By trains, I mean long distance Amtrak routes, particularly in the Western part of the country. Ideally, you'll want to take an overnight trip, preferably start to finish. These routes range from 35 hours for Los Angeles to Seattle on the Coast Starlight to 51 hours for Chicago to San Francisco on the California Zephyr (two nights.) The New Orleans to New York run, the Crescent, might work at 30 hours but I haven't tried that route and its been many years since I rode the Silver Star or Silver Meteor from NYC to Miami. As you might expect, the overnight City of New Orleans from Chicago via Memphis to the Big Easy can be quite the party train as can the longer Sunset Limited from LA to New Orleans. For route descriptions, timetables, menus, and reservations, check www.amtrak.com.

Something like airlines, Amtrak offers two classes – coach and "accommodations" – the latter really "first class" by another name. You really want accommodations on overnight trips. Sleeping in a coach seat is a great argument for strong opiates – it ain't easy. In accommodations, you pay for a ticket for carriage at the same price as coach but buy your room as a separate, additional charge that includes your meals in the dining car. But they don't offer a room for one – their smallest is a roomette with two beds.

The beauty with the Amtrak system is that even if you've boarded alone and paid for a roomette, you can still invite any ticketed passenger to join you, even for meals and as an overnight guest, until her (or your) ticketed destination. Money-wise, it's all the same to Amtrak. Most on-board staff know the deal although you do need to inform your car attendant and introduce your new bed buddy so the attendant can recognize the new face in the sleeper car and be accountable for all the passengers in case of an accident.

Who Rides Amtrak?

Amtrak clientele is diverse. They have three market niches pretty much to themselves – the obese who are too broad for airline seats, the neurotic who are afraid of flying, and the geriatrics who are too weak to travel any other way (using the special handicapped bedrooms.) None of these groups are of much interest.

Better are the college students and other young people moving about the country. Obviously, there are prime travel seasons for college students but there were young bargain hunting females on every train I've been on. Foreigners seem to love our trains, especially Australians and Germans, and both nationalities are friendly and eager to talk to Americans. Another surprising group of people are the recently divorced/widowed or those just escaping a failed relationship. The largest single group, however, are retired people who usually travel as couples. They tend to be friendly enough, but just not your focus.

The young American women and the recently divorced are your prime targets, depending on your own age. In either case, the best place to meet them is in the lounge car. Besides having the biggest windows and the best views, it also has a full-time bartender from early morning to midnight! With any game at all, you'll be able to strike up a conversation with a female of your choice. Women on trains are easy to approach since they feel safe and protected while on-board.

Once you've broken the ice with a particular woman you've met in the lounge car, and maybe had a couple of drinks with her, your next move is to invite her to visit your room in "first class." Choose carefully, because you two may be very intimate for the next 48 hours. You can consume your own private stash of booze in your room, something that's forbidden to coach passengers. Water, ice, cups, juice and soft drinks are provided as mixers in your sleeping car so bringing a pint of vodka or rum is thinking ahead and can save money. Remember to introduce your new friend to your car attendant.

The Mechanics of the Roomette

A roomette is not a roomy place for a tryst. Yet it is several notches better than the backseat of a car and infinitely better than the toilet on a 777. You will be able to lock the door and pull the curtains for privacy. The train's background noise when moving will block most conversation and non-screaming lovemaking sounds from your neighbors. If you DON'T pull the curtains while getting frisky, the car attendant may interrupt you to protect the sensitivities of the other passengers. Think of it as a very cozy, rolling hotel room.

Taking your new friend for a meal in the dining car is another gift. In any case, if the waiters see you two coming from the sleeping car end of the train (the diner and lounge cars are in the middle) and/or you've made a reservation for two, then they will simply ask if you're in coach or the sleepers – you say "yes" to sleepers and just sign the two order forms with your name and your car and room numbers.

The big step is inviting her to sleep in your roomette. If she's already tried sleeping in a coach seat, she's primed for your offer. You can also offer a shower—pre- or post-coital—there's one per sleeper car available for passengers who don't have one in their larger rooms. It works well and doesn't get much use.

Mistakes to Avoid

But if she takes you up on the overnight, don't let this beta move be yours:

Make her get her ass out of the rack and go with you to the dining car – don't play room service for her. Also, you'll want the bottom bunk for sleeping since it is a bit roomier than the top rack.

If you're in coach, don't despair! Getting overly amorous in your coach seats is discouraged since you're surrounded by other passengers although there are blankets if you're discreet and quiet after lights out. Better, the coach cars have "dressing rooms" downstairs that are larger and cleaner than the rest rooms and can be used when the passion temperature is right.

Other tips:

- Tip your car attendant, bartender, and head waiter at first meeting and remember their names. $20 each is a good start and gets their attention.

- Baggage check is available between the larger stations but there's plenty of room for carry-ons.

- Bring plenty of cash or credit cards to buy alcohol. The selection of wines (in half bottles or by the glass) in the dining car is usually decent, reasonably priced stuff. The price of alcohol is not included in accommodations.

- There have been no TSA pre-boarding inspections to date although you are asked to check your guns! Amtrak, by law, has a special gun safe in the baggage car.

- Dress up a bit and look sharp but comfortable. This gives you credibility with a broader range of females and with the staff. Shoes are required to be worn when not in your seat or compartment.

- A roll of duct tape is a favorite with regular Amtrak riders – a little tab can quiet annoying rattles or muffle a too-loud screamer.

- No smoking on the train but most schedules stop every couple of hours long enough for a smoke of whatever on the platform. If you don't smoke, get out anyway and walk up and down the train for exercise. Plus, you might meet someone you haven't seen in the lounge car yet – here's a chance for an invitation.

- Mingle early and often. Being seen as open and friendly, even with the retirees, can be the social proof she needs.

- Don’t give the staff lip or act the fool. They have the legal authority to smack you upside the head, cuff you, and leave your ass off on the Winnemucca platform at 2 am in January…. or worst.

- Ladies – if you are someday on a long train trip and a tall, handsome, well-dressed gentleman offers small talk, cocktails, and a chance to visit with him in his first class room, you’d be a fool to say no.

- Guys – if you should see a tall, handsome, well-dressed gentleman on a train making his moves on an attractive female, don’t you dare try to AMOG me.

Thomas Friedman Does Environmentalism

August 30, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

One day a few weeks ago, I was wandering a military clothing store looking for shiny things. This is the store on army posts that sell uniform items, boots, and souvenirs. It also has a small book section in it. The books mainly consist of military service topics such as evaluations, uniform standards, and accounts of specific battles. One book caught my eye though. It was Hot, Flat and Crowded and was written by Thomas Friedman. It was also marked "release 2.0, updated and expanded".

I recognized this author from his other books and his television appearances. I was curious as to why this book was for sale at this location. Could it be a supposed relevancy to war fighting? Maybe it is an attempt to change the views of the troops from above. Maybe the store got a really good deal from the publisher for it. I do not know why it was there, but I do know that the book did not appear to be selling well.

The book I purchased was paperback and the cover used a public domain art print. This immediately tipped of my suspicion that profit might be the prime motivator for the release of this book. When I got the book home, I looked in the back to see what sources he uses in the bibliography. More suspicion was raised when I learned there was no bibliography, just an index. With this discovery, the credibility of this book dropped significantly in my mind and I have not even started to read it. He starts his book with a quote from The Onion, and actually quotes Wikipedia on page 85.

One page 8 he states the thesis of his book:

> "My thesis then, which remains my thesis here, is that America could get its groove back by taking the lead in developing the technologies and policy solutions to address the world's biggest problems—the energy and environmental stresses growing out of a planet getting hot, flat and crowded."

He divides the book into five parts. In the first part he tries to make the correlation between the decline in the environment with the decline of the financial economy in America. He delves into "the greatest generation", baby boomers, and what he calls the "regeneration", or the offspring of said baby boomers. I agree with his point that the baby boomers tend to be more like the grasshopper than the ant from an old Aesop fable with resources and environments, but I disagree with his assignation of responsibility for the correction of this to his "regeneration". I cannot stand it when someone expects a group to fix ills of the past done by others. And it is extra galling that he as a baby boomer is saying it.

In the second part he highlights the overcrowding of the earth, the various financial bubbles of the earth, and the dependence on cheap fossil fuels and the political blow-back associated with it. He also discusses carbon dioxide, and how it functions as a greenhouse gas and how it is evil. He also makes plenty of references to other proximate social activist causes to the green movement. He does not mention how carbon was originally deposited in the ground so many millions of years ago.

The third part deals with solutions. At this point I noticed he start to gloss over a lot of things that don't agree with his thesis. It seems all his solutions have no actual cons just all pros. For example he doesn't go over the detriments of wind power to local bird populations. Or the fact that in real life centralization does not lead to more efficiency.

Loading...

In part four he goes over the rise of China as an economic and industrial powerhouse. He goes over the pollution problems associated with this rise. At this point I noticed he avoids big elephants in the room. He makes the explicit argument that the government of China has the consent of the governed. The Chinese Civil War, the Cultural Revolution, Tienanmen Square, and the various Tibetan uprisings dispute this. His assertion of the direction of the ninth Chinese five-year plan for 2006 to 2011 as "green" is not actually reflected in the plan as found in the Chinese government's official portal. It appears more coal power plants, internal trade, and the development of Western regions was the actual focus of said plan.

Finally, part five deals with the United States. He goes over the unpredictability of markets and how if they were predictable a green revolution would be able to take hold. He also rehashes China with his respect for its ability to make sweeping changes by dictate. He then goes on to compare the market capitalization of various companies in their sectors in the green economy. I find his charts misleading both in their content and conclusions.

While responsible guardianship of the environment is a noble cause, this book seems to me to be more about steering people socially than it is about protecting the environment. One has to read between the lines to decipher his probable motivations.

Conclusion

While the earth should be cared for, following men like this would be a fool's errand. I find his position disingenuous at best and subversive at worst. He seems to play the old "co-op –insert activist cause here– in order to make money". Just reading his preface gives this away.

"Welcome to the release 2.0 paperback edition of Hot, Flat, and Crowded. I've always viewed my books the way computer programmers view software as works in progress that should be updated whenever possible."

Sorry Mr. Friedman, computer software makers create new versions of buggy software to make more money not for the thrill of updating it. His book uses many buzzwords, anecdotes, and emotional appeals targeted to a specific audience to adopt his "solutions". One quote is illustrative:

> "Telling every individual on the planet who wants or can afford a car that they cannot have one will be changing our lifestyle. Bringing down your maximum speed limit to 55 mph, or banning taxis that are not hybrids-such efforts do not strike me as fundamentally cramping anyone's lifestyle."

His solipsism is on full display with that quote. Giving people like him the ability and power to do such things would not end well. I don't think he realizes that the price of his latte would go up exponentially if his ideas were implemented.

The book comes across as a fancier version of Al Gore's "activism". His book is actually somewhat political for he failed to mention President Clinton's sale of oil on the open market from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve in the 90s. He also makes no mention of the local economic devastation that would ensue with a collapse of coal as an energy source.

Should you acquire this book? Yes, but only if you want a contemporary work to show future generations that people actually thought this way. The whole Solyndra debacle provides an immediate example on why the ideas advocated in this book would end badly. If you do choose to pick up this book, do it in a fashion that would not enrich the author.

Western Culture Is Dead

August 31, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Western culture is dead. It is a poison in the slow drip IV attached to us from birth. We have all the comforts we could ever ask for; what else is there left to do?

Everyone I've talked to in the past week has had nothing more important on their tongues than Miley Cyrus' 'performance' at the VMAs. On the surface it seems overtly sexual. She awkwardly dances, constantly sticks her tongue out, twerks, frames her genitals etc. Everything is so blatant in its meaning, yet lacks the fluidity and sensuality of a sincerely arousing performance.

I've heard people claim she is just a knock off of Lady Gaga, who is a knockoff of Madonna. People defend her and praise her confidence for being true to herself. Young girls idolize these actions and hope they can one day amount to absolutely nothing leeching off of others for subsistence. They want to live a life doing what they want, but don't want to accept the fact that life is pointless if you do not have drive to do anything of value.

We are attached to our smartphones, laptop screens, TVs. Technology at every turn. We have become incapable of critical thinking and instead reach for Google, or even a calculator for the most basic of questions. There was once an American Dream where hard work, perseverance, and intelligence was rewarded with opportunity and a chance to leave a legacy.

Everyone has had their 15 minutes, and soon enough everyone from sterilized and effeminate hip-hop artists to wage slaves will awake in a sweat from the American dream and will realize they have not accomplished anything except a marketable, politically correct image.

Sex sells more than ever. Farrah Abraham of teen mom fame whored herself out for attention. Her child will grow up to see their mother getting fucked hard in the ass and gagging on a strange mans above-average cock. Her child will read how she claimed it was the best day of the actors life getting to fuck her. Her child will look upon the wrinkled and empty face of their mother and realize they were the best thing to ever happen to her. Not because she was a proud mother, but because she was able to skyrocket her social relevance and provide fleeting material wealth.

Social networking leaves us depressed and questioning our life choices, student debt makes people realize a university is just another business, ‘performances’ on the TV leave us disgusted and wanting more. We want more to hate and more to consume, but never want to give anything back.

Men are taught from birth that their nature is wrong, that they are supposed to fawn over women and sacrifice their lifeblood to please her for the hopes of a piece of pussy.

Our food is an amalgamation of everything pleasurable. Our social life is instant gratification on a computer screen. Our connectedness to our peers comes from watching ‘real’ people do ‘real’ things on TV. Our life is spent in front of screens wishing and hoping that something would give purpose to our lives. Because of this we create a hollow identity to gain the approval of others.

The West’s societal identity has been replaced by narcissism, materialism, and blind uniformity. Even this piece is a tired cliche.

The Rape Of Fatty Arbuckle

September 1, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Fatty Arbuckle was a highly successful silent film era actor. He was reknown for his impressive comedic talent and singing abilities, as well as his incredible size. In his era, the early 20th century, a man of Arbuckle's size was not common at all. He attracted all sorts of attention, often negative, for his body mass. Still, he was known to be an extremely kind man, soft spoken and very much a gentleman. Despite his addiction to morphine and alcohol, he was happily married to a woman he met a few years before his talent was put on display by the burgeoning Hollywood theatrical scene. Despite his popularity, kind-hearted nature and impressive wealth, he fell victim to a tragic accusation: rape.

Shortly after signing an unbelievable contract for unprecedented amount of money, Arbuckle and two of his friends decided to travel north to San Francisco and throw a soiree to celebrate Arbuckle's absolute stardom. Over the course of a Labor Day weekend during the early days of the Prohibition Era, Arbuckle and his friends rented three rooms at the St. Francis hotel in downtown San Francisco. They revelry and merriment began early in the day on Labor Day; the ensuing dance party and socializing was fueled by a large stash of banned liquor.

Virginia Rappe

Around 3 P.M., Arbuckle retired to his room to get changed and travel around the city. At this time, a young woman named Virginia Rappe was in his bathroom, in intense distress from alcohol consumption and her personal medical issues, profusely throwing up. Arbuckle helped her to his bed, as he thought she merely had drank too much. He left the room briefly and came back, only to find her writhing body on the floor. Arbuckle, once again, placed her back on the bed. Rappe was an intensely disturbed and unstable individual. She was born to a single mother and, by some accounts, had already had four abortions by the tender age of sixteen. She had fought bouts of venereal disease, had medical conditions that were worsened by her alcoholism and took to claiming men had harmed or wronged her once she was drunk.

Bambina Delmont

Observing this situation between Arbuckle and Rappe was the manipulative Bambina Delmont. She had a terrible reputation as a serial accuser of misdeeds in order to swindle and blackmail various celebrities in Hollywood. Once she had seen Arbuckle repeatedly leave the room and return the crafty gears in her mind began to turn. Belmont would falsely claim she had to force her way into the room, only to find Rappe nude and bloodied, with Arbuckle's obese and nude body blocking the door.

In reality, Arbuckle had left to grab a bucket of ice, as to ease the pain she claimed to be emanating from her swollen abdomen. He and some guests began to rub ice on her abdomen and her thighs, trying to calm her insistent cries. At this juncture, Rappe uttered a fatally damning statement to the rapt attention of Belmont: "What did he do to me, Maudie? [Arbuckle] did this to me." Rappe was placed in an ice bath that calmed her nerves and eased her outbursts. Hotel staff was contacted and she taken to a room to rest. A doctor administered morphine to ease her pain. She eventually was admitted to a hospital a couple days later, where she died of a ruptured bladder.

Arbuckle traveled back to Los Angeles, only find out that within a week, his whole life would crumble before his eyes. An ambitious young prosecutor in San Francisco wanted a blockbuster case and saw this situation as his case. His star witness, the aforementioned Belmont, changed her story significantly every time she recounted the incident to authorities. That did not stop him from pursuing Arbuckle legally.

However, what felled Arbuckle was the machinations of William Randolph Hearst, a calculating man who saw the incredible power of the emerging national press. He was the leading proponent of yellow journalism and actively sought to distort stories and situations in order to further his profits and status.

He published incredibly sensationalistic fare that painted Arbuckle was a serial abuser of Rappe, having not just ruptured her bladder through his great weight that crushed her body, but also assaulted her with a Coke bottle. Hearst played off America's distrust of Hollywood's sexual freedom and rampant abuse of substances. Further, painted the obese Arbuckle was a rank glutton, even though Arbuckle had been overweight since childhood – suggesting biological reasons for his weight. Still, this media coverage was absolutely damning and completely ruined Arbuckle's career. He subsequently was tried three times for his role in the death of the Rappe, with the final trial resulting in acquittal, with the jury issuing an apology—completely unprecedented for a jury.

In the aftermath, he was temporarily banned from Hollywood and had his movies banned as well. He was allowed to return and began to do work under a pseudonym, Will B. Good. Little came of this so he took to abusing alcohol and morphine to ease his anguish. In the summer of 1933, right after signing a new contract to do a new movie, he died of a heart attack in his sleep at age 46.

In the aftermath of this debacle, it is universally recognized that Arbuckle was innocent of the rape accusation. As usual in America, a dogmatic and hateful witch-hunt — usually fueled by the media — results in innocent people having their lives completely ruined, only to have people posthumously issue apologies for their inability to rationally approach accusations of crimes and misdeeds. America, starting with the Salem Witch Trials, has a long and off-putting history of abusing the criminal justice system in order to slake America's thirst for moral judgmentalism. However, what is most salient about the Arbuckle situation was the role the media played.

Loading...

Hearst was a pioneer in yellow journalism, a type of reporting that is, essentially, sensationalizing news stories with the aim of increasing profits. Hearst was a master of misleading headlines, manipulating facts to fit a prefabricated narrative and pitting underdogs against allegedly far more powerful forces. This sort of reporting has lead to the wasteland of so-called news sites such as Jezebel, Daily Kos, Fox News and MSNBC. Just about any mainstream news source has strong roots in yellow journalism.

In his greedy and self-absorbed pursuit of control of media, Hearst created a false god of sorts, as he helped establish that the media is the decider of what is or is not a significant story, what the issues to be debated are, the character of the people they report, etc. He established that the media is the ultimate authority in America. His completely negative portrayal of Arbuckle did not just reaffirm the image conservative society held of Hollywood, but inadvertently created the media Leviathan that we have today.

People never complain when the media reports stories in a way that affirms their ideology or sympathies, they don't speak out when a story is clearly slanted in a way that dishonestly represents an issue they agree with. People only complain when figures in media represent an issue in a way that conflicts with their ideology or sympathies. Take Trayvon Martin. The whole issue was an embarrassingly obvious example of this, as two discrete camps — both created and fueled by the media — emerged, with one camp claiming Zimmerman did not kill Martin out of racism and the other camp asserting Martin was killed because of his race.

The question that never surfaced was whether the state could prove that Zimmerman met the standard of proof necessary to convict a person of a hate crime. That was the sole issue presented, not the deluge of side issues produced by the media in order to drive revenues. I have no doubt most people have a strong opinion on this issue and that is the point — the media wants to decide the arc of issues and what you think. All liberal outlets were distraught at Zimmerman's acquittal, wondering aloud why the jury got the verdict wrong, while the media got it right. The media gets to be the deciders while people get a public forum in which they prove they aren't X, Y or Z; in the Zimmerman case, people get a public forum in which they can prove they are not racist.

As was seen with the tragic life of David Reimer, Roscoe (Fatty) Arbuckle was just a man in the wrong place at the wrong time. His place amongst the stars was aborted by the despicable machinations of a woman possessed with the desire to rip apart men who were more successful than her. On that fateful day in a San Franciscan hotel, Belmont found a perfect target in Arbuckle — a fat, emerging star of the suspiciously-viewed Hollywood who was too kind and nice for his own good. He was just an object, a cog in the games of the self-possessed people around him: Belmont who wanted to sow the seeds of discord, the prosecutor who desired the Californian governorship and William Randolph Hearst who desired to both discredit Hollywood and maximize his profits.

Eventually, Arbuckle's life was lost to the depressing vices of alcohol and painkillers, but his demise portends greater lessons for America. As Hearst proved, the media Leviathan he helped created wasn't interested in the pursuit of truth and knowledge, but profits based out of preying on America's collective social psychology. This Leviathan exists to this day, pretending to provide objective news while shunting said news through the idea that the media is the decider of truth in society.

Whether truth or rationality was the goal of American media at any point is irrelevant because of what America media has become — a massive authoritarian project aimed at maximizing profits through recruiting loyal followers that suborn their own thoughts and interpretations of situations, events and people through the lens of the preferred media provider. The great sleight of hand is media allowing people enough space to believe they are thinking for themselves or coming to realizations when in fact it is spoon-fed to them

Was the information that exonerated Arbuckle readily available to the consumers of media? No. He was treated as guilty from the outset and Hearst actively suppressed any information or evidence that contradicted his narrative that Arbuckle was nothing more than an obese rapist that killed his victim through his weight. Hearst's supreme desire to control the narrative far outweighed the reporting of facts over interpretations. People thought they were realizing that Arbuckle was a gluttonous rapist – they were told that in a fashion that made them think it was a judgment they made, not made for them.

You should always beware a man that seeks to deny your access to knowledge, for in his heart he seeks to be your master.

Why Do You Care If Black Guys Like Fat White Girls?

September 1, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There's no denying that black men have a preference for thick women. Even in Europe with black men straight from Africa, they still go for the girl with strong asses. It's not that these men are getting rejected by skinny girls and then resigning themselves to thick girls—they go straight for them.

Most black men simply have no interest in petite body types. In Ukraine, a land of super petite women with flat asses, the African man will somehow find the huge ass needle in the haystack. It's like they have a sixth sense for it (studies must be done to test their sensitive ass antennae).

Some white men on the internet like to mock black men for this. They say they are chubby chasing, dumpster diving, and so on. More severely, the say that black men are elevating the overall attitude of women because of their aggressive game and high approach frequency. But they fail to realize that black men are only raising the attitudes of the big women they approach. Remember: they don't approach thin women any more than white men do. Unless your target is a bigger girl, black men have no effect on how you will be received by a normal-weighted white girl with an average ass. In fact, hipster white women don't get approach by black men at all.

Loading…
Black men are doing white men everywhere a favor by satisfying thick women. Every thick white girl who just got the veiny black snake is that much less likely to cockblock out of sexual frustration. They may not even make it out to the club because of vaginal fatigue. It's true that these thick women have higher self-esteem thanks to the preference of black men, but if you don't like thick women, this doesn't affect you. You shouldn't be bothered by it.

The last time I was in DC, I fornicated with a thin girl who I suspected was approached often. She told me she wasn't, in spite of DC's large black population. The reason? She was petite. The black man's behavior actually helped me because she could see how she was approached much less than her meatier friends. When I came around to put in an attempt, she received me well and allowed raw dog sex to occur.

If you like thicker women, then yes, black men are not helping you. In fact, they are messing your game up. You have to intensely compete with them for asses that jiggle and gyrate. But if you're a white man, it's doubtful you have this preference, and therefore can blame several other factors for sexual airballs before black guys. Personally, I thank them for distracting a type of girl I don't want. I will not shame men for going after the type of women they desire… especially when that type isn't the same as mine.

Tips On Looking Your Best As You Get Older

September 2, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I made a recent comment in an ROK article that I thought could be more fully fleshed out in a separate post. The subject is one that concerns all of us: how to continue to look your best as you get older. The following points are my own opinions and observations about what things have helped me look and feel younger than my years. As I see it, "looking your best" has three general categories: physical best, mental best, and emotional best. I will examine each of these categories in some detail.

Physical Best

Your "physical best" is protecting and preserving your body so that you can be viewed as looking (by general consent) younger than your age. In short, you've got to take care of yourself. Some things that I've found to be important in this vein are:

You need to focus particular attention on your skin. Sun can age your skin remarkably quickly. Even if you have never had problems with your skin in the past, bad things can just erupt out of nowhere. The most important skin care tip I can pass on is to wear sunscreen or sunblock of some sort. There are two general categories of sunscreens or sunblocks: chemical and mineral. The mineral sunscreens have zinc or titanium oxides in them, and work by reflecting the sun's rays from you. Chemical sunscreens work by absorbing the sun's rays and dissipating them as heat.

I never paid any of this much mind until after my last trip to Brazil a couple months ago, when I noticed I was developing pigmentation discoloration on my forehead. I never wore sunscreen diligently there in all my years of traveling. A trip to the dermatologist followed, and I learned many things I didn't know. So, profit from my mistakes. Use sunscreen. I'm told that the protection level should be at least 50 in the summer, and 35 in winter.

Schedule a comprehensive physical examination once per year to give yourself a thorough "review". This is a pain in the ass, but it really is necessary. A decent doctor can catch things that can be solved in the early stages, and this can save you tons of money and stress in the long run.

You need to eat right and avoid garbage. It is very easy to slide in bad food habits, especially when you are single. But you need to be disciplined. There are tons of books and other materials out there about nutrition, and I have nothing new to offer in terms of any diet recommendations, except that you should eat a wide variety of foods. I don't think any other advice makes as much sense. Make a special emphasis on variety: fruits, vegetables, meats, fish, grains, nuts, dairy products, etc. You just can't go wrong with variety. I don't believe in food fads. You should avoid processed foods and junk foods whenever possible. Don't eat out often, and learn to cook well for yourself. It's an essential skill.

Some guys swear by supplements. I don't. The only supplements I take are a mens' multivitamin, and fish oil capsules. Does the fish oil do any good? I have no idea. But I think so. I don't mess with any other supplements. I suspect most of them are a waste of money and put undue stresses on the internal organs. And if you're eating a truly balanced diet, you'll get all of what you need from that.

You need to exercise. And I mean vigorously and regularly, as if it really is part of your life. When you pass 40, the focus should be on gaining and preserving muscle, since it will keep you looking good, protect you from injury, and keep your testosterone levels up. So, weightlifting should be a main focus. But don't ignore other elements of fitness. You should also incorporate some vigorous swimming, running, or other endurance-related training into your regimen. And don't forget flexibility. You would be surprised how freak accidents can happen by just walking around. The worse hamstring injury I got was just from walking around Tokyo about a year and a half ago. All I was doing was walking. Yoga is also great for flexibility. The problem is that it is also boring as hell. I don't do it, but would suggest it if you want to mix things up a bit.

Do not go without sex for long periods of time. The male animal needs intimacy, and lack of such intimacy with females can produce neuroses, anxieties, complexes, and all sorts of depression problems. So, get out there and make it happen one way or another. The chase will do wonders for your morale, too.

Mental Best

Regarding you mental best, the key thing here is keeping your mind active and intensely focused. Don't believe all that bullshit about it being "harder to learn as you get older." It's actually easier in many ways, because you know how to learn more efficiently than you used to. Take up hobbies or activities that exercise other parts of your brain: learn a new musical instrument, learn to paint, learn to sculpt clay, stone, or wood, learn a new language. Anything. The idea is that you need to keep yourself intense and focused. I am a very intense and driven person, so this type of thing is necessary for me as a way of channeling off surplus energy.

Another way to keep yourself sharp is by being around and interacting with stimulating, interesting, or intelligent people. Avoid deadbeats, flat-liners, dunces, and sluggards. They will only bring you down. This applies equally to men and women. Hanging around the wrong sort of people can really drag a man down. So, pick carefully the people you spend your time with. Time is precious.

Emotional Best

Loading...
You've just got to nurture your spirit and morale as you get older. Once you've seen the same old story play out over and over again like you've seen it in your 20s and 30s, it is very easy to get cynical and jaded about everything. Sometimes I get that line from an old Digital Underground song repeating in my head as I walk around a new foreign city: "all around the world, the same song". It really feels like that, all too often. I suppose some of this is natural.

When you're a single man and living in the West, you are going to be subjected to severe stresses from society and the media. You need to be aware of this. There is such a volume of stupefying trash out there in the media and on people's lips that it becomes difficult to escape the steady drum-beat of conformist brainwashing. If Goebbels himself could come back today to modern America, he would be truly impressed at the advanced state of propaganda, groupthink, and mind control that has successfully been able to distract people from what really matters.

Travel frequently. You can all-too-easily become trapped in a rut. Nothing shatters the illusions like travel. I can't stress this enough. My friend Maverick Traveler (who is extremely well-traveled) has structured his life around travel, and to a more modest extent so have I. To me, it is a critical part of my sanity (or insanity). To range across space and time, make languages your passports and companions.

Shut off or disconnect the television. Basic cable is fine, but anything more than that is a waste of money and a real downer. Listen to foreign newscasts on the internet, in the target language(s) you're studying.

Avoid overly negative people. You know who these people are in your life. You have the "sad sack" types, the people who hobble around looking pathetic and looking like life has crushed them. They're the ones at the gym, in the locker room, with a distended belly, whining about their gall bladder operation or how their aunt is dying of lymphoma. Bottom line: nobody cares, and flatliner negativism has a way of becoming a substitute for action. Then you have the "I'm gonna" types. These are the guys who are always just about to do something great, but never do for one reason or another. They resent anyone better or happier than they are. Say hello, and keep moving. I love to bitch about bullshit as much as anyone, but at the end of the day I know how to roll up my sleeves and keep going. Venting is fine, and performs a necessary function of releasing stress. But just don't let it slide into bottomless darkness.

Then you have the "angry" types, who are convinced that the entire world is conspiring against them, whether it's the UN, the "Illuminati", Gozer The Destroyer, or whatever. They use whatever fixation they have as an excuse not to try to improve themselves. Then there are the "vampire" types, those men and women who just drain you emotionally for one reason or another. They might be old friends from school whom you no longer have anything in common with. Or they might be that wife, girlfriend, or fuck buddy you just can't get rid of. Or they may be one of those 100 useless "friends" on Facebook. Fire their asses. Or powercheck their asses into the proverbial boards of the hockey rink. You'll feel better. Literally.

We all have a bit of these tendencies, but you need to keep this stuff under control or it will consume you.

You should embrace some sort of world-view that protects you from depression, negativism, and other bad thoughts. Everyone is different in this regard. I know people who have widely varied belief systems (e.g., mystical theurgy, religion, atheism, philosophy, etc), but who all share the commonality of sincerity. It doesn't really matter what you believe in, as long as you sincerely believe it and it helps you deal with the stresses, agonies, and trials of life.

Because, believe me, bad things will happen to you. No one escapes this aspect of Fate. And if you don't have the maturity or seasoning of a comprehensive belief system, you may find it difficult to cope. As Gavan Daws relates in his classic wartime study Prisoners of the Japanese, the inmates of Japanese POW camps in the Pacific who best survived were those who had a strong belief system.

Finally, be aware of your time. Every great man valued his time above all else. I recently read how Charlemagne, the greatest of medieval kings, would hear cases and diplomatic issues as he dressed in the morning. And beware of "non-game changers": spinning your wheels on pointless nonsense for little real value gained. I saw a hilarious cartoon in the New Yorker Magazine a while ago about this. It was entitled (of course) Non Game Changers. You can find it easily on Google. It listed a series of activities that appear important, but are not (rearranging the living room, switching to organic milk, reading "Ulysses", getting on Facebook, getting off Facebook).

To make real changes in your life, they have to be real game-changers. Don't waste time on sideshows, distractions, or stupidities. Big, bold changes are often better than the incremental bullshit you've been doing up till now. Shock your system and shock your mind, and force yourself to adapt.

Don't isolate yourself. People need interaction constantly. Many neuroses and complexes could be nipped in the bud if people had others to keep them in check. Everyone needs a smack upside the head every now and then to keep himself grounded. When you're alone, you have only yourself to talk to, and after a while the walls start closing in on you. People with active, intense minds need to be aware of this more than others.

And finally, have a sense of humor. Keep laughing, no matter what. Because you're on this roller-coaster ride whether you like it or not, and you might as well stick around to see what happens.

How Modern Feminism Won The Day

September 2, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

By now I'm sure you've all heard about the recent debacle with entertainer Miley Cyrus at the latest edition of the MTV Video Music Awards. If not, here you go:

My problems with the quality of this performance are multiple:

a). The fact that the clothing looked like crap on her (tried to mimic the Blurred Lines girls, failed).
b). The fact that she can't dance.
c). The fact that she can't twerk but insists on trying despite having no ass and no rhythm.
d). The fact that she looked like try-hard wannabe-edgy trash on stage. She's working so hard to seem "out of control" that she can't seem to keep her tongue in her mouth.

My concern for this performance is not about it being too sexual in nature. I'm all for women getting up on stage in skimpy clothing and putting on blatantly sexual performances that offend puritanical sensibilities. I just want it done properly is all:

Miley Cyrus' performance was just poorly done, it's that simple.

However, if I'm being totally honest, I can't really knock Cyrus' hustle here. In today's social media driven world in which eyeballs are the most prized commodity, Miley Cyrus is a winner. People are talking about her and watching her, and at the end of the day that is all that really matters for her career wise.

To me, however, her performance signifies another important development: the rise and success of third wave feminism.

To understand this success, we have to understand what third wave feminists have sought to accomplish in recent decades. They saw a society in which they perceived women to have been forced into fairly strict caricatures of femininity. They saw a model of "wholesome" and "good" all-American femininity put in front of girls and they concluded that girls were generally punished severely for deviating from that model.

Who is this wholesome, good, all-American girl? Well, she's generally white (bonus points if blonde), fit (normal BMI or close to it), well-spoken, and not prone to giving off a heavily sexual, raunchy vibe. She's cute, she's kind, she's unassuming and she's never provocative in her style of dress, behavior or speech.

Feminist concerns stemmed from the fact that, in their view, not every woman could fit in with this standard model of femininity and, more importantly, not every woman should have to. They wanted to see alternative visions of femininity that went beyond these stereotypes promoted and celebrated. That meant getting to a point where women could go against nearly every trait associated with the “all-American good girl” model and suffer few significant consequences for it.

In short, there was an enthusiasm among feminists and young women in general for rebellion against this model of mainstream, Disney-style, all-American femininity that was increasingly being viewed as oppressive, outdated and downright boring.

Miley Cyrus has now become a symbol of this rebellion and its success. Why? Because she has successfully flipped the bird to that old model of traditional American femininity and suffered very few consequences for it. She is a living embodiment of the reality third-wave feminism sought to create for all women, one in which a woman can do virtually whatever she wants and still “have it all.”

Miley Cyrus has it all.

1. She has the “dream guy”.

PRESTIGE
GAME ON

2. She’s got plenty of money (and her antics will only earn her more)

3. Her career is in fine shape (her antics will only improve it further).

Yes, she has still received plenty of criticism (the feminists will call it “slut shaming”) for her antics, but in the end none of it really matters. She has suffered no real romantic, social or economic consequences for her actions. She’s still got the guy, still got the money, still got the career and still got the fame and popularity. She’s in a situation that I’d bet the bulk of young female America would love to be in. Most will never come close (they don’t have her connections or her finances), but with her example they can maintain hope that it is possible, a hope their parents and grandparents didn’t really have.

Miley Cyrus is not the first of her kind. Madonna was similarly controversial in her youth, and other starlets like Britney Spears have had their out of control moments on stage. When taken together, however, these examples show us how far third-wave feminists have come in their bid to normalize deviation from established and allegedly restrictive definitions of traditional American femininity. They show that it has become possible within the last 15-20 years to openly disregard these norms, or to even insult them, and still find widespread support and adulation within a society where there was only shaming and stigmatization before.

The patriarchy of old is long dead, and the strict limitations it placed on both the men and women under its dominion have gone with it. Miley Cyrus is not the first sign of this social metamorphosis, and she will not be the last.

How To Get The Most Out Of Tinder

September 2, 2013 | by Black Knight | Link | Original Link

The newest trend in online dating is the Tinder app, which shows pictures of girls in your geographic area that you can rate as “Hot” or “Not.” If you “match” with someone, you are both notified and can message each other within the app. Though we’ve written before about the pitfalls of online dating, here are a few reasons why Tinder can be a valuable addition to your game:

1. Target Selection/ Quality

I’ve found Tinder to have a much more favorable ratio of decent girls than other online venues. The median age is probably about 22, with large numbers of college girls looking to meet people outside of school. Like any online dating service, you’re going to get the most out of Tinder if you are young and good looking, but it can provide a few valuable leads on younger girls who are already open to dating older men. It’s doubly useful if you don’t live near a college campus and rarely see these girls in the wild.

2. Time Efficiency

Tinder’s elegant design allows you to avoid drudgery of composing messages, rapid fire copypasta, hiding fatties, listing your hobbies, and answering match questions. The app cuts through this useless B.S. to the the elemental question of dating: “Do I find this person attractive?” You can spend a few minutes at a time swiping people left or right according to your interest, and the app provides a convenient instant messaging interface for initial contact.

3. Interest Efficiency

On OKCupid, girls can keep a profile dormant while they rake in messages from simps that feed their ego without having to leave their house, actually creating a perverse incentive for them NOT to go on actual dates. With Tinder, they are able to get messages only from men they have proactively flagged as being attractive. You’ll still get some of the inevitable flaking and attention-whoring, but if you match with a girl on Tinder you know she at least has a certain level of initial interest you can work with.

There’s a small learning curve to using Tinder, but here are three ways you can maximize your experience out of the box:

1. Use Your Best Pictures

This should be priority one for any dating profile, and even more important on Tinder due to the lack of other communication prior to getting swiped. My hit rate up significantly after switching to a picture that I thought was only slightly better than my previous one.

2. Get The Number Quickly

Like other online dating venues, girls are inundated with the sheer volume of thirsty guys. She swiped you because she thought you were cute, but if she won't give you her number after a few back and forth messages (no more than 3-4 typically necessary), you can safely assume she's not interested and just move on. Though the flake rate is still high, there are fewer guys competing for her attention. The numbers game will work more to your advantage because there's already some preselection at work. Move it over as quickly as possible to a more permanent method of communication, because sometimes girls will forget to check the app for new messages.

3. Use Liberally During Travel

Travel is one situation where Tinder really shines. Though it only searches within a radius of your own location (rather than letting you filter by geographic area), Tinder helps you get dates even if you did not pipeline before leaving. The best method is to swipe through as many girls as you can on your first day in town, preferably as soon as you arrive. If you're in a populated area, you will pick up several matches over the ensuing days as girls log into their profiles, and you can set up meetings for later during the trip or the next time you are in that town.

You will find that the short-engagement nature of Tinder does not detract from real life game or demotivate you from making actual approaches like other online dating sites tend to do. No electronic approach is a substitute for real life game, but Tinder represents an efficient supplement to the usual methods — once you swipe a girl, she's out of sight and mind unless you match. For a few minutes at a time and minimal messaging, you can add a few prospects you might not otherwise encounter.

Negative HIV Tests For Sale

September 3, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It has come to my attention that women are selling positive pregnancy tests on Craigslist. It is assumed these tests are not for making funny Youtube videos, but deceiving men in the hopes of gaining their commitment.

Avoid scams, deal locally! Do NOT wire funds (Western Union, Moneygram). Beware cashier checks, money orders, shipping, non-local buyers/sellers. More info

A site called Daily Dot found it possibly reprehensible that this is being allowed, but stops short of judging the women who engage in positive pregnancy test commerce:

> I'm all for women with a business plan, and the concept of a ratchet network intrigues me, but this might be taking the idea of "lean in" a little too far.

I paid careful attention to this story for several days after its release, waiting for outrage from the American media. I waited in vain, because there was none (it only made the rounds on the Men's Rights subreddit). This was actually good news for us over at ROK, since as you already know, we are looking to make some money for the site. We have decided on the male equivalent of selling positive pregnancy tests, and don't anticipate any criticism to our venture.

Negative HIV Tests

For only $50, we can sell you a bonafide negative HIV test. You can give it to whomever you want—we don't ask questions. Here's how it will work:

1. You purchase a HIV home test.

2. Contact us to get the address of the nearest HIV negative ROK writer. Mail the test to him. (European readers will be mailing me their test.)

3. We will bleed, drool, urinate, or defecate on the test, whichever is required as per the protocol.

4. We will mail the test back to you through express mail. You can then forward the test to the laboratory for a guaranteed, worry-free result.

Special Upgrade Combo

If you purchase a negative HIV test within the next week, you get a negative syphilis upgrade for only $5 more. That's right—you will be confirmed negative for HIV and syphilis. And you know what, since we appreciate the loyalty of our readership, we will toss in a negative herpes test at no extra charge. If you are interested in our service, please email with the result you desire.

Don't let a little STD ruin a relationship you want with a woman. Order an ROK Negative STD Result test today so that you can continue having sex just as if you were STD-free. Since we anticipate such a huge demand for this service, please be patient in receiving a reply to your inquiry. Thank you for your patronage.

“Russian Girls Are All Whores”

September 4, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

That, or a variation of that conclusory statement, is what various girls told me after hearing I was going to Russia for an extended period of time. My sister told me to be careful because they are evil girls. My mom told me that’s what she heard about Russian girls from men she’s talked to. A female friend of mine from a Western European country stated to me that they are all whores and prostitutes. Even the girls I dated in Ukraine would tell me how horrible Russian girls are.

So were they right? Absolutely not. And after my six weeks in Russia this summer I found out why so many girls hated on their Russian sisters… they just simply can’t compete.

In almost every way I can think of, Russian girls surpass their competition. Even though six weeks is hardly sufficient time to make such a bold claim as I just did, I have traveled enough and spent enough time chasing/dating/fornicating foreign women that I think I can make some judgments.

Looks

There is no escaping the importance of aesthetics. Despite being subjective in nature, there are certain things most men can agree on and mind-blowing beauty is one of them. Moreso in Moscow but still existent in some of the other cities I visited, you are exposed to girls that are simply astonishing. Day, night, subway, the club, the park, wherever. Two times in my life I’ve just completely lost the ability to approach girls because of shock. Both times were in Moscow.

Sure, there are gorgeous girls everywhere in the world. The high-end Brazilian girls are amazing. But the higher-end Russians are higher. Argentina has many many hot sexy girls walking around. But they come at a higher frequency in Russia.

Their Ukrainian sisters can compete… and compete well. But they still come up short. Both Ukrainian and Russian girls have sexy, thin and tall bodies. But Russian girls have tits and asses too. Russian girls also have no teeth or acne issues, which is commonly a problem with Ukrainian girls.

I'm pretty sure I don't have to explain the comparison to American girls…

Sophistication

Whereas going on a date with an American girl is an exercise of restraint in either offing yourself or reaching over and slapping her for her idiocy, and dating a Ukrainian girl is sometimes the equivalent of dating a cardboard box in a dress and heels, Russian girls are interesting, fun and entertaining to be with. The students you date seem more mature than most girls you've dated in the past. The working class girls show up to a date as if they were attending a wedding, and instead of bitching about their bosses they compliment you and ask how your day was. Most if not all have interesting stories to tell.

These girls have actual skills, whether being able to sing, draw, know a different language, or tell you about the latest nonfiction book they are reading. And you sit there, staring at the long hair and sexy dress and wonder how this is possible. I won't forget the girl who could win most reality show singing competitions serenading my friend and me at 6:00 a.m., then sleeping for an hour before waking up to go to the market to have breakfast prepared for when we wake up. Or the girl who started showing me paintings she drew that could battle for space at a museum.

I will even go a step further and say that their sophistication in evil is higher. Ukrainian girls for example are some sneaky and devious bitches, but it is at a basic level. I had a Ukrainian girl I dated tell me she is going to Greece with "her friend" who is female. I could care less, but for fun I told her to send me a picture of them two together. She couldn't as she obviously was there with a guy. I got every excuse in the book on why she couldn't, from they are "not that close of friends to take pictures together" to "how dare I not trust her." It was quite funny.

Compare that to a Russian girl's conniving. Most Russian girls I met were incredibly sweet and gentle (until time for sex). Nonetheless, the tricky ones can really be tricky. I will be the first to admit I got duped by what seemed to be a sweet, innocent 18 year old. She invited me out to a club, greeted me with some champagne upon arrival, and was wearing a sexy white dress. She was all over me, a smart tactic to lower my defenses. Her friends flirting with my friend. We partied all night with them (aka we paid for all the drinks), and in the end of the night she and her friends bounced with some local guys who showed up at the last second to pick them up. Although in the FSU you are expected to pay for everything when out with girls, and I don't really mind as more times than not it leads to success, I take full responsibility for being taken for a ride. That said I do have to commend her ability to portray herself in that manner. From an 18 year old girl at that.

Sex and Passion

I spent a large portion of my traveling life in Ukraine after being drawn in by these girls' beauty. However as hot as they were, sex was often times uneventful. It seemed like more of a progessionary duty than something they enjoyed from deep within. Sure they would get into it, and sex was good with some of the girls, but at best it was just that — "good sex."

Well, to my pleasant surprise Russian girls were very very different. They absolutely love sex. Every girl I had the fortune of being with was some of the best sex of my life. They are passionate beyond what you can imagine, and I will go so far as to say they exceed Brazilian girl sensuality — once behind closed doors. They will go from being the quietest girl you met on the street or bar, to the girl begging you to pull her hair in several different positions as she screams “Da!” with every thrust, to rubbing your head and giving you slight pecks as she tells you to rest after the great sex you gave her.

Also, it could have just been the luck of the draw for me, but over 90% of them had visually perfect vaginas. Not an errant labia in sight. I may have to supplement one of my previous articles and say that roast beef does not exist in Russia.

Traditional Values

We can quickly just comment that they possess all the traditional values real men seek and desire. They can cook, clean, take care of their men, and so on. They show up to a date for a walk in the park with heels and a dress. No different than what you would find in other non-Western societies, but I wanted to throw that out there so we can check off this box.

Conclusion

There are many countries I have yet to visit, so it’s hard for me to absolutely claim the superiority of Russian girls. But from what I have seen, and what I have experienced, they are the cream of the crop. It’s no wonder if you ask a non-Russian girl what she thinks about Russian girls, you get the standard derogatory statements. If you were a girl that paled in comparison in every way too, you’d also be butthurt.

24 Signs She’s A Slut

September 4, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

The other night I met up with a girl I’d met online. Despite having a stripped-down profile that revealed very little about her sexual appetites, I went in optimistic about getting laid that night. In my head, I’d somehow ascertained she had “slut face,” and was therefore more likely than others to put out. Before every date—as a sort of silly little game with myself—I like to set a percentage for the likelihood that I’ll get laid that night. I adjust it up or down throughout the evening depending on certain cues, and how well I figure my game is landing. Hers started at an aggressive 25 percent, meaning that I’d assessed, going in, I had a 1-in-4 chance of banging this girl on the first date–all before having ever spoken a word to her.

When I got the girl to my apartment later that night, her number jumped from 40 to 60 percent. It had already been climbing steadily from its starting point thanks to a series of subtle slut tells she'd been emitting at the bar. When we started making out, her responsiveness pushed the number to 75 percent. When she announced "I'm not having sex with you," it climbed to 90 percent. Most experienced womanizers recognize that statement as more-times-than-not a girl's final, feeble pawing at her sex snooze-button. When, after increasingly spirited making-out, I reached for her pants button, she confessed, "I want to have sex, but guys don't respect girls who have sex on the first date. And, [in a disappointed tone] I'm on my period." 98 percent.

I responded, with a smirk and joking tone, "If it makes you feel any better I already don't respect you. I'll go get a red towel. Go take out that tampon." She laughed and ran to the bathroom. 100 percent. I don't normally have sex during periods, but make exceptions for new bangs.

There are no guarantees in life, but I felt increasingly confident throughout the night that I could bang this girl. Why? Because she'd displayed a double-digit count of my classic slut tells.

Tuthmosis's Abridged List of Slut Tells

1. Has tattoos. This is especially the case if they're visible, multiple, large, and elaborate. If they have sexual themes, you're in like Flynn.

2. Piercings outside of the traditional earlobe placement. Sluttiness increases as you radiate from the lobe, to other parts of the ear, to the nose crumb, to the bull-ring. Other parts of the face—and erogenous zones—speak even louder.

3. Has "slut face." You either recognize it or you don't.

4. Cusses a lot. Especially if she uses the words "fuck," "pussy," or "cock" outside of the bedroom.

5. Not ticklish. I've noticed that girls who aren't ticklish aren't so because they're used to being handled (by men). Almost every prude is super ticklish, while sluts are rarely so. Sluts may have a physical response to light touching, but it's rarely a tickled sensation.

6. Broaches the topic of illegal drugs (even marijuana) without prompting. The more illegal, the sluttier.

7. Has big tits. They probably came in early, which translates into additional years of male attention.

8. Shows excessive skin for weather conditions. Exposes the midriff, lower back, or ass-piece from the bottom of her daisy-dukes even when it's not super-hot.

9. Has extra body hair (arms, girl-sideburns, girl-mustache) and/or a low speaking voice. This, I'm told, is simple biology. More hair and low voice equals more testosterone. It's an imperfect metric, though, because women of certain ethnicities are just more hirsute by default.

10. Associates with confirmed sluts. Her friends are often one of your best weathervanes. Birds of a feather, as they say.

11. Shows interests in girls, has "hooked up" with girls, or claims to be "bi-sexual." Bi-sexuality has quickly become a stand-in for hyper-sexuality.

12. Is currently, or was at some point, in a sorority. Sororities are little more than pussy buffets for the campus fraternities.

13. Has traveled alone, or with only girls, to fuck-fest locations (e.g., Jamaica). This is often a tell-tale sign of a sex-on-vacation-doesn't-count case.

14. Was a cheerleader in high school. Cheerleaders have, and exploit, access to the most desirable and horniest dudes at school.

15. Went, or goes, to a known party college (e.g., Arizona State, USC, UC Santa Barbara). Girls are copycats, and when all of her friends "are doing it" (whatever "it" is), they do too. (See No. 10.)

16. Lost her virginity on the younger side (15 and down). The earlier they start, the longer they tend to ride the carousel.

17. Likes tequila shots or party drugs (e.g., Extasy/MDMA). These are the drugs of choice for the promiscuous.

18. Is "friends" with DJs, promoters, or other small-time pseudo-celebs. This is a world in which the gears are lubricated with pussy—even more directly than others.

19. Is an artist, or a wannabe "model" who has done "photo shoots." Girls in the arts tend to have a loose attitude toward sex, especially if their "art" involves "expressing themselves" with their body.

20. Broaches the topic of sex first. This may seem like a no-brainer, but they often do so in subtle ways that can seem plausibly deniable. They never are.

21. Has a bad relationship with her father and/or has divorced parents. "Daddy issues" are classic, but accurate predictors of her relationship to men and sex.

22. Describes herself as a feminist or with any of its jargon ("pansexual," "demi-sexual," "cis-gendered"). You may not be able to stand a feminist long enough to bang her yourself but, in trying to prove she can do everything a man can do, she likely fucks with impunity.

23. Has an even, nice tan that she maintains. Girls with even, perfect tans spend a lot of time semi-naked, often in semi-public.

24. Hair dyed a nontraditional color (e.g., blue). Like piercings and tattoos, dyed hair telegraphs “rebellion” to social norms. That almost always translates into sluttiness.

Whether you use them to get laid more reliably, or to avoid wifeing up the town bike, these cues should be on every man’s slut radar. Sure, there are exceptions to all of them. You could meet a nun with a tattoo, or a ticklish slut, but these are—especially the more of them that are evident—some of most accurate predictors of sluttiness you’ll encounter.

A Hero Of Our Time

In this novel we are presented with a Byronic character named Pechorin, a Russian military officer. We learn about him through a narrator and also excerpted diaries that he abandoned before his final voyage, which includes themes of adventure, seduction, existentialism, and bride kidnapping.

> The air is pure and fresh, like the kiss of a child; the sun is bright, the sky is blue—what more could one possibly wish for? What need, in such a place as this, of passions, desires, regrets?
> I always advance more boldly when I do not know what is awaiting me. You see, nothing can happen worse than death—and from death there is no escape.
> He once told me that he would rather do a favour to an enemy than to a friend, because, in the latter case, it would mean selling his beneficence, whilst hatred > only increases proportionately to the magnanimity of the adversary.

Pechorin's seduction of Princess Mary over a beta male counterpart was masterful, forcing me to realize that game is nothing more than a watered down version of what the great seducers of history have mastered.

> She finds it exceedingly strange that I, who am accustomed to good society, and am so intimate with her Petersburg cousins and aunts, do not try to make her acquaintance. Every day we meet at the well and on the boulevard. I exert all my powers to entice away her adorers, glittering aides-de-camp, pale-faced visitors from Moscow, and others—and I almost always succeed. I have always hated entertaining guests: now my house is full every day; they dine, sup, gamble, and alas! my champagne triumphs over the might of Princess Mary's magnetic eyes!

They invented the game while we merely copy the best parts and apply them inelegantly on women who have already opened their legs for a large number of men. We borrow their vaginas for the night while the greats took their souls.

Pechorin's had many insights on women and life:

> If she is bored in your company for two minutes on end—you are lost irrevocably. Your silence ought to excite her curiosity, your conversation ought never to satisfy it completely; you should alarm her every minute.
> I must confess that, in fact, I do not love women who possess strength of character. What business have they with such a thing?
> The [dance] began. Grushnitski chose no one but the Princess, other cavaliers chose her every minute: obviously a conspiracy against me—all the better! She wants to talk to me, they are preventing her—she will want [me] twice as much.
> I am very glad; I love enemies, though not in the Christian sense. They amuse me, stir my blood. To be always on one's guard, to catch every glance, the meaning of every word, to guess intentions, to crush conspiracies, to pretend to be deceived and suddenly with one blow to overthrow the whole immense and laboriously constructed edifice of cunning and design–that is what I call life.
> Passions are naught but ideas in their first development; they are an attribute of the youth of the heart, and foolish is he who thinks that he will be agitated by them all his life. Many quiet rivers begin their course as noisy waterfalls, and here is not a single stream which will leap or foam throughout its way to the sea. That quietness, however, is frequently the sign of great, though latent, strength.

> However passionately I love a woman, if she only gives me to feel that I have to marry her–then farewell, love! My heart is turned to stone, and nothing will warm it anew. I am prepared for any other sacrifice but that; my life twenty times over, nay, my honour I would stake on the fortune of a card… but my freedom I will never sell.
> I saw how futile and senseless it was to pursue lost happiness. What more did I want? To see her again? For what?
> If I must die, I must! The loss to the world will not be great; and I myself am already downright weary of everything. I am like a guest at a ball, who yawns but does not go home to bed, simply because his carriage has not come for him. But now the carriage is here… Good-bye!…
> To none has my love brought happiness, because I have never sacrificed anything for the sake of those I have loved: for myself alone I have loved–for my own pleasure. I have only satisfied the strange craving of my heart, greedily draining their feelings, their tenderness, their joys, their sufferings–and I have never been able to sate myself.

He may be the first writer to eloquently describe a woman's rationalization mechanism:

> I remember that once a woman loved me simply because I was in love with another woman. There is nothing more paradoxical than the female mind; it is difficult to convince a woman of anything; they have to be led into convincing themselves. The order of the proofs by which they demolish their prejudices is most original; to learn their dialectic it is necessary to overthrow in your own mind every scholastic rule of logic.

Beta male behavior was disliked then just as much as now:

> "You torture me, Princess!" Grushnitski was saying. "You have changed dreadfully since I saw you last."
> "You, too, have changed," she answered, casting a rapid glance at him, in which he was unable to detect the latent sneer.
> "I! Changed?… Oh, never! You know that such a thing is impossible! Whoever has seen you once will bear your divine image with him for ever."
> "Stop."
> "But why will you not let me say tonight what you have so often listened to with condescension—and just recently, too?"
> "Because I do not like repetitions," she answered, laughing.

Overall the book was an enjoyable read but it was missing something that made it great instead of merely good. The wisdom it relayed was a touch incomplete, which makes sense when you realize the author, Mikhail Lermontov, produced it in his mid 20's. Nonetheless, it's a short read that I believe is worth your time.

There’s No Need For Men To Worry About Monogamy

September 5, 2013 | by Jesus Baetana | Link | Original Link

The concept of being monogamous has traditionally been associated with women while men have been cast as the villains of relationships, as the polygamists.

As we all know well, barring any unusual circumstances, testosterone is at much higher levels in men than women and biologically we are hardwired to want to have sex with women (like all mammals) to continue the human race. The indisputable fact is men are biologically different, and as a result of growth from this difference, psychologically different to women.

The PC Bandwagon

An often discussed sense of entitlement has used political correctness to change how female infidelity has been framed. With the media’s only goal being to garner views or sell units, any expansion of political correctness are fully welcomed, as with this expansion comes more opportunities to highlight ‘shocking’ stories of, for example, male infidelity. Because women tend to absorb fiction, these stories are lapped up by them and used to justify their beliefs about male attitudes towards monogamy and in turn, what is acceptable for themselves to do.

The net result of this is the normalization of female infidelity, based on a perception of all male attitudes towards the same subject, dismissing any possibility a modern male may indeed have their own principles on monogamy. The entire male consciousness is aggregated into a single sweeping presupposition for females to do as they wish. This gets reinforced daily by the media buy in, with women portraying themselves as helplessly buffeted victims of the uncontrollable libido whirlwind of adulterous men.

We see this victim mentality manifested all the time, in every aspect of the media and in our own lives. Starting from tired entertainment storylines of female focused love triangles, the burnt out clichés of women having extra marital affairs or in the case of no marriage, the disguise of unauthentic behaviour; the effect begins to filter through into our real lives, all the while the pretense being masqueraded as an excuse for women to justify to themselves and their peers that they are not sluts.

If a man is to cheat in a relationship, it is because he is a cold, heartless, animalistic beast; 'how could he do that to her', 'she never deserved that' etc. When the roles are reversed however, with the woman cheating on the man, even if there appears to be no substantial grounding upon which to exonerate themselves, women probe for rationale; 'we've been having some problems', he was working late a lot', 'I've been under a lot of stress recently', 'I just don't love him any more'. Anything they can attach themselves too, that alleviates the nagging self acknowledgement they just wanted to fuck someone else, because they think men are doing nothing else but this.

Real Life

I have been fortunate enough to have developed my level of game to a reasonable level; mostly day game through a long learning process beginning a few years ago and I humbly present to you, these real world examples I have personally experienced;

- A girl I met on a foreign training based course, who had been in a two year plus long distance relationship, who after one date initially hesitated to kiss me. After this barrier had been passed soon after on our next date however, I was quickly invited for a weekend of sex back in her country, with her having no intention of leaving her boyfriend after as in her own words, she 'just wanted to be fucked'. It transpired two other men had recently also recently been invited to this weekend arrangement before me.

- A woman I'd met who went from telling me how distraught she was over her husband telling her he wanted a divorce earlier that week; so distraught she was fellating me and fucking me that same night to console herself.
- Another woman who during our first 'friendly drink' suggested we have the day before, decided to tell me in detail over two hours how although things were difficult between her and her husband , she loved him and their kids 'very much'. Shortly afterwards, she had drove me home, where we fucked in a variety of positions, calling me 'babe" as she came again. She then drove home with a smile on her face, to tell her husband what a great 'yoga class' she'd had that night.
- The sudden agreement of a girl to come and visit me from my previous country, after a couple of my previous suggestions to do this were refused on the basis of 'my boyfriend' – turns out although they are still together, they'd had an argument and I quote; she "'didn't give a fuck anymore.' On arrival, it seemed to be quite the opposite as we didn't even make it to the bedroom before me being deep inside her.
- An immigrant girl from Poland I met, who had been single-handedly taught language, assisted in finding a job and provided for / housed by her partner of over seven years, free of charge upon her arrival in the country who; after she told me she 'hadn't been fucked like that since high school', explained to me she did this with me as her friends had suggested to her it's 'a good idea' to have a lover, alongside her saviour boyfriend.
- A girl I'd met at the gym, who after our second date suggested we go back to my place. After her 6th orgasm, she let slip; 'Oh God, what if my husband also wants to have sex with me tonight' – further questioning revealed she was planning on leaving him but 'wanted to stay friends as he means so much to me'. So much I found, she also already was fucking another guy (also married).

I could go on as these are just a selection of personal experiences. No doubt you'll have had also seen examples while running game.

The Media Gravy Train

Therein lies the problem for our female counterparts; they are doing what they are told they 'should do', rather than searching within themselves for what they genuinely want to do (as every person should). Part of these unspoken feminist-driven rules is 'cheating is bad'. With the help of the media, feminist thought has normalised the popular 'rules' of the dating game, amongst which now include;

- It's ok to 'date' multiple men at the same time (this includes fucking them).
- You have no commitment to anyone if you are 'seeing' (read 'fucking') someone – this word intentionally chosen by women because of its ambiguity.
- If you are in what has been announced as a 'serious' relationship, should the man not reach a certain standard in any one area (such as fucking her at the frequency she sets, solely organising original & enough 'bonding' activities for the relationship, the man occasionally desiring time to himself or with friends etc), the women is permitted a 'grace fuck', whereby should she choose to fuck someone else, the blame shall lie solely with the man in the area of his 'failure' and he should forgive her, with the promise of improving in said area.
- If at any point, the relationship is agreed to be over, the woman may then immediately do whatever she likes with whoever, with the new involvement being given a rationalising label (rebound, shoulder to cry on, etc), where no judgement shall be passed upon her prior efforts within the previous relationship. Inversely, should a man do exactly the same, his commitment to the relationship shall be questioned to the point of his new involvement being implicated as a cause of failure in the previous relationship, as it is unthinkable the honourable female would not have been entirely committed to the relationship (regardless of who she is fucking immediately after it ends).

- If afterwards, the man should wish to rekindle the relationship after a break up, he must prove himself with at least double the efforts required by any other man. During this second dating period (as with any dating period) it is permissible for the woman to continue to sleep with whoever she chooses. In the event of an official relationship reconciliation, the woman is permitted an undefined amount of time to conclude her sexual dalliances with any other men, which may include departing sexual relations where required.

…and this list could go on. Although these prior points may seem almost contractual in their nature, this is what the modern man is up against; the end game of consistently self serving feminine emulation of natural male behaviour.

Female Perception

During my own journey from blinded, naive romantic to hardened red pill realist, the one thing I have noticed time and time again is the futility of monogamy; providing you are honest / stealthy enough, the ultimate outcome of your relationship will remain the same.

Regardless of the bravado displayed by some men, there will inevitably be some sort of relationship in your life that has more of an emotional effect on you, wanted or not. It's at this point where the small part of you still believing in the concept of romantic love and may begin to make you question your approach to monogamy, whether it be disposing of your harem or even just committing yourself to dating one woman. You'll feel inclined to do this, as it's been subconsciously foisted upon us in society as being a foundation of a successful relationship.

In my experience, most women will officially end the relationship before fucking anyone else. That's not to say they won't have done anything at all with someone else before the officialise the breakup with you, as they'll need some sort of spur, which the vast majority of the time will be them knowing some replacement cock is lined up, ready to go because they've kissed someone or someone has made it patently clear they'll fuck her. Because of the combination of the media and modern peer expectations, when it comes to sex, women love it just as much as men, but for very different reasons – it's the ultimate form of validation & a great way to fit in with 'the girls' melodrama.

Counterbalancing Technicalities

Unless you're fucking oblivious or at best, only beginning to discover red pill philosophy, you may have observed subscribing to this profile of a 'good man' tends to result in a unattractive package for men; essentially living as a machine giving away everything you earn, with barely any time to pursue your own interests under duress of being a 'responsible' man, whose main interest is those permitted as in line with your partner, minus something innocuous such as a sport, to prevent complete psychosis and /or revolt.

I can state without reservation; do not feel guilty for these thoughts & desires. Do the opposite and embrace them. Because whatever you do to yourself in restraint will not be seen or appreciated by the person you feel you are doing it for, as any belief that you may be an individual thinker trying to do what you think is right, will be washed aside and replaced by the tar-brushed assumption that you are 'only a man' & 'all men are the same'. So go forth and do what needs to be done to ensure you are bringing someone into your life, that adds something more than a pussy into your world.

And if you ever have doubts or need a further spur to take this type of affirmative action for the benefit of yourself, remember that 95% of women are not only scrutinising and comparing you while they are in a relationship, they are always actively keeping backup options as 'friends' until the day comes when they 'just don't think it's working anymore' with you, coincidentally enough when they realised there's a different cock waiting for them.

When this day happens, do you want to be the person wondering why you spent all this time devoted to this person who has been mentally fucking other people practically since you've been with her, or the person who realises they did the right thing by prioritising their own needs over a fallacy of 'being a good man' in the eyes of those who are not men, but took it upon themselves to decide what you wanted to be?

I thought so. So no need to worry about monogamy.

The Feminist Attack on Steve McQueen

September 5, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Steve McQueen was one of the greatest actors of all time and was known for his off-screen lifestyle just as much: car racing, partying, motorcycle racing, trips cross-country with his buddies and generally living the dream that most middle-aged men only wish they could live. Oh yes, he liked women too. A lot.

Perhaps not too shockingly, anything that a man does that is out of the realm of work a 9-5, provide for his family and God forbid, have ANY time with his pals or even a 'man-cave', feminists must attack. An article was brought to my attention by a friend just recently, and although it's from 2011, it's never too late to call out a feminist on an idiotic, incongruent attack on a passed away icon. Steve McQueen is dead last time I checked, but leave it to an embittered feminist to STILL attack a dead man, even when he cannot defend himself. That's ok though, because yours truly, Christian McQueen, will defend the name and legacy of our deceased manly alpha male brother.

The full article link is here: http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2057769/Steve-McQueen-Wife-beater-drug-taker-relentless-philanderer-brutal-truth-actor.html

However, I will be inserting portions of the article and my rebuttal below.

The article starts off with a snarky attack on Steve's alleged behavior towards his wife Ali McGraw:

Whenever Ali MacGraw's agent called, her husband would slam down the phone.

No way was he going to allow his young wife to resume her career, even if she was the hottest female star in Hollywood.

As far as Steve McQueen was concerned, Ali was better off barefoot and pregnant, serving him up meat and potatoes at 6pm precisely, which he'd devour alone in front of the TV.

Rebuttal: Apparently, if your husband doesn't answer your agent calls, there is simply NO way to get in contact with your agent and set up a meeting. Could it actually be that Ali was enjoying living the good life, WITHOUT having to act anymore, and she actually did not desire the career anymore?

Feminists absolutely HATE when a woman chooses a traditional role of child-rearing, homemaking and being a supportive force BEHIND her successful husband. This very definition cuts away at what they want to undermine. According to them, it's NOT really a woman's choice. Every woman MUST have a career and choose that career over a providing husband and raising kids.

The statement "barefoot and pregnant", is a clear dig on the women who choose to stay at home, rear children and cook a good meal for their man who is PROVIDING for the entire family. And God forbid, that a precise meal time be set in the home! Doesn't everyone know that having inconsistent meal times is actually better for kids? Oh the horror.

[image]

No one could understand why the sophisticated former model, at the peak of her career, had chosen to marry McQueen, whose antediluvian attitudes to the female sex were widely known.

Even the gossip columnists knew he was cheating on Ali — by renting a suite at the Beverly Wilshire in LA for quickies, though no one quite dared put it that way in print.

Sometimes, too lazy to go out looking for women, he'd arrange to 'interview' potential starlets in his suite for a movie that didn't exist.

And such was power of his macho movie image that girls half his age ignored his growing paunch, falling willingly into the convenient bed.

He was never all that fussy where sex was concerned. If models and starlets weren't readily available, he was perfectly happy to sleep with prostitutes — the more the merrier.

Indeed, a few years earlier, while making The Magnificent Seven, he and his co-star Robert Vaughn had spent the whole of Good Friday in a Mexican brothel.

After getting drunk on margaritas, they echoed the film's title by sharing seven girls between them in one silken-pillowed room.

Rebuttal: "No one could understand…" Really? I know it's shocking for the man-jaw, fuzzy lipped fat feminist cunts to understand why in the fucking world gorgeous women would desire an A-List alpha male movie star known for being a man's man, but newsflash feminists: Attractive women actually do DESIRE men of value. The higher the value the more attractive his pursuers actually are. It's science sweeties. Called pre-selection and maybe you should do your research.

Fact: A women would rather choose to share an alpha male, then to have a beta bitch ass dude all to herself.

It's such a shame gentlemen, that a man would desire sex with multiple different gorgeous women? Who did Steve McQueen think he was? And once again we have the attack on prostitutes. Funny coming from feminists where it's all about female 'empowerment', however when a woman CHOOSES to exchange sex for cash it's morally reprehensible by Steve McQueen to have committed these heinous acts.

I'm starting to wonder if feminists are actually mildly retarded. I've never seen such blatent hypocrisy and illogical arguments presented by any one group of people more than feminists. Maybe the state should have mandated IQ tests for any girls majoring in Women's Lib etc.

Not only was McQueen openly and repeatedly unfaithful, as author Marc Eliot reveals in a new biography, but he also ingested vast quantities of drugs, regularly getting high on cocaine, peyote (a hallucinogen made from cactus), LSD and — to pep up his bedroom activities — vials of amyl nitrate.

Being a bad boy, of course, was a crucial component of his popular appeal. But what this book reveals for the first time is the sheer scale of his appalling behaviour, in both his private and professional life.

In person, McQueen was a short, boorish man of few words — sometimes choosing to communicate only in grunts.

Rebuttal: Can you believe Steve McQueen? He actually took amyl nitrate, TO PEP

UP HIS BEDROOM ACTIVITES! Holy fuck. Who did he think he was doing anything to spice up the bedroom?

I pray to God you never do, but if you happen to fall into bed with a feminist, due to a drunken night where your judgment was impaired, and she pulls out a vibrator, immediately condemn her to hell for bringing out anything to spice up the bedroom.

I've tried amyl nitrate before actually and it's a helluva drug when used in small doses and not repeatedly. Kudos to Steve.

Of course we have the attack on Steve's height. So now being short is an excuse to attack men. "We know it's completely out of your control men, but damn you for having been born short." Another idiotic statement that has NO bearing on the character of a man, but provides this cunt author with 'ammunition' for her attack on Steve.

Paul Newman, who starred in more hits than McQueen, was a particular bugbear. So when the two men were given equal billing in The Towering Inferno in 1974, McQueen insisted that each was given exactly the same number of words — and that the final shot and sentence spoken in the film would belong to him.

Hard to believe now that he was widely viewed as the most attractive alpha male of his time.

Rebuttal: Dammit Steve, how dare you fight for your right to retain leading man status! Once again, an attack on any man who actually FIGHTS for his career. Take a look at your closest corporate workplace and show me a man who actually can fight for his right in the workplace and not get brutally attacked by feminists for trying to undermine women and having 'anger issues'.

In this cunt author's mind, the statement "Hard to believe now…", is a testament to her feminists camp's mindset that they have undermined everything that real raw men were and stood for years ago.

Fact: Feminists WANT men to lie down and be bloody dogs, getting fucked in the ass and not complaining about it.

I say "Fuck The Fems" loud and clear.

For years, as his career failed to ignite, he leeched off a successful dancer called Neile Adams — spending her earnings on new cars, drugs and other women.

Rebuttal: Oops, did Steve do what women have done for years? Did he dare provide sex and companionship for a woman and in exchange she helped him stay on his feet while he pursued acting? Wait, which one is it feminists? I thought you lasses WANTED independence to make your own money and do what you wanted? So which one is it? A women CHOSE to help Steve and he should be tarred and feathered for this.

Baffling.

That night, when they were alone together, he turned on his devastated wife, asking repeatedly whether she'd ever had an affair. She denied that she had. Then, suddenly, he leapt up to dig out his supply of cocaine from a drawer and insisted that she share it with him.

Being a bad boy was a crucial component of his popular appeal
With her tongue loosened by the drug, Neile at last admitted she'd had a fling with an actor. Saying nothing, McQueen got up again and went into the other room.

A few seconds later, he returned with a pistol and pointed it at her head, insisting she tell him the name of the actor.

When she didn't answer, he cocked the trigger and pressed the tip of the barrel hard against her temple.

Finally, she cracked: she'd had sex with the Oscar-winning actor Maximilian Schell, she admitted tearfully.

Rebuttal: Gee, so a husband cannot get upset when he finds out his WIFE FUCKED ANOTHER MAN?! The audacity of Steve McQueen is unbelievable. He actually got MAD at his wife for cheating. WTF was wrong with him?

Another double standard by feminists in that it is NEVER okay to show anger at your significant other, especially when she's caught cheating. It's her RIGHT you know to go have another cock shoved up her vagina and you as a REAL MAN should be ok and not INTIMIDATED by it. Cunts.

His next movie, The Getaway, was produced by Robert Evans, a Hollywood bigshot then married to the coltish Ali MacGraw — and Evans decreed she should have a starring role. It was an order he'd live to regret.

Almost immediately after meeting McQueen in 1972, Ali became another notch on his belt.

Later, she recalled: 'I was obsessed with Steve from the moment he stepped into my world, and there was never enough air for me to breathe to change that feeling. He was very taken with me, too, although I wasn't necessarily his dream lady physically.

Rebuttal: I can't for the life of me figure out WHY Ali was into Steve…can you guys? Note: the DHV Steve must have displayed "although I wasn't neccesarily his dream lady physically". Laugh my fucking ass off, Steve knew what the fuck was up.

Knowing he meant it, Ali scrambled to prepare for her wedding the next day, presided over by a justice of the peace whose name McQueen had found in a phone book.

At the very last minute, her lover produced a pre-nuptial agreement. If she didn't sign, he said, there'd be no wedding. Ali signed.

Rebuttal: Feminists HATE the idea of a smart man who would protect his assets from a woman. Smart move McQueen, smart move. Note how she signed it. :)

Steve McQueen was a Boss among Bosses. Period. He was a man's man, loved by women and envied by men. He was successful, pursued what he wanted despite having being born on the wrong side of the tracks and the wrong side of advantage and did it all with a sardonic smile. May the King of Cool RIP, despite the feminists cunts who only wish they could have had the chance to fuck him. Wouldn't have happened: Steve only went for the hotties.

McQueen to McQueen: You're the fucking man, dead or alive.

Her Place Or Yours?

September 6, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

A Dilemma

A man must choose wisely as to where he takes a woman when it's time to move furniture. Some argue that it is best to take a woman back to your place. Others espouse the merits of going to her place. There are pros and cons to each but I'm an advocate for going to her place over having her come to yours.

Your Place

While having a woman at your place is familiar territory, the disadvantages outweigh the advantages. The only real advantage having her come to your place aside from showing off any expensive things you have is the convenience of getting ready for the next day in the morning. The pitfalls of allowing woman your house are immense. One major problem of having a woman stay over your houses it's hard to get them to leave. A wise man once said "get the fuck out after you're done." Another problem is she will go through your stuff. I have sensitive items, things that go bang, and expensive things I don't want to lose laying around. Also it gives the opportunity for women to leave things behind in order to concoct an excuse to come back over your house and/or tip off other woman you might bring back that she had been there. This can all be avoided by going to her place.

Her Place

When going over a woman's house all you have to keep track of is yourself and your property you have with you at the time. A good technique is to have a small messenger bag to hold your items so it is quick and easy to verify you have everything on the way out. Also by putting things in the bag it makes it harder for her to snoop through things without detection. Also this bag can be used as your road kit with a change of clothes, condoms, drop gun, and anything else you might need for a night on the town.

When you go to her place, you can see what kind of person she is. You can see if she's messy. You can see how dirty she is. You can see how crazy she is by how many cats she has. Good places to check are trashcans, medicine cabinets, and nightstand drawers. Nothing is more of a buzz kill than a Valtrex prescription or trashcan full of pregnancy tests.

One advantage of going to the woman's place is you get to try new things. Women like to buy lots of soaps and shampoos so you can find the one that is best for you for free by sampling many women's houses. I don't really use the shampoos after reading the ROK article on baking soda. Same thing goes for food in her fridge, so make sure you keep room in your bag for things you might want to take with you when you leave. Using your overnight bag as a swag bag helps the environment through reuse.

Another advantage of going to the woman's place is you set the timetable for when its time to go home. For example you might want to blast out real quick if you want to go to another bar before last call. You might want to stay for round two if it was good. You might want to stay for brunch if it was great. You really can't pull the old "dip out while she's in the bathroom like Batman" at your own house.

One great advantage of going to the woman's place is that other women don't know that location. You don't have to worry about Molly knocking on the door while you and Sally are handling business. You also don't have to worry about your neighbors observing your behavior. This will lead to your house being a drama free location.

Words to Remember

Don't forget there are a few things you should remember. Always have a lock on your phone. Always flush the condom down the toilet. Check yourself in the mirror for any marks, scratches or lipstick. Remember as R'as al-Gul said, "leave no sign".

Life Happens Once You Unplug

September 7, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Newton's first law of of motion states that an object in motion will stay in motion, unless acted on by an outside force.

During childhood our imagination is at its peak, with time earned experience we gain passion and creativity. Angst and peer-approval defines our teens, while in our twenties disillusionment and apathy is becoming the norm. Underlying all of this is the same imagination, passion and creativity from our youth; it is just expressed in different ways. Teenagers stoke the fire with their self-perceived invincibility. Those in their twenties and onwards can fan the embers by defining their own life purpose or they can let the flames suffocate by following the expected life path.

We are all responsible for the rate at which we move through life. Smartphones, Facebook, Instagram, internet memes, forums — whatever your poison — all are outside forces that act on the forward motion our passions, imagination, and creativity create. We believe having pocket-sized technology that allows us access to the entire wealth of knowledge created by humanity is a benefit, when in reality it is a detriment. Technology overuse, instant gratification addiction, and the need to always have a smartphone as a safety blanket for uncomfortable situations are the biggest detriment to one's progress.

Men find sites like these and realize they are wrong about everything they have ever known. They ravenously devour any information they can and once that initial enlightenment is through they seek a second enlightenment. They understand they are not necessarily getting better, but becoming less wrong so they search out more and more information. They want to know every tested method for every conceivable situation and as a result suffer from paralysis by analysis and never actually get anywhere.

How did man discover fire? How did he build the pyramids? How did he learn the pleasures of food, drink, and sex?

He either experimented out of necessity or curiosity, learned from someone more knowledgeable than him, or he instinctively knew.

Technology can only assist us in achieving what we want. We can use the internet as a tool to learn how to make love to beautiful women, learn a language, or any other practiced skill. However, people do not use it this way. They use technology and books as outward proof that they are working towards a certain ideal while not actually accomplishing anything towards that ideal. Take away access to placating technology and we are left stunted in our self-sufficiency.

All a man needs to improve is a push in the right direction and the avoidance of friction. He needs inspiration to experiment and an introductory manual. He does not need social media, how to articles, youtube videos, smartphone games, or even electricity.

Smash your smartphone, turn off your laptop, and blow your circuit breaker. Eventually you will learn to take pleasure in life as it happens.

We Are Now Accepting Your Gracious Donations

September 7, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A couple weeks ago we announced a sponsorship program so businesses can reserve a month of space to advertise their web site. For everyone else, we now have a tip jar, where you can donate money either on a monthly basis (e.g. $3) or via a one-time donation. If you donate at least $1 today, you get the following benefits…

- Picture of a hot Ukrainian girl holding a placard that says “I love your name”
- All of my books, both in ebook and paperback form
- Drake’s upcoming new album in MP3 format
- One-hour telephone consultation with each member of the ROK staff
- 100 non-lubricated condoms

So head to the tip jar page now and make your donation. All proceeds will help ensure that ROK ejaculates its red pill wisdom upon the masses for some time to come. Thanks.

Women Are The Scorpion, Men Are The Frog

September 8, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Mansplaining is a concept that emerged in 2008 in a LA Time article by Jessica Solnit named, "Men Explain Things To Me." If you have any skin the game, you should already know women are primarily looking for venting their emotions in life rather than somebody solving their problems. That is precisely why women continuously and almost always toss monkey wrenches in the machinations of men.

Mansplaining is defined as when a man, when talking to a woman, treats her differently than he would a man and talks down to her with arrogance, pretends she is ignorant, talks with upsetting tones and doesn't recognize the dignity, humanity and competency of the female engaged with.

This definition is classic narcissism as the women who believe in the concept start from their experiences and extrapolate from there. They don't understand the concept of larger trends and forming opinions about the world around them from those trends. They don't understand the concept of men and women being biologically different and socialized differently. They talk a big game about gender and socialization, but that is just a smokescreen for what they really believe – everybody is just like them if those oppressive, gendered masks come off.

With the smashing of sex roles, women love to pretend they are civilizing the men across the board. It is not good enough that women watch men from the home,women must enter workplaces, locker rooms and male only spaces – of course, creating diversity and making the world a safer place (for them). Mansplaining reeks of the supreme self-centeredness of the modern woman, thinking her feelings are first priority in any situation that involves men.

The modern woman is so paranoid she is in constant awareness of being a female and constantly worrying men are thinking of her as a woman instead of a human being. She thinks differences between men and women are erected in order to suborn women and thinks the solution is she needs to be treated as a human being devoid of sex – but one also with significantly heightened sensitivity, due to sexism of course. Someday she will deal with her low self-esteem once the patriarchy ends – oh, wait. She doesn't even realize that is the majority of her problem. Hence, the narcissism.

[image]

Women, like the above Jen McCreight, treat serious issues as fun, empowering and exhilarating – often taking many pictures and making kissy faces or other ludicrous poses. This is mocking behavior, as they have been taught that men and what men do is and are inferior to what women do. All those TV shows for kids that show ass-kicking females and male followers inculcate views that males are boorish, ineffectual and are simply side-kicks to a female's life. Later in life, groups and movements aimed getting women into math and science programs reinforce the idea that men have it better in society and women need a leg up over the hopelessly privileged man. The drowning multiplicity of government and private programs exclusively aimed at coaxing the oppressed woman up the dreadfully sexist male corporate hierarchy (with the direct aim at blasting the misogynistic glass ceiling) is the final nail in the coffin that allows women to pretend they are better than men, while simultaneously allowing them to believe in male privilege.

Nirvana awaits "there," as they are told. "There" is whatever mythical construct they have erected into their head about how their life will play out, with respects to career, fashion and male partners. Children vaguely factor in after that, taking on a dangerously high importance in middle ages as their narcissistic dreams are dashed on the cold coasts of reality.

Kate Bolic, working with Susan Walsh, penned a narcissistic piece in The Atlantic in which she laid out the metaphor that women and climbed the staircase into their middle age, with the pithy and pretend achievements of career success, and find there are no handsome, roguish men waiting to sweep them off their feet and into in vitro-aided marital bliss. That metaphor is how life has been dictated to them by associates, friends and the all-powerful media. You think aging women want to consume media that states that at age 30 that only 10% of their eggs are left? No, they will consume media that states they are in their sexual prime with the "real" men stepping up to capture their narcissistic heart.

If this isn't bad enough, they have been tearing through colleges and workplaces, demanding equal treatment which, to them, means treating them as they wish to be treated. They falsely assume how men treat each other, then demand to be taken seriously as equals in these institutions they seek access to. When they find out that they might get challenged or just treated as "one of the boys," they find out their delusions about themselves are being cracked, so they claim that such behavior is sexist, violating her human dignity and is exclusionary.

In their self-absorbed collective effort to stymie opinions that spur uncomfortable feelings, they also drown intellectualism and human achievement in the shallowest pool imaginable. Valuing comfort over challenge, they lay to rest the competitive – and often brutal – world of intellectual debate. Remind me again – are men better comedians than women? Gee, I wonder why.

A common refrain in feminist and female circles is how they love a vigorous debate, but then toss in massive roadblocks suffocating debate. Often times, especially with feminism and so-called women's issues, the roadblocks are so severe that if you were even begin to climb them, you would immediately treated as a misogynist. They claim to be pro-this and pro-that, but their actions belie their true intent. The complete and utter suffocation of true intellectual sparring is what is desired. The replacement is the feel-good world of authority figures dispensing with – often times cruelly and hatefully – out-group members who have yet to convert to the state religion of politically correct feminism.

Mansplaining is yet another attempt at suborning men to women.

They pretend men talk to them in such a "sexist" manner because they are women. What they have done is find out when men treat women like equals. We debate, attack and go back and forth constantly with other men. We break each other's balls and mock each other. Then we go get drunk at the bar like brothers. Women don't understand that. Since they start from themselves and extrapolate outwards, they take every slight as personal and meant to degrade them – you know, how women treat each other. They apply the relational calculus to men and find the answer is horribly sexist because they falsely assume if equality is achieved between men and women then conflict, anger and all untoward emotions will drain away into a modern day Eden.

The most dangerous assumption is that human progress, done often by the elites, is a product purely of privilege. It truly is done by genius, hard work and luck. I can't even begin to count how many women I have had passing contact with who giddily assume once they get degree X, job Y or the nebulous Z they will finally be able to start changing the world, inventing that or greatly forming that. It reminds me of somebody who thinks they need a degree in English to be a writer. It is the narcissistic idea that America will always be great and always prosper. Like I noted with McCreight above, she is supremely superficial and her pathetic little sign, "Science In Progress!" while showing her boobs is just sad. She reinforces women watch men make scientific process while flaunting her only sexual goods. Checkmate, feminist.

Mansplaining, at its heart, is about the idea the progress just happens and men will continue to invent, theorize and do it all with women present – just so long as they censor their thoughts as women wish. It is like going to a psychologist and your therapist saying, “You can say whatever you think or feel in so long as it does not offend me.” There would be no therapy on that psychologist’s couch.

Women will pretend they are part of technological, scientific and theoretical progress, often times clinging to the coattails of a man who needs a female name on the study. It needs to be said that a few women do do original research, but the majority of women are just around to status-whore and self-aggrandize. Some women do contribute greatly, but their accomplishments are crowded out by self-absorbed women who are only interested in advancing their self-image as X, Y or Z. Women are just there for the ride, clinging to the idea they have the same qualities as the men they desire and get fucked by.

This fatal self-absorption portends dark things for America. As the arc of America keeps pressing further and further downward, women will clamor for more government money, more governmental intervention and more seats at the table of power, claiming women’s voice will cure the ailments of America, simply because they want the trappings of power, not real power.

What they don’t realize is they are asking for the exact poison that felled America. The crushing narcissism and authoritarianism of the modern women has greatly contributed to the decline of America, but who really cares? Life is all just a performance, just a facade.

Avoid Women With Horses

September 8, 2013 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

If there is one lesson that I could pull from the entirety of my economic experience, research, data, and philosophizing, and that one lesson would apply universally regardless of context, environment, or conditions, it would be without a doubt:

AVOID WOMEN WITH HORSES.

Horses are evil, the devil's representative on this planet. Nothing good comes of them. Nothing good will ever come of them. And if you are smart, you will avoid them.

Thankfully, most men have no natural predisposition for them. They view them as beasts of burden, perhaps something to ride in the off chance you find terrain too steep to navigate with an off road vehicle and are too lazy to scale yourself.

But horses creep into male society nonetheless and their conduit is women.

Women are already a bad cocktail unto themselves. Unchecked and untempered they'll run feral and ruin the best of men, but you combine them with horses and John Freaking Wayne would have difficulty in taming them. I cannot pin it down, nor do I wish to expend the calories of energy to figure out why women have such a psychological attachment to horses, but they do. And in EVERY instance I've ever ran into with a woman with horses, it has been a bad deal.

My mother (not to get Oedipus on you) has four of them.

Does she have a 401k plan? No.

Does she have a pension? No.

Does she have nursing home insurance? No.

But she drives my step-father batshit insane about them to the point that every rare time I visit he is actually happy to see me.

She has supplanted her children, her husband, and her family with 4 dumb beasts of burden. She has sacrificed human interaction and financial stability with eating-pooping-riding animules. Why this is, I don't know, but she has.

There was also the trophy wife of Minnetrista fame. You don't know Minnetrista, but if you ever visit western Minneapolis, you'll see rolling hills and ranches of horses for trophy wives who majored in worthless shit and managed to score themselves a reliable ~~sucker~~ accountant at Cargill. They don't have the money, but their husband does. And that's all that matters. Because in the end a horse seemingly can replace a husband or spouse with whatever harlequin-romance-galloping joy those dumb beasts provide. I know this to be true because I saw on MORE THAN ONE OCCASION a desperate, supplicant, obedient husband cut his veins open to pour the financial blood to finance a floozy's horse hobby or (worse) hobby farm. We even had one desperate individual tender his "wife's horses" for collateral for a line of credit (which he would no doubt use to finance her fancies). Whatever the case, there was ALWAYS financial problems and mental suffering on the parts of men with women who had horses.

And then there was my good friend, who I genuinely cherished, in Wyoming. She was a great gal. A wonderful gal. A person I would consider my friend. But she had horses and was thusly psychotic.

Even if the relationship with the horses is not financial, meaning the woman (or more likely her male benefactor) can afford the horses, women without means who STILL manage to obtain and own horses are just plain batshit insane. They take animals that are dumber than dogs (literally) and rank them above other humans. They prefer their horse over their husbands. They prefer their horse over their kids. They prefer their horses over any potential spouse. And they prefer their horse over their friends. And thus was the case of my Wyoming friend. She valued her horses more than anything else, including herself. She fell in love with them. Talked to them as if they were humans. She put them at the center of her life. And thusly, was left alone on her ranch with them.

It was a scary and eerie thing watching a woman with such a psychotic level of commitment to horses, but it told me enough to stay away, while at the same time begetting pity.

Do I understand it?

No.

And again, I'm not aiming to try.

But I will tell you this, and this is the moral of the story.

Avoid, with all of your might, women who have horses. It is the reddest of red flags.

Imagine, if you will, a woman with 3 children from 3 different fathers, who insists on hyphenating her name if you were to ever marry, who has a ton of cats, and majored in Women's Studies with a Masters in Social Justice.

That woman is more reliable, sane, stable, and trustworthy than a woman with a horse. Women with horses are plagued with financial problems (not to mention psychological), and if they aren't, they are so rich and deluded you will not even be able to compete with a dumb, inferior animal.

The world of women is already pockmarked with landmines of an unfathomable variety. You can easily sidestep one as clearly marked by horses.

Leadership Training For Men

September 9, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

There is a perception that “education” involves stuffing one’s head with facts and information. What passes for male education these days is a sad mockery of the word, for it places far too much emphasis on intellectual development and attaches too little importance to the training of character. The cultivation of leadership qualities in men is a critical component of character building, and yet the idea that it should be taught systematically has nearly vanished from organized education.

One could argue that what young men today lack the most is vigorous training in character and leadership. Instead, curricula have been inundated with political correctness, timidity, gender sensitivity, and concerns for not hurting women’s feelings.

Many of the modern man’s problems—unrelenting simping, lack of inner game, lack of confidence, catty behavior towards other men, dissipation of focus and intensity, weakness of mind or body—can be attributed to the gross deficiencies of our educational system, as well as to the complete lack of mentorship for young men. It was not always so. This article will discuss the educational views of an influential Italian humanist named Pier Paolo Vergerio as expressed in his treatise The Character and Studies Befitting a Free-Born Youth.

Born in 1370 in Capodistria (what is today the city of Koper, in Slovenia), Vergerio taught rhetoric and law in Padua, Florence, and Bologna, and served for a time as an advisor to the Holy Roman Emperor Sigismund. His educational essay for men, composed around 1402, is a near-perfect summary of the Renaissance idea of education for young leaders. It was published numerous times in the following centuries, and had considerable influence. It is a pity (though not surprising) that it is not more widely known today. For nearly alone among his contemporaries, Vergerio was a firm proponent of the idea that everyone has different talents, and that an educational program must be adapted to each student's strengths and weaknesses.

I have culled Vergerio's main points from his essay, and present them below. I then offer my own comment.

1. Education in character begins in the cradle. Parents should pick a name for a boy that is not "unseemly" or clownish. The correct choice of name is a matter of high importance, despite the cavalier manner with which most women treat it. Names can affect character and influence the career choices for men, and nothing is worse than being saddled with an oafish name.

2. Parents should settle their sons in "renowned cities" (in egregibus urbibus). Few opportunities will be found in the middle of nowhere, and men need the company of other good men to develop themselves.

3. Although training in the liberal arts should start at an early age, parents should take care to direct sons to those studies for which they are naturally inclined. Compulsion in education is something that should be used in careful moderation.

4. Body and mind are connected intimately. Just as a healthy body consumes and digests food well, so a healthy mind will not scorn anyone, but will put the best interpretation on what it hears or learns.

5. Young men should look at themselves in the mirror often. There is nothing wrong with this, and it serves a useful function. Those with a fine appearance will not dishonor themselves with vices, and those with an average or ugly appearance will strive to make themselves more attractive with their virtues.

6. Young men are generous and open-minded by nature because they have rarely experienced want and need. They are also credulous, due to their lack of worldly experience. Their opinions can change easily and quickly. They take great pleasure in their friendships and love the clubs they belong to, which they often "join and abandon on the same day". Leadership instruction must be given while taking into account these qualities.

7. Every age of a man's life has vices particular to it: adolescence "burns with lust", middle age is "rocked with ambition", and old age "wastes away in greed". Not everyone is this way, but men are more inclined to these vices according to their age.

Another view of the city of Koper.

8. Young men must be taught from an early age to treat the elderly with “profound reverence”. Much can be learned from a young man’s associating with an older man. So Roman youth treated senators and other older men, thereby learning much about perseverance and patience.

9. Young men should learn right away the value of being constructively criticized and admonished. This is necessary for personal improvement. People who don’t listen to anything they dislike are “the ones most vulnerable to deception”. The weak stomach is the one that “will only accept delicacies.”

10. Excessive leniency can corrupt a young man. Women are unsuited to the task of training a man for male leadership. Those who have been “brought up in luxury under widowed mothers” display these negative traits most openly. However, this problem is easily corrected provided the proper male role models appear, one way or another.

11. The finest studies for leadership are those based on arms (military) and letters (history, philosophy, languages, and rhetoric). Everyone wants to be learned in old age, but to achieve this one must start early and exert “zealous effort”. Being learned in letters and arms will provide a remedy against “sloth” and solace in the face of worry and stress.

12. The ancient Greeks trained young leaders by teaching letters, wrestling, music, and drawing. This sort of regimen gave them appreciation for the “beauty and charm of things both natural and artificial”. “Great men”, he says, “need to be able to talk among themselves and make judgments about matters of this kind”.

13. Good disciplines to know also are literature, in that it forms good habits of virtue, and strengthens the memory by study. Rhetoric (the art of eloquence) and disputation are required also for being able to verbally spar with opponents in the inevitable contests that will confront any leader. Poetics is good for relaxation, mathematics and the sciences good for logical development, and languages for getting outside oneself.

14. Don't just dip into any authors. Surround yourself only with the very best. By keeping company with great men, we will learn greatness by association. The most important quality in education is hunger: that fanatical desire to learn and better oneself. Some students have it, some do not.

15. The easiest person to deceive is ourselves, and no one who is damaged more than ourselves by such deceit. Young men must confer often with peers and guides, so as not to form an inflated opinion of themselves.

16. The training of the body is of paramount importance. It should be conditioned from a young age for rigorous service, military ability, and endurance. Young men should be hardened from a young age to endure pain and discomfort of all sorts, so that they are not broken by the strains of life and struggle. They should also be taught to "dare great things". The Cretans and Spartans valued hunting, running, wrestling, and jumping, and sought ways to train themselves to endure hunger, thirst, cold, and heat. Luxuries weaken the mind and body.

Cultivation of the martial virtues is an essential part of leadership training.

17. In a great quote, Vergerio reminds us that "Every period of life has the capacity to yield something splendid."

18. The youth should set fixed hours for bodily exercise every day, and fixed hours for the exercise of the mind. Strict self-discipline is critical. The emperor Theodosius, he notes, would engage in military exercises or legal judgments by day, and by night would apply himself to his studies by lamplight.

19. Since battle tactics are constantly changing, a forward thinking youth will attempt to master the martial arts and self-defense arts of his day. This should include mastery of weaponry, personal combat skills, horsemanship, and movement over rugged terrain carrying heavy loads or equipment. There are many different kinds of combat. "For things are done one way in a melee; another when the decision rests on a battle formation; another when there is an infantry charge, and another when combat takes the form of a duel."

20. Expect often to be unfairly judged. Generals get the praise for the valor of their soldiers, but also get scorn for their shortcomings. "The glory that comes from good deeds is unequal to the shame that comes from mistakes".

21. Learn to swim well. It greatly increases confidence.

22. Rest and leisure is of vital importance. Hunting, team sports, and fishing "refresh the spirit with great delight, and the movement they require fortifies the limbs."

23. Dancing and cavorting with women is also essential, and there is a "certain profit in doing them, since they exercise the body and bring dexterity to the limbs, if they do not make young men lustful and vain, corrupting good behavior".

24. From time to time, however, "one needs to do absolutely nothing and be entirely free from work, so as to meet once again the demands of work and toil. For the muscle which is always stretched taut usually breaks if it is not sometimes relaxed".

25. Grooming the body is critically important. The end result should be neither "too fastidious nor too slovenly". Excessive focus on grooming is "a sign of a feminine mind and a proof of great vanity".

Final Thoughts

All in all, this advice is an excellent program for training in leadership and character. For a short treatise, this little work can scarcely be improved on. Vergerio's counsel was directed at individuals, but we should note that masculine virtue does not exist in isolation. It thrives only when certain conditions are met. From my own study of history, the following conditions must be present in order for masculine virtues to find a healthy presence in a society: (1) institutional support from some sector of society, such as the military, an organized religion, or mercantile guilds; (2) the existence of fraternal societies, such as guilds or military orders from which women are excluded; and (3) mentors willing to instruct young men.

Unfortunately, none of the conditions needed for the cultivation of masculine virtue are present in modern America. Institutions that once nurtured it have been marginalized or destroyed, and mentorship is now a purely hit-or-miss affair.

But the seeds of our resurrection have been planted, and are slowly germinating. We do have control over ourselves, and we can integrate elements of Vergerio's program into the training of our younger brothers or sons. By training ourselves for leadership and the hardships of life, we serve as beacons of hope for younger men who have been left with no role models, no mentors, and little hope. For ourselves, and for them, we toil.

We sharpen our swords, and await the approach of our day.

How Not To Be A Man

September 9, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The recent Miley Cyrus debacle has generated a lot of conversation online, most of it rightfully directed at Cyrus. It appears, however, that it has also brought the white knight armies out for a march. One enlisted member of this pathetic farcical force, Matt Walsh, decided to create his critique in the form of a letter to his son, ostensibly with the goal of getting him to avoid following Robin Thicke's example.

What follows is one of the most pathetic examples of how not to be a man that I've ever seen, which I'll take the time to respond directly right now.

> In any case, this gives you an idea of the full performance: A 36 year old married > man and father, grinding against an intoxicated 20 year old while singing about how she's an "animal" and the "hottest bitch in this place." And what happens the next day? We're all boycotting the 20 year old. The grown man gets a pass.

> Now I'm beginning to understand why that judge in Montana gave a teacher a 30 day jail sentence after he was convicted of raping a 14 year old girl, who later killed herself because of the psychological trauma caused by being sexually victimized by a 50 year old man.
> This guy must be a Robin Thicke fan.

White knight logic: Robin Thicke singing about sexy girls and dancing with a totally legal 20 year old at the VMAs = child rape.

> I'm no feminist.

> But where are the men in all of this? Have we so completely given up on chivalry that we don't even see what's troubling about a GROWN ASS MARRIED DUDE singing a song about sexual domination while dry humping a young woman on national TV?

1. Chivalry is dead and women had as much to do with that death as men did.

2. Notice the subtle age-gap-shaming implied here. Robin Thicke is a “GROWN ASS” married dude, but Miley Cyrus is, at 20, a “GROWN ASS WOMAN” who (at the time) had a fiance. She is an adult. There is nothing wrong with two adults doing what they please sexually/romantically, so long as it is consensual. The age gap is irrelevant.

3. What dry humping? I saw the performance, I didn’t see much in the way of active humping/grinding from his end. I saw her bend over and try to twerk on him, not the reverse.

Why the need to make things up? Is it too hard to white knight without fudging the facts?

> The girls that behave like Miley Cyrus do so because they want to attract men. And it works. It shouldn’t.

It doesn’t. Men don’t find Miley Cyrus’ behavior attractive. They don’t generally prefer short hair like hers, don’t generally favor her tongue’s perpetual presence outside of her mouth and don’t really get much from her total lack of rhythm. Men like fit girls who can twerk and dance, but Miley can’t actually do these things.

It is important for young men to understand female behavior and the motivations behind it, since Matt Walsh clearly does not. Miley Cyrus is doing what she’s doing not for men, but for herself. Less famous women who make the kind of decisions she makes (lopping off their hair, adopting trashy dress and behavior, going out of their way to be “edgy” and adopting behavior traits from totally different cultures) are not doing it for dudes, they’re doing it for their own reasons (boredom, rebellion, desire for change, etc, etc). Many of the decisions women make have absolutely nothing to do with men and everything to do with their own emotions, feelings and relationships with one another.

These are the realities that make the white knight’s bid to saddle men with every ounce of blame and responsibility he can muster so totally and utterly absurd. Adult women make their own decisions for their own reasons. Smart men understand this and don’t take it all that seriously.

Smart men know that they do not have control over young women like Miley Cyrus and the tens of millions of young females who worship her. If they did have such control over the behavioral and sexual decisions such young women made, I guarantee that there would be no manosphere, no PUAs, no legions of “nice guys” complaining about girls loving “assholes” and no girls pulling a Miley Cyrus and lopping their hair off.

All of these very real things are the product of one inescapable fact of life: men, more often than not, do not understand women particularly well and are not usually successful in getting them to behave in ways that work for them. They have, in reality, no more control over women than women have over them.

> A few days ago a mom blogger wrote a letter to her daughter entitled “Dear daughter, let Miley Cyrus be a lesson to you.” Well, I have a daughter, and I echo this woman’s sentiments. But I also have a son, and I don’t want the boys to get off the hook here. My little man isn’t old enough to read yet, but one day he will be, and one day I’ll give him this letter.

God help this kid.

> Dear son,
> Don't let Robin Thicke be a lesson to you.
> Don't let any of these pigs and perverts you see on TV be a lesson to you. They treat women like garbage;

They treat women only as well as women allow them to.

> they possess no chivalry,

They're better off without it. This isn't medieval Europe, we are not knights and they are not ladies.

> You might be tempted to follow suit. In fact, you WILL be tempted. These male > pop stars and celebrities, look at them, you'll think. They take advantage of emotionally broken, self loathing, confused young women, and they are rewarded handsomely for it.

Yep, totally just the dudes to blame here. Women don't have their own minds, they live at the mercy of men. None of this has anything to do with women and what they want.

Sure.

In the eyes of the white knight, women are never anything but victims. Such a mentality is easy to understand when you think about it: who would the gallant knight have to rescue if he lost a ready supply of innocent, defenceless, and mindless damsels?

> What you see on TV is a facade. It's a sales pitch. It's poison. You see the bright lights and the sexy women, but you don't see what happens when the cameras are off and these pop culture gods return to their lives as mere mortals. You don't see them in their big, empty, lonely houses. You don't see the emptiness in the pit of their souls. You don't see all the alcohol and drugs they have to use to dull the pain of living a life devoid of real, committed relationships. You don't see the hatred they have for themselves and for humanity. You don't see the jealousy they have towards normal, decent men.

I'm not sure I even need to illustrate just how self-serving this entire paragraph is.

We don't see most of the things he mentions because, frankly, they often are non-existent. The bulk of the world's wealthy and powerful are very comfortable in their homes, love what they do, are perfectly fulfilled as far as their "souls" go, and are not addicts. They don't hate humanity, they don't hate themselves, and (most of all) THEY HAVE NO DESIRE TO BE AN AVERAGE JOE LIKE THE TYPICAL WHITE KNIGHT.

Again, this guy says he's not a feminist but the kind of rationalization I'm reading here reads like something right off of Jezebel and straight off of the white knight's sigil. Healthy relationships, fulfilling lifestyles, a lack of drug addiction and comfortable homes are not the sole property of "normal decent men" lacking in money and fame.

Matt, bro, I'm gonna be real here: You are not a special snowflake. You sound like just another average Joe who isn't too pleased about that status and responds by trying to tear down those above him. Robin Thicke is WAY better off than you are, and you attempt to rationalize this away by saying "oh, its ok. Deep down he's just a broken, lonely drug addict!". This is BS, bro. We can all see right through it.

Here's a crucial realization for those seeking to define manhood and what is needed to attain it: If you can't take pride in what you are without tearing others down, you've got a serious problem and a serious weakness. Men learn to define themselves and find contentment within themselves. The snarky, envious takedowns seen here are for females, particularly those who've yet to leave their teens. It is irresponsible of any man to not only fail to correct this, but to attempt to pass the behavior on to a child.

> Your dad is no celebrity. He's just an average, boring guy.

Yes, and painfully so.

> But he's got something that every famous and non-famous womanizer envies: He's got the love and commitment of ONE beautiful, smart, faithful woman. He's got your mom, and he'll only have your mom until the day he dies. He ought to be waking up every day shouting praises to the Lord because of that.

Can you build a bigger pedestal than this for a woman? I'm not sure I've seen such a gargantuan illustration of oneitis in my life. Every white knight must have his princess, I suppose.

Look, Matt (and all of the other white knights out there), you're in love. I get that, that's cool and I'm glad it works for you, but don't assume that it makes you special. Plenty of men are not monogamous and/or in lifelong marriages, and plenty of those men are quite alright with that. They don't want the commitment of your woman. Some don't want or need the commitment of ANY woman. Some wouldn't mind having the commitment of one woman one day, but are just fine for now without it until they find a girl that's right at a time that's right. And still other rare men are able to get the commitment of MULTIPLE women at the same time or throughout the course of their lives at different periods of time.

Each guy decides for himself where he stands. What is objectively clear, however, is this: the fact that you are in a long term relationship with one woman does not make you special. The fact that you got one woman to marry you is not special. Your particular woman is, in all likelihood, not all that special. YOU, in all certainty, are not all that special. Nobody envies you. You are just one in a legion that stands itself among many other legions of white knights defending a damsel in no particular distress. Nobody is anxious to don your armor and join that horde of supplicants.

> Men are loyal. Men are honest. Men respect and honor women. A man goes out and finds one woman, and he vows to protect and love her for the rest of his life. A man would never betray that vow

So, in short, Matt seeks to teach his son to adhere to a very narrow view of masculinity (even as he spends time attacking the media for putting forward what he claims is a “limited” view on manhood) that originated and really only holds strongly among North Western Europeans (and these days mainly just the most religious ones)?

The world your son will inherit is a very diverse one, Matt. The majority of the people in it right now don’t have a great track record of adhering to the kind of social model you’re promoting here. It isn’t a part of their culture, it is a feature of yours.

Given this reality, I think you’re doing your kid a disservice by teaching him to adopt such an intolerant point of view.

> Even the weakest and most cowardly man — if he is a man at all — would die for the woman he loves. Your dad is no hero, but let someone try to hurt your mom and watch him suddenly turn into Superman (or Batman, whichever you prefer).

You are not a hero, and you won’t become one (or even remotely resemble one) under any circumstances. You’re an arrogant, condescending white knight, and that’s nothing to be proud of.

> See, son, you don’t have to be big and strong to be a man, although I think you will be one day. You don’t have to be “cool” or athletic. You don’t have to play guitar or fix cars. These are all fine things, but they don’t define a man. A man is defined by how he treats women,

A man who is defined by women is not a man, he is a mangina.

Men must define themselves, and they do that in part through their treatment of EVERYONE (including themselves), not just women. When you can reach a point at which you are not defined primarily or exclusively by your relationship to and/or worship of a woman, you will have understood the definition of true manhood.

Until then, you’re just another supplicating white knight.

Debunking The Three Most Popular Game Denialisms

September 10, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Game denialism is something that started off as a reaction to the PUA bullshit of the 2000's, where it was discovered that No-it's-not-worth-$3000-to-learn-how-to-approach-girls, but slowly evolved into a more insidious force of angry beta males who were insistent that their failures with women were because of something outside of their control. In order to support the lie that they had no power over their sex lives, they deny that game exists.

In this blog post, I'd like to discuss the more popular criticisms of game while trying to show the more academic and psychological side of game.

Denialism #1: What you say barely matters

This criticism focuses on the passive vs. active side of game and denies that active game exists, or has little to zero impact on the seduction process. For the layman, this is the most popular criticism of game. They will argue that the only reason a man like George Clooney gets women is because he is famous, or that rich men with ugly women like Mark Zuckerberg are just weirdo's who are outliers in the grand scheme of things.

All else being equal, they say, the man with the best looks, most money, most fame, or best connections will score the hottest chicks.

The first counter-response to this is that anyone who believes this hasn't seen much of the world. He has not seen the countless doctors who spend all their time in the lab with no pussy to show for it, or the lawyers who make six figures in NYC but have extreme difficulty bringing girls back to their apartment, or the investment bankers who spends all of their hard earned cash on hookers. They have not seen the loser drug dealers who bang young hot skanks, or the broke musicians with their many groupies, or the salsa dancer who smashes more hot pussy in two months than most men will touch in a lifetime.

But more importantly, the philosophical problem with denialism #1 is that it denies a very influential and important school of psychology called behaviorism. Behaviorism, which starts with the premise that our thoughts do not matter in guiding our actions (a controversial, but useful, premise), believes that how animals act are largely based on what sort of stimulus it was exposed to.

Likewise, game, whether or not its adherents understand this, operates on the principle that a woman's actions toward a man are based on what the man has previously said or acted toward her. That is, if a man approaches a woman with confident body language and speaks with gusto and charisma, the woman will be far more receptive to him than had he approached otherwise. This is behaviorism. Active game, in essence, is understanding how one's behavior influences others. Behaviorism is also the guiding philosophy behind the sales business, whereby salesmen carefully craft their pitches to successfully pursuade their customers into buying their product.

So denialism #1, in addition to contradicting everyday experience, also denies a very powerful school of psychology which has proven itself extremely useful. It is for these reasons people should reject the idea that our behavior does not influence the results we have in our social interactions.

Denialism #2: Game is not geninue attraction, it's just a bunch of tricks

This denialism is an interesting one. Rather than deny that game works, instead it is denied that game is as powerful as its adherents claim it to be. Game is merely a set of tricks that guys can use to con women into sleeping with them, rather than earn the love of a woman for the long haul. Other variants of denialism #2 include "game is mostly not fucking up," or "game is just a placebo men use to give themselves confidence."

In all cases, the denialist is appealing to some sort of moral code whereby a truly attractive man would not need game; indeed, he would be self-sufficient enough such that women would be drawn to his personality due to his raw masculinity. He would have no need to study behaviorial psychology in order to get laid – game is just for the loser men who aren't manly enough to get laid without resorting to tricks.

This argument is equivalent to saying "game isn't fair." For example, if two men agree to a knife-duel and one man pulls out a gun to shoot the other man then it wouldn't be a fair fight. And you know what? No one gives a shit. Because in the game of love, like war, the outcome is zero-sum. Some men will get more pussy than others. In every relationship, one will always like the other more, so either the man or the woman will have more power over his/her partner.

Thus if the only criticism of a gamer is that he's not playing fair, here's what I have to say…

Game is more than tricks. Game is knowledge of women. Knowledge is power. Game is power over women. Thus by learning game you do more than trick women — you control them.

Denialism #3: Game is a fad

I admit, I used to believe this one when I was first learning game. I thought that game was the product of a decadent culture, and when Western Civilization collapses so too will game lose its usefulness.

But once I learned game, I realized this was wrong. Game is nothing more than a euphemism for knowledge of behaviors that attract women. Certainly, the passive side of game will never change — women will always like being with successful and handsome men — but also, the active side of game will remain even if the language in which we speak changes or the venues in where men meet women change. The active side of game will always be culturally relative, but the principles of game will always remain the same (click this link to read some excerpts from Ars Armorata, by Ovid).

What is unique to our time, and what surely will not remain in place forever, is the "endless dating" that is inherant to our decadant culture. Casual sex is seen as normal, and women forgo childrearing in favor of careers and sexing as many alphas as they can before they hit menopause. Although it is extremely doubtful if this can last (I certainly do not think so), I will concede to the game denialist that it is our slutty times which have given rise to the science of game. Without the ability to approach and bed countless women, it would be impossible to develop and refine man's understanding of women in such a scientific way as the modern gamesman has.

The Gift Of Information

September 10, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Several generations ago, your great grandparents likely worked on a farm or in a dimly-lit urban factory after dropping out of school. They toiled doing menial labor for hours on end, kept a home together, and sometimes learned to read if they were particularly lucky. At or before age 18, they married the child of a close family friend, or perhaps even a cousin. They had kids immediately and continued working until they died in their sleep, never having left their home town.

Two generations ago, people began to go to college en masse. They read a few classic books and got a nice degree that ensured them a middle-class job. They would marry someone they met at their job, go on a few nice vacations, and have unremarkable kids. They would live modestly off their pensions until dying of a heart attack at age 68.

More recently, "Generation X"ers were pushed into taking on debt to pay for increasingly worthless college degrees. They could tell that something seemed vaguely wrong with Reagan-era consumerism, but were poorly equipped to deal with the changing economic, global, and social climate.

This generation lives in an age where information travels exponentially faster than any other period in human history. With a few keystrokes, you can call up exhaustive information on any subject and, if you know where to look, best practices for a fulfilling and healthy life. I fear that many within and outside of the manosphere overlook this monumental gift of our time. Without this knowledge-transfer, I would have never known things such as:

- That All Girls LIke Rough Sex
- Not to worry about monogamy
- Not to make waves at work
- How to spot a false rape accusation

My colleague Western Cancer recently posted on the paralysis by analysis that comes with technology's increasing prevalence in our lives. Perhaps he is right to an extent — too much of a good thing can arrest progress and may fail to make us happier on a day to day basis, as he laid out. But I contend that when managed properly, it allows us to make better decisions that can lead to long-term well-being.

Any question that you can imagine about game, lifestyle, fitness, nutrition, money, entrepreneurship, or wisdom has been asked and answered scores of times by men like you, many of whom have made mistakes that you can learn from. The collected wisdom of millions is available to you if you know where to look.

Despite the increasing prevalence of keyboard jockeys, the signal to noise ratio is still high enough in this corner of the internet for you to learn by asking the right questions. No one in the history of humanity has had these opportunities on a daily basis. Simply by being alive in this generation, you've been given a tremendous gift of information and, if you learn how to synthesize it, knowledge. How will you use it to improve your life?

Are Nitasha Tiku & Anil Dash Racist Against White Men? (Update)

September 11, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A disturbing story has recently developed where two Indian immigrants have coordinated to destroy the livelihood of a white American-borne professional who they didn't agree with.

Pax Dickinson worked as the Chief Technology Officer for Business Insider. He had a Twitter account where he shared views that went against the liberal narrative of gay marriage, spinster worship, fat acceptance, and open borders.

Anil Dash, an Indian businessman, started the attack with this tweet:

Not six hours later, another Indian individual who works at Gawker, Nitasha Tiku, put up a story that shared the most "offensive" tweets that Pax had posted. Because of how fast Nitasha published the story, I would not be surprised if there was private coordination between Anil and Nitasha before publication. Since Business Insider is run by a CEO who is afraid of pansexual geeks on Twitter, Pax's employment was terminated. (Nick Denton, the homosexual British man who employs Nitasha, was no doubt satisfied to create turmoil for his main competitor.)

Nothing can be done about Pax's employment, but I want to take a closer look at the motivations of both Nitasha and Anil, and why they decided to gang up on Pax. First, let's examine something that Anil wrote on his blog in response to the financial crisis of 2008:

> There's a related question here which no one is asking, which is whether the economic catastrophe facing the global marketplace is a result of a failure of white culture in America. The media is always quick to ask whether problems like violence plaguing minority communities are symptoms of a toxic culture in that community, but I haven't seen any questions to that effect in regard to this financial meltdown.

Last time I checked, white culture made America, but here we have a man with Indian roots attacking the entire home race. Why is it okay for him to attack white culture, but if anyone attacked "black culture" or "gay culture," he would be first in line to fight back, crying bigotry, or as in the case of Pax, "misogyny"?

In my line of work (teaching men how to meet women), I have noticed a lot of pent-up frustration from Indian men that is directed at white men. The reason? Indian men are jealous that they can't lay white women, who they pedestalize to heavenly heights. You can shake your head or laugh, but most Indian men will openly tell you they prefer white women over their own race. On my forum, we have enough angry Indian trolls that we've developed a name for them: Indian Race Trolls (IRT).

In spite of Anil's apparent success in business, I would bet a month of my income that he is angry at not being able to have sex with pretty white women. His wife, while surely a nice woman, is not objectively attractive:

This man has lots of money and half a million Twitter followers, can easily import a pretty Indian bride through his family connections, but instead settles for this individual. In other words, the fact that he is with a homely white girl instead of a pretty Indian girl is a strong indicator to his white woman fetish.

In comes Pax Dickinson, a fellow tech worker who is okay-looking, cocky, confident, successful, and white. Anil is resentful of the white man not only for building the West, compared to—say—a Mumbai slum, but also because he can't come close to getting the type of woman that his business success would give him if he were white.

The animosity is even more clear when you learn that Anil and Pax used to work in the same building. Did Anil lash out at him when they worked together? Nope. Only when he was safely out of range did he decide to start his internet attack. Typical, passive-aggressive beta male behavior.

Nitasha Tiku, also Indian and a suspected Marxist, has shown a pattern of disliking white men, who she believes are privileged and contain no inherent value. She recently called an app "deplorable" because it helped regular people avoid ghetto areas. In her world, it is unconscionable to think that someone would want to keep themselves safe, but when you consider she lives in a white New York neighborhood, it becomes clear she is a hypocrite who won't be interacting with poor black people anytime soon. She deemed the ghetto avoidance app "racist" and "classist" because it's better if everyone is equally poor and unsafe. Why she doesn't return back to India, where there's a flatter class system consisting mostly of poor people who defecate on the street, I have no idea.

Here's a sample of her most recent work:

- Dear Paul Graham, Your Priorities Are So Far Out of Whack
- Larry Ellison makes 2,236 times more than the average American worker
- This Is Why There Aren't Enough Women In Tech
- Bustle's CEO is Even More of a Self-Serving Misogynist Than You Feared

It's obvious she hates men, especially white men. It's amazing that a bonafide misandrist can get a job at the biggest blog network on the internet, denounce whomever she wants, and no one calls out her hatemongering.

[image]

Would not fornicate

The irony is that Anil, her partner in Soviet-style denouncement, would never date her because she is Indian, even though they are of the same race, but it's okay for them to team up and get a white man fired. I suppose in the end it doesn't matter since she's a lesbian, and I predict that she's only one year away from identifying herself as neither a woman or man, as encouraged by the latest liberal trend of declaring yourself to be a gender-neutral carrot, or whatever.

In this drama you have a classic Marxist dyke and a sexually frustrated Indian man joining forces to get a white American man fired within 24 hours. And no one cares besides our perverted corner of the internet. That tells you how much power that minority liberals have gained.

I must state that Pax didn't do himself any favors with his tweets, but we have to make a decision as a society if we're going to let angry liberals decide the employment status of natives who actually are contributing to the nation's economy. The result from all this is one productive man is out of a job while Nitasha can continue fouling up the internet with her Apple laptop (Steve Jobs was a white man) while sitting in Starbucks (Howard Schultz is a white man) and slaving away for Gawker (Nick Denton is a white man), thinking how she is changing the world for women and Indians. At the same time, Anil can ruin a white man's livelihood because he's deeply disappointed with his white girlfriend in spite of all the money and status he has. How did this happen to America? I don't know, but it's a damn shame we've arrived at this point.

Here is additional evidence of Anil's anti-white hatred:

But You’re A Good Girl

This past weekend, I was reminded that no matter how you perceive a certain girl, no matter how “tame” you think you can make her — she will always have the same desires, urges, and underlying sexual yearnings of every other girl you’ve encountered.

I attended a friend’s birthday party where it was almost exclusively girlfriends, mothers, and wives making up the demographic of women in attendance. However, it was a very close friend, and having come off a three-month binge in the EE, I welcomed an off-night from gaming. Following dinner, the group of 30 or so went to a nearby karaoke bar.

Alcohol was flowing, but not every girl was drinking. However, every girl did sing. Many songs were sung, including new favorites (“Get Lucky”), love songs of a pop nature (“Love You Like A Love Song”), old karaoke classics (“Don’t Stop Believing”) , amongst others. The girls that participated in these various songs, maybe at most 3 for each song, gave a decent effort to sing for the crowd.

And then this song came on:

With lyrics such as:

> OK now he was close, tried to domesticate you
> But you’re an animal, baby, it’s in your nature
> Just let me liberate you

Or:

> I know you want it

> I know you want it
> I know you want it
> But you're a good girl
> The way you grab me
> Must wanna get nasty
> Go ahead, get at me

And the clever line of questioning:

> Hey, hey, hey
> You wanna hug me
> Hey, hey, hey
> What rhymes with hug me?
> Hey, hey, hey

Two things happened. First, every girl in the room got up and slithered her way to the nearest microphone. Second, these wives, mothers and girlfriends sang the song with the unbridled passion of a sex-starved virgin, harboring submission fantasies after reading 50 Shades while taking an aromatic bubble bath in a castle nestled atop an Italian villa. To say the energy in the room changed would be an understatement. The glisten in the eyes of the mother of three when the song echoed "must wanna get nasty." The fixated stare at the lyrics by the conservative non-drinking religious girl while belting at the top of her lungs "you're a gooooooood girl…" The undoubtedly now-all-moist girls exclaiming in unison "hey hey hey!" following the lyric of "I know you want it."

While it was shocking to see girls I knew act this way, I was not surprised. Girls are sexual creatures and given the opportunity, they will want to express it. They want to be dominated. Yet too often, guys believe that "she is different." That this little snowflake is does not harbor such devious desires. She does not want her hair pulled. She does not want rough sex. She does not want to get dirty.

Bullshit.

I did not see all the girls get up and risk vocal cord damage for Whitney Houston's "I Will Always Love You" that played a few songs prior, a song about romance and love. I did not see more than two girls arise for a sing-along to Tommy Tutone's ballad about a girl named Jenny and his cringeworthy desire for her and her catchy seven digit telephone number.

Nope. It was a song about "degrading women" that was "rapey" that put the dampness back in those kitchen sponges.

Pax Dickinson And The Culture Of Tolerance

September 11, 2013 | by scorpion | Link | Original Link

The politically correct internet hit squad is at it again. You know who I'm talking about: the assorted collection of feminists, white knights, manginas, fat acceptance activists and homosexuals who band together to create a virtual shit storm every time a man opens his mouth and says something remotely offensive. Their modus operandi? Raise a ruckus on social media in an attempt to sully the reputation of their target and get him fired by his employer. Unfortunately, they've succeeded yet again, this time in the case of Pax Dickinson, the now-former CTO of Business Insider.

Isn't it a little amusing how a group of people who claim to be tolerant of everything are so intolerant of traditional masculine behavior, and traditionalism in general?

This type of social justice activism/cultural Marxism has become a sort of religion to these people. In this age of atheism, absent belief in any traditional god, these sort of people are moral itinerants. What is right? What is wrong? Who the fuck knows? They have no idea. But once they stumble upon this cultural Marxist, social justice nonsense, they suddenly believe they've discovered what it means to be virtuous. They've found religion.

So their new answer to the question, "What is right?" is simply to tolerate everyone and everything, except those who do not agree with this view of complete tolerance. So they run around spouting their nonsense, encouraging and mainstreaming the most bizarre and marginal human behaviors in a perverse quest to prove themselves the most tolerant of all their peers. The worst sin, according to these people, is to be intolerant of or insensitive to another person (unless that person is in any way traditional, then they must be destroyed). This blanket tolerance has led, in combination with the natural attentionwhoring of women, who comprise most of their movement, to the emergence of the most outlandish self-descriptive language among these types. “Otherkin”, ‘Pansexual”, “Cisgendered”, and so on and so forth.

What this is, really, is the elevation of the deranged and deformed along with the simultaneous tearing down of the strong and traditional. They are threatened by the sight of a masculine, red pill man like Pax Dickinson who unapologetically speaks his mind without fear of offending anyone. His very presence is like rubbing salt into their open wounds. Every time they see him they are acutely conscious of their own inferiority, so they conspire to end him. It’s like a gang of angry, deformed and diseased street cripples overcoming a confident and successful alpha male. They cannot stand the sight of him simply because the contrast of his excellence with their personal failure creates the most acute existential pain imaginable. Their hatred of him is just a projected hatred of themselves.

Their entire ideology is a failure, because tolerance itself is no virtue. The thing that matters is what is being tolerated, not the act of tolerance itself. Would you tolerate a man breaking into your house and raping your wife? Would you tolerate a man who gave your daughter drugs and encouraged her to become a prostitute? Would you tolerate a group of people who laze around the town square naked, covered in their own piss and shit and who harass anyone who comes near them?

Of course not. These people don’t understand that by tolerating every type of degenerate behavior, they are destroying the culture. Imagine what would happen if your immune system suddenly became tolerant of everything. Within days or weeks your body would become host to dozens of infections and viruses, and you would quickly die. That’s exactly what these people are doing to our culture: they’ve essentially turned off our cultural immune system, which naturally acts to kill off what is undesirable, and instead now allow it to tolerate everything. And so the body of the West has become filled with disease.

A backlash against these people is starting to build. This type of insanity will not long endure. It simply can’t. It is evidence that our society is terminally sick and dying. Within a few decades will come a rebirth of more traditional values, and these cultural Marxist social justice warriors will become nothing more than a relic of an ignominious era in our history. They will be looked back at with a mix of horror, pity and laughter. Our descendents will be unable to comprehend how such an absurd ideology was able to take root in society. It will be as incomprehensible and perverse to them as the idea of suddenly chopping off their own body parts (which is fittingly a practice esteemed by the social justice warriors under the guise of “transgenderism”).

These fools think they have found the one true god, but in reality they are simply a cult of death and decay. They are the patron saints of the sick and the twisted, the degenerate and the deformed. They are the enemies of excellence. They fancy themselves as warriors for social justice, but are actually the destroyers of traditional culture. It’s too late to save the West as we currently know it; but like a Phoenix, a new Western culture will rise from the ashes, a culture with traditional values and a healthy immune system to protect itself against degenerate cultural scum. And it won't soon tolerate these worshippers of tolerance.

How To Defeat New York City Media Liberals

September 12, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've stumbled upon the formula that liberals based primarily in New York City use to attack those that go against their narrative. I want to discuss their methods and suggest a possible counterattack.

The Liberal Attack Formula

Their attack begins with a low-level staff writer, often a woman, on one of the many blogs that are primary headquartered in NYC, such as Gawker, Huffington Post, Buzzfeed, Atlantic, Salon, Slate, and Wonkette. She writes about the latest man who is a "misogynist," "racist," or "bigot" of some sort. Even though all the sites I mentioned are owned by different entities, the hate piece quickly cascades through their network, often within a day. This is no surprise when you consider that staff members at all these sites know each other in real life and have both friendly and sexual relations. Or perhaps they are just lazy and rather copy/paste a news item that someone else wrote instead of finding an original story themselves.

The articles, full of snark and liberal talking points, greatly anger their liberal audience. Now, understand that today's liberal doesn't attack through the courts or police—they go after a man's livelihood using the internet. The articles all contain the victim's employment, sometimes even contact information of his boss or CEO (if the victim owns his own company, they will list his advertisers or customers). They are sure to include the source of the victim's income.

All those angry readers now channel their anger on Twitter. They form a huge bot army that engages the victim's source of income through a deluge of angry tweets, along the lines of "Did you know that you employ a man who does so and so?" No company can withstand this type of negative publicity, so within a day or two, the victim in question loses his employment. Because all of the sites have huge audiences, the bot army is quite large and impressive.

Their attack depends on four factors:

- A low-paid, liberal staff writer who wants to destroy a man's livelihood either for laughs or to please her boss massa
- A victim who had an impure thought that could be construed as "racist" or "misogynist"
- Informal coordination between different blogs to juice a particular story for page views
- Creating enough anger in readers so they act upon the perceived outrage

Their system is quite effective at reaching the desired end, but like all systems, there is a weakness. Can you spot it?

How They Can Be Beaten

The weakness lies in the original writer of the hit piece. Once the story goes viral, she is often forgotten, but it's her where the counterattack can be successfully executed. There really is no point engaging the bot army because their numbers are more than 10,000 times ours. Any attempt to fight them on Twitter will result in defeat, especially when you consider that they have tons of soldiers with over 50,000 followers (I have less than 6,000).

There is also no point in attacking companies like Gawker, who earn millions of dollars a year and can withstand any criticism we throw at them. But the blogger making $30,000 a year, trying to eke out a living in New York City, with hopes of climbing up the career ladder once it's clear she's not talented enough to be a real writer, is very vulnerable to being even slightly attacked. Anything that damages her future employment chances will cause her grief, pain, and a decrease in income.

Twitter is a medium that is short and fleeting. Unless we can raise a huge rage army at short notice, which we can't, there is little point using this medium to fight back. But there is a medium which lasts forever, and where numbers don't matter as much. That medium is Google.

I have been successfully destroyed on Google. My name is linked to all sorts of negative material that ensures I will never get a corporate job again in my life. That's fine with me since I make my living via other means, but that's not fine for blog writers who still need to depend on corporate America. Little Susie is writing for Jezebel today, but she will have to change jobs at some point, meaning a Human Resources airhead will search for her name to make sure she is a proper fit for the company. What would be HR's reaction if they google their promising applicant and find this?

They wouldn't hire her. Unless she's applying for a position at Jezebel, no respectable company will touch a toxic individual who has been linked to racism. They don't want anyone who may cause controversy for them, and behind rape, nothing says controversy like race. If you dig into these writers work and background, you can easily find cases where they spew anti-white or misandrist views. All that's left is getting that on the first page of Google.

It's a slow-burn attack that will effectively punish these writers and scare their co-workers, whose income is low enough that they need to depend on corporate employment indefinitely, unless one day they get an original thought and can stay away from their iPhone long enough to write a book. It won't work on the big liberal writers like Jessica Valenti or Naomi Wolf, since any attention they get just helps them sell more books, but it does work on the young girl out of college trying to win feminist brownie points by denouncing a man for being "creepy" based on a bad joke.

If you're still skeptical on whether this will work, simply take a look at Nitasha Tiku, whose anti-white racism I highlighted recently. Within half a day, that post shot to the first page of Google when searching for her name. Whereas one day before Nitasha was gleefully retweeting my hate against her to rally her supporters, the following day she went completely silent. When one of her NYC media friends posted a link to my article, she took only 8 minutes to beg him to take it down (like an obedient puppy dog, he did).

Does that sound like a girl who doesn't care what anyone says about her? One thing she was wrong about is that the traffic doesn't matter—it's about page rank. The more people that link to it or retweet it, the higher it will go in a Google result for her name. And this will stay there forever. She can easily dodge any Twitter attack we send her, but she can't run from Google. No one can.

Why I'm Immune From The Standard Liberal Attack

Not long ago, Buzzfeed insinuated I was a rapist. If I was a lowly staff writer who had to stroke Nick Denton's gay balls every day, I'd shake in my boots. I'd never get hired in a corporation again. But it actually had four benefits for me:

- More site traffic
- Higher book sales
- Higher page rank for my sites
- Entertainment for my readers

An attack that would devastate a person like Nitasha put money in my pocket. The reason they don't go after me anymore, even though all of them read me, is because they know that even mentioning me makes me stronger. I lost count how many times it happened where one of them tweeted me (usually a hack from The Atlantic), but then deleted the tweet not an hour later. I am on some type of blacklist, and to me that's fine, because I have enough seed traffic to create agitation in their gender-neutral souls. I also have the power to shoot anyone's name to at least the second page of Google within a day. And there's not a damn thing they can do about it.

They Are More Vulnerable Than You Think

I scared Nitasha with almost no work—it was just one blog post. Now imagine if there was just minor coordination within this part of the masculine sphere to attack one lowly staff writer who can barely make rent the following month. What if the first page of Google has several hits highlighting her anti-white or anti-male behavior? How many sleepless nights do you think she will have? A lot, and do you know how I know? Because several years ago I had those same sleepless nights.

Having your name destroyed on Google is the internet version of getting raped. I know this will hurt them because it hurt me, as right now I'm stuck in some backwater European city, waking up at noon every day, banging thin women who bake me cakes and wear heels like they're sneakers. At the same time I make love to foreign women without condoms, I have immunity from liberal attacks, and have decided to use this immunity for the good of men from my birth country. It's as if I have been blessed with a superpower.

There will be another Pax in the near future. All we have to do is follow these steps:

- Identify the staff writer who began the attack
- Carefully review her previously published material for racist and misandrist comments (feel free to ask your readers for help)
- Present your findings on a web site with a high Google standing
- Bring your story to the attention of your blogger friends and urge them to consider linking your work via their sites so it ranks high in Google
- Watch her beg people not to link to you

Our attack is slower and doesn't have the explosiveness of their Twitter bot army, but it works. In time, we will have our own bot army, but until then, Google is the equalizer that will put the brakes on their hatred of men and traditional masculinity. They have money, they have dozens of high-profile sites, and they have millions of readers, but we have the first page of the most popular search engine in the world.

The Castration Of The American Conservative

September 12, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Decline And Fall

A man owns a chair with four legs. His friends and colleagues have by turn cajoled and bullied him into believing that one of these legs is superfluous, and that the chair can seat someone safely with one less leg. The man, surrounded by loud, forceful opponents, eventually concedes. He saws off a leg, without making any other alterations to the chair.

He draws a line – "This is enough. I'm not going to saw off any more legs, lest the chair collapse under someone's weight, after losing the needed support." And yet, his opponents eventually succeed in convincing him to shear off two other legs as well, leaving only one remaining.

It's obvious that this chair, in its current form, will fail to ever serve its purpose. Yet the man cannot concede that the changes he made are responsible for destroying the chair. Instead, he starts blaming the last remaining leg for not being strong enough. He believes the solution is to somehow shore up that last leg, to let the chair be usable again once more. "No, it's not because I sawed off three legs, but because that last leg is just so weak!"

In truth, the last leg alone could never let the chair sit upright, even without someone sitting on it. Nor could any of the other legs. They were all essential to keeping the chair upright and healthy.

Enter The Mainstream Conservative

This man is the modern mainstream conservative. He has conceded much ground to progressivism, and worships at its altars. He freely tolerates and endorses its rituals. There is very little of which he doesn't approve.

Of course, he doesn't think so. He is captivated by constant opposition with progressives. The constant battling consumes him, and narrows his view. He is convinced that HE is the very antithesis of a progressive. When people of all eras and cultures are considered, the modern American conservative is indistinguishable from his progressive counterpart. Of course, he doesn't see it that way; his eyes play tricks on him. The inches of distance between his progressive peer become a chasm many miles wide from his vantage point.

The legs of the chair, as it were, are the elements essential to creating and propagating a society that conservatives claim to want. Most of these legs have fallen away already, initially at the instigation of progressives. And each time progressives started to remove one, conservatives would join in to finish the job. As John Derbyshire memorably put it, the conservative is a man marching eastward on a westbound ship.

> The whole modern world has divided itself into Conservatives and Progressives. The business of Progressives is to go on making mistakes. The business of the Conservatives is to prevent the mistakes from being corrected. – G.K. Chesterton

His protests are comically futile. Yet he shows no desire to jump ship, as it were. That would be too radical. Being a conservative today consists of the inability to see the consequences of one's actions, and to be yesterday's progressives.

For anyone who thinks clearly, these legs propping up traditional society are not hard to identify. Conservatives still believe that sex and childbearing ought to be limited to a man married to a woman. Yet people do not marry until their late 20's nowadays, more than a decade after full-blown puberty. Nor are females sexually restrained enough to prevent promiscuity.

When women well into their sexual prime are free to have sex with little consequence or restriction, they will. To tell independent women to abstain and hope that more than a few will listen is insane. Our forebears knew better of course. But conservatives have long since given up on listening to them. Modern conservatives who pride themselves on being 'hard-headed' suddenly become naive utopians in the realm of human sexuality.

Conservatives show no taste for truly addressing promiscuity, let alone women's liberation. To do so would be to promote early marriage, and largely oppose the admission of women to universities and the workplace, and to shame sluts. Broadly speaking, it would amount to restoring power over the institutions of society to the hands of men, while women would nurture the next generation to good health and spirit. However, their strategy is no such thing; it is identical to that of feminists – empower women and blame men.

The man who cut the legs off his chair steadfastly denied that his actions destroyed the chair. His denial is incoherent, and insane. So too, the conservative dementedly denies that the ideas he now supports contribute to conditions he so deplores. Just as he castigates the media for saturating society with sexual deviancy, he has a television and complete cable package to pipe in Hollywood's finest at his convenience. The recommendations of the mainstream conservative is unsuited to achieving his stated goals. He must either change his recommendations, or give up on achieving his goals.

Recently, Return of Kings ran a piece by Bacon on how to persuade a woman pregnant with your child to abort it. For the sake of argument, let us concede that abortion is an unmitigated atrocity. When a mature man is confronted with an atrocity, he looks to how he might prevent it from happening again. Detractors of the article were not so wise. They opted for feminine outbursts of anger and condemnation instead.

The calculus is fairly simple – a bastard poses risks that men don't want. Abortion is one final solution to avoiding these risks. The question then becomes, how do you reduce these risks, so that fewer men have a reason to abort a fetus? As the author suggested, giving the man the ability to opt out of child support obligations was one way – yet not a single detractor, as far as I saw, supported that. The main response was "another reason abortion is horrible – men can use it to their advantage." In the moral hierarchy of modern conservatism, a woman's right to a man's paycheck trumps a fetus's right to life.

If a man could opt out of paternity obligations, he'd have a lot less reason to push for an abortion. And as the detractors would have it, every conception is an immaculate conception – the fact that a woman chose to have sex goes unmentioned. Men have little in the way of birth control besides rendering themselves sterile for life, or making the sex mediocre by putting on a condom. Not to mention, to hit it raw is divine – God smites he who does not raw dog (Genesis 38:8-10).

Of course, abortion isn't the only issue. Bastardy and divorce are pernicious as well, yet conservatives have largely given up fighting those. The constellation of factors behind these conditions are too great: late marriage, fornication, contraceptives, female schooling & careerism, racial differences in their prevalence, the list goes on. Abortion is an outcropping of deeper problems that the conservative now ignores. Even if abortion were banned, other problems would continue to surface.

He is too cowardly to discuss those deeper issues; he fears upsetting progressives with allegedly sexist and racist speech. In fact, he is their enforcer. Abortion is the rare safe haven where his perceived morality outshines his 'bigotry.' My aim is not to say what should or should not be done, but to note that the conservative has lofty visions and yet timid actions; he suffers from an incredible inadequacy, a marked mismatch of ends and means.

If abortion is their only concern, let them attack it directly by giving men the right to opt out of child-support payments before birth. Let them back their words with action, and call for male birth control as strongly as they've condemned Mr. Bacon. Let them fiercely steward female chastity. They won't do any of these things, of course, because anything that empowers men and obligates women is unacceptable to them. To a modern conservative, just as how the ills of the free market always stem from big government, any time a woman screws up, it's a man's fault, someway, somehow.

The Art Of The Approach

I get a lot of emails asking for advice on how to approach fresh sluts or good girls, take your pick; so here's a breakdown that will help the newbies and provide a refresher course for the veteran players.

The first step in becoming great with women is learning How To Approach. Period. You can't pull a girl and enjoy her fresh tasty tight pinkness without at first approaching her and building her interest through your verbal and body language skills.

Now you're thinking, "I'm good looking so I get approached all the time", well congrats for looking like a Greek god and being a minor celebrity in your bubble of a world; however MOST guys don't look like Greek gods and will HAVE TO APPROACH in order to get laid. If you err in relying on being approached solely, then get ready for lots of lonely nights on your couch furiously masturbating to the latest Bang Bros video vixen.

There are 3 main components of the Art of The Approach: Mental, Physical and Instinctual.

Mental

Show me a cat approaching college co-eds on campus while he's in a depression and his face is taut with anxiety over XYZ problems and I'll show you a guy who's getting blown out of the water. Girls have a sixth-sense for a guy who's not congruent in what he says and how it comes across in their communication. YOUR mental well-being, first and foremost, is more important than you getting a night with Megan Fox at your local hotel. If you're dealing with depression, anxiety or any type of mental illness, then take care of that first. Girls aren't going anywhere.

Let's say that you're healthy mentally and are good to go. Then here's the how Mental plays into the Art of The Approach:

Your internal monologue is being broadcast to the world through your eyes, your word choices and your body language.

Unless you're the world's best actor, you cannot hide the negative self-defeating thoughts flowing through your mind before you head out to approach girls; whether that's at Coffee Bean or the club. I've mentioned it before in my 11 Step Prep article, but I'll reiterate it again: affirmations work. Talk yourself up: "I'm a badass motherfucker, I've been blessed with great looks" (whether true or not; doesn't matter), "I'm charismatic, girls WANT to be with me, girls want to date me, girls desire a dream guy just like ME".

Call it corny, call it new age bullshit, call it multi-level marketing fuckery; but show me a player who CONSISTENTLY pulls quality ass and I'll show you a player who's positive and NOT self-defeating.

Get your positive thoughts flowing, smile in the mirror and get ready to get Physical…

Ever noticed how when you're dressed in your favorite outfit, you just got a haircut and you worked out earlier in the day, that you feel unstoppable? Your mentality of self-worth will skyrocket when you combine the positive self-talk + taking care of yourself + dressing your best.

When you wear a suit, people show you more respect, girls eye-fuck you and valet brings your car to the front a lot quicker. Now, I'm not saying you have to wear a suit, what I'm saying is that you need to determine exactly what your Optimum Style is and make a real effort to maintain that look. If you're a V-neck sweater + nice jeans type of cat, then rock the fuck out of that style. Whatever is making YOU feel confident, sexy and outgoing should be your go-to outfit and style.

How you feel mentally (positive), plus how you feel physically (clothes/working out) comes across in your Body Language. Body language is so fucking big in approaching I could write 10 articles on it and still not explain the importance of this one. It is KEY. Girls are drawn and repelled by body language. I know for a fact that much of my approach success is due to my body language. Why? Because multiple girls have told me, "There's something about the WAY you CARRY yourself physically". Yes dear, it's called walking around like every girl in a 50 foot radius would be lucky to have my cock for 5 minutes. Try adopting this attitude gents and watch your success soar.

Quick Recap: Mental Health including being positive, self-confidence boosting INNER and OUTER dialogue + Physical Self-Awareness, knowing your personal best style and walking around like every girl would die to be with you = enhancing your approach success. These are tangible aspects of The Art of The Approach; however, this last component is NOT tangible, but is the 'IT' factor of approaching: Instincts.

[image]

Instinctual

Instincts may seem like something that you can't develop, but you actually can. Let's get real for a second: remember the last time you kissed a girl at the right moment? Remember how you just knew the timing was right, went for it and it was a success? That's called instincts. The more you listen to those instincts and TRUST them, the more 'natural' you'll seem. The fact is most 'naturals' are simply in touch with their instincts and utilize them when dealing with girls.

I used to question myself when dealing with girls years ago and we all know what happens when you start overthinking your interactions with them: you suck and it comes across canned and slightly moronic. As my confidence increased and I realized that for the most part trusting my instincts played to my favor, then my approach success and overall pull rate skyrocketed.

Unless you're simply a fucktard with a 78 IQ, odds are you have instincts that will serve you when you trust and go with them. Test them and learn to utilize them.

In my next article I will be going more into the actual approach process from physically seeing a girl, to approaching her and talking to her.

Until then, check out my system: http://www.NightclubBible.com

Let The World Be The World

I watched President Obama speak on Tuesday night. He spoke about intervention in Syria. A lot of people I have talked to about it have many different opinions. The most common ones were that he was unpresidential, indecisive, too limited with his intervention, and that he capitulated to the Russians. I did not get that vibe from his speech. It appeared to be more like a child beholden to his parents making a fake apology. It seemed that he said the things he was told to say with no meaning behind it and included things in his speech that are against intervention. It seems a vast majority of his advisers, courtiers, and lobbyists want a massive intervention in Syria and that they actually have the power to influence the President to say and do things he might not want to do.

Secretary of State Kerry seems to be adamant about intervening in Syria. I find this odd due his opposition to the Vietnam War and the things he said in protest to it. Looking through his history, he changes positions with the wind, as long as that wind is profitable. It seems a lot of other people in Washington DC work on this concept.

There have been many polls to show the American people do not support any intervention in Syria. I have emailed my Senator who is actually on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and voted for intervention in Syria and asked for a reason for intervention. I've not received an answer. I therefore started to think the shot callers in Washington don't really care about the will of the people. I've also come to the conclusion that there is not much that the people can do to stop this intervention. It seems only the might of Russia has put a hold on it.

There is a world that should be, and a world that is. While it is admirable to have idealism and hope for a world that should be, it is more pragmatic to plan for the world that is. Therefore I decided it is better to plan for a Syrian intervention and find ways to profit from it.

An intervention in Syria would utilize products from many publicly traded companies. Such products include Tomahawk cruise missiles, ammunition, services from military contractors, and gray market media productions. A wise man can find out who makes these products and what their symbol is on the stock exchange. Also the clash of Western and Eastern technologies in such an intervention could jump start innovation in engineering which should be a boon to intelligent men.

While many can espouse the horrors of chemical warfare or the suffering of people in a faraway land, a Syrian intervention is not in the interests of the people of the United States. It only might be in the best interest of a certain political class that overlaps into a corporate class. Because of this there most likely will be an intervention and a wise man should plan for it. Although investment in this intervention carries the risk of peace, I'll gladly take that profit-loss if there is peace.

Letter To My College Freshman Self

September 14, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

So you've been on campus for a few weeks. You're in awe of all the young, beautiful women. You're overwhelmed by the constant stream of information and entertainment. You've attended all the first week events and maybe you've had sex with a tight 18 year old discovering her freedom for the first time. You may think you know yourself, you may think you know everything, and you may be overwhelmed by the freedom you think you have. There's one thing wish for you to understand and that is "you know nothing." This is not a bad thing, but no matter how well you think you know yourself, your passions, or your morals, but the next four years will temper your youthful heat into the man you will soon be.

University has become a stepping stone into real life. You get the autonomy of living on your own without the responsibility that comes when the student loans dry up. When it comes down to it university is truly the best place to discover who you are deep down. Having been through it myself I can tell you this:

Social Life

Follow the 10 college commandments. Don't get tied down by any one group or woman. Now is the time to be friends to every one you meet, to start as many relationships as you can. Hold your friends and lovers to a set of personal standards. If they do not meet these standards there are thousands of other people who would be great to be friends with. Don't keep the do-nothings around, stay away from the angry idealists, shun the dudes with bad game, and reject the psycho chicks.

Many people I knew did not want to live in the dorms, but living in the dorms produced some of the best relationships and funnest nights. Watch what you eat, be mindful of who you fuck, and make sure you can bring value to any group. Eventually you should be at the point where you can walk down the street for 10 minutes and stop to say hi to a few people.

Like I said before watch what you eat in the dorms and hit the gym hard. University is the time to be building life long habits. One of these habits will be getting up before everyone else. When you wake up hours before your peers you can hit the gym, cook your food, and do your homework before your buddy calls you up to go drinking at 6pm.

The number one thing you should not do is waste time. You'll have days where you just want to sit around and watch the Wire all day eating snacks, or you might get off class and surf Facebook for hours. Fuck that. You will never again have the same level of freedom you do now unless you work for yourself. Get everything you need done while the day is young then soak in as much experience as you can at night. Try to do everything you ever wished you could do.

Classes

Chose your classes wisely. Research your program so that you get all of your required courses out of the way before you head off to study abroad. Research the options your major gives you and if you find you'd rather party or travel instead of commit to learning why are you still in school?

When it comes to studying, university is the polar opposite of high school. In high school everything is defined for you. You get daily homework, frequent progress reports and the teacher's job is to keep you on track. In university you have to do all this yourself. You can get by if you pay attention in class, but studying is more than memorizing facts. Learn concepts, be able to explain things, and most of all learn how to take tests better.

Wow, so much diversity!!!

Remember that a university is a business, but you also get out what you put in. It may seem like you're paying exorbitant fee for a piece of paper, but depending on the school you get: prestige, connections, beneficial professor relationships, etc. You're shelling out the cash, so work your hardest to get the most return on your investment.

Last of all make your own choices, take the advice of those wiser than you, but don't feel the need to live up to someone else's expectations; be it friends, family, or society. Even if you completely fuck everything up don't regret it, you're ahead of 90% of the world as it is. Have fun, don't stress out, and live life to its fullest.

Get Laid By Becoming A Foreigner In Your Own Country

September 14, 2013 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

The smile on my face faltered slightly. I look at the 8 sitting beside me, feeling the bitchiness rolling off her like stink off a very bangable garbage dump. I look slightly to her left, then smile and turn my ear in like I hadn’t heard her.

“Excuse me?” I ask.

“Where are you from?!” she asked back, louder, ruder, nearly snapping at me.

“Oh!” I chuckle, shaking my head. “Sorry! I am from Caen!”

She arched an eyebrow with a sour look on her face, ironically acting like I was the biggest asshole idiot in the conversation.

“Where?” she asked.

“Caen! Um, France!”

“No way,” she said with naked disbelief.

If this woman hadn’t been a very fit red-head her unpleasantness would have made me move on.

One day, whoever you are, one day…

Instead I plowed ahead with my pre-rehearsed method. I reached over to the drink menu on the bar table, took a pen out of my pocket and slid closer over to her to establish light physical contact while I drew a crude map of France on the blank side of the cardboard. Up on the Normandy coast I scribbled a rough square representing the Calvados Prefecture (State/Province), put a dot in it and labelled it Caen. Then, after a faked moment of hesitation, I went a bit across the map and put another dot labelled Paris.

Three hours later I was strolling out of her dorm whistling Don't You Forget About Me.

We were both from the same country. At that point in my life I hadn't spent two seconds in France. Yet the fact that I had convinced her I was Jean-Pierre Monet of Caen, France instead of Billy Chubbs of Turnip Town, Canaduh had gotten me a high quality notch that normally I would have had to pull my hardest A game to achieve.

Chicks dig foreign guys. With no differences, put Billy A beside Billy B and she'll always choose the one who comes from further away. Why? There could be hundreds of reasons; the excitement of vicariously vacationing through his dink, sheer boredom with the regular men she rides in her town, the exotic factor. Whatever it is – chicks dig foreign guys.

And you don't even have to be foreign to capitalize on it. In today's global village it's never been easier to create a foreign persona. You want to be from Rome? Five minutes on Google and you can know the names of the streets, what the view from your fake apartment looks like, what are the best restaurants in the city and even who the locals hate. You can go on Youtube and listen to how they talk, picking up their inflections, where they pause in conversation, their body language. It's never been easier to play Foreign Game… although it still requires some dedication. Here's how to get started.

Choose A Persona

Where do you want to be from? I grew up learning redneck French in Canadian schools, so my choice was already apparent. Anglo women adore France since they thrive on pop culture (and Anglo female Pop Culture has a girl boner for French anything), so France can be a good choice – but really, any European country can do. Except don't choose one with a goofy or obscure name; you want to be foreign, not alien. Every time she has to ask "Where?" the V dries up a whole percentage. She'll put out without much fuss for Michael from Stuttgart, Germany, but Mujo from Sarajevo, Bosnia probably isn't going to be seeing too many wet Western panties beside his bed.

Trés exotique!

Learn The Language

This one is obviously… obvious. If you're playing your Foreign Game in a Podunk town you might be able to get away with monkeying such gibberish as "Avec pour la vu c'est ce vu play eh bourdoir", telling the awe-struck 5 crushing your lap that it means "You are as lovely, interesting and thin as a starry sky". For the rest of the women in the world which haven't been bred from a long line of cousins, it requires a (tiny) bit more effort in that you actually need to learn some phrases. And let's face it – learning another language is awesome both for the mind and the soul. You don't need to be fluent in the beginning, but once you're out hunting your language should be distinctive enough to support your foreign persona.

Study The Geography

You don't have to remember every street corner and restaurant, but open up a map and study the main routes, learn the major landmarks, the local tourist traps. As I mentioned above, women love vicariously vacationing through foreign guys. I've seen nipples pop when I talk about growing up playing street football (soccer to you uncouth barbarians) on the Rue de Bras and going to the Orne River and Normandy Beach to swim. I'm a little fortunate in that relatives of mine fought through Caen back in WW2, so I have their stories to repeat as well – I just, you know, leaving out the parts about the Nazi's machine gunning me while I'm trying to surrender. Study your chosen city or town and become confident in the geography; you should be able to draw a very rough map of the region at a moment's notice, and have a memorized story about each major spot.

Learn Some Customs

You don't need to be fully aware of every custom of where you're from but you should know one or two major ones – and always, always say that kissing as a greeting or goodbye is a custom. And by goodbye, I mean if you're at a table with women, and a pretty one gets up even to use the washroom or get another drink, rush over and plant one on her. If she takes offense, well hey! It's a custom where you're from! Then the onus is on her to not be an Ugly American. It pretty much goes without saying to ignore that custom if she's not bangable.

That's about the basics of Foreign Game: persona, language, geography, customs. You should now be equipped to raise your quality level by a whole point. Just be aware that there are some things to take into account when employing your Foreign Game.

Foreign Game Is Not Applicable Everywhere

For optimal Foreign Game, you need to attend a low or mid level sized club or pub, somewhere that's small enough that you will be semi unique, and not rowdy and loud enough that you can't even let the girl's know you're from somewhere else. At bigger, more elite venues, there will be more foreigners by default and it will be harder to have a conversation or hold a girl's attention long enough to build up your persona. Keep Foreign Game confined to places where you can grab and hold the girl's attention. A huge chunk of Foreign Game is being a good story-teller.

Proof I'm French? Of course! Here's me visiting the Eiffel Tower on France Day!

Foreign Game Cannot Be Used Often

"But hey Billy! I spent three goddamn months learning how to say Hey Wood Ya Blow Me in Afrikaans and studying every bush in Limpopo, South Africa. All that time spent and I can't even use Foreign Game that often?" No, you can't. Foreign Game's power is in its rarity, its exotic nature. If you go out to the same round of clubs every weekend, pretending to be Sven from Sveeden, you'll simply become another familiar – except now you're one with a goofy accent. Save foreign game for visits to other cities or to your less frequented clubs.

Foreign Game Is Hard For Repeats

Some of us like to bang the same girl a few times. Maybe she's smoking hot or has a nice pootenanner down there. Maybe she's not too annoying and we can stomach her for slightly longer amounts of time then normal notches. It's hard to keep up the charade with the same girl while acting in your foreign persona. If you think you can approach a girl with your normal game, then for god sakes stick with normal game. Foreign Game can be tiring enough 3-6 hours every two weeks; constantly keeping up with a girl while flipping between normal you and foreign you can get outright exhausting and is not worth the headache. Keep Foreign Game limited to one night stands in strange lands.

Foreign Game Is Solitary

You have to be a good, consistent actor when employing Foreign Game. It's unlikely you will have good wingmen who can keep up without spoiling it. Solitary game can have its own difficulties but they're all exacerbated when you're pretending to be a completely different person. Prepare for a few notchless nights of looking like a complete jackass/creep – pretty much par for the course for most beginners attempting Alphadom.

You May Be Called Out

Anecdote time.

I went to visit a friend in another University town and wound up wheeling a fit red-head at the school's pub (fit red-heads being my own personal 10's). It was going along perfectly. I was in the middle of making her feel like a hero, explaining how we love Canadians where I'm from because they saved us from the Nazis, when suddenly she looked over my shoulder and waved someone forward. I turned around and saw a very plump 4 waddling over. My shield went up, thinking that this red-head was going to tell me she had a boyfriend but here was her 'cute' friend I could talk with.

"Hey Tara! This is John (*it's Jean-Pierre I wanted to shout at her for some reason), and guess what?! He's from France too!")

From France too… From France too… From France too… echoed in my head, and I felt my face contort like I suddenly had to drop a football sized one in the toilet.

"Oh!" Tara the European land whale said, and then fired off a string of quick, fluent French at me.

From good night to bad in 10 waddles.

I caught the word Marseilles and nothing else. Panic crept up in me, like I was a new inmate being surrounded in the showers by a bunch of smiling cons already at half chub. I thought quickly; Marseilles, Marseilles…that's a city on the Mediterranean coast! It's close to Italy, which meant she was probably telling me where she was from and asking where I was from.

"Marseilles?" I croaked back.

She nodded excitedly.

"Go – back – to…Alps," I muttered lamely in fluent English, and I slinked away like a beta with my face thoroughly red. That night I wound up alone merely thinking about the red-head instead of finishing with her.

You may get called out. It will be embarrassing. Just remember, you're alpha. You don't need to explain yourself to anyone. Maintain your frame, salvage what is salvageable and if nothing is simply shift to a different group. After all – it's all just a game. If you aren't having fun, you aren't playing it right.

So there y'all have it! Foreign Game; a powerful tool capable of upping your quality… if used appropriately – and sparingly. Go forth and rack up some notches.

A Portrait Of The 1920's Naughty Flapper Girl

September 15, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The Roaring Twenties resulted in a myriad of changes in American society, but one prominent change was with respects to women – most specifically, the social phenomenon of the flapper.

Consider a few historical points. First, remember the flapper movement began after the Civil War. Unhappy with their clothing options, job prospects and the general comportment society required them to engage in, women began to agitate for change. The changes were superficial at first, as the requirement to wear floor-length dresses was a universal complaint shared by both liberal and conservative women. They wanted to be able to expose more skin and have more options for their hair. They also wanted to venture more outside the home for jobs. Once again, representing the privilege of American feminism.

The flapper bubble heated up during WWI, when women flocked to the factories to help out in the war effort. This source of serious independent income helped spark the movement's explosion after the war. Also, the Spanish Flu epidemic broke out on the heels of the WWI, as the close quarters and diverse mix of cultures involved helped spread the disease. This put off the economic recovery for a few years, until 1920. In addition, the Temperance Movement had gotten Prohibition passed, thus setting up alcohol as illegal and taboo, thus increasing its appeal to young women. The creation of Fed lead to the creation of cheap credit, which helped fuel the economic and social bubble of the Roaring Twenties. Also, this was the same year the women gained the right to vote in the US. The economic independence gained by women during the war, coupled with the power to vote and toss in the fact that over 53,000 young men died in the war seriously increased the competition for men.

This era gave birth the flapper girl. This woman was a primitive modern woman. She still retained many feminine virtues, but still tried to defy sex stereotypes. What is most striking is her modified approach to fashion. The most identifiable feature of the flapper is the bobbed haircut.

As for women's fashion, there was the desire to show off arms and shoulders, as well as knee-high skirts. The dresses of the era reflected that. Also, they desired less restrictive clothing – remember the corset? – so the dresses were looser and less form-fitting. They flirted with audacious jewelry and all manner of boyish haircuts. They also broke sex barriers by wearing all sorts of hats. They typically expressed their boyishness through their haircut. By and large, they considered wearing excessive amounts of makeup and bright, red lipstick to be a sign of empowerment.

The flapper approach to social comportment is also striking. Remember, alcohol was illegal, so speakeasies and all manner of back-alley bar reigned supreme – most Americans largely ignored Prohibition. However, the flapper went all-in on this. Previously, smoking, drinking and generally bar-going was a male endeavor. Men would work all day, go the bar and go home drunk. However, women wanted access to these places and so they went. Women were sometimes seen half naked, cigarette in one hand, drink in the other in a speakeasy. Women also began to participate in mass consumption as an individual, not a partner.

Consider evolving approaches to sexuality. Dating and casual sex mores were loosened for the flapper. Some solid research on effective birth control methods arose late in the 1800's, but it was against the law to disseminate it. However, it trickled down to the general population and some birth control clinics opened – most famously the one by Margaret Sanger, who saw birth control as a way to reduce nonwhite populations. However, the flapper used these methods to allow her to exploit her hypergamy. She flirted shamelessly with men in bars and in public. She reveled in the positive attention she gained from men noticing her slender arms and exposed ankles. We would not get it today in 2013, but at the time, it probably blew men's minds to see such skin exposed in open society.

Flappers saw manipulating men sexually through their looks to be the epitome of empowerment. They prided themselves on their use of makeup, fashion and open flirting with men. They also experimented with lesbianism; the book "The Well Of Loneliness," was published in 1928. Such a book could not have hit publishers 20 years before. There were some high-profile lesbians in society, at this point. Places like Harlem were more accepting of homosexuality, but as usual, it was female homosexuality, not male.

Women saw freely hooking up as empowerment. However, this was not their only change in their relationships with men at large. They began to question the whole makeup of society. Flappers considered men to be privileged at the expense of women and sought to invert these roles. Magazines targeted at flappers continued to develop primitive feminist theory. As expected, there were beta males who identified with flappers – they were called flippers.

Women did not just seek access to venues to fuck men, they sought access to other places generally off limits to women. They sought to participate in sports, from hockey to baseball. Some wrote manifestos about how men and women are equals on the field; but women had those delusions ground up by reality when men allowed them to the take the field. They also increasingly sought access to college. Colleges became known for “necking parties” or “petting parties,” where emphasis was on kissing and touching, but no sex. Clearly, the lack of true, reliable birth control played a part in this, but it seems to be another way for women to feel out for sexually attractive men.

However, the most striking point of the flapper was their resistance to relevance. They emphasized fashion, flirting and fun. They despised the work ethic of their mothers and desired a world of nothing by good looks, sex and listening to music and watching movies. As such, they helped popularize the Charleston and jazz. Their lives were supremely superficial – which is exactly what they wanted. They did not want the real responsibilities of being a wife or mother. Part of this mindset might have been the hardship of the war, but they did not suffer in any way close to the women of Europe. They were just entitled, narcissistic women just waiting to burst out and had their chance in the Roaring Twenties.

Corporations took advantage of this. They helped popularize the look of the empowered woman smoking a cigarette. Women took to this as empowered, but really just lined the tobacco company's pockets with silver. Women spent all of their wages on all sorts of new trappings; as such, they helped develop modern consumer culture. Government and corporations knew they had a new cash cow – women. It isn't any surprise a federal income tax got laid in the 1910's along with the creation of the Fed. It was all in the cards, as cheap money leads to cheap morals.

However, for all their supposed independence, gumption and empowerment, the stock market crash in 1929 ended the movement. The poverty most Americans were thrust into resulted in flappers really taking on a bad light – they were seen as petty and a burden. Only wealthy and productive societies can afford such privilege to a class of women.

The poverty that became the United States forced the flapper to face realities. One, is that female economic independence is rarely correlated with actual productivity, as women usually piggy-back on male productivity. War-time may force them into productive capacities, but when given the chance; they may rue the loss of income, but women prefer nonproductive jobs where they can self-aggrandize. Second, is that social stability, especially in times of hardship, is predicated not just on the nuclear family, but all members of the family supporting each other. Third, is the idea that superficiality is worthless for society. Not being a mother and wife, or at least being a productive worker, hurts society.

Of course, women went back into the house, being a wife and a mother. They did often work outside the home if they could, but as we already know, women are only interested in an independent income for themselves. However, these women are members of the Silent Generation. Their behaviors – although not universal, to be sure – laid the groundwork for the Sexual Revolution and second-wave feminism.

Game Trumps Everything

September 15, 2013 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

The girls are out on a Wednesday because it's Quinn's birthday. We're out on a Wednesday because we're dirtbags with sheets of modafinil waiting for us in the office tomorrow morning. Our two groups are the highest energy in the bar, and we inevitably merge.

I'm vibing with Lindsay. We're standing slightly off to the side, I'm positioned so that she has to turn her back to her friends. Three minutes into the interaction and she is laughing, qualifying, holding eye contact. Life is good.

Mark approaches us. Mark is one of the friends I came with. He's 5'10 and thirty pounds overweight, with a Burt Reynolds mustache over a five-day neckbeard. I am much taller, much fitter, and much better groomed than Mark. I am wearing designer jeans and a nice polo. Oh, and my shoes. Great shoes. Mark is wearing a baggy grey t-shirt and dad-jeans. His hair isn't cool and spiky like mine.

Mark is not trying to be a dick or take the girl. But he does take the girl. In just a few minutes of conversation, she is making eye contact with him, angling her body to face his, laughing at his jokes, and looking to his eyes for approval whenever she speaks.

This scenario has played out in my life dozens of times, if not hundreds. Guys who are 'objectively' worse, take girls off me and successfully resist my attempts to take girls off them. The opposite happens often as well. I have taken girls off better looking guys, better dressed guys, with more money.

At the end of the day: Game Uber Alles

Dressing sharp and getting in shape will open doors for you. As a fairly good-looking guy, I get many more indirect openers from girls than average guys, and even the occasional direct open. I have a few extremely good-looking friends who will basically get sex dumped in their lap on a regular basis. There are also major practical advantages to having the right social circle, career, physique, and facial symmetry.

But the seduction industry canard of "looks/money/etc don't matter" is a much closer approximation of the truth than the crippling insecurity of the average man. For example, the man who won't approach because he's at 12% body fat, but dude, just wait until he hits 10% body fat! Or the man who's focusing on his career and will start hitting on girls just as soon as he gets that next promotion and the confidence he imagines will come with it.

All men are encumbered by what we in the seduction community call self-limiting beliefs. We take a shortcoming, real or perceived, and use it as an excuse to avoid approaching, escalating, and closing. We bring a subconscious inferiority complex into our interactions. But no material disadvantage is as harmful as a negative frame, and no material advantage – not even the dashing good looks of your humble author – will elevate you above a lesser man with a superior frame and seduction skill set.

By all means, hit the gym and make some money. But if success with women is your objective, the prime determinant of your success will be your willingness to approach, and your willingness to learn from those experiences.

How to Fight Abortion

I've tackled the issue of abortion once before here at ROK. In that article I noted that while I generally dislike abortion and have maintained pro-life leanings for most of my existence, I had come to warm to the pro-choice perspective. That warming was due primarily to the acknowledgement of a few harsh realities related to the topic, most notably the fact that a lot of people simply aren't fit for parenthood and should not produce children.

That being said, I still don't like abortion and do sympathize with those who wish to see less of it. To that end, I've given quite a bit of thought to the topic and made a few conclusions regarding the solutions necessary to fight abortion.

First, let us discuss what will NOT work:

1. Abstinence

This is a common rebuttal from the pro-life crowd: "If you don't want a baby, then don't have sex!"

Said rebuttal is often coupled with some statement regarding the notion of sexual intercourse being tied directly to reproduction.

Both of these notions are extremely problematic due to their sheer disconnection with reality. That reality is as follows: people want to fuck. People are going to fuck. A handful of people maintain a certain set of convictions that keep them from fucking and have enough discipline to hold to that, but the vast majority of humanity does not. Man will fail the test of abstinence nine times out of ten.

Similarly, social norms in the west have moved well beyond the stage at which abstinence can be maintained. The past 50-60 years have seen casual sex become an accepted part of ordinary life. The days of societal condemnation directed at sex out of wedlock are gone, and it’s not coming back.

In addition to this, the days of sexual intercourse remaining highly correlated with the act of reproduction are done as well. You can thank the pill for this along with dozens of other contraceptive advancements available to modern women. That genie is out of the bottle and it isn’t going back. Sex for pleasure and pleasure alone is here to stay.

Long story short: Abstinence is NOT an answer, and cannot be used as a weapon against widespread abortion.

2. Adoption

Another common argument from the pro-life crowd: “Why not just give the baby up for adoption?”

The answer? People aren't really going to want them, especially if they are black or brown. This is aside from the fact that the system that children given up by their parents in this society is one in which they stand a high chance of suffering physical abuse, sexual abuse and developing serious psychological issues.

3. Banning Abortion

Conservative initiatives to this end have been failing left, right and center. Abortion is firmly established socially and legally and is here to stay. Conservatives can possibly make them more difficult to obtain, but they're not going anywhere anytime soon.

So, what are the solutions that WILL work? They are ideas that go to the heart of the problem, which is societal.

1. Spreading Contraception

This is a no-brainer, and every conservative with a pro-life bent ought to be behind it. Fewer unwanted pregnancies = fewer abortions.

2. Changing Societal Attitudes Toward Women in the Work Place

This is a challenging one because, depending on how you approach it, you can and will piss off a lot of people on one or both ends of the political spectrum.

Abortion at its fundamental core is caused by the prevalence of unwanted pregnancies, so we must ask ourselves this: why are these pregnancies not wanted? Often you will find an answer that relates to female academic and professional goals. Women increasingly desire larger amounts of education and longer, more fulfilling careers, and babies get in the way if they come at the wrong time.

There are two ways to deal with this:

A: Provide greater support (flexible work schedules, daycare subsidies, etc) for working mothers and young mothers in school.

B: Put a greater emphasis on ideas of “traditional” stay-at-home motherhood, and allowing or encouraging a larger number of women to head in that direction at the expense of more progressive ideas regarding female academic and professional achievement.

Option A will piss off fiscal conservatives who don’t want to waste money supporting grown women, especially single mothers. Option B will piss off progressives who will see an attempt to roll back decades of feminist progress that has seen women increasing their academic and professional achievements at a rapid rate.

One, or both, of these options has to come to pass. If younger women continue to feel forced into a choice between career/education and motherhood, then many will continue to see abortion as their only viable option in a world where it is simply too difficult for a woman to raise a family and get a degree/build a career at the same time.

Similarly, if women continue to feel ashamed and/or “unfeminist” for thinking about the idea of stay-at-home motherhood and perhaps foregoing a more serious career track at an early age in order to live that lifestyle, abortion will remain appealing. If parents and society at large continue to shame young women who would otherwise consider young motherhood and instead pressure them to spend their youth strictly on the career track, then many young women will continue to do whatever it takes (up to and including abortion) to avoid a pregnancy.

This leads me to my final point, and the most important.

3. End Societal Shaming of Young and Single Mothers, Encourage Support

This is probably the most necessary of all steps and was touched on above, but will be expanded upon here.

Again, abortion is tied at its core to the prevalence of unwanted pregnancies. Why are these pregnancies unwanted? Often because women understand the social costs of bringing a child into the world before they are “supposed to.” It is not uncommon for a prospective young mother to fear the wrath of angry parents in the case of an unplanned pregnancy, or for parents to very severely shame and/or isolate their daughters for allowing such a thing. Said prospective young mother often cannot count on the support of her parents, her community, the father or the father’s family. She can expect, however, to be looked down upon by some or all of those actors, with serious social isolation a real possibility. For many, the sheer mass of shame directed at them in this scenario is unbearable.

When you examine parts of the world where fertility rates are high and young women are not afraid to become mothers, you'll notice one thing is prevalent above all: support. Young mothers in many developing countries can, upon getting pregnant, expect support from family, community and (to some extent) even the father and his family. These are places where there is limited government support and very limited finances, yet young women continue to get pregnant at high rates, continue to desire large families (women in many parts of Africa still desire 5+ children and often plan to mother them early, regardless of contraceptive availability) and abortion is still often frowned upon. Why?

Support. The young mother in the developing world knows she isn't alone even though she is broke and often lives under the dominion of what amounts to a corrupt banana republic. She's got an entire community to help her and a family to support her.

The young western mother, on the other hand, has plenty of money and a much more efficient government, but no support. This is a big reason why you'll find more support for abortion in western nations than others—it isn't all about religion and/or "the patriarchy" robbing women of choice. There are practical matters to consider here as well.

If conservatives plan to continue to lead the charge against abortion, then they need to start by becoming the first to encourage the support of young mothers. If you want to encourage young women to have all of these babies instead of aborting them, then you've got to lead efforts to make it more feasible for those babies to be raised by said women. That starts with having a more positive, welcoming attitude to unplanned pregnancies at the family and community level, and encouraging broader collective efforts to help raise those children. None of this would completely end abortion, but it would go a long way to making the procedure less common and is, in my estimation, the best option that those in the pro-life camp have available to them.

I fully intend to put my money where my mouth is. I don't like abortion and, should I have a daughter, I'd quite prefer she not have one. How can I best ensure this does not happen? By being as open as possible with her about my willingness to support any unplanned grandchildren and making it very clear that she will not be judged a deviant or a harlot for making a mistake.

I know she will be having sex early and probably often —virgins beyond the age of 18 are not terribly common these days, and virgins beyond age 21 are exceedingly rare. I, like most parents, would probably prefer for her to be in her mid-late 20's (done with school, established a career, etc) before starting a family, but she will be having sex well before that point. To that end, I will not attempt to encourage abstinence. While I will encourage the use of contraception, she will know that, should there be a mistake and should she find herself with child, she will be able to come home and be open and honest with me and her mother about everything. She will find emotional, logistical and financial support for herself and for her child in my home. Nobody is going to railroad her into an abortion clinic.

Of course, you may judge the above as inherently immoral, an endorsement of pre-marital sex, illegitimate birth and wanton debauchery. For those who may think this, ask yourself a question: Between consensual pre-marital sex and the abortion of unborn children, which is the greater evil? Does the notion of your daughter being sexually active between the ages of 16-25 strike you harder than the possibility of your unborn grandchild meeting an early end because your daughter was too scared to reveal an unplanned pregnancy to parents who she could not be honest with because they had shown themselves totally unwilling to support her and entirely willing to shame and isolate her along with the wider community?

I already know my answer, but I do not presume to speak for everyone else. The decision is yours.

How To Achieve Immortality Through Keen Observation

September 16, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Nature has granted us extensive powers to observe, and to draw inferences from those observations. For most of us, observations are blithely made and discarded, in the hundreds upon hundreds every day. Even if we make a significant observation, only rarely do we have the presence of mind to ask follow-up questions; and rarer still do we have the conviction to draw the ultimate conclusions from what we perceive. What separates the average man from the truly exceptional man is this: first, the latter will instantly recognize an important observation when he encounters it, and second, he will have the courage to probe into the implications of this observation, regardless of where his conclusions will lead him.

But is there anything more rare than this type of man?

Far, far too often, we censor ourselves, and we hold ourselves back. We timidly suppress our boldest observations out of fear of social opprobrium or the mockery of the herd. But there is nothing more awe-inspiring than the example of a man who is able to see something of importance which no others have recognized, who has the intelligence to ponder the observation, and who then possesses the moral courage to make devastating deductions in the face of popular resistance.

It is the power of the will, displayed in all its muscular radiance.

So the great French philosopher Rene Descartes, lying sick in his bed and watching the movement of flies on his ceiling, began to make inquiries which would lead to the development of analytic geometry; so Albert Einstein, bicycling through the Viennese countryside, began to think about what it would be like to ride on a wave of light; so the great astronomer Christian Huygens measured the relative distances between stars by peering at them through small hones drilled in brass plates; and so the Greek scientist Eratosthenes was able to make perhaps the most sublime and beautiful observation in all of geographic history.

We will discuss him and his greatest achievement now.

Eratosthenes (c. 275-195 B.C.) was a driven and brilliant scholar whose erudition on many fields earned him the position of rector of the Alexandrian Library during the reign of Ptolemy III. His rivals and jealous colleagues liked to tease him with the nicknames pentathlos and beta, for his distinction in many fields, while always supposedly being second (beta) best. But as we will see, he was anything but "beta". By the age of forty, his list of achievements was already astounding. He was a paragon of Hellenistic learning.

He wrote a history (Chronographia) of the major events of Mediterranean history, a volume of verse, and even a history of comedy. As a mathematician and scientist, he discovered a mechanical method for finding mean proportions in continued proportion between two straight lines. He measured the "obliquity of the ecliptic" (an astronomical term related to the orbit of the Earth) to an error of only one half of one percent.

But he was anything but a narrow-minded bookworm. Alexandria in his day was perhaps the world's most cosmopolitan city. Greek in culture, but international in population, it possessed large numbers of foreigners from all over the Near East and the Mediterranean world. Traveling frequently and conversing with merchants, traders, and military men, he was able to make his Geographica the most authoritative treatise on geography for several generations. Unlike many men of his era, he was free from ethnocentric chauvinism, and believed men should be judged only on their actions, not their country of origin. Many Persians and Hindus, he counseled his pupils, were more honest and refined than Greeks, kept their word more frequently than Greeks, and had a greater aptitude for good government and social order.

But his greatest achievement, and one that will forever be a classic example of the power of deduction from the most rudimentary tools, was his measurement of the Earth's circumference. Like many achievements of genius, it is unsurpassed in its simplicity and profundity. Let us examine just how Eratosthenes achieved this feat, more than a thousand years before the European discovery of the New World.

In Alexandria, he chanced to read in a book (or overheard a colleague mention) that at noon on the annual summer solstice (June 21) the sun at the city of Syene shone directly over a well. Residents of Syene were able to see the bottom of the well illuminated from the rays of sunlight shining directly overhead. The illustration below shows the details.

On June 21st of each year, the sun was directly overhead at Syene, but cast a shadow in Alexandria.

Now, this bit of information would have passed unnoticed through the ears or eyes of the average man. The solar illumination of the well in Syene had been going on for generations, and no one had ever given it the slightest thought. But Eratosthenes was not an ordinary man, and such men have the ability to take seemingly insignificant pieces of information and then use them to draw shattering conclusions. What he did next shows the analytic powers of the human mind at their very best.

Map showing the distance between Alexandria and Syene in Egypt.

He asked himself a key question: why are no wells in Alexandria illuminated by overhead suns on the date of the summer solstice? What explanation could there be for this phenomena? Eratosthenes knew of the sphericity of the earth; it had been taken for granted by his predecessors Aristarchus and Hipparchus, and perhaps the idea even went back to the Babylonian astronomers. But none of his predecessors had the patience or conviction to follow their observations in a systematic way. Eratosthenes did, and achieved immortality.

He noted that on June 21 in Alexandria, an obelisk cast a shadow on the ground of 7.5 degrees from its apex. He measured the distance between Alexandria and Syene, finding it to be about 500 miles. In the diagram below, the letter “s” represents the distance between Alexandria and Syene.

Diagram showing Eratosthenes’s experiment. The sun is so far away that its rays arrive parallel.

Putting this data together, he then sketched it out as a problem in geometry. The diagram below shows the well at Syene, the obelisk (or tower) at Alexandria, and the distance (represented by “s”) between the cities.

Since opposite interior angles are equal, the two angles represented by the letter theta are equal.

Now Eratosthenes knew from basic geometry that opposite interior angles are equal. Thus, if the angle of the tower's shadow at Alexandria was 7.5 degrees, then the angle enclosing the arc of the circle from Alexandria to Syene must also be 7.5 degrees. The two angles represented by the Greek letter "theta", in the diagram immediately above, are equal.

It followed from this that an arc of 7.5 degrees on the Earth's circumference must equal 500 miles. And if 7.5 degrees equaled 500 miles, then, using simple logic, 360 degrees (a full circle) must correspond to about 24,000 miles.

This turns out to be very, very close to the correct answer. It was an amazing performance to draw such an immense conclusion from such a mundane observation. Observation: a well in another city is illuminated by the sun a certain day of the year. Conclusion: the circumference of the Earth is 24,000 miles. I love this story because it shows just how powerful a man's will and conviction can be if it permits itself the freedom to soar.

It all seems so basic, so simple, in hindsight!

Except it isn't. Great moments of inspiration always seem "easy" to achieve in hindsight. Especially when someone else has done the work. And such moments can come in very unexpected ways, as when Archimedes, immersing himself in water, discovered the principle underlying specific gravity. We all have such "eureka" moments, in one way or another. But who among us has the courage to act on them?

All of us have the power to observe. What we do with those observations is another matter. We can choose to ignore them, or to catalogue them away nicely, and refuse to act on the implications of our observations. If we have faith in ourselves, and if we have the courage of our convictions, we will approach the world with the fearless spirit of Eratosthenes. We live in a world where information is all around us: we can barely escape it. The problem of our era, and the challenge for us, is not so much finding information, but rather it is having the courage and conviction to act on what we know.

Act now. You already have made the observations. You already know the data, and you know the terrain. You are unlikely to know any more later than what you know now. Have faith in your own perception, and learn to trust your instinct. Take things one step further. One leap further, as Eratosthenes leaped. And an ocean of discovery, and perhaps even immortality, will await.

The Strength Of Your Game Is Situation Independent

The best predictor of your future success with women in any other situation is your success in your current situation. This may sound tautological, but is an underrated truth that some men fail to grasp.

Many men think, and even say, “If I get into XYZ situation I’d be crushing ass.” You see this especially frequently with married/relationship friends on their biannual wife-sanctioned night out with the guys. The married man’s lament is “If I were still single…”, but are they getting looks from attractive women? Can they flirt with waitresses and bystanders and create attraction? Usually not. Many men would rather retreat into a safe fantasy world than admit they’re anything but master players who are just in a relationship because it’s temporarily convenient for them. This happens for two reasons:

1. Vicarious wish fulfillment

Louis CK talks about this in his first class bit (12:30 – 16:15):

This is why you don’t tell many other people your goals — just the act of vocalizing them to another person releases dopamine in your brain, giving you the feeling of goal fulfillment without it happening. When you delude yourself into thinking you’re better than you are, it actively prevents the mechanisms necessary for improvement.

2. Plausible deniability

Most people are lazy. Every man wants to get girls, but most have no desire to put in the work necessary to get better at game, and many who do try give up after initial troubles. Saying “If only XYZ were true” allows them to hide their deficiencies with a non-falsifiable hypothesis. If they ever get into that particular situation, watch their male hamsters spin as they set another aspirational set of ridiculous circumstances necessary for them to pull.

Here are some situations where this plays out:

Night Game Venues

The guys bitching about the “ratio” are often the ones who never approach. Turn yourself into someone who stands above the 70% schlubs in the room rather than complaining about the “vibe”

International travel

If you can’t approach and lay girls in your home country, it’s not going to happen abroad (unless you pay).

Relationships

Mentioned already, but the guys in relationships with middling girls are always the ones talking about how many hot chicks they could pull if single.

US Cities

How many times have you heard a friend say something like, “If only I lived in Miami, I’d be rolling in it.” Different personalities and looks play better in certain parts of the country, but the idea that game is vastly different from city to city within the United States is largely bullshit. If you live in a city big enough to have even one major league sports team and you’re not getting a piece of the action, it’s not magically going to click somewhere else.

Even if your future plans include gaining fame or money, the two most polarizing external changes that will make you more attractive to women, it’s likely you will not use them to their fullest capacity if your game was weak before becoming externally more valuable. Ask any rock star, athlete, or entrepreneur who has been taken to the cleaners in a divorce because he did not select a suitable partner.

Figure out how to shine in your current situation, and stop making excuses about your circumstances.

What Electric Zoo Teaches Us About Using Drugs As A Crutch For Game

September 17, 2013 | by americanbk | Link | Original Link

In case you haven't paid attention to popular music for the past few years, electronic dance music (EDM) is taking the United States by storm. As a fan of the genre, I really can't complain. Although many of the pounding beats are admittedly repetitive and uncreative, the high energy and positive emotions created by the sound tend to make it great party music. Whether your like it or not, EDM is not going anywhere anytime soon — even if all of the DJs across the world never make a single new track.

The reason is simple: EDM's party culture, filled with Molly (MDMA) and other inhibition-reducing drugs, assists young people to have to the time of their lives every single time they go to a rave. Even the most awkward or shy people, male or female, suddenly gain the ability to confidently approach and effortlessly escalate when Molly is in their systems. And you'd best believe some people are using this information to make A LOT of money.

The Music Festival

Organized mega—raves like NYC's Electric Zoo continue to pop up all over the world. These multi-day outdoor music festivals feature the same collection of DJ Mag's top 100 DJs, have very similar stage set-ups, and generally charge $5 for a bottle of water. Interestingly, ticket prices for these type of events can be greater than $500 and often sell out in just a few hours. In return for these steep prices, concert organizers provide the horny, half-naked partygoers a relatively safe and hassle-free environment to do Molly and interact with one another.

The much anticipated Electric Zoo festival celebrated it's 5 year anniversary this weekend on Randall's Island in New York City. Unfortunately, the final day of the three day event was cancelled by Mayor Michael Bloomberg after two concertgoers died and an at least four others were hospitalized in critical condition — all from reportedly overdosing on MDMA. It is easy to predict the intense outrage that will be aired in the media by mothers and politicians over the next few weeks. Blame will be thrown at event organizers, poor parenting, the drugs, Miley Cyrus, and everything else under the sun. However, no one is going to point any fingers at the true cause of these tragic events — this generation's lack of social skills.

A Quick Fix for No Confidence?

A frightening percentage of today's young men does not have the ability to approach a girl and face a potential rejection. Instead, they rely on drugs, alcohol, and the internet to reduce virtually all risk. Every guy has a friend who needs to get completely obliterated every time they go to the bar, just so they can gain the confidence to approach a fat, gargoyle-looking woman for sex. I believe the tragic events that happened this weekend at Electric Zoo are simply a more extreme example of this behavior. (Try to picture a guy who was always the life of the party in college but never got laid — then find an image of the young man who died this weekend. Is it just me?)

For normal, responsible men who are looking to meet someone, taking heavy doses of MDMA every night out to help his “game” is socially unacceptable in addition to being extremely unhealthy. Alcohol, on the other hand, is not frowned upon – this is why every college bar in the country has dozens of blacked out dorks slurring pick up lines to below average women and wasted girls who will soon have regrettable one night stands they will barely remember. However, as soon as Electric Zoo or the next festival arrives, this same crowd jumps at the opportunity to do Molly (a much better inhibition blocker) and interact with each other the way they truly want to. Just as with alcohol, some people over do it. But with hard drugs, hospitalization and death are clearly not impossibilities.

Don’t get me wrong — I enjoy both alcohol and MDMA (from a trusted, safe source) in moderation. When used reasonably and responsibly, both can truly enhance certain experiences. My message to you is this: do not use drugs and alcohol as a solution to your poor social skills or fear of rejection. Not only does it make you a loser, it can ruin your life.

Go out today and talk to a stranger. Say whatever comes to mind and get rejected. Then check your pulse. I promise you will still be alive. Hell, you may not even be rejected. Once you work to improve yourself and stop using drugs as a social crutch, you'll realize just how tragic and unnecessary the deaths of these young people are.

A Typical Tuesday

Stupid alarm clock. “What time is it?” Becky mumbled to herself as she laid on her bed, her cat Ariel right next to her. She moved the six pillows around until she found her Iphone 5 and hit the snooze. She couldn’t fall back asleep, however, so she got up and started getting ready for work. She put her hair in a bun, put on her jeans, tanktop, and Converse shoes and headed into work. Becky was a marketing manager at a mid-size company in LA. She stuffed a Cliff Bar in her purse and grabbed a bottle of water as she headed to her Jetta parked outside.

Once in the car, she took her birth control pill and started driving to work. On the way she checked her text messages. A few random numbers she didn’t recognize from the weekend had texted her last night but she had already fallen asleep. One guy proposed dinner. “How creepy!” she thought to herself. She immediately texted her best friend Alexa and told her how the guy from the bar wanted to take her to dinner. Alexa responded “Ewwww, next!” Becky laughed as she pulled into the parking lot of her office.

She went inside and grabbed a donut and coffee from the kitchen before settling in at her desk. Yesterday she had taken an intense “cardio-fit” class at her local gym. Before getting into her breakfast, she took a picture of the donut and coffee and put it on Facebook. “Work hard play hard! Nothing like a little treat for my hard workout yesterday :)” She threw her Iphone to her side and started making some calls for work.

A few minutes later, her boss came by to ask how she was, because she had taken a “personal day” yesterday. Becky quickly replied “Oh I’m fine, you know just women issues.” In reality Becky was just hungover from partying all weekend. Nonetheless, this made her boss back off quickly and he told her he was happy she was back and reminded her of some meeting the next day.

Becky grabbed her phone to text Alexa about her boss's rude comments but saw some notifications from Facebook which, of course, Becky had to see. Thirteen likes, one comment on the donut picture! Becky was happy, though really she didn't know why. She checked the comment, it was her friend Melissa who exclaimed "As if you can't afford to treat yourself! Bitch lol." Becky was a size 6, and enrolled in the gym to get some of that flab off. But seeing Melissa's comment (size 12) made her wonder if she really needed to go to the gym after all. Whatever, Becky thought, it's just one donut.

Right as she was about to get back to work, she remembered she was going to text Alexa. She grabbed her Iphone and texted Alexa about her boss reminding her of a meeting right after she told him about her personal day. Alexa quickly responded, "what an ass!" And because girls cannot put all their thoughts into one text, a string of replies quickly came telling Becky that "You should quit your job, fuck that guy." Next, Alexa told Becky she should just marry rich and "end it lol." Becky responded "I know right? I've got time though, I'll find my Ryan Gosling ;)" Becky was 30.

Work went along slowly, with Becky checking her phone every few minutes. She went to lunch with Charles who worked in her same department. Charles really liked Becky, in a sexual manner. They went to the cafe downstairs and Becky got a Cobb salad, dressing on the side to be healthy, a brownie and a diet coke. Charles offered to pay for lunch, but Becky said she could pay for herself. They sat down and started to eat. Becky told Charles all about the random guys texting her from the weekend and how creepy they were. Charles agreed: "Seriously, how rude of those guys to think they can just ask you out for dinner after just meeting you!" "You have no idea Charles, these guys are just weird," Becky disgustingly stated as she finished the entire dressing despite it being on the side. As they were leaving, Charles asked Becky what she's doing that night, if she would like to join him out for a movie. His original plan was dinner, but after Becky's comments he had to improvise. "That's so sweet, but I already have plans. Maybe another time." Becky had no plans…yet.

That reminded Becky, it's Tuesday night tonight…Taco Tuesdays? Wine night with the girls? What should we do!? She texted her core group of girls on what they wanted to do that night. All of them already had plans. "Whatever," Becky wrote Alexa, "I'll just respond to one of these guys who texted me last night." She scrolled through the texts and chose the guy who offered dinner, because she didn't have any food at home and was too lazy to go to the grocery store. She texted the dinner guy at 4:03 p.m., roughly 16 hours after he texted her the night before. He responded at 4:05 p.m., stating "Sounds great! I'll meet you at the restaurant." A date was set.

Becky went home after work, and when she walked in saw Ariel curled up on her pillow on the couch. "Soooooooooo cute!" Becky exclaimed with glee. "I need to put this on instagram" she thought. She sat next to Ariel, made a duck face and took a picture with her Iphone. Uploaded it and went to shower and change for dinner. She put on another pair of jeans, flip flops (but with studded rhinestones), and a slightly tighter tank top relative to her work one, but still loose given her size. When she showed up at the restaurant, roughly 15 minutes late, dinner guy was already there with a table waiting. She sat down across from him, said she was sorry for being late as they started chatting. “Hmm” she thought, this guy is not as lame as I thought. They ordered some appetizers and drinks.

Despite her initial interest, after about 30 minutes or so Becky got bored with the conversation and slyly took her phone out of her purse. “One second” she told dinner guy. “Just need to take care of something real quick.” “Go ahead,” dinner guy said. She checked her Instagram, seven likes for her cat picture. Kind of low, she thought. She checked her phone’s internet connection to make sure it was working and it was. “Whatever, people are probably out to dinner or something,” she rationalized. Just as she was about to put her phone away, she got a text from Rick. Rick was someone she met two months ago at a bar and ended up going home with that night. Rick fucked her pretty good, and simply texted her at nights for a booty call when he has nothing to do. “whats up” said the text, with no capitalization or punctuation. She quickly responded, “At dinner with a friend! Kind of bored, what are you doing? :)” She left her phone out on the table.

Dinner guy finally got some attention again, and started chatting about his work and what she does for work, if she is close with her family, and so on. Becky responded to all his questions, but kept one eye on her phone. “Come on!” she screamed in her head. “Why the hell doesn’t Rick text me back? He always fucking does this!” She kept smiling the entire time at dinner guy however, completely keeping him none the wiser that her mind was elsewhere. After another 45 minutes, she decided to herself “That’s it, I’m done with Rick. I had enough of his shit.” They ordered another round of drinks and now Becky was getting a little buzzed. 30 minutes later, the waiter brought the bill to the table. Right as he put the bill down, Becky’s phone vibrated. It was Rick. He texted Becky “nothing, come over if you want.” She excused herself to the bathroom and once there Becky angrily texted Rick “what took you so long to respond??!! Not sure if I can make it anymore.” Rick responded back, “yes or no, make a decision.” Becky without hesitation, responded “K I’ll be there in 30.”

She went back to the table and dinner guy had already paid the bill. As they were getting up, he suggested a drink at the bar next door. Becky convincingly hesitated for a second, and said, “You know I have to get up early, I have this fitness class I need to go to before work. I shouldn’t skip it.” “Sure, another time,” dinner guy responded. He walked Becky to her car, gave her a kiss on the cheek and watched her drive away.

Fifteen minutes later, she was at Rick’s apartment. He opened the door in a tshirt and shorts and sat back on the couch watching TV. Ten minutes later, they were having sex. They both fell asleep after, and Becky woke up around 2:00 a.m. to drive home. When she got home, she got on her MacBook Air and pulled up the gym’s website to cancel the fitness class. She grabbed Ariel and plopped her cat next to her, set her alarm and got ready to pass out. Laying in bed, she thought about her day and her life in general. “Melissa was right,” she thought, “I don’t need to get into better shape.” After all, Rick just fucked her, dinner guy was all over her, she had several guys texting her and her coworker Charles keeps asking her out. “I’m just fine :)”

Magellan’s Terrifying Circumnavigation Of The Globe

September 18, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This book tells the story of Magellan, the first man to attempt circumnavigation of the world in search of an alternate route to the Spice Islands. It’s a testament to one man’s incredible will above extremely long odds during a period in history where such a journey brought nearly guaranteed death to all those who attempted it.

Originally from Portugal, Magellan defected to Spain after the Portuguese refused to fund his expedition (they already had a secret route to the Spice Islands around Africa). The Spanish monarch, locked out of the spice trade, decided to fund his trip. He was treated poorly by his Spanish peers, facing sabotage and treachery every way he turned. It was a minor miracle his expedition was even allowed to begin.

Their first indigenous contact was in Brazil:

> As Magellan’s ships came to rest, a throng of women— all of them naked and eager for contact with the sojourners— swam out to greet them. Deprived of the company of women for months, the sailors believed they had found an earthly paradise. Any fear they might have had of Indian cannibals melted in the flame of carnal pleasure.
> Under the strain of temptation, one of Magellan’s most trusted allies, Duarte

> Barbosa, who had offered critical assistance when Cartagena mutinied, all but lost his head in Rio de Janeiro. Falling under the women's spell and envisioning a life of ease as a trader on these distant shores, he decided to desert the fleet. Magellan learned of the plan and intervened at the last minute, sending sailors to arrest Barbosa onshore and drag him back to the ships. The poor man spent the rest of the layover in Rio de Janeiro confined in fetters aboard his ship, gazing on the women and the self-indulgent life that Magellan— and duty— denied him.

This may be the first documented case of poosy paradise, and the predictable effects it had on men.

> João Lopes Carvalho, Magellan's pilot, returning to Brazil after a seven-year absence, happily reunited with his former mistress, who introduced him to their son.
> When the fleet finally weighed anchor and sailed away, Indian women followed them in canoes, tearfully pleading with the men from distant shores to stay with them forever.
> If they were received well, the sailors were ready for orgies, and the priests for conversions; if they were attacked, they were ready for battle.

These men would have been better off staying with their Brazilian mistresses, for few would make it home alive.

Magellan exploring el paso, after the San Antonio disappeared, with his three remaining ships: the Concepcion, the Victoria and the Trinidad

The conditions for Magellan's sailors were deplorable:

> When conditions turned hot and humid, the insects infested the clothing, the sails, the food supply, and even the rigging. The sailors scratched and complained, but they had no defense against the pests. Even worse, weevils invaded the hardtack, and it was further contaminated with the urine and feces of rodents. Crew members with growling stomachs forced themselves to > overcome their inhibitions and swallow this disgusting, contaminated provender.

> …the heavy weather stranded a landing party already ashore, this time with no "sea wolves" to provide shelter or warmth. Enduring bone-chilling cold, their skin and hair and beards soaked constantly with freezing rain, their fingers and toes numb, the men forced themselves to forage for shellfish in the freezing water. Their hands bleeding, they smashed the shells and survived on the raw flesh until, nearly a week later, they were able to return to the fleet.

As the voyage dragged on, and the Spice Islands were yet to be found, Magellan had to deal with a mutinous crew. He was successful:

> A crucial evolution of Magellan's style of leadership, and perhaps his character, occurred over a period of nine trying months, from February to October 1520. He emerged from the ordeal a very different man from the one who had begun the voyage. The Magellan of February teetered on the brink of being murdered by the men he commanded. The Magellan of October was on the way to earning a place in history. In the intervening months, he passed a series of tests that forced him to confront his own limits as a leader and to change his ways, or die.

When the impossibly navigable Straits were found, and the Pacific Ocean was within reach, Magellan did not rush the job. He took his time through them to prevent disaster at the critical moment.

> His sophisticated approach to navigating uncharted waters went far beyond technical ability in boat handling and direction finding; it revealed an ability to deploy novel tactics to overcome one of the great challenges of the Age of Discovery: namely, how to guide a fleet of ships through hundreds of miles of unmapped archipelagos in rough weather. Magellan's skill in negotiating the entire length of the strait is acknowledged as the single greatest feat in the history of maritime exploration. It was, perhaps, an even greater accomplishment than Columbus's discovery of the New World.

The Straits of Magellan

But such a burden was too great for one man, and he started to lose his faculties, going mad with power and coming to think of himself as a messenger of Christ who was destined to convert native populations. He was angered when one particular tribe refused to bow to his will. Feeling invincible in possession of European steel against puny wooden weapons, he began a foolhardy battle that resulted in his death.

> Magellan, normally possessed of superhuman determination and indifference to hardship, became depressed and unstable as the transpacific crossing wore on. In a rage, he flung his useless maps overboard, crying, “With the pardon of the cartographers, the [Spice Islands] are not to be found in their appointed place!”
> …he could not fail to notice that his weapons conferred absolute power over the islanders, should he ever feel the need to exert it.
> Magellan gave an even more astonishing demonstration as he brought out one of his men, who was dressed in armor from his knees to his neck; then three other Europeans, “armed with swords and daggers… struck him on all parts of the body.” As the blows fell and glanced off the armor, the clank of metal on metal echoing across the water, “the [indigenous] king was rendered speechless.” The king seemed to think that these visitors possessed superhuman powers. No man could have withstood the shower of blows, yet the armored soldier had done just that.

> In the course of the voyage, Magellan had managed to outwit death many times. He overcame natural hazards ranging from storms to scurvy, and human hazards in the form of mutinies. In the end, the only peril he could not survive was the greatest of all: himself.

As shown in previous reviews of long sea journeys, it is clear that strict discipline is paramount. The reason it's so common to hear of cruel captains is because a mistake can cause the entire ship to be lost. There is very little room for error.

Less than 10% of the original crew made it back to Spain, in only one ship instead of the original fleet of five. It took 58 years for the circumnavigation to be duplicated by Francis Drake after several disastrous failures.

> The [crew], for the most part, were ordinary men, many still in their twenties or even younger, the overlooked servants of more powerful officers and specialists. No matter what their status, they had surveyed more of the world than anyone else before them; by accident or design, their names belong among history's great explorers.

I couldn't help but feel jealous as I read this book. These men were first to sail around the world and first step on new lands. Today, the only thing men race to be first in is to get in line when a new iPhone is released. Overall this book is a page turner that I thoroughly enjoyed. May we all have the opportunity for our own great discovery.

Helen Mees Is A Feminist Role Model

I have a real treat for you today, gentlemen.

While writing a recent post, Feminism is Responsible for the Depression Epidemic, I was researching the data point that Dutch women are both (1) The least likely to prioritize career advancement over family, and (2) The happiest in the Western world. I came across an old Maclean's article from 2011, How Dutch Women Got To Be The Happiest In The World:

> "In 2001, nearly 60 per cent of working Dutch women were employed part-time, compared to just 20 per cent of Canadian women. Today, the number is even higher, hovering around 75 per cent. Some, like Van Haeren, view this as progress, evidence of personal freedom and a commitment to a balanced lifestyle.
> …Dutch women appear deaf to the siren call of the workplace. Asked whether they'd like to increase their hours, just four per cent said yes, compared to 25 per cent of French women. And while across the Channel, British media are heralding the resurgence of feminism—last weekend, some 500 women crowded into a feminist training camp, UK Feminista, to be trained in direct action and activism—in Holland, women like Van Haeren baldly proclaim no further need for the movement. "Feminism wasn't necessary anymore by the time I grew up," she says. "In my eyes, it was a thing of the past."
> The relationship between personal lifestyle choices and the socio-economic > standing of women has been under the microscope in Holland ever since the publication of Dutch Women Don't Get Depressed in 2008. Ellen de Bruin, who patterned her book after Mireille Guiliano's bestseller French Women Don't Get Fat, began by defining the stereotypical Dutch woman: naturally beautiful with a no-fuss sense of style, she rides her bike to fetch the groceries, has ample time with her kids and husband, takes art classes in the middle of the week, and spends leisurely afternoons drinking coffee with her friends. She loves to work part-time and does not earn as much as her husband, but she's fine with that—he takes care of the bills. The book went on to note that Dutch women rank consistently low, compared to those in other Western countries, in terms of representation in top positions in business and government—and rank consistently near the top in terms of happiness and well-being. In fact, just about everyone in Holland seems pleased with the status quo; in 2009, the Netherlands ranked highest of all OECD countries in terms of overall well-being."

What a nice little scientific – excuse me, ♥♥♥ scientific ♥♥♥ – confirmation of the Red Pill world view! But of course, not everyone is happy about Dutch women's cheery good fortune. From the same article:

> "Others, however, view it as an alarming signal that women are no longer seeking equality in the workplace. Writer and economist Heleen Mees, for example, argues that the stereotypical Dutch woman has become complacent. "Even at the University of Amsterdam—the most progressive university we have—I had a 22-year-old student say, 'Why is it your business if my wife wants to bake cookies?' and the female students agreed with him! I was like, what's happening here?"
> Mees runs an organization called Women on Top that strives to push more Dutch women into ambitious career paths. Its slogan is "Out with the part-time feminism!" and it points to part-time work as a major factor in a lingering pay gap. Then there's the matter of principle. "I think highly educated women have a moral obligation to take top positions, to set an example by their choices," says Mees. "When women just stay at home or work part-time, they don't reach the top, and they set bad examples for their daughters and daughters' daughters."
> Understandably, the notion that there's a correlation between women's relative powerlessness and their happiness rubs people like Heleen Mees the wrong way. Yet others frame the correlation differently, arguing that Dutch women have smashed the vicious circle of guilt that traps other Western women, to embrace a progressive form of work-life balance."

Helen Mees… does that name sound familiar? It should.

Apparently a certain Willem Buiter, chief economist of Citigroup, lost interest in Ms. Mees after she hit a patch of ice and skidded headfirst into The Wall. Buiter's rejection catalyzed a core meltdown in Helen Mees' Hamster Wheel reactor core. This was no mere Three Mile Island, but rather a full containment breach that will result in abnormally high concentrations of solipsism and circular reasoning in babies born within a hundred-kilometre radius of Manhattan for centuries:

> "The Dutch economist [Mees] was arrested July 1 after allegedly sending more than 1,000 e-mails to Buiter over a two-year time period…
> He's had a past history of disconnecting Ms. Mees and then reconnecting with her…
> "What can I do to make it right? Shall I lick your b–s?" she said in one X-rated epistle…
> In another, she told him: "Hope your plane falls out of the sky."
> Her angry rants allegedly included Buiter's wife and children.
> Prosecutors say she targeted his family even after she was told to stop…
> Buiter received a snapshot of Mees pleasuring herself and another creepily depicting dead birds, according to court papers…
> Mees is looking for new jobs after she was shunned from NYU's Wagner Graduate School of Public Service because of this case."

Now I know that ROK readers trust me to ask the hard-hitting questions. As a journalist, I go right for the six W's: Who, What, When, Where, Why, and WYB?

Her photographer certainly knows when to call in the industrial grade 1000-Watt floodlights, but as 45-year women go, she's a perfectly reasonable specimen. For the sake of novelty, and unlocking the 'Mrs. Robinson' achievement, my verdict is:

(Ms. Mees, if you're reading, I trust this great honour will make up for your otherwise difficult summer.)

Now, what does her future hold? As a professional economist, Helen Mees has achieved (very nice!) great success. However, as a role model, mentor, and source of relationship and life advice to young single women – I suggest to Ms. Mees, that perhaps her comparative advantage lays elsewhere.

The Chinese Are Coming

The New Yorker has a great article about Chinese tourists traveling to Europe on package tours. It expanded on the modern romantic ideal of travel, such as what it can give you and what it can't. It also showed why the Chinese will eventually crush the West.

> Li made a great show of acting out a Mediterranean life style: "Wake up slowly, brush teeth, make a cup of espresso, take in the aroma." The crowd laughed. "With a pace like that, how can their economies keep growing? It's impossible." He added, "In this world, only when you have diligent, hardworking people will the nation's economy grow."

Can you imagine a Western girl speaking such an immutable truth of economic success? To European credit, not all countries are equally lazy (in my experience, Spain and Croatia were the laziest in terms of "taking in the aroma"). I guess some peoples simply value leisure above hard work.

> Mark Twain, whose 1867 trip to Europe and the eastern Mediterranean produced "The Innocents Abroad," described American tourists "who talked very loudly and coarsely, and laughed boisterously when all others were so quiet and well behaved." But, through it all, the journeys changed the travellers in powerful ways. As Samuel Rogers, the English poet, put it, travel sowed in them "doubt of our own exclusive merits."

I dined recently with an American in a busy Ukrainian restaurant, and we were the loudest ones there. A lot of people think Americans are loud because they want others to hear about our exciting lives, but even when the crowd can't understand English, the loudness remains. It's cultural upbringing, and can't be helped.

> "Analysts overseas can never understand why the Chinese economy has grown so fast," he said. "Yes, it's a one-party state, but the administrators are selected from among the élites, and élites picked from 1.3 billion people might as well be called super-élites."

Wait, so we're not all born equal? Is the Chinese man quoted above implying that Malcolm Gladwell's tabula rasa won't transform Jenny in HR into a capitalist superhero after 10,000 hours of paper pushing?

> Li's portrait of the West contained at least one feature of unalloyed admiration. He mentioned a Western friend who had quit his job to go backpacking and find his calling in life. "Would our parents accept that? Of course not! They'd point a finger and say, 'You're a waste!' " he said. But, in Europe, "young people are allowed to pursue what they want to pursue."

It's because all their survival needs are met, and even after that year of fucking around, they won't be lacking food or shelter. They don't need to work, but soon enough they will—if not them then at least their children.

People say that China has a bubble and will collapse, but after the collapse, which would affect the West just as bad, who is more poised to come back? Those with the factories or those with hollowed-out office buildings? The East will surpass us while we busy ourselves trying to be musicians, foodies, and Vine celebrities. I don't wish bad on the West, but I can't think of a people that deserves more to fall.

Give Lower Body A Try

September 20, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Observations

I've noticed a lot of men that work out in the gym focus mostly on the upper body. I cannot recall any time I ever had to wait in line to use the squat rack, dead lift pads, or hip machines. I routinely see people waiting in line to use the bench, sometimes two or three deep. While it is admirable that men have the dedication and discipline to actually work out, working upper body almost exclusively is not utilizing the full potential of one's physical self.

Why Men Workout

There are three main motivations I've seen in men to improve themselves physically. One is to feel impressive, which is good for self-esteem. Another is to appear impressive to other people such as competitors or mates. The third motivation is to actually be impressive, to accomplish physical tasks. Utilizing those three motivations, men should actually put as much if not more effort into lower body as they do their upper body.

Everyone has seen it one time or another, that guy whose physique is disproportional. Those massive arms and chest coupled with chicken legs that make one wonder how he can actually walk around. Maybe he became this way because he only looks at himself from the waist up in the mirror. Maybe he only does the exercises he feels he's good at. Or maybe he just decided to work out as efficiently as possible to look good for the club and just wears baggy jeans. This disproportionate physique can actually work against him.

Reasons For Working The Entire Body

Building up your upper body to be huge is good but if it is trouble walking up three or four flights of stairs, there might be an issue. All the bicep curls in the world won't help you run or jump. Your lower body supports your body most of the day in pretty much every you activity do. Therefore working on your lower body would actually improve your strength and stamina in almost every activity you do.

Having a visibly in shape lower body is quite impressive to observers. To a trained fighter an opponent with visibly developed lower body is far more intimidating than one with big biceps. Skinny legs are a turn off to woman for the most part. Well-developed glutes, hamstrings, and quadriceps let a woman know you have the actual capability to rumble her ovaries.

Conclusion

I'm not advocating for men that they cut down on working out the upper body. I am merely advocating for the addition of lower body workout for those that avoid it. Try doing a few squats at the end of your usual routine. Add a few dead lifts here and there. While calf raises are good, I find sprinting and bicycle riding build calves up very well. No harm in trying something, and there is no actual legitimate argument against working lower body. In conclusion, if you go to the gym, workout your entire body.

Privacy Is Completely Gone

What does this look like to you? Let's look at the picture painted, shall we?

- Massive industrial buildings
- Parking lot appears to be a short hike away from the building itself
- Middle of buttfuck nowhere.

- Lots and lots of electricity poles going everywhere

So, what do you think it is?

1. Secret NASA shit
2. Nuclear plants
3. A massive data center that will monitor everything you do

If you guessed number three, BINGO! You are a winner. This is the new pride and joy of the Director of National Intelligence, the Utah Data Center.

First, let me give you a bit of a background on myself. I work in IT, however, it's not really a "normal" IT life of fixing client side and network issues. Specifically, I'm a SAN (Storage Area Network) engineer. A SAN is essentially the back-end environment that houses data at a block level. This means that a SAN allows basic users to access massive data storage devices, and it simply shows it as an additional logical device (like your C:/ drive on your computer, except it would be whatever letter is mapped to it). Delving a little deeper, I specialize in NAS (Network-Attached Storage) devices, which are devices that are used specifically to speed up file transfers, provide easier administration, etc. I also am (relatively) skilled in VMware environments, replication, and performance analysis of subsystems.

In a nutshell, while I'm not going to disclose where I work, or the clients I work with on a daily basis, I'm blabbing about all this to show where I'm coming from. I work in environments that are extremely large-scale and expensive. Nowadays, data centers at the HIGHEST level (think Google, Microsoft) cost about $500 million. Check out this article for a further breakdown.

The Utah Data Center costs $1.5 billion.

Read that again. Let me spell that out for you. One and a half billion dollars. I understand what the pricing in this industry is, and that is a jaw-dropping figure. That is three times as large as some of the largest data centers in existence, run by the giants of the technology and banking industries. Why so pricey? Well, the Utah Data Center can support zettabytes. For reference…

1,073,741,824 terabytes = 1 zettabyte

Over a billion terabytes. The majority of laptops come with about 250GB (1/4 of a terabyte). Hell, I'm a techy person and I don't even have a full terabyte installed in my machine. The point I'm trying to make is, that is a TON of data. Here's why. Check out the list of things that will be monitored:

- internet searches
- websites visited
- emails sent and received
- social media activity (Facebook, Twitter, etc)
- blogging activity including posts read, written, and commented on – View our patent
- videos watched and/or uploaded online
- photos viewed and/or uploaded online
- mobile phone GPS-location data
- mobile phone apps downloaded
- phone call records – View our patent
- text messages sent and received
- Skype video calls
- online purchases and auction transactions
- credit card/ debit card transactions
- financial information
- legal documents
- travel documents
- health records
- cable television shows watched and recorded
- commuter toll records
- electronic bus and subway passes / Smartpasses
- facial recognition data from surveillance cameras
- educational records
- arrest records
- driver license information

Now, what are they going to do with all that? They are hoping to reveal any potential plots by monitoring all of this data and trying to pick things out. Now, I have no knowledge of the likely incredibly complex algorithms and back-end programming that goes into sorting and sifting data. While I have no doubt that the data of mine that is being logged is highly encrypted and secure in the data center, it's still bothersome that everything I do online is being monitored. Why not just mandate a law that all users must have a keylogger installed on their computer, and, while we're at it, how about I just send you a daily report of everything I'm doing. That would make things easier without needing a $1.5 billion data center, wouldn't it?

Another flaw: what is being done about data in OTHER countries? While I'm not denying that there are plenty of Americans that want to hurt fellow Americans, it wouldn't be hard to argue that other countries probably dislike us even more so. Last I knew, the Internet was the WORLD WIDE WEB. Not the World Wide Web of America. How are potential threats to our country from outside of our own boundaries being monitored? I know what $1.5 billion buys you in this industry, and I guess I feel like that's a shit load of money to pay and then not be able to monitor international threats. Are we, as a country, that powerful, that we're simply getting away with it? Looking at this site, it looks like that's the case.

In today's world of social media, it's not like we have any privacy anyway. I'd say that I'm hoping not to get an official government warning for writing this post, but the Utah Data Center probably knew about this post while it was still in draft form.

All Women Are Sheep

September 21, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

As much as you may be aware of the very powerful and widespread herd mentality among women, it might have even greater influence on women than we have been noticing so far. It seems that just about everything a modern girl does is not because she wants to do it, but because everyone else does. This applies to he most petty, insignificant things and to major behaviors and choices.

See that girl walking down the street? Her yoga pants, yoga mat, iced coffee in her left hand, her iPhone in her right hand, her sunglasses and white headphones—the whole combination is not her choice. Whether it's lack of independent judgment or any ambition to stand out and be different—none of those accessories were her choice. She just follows the herd.

The next time you see a girl with a tramp stamp on her back or with a big Michael Kors watch, don't forget that she's just part of "the mainstream and the mediocre" herd without giving too much thought to what she wants and likes.

Remember how you called up that girl who you were excited about meeting, and she texted you back instead of calling you back? Be assured that she wasn't born rude and lame. Her friends made her that way by acting equally lame, and she eventually joined the herd.

What about the women's online dating profiles? Why do so many look so remarkably alike and start with the same cliche "I am as comfortable in my dress as I am in jeans" b.s.? It doesn't take a genius to write at least somewhat creative and interesting dating profile, if they only tried, instead of shamelessly plagiarizing each other.

Every time you go to a gym, don't you notice how just about every girl in there is wearing some seriously fortified bitch shields? Contrary to what you might think, the girls who suffer on a treadmill after work or school did not adopt a cunt face look naturally—they just mimicked all the other girls who have mean, unapproachable zombi look on their face.

The vast majority of what a young woman does or has today—from doing nails and shopping at Forever 21, to being glued to her inhaler-smartphone 24/7—is dictated by the herd. And for your information, she is not this perky and bubbly because she is so damn happy all the time. She is this way because all of her friend are. She just follows them very obediently without asking too many questions.

The worst part is that she doesn't even think there is anything wrong with that kind of extreme and all-encompassing conformity that leaves no space of individuality and authentic expression of self.

Sons & Lovers

September 21, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Sons & Lovers is the story of the Morel family set in early 20th century England, during a time when seemingly every child was born “frail.” The father is a coal miner and alcoholic who mistreats his wife. The kids, in response, come to hate him and develop a strong attachment to their mother. The beginning of the story shows how a marriage that began with love can devolve into tension and hatred. There is almost no action. Instead we get slices of family life and the individual problems that the characters faced. The writing is floral:

> Paul hurried off to the station jubilant. Down Derby Road was a cherry tree that glistened. The old brick wall by the Statues ground burned scarlet, spring was a very flame of green. And the steep swoop of highroad lay, in its cool morning dust, splendid with patterns of sunshine and shadow, perfectly still. The trees sloped their great green shoulders proudly; and inside the warehouse all the morning, the boy had a vision of spring outside.

> She searched earnestly in herself to see if she wanted Paul Morel. She felt there would be some disgrace in it. Full of twisted feeling, she was afraid she did want him. She stood self-convicted. Then came an agony of new shame. She shrank within herself in a coil of torture. Did she want Paul Morel, and did he know she wanted him? What a subtle infamy upon her! She felt as if her whole soul coiled into knots of shame.
> He courted her now like a lover. Often, when he grew hot, she put his face from her, held it between her hands, and looked in his eyes. He could not meet her gaze. Her dark eyes, full of love, earnest and searching, made him turn away. Not for an instant would she let him forget. Back again he had to torture himself into a sense of his responsibility and hers. Never any relaxing, never any leaving himself to the great hunger and impersonality of passion; he must be brought back to a deliberate, reflective creature. As if from a swoon of passion she called him back to the littleness, the personal relationship. He could not bear it.

There was no lead-up to big events. One character was having dinner, then suddenly realized he loved a girl with all his soul. Another character had an itchy rash. And then he was dead (lol). It gave the book emotionally distant timbres, where you could understand the characters, but didn't care if they died. In fact, you hoped for death because it would give the mossy plot some excitement. After a while, I began to get the feeling that the book was written for suffragists and unsatisfied housewives of the time. Men are portrayed as mule-like and erratic while women are always suffering at the whims of men. The only favorable character, Paul Morel, is portrayed as a sensitive artist who deeply loves his mum.

Paul develops an Oedipus Complex, thanks to a mother who makes him feel guilty for giving more attention to other women than her. She never approves of the girls he courts, applying subtle but disturbing manipulation. It causes Paul to develop like a woman with emotions that rapidly vacillate for no reason that the reader can discern. This book could easily be renamed "I Got Mommy Issues" or "Build-A-Beta."

> "I do like her," he said, "but—"
> "Like her!" said Mrs Morel, in the same biting tones. "it seems to me you like nothing and nobody else. There's neither Annie, nor me, nor anyone now for you."
> "What nonsense, mother—you know I don't love her—I—I tell you I don't love her—she doesn't even walk with my arm, because I don't want her to."
> "Then why do you fly to her so often!"
> "I do like to talk to her–I never said I didn't. But I don't love her."
> "Is there nobody else to talk to?"

> “Not about the things we talk of. There’s lots of things that you’re not interested in, that—”
> “What things?”
> Mrs Morel was so intense that Paul began to pant.

Though Paul constantly sought the approval of his mother, he somehow found himself in a love triangle of sorts with two beautiful women. Ironically, it’s his female-like emotions that made him more attractive in their eyes. He’s constantly hating something or another. He “hated” her because she looked at him weird. He “hated” the selfish part of her. In fact, the word “hate” comes up 125 times, while love shows up 364 times. No one has emotions that extreme. It was silly.

> Recklessness is almost a man’s revenge on his woman. He feels he is not valued, so he will risk destroying himself to deprive her altogether.

Back in the day before no-fault divorce, a woman paid the price if she chose the wrong man. It’s obvious why a movement of female emancipation had much appeal, but over-treating the illness, as we have done, will cause side-effects from the medicine to be worse than the disease. While the Morel family wasn’t entirely happy, the children were instilled with traditional values that went on to aid them in adulthood. None of them took on a life of crime, homosexuality, or procreation out of wedlock. I fail to see the problem of not having a perfectly utopian family life over single mom households and bastardization.

This book has reinforced my suspicion that classic literature is often nothing more than code for “heavy description, heavy character development, little action.” It’s not too often that I’m in the mood for a story that doesn’t move. The book was competently written, but nothing would be lost by skipping it.

Understanding The Seneca Falls Convention

The Seneca Falls Convention was held in the summer of 1848, between the days of July 18 – 20 in Seneca Falls, in upstate New York. It has been credited as the first, formalized meeting of women's rights activists in America. At this point, there was no talk of feminism – the rhetoric was about women's rights.

The primary organizer of the convention was Elizabeth Cady Stanton, a clinical narcissistic with serious issues relating towards male approval. Lucretia Mott – Stanton's sidekick – also exerted a serious level of influence on the convention, but she was little more than an instrument for Stanton's ideological views.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton

Elizabeth Cady Stanton is quite possibly one of the most influential people in American history. Her psychologically deficient childhood birthed her feminism. She was born into great wealth with a father who was a prominent lawyer; there were eleven children born into the family, five of whom died in early childhood. This caused her mother to fall into a life-long depression. Her father's robust professional life prevented him from having a great influence on her directly. The parenting in the family fell to the eldest daughter – never a good situation.

Stanton took to her father's legal library and began to develop a knowledge base. She attended elite primary schools and won awards for her debating skills. Her father famously remarked after her getting an award, "How I wish you were a boy!" Stanton took this comment to believe that he valued boys over girls. In reality, he valued them differently, not the same. A key error in feminism is that they assume men and women are the same and as such, valuing a man for this and a women for that necessarily means a person values the man over the woman.

However, we see the profile of a woman desperately seeking the approval of men, starting with her father. Her mother was a supremely weak person and that probably fueled her own inability to value a woman's distinct contribution to a marriage and childrearing. As such, she found a weak man to marry and took on the role of "voluntary motherhood." She rubbed elbows fellow 1%'ers in New York City and loved the intellectual debate – probably all fueling her narcissism as she got to feel superior to men as a class if she bested a man in a debate.

Eventually, she moved to Seneca Falls, where she fell into depression because of the lack of intellectual stimulation, in which she did not get her narcissistic self-preening validated. She traveled to London in 1840 to the Anti-Slavery convention, where she met Lucretia Mott. The two bonded over women's rights, as they were not allowed to speak or vote at the convention. The organizers were rightfully worried the two would derail the convention with women's rights rhetoric.

Lucretia Mott

Lucretia Mott, herself, was a Quaker and was primarily interested in abolishing slavery. Her interest in women's rights paled in comparison to Stanton's, especially as Stanton radicalized her views. Mott was interested in expanding social respect (worship) for women's roles in society. Women like her were strong proponents of women as men's moral superiors. She was opposed to female suffrage, noting that politics are corrupt and subject to power relations that prevent true morality from being expressed. Mott observed that voting isn't as relevant as Stanton thought.

However, their deep friendship and mutual correspondence lead to the Seneca Falls Convention. Predictably, the narcissistic Stanton insisted it be in the town in which she lived, which is quite the demand in a world that doesn't have the automobile. Regardless, around 300 people showed up the event headlined by Stanton and Mott. It was held in late July during a heat spell.

On the first day, men were required to be silent as the two headliners talked about the importance of women's rights as general concept. Stanton recited her "Declaration of Sentiments" in the morning session. Later that day, debates over female suffrage occurred, with a "humorous" recounting of a woman's idea that she works so much harder than her husband – her slaving away all day while he comes home from work to sit around. That woman is already admitting she has class privilege as not many men worked outside the home in such a manner in America.

Fredrick Douglass

The second day was the most important. Stanton's declaration was adopted by the entire convention, with men's and women's signatures segregated on the basis of sex – in the name of equality, of course. What is most striking is the only black person allowed to the event – Fredrick Douglass – gave a rousing speech about the equality of all people, black and female, that is often cited as marrying the nascent women's rights movement and abolition as one. That isn't what really happened.

Before considering race and voting rights, consider the roots of Christianity in women's rights. Stanton herself distanced herself from Christianity, but she knew if she was to reach women, she needed to use Christianity. Her declarations were couched in Biblical exhortations. She argued that female happiness was the touchstone for social approaches to sex relations, but then would argue men and women were created equal by God. She used Christianity to appeal to women, but knew that she could never get the world she wanted purely through Christianity.

In the end, she knew that she could get to women via naked emotional appeals; the problem was she was not a great orator nor had the ability to relate to women at large because she was a narcissist. So, she used Mott to give rousing speeches to the women in the evening sessions. Mott was the one that cemented the convention, as her speeches brought tears to the eyes of women and laid the groundwork for Stanton's radicalism.

The convention ended with a good bit of fanfare. Unlike what any feminist would tell you, the convention was met with, in totality, tepid approval. There were many newspapers & intellectuals that did not approve of the convention, but a very good bit of people agreed with the convention. The ideas that women should have easier access to divorce, custody rights and independent income streams wasn't as radical as some would argue. The radical idea was women's right to vote.

In the aftermath of the Civil War, a few Constitutional Amendments were considered. The least controversial one, the 13th Amendment, officially abolished slavery and involuntary servitude. However, a serious rift developed in the women's rights movement – between those who supported universal enfranchisement for all men, and those that did not and insisted on an equal voting rights Amendment that included women.

The 14th & 15th Amendment concerns discrimination based on race and black male voting rights. The impetus for the 14th Amendment was to ensure equal enforcement of the laws for both whites and blacks. Of course, it took over 100 years to see this idea reflected in reality.

Stanton, and many of her supporters, refused to support either Amendment, saying it should not be in the Constitution if women are not included. This caused quite the rift in the movement, as many women's rights activists were white supremacists. Others were put off by Stanton's insistence that black and female emancipation should be tied at the hip.

Fredrick Douglass argued that white women already enjoyed class privilege, marriage privilege and the fact many women can bend their husband's ears, as well as their son's and brother's. Stanton and her supporters had a bad reaction to his assertions, claiming all men were privileged in society. He eventually backtracked in his comments, eventually suborning himself to Stanton's views. Yes, in the 1860's, early feminists believed black men enjoyed privilege that white women did not. Douglass stood by when Stanton relied on highly racist language in order to move white female approval away from both Amendments; he stayed by her side as a friend and never spoke ill of her, even as he knew women like Stanton wanted to hijack the civil rights movement in order to push women's rights causes.

That had been Stanton's whole life, inserting herself wherever possible in order to talk about herself, although she masked that self-absorption by claiming to be talking about women as a class. Clearly distraught black people were getting legal protections that women didn't have, she demanded to marry women's rights and equality between whites and blacks because she felt that black people were achieving too much before women did.

In her life, women came first. Even just after the ending of slavery, this woman was spitting rhetoric of male privilege into the faces of black men. Douglass was powerless because feminism is a movement for white women and, as such, he had little to no ability to alter it. As such, she was able to maintain her delusion that all men had this inalienable privilege – in her world, even newly freed black men enjoyed social privilege that white women could not enjoy.

The takeaway lesson here isn't at all about what rights women or men should or shouldn't have, but simply the completely self-absorbed roots of American feminism. Notice how feminists think agency and being strong is showing off their actions at men. That is how Stanton approached life, as her life was one massive project aimed at garnering male approval for her mind, intellectualism and ideas. Of course, like with any narcissist, once she gets the approval she immediately devalues said person – her husband was a perfect example of this as she clearly had little regard or respect for the man.

Stanton and her convention was about her desire to be able to show men her capabilities as more than a wife and mother. She started with herself and multiplied her desires to one-up men across all women. That is never healthy and can only result in a self-absorbed ideology focused exclusively on garnering approval, only to ruthlessly devalue those who give them approval.

Which turns out to be today’s American feminism.

You’re A Misogynist

September 22, 2013 | by Vincent Vinturi | Link | Original Link

You may not know it, but the very fact that you run around having sex with a variety of beautiful girls all the time proves you’re a misogynist. They’re just conquests to you; you don’t care about the “real” them. You just want to fuck them. And that makes you a woman hater.

All you have to offer these women is an incredible emotional and sexual ride. And then what? You don’t buy them anything. You don’t entertain them or sit through their long soliloquies about mindless minutiae. You just use them for your pleasure and leave them high and dry when you get bored of them. You don’t even have the decency to stick around once your interest in each other naturally wanes.

Truly, only a man who hates women as much as you do would expend such a colossal amount of effort and brave the countless rejections and disappointments necessary in order to become a better communicator, a better seducer, a better listener, a better lover, and a better man.

In your selfish quest for pussy, you take women on an emotional roller coaster that they’ll only go on maybe a small handful of times in their entire lives. But you’re short-sighted. Because when these women are on their death beds, you think they’ll think of you? Please.

They’ll be nostalgically recounting their many happy days of working in the office and climbing the career ladder. The memory of a summer tryst with some mysterious playboy won’t even make her old pussy wet one last time. Or let her die knowing she experienced some beauty in this world during her short visit. You should do the world a favor and have your tubes tied.

You're A Sex Tourist.

You leave the West for a stint abroad. You discover that in your new country, women act like… women. And because you're biologically driven to find femininity incredible alluring, you actively pursue these foreign girls. Thus, you are a sex tourist.

What's that you say? You never pay for sex abroad? Doesn't matter. You're a sex tourist because we said so. We bend words to our liking. We don't approve of your activities, therefore you are a sex tourist. Get it? It's really quite logical. But you think with your dick, so it might take your perverted little mind a bit of time to process our superior form of reasoning.

Maybe if you had stayed in your miserable, Anglophone country with its mannish, uncouth, ill-tempered 'women', we might have let you off the hook. Maybe. But you've deserted us and discovered that you don't have to deal with our bullshit ever again. You've found out the truth. And now you're out telling other people about it. Tsk, tsk.

Well, sex tourist, you've forced our hand. Now we're going to do everything in our considerable, government-subsidized, socially supported power to silence, shame and denigrate you. By the time we're through with you, your livelihood and reputation will be shot to death with a Tommy gun-like barrage of articles, written by our snarky sisters at Jezebel. And you'll come crawling back to us, begging us for the privilege to grovel at the feet of the ugliest and most obese among us, of whom there is a considerable supply.

So enjoy your blissful sexual escapades with sweet, feminine women in a warm paradise while you can, sex tourist. Because eventually, you'll have to return to your home country and… wait, you'll eventually have to return, won't you? Won't you??

You Are Whatever We Say You Are

If you weren't. Then why would we say you are? The fact that you've hurt nobody and have given many women great pleasure is all the evidence we need to indict you. Actually, the fact that you're a man is enough.

Because we've been so well-educated by our benevolent feminist foremothers, we know that your very existence as a strong, unapologetic, sexual man threatens our ability to acquire and wield power. And we like power. It's intoxicating. You've had it for so long; it's not fair! So now it's our turn, 'cuz we want it too!

Sure, maybe you can hide away for a while in Thailand, or Russia, or Colombia, or China and put our shrill voices and amorphous bodies out of your mind. But it's only a matter of time before our tentacles reach around to your side of the world. Then we will make your activities illegal and punishable by copious amounts of estrogen therapy. We'll make you grow tits just to make you feel what's it's like.

You think we're kidding, don't you? You think this is all a big, grotesque joke, huh? Well, maybe you'll be too old to do anything about it, but our enlightened public school educators will be putting your sons in dresses to teach them the value of womanhood. And there isn't a damn thing you can do about it.

We’ll make sure the last thing you see before you shuffle off this mortal coil is a photograph of your son wearing lipstick and gayly flipping his wrist. And we do mean gayly. We’ll have the last laugh, sex tourist. So enjoy the free-for-all while you can.

Why There Will Always Be A Sexual “Double Standard”

September 23, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Women complain about the sexual “double standard” all the time. “Why is a girl who sleeps around a slut but when a guy does it he gets praise? So unfair!!”

Females definitely dislike this reality, and feminists are especially vocal about it. The irony, however, is that girls are actually the main drivers of the sexual “double standard”. They just don’t admit it.

The main reason “studs” get so much more praise than “sluts” is not just down to the difficulty associated with approaching and seducing women (we all know that any decent looking girl can get laid whenever she wants). Rather, this praise also stems from the fact that girls prefer men who are also preferred by other girls (the more, the better). This is tied to the concept of pre-selection: the more you are seen to be objectively desired by other girls, the more girls you are able to attract.

What women want is a man who could get with many other girls, but chooses not to exercise those options and instead seeks to be with her alone (at least to her knowledge—a savvy player will often renege on this, but even a smart girl will still often make the effort to “change him” and gain his sexual exclusivity despite having no real shot at doing so).

This is the stud’s biggest advantage: his ability to get lots of girls to sleep with him just gets him more appeal among the other girls he might run into who become aware of his popularity. Other men praise him too because they envy all the female attention the stud gets and would love to emulate it (read: they dream of being in his position). Thus, the stud is idolized by both genders.

The Madonna and the Whore

Sluts have things a bit differently. Men don't feel about sluts the way women do about studs. They aren't impressed by a girl's ability to attract other men (which makes sense, since so many girls have that ability—cute girls can run through men with ease if they wish). Men also want a woman who is sexually exclusive and loyal ONLY to them. This is best illustrated by the Madonna-whore complex: he wants her to be Madonna for everybody else, but a whore only for him, or a "lady in the streets and a freak in the sheets". He wants to know that he has access to a side of her that no other man can have.

This is sort of similar to the female dynamic I mentioned above in which girls desire the exclusive focus of a stud's sexual/romantic attention. The difference really rests in the way each sex treats sexual history: for the woman, sexual promiscuity can be a signal of value and therefore a plus so long as she can tame it and make that man exclusive to her at some point (women do not value chaste men). For a man, sexual promiscuity can be a negative insofar as it can signal her potential inability to satisfy the Madonna-whore complex mentioned above by giving him full sexual exclusivity (men do not value promiscuous women).

Sluts, by definition, don't tend to offer sexual exclusivity to one guy—they spread it to several. Instead of being his whore and everyone else's Madonna, she is everyone else's whore and nobody's Madonna. That's about as uncomfortable for a guy as the notion of losing an attractive man (stud) whose exclusive commitment she thought she had to another woman could be for a female.

So, the double standard can be summed up as follows:

A: Girls don't want guys that have not shown the ability to consistently attract other girls. That gives studs a massive advantage over less socially-dominant men with lower partner counts since women tend to prefer them when given a choice.

B: Guys don't favor girls that a whole lot of other guys (particularly guys they could know) have been with.

Women also aggressively shame girls who are seen to have been with many other guys. In fact, women are the primary source of "slut-shaming", and certainly the most vicious about it. Why?

Competition

As I said above, women want to be able to find a stud (the man that all of the other girls want) and gain his commitment and exclusive romantic focus. Sluts (especially the cuter ones) make that more challenging by providing a very tempting sexual alternative to these men that undermines any given girl's ability to lock him down. Women want their stud for them, not other women, and the slut poses the greatest threat to that bid for exclusivity.

Some women will also use slut-shaming to help their competitive odds with women who are not sluts. As I mentioned above, men have a Madonna-whore complex. They want the whore bit to be exclusive to them when it comes to any given girl, something no other man gets to see. Sluts (by virtue of their tendency get around with multiple men simultaneously or within very short periods of time) threaten that ideal, and so men tend to be more hesitant to commit to them. This includes studs, who (true to the double standard) have the same Madonna-whore complex as any other guy. A slut, by virtue of being a slut, undermines her chances of gaining long-term commitment from a true stud. It isn’t impossible, but it is harder.

Women instinctively understand this. They know that a high-value male could be turned off by any sexual history that could be viewed as a sign that she may not be 100% sexually exclusive to him (his whore, everyone else's madonna). This is part of why they are generally not forthcoming about their sexual histories and usually underestimate their "number" when asked (and/or just get offended by the question).

This is also why it is not uncommon for a young girl to shame another young girl she has a rivalry with (maybe she's prettier, or maybe she's caught the eye of a stud another girl likes, etc, etc) by attempting to paint her as a slut (or a similar term like skank, whore, etc). She'll do this either by calling her those names outright or by making up rumors about a given girl's sexual promiscuity that have no basis in reality. Among young girls this can sometimes manifest itself as serious and at times fatal bullying.

The goal of this slut shaming? Undermine the girl's social capital. If the slut-shaming is successful, she'll receive fewer offers of commitment from the most attractive men (who, as I noted, are generally more wary of sluts for anything serious) and other girls (who, as I noted above, are threatened by sluts).

Here's a website that provides a good example of how women do this. The site is essentially a rumor mill. There are valid stories there, but many of the female entries (females make up the majority of the visitors, commenters and submitters) are clearly tied to sour grapes and have no real basis in reality. They are just the result of one girl attempting to undermine the social capital of another girl who threatens her ego by associating her with a gossip website and publicly attempting to slut-shame her.

Thus, as you can see, sluts are shamed and manwhores are celebrated by both men and women.

When will this change?

If you've seen the show Entourage, consider this: Eric vs. Vince. Who was the more attractive guy, generally, to women?

Obviously Vince. Guys like Vince (who play the field extensively and are known by the women they approach to be players) are generally preferred to less prolific men like Eric or Turtle.

Those are good guys and it isn’t like they were forever single (both had girls from time to time, Turtle had Jamie Lynn Siegler and Eric married one of the prettiest females ever to appear on the show), but the balance of power when it comes to the ability to attract females clearly leans toward players like Vince. That is just a fact.

The double standard will go away when that reality goes away, and men like Eric or Turtle are considered by the average woman to be just as attractive as men like Vince despite their less promiscuous histories and lower levels of charm and game. When that happens, the celebration of the stud will end: women will obviously not be favoring the stud and men (who only worshiped studs because of how many women they could attract) will cease their praise as well. The stud will be held in no higher regard than the slut. Why desire to be a stud like Vince when you can just be Eric and be on a level playing field? At this point there would be no more double standard.

Of course, we all know this will never happen. Why? Because women love studs and always will. Give 100 women a choice between the chance to start a sexual relationship with Vince Chase the stud (whose promiscuity is well known and whose commitment they know they are VERY unlikely to obtain beyond a superficial level) and Eric the good guy (who isn't as handsome or famous but is smart, affluent and more likely to actually stick around) and 80-90 of them will take their chances with Vince.

This isn't changing and, as a result, the double standard will remain with us. Those who oppose it had best get used to it.

The Greatest Physician In History

September 23, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Greatness is more often the result of years of incremental, patient labor than it is the sudden phosphorescence of a single incident. Gradually but persistently, like the drips of water falling in a cave and accreting mineral formations, the labors of the great man may take many years to produce results. But when the results to come, they can move awe in the soul. We, the spectators, stand in wonder at the finished products, but forget the painstaking, backbreaking toil that produced them. Overnight success, someone once said, usually takes about ten years.

In fact, it usually takes a lot longer than that.

Andreas Vesalius came from a Brussels family with a notable history in the medical profession. By all accounts, as a boy he was consumed with a passion for the natural world, and eagerly soaked up all available information on biology, anatomy, and medicine. His special passion was dissection, for which he developed a prodigious talent. He showed signs of genius at an early age: at twenty two years old he was able to lecture to pupils in Latin, and was able to read the medical works of Galen in the original Greek.

Medical science in Europe at the time was held hostage by the ancient texts of Galen, Celsus, and Aristotle, and by traditional theological disapproval of anatomical research. Galen's work, although brilliant in its day, had not kept pace with the advancement of learning in the intervening millennium; and Vesalius found the slavish devotion to his texts at Louvain schools to be suffocating. Secretly, he and friends prowled the charnel houses for cadavers to bring into the lecture halls and dissect. He suffered no fools and, like many great men, found it hard to keep his passions under control. He soon found it prudent to leave Louvain and relocate to Padua, Italy, where he received his doctorate; in 1537, the Venetian authorities appointed him professor of surgery and anatomy at the University of Padua. He was only twenty three years old.

Vesalius kept meticulous and voluminous notes of his researches over many years, a fact that would be of inestimable value in the next phase of his life in Italy. From 1541 to 1543, while working with colleagues on a complete revision of the medical texts of Galen, he became more and more aware that an entirely fresh perspective was needed. Traditional ways of thinking would have to be thrown out completely.

Revolutionary moments in science seem to come when a pioneer—either through a flash of insight or simply out of desperation— finally jettisons the old paradigms and adopts an entirely new model. So Copernicus and Kepler finally realized that the Ptolemaic orbital systems of the sun and earth could not be reconciled with the observed astronomical data; and so Max Planck, in desperation at his inability to explain the nature of blackbody radiation, finally adopted a quantum-based mathematical model that could account for his observations. Vesalius had reached a point of no return: regardless of the cost, he resolved to drag the science of anatomy, kicking and screaming, into the modern world.

The result was the greatest medical work ever written.

In 1543, at the age of twenty nine, Vesalius published in Switzerland the first edition of De Humani Corporis Fabrica (On the Structure of the Human Body). No one had ever seen anything like it before. Printed in 663 glorious folio pages, it contained nearly 300 original woodcuts which by themselves could have stood independently as works of art. Many of the engravings were made with Vesalius's own hand. Here was finally revealed the intricate and detailed structure of every part of the human body, in a methodical, confident way that was staggering in its breadth and scope. Everything in the Fabrica was based on original first-hand research, with no reliance on, or allowance made, for hearsay or superstition. It was momentous in the profoundest sense possible.

It is perhaps difficult for us now, several centuries removed, to realize how revolutionary his revelations were. Knowledge of the body and its operations is relatively common now, but this was not always so. We must remember that the entire basis of modern medicine rests on a detailed factual understanding of how the body works. And Vesalius's labors showed the way. For the first time, here was described the ventricles of the heart, the operation of the blood vessels, the uterus, the liver, the brain, the skeletal system and bone structure, and the function of the other internal organs. Vesalius had mapped the body with the same masterly thoroughness that Johannes Kepler described the orbits of the planets. And he laid the observational groundwork that later generations would build on.

Expectedly, he was resented by older colleagues and the theological authorities whom he had no use for. Like many great pioneers, he made enemies everywhere who feared the overthrow of the existing paradigms. Some academics tried to explain Galen's errors by claiming that the human body had "changed" anatomically since antiquity. In frustration at the pettiness of his peers, Vesalius left Italy and took a position as medical advisor at the court of Charles V of Spain, where he found himself a foreigner at odds with the native Spanish physicians. It is not unlikely that he was also under suspicion by the Inquisition, which never forgave his bold refutation of religious scripture with applied science. He issued an expanded second edition of the Fabrica in 1555, which contained even more original research and observations.

His powers remained unequalled. In 1562, the king's beloved only son suffered a concussion and serious head trauma from a fall. Vesalius urgently recommended a brain operation which involved opening the skull; the diagnosis was rejected with horror by the king's sycophantic entourage and other doctors. As the prince neared death, and with the royal court in near paralysis, Charles finally consented to let Vesalius perform the surgery. Vesalius undertook the job fearlessly, fully aware what was at stake. It was a complete success. The prince recovered in eight days, and Vesalius's powers gained nearly mythic status.

Like many men of genius, he had the faults of his formidable abilities. Far ahead of his contemporaries, he found it difficult to extend forbearance to foolery, and impossible to leave ignorance unanswered. It was in his nature. His flame burned brightly, yet with tragic brevity: men of action find it difficult to relax, and to know when to stop. For reasons that are not clear, he eventually left Spain to go on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. He reached the holy city, but was shipwrecked off the island of Zante in Greece on his return voyage in 1564 and died of exposure. He was only fifty years old.

Vesalius's mapping of the human body laid the observational groundwork for later discoveries by the physicians Servetus and Sir William Harvey. As a physician and scientist, he had no equals. But he paid a high price for his genius. Working under difficult conditions and in hostile environments, he developed a protective shield of curtness and pride that often wounded his friends and colleagues. He was generous to a fault with his friends, and had none of the vindictiveness or petty jealousies that afflicted his peers. When hardly thirty years old, he was able to dethrone the Galenic view of medicine and anatomy that had held sway in Europe for over a thousand years. He was a prisoner of his time, yet scaled the heights of immortality.

The original woodblock engravings of the Fabrica , lovingly preserved by Vesalius in his lifetime, were lost after his death. They were miraculously rediscovered at the library of the University of Munich in 1893. During the Second World War, they were destroyed in a bombing raid. So the folly of man can obliterate in an instant the treasures of the ages.

In an age where the boundary between art and experimental science was often indistinct, his Fabrica remains a masterpiece of both. An outsider in many environments, he did his best to reconcile his restless ambitions with the intolerance and ignorance of the era in which he lived. He believed passionately in the progress of mankind, and he exhausted himself in his lifelong pursuit of knowledge, yet he never lost faith in the redemptive power of scientific inquiry, even in an era which believed firmly in witchcraft and demons.

Who among us has the moral courage to rise about the limiting beliefs of our era, and who will permit his spirit to soar into areas of inquiry that may bring strong disapproval? And who has done it with such masterly confidence, and such single-minded devotion? Despite his human faults, he ennobled his patient labors with the inspiring dignity of a scholar and the courageous objectivity of a true scientist. He was a seeker and a pioneer. And he was the greatest physician in history.

Canadian Feminist Kyla Garvey Gets Two Firemen Fired

September 24, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Well that didn't take long. Since I last reported on the antics of misandrist Nitasha Tiku, another feminist has successfully hurt the lives of two men because of tweets that she found offensive.

It started with this National Post article, written by Kyla Garvey:

> On November 1 2012 Matt Bowman, whose Twitter handle is @Hero_Matt and features a photograph of him in his firefighter's uniform, tweeted: "Reject a woman and she will never let it go. One of the many defects of their kind. Also weak arms." In March he tweeted, "I'd never let a woman kick my ass. If she tried something I'd be like HEY! You get your bitch ass back in the kitchen and make me some pie!" On Thursday he tweeted "the way to a woman's heart is through anal."
> Told of the tweets on Friday, David Sheen, division chief of staff services at Toronto Fire, said "I am logging it as a complaint, I am going to investigate it. To me that is not an acceptable attitude to be identified with firefighters in the City of Toronto."

A follow-up article reveals that the two firemen were indeed fired.

> Toronto Fire on Monday terminated three firefighters for what it calls breaches of the city's policy on social media, a spokesman said Monday evening.
> The firing comes one month after the National Post published a story about attempts at Toronto Fire to recruit more women and visible minorities. In that story, the Post republished just a few tweets from accounts connected to two firefighters in Scarborough.

It appears that the answer is more cultural sensitivity training:

> Goal number seven of the diversity report is cultural understanding training for all staff. Fire Services have prepared a one to two-hour PowerPoint on cultural understanding, equivalent to health and safety training. Online training will begin at the end of 2013.
> Mr. Sheen says it was developed to "make sure that firefighters start to think about cultural differences and how it affects people they serve." It is also meant to increase awareness of cultural differences in the workplace to make it more welcoming and understanding.

A member at RVF gave a humorous response:

> Imagine the following.
> A bunch of gender studies women are trapped in a burning building and call 911. They are given two options by the operator on what kind of emergency rescue they require.
> A) Gender Normative Fire brigade "The Fancy Gushers". 50/50 women and men that spend special time on sensitivity training as part of their regular drills.
> B) Ladder 666. Consisting of the meanest, most foul mouthed pukes available that piss barbed wire and wouldn't notice a third-degree burn unless it prevented them from benching an ox.
> Which one are you going to pick to come rescue you lady? WHICH ONE!?

Who Is Kyla Garvey?

Research done by the ROK staff has revealed a sinister motive in regard to her original story. Before I provide her background, let me propose a hypothetical: do you think it would be a good idea for me to write an article in the New York Times about feminism? Probably not, because I have a deep-seated prejudice against the ideology that would prevent me from writing a "balanced" journalistic account for mainstream consumption. It's the same reason why a judge should excuse himself from a case if he's financially connected to one of the litigants. In the same vein, no card-carrying feminist should write a newspaper article about "sexism," since their prejudice against men means they see sexism where sexism may not exist.

Now take a look at Kyla's background (click for larger size):

Here are the highlights:

- She states: "I'm particularly interested in women's rights"
- She studied a course on "Gender, Sexuality, and Cultural Resistance"
- She was a member of the Women's Studies Student Council

I also found another source that states she actually majored in Women's Studies.

apply our academics to first hand experiences. In return, we've been given a chance to discover how we can assist in the fight against oppression, human rights abuses and access to information challenges.

Kyla Garvey is entering fourth-year at Western pursuing a double major in Media and the Public Interest and Women's Studies. Currently, she is interning in Malaysia with the Centre for Independent Journalism and hopes to one day be an investigative journalist.

In other words, she's a man-hater. It seems that she has gone out of her way to not help men, even when working for the Big Brothers organization (she only helped girls). So why did the National Post allow her to denounce two men, when it's a certainty she harbors resentment against the male gender? Does that sound like patriarchy to you?

Hit-And-Run Job

Kyla is not even a regular writer for the National Post—she's a freelancer. She was able to perform a hit-and-run operation and then gain full-time employment at the Ontario Lottery and Gaming commission. She has absolutely no skin-in-the-game when it comes to fair reporting or journalistic integrity, and will go on with her life not feeling empathy for the harm that she has caused. Shame on any society that allows a person like her to unfairly denounce men without repercussions.

An interesting side-note is that this case differs a bit from the standard liberal/Marxist attack formula. It appears that the lower the reputation of the publication where the denouncement is published, the more the attacker must stir up the mob, like Nitashu Tiku did. Since her employer, Gawker, is known to be a disreputable cesspool that publishes without concern for facts, she had to stoke mob anger in order to get Pax Dickinson fired. But all Kyla had to do was say she worked for the National Post and then make a single phone call. That tells you how much power these people have if they work in major newspapers to exercise their feminist agenda. I doubt we have to wait long until the next victim is purged.

Nothing Is Permanent

If we stop and observe those around us, we can see many unhappy people as we go through our daily lives. They fill a variety of archetypes, but a common thread is that their despair often derives from the broken assumption that things in our world can achieve permanence. This is true for both positive and negative beliefs — the fat computer geek is unhappy because he believes his life can never be any better. Conversely, the rich executive struggles for contentment once he has reached a certain level of status, but after making his first million finds that the fulfillment only stays for a short time.

Our lives are in a perpetual state of change. Feelings, priorities, relationships — all are impermanent. Roosh has written about this, the idea that we are chasing happiness but the very idea of change (and its pursuit) is what makes us happy. When you find something that grips you in the moment, part of the battle is dispelling the creeping feelings of self-sabotage that tell you it will remain so forever. We must divide our effort between prolonging the experience as much as possible, and attempting to appreciate it as it washes over us.

The worst moments of my life occurred when I built something up as a permanent pillar of my world view. When my girlfriend of several years dumped me, I was crushed because I assumed that we would be together forever and she would continue to love me unconditionally. I lost touch with old friends I thought would be lifelong comrades, due to eroding communication and lack of continued shared circumstances. People who once seemed so important in my life disappeared after I moved only a few states away. Nearly every difficult transition in our lives occurs when we take for granted that things will stay the way they are.

Ever wonder why some of the most rich and successful people wreck their minds and bodies on drugs and alcohol? Even the most intense high of performing in front of thousands of people gets old. We all acclimate to our surroundings. These people chase a high so potent that only chemicals can provide it. They wrongly assumed they would always derive the same exhilaration out of doing what they love. Surely, they could count upon the permanence of their one calling, but almost without exception they were wrong. Nothing makes us happy forever.

The best memories in my life are from situations I knew would come to an end quickly, but I pushed myself to get the most out of them regardless. The night I spent under thousands of stars deep in our western wilderness. The new year's eve party in Eastern Europe with a girl that I had fallen in love with, but knew I would likely never see again. The months in isolation working toward a dream that, once achieved, brought joy but not ultimate fulfillment.

Whether you're on a weekend getaway with a girl who makes you recall life before "Red Pill" knowledge hardened you to the truths of our reality, taking an amazing vacation that changes your view of the world, planning a reunion with friends from long ago, or starting a new dream job, the only thing that's true about your feelings and fulfillment is that they are not going to last. The sooner you accept this is the sooner that you can appreciate the fleeting and exquisite nature of human experience. You owe it to yourself to realize that nothing is permanent.

How To Control Your Woman’s Diet

September 25, 2013 | by Thomas Andersson | Link | Original Link

She gave me a look I had only witnessed once previously, upon instructing my childhood puppy to cease the consumption of its own excrement. I had just informed my 20-year-old Swedish girlfriend Zandra that her Bacon Double Cheeseburger was spoiling my sexual appetite.

In the early days, I seldom saw her consume anything. At most some strawberries, or if she was feeling particularly peckish a few slices of cucumber on a thin piece of Knäckebröd. I suspect she may have been sneaking in some alternative sources of nutrition (a healthy woman needs between 800 and 1200 calories per day), but never once in front of me.

Like all women, she knew subconsciously that for a man, being forced to watch his woman eat is only marginally less stressful than watching her be sexually devoured by a local cad.

This understanding pleased me, and the resultant 51kg weight on a 5’9″ frame pleased me even more. Hers were the kind of legs that one could wrap around one’s shoulders and minutes later forget that they were up there. Making sweet love to a thin woman as opposed to a thick woman is as stark a difference as driving around an F1 circuit in a Lamborghini versus going around the track in a Volvo.

A few months into the courtship, things took a sudden turn. I grew suspicious of her behavior, disappearing at random intervals for around half an hour at a time. Her skin grew from matte to glossy, and her rib-cage was no longer visible!

I knew something was up. I grew increasingly stressed until one day I found the dispiriting evidence in her waste-basket. A romantic message upon crumpled grease-paper from her new beau. It read: ‘I’m Lovin’ It‘.

She was cheating on me with Ronald McDonald.

I could have callously replaced her, but instead I decided to do what only a decent man who cares about women would do; implement serious measures to control my woman’s diet. Today I share them with you:

1. Criticize Her in Public

It is widely known that our females are often entirely in thrall to the seemingly worthless opinions of her social circle, or even worse, people outside of her social circle.

While this may be an infuriating tendency at times, it can be effectively gamed to yield a positive result. Next time you are in the vicinity of your girl and her friends, start a conversation with one of her inner circle about some trendy health food (I find Goji Berries often works) and end the interaction with "And they're really low in fat too!…..but (Girlfriend's name) would know nothing about that!"

This will cause an estrogenic cluster bomb in the ensuing days, no doubt, but once the fallout subsides and the rough make-up sex is successfully completed, she will have it hard-coded into her memory that you are onto her filthy little eating habit, and you don't like it one bit.

2. Criticise All Fat Women

This is an easy one (and fun too)! If you live in the Western world, any given street will yield a multitude of possible recipients for your critique.

I like to walk my girl past the window of a KFC, point out the most grotesque thing grazing in front of the window and pronounce loudly "look at the state of that." *It's indirect, so your woman has no legitimate case to be offended but it sets an example. If she consumes more calories, men will point at her in the street. And not in a good lecherous way.

Bonus points if the rotund fast-food munching wench hears it too!*

3. Buy Her Some Smaller Clothes

This is a method that has been joked about for years, but all joking aside it works great. Not only that, if you're a sensitive type, this one is unlikely to produce blubbery waterworks.

If her Birthday is coming up soon, go out and get her some high-end attire in an absolute maximum of a US size 2. (See, we're not all Size Zero zealots, girls!). Some important points to note:

- Burn the receipt. I'm not being hyperbolic here, you must reduce it to ash. A fat girl will go as far as scotch taping together the fragments of a shredded receipt in order to return your gift and replace it with a larger size.
- Buy something dainty and fragile. If it's elastic, a tubby lady will use shoe-horns, a crow-bar and WD-40 in order to fit into an under-sized dress. Good luck maintaining your boner as your hand caresses the depressing reality that is 'muffin-top'

4. Steal Her Food

Feminism has brought forth many ills in its rise to power, but there is one benefit to women now behaving like males – we can eat their food!

Gone are the days where a woman's daily indulgence would be a cup of sugary tea and a single glass of wine. I've taken cases of beer, Mozzarella cheese, full-sugar soda and even a box of 12 donuts from a girls fridge over the years. I recommend bringing a shopping bag, but your regular overnight bag should suffice.

This wasn't an act of selfishness, but an act of kindness. My thievery allowed them to remain physically attractive to me for at least a few more weeks.

5. Have ‘The Talk’

If all of these methods fail, it’s time to have The Talk. This won’t be easy, and even the most hard-hearted of you will struggle with this but it’s entirely necessary in such a grave situation.

I sat Zandra down on a park bench on a warm summer’s day just a stone’s throw from the ubiquitous golden arches and told her, “If you go in there, I won’t follow you. I’ll have to leave and I won’t come back“. With tears streaming down her face, she said “OK. I’ll just get something to drink instead”.

Victory arrived soon after in a polystyrene cup filled with low-grade coffee.

Women Don’t Know How To Argue With Logic Or Facts

September 25, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

I do not want to offend you gentlemen. I know some of this is basic knowledge. But I could not help pointing out how stupid some people are, and how unbelievably easy it is to pick apart their arguments. Another day I’ll use my legal skills to show how to really destroy someone in argument, but for now let’s focus on some fun feminist yappings.

Originally I was going to write something about the WNBA and why it even exists. I was watching Monday Night Football and happen to switch to ESPN2 where there was a playoff game between the LA somethings versus the Phoenix something elses. Despite it being a playoff game, the arena was almost empty. Of the fans that actually went to the game — for reasons I will never understand — they are…ahem…a certain type. Almost all the women in the crowd are either fat or have boy haircuts. The few men that are there look like beta husbands of the aforementioned fat/masculine women. One of the refs looks like the marshmellow man from Ghostbusters.

What's The Point?

So I started doing some research into the history of the WNBA, its financials, and essentially try to find a reason why it exists. But I quickly found this guy did a pretty good job in his article last year:

> Despite the challenges, however, the WNBA keeps chugging along resiliently. While it does not make much money, attract many fans or make a lot of headlines, was being popular ever its purpose? Perhaps the league was created not to make a profit but to make a statement.
> Just as women are making advances in politics and education, they are also trying to break the status quo in an industry dominated by testosterone.
> They are here simply to challenge the boys.
> That challenge is ultimately a weak one. Ideology and identity statements make for a nice, fluffy story. But it has created a sport founded upon sand. When you get down to the basics, sports are about entertainment, and women's basketball will always be less spectacular and less appreciated than any show men put on.
> If you want real gender equality, then, you'll have to look somewhere else besides basketball.

The Feminist Response

There were only a handful of comments, but of course the feminist voice was present. And that led me to instead focus my post this week on how amazingly inept these feminists and their supporters are in making arguments, and how easy they are to pick apart. The argument is not based on logic. It is not based on fact. It is not even based on the actual content of what they are criticizing. While an occasional point may be made, it is overwhelmed by the abundance of idiocy.

As I mentioned above since my vocational livelihood is based upon deconstructing arguments, I thought it would be fun to apply it in this realm. Here are some of the comments and why they fail to carry any weight:

Misquoting the source:

This happens a lot more than you would believe. Take a look at Lady Disbelief:

> Unbelievable how you continue to look down upon women in sports. Yeah, I know all about how just a couple of years ago, you slammed women's sports on the radio. Don't you remember the Olympics this summer? The American women have dominated that event and have done a lot more than the men have. More people are tuning into women's basketball now than they ever have. The fact that you see women's sports as here "simply to challenge the boys" is borderline misogynistic.

Her argument is based on the "fact" that the writer looks down upon "women in sports." If she had bothered to read the actual article and not get offended and jump to conclusions at the mere mention of male/female inequality, she would have seen that the writer explicitly stated he does not look down upon women in sports in general, just the WNBA:

> I support women's athletics. Some of my fondest sports memories are of watching Abby Wambach — the pride of my hometown of Rochester, N.Y. — strike headers into the back of the net while leading the U.S. women's soccer team in thrilling runs at both the World Cup and the Olympics. I took a great deal of pride in watching our female Olympians compete this summer.
> So this is not a criticism of women's sports. This is a criticism of women's professional basketball.

It really cannot get any clearer than this. Watch out for those sneaky bitches that try to pull a fast one like this.

The "no evidence" argument:

From the mouth of "Really" we get a comment with no substantiation whatsoever…

> This whole piece stinks of sexism and victim-blaming. Also, if you have to clarify that you're not a misogynist, you probably are. Disappointed the The Hoya continues to give a voice to sexism.

Thank you for that insightful comment. First, a blanket opinion with no explanation on how this conclusion was reached. Next, another argument where she admits it is founded upon an assumption. A remark like this is easy to pick apart, because it is not based on anything whatsoever.

The contradictor:

Anonymous chick writes…

> The first game of the 2012 WNBA Finals sold out. The arena was packed.
> "But the WNBA is neither exciting nor historical."
> Wrong. The first women's basketball game took place in the late 1800s. The league is young but women's basketball has a long history. When the NBA was 16 years old, would you have considered it "historical?"

As one of the other commenters point out, the first game was not sold out. And to add to her inaccuracies, her next set of sentences is self-contradictory. She states that the writer is wrong for saying the WNBA is not historical, as the first female basketball game took place in the 1800s. Even if it did (who knows/cares), that is not the WNBA. As she states herself, the league (referring to the WNBA) is young. Thus the writer's comment of the WNBA not being "historical" is accurate, and confirmed as such by this commenter herself.

The implied rhetorical question:

Hungry chomps at the bit, stating…

> Is it because women's basketball is less entertaining or because the sports media is dominated by men who have the same opinion as you and choose not to give women's basketball the same attention?

Nice try with that supposed rhetorical question. However, the answer is actually the opposite of what you tried to imply. It's because it's less entertaining. Ever wonder why people watch horse racing yet there is no market for tortoise racing?

Apples to Oranges:

Tragic, an appropriate name for this comment, opines…

> Georgetown women's basketball has consistently outperformed the men's team for the past several years yet continue to play in front of meager audiences in McDonough while the losing men enjoy a spectacle in the Verizon Center. Why? Because the women are dismissed from the get-go.

First off, again it's because nobody wants to watch this sport outside those delusioned into thinking the ideal of gender equality should force people to sacrifice entertainment. Blake Griffin was entertaining to watch even before the Clippers were decent. Can't say the same for any WNBA player. More importantly, Tragic's claim that the men's team is "outperformed" by the women's team is flawed as you are comparing two different leagues. Can you say that Arena League Football team (insert any team) "outperformed" even the worst NFL team? Pit them against each other and see who wins. I'm guessing Georgetown's men's team just may be slightly favored against the school's women's team.

Conclusion:

Next time you get hit with a comment by one of these superficially intelligent people, take a step back and analyze. Within a few seconds you should be able to deconstruct the argument with ease.

Don’t Work For A Female Boss

September 26, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

My worst experiences in the professional world all share one thing in common: I reported to a female boss. Talk to most guys (and, frankly, normal women) and they will say the same thing—working for a female boss, or in an environment composed of mostly women, is a descent into an endless abyss of back-biting, passive-aggressiveness, lies, envy, intrigue, subterfuge, manipulation, and drama.

This should come as no surprise. Male leadership—though this is decreasingly the case—is characterized by traits that come naturally to men; things like leading by example, commanding respect through body language and presence, and reason. Female bosses, meanwhile, tend to break into two different camps: those who try to pantomime male leadership and those who fall back on female-style social dynamics in their leadership. Each results in its own brand of shit show.

Female Social Dynamics Leadership

Female-style social dynamics are basically the same tableaux you saw in the hallways of your middle- and high-school, but grafted onto the corporate environment and acted out by adults. Women (and effeminate men) will break into cliques, gossip about everyone, and try to undermine one another, all with a smile on their face and a stream of disingenuous compliments flowing from their mouths.

If, as a masculine guy, you get caught up in this, rest-assured that you’ll quickly be associated with one clique and live and die by that association. Meanwhile, your so-called friends won’t have your back because: (1) women (and manginas) are firmly disloyal and;

(2) you'll always be, as a manly dude, thought of as that much more of an outsider. Female leaders not only fail to put a stop to this type of environment, they actively encourage it and participate in it.

I'll never forget the time—while working in a corporate department where the male-to-fatty ratio was 3:19—I came into the office to find that a new assistant had been hired. The new girl was as hot as her half-Colombian, half-Russian ancestry suggests she was. By the end of the first week, when she asked me for advice on dealing with "the office politics," I couldn't help but tell her the truth. "Remember high school, where the fat and ugly girls hated you for being skinnier and prettier than them? Well, that's exactly what's going to happen to you here." "I'm glad you're confirming it," she said, "I was starting to think the same thing." Despite being, by all appearances, hard working and competent at her job, she was gone within two weeks.

Male Kabuki Leadership

As if that weren't bad enough, female-socialization leadership isn't as bad as it gets. Worst still is the pant-suit-wearing, "Lean In," you-go-girl, make-believe-I'm-a-man-style leadership that's being encouraged by today's popular media. These women, failing to understand the true nature of male leadership, attempt to replicate masculine poise, but end up with little more than aggressive power-tripping. They become plain-and-simple bullies who, rather than commanding respect, command nothing but hate and fear. Both male and female employees, in turn, work to keep their jobs rather to improve the company bottom-line or help their co-workers. Innovation turns into self-preservation.

For every woman who understands that you can be an effective leader while remaining feminine, without resorting to pretending to be a man, and while leaving the hen-house politics on Facebook, there are 99 who fall into one of these two categories.

Of course, the best way to avoid this drama is to avoid working for a female boss altogether. But, in a world where more and more women are given the power over men's livelihoods—a power they rarely wield responsibly—it behooves us to not only understand these tendencies, but ways to work them in our favor.

The Art of Repackaging

September 26, 2013 | by John Fisher | Link | Original Link

The problem with most men nowadays is not that they are not interesting. When you think of it, most people have at least one hobby or passion, and have done at least some notable things in their lives. Most are not couch potatoes who hole up in their basements to play video games and watch porn (even though that could be repackaged too). Here is what the average man has to work with:

- Age around 30
- Income decent enough to live frugally on his own, but not luxuriously
- Enough cooking and homemaking skills to pull through
- Goes to the gym or plays a sport with friends once a week
- Listens to at least one style of music that can be said to define his tastes
- Has traveled within the country a bit, and maybe a bit outside
- Goes out every weekend to get buzzed
- Average height, weight and looks; neither ugly nor pretty
- Has had 3-4 sexual partners

And yet, even though he has no notable flaws—he is not a basement dweller, his teeth are not rotting, he doesn't live in poverty, he is not a virgin—he still comes across as boring. It is a paradoxical thought that can be said to describe most modern men – objectively, they have plenty of interesting things going for them. However, spend an hour with them and they certainly seem boring, as if there was nothing about them could make them stand out in a crowd.

How can that be? While we could rightfully blame women for placing excessive demands from their potential partners, I also believe it is because the average man lacks the art of repackaging. He doesn't know how to present himself in the best possible light so that his weaknesses are minimized and his strengths maximized.

Worse, even if he does know how to do it, he often chooses to forgo it out of some insane sense of romance that he has been taught. While presenting yourself in the best possible light at a job interview would seem natural to everyone, doing the same would often be branded "not being yourself" or even "being deceitful" when at a date. There seems to be some sort of underlying expectation that we should always present our "honest self" for examination by women that appeal to us, even though we understand that "honest self" does not actually exist.

What are these attributes that are subject to repackaging? I will give several examples for attributes that might traditionally be considered positive or negative, but are actually completely relative:

1. You're a construction worker

Bad: You are having a monologue about cement bags, what a pain it is to haul cement bags around the site, and you insist that the other person understand how much you "hate those fing bags"

Average: You simply say that you are a construction worker, but sheepishly add that you are looking for a better job

Good: "I didn't like working there at first because it's a demanding job but hey, it steels you. There really is something about walking down the street after a few years and know that you built that. "

Doesn't seem like something worth mentioning?

2. You don’t have a car

Bad: You apologize in advance for not being able to drive her somewhere. You ask her if she could ever date someone without a personal vehicle.

Average: You say that you don’t have a car, but that you are trying to save up for it.

Good: You don’t mention cars. If it comes up in the conversation, you are open about the fact that you’re preparing to buy a sportbike

3. You’re overweight

Bad: You talk about how much you want to lose weight but no diet works for you, or you express your admiration about her thin figure

Average: You don’t mention it at all, but it shows up in your poor body language and general awkwardness

Good: Some people carry their weight as a burden. Some carry it as a sign of power. To which group would you like to belong? You carry yourself with power and confidence of a sumo wrestler, and make no secret about being a great cook, wine expert or epicurean.

4. You’re divorced

Bad: You talk about how much you miss your ex, or what a bitch she was

Average: You talk about the previous marriage in as much detail as she wants, or mention how difficult it is to be single again

5. You have traveled around Europe for a month

Bad: You enthusiastically describe the occasion when you got shit faced with your buddies in Amsterdam and visited a brothel

Average: You provide technical, boring details of the journey, such as how much a ticket cost or what you ate for breakfast, and finish up with “there’s not much to say, really”

Good: You draw her in with an emotional description of a historical site from WWII, talk about interesting people you’ve met, discuss peculiarities of foreign languages (particularly words that sound like your language or mean something in your language), show her a few photos on your phone and finally invite her to see some souvenirs back at your place.

6. You have not traveled outside the country at all

Bad: You express your hatred of foreigners, other countries, and engage in sour grapes about not being able to travel

Average: You admit that you have never traveled and say that you are saving up to go somewhere

Good: You know that you don't need to personally visit a country to know interesting things about it (especially weird customs) or have knowledge of its panoramas and sights. You also comment on her travels with a focus on how something made her feel.

7. Your height is average or below average

Bad: You ask her if she minds the fact you are shorter than her/only 5, 10 or 15 cm taller than her (i.e. your height difference is less than what women would expect from a tall guy), and immediately inquire if she has ever dated someone of your height.

Average: You don't mention it, but your poor body language and general awkwardness betray your anxiety about not living up to her expectations.

Good: You know that Bruce Lee was 167 cm tall and have a confident body language and/or a toned body. You are fearless about the fact that you might have to stand on your toes to kiss her and don't let that stop you from escalating and touching her as usual. If she mentions your height, you add "Don't worry, I'm tall where it matters" and wink.

The first thing people notice about this short guy: psycho stare

8. You’re a virgin or sexually inexperienced

Bad: You whine and moralize over guys who have had many sexual partners to make it clear that you are not like them, or spin a sob story about how no woman wants to be with you

Average: You state that you have no experience and are then defensive about the matter, with explanations like “I’m just waiting for the right one”, “Yeah, but I know enough” and “There’s nothing wrong with me.”

Good: You just don’t talk about it and behave as if you were experienced. She is not likely to be able to tell the difference. This is an area where only irrational self- confidence is going to work. If she forces you to talk about it, use the agree & amplify technique and jump on her thought with something funnily exaggerated like: “As you can see, it’s because I have no sense of humor and no personality whatsoever.”

9. You’re too young/old (the age gap between you is higher than socially acceptable)

Bad: You apologize for being of wrong age and ask her to still consider you

Average: You suck up to her with phrases like “Love can overcome any difference”, or do weird things to show her how young at heart or mature you are.

Good: You tease her about being too young and inexperienced for you (if she’s younger), or not being able to keep up with you (if she’s older). You deflect her hesitation with humor. For example, you’re 29 and she’s 22 and he says “I have never dated anyone older than 25”, smile and add: “Yeah, neither have I.”

10. You have a geeky or unusual hobby

Bad: You apologize for collecting model airplanes/leaves/insects/postal stamps/coins/video games/comics, and promise that you don’t spend that much time on it. You strangle the conversation with technical details about the hobby and emphasize that you could give it up if she minded.

Average: You talk moderately about the hobby, indulging her interest, and allow her to qualify you with questions like “how many hours a week you spend that way”. See the famous Magic the Gathering champion Jon Finkel’s incident for an example.

Good: You qualify her to see if she is open-minded or awesome enough to keep up with your hobby or understand the passion behind partaking in it. There is no hobby in the world that cannot be spun in a positive light… well, except Satanic child sacrifice. On second thought, Charles Manson had lovers and groupies so even that doesn’t seem to be beyond the power of repackaging.

The contents of the package are subject to point of view

Now, notice this important fact: in 90% of the repackaging cases I described here, there is no cover-up, misdirection or lying. Instead, how each attribute is perceived depends only on how the man chooses to present it. An average and insignificant attribute – such as being slightly overweight – can come across as either endearing or creepy. Is the jovial man who carries his weight with confidence less overweight than the lazy slob who talks about dieting? Of course not! If you measure both, you will find that they both have the same BMI. There is no objective difference between them, yet how they are perceived is worlds apart.

Realizing this truth is like understanding the green waterfall code of the Matrix – it is the realization that many facts do not exist until they are actually presented. They exist in all potential states at once and their outcome depends only on the way in which the man deals with them. We might call it “Schroedinger’s fact”.

Other than being relaxed cheerful about your shortcomings (and strengths) right from the start, remember to always repackage things in a positive way. Positive emotion usually trumps negative. While “just be positive” is usually just an empty phrase, this is one of the rare occasions where it actually can do a lot of good for you. And remember: what is inside your package depends on you alone.

The Art Of The Approach: Part 2

My last article covered the mindset and attitude that one needs in order to be successful in approaching girls. Today's article is a guide on the practical side of the approach, a nuts-n-bolts breakdown.

One of the myths of game that has been purpotrated for a longass time is that you can approach ANY girl and get her in bed if your game is tight. Hold the fuck on a minute. It's impossible to pull every single girl you approach. Some will simply not be into you physically, despite your game, some will be married and loyal to their hubbys, some will not like your shoes and nothing you say can change her mind. That's ok. Who the fuck wants to be with a girl who you have to convince to that extent that she should be with you? It's a waste of time.

I'm going to let in you in a little secret that will increase your successful approach rate by ALOT. You ready?

Get an IOI (Indicator of Interest) from her BEFORE approaching

The casual eye glance that lingers on you, the moving her and her friends closer to you on the dance floor, the talking loudly for no apparent reason but to get your attention, and of course the ever trusty hair flip and 'fuck me' eyes that a girl may give you.

Now you might think that getting an IOI BEFORE you approach isn't game. Wrong. It's knowing how to maximize your potential until you're a magnet for the girls who are MOST into you. The girl who is already attracted to you, or interested in you will be MUCH easier to game then the girl you walk up to who has shown you NO interest. Later after you've become better you can focus on approaching the girls who are not displaying interest and pulling them. Also, the girl who shows you IOI's initially is the girl who you have a much better chance of having a ONS with. Fact.

Let's use a club as an example.

After skipping the line and not paying cover because you utilized the Club Lock-Down outlined in my book, you make one pass around the club, hit the bathroom and then post up at the bar. In your initial pass around the club spreading good energy, what did you do? Oh that's right, you made Soft Approaches. By high-fiving girls, making quick comments and being upbeat and having an authoritative presence, you already made it known that you're a fun guy and a man of high value. You set the Framework for your Hard Approaches.

As you post up at the bar, you notice a couple of different girls checking you out, dancing closer and giving you the eye. As Shakespeare would say, "The Stage is set so go and pull the lass into your lair". Half the work is now done. These are your targets.

Now, I want you to understand something: You must crawl before you can walk and you must walk before you can run. If you're new to game, do NOT expect to hit the club and start pulling 9′s and 10′s. Unless you have extremely good looks and natural charisma you will be blown out. You have to start somewhere and no that doesn't mean you have to nail 4′s and 5′s, but your initial Middle Ground is 6′s-8′s. These are the 'easiest' girls and the ones where you will practice. Call them Practice Girls. Once you're great at those, you can start focusing on 8+'s.

As you pick a target who's giving you the eye, now is the time to remember the Greatest Pick-Up Line In The World: "Hi, I'm Christian…" (wink/half smirk)

What?! But it can't be? It's that simple? Yes. In the club guys are CONSTANTLY dropping bullshit pick-up lines to the point where it's completely been done a million times and it's ineffective. By being a normal fucking man and giving her a greeting with your name, you're establishing Confidence and Frame with the girl.

Confidence: By stating your name, you're already being open with her about something regarding you. Now it could be a fake name, but it doesn't matter, she doesn't know that.

You have to remember, she doesn't know you from Adam, so some comfort building is necessary.

Frame: You're setting a no-nonsense tone from the get-go. If you truly want to get great at having one night stands, then learn to cut the bullshit and eliminate steps that will only drag out the process and kill the momentum of taking the girl home the first night.

After you've introduced yourself to her, now is the time you can drop something witty or clever.

Examples:

"Is this guy really a dj? My fucking ears are bleeding" (opens a whole stream of topics regarding music etc etc)

"I noticed you staring at me…I know it's not everyday you see a guy this good looking" (Funny if you're NOT good looking and if you are good looking say it with a smile so she knows you don't take yourself to serious. Self-deprecation is ok, but in SMALL doses. Better to be Cocky then a Clown)

"You do know it's rude to stare right?" (It's flirty, puts her on the spot and she will probably shit-test you at this point. Hold fast and firm that she was staring at you)

There's a million different replies to her and responses she'll give you, however, the ONLY way to become a master at approaching, is what Roosh has advocated for years and I have concurred: get in the trenches and approach your ass off. Get out to the club and approach until your legs fall off.

Next week I will cover approaching in Starbucks, on your campus and in non-party environments. If you haven't yet, do yourself a favor and check out my book: Night Club Bible.

A Great Date Idea That You May Not Have Thought Of

September 27, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

A New Idea

Sometimes it is hard to come up with creative ideas and things to do with women. The usual dates such as dinner or movies have become the realm of the beta and the omega. Hitting up the the club or the bar for dancing and drinks has almost reached Groundhog Day status with me. I came across a new activity to do with women almost by accident and its opportunities and prospects are lucrative.

While seducing a particular lady in a particular locale, I noticed there was a miniature golf course down the street. After finishing my meeting over coffee I told her I'd see her for a round of golf the next day. She informed me that she didn't play golf. I told her I was referring to the miniature golf course and to be there at 1 o'clock. To make a long story short, I came in first and then I came in first again later.

While some can say planning miniature golf is juvenile, tell them you care what they think. It's one of those secret ideal date locations. It allows you to observe the woman from all angles. It makes it hard for her to hide her flaws. You can see how she walks, bends over, and carries herself. It helps weed out the crypto-muffintops, drug addicts, and out of shape people. Also, commanding the woman to adhere to the rules of the course is a good way to gauge her femininity. This is a two way street though, so make sure you're in shape and looking good in your clothes.

Advantages

Playing 18 holes of miniature golf allows you to dial up or down the intensity of the date. Maybe you misjudged a woman's appearance in the dim light of the bar before but a second look in the sun changes your mind about her. The 18th hole is a definite end to allow you to have a clean break if you need to eject. It also gives you the opportunity to admire a well formed butt surreptitiously or not surreptitiously, depending on your level of caddishness. It also allows her to feel that she spent a lot of time with you, building up that comfort level to a bang.

Surprisingly the conversation is less scripted and the usual bar scene bitch defenses are lowered in a playful environment. She will be more forthcoming in revealing details about herself that she would normally be guarded about. She might let a few cats out of the bag about being a single mommy, recovering slut, or some other deal breakers.

Conclusion

The only possible con to miniature golf is a woman may see you as immature but you can parlay that in your favor. Miniature golf is relatively cheap so one does not have to worry about wasting money on a bang. I find miniature golf highly entertaining, so if the woman is a dud, the outing is not a total loss. So add the putt putt to your repertoire at least once and see if it works for you.

How Buddhism Can Help Your Game

September 28, 2013 | by Le coq | Link | Original Link

My relationship with Buddhism began when I was born. I can recall, even as a child, a deep state of dissatisfaction with my life and the world around me. I always knew something was wrong, but I couldn't put my finger on it.

In my social interactions at school, everything felt forced to me. I felt incredibly different which lead to feelings of alienation and loneliness. Other kids would crack jokes and I would force myself to laugh or smile at them because that's what other kids did and I wanted to fit in.

I was (and probably still am) what you might call an outlier, or fringe element of society. The town I grew up in was extremely homogenous. Primarily white, Christian, and very cliquey. It seemed everyone knew each other through church, youth group, or other wholesome organizations and activities. To say I didn't fit in would be an understatement.

One day, in my high school English class, we were assigned to read and critique Siddhartha by Hermann Hesse. It didn't take very long for me to really get into the book, and I started reading things that were forming connections and leaving profound feelings within me.

The descriptions of Siddhartha's dissatisfaction with his affluent lifestyle and his ensuing path of self-discovery immediately grabbed me. I felt like I was getting a taste of something familiar, but I wasn't sure what. An answer, an explanation, a little piece of something with which I could finally relate. Imagine my frustration when we were asked in class to give an analytical summary of the book's plot. Here I was, having some mild epiphanies about my own experiences and feelings up to that point in life, and the teacher was insistent on discussing literary devices. My alienation grew, and I started to see the education system for what it was; an ongoing regurgitation of information with no real lessons learned or knowledge imparted.

Regardless, those first tastes of introspection stuck with me. I had a natural orientation toward the internal world. I was curious about the human mind and soul, what made them tick, and if there was such a thing, the science behind all of it. This curiosity naturally led me through a pretty extensive party and drug experimentation phase. I met some like minded people, some “cosmic wanderers” if you will, and we established a little counter-culture apartment in the middle of this boring, conformist town.

Enter Buddhism

The natural progression of this lifestyle eventually led me to Buddhism. What immediately struck me was the scientific quality to applied Buddhist practice. Instead of getting on one’s knees and praying to a big man in the sky, I was learning to meditate, to quiet my thoughts, to focus, to shut my body down mentally and physically. Here was a system that prescribed various practices; sit like this, avert your gaze to this degree, breath this way, and you do all of it and strange things started to happen. By following some simple steps in meditation, I started having some profound experiences. I learned a great deal about discipline and myself. I gained a greater understanding of the four noble truths and the eightfold path, and how to apply them to my life.

What Buddhism didn’t teach me, however, was game. All of this meditating and compassion was getting me nowhere with women. I always had a girlfriend around, but I was miserable in these relationships. The kindness, understanding, and patience I was giving them was not being reciprocated, and if anything was only provoking anger from their frantic, convoluted minds. After years of Buddhist practice, I also felt that I was forcing too much and getting ahead of myself. The meditations started getting really out there. I was spending a lot of time in my “inner space” and I started to question if it was really necessary or benefitting me as much as it used to.

Or, more poetically, “You cannot force a snake to shed its skin. It must be shed of its own accord.” In Buddhism there is what’s called the Middle Path; that you do not drop away from this world, lost in meditative bliss, but you also don’t lean equally hard into “worldliness” which breeds greed and materialism.

I Became More Worldly

I became more job oriented, making money, and indulged in more shallow pursuits. I spent time in bars and pursued casual sex. And, ever the perfectionist, I realized I wasn't nearly as good at it as I wanted to be. I started looking into seduction techniques. And during all of it, I kept the Buddhist "witness" in the back of my head. I kept that little voice that kept me from getting lost in worldliness, giving me little reminders of the internal world that I carried with me.

After reading several different seduction gurus, I settled on Roosh, simply because I appreciated the direct language he used. His tone was very scientific and causal, which greatly appealed to me. Over the course of several years, dating several women and having numerous casual sex partners, I started to notice the funniest things… the same techniques that apply to game are absolutely rooted in, of all things, Buddhism.

And the number one element of it all is this: detachment. Detach yourself from your mind, your body, and even your soul. Detach yourself from your ego. Detach yourself from potential outcomes. Detach from fortune and misfortune, from happiness and sadness. Learn to observe your emotions from a distance, as if watching waves rising and falling on the ocean's horizon. Many people new to Buddhism struggle with detachment, thinking: "Well I don't want to suppress my desires. I LIKE wanting things!" Detachment does not mean suppression. Consider these three scenarios:

1. You are angry.

You validate your anger through environmental stimulus, giving external reasons as to why you are angry. The anger consumes you and drives you to act upon that anger.

2. You are angry but clench your teeth and fists, driving the anger deep inside.

After time, the anger subsides but manifests itself in other, more passive-aggressive ways. Emotions are like air in a pressure chamber; they must be released eventually

3. You are angry but "you" are not angry.

You OBSERVE yourself being angry, you feel the heat on the back of your neck and you observe the thoughts in your brain that manifest this anger. Somewhere in deep inside, you laugh, bemused, thinking, "Ah, so this is anger."

The Buddhist response, naturally, is #3. Detachment does not mean suppressing your desires. You want sex. You want comfort. You want food and water. You want companionship. But you do not attach yourself to these desires. You do not attach yourself to outcomes. You allow yourself to approach women and be rejected. You observe your ego being hurt by her rejection. You observe and allow, but you do not invest your deeper self.

I found my foundation of Buddhism helped me immensely with approaching, meeting, and dating women. I no longer attached myself to the bullshit outcomes that we are programmed to expect. I no longer expected loyalty, romance, or fairness. Now, the downside of all this is I started to see women for what they really are. Without my childish projections, the romance was pretty much toast. I became dismayed at what I observed, but ultimately what I attained was liberation. I experienced the freedom to really see things, to get that rare honest glimpse into humanity. This was my red-pill process.

Digging Deeper Into Buddhism

We can see that Buddhism applies to game in other ways. Let's look at the Four Noble truths (roughly translated):

1. The truth that suffering exists
2. The truth of the origin of that suffering
3. The truth of separating oneself from that suffering
4. The truth of the path leading to that separation from suffering

It may seem redundant, but let's apply those four truths to game:

1. Accept dissatisfaction over your own dating life
2. Understand why your dating life is dissatisfying
3. Separating yourself from the negative causes of that dissatisfaction
4. Finding the path that leads to a satisfying dating life

Through this filter, an entire world opens up for guys trying to find their own happiness. It's a simple exercise in identifying positive and negative factors in one's life. Taking the 4th Noble Truth even further, we can move onto the Eightfold Path, which is an elaboration of the 4th Noble Truth.

The Eightfold Path is a prescription of sorts for "right living". How to live life that eases our suffering, increases compassion, and increases our quality of life.

The Eightfold path can be interpreted many different ways, but it absolutely applies to game. Some of you might think, “Well, manipulating women isn’t very compassionate.” That’s where honesty comes in. One of the greatest things I learned from Buddhism is the ability to be honest, no matter how offensive or abrasive. The truth will indeed set you free. I learned to tell women, “I’m not interested in an emotional relationship with you.” And “I don’t consider you a suitable life partner.”

The most amazing things happened: they listened. They internalized. And it happened like that because I wasn’t arguing. I wasn’t presenting opinions or conjecture. I was giving them truth, which surpasses the realm of “good and bad”. Women respect truth more than anything else. Compassion towards women comes in the form of honesty. Compassion doesn’t mean kneeling before women or treating them as naturally superlative human beings. Compassion means being honest with your desires, expectations, and disappointments.

The Eightfold path covers nearly all ground. Resist evil means resisting materialism. Resist the false pursuits that women direct toward you. Resist drama and manipulation.

Right action means giving back. If you make it to your 30s with a little fortune and happiness on your side, chances are it means you have some people to be grateful for. Give back.

Right intention means maintaining a positive vibe. It means keeping a playful and carefree spirit.

At this stage of the game, at the age of 32, I do my best to keep on the “middle” path in life and with women. I’m not 100% invested in my career, and I’m not abandoning everything to go meditate on top of a hill for the rest of my life. I’m somewhere in between. I’m not married, but I’m not looking to score a one-night stand every week of my life. I’m somewhere in between.

You can swing hard in many directions in life, you can indulge in hard drug trips, crazy sex experiences, thrilling adventures, you can experience the highs of financial wealth or the lows of absolute ruin, you can break 10 hearts and then get yours broken, and so on. I highly recommend you do it all, but they all often come accompanied with despair; the highs fade, reality sets in, remorse and emotional pain abound. Highs bring lows. It’s important to experience those things and experience life, but when it’s all over I feel it’s important to know true happiness; deep happiness that is unwavering in the drama (karma) of life.

For that deeper happiness, look toward the middle path.

I Hope They Serve Beer In The Cloud

September 28, 2013 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

If you haven't heard of the cloud, you've been living under a rock. Over past years, this has become all the rage of the technology world. We are slowly being completely surrounded by clouds of all shapes and sizes; as they collapse around us and force us into their depths. Every major company has a cloud in the sky these days. Apple's iCloud. Microsoft's Skydrive. Google Cloud/Drive/Docs. Even on large-scale business enterprise platforms are providing cloud services, with companies like EMC, Commvault, Symantec, etc entering the arena.

Today, let's discuss today's impact of the cloud on users like us, and where it could be taking us.

Everyday Use

At its core, “the cloud” is really just a synonym for the Internet. When data is stored in the cloud, it’s stored on the Internet. Not locally to your hard drive. Privacy, anyone?

If I bring my laptop home from work, it’s a matter of 30 seconds for me to log in and access all of my work files. I simply VPN into the company network, and presto!—all of my files, virtual machines, and company networks are available to me. In college, I lost track of how many times groups would work together on one large Google Doc in preparation for a test. Granted, there were the freeloaders like me who would just let everyone else finish the guide; technologies like these probably haven’t helped our overall laziness as a society.

There is no doubt that cloud data storage has its place. The ease of transferring files between computers, phones, tablets, etc from anywhere in the world with an Internet connection is incredibly efficient.

Where We're Going

Basic cloud computing and data storage is probably a bigger part of your life than you realize. Use Dropbox to transfer things between computers? Use Google Docs to help study for exams? You'll note that now, it's primarily DATA being stored. However, applications are starting to be run from a cloud interface now, as well. Facebook is a type of cloud service. You upload the data to it, and the application runs off of that data. In no way whatsoever is "Facebook" stored on your local computer. More than likely, applications will continue to be pushed to cloud interfaces over time.

The question I ask is, how far does it go?

Theoretically Speaking

Let’s say you’re a Windows kind of guy. Right now, you’ve got Windows 7 Home Premium running on your Dell laptop. Think about your entire operating system, Windows 7, running off a cloud system from Microsoft. Will computers eventually become such a bare bone that you actually log into a cloud to access your core operating system and its files? If that is the case, then all of your personal documents would be stored there as well.

I, for one, can’t imagine a life without having my data locally accessible. It’s nice to know that even if I were to unplug from the Internet, I could still access my basic photos, music, videos, etc. Storing everything in an online space, where the ownership and rights of said data becomes cloudy (see what I did there?), simply seems like a slower, and less secure way of running everything. Then you have to be trusting of these large companies to house your data, but it’s not like it’s private anyways.

My concern is, if it is more profitable for the technology giants of the world, eventually they will all push this upon us until we have no choice. Technology moves so fast you constantly are in a state of uphill battle if you want to keep up. If all companies push this kind of system upon us, what choice do we have but to conform to it? Perhaps we are just at the mercy of these corporate giants, and they will just pull us in whatever direction they see themselves making the most dough.

“I Want” Is Not Good Enough

September 29, 2013 | by Mark Ford | Link | Original Link

At least 90% of the time when someone begins a sentence with “I want … ” I immediately decide to ignore everything else they are about to say.

Here are some things that everyone in the world wants (and much fewer have):

- To be popular, charming and respected
- To have plenty of money
- To be intelligent
- To own their own time
- To be really physically fit, functionally and aesthetically
- To be properly satisfied with their relationships / sex life

I don’t believe a single person in the world would honestly turn down a no-strings-attached, effort-free upgrade in any of those areas if you offered it to them.

Apologies, I’ve just spotted a typo in my previous assertion: these are things that most people in the world wish for, and a select minority want (and even fewer have).

Saying “I want … “ implies…

- A desire strong enough that the expected reward outweighs the expected effort
- The stated target is realistic (in the sense that it can certainly be achieved with enough application, irrespective of whether or not it’s a simple or easy outcome)

Under such conditions, people take consistent action, learn from their mistakes and eventually get what they want.

Saying “I wish … “ implies:

- EITHER a desire not strong enough that the expected reward outweighs the expected effort, and thus a tacit acknowledgement that the only real obstruction is self-discipline (eg. “I’m fat, I wish I could lose weight”)
- OR a fantastic aspiration that falls outside the “I want … “ category (eg. “I wish I could live forever”)

Too many people substitute the latter for the former, and brand themselves with my mental “Do not take seriously” sticker. I’ll cut everyone in the first world some slack before age 16, as until that point most people are legitimately restricted by their parents, self-awareness, peers and society – but after that the clock starts ticking. By age 21, first world citizens (no, this doesn’t apply to North Koreans, comment troll deflected) have had 5 years to get at least a couple of the things they “want”, but dismal few have even managed a single one. By age 26, a whole decade of potential has been seized (or more likely, wasted) and by age 31 every first world citizen has had more than ample chance to complete the whole list.

Who makes up the less than 10% of people who don’t make me tune out after “I want… “? For these people, I listen attentively and take mental notes.

- Children under 16 (I agree with the saying “Adults only ask children what they want to be when they grow up because they’re looking for ideas”)
- 16 – 21 year olds that demonstrably have at least 1-2 of the items on my 6 point list above
- 21 – 26 year olds that have at least 2-3 items on my 6 point list
- 26 + year olds with at least 4-5 items on my 6 point list
- 31+ year olds with the whole list (the best ones do, and the rest of the switched on ones never shoot off about all the stuff they “want”)

It’s incredible if you pay attention how often people talk about what they “want”. Even better it’s an incredibly effective way of filtering out potential friends and mentors from the mob. Bait the topic of current aspirations with “You seem like a cool guy / girl that’s got it together, where do you see your life heading?” if needed. I recommend this model as an initial framework for those who don’t already have a conscious list of what makes someone worth listening to. Food for thought for those who do. Assume slacker until proven achiever.

The Gibson Girls Of The Gilded Age

This is the second installment of a multi-part series about the evolution, or devolution, of the American woman throughout the arc of American history. Click here for the first installment here.

The Gilded Age in America followed directly on the heels of the Civil War that lasted up until the assassination of President William McKinley. It is a widely misunderstood era, as serious rumblings began with regards to the changes in society – many of it dominated by female voices. It was referred to as the Gilded Age because a thin veneer of gold lined the serious, festering problems of wider society. The 1950's wasn't the height of patriarchal approaches to family, leadership and society in general – it was the last gasp. The Gilded Age was the zenith of patriarchal society in America, with storm clouds slowly but surely gathering of the horizons of North America.

First off, the 1850's were a tumultuous period in American history as the country teetered on the verge of civil war. A handful of ineffective American Presidents were elected who did little to stave off what would eventually erupt in a bloody and costly civil war. When Lincoln was elected in 1860 it all but assured Southern secession. The war ended four years later, with North winning a decisive victory; Lincoln himself was assassinated the next year. This setup of events leads to the Gilded Age – an age of unprecedented American economic growth and social transformation.

Consider the massive influx of European immigrants into the country. Irish, Italians, Brits, Germans and all manner of Scandinavian flooded the country. They did for many different reasons – mostly related to chasing wealth in the US. This was a time of rapid urbanization and immigrants flocked to the cities, looking to work for factories. Urban centers became hotbeds of disorganization, crime and poverty. Modern approaches to urban planning and policing came out of this era. Many moved West and formed communities all over the country, often taking to farming as indigenous Americans were more keen to move to urban areas. This created much racial and cultural strife, most especially for the Irish and Italians. Times were tense and two marked depressions struck the country – in 1873 and 1893. As such, issues like monetary policy and tariffs were huge political issues.

What was going on with sex relations is more fascinating than the rapid urbanization. There are two categories of female that competed against one another in this age: the "New Woman" and the Gibson girl. The "New Woman" was the literal embodiment of the primitive feminist. White, middle class and upper class and college educated, they were the founders of modern feminism. Many of them never married and never had kids. They flocked to urban areas, as there can be no feminism on a farm. They enjoyed increased employment opportunities during this era, contrary to mainstream feminist thought.

Women regularly were typists, telephone dispatchers, worked as secretaries and, in some states, worked in the civil service. They championed looser sexual mores, but were far more discreet about it than later generations. Also, understand the legal concept of coveture – whereby a woman gives up her legal rights to her husband upon marriage. If a woman remained unmarried, her right to own property and contract were maintained. Not marrying was a way of retaining legal rights that might otherwise get extinguished.

The champion of this sort of woman was Victoria Woodhull. Born into poverty, she worked her way up the ladder and became rich and engaged in a variety of activities. She married at 14 to a 28 year-old who was by all accounts a very charming doctor, but he turned out to be a raging alcoholic and a serial womanizer. As usual, a woman with serious psychological issues becomes a feminist pioneer.

She founded the first female-run Wall Street brokerage firm with her sister and they were financially successful. She was the first female candidate for the Presidency, running under the Equal Rights party. She also was the first woman to advocate for “free love” for women. Based on her experiences in her first (of three) marriages, she concluded people (women) should have the universal ability to marry, divorce and get custody of the children – with maintenance (alimony), of course. Despite her professed love for monogamy, she said people personally reserved the right to “love others exclusively” outside the marriage.

In contrast to “New Women” were Gibson girls. The term Gibson girl was coined in 1892 (towards the end of the era) by Charles Dana Gibson, as he saw the Gibson girl as emblematic of the beauty reflected in the era. She was tall, skinny with “ample bosom and buttocks.” This woman did incorporate some of the “New Woman’s” ways while trying to maintain some sense of tradition. She was considered to be upper-class, refined, educated and sensitive. However, she broke traditional convention, as she could be seen working out in public, like biking. She typically eschewed campaigning for women's suffrage or any political movements. She would most likely be whispering in husband's ear about the changes she wants to see in society or starting or helping in charities, the church or just general social betterment.

She was seen as not usurping masculinity nor male roles, but carefully sought out to expand her world. She sought to be more worldly, intelligent and to help her community in roles outside her home. Part of this impetus was urbanization and the strict gender role divide that emerged. Note that in rural farming communities, a level of equality exists as there is too much work for a woman to just sit around and dust the house – she has to feed livestock, tend to the yard and all manner of other stuff. The wage earning male that leaves a woman behind to tend to the home makes her restless. Plus, considering these women had excess income to hire nannies, tutors and maids, it makes sense they could get bored. As usual, these women assumed their grievances were universal to all women.

The final important point was the development of the concept of the "domestic goddess." These women helped play up these roles, as they wanted more and more accolades for their domestic endeavors. Further, the men (betas) of the era sought to edify these women. Common complaints about the era involved men fawning over the beauty of women, as such fawning treated women as objects. Further, there were complaints of sexism about "domestic goddess" concept. The important takeaway is that the home was seen the under the control of a "domestic goddess," while work outside the home was seen as best under the control of a male. Pure gender role division.

However, Gibson girls emphasized propriety, marriage and refinement in women. She helped popularize the corset and started and aided in many important charities in cities across the nation. Like the above picture, they began to belittle men. They would run cartoons like this one, showing men to be weak, ineffective and impotent. They referred to themselves as equals to men and sometimes considered themselves to be the snarky sidekick to their husband. They liked to portray men as impotent fools. Their growing distaste for American men is palpable. It's almost as if when men give women what they claim to want they immediately begin to resent the men who give into their demands.

Once again, this sort of social setup reeks of privilege. These women were fairly close to or at the apex of society. Of course, they could afford to be single and not reproduce. For the “New Women,” they depended on poor women and Gibson girls to keep up fertility rates so they didn’t have too. As for Gibson girls, they didn’t step outside the box, but backed up right against it. They flirted with stepping across the line, but ultimately did not. However, they helped pave the way for feminism to penetrate into society.

Women will always—once a degree of comfort and wealth is accumulated as a society—demand “free love” and be allowed to indulge their hypergamic impulses. It will start at the top of society and trickle down the poorest, once welfare programs are established that allow for a woman to have a husband’s income with no husband. Women will call it “helping the poor” but I think part of the impulse is helping other women achieve hamster transcendence and allow her to have two distinct men in her life – providers and alphas. Of course, she may know the provider as a husband or not, as he is just a taxpayer. In this era, there were not many federal or state programs to help women, but part of this is that women who decided to go without marriage went without children. Per usual, poor women who worked still had many children.

Notice how generous women are with men’s money. In the Gilded Era, men made the money that went to taxes. There was no federal income tax and the jobs women did often did not produce much tax revenue. Women shamelessly spent men’s money on all sorts of pet projects that allowed them to self-aggrandize. Most resources I read about these women seemed to be reverential of generosity women displayed.

A rich guy in the era founds a university? Greedy 1%er better cough up the damn money.

A rich guy’s wife founds a soup kitchen? Women really are the morally superior sex.

In sum, privileged women began to haltingly assemble the machinery of feminism. They helped alter fashion and social standards. Most importantly, they helped establish the idea of the domestic goddess and a woman’s moral superiority. This idea is very relevant to today, as this idea has seeped into any institution in which women have sought access. American women, of all ideological stripes, consider themselves morally superior to men and this era was an important step towards cementing that mindset.

Revisiting The Duke Rape Case

September 30, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

On March 13, 2006, a party was held at an off-campus house owned by Duke University. In attendance were members of Duke's lacrosse team. Some of the players contacted an escort service named Allure and requested that two strippers to be sent to the house. When the two strippers (Crystal Mangum and Kim Roberts) arrived, some of the students made it clear that the strippers were not the physical types they had asked for. An argument ensued between some of the students and the girls; insults of various types were exchanged, and the two girls left.

Mangum, 27 years old at the time, had been working at strip clubs on and off since 2002. By her own admission, she had been drinking alcohol and had ingested a muscle relaxant called Flexeril before arriving at the lacrosse players' house. She had a history of mental problems and consumption of a wide variety of medications and mood-stabilizers. She had been previously convicted of stealing a car, and was arrested in 2002 for stealing a cab and leading police on a high-speed chase. When 18 years old in 1996, she had told police that she had been raped by three men (for which she never provided corroborating details). A security guard at Mangum's strip club claimed that Mangum, after the party, stated her intention of wanting to "get money" from the Duke boys who had not paid her.

Crystal Mangum, the despicable liar whose false allegations launched the case.

Roberts and Mangum sped away from the party in their car, and became involved in a heated argument. Mangum refused to leave the car; Roberts called police for help; and Mangum was taken away to a substance abuse facility. At this point she began to claim she had been raped at the party by "white" students. In an instant, the tried-and-true racial genies were conjured up for the self-serving purposes by an opportunist and a liar. Knowing what flags to wave and what accusations would stick, she hit the launch button on what would become a terrible drama. A medical examination done at Duke University Medical Center did not find any injuries consistent with her claims of forcible rape.

After Mangum made her accusations, a terrifying sequence of events began to unfold, seemingly unstoppable, yet guided by the invisible hands of the powerful; and an avalanche of lies and innuendo obscured the most basic questions that should have been asked in any criminal investigation. Durham Couny District Attorney Mike Nifong ordered DNA samples to be taken of the entire lacrosse team, even students who were not present. When the test results failed to connect any team members with Mangum, Nifong had additional tests done at another laboratory. The results of the second battery of tests were distorted and suppressed by Nifong and the lab director, Brian Meehan. Nifong informed the court and the public that DNA had been found from only one male, Mangum's boyfriend. This was a lie.

In fact, the lab reports showed the DNA of at least four or five unidentified males in Mangum's pubic area, rectum, and underwear. Nifong knew this at the time. The DNA report given to the students' defense attorneys was incomplete and misleading, in that it contained no information about the exculpatory evidence. Prosecutors have an ethical duty to disclose exculpatory evidence to the defense. He suppressed this evidence. Meehan later admitted that the doctored DNA report was against his lab's regular policy, but tried to explain it away by stating that he and Nifong did not want to "involve" any other persons.

Unbelievable.

By this time, an army of attention-seekers, race-baiters, demagogues, guttersnipes, clowns, and knaves had begun to pontificate about the case. The Duke students were subjected to harassment, vilification, and outright threats from all quarters.

The arrival of "journalists" at the sites of the latest scandals-du-jour are so routine by now that we could almost write their boilerplate editorials and speeches in our sleep. Almost all voices were united in condemning the students, who were assumed to be guilty. Journalists, almost all of them feminists, white knights, and manginas, worked themselves into a red-faced, froth-mouthed frenzy in attacking the "culture of privilege" supposedly displayed by the Duke students, their "frat-boy mentality", and similar imagined social bugbears.

In April, 2006, two lacrosse players, Collin Finnerty and Reade Seligmann were arrested. In May, David Evans, a former player, was arrested and indicted. The charges included forcible rape, sexual offense, and kidnapping. With blinding speed, and sensing the way the political winds were blowing, the institutions that could have stopped the railroading—the school, the hospital, the police, and the city—stood by in silence or actively helped to serve the students up to Nifong's prosecutorial meat grinder.

In a civil lawsuit filed in 2008, after the criminal case had collapsed, the students alleged (in a two hundred page civil petition) a shocking litany of collusion and corruption between Nifong, the medical center, and Duke University. Defendants named in the civil suit were the school, the hospital, the police, and the city. The suit was settled this year (2013), but the terms have not been disclosed.

As the summer months of 2006 ground on, and as media attention reached a frenzy, the falsity of the entire case began to become more and more obvious. Mangum's story had so many inconsistencies and incredibilities that even Nifong's double-talk and stammering in front of the news cameras could not conceal them. The photo identification process used to help Mangum identify the "perpetrators" was exposed as a sham, as the officers conducted it improperly. An alibi witness for one of the accused students was also apparently intimidated by police.

The superb lawyering of the students' attorneys was instrumental in cutting through the lies and obfuscation that Nifong, Mangum, and their enablers had created. In motion after motion, holes and inconsistencies in the case were highlighted. Nifong refused to relent. He dismissed the rape charges in December 2006, but kept the other charges. Probably desperate for some sort of plea deal, but lacking the moral courage to abandon a fraudulent prosecution, he kicked the case upstairs. He removed himself from the case and passed it on to the state's attorney general.

But by this time, the tide had turned. And so the wicked are ensnared in the traps which they set for others.

Like many such conflagrations in history, the kindler of the fire was himself consumed by the flames. Nifong's public statements showed a contemptuous disregard for the rights of the accused, and a disrespect towards the defense attorneys whose job it was to represent them. The state bar of North Carolina filed ethics charges against Nifong, who was described as a "rogue prosecutor"; after an extended ethics inquest Nifong was disbarred for "dishonesty, fraud, deceit, and misrepresentation." He was also convicted of criminal contempt and spent a day in jail.

The revelations that came to light at the ethics hearing can only be described as shocking: here was detailed a pattern of abuse of power, collusion with various authorities, and a level of skull-thumping stupidity as has scarcely been equaled in the annals of contemporary American justice. Charges against all the accused players were dismissed, and the students were declared innocent. Nifong's demeanor in the hearings was a textbook example of the "banality of evil" (to use Hannah Arendt's phrase): he was able to summon up crocodile tears for the accused boys whose lives he tried to destroy, but the overall impression given by his testimony was that of a government drone overwhelmed by the forces which his power-drunk avarice had set in motion.

Some may see the outcome of the Duke rape case as a vindication of the ability of the system to correct itself. Truth won out in the end, some have said. But in many ways, the conclusion of the case left much to be desired. Nifong's description as a "rogue" was too comfortable and smug; at every step of the way, he was aided and abetted by the media and local institutions. Safely labeling him a wild-eyed rogue conceals the roles played by powerful institutions (media, government, education) in fanning the flames of anti-male bigotry.

Nifong was only abandoned by the establishment when the tenacity of the defense attorneys exposed the whole charade. One may wonder what would have happened had the students not been able to hire competent counsel. The case exposed just to what extent feminism and political correctness had rotted the souls of the existing institutions. Like France's Dreyfus Affair, the Duke case exposed for all the world the callous, wicked, and rotten nature of the contemporary American establishment.

And the mentality continues. To cite just one of many examples, former Atlanta Falcons football player Brian Banks recently had a rape conviction overturned under circumstances that shock the conscience. Banks, a star football player with a bright future, had been falsely accused of rape by a cynical and vicious teenage classmate. Facing the possibility of a lengthy prison sentence, he pled guilty for something he didn't do, and served five years in prison. His accuser and her mother proceeded to shake down the school with a phony lawsuit and got a huge settlement. On his release, the girl contacted him on Facebook and offered to "help" him clear his name as long as she didn't have to give the settlement money back.

Unbelievable. He recorded the meeting and used it to help clear his name. But he had lost five precious years of his life. Under Roman law, a person who wrongly accused another of a crime was guilty of calumnia. The penalty for calumnia was for the lying accuser to be subjected to the same range of punishment as the crime alleged. I like this old Roman law, and think it should be adopted today. The deterrent effect would be enormous.

How many innocent men are rotting in jails today, due to their lack of financial resources? How many men have been deprived of their livelihoods, due to the cowardice of a feminist-dominated system that throws them to the wolves immediately after accusations are leveled against them? The lesson here is that no man can put his unqualified faith in the system or the government to protect him. Institutions exist to support the prevailing orthodoxy. And if that orthodoxy is anti-male, pro-feminist, and politically correct, an honest man cannot expect a fair deal.

Another vital lesson here is that the legion of manginas, leftists, tattooed hipsters, and assorted cowards who cheered on Nifong and white-knighted for Mangum were all men. More harm has been done to men in the name of feminism by men than by women. The worst enemy of the masculine, honest man is not the female feminist, but the male feminist. It was men in the local establishment institutions who looked the other way or acquiesced in the feeding frenzy. Mangum was a guttersnipe, of course, but she did not occupy a place of power or influence. At any point, she could (and should) have been put in check. This did not happen. Those in power sat there and did nothing. They only acted when the outcome was no longer in doubt. No one was willing to stick his neck out and defend the men. Almost all news outlets refused even to show a photograph, or to give the name, of the false accuser Mangum.

In a healthy society, a Crystal Mangum would be severely punished for her false testimony, which nearly destroyed the lives of numerous men. As it happened, the state attorney who took over the case from Nifong chose to give her a pass, stating it was “in the best interests of justice” not to prosecute her.

And so she was allowed to continue harming people, over and over again. In 2010, she was arrested on charges of attempted murder, arson, assault, identity theft, resisting arrest, and child abuse. She was convicted at a jury trial of several misdemeanor charges, among them child abuse. In 2011, she was charged with assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill, for allegedly stabbing her boyfriend. He later died. At the time of writing, the case is still pending. Not one single feminist, mangina, or white knight has ever come forward to demonstrate for the rights of Mangum’s many victims. There is only silence. Where are they now? Mangum has even written a “book” to try to cash in on her criminality.

Selena Roberts, a journalist who worked as a writer for the New York Times when the Duke case broke, was interviewed in 2008 about her afterthoughts on the case. She had been one of the more strident voices in pre-judging and condemning the students. But even in 2008, a year after the case had collapsed, she could not admit she had been wrong. About anything. Ever. Her statements from the interview, recorded below, provoke fury in their callousness, cruelty, hatefulness, and insensitivity to the rights of the persecuted. Read them and decide for yourself:

Q: Which column – over the span of your career – have you taken the most heat for? Why do you think readers were so upset?

Duke Lacrosse. No question. Basically, I wrote that a crime didn't have to occur for us to inspect the irrefutable evidence of misogyny and race baiting that went on that night. Not a popular stand. I received lots of hate mail, some of it threatening. I think the intense response came from Duke-player supporters who felt threatened when someone, whether it was me or another columnist, started poking at the culture of affluence and entitlement. We're always dissecting the African-American and Hispanic communities – is it gangs? is it the rap lyrics? – when trouble strikes minority athletes. Obviously, some segments of the Duke lacrosse crowd did not enjoy the scrutiny of their world.

So, in Selena Roberts's world, it doesn't even matter whether a crime occurred or not. To her, there was "irrefutable evidence" of "misogyny" and "race baiting". If anything sums up the mentality of the modern-day feminist Inquisitor or commissar, it is this way of thinking. Facts, reality, and truth don't matter. What matters is my agenda. The destruction of an innocent man means nothing to me. What matters is my personal vendettas and axes to grind. I have a right to use a fake case to make some bigger point about (in her words), "the culture of affluence and entitlement". Which is feminist code words for white men. And notice also the nice little whiff of martyrdom she throws in there. She actually tries to make herself look like a hero ("not a popular stand"), when in fact she was a willing member of the executioners' squad against the Duke boys. The rationalization would be shocking, were it not so routine.

Ms. Roberts even sees fit to lecture us on race. Unbelievable. She tries to portray herself as a defender of African-American and Hispanic communities by taking on the big, bad Duke twenty year old lacrosse players. Since Ms. Roberts is so sensitive to minority rights, I'd like to ask her: has she spoken out against the false rape accuser in the Brian Banks case, cited above? Brian Banks happened to be black, and the Duke boys were white. Well, have you, Ms. Roberts? Or is there only "misogyny and race-baiting" when the falsely accused men are white?

Selena Roberts's hateful, bigoted, and sickening comments should be condemned in the strongest terms. She obviously doesn't respect the legal decision in the Duke rape case. And obviously she doesn't care about truth or justice. People should know her attitudes. This is why I have quoted her here.

Make no mistake: these people mean what they say, and will go to any lengths to hurt those they believe represent "affluence and entitlement". You are not safe from their cross-hairs unless you are fat, gay, a lapdog mangina, a simpering white knight, a listless loser, a tattooed hipster, or some other worthless person who endorses their worldview. If you fit this description, they will love you.

They hate anyone better than them. And this is why I have said before, and continue to say, that feminism is not just a threat to men, but a threat to civilization itself. These people desire to extirpate healthy masculinity to make the world safe and prosperous for degenerates, freaks, monsters, and other human detritus. And they are succeeding. At stake is nothing less than the continued viability of Western civilization. It is not certain whether men will rise to the challenge and combat these forces.

When the history of this age is eventually written, the mentality of people like this will be held up as the plague bacillus which helped to poison, corrupt, and destroy the foundations of a healthy social order.

Don’t Hate On A Skilled Hustler

The public has recently been made aware of Blake Griffin’s entrance into the world of fatherhood. For those of you who don’t know him, Griffin is an NBA superstar who plays for the Los Angeles Clippers. He is one of the most ridiculous athletes in all of professional sports, so his goings-on tend to get attention.

Granted, this seems unremarkable at first. After all, NBA athletes (stars or otherwise) make babies all the time. Why care about this case? The answer lies with who was carrying Mr. Griffin’s baby, and the baby she’s carried before.

Brynn Cameron was a basketball player at USC. She got knocked up by Matt Leinart (a pro-football athlete) as a sophomore and now is having her second child by another pro athlete.

Yes, I know: the girl is a shark, watch out for the gold digging hoe, etc, etc. Say what you will, but she has mastered the female equivalent of game, which is designed not so much to attract men as it is to attract the right kind of man (read: well-off, high status) and extract valuable resources (tangible and intangible) from him. She was able to pull this off flawlessly not just once but twice, and each time she reeled in a professional athlete who had secured (or would go on to secure) massive contracts.

And you know what? I can’t even hate.

I can’t knock a good hustle. Too many decent looking young women out there are just letting any old do-nothing guy in to knock them up. There are plenty of beautiful women running around out there with kids by men of no note and no value whatsoever. Women who look like this:

Very attractive women who could sleep and gather semen from just about ANY many they chose, birthing children for men who aren't worth a damn.

Even more intriguing are the females who have a "do-something" (read: rich) dude on lock, but are sleeping around on the side with do-nothing guys and getting knocked up by the wrong dude. This has happened with more than one pro athlete, and the consequences have been dire in some instances. Their stupidity in failing to even gold-dig properly by making certain they at least get the right sperm is notable.

To keep it simple, there are lots of gold-diggers out there but very few who know where to dig and how to do it.

Brynn Cameron is a smart woman. She knew she had all of the tools to succeed in America – she was tall, very leggy, athletic, white, blonde haired and blue eyed. She also comes from a freakishly athletic family – Jordan Cameron is having a breakout 2013 season for the Cleveland Browns and is looking like a future all-pro tight end. Colby Cameron was an elite NCAA quarterback and (now former) Carolina Panther who, in 2012, broke records for passes completed without an interception in a season or career, and won the Sammy Baugh tropy as the best passer in the nation not named Johnny Manziel. Brynn heself was a D1 basketball player. All of that is sure to appeal to any pro athlete – if he's going to knock any girl up, it may as well be the one with the freakish bloodlines and the elite (by American standards – leggy blue-eyed blondes are the physical ideal here) physical appearance.

Brynn Cameron put herself in the mecca of celebrity (LA), played a little b-ball and made things work for her. And, most importantly, she made damn sure she got the RIGHT seed in her and wasted very little time with no-name, do-nothing dudes.

Is she a hustler? Yeah, but I can't hate on it. Between her exploits and those of her brothers (one of whom is probably this year breakout superstar at the tight end position in the NFL), she's done quite well by her family and guaranteed that all her offspring will have money, as will she for the rest of her life. The legal system will further ensure it:

> As for the child she had with her baby daddy Matt, 6-year-old Cole lives primarily with her and we're told she's getting a boatload of child support — we know she was getting $15k a month.

Again, can't knock that. Just gotta respect the hustle. We live in a society that has handed her the tools on a silver platter and she used them better than most ever could. Well played, Brynn Cameron. Well played.

As for how such a story can aid the man concerned with self-improvement? It starts by teaching you the caliber of your opponents and the weapons they have at their disposal. Know a good hustler when you see one and identify the tools they use to ply their trade like Brynn Cameron did here. Such observations could one day save you a lot of money.

America Is Becoming A Homosexual Nation

October 1, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In an interesting article written nearly ten years ago, a writer by the name of Orson Scott Card has forecasted a lot of what has happened with the rise of homosexual culture in America.

> Civilization requires the suppression of natural impulses that would break down the social order. Civilization thrives only when most members can be persuaded to behave unnaturally, and when those who don't follow the rules are censured in a meaningful way.
> Why would men submit to rules that deprive them of the chance to satisfy their natural desire to mate with every attractive female?
> Why would women submit to rules that keep them from trying to mate with the strongest (richest, most physically imposing, etc.) male, just because he already has a wife?
> Because civilization provides the best odds for their children to live to adulthood. So even though civilized individuals can't pursue the most obviously pleasurable and selfish (i.e., natural) strategies for reproduction, the fact is that they are far more likely to be successful at reproduction in a civilized society — whether they personally like the rules or not.
> Civilizations that enforce rules of marriage that give most males and most females a chance to have children that live to reproduce in their turn are the civilizations that last the longest. It's such an obvious principle that few > civilizations have even attempted to flout it.

It’s not obvious anymore. We now live in age where people’s brains have been so washed that sex, a basic mammalian behavior, has to be legally codified by courts and women’s studies professors, then disseminated through rape-obsessed liberal writers.

> In this delicate balance, it is safe to say that beginning with a trickle in the 1950s, but becoming an overwhelming flood in the 1960s and 1970s, we took a pretty good system, and in order to solve problems that needed tweaking, we made massive, fundamental changes that have had devastating consequences.
> Now huge numbers of Americans know that the schools are places where their children are indoctrinated in anti-family values. Trust is not just going — for them it’s gone.
> Huge numbers of children are deprived of two-parent homes, because society has decided to give legal status and social acceptance to out-of-wedlock parenting and couples who break up their marriages with little regard for what is good for the children.
> The result is a generation of children with no trust in marriage who are mating in, at best, merely “marriage-like” patterns, and bearing children with no sense of responsibility to society at large; while society is trying to take on an ever greater role in caring for the children who are suffering — while doing an increasingly bad job of it.
> Parents in a stable marriage are much better than schools at civilizing children. You have to be a fanatical ideologue not to recognize this as an obvious truth — in other words, you have to dumb down or radically twist the definition of “civilizing children” in order to claim that parents are not, on the whole, better at it.
> We are so far gone down this road that it would take a wrenching, almost revolutionary social change to reverse it. And with the forces of P.C. orthodoxy insisting that the solutions to the problems they have caused is ever-larger doses of the disease, it is certain that any such revolution would be hotly contested.

Fanatical is a good word for what we are seeing today. It’s a complete breakdown of common sense and the knowledge that humanity has accumulated over the ages. Today’s progressive is ready to throw it all away, based on no evidence, to enact policies and laws that make them feel warm and snuggly inside. And the worst part of it is that they’re winning. Their power is increasing.

> Calling a homosexual contract “marriage” does not make it reproductively relevant and will not make it contribute in any meaningful way to the propagation of civilization.
> In fact, it will do harm. Nowhere near as much harm as we have already done through divorce and out-of-wedlock childbearing. But it’s another nail in the > coffin. Maybe the last nail, precisely because it is the most obvious and outrageous attack on what is left of marriage in America.

> Supporters of homosexual “marriage” dismiss warnings like mine as the predictable ranting of people who hate progress. But the Massachusetts Supreme Court has made its decision without even a cursory attempt to ascertain the social costs. The judges have taken it on faith that it will do no harm.
> You can’t add a runway to an airport in America without years of carefully researched environmental impact statements. But you can radically reorder the fundamental social unit of society without political process or serious research.

You can’t even make a joke on Twitter using “faggot” without getting fired from your job, but you are expected to champion a change to the marriage contract that has worked for the human species for thousands of years. Soon enough, you will be brought under suspicion if pro-liberal positions are not found within your social media accounts.

> Once this is regarded as settled law, anyone who tries to teach children to aspire to create a child-centered family with a father and a mother will be labeled as a bigot and accused of hate speech.
> Can you doubt that the textbooks will be far behind? Any depictions of “families” in schoolbooks will have to include a certain proportion of homosexual “marriages” as positive role models.
> Television programs will start to show homosexual “marriages” as wonderful and happy (even as they continue to show heterosexual marriages as oppressive and conflict-ridden).
> The propaganda mill will pound our children with homosexual marriage as a role model. We know this will happen because we have seen the fanatical Left do it many times before.
> So when our children go through the normal adolescent period of sexual confusion and perplexity, which is precisely the time when parents have the least influence over their children and most depend on the rest of society to help their children grow through the last steps before adulthood, what will happen?

A nation of burly dykes and butt fuckers. Super.

> …society will bend all its efforts to seize upon any hint of homosexuality in our young people and encourage it.
> most parents regard schools — an institution of the state that most directly touches our children — as the enemy, even though we like and trust the individual teachers — because we perceive, correctly, that schools are being legally obligated to brainwash our children to despise the values that keep civilization alive.

A lot of people in Eastern Europe, once they've become comfortable with me, ask questions about the weird things going in America, including homosexual marriage. It just doesn't compute in their mind how homosexuals can get married. I wish I could give them a clear answer of why this is being allowed which involves some logic, but there is no logic. "The American culture is crazy," I say, and leave it at that. It's this craziness that is absolutely destroying the family in the West. Considering that one of the goals of communism was to replace the family unit with the state, it makes you wonder what side of history we're falling on.

Beware Of Trojan Horses

October 1, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

In your quest to navigate the dating market, you may encounter one type of girl I like to call the Trojan Horse. These girls have the appearance of a being a traditional-minded, high-value foreign woman but hide a core of American consumerism and feminism. Typically, these girls are born in a foreign country and undergo a somewhat traditional upbringing, but spend some or all of their later formative years in this country being inculcated into the American feminist you-go-girl culture. Their initial demureness is matched only by the extent of their psyches ruined by solipsism, independence, and false self-esteem.

If you have never dated a non-westernized woman, this type of girl may not seem so bad at first. You may think "Hey, she was born into a traditional household and probably values traditional relationships like traditional foreign woman. This is terrific!" But with more exposure you soon realize that she combines all of the drawbacks of an American girl with the significant expectations of a traditional feminine woman — expectations that are reasonable only when complimented by effort and sacrifice on the part of the woman. Here are a few of the unseemly things you may notice in your dealings with these girls:

- No cooking ability, feels that she is above cleaning
- Not sweet or feminine
- Focused on her career and sees homemaking and children as a lowly goal
- Does not respect economy of language, will prattle on about anything
- Zero intellectual curiosity, unlike many actual Asian and Eastern European girls

But doesn't this just look like the typical American woman? Not so fast. For all the negatives we point out about the women of our country, they will occasionally pay for a dinner (insisting on financial independence, at least in the early stages), and their preoccupation with remaining busy and aloof means that they are more likely to accept an arrangement where they don't grace you with their value-adding presence every day. On the contrary, foreign-born girls will often have exaggerated negative traditional female traits like these:

- Clingy — expects an incredible amount of attention
- Expect the man to provide and be "manly"
- Demure when it comes to sex — often difficult to bed for the first time and will openly use it as a bargaining tool even early in the relationship

Trojan Horses want to be by your side all the time and suck your time and resources more than normal American women, but won't provide value in homemaking, child-rearing, cooking, or respect. The sweetness that Law Dogger, Roosh, and many others have written about has been stamped out of them by the American feminist multiverse. Having ridden the carousel at the behest of the poisoned media, they turn to the relationship route when they are losing their value in the sexual marketplace and are getting intense familial pressure to return to their traditional roles.

Unfortunately, after their years of careerism and solipsistic rejection of purposes other than their own enjoyment, they have none of the skills or proclivities necessary to be good relationship partners. Watch out for these girls, and be especially aware of their pitfalls lest they demand your commitment.

All Women Are Disloyal

October 1, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

If there is one defining feature that separates men and women it can be summed up in one word… loyalty. Why? Because women have none. And is it a bad thing? No, because men are able to excel while women constantly implode their own lives. It's the reason why men literally run the world, and women hold secretary positions at best. And thank god for it, because if women had any sense of loyalty, there is no doubt in my mind that the red pill would be the biggest failure since new Coke.

Angry women will constantly preach to you about how "hell hath no fury like a woman scorned." What women don't realize is how moronic they look when bro-code trumps their antics to make them look stupid, all while two men have a laugh over the fact that they both just banged the same chick. See Exhibit A which can be found below.

Personally I haven't decided what's more hilarious—the fact that the two guys planned the whole thing and seem to be having a bro moment over busting this chick, or the fact that she was not just publicly shamed, but virally shamed; the video currently has over 2 million views on YouTube alone, plus however many it's achieved via Facebook.

Which leads us to point number two… everything is your fault. This can be explained with Exhibit B, also seen below.

As you can see, it’s simply your fault for you cheating, and your own fault for her cheating. Of course in the views of feminist America, it couldn’t possibly have anything to do with the fact that she has gained 20 pounds since the beginning of your relationship, or the fact that you hate hanging out with her because all she does is nag. It’s always your fault.

And here’s Exhibit C:

Women hate women. I don’t know what causes their cattiness, but whatever it is, we need to make more of it. It’s hands-down the best thing that has happened to men. With us, there comes a sense of loyalty, most prominently displayed as bro-code. We generally don’t give two shits if you had sex with an ex-girlfriend, or even current possible prospect, so long as the proper protocol is followed.

Women on the other hand have no such system, and the lack of it causes women to constantly get in arguments with each other and be their own worst enemies. The phrase “keep your friends close and your enemies closer” was not coined by a man—it was defined by a woman, because it helped her cope with the fact that she has no real friends, only acquaintances whom she will compete with men over.

Guys, on the other hand, realize there’s no real shortage of pussy, and loyalty to other men benefits them over the long run. This completes the great circle of masculine greatness that keeps men on top, literally, and women on the bottom, until we tell them to ride us or moan into a pillow.

Swallowing the red pill makes you part of a fraternity. Manhood itself was once part of this great fraternity, but feminism has caused many men to become white knights and manginas (Darwinism at work). The men who remain never forget loyalty, because in the end it is the defining feature that helps you get laid while women foil each other’s lives. In essence, loyalty is the key factor to game, and life as a man.

Help Raise Awareness About Rape Tourette's

October 2, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Every two minutes, a woman is diagnosed with Rape Tourette's.

That's a disturbing statistic, but it's all the more alarming when you consider that RT is highly preventable and treatable if detected early. Any woman could fall victim, but the risk increases if someone in that woman's social networking circle has been diagnosed with RT, or if that woman comes into close contact with demographics prone to habitually abusing the word "rape," blurting it out constantly: as a means to lay claim to the victimization credentials of real victims, as a catch-all insult for male sexuality, or as a means to shut down a conversation—thereby rendering the term increasingly meaningless.

The Return of Kings Foundation is committed to fighting this terrible affliction and is launching a campaign to raise awareness about Rape Tourette's. Join us in the fight against RT!

Together we can make Rape Tourette's a thing of the past.

Know the facts.

Knowledge is power, but how much do you know about Rape Tourette's?

Did you know?

- RT doesn't just affect woman, 1 in 4 manginas suffer from it
- Manginas suffer a more acute strain, which attacks their white-knight cells and wimp nodes
- Most people catch RT on the Internet or from someone they know
- RT spreads rapidly through college campuses and blog comment sections
- Until 2013, Rape Tourette's was simply known as the "Feminist Plague"

Talk to your red-pill doctor.

The early signs of RT are often subtle, but the full-blown disease matures quickly. It doesn't take long before a victim is blurting out the word every day. Left untreated, acute RT sufferers have been known to use the word "rape" for every word in a sentence.

If you, or someone you know, exhibits one or more of these early signs, seek immediate professional help.

- Uses the word "rape" as punctuation, or to insert false gravity into a pedestrian statement
- Uses the word "rapist" as catch-all insult for anything to do with male sexuality
- Exhibits unreasonable fear or envy of men or natural male sexuality caller driving in a black GMC Envoy said another driver got out of his car and threw things at his car. Police arrested Carlos Bello for malicious destruction.

- Cuts hair short, or in bizarre shaving configurations that more appropriately belong on a dune-buggy driver in a dystopian desert wasteland in the distant future
- Convinced that "rape culture" is a real thing, in the Western world especially applies only to manginas*

- Uses exotic, incoherent gobbledygook terms like “cis-gendered” or “demi-sensual”
- Deploys the word “rape” to try to shut down a conversation or activate white knights in the immediate vicinity
- Posts about any kind of “shaming” (fat, slut, or otherwise) on his/her social network or dating profiles
- Easily offended or emotionally wounded; even becomes visibly agitated or faux-angry when they use the term themselves
- Pathological obsession over increasingly absurd, even comical, levels of “consent”

- Displays exaggerated outrage over fictitious epidemic of “rape jokes”
- Believes that only women suffer from sexual assault

Make a difference.

Rape Tourette’s can affect your sister, your mother, or your friendzoned mangina orbiter. So, learn how to recognize the problem and speak up.

Because only we can prevent RT.

Our First Date

I met you either at a bar somewhere or online and after a few playful texts we choose a night to meet. It is of no import if it is a weekday or weekend night, as long as I can plan the logistics correctly. My goal on our first date is to sleep with you. If we are meeting by your place, then I will have already asked about your roommates and living situation in an indirect way. For example, I will ask if you like living in (insert city), if you have any friends there, and subsequently "what about your roommates?" This will lead you to telling me how many roommates you have and a few things about them, which in turn allows me to evaluate how difficult it would be to go back to your place after the date, and more importantly how likely or unlikely the bang would be. If you are coming to me that's no issue, because I live alone.

We will get drinks and potentially some food at a nice-to-high-end place. If you are coming to me, you will park at my place and either I'll drive or we walk to the bar because it will be no more than 5 minutes away. I will greet you with a hug to start the physical contact process. If I am coming to you, I will pick you up so you can drink freely. I do not greet you with a hug or kiss. I am either in a suit with no tie, or a blazer and jeans. You will never be overdressed for me.

Once we arrive at our date location, I open the restaurant or bar door and allow you to walk in. I want you to feel the traditional mindset I am invoking, and know that you are the woman in this setting. I let you sit down first. Then I sit next to you, not across from you. I tell you it is because I don't want to have to yell during our date but in reality it is so I can touch you more easily as we talk to each other. I ask you about your drinks of choice and you tell me and I mentally take note of what you like for later. We get a round of drinks and start chatting about whatever.

Every placement of my hand and every move I make is calculated. I let my thigh rest on your thigh for compliance testing. Do you move your thigh away? Do you let it sit there? Do you actually push back a little? Eventually I have my arm over your chair and at times will hold onto your upper back. I will go to tell you something in your ear after purposefully not saying it loudly enough, to create sexual tension as our cheeks meet to exchange this important detail. I maybe hold an extra second so you wonder if I'm going to kiss you or not. But I won't kiss you.

As you tell me stories I yawn noticeably one time. You will ask me if I think you are boring and be offended. I tell you of course not, I was just yawning. It doesn't matter if you don't believe me, because you have already taken offense to it. Good. I also look around a lot and act like I am not interested at times. At other times I am listening intently about what you are saying. You tell me that you "cannot figure me out." Perfect. You ask me how many dates I go on a week and I say none, this is my first and I am hoping to potentially hold hands with you at some point in the night as I'm too nervous to kiss a girl. You retort "Shutup!" and ask me again. I ask you for a sip of your drink because I want to try it. I don't answer your question and eventually you give up trying to get an answer.

I tell you pre-scripted stories to gauge your interest in sex. I tell you about that time I went to a male strip show and the girls were amazingly horny and loud. Do you agree? Do you find that offensive? I go into detail about how girls were brought on stage and basically molested. Again, what is your offense level, or are you ok with it? I tell you about how I've visited 24 countries and can speak 4 languages. I tell you about how quickly Brazilian girls show affection, or how feminine FSU girls are. I mention numerous times how I don't judge people — so it gets ingrained in your mind that should you want to have sex with me the first night, I won't judge you.

We look around at people at the bar and I say let's play a game and guess who's on a date, who's in a relationship, etc. I specifically point out people and say that guy will never get laid, she sees him as just a friend. I point across the room and say those two have already fucked. Again, sex, sex, sex. There shouldn't be a question where our minds are at.

The bill comes and I let it sit there for about 30 seconds. Just enough time to make you sweat but not enough time for you to offer. I am traditional and I have told you this, so I am paying. After 30 seconds I take the bill and put it aside by me, so you cannot pay but also so we do not break our conversation. No rush here. After a few minutes, I pay and I tell you "let's go" but I do not say where.

As we walk out, I will have my hand on your lower back with you in front of me and will say my standard line of "I'm not tired, are you tired? I can stand to hang out a bit longer." One of two things usually happens. If I've pissed you off enough with my yawning or looking around, or offended you with my stories, you will tell me you are tired and want to go home or flat out say I was rude. This is when I engage in some damage control and grab your face and make out with you, regardless of where we are or who is watching. I tell you to calm down you are misinterpreting things and so on. I'm a good kisser, so you will feign a protest but eventually relent. If you are into me after we leave, then I don't make out with you because I don't have to yet.

Now, either way we are ready to hang out a bit more. Since I asked you your drinking proclivities earlier, I know what you like to drink. Chances are you like champagne. If we are by my place, I tell you my client recently gave me this organic champagne and said I should really try it. My client never gave me a bottle, I bought it at Trader Joe's a few hours ago for $7. If we are by your place, I magically have a bottle of wine or champagne in my car and we can go drink it at your place. You eventually agree and I hope you say the magic words "but we are not going to have sex." If you say that, then I know we are going to have sex.

Once inside I amplify touching but hold back kissing. We pour a drink and put on some music or, if at your place, the TV. After about 10 minutes or so, I do one of two things. If you were wearing heels or wedges, I ask you to stand up so I can see you "without your inches of bullshit on." When you are in front of me and I am of course taller than you staring down, I pat your head like a good girl and then go for the makeout and go strong. If you were not wearing heels, I ask to see your hands because I know they will be smaller than mine. I then pull you in to make out with you.

I escalate and escalate hard. I will be a bit rough. I will physically pick you up as we are standing, and carry you towards the bedroom. If you say no not in there, fine, I will go back to the couch and throw you on there. Note, I will not gently place you down there. I know girls like it rough. I take my cues from both your words and your actions. Experience trumps anything you read in theory, and having been on many many dates I can tell by now what you actually mean and what you don't mean. If you are pushing me away, I will back off. If you are grabbing my dick through my pants, I will push forward. Eventually you will tell me that "you're so bad" or "do you ever calm down?!" Again, one of two things will happen. You will eventually stop me, but will not punish me for going for sex. That's fine. I know the next time I see you we will have sex. And if I don't see you again, then you were not serious about having sex with me in the first place. There is no losing here.

The better alternative is we do end up having sex. A few times. And again, I will either see you again or I won't. If I do, cool, we can have sex again. If I don't — whether it's because you now feel like a slut or think that I just want you for sex and not a relationship — that's cool too because chances are as an American girl I wasn't that serious about you anyway.

The Warsaw Rising

This history book recounts World War 2 from the Polish perspective, centered around the Warsaw Uprising (not to be confused with the Jewish Uprising) that occured towards the end of the war when the Red Army was camped on the outskirts of the city.

> The Gestapo established its control over Warsaw in the early months by filtering the entire population, allocating them to racial categories and issuing them with the relevant documents. In order to live, every person required a Certificate of Racial Origin, an identity card (Kennkarte), and a ration card.
> The inhabitants of Warsaw were turned into hunted animals, who had to go outside to live, but who were constantly on edge, lest they were pounced on. One could go out to buy a bottle of milk and not return, then be found on the list of hostages . . . to be shot [as] 'enemies of German reconstruction'. One could be grabbed in a restaurant, in a shop, in a church, or in one's own home. Life > became a daily game of chance with death.

What the Germans did to the Poles reads like a nightmare. They literally wanted to wipe Poland off the map while enslaving the less intelligent Poles to trudge away in German factories. Most of Poland's intelligenista and political class were wiped out by the Germans (and also Russians).

The resistance fighters in Warsaw, loosely led by the exiled government in London, built up a surprising amount of organization during the occupation, including a postal system, newspaper presses, and an ambulance service, operating right under the nose of the Germans. They even had an assassination squad that successfully killed many Gestapo officers.

> …the tentacles of the exiled Government reached out from Sikorski's HQ at the Rubens Hotel in London to every town and village and to almost every clandestine formation in Poland.

The resistance fighting began in earnest when Soviet victories against the Germans brought the Red Army to to the Vistula River. The Poles expected help from the Soviets, the British and the Americans, but little help came. The Red Army sat on their heels, watching the fighting for over a month through their binoculars. The British could only manage airdrops from Italy, and the Americans sent one large airdrop that mostly landed in German hands. In the meanwhile, it was already decided by the Allied big three in Tehran that a large chunk of Polish land in the East would go to the Soviets, who had free reign by the British and Americans to do whatever they wanted as long as they kept fighting the Germans. Cities you know of today like Lvov (Ukraine) and Vilnius (Lithuania) were part of Poland before the war.

Much of the book is first-hand testimony from survivors…

> "Where AK platoons possessed only one gun for every two men, the night watch would take over the weapons of the day watch. So long as the guns of the dead and wounded could be recovered, the ratio of guns to men was actually increasing."
> "Stalin dismissed the opportunity to help the Rising when assistance would have been most effective. What is more, after a long period of silence, he chose to condemn the Rising in the most callous terms."
> "The Home Army authorities concluded that the hospital, in accordance with international convention, should be clearly marked on the roof with a Red Cross. It precipitated an immediate bombardment by German Stukas and by extremely heavy rocket fire. The hospital began to burn, the upper floors to collapse . . . Immediate evacuation was essential."

> “Many teenagers joined the Rising. They often served as messengers, carrying weapons, reports, orders, and the press with enthusiasm. Many of them fell. They did not always realize the dangers, and had a greater tendency than us older ones to perform dashing deeds.”
> “Our daily paper, the Warsaw Courier, wrote: ‘Stalin had planned the total destruction of Warsaw a long time ago. A vibrant city with a long democratic tradition would have been a source of constant irritation in his vast totalitarian empire. Only when he saw Warsaw almost razed to the ground did Stalin decide to throw a few sackfuls of food to the dying few, an empty gesture designed to deceive world opinion.’”
> “Further fighting has no sense. It’s madness. Politically, we have achieved a great deal. Yet, since we have not received the assistance expected, we should save what is most dear to us, namely, the biological substance of the nation. This is all the more important because the whole cultural and scientific elite of society is concentrated in Warsaw.”

When Stalin eventually did make aid drops, he didn’t use parachutes, meaning most sacks were destroyed upon making impact with land.

> “This is the stark truth. We were treated worse than Hitler’s satellites, worse than Italy, Romania, Finland. May God, who is just, pass judgement on the terrible injustice visited on the Polish nation, and may He punish accordingly all those who are guilty. Your heroes are the soldiers whose only weapons against tanks were revolvers and bottles of petrol . . . Your heroes are the women who tended the wounded, cooked in bombed-out cellars . . . and comforted the dying. Your heroes are the children who went on playing in the ruins . . . Immortal is the nation that can muster such universal heroism. For those who have died have conquered, and those who live will fight, will conquer and will bear witness again that POLAND HAS NOT PERISHED YET, SO LONG AS WE STILL LIVE.”
> Despite a critical military situation, in which every last soldier of any age was being impressed into service for the defence of the Reich, thousands of German troops were employed in the ruins of Warsaw, fulfilling the Führer’s orders for its total razing. Some of the units were brought in daily from billets in the countryside; others camped out in the eerie wasteland, huddling round their braziers as the nights grew ever colder. Brandkommandos or ‘fire squads’ attacked the empty, desolate, and largely roofless houses with flame-throwers. Demolition teams used dynamite and heavy equipment to bring down the larger buildings and monuments. Gangs of impressed peasants collected scrap metal and other usable building materials, and carted them off. The operation > proceeded without a break, day by day, street by street, district by district. The Soviets watched impassively, making no move. If the work was undertaken energetically, there was a good chance that it could be completed before the next Soviet offensive.

> The cream of Poland's patriotic and democratic youth, who in normal circumstances would have taken over at the end of the war, had been eliminated. Stalin's puppets could now assume power in their stead with no regard to popular opinion or to democratic niceties.

For helping the allies throughout the war, where Polish soldiers fought alongside British, the Poles were rewarded with 46 years of communism.

A common question is why would the Poles resist against the Germans when Hitler's defeat was imminent? Why not wait it out until the Soviets saved them? The Poles wanted to welcome the Soviets as hosts to a liberated city, putting the country's destiny and freedom into their own hands. They didn't believe that democracy would be handed to them by the Soviets, so they determined to fight for it. They also didn't want to be labeled as cowards who didn't fight when given a chance, but without allied help, their resistance was doomed.

After fighting for nearly two months, they surrendered themselves to the Germans and got to watched their city razed to the ground. Symbols and landmarks of Polish heritage were methodically destroyed. Poland was abandoned by her allies twice: at the beginning of the war upon the initial German invasion and then at the end.

> Warsaw fell to the Soviets on 17 January with hardly a shot being fired. At Yalta, Churchill was the weakest of the 'Big Three', and Roosevelt was dying and allegedly depressed. They called on Stalin almost as petitioners. They desperately needed his cooperation for the showdown against Japan; and they had very little more to offer to guarantee victory over Germany. So they acquiesced in his takeover of Eastern Europe with barely a whimper. Whilst not withdrawing recognition of the Polish Government in London, and continuing to benefit from the services and sacrifices of the Polish forces in the West, they raised no objections either to the installation of the so-called Provisional Government in Warsaw or to the depredations of the NKVD in their First Ally's homeland.

After the war, many Poles refused to go back to Poland and be persecuted, so they became a diaspora:

> In any other political circumstances, almost all exiled Varsovians would have returned home en masse; and they would have flung themselves into the task of reconstruction, no matter how harsh the deprivations might have been. But they were not going to devote their energies for the benefit of foreign masters, whose ideology and practices they deplored. So, despite the risks and the anxieties, > they stayed abroad; and they bore all the adversities with fortitude, because they had chosen to do so of their own free will. Many years later, when asked about their life decision, they would generally answer with disarming frankness and absolute clarity: ‘Our country was not free.’ ‘There was no place for us there.’ ‘Members of othe Home Army were persecuted, imprisoned, sent to Siberia, or brutally murdered.’ ‘We sincerely hoped . . . that we would again be called to fight for free Poland.’

The Poles are often maligned when it comes to their intelligence and bravery, but this story shows the opposite. They were quite ready to give up their lives to be a free people once again, seemingly desiring their freedom more than other occupied countries in Europe at the time, but had an unfortunate geographical position between Germany and the Soviet Union.

I have to admit this book put me into a mini-depression upon realizing how trivial human life can be. It was sobering to walk out the house after a reading session to see relatively no suffering on the streets. Even the poor country I was in at the time (Ukraine) had no one coming close to the pain that was endured in Warsaw. World War 2 has produced a lifetime’s worth of amazing stories that encompass the extremes of humanity, and I believe this book shares one such story.

---

Today I'm going to cover the nuts n bolts of approaching in Non-Party Environments. When you're in a club and the music is pumping, sluts are dancing and alcohol is flowing like the Hoover Dam, approaching is more natural and is expected. When you're in a Starbucks, walking on campus (not streaking, but walking haha) and getting some new condoms at your local Wal-Greens, how do you approach that cute girl with the perky tits and booty shorts?

First off, unless you walk around with a manic energy of a clown on crack, then the approach is different. There are always exceptions to the rules and only after practicing approaches and a shit ton of them, will you be able to perfect your style of approach based on your natural personality and vibe. But for Non-Party Environment approaches, err on the side of being the following: Cool, Calm and Collected.

Cool: Not temperature wise smart ass, but cool as in style and vibe. If you want to run card routines with a fuzzy hat and eye shadow smeared on your eyelids then go ahead. I don't advocate that type of 'Game' and never will.

The 3 Components of Cool

1. Style

What is the best outfit you feel like a straight G in? What shirt makes you feel confident and makes you hold your shoulders back a little more, walk a little taller and gives you the confidence to look motherfuckers in the eye without wavering? Wear that. Know your style, perfect it, for it always be evolving to a certain extent and it like it or not, it is a girl's First Impression of You.

2. Breathe

There are a lot of times where you'll spot the girl and have time before you approach her. Unless she drops out of the sky naked and bent over in front of you, you'll have a minute or two to compose yourself, pull your tongue back in your mouth and take a deep breath. Approach anxiety can be very real, but I'm here to tell you that it can be overcome with a quick exercise:

Count to 10 slowly while breathing in and out on each number count.

1….breathe in…2….breathe out…etc.

Don't huff and puff like a fat bitch reaching for the Cheetos on the top shelf, but do it discreetly. If you're in Starbucks, take a quick trip to the bathroom and do it. Wal-Greens, go to the magazine aisle, pick up the latest issue of GQ and do it. Once you practice this exercise and have successful approaches you'll get comfortable with that FACT that it's really not a big deal and 99.9% of the time nothing bad will happen to you when you approach a girl.

3. Swagger

Everybody has SOME swagger somewhere in them. It might take time to find it, cultivate it and make it pop, but it can be done. When you develop your swagger + game, it won't matter WHAT you say to a chick so much, it's HOW you say what you say. Re-read what I just said. It's THAT key.

Calmness

Being calm is hard I know. Your heart may be racing, palms sweaty, mom's spaghetti on your sweater, oh wait did I just drop some Eminem? Yes. Now back to the main event. It's hard to be calm when you approach a girl, especially the hotter the girl. Shit, even I still get some approach anxiety every once in a while!

I could write a book on some of the bad approaches of my past. This one in particular I remember as especially tragic.

I spotted a cute girl inside Aldo, the shoe store every fucking mall in the world has. I walked in right up to her and literally couldn't get a word out of my mouth. I just stood there looking at her like a dumbass. She looked at me like I was an alien and while my brain was screaming at my mouth to say something, anything, my mouth moved but not a single syllable came out. After a few seconds, but what felt like 2-3 minutes, I did an abrupt about face and skedaddled out of Aldo without a word spoken. I survived and you will too. The girl? I'm sure she went home and masturbated to THAT experience of meeting the great McQueen.

Collected

You have your style together, you've taken 10 deep breathes and now you feel calm. Now what? Collect your thoughts. What are you wanting out of this interaction? To just flirt? No. To fuck her on the Wal-Greens counter? Maybe. To get her phone number? Hell to the motherfucking yes.

You MUST have an objective when you approach or else you'll be all over the place while interacting with the girl and that will scream lack of confidence and lack of life.

Lack of life? Yes. You're a high value man who has places to go and people to see, remember? When you first start approaching and you haven't mastered it yet, you want to be like a sniper. Focus on your target, get in and get out. The quicker and smoother you execute the interaction, the less chance of ‘fucking up’. Here’s an example of a real life approach I did at an Office Max. I hate the fucking store but I had shit to get there.

When I walked into the store I noticed one of the cashiers. She was hot, a solid 8, tall, dark hair and eyes and long curly hair. I tossed a small smile when walking past her initially, but that was it. She shyly smiled and that’s it. After getting my boring office supplies I approached HER register to have an excuse to interact. She greeted me and proceeded to ring up my useless office shit.

Me: Well you must be thrilled by your job…

Her: (laughing) It sucks, but I’m in school too! (She felt the need to prove to me that she had other stuff going on in her life. Good sign)

Me: Where? Community College? Damn girl you planning on running the world? (Wink)

Her: (Acting offended) Ouch. Actually yea, I go to XYZCC

Me: So basically you work and go to school. Yawn. When do you get drunk and make “bad” decisions?

Her: It’s been a while, but I do like to party.

Me: (while she was blathering I opened my phone to the NEW CONTACT screen) Put your number in (saying this while handing her the phone)

Her: Sure! (puts it in) Call me soon (smiles big)

Me: We’ll see (Smirk and I bounce)

I text her my after-meet text which goes like this:

She replied back with agreeable comments. I ignored and text her 2 days later. She came over to a house party, had two drinks and then we fucked. I fucked her in her ass as well. Good times.

Now I spoke 5 short ‘lines’ and walked away with her contact info. There is NO need to go on and on. In fact the more you take away the mystery of the interaction, the greater the odds of the girl growing bored of it. Girls LIVE for this shit. Meeting a guy while going about their mundane lives and the experience of having a stranger hit their button and bounce. It intrigues them and trust me they’ll replay the interaction a million times in their head while calling their friends to get their opinions. It’s catnip for pussies, er I mean chicks. Fitting though isn’t it?

Last But Not Least

You now have the components of the state to be in when approaching, but lastly I know you're thinking, "What do I say?", so here is reasons WHY to approach. What excuse do you need in order to approach a girl? Now every author on meeting and banging girls has their own method for this, but mine differs slightly from the mainstream gurus. Mine is more direct and maintains strong frame. I am an advocate of direct openers.

Now I don't mean to walk up and say, "Hi, I'm Christian, what's your number?"; what I mean is that you establish INTENT quickly. This isn't always done through what I say, but how I say what I say and body language. Like the Office Max slut, I established flirtatiousness immediately with my first 'line'. I didn't ask her where the blue paper was first or anything. I noticed her when I walked in, we exchanged friendly smiles and that was it. When I went to the register, I started by teasing her and escalating the interaction by continuing to tease her. This establishes higher value on my part, that I am superior to her. This is extremely effective, especially with girls in the 18-23 year old range.

I quickly turned the interaction to a naughty direction with the "when do you make time for bad decisions blah blah" line. Girls aren't stupid. They've been getting hit on since middle school and even earlier. They know when a guy is interested. Now how about being strong about that assumption and running with it? It's not giving away your game by doing this, it's higher level game in the sense you know she knows you are attracted to her, otherwise why the fuck would you have approached her? You're taking the horse by the reigns, seeing something you desire and will take.

The difference between you and the other 99 guys who hit on her that day, is that you can TAKE IT OR LEAVE IT. Your happiness that day will not be dependent on her reaction to you. You have such a strong frame that she is drawn into your world and will want to be a part of it by the time you walk away with her phone number.

Here's a formula to make it simple for you. In fact if your memory is as fucked up as mine, for having drank swimming pools worth of vodka over the years, then write the formula on an index card in black magic marker and carry it with you everywhere. Or since it is 2013, put it on your phone.

Frame + 'Excuse' + Direct Opener = Approach

Your Frame is that you are a high value man with shit to do and people to see and you don't have much time to waste. This will come across in your attitude and body language. Also, you are leading the interaction, as opposed to asking the chick if it's okay for you to get her number. Never ask. Assume.

Your 'Excuse' is you see a girl and want to meet her. Ideally you want to fuck her at some point. The 'Excuse' is the logical reason for you opening your mouth to the girl. The 'Excuse' turns into…

Your Direct Opener is what you are saying to open the chick on an intent level.

Here's a real world example:

Frame: You've got your 'Power Outfit' on, did your 10 seconds of deep breaths, have an objective (to get her number) and know that you have high value, thus the girl should want to meet you and it's her loss if she blows you off. Don't trip, you'll get some blow-offs, but soon you'll get blowjobs. :)

The girl you spotted at Starbucks is reading a book, funny enough it's Nightclub Bible, I kid, she’s reading 50 Shades of Grey. Perfect.

‘Excuse’: is using the book to open her while turning that ‘Excuse’ into a direct opener.

You: I noticed what you’re reading (This is the ‘Excuse’)… (And here is the direct opener) you must have a different side to you (wink)

Her: (Laughing) Maybe…what’s it to you?

You: Nothing. Besides the fact that I’m your Christian Grey. Lucky day for you.

Her: Oh really? Hmmm, I don’t know. My parents told me not to talk to strangers.

You: Did they tell you to read books about S&M?

Her: (laughing) Ah no

You: I’m “Your name”, what’s yours?

Her: Starbucks Slut

You: (having pulled your phone out and having the screen open to new contact screen) I have to run, I’m late to my S&M workshop (wink), but put your number in. We’ll grab a drink sometime.

Her: (taking your phone and putting in her number) Sounds intriguing

You: Maybe (smile and get the fuck out of there. Don’t stand in the parking lot calling your buddy to tell him the story. Bounce like Biggie’s killers)

Make a small mark on the back of the index card with a pen after every approach. That way you can keep track of your approaches. Similar to the old school approach of making a notch on your belt or bedpost actually haha.

I just threw a lot at you, but I want you to think and process this article over and over. The first 3 Parts of this 7 Part Series covered Approaching. My next article is Escalation Part 1. There will be a total of 7 articles entitled as follows and will be a great guide for you to study and apply covering from getting her digits to getting her buttass naked.

The Abolition Of Man

October 3, 2013 | by Bryan Paul Rouleau | Link | Original Link

In 1944 C.S. Lewis published The Abolition of Man, a three chapter handbook that uses a horse tranquilizer of logic to paralyze the legs of the enduring progressive quest to pillage and burn objective truth to the ashy ground. The book is named after its final chapter, which in one line strikes at the heart of the predicament that the progressive plan now logically and inevitably faces:

"Man's final conquest has proved to be the abolition of Man."

First Principles

According to Lewis, there exists a body of first principles; traditional values that are universally and objectively applicable to all humanity. Lewis calls this body of collected ancient wisdom the Tao. Lewis argues that the conditioners rebel against the Tao to their own detriment (Lewis refers to progressives as "progressives" occasionally throughout his argument, but more commonly calls them "the conditioners," a term that more aptly describes their tactics). They believe that in destroying the Tao, they can then either build a new body of values, or they can finally live in a world absent of values and first principles.

To those conditioners who would build a new body of values, Lewis reveals that by their mere recognition that some first principles are worthy, they recognize that there are worthy human values. Therefore, any attempt to alter the Tao is done to suit a personal or ideological agenda or done out of ignorance of the Tao. Lewis rhetorically asks:

> "Whence comes the Innovator's authority to pick and choose?" Lewis then explains, "Since I can see no answer to these questions, I draw the following conclusions. This thing which I have called for convenience the Tao, and which others may call Natural Law or Traditional Morality of the First Principles of Practical Reason or the First Platitudes, is not one among a series of possible systems of value. It is the sole source of value judgment. If it is rejected, all value is rejected."

Progress Fallacy

To the conditioners who would reject all value, who adhere to the Nietzschean ethic and believe there are no values and there are no first principles, Lewis argues that the logical conclusion of their belief only means that in the end, they will have destroyed themselves. Lewis relays a personal story, where a man claimed that "Man has Nature whacked," even as he was, ironically, dying of tuberculosis. The man said that although we would be a casualty in man's war against nature, it is not uncommon for the winning side of a fight to still suffer casualties. Lewis aptly points out that "Man's conquest of Nature is an expression often used to describe the progress of applied science."

Lewis argues that man has made no progress against nature and has gained zero power over it since the dawn of time. He uses airplanes as an example. Airplanes simply use the physical laws of nature to function; they do not defy those laws or subvert them. Although new inventions and new applied science might seem to give man an advantage over nature, this is not the case; Nature is merely the tool by which man makes those claims of power and any power gained by any man is only power gained over other men, and not over nature. If you were the last man on Earth, could you alone rebuild civilization? Could you alone build and fly a jet? Perhaps you can, but most cannot. So in inventing the airplane, men who were capable of doing so used Nature to gain power over those men, like me, who have to rely on buying a ticket to achieve flight.

Lewis makes this distinction because nature includes human nature. There are men in this world who have been conditioned by the conditioners into thinking human nature can also be beaten. And they are deceived by the apparent retreat of nature from man's newly gained 'powers over it'. But nature's arms held high in surrender is merely a Trojan Horse, because when man draws near enough to claim final victory, he will only find that he has destroyed what he is; he will have abolished himself, because he no longer believes anything; he sees through everything, and as Lewis says, a man who sees through everything sees nothing. Humans will walk the earth, perhaps for a short time longer, but they will not be men by definition, because they have ripped from themselves everything that is objectively true about being a man.

Why do the conditioners, the progressives, the so-called innovators, think that their goals are worthy when every 'advance' they believe they make is in fact a denial of truth and a piecemeal removal of the laws that make us men?

Applicability To Feminism

Take feminism. After 200,000 years of mankind's existence, did the 1960s feminists and their descendants happen upon a new truth about humanity? Feminists will argue that feminism merely requests that women be equal to men under the law and in perceived worth and dignity; but equality under the law already exists, and equal worth and dignity is certainly a first principle, a branch in the Tao, if there ever was one. So what else do they fight for?

Feminists want total control. And they perceive, most ironically, that the way to gain full control over men and over society, is to behave like men; in dress, in attitude, and in professional pursuits. They also encourage men to not behave like men – that is, they want men to be more like the traditional woman. They deny gender roles, which are unequivocally true and necessary (another immutable branch of the Tao). Women are best suited to be women, and men are best suited to be men. Women in the 1960s, however, found a new truth and made 'progress' for all humanity, or so they continue to believe.

I would ask them: whence comes your authority to pick and choose? Feminists, after all, at once recognize the branch of the Tao that calls for equal dignity and respect of men and women, but not the branch of the Tao that defines the two genders separately and assigns them separate roles in nature. In their picking and choosing they have denied all objective value, and they now seek to burn down the nature of man and build a new one. But in doing so, they only burn down themselves; they have systematically rejected all the true and wonderful things about womanhood and feminine quality, and traded it for a construct that is unnatural and doomed to collapse.

The silver lining is that this history of humankind is cyclical, and the feminist revolution can only be tenable for so long before it collapses under its own weight and a counter-revolution takes its place; a counter-revolution that encourages men to be men and women to be women. But until then, the conditioners, the progressives, the innovators, and the feminists will live in their fairy tale land of progress. A fairy tale land that Lewis describes thusly:

> "What I most fear is the reply that I am 'only one more' obscurantist, that this barrier, like all previous barriers set up against the advance of science, can be safely passed. Such a reply springs from the fatal serialism of the modern imagination — the image of infinite unilinear progression which so haunts our minds. Because we have to use numbers so much we tend to think of every process as if it must be like the numeral series, where every step, to all eternity, is the same kind of step as the one before. I implore you to remember the Irishman and his two stoves. There are progressions in which the last step is sui generis — incommensurable with the others — and in which to go the whole way is to undo all the labour of your previous journey."

Black Propaganda In Feminism

October 4, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

To those who do not know, black propaganda is information from a source that is not what it claims to be. It can be used in nefarious ways to manipulate movements and people. It is usually the domain of sophisticated intelligence agencies and media companies. When it is done by ordinary people and has an actual effect, it is quite interesting. It is also hilarious when it exposes the stupidity of its intended audience.

I was recently informed of such an operation. If this operation is true, it shows the ease in which a clever person can create divisions within feminism. It also show the stupidity of the rank and file foot soldiers. According to the operative "Bavarian" there is an operation dubbed "Lollipop" directed at the fissures in the feminist movement.

Quoting from the email that was forwarded to me from "Bavarian":

> I was told you are interested in my group's (Codename: Lollipop) ongoing operation against the PoOs (People of Oppression). My group poses as feminists on twitter. We bait other PoOs into agreeing with us as we subtly move them more and more to the extreme. The purpose is to make moderate feminists turned off with the movement, as well as cause infighting within the group. As some of our operatives have been compromised, my commander has given me permission to make some of their conversations on twitter public. We want to let the PoOs know that we have infiltrated them so that they begin to accuse each other of being Lollipop operatives.

Reading this first paragraph piqued my interest. It reminded me somewhat of the Kurt Russel remake of the movie "The Thing" where everyone accused everyone else of being the alien. I could see how this would upset a few true believers in the feminist movement. Reading further, I had a few more giggles:

> We manly pose as women of color and argue with white feminists. We "check their privilege" to the point that they are fed up. For example, if they say "it's not our time to talk, white ladies, it's our time to listen," we say "the last time white women just listened, George Zimmerman walked free."

While I do not subscribe to racism, this use of it could be very corrosive to the cohesion of the feminists. I can only imagine the dissension this would cause in their ranks. I then continued to read the email. To paraphrase the late night infomercial, “but wait there’s more”:

> This group started when the hashtag #solidarityisforwhitewomen started trending. It referred to an incident where the feminist Hugo Schwartz [sic] [Schwyzer] had a mental breakdown and revealed on twitter that feminism was a fraud. He further revealed that WoC were incompetent and only got in the way of the movement. Some white women offered him sympathy and told him to get help. The WoC got angry and started the hashtag.

It seems Return of Kings’s perennial favorite white knight Hugo Schwyzer provided the spark to this “Operation Lollipop”. If so, those tears would be delicious. “Bavarian” has also provided select twitter screenshots and a tumblr for those who would want to see the “declassified” tweets. I noticed one of the accounts is followed by Vanilla Ice, which elicited another chuckle. Apparently this operation is ongoing:

> The declassified tweets can be found at http://privilege-wars-of-2013.tumblr.com/. Start at the bottom of the page and work your way up. I apologize that these aren’t the best tweets we have, but we need to save our best material for future conversations. I’ve also attached some tweets to this email.

I can only imagine the chaos such an operation would wreak upon the feminists. I look forward to seeing how it all works out. Maybe it will cause the level of mistrust to skyrocket to levels that would hinder the feminist machine. Maybe it will give me more things to laugh at on the internet. All I know is this concept is quite dastardly and funny.

Does Building Muscle Get You Women?

October 4, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Weight lifting should be a cornerstone activity in every man's life. A lot arguments can be made for this.

It builds strength and muscle – among many other health benefits.

But is getting women one of them?

No

Women don’t want monsters.

20 inch arms and shoulders too big to get through the doorway? No thanks.

Yes, the same way we are attracted to fit women – girls are attracted to fit men.

So yes – if you’re fat lose weight. Fat is never sexy. And if you’re rail thin – then bulk the fuck up, son. Girls aren’t looking to molest little boys.

But aside from female bodybuilders – who exist in a culture where steroid level physiques are the goal – woman don’t want more than knowing that you’re strong. That you can protect them. So if you aren’t a fatty – or look like an African Charity model – don’t kill yourself in the gym for some snatch. Spend your time actually talking to women.

But Wait

From the above passage you might assume I disapprove of dedicating yourself to the gym.

That couldn't be any further from the truth.

Lifting weights might not get you in bed with a fly bitch – but it will develop certain characteristics that will help you get there.

Following a consistent workout regimen is an absolute must. It trains you to take the same approach in other areas of your life. At the most basic level it forces action. You won't grow if you don't put your time in at the gym. The same way you won't turn into a Casanova if you don't talk to women.

Moreover, the fact that any good program should incorporate constantly trying to outdo your previous best and push you beyond your comfort zone is essential. Self-development in any hobby or discipline follows the same progression. But lifting weights forces you to acknowledge your current skill level. If you can only squat 150 lbs and you try to squat 200 lbs you will fail. And you will know it – getting stuck on your ass or worse (an injury) is obvious.

In other areas – like game – you can lie to yourself and feign supreme skill – ignoring the basics. Weight lifting forces you to build from the ground up. And it teaches you that doing so equals sustained progress in the long term.

Does Building Muscle Get You Women?

No. It doesn't.

But it does encourages it.

It will assist in your personal development and more importantly – your personal development skills.

So man up, hit the weights, and get stronger. By the same token – hit the streets and bars, and get better with women.

You can’t read or think your way into growing biceps and you can’t read or think women into your bed.

My First Multicultural Experience

October 5, 2013 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

John Lennon was a great, great, GREAT man. He truly was the voice of the baby boomers, unarguably the greatest generation to have ever lived. His calls for world peace rang out from the windows of the high class building he lived in, echoing messages of hope across a gentrified Manhattan which at the time had an evil majority population of 70% white people. Lennon was such a great soul that he recognized the importance of ethnic cross breeding, choosing as his life mate Yoko Ono, a Japanese women from a high class family.

Ono's family had spent their lives living in the lands of evil white men, having sent Yoko to a Christian school to be tutored by more evil white men – so she knew all about their evil by the time she moved to white cities and spent her time hanging out with white people. Evil, evil white people.

John Lennon and his ethnically safe soul mate Yoko Ono

And yes, Lennon had made mistakes in the past – perhaps biggest of all having married a woman from his own cultural and societal background, a white woman, and having fathered an evil white BOY with her. Of course Yoko Ono, who by the grace of not being Western or white was mentally and morally superior by default, quickly put that evil white boy in his place by helping Lennon cut off contact with him, making sure their inheritance was denied and squandered so they couldn't hatch evil white man plans against the world.

Truly, Lennon and Ono were shining beacons of what a multicultural utopia could be. Just listen to the greatest song ever written.

Stirring is it not? Dig those lyrics brah…

> Imagine there's no countries, It isn't hard to do.

We are so lucky. We truly are. John never got the chance to see how our evil nation states – created to protect and enrich JUST the lives of the people who lived within their borders – are morphing into borderless squares of politically correct corporate fiefdoms.

> Imagine no possessions, I wonder if you can, No need for greed or hunger, A brotherhood of man.

Wow. The world John envisions is so beautiful isn't it? A world where no one feels hunger, no one feels the need to generate wealth, where we'll all live in houses whatever size we want built by all of us just to see the smiles on our fellow humans. I mean, imagine a world where, like, we needn't have to breathe so we could live in the water with whales and dolphins. Imagine a world where beautiful people had to pair up with ugly people so that in the end everyone just has plain and mediocre genes. Imagine a world with nothing that makes us feel any sort of emotion what so ever!

> Imagine all the people, Sharing all the world…

John and you other baby boomers, you may have been a bunch of dreamers, but this dream of yours is finally coming true. It's taken far, far too long but we're almost there brother. We're almost there. Thank you for leading we younger generations to it.

I was listening to the above video not too long ago, and it made me reflect on the joys of my own experiences in growing up in a small multiculturally diverse Canadian city. Multiculturalism has been getting a lot of bad rep lately and I honestly find this mind boggling.

I think most of the people saying how multiculturalism destroys peace within a nation or takes opportunity away from those whose parents, grandparents and greater ancestors who built the country are simply haters and bigots. I don't think they've ever really lived in or experienced the joys of being in a multicultural community.

Well folks, old Billy Chubbs has. I spent my childhood growing up in a city that is a shining example of the multicultural utopia currently being created around us. Unfortunately my parents moved me away during 8th grade, so I never got to fully mature in that glorious rainbow of skin colour and differing religions. I think I am worse off for that lack of experience. I can, however, recount some lovely incidents I had during the golden age of my life that I spent within that multicultural Nirvana.

Billy Chubbs first experience with a different culture

There I was, fresh faced and precocious, ready for another day of 1st grade. My colouring books and lunch safely tucked away in my favourite Power Rangers backpack. After a kiss and hug from my mommy I was out the door. The day was bright and sunny. The leaves were beginning to change into their fall colours but for the end of September the weather was exceptionally warm. School was seven blocks away and I took my time meandering to it, watching squirrels gather their nuts, looking at the pretty flower gardens carefully kept in front of the middle class houses. I noticed a lot of them down this street had For Sale signs up but I thought nothing of it – in fact, I enjoyed those signs quite a bit that day, giving each one I passed a satisfying bonk with a stick.

Turning south two blocks away from the school I had my first multicultural experience.

A bit of background on my city first. For most of the 20th century my city was predominantly full of evil white men. It was truly a hell hole; no, there wasn't much in the way of crime or uncomfortable experiences, but what we had in safety we lost in soul. The city council, baby boomer dreamers that they are, decided to do something about this. The 90s and early 00s were a rough period for the innocent parts of the world. Wars and genocides in African and the Middle East – caused by us evil white men of course – were ravaging the disenfranchised 2nd and 3rd worlds.

Realizing something needed to be done to help their fellow man, and to give our city some much needed culture, our council held several closed door meetings in their suburban McMansions and agreed to accept a lot of refugees from these culturally superior countries.

Our first big slice of multicultural utopia arrived in 1999 in the form of several hundred Somalians. The apartments right by the school had been rented out to them. I had walked this route last year with no incidents and boy howdy, was that ever boring! As a young man what I really craved a bit of excitement on my way to school, and a nice Somalian man provided it. He was sitting on the corner, swaying and smelling of mouth wash. That explained his big toothy white smile when he saw me walking by. He hopped right up and began stumbling over.

Now two weird things happened, which the doctors at the hospital later told me was probably just euphoria from me realizing I was about to experience a non-Western – and therefore superior – culture.

My body went numb and I froze. A voice inside my head said;

This is your brain Billy. I'm releasing Dopamine; it will make you numb.

To which I thought back; Are you trying to kill me?

No Billy, I'm making you not care.

And behind the nice man's shoulder, there was a bright white light and suddenly an Angel appeared. Apparently, much like our encounter, at the time no one seemed to notice it. The Angel had a sad face and was stretching out his hand, mouthing; You're going home my child.

Of course, being white AND a man, I knew the Angel did not have my best interests at heart and therefore could not be trusted. Besides, I wasn't going home! I was going to school! I ignored the silly Angel and stood there waiting to see what the nice Somali man wanted.

He began by trying to teach me his language, and as was his culture's way it involved yelling at me and pushing me around. As an evil white boy, I had some reservations about standing there absorbing the Somalian culture. For a long time afterward I thought I didn't run because I was frozen from sheer fear and terror but recently some feminists explained how it was my duty to welcome all cultures, and that my refusal to run was my mind recognizing that simple fact of nature. They couldn't explain why the Somali then took my back pack off, held it between us and unzipped it to shake all my books and lunch out onto the sidewalk. But those feminists assured me that, as an evil white man, it was my fault.

When I asked what he was doing with it he finally communicated with me in my own evil and inferior language.

"MONEY?!"

Oh! I thought, He is just a hungry hobo. John Lennon says nobody should be hungry, so I reached into my pocket and took out my two loonies for milk money (one dollar coins for the 98% of you reading this who aren't Canadians) and happily held them out to the man.

The nice man then gave me a Somalian goodbye by kicking me in the stomach with his engineer boot before prying open my hand and taking my two dollars. I tried not to cry as the wind was knocked out of me. I shamefully admit I had a brief thought about why a grown man had struck me, a small child, and if he was white I suppose I would have thought the man a criminal. He was, however, a different colour then me and since I was the white male it was simply my duty to accept his culture.

The teacher made a big deal out of my being late and then of the massive red welt which turned into a 3 inch bruise on my stomach. Then my parents and the police made a big deal out of trying to get me to identify the attackers. When I did they stopped making such a big deal, recognizing that I was not the victim of a crime but just experiencing multiculturalism. They showed me a big binder with a lot of faces inside, asking me if I recognized any of them. There were lots of evil white men inside, a few disenfranchised brown Native Americans and black men but none matched the nice Somali that taught me about his ways. The incident was soon dropped.

I had many more enlightening multicultural encounters after that, the most shameful of which occurred in grade 6 when me and my friend committed a hate crime by attacking some Sikh kids that had earlier cornered my friend's sister and tried to make her lift her skirt up for them. That was their culture, and we evil white boys should have known better by then. I felt absolutely no revulsion or hatred for the older men in my city and society in general as my Principal and Vice Principal, both evil white men who had fortunately embraced multiculturalism, forced my friend and I to shake hands with the Sikh boys we had attacked for no good reason.

It's not a crime, it's their CULTURE.

My friend's family could not get over their evil whiteness and moved shortly thereafter.

My own mother and father tried their best to avoid giving into their hatred, even as in my weaker moments I admit I begged them to leave as well. When our evil white neighbour got hit with a brick in the head walking to his car after work, I guess my mom and dad finally realized that multiculturalism can affect the morally superior baby boomers too, no matter how much they tried to make our city a Multicultural Utopia.

So, the cowards we are, the Chubbs shamefully retreated to a smaller town. The population was almost 90% white and I spent my boring high school years soullessly safe. My grades skyrocketed since my classes were full of calm, boring evil white people who didn't scream at each other in different languages or bring pellet guns into class. To make up for my shameful ways I attended university, giving tens of thousands of dollars and three years of my life to further the feminist indoctrination institution.

And today, now that my country is thoroughly multicultural, I don't have to worry about finding any more evil white communities! Chasing careers in a crowded job market saturated with affirmative action laws and immigrant driven wage undercutting, I get to relive my childhood every single day! I just hope those evil white people living in suburbs, gentrified neighbourhoods and gated communities get to experience the sheer joys of multiculturalism one day. After all, they're the ones who instituted it in the first place and have spent so much time spouting how good it is for everyone. I know they're afraid of affecting the rest of society with their evil whiteness, but it's okay. Most of us Millennials and Generation Xers have paved the way for you baby boomers; we have met multiculturalism and it is us!

So come on folks. Erase those borders, open up those gates and for god sakes build a project or two in mostly white neighbourhoods. Multiculturalism ain't so bad, and it's-a-comin' anyways – don't you want to be ahead of the curve?

Maybe we just need some more examples; why don't you, gentle reader, share some of your experiences with multicultural utopianism below?

That's how they made me, Facist baby, Utopia, Utopia…

Generation Y Bother

Everybody wants a quick fix, a magic pill, 5 easy steps, or a 30 second trick to change their lives forever. Even here at Return of Kings many of the most popular posts have been succinct hits of information and entertainment. The 9 Ugliest Feminists in America, 24 Signs She's a Slut, 8 Signs She's A Keeper, and many more.

Everybody wants a how to manual or brief instructions on how to incite revolutionary change within oneself. We want to be told how to live and we want to be lead instantaneously to greatness. From Tim Ferriss to Dr. Oz we are being sold these quick fixes.

Generation Y is criticized for being entitled, soft, narcissistic, lazy, and so on. I fully agree with this and I believe the problem is this culture of quick fixes, 30 second tricks, and magic pills which are said to cure our every ailment we are told we have.

The most successful fixes are shared by those who distill their years of servitude and experience into a succinct manual for success. After a quick Google search, we Gen Y'ers find this work and assume that since we have tasted the essence of innovation we no longer need experience.

We don't respect our elders because we think we know better, we talk back to our bosses because we think we understand more, we wave a bachelors degree and believe that trumps sobering time working outside of textbooks. We as generation Y'ers truly believe we can have it all, or in the very least a little bit of everything.

Hypothetically lets say life is like a video game and you only have a finite amount of points to spend on a set number of skill categories. Would you evenly distribute them ending up mediocre at everything? Or would you pick a few skills to concentrate your efforts in to so that you will excel in a specific field?

What gen Y'ers are doing are generalizing. Gathering information, learning a few skills here and there then wondering why we are not reaching our semi-related goals. If there is one thing that should be taught in schools it should be that at 20 something years old you are not special, you know nothing, and you deserve nothing until you sit down and actually get the experience it requires to master a certain area of one's life.

There really is no better way to get better than to keep your head down and go one step at a time through the footsteps of those greater than you. Only then will you have the perspective to improve the existing framework.

The Sissy Who Refused To Wear Men’s Clothing

October 6, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The inimitable LA Times has recently reported on the story of a long-time, cross-dressing man known as Sissy Goodwin.

Sissy has lived his entire life in Wyoming. He was born into a terribly unhealthy world, as his mother was an alcoholic and his father was physically abusive. As a response to this awful and untoward treatment by a male figure, he hyper-identified with his mother. Most men like Sissy in his age bracket became forerunners to second-wave feminism, refused to identify with anything remotely masculine and simply divorced themselves from positive relationships with other men.

In the long run, most men in this situation simply have life-long struggles with masculine identity that relate directly with self-esteem, ability to attract and maintain healthy relationships with women and the inability to connect positively with other men. However, Sissy took a bizarre approach – wearing women’s clothing. Tellingly, his sense of feminine fashion seems oddly stationed in the pre-1950’s era – he even admits as such, saying his preferred clothing belongs more in the 1950’s. Since he is a clear-cut liberal, citing the 1950’s is damning – he knows his clothing belongs in another era.

Sissy recounts, with detail, numerous incidences of what he calls “homophobia.” He recalls hateful slurs directed at him, sneers in the local supermarket and outright violence visited on him. The article goes so far as to mention Matthew Shepard, a gay man killed under disputed circumstances in the late 1990’s. Gay advocates refuse to admit Shepard’s murder was for any reason other than two men who were closeted homosexuals that murdered an out and proud gay man in Shepard. Still, for this incredible torrent of vitriolic hatred and bigotry, did Sissy leave Wyoming for the tolerant pastures of a big city? The article states cross-dressing is so commonplace in major cities that he would exist simply as another human. No, no, no: Sissy remained in the feverishly intolerant atmosphere of Wyoming.

I am going to suggest something radical, apparently intolerant, and true: people do what they want. If Sissy was so worried about being a victim of crime and his acceptance in a community, then why didn’t he move? The most common response to this assertion would be that people should be able to be whatever they want wherever they want. I don’t agree with that statement for many reasons, but most saliently here is this: people do what they want precisely because people only do that they want. If what he truly wanted was to be accepted in Wyoming, he would learn to dress in way that reflected prevailing norms. If what he truly wanted was social acceptance, he would move to San Francisco where his choice of who he is would be more accepted.

The fact he refused to change his style of dress while still remaining in his home state says exactly what he wants: for people around him to treat him badly for his choices as a man. Sissy knows that people will automatically assume he is 100% against violence and expressions of bigotry, but his behavior completely belies that he against expressions of hatred and violence towards himself.

Sissy wants to be treated badly by men he perceives as masculine. The article makes a point to highlight he teaches at the dreadfully male-centric world of Casper College's power technology lab, where he bravely wears his yellow top and carries his pink lunchbox. First off, those are more markers of youthful femininity, not a person drawing Social Security – anybody else notice the girlish bow in his hair?

Second, Sissy seems to love to press right up against the edge of the box, without actually having to step outside the box. He seems to be relieved that so many of his students have decided to show their support by wearing pink in their hair, but come on. What was the point of all this wearing women's clothing? To combat gender expectations? You mean he has engaged in a pattern of behavior over multiple decades so other men can make the choice to wear women's clothing? Was it his biological calling to wear female's clothing? Or are we simply to accept this man's choices simply because he engaged in them?

The latter reason is the story-time lesson we are supposed to glean from this heavy-handed and predictable piece. As expected: male privilege, bigoted intolerance in the red-state America and women fearlessly accepting a man who wears lace panties on the regular. Regardless, the most interesting aspect of this story is the complete lack of understanding of why people are the way they are. A common claim, here, is that people should be allowed to be who they are so long as it doesn't hurt anybody. This man has kids. His own son was quoted as stating he sees his father as brilliant, but Sissy admits some form of guilt or shame, as he admits "I blame myself now…[my son] was defending his dad when he didn't really know what he was defending him for."

Really? Now, suddenly, all that self-aggrandizing behavior Sissy engaged in over the course of decades – bringing shame to his family and embarrassing his wife (you can't argue she wasn't negatively affected by all the attention directed his way) – is now an issue because his son is implicated? Sissy feels some twinges in his heart now that a young boy has been placed in a similar situation as he was. Forced to deal with untoward attention he didn't ask for, his son reminds Sissy all too much of his youth. A self-absorbed male gives birth to another male – just a potential usurper to the primary role Sissy has carved out for himself in the Lifetime movie of his life.

Which might be the saddest aspect of this story: Sissy chose this path, but as a response to his father's abuse, and most likely, his mother's weakness. He may have taken to wearing women's clothing in a way of idolizing the mother he deified; it may have been a way of acting out the role she should have taken in response to an abusive father. Regardless, this man's life was one of his choosing, but far, far sooner than he should had to make a choice.

Children shouldn't be forced to take up roles, much less ones taken up in the crepuscular lights of their existence. This deep-seated choice of his to wear women's clothing was born of a highly unhealthy identification with his mother. As a result of his choices as a child, he has made a life of himself and how people respond to his decision to be a man who wears women's clothing. Without children, he can freely view others simply as objects who either give him worship (tolerance) or hatred (anybody who doesn't worship him). With children, he suddenly feels a strong jolt of guilt, only to deny that guilt and port it out as shame, as he has refused to change and figure out quite why he needs to dress as a woman.

Any man who desires so deeply to wear women's clothing – much less women's fashion dating back to their youth – has serious problems. Media outlets, like the LA Times, love tidy stories of impossibly quick transformations or normalization of personality disorders. Both serve to feed the audience's desire to either have a quick and easy morality tale, or an all-too-brief expose that highlights the pervasive intolerance of people who are not in the targeted readership demographic.

As for Sissy, he still refuses to address why he needs to wear women's clothing. Indeed, his son observed that his father wore men's clothing at his sister's wedding. Curious, Sissy refused to wear men's clothing for his entire son's childhood, but when in the presence of God at a wedding, he surrenders to wearing men's clothing. Somebody has a clear issue with authority figures.

It really doesn't matter, as Sissy has spent his entire life wasting emotional energy on propping up a psychological construct that carried him through his childhood, only to not abandon it as an adult – clinging to a past that hasn't existed for decades. He has drug his children, his wife and his social circle at large through repeated episodes of those who would mock or abuse him for wearing women's clothing. A fully grown man – a father, a husband – needing to be a victim of perceived hatred in order to bolster his self-identity. Sad.

I'd venture to guess that Sissy's dad beat him when his dad claimed Sissy wasn't man enough. Sissy's dad was 100% wrong when Sissy was a child, but his dad is 100% right today.

Obamacare Boils Down To More Free Shit For Women

October 6, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Peter Schiff, a prominent libertarian-minded economist, and ever the government watchdog, has brought to our attention that Obamacare discriminates against men. Namely, there is no more price difference between men and women under Obamacare; previously insurance companies would charge more for women and less for men. Insurance companies normally would charge women more since they used healthcare much more than men do, as women are weaker, generally more sickly, and also have that tendency to get pregnant, but now men are going to subsidize a woman's life even more, in additional to all the usual benefits women get in virtue of their sex.

Schiff points out that men already die sooner than women and pay more for life insurance; men get into more accidents and pay more for auto insurance; men already pay more in terms of time and money during the courtship process as well. Health insurance was their only break, but now they do not even get that.

I would recommend watching the entire video above. It's only 10 minutes long and Schiff does a great job of laying out why Obamacare is a raw deal for men.

And for the "men" who voted for Obamacare – what were you thinking, voting for a male feminist?

Special Thanks To Our October Sponsor

October 6, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Not long ago I put up a call for individuals or business to advertise as a monthly sponsor where they get exclusive promotion on ROK. Our first sponsor for this month is My New Company, which helps you create a corporation, LLC, or DBA.

> We are a small business that understands the needs of small business owners. That's why we provide exceptional service, for less money, with much more included in each business formation package. We offer a 100% satisfaction guarantee and we're always a phone call away to guide you throughout the incorporation process. So take a look around, compare our service to the competition (compare the total price) and see why we are one of America's fastest growing incorporation services.
> MyNewCompany Startups Made Simple

I don't know how many of your are starting a business at the moment, but if you are, check out My New Company. We thank them for their support, and it couldn't have come at a better time because we recently upgraded our hosting infrastructure and are now on a dual-processor server that gives us ten times the capacity as before. I hope you have noticed an increased in performance when visiting the site in the past week.

If you are interested in becoming an ROK sponsor, visit our sponsorship page. Otherwise, you can drop a couple bucks in our tip jar. Your supports means a lot in light of some sustained feminist criticism we've been receiving lately for Tuthmosis' post 24 Signs She's A Slut.

Fat Shaming Week

October 7, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Geoffrey Miller
@matingmind

Dear obese PhD applicants: if you didn't have the willpower to stop eating carbs, you won't have the willpower to do a dissertation #truth

2:23pm - 2 Jun 13

I've previously written about how the very concept of beauty in the Western world is being attacked. Coordinated efforts are being made to re-define beauty to accommodate the growing heft of strong, independent American women. These efforts are succeeding, because there are many fat women who are actually proud of their fat, with no immediate plan to lose the weight. Except for a handful of deviant websites like 4chan and Misc, no one is pushing back against fat acceptance.

There is no prominent politician or media figure who uses their influence to say, "Hey now, fat people are decreasing life spans and burdening our health care system." There is no one stating the obvious that a person's physical appearance is a reliable indicator of their character. There is no Dr. Oz or Dr. Phil stating that it's impossible for a whale of immense proportions to be a psychologically well-balanced person. There is no male celebrity stating that he rather die than have sex with a woman over 150 pounds.

Why is this? We are allowing fat people to change the definition of beauty? Because they are consumers with money to spend and because they are citizens with votes to cast. Offending them is not prudent from a business or political standpoint. Telling them to put the goddamn bacon cheeseburger down may cause them to spend their money elsewhere or vote for the other guy. This means that fat acceptance will continue to make strides in the corporate and political sectors of life, but thankfully these two institutions don't completely control the culture. No matter how many ads Dove makes featuring morbidly obese women in bikinis, most men will simply not find fat women attractive. No matter how many feminists tell you to stop being "sexist" for having a natural and biological preference for fit women, most men would rather jerk off with their left hand than try to find the vaginal entry point of a fat woman.

That's where we come in. We at ROK fully understand that the reason women are so against fat shaming is because it works. Mocking someone for lazy and slothful behavior is one of the best ways to motivate them to change and appear more pleasing before our presence. If a fat woman goes to the bar with attitude, thinking she's a great catch, but several men check her for that arrogance by calling her a grenade launcher, do you think she'll feel comfortable the next day for her scheduled cupcake and ice cream binge?

Hurting people's feelings is the quickest way to get them to change, as any man who has been rejected by women can tell you (we can get laid today only because we've adapted to being shamed and punished for our appearance and beta male behavior over the course of many years). It's no coincidence that fat shaming and slut shaming are two big causes du jour of mustached feminists, because these two work synergistically in creating women who are not fat and not unabashedly slutty. The fact that these shaming techniques are being attacked simply confirms their immense power.

Therefore, we are proud to announce this week as Fat Shaming Week. For the next seven days, we will promote a culture of fat shaming. The brightest masculine minds are currently at work to bring you a delicious buffet of fat shaming analysis and literature. During fat shaming week, I implore you not to whine and nag about wanting a wider selection of posting matter. If you don't like fat shaming—and we don't see why that would be the case—come back next Monday when we return to our regular program. We have decided as a group that fat shaming is essential in creating a society of thin, beautiful women who are ashamed for being ugly. Let the fat shaming begin!

3 Reasons Why America Can’t Afford Obesity

October 7, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The topic of obesity is a familiar one in the United States. The condition has become so closely associated with American life that some even consider it one of the nation’s chief exports, and up until recently America was the most obese country on Earth.

I've been pleased with the direction obesity discussions are taking lately. More and more mainstream media outlets are reporting on the problems associated with obesity, and even the First Lady of the United States has taken the time to focus on the topic. There have been good results too: obesity rate increases have stalled in the USA, a sign that at the very least we've come close to rock bottom with this epidemic and seen things get about as bad as they can get.

That being said, there is still a lot of delusional talk out there about obesity. Fat acceptance movements persist, claims of "fatphobia" are still being thrown at critics of the obese, and many mainstream media outlets still lament the persistence of what they call "fat shaming".

Now don't get me wrong, I can see where some critique of the current dialogue on obesity is welcome. For some people obesity is an actual result of serious genetic conditions or illnesses, but these people are quite rare (much rarer than the pro-fat camp would have you believe). Similarly, I acknowledge that the BMI isn't a perfect measure of healthy weight in humans. There are many men who are "obese" simply because they lift weights, but can't be considered anything less than in peak physical shape. There are also probably a few women who are overweight for similar reasons. These people aren't very common but I'm aware of their existence.

That being said, the excuses above do not apply to the vast majority of America's obese population, nearly all of whom are the way they are because of poor diets and poor (or nonexistent) exercise habits. The vast majority are not victims of genetic diseases—they are victims of misinformation and a society that still seems all too willing to assuage their ego by telling them how "all bodies are beautiful" (lamenting any critique of them as "fat shaming"), instead of actually dealing with a very real issue.

Here are three reasons why we can't afford to let this proceed:

1. Lifespans

For the first time in the modern era, the United States is projected to witness a significant decline in the life expectancy of its citizens.

> Over the next few decades, life expectancy for the average American could decline by as much as 5 years unless aggressive efforts are made to slow rising rates of obesity, according to a team of scientists supported in part by the National Institute on Aging (NIA), a component of the National Institutes of Health

> Additional research has shown that people who are severely obese — with a BMI greater than 45 — live up to 20 years less than people who are not overweight. Some researchers have estimated that obesity causes about 300,000 deaths in the U.S. annually. In addition, obesity is fueling an epidemic of type 2 diabetes, which also reduces lifespan.
> To estimate the overall effect of obesity on life expectancy in the U.S., Olshansky and his colleagues calculated the reduction in death rates that would occur if everyone who is currently obese were to achieve the difficult goal of losing enough weight to reach an "optimal" BMI of 24. The calculation was based, in part, on age, race, and sex-specific prevalence of obesity in the United States from the Third National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey. Based on these calculations, the researchers estimated that life expectancy at birth would be higher by 0.33 to 0.93 year for white men, 0.30 to 0.81 year for white women, 0.30 to 1.08 year for black men, and 0.21 to 0.73 year for black women if obesity did not exist.

People want to enjoy healthy, long lives. As a society, we want all of our citizens to enjoy healthy, long lives. Obesity is genuinely limiting the ability of Americans to do these things in the future, and is a factor that is literally jeopardizing our future by ensuring that Americans have less of it to look forward to.

2. Healthcare Costs

The most direct costs of obesity relate to healthcare expenditures, and they are quite extensive:

> Reports on obesity-related medical spending (direct costs) have charted a steady rise in obesity's cost over the years, as the epidemic has grown. One widely-quoted estimate from Finkelstein and colleagues, based on data from the U.S.

> Medical Expenditure Panel Survey (MEPS), found that obesity was responsible for about 6 percent of medical costs in 1998, or about $42 billion (in 2008 dollars). By 2006, obesity was responsible for closer to 10 percent of medical costs—nearly $86 billion a year. More recently, Cawley and Meyerhoefer drew headlines with their estimate that obesity accounts for 21 percent of medical spending—$190 billion in 2005—more than double Finkelstein and colleagues' earlier estimate from MEPS data.
> Looking ahead, researchers have estimated that by 2030, if obesity trends continue unchecked, obesity-related medical costs alone could rise by $48 to $66 billion a year in the U.S.
> Countries with lower obesity rates than the U.S. spend a smaller share of their healthcare dollars on obesity, but the burden is still sizable.

On a per person basis, the obese are very expensive:

> Several investigators have evaluated the cost of obesity on an individual level. Finkelstein and colleagues found that in 2006, per capita medical spending for obese individuals was an additional $1,429 (42 percent higher) compared to individuals of normal weight. Cawley and Meyerhoefer, meanwhile, found that per capita medical spending was $2,741 higher for obese individuals than for individuals who were not obese—a 150 percent increase.

I think that the seriousness of this spending cannot be overstated. We're in the midst of a shutdown of the U.S. Federal Government that resulted in large part from debates over healthcare programs and the costs associated with them. As the American population gets older these costs will only go up, meaning that we will need to find more money to fund healthcare programs. Where this money will come from is anybody's guess, as there don't seem to be an abundance of options.

3. Economic Costs

The healthcare costs are just the tip of the iceberg. The more indirect costs of obesity hit hard as well.

How hard? Try $390 Billion a year:

click for full size

We are approaching a period of very serious challenges to our prosperity. Western nations like the United States are getting older, and that rising number of senior citizens will lead to rising healthcare costs and significant losses in economic productivity (youth = higher productivity, lower likelihood of retirement, etc). As the golden days of seemingly endless prosperity that American Baby Boomers grew up with come to an end, their children and grandchildren will be left to face a much less economically certain future. They'll be in no position to face the challenges that future will bring if they can't take an objective look at issues like obesity, objectively examining the consequences of said issues and making a conscious effort to reduce them.

The objective truth is simple: we are living in a society that simply cannot afford the obesity epidemic we're facing now. Feelings will be hurt and labels of "fat shaming" will fly, but a sustained effort to combat obesity—an effort which will require fully acknowledging that it is not a positive thing and that saying "You're beautiful the way you are!" is no excuse—will eventually need to happen.

Those unwilling to face this reality had best be willing to pay, or have their children ready to pay in the future, the exorbitant price that will accompany their refusal.

How To Prepare For Your First Triathlon

October 7, 2013 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Much is discussed in this realm of the Internet regarding the best way to go about approaching fitness. Let's face it, it is a core principle of who you are as a man. It needs to be a part of every successful man's life, and there is no getting around this as far as I'm concerned. Much of the emphasis is on weight training and bulking up. While I would not pose any argument that is the way to get to get girls, there are also other forms of exercise that can easily become part of your mission, or at least an attractive hobby. It takes dedication, passion, and the willingness to take a lot of hurt.

I'm speaking of a triathlon.

I tentatively tend to run this as a three part series. The first one will cover the first baby steps into the sport, the second will cover race training, and the final one will cover an actual race.

If you don't know what triathlon is, it's an endurance sport that combines three endurance sports into one long race. Swim, bike, run. This is typically the order, save for a few reverse races that pop up on the calendar. It is not a duathlon, it is not a bike race, it is a triathlon. The distances of these races varies greatly, from the beginning sprint distance (roughly a 400-800 meter swim, 12 mile bike, and 3.1 mile run) to the elusive Ironman races (2.4 mile swim, 112 mile bike, and then a marathon, 26.2 miles).

Obviously, training for an Ironman cannot be taken lightly. For the average person, an Ironman day consists of probably about 25,000 calories and numerous stops on the side of the course at the porta-pottys.

Triathlon is a great sport for anyone to get in and try once. Don't start with the Ironman. Contrary to popular belief, you do not need to invest tons of money into the sport right off the bat. Get into a local sprint triathlon for about $50 with a friend or two, and see if you enjoy the sport. If you decide to undertake this journey, here is some very beginner-friendly advice to get you off the couch, and into the water, on a bike. or out running.

Things people say you need (you don't)

$2,000 super duper aerodynamic carbon fiber triathlon bike

It's simply not necessary. Assuming you are doing a sprint distance, even a professional biker would only squeeze a few extra seconds out of a high-end bike. I strongly encourage getting a bike with gears though, and preferably a road bike with skinny tires as opposed to a mountain bike. However, a mountain bike is sufficient. A fixie lacking brakes, or a 55-pound beach cruiser, is not.

Expensive nutrition or recovery drinks

You don't need the gel shots that are pure sugar. Eat a granola bar instead, or drink a soda. You don't need the $50 "recovery mix" from the latest nutrition vendor. Drink a class of chocolate milk.

A team or club

Any good club worth their salt welcomes all triathletes of all skill levels on their weekly group swims, rides or runs. Go and join in, see if you like the people. Avoid membership dues or fancy club kits until you know you like racing.

Wetsuit

This one may vary depending on where you live. I'm fortunate enough to live in Southern California, which means I can get by without a wetsuit for much of the year. For longer races a wetsuit is a necessity for buoyancy, but for short races you can do without one. Also, keep in mind that if you want to race with a wetsuit, that means you need to practice with the wetsuit on. Shoulder/arm movement is greatly restricted by wetsuits. More than likely, the majority of swim training will be done in a heated pool where a wetsuit isn't going to be much fun (keep in mind chlorine also can have negative effects depending on the type of wetsuit).

Things people don't mention (they should)

A good pair of swim goggles

This is NOT an area to cheap out on. Spend at least $20. Try them out in the store. Press them against your face, they should stick onto your eyes with good suction. If they fall off immediately, do not buy them. If you know the races you are competing in are going to be open-water versus pool swims, I would recommend trying some goggles designed more for that.

There are few things less fun in the world than having ocean water fill your eyes for 1,500 meters of swimming.

Running shoes

Can't stress this one enough, do NOT go the cheap route on your running shoes. I'm a strong advocate of minimalist running, but you need to work into it. Make sure you have a good pair of running shoes that don't leave your feet aching afterwards. Gradually make the transition to lighter, more minimalistic shoes.

Personally, I train in Nike Frees and race in Zoot TTs.

A helmet

Obvious. Don't be stupid.

The girls…

…are not that cute. Don't get me wrong, there will be some, but if you're better off doing yoga or spin class if you want to pick up chicks. The ones who are cute are likely not that into the sport. The girls who are really into the sport age horribly. All the hours of feet pounding the pavement, and hours in the sun make female triathletes look years older than they actually are. One of my teammates last year qualified for the Ironman world championships in Hawaii. When I first met her, I thought she was 26.

She was 21.

The below is the exception, not the norm.

Keep up your weight-lifting regimen

…but stop lifting heavy. Higher reps, lighter weights are your friends. Try to organize your training in a smart way; and you'll need to figure out your recovery times individually. If you lift upper body on Monday but then your swim workout is greatly impacted Tuesday, it will hurt you in the long run.

You need a full day to recover

Once a week. On this day, know that if you can sit, it's better than standing. If you can lie, it's better than sitting. If you can sleep, it's better than being awake.

You will likely be skinny-fat

Endurance sports are not for those who want to look great. If that's your cup of tea, stick to lifting. Personally, all the hours in the sun make me crave sugar, carbs, and other junk food. I generally satisfy these cravings, but I believe that's a firm reason why I'm usually not as lean during the season. I tend to have a more ripped/lean look in the offseason.

Know that you are going to be stronger in one discipline. Accept that.

If you have been running for five years but have never done a flip turn in your life, that's okay. Accept that swimming is going to be a struggle at first. This does not mean you give up run training for swimming. You need to be a stone-cold killer in at least one discipline, this will help your confidence in training and on race day immensely.

More importantly than anything, and while it make sound cliche: have fun. Make it your mission to finish an Ironman. Use it as a way to get in shape. Use it to make a new social group.

See you at the starting line.

Obesity Is A Bigger Threat Than Al-Qaeda

October 8, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Morals and customs vary from culture to culture, and across historical periods. In a thousand ways through the ages, man has used a complex interplay of moral codes, religions, and taboos to promote social order and cohesion as a precondition of civilization. So, for example, in old China, a woman was afraid to expose her feet; in ancient Crete and old India, women were unafraid of exposing their breasts; and until recently, Berber women in North Africa hesitated to expose their mouths. Numerous examples of the wide divergence of customs and moral codes can be cited by any well-traveled anthropologist.

But a little knowledge can be a dangerous thing.

The immature, egotistical mind sees the variety of customs and morals in history as proof of their worthlessness. This would be an incorrect conclusion. The changeability of morals down the ages only proves the ingenuity of man in finding different ways to impose social order in a variety of climates, environments, and epochs. In order for social cohesion and civilization to flourish, everyone needs to know the rules of the game. There must be some set of generally agreed-on standards to which all may subscribe, willingly or unwillingly. It is a dangerous thing to try to substitute one individual's judgment for the collective wisdom of a hundred centuries and a hundred million minds. The modern egoist never remotely suspects that even things which he does not understand may nevertheless be valid.

And so it is today when we consider the subject of obesity. When we talk about fatness, I am speaking of the stomach-churning monstrosities waddling and fitfully lurching their way around the typical American suburban megastore. These creatures are clothed, invariably, in stretch pants or some other wretched rag, and usually followed by a trail of snot-nosed offspring from the shallower end of the gene pool.

I remember the words of a svelte, beautiful Japanese girl who came to visit me here in the States a few years ago, as she first landed in San Francisco to change planes for the last leg of her flight. It was her first trip to America. Laying eyes on a vomitous obese person for the first time, she told me in the most strained polite language, "Oh Quintus…ugh…I never saw such kind of person before…I never knew that such people existed." The way she described it, and the look of spreading horror on her face, almost made it seem she was speaking of a different species of human.

How did things get to be so bad? How can a person have so little self-respect that they allow themselves to fall outside the norms of civilized behavior? I would often ask myself this question. The answer, I've come to believe, is simpler than might be expected. The answer is that they don't care. The negative impact of being a sickening blimp is minimal, and therefore tolerable. And until that cost-benefit equation changes drastically, they will continue to revel in their corpulence. Grossly obese people in America are contemptuous of society's judgments. Their behavior is a fundamental negation of life itself. Until they are hounded, fined, taxed, and shamed into behavior modification, nothing will change.

They thumb their noses at society, and expect to reap the rewards of misguided tolerance while rejecting all the associated responsibilities that come with being a citizen. Their appearance is, fundamentally, a deeply hostile act toward everyone around them. It is a passive-aggressive attack on their fellow men and women. Their appearance announces to the world that they care not one bit about standards, decency, honor, or dignity.

One of the biggest lies foisted on the masses is that "your body is yours to do with as you please." You can do whatever you want with yourself, as long as (in your own judgment) you "don't harm anyone." To this, I say: no.

You are not a special snowflake. You don't have the right to do whatever you want. You are part of a group to which you owe duties and responsibilites. One of those duties is not to harm your fellow man. And you are harming your fellow man with your appearance and attitude. You do not have an unqualified right to indulge your basest instincts and flout the customs and norms that have served humanity well for millenia. Who are you, a corrupt and degenerate specimen of humanity, to set yourself up as a judge and arbiter of things you do not understand?

If a society's biological inheritance is an important gauge of its health, then it can be said that obese people represent a threat to the future of society. As feminism in its current form is a threat to the foundations of civilization, obesity is a threat to the continued survival of humanity itself. This is a demonstrable, biological fact.

The culture of fatness is aided by the media and leadership elements in the popular culture. Junk movies like Shallow Hal (2001), Identity Thief (2013), and a hundred television shows and films (e.g., Man vs. Food, Bridezillas, etc.) promote the idea that fatness is funny, acceptable, and normal. Shallow Hal even went further, suggesting that a man had a psychological problem if he judged a woman in any way based on her appearance. It is perhaps the most insidious beauty-shaming piece of propaganda ever made. I suggest readers watch this film as a means to study the general tactics of the war on beauty.

Powerful financial interests support this culture of fatness, regardless of the threat to the public welfare. They could care less about the health of society: what matters is their profits, and if they have to sell sugary, starchy garbage "food" to every child and adult in America, so be it. The political leadership, bought off by big money in this regard as in so many other things, confines its outrage to rhetorical denouncements (remember, this is a country where even having health insurance is a controversial idea).

One example demonstrates this point. When Congress passed the Food Safety Modernization Act about three years ago, the food industry representatives went ballistic. They spent tens of millions to delay, wear down, and dilute the law to such an extent that the Food and Drug Administration can barely do anything with it. Food policy in America is set by the food industry, not by public health officials. The American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC), funded by Koch Industries and other big corporations (including Google and Facebook), forces through legislation that benefits big business, rather than the public. So-called "ag-gag" bills even go so far as to criminalize whistleblowers or journalists to report abuses in the food industry.

The end result of all this is that what hits the shelves in your local megastore is the most unhealthy junk imaginable at a cheap price. And the average person, more often than not an indolent mule unwilling to exert any mental energy to improve himself, just buys and eats whatever is placed in front of him.

But at some point, personal responsibility must come into play. We cannot blame big business for everything. Living on this earth carries with it certain duties, among them the most basic one of being able to take care of one's body. Shame is the only weapon to stem the tide. And shame works. Daniel Callahan's authoritative study Obesity: Chasing an Elusive Epidemic (2012) convincingly argues that shaming and stigmatization of fatness, consistently maintained, would be an effective antidote to the obesity epidemic. But it must be severe, and it must be consistent. The following are some possible solutions:

A State-Maintained Fatness Registry

The government and the politically-correct machine love to put people they don't like on lists. We already have no-call lists, child abuse registries, child neglect registries, no-fly lists, hate group lists, even "misogyny" lists. The cultural commissars love these lists because it gives them a way of marginalizing and silencing those persons they don't like. Let's see them apply their logic to the morbidly obese. A fatness registry would be a one way to hammer home the message that extreme obesity is socially despicable conduct.

A person exceeding a certain weight limit could be automatically added to a state-wide registry, and would be denied a variety of government benefits unless they lost weight. Their driving licenses could be restricted. They could have restrictions placed on where they can live and work. They would have to take mandatory classes, boot camps, mandatory public service, and sensitivity training about how their repellent appearance hurts everyone around them. Their health insurance should costs much more than people not on the list, since they take a disproportionate amount of the medical benefits in society.

Enforced sterilization or neutering of the irredeemable or the unrepentant should also be considered. Raising children is a privilege, not a right; and no methods are too extreme to halt a society's biological and genetic deterioration. In previous eras, before the advent of the welfare state, such people would be weeded out of the gene pool by dying early deaths from disease or accident. Now they are coddled, empowered, and emboldened. They should not be allowed to destroy society by feeding off its most healthy and vigorous members.

Financial Sanctions

Some companies have already started to use this technique. Certain airlines have begun to charge fees based on weight, a not-so-subtle way of reminding fat people that their conduct has consequences. This concept should be expanded dramatically.

Media and Cultural Awareness

There must be a concerted and sustained media campaign that presents obesity as a threat to humanity's biological inheritance. It needs to go beyond just preaching to people. They've heard it all before, and so the language needs now to be much more urgent, strident, and strong. Screenwriters, directors, and media elites should hammer home the point that a person is a member of society and is expected—no, required—to behave in socially responsible ways. Fatness should be presented as socially undesirable, to be avoided at all costs.

No one is an island unto himself, free to do whatever he wants. This type of extreme individualism is what has led us to this situation. There is too much talk about privileges, and not enough talk about responsibilities.

One recent news report claimed that President Obama's new "food czar" (Sam Kass, a "food initiative coordinator") viewed the obesity epidemic as "a greater threat than Al-Qaeda." More blustery talk, combined with limp-wristed action? Or does he mean what he says? Does he really view the morbidly obese as the enemy, as his words imply? If he truly means what he says, then I challenge him to propose solutions with the same zeal and ruthlessness that the government enacted to empower the military-industrial complex after the 9/11 attacks.

I'm not holding my breath.

Societies decay when the people who compose them begin to decay. The sorry state of public health in America at the individual level is the end result of decades of overindulgence, selfishness, and hyper-individualism. At the macro level, cowardly capitulation to big business and a lack of leadership has allowed garbage food, and garbage people, to permeate every sector of American society, including the schools.

Obama's Food Czar Says Obesity Bigger Threat than Al Qaeda

White House Chef: 'Obesity May be Our Nation's Greatest National Security Threat'

Don't believe me? Take an extended drive through a few states some time. The only places to eat on the road are fast-food joints: the traveler, even if he wants to eat healthy, is faced with a complete nutritional wasteland. I contrast this experience with my travels around Japan and Brazil. At least in these countries you can find healthy foods to eat on the road, such as Japanese bento boxed meals, rice, beans, etc. I found the same experience in Europe and the Middle East.

In the end, societies make choices about what they value. Societies define their values by what they promote, tolerate, or encourage. I do not believe that the grossly obese should be allowed to determine the evolutionary trajectory of the human race. Have no illusions: what is at stake here is nothing less than our biological inheritance. The goal of the obesity movement is to force their vision of "healthy" humanity upon the rest of us. If we are unable or unwilling to defend ourselves against their attacks, it will only be because we don’t care enough, and have opted for the path of self-destruction.

Fat Woman Sucks At Yoga, Gets Rich Anyway

Trina Hall is a Dallas-based yoga teacher who, judging by her mobilization of support from fat apologists, is also something of an internet marketing genius.
Multiple news outlets picked up on her heroic mission to become fat, just to disprove the evil cultural stereotypes that obesity is undesirable and alters a person's self-worth and ability to use their body. If you read between the "you go girl" veneer of the article, you can see that Trina found out these very truths en route to a new business venture:

> "Hall also found that her weight gain affected her ability to practice and teach yoga. She experienced trouble with stamina, certain poses and breath control — to the point where she dramatically cut down on demonstrating poses in her > classes and would instead walk around the room assisting her students."

This provides yet more objective evidence against the laughable "Fit any any size" movement: gaining weight prevented this woman from fulfilling the most basic requirements of an athletic activity that was also her occupation. Note that her fatness also promoted laziness — instead of demonstrating poses she would "assist" others, making her less effective at her job. She writes about her scientific approach to this courageous and illuminating experience on her blog and in the article:

> "I've followed the brand new, yogi-approved Seat Diet. See it… eat it."
> "I changed that to eating anything and everything and all amounts of food that I desired or wanted or thought, "Oh, that would be great." I ate a lot more every day – and I ate a lot of Mexican food. Forty pounds just came as a result of that.

It's an interesting study in human excess that forty pounds of weight can can "just come." Trina's 5'5″ height and (self-reported) 175 lbs would give her a robust BMI of 29. Since she is not a muscle-bound NFL linebacker, this flags her as being significantly overweight and borderline obese.

Not to be outdone in their quest for political correctness, The NY Daily News and HuffPost pieces unsurprisingly shy away from the natural conclusion of this woman's experience: despite what the media tells us, being fat will affect your life in a negative way.

Obviously Trina must have used her firsthand experience to realizes this and refocus her professional life toward preventing and curing obesity in others, right? Negative. A quick look at her blog reveals that the single thirtysomething has rebranded herself as "The Fat Yoga Teacher." She shares her new business venture and mission statement on the articles and the blog:

> "Instead of slaying my means of supporting myself, I want to slay the notion that people who do yoga need to look like the beauties on the cover of magazines."

Before and After. WYB?

As we learned this week, you can't knock an experienced hustler. Trina has identified an increasing market for fat yoga teachers who normalize the flailings of porcine customers whose gunts scrape the ground on every futile downward dog attempt. Even better, she gets to market herself liberally to this niche, receive positive media notoriety, and continue to stuff potato chips into her face while the bucks roll in. Game recognized.

The rest of us, however, must note the subtext of these articles that take a disturbing stance on fitness in our culture. It is a strong statement that someone who takes the path of least resistance is rewarded with fame, cash, and prizes, while people who actually care about their appearance are branded as disordered and misguided.

Despite the spittle-flinging protestations from the growing (ha) movement in our country to normalize obesity, we will never eradicate our innate disgust response to fatness. Whether you censor anti-fat speech or strive futilely to prove that it does not affect one's quality of life, you cannot change the truth that obesity is elementally and undeniably disgusting and undesirable. Even if it can now help you make a quick buck.

The Atlantic: Quitting Is Leadership If You're A Woman

October 8, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Our corner of the web often makes fun of a woman's rationalization mechanism, but never have I seen a mainstream publication so complicit in enabling it while trashing an entire organization.

The story starts with Teach For America (TFA). It receives grants from the federal government to place spunky college students in schools where there is a wide disparity of achievement between whites and minorities. Their aim is to be help minorities do better on standardized tests. Whether that actually helps minorities is an argument for another day.

Enter Olivia Blanchard, a white woman. She committed herself to a two-year stint in TFA and was placed in an urban Atlanta school. Once she realized that teaching is not actually easy, and that her minority students weren't at her beck and call, she began to blame everyone but herself for why it wasn't going smoothly.

> The truth was, the five-week training program had not prepared me adequately.
> During my training, I taught a group of nine well-behaved third-graders who had failed the state reading test and hoped to make it to fourth grade. Working with three other corps members, which created a generous teacher-student ratio, I had ample time for one-on-one instruction.
> That classroom training was completely unlike the situation I now faced in Atlanta: teaching math and science to two 20-person groups of rotating, difficult fifth-graders—fifth-graders so difficult that multiple substitute teachers would vow never to teach fifth grade at our school again.

Unruly students? In a school?!

No training program can teach you adequately from day one. Experience, attention to detail, and continued learning is necessary to pull through, as anyone who started an entry-level job out of college can testify. I've been out of corporate America for a while now, but I believe they call it “on the job training.” Ms. Blanchard tells the story of a woman who also had unruly students:

> Jessica Smith, a corps member I recently called up, agrees. “I’ve struggled with behavior management,” she admits. (As with all the names of teachers I spoke to for this article, “Jessica” is a pseudonym.) Though training includes some instruction in student discipline, “I didn’t really have the training to know how to give consequences consistently,” Jessica said.
> I asked if she reached out for support. “I think I talked to every person I knew to talk to, even our region’s executive director,” Jessica recalled. Although TFA ultimately did send in a behavior-management expert, “The person who finally came in to help me came at the end of February for a 20-minute session.” Is this a representative experience? It’s hard to say. “We provide training in behavior-management techniques,” a TFA spokesperson said when asked about Jessica, “but corps members are expected to adapt their training to their unique school culture. We also provide continuing support for corps members who have trouble fitting in.”
> Jessica has decided not to return to TFA for a second year. She said she was so unsupported that she felt justified reneging on her two-year commitment. “Yes a commitment matters,” she wrote, “but staying isn’t necessarily helpful to your kids or anybody.”

Because TFA didn’t hold Jessica’s hand through every difficulty, she decided it would be “helpful” to just renege on our commitment and quit. At this point it would be prudent to state many women choose teaching for the ease, not for the intellectual rigor. The hours are relatively light, the schedule is predictable, and you get three months off in the summer.

Ms. Blanchard gives Jessica a pass for quitting because, well, she was about to do the same thing. After attacking the TFA and the Atlanta school system with dubious anecdotes and statistics, she sets the reader up for the big reveal:

> I am sitting in a black, leather office chair in my new Washington, D.C., office. I have just been hired at a private company whose vision statement says nothing about closing the achievement gap, and the time has come to send TFA an e-mail announcing that I am leaving the program. I have only completed one year of my two-year commitment, knowing full well that this kind of mission-shirking is seen as a very serious, selfish betrayal within TFA. However, the reality is that my employer has been Atlanta Public Schools, my contract with the district was only for one year, and most of my teaching experiences have been defined by the messy struggles of Atlanta Public Schools, not the comfortable mantras of TFA. I struggle to summon the guilt I know I am supposed to be feeling. My large-screen computer monitor rests sturdily in front of me, and the cursor on an empty Word document blinks.What can I say to them?, I wonder. I steel myself against the > possibility of criticism, against accusations of apathy, inability, or lack of leadership.

> When I click Gmail's Send button, though, I am flooded with relief rather than dread. Because the truth is, by finally showing I don't believe that American education can be saved by youthful enthusiasm, I feel more like a leader than I ever did inside the corps.

She gets hired for a job at a DC firm, tosses her commitment aside with one email, and then declares herself as exhibiting leadership. Editors of The Atlantic have just announced to the world that if you're a woman and enter a difficult job that you can't solve with a Google search, it's fine for you to quit, and if you do, you can successfully pitch them an elaborate story rationalizing your failure.

It's no surprise the article has gone viral, with hundreds of people on Twitter commending Ms. Blanchard for exhibiting leadership by quitting the horrible TFA organization that, in spite of their imperfections, gave her the opportunity they promised. I could find only one voice of dissent:

> She quit teaching in Atlanta after one year to go join an investment bank in D.C. I guess I don't feel her pain? http://t.co/Vo2bmBvqyP
> — David Kallison (@davidkallison) October 3, 2013

Bashing on millennials has become a bit of a tired sport in the past couple of years, but as long as publications like The Atlantic continue to enable their narcissism and poor work ethic, the example they set will simply encourage more female "leaders" like Ms. Blanchard.

Thin Privilege Doesn't Exist

October 9, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Females love to rationalize. Fat females love to rationalize even more. Sometimes, we get a rationalization so big it must be called out. Today is one of those times.

This is thin privilege.

Seriously…this is a real website.

The Definition Of Privilege

Let's first define what exactly constitutes a privilege. And to show how moronic this website is, let's even use the definition of privilege they point to themselves:

> Privilege is any right, immunity, or benefit enjoyed only by a person or group beyond the advantages of most. At TJLP, we think of privilege as an unearned > advantage that a dominant group has over marginalized groups…A key aspect of privilege is that, due to its unearned nature, those who have privilege often do not realize they have it. In other words, they don't see the access and opportunity being a member of a dominant group affords them.

(Emphasis in original)

For example, under this definition being born white is a privilege. It is "unearned" in that you have no control over it. Again, only under this definition, being either male or female can be considered a privilege because again, you do not earn this designation. You are born this way.

Thin Privilege Doesn't Exist

Being thin is not an unearned state. How do I know? Well, besides the obvious fact that one can exercise and eat right and magically morph from being fat to thin, I have personally gone through this. During my early years in college, I was 198 pounds and 6'0. My max bench was 45 lbs. So that should tell you the body type I had…zero muscle, all fat. I never exercised. I would eat pound-sized burritos with nachos and then gorge on multiple cookies after smoking some weed. I was a chubster to say the least.

What was the result? I never got laid. I had less respect from my friends and rightfully so. I still had a lot of friends and had a lot of fun because I was in college, but it ended there. I was not happy and decided I needed to make a change, so instead of writing a blog about why it's ok to be fat, I actually did something. I stopped eating like a pig. My diet consisted of egg whites, grapefruits, chicken breast and veggies. I would not eat after 6pm. And no matter what, no matter how hungover I was from the night before, I would run 4 miles every morning. What happened was I went from 198 to 154 in three months.

Whether that's the best means to lose weight or not — who knows? But guess what: I wasn't fat anymore. People were complimenting me left and right. I snagged my first girlfriend. I was actually hooking up with girls instead of just staring at them. I was able to move around the basketball court instead of just posting up and backing down my opponents. All these benefits that were now conferred on me were earned. All my hard work, self-control and dedication paid off.

Nor am I on the only one. Numerous people I've personally known have done the same thing. Hard work, exercise, and diet, and somehow their bodies decrease in size. Ever wonder why in America hot girls drive Range Rovers and fat girls have jobs? It's because the men that buy said Range Rovers have options, and would never take up a fatty. The hot girls, on the other hand, are going to yoga, pilates, boot camp, the gym; they are the ones eating kale at Whole Foods for every meal. Again, they work for their bodies and the associated "privileges" that come with it. Go outside the Western world and you will find many svelte women. Why? Because they barely eat and walk 5 miles a day (in heels at that). Again, effort and a concentrated desire to not get fat yields these results. Therefore because these are earned rights, by the very definition used in this poor excuse of a blog, thin privilege doesn't exist.

It’s All An Excuse

Some of my closest family members are overweight. And while I love them, I don’t sympathize with them. I’ve seen the way they eat and there is no effort whatsoever to change. They keep hoping that it will just go away. They keep citing the latest craze relying on a magical shortcut to just develop. But it never will. They know deep down in their hearts what it takes but rather rely on excuses, supposed genetics, or society like these blubber bloggers do.

Perhaps, just maybe if the authors of this blog spent a little more time in the gym instead of spending all their free time constructing 451 pages of babble, they’d earn some of that coveted thin privilege…

5 Ways To Bully Fat Sluts On A Date

October 9, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

I am shocked and appalled at Return of Kings' devotion to "shaming fatties." I cannot remain silent. Like my big beautiful sisters, I shall be loud and proud in my defiance.

There are lots of insecure men out there with tiny penises. And they want to make big beautiful women feel unwanted and undesirable. They will go to any length to make curvy girls feel bad about their voracious appetite for cronuts and mimosas. They think nothing of vicious bullying the likes of which every big girl needs to be forewarned. I've assembled a list of some of their methods, so that big girls everywhere can be on the lookout. Take note.

1. Go Bike-Riding Together

Invite her to go for a ride by the beach, or along a scenic path several miles long. Already, the big girl will be on edge. The mere mention of exercise makes her sweat, and she may not even know how to ride a bicycle – her parents couldn't afford the adamantium-reinforced frame required for her bulk.

You will tell her that at the end of the ride, you will treat her to a vast spread of culinary delights at the local Hometown Buffet. Start the date off at her place.

You must bring one thing: a pedal bicycle with a discreet electric motor. Initially, you'll go at a reasonable speed, using the pedals alone. A mile or two in, she's starting to tire – and that's when you engage the motor. You're still pedaling nonchalantly, yet now you're racing far ahead of her.

As she beckons you to slow down, profess not to understand. "What? Look, I'm not even pedaling that fast [motions to half-hearted pedaling]. I can't hear what you're saying, come closer!"

She tries in vain to keep up, and her face turns fire truck red. The ice cream sundae bar at the buffet looms large in her mind, pushing her to trudge on. With about a block or two between you, you start to really book it, until she can no longer see you. Take a detour off the path and treat yourself to a Brazilian barbecue buffet for one, as your date furiously pedals for a feast wickedly stricken from her sausage-like digits.

2. Go For A Hike Together

Everyone says they like to hike, but no one does it voluntarily. Yet they're anxious to keep that a secret – so if you invite them to go on a hike, they will be sure to say yes.

Invite the big girl of your choice on a hike. There are lots of big and willing girls to choose from, after all. Encourage her to wear her finest exercise attire. She will automatically bring trail mix (100% M&Ms, 0% fruits or nuts) and a jug of Sunny D, you don't even need to ask her.

Put on sunblock before you see her. If you bring the sunblock along, she will make you rub her down in the parking lot, in front of all the avid lean hikers. It would take a whole jug of sunblock to canvass all her folds and crevices, and that means kissing eight bucks goodbye. Anyhow, I hear skin cancer is slimming.

Her trail snacks will induce a sugar rush for the duration of the hike. Just as you're finishing the hike, her energy will subside. Tell her you have to use the bathroom, and gesticulate vaguely in some direction. Then, dart off to the parking lot and drive away. Hikes on hikes, baby!

3. Go Shopping Together

Your big date is such a beautiful girl that she deserves nothing but the finest finery. You will buy the outfit of her choosing – money is no object. She just needs to model it for you first, to ensure that everything fits just right.

Proceed to your local mall, to Abercrombie and Fitch. They usually have a chiseled male model standing outside, to welcome girls in – even if your date says she “hates” Abercrombie, she will be just giddy after getting a come-on from an attractive man. She strides in gladly.

While she’s picking out mounds of clothes, you’re texting your Tinder matches on your phone. As she proceeds to the dressing room, a loss protection officer accosts her, stopping her in her tracks. She is told to cease and desist, that she must return all of the clothes to the racks — if she tries them on, they will be permanently stretched and damaged. She can’t even buy them, lest she try to return them later in their expanded state.

As she bubbles with rage, you make a quiet exit and haul off to the lululemon store one floor up for their free yoga class. As you cool down afterwards with the cutie at the counter, remember to silence your phone, as your date will be blowing it up, demanding you take her to Coldstone Creamery. Maybe you use sex and lifting to manage your stress, but she uses octuple sundaes. Meanwhile, you pair off with Miss Lulu to the one place in the mall where your original date will never set foot: the juice bar serving kale smoothies and pureed beets.

4. Take Her To The Zoo

You're feeling a little young, and decide it's time for a jaunt to the zoo. You tell your big girl date it will be great fun, and that you are going to play up your appearance as a big hairy Neanderthal. Tell her she should wear some sort of animal print to get in the spirit.

When you get to the zoo, drop her off at the entrance so that she won't know where your car is parked. As you make your way in to the zoo with her and get settled with a big bucket of buttered popcorn.

It's time for action. There will be lots of little kids milling about the zoo, and they are essential. When she's not looking, take a few steps away. Locate a little kid nearby and point to your date, "do you know what kind of animal that is?" Kids are creative little fuckers, so they'll come up with something apt. You follow up with, "I wonder what would happen if you tried to feed it. It's probably hungry." You give some of your popcorn to the kid, telling him "here, give it some of these."

Dutifully, the kid trots over and throws popcorn at her back. She feels something lightly hitting her, as the scent of fake butter wafts through her nostrils, pleasing her.

By the end of the date, she is covered in small oil stains. You don't want your Hyundai's plush cloth seating smelling like sweaty hydrogenated oil. You take her to eat at the zoo and excuse yourself to "the bathroom," aka to your chariot in the parking lot. Mmm, freedom.

5. Go Ice Skating Together

The perfect winter diversion. Locate a lake that has recently frozen over, where you and your date will have complete freedom. You start skating the perimeter, saying you want to warm up first. When you're at opposite ends of the pond, beckon her to skate across, directly to you.

As she skates towards you, you feel the ice quivering underneath. You hear a crack, and she suddenly trips. Now she's sloshing about in the water, trying to get back on land. You came prepared, thankfully, with a lifesaver. Actually, you brought a whole roll of them.

You carefully tread towards her, and create a trail of lifesavers and marshmallows in the ice-water, leading her back to solid ice. If you're feeling romantic, clench a donut between your teeth as she gets to your feet. With her last ounce of energy, she grabs your hands and hoists herself up for a bite of that sweet Krispy Kreme, her feet dangling in the water below. You muster all your strength and carry her out.

She can't decide what she's more grateful for, you saving her or the donut. Regardless, she is now yours to lose for life. Enjoy your catch!

Big girls, I hope this brief guide has been a valuable tool in escaping exploitation at the hands of weak men.

Always Take Photos of Fat Women

October 9, 2013 | by Thomas Andersson | Link | Original Link

Fat girls love taking photos of themselves. When their make-up is perfectly applied, the lighting perfectly aligned and their Spanx straight-jacket concealing the vast lunar craters dotting their thighs, a big girl can just about resemble an attractive woman.

This beauty is achieved for a fleeting second, with a half-life akin to a particularly unstable radioactive isotope, captured in an iPhone photo lens, then gone forever. Beyond this brief moment, a tubby lady would prefer to dive-bomb into an active volcano

A young woman named Caitlin Seida, a member of the plus-sized Cosplay community (yes, that is a thing in 2013), decided to venture out of her house dressed as the iconic female video game character Lara Croft.

Prancing around, ruining the fond memories that any man under 30 will have of his formative years spent with his PlayStation 1, Miss Seida was photographed by a passer-by, curious as to why Peter Griffin from Family Guy was wearing short-shorts.

The image was uploaded, and soon became viral on 4chan, 9gag and various other sites decreed unmissable for the office drones of the world. Meme-status was quickly achieved, with Seida winning the affectionate nickname 'Fridge Raider'.

Now riding a wave of global infamy, Miss Seida, after a number of inevitable cupcake/bacon/twinkie binges, penned a wordy response at left-wing wailing-post Salon.com. In the midst of paragraphs of inane self-rationalization comes this nugget of excuses;

"That picture was taken late in the evening — I was red-faced from the heat, my makeup was sweating off and I was lacking proper boob support."
Translation: "I look repulsive."

How You Can Help

It took her photo being shared by tens of millions of people, and the scorn of thousands to finally realize that years of emptying fridges with her mouth had culminated in her becoming an unsightly walking tumor on the face of the planet.

This shows that all you have to do to force a women to face her problems and take control of her life is to take her picture and upload it to the internet.

In support of this website's successful Fat Shaming Week campaign, I urge, you to get out there and every time you see a girl with a bit of muffin top, bingo-wings or indeed cankles – take out your smartphone and snap a photo of her, then upload it to Twitter with the hashtag #FatShamingWeek.

The women of the world need your help and you can make the difference. Get snapping!

5 Reasons Fat Girls Don’t Deserve Love

October 10, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

I interrupt my normal scheduled program of insightful game techniques and tips on how to pick up hot thin sluts and keepers, to bring you the fat -er I mean facts, on why Fat Girls Don’t Deserve Love. This is an open letter to fat girls world-wide, but specifically in the good ole USA, where the fat girl epidemic is at an all time high.

Dear Fat Girls,

Grab a box of Ho Ho’s, a gigantic slice of apple pie topped with old-fashioned cookies and cream ice cream and settle your fatass on your worn out couch. It’s worn out because you sit on it almost 24/7 bitching about why it’s “So hard to find a good man!”, while watching Sex and The City and wondering why it’s hard for you to get laid by handsome, successful chaps like myself. Let me tell you as clearly as I can WHY I cannot have sex with you and more importantly why you do not deserve love…

Because your very large physical presence is a display of slothfulness, low self-esteem, and unattractiveness.

Here is my Top 5 Reasons Why You Don’t Deserve Love:

5. You Smell

It’s impossible to be that fucking fat and be able to wash your ass properly after a shit, unless you take a bath in your swimming pool after each and every shit.

4. You Suck At Sex

Unless you're hell bent on having a heart attack, there's no way in hell you can keep up with my jackhammer porno style sex that I deliver with the velocity of Superman on crack. You lay on the bed with your enormous legs open, begging for me to FIND YOUR PUSSY, which I can't for the life of me, unless I roll you around in flower and look for the wet spot.

3. Public Appearances

For the life of me, I cannot with a good conscious, take you in public and flaunt you around. First off, I don't won't to make people queasy and on top of that I drive a 2-seater of which there is no fucking way in hell you'll fit in it. The only solution would be to get one of those U-Haul trailers and pull you behind me.

2. Can't Hug You Within 3 Seconds

I have to give you 3 hugs just to encompass your entire body, which takes time up out of my life. Time is valuable and spending an extra 5-10 seconds to hug you simply is not congruent with my agenda. Sorry sweets.

1. Eating

All you want to do is eat and dammit I refuse to spend hundreds of dollars a week keeping you fed. It's ridiculous the amount of food you demand daily, in fact, it's enough to feed a pony or two, or perhaps a family of seals. Also, your habit of reaching over to my plate and snatching food like a fucking gorilla simply pisses me off to no extent. For this reason ALONE, you do not deserve love.

You hate thin girls who take care of themselves, call them 'bitches', are filled to the brim with jealousy at their good-looking boyfriends, and all the while you MASK your true feelings of self-loathing by saying that "big is beautiful". Excuse me while I go throw up.

I don't give 2 flying fucks how many politicians, marketing companies, nor that fat girl from Precious, tell you it's okay and attractive to be fat; it's simply not true. Your fatness is the human version of a dead hippo, a beached whale, or to put it more bluntly, a human size cupcake: spongy on the outside, round and full of crap.

All is not lost though. There is hope and it's quite simple: put your motherfucking fork down, go to the gym and don't stop until you're an appropriate weight for your height. Easy right?

Now pull yourself off the couch, go wash your grubby greasy face, throw your shit food into the garbage and go buy a gym membership.

Sincerely,

Men Who Have Their Shit Together and Workout Across The Fucking World

P.S. Even after losing weight, don't even think about NOT getting surgery on those stretch marks. If I get fooled and you take your clothes off and your body looks like a map then I’m going to verbally humiliate you…with a megaphone…to your entire neighborhood.

Larger Women Require Larger Game

October 10, 2013 | by Nigel "Big Game" Davis | Link | Original Link

Big girls need love too. Yet everyday, millions of BBWs (Big Beautiful Women) go to bed hungry and alone, forced to please their starving vagina with corndogs. There just aren't enough men out there that are hardy enough for the big girls. If you describe yourself as adventurous guy that loves extreme sports and challenges, consider the ultimate challenge: hunting down the largest game in the land! The big wild beasts that roam the vast American wastelands are the allegorical descendants of the buffalo that once roamed the great plains. You need Big Game to take out the Big Game.

Big Game is a dangerous business.

But this danger is what makes it so exciting. It’s nothing short of an adrenaline rush when I stuff my big black cock in a BBW’s soft, cellulite riddled ass. It feels like splitting a giant stump with an ax; and If I manage to find that hole, it cracks and bleeds, it’s like discovering a lost pirate booty (pun intended). Anyway, despite the softness of a BBW’s ass, even I have to keep my guard up to avoid injury. If you have a small build or a small cock, basically if you’re an Asian/Jewish guy, then forget it—not trying to sound racist here, just how it is. You have to have the equipment for the job. By equipment I mean much more than just a huge cock. You’ve gotta be built like Hercules with the will and stamina of a slave.

If you have a good robust frame, get your ass in the gym and lift HARD.

I recommend dead lifting a few hundred pounds, as this best simulates the doggy style position with a BBW. Remember, you have to beat that pussy like you’re in the UFC, and every fighter knows the battle is won in the gym. Gotta pump yourself up before you pump it in a rotund marshmallow-hoe like Lindy West. You’ll need every muscle fiber you can muster to lift and grease every slab, so lift hard.

When it comes to approaching, you must have a Big Game plan in place that builds attraction.

My strategy is to follow them from behind, within earshot, until they fart. Everyone farts, but BBWs do so with greater frequency and intensity because their intestines are larger, so there's more gas build up and pressure. Once the fart is released, this is the green light to approach. My typical approach is to walk up to her and immediately take the blame, smiling as I fan it away from her and saying something like, "Excuse me baby, my bad. I'm here to rescue you from myself."

What's so clever about this move is that it's not just an excuse to approach, but it's also a Neg and a Demonstration of Higher Value all in one. At first she feels insecure because she knows she's the one that farted, but then I spin it around by taking the blame and helping her deal with it. This shows her that I'm a gentlemen, and makes it easier for me to move to the comfort building stage. Later when we're in the bedroom, I'll reuse this gambit again to start a farting contest, because it's also a great way to get her to remove her pants.

Always remember to smile throughout the process. It works wonder for me at least, because there's nothing brighter than a black man's smile.

Next we have logistics, which is mandatory in Big Game.

If your logistics aren't planned out right, even a measly 170 pound girl will get tired of walking and complain about it, collapsing before you can get her to your sex location. You have to circumvent this with meticulous planning. This requires taking into account every nearby elevator and ramp, because you want to get your BBW into a wheelchair as quickly as possible. Walking is tiring work for heavier women, so it's important to allow them to reserve their precious energy for sex. Invest in a good, sturdy extra large wheel chair. You can never get one that's too big, and a wheel chair that's too small will just make her feel fat. When you pull out a wheelchair for thicker women, they're always impressed that you were thinking of them.

[image]

Last but not least, you gotta feed your bitches.

This isn't as simple as you'd think, as a lot of amateur chubby chasers make the mistake of feeding their BBW with junk food too early in the game. BBWs are constantly hungry and easily seduced by food, and any skilled Big Game player knows how to use food as bait. He doesn't ruin his game plan by feeding them too early, because a BBW that's not hungry is a BBW that won't give good head. Also, a quick breakfast in bed is all the plausible deniability she needs to rationalize a trip to your place, especially if that breakfast involves double-fudge ice cream with pancakes, and a healthy side of Big Black Cock.

From Fit To Fat

October 10, 2013 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Ashley grew up in a small suburb of a small city. Her family is upper middle class. Ashley never wanted for anything; her first day at university she showed up in a car more expensive then half those in the staff parking lot. For the first 18 years of her life Ashley was on top of the world; while not facially stunning she was pleasant enough to the eye to be considered cute. She was big into volleyball since grade school, and all that running and bouncing in tight spandex had put quite a fit body on her by the time she wandered into our dorm with a small duffel bag over her shoulder and her mom and dad trailing the rear, pushing a pair of moving carts so full and heavy that slaves building the pyramids would have complained about it being excessively cruel. Of course the betas of the dorm crowded in to help, thereby forever destroying the chances of getting some touch off of Ashley.

Ashley had a tight bum, curvy hips (and not the fat kind of curvy – the good kind), a taut midriff and perky but small boobs bordering on a B cup. She had a natural tan from her job of planting trees all summer but she took care to use sunscreen so it was just a light browning, the colour of a perfectly roasted marshmallow – not the blackened saggy chunks that most girls feel the need to burn their skin to, where you're like; "Goddammit, what do they make these marshmallows out of freaking napalm?!" Even Ashley's hair was phenomenal, a light brown so long that it could curtain her bewbs if she wanted it to.

Ashley ala that September

She was hard to peg during our first week. Although Ashley drank like the liberated 18 year old woman she was, we never noticed her sneak off for some dick rendezvous. A few of the tell tale signs of future slutdom were there but none were too blatant. To her defence the worst two could be dismissed quite rationally. Most University students drink themselves blind during their first month, and the little rose tattoo Ashley had on her ankle (gotten as an 18th birthday present) was a typical safe 'rebel' move – the rose was small and out of the way so that it could easily be concealed.

Descent Into The Fatbyss

In October Ashley began her full descent. Although she, like many University girls, made a big show of eating salad for dinner or lunch more and more we caught her later in the day sneaking back to the dorm with brown paper bags or styrofoam boxes reeking of fried meats. A coffee drinker, it was not uncommon to see Ashley with a full cup before one class then catch her two periods later and see another in her hand. Evening cappuccino runs became religious with her, and the ice cream store in the strip mall closest to campus practically had a stool with her name on it.

Of course gone were the days of extreme work outs for Ashley. No longer would her then tight little body be bouncing around in gym class, during intramural and varsity sports and the numerous practices associated with them. She still went to the gym – though went is the most descriptive word. The few times I saw her at the university's gym she was walking old lady with arthritis speed on the treadmill. With meals by mommy out of the picture as well her diet continued to be terrible even though as gross as they were our university café served salads, had a vegetable bar and numerous other healthy alternatives for food. The weekend became Thursday-Sunday for her; binge nights full of sugary vodka coolers, vodka mixed generously with Coke or exceptionally sugary mango juice, creamy liquors. And always McDonalds or pizza to look forward to afterwards.

That is, if Ashley wasn't off getting laid. By November she had thoroughly passed herself around the guys she was willing to bang in our dorm. I was tempted…but I could do, and in fact did, better. In the first two weeks I probably would have. Yet even without Billy's christening across her face Ashley soon had joined the massive pool of Campus Cunny, girls with which one could dependably get laid with minimal effort. Many nights and mornings our small group of guys walking back to our dorm from our conquests would find Ashley. We men were all smiles and laughs – Ashley always looked like she had just come back from her dad's autopsy, preformed while he was still alive.

She wasn't the only one; a brief misogynist aside here – like many negative stereotypes concerning sex, the walk of shame only applies to women. I never once saw a sad guy sneaking out of a dorm in the early AMs. Nearly every gal I saw stuttering along, heels or shoes usually held in her hand, always looked dead eyed and defeated. Some were crying. To contrast, whenever a big group of guys from different dorms would pass each other on the ways back, we often fell into two straight lines and began stoically high fiving each other as we passed, like players after a match saying; "Good game, good game, good game."

She thinks: 'I'm so liberated I can walk with my head down"

Now back on track; after Christmas break Ashley came back with a new tattoo – a tramp stamp – and a fresh piercing in her nose. One of the best burns I've ever heard in my life occurred during our first New Years party; Ricky, a shameless quantity alpha (he who cares more about the quantity then quality of his notches) pointed out Ashley in the crowded dorm room, shouting; "Holy shit! Rich girls even have diamond pimples!" Ashley cried and left as the room erupted into laughter. Not that his insult mattered to her; before and after, she's gone home with Ricky so much that I bet he's received more blowjobs from Ashley then her future husband – scratch that, partner – will.

Ashley ala that June

A Life Lost In 8 Months

By the end of the year Ashley had more then a dozen different penii (that I know about) inside her. Gone was her well kept skin – increasingly numerous real pimples joined her increasingly numerous diamond ones. By the time summer rolled around Ashley's skin was perpetually browner then a Samoan's. Ear stretchers had made their way into both lobes, a tongue piercing had been added and, as I later out found during a game of strip poker she made unfun by forcing her way into it, Ashley had gotten both nipples pierced.

Gone too was the taut midriff that drives men wild; her stomach had become rumpled and loose, the beginnings of a brown stained pudge turning her once sexy expanse of flatness; into something that looked like a battalion of Marines had just fought over it;

They played Taps over my dead boner

The second year merely accentuated Ashley's slobbery. More dicks, more drinks, more snacks, more tats – and more pudge, more pimples, more tears and less romance. The first year, even as she was degrading, Ashley still had a couple of boyfriends, still had dates. Those trickled away to nothing.

I left dorm in third year never to live there again. Ashley and the unbangable dorm girls completely dropped off my radar. I graduated with my single ply of 20,000 dollar toilet paper soon thereafter, and having no Face Book I did not get to immediately see what I knew was to be the aftermath of Ashley's university years.

A Most Unwelcome Reunion

Last July an old university buddy was getting married. He invited us all to his place for a big one week party. I jumped on the opportunity, psyched that a couple of girl's I banged at uni were going to be there – and by their texts, they were most definitely DTF and thankfully still skinny and hot. I pulled up to my buds house, a fairly big two story just outside of the university town. I walked up to the door, my face stuck to my cell phone texting Kaylee – the first girl who I was planning to bang – that her prince had arrived and she could come over to get come over when I felt a squishy mass slam into me. For a moment I thought my bud had gotten a Beethoven sized dog – at least that's what the smell lead me to believe at first. I pushed it away without looking and immediately heard; "RUDE!"

There was Ashley. She had gained fifty more pounds since the last time I'd seen her, yet her body hadn't distributed it. She looked like a fully grown African child with one of those distended bellies. A few more piercings had found their way to parts of her nose, lips and ears that hadn't been poked yet. Two sleeves of tattoos now run up her flabby arms, looking like a Japanese painter's worst nightmare. Her small breasts have gotten slightly bigger and far more saggy. Her hair, once long and beautiful, had been cut down and shaved on one side for a short version of the Skrillex cut.

I greeted Ashley but refused to hug her, quickly pushing by to stake out a bedroom before spending the rest of that night doing my utmost to avoid her. She had uglified herself something fierce but at least if she was skinny Ashley would not have been completely repulsive to the room. She was though, and I saw it on the faces of most people there – many obviously hadn't seen her for some time. Kaylee looked incredibly sad every time she looked at Ashley; for three months they had been BFFs, and to see how far her former best friend forever had fallen surely stirred mixed feelings of pity, guilt and relief that she didn't look like that.

After banging Kaylee she admitted feeling genuinely horrible for Ashley and straight up said she could never imagine living like that. Ashley is not an amputee, nor blind, nor has any other horrible affliction that would make life horrible; she was just very, very fat. Kaylee couldn't imagine living life as a fat girl; I sympathize completely with her horror.

Even the pig bangers had stopped hitting Ashley up and she is – to my knowledge – currently dating an alleged drug dealer in his late thirties. And even more unbelievably – or not when you think about it – Ashley has become a feminist. During her third and what was supposed to be her final year Ashley dropped her education major and switched to Woman's Studies, with a minor in stereotypical cliché. Ashley has become a nightmare of a woman. And as I look back on it, she became worse the more she ate. The new tattoos and piercings didn't appear until her belly did. Perhaps she consciously or unconsciously thought disfiguring other parts of her body would draw people's eyes away from her belly. If so the time that would have worked was short lived. The damage began with her weight gain; all the uglification radiation of piercings and tats and body stretchers were secondary to the nuclear Hiroshima of fatness upon her once tantalizing midriff.

Even the supposedly ‘nice guys’ of our group shunned her. That week our host seemed to coincidentally wait until Ashley was gone off with another group before inviting us out on his boat. Early 20 something’s, all in good shape, sharing beer’s and laughs on a lake – it’s the stuff of Budweiser commercials. I got to flirt and swim with this every day;

If Ashley would have been around, we could have been blessed with seeing this;

Fatness is depressing

It’s depressing to be around, it’s depressing to witness and it has to be absolutely depressing to live. Fat people aren't pleasant. Fat people aren't happy. Ashley had the opportunity to have a halfway decent life. She threw it away one Cappuccino, bacon cheeseburger and Toblerone at a time. Then when people responded to the lack of respect she showed herself she decided to join a hate mongering movement in order to force people to respect her. Does that sound like the kind of person you want to be? Or even be around?

A Plea To Fatties

We know there are at least a few fat people reading this. For those of you who are, whatever your reason – stop. Please stop being fat. I know it seems hard, and it will require long, hard work, but you need to do it – if not to make the world more pleasant for the rest of us, then to make the world more pleasant for yourselves.

It requires determination and hard work but weight loss is simple. Forget all the diets or quick weight loss schemes; there are only three factors to weight loss: calories, exercise, and time. Keep track of your daily caloric intake, and if you are currently obese try to find and maintain an equilibrium between 1400-2400 less to really begin your weight loss.

Exercise constantly, no matter how you do it. You don't need to be in a gym to exercise – walk as much as possible. Take the stairs, park at the back of a parking lot instead of driving around for 5 minutes trying to find a spot closest to the door. Find a hobby that requires movement and stimulates mental thought process – playing a musical instrument might not seem like hard exercise, but it will use up calories and help keep you from being bored and wanting to eat. Watching what you eat and exercising, you're on your way – time will do the rest, but if you've let your body become a mess it will take awhile to recover. There is no shortcut. Do us all – including yourself – a favour. Stop being fat. Don't be like Ashley. You can change.

And if you refuse to – yes, refuse; nobody buys that you can't you whining hamplanet – then for god sakes don't die in a building. If you feel a chest pain coming on get outside quick so the paramedics and fire department don't have to cut a hole in the wall and drag you out with a forklift. It's embarrassing for everyone and a pain in the ass for emergency services which have better things to be doing. In fact, if you're not going to stop being fat you should go out to the woods right now and just lie down and die; at least your bloated fatness will be able to feed some animals. Winter's coming, and unlike you they need all the food they can get to keep themselves from starving to death through it. Animals make the world more beautiful. Fatso's don't.

And no, you don’t count

Dealing With Dangerous Game: Fatty Edition

October 11, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

The world we live in has many strange and interesting creatures. Some are docile and of mild temperament, others can be vicious and dangerous. When a man goes out in the world he must be cognizant of his surroundings. He must know how to keep himself safe around dangerous animals in order to live another day.

Grizzly bears inhabit the forest, lions live on the Serengeti, and tigers hunt in the jungles of Asia. While these dangerous animals are far from the urban areas that the modern man inhabits, he should not let his guard down. There is a dangerous animal that lives in his environment. This animal is known as the “fatty”. This animal is dangerous in many ways and a man should know how to react in cases of attack.

Fatties are known to be shortsighted, irrational, and have a total lack of self control. They are somewhat immune to societal pressures but oddly, they are herd creatures. Their grazing habits are predictable and similar in addiction to any narcotic junky. They can become confrontational at any perceived slight and due to their bulk, present a lot of kinetic energy when they charge. Their cackles and hollers also have the ability to summon other fatties to cause a very damaging stampede. Utilizing these characteristics, a man can adequately prepare himself for a dangerous encounter.

Avoidance is one method to defend against fatties. While curtailing social activities to avoid fatties can be cumbersome, it is still an option. One must recognize the places and circumstances where fatties may appear and congregate. They tend to gather around food supplies and air conditioning. Places that have these features include Wal Mart, McDonald's, and malls. The less expensive the place, the higher probability of a fatty encounter, such as a buffet or a Waffle House. A man could avoid a mauling by staying away from such places.

Obstacles are another method to defend against the wild and dangerous fatty. If one were to anger a fatty, utilizing obastacles to slow and/or stop their advance can be useful. Fatties are not known for their problem solving abilities, so the more complicated the obstacle, the more effective it will be. Examples include tables, cars, punji sticks, and anti tank ditches. WARNING: A FATTY'S BULK CAN ALLOW HER TO BREAK THROUGH MANY OBSTACLES.

Flight is another mechanism to avoid harm from a fatty attack. A man should be able to outrun a fatty over distances. He should also have the ability to out sprint a fatty. While fatties are slow and lack endurance, they have been observed in the wild sprinting at high rates of speed for very short distances. This has occurred when there is only one piece of cake left at a party and when the bouquet is thrown at a wedding reception. Also, climbing up something like a tree or a flight of stairs is an effective method to evade fatties. Be sure to select a tree with enough girth so it cannot be knocked over.

Direct engagement with fatties is another method of defending oneself. Aside from the the legal ramifications of such an act, there are many problems with this method. Fatties tend to have poor hygiene habits so physical contact can be unsanitary. Their physiology provides many unique difficulties to overcome. Their thick skull is an effective counter to blows to the head. Their bulk is a good defense against projectile weapons. While big game cartridges such as .300 Winchester magnum and .338 Lapua can put a fatty down, a man would have a difficult time explaining to a grand jury why he was packing such a weapon outside of Africa. The likely calibers a man would have on him such as 9mm, .40 and .45 lack the energy necessary to stop a charging fatty. This method is not recommended.

If avoidance and obstacles fail, a man can use the final method: distraction. If you notice a fatty stirring toward hostility, change the channel on the TV to the Food Network. If she is getting upset, tell her it's two for one day at Chipotle. If she starts to attack, throw some food item one way and run in the opposite direction.

In summary, a man should avoid fatties. If they cannot be avoided, a man should be wary for when they become agitated. A man should be ready to react when the fatties charge and stampede.

How To Become A BBW Fast Using The Food Pyramid

October 11, 2013 | by Bronan The Barbarian! | Link | Original Link

If you've ever looked at the internet or stepped outside your house, guaranteed you've encountered a BBW. What is a "BBW" you ask? BBW stands for "Big Beautiful Woman," although the "beautiful" part is kinda just thrown in there. The important part is "big." Not just regular fat, I'm talking super fucking 'Murica fat. Fat enough to write a W4M Craigslist ad. The big question is, how do you get fat as fuck, fast as fuck? Get yo' health on, and learn how to use the BBW Food Pyramid to build that bulk!

Ham group – Limit your ham intake to 1-2 servings per day. Ham contains unessential elements such as protein, so this food is best used as a flavor supplement.

Cheesecake/Ice Cream Group – This food group is as essential as it is delicious. The major problem with cheesecake or ice cream is that it involves repeated trips to the fridge. This may result in unnecessary calorie deficits. Try to eat 7-9 daily servings from this group as fast as possible, but be careful to avoid brain freeze!

Kentucky Fried Group – This group is an excellent post-cheesecake snack and can be consumed for up to 120 hours without being refrigerated. Use food from this group to balance out any ice cream intake with the nutritional value of grease and chicken skin. Try to obtain 5-9 servings with a single trip through the drive thru as multiple trips means more burned calories.

Doritos/Cheez-It/Nachos Group – This food group is one of the most overlooked, yet possibly the most important. Many BBWs fall short of hitting daily cheese flavoring quotas, which can lead to undesirable underarm flavor. Doritos and Cheez-Its provide essential vitamins and minerals as well as a quick burst of corn-based energy for long sessions in front of The Price Is Right. Add in extra servings of liquid nacho cheese for necessary chip hydration.

7-Eleven Group – This food group is plentiful and readily available on many street corners. If you need to travel more than three blocks to obtain this food group, move closer to a 7-11. Make sure to include every 7-11 item into your diet, including taquitos, pizza, mini donuts, Big Gulps, candy bars and Slurpees®. 7-11 nachos are a good crossover food, so double up on nacho cheese to add to any other food group. Try not to exceed more than 22 servings per day or you may shit blood.

Thirst Group – Becoming a BBW means twerking up a sweat while you eat. Make sure to remain adequately quenched throughout the BBW process with 25-40 daily servings from the Thirst Group. Mountain Dew, Dr. Pepper and beer are great for a hot day. If it’s cold outside, feel free to add in extra helpings of Starbucks. Ensure that caramel, whipped cream and sugar are added, as plain Starbucks coffee is needlessly flavor-free.

If you stick to this Yum Brands-approved BBW Food Pyramid, you’ll be on your way to health and fatness in no time!

The Commander On The Ground

October 11, 2013 | by Wald | Link | Original Link

The commander on the ground makes the final decision: why older men and established communities think younger men and new comers are stupid, and haven't a clue of what they are talking about.

In World War One but especially World War Two, one of the things the German army did that was revolutionary was that high command would make a mission with certain objectives and then assign this mission to a unit. The commander of the unit, the subordinate to the high command was then free to accomplish the mission in any way he felt necessary. The rationale was that the commander on the ground had superior tactical knowledge of a mission, and therefore was well equipped to make changes in the plan in response to the changing conditions on the ground. The high command accepted the fact that the best laid plans often fall apart, and the best way to work around that was to let the commander on the ground change the modus operandi to fit the current tactical situation instead of rigidly following a plan and guide lines set by higher-ups.

Other armies that were slow to adopt this line of thinking and operating had trouble reacting to the ever changing conditions of the battlefield. Commanders who were competent but did not always follow orders to accomplish missions often got court martialed and their careers stalled, hampering their ability to positively affect the war effort on their nation's behalf. Commanders who were known for rigidly following rules often got their men killed when they could adapt to the ever changing tactics and strategy of the enemy.

Sometimes older men, jaded through experience, are quick to dismiss the ideas of younger men who seek their guidance because they feel like they know the answer already and that there is no other way to arrive at the same answer. Sometimes they dismiss the younger men as stupid for not seeing the answer like they do, because it is so blindingly obvious and "How can you not see what the answer is?"

Often the same issue is paralleled in established communities where newcomers are trying to break ground. One of the examples that most comes to my mind are scientific communities like the ones that revolve around physics or anthropology. Often they dismiss newcomers as too inexperienced to make any observation worth a damn, or just plain crazy.

Usually the issue is that the older party or established community, having so much knowledge and experience in store, comes to conclusions pretty fast. Just like a boxer who can perform his combos faster and faster due to practice or can recognize the moves his opponent is using, an older man or established organization uses all of their data points to come to conclusions and find answers pretty fast. Most of the time, this is a good thing. Sometimes, though, it prevents the older party or community from learning something new.

Maybe the kid actually has something worthwhile to say. Maybe the up and coming anthropologist's new theory actually has a lot going for it. Of course nobody would know unless they stopped to think that maybe they don't have all of the data points and maybe they might learn something. It certainly doesn't hurt to listen to all of new idea's arguments, if not only to be sure of its usefulness, as opposed to making a snap judgment. It is important to keep your mind open so that you do not discourage younger people or new comers from forming their own opinions and bringing them to you.

The worst case is that they'll tell you you're full of shit and take their ideas elsewhere and learn things the hard way.

My father, despite his abundance of experience, does not belittle any ideas or suggestions I make and does not answer any stupid questions of mine as if it were a burden to do so. Sometimes he may think he's a little forceful in debate, but he's usually good about acknowledging the fact and apologizing if he thinks he has gone too far (he's never actually apologized, but I did catch him explaining how he was tired and therefore his method of debate was little less diplomatic than usual and that he was not mad at me). Consequently, I seek out his advice often and pay attention even when I think his answer is off the mark.

My brother on the other hand does not do the same. He has gained lots of experience like my father and has done relatively well for himself. However, his attitude is different when offering answers to questions or advice. While he's nice enough over the phone or through email, in person, his arrogance is corrosive. Every now and then I ask him questions and he'll oftentimes sigh as if he is carrying the weight of the world on his shoulders. Then he answers my questions as if I'm the stupidest person in the world for asking those questions. Or he'll ask me to do so something for him and when I do it wrong or don't understand what is asked of me, he'll look at me as if I'm a retarded monkey capable of little more than eating bananas and slinging poop.

And then he'll tell me how I'm stupid and am doing it wrong in a disappointed tone. This makes me dislike asking him questions. He just sounds like a prima donna douche bag who gets annoyed that he has to help me out or explain things to me. Sure he has more experience living life than I do, but not nearly enough like my Dad to warrant his attitude.

One time when I drove with him over 1,000 miles to keep him company on the way to see the birth of his first born son, I talked with him about a girl I was involved with. At the time I was started develop heavy feelings for her as she had already told me "I love you" plenty of times and I thought that maybe she might be sincere after all. My brother tore that idea apart with how it would end miserably because I wouldn't see her for 18 months if I went to the service academy that I desired.

When I told him about how I made her make me a sandwich and blow me while I ate it because she was "being too much of a woman" he told me that I was abusing her. He thought I hated women. I was appalled. How could he say I was abusing her? It's one thing if beat her and forced her to make the sandwich, but to come to that conclusion? Just like that? He didn't even stop to be on my side for a minute because I'm his brother. Or congratulate me on it.

What? I hate women now?

The irony is that my brother once taught me that I should let what people say about or to me get to me. If some drunkard on the street told me, "I fucked your mom last night" I wouldn't care. He doesn't know me, or my mom, and probably didn't fuck her. But to hear these sorts of comments from my brother blew me away. In ninth grade my brother once told me that I could ask him anything about girls, especially about how to have sex because he had no shame in discussing such matters and I was his little brother, dammit.

Now the thought of asking my brother for any advice towards girls repulses me.

Later I learned that my brother acted the way he did as he was feeling guilty of some his own personal demons. I still don't think he should have projected his bad behavior and morals regarding such on me but I largely forgive him for it. When I brought up the issue to my Dad, he explained to me that my brother had a hard time imagining that when I think of wrong answer, I come up with it, because at my age it makes sense and I don't know any better. He will learn in time with his son that young people ask a ton of stupid questions, and he'll mellow out on giving advice. I certainly hope so.

10 Tell-Tale Signs She’s A Secret Internet Fatty

Like it or not, online dating is gradually taking over. As the American woman becomes more socially retarded by the minute—liable to blow her rape whistle if a man who isn’t already among her 10,000 Facebook “friends” should so much as say hello to her—it behooves men to adapt to the shifting dating landscape. An online-dating profile has been a part of my repertoire for some time, and it’s supplied me with a healthy dose of fornications, stories to tell, and—above all—wisdom.

I needn’t tell you that online dating is jam packed with a host of nuisances and perils. There’s the over-confident 6 whose ego has been artificially inflated by the fawning online attention of thirsty guys—to the degree that she delusionally carries on like a 9 whenever she cracks open her MacBook. There's the girl with the manifesto-like profile, itemizing unreasonable demands like a hostage-taker in a movie bank robbery. Then there are the brutally repetitive jokes, clichés, and "witty" remarks that women merely copycat from one another—and television. She's preparing for the zombie apocalypse. You should message her if you know the difference between to/too/two and there/they're/their. She took a skydiving picture. She did a novelty race where they spray you with colored powder at the end.

All of those pale in comparison to the mother of all of online-dating dangers: the Notorious S.I.F.–the Secret Internet Fatty. Talk to any man who has shown up to an online date with a cute girl, only to meet 30 pounds more of that girl than he expected, and you'll know that it's among the worst sinking feelings you can have on a first date. You've been tricked—and on purpose.

Girls today are masters at photographing themselves in the most flattering way possible. And, all you need to do is shadow a few of them for one night to understand how they acquired that skill: girls today spend a better part of their day taking pictures of themselves, and each other. Not only do they have thousands of pictures from which to cherry-pick the best ones, they have countless hours of practice in posing, emphasizing, and concealing. Moreover, girls receive constant input—from other girls as well as their desperate online male admirers—about when they look their best. A college-aged girl has an advanced knowledge of her physique—and photography—far beyond the average guy, even 10 years her elder. The undiscerning male online-dater is simply no match for this training.

So, what can the average man do to avoid being Secret Internet Fattied in today's online-dating world? Learn to look for the tell-tale signs of the SIF:

1. Has no body shots, only tightly cropped face shots, or very few pictures in the profile.

No matter how much feminists and fatties kick and scream otherwise, girls are hardwired to know that their body is their number-one asset in attracting a mate. If a girl conceals this information from you, you can rest assured there's a (good) reason. It will never be an accident. An all-headshots profile will mean a dumpy, fat body.

2. Apparent wild swings in body weight in her photographs.

You can be certain that if she has pictures of her as both thin and as fat, she's currently in the fat stage.

3. Pictured with food or talks about "loving food."

Fat girls take a lot of pictures of themselves with food because, quite simply, they spend a lot of their time eating, and eating out is the only social activity they know. A girl who talks about how much she loves food–or how much of a "foodie" she is–lives to eat rather than eats to live. That almost always means fat.

4. Has fat friends.

There’s good science that shows that female friend-groups gain weight together. If she associates with fatties—according to her pictures—there’s a good chance she’s fat herself by now.

5. Uses Myspace angles, or similar forms of photographic subterfuge.

Myspace Angles—that is, taking picture from above to reduce her visible size—may be an old trick, but it sticks around because it works.

> MySpace camera angles in online dating profile pics is equivalent to attempted rape. You know he doesn't want it. #FatShamingWeek
> — Danger and Play (@PlayDangerously) October 9, 2013

6. You can't see her collar bone.

One thing Myspace Angles and similar tricks can't hide is the absence of a collar bone. If you can't see it, she's overweight.

7. Has sausage fingers.

Even if she succeeds in hiding everything else, her hands are a reliable tell-tale physical sign.

8. Overemphasis of one feature, to the exclusion of others.

Since girls are keenly aware of their bodies, they know what looks good and what doesn't. If they're only showing you one thing—repeatedly—it's because there's something wrong with the rest.

9. Describes herself as "average" or "curvy."

"Average" and "curvy" have become, almost exclusively, euphemisms for fatness. Even "athletic" isn't a reliable predictor of a fit physique, since a lot of fat girls will do zumba one day a week, only to drink Starbucks milkshakes on the other six.

Her Details
Last Online	Yesterday – 5:39am
Ethnicity	White
Height	5’ 8” (1.73m).
Body Type	Average
Diet	Mostly anything
Smokes	No
Drinks	Socially
Drugs	Never
Religion	Christianity but not too serious about it

10. No new-looking pictures.

One of the most effective tricks is to simply use pictures from when you were skinny. While there’s no reliable way to inoculate yourself against this move, you should look out for signs that her pictures aren’t new. How’s the image quality? What’s happening in the background? What do the captions say?

Avoiding fatties requires a tremendous amount in work in 2013. But, doing that online doesn’t have to be harder than it is in real life. Once you train your eye, you’ll be a master at smoking these SIFs out of their troughs.

Fat Single Mothers Are Child Abusers

October 12, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

It is known that single mothers are a virus which cause many of the societal ills plaguing Western culture. They leech off hard working men with the assistance of the feminist welfare state and still demand more. Without male leadership a boy 'raised' by a woman will, as black America predicts, "have high unemployment and incarceration rates. Young boys will be prone to violence, academic reticence, and poor performance in school." As for girls raised by single mothers they will become emotional, more likely to buy the lie of feminist dogma, and will become a career driven androgynous ball-buster.

Despite the fact that being a parasitic single mother is becoming normalized. Despite the fact that more and more women are "choosing" to become single mothers to boost their narcissistic desires. Despite it all, there is a class of women even more vile and hurtful to both children and society than the single mother: the Fat Single Mother (FSM).

Mental illness is hugely correlated with obesity. Depression, bipolar disorder, anxiety, and in some cases PTSD (from seeing their unfathomable bulk in the mirror every morning) are the main mental illnesses associated with being a fat shit. Along with obesity, being a woman is a predictor of mental illness. The reported rate of mentally ill women in the USA is roughly 23%. Depression, anxiety, borderline personality disorder, and narcissistic tendencies top that list. Any sane person will have a good idea what that will mean for a helpless and impressionable child.

FSMs, on average, are more narcissistic, solipsistic, and delusional than their thin counterparts. They genuinely do not comprehend that they are at fault for any of their life problems and thus will teach their children this. Leading by example FSMs teach their children to be entitled, lazy, and completely dependent on the others (i.e., the state). However, these narcissistic FSMs will also project their subconscious self-loathing onto their innocent child making them believe they're shit with no hope in life. If the child is a male he will be scarred by seeing gentleman caller after gentleman caller ravage the holes of his portly mother. The active effects of the FSM riding the cock carousel are that because the FSM has no accountability she will blame many of her problems on the men in her life. In the case of a FSM the only man that sticks around long enough to abuse is her own flesh and blood.

Fat parents have fat children. This is nearly true in all cases. Fat children grow into fat adults and through their life they will face constant discrimination, bullying, self esteem issues, mental health issues, lower life span, and all around a lower quality of life. Children of mentally ill parents suffer abuse through neglect, stunted personal development, and low self esteem. Through life they show an inability to trust others, depression, fear, low academic achievement, and on and on.

A child cannot consent to being fat.

Children born to FSMs are marginalized from birth and have no hope but to continue the viscous cycle of abuse. Parents are meant to raise children, to mould them into the best human they possibly can, yet FSMs do the exact opposite and from every angle prevent their children from having any semblance of hope in this world. FSMs have the responsibility to become accountable for their actions or the state – instead of funding single mothers – will be forced to remove these children and teach them the fundamentals of being a healthy and happy human being.

Fat single mothers are child abusers and they are as detrimental to a child's welfare as a two-bit crackwhore.

Atheists Are Fatties

October 12, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Virtually every religion that has existed, or exists today, strongly condemns gluttony. Given that religions evolve culturally over hundreds of years, there's probably a good reason why all of them shame fatties.

Before we talk about these reasons, here's a quick breakdown of the world's major religions.

Christianity And Judaism – On Gluttony

Old Testament:

> Do not join those who drink too much wine > or gorge themselves on meat, > for drunkards and gluttons become poor, > and drowsiness clothes them in rags.

New Testament:

> Do you not know that your bodies are temples of the Holy Spirit, who is in you, whom you have received from God? You are not your own; you were bought at a price. Therefore honor God with your bodies.

The Old Testament says fatties are losers and the New Testament thinks fatties are a disgrace to God. 'Nuff said.

Islam – On Gluttony

[image]

The entire month of Ramadan is dedicated to fasting. Fasting is a regular and important feature of Islam that teaches self-control and self-respect:

> O you who have believed, decreed upon you is fasting as it was decreed upon those before you that you may become righteous – (link)
> [Fasting for] a limited number of days. So whoever among you is ill or on a journey [during them] – then an equal number of days [are to be made up]. And upon those who are able [to fast, but with hardship] – a ransom [as substitute] of feeding a poor person [each day]. And whoever volunteers excess – it is better for him. But to fast is best for you, if you only knew. (link)

If only, if only our American fatties knew that to fast (i.e. abstain from eating) is best for them. If they only knew.

Buddhism – On Gluttony

Buddhists believe that avoiding attachment, translated as acquisition below, to any worldly thing is the way of wisdom and peace.

> "Now, when a monk — maintaining restraint over the six spheres of contact, knowing that 'Acquisition is the root of stress' — is free from acquisition, released in the total ending of acquisition, it's not possible that, with regard to acquisition, he would stir his body or arouse his mind. (link)

Fatties need to lose their attachment to 7/11, McDonald's, Wendy's, Burger King, and KFC.

Atheism – On Gluttony

So, having established that the world's major regions all believe fat is evil, what do atheists up doing?

GALLUP – Very Religion Americans Lead Healthier Lives

Gallup-Healthways Healthy Behavior Index Score, by Religiosity

Controlling for age, gender, race and ethnicity, region and state of the country, socioeconomic status, marital status, and child-bearing status

	Very religious	Moderately religious	Nonreligious	Difference between very religious and nonreligious
Healthy Behavior Index score	66.3	60.6	58.3	8.0

Gallup-Healthways Well-Being Index
Data collected Jan. 2, 2009-July 28, 2010

GALLUP

Is it any surprise? With nothing left to believe in, atheists will fill up their spiritual void with cheap processed food and confectionery sugars. Just look at the non-believers and see for yourself:

Body fat percentage: 50%

Body fat percentage: 35%

Body fat percentage: 70%

Hell, there are even blogs dedicated to being a fat atheist. I don't think any of this is a coincidence. I think the successful religions have been successful precisely because they make people take care of themselves, and most importantly, by keeping women slim it attracts more men to the religion. Meanwhile, atheism leads to despair and big-waistlines.

5 Reasons Fat People Are Evil

October 13, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

America continues its glorious descent into the hell that was foretold by our Puritan forefathers. A rapidly increasing piece of the populace threatens the delicate social order of America: fat people. Fat people sometimes go by ‘fatties,’ ‘fatasses’ or ‘gluttons,’ whose putrid and unsightly waistlines will taste the cleansing fires of Hell. Regardless, they highlight some dark and horrific realities about America.

1. Fatties Only Give A Shit About Themselves

Fat people are all self-absorbed assholes. Like an alcoholic, all they care about is the next slice of double stuffed crust pizza cruising down the conveyor belt. Instead of craving the high of drunkenness, they lust for the rush of harmful nutrition.

Woe is he who decides to be a part of a fattie's life; he will always come second to her desire for the next piece of fried chicken. To them, you don't have needs, you exist to make sure she gets her Whopper fresh. Sure, she feigns gratitude when you bring her burger and fries, but beware: when the high wears off, she will target you. All that matters to her is constantly eating. They hate Paleo diets and abhor vegetarianism. Their supreme desire to consume their world represents their inability to improve.

2. Fatties Don't Give A Shit About Their Appearance

Consider the depressing blog People of Walmart. Walmart isn't just representative of our mindless consumerist society or the entrenchment of corporations as the ultimate authority figures in America. It also shows how far the average American has fallen. People used to care about their appearance because they cared about society around them and their contribution to it.

No more. Fatties roam the aisles of Walmart, armed with obesity-induced rage, and a wardrobe that reflects a person half their size. Their unwashed ass-cracks hang out at every other free food stand, their cellulite is disgustingly on display in the frozen pizza aisle and their guts hang over the check-out aisle because they are too fucking lazy to self check-out.

3. Fatties Are Often Feminists

Considering how self-absorbed feminists are, it only makes sense for them and fatties to unite. This often takes the form of “fat acceptance,” which is always couched in feminism, which means it is meaningless. It claims people are not responsible for their personal choices, that other people exist to validate them or mollify their self-hatred as it inevitably bubbles up when McDonald’s runs out of nuggets. Their feminism is simple extension—others exist to maintain their personal emotional state. And that state is never your responsibility. It was the gift of fatphobic patriarchy that privileges those who care about themselves over those who want to waste away in a fat-encased shell of a human body.

4. Fatties Smell Horrible

Studies have conclusively proven that fat people are the cause of global warming. In order to understand this mind-blowing epiphany, understand that fatties have a difficult times processing the livestock feed they slip down their gullets. When food hits their intestines, their body has no option but to expel the waste as gas. As such, unbelievable levels of methane and other dangerous gasses are emitted through their distressed and overworked anuses. These released gasses have contributed greatly to man-made global warming.

Even if you don’t believe in global warming, understand that that foul smell you encounter on the streets of America is a direct result of fat people. Since their bodies can’t handle the feed they force into their mouths, they expel offensive and putrid scents. The next time you encounter a foul smell, blame the nearest fatty. Or knock the drumstick out of their hand. Either way, you are doing the Lord’s work.

5. Fatties Are Creepy As Fuck

Face it, fat people are creepy as fuck. Their self-hatred makes you pity them and their poor nutritional understanding makes you feel bad. Fat women are worse. You can see the look in their eyes, the dead look of a person long-past caring about themselves, motivated only by the fleeting, short-term thrills of bingeing on unhealthy foods. They pretend their "curves"—which is really just one, expansive bowling-ball of flesh—are sexy to men. Of course, they refuse to date or have sex with fat men, as those people are disgusting, but men should and need to find them attractive. They creepily stalk men online and in real life, pretending nobody notices their geological impact. Healthy people avert their gaze from the afflicted and proceed without noting their existence. All this blatant self-hatred reeks of an emotional life not lived.

In sum, fat people are evil personified. Their self-possession is borne of self-hatred, and it's perpetuated by their desire to destroy their bodies with the widest spectrum of unhealthy foods. Don't try to help them – they want you to worship them or hate them. If you want them to improve, ignore them. They will either slip into depression or lash out violently. Either way, you expose them for who they are: tyrants with a chili dog in one hand and a Diet Coke in the other.

A Proposal To Enact A Federal Fat Tax

October 13, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

In economics there exists a measure known as social cost. A social cost exists when an activity generates negative externalities – for example, when a power company causes environmental pollution, or when a plump stranger decides to sit next to you on the bus.

Both of these situations cause irreparable damage, yet only the former is taxed. This tax is known as a Pigovian Tax, and it already exists in a variety of markets.

Should the obesity market be next?

Before we condemn fatties to paying their true price we must examine the facts. Are they a source of negative externalities? And, if so, which ones?

Below I offer a humble list of four costs that healthy, fit members of society must pay as a result of our larger counterparts.

1. Space infringement

Due to their wider nature, obese individuals tend to take up more space.

Yes, I already hear the chunkies mumbling. So do tall people. And muscular people.

But it is not the same. The imprint of your ass and the circumference of your belly is the cause of the distress. Ask yourself: how let-down are you when you navigate your way to your seat on the airplane only to have Big Molly's flabby love handles strewn halfway across your seat?

2. Weight Considerations

Most furniture is not made to support an elephant.

So what happens when big old Carlos decides to plop his behind down onto your bed? The box spring caves in, never to return to its original position (true story). Yet another cost we all must pay.

3. Health Costs

A lot of money goes into the diagnosis and treatment of obesity induced diseases and illnesses. No, we don’t have to suffer diabetes. But the health insurance we all pay is raised to treat the neighborhood fatty. This cost is not like the others, it is measured in actual dollars and cents.

4. Dating Supply

Dating is a game of supply and demand, just the same as any other market. And skinny people don’t date fat people. This constitutes a decline in the supply of potential partners.

We demand compensation!

And So I Conclude

I hope the list above assists you when considering the cost obesity places upon society as a whole. A tax to balance these negative externalities is only logical.

In fact, one was proposed in 1942 by psychologist AJ Carlson to counter some of the externalities listed above as well as to provide more food for the war effort. Denmark and Japan have already begun the official war on fat with limited measures that tax unhealthy foods and waist-sizes.

I propose a tax not upon unhealthy foods, but on waist size or body fat percentage. 1% income tax for every 1% of bodyfat over an obesity determined baseline. Make them pay…

The Farce Of “Rape Culture” In The Workplace

October 14, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Plenty has been said about women in the workplace and their interaction with men, and most of it has been negative. Feminists and progressives on one end have little good to say about female prospects at work in the face of discrimination, while on the other end men and many conservatives are concerned that efforts to dampen supposedly rampant instances of sexual abuse/harassment in workplaces are making it too difficult to navigate the work environment without walking on eggshells all the time.

While harassment certainly does occur at work due undoubtedly to the presence of many very thirsty and tactless betas in America, feminists still all too often make mountains out of molehills. This recent article on ThinkProgress (which, unfortunately, recently made itself abundant on my facebook newsfeed) drives this point home. The title? “Five Examples Of How Employees Turn Women Into Sex Objects”.

> …issues that women encounter on the job can run deeper than being unfairly assumed to be less competent or less valuable than their male counterparts. In many cases, women are up against very specific assumptions about their sexuality, their role as “objects” intended to be attractive to men, and their responsibility to prevent men from desiring them.

This argument is a common one from feminists and, as usual, it seeks to remove all consequences of female action more than it seeks to create actual equality.

The reality here is that both genders have a responsibility in the workplace. Men have to keep their thirst in check and avoid letting it run rampant in their pursuit of ass. Women, conversely, are asked to make this a little easier by not trying too hard to attract those same men in the workplace.
Both sides are asked to tame their sexuality to some significant degree in order to facilitate their getting along. Many men, who instinctively enjoy the act of pursuing/chasing an attractive woman and would normally be immediately inclined to make many sexual/romantic overtures upon the sight of a woman who appeals to them have to avoid doing this in the work place.

Many women, who instinctively enjoy (and are usually quite skilled in) the act of getting men to initiate said pursuit with themselves as the target, are asked to avoid doing this at work. On paper, this sounds like a fair tradeoff.

Feminists do not agree, and have listed five examples here to tell us why:

> A New Jersey judge ruled that casino waitresses can be fired for gaining weight. Twenty two former cocktail servers sued a popular casino in Atlantic City over a policy that forbids waitresses from gaining more than seven percent of their original body weight.

This is the silliest example provided by the article.

Certain occupations rely on the maintenance of a certain level of physical fitness and/or appearance. An employer should have every right to take such things into consideration if (and only if) they can be considered relevant to the success of the business at hand. In this case, the casino waitresses are there to look hot, fit and enticing to customers in order to encourage their making the kind of decisions (drinking and gambling) that result in their handing the casino their money. To ensure that their waitresses meet this standard, the casino sets a weight limit and it is well within its rights to do this.

Similar examples that impact men abound all over the country. In professional sports, many men are contractually obligated to maintain a certain weight lest they find themselves released altogether. The same thing happens in Hollywood, where the ability of many actors to maintain a role is tied directly to their ability to maintain a certain physical appearance. There are plenty of men in Hollywood who would have an issue if they gained seven percent of their original body weight after taking a role, even if most of that weight came from healthy muscle mass instead of fat accumulation (bulkier men are not desired for many roles). This is to say nothing of the well known advantages that men with certain physical appearances (ex: more height, certain skin tones, etc) have in the workplace, advantages that put more pressure on men.

The bottomline is simple: men as a sex are not exempt from the need to maintain certain physical standards in order to keep certain jobs. Women should not expect to be either.

> A widely-used employee training manual tells women how to make sure they don't lead men on.
> Earlier this week, Jezebel reported that a popular manager training guide — used as companies like Google, Groupon, and Modcloth — essentially tells women that they're responsible for preventing advances from their male co-workers.

And men are responsible for doing the same exact thing.

> The manual tells women who are "touchy-feely or flirtatious by nature" to "dial it back,"

…something men are also asked to do.

> Women at Merrill Lynch have been instructed to seduce their way to the top. Other employee trainings have similarly gone off the rails when it comes to guidance on women's behavior in the workplace. Female employees at Merrill Lynch allege they were made to read a book called "Seducing the Boys Club: Uncensored Tactics From a Woman at the Top"… To get men to do their work, the book suggested "play[ing] on their masculine pride and natural instincts to protect the weaker sex." To diffuse tense situations, it pointed out that men "puff > up" at being told, "Wow, you look great. Been working out?"

I can't even really get the issue with this bit. If anything, it evidences sexism directed at men by implying that they are easily manipulated and suggesting how to carry out such manipulation.

> The Iowa Supreme Court decided it's okay to fire attractive women if they pose a risk to men's marriages.
> James Knight, a dentist in Iowa, didn't fire his female assistant Melissa Nelson after 10 years of working for him because of performance reasons. Instead, Nelson alleges that Knight's wife told him to do it because "she was a big threat to our marriage" given that he was sexually attracted to her. Yet in July, the all-male Iowa Supreme Court stood by an earlier decision that she wasn't improperly fired because it wasn't gender discrimination.

I'm more torn by this one. I don't feel that it is ok for a man to fire a woman simply because he grows to find her attractive, but the alternative doesn't seem great either. If he continues to employ this woman and the sexual tension between them remains (even if neither of them act on it), he could lose his marriage which, as we're all aware, could be financially devastating for him.

In either case, the Iowa court was right to uphold their earlier decision. The female employee was not let go simply because she was a woman. She was let go due to details relating to her specific relationship (not that of her gender, just her) with the dentist, a fact that would preclude any notion of gender discrimination.

Gender discrimination does exist in workplaces and, as I've said before, plenty of thirsty and tactless betas in the working world give women a hard time there. This is a reality I don't doubt. What I also do not doubt, however, are realities that feminists fail to acknowledge in their bid to manufacture this notion of a pervasive "rape culture". Women can be held in certain occupations to certain physical and aesthetic standards, but so can men. Women are asked to put a lid on their sexuality when working with the opposite gender, but so are men.

These are truths, and ignoring them will not make them disappear.

Every Man Has A Breaking Point

October 14, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Pressure reveals the man. Take a man, any man, and subject him to extreme stress. Subject him to sleep deprivation or fear, exhaustion, and the uncertainties of climate and personal safety, and you will see the soul of the man. This is what I always liked about extreme stress. It reveals the true essence. A young military trainee thrown into an extreme environment or hostile fire zone, or a young lawyer taking on his first big high-stakes jury trial, will both reveal their inner natures by their performance and responses to pressure.

A man's response can't be faked. It just can't. Some men like to talk big, to pound their chests about one thing or another. But those who have truly seen the face of the Beast know it is not a joke, not something to be taken lightly. Because the Beast is avaricious, and he feeds on souls.

And sometimes we find out things about ourselves that we would rather not know. But it is a fascinating exposition. It is a wonder to behold. Those who enter these dark arenas are driven by a passionate desire to test their cold steel against the flesh of the world. It is truly the greatest drama of all.

And you never can tell. You never can. That man you see over there, for instance, who seems to be a quiet, bespectacled introvert, may turn out to have the soul of a lion. Or that peacocking, muscled braggart over there may be revealed to be a man of straw at the moment of truth. Or vice-versa. You just never can be certain.

But every man has a breaking point. Every man. I remember reading a story in Tom Mangold and John Penycate's book The Tunnels of Cu Chi some years ago that resonated with me and stuck in my memory. I want to relate it here.

Jack Flowers was a college dropout who got drafted into the US Army the late 1960s and found himself serving in Vietnam. Because of his educational background, he was put through an officer training program and was assigned to an engineer battalion. Over time, he began to feel the stirrings of an unsuspected militancy, and became more and more interested in taking an active part in the fighting. Two experiences helped push him in this direction. One was getting called a REMF (rear echelon motherfucker), and another was seeing a dead comrade getting pulled out of a Viet Cong tunnel.

Like some men, he was driven by a secret pride that felt compelled to test the limits of its endurance. Flowers would soon get his chance. Against the advice of his friends and family he decided to join an elite group of "tunnel rats", which specialized in locating and destroying the enemy in its dark honeycomb of underground lairs. Armed only with a switchblade, flashlight, revolver, and a grenade, a tunnel rat had to go down into the tunnels, seek out the enemy, and kill him in one-on-one combat.

And by all accounts, combat in the claustrophobic tunnels was a horrifying experience, profound beyond words. It was as personal as the war ever got. And there was no way to fake it.

The man who had trained and led the tunnel rats which Flowers joined was a smoldering, inscrutable soldier named Sergeant Robert Batten. He was nicknamed Batman. And he was both widely feared and respected for his extraordinary body counts and ruthless leadership abilities. Batten was a legend, and he knew it. He was a tough, cunning, and deeply aggressive man; someone who might have been a nonentity in regular life but had come into his own during the war.

The Viet Cong knew who he was, and had put him on their “ten most wanted” list. Captured VC spoke of him with awe. Batten didn’t like most officers, and he didn’t like poseurs. Incompetents and fake heroics could get men killed. Everyone had to pull his weight; there was no rank in the tunnels. “We’ll get along just fine if you stay out of my way” was his curt statement to Flowers.

The tunnel rats were a highly professional unit. There were many Puerto Ricans and Mexicans, men coming from cultures for whom the martial spirit of Old Spain had never really died, men who were not squeamish about using a knife, men who had never gotten much from life and expected little from it. There were also many quiet, unassuming hillbilly types, men who were otherwise soft-spoken but who became unglued in the tunnels, relishing in the brutality of man-on-man combat.

Man is a complex and many-layered being.

Slowly and steadily, Flowers built up his credibility with Batten and the tunnel rats and earned their respect. He knew he could never ask one of his men to do something he himself would not do, so he personally went on many tunnel missions. He began to lead his unit in fact as well as in theory. He was even wounded by a grenade on a tunnel mission with Batten. And his confidence soared. He was a good “Six” (tunnel rats used the term “Six” as the code word for leader). He had wanted to prove to Batten that he was his equal, that he was a good fighter, and a good leader.

But Batman was unimpressed. He sized up Flowers in his own ruthless way, and issued his own verdict. One day, Batten said to him, “You’re not a killer, Six, and that’s your problem. You’re pretty good, the best Six I ever had, but you’ll fuck up somewhere. Charlie hasn’t killed a rat for quite a time. And you’ll either let him get you, or you’ll get yourself.” Flowers was stung by the remark but let it go. Batten rotated out of Vietnam soon after, after having served three back-to-back tours.

One day, Flowers and his men were out on a mission. A tunnel complex was discovered and someone spotted a VC disappear down a shaft that went straight down twenty feet before angling off horizontally. They thought they had the VC cornered. He had to be down there, they thought, crouching in the horizontal tunnel with his AK-47 at the ready.

Flowers was exhausted but pressed on. He looked down the shaft. It was a rat hole leading straight to hell. He decided to have his men lower him in a seated rope cradle (called a Swiss seat) halfway down the shaft. They would then drop him, and he would hit the bottom of the shaft so he could take the cornered VC by surprise.

One of the rules of the tunnel rats was never to fire more than three shots from a .38 revolver, as this would reveal that the shooter needed to reload. As Flowers was lowered slowly down into the shaft, his men looked on in grim and fearful silence. He was soaked in sweat, throbbing with adrenaline, and he kept hearing Batten's voice.

You'll fuck up somewhere, Six…you'll either let him get you, or you'll get yourself.

His plan was to hit the ground and immediately get off a head shot against the VC before he himself was hit. He fully expected to get hit, and, as he was lowered slowly into the hole, he tried to visualize the best shooting position to get into. Finally Flowers gave the signal and he was dropped into the inky blackness. He hit the ground and started firing. And kept firing. After his men heard six shots ring out, one of them threw down a second revolver.

And then there was silence. When the acrid tang of cordite cleared, Flowers breathlessly tried to make out what was in front of him. There was nothing but a blank dirt wall. No VC with a gun. Just a cluster of bullet holes in the damp earth. Exhausted and stressed beyond limit, he had fired all six rounds against an imaginary target. And the rules said no more than three shots. Flowers rubbed his fingetips against the six neat holes in the packed earthen wall, and then put his head in his hands. And in his mind, he heard Batten's voice.

You'll get yourself, Six. You'll get yourself…

Word of the incident found its way back to Flowers's commanding officer, and he was relieved. Not much was said, but it was clear that his men had lost confidence in him. For the good of the unit, he was shipped out of the area to another part of Vietnam.

There were no goodbyes, no pats on the back, nothing. He was just gone. And then Flowers secluded himself and stayed drunk for a week. He had found his limits, and his war was over.

He had done his job with honor, and tested the hazy boundaries of his own endurance and tenacity. He had nothing to be ashamed of. But the merciless struggle leaves no one unscathed. No one is exempt. And as character determines fate, so there is no escape from the pitiless rendezvous between man and his destiny. It makes us and it breaks us with equally callous apathy.

The obscenities of conflict strip us down, flay the protective skins from our bodies, and expose the souls of the innocent to the bitter mockery of the damned.

Fat Shaming Week Was A Corpulent Success

October 14, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The exposure that Fat Shaming Week received has exceeded our expectations. Here are some outlets that helped spread the word:

- Buzzfeed: Some Terrible People On Twitter Have Decided That It's "Fat Shaming Week" (~210,000 views)
- Thought Catalog: It's Fat Shaming Week
- Daily Dot: Fat Shaming Week is real, and it's despicable
- Happy Place: 5 people who totally ruined this week for us
- College Candy: #FatShamingWeek Is Taking Over Twitter and Proves People Have No Souls
- Bliss Tree: 10 Of The Worst Tweets From #FatShamingWeek…So Far

Things really exploded with the #FatShamingWeek hashtag, where there was a nuclear war between fat shamers and fat enablers. Nearly 10,000 tweets were exchanged, including several from radio host Tom Leykis:

> #FatShamingWeek what a great idea! If your girl looks like a human Cinnabon or a Butterball, make her feel like shit! http://t.co/cjbLvvNKeB
> — Tom Leykis (@tomleykis) October 11, 2013

Credit for the hastag idea goes to ROK contributor and fat shaming innovator Ray Starke, whose article How To Control Your Woman's Diet caused great outrage a couple weeks ago. Here are all 18 fat shaming posts that we published, in the order they appeared:

I ask you, dear reader, what outlet has advanced fat shaming as much as we have? We promised you a buffet of fat shaming and I think we delivered. Most importantly, we're still here. We have survived a week of rage and no fat shamer has lost his job. This fact alone suggests that fat acceptance has peaked. They no longer have the power to halt fat criticism.

FSW was a success because it helped create a safe space for men to shame obesity. In the past, fat apologists have silenced fat shamers under the guise of "hate" or "bigotry," but this week we exercised our free speech right to air grievances and have a clear dialogue of all the negative societal and physical manifestations of fat.

I am a true believer in personal liberty where you should be able to make your own life choices. For that reason, there is no inherent crime in being a fat ass, but in the past five years, there has been a push to accept obesity as normal or even beautiful. Fat shaming is less about bullying individual fat people than re-affirming the fact that obesity culture is not okay in America, and attempts to brainwash people of that fiction must be immediately destroyed with logic, science, and schoolyard insults.

I believe FSW reached some people who were a bit confused on the mixed messages that society was sending them on beauty and health, especially millenials who have grown up thinking that any type of criticism—no matter how righteous—is "bullying." It is our responsibility as citizens and lovers of beauty to shame any attempts at fat apologia. They have been getting away with promoting obesity for too long, and it's time for that to stop.

On the behalf of the ROK staff, we thank you for your tweets and comments about this important cultural issue. God bless you and your shaming efforts.

Feministing Supports Bullying Of 16-Year-Old Girl

October 15, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Lorde is the stage name for a talented 16-year-old New Zealand singer whose sparse and catchy indie pop has gained her significant notoriety over the last couple of months. She is the youngest artist to top Billboard's Hot 100 chart in 26 years, a feat made even more amazing by the fact that most girls her age are spending 4 hours a day on Instagram rather than creating anything new for the world.

Lorde's chart-topping single "Royals" has primarily driven her rise to popularity. However, in a recent Feministing article, Veronica Bayetti Flores described the song as "deeply racist," ascribing a hateful intent to the song's lyrics that, to any reasonable person, simply poke fun at rap's culture of excess. These are the "offensive" lyrics:

> But every song's like gold teeth, grey goose, trippin' in the bathroom
> Blood stains, ball gowns, trashin' the hotel room,
> We don't care, we're driving Cadillacs in our dreams.
> But everybody's like Cristal, Maybach, diamonds on your timepiece.
> Jet planes, islands, tigers on a gold leash.
> We don't care, we aren't caught up in your love affair.

As usual, priviledged American feminists are doing the eminently meaningful work of being offended on behalf of a group they aren't even a part of. Veronica Bayetti Flores, a white and/or hispanic woman, writes for a major website but apparently does not even know the definition of racism:

Racism: noun: : A belief that race is the primary determinant of human traits and capacities and that racial differences produce an inherent superiority of a particular race

In the least charitable interpretation of Lorde's lyrics, she is blasting the hip hop culture for embracing materialism and insisting that her own group (Females? New Zealanders? Indie pop artists?) are not trapped by such vices. It would be an incredible jump in logic to make even the flimsiest of arguments that she is citing her race's superiority over another's rather than simply criticizing the behavior of a particular group.

The author's incoherent diatribe also ignores other parts of the lyrics that seem to reference stereotypically white excess — I can't remember the last rap video I saw featuring "ball gowns" and "trashing hotel rooms" (a cliché for predominantly white rock-and-roll bands). Are these references racist as well? Most likely, that these are the words of a girl getting into an industry driven by appearances and citing the hypocrisy and ostentation therein.

Even if one ignores the dig at white stereotypes and insists that Lorde is solely criticizing the world of rap, why is it forbidden for a person to critique a culture that is steeped in excess and ostentation while the community that dominates its fanbase remains largely low in socioeconomic status and unable to create wealth? Have we reached a point where any criticism of a subset of a racial group is met with a reactionary branding as "racist" and shamed out of existence?

Other articles have highlighted the sheer solipsism and stupidity of an American feminist viewing the lyrics of a 16-year-old New Zealander through the eyes of American race relations, so I will not repeat that aspect here. I will point out, however, the hypocrisy that Feministing has condemned bullying of other groups but remains complicit in shaming a girl for purportedly racist song lyrics without any sense of nuance or perspective. Does it have anything to do with the fact that, as a young girl in a foreign country just starting out in an industry based largely on reputation and body of work, she makes an easy target? Who could be expected to jump in and defend a pretty white girl against cries of racism from American feminists wielding a self-declared broadsword of faux moral superiority?

In any case, Bayetti's puerile and poorly conceived hit piece is proof that our level of discourse on race is rapidly decaying to a point of no return, and American feminists are complicit in accelerating the decline. A blanket description of any criticism as "racist" simply for shock value and page views implicitly restricts freedom of speech and degrades the dialogue about race into a space of feelings and "offense" rather than facts, logic, and reason. Then again, those ideals never really were the domain of American feminists anyway.

Eminem & Survival Of The Fittest

October 15, 2013 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Eminem & Survival Of The Fittest

The pundits were surprised when Eminem came out with a heavy guitar based hip hop anthem, 'Survival', for his new single. The riff (and marketing push) linked to Call of Duty. This kind of old school track was presumed dead, too cliché to touch. Nonetheless it is an excellent track and the lyrical content is quite inspiring and uplifting.

In truth I am not a huge fan of the whole hip hop thing, much of it represents ridiculous music for the ego. Music was supposed to convey emotion and harmony, but now it has to convey how many girls I've banged and what a nice car I have? What happened to Beethoven, Pink Floyd, Progressive Trance – music that took you on a journey and didn't require you to sport sunglasses to hide behind (other than to protect your LSD inflated pupils).

One of the saddest things in the world is rich young white boys in California and New York, that come from well to do homes, and live in the lap of luxury, calling each other nigga while riding about in mommies SLK, complete with her Louis Vuitton make up bag in the glove box. Not a .45 to be seen. I'm sure if you pop the trunk you'll find her pink Juicy Couture gym bag in place of a Mosberg and pound of coke. Ride on white boys, you're the shit. You have so little integrity and identity of your own, you have to take one from a pop song.

Whilst it's easy to identify with the art of an impoverished class, reduced to a life of crime (or pipe dream music success for the chosen few), and whilst I cannot deny the angst, energy and hope that much hip hop contains, the commercialization of it leaves a bad taste in the mouth. Youngsters embracing the gangster lifestyle and thinking they have any kind of empathy with that violent world, is more beta than buying their girlfriend a strap-on. The most violence in their life is Jose's lawn mower, grinding the grass on daddy's 5 acre estate.

Still, I think it is important to recognize hip-hop for the art form and expression that it is. It is also interesting to see the polarity of the sexes still exists in hip hop, where men are surely men that take no shit and carve out their own existence. While the women, albeit black, (sorry trolls, had to slip that little politically incorrect faux pas in there) are sexy and luscious females.

Back to Eminem. His new track is great for many reasons. The pounding guitar has a ring of the almost forgotten heavy metal era, it's a shame that the shredded guitar solo is lost in the mix, but the vibe is still there. His point is put across perfectly. "This is Survival of the Fittest, This is do or Die. This is The Winner Takes it All… So take it all."

Why not? That is what men do.

Eminem is always politically incorrect, setting out to ruffle as many feathers as possible and while this track is perfect bubble gum pop in many respects and no one is going to be up in arms about his lyrics on Survival, that is actually the genius of it. He has managed to preserve the ultra alpha attitude (chauvinist, misogynist scream the feminists), that women's advocates the world over have tried to rail him for – without actually giving them anything to talk about. Art is meant to dip into your subconscious and Eminem accomplishes that. It's a man's track, and it perfectly captures the attitude a man needs, without making any social references or causing you to feel the need to pretend you are an extra in Al Pacino's Scarface. You can leave mommies Benz in the garage and build your own vibe.

Even with all his wealth, accomplishment and success, Eminem, who has surely had his personal ups and downs, sign seals and delivers as he spits – not just the emotion and fear he still goes through to this day when trying to maintain his persona and success, but also conveys the psyche and drive he must conjure up to carry on putting out material and remain credible as an artist.

I love how he shoots down his detractors with such lyrical precision, firing himself up and executing a rap that is just as good as any of his first material:

> Wasn't ready to be no millionaire, I was ill-prepared
> I was prepared to be ill though, the skill was there
> In the beginning, it wasn't 'bout the ends
> It was 'bout busting raps and standing for something, fucking acronym
> Cut the fucking act like you're happy, I'm fucking back again
> With another anthem, why stop when it doesn't have to end?
> It ain't over 'til I say it's over – enough when I say enough
> Throw me to them wolves and close the gate up
> I'm afraid of what'll happen to them wolves
> When the thought of being thrown into an alligator pit, I salivated it
> Weight is up, hands up like it's 12 noon, nah, homie
> Hold them bitches straight up, wave 'em 'til you dislocate a rotator cuff
> Came up rough, came to ruffle feathers, nah, egos
> I ain't deflated enough, last chance to make this whole stadium erupt cause
> This is survival of the fittest
> This is do or die
> This is the winner takes it all
> So take it all

He avoids all the niggas in the hood BS, which sounds absurdly pompous coming from guys like Jay-Z and Kanye. No matter what your background, you can't pretend to live an under privileged life and rap about it, while criss-crossing the globe in a private jet as a part of pop music royalty. Talk about a coconut (yes… more totally inappropriate racist jokes).

One of the nicest things about blunt and to the point communication, is that it cuts straight to business. We can learn a lot from the way the hip-hop artists have neutralized the N word, and a lot about their attitudes and aggressive language. If we learn to take criticisms as they come and not be worried about detractors, and stop pussy footing about with some kind of false pride; pretending that we are oh so offended because someone was swearing or calling us a mother fucker, we will all be so much better off.

You see that world of attention to detail and social mechanics is largely a woman's world. I am quite sure that most of the time, when I drop the F word to the clerk at the bank she is not offended at all, but simply seeking a mechanism to obtain some kind of power over me. FUCK YOU BITCH. I will talk how I want.

Stop being offended

The more we care, the more we attach ourselves to external things, the more just about anything can ruin our day. People's impression of us, judgmental or derogatory comments, and our own minor screw ups and so on and so forth, the more we tie our happiness to the external – the more we are likely to fail in life.

Getting offended by anything is about as valid as making the life decision to only be happy on sunny days. It's raining so I will be miserable today. My buddy called me a fucking idiot so I am sad today. My girlfriend sucked off my dad so I feel sad today. Fuck all that. This is survival of the fittest.

First and foremost, fittest in this day and age, means emotionally robust. Water off a duck's back. All the obstacles and detractors are simply the weights and the gymnasium to build muscle with. Otherwise you are no more than an animal jumping from one situation to the next. Acting and reacting according to external stimulus. Unfortunately today we do not embrace survival of the fittest. We embrace survival of the handbag and sunglasses. Whoever has the most expensive logo on his shirt and motor car is the winner.

It would be nice to learn from mistakes and fire up that success and credibility while I am still alive, certainly. It would be nice to benefit from the wealth, success, social life (think endless hot pussy) and creature comforts that it would bring, but as Eminem's own example and track makes clear, getting rich and successful is just the beginning of your problems. The more money in your bank account, the more you will have to worry about and maintain. You will have to run just to stand still and all your character flaws will be amplified. Few get to rest on their laurels and when they do, they are bored and fed up.

Survival is my psych up song of the month

Any time you are heading out on the game, have a difficult problem to solve, women trouble, work issues, money problems or whatever, this track will hit the spot and get you in the right mood.

> They said I was washed up, and kinda blood-bathed
> I'm not a rapper, I'm an adapter, I can adjust
> Plus I can just walk up to a mic and just bust
> So floor's open if you'd like to discuss
> And if there should ever come a time where my life's in a rut
> And I look like I might just give up, eh you might've mistook
> Let me remind you of what got me this far, picture me quitting
> Now draw a circle around it and put a line through it, slut
> It's survival of what?

Remember it is survival of the fittest. Life owes you nothing more than a miserable lonely death. Anything beyond that you have to create for yourself, a large part of which involves maintaining your own mental and emotional state and ignoring everyone else's opinion.

Pay respect to those more successful than yourself; try your best to engage politics and social mechanics when needed, in part to get a leg up from a friendly mentor, but otherwise to hell with them all, especially the fat black feminist bitches and their beta manginas.

Stupid Western Men Are Getting Ripped Off In Ukraine

October 15, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Independent has put out an article describing the mail-order bride capital of the world, Odessa, a city that I have spent the past four months in.

> They populate Odessa's numerous terrace cafés, stroll in hordes through its parks, and fill the plush velvet seats of its 19th century opera house. A foreign man, usually though not always over 60 and American, sits with a Ukrainian girl, probably in her twenties and strikingly attractive. Habitually, they are joined by another young woman, the translator, who facilitates the dialogue.
> "She says she likes a strong man who knows his mind." "Tell her I love the idea of two cultures coming together in a relationship." "She says she thinks you could be her soulmate."

I've seen these men in the city. They all congregate at the Guinness Pub on the main drag. Usually they have mustaches and wear bomber jackets. Some of them venture in a bar called Captain Morgan's, but they don't usually hit the normal nightlife venues.

As for the Odessan girls, they seem normal to me (by Ukrainian standards). None of tried to milk me. Ukrainian women are most adept at male mineral extraction, so when you toss in naive men who don't know any better, you know that large sums of money are being tossed into the ether. Their idealistic wife search turns into an impoverishing death spiral.

These bride hunters also have a faulty belief, along with many feminists, that quality women are just begging to come to a dying America. While many do have fantasies of living in the USA, not one quality woman I've dated in Ukraine has even hinted to me that she wants to settle in the USA. Moving to the USA is a desperation move that happens to older women (28+) who for whatever reason has lost hope that they will ever get married in Ukraine. In other words, moving to America is not their first choice. Unless the girl is busted and overweight, it never is.

> "Everything is possible; there are women who genuinely want to meet a man and emigrate," says a foreigner living in Odessa who is well acquainted with the dating industry. "In the villages there are even more of them. But there are very few of them in Odessa, these days. Especially those who would be willing to marry a man in his sixties or seventies. They love Odessa, and they can make good money scamming these idiots. Why would they actually go through with it and move to some boring place in rural America?"
> "She'll say yes to his proposal, milk him for money for 'English lessons' for the next six months, and then disappear," predicts Alina, when I tell her about Stephen. When he complains to me of the vast sums he is forking out every day for the translator fees, taxi rides, and gifts of Swarovski jewellery, I make gentle suggestions that perhaps all is not what it seems. I smile weakly when he talks of plans to redecorate his house ahead of the arrival of his new wife, and I wonder if I should sit him down and set him to rights. But he is old enough to work things out for himself. I leave him the day before his departure on the way to a karaoke bar, where he plans to propose.

> […]
> Indeed, as the tour winds down, even those men who were sent to the depths of despair by dates who did not show up, fleeced them, or led them on, are planning return trips to Ukraine. Some have already been more than once; one of them is on his 14th tour. For some of them, merely the fleeting hope of happiness seems to be enough, while others hold on to a conviction that next time it might just be different.

These men are so lonely that they don't mind spending thousands of dollars to pass the time with beautiful women without sex. And these are the idiots that guys like me get compared to!

There are so many horror stories from mail-order bride agencies online that I have as much sympathy for these guys as I do for a man getting raped in American divorce court. The secret was long out for anyone with a functioning set of eyes and ears. I must conclude that some men simply want to be led to slaughter.

Is there a solution for these old Western men? Can they just learn game and start approaching girls in the cafe? I'm not sure, but expecting to hand over a pile of cash and get a wife in return reaches a level of stupidity that deserves, at the minimum, a bitch slap.

There is no shortcut to finding a wife. You must display your value through taking social risks in the form of approaches until a connection is cultivated. To think that an agency is going to do it for you because you've paid thousands of dollars, and expect any resulting marriage to be successful, is absurd.

> She told him that the men are effectively paying to sit at a restaurant with a > beautiful woman. If they are naïve enough to think there is a romantic attachment, then that is their problem.

Their problem indeed.

Choose A Weekend Lover Over a Traditional Relationship

October 15, 2013 | by Jeremiah | Link | Original Link

I propose that the working class man should solely be with women who are only available on Fridays and Saturdays, from 7pm-2am. I'm a realist and I have been in relationships so I understand that not all hours in relationships are productive. Many of these hours are spent doing one's own thing, which is understandable and ideal so as not to smother our partners. So I prefer we lump 14 hours of productivity into 2 days.

The Ideal Schedule

I'm all about efficiency and reducing bottlenecks. An ideal schedule would look something like this:

Friday Night:

- 7pm to 9ish: Go to dinner where you share stories about your week.
- 9ish-9:30pm: Come back home. Get in a quickie, depending on how well you escalated sexual tension at dinner.
- 9:30-12am: Take a bubble bath together. Drink some wine while watching a movie or playing a board game until about midnight (in which time plenty of jokes can be told).
- 12am-1am: Share some affectionate cuddling.
- 1am-2am: End the night after an hour of sex (as long as you're sleep by 2am).

Saturday Night:

- 7-9pm: Go to dinner or a movie, or perhaps dancing or a comedy show.
- 9-11pm: Come back home, or preferably her home. Have wine and play a video game or talk about a book together.

- 11-12am: Escalate sexual tension.
- 12am-1am: Enjoy the fruits of the sexual tension that should have been built an hour earlier.
- 1am-2am: Cuddle and then sleep.

This set-up allows for a win-win because you both can enjoy half of your weekend and your week days doing things that you want to do. The fact is, most people don't, and shouldn't have time for week day lovers anyway. I know I don't. I have a son to raise, work to worry about, plenty of books to read, blog postings to write, and sleep to be had.

If one person just has to communicate during the week, then I suppose they should call, but I'd much rather they write their concerns on sticky notes and come prepared to discuss their notes on Friday evenings. In this manner, the couple would never have to worry about an awkward silence over dinner.

Why A Schedule? Shouldn't You Just Go with the Flow?

Anything outside of these designated hours would disrupt the peace in the relationship. Also, too much information can come out way too soon. Have you ever felt pressured to "do something" just because your girl is around when you would rather be playing a video game or reading? Enjoy your "me" time. If your girl is worth anything, she'll have her own things that she's into and shouldn't mind such a low-pressure relationship.

And no, it's not an issue of being a control freak, it's rather practical. A schedule sets social boundaries. I like my free time, so I'll assume everyone else does too.

There are likely some who would argue that there shouldn't be a schedule for intimacy, but I would invite them to consider re-evaluating their thoughts. How many people do you know are in relationships that are void of intimacy because they don't schedule it? There are plenty of social psychologists and relationship therapists who promote scheduling date time. You'll just be one step ahead of the game.

Married or not, nothing fundamentally changes about relationships. Quality time always rules over quantity of time. As long as you can make the 14 hours memorable, romantic, respectful, concerning, genuine, and compassionate, your woman should always look forward to the next scheduled weekend date.

My proposed schedule doesn't exclude spontaneity, surprises, or new ideas to enjoy each other's company. As long as you and your girl are spending good quality time together, you two should be good.

How do you convince your girl to submit to such a schedule?

I propose that the ultimate measure of a man's game is to get women to agree with things they wouldn't otherwise imagine they'd enjoy. To do it without lies or deceit is even better—it's not only "red pill domination," but also Leadership 101. The excitement in accomplishing such a goal is as exhilarating as having sex with a woman on the first night, even though she had said earlier that she'd never do such a thing.

In order to convince your girl to submit to such a schedule, it'll take communications and a channeling of her inner emotions with sincere, genuine tact, which Winston Churchill defined as "the ability to tell someone to go to hell in such a way that they look forward to the trip."

This is admittedly an extreme challenge. Females are needy and emotional. Thus, saying the wrong thing will quickly get your texts ignored and phone calls blocked. So challenge your inner "game" and see how would you get your girl to submit to your Friday and Saturday night only schedule, so that you can maximize your independence during your week days.

The 7 Most Common Feminist Insults

October 16, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Slutty and overweight Internet feminists aren't known for their originality or creativity.

This truism has been made especially clear in recent days, with the tandem explosion of two ROK events: my own 24 Signs She's a Slut piece and ROK's devastating, unexpected 9-11-for-fatties #FatShamingWeek campaign.

> #FatShamingWeek will become fat chicks' 9-11. Unexpected, devastating. The 19 "bombers" will become heroes in the skinny world.
> — Tuthmosis (@tuthmos) October 14, 2013

Both garnered tremendous engagement, and from disparate corners of the web. Much of it came from regular guys who—either recognizing the tell-tale signs of female promiscuity, or fed up with excuse-making from indolent fatties—high-fived us in enthusiastic approval and gratitude. However, a not-insignificant portion came from embittered feminists, crypto-sluts, fat tubs-of-shit, and their emasculated male defenders, who lobbed ad-hominem abuse at the authors. This, we know is the clarion call of the butt-hurt and fragile Internet feminist, who requires a "trigger warning" for mere words on a screen, while unironically declaring herself to be "strong" and "independent" in the same breath.

The fascinating part about these reams of "insults" wasn't their sheer volume—and it was large—but how remarkably identical they were to every other insult you see coming from their ilk, in manosphere comment sections and twitter feeds, or feminists' own call-out articles. Their lack of originality was such that you couldn't help but wonder whether they were all reading from the same instruction manual or whether there's, in fact, veracity in the argument that women are uncreative copycats with an inability to be funny.

1. Basement-Dwelling Losers

One way to feel better about someone attacking you is to hope and pray they're unsuccessful, marginalized ciphers. This manifests itself in many forms, but usually with the inference that we live in our mother's basements and play video games all day which, frankly, would be great—and doesn't make our assertions wrong.

Bravo Ms Brandes. I suspect those self-piteous basement dwellers will burst a few blood vessels reading this, so perhaps someone should call the waaahmbulance in advance.

Wow, this is an angry crowd. I guess there are a lot of pimple faced, weird guys sitting behind computer screens displacing anger because they know deep in their hearts they probably don't measure up to whatever "slut" they're referring to (Come on, you know it has something to do with the women who turned them down and wouldn't give the time of day)

2. Sexless Virgin

Interestingly, one of the most common responses to my incontrovertible truths about slut detection was the unlikely proposition that I'm, in fact, a sexless virgin. This is among the most common feminist insults, proving that our skills at bedding women are, in the end, the object of their (however begrudging) admiration.

Jamie · 11 days ago

this is the dumbest thing ive ever read. Whoever wrote it is probably a virgin

This is one of the saddest things I've ever read. I can't begin to imagine how inadequate you are. Hope you lose your virginity and stop being so angry at girls soon.

3. Small Dick

The classic feminist and fatty insult comes straight from the penis-envy sector of their brains. They rarely consider that perhaps all of the penises they've witnessed are "small" because: (1) their obese bodies make everything seem small by comparison; or (2) their unattractiveness rendered the unfortunate penis's flaccidness that much more intense.

Tuthmosis, is your dick the size of a pinky?
Clearly it must be, because you seem to have some insecurity issues.
Seriously, you're a grown man and you write about "slutty girls" for a living?
aha get a real job.

4. "Your [sic] a Rapist!!!"

When in doubt, shout rape. This (in its various permutations) is easily the most common insult, a sad product of the Rape Tourette's epidemic among feminists and their white-knight protectors.

5. “Mommy Issues”

In a classic instance of “projection,” sluts and feminists with daddy issues assume everyone has their deep-seated psychological problems.

I really doubt this is satire, looking at the authors previous 'articles'.

Someone has some deep mommy issues.

It seems that any girl who doesn't give you the time of day (and any girl with an ounce of self respect wouldn't) is a slut. You need to work on your own mommy issues. You are not owed a virgin just because you happen to be male. Get over yourself.

6. The Exception

“x doesn’t apply to me, therefore your whole proposition is wrong.” The rare exceptions merely prove the rule, sweetheart–assuming you’re even telling the truth.

A fellow alternative chick. - 24 days ago
I have dyed hair, facial piercings, and multiple tattoos. I've only had sex with one man. And am currently still with him. Sex did not even happen or cross my mind until 6 months in when I was comfortable. Not every "rebellious girl" is a slut. Maybe 60% of that stereotype may be but 40% are not and thats to large of a percentage to even be a tell tail sign for sluttiness.

What a load of shit!

I have tattoos, peircings & purple hair among other apparently 'slutty' signs & I have been with much much much less men than all of my 'normal' looking friends.

Get a life, a clue & some morals.

7. Graphic Violence

The great irony is that people who are so dedicated to fighting violence against women are quick to wish (and describe) brutal violence on others. Perhaps unsurprisingly, they have a particular fixation on the male genitalia.

The Only Girl For Me

I have a confession to make. Despite everything I say and my beliefs towards women and relationships, there is one female that has been a part of my life for a long time. I do love her. And yes, this is a true story.

I found her online and after a few emails I was set to finally meet her in person. When I finally laid eyes on her, it was love at first sight. I did all the talking, but after some playful rubbing she opened up and I took her home. I am not ashamed to admit that during that first night, I cuddled her like a virgin who just experienced his first girl-induced ejaculate. I even brought her breakfast in bed the next morning, and watched happily as she ate every bite.

Later that day we went for a walk around LA. What would normally be a very boring walk for me now had new meaning. It was a new adventure. I loved just being around her. She was quite young and energetic and her liveliness rubbed off on me. So much energy; many times I could barely keep up. In the months that followed we spent every single day together. We would eat together. We would exercise together. Those times when I went out without her, I missed her and she missed me. Every reunion — even if it was only after a few hours — was akin to a scene out of the movies. She would look out the window for me, and when she saw me arrive her eyes would light up and she'd greet me at the door with a huge kiss. It did not take long for me to fall madly in love with her.

She was perfect. My roommates did not mind having her around. My friends all loved her. At first my mother hated her, but with time they grew to love each other. Now every time I go out of town for more than a day she's visiting my mother. They act as if they are best friends. To be honest she's the only female my mom's ever liked. But this is no surprise, almost everyone who meets her likes her. It is hard to dislike her given how great her personality is. Aesthetically, she is perfectly symmetrical with great muscle tone. Nice golden hair, cute nose and a strut to her that told people that she was not only classy but also friendly and a pleasure to be around. People would come up to me and comment on her beauty and I would say thank you, even though I know I had nothing to do with her genetics.

When I go on vacation, she is the only one I miss. I never miss my family or my friends. I never miss the so-called American comforts. And as much fun as I was having going out at nights and experiencing new cultures and new women, I always thought about her the next morning. Maybe it's because she is the type that has unquestionable devotion to me. If I killed or maimed a person, she would love me the same. If I yelled at her, she would love me the same. She doesn't care that I write for ROK or judge me for my views. If she gains a few pounds I call her fatty and make it a point to exercise more with her, and she's absolutely fine with it. There is absolutely nothing I could do that would even slightly decrease her love for me.

And then there is her submissiveness. She listens to every word I say. If I told her not to move from where she was sitting, she would literally stay there until I told her she could move again. I am her world, and nothing will ever change that. No other man could come by and sway her love for me. If she was presented with competition — another vying for my attention — she'd do everything in her power to separate us. A little bitchy, perhaps, but it's nice to see that she loves me so much she cannot stand the idea of losing me to another, even if for only a few seconds.

The result of her attitude is that I do things for her that I would never do for anyone else. To simplify it, I'm a complete "beta" not only around her but also for her. I look forward to spending time with her. I would never think of replacing her with another. Every single day of my life I'm excited to see her again. I pay for absolutely everything. I provide for her housing, her clothes, her food, her health, and so on. I even pay for her haircuts and nails. And I have zero hesitation to do so. And despite the fact that I'm a very unemotional guy… if she so much as broke a nail and I saw her in pain, my eyes may water. Often times I sit around thinking about how much better society would be if the women here just portrayed half the qualities my girl does. But it's never going to happen, it's an impossibility.

I'd continue writing about how much I love her and how great she is, but she's sitting right next to me and giving me those eyes. It's time for us to do our nightly walk. I just need to grab her leash.

Observing A Young Alpha Male

October 16, 2013 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

I was watching the above video recently for some reason (I have no idea how I wound up there – ironically the same can be said of many of my one night stands badum tsh). It's a basic science video, the kind that so many internet 'scientists' with their 3 year Bsc degree from mid-tier universities sperg themselves over. It's boring as hell and useless, so of course like many situations where my attention wanes I immediately began checking out the talent in the background. Stripes and green are pretty decent specimens, and black skirt on the end needs a closer examination before I declare hot or not (not to mention some badly needed hair treatment) but the others all have blocky bodies and guts so they're wrote off immediately.

As the video went on, a few interesting things caught my eye.

1. The boys and girls are completely separated.

Now I have no idea if the teacher set them up like that or if they were all shy and naturally assumed that demarcation. I can see a teacher trying to separate the boys and girls, having experienced some petty frosty bitches like that during my school days, but me and the other two biggest goons in my class never let that stop us from sauntering over to hover behind girls to snap some bras and sniff some hair.

However, these kids are clearly in grade 9 or 10 – literally making my erection a crime by the way; at least according to the man. So I'm going to assume that they picked their places themselves 'cause they're like, shy or still worried about cooties or something.

2. The only boy and girl standing beside each other are wearing the same colours flipped vertically.

This is an interesting composition. It's unlikely they coordinated or planned that in advance but his black shirt vs. her white shirt and her black skirt vs. his white shorts instantly draw the eye, creating an almost chequerboard like appearance of unity; even the line between their shirts and bottoms match up to an eerily uniform level. Their complimenting style and stance are very cinematic in appearance, and if this were a competently made fictional movie that composition would give us a hint that they're attracted to one another.

3. Also the two I mentioned above are furiously attracted to each other.

I could float a cinder block on the sexual tension between them. I also noticed that the boy is a hard alpha for his age. Don't agree? Well I've broken down the video play by play to examine the moves of this young, burgeoning alpha male.

And before you sperg lords scroll down and begin furiously accusing me of being a paedophile; this video was made in 2010. These kids look at the very youngest to be 14. They're either 17 or 18 now.

Like you wouldn't either or.

Besides, every red-blooded male takes down consenting High School girls. Stop letting feminized society dictate your boner. But stay the f away from kids you sickos. Lolita was fiction, not a suggestion.

Any ways, if you're cool with observing the sexuality of 14-year-olds then tie up your trench coat and hop on the lurking school bus to see if you agree with my observations below:

(0:04) They start off stiff, both facing the demonstrators. Very quickly in the video the girl shuffles, lightly nudging him, and immediately the boy readjusts his stance, turning slightly toward her and leaning back. Subtle signs of interest have been established by both parties.

(0:19) A deal of time passes where neither of them makes a move toward each other. Eventually the boy, perhaps sensing rejection, or that the girl was merely teasing him, reverts back to a stiff forward facing stance. Immediately the girl fidgets, letting him see her interest by extending her leg once, receiving no reciprocation and then extending it again – once more receiving no reciprocation. The boy refuses to chase her and it is here that he displays his first hint of alpha dominance. A deal of time passes with them leaning away from each other, both clearly disappointed, but the boy stoic in his refusal to buy into her chase game.

(0:40) The teacher, or TA, or whatever that fashion victim woman calls herself (probably just a university student, going by her fatness, mole-mannish movements and inability to dress herself) moves around the barrel to begin the experiment proper. The girl becomes frightened and shrinks back and toward the boy, her movements practically begging for protection. However, for several seconds it is unknown whether he notices her need for protection or is simply refusing her.

(0:54) The boy has noticed and has likely held off to signal that he does not need to react to her every whim; a second display of alpha male dominance, showing the girl that he will react to her needs on his own schedule. He also pulls the girl in further by rewarding the girl's helpless need for protection by leaning over to her, establishing contact and at that moment she shrinks into him further, clearly accepting his protection. Her hands, which had been clasped in front of her skirt in a protective position, unclench in a sign of trust; one even moves back to clutch at herself in an almost sensual manner.

(1:00) The boy has visibly relaxed, having established a physical contact and dominance with the girl. His arms, still crossed, have loosened and he appears less like that asshole bouncer who threw me out of the club last weekend and more of a king observing great works being ERECT-ed in his domain. His confidence has sky rocketed from the females acceptance of his alpha moves.

Is fatso checking out her lack of ass or just admiring her sweats?

(1:05) The experiment before them enters a 'dangerous' phase. The girl can be seen raising her hands to her ears to block out the bang, and also shifts more into the boy. Unfortunately at this point MuffinGut McSweatPants moves in front of her blocking the girl's reactions from view for several moments.

(1:19) When Sweatpants finally waddles off to the side we briefly catch the girl's leg bent coyly toward that of the boy. Her hands are back down, once more moving in front of her skirt in a suggestive manner and she's fidgeting nervously, constantly shifting into and toward the boy.

(1:27) The girl leaps fully behind the boy, completely giving herself over to him as her protector. Her hands grasp his arm and doubtless if the camera was focused up at the only interesting part of this video we would see her upper body pressing into his, letting the boy feel her burgeoning female form, possibly whispering how totally freaked out she is into the boy's ear. As far as can be discerned from the angle, the boy is defiant and proudly masculine, fully exposing himself to the danger and showing no worry. He has established dominance over the girl and at this point it's undoubted that they rutted soon thereafter, possibly after a sock hop when both are inebriated from a shared bottle of liquor stolen from their parent's liquor cabinet.

After that point their sexual frustration cannot be ignored. Their legs rub, their bodies turn toward each other like frickin' magnets, they're both antsy and clearly they want nothing more than to mount and mate like the crazed teenagers they are. The boy has entered alphadom and I have no doubt that in the years since this video was made he tapped a lot of teenaged ass at his school. It's likely he currently spends his time going through a bevy of tight, attractive young bodies, writing up occasional articles on game websites to share tips with his fellow alphas and trying to help borderline betas make that final step to the promised land of poosy.

You can visibly see how happy he is with her by his side, how much grander life is when you assert your male dominance. Meanwhile the beta chumps off to the right all are crestfallen, probably wishing that the school day was over so they could rush home and play Call of Duty together – each in their own houses of course, since this is the 21st century and only homos want to go over to each others houses and talk face to face with each other hur hur hur.

They undoubtedly rationalize their sexless high school lives by reassuring one another that all the girls in their town are sluts and who would want to have sex with a whore? They know that once they head off to university there will be a treasure trove of beautiful, chaste virgins who totally understand what a big deal reaching level 12 prestige is in their video games and laugh uproariously at all their witty recitations of jokes from Family Guy and Futurama, while these mythical women ask and expect nothing in return. It's likely that they currently spend their time masturbating to videos of tight, attractive young females, writing up incessant comments on game websites about how much of a lying, creepy loser the author of the article is.

---

You approached a little hottie and her perky tits and bubble butt are fresh in your memory, after getting her digits that Monday afternoon at your local Starsluts, I mean Starbucks. Now what the fuck do you do?

Pick up the phone and call her right NOW! I kid. Don't do that.

Send her the after-meeting text as I mentioned before:

"It's Christian the sexy muthafucka u met at starbucks. let's grab a drink soon ;)"

Unless she responds IMMEDIATELY with "Heyyy!!! Come over to my dorm room tonight, lets get drunk and play twister", then don't respond to her texts. Odds are she'll write something back like this, "lol, hey it was cool meeting you too"

Ignore it. Text her 2 days later with a Call For Action:

You: "Drinks tomorrow night. 9pm. XYZ Bar. Try to look sexy ;)"

Note: Unless you have a club ON-LOCK, and I mean to the point where you could pull her in the bathroom and fuck her in a stall without ANY problem; then go to a bar. In the bar you'll build comfort. Another important reason to have a couple of bars ON-LOCK. It builds MASSIVE DHV (Demonstration of Higher Value) when you walk into a bar and are The Man there.

You're assuming the sale. NEVER ask her. Don't do this:

You: "Hey Starbucks Slut, would you like to meet for drinks tomorrow night at 9pm sharp? No problem if you can't…"

I'm fucking puking even having just wrote that. How fucking gay is that beta text I just wrote? Assume the sale, assume the sale, assume the sale.

You must ALWAYS be operating from a High Value Man position. This is a part of Frame.

Now assuming you sent the Alpha text, then let's say she responds with this:

Starbucks Slut: "lol! Of course I'll look sexy. duh!"

You: “koo”

SS: “Are you picking me up?”

Note: Now depending on logistics of where the bar is to your crib, then this can get tricky. I would have her drive her car to the bar. I’m basing this on her being able to have a ‘legitimate’ excuse to tell her parents/roomate if she winds up at your crib and spends the night. If you pick her up, then you’re obligated to drive her back to her house (generally speaking).

If she drives her car to meet you and she decides to stay over, then she can tell her parents or roommate that she’s spending the night at “a friend’s house”. Plausible deniability. Make it easy on her to get nasty with you and rationalize her hamster. Plus, if she winds up being a cunt, you can always stay at the bar, ignore her and game other sluts. At the least you won’t have to endure a drive to her house with the ‘date’ having gone bad and both parties miffed.

You: “nah, just meet me there. if you’re secretly crazy I’ll need a quick way to escape ;)”

Her: “lol okay. See you at 9″

You: “kk”

Alright, now you have the ‘date’ scheduled. You’ve cleared the first hurdle: Approaching and setting up a ‘date’. Now to actually meet her and get her comfort built, while subtly escalating.

Goes without saying, but dress in what you feel best in and God forbid you wear the same outfit you were wearing when you met her.

You set the ‘date’ for 9pm, BUT you’re not going to show up UNTIL she texts you that she’s there at the bar. Trust me, she will. No girl’s hamster can handle being stood up and IF she actually gets to the bar on time (highly unlikely with girls tendency to be late + ‘getting ready’ etc) then cool, that’s great; she might actually be a relatively decent girl. Sit in your car, but not in an obvious place.

Starbucks Slut: “Heyyy…are you coming?? I just walked in”

Note: It’s 9:15pm

Wait 2-3 minutes and text back:

You: “ya. grab a seat almost there”

Her: “Ok”

Wait 3 more minutes and then walk in the bar. Now I know you’re thinking, “How the FUCK can it be this much of a science??” Well gentlemen, it is, because our current generation of women LOVE to play games and are in constant competition with men to one-up them and be ‘better’.

It’s called Game for a motherfucking reason. Play or be played like a fiddle.

In The Bar

Walk into the bar like you’ve got the biggest dick in the world and could give two flying fucks what people think; you’re THE MAN. Confidence, confidence, confidence. Walk up to her, give her a hug, and order a drink. Odds are she won’t have ordered a drink, she’ll be waiting on you to buy one. Now there are a million schools of thought regarding this. I’ve bought and NOT bought girls drinks on the first ‘date’ and have had ONS’s in both scenarios, BUT for this scenario, let’s say that you do buy the drinks. Remember, you’re shooting for the Path of Least Resistance into her panties.

Make it smooth. When you order the drinks, be fucking casual and boss like. Bring CASH. Don’t hand your Bank of America card over hesitantly wondering if you’re going to overdraft. Take cash so you know what the fuck you’re working with and there’s NO chance of it being declined. Toss the cash on the bar casual like. Meanwhile she’ll be jabbering about something that doesn’t really matter. Half-listen. She’s in your world;

NOT the other way around. Take a sip of your beverage, savor it and then open her up.

Cats get worried about meeting a girl for a date and let me tell you something; it's actually easy. You know why? Because all you really have to do is ask her fucking questions. By the end of the date, she'll be drunk, you'll know a ton about her life and interests, what buttons to push to get the desired affect and she won't really know much about you, which is KEY.

Literally as I'm typing this right now at a Coffee Bean, a couple was in front of me on their first date and holy fucking shit the dude just blabbed and blabbed his ass off. It's no shock when I went outside for a smoke, the girl on the date eye fucked the shit out of me. The date was a disaster by all accounts and the dude was an idiot because the girl is clearly wanting the dick, but his lack of basic social skills ended it before it could begin.

Ask, Listen, Comment.

Ask, Listen, Comment.

Ask, Listen, Comment.

Example:

> You: You like school?
> Her: blah blah blah
> You: Yea Math sucks dick
> Her: blah blah blah
> You: Teasing insult disguised as a comment
> Her: laughter

Get it? Now when she asks you questions you CAN answer some of them sincerely, because nothing is more obnoxious than a cat who answers every fucking reasonable question with a joke or dig. It’s fucking gay. There is a balance. Example:

> Her: So did you go to college?
> You: Yea, Harvard
> Her: OMG! Really??
> You: Nah I went to IU
> Her: Oooh party school. How was that?
> You: A lot of partying and an hour here and there of studying
> Her: (laughing) I’ll bet. You’re such a bad boy! (Lightly punches your arm. Great sign.)

See what just happened? She lightly punched your arm. That means Young G, that you’re doing something right…

Understand the difference? You can be light and playful, but yet still communicate like a normal fucking human being. If you respond to every reasonable question with a complete joke and don’t revert to truth, or some semblance of truth, it’s not going to flow. You want the date to float along smooth, fun, playful and with one goal in mind: Getting her naked by the end of the night.

In a perfect world, every date would end with you bending her over and fucking her little tight pink pussy so hard that she walks funny the next day, but alas, it’s not a perfect world. She might take 2 dates, or even 3, and that will depend if you have the tolerance to drag it out that long. Some cats are cool with 5 dates before they shag her; some just 1. The point is, you’re going to do everything in your power to seduce her into getting naked the FIRST date.

Next week you'll learn how to take this up a notch, in Escalation: Part 2.

Indian Feminist Seetha Kulandaisamy Gets An American Man Fired

October 17, 2013 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

A few days ago, Captain Capitalism published a link about an Indian feminist who had gotten a guy fired from his job in Austin, Texas over a sign that made a light-hearted joke about domestic violence. I clicked the news link and read it, and noticed that the article mentioned the woman's name, one Seetha Kulandaisamy, who had been walking down 6th Street (a popular night life area) in Austin when she had noticed the sign outside of Minibar.

Seetha was seething with indignant righteous feminist rage upon seeing the sign. Like any good feminist, she took a picture of it and uploaded it to Facebook and Pinterest and of course it went viral.

After a rabid gang of feminists flooded the Minibar with phone calls and harassment, the bar manager decided to fire the guy who wrote the sign. He then proceeded to write a sign saying “1 dollar towards every beer will be donated to domestic violence victims”. The interesting point here is, notice how the Ds and the Es of both signs are identical. Therefore, it is my assumption that Alex Elmiger, the guy who manages the bar, wrote both signs, and that he simply fired some poor guy and used him as a scapegoat. This is definitely worth investigating.

A few guys on RVF noticed this incident and made a thread about it and were discussing it. It also was very quickly picked up by people from 4chan. The thread on the /b/ (Random) section on 4chan went viral, and one guy on the thread posted “Hey, I know this girl, she was in my class at UT Austin and I used to have her on my Facebook friends list”. He then proceeded to post her Facebook profile link and she got flooded with troll messages. Then someone tracked down her employer information and posted her office phone number on the /b/ thread, and they proceeded to flood her office with calls. She works as a receptionist, so she was the one answering the phone. The trolls at 4chan were also talking about sending her pizza deliveries, but I do not know if they really went that far or not.

4Chan /b/ thread:

It was a lot like the whole Adria Richards situation a few months back, who overheard two guys making a joke about dongles and so she took their photo and got the two guys fired from their job. The people at 4chan picked up this story very quickly and they proceeded to flood her with messages, and a few guys even DDoSed her employer's website. The next day, the employer wrote that he was firing Adria Richards because how she handled the situation was incredibly inappropriate, causing those two guys to get fired over an innocent joke. Roosh documented all of this in an article he wrote called American Feminist Adria Richards Gets Gang Raped By The Internet.

Feminists who screw up men's lives need to be publicly named and shamed. Any time a feminist or a woman gets a man fired over something stupid, it needs to be documented and published online. The days of women thinking they can do whatever they want and be immune to the consequences are over.

How Liberal Arts Hurts Our Economy

October 18, 2013 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Tori and Tory are both accountants at a local accounting firm. Tori holds a Bachelor's in accounting, has five years of experience in the industry, and is 30 years old. Tory has a Bachelor's in finance, with four years of experience, and is 27 years old. Both Tori and Tory are considered to be top accountants at their firms; they have happy clients, bring in profits, and are generally considered to be good employees. However, they differ slightly…

Tory is supposed to start work at 8:00am sharp every day. Typically though, Tory walks into the building at 7:30am. Tory has one hand on a briefcase, and the other hand holding a smartphone to the ear, already working with clients. Once in the office, Tory focuses on the task at hand. Tory typically only takes lunch twice a week, and that time is spent in the company gym, knowing there is little time after work to accomplish this. Other days, Tory works through lunch. During major tax season, Tory often works 80 hours a week with no further financial incentive. At the end of the day, Tory is scheduled to get off at 5:00pm. However, it is more often to see Tory walk out the door at 6:00pm with a tired, drained expression. Tory collects a respectable $54,000 a year for work.

Tori is supposed to start work at 8:00am sharp every day. Typically though, Tori saunters into the office, Starbucks in one hand, the other hand glued to a smartphone with Facebook up, at about 8:30am. Tori loves water cooler talk, and will spend 30 minutes every day talking about the latest episode of American Idol. Tori will often take a two-hour lunch on Fridays to relax before the start of the weekend. During major tax season, Tori often works…40 hours a week. Tori is scheduled to work at the office until 5:00pm, but often slides out around 4:45pm with a cheery smile. Despite this, when Tori focuses on work, good things happen. Tori collects a respectable $50,000 for work.

One day, Tori finds out that Tory makes $4,000 a year more. Tori is outraged at this, as Tori has more experience, age, and an actual degree in accounting over Tory. Tori complains to HR, and the managers give Tori a raise to bring their salaries closer together.

Which one of these accountants is a woman, and which one is a man?

Women should get paid the same as men? Absolutely! Women should work just as hard as men to get that pay! Absolutely! While feminists will agree with what I said, they're lying. I consistently have seen women/girls expecting to get paid the same, but when the going gets tough, they are the first ones to complain. If you work less than someone, you should get paid less, regardless of gender. Let's take the above analogy with our accountants and now apply it to college-level education.

Feminism –> Liberal Arts –> Government-Created Jobs –> Less $

With feminism spawned more girls furthering their education by going to college, which is all fine and dandy. However, notice how, year after year, courses become flooded with more and more liberal degrees that are at best repetitive and at worst…total bullshit. This spawns from the analogy above, women want the same opportunities, but don't want to work as hard. Hence, worthless majors and degree programs are created; simply so that more pieces of paper with degrees stamped on them flood the job market, which hurts everyone in the economy. I graduated college less than a year ago, a semester ahead of most of my peers, most of whom graduated this past May. Most of them are having to move home and are taking up jobs as valets, babysitters, or waiters/waitresses.

Why does it hurt everyone? Economics 101, supply and demand. There is far too big of a supply of people with degrees, and simply not enough jobs to keep up.

Feminism –> Liberal Arts –> Government-Created Jobs –> Less $

Some examples from my own alma mater about the "career opportunities," of Liberal Arts degrees.

Sociology

> Career opportunities for sociology graduates are as varied as is the discipline of sociology. Many sociology graduates find themselves working for businesses > while others find employment in social service agencies or correctional departments (e.g., child welfare worker, parole or probation officer).

> Other fields that might employ sociology graduates include population analysis, public opinion research, public administration and politics.
> The sociology major is also a good preparation for graduate programs in the following areas: sociology, social work, law, medicine, teaching and research.

A sociology degree is nowhere near as good of preparation for med school than…you know, a pre-med degree. This basically says that after you get your degree, you can go spend a few hundred thousand more dollars to get your master's in social work…which you then do what with? Be a correctional officer, working on counseling criminals for $40,000 a year?

Women's Studies

> As with any Liberal Arts Degree, Women's Studies provides a well-rounded education that can be useful in any job. A Women's Studies degree also provides an excellent foundation for further graduate work in professional degree programs such as counseling, social work, law, and public health. A degree in Women's Studies will enhance student's ability to participate professionally in a range of organizations and businesses in the public and private sector, particularly those addressing women's issues. Women's Studies not only provides an excellent Liberal Arts education that improves one's skills in writing and discussions, but it also prepares the student to work with diverse populations and be aware of the forces of privilege and oppression.

Read that first sentence. "As with ANY Liberal Arts Degree….useful in any job." Think about that. They basically said that a major in Women's Studies provides NO additional skills, experience, or knowledge any more useful than any of the other Liberal Arts programs. So, why does it exist?

Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender (LGBT) Studies

> LGBT Studies is an interdisciplinary program, not affiliated with any one department. Courses offered include LGBT literature, history of sexuality, media and sexuality, psychology of human sexual behavior, sexuality in modern society, valuing human diversity, lesbian lives and cultures, among many others. There are also over a dozen internships in LGBT organizations.

There is nothing even listed on this page for "Career Opportunities." What does this major entail? How to have gay sex without lube? The only mention of career opportunities is for "internships" in LGBT organizations. Great, so you pay $100,00 grand for a college education, then all it does is qualify you to go march around in a gay pride parade in your underwear.

Feminism –> Liberal Arts –> Government-Created Jobs –> Less $

What do all these people with Sociology, Women's Studies, and LGBT degrees do? Well, there are no real jobs for them. The government, not wanting to waste all of the scholarship money and money spent printing the diplomas, has to create jobs. Think jobs like paper-filer, keyboard-presser, HR <insert made-up title>, hot-girl-in-tights who walks around (it's a real position, I've seen it)…you get where I'm going with this.

Feminism –> Liberal Arts –> Government-Created Jobs –> Less $

The cycle has come all the way around. Now there is less funding to science, technology, business, engineering, economics…you know, worthwhile careers and fields that contribute to our development as a country and builds future leaders. This in turn cuts the lack of funding to these sectors of the economy, which results in fewer careers in those areas. So then what happens? The people who pursue worthless liberal arts degrees essentially take jobs from those sectors, and on top of that, the science, business, IT, and engineering folks lucky enough to have a job pay more taxes to fund those degrees. This degrades their quality of life and doesn't allow them to be as productive as they could be.

For the immediate future, I see no stopping the government money going towards funding the next great liberal arts program at your local state college.

Take Care Of Your Stuff

October 18, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

A few weeks ago my Kindle stop receiving data through the 3G AT&T wireless connection. I found a lot of info on broken Kindles but I couldn't find any relevant literature for this problem on the internet so I contacted the Amazon customer service online chat. It immediately sounded odd that the representative offered to have me turn in my Kindle and buy a refurbished one for $70 instead of diagnosing the problem. The quickness that he offered this solution immediately raised my suspicions that this might happen quite a bit. I informed the gentleman that I'll look into it and get back to him.

While I was never a communication specialist in the military, I did learn the first step in diagnosing a radio problem is to check connections. I popped open my Kindle saw the only thing I could connect and disconnect was the SIM card. So I did that and turned it on. Magically my Kindle works just fine now. Usually I wouldn't take the time to attempt to fix something that appears to be toast, especially something I am really too familiar with but this case reminded me that it's always a good idea to maintain your stuff.

Some people might argue we live in a disposable society, which is true to a very large extent. But the old saying goes something like this: “a penny saved is a penny earned.” I’m not advocating for you to be a cheap bastard that keeps McDonald’s cups for the refills but merely for maintaining things so they look good and last a long time. So if you keep something working for longer there really is no downside to it.

What things should you focus on attempting to maintain? Well one category would be durable goods. One very good example of this would be your car if you have one. The usual oil change, tire rotation, and tire inflation should already be your standard. Men should also strive to have their car washed at least every two weeks, especially if you live in an environment that has corrosive elements in it such as sea air and road salt. If you want to take it even further you can replace the paper air filter in your car with one of the aftermarket washable ones that not only are cheaper in the long run but improve performance. Who knows, maybe if you maintain your car well enough, what you have today might be the equivalent of a 64 Mustang tomorrow.

You don't always have to maintain your stuff yourself. Sometimes it is easier and more practical to have others do it for you. A very good example of this is maintaining your computer. Buying that antivirus subscription for 40 bucks year is a whole lot less aggravating than trying to solve things on your own when they pop-up. If you can't deal with putting the Kiwi shoe polish on your own shoes then pay someone to do it. There are very few people in the world that can legitimately afford to throw away anything as soon as it gets dirty and I'm guessing those people who can wouldn't anyway.

Sometimes failure to maintain your stuff makes you look bad. If you cannot keep your leather shoes and/or boots tiptop with a shine you will look like a scumbag and people judge you for that. Girls for the most part will not want to have sex with you if there are springs sticking out of the mattress. This is especially true for potential employers. If you appear to be incapable of maintaining your own stuff they'll doubt your ability to maintain company property.

In conclusion, it is a good idea to maintain your stuff especially in these trying economic times. But like anything you do, you have to be reasonable about it. Trying to re-solder that seven dollar pair of headphones you broke at the gym is not really a good use of your time. Buying an air pressure gauge so you can check your tires is a good use of your money. Upgrading your phone at the earliest opportunity may work for some but buying a nice case for one works for everybody.

A Little Knowledge Is A Dangerous Thing

October 18, 2013 | by Wald | Link | Original Link

From Life, by permission.

SHE HAS JUST PICKED A NICE BASKET OF MUSHROOMS FOR DINNER. SHE SAYS SHE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

BUT SHE DIDN'T.

A little knowledge is a dangerous thing, or why younger men sometimes totally disregard the advice of their older peers.

I've known this cliché for a long time, even at a younger age. For the longest time I thought that this cliché was one of empowerment in that, if you have even a little knowledge, you could be capable or dangerous to others. Through conversation with my father I learned that I didn't have the complete answer.

A little knowledge is a dangerous thing means that though one may know something, one does not know what one doesn't know, and you will make faulty decisions based on a the three data points when one should make a decision based on twenty. That is to say, if someone has a small knowledge of martial arts, he should not assume that he is therefore a kung-fu master and start getting into fights. Sure, he might beat up a few guys who don't know anything about fighting, but should he come up against someone with medium experience he'll lose bad.

This cliché is especially applicable to younger men like myself. Often we learn a few things in a field of interest and we jump to many conclusions. Maybe we even accrue some experience that supports our grand total of five data points in head. Often we get to the point where we're so confident in our expertise that we ignore the advice of our older peers who are trying to help because we think what we're doing "makes sense" and "it's worked before." Of course, the guy trying to help us out is working with fifty data points and sees exactly where we're going wrong and even explains it to us, and still we ignore him only to learn the hard way that he was right all along.

This has happened to me plenty of times concerning advice with my Dad. This happens to plenty of younger guys just starting out in the game when their culturally ingrained beta advice wins out against the advice they get from their player friends or experienced mentors. This has also happened to me more times than I'd like to admit. It is all well and fine to learn by trial and error, and young men certainly have the time to learn from their mistakes. Often being young is the perfect time to learn from your mistakes because the consequences are relatively small. I mean, compare heart-break, writing love poems, and whining to anyone who will listen about how you fucked up to getting raped in divorce court, losing your kids, your lover, and tons of money in asset division; child support payments, and alimony. Learning from your mistakes at a young age beats the shit out of doing the same when you're older.

But there's another way to learn that's faster and less painful. It's called learning from the mistakes of others and taking the advice of others. I've had good relations with my parents and have stayed out of a lot of trouble because I saw, or rather, heard what happened to my siblings when they misbehaved. The screams that echoed through the walls and throughout the house were effective in convincing me to pay attention to what they did and not repeat it! My siblings often thought I didn't get spanked enough. I laughed and thanked them for being stupid for me. For the longest time I didn't learn from other people's mistakes regarding girls. But when I started to, I avoided a lot of pitfalls. Sure, I occasionally have an episode where I'm headstrong or my feelings get the best of me, but I learn so much more this way than just learning from my mistakes. This is not say that I don't also learn from trial and error, I do both. I attribute following my father's advice to a lot of success in my life.

How do I do this? I accept that my Dad has seen and done a hell of lot more than I have and I pay attention to his advice. It helps that I've naturally preferred his company to my mom's since around fourteen years of age and have had plenty of time to pick his brain when we'd go shoot sporting clays for the last four years. I learned what Emotional Quotient or EQ is, when to recognize that mine was low, and how to deal with it so that my emotions don't control my life (or affect my shooting!). All I have to do is look at how successful my Dad is, what good health he is for his age and then the quality of his advice is self-evident.

I don't only take advice from my Dad. I take advice from what I read on various blogs in the manosphere. Some things I have to take with a grain of salt of course, because it's the internet. Usually I read something, keep it at the back of my head, and quietly evaluate whether it is true or useful or not based on my own experiences. I don't take advice from just anyone, however, I take advice from people who I have reason to think know more about a subject than I do. And I keep taking their advice until they prove otherwise.

It’s All Your Fault

October 19, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

It’s your fault you dread your 9 to 5, your asshole boss, and the cattiness of human resources.

It’s your fault you drink every weekend as a salve for the work week’s wounds.

It’s your fault you’re so poor that a blown head gasket would spell disaster.

It’s your fault you graze on Facebook and wish more people liked you; that your life had more excitement.

It’s your fault your friends don’t call you because you only talk to them when you need something.

It’s your fault you spend 20 hours a week sedated by technology, waiting for something more.

It’s your fault you feel content watching hours of television instead of imbibing the wisdom of men wiser than you.

It’s your fault you’ve become complacent and can only dream of adventure.

It’s your fault your insecurities leave you paralyzed when opening up to a new situation.

It’s your fault you’re so irrationally afraid of failure that you sacrifice your happiness for stability.

It’s your fault your focus is spread so thin that you rarely accomplish any task you set out to do without interruption.

It’s your fault you lack discipline and slide back to the bottom after barely making a start.

It’s your fault you spend hours planning and over-thinking instead of taking action.

It’s your fault you tell yourself day in and day out that you can’t.

When everything is your fault, beauty lies in the ability to change for a better tomorrow.

5 Big Lies You Have Been Hearing Your Whole Life

October 19, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

There are at least five big lies we have been hearing throughout our lives over and over that somehow evolved into being accepted as axiomatic truisms, when they are anything but the truth. The sooner we abandon them, the more authentic we will become with others and with ourselves. Here is that short yet evil list of lies you should abandon, and the sooner the better:

1. "You Should Just Be Yourself"

This is a typical lazy excuse for the laziest among the lazy to remain where they are today and not bother to get out of their comfort zone in order to grow and become better in any direction. As soon as you suggest change to their behavior and lifestyle, they become extremely defensive, turning the guns on you and telling you all about how much work you could do to become better. The common excuse for rejecting your advice is that they want to remain true to themselves, and they don't want to be something they are not. Apparently becoming stronger, better and smarter is somehow equivalent to betraying your values and principles in their book.

2. "You Should Not Be Judging Anyone"

Why not? Weren't we given brains precisely for that reason – to form opinions, judge, criticize and admire with equal passion? Judgment is the source of much, if not all, progress. If we weren't unhappy with something and didn't do anything about it, we would see no progress of any kind.

Lets also admit it – judging is fun. Going out to a place where there is no one to look at and no one to talk shit about would not be all that much fun either. The reason that all the ridiculous reality television has such a mass appeal is because we all love judging and talking shit about others. I don't know if the true reason for this is that observing others' embarrassing behavior makes us feel better about who we are, or there is more to the story, but the bottom line is that it's such a huge industry for a reason. It draws massive attention.

3. "If You Are Lacking Confidence, Fake it Till You Make It"

This is more BS. Any person with the most basic intuition will recognize the attempts at trying to fake confidence as awkward, lame and kind of Napoleon Dynamite-ish. Having real confidence requires real reasons to be proud of who you are. You don't have to be a millionaire or the best looking person in your city to be confident, but you need to have some kind of accomplishments to be proud of and have that pride translate into a more confident posture, body language and overall demeanor in order to exude real confidence.

4. "Appearances Don't Matter; It's the Inside that Counts"

Appearance does matter. It always did, and it always will. From people's bodies and faces, to cars, shoes, furniture, and architecture – how things look matters a lot, and there is no way around it. I assure you that the reason that Nespresso machines sell is not because they make such an incredible coffee (they really don't), but because they look slick and they make the kitchen look prettier and more hip.

It doesn't mean that substance is not important or that it is less important than what's on the surface, but discounting the value of how something or someone looks is both false and hypocritical. We all care about looks. Find me a girl who accuses men of being superficial, and I will remind her about how she said once that she wasn't interested in a guy because his belt didn't match his shoes. Find me a guy who accuses women of being superficial, and I will remind him how he rushed to upgrade his I-phone for no good reason whatsoever.

5. "Normal is Boring"

No, it's not. What makes someone or something boring is not that it's normal or that it's not shocking, but that it does not stimulate or provoke any thoughts or ideas. It is boring because it is simply not interesting. On the other hand, there are plenty of people out there who lead a "normal" lifestyle, who don't try to stand out by dressing up like clowns, or covering their body with tattoos and piercings, and yet they are fascinating on so many levels. You don't have to look like Nicky Minaj or Lil Wayne to be an interesting person. You don't have to become vegan or join some weird club or a clan to be exceptional. And you don't have to run away from your parents' home to assert your one-of-a-kind individuality. You can look and act normal, just like Bill Gates, Warren Buffet, Roger Federer and Barack Obama, to name a few, and be anything but boring.

Archer: On The Importance Of Mothering

October 20, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Archer is a TV show that has aired on the FX Network for the past few years. The show neatly represents America's narcissistic sexual hierarchy and the importance of mothering in raising boys into healthy men.

Overview Of The Show

Archer is about a spy agency, ISIS, and its general incompetency. The agency is headed by eponymous character Archer's mother, Malory. Archer is an international spy who works with his ex-girlfriend Lana Kane. The accountant for the agency is Cyril Figgis. The show is fairly surreal in the sense that there is a mixing of time periods. The show looks like a 60's spy cartoon, but the references in the show are contemporary. The style of dress is of the Sixties, and the history of the characters suggests that the show is in the 60's. However, they use modern technology like GPS. Consider the relevant four characters:

.[image]

Sterling Malory Archer: Also known as "Duchess." A classic narcissistic alpha. He is an international spy who is handsome, jacked and always suited down. He is proficient at driving, martial arts and weaponry. However, his primary concern is drinking and playing the field. He has serious anti-social and narcissistic issues. His ex-girlfriend is fellow spy Lana Kane who is deeply enamored with him

Malory Archer: Sterling's mother. A cold and self-absorbed woman who is particularly loathsome. She has the ability to turn on the charm and regularly seduces powerful men. She was a terrible mother who treated Archer poorly. As with any psychologically draining relationship, Malory & Archer need each other to bolster their self-identity.

Lana Kane: A tall, gorgeous dark-skinned woman. She is very competent and often bails Archer out. She is in love with Archer, but his instability precludes a relationship. She is often mad because she plays second fiddle to Archer because Archer is Malory's son.

Cyril Figgis: Comptroller for ISIS. He is competent at his job, but is a hopeless beta. He is insecure and often tongue-tied. He is the victim of office politics because he does not understand how to manipulate power. He dated Lana in Season 1, but, of course, that relationship did not last. Lana never said she loved him and often balked at public recognition of their relationship.

The Sexual Hierarchy In The Show

[image]

Consider my sexual hierarchy post. In the show, we see it embodied with Archer, Lana and Cyril.

Archer is an alpha, with his pick of the women. Every female wants Archer's dick. Given his personality, he exploits this with ruthless abandon. Cyril resents him, as Archer treats him as an inferior and doesn't take him seriously.

Lana is a typical woman trapped between an alpha and a beta. She, of course, burns with desire for Archer, but she can only lock Cyril down. She dated Cyril so she could treat him like Archer treated her. However, when women in are control they are never satisfied with the relationship. Her treatment of Cyril mirrors the indifferent, sometimes cruel, way Archer would treat Lana. When she found out Cyril was cheating, it was the end of the relationship. Women will only stick around here only if they are in complete control of the beta. With him cheating, it set her off because it showed she couldn't even completely control a weak beta.

Notice how narcissistic Archer is and how Lana, despite their fighting, will submit to his frame. She is a classic codependent with Archer, but becomes a compensatory narcissist with Cyril.

Malory And Archer: The Wages Of A Self-Absorbed Mother

Archer & Malory have a sick relationship. She is a classic, cold self-absorbed woman. She left Archer in his most tender years to be raised by her butler, Woodhouse. She would show up intermittently, bearing gifts only to mock Archer while she was drunk. She clearly clearly sees Archer as little more than an object in the game of her life.

Archer, for himself, developed serious anti-social and narcissistic tendencies as a result. His drinking, his rebelliousness and his rakishness all suggest of strong dose of anti-social personality disorder. He is clearly self-absorbed, displaying a level of self-interest that he inherited psychologically from his mother. His inability to emotionally connect with anyone, his cruel treatment of perceived inferiors and his obsession with the superficial all suggest he is a clinical narcissist.

Archer highlights is how important healthy mothering is for children, most especially, for boys. There is much chatter about the importance of fatherhood in these corners of the web, but the importance of mothering isn't discussed as often as it should. While every child may not have a father in their life, they most certainly will have a mother. In the absence of a father, healthy mothering is absolutely crucial.

However, what becomes of men with poor or terrible mothering is either becoming a simp like Cyril or an alpha like Archer.

Consider the beta first. Cyril embodies the beta beset by bad mothering. He has little ability to stand up to women and tends to either treat them like absolute dirt or deify them – that is most likely how Cyril treated his mother. He would treat her like a goddess while harboring nasty, violent thoughts about acting out against her. We see Cyril occasionally treating women like shit, only to back off if they push back. That's how he treats his mother, as he would push back on his mother a bit, only to hastily retreat and resume worshiping her.

With Lana, we see a sexually frustrated man blinded by his codependent approach to women by worshiping or devaluing them. He tries to please Lana, only to find that kissing up to her only causes her to ratchet up her demands or disapproval. Frustrated, he pretends to want to change and improve with women, but he knows no other way of dealing with women.

Remember that these sorts of behavioral approaches are formed from infancy. The infantile rage is just that – a deep-seated rage from a mother's neglect. Defenses have to be erected against this rage, so a baby can either choose one of two forms of narcissism: codependency or outright clinical narcissism. The former is the choice made by Cyril, the latter is the choice made by Archer.

Becoming a narcissist in the mold of your mother is easy; merely copy and mimic the all-important maternal figure. Children all adopt behaviors of those around them, trying them on to settle on a stable identity. This natural behavior is disrupted by the personality disorders of the parent. The most disruptive of these is narcissism. From an early age Archer mimicked the behavior of his mother, quickly using it is a defense mechanism against the existential disappointment of a childhood denied. Archer found out that by simply denying emotions as they arose was the best way to paper over his natural, biological emotional needs going unfulfilled.

As he aged, he found drugs, sex and rock and roll. The rush of sex, drunkenness and fast cars provided him with a way to feel something, anything. The dreadfully bland world of self-absorption is terribly psychologically draining and, often, boring. Abusing alcohol and sex is an avenue that allows Archer to experience the world of feelings. His anti-social impulses are yet another defense mechanism against change.

Both approaches taken by Archer and Cyril are inappropriate and unhealthy. Now, there is nothing wrong with enjoying alcohol, sleeping with many women or investing emotionally in a woman. As always, it is always why you are engaging in said behavior. While there certainly are institutions in society that hurt men psychologically – such as the public school system and the wider media that favors women over men – flawed mothering have marred both men's lives. Society needs healthy mothers to raise healthy men. First, healthy mothering can greatly ward off needy behavior in men when it liberates them from the need to seek female approval in the realm of romance.

A common cause of needy behavior is men who were taught, as boys, to seek to female approval. If the mother doesn't expect it from her son, then it minimizes beta behavior. Second, a healthy mother ensures her sons have a sympathetic ear to turn to during their vulnerable years of adolescence. Not having to rely on romantic partners for emotional support helps a young man. Many betas are born in high school when they have little guidance in the hormone-fueled rush of the teenage years. Quality mothering can help teach these men self-respect and appropriate boundaries in a relationship.

Poor mothering causes so many problems in society. Sure, she isn't going to be able, generally, to teach a young man about how to deal with women sexually, or teach him masculine things like shaving or changing the oil in a car or even lend an ear in the way only another man can. However, she can contribute great value to a man's life.

Archer shows a man who was a product of a completely self-absorbed woman who, in turn, creates another completely self-absorbed man in Archer. Neither person is truly a happy person and neither will ever experience real, true humans emotions like love, compassion or sympathy. Cyril represents the approach to narcissism known as codependency – he feels emotions insofar as it allows him to play the roles narcissists need him to. None of these approaches are healthy and all are a result of poor parenting. The deficient approaches to dealing with women displayed by both Archer and Cyril are a direct result of poor mothering and how society approaches the issues between the sexes.

You Are The Most Important

October 20, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

It’s easy to get distracted. Back in college I would peruse Facebook. Watch the news. Play video games. Talk shit with my roommates.

I would do anything to distract myself. From what you ask. From myself.

Was I uncomfortable in my own flesh? Maybe. Was it the path of least resistance? Quite possibly. At times I still fall into the above pattern. And so I write this article as a reminder to myself.

Do You Avoid Yourself?

With the rise of smartphones and social media, we are becoming more and more detached from our own bodies. Constantly plugged in and over-stimulated, we find less and less satisfaction from reading a book, or from spending time alone in silence.

And when you do find yourself with a free hour or two – what do you do? Open your smartphone? Turn on the TV? It has become all too common to seek these forms of… entertainment if you will. Distractions, really.

When I fight the urge for instant stimulation and instead take a deep breath and slow down – I always feel more energy, more alive.

Focusing On Yourself ≠ Attention Whoring

Bitch to your friend about your day at work. Send a tweet about the meal you just ate at. Post a new picture on Facebook.

No these things don't count. They are the opposite of the kind of focus I am trying to communicate. Seeking approval and bragging are not equivalent to focusing on yourself. They indirectly focus on others and their thoughts and emotions. Furthermore they are beta behaviors that signal weakness.

3 Ways To Focus On Yourself

1. Meditate – Being alone with your thoughts is so unnatural to some people that they immediately flee and seek outside stimulation. Sit for some time alone and feel your breath. Become comfortable being alone – doing nothing, thinking nothing.

2. Read – Nothing stimulates my imagination like reading a book. Rather than watching images or videos rapidly progress with no time for thought, books encourage contemplation and calmness.

3. Exercise – Exercise is a fundamental way to allow your body to express itself and release pent up energy. Whether you chose to dance, lift weights, or play a sport – vigorously using your body turns off the mind and allows your body to flow.

Focusing on your feelings, emotions, and energy seems like a burden at times. But doing so will only lead to stronger and more satisfying experiences.

Return Of Kings Is One Year Old

October 21, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I launched ROK on October 16, 2012 because there was no general interest blog for masculine men that I liked. Since I'm not dependent on corporate income, I knew I could leverage my unique immunity to create a site that could weather inevitable attacks from easily-offended Westerners. Since launching, we have survived puny waves from those who think their angry tweets and "you have a small dick" comments will stop us. They feed us instead.

Here are traffic stats for our first month in operation:

- 20,007 unique visitors
- 141,220 page views

Here are traffic stats for September:

- 541,807 unique visitors
- 1,752,721 page views

There is demand for the content we publish, and since the mainstream media is not providing it, we will continue to grow. I have implemented many behind-the-scenes innovations that ensure ROK can run independently of my involvement.

I will make no bold proclamations for the next year; we will just keep doing what we're doing. If you feel the urge to complain about our efforts, you are free to make the site better by contributing a guest post. Ask not what ROK can do for you, but what you can do for ROK.

Why Man Needs His Myths

October 21, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Man cannot live by bread and woman alone. He also needs a myth to sustain him, to console him in his bereavements, to provide a code to anchor his life, and to impart a sense of meaning to this brief mortal existence. Snatch away his mythos, rob him of his ideal, and you banish his spirit to a rudderless drifting in life's expansive ocean. It is a cruel fate, and one that is far too common.

But for some men, the myth is strong. And it is the last thing to die.

Take, for example, the case of Sir Thomas Malory. He was a English knight who fought in the Hundred Years War, and in 1445 even briefly served in Parliament. He was living at a time in which the medieval notion of chivalry—the age of the knight—was on the wane. Malory had built up his identity around the idea of knighthood, chivalry, and the centuries-old moral code that went along with it. He was bound up with this mythos, and it animated his soul. But returning home to England after his campaigns in France, he found peacetime society unbearable. Here was nothing in his previous experience that he could call his own. And he found his martial skills of no value in the humdrum drudgery of the English society from which he was alientated.

He couldn't bear it. He writhed and rolled in his peacetime agonies. His way of life was doomed, and he knew it.

At this point, he made a startling reversal. Turning his back on is previous life, he plunged into crime. He broke into the home of a man named Hugh Smyth and raped his wife; he extorted a sum of money from another couple; he raped Smyth's wife a second time. He committed a long series of thefts, robberies and burglaries, even from a Cistercian Abbey. His crime spree came to an end when he was caught and thrown into prison.

While languishing in the fetid darkness of confinement, Malory managed to write one of the most elegant and transcendent works of early English prose: The Noble Histories of King Arthur and of Certain of His Knights. Time has shortened the name of his book to Le Morte d'Arthur.

Malory implores his countrymen and fellow knights to return to the ideals of King Arthur and his 150 "Knights of the Round Table;" here are found the tragic and timeless stories of Tristram, Lancelot, Guinevere, and many others. He requires of a knight > never to do outrage nor murder…by no means to be cruel, but to give mercy unto him that asketh mercy…and always to do…gentlewomen succor, upon pain of death.

Considering the source, the irony is so thick that one could hardly cut it with Excalibur. In Le Morte d'Arthur, no one ever gets his boots muddy, the skies are always brilliant and clear in Arthur's ethereal realm, and love and war are wondrously pedestalized. It is about as mythic and idealistic as a writer ever managed.

Because it had to be. Because Malory knew that he, and his myth, were doomed. How can we reconcile the sublime, airy beauty of Malory's book, with its noble language and moral code, with the base reality of his crimes? How could such a man write such a book?

Because man is a complicated being. That's why. Complicated, with many faces. He can possess the heart of a monster, and the tenderness of a saint, in equal measure. And somehow, each of these voices needs to speak. Don't take away my cherished myths, O World! Don't deprive me of my consolation.

But he knew his time was running out, and he died in prison in 1471. The colophon of his book is a poignant cri de coeur:

> I pray you all gentlemen and gentlewomen that readeth this book of Arthur and his knights, from the beginning to the ending, pray for me while I am alive, that God send me good deliverance and when I am dead, I pray you all pray for my soul. For this book was ended the ninth year of the reign of King Edward the Fourth by Sir Thomas Maleore, knight, as Jesu help him for his great might, as he is the servant of Jesu both day and night.

Several years ago I visited the Tower of London. There is a part of the fortress where visitors can look at the wretched cells where prisoners were housed. I remember seeing an attendant on duty there, a pale, grey-haired man sitting at a desk, fidgeting obsessively with a gold cigarette lighter. The other tourists had left the room, and he was looking out the window. I decided to give him something to do, and began to make idle conversation.

"Some of the carvings on the cell walls" I said, "are amazing. It's hard to believe they were allowed to make graffiti like that."

He eyed me furtively, taking in my American accent.

"Well, now," he began, clearing his throat and shifting himself slightly in his chair, "you have to remember that these inmates were rich people, noblemen and such. They had their knives, tools, and the like. They had their ways. Wasn't much security in those days, you know." Accustomed to tourist ignorance, he had the impatient demeanor of a man who had answered the same questions a thousand times.

“Yes.” I nodded in agreement, anticipating a yarn.

“Here, let me show you something.” He stood up and walked over to one of the cells and pointed to an amazingly detailed carving in the wall, made by a prisoner centuries before. It was carefully covered with a clear plastic shield to protect it from the curious fingers of tourists. It looked like a coat of arms, or some family or clan monogram. Other cells had similar little carvings, some of very high quality, and all covered with clear little plastic squares. They were all obviously of great significance to their makers.

I tried to imagine the effort the condemned man must have exerted to produce this little piece of gallows artwork. I tried to imagine the sustained willpower that would have been needed. To carry it off would have required the soul of a true believer. It may have been the last thing he ever did. His family coat of arms, his lineage, his house, his earthly identity: scratched out in stone for eternity. There it was. His last and final act. It was moving in its own silent way.

“I can imagine the effort it must have taken,” I said blankly, not knowing what else to say.

“Of course. But it was his identity. That meant something in those days. Much more so than now. We all need something to keep us going, you know.” Then he shrugged his sunken shoulders and walked away.

And I thought to myself, the myth truly is the last thing to die. When that goes, so goes the man.

3 Reasons Why Drake Gets So Much Hate

October 21, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Aubrey Drake Graham is a popular and polarizing figure. Even though I don't actually dislike much of his music, I recognize the flaws inherent to Drake the artist. To this end, I'm not surprised at the sheer amount of hate he attracts.

What particularly is it about Drake that attracts so much vitriol? There are a few things…

1. He Had It Easier Than He Lets On

Drake was well-off but occasionally tries to front as though he came up rough to fit in with the "street hip-hop" persona. Drake grew up in a nice part of Toronto with the Jewish side of his family and wanted for little, so this gets to people. We all know Drake never started from anything close to a legitimate "bottom," and thus we get a little annoyed when he claims to have done so:

2. He's Not As Hard As He Says He Is

Just as he has shown a tendency to try and claim he came up rougher than he has, Drake is also known to claim more toughness than we know he really possesses. He will occasionally speak in a manner designed to associate him with aggressive/violent behavior even though we know he's got nothing to do with any of that and never has had anything to do with that in his life (which, again, was spent primarily in well-to-do Toronto suburbs). A prime example of this was seen in a particular verse of his hit single "Headlines":

> Tuck my napkin in my shirt, cause I'm just mobbin like that
> You know good and well that you don't want a problem like that > You gone make someone around me catch a body like that
> No, don't do it, please don't do it
> Cause one of us goes in, then we all go through it

In this verse Drake claims to be somewhat of a mobster while also threatening violence, implying that folks should want few problems with him because if they have them "someone will catch a body." We all know Drake is not a mobster/gang kingpin capable of calling in murders. Then he talks about dealing with friends going to prison, another problem Drake is unlikely to have ever dealt with.

I liked Headlines quite a bit, but I see where people are coming from with this critique. It doesn't seem genuine.

3. He Says Some Really Bitchmade Shit From Time To Time

Drake has dropped some very feminine lyrics from time to time. A prime example of this is heard in "No New Friends":

The whole idea of the song is that Drake has his friends and doesn't want to meet anyone new. This is reminiscent of the kind of thing a bunch of cliquey 6th grade girls might run around saying to their classmates in order to isolate girls they don't like and/or make themselves feel more important than they are. Most men are open to meeting cool new people. Girls are the ones who tend to be associated with the kind of bitchy/cliquey behavior exhibited in the lyrics of "No New Friends".

Again, I don't think the song is that bad on the whole, but I concede that it had a feminine cliquish energy to it and understand the critiques. Charlagmagne the God sums up the issue very well in this video:

In summary, as I've been saying, I don't dislike Drake. He makes a lot of good music, much of which has resonated with me on a personal level. Of course, I have noticed that my favorite songs of his (ex: Fear, Dreams Money Can Buy, Look What You've Done) aren't his most popular, and that isn't a coincidence. When it comes to his mainstream stuff, the immortal Big Ghost's critique is just about on point:

> Is Drizzy a salty cornball who can't get a grip on his emotions n has a hard time lettin go of exes, coulda-beens and deceased female music artists he ain't never even met and spends too much time reflectin on the hardships of his upper middle class childhood and tryin to lyrically ether anybody who ever knocked his juicebox over in the school lunchroom or broke his crayons? YES.

In his most popular songs, Drake plays to an image that sells and he's very good at it. He plays like a tough guy by throwing out a few aggressive lines about "catching bodies" and all that (to appeal to the legions of wannabe suburban thugs out there with money to burn) and ups the softness/bitchmade talk a notch or two (to appeal to young western females, the world's most powerful block of consumers). This earns him some enemies, but it earns him even more money.

I don't like the game, but I respect a good player when I see one. Drake is a good player. That being said, the fact that engagement in this aforementioned game is so richly rewarded in our society today is an issue in and of itself. It tells us that ours is a society that prioritizes and rewards the feminization of men (as illustrated by the overly-emotional/cliquish behavior of Drake above and the increasing feminization of hip-hop in general) while also promoting inauthentic behavior.

Eric Check / BuzzFeed

On the other hand, the heavy backlash that Drake receives for his effeminate celebrity persona is almost heartening in a way. It shows that, despite the fact that our society has been hell-bent on shaming/eliminating masculinity and promoting fakeness, people are able to see through the acts. A very large number of men, despite the abundance of programming to the contrary, still reject the feminized, anti-masculine examples put before them and call out inauthentic behavior when they see it. In short, despite the best efforts of many powerful interests, a lot of men are still (for the most part) men. They resent the adoption of feminized behavior patterns by other men and don't co-sign fakeness very quickly.

Say Hello To The New Definition Of Rape

October 22, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In the past, rape used to be an ultra-violent entry of a vagina, usually involving a stranger who stalked a woman in public and then dragged her into an alley. While this type of rape 1.0 still occurs, a new type of rape is sweeping the nation: rape 2.0. This “rape” is where the woman felt regret, guilt, anger, or embarrassment after having consensual sex with a man she had attraction for. Today, any woman can put a man’s life in jeopardy by crying rape simply because she felt like a slut. This is exactly what recently happened at Ohio University.

There, a woman allowed a man to eat her vagina in public. Many photos were taken, including this one:

There is also a video showing the man giving her sexual pleasure. She liked it enough to grab his head to direct the action:

What did the girl do once she realized photos of her slutty behavior made their way online? She went to the police and said she was raped:

> A university student photographed while appearing to be engaging in a public sex act near Ohio University's Athens campus tells police she was being raped as fellow students watched and uploaded pictures.

A meme was made to commemorate her brutal rape:

THIS IS, LIKE, SO TRAUMATIZING

TONIGHT I WILL CUM
TOMORROW HE WILL GO TO JAIL LOL

IF THE FIST DOES NOT FIT
YOU MUST ACQUIT

TAKING THE TIME TO GET HER PUSSY WET ALWAYS PRACTICE PROPER RAPE ETIQUETTE

And on a more serious footing…

Thanks to photographic evidence, it doesn't appear that the carpet muncher is going to jail, but that hasn't stopped Ohio feminist Allie Erwin from saying that, photos or not, a rape still occurred (2:23). Without considering the evidence, she is ready to lock the man up for several years, going along with feminist doctrine to always presume male guilt. Not only does the man deserve to go to jail, but Allie won't be your friend if you don't actively tweet about the horrors of rape culture:

> If you don't follow and tweet @oufckrapecultur on a regular basis from this moment forward, I am pretty sure we aren't friends
> — Allie Erwin (@allienerwin) September 23, 2013

There may also be foul play from the Ohio University's Dean of Students, Jenny Hall-Jones, to hide the identify of the lying accuser. Expectantly, she has feminist sympathies, having previously whined about the sexism boogeyman. We have a feminist activist delivering a guilty plea on television and a feminist Dean who is shielding a false rape accuser who clearly broke the law in filing a false police report. Ohio University is making it very clear that you will not be punished if you wrongly charge a man with a crime that can send him to jail for over 10 years. Young men may want to pass on attending this school.

For every one of these false accusers that we catch, how many more did we miss? Feminists will continue to say this is a "small" problem, but men know very well that hooking up with the wrong girl can send them a world of trouble. It seems that the feminist goal of making consensual sex considered as rape is well on its way.

Female Bias In STEM: A Bayesian Explanation

The New York Times recently ran a long piece exploring the history of women in STEM fields and attempting to explain the ever-present difference between men and women in performance and participation in these fields. The article begins by citing research on perceptions of female aptitude in math and science:

> "Researchers at Yale published a study proving that physicists, chemists and biologists are likely to view a young male scientist more favorably than a woman with the same qualifications. Presented with identical summaries of the accomplishments of two imaginary applicants, professors at six major research institutions were significantly more willing to offer the man a job. "

She shares an anecdote that is supposed to display the prejudice of professors against females in the field, but instead illustrates one valid reason for the bias displayed by the Yale study:

> "Other women chimed in to say that their teachers were the ones who teased them the most. In one physics class, the teacher announced that the boys would be graded on the "boy curve," while the one girl would be graded on the "girl curve"; when asked why, the teacher explained that he couldn't reasonably expect a girl to compete in physics on equal terms with boys."

Enter Bayes' Theorem

$P(h)$ = prior probability of h
$P(D|h)$ = probability of observing D given that h holds
$P(D)$ = probability of observing D

Bayes's theorem is a foundational principle of statistics and probability that allows us to update our estimations about the trueness of a fact based on new evidence. The math of Bayes' theorem is simple and elegant, and the overarching idea is powerful — we can use evidence in a formalized manner to change the probability that something may be true, and this can often have non-intuitive results.

The classic example of Bayes in action is medical tests — for example, if 1% of women have breast cancer, and a mammogram detects the cancer 80% of the time with a 10% false positive rate, what is the probability that a positive result means the woman has cancer? If a mammogram is positive, the chance of cancer is less than 8% due to the presence of false positives, as well as the low baseline population rate of cancer.

What does this have to do with women and STEM fields? Readers of this site are familiar with the allure that even a plain looking girl can have at the height of her availability and youth. This isn't just a factor when getting free drinks at the bar – it extends to the classroom, hiring for jobs, treatment in everyday life, and many other areas. Girls in primary and secondary school are judged to be better students, despite boys showing a significant advantage in standardized tests starting around middle school. The article highlights the ways that women are supposedly discouraged by the system, but makes no mention of the advantages they enjoy.

Put simply, women are more likely to be handed accomplishments without having to work for them, both due to the power of their sexuality and as unconscious overcorrection for their supposed disadvantages in opportunity. Given an applicant with a certain pedigree – a Ph.D, say, from a top graduate program —we will have a certain estimation of that person's intelligence and aptitude. However, the "false positive" rate on those qualifications identifying extremely high aptitude is likely to be much lower for a man, who has not enjoyed the advantages of a feminized education system, catch-up programs, and the hint of his sexuality influencing the evaluations of his superiors.

The bias against hiring a woman whose qualifications are equal to a man, and their subsequent lower salary offer, is simply a use of Bayesian inference. It accounts for the implicit probability that the female will not be as good as her résumé suggests, to say nothing of the chance that she will leave her job to begin a family and leave her employer empty-handed at some point in the future. If, as the example above states, both men and women implicitly behave as if men are superior in math and science, we must give some consideration that this is a possibility.

If Men Are Better At Math/Science — What's The Big Deal?

The media is encouraged to sing the praises of women where they excel compared to men, and females indeed show demonstrated advantages in many cognitive areas. They are better at language acquisition, picking up on non-verbal cues, and we are all familiar with their evolved capacity for psychological manipulation. Many would suggest that women have better organizational skills. They are incarcerated for violent crimes less often, are less prone to risky behavior, and are more resilient to psychological trauma such as PTSD.

But when it comes to exploring why men have long-demonstrated advantages in certain disciplines, the media scrabbles to ascribe the boogeyman of injustice perpetrated on the protected class. The article is quick to dismiss the repeatable and longitudinal difference between males in females in standardized testing, a long-standing form of evaluation that every college and grad school uses to give out valuable admissions spots. It also does not mention the lack of female representation in technology entrepreneurship, a field that is less dependent on credentials and more on individual drive, creativity, and aptitude.

It could certainly be true that women are discriminated against AND that they are simply less common at the far right of the aptitude bell curve necessary for competitive positions in academia. But I challenge you to find this idea entertained in any mainstream publication despite the mountains of circumstantial evidence. Larry Summers was tarred and feathered for even mentioning research on population dynamics as a potential driver of this difference. The lesson here is that, when you begin an "inquiry" by presupposing the conclusion, you will end up with a politically correct and eminently intellectually dishonest worldview.

A Final Solution For Abortion & Bastardy

Sandra Fluke came to prominence last year, after claiming that the government should pay for her birth control. Suddenly, the pill became one of life's necessities – and the state had to pay for it. Even religious institutions, like the Catholic Georgetown University were expected to pay up for Fluke's "whore pills."

The backlash was swift. Many didn't want to aid and abet whoredom among parasites like Fluke. Others didn't want another entitlement, bought and paid for by the taxpayer. Yet nowadays, bastardy is extremely common. Children are born out of wedlock, and even outside of a serious relationship. Little Johnny may have been conceived in a Vegas stairway.

A child by another man is enough to make a woman un-dateable. Reducing bastardy is in every man's interest, just as a healthier, less fattening food supply would be – it would mean more comely women for the men of the West. Bastardy has also been linked to greater criminality, and a raft of other undesirable outcomes.

If women's sexuality were heavily guarded until marriage, there would be little need for birth control. Nowadays, women marry in their late 20s, more than a decade after puberty. They lead independent lives in a society saturated with sexual imagery and come-ons. Expecting more than a small minority to 'save it for marriage' is utterly demented.

A patriarchal society of early marriage and sexual restraint is not coming back any time soon – birth control is an absolute necessity to keep the bastards at bay. I stand with Sandra Fluke.

The Need For A Better Pill

Except… the pill has been around for decades now, yet bastardy is far higher now than it was before the pill came out. The genie of fornication cannot be put back in the bottle for the rudderless mainstream. But the pill hasn't worked either – it failed to eliminate bastardy. Or abortion for that matter – three in 10 American women will have an abortion at some point.

The pill is powerless where it is needed most; there is the bimbo who is too irresponsible to take a pill daily. Or the woman in the grips of 'mother-lust' mid-coitus, who yearns to have a child and 'forgets' to take it. Or simply the girl who raw-dogs with abandon, without any concern for birth control at all. There is even the man who wants to snare a woman by inseminating her. In short, the pill is not retard-proof. It is a half-assed solution to a serious problem. What's needed is a contraceptive solution that requires no effort from a woman to work effectively.

There are solutions – the intrauterine device (IUD) is one. As soon it's inserted in a woman's vagina, it prevents conception, and it remains effective for up to twelve years. There is practically nothing a woman needs to do to keep it working. I.e., it's idiot-proof. It's the most effective form of reversible birth control, and it also gets the highest rating for user satisfaction. The IUD holds great promise as a weapon against the plague of bastardy.

Effective long term birth control is also available in the form of an implant, which can be effective for several years. Together, these methods rank on a par with sterilization in effectiveness. In a trial run with St. Louis women, the implant and IUDs were twenty times better than the pill.

Except no one wants it. The right is in righteous denial that everyone who's single fornicates, and that that isn't changing. They prefer to thump their bibles in irrelevance, and blame men for knocking innocent little girls up. Feminists say "teach men not to rape." Conservatives say "teach men not to fuck. But women are always innocent." Here we have a tremendous tool to keep women from resorting to abortions, yet the 'pro-lifers' would have nothing to do with it.

Meanwhile, on the left, single mothers are modern-day saints – questioning having children out of marriage is heresy to a progressive. And because bastardy is more prevalent among blacks and Hispanics than among whites, they're deathly afraid of telling minority women off, lest they be accused of racism. They're too happy to collude with the right, and just shame men for those immaculate conceptions of 'helpless' women. And many minority women themselves think contraception is a government conspiracy to keep minority birth rates down.

Additionally, birth control pills have been fingered for polluting water; these pollutants wreak havoc on fish and amphibians, and are very expensive to remove. A switch to a non-hormonal IUD would have a great environmental payoff as well.

A Fish On The Pill

A Role For Government?

How would a policy promoting long term birth control work? The government might cover the cost of the initial insertion, plus a follow-up visit. Single women ages 18-30 would be eligible. Women could have it removed at any time at their own expense, but if they wanted the government to pay for the removal, they would have to prove they were married. The rate of ‘unintended pregnancies’ among users of the pill are too high. Contra Fluke, subsidizing them is simply a bad idea. The IUD and implant, however, are vastly superior in avoiding unintended pregnancies and abortions. The case for government subsidies to cut bastardy and abortion is strong when the solution actually works.

Widespread use of long term birth control would also be an effective stopgap measure until birth control for men comes about. The implant and the IUD are not foolproof, nor are they suitable for every woman. But their mass adoption would constitute a serious, effective response to rampant bastardy and abortion. And when she does up and decide to marry, she will find it far easier without another man’s spawn in tow.

Your dear author would gladly chip in and pay several hundred dollars to strap every strumpet with foolproof contraception – no small thing for a Goldstein. Upon feeling that tell-tale string in a woman’s vagina, a man could smite her unsheathed, content that his rutting would be fruitless. Heaven hath no bliss like raw dogging in serenity. To disagree is to admit to a personal poverty of fornication; for to fornicate is human, but to raw dog is divine.

5 Ways To Land (And Keep) A Quality Boyfriend

October 23, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

It has recently come to my attention that a significant portion of our readership is, in fact, female. It therefore only seems fair—in the spirit of gender equity—to provide our lady readers with some of the same top-shelf self-improvement content we pride ourselves on providing our male readers day in and day out.

I needn't tell you that while women control the gateway to sex—most, if not every, man's true objective—men control the gateway to the increasingly elusive female prize of commitment. In other words, while much of the advice for men here is centered on getting laid, advice for women will necessarily focus on landing and keeping a quality boyfriend—since getting laid for a woman is among the easiest things in human creation.

But this isn't as easy as it sounds. With so many girls giving away the milk, fewer and fewer quality men are choosing to buy the cow. Add to that, a massive crisis in (especially American) women's girl-game—and a precipitous decline in the population of masculine men—and you have a perfect storm of slim pickings for the relationship-worthy girls among us.

How to get a good man and keep him:

1. Look good and work on staying that way.

This may seem obvious, but it's worth repeating that men are visual creatures who value beauty—in various aspects of their lives—above most other things. Being overweight, poorly dressed, or clearly putting little effort into your appearance, while expecting a hunk to sweep you up, is not only ineffective but straight-up delusional. Even if you're naturally cute, you need to keep yourself in shape (ideally by being active), learn to dress your body, and take care of your skin. We men do all of this too.

Whatever you do, don't cut your hair short—it looks terrible, despite what your girlfriends disingenuously say, and 99 percent of men hate it, no matter what they may say. Also, don't mutilate your body with ugly tattoos and piercings, which distract from your natural beauty at best, or make you look like walking case of Hepatitis at worst. When you do land that prize boyfriend, don't take your foot off the gas. Keep showing that you're putting in work into looking your best, and you will keep that man.

2. Be a pleasant, feminine sweetheart.

Being sarcastic, foul-mouthed, confrontational, and difficult just for the sake of being difficult is not funny, and are not attractive qualities, contrary to what the television might be telling you. You'd be shocked how irresistible and addictive simply being nice and pleasant to be around can be to a man. I can't count the number of guys who've shacked up with a girl because—instead of feeling agitated and annoyed around their grating bitch-girlfriends—feel soothed and relaxed whenever they're with them. Even when it comes to breaking up, guys agonize over leaving something so good on the table. They can't pull away. Don't buy into the feminist propaganda that lies to you by saying that being sweet automatically makes you stupid or a push-over. In fact, it's being a willful irritant that makes you stupid and, more importantly, single.

3. Don't be a slut.

Even though that same propaganda is trying to tell you that sex is the same for men and women—and that the number of sexual partners a woman has doesn't matter—this simply isn't true. I'd hate to break it to you, but to an overwhelming majority of quality men, your past does matter, especially if you want him to think of you as relationship material and stick around. That doesn't mean he expects a virgin, or that withholding sex for as long as possible should be your strategy. It simply means that your slutty past—or present—is a liability, whether you broadcast it or not.

Note: Attention-whoring–whether that's dancing on tables in a bar or uploading hundreds of sexy pictures of yourself to Facebook for the ego-boosting admiration of your many male "friends"–is a form of sluttiness.

4. Have some domestic skills.

Nothing discourages a man more than bragging about your non-existent domestic skills. If your mother didn't have the sense to teach you how to prepare a nice meal or iron a blouse, learn. In the age of Youtube, there's no excuse to not know these basic skills. Once in a while, make your man something for no reason, fold a shirt, clean up after yourself. He will notice, and he will be more attracted to you for it.

5. Be interesting.

Cultivate other parts of you above and beyond your looks. An attractive, well-rounded girl has a long waiting list of top-shelf guys hoping to make them a long-term girlfriend. Put down the iPhone and learn an instrument, practice a (real) dance, or master a fine art. Hone your conversation skills. Instead of copy-catting jokes that Liz Lemon said last night, be original, be creative. An interesting girl, with all of the other traits above, starts to look like not just girlfriend-material, but like a wife and mother.

While our (many) detractors enjoy calling us women-hating, proto-rapist manipulators we're, in fact, little more than a group of men committed to, even obsessed with, constant self-improvement. Our successes with women stem from the fruits of that labor.

That success needn't be limited to on-demand sexual conquests for men. Women can have "game" too.

The One Change Facebook Can Make To Create A Better World

October 23, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

This past Saturday I came across a Facebook post I thought deserved some recognition:

> The truth about marriage, American girls, and the need for #FatShamingWeek all in one screenshot. pic.twitter.com/AC0rr1LvvT
> — Law Dogger (@LawDogger) October 19, 2013

After the initial shock and disgust, I spent some time thinking about the underlying reasons yielding such an inane post.

The Problem

Several issues intertwine to produce this one post. First, her fiance tells her — expressly — that the act of excessive caloric intake and deliberate disregard for one's health makes her "beautiful." Next, the fact that she considers expressing her gluttony to the world as something to be proud of is beyond troubling. While these issues can serve as future ROK posts onto themselves, there remains one other issue I'd like to address. And that is the Facebook "like" system.

This was posted at 5 in the afternoon, and within less than a day it had accumulated 20 "likes" from her friends (up from the 18 at the time of screenshot). Of those 20, 17 are females and the remaining 3 are the presumably white knighting males we've all come to know and ~~ridicule~~ love. So this girl not only has direct approval to mimic a piglet from her husband to be, but she logs in and sees that her behavior is condoned twenty times over. In other words our female friend here inhales a bucket of fried fast food and receives nothing but positive reinforcement.

Unfortunately this is not something that is unique in our present time. We've all seen it before. A fat girl posting a picture of herself in a slutty dress, and the "likes" pouring in like offers of coworker betas to take a female colleague to lunch. Or the 35 year old woman posting pictures of her still partying and a deluge of "you go girl" comments flooding her Facebook. It happens on a daily if not hourly basis here in America.

However, there is at least one way to tame this out-of-control beast.

The Solution

I knew this girl many years ago. Before Facebook. She was insanely obsessed with not only her image but also her weight. She always aimed to be absolutely stellar in her looks. Fit, fashionable, feminine. So what happened? Well, many things. First, the deterioration of America in general. Second, she found a man to marry her, so as with most all girls in America, she gave up in life. And so on.

But there remains no doubt in my mind that the Instagram and Facebook culture, as demonstrated directly herein, played an active part of shaping that female hamster. And with such an integral part of shaping a girl's mindset being this medium, how absolutely wonderful would it be if their attempts at validation were met with not only indifference, but direct rejection? It can happen, if only there was a "dislike" button.

Fat girl posts a picture? Dislike. Girl cooing at her date buying her roses on the third date? Dislike. Blah blah blah…blah blah "rape culture!" Blah blah! Dislike. Long political rant from anybody? Dislike. The 154th picture of a gastronomy-based dinner the Asian chick you barely know gushes about? Dislike. You get the point. If this girl logged in the next day and saw 20 "likes" and 30 "dislikes," I guarantee you she would think twice before scarfing down a bucket of KFC during a single sitting. At the very minimum, she would not post about it.

In light of the just-concluded #fatshamingweek, if we just focus solely in the realm of fat girls a huge [pun intended] change could occur. Now she knows that yes we see those rolls you're trying to hide, yes we don't want to see that exposed thunder thigh, and yes we do find you disgusting. Maybe, just maybe that afternoon she will forego that donut with her coffee. Maybe that morning when she logs in and sees 13 "dislikes" instead of 15 "likes" she may just waddle over to the gym. The possibilities are endless.

The Sad Truth

Unfortunately this will never happen. I'm not the first one to come up with this idea. Facebook has already addressed this novel concept and rejected it, as they want to keep Facebook a positive place. While there are some hacks to implement a means of a dislike button, there will never be an official one through the website. And that makes me sad.

The Snitchy Bitch

October 23, 2013 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

The recent takedown of Pax Dickinson and the Adria Richards kerfuffle highlights a new, real, and increasing threat as the latest generation of girls, brainwashed with feminist, leftist, and crusaderist indoctrination, enter the labor force — the snitchy bitch. Thinking they were chartered with some higher calling, these women (and men) go beyond just shutting up and doing their jobs, and carry out a secondary mission by "purging" corporate America and other employers of "evil" and perceived racists, sexists, bigots, homophobes, etc. If going on this ego-power trip wasn't crossing the line, when they delve into people's personal lives and social media accounts solely to find a comment or a post to get them fired, it doesn't just become malicious, but psychotic.

The consequence of legions of snitchy-bitches entering the working world is that they take an already inhospitable environment and make it toxic. It wasn't bad enough with faux sexual harassment suits, forced diversity training, forced sexual harassment training, and HR c*nts making you jump through hoops as they ask for your Facebook password. No, now we need little gestapo agents auditing our conversations and thoughts outside of work. And so, if you thought the cubicle world was intolerable before, just wait as this trend continues.

There are, however, consequences to this. Consequences that are not as dire and severe as you might think and, as a matter of fact, are to the benefit of most men. Most notably, Gresham's Law. Gresham's Law states that bad currency drives out good. You see this today where silver coinage is in existence, but not circulation. Since we introduced the nickel/clad coins circa 1965 people have hoarded the valuable silver coinage while using the worthless coinage for transactions. The same will happen with employees.

Maybe not today, maybe not tomorrow, but over the course of time men (and women) will wake up and realize today's modern work environment is simply not worth it. It is toxic, it is inhumane, it is inhospitable and it is getting worse as snitchy-bitches infect it. These good employees will simply leave corporate environments for greener pastures or (worse for corporate America) go minimalist and just not work at all. They will pay off their debts, cut their budget, and once the mortgage is gone, they're done forever with corporate America. This will leave a labor pool that is increasingly poor, as well as leftist, psychotic, drama-full, incompetent, childish and petty. It will become a nightmare to employ, let alone manage these people, resulting in a downward spiral further driving competent employees away. Consequently, with no good employees left and only whiny leftist girls remaining, profits will suffer (though they will have one mean CSR department and a very small carbon footprint).

While this addresses the costs to companies will pay for hiring leftist ideologues, feminists, and pursuing political instead of financial goals, it does not address what the Pax Dickinsons of the world are to do.

Did not Pax lose his job?

Did not those two IT geeks lose theirs?

Shouldn't we all be afraid of losing our jobs if we dare speak our minds on the internet and be politically vocal?

To that I say, "What jobs?" and "Good riddance."

The true benefit to all of this isn't to see corporate America and employers delve into a stew of simpering, incompetent, HR ditzes, feminists, beta-wage slaves, cannibalizing itself, collapsing inward like a black hole. It's that the working world has become so politicized and so hostile to males that it is no longer a viable option. It has made your choice simpler by removing itself from the table of options. And thank God for that.

Did any of you like working in corporate America? Did any of you like being cubicle slaves? Did any of you have a shot at rewarding work with adequate pay? While some of you may be lucky enough to answer "yes," the vast majority of people have to answer "no."

And this is the key to understanding why the invasion of young, bitchy, power-tripping feminists into the work force and thus the destruction of your current and future career is a good thing:

It was never going to happen anyway. It was never meant to be.

Understand that there never was going to be a career for you. You were never going to get that promotion. You were never going to make it to executive management. Not because of a lack of trying or skill on your part, but because the FACT is employment has deteriorated to the point where it is no longer a viable vehicle for success for most men.

In other words, the "USS Company Man" is a sinking ship, full of narcissists, sociopaths, feminists, sadists and other psychos. Them pushing you off of it and firing you is a favor because it frees you to find your true calling and an environment you can excel in. What that is, is ultimately up to you and will require some wandering in the desert. But while you're piecing it together, maybe not buying that brand new car or affording sushi every night, you certainly won't be like your feminist, snitchy-bitch counterparts buying into propagandist bubbles like

- Worthless degrees
- Crippling debt for advanced worthless degrees
- Never having kids
- Never getting married
- Slaving away at a "corporate career"
- Ruining their lives in the process.

You'll be out there writing a book, fishing, working less, paying less in taxes, living a better life and enjoying the decline instead.

(If interested my most recent podcast delves into the issue of work, career, employment and the future of men in more detail than above. It may provide additional guidance or at least some insight for young men trying to navigate today's economy and working world. That segment starts around the 50 minute mark, though you may enjoy the whole podcast.)

How To Escalate With Women: Part 2

---

I hope your week is rocking and you're implementing the advice I've doled out in the previous articles. Feel free to email me questions and I'll answer them: ChristianMcQueen@yahoo.com.

When we left off, you were on a date with Starbuck's Chick and she had just lightly punched you on the arm. Now this is a defining moment: you can pull back or escalate.

While I'm a proponent of Push-Pull, now is the time to Escalate. She called you a bad boy and punched your arm. Agree and Amplify the hell outa that.

You: You have no idea

Her: Oooooh…tell me more!

You: Punch me again and see what happens (half-smile)

Her: Fine. (lightly punches you again in the arm)

You: (pulling her in close to you as though you're going to kiss her) Do that one more time. I dare you.

Her: (she knows where this is going but understand, girls ENJOY the process) Okayyy (lightly punches you again)

You: (pull her in and kiss her firmly on the mouth)

Let me clarify, it is NOT always the case that a girl will punch you 3 times in the arm before you kiss her or escalate, however, I'm showing you an example of how an interaction can go. It's very common for a girl who has some interest in you to get 'rough' with you, in order to give you an opportunity to ‘overpower’ her and assert your dominance. Remember, this is the chick who was reading 50 Shades of Grey.

When you pull back from the kiss, wink at her and order another drink. You’ve now escalated the date in a positive direction and now it’s about keeping the momentum going.

Remember, the entire time on your date, you want to be having fun and guiding the date towards a one night stand. Leave the serious talk, especially politics, religion and fiances for another day, or perhaps never.

In the previous example I used, the Starbucks Slut already had a high level of interest in you, but let’s say that she is going to take more ‘work’ to warm up to you on the date. Now this is key, it’s never about investing more of yourself into the date, in order to get her affection and attention; it’s about you presenting her with opportunities to QUALIFY herself to you.

Flip the table: generally girls and society paints the date as the guy’s responsibility, in that he has to impress the girl and then maybe, just maybe, it’ll be good enough for the girl. Hell no. That’s why I suggest going for drinks to a bar. It’s low cost to you, it’s low key and if after a few drinks she’s not into you, then my friend, she will never be. Alcohol is a truth teller and the social lubricant of our society. A girl’s tongue will loosen with each sip of her sugary-alcoholic drink. That’s a good thing.

[image]

Here’s an example of her not being as warm to you and how you would combat that.

You: Yea I drank alot in college, good times.

Her: That’s not good. My ex used to drink alot. I hated that.

You: Drinking is good for you. (sardonic smile) Perhaps he just couldn’t handle you…

Note: You have never met her ex and you have no idea if the was the baddest player in the world, or a total loser, but the angle you’re playing is planting the seed of doubt in her mind. Girls are very intuitive and by dropping a response like this she will think one or more of the following, which will help get her in the ONS mindset even more:

(Thoughts to herself)

-Yea, he never really fucked me that good, in fact I rarely came.

-This guy is perceptive, how could he tell?

Her: Hmmm maybe. Tell me more…

(she leans in and sizes you up again)

This is where you want her: curious, physically leaning in with open body language and wanting your opinion.

You: I can tell when a girl is pent up. You have that tension in your shoulders.

Her: Whaaat?! What do you mean?

You: Here (lightly touching her shoulder by her collarbone. This is an erogenous zone on a woman, plus it’s initiating touch and warming her up)

Her: Hmmm yea you might be right (small smile)

You: Of course I’m right (wink)

Then order shots for the two of you.

Next week we get into the really fun part of this series: Closing 1. In the meantime check out http://www.ChristianMcQueen.com

Why You Should Beat Your Kids

October 23, 2013 | by Rebel Yell | Link | Original Link

I am not a fan of child abuse. No, really, I am not. But that doesn't mean I don't think you shouldn't beat your kids from time to time. Beating builds character, and in my estimation, is the solution for today's flabby, emasculated, and gynocentric culture.

A good beating will remind a child that they are not in charge and will always face stronger willed and more powerful opponents. If you don't beat your kids your son will end up banging some dude and your daughter will become an anarcha-feminist with an unshorn vag.

Western kids in general and Americans in particular are coddled, forced to hug each other and sing "Kumbaya" while being given trophies for their mediocrity. Fat girls are praised for not giving into the pressures of the male dominated oligarchy forcing them to be skinny and feminine. Effeminate boys are now celebrated and held to be a new class of human being: Homo Novus or the New Homo (no pun intended).

What today's kids need is a good slap across the mouth from time to time. They should be beat constantly until they realize that they can't get away and have to fight back to survive. Beat until they lose their narcissistic attitude and accept that weakness is never an option. Beat until she loses weight and he stops playing with Barbie dolls. Beat until they realize that their opinions don't matter. Only corporal punishment directed at their lamentable selves will cure this degenerative malaise corrupting society.

If you're kid doesn't look like this when you come home you're a bad parent.

I know my views are antiquated, perhaps novel, but I am an antique in an ever-feminized world. I am a man with two testicles and a big dick between my legs. I fuck women. Lots of women. I train in combat sports. I own guns, lots of them, and kill little furry animals with them, which I then eat. You may ask: where did you learn these ancient techniques? Did you find a lost scroll from a lost reliquary or learn these secrets in a hidden lamasery in the Tian Shan? Nay, my brothers. I learned how to be a man from my dad who kicked my ass from time to time, who had his ass kicked by his dad, and so on from time immemorial. I will kick my sons asses so they don't become pussies like most of the other degenerates inhabiting our planet.

My grandfather was born in the first decade of the twentieth century, at the tail end of the Old West. He knew his grandfather who fought in the War Between the States. My granddad was 20 years old when the Great Depression hit Wall Street. During this period he and his younger brother traveled to New Orleans to make money to survive. You know how they fed themselves? By knife-fighting. They'd take bets on who'd get first blood, and take a cut of the winnings.

When I was a kid I would go with my dad to take my grandfather to visit his brother and sister-in-law. We would drop him off at their house for week at a time. My great-uncle was a hard ass like his brother. He would proudly show off a old shot gun bast wound to his side gained while trying to stop a man from abusing his wife. The man visited my uncle in the hospital after the altercation and said, "I had to shoot you because you'd have killed me." My great-uncle replied, "Yeah, you're right. I would have."

The only issue with my grandfather's trip to see his brother was that he never ended up staying for the full week because the two nonagenarians would eventually have a disagreement and take it into the front yard where they'd spar. My dad would get a frantic call from my great aunt who'd insist that we'd pick up my granddad before they broke a hip.

My granddad was a hard ass and like any hard ass motherfucker he beat his son when he acted up. He didn't give me much advice, but at the age of 95 (a week or two before he died) he suggested that I always keep a knife in my front pocket. He suggested that I keep the type where you "push the button and the blade pops out" and followed his advice with a story of shanking a would-be attacker. I followed his advice and keep a blade in my pocket to this day.

I was taught by my father and grandfather to not be a pussy. If someone "bullied" me I was told to beat his ass, and I did. If I came home from school crying, I'd be made fun of. If I acted up, I was beat. Plain and simple. Negligent parents tell their children they're winners and special. Good parents beat their kids into accepting the natural social hierarchy between parent and child.

Do us all a favor: beat your kids from time to time. If this simple rule was followed Miley Cyrus would shut the fuck up because Billy Ray laid a black eye on his slut daughter, Perez Hilton would be shamed to suicide, and Lindy West would die an ignoble death somewhere in the hinterlands of Hell. After all, Satan is male, right?

Cultural Marxism Produces Matriarchy

October 24, 2013 | by Masculate | Link | Original Link

The perverse obsession with equality in the West is the attempt to temper the excesses of individualism by engineering a matriarchal mold of society. On RoK we often rail against the brutalised, narcissistic woman that this ideology is producing. Like the vulgar displays of wealth from the nouveau riche, newly-bestowed social entitlement has predisposed many women to flaunt their recent gains. It is difficult to blame them for doing this. Which is why, if the war is to be won, it is important to recognise that the battle of the sexes is now a battle of disparate political ideologies.

In the Marxist doctrine of equality, the logical endpoint is a matriarchy. If you observe some of the common features of female-dominated societies, social organisation is remarkably similar to Marx's idea of a Socialist utopia, where shared property and loose family ties are a pre-requisite for greater communal participation. The next time a feminist sounds off about the patriarchy while expounding the virtues of her own entirely altruistic egalitarian philosophy, politely remind her that the Hopi Indians and the Mosuo of China are exemplars of her worldview in action; both are matriarchies.

However, there is an elephant in the room. Eastern Europe has remained an outpost for masculinity in exile despite its being in thrall to Marxist principles for over fifty years. And why, in capitalist democracies, has the creeping rot of feminism and equality produced an enfeebled male population but an empowered female one? The answer, I believe, lies in the fact that whereas political Marxism in the Eastern satellites remained largely economic, in the West it has been manipulated primarily for social upheaval.

Marxism enacted economically worked to keep its population financially impoverished; enacted socially it has levelled out the difference between the sexes. The West has not yet capitulated to economic Marxism; when it does, it would be unsurprising if more traditional male-female roles were naturally reinstituted. In the absence of state social interference, there would be no affirmative action as a leg up. Each would be obliged to prove their worth in among the best of men.

Elephantiasis sufferer punished by frustrated women

Perhaps it is because Capitalism doesn't ostensibly seek to regulate the social lives of its populace that a rogue ideology has filled the vacuum. At any rate, Marxism and the idea of female oppression go hand in hand, which is why for feminists it is an expedient and pseudo-credible ideology as an opportunistic means to further their lot while placing the blame squarely on a perceived oppressor: man.

Natural matriarchies such as the Mosuo prosper because men are inured to their servitude. In a socially-engineered matriarchy, which pockets of the West are well on their way to becoming, the organ of the state must increasingly regulate its citizens' thoughts and speech for the ideology to prosper. Thus sexism and racism being the bête noire of modern Western discourse; any opinion which deviates from the egalitarian agenda endangers the precarious edifice of Marxism in action.

Since the cultural revolution of the 1960s Marxism and Feminism have joined forces to permeate every strata of society. That the former can still be taken seriously in light of the destruction each manifestation of its ideology has wrought is testament to the criminal naivety of mankind and remains the most damning modern indictment of our inability to learn the lessons of history. It may now be too late to stem the seeping wound that Western civilisation has inflicted upon itself. But if a last-ditch attempt is to be made, the jugular must be aimed for. Play them at their own game. Bypass the feminists and attack the root of the problem; push to criminalise Marxism in the same vein that fascism has been outlawed. If this is achieved, both insidious ideologies will be swept away in the carnage for good.

Biology Says People On Welfare Should Die

October 24, 2013 | by Trouble.Maker | Link | Original Link

TroubleMaker: Hi Charles, thanks for taking the time to sit down with us today for this interview at Return Of Kings. Please, tell us a bit about yourself and why you've agreed to this interview.

Charles Darwin: I am the naturalist behind the ideas of evolution and natural selection, the culmination of my life's work. When I published my work, I faced criticism from large groups such as the church refusing to accept my theories. Over time, the Darwinism movement gained steam and natural selection is now considered by many to be an acceptable explanation for evolution. I feel you gentlemen are fighting a similar battle here at ROK; you are a small minority going up against giants in feminism and the mainstream media, both of which have more power and resources that you.

TM: Let's dive right in. We're going to discuss how the government in the United States has essentially negated the actual process of natural selection. To start, natural selection, in short, is the process of nature in which only the best organisms survive to reproduce and pass on their genetic line. Your theory of evolution can be summed up well in four points:

1. Variation exists amongst the individual organisms of a species
2. Organisms reproduce more than the environment can handle
3. There is competition amongst individuals in a species
4. Finally, the best organisms will live to survive and reproduce. The weak die.

Can you tell us how the first point relates amongst humans?

CD: Obviously if you look around at people, everyone is different. No two individuals are exactly the same. You have fat people, skinny people, ugly people, and beautiful people. People with motivation, and people without it. "Variation" is not purely physical, though I would argue beautiful people are more desirable amongst all for their genetics. We are programmed at a biological level that mating with an attractive person increases our status as individuals, and gives our offspring the best chance for survival. Some of the natural variations we see in humans may or may not impact the individuals survival. Hair and eye color are good examples of this. However, some variations DO help survival: a healthy body, good skin, and confidence. The fat woman who is using a power chair to get around Walmart isn't going to have a healthy child with you, no matter how superior your genetics are. This brings us to the second point:

Organisms reproduce more than the environment can handle. There are a limited amount of resources that have to be spread across our society. Money is at the root of all of it. The people who are more intelligent, more educated, and better socially adept (often because they are physically attractive) are going to have more of it. The people that don't have money line up in the welfare line and take the money from the rest of us. It's a matter of scarcity, and everyone is competing for what we have. Unfortunately, the government has intervened with nature. Biologically, our species wants the scum mooching from the rest of society to be buried six feet under. They are contributing nothing to society except sitting on the corner asking for a handout, taking money away from the people who worked hard and earned it.

TM: Naturally then, there is a lot of competition for the high-status, attractive people.

CD: Exactly. What the government has done though is throw a lifeline to the crappy genetics. They are keeping these lines of genes alive, they then continue to reproduce at mass levels, which only makes our environment more resource starved. Yes, sometimes a gem comes out of these bad genes, but it is the exception, not the norm. Nature wants what is best for it's species survival. This brings us to the fourth and final point of my theory on evolution, which can be summed up in a common phrase: survival of the fittest.

For example, let's take a pride of lions. Let's say one lion suffers an injury while hunting one day. Suddenly, he is no longer able to hunt down fresh prey. Because he is in a pride, he will not starve. The other lions will pick up the slack and bring him back food. He will be given the chance to nurse his injuries until he can return to the game of hunting down prey and contributing to his herd.

Let's say a girl at the tender age of 19 gets knocked up by the bad boy. Rather than engaging in provided services for birth control prior to having sex, she gets knocked up and gives birth to a bastard child. The father is a deadbeat and doesn't make his child support payments. So of course, the pride(taxpayers) pick up the slack, providing her with food, shelter, and other services for her. However, she is never forced to get back into the game. The prideprovides endlessly because the government takes the money out of those who work hard and gives it to the deadbeats who contribute nothing to society. For the next 18 years, her basic needs are met. If she wants to continue, she can get knocked up a couple more times along the way, and the government will simply increase the size of the checks being deposited into her account. She contributes nothing to society except for Facebook statuses of, "How tired she is after taking care of little Johnny all day," and Instagram photos of her eating out at the latest trendy "foodie" place with her government checks.

Do you think the lions would bring back food for the injured lion for 18+ years while he contributes absolutely nothing to the herd?

TM: He would have to get off his ass and figure out a way to survive for himself. Either that, or he would simply be left to starve to death. He doesn't have a government that will baby him and give him things so they can secure his vote in the next election.

CD: Welfare is when the government loves one stranger (and the collective votes) so much, that they are willing to steal from another stranger to help them out. As Abe Lincoln said, "You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they can and should do for themselves."

As long as the government continues to subsidize programs for single mothers, and dead-beats who need food stamps, housing assistance, etc, for extended periods of time; they will continue to piss off those with superior genetics, which will simply lead to society burning down over time as the inferior genetics simply outnumber those with superior genetics.

TM: Thanks for your time and your thoughts, Charles. I hope you don't roll around too much in your grave as our government continues to encourage, fund, and celebrate the survival of inferior genetic stock.

Hiding Your Power Level

October 25, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Power Level

What is your power level? It is a euphemism for enlightenment. This enlightenment takes the form of what some would call “red pill” status. Knowing how the world really works is very useful in getting power, money, and pussy. This knowledge is seen as a threat by some so a smart man will not reveal his power level in all environments.

Haters Gonna Hate

As was demonstrated in this article here, there are people who actually go looking to hammer those who do not toe the party line. Anyone who has been to an American college can attest to this. If you don’t believe me, go take a gender studies class and question the pay gap myth and see what happens.

Be The Zebra

A good practical exercise in hiding your power level would be to pretend you don't understand a language for your in a multilingual environment. For example if you go to Germany pretend you don't know German and see what people say around you in German. You would be surprised at what they actually say they think you cannot understand. Playing dumb is a strategy to use in many other environments such as bars college classes and police interview rooms.

But What About Open Debate?

Some would say hiding your intelligence or worldly knowledge hinders humanity's advancement. This is true in an open and fair society. Such a society doesn't really exist though. Whether it's the Khmer Rouge taking smart college professors to the fields to kill them, or certain researchers being ostracized for non-politically correct studies, sometimes revealing your power level is a detriment.

Can't Lead A Horse To Water

Another reason the hide power levels is because some people are dumb and working to enlighten them is a fools errand. Trying to educate a potential lay at the bar about the socioeconomic situation in China is not really going to help your mission. Trying to convince that college professor the folly of his ways is only getting get you a bad grade. You have to pick and choose where and when you reveal your true power level for your benefit.

There Is A Time And Place For Everything

A wise man will pick and choose when and where he reveals his true power level. One place is this site. This is why it continues to grow more popular over time. Places where you must hide your true power level are slowly becoming parodies of themselves. Examples would include woman studies, centralized healthcare, and broadcast TV. Remember, discretion is key.

Achievement Unlocked

October 25, 2013 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

The typical Return Of Kings reader is a complete dirtbag. Trust me on this. We can smell our own.

To us, sex is not a sacred act consecrating love, passion and a bond of loyalty between two adults. Sex – that most emotional and essential of human activities – is a mere game to be played.

Unhealthy and self-destructive though this attitude may be, it has inspired me to develop a set of goals and metrics to gauge my progress down through the inner circles of hell. What gets measured, gets managed. And so dear reader, I present to you my collection of goals, records, benchmarks and aspirations, that I use to guide and give meaning to my irresponsible, incautious and pride-fueled romp through womankind:

1. The Slugging Percentage

Every week is a fresh 'at bat.'

You get seven pitches, one each day of the week.

If you bang one girl in a 24-hour period, that's a single. Two is a double, three is a triple, four is a grand slam. Note these are 'bangs' not 'notches.' Repeat offenders still count.

Your score for the week is the highest base you reach. If you're the rare quant-slash-playboy, feel free to chart out your slugging percentage over time using this measure. The Slugging Percentage is a good test of harem management skills, as it incentivizes the close temporal grouping of girls on the rotation. It also increases the odds of explosive baby mama drama and general hilarity, which is a bonus for your buddies and blog readers alike.

2. Par

Every hole in golf is different. This is why golfers have 'par' i.e. the number of shots it should take a decent golfer to get to the hole.

Similarly, every month is different, and you should adjust your expected number of fresh notches accordingly. June in Barcelona with three solid wings and a penthouse apartment? Par 10, if not 20. February in Iqaluit, nay, suburban Iqaluit? Par 1.

At the start of each year, plot out your planned lifestyle over the course of the year and set par for each month. At the end of each month, if you've made par that's a zero. Birdie is +1 notch, eagle is +2, +3 is a double eagle and so on. One less notch is a bogie, two less is a double bogie and so on. Keep a scorecard with your friends throughout the year, and feel free to award a 'handicap' to anyone so unfortunate as to not read blogs such as this one, Roosh, Roissy, G Manifesto, Dagonet, Naughty Nomad, Wall Street Playboys, Bold and Determined, Danger and Play and Thumotic.

3. Track Records

I'm a man who enjoys an occasional weekday night on the prowl, but I'm also not the 21-year-old rapscallion I once was. Lack of sleep catches up with me. To minimize the damage done to my training, hustling and general happiness caused by lack of sleep, I aspire to be in and out of my weekday hunting grounds as quickly as possible.

The rules are: Stop your timer and wave the checkered flag as soon as the girl is over your bedroom door threshold. There is no limit to the start time for the evening. Each venue and day of the week is a different course. If you get a girl into your bedroom and then fail to close, you haven't read my guide to negating last-minute resistance, and your record is invalid.

4. KO, TKO, Decision on Points

In terms of transitioning closed deals to harem regulars, it's all about showing the girl stars on that first night. The single most effective way to maximize your 'hand' in a budding relationship is to fuck her properly that first night. If you do this, you can kill her cat with your bare hands in front of her on date #2 and she will forgive you for it.

A KO is scored when you have left your girl a writhing, gushing, squirming, screaming heap of estrogen and spent energy several times throughout the night. The KO is scored when your bed is in shambles, she can't speak, your dick is sore, she needs to be treated for dehydration, and your back looks like you were attacked by Wolverine in a berserker rage. It is a complete and utter knock-out, and she will be on the mat for the next three months of your mini-relationship.

A TKO is scored when you properly bring the thunder, both of you have a good time, and you get that sound out of her at least once. This is the kind of sex she will sincerely describe to her girlfriends as 'good' if they ask but otherwise won't bring it up. A TKO is a 'meets expectations' and a 5% raise. You've knocked her down a few times, but she didn't have much trouble getting back up.

The outcome of a TKO is that she will almost certainly come back for more, but you will still have to put in some work to earn her complete and total submission.

A Decision On Points occurs when you close the deal with unremarkable sex. The kind of sex that she enjoys, but feels vaguely disappointed about afterwards, and describes to her girlfriends as 'nice' after the fact with a 1000-yard stare. In this case, consider yourself to have lost all hand in the relationship entirely. If she is sticking around after mediocre sex, it is because she views you as potential boyfriend material. It is a ‘W’ to be sure, but it is nothing to brag about.

5. The Golden Touchdown

Credit to the Roosh V Forum community for this one. A Golden Touchdown is awarded when a man secures his flag within 24 hours of arriving in a new country. A Platinum Touchdown is scored when two separate lays are scored on Day 1. Three is a Diamond Touchdown. If you can rail more than three new notches within a day of hitting tarmac, there is no category for you – but I doubt that’s going to ruin your day.

Scoring A Politically Correct Touchdown Against The Redskins

October 26, 2013 | by colonelcrimson | Link | Original Link

The Washington Redskins, winners of three Super Bowls and one of the most iconic franchises in all of sports, will be changing its team name soon. Sure, owner Daniel Snyder vowed he would "never" do such a thing, but you can bet that's a promise he won't be able to keep. (He already backed down from his original avowal.) Political correctness has permeated itself into Western culture like blubber in the belly of your average Walmart shopper. Which means 80-plus years of history must be flushed away in deference to an offended few.

Nothing illustrates the insanity of this issue better than a recent discussion on ESPN's "Around the Horn," a show that features four columnists from across the country who enlighten their lucky viewers not only with their brilliant analyses on the world of sports, but on the social issues that surround it. And by "enlighten" I mean spout left-wing groupthink at a rate that would make the most strident feminist proud. Not one of these men (using the term loosely) came down in favor of keeping the name Redskins. Not one.

A Trip into PC Hell

Here's the transcript (the discussion begins at about the 10:00 mark):

> Tony Reali (Host): Last week, President Obama said if he owned the Washington Redskins he'd have to think about a name change. Earlier this week, the NFL moved up a meeting with the Oneida Nation, and today team owner Dan

> Snyder responded. In a letter to season ticket holders, Snyder maintained his position that the name is a badge of honor and his intention is keeping the nickname. He quoted two surveys, one of them, he says, “90 percent of Native Americans didn’t find the name offensive,” and also: “I respect the opinions of those who disagree. I want them to know that I do hear them and continue to listen to them, and learn. But we cannot ignore our 81-year history.”

The writing is on the wall. Even the lone person here with a shred of sanity—Redskins owner Daniel Snyder—waters down his remarks with the utmost respect given to the lords of political correctness. What exactly do we have to “learn” from the offended, Daniel? That they’re still offended? Newsflash: we shouldn’t care. And 90 percent of Indians don’t care either.

> Woody Paige: I think he’s totally wrong, and I want to address a couple of points. One, in talking about the history and tradition of the franchise, we have seen over the past 80 years, a lot of changes made in this country, including the fact that we now refer to those who are Native Americans as Native Americans, not by a name that they were given by the Italian when he supposedly came to this country and misspoke about where they belong. Number 2, he talks about the surveys. The surveys, were each about 1,000 people. There were 3 million, the last census, 3 million people who registered as Native Americans, so that is a small sample size. I think he should take more consideration and to call it a badge of honor is such a mistake, I think he needs to back off.

Woody’s never been the most eloquent of speakers, but this statement is a mess. And completely untrue. In his rambling, I think I can safely conclude that he’s talking about Christopher Columbus—the guy who “supposedly came to this country”—and the taboo name “Indians” he allegedly coined. To quote one of the great red-pillers of our time, George Carlin, “Indian” is a dignified term with a history most are completely ignorant of:

> I call them Indians because that’s what they are. They’re Indians. There’s nothing wrong with the word Indian. First of all, it’s important to know that the word Indian does not derive from Columbus mistakenly believing he had reached “India.” India was not even called by that name in 1492; it was known as Hindustan.
> More likely, the word Indian comes from Columbus’s description of the people he found here. He was an Italian, and did not speak or write very good Spanish, so in his written accounts he called the Indians, “Una gente in Dios.” A people in God. In God. In Dios. Indians. It’s a perfectly noble and respectable word.

Plus, “Native American” is just a derivation of the name of European explorer Amerigo Vespucci with the word “native” tacked on. Ersatz moniker, for the win.

> Tim Cowlishaw: Yeah, I would have been okay with what he said if he reversed it. If instead of saying, I’m willing to learn, but we have an 81-year history and > tradition. If he had talked about the history first, and then said, but I'm open-minded, I want to learn. We need more than these two surveys to find out if it's really offensive, that would have been okay.

Sadly, this is the most level-headed statement from our esteemed ~~Obama speech writers~~ sportswriters. We need to learn? Teach us, oh great spaghetti monster of relativism, if this term is offensive or not. Let me ask you, Mr. Cowlishaw, at what percentage would it become acceptable for you to feel okay about using the term Redskin to describe Washington's football team: 91 percent? 95 percent? 99.9 percent?

> Bomani Jones: It's a spectacular level of arrogance, this whole show. But the big thing to remember is that this is George Preston Marshall's team, both a hall of famer in football and a hall of famer in racism. And Daniel Snyder's trying to tell me that that man was honoring Native Americans. If you really believe that, then what else are you doing to honor Native Americans other than this name? It's a slur, stop lying to me.

And for our Victims of Racism™ segment tonight, I present to you Bomani Jones. Crusader against racist owners who've been dead for 40 years, who understands the only way to fight arrogance is with more arrogance.

> Reali: Back to the survey though, what if 90 percent of Native Americans don't find the name offensive? What if Native American high schools on the reservation have Redskin as a nickname, as they do, if that's the case?

How dare you introduce reason into this group, Reali? We were having a Racist Haters circle jerk and you ruined it with ridiculously factual hypotheticals! (Don't you just love it how he has to tiptoe through the truth? The entire point is presented as a great "what if" even though it's completely true that Indian high schools use Redskin as a nickname.)

> Pablo Torre: Well let's grant that that's true, for example, and let's say…I mean, let's remember that this is a category of a racial caricature, right? That's what we're polling about. And so I think there's a principle as much as there is an empirical research element to this. And if 10 percent of people, 21 percent of people, are gravely offended, if their human dignity has been stripped from them on a regular basis, we should probably err on the side of protecting that minority. That's where we are, I think, in this country in 2013.

Yes, Pablo, "let's grant" that the truth is actually the truth, since it is we as sackless hack sportswriters who ultimately decide the truth. And nice touch on adding the feminine touch of the dramatic—I'm trying to picture someone whose "human dignity has been stripped" because of the name of a fucking football team. Beta males suffer divorce theft at the hands soul-wrenching vulturous ex-wives every day, but we as a nation are more worried that little Dances With Wolves will be eternally scarred at the sight of Robert Griffin III wearing a picture of an Indian warrior on his helmet.

> Paige: Why don't we also survey all the people who are non-Native Americans? Because, even though I'm 1/16 a Native American, I'm offended by the term. I think a lot of the people I hang out with are offended by the term, and will never use it, and I never write it.

Chief Plays With Wood has a point. White people are more offended by Redskin than red people. Ah, the gifts of feminism just keep giving! White guilt is its fundamental premise.

> Jones: Hey, go back and check how many colleges changed their names from Native American mascots and see how few of them were even close to being like "redskin." They were much more tame and people still found the decency to do better.

Or in other words, if everybody else is doing it–in the name of PC, of course–that makes it right! When will we as a nation man up and just give in to the whim of the minority already?

By the way, for those of you counting at home, that's 11 instances of the term "Native American" in a 3:00 segment. Carlin is rolling in his grave.

Change My Evil Ways

Unfortunately, we cannot prevent the inevitable. The Redskins will be no more soon, because it's been arbitrarily decided that, combined together, the words red and skin are a slur. It doesn't matter that one means a shade of scarlet and the other means epidermis. It doesn't matter that it only applies to some—it's perfectly acceptable to call Blacks black and Whites white. What matters is that THIS is a slur. It's offensive because we have decreed it offensive. It is an etymological fallacy of the highest degree.

In the mean time, I guess we'd better start thinking about some new names for our nation capital's football team. Maybe the Gay Marriages? the Reproductive Rights? the Community Organizers? I think I'll play it safe, and go with the name inspired by our gang of sports analysts—the PC-DC Pussy Willows.

A Week Of Praise

October 26, 2013 | by Wald | Link | Original Link

With the recent overwhelmingly large success of Fat Shaming Week, I think it's time to take a different tack on things. That is to say, I believe it's time for a Week of Praise.

Currently, there is much anger and negativity in the manosphere. It's very easy for an outsider to peg us as bitter, pessimistic, and as a bunch of negative Nigels. I'm not saying that all the negativity, bitterness, and anger out there are misplaced. They exist and there is good reason for them too. I believe there needs to be a balance. Positivity to balance out the negativity. Moderation to balance out immoderation. We need some Yin to our Yang.

Our shame can only have so much effect by itself. The stick is only so effective without the carrot. Knowing that women seek attention by design, it only makes sense to portion it out accordingly. With shame, we let women know what not to do, lest they suffer our displeasure. With praise, we let woman know what's okay and what we like. Feminists, magazines like Cosmo and Vogue, and washed up cougars shouldn't have a monopoly on telling women what it is that men desire. Women need men to lead them. Otherwise, you have a case of the blind being led by the blind.

There are still women out there who are striving be good women in an age of temptation, and in the crab bucket we call today's society. I see no reason why those special women shouldn't receive some encouragement.

It is time to let women know that:

- It's okay to be submissive to a man
- It's okay to be good at cooking
- It's okay to be good at cleaning
- It's okay to want to be a traditional, stay-at-home mom
- It's okay to be feminine and petite
- It's okay to be skinny and interested in staying in shape

- It’s okay to get married young and chaste
- It’s okay to take care of your man according to his wants and needs
- It’s okay to not like effeminate men

I dream of the day where women brag about how well they treat their men, how much and healthy they cook, and how much they gyrate their baby factories in an attempt to placate the insatiable appetite of their beloved husbands. I dream of a day where women speak of their husbands with reverence and follow the examples of celebrities renowned for their class, poise, modesty, home-cooking, and loyalty.

Therefore, I issue a call to action that men hoist the examples of women who got it right on high. We’ve told women what they should dread turning into. Now is the time to show them what they should aspire to become.

Fatso: The Damning Codependency Of Betas

October 27, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Fatso is a Norwegian movie, released in 2008, about a fat, ugly man who cannot get laid. I will use the movie and its plot and characters to analyze the narcissism of the beta male – as typified by the main character, Rino, in the movie. I will also draw on Dr. Robert Glover's book "No More Mister Nice Guy," to understand why these sorts of males exist.

The movie opens with Rino in a grocery store. Already, we can tell he is fat, unattractive and tremendously awkward – especially with women. He clearly has a crush on the cute blond at the checkout line – but has negative game and even trips when leaving the store. Immediately, we are hit with a cartoon spiff. Rino makes and draws a series of cartoons in which his alter-ego – Captain Cock – either does things he won't do in real life or is the scapegoat for the shame Rino feels about his sexual feelings and desires. In the initial cartoon, a bunch of cops show up and arrest him for having a hard-on. They interrogate him for watching tons of porn and visiting sex-chat sites. In a bit of foreshadowing, the cops solve his "problem" of having sexual impulses by castrating him.

Zooming back to real life, we see Rino illustrating the exact cartoon sketch he just laid out. There is a ring at the door and we see him hurrying through his house – porn on the computer screen, his living room littered with Coke bottles, beer cans and a pizza box. Then, in comes Rino's clearly narcissistic best friend – skinny, ugly and looking like he stumbled out of a bad 1970's porno. He comes in and immediately begins riffing about his tight game and banging asthmatic chicks. They go out to a bar and he brags about banging a 53 year-old woman.

Another important take-away from the movie is still in the first ten minutes. Rino's dad comes in – with a kid- and is seemingly gay. Regardless, he has the air of a man who can't understand why Rino is the way he is. He has the usual parental exhortations – why can't you get a girlfriend? Why aren't you ambitious? Rino's horrible insecurities owe to this man's influence. Still, he announces to Rino he will be getting a roommate, an attractive, young blond woman named Marlin.

She moves in and the impression of a breezy, superficial party girl is made. She is bubbly and bright towards Rino, which catches him off guard because no woman has ever treated him that way.

However, two strands in the movie appear. One, is Marlin's increasing reliance on Rino emotionally. Rino trys to the play simp "pity me game," which gets her to hug him, gets her to confess feelings about stuff to him and gets her to cuddle with him and all that. For the moment, the male hamster is satisfied. The second is his relationship with his narcissistic best friend. He uses Rino as little more than some pathetic guy he can boast to about banging old women, hookers and selling dope to kids. His relationship with Rino hits a climax at a house party Marlin throws, which is a mini-climax.

In the lead-up to this party, Rino tries working out. However, one more of his cartoons pops up as he falsely thinks everybody is judging him at the gym, so he runs away, never to come back. He changes his look, wearing a suit coat to the party along with styling his hair. He still looks a little shabby, but much better than before. Marlin says he looks cute and he stares into the mirror after that compliment – a little too long. Regardless, Rino at least makes some fumbling gestures at women and they are not turned-on, but neither actively dissing him.

Once again, he flees to the balcony, where Marlin consoles him telling him drunkenly to not be depressed. Rino's friend comes in, blazing mad Rino is throwing a party with cute girls and demands to be allowed to cook a few pounds of bacon on his stove. Rino's friend remarks to him, "Is bacon too primitive for you now?" I laughed hard at that one. However, this symbolizes what Rino is to the people in his life. To his dad, a failure and does nothing to understand Rino. To Marlin, an emotional tampon. To his best friend, a simp he can feel superior to. However, this blows up as expected.

Later on, Marlin is crying at the park and he inquires as to why. Long story short, the alpha male she was getting fucked by broke up with her. They take on one of the most beta pacts ever – she steps into celibacy, while he steps out. She decides to set him up with a date.

Rino walks into the restaurant and immediately approaches an attractive blond at the bar with no fear. It shows much fear can impede a man, as the female wasn't swooning but was at least entertaining his advances. It isn't his date, however, as a chubby blond calls him over.

Rino loses it. He calls her a disgusting lard ass and pours his beer in sheer beta defiance over his head. She grabs his hand in an act of empathy, but he jerks away and leaves. He flees home and begins to draw one of cartoons in which Captain Cock takes control of his sexuality and fucks hot chicks.

He meets up with his best friend and decides to go to a strip club. Rino gets turned on and decides to go with his best friend to a brothel to finally get laid. When he goes into the dirty brothel, there are several fairly good-looking women there. He has serious jitters and the matron gives him a strong drink to help him relax. He chugs it and gets more nervous, so nervous he runs all the way home in the pouring rain. He finds Marlin, crying because her alpha came by, fucked her and then told her it was over again.

He carries his fair maiden to the bedroom, where they sleep and cuddle together, with her pressing her almost naked body against his. In his sleep, he dreams of fucking her, but habits are habits and he begins stroking in his sleep. She wakes up and recoils in horror and calls him a disgusting pervert. Bad choice of words on her part because that triggers his deepest fear and he runs to the bathroom, grabs a blade and threatens to cut his dick off. She eggs him on at first, telling him he won't do it because he is too big of a pussy. Well, he does it. We are presented with another cartoon montage where he gives up his cock and balls, much to cheering of a crowd. He gets to a hospital and is fixed up.

He comes home and Marlin is waiting for him. She comments on how sorry she is for egging him on and tells him she found his drawings and he is really good at drawing. She gives him a final exhortation – possibly the best advice he got the entire movie – and to leave the apartment. He is too trapped in his own mind there. At the end, he goes back to the market with the original girl. He buys some paints and asks her on a date – very badly. She politely declines and leaves; all the while pretending – in his mind- he has changed significantly.

What to make of this? Rino may appear to be a narcissist and he does have narcissistic qualities, as he is preoccupied with his false view of himself and ignores his true SMV. He displays nothing more than superficial changes in his life – his workout routine lasted all of one day. What he really displays is sometimes called “inverted narcissism” or, codependency.

Codependency is a common psychological issue that one develops as a child, with either a narcissistic parent or a drug-addicted parent. They are characterized as having a deep ability to understand other’s emotions, but only as so far as it relates to the given codependent’s ability to perform a particular role in a narcissist’s life.

In Fatso, Rino plays the regular simp who is psychologically used by those around him, but insofar that it allows him to act out certain roles. With his best friend, he gets to act out his failed relationship with his father, as he gets to the play the fascinated, idolizing inferior. With Malin, he plays the emotional tampon, the guy who gives her the emotional support she craves from the alpha male. With women in general, he gets to live out his fantasy of “Captain Cock” who not only saves women from the clutches of uncaring assholes, but who also gets his sexuality approved of. I noted only once did he actually fantasize about having sex – it was all about the ability to get sex in theory. That sounds like narcissism.

Understand that deep down, Rino doesn’t want his sexual desires approved of. Codependents have a superficial desire for approval, as that is what they got from their self-absorbed parents. Any real displays of approval are almost always rejected, sometimes very strongly. This is reflected in Rino’s inability to come to grips with his sexuality. He craves superficial acceptance – for example, when he asks that women out at the end, she says she is engaged and “might” take go on a date with him if she was single. It was worded so that it was a very light rejection, but still could be taken as an acceptance. That is exactly what he wants – superficial approval from women so he can live out his fantasies in his head, while simultaneously avoiding any real, substantive contact with women. The closest he got to ever touching a female was after a serious psychological shock at the brothel, having run home half-drunk and presented with a great white-knighting situation. The best he coughs up is jacking off and then trying to slice off his dick.

This is where the book “No More Mister Nice Guy” comes in. Written by Robert Glover, it is a handbook for the beginning of changing a “nice guy” or beta male. Dr. Glover does lay some serious tips to help the codependent male. Understand, the narcissist is protected by narcissistic armor – their defenses against criticism. Telling a narcissist in therapy that he or she has value is worthless because they will laugh at you. Of course they believe that, their narcissistic armor ensures that at a superficial level. In my opinion, the most insecure people are narcissists. They hide behind serious defense mechanisms that make you think they are strong. They are not. However, one of the benefits of being a codependent comes in. Codependents already blame themselves – their self-hatred is just below the surface, that is why narcissists target them so shamelessly. They know they can get them to act out the roles they need them to.

This is why codependents are receptive to therapy – accepting blame for their actions is their nature. They don’t have the serious deflection armor narcissists have. While their self-blame is shamelessly self-centered, it is the first step of solving any problem – admitting a problem. Codependents are acutely aware of their deficiencies – look at Rino. He knew he was fat, ugly and sexually repulsive. His cartoons he drew reflected that realization. Marlin, at the end, remarks that he has a level of self-awareness. She recognized and empathized with the fact Rino knew on some level he was sexually worthless to most women.

In the book, Glover lays out nice guys. He characterizes them as guys, who think if they get everything “right,” that love, lust and all that jazz would flood into their lives. He positively cites Lasch’s “Culture of Narcissism” book near the beginning, signaling he notices that many men are suffering from narcissistic parents. However, his expose of the typical nice guy could literally be channeled through Rino.

In Glover’s words, nice guys operate on two axis’: the “I’m so bad” and “I’m so nice” nice guy. The “I’m so bad” nice guy is really a guy who has been convinced of his inferiority by a parent; he abuses alcohol, drugs and others in an attempt to prove his lack of worth. In other words, he attempts to paper over his own perceived worthlessness by pretending to be bad. He really isn’t anti-social, he just acts that way to get attention. The “I’m so nice” guy is a person who believes that they really are the nicest person around. They paper over anger, fear and sexuality by pretending it doesn’t exist. After all, they are the paradigm of the goodness. Any nice guy can vacillate between these two polar opposites given the right circumstances. Rino displays the “I’m so nice” guy outwardly. When confronted with this sexual desires, porn use, etc. he flips to the other end of the spectrum – “I’m so bad,” I’m sick, depraved and a loser. When Malin confronts him with his desire for her, he runs off in a tantrum to deny himself his very manhood. A playing up of the “I’m so bad,” while emphasizing the “I’m so good” – I will rid the world of my depraved sexuality.

What causes these feelings of worthlessness? Two concepts: abandonment and shame. If you are raised by a narcissist, that person only cares about themselves. A baby would quickly realize that their needs and desires aren’t relevant. They would begin to act out in ways that would allow them to function with the paradigm of that relationship. Since narcissists need to feel superior, babies and children would most likely play the inferior to get attention.

Roberts provides a great breakdown of shame. Shame-based people are people who believe that is inherently dangerous to be who they are. It is a dichotomy that breaks down – “There must be something wrong with me because [fill in the blank],” and “I am lovable when [fill in the blank].” Analyzing Rino through this lenses, it becomes clear he was lovable as a child when he took care of female emotional needs, but he was in the wrong when he asserted himself. He was lovable when he listened to and praised a male superior, he was in the wrong when he expressed himself in a way that a female found inappropriate.

This is where Robert’s analysis of the social forces that lead to this comes in. Roberts comes down on a few forces: lack of fathers, a feminized education and feminism in general. He recognizes the lack of quality fathers impairs a male’s ability to grow into a confident man. Second, he comes out and says the early years of education isn’t about education but learning how to please the female superior (!). Third, is feminism; Roberts says that sayings like “All men are pigs” or “All men are rapists” do nothing but hurt vulnerable men; further, even sayings like “A woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle” hurts men who were already conditioned in this female-centric to look for a woman’s approval first.

Ultimately, men like Rino really don’t have a chance. Born into a system and a world that does little to understand boys and men, men like Rino simply don’t slip through the cracks, but fall right through the massive holes society affords these men.

Regardless, men like Fatso will still be jacking off watching the flickering screen of their TV.

How This Site Improved My Life

October 27, 2013 | by Lucas Bly | Link | Original Link

I started reading this site just over a month ago, and can report the following lifestyle changes.

1. My priorities are clearer

I suddenly feel I have the right to insist on prioritizing my own daily goals, over the goals other people want me to achieve.

2. I Lift To Look Better And Get Stronger

It's OK to want to learn what my own abs look like. I started Leangains, dropped ten pounds of fat, gained three pounds of muscle. Eating lifting and feeling like a warrior, and I've never felt better in my life. Man eats meat.

3. I started learning Krav Maga

Because a man should be able to defend himself and his pride. This seems so obvious to me now, I wish I'd started years ago.

4. Fatherhood now makes sense

It's clear I must teach my son how to approach the world of women, better equipped than I was. I bought three of Roosh's books, and my son will receive them as a gift when he comes of age.

5. I understand women better

I understand now why I was never "good" with women, why my older wife chose younger me, why our relationship evolved as it did, and how I can improve my current and future relationships with women by encouraging them to be feminine. Someone has to be the man, it might as well be me.

6. I understand men better

Every man I encounter can, and should, be considered by his beliefs about the sexes and his alpha or beta tendencies. Both frameworks make total sense to me. Once I realize whom I'm talking to, conversations take on a whole new meaning.

7. I'm better with my clients

The illogical and frustrating people I am forced to deal with, are as they are, independent of how I deal with them. That truth frees me to do my job of sharing knowledge and charging appropriately for my time, while concerning myself less with whether or not the student learned what I was trying to teach. It's no longer part of my job to feel guilty every time a student refuses to learn.

[image]

8. When a telemarketer calls, I hang up.

Because I didn't ask for that. I have the right to control my own time. I used to feel at least a twinge of guilt before hanging up before.

9. I'm downright brutal in conversation now

I don't have time for your crap. If you don't have facts to counter my argument, your opinion is irrelevant and the discussion is over. I've noticed others suddenly work extra hard now to please me and garner my praise. Turns out more people respect a man who believes in what he says, and says it with conviction.

10. My relationships are improving

I now focus on setting clear and realistic expectations with others; I reward good behavior and punish bad behavior with my wife, and my son. My employees are much more straightforward. I am not passive agressive, because I have the right to believe, to feel, and to say what I want, and further, to insist on my needs rather than 'request.' I've begun to value my own contributions to my relationships so much more now, that it only makes sense to expect reciprocity.

Not Just Problems – Return Of Kings Offers Solutions

It doesn't even matter if you disagree with something you read here, or if every author is correct 100% of the time, or if someone writes just to inflame readers, or what the site creator's motivations are. That someone created something this beautiful and true, is inspiring.

I'm not going to be a Casanova any time soon, and that's not my intent – I'll leave that to my son. Here I find a small army of forward thinking writers whom I enjoy reading.

I will contribute as long as I'm able. And read, and absorb, and join in, and contribute again, and learn with you all, and celebrate men, and the women we love.

Roosh, Uncle, I tip my drink to you.

Dear readers, what about you – do you have any stories of how your life has been changed by this journey?

Yes or no, I hope you will join me in contributing to the vital discussion of what it means to be a man.

The Return Of A King

October 28, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The daring exploits of John Paul Jones during the American Revolutionary War earned him international fame as America's first great naval hero. A Scotsman by birth, he possessed all the sternness, willpower, and volcanic temperament of his people, qualities which made him a formidable commander on the high seas; but like most great men, his virtues contained the seeds of his faults. After the war ended in 1783, Jones found it difficult to accommodate himself to the politics and maneuverings of the peacetime military. His fighting skills and experiences suddenly counted for little, as the new country proceeded to demobilize and concentrate on commerce.

A fighting admiral, he could not suffer fools or endure the subtleties of diplomacy, and he was at pains to appease the bureaucrats in Congress to secure a position for himself as head of the fledgling U.S. navy. When funding and ships failed to materialize as promised, Jones felt shunted aside and unappreciated. Bitterly disappointed with his prospects in America, he sailed for Europe, never to return.

He found eventual employment, incredibly, with the Russian Empire, and became a favorite of Catherine the Great, slavicizing his name to Pavel de Zhoves. But even there, his career prospects eventually dried up, and he found himself in Paris in 1790. He died two years later, exhausted and embittered, and still chasing his ambitions. His death went unnoticed in the United States, and his funeral was attended by a scant few close friends. A knight permanently in search of a liege lord to serve, he had found little rest while he was alive, and he had been unable to recast his identity in a way suitable for a peacetime life.

In the end, he realized that this world, and everything in it, is but a maya of transitory phantoms, melting into the swirling mists of our own perceptions.

A century passed. At the dawn of the twentieth century, the United States had been transformed from a provincial backwater to an industrial powerhouse. Interest had been reawakened in the heroes of the Revolutionary War. Historians gradually began to realize that John Paul Jones had had a remarkable career, and was the country's first great fighting admiral. But no one seemed to know what had happened to him. Jones had died at the height of the French Revolution; and in the upheaval and turbulence of the period, records had been lost, mutilated, or scattered. Where he had lived, and the location of his final resting place, were completely unknown.

A wartime British caricature of Jones, who was seen as a "pirate"

The U.S. ambassador to France, Horace Porter, was a quiet and industrious man with a keen interest in naval history. He was personally outraged that an American national hero had been so cruelly served by his adopted nation, and he resolved to put the matter right. In 1899 he embarked on a personal quest to locate Jones and return him to America for a proper burial. He was acting purely on his own, as a private citizen.

But where to start? He found that the death certificate had been consumed by a building fire in 1871. Luckily someone had made a copy of it in 1859, and this copy had been hidden away in a mountain of records in an old archives building. According to the document, Jones's death occurred on July 18, 1792. Other documents yielded other clues. A letter from one of Jones's friends who had attended the funeral mentioned that the coffin had been encased in thick lead "in case the United States, which he had essentially served and with so much honor, should claim his remains, they might be more easily moved."

Porter was shocked to discover that the American government had not even paid for Jones's funeral. This burden had fallen to a friend of the admiral's named M. Simoneau, who had paid roughly 500 francs for Jones's leaden coffin, the embalming of the body in alcohol, and the outer wooden coffin. Moved to chagrin and shame by the revelation, he tried to find a descendant of Simoneau's to reimburse, but to no avail.

At this point Porter had to resort to guesswork, his remaining leads having run cold. Foreign non-Catholics in Paris such as Jones would most likely have been buried in the St. Louis Cemetery. A search of the graveyard records found that they were fragmentary and incomplete, a likely consequence of the all-consuming fury of the French Revolution. The missing records miraculously turned up in a Paris library, and Porter was back on the trail of his prey: the records proved that Jones had indeed been buried at the St. Louis Cemetery.

But further problems remained. The cemetery had been sold in 1796 by France's revolutionary government to a dodgy private building contractor named M. Phalipeaux, who then (probably illegally) swept away the headstones and erected commercial buildings on the site. Porter was further disturbed to find that the site later had become a dumping ground for the cadavers of horses and dogs.

Porter approached the owners of the property (today located at the corner of Rue Grange-aux-Belles and Rue des Ecluses St. Martin) to request permission to conduct some excavations on the land. But they demanded so much money from him that he thought the best course of action would be to walk away and let the matter sit for some time. He then quietly re-approached the owners after 24 months, and explained he was a private citizen financing the project out of his own pocket. An agreement was eventually reached, and shafts were sunk on the land in search of the admiral's casket.

The streets of Paris, which conceal ancient secrets

Eventually, after probing the entire property and sifting through garbage and animal skeletons, five caskets of lead were recovered. All of them save one were marked with identification plates. The unmarked one, Porter concluded, had to be Jones's casket; during the chaos of the French Revolution, no proper engraver could be found. The casket was opened, and a well-preserved corpse was found wrapped in linen and straw, which matched old portraits and a marble bust of Jones. A detailed examination of the body done at the Paris School of Medicine established beyond doubt that the body was that of John Paul Jones.

President Theodore Roosevelt, hearing of the recovery of the remains of Jones in Paris, was deeply moved by the pathos of the story. With his usual flair for the dramatic, Roosevelt decided to send a squadron of warships to carry the body back to Annapolis, Maryland for proper burial.

Porter himself faded from history. His tenacity and devotion had made the recovery of the body possible, but he was never reimbursed by the U.S. government for his efforts. His personal expenses had run into the tens of thousands of dollars, which were hefty sums in those days.

Time heals old wounds, and inflicts new ones.

Memorial services were held on April 24, 1906. President Roosevelt spoke the following words:

"Remember that no courage can ever atone for the lack of preparedness which makes the courage valuable. And yet if the courage is there, its presence will sometimes make up for other shortcomings; while if with it are combined other military qualities, the fortunate owner becomes literally invincible."

Roosevelt chose April 24 as the day for commemorative services. On that very day, 138 years before, Jones had captured the British man-of-war Drake.

In triumph and pity, the remains of America's first great maritime warrior were entombed in their final resting place, while mourners prayed for the repose of his soul. After 130 years, the man who had only just begun to fight finally lowered his spyglass, sheathed his cutlass, and entered the Pantheon of Heroes with a measure of silent dignity and crowning gratitude. It was his homecoming. It was without doubt his greatest victory.

Why Game Is Necessary (Part 2)

Previously: Part 1

We're big on the concept of self-improvement here at ROK, and for good reason. We understand that men cannot hope to get want they want out of life (romantically or otherwise) without taking a serious look at themselves, objectively and efficiently identifying their faults and working diligently to improve upon them. Society's judgment of men who fail to do this is a very poor one, and the judgement of the female sex is harsher still. Weak men who show themselves unable or unwilling to address their faults are the floor upon which members of this society trample and spit upon. Their only defense is to begin the process of self-improvement.

It is often beneficial to facilitate this process through example. By providing illustrations of what should and should not be done, one can provide the male concerned with legitimate self-improvement a figurative “map” of sorts with which to guide himself forward, a source of directions that shows him where he needs to go and where he really shouldn’t be.

The more thorough and common the provision of these “directions”, the more effective the broader process of male self-improvement. Fewer men engage in pathetic activities that render them perpetual romantic failures and more women get to enjoy the company of men with at least a moderate degree of romantic competence. Everyone wins.

Today I am going to do my part to facilitate this process by providing an example of where no man should seek to be (as I have done before). The scenario is simple enough: a guy gets access to a girl via social circle contacts. He is able to build enough attraction for her to give him a shot and manages a couple of dates. He fails spectacularly for reasons that will become evident below.

I will let the images speak for themselves.

So, where'd this guy go wrong? I think I could make multiple posts answering that question, so in the interest of time I'll just abbreviate with three simple points.

1. Too many texts

He's sending her 3 or 4 texts for every one he receives. From the very beginning, he's too talkative and comes across as entirely too eager. We've all been here, and we've all run headfirst into the consequence: seeming too needy. This is the kiss of death with any female.

2. Too much cutesy talk

This guy thinks he's being charming, funny and cool with his use of "foeva" and the like, but really he just sounds kind of like a goofy try-hard.

3. He telegraphs interest far too early and far too directly.

It takes him two days to invite the girl he barely knows (they've only been on a date or two) on a cruise.

Note how prior to this point (which you can find above in the fourth image), despite his goofy wordiness, she's at least moderately responsive. When he starts calling/texting her late at night with something to say, she at least manages a response eventually ("I'm at a baby shower, what's up?") and hears him out. Up until this point, he never sends more than 3 messages without getting a response (though this is still a horrible ratio) and that response usually comes less than a day after he's said something. She's not totally ignoring him. The guy was playing it poorly, but (miraculously) wasn't totally out of her life yet.

After he mentions this cruise, she says "I don't want to commit to anything for the summer right now". She then goes dead silent on him for almost 10 days. Despite all of the mistakes he had made within the earliest stages of the conversation (wordiness, overeager tone, 3-to-1 text/response ratio, etc), it was his move to try and get her to offer some form of commitment early on that really convinced her to completely shut things down.

This demonstrates a very valuable reality for young men pursuing women to understand: be very wary of offering commitment. Women may be the gatekeepers of sex, but men are the gatekeepers of commitment. A gatekeeper's value is inherently linked to his/her ability to guard the objects being kept (sex for women, commitment for men).

Women who fail to guard their sex (read: highly promiscuous women who gain a reputation for providing easy sex to many men) are marked as poor gatekeepers and generally not held in high esteem.

Men who fail to guard their commitment (read: overeager, insecure, needy men who seem all to ready to wife up a girl within a very short time period and ooze desperation in the process) are no better and, actually, are in many ways held in much lower regard than the aforementioned highly promiscuous women (who hate them too).

This man was a piss poor gatekeeper, and he was treated accordingly. He did not understand what his commitment was worth, and offered it too casually. His needy, overeager nature and likely scarcity mentality were his undoing.

To improve romantically, men must learn to understand the true value of their commitment (a desirable commodity that can be offered and removed at will only by men) and understand the need to guard it accordingly. This knowledge must also be combined with focused efforts in other aspects related to broad self-improvement (style, finances, fitness, etc), which will be needed in order to make you into the kind of man whose commitment is actually desired by attractive women in the first place.

This is the way forward for the self-aware male seeking to better his romantic lot in life—you begin by becoming the kind of man women are attracted to (and, by extension, the man whose commitment is desired). The increased demand for your commitment (to which you are the gatekeeper, remember) then enhances your romantic value and allows you to enjoy higher quality relationships with higher quality women on a more regular basis.

It will also allow you to avoid becoming anything remotely resembling this sad example of manhood here, who (unaware of the lessons I am attempting to disseminate in this post) wasn't done texting this now totally uninterested girl:

Now, I want to make this clear: none of the mistakes displayed above are particularly rare. I think that the bulk of men on this site have been repeat offenders at some point in their lives. I know that I have certainly been guilty of much of the behavior displayed and described above (neediness, over-texting, etc).

How do we respond? We live and we learn, often the hard way. It isn't just about avoiding the mistakes, but making sure they are properly utilized as catalysts along the path to self-improvement, small boosts that can move you closer to the ultimate goal.

By displaying such catastrophic romantic blunders and highlighting their faults for all to see, I hope to make that process of mistake utilization a smoother one for other men who have either just recently made such errors or will soon do so.

Take it from somebody who has made the above errors on more than one occasion and seen the pitiful destination to which they lead: you don't want to be there. Don't be that guy. Stick with ROK and, eventually, you will internalize the steps necessary to avoid hitting the kind of rock-bottoms displayed above and, hopefully, will never find yourself there again. That will be more than hundreds of millions of young males in this modern world can say, and that's an accomplishment.

Building A Bridge To The 18th Century

October 28, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

First, I must admit that I'm a fan of Neil Postman, the late American cultural thinker. I recommend his book Amusing Ourselves To Death if you want to understand the effects that technology has on humanity (for a shorter synopsis of that book, check out his speech here). Similar ideas can also be found in the great documentary Connections by James Burke.

What I wanted to know is how to solve the problems that we face from blindly adopting technology. Postman suggests that we should borrow the 18th Century way of thinking from the Enlightenment in order to navigate our modern times (the century of Goethe, Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot, Kant, Hume, Gibbon, Adam Smith, Thomas Paine, Jefferson, Adams, and Franklin). He briefly goes over their philosophies and how we can adopt their way of thinking.

One of the most important points Postman makes is that modern man has lost a purposeful narrative of religion. The narrative that has replaced it is using technology and being satisfied with one's consumer products.

> …when people do not have a satisfactory narrative to generate a sense of purpose and continuity, a kind of psychic disorientation takes hold, followed by a frantic search for something to believe in or, probably worse, a resigned conclusion that there is nothing to find.
> I write for those who are still searching for a way to confront the future, a way that faces reality as it is, that is connected to a humane tradition, that provides sane authority and meaningful purpose.

But attempts at constructing a narrative won't work, because…

> There is no escaping from ourselves. The human dilemma is as it always has been, and it is a delusion to believe that the future will render irrelevant what we know and have long known about ourselves but find it convenient to forget.

The 18th Century marked the beginning of the modern world, not unlike how the Ancient Greeks marked the beginning of the Western world. In fact, the Englightenment was partially due to a re-discovering of the Ancient Greek writing. All the founding fathers of America studied them, and used those ideas to birth America. But how many American men study the Ancient Greeks today?

Today's society has been taken over by a zombie march of progress instead of the accumulation of wisdom. This idea of progress is relatively new. In the past, science was a pursuit of truth, without any immediate applications, but now everything must be done to make humans happy or improve their standard of living (i.e., bombard their senses with cheap and accessible entertainment and feed them with subsidized corn and sugar).

> The eighteenth century invented [the idea of progress], elaborated it, and promoted it, and in so doing generated vast resources of vitality, confidence, and hope. But the eighteenth century also criticized and doubted it, initiating powerful arguments about its limitations and pitfalls.

These limitations and pitfalls are rarely discussed today. 3D movies are progress. Internet is progress. Porn-on-demand is progress. Google Glass is progress. And so on. A cultural obsession with progress results in spiritual emptiness and a confused people. Progress has replaced god.

> We can get a clear idea of the seriousness and skepticism with which European intellectuals regarded technological progress by reading a letter Lord Byron sent prior to a speech he gave to the House of Lords early in the nineteenth century. The letter summarizes his speech. He spoke against a proposed law which would apply the death penalty to anyone deliberately breaking a machine, as those people called "Luddites" were in the habit of doing. Byron tried to show how the rise of factories made workers useless and desperate, and how their way of life was being destroyed. Byron was not a Luddite himself, and, in fact, understood the advantages of mechanized progress. But he saw in such progress a tainted > bargain—economic growth on one hand, the loss of self-respect and community vitality on the other. (The law was passed, with only three votes against it.)

Postman gives us the intellectual tools to question today's technology:

> The most obvious question to be asked about any new technology—for example, interactive television, virtual reality, the Internet, or, for that matter, doorknobs and toasters that "understand" human speech—is, What is the problem to which this technology is the solution?
> What new problems might be created because we have solved this problem? The automobile solved some very important problems for most people, but in doing so, poisoned our air, choked our cities with traffic, and contributed toward the destruction of some of the beauty of our natural landscape. Antibiotics certainly solved some significant problems for almost all people, but in doing so, resulted in the weakening of what we call our immune systems. Television solved several important problems, but in solving them changed the nature of political discourse, led to a serious decline in literacy, and quite possibly made the traditional process of socializing children impossible.
> What sort of people and institutions might acquire special economic and political power because of technological change? This question needs to be asked because significant technological change always results in a realignment of power.
> …I find it useful to ask of any technology that is marketed as indispensable, What problem does it solve for me? Will its advantages outweigh its disadvantages? Will it alter my habits and language, and if so, for better or for worse
> I will use technology when I judge it to be in my favor to do so.

We've reached a point where the newest technology hype coming out of Silicon Valley offers only marginal benefits to our lives. Having an app that reserves a restaurant in 10 seconds is handy, but calling to make a reservation isn't particularly burdensome. Everyone is quick to look at the benefits that such technologies give, but what do we lose from them? Do we lose the basic ability to communicate with other people? Of having empathy and patience for our fellow man?

Postman also understands information is not knowledge, and that it's possible to have tons of information but stupid citizens who don't understand the political process that dominates them.

> …the concept of "information" was different from what it is today. Information was not thought of as a commodity to be bought and sold. It had no separate > existence, as it does in our age; specifically, it was not thought to be worthwhile unless it was embedded in a context, unless it gave shape, texture, or authority to a political, social, or scientific concept, which itself was required to fit into some world-view. No one was ridiculed more in the eighteenth century, especially by Jonathan Swift, than the pedant, the person who collected information without purpose, without connection to social life…

> The problem addressed in the nineteenth century was how to get more information to more people, faster, and in more diverse forms. For 150 years, humanity has worked with stunning ingenuity to solve this problem. The good news is that we have. The bad news is that, in solving it, we have created another problem, never before experienced: information glut, information as garbage, information divorced from purpose and even meaning.

There is no problem caused in today's society by a lack of information. Bad education is not caused by lack of information. Neither is crime, world hunger, or wars. Information without context is useless; it's mere trivia.

> It is also assumed that, as we proceed into a postmodern world, we are bereft of a narrative that can provide courage and optimism; that we are facing what Vaçlav Havel and others have called "a crisis in narrative." Old gods have fallen, either wounded or dead. New ones have been aborted. "We are looking," he said, "for new scientific recipes, new ideologies, new control systems, new institutions." In other words, we seek new narratives to provide us with "an elementary sense of justice, the ability to see things as others do, a sense of transcendental responsibility, archtypical wisdom, good taste, courage, compassion, and faith."8 No one must underestimate the difficulties in this.

And so what narrative have guys like me sought out? Tradition, masculinity, strength, conquest, hard-work. Technology doesn't fill a man's spirit, and neither does information. Like Postman, I have looked to the past for answers that can give me meaning today, because I know that consumer messages or new technology don't have the answer.

> There is very little the culture wants to do for children except to make them into consumers. A child is someone who has money to buy things. An adult is someone who has more money to buy things.
> The whole idea of schooling, now, is to prepare the young for competent entry into the economic life of a community so that they will continue to be devoted consumers.
> […]
> The average American graduate student cannot tell you, given a thousand-year margin of error, when the alphabet was invented, or, given a two-hundred-year > margin of error, when the printing press with movable type was invented, let alone say anything intelligible about the psychological or social implications of those inventions. To think that these are the people to whom we will entrust the uses of the information superhighway would be laughable if it weren't so dangerous.

> …the structure and authority of the family have been severely weakened as parents have lost control over the information environment of the young.

In the end, Postman argues that education has failed to teach reason and skepticism, two prime qualities of the Enlightenment. At the same time, having educated minds is a nation's best resource, creating citizens who can doubt authority and identify propaganda that hurts the nation. But we no longer aim to create this type of society in America. Instead, we give a tiny elite a proper education while the rest are reduced to the learning of facts and obedience. Let them have iPhones!

This book brought up a lot of good points, but it did meander at times. It'd be best if you read Amusing Ourselves To Death first. Unless you love that volume, you may not get too much value from this Postman offering.

Game Move: Go Dark

October 29, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

We have written here before about the mental benefits of going off the grid and unplugging for a while. What we haven't mentioned is that this technique can also be a boon to your game.

The move itself is very simple: take a set time off from all communication with existing girls. Don't schedule any dates, and cancel any that you have. Don't reply to any texts from girls, and don't initiate texts or calls. Approaching new prospects is acceptable, but do not call them during the window you have committed to. I find that 3-4 days works best, since it is long enough to be a conspicuous absence but not long enough for girls to forget about you. Here are three benefits from dropping this move into your repertoire:

1. Recharge Your Energy

Talking to multiple girls is time-consuming. Even if you're a master of laconic text game, you're devoting some brainpower to spacing them out, keeping leads warm, and showing up to dates/hangouts. Putting it all aside for a period of time helps you refocus mentally and reflect on what you want to do to improve. When you start spending too much time managing prospects, consider taking a break.

2. You Appear Scarce

This is the biggest game benefit of this tactic. Ignoring an attractive girl gives you the upper hand in the interaction and amplifies existing attraction (though it is important to note that it doesn't create it from scratch). This works best for westernized girls who will skewer you for appearing too needy, and ensures that you're erring on the side of being too aloof. This works if you have multiple girls, or if you have one girl you've been focusing on with regular communication.

3. Improves Focus On Your Other Projects

Gaming girls is fun. At the end of the day, though, it's the investments you make into yourself in other areas that create a lifestyle that helps you succeed with women, and fulfills you when your game goes through inevitable dry spells. During periods of going dark I am more productive at work, concentrate better on my hobbies, and focus more on on my meaningful friendships.

This is a move I like to use about once a month. Ideally, you're spinning 3-4 plates with sufficient but varying levels of interest. A girl may actually ask why you're ignoring her — if she does, congratulations. You've made yourself unavailable and increased her attraction for you. Though a newbie might find it painful to ignore a text or two, taking a few days off from the game is not going to ruin prospects that were otherwise invested in the interaction. When you return to the trenches, make no explanation of your absence, or at most a passing "I've been busy." Though they protest outwardly, your girls' lizard brains will respect you more for showing that they're not as big a part of your life as they assumed.

The Benefits Of Avoiding Fatherhood

October 29, 2013 | by bacon | Link | Original Link

In the last few years there have even been many articles and even books written by women expelling the virtues of avoiding motherhood. In fact any cursory glance at the majority of child-free websites or forums would show that 99% of the contributors are female. However much of the content about women avoiding motherhood is simply not applicable to men opting out of fatherhood.

For example, I think women have a different relationship with remaining childless because they need to reach a decision about becoming a parent relatively early in adulthood as after they reach 40, natural childbirth for them is a difficult thing to achieve. This is in stark contrast to men who can delay parenthood into old age as anybody who has traveled to South East Asia can attest to frequently seeing men in their 70´s having babies with younger wives and girlfriends.

As men, we tend to think of life logically and put our emotions aside when making decisions about what we want in our lives. Consciously or unconsciously most men realize the financial implications of having children because unlike women we cannot expect someone else to foot the bill for them. Even if you have no interest in having a child and have one by accident a man is aware of the power of the state to garnish his paycheck or even lock him up if he loses his job and falls behind paying child support.

Fatherhood Is Expensive

For those men with an interest in making it work with the mother or supporting the child beyond the minimum financial requirements, they are almost always signing up for large financial commitments. Consider that as a man without children you can choose to live close to work, giving you more free time since you have a smaller commute and without children you can live in a smaller more economical place. Compared to say a father who now needs a larger home with adequate space for the kids and that is located in a good school district and you begin to see how doing the right thing for your kids starts to become such an expensive undertaking.

From a strictly financial standpoint children no longer provide the return on investment they once had when 90% of the population were living on farms. Nor in 2013 America can they be relied on to provide long-term care to their parents as that work has now been outsourced to nursing homes at the first sign of trouble.

Fatherhood Has Opportunity Costs

To further illustrate the financial differences between the father and a child-free man you need to look at opportunity costs which can best be described as "the cost of an alternative that must be forgone in order to pursue a certain action." A man with kids puts the needs of his children first and in order to provide stability to his kids will usually pass on a promotion or job lead which requires a move to another city while a child-free man would have little to hold him back.

One must also examine the opportunity cost of the excess capital that the child-free man can have to make towards investments since his excess discretionary funds can help him build up a large investment portfolio. And perhaps the biggest opportunity cost lost to having children is that when you have only yourself to think about you are generally more willing to take on greater risk with starting one's own business rather than holding on to a steady job because you now can't afford to lose the health plan and guaranteed paycheck. Who knows how many startup and innovative companies are never built by family men not willing to risk going alone and instead need to hold onto their comfortable office job?

[image]

Fatherhood Comes With Less Freedom

The opportunity cost idea of having kids also addresses a lifestyle of freedom which is something men without children have in abundance since they are only responsible for themselves. As humans we are in a constant state of evolution and part of that involves making changes to your life when you feel it is the right thing to do. As such many fathers may find themselves working jobs they hate to support their family while they yearn for a change of lifestyle and to start a different career or even to expatriate.

Making changes to one's life which may be necessary to finding personal happiness are very difficult to do when you weigh your life down with the responsibility of providing for children. But beyond having the mobility to make vast lifestyle changes for many men the freedom achieved by never having kids might be something comparatively trivial like wanting to sleep in every weekend or not having to worry about finding a babysitter to engage in some fun with your friends. Personally I don't want to ever feel like a prisoner to the lifestyle and time obligations that come with correctly raising a child.

I think the freedom achieved in man's life by never having children speaks to a larger issue which is that you only get one shot at this life so you should live it with no regrets or in the case of children buyer's remorse. To help summarize this I defer to famous child-free bachelor George Clooney who when asked about his decision to not have kids replied:

> I remember Uncle George sitting in bed (death bed), 68 years old. He looked at me and said, 'What a waste.' … I came to the conclusion that I was not going to wake up one day in my 60s and say, 'What a waste.' I was going to grab as much out of this life as I could.

This quote addresses the issue that kids are a major lifestyle change and once they are in your life you do not get to hit the reset button. The lifestyle of having a family is not as necessary to male happiness as it is to women since men are more individualistic in nature and men are also less likely to feel a void without children.

While I do think some men are naturally paternal it is not encoded in all men, just look at the animal kingdom, how many male animals stay with the young? I think for the majority of men becoming a father is a learned behavior through social conditioning rather than an instinctive paternal nature. The fact is most men have little to no interest in dealings with babies and children and would rather spend their free time on their passions and hobbies.

Western Fathers Have Diminishing Rights

Historically society was aware of the sacrifice men made in providing for women and children and rewarded men by giving them dominion over their family. Unfortunately today this is no longer the case in many parts of the world (e.g. Anglosphere) and this has strongly disincentivized men from wanting to have children. Any objective look at the power of Child Protection Agencies and Law Enforcement would conclude that modern day fathers have been emasculated by the state and now they are no longer the head of the household.

To help illustrate this point consider that women can create false domestic violence accusations to have the man removed from the home (which he paid for) and by default receive custody of the children while accusations are investigated. The power of the state is especially visible when the relationship with the child´s mother ends and now the man must submit to the decisions made by the family court on mandates of child custody and child support. According the most recent US Census, "The majority of custodial parents were mothers (82.2 percent), and about 1 in 6 (17.8 percent) were fathers." With women overwhelmingly likely to become the custodial parent they can therefore expect to receive child support from the father which is money that they do not have to be accountable for in spending on the child.

Even in very public celebrity cases where the mother is receiving several thousand dollars a month to raise the child, society refuses to call this for what it really is: a wealth transfer from men to women who can use child support checks on whatever they want such as shoes, nails and handbags. Given that women can most always expect to receive custody of the child and by extension child support money every month it is no wonder that over 70% of divorces are initiated by women. Considering the environment men are dealing with is it any surprise that many men view the role of a father today as little more than that of a sperm donor and human wallet.

[image]

Fatherhood Does Not Bring Happiness

In the face of all the glaring disadvantages of being a father that have been discussed one would have to assume that the happiness a child brings to a parent makes all of those sacrifices worth it. That is until one looks at some of the limited studies that have been done on the subject. One of the first studies on the subject was done by famous advice columnist Ann Landers who did a survey in 1975 to see if people could do it over again would they have children and to the dismay of the American public 70% of those that wrote in to her said no. While that Ann Landers study was hardly scientific, it goes along with anecdotal stories online along the lines of "I hate being a father/mother." This suggests there is a disconnect about what society wants people to believe about parenthood.

Arguably the best scientific evidence evaluating parental satisfaction are happiness studies which conclude:

> In fact, people without kids were happier than any other group, including empty nesters . . . the conclusion was that marital quality often drops after the transition into parenthood, and that there is an increase in marital happiness after the children leave home.

Another study by Open University using 5,000 participants found that, “men with children emerged slightly less happy than those without.” Obviously it is politically incorrect for people to admit that children bring stress, make life difficult and often do not turn out the way many parents would like, so for a study to come out and state the uncomfortable reality that kids do not provide as much happiness as people think makes it difficult to kept arguing the position that having kids is worth it.

Fatherhood Requires Cognitive Dissonance

I have to assume many of the child-free men reading this may have trouble reconciling with the evidence about happiness and children because most people they know with children usually speak highly of it. My response to possible criticism is to point to a psychological theory known as cognitive dissonance. Cognitive dissonance can best be described as:

> …sometimes people hold a core belief that is very strong. When they are presented with evidence that works against that belief, the new evidence cannot be accepted. It would create a feeling that is extremely uncomfortable, called cognitive dissonance. And because it is so important to protect the core belief, they will rationalize, ignore and even deny anything that doesn’t fit in with the core belief. (Frantz Fanon).

Once one understands the theory of cognitive dissonance it becomes easier to make sense of why people who have invested so much time, money and energy in a lifestyle of raising children would even in the face of the many difficulties still only want to speak highly of child rearing.

I strongly believe that the decision to become a father is something no guy should take lightly because of its life changing implications. Many men become fathers by accident because they foolishly trust a girl to be using birth control or they find a girl they don't want to lose and they give into her demands for children. Therefore as men we need to be aware of the benefits of opting out of fatherhood because the pressure from one´s family, friends and significant other can make it difficult to go against the grain and stand your ground in avoiding becoming a dad.

How To Spot And Avoid A McDojo/Belt Factory

October 29, 2013 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

Martial arts is a study of discipline. While the main premise behind martial arts is self-defense the main benefit is self-discipline. Self-discipline is very difficult to come by, which is why so few people have it. Whether it is abstaining from hard drugs, not eating those donuts while on a diet, or saying no to a psycho ex who is promising you sex if you will get back together, people have a hard time resisting temptations that lead to bad places.

This is why martial arts has been so popular for thousands of years in Asian countries. It gives men a path to physical, mental, and spiritual self-improvement. If a student has progressed far enough he can even make a living teaching others his art.

A Bit of Background on Martial Arts

The origin of the “black belt” is a mostly American tradition. In Japan, a student was given a belt to tie around his waist in order to hold his pants up. This belt was seldom if ever washed. Over time it would turn green with grass stains, then brown from dirt stains. If he went to battle it might turn red from blood stains. If the soldier survived long enough this unimportant clothing accessory would start to rot and turn black. That is where the “black belt” comes from.

With globalization, the art was brought to the West in the mid-twentieth century. (The changes Communism brought to China also chased many kung fu masters out.) Things went well at first. Many men who lacked something in their lives pursued it with passion. At the time, many became so good that, in some states, anyone who acquired a black belt had to register with the police.

How Things Started To Go Wrong

Teaching true self-discipline required teachers to maintain high-level standards that many students could not meet. A teacher, facing financial problems when starting out or simply to make more money, would lower his standards in order to keep more students. These students would receive black belts they didn’t deserve it and, in turn, would go on to teach others — lowering the standards further. These schools might become good money-makers for their owners, but the students they produced were sub-standard.

Since these schools took on the most students, and produced the most black belts, the faster they spread what's known as the McDojo.

[image]

Today, I'd estimate 80-90 percent of all martial arts schools can be classified as McDojos at some level. Of course, some will be more than others. Perhaps you don't want a Navy Seal-level training commitment at this point in your life (I don't), but make sure what you are spending your time and money at is not a waste of both.

But Why Does It Matter

The problem with McDojos being so numerous is students who are passionate about martial arts and have what it takes to make it in one of the real schools will often simply find the martial arts school that is most convenient for them to get to. They are beginners and don't know how to identify a real school from a fake one. This is bad for the student and bad for the real instructor because if he sets standards that are too high for the average person and he only gets a few prospective students a year come into his school then he will be forced to close or lower his standards just enough to stay open and become a pseudo-Mcdojo out of necessity.

I am not opposed to people having entrepreneurial spirit and making money, but people go to McDojos to learn self-defense and people who think they know something but don't get into trouble as this story demonstrates.

"when a school opens and you go to see the instructor, and he looks like what he does is a lot like the things you see on TV, you tend to believe that they really do know what they are doing"

You can buy a uniform and black belt online for less than $50.

"In 2 years I did get my black belt. I went through the test with a dozen other people…and amazingly enough we all passed"

"Most of us stayed and went for our 2nd degree black belts. And then third."

Then later one of these guys got into a real fight.

"one of the guys who blazed his way through to black belt in 2 years and stuck with it along with me was beaten up in a way I didn't think anyone could survive. He was a mass of ripped flesh and broken bones and blood"

"He says now that he was confident until he was hit with the first punch. All that kata practice hadn't taught him how to block effectively…We're not black belts. We're a bunch of well conditioned dancers."

Martial arts does build confidence. However, confidence that lasts until the first punch is as useful as game that lasts until your first approach.

"We didn't spar. We weren't allowed to compete. The reason given that sport held no place in his teaching…We were conned. This joker left his own instructor as a blue belt with only 2 years instruction"

How To Prevent This From Happening To You

This is why, if you ever decide to start studying martial arts, learn some of the red flags of a McDojo. Here are a few common ones.

1. Are there black belts who are children

2. Are students going through different belt levels very quickly and getting a black belt after only a few years

3. Lack of sparring or no contact sparring

4. A teacher whose credentials are unbelievable for someone his age

These are pretty common. Here are two more I would like to add.

Your teacher rarely corrects your technique. Practice does not make perfect. Practice makes permanent. When you come into a school on day one I guarantee there are many things wrong with your kicks, punches, posture, stances, and everything else. If your teacher does not correct them he either doesn't care or doesn't know any better himself. Practicing imperfect technique makes it harder to unlearn later and increases your chance of sport injuries. Only by knowing the corrections that you need to make and making them can you get the discipline to make your martial arts…better, not perfect.

Are you afraid of the higher level students? You should be. They are supposed to be better than you. You probably won't be practicing with your teacher very much so the best way to qualify the effectiveness of a school's curriculum is by the upper level students. Do you want what they have? If not, the school is not for you.

4 Reasons Why American Women Are Gross

October 30, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

I spent this past week with a Russian girl I met in Moscow, who was visiting America for the first time. Aside from how refreshing it is to be around a non-American woman, it magnified the extreme differences between these women. My experience with her both in private and in public reminded me how gross American women are and, consequently, what it is like to be around a real woman.

1. Appearance

American women just don't care about their appearances. This comes across both in physical body manifestation as well as choice of wardrobe. Granted this is an extreme example, but the Russian girl wore a dress and heels to go on a short hike because she said it was more important she look good for her pictures than be comfortable. Even though she got stares and some comments, and maybe deservedly so considering it was almost 80 degrees out on a hiking trial, I looked around and couldn't help but smile. I was surrounded by dumpy lesbian looking girls wearing spandex pants when they shouldn't be and chowing down a "health" bar. I'd take this extreme concern for beauty over complete lack of care for one's presentation.

That is just one example. Think of how many times you walk around the US and see American girls in flats, unkempt, and generally disheveled. Even more sad is that they are proud of being fat, and almost display it as a sign of prosperity. Have you seen girls with muffin tops wearing baby tees? Of course you have, even in places like Los Angeles where it is generally known that people care about image. Take a look at this picture I snapped during a Halloween party at a club. She was one of several girls that had no problem, reservation or hesitation with displaying their fat rolls and fat asses for the public to see. Gross.

2. Age

In most other countries in the world, when a girl exceeds the age of 25 she is no longer in clubs or bars partying the nights away. She is no longer single and hunting for men. She is not out with her friends getting plastered on a Saturday night, only to wake up the next morning and put on some sweatpants to waddle over to Starbucks and get a latte.

Yet in America, women seem to be oblivious to the fact that as they age nobody wants to see them out partying. Or having drinks. Or having a girls' night out. Or wearing that slutty dress. Stay home ladies. It is not attractive to see the crow's feet face when the bars close and the lights turn on. Here's a little surprise for you — the only reason "cougars" enjoy any success is because men are horny as hell and are open to banging a variety of women. That does not mean he will ever choose you over your 22-year-old counterpart.

Even if you managed to stay thin (bravo to you), you are still old and need to realize that before cats take over your life. Not to mention you may be pushing the same age as the guy's mother. The looser skin, looser vagina, and all around weathering is a turn off. Gross.

[image]

* Disclaimer: They do however consistently give great head. I guess decades of practice at anything will make you an expert.

3. Demeanor

Because I am focusing on American girls, I have to draw on my previous experiences with other cultures to make the distinction. Outside America, girls walk around with class and dignity. They wear heels out, they exude sexuality in a subtle way. It's hard to explain unless you've been there. But it's easy to explain how American girls act.

They curse like sailors. "Can you fucking believe what that asshole did?" You will walk by during the day and overhear a phone conversation about a guy's sexual performance or see girls at a bar sharing dick pics. Whereas girls in other countries are careful to remain ladylike, girls here seem to go out of their way to display their masculinity and over the top callousness.

Go to Argentina or Brazil and you will see couples making out in the streets, in parks, even restaurants. However this is refreshing rather than disgusting as it stems from actual affection and desire for one another, and not just some drunken oral play that later can turn out to be supposed rape.

They get absolutely tanked. Falling all over the place. Taking pisses on the street behind food trucks. This weekend I had to watch a chunky girl get fingerbanged on the dance floor while her fat friends stood around and rooted her on. Simply gross.

[image]

4. Sex

There are many benefits for men to discontinue watching porn. But I think it's time for the ladies to lay off the damn porn too. Like any other guy I enjoy a good hard romp in the bed, and like to get a little crazy here and there. But American girls take it to another level. We already know all girls like rough sex; however that doesn't mean you have to be a filthy whore about it. Almost like clockwork, every American girl when you trespass her vaginal walls turns into a porn star. "Pound your cock in me!" "Fuck that pussy!" "Say I'm your slut!" And so on. It is almost like if you don't pile drive them six ways to sideways while choking them and then cumming on their faces then you are a weak man. This is likely why so many of us enjoy the hunt more than the actual act of sex, which to me has lost its allure in America.

Having sex with a Brazilian is intense. Having sex with a Russian is passionate. It is amazing to see a girl silent with words yet vocal in her body's shuddering and reactions. At most you get an "oh god" or "oh yes" in their native tongue. Regardless of what country you insert in the previous sentences, it hands down beats out these American girls…the ones that request you to stick it in their ass while fish-hooking their mouths with your finger as you push their head down into the pillows and finish on their buttholes like a human toilet. Gross.

Why You Should Try Sober Game

October 30, 2013 | by Roberto Nascimento | Link | Original Link

I love to drink. Maybe not as much as your typical Friday night out crew, but I enjoy it. But if I am out to game, I will almost always choose doing it sober. I want to narrow down the pros and cons of you drinking when it comes to game:

Pros

- Fun, social mood
- Less hesitation
- Drink can be used as a tool (ie. allowing her to sip your drink to build comfort)

Cons

- Money
- Too many drinks and you can severely hinder your game
- Too many and it can affect how you feel the next day

I'd take the pros over the cons for drinking. Besides, these cons aren't really a factor unless you drink too much. Now, the pros and cons of you staying sober:

Pros

- Remember the night with more accuracy
- More control over yourself and your interactions
- Ability to read smaller signals (e.g., if she is constantly touching her hair, touching you in subtle ways, showing signs she is nervous)

Cons

- Can be harder to get in social and fun mood

- More hesitation, depending on your level of game

Those are pretty much the basics. I'd like to discuss the more in-depth differences between being sober and drinking while out, as some of it cannot be explained by simple bullets. First, let us start with the topic of state.

State

When you drink, your night always starts on a high. Your state is amplified by the alcohol. You are on top of the world. You don't have to be drunk and falling over to achieve this, and often enough a few drinks are enough to reach this sweet spot. Problem is, there is nowhere to go but down. Throughout the course of the night, your state will slowly start to decrease. Drinking throughout the night can slow this process, but the decline is inevitable.

When you are sober, it is the opposite. You start on a low. With experience out sober, you become accustomed to it so that it is not a detriment. Inevitably, with the night starting out and approaches occurring, you start to increase your state. You build social momentum. At the end of the night, you are on a high, and potentially even more so than the high you get from being drunk.

That is not to say you can't build momentum while drinking. Although I believe it has the potential to be stronger when you are sober. I am not saying because of your decline in state you will have a hard time pulling a girl at the end of the night either. However, I believe you have greater potential if you are on a high sober state, as opposed to a drunk state.

Extraversion

Some people say you are either an introvert, or an extrovert. Some say that you can be somewhere in the middle. I say create another option; you could be all of the above.

I was always classified as a more introverted person. When I drank, I became more social, bringing out the extraverted side to me. I had the potential to become life of the party with the right amount of booze. But never sober.

When I was out at night, I would become more social and witty around girls. Extraverted traits are necessary in night-time environments when it comes to cold approaching. And this is no surprise, as drinking exposes the extraverted side to you. But if you are an introvert, and find you can only be more extraverted when you are drunk, then you are relying on alcohol to meet people and be social.

This can be changed. That extrovert side to you? You don't need alcohol to become it. In fact, its interesting by taking a perspective where you can learn from your 'drunk self'. Personally, I would reflect on how I would act drunk, socially. If I was talking louder and with more confidence, if I was more direct with my touching without any drawbacks, if I was less hesitant in the split second before an approach, and so forth.

I started doing these things sober. It was challenging at first, but I learned to calibrate. If I can act that way drunk, I can act the same way sober. Eventually, I found it just flowed naturally in the right environment. You learn to become high energy.

By doing this, you unlock the extraverted side to you, without requiring alcohol. You learn that you can be introverted or extraverted, depending on your mood and situation. Contrast that with someone who is always 'introverted' and when they go out they can't stand that they must drink just so they are able to talk to attractive strangers.

Inner Game

Now for what I believe is the most important part of sober game. When I first started going out and getting my first kisses and make outs and slight successes, I loved it. However, I was always drunk. I felt like alcohol was my crutch. And truth is, for many guys, if not most, it is.

I wanted to be able to do the same thing, sober. Being able to make out with a girl I just met minutes ago sober was a challenge for me already. After a tough learning curve in getting used to the night environment sober, I eventually accomplished that goal. Then, I imagined myself pulling and getting a one night stand. I had never had one before, and if I could do it sober, I would be proud of myself. Once I did that, I felt a very strong high after my achievement.

Which brings me to my next point, inner game. I believe attaining success with women without requiring alcohol, and being in a sober state builds deep confidence. Not the type you choose to exhibit, or are aware of. Ever since I started to become really comfortable going out sober, I've had more people respond to me. Guys avoid eye contact and look down, girls show more interest and shyness. Also have had some very direct compliments from girls I had not been accustomed to:

> ‘I figured out why I’m so awkward around you. You’re so confident with yourself it is intimidating.’

On the other hand, success with women while drunk builds drunk confidence. A buddy of mine is great with girls. He doesn’t get needy, teases, escalates, and shows some ‘natural’ qualities. Problem is, he can only do this drunk. When he is sober, or only one or two drinks in, he is like a scared rabbit. This doesn’t mean everyone only has drunk confidence, but this is widely the case. Roosh has mentioned the following before in his book Day Bang:

> “The average man will die before doing a cold approach while sober.”

I also wanted to feel in the same state all the time. If I was out during the day on my university campus in between studying and lecture and I saw an attractive girl sitting by herself reading a book on a bench, I wanted to know I could do well, because I do great in the exact same state at just a different time of day. It’s not as difficult to integrate day approaches into your life when you approach at night in the same state you are in all the time.

To conclude, I want to make it clear that I don’t have any hate against drinking on nights out. I still do the occasional night where I’ll drink and rip the fun benefits that alcohol brings. But I do appreciate doing nights out sober. I know many of you can have great nights out while drunk, and can pull successfully at the end of the night.

Game is game.

But I definitely encourage giving sober game a try. Even if it means only to learn how it affects your state. Or how much you can learn about your drunk self. And maybe see how it affects you internally. At worst you’ll save some money and maybe a hangover in the morning.

A Rose By Any Other Name Still Reeks of Women's Entitlement

October 30, 2013 | by RickDerris | Link | Original Link

I live in Austin, Texas, the most overrated city on the planet, and although I would not care to hang out with Mr. Romeo Rose, I wanted to write about his plight.

Not sure who Romeo Rose is? You must not plugged in to the awesome (sarc) Austin social media scene. Fortunately, I'm not either, so I found out about him from a friend who wastes too much time on social media.

Apparently, Mr. Rose was a local wanna-be musician and part-time wedding photographer who, according to an Austin grrrl power reporterette, calls his awful guitar "the most beautiful guitar in the universe." Any musician who would say such a thing without prefacing it "after the Frankenstrat or Jimi's Fender" is indeed a clown. He's also allegedly a 9/11 troofer. Not exactly the kind of guy I would want to party with. There were also other allegations involving the man, but I am leaving those out because I could not find better substantiation of the claims (granted, I wasn't about to spend hours looking this up).

Mr. Rose "rose" to prominence recently after he posted a website seeking his ideal Mrs. Right at SleeplessInAustin.com. He is so sleepless that he's even offering a finder's fee to anybody who can help him find a girl. On the site he included a list comprising thirty-nine paragraphs of what the future Juliet should be to this Romeo. And what is he looking for? Let me quote him (sic throughout):

- "I want the girl to be attractive."
- "I like girls that are thin, or with a toned or athletic build. . . . I will not date a overweight or fat girl."

- “I also like girls with long hair. I like a girl to look like a girl, not a man, I like a feminine, pretty girl.”
- “I will not date a girl that does not have a job or career.”
- “I do not like tattoos on a woman.”
- “I do not like glasses on a girl.”
- “I do not like strippers! I will not date any girl that has ever been a stripper.”
- “I will not date any girl that has ever had a threesome, or a large number of past sexual partners. I do not want a promiscuous slut.”
- “I will not date any girl that can not always be honest & faithful to me.”
- “I prefer a woman that has never had children.”

OK, so it sounds like he isn’t looking for Eva Angelina. I can understand that; he prefers redheads, so… well, I can’t think of the names of any redheaded chicks right now, so this wise-ass comment just died.

But, as a man, I can completely understand where he is coming from. Who among us wants to date a fatty? Who among us wants a girl who looks like a man or even a post-op tranny? Do you want to date a fug? Are lazy, unemployed, skanky, slutty, tatted-up strippers your cup of tea for a long-term relationship? Hell, no!

So why am I even discussing this guy? Well, he included this item:

- “I will not date a Black girl. I don’t care if she looks like Halle Berry, I will not ever date a Black girl.”

OK, so this was a “d00d WTF were you thinking???” moment, mainly because I still dig Vanessa Williams, but if that is the way he feels, well, to each his own.

But his list and final point listed above opened the floodgates of h8red from the haters in the Cathedral.

The harridans at Jezebel unloaded on him.

So did the chicks at Salon.

And the “men” at Gawker.

Then the Huffington Post joined the fray, and even arranged an interview between Mr. Rose and Ms. Caitlyn Becker, their not-exactly-svelte reporter.

The Cathedral pounced like an angry animal as soon as they had the chance to scream RACIST! at Mr. Rose. Within a few days of this man’s rather silly and innocuous website going live he went from a local with a clownish reputation to the latest example of the RACIST AmeriKKKan patriarchy.

Now, before I proceed, I’d like to ask a few questions of Ms. Becker:

- Would you date a guy shorter than you?
- What about a guy who does not earn over $100,000 per year?
- What about a guy with an educational background not as “stellar” as yours?

Yup, just what I thought. No, no and no.

The entire Romeo Rose affair isn't about the media calling out a fool who made bigoted comments. Instead, it's another obnoxious display of the double-standard employed by wimmin regarding preferences in a partner. I'm sure Ms. Becker, the women at Jizzabel, the women at Salon, and (most likely) the "men" at Gawker all have their list of 300+ firm requirements in a man. And a good portion of these will be related to looks. Meanwhile, a local goofball has now become a national whipping boy for daring to list in thirty-nine paragraphs what he'd like to see in a woman.

How dare he have standards!

But I will leave Mr. Rose with one piece of advice: you won't find your Juliet in Austin. Not in a town where the feminists and their manboob allies would rather have mob rule than a democratic process adhering to procedural rules.

Maybe Verona, Italy would be a better place to start looking.

How To Close With Women: Part 1

---

Gentlemen, now we finally get to the fun part: Closing. Closing separates the men from the boys, the players from the played and the Casanovas from the one-bang wonders. Crack open a Red Bull and take notes, this is going to be fun.

My last article left off with the Starbucks Slut feeling flirty with you. Because of the great escalation tips you followed, she's now into you more than ever, so the million dollar question is: How do you get her from the bar to getting naked?

Unless she directly says, "Let's get out here and go to my apartment", then you have to put in some work. Odds are, most girls will want to be led and it's your job to make it seamless and natural. The best way to warm her up to going to your spot or hers is to make a Location Transition. Simply put, take her somewhere else BEFORE the offer to hit up your spot or hers.

You're at the bar with her and she's being very flirty, touching you and you've already kissed her. Now some may disagree with kissing her at the venue, but based on my extensive experience, if she DOESN'T kiss you while at the bar, she more than likely will not be down with going to your pad. A girl's interest level can be strongly determined by her willingness to kiss you while on the date. The key here is to LEAD. Here's an example:

You: "Let's check out XYZ bar. It's a block away."

Her: "Ok."

Take her by the hand and walk to the next bar. Now you may be wondering why another bar? Why not take her to the tasty burrito shack next door? Hear me loud and clear:

Food stops are the DEATH of the one night stand. Stopping for food after drinking, is like calling all your buddies to come to the bar right before you plan on taking her home. Why the fuck would you cockblock yourself? Food sobers people up and brings the excitement of the night to a close and quickly. Fuck food. If you want to go get food after you swoop her, then by all means go stuff your face with pizza after the dirty deed is done.

Taking the Starbucks Slut to the next bar accomplishes 2 very important things:

1. Builds Comfort

2. Grows The Experience

Building Comfort is key to getting her in the state of mind of having a one night stand. If she doesn't feel safe with you at the bar, she sure as shit won't feel safe enough to go to your pad. By taking her to another bar, you've created Comfort In Transient: the transition of one venue to another, while creating an enraptured experience.

Now here's a tip that I rarely give out but it's money:

When you walk down the street with her, make sure that she is walking on your side furthest from the street. If you walk out of the bar and make a right, she should be on your right side closest to the buildings and vice versa. This started way back in the day when you and I weren't even thought of and stems from the streets being unpaved. Horse and carriages would hit puddles and the water would splash onto the sidewalks. The guy would walk closest to the street to block the water from hitting the girl.

Now you might think that that's 'beta', but let me tell you something: having 'gentleman' traits that reveal themselves in glimpses through your Alpha state, is golden. And if you're sincerely worried about getting splashed on, then you might need to move. Last time I check most roads are paved and free of massive pothole puddles.

If she is walking on the ‘wrong’ side and you physically guide her to your opposite side and she asks why you did that, tell her why. Do it in a fun and easy way. She’ll love it and don’t be surprised if you see that special look in her eyes where you know it’s in the bag.

When you take her to the bar, hold her hand or put your arm around her shoulder/neck. Drape your arm on her shoulders and pull her in close randomly to kiss her. Girls love this and it’s fun as fuck. Having a cute girl beside you while you walk down the street is one of life’s simplest joys.

When you enter the bar, immediately order a shot and do it with her. Kiss her immediately after the shot. By doing these exact strategic ‘moves’, you’re Growing The Experience. She will have had fun in the simple walk from one bar to another and her comfort will increase in knowing you’re not a pyscho killer.

There’s a million excuses you can say to get her back to your place, and I’ll cover a few here, however, there is one that stands above all others that has literally NEVER failed me. Say and do this.

You: “You want to be my girl tonight?”

Her: “Yes” (she may just nod her head yes, or smile and kiss you)

Give her a quick kiss on the lips and continue with your night. It might sound crazy, but this phrase, for some reason, is absolute gold with girls. I haven't even figured out exactly why it works so well, but I believe it touches girls in an emotional way where they are completely aware of what you're talking about, without you having to spell it out. It also cuts through alot of the bullshit that you may jump through, just to find out she's not down to transition to your pad anyway.

Lets recap: You've successfully made the transition from the initial venue to the second venue, while building comfort and growing her experience. You've also asked if she wants to be your girl for the night and she's agreed. Now, it's time for you to transition her from the second venue to your spot. For the sake of simplicity, we will approach this scenario with you having your own spot. I'll cover in a future article the possibilities if you do not have your own spot.

After the Starbuck's Slut agrees to be your girl for the night, then you have a couple of options: Be direct or indirect. Experience will guide you in knowing which approach is the best one based on the girl. Direct can backfire, so choose wisely, but whichever one you choose, do it with confidence. Confidence is half the battle with what you say to a girl and it's effectiveness.

Here's some practical examples of Direct and Indirect Pad Transitions.

Direct Examples:

#1.

You: "This bar can't handle us. Let's go to my spot for a bit."

Her: "Hmmm…and what are we going to do there?"

You: "Play checkers and write down our life goals"

Her: (laughing) "Okayyyy…as long as you bring me back to my car. I don't want to get towed."

You: “I got you doll.” (taking her hand and leaving.)

#2.

You: “Lets get out of here.”

Her: “And go where?”

You: “My spot. It’s more exciting.”

Her: “Ok”

#3.

You: “You down for an adventure?”

Her: “I love adventure. What kind?”

You: “It’s a secret. Yes or no?”

Her: “Hmmm, okay I guess. But have me home before it gets too late.”

You: “Done” (Taking her hand and leaving)

The adventure example is an excellent one when the chemistry is high and her interest level in you has skyrocketed. Simply take her to your pad. The act of going to your pad IS the adventure and when done properly she’ll be head over heels.

An Indirect Pad Transition (IPT) is one where an excuse is used to transition to your pad.

Indirect Examples:

#1.

You: “I just got this sick aquarium and I have baby sharks. No joke. Let’s swing by my spot quick and I’ll show you.”

Her: “Sharks? Really?? No way!”

You: “Yes way.”

Her: “I’m down”

You: “Cool, let’s go” (Taking her by the hand and leaving)

#2.

Let’s say that you mentioned on the date that you are an artist or a musician. Girls love artists and musicians and any display of your talent is generally a turn on for her. The key is to be casual about it and do NOT use it to impress her; instead use it as an excuse to transition to your pad.

You: “I just got this sick guitar and when I get buzzed I want to play music. Down for a mini-concert?”

Her: “I love guitar players (giggling). Yes.”

You: “Don’t turn into a groupie” (wink)

Her: “Can’t promise I won’t”

You: “Fine. Let’s go.” (Taking her hand and leaving)

#3.

This one is extremely indirect, but let’s say that you actually picked her up for the date. I don’t suggest picking her up, but perhaps she doesn’t have a car etc.

You: “Before I drop you off, I have to pick up XYZ at my spot.”

Her: “Ok.”

When you get to your spot, invite her in for “just one more drink”, and escalate from there. Girls are not stupid when it comes to this, BUT it provides a rational reason for them to come into your house and not feel like a slut.

Sidebar: IF you drove, take a cab to your spot. Do NOT drive drunk. Nothing will cockblock you worse then getting pulled over and getting a DUI. It’s not worth it. Take a cab and come back later for your car. Also, you can be escalating by making out with her while the cabbie drives, which helps keep the flow of physical touch moving along at a good pace. By the time you get to your spot, she’s ‘warmed up’ for the main event: getting naked.

Next week, Closing 2 will break down exactly the keys to getting her naked and having some great sex. Until then, check out http://www.NightclubBible.com and enter in the discount code of: ONSPUSSY to get it for only $19.99. The sale expires in 24 hours.

Why Did A High School Prank Lead To A Young Man's Suicide?

Hyper-sensitivity and political correctness were once merely annoying. Now they are killing people. And somewhere between being culpable of annoyance and being guilty of homicide, hyper-sensitivity started sapping the strength of a once proud American culture. Now we are bone dry.

Just look at these headlines:

- "7th graders suspended for playing with airsoft gun in own yard"
- "Kentucky bans postgame handshakes for high school athletes"
- "8-year-old Florida boy suspended for making gun shape with fingers: 'It was a game.'"
- "Joseph Lyssikatos, 12, suspended over gun-shaped key chain"
- "New York school bans balls, tag during recess"
- "Tahoma High School students wear Confederate flags in alleged anti-gay statement"

And now this one:

Boy, 15, kills himself after 'facing expulsion and being put on sex offender registry' for streaking prank at high school football game

From the article:

> "Christian Adamek hanged himself on October 2 and died from his injuries 2 days later – a week after he streaked at his high school football game. He was arrested and school district recommended he face a court hearing. If convicted of indecent exposure, he'd have gone on sex offender's list."

I'd like to say this incident was tragic, or that it was the sad result of an unfortunate circumstance. But this is the tired and insipid vocabulary of gutless school administrators and sociopathic local police chiefs. These are the tedious words the President might use, if he could bring himself to comment on the outrageous loss of a young boy who isn't black.

Who is to blame?

The boy, for one, because he took his own life. It wasn't as if he was helplessly gunned down on his way back from buying Skittles and iced tea (criminals and thugs don't eat Skittles, or drink iced tea). He chose to hang himself. Maybe his family is somewhat to blame for not noticing the signs of his desperation, but that is purely speculative. Maybe I am to blame. I suppose I should have dedicated some more effort into cultivating a society that equally accepts Confederate flags, firearms, and streaking – whereby young children (exclusively males, you might have noticed) don't have to fear being young children. Maybe you're to blame.

Every time I lose the courage to say something that I believe, intimidated by the sick society of demagogues and automatons that surround me, I could be failing to give a suicidal 15-year-old the one glimmer of hope he needs to escape a desperate situation. That is why I will never choose to hide in the shadows while fools and knaves casually strip away the threads of our culture in broad daylight, unchallenged.

Have you heard the speech that Dr. Ben Carson gave at the National Prayer Breakfast in February of this year? It garnered national attention because the good Doctor critiqued a number of President Obama's domestic policies while the President sat two chairs away from the speaker. In the first six minutes, Dr. Carson talks about political correctness and sensitivity, and he makes valuable points that are germane to this topic. I encourage you to watch the first six minutes.

How can it be stopped?

This may be too little too late, but here is something I just wrote. I wish I'd known this kid, Christian, and I wish I could have been there in the moments before he decided to take his life, because this is what I would have said to him…

Christian, you probably don't realize right now what you are dying for. I imagine you are so petrified that you haven't thought of anything beyond yourself and the consequences of your actions, so I want to give you some perspective.

Unfortunately, I don't know the exact circumstances of your situation, and since I can't ask you, I'll have to make some assumptions. Allow me assume you are planning to kill yourself primarily because you think your life is ruined. If you are convicted in court, you will be permanently added to the sex offender registry. You will be marked and known, everywhere you go, for the rest of your life. You won't be able to get into colleges you want to attend. It will be incredibly difficult to hold jobs that don't involve handing coffee and donuts through a window. You feel helpless, and the sociopath principal at your high school, Michael Campbell, isn't giving you much hope:

> "Campbell added that the incident was not just a prank and needed to be treated seriously."

Here is the big picture. You are a victim, but you're not the only one. There are many like you, and most of them are also men, young and old. You see, in this brave new society we've constructed, men are something like public enemies. By our nature, we can be violent, aggressive, and also courageous. But you live in a society that values none of those things. The conventional wisdom of the society you live in has created these platitudes that everyone must accept and repeat: violence is never a solution; do not be aggressive, be agreeable; do not be courageous, say only the things that everyone else says, do the things that everyone else does, and never cross the line.

You, my friend, crossed the line. Now, streaking isn't the grandest form of civil disobedience. Or at least it shouldn't be, but the seriousness with which your case is being treated now leads me to believe otherwise. If you brought a Confederate flag or a gun key chain to school, then you would be making a statement worthy of national media attention. Streaking sounds like a typical high school endeavor, perhaps worthy of a couple of days suspension. You probably thought the same thing before you pulled off your clothes and did the deed. But you, and I, have forgotten we live in a new world, where streaking might have offended someone. Your deed was seen no longer as mischief, but as a serious indicator of what you, and all men, are destined to become; crazed, violent, rapists who need to be put on a list.

There is no evidence for what I'm about to say, but I will bet you my wardrobe that your Principal, Michael Campbell, was put under some heavy pressure. Someone somewhere convinced him that your streaking was "more than a prank". It was symbolic of something else, he was told. Perhaps he convinced himself of this fact; there is no telling how poisoned his own mind has become after years in the pressure cooker of modern academia.

But in either case, Michael Campbell believed that your prank went beyond mere mischief. Your prank was viewed in some way as an expression of male dominance. Perhaps he thought that in a few years time, you'd be just another sex offender like the rest of us men. Perhaps when you were streaking across the football field, feeling the wind on your bare man flesh, a single mother in the bleachers gasped and experienced an emotionally-forced flashback to her college years when she drank herself blind every weekend and throttled every young college buck in sight, including the one she didn't remember raping her.

It is hard to pinpoint exactly from where these overreactions originate, but that is not the lesson. The lesson is that the society you live in has spent a lot of time cultivating an environment that allows psychotics, sociopaths, and the otherwise mentally disturbed to crucify transgressing dissenters who have offended someone, somewhere, for some reason. It does not matter how deranged the accuser is, or how flimsy the claim. It only matters that no one is offended, and to ensure that end, all of the most extreme measures will be taken.

Now that you have some perspective about the world you live in, let's answer the question. For what, exactly, are you dying?

You are dying to appease a sick and broken society. Your death will be given a news article and some meaningless words of empty regret, but then you will be lost in memory, and the wheels will grind on. The hyper-sensitives will work tirelessly, without conscience, to makes examples out of people like you, and not one of those lunatics will consider the consequences of their actions. Your death will have no effect of them. You, only for a second, got in the way of their main goal to equalize, to kill rational thought, and to create an imaginary world where no one is offended ever.

Despite your death, those who cross the line will be continue to be nailed to their crosses. They will be put on display atop a high hill wearing their gun-shaped key chains, or their Confederate flag t-shirts, or in your case, nothing at all.

You have many years left to live, and you've done fantastic work so far for such a young age. If you manage through the remainder of your life without offending anyone, you will have gone through life without believing anything of consequence, fearful to step on the wrong toes. And that might be the worst thing you could do—even worse than streaking across a football field during your high school game.

Lady Gaga Has A New Slut Anthem

October 31, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

If nothing else, pop music can reveal the values and tastes of a generation. The lyrics are simple, the message is bare. You don't have to think long and hard to understand the song's message. Pop songs give us valuable clues about what people of a certain generation believe and feel. And there's no room to hide what you really mean – it's all there for the ear to hear. In polite speech, people hide their true intents. Indeed, if you spoke as honestly as songs do, people would think you were alternately a psychopath, a sap, a rapist, degenerate a coward. But in a song, carte blanche.

There's a growing chorus of men critical of Western women. They're dismissed as misogynists, balding rapists with tiny members living in their mothers' basements. Their sin – they transgress the 11th commandment as Marc Rudov calls it: Thou Shalt Not Criticise A Female. Let us accept these scholarly denunciations, and instead watch the American woman hoist with her own petard. Her own honest account is more damning than a male observer's could ever be.

In relationships, there are two extremes of women. The first is one who commits to a man, whom she loves and cherishes, but she refuses to copulate with him – this is the prude. The logical opposite of the prude is the woman who shows no great love or respect for a man, but surrenders her body nonetheless. This woman is the slut. Both are dysfunctional; their relationships are mired in discord and end in failure.

The healthy woman avoids both these fates, by surrendering herself to a man, but only to the one who has her affection and reverence.

In Lady Gaga's new song (embedded at the top of the page), the central refrain is:

> Do what you want
> What you want with my body

In the chorus, she adds:

> You can't have my heart, and
> You won't use my mind but
> Do what you want (with my body)

You can sleep with me, but you can't have my heart or my mind. I won't love you and I won't revere you. But when it comes to my body, use me as you like. In real terms, I will lick your asshole but don't dare ask me to cook you breakfast the morning after.

This is the anthem of the slut. She has declared submission to a man forbidden. He will never have her heart. Her heart and mind are elsewhere. Where exactly, it's not clear. She refuses to take a man as her master. But it's not because she loves freedom. She wouldn't know what to do with it.

She already has a master; man has been made superfluous. Her career, her friends, her FOMO YOLO ethos… there just isn't any room left in her life for feminine submission and dedication. All he has left to offer is a tumescent shaft and costly treats. His value is in the orgasms he incites, the gifts he offers, as R. Kelly sings:

> I could be the drink in your cup
> I could be the green in your blunt
> Your pusher man
> Yeah I got what you want

There's her dream of having the kitchen with granite countertops, the Range Rover to tote the kids to soccer practice, and the palatial wedding of course – the man is a mere enabler. Naturally, the man is reduced to an accessory and a status item, much like her purse. This has long been a temptation to which women are drawn, none more so in America where materialism abounds. But it was restrained and shamed, by communal shame and material scarcity. Those shackles are gone now, and the Western woman is as brazen and vulgar as ever.

And the Western man only knows how to obey, to man up and be her personal house negro, in the words of Malcolm X. The Western man loves this woman more than he loves himself… when the woman's heart is all but closed to him.

The greatest master of them all is the man she let into her heart – and he never left. She is the 'Alpha Widow,' and he is the 'The Great White Buffalo.' She never recovered from his rejection of her. Had she married her first love, this would all be a quaint, abstract fear. But she's a career woman who will marry not a day before age 27… and she broke her heart already at 17. A decade or so is time plenty to leave her brittle and senseless in time for her husband. Every man after the first chips away at her ability to love. For a man to accept her and commit to her now is to admit that he is inferior to the man who rejected her, to whom she was once committed. Perhaps even she is put off by a man lowly enough to commit to her.

Lest she love and be scorned once more, she hardens her heart:

> Sometimes I'm scared I suppose
> If you ever let me go
> I would fall apart
> If you break my heart
> So just take my body
> And don't stop the party

She sings from experience – the last time she let a man have her mind, he eventually dumped her. So now she steels herself – 'Just fuck me, I won't love you because I don't want to risk breaking my heart over you.' And besides, that would just get in the way of her 'partying.' She parties to ward off the numb void that is her life. The road to her heart is closed; best aim for her vagina then. Gaga has spoken.

With any luck, Gaga will impel American women to new heights of whoredom.

Boobies Are Pink, Men Are Invisible

November 1, 2013 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

You don’t wear pink in October? You hate women.

You don’t participate in a walk for a cure during October? You hate women.

You don’t give as much money during October as feminists would like you to give to breast cancer? You asshole.

Hey, did you know September was Prostate Cancer Awareness Month? Apparently, the ribbons are blue.

Let me start off by saying that I fully support the fight against all forms of cancer, and I am sincerely sorry for any of you readers who are suffering from, or have loved ones who have dealt with cancer.

With that being said said, the last month of pink ribbons, ridiculous NFL uniforms, and 5k walks full of fat people getting their first exercise in a year is a perfect illustration of feminist propaganda. Breast cancer gets far more publicity (therefore, awareness), and funding than any other form of cancer. The National Cancer Institute, which is a federal agency and receives its funding from Congress, spent nearly $603 million last year in research for breast cancer. That $603 million is more than double the amount of funding that prostate cancer received. Here's a chart showing where all the funding goes:

Cancer Type	2010 Spending (in millions)	2011 Spending (in millions)	2012 Spending (in millions)
Lung	$281.9	$296.8	$314.6
Prostate	300.5	288.3	265.1
Breast	631.2	625.1	602.7
Colorectal	270.4	265.1	256.3
Bladder	22.6	20.6	23.4
Melanoma	102.3	115.6	121.2
Non-Hodgkin Lymphoma	122.4	126.4	119.5
Kidney	44.6	46.2	49.0
Thyroid	15.6	16.2	16.5
Endometrial (Uterine)	14.2	15.9	19.1

So the question is, why does breast cancer get so much more funding than prostate cancer? Is it because there more than double the amount of diagnosed breast cancer cases than prostate cancer cases? Nope. In 2013, the American Cancer Society predicted there would be 232,340 new cases of breast cancer, versus 238,590 new cases of prostate cancer. Is it because the chances of developing breast cancer are more than double the chances of developing prostate cancer? Nope. Women have a 12.38% chance of developing breast cancer, while men have a 16.5% chance of developing prostate cancer. You can see that chart here.

Why then, since the NCI is government-funded, is there so much more funding going towards the pink ribbons of titties versus the blue ribbons of prostates? The government, the services it provides, and the laws it writes, cater to women. From birth control to divorce laws to deadly diseases, the government has made it clear that they will be pinning the pink ribbons on their suits, not blue. I didn't even know Prostate Cancer Awareness Month existed until I began my research for this article.

Did you?

Now, to be fair, boobies are sexy. Prostates, lungs, and kidneys are not. There is certainly an amount of sex appeal that goes into why breast cancer funding and propaganda is vastly ahead of other forms of cancer. Breasts are synonymous with femininity, sex, and womanhood. Prostates are a topic that men are going to avoid at all costs. I also have to readily admit that breast cancer is much more prevalent in younger women than older women, whereas men are much more likely to suffer from prostate cancer past the age of 65.

In addition, in economics there the equimarginal principle, which states how a consumer allocates resources between various goods so as to obtain maximum satisfaction. Meaning, that though some forms of cancer may be far more vicious than others, there may be worthwhile medical and financial reasons not to pursue those specifics paths. However, that is beyond the scope of this article.

I am willing to cede these arguments, but that that does not justify the way the current budgets are laid out.

So the question is, why does a government-funded center place so much more money into the health of women versus the health of men?

Say hello to feminism. Again. And again.

Once again, the government is willing to bend over backwards to accommodate feminists and white knights to secure their vote. They have to, as the public backlash for cutting funding to breast cancer and raising the budget for men's health would likely cause riots in the street with women threatening to cut their own nipples off in support of breast cancer. Look at the previous article I linked, and how Jezebel rips the NFL into shreds for donating "only" $3 million for breast cancer research.

> Since the program's inception four years ago, the NFL has raised $3 million for breast cancer. In 2009, the League made $8.5 billion. Last year, they made $9.5

> billion. Commissioner Roger Goodell has set a revenue goal of $25 billion per year by the year 2027. A million per year out of between $8.5 and $9.5 billion in revenues? Pardon me while I don't slobber all over the NFL's pink-drenched marketing campaign.

Roger Goodell is too busy worrying about his players dying of brain injuries to be concerned what feminists think about his league's budget, but our Congressmen (~82% of Congress are men) aren't the same. They are only concerned about securing the next round of votes so they can stay in office, wielding their sticks of power.

Considering the men in office dividing up the NCI funding are assholes (according to themselves), you'd think they'd be a little more concerned about the health of their personal asshole.

For now, prostate cancer will continue to be painted invisible, drowned out by shades of bright pink. Feminism has painted it that way.

I'm glad the feminist idea of equality continues to ring loud and hypocritical.

You Should Use Olive Oil To Shave Your Face

November 1, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

The creation of a materialistic consumer society has led to the commercialization of any and all activities. One activity in particular is grooming. There is an enormous and extremely varied amount of solutions offered for sale for your grooming “problems”. Every once in awhile, I come across some not-so-commercial solutions such as Roosh’s baking soda use and Samseau’s no shampoo challenge. These types of solutions interest me because they can be more effective and have less drawbacks than commercial products used in their intended role.

After reading numerous other articles on alternative hygiene methods I became curious if there was a better way to shave. After reviewing the concept of how a blade works to cut hair and how many commercial products are used to facilitate this I began to think of what else can accomplish this in a better fashion.

One of my favorite soaps is derived from olive oil. I put a little drop of olive oil between my fingers and I realized this could be an effective lubricant better than alcohol based shaving cream and lotions. I decide to try it. It worked far better than I thought it would. I had a smooth face with no razor burn or drying. Here is my method:

Step 1.

Dampen a washcloth with water and put it in a bowl. Microwave this bowl for one minute.

Step 2.

Trim your beard as close as possible with electric clippers.

Step 3.

Remove the bowl from microwave. This washcloth will be extremely hot. Put your face as close to the towel in the bowl as comfortable and allow the steam to work on your face.

Step 4.

Start rubbing olive oil into your stubble. Be generous because it is relatively thick. Make sure to rub it in thoroughly.

Step 5.

Use your regular razor and begin shaving. The strokes will be far shorter and slower than what you used to due to the thickness of the olive oil. You only get to go about half an inch before the blade gets clogged. Rinse the blade thoroughly after every stroke.

Step 6.

After shaving all the hair off you wanted to, take the washcloth out of the bowl. By now it has cooled off to a safe temperature. Use the washcloth to wipe down your face. You will notice that there is some olive oil left behind. This functions as a sort of aftershave.

Utilizing this method I've noticed a few things. The razor blade doesn't actually feel like its on your skin but above a layer of olive oil. This could be why there is no razor burn. The lack of alcohol and other detergents prevent your skin from drying out or having skin oils washed away. Finally, just like the baking soda idea referenced earlier, olive oil is a whole lot cheaper than shaving cream.

Life Was Never Better

November 2, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

> Another hundred years were ground up and churned, and what had happened was all muddied by the way folks wanted it to be — more rich and meaningful the farther back it was. In the books of some memories it was the best time that ever sloshed over the world — the old time, the gay time, sweet and simple, as though time were young and fearless. Old men who didn't know whether they were going to stagger over the boundary of the century looked forward to it with distaste. For the world was changing, and sweetness was gone, and virtue too. Worry had crept on a corroding world and what was lost — good manners, ease and beauty? Ladies were not ladies any more, and you couldn't trust a gentleman's word.
> There was a time when people kept their fly buttons fastened. And man's freedom was boiling off. And even childhood was no good any more — not the way it was. No worry then but how to find a good stone, not round exactly but flattened and water-shaped, to use in a sling pouch cut from a discarded shoe. Where did all the good stones go, and all simplicity?
> A man's mind vagued up a little, for how can you remember the feel of pleasure or pain or choking emotion? You can remember only that you had them. An elder man might truly recall through water the delicate doctor-testing of little girls, but such a man forgets, and wants to, the acid emotion eating at the spleen so that a boy had to put his face flat down in the young wild oats and drum his fists against the ground and sob "Christ! Christ!" Such a man might say, and did,

> “What’s that damned kid lying out there in the grass for? He’ll catch a cold.”
> Oh, strawberries don’t taste as they used to and the thighs of women have lost their clutch!
> John Steinbeck, East of Eden 1952.

I’m sitting here on Halloween carefully unwrapping my meticulously organized miniature candies; just like I did as a kid — waves of nostalgia wash over me. I think back to just a decade ago when everything seemed so much simpler. As if I am still there I can smell the distinct scent of Jack-O-Lanterns and stale gunpowder. I can picture the Star Wars Episode 1 pillowcase I used to cram full of candy, and I still remember the mischief me and my group of friends got up to.

It was the good old days, it may have only been 10 years, but our parents let us roam free with all the other kids in the neighborhood. Explosives and sugar: what more could a kid want? We blew up pumpkins and had bottle rocket fights with the losers from the other school. The fear, the newness, and the debauchery made me think nothing could top Halloween night as a kid. I’d sit in my dorm room half-assedly studying and think of how much easier everything was back in high school. I’d come home from 8 hours of manual labor and dream of the time when $20 could get me everything I desired.

Then one day it just hit me. The present is the best ones life will ever get.

What once was does not matter. The past may give us perspective, but the present gives us our reality. The quote above was written in 1952; despite being fiction, it has the same sentiments as many of us now: things were better in the past, women and men alike were more virtuous, and culture these days is utterly fucked up. These problems are consistent through time. Human nature doesn’t change, only its expression in a given environment does.

If you’re not working for your future freedom what are you working for? If you’re not lifting because you want to look good and be healthy what are you lifting for? If you’re not approaching women to enjoy them, what are you approaching women for? If you’re not manipulating our current system for your own ends what is your purpose?

8 Ways To Spot A Transsexual

November 2, 2013 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

There are many people trying to trick us in this day and age. This varies from bullshit health advice to the blue pill nature of most of modern society. There is also another way men have been tricked and it can be from our own XY chromosome brethren.

That's right. I am talking about transsexuals who are "male to female". It's not just betas and closet conning alphas trying to hold us back. It's cross-dressing men who are so mentally ill that they think they're women. They're delusional omega men who think acting like a caricature of the women who don't give them play is how they can finally get some sexual pleasure from unwitting men. A lot of players won't admit to this but it happens to a lot of us.

Trannies will try to trick a player to get some loving. I've been fortunate enough to avoid the pitfalls and I want to make a simple easy list that anyone can apply to check if that 'freak' in a dress is an actual freak of nature.

1. Trannies exhibit the most feminine hamsters by their names alone.

That's why one of the most quintessential ways you can tell one apart in the Anglosphere is just by the name. It's very common for them to have a conventional name but with some tweaks to it. Like the name Jessica but spelled as Jessika. Even if they do go with more conventional names, they pick something trashy like "Natalie Mercedes Langley." Take their perspective as a special snowflake unique woman with the urge to change their name. It never really ends well.

2. Trannies require others to prop them up and support their delusions.

A little fun test is to imply the hottie in the dress is a he. Most normal women would laugh at that and chuckle, allowing you to game on and win them over. The tranny views this as an attack on them and will get hostile with you. Expect a “pronoun” check with some snark.

3. Trannies either grossly overcompensate or underwhelm with their feminine mannerisms and dress.

It’s easy to see them undercompensate because it looks like a frumpy NFL line-backer in a budget dress. The ones that overcompensate though will go full on out—they will wear 7 inch heels with a tight form-fitting dress. They will act like a special Anglo cultured sex-in-the-city snowflake.

4. Trannies, like most feminists, are NOT likely to have employable skills.

Trannies will have long periods of unemployment typically, and when they do work, it’s the fun time for a handbag special. They will be like any other gold digger try to leech off you. They always expect some mythical figure to pay for their whims.

5. Trannies have cut marks on their bodies.

Transsexuals have an incredibly high suicide and drug abuse rate. Just a good rule in general is to avoid mentally sick men and women who have those traits.

6. Trannies talk in make-believe ivory tower academia terms.

If you hear things like “social justice”, “kyriarchy”, “patriarchy”,”Cisgender”,”gender binary”, “transgender”, “privilege,” get your game on somewhere else. Male/female/it are so psychologically poisoned that it’s just not worth your time in general. There are many attractive REAL females without that academic poisoning.

7. Trannies require extensive surgeries that almost no government will subsidize.

This also requires years of therapy and other extraneous activities. Most trannies won’t even remember it all. Just remember to keep a critical eye for the uncanny valley. If it doesn’t feel right, investigate and draw your own conclusion.

8. Trannies are masters of destroying relationships.

I’m not a mental health expert but they’re broken psychologically. It’s quite easy to see a person that burns bridges.

This mentally ill man calls himself “chloe sagal”. He is famous for e-begging on Kickstarter back in March for surgery to remove shrapnel from his body as it was causing “metal poisoning” . When called out about the fact that he was asking for the same amount of money required for “gender re-assignment surgery” he went in to denial mode. The gaming communities criticisms and Kickstarter asking for proof caused this man to have a meltdown. He went on to twitch.tv a famous game streaming website where individuals can stream themselves playing games to announce his suicide. Trans people who are known to be histrionic wrecks do this type of activity for attention. When cutting himself lightly with a steak knife and taking pills, he commanded his friends to call the ambulance. The life of a mentally ill man is not a glamorous one.

The last and final drastic step of all of this is to do a TSA-style pat down. If that doesn’t work just remember that tranny “vaginas” have no natural lubrication. It’s quite easy to tell if somebody isn’t getting wet. We as red pillers must even tell the most beta blue pillers in existence when the “hot girl” at the bar is really a lying mentally ill man in a dress. If we stand up to their mental illness and call them out instead of making their delusions worse. It will inspire these disfigured men to stop being omegas and start being true men again.

5 Things I Noticed After Coming Back To The States

November 3, 2013 | by Thomas More | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, having been out of the States since 2004, I'm back for a bit and would like to share a few of my observations and experiences in the field.

1. American women are intrigued by a man's expat experiences.

Roosh has reported the same thing on his return visits to America. Places on the globe that are of particular interest to American women are countries in South America and Western Europe. These areas are considered by them to be a "Gran Aventura", whereas if a man states that he spends his time in the Philippines or Eastern Europe, most American women will assume he is gash mongering. Not that I give a rat's ass about American women anymore, but oddly enough it would seem that despite being in my 40's, as a result of my work and travels outside America, I get more interest from American women in their 20s than ever before in my life.

When a man becomes an expatriate and spends his time with quality foreign women, he acquires a way of being, a gestalt of sorts. That is to say that because of one's experiences with foreign women,you automatically project with your mannerisms and body language an indifference to the Westernized woman. You have an "I don't give a shit about you" attitude that they pick up on, and you become more attractive in their eyes. We must also factor in that in the wake of their secure, easy, government co-sponsored, mundane day to day existence in America, women are always looking for adventure. That you, being an expatriate man, they realize you are blazing your own exciting trail in life, and the little darlings want in.

2. To get to the better quality American females, in terms of looks and psyche, social connections are becoming more important.

A woman in America who doesn't have worms in her head induced by pop culture and feminism exposure is difficult to find nowadays. So social circles matter more. As in, real life people who know you and become acquainted with other people that know you. This way is much easier then going at establishing rapport from scratch with no connections. Given the current zeitgeist in America, this makes sense; Americans who are sane and live their lives according to common sense and decency, are cautious about who they allow in their inner circle.

3. A lot of younger guys are still very clueless.

The above video clip is a typical excerpt of the current state of affairs in the USA. There remains a lot of young men still clueless to just how lame American women are. They are mangina white knights being played for suckers by the system. They are also still very clueless to game. Sporting their momma's boys garments, including the red jeans (seems like this is official hipster army issue clothing, the only thing missing is the yellow hammer and sickle on the left rear pocket) they really fail miserably with the basics.

I observed one night at a local bar a guy rambling on to some chick, and I'm sure he felt he was talking her up and making all the right moves. He was not. At the very least guys should be able to gauge a woman's interest in case she's bored, so he can change his strategy. This is why older, experienced men actually have a better shot at a young hottie then a dude her age. The older man owes his superior refinement to his experiences, especially if he is an expatriate

4. 30-something single women in America are starting to get spooked that too many men are shying away from marriage

Marriage Rate In America Drops Drastically

By Alister Sampson Briggs
WASHINGTON | Thu Oct 2, 2013 10:47am EDT

(Reuters) - The marriage rate in the United States is continuing its decades-long downward slide, with fewer American men then ever proposing marriage and others either waiting longer to wed, or remaining single for the duration of their lives according to a new report.

The marriage rate has fluctuated in the past, with dips in the 1930's and 1960s, but it has been in steadydecline since the 1970's...

These women sense the undercurrent. They fear that they may be destined to grow old with a vibrator and a cat. Everyone is seeing more men quietly withdraw themselves from the pre-ordained life mandated by society. They are men going their own way (MGTOW), and the girls in their 30's are panicking behind closed doors. To find marriage these women change to become more enticing.

Nearly every woman in her 30's I meet here is nice, complimentary, flirtatious, and of course easy to fuck. Fine if you don't mind having sex with a woman who is past her prime, but I'll pass. Women who in their 20's thought they were too cool for the universe because they were young and female start singing a different tune when they hit their 30's and start aging. Meanwhile I'm in my late 40's and my South American girlfriend is 25. American women, ain't karma a bitch?

It should be noted that 30 something American women are not becoming traditionally minded or anything, but rather they are simply in a desperate rush to find the useful idiot who will put a roof over her head. Once an American man goes foreign, American females both in their age 20's and 30's are sloppy seconds and cannot compete with non-Western women. In all fairness, I have been critical of foreign women, but mainly for the green horn men who think that jumping on a plane and finding better companionship is an easy and quick task. It takes time but your chances of finding a quality girlfriend elsewhere are better, as opposed to in the States where men have to contend with the overweight, screwed up, tattooed, walking STD incubators that are pass for women today.

5. That spending extensive time outside the Anglosphere is truly a fulfilling experience.

This is a life experience that one will never get at any college nor any amount of internet keyboard jockeying. Once an American man becomes an expatriate he is no longer an “American” in the traditional sense, but he may never be a citizen of his new home country either. What usually happens with most expatriates is that they end up between the cultures, becoming a World Citizen. This broadens one’s horizon, and teaches him what it means to be human. I find myself less judgmental of American men who have never been outside the country. Had I never left, I would still think like a lot of these men. A man’s attitude and behaviors are a result of his environment and government, a government whose aim is to play every man for a fool.

Girls Chase

November 3, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

ROK's sponsor for November is Girls Chase, a site that teaches game. Here's the description:

> Girls Chase has been online since 2008, founded by Chase Amante, a guy who'd been cold approaching on his own for a year before he found the pickup community in 2005 and trained under some of the top instructors of the time (Sebastian Drake, Vin DiCarlo, BradP, etc.). The site focuses on both uncomplicating and vastly fleshing out the seduction and relationship process, getting men who want to improve with women practical, actionable advice delivered in intuitive, easy-to-digest ways, with a special emphasis on getting down the fundamentals of being an attractive man.
> There's a LOT you can do with both appearance and behavior that makes you more attractive, and they're arguably a lot more important than the words you say. There's also a large amount of emphasis in the material on Girls Chase on having a good process and moving quickly through that process, because you'll almost never lose a girl by moving too fast but you will consistently lose girls (to the competition, or just to boredom / her giving up) by moving too slow. We sell a handful of products, but the bread and butter of our business are website content subscriptions, which motivates us to keep the content value and engagement levels high and the content publishing rate frequent (we have almost 1 new article up a day right now).

We'd like to thank Girls Chase for their support. If you are interested in becoming an ROK sponsor, visit our sponsorship page (we will soon have an opening for February 2014). You can also drop a couple bucks in our tip jar.

Is Kanye West The Black Mark Minter?

November 4, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Many of us here are familiar with the story of Mark Minter. A middle aged male with an apparent MRA leaning, Minter made a name for himself in the manosphere over the past year or so with a series of long, but enthralling posts about gender relations. Minter quickly gained a sizable following within the manosphere as his writings became more well known and more widely respected.

It was this earned respect that made Minter's fall so surprising and so spectacular. The man who had spent months damning American women and American marriage decided to shack up with a 34 year old single mother.

Minter had failed to adhere to a principle considered vital to the conception of masculinity and manhood by many men in the manosphere and beyond: practice what you preach.

Granted, men are not perfect. It is only to be expected that some men err in their consistent adherence to this rule and write a few checks that their asses are not quite ready to cash in practice. Such imperfections can be forgiven to an extent, since all will prove guilty of them at some point in their life.

When you build large portions of your reputation on one principle, however, and then proceed to consciously go against it in an almost remarkably direct, indisputably contradictory fashion, you should not expect this kind of leniency.

Mark Minter may now have somewhat of a parallel in Hollywood.

I’m sure most of us here are familiar with Kanye West. He’s one of the most talented musicians alive today, with 6 Grammies and 5 platinum solo albums. His net worth is rumored to be in the $100 million range.

Kanye has made many hits, but “Gold Digger” stands out as one of the most prominent, its legacy carved deeper into modern pop culture lore and lexicon than most of his other hits.

> [Jamie Foxx]
> She take my money when I’m in need
> Yeah she’s a trifling friend indeed
> Oh she’s a gold digger way over town
> That digs on me
> [Chorus:]
> (She gives me money)
> Now I ain’t sayin’ she a gold digger (when I’m in need)
> But she ain’t messin’ with no broke niggas
> (She gives me money)
> Now I ain’t sayin’ she a gold digger (when I’m in need)
> But she ain’t messin’ with no broke niggas
> Get down girl go head get down (I gotta leave)
> Get down girl go head get down (I gotta leave)
> Get down girl go head get down (I gotta leave)
> Get down girl gone head
> [Verse 1:]
> Cutie the bomb

Met her at a beauty salon
With a baby Louis Vuitton
Under her underarm
She said I can tell you rock
I can tell by your charm
Far as girls you got a flock
I can tell by your charm and your arm
But I'm looking for the one
Have you seen her?
My psychic told me she have an ass like Serena
Trina, Jennifer Lopez, four kids
And I gotta take all they bad ass to show-biz
OK get your kids but then they got their friends
I pulled up in the Benz, they all got up in
We all went to Den and then I had to pay
If you fucking with this girl then you better be paid
You know why
It take too much to touch her
From what I heard she got a baby by Busta
My best friend says she use to fuck with Usher
I don't care what none of yall say I still love her

[Chorus]

[Verse 2:]
18 years, 18 years
She got one of your kids, got you for 18 years
I know somebody paying child support for one of his kids
His baby mamma's car and crib is bigger than his
You will see him on TV any given Sunday
Win the Superbowl and drive off in a Hyundai
She was supposed to buy your shorty TYCO with your money
She went to the doctor got lypo with your money
She walking around looking like Michael with your money
Should've got that insured got GEICO for your money, money, money
If you ain't no punk holla we want prenup
WE WANT PRENUP! Yeah
It's something that you need to have
'Cause when she leave yo ass she gonna leave with half
18 years, 18 years
And on her 18th birthday he found out it wasn't his

[Chorus]

[Verse 3:]
Now I ain't saying you're a gold digger you got needs

> You don't want your dude to smoke but he can't buy weed
> You got out to eat and he can't pay you all can't leave
> There's dishes in the back, he gotta roll up his sleeves
> But why you all washing watch him
> He gone make it into a Benz out of that Datsun
> He got that ambition, baby, look in his eyes
> This week he mopping floors next week it's the fries
> So, stick by his side
> I know this dude's balling but yeah that's nice
> And they gone keep calling and trying
> But you stay right girl
> But when you get on he leave your ass for a white girl
> Get down girl go head get down
> Get down girl go head get down
> Get down girl go head get down
> Get down girl go head
> (lemme hear that back)

The message is pretty clear: avoid women who will bleed you dry financially. Protect yourself as a man. Sign pre-nups.

It all sounds fairly straightforward, right? Well, that's what most people thought and it wasn't long before "Gold Digger" became an iconic tune. Kanye's message resonated with a lot of men.

But did it resonate with Kanye? Recent events have led me to believe that this isn't quite the case:

> Kanye is so overjoyed that Kim has agreed to be his wife, and the last thing on his mind right now is money. He 'loves Kim too much' to even think about asking his beautiful bride-to-be to sign a prenup!
> Kanye West has been waiting for this moment for so long and he doesn't want to do anything to ruin his happiness with his new fiance, Kim Kardashian, 33. The Yeezus artist thinks it would be "tacky" and "awkward" to get a prenup — he just wants to celebrate their love instead, a source tells HollywoodLife.com.
> "Kanye's in love with Kim to the point of infatuation. It's scary because the love is so powerful, Kanye doesn't even want to have a prenup," the source says. "He thinks it's tacky and he doesn't want to offend Kim or make anything seem awkward. He loves Kim too much for that to even cross his mind. He thinks of his money and his accomplishments and hers and he wants to share them with her — no strings attached."

What were those lyrics again?

> Now I ain't sayin' she a gold digger (when I'm in need)
> But she ain't messin' with no broke niggas

Yeah, sounds about right…

> If you ain't no punk holla we want prenup
> WE WANT PRENUP! Yeah
> It's something that you need to have

So, is Kanye a punk now? By his own standards, I suppose the answer is yes.

Like Mark Minter, Kanye has revolted against his own stated standards of behavior. He has now embarked upon a mission to turn a hoe into a housewife, no doubt certain that he could be an exception to that general rule of failure. He’s decided to wife up a woman who is not only well beyond her prime, but whose entire name is built upon the foundation of a sex tape, a couple of failed marriages and a seemingly endless stream of boyfriends. And he’s decided to take this chance and dive in with no actual legal protection.

Good luck, Kanye. You’ll need it.

16 Ways To Spot A Cougar

November 4, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Men chase the priapic mysteries. These mysteries fascinate us, and we crave the sensual delights that come from exploring their subtleties by frolicking on supple female flesh. It is part of our evolutionary inheritance. It is safe to say that the male desire to sample a wide range of sexual experiences across as wide a geographic area as possible is near universal; to deny this is to deny the nature of man. It is nothing less than a biological imperative. Does not every organism seek to expand its habitat and multiply itself with geometric abundance? Consider how our distant ancestors, as soon as they could walk upright, struck out across the savannahs of east Africa, walking for uncounted hours, days, and weeks in search of game and fertile pastures. Consider how intrepid Columbus burst the bonds holding man to the Old World, and exploded into the fragrant fields of the New World.

We exist, and therefore must copulate.

Consider the modern cougar. Advances in health and technology have expanded the sexual marketplace shelf-life of women who, in previous eras, would have been invisible to the average man. It is now possible for women in their 40s, 50s, and even 60s to prowl the sexual terrain in the fond hope that the diligence of their physical upkeep will cause them to be noticed by a younger diffident male. She has truly arrived.

To advise my fellow ROK readers on the nature of that huntress who stalks the lands, I have decided to list the most common features of the modern cougar. I urge readers to do their own first hand research (as I did) by copulating with a cougar or two. Keep your own "Big Cat Diary", I say, and feel free to share your experiences. A sexually well-educated man must be able to appreciate the differences between a younger and a older woman, in the same way that a gourmand needs to train his palate to distinguish the subtleties of fine food and drink.

But take care! The cougar is not an animal to be underestimated. Beneath that laser-like stare pants the heart of a tiger, and the soul of a hamster. Her survival instincts, rationalization mechanisms, and predatory abilities have been honed over many years of evolution, as well as by decades of indulgence, protection, and coddling from American society.

Here some of the most commonly displayed traits of the modern cougar. I can give you 16 common ones, in no special order.

1. Elevated Masculine Mannerisms And Features

The hormonal changes that women undergo as they get older tends to diminish their (already tenuous) femininity as Western women. Their faces take on a more hard-bitten, harsh appearance, and it is not uncommon for facial hair to increase significantly. Estrogen levels seem to go down, voices deepen, and a constant exposure to feminist propaganda whittles away at whatever may be left of their feminine core. Sexual dimorphism in behavior seems to fade as cougarism blossoms.

2. Fixation On Younger Women's Clothing Styles

In an attempt to recapture her lost party-girl, carousel-riding youth, the cougar will become more and more shameless in wearing clothing designed for girls 20 years younger. Favorites here are leopard-spot and tiger-stripe patterns, short skirts, skin-tight jeans, and low cut blouses designed to show off an ample, silicone-enhanced cleavage.

3. Constant Talk About Work

Admittedly, the modern cougar works hard. Not for her are the languid, relaxed days of lounging around the house. She usually has brood to provide for, and her own upkeep is hardly inexpensive. Unless she has hit the jackpot by shaking down her ex-husband in divorce court, expect the cougar to work well into her elder years. She takes her work seriously. The down side of this, unfortunately, is that you never stop hearing about it. Besides her work and her kids, the cougar cares for little else. And you will hear about both. Constantly. I have found this one of the oddest cougar traits: so mature in many respects, but so childish and juvenile when it comes to trying to make intelligent conversation with men. Some things women just never outgrow. Ah, humanity.

4. Constant Blather About Her Ex-Husband, Kids, Or Party-Girl Years

The cougar will initially feign interest in her younger male target, flattering him with attention. But after coitus has been consummated, the hapless youngster will find himself enmeshed in a constant stream of mind-numbing jibberish about how bad her ex-spouse is, how great her kids are, and how she wistfully longs for her lost party-girl (i.e., carousel) years.

5. Credit or Debt Problems

Years of hard living and big spending have usually put your top-tier cougar into credit and debt problems. Of course, it's always someone else's fault, but be aware that lurking in her background is a financial house of cards, ever ready to collapse. Hold onto your wallet.

6. Willingness To Raw Dog

Cougars love raw dogging. After a hysterectomy or the passing of her child-bearing years, the average cougar feels that she has little to fear from unwanted pregnancies. Her innate fatalism removes whatever other hesitations she may have from high-risk behavior. Expect to be encouraged to take the plunge. We here at ROK, of course, always advise safety first.

7. Preferences For Dogs As Pets

A true cougar is a dog person, not a cat person. Cougars love to bask in the unbounded energy of a hound hurling himself about the house, tongue lolling about, ever subservient to her demands. Accomplished attention seekers, cougars know that taking their dogs in public is also one of the best ways to attract the limelight.

8. Kids In The Background…And When She's Ready, In The Foreground

A cougar knows that her younger male prey is innately repelled by the sight of another man's spawn. So, in the beginning of the seduction, she will keep her kid(s) safely hidden away so as not to scare off her younger male target. But, eventually however, her desire to take power in the relationship will get the better of her. She will feel a compulsion to test the waters. The kid will slowly be edged into the picture…ever so subtly, and ever so gradually. This is the big moment of truth. The expert cougar hunter will not flinch at this critical juncture. He will refuse to have anything to do whatsoever with another man's children, including being in the same room with them. Not your brood, not your problem. The irony here—always lost on females—is that they themselves would never want to be involved with a single man with his own children. Yet they expect a single man to tolerate the sight of her own offspring.

9. Pseudo-Intellectual Blather

Our standard-issue cougar has spent many an hour poring over the dreary tomes found in your local Barnes & Noble, and she wants to show it. Expect to be lectured on P/E ratios, modes of alienation, the Arab Spring, and other vapid topics du jour.

10. Sexual Forwardness

This goes without saying. Deployment of some reticent "beta bait" game will work wonders. Believe me.

11. Silicone

I know it when I see it. And I happen to like it.

12. Crazy Ex-Husband Stories

To justify her solo existence, the cougar has developed a sophisticated rationalization mechanism, which has calcified into certitude with the passage of time. You will hear stories about how the former spouse threatened her, verbally abused her, and made her strike out on her own against her will. Every life decision is the fault of someone else, of course.

13. Intense, Predatory Gazes

When a cougar locks her gaze on you, there will be no mistaking her intentions. The cougar has no time for the giddy dilly-dallying of the clueless younger woman. But be warned…there are other, more sophisticated games brewing in the background.

14. Insipid Mishmash Of Religious Or Spiritual Ideas

Cougars are always into self-actualized “spiritualism” or other vague religious cant, which has the advantage of making no demands on them. At the same time, it enables them to adopt the posture of the deep, introspective woman of the world. You will be expected to buy into her religious ideas, or at least pretend to listen to them, whatever they may be. Yawn.

15. Excessive Use Of Cosmetics

Expect to see some skillfully placed make up that conceals the ravages of time, a lifetime of hard partying, and excessive exposure to sun. The higher the income of the cougar, the better the overall results. She's high maintenance, and is proud of it.

16. Vague Contempt For Feminist Bullshit

Having been around the block, the typical cougar has no use for feminist talking points. She may mouth the creed, but there is no belief behind it. The harsh realities of life have stripped away the false illusions of feminism, and replaced them with a ruthless practicality. Her hamster, of course, still operates as it always does, but it services her personal needs, not the false ideologies of deluded younger women.

Final Thoughts

So there it is. I must confess, chevalier that I am, a measure of sympathy for the plight of the modern cougar. Cut adrift from her traditional feminine moorings, drifting here and there in the harsh realities of a society that promised her so much and delivered so little, she haplessly tries to make her way in the world. And what a nightmare it turned out to be. So let us be tender, and let us be gentle.

As I look into those cougar eyes, and peer through those windows of the soul, what do I see? I detect, perhaps, the vague glimmerings of a sadness at the cruel passage of time, and at the mournful brevity of life's pageant.

I sense her inner voice. And it says to me, with soft poignancy: Ah, you men. You lust after our flesh, and seek to possess us, and to what end? For the comedy of reproduction? Have you any idea that we women pay a higher price than you for love's reckless and maudlin play? And yet…we do so desire to be loved, and to give love in return. Tell me, is this not the only redemptive tonic in the drama of life?

How Contraceptives Distort Gender Relations

November 4, 2013 | by Giovanni Dannato | Link | Original Link

Men are genetically programmed to be drug addicts. Women are the drug and the dealers all in one. Men are rigged to obsessively desire sex for a reason—to compel them to seek the holy grail of genetic immortality before all else. However, nature didn't account for modern contraceptives. Obviously, many men are happy to "cheat" nature while still enjoying the neurochemical fix, yet most never stop to consider the price they must pay.

There used to be a more reasonable balance of power. Before the pill and condoms, a woman generally had to put the possibility of pregnancy on the bargaining table when she had sex. Now she still charges a heavy price for sex, making multiple men compete for her, yet no longer puts any sacrifice of her own on the table in return for their frantic ladder climbing and risk-taking. These men get only the illusion of fulfilling their primal objective while she still gets real status, attention, and resources.

When women give up nothing while gaining much in return, we necessarily see a huge trade imbalance that grows with each lopsided transaction. To some extent, "feminism" is a manifestation of this great trade imbalance. A relatively wealthy society that also provides women with the means to extract increasingly more resources ends up with a predictable result. Whether in the US, Sweden, China, Iran, or even the Roman Empire, we see the same social dynamics begin to emerge when the conditions are right.

A woman who does not need to account for conception has hit the jackpot. She can keep plying the same trick over and over. Imagine having a magic dollar bill you can endlessly use in a vending machine. She no longer ends up losing her powers for 9 months at a time and no longer has to devote her energies to raising offspring instead of playing the game. Above all, that first courtship phase of life that once lasted a few short years now endures for more than a decade. Not only can she collect tribute from multiple suitors without having to give up her womb to any of them, she has much more time to exploit what once would have been a passing phase.

Those ripe child-bearing hips and expectant breasts remain ever-vestal, a false promise that keeps those hordes of men panting and clambering to have her. She can get endless adulation and unlimited free lunches until aging finally begins to erode her assets.

Is it any wonder now it always seems to be the foolish and homely women who get pregnant in high school and keep having more? Predictably those least able to strategize or with the least leverage to lose are those who cash in early. Is it any wonder that women now lose status when they get pregnant? They're surrendering their power by actually delivering the product they advertise! In one quick glimpse we can see how our mass culture looks down on perpetually pregnant trailer park moms yet worships barren celebrities fighting a futile fight against time.

Unsurprisingly, it's more likely the good-looking or smart career woman who waits until her 30s before trying to get pregnant. The enormous power she experiences intoxicates her so she waits and waits to cash in her ever-growing pile of chips until she finds herself suddenly on the verge of losing everything. Like any gambling addict, the greater her winnings the more she's compelled to keep playing. She simply pursues behavior that got generations of her ancestors knocked up by high status men, yet the same protocol becomes a dysfunctional downward spiral in the presence of birth control.

It makes me very curious about the impact this might have on the gene pool. I see it favoring outliers in an almost male-like way. Both women on the lower end of the bell-curve and a few mutants on the opposite end of the bell who are able to think critically about what matters most and avoid falling in with the main herd. By the same token, we can predict that women will be heavily selected for affinity for fundamentalist creeds such as Mormonism, Evangelicism, and Islam that encourage above replacement fertility in stable families.
We could certainly suppose that women who claim to have "no maternal instinct" and prone to being distracted by busywork will become much rarer and that those with the very strongest urges for babies will tend to become Darwinian elites.

Overall, we've begun to see atypically intense selective pressure on females. She's no longer guaranteed a high chance of passing on her genes in abundance just by being born female and faces an extreme uncertainty of success that only males normally have to live with. Right now, the current generation of American women around age 40 is nearly 20% childless even after having grown up decades closer to more traditional times. Almost another 20% of them have had just one child as their reproductive years draw to a close. We can anticipate a large "middle class" of "betas" reproducing at replacement levels. And at the top, a small minority of biological "alpha" women who are doubling, tripling, and quadrupling the competition.

It begins to look a lot more like the spread among men, where there's an entire bottom rung of countless millions who have no success at all, countless more eke out just 1 or 2 offspring to precariously replace them, and on the high extreme, rock stars and sheikhs outperforming other men by orders of magnitude.

It makes me wonder if in the long run the trend may be eugenic after all, if those who don't fit in with the main herd for whatever reason are those who pass on their genes. It is this same kind of pressure that pushes men to stand out from one another. Ironically, it may be the closest thing to "gender equality" we've ever seen as a species as entire segments of the population are weeded out in an extinction event as big as the bloodiest of wars.

Apple Should Have Never Hired A Female Handbag Executive

November 4, 2013 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Whether you like Apple or not, Steve Jobs will be remembered as one of the great minds of the 21st Century. Starting in his parents garage he built THE most valuable company in the world and did it without Gates or Rockefeller type monopolies. His whole persona was built around what people came to term “the reality distortion field”. IT CAN BE DONE. The concept of a personal computer for home use, was off the radar in the late 70s early 80s. Computers took up entire buildings. Steve set the pace and demanded his engineers push it to the max.

Two years after Steve died, Tim Cook the replacement CEO of Apple, is struggling without the founder’s vision and leadership so has hired a woman,Angela Ahrendts, from a high-end hand bag firm to head up Apple’s marketing. She’s one of the few females ever invited to the Apple board. This tragic and desperate move will be marked as the turning point in the fortunes of Apple. Sony and Samsung have already beaten Apple to the smart watch. The iphone 5 is just an iphone 3 with a better camera and competitors have stolen all the ipad ideas.

[image]

A Little History

The glass in the iphone, (Gorilla Glass) is a relic from the 1960s. Corning had no production facilities for it and refused to make it – that is until Jobs barged into the CEOs office and hammered the guy to dedicate an entire factory to it. Steve started a revolution in portable touch screen devices. No more horrid plastic screens and styluses. The guy killed himself working all hours of the day and night with a passion most people cannot imagine. Microsoft had to steal his ideas for Windows just to keep up. (Not to mention that his side project Pixar made him a quick $8 billion.)

The computer must be like a home appliance, Steve decided. Appealing, functional, easy to use – yet also sexy and stylish. He wanted people to feel that their gadgets were an extension of their mind. A way to be creative, to be more than just a human being. As with all geniuses, the level of his accomplishments are overlooked and his vision misunderstood – clouded both with the politics of the company he left behind, as well as the gossip of his personal life and character flaws.

If you read his biography or (lazily) watch the Hollywood version 'Jobs' you cannot avoid the man's sheer determination not to accept 'crap'. Steve hated second rate products that consumers buy and companies profit from, but which are not well engineered. The iphone 1.0 was scraped days before it's release, costing Apple millions. Steve wanted it to be perfect.

Before Steve died, his ambition was to change the TV. Walter Isaacson describes Steve wracked with cancer, writhing in agony in his bedroom, cursing at the TV and laying out how it should work. A real man with balls, who was alive until he was not. If Apple's staff needed direction as to the future of the company they only had to read Steve's bio. Tim Cook should be hiring a hard hitting entertainment exec, and making strategic partnerships with the TV networks and studios…. even taking on Microsoft's X-Box, not sniffing at some fancy hand bag woman.

Apple has dropped the ball. Why is there no Apple TV on the scale of iTunes and the iPhone? Why aren't they developing a device that is networked, interactive, online and completely changing the rules of the TV game? Netflix is killing it. Where is Apple? Even Sony makes better TVs and they lost it years ago. Apple could kill it with a TV. That was literally Steve's dying wish.

Women In Tech Have A Terrible Track Record

King Apple is following King Sony into neverland. Swamped with competition and lacking ideas, Apple hires none other than Angela Ahrendts whose claim to fame is that she vamped up the marketing for Burberry hand bags. A troll from the fashion industry should not be allowed in tech. Tech is all we have to separate us from tribesman and animals. It is not about marketing gimmicks, but about improving humanity.

Carly Fiorina ran HP into the wall in the early 2000s (HP was another Silicon Valley garage start up). She gave the once titan of tech's crown straight to Apple without so much as a sniffle. Another woman CEO, Meg Whitman, presided over Ebay. She dropped the ball on Ebay's verification and payment system, losing the battle to Paypal that Ebay had to pay $1.5 billion dollars to acquire. Worse still, Meg was so arrogant to think she could buy the post for governor of California by spending $144 million of her ill-gotten Ebay gains, only to find the voters laughed in her face.

And now Apple, the king of consumer tech, hires the Burberry hand bag CEO for a position that most likely set her up to be CEO of Apple in a few years. (The blue pill media is already anointing her the future CEO of Apple). As many a husband will confirm, once you let a woman into your house, she'll jolly soon take over.

Burberry Is No Apple

Burberry is the bane of husbands the world over, selling useless and overpriced branded items along the lines of Louis Vuitton; using the Scottish tartan as its 'iconic' tag. Burberry will happily charge you $1000 for an unnecessary cloth and leather luxury item (some real ground breaking technology right there) that probably costs less than $50 to make.

Apple revolutionized the face of technology. Steve's forward thinking attitude gave people gadgets so useful and so usable that our whole world has changed because of it. And now they want to put a woman in to head up marketing and dump Apple products into the shops as if they are some 'must have' female fashion accessory.

Apple was never about that. Apple was about absolute male logic, ambition and realism (and a little magic). Apple was about pushing the envelope further than possible, to create the greatest products on the planet, beating out Exxon and Microsoft by market cap. The market cap. of Burberry is $6 billion. The market cap of Apple is $500 billion. The difference is because one makes useless ‘designer’ products that are bought only to attach a sense of value to one’s image. Never mind that this entire mindset is not better or more advanced than the tribal chief and his feathered head dress. (no offense to native American tradition meant)

[image]

Let’s have a look at what Steve Jobs thought about tribal respect and image. The guy didn’t even wear a belt, never mind a $500 Burberry one.

[image]

How can you insult his legacy by hiring an accessory marketing troll? How can Tim Cook soil one of the most important companies in the world, by hiring some light weight, whose last post was in a company barely 1% the size of Apple. Her experience is in selling products YOU DO NOT NEED. Whereas Apple was built by making products you don’t know you need, but which are so awesome when you see them, that you have to have them (even if that means queuing all night in the street to get it). They actually changed the entire planet’s attitude towards multiple product categories.

Meanwhile Burberry still knocks out the same crap it did 150 years ago, and your average male’s butthole puckers up as he walks past their stores, quickly distracting his girlfriend’s attention lest tonight’s BJ cost more than a round trip to Bangkok. No one is queuing all night for $1000 hand bags. The only thing Burberry knows about marketing is how to appeal to brain dead ‘shiney’ women whose sex starved husbands’ wallets outsize their shriveled penises.

The outer design and ‘feel’ of the product, the packaging and so forth you find from Apple, was simply a kind of ‘Zen’ presentation of what was within. That was the genius of Steve Jobs. He beat marketers and their plastic packaging at their own game, by actually putting engineering and guts into his products. The only guts in Burberry is from dead animals.

Apple was never about the marketing ‘con’ rather about making amazing products. Burberry is ONLY about the marketing con. Making average to poor products and selling them entirely on image. Obviously that is Apple's new business strategy for why else would they hire an expert in that field? Do we need Harry Potter actors to choose our iphone because the engineering is so lame?

This is the woman's world of marketing; where feelings, emotion, image and the sense of self-worth conveyed are more important than functionality. Where keeping up with the Joneses and flattening hubby's credit card is more important than what the product can functionally do for you.

This Is A Sad Time For Apple Fans

You cannot and will not be able to market Apple products using a female strategy for hand bags. Tim Cook has missed the point entirely.

John Sculley, the marketing genius from Pepsi (another completely useless product that also happens to be a health hazard), ousted Steve jobs in the 80s and led Apple to ruin, relying purely on cranked profit margin and marketing gimmicks. Angela Ahrendts was CEO of Burberry. Is an ex CEO going to be satisfied with just heading up marketing, or does she have her eye on the crown like Scully did? What agenda does she have to make her mark in the man's world as a fem CEO of a fortune 500 company?

Poor Tim Cook was done as Apple CEO before he even started. He's Steve's robot (with hair and pancreas intact) running on low batteries. Tim's only role at Apple was to find the next Steve. Angela Ahrendts is most certainly not the MAN he's looking for. How long before she takes the reigns of Apple and leads it down the same path that Scully did?

It's a sadder day than the day Steve died, because while a man is always going to die, his legacy can be understood and preserved for decades – even centuries to come. Yet it is clear that Steve was misunderstood and mistreated by those around him, and his legacy will be flushed away with Angela Ahrendts' period pad. Apple produced products that took us a step closer to the stars, a step closer to Star Trek type technologies, taking us away from the tribal caveman and towards human beings. Of course it takes a woman and a marketer to pull all that apart and land us back in the land of trinkets, superstition and war paint. RIP Hewlett Packard, RIP Apple. Steve will always be remembered. His company, not so much.

22 Signs He's A Player

November 5, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

As soon as Tuthmosis dropped "24 Signs She's A Slut" like an atom bomb on the fem-o-sphere, sluts were set back a decade in their quest to hide their promiscuity. The post provided such superlative advice for how to micro-target for easy sex that I felt it was necessary to even the playing field for our female fans.

There isn't a girl alive who will admit that she likes being played. Ladies, if you've ever wanted to figure out whether your mystery man is getting some other action on the side, you are in for a treat. Here's your guide to spotting cads while trying to find your tame, submissive, and monogamous dream man.

Black Knight's List of Top Cad Characteristics:

1. He is in good shape. In a country where 2/3 of adult population is overweight or obese, you won't see many tubby guys getting sex from high-quality girls.

2. Approached you, especially during the day. As Roosh wrote in Day Bang, "the average man will die before doing a cold approach while sober." If he proactively approached you and you weren't immediately "creeped out" (woman-speak for any attention from men they find unattractive) you can be sure he's got a lot of practice.

3. Pushes for sex on the first date. Players know that modern girls are flakes. Whether they put value on the immediate one night stand is immaterial — they know they have to push the interaction as far as possible to get the girl invested and maximize the chance she will return.

4. Is evasive or mysterious about mushy personal things. You're unlikely to hear about a player's dreams, aspirations, insecurities, etc. Good players don't want to tell you anything that could be used against them, and really, what's the use of opening up to someone you don't view as a potential partner?

5. Is in a band, especially as guitarist or lead singer. With a constant stream of young groupies at their fingertips, why would any of these guys commit to you?

6. Refuses to meet your friends. If you delight in the chase you know that a girl's friends are never your allies. At best they are neutral observers, most often they are saboteurs and haters. After all, why should their friend enjoy some fun with a mysterious stud if they're not getting any attention themselves? They are also spies who will report any sightings of you to their friend.

7. Reticent to spend lots of money on you. Everybody knows the simp's go-to maneuver is the expensive dinner first date. Players flip the script because they know there's no upside to trying to buy a girl's attraction. If he suggests you split a bag of skittles for dinner, you're staring down sexual checkmate.

8. Won't see you more than two times a week – A player's time is valuable, whether it's being used for gaming other girls, making money, or enjoying leisure time. As part of the harem, you're not going to get more than the occasional bone thrown your way.

9. Has friends who are good with girls. Players don't hang out with simps. Period.

10. Could be described as charming. How many socially awkward guys do you know who are getting trim on the regular?

11. Often doesn't want to see you on the weekend. The weekend is a time for precious rejuvenation and rebirth. For the hardcore 24/7 players, this is when they're beating the bushes for new prospects. For the introverted players, it's the time when they unwind solo and prepare for another week in the game.

12. All of your dates involve alcohol. Feminists will undoubtedly misinterpret this and brand me as a proto-rapist thought criminal. The fact is, most players want to avoid getting a girl sloppy drunk. However, they also know that sharing just drink or two will make it easier to get sex by an order of magnitude.

13. He has a wide face. Biomechanics is your friend in your quest to root out cads. Men with wider faces are more likely to have higher testosterone levels, and therefore are more likely to seek sexual novelty.

14. Is secretive about his phone – He knows that, because you possess a vagina, you are going to try to snoop as soon as you get the chance.

"A phone is to a player what a light saber is to a Jedi." – Danger and Play

15. His phone is always blowing up OR you have never heard it. The bolder playeratii will not care to hide their dalliances with other women because they can use jealousy to their advantage. The stealthier guys will make their phones a complete non-factor when you're together.

16. Is resistant to any innovative date ideas after getting sex. Why should this guy waste time on taking you to the zoo or ice skating if he got what he came for?

17. Avoids PDA at all costs, especially if he's better looking than you. The player needs some plausible deniability should he run into one of his other conquests. He also doesn't want to devalue himself in the eyes of women or other men if he's punching below his weight.

18. He forgets which stories he's told you. The most surgical players have a cache of go-to anecdotes, one liners, and pontifications that they unleash on any new prospect to build attraction. If you're hearing about his skydiving adventure or his palm reading skills for the third time, he's used this script before.

19. Doesn't give a shit about Facebook. He knows that social networking puts him squarely on the grid, and also that "getting your Facebook" actually decreases his odds of having sex with you. A small subset of players will embrace the opposite extreme and have a prodigious Facebook presence with tons of female "friends," but most player Facebook accounts will be locked up like the farmer's daughter on prom night.

20. Not anxious to please you. Have you noticed that most men have bent over backwards to accommodate you since around the age of 14? This behavior will be conspicuously absent in players. They will be less willing to put up with your crap and will act like they have other options. Because they do.

21. Doesn't call or text you beyond the bare minimum. With lots of balls in the air, it's impractical for the player to devote significant energy to any single one.

22. Will only meet up when there's the prospect of sex. Lunch at your favorite place between work meetings? Taking a walk around the park? Getting together while you're on your period? The veteran player will avoid these like the plague.

Men, if you work some of these characteristics into your persona you'll improve your success with women instantly, have more power in dating, and free up time to focus on more important things.

Now for the ladies — I've given you a great blueprint for avoiding the kinds of men you profess to despise, but I fear it will inevitably fall on deaf ears. You are innately and viscerally attracted to men who display these characteristics, which is why many of us have worked hard to develop them as second nature. Sorry.

For the majority of you, only when your sexual marketplace value falls will you make good on your cries of "hating players" and "just try to find a nice guy." If you're finally at this point, follow this advice to the letter and you will live happily ever after…at least until the divorce.

How To Get Everything You Want

November 5, 2013 | by Mark Ford | Link | Original Link

I've heard various bits of hearsay science around human beings only being able to count to three in our brain (e.g., 5 is represented in our brain as 3+2).

Whether or not that's true, I seem to find that achieving almost anything can be distilled to a core of three points. Once all the waffle is stripped away, any further advice will always be built upon them.

This is not to say that more in-depth research is useless, just that the fundamentals never stop being required and refocusing on the basics is a good way to move past a sticking point.

Goal: Build a physique like a male fitness model.

Steps:

1. Gym three times a week
2. Eat properly (lots of eggs, steak, veggies etc.)
3. Get a good amount of sleep each night

Timeframe: 6 years*

That's it.

There is no "One surprising secret to…"

There is no "Top 10 things that will help you …".

There is no "Science reveals new method for …".

Everything comes down to a simple plan, discipline, experimentation and persistence through failure. I've already written about the six points I consider to be fundamental and universal desires. Here is everything you need to achieve each one. Life transformation guaranteed in a period of 5 – 15 years.

Be respected, popular and charming

1. Understand your input to someone's perspective in five minutes is a tiny speck compared to the thousands of other reference experiences they used to build their current frame of understanding. The reverse is also true.
2. Provide opportunities for other people to talk. On an interpersonal scale this means having your mouth shut more often than open. On a societal scale this means organizing events of any kind with some social element.
3. Give time, compliments, attention, good conversation, introductions, gifts, loans, advice on situations you have experience with etc.

Have lots of money

1. Work
2. Don't spend all of your paycheck
3. Invest

Be intelligent

1. Read
2. Listen to podcasts
3. Talk to people that are highly opinionated or also follow the first two steps (bonus points if they are a recognized expert in a given field, usually the most opinionated and who have done the most research of everyone)

Get a girlfriend

1. Talk to girls you find attractive
2. Ask them out
3. Close

Own your own time

1. Develop a practically useful skill like plumbing, computer programming (not pushing papers at a desk)
2. Offer to exchange labor in that field for money to individuals that require that service
3. As your clientele grows, hire someone else to do the bits you dislike or are bored with. Eventually someone else provides the pair of hands that does every part of the job, and you just perform basic quality inspection (doesn't take long) and receive the check

From these lists, you may realize you're overcomplicating things and that you're doing one of the steps wrong. Either the solution will be immediately apparent or you will know what exactly further research should be focused on. If you are not satisfied with your Generation 21st Century approved Life Fulfillment Plan, feel free to return it, it comes with a 100% money back guarantee.

*For those on the impatient side, this duration can be shortened with steroids at the expense of your wallet and chances of a liver failure. However, it will still require years of hard work.

Woman From MTV Demands Free Stuff From Us

November 5, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Some time ago, I wrote a piece titled All Girls Are Cheapskates. In it, I presented a small sampling of miserly and—as I termed it at the time—"tacky" behavior women have exhibited in my presence with respect to money in the recent past. The goal, of course, was to illustrate a truism that's all too evident to any man who's dated a lot—women are allergic, and generally unaccustomed, to spending their own money. Many of the commenters enthusiastically cosigned the sentiment, adding their own vignettes and examples that supported the overall thesis. That, I thought, would be the end of it.

Then, a few days ago, I received the following request from a woman, a Helena Kincaid, who claimed to be a casting person for an MTV reality show called "Real Life" which, she added, was planning an episode on dating cheapskates. Some basic triangulation suggested she was telling the truth. She'd apparently, run into my "All Girls" piece in a routine Internet search.

Hi!!

My name is Helena Kincaid and I just came across the Return of Kings website and read your post "All Girls are Cheapskates"... I am writing to you because I am currently working on casting an episode of MTV's True Life. The subject of this episode is "I'm dating a Cheapskate". I was wondering if it's possible for you to put out a small blerb on your website asking your readers if they, or anyone they know is "dating a cheapskate" and would possibly be interested in being on the show. If not no worries, but if you could it would be a great help!! Please direct emails to this address: datingacheapskate@gmail.com

Thank you so much!!

Have a great weekend,

Helena

p.s. I attached the Casting Call document that you could use to repost. Thank you again!!

Seeing the writing on the wall, I responded with the following polite message.

Helena,

Thank you for your note. I would refer you to our sponsorships page (http://www.returnofkings.com/sponsorships).

I hope it's not lost on you that, in the end, you're merely proving my point that all women are cheapskates. Here you are writing me--without a tinge of irony--asking for what amounts to a free advertising campaign. It's like you can't help but try to get free stuff from men.

I guess I can't blame you since, probably 7 times out of 10, that kind of thing works. I'm convinced that any half-way attractive girl must have a massive savings-account balance.

Let me know what you think.

Warmest regards,

T.

Unsurprisingly, she lashed out at me immediately, revealing her true intentions and views.

I think you're a misogynistic ass hole.

Fuck you and all that you stand for.

warmest regards,

Helena

I was quick to point out her brazen hypocrisy.

Dear Helena,

It seems like you thought I was "misogynistic ass hole [sic]" and hated "all that [I] stand for" well before I pointed out your miserliness. That means you were being phony just to get something out of me (for free).

So, on top of being cheap, you're also manipulative and dishonest.

Will you at least admit to that much?

Kind wishes,

T.

In a last-ditch effort to exercise some measure of power over me, she withdraws from the conversation with the implication that I was the one who was pestering her when, in fact, the opposite was true.

please don't email me again.

Beyond proving my original assertion that all women are cheap, this exchange illustrates the level of manipulation and disingenousness to which some will stoop in order to parasitically extract free stuff from men.

But despite all that went on between us–and in a spirit of forgiveness and generosity–I've decided to comply with Helena's "request" and put out this short "blerb" [sic] plugging her show, setting aside her rather unsavory disposition and vulgar demeanor. If you or anyone you know is interested in being on this show–and working for and with Ms. Kincaid–feel free to reach out to her directly at the contact information above. Best of luck in your auditions!

The Worst Bang Of My Life

November 6, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

In 2005, I had no semblance of “game” and had only been with a handful of girls. This included the one I had just broken up with, a terrible choice of a girlfriend who was an ex-stripper and ended up cheating on me. As an already avid drinker, I escalated things and would charge out at nights, drink very hard, and try to basically bang anything. And anything I did.

Living with my buddy who had game was helpful, as we’d go out and he would make me approach girls. Also living in one of the sluttiest cities in America did not hurt either. Anyway, usually after my second Long Island iced tea I’d start approaching on my own. I would keep drinking all night, penning my then nickname of the “suicide bomber” as in the process of taking myself out I’d take down any girl around me. To say my quality varied wildly is an understatement. I banged average girls, I banged chubsters, I banged a legit 8, and even a girl with a great body but askew face.

One quick side note: despite the fact that I’ve always had a distaste for fat girls, back then I was more concerned with just quantity of notches than anything else. The idea that I could go out and come home with a girl was so new to me, that it trumped any quality control I would try to implement. So while I hate to admit it, at times I delved into the underbelly of society while under the influence of an abundance of alcohol.

Eventually my buddy started hooking up with a cute girl who had a big social circle of slutty friends, of which I dabbled into two and one…well…led to this story.

The Joker

The first one I ended up banging was actually pretty cute. She was 6’1 and had monstrous fake breasts that were buoyant enough to float a sinking elephant, but cute nonetheless. Unfortunately, every time we’d have sex she would just stare at me and smile nonstop. I’m talking the biggest shit eating grin you’ve ever seen, and for no reason whatsoever. Eventually I couldn’t take it anymore and stopped seeing her, solely because she reminded me of the Joker and it freaked me out. But she wasn’t the worst bang of my life. Actually, this really has nothing to do with the main point of this story. I’m just trying to soften the blow I’m about to share with all of you by citing to at least one decent pull that year. It was actually her friend. The one that my buddy to this day — 8 years later — still reminds me of. I am referring to…

The Seven Layer Burrito

I remember it was cold that night. Because of the cold, I had made some chili in the crockpot for dinner and there were a lot of leftovers. I also remember my buddy and I taking several shots of vodka before heading to our favorite bar to pick up girls. I remember ordering our standard Long Island iced teas, and then ordering another one after finishing the initial one. Then it gets foggy.

At some point, after likely striking out with the clientele of the bar, my buddy’s girl came over with this other friend. To paint a good picture, imagine a indisputably fat girl with curly hair, tall, pale and annoying as hell. Now add another 30 pounds to that and give her red hair, and you have this girl. We all started drinking together, and eventually after a few minutes of massaging her backfat rolls we started making out. We left hand in hand from the bar, in plain view of all the patrons. I do not remember this, but of course my buddy was more than willing to share these details with me the next day. However, this was not the worst part of the story.

We all took a cab back to our apartment, where my lover for the night decided to first attack the crockpot of chili. She ate the ENTIRE thing before waddling her way into my room. Sadly this part I remember because of how traumatic/surprising it was. Even more sad is that I followed her into that room. However, this was not the worst part of the story.

Once inside we started to go at it. Thankfully, I was so drunk that I only remember snippets of the fornication, saving my mind from irrevocable damage. Her breath smelled like chili. Like Magellan, I had to navigate the waves of her body to find the orifice by which to copulate. And for some reason, she demanded I punch her in the face during the act. She also demanded that she be choked. So there she was, this rotund mass of a girl resembling the worst version of Pippi Longstocking you can imagine — if you can imagine her with elephantitis of the body — with a belly full of chili asking for violent acts to be performed against her for purposes of reaching orgasm. However, this was not the worst part of the story.

We fell asleep and the next morning I snuck out early to walk my dog. When I got back she finally came out of my room. My buddy was already on the couch with his girl, watching the debacle come to a conclusion. She slowly and steadily lowered her massive self to the floor, and started rolling around the carpeted flooring with my dog. As I stared at this sight, now sober, I felt great shame for the first time in a long while. I looked over at my buddy, and he was now mimicking the Joker of the story above, smiling incessantly. I knew I would never live this down, and so did he.

And then it happened. Growing tired of the three minutes of physical activity with my dog, she grabbed onto the dining table to help elevate her gravity-challenged self to a standing position. Upon accomplishing this feat, she…with all sincerity…presented the following question:

> I could really use a seven layer burrito right now. Mmmmmm…does anyone else want to come with me to Taco Bell? Who wants to go to Taco Bell?!?

This was the worst part of the story. Perhaps she lost the genetic lottery and was ugly. Perhaps she was wasted and that led to her desire to down the crockpot of chili. Perhaps she was abused and had some mental issues leading to the aggressive requests for rough sex. But that next morning, after no longer being drunk, and having just ate a quart of fucking chili the night before, she still had not only the desire but the utter lack of shame to outwardly state her ridiculous need for a fast food burrito. A part of me died that morning. I hated myself. Not only did I degrade my own self worth, but I validated hers.

Conclusion

That was eight years ago. Yet a few times a year, even now, my buddy reminds me of the Seven Layer Burrito girl. Partly to give me shit, but also partly to show how far I've come. If you have been reading ROK and/or Roosh's blog, you know that I've had some crazy success this year. But as with any student of the game, it was not always like this.

In the winter of 2010 before a trip to Colombia I googled "Medellin sluts" and that let me to the forum, which changed my life drastically and for the better. I've never hit such a low again in my life, and every year my percentages of "unmentionables" decreased significantly to now being nonexistent.

I really wish that I could take that one back…a mulligan if you will. But I can't. Hopefully, however, this story can at least show you how low one can start. And it was pretty damn low.

5 Reasons Women Should Come With HoFax Reports

November 6, 2013 | by Franchise | Link | Original Link

My first car was a 1998 Honda Accord named Penelope. She had about 150,000 miles when I got her. She was a deep plumb color, and I really loved that car. We had a good run, but Penelope passed away a few days before I was to start my first real job so I figured it was time to buy a decent car.

First, I determined my price range and then figured out what type of vehicle I wanted. After about two weeks of research, I decided to get either an Audi A4 or a Volvo XC-90 that was a couple of years old.

I drove past an imports auto dealer and saw a 2011 Silver A4 with low mileage and an SMD package that was priced about $5,700.00 below market. I pulled into the parking lot, test drove the car, and went inside to talk to the manager about pricing.

The manager's name was Ali and he was an overweight Middle-Eastern guy who looked like he had a lot of money. He pulled up www.cars.com and compared the price of the Audi I was looking at with other Audis in the area with similar mileage and said that he was unwilling to haggle because it was priced so competitively.

I responded that I needed to see a CarFax Report before I could continue discussing price.

At this point Ali stopped me, threw his hands up in the air defensively and said, "Whoa, whoa, whoa. The past is the past. What does that have to do with today? You're going to hold the car's past against me??"

Okay, Ali didn't really say any of that. But I don't know how many times I have been talking to a woman with a questionable past who has a higher kill count than Ted Bundy who acted like just because something happened in the past, it cannot, and should not, be used as an indictment of her character. This proposition is divorced from reality. When you think about it, everything that anyone has done before the very moment in which they are living is “in the past.” If you can’t judge a person based on all of the things that he or she has done, what metric are you to use?

And some people have an aversion to the word “judgment.” But as far as predictors go, looking at what someone has done is the best way to figure out what they are likely to do in the future. I’m not advocating that only untainted women should be fooled with (yes I am). What I’m saying is: every woman should come with a HoFax Report, confirming the number of previous partners, age, and a history of significant sexual encounters. Here’s why:

1. Women Lie

It’s common knowledge that you can’t take a woman’s word on the number of sexual encounters she’s had. Odometers get rolled back all the time. “Seven” can really mean 21, with 14 dudes that “didn’t count,” simply because they “weren’t in a relationship.” As I progress through my twenties, I have found that 27-year-old Becky likes to pretend that her 20-year-old self, who hosted more trains than Amtrak, never existed. Women also lie about their relationship status. We all know what it’s like to waste hours with a girl, buying her drinks and feigning interest in boring conversations about her vegan diet or her roommate’s kitty, only to find that she is uninterested because she has a boyfriend. Before I even ask you where you’re from, show me the HoFax.

2. Partner Count Is Too Blunt A Metric

Even if a girl is honest about her number, a girl who has had sex with one guy a year for the past ten years is a lot different than a girl who had sex with one guy for five years and then had sex with nine guys in the past two months.

3. Know Your Odds

Although knowing the skinny on a prospective girlfriend is the more respectable function of the HoFax Report, its utility in more hedonistic pursuits should not be undervalued. If you’ve been striking out all night and last call quickly approaches, you don’t want to waste your time with the metaphorical Jaguar; you want the 1992 Toyota Tercel because you know you can close the deal. No credit, no problem.

4. Never Trust Other Salesmen

Nine times out of ten, the only insight you have on a woman outside your friend group is what her friends tell you about her. This creates a problem since a) women lie and b) girls don’t know how to be friends. With those two factors in mind, a girl who has a desperately single friend is trying to pawn her off on some unsuspecting guy because she’s tired of listening to her friend’s problems. So when you ask a potential mark’s friends about her, you'll undoubtedly hear about how she is so much fun and such a good girl. What you won't hear is that she's still hooking up with her ex-boyfriend from three years ago or that her birth control method consists of taking Plan B with her non-fat Caramel Frappuccino with no whip every morning.

5. Safety

Some cars, and women, are "sick." I don't want a vehicle that will land me a highly infectious and possibly terminal disease. At least not without a heads-up.

Bottom line, you give me the information and I will decide if I am going to continue the conversation. If Ali had told me that the Audi used to be a rental car in Bangladesh and it had been involved in a number of car wrecks, that doesn't necessarily mean I would not have bought the car (yes it does). It just means that the amount of resources I am going to put into getting the car, and subsequently the expectations I have for the car's performance, will be more realistic.

I'm not stupid enough to think that this principle doesn't apply to me too. I've been in numerous relationships with girls I don't like. Hell, I even almost got married one time. I like to think that those experiences don't define me, per se, but they do provide a mountain of insight into my mindset and the approach to life that I have.

Heraclitus put it this way: character is destiny. You can only judge someone's character based on what they have done.

Just show me the HoFax.

How To Close With Women: Part 2

November 6, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

My previous article left off with you taking a cab to your spot and today concludes this 7 Part Series from Approaching to Closing. This is the big kahuna of vital information. The good news, if you've made it this far with the Starbuck's Slut, is that half the battle is over and now the real fun begins. She may have a great personality and she might be a blast to hang with, however, the ultimate reason for going on a date with her, is to see what she looks like naked and have a good, sexy, mutual agreed upon romp in the hay.

You arrive at your pad and for simplicity sake, let's assume that it's an average apartment. If you have a mansion, then the work got even easier, however, I don't have a mansion and most guys don't, so an average apartment it is. If you followed my 11 Step Prep For A Night Out, then you already have cleaned your apartment and it's in perfect condition for a sexy guest. Here are the 5 Steps To Sex once she's inside.

5. Get Her Comfortable

From the moment you walk in, have her take her shoes off. You want her to be comfortable and you don't want your carpet fucked up, so tell her shoes come off at the door. Congratulations! She's already getting undressed and you just opened your front door. Also, this gets her in the mode of taking clothes off. Progression Gents, progression…

Tell her where your bathroom is so she can freshen up, or whatever the hell it is that girls do in the bathroom.

4. Pour Her A Drink

Don’t ask; assume she wants another drink. Having been observant at the bar, you’ll remember the type of drink she likes and pour her one accordingly. Do a cheers with this toast: “To beautiful women with dirty thoughts”, followed by a kiss. If she responds to this, then you may continue to escalate to sex. Yes, it can happen that fast, but let’s say she needs to be ‘warmed up’ more…

3. Turn On Background Noise

This could be you turning on some music, to throwing on a Netflix show; the point is, you need to have some type of sound in the background. When all is quiet and you’re getting your freak on, it’s weird. It’s like sex in a funeral home: there’s nothing sexy about it. Throw on some Marvin Gaye, Young Jeezy, Tupac, Rolling Stones, or whatever the hell it is that you like. Stay away from extremes with highly emotional topics and obviously stay away from sappy love songs.

2. Physically Escalate By Testing Her

Let’s say you’re sitting on the couch with her watching House of Cards on Netflix and she’s resting her head on your chest, well unless you want to become a pillow for her you have to make a move. Offer her a massage to warm her up, or ask for one. A massage can get a girl wetter than Niagara Falls when done smoothly. Another one is to have her pour you guys shots and after doing one, start making out with her. Don’t be like a 12-year-old boy and grope her madly. Be smooth and non-needy about it. Grab her ass, lightly graze her breasts, hold her face in your hands and mix it up. IF she’s responding positively, then amp it up and go with taking her shirt off first, then her bra.

Another GREAT move to test her receptiveness, is while you're making out, to put her hand on your cock. This is literally the best move in the world. It immediately sets the tone for your interaction, as well as giving her the opportunity to take it out. If you have an extraordinary cock, don't be afraid to whip it out and gently place her hand on it. Any girl who has an inkling of wanting to fuck you, will then start giving you a handjob or immediately go to town with a blowjob. This move has literally NEVER failed me. It's money.

1. Fuck Her Like A Pornstar

There are few things in life as joyous as boning a new hot girl for the first time. This is your reward for the rejections and flakes. Enjoy it and don't let her forget about you easily. As you guys have consensual sex, pull her hair, give a few good smacks on her ass and pound her pussy like it's the last pussy on earth you'll ever have. Don't focus on making her cum. It doesn't really matter. What does matter is that while you're getting your enjoyment she will conform to you and to pleasing you. Girls are born pleasers and when they have the opportunity to sexually please an alpha male that they are attracted to, it becomes a major turn on for them.

Pound her good and cum on her face. Finish by standing up and having her suck your cock on her knees. Then get vocal as you cum by holding her by the throat (gently of course), and blowing your load on her face, by saying this: "You want my cum? Take my cum. Are you my slut? Good girl." By saying this you're starting the psychological game of Deep Conversion, should you decide to keep her around for more than just one night.

Lastly, keep your word of getting her home, by getting her a cab or dropping her off. After you drop her off, send her a text like this:

Sample Texts

You: good times tonite, had no idea you have such a sex demon in u

Her: lol! I'm normally a GOOD girl

You: i'll bet. you have fun?

Her: Tons! :) Lets do it again soon

The point of this, is to get her texts CONFIRMING her good time with you and the consensual sex that you two had. This is in case she gets a case of Buyers Remorse and cries rape later. Heed my advice: The after sex texts are extremely important.

This concludes the 7 Part Mini Series: Approach to Closing. I hope you enjoyed it. Study it, use it and let me know about your experiences: ChristianMcQueen@yahoo.com

An Examination Of Cult Leader Game

November 7, 2013 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

The 13th of every month is gun cleaning day in the Chubbs household. I wake up and get the oil out, really lubing them up good before I scrub off the rust and make sure everything still fits smoothly into the slide – then I kick my woman of the week out and begin cleaning my guns, har har har great joke Billy. I also make and shine up a new tin foil hat too, since after awhile the rays wear down the protective metal coating – but you guys already knew that.

While cleaning I like to watch documentaries. This week's fare was called Waco : The Rules Of Engagement (it's available on youtube). It's a surprisingly unbiased documentary, given it's content, and the sheer bold facing lying of some of the agency directors is absolutely fascinating to watch. If you're the kind of person who doesn't hear demonic voices coming from their neighbour's dog, I recommend watching it.

Emma is a spy for them James kill Emma to save the world James

For those of you who don't know what Waco is; Waco in general refers to a siege by the US government on a religious cult's compound outside the town of Waco, Texas. The cult called themselves the Davidians and it was run by one Vernon Wayne Howell, a native born Texan who went to Israel and changed his named to David Koresh so you already know he's sane. (Interesting fact: Vernon – who will be referred to as David from now on – was born to a single mother; make of that what you will) David's childhood and teenaged years were incredibly pathetic. His mom, like many single mothers, selfishly shacked up with a terrible man and David was that pathetic kid even the losers spat on. According to Wikipedia, that reputable source of everything; "Due to his poor study skills and dyslexia, he [David] was put in special education classes and nicknamed "Mister Retardo" by his fellow students." I lolled.

Make way for the messiah!

David then dropped out of high school. Soon he [allegedly] began to tap some young teenage trim, quickly [allegedly] putting Retardo Jr in her oven. Then he joined a church and [not so allegedly] went straight for the pastor's teenaged daughter. David had his priorities and he chased them with the admirable fury of a hungry bear going after Timothy Treadwell. (I…also watched the documentary Grizzly Man while cleaning my guns) The pastor kicked David out of the church due to the sheer persistence of this underage hunting jackanapes. You can hang a piece of meat over a hungry dog and it'll eventually stop trying to jump up and get it – hang some jailbait over David and he'd leap until he was crippled.

With no immediate teenaged poosy on his horizon, with no equitable job skills and an undignified drop out of the Texas educational system (a state where actual graduates barely rank above lukewarm potato in the intelligence range, according to popular American media) what did David do? Why he did what any one of us would do; David proclaimed himself god. Classic game move. He joined the Branch Davidians, themselves a splinter faction of The Shepard's Rod – take from that name what laughs you will – who themselves were a splinter faction of the Seventh Day Adventist Church; basically one big ski slalom of sexually tense holier then thou crazy. Then he told all the Davidians that he was the messiah, the Jesus of the 20th century. They believed him and moved with David to a remote compound to pray and stockpile guns. Just another day in 'Muricah.

No no, what god meant was 'thou shalt not kill…without armor piercing bullets y'all!'

But wait Billy! How did he prove he was god you ask? Did David perform miracles? Did he walk to the top of a mountain and moon the heavens while thunderbolts pelted ten new commandments (mostly espousing rights to jail bait and guns) onto his ass? No dear friends, David did something far more convincing; he took random passages from the bible that vaguely alluded to anything you can possibly think of and said it was referring to him. He also played the guitar in local clubs and tried to start his own record company but failed because of a lack of funds; plus no one was interested in joining a label called I'm Literally Jesus records. David was a loser. David was god with an AK47 and a 5 inch erection.

Until the Man came to burn down his little slice of eden and kill him, David spent all day reading to his followers about how he was totally god, sending the adults out to work to make money for the church (him) while he stayed at the compound tuning his guitar and banging their teenaged daughters. And these weren't the ugly offspring of potato people – there was some nice trim in that compound. Semi-attractive and otherwise clear minded adults willingly listened to, toiled away and gave their teenaged daughter's flesh saddles to a man known to most people as Mister Retardo. All this was achieved because David was shamelessly confident in himself.

David Koresh; patron saint of playa's everywhere

Other cult leaders share(d) similar lives. They have no credentials, no skills – most are not even charming. They wouldn't last a week on a real job site. If they were military commanders the majority of their soldiers would be trying to surrender before they even hit the beach. Yet because David and others like him are shamelessly confident in themselves they get to live like kings. When challenged about their legitimacy they pretty much flip open to random pages in books, or play the chorus of pop songs or hell even just pointed a smudge on the wall and say: "There it is. I'm god. Me one you nothin' – where's your teenaged daughter?" They are god because they say they are. 9/10 people they say that to dismiss them of course, but the 1 who don't absolutely worship them. How many people currently worship you?

Now most of us don't want to be cult leaders – I sure as hell do (I'm a narcissistic sociopath) – but all of us can benefit from shameless confidence. In a sense that's the core essence of game; going at the woman you want to bang with the attitude that you're the 10 and she's the 1. And it works. Yeah there will always be naysayers, people who look down on you and belittle you what you do. People who might label you Mister Retardo. They don't matter. What they call you doesn't matter. You are who you want to be. David Koresh wanted to be god and slam some teenage clam. He did it through sheer confidence. The people who reject you do not matter because with enough persistence and belief in yourself others will accept you; even if you're beat, so long as you keep your head up and act like number one you will be treated as such by those who matter to your goals.

This all sounds like some self help, The Secret type baloney but those who are already confident, those who have disregarded the shame from other peoples opinions are nodding their heads in agreement because they know it's true. Shameless confidence trumps dignified humility any day of the week. Look how many otherwise attractive or incredibly successful men have mediocre wives and are totally whipped COUGH Kanye West COUGH. Look at how many ugly guys have gorgeous women taking their baby juice. And most of you will probably be saying "Yeah the guy's ugly, but he's probably rich or famous Billy, you beautiful bastard." To which I rebut; Prince William of England. Young rich royalty, not repulsive in looks, could only pull at best (with make up on) a 7 who doesn't exactly reek of intelligence or wit. He literally had a world of tight, beautiful women to choose from who would have jumped at the opportunity just to sleep with him – and I bet a good percentage would be more tolerable and witty then Kate Middleton is. Yet because he has zero confidence, and is dominated by the women in his life, he buckled under the first chick with shameless confidence who leapt in his way. Then again, Willy's a prince so he has to choose a wife with subtle looks and no personality because the royal family's image is so important to maintain right?

Ah royal grace and C minus bewbs

When I go out walking with no destination I try to strike up a conversation with every pretty girl I meet, sometimes even if they're with a group of friends or guys that are smaller then me. I have a lot of awkward conversations. I've been called every name under the sun. One time a girl straight up ran away, now there was a self-esteem boost. Mace has been pulled on me thrice; my fault for telling them they're good looking and asking if they'd like to get some coffee right? Those rejections roll off me because I know I'm awesome. I just have the rotten luck of living in a world where a lot of women aren't awesome. When I meet one who is, we have an awesome experience together. If I apply for a job and don't get it I don't care because I know I'm awesome. When I get my ass handed to me and knocked down to the mat I don't care because I'm going to get back up and keep being awesome, missing teeth, tears and all. A life lived without shame, a life lived with pure confidence is a beautiful thing to experience. Like wise Buddha said;

> "A life lived without shame, a life lived with pure confidence is a beautiful thing to experience." – Buddha, Corinthians 6:9

Of course shameless confidence isn't an excuse to be a lazy slob. Be confident enough to keep yourself clean and in shape for god sakes. A 300 pound basement dweller has already proven they have no shame and are much worse for it; but if you're fit and not utilizing your inherent awesomeness you're no better then morbidly obese James clicking life away in Warcraft while Emma's out spying on you James silence her James Emma's not real we're not real

So in closing; stop feeling humiliation because some stuck up broad rejected you. It's not your problem if that particular poosy doesn't realize how awesome you are. She spends her nights at home alone musing how pathetic you are while reading 50 Shades of Billy's

Chubb and sharing supper with her cat straight from the plate (true story) while you're giving some more intelligent chick the best O of her life. So far as we know this one life is all we got. It's too damn short to waste caring about what others think of you. Go forth and be as shamelessly confident as David Koresh was – just, you know, don't do anything else he did.

SPECIAL NOTICE : The Children Of Chubbs is now accepting enlightened individuals to join it's parish. If you have a median income of over $40,000 and one or more attractive teenaged daughters, please leave your E-Mail in the comments section and god (me) will contact you for your banking information and pictures of your daughter. Owning a gun is a plus but if you do not have one, one will be provided by god (me) along with your robes on arrival. Heaven is only a northern Canadian compound away.

Homage To Catalonia

The Spanish Civil War was a confusing war. On one side you had the Republic, represented by a hodge-podge of leftist unions and political groups, and on the other side you had the fascists, represented by General Franco, the Catholic church, and bourgeoisie elements.

The Republic (referred to as the “government”) had help from thousands of foreign volunteers who poured into Spain to defeat the fascists, which were supported by Hitler and Mussolini. George Orwell was one of those volunteers. What started as an idealistic campaign for socialism ended with him rushing to escape the country, not from the fascists but the socialists.

> We were getting near the front line now, near the bombs, the machine-guns and the mud. In secret I was frightened. I knew the line was quiet at present, but unlike most of the men about me I was old enough to remember the Great War, though not old enough to have fought in it. War, to me, meant roaring projectiles > and skipping shards of steel; above all it meant mud, lice, hunger, and cold. It is curious, but I dreaded the cold much more than I dreaded the enemy. The thought of it had been haunting me all the time I was in Barcelona; I had even lain awake at nights thinking of the cold in the trenches, the stand-to's in the grisly dawns, the long hours on sentry-go with a frosted rifle, the icy mud that would slop over my boot-tops. I admit, too, that I felt a kind of horror as I looked at the people I was marching among.

> The essential point of the system was social equality between officers and men. Everyone from general to private drew the same pay, ate the same food, wore the same clothes, and mingled on terms of complete equality. If you wanted to slap the general commanding the division on the back and ask him for a cigarette, you could do so, and no one thought it curious. In theory at any rate each militia was a democracy and not a hierarchy. It was understood that orders had to be obeyed, but it was also understood that when you gave an order you gave it as comrade to comrade and not as superior to inferior.

Orwell gave details of fighting in a war so cash-poor war that even bullets had to be rationed. Discipline in such conditions, where homemade grenades were fastened with tape instead of pins, was preserved because of desire to defeat Franco. The destiny of the Spanish people was at stake.

> You broke the tape and then got rid of the bomb with the utmost possible speed. It was said of these bombs that they were 'impartial'; they killed the man they were thrown at and the man who threw them.

As a matter of fact the stagnation on the Aragon front had political causes of which I knew nothing at that time; but the purely military difficulties— quite apart from the lack of reserves of men— were obvious to anybody.

> There seemed no hope of any real fighting. When we left Monte Pocero I had counted my cartridges and found that in nearly three weeks I had fired just three shots at the enemy. They say it takes a thousand bullets to kill a man, and at this rate it would be twenty years before I killed my first Fascist.

> You always, I notice, feel the same when you are under heavy fire— not so much afraid of being hit as afraid because you don't know where you will be hit. You are wondering all the while just where the bullet will nip you, and it gives your whole body a most unpleasant sensitiveness.

While Orwell gives a background on the political action, it doesn't come until the middle of the book. Therefore it's helpful for you to know that the historical story begins when General Franco attempted a coup with support of the church and nationalistic factions against the leftist government. This caused a spontaneous uprising among anarchists, socialists, and communists centered in Barcelona. The Western media, especially in England, portrayed the war as fascism vs democracy, but the left in Spain believed it to be their workers revolution. They confiscated land, collectivized factories, and set up revolutionary communities.

The Soviets came to help the government, but really they came to help themselves. They wanted Spain to be a reliable Soviet ally for its defense. Instead of helping the workers, they consolidated power, imprisoning and killing many who were fighting against Franco. The Western media did not want to admit their aid to the "democratic" government was actually helping Stalin create a Soviet puppet state.

By supplying arms and airplanes, Stalin was able to dictate terms. He wanted to prevent a full-blown revolution so that control could be maintained and he could slide into a functioning government apparatus, since revolutions are unstable and hard to manage.

> The thing for which the Communists were working was not to postpone the Spanish revolution till a more suitable time, but to make sure that it never happened. This became more and more obvious as time went on, as power was twisted more and more out of working-class hands, and as more and more revolutionaries of every shade were flung into jail.
> The whole of Comintern policy is now subordinated (excusably, considering the world situation) to the defence of U.S.S.R., which depends upon a system of military alliances. In particular, the U.S.S.R. is in alliance with France, a capitalist-imperialist country. The alliance is of little use to Russia unless French capitalism is strong, therefore Communist policy in France has got to be anti-revolutionary. This means not only that French Communists now march behind the tricolour and sing the Marseillaise, but, what is more important, that they have had to drop all effective agitation in the French colonies.

Stalin needed allies to preserve his power, and didn't care whether those allies were communist or not. In Spain, he used his propaganda machine to denigrate other political parties that were also fighting against Franco.

> One of the most horrible features of war is that all the war-propaganda, all the screaming and lies and hatred, comes invariably from people who are not fighting.

At the same time the government was fighting Franco, it was also fighting itself to consolidate its power into a Soviet-approved system. But since we know that Franco eventually won, it turns out that Stalin subverted the will of the Spanish people through his meddling and let them be overcome by a dictatorship that lasted nearly four decades.

> There was a dreadful moment when I kicked against a tin and thought every Fascist within miles must have heard it. But no, not a sound, no answering shot, no movement in the Fascist lines. We crept onwards, always more slowly. I cannot convey to you the depth of my desire to get there. Just to get within bombing distance before they heard us! At such a time you have not even any fear, only a tremendous hopeless longing to get over the intervening ground. I have felt exactly the same thing when stalking a wild animal; the same agonized desire to get within range, the same dreamlike certainty that it is impossible.
> When you are taking part in events like these you are, I suppose, in a small way, making history, and you ought by rights to feel like an historical character. But you never do, because at such times the physical details always outweigh everything else. Throughout the fighting I never made the correct ‘analysis’ of the situation that was so glibly made by journalists hundreds of miles away. What I was chiefly thinking about was not the rights and wrongs of this miserable internecine scrap, but simply the discomfort and boredom of sitting day and night on that intolerable roof, and the hunger which was growing worse and worse— for none of us had had a proper meal since Monday. It was in my mind all the while that I should have to go back to the front as soon as this business was over.

> The fact is that every war suffers a kind of progressive degradation with every month that it continues, because such things as individual liberty and a truthful press are simply not compatible with military efficiency.

> There was one man wounded in the face and throat who had his head inside a sort of spherical helmet of butter-muslin; his mouth was closed up and he breathed through a little tube that was fixed between his lips. > […]
> I wonder what is the appropriate first action when you come from a country at war and set foot on peaceful soil. Mine was to rush to the tobacco-kiosk and buy as many cigars and cigarettes as I could stuff into my pockets. Then we all went to the buffet and had a cup of tea, the first tea with fresh milk in it that we had had for many months. It was several days before I could get used to the idea that you could buy cigarettes whenever you wanted them. I always half-expected to see the tobacconists' doors barred and the forbidding notice 'No hay tobaco' in the window.

Orwell didn't leave the war unscathed: he was shot through the neck and had his vocal cords and right hand permanently damaged. He arrived as an idealistic socialist soldier but left a man jaded by the Soviet style of communism, determined to let the world know what a true danger it was. If you like Orwell and want to learn more about the Spanish Civil War, this book is for you.

Paternity Fraud Is Worse Than Rape

November 8, 2013 | by bacon | Link | Original Link

To me the word rape has just about lost all of its meaning. Thanks to feminists and the "rape culture" propaganda it has been devalued and now I get very suspicious whenever I hear that someone was a "rape" victim. However, one thing that has never lost its impact on me is hearing about paternity fraud. This always angers me because I know these men will never get the justice real rape victims can hope to receive. I believe paternity fraud is in many ways a far more sinister, long lasting, humiliating and painful act than rape yet no one seems to see the polarization of how each of these crimes are treated and viewed by society at large.

[image]

Today's Rape Is Different Than Yesterday's Rape

When I was growing up I used to associate rape with Hollywood images of some recently released convict breaking into a woman's home and brutally sexually abusing her and beating her up within an inch of her life. As I have gotten older, wiser and more skeptical I now know that scenario is the exception to the rule. Today in 2013 America, women can claim rape when both parties had sex under the influence of alcohol simply because she regretted it or did not like being "pumped and dumped." In fact now I tend to think the worst about a woman who says she is a rape victim because I don't know if her motives for claiming she was a victim of rape was an effort to get back at a guy, a cry for attention, or a combination of both.

The law as it is written with respect to rape goes above and beyond for women, leading many rape cases to go to trial with little evidence, all in an effort to show unwavering support for females. This legal bias has allowed women to get away with outright lying as the Duke Lacrosse rape case exemplifies and yet like the stripper in that case women still do not get in trouble for bringing false rape charges and ruining the lives of countless men. It must be nice for women to have so much support from the law with rape even when they are making up stories. Unfortunately, men are not afforded anywhere near the same support from the law in matters of paternity fraud.

Women Are Not Punished For Paternity Fraud

Paternity fraud clearly meets the legal definition of fraud which under the law is defined as an intentional deception made for personal gain or to damage another individual. However, it is currently not considered fraud under the law (women do not receive prison time for defrauding a man into believing the child he is raising is his own). Why is the law absent? Why doesn't it punish these criminals who are engaging in fraud by lying to a man about being the father of their kid?

Perhaps most painful of all is that when men find out that the child they are raising is not their own, they are almost always legally held responsible as the father even when DNA results prove otherwise. Try to image a scenario where a rape victim has to pay her rapist monthly checks for years after the crime. That would be unthinkable. So why are men who are victims of paternity fraud punished for years of having to write child support checks to the woman who defrauded him even after DNA testing has shown the kids are not his own?

Paternity Fraud Victims Are Adding Up

While Maury Povich is out there doing God´s work exposing the scandalous nature of women who are trying to defraud men, this subject does not get enough attention. Paternity fraud is far more prevalent than one realizes. In fact, a 1999 study by the American Association of Blood Banks found that in 30 percent of 280,000 blood tests performed to determine paternity, the man tested was not the biological father. While that number is high because those people already had doubts about the paternity, it illustrates how common this is and that there are many men being victimized by women.

In popular culture one of the most blatant examples of alleged paternity fraud is Klohe Kardashian, who I would describe as an albino Sasquatch in comparison to her short olive toned sisters. Kris Jenner, her mother, admitted to an affair around the time of Klohe´s conception years after the alleged father, Robert Kardasian, passed away.

Another recent example was celebrity crime boss actor from The Wire Idris Elba, who after DNA testing learned he was not the father of his son. Elba describes the experience; "You know, the truth is—like, even admitting it, I'll probably get laughed at for the rest of my life. But it is just tragic, and it happened."

When compared to genuine rape cases, paternity fraud is more common yet society refuses to address just how much damage these female criminals are getting away with at the expense of the male victims. Just imagine the psychological impact of being deceived into raising a child that you believe to be yours for decades and the permanent reminder of the infidelity your partner committed. It's easy to see why this crime is at least as damaging to the victim as rape, if not more.

The most egregious part of this crime is how callous the women are to the men they are victimizing. These women play on the man's emotions like a true sociopath by saying things like "look the baby has your nose and ears" to help pull off the ruse. What makes these women so much worse than the rapist, who also gets a thrill from the power of dominating the victim, is that these women often convince the man to love them and the baby all the while laughing behind his back knowing they are controlling this sucker into loving and supporting another man's kid.

Unfortunately I don't think anything is going to be done about paternity fraud in the future so that it receives the same legal treatment as rape. But the point of this article was to highlight just how hypocritical society is when dealing with two different issues that are damaging to both genders. The only way to make sense of the law and its rulings on these matters is simply to conclude society still believes women are tall children. This is why when men and women both have sex while intoxicated the law views women not as real adults accountable for their own behavior so they are able to cry rape if they did not like the outcome of a drunken hook up. This also explains why women are able to commit paternity fraud on men yet never be punished for the crime because society feels they should not be held responsible for their criminal actions since, like children, they did not know better.

In closing I think readers should be aware that while rape is the number one fantasy of women, the fact is no man has erotic dreams of being a victim of paternity rape.

For the purposes of this article all references to rape are pertaining to adult women. Child and male rape on heterosexual males are far worse crimes and are not to be included under the umbrella of the word rape for the purposes of this article.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. Stay At Home Moms Don’t Work That Hard

A Day In The Life

Wifey and the husband wake up at 6:00am and she starts to get herself prepared for the day. Then, she’ll get the kids up at 7:00 or so and see them and the hubby out the door by 8:30. What’s next? There’s an entire day of freedom from the little munchkins! She’ll go home, clean and tidy the house. It’s not even 10:00. She’ll go to the gym for an hour then head to lunch with girlfriends…maybe go shopping with them, or pick up a few groceries. She’ll pick the kiddos up at 3:00pm, then go home and “supervise” while watching whatever current garbage is on the HGTV network. At 5:00, she’ll start preparing dinner (if she bothers to cook). The husband comes home, and by 7:00 she checks out for the night as he does the dishes and helps the kids with homework. Maybe she reads them a story for an hour. ~~Have sex at 10pm~~ (oops, I forgot this was a marriage, so cross that off). Asleep by 11:00.

Please note, this is applicable to parents with school-age and above children. A toddler is a different ballgame, I would imagine.

These are very real stories that I’ve heard rehashed numerous times by some of my own family members and the wives of my co-workers. While they’ll never shut up about how mentally exhausting it is be a stay at home mom, and how they never get to sit down, it’s ridiculous that they think their life is somehow more stressful, or that they work harder than their husbands that deal with rush hour commutes, nagging bosses, deadlines, and the other pitfalls of a 9-5 career.

My mom stayed home and cared for my sister and I until we were both in middle school. She did things right: we had hot meals six nights a week, my dad read the paper after dinner (rarely doing dishes), and she did all the housework except for the manly stuff like mowing the lawn and changing the oil. She did not spend hours on Facebook or at lunch gossiping with girlfriends. On top of that, if asked, she always said without hesitation, "Dad works much harder and endures much more stress than I do. I'm very lucky to be able to stay home."

That is the attitude a stay at home mom should have.

Do The Math

Total hours "worked" in her eyes = 6am – 11pm = 17 hours

In reality:

- 4 hours for getting the kids ready and then cleaning up/tidying
- 1 hour shopping for groceries
- 1 hour entertaining the kids in the afternoon
- 2 hours preparing a meal and then cleaning up

Once that's all added up it's only eight hours, and I'm being generous with that. Meanwhile, the husbands leave the house by 8:00, sit in traffic for an hour, get a measly one hour lunch, and sit in traffic for another hour to get home. Once home, they then have to clean up (because after all, she did the cooking) and then help the kids with their math homework because mom never studied anything that actually made her think, and therefore cannot help with math.

The most disgusting part about this to me is that I hear my these stay at home moms bragging about this to no end. Yet, they still hamsterize that they are somehow working harder and longer than their husbands. They also never acknowledge that the stress of the full-time workforce is far more intense than being a stay at home mom. While their husband is being chewed out by his boss, their biggest worry of the day is not burning the lasagna (assuming they can cook).

As Technology Evolves, Staying At Home Gets Easier

It's too easy to be a stay at home mom because of ever-advancing technology. In other times, tasks would take longer and more of the mom's day would be filled up doing other homely duties.

- Instead of making a scrapbook of photos of her children, she launches iPhoto.
- Instead of making several batches of a recipe to perfect it, she just searches Google for the easiest one.
- Instead of hand writing a letter to her mother containing pictures of the kids, she snaps a picture on her iPhone and sends it as an MMS.
- Instead of hand washing clothes and then hanging them up to dry, she presses a couple of buttons on the dryer.
- Instead of going to the farmers market for fresh produce, she has the groceries delivered straight to her home.
- And of course, she has a smartphone with Yelp that lets her order a variety of different meals so she doesn't even need to turn on the oven.

Suggestions For The Husbands

If I wasn't falling on deaf ears to my uncles and co-workers when talking about the red pill, here's a few ideas I'd throw out to make sure that their stay at home wife is far more accountable and contributes her fair share to the household. I can see from the look on their face that they know they work harder, but don't have the balls to say anything.

- Make her keep a journal of everything she does. Every day.
- Write down a schedule/to do list for her and make it clear that you expect it to be completed every day.

- If you can outsource some of your career work to her, do so. Make her edit your emails or reports to save you the time.
- If she's got the drive, have her start her own business. Being a "mom blogger" doesn't count.
- While she'll probably throw a fit at the idea, have her get a part-time job. She'll complain, "Nobody will hire me for what I'm worth," and not look hard. Keep bringing her job applications from Starbucks and Wal-Mart until she finally gets fed up with it and looks for a job she thinks she deserves. If she has a Liberal Arts degree, I wouldn't throw away the Starbucks application just yet.
- Make her bring you a hot lunch. Buy one of those boxes that delivery boys use to keep pizzas warm. If you live far from work and gas money for her to get there is expensive, get her a bus pass.

If she considers herself as an equal partner in the marriage, she should have no problem complying to the above, or getting a part-time job. If she fails to do either, then at least get her in the kitchen to make you a sandwich.

5 Ways To Eject From A Relationship

November 8, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Sometimes things in this world just don't work out. One of these things can be relationships with women.There are many reasons why a man would want to end a relationship with a woman. How he does it is important. In this day and age, the traditional means for breaking things off might not be in the best interests of men. Here are some ways to end a relationship or change it to a situation that benefits you.

1. Ghosting

This is for those liaisons where dealing with the woman can be difficult and embarrassing. Did that fatty you had a one night stand with find you on Facebook? That girl from the bar turn out to be a psycho? Easy, just ghost it. Don't answer their calls, texts or knocks on your door. Do not be at the usual spots where she could find you in public. She should get the hint after a few days.

2. Downgrading

This is where you downgrade a woman's status in your rotation. That Friday night thing getting a little too comfortable at your place? You getting weary of your main girl's techniques? Easy, just down grade her to "side bitch" status and see if she improves or not.

3. Revisionism

This one is a loan word from the history department. Its your life, you write the history. Your girl trying to get you to propose and you don't want to? Easy fix, rewrite the history. Tell her that she was a good friend and not the soul mate she thought she was. That should get her to find some other sucker to marry her.

4. Unilateralism

This is the one sided ending of the status quo in a relationship. You unilaterally cease being the monogamous partner in a pair bonding situation. You can tell the woman of this change of status or not, the choice is yours. You get the benefit of that steady access along with the benefits of being single again, if she plays along.

5. Amnesia

This is a surefire way to end things. Just never acknowledge her existence. When she asks questions, just give the standard "I dont know what you are talking about", "I have no recollection of those events", and the greatest: "Who are you". I have yet to see this one fail in ending a relationship.

Conclusion

Some might say these techniques are inconsiderate. While they could be construed that way, a man has to do what is good for him. If he puts her condition above his own for consideration he is not thinking rationally and is treading toward beta country. In today's world there is a reason why nice guys finish last.

Why Is Female Sex Tourism Embraced By Society?

November 9, 2013 | by bacon | Link | Original Link

Female sex tourists are usually older women from First World developed countries who visit developing countries looking for the “love” of a younger man. These relationships are transactional in nature where money and gifts are going to the younger men who in turn are providing sexual services to the women. In essence these mostly older women are engaging in prostitution by any black-and-white definition of the word.

One would assume that since society views men who visit prostitutes in a negative light they would also be critical of women doing the same thing. In the case of sex tourism, both older men and women from developed countries make trips to the developing world to pay for sex with partners far younger than themselves. However the way society and the media view the men and women doing the same thing couldn’t be more different. Male sex tourists are depicted, at worst, as criminals or, at best, as low-life scum taking advantage of poor desperate women. Meanwhile, the media practically celebrates women who do the same thing—in the form of films and articles—while the at-large society seems to accept this glaring double standard.

In my opinion, the articles and films are really grasping at straws to depict female sex tourists in a positive light to the public. However, any objective look at the films and articles on the subject suggests that they actively promote, rationalize, and condone what these wealthy older women are doing with poor young men from developing countries while on vacation.

The movie Heading South, as seen in the preview above, is about older French women visiting Haiti in the 1970s. They exchange their money and gifts to get sex from the local teenage boys. Can you imagine how vilified a comparable film about old American men paying teenage girls in Thailand for sex would be in news media outlets? I suspect news media would create stories reporting mass protests and boycotts of cinemas that decided to show the film.

It's safe to say that while the news media loves to go after any possibly deviant male sexual behavior like male sex tourism, they give women a pass for the same behavior. This why major motion pictures like Heading South and Paradise: Love (preview below) can be created with either news media complacency or support.

In recent years several articles discussing the phenomenon of female sex tourists have had writers trying to paint these women as victims who are tricked by local men who make them believe the relationship is about love and not money. For instance this is what one women comments as she realizes her boy toy was only with her for her money:

> I used to think Derrick was respectful of me and really loved me, until I heard him laughing with the other boys one night. It turned my blood cold.

In one article, For Love And Money, writers Deborah Pruitt and Suzanne Lafont argue against the use of the word prostitution for the relationship that female sex tourists have with the men they pay for sex.

> Male sex workers are involved in romance rather than sex tourism, because there is often a level of emotional investment that is not present in sex tourism.

The media is doing its best to either cast the female sex tourists as victims who are lied to about the nature of their relationship or they try to romanticize the relationship as deeper than prostitution. Also an implied message in the films above is that the female characters are only overseas looking for "love" because the men back home no longer desire them the same now that they have gotten older so these women are acting rationally by traveling to places where they are still desired by men.

[image]

I believe the goal of these articles and films promoting female sex tourism are largely to help women rationalize paying for sex. Female sex tourists are finding themselves in male territory as sex without feelings or a relationship element is difficult for many women to practice. Conversely, male sex tourists usually have no illusions about the transactional nature of their relationship with prostitutes, but this type of thinking is not as easy for women to achieve. Also, unlike women, older male sex tourists have typically had a lifetime of paying for sex one way or another—between divorce and courtship—so outright prostitution is not as hard of a transition for them. For older female sex tourists, it must be difficult to realize their vaginas, which at one time could command high value on the open market, now cannot even be given away for free.

While the media does its best to spin the reality about female sex tourists, the fact is these women are engaging in sex tourism because they are too fat, wrinkly, and outright painful to look at, so they have to pay poor men from third world countries for access to dick. The men they are fucking do so out of economic necessity and are disgusted with themselves. One of the male sex workers describes his experience with these women:

> They stink, have rough skin and look like old dogs. No wonder they have to pay for a man. . . Men won't touch them where they come from.

Only in the case of older women buying sex would you ever see films and articles putting a positive spin on prostitution. There is a long list of adjectives that the media uses to describe men who also practice sex tourism, but when women do it, the words associated with it are either positive and congratulatory, or even go as far to portray the sex tourists as victims.

The media understands that women have such fragile egos that any criticism of their behavior (solicitation of prostitution) is not permitted. In fact, it seems that the more women engage in undesirable behaviors, the stronger the need to celebrate the behavior (e.g., the fat acceptance movement, slut walks, pedestalizing single motherhood etc.). With upcoming demographic changes that will cause a large population of old single women, expect even more articles and films to promote female sex tourists so that they can easily rationalize exploiting young men.

People Don’t Know Shit

November 9, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

“It’s all one big conspiracy in the White House,” a cab driver exclaimed when we were talking about 9/11 on this year’s anniversary. I am pretty sure that he didn’t have a smoking-gun evidence of anything to substantiate any of his opinions that he was sharing.

I love how people who have no first-hand access to any information about what’s going on behind closed doors in political offices love to talk and hypothesize about the politicians’ motives, plans, and intentions. Do we realize how ridiculous we sound when we do this? And we do this everywhere—during a happy hour, dinner parties, etc. Sure, having strong opinions about politics, drugs, abortion, the death penalty, religion, terrorism, and other hotly debated issues makes us sound like we’re smart and we care—even if we talk completely out of our asses—but it’s unwise.

If you’re sitting in a classroom and one of your classmates gets up during a political science lecture and starts accusing some bank CEO of corruption or embezzlement, try to resist the urge to shut him up. Just laugh on the inside, and start thinking about where you’ll be going out that night or the night after until he is done dispensing useless information based on nothing but his own conjecture.

Go to your local Best Buy store and conduct the following experiment: Ask one of the sales clerks which laptop or camera is the best one for you to buy. How many of them are going to give you an honest answer? None. Do you know what the most honest answer should be every single time? Let me quote it for you: “I’m just a sales clerk. I don’t have any professional or educational background in design or manufacturing of the products you’re asking about, so I can’t really tell you much about which item is better. You are better off reading reviews online than asking someone like me.” This is no different in car dealerships, of course, where your typical sleazy salesman will try to make it sound like he’s a cutting-edge mechanical engineer who put the cars together with his own hands.

What about CNN and MSNBC? Obama gives a 20-minute speech, and the news hosts and their “panel of experts” belabor every word, trying to interpret them, while make a bunch of assumptions about what the President must have meant or what he really wanted to say. Who cares what they think? What can they possibly know about what’s going on in the President’s head? Being dressed up, having tons of make up, and sitting next to a shiny glass table at a TV studio doesn’t make them know what’s really going on.

Let’s face it: we don’t know nearly as much as we think we do, and we rely way too much on hearsay. Then, we take that likely false information and share it with our friends over drinks, when there’s nothing better to talk about. Perhaps it’s time we realized how little we know and start looking for more reliable answers to our questions.

One obvious and immediate solution is not blindly relying on what you read online and what you hear on TV, but giving those who are being roasted by the media the benefit of the doubt. It’s so easy to say what someone else could have done better, but it’s harder to look in the mirror and tell yourself what you can do better. Walking barefoot at a gas station is not the classiest thing to do, but that alone doesn’t make Britney Spears a demon. Twerking at the VMA awards show is obnoxious on so many levels, and even though I’m no fan of Miley Cyrus, that trashy move alone does not make her evil.

Traveling is another way of getting reliable information about other places in the world. I’ve never been to our so-called enemy countries, but I bet that I’d be pleasantly surprised in quite a few ways if I visited Syria, Lebanon, and even Afghanistan—and I hope to go there one day once the military conflicts in that region are over (and before the gender dynamics in those countries are poisoned by the ways of the West). I’m sure we could learn a lot from them.

So far, every person I know who’s traveled to Cuba reports that it was their most memorable travel destination ever. Roosh knows this better than anyone else, having spent time in such places as Colombia and Brazil on one hand, and Poland and Ukraine on the other. He must have seen some bad things but, overall, life in those countries isn’t as bad as he probably thought it was before he went there. He makes it very clear in his writings that many of the truly important aspects of living in Eastern Europe, Latin America, and other areas of the world that we’re used to thinking of as having a lower standard of living than the US are actually superior to ours.

They say knowledge is power. Does it mean that false knowledge is weakness? If so, let’s make sure that at the very least we don’t give away the power we already have and not let others mislead us so easily.

Stefan Kiszko: When Even Angels Cry

November 10, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

As September had just given way to October in 1975 in Britain, a young girl by the name of Lesley Molseed volunteered herself to go fetch bread for the family. In the cool air of England in autumn, her curly brunette locks bounced about as she worked her way towards a local bakery. Before she arrived there, she was snatched up by a man and whisked away to a steep hill known as Rishworth Moor. Once there, she was tossed in the grass, where she landed on her chest and she was viciously stabbed 12 times in her upper shoulders and back. Once dead, the killer lifted up her dress, exposed her underwear and ejaculated onto her undergarments. She was just 11.

Lesley Molseed

Once she was reported missing, an outcry for the discovery of her body erupted in her hometown of Rochdale. After three fruitless days, the police found her body on Rishworth Moor, decaying next to her blue linen backpack emblazoned with the symbol of Tweetie Bird. The public immediately called for the terrible, swift sword of vengeance in light of her murder. This lust for justice led authorities to man named Stefan Kiszko.

Eerily reminiscent of the Salem Witch Trials in the United States, a gang of pre-pubescent girls had claimed that Kiszko had exposed himself to them – they would admit, years later, they had completely fabricated their claims. When police followed up on the girl's claims, they thought this man perfectly fit their profile of a man who would kill and masturbate over a girl.

Stefan Kiszko

Stefan Kiszko was a 24 year-old tax clerk of Eastern European heritage. He was a large man, known for his kindness and social ineptitude. It would later be revealed that he suffered from hypogonadism, or in other words, his testes were severely underdeveloped and he never underwent full puberty. As such, he was literally a boy in a man's body. Due to this, he lived with his mother and aunt in Rochdale. Just before Molseed's murder, Kiszko's doctor had prescribed him shots of testosterone to treat his hypogonadism. As expected, this lead Kiszko to develop sexual thoughts for the first time. When he was apprehended by police, the police found "girlie mags" and bags of candy in his car, which confirmed suspicions of him being a sexual deviant and a pedophile.

Upon his arrest, he was taken to the local police station. Over the course of three days, Kiszko was subject to intense and grueling interrogations in which the police investigators pounced on every inconsistent statement Kiszko made. At the time, suspects did not have the right to an attorney to be present during questioning; repeated pleas for the presence of his mother were ignored. Eventually, Kiszko confessed to the murder, with the erroneous belief that he would be released to his home and subsequent police inquiries would prove his innocence.

They didn't. He was never released back to this home. Most damningly, his legal defense was woefully inadequate. His lawyers never presented evidence that he had broken his ankle the summer before the murder and, given his weight, could not have scaled the hill upon which Lesley Molseed was killed. Further, the semen samples taken from Kiszko contained no sperm while the semen recovered from Molseed's body indeed contained sperm. Despite all this easily verifiable proof of his innocence, Kiszko's legal team sought to reduce the charge to manslaughter on the theory he did, in fact, commit the murder, but due to his testosterone treatments, was operating under diminished capacity. His doctor, if he had even been called to testify, would not have agreed with that theory. Testosterone doesn't cause men to act like mindless beasts.

Regardless of all this, Kiszko was convicted and sentenced to life. The judge praised the verdict, noting the excellent nature of the police and investigatory processes, the adeptness of the prosecution and the sheer bravery of the young girls to come forward with their story. In the mind of the justice system and the hearts of the people of Rochdale, justice had been served.

For his part, Kiszko was thrust into prison, his child-like behavior and reputation as a pedophile having preceded him. He was subject to multiple beatings and rapes, with prison staff having to isolate him constantly to prevent him from being killed. His naive illusion that the criminal justice system would right the wrongs against him could no longer be maintained. Kiszko descended into paranoia and schizophrenia, believing the government and those all around him were conspiring to destroy his life.

All this time, his mother toiled endlessly to prove the innocence of her son to any sympathetic ear that she could find. For years, both Kiszko and his mother existed in suspended animation, with the hope for his vindication dying with each passing year. Yet, in 1988, a man in the government named Campbell Malone listened to Kiszko's story and looked into the case.

Over the next few years, it became readily apparent to those working on the case that Kiszko was completely innocent. Incidentally, Kiszko was up for parole in 1992, but the condition of his parole was that he admit he killed Lesley Molseed. About a year before his parole hearing, a formal judicial investigation was launched and upon hearing the evidence against upholding the conviction, Kiszko's name was immediately cleared by the court.

Given his years of psychological torture by being falsely imprisoned and the physical beatings from the hands of fellow inmates, he needed a few months of intense psychotherapy before he was allowed to return home to stay with his mother. Upon his return, he was interested in next to nothing, was given to panic attacks very easily and had the look of a man defeated. On the short trips he would take outside his home, locals noted his feet simply shuffled one in front of the other, his shoulders slumped completely – the gentle giant was completely and utterly crushed. He spent his remaining days of his life, alone, in his room.

Ronald Castree

Years would go by until a man by the name of Ronald Castree was arrested by police. He was apprehended for an unrelated sex crime in 2005, but when his semen was ran through the DNA database, a direct hit was found – the semen left on Lesley Molseed's undergarments. He was promptly arrested and tried for the crime. Castree, then aged 53, was sentenced to no less than 30 years in prison for his crime against Molseed. Vindication had come full circle; it wasn't just that Kiszko was innocent, but the guilty man had been finally put behind bars. Surely that brought some cold comfort to Kiszko?

It was a cold, wintry day in Rochdale, with snow dusting the roofs of homes and skirting about aimlessly in the slight breeze, just two days before Christmas and a mere 10 before 1993. Kiszko was at home, when he suddenly collapsed to the floor, his body and mind having fully given up on life. His death was officially chalked up to a heart attack – I suppose they would be right. His health had been poor for so many years and given his weight, he was simply was a prime candidate for a heart attack – but that isn't the story to be told here, right?

The main problem with stories just like Kiszko's is the man wronged often gets swallowed whole in narratives such as the arc of justice in the modern world or the woefully inadequate reparations that are afforded those so wronged. The desperate and vengeful retribution sought for the depraved murder of Lesley Molseed was needlessly wrathful. The angry casting about for a man on which to pin this evil has the fetid stench of pure revenge. Rochdale had been ravaged by economic troubles in the years before Molseed's murder and this situation was simply an outlet for all the pent-up frustration in the community.

In their iniquitous witch-hunt, they found a vulnerable and defenseless man. They looked aside while the police subjected a man to the third-degree of police interrogation; they didn't demand to hear the evidence against him. His defense lawyers were clearly incompetent and Kizsko's repeated assertions of his innocence while simultaneously believing in the intrinsic goodess of the system – when all signs point to the opposite – should have made a reasonable man pause for more than a few moments.

To quote the movie Boondock Saints, the preacher at the opening of the movie observes:

> Now, we must all fear evil men. But, there is another kind of evil which we must fear most…and that is the indifference of good men!

The greatest injustices don't occur when evil men hurt those around them, it is when men stand idly, refusing or unwilling to act. Where were the men calling for a rational and fact-based approach to Kiszko's arrest and trial? Where were the reporters commenting on the glaring deficiencies of the defense team? Did the police involved feel any guilt when they subjected a mentally-handicapped man to the third-degree, when they let the media railroad him? What of the men at large in the community – did not one of them have the balls to keep their heads screwed on straight? Hell, they said Kiszko had the shrunken testicles. At least he had them, unlike the men of Rochdale.

Who we should fear are the men that refuse to try to do right. The men who never take strong stands in their personal life on what they believe, much less men who don't believe in anything all. The men who mindlessly believe whatever drivel is spoon-fed to them by MSNBC or Fox News. The men who never criticize and men who do nothing but criticize. The men who seek first to judge before understanding, the men who seek first to burn off their rage before understanding the situation before them.

Men like Kiszko suffer because of the failure of good men to act. Good men don't stand idly by while the weak among them is carted off in a ridiculous witch-hunt. They don't give into the fickle, teeming emotions of the populace at large. Good men know doing right can often mean they must work at odds with majority. So many Western works highlight this, such as Arthur Miller's "The Crucible" and The Twilight Zone's episode "The Monsters Are Due On Maple Street." While most men will never be confronted with these sorts of situations, some are – like the men in Rochdale.

However, the men in Rochdale stood down. They caved into their baser emotions and ignored any higher callings about rationality and morality. They stood by while Kiszko was railroaded into his eventual death.

In the end, good men certainly don't refuse to admit when they did wrong. The community of Rochdale was strangely silent when Castree was arrested and convicted. I would chalk it up to moral weakness; the more generous would consider it social cynicism or emotional exhaustion. I strenuously doubt the latter.

With all that said, when all the political, philosophical and moral chatter dies off into muted silence, the legacy of a man remains.

Ivan Stephan Kiszko, born on the 24th of March in 1952 and died on the 23rd of December of 1992, wasn't just a good man, but a man whose life was completely marred by the ugliest shades of human nature. With his legal and personal innocence destroyed, he collapsed under the absolutely savage treatment from his fellow man.

Was it the frozen tears of angels that touched Rochdale with snow that day? Maybe not, but on that sad, blustery day a man passed from this earth, a victim of one of the most tragic miscarriages of justice of the modern world.

5 Things We Can Learn From The Movie Gran Torino

November 10, 2013 | by Truth Teller | Link | Original Link

Walt Kowalski, the protagonist of Gran Torino, is a product of an earlier time. In many ways, he is the red pill incarnate. However, his wisdom is unintentional. He lives without a care as to what others think. He is a threat to the modern status quo, giving modern men five tremendous lessons. In so doing, he transforms his neighbor from an omega into an alpha.

1. Men used to be raised with balls.

During Gran Torino, Walt faces many challenges, some of which may result in his injury, death, or people simply not liking him. Regardless, he does what he feels is best, and not what will endear him to others. The best example is his refusal to call the police and confronting intruders with a M1 Garand instead.

A man of today would never do that. Rather, he would call the police and retreat into his house, then pray that nobody entered the house. Men need to take action, not be passive. Successful people take action. Failures are passive. Kowalski is a product of the 20s and 30s, where men weren't subject to public ridicule. You did what you had to, if you were a man. Forget what everyone else thinks, and flout society's expectations. You are your own man. Never forget that, despite what all the betas, "white knights," omegas, and feminazis want you to believe.

2. Say what you want.

Walt Kowalski is an unabashed racist, calling Hmong "gooks," Italians "dagos," and Irish "paddies." But he doesn't conform to what's "acceptable." I'm not saying to be a racist, but I am saying that most guys who worry about society's reaction tend to be either betas or omegas. We move towards being alphas just by learning this stuff.

Now, let’s relate this to game and lifestyle in general. As men, we need to say what we think. Not just to other men or our friends, but to everyone. That doesn’t mean you should be the negative, energy-sucking fellow. Nobody likes him. Rather, be the man who isn’t afraid to disagree. Be the guy who isn’t afraid to take initiative and say “let’s do this.” Be the man who takes control of situations. For example, I’m a fraternity brother at my university. During pledge, our pledge class president wasn’t doing his job one night. We were being lax in our duties. I started getting people together so we could do tasks we needed to do, kicking some guys asses and telling them “get your ass in gear.”

I had my pledge brothers there the next three nights.

3. Age should be no object

Kowalski is at least 75 years old. Now, I’m not saying that you need to pull women at that age… nobody does. He doesn’t let his age get in his way. Rather than sit at home and meekly watch his world go to shit, Kowalski fights back, knowing he has nothing to lose. In the process, he helps his neighbor become a stronger man. This sets him up for a bright future, as long as he stays away from feminism.

Now, apply this to game and understand two things. First, we are conditioned to believe that passive game is worth everything. Look at the stuff that the media throws out there. I’ve seen many older men with young, hot women. Most people attribute that to money and looks. Well, these guys aren’t wealthy and aren’t good looking. Logically, they shouldn’t get women. However, they do.

4. Don’t take crap. Ever.

Kowalski doesn’t take crap from anyone. His family, friends, and neighbors all realize that he won’t tolerate dealing with nonsense, as is shown on his birthday. Pussies let people get away with giving them crap. The type who goes “it’s okay,” “not a big deal,” or “don’t worry.” Secretly, however, pussies are burning up on the inside. Men tell it like it is. We stand up for ourselves, something that we seem to have bred out of boys.

Women will try to shit test you. It happens and if you want to fuck them, you have to beat it. There are a lot of ways to do it. My favorite involves making her wait for me to finish something.

5. Don’t care what people think about you

Kowalski doesn’t care what people think about him. He is completely unapologetic in what he says, does, and thinks. He operates completely on his own terms, and doesn’t care if people like it or not. To me, this was a huge lesson, and one that I am still learning (I’m 18). The red pill reveals a world that most men will never enter. When you determine a goal and start pushing towards it, people will give you shit. People will be jealous. Some people can’t stand the idea of someone who speaks his mind regularly. Screw them, push yourself, live your life, and be an Alpha in every part of your life.

My friend, a fellow fraternity brother, is dating a girl – a bad idea to keep a girlfriend when you go to college anyway. This pussy is the epitome of the blue pill. A few nights ago, we performed one leg of a famous event at my university. It involves streaking. He texted his girlfriend to ask for permission to streak.

To reiterate briefly, Walt Kowalski is a man’s man. He teaches us the lessons that we need to learn. In many ways, he’s why I became interested in the red pill in the first place. He is what we should aspire to, although we do not need to be bitter or racists. Rather, we should take his positive attributes and apply them to our own lives. I have noticed that I have begun to live a far happier, more fulfilled life since I did.

Top 13 Hottest Miss Universe 2013 Contestants

November 10, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I just found out that Miss Venezuela won Miss Universe 2013. I can't say I'm a fan of her tranny face…

[image]

In fact, I think there are 13 other girls who are more beautiful than her. Here are my selections:

13. Korea

Thick hair and dynamite hip-to-waist ratio.

[image]

12. Slovenia

Her eyes are spaced too far apart, but otherwise she's very nice.

[image]

11. Costa Rica

Jaw can be less prominent.

[image]

10. Dominican Republic

I don’t have sex with black women often, but if I do, this is what I want.
[image]

9. Thailand

Cute and petite, though the ass looks like a pancake.
[image]

8. Spain

Classic Latin look, strong child-bearing hips.
[image]

7. Lithuania

Forehead is a bit large, but I like her look.
[image]

6. Australia

Very pretty, though shoulders are too husky for my taste.
[image]

5. Paraguay

Doll face, tiny body, gigantic ass. I would love to demolish her.
[image]

4. USA

If the average American girl look liked this, I would have never left the country. Beautiful.
[image]

3. Colombia

Stiff body language, but super gorgeous.
[image]

2. Hungary

This right here is why I live in Eastern Europe.

[image]

1. Finland

I don’t even prefer blondes, but this is as close to genetic perfection as you’ll get.

[image]

You can see all the contestants here.

In The Gunsight Of The KGB

November 11, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

My exposure to the postings here at Return of Kings and some of the travel threads at the Roosh V Forum have generated in me some interest in things Russian. I have never visited the country. My limited knowledge is confined to what books and films have conveyed. But assuming we are reading the right books or seeing the right films, we can still learn a great deal about a culture from a vicarious distance. I wanted to share my opinion of a book I recently read that might be of interest to the Russian enthusiasts here. And it transcends its genre. It is not just a great book about Russia, but a great book about a man's endurance, survival, and rebirth.

In the Gunsight of the KGB is a memoir by Alexander Ushakov, written in the mid-1980s but not published until 1989. It is his intensely personal account of his betrayal, arrest, show trial, and daring escape across the Soviet border with Turkey. Ushakov writes with that uniquely Slavic blend of philosophic irony and brooding intensity that I find very appealing. Besides being a compelling story, it also deserves much credit for predicting exactly the downfall of communism. Ushakov's impressions on his new life in America and American culture also make for great reading. One wonders why this book is not more well known.

In the early 1980s, Ushakov was a tenured Marxist political theorist working in an adjunct role with the Soviet Navy. He had actually gotten a Ph.D. in Marxism and had made it his life's work, but he secretly despised the communist system and spent his nights writing manuscripts predicting the collapse of the communist regime in Russia. Ushakov never published his writings, but a vindictive ex-wife discovered his passion and denounced him to the KGB. It was a classic, heartbreaking betrayal, and Ushakov's anguish and repressed rage from this unhealed wound runs like an electric current throughout the book.

Ushakov describes his arrest by two KGB goons with such passionate detail that the reader can almost see the unshaven mugs of the agents, and smell the vodka and sweat exuding from their pores:

> A strange looking man entered the room. He was short and fat, and wore a crumpled grayish suit and for some reason a large hat with the ear flaps turned up. A tramp. But his eyes were the most amazing part of his face. One was simply crossed, very much so, but the other had moved so far to the side that you only saw the white part of the eye. I knew it was merely a physical impairment, but…there was something hellish about it. Did they recruit people like that on purpose, or did they simply join the KGB?

He was later brought before a kangaroo communist court and subjected to a humiliating inquest. Ushakov openly defies the inquisitors, having nothing left to lose, and pours scorn on his accusers. One gets the sense that, by the 1980s, even the communist nomenclatura had secretly begun to lose faith in the system; but the system still had the power physically to destroy lives, and Ushakov faced at least seven years in a gulag for his writings. So he decided to act, against all the odds.

Released briefly pending the final phase of his trial, Ushakov knew he had only one choice: to flee across the Soviet border (then heavily militarized) into Turkey and freedom. To do this, he had to leave his new wife behind to face the fury of the KGB. But Ushakov had no choice. In words of wisdom that everyone thinking of starting a new life as an émigré should read, he says:

> Is it worth it for all of us to leave Point A for Point B? It is. If life puts us in a situation where you have to take the first step from falsehood to the truth, from evil to good, from the devil to God—get up and go. Go despite everything, go through fear of death, and even into the cross-hairs of a gunsight. If you're right, you will be saved by Providence, and then you'll be able to go through the whole alphabet, from A to Z and beyond.

Ushakov secretly gathered some basic outdoor survival supplies to endure a trek across the Caucasus Mountains, and slipped away to the closest city he could reach near the Turkish border (Batumi). From there he entered the wilderness of the mountains, and after many days of hiding by day and traveling by night (all described in harrowing detail), he found a way to enter Turkey, dodging a massive manhunt organized to capture him. From there he traveled to Germany, and finally to the United States.

The Caucasus mountains near Batumi, Georgia, crossed by Alexander Ushakov in his escape from the KGB

There are some poignant and moving parts of the book in which Ushakov describes his starting a new life in northern Virginia, and his longing for his homeland. He suffers the pangs of homesickness and guilt that all emigres suffer. Only those who have been uprooted from their cultural environment will fully understand his sorrow, despite his gratification at having escaped persecution. His attitude reminded me of the epitaph of St. Augustine, which read, "What makes the heart of the Christian heavy? The fact that he is a pilgrim, and longs for his own country." Ushakov would concur with this sentiment.

I found his impressions of American culture also to be worth mentioning. Describing the prevalence of American obesity, he tells us:

> Let's begin with the diet. American dogs, all of them, get special food. There is more food here in general than anywhere else in the world. And all kinds of food. If you know where to buy ethnic foods, you can have any cuisine you want, quite inexpensively. With such gastronomic temptations all around, it is hard to resist and not eat as much as you want, and you gain weight, and that's why diets are so popular with Americans…Naturally, this is astonishing to a person from the land of socialism, where all sorts of foods disappear periodically…

Readers will be gratified to learn, in an epilogue published at the end of the book, that Ushakov was ultimately able to get his wife permission to join him in exile, after much effort and expense.

Part adventure story, part memoir, and part political treatise, this book defies easy categorization. Anyone interested in Russian affairs will find it of great value, and anyone interested in tales of tragedy and triumph will find it inspiring and thought-provoking in equal measure. As a historical record it is precious, but as a personal testament it is timeless.

Who Do You Want To Be?

November 11, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Here at ROK we often emphasize the need for all men to take the “red pill” and subsequently accept the truths about sex and gender that it reveals. This is easier said than done, however: it is often quite challenging for men to process the revelations offered by the red pill. The truths it offers are generally obscured by mainstream societal narratives and when one is actually able to identify them amidst all of the misinformation, they can prove very difficult to accept and digest. Finding ways to properly and efficiently convey easily digestible red pill knowledge is therefore of crucial importance.

Every so often I come across writing in the manosphere that seems to go some way toward completing this mission. At RooshV Forum, a user by the name of “HeyPete” offered a post that seemed to fit this bill:

> My best friend in high school is the personal trainer for a DJ in LA, who was bigger in the 90’s and last decade. He DJ’d, had a radio show, produced, remixed for some really big name artists like Madonna, Britney Spears etc., etc. Shit music, but it made him rich.
> When his personal assistant had to miss some trips to other parts of the country (He somehow never missed overseas shows) my friend would go on the trips as his assistant.
> So, one such trip/long weekend, they came to St. Louis when I was living there. I also joined them in Indianapolis (Sat. night) and Columbus (Sun. night).
> I — simply a hanger on, who toted a few boxes of merch and set up some tables where they were to be sold and basically just hung out got laid all three nights. It was insane the crazy shit we could get hot, hot 18-21 year olds to do for a shirt or a CD — and the small chance to go to the DJs after party. Because, apparently, every DJ has an after party.

In St. Louis, about 20 girls came back to his hotel suite. I banged a solid 8 on the bathroom sink. Little brunnette about 18 or 19. I figured that would be the highlight of the weekend.

In Indy the next night. My friend and I ran the merchandise area when the DJ played. I started off slow, because I felt a little guilty giving this dude's shit away. Things like wiggle your ass, shake your tits back and forth. By later in the evening, after I said, "fuck it, when will this happen for me again." I was saying, "Let me put my hand down your shorts and see if your wet enough to deserve a CD." Or "Oh, you want a shirt. OK, let me finger your pussy behind the table." Boom. They didn't hesitate.

Back in the suite, it was incredible watching about a dozen 9s all trying to compete and outdo each other. They all wanted to screw the DJ, but they had no idea he was in another suite on the phone with his wife and soon fast asleep. Two were in skirts. I said, "I bet you won't take your panties off and leave them for the DJ." It was like they raced to slide them off. Later, one was sitting on the bed and I was on a chair halfway across the room. I motioned for her to spread her legs a little. She did. I gave her a thumbs up.

By this time I was as bold as ever. I motioned the hottest girl on to the balcony, asked if she wanted to meet the DJ. Of course, she is almost giddy with delight over the prospect. I simply said, “He likes me to see what’s up with a girl before he meets her. She took my hand, we went into the kitchenette area and she blew me with gusto. Then she let me do pretty much anything I wanted. I pulled some things out of the porn playbook that I never tried on “regular hookups.”

My friend was having a three-some, while five or six other girls watched. It was surreal.

All for the chance to meet a fucking DJ.

The next night in Columbus, same stuff. It was incredible having that much power (none of earned either) over seriously desirable chicks.

It was a little tricky when we had to kick them out and they never got to meet or > do the DJ. Lots of, “Sorry, he has an early flight. He was about to come over too. I guess his set really tired him out.”

> It was one of my best weekends.

This story serves as a powerful lesson for the blue pill, beta, “Nice Guys” out there, and a good way to encourage Red Pill acceptance.

For each of these hot, kinky cumsluts going out of their way to impress the DJ, there were probably 3, 4, maybe 5 or more ordinary guys out there in Columbus (or Indianapolis, or St. Louis) who were subsequently holding her up on a pedestal and wholeheartedly convinced that their individual girl was “not like that”. Their conviction isn’t hard to understand—according to the descriptions given, these girls probably weren’t hardened hookers/strippers or pornstars, but rather young, pretty looking co-eds from middle America. They didn’t necessarily look like the kind of girl you would expect to engage in such kink/debauchery upon first glance. For the ordinary guy raised on a steady diet of blue-pill delusion, it would only be natural to remain oblivious to all this.

To these males, these girls are princesses, future girlfriends and wives. They are females that these men hope one day to date and potentially wed. To HeyPete, the DJ, and the rest of his entourage, these girls are mere cum dumpsters and easy sextoys.

The other gameless men continue to pedestalize them, unaware of their real exploits and ignorant of the fact that these young women (like most of their peers in this society) don't really want to be on that pedestal in the first place. They'd rather party, travel, have fun with their friends, and hook up with hot (hopefully famous) guys. They'd rather be the hoe, not the housewife that so many of the young, naive, idealistic young dudes have been raised to want to turn her into.

I know how these young, idealistic dudes think because I was one of them not more than 3 or 4 years ago. I was one of many naïve, insecure "nice guys" spending entirely too much time looking up at the young women I'd placed on a pedestal for simply being cute and female.

And you know what these young women were doing while I was busy drowning in my own insecurity and lifting them onto pedestals they didn't deserve (or desire) to be on? They were out having fun, meeting cool guys who didn't put them on a pedestal and could treat them like the sexual beings they actually are. While I was busy rationalizing my belief that none of these girls were "like that" and coming up with new first date/gift ideas for my next encounter with them, these men were casually meeting and fucking them.

How did I get beyond this pathetic state of affairs? After a couple of rude awakenings I just stood up and asked myself a question:

“Athlone, who do you want to be?”

The question sounds quite simple, but really has profound implications. In this modern dating environment, it is crucial that young men face this query head on and satisfy it completely.

Young women know who they want to be during their prime years. They are going out, having fun, meeting new people and exploring their sexuality. They are socializing, they’re partying, and they’re fucking. They are doing so whenever, however and with whomever they please.

Why? Because they can. This isn't 1950. The days of "traditional" gender relations in the USA (and the fairly stringent limitations on female sexuality that came with them) are gone. The genie is out of the bottle and it isn't going back in.

So what are you going to do about it? Will you swallow the red pill, face the hard truths it will inevitably reveal and work toward the substantive self-improvement it demands? Or are you going to cower in the "nice guy" corner and remain ignorant to the sexual realities of your environment?

Would you like to be the "hot/interesting" guy banging these girls on bathroom counters on a whim? Or would you prefer to be the "nice guy" that those girls keep in the dark while they fuck those "hot/interesting" dudes on the bathroom counter?

When these girls head out at any given time to socialize/party/have sex, do you want to be one of the guys they seek out in order to do so? Or would you prefer to be one of the guys they leave behind as they do so?

Do you want to actually be the one night stand, or would you prefer to be the man who is merely stood up?

The choice is yours.

Stop Watching Porn

November 12, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Watch the video below. It is a TED talk about porn and masturbation.

It offers a lot of insight into an area that most guy don't stop to think about. Something that has become a normal, expected behavior.

Rather than summarizing the video I will offer what I can from my personal thoughts and experiences.

The Instinct

Men are sexual creatures. This is undeniable.

And at some moments there is a primal drive that kicks in. We need sex.

Maybe you're at the gym and a super fit girl walks by you. Or maybe you're perusing the internet and see an ad featuring a big titty model. Some hormones are released and then you can't think about anything but having sex. And hot bitches.

The Release

There are two ways to fix this problem. At least that I know of.

Sex and masturbation.

I think all guys can agree that sex is preferable. If you don't, then this article will fall on deaf ears.

However, masturbation offers immediate relief. An instant release of all the pent up sexual energy that arises in these situations.

And watching porn to facilitate this urge is only natural in today's digital age. It offers the stimulation you crave. In all of a matter of minutes. It's like magic.

But to what end?

The Problem

Watching porn is so fundamentally different from real sex. Watching people get after it does not equal making explosion yourself.

Like most habits, its effects take place over the long term. You fundamentally train yourself to release your sexual energy while staring at a screen.

Our brains are plastic, and the neural pathways that control these interactions can physically change. And so what happens when you see an attractive girl you want to approach? What happens when you're knee deep in some real sugar walls?

Your brain can get rewired to become aroused based off of looking at pixels. And things like touch, emotion, and the actual feelings of real sex can be dissociated from your arousal state. Symptoms like erectile dysfunction and social anxiety are common according to the research in the above video. Some people subconsciously lose their ability to talk confidently to, or get hard for – a real life girl.

Is that really what you want? Is the momentary satisfaction you get from busting a nut looking at your laptop worth it?

The Solution

The short answer: stop watching porn.

Give it up for a few weeks and feel your testosterone pumping through your veins. Seek out a woman to give you the release you crave.

Fighting against the impulse to jerk it can be tough at times. Remind yourself that the pleasure derived from porn is short lived. That it's nothing special. That you're altering your brain – for the worse.

Think of fighting against the desire as masculine energy building up in your body. Building up until you find a suitable girl to release the tension. Something very different than looking at your computer screen.

If you absolutely cannot hold back the urge, I think fapping without porn is a better alternative. But why settle for your hand?

Check out my new #1 Amazon Bestseller, The Book of Alpha. It's full of direct, actionable advice for the man who wants to better himself.

5 Steps To Living Like A Nomad

November 13, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

In the past six months, my longest residence in a single place has been one month in Kiev — despite the fact that I "live" in Los Angeles. And since I came back from my summer abroad I have moved six times and taken up housing in five different abodes. Some people think I'm nuts, others wonder how I can handle moving all the time. The truth is not only do I like it, but that with some upfront and concentrated efforts this nomadic lifestyle can be done with ease…

Step 1 – Clear House

Material possessions are not your friend. You need to get rid of absolutely everything you do not need, and for the few things that are either important to you or you just cannot replace at a later time, find some storage space and throw it in there. I used to have a lot of possessions, but once you decide to get rid of them you will feel liberated. Get rid of all appliances, dishes, unused clothes, furniture… everything. Trust me on this — I decided to keep some nice speakers, some art and other random things and I regret it now. Just a waste of time and space.

Keep whatever you need for work, clothes to wear, toiletries and a few other things on you. Everything else can be bought for use as necessary. Max cost – $100/month storage.

Step 2 – Secure A Permanent Address

If you are going to be moving around a lot, it will be nearly impossible to keep forwarding your mail from one place to another. Instead, seek out some sort of permanent address to have your mail delivered to. It can be your family home, your business address, or a virtual address (google search, can be had for $20/month or so). Personally, I use my business address and just have my office scan me anything important. Max cost – $20/month for a virtual address.

Step 3 – Housing

If you cleared house as described in Step 1, you should be rolling around with your clothes, toiletries, maybe some vitamins/supplements and your laptop. Now search Craigslist or Airbnb and negotiate the hell out of those prices. Or something that has worked for me – put an ad on Craigslist and describe what you are looking for. You will be surprised at the number of responses you will receive. Most of these people that rent out their apartments for short timeframes travel a lot and just want to recoup some of their rent. If you are a good tenant, like I am, they will keep your number and contact you whenever they are gone again. The last two places I took up were repeat landlords. Here the cost will vary by location and preference. In my area, and even with my desire to live alone, I've spent as little as $200/week and up to $550/week. Max cost – varies.

Step 4 – Transportation

If you live in a city with public transportation, you are lucky and nothing changes. However, if you live in an area that requires a car, then you will have to rent one. They can be had cheaply. Look to rent from the centers by the airport and on a weekly basis, as they tend to offer better deals. I've gotten as low as $90/week and spent up to about $130/week. Decline insurance, use a credit card that covers you and just carry liability insurance. Try to get added onto a family plan if you can for liability, usually that costs little to nothing to do so. Yes you will pay more per month than a conventional lease, but you have no contract to worry about, no down payments, no attachments and you can bail at any time. Plus you get to try a new car every week and never have to pay for a carwash. Max cost – $130/week.

Step 5 – Explanation

"Who cares what people think!" That's what you would like to say, and in most cases so be it. In fact with women I've found they are intrigued by this means of living, especially when I explain to them it stems from my desire to travel and be mobile. But in one situation – business – I would caution you to be careful with your words. Clients, or people paying you money for services, may perceive your nomadic lifestyle as unstable. You do not want to appear too far from the mainstream here if it will come at the expense of your ability to earn money. With others, feel free to proceed as you wish.

Conclusion

This it is not meant for everyone. You have to be willing to live a very minimalistic lifestyle…I can fit everything I own (not in storage) into a car. And in some situations, it may not make sense to move around so much. For example, if you want to do a stint in a foreign country or new city, you may just want to get a steady home pinned down. This will allow you to anchor yourself and have a home base while experiencing the new city you are in.

But if you like to travel from your home city a lot and have been wondering how to do so, this may work well. Or maybe you just don't want to be tied down to a car or apartment lease. I have gotten used to this lifestyle and I love it. I get to live in different communities and experience the slight differences of each area in doing so. have nothing tying me down and can take off whenever I want to wherever I want. For now, I'm happy to be a nomad.

5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder

November 13, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Nothing screams white-girl problems louder than a good old-fashioned eating disorder.* But they're more than that. Eating disorders have been—quite appropriately—declared a luxury reserved for only the most privileged members of the female race. In other words, the presence of one of the classic eating disorders is a reliable predictor of various socio-economic, cultural, and personality traits in a young woman–features that, in the end, are desirable to today's American man. In a world where the "retail price" on the typical Western woman continues to skyrocket—while their quality continues its precipitous decline—there are some real gems to be found in the bargain bin.

I've dated several girls with eating disorders—in various intensities—and all of these traits have applied to each of them.

While obesity is, in most cases, also an "eating disorder," this list doesn't apply to emotional eaters, food addicts, and fatties with no self control.*

1. Her obsession over her body will improve her overall looks.

A girl who spends inordinate mental and physical energy on her looks is rarely fat. If you were to get into a long-term relationship with one of these girls, she's also less likely to become complacent about her physique over time. Girls like this are usually deft at properly dressing their body type, which translates into a more stylish girl overall. And, because cheap clothing lines—like H&M—are shaped with straight cuts that are less labor-intensive and therefore more inexpensive, they look good in even the cheapest of shit. While they may have a "distorted body image" on the inside, that usually means staying trim and fit on the outside. Let's not forget that fatties too, in the majority of cases, have a "distorted body image," but in the unattractive direction.

2. She costs less money.

You can go out to nice restaurants and order take-out with the confidence that your expense on her will be minimal. In most cases, she'll get a small dish–like a side salad–or just eat a little bit of whatever communal dishes you order. If you're a hungry bastard, you can even finish off her plate. "Are you going to finish that?"

3. She's fragile and vulnerable.

The case has repeatedly and persuasively been made that an inflated ego and an unearned high self-esteem are among the most unattractive traits in a girl. You-go-girlist "confidence"—grounded in little more than years of being told she's a unique and special snowflake for no other reason than she was born female—renders a woman into an insufferable turd who thinks the world revolves around her.

An eating disorder often translates into the direct opposite: a girl who's modest, fragile, and vulnerable. Instead of having to constantly wrestle with a difficult and obnoxious girl, you'll be dealing with a tastefully insecure girl, who's eager to please, and wants nothing more than your approval. She's quick to apologize for transgressions, and will make the extra effort to see you–instead of flaking on you constantly. This level of vulnerability often brings out the best in men, whose protector instinct can't help but get activated.

4. Probably has money of her own.

They aren't too many poor girls with eating disorders. These girls come from money, and often continue to wield that spending power right into their adulthoods. Her instinct to please you will translate into her picking up tabs, coming to your door not empty-handed, or buying you little gifts.

5. She's better in bed.

It's a well-known fact that crazy girls are exceptional in the sack. A girl with an eating disorder has just the right cocktail of pent-up insecurity, neuroses, and daddy issues to ensure that your whole building knows every time you're beating it up.

Say what you will, a girl with a mild-to-moderate eating disorder—that hasn't excessively marred her appearance—is today's best-buy in the West's rapidly plummeting dating market.

The Mainstream Media Writes For People In Cubicles

November 14, 2013 | by Rollo Tomassi | Link | Original Link

If the "postponement" of the ABC 20/20 manosphere "exposé" has taught us anything it's that the writers seeking to cast light on the manosphere are looking for crazy. They need crazy because it's the only thing they know how, or have the patience, to confront in as minimal an effort as it takes to type a few paragraphs dismissing it as misogyny.

Writers (vichy male writers) like R. Tod Kelly are also lazy. They see an opportunity for outrage that sells advertising. They wanted Stormfront and what they got was a global consortium of rational, well reasoned men with jobs, families and intelligence, men from all walks of life, all ethnicities, and socioeconomic backgrounds expressing ideas that don't fit into an acculturation of feminine primacy.

If you read Matt Forney's 20/20 interview post you'll see the desperation for crazy in their producer's attempts to provoke him to become what they think he should be – a frothing, angry, hate-fueled misogynist. That would make it easy for them, they know how to sell crazy. The copy gets approved, the crazies get marginalized and we move on to the next Mabeline commercial.

But they didn't get crazy from Matt, or Roosh (okay Paul Elam looks a bit like Charles Manson in a certain light)—they got well reasoned, sensibility that was hard to argue against, so they attempted to prompt the crazy by barraging Roosh with questions about rape in the hopes that he'd blow up. He wouldn't. They wanted it to be easy. They wanted to know all they needed to know about the manosphere by sourcing Manboobz, interviewing three manosphere bloggers and then trot out the crazy, show off the carnival freak, demonize and marginalize him and frog march the crazy off the stage. They wanted fringe, the easy kind of fringe that their journalism, communications and women's studies classes taught them the easy answers to confront it with.

But the manosphere isn't fringe. For as much as R. Tod Kelly, or the producers at ABC would like it to be, the manosphere is too broad, too comprehensive, too diverse for anyone unfamiliar with it to really understand it, much less deliver an unbiased objective opinion of it. So Kelly follows formula and makes the same lame attempts at simple aspersion and misogynistic dismissal 20/20 had already failed in doing (as evidenced by their segment's postponement). The Daily Beast wanted its formulaic red meat, but Kelly is just dishing out ABC's cold left-overs.

The Cube

Details of Elizabeth Vargas' alcohol rehab not withstanding, the entire debacle of the cancelled (?) ABC 20/20 manosphere hit piece serves as an illustration of how out of touch the MSM is, not just with their distorted portrayal of the manosphere, but who their audience really is. Judgy Bitch has done an admirable detective job in shinning some light on the backgrounds of the girls responsible for generating their written piece, and also detailing the process they used to emphasize their distortions. However the entire affair, and all of the internet fallout that led up to ABC shutting down their comment thread after tiring of playing whack-a-mole with their comment deletions, exaggerated the impression for me that a "news" organization the caliber of what 20/20 used to be has absolutely no idea of how their audience's media consumption landscape has changed.

As I walk through the various sales and marketing departments of the offices of the liquor brands and casinos I develop for, what do I see in every cubicle I pass? I see men and (primarily) women glued to their monitors, checking Facebook, or a blog, or a forum, or a news site. In all likelihood, you are reading ROK or Chateau Heartiste or Rational Male from a computer at work that miraculously isn't censored by your company's web filters.

The cube-lings' only consistent connection to anything happening in the outside world invariably comes to them via their company's internet when they've got "down time" which is usually a lot more than the actual work time they're probably tasked with. Right or wrong it makes much more sense to the average cube dweller to consume media of their own choosing at their convenience, which is usually on their bosses' dime, when things get boring. This is the new media consumption paradigm that at least ABC's 20/20 freshmen crew of ~~producers~~ interns seem genuinely surprised by. People consume media that they want to take an active part in. It's not enough to be spoon-fed something to consider; people want and are now used to being actively engaged in the media and information of their own choosing. Whether that's Mommy blogs, custom car forums, political blogs, or the manosphere, people now expect that degree of engagement.

I literally don't watch TV anymore. If I could subscribe just to the NFL channel when the season's on without a basic HD cable package I would drop cable entirely and stick to my AppleTV with subscriptions to Netlfix, Hulu or whatever else I think might be worth it. I'm far to busy a person to be on any media outlets' schedule for my information or entertainment. Maybe I'm an outlier at this stage, but I think my lifestyle is becoming increasingly more common with regards to how I consume, as well as produce, media (products, promos, branding , etc.) A lot gets made these days about dual screen media consumption; where a viewer is watching something on the monitor and simultaneously "participating" in that consumption on Twitter or a live blog or even on a forum. Whether they believe their online input will actually direct the overall perception of what's being broadcast is debatable, but what isn't is the desire of media consumers to influence perception one way or another.

This is what the little girls responsible for the now failed 20/20 manosphere exposé didn't anticipate – they sourced the same online communities that would hold them accountable before and after the piece would air. They weren't writing for the cube, but they were happy to petition the cube and writers for the cube while naively believing that neither would actively engage them in the overall narrative of their misrepresentations. They weren't writing for the cube, they were writing for a dying media form; they used new media to create a product to be delivered in an anachronistic format and it came back to bite them on the ass.

Need another example of this? Look no further than MTV's Helena Kincaid's petitioning the manosphere for exactly the same purpose, using exactly the same process as the interns at 20/20 did. Don't ask the cube for anything you don't expect to be held accountable for.

When you consider that media consumers will spend more hours with their eyes on their employer's monitors than they will their own TVs, as a media producer, blogger, forum proprietor, etc. you must now write for the cube. Why does ROK or A Voice for Men outrank mainstream blogs in the Alexa ratings? Because it's a topic and media that more people want to be engaged in. This entire affair puts ABC and anachronistic media delivery on notice, ignore the cube at your peril. Otherwise you might want to invest in hiring more digital media managers to delete blog comments about your story's distortions or dissenting opinions; and even that wont stop the global perception.

31 Pieces Of Wisdom From Balthasar Gracian

November 14, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Art of Worldly Wisdom is a 17th century book of maxims written by a Spanish rector of the Catholic Church. It was innovative at the time for being one of the first that attempted to collect human wisdom is a handy pocket guide, a template for more modern wisdom books like The 48 Laws Of Power.

Here are the morsels of wisdom from the book that made the strongest impression on me:

1. Seek knowledge

> Knowledge and Courage are the elements of Greatness. They give immortality, because they are immortal. Each is as much as he knows, and the wise can do anything. A man without knowledge, a world without light. Wisdom and strength, eyes and hands. Knowledge without courage is sterile.

2. Make others depedent on you

> …hope has a good memory, gratitude a bad one. More is to be got from dependence than from courtesy.

3. Don’t succumb to the collective flaws of your peers

> Avoid the Faults of your Nation. Water shares the good or bad qualities of the strata through which it flows, and man those of the climate in which he is born.

4. Act

> Mediocrity obtains more with application than superiority without it.
> […]
> Bad execution of your designs does less harm than irresolution in forming them.

5. True wisdom will find its audience

> The sage has one advantage: he is immortal. If this is not his century many others will be.

6. Be vigilant

> Never open the door to a lesser evil, for other and greater ones invariably slink in after it.

7. Be patient

> You must pass through the circumference of time before arriving at the centre of opportunity. A wise reserve seasons the aims and matures the means. Time’s crutch effects more than the iron club of Hercules. God Himself chasteneth not with a rod but with time. He spake a great word who said, “Time and I against any two.” Fortune herself rewards waiting with the first prize.

8. Easy come, easy go

> Quickly done can be quickly undone. To last an eternity requires an eternity of preparation.

9. Carve your own path

> Those who come first are the heirs of Fame; the others get only a younger brother’s allowance: whatever they do, they cannot persuade the world they are anything more than parrots.

10. Don’t joke all the time

> A continual jest soon loses all zest. Many get the repute of being witty, but thereby lose the credit of being sensible. Jest has its little hour, seriousness should have all the rest.

11. Beware of the extremes

> A sage once reduced all virtue to the golden mean. Push right to the extreme and it becomes wrong: press all the juice from an orange and it becomes bitter. Even in enjoyment never go to extremes. Thought too subtle is dull. If you milk a cow too much you draw blood, not milk.

12. Be humble

> Be extraordinary in your excellence, if you like, but be ordinary in your display of it. The more light a torch gives, the more it burns away and the nearer ’tis to going out. Show yourself less and you will be rewarded by being esteemed more.

13. Know thyself

> You cannot master yourself unless you know yourself. There are mirrors for the face but none for the mind. Let careful thought about yourself serve as a substitute. When the outer image is forgotten, keep the inner one to improve and perfect. Learn the force of your intellect and capacity for affairs, test the force of your courage in order to apply it, and keep your foundations secure and your head clear for everything.

14. Earn respect before demanding it

> Do not enforce respect, but try and create it. Those who insist on the dignity of their office, show they have not deserved it, and that it is too much for them. If you wish to be valued, be valued for your talents, not for anything adventitious. Even kings prefer to be honoured for their personal qualifications rather than for their station.

15. Waiting may be the best course of action

> A fountain gets muddy with but little stirring up, and does not get clear by our meddling with it but by our leaving it alone.

16. Success can hurt friendships

> A wise friend wards off worries, a foolish one brings them about. But do not wish them too much luck, or you may lose them.

17. Think before you speak

> There is always time to add a word, never to withdraw one. Talk as if you were making your will: the fewer words the less litigation. In trivial matters exercise yourself for the more weighty matters of speech. Profound secrecy has some of the lustre of the divine.

18. Maintain reserves

> A man should not employ all his capacity and power at once and on every occasion. Even in knowledge there should be a rearguard, so that your resources are doubled. One must always have something to resort to when there is fear of a defeat.

19. Don’t fight a starving animal

> Never contend with a Man who has nothing to Lose; for thereby you enter into an unequal conflict. The other enters without anxiety; having lost everything, including shame, he has no further loss to fear. He therefore re-sorts to all kinds of insolence.

20. Sip slowly on life’s pleasures

> We have more days to live through than pleasures. Be slow in enjoyment, quick at work, for men see work ended with pleasure, pleasure ended with regret.

21. Great men aren’t perfect

> No one o’ersteps the narrow bounds of humanity: all have their weaknesses either in heart or head.

22. Don’t befriend fools

> He that does not know a fool when he sees him is one himself: still more he that knows him but will not keep clear of him. They are dangerous company and ruinous confidants.

23. Always have dreams

> Leave Something to wish for, so as not to be miserable from very happiness. The body must respire and the soul aspire. If one possessed all, all would be disillusion and discontent. Even in knowledge there should be always something left to know in order to arouse curiosity and excite hope. Surfeits of happiness are fatal.

24. Use different strategies for different tasks

> Attempt easy Tasks as if they were difficult, and difficult as if they were easy. In the one case that confidence may not fall asleep, in the other that it may not be dismayed.

25. Don’t shock

> …the most expert doctors of the soul pay great attention to the means of sweetening the pill of truth. For when it deals with the destroying of illusion it is > the quintessence of bitterness.

26. Friendships change

> Trust the friends of to-day as if they will be enemies to-morrow, and that of the worst kind. As this happens in reality, let it happen in your precaution.

27. Don’t make a man feel too indebted to you

> With many persons it is not necessary to do more than overburden them with favours to lose them altogether: they cannot repay you, and so they retire, preferring rather to be enemies than perpetual debtors. The idol never wishes to see before him the sculptor who shaped him, nor does the benefited wish to see his benefactor always before his eyes.

28. Always remain diligent

> Have no careless Days. Fate loves to play tricks, and will heap up chances to catch us unawares. Our intelligence, prudence, and courage, even our beauty, must always be ready for trial. For their day of careless trust will be that of their discredit. Care always fails just when it was most wanted.

29. Don’t be quick to vouch for others

> Do not become responsible for all or for every one, otherwise you become a slave and the slave of all. Some are born more fortunate than others: they are born to do good as others to receive it. Freedom is more precious than any gifts for which you may be tempted to give it up.

30. Stop just short of being sated

> Leave off Hungry. One ought to remove even the bowl of nectar from the lips. Demand is the measure of value. Even with regard to bodily thirst it is a mark of good taste to slake but not to quench it. Little and good is twice good. The second time comes a great falling off.

31. Virtue is greater than wealth

> A man’s capacity and greatness are to be measured by his virtue and not by his fortune. She alone is all-sufficient.

While I agreed with much of the wisdom written in this book, there were a few instances where I didn’t. For example, he advises you to withdraw from hot streaks so as not to push your luck: “Leave your Luck while Winning. All the best players do it. A fine retreat is as good as a gallant attack.” But then how will you know when your streak is over? He is also extra sensitive to rejection and urges you to do your best to not fail in anything, a position that makes his other maxims on success just about impossible to achieve. I understand it’s difficult for one men to present a perfect system of human wisdom, so his attempt was overall quite impressive.

As you may have noticed, the writing is dense. You need to devote your full concentration to understand what the author is trying to say. I found it quite trying, but nonetheless enjoyed the refreshing of my memory on things I have learned through experience and study. Think of this as a review manual for life.

Because all the maxims are so short, this would make an excellent bathroom book, and I don’t mean that as an insult to the author. It’s very easy to pick up, read for a few minutes, and then put back down. If you don’t mind an older style of writing, it’s worth your while.

Each Day Is A Little Life

November 14, 2013 | by OMYG | Link | Original Link

Take a second and think of any man this moment. What that man is today is simply a reflection of everyday he has lived up to this point in time.

I recently stumbled across a quote by Arthur Schopenhauer. Despite its simplicity the effect it had over me was powerful. Now hear me out, I'm not the type of guy that gets really inspired by quotes or Googles them like a fat girl before starting a new diet, which she will later give up on and decide it's easier to stuff her face with Haagen Dazs ice cream and sausage & egg McGriddles. I especially believe most quotes are simply red pill realities sugar coated for the blue pill prescribed masses. Besides I get enough of these quotes from 'like' thirsty girls trying to get their daily dose of attention. But I believe this quote has the power to improve our current state or at its least it can be used as a measure to reflect upon ourselves.

"Each day is a little life: every waking and rising a little birth, every fresh morning a little youth, every going to sleep and rest a little death."

Tomorrow you will wake up. Your lifespan is 24 hours, how will you live it?

You wake up. Did you hit the snooze button on your alarm or where you up and ready after its first ring? Now did you have a nice balanced breakfast or did you microwave last night's pizza? Do you feel comfortable in your clothing? Did you brush your teeth? As in life the parallels in this quote are simply a micro interpretation of your life, and a good youth is essential for a good life.

If you have a crappy morning odds are you are going to have a crappy day. You woke up late, you didn't eat a good breakfast, you don't feel comfortable in your attire, you didn't even brush your teeth and now you have all that internal baggage dragging you down all day, simply because the beginning was shit. Just as in life if a kid has a shitty childhood then guess what? That kid will most likely grow up and be a shitty person (there is exceptions of course). So in our 24-hour lifespan we must make sure to take full advantage of this youth and start it off correctly since each action affects the next.

Do you have ambitions or goals for your day? You must wake up and have a goal in mind, you must be hungry for something, anything. Whether it's changing the light bulb that gave out last week, or something bigger like starting a blog from your cheap brand name laptop and not to mention your crippled Wi-Fi signal that comes and goes. As in life you see the parallels in your days. You have long term goals in life, whether it's in your career, your game or enhancing your appearance by hitting the gym. It all starts one day. That is what keeps us moving and looking forward towards another day; the hunger to accomplish these goals. So in your remaining hours of life do you have a goal in sight? Will you accomplish it? Will you try?

Now the sun has set, you know your time is near. Can you lay in bed with peace of mind knowing you did everything in your power to accomplish the goals you set? If yes then reflect upon what you have accomplished and let yourself know that you are a better man than you were when you first woke up. As in life one day we will die. Every experience we live through eventually leads us all to death. When we know our time is near will we look back and ask ourselves if we accomplished everything we ever wanted, if we tried.

The man is all he ever was. Every experience will add up to the man he is today. It all depends on each day of his life, if most of yours days are filled with accomplishments or on the other hand failures your life is just going to be a magnification of each day of your life. Just how a single drop of blood can identify a man, a day in your life can identify the type of life you have or will have.

Of course, you can simply die tonight and know you will have tomorrow to live again.

20 Things Women Do That Should Be Shamed, Not Celebrated

November 15, 2013 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Prior to having the red pill dropped on me like a bomb, there were things in my life that, deep down, disgusted me. Looking around though, everyone was celebrating these things, cheering women on. I was forced to bury my disgust within me and not act upon it, or dare speak my mind. If I said something, I was the bad guy, and the people I'd criticize were of course, unfortunate victims of circumstance. Not surprisingly, the majority of these situations it was women, and I was labeled as a misogynist asshole.

No longer. Now I see these things and realize that they disgust me for a reason, and I have every right to feel that way. With that being said…

20 Things Women Do That Should Be Shamed, Not Celebrated

1. Sluttiness. See: Tuthmosis: 24 Signs Signs She's A Slut. While I've banged my fair share of sluts and would rather not see them disappear into thin air, there's no doubt that the new slut generations are going to end up with more cats and less husbands.

2. Being fat. Rather than accept the fact that her greatest asset is her beauty, women are instead celebrated for eating Dunkin' Donuts and drinking whatever-the-fuck stupid name Starbucks uses for their large calorie-loaded heart attacks.

3. Being a foodie. I think a foodie is best defined as someone whose life is so boring they literally think that food is their favorite hobby. That is pathetic. Come on, I know all you ladies out there have tons of fascinating stories to tell me about your lives.

4. Relying on the government to pay the bills. Instead of owning up to their failures, women are instead told, “it’s okay”, and to “take as long as they need” to get back on their feet. Welfare is the weak link of society.

5. Single motherhood. Because she “doesn’t need a man.”

6. Slacking as a stay at home mom. Instead of celebrating being a homemaker and taking pride in that, instead the pride is derived from how much money she can spend everyday shopping with her girlfriends while her husband toils away in his cubicle.

7. The use of cake face make up. Makeup should absolutely be used to enhance a women’s looks, however, there is a line. When girls wear so much makeup it looks as if they can’t even smile naturally, it just looks fake, silly, and makes guys wonder what she really looks like.

8. Cat collecting. These furry critters make fantastic substitutes to a husband and children.

9. Watching porn/trying to be a porn star. I’m all for being sexually adventurous, but when I’m having sex with a girl I met two hours ago and she’s whimpering, “Daddy, fuck my cunt,” while gasping for air while I choke her, that’s a little extreme.

10. Birth control, because it's "their choice." Meanwhile, men have no reliable forms of birth control apart from condoms, which if the girl is evil enough, can easily be rendered null. Let's nuke the funding to Planned Parenthood (and the multiple options of female birth control) and instead put that money into research for a real male birth control. How many girls do you really think are responsible enough to take the pill every day at the same time?

11. Lazy hygiene. Don't shave your armpits/legs/pussy because you're a fiercely independent woman? You go girl! Have fun living in the wilderness with your cats. Meow.

12. Doing online dating because they can't find anyone. You're telling me you had from 18-25 and yet you couldn't find a guy in any college class, job, or bar who wanted to be with you? Sounds like you're just picky. Enjoy the continuous window shopping on OKCupid.

13. Blatantly lying about their body type on online dating. Rather than fix the problem, or just admit it, girls are of course encouraged to simply "swing the odds" in their favor a bit. After all, everybody lies about something on their dating profile, right? While a guy might be able to swing a few extra thousand dollars on his income or an extra inch of height, girls cannot swing 40 pounds in their favor. Take two examples:

This lovely lady lists herself as "Athletic and Toned," body type. She has no full body pictures to prove it (hint, all girls that have nice bodies show them off). The large, round face and what appear to be ever-widening hips indicate a secret internet fatty.

The below girl lists herself as "Curvy". I see her lower stomach fat rolls through her skirt. Any guesses on what she weighs in at?

14. Divorce. Rather than honoring the commitment she made to the love of her life (at the time) in front of who knows how many friends and family at their (likely) over the top extravagant wedding, women are instead celebrated for getting divorced because they're, "not haaaapy." Of course, when they start collecting child support and alimony, they are celebrated even further.

15. Paternity Fraud. While maybe women aren't celebrated for this, they are defended valiantly because after all, the child needs a father. Convenient how the child doesn't need a father the other times (see #5). It's becoming easy to see though that society as a whole is truly convinced that the victim of paternity fraud must suffer for the good of the child that isn't his. For example, while out with a girl the other night we were discussing this and I posed this question:

"So you're saying that if my partner cheats on me with the mail man and has HIS child, and I find out when the child is two, I should be responsible, legally and financially, for that child for the next SIXTEEN years?"

She responded with a resounding yes, saying at that point the child thinks of me as his/her father and it's wrong for the child to have to suffer. Men, you should all get a paternity test immediately after the birth of your child. I don't care what kind of fit your woman throws – no exceptions. I got her back to my place and fucked her.

Then deleted her number.

16. Dancing/getting shots taken from her belly button/stripping/YOLO'ing…or anything that involves being ON TOP OF a bar. Attention whoring to the extreme. Getting drunk and rowdy encourages sluttiness, which of course all women claim to not be, so this goes hand in hand with the first point on this list.

On the lighter side, the website where I got this photo from discusses a bar that got sued by a whale because she was told she was too fat to dance on a bar. Good for them.

17. Cutting her hair short. The greatest sign of feminine fertility and it's encouraged to be chopped off.

18. The entitlement complex. "Daddy's little princess" never really goes away. Rather than encourage women to be sweet, nurturing, and easy-going, it's not common to hear ladies discuss how they dangle sex and good behavior in exchange for money and chores around the house.

19. Female sex tourism. If a man goes to a foreign country to try to bang some cute girls, he is seen as a pig and sex tourist. A loser who can't get laid in his own country. If a woman goes to a foreign country and the local young guns fuck her for a few meals, she's seen as a poor innocent victim who just wanted to find love overseas.

20. Being a feminist. I think this pretty well sums everything up.

This list could go on and on. I recognize there are plenty more issues not discussed in this article. If you have more to add, comment below.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. A Picture Is Worth A Thousand Words

A few weeks ago I had to listen to some trendy hipster drone on about his new digital camera. This went on for what seemed like an eternity to me. After listening to his "worldly" explanations of the value of HDR photography, he displayed some of his work. I was not impressed and felt let down by this gentleman's excessive sales pitch. I had the thought that I could do better with my cell phone. I went back and selected a few pictures from my device and decided to post them here. They were taken at the Mount Rainier National Park with a Blackberry. The only alteration made was cropping the edges due to the odd 15:9 aspect ratio on my Blackberry.

The Stream From "Valhalla"

Ice Age Flowers

A Smaller Version Of The Waterfall From “Prometheus”

Piercing The Cloud Canopy

Like A Bob Ross Painting

These pictures turned out nice to me. Let me know what you think in the comments.

The Opposite Of Manliness

November 16, 2013 | by Mjolnir | Link | Original Link

Much has been written about manliness and the qualities that make a man a man. It seems to be the chief preoccupation of ancient writings, as they describe what makes some men worthy of honor and others worthy of disdain. The Bible, The Iliad and Odyssey, and The Sagas of the Icelanders are all examples of ancient books telling us about manliness and how it is achieved. In the Old Testament, characters are manly because they are upright and God fearing. In the Iliad and Odyssey, characters' manliness is judged by skills with weapons and the courage to use those skills as they lead their men into battle. In The Sagas of the Icelanders, men are weighed by the respect they command from other men.

The Timeless Question

The question "What does it mean to be a man?" is timeless, and I'm sure I couldn't begin to answer it in one short post. Activities and attributes of men vary by whom you ask; some say hard work, others say military service; playing football, bench press max, alcohol tolerance, and number of women bedded all come up as well. None of these completely sum up manhood, and more abstract conceptions of masculinity seem to evade most modern men completely. The more I talk to my peers in America, the more I realize that traditional masculine traits, like honor, assertiveness, and self-sufficiency are wholly unfamiliar to them. They are genuinely confused by yesterday's conception of manhood, and I can't really blame them; feminism's victory over Western civilization is complete for the time being. Even using the word "manliness" will be laughed at if used seriously in many crowds.

There is a branch of theology called apophatic theology that seeks to define God by defining what he is not, using negatives rather than positives to describe the deity. Applying this kind of reasoning to lost ideas of manliness is useful because we can take a machete to the parts of our culture that drag us down. Western civilization has spiraled into madness by allowing the worst instincts of masculinity and femininity to run amok, and further, most of our culture is the antithesis of manliness. Despite how difficult it is to even begin to cut through the rot of our corrupt society, there is one thing that stands out as particularly opposed to masculinity.

Being A Victim Is The Opposite Of Manliness

"Victim" implies a passivity, a sense of a person being at the mercy of circumstances. With the victim archetype dominating the Western consciousness since the Holocaust, victimhood is the raison d'être for the various "progressive" movements. Saints are made of people who have done nothing meaningful in their entire lives, with their defining moment consisting the misfortune that befalls them.

Tragedy, of course, is a prominent feature in human stories from the ancient oral traditions of primitive hunter gatherers to modern tales like Moby Dick, but there is a vast difference between those stories and the standard victim story that is trotted out daily in America. Emphasis in older stories was placed on the protagonists' reactions to their bad luck, or the events the actions they had taken to bring the tragedies down on themselves. Modern stories always portray victims as hapless, innocent individuals at the mercy of their fates. Is quietly accepting your fate manly?

Living Under The Umbrella Of Victimhood

My grandparents lived through the Great Depression and World War II, events causing great human suffering. They told stories about my infant aunts and uncles almost dying in Hooverville conditions, going hungry for weeks, and working long days for pennies. One of my grandfathers was a hobo, jumping freight trains across America to work in construction, logging, and farming, dodging railroad bulls and the other dangers that waited for those who rode the rails. No matter what they went through, their accounts were about what they did to make the best of their bad situations, not sob stories. Nothing could be more different from the stories we hear today.

In true Newspeak style, language that was meant convey strength is used to describe weakness. Victims become heroes. Quasi-religious imagery is used to convey martyrdom. The mediocre become objects of praise. And in the end, that is what the worship of victims is about. It is to absolve everyone from responsibility, to encourage passivity, and to idealize a life of permanent inaction.

With victim hood held up as admirable, it is no surprise that establishing victim credentials is a sought-after qualification to separate oneself from the oppressors. The irony of white feminists from wealthy backgrounds claiming the victim mantle is especially absurd. The victim mentality underlies every part of the second-wave feminist philosophy, so as true victims become rarer, they do their utmost to contrive anything that proves that they are being downtrodden. As they delve deeper and deeper looking for new victims, the genuine compassion we should feel for the unfortunate is diluted. At its heart, victim worship is inherently pornographic as it allows us to revel in the pathetic. As Nietschze said, pity is really just contempt in disguise.

The Alternative

Passivity, powerlessness, haplessness: no matter your definition of masculinity, I doubt you would want to use these in your description of yourself. Reject the victim mentality in all of its forms. Casting yourself as a victim can feel really good, but at what price? It turns you into a mere actor buffeted by the cruel forces that surround you. Who are you to resist?

Perhaps if men collectively undertook the journey to reject the antithesis of manliness, The Victim, they would rediscover positive masculinity on the way by exploring the chasm traditional masculinity has left behind. The alternative is to feel sorry for ourselves as we fade into oblivion, the perpetual victim.

The Best Upper Body Exercise

November 16, 2013 | by Roberto Nascimento | Link | Original Link

When it comes to deciding what is the best weight training exercise, there is much to discuss. There's the squat and the deadlift. There are the explosive, combination movements such as the clean and press. These are excellent exercises that should have a place in every workout regimen. However, if we are to place a focus on upper body dominant movements, there is a clear and distinct king of exercises:

The barbell shoulder press (or military press).

The shoulder press is the best upper body movement. There are great arguments that suggest the bench press, or perhaps weighted pull-ups are in fact the best exercises. Although they are great compound exercises on their own that focus and develop large muscle groups, they simply cannot compete with the overhead press, in terms of variety and extent of active muscle groups and potential for development. When asked what muscles are worked during the press, most will answer with the deltoids, triceps, and maybe the upper chest. These are all true, except this is only a small portion of the workload.

Let us examine this movement more closely. A firm overhand grip is used, with hands roughly shoulder width apart, holding the bar just above the clavicles. The bar is then pushed up in a straight line by extending the elbows, until full extension is reached and the bar is stabilized above your head, completing the repetition.

Now where things get interesting, the skeletal-muscular breakdown. The initial part of pressing the bar up involves the abduction of the gleno-humeral (GH) joint, until your upper arm is about parallel to the ground. From that point to the full extension of the elbows, there will be adduction of the GH joint as the arms are brought back towards the midline of the body. Throughout the entire movement, the GH joint is externally rotated, and the scapula will drive the GH joint movement by superiorly rotating as the arms are extended above the head.

To sum up the movements, we have abduction, adduction, and external rotation of the GH joint; extension of the elbow; and superior rotation of the scapula.

Now, the muscles that produce those movements:

- Abduction (lateral deltoid, supraspinatus, biceps brachii)
- Adduction (front and rear deltoids, teres major, latissimus dorsi, pectoralis major, coracobrachialis)
- External rotation (infraspinatus, teres minor, rear deltoid)
- Elbow extension (triceps brachii)
- Superior rotation of the scapula (trapezius, serratus anterior)

Were you aware this much muscle was involved in your shoulder press?

Although some muscles I listed are considered more prime movers than others, they are all either large muscle groups or significant movers. Anconeus for instance, is an elbow extensor, but is such a small muscle that I didn't bother to list it here.

Shoulder pressing will not only develop those round shoulder caps and dense upper chest muscles, but will also develop a significant portion of your posterior. A v-shaped back is a result of well-developed lats, traps, and scapular muscles that can all be stressed during the shoulder press.

You will also be developing essential core muscles. Power comes from your core — by shoulder pressing you will activate the abdominal and erector spinae groups extensively. Their function is to stabilize, without a stable core your body would simply fold as you attempt to press the bar over your head. Also, consider that you will also be working the serratus anterior muscles, or more commonly referred to as the boxer's muscle. Not only are they a powerful muscle group outlining the exterior of the ribs, they are also aesthetically pleasing when developed as well:

[image]

Evidently, the shoulder press is a very efficient exercise for developing the musculature of the upper body. It targets multiple large muscle groups, and some smaller, harder to work groups, due to it's extensive range of motion. The shoulder press should be considered part of the core and foundation of any serious workout program.

Don't be surprised if you start to enjoy it more than the bench press.

What Is It Like To Grow Up Country?

November 17, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

I grew up in the absolute middle of nowhere. Dirt roads, fields of corn and soybeans as far as the eye can see. Hotter than hell during the summer and colder than shit during the winter months.

Let me dispel some myths about the country in America.

1. There is no patriarchy in the country

This one is a common meme in the media and liberals. Take note: fat, white women rule the country and the small towns. Men still usually make up the formal leadership in small towns and rural power structures, but women pull the strings of power.

I made the argument in a political science class about sex and politics that men have the authority (formal power) in the country, but women exert the power (they have the ability to influence the authority). This was back in my blue-pill days. It did not go over well. Like the frustrating arguments I had in Family Law about whether being the primary wage-earner gives you the power in a relationship, I could not have a true discussion about power and how it works – which led me to this corner of the web. I was supremely frustrated with people who refused to care about understanding the world around them.

The country and rural areas are ruled by obese Caucasian women. It doesn't matter if she is Christian, secular or anything else. Women have the upper hand. Some of the most pussy-whipped motherfuckers I know are the most "conservative." The women do their utmost to front their man as the head of the household, to socially present him as the “man,” when she is actually in control.

I argued with a woman about a “controlling” husband who limited his wife’s autonomy. I pointed out that clearly the wife is in control and is manipulating your perception of the relationship because she needs you to see her in a certain way. The woman was completely offended by my assertion. I pushed further, asking her to really consider the husband – do you really think this man is a controlling asshole? She laid down her arms because the social script of the dominating male didn’t fit here because she knew the husband was a bitch.

2. Rural areas are not hotbeds for conservative Christians

While this stereotype may or may not apply to the South, it isn’t true in rural areas of the Midwest.

It is absolutely true that Christianity has a strong influence over society and politics in the country, but it isn’t as controlling as portrayed. Part of this conception stems from who is consuming, reading or viewing media coverage of rural areas – city folk. Part of the mis-characterization is narcissism – they need to feel superior to those ignorant Bible-thumpers. It’s also political – they need to feel that there is a strong backlash to liberal politics festering in the hotbeds of reactionary America.

There isn’t.

As usual, reality is more boring than fiction and that applies to rural areas and the country. Isolated areas attract a diversity of folk, many of whom are seeking to exist outside the mainstream. As such, you get many conservative Christians. You also get inordinate amounts of atheists, radical liberals, gay women (haven't figured that one out), libertarians and all manner of folk who are not long for mainstream American society.

In many rural communities, the breakdown is as such: Christian conservatives, Big Union Democrats (Blue Dog Democrats) and libertarians. There are many, many conservative Christian conservatives in rural areas. The twist is that a good bit of them are Democrats – Democrats that abhor social liberalism but are strong fans of unionism and Keynesian economics (whether they know it or not). While they may be completely against gay marriage, abortion, feminism or whatever, their livelihood depends on their union membership and vote as such. These voters strongly preferred Hillary to Obama in 2008. Such voting was chalked up to racism, but that was very off-base. Hillary specifically targeted these sorts of voters with her strong pro-union credentials. Sometimes I wonder about the so-called "political" experts in the media.

Still, there are a good bit of strong liberals in rural communities. Sure, they rarely make up more than 25% of any local electorate, but they most assuredly exist. Political debates are far more robust in the country than urban areas – I have found big cities are thoroughly liberal. Voting patterns show this well, but my life has also reflect this. The most vigorous debates I had were often over hookah, weed and booze in a backyard of some farm house or living room of a rural apartment.

I think part of this is the fact the media presence is much more omnipresent in urban areas. It is tough to think for yourself when confronted with endless pleas to conform from the media. Only in the country can you sit back in your yard, enjoy the sky strewn with beautiful constellations of stars and just enjoy your beer. Alone. With just your thoughts.

Still, given the economic stress most rural communities experience, the debates often focus over approaches to economics. That is why both rural Republicans and Democrats spar primarily over economics. The sleight of hand the media engages in is that we are fighting over abortion or whatever. We aren't. Conservative Christians sometimes use social issues as ways to politically organize, but the most passionate debates are over economic issues. Leave it to Starbucks liberals to bitch about gender roles. There are no debates about what sex does such and such when you have a hog farm to police, fields to walk and siding to mend on your house. The privileged get to bitch and moan about whether buying the groceries is gendered.

3. The country is not violent.

A common trope in mainstream media is that the country is highly violent, especially towards women.

It isn't true.

My hometown hasn't had a murder since Lyndon Johnson was President. Batteries and assaults have almost exclusively happened at the local bars, between high schools kids and young, adult males. Domestic violence isn't as much as a concern in the country precisely because you can't just exist in rural areas, everybody is obvious.

The idea that domestic violence is openly tolerated in society is blown wide open by rural America. I would surmise that urban areas are more susceptible to domestic violence just because it is easier to slip away into a crowd, but in the country it's impossible.

City folk regard rural folk with such suspicion because the country deals with violence differently. Urban folk are far, far more likely to take a pure authoritarian approach and leave it to the police and the courts to deal with violence. In rural areas, where people actually know each other, there exist real human ways to deal with others.

I have known local cops to take a perp to his local pastor, where the pastor admonished the man for his violence at the local bar. I have know a guy who was known for beating women to be taken to his grandmother's house over jail, where he got a verbal licking so bad it became a local legend. Is it more effective than police intervention? Maybe not, but considering the failure of rehabilitating offenders in our criminal injustice system, maybe it is a good approach. Reinforcing family or social ties in order to engender better behavior out of somebody is probably more effective then some random judge telling you need to get your shit together.

For the record, suicide is a huge issue in rural areas. There are suicides every year in a sizable community. Murders, rapes, serious batteries and the like are rare. Yet, taking your life is common.

4. Growing up country can be a great life experience

[image]

Growing up in the middle of nowhere is a truly unique life experience. When all you know, as a child, is a home surrounded by corn fields and dense woods it truly is a different experience. Biking hours in the punishing July sun just to see a friend and, for when you get there, they don't have AC so you bake in the 104 degree steam playing PS1 is just strange to most people.

I have seen and done it all – driving around remote roads slinging back Bud Light as foolish youths, watching some depressed and poor farmer torch his barn and lighting off highly illegal fireworks with absolutely no worry about police action. In the country, a man can truly exist as he wishes. Sure, it isn't pure independence from society and its ridiculous expectations, but the leash is so much longer.

The great amenities, culture and lifestyle urban areas afford are counter-balanced by the looming presence of government and the lack of anonymity. In the country, you can truly live life as you see fit. Policing is very light, prying eyes are far fewer and the social expectations are far different. The appearance of rural areas being hyper-conservative is off-base, as the country is more libertarian than anything else.

Still, the social ties you do have are deeper and more meaningful. The collective sense of community is so much greater because the isolation and lack of available governmental services. People learn to take care of one another, instead of letting disinterested government bureaucrats tend to the needs of their neighbors. You may hate the people around you, but you will always matter. It is a cardinal sin to not care about your neighbor in the country.

You may point out that this means that people's autonomy is limited in the country and you would be right in a sense, but the biggest weirdos I have met were all country. Deviance is more tolerated in rural areas. Don't listen to the propaganda in the media about rural intolerance. People come to and stay in the country because of the freedom of thought and action afforded by the geographical isolation.

With all that said, I hope you come away from this piece with a greater understanding of the flyover areas of America. They aren't even close to being the bigoted, gun-toting rednecks media liberals desperately want them to be. They are hard-working citizens who provide great value to society at the expense of enjoying the pleasures a city affords.

Do You Love Game?

November 17, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

My background is in fitness. Having worked with many people, I now realize the ones who succeed are the ones who learn to love the process. They begin to enjoy lifting weights, or cooking healthy meals.

The ones who fail are the ones who tell me, “I want to gain 10 pounds of muscle” or “I want to lose 20 pounds of fat” – then bitch and complain throughout the workouts, only to fall off a month or two later. They have become attached the end game, but neglect the means necessary to get there. They have it backwards.

When it comes to game, it’s no different. I have seen it in myself and through my friends. When I’m happy to be at a particular lounge or bar – I kill it. When I’m going through a stretch where I’m less than excited to be out, I tend to fare quite poorly.

Do You Look Forward To Going Out?

Friday morning. It’s the beginning of the weekend.

Are you pumped to hit the bars tonight, and run some game? Or are you dreading the thought of going out?

It makes a difference. A huge one, at that. Obviously if you don’t want to go out, things will end up sour. Gaming has to be more than an item on the to-do list. More than another chore. It’s not something to be done on autopilot. If you don’t bring the energy, you won’t have solid approaches, fun interactions, or any bangs. But more importantly – progress will stall. You will never make it past the initial learning curve – and reach poosy paradaise – if you can’t stand going out, and meeting girls.

Or Do You Just Want To Get Laid?

Maybe you aren't overly excited. Maybe you aren't dreading it either. Maybe you're just picturing a piece of fine ass you want to hit.

Yes, this is an end goal for most men in this game. But being overly attached to the outcome is dangerous. After all – having to dress up, cab it to the venue, approach a prospect, make small talk, escalate things, and get her home alone – seems like a pretty big nuisance when all you care about is sex.

If you don't enjoy doing everything in between points A and B – getting there is going to be a much bigger challenge. You will perform worse, and you'll likely get bored or frustrated. It doesn't matter how much material you've read on approaching, negging, escalating, etc. if all you care about is the cream. You can't skip the intermediary steps (without hiring a hooker). And so you must find a way to enjoy them.

3 Steps To Enjoying The Process

I offer the following 3 simple steps as a means to extracting more joy out of the gaming process.

1. Choose your time – day or night? Game can pretty well be divided into 2 distinct forms. Day game and night game are different from top to bottom. Experiment with both and see which is more appealing to you. If you're a party animal, the choice will be obvious. But for many guys, the former is more natural, albeit the road less traveled.

2. Choose your crew – wing, wings, or solo? I have a great wing. We get along well, compliment each others styles, and most importantly – always have a great time. If you go out with your friend and it all it does is make you mope around like a chump, then ditch him for a replacement or give solo dolo a try. During the day is a bit different – solo is the only way.

3. Choose your locale – nightclub, college bar, mall, coffee shop? Once you have the first two items decided, this should be a bit easier. If you're going solo during the day, then figure out if you feel more comfortable heading to a busy mall, or hanging out at a low key coffee shop. If you're hitting the town with a wing – a college bar might be the best spot. And going one level deeper – find a specific locale. You'll notice that you'll feel more comfortable, have a better time, and get better results if you get a certain bar – or mall – on lock.

Take these easy steps, and it will feel less like you're taking shots in the dark – and more like you've found a new hobby that you love. And one that gets you laid.

Why You Should Care Less

November 18, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The subject of female sexual promiscuity comes up often in the manosphere, unsurprisingly. Guys often talk about the nature of female promiscuity (particularly as it relates to hypergamy) and its impact on men (haves vs. have nots) and women (more partners = bad wife?). The more I consider the subject, however, the more I hear a single question repeated in my head with regard to sluts: should we really care as much as we do?

Granted, I'm not saying that the number of sexual partners a woman has had is not ever relevant. Indeed, it would be wise to keep that history in your mind if you're considering a woman for something long term. A woman who is prone to impulsively hop into bed with different men whenever she gets the urge is a woman who may not be loyal enough to stick by your side, the kind of woman who will be especially prone to using "her emotions" to justify stepping out on you sexually every time something goes wrong. That reality just is what it is.

Many young men, however, aren't looking for anything serious. Many are merely looking to get some sexual gratification and to take step towards genuine self-improvement in the social, physical and sexual realms. Many are surrounded by females who really have no desire for anything serious either, preferring instead to focus on discovering their own sexuality and improving their social lives.

For these men, is it really warranted that a large number of fucks be given with regard to the fact that a particular female has gotten around a bit? How many young men are held back from realizing their full sexual potential because of their inability to properly deal with the concept of female promiscuity?

Much of my motivation for asking this question here is drawn from my own experiences with "sluts", and my realization that my inability to merely take what they could offer and accept them as they are cost me a host of potentially very enjoyable sexual experiences, as I'm sure it has cost a lot of other young men.

Pedestalization was one problem. As a teen I would run into several girls who I would discover were, in fact, “sluts”: they didn’t really date and they hooked up with numerous men, going as far as to tell their friends that increasing their partner count was an actual goal of theirs. A couple of these sluts took some romantic interest in me.

What did I do? I tried to turn them into housewives. I took them on dates and treated them like “ladies”, and failed. Why? I couldn’t merely accept what they are. As in the game of American Football, sometimes it is best to just take what the defense gives you.

Modern men have no real control over female sexuality—the days of the male dictating to the woman who/when/how/where she actually can/cannot fuck are done. This renders all efforts to change the slut futile.

Had I merely accepted the girl for who she was as opposed to moving to squeeze her into my own naïve vision of what I figured her sexuality ought to have looked like, I could have gotten laid a decent amount, had a little fun, and left my teen years with substantially more sexual experience than I had.

Excuses were another problem. During my early college years, I used female “sluttiness” to mask my own insecurities. In one particular case, I was in a fraternity basement with a friend on a weekend night. A particularly attractive young freshman was dancing next to me. The opportunity was there, and I suspect she intended it to be so: she was wide open for me to approach, and had oriented herself somewhat in my direction. All I needed to do was make a move. I thought about it, and so did my friend. He wasted no time questioning me.

“Why don’t you go ask her out?”

I was intimidated. She was hot. I had no game.

“Nah, she’s a slut dude. Nah.”

“If she’s a slut, then why don’t you go fuck her then?” My friend replied before pushing me a bit in her direction. Frozen by the logic of his words and my own stupendously pussified, gameless nature at the time, I did nothing. She kept dancing. The night passed. Life moved on.

Now, I wasn’t entirely wrong in my characterization of this girl. She became a well known “team bike” for several of the school’s sports programs, throwing herself at multiple seniors on the football, hockey and baseball teams. One football player even managed to hit it in the football fraternity’s chapter room in front of many of his teammates—she was down for that kind of thing, and made it known to multiple upperclassmen. Despite being one of the most beautiful girls on campus, a top sorority turned her down during Fall rush, only accepting her during the next semester as a late bid. Her female peers were openly shaming her for the reputation she’d gained, and everyone knew it.

All of the above, however, is really quite irrelevant to my own situation. Her sluttiness was not the real reason for my lack of effort in approaching her. Rather, I used that as a cover for my own insecurities.

The efforts of my male rationalization hamster had convinced me that it wasn’t because I was a gameless pussy that I couldn’t approach this hot girl right in front of me. No, it was because she was a slut. By throwing out that label and feigning to be holier than thou, I could divert my mind’s attention away from my own insecurity and inability to even approach a pretty girl. It was all a clever (or not so clever?) ruse.

My friend saw right through it, of course, and rendered it moot with one simple question: if she was such a slut, then why didn’t I go ahead and fuck her?

I said nothing back to him because there simply was no good answer. What reason was there not to have sex with this girl (or at least attempt to approach her and do so)? I was a young, horny, inexperienced guy with a desire to improve my social and sexual fortunes. If I had just dropped a pair of balls, I could have made a move right then and there.

I failed for one simple reason: I could not merely take what the defense (the girl) gave me, and instead tried to deflect and twist reality to fit into my own preconceived visions of what her sexuality should have looked like. I was so overly focused on her “sluttiness” that I threw away any potential to gain any sexual satisfaction of my own and derive enjoyment from it. I simply cared too much about her promiscuity, and too little about my own sexual gratification.

Again, I am not trying to suggest that there are no problems associated with female promiscuity. What I am saying, however, is that it is possible to vastly overstate this concern and fail to get as much sexual gratification as one should.

After taking the red pill, I soon realized I was not alone in this: lots of men, conditioned by false blue-pill delusions and their own ignorance with regard to the nature of female promiscuity have tried to turn hoes into housewives (and failed spectacularly as a result) or talked themselves out of pursuing an attractive but slutty girl and getting sexual experience they should be getting. They would have been much happier (having more sex and catching fewer feelings) simply accepting those women for what they were, getting what they needed, and moving on. No need to waste too much time focusing on her promiscuity (and why it is a negative) and no need to falsely put her on a pedestal. You need no shaming and no praising—just get your touches in and get along when you’re satisfied. Chances are that she’ll do the same thing. She’s probably not interested in being your special princess—don’t treat her like one and everyone wins.

If you’re a young guy and you meet a slutty girl, what is there really to care about? Chances are you have no desire to marry the girl or get serious (and vice versa), so the risk sluts pose in LTRs is irrelevant. Proper protection can minimize the STD risk, and the risk of pregnancy can be mitigated as well.

With those concerns out of the way, the only prominent factor left for the young male concerned with social and sexual self-improvement is his own sexual gratification. In this regard, the slut can be quite helpful, so long as you accept her for what she is. Nothing more and nothing less.

She’s going to be having lots of sex with somebody. Why shouldn’t it be you?

A Night In Lapa

November 18, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

He had just finished eating at Boteco do Beco, near the Naval Museum, which was his favorite place to eat in Centro. It was an old-school Rio place, serving traditional food at good prices (he loved the dobradinha), and he hardly ever saw a woman eat there. He then got on the metro and headed back to Zona Sul and his little hotel on Rua Republica do Peru to kill some time before heading out to Lapa for the night. His wingman Paulo couldn't join him tonight, having to deal with some issues with his girlfriend Silvia. Gone were the days when he and Paulo would head out to Via Show or other funk clubs to get hammered and grind their crotches into the ample bottoms of the local favela rats, but at least he had the memories. And he was still very close to Paulo's father and the rest of his family.

Paulo was crazy, which was one of the reasons he liked him, but he sensed the creeping tendrils of female domestication threatening to cramp his once unrestrained style. Maybe that was inevitable. But he was a great wingman, able to time his interjections into a conversation in a way that was unobtrusive but generated sufficient momentum to keep the group energized. It was an art form, like that of the omuko, the professional shouters in Japanese kabuki theatre, who knew how to time their special yago shouts (Yamatoya! Godaime! Mattemashita!) in a way that was coordinated perfectly to keep the stage actors flowing and moving.

Everyone needs a little external motivation now and then.

Silvia could be slightly overbearing in the exuberant way that big brasileiras can be, but he still liked her and thought she was a cool chick. She never cared that he and Paulo went out together on the prowl. "You two safados go do what you want. I'll see you when you get back", she would say. She once broke up a fight at a barzinho by pulling the guys apart with her own hands and yelling at them. Now that was cool. And he had a weird connection to her somehow, having banged her boss, a wild-eyed cabeleleira and business owner named Renata who lived near Rua Visconte de Piraja in Ipanema. All it took was an introduction, and he had taken it from there. Renata had an impressive body and a nice thick bundao, but she was also a ball-busting pain in the ass. So it was a short relationship.

Lapa was better on Fridays, but Saturdays were still good. He walked through the crowded streets near Siqueira Campos and entered the metro there. Getting off at Cinelandia station, he walked to Lapa, passing under the aqueduct-looking Arcos da Lapa where paupers and druggies congregated. He made a couple passes around Lapa, checking out Bar da Boa and Carioca da Gema, and when nothing seemed to be promising, he headed for Lapa 40 Graus. He hadn't been there in years and figured it was worth a shot.

Why does it feel like I've been doing this for decades, he asked himself. And he told himself, because, you asshole, you have been doing this for decades. Some men are just fated to walk the earth, maybe.

As he walked along the dirty streets he passed a glass door with a lace-like pattern of cracks in the glass, and suddenly a dormant memory flashes in his mind's eye from when he was very young.

It is winter 1992 and you are in Pohang, South Korea. "Sir", says Sgt. Wycklow, "the MPs have detained Cpl. Robinson. I think we've got to go get him." So you secure your rifle and personal gear and head out from MCP to a seedy, nasty strip of bars and shops that exist in the dregs of Pohang to service deployed Marines. When you get there Robinson is already pressed up against the wall by two huge MPs with black nightsticks and you go over to talk to them. You are a good talker, the best, and you know it, and you can get him out of this situation. A greasy little Korean rat bar proprietor with a mole between his eyebrows is swaying back and forth with his index finger jabbing insistently near your solar plexus. He is accusing Robinson of punching and breaking the window of his bar but you look into his eyes and know the dink is lying. Fucking lying. The eyes, Chico. They never lie. But you know it's useless to argue so you pay off the Korean rat with a fistful of won. Probably about forty thousand, maybe a bit more. Then you take Robinson away and give him a lecture, not too harsh, because he's a good worker and you know the dink was fucking lying.

He arrives Lapa 40 Graus and gets in line. Security frisks him then he shows his ID (an expired international drivers' license) and gets his magnetic club card used to buy drinks and food inside. Last time he was there it was a paper card. It's an extra 20 reais for access to the dance floor, and he pays it. He goes up the stairs, past the sinuca tables, and enters the dance hall, where a decent live band is already playing Brazilian music; couples glide across the floor here and there, some men sporting small straw hats that are popular but which he does not know the specific name of, except the generic word chapeus. He is suddenly conscious of his own inadequacies. Damn, he thinks, I really need to learn these dances.

Ordering a beer he sits near a group of girls and makes conversation, insinuating himself into their circle. His dancing game is awful, and he knows it, because he has made little to no effort to learn Brazilian dances. His language game is very good, though, and this counts for a lot. But maybe this was not the right place to come to. Maybe he should have headed to Leme or Leblon, the scene of past glories, where he had closed with some chick at Club Melt during one of his first Rio trips. That was back in 2004. The dance floor at that time at Club Melt shook and trembled disconcertingly but it was still a great place.

He remembered the video screen there at Melt that night had kept playing and replaying a video clip of the 2004 Pacers-Pistons brawl, with Ron Artest leaping into the stands. That somehow gave the place an electrically charged sexual intensity that he used to good advantage with a short garota with a kicking body and nipples that projected proudly through her camisa. He worked her good, real good, with the image of Ron Artest on a huge video screen in the background leaping into the stands to brawl with fans, looped over and over again.

He gets in a few approaches at Lapa 40 Graus, gets a cell number and a business card from a couple of girls, but nothing he knows will lead to anything. He goes down the the sinuca tables and opens up a girl in a blue striped dress and a jutting ass, looking out the window onto the street below. She is not interested and makes that clear. One negrita with a beautiful smile takes pity on him and shows him a few of the local dance moves, which was cool.

No other guys are making approaches that he could see; small social circles are staying tightly with their own groups. Brazil is a society of tribes and subtribes, he thinks.

Pipelining is the way to go here. Better get your own tribe and work things that way. This is the best way of pre-selection. Paulo's female friends were and had always been his best option, and he knew it.

The night surges on. Little tribes of girls are taking more and more pictures of each other with smart phones and seeking the shelter of their chattering peers. It seems to get worse every year like that, he thinks. And more and more of the girls every year are sporting tattoos, he notices. The band is good, very good, as live acts in Rio always are, and this counts for a lot. The crowd works itself into a seething mass, couples caroming off each other like agitated atoms. Strangely, although it has been a night of failure, he feels good. At about 3:30 a.m. he decides to call it quits and edges his way past the drunken dancers on the first floor, pays his bill, and leaves the club.

On the sidewalk outside, he leans against a pole and watches a stray dog with a loping gait nibble cautiously on a morsel of food in the gutter. It is time to go. His mind turns to Renata, her nice body, white teeth, and carefully depilated legs and bronzed skin; and her apartment in Ipanema, with the surly doorman and the rickety wire mesh elevator he loved, and he wishes things could have been different with her, that he could end the night in her arms, and wake up and bang her raw-dog in the shower like she loved. But he knows that those days are long gone and there is no point in dwelling on that.

He hails a taxi and heads back to his hotel, chatting with the driver about inflation, girls, Fluminense and Flamengo football, and corrupt politicians.

The cab glides near the shoreline near Botofogo and Flamengo, and on the water, reflections of bobbing watercraft shimmer and pulse in the flickering pallor of the morning's ocean phosphorescence. A steady train of linked impressions of the night, and of years past, move through his mind as gleams of lemon-yellow surrounding the masses on the horizon portend sunrise. He turns away from the water and, in the hills in the distance and over the tops of boxy apartment buildings lining the waterfront, the iridescent orange lights of the favelas mingle hauntingly with waning clusters of stars in the dissolving darkness, swirling and cascading like sparks arcing off flint-struck steel, melting gently into the dawn.

I Hate Men Dot Org

November 18, 2013 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Not too long ago I started a Google search for Panzer tanks of World War 2. After an hour I had completely forgotten why I was looking up sexy tanks of the Wehrmacht because I had inadvertently wound up on the incredibly unsexy site I Hate Men. Initially-due to its ugly look and clumsy design-I thought the site was just another abandonware blog. Yet it still seems to be functioning with a small but active user base.

The banner head proudly declares that I Hate Men is the 'World's Largest Women Driven Social Media Website'. I think Pinterest, Facebook and practically every other social media website in existence might have a legitimate argument against that claim but if there's one thing I Hate Men dot org has in abundance it is overestimation of self worth and lack of rational thought. Remind you of any particular group?

"Not worshipping me is pARt of pAAAtriARchy"

The quality of the site is low. The majority of the 'articles' are mostly rambling one to four paragraph walls of text rife with improper punctuation and misspelled words submitted by ranting women frustrated with men. The majority of their accusations and hatred have little basis in the real world and it was readily apparent after only ten minutes of reading that the women on the site consist of spoiled, angry and aging sluts. However, the direct access into the minds of sluts is absolutely fascinating and also very informative, especially for those of you who plan on or just beginning to game said sluts. Although a lot of the site can be painful to your sanity, I recommend any budding playah to read through some 'articles' and study the inner workings of the mind of your promiscuous counterparts.

I would like to avoid giving the site the traffic since it'll undoubtedly boost the ego of the creator but there are too many lols to be had and too much practical wisdom to be gleaned from examining the unadulterated thought processes of cheap women. In the end it is impossible to resist sharing when you have ~~crap~~ thoughtful, heartfelt confessions like this:

Why I hate men: by Tanya

> "I hate men because they're shallow. They'll always turn to stare at a beautiful woman, even when you're right there beside them looking your best. Do men think we should just sit there and endure it with a smile plastered on our face? Women don't carry on like that. You don't see us craning our necks to gawk at a hot guy right infront of our boyfriend."

Billy's Slut Translator: The alpha I'm banging is taking me out for some post "yay you let me finish on your face" pancakes. Having cheaply given my poosy up for him because he's super cute, Mr. Alpha is now scoping out his next lay instead of staring directly at me the whole time – oh hey look at that guy's cute butt.

> “Anyway… I guess I’m feeling a little frustrated right now.”

Billy’s Slut Translator: After the pancakes Mr. Alpha had me drop him off and he’s not replying to my texts.

She has so many serious problems

> “I am not the type of girl who will go out and sleep with any random guy. To be honest I’m sexually frustrated but I can’t seem to find a guy I like enough to become intimate with. I’ve tried internet dating websites.. It’s like the guys in my town are all taken, gay or just plain creepy.”

Billy’s Slut Translator: Despite all evidence to the contrary, I’m totally not a whore. I’ve never, ever, have sex with a guy within five minutes of meeting him. I always make sure I know their names first. For some reason they never want to wife me up afterwards and now I have to search for ~~dick~~ my prince on an international level with the internet. Every guy I find attractive enough to date doesn’t wanna date me; they’re probably intimidated. I mean, there’s tons of single guys available but they’re nowhere near as cute as the guys I deserve. Or they’re already out dating those real sluts. Gawd.

> “I just want to find my kind of guy, I want to have fun and open up to him have that feeling you only have when you’re with your favourite person in the world.”

Billy’s Slut Translator: I want to find a guy who’s super hot and will bend over backward to worship me. A guy who doesn’t care that yeah, most of the time it really is all about me. I mean, if I’m happy then he’ll totally be happy just being in my awesome presence. Then I can tell him every single inane thought and opinion I have and he’ll totally be my favourite person in the world.

I want to say that Tanya’s little rant is more sad then funny, that it’s a tragic Banshee’s wail from a woman who is on the cusp of realizing her selfishness has a price and that the bills are starting to come in but the lack of self awareness and near clichéd level of narcissistic slut speak and rationalization really does blow away any sense of pity for her.

Many of today's women are genuinely out of touch with the world beyond themselves. They are simply incapable of seeing their inherent faults or of stepping out from behind their own conceit. Here are some more examples to show the bizarre thought processes behind the minds of today's sluts:

(Except) I hate men!: by Separated4Ever111

> "3. I hate men b/c they are physically stronger than us. Fkg bullsh*t! So, this last one is really just an annoyance that I have since I hate men and I don't want to have to need their help when I'm not strong enough to do something. Urrgh!"

The number one obstacle to women's independence apparently

Sepafor (a heroic single mother) deeply desires to be independent, but all those 20kg Olympic bars lying around her house are really putting a strain on her feminism. Never mind everything else wrong in today's war of the sexes; Sepafor hits the nail on the head – men being physically stronger then women is totally unfair and unarguably the number one issue we as a society must figure out ASAP.

I HATE ALL MEN!! THEY ALL SUCK BALLS, LITERALLY: by manhater26

> "Ok first off, I'm only 19 years old and I already hate men. They're SUCH fucked up creatures. I'm glad I realized this early on in life because I'll be saving myself a great deal of suffering in the future. The freedom that comes with not caring what men think about you is unspeakable. I used to try hard to look good for men; well, not anymore. FUCK IT. Older men are the WORST, they like to manipulate young girls such as myself because they know we're naive/don't know much about life. But hey, you live and you learn and I've definitely learned my lesson. I'm doneski. I don't want to get married and I don't want to have kids. I'm SOOOOO done."

Here manhater26 (who claims to be only 19, manhater19 was taken apparently) declares how she's NOOOOOW going to ACT how the millions of other sluts infecting/living western society already DO. I truly hope she ENJOYS her freedom but I have a sneaking suspicion that I Hate Men hasn't seen the last of herski.

Pictured: the new and improved manhater26

I don't just want to criticize though. I realize that Return Of Kings has a few silent hoebags reading it and their feelings probably just got hurt. We don't want to become a hate site ourselves now. So hold off on rushing to comments section to deride me ladies. I don't want to leave a sour taste in your mouths amongst the thick gooey saltiness that is already encrusted in there, so I'm going to pull out my inner Dr. Phil and guide you chicks out there through a final article where I offer some sage wisdom on how not to be the stupid sluts you probably are. You're welcome.

hate: by monykah

> "I hate men. I hate the games that have to be played with them.I hate the fact that they want women so bad sexually, if you have sex with them too quickly, they leave. It hurts so bad. I hate to think of how many men I have had sex with (only because I desire intimacy/closeness) and KNOW that I meant nothing to them (and vice versa). I've only had 2 real boyfriends, but several partners."

Monica – sorry, monykah – and all you other women like her, here's a little PROTIP on love; seeking intimacy/closeness with 'partners' (guys you screw without dating) via sex is retarded. Stop being retarded and stop having random sex if you want love. Sex does not lead to intimacy if you're not committed to the person. If you're looking for love, sex should be the culmination of a relationship, not something that happens after six Smirnoff mixers and three Jello shots. If a man is pressuring you for quick sex he's undoubtedly looking for a pump and dump. If you give it up, it is no one's fault but your own.

> "I hate the way men try to give you the bare minimum, but will take everything if you allow them to. The other day I was texting with a guy that likes me and I told him that I had gotten laid off of my job. He then says, "oh, you're at home?" After I tell him yes, he proceeds to ask me if he can come over and watch tv with me. Call me crazy, but that made me so so angry! He has never ever invited me out to dinner, lunch, a movie, bowling, or any other type of date, but he wants to > come over my house, kick off his shoes, watch my cable on my tv, sitting on my couch, in my house, where I don't even know how I'm going to pay rent at this month. If there is one thing I know about men (especially those that will invite themselves over to your place of residence, or you to theirs) they want to try to establish some false sense of intimacy with you, put their arm around you, touch your leg, try to kiss you, eventually hoping it will lead to sex. All without them ever having to spend a dime on a damn date."

You Moneykuh's out there, welcome to equality. Men don't have to spend a dime on you just because you don't have a job. If you want men to spend money on you, you have to be a woman worthy of spending it on. A lot of men work hard jobs and they have to earn their cash. If you want to date stop giving your body up for next to nothing. If you want a man to spend money on you then give him a reason to. You are only worth what you are worth. Men don't owe you anything even if you've banged them; if you want cash for sex, become a prostitute.

If you only want sex and money you may as well hook – I still would if I could find a kind pimp

Brief aside: I can't wait until someone makes an article saying that Return Of Kings tells women to become prostitutes and quotes only the last half of that sentence.

> "I hate men who approach me who are way out of their league. And I get so frustrated with myself for being so damn polite to them, and not wanting to hurt their feelings. I hate how I have to pretend not to like the guys that I'm really interested in, knowing that if I pretend that I couldn't care less about them, they will chase me to the ends of the earth. But if I am genuine and authentic, and show that I like them, they really aren't interested. It's the most unnatural thing > in the world to pretend as if you don't like someone when you actually do."

Munnekaa's, here's a crazy crazy thought – bear with me – but if you're not employed, if you're deceptive and you've slept around with a lot of guys, there are very few men who are legitimately below your league. You are not good girlfriend material for most men out there and you certainly aren't worthy of being a wife to any good man. An investment in you in either forms of love or finances is a terrible prospect for men. You're a loser and the first step to fixing that is to admit you are the problem, not the men you thoughtlessly bang.

All your problems stem from your selfishness and sense of entitlement. Lose these and try to salvage the remains of your life, the one you alone are screwing up. And don't be surprised when you play hard to get and nobody gets you. Most people have better things to do then to chase someone around who shows no sign of interest. Women of the west, find some middle ground between immediately giving your herpes to a guy you just met and completely ignoring him like he's an unworthy smudge of crap on your heel. Stop being so extreme and if you genuinely like a guy let him know. There are only three possible outcomes to doing so;

1) He'll want sex immediately, meaning he's going to pump and dump you – proceed knowing that he won't date you.

2) He'll beta it up and he'll ask you out on a date. If you accept that the date is not your inherent right, you'll treat him with the same respect and dignity you demand for yourself. Respect it when a man spends time and money on you without pushing immediately for sex.

3) He's not interested and will tell you so or simply just ignore you. You may be tempted to bribe him with sex, and he might take you up on that offer, but he's not going to date you afterward so just forget about it and move the frig on.

> "For every man that I have ever had sex with, I hate you. I hate you for making me feel worthless in your eyes, when I was simply trying to share a part of myself with you. I hate you for making me doubt myself. I hate you for making me have such a negative outlook on men. I hate you for making me cry. I hate you for not even making the sex worth my time."

Moonicuz's of the world, it is you and you alone making terrible choices in regards to men. You all are not some tragic heroine, spurred and used by the cruel vagaries of men. If you act like a cheap worthless slut, then that is exactly how men are going to treat you. All those tears you cry over us, all those angry feelings, they are not our fault – they are yours. Sex does not magically equal intimacy if there was nothing there beforehand. If all you want is sex sex sex then how are you surprised when that's all you get? Stop trying to make other people feel guilty for you. You're playing a game of Sexual Chicken with men and in Sexual Chicken the man always wins, especially if you don't swerve your poon outta the way (of his penis). For women the only way to win the game is not to play it.

Hey, I'm not the one saying it; a woman is

In a better world the butt-hurt sluts on I Hate Men would represent just a sub-sect of the Western woman; that they were nothing more then a small, pathetic repository of greedy hoebags who lack an ounce of logic or empathy. I wish we men didn't encounter women like this every day, all day, in our jobs or on the street, while out shopping or at the gym. Yet we do. The rants expressed on I Hate Men are the zeitgeist of today's Western female. They are everywhere, it's like we live in a world of slutty Bodysnatchers. Hopefully this little bit of insight into the female mind helps improves your lives men; or at the very least helps lead to an extra notch or two in some roundabout way.

And to all the women reading this, do you want to be a decent human being? The method is simple; do not act or even think like any of the chicks on I Hate Men. If you already do change your ways quick before you wind up getting slammed by us alpha jerks next weekend and then fill the internet up with more jaded crap about how men are evil monsters. We don't have to save you from yourselves. The majority of men are not assholes; they're simply treating you how you deserve to be treated. Give yourselves a reason not to hate men because you alone are the only one with the power to find it.

Or, like always, just ignore my good advice and keep on skankin' it up. It's not my heartache.

3 Lessons From The Elderly

November 19, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

I am not proud to admit that old people make me uncomfortable. Having to spend time with someone so out-of-touch with our modern world and rapidly hurtling toward death makes me both anxious and a bit sad. As I get older, though, I have realized the importance of connecting with people who have valuable lessons to teach us if we're willing to put in some time to sift through some minor banalities.

I recently spent a few days with both of my grandmothers, who are alive and healthy but approaching their late 80s. Not knowing how much longer they will be around, I made it a point to ask them as many questions as possible about their lives — their upbringing , jobs, loved ones, and most vivid memories. Here are a few things that struck me about our conversations:

1. They value life's small pleasures

The highlight of the day for one of my grandmothers is getting to walk to the mailbox and then sort through her junk mail. As I watched her contentedly tear apart envelopes, I thought of my frustration when my smartphone wouldn't boot up in under 30 seconds and felt small. I have the word in my pocket. I have friends, my health and limitless possibility ahead of me. Yet she gets as much glee from feeding the dog as I do in getting a job promotion, banging a new girl, or traveling to a foreign country. Watching her enjoyment of daily chores gives me yet another reason to unplug and appreciate these subtle moments.

2. They enjoy the few meaningful friendships in their lives

At such an advanced age, most of the people they care about are either dying or long dead. Octogenarians live lonely lives. Just seeing their neighbor in the old folk's home or at the bingo hall makes their day immeasurably better. Often when I'm out with friends my inner introvert implores me to retreat to my apartment and read books or articles on the internet. Watching my grandmothers reminded me that the internet will always be there, but my friends won't.

3. They are conscious of how fast it all goes

It's the ultimate cliche that life is short, but seeing 80 years' worth of living replayed in stories over just a couple of hours highlights this point in a way I thought impossible. My grandmothers both spoke about childhood during the depression and how different today's world is, and how massive changes have occurred almost in the blink of an eye. Despite her devout Catholicism, one of my grandmothers advised me to "stay unattached" (her words) as long as possible, travel a lot ,and enjoy my life. No matter their religious leanings, old people grow to lament the things that they didn't get to do and only all too late see the big picture of how to appreciate the power of youth.

It is a stupid cliche to say "live every day as if it's your last," because that would prevent you from building a foundation for a long and contented life. Spending time with my relatives has helped me a develop a more appropriate credo: "Live every day how you would like to remember yourself when you grow old." It will happen before you realize.

Female Vs Male Problem Solving On The Energy Crisis

November 19, 2013 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

The world today is facing many problems: financial, political, and environmental. Many people in the manosphere are suggesting that we learn to Enjoy The Decline. However, there are some within and outside of the manosphere who believe that these problems have solutions and have not yet given up on civilization. One must admit, while progress has come with quite a few problems there are some things that I would not be willing to give up.

One of the problems that the world faces is energy. Whether to power our houses, run our businesses, or move our cars the world needs energy. This problem covers all of the three categories mentioned above and our ability or inability to solve it will be a major factor in what the future of our species will hold. Many people are working on it from every angle imaginable. I am going to focus on two people, one man and one woman, and compare how they approached this problem and what it says about them.

The woman is Jennifer Granholm. According to Wikipedia she is the former Governor of Michigan, a beauty pageant winner, unsuccessful Hollywood actress, and graduated with a B. A. in political science and French. This is her speech at TedTalk about her plan to fix the energy problem.

The first five minutes is a sad story about a factory that closed in a small town in her state. After that at about 6:45 she gets to her plan, which is to put a $4.5 billion dollar reward from taxpayers to states that succeed at making 80% of their electricity from renewable sources like wind, solar, or biofuels. At 10:50 she mentions that it would be hard to get Congress to agree to this so she suggests that the rich people in the audience voluntarily pony up the money to pay for it.

There are three things to take from this video.

1) She doesn't actually come up with an idea. She just came up with a way of spending other people's money to pay for other people to solve the problem.

2) She is unbelievably happy with herself for her ability to come up with this idea of getting other people to solve a problem. Although I must point out that sometimes men do this too.

3) She is missing the point that the reason people are not moving to renewable energy is because at the moment it is more expensive. Moving to having 80% of a state's energy from renewable energy at this time would increase the cost to companies that hire people. Blue collar manufacturing plants that use a lot of energy would be even more likely to outsource to other countries just like the refrigerator company in the beginning of her video that she seemed so sad about. Thumbs up for government interference in the free market.

Now compare her "solution" to a solution made by a real scientist, not a political scientist (in her own words).

Introducing Kirk Sorensen. According to Wikipedia he has a master's degree in aerospace engineering. He worked as an engineer at NASA for ten years followed by a year at Teledyne Brown Engineering as Chief Nuclear Technologist before leaving to start his own company, Flibe Energy. Those are real credentials. His solution is an improved nuclear reactor called Liquid Fluoride Thorium Reactors which are explained in the video below. This video is much longer, but at least view the first five minutes and I will outline the other important points below. The point I believe are most important are in bold.

- 0:00-5:00 Short attention grabbing Intro to Thorium power
- 6:00 – 6:10 Gender demographic on Facebook
- 6:15-7:40, 9:50-11:50, 1:25:00-1:27:10, 1:32:10-1:35:20 Kirk talks respectfully with a hippie couple
- 16:35 – 19:00, 36:50-40:15, 56:00-57:20, History of Thorium energy
- 19:10-21:40, 24:50-29:30, 31:20-34:20, 40:20-45:30,1:10:00-1:11:30 Technical talk about nuclear power
- 21:40-23:00, 52:25-52:55, 1:25:30-1:29:30 Explanation of dangers of radioactivity in easy to understand terms
- 29:00 – 31:20 Explanation of nuclear weapons and thorium
- 34:30-35:00, 1:37:30-1:39:30, 1:53:00-1:54:00 Why we didn't use Thorium before

- 1:50:00-1:50:30- Using waste heat to make ammonia or desalinate seawater
- 35:20-35:45 Kirk complains about being in a basement

I included the last one because it shows how Kirk who has already done orders of magnitude more than Jennifer is able to remain orders of magnitude more humble about it.

I will break down Jennifer and Kirk's solutions by the three categories I mentioned in the beginning.

Financial

Jennifer's solution would obviously cost taxpayers or TED's rich and gullible audience members 4.5 billion with little chance of seeing a return on investment. It would create jobs in clean energy production, but the jobs made in wind farms and solar would be at the expense of taxes that could be used elsewhere and would also raise the cost of electricity on both businesses and consumers hurting the economy much more.

Kirk's solution would lower the cost of energy dramatically for both consumers and businesses which would help the economy. There would also a very good chance of getting a substantial ROI for investors. Kirk does admit that since it is a new technology there would be some risk for investors and he can not put down an exact percentage on the investor's ROI, but it is better than Jennifer's "just give 4.5 B because it is the right thing to do."

Thorium energy adoption would hurt the coal and gas industries which do create jobs, but there would be new jobs in the rare earth mining as thorium regulations disappeared. I would imagine rare earth mining is nicer than coal mining (although I have never worked at either). Having a guaranteed source for rare earths would also prevent manufacturing jobs from outsourcing to China and perhaps bring a few back. No company will spend billions on a manufacturing plant in the US if there is a chance that US/China relations will go down to the point that China embargoes the US and they have to close their factory because they can not get their necessary raw materials.

Political

Jennifer's proposal would cause more bipartisanship as electricity costs went up. Kirk's idea would get rid of the global warming and environment debate because the most environmentally friendly option would also be the most cost-effective.

We could also sell this technology to other countries to pay off our debt. Not to China anymore, that ship has sailed because we gave this tech to them for free already. However, we owe lots of money to other countries who probably aren't expecting anything more than hyperinflated fiat currency by now anyway so they would love to trade debt for a few hundred thorium reactors.

As companies moved out of China because they weren't the only source of rare earth metals then manufacturing in China would drop and they wouldn't have to trade with North Korea for materials anymore and North Korea would have to stop their nuclear program.

We could offer this cost-effective proliferation resistant nuclear technology to Iran in return for them stopping their uranium enrichment program and they would have to say yes.

Environmental

Jennifer's proposal would involve building massive number of wind farms, solar panel farms, all over the country with high voltage power lines connecting all of them. That wouldn't be environmentally damaging at all (/sarcasm). Also the amount of energy needed to build, transport, and set up this renewable energy infrastructure would take many years to pay off the carbon credit anyway.

Kirk's idea would replace 5 billion tonnes of coal, 31 billion barrels of oil, 5 trillion cubic meters of natural gas, and 65,000 tonnes of uranium with only 5,000 tonnes of thorium because of thorium reactors high efficiency. However, I am personally very doubtful about his claims of creating carbon neutral gasoline from atmospheric CO2 even with nearly free electricity, but I would love to be wrong on that.

Even discounting the coal and natural gas the 5000 tonnes of thorium to 65000 tonnes of uranium difference would already reduce nuclear waste produced. Also the isotopes made from the decay of U233 created in the thorium reactor (Bismuth 213) can be used in cancer radiotherapy for leukemia so it would actually save lives.

So, which person would you choose to lead the country in solving the energy crisis?

Publisher Response To The “Eating Disorders” Article

November 20, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On November 13, I allowed publication of Tuthmosis’ article 5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder. I did so because it contains value for men who want to date thin women in America, a country that is currently facing a devastating obesity epidemic, which we recently highlighted with Fat Shaming Week.

The article states several facts about women with eating disorders:

> A girl who spends inordinate mental and physical energy on her looks is rarely fat.
> […]
> You can go out to nice restaurants and order take-out with the confidence that your expense on her will be minimal.
> […]
> An eating disorder often translates into the direct opposite: a girl who’s modest, fragile, and vulnerable.
> […]
> They aren’t too many poor girls with eating disorders.

The delivery of ideas like these may make some people uncomfortable, but they are based on our experiences and views of the world. We speak the truths that politically correct outlets are too afraid to share because of sensitive mainstream readers who lose their composure at anything they disagree with.

Eating disorders are bad

I want to make it clear that we at ROK are not promoting eating disorders. These are devastating illnesses on those whom they afflict, and we wish sufferers are able to receive the treatment they need. It is unfortunate that sufferers continue to be stigmatized by society, so it surprises me that Tuthmosis' article has been angrily received when it attempts to reduce stigma by encouraging our male readership to give women with anorexia and bulimia an opportunity for real intimacy. This is far better than merely giving patronizing e-support by outlets like Huffington Post.

We are educating our masculine readers not to pass on eating disorder victims just because they have an illness, yet instead of receiving thanks, we're receiving hate instead. If we all had cancer, and someone wrote an article titled "5 Reasons To Fornicate With A Man Who Has Cancer," we would spread it far and wide to make fornicating with us a better proposition for women. We would not send death threats or calls for censorship like is happening to us now. I think a bit more graciousness is in order for our unorthodox method of outreach.

The Tuthmosis case

Upon closely reviewing Tuthmosis' article, I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing in it that endorses eating disorders or slanders those who have them. He has simply shared knowledge and insights that can aid single men in their pursuit of sexual happiness without hurting women. While some of his statements may be subjectively interpreted, we're not a scientific journal, and so should not be judged in that manner.

Was Tuthmosis' article offensive? Was it tasteless? Not to me and not to the bulk of our male readership. It is not our job as a men's publication to ensure everything we write does not offend 7 billion human beings on this planet, so there is no legitimate reason to remove the article, and those who are calling for it to be removed should instead visit the graves of America's great founders and speak into the ground about why they don't believe in free speech simply because their feelings have been hurt by mere words. As a staunch believer in free speech, I will do all I can to make sure ROK contributors like Tuthmosis can share their opinions and experiences freely, especially when it does not advocate for violence or breaking the law.

Therefore, the article will stay and Tuthmosis will stay. We respect your freedom of expression, even if they include death threats and calls for mutilation on our genitals, but I sincerely hope you can gather the strength to handle one article on the internet that you don't like. If you want to engage us in a sane dialogue about this matter, feel free to reach out via the comments below or through email. God bless.

The Women Who Have And Women Who Have Not

November 21, 2013 | by Mxaddict14 | Link | Original Link

After I recently broke up with my girlfriend of 5 years, I have become quickly acquainted with the jungle world of dating in Los Angeles at age 45.

I was spoiled with my ex. I'm obsessed with thin, waify, delicate, small boned women. She was small boned, weighed less than 100 lbs., and had above average breasts. She wore the clothes I like, exactly the way I like it, and performed various sex acts, exactly the way I like it. But above all, I never had to worry about her getting fat.

But then early menopause hit, and everything changed for the worse. The sex drive and motivation fell off a cliff. Then came the wrinkle lines, the constant nagging, wild mood swings, lecturing, and all the rest. That relationship ended.

After putting myself back into circulation and navigating the dating scene, it has quickly dawned on me the shocking contrast between the "Haves" and the "Have Nots" among the available single women in L.A.

1. The "Haves"

The "Haves" are the thin, or slender women with good figures who also possess the skill and guile to be able to capture a man's attention. They don't even have to be that pretty in the face, they just need to have the right "look".

Exhibit A is a girl who I met in my office building, 31 years old, 5'9", no more than 115 lbs.. Somewhat average and plain facial features, but easily overcome by having the most perfect breasts imaginable. I took her out to lunch, and she shows up dressed up in tight fitting navy blue skirt that hugged her slender waistline, and one of those delicate silk blouses which showed off her nice, bony shoulders and her pencil thin arms. On top of that, she strategically left a middle button undone on her blouse such that I could get an ample peek of her extraordinary breasts held up delicately by her $75 La Perla bra decorated with all sorts of lace and sequins. It was classic. She was showing just enough, but at the same time, not quite enough. I was totally transfixed.

This type of woman knows exactly how to dress, how to walk, and how to flirt to drive men absolutely wild.

Despite her average facial appearance, this one will never have to bother with Match.com, OKCupid, or any professional “matchmaking” service. Hundreds of guys are constantly available in real time, anytime she wants, simply by presenting herself correctly and circulating in the general public. She will get constant hits at Starbucks, Whole Foods, the Juice Bar, or just walking in the mall.

Of course, she might install a Tinder App on her iPhone, and get 150 matches within 48 hours for ego gratification and show her girlfriends all the cute guys are interested in her.

The “Haves” are never alone. In fact, their biggest worry is to how to fend off the hundreds of men clawing after their phone number or attention. That is why so many of them walk around with that “bitch look”, as in “how dare you look at me”. And they consciously refuse to make any eye contact with the opposite sex out of fear of sparking animal spirits and having to engage in defensive action.

But if they are ever lonely, they can have a suitable man who is very good looking, interesting, and with a respectable wallet size with relative ease. Probably within 12 hours or less. All they have to do is engage in eye contact, speak one or two sentences, and the phone numbers and/or invitations will come flying in.

2. The “Have Nots”

The “Have Nots” are another lot.

More typically, they are the women who are prone to fat “PTF”, or either just plain “fat”. You know the ones I’m talking about. Those who have to struggle with their weight 24/7. No matter how many diets they try, or how many exercise machines they order off the late night infomercials, nothing works. They are simply stuck with bad genes, or they are “foodies” and have an emotional connection with food which cannot be broken.

Many of them can have a good looking face, featured prominently on the first page of dating profiles, with the body view missing. Running into them in person ignites an initial flash of desire, but then when the eyes scan the rest of their bodies, then interest immediately evaporates.

They may have normal sized shoulders and arms, but their butt and legs are way too big for their frame. Or they may appear to have an acceptable figure when dressed up, but the slightly thick arms and the chunky chopper calves give away what they really look like with their clothes off.

The poor "Have Nots" are stuck living with the horror that very few men are seriously interested in them, except for maybe one time hookups. Few men ever ask for their phone number. Drunken ones will simply ask them to go to their place right away with no courting whatsoever. Anytime they accompany a hot girlfriend to a nightclub, they are looked upon as a dreaded disease by the men attempting to hook up with their skinny companion.

3. The Curse of Fat, The No. 1 Danger in Online Dating

This weight problem which dooms many women into the "Have Not" category is especially acute with women in their late 30's or early 40's. Keeping the weight off was always fairly easy when they were young, even though it was a constant struggle. But then they reach a point where the fat just accumulates for no reason whatsoever. And they know that most men hate it and despise it. It can ruin everything, regardless of their "bubbly" personality. Worse than that, many of these "fatties" are also those who have substandard breasts. Odd shaped, too mushy, or those with the horror of knowing that every 10 lbs. they gain, all of it goes into their ass, legs, and stomach, and none of it goes to their breasts.

By the way, if you ever have phone sex or chat with a woman whose name is "Phoebe", "Matilda", "Gertrude", etc., run like hell. Those are guaranteed to be leviathans.

Most of these "prone to fat" types are those who sign up on all the online dating sites. They get headshots made for their profile pictures to make them appear to be thin, without revealing anything about their body size or shape. However, some have been adept at using photoshop at erasing fat provided that the picture is taken at the proper angle. I've been burned by several of those.

Any of these "chunky" chicks who attempt to post on Tinder and show only facial shots are quickly swiped off and they get no admirers.

I made the mistake recently by agreeing to meet one of these girls from Tinder who had a glamour head shot, and a blurry distance shot of her riding on horseback. Couldn't exactly tell how her body looked, but I took a chance anyway. She shows up at the bar where we agreed to meet and she was a monster. She must have been over 6 ft. tall and probably weighed at 170 lbs. Not really "fat", just big boned. Pretty flat stomach, but wide "birthing stock" hips. Luckily, her breasts were ample, which made her tempting. But nothing could stop the fact that I felt like I was with a chick that looked and felt like she outweighed me by 35 lbs. and would probably smother me in bed. And 2 years from now she'll be even bigger.

Who knows, she might have just lost 120 lbs. on "The Biggest Loser", lol……

4. Where Are The Women In Between?

So compare and contrast the tall, skinny, beautiful one, with the "Amazon" chick I just described.

One will never been seen online and spends most of her energy fending off phone number and hookup requests, knowing that she will never be left alone and will never have to live alone.

Always has a flat stomach, perfectly shaped silhouette waist and hips. You know what I'm talking about. One which you would never have to bother with a tape measure to win an argument whether or not she was “fat” or not.

The hot ones seem to get even hotter because they become even more emboldened by the constant attention they receive.

The “Have Nots” are probably on 5 different matchmaking sites and using 3 different speed dating apps and wonders why she only attracts creeps and psychos interested in “big and beautiful”.

They seem to try vairious diets, but eventually throw in the towel and give up. They get bigger, thicker, and heavier and drift even further outside the realm of being viewed as a looker.

It is really astonishing to see how black and white it is out there if you are a single woman looking for dates or attention from the opposite sex. Either you’re one of the “Haves” or one of the “Have Nots”, and there is not really much in between.

So where are the girls in the middle? So far, I can’t find any.

Arguing With Dumb People

November 22, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

After the recent flood of ideological zealots here, I looked into ways of combating them and their methods. When dealing with the unintelligent, arguments based on reason, fact and logic are not their strong suit. Arguing with these people is best done by exposing their inconsistencies or their emotional dependency.

In a world full of many different ideologies, big egos, and hurt feelings, a man can come across many different opinions. Sometimes there can be thoughtful, rational and logical arguments. This occurs in certain places. These places tend to be few and far between. The consumerist herd mentality of modern society has diffused into politics, education and the workplace. This has created environment that are almost entirely ideologically driven and dominated by one belief through non-intellectual methods.

In most political spheres and in public, peoples' opinions become their identity. Losing an argument is not an option because that would invalidate their existence. Engaging these people in certain discussions is a tricky venture. They are more like salesmen than defenders of a premise. They seek to sell you something. Whether you need it or not, they will find a way to convince you that you need it and should conform.

I found that typically the biggest advocate of an idea is not necessarily the most informed person of that group. This person's advocacy usually is an attempt to belong to something. Countering their argument is rather simple, just avoid playing by their rules. There are four main techniques in engaging these ideological salesmen.

The first technique is nonchalance.

This is where you listen to what they say and are indifferent to it.

Typical global warming advocate: We should save the environment utilizing “x” method.

Response: that’s nice

if you’re feeling more antagonistic you can use this:

Response: cool story bro

The second technique is asking questions.

This is a variation on the Socratic method. You just ask questions that could lead to sales men disagreeing with his own premise.

Typical feminist: We should enforce equality utilizing “x” method.

Response: What is your selective service number?

Response: Are men and women different?

Response: Has this method been tried before?

The third technique is war gaming.

This is where you play out their idea as if it’s actually been implemented.

Typical collectivist: We should have some sort of “x” economy to solve “z” problem.

Response: What would be the punishment for people that don’t comply with the system?

Response: What would your position be in this system?

Response: Would the system be sustainable in the face of the inherent selfish nature of people?

The fourth technique is being indifferent emotionally.

Some people trying to sway your opinion with emotional appeals. This is an attempt to circumvent logic and rational thought. By appealing to your empathy and/or aversion to hurting people, they seek to manipulate you. If you are indifferent emotionally, they cannot influence you.

Typical “victim”: I was the victim of “x” crime therefore you should acquiesce and agree with me.

Response: If you feel a crime has been committed, call the police.

Response: I don’t really care.

Response: Sucks to be you.

As you can see, these responses would throw a monkey wrench into these ideological sales pitches. The vacuous zombie that is spewing buzzwords will be confused by these methods. They would not have a reply to these response because they have not seen them before nor have been trained how to answer. To the rational outside observer, these responses will work to discredit whatever ideology is being pushed. In conclusion, it is best to do your own research to make any decisions. This is especially true with what ideology you follow and believe in. If you do choose to engage these “salespeople of salvation”, these methods will surely get them off their pitch and might actually cause them to question their own beliefs.

You can read my original post that prompted these responses here as well as all of the wonderful comments I've gotten on it. I've received hundreds more Tweet-hates and emails calling for my head. You can read some of the best here.

NOTE: I've gotten nowhere near the hate of my fellow ROK writer Tuthmosis for his "5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder" article that was published a few days before mine. I attribute much of the vitality of my article to his going absolute ape-shit insane. If Tuth is the 10 at the bar garnering all of the attention from dudes, I'm the fat ugly 3 sitting there hoping some dude is going to get drunk enough to go dumpster diving.

First, violence rarely solves anything. Posting that you want to kill me in some extremely inhumane ways will do nothing but give you a temporary dopamine hit that you did your part to fend off the mean, scary blogger. Do what you please, it's a free country. However, I must pose this question: if you feel so compelled to write such things, why do you feel that way? If I'm so wrong, it wouldn't bother you. Much like when a toddler tells you 2+2=5, you simply laugh them off and continue on your merry way. However, it seems very few people were able to do such a thing on this article. It seems as if the hate is rising, seething underneath these petty insults, because it's the truth.

What's that, the truth you say? Nobody ever gets upset if it's truly bullshit. People are all riled up over this because they look in the mirror and see the reality of the world we live in. I call things like I see it, and I put it down on paper for others to read and learn from. Whether it's ugly or not.

Secondly, the context of this article is simply being taken out of hand. Is it satire and/or trolling? No. Let's think about it though. "20 Things Women Should Be Shamed For, Not Celebrated." To me, this means that these are things women shouldn't be doing, as well as opening open avenues of exploration for what is, dare I say, good behavior.

Being a slut; girls hate other girls who are sluts and shame each other with the word. So we SHOULD encourage girls to sleep with every guy they come across?

Being fat; it's not healthy, should we not encourage people to eat right, exercise, and be healthy?

Being on welfare; should we not encourage women to be getting jobs and not be reliant on the government?

These seem to be the ones that people are hating on the most, so I felt the need to address them. Now that we've thought about it in that context, does it really sound so bad? We want to encourage girls to pick the right men to have sex with, to be healthy human beings, and to pursue their careers and not rely on the government to pay their way.

Wow, I really am such an asshole. <– THAT is satire.

If you think that women should sleep with every guy they find remotely attractive, should never exercise, and should pop out tons of babies and collect checks from the government, then perhaps you need to take a good long hard look in the mirror and realize that the truth hurts. Notice, though, that some points such as lying about online dating, paternity fraud, and divorce haven't really come under as much fire. Clearly then, I can reasonably state that some of these commenters calling for my death actually believed they were very good points, because they stayed hush hush about them.

Finally, many people have told me I'm a worthless piece of shit who is turned on by donkey porn, lives in my mom's basement, and fucks myself in the ass with a giant dildo while playing Warcraft. One sentence later, they crucify me for hiding behind an avatar and pen name.

Obviously, if the first was true, I would hide behind an avatar and pen name. Really though, take a look around at my articles here, and my own personal blog. Do I really sound like a fat nerd who never steps outside of his basement except to buy another 2-liter of Mountain Dew Code Red? Get a grip people. I blog under a pen name because I have a wonderful family (my little sister reads my blog), I have beautiful girls in my life whom I care deeply about (some of them read this), I'm in superb shape, and I have a fast-tracking career with a great company. Am I bragging? Perhaps a little, but there was really no way to say the last points without doing so. If I really wanted to brag, I'd say I'm fucking models, drive a Ferrari, bench press 1,000 pounds, and am a CEO at Google.

I've worked hard to get where I am today. Continue to criticize me behind your own anonymous usernames. Go ahead and cry to the Twitter-gods calling for my suspension, in addition to calling for my testicles, head, and just about any body part that can be mutilated. Just realize, I'm the one out there living, breathing, and writing about life.

All you do is read the article and become so enraged you feel the need to shout disturbing death threats to a stranger on the Internet.

To that I say, the truth hurts.

Why Grandma Yellen Is A Bad Choice For Federal Reserve Chairman

November 22, 2013 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

With the bloated state of the US government debt and the shutdown, Fat Shaming Week was appropriate in more ways than one. Now, horror of horrors, Janet Yellen has been nominated by Obama as the first woman chairman of the Federal Reserve. She will almost certainly be confirmed.

The FED has been a contentious organization over the last couple of decades

Where Alan Greenspan was once the cheer of Wall Street and the friend of investors around the globe, it is now seen that his policies, far from creating a more balanced economy actually led to the tech boom/bust at the turn of the millennium and his stimulus to try to 'fix' that problem led to the housing boom/bust and virtual collapse of the entire global financial system. Conveniently retiring a hero before the full scale of the disaster he created could be pinned on his watch, Alan then went on to pen his memoirs which he titled "The Age of Turbulence". Sounds more like the morning after a bad vindaloo than anything to do with sound monetary policy. Love your work Alan. Where can I get a job like that?

Alan is a classic case of Government being the disease it pretends to cure

While the FED is not strictly speaking a government branch, being a private bank, essentially the banker to the government, it is a politicized organization that carries considerable weight, but has very little public oversight or transparency.

Ben Bernanke, Greenspan's successor has been even more controversial. Before he took office he jokingly announced he would drop money from helicopters if he thought it would stave off a depression. If that isn't the ultimate beta male quote I don't know what is. Whatever happened to action and consequences ?

This little quip earned him the nick name of Helicopter Ben in the press and he has most certainly lived up to that name; although sadly for Joe Public helicopters are nowhere to be seen, rather he's preferred to air lift money into the vaults of his bankster buddies.

A career academic who's never had a 'real' job, preferring to be an esteemed professor at Princeton (writing long winded waffle on the 1930s depression), Bernanke has never successfully launched a product or run a business, yet somehow this armchair economist was deemed to be the best man to put in charge of economic policy of the richest, most prosperous nation on the planet. This so-called economic expert has been known to make comments such as "no one can predict the price of gold" and "no one saw the crash coming" – although sound minded traders and hedge fund managers were able to do both.

During his time in power US debt has mushroomed from a few trillion or so up to $16.7 trillion and Obama has now run out of money and is begging Congress to add another quick trillion to his credit card limit, which will be unlikely to last until the end of his term.

The problem with socialism is you rapidly run out of other people's money to spend

So what can we look forward to in 2014 as another historic milestone in feminism is notched up? Women are traditionally unwelcome in banking circles. It remains a bastion of male tradition. Suits, cigars, gentlemen's clubs and BDSM don't generally fit well with conservative senior 'ladies'. After all that number crunching and masonic trouser rolling, a few cigars and a good whipping by some brunette hottie just hits the spot. Not any more: cigars and black leather are out, necklaces and brightly colored 'old bag' couture is in.

In Wall Street speak, Yellen is seen as a ‘dove’ who tends to keep monetary policy loose and easy, lowering interest rates and keeping the punch flowing as long as possible. Get used to hearing the term quadrillion, (1000 trillion) because that is most likely where the US debt level is headed, as the USD devalues, interest rates creep up and the government frantically tries to bail water out of the sinking ship of its broken economic and budgetary policy by raising more and more debt. Currently the US is like a teenager with several credit cards, using one to make the minimum payments on the other, while hurriedly applying for more cards (been there done that). The only difference is that Mommie Yellen and Daddie Bernanke happen to run the bank and can keep approving new cards.

Under the current state of affairs, if interest rates creep up to the normal 6-7% level, almost the entire Federal Tax revenues will be spent servicing interest repayments. Thus begins the nightmare akin to the situation in Greece, whereby cutting Government spending and raising taxes, kills the economy and tax revenues fall, whilst interest demanded by investors goes higher and higher.

But how can interest rates creep up you might ask if the Fed controls them?

Well, while the FED can set the interest rate at which all the other US banks borrow dollars from the FED (the FED creates the USD notes from thin air), the market place can simply move bond prices around until interest rates have increased regardless of the FED's actions. With interest rates at historic lows, in order to lower them any further the FED would essentially have to pay banks to borrow money, a rather inverted situation that has been known to happen in Switzerland from time to time. But we don't have the problem of uber-safe fiscal policy driving the USD stronger. The USD has been steadily losing respect and purchasing power since Clinton left office.

So in order to hold interest rates artificially low, what Bernanke has been doing is buying government bonds in the bond market, to hold the prices up. When bond prices are higher, it implies a lower interest rate. As bond prices fall, you acquire the bonds for a cheaper price, and thus the 'coupon' (the interest you receive) is proportionately higher.

This is how the government has been able to plough itself into such incredible debt. The FED has been buying some $80 billion of bonds per month; so essentially the FED is creating dollars out of thin air to fund the US government liabilities at a nice low interest rate. The FED is floating the market for USD debt, acting as buyer of last resort. If a CEO did that with his stock or bonds he'd be in jail in a flash (and he'd have to use real money to do it).

If history is any kind of indicator, watering down or ‘debasing’ the money supply, if not the cause, is a huge red flag in the decline of many nations stretching back in history from Germany post WW1, to France in the Louis 15-16 era right back to the Romans putting less and less gold into their coins. You can fool the markets for a while but when confidence is lost, no one will trust your fake coins anymore and you are automatically in the poor house.

Yellen for 2014 is all set to continue this insane policy that looks ultimately set to turn the good olde US of A into a something more along the lines of Argentina. In the 1900s Argentina due to its natural resources and climate was one of the wealthiest nations on the planet. People flocked to Buenos Aires (think California) and the city is filled with impressive buildings from the beginning of the 20th Century.

Poor financial policy soon turned the country into a cess pool of socialism and enormous debts, ultimately resulting in the entire banking system being shut down and for some months the whole country returned to a dark ages style barter system. While confidence is built up slowly, faith is instantly replaced with fear and there is no middle ground.

The most epic crash of all time occurred in Holland in 1637

Tulip bulbs became the talk of the town and rose in value some 60 times, until finally investors looked at what they were buying and holding and hit the bid. That was the end of that. Families lost their fortunes and things returned to normal.

US government debt is no different to tulips. Value is set only because of confidence in the paper. Presently there is confidence and the game of musical chairs can continue for some time to come. However the dance of the FED seems to be that when one chairman retires a hero, another is put in place to ‘rescue’ the system from some unforeseen crash that takes place on his (or in this case her) first year or so. Bernanke is out of there. He needs to write his memoirs quick smart before the shit hits the fan.

It’s one thing for someone to build a delicate house of cards, and another to have someone else jump in and take over, least of all a woman and a rather old one at that.

Generally speaking old women tend to lack a certain amount of brain power and prowess, being rather absent-minded and lacking clear mental clout. Even Thatcher lost her way as she aged. Women live longer but they do not age well. Aside from Queen Victoria, who was largely a figurehead, there are precious few examples of old women holding important positions of power. They say the FED chief is more powerful than the president.

Now is hardly the time to turbo charge the drive for equality and feminism. I feel like I'm back in high school, hoping for the dynamic young alpha male maths teacher that could control the class rather than the daft old bat who had to dish out detention nonstop and still had a riot on her hands.

While this might be a gross generalization, generalizations are good in politics. Would you want a known white collar criminal with a felony conviction for fraud running the FED. Would you want a grandma ? Only the alpha male has the balls to take the unpleasant leadership decisions and cut a path out of the swamp. Grandma ain't the one to save the day.

If you think into it logically, as only an alpha male can, the bank collapse in 2008 meant market conditions were MORE not LESS risky, meaning that interest rates should have risen and lending should have decreased. Instead the FED engineered the opposite. It's not dissimilar to firemen, rocking up to a burning building and pumping gasoline onto the fire, and arguing that it will help the house burn down faster and then the fire will go out. Granny Yellen is going to need napalm after the Bernanke years.

Fireman do sometimes light fires to stop larger ones, however in this situation, the problem is the inflamed USD and US economy. Setting them on fire as the FED has done is likely to simply burn them out altogether. Snorting cocaine might enable you to walk on a broken leg, but it won't heal it.

Let's take one more quick example from history from the 1960s and 70s, Nixon the original devil that started debasing the USD by removing the gold standard, set the world on fire with terrible inflation. Gold shot from $35 an ounce to $800. When Regan came into power in 79, his FED chairman Paul Volcker had the balls and the good sense to rescue the USD by cranking interest rates as high as 20% and held them there for three years. I don't fancy the US government chances with a debt of 16-20 trillion on the books if interest rates go that high – and they are unlikely to with Granny Yellen baking us all yummy apple pie. Let's just hope we don't get the shits afterwards.

If Yellen presides over the destruction of the USD, dithering about, trying to appease everyone but making no one happy, like only a grumpy, batty old grandmother can, perhaps the manosphere will have the last laugh sooner than it expects. In the meantime, buy a gun and plenty of ammo—you're gonna need it.

5 Things I Learned About Women This Week

November 23, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

As some of you may have noticed, connectivity to Return of Kings this week was spotty, and comment sections were full of vitriol. This was due to Tuthmosis' article "5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder" and Trouble Maker's "20 Things Women Do That Should Be Shamed, Not Celebrated" The hateful response by women garnered an unprecedented high of page views. Tuthmosis' article was liked on facebook over 100,000 times, innumerable tweets, and Trouble Maker's article reached nearly 2000 comments. Millions of page views came in from all over the world and here is what the viewers had in common:

1. Feminist Rage Is A Young Privileged White Women Phenomenon

99% of the haters were 18-22 year old white women attending university somewhere in North America, UK, or Scandinavia.

I saw a supreme lack of female haters from the Middle East, Africa, Eastern Europe, or India. I guess they were too busy being stoned to death, being a possession of their husbands, being gang raped, or being sold into a human trafficking to get offended on twitter.

Got shown returnofkings.com/21313/5-reason… in Sociology today and I can't remember the last time something upset/sickened/angered me so much
Expand

2. They Love Being Told What To Hate and Hate Being Told What to Feel

University freshmen, having their first taste of freedom and biased sociology teachings, were the overwhelmingly violent haters on Tuthmosis' article. They all felt a self importance by preaching the scripture of their university approved ideas. Since what Tuthmosis told them was not what they were taught it must be wrong and it must be eliminated.

On the other hand the general female consensus was that Tuthmosis' article was telling women they should have an eating disorder to please men. Most women struggle with their weight psychologically and physically, but this is a result of other women and female-oriented media. If they admitted this was the case they would be shown as weak so they must lash out at the man who tells them to feel the way they truly are.

3. Women Crave Drama

Plain and simple. Celebrities tweeted the post early on and there were a multitude of women who posted the article to every big name feminist blog they could think of begging for them to take it down. As Scorpion said on the forum:

> I love how these women don't understand the internet. When they see something they think is horrible, they want to share it far and wide and get as many eyeballs as possible on it. It would be like if their was a little dog with explosive diarrhea sitting by itself in a corner, and instead of leaving it alone, they pick it up and carry it across the entire house, spreading shit all over the floor, saying "OMFG everyone look at this dog that keeps shitting all over the place! Can you believe this? OMG!"
> The female imperative that craves drama and emotional solidarity from peers overrides all logic. And so it is that feminists unwittingly find themselves foot soldiers in the RoK army, helping to spread our message far and wide. Thanks bitches.

4. Women Are Attracted To Power And A Powerful Man Goes Against The Current

This reason is more subtle, but if you look at Tuthmosis' twitter, all of the angry tweets, all of the conversations, and all of the reaction videos there is one thing in common: these women are undeniably turned on and have no other way to express this than to contact Tuthmosis directly and hope he replies back. They are truly feeling rage and indignation, but some of this feeling spills over into an attraction to his power. They have no choice but to be attracted to a man who can, with one touch of a button, control the emotions of millions. A woman will only ever call the man she loves an asshole.

5. Their Accountability Is Appealing To A Higher Power

It is in women's nature to submit to a power greater than them. In relationships it is men, in life it is the government or God. In the case of this viral episode women petitioned to change.org to get ROK removed from the internet. They tweeted and shared the post asking their favorite feminist identities to please take the site down. Not a single one of them simply closed their browser or told their sisters not to look at it for it will bring them no value.

A 3 Point Primer In Modern Female Privilege

November 24, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

A common trope among left-wing keyboard jockies are privilege checklists. They have male privilege checklists, white privilege checklists and even cisgender checklists and skinny-privilege checklists.

The most amusingly self-absorbed and grossly incorrect approach to privilege is the aforementioned male privilege checklist. A review of the claims shows most all of them are based on a white, middle-class plus lifestyle with straight parents. To the more historically-aware, feminism is truly the white woman's privilege. Further still, it is based out of narcissism, as women are fleeing feelings and place a great emphasis on the trappings of power: degrees, placement in corporate/government hierarchies and general monetary wealth. Marriage and motherhood are often seen as the ultimate trap, unless they can make marriage and motherhood all about them. Which they do.

The modern female privilege is, at the apex, embodied by Sheryl Sandberg: a woman who has benefited from a system rigged to uplift women at the expense of men. Sandberg also had the cash to outsource her motherhood to nannies and her domestic duties to maids. Further, she is the CEO of Facebook, a major social media outlet catering to female wants and needs.

While she certainly is an aspirational symbol for most women — as the vast majority of women will never taste her level of class and power privilege — she represents the privilege the modern woman enjoys. She still retains the reigns in the domestic sphere – but can outsource the work involved to lower-status women, while retaining the power. She enjoys a media market that caters almost exclusively to women, save the Internet.

TV, radio and print magazines all reflect the dominant strain of female interests. Further, relationships are skewed more than ever in a woman's favor – most strikingly in divorce court.

These confluent tributaries speak to the privilege the modern woman enjoys and allows her unprecedented levels of autonomy with respects to work/life balance. While some of the privilege operates independent of men, a majority of the privileges afforded operate at the expense of men.

Without further ado, let's unpack this invisible knapsack of female privilege.

1. Women Are The Authority In The Domestic Sphere

This is a remnant of more balanced times, when women had primacy in the domestic and childcare realms. These twin privileges still exist to this day. The one major modification to this social approach is that many women do not have a husband, either choosing to raise their children alone or with a female partner.

Women still maintain a primacy over the entire home – the location, the size, the decor and ambiance within the dwelling. Most men do not have much — if any — power to affect these decisions. Women, by and large, control the arc of heterosexual relations. Men may be able to exert control over how expensive of a house they may want, but the strong majority of men are powerless to affect the living arrangements of their own homes. Where do you think the concept of the man-cave came from? It has evolved from men desiring to have hand in a relationship in which they do not have power, so they choose a childish and passive-aggressive way of exerting themselves without actually having to learn to deal with and interact with their wives. And this even assumes a woman has a man in her life – she could be doing this alone.

This furthers extends to the raising of the children. Women have long been considered moral superiors to men in America — and the West, generally — and this privilege extended to the rearing of children. It is indubitably true that the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world, given the proliferation of a field called psychology which realizes and understands many problematic thought processes and behaviors are an adaption to poor parenting – which includes poor mothering. As I wrote a few weeks ago, healthy mothering is absolutely crucial in raising healthy people. It is doubly so in America where so many single mothers raise their children alone. Those mothers become solely responsible for their children, as how can she blame her children's poor life choices on an absent father? He wasn't there to affect their development, only she was. This is an incredible privilege women enjoy.

2. Media Caters To And Soothes Female Egos

If ROK's past week has been any indication, women expect media to cater to their egos and if it does not, to demand that authority figures dispense with opinions that cause rage within them.

This shows how women relate to media, as they see media as a source of therapy. The wider media responds to this demand, supplying women with countless websites that cater to women's limited, but varying interests such as men, marriage, babies, men, fashion, and men. Of course, highly popular websites such as Jezebel and Gawker manage to distill the self-absorption of the modern woman and repackage it through feminist and left-wing views that either incite the rage or anxiety in the viewer. With plenty of sex talk, celebrity gossip and feeling superior to others, of course.

Regardless, this is how women regard media. They expect to be able to turn on any media outlet and have their egos massaged. They expect to see superlatives lavished on them, expecting to see fat women being called “beautiful,” physically unattractive women described as “beautiful,” in fact, most of the media coverage seems to be reaffirming the viewer that she is, in fact, beautiful. Not average, not above-average, but beautiful.

Of course, ferocity, independence and intelligence are always assumed on the part of the woman. Think about that – female egos are not even worried about actually being smart or tough, as they assume that they are that just by existing. They do need reassurance they are not just physically attractive, but beautiful. And the media caters to that and soothes their existentialist torment over their own perceived physical attractiveness.

This is the privilege women enjoy. Men don’t get to turn on the TV and hear how handsome they are, how capable they are or how valuable they are just for existing. No, they get to hear about how they aren’t satisfying their women, how they don’t do enough housework or childcare work. Isn’t it sad how Americans perceive taking care of their children as “work?” So much for unconditional love.

Regardless, women enjoy great privilege in the media, as they can sidle up with a tub of Ben & Jerry’s on their over-priced couch, turn on MTV and be catered to exclusively by the media. While being beautiful, of course.

3. The Relationship/Divorce Industry Is Staunchly Pro-Woman

Women, collectively, have the upper hand in American relationships.

The constellation of magazines, TV shows and media attention focused on female sexual and romantic well-being is simply astounding. Bevies of sympathetic experts crowd each other out in the romance marketplace, offering up salves to the aching hearts of women. Female loneliness is universally recognized, their desires and emotional needs prioritized over men’s commensurate needs. This industry toils tirelessly to produce articles to help women find better partners, help solve their relationship issues or assuage their angst. The only remotely mainstream website that focuses on the needs of men in today's world is Return of Kings. No other site combines advice for game, lifestyle, weight-lifting, finances and general intellectual betterment than Return of Kings.

However, this isn't even the pinnacle of female relational privilege, that reaches its zenith in the hallowed — or demonic — halls of America's divorce courts. Sure, visit websites like the National Parents Organization or the Wikipedia entry for Father's Rights. However, it should be obvious anybody with a brain capable of seeing beyond it's own self that men are routinely and systematically discriminated against in divorce court. Perhaps one of the greatest privileges a modern woman enjoys is the ability to clean her husband's emotional and financial clock in divorce court. She overwhelmingly gets to retain custody of her children. A saying amongst family law lawyers is that if you put a skirt on the facts, suddenly it swings a judge's opinion towards the "facts."

Imagine what it is like to be in a marriage in which one party gets to dissolve the union for no reason and take the majority of the family wealth. At any point. What a privilege.

Conclusion

Privileged Patty squatted herself down on her couch. Her actual weight and physical attractiveness are entirely irrelevant as patriarchal norms based out of male dominance needlessly hierarchize female worth. Privileged Patty is inherently beautiful. And, just being born a woman, she is born with intelligence, capability and insight known only by women.

She flips on the TV while downing a glass of wine, with the channel Male Privilege flickering across her brand-new plasma screen. In fact, Jezebel declared her new TV to be the only female-only constructed TV on sale in America.

"Honestly," thought Patty, "It is about time those women in Vietnam got with the feminist program."

Patty on and watched Male Privilege and sipped her wine. The show highlighted the inherent stupidity, arrogance and perception of superiority these men have. God, they all think they are just impossibly handsome.

“Mommy!” said Patty’s daughter running up to Patty on the couch, with a Hispanic woman chasing after her,”Look what I made!”

“That’s nice,” said Patty, gesturing towards the Hispanic woman while feigning a grin at her daughter. “Maria, get Ophelia out of here! This is my ‘Lean In‘ time!”

Maria carted Patty’s daughter off, as Ophelia lamely gesturing towards Patty with her gingerbread man.

Patty settled back in, killing yet another glass of wine, feeling she was free of oppressive elements outside herself for the moment. Male Privilege continued and showcased men who refused to play a major role in their children’s lives and their mother’s insistence that those fathers take a more active role.

“Patty,” said a soft, but vaguely masculine voice, “We need to talk about Gregor’s and Ophelia’s grades in school. I fear…”

Patty shot her eyes to the source of the voice – it was her co-parent, Stefan. She regarded him for a second before sharply remarking, “Didn’t we discuss ‘Lean In‘ together? This is my time. We decided we shall discuss our children’s grades on Wednesday at dinner. When that Hispanic bitch watches our kids.”

Stefan recoiled a bit with Patty’s last sentence, “Maria plays a great role in our children’s lives, Patty!”

Patty started drinking yet another glass of wine, “I know.” She then looked Stefan in his eyes directly, glaring right at her oppressor. He promptly left the living room.

Given all the guilt put on her by Stefan, her children and her maid Maria, Patty was drowning in oppression.

She turned on the ultimate feminist TV channel, known as “Nothing Is Ever Your Fault.”

“Exactly,” she said as she polished off her last glass of wine, “It is so tough to be a woman these days.“

Knockout Game & Misguided Masculinity

November 24, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Knockout (also known as the knockout game and knockout king) – a violent activity played by sucker punching an unsuspecting bystander with the objective of knocking that individual unconscious in a single punch. (Wikipedia)

If you haven't heard of it – a host of news stories surrounding this game have been surfacing lately (Example 1 / Example 2).

Black children are brutally injuring, and even killing unsuspecting victims. And while these actions are clearly wrong, I think they reflect something larger. Whether they're due to the lack of a father figure or a violent adolescence, I'm not sure. But I do believe these acts are a good example of misguided attempts to assert one's own masculinity.

I’m sure the need to feel some sense of power – both over the victim and among their peers – plays a large role in the attacks. Some sense of being a man. And in this case it’s obviously wrong. But it got me thinking – how different are these acts from the common tough guy attitude so many bros take assume on the streets or in the bar.

Whether it’s purposefully bumping someone with your shoulder as you make your way to the bar or staring someone down on the streets, and then taunting them upon making eye contact – I don’t think it is too far removed from the violent knockout game.

Sure, it’s 10, 20, or 100 times less violent – but it’s seeks the same artificial approval that you’re a real man. These behaviors strive to make a grand display of one’s physical prowess. But in the end, all they show is insecurity – a trademark of something far different than a masculine man.

What is masculinity?

All of this begs the question to be asked: what is true masculinity?

Physical prowess, and the ability to defend yourself is undoubtedly on the list. But cheap shows of intimidation demonstrate weakness. It is often noted that premier martial artists are some of the least threatening people you will meet – as well as some of the most masculine. And this is because their physical prowess manifests as extreme self confidence in public – with no need to prove themselves to everybody at the bar. And so true masculinity, as everything seems to do, ties to self confidence in the end.

Something else an accomplished martial artist has that contributes to this confidence – is a purpose. Their purpose being striving to improve and perfect their craft. Being on a mission of some sort or other is another bullet point on the list of masculine traits. And when you’re caught up in dedicating your life (or at least a portion of it) towards a particular mission, staring down alpha males at the bar falls pretty low on the priority list.

And this leads me to another point. The truly masculine man appreciates others who share his qualities; his first instinct is not to attempt intimidation. Rather he finds it refreshing to meet and interact with someone else who's on his level, whether it's through sharing ideas or slaying broads. Yes, none of this supersedes competition, another masculine trait, for sure. But even after two prize fighters try to wreck each other for 12 rounds, they embrace after. And is trying to intimidate a stranger walking down the street competitive?

Sure, other masculine traits exist, but I find these are the ones that closest relate to the tough guy mentality, and its misguided intent. All of this goes to show that using cheap tricks to accomplish a feeling of power or control is not masculinity, but actually insecurity – quite the opposite. And this goes for killing a stranger with an unsuspecting punch – or trying to fight everyone at the club on Friday night.

Society Can’t Afford The Educated Woman

November 25, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Women are making great strides academically, so much so that I think it fair to claim at this point that they have overcome just about all of the road blocks to higher education previously placed in front of them.

> Women in the United States now earn 62 percent of associate’s degrees, 57 percent of bachelor’s degrees, 60 percent of master’s degrees, and 52 percent of doctorates.

So clear is this triumph that people are starting to ask a question rarely considered in our modern society: what about the boys? Few folks seem to care about them really, instead celebrating the triumph of women as a sign of the female’s greater adaptability.

> As the United States moves toward a knowledge-based economy, school achievement has become the cornerstone of lifelong success. Women are adapting; men are not.

	Class of 2010			Class of 2019
	Percentages		Females per	Percentages		Females per
Degrees	Male	Female	100 Males	Male	Female	100 Males
Associate's	37.7%	62.3%	166	34.9%	65.1%	187
Bachelor's	42.6%	57.4%	135	40.8%	59.2%	145
Master's	39.7%	60.3%	152	37.9%	62.1%	164
Professional	50.6%	49.4%	98	49.0%	51.0%	104
Doctor's	48.4%	51.6%	107	45.1%	54.9%	122
All Degrees	41.2%	58.8%	143	39.1%	60.9%	156

That's all good and well, but a recent perusal of a New York Times article got me thinking about a crucial aspect of this growing academic "fempire" that seems overlooked: the utility of the educated woman.

> I'M a doctor and a mother of four, and I've always practiced medicine full time. When I took my board exams in 1987, female doctors were still uncommon, and we were determined to work as hard as any of the men.
> Today, however, increasing numbers of doctors — mostly women — decide to work part time or leave the profession. Since 2005 the part-time physician workforce has expanded by 62 percent, according to recent survey data from the American Medical Group Association, with nearly 4 in 10 female doctors between the ages of 35 and 44 reporting in 2010 that they worked part time.
> This may seem like a personal decision, but it has serious consequences for patients and the public.
> Medical education is supported by federal and state tax money both at the university level — student tuition doesn't come close to covering the schools' costs — and at the teaching hospitals where residents are trained. So if doctors aren't making full use of their training, taxpayers are losing their investment. With a growing shortage of doctors in America, we can no longer afford to continue training doctors who don't spend their careers in the full-time practice of medicine.

Women are dominating men in classrooms now and this is, of course, hailed as a good thing, a sign of modern progress and, some would argue, greater potential for societal improvement (that argument stemming from the notion that women are more adaptable and more benevolent than men and, thus would better the world if found more prominently in positions of power).

The article above, however, raises serious concerns about this celebrated trend, as does this one:

> One tiny problem may be holding women back: they are leaving the workforce in record numbers…
> …There are numerous explanations put forth to explain this trend. Most tend to identify two categories of workplace drop-outs…
> …The second (and more problematic) group consists of highly educated women who drop out (or "opt-out") when they have children, even though they have the skills and income necessary to hire childcare. This latter bunch has economists and feminists alarmed for different reasons.
> Economists consider the defections costly for the country; we need highly talented and trained workers. For feminists, the drop-out trend undermines their argument that women – even our most accomplished and best educated — are victims of discrimination. If the women most likely to enter the C-suite marathon increasingly choose to hang up their running shoes, why should we expect more finishers?
> A recent study by Joni Hersch, professor at Vanderbilt Law School, makes that case. She looks at female graduates of our top universities – those presumably who have the best shot at shattering the glass ceiling – and finds that once they have children, they are more likely to quit their jobs than are women who graduated from less selective schools.
> Overall, Hersch reports that 60 percent of women who graduated from our top schools are working full time, compared to 68 percent who made it through less prestigious institutions. Married women without children from top schools are 20 > percentage points more likely to work full time than those with children; the difference for graduates of lesser schools is 13.5 points.

> Perhaps most astonishing is that only 35 percent of women who have earned MBAs after getting a bachelor's degree from a top school are working full time, compared to 66 percent from second-tier schools.
> So, as Hersch argues, if only a little more than one third of the best C-suite candidates continue to work after they have children, it is not surprising that women are not showing up more often in corporations' top ranks.

Tremendous amounts of economic and social effort have gone into the promotion of the educated woman and the more gender-diverse workforce. Tremendous amounts of real capital have gone into the promotion and education of women, the goal being to bring them fully up to par with men in both ability and opportunity.

Are we getting a good return on that investment? This is a question feminists do not want to hear about, but how long can it be avoided?

When it comes to educational costs, women are by all means equal to men. It does not cost less to educate a woman at Harvard Law or [insert prestigious and preposterously expensive medical/law/business school here] than it does to educate a male. It does not cost less to send a woman to an elite liberal arts school than it does to send a male. These costs, I don't need to tell you, are massive.

Society is, collectively, making a gargantuan investment in educating college students with the hope that there will be some return on that investment. That return doesn't have to come in the form of capital, but rather in productivity: those receiving these extravagantly expensive educations are expected use them in order to enhance their performance in professional fields. Said enhancement leads to better performance of professional fields as a whole (ex: a larger number of competent doctors, lawyers, investors and the like available to a larger share of the population), and that in turn leads to a better society.

The problem here is that men are offering a greater return on that investment than their equally well educated female counterparts.

The maddening reality for feminists is that this can't be blamed on the patriarchy. There are many more women capable of holding elite white-collar positions than there are women actually holding them. That differential is, as the article above mentioned, due to female choice, not to male oppression. Women not only self-select out of many demanding, prestigious and high paying fields (even if they've not shown any lack of mental capacity to do the work), they also seem to very strongly favor the birthing and raising of children (and the professional sacrifice that comes with it) to the maintenance of a life on the hard-charging career track.

Most women (and men, actually) want kids, and (unfortunately for feminists), no amount of protest and advocacy for increased gender equity is going to close the gap between the biological role men and women play in reproduction. That burden will always be harder on the female than the male, and child nurturing is always going to be a greater female burden than male (another reality hated by feminists, except when our court system uses it against men). Therefore, so long as people want kids, women will always have a harder time keeping up with men on the career track, and will always "opt-out" at vastly higher rates.

Now, I don't see anything wrong with women opting out in principle. Feminists shouldn't either—after all, female choice is the most important thing, right? Women who opt-out are merely exercising their choice, and that's fine.

The problem, however, is not one of principle but one of practical matters, particularly those relating to finance. Western nations are running out of money and, as the aforementioned New York Times article notes, running out of educated professionals in many crucial fields:

> The Association of American Medical Colleges estimates that, 15 years from now, with the ranks of insured patients expanding, we will face a shortage of up to 150,000 doctors. As many doctors near retirement and aging baby boomers need more and more medical care, the shortage gets worse each year.

Yet, this continues to be a reality:

> women received 48 percent of the medical degrees awarded in 2010.

Despite this:

> But their productivity doesn't match that of men. In a 2006 survey by the American Medical Association and the Association of American Medical Colleges, even full-time female doctors reported working on average 4.5 fewer hours each week and seeing fewer patients than their male colleagues. The American Academy of Pediatrics estimates that 71 percent of female pediatricians take extended leave at some point — five times higher than the percentage for male pediatricians.
> This gap is especially problematic because women are more likely to go into primary care fields — where the doctor shortage is most pronounced — than men are. Today 53 percent of family practice residents, 63 percent of pediatric residents and nearly 80 percent of obstetrics and gynecology residents are female.

How long can this go on? I'm sure the pie in the sky ideas promoting absolute gender equality and the costs associated with it were more bearable in an age when economic growth seemed endless, an age in which the generation that largely began this whole gender revolution (hi boomers) grew up in.

Today, however, we've got a harsh reality staring us in the face: we've decided to take a massive portion of society's investment in education and focus it on women and we're seeing less of that investment returned to society. We're paying more and, essentially, getting less. We're committed to maintaining equality in our investment, but totally unconcerned with the equality of the return. This isn't sustainable in world of finite money/resources.

The answer, surely, is not to stop educating women. Rather, it is to find a way to improve the return on the investment that said education symbolizes. How should this be done? If the answer means perhaps accepting persistent gaps in career earnings between men and women (due to female choice), tolerating some persistent gaps in male-female professional achievement (due to female choice) and perhaps pushing for a closing of the current gender gap in education that favors women in order to ensure that a larger share of this society's massive educational investment goes to males (who, again, offer a greater return on it), will feminists and their progressive allies be able to accept that?

Feminists are going to have to find a way to answer this question, and soon. A society that fails to take a truly objective look at dilemmas of this sort and grapple with their serious (and, some will argue, horribly sexist) implications may be a society that, ultimately, fails to persist.

Tuthmosis Swallows The Sun

November 25, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Isaac Asimov's 1941 short story Nightfall is considered one of the best in the canon of modern science fiction. I have found it to be a useful parable in interpreting the firestorm of hysteria created last week by Tuthmosis's viral articles. In Asimov's tale, a planet called Lagash is located in a stellar system in which six suns provide continuous daylight to Lagash's inhabitants. Night and darkness are unknown concepts. Due to this fact, Lagashians are smug in the knowledge that their stellar system constitutes the entire universe. In their view, nothing outside of them exists. Not being able to experience nightfall and the resulting sight of other stars in the sky, they have no conception that there are other stars, other planets, or other worlds.

However, scientists on Lagash make some disturbing discoveries. Some irregularities in the orbit of Lagash, and archaeological evidence of cyclical civilizational collapse, provide convincing evidence that Lagash's primary sun experiences a full eclipse every 2050 years. The eternally bright planet is plunged into darkness for a brief period of "night." Since no one has ever experienced nightfall, it will come as a profound shock to the Lagashians. In an instant, they will become aware that they are only a small speck in a vast universe of planets. It becomes clear to the scientists that another eclipse is approaching soon, and that it will likely trigger civil unrest, chaos, and terror among the population.

Nightfall comes. The horrifying penumbra of darkness creeps across the face of Lagash's primary sun, and the coddled, sheltered inhabitants in an instant become aware of the vastness of the universe and of their relative insignificance in the immensity of existence. This realization drives them insane. As the story ends, an ominous red glow begins to light up the night, as cities burn and civilization once more undergoes destruction.

To those familiar with last week's internet drama, the analogy is obvious. Young women in the West have become so sheltered, pampered, and spoiled, that any opinion or spectacle that contradicts their worldview drives them into paroxysms of panic and lunacy. They are unable to cope with any contradiction of their sacred mantras. Sudden exposure to worldviews that mocked their cherished beliefs sent them into a frenzy. The reactions to the articles were truly something to behold: death threats, swooning, fulminating, and irrational feminist goose-stepping to a prescripted program of fake outrage.

The reactions, while disturbing, were not entirely unpredictable. Gustave Le Bon, in his landmark 1895 study The Crowd: A Study of the Popular Mind (required reading for anyone interested in mob psychology) noted the essential feminine nature of crowds. Their fickleness and irrationality lent them to easy manipulation. Le Bon noted three elements that characterized the irrationality of the mob:

1. Anonymity. The individual can submerge her identity in the mass, and join in the actions of the mob without taking any responsibility for her actions.

2. Contagion. The hysterical nature of feminine crowds means that their emotions spread in the same uncontrolled way that a disease pandemic would.

3. Suggestibility. The feminine crowd is suggestible in that the slightest tweak of its sacred mantras can send it into swooning, frothing hysteria.

All of these elements were on display last week. Although Asimov's story Nightfal is fiction, there are indeed historical analogues for the idea that a sudden onset of darkness can trigger mass hysteria. Columbus, on his final voyage to the New World in 1504, was saved from certain death by hostile Indians on the island of Jamaica by his dramatic prediction of a lunar eclipse, a feat which made him appear godlike to the unlettered Indians. Columbus, stranded in the Caribbean, was in possession of an almanac of the mathematician Regiomontanus which contained astronomical tables. He also had a keen knowledge of human nature and the suggestibility of crowds, and used this to his great advantage. Similar feats of "magic" were recorded in the 19th century by early European explorers in the heart of Africa.

When people are confronted by a spectacle that completely upsets their worldview, the knowledge can drive them mad. Expect bursts of insanity, irrationality, and violence. It is one thing to know this in an abstract sense; but it is another thing entirely to witness it first-hand.

I can only imagine what the pandemonium must have been like when Columbus foretold the lunar eclipse to the Indians back in 1504. It must have been an awe-inspiring scene.

"Look, O cacique!", cried Columbus. "See how we, the white men from the stars, swallow the sun!"

And slowly, gradually, the dark penumbra played about the edges of the bright disc, and as it did so a shudder of horror, of abject anguish, arose here and there among the gathering crowd on the beach.

"You have asked me provide a sign of my powers," intoned Columbus solemnly and raising his hands with his palms forward, "and now I will show you how we can engulf your world in shadows."

"He is a liar," muttered one of the cacique's female attendants, "he cannot do what he claims to do."

But the cacique fidgeted nervously, turning pale beneath his ruddy complexion, rocking back and forth in distress as the lamentations and moans of his handlers grew in frequency and volume. And then a loud wail of terror played across the assembled mass; women threw themselves on the ground, gnashing their teeth in panic, while young warriors bedecked in feathers, pendants, and weapons stamped their feet in hot fury. On and still on, the inky ring of the penumbra drew itself across the surface of the pulsing solar disc, until it became a blood-red orb hanging in the sky; and a great and awful silence fell upon the crowd, with only hushed whispers being heard here and there among the edges of the multitude.

"They have swallowed the sun…the white wizards have killed the sun! What will become of us?," whispered the cacique in horror.

And now the darkness was nearly complete, and a heavy silence descended over all; and in the sky, the stars began to burst forth in the firmament, now here and now there, until the darkness was consummate and the heavens glistened with starry points of light. Columbus and his party, linking their arms in the darkness, made their way back to the shore and their boats, amidst the terrible spectacle of the mounting hysteria and the haunting shrieks of the Indians.

Last week was Nightfall. The internet primitives, like Columbus's Indians and the Lagashians in Asimov's story, could only roll in the sand and gnash their teeth in fury and terror.

And nothing will be quite the same again.

Women Are Responsible For Slut Shaming

November 26, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

At Return of Kings we have often been accused of promoting slut-shaming. But what if, as we here have long known, the lion's share of distaste for easy women rests not among males, but within the seedy underbelly of the female psyche? Recent research suggests that female animosity toward promiscuous women is not due to any "oppressive patriarchy," but rather an ingrained competition mechanism that has developed over hundreds of thousands of years of human evolution.

The New York Times reports on a study at McMaster University that was designed to test female reaction to perceived sexual competition. The experimenters had a hot blonde lab assistant enter a room and ask for directions, and then filmed female reactions to the confederate after she left. When the girl (who was highly attractive in either case) was wearing conservative clothing, she received almost no negative reaction. When she was dressed in a short skirt and low-cut top, however, the female hater parade ran strong with subjects making comments about her clothing, chastity, etc. From the article:

> "Now that researchers have been looking more closely, they say that this "intrasexual competition" is the most important factor explaining the pressures that young women feel to meet standards of sexual conduct and physical appearance."

ROK readers yawned, but society at large recoiled in horror. Though we often hear the tired canards of "male chauvinism" or "media emphasizing unrealistic body image or sexual expectations" as explanation for slut-shaming, behind closed doors this impulse exists independent of any male influence. Despite the shrieking of feminists to the contrary, it is the female's innate drive to compete with her peers for high value males. There is delicious irony in the fact that women were enraged at Tuthmosis's slut tell list and invented any reason to dismiss his points, but in private they are adept at recognizing and reacting to the very same cues he simply pointed out.

Anyone who has observed the backstabbing and subtle aggression in female social groups has seen this scenario unfold firsthand, but this study provides evidence that, in a microeconomic sense, women are predisposed to undermine other women who allow easy access to their sexuality.

> "Sex is coveted by men," she said. "Accordingly, women limit access as a way of maintaining advantage in the negotiation of this resource. Women who make sex too readily available compromise the power-holding position of the group, which is why many women are particularly intolerant of women who are, or seem to be, promiscuous."

This is a perfect example of a Prisoner's Dilemma, the classic behavioral economics paradigm. The fictional parameters of this game are as follows: two gang members are accused of a crime, arrested, and put into solitary confinement. To gather evidence, the police attempt to get each suspect to betray the other and offer evidence against his partner. If both suspects cooperate with each other and stay silent, they both get reduced sentences. If both betray each other, they both receive a moderate prison sentence. If one cooperates and one betrays, the cooperator gets a full prison sentence and the defector goes free. They cannot communicate with each other. How should each suspect behave?

The fascinating thing is that, even if they can communicate, in both cases each suspect's best move is to betray his compatriot. If he knows the friend is going to betray him, he gets a lesser sentence by also betraying. If he knows the friend is staying silent, he goes free if he betrays him.

In the case of female social groups, the "betraying" is offering one's sexuality at little cost (sluttiness), and "cooperating" is remaining chaste and limiting the supply of easy sex. Female sexuality is undeniably valuable in any society—if women limit its supply, they maximize the gender's overall ability to keep male behavior in check and promote their reproductive aims of finding high-value men. If an individual woman defects from this tacit agreement, though, she has access to more high-value males because of her willingness to engage in quicker sex. If they all defect, you witness a free-for-all of devalued sex and emotional backstabbing. Enter modern western culture.

Women innately understand that their compatriots are going to outcompete them if they offer quicker sex. Despite society's macro message supporting unrestricted female sexuality via slut walks, easily available contraception, and the "You can have it all" Alpha Fucks/Beta Bucks dichotomy, at a micro level women will still punish defection with non-violent measures like passive aggressive pressure, withholding of approval, and exclusion from social groups. This happens regardless of the closeness of their relationship. The interesting part is that it is in a female's rational self-interest to enforce cooperation in other women while they themselves secretly defect. We see this played out when girls will call their friends sluts for actions that they themselves have participated in in the recent past.

We live in a society where the male contribution to slut-shaming is light in comparison, and only in the context of the increasingly poor choice of long-term commitment. The male role in slut-shaming is further muted by a media and culture that has imbued them with the sense of learned helplessness at assessing the meaning of a female's sexual past. After all, it doesn't matter how many partners she had before you! Evaluate her on her actions now and forgive her follies of youth! The majority of men have taken this rubbish to heart.

Make no mistake — the true reason for outrage at Tuthmosis's slut tells list is that identifying the defectors punches holes in the "You cooperate, I defect" best-fit strategy of modern women. The existence and identifiability of promiscuous women makes the cooperation they strive to enforce in others more difficult to achieve and reduces the mate-getting value of their individual sexual availability. Despite modernist teeth-gnashing to the contrary, science often shows us that we ultimately remain subject to the innate psychological schemas of our evolutionary biology.

Go For No

November 26, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Go For No is a unique sales book that tells you that the path to success is getting as many no's as possible. The mark of progress is not avoiding failure or actually accomplishing your goals, but getting a no. The authors teach this strategy through a brief fictional story.

The turning point is when the protagonist, a salesman just getting by in life, learns an important lesson after selling a large amount of clothing to a customer:

> "After the customer left, Harold, [my manager], finally sauntered over and said, 'Nice sale kid." My chest puffed out with pride. 'Eleven hundred dollars!' I proclaimed. But Harold just stood there and didn't seem overly impressed. Finally he said, 'I'm just curious, but what did that customer say no to?' 'What do you mean?' I shot back. 'That guy just bought a suit, sport coat, three shirts, six ties, shoes, socks, a belt and underwear! What do you mean, what did he say no to?'
> "Harold waited calmly for me to stop being defensive, then he said, 'We've > already established what he said yes to. What I want to know now is, what did he say no to?'

> "I thought for a long time, mentally reviewing the sale in my mind, then sheepishly I replied, 'Nothing. That customer didn't say no to anything.' 'So,' Harold asked, 'then how did you know he was done?'

I have long embraced rejection in my life, but this book takes it to another level by advising you to set goals based on the number of no's you receive. Here are some quotes:

> The salesperson never decides when the sale is over; the customer does.
>
> "I realized that failure was the halfway mark on the road to success, not a destination to be avoided but rather a stepping stone to get what I really wanted in life. Most people get to the sign marked 'failure' and they figure they're heading in the wrong direction turn around and head back home. They think that success must be back the other way, but it's not! It's straight ahead!"
> Failing… and becoming a failure… are two very different things. Successful people fail eagerly while failures avoid failing.
> […]
> "Courage is not the absence of fear"… "Courage is acting in the face of fear. It's being afraid of something and doing it anyway."
>
> "I told them that hearing yes is the easy part of the job and teaches you virtually nothing. But learning to hear no over and over again and to never quit… now that builds character and self-esteem. That's empowering."
> […]
>
> "I know the day I start giving in to my fears in one area of my life, it will only be a matter of time before it becomes easier to avoid other challenges as well."
> […]
>
> "…if you truly want to accelerate your sales performance, you have to fail faster!"
> […]
> "…a no is always better than getting a 'let me think about it.'"

Not only should you get a no from a prospect, but you should get multiple no's. You should be like a child asking his parent for a candy bar at the checkout line of the grocery store. Does the child give up at the first no? No.

This strategy reminds me of myself when trying to invite a girl back to my apartment. On many occasions I've received over five no's before she finally changed it to a yes. I would have lost out on dozens of notches if I didn’t keep pushing my prospect. An initial no merely begins the closing process.

This book is about sales but it very effortlessly applies to getting laid. Simply substitute sales calls with approaches. I highly recommended it for its powerful message and brevity.

The Most Omega Place On The Internet

November 26, 2013 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

Imagine an omega loser that you went to high school with. He smelled like sour milk and piss, played with cards from some Japanese cartoon, and sweated whenever a woman came into contact with him. Those who didn't outgrow such omeganess now post in various online forums with kindred spirits, refusing to become true men. One of these nerd-filled forums is wizardchan.org.

Wizardchan was founded on the principle that certain online users felt left out in online conversations about the good old pastimes of beer, bros, and pussy. Dissatisfied that other people were having the time of their lives, this website was born. The site even has its own terminology. Someone who is younger than thirty and a virgin is a "wizard apprentice" and a 30 year old who is still a virgin is a "wizard." Yes, the users of this website actually strive to remain virgins. It is the complete opposite of the Roosh V Forum. An actual quote from the website:

Going by this information alone, what is the typical Wizardchan user like? He's a virgin in his late teens to early twenties that doesn't leave his house. He is into Japanese cartoons and/or some other omega shit like My Little Pony. He collects welfare or is supported by family members. He doesn't even communicate with his own family members that he mooches off of. Also, most of the users suffer from some sort of psychological disorder and are prone to suicidal ideation. What the average user of wizard chan looks like:

Anyone who doesn't meet these criteria is considered "normal scum." Normal scum are people who go to work, get laid, and have a social life outside of the internet. Even the smelly, acne ridden Dungeons and Dragons geeks are considered "normal scum" according to them. Like homos and feminists, they view themselves as an "oppressed" minority. How are they oppressed? They are told to get a job, get laid, and function out in the real world like a grown man would.

Rules

Last updated Nov 3rd 2013

Preamble

Wizardchan is a sanctuary for virgins who may be NEET or hikikomori to discuss their thoughts, interests, and lifestyles. This is an imageboard specifically for wizards and wizard apprentices.

Global

1. Do not just start your personal sexual experiences or allude to the possibility that you have any
2. Do not post about real life social activities or your romantic relationships.
3. Do not disparage, advise against, or show contempt for the celibate, NEET, or reclusive lifestyles
4. All content should invite constructive, thoughtful discussion, not start or feed a personal echo chamber.
5. Do not post, request, or link to any content illegal in the United States of America
6. Do not create or derail a thread for the sole purpose of posting porn or disruptive content.
7. Try to keep similar topics to one thread, duplicates will be locked
8. You must be at least 18 years old to use this website.
9. Do not sign your posts with a name, avatar, signature, or any variations thereof
10. Use the "Spoiler" function when posting pornographic content.

Let's take a look at some of their rules to get a look at their online community:

- "Do not post about your personal sexual experiences or allude to the possibility that you have any." Can anyone else say "sour grapes"? They throw hissy fits whenever someone mentions getting their dick wet. So, what happens when someone on their site finally does get lucky enough to lose their virginity? Most guys would pat him on the back for it. The same cannot be said for these bitter cunts. They screech that the user had "betrayed them" like jealous ex-girlfriends. Omega's can't even be happy for the ones that escape the omega lifestyle.

- "Do not post about real life social activities." These bitter cumrags don't just want their users to remain virgins; they also want their users to be friendless losers as well. An alpha bro is someone that has your back. They're the ones that you can count on to drive your drunken ass home after a night of partying at the club or to join you in getting shitfaced. Only an inhumane feminist would want to deprive a man of good alpha role-models.
- "Do not disparage, advise against, or show contempt for the celibate, NEET, or reclusive lifestyles." Yeah, no one can say anything against being a NEET(Not in Education, Employment, or Training). Back to what was stated earlier about the suicidal idealization; these users have had multiple threads about wanting to off themselves. It had gotten so bad that one of their admins had placed a warning under the site title with the Suicide Hotline numbers urging their own users to seek help. If these users actually had goals to strive for that wasn't masturbating in their room for twelve hours or a bud to hang out with, their mental health may actually improve.
- "All content should invite constructive, thoughtful discussion, not start or feed a personal echo chamber." This particular rule seems like an oxymoron, doesn't it? Their whole site is an echo chamber for the depressed socially inept. If an alpha male were to post openly on their site, he would be met with a dozen responses on how "normals won't leave them alone." This forum is like the male equivalent to a female relationship website. They just want a hugbox to coddle each other, instead of improving their lives.

Look at the omega zone. It's a hellish dystopian filled with males who will never accomplish their goals. Remember that everybody has a choice in what they want to associate themselves with. You can choose to watch My Little Pony and choose to bitch on your computer about "normalshits". You could also read some Bang and Day Bang. Learn some game and associate with those that have the same goals of being a better person. It's your choice.

Bang It Forward

November 27, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

In today's article, I will provide you with a recipe to exponentially increase your bangs.

Ingredients

- 1 Main Male (yourself)
- 1 Main Girl you are fucking (preferably imported)
- 2-3 Friends that have game

Preparation Time

Usually 1 – 2 weeks. May be shorter or longer based your skill level and experience in the kitchen.

Directions

1. Dress the Main Male with the appropriate clothing. Next, head out and find the Main Girl you will be fucking. Make sure she has not spoiled yet, as continuing to fuck her over the course of several dates will require her to remain fresh for that period of time.

2. Run normal game, peel off the clothes and have sex with Main Girl. As always, some light force should be used to make sure to extract all the juices.

3. Continue pounding Main Girl over the course of a few days or weeks. After you have made her juice a few times, she will be nice and tender, allowing you to ask her about her single friends.

4. Set up Main Girl's single friends with your aforementioned 2-3 Friends that have game. Be direct and ask her which one of her friends are slutty. She will not punish you for being bold.

5. Friends will bang Main Girl's single friends, because (1) your Friends have game, and (2) your Friends are "vouched" for by Main Girl [see explanation below].

6. Hand Friends this recipe, and they will now cook for you.

Why This Works

Putting aside this allegory for a moment, there are two main reasons this works and works well. First, if you have correctly wooed the Main Girl, she will be smitten with you and wants to lock you down. Now whether or not you want that is a different story, but her desire remains nonetheless. So how does she do this? By pleasing you. When you request that she set up her friends with your friends, she will not hesitate to do so. The happier you are with her, the more likely you are to stay with her. Additionally, whether on a conscious or subconscious level she believes that as more of her friends and your friends integrate, the more difficult it will be for you to leave her. And what girl doesn't love to play matchmaker?

The other main reason this works so well is because your friends are already "preapproved" by Main Girl. Her friends — using solely hamster logic — will believe that your friends are more trustworthy, safer, and less "creepy" than the random guy she meets online or at a bar. There is no reason for this logic, but then again when does logic come into play with females? As a result her friends will feel more comfortable going out with your friends. And if your friends have game, sex should follow very soon.

One piece of advice — do not try to flip this recipe right away. What I mean by that is do not try to make your friends be the cook and you the recipient. Give first, and reciprocation will soon follow. Bang it forward. And if it happens to involve a friend with little game or who does not get laid often, you can be sure he will thank you even more.

Results

This is not just a theory of mine. I have done this repeatedly throughout my life as both the provider and the recipient. Some examples include:

- From one Main Girl, having my friends bang three of her friends, all on the first date. Including one within 15 minutes of meeting after being set up on the date.
- From another Main Girl, her friend agreeing to anal sex with my buddy before meeting him (my claim to fame).
- From my buddy's girl, me going through several of her friends in a semester's time.

And so on. As Snoop Dogg correctly points out in his song Ain't No Fun (which ironically all girls love), "it ain't no fun, if the homies can't have none." While it may not be as rewarding or fun as a fresh double bang on both sides, knowing I just got a buddy laid with minimal effort on both our parts makes me feel like a genuine philanthropist. And ~~girls~~ people say I'm not nice…

16 Cute Girls Who Hate My Guts Now (UPDATED)

November 27, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

If Fat Shaming Week inspired hate comments and nastygrams from fat girls and misfits, the epic shitstorm surrounding my 5 Reasons to Date a Girl With An Eating Disorder brought the hotties to the yard. Droves upon droves of thin—and supremely bangable—girls kept my Twitter feed sizzling for days with expressions of disappointment, rage, and pouty sadness. Many of their grievances were painfully repetitive, but the messaging wasn't what was so striking. It was the sheer volume of serviceable talent that was astonishing. It seemed that, in one fell swoop, I'd unwittingly managed to infuriate every cute white girl in the Anglosphere. Fortunately, to paraphrase my dear old mother, "indifference is much worse than hate."

This gallery is by no means comprehensive—and represents but a mere sampling of the many cute girls who decided to voice their opposition—so I apologize in advance to any girls who feel they should have made the cut. It was a very competitive selection process, and tough calls were common. Many "legit" chicks—who no guy would feel the least bit embarrassed to be caught with by his buddies—ended up on the cutting room floor.

> ## A Glimpse Into the Selection Process:
> 1. A girl got an "interview" if her avatar was on point.
> If she looked cute in the tiny version of her icon, our judges opened her Twitter page in a new browser tab for closer inspection later on. If she had some impressionistic or emo picture that obscured a clear look at her face, she was automatically disqualified. The same went if she had a group picture where it was unclear which one was her.

2. Examination of the profile picture.

Having passed the initial muster for having a tab opened, the girl's primary picture underwent closer scrutiny. These were subjected to a thorough screening for every type of photographic subterfuge, including Myspace Angling and distorted contrast. If everything checked out there, she was officially entered in the "big dance."

3. The elimination stages.

After several vetted profiles were up, the girls' tabs began to go head-to-head. Sometimes this required that our judges scroll through a few selfies in their galleries to render close calls. Girls with several pictures, verifying their cuteness, had a decided advantage over avatar-only candidates.

4. New contestants were constantly added to the battle royal.

Girls who made it through an elimination stage went up against successive waves of candidates entering the fray, in an ongoing battle of attrition.

5. Final cut pro.

In the final round, intangibles came into play. Things like a nice hairdo, a sense of style, or a friendly face were factored in to narrow the finalist pool. Multiple pictures—which insulate the process against one lucky, flattering picture—were essential at this stage.

In no particular order:

The Rise Of The Mangina

November 27, 2013 | by Truth Teller | Link | Original Link

Definition

Man·gi·na
-noun-
1. A women-firster.
2. A pussy-worshipper.
3. A male who behaves or acts toward men in an overly aggressive way once feminist Maxims are questioned.
4. Teacher of lies and half truths.
5. One who believes violence against women is more wide spread than violence against men.
6. The major party of financial transactions to feminist and their misandric programs.
7. A cruel and vicious robber of freedoms.
8. A male lackey of the feminist movement (called a 'male feminist'), who views women as superior to men and always bows down to and agrees with women in an attempt to curry favor.
9. Males who cater to women so that women might like them more.
10. A woman's doormat, personal servant and cuddle buddy.

Last night I was initiated into my fraternity after a five-week pledge period. As is usual on a fraternity induction/initiation night, we drank and talked about women. I would say that there are only three or four red pill guys out of 23 in the entire fraternity. One has been beaten around by life and realizes how the world really works. He has been screwed over so many times that he really has no choice but to be red pill. The other three are myself, the fraternity treasurer, and the guy in charge of the fraternity brotherhood.

After many beers, a game or two of pong, and a trip to a convenience store, we began to speak about (what else?) women. The treasurer and I both sucked with women in high school, but got into game (him indirectly, me directly) and saw huge spikes in our ability. He and I see it pretty similarly. Another guy (not red pill) took offense to what I said about the traditional idea of "chivalry" being nonsense.

It seems as though men used to be raised with balls, as I said in my earlier article about Walt Kowalski. Now, we're too busy trying to make boys believe in "touchy feely" crap, which is embodied in our educational system. This is one of the biggest issues with the liberalization of education. As someone who went through four weeks of "extended orientation" about diversity, rape (which was highly antagonistic, mind you), and other mind-numbing topics, I've very recently had to deal with this. We're too damned busy trying to teach men about crap that doesn't mean anything. Yes, diversity is important, and we need to respect other people's ways of living (up to a certain point) but when you're trying to shame someone for not being a LGBT "ally," there's an issue.

There are many reasons why the average man has become a "white knight"/pussy. These are three of the most important:

1. The Rise Of Feminism

With the rise of feminism, men have been told they should have sympathy for every issue that a woman has. This is what some call “chivalry.” I call it the pussification of the West. Chivalry is dead, and feminism uses it as an excuse while demanding equality and attempting to empower women. While I support things that are truly equal, like equal pay for equal work and equal opportunity, it doesn’t mean that women should get benefits that men will never receive. Unfortunately, the feminist idea of equality is where men are subjugated. By and large, feminists have succeeded.

Misandry is, unfortunately, alive and well. Look at how our court system works in the United States. Refer to the Duke Lacrosse case, where a slut cried “RAPE” and managed to destroy the lives of three young men. What happens if a sexually promiscuous man does that? Nothing. Hell, I bet it never would’ve made the local news, yet alone Nancy (dis)Grace. Look at how sexually promiscuous men are called “players,” but sluts are “sexually liberated.”

2. Social Pressure

This falls slightly under reason one, but it’s important to differentiate the two. I took the red pill in January of 2013 (so not too long ago). I’ve gotten shit from a lot of people about it. I’ve been questioned about how I can call a woman a slut but not call a guy with game a slut. I’ve been cockblocked by white knights who repulse women. I’ve also had some of my greatest personal growth in this period. Prior to January, I couldn’t have cold approached a woman drunk. The second night of frat rush (second night I went out), I cold approached three women sober. I did the same thing again the next weekend.

I took a lot of shit for taking the red pill but I stayed the course. However, how many do not? How many men give in? Society tells us that men should be sweet, sensitive, romantic, and all that Disney nonsense. It’s easy to be a mangina/white knight. Women tell you that’s what they want, society likes you, and people won’t dislike you to your face.

Mainstream society conditions men to be this way, and going against the grain of society is very difficult. Most take it and find they can’t enjoy what the majority of people still enjoy. Personally, I can’t watch many movies anymore, because I get irritated with the theme of the nice, quiet guy getting the girl in the end. Actually, I find myself reading more books than I used to.

3. Institutional Collapse Of Marriage

Marriage used to be a sacred contract with the oath “’til death do us part” taken seriously. Now, it’s seen as an eight to ten year commitment, with the man losing at least half of his property and custody of his children. Sons need fathers in their lives on a regular basis. My father was usually working during my childhood. My grandfather acted as my surrogate father until I was about six, and I thank God for it. He didn’t teach me about the red pill, but he planted the seeds in me through stories of his childhood and his heroes as a boy. He taught me to know when to stand my ground and take a stance. He also taught me how to know when to compromise with people. Both have been unbelievably useful.

With the institutional collapse of marriage has come the rise of the single mother. Single mothers can't teach boys how to be men, regardless of what the feminists want you to believe. These boys become manginas. They're forced to believe in the feminist talking points because they don't have another viewpoint. Unfortunately, most fathers can't raise boys into men either, but fathers are better equipped. The single mother is seen as a hero by many liberals and the mainstream media. Bill Clinton was an exception; he saw the benefits to having a nuclear family. How many times does CNN or another 24 hour news network talk about the "heroic single mother?" I would say at least once a week, if not more. How many time is the single father reported on? Almost never.

A Brief Anecdote:

The aforementioned "white knight" came into the frat house in a bad mood. He had taken a girl to the International Relations (IR) club formal and been promptly ditched. Then she started making out with another guy in the corner. He entered the house somewhat drunk, but not horribly so. He then told us his story of woe. When I told him what he should've done, he said I have "no experience with women" because I proposed that he change his actions. He then told us that he thought he lost her when he accidentally"stood her up," after making himself ridiculously available to her for the last two weeks. Sure, honor your commitments to people, but don't be so available that it appears you have nothing else going on in your life.

Summary

It's easy to be a mangina. It's far easier to be blue pill than red pill, and it's what society expects of us. I understand the world needs manginas. If every guy were an alpha, we wouldn't have such a wide array of choices. Manginas/white knights have risen because of the institutional collapse of marriage, societal pressure, and the rise of feminism. With all of these issues, it's no wonder that the majority of men will be content having a soul crushing 9-5 job, a wife who hates their bloody guts, and no chance to ever improve themselves.

Now, being an alpha doesn't necessarily mean being an entrepreneur who travels the globe, makes a ton of money, and sets his own hours. It doesn't mean being a controlling douchebag either. In my experience, I've found that domineering men tend to be very beta. So what does being an alpha mean? It means being your own man, judiciously speaking your mind, and continuously moving forward towards your goals. You can hold a 9-5 job if you want to, as long as you enjoy it and can be married, as long as it's a healthy relationship. There's nothing beta about either of those.

5 Commandments Of Stripclub Game

---

To launch my new book, Stripclub Bible, I've chosen this week to give you gents an excerpt from it. Never has there been a system designed to pick up strippers like the one I have put together. Strippers can be the most elusive girls to pickup, IF you don't have the proper game to do so. Without further ado, I present 5 Commandments of Stripclub Game.

5. Don't Drink

"What Christian?! You always talk about drinking while gaming…"

You're correct in thinking that, but I'm not talking about Club Game right now; I'm talking about Stripclub Game, which is a different animal. From your energy, to how you conduct yourself, it's a completely different ballgame. Thus, No Drinking and here's why:

-First off, when dealing with professional cash makers, the last thing you need to be is buzzed. It affects your decision-making and will cause you to make amature mistakes, that you wouldn't normally make, such as buying lap dances, 'making it rain', and other foolish try-hard moves that I've seen a thousand times. Would you go into a business meeting buzzed or drunk? More than likely not, if making money is a priority in your life. The same goes for pulling strippers: they are EXPERTS at pulling money out of men, so how do you combat that and turn the tables? By not succumbing to what the average fucker does: drinking.

-You’re not going to be at the strip club long, so there’s no point in drinking and then turning around an hour later and driving buzzed.

-Your mental wits being on point is KEY to dealing with strippers. They are judging you from the moment you walk in from how you carry yourself, to what you say and where you sit. “Is this another john, or a playboy that I’d like to fuck?”, the strippers are thinking. How do I know? Because they’ve told me that exact phrase.

-It’ll make your game that much sharper to have zero reliance on drinking. Zip, zilch, nada. Leave the booze for that date with the Starbucks Slut, or when you’re in the club with your buddies. Stripclub Game = Zero alcohol. You heard it here first. Instead, order a soda water with lime, a Red Bull, or even a cup of coffee.

-The exception to this rule, is if you have a strip club On-Lock, to the point where they give you a comped bottle. In Vegas strip clubs, I’m comped bottles, which is fine for treating my clients, however, it can take a while to get a strip club On-Lock and generally, a lot of strip clubs don’t do bottle service. Even then, I’m not a big fan of drinking the bottle myself. Let your friends and the strippers drink the bottle; it’s at no cost to you and while they’ll be stumbling around and trying to spit game, you’ll be razor-sharp and pulling the hottest strippers there.

4. ‘Sniper’ vs. ‘Shotgun’ Style Game

A nightclub with high energy, really loud music and a lot of people, is different from a stripclub. Stripclubs tend to be lounge style, with music obviously, but, instead of pounding Tiesto, they have a slow T-Pain song on, cats are sitting down and not fist pumping, and there’s a sensual vibe, instead of a high energy party vibe.

These major differences means that your game style will be vastly different. While in the club, you may roam around dropping flirtatious remarks to twenty different hotties, combined with a high energy fun dynamic, but in the stripclub, you'll be like a 'sniper'. Cool, calm, collected and picking your 'target' with precision. Also, you'll be getting in and out quicker, while at the club you may spend hours working different girls.

Stripclub Game is a calculated style and patience is a virtue. The strippers have work to do, so they're not going to walk out with you after 5 minutes of conversation. Instead, due to 99% of stripclubs having the "Can't leave with a customer" policy, the stripper will have to wait until AFTER her shift is over and then she will meet up with you. While both styles are fun in their own right, learning the difference and becoming great at both, will only add to your pussy coffers even more.

3. Don't Buy Lap Dances, But You Can Buy Them A Drink

The Number 1 question I get regarding stripclubs, is "Should I spend money on the stripper?" and the answer is 'yes' AND 'no'.

You should not buy lap dances, private dances, or any type of physical interaction between the two of you. Zero. You are not a john and the moment you spend money on them, you become a customer. Listen closely: I have NEVER pulled a stripper having spent money on her, but I have pulled many many strippers utilizing a technique, which I'll explain in a bit.

*Note: Can a cat go to a stripclub, spend hundreds or thousands on a girl and potentially fuck her later that night, or even at the stripclub? Of course, but you're a Player, not a Played. You're a Casanova-In-Training, not a putz who is reliant on spending money to get to that pussy. Add to this, that no matter what my friend, you'll never spend more than another customer she's had. I've had clients spend literally thousands ($15,000+) on lap dances and private dances and get NOTHING in return; while I sat back, used 'sniper' game and wound up meeting up with the stripper later, much to the chagrin of my client(s). Don't be a schmuck to fuck.

What can you spend money on? Drinks for the strippers. Now think about this for a second, you go to a club, meet a hottie and buy a couple of shots for the two of you, no big deal right? Right. Now in a stripclub, there is a certain etiquette and that includes spending SOME money in order to be there. When you see a stripper that strikes your fancy and one who you want to bang, then after she sits down, you may order a non-alcoholic drink for yourself and casually ask her what she wants to drink. This does NOT make you a schmuck getting her drunk, it's casual, non-expensive stripclub etiquette combined with being an effortless playboy.

Buying her a drink accomplishes a couple of important aspects of gaming in a stripclub:

1. The management and stripper pressure on you to buy lap dances etc, diminishes 100 fold. You are now a paying customer, not a frog on a log getting your eye candy feel.

2. Shows her you're not a cheapfuckinskate and you can hold your own while out and about, but also, she can use the excuse to her boss that you "were buying her drinks, so she talked for a bit with you". This is key: she HAS to make money, that's her job. If you're buying her a drink or two, she can chill with you while you spit game, without putting lap dance pressure on you. The burden will be lifted, which allows her to relax and drop the 'mask', that strippers use so well.

2. Roll Solo

Afraid of rolling solo? Cut that fear out of your life immediately. Stripclubs are perfect venues to roll solo to and in fact, it works best when you do. Rolling to a nightclub solo may be intimidating for some of you, however, if you want to get in some practice, start with stripclubs. At stripclubs, it's quite common to see a cat by themselves, so it's natural and almost expected.

Here's why you want to roll solo to a stripclub and why it works best for picking up a stripper:

1. Rolling solo with the proper body language + swagger = HIGH DHV (Demonstration of High Value). Nothing screams 'confident', like a man who can walk into a venue of ANY kind and command the room while being by himself. This makes you a non-needy man and one who is not dependent on peers to have a good time.

The key here is to be: Coming From Somewhere, Doing Something In The Moment and Going Somewhere.

For example:

-It's 9pm on a Saturday night. You worked out, got dressed, had dinner and are killing an hour of time, before going to a birthday party. You are at the stripclub doing some business on your phone (not making calls, but texting, making notes etc). You expect to be leaving in an hour or less to go meet your friends at the birthday party. So you have a strong purpose and are not just idling sitting at the stripclub with nothing going on in your life and nowhere to go.

This automatically gives your physical body a PURPOSE, which controls your body language, your speech and how confident you feel. Think for a moment of those times where you had a hot date lined up for the night…

How did you feel? You went to the gym and on the way home stopped to pick up a steak at the grocery story. When you walked into Piggly Fucking Wiggly Supermarket, you had a pep in your step and a confidence in your body language and speech. You smiled at the cute cashier and flirted a bit. You looked at the pimply bagger boy and actually thanked him for bagging your steak separate from the deodorant you also bought. You were a magnet. People were drawn to look at you and acknowledge your presence. Why? Because you had a PURPOSE in where you were going and what you were doing.

Now back to the stripclub…

You're sitting in a chair away from the main stage and are handling some business on your phone. Your body language is casual, collected, non-needy and you're not staring at every stripper like you've never seen tits, ass and a snatch before. You are a man of VALUE and YOU are the prize. You notice a particular stripper who catches your eye and one you'd like to bang. You motion her over casually and instruct her to sit down in the chair beside you. NOT on you right away, but beside you.

She sits down and the cocktail waitress buzzes over immediately and you instruct her to get you a Red Bull and the stripper whatever she would like. You casually drop a bill on the cocktail platter and finish up some business with your phone while half-listening to the stripper babble. Now think about that frame for a second? YOU are in charge the entire time. YOU decide when you the conversation really starts and how it's going to go.

If there's one thing strippers love and I do mean love, it's a dominant male leader. Fact: They tend to be lost little souls and they are very drawn to alpha men.

If you’re with a bumbling friend who hasn’t been out of the house in a month due to his ball and chain, then odds are, he’s going to do everything possibly wrong. Roll solo and reap the benefits.

Also, don’t bring your guy friends around the strip clubs you got On-Lock. These are YOUR Pussy Paradises and trust me, one stupid move from your ‘friend’, can tarnish and ruin all of the work you put in.

1. Move Fast And GTFO

Part of building massive DHV with strippers is that your night consists of stopping in at a stripclub, but the totality of your night is NOT the stripclub. It’s like a great appetizer, but not the main course. Here’s why:

-You’re a busy playboy and you’re not going to sit in a stripclub for 4 hours staring at hot naked chicks for no reason. Your SOLE reason for going to a stripclub is to meet some strippers, target one of them, build DHV + Comfort and set up logistics.

-Your composure, as I mentioned before, is being calm, cool and collected. Imagine the smoothest player you’ve seen in action or an imaginary player such as James Bond or Hank Moody. What about them is smooth? They are Casual, Chill, Non-Needy and always On-The Go. Now of course, these two characters are fictional, but that in no way takes away from their game styles being effective in the real world. So while you’re on a time limit for being at the strip club, your composure is not hurried.

-Walk in, purvey the spot, pick a seat (away from the main stage. I break this down exactly in my book), casually check out the strippers and decide on who your target is, motion her over casually (there’s a reason why you motion her over), order yourself a non-alcoholic drink and her a drink of her choice, build DHV + Comfort, get her phone number and lastly set up logistics for you to meet up after her shift is over.

In conclusion, Stripclub Game can be very rewarding:

-Not 21 years old? Doesn’t matter. Most stripclubs in the US are 18+ establishments. Some are 18+ to get in and 21+ to drink.

-It can be as cheap as day game. Cover is always negotiable and usually free your first time. Once you develop a good rapport with management, you’ll be comped every time.

-You’re not drinking alcohol, so you’re saving money and the 1-2 drinks you buy a stripper is under $20.

-Stripper game can be more rewarding, due to the ‘elusive’ challenge of strippers, as well as the most sexually satisfying lays, because strippers, if they are anything, is that they are highly sexual girls.

-One of the best ways to get a threesome? Learn Stripclub Game.

-One of the best ways to get a sexy little freak? Learn Stripclub Game.

Act As If Every Girl Were A Slut

November 28, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

"Act as if every day were your last" we're told. Pretend it's true, the thinking goes, and you'll have a more thrilling life. In the same vein, here's another aphorism to boost your game: "Every girl is a slut."

It's a truism among players, and it's one I struggled with. Yet girls aren't all the same – some will have sex with you at a moment's notice, and others will tell you they're saving it for marriage. To someone with an empirical bent, to someone who likes to understand the world as it is, you might struggle with such an absolute statement – it's so vague it's not even true or false per se.

Properly understood however, "every girl is a slut" is valuable because it makes your game better. It's a tactical assumption, something that you assume to be true to improve your strategy, even if you think it will be false most of the time. For instance, if you were getting into a fight, you might assume that your opponent had a knife on him. There might only be a 20% chance that he carries a knife, but if you adopt a fighting style that's vulnerable to an opponent with a knife, you'd be 100% fucked if he whipped one out. While the assumption will constrain your behavior, it will be a great boon to your continued success over time.

Over the past month, I slept with several new girls – girls I saw once or twice. That was it – I doubt I'll ever get to sleep with any of them again. We had met for a date in each case, and then proceeded to have sex on the first date, or in one case, a second date. When I tried to push it beyond a second date, only a couple were interested. Angry women on the internet tell me I have a tiny penis, so maybe that was it.

One girl claimed she 'could not commit to anything right now' when I never claimed to want anything more than sex. Another girl was casually dating another man, and chose to stick with him. One worked too much and lived with her parents to make it a regular deal.

One was interested in something more serious, but I wasn't. One said we were going different ways. These girls were like cold beads of water coursing through my fingers – refreshing, but I'd be a fool to try and hold on to them. Better to enjoy them for the brief moment I have them laid away in my lair.

> American girls are so slutty nowadays that a consistent fuck buddy is too much commitment for them. From recent personal experience…
> — Emmanuel Goldstein (@Goldsteineum) November 19, 2013

Even if a girl likes you, there's no guarantee that she will see you again. Maybe she'll end up fucking some guy on her next night out. Or her workload doubles and decides she doesn't have time for any 'commitments' right now. It sounds like she is only temporarily rejecting you – after all, you had a good time together. From experience though, know you will never see her again. In the mind of a woman, sex should be effortless – if she has to overcome what she calls 'fate,' aka that loss of momentum and time apart, her pussy will dry up and she will lazily opt out. Especially if she's a slut.

As a man, dating is an investment whose minimum return is sex. Other things matter, but they're meaningless without sex – and then you're just platonic friends. Some 'investments' won't pan out – you go on a date or two with the girl yet you never fuck. And others, you'll have sex with nothing more than a round of beers and a floor mattress. By pushing for sex early and often, your returns come in quicker, and you invest less on girls that never pan out.

When you act as if every girl is a slut, she may assume you 'do this with every girl.' While that sounds counter-productive, in her mind she 'won't be a slut' for sleeping with you, because so many girls have done so before her. Sheep see safety in the herd.

You will take every step to maximize the likelihood of having sex quickly. You toss out all those dating conventions – all that matters is if they help you get laid or not. Maybe you even like the girl – no matter.

Always structure dates so that you can get laid. Set the date near her house or yours, preferably yours – girls can be skittish about letting you in to their house on a first date. Do not meet in the middle.

Assume she's already fucking other men. No attractive girl is ever truly single or alone. There are always men just a text away, and sometimes less. When you assume that she is already fucking other men, or is about to, you realize time is of the essence – as the tacky infomercials go, "You must act now!" Dawdle, and you'll end up in the friend zone or as a dead phone number. When a girl is sleeping with someone, she becomes markedly less attentive to other men.

This dynamic is even obvious among female coworkers – when girls are openly distant in greeting me, I know it's because she's already fucking someone and she feels little need to talk up other eligible men. Even though she'd never consider fucking me anyway, her steady dose of dick imbues her everyday behavior and makes her distant with other men. If a girl is already sleeping with someone, you'll have to leverage all of your pull on her to get anywhere. Even if this assumption were false, the end result is you get sex or rejection quicker – more return or less investment, a win in either case.

If she's being flaky, she's already fucking someone. Women crave sex. Once they start having it, they will not want to go without it for long. If she isn't getting it from a boyfriend, she's getting it from someone else, even as she's going on dates with you.

Be wary of poisoning the pot. Be aware that you could turn her off if you're too aggressive. If you proceed carefully enough, this shouldn't be an issue. Even so, you have to ask yourself if this girl is so special that you'd be willing to put in time to get with her – if you can't say yes to that, her rejection is a blessing – she's keeping you from wasting more of your time and money in a failed prospect. Even so-called nice girls, who are not sluts, can be very forgiving of an aggressive man, provided you show some enduring interest in her as a person. They secretly respect men who pursue boldly. Proceed more carefully in sensitive situations, like with coworkers or girls in your social circle, until you're sure she likes you.

You may want more than sex. But with a woman who's got several sexual partners in her past, and dozens of suitors lining up in the present, you're not remotely in her reality until you fuck her. She will not think twice about never talking to you again until you've had sex, and maybe not even then. We live in a Slut Culture where sex means nothing, an amicable date even less. Every time you see a woman, you cannot be certain you will see her again… imagine every night with her is your last.

Fortune favors the bold.

The Patriarchy Conspiracy Theory

November 28, 2013 | by Glanton | Link | Original Link

It's odd to me that the conservative right always gets tarred as a bunch of conspiracy theorists. That's the picture in the popular imagination at least. A conspiracy theorist is a disaffected red-stater in a tinfoil hat. Now I don't think that stereotype is odd because it's inaccurate. Like most stereotypes, it's there for a reason.

(I'm a thoroughgoing Southern traditionalist myself, and I ascribe to quite a few conspiracy theories. Buy me a glass of bourbon, and I'll gladly share them with you. Right after I comb the bar for bugs and verify that you're not with the NSA.)

My problem with that stereotype is not that it's inaccurate but that it's incomplete. The right has no monopoly on conspiracy theories whatsoever. Your average leftist—be he a dorm room Marxist or an LGBTQ social justice crusader—is chock full of conspiracy theories. Head to toe. And almost every major tenet of the blue-pill worldview, in fact, rests on theories so obscure, so elaborate, and so prima facie preposterous that they would make an anti-NWO infowars.com militiaman blush at the outlandishness of it all.

Take, for instance, the feminist.

Patriarchy as Fact

Okay, patriarchy is a historical fact. No two ways about that. Men, with vanishingly few exceptions at any point in history at any spot on the globe, have been the primary political movers in human societies. Men have always held the majority of positions of political authority and large-scale social influence. Men have always had the power.

But here's the thing: patriarchy evolved in almost every society in human history for a reason. Reason being that men are better suited to be leaders and everybody benefits when they lead. There are perfectly legitimate explanations for why men are so disposed.

A lot of them are basic biological facts.

It's not a secret that men are more aggressive than women and more prone to taking risks, and it's not a mystery why those traits allow them to excel in inherently high-stakes environments like statecraft. Men are also better at systematizing than women, as recent neurological studies bear out. We're big picture thinkers, given to the sort of theoretical abstractions like "rule of law" that allow societies to function smoothly.

That tendency towards the big picture spills over into masculine social networks as well, which are typically wider and shallower than the narrow and deep social networks that females prefer. The former resemble the sort of coalitional networks essential to running a tribe or a state or a nation. The latter not so much. Moreover, there's strong evidence that men are overrepresented at the genius-level tail of the IQ bell curve, by maybe as much as a 2:1 ratio. That means there's a larger pool of exceptionally talented men to begin with, compared to the pool of similarly talented women. More raw material for the great movers and shakers of tomorrow. Hell, there's even evidence that testosterone predisposes individuals to fairer and more honest bargaining. Not a bad trait in a political leader.

I don't want to drone, but this list could go on and on and on.

Some of the reasons men have always run the politics game are so obvious that it's almost insulting when you sit down and think about it. Imagine you're in a pre-modern society where your physical capacity to wage war is crucial to your position as a leader. Those androgens get real important, don't they? Another thought experiment: imagine you don't have access to state-of-the-art medical facilities or contraception. You've got high rates of pregnancy and of maternal mortality at childbirth. Does it make good sense to install women in positions of critical importance to the continued functioning of your tribe? Why? So she can kick the bucket nine months from now?

In other words, patriarchy is not only a historical fact but also a beneficial adaptation that allowed human societies to thrive in the first place, to flourish all over the world. Like I said, men are better suited to politics and leadership and so everyone—man, woman, child, and beast—is better off with them installed in those positions. Looking back over the historical record, of course men are going to be politically dominant in the successful societies.

Patriarchy as Conspiracy

But in come the feminists, inveterate conspiracy theorists that they are. To them, patriarchy is not universal because it's beneficial. No! Patriarchy is universal because the whole thing is one, giant, several-hundred-thousand-year-long conspiracy to keep bitches in the kitchen. Since time immemorial, men have been rigging the game. We put the Illuminati to shame. You, sad dupe to the whole scheme that you are, might think that patriarchy is just a feature of human social organization (like burial of the dead or bodily adornment), but no! Wrong again! It's all misogyny. Men hold leadership positions just to spite women. Men hold them out of hatred and loathing and fear. Why do men hate women? Who knows? Men throughout history have just been a bunch of hateful haters who hatingly hated their whole hatey lives.

You'll excuse my skepticism, ranting tinfoil hat lady.

You see this feminist psychosis in action all the time. Soon the feminist starts hallucinating a hostile patriarchy everywhere. Everywhere. Its tentacles creep into every human endeavor. Marketing does not use pretty women because even women prefer to see pretty clothes on pretty models. Actually marketing is an arm of the patriarchy that browbeats average-looking women into a life of obedient servitude! The WNBA doesn't rake in less cash than the NBA because it's a demonstrably inferior athletic spectacle. Actually sports broadcasting is an arm of the patriarchy that marginalizes female athletes out of sheer distaste for their gender.

When the feminist's breakfast cereal tastes funny, she suspects that patriarchy spoiled the milk.

Occam's Razor applies here. You don't have to multiply entities to understand these social dynamics. You don't need a concept like "misogyny" or "sexism" to accurately describe relationships between men and women either historical or present. (You don't need a concept like "misandry" either, you goddamn MRAs.) Those concepts add zero explanatory power. All you need is a basic familiarity with human psychology, behavior, and physiology. With patterns of social development through time. All you need is a basic familiarity with reality. The rest of this shit can be extrapolated from there.

A Couple Closing Suggestions

So put the wildly implausible conspiracy theories down, ladies. And go ahead and pick up your Ben & Jerry's while you're at it. It's going to take a pint or two to gorge away the psychic pain of realizing that you're a miserable social pariah because that's what you are, not because a patriarchy that inexplicably despises you made you into one.

And as for the rest of you folks: I say feel free to keep trafficking in the stereotype that the right is a bunch of gun-toting, government-fearing nutjobs. Not too far off the mark, really. At least where I come from. Just don't forget that we don't have a monopoly on crazy. The left has some even wilder-ass conspiracy theories all its own.

7 Reasons Why You Shouldn’t Use Escorts

November 28, 2013 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Escorts, hookers, “masseuses” and so forth are like the fast food of sex. If you eat in MacDonald’s everyday it can certainly be tasty and convenient, but there are certain draw backs. First, let’s take a look at the upside:

1. You are guaranteed to get laid

Sure there are times you want to eat at the four seasons or hit the local supermarket and fry your own steaks at home, even hunt them yourself in the forest, but sometimes it’s 1am and a one off greasy burger hits the spot. Nothing wrong with that in and of itself. You get what you pay for, “Wham bam, Thank you Mam”.

2. Privacy and confidentiality

Charlie Sheen is infamous for using escorts after he was busted in the Heidi Fleiss case. He was quoted in court as saying, “I don’t pay them for sex, I pay them to leave.” By my own experiences, I’d agree and say that unless you’re mounting a crack whore, she enjoys her work to some extent; at least as much as a therapist, or a non-sexual masseuse and certainly while you do in a sense pay her to leave afterwards, I’d say you pay to establish precise relationship boundaries. You pay her not to gossip, not to know your name, and not to speak about you AT ALL. A lot of men use escorts for this reason alone. Not just to cheat on wifey, but not to have that pesky girlfriend wanting to come on business trips and not having to justify a relationship or introduce the girlfriend to friends and family. Social dynamics get trickier as you get older.

3. Quality / hassle free

Professional girls know what men want. They know how to please. While the industry does still lack some quality control, if you are discerning, pay for high class girls or simply do some leg work and be prepared to decline even after paying and better still if you find a regular girl – you really can do quite nicely for yourself. I practically had a relationship with one pro. Zero games, great sex, drop around to her place with a ½ hour’s notice. Leave when I’m done. No gossip, family, girl friends or bitching to put up with. Never had to buy her so much as a soda. No favors, no bad attitude if I blew out a date. She supplied all the condoms and premises etc… SIMPLE.

Her skills in the bedroom sat alongside any of the most well known pornstars. As James Gandolfini said in Killing Them Softly: “ Honey, learn to roll the condom on with your mouth and stop acting like your asshole is a national treasure.”

The younger guys will probably laugh and certainly the escort industry makes a large portion of its money from older married guys paying to experiment and paying for privacy and discretion, but none the less there is a lot to be said for the pure and perfect relaxation of having a girl there to serve you, never say a word and never judge you.

4. Getting nasty

One reason that guys in long term relationships go to pros is so they can do things they wouldn't normally do with their SO. Perhaps you want to be restrained and teased. Perhaps you want to piss on her, or have her lick your ass, but doing that with a decent 'nice' girlfriend will damage how she thinks of you. Perhaps you want to try two girls at once, or tag teaming a girl with a buddy. Need a date for an eyes wide shut? There are places you don't want to take your lovely girlfriend or wife to, but nothing wrong with going there yourself. A lot of guys bemoan ever trying to get fancy with their wife or girlfriend. Swingers, threesomes, couple swapping and so forth have killed many a marriage. If there are kids involved you don't want to take that risk. Release yourself from the confines of marriage and go have a bit of real nasty fun a few times a year. Good wives are faithful, good men are loyal. There is a huge difference.

Okay, so we've heard all the advantages. Here are the reasons I would generally avoid pros.

1. Laziness

If you know you can get fed at Macdonald's 24/7, and you're lovin' it, why bother loading the fridge or cooking for yourself? Lazy is bad. It reduces incentive and you slowly get sloppy and reliant upon what is still in many states considered a vice. They are called hookers for a reason.

2. Expense

The odd couple of hundred here and there to experiment is fine, but if you are a guy like me that basically wants sex a couple of times a day, and has lived like that for years on end with a girlfriend. Trying to replicate that with a pro is going to run into thousands per month. It might be cheaper than a divorce, but still the financial commitment is going to mount up, just as it would with a drug or gambling habit.

3. Self-Respect

The feeling of conquest that is missing. Zoo keepers have discovered that big game animals, even monkeys – have a much better psychology when made to catch their food, even though they are living in a park. You might be the kind of guy that considers yourself a pretty parrot in a cage, but I think most guys want to think of themselves as lions or tigers on the prowl. Hard to do that when Mr. Zoo Keeper throws a fresh carcass straight over the fence at 2pm each day.

4. Disease

Whilst good pros are probably more conscious of their sexual health than your average ONS or cheating girlfriend, and they use condoms strictly and make visits to the doctor and tests regularly, you can never be 100% sure. You have no way of knowing how many clients she's getting through per week, or how clean she really is. She might already have HIV and know it, and need the money. How can you ever be 100% sure? Certainly you are better off with a pro than a disco skank that likes to get gang banged on the weekends – but in the long run the odds with a pro are not on your side, especially if you get the habit for different flavors and frequent visits. And god help husbands if your wife catches something.

5. Sexual skills

You'll never be quite sure if she's really enjoying it or not. Sure I've had plenty of evenings with my regular, which ran way over time, where she was clearly enjoying herself and I could feel her cuming, lube wasn't needed, and we were all over each other, but there is still that taboo where it's just a job for her. The 'employment' vibe is in the air unless you can game her into a freebie.

6. Convenience

It requires more work to find a good regular stable independent pro that has her own place and that you have a bit of chemistry with than to just find an honest girlfriend. You might not want to bring pros to your place unless you live alone. That means going out for an in call, and then stumbling home. Not always what I want of an evening. Sometimes I just want a quick BJ in front of the TV.

7. Social skills

You will not learn much about how to connect emotionally with women. You are the bitch in a sense. She controls the interaction, she's in charge. You can charm your way and create sexual tension as much as possible, but still you won't learn all that much – if anything at all socially. It's just a transaction. This is probably the worst side of visiting a pro. You are taking a path that leads to less and less social interaction, whereas what you probably need if you are visiting a pro purely for reasons of lack of sex – is more social interaction, not less.

I would recommend a few visits to a pro for very inexperienced single guys that are not good around women and want to experiment. It's very relaxing to have a girl do all the hard work and seduction. It sets your expectations very high and makes you demand more from girlfriends. I would also recommend a pro for married guys, but again, not as a habit, simply as a way to inject some strange into your vibe. Women, especially wives tend to get wild in bed when they sense competition – and trust me wifey will sense it. Women have antennas. NEVER RAT YOURSELF OUT – NEVER. Eat your own guilt and be a man.

I'd also recommend it if you are stressed and need to just get laid quickly. The main thing is that you maintain your self-respect and that it doesn't become a habit. Think of it like alcohol or fast food. A few drinks or a few burgers is fine, but you don't wanna be hitting the bottle at 10am on a Tuesday.

Final notes

If you don't find a quality product, don't pay for it. Have the balls to leave. Pay her cab or just walk away. One of the reasons that guys end up feeling dirty and shamed from sleeping with pros is because they get a girl they don't really like, aren't attracted to, don't have chemistry with, or who is just plain amateurish, clearly out for the money, or too fucking lazy to do a professional job. Already insecure around women, they don't have the guts to say no thanks. That used "hooker face" from the low to mid end girls, can be a real boner killer. So kill the transaction.

Don't ever let tramps suck you in. They are called hookers for more reasons than one. If you must nibble on the hook, carefully enjoy the bait, without biting in deep.

Bitcoin Is Creating A New Class Of Millionaires

November 29, 2013 | by Mark Ford | Link | Original Link

Right at this very second, the largest transfer of wealth in the history of humanity is underway. It has been going on since 2009, but it's really picked up speed in the last 6 months. A couple of days ago, I wrote a detailed post on RVF explaining Bitcoin in layman's terms. I strongly suggest that every reader of this post spend 10 minutes on that explanation, but if you're too lazy then here's the summary:

- Bitcoin is the world's largest cryptocurrency, essentially money for the Internet. It is an open source Internet protocol, like HTTP. It was hypothesized and first developed by an anonymous author or group under the name "Satoshi Nakamoto".
- Bitcoin is pioneering the idea of a deflationary currency, something which has never been possible before in humanity's history. Gold and silver come close, but not all of it has been dug out of the ground yet. The only two possibilities for Bitcoin are that its value goes to zero, or increases. There is no possibility that the value ever decreases or stabilizes (in the medium term). In the long term, Bitcoin's value will increase at a decreasing rate, but never stop, as it can be lost but not replaced.
- Unlike gold and silver, Bitcoin can be essentially perfectly subdivided, and transmitted anywhere on the planet for almost nothing between any two parties with an Internet connection.
- Bitcoin is decentralized like the Tor network, so it cannot be regulated or controlled by any government or authority body.

One Bitcoin has climbed from less than $200 to peaks over $1000 in the last month.

Every currency and medium of exchange on the planet is down against the Bitcoin over the last year, including gold and oil.

Innovation Means Winners And Losers

There is a hard limit of just under 21 million Bitcoins. That means less than 1 in 300 people could own a full one, even if evenly distributed, which they are not (there's already a number of investors that own hundreds or thousands or more).

One Bitcoin can be subdivided down into 100 million Satoshis (the smallest unit). Even if the world's money supply was entirely Bitcoin, one Satoshi would be worth just a couple of cents in today's USD, allowing for small transactions. If this were to happen, many many people would be reduced to poverty, living their entire lives on a few Millibits (thousandths of a Bitcoin) or Satoshis.

The new 1% is anyone that currently owns at least one Bitcoin, the world just doesn't know it yet. Like this, but on a world scale. For the most part, this includes white, technically-minded, middle-aged American men but increasingly comprises Chinese technophiles and a cross section of society in economically unstable countries like Cyprus and Argentina.

The US government is starting to clue in and realises it needs to know what's going on, but all they need to understand is that they can benefit from supporting it, or be trampled as they attempt to regulate something beyond their control.

I can't say it any better than one of the commentators on the linked article (although I disagree about the inevitability of war and death), so here's "Dumbhandle":

> US Government: Pay attention. You have almost destroyed the future of our country by retarding bitcoin usage in the US with the ham fisted application and mismanagement of various regs. Wealth is fleeing already to China and accelerating. You have a very short time to deregulate in order to attract bitcoin wealth to the US before the bitcoin black hole inevitably sucks in all world fiat currencies and the flow of XBT wealth to China and other counties accelerates.
> Against all odds, your Chinese colleagues have realized this and are working as a team to effectuate capital accumulation over there. They are winning, because they understand fiats and the petro are finished. You need to immediately pull in some experts from the bitcoin community to explain this to you so you can take proper emergency evasive action to reverse the flow back to the US. Here is your goal: deregulate to reverse the capital flight. Then watch the global conversion of fiat to bitcoin. Watch bitcoin accumulate in the most innovative place in the world, the US. Sit back and watch a golden age bloom here and it spreads globally. Any other course will result in wars and death on a massive scale. Now we will watch you screw it up.

Bitcoin Doesn’t Care

Just like hypergamy and evolution, Bitcoin doesn’t care.

- It doesn’t care if you didn’t know
- It doesn’t care if you don’t understand
- It doesn’t care if you don’t believe

The critics will cry that “Bitcoin is just a bubble” (alternatively: pyramid scheme), and they’d be right. It’s a bubble in exactly the same way as the US dollar, which also gets its value entirely from community consensus (the paper it’s printed with cannot be eaten, used as construction material and is pretty poor fire fuel). I am more prepared to trust a democratic, distributed, deflationary technology than the self-serving government printing press, and I suspect a lot of others might too. I’m not alarmed by Bitcoin’s incredible growth, it’s just following the same S curve that tech giants like Facebook and Twitter tend to.

Absent any flaw being found in the source code (which has been publicly available and reviewed for years), or more likely one being introduced by the core development team (still a vanishingly unlikely proposition), I believe 1 Bitcoin will be worth at least US$ 100 000 by 31st December 2016. The Winklevoss twins think even higher. Max Keiser thinks even higher. Even Peter Thiel (Paypal co-founder) agrees the revolution has begun. Although ultimately, we’re all pure speculators on a very untested new technology.

The only other potential issue is advances in quantum computing that smashes apart current encryption standards, but that would cause far larger problems with all online privacy. If anyone would come out on top it’s the forward-thinking and technically-minded Bitcoin community.

Adapt or live with regret among the masses. You have been warned. At the very least, do some reading and make an informed decision.

Bitcoin daily closing prices on MtGox for the last 4 years (to Nov 29), from sub-5 dollars to over $1000. The closing of illegal, anonymous online marketplace Silk Road knocked the price off for a while, but it freed Bitcoin from any accusations of being useful only for drug deals. The road up is going to be rocky, but there is no stopping the train now.

NB: In the time taken for this post to go through the ROK submission and editing process, closing prices have doubled. The original version of this article had the graph below finishing at $450.

The Movie That Understands The Ongoing Attack Against Testosterone

November 30, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

My first introduction to the Belgian film Bullhead was through NexxtLevelUp. I read Virgle Kent's review of the movie nearly a year ago, yet the title remained in my 'to watch' queue up until recently. The plot is simple, dark, and character driven. On the surface it follows the protagonist Jacky in his attempt to navigate dealings with the 'steroid mafia' so that he can keep his family's cattle business afloat. Digging deeper the character of Jacky has been traumatized from an incident in his youth and we are given a glimpse into the effect of this on his every day dealings. Jacky is reserved, feared, and himself scared of others knowing his shame: he has to inject testosterone for his testicles were obliterated by a mentally unstable bully in childhood.

After watching the film I read some reviews of the movie by noted film critics and anonymous bloggers alike. If its one sentiment they shared it is that one will most certainly feel pity for Jacky, but the plot itself was weak and only served to act as a platform to act out the inner struggles of the main character. Coincidentally enough many of the lesser writers chose to describe Jacky's actions as "roid rage" or joked about Jacky's abuse of testosterone.

The plot is simple. It is contrived and it's sole purpose is to portray the inner struggle of Jacky. However, the inner struggle of Jacky is, like the plot, deliberate in order to make social commentary. Bullhead is a movie about societies perceptions of testosterone and nothing more. Jacky is Frankenstein's monster. He embodies testosterone in his size and aggression, because of this society looks down upon him as if he were a jester to both mock and fear.

Having lost his testicles pre-pubescently Jacky must take exogenous testosterone in order to develop the correct secondary sexual characteristics. In the scene which Jacky's parents consult with his doctor, the doctor bluntly states that if not given the recommended testosterone Jacky will never become a man. His mother replies asking "Will he be gay now?"

Despite being nearly halfway into the movie, this scene is where the true discourse of the movie is fully revealed. As transparent as it may be, this cattle farmer is seen by society as one in the same with the animals he raises. We believe testosterone must be controlled, must be caged, lest its wielder do wrong.

The day of Jacky's mutilation was also the first day he noticed that girls have breasts. While his father was in a business meeting, young Jacky finds himself enamored by a young girl at the scrapyard. Her brother soon comes over to butt heads with him, taunting him, and asking how much he would pay to fuck his sister. Jacky submits until his father comes over to break things up. He has now begun to learn that his natural sexuality is evil.

Days later Jacky stumbles upon the hideout of the bully. The bully and his friends are looking at porno mags. The bully catches Jacky watching and this triggers the rage of the bully. Jacky is mutilated and learns it is wrong for him to experience human sexuality. At another point in the film this is referenced as Jacky refuses to fuck whores with his business partner.

However, Jacky still has sexual desire for the girl he noticed that day as a child. She now works at a perfume shop and after multiple attempts to talk to her he ends up following her to a nightclub. The girls friend pushes the girl to talk to Jacky and the girl objects saying its gross how big he is. The girl starts talking to Jacky, but is pulled away by a player-esque character. Later on Jacky headbutts the player and beats him into a coma, grunting animalistically.

Bullhead climaxes as Jacky's life is crashing down around him. His ranch is threatened by a raid and he must destroy all of the hormones he is giving his cattle. Jacky's love interest has realized it was Jacky who beat the player into a coma and Jacky is determined to finally take charge of his own life. Jacky laments that in his life he has never felt the need to protect someone like a wife or children because it is in his nature.

After reluctantly letting Jacky into her apartment the girl tells Jacky "you're all animals" Jacky accepts that society will never again accept his testosterone; he chooses to end his life the only way he deems fit… as another bull to the slaughter.

Yoga Pants CEO Is Attacked For Speaking The Truth About Fat Women

November 30, 2013 | by The Last Dissident | Link | Original Link

When I first watched the short clip above, my reaction was a mix of laughter and annoyance (with an emphasis on annoyance). For those who do not know, Lululemon Athletica is the very successful Canadian company that pioneered and made fashionable the ever so wonderful yoga pants fad that has swept the west over the past decade. Any man, like myself, who has an insatiable lust for a well-rounded feminine posterior has this company to thank for putting a $100 price tag on a pair of spandex, thereby making it accessible to the more decadent ideals of the western female mind. Which brings me to the laughter: not only is the Founder and CEO of Lululemon some dude named “Chip”, he also sees it fit (no pun intended) to call out overweight women for wearing tight clothes on national television, albeit with tact. Bravo good sir! Standing strong for the manosphere! And then the inevitable occurs…

Truth Is Forbidden

When asked why so many women have an issue with their Lululemon pants wearing thin, this CEO has the courage to speak the truth, and is immediately and universally chastised for it by the feminist hoard. This of course should not come as a surprise for readers of ROK, as we are all well aware of the hyper-feminist brainwashing that permeates the very fabric of Western culture. This news segment, however, struck a chord with me.

His answer to the question was delivered in a sincere, gentle, almost eloquent fashion. His answer is one based in physics (i.e., if you wear tight fitting athletic clothing and you happen to be overweight, inevitably you will wear out the fabric). End of story. If you have an issue with this, take it up with the Gods of Alchemy. Of course, physical reality be damned when it comes to the hyper sensitive expectations of feminized culture. How dare a man have the tenacity to suggest that women purchase clothing that fit them! And to be fair, Chip did not even go that far.

Hypersensitivity/Irrationality is The Rule

After reflecting on this video, I couldn't help but visualize every single fat and/or morbidly obese girl I've ever seen carelessly making her way down the side walk in a pair of ATHLETIC yoga pants, seemingly oblivious to her effect on the world around her. I couldn't help but see in my mind's eye the overflowing rolls of fat, the over-stretched fabric barely clinging together as thunderous thighs of ignorance slowly tear it apart molecule by molecule.

What gets me most about this news segment, however, is just how universally accepted it is that this man should be reprehended for his suggestion that not every body type is right for yoga pants. On the surface, to any logically thinking adult, this would seem a no-brainer. If parts of your body are rubbing together due to your size, than this will deteriorate the fabric of clothing, especially if your clothing is made of a stretchy, spandex-like material. Makes sense right? Why is it then that the immediate reaction by the female interviewer, and the women they interview, is one of utter disgust? The answer: in the modern Western world, logic, common sense, and yes even physics are shunned and ignored if the truth that these avenues yield happens to even slightly offend the fragile female ego.

How Did We Get Here?

So who or what are we to blame for this irrational, emotional response that has, to the detriment of us all, become the norm? Western women. When every single thin girl under the Western sun tells her obese friend "you go girl" or that they "look hot in that sexy outfit," they are reinforcing the ingrained dogma that no matter how unattractive a women appear, they must be told otherwise.

In reality, they are doing their overweight friend a disservice. By disingenuously flattering them, they are simply perpetuating her being okay with her weight problem,which down the road can and will lead to serious health issues, not to mention the inability to attract a quality mate. Beyond that, they are contributing to the continuing aesthetic decay of what was once a beautiful and virile western population. Combine this disingenuous female to female fawning with the unwritten law that the fragile egos of overweight women must be tip toed around, and you get this:

Another Man Bites The Dust

And this brings me back to my man Chip Wilson, no-bullshit CEO extraordinaire. Because of the enforced, ingrained social dogma that forces men to adhere to some blatantly illogical sensitivity standard, and to censor the truth should it be too “insulting”, his name and thus company will be tarnished by the liberal media. But fear not Chip, because intelligent males everywhere feel your pain, and we stand by you in your moment of tribulation. Though I will never purchase any of your overpriced yoga pants, I wholeheartedly support your right to rip off young, fit, bubble butt cuties everywhere.

The One Sure Way To Make A Girl Psychotic

December 1, 2013 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Half an hour after banging we're all showered up and sitting on Sally's couch. Sally's sprawled out, head on my lap, thoroughly engrossed with the reality show about weddings on the TV. I'm sitting there flicking my eyes every ten seconds to the seemingly frozen clock on the wall. Out of courtesy for the otherwise free sex I'm waiting a nearly intolerable hour before leaving. After only twenty minutes of reality television I already feel like a Vietnam vet sitting in my foxhole wishing night would come already and Charlie would just get it over with.

This look every time I hear Sharp Dressed Man

Like Manna from heaven, a commercial comes on three seconds before I snap my own neck. Before I can implement my brilliant idea to go sit in the washroom and pretend to take a twenty minute donk, Sally walks her fingers across my leg. I foolishly think she's still in the mood for friskiness so I put off the retreat to my washroom refuge.

"So when's our wedding already?" she asks.

In retrospect I can see that this was a clear shit test, even though Sally and I were bang buddies and had not gone on one date in the two months we had been messing around.

Without thinking, I jokingly and immediately answered, “Sorry babe, for this guy’s wedding only teenaged virgins need apply.”

I honestly can’t recall what all was said in the ensuing fracas. Five to ten minutes later I found myself standing in the doorway of Sally’s apartment, asking her sarcastically if she was really so stupid to think we were dating.

I said something along the lines of: “We met at the club! Do you think any guy would date some chick he banged before he knew her name?”

WHAP!

A spiked heel hit me dead center between the eyes. Sally had thrown a shoe at me and nailed a bullseye. I was more shocked then hurt – and that’s saying something since the heel hurt like hell. A few minutes before we had been sitting on the couch thinking our insignificant thoughts – then suddenly all was chaos and anger and frickin’ shoes.

Trigger warning

I felt like a kid from Columbine as I stood there, not really comprehending everything that happening. Seriously, when I look back at the argument Marilyn Manson’s The Nobodies begins playing in my head:

…while Michael Moore sappily narrates the whole thing.

For a very long time I had no idea what set Sally off so badly. I thought it was her realization that we weren’t dating and never would, or that she was just bored and wanted to live out a Taylor Swift song. A few days later she apologized and I accepted but needless to say we never ever ever ever got back together.

A different woman, Erin, was blatantly, annoyingly into me during University but I never found her attractive – at least, not nearly as attractive as the girls I was able to get. Even without my penial knighting ceremonies Erin still got banged aplenty by thirsty dudes. In our third year she got really drunk at a party and pulled me aside. She asked me, crying, why I never wanted to date her. Now despite my internet persona, for the most part I’m nice to girls in real life. Instead of telling her that I was out of her league, I answered with what I honestly thought was a rational response she could understand and appreciate:

"Erin, like, first year before I even met you or whatever you totally slept with three guys on our floor. Why would I date a chick like that?"

A tip for those guys who don't know it: never, ever, try to be rational with women. Especially overly drunk, recently dumped women surrounded by white knights and some of your former lays. Being persona non grata among some people you sort of like isn't fun…even if for the most part ~~they all~~ some apologize after learning the full story.

I know that feel Brazil bro

Looking back on these two events, and the other major fights I have caused with women, there is always one common theme: they only really erupted when I called out their sexual promiscuity, whether sometimes with sublime elegance or more often with a string of four letter words. Accusing a woman of being a slut, skank, whore or any of word for sexual deviant is an emotional Hiroshima for them. Even the tough talking proudsluts feel the sting of such accusations; notice how many girls in slut walks hide or mask their faces, or won't mention their source of pride to their parents and boyfriends. Usually if you're actually proud of something you don't have any trouble talking about it with your loved ones. Or what do I know; maybe these whores do have conversations like this at the supper table of today's modern 'family':

Slut "So guess what daddy? I totally sucked three dicks and got DP'd last weekend! By next month I should be able to take eleven inches!"

Dad "Aw sugar lumps that's great! Good for you! Someone definitely takes after their mommy."

Mom "It looks like we're all going to need a lot more Valtrex!"

Everyone laughs, cue Full House Theme.

Everywhere you look everywhere you go, there's a heart, a hand to hold ontooo

For all their bluster and rah rahing about being sexually liberated, women intrinsically know that them sleeping around with men – even if it's as little as four or five over a lifetime – degrades themselves. This is why women can only use euphemisms when describing their sex lives. They're not being used by a man who sees her solely as a series of holes for his pleasure; they're 'empowered'. They're not spreading their legs for random strangers who yank their hair, slap their butt so hard it leaves bruises and then drops a load of baby juice on their face; they're 'hooking up'. They're 'conquering' these men, even though their conquered foes immediately leave after they come (rightly not giving a squeaky fart about her orgasm) and will outright ignore their mighty vaginally equipped conquerors once any wrinkles on her appear and the inevitable sagging begins.

And really, if random sex is so great for woman how come the vast majority of them have to be drunk or high to go through with it?

I've said some bizarre things to women I've tired of banging just to see what I can get away with before they go away. I've been overtly racist with many (and found a lot of them to be sincerely racist themselves). I've told a few that they need to get back in the kitchen. I managed to convince one particularly bright bulb that historians proved the Holocaust was faked. I didn't even have any preamble. One night we were laying in bed and I straight up out of nowhere asked if she knew the Holocaust was fake. When she asked where all the bodies came from, I told her that the Allies dug up Germans that had been killed and then posed them. "Wow, that's awful," she said sincerely. "Totally," I agreed, unable to stop myself from guffawing. I also taught that one how to do a proper Nazi salute, with the heel clicks and everything. She loved it.

I had the same 'seriously' look on my face as that Nazi officer does

Yet it never failed; any mention of a chick's promiscuity always resulted in a fight. Whether said accidentally or with sincerity, if one implies a woman is a slut – even if it's warranted – watch out. I learned it the hard way.

A pal of mine made a bizarre choice and dated a noted whore. He probably heard ample rumours about her infidelity and rampaging cum bucketry but for whatever reason my buddy stood steadfast for six months while they dated. This guy had seen her, before they started dating, make out with other men at parties and often go home with them. One time she took off her shirt and gave out drunken lap dances in the middle of a soiree. It took him finally coming home and seeing her in the middle of being banged on his couch by another guy for him to call off the relationship. Eric, a different friend, and I were at Eric's place talking about it recently. His girlfriend Alisha was there as well.

"I seriously don't know how he put up with it," Eric said. I worded that. "I mean, I'd go crazy every time she was out of my sight. We all knew she was a slut. He knew she was a slut."

Alisha, normally a cool chick and not a slut herself, cleared her throat. Eric looked like he had just farted in the Queen's presence and quickly changed the subject. Alisha is not friends with the slut. Alisha is not a slut herself. Yet just mentioning a woman's sluttiness in front of his woman was enough to earn Eric a reprimand. Eric knows full well the black abyss that opens up whenever any woman's sexual practices are scrutinized.

For many women the topic of a woman's sexual deviancy ist verboten, regardless of their own sexual history or views on the subject. Why do you think we at Return Of Kings get so much hate for our articles which center around sluts, regardless of whether they're written for the purpose of Real Talk or satire?

There is a primeval part of women's lizard brains that flares up when it comes to female sexual promiscuity, especially if it's their own. They cannot handle allegations of whoredom even if everyone knows they're a skank. A Slane girl can blow a guy in front of a thousand people but the moment she gets called out for being a slut the masses will rush to protect her, lest that slut spotlight gets turned to illuminate their skankiness. Woman would rather jail men with false rape accusations then admit that they slept with them. I've seen girls reduced to tears by being called a slut – even when the accusations were false and levelled by whores. Women have straight up killed themselves because of being labelled a slut, regardless of whether or not the accused slutdom was true. The label was enough to destroy them.

I just noticed there hasn't been a picture for awhile so here's whatever this is

So gentlemen, save the atom bomb of sexual shame for an enemy that really deserves it. It's more effective then you think. Sure, the accused might roll her eyes at you or proudly agree that she is indeed just a sperm receptacle but I can guarantee that when she goes home she can't look in the mirror without feeling shame. You might be mad when your woman ruins dinner, but shouting, "YOU BURNT THE GRILL CHEESE YOU SLUT!" at her is probably going to make things a hell of a lot worse for both of you.

And with that Billy's out until January! So for all 7 of you who like my articles and the rest of you jerks, I hope your Noel is tres joyeux. And remember; drunk driving is an art and most of you ain't Picasso. Don't be that douche that dies during Christmas.

Why You Should Embrace Rejection

December 1, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Midnight. You spot a fine blonde thing in the corner of the bar – giggling with her friend.

Taking one last sip of your drink, you put one foot in front of the other and head over to say hi.

"Hey, I'm…" she cuts you off – "We have boyfriends – bye."

Welcome To Rejection

Rejection is common when it comes to game. And that's why it's so great. I love it.

Rejection is an essential part of life – it's essential to accomplishing anything worthwhile, at least. Whether it's at the bar, at an interview, or trying to sell something – you will get rejected. And this notion horrifies most people. It stops some dead in their tracks – paralyzing them for life.

After all, if the fear of rejection is enough to stop you from doing something, you may never approach a girl or have sex. You may never apply for your dream job. Or worse, you may never quit your miserable job to try something new – for fear that your plan will fail.

You will never leave your comfort zone. You will live a stagnant, boring life.

Game As Rejection Therapy

One of the best things about game, aside from getting girls, is that is offers a quick and efficient way to get rejected. A lot.

If you embrace game and head out to the bar, it is normal to approach 10-20+ girls a night. And unless you bring one home (or get a number, I suppose) – you will be rejected just as many times. The exception is, of course, if your fear of rejection keeps you from approaching or attempting to close. This is a heavy dose of rejection, especially if you go out 2-3 times a week.

What this does is powerful. It doesn't necessarily desensitize you from rejection as some will say (most still deal with some degree of approach anxiety even after years of gaming). Rather, it teaches you that you must face your fear of rejection to prosper. It teaches you the cycle of learning from rejection. It teaches you that even after you have almost perfected your skill, rejection will be a mandatory part of the process.

Why You Should Embrace Rejection

Because without failure, success would not be meaningful. If you went through life, and never failed at anything – how boring would life be?

This would mean that either you never tried anything outside of your comfort zone and died a depressed hermit – or that you were an unbelievable success at everything. But this doesn't happen. Even people like LeBron James, who the general public would never consider a failure, failed at many points along his journey. Most recently, by losing in the playoffs and NBA finals many times before getting the W. And that's what made it so special for him.

Game is the same. If you took home every girl you approached – that would be awesome, right? No, that would suck and you would find no gratification whatsoever in the process.

Without failure, success would not be meaningful.

Why Game Is Necessary (Part 3)

December 2, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

I've already written a couple of posts talking about the necessity of game, and for good reason. Whether it's preventing the maintenance/expression of absurd levels of neediness or combating gargantuan levels of insecurity and self-hate, game (and red-pill knowledge in general) has a valuable and positive impact on the lives of many men. Sites like ROK have a key role to play in spreading valuable lessons and making men more aware so as to help them avoid the misery and embarrassment often inherent to life without the red pill.

There's a more serious side to all of this, however. The internalization of the red pill and the lessons that come with it does more than just get guys romantic results and prevent embarrassment. It saves lives.

> Members of a Westminster family said Monday they are mourning the death of a 1-year-old girl who was shot by her father.
> Merrick McKoy, 22, allegedly shot his daughter to death after an argument with the child's mother at her home at 7030 Stuart St., according to a news release from Westminster police.
> McKoy also shot himself an unknown number of times and was taken to St. Anthony, police said. Police did not release an update on McKoy's condition.
> Kim Phanthavongsa told her family that Mc-Koy, her former boyfriend, shot their daughter Mia and then shot himself about 9 a.m.
> Phanthavongsa had a restraining order against McKoy, police said.

A young man falls in love with a woman and has a child with her. She decides to move on from him and he cannot cope, because she's his world. Like most beta males, he's invested everything he has emotionally into his relationship with one female, and now the child has compounded that investment.

He's never taken the red pill and doesn't understand anything about the need for self-improvement, the possibility of meeting other woman, or the fact that he has no hope of sparking this relationship again. So he keeps pushing until things get out of hand, forcing a restraining order. Eventually, he escalates toward more violence and takes himself and a child with him.

Meanwhile, in Japan…

> A 23-year-old man was arrested on Thursday at Hachijo Island after police suspect that he murdered a woman in Chiba Prefecture. 22-year-old Shiori Yuasa was stabbed with a kitchen knife on Wednesday at around 4:30 p.m. in the shopping district of Ichikawa. She was rushed to the hospital but was pronounced dead upon arrival.
> The investigation revealed that Oka [the perpetrator] used to date the victim and had an altercation with her last September when he tried to get back together with her. At that time, he called the police himself to let them know that they were arguing but they only gave him a verbal warning at the time. Yuasa then transferred houses together with her 3-year-old daughter and fiancée to avoid any further confrontations. But in late October, Oka was once again detained by police in Ichikawa for unruly behaviour. He is expected to be charged with murder as there are no other suspects in the crime.

Man meets young girl. Young girl decides to move on. A man who has taken and digested the red pill will understand that this young girl was not the only girl in the world. He'll understand that he can move on and find another girl (or girls) in time, and be happy. He doesn't stake the entirety of his life and future on his relationship with a single female. But Hayato Oka had never taken the red pill, and the price was Shiori Yuasa's life.

Meanwhile, in California…

> A Southern California man was convicted Friday of the murders of the father and sister of his ex-girlfriend and the attempted murder of her mother in a fiery attack that prosecutors say was an ill-conceived attempt to reunite the couple. Authorities say Murtaza killed the relatives of Shayona Dhanak, who was a college freshman in 2007, after she blamed her decision to end the couple's two-year relationship on her devout Hindu family's opposition to her dating a Muslim.
> Prosecutors say an obsessed Murtaza wanted to kill the family to eliminate them as an obstacle to the relationship and drive Shayona Dhanak back to his arms.

Another young man fell in love with another pretty young girl and, as is typical of beta males, made her the center of his life.

Her family rejected him and, eventually, so did she.

Men who've taken the red pill understand that such a thing would not be the end of the world. They understand that rejection happens for a variety of reasons (some less palatable than others) and is inevitable. They understand that, as men, they must get used to that rejection and learn to move on from it. Murtaza never took the red pill. As a result, he invested all that he had emotionally into his relationship with a single girl, and showed a willingness to destroy everything (his life, his friends' lives and the lives of her entire family) in order to get her back.

And in Baltimore…

> A police officer was apparently having a difficult time coping with the fact that his ex-girlfriend was moving on with her life. She and her new boyfriend–a beloved firefighter– had just come home from a Halloween party when they were killed. Hoffman and his new girlfriend, 26-year-old Marie Hartman, were gunned down inside his Glen Burnie home around 1:30 a.m. Sunday.

A red pill male not only understands how to deal with rejection, but accepts the fact that he cannot control female sexuality. He understands that women are not obligated to abide by the limits placed upon them in the minds of men who have put them up on massive pedestals and expect them to behave accordingly (chaste, like a princess awaiting her betrothed prince). Women will date and/or fuck who they want how and when they want, and he understands that there isn't much he can do about that except adapt to it and focus more on his own romantic life instead of hers.

This police officer had never taken the red pill. He couldn’t accept his ex-girlfriend’s progress following the end of their relationship. He couldn’t accept the fact that she’d decided to start fucking someone else (which she was perfectly within her rights to do, having broken up with him). She was HIS special princess, not Andrew Hoffman’s. She was supposed to save her sexuality for him—it belonged to HIM.

The result? Everyone dies.

Young, sad beta males who’ve failed to take the red pill and live their lives shrouded in blue-pill delusions are not just embarrassing: they’re deadly. The emotional turmoil stirred up by their blue-pill entitlement and insecurity not only threatens themselves, but all of those who surround them.

Game, and the digestion of red pill truths that come with it, is necessary because its alternatives, if left unchecked, can prove to be more than simply depressing. They can be fatal.

5 Reasons Why You Should Date A Nurse

December 2, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A girl's profession or job can say a lot about her. When you are casting about for dating prospects, we men need to be just as ruthless and mercenary as girls are. In this scary modern era of women getting high salaries for occupying useless paper-pushing jobs where they can torment people, it is refreshing to learn that there are occupations that can actually help us as men. Remember: the only person who cares about you is you. From my experience, girls who are nurses offer significant advantages for short or long term relationships. Let me count out five reasons…

1. Nurses have money

The health care and nursing professions are in significant demand these days and this demand is expected to grow in the years ahead. Even nurses who are just out of school can command significant incomes, and this is a good thing for men. Why? Because it's better to be with a girl who has money than with one who is broke. She can buy you things. Never turn down money or gifts from a girl. She can go dutch with you frequently when you go out, and generally feel better about her sense of security and well-being. Trust me on this: being around broke chicks is no fun. Nobody wants to be around a flatliner.

2. The sex is better

Nurses are comfortable with human anatomy. Nurses have seen it all. They are around naked bodies all day and are fascinated by them. A healthy interest in human anatomy is a precondition for good sexual performance. This translates into better sex for you. She'll know just how to stroke your prostate in that special way. She'll also tell you exactly which part of her genitalia is most receptive to stimulation. You won't get any squeamishness, whining, or half-stepping when you ask her to do new and unusual sex acts with you in bed.

3. Nurses work long hours

How is this an advantage for you? By working a real schedule, nurses have little energy to spend in destructive female pursuits like gossiping, scheming, or conniving. Idleness is the root of much evil when it comes to girls. They will want to be intimate and relaxed in their off-time, not spend it causing trouble, or trying to keep up with the Joneses. Another benefit of her working long hours is that you can get some time to yourself. It is clear to any guy who has been in short term or long term relationships that each person needs time to himself or herself. Too much contact can lower attraction, and it is a good thing to have time for yourself. Your woman should never be the master of your time.

4. Nurses have a brain

It takes some mental ability to pass all those nursing courses and the examinations necessary to become a nurse. I don't know about you, but I can't stomach a girl who is an idiot. I just can't. And there are many of them out there. If a girl is already a nurse, you know that she at least has some level of mental acuity. She's also displayed a certain level of discipline and dedication in tolerating the long hours, the arrogance of doctors, and the touch of hazing that goes with the medical profession. This translates into a specimen of womanhood who is not spoiled.

5. You get free medical advice

Getting free stuff is always great. Never turn down free things from the girl you're dating. Fall off your bike? Jam your finger in that pickup game with your friends? Don't know how to treat those flu symptoms? Just ask her. She'll tell you. Being around doctors, patients, and other nurses has exposed her to a huge range of diseases, afflictions, ailments, and accidents. In these days of pricey health care and dwindling access to good treatment, a man has to take advantage of the opportunities presented to him. And this means picking your nurse girlfriend's brain for every scrap of information on the ailment of your choice. Getting plugged in with a nurse has its advantages for your health, in more ways than one.

All in all, nurses have much to recommend themselves for. So, the next time you see a decent looking girl in scrubs on the bus or on the metro, make an effort to strike up a conversation. Don't be intimidated by the possible vague scent of iodine, or the stressed-out demeanor that you may see. Your choice of openers is huge, as you can pretty much ask her anything related to the field of medicine, and are bound to be able to get a decent conversation going. So get in there, have fun, and good luck. As always, we here at ROK welcome your stories and feedback.

7 Things I've Learned From Tuthmosis' Viral Article

December 2, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've already shared some of my thoughts about Tuthmosis' article both here on ROK and on my personal blog, but I wanted to offer some additional observations.

1. There are millions of people in the Western world who have identical beliefs

It's amazing how hundreds of hate comments coming our way seemed to be written by the same person. Even phrases were the same, such as "I don't believe this exists" and "Wow, really?" It's almost as if a good percentage of the population have been brainwashed to believe in the same thing even though they come from completely different backgrounds, even countries.

> Free speech is nothing more than an abstract concept until you face an angry mob that tries to curtail yours. Never take it for granted.
> — Roosh (@rooshv) November 20, 2013

2. Rage is a monetizable commodity

While I do a crappy job at monetizing this blog, I fully understand how playing with people's emotions is a great way to grab attention, something that advertisers greatly covet. Large media outlets comprehend this strategy and use it to make money. The only snag is that you can't duplicate rage incidents. Your viral machine has to be constantly innovating to find emotional buttons that have not yet been pressed.

3. Petitions don't work, but they serve as a useful coping mechanism for the aggrieved

Over 12,000 people signed a petition against ROK over at Change.org, with dozens of tweets sent by people who implored their followers to sign. If you're reading this now, the petitions have all utterly failed. If you estimate that it takes 20 seconds to sign a petition, 66 hours of human life were completely wasted on them, yet those who signed really believed that they were making a difference (one petitioner was glowingly interviewed by a Rhode Island newspaper). In other words, petitions are a release valve to make the powerless feel like they have power, which is why the White House allows them. It's better they waste their time signing a meaningless petition than actually taking action that could cause real harm to the state.

4. Virality and intellectualism are mutually exclusive

I had the misfortune to go through over 200 hate emails sent to ROK. More than 90% of them were rife with bad spelling, poor grammar, and incomprehensible sentence structure. I can count on my hands the number of emails that I believe were written by a self-aware individual who could clearly communicate their thoughts. If you want to write viral articles, you will not fail if you assume your target audience is dumb as rocks. In fact, the web site Buzzfeed actually has created a profitable business out of feeding content to stupid people in the form of animated gifs and child-like copy, becoming the internet's preeminent picture book. I feel that I should have to apologize to regular readers when the sheep herd come and defecate over the comments section after one of our articles go viral.

5. Women are not used to being judged… at all

And because of that, they simply don't have the tools to handle anything they don't agree with. They're even complimented when they make mistakes or show an abject lack of character. I think the adult female brain is capable of higher order thinking, but it's hard to see it in the childish emotional reactions of women claiming they cried because they read an article of ours that they didn't like. If they cry at an internet article, how are they going to cope with life? The answer: they're not. Society is failing women by not preparing them for having their beliefs or life choices challenged in any way.

6. Lists are here to stay

Personally, I'm able to write in a way that doesn't use lists, but with attention spans becoming as short as they are, I have to accept that it's the most effective way to give articles a chance of at least being skimmed. People have so many media options today that webmasters need to adopt the list format solely to compete.

7. Bandwidth is dirt cheap… until it’s not

I ran web sites back in the day when a gigabyte of bandwidth was $10. Now it’s $0.12. That’s not much until you’re serving close to 1000 gb a day because half a million people want to read your articles. Since we charge a set price for our monthly sponsorship, a viral episode ends up costing us additional money (an extra $500 for November). Forbes' "Most Powerful Women In The World" List Is Complete Horseshit

December 2, 2013 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Every year, Forbes releases semi meaningless lists ranking the richest and most powerful people. Of course a certain amount of it is down to PR, the most classic case being the king of narcissistic beta males Donald Trump, desperately phoning Forbes to bump himself up the list, (on the basis of the value of a New York high rise building that had leased the use of the Trump name, but he didn't actually own). I am sure people with real power and wealth couldn't care less about Forbes or their silly lists.

None the less Forbes Most Powerful Women list, makes for some hysterical reading. Excuse me while I roll around on the floor laughing before I continue. According to Forbes, Beyonce is the 17th most powerful woman in the world. I wouldn't put Jay-Z in the top 10,000 men myself, and I think Beyonce's position is a pretty sad indication as to the hopes and dreams of feminism. She's a great artist and all woman, but let's face it – not particularly powerful, and not even rich by fortune 500 standards.

Rolling up to the no#1 spot we have Angela Merkel the Chancellor of Germany whose party only just scraped the last election. She's presided over Germany's decline as it entangled itself in EU debts. Poor old Angela is still paying guilt laden reparations from WW2 – that's a woman's power for you right there. A well-organized industrial nation like Germany has no need to foot the bill for Greeks and Spanish, who'd rather sip a cappuccino than do an honest day's work. In effect, Germany is keeping their neighbors afloat lest they stop buying German products. I'll lend you money so you can buy my shit – doesn't make me powerful – it makes me stupid, you lazy and both of us broke.

No#2 The president of Brazil we can skip over, since Brazil is mired with so many social problems and poverty it's hard to consider that being president represents much of any real power. What's more, Dilma Rousseff has only been in power a couple of years, and has wormed her way in there as the previous president's chief of staff (think hand puppet for the last guy). She's also a socialist troll bound to cause more problems than she solves, so we can't possibly consider her as powerful in any real sense of the word.

America will look like this in another 10 years or so, politically and geographically:

No#3,4 and 5 we can also skim over. Gates' wife, Obama's wife and Clinton's wife. Sorry honey, fucking your way into power doesn't count, you actually have to do something real to validate yourself. Rubbing your pussy on the glass ceiling doesn't do it. The only thing we can say about these women is they have successfully pussy whipped and beta boy'd their husbands to no real advantage to themselves. When will women learn? If you drag your husband down, you just make yourself look bad. (Although Hilary did stand by her man and his BJs – good girl – she was sniffing for a Senate seat at the time. Anything for power isn't it ladies.)

No#6 caught my attention for two seconds, Sheryl Sandberg, the COO of facebook, but then I remembered what Zuckerberg's wife looks like. Facebook is consuming more blue pills than an EDM festival in Miami; Zuckerberg had to hire mommy kins to run his company for him. MILF Sheryl almost gets a 6….

… while Zuckyboy smooches with his 4. Now we know who wears the trousers in Facebook's board room. I also read recently that the younger generation is moving out of Facebook wholesale – what teenager wants to share a social site with their parents? Short Facebook stock, its IPO was a joke anyway… like!.

No#7 Christine Lagarde is some old lawyer hag from France who is President of the IMF. They bail out broken African nations and such. She wormed her way in there after the previous president was royally stitched up in some false rape charges. Sorry Christine you are not that powerful either.

No#8 Janet Napolitano is the head of Homeland Security who just bought 1.6 billion rounds of ammo. To put that in perspective, the military in Iraq used 6 million rounds per month. Her purchases mainly include military hollow point rounds that are expensive and useless for training on a range. She's also been stocking up on armored personnel carriers and other high end tactical kit. She's obviously getting ready for a civil war and since she looks more like a man I'd say she's pretty powerful. Only problem is that if all that kit goes into use, Janet won't have much of a country left to laud over, so I'd say Janet is more bluster than clout. (At least until the fascist take over of the USA is complete – then she'll be like a female version of Hermann Göring). Yikes. There is an alarming family? resemblance.

No#9 Sonia Gandhi. The president of India, a nation loaded with beta males if there ever was one, hardly counts as having achieved any real power, since she's also in place due to the fact that her husband was a much loved president of India. No one really takes India that seriously anyway. Nope – no real power here.

No# 10 Indra Nooyi is the President of Pepsi, the world's largest snack food maker. Since taking power in 2001, she's increased the company's profits by 72%, although that's largely been done by poisoning young children with sugary, salty garbage. Rather interestingly Irene Rosenfeld the CEO of Kraft Foods comes in at no #20. Kraft (originally a subsidiary of Philip Morris – Malboro anyone? – was spun off to prevent associations with big tobacco) is yet another peddler of edible marketing whose side effects include cancer, diabetes and obesity – love your work ladies. Janet and her cache of ammo is looking better by the minute. It seems that some women will do anything for a sniff of power – and even more to hang onto it. So much for maternal instincts.

No#11 Geun-hye Park is the president of South Korea, but last time I looked most of the power in that neck of the woods lies north of the border in the CIA sponsored axis of evil – an absolutely essential accessory to the war on terror, that keeps the whole military-industrial complex in business, although Janet seems to be taking on that role single-handed. Not much power in SK, sorry honey.

No#12 Ginni Rometty is the CEO of IBM overseeing the dive of the world's largest tech company into almost irrelevance.

No#13 Oprah – enough said.

No#14 Ursula Burns is the CEO of Xerox, the first women to take over a fortune 500 company from another woman. XRX's previous CEO Anne Mulcahy was running the show since 2001. A quick glance at their stock price tells you all you need to know. Xerox could well have been Apple, these guys invented the photocopier and the mouse. Even more interesting is both these women – as is the case for many other female CEOs, have worked their entire lives inside the ONE company. A classic case of unimaginative middle management worming its way to the top and spoiling a once innovative and risk taking corporation. Xerox helped end the cold war by inventing the photocopier as a spying device. Embassies loved them and the CIA was only too happy to assist with the install.

No#15 Meg Whitman ex CEO of Ebay, I already covered in a previous piece on Apple. Like some low life third world politician, she spent $144 million of her own money, trying to buy the governorship of California, but lost the election. Anything for a sniff at power, huh?

Finally no#16 Georgina Rinehart, who inherited wealth from her father Lang Hancock an Australian Iron Ore magnet. A cross between Janet Napolitano and Crocodile Dundee, Georgina is a true blue Aussie (Red Neck Hick in American speak).

No one takes her that seriously, although to her credit she is anything but a socialist, making statements such as, "If people wanted to have more money they should stop whingeing and do something to make more money – spend less time drinking or smoking and socialising, and more time working." Easy to say when daddy did all the hard yards – typical entitled woman coming out with such a crass statement.

That brings us around to the mighty Beyonce, a true example of female power. If more women would stick to singing and dancing (and breeding) we'd all be a lot better off. As Marlyn Monroe said: "A woman who wants to compete with a man has very little ambition."

Anyone less powerful than Beyonce is barely worth considering. Although I couldn't resist trolling down the list; more for the laughter and mirth it brought than any real educational purposes. The highlights include actresses Angelina Joile and Sofia Vergara at no# 37 and no#38, Steve Jobs wife at no#39, that true bastion of might and power Lady Gaga at no#45, Joyce Banda the president of the powerfully impoverished nation of Malawi at no#47, Ellen DeGeneres (is she a woman?) at no#51 and the awe inspiring Shakira at no#52.

It seems that women have come a long way in the last few decades and they certainly wield some real power on the planet. Watch out for the hand bags, stilettos and cleavage my boys. We're in real trouble.

As a final note, Obama has been booted out from top male spot by Putin. Perhaps it is time for a move to Russia. I hear the ~~women~~ hunting is great.

One Tip You Must Follow To Succeed At Anything

December 3, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

I walked into in the sparsely-adorned weight room and began my warmups. Using the empty bar to practice the best upper body exercise, I thrust the iron into the air enthusiastically so I could add weight and begin my actual routine. I put the bar down and was adding weights when I heard a mousey voice behind me:

> "You shouldn't lock out your elbows"
> Me: "What?"

I looked around to see a chubby girl in a "personal trainer" T-shirt glaring at me.

> Girl: "It's bad for your cartilage. You'll hurt yourself"

My inner monolgue was ready with several snide responses, but luckily I am well-socialized enough to hold my tongue in polite company when I have nothing to gain from the situation.

> Me: "Okay. Thanks. By the way, do you have a squat rack?"
> Girl: "What's that?"

Now, if this girl had even a remotely decent physique, I might have given her the benefit of the doubt and done a 10-second internet search on proper overhead press form. But, rightly or wrongly, I had developed my form from fit friends and books written by people who have actually achieved level of fitness that I respect. I wasn't about to take fitness advice from someone who hadn't lifted a weight or gone for a jog since the second Bush administration.

The idea that someone who didn't know what a squat rack was would be giving advice about weightlifting was especially laughable. I let her say her piece, and summarily dismissed her existence from my life. If you are setting out to accomplish anything that requires long, sustained effort, the one principle you must follow is:

Only take advice from those who have done what you want to do

"Bro science" is something we see lampooned on a daily basis. People trash "meatheads" and "gurus" and suggest that everyone avoid innovative or non-scientifically approved methods to achieve a goal. With large swaths of published experimental science now being revealed as non-reproducible, it is becoming clearer each day that peer-reviewed science has essentially devolved into academia-approved bro science. We are seeing results-based and evidence-based advice supplanted by credentialism and political correctness. No wonder everyone is fat, unhappy, poor and sick.

This principle may seem obvious, but it is astonishing at how many people fail to adhere to it. Take dating for example — the internet abounds with female dating coaches and advice columnists who presume to tell men how to attract and please women. None of them have ever done this themselves, and it's no coincidence that their advice is almost universally worthless.

Whether you want to get huge, write a book, travel the world, get a promotion, date hotter girls, or start a business, you must only take advice only from those who have accomplished what you want to do. Your mentorship and guidance must come from those who made mistakes along the way and lived to tell the tale. Anything else isn't worth the paper it's printed on.

This Weird Metaphor Brainwashes Men Into Becoming White Knights With Low Standards

December 3, 2013 | by JayTK | Link | Original Link

I saw a post on Facebook the other day. It stated:

> "Girls are like apples on trees. The best ones are at the top of the tree. The boys don't want to reach the good ones because they are afraid of falling and getting hurt. Instead, they just get the rotten apples from the ground that aren't as good, but are easier to reach. So the apples at the top think something is wrong with them when in reality, they are amazing. They just have to wait for the right boy to come along, the one who's brave enough to climb all the way to the top of the tree."

I wouldn't bring this up except that I've been seeing this post everywhere for about a year now, and have never really paid much attention to it until now. At first, I found the post corny, but sweet in a you-go-girl sort of way. But now that I read it over again, I've noticed some strange things about its message/

"The best ones at the top of the tree" is misleading.

This implies that high maintenance girls, or girls who lead boys on or play hard-to-get, are somehow the "best" girls. It also implies that girls who do not perform these behaviors are somehow inferior, slutty, or "rotten," as the post says, which is very demeaning to the outgoing and gregarious women of the world.

“So the apples at the top think something is wrong with them, when in reality, they are amazing” can be taken the wrong way.

A girl who is constantly ignored by boys could think something is wrong with her, yes, and she very well could be an amazing person. That much is true. But I ask you to reread point #1. This sentence could also mean that being “at the top of the tree” (and performing the same behaviors I mentioned) somehow makes you “amazing.” It does not: it makes you a tease.

“They just have to wait for… — …the one who’s brave enough to climb all the way to the top of the tree” is by far the most troubling statement of the bunch.

On the surface, this reads like a sweet ending to an encouraging message, but read deeper. Notice that these girls, or “apples,” are not encouraged to go out and find these “brave” boys. Instead, they are instructed to “wait for the right boy to come along, the one who’s brave enough to climb all the way to the top of the tree.” These girls are openly being told not to put any effort into their relationships and romances. They are being told that they should be content to sit around and wait for a boy willing or desperate enough to work through whatever barriers these girls put up (described in point #1) in order to reach them.

This is equally misleading to boys as well. Taken at face value, this last sentence tells boys that if they are romancing a girl and getting nowhere, that means she is an “amazing apple” and they simply aren’t trying hard enough. More likely than not, this particular girl is simply not interested and the poor boy is wasting his time. But now he feels like if he doesn’t keep trying, he is not “brave.”

And so, in light of this, allow me to offer a rebuttal: these boys—these “brave” white knights of tall courage and taller ladder—do not really exist. The “apple metaphor” puts high-maintenance, low-quality, and emotionally unstable women on a pedestal and holds any men who show interest in them to an inappropriately high standard. This is what the society wants to hold up as the ideal. The only males who can even hope to measure up, of course, are white knights, betas, and other clingers-on who have both the time and desperation to slavishly devote inordinate amounts of attention to these high-minded females, and will most likely be friend-zoned anyway for the first mopey bad boy that comes their way.

So yes, maybe we are now afraid of falling, because we have needlessly injured ourselves going for the high apples. Maybe we don’t always pay a lot of attention to the “good ones” at the top of the tree to wisely go after more low-maintenance girls, the fallen fruit, your so-called “rotten apples,” because they meet us halfway. If the “amazing apples” of the world put effort into making themselves a little more accessible, I imagine men might start passing up the “rotten apples” in favor of their purportedly riper fruit. And who knows—I may even invest in a ladder myself.

HBO’s “Girls” Heralds The Cultural Decline Of American Women

December 4, 2013 | by Falstaff | Link | Original Link

Imagine a masterful artist painting a picture of something horribly ugly, perhaps a nude Oprah, or two Chihuahuas fucking. No matter how well executed the painting, it would be difficult to look at because of the ugliness of the subject matter. That analogy sums up the HBO television show “Girls.” While the show perceptively portrays the millennial generation and the modern Western woman, it is painful to see in its full repulsiveness. If I ever again feel the need to explain why I hate American females, I will tell them to watch the first two episodes of this show.

To faithfully observe the once great country of America descends into complete cultural and economic oblivion, I have dutifully resolved to watch this show. It created a buzz when it first aired in Spring 2012 because of the “gritty” writing, as well as garnering praise from some feminists because it showed women “making mistakes without judgement.” Apparently the overwhelming shabbiness of the characters’ personalities and decisions was lost on them. Other feminists panned the show for its focus on sex, but methinks they doth protest too much; I suspect they were uncomfortable with the accurate picture it rendered of the their perverse philosophy’s logical conclusion.

Lena Dunham, who wrote the show and stars as the main character says she “reveres Sex and the City as much as anyone of my generation” and it shows through her character’s actions. “Girls” is very insightful and relevant; it could well be used as a case study when future historians dissect America’s collapse. The red pill man will find himself nodding with [Jack’s] complete lack of surprise as “Girls” delivers situation after situation to perfectly illustrate what he already knew from the manosphere.

The Premise

“Girls” follows the lives of four women in their twenties in New York City, “busy trying to become who they are.” They are well described as girls in some ways, as they lack maturity, but in other ways it falls short. While they have the negative attributes we associate with young children, like selfishness and emotional volatility, they have none of the innocence that can be so endearing.

Hannah

The show’s protagonist is Hannah, a neurotic, self-loathing, twenty five year old who aspires to be a writer. Although she claims to be working on a series of “personal essays” for a book, she has only written a few pages in the several years since she graduated college. Confused about what she wants to do with her life, she exists off the allowance her parents give her while initially refusing to take a service job that would be beneath her.

In the first episode, her parents cut her off financially. The entitled Hannah throws a tantrum, but her parents hold firm. If only that was realistic! Most of today’s “helicopter” parents wouldn’t dream of doing that. Hannah is conscious of being overweight, even though her BFF tries to persuade her otherwise in the insincere manner that girls use to reassure each other. She is covered with ugly tattoos of illustrations from children’s books. When her boyfriend asks about them, she says that she got them in high school because she gained weight and “felt out of control of her body.” Fat acceptance is a theme in the show, with many shots of Hannah’s body, and scenes of the girls consuming high calorie snacks as a form of therapy or for no reason at all.

Hannah's love interest is Adam, who has a funny looking face, a weird way of talking, and strange mannerisms in general with strange sexual tastes to match. Despite all of this, Adam is an excellent example of how game so often trumps any other factor. He doesn't ask Hannah about her problems, and ignores her for weeks following a fuck session. He takes whatever he wants from Hannah sexually, with the result that Hannah can't get enough of him. Of course Adam uses Hannah, but she selfishly objectifies him as well. His game is so good that I wondered why he even bothered with the very homely Hannah, but I assume he's one of those players who values quantity above quality.

In one episode, Hannah receives a late night dick picture text from him, and then a quick follow up text that reads, "sorry that wasn't for you." Clearly he has a harem, and Hannah is just one of many. In a twist that is improbable but not impossible, he becomes more beta towards the end of the first season as he commits to the ugly and annoying Hannah. Predictably, Hannah starts to lose interest in him.

Marnie

Hanna lives with her best friend Marnie in Brooklyn. Despite ostensibly being BFFs, they are contemptuous of each other behind each others backs. She has a textbook beta boyfriend named Charlie whom she (needless to say) despises. Marnie dumps Charlie, but then becomes obsessed with him when he gets a new, more pleasant girlfriend. Now that Charlie has "hand" over her, he becomes tantalizingly close to being an alpha, but can't quite realize his potential. A guy like Charlie is a prime candidate for either finding his way to the manosphere and going on to better things or organically maturing into alphadom.

Shoshanna

Shoshanna is a Jewish American Princess who is high strung and shy. Her part in the show is small, serving mainly as comic relief. She is determined to lose her virginity but is thwarted by her awkwardness and naïveté. Shoshanna wants to be a slut, but hasn't figured out how just yet, as of the first season.

Jessa

Jessa is a British girl and is Shoshanna's cousin. She's traveling the world at random (that piece of information should have your slut sensor going crazy) and is staying in New York City temporarily. In one outburst, she says that she wants to have many biracial children by a variety of men. She is supposed to be a seductress, but ends up as the most repulsive character.

Early on, she finds she is pregnant by a fellow traveller from Europe, and schedules an appointment for an abortion. She misses the appointment because she is busy banging a random boy who wanders into the bar where she is getting her pre-abortion White Russian. At one point, a former lover shows up in New York City and declares his love for her. She takes him back to the apartment she shares with Shoshanna and lets him have sex with her from behind as she hangs out the window screaming. As soon as they finish, she scorns him and he slinks off in shame. "I cannot be smote! I am unsmotable!" she exclaims to Shoshanna afterwards. Seeing her strut around the streets of New York with her muffin top looking for the next sexual adventure is sickening, but entirely realistic.

There are broader themes in the show that apply to the millennial generation, like dealing with self absorption, narcissism, and the overall shabbiness of so many of my peers. One cringes at their pettiness as they deal with their first world problems. The observer of America's latter days will find all of this interesting as well, but the exposé of feminism's false promises are where the show truly excels (whether these astute observations of feminism's outcomes, the millennial generation, etc. are intentional I am unsure). The characters crave authenticity, but they are already authentic pieces of shit.

There were times my stomach churned as I watched the first season of "Girls," much as it does during my travels through the American wastelands. The truth is often painful to see, and this show tells it incisively. I encourage red pill men who take an active interest in fighting feminism to watch the first two or three episodes of this show. Anything more than that would be too painful, as it reflects American reality all too well. During Jessa's surprise wedding, Shoshanna blurts out, "Everyone is a dumb whore!" Truer words were never spoken.

Give Her Tingles, Not Torture: Erica's Story

December 4, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Alex

Erica was tired. She had spent all week working on a new project for her company and thought she'd treat herself to a quick drink after work before meeting the girls for dinner.

She stepped inside Taco Tinder, a new Mexican restaurant by her work and sat down at the bar. She ordered her favorite drink — an organic agave margarita. As she took a sip, she pulled out her phone and started texting her friends. Not out of genuine care or concern about their lives, of course, but as a means to pass the time while enjoying her refreshingly sugar-based drink.

"Excuse me…is this seat taken?" Erica looked up and saw a soft-bodied man in a button down untucked striped shirt, white undershirt, and slightly saggy jeans pointing to the chair next to her. Erica immediately guessed to herself that he was a midlevel employee at some company nearby. His haircut reminded her of the 90s television shows she had watched as a kid. He had some scruff on his face. "How lazy, he can't even be bothered to shave," she thought.

"No" Erica mumbled without keeping eye contact for too long. Alex asked her name, prompting Erica's disappointment in realizing that she now has to engage this guy in conversation when she would much rather be messaging people on Facebook or hearing about her friend's date last night via text, despite the fact that she was going to meet them for dinner in an hour.

"I'm Erica" she responded as she recrossed her legs to slightly face away from Alex. Alex inquired of Erica's drink as he leaned in and smiled eagerly awaiting an answer. "Ya a margarita," Erica dismissively retorted as she kept pushing the home button on her iPhone 5s to see if she received any notifications or texts. They chatted on and off for the next few minutes, Erica barely paying attention and continually hoping for a call, text or any vibration from her iPhone to validate an excuse to end the conversation, even if temporarily. Finally, a text from Meghan. "About time…," Erica, now relieved, mouthed silently. "Sorry Alex, I have to take this." She turned away from him and furiously texted Meghan for the next five minutes.

When she turned back, Alex was sitting there just staring at her way. She immediately felt creeped out by his stare. She saw him finishing his drink and dreaded what he was going to say next, because she knew he was going to ask her out or something along those lines. "I have to get going, but how about we exchange numbers and catch up another time?" There it was, the offer she was hoping wouldn't come. "Awww that's so sweet, but I'm actually seeing someone," Erica responded with a bare attempt at sincerity. The truth was she was seeing some guy, a guy she had just been sleeping with here and there.

Alex closed out his credit card and walked away. As Erica finished the last sip of her drink, she sat back in her seat and sighed to herself "What luck…of all the guys in the world and he came up to talk to me…"

Tom

Erica was tired. She had spent all week working on a new project for her company and thought she'd treat herself to a quick drink after work before meeting the girls for dinner.

She stepped inside Taco Tinder, a new Mexican restaurant by her work and sat down at the bar. She ordered her favorite drink — an organic agave margarita. As she took a sip, she pulled out her phone and started texting her friends. Not out of genuine care or concern about their lives but as a means to pass the time while enjoying her refreshingly sugar-based drink.

"Excuse me…is this seat taken?" Erica looked up and saw a fit man in a suit, white dress shirt with no tie, all custom fit, pointing to the chair next to her. Erica immediately guessed to herself that he was an executive, actor or had some other exciting job. His haircut reminded her of Ryan Gosling from the Cosmo magazine she had glanced at that morning. He had some scruff on his face. "How sexy, he doesn't even want to be bothered to shave," she thought.

"No, not at all," Erica exclaimed while fumbling nervously to move the chair back for him. Tom asked her name, prompting Erica's excitement…what better way to pass the time than being able to engage this guy in conversation. She can hear all about her friends later when she meets them for dinner in an hour.

"Erica" she responded as she immediately swung around to face directly at Tom. Tom inquired of Erica's drink as he leaned back and smiled curiously awaiting an answer. "It is a margarita! How did you know!?" Erica stated as she picked up the drink and offered him a sip. They chatted on and off for the next few minutes, Erica completely engrossed in the conversation. Her phone buzzed, a text from Meghan. “Bitch! What does she want…” Erica mouthed silently as she threw her phone in her purse. “Sorry Tom, let me handle this real quick.” She turned away from him and furiously texted Meghan not to text her back as she was busy.

When she turned back, Tom was sitting there just staring at her way. She immediately felt flustered by his stare. She had butterflies in her stomach thinking about what he was going to say next, because she wished he would ask her out or anything along those lines. “I have to get going, but how about we exchange numbers and catch up another time?” There it was, the offer she was hoping was coming. “Sure!” Erica responded with bare attempt at hiding her excitement. The truth was she was seeing some guy, a guy she had just been sleeping with here and there. Oh well.

Tom paid cash and walked away. As Erica finished the last sip of her drink, she readjusted herself in the seat to quell some of the tingles, and smiled to herself “What luck! Of all the girls in the bar and he came up to talk to me…”

The 7 Prettiest Women In The Democratic Party

December 4, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

It is indisputably true that women in the Republican Party are significantly more attractive and more feminine than their counterparts in the Democratic Party. Considering that the Democratic Party is the home of feminism, it makes sense that women who embrace the choice of androgyny feel right at home in the party.

Democratic women — by and large — believe instituting a reign of androgyny will end sexism. Not only are they wrong about that approach, but they also seem to think that men and women are carved out for the same roles. They seem to think ending sexism rests in governmental intervention and deconstruction of "gender."

Democratic approaches ignore the real issue — that women still think of themselves as inferior to men. That is why they spend so much time thinking about male privilege. In their mind, if they were a man, their problems would go away. In 2013, they don't realize that the only thing that holds a woman back is herself. No amount of government intervention can convince a woman to truly want to change. Furthermore, men and women are different biologically. God or evolution didn't give women ovaries so they could slave away in a cubicle. No, it is because women are designed to give birth and care for children. Everything else in the human experience for women is secondary.

Why should we even consider their ideological opinions? They take no strong stands, spearhead no new policies, expand no boundaries of political debate. They are followers of the supreme order. Just like their personal lives, their political lives are constructed around safe decisions cloaked as brave ones because they are terrified of losing social approval. Now without further ado, the seven ugliest female Democratic politicians:

Tammy Baldwin

Tammy Baldwin is a Senator from Wisconsin. She is famous for being one of the most liberal members of Congress, wholeheartedly supporting ridiculous ideas such a single-payer healthcare system and increasing police authority in addressing the already over-addressed issue of male domestic violence against women.

In true female form, she reinforces female inferiority by treating women as a special class of victims that need incredibly high levels of governmental intervention to save them from their own choices. She routinely votes against resolutions honoring the victims of 9/11. She is also famous for being a lesbian. She is the first gay member of the US Senate and, as such, she wastes her time complaining about the need to for governmental sanctioning of gay relationships. Legalize love and all that ridiculous rot. Unexpectedly, she left her "~~life~~ partner" in 2010 and is currently looking for a new box to munch.

Claire McCaskill

This warhammer is a Senator from Missouri. Yes, the state in which Todd Akin was running for Senate, in which he uttered a phrase that Democrats used to troll the nation and ensure Osama's reelection. McCaskill went to the University of Missouri, a mediocre law school that regularly produces lawyers of middling competence that would impress Roman Hruska. She ranks as a moderate Democrat, but her lockstep movement with major Democratic initiatives, such as Obamacare, betrays her true ideological feelings. She has been embroiled in scandals in which she used taxpayer dollars to fly her family from St. Louis to D.C. As if her looks were not offensive enough.

Ann McLane Kuster

Kunter is the freshman U.S. Representative from New Hampshire. Apparently all those voters fleeing the monstrosity that is Massachusetts politics take their voting preferences with them, not realizing it is their big government voting patterns that are the problem. She is minorly famous for snapping on Americans, telling them they need to have patience about Obamacare. You know, be patient about Obama's presidency-defining initiative that affects every single American. Be patient, government bureaucrats have only been working on this project for multiple years.

Elizabeth Warren

Elizabeth Warren is yet another liberal Senator from Massachusetts. She came to national prominence as a special advisor for Obama's Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. She wouldn't have made this list if she had stayed a Republican, but she turned to the Democrat party, as she felt that strong governmental intervention into the marketplace is what is healthiest for a free market.

She defeated the charismatic and much more qualified Scott Brown in 2012. She is regarded as a serious thinker, but she chaired the TARP implementation, supports merely only lowering student loan interest rates and supports Obamacare. For all of her professed worry over the middle class and the poor, her career shows a woman supremely interested in upholding the system she claims supports inequality and discrimination. Imagine that — the powers that be are using women for maintaining what feminists would term the "patriarchy." Genius.

Janet Napolitano

2/10 would not bang.

Debbie Stabenow

Stabenow is a Senator from Michigan. She is famous for….nothing. She is a completely lock-step Democrat, with absolutely zero personal charm or unique views. She represents the modern female: a robot, an automaton who simply just does what she is told. She is known for her insistence on a “Fairness Doctrine.” The “Fairness Doctrine” refers to a US policy that required those who hold public broadcasting licenses to address important social issues and present them in fair, balanced ways. Imagine that! Liberals would have to stop trolling America with their insistence that everybody in America (read: white males) hate them.

Somebody might have to be called up to address the narcissism in that. Further, imagine a world in which feminists would have to present fair and balanced arguments. I don't think feminism could survive with a Fairness Doctrine. Of course, Stabenow doesn't know that. She just does what she is told.

Maxine Waters

Maxine Waters is a long-time US Congressman from California. Just look at the picture. Those frown lines can only belong a perpetual victim, a self-possessed woman who thinks everybody (read: white males) are out to get her. She is a long-time race baiter who is supremely interested in the story of Maxine Waters as told by Maxine Waters. She has a long list of inflammatory quotes that she gets a pass for because she is a woman, not because she is black. A black man would not be able to run their mouth like this battleax does.

This is by no means a conclusive list, but it's indisputable that ugly and disgusting women are drawn to the Democratic Party like the plague.

The Verse Of The Lizard King: An Analysis Of Jim Morrison's Work

December 4, 2013 | by Thomas More | Link | Original Link

Most have heard of the legendary musical group The Doors and their lead singer/front man Jim Morrison, who tragically died in Paris in 1971. What many do not remember is that Morrison had numerous problems to contend with during his short life. Among them were issues with his father, drug and alcohol abuse, and problems with people and the idea of fame in general.

Who Is Jim Morrison?

Jim Morrison was born James Douglas Morrison, December 8, 1943 in Melbourne, Florida USA, the son of Clara Virginia (née Clarke) and future Rear Admiral George Stephen Morrison. According to Wikipedia, early in his life he was inspired by the writings of philosophers and poets. He was influenced by Friedrich Nietzsche, whose views on aesthetics, morality, and the Apollonian and Dionysian duality would appear in his conversation, poetry and songs. He read Plutarch's "Lives of the Noble Greeks and Romans" and also read the works of the French Symbolist poet Arthur Rimbaud, whose style would later influence the form of his short prose poems. He was influenced by Jack Kerouac, Allen Ginsberg, Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Charles Baudelaire, Molière, Franz Kafka, Honoré de Balzac and Jean Cocteau, along with most of the French existentialist philosophers.

Morrison lived a brief life. Here is a man who was at the top of the popular music scene at the time, and had all the fame and all the chicks he could want, but still found his muse not in being a rock star, but rather in poetry. He aspired to write and get published, but despite his popularity as a musician he was at a loss to find a publisher who would take him seriously enough as a poet and put his work out there.

He finally decided to self-published his poems, and of course had to do so the old-fashioned way as this was decades before print-on-demand technology, ePub, and Kindle. His first collection of work was The Lords / Notes on Vision and The New Creatures. The Lords consists primarily of brief descriptions of places, people, events, and Morrison's thoughts on cinema. The New Creatures verses are more poetic in structure, feel, and appearance. These two books were later combined into a single volume titled The Lords and The New Creatures. From what I understand, the first self-published version was a limited run of about 100 copies. They were primarily given as gifts to friends and colleagues and anyone who might have potential connections to a publisher.

The Lost Writings of Jim Morrison Volume I is entitled "Wilderness," and upon its release in 1988, became an instant New York Times Bestseller. Volume II, "The American Night," released in 1990, also had success. Morrison recorded his own poetry in a professional sound studio on two separate occasions. The first was in March of 1969 in Los Angeles and the second was in 1970.

It was in the summer of 1971 when Jim Morrison went to Paris to chill out, take a break from his music celebrity-dom in America, as well as to devote himself to writing his poetry. Some suspected that he was also evading possible jail time in the States, where he was found guilty of indecent exposure during a Doors concert. Despite his improved physical appearance, Morrison was drinking heavily and his years of the party lifestyle were rapidly catching up with him. Late in the evening of July 2nd, while spending time with his girlfriend Jim tried a shot of heroin on top of all the alcohol he had already consumed during the day. Shortly after he prepared a bath for himself, and it was very early in the morning on July 3rd when he eventually drifted off to unconsciousness and passed away.

To many people Jim Morrison's poetry is dribble. Even his first wife stated in an interview that she felt as a poet he was a better song writer. To many others, Morrison's poems are absolutely brilliant.

What makes good poetry and art?

Is Jim Morrison's poetry good? Does the creator of any work of art have to die tragically in order to become famous or to have any kind of lasting impact?

When one grows up stateside and studies poetry, names such as Robert Frost, Wallace Stevens, Robert Lowell, and Walt Whitman come to mind. The notable differences between these the famous classic poets and Jim Morrison was that the former were around much longer to evolve their art.

For those who think Morrison's poems were a bit sophomoric, was there enough indication that he could he have evolved sufficiently to join the ranks of the greats in the poetry arena? The art of poetry is a tricky one, so let's look the other direction: did not Frost, Stevens, Lowell and Whitman not have their bad periods early on in their careers? And if Morrison had lived a longer life, and stayed away from the booze and drugs, could he not have evolved into what experts might consider a great poet?

Morrison's involvement with The Doors

The Doors was way before my time, but while I was in high school there was a small niche crowd that worshiped the Doors and Morrison. And Morrison's self-read poetry was among their discography. I wondered what exactly it was that they liked so much about Morrison? Was it the music? Morrison's poetry? Or quite possibly his shooting star, short lived life? One of the better-known biographies about Morrison and the Doors is "No One Here Gets Out Alive" by Jerry Hopkins and Danny Sugarman. In perusing the book and reading some of the reviews, I stumbled across one interesting insight on hero worship vs. worship of art:

> It must be known that a derangement of the senses is not rational. Too much literature and film has glorified Morrison's drug and alcohol abuse causing grotesque behavior as some sort of philosophy of life and inner genius. The persons responsible for the literature and film really have used calculated techniques to sell products. Hero worship has shown to be a major selling point of works related to the Doors and Morrison.
> For youngsters in high school or younger it is not difficult to idolize this skewed portrait of Morrison, while older and more mature fans may very well grow to hate the man for what he has been portrayed as. What matters most about Morrison is his art. He was an intelligent and unique person as well, but his flaws need to be represented as what they were, not as his lasting legacy. It is my opinion that his drug use often got in the way of the good aspects of his personality, creating a deranged and pathetic figure.
> He also, (his drug abuse could have contributed), did not face up enough to the numerous difficulties that he faced in life (his parents old fashioned views, film school trendy half-wits slamming his work, and troubles with the law), and this may be what hurt him in the end. These difficulties have to be shown for what they were, and then the world will be able to more fully appreciate the aspects of what made Morrison the artist he was. If mainstream works of bloated literature and film continue to romanticize about the worst aspects of Morrison, he and the rest of the Doors will never be appreciated in the ways they should be. I hope some day a person will go through the trouble of writing a critical but always thoughtful work on the band, and Morrison.

Even if Jim Morrison's poetry may fail to hit the mark for experts, I cannot help but sense that there was something very real in his writings. I suspect that with Morrison, the soul was there. You decide. I have to say that I do find it interesting how contemporary music lyrics and what constitutes serious poetry share, to a certain extent, a common thread with each other in popular culture.

Below are just a few audio recordings of Jim Morrison's poems, recited by the author himself. The last video clip at the bottom of the post is what I think is a good documentary (running time approximately 20 minutes) about Jim Morrison and The Doors, given by the group's keyboardist, and arguably Morrison's best friend, Ray Manzarek. This is an interesting insight to not just Ray, Jim and the Doors, but also a brief historical look at Venice California at that time.

Under Waterfall

American prayer

Lament

And finally, the documentary from Ray Manzarek:

From an ontological perspective it would have been intriguing to observe the zeitgeist of the years between the post beatniks / pre-hippie era. Times can and do change. Starting at the 11:50 time marker in the documentary, Ray is reminiscing about the past when he and Morrison were just starting out as musicians. As I notice his expression on his face as he talks about those times, one gets the impression, that in life, it is not the destination that counts, but rather the journey. Even though he had become well-established in his career when he produced this mini documentary, it is clear that those days of struggling where among the happiest for Manzarek. Perhaps for Morrison as well.

Fuck Excuses, Get Laid

December 5, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Excuses. What a shitty word that is. I despise it. It is the enemy of our dreams, our goals and the poison of our ambition. Excuses have set me back and have taken precious time from me that I will never recover.

Why do we make excuses?

Because we are weak? Because we are afraid? Because we actually fear success?

Excuses are comforting. They provide a detour from the ‘hard’ path and an outlet to explain why we haven’t made progress with our respective goals.

I’m done with excuses. Will you join me in saying a hearty ‘Fuck You’ to excuses?

One of the main questions I get regarding game is this: “Is there a shortcut to learning Game? Do I really need to put in the time to become great with women, or can I just read a book or take a course?”

The answer is, of course not. There is nothing that replaces you getting out there and experiencing rejection and success on your own. Guys like Roosh and I, can provide you tools in your journey, but make no mistake, you MUST put in the work to get the results you want.

Have you ever heard the guy who talks like this about meeting girls, “She’s too hot, she’s too ugly, she’s not into short guys, she only dates jocks”, etc? Maybe you’re that guy. Always having an excuse in order to avoid developing your game and in the process SHORTCHANGING your life.

If this is you, it’s time to say “Fuck Excuses, I’m getting laid”. Commit to the journey, because it WILL be a journey. Enjoy the journey, the experiences and the highs and lows that you will encounter, because the journey is where the reward is hidden.

In a perfect world, we would all have $100 million in the bank, have model good looks and be born into royalty, but that's not the way it is. Life is unfucking fair. Realize that and embrace it NOW so you don't waste time on what you cannot control and instead. Focus on what you can control.

Every one of us, in our own way has strengths and talents. How do you make them shine? How do you make money from your talents? What can you start doing today, utilizing the positive that will make your tomorrow better?

I know how it feels to be broken emotionally, bankrupted financially and depressed to the point of suicidal. It fucking sucks and if you're experiencing any of those, then know this: I can relate and things will get better, but only IF you pull yourself up by the bootstraps and tough it out.

During times like this, it can seem like it's impossible to have any game at all with girls, but it is possible. I've gotten laid when living in a car, so trust me, If I can, you can too. Maybe your focus will be on getting back on your feet primarily, and it should be, but don't forget to have some fun and get your dick wet as well.

Start today, fuck the excuses and decide no matter what, you're going to become great with women.

It'll change your life for the better. I know, because it changed mine.

The One Word A Man Should Never Use

December 5, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

You may have noticed feminists use the word ‘gender’ instead of the word ‘sex.’ They say ‘transgender’ instead of ‘transsexual,’ ‘transvestite,’ ‘hermaphrodite,’ or ‘misfit.’ ‘Gendered identity.’ ‘Gender roles.’ ‘Gender queer.’ Up until the middle of the 20th century, the word gender was rarely used. Except in occasional casual use, its use was limited to grammar – to say whether a word was feminine or masculine for instance. In many languages, such as French and Portuguese, a word has a masculine or feminine form – and the speaker must know which one to use to speak properly. In English, the distinction rarely matters – only a few words are gendered, like aviatrix and waitress, senatrix and mayoress. And nowadays, most such words are obscure and archaic.

A Brief History

Recently, gender has come to mean a lot more than a matter of grammar. It wasn’t always so. In a journal article, David Haig analyzes the rise of the use of gender, and finds that its use has grown dramatically. It is more prevalent now than its rival, ‘sex.’ Haig credits the theorist John Money with minting this new meaning of gender. Money wrote in 1955:

> The term gender role is used to signify all those things that a person says or does to disclose himself or herself as having the status of boy or man, girl or woman, respectively. It includes, but is not restricted to, sexuality in the sense of > eroticism.

Fig. 2. Proportion of titles in the Science Citation Index containing the word sex and proportion containing the word gender.

This meaning of gender didn't become prevalent until the 1980's, where it was widely adopted by feminists and eventually the greater academic community. Haig mentions how in 1993, the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) required that all new drug applications had to include studies of 'gender differences.' Of course this mangles the meaning that Money coined and feminists adopted – the FDA was concerned with differences between the sexes. English speakers the world round went on to make the same mistake, and now use gender when they mean biological sex – usually out of prudishness or ignorance.

The Need For A New Word

You wouldn’t eat a potato like you would an apple – potatoes must be steamed, boiled, baked or otherwise prepared, while an apple doesn’t. Some would argue that an apple and a potato should always be treated the same, that an apple and a potato are in fact identical, and it’s only our imagination which says otherwise. These people are called feminists.

Feminism is the belief that men and women should have political, economic and social equality. Before feminism, people believed that men and women are different, and so they should have different roles, different rights, and different duties.

To change the role of men and women, feminists argued that these different roles were based on imaginary or imposed differences – that women were every bit the same as men in all the ways that mattered. It was only because society imposed behaviors on men and women that the sexes seemed different.

The feminist had to claim that these differences were not biologically rooted – if they were, the feminist project would sink under the weight of human nature. The feminist had to deny that observed differences between men and women were biological – instead, they were the fruit of a society that arbitrarily divided the sexes into different roles.

Feminists & Sex

But the word sex was too tied up with biology. Just as they would assert that differences between men and women were purely environmental, the immutable overtone of ‘sex’ was damning them. It implied those sexual differences were permanent. They couldn’t say ‘sex’ without undermining their own argument. Your genitalia were happenstance – it was your gender that mattered. Your identity, your interests, your comportment – those were all things you chose or were imprinted upon you by your environment – it had nothing to do with your biological sex. That say, women are more expensive to medically insure than men has nothing to do with the fact that they were born a female. Instead, it is the legacy of a sexist society that imposed needless division.

They needed ‘gender’ because the historical meaning of ‘sex’ was too reminiscent of the idea that men and women are different. ‘Gender’ came to be a code word that signified you believed that sex differences were fabricated; they were the fruit of patriarchal norms. It wasn’t enough for feminists to disagree – they had to speak in such a way that made it impossible to disagree with them. Propaganda of all stripes invoke this abuse of language. Proponents of open borders call an illegal alien an ‘undocumented immigrant’ to obscure the immigrant’s original crime of trespassing.

‘Gender’ Bespeaks Confusion Of The Soul

> The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman’s garment: for all that do so are abomination unto the Lord thy God.
> Deuteronomy 22:5

On its face, the feminist meaning of ‘gender’ is useful. More than ever before, men identify as women, and women as men. Their sex differs from their sexuality – a man may be biologically male, but he identifies as a woman. And ‘gender’ refers to what he identifies as, not what he was born as.

Plainly speaking, they are misfits, abominations of biblical proportion. It is they who have given life to the feminist concept of gender. Sexual equality is the ideal in Western society, so we celebrate androgyny. The more confused someone is about their sex, the greater their virtue – because they are even closer to being sexless. No surprise then that the numbers of sexual misfits have multiplied in a bid for attention and pity. And occasionally, the egalitarians and the misfits come to blows!

To use the word gender is to sow the feminist lie that our sexuality, our inherent maleness or femaleness can be ignored and discarded. It is to say that our sexuality can be made not to matter, that we are as pliable as our hearts’ contend. Those very sexual differences that excite and arouse us in our private lives – we can change them as if they were channels on a television. The same woman who campaigns for equality lusts for inequality, for domination and aggression behind closed doors.

5 Reasons To Date A Man With Cancer

December 5, 2013 | by The Private Man | Link | Original Link

The famous blog article 5 Reasons to Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder went viral recently. Some of the responses to that article compared an eating disorder with cancer. My feelings on that comparison are not relevant here. If I'm offended by something, I keep it to myself because I will not compete in the victim Olympics. I'll leave that to the professional victims and their groups who stifle free speech based on their "offensitivity" (the degree to which a person chooses to be offended by something).

The responses to that article got me thinking about men and illness. Specifically, it got me thinking about how emotionally healthy men respond to having a serious illness. It changes a man. It makes him stronger (more details below). It's like a forge where iron is transformed into steel. Therefore, women should indeed date a man who is dealing well with a serious illness, specifically, cancer. Three of the reasons are actually about the woman, not the man.

I'm well aware that cancer takes on many forms. My own particular malignancy (ocular melanoma) is very rare and right now shows absolutely no outward physical manifestations. However, after my eye is treated, there might be something visible. If it spreads, then all bets are off. While I'm going through this, I'm still giving dating advice. I've just adjusted a bit because my cancer doesn't own me.

Other cancers, of course, are different and the treatments can be relatively benign or quite dramatic. I've met cancer survivors who came through only because of limb amputation or loss of other body parts with the accompanying physical disfigurement. I'm not glossing over that. Cancer can really mess up a man's physical appearance. While new treatments aren't as debilitating, the medication can cause temporary weakness and other serious side effects. No matter—a man who is dealing well (emotionally in particular) with cancer is worth dating. Here are five reasons why:

1. A man with cancer can be incredibly emotionally strong

If he has the guts to deal with a potentially fatal disease and to take on dating, this man can handle anything emotional a woman can throw at him. A shit test? Puh-lease, this guy bats those aside because he has more important things to deal with. He's going through an experience where death or permanent disability is a very real possibility, depending on the cancer. But at the same time, his medical condition does not own him. That toughens a man. Ironically, it can also give him incredible confidence, the one masculine trait that women find utterly irresistible.

2. He is worthy of respect

This guy doesn't need a ribbon for "support". He's facing something that can be truly awful in terms of medical treatment and the possible outcome. If the outcome is good and the cancer goes into remission, the man emerges with an amazing view of life and what's truly important. He's got his priorities straight. He's stronger for it (see above) and he'll get respect for that. Even if he's currently coping with his disease, a woman can look up to him for his willingness to be realistic without being fatalistic.

3. Caring for him lets a woman embrace her natural femininity

A big part of femininity is caring and nurturing because its her natural biological role. A man with cancer needs her femininity. She can be there for support and encouragement, something that women can do incredibly well if they just let themselves. This, of course, requires a woman to utterly reject the prevailing social attitude of "I shouldn't do anything for a man".

4. He will be the strong leader she craves

A strong man takes the lead in the dating process. A man with cancer is already taking the lead in dealing with his health so he can continue this precedent into the dating process. Besides, being in control all the time is exhausting for a woman. She doesn't have to be the strong one, that's his job and he's already doing it regarding his health. She can let him lead, as he should do no matter what the state of his health might be.

5. He will make a woman out of a female

Dealing with possible tragedy gives perspective on life. If she becomes attached to a man with cancer, she's embarking on an adventure where she must put aside her selfish interests and focus on another adult who is not family. Society tells a woman to only focus on her own needs and desires. That's the realm of children. Dating a man with cancer motivates generosity and selflessness out of desire.

From a personal experience, I have told all the women friends in my life about my recent cancer diagnosis. All said the right things about being sorry and worrying about my health. Those were kind words and I still appreciate them, but only 20% actually stepped up to the plate and gave the kind of help that I needed, especially with my recently motorcycle accident and subsequent hospital stay. Those women showed their support with actions and sacrifice, not just kind words: a visit to the hospital with clothes, a ride from the hospital, a ride to Miami for an eye treatment, and so much more.

A man with an illness (or injury) simply must show strength in the face of such adversity. That's his natural masculine behavior as a man. Such strength is attractive to women. It's her natural behavior as a woman to be attracted to that masculine strength. A serious health adversity peels away all the politically correct bullshit of contemporary, gender-based social expectations. It's where the rubber of natural gender behavior hits the road.

Why You Should Start Buying Custom-Tailored Suits

December 5, 2013 | by balani | Link | Original Link

If you're like many men, the idea of having a tailor strikes you as some hoity-toity fantasy where you're a movie star or a high-priced lawyer. After all, why do you need a custom-tailored suit if you're just a regular guy? And how can you possibly hope to afford it?

Well, it turns out that there are quite a few myths out there when it comes to custom-made suits, and there are some truly good practical reasons why you should think about getting one – or several!

Myth: It's really inconvenient to go to a tailor.
Truth: What's inconvenient is going to 20 different stores.

Going to a tailor, getting measured, and waiting for them to make your suit sounds like the height of inconvenience, but think about what you'd do otherwise. Off-the-rack suits are all in generic sizes, so chances are good that you'd end up trying on a lot of them and probably even driving around to different stores before you find something that seems acceptable – not even great; just acceptable. That kind of shopping takes a lot of time and gas, and all it really gives you in return is frustration. Having a tailor make you a suit may not allow you to walk out of the store with it that day, but the actual time you spend shopping is often much less.

Myth: The level of quality is about the same.
Truth: Custom-made clothing really is made better.

It's not that off-the-rack suits are the equivalent of plastic bags and custom-made suits are recyclable canvas, but there is definitely a difference in the level of quality between the two. Part of that comes from the fact that off-the-rack suits are put together by machines on an assembly line, whereas each custom-made suit will be overseen by a real live person. There's just an attention-to-detail there that can't be matched. Also, when you're having something custom-made, you can choose the fabric that's going to be used. Even lower-end fabric offered by tailors tends to be better than what's offered in off-the-rack clothes, and you can pick material that's truly amazing.

And then there are things like canvas. What's canvas? Typically made from cotton and horsehair, it's a separate material that runs throughout the interior of every custom-made suit. Essentially, the canvas serves as the "bones" of your suit, and it serves to give it both shape and solidity, as well as helping mold it to your body. Canvas can even prevent bubbles from forming in the fabric and help to keep your suit wrinkle-free! In contrast, many off-the-rack models simply hang limp.

Myth: Off-the-rack fits just fine.
Truth: That's because you've never tried a custom-fit suit.

For a tailor, "just fine" is a failure. When you get a custom-fit suit, you're buying a piece of clothing that will feel like a second skin – only better. Tailored suits not only fit perfectly to the particular contours of your body, they also accentuate your best features while masking the ones that you'd prefer to keep hidden. They can do this because someone designed the suit specifically for your body. You'll never be able to get that with an off-the-rack suit, and anyone who says otherwise is just flat-out lying.

Myth: Tailor-made suits cost an arm and a leg.
Truth: Many people go to tailors to spend less.

Let's be completely blunt: no tailor is going to be able to provide you a custom-made suit that's less than the lowest off-the-rack prices you can find. There's a reason big businesses use assembly lines, and someone who's personalizing every suit can't match that. At the same time, tailors are quite affordable when you start to look at the big picture. First off, it comes back to convenience. Your time is valuable, and if you can go to one tailor with your measurements and get a great suit out of it, chances are good that you'll save a lot of time over trying to find an off-the-rack suit that works. Additionally, tailored suits tend to last longer and take more wear and tear, which means you should have to replace them less. And sometimes, tailors can replicate looks on popular (read: expensive) brands for far less than what you'd pay just to get a particular name on the label.

Myth: Tailors just charge more for the same thing.
Truth: Custom-made suits can be personalized in any number of ways.

Try to buy an off-the-rack suit and you're going to be limited to a few specific styles that are currently popular. Tailor-made suits offer unlimited personalization. All you have to do is tell your tailor what you'd like to do and they'll let you know the cost and time involved.

If you don't want to believe what I've written above, simply find a man who owns a custom suit and ask him what he thinks. You'll find out that one you go custom, it's hard to return back to the rack.

Do You Have A Baseline Workout?

December 6, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Opportunity

Physical fitness is a goal all men should strive for. Keeping one's body in shape and ready for any challenge is a smart move in today's modern society. There is a lot of information about exercise available for anyone to access. This coupled with the prevalence of gyms means that the knowledge and facilities are available. The limiting factor of an exercise routine is opportunity. Overcoming the lack of opportunity is essential to getting and staying in shape.

Creating the opportunity to work out is important. One way I have found to create this opportunity to exercise is to have an exercised program simple enough to do at home. Unless you are constantly sleeping over strange ladies' houses, one typically wakes up in their own bed. If you do wake up in strange places quite often, you still can adopt a program for that. A daily morning workout is easy to allow time for. You just wake up half an hour earlier. Also, most neighborhoods are safe enough to run in and if yours is not, it will only push you to run faster.

Time

Sometimes gym hours do not mesh with work schedules. Sometimes traffic patterns preclude traveling to the gym. The logistics of showering and changing at the gym can take too much time out of a busy day. These difficulties associated with exercising exclusively at a gym can and do keep men from getting in shape.

The best way I have found to create exercise opportunity is to exercise around your home soon after you wake up in the morning. You usually have to shower and change for work anyway so there is no duplication of effort there. Any commute you would have for the gym is not applicable. It also allows for a frequency as often as you wish, even seven days a week. This frequency is significant in maintaining any fitness gains.

Frequency

A quick home based exercise program should be quick and simple so one can do it every day. One system I have is sit-ups, pushups, and a run. Sometimes I will also do chin-ups. The intensity varies, sometimes run three miles, sometimes one mile. The amount of pushups and sit-ups is usually the maximum possible. Remember, the key is to keep the exercise program short so it can be done often in a busy schedule.

These daily workouts are a method of maintenance and routine. They should not be a stand-alone project for men. The gym is still an option and should be used for any serious weightlifting and fitness gains. The idea of exercising every day with low opportunity costs is a better move than going to the gym once a week when time allows. The idea of doing both is even better.

Conclusion

Over time, the intensity of these daily workouts will increase. I am at the point where I can do sixty pushups and seventy situps nonstop. Running every day builds the endurance that some gym based programs. I have noticed that running in the morning has an invigorating effect waking up for the day. Use caution though, I have also noticed running too far too often can lead to aching joints. Wearing different shoes also works different parts of the leg. Squishy soled shoes pump the calves quite a bit.

Soon You Will Be Able To Have Sex Over Social Media

December 6, 2013 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

ATTENTION: Beta nerds across America, rejoice! You can now have sex with a real, live Secret Internet Fatty for just a few hundred bucks, provided you have an Internet connection!

While listening to a recent podcast about my 20 Things Women Should Be Shamed For, Not Celebrated post, I was introduced to a new form of social media…FriXion.

> FriXion is an online community whose users are able to touch each other using various supported haptic devices from hand holding and kissing up to full penetrative sex – regardless of where they are in the world, from across a room to across an ocean.

I don't think I need to get into the overall level of desperate you have to be to literally go out and drop several hundred dollars, so you can have a girl stimulate you with a Fleshlight online while she uses a dildo to mimic the motions. Needless to say, these are the type of people we here at ROK strive to shame.

> Unique to FriXion, our most advanced peripherals use bidirectional force feedback telemetry to create simultaneous one to one motion and resistance between your and your partner's device. The result is convincing and organic intimacy over any distance, from across a room to across an ocean!

What does something like this mean for our culture, if and when it goes mainstream?

Our society is very much adaptable. Ten years ago, we couldn't even fathom smartphones, and I'm sure nobody would have predicted how mainstream texting would become, whilst calling is now seen as "creepy". What concerns me is what will happen when this new disturbing form of sex becomes the norm around society. Much like how online dating took heat for many years, this will be pushed back and shamed by the whole of society upon first release. Over time though, that shaming will wear out, and if it can withstand that, then it will integrate into our culture much like online dating has. Soon, real-life sex will be seen as "inconvenient" (much like going to bars to meet someone is portrayed), and platforms such as FriXion will be seen as "cool" (much like Tinder is).

It means that human interaction, which is already becoming more text based as compared to human interaction, will only continue to be poisoned further. Hell, for the beta males, they already have very little reason to leave home. Food? Order takeout. Work? Plenty of jobs can be done remote. Entertainment? Movies, books, and a plethora of other options are all available for download. Exercise? Get a treadmill. Want to get a girlfriend? Fire up OKCupid or Tinder. Hell, I do it, it's that convenient.

Now though, "sex" will be available for anyone with a couple hundred dollars to blow and a 10 megabyte cable connection. Rather than guys discussing the best way to find the g-spot, it'll be over what the best Fleshlight is to use while your e-girlfriend jerks you off.

Do I get this porn star's asshole Fleshlight, or this slut's mouth…hmm, decisions, decisions.

What does it mean for guys like ROK's readership, though? Here's where the good news comes in for you, readers. Because while society's norms and beliefs will adapt over time, humans at our biological core require real, face-to-face interaction and human touch. The number of males capable of having a decent face-to-face interaction with a girl will continue to dwindle down, likely prompting more "Why are allllll the good men gone?!" bullshit from women.

I'll tell you where. They're in their bedroom because they have no incentive to leave.

With every new social media platform that further disconnects society from human interaction, this gets easier for guys like you and me, because we understand how psychology and human interaction works. At the bar, guys will stutter with their openers because they're used to opening with "how r u?" typed out on their iPhone. Meanwhile, we'll have plenty of smooth openers to grab their attention. While plenty of guys will know how to work a robotic dildo better than we ever will (years of Starcraft will have been excellent training…fucking nerds), we can unhook a girl's bra with one hand on the first try. Good luck getting her to come back for a second round when you're stumbling around in the bedroom like a virginal teenager.

While the emergence of a technology like this is undoubtedly disturbing and discouraging, look at it from the bright side. Game is only becoming more and more efficient as social media encourages being a pussy.

If you haven't started learning game, you probably should start doing so.

And if you want to make some money, robotic vaginas and penises probably are a pretty safe bet for the future.

5 Life Lessons From JFK

December 6, 2013 | by The Lieutenant | Link | Original Link

November 22nd was the 50th anniversary of the death of President John F. Kennedy. The news was full of conspiracy theory rehash, pictures of Lee Harvey Oswald on the perp walk, and news stories from Dealey Plaza in Dallas. There is so much more to President Kennedy than his assassination, however. JFK was the epitome alpha male, and his life is a great instruction for many reasons.

Here are some of the lessons that studying this dead president has taught me:

1. Stop complaining

JFK was sick so often when he was younger that his brother Robert joked that mosquitoes would die from drinking JFK's blood. From his colitis, a nasty intestinal problem, to nagging and debilitating back pain, the youthful and vigorous pictures and movies of JFK were a manufactured veneer. Behind the scenes, JFK needed back injections and surgeries (one of which nearly killed him) just to deal with the pain.

Through it all, JFK rarely complained to anyone, and certainly didn't let on to the outside world that much of his life off camera had been spent in hospital beds and under a doctor's care. Kennedy would deal with it through recuperation in Florida, reading, and frequent sex with many attractive women that were not his wife.

JFK also had to deal with deaths of beloved siblings. His older brother Joe, Jr. was killed during World War II in an aircraft explosion and his younger sister Kathleen was killed in 1948 in a plane crash. JFK wouldn't complain, and would just press on.

2. Look good

In this day and age of untucked dress shirts and an epidemic of jeans, looking better than most men around you is just so darn easy. JFK would cringe today if he looked out on the obese, dingy clothed masses.

Google “JFK pictures” and here’s what you will see: suits and sport coats, slender ties, and a white dress shirt. He almost always wore that white dress shirt. Whatever he wore fit him well.

I wear a crisp white dress shirt frequently, and always when wearing a tie. It requires no complicated decision matrix to match tie to shirt colors. I wear sport coats often, never jeans, and occasionally don a slender tie with my white dress shirt. I get nods of respect everywhere I go, just due to the way I am dressed.

3. Become a faster reader

JFK studied speed reading, and consumed multiple newspapers per day. He enjoyed many genres of books and would constantly be recommending something he had read and enjoyed to others.

In the case of Guns of August, which was a book detailing mistakes leading to World War I, JFK had copies sent to his military officers all over the world.

To become a faster reader, I have learned to speed read. The best speed reading technique I have tried is what I call the “grouping” speed reading method. Instead of reading letter by letter, or word by word, learn to group words together, so that your eye moves just a few rapid times per line. This method takes some practice, but it has sped my reading ability by leaps and bounds.

4. Be in a hurry

JFK had a keen awareness of his own mortality. This forced him to live his life as if in fast forward. He was a U.S. Congressman at age 29, Senator at age 35, and President at age 43. Yes, JFK had a wealthy dad to bankroll his campaigns, but the energy needed to campaign for even a local U.S. House seat is tremendous.

A flurry of activity surrounded the man, rendering him irresistible to both men trying to gain his favor and charmed women willing to give him a notch. I apply this “be in a hurry” tactic to my business ventures. Latest business idea of mine doesn’t take hold? Abandon it, and on to the next one without looking back.

5. Question the experts

Kennedy started out his presidency with the Bay of Pigs, a military and intelligence disaster. He had assumed that the “wise old men” in the CIA and military were expertly advising him, and he was burned badly in the fiasco.

As a result, JFK gathered opinions from a variety of sources following Bay of Pigs, even going around the military chain of command occasionally to get first hand accounts of events. My own proudest bucking of the experts and conventional wisdom was deciding to eat the paleolithic diet. I have never felt and looked better.

While the rest of the world has recently focused on JFK's death, remember instead the valuable life lessons that he left for men of vigor.

Video Games Are Limiting Men’s Potential

December 7, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

I made a thread over at the RVF a while back giving Canadians a heads up that Future Shop had a promotion that essentially meant free video games. I’m not going to lie, I was pretty excited about the prospect of exchanging old, completed games, for copies of Call of Duty: Ghosts, and Assassins Creed. Having played the predecessors to both games in the past I expected nothing more than to be taken into another world so I could live as a super-soldier or unparalleled assassin for a day or two. I thought to myself this was a no-lose situation; I could get there early, grab as many copies as I possibly could, and sell the ones I wouldn’t use for some quick profit, but then I read a response to my thread by Thomas The Rhymer:

> I thought this was gonna be a thread about how the Canadian government is going to hand out free video games to keep men pathetic and docile.

I think I was 10 years old when I got my very own Pokemon Yellow: Pikachu edition gameboy. I like to joke saying that I stopped reading books the day I got my gameboy, but it’s true. I used to read voraciously, but after that Christmas I rarely picked up a book that wasn’t for school. Eventually I got a PS2 and then a PS3. As soon as I cracked the packaging of a new game everything else in my life took a back seat to completing that game. For the most part I grew out of this by the time I hit university. I’d play call of duty every once and a while, but rarely did I have that compelling need to play endlessly.

However, for many young men they never grow out of a teenage gamer phase. Why is it that men will often choose the warm glow of a television screen over the soothing embrace of a beautiful woman? Why do men waste so much of their precious life ruthlessly leveling up a bunch of pixels instead of working to reach their true potential?

A pessimist might argue that the ills of our culture leave men no choice but to self-medicate with achievement through technology. After sleep and a job, the only way to escape the doldrums seems to be to plug into another world. The way I see it video games are filling the holes left in many mens' lives. They provide:

- A sense of achievement
- Instant gratification
- Fulfillment of man's desire to create
- The ability to live a thousand different lives
- Sense of camaraderie and community

Men can get all of this out of a simple video game, but how is it that they never grow despite it all?

Video games are finite. When a man unplugs he returns to his average life where he has no tangible rewards from his spent time. He must continuously play in order to get the same satisfaction, lest the sheer immensity of life crush him. It is far easier to be a new man every day than it is to build one's current self from rubble. Detached from the facade he realizes that he is 27 and has not achieved anything, he has not created anything, he has not lived his life, and he has no other men to share his successes and failures with. Many men are weak and this is too much. For others it is just the motivation they need to impose their will on the world.

Never Date A Girl Who Has Rescued A Dog

December 7, 2013 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

I like dogs. Matter of fact, I love dogs. I think dogs are a blessing for man, be it a lucky quirk of nature or by divine design.

But I will NEVER date girls who “rescue dogs.”

If you are unaware of this trend, allow me to explain.

Many innocent dogs are abused, mistreated, or just outright abandoned by their despicable owners. The humane society does their best to help, but in the end must put most dogs to sleep as there are not enough masters who wish to adopt. To prevent this (merciful) euthanasia, various “rescue groups” have been created where (primarily) women adopt dogs to save their lives.

On the face of it, it is fine. It is wonderful. It is kind. It is charitable.

Until you start to notice some trends and similarities with “Rescue Dog Girls.” Namely, they’re using it as a substitute for human love and companionship.

For example, one of my friends. I love her dearly, but she is overweight, waxes poetically about her past with men, and constantly rescues dogs. I do dare make the accusation she does this not so much for the dogs, but because she is not capable of finding/attracting a man in her life.

Another example delivered via anecdote was a girl who had 8 dogs and 7 cats in her house. My friend visited her place for dinner and could not eat because of all the smells, hair, and dander. The boyfriend of this girl told her that maybe she should let her pets live out their normal lives, but not replace them so that he and she could travel the world. She agreed…

and she promptly replaced it with a puppy (the boyfriend promptly dumped her).

I could go on, but I've seen enough evidence that I'm convinced this is a trend. Rescuing dogs is a coping mechanism, another red-flag we can catalogue in our Catalogue of Red Flags. And the reason it is such a red flag is because it shows you how little effort the girl is willing to put into a relationship. Yes, she may want companionship. Yes, she may want love. But instead of committing the time and resources to self-improvement to attract a man, she will merely buy it on the cheap by rescuing dogs. But realize there is also a scary element – control.

Yes, women may want to rescue dogs. Yes, they may want to nurse an entity back to health. But I can't help but notice how in a very "Misery" like way these dogs are completely dependent upon their new owner. Genuine charity and love aside, these dogs are a captive audience, and their love AND OBEDIENCE must be paid to the dog rescuer. Not that these new owners are anywhere near as bad as the vile scum who abused these dogs, but at minimum I believe they have an ulterior motive.

I merely ask the question why women are rescuing dogs when there are plenty of men that could use rescuing. But sadly, I know the answer.

Men hold women to some modicum of standards before committing.

Dogs' love is unconditional.

Thoroughly think those two statements through first before agreeing with one or the other.

This Is Why Girls Go For Bad Boys

December 7, 2013 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

Like most people who have taken the red pill, I had already internalized some of the lessons that it gave before I found anyone else who shared the same ideas. Once I discovered the manosphere I went on a long binge of all of the red pill bloggers I could find and digested everything. There was not enough time to critically think about what any of them were saying because I was taking everything in too fast.

Now that it has been several months since I have taken the red pill I have had a chance to think about what I have read and come to some of my own conclusions from it. Some ideas I have embraced completely while others I have chosen to discard. One of the writers who I found very interesting was once mentioned on this site before: Bonecrcker.

One of his posts that was particularly interesting to me was one called Social Proofing has Negative Survival Value for Women. In this he explains money, looks, personality, and other indicators of a man's value are less important to women than how many other women a man has had in the past. This is the idea of social value. A woman will be less interested in a tall, fit, and wealthy engineer who hasn't dated much than she would be in an STD-ridden drug dealer who has pump and dumped hundreds of women before her.

Even with red pill wisdom this was something I simply could not swallow. It seemed far, far too illogical for my brain to wrap itself around so I dismissed him as a loser who must have done something wrong with his woman. This was a couple of months into my red pill awakening.

Then later I saw a youtube video by a MGTOW blogger named Stardusk that talked about maladaptation. The most obvious form of maladaptation is human's ability to store large amounts of fat deposits whenever food is abundant so we can survive when it is not. For most of human history this was an extremely important and life saving biological adaptation. However, today this once life-saving evolutionary advantage has become disadvantageous to people who live in modern society. For more on this just look at any ROK post between October 7th through October 13th.

This is the most commonly understood form of maladaptation, but where this concept gets truly interesting is not in survival of the fittest evolution, but in sexual evolutionary psychology. This is where it can be explained why women prefer to go after bad boys over nice beta males.

Some Brief Historical Perspective

Before modern medicine came along some studies have shown that the chance of a woman dying in childbirth in the 17th and 18th centuries was 1-1.5%. Since women in that time had to have numerous children to account for the high infant mortality rates, it is suspected that around 1 in 8 women died of childbirth at some point in their lives. It is likely that thousands of years before this the chances of a woman surviving may have been even smaller.

Since women were risking their lives for the chance to pass on their DNA to future generations, they had to make sure they were getting the best chance possible. If a mother and a beta husband have a son who never has children of his own then as far as the parent's DNA is concerned that son may as well have been stillborn. On the other hand, if her husband were an alpha who has an alpha son that impregnates all of the girls in the village, the mother's DNA would be spread very well. Any granddaughters that her alpha son gave her will have the same strong desire for alpha characteristics that the original mother had.

Lets Test the Math

Lets take a hypothetical scenario of two women. Beta-loving Susan and alpha-loving Megan.

Susan marries a loyal beta male who provides enough for her to have three sons. Each of them gets married and have three children. Susan's childbirth to grandchild ratio is 3:9 or 1:3. Three grandchildren per childbirth.

Megan marries a man who cheats on her and doesn't provide as many resources to her so she can only have two sons. However, these two sons are just like their father and go out and have sex with many girls in the area and have five children each. Megan's childbirth to grandchild ratio is 2:10 or 1:5. Therefore she gets a wider spreading of her DNA while not having to risk death in childbirth as much. Who is going to be favored by evolution more?

Megan, of course. 10 > 9. After hundreds of iterative generations almost all of the women in a community will share Megan's love of men who sleep around a lot.

Therefore the best evolutionary strategy for women is not to have lots of sex like it is for a man, but to have sex with the man who is most successful at getting lots of women to have sex with him so she can have his son and make all of her friend's daughters go through the childbirth instead.

So What Does This Mean For Us?

Obviously this is just a theory, but it is a theory that matches up with most of the data points. A man who acts needy is more likely a guy who doesn't get laid much and may bear sons who also won't be able to get girls. A guy who acts confident and aloof is signalling that he has the ability to get another girl if the one he is currently talking to doesn't work out. This signal will attract the female because he is more likely to bear sons who will also be able to get girls (theoretically).

A woman will be attracted to an athlete or celebrity who gets lots of pussy because she hopes that those traits will be passed onto her son who will carry half of her DNA and spread her genetic code around. That is the evolutionary point of all life after all. A man who has sex with a fertile woman every day can have 270 children in a nine month period while a woman can only have one.

This epiphany helped to cement the red pill into my mind. Even in the blue pill world men understand that women do not behave logically. However, there are logical explanations for their illogical behaviors. In the case of bonecrcker's example of a woman choosing a lecherous drug dealer over a stable and loyal man the woman's actions can be understood. If the lecherous drug dealer can get lots of women without putting in much effort then the woman's hindbrain, which is responsible for creating feelings of attraction, sees him as high grade DNA material for a son. The loyal hardworking man is seen as weak because he has to work harder for less pussy. He lacks the unexplainable animal magnetism that the drug dealer has from the point of view of the female hindbrain.

This is a perfect example of maladaptation. In 12000 B. C. a man would not be able to get lots of women unless he was the strongest in the tribe so a woman could accurately predict that a man who other women were going after would have superior DNA.

This is an important tool for spreading the red pill message into the blue pill world. It is very hard to tell a man what women are really like unless you can prove it with rock solid logic. Without it most blue pill manginas will dismiss your argument. In which case you can respond:

> "Do you not understand that women had to actually risk their lives in childbirth thousands of years ago. Evolution has taken place over environmental stresses much more mild than that. The fact that you refuse to believe that women actually dying would cause a change in their evolutionary psychology just shows how little empathy you have for what women had to go through back then."

Yes, you can use a mangina's own tactics against them to force them to take the red pill.

“The Bewitchin’ Pool:” The Roots Of American Divorce Culture

December 8, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

“The Bewitchin’ Pool” was the final episode of the Twilight Zone aired. It is an episode that causes much consternation of those who view it. Do note, limited funding hindered the production of the episode, as it shows in the poor production and editing of the episode. However, it is a fascinating episode that highlights some serious issues in America that began to take off when it was aired.

Watch the full episode here.

The episode begins with a rich family of a successful father, a bored wife & two young children – a daughter & son. It is clear from the outset the mother is a pure histrionic female who takes to new identities as she feels the need. The father is a cold, narcissistic man. Both are dismissive of the children and are very cruel & self-centered in dealing with them.

After yet another vitriolic clash between the two parents, the children are approached- by the pool – by a young boy swimming around claiming there is a better life for them if they just follow him to the other side. Eventually the two kids agree, jump into the pool and come out into a different world. It is a fantasy world of happy children with a compassionate, loving maternal grandmother who unconditionally loves them all.

Eventually, they hear the voices of their parents and are worried their parents are missing them & concerned for their safety. They go back to reality and, once again, realize their parents are still all about themselves and their victim complexes. They desperately seek out the other world and eventually make it back, ignoring the cries of their self-absorbed parents – seemingly staying in this idyllic world.

In “The Bewitchin’ Pool” the two kids sought out an alternate reality to their sufferings at the hands of terribly cruel parents. Like any other kid, they seek out a world where a parental figure gives them unconditional love and allows them the space to be a kid. This is a typical fantasy of a child whose life has been supremely deficient from a parenting standpoint. They dream of life in which they don’t have to negotiate complicated relationships between two parents fraught with tension & anger. They desire a life where they get the unconditional love that will very much help them become well-adjusted adults. The twist, here, is that world isn’t just a fantasy but a reality if they can let go of the relationship with their parents.

This letting go has ruffled some feathers of those reviewing the episode for many reasons, but consider the relationship a child will have with parents like these. The views of the child are going to be purely black & white – either they love their parents with no qualifications or they hate their parents to their very core. This supreme vacillation is emblematic of an unhealthy relationship. In his book “No More Mister Nice Guy,” Dr. Robert Glover notes this in his sessions with husbands talking about their wives. One second they are praising their wives to the Heavens then muttering, “Fucking bitch.”

Back on point, towards the end when the parents give them the “good news” they are divorcing the daughter says they will be good now & she understands that their misbehavior is the cause of the divorce. This is a stereotypical response of a child upon learning their parents are getting divorced. Say what you will about divorce, but no matter how well intentioned by the parents, a child will always blame themselves for the divorce. The parents laugh and it represents the kids are no more than window-dressing. Sure, the kid's existence strained relations between the two, but didn't create any new tensions than those that were already there.

As this episode was aired in the middle of the 1960's, with the Sexual Revolution in full sway a cascade of divorces would visit the country in the next decade. This episode shows the early recognition of the divorces that are to come, but is conflicted as it provides evidence for the utility of divorce to cure unhappy marriages, but also recognizes the terrible psychological pressure poor parenting and divorce has on a child.

First, the culture of divorce is rooted in narcissism & denial of psychological issues.

Divorce most assuredly has its deepest foundations in hypergamy. However, it is far worsened by our narcissistic society. Note the first benefit of divorce – happiness for both parents. In "The Bewitchin' Pool" both parents are presented as highly dissatisfied with the relationship. The mother overestimates her potential – a quasi-feminist – and a dismissive male who cares only about his own success. This is an unusual relationship, as most divorces are a female leaving a male who loves them.

This episode highlights the delusions around how divorce goes down. It presents two equally dissatisfied parties that would prefer divorce over working the relationship out. Further, it highlights the delusions around how personal psychology. Rarely is somebody simply a product of an unhappy relationship. That assumes issues in a marriage stem merely from being matched with the wrong person. That is incredibly naïve & reeks of female delusions about how relationships work.

Most times, personal psychological issues get magnified in a given relationship – it is up to every person to handle their responses. It is one thing to admit your partner is making a certain trait of yours more obvious; however, it is up to you to decide whether to express it or not. Chalk it up to our society's desire to have everybody express their emotions – it is good that everybody be aware of what they are feeling , however, having them express it isn't always a good idea. It is best to have people be honest with themselves above all else.

Second, consider the female imperative represented by divorce culture. Women need to keep up appearances in the event of them choosing to divorce. They need social support networks to help them, they need court systems to ensure fiscal solvency and they need forces in the media assuring anybody who would judge them that the divorcing woman is making the right choice. Children, husbands, etc. are secondary or less concerns when it comes to their personal happiness. Always remember that their happiness is predicated on social approval of their decisions.

Society does a bang-up of shoring up female concerns around divorce. Females still complain that they are being judged for divorcing their husbands and separating their children from their father, but that noise is coming from other women. Kill all the men tomorrow and virtually 100% of female concerns will still exist as their problems involve other women. Still, society does its utmost to ensure women are adequately compensated in divorce, provided and plenty of governmental help for psychological issues. For the mother, not the children.

However, the most important part of this episode are the kids themselves. Their parents divorcing doesn't cure either parent of their personal issues nor guarantee any sort of happiness or better treatment for the kids. Superficial and female-centric salves such as divorce are defenses against individuals facing their own personal issues, either by blaming the other parent or taking it out on their captive audience of children.

I can personally attest to this situation. My parents had a horrid relationship in which I would spend much time in my room alone, playing with toys, reading & writing. My imagination took me places I could never go in real life. However, the call of your parents will always be there. You can only immerse yourself in your action figures or Legos for so long before the spell is broken by the barking of your mother. Part of the reaction to this episode is people who have no idea what it is like to be in this situation. It can be very tiring talking about this episode with people who constantly bang on about how creepy the grandmother figure is & how they would never leave their parents, no matter how cruel. I completely understand the supreme reticence about leaving your parents, but this episode did & does speak to me about wanting to leave horrible parents.

I understand the wandering of any kid's imagination in response to their deficient upbringing – their dependency necessitates understanding their parent's issues insofar as it relates to their ability to survive. The problem is that everybody will at least, in theory, have the ability to support themselves independently when they become adults. The issue is that those complexes that carried a child through to adulthood are no longer necessary because they are no longer dependent on that parent.

"FREE LOVE"

In the end, "The Bewitchin' Pool" first aired in the summer of 1964, in the middle of the emerging Sexual Revolution. The episode focused on the children who would be the primary victims of the slowly emerging divorce culture. It showed some kids who were subject to terrible parenting & needed to have an escape from that. However, the episode highlighted the nascent optimism that the Sexual Revolution embodied as seen through divorce.

It has been said that this episode was a horrible episode to end the Twilight Zone series on because there was no twist in the ending.

There was a twist in the ending, alright.

Those two kids came into happiness when most American children won't with today's parenting

Stop Being A Pussy

December 8, 2013 | by General Stalin | Link | Original Link

Everyone has external excuses for why they act the way they act, or why this or that happened:

- "I am an alcoholic because my parents were alcoholics."
- "I can't quit smoking because it helps my anxiety."
- "I sleep around a lot because my father was never around when I was younger."
- "I do this because my ex blah blah blah."

Everything you do in your life is your choice, and the way you let events affect you is also your choice. Literally the only thing in this entire existence you have any control of is yourself. If you're a shitty person with piss poor habits, then don't lie to yourself about it and make it seem like the world is just out to get you. If you have a problem with your life then do something about it instead of complaining about how the way you are is somehow not your fault.

Women do this constantly without exception because the world is always against them and nothing is ever their fault, but I see a lot of men doing it as well. It's an awful effeminate trait that needs to be eliminated. Stop being a lazy, defeatist weakling and take control of yourself.

Being Highly Effective

When I was in college I had a Computer Science professor who taught programming basics and information technology principles. I was gathering text books before the semester started and I noticed he had an “optional” work in his literature roster: The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People by Stephen R. Covey. Despite being an IT professor who taught object-oriented programming fundamentals, he was an ardent tree-hugging hippie. He would wear flip-flops to class every session, even into the fall months. With that in mind, a small part of his curriculum was life coaching.

Now, I’m not going to sit here and try to tell you that I read the damn book. It was optional after all, and I had better things to do, but I did crack it open. Of the skimming I did, the biggest takeaway I got from it was to stop externalizing your problems and start internalizing them. The easiest way to be lazy and scapegoat any responsibility for one’s poor habits and life choices is to pass the buck. Blaming something out of your control makes your problem essentially unsolvable. Since you can’t control it, all you can do is bitch about it and keep going on business as usual. This is incredibly ineffective and shows a complete lack of self-control. This goes along with people being afraid to leave their comfort zone and would rather take the hit than make an effort.

Take Control—Maximize Your Life

If something is truly 100% out of your control, then it’s a non-issue because it can’t be helped. Most of the time, however, this is not the case. Even when something happens to you that you could not have foreseen or prevented, you at least have the mental ability to decide how you want to let it affect your life. We let breakups, failures, busy schedules, and stressful life events drag us down and we dwell on them and sulk. Why? Do you think life is long enough to waste any of it pissing and moaning about everything? Some may think this is debatable, but realistically your personal quality of life is based on how much happiness you can achieve and for how long. Minimizing unhappiness and maximizing happiness should be paramount. Things that get in the way of this goal should be dealt with accordingly.

Some broad you’ve been steady with for a while consciously runs behind your back and cheats on you. Is she a sleazy scandalous piece of trash? Of course. Did she do it because she secretly hates you? Maybe. Did she do it because she got bored with you because you weren’t man enough and you were too needy? Likely. The latter is something you can control. Instead of being a victim who got played, learn from it. Not making as much money as you want? Work better and ask for a raise. Not getting a raise? Look for a new job. Don’t make excuses for why you can’t change jobs. It’s 2013 and jobs are like underwear. You live on your own and all you have is basic bachelor bills – always be on the lookout for better opportunities.

Don’t Feed Into Negativity

Pessimism can be contagious, and it’s important to not let others drag you down. Nowadays, when someone bitches about something she refuses to deal with, I just shut down. When I hear people (women) ramble on about their baggage, my brain just turns to pudding and I tune out. Venting about something can certainly be a useful mental tool, but at the end of the day you need to learn to step up and help yourself. The world doesn't owe you a favor, and you're entitled to nothing but what you make for yourself.

The Leadership Secrets Of Ayatollah Khomeini

December 9, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Influence matters in history. When we assess the relative importance of historical figures in the second half of the twentieth century, it is impossible not to notice the driving figure behind the Iranian Revolution of 1979. Along with the Russian Revolution of 1917 and the French Revolution of 1789, the Iranian Revolution was a revolution in the profoundest sense of the word: an entirely new paradigm was created to supplant the preexisting system. Ayatollah Khomeini was the symbol, the main protagonist, and the driving force behind this revolution; and its influence immediately burst Iran's borders to shake the entire Middle East to its foundations.

This influence is still profoundly felt today. And yet the figure of Khomeini as a leader and as a man is almost entirely unknown in the West. His books and writings are practically unavailable, and his methods of leadership are shrouded in mystery and confusion.

Baqer Moin, the head of the BBC's Persian Service, published a well-written and informative biography of Khomeini in 1999 called Khomeini: Life Of The Ayatollah. As an Iranian from a religious family, and as a former seminarian from some of Iran's most respected religious institutions, he was uniquely positioned to provide insight on his subject's background and political life. Through Moin's work, we can begin to understand some of Khomeini's motivations and principles of leadership.

As an influential historical figure, Khomeini's ideas are worthy of serious study by anyone with a sincere interest in history and personality. I should point out here that understanding does not necessarily equate with endorsement. I personally do not believe theocratic states to be the ideal form of government, nor do I necessarily agree with all of Khomeini's policies and decisions. Yet there is no denying that the figure of the Imam was and is a giant one; and he cannot be ignored if we wish to consider ourselves informed students of history.

From my reading of Moin's biography, I believe that it is possible to distill some central principles of Khomeini's leadership style. These are summarized below.

Have A Unifying Vision And Get Your Message Out There

From his earliest years, Khomeini was a unshakeable believer in political Islam. This ran counter to nearly everyone else in the clerical establishment, and it involved serious risk to him a person. Until his last days, he never wavered from the idea that it was possible to create a society (velayat-e faqih) based on Islamic principles as he interpreted them, and ruled by enlightened clerics. In his view, this type of society could be superior to "both East and West." His single-minded belief in this idea sustained him through persecution at the hands of the Shah, exile, war, and isolation by the United States and its allies.

Do Your Own Thing

This is perhaps the most important lesson that Khomeini's career can teach us. Early on in his life, he sensed that the West would not accept the Middle Eastern nations no matter what they did. He sensed, as few leaders in the region today seem to realize, that no amount of groveling or subservience to the United States and Israel will ever win the hearts and minds of the West. No matter how much you try to be polite to the United States, they will never fundamentally accept you, and will always come up with pretexts to undermine you. Their minds are closed to anyone who doesn't worship them.

Essentially, he said to himself: they're never going to accept us no matter what we do, so we might as well just do our own thing and be proud of who we are. And what lesson could be more important than this? It is one that all of us should take note of. The way to get people's respect is not through obsequious displays of subservience, but through cultivating an independence of spirit and a fortitude of will that can be felt perceptibly.

You Pay A High Price For Your Independence, But It Is Worth It

"Neither East nor West", was one of the slogans of the revolution. Nothing is more precious than one's freedom and independence, and this is something that cannot be sold to the highest bidder. But you will pay a high price for your independence. By not turning his country into a puppet of the United States and Israel (like many other countries in the region), he incurred the unmitigated wrath of the forces of bullying and global arrogance. So, if you wish to be independent—truly independent—you will need to prepare for a backlash from people who cannot stand the sight of someone who plays by their own rules.

By standing up to the arrogance and violence of the United States and Israel, he knew that he would be demonized and vilified. And yet the price was worth it, because today Iran is beholden to no foreign power, in stark contrast to some of the other countries in the region.

You Have A Duty To Stand Up To Bullying And Arrogance

Khomeini always refused to back down to intimidation, threats, and blackmail. In the Shia tradition, resistance to tyranny is something of a religious obligation; and to this Khomeini added his own unique blend of charisma and willpower. After the consolidation of the revolution in 1980, there were countless attempts to subvert and undermine him, but he always prevailed by refusing to take the easy way out.

Know Your People

Moin's account is full of anecdotes of Khomeini's intuitive understanding of the Iranian psyche and the other peoples in the region. He understood why the common people so deeply resented the Shah's attempts to "Europeanize" Iran; he understood how to tap into the grievances of Shia communities in south Lebanon and Iraq, and win them to his cause; and he understood how to consolidate and maintain his hold on power after arriving back in Iran from years of exile in France, Turkey, and Iraq.

Cultivate Your Own Circle

Khomeini always had a deeply loyal following which supported and sustained him during many years of painful exile in Iraq, Turkey, and France. He valued personal relationships and was always quick to return a good gesture. By living a simple and exemplary life, avoiding pointless quarrels, and showing a genuine interest in people, he was able to attract a devoted core following.

Master The Technology Of The Day

I was impressed at how Khomeini's followers stressed the innovation of recording his speeches and lectures on cassette tapes and smuggling them into Iran for clandestine broadcast. It may be a minor detail, but it shows a real willingness to adapt and improvise the technologies of the day to one's own use.

Always Stay One Step Ahead Of Your Opponents

In his duel with the Shah, Khomeini was able to exert unrelenting pressure over a sustained period of time. No matter what the Shah did, Khomeini was able to turn it against him and take the upper hand. The Shah's government would pass a law, and Khomeini would order demonstrations to oppose it; violence would result, and more demonstrations would follow. Towards the end of the Shah's rule, this pattern became so common as to be almost grotesque: the country became nearly paralyzed. The Shah's indecision and vacillation stands in stark contrast to Khomeini's iron-willed determination.

Cultivate Your Mystical Side

This was the side of Khomeini I found most fascinating. From his earliest days as a seminarian, Khomeini showed a keen interest in the writings of the Sufi mystics, chief among them Ibn Arabi, Suhrawardi, and Ibn Sina. These doctrines gave him a source of contemplation for union with the Divine, and a source of personal solace. I believe they were a deeply influential part of his personal belief system in ways that have never been fully appreciated in the West. Mysticism gave him access to a body of wisdom, spirituality, and serenity that helped him achieve his goals and overcome his obstacles. He wrote extensively on this subject, but unfortunately his writings are nearly impossible to procure.

Towards the end of his life, he even got into some trouble himself when he recommended to Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev some books of the Sufi mystics. Some circles in Iran attacked him strenuously for this, as well as for some controversial television programs Khomeini made about mysticism.

In this, as in so many other things, he proved himself a true rebel. Mysticism is looked upon by some with disfavor, as it emphasizes a personal spiritual union with the Divine, rather than an outward conformity to standard ritual. According to biographer Moin, Khomeini actually was as much a rebel in the eyes of “reactionary clerics” as he was to his enemies abroad.

Conclusion

Although Khomeini himself never wrote on the subject of leadership, it is clear that his life provides indications of what concepts he valued. Some of them I have summarized above. Interested readers will find much in Moin’s biography of value, and it stands as perhaps the only fair treatment of this towering historical figure that has yet been published in the English language.

The Vindication of Jameis Winston

December 9, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

If you’re a fan of American college football then you’ve probably heard a decent amount of news from Tallahassee, Florida in recent months, most of it centering on Florida State University quarterback Jameis Winston.

Winston has been a sensation in Florida since he arrived as an elite recruit from Alabama. Even before the season started, his legend was growing.

His impact on the baseball team was immediate.

He threw footballs clear over frathouses.

And in the pre-season spring football game, the freshman Winston’s dominance proved enough to convince Clint Trickett (a senior and the presumed starter up to that point) to get the hell out of dodge.

Then the season started, and the hype proved valid. From the very beginning, Winston began to make big plays. The Florida State team he led hadn’t been expected to do all that much. Winston was a freshman replacing a 3 year starter in EJ Manuel (a first round pick in the NFL). The team had lost a number of other key players on both sides of the ball. Florida State is not Alabama and, as a result, wasn’t expected to be able to simply “re-load” and replace all of that talent in a year.

Under Winston, however, that is exactly what happened. FSU became an unstoppable juggernaut, massacring every team it ran into as Winston made spectacular play after spectacular play.

By October, Winston was an obvious Heisman candidate with statistics that bested almost any other quarterback in the country. FSU was an undefeated national title contender. Everything was going smoothly… …until this.

> An assistant state attorney says prosecutors in Tallahassee did not receive information about an 11-month-old sexual assault allegation involving Florida State quarterback Jameis Winston until Tuesday.
> Tallahassee police investigated the Heisman Trophy contender in connection with a sexual assault that was reported nearly a year ago in an off-campus apartment. FSU records show the first report was made to campus police on Dec. 7 by a student at a dormitory. The investigation was handed over to Tallahassee police.
> The case was not given to prosecutors until this week.

If charged, Winston would have been suspended indefinitely and his promising career almost certainly derailed. Florida State's unbeaten run (and its national title hopes) would have likely went right down the drain without their leader. The hopes and dreams of hundreds of thousands (most of Tallahassee plus FSU's many fans nationwide) were under threat.

I was (along with many others) suspicious of this entire thing from the get-go for a number of reasons (the timing being the most obvious). On Thursday, December 5th, these suspicions were proven well founded by the decision of the state attorney, a man known for throwing the book at FSU football players in particular, not to charge Jameis Winston.

> Willie Meggs, the state attorney for the Second Judicial Circuit, announced the move during a news conference at the Leon County Courthouse. Winston had faced felony charges after being accused of sexually assaulting the woman at an off-campus apartment on Dec. 7, 2012.
> Meggs wouldn't say whether his decision was a vindication for Winston, saying he would "leave that to you all after you review the facts."
> He did reveal some new information, saying that while Winston's DNA was present in the sexual assault kit, the DNA of another male was also found, > complicating the investigation. That person was identified as the accuser's boyfriend, and he was not associated with the complaint, Meggs said.

> Meggs added that the accuser had no outward signs of trauma, a key point in trying to prove an assault, and that documents related to the case were being released.
> Search warrants in the case were released before Meggs' announcement and indicate the woman told police she was raped at an apartment after a night of drinking. In the warrant, the accuser says she and friends had shots at a local bar and her "memory is very broken from that point forward."
> Meggs said that toxicology reports show the accuser had a blood alcohol level of .04 and that there was no evidence of drugs, including what are commonly referred to as date rape drugs.

The accuser's attorney claimed that she was raped. Despite this, no signs of struggle or trauma were visible on her. We were intended, I guess, to believe that she simply allowed her rapist to have his way.

Her attorney would claim that we are in fact intended to believe that because her client was, in fact, heavily intoxicated. Despite this, she only blew a .04 BAC, well under the legal limit for motor vehicle operation (read: she was sober enough to drive).

So, what did we have here? A false accusation. Is this an anomaly? Not at all:

> Former NFL first-round pick Travis Johnson, who was acquitted after a sexual-battery trial while he was a star defensive tackle at Florida State, said he is worried for FSU quarterback Jameis Winston, he told the Tallahassee Democrat.
> In March 2003, Johnson was charged with sexual battery after a female student-> athlete accused him of forcing himself on her. Johnson later was found not guilty by an all-woman jury after less than 30 minutes of deliberation.

This is odd. The feminists told me that false accusations of sexual misconduct are insanely rare—women don't lie about these things. What are the chances of two African-American football players at the same school in the same (relatively small) town facing such false accusations within a 10 year time frame?

In any case, the lack of veracity in this accuser's claim leaves a simple question to be answered: what really happened with Jameis? Newly released Tallahassee Police documents that include testimony from two witnesses tell the story:

> I, RONALD DARBY, hereby having been duly sworn and affirmed hereby state the following as true and correct:
> My name is Ronald Darby. I am over 18 years in age. I am a resident of Leon County.
> On December 6, 2012, I went with Chris Casher and Jameis Winston to Potbelly's. We arrived around 11:00 p.m. While there, I watched Jameis talking with a white female that had blonde hair. It appeared that the female was pursuing Jameis. In an effort to continue to hang out with Jameis she was trying to get her friend to go home with Chris Casher. As Jameis and this girl talked, she did not want him to leave.
> Jameis Winston, Chris Casher and I decided to leave Potbelly's and the same blonde female followed us out of the club. This female did not appear intoxicated. She was able to walk out of the club, have a conversation with all of us and use her cell phone to text her friend to join us. She even got in the cab with us.

When we returned to our apartment building, she followed Jameis into his apartment and into his bedroom. Jameis and the girl went into his bedroom. The lights were on and the door was cracked open. The door did not lock and did not close all the way because the lock was broken.

As the door was partially open, Chris looked through the opening and we could see her giving Jameis oral sex. Chris continued to watch Jameis and the girl through the cracked door. He was playing jokes on Jameis and trying to embarrass Jameis. Chris walked in Jameis' room and the girl told Chris to get out. She then got up turned off the light and shut the bedroom door. Chris and I could hear her and Jameis having sex. At no time did the girl ever indicate that she was not a willing participant. In fact, she wanted more privacy by closing the door and turning off the lights.

After approximately 20 minutes, I left the apartment and went upstairs to my apartment. As I was walking to my apartment I saw Jameis leave with the same girl on his scooter. Approximately five minutes later, Jameis returned on his scooter.

I, CHRISTOPHER (CHRIS) CASHER, hereby having been duly sworn and hereby state the following as true and correct:

My name is Chris Casher. I am over 18 years in age. I am a resident of Leon County.

On December 6, 2012, I went with Ronald Darby and Jameis Winston to Potbelly's. We arrived around 11:00 p.m. I met a white female with blonde hair.

> She came up to me and asked if I played football. When I responded that I did play football she seemed more interested in me and gave me her telephone number. I went off and started mingling with other people in the club.
> When Jameis Winston, Ronald Darby and I decided to leave Potbelly's and the same blonde female that gave me her telephone number followed us out of the club. This same female wanted to leave with us in the cab and virtually invited herself. She was not intoxicated. She was able to have a conversation with us.
>
> She was not slurring or stumbling. She was using her cell phone to try and invite her friend to join us. When we arrived at Legacy Suites, she got out of the cab and followed Jameis to his apartment and into his bedroom.
> Jameis and the girl went into his bedroom. The door was pulled shut but could not shut all the way because it was broken. The lights were on.
> Since the door was partially open, I looked through the opening and we could see her giving Jameis oral sex.
> They had only been in the room a few minutes before I witnessed her giving him oral sex. Jameis was facing the door with his hands on his hips while she was in front of him on her knees. I witnessed them both take each other's clothes off and lay on the bed. Jameis and the blonde female began having intercourse. As a joke, I busted into the room to embarrass Jameis. The girl yelled at me, "get out." She got up off the bed and turned off the light and tried to close the door. I could hear them continuing to have sex. She never indicated that she was not a willing participant. From what I saw she was a more than willing participant.
> After approximately 20 minutes, I went into my bedroom . I could hear Jameis and the girl leaving. They were talking to each other in a friendly manner.

A typical story: the girl got a little buzz and decided to get adventurous with a couple of athletes. She later regretted this, especially after she realized that Jameis Winston already had a long-term girlfriend (due to visit him at FSU just a day or two after this incident).

She was nothing more than a casual, short-term slampiece to him, a quick sex toy to be shared with his buddies. She figured she deserved better than that and her solution was a common one: claim sexual assault/rape. Turn the man she gave sexual access to into a trespasser.

She failed to do this, but this saga can still prove educational to many men. Despite the fact that he will not be going to prison, Winston has still paid a price for this drama. His name was dragged through the mud and he spent the better part of a year with the spectre of a falsely-conceived prosecution hanging over his head and potentially ending his career. There was obviously plenty of noise coming at him from fans and media across the country, many of whom were happy to see him in trouble and hopeful of his being put away. And, finally, there was the need to face friends and family and explain all of this to them as they too bared the stress.

Travis Johnson knows all about the costs of this kind of thing:

> Johnson, who played six years in the NFL after he was a first-round pick of the Houston Texans in 2005, told the newspaper he thinks Winston will suffer emotional distress even if he is never charged in the investigation into a sexual battery allegation stemming from December 2012.
> “Right now, Jameis is as cool as the other side of the pillow,” Johnson told the Democrat. “But on the inside, I know that it’s killing him. The longer it goes on, the more it’s going to wear on him.”
> Johnson, 31, who lives in Houston, told the Democrat the charge followed him for years and that every NFL team he spoke with brought up the case.
> “There’s a reason I met with all 32 teams,” he told the newspaper. “Because all 32 teams wanted to know what happened. … In this country, you are guilty until proven innocent. In the court of public opinion, they crucify you.”

And what was the cause of all this turmoil? What brought about this media storm that engulfed the sporting world for months and threatened to bring down one of the greatest young stars college football has ever seen?

A pretty little co-ed got a little loose one night, did some things she regretted and didn’t want to look bad. That’s all.

Such is the world we live in, gentlemen, and such is the world we must adapt to. Women in this society (particularly the young ones of European heritage) have tremendous influence. One peep from them regarding their having been harmed by you in any way can bring tremendous consequences even in the total absence of evidence. In some cases, these consequences can be as simple as a white knight stepping in and “defending her honor” by getting confrontational with you. In other cases, the consequences can awaken societal forces large enough to bring young superstars and multi-million dollar athletic programs to their knees. All on a whim.

And when these claims are proven false, what happens to the accusers? Not much. The media continues to try and protect the accuser of Jameis Winston by refusing to use her name, and the authorities aren't releasing it either (even though word has gotten out unofficially). Meanwhile, as the powers that be worked to shield this accuser, Winston's name got dragged through the mud before he was even CHARGED with a crime. Again, such is our world.

What can a young male concerned with self-improvement (and self-preservation) take away from all of this? Cover your back. Watch yourself and always maintain a healthy dose of skepticism regarding the intentions of these women. Be careful where you put your dick. You are, as a male in this country, at a significant risk of facing false accusations of sexual misconduct and the consequences of doing so are not trivial. Don't let a feminist tell you otherwise—they look out for the women bringing the accusations, not for you.

This Is What A Feminist Looks Like

December 9, 2013 | by Viva la Manosphere! | Link | Original Link

From Wikipedia: A feminist advocates or supports the rights and equality of women.

Here are some feminists hard at work, abusing peaceful men while they pray and attempt to protect their cathedral from vandals.

Assault. Sexual assault. Vandalism. Spitting. Public indecency.

The last time I checked, these were crimes. So why didn't the police intervene?

> "I asked the police, I went down and said to the police, 'If that was [sic] black men or Jews, you'd arrest those women. But why don't you?' They just looked very uncomfortable, and one of them said 'We're frightened of them.'"

More:

> 'La policía, si bien se destacó por una acción coordinada y eficiente para impedir mayores daños, no podía intervenir ante semejantes atropellos porque «son mujeres».'

Feminists know they can get away with whatever they want, as long as they screech loud enough.

This is what a feminist looks like.

'Hey! But they're not real Feminists…'

My bad, valued feminist lurker. I forgot that #SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen only. Here are some real feminists (white ones) ‘advocating and supporting the rights and equality of women:’

Curbing Freedom of Speech. Intimidation.

False sexual assault allegation. Sickening, cowardly violence.

Vandalism. Trespassing. Abridging Freedom of Speech. Endangering lives by wasting the time of firemen.

Masked feminists brandishing weapons. Two feminists assaulting an innocent bystander.

This is what a feminist looks like.

‘But Not All Feminists Are Like That!’

NAFALT, huh? One look at how ROK’s articles are shared on Twitter proves otherwise. Death threats, rape threats, mutilation threats…

Which is ironic when you consider that half a year ago, feminists were so anti ‘rape and death threats on Twitter’.

Due to the campaign spearheaded by feminist Kathy Lette, author of ‘How To Kill Your Husband,’ (yes, you read that correctly) Twitter became so frightened they installed a ‘Report Tweet’ button.

Now feminists roam Twitter like rabid dogs, wilfully abusing their new-found powers by censoring, harassing and threatening everyone they disagree with – after promising live on television that they wouldn’t.

Blink, and you’ll have missed how quickly the tool of the ‘oppressor’ became the tool of the ‘oppressed.’ Once again, equality was nowhere to be found.

This is what a feminist looks like.

Feminism = ~~Equality~~ Supremacy

In the spirit of fairness, I’d like to give some prominent feminist figures the chance to speak for themselves. ‘Ladies?’

> “I feel that ‘man-hating’ is an honourable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them.” – Robin Morgan, Ms. Magazine Editor
> “I want to see a man beaten to a bloody pulp with a high-heel shoved in his mouth, like an apple in the mouth of a pig.” – Andrea Dworkin
> “The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately 10% of the human race.” – Sally Miller Gearhart

> > “Men who are unjustly accused of rape can sometimes gain from the experience.” – Catherine Comins
> “All men are rapists and that’s all they are” – Marilyn French

I see.

This is what a feminist looks like.

‘Waaaaah! NAFALT!’

I hear you, treacle. I’m also having trouble believing that feminists are nothing but vile, fascist thugs. Because equality.

Surely the mainstream feminist rag Jezebel will set me straight. Jezebel, you and your 16 million monthly readers aren’t violent pigs too, are you?

> “One Jezebel got into it with a dude while they were breaking up, while another Jez went nuts on her guy and began violently shoving him. One of your [Jezebel] editors heard her boyfriend flirting on the phone with another girl, so she slapped the phone out of his hands and hit him in the face and neck… “partially open handed.” Another editor slapped a guy when “he told me he thought he had breast cancer.” (Okay, that one made us laugh really hard.) And lastly, one Jez punched a steady in the face and broke his glasses. He had discovered a sex story she was writing about another dude on her laptop, so he picked it up and threw it. And that’s when she socked him. He was, uh, totally asking for it.”

I, uh, totally see.

This is what a feminist looks like.

Moderate feminism is hate. Mainstream feminism is hate. Political feminism is hate. Ideological feminism is hate. And I’m not even going anywhere near radical feminism. cough

From the top to the bottom, feminism is hate.

3 Ways Women Have Ruined Video Games

December 9, 2013 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

The video game industry and culture changed substantially when women started to get involved. Whenever a successful male industry is created, a biological urge to change it comes from those with two X chromosomes. Here are e three ways that women have ruined gaming culture:

1. Inclusiveness

The videogame culture of the 70's – 00's was about making fun games to sell to consumers. This could mean controlling Bill and Lance from "Contra" to Duke in "Duke Nukem." You bought video games that appealed to you and didn't support the ones you didn't like. Women don't understand this basic formula. They would rather screech about a game not including a strong female role model than actually make a video game with a strong female role model.

A female Youtuber named Anita Sarkeesian used this premise to rally for more feminist narratives. A normal alpha would use Kickstarter to make a high budget game that appeals to them. Anita instead spent time begging on Kickstarter and used it to raise over $150,000 dollars to make snarky videos on an iMac. Females always want to be inclusive without putting in the work themselves. One example is this fat lady named Heidi.

About Heidi

Heidi McDonald is the Women in Gaming Rising Star Award Recipient for 2012. Specializing in Narrative Design and interested in the area of NPC romance in single-player RPGs, McDonald invented the ICING Model to help narrative designers write more satisfying NPC Romances.

Her work has been published in Well Played, and lectured about at Feminists in Games 2012, GDC Online 2012, and most recently, GDC in March, 2013 where her poster session, "Men Are From Mars, Women Are From Ferelden," explored survey data about how and why men and women romance in single-player RPG's.

McDonald is a Game Designer at Schell Games in Pittsburgh, PA, and a single mother of three who ended up in video games after a successful mid-life career switch.

This is an example of a woman who wants to write a poly-amorous love triangle in video games instead of working on a new physics engine. It's also not surprising that she's a fat single mother with a useless degree. If we had this chick developing games instead of Shigeru Miyamato, Mario would be a transgender Eskimo amputee and he would beat up racist men instead of saving the princess. It would also mean that video game companies would go out of business. Since the type of feminists the "social justice" games would be marketed to rarely support businesses that aren't clothing, decadent food and media publications. In the big scheme of things, video-game companies need talented men to produce content that would be used to subsidize feminist outreach programs made by the same companies. Every time you see a conference or panel at a convention hosted by a video-game company about getting more women into the industry, you know that these wouldn't even be possible without Joe Nerd spending 16 hours a day, 7 days a week unknowingly subsidizing it. Women want to be involved in things but don't want to do the actual work to do so.

2. Video Game Journalism

Women and beta males have made video game journalism an entry point for dilettantes with humanity majors. Most major publications like Kotaku, Gawker, IGN, and Gamespot rather complain about how "sexist" GTA is than write actual meaningful game content. Video game publications have turned into tabloids with female writers at the helm. Most people can't name a female game journalist because they coast on their male colleagues who do the actual work.

You'll never have a Louis Theroux in the video game industry because women who work in the industry would bitch about inquisitive questions. They would rather write about some dumb ass model dressed up as a video-game character than something substantive.

3. Gamer Girls

The last part of this trifecta of regression is the culture of gaming brought in by women. The beta males of video gaming culture are the thirstiest betas in existence. When a former porn star can make more money by streaming video games for donations instead taking a fat dick, you know there has to be betas behind that.

You go to any Youtube channel about gaming and it will have a useless pretty chick talking about her experiences with Pokemon as a child. These women are not actual gamers but women riding a fad. They're called "Gamer Gurls" for the reason to mock the gurl phrase that feminists like to use. These semi-attractive chicks have learned that they can get the princess treatment by pretending to be a video game enthusiast. Also another type of chick started to pop up. These women though don't have the facade of being attractive. Instead they use videogames to up their social status. The land whales realized that if they could fake their enthusiasm for games, some video game beta would find them attractive as well. The betas fight over these chicks and since they're all manginas of the highest degree. This is one of the reasons that betaness and even omeganess are the norms in video game culture.

Because of these reasons, video games have declined since their great rise in the 70's-00's. Girl gamers and their beta male hangers-on rather buy Call of Duty than support quality products. Don't let women in to your sub-culture unless you want it permanently disfigured. Too bad they already did it to my favorite sub-culture.

Men Should Assert Their Dominance Over Women Through Anal Sex

December 9, 2013 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

A couple of weeks ago I went to pick up an old friend of mine who'd been in jail for 20 years. (We'll call him Jake). Jake was the driver in an armed robbery and unfortunately a security guard was shot and killed by one of the gang. I won't defend his involvement – there are better ways to make money than criminal brute force. He was young and stupid, now he's old and sorry. The time Jake served was extreme considering he was only the driver, never carried a gun and never went into the building. The media picked up the story and the judge gave sentence according to mob rule.

Jake missed parole due to squabbles in prison and did more time than he deserved. I suppose he's one of those guys that just finds himself in the wrong place at the wrong time. He probably would have done great in the army. Jake's a hard alpha, like a character from a Guy Richie movie, but he needs a leader to keep him in line. I guess that was the appeal of a criminal gang.

So he finally gets out and obviously he wants to go party because life has passed him by (he was 24 at the time of the crime, but now he's nearly 45). The best years of his life have been spent locked in a tiny cell in a maximum security facility with all the psychotic and violent goings on that that involves. I didn't even want to ask – he chose to talk about it freely, in part to debrief himself.

I tried to run one of those Al Pacino type scenarios – We got him all new clothes, and went out on the town – a bar and then a restaurant, onto a nightclub, finally a strip joint. He's wide eyed at all the new technology and fashion. The music, the changed social environment. 1993 was a long time ago. We didn't have cell phones, internet, laptops, iphones, flat panel TVs, DVDs, GPS, email, SMS, the list goes on and on. Other things like gay rights, or in this case openly gay behavior in the club, dress codes, piercings, tattoos, open lesbianism and general lose sexual standards started to catch his eye.

We're sitting having a coffee the next morning and Jake made this remark that both stunned me and opened my eyes at the same time.

"I thought I was getting out to freedom, but I feel like I'm in a much larger prison. Even the women behave like jailbirds these days."

"How's that?" I replied.

"Well the number of people with tattoos to start with. Tattoos used to be for jail birds and military boys. Today everyone seems to have one. The aggressive attitudes in the clubs, made me feel like I was in the prison cafeteria and all the homosexual behavior and lesbian looking women around town, it's like everyone is a jail bird."

The social attitudes of 'feed me, feed me' where an entire generation seems to believe the world owes them a living, the gay and women's rights and the overriding social pressure to be politically correct and not mention or criticize minorities, lifestyle choices, sexual orientation and so on and so forth. The heavy handed anti-terrorist laws have been put in place to make you feel all cozy and safe; in one sense you are free to do as you please and in another sense you are in a low security jail.

He had failed to pick up girls a few times during the evening before we relented and went to the strip club. We went on to talk about how aggressive the women seem to have become. He doesn't look bad for a guy of his age, and he's ripped having little to do but pump iron all day. Obviously he's dumb to game and the whole hypergamy thing that has taken control of the lizard brains, but he was still more shocked than you might have expected. I related to what he was talking about having been shielded myself inside an LTR for seven years.

The conversation wandered about as we tried to wrestle with a solution for all the world's ills. It's always fun to try to 'save the world' since it's an impossible task – so instead you come up with some comical and insane suggestions like roving death squads.

His idea though has a certain amount of merit. As scary it might be, we do live in more and more of a 'jail' type environment, we just don't realize it. Web sites like Prison Planet sing a similar song. The reality of social decline and restricted freedoms is more than apparent if you truly want to look at it in the cold hard light of day. Sure you might have a safety net, but is it stopping you from falling or forming the walls of your cage?

"Life has become like living in a jail"

Many people have tattoos, exaggerated tribal or gang type codes, and a hostile (or what we at ROK might term an insecure) attitude. People curry favor with those in power to make their lives easier. Could be a boss, a landlord, someone in authority. Higher up the food chain in politics and government it's no different. Women have become masculinized, creating what Jake termed "men with tiny dicks". There is a general feeling of not having to take responsibility for yourself, the safety net of 'the system' is firmly in place (although to ROK readers it looks more like a cage) – it makes people behave in certain ways that are very similar to the population of a prison.

He explained to me that one of the ways in jail that guys dominate each other and push someone into submission is with the use of sodomy. Even the guards do it. Obviously it's a certain niche in the prison. Some guys steer clear of it, others have authority and control through brute force, with financial favors, or with the guards, or having connections to drugs, luxuries, illicit cell phones and so forth. Others just keep their heads down. But he explained there was a hierarchy established in some groups in the prison, through the use of having a bitch, especially amongst lifers. It's not just a sexual thing, or gay – it's a question of creating loyalty and having someone to cover your back and run errands and favors for you. The bitches gained many benefits they might not otherwise have had access to.

“The answer is to fuck your bird in the ass, then she’ll be your bitch”

In times gone by, women were submissive to the male in large part due to the sexual act. The emotional response to having another human being penetrate your body and deposit their genetic fluids inside it is not to be overlooked in terms of establishing a power structure. I can hear the feminists howling rape as I write this, but it’s not entirely the case. The alpha in the pack from gorillas to buffalo maintains his group of females in part because he is the one that mounts them. If he doesn’t they will stray and find another male. The gay crowd often have a top and a bottom in a relationship and the top is definitely the dominant where they do.

While women are hardwired to be submissive to their man, the internet is on fire with married men complaining about how aggressive, cold, demanding and so forth their wives have become. Clearly the power structure has collapsed. Women are not happy either—they are crashing about in men’s lives and bouncing from one divorce to the next. Vaginal sex is now seen as nothing more than a pleasurable pastime for women. It no longer carries the weight it once did. As Goldstein confirmed from experience in his recent article, finding a girl who’s a virgin or who truly holds sex with you as something precious, meaningful and treasured is increasingly hard if not impossible. If you find a sweetie, you can be sure her friends are in her ear steering her towards feminism and man hating.

Whereas before a woman having sex with a man meant to some degree she had given herself away to that man, that she was now under his umbrella, today it is virtually meaningless—just a quick mutual genital massage. Sodomy on the other hand is still an act that has not been entirely pushed into the realm of indifference like regular sex has. You can most certainly find girls that are anal virgins.

I then related this back to an experience of my own, where an ex had got curious about anal sex from watching porn. She started asking to try it. She came out with this strange idea that although she’d slept with 5-6 different guys, she knew her husband would be the one she’d give her ass to. We freely had anal sex for many months, until we both passed over it as a ‘phase’. For that year, the relationship was amazing. She was literally my bitch. She did what she was told. I’m not the super player or ultra porno guy, but thinking into it more, I realized another experience of anal sex I’d had with a prior girlfriend who also turned into my bitch.

I was trying to think into why this might be and you can laugh at my theory, but the connection of the rectum to the digestive system which is in many ways the emotional brain of the human machine is clear and present. When someone says ‘he hasn’t got the stomach for it’ they mean it both literally and metaphorically. If you look at the intestines they look a lot like the curls of the brain. Being stressed or nervous can literally shut down your digestion, make you throw up or lose your appetite. It’s an emotional group of organs. The kidneys and lungs for example are a more logical organ, they just process all day long. The expression tight assed is another that springs to mind.

When a man is sodomised in jail, it’s not just the stigma or the act itself. As Jake explained – another male has taken control, and possessed his emotional state, both physically and psychologically, he therefore becomes submissive, at least until he's been nailed by 20 different guys, then the whole thing becomes as much of a moot point as the vagina does these days. He gets bitchy after a while, now he's got value, something others want. But his first has a huge hold.

It's a theory for you to consider and experiment with. I noticed both my previous relationships got out of hand a few months after we stopped doing anal. If you want to hang on to her, try doing her in the ass a few times a month. Make her submit to you. It might make her settle down and lose some of the entitled attitude.

7 Reasons Why You Shouldn’t Date A Model

December 10, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Men are wrong in thinking that models would make an ideal life partner. Not only are models human beings like the rest of us, but they possess serious flaws that make dating them a potentially negative experience. Here are seven reason why you shouldn’t date one…

1. They never had to develop their intellect or personality

Models are incredibly dull-witted. You would be too if everyone responded favorably to you since childhood just because you were genetically beautiful. It has never happened in the history of the world that a model said something interesting or impressive. They simply never developed the normal mental faculties to do so, because merely existing and coasting by on their beauty was enough. A model is great to look at, but after you have sex with her a couple times, you won’t uncover a secret treasure that makes you like her even more. It only gets worse over time.

> You guys, honest moment: I just peed on my own back porch bc I locked myself out, am waiting on a locksmith & couldn’t hold it any longer.
> — Brooklyn Decker (@BrooklynDecker) November 19, 2013

2. They are so insecure that they need constant validation

You'd think that having all that beauty would make models self-confident, but in fact the opposite occurs. She knows that her beauty is like a Silicon Valley IPO that will inevitably crash, so she needs constant reassurance that you value her as a human being, when in actuality you like her just for her incredibly pretty face. They will be constantly late to dates because of the extra time they must spend in the mirror making sure they look perfect. That's not entirely bad unless you have theater or dinner reservations.

> Hair And make up done ?Now its time to rock the runway !!! Kisses!! See you on the runway!! Pronta!!!… http://t.co/iuX7Vp1Lc8 — Izabel Goulart (@iza_goulart) November 13, 2013

3. Rich men will constantly try to steal her from you

You'll never be able to rest when dating a model because there are more men who want to date models than there are models. In other words, supply is low while demand is high. Therefore you will have to accept that she'll be approached non-stop by other men who are much richer than you, taller than you, and much better looking than you. It will be impossible for you not to feel relationship anxiety in the face of this constant onslaught. If you do eventually get a model to settle down with you, your best bet is to move her to a farm where other men can't tempt her with their overly generous offers of seduction.

4. She's always on the road

New York this week. Milan the next. Runway show tomorrow. Magazine shoot the day after. She's going to be so busy that you won't be able to establish a regular sex schedule. What's the point of having a girlfriend if she's busy traveling the world while you have to jerk off? The point of dating a girl is so you don't have to masturbate, but if you enter a relationship with a beautiful model, you may find yourself masturbating more than ever.

> Here we go again now in Istanbul for L'officiel love this place !Mais um dia de trabalho agora em… http://t.co/mANn9aw5I3 — Ana Beatriz Barros (@anabbofficial) November 15, 2013

5. She’s horrible in bed

Why should a model take time to study the Kama Sutra like normal girls when so many men feel blessed merely to see her naked? The result is that a model has the absolute worst sex ability out of all other female socio-economic and professional classes. It’s pretty close to having sex with a Japanese sex doll, and don’t ask me how I know that. Even worse, if you want your dick sucked, you’ll get more pleasure sticking it through a glory hole of a gay bathhouse than requesting a model give you oral fornicative pleasure. A dick of respectable girth is like kryptonite to a model’s mouth.

> Walk into my acting school and there’s a weird group of people in a circle talking, at first I thought AA, now I know it’s worse- politics — genevieve morton (@genevievemorton) October 8, 2013

6. She doesn’t possess even the most basic homemaking skills

Girls don’t dream to become models because they want to cook hearty meals at home or repair your shirt buttons. You’ll know more about knitting a scarf and raising kittens than she ever will. In fact, besides modeling, she’s nearly useless as a human being. I really hope beauty is the only quality you want in a woman, because there’s not much else a model can offer you. Don’t expect her to do anything except look pretty and vacantly stare at you with her ravishing eyes.

> Breakfast? Ummm maybe. or nah? #peanutbutta http://t.co/Ug0rTWhKzi — Selita Ebanks (@SelitaEbanks) November 3, 2013

7. She doesn’t know how to handle money

Models know their careers will be short, sort of like American football players, but they don’t have the common sense to save money during their prime years to make it through the remainder of their lives. You can’t blame them entirely—if you were getting a $10,000 check to purse your lips for an hour, you probably wouldn’t know the value of money either. Nevertheless, don’t think you get any financial benefits from dating what you incorrectly think is a “rich” girl. They spend all their money and then have no choice at 30 but to find a rich man to take care of them. Therefore if you’re not a rich dude (I’m not), the best time to date a model is when she’s working, because she’ll more easily ignore the fact that you are dirt broke.

If you decide to ignore my advice and date a model, the best thing I can tell you is to have very low expectations about the longevity of the relationship. Do it for fun, do it for kicks, but don't take her seriously. Just making it to the three-month mark will be quite commendable on your part. In the meantime, have no shame for dating non-models. Maybe the beauty of a normal girl won't be as high, but she'll be able to do a better job satisfying you sexually, emotionally, and intellectually.

The Truth About False Rape Accusations That All Men Should Know

December 10, 2013 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

It was my first year of undergrad. I hooked up with a girl and laughed in her face when she suggested we hang out again. Predictably, she got upset.

She went to visit her don (floor captain/residence adviser), and poured her heart out. In a sane world, they would have shared some tears, some hugs, and some sisterly advice to watch out for smooth-talking boys with a copy of Roosh's Bang in their back pocket.

But this particular don was a gender studies major with a persecution complex and a close resemblance to late-career Roseanne Barr. She let out a deep Social Justice Warrior battle cry, and spent the semester trying to bully my consensual conquest into accusing me of rape. Fortunately for me, the girl was a decent human being with a strong enough personality to resist the allure of petty revenge. I am a free man.

This was almost a decade ago. If that girl had been weaker, dumber, or more vindictive, my life may have turned out very different. I once thought that my story was unique, but I've since learned that it's much more common than you might think.

American men have started to realize that falsified rape claims are a serious threat to us, even though the issue is completely ignored by mainstream media sources.

Here are three reasons why you should be aware of the danger of false rape accusations:

1. False rape accusations are very common

Statistics on politicized issues like this are often untrustworthy. Many police departments resolve even the most obvious cases of false rape accusation by sending both parties home, recording no crime, and making the girl pinky swear never to do it again. But to my surprise, several decent studies have been done on the frequency of false rape accusations.

A meta-analysis by Rumney (2006) suggests that between 10-50% of rape allegations are false. Kanin (1994) arrived at an estimate of 40%, using methodology that strikes me as more trustworthy than a simple count of police-recorded 'malicious accusations', since many false rape claims are ignored. Kanin's unique process was as follows:

> Kanin investigated the incidences of false rape allegations made to the police in one small urban community between 1978 and 1987. He states that unlike those in many larger jurisdictions, this police department had the resources to "seriously record and pursue to closure all rape complaints, regardless of their merits." He further states each investigation "always involves a serious offer to polygraph the complainants and the suspects" and "the complainant must admit that no rape had occurred. She is the sole agent who can say that the rape charge is false."
> The number of false rape allegations in the studied period was 45; this was 41% > of the 109 total complaints filed in this period. The researchers verified, whenever possible, for all of the complainants who recanted their allegations, that their new account of the events matched the accused's version of events.

Other studies have arrived at figures as high as 90%, such as Stewart (1981), who considered one case disproved because: "It was totally impossible to have removed her extremely tight undergarments from her extremely large body against her will." I wonder if she lives near Nigel?

Most convincing to me, and more trustworthy than anything put out by any modern academic, is the claim by Danger and Play that more than 50% of 'date rape' accusations are false. I'll take the word of one man I trust over a dozen corrupt and career-climbing academics, but in this case the academics seem to agree with the anecdotes: False rape claims are extremely common.

2. There are no penalties for women who bring false rape charges

A false rape accusation is not merely an attack on a man's character. It is an attempt to kidnap, imprison, torture, and perhaps murder an innocent man. It is a profoundly evil act, and yet there are often no consequences for women who make false rape accusations. Consider the case of Leanne Black, who accused five different men of rape before she was sentenced to two years in prison. Or Ashleigh Loder, who spent just six months in jail for a false rape accusation.

Hilariously, the tagline in that second article is: "Mother-of-two wasted 100 hours of police time by inventing the assaults." As if the wasted police resources, and not the act of trying to imprison an innocent man for the rest of his life, is her most newsworthy crime.

There is no real penalty for women who make false rape accusations, despite the fact that it is at least as severe of a crime as rape itself. Personally, I would much rather be raped than spend a decade or more in prison, especially since there is a good chance that an American man charged with rape will wind up being raped quite a bit. I suspect very few people, male or female, would choose to spend decades in prison, over a single incidence of rape. And yet, false accusations are treated like parking fines – accumulate enough, and you might get a slap on the wrist.

3. The Definition of Rape Is Subjective

What is rape, anyways? Once upon a time it was when a man had sex with a woman even while she was saying 'No.'

Today, articles like this argue that a "weak yes" can also be considered a "No". Feminists are actively working to re-define the definition of consent to make it as subjective and open to manipulation as possible. The days of "No Means No" are long gone, replaced by a new paradigm of "If I Wake Up and Feel Uncomfortable With What Happened, Well I Guess I Must Have Been Feeling No."

Historically, if a girl is passed-out drunk and a guy has sex with her while she's unconscious – that's rape.

But what if a girl is just pretty drunk? What if the man has also been drinking? Are both guilty of rape? In a sane world, drunk people would be held responsible for whatever decisions they made while intoxicated. Drunk people still have agency, otherwise "I was drunk" would be always be a valid defense for drunk driving. The idea that a girl can wake up the morning after a night of enthusiastic sex and claim that she was too drunk to consent, is absolutely ridiculous.

College-aged men are put in an especially precarious position by the murkiness of rape laws, and the lack of consequences for women who make false accusations. It's easy enough for me, as a twenty-eight year old man with a lot of dating experience, to avoid unstable drunk girls. But consider a young man on the college hook-up scene, in which the majority of girls he meets are impulsive, immature, and a heavy drinkers. Such a man should immediately learn How To Avoid A False Rape Accusation and start taking the precautions in that article.

Conclusion

These are the reasons why smart young men are aware of the growing threat of false rape accusations. It's why men with options don't date feminists. It's why smart men send an 'I didn't rape you' text. And it's why men are disregarding the bullshit mainstream news sources that completely ignore issues like this, and reading sites like Thumotic and Return of Kings instead.

We're coming out with two more articles on False Rape Accusations this week. Tomorrow we'll look at How False Rape Accusations Force Men To Be Nice Guys. Make sure to follow us on Twitter so you don't miss out.

3 Facts You Didn’t Know About A Woman’s Nature

December 10, 2013 | by Don Selonius | Link | Original Link

After studying some evolutionary psychology, I was shocked to find that a woman’s scheming ways are actually a biological instilled trait, one she cannot readily control. I had assumed woman treated infidelity the same way men did, out of conscious choice to do so, but I was wrong. One book that stood out was Sperm Wars by Robin Baker. When it was released in 1996, it caused extreme controversy and was met very critically by angry reviewers (mostly female). With its re-release 10 years later it became an instant best seller and classic. It’s a must read for anyone interested in the scientific aspect of sex/relationships. I will briefly sum up a few of the facts that stood out the most.

1. 10% of children are not fathered by their “fathers

Perhaps we’ve underestimated the phrase “Alpha fucks, Beta bucks.” It is always a sad moment when you read an article in the news about some respected male celebrity who was duped by his beautiful wife into raising a child who wasn’t biologically his. The thought that the child could have possibly belonged to another man never crossed his mind. An obscenity like demanding a DNA test would have been outlandish on his part and disrespectful to his wife.

However, we see this all the time on the Maury show, where we like to laugh at unintelligent individuals who beat their chest and flip chairs when they’re told their new baby was, in fact, from another affair. Those people you criticize for misjudging their partner’s fidelity are not so much different from you and I. In an evolutionary perspective, the man who pumped and dumped (alpha) is successful because his seed was conceived and taken care of by another family. The woman wins too, her vagina favored the “lover’s” sperm over the “partner’s” and her child will have the genes of a champion (as well as being provided for by the loyal spouse).

The unfortunate loser is the unknowing beta male who assumed the baby was his. After dismissing suspicions that his woman cheated on her last business trip to Barbados, he is now playing the provider role for another man’s child. Even if he chooses to leave her, he will be stuck paying child support for the illegitimate child.

2. “Smart” vaginal mucus encourages some sperm but blocks others

Smart is correct. I always knew women were governed by their emotions but I had no idea their vaginas made decisions for them. Women seem to be far more likely to conceive through a casual fling than through sex with a regular partner, which explains why a rapist’s sperm is usually the most successful in impregnating his victims. This also probably explains the rape fantasy most women like to deny exists. As it turns out, a vagina will reject a load of unwanted sperm in what is called a “flowback” sometimes hours after intercourse. The preconception that all sperm is just as likely to impregnate is false.

Some couples try for months, even years to conceive only to meet failure time and time again. It isn’t only that the guy’s sperm is probably on the weaker side—it’s the woman’s pussy who is constantly rejecting his attempts.

A message to all newlywed males: that “bad boy” dude next door your wife has coffee with every Tuesday has probably fucked her at least once. The tests are in: you are NOT the father. “How could you, wifey? How could you help that guy’s sperm beat mine, after all we’ve been through!” It’s not her fault. It was her meddling judgemental vagina who’s to blame.

3. Vaginas encouraged evolution of sperm warriors

“Less than one percent of a man’s sperm is capable of fertilizing anything.” These guys are called the “egg-getters”. The strikers going for goal on your reproductive soccer team. The rest are “killers” (who kill other sperm with corrosive poison) and blockers (who prevent other egg-getter’s from probing the cervix). This means that a vagina promotes sperm warfare. Whether she favors one sperm load or the other contributes to the sperm’s success.

Men also subconsciously ejaculate more sperm at times than others. For example, his body may say “Is this a 150 million sperm load or 30 mill day?” This happens subconsciously every time you ejaculate in your girlfriend, you are just “topping up” her already full vaginal reservoir (assuming you had sex with her only a short time ago). If you have a repeat sexual partner like a girlfriend or wife, you are giving more blockers who “patrol” the vagina ready for intruders. However, if you were to rape a girl the next night, you’d deliver more killers and egg-getters.

Do yourself a favor and grab this book to learn more interesting facts, such as the probability of a homosexual child, the manipulative techniques orchestrated through a woman's orgasm, and the role of rape in evolutionary reproduction. It will help you understand the subconscious drivers of human sexual biology. Our brains have evolved an intellectual capacity where we feel in control, but our genitals operate on a different program.

26 More Signs She's A Slut

December 11, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

A few months ago, I wrote a post titled 24 Signs She's A Slut. In it, I itemized a few tells of promiscuity in women that I—and men everywhere—have figured out through hard, empirical work over the years. Perhaps I should've expected it, but the piece instantly stirred up spirited responses, particularly from certain demographics. While getting a lot of "daps" and cosigns from level-headed men and women, it also managed to kick over a hornet's nest of angry, closeted strumpets who didn't appreciate having light cast on their scandalous behind-the-scenes shenanigans. Everyone knows that sluts, like Dick Cheney, lurk in the shadows.

A common counter-argument to the article was the logical fallacy of presenting an exception to the rule to try to disprove it. The formula was simple:

> 1. Pick one of the more innocuous signs that applies to you ("I have blue hair").

> 2. Claim to have a relatively tame sexual past ("I've been in the same relationship for the last 7 years").
> 3. Declare the entire article null and void ("Therefore you're wrong").

Of course, these people conveniently failed to read the part of the article that says the more tells a woman exhibits, the more likely it is that she's a slut. Absent is any black-and-white claim that any single one of these signs alone automatically renders a woman a slut. For example, I acknowledge it's totally possible to meet a nun with a tattoo. That said, a double-digit count made a slut diagnosis near-inevitable.

Among the pieces of constructive criticism I received was that the list is simply not comprehensive. In consideration to my reader, I'd deliberately presented an "abridged list." So, by popular demand:

Tuthmosis's List of Slut Tells, Part II

1. She smokes (cigarettes). The classic adage has never been more true: if she smokes, she most certainly pokes. A girl who smokes is a natural risk-taker—especially in an age where we're fully cognizant of dangers of the habit. If she gambles with her pulmonary health, rest assured she also takes risks in her sex life.

2.Has mostly "guy friends." A woman's comfort around hordes of dudes—and participation in their "guy activities"—likely extends into the bedroom. If for no other reason than simple attrition, sooner or later the conditions (inebriation, horniness, isolation) have been right with several of her so-called guy friends.

3. Wears color contacts. The bigger the cosmetic lie, the bigger the slut. Eye color is a pretty big untruth.

4. Has slutty role models like Miley Cyrus, Taylor Swift, or any of the Kardashians. Women are natural copycats, and it's a good bet that they're not only copying their idols' fashion choices and speech patterns.

5. Wears hoop earrings. Sayings exist for a reason, and "the bigger the hoop, the bigger the hoe" has stuck around precisely because of its reliability. Perhaps no other fashion accessory speaks louder. If you could fit a soda can in it, you're golden.

6. Grew up with multiple brothers, especially if they're older. The little sister gets dragged along to gatherings of older boys, who monitor her development like an impatient baker watching a cake through the oven window. She overhears guy-talk through her formative years, and inherits a quasi-male cavalier attitude toward sex.

7. Went to Catholic- or all-girls school (during or after puberty). These places are natural incubators for horniness and sexual resentment, which few girls have the natural willpower to resist satiating upon departure.

8. Has a loud voice and/or a loud laugh. The loudest girl in the bar is never the most prudish.

9. Is an athlete, especially at the elite level. Athletic girls have a triumvirate of powerful pull-factors into slut territory: fit bodies that make them supremely desirable; higher testosterone levels, and therefore higher sex drives; and access to successful and equally horny alpha males. Recent exposés on the epic fuckfests in the Olympic Village have only further confirmed this.

10. Drinks manly drinks. If a girl orders a whiskey on your first date, close your tab and figure out which one of you lives closer to the bar.

11. Is an inveterate online attention-whore (i.e., has thousands of Facebook "friends," regularly uploads tons of sexy "selfies," includes herself in pictures of everything she "shares"). Attention-whoring is only one step removed from actual whoring. She thrives on male attention and it doesn't stop just because she's not in front of her MacBook or iPhone.

12. Majored in psychology. It's well known that a not-insignificant percentage of female psychology majors are damaged girls looking for "answers." That damage, at the very least, grazes the sexual realm.

13. Doesn't object to, or outright proposes, unprotected sex early on. Do you really think you're the first, or last, to raw-dog her on the first date?

14. Is good at giving blow jobs. Oral sex is like playing violin or writing calligraphy—fine work that requires practice. There are no prodigies.

15. Claims to be "good at dancing" but doesn't do any formal dances (e.g., tango). You only get good at grinding your ass against a man's boner in a dark room by doing it week in and week out. A certain percentage of those boners end up getting past the goalie.

16. Is a single mother. This almost goes without saying, but single mothers rarely made one "mistake," as they often claim. She only made one mistake that's visible and audible to everyone.

17. Describes herself as polyamorous, "into kink," sex-positive, or simply as being "sexual." Girls are masters at devising euphemisms, especially for their misbehaviors. Take note if her euphemisms translate into little more than horny, trampy, and sexually deviant.

My self-summary

I am on here for the gender queer and ladies, and especially not heterosexual / heteronomative males.

I am fun, smart, and hilarious. I have only one volume, and that would be loud! I like to make people laugh, cuddle, give massages. I love to take showers, and sit around in a towel for as long as possible. I swear worse than a trucker and sailor combined, you have been warned.

I am polyamorous, queer, and kinky. I currently have a few people I am casually seeing in [redacted] and a girlfriend in [redacted] I am very multifaceted so it would be impossible for one person to fill all my wants and needs. I might be very sexual, but when it comes down to it, sex is something that I save for significant relationships.

18. Moved to New York City at some point in her life but isn't actually from there. Moving to New York during your 20s for no good reason, and without a boyfriend or husband, is a near-guarantee that you partook in the female sex buffet that is the Big Apple.

19. Has fake tits or, worse, a fake ass. These even bigger cosmetic lies than color contacts, and more permanent.

20. Is a "fag-hag" (a.k.a. "fruit fly"). Girls who hang around gay men, accompanying them to their rowdy clubs, get manhandled by dudes as a matter of routine. She simultaneously feeds her attention-whoring addiction and her PG-13 sexual cravings. Straight or semi-straight guys will regularly capitalize on her horny moments and hit it. Of course, those won't "count."

21. Is into "cosplay." Dressing up like sexy versions of cartoon and video-game characters is little more than a thinly veiled form of sexual-attention seeking from men.

22. Is on birth control, but not in a relationship. These are girls who are expecting to have unprotected sex any minute. If she has an IUD, she's made a long-term commitment to casual sex.

23. Is always late to things. Habitual tardiness is tell-tale sign of general irresponsibility. This correlates with sexual carelessness.

24. Has an oversized man-jaw or a big mouth. Like hairiness and a low vocal-register, a man-jaw is a sign of high testosterone and, by extension, oversized sexual cravings.

25. Is somewhat overweight. Girls who dance around the 6 range—especially if it's because of their dumpy, unfit physiques—are sufficiently attractive to participate in the sexual marketplace, but not cute enough to compete with the real hotties. They'll make up the difference by being easy.

26. Her mother is a slut. Like mother, like daughter. The person in the best position to steer her daughter away from a life of skankiness is her mother. And, the best way to teach her daughter how not to be the slut is by modeling that behavior herself. But just like violent fathers raise violent sons, slutty mothers raise slutty daughters.

The great American jurist Louis Brandeis once remarked that "sunlight is the best disinfectant." Bringing these iron-clad slut tells to light isn't necessarily a condemnation of promiscuous women. It just allows men to make the informed choice of either avoiding commitment to a girl who's willfully made herself the cake in the urinal or, alternatively, seeking that girl out.

The Worst Advice Ever For Strong Men

December 11, 2013 | by americanbk | Link | Original Link

For centuries, people have had this phrase jammed into their heads from birth: “Do onto others as you would have them do onto you.” Your mom, your teachers, your religion, and celebrities all preach this statement as the only code of moral conduct. To summarize: “Play nice.”

If you are presented with an opportunity to can take advantage of a person’s weakness or vulnerability, The Golden Rule mandates that you should not use the situation to your benefit. After all, you wouldn’t anyone to take advantage of you, right?

In a perfect scenario, this reciprocity would result in everyone being equal. The weak and the vulnerable could live without fear. On paper, this theory in action could solve all of the world problems, but here’s the issue: if the strong and dangerous contribute to the Golden Rule by playing nice, what do the weak and vulnerable contribute to balance the equation? They do NOT play nice.

Those who identify as a victim, regardless of whether or not they are, are encouraged to ruthlessly seek justice for themselves. For those who are not real victims, this “justice” means fighting for selfish desires or trying to obtain power they are not worthy of. And by making an awful lot of complaints.

If you are a strong, handsome, successful man, odds are you do not find yourself playing the victim role very often. In an animalistic world, females and the weaker men would be at your mercy. You have the ability to overpower them, outsmart them, and conquer them at will. However, according to The Golden Rule, taking advantage of your strengths is immoral and wrong. After all, if you were weak and vulnerable, wouldn't you want them to show you some mercy?

Why Does the Golden Rule Fail in Real Life?

There are two major flaws with the Golden Rule of moral conduct:

1. Life under the Golden Rule is extremely fragile.

The Golden Rule only works when everyone follows the rule perfectly. If even one person takes advantage of a vulnerable situation, the Utopian world is thrown off, and artificial winners and losers are unfairly created. Also, if people who aren't really victims play the victim card, the entire honor system is completely destroyed.

2. The strong and dangerous often remain that way the majority of their lives, while the weak and vulnerable victims rarely improve themselves.

By definition, the Golden Rule demands that the strong spend most of their lives relinquishing power while the victims collect it for no good reason. The weak will likely never have to return the favor – this promotes people identifying as victims for life.

Despite the obvious flaws in this moral system, modern society continues to push the Golden Rule on its people. Basic biological differences make men bigger and stronger than women on average — nature intended men to dominate and for women to submit.

It’s easy to figure out who the Golden Rule dictates should play nice and who should not.

When dealing with victims, men who live by the Golden Rule are very polite. Society tells them that women are weak and vulnerable, and that men must be understanding of all their hardships and demands. After all, how would he feel if he was in her shoes?

“It’s OK that she elbowed me in the ribs at the bar. After all, how would I feel if I was five feet tall and had to navigate through these giants?”

“It’s OK that she cancelled our date at the last minute again. After all, how would I feel if I had to get up early for my 11am class and she was pressuring me to meet up?”

Even when obviously being taken advantage of others, these same men still stick to their moral guns.

“It’s OK that I got targeted in the Knockout Game. After all, how would I feel if I was an underprivileged urban youth with nothing better to do?”

While these “noble” men act in the best interest of weak, expecting to be repaid with similar kindness if they ever become vulnerable, many “victims” are simply plotting how to achieve their next helping of justice. Take, for example, the most infamous victims in the history of the modern world: feminists.

This poor, mistreated feminist shamelessly used her victim identity. Golden Rulers jumped to the rescue with generous donations to help a vulnerable person they didn’t know because hey, how would they feel if they were denied pay because of their sexual orientation?

As permanent victims, feminist thirst for undeserved power and justice is never quenched. Regardless of how much power men relinquish, feminists view men as the cruel slave masters beating them down. This is why beta males and white knights receive no love for their numerous gifts to the feminist cause—if they were born with a larger stature and a penis, they are the enemy for life.

The Dirty Truths

The “Golden Rule” ignores three dirty truths that victims forbid men from speaking about:

1. Men still have the physical ability to keep hoes (and the rest of the weak) in line – they just repress it.

This can be seen on a daily basis in any third-world country or traditional society. Not necessarily ideal, but a definite option.

2. There are few situations in which the world will sympathize with a strong, successful man.

If you are waiting for the weak to return the favor, don’t hold your breath.

3. Even in situations when the Golden Rule commands sympathy for a successful man, those who identify as the victim will never play nice.

What about me? I have problems too! GIVE ME STUFF.

My advice to men is to not follow the Golden Rule. This does not mean to be evil, but to use your strengths to act in the best interest of yourself. If you choose to do good deeds for others, do them because you truly want to. Bill Gates had to screw over many people in the business world and create an unfair monopoly to earn his fortune — but now, as one of greatest philanthropists of all time, he has the power to give millions of dollars each year to the causes of his choosing.

If you give away your masculine power just because society tells you to, don't expect to ever get it back. And certainly don't expect to receive a thank you in the mail.

The Most Abominable Christian Wife On The Internet

December 11, 2013 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Jenny Erikson, a conservative Christian mommy blogger, recently attracted the attention of the manosphere when she posted posted an attack on her pastor for "spoiling the surprise" of her divorce by telling her husband before she could.

When Jenny talked to a friend about leaving her marriage, the news made its way to Jenny's pastor, who contacted her husband, Leif, to let him know what was coming. Her husband went home, and the following conversation transpired:

> "I want to know what My Pastor told you," I [Jenny] repeated.
> He paused. Dried his hands. Took a deep breath. Sighed. "That you were planning on filing for divorce on Friday," he finally admitted.
> So there you go. My Pastor had actually told my husband, based on a fourth-hand rumor, without talking to me first, that I was planning on leaving him. That. Just. Happened.
> "I filed for divorce last week," I told him flatly. "I was planning on telling you this Friday."

Jenny accuses her pastor of repeating a "rumor" that he heard "fourth-hand" while freely admitting she had already filed for the divorce a week ago. She wants to blame him for something, but was just mad she got caught.

> My husband defended him as doing his pastoral duty. I looked him straight in the eyeballs and said, "The fact that you are defending this man's actions yesterday > is one of a thousand reasons I cannot stay married to you."

The Bible's position on divorce is pretty clear: don't. Jenny shouldn't be shocked that her pastor would warn a member of his congregation his wife is about to destroy his family, and give him a chance to confront her and repair the marriage.

Who is Jenny Erikson?

The tagline of Jenny's blog is "God, Family, Politics, Wine (in that order)." Her profile picture is a cell phone image of her with a fruity alcoholic drink captioned "conservative blogger" when you hover your mouse over it. She has supported the Tea Party, been to CPAC three years in a row, and submitted a video question to the GOP presidential debates.

She and her pastor had clashed before over an article she wrote entitled Victoria's Secret's New Teen Lingerie Is Something All Moms Should be Happy About. She also wrote a piece against 'Fitness Mom' Maria Kang, who posted a picture of her toned body and three children with the caption, "What's your excuse?" and a piece against Tuthmosis's ROK article 5 Reasons to Date a Girl with an Eating Disorder, meaning she is familiar with this site.

Jenny writes that she was "contemplating drinking before 9am" the day after announcing her divorce, revealing a lot about her relationship to alcohol and true feelings about the divorce. Shortly after her husband left, she got a Bible verse tattooed on her wrist, in an attempt to be as "hip" as other women. While Jenny is comfortable criticizing the government, she believes women are beyond reproach, even if they are drunk, fat, dressing their daughters in sexy lingerie, marking their bodies, suffering from eating disorders, or claiming God told them to break up their family.

Jenny is excommunicated, responds with snark

After divorcing her husband, her pastor rightfully excommunicated her. For those not familiar with the customs of the church, excommunication is a fancy word for kicking someone out. Usually, excommunication occurs when someone breaks a major rule and is unrepentant — unrepentant being the key word, because if Jenny was to say, "I'm sorry, I was wrong," most churches would let her back in.

Instead, Jenny posted the letter her church sent her and peppered it with snarky comments:

> Form for Excommunication:
> As you know we have announced to you the great sin committed and the grievous offense given by our fellow-member, Jennifer Erikson, to the end that, by your Christian admonitions and prayers, she might come to her senses, turn to God, and escape from the snare of the devil, after being captured by him to do his will (2 Tim. 2:26).
> [Another side note. Snare of the Devil. I'm sorry, but I just snorted. Y'all should've heard it. It was totally sexy. Snare. Of. The. Devil.]
> …So yeah that happened.

You'll notice most of her posts end with some version of "that happened" or "That. Just. Happened" as if she is deeply surprised that her actions have consequences and there are other people in the world who don't share her narcissistic fantasy, in which God thinks exactly like her and agrees with every decision she makes. Her substitution of indignant phrases for counter argument shows an inability to imagine or empathize with a perspective other than her own.

What life is like for Jenny after divorce

At least Jenny seems to be adjusting adjusting to single life well:

> I've been living without a man around the house for just over a month now, and there are definitely some things I've had to get over. Spiders, for instance. I've had to kill numerous spiders all by myself. I tried to make the girls do it, but they were too busy screaming bloody murder at the eight-legged freaks to obey me. We're going to have to work on that. Or something…
> I've had to do all my own dishes. Leif used to do that…
> Money. Is. Tight.
> So far, a toilet hasn't clogged yet, but I know it will eventually (hello, I have kids!), and then it will be my responsibility to fix it.

The fact this man used to do the dishes for her tells you everything you need to know. Her husband Leif shared in the housework, provided for his family, was present as a father, and active in his church. He seems by all accounts to be a good man.

What can we learn from this?

Jenny's actions have been slammed by Christian manosophere bloggers such as Dalrock and Sunshinemary. The fact that a significant number of bloggers identify as "Christian manosophere bloggers" shows that even conservative Christian men in monogamous marriages need game nowadays.

Jenny Erikson's husband did exactly what he was told he was supposed to do. He had the full support of his community and pastor and it still wasn't enough to preserve his relationship. The sad truth is that by supporting his wife, Leif was supplicating rather than leading, even going so far as to buy her presents after she divorced him. Jenny describes him before marriage as "my shoulder to cry on when I went on bad dates" and "just friends.”

His wife placed a greater value on the tingles between her legs than her church, family, or God. If Leif had studied game, he might still have his marriage. Or have picked a better wife. We’ll never know.

Most churches wouldn’t even excommunicate a woman for divorce, instead placing blame on the man for failing to please his wife. There are pastors who regularly praise the heroic struggle of single moms. Feminism has infiltrated the church to such a degree that it’s dogma has become a part of church dogma.

Women like Jenny don’t just subscribe to the feminist dogma that we should support any choice a woman makes – they spiritualize it – saying that we should support any choice a woman makes because God wants us to. Even the Bible is just food pellets for her rationalization hamster.

Jenny Erikson is now a single mother with little money, two daughters to take care of, and the fading looks of body worn down by years of drinking and stress. Because she publicized her actions online, the stigma of abandoning her family will follow her as a warning to any man who’d consider dating her, and any Christian who thinks religion alone will spare him from the problems of modern women.

6 Types Of Photos Girls Use To Attention Whore On Tinder

December 11, 2013 | by Mxaddict14 | Link | Original Link

The Tinder App has played a large role in reinforcing the confidence of the girls characterized as "Haves" in Los Angeles. This has created a positive feedback loop, elevating their perceived value and separating them even further from the rest of the pack.

The art of taking pictures of oneself or girlfriends has been elevated to a new level. Rather than being employed solely for dating, Tinder is now used as a tool of marketing and self-promotion. Whereas girls used to simply post the best photos that they had on hand, many current Tinder photos are brazenly engineered to raise the desirability factor and elicit as many responses as possible. This is done all in order to feed their egos.

Here are the typical types of photos I have seen so far:

1. The Glamour Headshot

2. The Peak-A-Boo Shot

The second photo typically escalates to show a little bit more skin, somewhat of a tease.

The “Unbuttoned Blouse” shot shows a silk or chiffon blouse unbuttoned such that the graceful curve of her bosom is gently outlined by the scalloped lace of an expensive demi bra. Girls are even defining terms for these shots, such as “One Side Open,” whereby a man can get clear view of her elegant brassiere cup through the unbuttoned shirt or via a sleeveless opening.

A variation of this is the “Sheer” shot, where the material in her dress or blouse is thin enough to plainly see her nipples.

3. The Boob Shot

Women who really want to attract attention post a bolder picture showcasing either ample or perfectly shaped breasts.

Sometimes you even see pictures showing her leaning over to display her cleavage. These girls do not want to waste any time leaving the men guessing about the status of their sweater meat:

4. The Bedroom Shot

Next come the shots of the women cavorting in bed. These shots typically feature heels kicked up, an inviting smile, bra strap askew, or some other display of seduction.

5. The Girls Night Out Shot

Tinder girls are also found partying with their girlfriends, getting drunk on champagne, flaunting their little mini-skirts, and look within a hairsbreadth of jumping into some group sex. Suggesting they have lost their inhibitions is just what’s needed to lure men into swiping right.

6. The Bikini Shot

Then there is the fabled bikini shot, showing off elegant slenderness, flat stomachs, and breasts that can only be described in a word: extraordinary.

And the younger girls love to pose in pairs, each comparing how skinny she is in comparison to her girlfriend, usually at a well-known public location.

With all this intensifying competition, the girls at the top rung will be even more inclined to starve themselves on cold pressed juice diets, take even more yoga, barre, and pilates classes, spend even more on the finest lingerie, and shop for shirts, tops, blouses, and bikinis designed for maximum effect. More Botox treatments. More visits to the Laser Spa. More visits to the “How To” amateur boudoir photography sites.

What’s next?

My prediction is that Tinder will eventually morph into a photo slideshow designed to attract the attention of the most eligible males. In L.A. these are men with high connections in the entertainment or modeling industry, which will help the best looking girls up their fame game even further. The increasing level of competition between women will push out the “Have Nots” to Swoon or other venues of lesser quality, which in turn raises the bar for everyone else. Here’s what to expect next year:

Boudoir Shots

Like this one, not revealing too much, but just enough to get the guys salivating for more.

Amateur Lingerie Modeling Shots

The “Amateur” label is important, because nothing is hotter than a “Have” girl sensual enough to take pictures of herself in front of a mirror.

The Gap Grows Wider

So far, the newer girls I've seen on Tinder seem to be better and better looking. No need to install a "Fattie Filter" on that app quite yet. Many of them are putting in a catchy phrase or quote in the "About You" text box, along with an Instagram address so that approved males will be invited to look for more photos.

Just imagine knowing that you are in demand by hundreds of eligible men. Knowing that you will never be alone. That you are the envy of all the "Have Nots" who are stuck with bad genes or lack motivation and discipline to improve themselves. These women will be using Tinder in order to parlay their way up the food chain, to more successful alpha types, richer, better looking, and more accomplished men.

For the "Haves", there is no longer a need to flirt around or issue promises of sexual encounters in order to get the right man in their grasp. The self-promotion tools like Tinder, Facebook, and Instagram do that for them. Meanwhile, anyone else who does not have the requisite good appearance to compete on these sites and attract attention are falling further and further behind. These unfortunate souls are left to deal with the horrors of matchmaking, online dating, and hookup apps like Blendr or Skout. These are rapidly becoming the favorite venues for "Foodies," low-level women who sit at desk jobs all day snacking away, or customers of all the various "Plus Size" clothing stores. Good riddance.

Top 5 Best Responses For When A Girl Says “I Love You”

December 12, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

As it goes in a playboy’s life, he will experience at least once or twice, at the minimum, the girl who falls in love with him. If girls never fall in love with him, then he’s not doing something right. I never advocate leading a girl on, because there’s plenty of ways to keep her in your stable, without crushing her heart. A true master at game, can learn to navigate the treacherous waters of ‘love’ and still maintain his position as a free, independent man who has many lovers.

A girl who falls in love is a girl who has not been tainted beyond repair emotionally and one who still has hope in real true love. In order to handle a girl falling in love with you, it’s often best to have experienced having your heart crushed into oblivion. A great boxer will never be a great boxer without having sparred for hours on end and experiencing an ass kicking. In the same vein, most great playboys have experienced the feeling of ‘love’.

Is it simply a chemical reaction to another person and the euphoria of the newness of the relationship, or is it really an emotional reaction grounded in reality? I put ‘love’ in quotations, because the definition of ‘love’ is one that can be debated at another time and is not pertinent for this discussion.

For a true playboy who experiences many women and understands their need for emotional connection, he can understand how to react to when a girl drops the L bomb on him. Generally, a woman will say these words within 3-4 months of meeting a man, whereupon they have interacted sexually already and have spent multiple hours together. Depending on the girl she may say it sooner or later, but a good gauge is around the 3-4 months period when the relationship is quite fresh.

Here are my Top 5 Best Responses To ‘I Love You’. These will save you from committing to a girl if your only goal is to have her for a lover and you choose not to lead her on.

5. ”I Love Me Too”

This is a golden response when said in a carefree and playful manner. When a girl says ‘I love you’, and it’s not in the heat of passion when you two are entangled in a heap of blankets and body sweat, you can generally assume that she is being sincere. Now, remember that women are led by their emotions, so a statement of ‘love’, can simply be in the manner of how she’s feeling in the moment. Do not believe that when she says this initially, that it is her profession of real undying love, similar to what your mother would tell you. A mother’s love (when in context of one having a good mother), is not the same as a lover’s love.

Oftentimes men become vexed and discontent because they are seeking a mother’s love to be duplicated by a lover. I have fallen into this trap before and it’s simply not realistic, nor necessary for a man to live happily.

By stating ‘I love me too’, to the girl, you’re simply reinforcing that you are indeed, quite lovable, but you’re not allowing her to let her words affect you in the moment. Men show love through ACTIONS and women tend to show love through words and expressions of emotion.

She will love you more for showing that you can restrain yourself from saying it (even if you ‘feel’ it) and be attracted to you on an even higher level.

4. “You Have Good Taste”

This is similar to the previous mentioned response, in that you are putting your ‘blessing’ on her professing her love for you, but you are not falling into her frame. Maintaining frame is the foundation of game. The moment you fold to her whims and desires based on her request, then you lose the individuality that she is so attracted to.

3. “Of Course You Do”

Dialing it up a couple of notches into the cocky range of expression, this response is classic and can be used to great effect when combined with a smirk and a wink. A great playboy knows that he is a man of great value and that women world-wide desire him due to his ability to live a great life, provide them with the emotional roller coaster they crave and rock their world in the bedroom with abandon. This response simply affirms facts.

[image]

2. “I Lust You Too”

Supposing that you may actually like this girl and would like to see where it goes and perhaps you’re considering her for a Long-Term-Relationship (LTR), but are not ready to confess your feelings, then this response is excellent. There are two parts to these simple four words that take her on a mini-roller coaster:

1. “I”

The moment that “I” comes out of your mouth, her brain will instantly finish the sentence with “love you”. She will immediately believe that you feel the same towards her, but alas here comes the drop on the emotional roller coaster.

2. “Lust You Too”

When the L word drops, and in this case ‘Lust’, then instantly her brain goes into a conniption fit of shock and wonder. Using the word ‘lust’ is in fact truthful, because one would assume that you are attracted to her physically and is also tinged with humor. In order to make this work, the playboy should pause for dramatic effect, look into her eyes seriously and say “I lust you too”. She will more than likely play slap your arm and/or burst into a shocked laughter as well as an outburst of phrases along these lines: “You’re an asshole!”, “I can’t believe you said that!” etc.

A great playboy knows that she is in fact now even more drawn to you and will commit to you even more in the hopes of having the unattainable. Human nature is designed to want what we cannot have. Chasing the illusion of a dream is often more powerful than attaining the dream. There is a reason why many great men upon accomplishing a worthy goal, feel empty shortly after the initial ‘buzz’ of completion subsides.

1. “I Know”

Never have two words, when spoken plainly and without emotion, can conjure up a symbol of manliness, self-control and confidence, then these two spoken in response to “I love you”. It is not a mistake that the best response is also the one with the fewest words. Only two words in comparison to the aforementioned responses which have four words each.

Women want a man who ‘gets them’, ‘who just knows’ and who knows how to push their triggers of lust and desire. There is a reason why words are so powerful in stimulating the female brain, as runaway best-selling novel 50 Shades of Grey have proven. By simply stating in a calm. deliberate and confident voice, that you know she loves you, you’re signifying that you are steps ahead of her and that it’s okay for her to confide in you her ‘love’, but that you feel no need to respond in the same manner.

Remember, Playboys-In-The-Making, it is okay to ‘love’ a woman, but it is even better to be loved by many.

This has been an excerpt from my upcoming Playboy Playbook, a life guide for every man, that will be released this month.

The 4 Types Of Women

December 12, 2013 | by Charlie W. | Link | Original Link

Type I: The Seductress

Description:

This woman is a master at creating illusions and the goal of that illusion is to get you to fall in love with her. In relationships she pretends to be where she is not, thus it is very difficult for those inexperienced with women to see through her illusions as they are often "looking for her in the wrong place".

In reality, her heart is broken, she has issues with rejection, and she is deathly afraid of just about everything. Her illusions are a survival strategy and a defense mechanism. She survives by getting others to support her and pay her way, and often has a “draining” effect on her lovers. (This feeling of having been “drained” can be noticed with most narcissistic women as well). Men never see this woman for who she is, in part because of her illusions, but also because her only value is sexual (she cannot be “truly” loved). She is the archetype for youthful women who must compete with each other for a man’s affection and resources.

Example:

I had the pleasure of interacting with a girl from South America most recently, and continue to see her a few times a week. Despite a relatively large head, she is one of the most beautiful women I’ve ever seen. Our first few conversations were normal, but it wasn’t long before I noticed both her overt and covert methods of flirtation and manipulation. I’ll leave the details out, but a variety of her behaviours had the goal to instill in me a sense that she was “my ideal,” something which I should strive for.

If she’s successful – and to some degree she is as my defenses aren’t adapted as well to women of other cultures – the ultimate effect would create a sense of “falling towards her” or more accurately, “falling towards each other,” almost like gravity, culminating in “psychological fusion” or “entanglement” that would then allow her to parasitize off of my emotional resources (as well as anything she could manipulate out of me – money, help, protection, etc.).

Because I’m familiar with this feeling, it immediately raised red flags for me and I began to reflect on our various interactions in earnest. It was then that I uncovered in her an ocean of anxiety and sadness from which she desperately fled (suppressed), which was the reason it was so difficult to pick up on initially. I do want to point out one thing: women like this tend to have “empty eyes” (though not always) as if they were puppets or dolls; as if they were dead or close to death. They have no true passion and their emptiness causes them to talk a lot to mask this, but it also calls out to you from deep within them, demanding that you fill their void.

Type II: Nutbar Factory

Description:

Over time, a woman's beauty begins fade. When she realizes this, she frets that her meal ticket in life is about to expire. Moreover, the attention, protection and privileges she received from men because of her beauty are no longer forthcoming, and she suffers neglect and abuse at the hands of her husband, other men, and other women who compete with her. These experiences cause her to go coo-coo for coco-puffs as she tries to make sense of her cruel reality.

Her apparent stupidity and craziness creates in others, especially men, a sense of awe and disbelief. Her stupidity and craziness boils down to the tendency for her to focus in on details at the expense of context. She does this in an effort to convince herself and others that she (woman) is good and the world (man) is bad. She makes it through life by being exploited for the humour she creates in others. Her exploiters never let on to her that she is being exploited, but they do provide her a portion of the proceeds so that she is taken care of and can continue to generate revenue.

She has one alternative life strategy. Once in a while, someone takes pity on her (the closest she will get to experiencing love) and they provide for her. The more loony she is, the more likely it is that she will be abused as her disconnect from reality frustrates others who interact with her, but also signals to others she is disconnected from any social resources and protection, thus arousing both anger and sadism.

Example:

I worked on a project with a woman who fell into this category. One day while we were sitting in the foyer, I watched as she misconstrued the sentence of a guy we were talking to. Normally I write such things off telling myself things like it's not my business or don't get involved, but I was so amazed at her reaction to him which seemed out of nowhere, that I wondered if I missed something important and finally took the time to figure out just where she went wrong.

It was subtle, but it was one of those things where you have to look at the context of the whole sentence to get the meaning instead of just the word/literal meaning. She was unable to do this and blurted out a response that literally made her seem crazy both to him and to me. Perhaps what's most interesting about this girl is that she says she often feels ignored, like people don't listen to her/take her seriously. Of course she hasn't thought to ask herself why that is.

Type III: The Witch

Description:

This is a phallic (masculinized) woman who is hyper narcissistic. She is best exemplified by Kris Jenner (Kim Kardashian's mother). This woman, having given up on receiving love but still desperately in need of it, takes it by force. She hates men and children, and she secures resources by exploiting her lovers and her children, and at times through them, other members of the population who would not have necessarily fallen under her "spell" if approached directly.

Her anger and pain at being unloved forms a new substrate on which she constructs her identity, and her demand for love or resources places a huge strain on her relationships (and society) as she seeks to attain the love and care that was withheld from her in childhood. Her hate for her children stems from the fact that she deems them more beautiful and more worthy than her of love, and so she competes with them. Her hatred for man stems from the fact that she, like Medusa, blames him for what she has become.

Example:

I personally never interact with women like this – I don't so much as look in their direction – but an example of this type would be your garden variety feminist. More specifically, she tends to be clustered between the ages of 35-55, but you can find her through all age ranges. Of the three women discussed so far, this woman is by far the most destructive (especially if she has any sort of intelligence).

She destroys her children – they often suffer from anxiety disorders, eating disorders, depression, or repeat the cycle of narcissism and emotional abuse. She destroys her husband – she will find either a man that she can dominate and abuse every day – one who will never leave her, or she will find a man she can't dominate and resent him for it all the while competing with him and tearing him down to the best of her ability until he finally leaves her, thus reopening old narcissistic wounds. She destroys companies by creating toxic, unproductive environments. She even destroys societies.

For those of you that would hold up Norway and find fault with this last assertion, I would put to you that if it weren't for the oil reserves in the Scandinavian countries, their societies would have faced some sort of economic crisis by now, but are likely heading towards instability as the family and entrepreneur are replaced by government and corporations – oligopolies and monopolies.

Type IV: The True Woman

Description:

If a woman is able, she resigns all claims of entitlement to love and resources. It is only then that she is "born again" into true femininity. It is at this point that she attains true personhood, personality and individuality, and is finally capable of loving and being loved. This is the only woman that is an asset to her husband and companies. Her intelligence is of a very peculiar kind, quite unlike masculine intelligence, but powerful and potent in its own right. Her skills lie not in securing resources, but in refining and re-purposing them so that they best fit a given task. In the economy, she will be found at secondary and tertiary levels of production.

Example:

In my life I've only met one woman that falls into this category (even as she retained in her elements of the other three), but this doesn't surprise me because Freud often said only a handful of women ever overcome their Oedipus complex. If you happen to find a woman like this, you've found a love that happens maybe once a century (assuming you have done the work necessary to enable you to love her as you should).

I'm finding it difficult to find words that capture what she is like, only the feeling she gives off can do her true justice. She was very quiet but very intelligent (an MD with a specialty). She was also very kind, gentle and loyal, and she had an innocence about her that was refreshing. She put everyone else before herself right up until she died (a year ago). I was upset with her because of this; I wanted her to be selfish. I wanted her to experience the rush of energy you get from giving in to your basest instincts, uninhibited by attachments. It made me sick that she wouldn't take my advice – I had hoped that this rush would "revive" her, as she was very weak leading up to her death.

I was being naïve. I couldn't see it at the time because I wasn't as aware as I am today of the various differences between men and women, but she already became what she was meant to become. She never demanded love, or anything for that matter, which along with her innocence, made all of her movements and expressions seem so genuine. Because she didn't expect to be loved (or try to manipulate love in any way), she has been the only woman I've met truly deserving of all the love I could give.

Her type remains for me the one beacon of hope in the cesspool that is modern woman, and I share her with you so that when you see her, she will be more easily identifiable to you (and perhaps you'll do better at avoiding the other three types). I believe that it's necessary to have an understanding of her, even if you haven't found her yet, because within us there is a phylogenetic memory of her waiting to be reawakened by her presence.

For most of us, we keep this memory locked away, safe from the harm that would befall it should it be corrupted by our modern women. But by keeping it locked away, we also keep a part of ourselves locked away with it. Until this part is restored to its rightful place beside/within us, we as men will always be susceptible to the vicissitudes of women, shackled to our fellow man, and trapped in a cycle of "endless becoming" – just "one damn thing after the next".

The 7 Sexiest Things A Girl Can Do

Unfortunately, if you are looking for a raunchy, pornographic style filth list then you will be disappointed. While a lot of these do have to do with acts preceding or involving coital play, as I've written before I don't care for girls that crave and utilize ejaculate on their face as a treasured fountain of youth cream, rubbing it across their skin with the jubilation of a chunkster receiving her third piece of carrot cake. It seems I am not alone, as a recent post by a talented blogger so eloquently described how girls these days love to be treated like human toilets.

No thanks. I prefer the sometimes subtle, the sometimes not mannerisms of an attractive, well manicured and beautiful girl who whether consciously or subconsciously, engages in actions that create a visceral reaction in both mind and body. The kind that make me harder than the diamond rings our modern feminists will never see. The kind that, in all seven instances below, have created an indelible mark in my mind.

No. 7: The Turn Away Hair Flip

This happens early in the seduction process, usually on a first date or first meet, when you are unexpectedly moistening her pink lotus and she senses the attraction by way of tingles. Without fail, she will giggle, twirl her hair and break eye contact. It's cute, endearing and a sign of submissiveness that just makes you want to fuck her silly.

No. 6: The Lip Bite

[image]

Like Catcher in the Rye or a cheeseburger, a timeless classic. Confused by her feelings of lust, elation, a desire to flirt and overall excitement, she ever so slightly yet tastily grabs a hold of her lower lip just enough to suggestively put thoughts in your head on what she can do with that lip… and what it protects inside there, namely her hopefully adept tongue. You want to bite that lip back, before throwing her down and asking her to say "aaah."

No. 5: The Cook & Clean

A slight deviation from the physical. As men we are hardwired to seek and secure a woman who knows how to cook for us, and displays her homemaker prowess by taking full care of her man. Asking us to sit and relax while she combines fresh ingredients into a meal that will satisfy her man goes a long way. When the meal is followed by a gesture of full care and devotion — to not allow us to help and to clean the dishes shows she is willing to go the extra mile. Not only do I find that sexy, but a sign of a quality girl. Extra points if she cooks naked or with minimal threads.

No. 4: The Inverted Shirt Removal

Speaking of minimizing threads, this happened to me a few weeks ago. A girl I was dating after initiating some kissing turned around and started walking to the bedroom. On her way inside, she grabbed her shirt on both sides with the opposite hand, and slowly lifted the shirt over her shoulders first and then her head, inverting it both from top to bottom and from inside to out. The way she shed her outer skin and slithered out of those confining threads put me into attack mode.

Bonus: This can also project the same sexiness if done facing her, as she straddles you. She removes her shirt, same opposite hand strategy as above, unclasps her bra and flips her hair to one side as she comes back down for a solid tongue session.

No. 3: The Arched Back

[image]

From any angle, the catlike prowler move of a feminine beauty moving across the bed will shoot straight disease free blood down to my groin. Looking from the front you see the breasts and apple shaped ass. Look from behind and be rewarded with a full view of the lovely vagina presenting itself for your dominance (assuming no roast beef). Animalistic instincts take over and I just want to jump her.

No. 2: The Double BJ

Kind of an obvious one, yet rare. There are a few sights that can short circuit your brain than looking down and seeing two girls vying for the right to satisfy you orally. I've had a few of these memories burned in my mind, from random occurrences to creating passive pussy streams that yield such wonderful experiences (see #1 below).

No. 1: The Silent Shake

Your penis is inside her. She is screaming, yelling your name. Eventually, you get her to a point where she starts trembling, her vocality fading in favor of quick gasps of breath. As she cums, she just shakes silently, twitching and juicing. It is a silent shake, because if she can concentrate to the point where she is actually speaking or yelling then you have not made her lose all control.

While not necessary for a one off bang, if I plan to see a girl again I like to make her orgasm, and I will tell you why. If you really make her cum, and I'm talking to the point of not being able to control her body or make intelligible sounds, you will have her. She will be putty in your hands for the rest of your desired length of the relationship. She will do almost anything for you, so you will continue to do that to her. In fact, every girl I've had be open to, agree to, or actually bring me other girls for triple play activity has succumbed to a silent shake.

I don't claim to want, or even be able to, do it at every instance. But there are few things that can rival the silent shake.

What An Undefeated Samurai Warrior Had To Say About Life And Combat

December 12, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Book Of Five Rings was written in 17th century Japan by a samurai warrior. He shares the fighting techniques and belief system that resulted in him never losing a match.

> I went from province to province, from place to place, and encountered martial artists from many different schools; and though I fought as many as sixty matches, I did not lose even once. All of these were events occurring from the time I was thirteen until I reached twenty-eight or twenty-nine.

Remaining undefeated then was more noteworthy than doing the same in the UFC of today because samurais fought with real swords. Losing very likely meant death.

He describes the rhythm of life:

> …there is rhythm in the formless. Concerning the position of a warrior, there is a rhythm to rising in the service of his lord, and a rhythm for retreating from it; there is a rhythm to being in harmony with others, and a rhythm to not being in harmony with them. In the Way of the Merchant, there is a rhythm for becoming a wealthy man, and a rhythm for ruining oneself with wealth. The rhythm is > different according to each and every Way. You should discriminate thoroughly between the rhythm of success and the rhythm of failure.

He shares martial arts advice:

> In the midst of the fight, if you are intent on making your opponent flinch, you will have already obtained the victory. For this reason, you should not forget about stabbing at your opponent's face.
> If he thinks you have understood the martial arts well, that you are strong in technique and that you are an expert in the Way, he is surely thinking that he is going to lose.
> It is essential that you attack violently when your opponents are not expecting it. Take advantage of the situation while their minds are unsettled, grasp the initiative, and gain the victory. Again, even in the martial arts of one-on-one, show leisureliness in the beginning, then suddenly attack vigorously. Following through on your opponent's agitation, you can take the advantage without missing a beat and grasp the victory.
> If you use a technique on your opponent and it is not successful the first time, it will have no effect to attack him once more with the same move. Attack suddenly with a different technique, and if that has no effect, you should use yet a different one. Thus, if your opponent is thinking "mountains," attack with "seas"; and if he is thinking "seas," attack with "mountains."
> …send [your enemy's] mind in different directions, make him think various things, and have him wonder if you will be slow or quick. When you grasp the rhythm of his confusion, discern your point of victory with certainty.

He insists you defeat your opponent completely and utterly:

> Smashing your opponent completely, even if he seems weak and you are strong, is called Crushing.
> […]
> If your Crushing is weak, they will be able to rally.
> …if your opponent is inferior to you, or his rhythm has broken, or if he appears as though he is going to retreat, it is essential that you crush him immediately, without letting him catch his breath or even letting him glance at you. It is your primary consideration to not let him recover even a little.

One sentence you will see repeatedly is “You should investigate this thoroughly.” In essence he’s saying, “Hey, don’t take my word for it; go try it out yourself and see what you can learn.” I believe we have lost this investigative mindset in modern culture, where people seek out knowledge not as a way to build connections between disciplines or have unique experiences of their own, but to plug and chug. A man wants to get laid so he insists on a book that teaches him exactly how to do it without having to think. Another man wants to get rich so he wants someone to give him a precise recipe for making it happen. People don’t want to experiment and struggle in modern times—they want to be spoon-fed like babies to achieve immediate success.

While this book was interesting, it was very specific to martial artistry, with little that you could extend to a more normal life. In that regard it was a more inferior work than The Art Of War. Unless you have a specific interest in fighting, you can skip this one.

It Is Not Over Until You Stop Breathing

December 13, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

With the holidays approaching, it is a good time to remind people that life is about not giving up. People tend to give up too easily on things, especially life. If things are too hard or have failed in the past, people just stop trying and become complacent with what they have. No matter what setbacks life hands you, as long as you're still breathing you're still in the game. The only thing in this world that cannot be redeemed is time. As long as you have the time you can work to overcome whatever obstacles life puts in your way. Whether some type of illness, legal setback, or loss of fortune, a man can always strive to overcome almost anything. Giving up is not the solution and when one does give up, he merely admits defeat. If your path is blocked, you should always work to find a way around the obstacle. Here are a few prominent examples of people moving forward.

Martha Stewart

This poster child for not talking to police has done some hard time in prison for related to talking to the FBI about some stock deals. Some said that the conviction ended her career in entertainment. it did hurt her promotional endorsement deals and set her back a few years on the outside but she merely went back to work as soon as she got out of her cell. Some could argue her time behind bars might have actually given her more credibility. I would have to see the jailhouse tattoos to better judge this.

Stephen Hawking

This gentleman is paralyzed in a wheelchair due to amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS). Not only did he not allow this to keep him down, his contribution to science along with his computer generated voice has created a celebrity of sorts. He has had a cameo Star Trek: The Next Generation and an Epic Rap Battle of History. Most people I know would take a sentence to life in a wheelchair as a permanent downer but this man has overcome that become so much more. Maybe one day I'll be able to understand the books he writes.

Richard Nixon

This example is a little bit of both giving up and keep trying. Say whatever you want about his politics, he stayed in the game after losing the nomination to the Kennedy. This is the only example of a modern perennial presidential candidate actually winning the office. He did throw in the towel though when he gave up gave America its first unelected president, Gerald Ford. That could be considered an accomplishment for notoriety.

Now that I gone over some historical examples of success after setback, it is time to delve into what the future might hold for others. The next few people are down on their luck after falling from very high places.

Bernie Madoff

This Wall Street hustler had a financial empire (of cards) dismantled after being caught running a Ponzi scheme among the rich and powerful. He is currently sentenced to a long stretch in a federal penitentiary. The scandal actually caused his son to hang himself with a dog leash. As I said previously, as long as you're breathing, the game is still on. While his son cannot work to succeed in this life, you can't count Bernie out. As Marc Rich demonstrated with his last-minute pardon by President Clinton, rich and powerful people in America don't really fall that far. Mr. Madoff knows too many people and might have quite a bit of money stashed away somewhere to grease some wheels. I do not see him being locked up forever. I am predicting that in a couple years, he will have mysterious illness that cannot be treated in prison and is allowed out. If this were to happen, I would like to see how he works to build his empire again.

George W. Bush

This punching bag for the left and favorite scapegoat for all the current problems in America has left the highest office of the nation. Has that slowed him down? Maybe, but he has uses free time to explore new pursuits in his life. Apparently some of his private emails were hacked leading to the exposure of the fact that he is a painter. While certain snotty pretentious people were quick to criticize his lack of skill, I find it amazing that he picked up the brush and put serious effort into it. I find his work unique and far better than many first-year art students I've seen. The fact that he took up a new pursuit seriously even after being the leader of the free world means he hasn't given up on the game.

The point of this article is to emphasize that moving forward and working towards success should always be the direction a man is going. No matter how bad the setbacks are in life, a man should constantly work to improve himself and his position. Unless your crimes lead to your execution there really is nothing stopping you from trying to succeed. Wallowing in your own guilt and pity is never a solution. No one actually wants to hear your "woe is me" story repeatedly. If you find yourself complaining to anyone who would listen and that person doesn't really seem interested, maybe you complain too much. If there's some obstacle in your life you cannot overcome using traditional means, maybe you should try nontraditional means. The point is you always keep trying. Never give up.

10 Reasons Why Foreign Women Are Better Than American Women

December 13, 2013 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

1. American women have unreasonable standards.

They expect you to have a big house in the suburbs and a salary of at least 150,000 dollars from a high status job (e.g. doctor, lawyer, CEO). Foreign women on the other hand, are content with a man, as long as he is a nice person and takes care of her and the family sufficiently.

2. American women have the highest obesity rate out of any other women worldwide.

Look at your average American woman nowadays— she is fat and looks like a hog. American women lose their beauty by age 30 and become very ugly, wrinkled, and fat. Foreign women, on the other hand, take care of themselves, exercise, and generally have very sexy bodies. Foreign women continue to be beautiful and attractive into their 40s, because foreign women take care of themselves and have a much healthier diet than American women.

3. American women see nothing wrong with cheating on her man.

Just look at the culture of America today. Women are glorified for slutty behavior. Foreign women, on the other hand, have not been raised to act like whores. They generally are far more chaste and loyal than the vast majority of American women. This is no doubt due to the more traditional cultures that non-Western countries have.

4. America has the highest rate of divorce in the world.

Considering that 90 percent of divorces are initiated by women, the vast majority of divorces are the woman choosing to leave the man. American women are divorce happy, and will divorce their husbands over extremely trivial reasons. The divorce system in America is also extremely biased in women's favor, and many women will divorce their husbands simply to "cash out" (to take all of the man's money and assets). Foreign women, on the other hand, have a much more loyal mindset to their men and won't just abandon their husband because she read the latest chick book like Eat Pray Love and decides she “needs to find herself.”

5. American women have the worst attitudes in the world.

Pretty much every negative quality you can think of, American women embody it—selfishness, immaturity, narcissism, fake personalities, arrogance, and anger. In short, American women are a real pain in the ass to be around. This is just one of the reasons why I chose to cut all contact and friendship with American women and only maintain friendship with non-American women. Foreign women, on the other hand, are generally pleasant people to be around. They don’t have the massive chip on their shoulders like American women do, and are much more down to earth, humble, and genuine.

6. American women have no sense of humor.

If you tell a joke in front of an American woman, and it is even slightly politically incorrect, it can literally cost you your job. American women tend to be extremely vindictive and they get offended over the slightest things. Foreign women, on the other hand, are much more relaxed and not as psychotic as American women. Even if they do find something offensive, they will generally overlook it and not create a scene. This is because foreign women are not as insecure as American women and don’t feel the need to constantly prove themselves.

7. American women don’t know how to cook.

It’s like American women barely even know how to boil water. A home cooked meal to an American woman means boxed Mac N Cheese or Ramen Noodles. Foreign women, on the other hand, know how to cook complex multi-course dishes. The complexity of Indian cooking or Chinese cooking is something that would take an American woman years to master.

8. American women are more brainwashed by feminism than any other country on earth.

Feminism in America has transformed into a a man-hating movement that is reflected in the attitudes of American women. According to an American woman, “independence” is equal to acting like a spoiled, loud mouthed brat. Foreign women, on the other hand, may support feminism but they have a much more realistic view of what feminism means—equality. Feminism to a foreign woman means simply being treated with respect, instead of wanting to dominate the man, like American women.

9. American women have the highest rate of mental illness by far than any other women on earth.

Let’s face it—American women are pretty screwed up as a whole. They are emotionally unstable, mentally unstable, and suffer from delusions and are out of touch with reality. An American woman is living in her own movie, with herself as the star. And this narcissism is reflected in their mental health, as well. Foreign women, on the other hand, are very mentally stable, and aren’t prone to psychotic outbursts like American women are. Foreign women are much more down to earth and do not suffer from narcissistic delusions of grandeur as a result.

10. American women are superficial and fake.

They expect their men to also be superficial and fake. You have to put on a false image and be someone who you are not just to be considered as acceptable in America. Dealing with American women is exhaustive because of the amount of games you have to play. Foreign women, on the other hand, are genuinely warm-hearted people and you can just be yourself around them. You don’t have to wear a mask or be a fake person in order to get a foreign woman to like you. That, in the end, is probably one of the best things about foreign women. You can relax and just be yourself and have a genuine relationship with a foreign woman.

China Has The World’s Largest Rationalization Hamster

December 13, 2013 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

$279,978,100,000

That’s over two hundred and seventy-nine billion dollars (or 1.7 trillion yuan) that China is going to spend so that they can combat their smog pollution which is literally causing cancer across its countrysides. Hopefully they made enough money making shitty knock-offs of every American product known to man to pay for that bill.

Look at this. And we thought Los Angeles was bad?

While I could go on and on about the economic impact this could potentially have, I want to delve into the morality of this. As you can see from the first article I linked, Chinese government officials begging for investments, putting their best spin on their pollution problem. Hey, at least while spending billions of dollars…we'll be safe from being bombed from other countries because of it!

The hamster is strong, gentlemen.

> "Smog may affect people's health and daily lives … but on the battlefield, it can serve as a defensive advantage in military operations," said an article on the website of Global Times, a nationalist newspaper affiliated to the Communist Party's mouthpiece the People's Daily. Missile guidance that relies on human sight, infrared rays and lasers could be affected by smog in varying degrees, the article said. It explained that tiny particles in the air contributing to air pollution could hinder missile guidance systems.

So they're saying that the smog isn't, in fact, pollution – it's a national defense against attack?

Government officials lying through their teeth for their own personal gain, with no regard for the citizens that vote for them. Not much different from America. Does it not realize it is killing off its own people who could prove useful in a war with it's toxic chemicals polluting the air? That all the self-destructing smog defense systems in the world won't do an ounce of good when their own kin are dropping dead left and right?

There won't be any need for anyone to bomb China because their own chemical bomb is plenty effective already.

> Over the weekend, 104 cities near China's two biggest "industrial clusters — the Beijing-Tianjin-Hebei region and the Yangtze River Delta region," saw visibility reduced to less than 10 meters according to Xinhua. The latest smog attack has left six dead.

More important to the government is saving face so you look good in the eyes of the citizens that are still standing and not dying of pollution filling their lungs. What they've failed to mention is the other casualties that visibility of "ten meters" does to a population – car accidents, plane crashes, plenty of other issues. The last thing China's government should be worrying about when the visibility in their major regions is next to nothing is getting bombed by another country. Meanwhile, the government wastes time spinning stories like these, which ring hypocrisy like a Chinese gong.

If there were to be bomb, perhaps the missile tracking systems are potent enough to knock them off their hamster treadmills.

Modern Citizenship Is Worthless. Here's How To Really Make A Difference.

December 14, 2013 | by savrola | Link | Original Link

Most people don't think politically. That's because most people don't have a polis—a city-municipality in which their progenitors had venerable roots. Those who do reside within a polis often do not qualify as citizens. In fact, 98% of the population today do not qualify as "citizens" using a historical definition. Of course most residents today are deemed citizens, so the result is that citizenship has become worthless.

Citizenship has no intrinsic rights and privileges. All are equal before the law. The city police will be as quick to taser a middle-class male as they would a ghetto thug or obese food-stamp mother of any race. Instead of having value, citizenship has a number of liabilities—city taxes, fines, regulations, high cost of living in exchange for cramp spaces, traffic jams, littered parks and pot-holed streets.

Real citizenship in the classic sense of the word comes from being born into a family who resided in that city for at least fifty years, or who were part of an ethnic community entrenched in the city for about the same length of time.

Who Is A De-facto Citizen?

- They often possess considerable real-estate around the historic districts and older suburbs, as well as the local cemeteries.
- They often serve on the dozens of governmental and party committees and councils of whose existence hardly anyone is aware.

- They have been involved in local unions, fire and police departments, hospitals, and other public organizations and institutions for decades, if not generations.
- They hold power but do not vote, except as a gesture.

Today, anyone willingly to jump through the appropriate hoops can register to vote, which makes your vote worthless. The lackadaisical turnout for municipal elections is proof of the fact that everyone knows in their subconscious minds that their vote is in fact worthless.

Go to your local precinct or ward polling place next election and observe the people who show up to vote—elderly women, some real-estate types, perhaps some small business owners who are supporting an insurgent candidate, and the middle-aged lesbians. You won't find anyone under forty-five voting for a city mayor or in city council elections. Young people don't vote. There are two classes of under-40 aged young people who are exceptions to this rule: those who have antecedents from the politically oriented class of citizenry like the George P. Bushes of the world, and their lackies who aspire to become apart of the political class like the Paul Ryans of the world.

These two classes themselves are kept from assuming the reins of power—young men are effectively prohibited from gaining political or managerial power in our society without the prerequisite connections of birth. And why not? Most young men, after all, are functional idiots—by the classical definition of the word. We no longer train men to be citizens in school, and most are incapable of self-education in civic affairs. Red pill men spend a great deal of time learning to develop their minds and bodies, to handle women, and business affairs, but they do not attend to politics. Libertarianism is a popular political philosophy among young white males because it allows them to rationalize their narcissism and effectively avoid history in the making.

So what's the answer, if you're a young man, business owner, family man, or individual who wants to put roots down in some city?

Prepare to make your city better.

To be politically effective, it's not necessary to become involved in the politics of your area—instead you must educate yourself to assume power. Read serious political works by real politicians. Start with the Greeks and stop at 1900. Learn the history and theory of municipal governance in the U.S. Study architecture and urban design. For hands-on training you can join a political party and serve in its ranks. Get to know the people in your ward. Work in the trenches, observe the party leadership, take notes, study their personalities and compare them and their methods to what you are learning in your own studies.

It's not about party affiliation. If you're a conservative red-pill male in a Democratic Party stronghold, join the Democratic Party. Become a precinct-committeeman. Spread your views in a neutral fashion. Most Democrats are only in the party for money, or out of ethnic loyalty. They may mouth liberal slogans, but watch how they live their lives, witness their dissatisfaction with the system, and then strike!

The Democrats were once a conservative party in the days of Al Smith. Like any political party it can switch ideologies at will. Politics is not about ideology. It is about the long term good of the city. Think about how you can turn your city into an affluent powerhouse of industry and culture that is both clean and pleasant to live in. Use Singapore and Hong-Kong for models.

Party politics has become a feminine preoccupation in the U.S. Treat the young women you meet no more seriously than you have to, but not flippantly. Act as if you were assisting your cousin the Girl Scout earnestly intent on earning her merit badge. Politically minded young women are usually wall flowers and plain janes, but in terms of pickup, they are safe, sane, convenient and discreet. Treat them like the serious and mature children they are.

Remember, it's all game, except for the education part. Ask Alinsky, "Why do we organize?" Power. Kings are Sovereigns. You can't be one without power.

Don’t Be A Boring Beta Male

December 14, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

Having talked to and observed many women of all kinds of ages, professions and walks of life, it became clear to me that one of the biggest turn-offs to them, if not the biggest one, is when the guy is being boring. Women seem to be able to overlook all kinds of other unattractive qualities. You may be bald, overweight, lacking in style or are not even that well off financially, and you could still date decent women if you have great personality, sense of humor and you can be a stimulating company to them. Even physically abusive guys get away with their temper and be forgiven if they are interesting,

However, if you are boring, there is nothing else about you that will make up for it, except if you just pay for sex straight up. That’s the reason there are so many “nice” and “sweet” guys sit at home on Facebook or porn sites and jerk off. Not all of them, but many of them are just too damn boring.

In this article, I would like to first present one major but rarely mentioned reason why so many seemingly educated and accomplished guys appear boring to women. Then, I will suggest a simple way in which any such guy can become more interesting or at least less boring.

The Problem: Many Guys Became Boring Because They Have Been Beta-fied

You go out on a few dates with a few uptight girls with serious entitlement issues, who think they are God’s gift. They can’t take the most mildly inappropriate joke or even get over the most mild disagreement, screaming “I can’t believe you just said that” as if you suggested that you endorse holocaust or slavery. You then start believing that all the girls are like that, and the only way to be attractive to any of them and the only chance to get laid is by being extremely careful and neutral when talking to them. You then start limiting your interactions, at least during the first few dates, to the most innocent topics, avoiding any kind of disagreements.

As a result, you go overboard in the political correctness department and you become way too careful when talking to girls. You steer away from any kind of dark humor or sarcasm. You are trying your best to be 100% positive about everything and you refrain from criticizing anything or anyone.

The over-the-top gentle and careful approach with girls, in turn, makes you appear extremely boring and ultra-beta, especially to the girls who have personality and a sense of humor. They want to spend time with a guy who has a backbone, can be both funny and stimulating, and can dish out dark humor and sarcasm.

The Solution: Don't Compromise Your Wit And Sense of Humor, and Don't Settle For Uptight Girls

The solution to this problem is two-fold. First, you must not start falling victim to your own past negative experiences with girls, and you must not start believing that all the women out there are uptight, high-maintenance bitches with no personality. They are not, no matter how many of them you met in the past. There are enough great women out there who you will have a great time meeting, having sex with and dating. Therefore, you should not alter or suppress your behavior if you are naturally funny and sarcastic guy, because it will inevitably work on the type of girl that matches well with you. Dark humor / sarcasm is one of the most powerful flirting and seduction weapons you have been blessed with. And the smarter and more interesting the girl you are talking to is, the more intrigued and the more turned on (both physically and mentally) she will be by a man of sharp wit.

The fact that your behavior and personality are off-putting to some girls is actually good news, because it saves you so much time by pushing away the princesses and the ice queens that you want to avoid anyway. Even if your behavior pushes away a few hot girls that you would love to bang, it gives you more time to pursue the girls who are both hot and great to be around. There aren't that many girls out there whose inside matches their sexy outside, but they are out there.

Fat Acceptance Is A Steaming Pile Of Garbage

December 15, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Contrary to popular belief, the fat acceptance movement has been around in the United States for some time, first being birthed in the 1960's, when many, many discrete groups began to organize around identity politics. The movement is a strong mix of narcissism and female-centrism.

A Brief History Of The Movement

Consider a brief history of the movement. Like I have previously said, the first documented fat acceptance acceptance event happened in New York City in 1967. The participants dubbed it a “fat-in” at a restaurant and consumed many, many pints of ice cream. Later that same summer, the first nation-wide movement, which eventually become the National Association For The Advancement Of Fat People (NAAFA). This time period is generally referred to first-wave fat acceptance.

For a brief period of time, moving lockstep with other identity political groups, a militant arm of the movement coalesced into the “Fat Underground,” a radical feminist-allied movement whose rallying cry was, “a diet is a cure that doesn’t work, for a disease that doesn’t exist.” The movement never gained much steam as they called for violence against perceived fatphobia.

Accordingly, as American’s waistlines expanded, the movement gained ground. This time period has been called second-wave fat acceptance, as Americans needed explanations for their decreasing physical attractiveness & increasingly poor health. Mainstream outlets began to run some sympathetic literature, mostly just viciously attacking the medical establishment & perceived fatphobia of the media at large.

Fat acceptance is currently thought to be the in third wave, which coincides with the birth of the Internet & blogging. Tumblr, online feminist webzines & WordPress have been credited with advancing the cause.

A Review Of Their Claims

The most accurate summary of fat acceptance dogma here.

Let’s review some of their more insistent claims. First, and foremost, is the concept that dieting & exercise don’t work. Given the multiplicity of posts on Return Of Kings about health and fitness, I will not talk about the veracity of the claim, just about the psychology presented. The claim that exercise & diet don’t work is just so absurdly wrong it begs for a reason why they cling to it. Part of this is the inability to accept responsibility for their weight gain – remember early fat acceptance warriors worked with radical feminists. These sorts of groups portended the nascent narcissism that would come to pervade identity politics in general, but markedly show off the sheer and utter inability of its adherents from truly changing their reality.

Consider that there are also people who are underweight. Fat acceptance types fold anorexia and related issues into their dogmatic and self-serving approach to weight issues, but they think that the underweight suffer from psychological issues. It is a delicate road to hoe, because they can't just say that vastly underweight people are completely healthy, like they would claim a person 300 pounds overweight to be. Of course, it's those poor, poor underweight folk that have psychological issues. Of course it is related to impossible beauty standards forced onto women by the heterosexist patriarchy. Notice, though, that fat acceptance claims the over- and under- weight suffer from psychological stigma by the media, yet only the underweight have to adjust their weight. You know, to become healthy again.

They are not seeking to decouple weight and health issues but to destroy the concept of being overweight. They want people to either considered healthy or underweight. It shows off neatly the psychology: it is all about them.

Take this study that is often bandied about in fat circles about the failure of dieting. A top comment on the article gets it right:

> Why aren't we looking at those who successfully lose the weight and keep it off for 2 or more years?

Of course, we should be looking for the success stories and understanding why they succeeded in the wake of others failing. What the commenter doesn't understand is narcissism.

Take game-denialists. They desperately need stories of failure of so-called game adherents to fuel their psychology. They don't want to hear stories of men pulling themselves up-by-their-bootstraps, they want to hear about some guy tripping over himself tying his boots while he relied on a technique given to him by a fraud. Who would you believe? A man who claims X, Y or Z is a fraud or a man that has achieved success and relates this personal stories, approaches and what his failures taught him?

That is the simple psychology of fat acceptance-activists and their denial of the science of dieting. Remember, if you are reading it, it is for you. Unable to bear hearing about successful dieting approaches, personal stories about weight loss or just seeing the photos of the so-called "weight privileged," they demand media conform to their perceptions of their value. So people can't keep the weight off for long periods of time? Sounds like a personal problem to me, not the diet's problem. On the rare off chance it is a biological disorder, you will find that out from your doctor.

Babies are born being able to select physically attractive faces from those that are not. This damning evidence for the fat-acceptance movement, as fat faces are rarely considered attractive because fat is unattractive and, most importantly, alters attractive features. A healthy man with a strong jaw becomes an unhealthy man with a weak chin when he is fat.

Another serious issue is the insistence that fat people, as a discrete class, need to be consulted on public health policy that affects fat people. This is a curious claim, as it tries to democratize what is, essentially, a dogmatic movement based on narcissism. Any fat person who deviates from the dogma is not included in the movement. You think the spokesman for Subway "Jared" is a fat acceptance hero?

Most importantly, here, is the notion that being a member of a class somehow confers a level of perception that non-members cannot access. This is classic narcissistic armor and it is wholly untrue. This approach is most used to defend feminist claims of male privilege, it is also used to defend claims of racism and homophobia. Being a member of a discrete class does little beyond signify you belong to said class. Like anything else in life, what you do with that is determined by you. You may have great insights to provide, you may not. In your thoughts and ideas people will judge you for you have to offer.

Which feeds into the next point, is the fear of being judged that fat acceptance-activists wish to counter. Instead of encouraging positive traits in fat people (that aren't related to you looking in the mirror and declaring yourself awesome), the main thrust is to change wider society so that they never have to confront their own issues. This never works for anybody. At the end of the day, you always have to close your eyes with no psychology to consider but your own.

Finally, a point is made that all humans deserve bodily autonomy. They consider decisions on being fat as relating to personal autonomy. That is a terrible approach, as it brings in the age-old liberal adage, "your autonomy ends where my feelings begin." If you get fat, you will get medical issues and not just affect the appropriation of my tax dollars, but you will affect my life personally as you could have been a woman I married, but you are either too fat to be interesting or dead. You could have been my doctor, but you decided to major in Fat Studies and now are a professional fat-ass. You could say that is selfish of me, but how the hell can you convince somebody with low self-esteem to change because they clearly hate themselves? You aren't fat and fierce, you are a pathetically privileged plus-sized person.

The serious issue with “your autonomy ends where my feelings begin” approach is that there is rarely an action one can take that does not affect somebody else. I am not sure there are any actions of consequence that be undertaken that will not affect at least one person. Exercising autonomy often implicates limiting other’s options – to pretend otherwise is ludicrous.

Here, take the test from fat acceptance fativists to see how much you have learned!

Conclusion

Fat acceptance has a long history in the United States, but only recently exploded as left-wing friendly platforms such as Tumblr and Reddit began to become popular.

The claims made reek of a supreme level of privilege, as only people in a late-capitalist society could possibly be able to complain about their poor choices in diet and exercise need to be validated by authority figures in the media. Not only that, but they are not seeking simply acceptance, but worship. While some some of the talk revolves around body equity with skinny people, the true end-goal is with referring to fat as “beautiful.” They are not seeking to be seen as average, but as gorgeous and models. Sure, they lash out defensively talking about their intense self-hatred and poor body image, but that is attention-seeking behavior to get others to worship their looks and reaffirm their personal delusions about attractiveness and sexual value.

While movements like this are part and parcel of any narcissistic society — notice it started in the 60’s with other identity-based movements — the truth it is woefully misinformed about basic science and biology. It exists as a stopgap between the fat activist’s own self-hatred and their complete inability to change. They need defenses to exist in order to deny any true change of the self.

I have no doubt that people exist that are completely happy with being overweight. Those people would never identify with the fat acceptance movement.

5 Reasons Why Lululemon Is Awesome

December 15, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

A few weeks ago, yoga pants made the news. Lululemon's founder and chairman made a simple, but true statement – buy clothes that fit you.

This caused a ruckus. The national media came in to save the day, and defend all those poor souls who couldn't fit into the company's signature product. This led to the resignation of Chip Wilson, Lulu's founder. Apparently it caused their stock prices to fall, too.

Honestly, I don't care. All this fiasco did was remind me to appreciate the finer things in life. Like Lululemon yoga pants, for example. Yoga pants in general are great, but Lulu takes it to the next level. Below are 5 reasons I think Lululemon is awesome.

1. The staff

In a world where being fit is becoming more of a dream than reality for many people, I appreciate that Lulu practices what they preach. I've never walked into one of their stores and not had a smile across my face. The girls that work their are fit – and they're all decked out in Lulu gear. It's a win-win combination. I'm sure it boosts their sales more than a little bit, too. Both to men, who drool over the counter, and women, who are jealous and idolize their looks.

2. Dat Ass

There’s nothing more refreshing than walking down the street or across the gym floor and having a tight butt in your face. It will reinvigorate your energy and mood. Lulu is adding value to society by increasing the natural beauty we all encounter in our daily activities. This is a classic example of a situation where everyone wins.

3. Pants Don’t Lie

Sure, yoga pants can have a tightening effect, producing an overall smoother image than what the flesh holds, but only to an extent. If you see someone similar to the image above walking around your neighborhood, it’s safe to say you should stay 100 feet back – for your own safety. Yoga pants can perform a small favor here or there, but not miracles. And if you see the Lululemon logo, rest assured, she is fit – as our friend Mr. Wilson confirmed.

4. The Message

Lululemon is at the forefront of women’s fitness. I don’t have any statistics, but I imagine their branding is responsible for getting millions of girls off their ass and into the gym, or yoga studio. Yes, it has an air of exclusivity, but one that motivates people to make healthy choices in order to join.

5. Their Men's Clothes

It's expensive, I know. But it's awesome. If you're in shape, it will fit very well. Moreover, while it's meant for the gym and exercising – it's classy enough to be worn as casual daytime clothing. Also, it's extremely high quality, will last a long time, and many of their items are made to be odor-resistant – so you don't have to wash it every time you wear it. And none of this even touches the fact that it all looks amazing.

So while Lululemon has gotten it's share of hate lately, I honestly find it to be a great brand. I had to give it the recognition it deserves in these dire times. It compliments fit people's shape, improves their look, promotes a healthy lifestyle, and is high quality. What's not to like?

Are White Women A Serious Threat To Black Men?

December 16, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Much has been said about the dangers black men face in our modern society. The Trayvon Martin incident helped to amplify this focus, but other dangers have been highlighted as well. The modern criminal justice system is a threat. Modern media (an alleged source of many negative stereotypes and portrayals) is often pointed out as a threat. And, perhaps most notably, other black men are a threat.

These factors and the dangers they pose to black men are well documented, but one other historical threat comes to mind that I feel doesn't get enough attention: the white woman. Though this threat may not match up to the others above, a bit of thought soon makes it clear that there is real cause for concern here. We live in a society that has not looked kindly on relationships involving white women and black men, and has imposed serious consequences on the male participants in said unions.

Consider the following examples:

1. Black Wall Street

By 1920, the Greenwood neighborhood of northern Tulsa, Oklahoma had long been at the center of a thriving community. The area was home to so many prominent black businessmen, lawyers, doctors, and other affluent professionals that it came to be known as "Black Wall Street". Dr. A.C. Jackson, a man whose surgical capabilities impressed even the founders of the Mayo clinic, was a resident of this neighborhood. It was a success story in a segregated world.

Then, in 1921, it all went to hell. Three days of race riots beginning on May 31st, 1921 left 10,000 blacks homeless, over 1,200 residences destroyed via fire, and up to 300 blacks dead. And what became of the talented Dr. Leonard? He was shot to death as he attempted to leave his home during the riot.

What caused all of this?

A teenaged black shoe-shiner entered an elevator operated by a white girl. According to most accounts, he tripped and latched onto the arm of the girl as he fell. She screamed, and he left as the elevator arrived at the first floor. A white clerk on that floor heard the scream and reported the incident as an attempted assault. The girl spoke to police and a quick investigation took place. She declined to press any charges and the police themselves are believed to have concluded no crime had been committed.

It didn’t matter. By May 31st, a lynch mob had already been assembled, filled with men looking to “defend the honor” of the girl in question. The single scream of a white girl sent hundreds of blacks to their deaths and leveled one of the few black economic success stories in the Jim Crow era.

2. Rosewood Massacre

The town of Rosewood, Florida was quiet and predominantly black during the 1920s. Despite the ravages of segregation and Jim Crow, the blacks of Rosewood had managed to find some economic success and create a degree of self-sufficiency while maintaining amicable relations with predominantly white towns nearby like Sumner.

What put an end to all of that? In January, 1923, a white woman in Sumner heard a scream come from her neighbor's home, grabbed her revolver and went over there. The neighbor claimed that she had been beaten, robbed and possibly raped by a black man, but her claims were entirely unsubstantiated. The black man she claimed was in her house at the time her neighbor arrived with the revolver was never found and her story was contradicted by witness testimony claiming her own husband had been responsible for the beating and had been seen leaving the home.

Nevertheless, a lynch mob was soon assembled. By the time the riot was over, two whites and an estimated 26 blacks were dead, and many more injured. The town of Rosewood was burned almost entirely to the ground and abandoned—those black residents who could escape did not return.

A mere accusation sourced by a white woman proved enough to destroy a town and end dozens of lives.

3. Emmett Till

Emmett Till was a Chicago kid visiting relatives in Mississippi during the summer of 1955. One day, local boys dared Till (who claimed to have had white friends and even a white girlfriend in Chicago) to speak to Carolyn Bryant, a 21 year old who ran a town market along with her 24 year old husband. Till acted on the bet. It is unsure exactly what happened in the store. Some claim that Till whistled at Bryant and may have grabbed her hand in order to ask for a date before saying “Bye, baby” as he left. Bryant herself asserted that he used “unprintable words” and grabbed her waist as he asked for a date.

The story soon spread across town. Bryant's husband and half brother-in-law decided to defend her honor by kidnapping the 14-year-old from his home in the dead of night and murdering him. They got away with it.

The mere alleged inconvenience of a white woman proved important enough to justify ending a child's life.

Granted, many of these incidents took place quite some time ago, but has the cultural imperative that animated them—one dedicated to throwing black men under the bus on a whim in order to protect white female honor—disappeared?

Consider the following:

1. Darrell Williams

In 2010, Oklahoma State basketball player Darrell Williams (a promising talent who had left the team in several statistical categories in 2009) was accused of groping two white women and reaching inside their pants without their consent. There was absolutely no physical evidence of the accusations leveled at Williams by these women. Williams also passed two lie detector tests.

It didn't matter—Williams was convicted in July, 2012. His sentence was suspended a few months later, but he will still have a felony conviction on his record and will need to register as a sex offender. His life is pretty much over, and it only took the mere accusation (absent any evidence backing it up) on the part of a white woman to make that happen.

2. Marcus Dixon

In February of 2003, Marcus Dixon was a promising student-athlete with a 3.96 GPA and a full football scholarship to Vanderbilt University. He was arrested for allegedly raping a 15-year-old student, and sentenced to 10 years in prison due in large part to Georgia's ten archaic statutory rape laws. He'd spend 15 months in prison before being released following a Georgia Supreme Court decision in his favor.

But why did he have to go through all of that in the first place? Kristie Brown's father was an open racialist and did not take kindly to the fact that his daughter had slept with a black man. She was well aware of this:

> On Feb. 6, 2003, Dixon accepted a full scholarship to Vanderbilt University, historically the SEC's weakest football program and the strongest academic school. He could have gone to Georgia, but thought a Vanderbilt degree would carry him further. Four days later, after basketball practice, he had sex with > Kristie Brown, a white 15-year-old virgin, in a classroom trailer behind Pepperell High School.

> “It was consensual sex,” said Dixon, who was 18. “When we came in there, it was set up like we was going to have sex. She unbuckled her own pants.
> “At the end, the only thing she told me was like, ‘My dad cannot find out about us having sex.’ Because in my town, black people having sex with white girls is not something you do. She said, ‘My dad cannot find out about us having sex, because he’ll kill us both.'”

He found out, and that was enough to nearly end Dixon’s life. Dixon’s story has a happy ending, at least: he was released after 15 months, got a scholarship to a smaller university, managed to get a shot at the NFL in 2008 and is currently a member of a playoff-bound Kansas City Chiefs squad. But that doesn’t erase the injustice done to him as a teen.

3. Jameis Winston

If you're not familiar with this particular case, you can get acquainted with it via my previous article.

All of these examples illustrate a similar theme: the power white American women have to bring down black men, a power derived almost entirely from the emphasis that this society puts on their protection and the lengths said society is willing to go to enforce that imperative.

White females are the most privileged demographic in American society. This fact is substantiated by society's tendency to do more for white women than it does for others: white females who go missing are given substantially more attention than others, and those accused of harming white women receive much harsher sentences than they otherwise would and are more likely to face serious convictions. This society prioritizes the protection of white women over that of everyone else.

At the same time, black men have historically been portrayed as the greatest threat to white women that exists in this society. Depictions of the unrestrained, “animalistic” negro ravaging white womanhood (something he apparently couldn’t help and was naturally inclined to do) have been used to justify all manner of things in the USA, from run-of-the-mill lynchings to slavery to entire socio-legal systems of discrimination. Race relations in this country have largely been defined by this fear. Black men must keep these historical precedents in mind and understand the very credible threat that white women pose to them if not approached and dealt with carefully.

This is a society with a deep, longstanding prejudice toward the notion of black male sexuality as an inherent threat to the white female and a long history of coming down hard on black men in order to guard against that alleged threat. It is also a society dedicated to serving the whims of white women and protecting them at all costs and above all others. When a white woman accuses a black male of committing some form of sexual misconduct against her, society will take her claims more seriously than they would accusations by women of other ethnicities against most other men, thus placing much more pressure on the accused. Society has her back, and she knows this.

These societal prejudices accompany any white American woman associated with a black man. They are the source of her power and lurk perpetually in the background and can be called upon by her at any time for use against him, often to devastating effect. Do not underestimate that threat.

6 Underappreciated Horror Films

December 16, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A good horror film is perhaps the most difficult type of film to make. For every truly exceptional horror movie, there are mountains of B-grade trash. Finding the wheat amidst the chaff is not easy. In a well-done film, the director is seeking to elicit a specific emotional response from the audience, and will use every scene to enhance and lead towards that emotion. Far too often, though, a mediocre director will take the easy way out, and overwhelm the viewer with gore and violence. But this is the mark of an amateur, not a master. And the masters do know the difference.

Edgar Allan Poe, who on top of all his other achievements in American letters, was a great literary critic and essayist. He touched on the question of how to craft a good horror tale in his masterful 1846 essay The Philosophy of Composition. A good tale of terror, Poe held, should be tightly constructed so that every sentence leads up a decisive, shattering finale. Emotion is more important than logic. Long books or long poems are incapable of being good vehicles for terror, because they drag on and are unable to sustain the required emotional momentum needed. Poe knew what he was talking about: his tales of terror are among the best short stories in English language, bar none. Re-read The Tell-Tale Heart, if you need any proof of this. As a short-story, it is nearly perfect.

H.P. Lovecraft, another great practicioner of the classic horror tale, had his own innovative ideas of how to evoke feelings of dread. Supernatural Horror in Literature, his 1927 treatise on the subject, describes specifically how terror as an emotion should be nurtured and brought to a crescendo.

According to Lovecraft, the competent horror writer should: cultivate the audience's fear of the unknown, as this is the oldest and strongest kind of fear; don't develop character, as it takes too long; use long sentences, weird ancient gods, and archaic words and spellings to play with the reader and heighten his distress; and try overturn the reader's sense of what is natural and normal. Both Poe and Lovecraft made it clear that there was no short-cut to terror: terror was an emotion that had to be nurtured and kindled, much like a fire coaxed from the smoking embers of a glowing coal. Film directors would be well advised to take note of Poe's and Lovecraft's opinions.

With these considerations in mind, I want to suggest six films that are recent overlooked classics of the genre. All of them employ Poe's and Lovecraft's principles to great effect. Some of these movies could be considered suspense, rather than horror films. But the boundaries between film categories can be blurred, and I think we can agree that all are in the neighborhood of horror. I hope you will add them to your Netflix queue.

Our hapless protagonist enters a nightmare world of violence and crime in 13 Tzameti.

13 Tzameti (2005)

A wayward laborer finds a set of instructions meant for someone else and, on a lark, decides to follow them. This act plunges him into a demented world of chaos, insanity, and death. Georgian director Gela Babluani won an award at the 2006 Sundance Film Festival for this, his debut film, and deservedly so. Its gritty black-and-white patina provides the perfect backdrop to a universe of nihilistic violence and random cruelty. Often seen as a neo-noir thriller, it can equally be viewed as a horror film. If horror can be described as everyman being caught in the grip of nightmarish forces beyond his control, this movie without doubt falls within the genre and succeeds brilliantly within it.

The masterful hospital ward scene from the 1990 classic Exorcist III.

Exorcist III (1990)

Due to inept marketing, this one sadly received little notice when it was first released. Don't let the derivative-sounding title fool you. This is not a sequel to the first two Exorcist movies, but a rendering of the horror novel Legion by writer/director William Peter Blatty. Blatty, with little experience behind a camera, was somehow able to carry off this project far better than anyone could have predicted. It has nothing in common with the other Exorcist films (except the name), and only added an "exorcism" scene at the end in final editing to appease the studio bosses. Featuring the always-watchable George C. Scott in one of his last roles, it manages to evoke a feeling of suffocating dread that it sustains until the very last shot. It also contains several scenes of heart-stopping terror that have no equal in any other film.

The English countryside conceals ancient and evil secrets in Kill List.

Kill List (2011)

Recommending this great British film is a true pleasure. Two out-of-work hit men with money issues (Jay and Gal) accept a vague final job to “terminate” several marks. The fact that they have to sign the contract in their own blood should have alerted them that this will not be an ordinary job. Their employers are withdrawn and reticent, and refuse to let them out of the job once accepted. Things progress slowly but surely, with dialogue that is mumbling to the point of inaudibility, and the viewer gets the sense that some sort of web is spinning around the two protagonists. And boy, are they right…Director Ben Wheatly explores the darkness of the human psyche through the vehicle of occult horror, and the results here are nothing less than spectacular. The ending is about as demented and unexpected as can be imagined.

Left Bank (2008)

This skillful Dutch-language film by Pieter Van Hees is another great entry into the world of occult horror lurking just underneath the surface of modern European life. A young female athlete (Eline Kuppens) meets a new boyfriend (Mattias Schoenaerts) and decides to move into his new apartment in the “Left Bank” part of city. But things are not what they seem, and she begins to notice her body and soul begin to gradually fall apart. As the web around her tightens, it becomes clear that she has been deliberately selected for a sinister and terrifying purpose. Great performances by all concerned, with some truly startling visuals at the end.

Sicko John Bunting calls the shots for his minions in The Snowtown Murders.

The Snowtown Murders (2011)

This is a dramatic recreation of the career of Australia's worst serial killer, John Bunting, and of his clique of fellow-conspirators he recruited. If you want to see an unflinching portrait of the face of pure evil, this is the movie. It is so effective, in fact, that you will feel yourself wanting to take a shower at the end of it just to get these characters off you: it's that good. Director Justin Kurzel shows us step-by-step how Bunting sought out and recruited weak or defective people in his lust to commit serial murder. The result is a horror film and a crime drama of unrelenting intensity. One of the most effective techniques (of many) used by the director is the playback of recordings of the victims' last words, as commanded by the killers. Hauntingly scored and acted, this great Australian film is not for the faint of heart.

Accepting a job at an abandoned insane asylum is not a good idea in Session 9.

Session 9 (2001)

A depressed building contractor accepts a job to remove asbestos from a decaying psychiatric hospital. His co-workers discover a series of disturbing audio recordings in the dilapidated basement. And things just get worse and worse from there. This is an examination of a disintegrating psyche under the influence of past trauma, and remains one of the most effective portrayals of insanity put on film (an equally effective film on the same subject is Lodge Kerrigan's 1993 masterpiece Clean, Shaven). What makes this movie so effective is that random events happen to the characters that we cannot be sure are real or imagined. There is a sense that arrows are flying in every direction, but mostly at you, the viewer; and the atmosphere of a rotting insane asylum is just about as oppressive as you can get. The suspends builds slowly but unceasingly, until the final 15 minutes when all hell breaks loose.

One of the greatest pleasures of movie-watching is coming across unexpected gems. Enthusiasts of the genre (or of good movies in general) will find any of these films worth a watch…or a re-watch. Horror takes real skill to portray effectively, as Poe and Lovecraft believed, and when a film uses these principles effectively, the results should be applauded.

Pornstars Are Proof That Female Obesity Is Vastly Underestimated

December 16, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Throughout the world, health organizations track the numbers of the morbidly obese and overweight by Body Mass Index (BMI) – a ratio of one's weight in kilograms to the square of one's height in meters.

> BMI = Weight (kg) / Height² (m)
> From the CDC:

Height	Weight Range	BMI	Weight Status
5′ 9″	124 lbs or less	Below 18.5	Underweight
	125 lbs to 168 lbs	18.5 to 24.9	Normal
	169 lbs to 202 lbs	25.0 to 29.9	Overweight
	203 lbs or more	30 or higher	Obese

According to the BMI guidelines, a BMI between 18 and 25 is considered healthy. Under 18 is underweight; 25-30 is overweight, and 30+ is morbidly obese. The ratio was conceived as a measure of a population's general physical shape—if BMI were to rise over the years, the thinking goes, this would be an indication that the population was getting fatter. In that very limited case, BMI is useful. Go much beyond that, and it becomes worthless.

The Centers for Disease Control (CDC) and other organizations use these BMI classifications to tote up how much of each country's population is healthy, overweight and obese. Using UN and WHO data, the average woman of age 15-29 in the US has a BMI of 27. Two thirds of women in this category have a BMI of 25+, which is classified as overweight.

But if you look at real women on the ground, you will arrive at a much different conclusion. To prove this beyond all reasonable doubt, I shall marshal some photos of porn stars. Porn stars are a great study sample because they represent the range of what's maximally sexually arousing to straight horny men – and we can all see them naked with the click of a button, leaving no pore unseen. Secret Internet Fatties, they are not. These are women that whose careers rise and fall on their ability to entice men. Some of them are known for having the biggest asses in porn – they are outliers in an industry of outliers. If any woman would look sexy with a high BMI, it would be them.

Alexis Texas has a legendary onion booty. I'm not a porn guru, so I can't say it's the biggest—but it's definitely up there. If anyone should have a high BMI, it's Alexis.

Despite sporting some of the biggest asses known to man, these porn stars end up on the low side of the supposedly ‘healthy’ BMI range. Those derrieres mean they’re packing ten or twenty extra pounds of muscle and fat down low, and they still come up thin according to BMI. Only Paige Turnah came even close to a BMI of 25, and she is just a gigantic woman all around – I wouldn’t be surprised if she played sports seriously earlier on. If these women are considered thin, what does that mean about the women with a BMI of say 23, with a flat ass and floppy thighs?

Simply, they are fat. I’m a bit of a numbers guy, and I like to connect looks to numbers. I’ve gotten pretty good at estimating a girl’s bra size, which is pretty easy once you understand how it works. I will routinely ask girls how much they weigh and their bra size on a first date, to build my sample size of observations.

It didn’t take long to realize that the BMI guidelines are wildly inaccurate – that any woman in the upper half of the healthy range was actually quite fat. Equally, women who were classed as ‘underweight’ were just as easily healthy. Not long ago, I met a girl who was 5’6″ and 98 lbs – she felt great in my hands, and wasn’t lacking for energy whatsoever. But at a 15.8 BMI, she was supposedly malnourished. More recently, I banged a taller girl with a big ass, yet her BMI was only a 19. Time and time again, hands-on experience has shown me that most girls in the upper half of the ‘healthy BMI’ range are simply FAT.

To gauge whether a woman is fat or not, consult the following table:

A Field Guide To Female Fatness

BMI:	CDC	Untrained	Trained
15-18	Underweight	Slim	Slim
18-21	Healthy	Moderate	Fit
22-25		Fat	Thick*
25-30	Overweight	Obese	Obese
30+	Obese	TOXIC WASTE

*Should be green if you are black

I’m black in spirit

To assess a girl fairly, you have to make an allowance for muscle. On average, girls will pack on 20 lbs of mass or 2 BMI points from lifting weights or playing sports seriously – ‘trained’ in the table above. You could have two girls that look slim with clothes on, both standing at 5’6″, and the athletic one will weigh 20 lbs more – plus her body will feel way better up close. They can pack on even more, but usually at the expense of their looks, by sporting a mannish, bulky upper body (e.g., water polo players). Girls with lots of muscle will look fat if they aren’t careful – an extra ten pounds of fat on top of thick muscle, or even clothing that fits poorly can be enough to erase their appeal.

Indeed, some prominent doctors back my findings, saying that the BMI threshold for women ought to be 24, not 30. Other research into BMI has found that the elderly, white women, and short people are fatter than their BMIs would suggest, while black women and tall people are leaner. My ~~gropings~~ observations stem primarily from white women aged 18-30; older demographic groups were deliberately ignored. Only a small minority of women fall in the trained group – so when you set the threshold for being considered fat at a BMI of 22 as in my chart above, you discover an astonishing 80% of young women are fat. No wonder getting a non-fat girl in America can feel like a sadistic game of musical chairs, where there is one chair for every five players.

How Women Use Love As An Excuse To Extract A Man's Resources And Deplete His Life Energy

December 16, 2013 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

I came across this most excellent book called The Predatory Female. It is online for anyone who wants to read it. I almost feel that it's wrong to write a review of it since that will make you less likely to read it. If game is the 9mm, this is the automatic shotgun. You might think you are a player, but please don't take an air rifle to a gun battle.

Let's start with one little quote:

> A picture of James Bond trying to placate a shrieking wife while she threatens to have his wages garnished doesn't fit the hero image. A married man is a cornered man. He is a man who has lost something and this makes it hard for him to be the classic, free thinking and independent hero.

As one reviewer on Yahoo so aptly puts it :

> "Lawrence Shannon comes out with guns blazing in this relentless blitzkrieg attack on the female of the species. He is cynical beyond belief and shows no mercy towards them. While not vitriolic in tone, he matter-of-factly explains to his male readers why you should never marry a woman (a.k.a. the predatory female). You can laugh at this book, but I think the author is being deathly serious."

I can't seem to find much information about the author online; he claims to be a Reverend although he must belong to one of those Mayan churches that likes to practice mass human sacrifice, because surely no orthodox religion would tolerate such an affront to the social norms.

The book is written in a rather quirky question and answer format, that alerts the uneducated reader in an excellent way.

> What about Love ?
> Q. You haven't mentioned love as an interest of the predatory female. Why ?
> A. The predatory female never loves a man, she only loves the love. This is a basic rule.

We've all had those clinging girl friends determined to make us swear undying love to them, and as the matrix glitched around us, something was not right but we couldn't quite put our finger on it. Well much like Neo, Rev. Shannon not only puts his finger on it, but dismantles the entire mainframe. Women want to know if you love them so they can better manipulate you. They are never interested in loving you, only in using you for their ends. It is you that must love them.

In times gone by they promised to honor and obey, which was a good trade off. These days those promises mean nothing once the divorce attorney files motions against you. It's a shame more husbands don't trot along to court with copies of their marriage vows. That is a verbal contract. Think into it logically: women say they are 'in love' but that does not imply they have love to give. A fish is 'in water' a bird is 'in the sky' but neither have anything to do with the object they are 'in'. It's a man that provides the love women feel they are 'in'.

A woman will do anything to snare a man

Lawrence goes on to explain how the predatory female on the hunt will lose weight, dress up, wear make-up (which he describes as part of the lie), and once she has snared her man, she then adopts the strategies of the chameleon to fit into his world most perfectly. Although this is uncomfortable for her and she is occasionally prone to slip into her default state, she will maintain the charade for as long as it takes to completely get a man.

As the relationship progresses (and goes down hill) the man starts to believe catch phrases like; "we've grown apart", when in reality he was never together with the girl he believed he was. She had made every effort to adapt herself to his world, like one of those science fiction aliens adopting human form, even becoming president, but behind closed doors, slipping back into its natural grotesque lizard creature appearance.

He also likens married women to the deadly wasps that use their sting to paralyze the tarantula. She then uses the poor living spider, a once ferocious and powerful hunter, as a host for her nest. As the venom wears off the poor creature is ~~(denied sex and pussy whipped)~~ stung again and again, but of course never manages to escape and finally dies as ~~(a withered pensioner, whose kids hate him)~~ the baby wasps hatch out on his back. Nasty! How many married men with children do we see in this decrepit state?

We've always had a matriarchy

Lawrence takes a hatchet to the patriarchy and declares it never truly existed in the first place, that women always ruled the roost. While he is absolutely brutal, you will find yourself laughing at his words - there is really nothing more you can do when the full light is shone on the ants nest of feminine humanity. Everything you ever thought, felt and summarized about women is laid bare in his book. No stone is left unturned and many innocent female behaviors we brush over, he turns his guns on and as men we can only agree. What's more he's used a slightly old fashioned writing style and language, that gives it the air of authority and seriousness you find in many Victorian era authors from the late 1800s. I tried to find something in his work to argue against, but I have to say he presents the most convincing points.

Roosh outlines in his blog recently how he let a number of "the ones" slip away and just couldn't quite muster the will to commit to them. Rev. Shannon pats him on the back and explains that moment was most likely the zenith of their relationship. He confirms what Roosh only touched on, that it was going into decline from there. As someone whose been down the rabbit hole of the LTR several times, I can say I concur and congratulate Roosh on his will power and self restraint. Lawrence explains the indulgence of continuing into an LTR and marriage as nothing more than that, and goes on to expose the folly and outright life threatening danger of marriage to any man.

He brings to light the example from the garden of Eden where the devil most easily tricks and persuades Eve the female to bite the apple, but Adam fearing being alone in paradise bites the apple of his own free will. This is exactly what has drawn me into long term relationships. I didn't want to be alone. I wanted my companion and sex buddy at my side. Yet looking back on more than 20 years of adulthood I see the years that I abstained from relationships were the happiest and most relaxing by far.

A woman can not increase a man's happiness

If a women doesn't drain you financially she will most certainly drain your sanctity and peace of mind, which of course reduces your productivity and soon leaves you financially drained just the same. What's more I see my father whose been divorced since he was 50, now at the age of 71 with his new girlfriend picking him up at the airport at 1am, after a flight came in late. He's never looked to remarry, just bounced from one woman to the next. Muscled through the lonely times and avoided 'the one'. Admittedly he is a man that likes his peace and being on his own, but don't we all ? If you haven't mastered the art of your own company you are most surely not close to any kind of alpha male.

Shannon goes on to explain that women never really commit to relationships they just use the man for the time he is useful. A classic example he gives is that of the invisible man.

> The Invisible Man
> Q. Who is the invisible man?
> A. Any man the predatory female has deemed to be of no further use. Although she'll go to extremes pleasing and cultivating a man when she's in the acquisitive mode, she views him as untouchable once his purpose is served. He totally ceases to exist in every way. He becomes a nonperson and is fair game for the carrion birds of society.
> Q. How can the male fall so low in her esteem?
> A. He never achieved any other status. He is commonly misled though his failure to grasp the predatory nature of the female. He may have been a victim of the chameleon syndrome. Indeed, one of the biggest stumbling blocks for men, especially those reared by women, is the understanding that no women will ever love them, particularly in the manner they desire.
> Q. Why do you say that?
> A. A woman's love is like a hand powered grinding wheel. If you pump furiously and wind it up, she will do the job, make noise, even throw off sparks. She will > respond, but only respond. The minute you release the handle . . . she begins winding down. She can only respond in a temporary manner. That's why an adult female will rarely call you or initiate anything. They are only constructed to respond.

> Q. And the invisible man?
> A. He is not allowed to crank the handle. Once the charade is over, and that day comes for every man, the female has no feeling, no remorse, no conscience, and no empathy for the discarded male. He becomes the invisible man.

This of course also explains the sexless marriages. She doesn't feel like sex, but he's useful in many other ways; so long as he hangs around begging for pussy she has no need to drop her draws. However should she get horny or be turned on by a passing alpha of course she will gladly use him as her dildo regardless of the poor husband desperate for even the lowliest hand job. Should the lover be foolish enough to fall into her trap, soon he will be wheeled in to take the place of the almost invisible husband that is shown the door forthwith.

We all have zero status with women and are ultimately invisible

Rev. Shannon agrees with my own finding that as tacky as it might seem, one of the most honest relationships you can have with a woman is simply paying for sex and taking it for what it is. His book is certainly an eye opener and whilst the truth can often be bitter and cause offense, you cannot help but agree with just about every line he writes.

I think the most important thing we can learn from this book is that it doesn't matter if we are young 18 year olds in our first year of college, or guys in our 40s and 50s that have been married and divorced a couple of times—we are all aboard Morpheus's hoover craft The Nebuchadnezzar. The question is not how long or why we were tricked. We must cast off our shame and anger, forgive our mistakes and move on the task at hand of pulling down the matrix. Since this is not a movie, most likely there is no 'one savior'. Rather the combined 'one' of everyone who sees the truth in the sea of lies we swim in. It's our job as brothers in arms to start covering each others backs, not just bitching on forums like feminists, or gaming each others girls because we can.

When you look at a woman who's with her boyfriend or husband, you start to see not a lovely couple with the man at the helm but an entitled female plotting and manipulating the poor sucker at every turn. It might not start out like that but it sure as hell ends like that. Visit your grandparents and see how your grandmother treats and talks to your grandfather. See girls out with their boyfriends, read their minds and body language and observe what is really going on.

Understand the social dynamics that are taking place in every male-female interaction. It's nothing close to what an 'innocent' man believes. In every relationship I've ended I felt like the girl stole my innocence, chipped away at a piece of my soul. Instead I see now that what I was experiencing was the bitter truth, nothing more and nothing less.

Men built this planet. We tilled the soils, mined its resources, developed the technologies, fought wars against oppressors, died for our loved ones who in times gone by honored, respected and obeyed us. Are we just soldier ants or is it time we took back what is rightfully ours. Today it seems the animals control the zoo and the patients are running the mental hospital.

How To Learn A Language And Practice Game At The Same Time

December 17, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Why would anyone learn a language? Usually we wish to improve ourselves, develop an understanding of a foreign culture and, often most of all, communicate with beautiful women who would otherwise be inaccessible to us. If you're planning to take a trip or live abroad, as part of your preparation you should find a way to combine language study with learning about the girls in your new locale.

Enter iTalki, a website that connects you to like-minded language students across the world. You can pay reasonable rates for private studies over Skype, write journal entries, and send messages to other students. However, iTalki really shines because of its search tool, which includes pictures of your potential language partners (girls, in this case), whether they are a native speaker, their skill level in your language, and a filter for city and country.

Pipelining is an increasingly important aspect of international travel. Whereas before most traveling players would dropping into a remote area and begin building contacts, the westernization of foreign countries ensures girls have exponentially more male contacts hitting them up on their iPhones. A numbers game is necessary for building both a prospect base and a social circle prior to your arrival.

Unlike OKCupid, where you are immediately put in a position of begging for dates as a confused foreigner, iTalki is a value exchange — you meet cute girls and help them with their English, while they help you with your French, Spanish, Russian, whatever.

Here are the two best reasons to work Italki into your foreign game routine:

1. It offers value

Even if you're a clod, you're likely a native English speaker and an American. Though that alone rarely gets you respect in the clubs in Helsinki or Buenos Aires, it projects value in this situation because many people wish to learn English and practice speaking with Americans. This type of sniper-game rewards the erudite player who is looking to improve himself in the process of finding new prospects, and helps meet women who are trying to do the same.

2. Multitasking

If you go to the bar, drop time and cash on a night out, and go home discouraged after getting blown out in your few approaches, what have you really accomplished? These growing pains are necessary evils for building the toolbox of your game, but improving your skills doesn't always require an outlay of time and monetary for zero guaranteed value. Talking to cute girls on this website allows you to devote your time to two things at once, both of which synergize to make the other better. Even if your game is a rebuffed, you have still better equipped yourself for a trip or living abroad.

Here are the first few girls that came up with a search of English-studiers in Wroclaw, Poland and the Ukraine:

Not bad. iTalki helps you get better at actual communication, talk to cute girls, and get the local flavor before you drop into a completely new environment. What could be better motivation to keep at your language studies?

9 Reasons Why Sydney Sucks For Men

December 17, 2013 | by Subetei Gur | Link | Original Link

It has come to my attention that while many of the readers of ROK are avidly familiar with the general curse of the Western woman, their scope of experience is somewhat geographically limited. The particulars discussed on this site attribute primarily to American girls, and while Western women everywhere are simply mutations of the parent specimen, the key to success (or avoidance) is in their subtleties. One particular region of the world that is well passed the ravishing point of third wave feminism is Sydney, Australia. Being a citizen and resident of this country and city, respectively, I believe I should enlighten you with the trends and realities of this place so you can better decide when or if ever you should book a flight heading down under.

1. Sydney girls are worse than American girls

When you first interact with the average white, local girl, you will feel familiarity in the vibe you get: yes, they are entitled, bratty, not so intelligent, sluts but don't admit it, etc. After all, Sydney is simply "Little America". But as you continue the interaction, you will notice that the blocks and obstacles ahead of you are no longer fun "challenges" for you to "game" around. They are outright hostile manoeuvres designed to GET YOU THE FUCK AWAY.

While girls in Sydney hate beta males, manginas, and white knights just as much as those in America, they do not exhibit the same level of appreciation for masculinity either. Now do you see the problem? You are stuck in limbo: be a nice guy and she will never EVER let you near her holes, but be a typical Los Angeles alpha male that has his shit together and you will get a look of disgust that screams "How dare you objectify me and topple my pedestal of uniqueness!"

2. Girls only care about your looks

Ok, my Altaic warrior ancestry in all its testicular splendour omits me from this one, but for the average guy, this is a real pain in the gluteus maximus. If she doesn't like you from the first second, SHE DOES NOT LIKE YOU. Any attempts to shift this momentum of thought will cause her to think, “How dare you have the audacity to talk to ME?” followed by “Only Leonardo Dicaprio is allowed to approach me”. You seriously need to be above 6′ and lift regularly to get attention here. However, on the plus side, once you are in this category you get eye fucked A LOT.

3. Girls are woefully ignorant and intellectually underdeveloped

Everyone makes fun of Americans for being stupid. Well guess what? Sydneysiders can be worse. See, the US has a large population, and so naturally the bell curve will stretch to either side more and more into the extremes. But in the case of Sydney, the entire bell curve is shifted to the left! So yes, while there are plenty of unbelievably ignorant Americans taking up the sidewalk, the average Sydneysider’s consistently annoying ignorance will drive you mad after about week.

We might not have your ‘worst’, but our entire population sits at your ‘pretty fucking bad’. This becomes a disaster when you try to display any value in Sydney because the shit you say are not only unappreciated, but are simply not understood. The rule of thumb is to say as few intellectual words as possible. Refer to below excerpt:

Man: “I am a biomedical engineer”
Sydney girl: “What’s that?”

Man: “Oh I’m from Ohio”
Sydney girl: “Where’s that?”

Man: “Let’s go to that bar, they make good sangria”
Sydney girl: “What’s that?”

Man: “Your place, Saturday night”
Sydney girl: “lol ok”

You get idea. Avoid all topics that require them to think or are not spontaneous and fun. And always, ALWAYS involve alcohol on dates.

4. Girls are xenophobic

I actually thought long and hard about putting this one up here, because I strongly believe that good game and sufficient masculinity will overcome all barriers. But in the case of Sydney, you can't avoid it. Some girls will not fuck you if you're black. Some girls will not fuck you if you're not the right kind of white. Some girls will not fuck you if you're Asian. Point is, if you're not white, you need VERY tight game. Moreover, you need flawless physical aesthetics and strong mental constitution on top of your game. In fact, I would rate pure, aggressive masculinity as being more important than smooth game here in Sydney.

5. An epidemic of lame dudes enable the absolute worst of all females

Upon arriving to this city you will witness, perhaps for the first time in your lives, the most beta, supplicating, socially awkward, unconfident men you have ever seen, save only for the absolute pussified Norway or Sweden, and even that's subjective. This means that the competition you face is nonexistent. However, because Sydney is such an illogical place, the lack of competition does not mean easier pussy. Having the balls to approach will

NOT get you points. Instead, expect to see lots of “couples” out, where the guy is paying dearly for drinks while the girl is eye fucking you, comfortable in the fact that her beta orbiter is attending to all her emotional needs, preventing her from taking the social risk to meet a new guy. Even the nastiest, grimiest, bitchiest Sydney girl will have her choice of orbiters to guard her.

6. It’s expensive

Sydney is the second most expensive city in the world, and that’s if you include immorally expensive places like Luxembourg into the list. Club entry fees normally shoot up to $40 and beyond, while drinks from anywhere decent will cost you around $10-$20 for anything classy like a cocktail. The public transport, while putting that of the US to shame, can still be a pain as it is does not operate 24 hours. However, this isn’t the real problem. The real problem is that a 20 minute cab ride will set you back $60. And these are 2013 prices!

7. Game doesn’t work

Remember that artful neg you employed on that brunette in San Francisco that got her from initially being annoyed at you to playfully hitting your arm and asking questions? Well that wouldn’t get you very far in Sydney. If you want to know the reason why, refer to point #1, paragraph 2. Whereas the girls in the US to some degree know that you are seducing them, they will develop a sexual desire for you out of appreciation for your game. That’s not how it works in Sydney. If your interaction conveys to her any notions of you wanting to impale her mud pipe, she will call you out. Even if she is attracted to you, your actions will be seen as subterfuge. Sydney girls do not like subterfuge.

8. Grenades… grenades everywhere

There’s no two ways of saying this, but girls here are FAT. Not morbidly obese (although we do have those too) and not “documentary fat”, but just fat enough to proudly and publicly exhibit their BBW statuses while not fat enough to be rendered immobile. The consequence is that finding a decent girl ends up wasting more of your time than actually conversing with one. Clusters of these grenades also means that at times your entire field of vision will be obscured by unsightliness, causing you to lose hope in life.

9. Almost impossible to date up

While there are exceptions to any rule, Sydney mirrors Toronto in the men’s collective difficulty in dating up. It is very common to spot women that are ugly, fat—or both ugly and fat—dating guys that, at least on the exterior, look like they have quite a bit going for them. Conversely, it’s not common at all to spot plain looking guys with gorgeous women. This discrepancy is especially pronounced in the fitness realm. Most men in this city have a gym membership, and regardless of how they look or how tall they are genetically, their effort screams out the admirable virtue of self improvement. The same can most certainly not be said for the females in a city where carrying easily preventable fat is the norm.

Final Note

I cannot speak for all of Australia as I have not gamed extensively in other cities, but I would presume they are significantly better than Sydney. However, I recommend that everyone pay Sydney at least one gaming visit if simply for a self-training session. If you can conquer Sydney, the world is yours.

The Reality Of False Rape Accusations Will Require You To Make A Change You May Not Like

December 17, 2013 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

My friend Steve got a girl's number. He texted her later in the night and she didn't reply. The flakes, ye will always have with you.

The next morning, we went out for breakfast with a group of friends. Steve told us his story of unrequited love. To soothe his broken heart, I offered him a wager. I bet Steve that I could send his girl three texts from my phone, and get more than ten back before the end of the day.

Steve doubted me. My other friends doubted me. The Gods themselves, looking down on that greasy spoon diner, said that it could not be done. I saved her number, took a deep breath, and sent the first text:

"I can't believe you"

She replied an hour later:

"Why?"

I wrote back:

"omg you don't even remember"

She responded, immediately:

"Wtf?"

And that's when I hit her with the emotional heavy artillery, uranium-tipped with a lack of capitalization:

"such a slut"

(Credit for this always-incendiary text to RSD Julien)

Did I win the bet?

Well, it depends. If a missed call counts as a text, and I argue that it does, then yes. Steve disagrees, but was still impressed with the four consecutive unanswered text replies, the last of which was "Meurt a Toronto, criss de pas beau." (My gutter slang French is rusty, but I think I catch her drift.)

What's the point of this story? Maybe there isn't one. Maybe it's just a funny thing that happened to me last weekend, that we can laugh about today.

But maybe not. Because now I'm a little bit worried. I have committed the ultimate crime against humanity in 21st century North America. I hurt a girl's feelings.

What might happen – I find myself wondering – if this girl has a complete mental breakdown from my rude texts? This is entirely possible. One In Four Women Have Mental Health Issues, and we are in the midst of a Depression Epidemic Caused By Feminism. What if this girl had actually hooked up with some guy later that night, felt bad about it, and forgot what he looked like? And then she woke up to my texts and decided to get revenge on the asshole who 'took advantage of her'?

As we discussed in The Truth About False Rape Accusations, the legal definition of rape is subjective. The Feminist movement has pushed hard to redefine all drunk sex as rape. Meanwhile, our culture refuses to hold women accountable for their actions in many regards. The result: false rape accusations are real, they are common, and they are usually consequence-free for the accuser.

That's why I felt worried about those text messages. I have no idea who this girl is. I did nothing more than call her a mean name. But, in the legal climate we live in, and given the emotional frailty of North American women, there's a real chance that it would be enough to kick off a shitstorm. This is true for any man who risks hurting a girl's feelings. For example:

- If a man and a woman have a few drinks at a party, hook up, and he never makes eye contact with her again, she's going to feel like a slut
- If a man and a woman hook up and he gets clingy in the morning, she's going to feel regret for sleeping with a weak man.
- If a man and a married woman hook up and the woman later gets caught by her husband, she's going to feel guilty

In each of these situations, the woman has two options: 1) Accept the responsibility and consequences for a bad decision and move on with her life, or 2) Cry rape.

The majority of women would go with option (1). But the statistics indicate that many do not. And once she decides to go down that road, she'll have the unflagging support of a feminist community to goad her on, and attack anyone who questions her credulity as a misogynistic "victim-blamer."

The end result is that men have one rational response to the growth of false rape accusations: We must become nice guys. We cannot go around being assholes, having a laugh, saying whatever crazy shit we feel like, because there are now serious legal repercussions to hurting the feelings of emotionally unstable women. We must become nice guys, and you must take precautions to protect yourself from false rape accusations. For example:

- We must exchange a few post-bang good-feelings texts with random hookups, both for the positive emotions and the recorded evidence.
- We must avoid crazy, unstable, and taken girls.
- We must avoid hooking up with girls who are drunk or high.
- We must generally act like decent guys, treat the girls we date reasonably well, and at least pretend to be interested in a follow-up bang after the fact.

I can hear the mentally defective feminists and manginas reading this list and saying: "Good! Men should do those things anyways! What's so hard about being a decent human being?" Thus revealing their totalitarian desire to enforce good hook-up etiquette with life imprisonment.

I can also hear the more enlightened reader, shaking his head at how we let our culture get so fucked up. And you're right. It is absolutely ridiculous. But, in the short term, this is the world we live in. Go to Singapore and they will lash you for chewing gum. In Thailand, you will be jailed for insulting the King. In India, they will draw and quarter you for the great crime of cow-tipping.

Here in 21st-century North America, you can be sentenced to die in prison for hurting an unstable and emotionally immature girl's feelings. Swallow your pride, and act accordingly.

Why America Causes Men To Be Unnatural

December 18, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

“What are you drinking?” I ask the blonde to the left of me as I wait in line to order a drink at the bar. She blurbs vodka something, in one ear and out the other. I was just trying to gauge her interest. Her eyes dart around the room and she doesn’t seem that interested in me. I know better than to give up, so I reengage the conversation. She talks for a few minutes and then excuses herself to go find her friends. Oh well.

Turn to my right. Brunette this time, hooray for variety I guess. “What are you drinking?” This one is excited and tells me ginger ale and Jameson. Sugary with a taste of slut. We chat it up and things are going well. More hand contact, first shoulder then side waist. She’s a fun girl and I’m enjoying my time with her. Maybe I should buy her a drink. Wait, no I can’t. I’m in America and that is a sign of weakness. Despite the fact that I genuinely don’t mind.

Won’t be able to fuck her tonight because the world is a cockblock, so I settle for her number. “Give me your number” I demand, because anything less than full confidence in assuming the sale can set off one of several fabricated yet indoctrinated alarms in her mind. She likes my assertiveness. Number collected.

Few days later text the numbers I collected, same text to all and see what bites. A few leads, including the brunette. Can’t use appropriate punctuation or a smiley face. I’m in America and that is a sign of weakness.

Date set with brunette. Go through my routine, and try to fuck her because it ensures the best chance of ever seeing her again. These days American girls have the attention span of a six-year old retard at the Willy Wonka factory. Funny thing is I wouldn’t even mind waiting another date, possibly two (but no more). But again, I’m in America and that’s a sign of weakness.

The Bizarro World

I have come to realize something lately. American men are forced to deviate from their natural and biological desires in order to achieve any perceived happiness with their counterparts of the opposite sex. Ironically, this has the unintended effect of pushing you away from happiness into a more morose state of being. American women are so damn backwards, it is a bit scary if you think about it. Girls here love to call us rapists and misogynists and little-dicked home-dwellers when all of our behavior is a direct result of their own misguided actions.

For ages, men have adapted as a means of solving problems by assessing a situation. Through experimentation, trial and error, and eventually wisdom from the elder and more experienced, we have figured out solutions to problems that face us in our everyday lives. "Game," as we like to call it, is the same thing. It is a medium by which we adjust our actions, words, and beliefs in order to achieve our goals. Here, our goals — be it fornication with many girls or a relationship with a hopefully devout wife — require the use of a strategy that, to be honest, goes against our nature.

This is a broken record by now, but we all know the drawbacks of our western women. They take pride in not looking good, in not cooking or knowing how to cook, in not taking care of their men, in valuing work over beauty, in disregarding the value of their youth, in becoming the dominant male of the heterosexual relationship. They have become filthy animals who beg to be choked during sex. They mandate drama as a means of interaction given the endless "reality" shows they gorge upon on a daily basis.

I've created arguments with girls I've dated just because I know they need that drama to be entertained, or they will think I'm "boring." I have to pretend their sexuality is not a turn on for me or risk being deemed a pervert because any overt act of kink displayed by a female causing a reaction in the observing male is indicative of someone who can't get laid.

Take for example one girl I was banging a while back, relevant tweet embedded below. She sent me a video of her masturbating while yelling my name. Likely fabricated, it was just attention whoring coupled with what she perceived to be something men want, to see a girl they are dating act in a pornographic way.

> Apparently, not everyone shares my sense of humor (slightly NSFW): pic.twitter.com/uDYNZpegIj
> — Law Dogger (@LawDogger) November 28, 2013

I know some men enjoy dirty texts, but since I've already banged her and I like the subtle sultriness more than the obvious displays, this did nothing for me. But let's assume it actually did turn me on. Naturally, I would want to make a comment indicating both the level of attraction that it caused me, and also approve of her behavior to hopefully encourage more of the same.

Unfortunately by responding naturally, she would either think less of me or overvalue her sexuality's effect on me. So as with other similar situations I responded in the way I did and after a few more angry texts (see drama discussion above), she warmed up as usual and we continued our physical relationship.

The Real World

Here at ROK it may seem like we sensationalize Eastern Europe, South America or Southeast Asia. But it is not exaggeration. They are places where men can act upon their natural and instinctive desires, and not be punished. If I buy a girl a drink in Russia, because I want to and believe in doing so, I am thought of as a good provider and a true man. If a girl likes me in Brazil, I know it within seconds and we can be kissing within minutes.

Across the sea if I have a question I want to ask via text, I can include the question mark without fear the girl may think the use of punctuation is too formal. There's no rush to fucking a girl because you will likely see her again She will kick you out of the kitchen if you attempt to cook, because that's "her job."

Until you actually visit and experience these places, it's hard to understand why American/Western women bother us so much. But I think I'm understanding a new reason why. Maybe our annoyances, while seeded in their actions, actually result from the unrest we feel within ourselves because of how much we have to deviate from our instincts. Maybe our feelings of elation and satisfaction from traveling comes not from the women we bed, but from the ability to finally coincide our desires and thoughts with what evolution intended for us.

By no means am I trying to get spiritual or preachy here. But just as we are not meant as human beings to be tied indoors in an office for 40+ hours a week, men are not meant to act in these ways to have successful relationships with women. The sight of a beautiful women elicits an intense desire in me. Sex is one of the purest forms of nature, biologically based upon reproductive necessity yet carrying with it the utmost physical pleasure most will ever naturally experience. Yet, living in America, we are required to act unnatural in order to even feel the slightest bit natural in the end.

And it fucking sucks.

4 Reasons Not To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder

December 18, 2013 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

Several weeks back, Brother Tuthomosis posted an article titled 5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder. Although it was meant as a ribald jest, many voices came forward to protest the insensitivity displayed by Return Of Kings. We simply cannot be so insensitive, men; our brethren sistren of the Demisexual & Otherkin genders are sensitive souls, and it is incumbent upon us to take their feelings into consideration before we speak.

So with that in mind, let us speak frankly about those Heroes of our modern age, the Eating Disordered White Girls, without resorting to ridicule, and without treating them as nothing more than cock cozies. What follows are the four main reasons you shouldn't date a girl with an eating disorder.

1. They're overweight

Perhaps this is because of a history of swing-dieting; all of that alternating between fasting and binging, only to wind up training their metabolism for a drought on the African Savannah. The poor dumplings! Or perhaps it's that their eating disorder somehow translates into having a bad diet –subsisting on sugars and electrolytes and dulling their insulin response. Or perhaps it's simply that skinny girls who work-out regularly, and exert a modicum of self-discipline when offered desert, never need to worry about their diet, and are thus immune to the disorder.

Now I want to be perfectly clear about something – I am not fat shaming. I believe that all of us here at RoK are man enough to admit that we secretly crave the porcine rolls of the full-time Mac-and-Cheese eater. No, I am simply pointing out that one does not simply 'date' one of these voluptuous tulips with the expectations of casual sex; these ladies need to be wooed.

2. They have bad breath

The human anatomy evolved as a one-way tube. We cannot operate like flatworms, who intake food, absorb the nutrients, and expel it out the same hole, and should we try do so, there are some nasty side-effects.

First there's the obvious: nobody likes kissing pukey girls, even though the ones I've seen at parties don't seem to realize this (perhaps the raspberry wine covers up the taste of stomach acid?). And as I'm sure you've noticed, during a bout of the flu, or after making the mistake of 'beer before liquor,' there's nothing that will completely remove the taste of vomit from your mouth.

The second problem comes only after years of binge-and-purging, but is even worse: the constant soaking of stomach acid manages to erode away even the pearliest of whites, and the result is a mouth degenerating to meth-addict quality.

3. Their malnourishment leaves them deranged

Speaking of meth addicts, there's the whole problem of malnourishment.

As heroic as it is to stick your finger down your throat, the fact of the matter is that we are organic machines: both our bodies and our minds rely upon regular intakes of chemical energy to function properly. The self-imposed starvation of the Eating Disordered Girl leads to mental derangement: flakiness, inability to concentrate, and hallucinations. In other words, it exacerbates the bad traits that women are already cursed with.

4. An eating disorder is indicative of a secondary mental illness

The interesting thing about mental disorders is that some of them are universal (depression, narcissism, female hysteria) while others are culture-specific. Eating disorders are in the latter camp.

Secondary disorders aren't disorders in and of themselves, but rather, an effect of some other underlying disorder. An anorexic hero doesn't actually see a warped version of themselves in the mirror, as some would claim – rather, she's engaging in a behaviour which is all too typical amongst the tumblr crowd:

She's engaging in self-harm.

The reality of eating disorders is that they're usually just an expression of borderline personality disorder, or some other derangement which involves hurting oneself to get attention. Some do cutting, others take pills, but in her case, she harms herself through starvation.

On the surface she says "I'm not pretty enough, so I'm going to punish myself by not eating!" And while it might seem like a good bargain for you at first, eventually this transmogrifies into "I'm not pretty enough because of the patriarchy! I'm not pretty enough because my boyfriend's an asshole! I'm not pretty enough so I'm going to murder you in your sleep for judging me!" and so forth.

There are a million-and-one ways for insanity to manifest, but only a few fundamental ways that things go wrong. And despite what the apologists say, mental illness is infectious. Even if you don't experience a false rape accusation or a physical attack from your anorexic hero, you're still going to be subjected to the M.C. Escher emotional life of a Schedule II, and trust me – your brain is just not equipped to deal with Cthulu so closely.

As I said at the beginning, our Demisexual Otherkin sistren are sensitive, easily damaged souls; what I didn't point out is that they're sensitive in the same manner as the puffball mushroom: poke them, and a cloud of toxic spores fills the air.

So let us be respectful, let us acknowledge their heroism, and let us celebrate how special and unique these women are – by boycotting these overweight, smelly, and unstable victims™.

The Book “Feminism Is For Everybody” Confirms That Feminism Is Not For Everybody

December 18, 2013 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

A friend of mine recently challenged me to read the book Feminism Is For Everybody by Bell Hooks. He told me that, as a gender studies major, he found the pop culture version of feminism to be very different from the academic feminism he was studying, and said that if I wanted to talk about feminism, I needed to read major feminist writing.

Since I actually enjoy listening to friends and authors I disagree with, I told him I’d read the book with an open mind. While Feminism Is For Everybody didn’t make me a feminist, it did show what’s wrong with feminism, and how to fix it.

What Does the Book Say?

In the introduction, Bell Hooks states this book is specifically intended to convince men, who “have no idea what it is feminists want” and are only familiar with feminism through “patriarchal mass media” that “they would find in feminist movement the hope of their own release from the bondage of patriarchy.” In other words, if you read ROK, you’re her target audience.

Hooks defines feminism as “A movement to end sexism, sexist exploitation, and oppression” and considers patriarchy synonymous with domination. By defining patriarchy as a system of domination, rather than a division of social roles intended for mutual benefit, Hooks creates a straw man that equates patriarchy with oppression.

Her writing often delves into broad generalizations without any examples or definitions. For example:

> Males as a group have and do benefit the most from patriarchy, from the assumption that they are superior to females and should rule over us. But those benefits have come with a price. In return for all the goodies men receive from patriarchy, they are required to dominate women, to exploit and oppress us, using violence if they must to keep patriarchy intact.

Hooks doesn’t define what “ruling over women” means, what “goodies men receive,” how men dominate women, or give any examples of actual violence committed to “keep patriarchy intact.” Her description is so vague, there’s no way to verify or falsify any of the claims she’s made. She gives no facts of any kind and only a handful of anecdotes, making the majority of the book simply opinions she asserts without evidence.

Where Bell Hooks becomes interesting is her critique of the feminist movement.

Are Feminists Anti-Male?

In her history of feminism, Hooks acknowledges “There was indeed a great deal of anti-male sentiment among early feminist activists,” since many came to the movement from physically abusive marriages. Despite this, Hooks argues that modern feminism is not anti-male, and the problem was that “conservative mass media constantly represented feminist women as man-haters.”

However, when talking about “anti-sexist men” joining the movement, she states:

> Anti-male factions within the feminist movement resented the presence of anti-sexist men because their presence served to counter any insistence that all men are oppressors, or that all men hate women… They portrayed all men as the enemy in order to represent all women as victims.

Hooks’s writing is full of contradictions. She says in the opening that men benefit from patriarchy, and then later states “men who are not rich and powerful” don’t have much privilege and are discovering that patriarchy doesn’t benefit them. Which is it?

Her aspirations for feminism frequently contradict the things feminists actually say and do:

> When feminist movement was “hot,” radical lesbian activists constantly demanded that straight women reconsider their bonds with men, raising the question of whether or not it was possible for women to ever have a liberated heterosexual experience within a patriarchal context…
> Teaching one of my first women’s studies courses in San Francisco I was confronted by a group of radical lesbian students who wanted to know why I was still “into” men. After class one day in the parking lot there was a showdown.

If a group of straight men had a “showdown” in the parking lot with their gay professor, asking him why he was still into men, we would call them homophobic. While Hooks tries to fight the image of feminists as angry lesbians, her few personal anecdotes illustrate a significant portion of the feminist movement is deeply heterophobic.

Are Women The Primary Abusers?

> "In a zealous effort to call attention to male violence against women reformist feminist thinkers still choose often to portray females as always and only victims. The fact that many violent attacks on children are perpetrated by women is not equally highlighted."

One area I found myself agreeing with Hooks was her condemnation of child abuse perpetrated by women. Hooks's willingness to confront female violence is incredibly brave, even if she frames it with the absurd statement that this abuse only comes from the fact many women are "more patriarchal" than men.

> Women are often the primary culprits in everyday violence against children… Maternal sadism often leads coercion of children must be seen as just as horrendous as male abuse… A serious gap in feminist thinking and practice has been the refusal of the movement to confront head-on adult female violence against children.

Hooks states that the root of male violence is abuse, and shame received at the hands of the mother, because "abusive shaming lays the foundation for other forms of abuse." As she illustrates in the best passage of the book:

> Often I tell the story of being at a fancy dinner party where a woman is describing the way she disciplines her young son by pinching him hard, clamping down on his little flesh for as long as it takes to control him. And how everyone applauded her willingness to be a disciplinarian. I shared the awareness that her behavior was abusive, that she was potentially planting the seeds for this male > child to grow up and be abusive to women. Significantly, I told the audience of listeners that if we had heard a man telling us how he just clamps down on a woman's flesh, pinching her hard to control her behavior it would have been immediately acknowledged as abusive. Yet when a child is being hurt this form of negative domination is condoned. This is not an isolated incident – much more severe violence against children is enacted daily by mothers and fathers.

If women are the primary perpetrators of child abuse, and pass these patterns of abuse on to their children, the system of oppression Hooks opposes is actually matriarchal. It is a system perpetrated and passed down through bad mothers. Hooks calls her own mother "the strongest patriarchal voice in my life," and frequently hints at an incredibly unhappy and abusive childhood.

Is Family the Solution?

Since the need to dominate others originates from feelings of powerlessness in childhood, then the solution would be to make sure children are loved and accepted. What has feminism done to make sure boys grow up in happy homes?

Hooks herself says, "No significant body of feminist literature has appeared that addresses boys." Due to the influence of feminism, boys are frequently shamed simply for being masculine, drugged at young ages for wanting to play, and are falling behind women in school and work.

While Hooks advocates men playing an equal role in child rearing, most boys are now being raised in single-parent, or divorced homes, with most divorces initiated by women. Feminist policies have resulted in less involvement from fathers, and total matriarchal control of the household.

Hooks seems uncomfortable with the idea of motherhood, saying “Female sexual freedom requires dependable, safe birth control… It evokes fear within me just to imagine a world where every time a female is sexual she risks being impregnated.” She criticizes authors who suggest women can find happiness in making raising children their primary role. She projects oppression onto men, even defining her own mother’s abuse as masculine, so she can avoid truly confronting it, and continue to play out the pattern of powerlessness she learned as a child.

If women want a world without violence, they can raise one. Making sure children are loved and accepted would mean embracing the role of motherhood. It would mean taking the needs and feelings of boys seriously. It would mean choosing male partners interested in fatherhood, and giving them the support they need to remain in their children’s lives. It would mean making the family, and the needs of children the most important organizing principle of society. If that sounds like patriarchy, then maybe patriarchy is for everybody.

Modern Men Are Becoming Lotus Eaters

December 18, 2013 | by Mjolnir | Link | Original Link

In The Odyssey, Odysseus comes ashore on the island of the lotus eaters, where the inhabitants eat flowers that make them completely peaceful and content. Some of his men taste the plant and sink into a peaceful apathy, losing all desire to return to their homes and families. This episode in the Odyssey reminds me of the circumstances of modern man.

I travel to America frequently, and occasionally to Canada and through Europe. The men I meet are hollowed out. Mentally, they are wraiths. Anatomically, they remain males, but even that distinction might be receding. Overall, there is an absence of masculinity as an ideal. Men throughout history, and presumably, prehistory, have had a conception of masculinity. No more—masculinity is verboten. It is a punch line, an object of contempt. There is a sense that we've all been robbed, but most dare not talk about it, except in hushed tones in the corner of a seedy bar or in a wilderness hunting cabin. Old folks may speak of times when "men were men, and women were women," but their voices are tolerated as the ramblings of senility.

In this age where identity politics are king (or queen, rather), men are refused the right to an identity."Fight Club" wasn't about underground boxing rings or anarchist terrorists. It was about men secretly reclaiming the identities that have been denied to them.

A character in a book I read when I was younger said, "Man does not live by bread alone,"and he certainly doesn't. His soul, his mind, his spirit, or whatever you prefer must be fed as well. The starvation is palpable, and starving people become angry people. As Colonel Slade says in Scent of a Woman, "There is nothing like the sight of an amputated spirit." There is nothing but a bloody stump where masculinity once was.

Whenever human civilization colonizes an area, it seeks to tame the nature that surrounds it. Forests are felled, livestock are bred, the soil is plowed for crops, and stones are taken from the furrowed fields to become cottages and towns. The wolves and lions that circled the edges of primeval man's watch fires are beaten back into the darker parts of the forest. Only the most intrepid hunter still sees them. The wild animals will be the unseen monsters used to frighten wayward children into submission.

The humans move farther into the forest, until one day an axe edge touches the last virgin tree at the heart of the woods. The animals that represent a darker age are extinct, and they pass into legends of times when heroes and gods walked the earth. The humans are content on their farms and in their towns, but there is regret for what they lost. In the TV miniseries of the novel Lonesome Dove, the retired Texas Ranger Gus reminisces with his partner: "Has it ever occurred to you, Woodrow; that all the work we done was for the bankers? Hell, we killed off everybody that made this country interestin'!"

Like the monsters of the deep woods, the beleaguered men of Western civilization retreated to a few enclaves, but even those are falling away. Not a day passes when a feminist doesn't gloat that men have been brought low. "You are neither wanted, nor needed!" comes the cry.

But a tribe without its men is just as dead as a tribe without its women, and society is becoming uncomfortable as it senses this crisis. We need nothing less than a Renaissance of masculinity. Return of Kings and the larger manosphere are good beginnings.

Every article on this site and its cousin sites is an opportunity to define ourselves. This reconstruction is difficult, because manly ideals were so imprinted on our forefathers that they often didn't explain completely what those ideals were. How do we have a discussion about things that were so second nature at one time? We're looking to the recent past, to our fathers and grandfathers for the ideas we need. We're looking to the distant and ancient past. We're looking to the present, and most of all the future. Let no one say that our striving for manliness is antiquated, because without better men (and better women), the days ahead will be more dreary and inglorious than they already are.

Feminism is a reactive force. It stands for nothing; it needs a "patriarchy" to rail against. In my last article on ROK I shied away from attempting to strictly define manliness. But there is one masculine trait that seems universal to cultures conceptions of manliness: that trait is the Active, marked by assertiveness and aggression. As men, our instinct is to take action, and we must have a positive masculine ideal in place in the West before we can move forward; otherwise we will only flail helplessly as feminism and her associated cancers drag us farther into the abyss.

In the Iliad, Achilles' mother tried to convince him he was a woman to prevent his death in the Trojan war. But Achilles remembered who he was when Odysseus showed him a sword, and went on to claim his legend on the fields before Troy. Men who listlessly drift around the land of the lotus eaters must remember who we are if we are to find our way to a true conception of masculinity.

No Woman Can Escape Mother Nature’s Devastating Reality Check

December 19, 2013 | by Kilmister | Link | Original Link

Time and time again I run into younger fellas, frustrated with the entitled “treat me like a princess because I have a pussy” females of today. I explain to them that at 39 years old, I have experienced one ultimate truth, witnessed one formula that never changes, never fails and always levels the playing field. I tell them, be patient… mother nature will humble these chicks like nothing else, permanently.

Because of various circumstances in life, and despite my age, I often end up in social circles with individuals in their early to late 20s, as well as those in my own age bracket of course. Half of these people, if not more, are females and many I consider friends. Being the case, I have seen one cycle repeated at least a good three to four times over by now.

Six Nine Syndrome (SNS)

A common theme on ROK is the modern entitled female. Never has this been more apparent, in my opinion, than the last 15 years or so. Females generally seem to have the attitude that simply having a pair of tits somehow entitles them to a certain brand of treatment, as well as giving them the right to treat others a certain way. Essentially they feel they have the right to conduct themselves like complete bitches, often acting as if you are lucky to be in their presence, let alone speak to them. If you are so lucky and (in their mind) proven worthy, she may actually touch your dick. An even bigger problem exists as well, that being that females who really don’t carry the physical or intellectual credentials to even justify such attitude portray themselves as if they were 9s instead of the actual 6s they are. I call it the Six Nine Syndrome, or SNS.

Whose fault is this? I go with 50/50 blame here. If men are treating you like a 9 your whole life, you are going to believe it on some level. It starts with their fathers making them feel like a princess their entire lives, regardless of how they behave or carry themselves. Even more it is the fault of the blue pill beta males so thirsty for female attention they bestow upon these “exalted ones” endless, unwarranted accolades and handouts in the hope that one day she will just maybe, MAYBE allow you to text her or even bless you with her company. Now the women need to exercise some rational judgment here and should realize they really don't need to act this way, and in most cases simply do not warrant such attention. Dude just wants his dick wet… period…. get over it. There are 30 more chicks in this bar alone that can fill the task. You are not that special, Beyonce.

One Of A Million

Fast forward to the next day where she can meet a pack of fellow hungover friends at some coffee house, wearing the same makeup as the previous night, hair knotted in a ratty bun off-center atop of her head, un-showered and generally disheveled in sweat pants with "Love PINK" scrawled across the ass. They will cackle and brag to one another how Brad or Greg "like was soooo talking to me last night… oh my gawd." You see, someone let these morning grease faced jackals think they really are THAT special. I mean, reality is down deep they all are tremendously insecure and jealous of one another. We know that, and playing off that is vital. But outwardly right now among friends, they are acting as if we all were blessed to simply be in the same universe as their grimy, polluted from the previous night, gash. Come on ladies, give us a break… you are one OF a million, not one IN a million.

Wall of Decay

When I was younger, and had not yet taken the red pill of freedom, this really bothered me. But over time, I saw before my eyes this wonderful cycle of nature. I say the average female has a socially relevant and peak sexually desirable shelf life of 10 years, 18 to 28 give or take. Note I said average. Sure some girls are never desirable, or some may bust their ass in the gym and remain relevant far longer. But the average chick doesn't really take care of herself, drinks too much, tans to handbag like skin, doesn't work out, eats like shit and one day around 28 or so they hit that wall, and they hit it HARD. Some hit it sooner than others, some harder than others, but it will happen and when it does it is absolutely magnificent. No longer can they skate by on their drooping tits, sloppy ass, bad skin and turkey neck to get what they want. Suddenly that requires merit. Something many never had to earn because blue pillers and betas just handed everything to them.

Definition of Hypocrisy

Now, they turn their nose up to the girls who are 4 or 5 years younger for the exact same behaviors they too once exhibited, only now are incapable of because that new generation of younger, tighter and more desirable females is on the scene. Of course they notice the men gravitating towards the new improved 2014 models first. Survival mode kicks in, and the younger crop is immediately labeled “slutty” or “trashy.” In other words, attempt whatever it takes to downgrade the better stock. Ironic, because 2 or 3 years previous, before the inevitable collision with the Wall of Decay, they were wearing the same clothes, dancing the same slutty ballet and slamming down the same Jager Bombs before some guy inevitably desecrated them, handed them cab fare, or begrudgingly bought them a bagel, egg and cheese the next morning. Wow, look how special you once were. Now however it’s, “Ugh… can you believe how these girls are acting? They are like soooo trah-sheyyy.”

The Tables Have Turned

As a man this is where we can just sit back and bask in their downfall. We didn’t write these age old rules, but we undoubtedly benefit from them. Rules pretty much dictate a women only has as much desirability and power that her looks allow. When those fade, despite what they may think, power is lost as well. It may take her brain a couple extra years to process and accept this fact, but it remains.

Is anything sadder than a female past her prime that still acts like she has the power and allure of a 23 year old? But as men get older, if we simply take relative good care of ourselves and carry on suitably, we actually become more attractive, or at the very least maintain previous levels. Women like older guys… period. I am not even saying you have to be super fit or well off, just don’t be a fat ass, present yourself appropriately in the right scene and you can still do very well or even flourish with women far younger, and even more important, younger than the bitter old clan of entitled jackals that seem shocked find their value plummeting year by year. They have lost most of their power and now wish YOU would talk to THEM. They look on from afar while knocking back chicken nachos, sucking down mojitos, whispering among themselves about how awful the younger women you socialize with are, simultaneously judging us on how we could even want to talk to them to begin with. Sorry hun, not interested. It looks like it's you, Chunky Monkey, E Harmony and The Notebook again tonight.

Cackle Away

Some women who read this will invariably have the typical response one might expect when hitting them with hard truth. Something in the range of "he is gay", "he is just bitter because he doesn't get laid", "what a pig"… cackle… cackle… etc. Sadly, per usual this response is a false and failed retort to something they simply don't want to hear.

If there are two things that will anger and confuse women more than anything, it's when a man hits them with red pill truth and/or when he dares exhibit how he could do without their presence. After all, her whole life she has been told how special and essential to male happiness she is. How can you not feel that way? Simple, the RED pill. But don't get it completely twisted: this attitude can also lead to plenty of success as they find your aloofness mysteriously attractive. Too many men, trapped in blue pill purgatory, still can't grasp this. For them we can only offer this….

Are Carbohydrates Your Friend Or Foe?

December 19, 2013 | by Robert Conti | Link | Original Link

Carbohydrates—the much maligned macronutrient of the 21st century. Are they really as bad as everyone has been saying? Well, yes and no. Demonizing an entire macronutrient is much easier than explaining the proper types of carbohydrates to consume and at which times that consumption would be beneficial. I'm going to explain the ins and outs of carbohydrate consumption, so you may use this type of fuel in an efficient manner.

History and Science

Let's begin with some history. Up until about 12,000 years ago, the elevated carb consumption that exists today didn't happen. During the Neolithic Revolution we as a species began to transition from hunter gatherers to creating human settlements supported by agriculture. The protein in cultivated cereal grains allowed us to implement staple foods that kept societies fed, but unlike vegetables, and to a lesser degree fruits, grains are packed with a shitload of carbs. When a field worker woke up, they ate a ton of grains. They did this because they could go out and work all day without needing to replenish their fuel, aka food. Their bodies would choose to burn those carbs first, then tap into the fat, and eventually protein.

This worked in that paradigm, but it doesn't for most people in the paradigm of modern society. Today, it's not unusual for your average office worker to load up on cereal, hash browns, toast, pancakes, and sugary coffee drinks. The thing is, they don't need a lot of fuel to sit on their ass all day, yet they consume it anyway. As a result, all of the fat that was consumed with the extra carbs gets stored away as reserve fuel. This typically continues, and the fat reserves continue to pile up, until the rate of overweight people in America has reached 73%; with 36% being obese.

Let's talk a bit about the science of how carbs work. Our bodies need carbs. They are integral to our health. Your body will seek out the glucose from carb intake and refinement first to use for energy. Whatever carbs are not used for fuel will be converted to glycogen. When you have produced enough glycogen—about 2,000 calories or 500 grams—the rest will be converted to fat. There's the kicker right there. Not only is your body storing all of the fat you ate along with the carbs, it's converting the excess carbs into more reserve fat. As you can see, your body goes through a bit of a process to refine carbs. There is a cleaner, more efficient fuel for the body to burn, and it's fat, but that's another article.

Carbohydrates To Avoid

Some of you may disagree with me, but… grains are bullshit. Our bodies just run a lot better on other things. Fossil records indicate a massive increase in tooth decay around the time of the Neolithic Revolution, this is because grains contain high amounts of phytic acid. Phytic acid contributes to mineral deficiencies, which in turn contributes to host of other issues including, but not limited to, tooth decay, rickets, and osteoporosis. I'm sure we've all heard enough about gluten already, and I'm not even going to get into lectins; you can research the ills of those for yourself. Obviously our bodies can digest grains for energy, they are just not very efficient at doing so. In addition, each serving contains a large amount of carbs, and one serving is not that big; most people eat quite a few in one sitting. This wouldn't be so detrimental if the people eating all of these carbs were out doing manual labor or running around all day, but that is typically not the case.

It's time to discuss the white devil; sugar. Not only is it terrible for you, it's literally as addictive as cocaine. Sugar dulls the signal to your brain that you're full, allowing you to eat more. When you finally feel full, your body experiences massive insulin spikes—refined grains do this too—clearing the sugar from your bloodstream, leaving you hungry and craving more sugar. This roller coaster really screws up your insulin system after a while, messing with your pancreas, and leading to diabetes. 8% of the population has diabetes already, and if that's not bad enough, the percentage of people 65 and up who have it is 27%. As a bonus, un-burned sugar gets stored as fat around your organs too; awesome. If you really need to have something sweet and fruit won't suffice, go for a dab of raw honey.

Desirable Carbohydrates

What does that leave for carb intake? Fruits, vegetables, and nuts. Fruits contain moderate amounts of fiber and sugar. One serving of fruit contains around 20 grams of carbs, which is mainly sugar. Two caveats about fruit; try to keep it to one or two portions a day, and steer clear of fruit juice. Juice is stripped of the fiber of fruit in its natural state, allowing the sugar—usually in higher amounts—to rush into your system, making it practically like soda. Vegetables contain varying levels of carbs. Root vegetables generally contain more, but usually have a higher glycemic index number too; use them sparingly. You should eat leafy greens and cruciferous vegetables to get a significant amount of your carbs. You'll need to eat a lot of them, but that's OK, they are packed with nutrients. You should also receive a modest amount of your carbs from nuts, an ounce or so a day. I wouldn't have more than that because they contain phytic acid.

The Timing of Consumption

You also need to employ a bit of timing for your carb intake. If you decide to avoid grains and sugar, this should be fairly simple. However, there are root vegetables with high to moderate carbs such as carrots, beets, and potatoes; also non-root vegetables such as squash, peas, and corn, among others. Therefore, you need to have a sense about the macronutrients you're consuming together. If you were to eat a lot of fat, with a bunch of carbs simultaneously, your body would primarily burn the carbs. If you don't spend energy beyond the burning of the carbs, the fat stays with you, as does the excess carbs, as fat. That's why something like ice cream is terrible for you. If you feel the need to carb out, try to make it a low fat meal. In summation, high carbs and protein: OK. High fat and protein: OK. High carbs and fat: not OK. High carb items should only be consumed in the absence of fat, or with only a trivial amount of it. Also, don't eat a ton of carbs and then do nothing. It would behoove you not consume more than what you need for energy and glycogen storage.

Daily Carbohydrate Intake Ranges

0 – 50 grams

This range will bring on ketosis, this is when the body transitions to burning fatty acids instead of glucose. This range can be useful for short periods of time to accelerate fat loss, but too long and you will start to drag.

51 – 100 grams

Encourages weight loss, insulin production is low, and fat burning is increased. This range is good for slow, healthy cutting.

101 – 150 grams

The maintenance zone. This should be where you're at once you're active and your body looks the way you want it to.

151 – 300 grams

Slow weight gain happens here, along with the development of chronic health problems. The analogy here would be a lobster slowly boiling in a pot of water.

This level of intake is out of bounds and no good for your health, even if excessive cardio and training will prevent weight gain.

As you may be starting to figure out, there is no one size fits all prescription here. We are all different weights, we have different activity levels, and we have different fitness goals. For example; I lift heavy weights 3 times a week, I also do HIIT, plyometrics, and yoga once a week, and I'm looking to cut a little body fat. For my diet, I cycle in and out of different states to sustain muscle and hormone production while burning fat. I eat high fat/protein, and 50 grams of net carbs on Monday and Tuesday. I fast on Wednesday. Then I switch to high protein, low fat, and 75 grams of net carbs on Thursday and Friday. On the weekend, I stay low fat, go medium on the protein, and jack up my carb intake to 300 grams to restore my glycogen levels. This is what works for me. It helps me achieve what I want and incidentally satisfies a craving for carbs on the weekends.

What will work for you? That's up to you. There's enough information here for you to get a general idea of how the body interacts with carbohydrates. And, there are certainly enough clues for you to go out and do your own research if you want to take this seriously.

The Truth About The Sturgis Motorcycle Rally

December 19, 2013 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

No doubt you have seen, since you were a wee little babe, all the hubbub and kerfuffle about the “Sturgis motorcycle rally.”

Be it documentaries, rumor, or cameo showcases in the media “Sturgis” is embedded in the minds of all young men as a magical place of motorcycles, leather-clad women, booze, drugs, Aerosmith, and anything goes.

Sorry to let you down boys. It just ain’t so.

Maybe back in the 60’s it was a riot. Perhaps in the 70’s it was great. And I’m sure there’s some wild crazy parties going on during the rally today. But the truth is the Sturgis Rally has seen its days and it’s pretty much over. The reason is two fold.

One, whatever hot girls attended the convention have long gotten old and saggy. There is no new blood coming into the rally and (as an economist I’m serious when I say this) Harley Davidson has some serious legacy issues to consider. The average age of a Sturgis goer is about 52 and the only young people (hot chicks included) are usually brought in as staff. All those video you see on TV? Yeah, take your eyes off of the bartender from Raleigh trying to earn tuition for the year with the pronounced cleavage and look at all the people behind her. It’s usually an AARP sausage-fest in the background.

Two, posers. Fucking posers. Not to lay down too much motorcycle culture on you, there are two types of people. Those who ride and those who haul. Those who ride drive their bikes to the rally no matter where they're from. I've seen serious, hardcore bikers from Mexico come up, driving their hogs from south of the border. Then I've seen pansy-assed pussy bankers from Fort Collins, buy a brand new Harley, haul it in their brand new Ford Expedition trailer with Ma and "cutsie puke-inducing" matching helmets, ride their bike a whopping 200 miles over the weekend, only to haul it back to Denver in the same day. Not only are they old, fake, weak, and pathetic, they're dangerous on the road as they're poorly-skilled, aging baby boomer, motorcyclists trying to complete a bucket list indifferent as to whether they endanger veteran riders at the rally.

In short, Sturgis has become nothing more than the state fair. Fat, conventional, cliche, and common. You just need a bike and you're there.

However, this does not mean the town of Sturgis and the Black Hills area itself isn't worth it.

To this day I am shocked and surprised how few people know about the Black Hills, Badlands National Park, and Deadwood. But while most people write off South Dakota as another white bred, boring, hicksville state, the far west side of the state is by far the most beautiful country in the country. The peaks are not too tall that you have to worry about snow in July. The Badlands are one of the genuinely unique national parks that everybody must visit. The landscape is dotted with abandoned mining towns with a bar that nobody will ever find you at. And if you have any inkling of patriotism and love for the US, I don't know how you can leave this planet without visiting Mount Rushmore. But the key to avail yourself of this mandatory country is, above all else, to AVOID THE STURGIS RALLY.

The sad truth is that the Sturgis rally, which made the Black Hills what it is, denies it its best features. You don't want to go to Sturgis for the rally, you want to go there for the wide open west. You don't want to go there to be part of the crowd, you want to go there to be alone with your thoughts at some no name bar. You want to pilot your bike through the Spearfish Canyon and the Needles Highway unencumbered. You want to ride peacefully through the Badlands. And you can't do that when 750,000 motorcyclists are occupying a highway system that is normally designed to support a population of only 100,000.

So my advice to you, motorcycle enthusiast or not, is to visit Sturgis, but a solid two weeks before or after the rally. You really aren't missing anything, unless you have a serious hankering for flabby, wrinkly, baby boomer ass.

Promotion Of Female Bi-Curiosity Is Damaging To Straight Men

December 19, 2013 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

While staying in a friend's condo, he had a couple of 20-somethings visiting, old college friends. He was out with his girlfriend and I ended up alone with these two girls. It was only 7pm and they were deciding what to do. I had free guest passes for the club up the road. I knew the promoter. I told them point blank: "Tell you what, I'll take the pair of you out to the club, and we'll come home, get high and have a threesome." They giggled – game on.

It was one of those moments where I had nothing to lose. I wasn't that interested. At best they were a pair of sixes and one had some pretty lousy tattoos. They barely passed the boner test, but the two of them together were going to be interesting. Having made the suggestion, I proceeded to warm them up with some drinks and dancing, bringing them home for a little light substance abuse to seal the deal.

Of course every guy has the fantasy to have a threesome.

If one is good why not two. Better yet have them get it on with each other, let them warm themselves up. You're going to feel like king of the castle. Or are you? I've pulled this stunt a few times, having blatantly suggested it to test the water (you can always take it back as a joke), and my experience is the girls tend to stick around to see if you have the balls to lead them all the way up the garden path. It's fun but the matrix was glitching around me every time, especially when I actively encouraged them to go down on each other.

The media is swimming in full blown corporate marketing that outright suggests girls validate themselves sexually by getting with each other. The younger generation of women could be forgiven for thinking they need to try some girl-girl action lest they miss out on a valid life experience.

Years ago, the first girl-girl kiss on a prime time TV show was a scandal and the Madonna/Britney misadventure on stage raised a few eye brows. Now it is becoming positively mundane. Katy Perry kissing a girl was blasted into every car stereo 24/7. More recently Avril Lavigne the good girl divorcee pop rocker has a full girl-girl dialogue scene in her video, unoriginally titled Rock n Roll. Yawn.

So what is wrong with this open unchecked promotion of homosexuality?

Girls are sensuous creatures. As men we want to encourage them to embrace and unlock their sexuality, discover and enjoy their more 'dirty' side. Some might say it's more natural for a female to feel like getting it on with her girlfriend than it is for boys to engage in homosexuality.

In nature, females, cows for example, are seen to hump each other. A younger girl who feels too shy to get with a boy is worried about pregnancy or had a bad experience in a heterosexual relationship might open or re-open her sexuality in a softer girl-girl experience. After having an abortion from a clumsy boyfriend, an ex of mine had a year long relationship with another woman. She said it failed like any other and she decided to go back to men. Me first, hehehe. Her array of sex toys and costumes was fantastic.

I doubt there are many men who jump the fence back and forth. Even if girls aren't lusting for full lesbian action, girls appreciate each other's sexiness. They can be more touchy-feely without it seeming gross.

As men it turns us on immensely to see two girls all horny with each other.

One female playing sensuous is great, two turning each other on is perfect. According to the little head we think it gives us open season to jump in and ravage both of them at once. If they are so horny they need to pleasure each other, the little head says, "how much more likely will they be to welcome a man into the boudoir". The horny old men running media companies and TV stations, music video directors, producers and so forth are only too quick to take the easy route of girl girl titillation and pander to this fantasy, while at the same time feeding women the bi-curious or what might be better termed homosexual agenda.

Let's see it for what it really is. If two girls stay home to play with each other, that's two girls that aren't out and about socializing and thus creating more sausage fests in local venues. Even if they are out, they know they can go home to play with each other at a lower risk. That's two men that won't get laid tonight. You can see where this sexual frustration is going to end up. The feminist agenda is pushing us all to be human droids rather than sexually polarized males and females. How long is it going to be before it's okay for two 'straight' guys to go home and have a fiddle with each other.

Rather than opening the female sexuality, enabling women to be more liberated, this whole bi-curious female promotion is an advertisement for homosexuality in both sexes. The girl-girl promotion doesn't create the fantasy MMF or MFF threesomes. You know the old saying, two is company and three is a crowd. It's not hard to see who gets the cold shoulder when two girls are used to getting down and dirty with each other.

While my adventures usually turned out okay, there was always the vibe that the girls were more 'intimate' with each other than they were with me, which is generally the case in a non-sexual social setting also. Women group together, gang up on men, and start their own closed intimate circles even where they are not carpet munching. Yet again we find a large incongruence in the reality versus the fantasy. My encouraging them to get with each other (and me) didn't exactly have them on the phone next weekend for a repeat, but I wouldn't be surprised if they had a play on their own from time to time after I introduced them to the idea.

Girl-girl masculinizes females which in the long run feminizes males.

The girl girl bi-curious drive is the nuclear weapon in the feminists arsenal. It creates girls who have even less interest in healthy sexual relationships with men. It creates more entitlement, solidarity and intimacy between females, more betadom for men and less—not more—sex. Sure it turns me on getting two girls with each other and then joining them. It's a rush. I'm not trying to act all puritanical and condemn people straight to hell for horsing about, far from it. I'm simply suggesting that red pill men and women take a serious look at homosexual activity of any kind.

Huffington Post Is Leading The Way To Totalitarianism

December 20, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

The clampdown started

Last week the Huffington Post made it a requirement to have a verified Facebook to post comments. This change has effectively stopped me from posting on various news articles, essays and opinion pieces on the Huffington Post. I could theoretically get a verified Facebook account but the payoff of trolling ideologues is not greater than the effort of setting something up like that. This aggravation of setting up such a Facebook account will keep others from posting on the Huffington Post comment section as well.

If the end goal is to really close the walls of the echo chamber the Huffington Post has become, they will succeed. As an Internet business they should want as many page clicks as possible. Maybe not though; they could be going for the MSNBC niche market that favors direct propaganda. After talking to my colleagues and looking into what is actually posted for comments, it seems most people comment to fuel comment wars and chicanery aside from a few die hard true believers.

Free thought is a threat to some systems

This somewhat totalitarian method of control is indicative of the desperation of certain ideology. A system like the USSR could not succeed in the long-term with the existence of a large free state in competition with it. The same idea holds true for certain ideologies. If oppositional ideas, criticisms and trolls are weeded out the only thing left would be social preening between like-minded individuals. By switching to verified Facebook accounts, the actual commenter pool of the Huffington Post is going to be extremely small. This could be the intention because ivory tower people like to pretend opposition doesn't exist or have no valid points. I guess it makes them feel comfortable to only hear the things they already believe in while they talk with their friends while sniffing wine. I guess as long as the conversation doesn't rock the boat they don't care that their ladies are getting drilled by the gardener in the guesthouse.

Justification for trolling

One might wonder what the purpose of trolling the Internet is. There are many. My favorite is exposing the lunacy of certain people's ideology. Instead of disagreeing with their points, I merely agree and amplify their concepts to the absurd. Some people actually see what I'm doing but not many. You'd be surprised how many people favorite comments calling for the destruction of any political opposition to the prescribed ideology. Some of these same people favoring these cruel comments are surprisingly quick to label other people Nazis.

Tested methodologies

Another method of taking apart the ideological views of a group is to get one subgroup's prerogative in conflict with another subgroup within the same ideological coalition. This has been demonstrated here. What do you do if you come across a bunch of Hillary Clinton 2016 fans? Tell them we need to change the Constitution so President Barack Obama can run again. That tends to get them to turn on each other real quick. Remember if you trolling hard, always remember which way is up, and don't get stuck into limbo.

Historical examples

The Huffington Post article trolling which began in 2011 had ended last week. Allow me to show you some comments. I chose based on what caused the most rage and frustration, not wit or intellect. Here they are:

The "Blame Bush" knee jerk reactions were big in that one.

Whenever I questioned the prerogative that the people need to be told what they need, some people lose their minds.

The change to verified Facebook accounts as a requirement to comment also indicates the internet trolls are actually making an impact on the delivery of the narrative pushed by the Huffington Post. By taking such drastic step, they are worried about something. This something is not merely a civil concern because the tattle tales over there are quick to snitch by flagging. It seems as this move is a shrewd move to remove cerebral commenter who is not in the hivemind. For the most part anyone that has a brain and has any political mindedness whatsoever would never get a verified Facebook account. It is always best to leave deniability on the table case you might need it. Remember the ultimate excuse for things you might say on the Internet is "just trollin brah". Disclaimer: this method most likely will not work in criminal or civil court.

A Perfect Example Of The Americunt

December 20, 2013 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I see Grandma Beatrice every other Christmas. She attends with her husband when the celebration is hosted at my cousin's house, and on the years that my own family hosts, she goes to her other children's homes. Last year's Christmas set off some fireworks between myself, Grandma Beatrice, and Jayne—my 21 year old cousin.

"Aww, you don't have an official job yet? That sucks. Maybe you should try harder," Grandma B mocked, while reaching across the couch to grab my cheeks like I was a toddler. Her chubby, wrinkly arms stretched farther and faster than I had anticipated for a woman her age and weight, and before I knew it my cheeks were between her fingers being kneaded like a loaf of bread.

"I just graduated from college a week ago. I have a verbal offer to start in February but I haven't signed the paperwork yet," I gritted back. I took hold of Grandma B's wrist and removed her hand from my cheek.

I'd had enough of Grandma B's drunken comments and bullying, and removed myself from the situation. All night, she had been ragging on my sister and I. She has always been the one to promote "cousin rivalries" between the families, and she was on the side with the losing grandchildren. I had spent the majority of my Christmas Day being harassed by her for not "officially" having a job, for having an "easy" major (I studied economics, you be the judge) which allowed me to graduate school early, being literally poked by her repeatedly to get my attention like a child would do to a parent, and plenty of other little digs designed to get a reaction out of me.

My little sister had been belittled as well. She had just been accepted into a prestigious university that Grandma B's granddaughter had been denied at. Of course, Grandma B said the only reason she was accepted into the school was because she is half-Asian. Never mind her 4.2 GPA and excellent testing scores, she threw the race card in the mix to hamsterize her own granddaughter's denied admission. She could not admit to her granddaughter's stupidity and lack of work ethic, so she had to bring my little sister down. This made my father furious, and he attempted to argue with her that being Asian is actually now a detriment to admission at universities. Poor Dad never learned game though, and his logical, well-thought out arguments eventually were overpowered by Grandma B's drunken womanese yelling and ranting.

By the time Grandma B had finished turning my cheeks a brighter shade of red than Rudolph's nose, I had had enough of her bullshit.

I called her on it.

I looked her dead in the eye, and as silence from the other 15 people in the room enveloped around me very sternly said, "Do not touch me like that again." I stood up, grabbed my half-empty bottle of Blue Moon, and walked into the next room to shoot some pool. Five minutes later, as I'm lining up a difficult shot, in walks my cousin Jayne, screaming:

"HOW DARE YOU SPEAK LIKE THAT TO MY GRANDMA. YOU NEED TO SHOW HER SOME RESPECT AND COURTESY."

Slowly rising from my shooting position, I look her in the eye, smirk, and pause for a long three seconds before saying, "Really, Jayne?" The smirk sets her off into another rant of incoherent womanese between the tears streaming down her face. I look at her again, scoff, and turn back to the pool table. I have nothing more to say to someone who is going to act like a child.

Jayne stormed upstairs to her room, slamming the door amidst tears. Grandma B comes into the room and accuses me of upsetting her poor granddaughter. Of course, I was being pinned as the bad guy; the evil man who made the poor little girl cry. She's a 21-year-old woman, for fuck's sake. She should be capable of handling her own emotions. I told Grandma B that I did nothing wrong, and ignored both crazies for the remainder of the night.

Jayne is every bit the crazy American girl we all love here at ROK. She goes to the same university I attended and lives in the same city I do. However, her college experience has not been what mine was. Every roommate she has had has not enjoyed her company; none will live with her for more than a year, and the last three years there has been a fallout in which she won't speak to some (or all) of her roommates. She's suffered from a likely eating disorder. She was OCD to the extreme – washing her hands up to 10 times an hour to the point her skin turned into a dry raisin. Her acne was so bad from stress that she had to take an extreme form of medication to combat the acne, which involved bi-weekly blood tests and no alcohol whatsoever. She has never had a boyfriend and I'm fairly certain she's somehow made it through almost four years at a Southern California party school without getting laid.

The point I'm trying to make is, she hasn't had an easy life the last couple of years and I had always tried to be as sympathetic as I could towards her. She is family, after all. I would take her out to dinner and check up on her every couple of weeks. However, throughout all of this, no one in her own direct family has held her accountable. It's always somebody's fault, but never hers. There's always a way to rationalize the blame for her own shortcomings and issues by pushing them off to another external force. Everybody always was willing to allow her, and her family to do this.

I just never really cared, too bad Jayne made the mistake of pissing me off.

Nobody ever had the balls to call Grandma B or Jayne on their shit and stand up to them. I never had a reason to. Until my sister and I were flat-out insulted, egged on, and treated with no respect. I stood up for us. I had the balls to calmly put these two "grown" American "women", who are so used to walking all over men, in their place, by using almost no words whatsoever. How did they react? Like children throwing a temper tantrum because Santa Claus brought them the wrong doll for Christmas.

Their tantrums continue to this day, as Jayne is refusing to participate in any Christmas gatherings in which I will be present at this year. She has, in her own words, "no respect" for me, because of this situation and because I didn't help with the dishes at Christmas last year. I'm the only one in the family who is willing to stand up and make waves, but she's so irrational she won't listen to me. Everybody else in the family simply goes along with it, refusing to ruffle her feathers because they fear it will send her back in a downward spiral of girl craziness. What the rest of the family fails to realize is that by allowing her to skip out on the festivities, they're simply promoting her behavior. They're telling her it's okay to act irrational, throw tantrums, and be a child, because she's being rewarded for it.

Her attitude is the perfect example of what women are continuing to become in this country. Nothing but spoiled, unapologetic children who are never held accountable.

I'm thinking for Christmas, I'll mail Jayne a bag of cat food.

She might as well start stock piling for the future.

Have a safe and wonderful holiday, to all you readers. Thank you for all of your support.

Why You Should Start Smoking

December 21, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

The G Manifesto has said it for years: smoking is near the top of the list of what a man can do to improve his game. We may have been taught from birth that smokers are disgusting, disease ridden, and of a lower class, but what else in our collective conscious sparks such a visceral association with coolness like smoking does?

As the G Manifesto has been prone to point out, the most interesting international playboys, athletes, actors and all around interesting men of history have been smokers. It doesn't matter if a man dresses sharp as a razor, or is skillfully disheveled, nothing non-verbal will ever tell a woman as much about a man as smoking will. If a woman sees a well dressed man standing contrapposto, smoke billowing from his nostrils, smirking while looking her way, she has no choice but to be attracted and assume he is a mysterious and cool bad boy.

Aside from looking cool there are many upsides to smoking casually.

The Secret World of Smokers

A lit cigarette is the password in to one of the most seemingly exclusive, yet overwhelmingly large social circles in the world. With the prevalence of anti-smoking laws and overwhelming amount of public shaming, smokers have no choice but to stick together. In most cities smoking indoors is illegal. This means girls who smoke are forced onto the streets to get their nicotine fix. All you need to do is walk down any street with a bar and use the greatest opener of all time.

From the first spark of her lighter you've put yourself in one of the best positions possible. Smoking with a girl gives the two of you valuable, instantaneous, rapport; the likes of which can hardly be achieved so quickly through other avenues. Along with this. the social stigmas surrounding smoking means that more often than not a girl has already isolated herself from her cockblocking friends, preventing further headaches.

If She Smokes She Pokes

It is a known fact that girls who smoke are 69% more likely to be thin, slutty, and suck mean dick. The risk-taking and rebellious nature of puffing squares means she will be down for casual sex with you, the mysterious stranger. From personal experience the most insecure, yet social, women smoke. Use this to your advantage.

There is no simpler way to simultaneously isolate, qualify, and polarize a beautiful woman than asking her to go outside for a smoke. This one is a no brainer.

Positive Habituation

I smoke infrequently. Others smoke a pack a day. To each their own, but what I have noticed is that associating smoking with going out at night and socializing has me going out much more frequently than if I weren't to go out smoking. When your first approach coincides with your first nicotine buzz you're bound to associate the two and be more active in game. I've set rules for myself and from these rules I have maximized the benefits of smoking while minimizing the negatives. Personally I only smoke when my intention is to get laid. If I smoke that night I'll either bum cigarettes off of hot girls or bring a few of my own in a simple cigarette case. Limiting yourself to a couple of drinks and a couple of darts seems to be the sweet spot for both decreasing inhibitions and getting a good buzz without getting drunk. If you rigidly abide by your personal rules you will form a socially beneficial habit rather than a gnawing dependancy.

I firmly believe opportunistic smoking is the best way to give a man that added bonus when it comes to socializing and women. I do not refute the health effects of smoking, but the mentality of abstaining from things like smoking is the same mentality which rationalizes working 40 hours a week until the age of 65 as a life well lived.

All being said smoking by itself will not make a man, but it will perfectly complement stylish dress, fitness, living by ones own code, and being flush with cash.

Life Lessons From Niccolò Machiavelli

December 21, 2013 | by Robert Conti | Link | Original Link

[image]

The Prince, written by Niccolò Machiavelli, is a classic. And rightfully so, because even though it was written 500 years ago, it remains the bible of realpolitik. It was originally given to Lorenzo de Medici as a gift to help Lorenzo unite Italy, but more so to help Machiavelli get a job with him. Lorenzo never hired him, and he never united Italy. In the time since, The Prince has been studied by many and used a practical guide to gaining and maintaining power. The lessons here extend beyond politics and can be used in many applications in our modern lives.

Forging a new path is not simple.

> It should be borne in mind that there is nothing more difficult to handle, more doubtful of success, and more dangerous to carry through than initiating changes in a state's constitution. The innovator makes enemies of those who prospered under the old order, and only lukewarm support is forthcoming from those who would prosper under the new.

Following in the path of great men is simple.

> …it is enough merely not to neglect the institutions founded by one's ancestors and then to adapt policy to events.

Act as if.

> …a prudent man must always follow in the footsteps of great men and imitate those who have been outstanding. If his own prowess fails to compare with theirs, at least it has an air of greatness to it.

Be smart, but be tough too.

> …one must be a fox in order to recognize traps, and a lion to frighten off wolves.

People need to respect you to take you seriously.

> …you cannot have good laws without good arms, and where there are good arms, good laws inevitably follow.

You will be better at things that you want to do, and enjoy to do.

> …where the willingness is great, the difficulties cannot be great.

Be impressive.

> Nothing brings a prince more prestige than great campaigns and striking > demonstrations of his personal abilities.

> […]
> Above all, in all his doings a prince must endeavor to win the reputation of being a great man of outstanding ability.

You can get away with a lot if you are well liked.

> …determine to avoid anything which will make him hated and despised. So long as he does so, he will have done what he should and he will run no risk whatsoever if he is reproached for the other vices I mentioned.
> He will be despised if he has a reputation for being fickle, frivolous, effeminate, cowardly, irresolute; a prince should avoid this like the plague and strive to demonstrate in his actions grandeur, courage, sobriety, strength.
> The prince who succeeds in having himself thus regarded is highly esteemed; and against a man who is highly esteemed conspiracy is difficult, and open attack is difficult.

Conceal your true self.

> …a prince must regulate his conduct.
> …be so prudent that he knows how to escape the evil reputation attached to those vices.

Choose your friends wisely.

> The first opinion that is formed of a ruler’s intelligence is based on the quality of the men he has around him. When they are competent and loyal he can always be considered wise, because he has been able to recognize their competence and to keep them loyal. But when they are otherwise, the prince is always open to adverse criticism; because his first mistake has been in the choice of his ministers.

Be capable of doing bad things.

> … a man who wants to act virtuously in every way necessarily comes to grief among so many who are not virtuous.
> … if a prince wants to maintain his rule he must be prepared not to be virtuous.
> […]
> … some of the things that appear to be virtues will, if he practices them, ruin > him, and some of the things that appear to be vices will bring him security and prosperity.

Be duplicitous.

> …men are wretched creatures who would not keep their word to you, you need not keep your word to them. And no prince ever lacked good excuses to color his bad faith.
> …one must know how to color one's actions and to be a great liar and deceiver. Men are so simple, and so much creatures of circumstance, that the deceiver will always find someone ready to be deceived.
> …princes who have achieved great things have been those to give their word lightly, who have known how to trick men with their cunning, and who, in the end, have overcome those abiding by honest principles.

It is better to be feared than loved.

> Men worry less about doing an injury to one who makes himself loved than to one who makes himself feared. For love is secured by a bond of gratitude which men, wretched creatures that they are, break when it is to their advantage to do so; but fear is strengthened by a dread of punishment which is always effective.

Have perspective.

> …to comprehend fully the nature of the people, one must be a prince, and to comprehend fully the nature of the princes' one must be an ordinary citizen.

Ask for advice from honest, wise people.

> A prince must, therefore, never lack advice. But he must take it when he wants to, not when others want him to; indeed, he must discourage everyone from tendering advice about anything unless it is asked for. All the same, he should be a constant questioner, and he must listen patiently to the truth regarding what he has inquired about.

Be decisive.

> …there is no avoiding war; it can only be postponed to the advantage of others.

As you can see from the chosen quotes, Machiavelli has a very realistic view on politics and life. There are many nuggets of wisdom in The Prince. You may want to study it if you want to go out into the world and get your hands dirty.

How Feminist Linda Tirado Lied Her Way To $60,000 In Donations And A Book Deal

December 22, 2013 | by Diomedes | Link | Original Link

In late October of this year, a Gawker commenter using the alias "KillerMartinis" posted a short essay entitled "Why I Make Terrible Decisions, Or, Poverty Thoughts". The title and article were written to suggest that the author had not only personally experienced the hardships described in the piece, but that impoverished conditions were essentially unsolvable…

> I make a lot of poor financial decisions. None of them matter, in the long term. I will never not be poor, so what does it matter if I don't pay a thing and a half this week instead of just one thing?

The article rapidly went viral and was reprinted at The Huffington Post. Many readers responded sympathetically and offers of help flooded in, since "KillerMartinis" portrayed herself as a Sisyphean victim of fate, constantly striving to manage the burden of raising small children while juggling two jobs and college courses. She eventually revealed herself as Linda Walther Tirado and set up a web page for donations, netting approximately $60,000. There are now talks of a book deal, so that she can "educate" Americans on what it's like to be part of the Working Poor.

Unfortunately for her gullible donors and literary agent, Ms. Tirado is a fraud. She is in fact a middle-class child of privilege who has squandered numerous opportunities while trashing the parents that have bailed her out. America is a place where the poor can better themselves through wits and hard work; similarly, the well-to-do can lower themselves through stupidity and sloth. Ms. Tirado richly deserves a life of poverty, but she has avoided this fate mostly because her parents and in-laws understandably don't want their grandchildren to live in filth and squalor.

Don't believe this "poor" woman

I immediately doubted the veracity of the original article based on Ms. Tirado's pseudonym (poor people generally don't drink martinis—they drink beer and cheap liquor) and the fact that the article is written in the "Valley Girl" argot affected by spoiled middle and upper-class feminists.

It took a minimal amount of researching her Gawker comment history for me to verify my suspicion. See below for the damning evidence, which include excerpts from her original viral essay, her comment history, her follow-up article in the Huffington Post, and her donation page.

She lies about her motives

Her Gawker piece states this:

> There's no way to structure this coherently. They are random observations that might help explain the mental processes. But often, I think that we look at the academic problems of poverty and have no idea of the why. We know the what and the how, and we can see systemic problems, but it's rare to have a poor person actually explain it on their own behalf. So this is me doing that, sort of.

But in the past she wrote this:

> I write things about poverty occasionally because I have a responsibility to. I feel a certain moral push to write about this thing that is alien to so many people, because I have the words to describe it. I know many people with much more interesting stories than mine, much more heart-wrenching and outrage-inducing, much more beautiful, much less messy. But the people living them did not go to the best schools and did not worry about their SAT scores and don't know the word prose. They can't tell their stories in a way that makes sense to the media system we're working out. And so I wonder: maybe the thing I should be doing is translating their stories into something that uses the right words.

She lies about her work schedule

Her Gawker piece states this:

> Rest is a luxury for the rich. I get up at 6AM, go to school (I have a full courseload, but I only have to go to two in-person classes) then work, then I get the kids, then I pick up my husband, then I have half an hour to change and go to Job 2. I get home from that at around 1230AM, then I have the rest of my classes > and work to tend to. I'm in bed by 3. This isn't every day, I have two days off a week from each of my obligations.

But in the past she wrote this:

> "I work Thurs-Sun nights. Free Mon-Wed."

She's ungrateful about being bailed out by her parents

Her Gawker piece states this:

> When I was pregnant the first time, I was living in a weekly motel for some time. I had a minifridge with no freezer and a microwave. I was on WIC.

But in the past she wrote this:

> When my parents came to be there for the birth and they saw what we were dealing with they moved us to Utah and gave us a trailer to live in. And then when we had our second and final daughter they helped us find a house to live in and now we have some space for once.

She lies about her living conditions

Her Gawker piece states this:

> We have learned not to try too hard to be middle-class. It never works out well and always makes you feel worse for having tried and failed yet again.
> Junk food is a pleasure that we are allowed to have; why would we give that up? We have very few of them.

But in the past she wrote this:

> I am turning my kids' room into a forest, because I own this house and I can. I've found some awesome tutorials on making tree stump and mushroom stools, but I'd be interested in any pictures or ideas that you guys have. I want them to want to play in their own spaces and leave my china cabinet alone.
> Yeah, I just sort of decided that they should have awesome stuff. I don't want them spoiled, so I don't want more toys, but I would like them to wake up thinking that life is really cool.

She lies about workplace discrimination, exposes herself as pushy and ungrateful

Her Gawker piece states this:

> I would make a super legal secretary, but I've been turned down more than once > because I “don’t fit the image of the firm,” which is a nice way of saying “gtfo, pov.”

But in the past she wrote this:

> You guys, I started my swanky job. It was fantastic except for the following: nobody seems to be sure exactly why I was hired, outside of one specific task that will take maybe 1/20 of my contracted hours. I got the feeling that they hoped I’d be able to branch them out into more outreach, but they’re really uncomfortable with moving into more overtly political strategies and I felt some pushback on anything resembling confrontation.

She pisses away an insurance check and turns her hair into rat’s nest

Her Gawker piece states this:

> I am not beautiful. I have missing teeth and skin that looks like it will when you live on b12 and coffee and nicotine and no sleep. Beauty is a thing you get when you can afford it…

But in the past she wrote this:

> I was hit by a drunk driver, fucked up my teeth, and took the insurance check before I realized that they would not be covering dental, thankyouverymuch.
> I am the queen of conditioning. I bleach/re-dye every month or so, so I keep four separate kinds of oil around. That way I can’t ever run out of them all at once.

She lies about her material possessions

Her Gawker piece states this:

> “Free” only exists for rich people.

But in the past she wrote this:

> Work issued me a phone, tablet, and laptop…
> I had a phone screen malfunction and accidentally hit submit. I can’t even post an awesome gif because it’s a new phone and I haven’t figured out pasting.

She exposes herself as a total hypocrite, flunks out of college her first go-around, yet considers herself a literary genius

Her Gawker piece states this:

> It’s great that there’s a bowl of condoms at my school, but most poor people will never set foot on a college campus. We don’t belong there.

But in the past she wrote this:

> I’m on my first semester back since my late teens, when I earned myself a > whopping .48 GPA by not going to class. Ever. So I'm on super-probation and the theory is that they don't want us to overwhelm ourselves.

> So, I get that we can't close higher education to the masses and all, but does everyone struggle this hard with the stupid when they go back to school? I can't believe how light the coursework is, or how much bitching commences every day after class.

She tricks the Sisterhood into paying her bar tab

Her Gawker piece states this:

> I am not asking for sympathy.

Then a commenter named Greenheart wrote:

> She [KillerMartinis] just mentioned that they're gonna shut off her electricity in 6 hours. If those of us who can afford it all chipped in like $5 each, we could easily fix that problem with no more pain to ourselves than not getting any fancy coffee today. Who's down?
> ETA: KillerMartinis has elected to have me pay the bill for her, so anyone who is interested in helping out can email me and I'll send you my PayPal username. Thank you so much for all your help, everyone!"

In the end, fools and their money are soon parted.

Family members shouldn't hold their breaths waiting for this spendthrift to pay her debts now that she has received a windfall.

I am not the first to poke holes in this woman's testimony. Many of the doubters are fixating on whether her teeth are as bad as she claims. This is actually one of the few things Tirado is honest about (she posted a video showing the stomach-turning evidence). However, she received an insurance settlement and probably blew through the money instead of spending it on treatment.

The reason Tirado's post went viral is not because it was well-written or based in reality, but because it provided "proof" for the bedrock belief of modern liberals that the poor are unable to wipe their own asses without help from a government program. I hope the soft-hearted people who gave money to this swindler (her take is $60,000) have learned their lesson.

How Women Killed Facebook

December 22, 2013 | by Thomas Andersson | Link | Original Link

A sad fact of all decent nightclubs is that one day you will step inside and discover that the thin, sexy and classy women you once danced with have been swept away by a sea of brash, over-the hill hags in ill-fitting clothing. One can't help but notice that this very same phenomena has come to afflict social networking behemoth/spy-tool Facebook.

Not so long ago, Facebook was a breath of fresh air. The clientele a marked contrast to the plebian inhabitants of Myspace. Instead of crazed, over-the-hill females posting endless streams of curiously-angled selfies and thinly-veiled threats of removing people from their prestigious positions on her 'Top 8', Facebook cultivated a user-base of young, smart and dare I say, sexy people.

You may not have noticed it, but over the past two years attractive women have been gradually disappearing from your Facebook friends list. Unless the portly section of the female population has secretly begun eating their skinny superiors, it's reasonable to assume that the hot chicks are leaving Facebook of their own volition.

In short, the nightclub phenomena has hit Facebook. The babes have fled and it's important, from an anthropological as well as business perspective, to examine why this has occurred;

1. Allowing Entry to Unattractive Women

Any good bouncer knows that despite the protestations of the equality-Gestapo, face-control is alive and well and if you want to keep the modest pay and limitless stream of intoxicated sluts available to a club doorman – you simply must keep the uglies and the chubbies out.

Unfortunately, Facebook failed to learn what a bouncer with an IQ of 70 knows instinctively—humans don't really want to be around undesirable women.

Full of wide-eyed, Silicon-Valley egalitarianism, the site went from being a place for elite university students to communicate to an attempt to 'connect the entire world'. The reality is that people only want to be connected to those they appreciate or desire. No rational man desires additional modes of communication with an ugly girl.

2. The Tide Of Thirsty, Thirsty Men

You know a nightclub is dead when the biggest loser you know tells you it's good. Until around 2011, Facebook was quite useful for talking to and bedding girls you would have otherwise lost touch with. Annoyingly, guys on Facebook told their loser friends about this, who then told their fedora-wearing friends on World of Warcaft forums.

The result is that Facebook went from being a direct line of communication to the girls in your social circle, to hundreds of millions desperately writing their wish-lists to a sexual Santa Claus. Any girl who is a 7 or above receives an amount of unsolicited messages that would shame even the most over-zealous African 419 scammer.

3. Allowing Women To Post Without Restriction

Women talk a lot, often about not a lot. That much is a given. But in real life, we can leave the room, pretend to be asleep or find a quieter girl with a smaller waist.

On Facebook, this isn't the case. You wake up, load up your Facebook and bam, you are hit last night's 50 attention-seeking posts from 'Kaylee'. These will be largely variations on the theme of "I FEEL LOST :(" and graphics emblazoned with over-used Marilyn Monroe quotes.

In order to be tolerable in conversation, women require some form of limitation or censorship. Facebook is quite the opposite of that, offering a direct view into the mind of the average woman and it's not pretty. In fact, it's barely readable.

The current Facebook experience is akin to getting stuck talking to the 26-year-old girl in the club who thinks another Jager-bomb will postpone her imminent collision with the wall. Tedious, to say the least.

4. Over-Accessibility of User Data

Lately an app named 'Lulu' has been attracting a lot of attention in the media, for it offers girls the chance to 'get their own back' by posting reviews of the men attached to the penises which have entered their vagina recently.

I didn't pay much attention to the hype, until a girl I made acquaintance with a couple of years ago messaged me out of the blue. "Ray, have you seen your Lulu profile?". Curious, I began to research and found that 3 Lulu users had rated me. 2 of the reviews being positive and the third making me sound like the bastard love-child of Hitler and 90s-era Mike Tyson.

Imagine every chick you hooked up with in a club being able to broadcast their opinions to every female in your life. Lulu brings this nightmarish scenario to Facebook. Were a male equivalent out there, it wouldn't last long. Cheryl Sandberg would doubtless deem it too rapey and promptly block its data access rights, but Lulu is good because… equality.

Conclusion

The decline of Facebook comes from a fundamental misunderstanding of the social and sexual impulses that drive humans. While connectivity between all humans sounds lovely on paper, the truth is that people operate largely in a hierarchical and aspirational manner.

Nightclub owners know this, they aim to create restricted environments containing attractive desirable women, as this is what motivates men to visit. However, I'm not so sure that those at the top of Facebook are aware of this. Their service now resembles that club where fat chicks burst into tears on the dancefloor upon hearing a George Michael song.

In short, if you are a man who likes interacting with young, desirable women – Facebook is no longer for you. The hot chicks don't frequent this club no more. You can stay and talk with 5s, but I'm off to that hot new spot where you can send girls self-deleting pictures of your junk….

3 Reasons Not To Become A Lawyer Right Now

December 23, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The possibility of becoming a lawyer first began to appeal to me as a kid. I had some older relatives who'd entered the field (becoming judges, professors, and government ministers) and their example inspired me. I looked up to them and wanted to be like them. If you'd asked me 5 years ago where I saw myself in a future career, law would most certainly have been my firm answer.

That was then, this is now. As I've grown older and a bit wiser, I've come to see the pitfalls associated with the career I had once unquestionably chosen. I originally planned to be in law school as we speak. As of now, I've delayed the beginning of that process for a while as I work and see where the industry heads. I may ultimately decide not to bother at all.

My decision to delay was not made lightly, but I feel it was made correctly and should be considered by other young men with a potential legal career on their minds. Here are three reasons why one should be hesitant to become a lawyer right now.

1. There are too many lawyers

Society does need lawyers. It is, however, entirely possible to have too many of them. What does that look like? We're finding out right now:

> Barely half of all 2012 law school graduates had full time, long-term legal jobs as of Feb. 15, according to employment outcome data released Friday by the ABA's Section of Legal Education and Admissions to the Bar.

Only a slight majority of law school graduates in 2012 managed to secure full time legal jobs, and you can bet that only a fraction of those managed to secure full time legal jobs that paid relatively well. Put quite frankly, there are more graduates coming out of law schools than the market can take. We have dozens upon dozens of accredited law schools who each pump out hundreds of graduates annually, but can't for the life of them produce a sizable number who can pass the bar and hold down a full time legal job. This reality is being corrected to some degree as law school enrollments drop, but even now the fact remains that there are just too damn many law students (and law schools, for that matter).

This sobering reality becomes particularly relevant when you consider the second item on my list…

2. Law school is expensive

Let's say you were an aspiring law student in the year 1982. You've got great numbers and managed to gain admission to the University of Pennsylvania School of Law, a highly ranked Ivy League institution. Let's say you pay the sticker price (no scholarships or financial aid) for Penn during your 3 years there.

Your sticker price (tuition, board, fees, etc) for the full 3 years would likely amount to about $40,000 (give or take a couple thousand) by the time you left in 1984. That's $89,000 of debt in 2013 after adjusting for inflation.

Now, let's fast forward to 2010 and look at another individual with a dream of becoming a lawyer. This modern aspiring law student also wants to go to UPenn Law. He will also be getting no scholarships or financial aid. What will his bill come up to at the end of his 3 year stint in Philadelphia?

> 2010:
> Law, the J.D. program:
> Tuition: $45,430
> General Fee: $2,152
> Technology Fee: $780
> Average room rate in the University's residence halls: $7,248
> Average meal plan: $4,182
> 2011:
> Law, the J.D. program:

> Tuition: $47,600
> General Fee: $2,318
> Technology Fee: $800
> Average room rate in the University's residence halls: $7,592
> Average meal plan: $4,286
> 2012:
> Law, the J.D. program:
> Tuition: $49,900
> General Fee: $2,408
> Technology Fee: $830
> Average room rate in the University's residence halls: $7,952
> Average meal plan: $4,416

Total (give or take a couple thousand): $186,000

He'll leave law school with a bill more than twice the size of his early 80's counterpart. He'll have twice the debt burden to contend with and (as my next point will make clear) he'll enter a market in a condition that isn't too conducive to helping him eliminate that debt quickly.

3. The impact of the financial crisis persists

During the boom times in the early/mid 2000's, legal hiring was in a very different place. "Biglaw" (high paying major firm job) placement rates at even less prestigious, non "Top-14", regional schools often approached 25% or more. Big firms had expanded the size of their associate pool significantly during that time period and it looked like such expansion might continue.

Recent evidence has shown us that it won't. The legal industry is in a transition now, and the "new normal" is not going to be a pretty picture:

> Last week, the National Associate for Law Placement announced that large law firms of more than 500 lawyers hired 3,600 new associates in 2012 — more than in 2011 but still far below the 5,100 new hires in 2009. Some students at top-20 law schools aren't getting big-firm jobs that were once automatic for most of their predecessors. The overall market is even more dismal. In 2012, law schools graduated a record number of new lawyers — more than 46,000. About half of them got long-term, full-time jobs requiring a legal degree.

Is BigLaw going to go extinct? Probably not, but your chances of getting to it as a typical law student have declined significantly within the last few years. Bonuses at top firms have declined in that time as salaries have remained flat, meaning that even if you do manage to squeak into one of the remaining BigLaw jobs (and survive the brutal hours associated with them), you won't be compensated as well for doing so. That sucks, because chances are you'll be carrying a large debt monkey on your back in the process.

These new realities challenge old motivations for attending law school, motivations based on an old vision of the legal profession and its ability to provide a certain status to those who chose to enter it:

> For generations, the law functioned as a kind of psychological safety net for the ambitious and upwardly mobile. If you wanted to be a writer or an actor or a businessman, you could rest assured that law school would be there if your plans fell through. However much you'd maxed out your credit card, however late you were on your rent, you were never more than an admissions test and six semesters away from upper-middle-class respectability.

The above is no longer a given thanks to the changes I mentioned above. If you've read this and still think you may have a legal career in your future, make sure you comprehend these changes fully. They're not temporary.

The Anguish Of The Manosphere

December 23, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

There is a lot of anguish in the manosphere. Anguish over the masculinization of women, anguish over the general unsuitability of American women as long term dating or marriage prospects, and anguish over the crisis of manhood today. And over many other things. With good reason, too. It is eminently justified. Discussing and venting about these topics is a way we have of working out our problems, of coming to grips with the predicament that the contemporary westernized man finds himself in. Those who attempt to deny these issues, or to avoid them, are simply unwilling to confront the darkness that haunts the modern societal landscape.

When I read Law Dogger's Why America Causes Men To Be Unnatural last week, it touched a nerve. I was reminded of Roosh's Why Can't I Leave A Smiley Face?, which I reviewed here. It struck a chord with me because it matched my experiences so precisely, and reopened old wounds that I have been trying to suture for many years. Those who have lived abroad for extended periods of time will be able to relate to the sentiments expressed in these writings I've just mentioned.

When I returned to the US after an extended period of living overseas in the 1990s, I went through a major depression. The full impact of the situation I was in gradually emerged. The corrosive influence of American culture on female behavior here was the one problem I just could not solve. It was totally beyond my control. For someone who was used to being action-oriented, it was a crippling realization. I felt alienated and betrayed. And no one could understand.

But suffering can have redemptive power if one knows how to channel the pain. After continuing to travel and study, I began to see things in a different light. I made efforts to construct my life around my travels and studies, and felt I had made some progress is coming to terms with the problem. Slowly, I began to feel a new worldview take shape. If I could not change the environment, maybe I could change myself.

The premise of Law Dogger's article is that the perversity of American culture encourages women to adopt unfeminine behavior, thereby making men behave in unnatural ways. And this is entirely correct. His anguish at having to deal with this mirrors my own anguish at the same realization. But maybe there is a way to come to terms with the issue. While we cannot solve it, perhaps we can find a way to suture our own festering wounds, to salve our own burns, to alleviate the sting of this painful knowledge with the blessings of consolation and guidance. Great men of the past have been through similar trials at certain periods of history characterized by social upheaval and realignment.

It is not good to say that women (or some environment) "make" you behave unnaturally. No one can "make" you do anything. Thinking in this way empowers the other person, and makes you feel helpless. And you are not helpless: no one can do anything to you that you do not permit them to do. Your masculinity is not conditioned on the approval of American women. Your happiness and peace of mind is not dependent on their behavior. When you see a woman behaving in an arrogant, masculine manner, think instead of this teaching anecdote by the Roman fabulist Phaedrus (IV.15):

> By the grace of Jupiter, the she-goats were able to obtain beards, like the male goats. At this, the he-goats were full of indignation, afraid that the females would rival them in prestige and dignity. "Suffer them," said the God, "and let them enjoy their empty honors and badges of your rank. It is meaningless as long as they do not equal you in masculine virtue."

Let women have their little "goats' beards." Let them play their little games, and strut around with their false airs of authority. As long as they do not equal you in masculine virtue, it is an empty charade. You rise about them, you walk through them; they do not affect you. As long as we remain centered in our masculine core, the unnatural behavior of women (or anyone else) should not be our concern.

Our purpose is to seek a philosophy of life, a way of thinking, that will enable us to be lit by an inner light. A light that will guide us in this hostile modern environment. A philosophy that will enable us to draw sustenance and strength from ourselves, rather than seek the approval of others. Nothing less than the deepest spiritual revelation will enable us to deal with the problems that are facing us as men today.

We travelers have spent a great deal of energy and effort to travel abroad. We travel here, and we travel there. And it is right that we should do so. "Seek knowledge," (says a tradition of the Prophet) "even though it may be in China." But what about the inner journey, the journey of the Soul? This is a profounder type of travel, one that will enable us to advance to ever-higher levels of consciousness, until we begin to approach true illumination. These are the journeys of the great mystics and poets of the past. The way of the mystic provides some guidance. Let us consider a few of them.

The mystic poet Farid ad-Din Attar (c. 1145-1220) in his great work Discourse of the Birds, believed that a sincere seeker could undertake a spiritual journey through six "valleys" or levels: Searching, Love, Knowledge, Detachment (from personal desires), Union (where he sees that all things are one), and Astonishment (losing sense of individual existence). Eventually, with persistence, he might be able to achieve the ultimate stage, Annihilation (of the self in the Divine). By going through these stages, Attar held, a seeker could become a "Perfect Man" (al insan al kamil) who had the power of direct communion with the Divine. No soul is fully happy, says the pantheistic Attar, until it loses itself in this World Soul which emanates from the Divine. The only real religion was the search for such a union. Although Attar was severely attacked for his heretical ideas, he confounded his critics by living a long and happy life.

Happier still was Saadi of Shiraz (c. 1184-1283), perhaps Persia's most beloved poet. For nearly thirty years he traveled all over the Near East and North Africa, experiencing all degrees of deprivation and poverty. He once complained that his shoes were in tatters, until he met a man without feet, and then "thanked Providence for the bounty." He fought in the Crusades, was captured by the Franks, released on ransom, and fell into a new kind of slavery after marrying the daughter of his ransomer. Eventually ridding himself of this servitude, he retired at age fifty to a small house in Shiraz, where he wrote poetry extolling the virtues of a simple life, animated by the sensual pleasures of physical love. He never lost hope, never abandoned himself to despair, and willed himself to live nearly a hundred years by his healthy philosophy and outlook on life.

The Sufi mystics were always careful to teach that the things of this world were illusory and fickle. To pursue them too rashly was to subject ourselves to inner torment and turbulence. Ibn Arabi (c. 1165-1240) brought this idea to its fullest and most elaborate expression in his many esoteric volumes of prose and poetry. As a mystic writer, he is unsurpassed in fecundity and abstruseness; one could spend two lifetimes studying his doctrines. What the great mystics all had in common was: a wide experience of travel, constant writing, a belief in their own inner light, spiritual exercises to achieve a level of enlightenment, a sense of humor, and a healthy enjoyment of worldly pleasure tempered with a knowledge that all such things were fleeting. We would do well to learn from them.

While we can never change the people around us, we can try to change ourselves. Instead of looking outside, we need to look inside. The answer to our anguish lies in this: seek the inner light that is within you, that part of the Divine Essence each of us carries. We each contain a cosmos within ourselves, if only we can tap into it. Travel, read widely, mix with people, write, and reflect. Stop frantically running here and there, seeking in vain the approval of others. It is a futile hope. No one can "make you act unnaturally." You are the Perfect Man, the living image of the Divine Principle.

The poetry of Al-Mutamid (c. 1040-1095), Emir of Seville, is perhaps the last word on the folly of chasing the phantoms of the world. No translation in English can convey the beauty and sublimity of his speech. He led a life of combat, fighting at times both Christians and Moslems in Spain, yet never stopped writing verses. Eventually captured, he was brought in chains to Tangier where he lived until his death. And yet he never gave up. One of his last poems expresses unforgettably in a few lines what only long experience and true wisdom can ever hope to know:

> Do not woo the world too rashly, for behold,
> Beneath the painted silk and broidering,
> It is a faithless and inconstant thing.
> Listen to me, Mutamid, growing old.
> And we—that dreamed youth's blade would never rust,
> Who wished wells from the mirage, roses from the sand—
> Shall understand the riddle of the world,
> And put on wisdom with the robe of dust.[1]

A Typical Empowered Woman's Conversation In Any City USA

December 24, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

I posted up at the bar and ordered a whiskey while I waited for my Tinder date to arrive. To my left, I overheard the bartender (girl) and two of the restaurant workers (men) talking to each other. They were all in their late 20s, and were having a good laugh over the "dating" foibles of the bartender.

She was an attractive enough girl, though cracks in the armor were beginning to show. I saw a beautiful face and an ample chest, but her low-cut black shirt betrayed a slight pooch from a few too many late nights of drinking and her twice-a-day Starbucks soy latte habit. She wore a bit too much makeup despite the laid-back vibe of the place, likely to hide some of the premautre crows' feet beginning to set in from her party lifestyle. That said, she was a pretty girl who had just passed the peak of her SMV, and I'm sure had no shortage of thirsty guys ready to date and girlfriend her up.

On this particular night, our specimen was regaling her buddies with tales of her dating life, both sordid and otherwise. I eavesdropped on her story, which was chock full of Red Pill wisdom assuming the proper translating capabilities:

> "Oh, I've been on some dates recently. I've been [fucking] this guy, but I go on dates with other people for sure. My sister called me a serial dater. She said it's healthy for me."

Takeaway: All girls are out there dating, and most date more than one man at a time. They have sex with guys they don't consider to be relationship partners, but are willing to test the water and waste the time of other suitors for attention and material goods. They are encouraged to slut it up by their friends and family members.

> "I only like to be having sex with one guy at a time, though. I just can't do more than one. It messes up my head and I don't think it's fair."

Takeaway: Some girls will limit themselves to only one sexual relationship at once (or so they say — hey, that guy at the Vegas pool party doesn't count!), but she acted as if it was a badge of honor, the exception to the norm. Western women have adopted masculinized dating traits and are likely to maintain a harem of their own, both for sex and for attention. You should expect western girls to be having sex with multiple partners during any given period. If a girl finds a higher-value guy who excites her enough that she jumps into bed with him, she will monkeybranch immediately.

> "The last guy I went on a couple dates with I kinda liked. He was a nice guy. It was a different type than I usually see. He said his longest relationship was 2 and a half years. I told him mine was 4 months. He looked disappointed."

Takeaway: Alpha fucks and beta bucks. Why would these girls settle into a boring relationship when they can get attention from unlimited "exciting" men? Give the date chump some credit for having at least a flicker of perspicacity—his lizard brain was alerting him that the girl's promiscuity has likely destroyed her ability to from attachments and makes her a bad bet for long-term investment. Clearly, though, his training to accept "empowered strong women" will pressure him into investing his time, money, and attention, despite the obvious fact that numerous other guys have beat it up for free.

> "Recently I had a guy push me up against the wall and not let me go. If you do something awesome like that, I'm going to start by saying no, no matter what. Sometimes they'll keep kissing me and doing it, and I kind of like it. I'll be like, 'shit' and give in."

Takeaway: The man was assuredly a Return of Kings reader. Women not only like rough sex, but these days they are willing to talk about it openly with their friends. They also admit that they provide token resistance, but are able to doublethink that if the guy just "takes it from her" that it's hot and empowering and "awesome." Either that, or he's raping her. Depending, of course, on her mood afterwards and how desirable the man is.

This level of knowledge and insight into female socio-sexual behavior used to be the purview of the "secret society." Now, Fifty Shades of Grey has sold 100 million copies and girls talk openly about being dominated, and the average man STILL won't listen to advice about women coming straight from the horse's mouth. The next time you're tempted to look at a new girl as a special snowflake, don't. Especially if she's American.

“Rape Culture” Was Manufactured To Wage An Unjust War Against Men

December 24, 2013 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

It’s been a fun and rape-filled season here at Return Of Kings. Before you read this post, check out the prequels:

- The Truth About False Rape Accusations
- False Rape Accusations Force Men To Be Nice Guys

And see also:

- How To Avoid A False Rape Accusation

Today, we’re going to finish it off with a bang. We’re going to dive into an analysis of the political nature of the 21st-century ‘rape culture’ movement. We’re going to dissect some feminists (using the beluga whale-grade flensing knife) and examine some of the beliefs rattling around in their heads, underneath those softball helmets and Justin Bieber haircuts. Consider this your first and only Trigger Warning that there will be pictures of feminists below. I apologize in advance to Return of Kings readers with sensitive stomachs.

1. Rape and Power

We've all heard the feminist sound bite: Rape isn't about sex, it's about power.

Ironically, this is probably true from the perspective of feminists, most of whom are the sort of women who have absolutely no reason to fear male sexual desire. Andrea Dworkin (pictured above) claims to have been raped at one point in her life. I can only assume that it was a simple case of mistaken identity; that her rapist was clad in cowboy boots and ten-gallon hat; and that he was indeed motivated by power, domination, and a desire to show the world what a "big man" he was, by mounting her for eight seconds. I'm guessing he never intended to hurt anyone, but that doesn't make the experience any less traumatic for Ms. Dworkin.

Putting Dworkin aside – likely with the help of some pulleys and an industrial-grade forklift – the vast majority of rape is not about power, or patriarchy, or whatever gender studies twaddle you may have heard. Feminist theory on this subject, to no one's great surprise, turns out to be completely ridiculous.

Rape is an evolved reproductive strategy present in a wide variety of animals, including humans. This does not make rape good, any more than noticing the ubiquity of murder, theft and tribal warfare in human evolutionary history leads us to approve of murder, theft, or war. Man is an imperfect creature, and prone to evil in the absence of restraints on his worst impulses.

But while feminists incorrectly believe that rape is about power, their claim shines a light on their motives. Feminists who claim that rape is about power are projecting, because they want to use rape for their own political ends. They seek to empower themselves and their ideological allies, by creating a new mythology around rape, which they call 'Rape Culture.'

2. The Feminist Agenda

The best way to understand human behaviour is to live by this rule: Don't listen to what people say, watch what they do.

If we listen to what feminists say about rape, their motives are virtuous. Rape is a horrible crime; they want to reduce and eventually eliminate it; they want to protect women from rapists.

But let's watch what they do:

- Feminists viciously attacked the unsuspecting columnist Emily Yoffe for offering the obvious advice that women who get really drunk are more likely to be victims of sexual assault.

- Feminists attack anyone who suggests that women avoid walking by themselves late at night, or in revealing clothing. In response to a mayor who suggested women take these reasonable precautions, they organized an international protest to reassure women that it's a great idea to stumble home past Albion and Finch at three AM in a miniskirt.
- Feminists have made it verboten to suggest that women ever take any precautions to protect themselves from rape and sexual assault. The sane and practical advice that grandmothers have passed down for centuries about not drinking too much, not going out alone in dangerous places, and not going anywhere alone with men you've just met, is now considered horribly sexist. In Rape Culture mythology, it is 'Victim Blaming.'

The typical ROK reader is bright enough to immediately see through this crap, but here's a useful analogy anyway:

If you leave your new Ferrari on a bad street, unlocked with the keys in the ignition, is it your fault when your car gets stolen? Of course not. The thief is still a thief, and he still belongs in jail. I'm sure we all agree that it would be nice to live in a world where unlocked cars are perfectly safe on every block. But until we do, intelligent car owners will take steps to protect their property.

There is simply no point in arguing against feminists, who believe that teaching women to avoid high-risk behaviour is sexist and misogynistic. Feminists (male and female) are either cynically aware that their arguments are ridiculous, or they are middling intellects, barely capable of regurgitating sound bites from their second-year sociology textbook.

If feminists actually cared about preventing rape, they would be singing the praises of columnist Emily Yoffe and other "slut-shamers," not to mention rallying around the cause of European immigration restriction. Somehow I don't see either of those political alliances taking hold.

So what are the true motives of the feminist advocates of Rape Culture mythology? Let's consider a few of their actions:

- Feminists want to define all sex as rape. They want to re-define drunk sex as rape. They want to re-define a 'soft yes' as a 'no.' They want as much sex as possible to occur under conditions wherein a woman is free to wake up the morning after, and decide that what took place the previous evening was rape.
- Feminists want to protect women from the consequences of false rape accusations. They want rape accusers to remain anonymous, while the accused has his reputation publicly destroyed before any trial has taken place. Feminists claim that a lack of criminal charges for false accusers is necessary, because they would 'scare off' women who are considering making real accusations. But this argument ignores the fact that there are three potential outcomes to every rape accusation: 1) Conclusive proof that a rape occurred; 2) Conclusive proof that the accusation was false, and 3) No conclusive evidence one way or the other. A real accusation would lead to either the first or third outcome, and so a woman who was actually raped should have nothing to fear.

- Feminists want to lower the burden of proof necessary for rape convictions, attacking anyone who would suggest that the word of an unstable, insane, and historically criminal prostitute is not sufficient proof to convict several men of rape. Rape shield laws prevent accused men from challenging the character of their accusers, even though in many cases, the word of the accuser is the sole piece of evidence against the accused.

Consider these actions together, and the goal of the Feminist campaign to enshrine Rape Culture into our mythology is obvious:

Feminists want to maximize the number of men who get charged with rape

Feminists don't care about actual rape victims. But they do hate men enough that they want to use rape as a political weapon against them, even if it means encouraging high-risk behaviour among college-aged girls. In their eyes, one girl's unpleasant night is worth it, to see a dastardly patriarch spend a decade in prison.

Rape Culture Feminists are also completely unconcerned with whether they are punishing actual rapists, or innocent men. In their eyes, it's to-may-toe, to-mah-toe. They don't actually hate rape and rapists. They hate men and masculinity, and rape laws are a useful weapon with which to attack them. Ironically, rape culture feminists have created a world in which they are correct. Rape is now about power – the power to imprison an innocent man on a whim or a hurt feeling. As a bonus, our murky rape laws have created an effective way for progressives to make trouble for thought criminals.

I also speculate – as the psychoanalytical icing on the cake of the rape culture hysteria – that sexually undesirable feminists are motivated by hindbrain fury at the very idea of male sexual desire, of which rape is one particularly barbaric manifestation. Feminists hate the rapist skulking in the dark alley, because they suspect that he would allow them to pass by unscathed.

3. The Effect on The Sexual Marketplace

False Rape Accusations are a real threat and I recommend every man learn How To Avoid False Rape Accusations.

But they aren't that common. The average man has a very small risk of being falsely accused. A man who takes the basic precautions in the link above has little to worry about. The true effect of the feminist rape culture mythos is the impact it has on normal interactions between men and women. Rape Culture hysteria drives a wedge between the sexes, reducing trust and intimacy, and accelerating our society's decline into atomized, adversarial cynicism.

Rape Culture hysteria poisons the already strained relationship between 21st century men and women. In a world of spam-approaching pick-up artists, gold-diggers, easy divorce, fuck-buddies, bottle service fruit flies, and bitter friendzoned nice guys – basically, in a world where the sexes are squaring off at knifepoint, rather than coming together to raise families and build a future for our civilization – Rape Culture is just one more attempt by feminists to prevent normal men and women from finding love and happiness.

This goal – the destruction of trust and cohesion in western civilization – is the ultimate goal of Feminism, an ideological cats paw for the broader Progressive movement. Once again, consider the actions of the Feminist movement over the past half-century:

- Feminists advocated for a generous social welfare system, which often penalized married mothers, creating financial incentives that led to the breakdown of the American family.
- Feminists advocated for easy divorce laws, generous alimony, and a culture that venerated single mothers, leading to divorce rates that hover around 50%.
- Feminists advocate for promiscuity and late marriage, creating a decline in birth rates and a generation of never-married men and women too accustomed to the hook-up scene to be capable of real intimacy.
- Feminists created sexual harassment laws which forbade workplace flirting, sending women into nightclubs and into the arms of the charming rogues of the sort who read ROK.

And now, feminists have invented rape culture. The result is a poisonous climate of fear and mistrust between the sexes. Read this post by Kid Strangelove, and consider how his (perfectly rational) fear of a false rape accusation is leading him to become a more closed-off, less trusting human being.

Men know that any hook-up with an amoral and unstable girl could lead to life-ending consequences, no matter how well we actually behave. On the surface, false rape accusations force men to be nice guys. But it is a false veneer of niceness, and beneath it bubbles resentment and mistrust. I find it difficult to picture Kid Strangelove ever truly falling in love, with his entirely reasonable hesitance to ever let his guard down.

4. Conclusion

A gentleman should never complain without offering solutions. Here are mine:

- The present governments of the USA and her satellites do not have the courage, competence, or willingness to resist the Gramscian march of the Radical Feminists through our institutions. But sanity may yet return. When it does, I suspect the historical precedent of Roman, Christian, and Babylonian law will seem very reasonable: A false accuser is given the same penalty as the accused might have received.
- Women and men under the influence of alcohol should be held to the same standards of behaviour as everyone else. If you rob a bank, sell your car, or consent to sex while you are conscious and coherent, you must live with the consequences. If you are not responsible enough to trust yourself after a few drinks, don't get drunk or use drugs.

- If a person doesn't want to have sex, they must say "No" firmly and clearly. Men cannot be expected to know if a girl is feeling uncomfortable, or if her tone of voice suggests that her "Yes" isn't really a Yes. Can you imagine how terrifying the idea of consent must be for men on the autism spectrum, who have trouble reading facial expressions, tonality, and other non-verbal cues? Adult women are not children, and it is fair to expect them to clearly communicate if they want something to stop.
- If a friend, family member, or public figure is accused of rape, don't immediately jump to the conclusion that the accusation is well-founded. Make a judgement based on the evidence, and the characters of both accuser and accused.

On a personal level, it is essential that all young western men read How To Avoid A False Rape Accusation.

Thanks to publications like ROK, the world is waking up to the damage done by the feminist movement and our corrupt governing class. One day, all that is wrong will be put right. But until that day comes: Be smart, be cautious, don't date feminists, and cover your ass.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. Should Eating Pussy Be The Most Important Thing You Do In Bed?

Recently I came across a book I bought over 7 years ago in my dumber years that, thankfully, I never actually read until now because I may have actually listened to it. I had some free time so I thought why the hell not, let me read this book now and see what it's about.

Well, it's about how to not only eat pussy, but why it should be the most important part of your sexual life. Seriously. The book is called She Comes First and is written by Ian Kerner who describes himself as follows:

> Just the sight of a woman's naked body could make me lose control, and foreplay quickly led to end of play.
> I was a sexual cripple, and oral sex became my crutch. If I couldn't satisfy a woman with my penis, then I'd sure as hell satisfy her with my mouth!

Now you can see the mindset of the author and what caused him to write this book. Before I go further I will say I am not opposed to some tonguing if the girl is hygienic and not suffering from roast beef. This guy, however, takes it to another level…he suggests up to 45 minutes of the seafood buffet:

> …a cunninglingus session should last anywhere from fifteen to forty-five minutes on average, not including foreplay.

At one point he even advocates pairing pussy with wine:

> Enjoy and savor her unique cassolette – now there's an idea worth raising a glass to and toasting!
> "…the acidity of the vagina in health is just about that of a glass of red wine…" Cheers.

Before you run down to the local wine mart to pick up that Malbec, you need to remember… you have to be safe when chowing down on some clam. Mr. Kerner suggests > dental dams…latex gloves, or finger cots

What the fuck is a finger cot you ask? I had the same question. Google it and shed a tear for anyone that actually listened to this advice.

I know what you are thinking. Law Dogger, what if she is coming so hard and in such volumes where the rivers of love must be soaked up prior to continuing? Don't worry, She Comes First makes sure you are prepared:

> When enjoying an entr'acte, keep a small towel handy and use your free hand to give your face a quick wipe-down. You might also want to pat down her inner thighs and lightly dab her vulva.

People Listen To This

So let's review. You show up with latex gloves, a towel, and a glass of wine to eat out your girl for 45 minutes. Good luck. For the ROK readers, we may realize that such suggestions are borderline absurd. However, the Amazon reviews on this book make it seem like people are taking this as gospel, and it is currently a "#1 Best Seller" in the human sexuality category. Perhaps some of the techniques are effective—as he goes into great detail on how to do everything—but the philosophy he preaches, where muff diving rules above all, is ridiculous.

The One Thing I Learned

There was one helpful piece of advice in there. Apparently, if your girl's vagina all of a sudden starts smelling a bit foul, it means she's banging someone else raw. Bacterial vaginosis is caused by the vagina coming in contact with new sperm. Good to know, I guess.

Nonetheless, if you read the book maybe use it to pick up a technique or two. But please do not listen to its philosophy of "outercourse" over intercourse. One thing you will never hear is a girl say "damn he tongued the shit out of me last night!"

A Year Of Outrage

December 25, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

My 2013 was reasonably productive. My first post of the year extolled the virtues of lifting weights, retelling the story of how a few minor gym results had made a noticeable impact on my dating life. Later that month, I talked about how All Girls Like Rough Sex, a truism that I discovered in a very unexpected way and have since repeatedly confirmed. I closed out the month breaking down the 7 most common traits of one of the most cowardly, pestilent characters a masculine man can encounter—the Male-Feminist White Knight.

Later, I told the story of how meeting a foreign girl—who had some respectable girl-game—laid bare just how terrible American women are at securing a man nowadays. I followed that with an essay on the 15 Magical Years of Womanhood where I broke down the story arc of today's typical girl. My favorite piece, Meeting Melissa, contrasts what it would be like to meet the same girl 20 years apart.

I floated a few alternative items, including a two-volume Dictionary of American Girlspeak and my thoughts on the mighty 1-to-10 scale. I also advised men to avoid helping their "friends" with no game, warned them that All Girls Are Cheapskates, and alerted them to the dangers of working for a female boss.

Things started to pick up when I submitted a piece called 24 Signs She's a Slut, where I detailed some iron tells for promiscuous girls. It remained quiet at first, but the article soon blew up on Twitter and various places around the Internet. Vice Magazine wrote about it, ThoughtCatalog syndicated it, and UCLA's feminist magazine even drew up a nice graphic for the occasion. I eventually published a sequel—which, in my opinion, is better than the original—that expanded on the original abridged list.

Soon after 24 Signs, ROK celebrated #fatshamingweek, a fat-bashing bonanza that ballooned on the Internet and was even covered on the local news. My contribution, 10 Tell-Tale Signs She's A Secret Internet Fatty, gave men some concrete advice on avoiding the landmine field that is online dating.

The capstone of the year was the massive viral event around my 5 Reasons to Date a Girl with an Eating Disorder piece. Apart from garnering over 168,000 likes on Facebook, being tweeted 4,000 times, and crashing the robust ROK server multiple times, the post inspired hundreds of Internet responses. A few responded in Youtube videos.

Others threatened me with graphic death and mutilation in tweets and emails. And, no fewer than three petitions were circulated to "take it down." National Eating Disorder organizations "spoke out" against it. I was told by several people that they'd overheard random girls talking about it in their daily business.

Several major publications—including the DailyMail, the Huffington Post, Cosmopolitan, and Yahoo Shine—covered the event, some of them multiple times. I was interviewed by BuzzFeed at length about the post. Girls Gone Wild wrote the most articulate response to it. And, for a brief moment, typing the first few characters of "5 reasons" into Google would direct you straight to the article.

When the (damaged) ladies at Jezebel finally caved and broke their gag order on ROK–succumbing to their pent-up female appetites–they squirted out a diatribe on #FatShamingWeek, 24 Signs, and 5 Reasons. It didn't take long for me to notice that a not-insignificant number of the outrage was coming from unambiguously attractive girls, 16 of which I recognized in my follow-up piece.

It also wasn't lost on me that the spirited reaction to my Eating Disorder article underscored a few facts that some of us take for granted. I wrote about it in the statement I was asked to provide by the author of the most prominent Huffington Post piece, a Dominique Mosbergen. She, needless to say, didn't publish a word of it:

> I've learned several lessons from the massive public response to my article. I didn't write it as a publicity stunt, to drive traffic, or to elicit a reaction (i.e., "troll")—as many people have speculated. I also didn't do it as a social experiment, though it's inadvertently become exactly that. Among the many > conclusions I can't help but draw is that middle-class white women are the most protected and privileged group in our society. We've known this, to an extent, when we're told things like American white women are the principle beneficiaries of affirmative action, or when we see rifts in the women's movement open along racial lines. This minor event underscored this fact on another level. While I'm repeatedly told that eating disorders are afflictions that strike women of all races and social classes, the overwhelming majority of responses—and the most prominent and spirited ones—have come from precisely that demographic.

> Not only do middle-class white women enjoy the luxury of having something so innocuous as a 600-word Internet post written by some stranger be "the worst thing that's happened to them," they have national organizations, major publications like your own, and droves of obsequious male supporters climbing over each other to come to their defense. What these women don't realize is that the discomfort that they're experiencing— of having their plight and challenges "trivialized" or "dismissed"—is how other demographics feel every day. But, in this case, these women and their supporters feel perfectly justified and, more importantly, enfranchised to lash out in violent (and probably illegal) threats of death and mutilation against me and my colleagues who are merely, and inadvertently, pointing out this uncomfortable truth. Most other demographics, unfortunately, don't have a national support network ready to come to their aid when someone so much as writes something that hurts their feelings, but they have every ability to simply ignore.

Writing for ROK in 2013 has been a wildly interesting and exciting experience. Here's to another year of the same.

The McQueen Manifesto

December 26, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

As often happens in life, situations arise and crisis hits without warning, but whether in good times or bad, it is best to have some Life 'Rules', or guidelines, to have in place. Navigating the experience of life without a 'compass' is a recipe for disaster. Having a game plan will help your journey be smoother. Throughout my life, I have experienced many situations, both good and bad, as I'm sure you have as well, and the following 'rules' have become rock solid truths that have helped me immensely. I believe they will help you as well.

13. Trust Your Gut

That feeling you get in the pit of your stomach is there for a reason. Instinct is a part of our biology in order to save us from bad situations and to help us make right decisions. Every time I ignored my gut, I lived to regret it. Whether it was dealing with a girl and my red flag gut alert would sound off and I chose to rationalize it away, or doing business, or anything at all, whenever I chose to silence it and proceed anyway never turned out good. Learn to trust your instinct and follow it.

12. Always Sit With Your Back To The Wall

Whenever I select a table in a restaurant or am sitting in a public place, I choose a seat that gives me the best vantage point of the entrance. Why is this? Two reasons:

1. My date now has to face me and has little to no distractions for me to deal with. If my back is to the wall and she is facing me, her view is of me and a wall. I just reduced the distractions and increased my interesting levels to her. Subtle but effective.

2. A smart man is aware of his surroundings at all times. Whether when pulling up to a stoplight, or sitting in a restaurant, knowing who is coming and going best prepares you for both good and bad situations. If a gun-toting maniac runs into the restaurant, guess who is going to be best prepared to deal with it? The guy sitting by the entrance with his back to the door, or the guy in the corner booth who can duck out of sight or bounce out the rear exit?

From a figurative standpoint, always know the angles when going into business dealings or social situations. It's impossible to always see everything, but knowing who and what you're dealing with can make the difference. Who does this guy know that I know? How does this benefit my company to work with this other company? How does it benefit them? Who is really getting the upper hand here? Analyze, draw up a game plan and proceed with confidence.

11. Worrywait

Dealing with stress is a part of life. Learn to deal with it. Stress can literally kill you if you allow it to, so getting a handle on it now will not only increase your life span, but elevate your quality of life. Worrywait is a term that I utilize to combat stress. The simple breakdown is not to worry about something until you have actual reason to.

For example, let's say John Doe has a stable job that he is good at. Regardless that his job is secure, he chooses to worry about losing it daily. He already takes wise steps of saving a large part of his income, lives within his means and has managed to pay off his debt. In fact, he even has almost an entire year's worth of salary in savings in case he should lose his job. So why does John Doe choose to worry everyday about a factor that may never happen? Chalk it up to personality type, anxiety issues, or perhaps him making the CHOICE to worry. Learn to worrywait: don't worry until you have REASON to worry.

The irony of life is that generally what you worry about doesn't happen, it winds up being something you haven't even thought about that becomes an issue. Worrying will paralyze your productivity, be a detriment to your health and is an unmanly trait to posses. Be smart, look ahead in life and plan, but choose not to be a worry wart.

10. Always Have Your Legal Plan In Place

Many people will wait until disaster has struck and THEN make a plan. I can guarantee you that at some point in your life, something will happen, whether brought on by your actions or being at the wrong place at the wrong time. It is inevitable. With this knowledge, it is prudent and wise to have your Emergency Team set up. This means that you have a lawyer that you can call on a moment's notice, a list of connections, or essentially a list of powerful people who you know through developing personal relationships with, who can make a call for you, as well as your Bail Buddy (a trusted friend or relative who is responsible for bailing you out). Your Bail Buddy will either have access to funds that you placed with them, or has the means themselves to bail you out and an agreement for you to re-pay them. Having a powerful friend, whether that is a Senator or the judge in your small town will move mountains when and if push comes to shove. Never underestimate the importance of these friends. You may need to call in a favor one day. Be prepared.

9. Believe What People Do, Not What They Say

Women lie. Men lie. People lie. Whether to protect you from the truth or to protect themselves, mankind will generally err on the side of falsehoods in order to make sure everything runs smoothly. Learn to believe people's actions and not what they say. This doesn't mean you go around never believing a word out of people's mouths, but for matters of importance, including but not exclusionary, in business and relationships, it best to assume that there are multiple angles to examine. To put it simply, if someone may have a higher motivation to lie and they are not following a moral code, then odds are they are lying. On the flip side. actions will tell you much more about a person than hours of talking. Examine people's intent, and watch closely to see if their actions match their words.

8. No One Cares More About You Than Yourself

This is not a cynical statement, this is a fact. At the end of the day, everyone must fend for themselves and be responsible for their actions and progress in life. Your parents may love you and your best friend may have your back, however, what you do in your life and what you accomplish is up to you and you alone. First off, unless a person in your life is a natural life cheerleader, then no one is going to DAILY motivate you to become great. That is up to you entirely. You can surround yourself with positive upbeat people and that will help you, but regardless, people are busy with their own lives, problems, dreams and goals. Be a man, take responsibility for your actions and know there is one person that you can ALWAYS depend on and that's YOU.

7. Learn To Set Goals

Show me a successful person and I will show you a person who knows the value in making goals. If you do not know where you want to go, then how would you get there? Learn to start making small goals and larger goals, you will notice a difference and your confidence and sense of self-worth will sky-rocket when you start achieving them. Goals have always been an integral part of my life and are definitely responsible for any success I may have had. Make a goal, plan and execute.

6. Pick Your Battles Wisely

You know what the mark of a real man is? Knowing when to walk away or admit that you were wrong. No matter how tough you think you are, no matter how many push ups you can do, no matter how much money you have in the bank, there is always someone smarter, stronger and richer than you out there. Knowing this, it's best to admit when you're in over your head and to retreat. I mean this in the literal and figurative sense.

There have been a time or two when I realized if I didn't back down, I was going to
