physically get the beat down of my life, if not killed. In those particular situations, I realized that ‘playing possum’ was smarter than mouthing off and I lived to tell about it. In business, I have had opportunities where I could have lost everything if I had gone through with them, so I decided to turn them down or to eject myself from the dealings with minimum financial damage. In the name of self-preservation it is okay to back down, apologize and walk away. It may just save your life.

5. Good Things Come To Those Who Bust Their Ass

The tired expression of ‘Good things come to those who wait’, had to have been written by a fool, because people continually believe that good things will happen to them based on them going through the motions of life and idly waiting on their golden rainbow. This is false. Everything that most people attain is because they bust their ass to achieve it and I know from personal experience that nothing good every comes from waiting. Get out there and make things happen. Waiting will only cause you to be stagnant and stagnation if a recipe for death.

4. You Really Are The Average Of Five Of Your Friends

When your mother told you ‘birds of a feather flock together’, she was right. Look around, what do you see? What do your friends do, how do they make money? Do they have goals? Do they workout? Are they hell-bent on getting ahead in life, or are they content with becoming attached to their couch and living vicariously through their sports heroes? How do you compare to them? Be honest with yourself and make adjustments if needed. This doesn’t mean that you have to cut them off entirely, but you can limit your exposure to them and choose to find friends who are on track to do great things in life.

3. Risk Falling On Your Face

Learn to take risks in life. Without risk comes little reward. Show me a person who never takes risks and I will show you a boring individual who has had little pleasurable experiences in life. With the sweet comes the sour and with risk comes the Life Trips, falling down and possibly looking like an idiot. However, that’s what life is about, is taking calculated risks. Don’t take stupid risks for the sake of taking risks, instead make calculated risks assessments and proceed from there. Life without risks is uneventful. Learn to live a little.

2. Focus On Achieving Greatness, Not Mediocrity

Define what you becoming great is. Is it you living in paradise with a suffice monthly income and no job? Is it you becoming a famous musician? Define it and pursue it. Don’t live a life where you look back with regret because you didn’t really pursue the life you wanted. You only get one life, make the most of it, dream big, work hard and achieve greatness.

1. Love Yourself

No one will love you like you. Learn to forgive yourself, appreciate yourself and value what you have to offer the world. In order for others to respect you, you need to respect yourself. Understand that every one of you reading this has value, talents and greatness and that by loving yourself, you will greater enhance these qualities.

Will Your Daughter Be A Buyer Or A Renter?

December 26, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Nicole has been saving all her life for this moment. She was denied an allowance growing up; instead she spent summers working as a camp counselor and weekend afternoons tutoring bratty kids. Now she has enough to buy a car. She's not sure she'll have a chance like this again to make the right choice.

She starts to research cars exhaustively. At first, it's the pricey and shiny cars that catch her attention. An Audi TT perhaps, or a Mercedes SLK. But reality intrudes as she learns more about cars, and she realizes that those cars won't give her the stability she ultimately wants. She lacks the credit to lease a car, and she's always envisioned herself owning a car anyway.

She doesn't want to waste decades' worth of savings just to become carless once more. The glitzy cars steadily lose their luster, as it becomes clear what a liability they are, and how quickly they depreciate. No, she realizes, she needs a car that can remain reliable for decades. She starts to pore over the Toyota Carollas, and the Honda Civics, cars she had initially reject out of hand. Their reputation for reliability and low maintenance costs slowly win her over. Their low initial cost, plus their low ongoing maintenance requirements, virtually ensure she'll always be able to afford running them.

Sure, those Japanese econo-boxes may look a little hum-drum. But she won't go broke keeping one around. Nor will she get stuck on the side of a freeway one night, feeling alone and abandoned. She spends many hours deciding on choosing a car, thinking logically and calmly about which one will suit her needs for decades to come.

Finally, she chooses one. It doesn't make any of her friends jealous. Her rivals have a quiet laugh at her. But that's okay, because she's content to just have a car all to herself, to enjoy for a long time. And while all cars lose value over time, to her it's just the opposite; with each passing year her attachment to it grows.

Enter Nikki

Nikki – a name well suited for this free spirit. Growing up, her father always gave her what she asked – she was his princess after all. Daddy showed her that working to get what you want is just something losers do, because they don't have a Daddy that loves them.

As her sweet sixteen approached, she knew she HAD to have a car. Among her circle of friends, she'd be a nobody without one. And it would be even worse if she came to school in something as hideous as a Toyota. Even a Lexus would be questionable. It had to be European. Nikki didn't want to have to come early to school every morning, just to hide the modest car she drove.

To show what a unique individual she was, she had to get a car that none of her friends had. Porsche Cayenne, Mercedes GLK – all old hat. It wasn't long until she settled on one – the Range Rover. She had vaguely heard of them being unreliable, but she found that with enough begging and pleading, Daddy agreed to sign the lease for her.

Years pass, and Nikki keeps leasing new cars. As she gets on in years, Daddy starts to get fed up with her dependence on him. Not to mention, his retirement accounts aren't getting any bigger, while Mommy can't help renovating a kitchen she never uses. Daddy gives less and less money to Nikki for her new car leases. One day, after Nikki complains that "all the good cars are taken" by people spending more, Daddy decides he's had enough, and cuts Nikki off completely.

Nikki despairs. She can’t afford a new car lease, or even insurance payments on a car. Without the crutch of her shiny trappings, her friends aren’t too fond of keeping her around either. She shudders, but eventually concedes: she must buy a bus pass.

She starts to take the bus every day. She comes to befriend Jules, a retarded homeless black man, who is enamored of his own incontinence while aboard the bus. But even Jules isn’t enough to tide her over – the despair of a lush life lost is too much for Nikki. Depression takes hold as she sees no end to her life on public transit – she has only her siamese cats and pints of Rocky Road to console her now.

Harvard University Jumps The Shark

December 27, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

On December 16, 2013 there was a threat made against Harvard University in the form of an email. This email allegedly stated that “shrapnel bombs” were placed in two of the following buildings: The Science Center, Sever Hall, Emerson Hall, and Thayer Hall. This was during finals week for the Fall Semester. I immediately took interest in the case. One reason is Harvard University is an incubator for future members of the ruling class. Two, it is also a hotbed for Marxist ideology and it would be interesting to see how such a place would deal with “revolutionary activities” against it. Third, I have noticed the Ivory Tower has been cracking for the last couple decades and only a thin veneer remains living off its own pretentious self image, like an Iraqi Presidential Palace.

As events unfolded, I was not surprised at what happened or how the suspect is treated with favoritism due to his affiliations. I will start by sharing parts of the affidavit submitted by Special Agent Dalton of the Federal Bureau of Investigation:

> Along with other agents of the FBI and officers of the Harvard University Police Department, I am participating in an investigation of several bomb threats directed at Harvard > University on December 16, 2013. As set forth below, there is probable cause to believe that, on > that date, ELDO KIM, age 20, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, sent several e-mail messages to > Harvard University, intending to convey the false information that bombs had been placed in > several buildings on the Harvard campus in Cambridge, Massachusetts, under circumstances > where the information might reasonably be believed, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §1038(a).

While this charge is serious, it does not really make it to the level of sending the alleged perpetrator to Guantanamo Bay. It would have been funny if they indefinitely detained him. That new power granted to the Executive Branch would be especially ironic if it was used in this case since I believe it was intended to go after enemies of the ruling class.

> On December 16, 2013, at approximately 8:30 a.m., the Harvard University Police > Department, two officials of Harvard University, and the president of the Harvard Crimson, the > university's daily student newspaper, received identical e-mail messages bearing a "subject" line > that read "bombs placed around campus." Each of the e-mail messages read as follows:
> shrapnel bombs placed in:
> science center
> sever hall > emerson hall > thayer hall
> 2/4. guess correctly.
> be quick for they will go off soon
> The Science Center, Sever Hall, Emerson Hall, and Thayer Hall are buildings on Harvard > University's main campus in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

I had a giggle at the "guess correctly" part. It seems the alleged perpetrator was channeling the Joker from "The Dark Knight." It made me even more curious as to this gentleman's belief system.

> In response to the e-mail messages, the Harvard University Police Department > immediately notified the FBI. The FBI immediately began an investigation on the Harvard > University campus, in coordination with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and > Explosives; the United States Secret Service; the Harvard University Police Department; the > Cambridge Police Department; the Boston Police Department; and the Massachusetts State > Police. Dozens of law enforcement officers, along with numerous other first responders, such as > firefighters of the Cambridge Fire Department, immediately went to the vicinity of the buildings > specified in the e-mail messages.

Well at least everyone got to turn on the lights and sirens, wear cool uniforms and carry neat guns. Can’t get too mad if this incident helps justify budgets.

> In the course of this investigation, I have learned that the person who sent the e-mail > messages described above took steps to disguise his identity. Specifically, Harvard received the > e-mail messages from a service called Guerrilla Mail, an Internet application that creates > temporary and anonymous e-mail addresses available free of charge. Further investigation > yielded information that the person who sent the e-mail messages accessed > Guerrilla Mail by > using a product called TOR, which is also available free of charge on the Internet and which > automatically assigns an anonymous Internet Protocol (“IP”) address that can be used for a > limited period of time. Every computer attached to the Internet uses an IP address, which is a > unique numerical identifier, to identify itself to other computers on the Internet and direct the > orderly flow of electronic information between them. IP addresses typically consist of four > numbers between 0 and 255 separated by periods (e.g., 216.239.51.99). Both TOR and Guerilla > Mail are commonly used by Internet users seeking to communicate anonymously and in a > manner that makes it difficult to trace the IP address of the computer being used.

> 9. Harvard University was able to determine that, in the several hours leading up to the > receipt of the e-mail messages described above, ELDO KIM accessed TOR using Harvard’s wireless network.

Wow. While Harvard had him on TOR, I was wondering how they were able to connect him to that email service. I read on in Special Agent Dalton’s affidavit:

> On the evening of December 16, 2013, an FBI agent and an officer of the Harvard University Police Department interviewed ELDO KIM at the building in which he resides on the > Harvard University campus. During the interview, the FBI agent advised KIM of his rights > under Miranda. KIM read and signed an advice of rights waiver, stating that he understood his > rights. KIM then stated that he authored the bomb threat e-mails described above. KIM stated > that he acted alone. He further stated that he sent the e-mails to “five or six Harvard University > e-mail addresses” that he picked at random from the university’s web page. According to KIM, > he was motivated by a desire to avoid a final exam scheduled to be held on December 16, 2013.
> 11. KIM further stated that he sent all of the threatening e-mails at about 8:30 a.m. and that > he used TOR to create a “guerrillamail.com” e-mail address for each of the e-mails. KIM > explained that he sent all of the bomb-threat e-mails from his MacBook Pro Laptop. KIM stated > he chose the word “shrapnel” because it sounded more dangerous and wrote, “2/4. guess > correctly,” so that it would take more time for the Harvard Police Department to clear the area.

> 12. KIM was scheduled to take a final exam in Emerson Hall, a building on the Harvard > campus, at 9:00 a.m. on December 16, 2013. KIM stated that he was in Emerson Hall at 9:00 > a.m. when the fire alarm sounded and the building was evacuated. According to KIM, uponhearing the alarm, he knew that his plan had worked.

I would have thought a Harvard University student would be smart enough never to waive Miranda rights. I also would have thought someone who allegedly violates the law would not tell the police the who, what, why, and where without an attorney. Seems my preconceptions were wrong though. A lot of other preconceptions I had were also wrong in this case. I was expecting an incident like this to lead to the suspect being held without bond. Nope, Mr. Kim got out on a $100,000 unsecured bond. Must be nice being in the “inner party.” Try doing some computer crime over at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the Federal Prosecutor will literally drive you to suicide. Also, the apparent Harvard University grade inflation problem makes skipping a final like this very peculiar.

After I got done laughing about this case, I came to a few conclusions. It seems Harvard University is a very sheltered social environment. I think the alleged perpetrator believed and still believes he will get a slap on the wrist. It is looking to be that is all he is going to get. I also noticed the cognitive dissonance of the people defending the alleged perpetrator's supposed actions. If a person is smart enough, disciplined enough, and has the connections to get into the undergraduate program at Harvard University, he will know right from wrong. I also suspect the alleged perpetrator might have done other not so moral things to get his way in the past, since most criminals do not get caught the first time they violate the law. While terrorist threats are a serious problem, this incident is important for its exposure of an academic society that may or may not think the law applies to them.

5 Things I Learned As A Young Brothel Manager

December 27, 2013 | by mr.hyde | Link | Original Link

My time managing one of Melbourne's seediest and most corrupt brothels has taught me many things, things that I will remember and use for the rest of my life. But before I can tell you all what I learnt, let me give you some background on who I am, and how I got into the underground sex industry.

As a very quiet, introverted young man, I always seemed to struggle finding jobs. I struggled with self-confidence and could sometimes barely string a sentence together. I had just turned 18 and had therefore got my driver's license, 18 being the legal age to drive in my state of Australia. My older female cousin, having revealed to me that she was herself a brothel manager, offered me some part-time work as a driver for some of the international girls that worked for her brothel. Her brothel was a very up-market, classy establishment in the heart of the city where the girls were gorgeous, always practiced safe sex and rarely did drugs. Please note that prostitution is legal and regulated in Melbourne.

During this phase in my career, I learned a lot about sex, money, drugs, their secret lives, and basically the ins and outs of Melbourne's sex industry. All of this was learnt from sitting around in my cousin's brothel all day talking to the girls, to whom I became quite close with.

Anyway, my cousin eventually left her job at that brothel, and so I thought I would try to take on a managerial position of my own. However, with little experience I had, my only option was to work in a dodgy, run down, drug infested brothel in a shady part of town. The job was simple, create as much income for the business as possible and maintain a safe working environment for myself and the 30 girls that worked there. I was 19 at this stage and was the youngest manager to be working in any of Melbourne's brothels.

1. How to recognize a bullshitter

This one was quite easy to learn. As the men would come in, I'd direct them to an introduction room where the girls would introduce themselves 1 by 1 and answer any questions the client might have. Almost always, the bullshitters would ask to see one of the girls for a second time. This was because all he wanted was to get a good leer before leaving to masturbate over her memory later on. The bullshitters, (who were almost always young men, often in groups of 2-3) would come in with a big cheeky grin and nearly never had their wallet on them. This taught me the valuable lesson of paying attention to the details. Did he have his wallet in any of his pockets? Does he have his mate waiting for him in the car outside? Is he asking the girls any questions? Realizing who was genuine and who was not saved me and the girls a lot of time and effort as I would deny the bullshitters entry almost instantly.

2. Never mix business with pleasure

Arguably the golden rule in this industry, and is what eventually lead to my downfall. Having just broken up with my girlfriend of 2+ years, I was admittedly in a very vulnerable state. I became victim to the seduction of one of the girls working for me, and had (free of charge) fornication with her on the premises. She was extremely attractive and one of the best lays that I've had to this date, although allowing her to overpower my better judgment showed a weaker side of myself to all of the other girls who worked for me and to the business owner (my boss). The jealousy and bitchiness towards the girl I slept with and the snide remarks toward me eventually made the work environment chaotic. I lasted another 2 weeks in that job before the boss gave me the sack. Not only did I lose my job from this particular sexual encounter, I also contracted the clap as a result of a broken condom.

3. Men with secrets can be very valuable

It didn't take me long to hear about all of the different fetishes that men have. I have heard it all. Men who want women to urinate on them, men who want women to masturbate with foods, men who want to be breast-fed by a lactating woman, men who want to lick women's eye balls (yes that is completely true). The more embarrassing and socially awkward the fetish, the more we are likely to charge. You could be almost certain that the man who likes the woman to shove a vibrator up his ass will be more than willing to pay top dollar for not only the service itself, but the comfort in knowing he can return to a brothel that he feels comfortable in.

This means that the more he attends to this business, the more money we will ultimately make. It was my job to liaise with the client and then to organize his desires and pricing with the working gal of his choosing. It didn't take me too long to capitalize on this, and by using simple sentences such as 'yeah sure, she can do that. That's no problem for her' or 'that's the type of thing we specialize in here' made the customers comfortable in what they were doing. This usually led to returning customers, me getting tips and having the regular clients bringing me pizza or whatever during night shift . I guess that making them not feel judged goes a long way!

4. Let women think they are in charge

As the laws of sex work in Melbourne are quite strict, and the industry is often regulated and patrolled by police, sexual slavery is nearly nonexistent, and all of the women are working by choice. This has led to an empowerment, as they are not forced to do what they are doing. Because the women cannot be forced to work, they seem to think that they are in charge of the place. They do have a legal right to refuse clients that they don't like, refuse specific services they do not wish to partake in, leave bookings half way through if need be and so on. The business did have rules however. One was that the girls could work any shift that they pleased, as often as they pleased, but a shift was 8 hours long and they must respect that. The women would walk around all day telling me that they won't accept a booking from a client because he was a particular size, nationality, age etc. In actual fact, it was my job to let them think this, and to hide the reality that I was the one calling all of the shots.

When one of the women wanted to, for example, refuse a client, I would simply ask them to reconsider and explain that the client is important for business. As they often aren't always the brightest human beings, this made them feel like they are the one making the final decision and they are still 'in control'. If I were to get an answer that I didn't like then I would push the client and all future clients towards the other girls for the rest of the shift. I would make this action known to everyone to ensure that all of the women made the decision that was of my best interest.

By letting the girls make some decisions about the clients they see, and occasionally ignoring them breaking the 8 hour rule, I maintained an illusion that they had more power than they really did. The truth is that I controlled all of the money that went in and out of the business, and had full control over who the clients made their booking with. This all turned out great for business as the working girls felt strong and happy in their work, which resulted in better services and therefore better client satisfaction.

5. How to show dominance and authority

As a teen-aged man, of average height and weighing in at only 66kgs (145 lbs), I quickly learnt that trying to go toe to toe with men who made trouble in this business was not a smart way to work. Although I could not bring a huge physical presence to work each day, I found ways to assert my dominance and authority through my body language and tone of voice. With approximately 1 in 10 men who came in being drug dealers, wannabe gangsters and just overall trouble makers, making sure that they know I was the one in charge was of utmost importance. Displays of assertive body language from the moment they enter to the moment they leave ensured that trouble was kept to a minimum.

They sit when I stand, maintain strong eye contact and always talk louder than they do.

I'd keep my head up at all times and would not hesitate when refusing demands from clients when necessary regardless of how intimidating they may be. This also applied when around the girls, but probably not to the same extent. Also, not being afraid to get up in the clients face and demand they leave when they were doing something wrong was important. These very basic displays of authority kept the work environment reasonably safe.

Now, as a 21-year-old, I am in a very different industry. But I will not forget the many lessons that I learnt during my time in the brothel. The main thing I got out of doing that line of work was the ability to be strong within myself during difficult situations.

Why Did Karl Halverson Pierson Attack His School And Kill A Pretty Girl?

December 28, 2013 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

On December 13 2013, Karl Halverson Pierson walked into his high school with a gun, wounded a fellow student named Claire Davis and then killed himself. The assumed motive was Karl's anger toward a teacher at the high school but others in the mainstream media posited their own theories as to the reasons behind the shooting. The usual suspects were called out to blame: prescription drugs, mental illness, gun control, etc. Some have even posited, based on former Facebook messages of his, that Karl was a militant anti-Republican and that that motivated his attacks…somehow. One theory that was noticeably absent from the 'experts' who reported on the situation, however, was Karl's probable sexual frustration.

Here's Karl.

What do you notice right away? Karl’s not a stunningly handsome dude and Claire is a smoke show. As of this writing, there’s not much information on Karl’s sexual history. It’s doubtful that Karl had a girlfriend, and it’s likely that he was a virgin.

By the way, if further details are released in the future which discredit my assumptions, well, ignore the Karl parts of this article obviously. Yet even if I’m wrong in my assumptions of Karl’s life, the basic gist of this article is right and does apply to the majority of normally peaceful men who suddenly turn violent and perpetrate these tragedies.

Return Of Kings has touched on this subject before, but since the cowardly and narrow minded mainstream media refuses to even consider positing such a theory, it’s up to us

ROK truth sayers to repeat ad nauseum such observations: women's selfishness makes men kill. What do I mean by women's selfishness? The majority of women are consistently sexual only with a minority of men. This is a fact. The percentages aren't certain (some studies claim a 60w/40m percentage – I personally think it's as high as 70w/30m based on my own empirical observations), but the basics are a sure thing. In our society today, there are hundreds of thousands of young men with insatiable sex drives who are receiving little to no sex from their female peers—not even the less attractive women whom traditionally would be paired off with less attractive men.

Life without sex is a horrible experience, especially when you're a young man. Although I get laid consistently, I have gone long stretches without any sort of sexual contact with women. It was gruelling. My unfulfilled sex drive made me jack off on average three times a day—four or more on gym days when I upped my testosterone level. For the vast majority of men their sex life is a central part of their character and a major part of their motivation for all aspects of their life. If men are barred from it (whether they actually are or merely feel that they are) for whatever reason, they feel little incentive for anything else; even if that incentive is to not go crazy and shoot people.

Karl wanted to have sex, and just by looking at him it's obvious he wasn't getting much, or any. Claire is a beautiful young woman and is doubtlessly the object of affection for many young men who know her, including lonely and sexually frustrated ones. Karl was certainly amongst them. Karl had no chance to ever be with her and he knew it. And that's why he encountered her in his school, armed with a gun, he turned it against her.

Unfortunately this picture is blurred, so it's difficult to see the subtle signs of body language, but notice how there's four men and three women? And how Karl appears to be the only male alone?

Am I saying Claire should have known better and had sex with Karl in advance? No. Claire was for all intents and purposes (looks, status, wealth) far out of Karl's league. Yet there's little doubt that there were many, many women in Karl's high school who were in his league. So why wasn't Karl at home relieving his sexual frustrations with a girlfriend on par with his looks instead of simmering in anger alone, writing typical angry teenaged political messages on his Facebook and purchasing guns? It is because the inherent selfishness of all women has been allowed to run rampant in our Western societies.

Women whose level of physical looks give them no right to be picky are allowed to chase after the upper tiers of men with no shame while men who are just as, or perhaps even a little more, attractive then themselves are forced to remain virgins into their twenties and are forced to wait until women's looks begin to fade around the age of twenty-six before being given the chance to enter into a relationship with them. And even then, the relationship is a farce. The woman has only entered it out of desperation since all the upper echelons of sexually enticing men who used to have sex with her have cast her off and she is emotionally damaged by her selfish experiences.

What future did Karl have to look forward to? Working a mediocre job (if he could even get one), living in a society that does not look out for him or his interests in the slightest (while often ridiculing the people like him in the media – when not actively selling out his future) and having to wait until he was twenty-five or older before being able to enter into a sexually satisfying relationship with a woman on par with his looks (who would be incapable of actually loving him by that point due to her dozens of sexual partners)?

Young men like Karl – who aren't blessed with looks, or exorbitant wealth, or the top tier social skills of the small percentage of men who are getting laid – have been left in the dust by our female-centric, uncaring societies. And society does not care until men like him pick up a gun and starts shooting. And society will not admit the real root of the problem, even when it's staring them in the face.

The assumed catalyst as to why Karl went on the rampage was that he was demoted by a teacher in charge of the debate team, and that this caused murderous frustration in him. Do you think Karl would have had so much murderous frustration if he was receiving as little as a blowjob every so often?

So long as society encourages women of all ages to be the inherently promiscuous creatures they are and allow them to limit their sexual choices to the men at the top of the pyramid (when many of them have no right to), sexually frustrated men will continue to lash out with extreme violence. The Columbine's will continue. The Sandy Hook's will continue. The Arapahoe's will continue. Until society sits down and thinks over these problems with an unclouded mind, men will continue the shootings. More people will die just so Jane Doe can continue to 'explore' her sexuality until she hits the wall.

Of course, it's always easier to scream, "PRESCRIPTION DRUGS! GUN CONTROL MENTAL ILLNESS!" and ignore the root of the problem and twiddle one's thumbs until the next shooting. For many men, hundreds of thousands of them, they live in a mentally ill society. It's a testament to either their humanity or their cowardice that more of them do not lash out like this. The problem will only continue to get worse and without recognizing some hard truths, it will never get better.

This article was a quickie and I'm on vacation, so I apologize that I won't be able to respond to comments. If you have something to say the writer, you can email

Never Put Your Dignity On The Negotiating Table

December 28, 2013 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

One story that profoundly sticks to my mind and that I recall with reverence as I navigate this world is that of the trial and execution of Charles Stuart I, King of England, Scotland, and Ireland, who was beheaded by the rump of his own parliament after being tried and convicted for treason in his own country. Aged 48 at the time, Charles' life was a dramatic roller coaster from the moment he was a small child and the constant in it was that he always held himself to a high standard. His dignity was never something to be negotiated.

Early Life

Born on November 19th, 1600, Charles was the youngest child of the King of Scotland, James Stuart VI and his wife, Anne of Denmark. In March 1603, when Charles was but two, Elizabeth Tudor, Queen of England and Ireland for over forty years, died, and her first cousin twice removed, James, succeeded to the thrones of her kingdoms, as he was her senior genealogical relative. As James and his family made the trip south from Edinburgh to London, one member was conspicuously absent: James' youngest son, Charles. The boy was in such fragile health that his father was worried the traveling would adversely affect him, and in truth, nobody expected Charles to survive to adulthood.

Charles did eventually make the trip, and was determined to overcome both his physical weaknesses and the stammer in his speech. In the first area, he took up a vigorous program of exercise to strengthen his body, taking long runs around the park and eventually taking up horse riding, fencing, and shooting. He would become proficient in all three. Attempting to overcome his stammer, Charles would place pebbles in his mouth and try to speak. The latter therapy, as you might expect, was not as successful.

The young prince strove to hold himself to a higher standard than his father James, whose court has had a reputation of casualness and carousing ever since his reign. Charles was appalled by his father's seemingly un-kingly behavior, and now heir to the throne (his stronger elder brother Henry died in 1612), he was determined to go a different, more elegant direction with his own court when the time came. Father and son did agree on one very important aspect of kingship however- the monarch's divine right to rule his realm, accountable only to God. This belief, and Charles' adamant defense of it, would haunt him throughout his entire reign, and ultimately cause his undoing.

Accession to the Throne & Troubles with Parliament

James died in 1625, and Charles became King of the three kingdoms. It must have been a very pleasing moment for the young king. Doubted by his own family that he would even survive to adulthood, Charles was now on the throne, helped in no small part by his determination to overcome his weaknesses.

Almost immediately however, as his father before him, Charles was at odds with his Parliaments. Its power over the purse being established during the Middle Ages, Charles, as all Kings of England, needed the consent of Parliament to obtain the money he needed to pay for his projects. However, he found his various Parliaments so disagreeable that he dissolved them very quickly, and was determined to rule alone. This he did successfully for eleven years, finding creative ways to raise money (some of these ways however, such as the infamous Ship Money, were bitterly resented, and cost Charles much goodwill).

Civil War

Eventually, troubles in Scotland caused by Charles' religious policies forced him to call a Parliament, as it was the only body that could vote him the money he needed to deal with the situation. This 'Short Parliament' was dissolved quickly, but the situation in Scotland was now so dire that Charles had no choice but to call another one, the 'Long Parliament,' and negotiate. Part of these negotiations led to the execution of Charles' close friend and advisor, Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford. In an act of complete misery and humiliation, Charles needed to sign his own friend's death warrant, and he agonized for the longest time before finally caving. This was an act which Charles would never forgive himself for.

During these rounds of negotiations, Parliament, sensing weakness, pounced and demanded, among other things, Parliamentary control of the military. This infuriated Charles. In January of 1642, Charles acted how any man might when pushed to the brink. Seeing what could only be described to him as a body of petulant, unsatisfied children attempting to usurp the ancient laws of the land, the King reacted with swift force. He went to arrest five troublesome MPs in the House of Commons and one in the Lords on a charge of treason, but they were all warned beforehand and escaped. War was now inevitable.

How many of us might react in the same way? It is difficult to keep one's composure in the face of such insolence. This website has been the focus of much the same kind of attacks—the strong mob probing for or sensing weakness in the party from which it wants something. Charles resolved to bravely stand up for what he perceived as his divinely granted rights, and to punish the wickedness of the mob.

The war however, was not kind to Charles or the Royalist cause. He faced a superiority in manpower from the beginning, the military brilliance of Sir Thomas Fairfax and Oliver Cromwell, and the might of the New Model Army—the nascent genesis of the professional British soldier that would conquer a quarter of the globe in centuries to come. These factors were too much and finally brought the King to defeat. In 1648, after failing in his attempt to restore himself to power in the Second Civil War, the King was brought to trial.

Trial & Execution

The decision to try Charles was a controversial one. Most of the Long Parliament simply thought that they were fighting to bring the King to the negotiating table. These moderates were purged by the army, leaving only a rump that consented to the trial.

Charles' dignity was on display at its absolute best in the last chapter of his life. He refused to cooperate with the court or answer the charges, rightly claiming that there was no law in England that allowed for the trial of the King. He would answer, he said, when he knew by what authority he was brought before this tribunal.

Charles calmly faced down his accusers in this event. He lost his stammer, speaking clearly and powerfully. He explained that the Divine Right of Kings and the ancient laws of the land did not allow for this farce of a court.

Nevertheless, the verdict was never in doubt, and Charles knew this. His power had been gutted by the war. On January 27th, 1649, Charles was declared guilty of high treason and sentenced to execution three days later.

The 30th was a bitterly cold day. Charles demanded extra shirts so that he would not shiver as he made his way to Whitehall in the frigid winter air. He did not want anyone to mistake a shiver from the cold for shivering due to fear. After bidding a tearful farewell to two of his children, he walked the last walk of his life. He was not afraid nor did he even think that his execution was wrong—he felt that it was the just price to be paid for his earlier execution of the Earl of Strafford, and respectfully owned up to this mistake before God.

Addressing the people gathered to witness the event, Charles showed neither fear nor sorrow, and, after assuring that his intention was to uphold the laws and liberties of his realm declared:

> I go now from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can be.

The King was then beheaded, shocking the crowd and all of Europe.

Though Charles had been defeated in the war and placed in a position of powerlessness, he never let his enemies rob him of his dignity. His adamant refusal to negotiate cost him the war, his crown, and his life, but his self-worth was not to be lost. In the face of a most stressful situation, he refused to let his enemies set the frame against him, retaining control of the one thing he still had power over- his self-respect.

Posterity will remember a man for his accomplishments and his failures, but it will also remember him for his dignity and character. Thus, though the loser, Charles is often remembered in a positive light, considered a martyr, and his memory carries with it the air of nobility that his character created.

Always strive to hold your self-respect in the highest regard. It is how people will remember you when you are gone and how people will value you in your time in this world. And it is the one thing that is not subject to the chaotic whims of fortune.

The 34th law: act like a king to be treated like one.

So Charles did. Even to his death.

Are Men Just A Bunch Of Misogynistic Gaslighters?

December 29, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Gaslighting is a term that refers to a situation or relationship in which one person presents false information, distorted views of reality, engages in historical revisionism and, basically, causes the other party to question their sanity and belief in reality. It is a narcissistic pattern of behavior meant to subordinate the other party to the delusions of the gaslighter.

In a healthy world, this term would really not be all that well known, but, we do not live in a healthy society, but a therapeutic one. Guess what ideological group took this psychological phenomenon and ran with it? Yes, feminist are in love with this concept.

Feminists discovered this concept some time back and have thoroughly taken to it. First off, it explains their relationship with self-absorbed alphas, as way too many feminists seem to have some past man who engaged in gaslighting. Second, the articles I reviewed on gaslighting had a highly disproportional levels of women claiming to be ex-Christians. Feminism is a natural extension for these sorts of post-religious folk, as they need radical politics in their youth to paper over their anti-social impulses they dig up as they reject religiosity.

Yashar Ali

The most famous mainstream article on the subject was posted by a virgin named Yashar Ali, originally on the awful website Current Conscience, then on Puffington Host. As expected, feminists raged against the article, as I recall some dumbass from my law school had a rageful Facebook update about saying men have absolutely nothing to teach women about their lives. Don't you see? Just by existing, women have this crystal clear view of themselves, society and power. Funny, if that was true, what exactly are feminists debating when they debate?

Ali's post is the typical mainstream analysis of how society work and how power functions. If you are familiar with my analyses, you already know that if it is in the mainstream media, it is inherently meaningless as the media needs to the remain the decider of false dichotomies while maintaining the therapeutic nature of media to ensure revenues.

Back on point, Ali sketches a world in which men are privileged at the expense of women. He further argues men and women are socialized differently, and due to misogyny, women are socialized with traits that society looks down on – empathy, emotional expression, etc. He says that this situation results in a world in which men, collectively, subconsciously engage in behavior that inherently devalues women's voices and renders their emotional lives dead. He argues women are socialized to hate themselves and men are socialized to love themselves. He wraps up with a predictable exhortation for men to stop gaslighting their women and to step off male privilege and into a world in which men actively take responsibility for their devaluation of women.

Ali fundamentally misunderstands one key and critical fact: male privilege does not exist. He seems to think that men and attributes he seems to think men are inculcated with are superior to ones females are given. Guess he never read the "Myth of Male Power." The reason this opinion is so pervasive is to, first, divide men and women and provide women an aspirational symbol in their minds. I am sure I am right about that because women will rail against individual men and men collectively among themselves and online, only to never say a damn thing towards men in real life. If they do, they pick easy and weak targets they implicitly now can't or won't fight back.

Further, his argument psychologically is that men are clinical narcissists and women are codependents. Generally, that is reversed in society. Women generally fall between clinical narcissism and codependency and, in the end, become compensatory narcissists with beta males. Men make up the majority of codependents and clinical narcissists. Notice how this tracks IQ? Men make up the strong majority of the mentally disabled and the geniuses. What Ali is asking for is for men to completely reorganize their life around codependent qualities. His misdiagnosis is precisely what feminists want from men – worship. If they can't get that, then they will assume hatred on your part. He thinks that society socializes men to feel superior to women and women to feel inferior to men. He is right women feel inferior to men, but that has nothing to do with men and everything to do with women.

Well, he is partially right. Society socializes women to fear and envy men, treating material possessions, independent incomes and social status directly tied to professional success as superior modes of living over prioritizing relationships, raising children and a life based not on dying for an outside chance of social fame. The trick is that women claim to be taught to value relationships over professional success, but that is their nature coming out. Women aren't taught to value relationships, but to value advancing through the educational system, starting a "career" and eventually settling for a fellow co-parent.

Ali is complaining that society encourages narcissism in people, but he doesn't know that. All he knows is what he is taught and that if all the horrid misogyny and gendered behaviors drain away, paradise awaits. He is 100% wrong. The more feminists get, the worse society becomes because new defenses need to be erected to ignore the rage inside of them. Read older feminist works – it becomes obvious that feminists have become far more angry every decade. Magazines dedicated to women? More rageful articles, more articles designed to cause anxiety in women and more articles pitting women against men that end in concluding women are better than men.

Gaslighting, here, is the idea that men have the audacity to challenge a woman's view of herself. Women, collectively, are not that aware of who they are or how they come across. When women gaslight each other, that simply is the status-quo and since they haven't been taught how to think, they ignore it because it makes them supremely uncomfortable, if they even acknowledge it. When men question a woman's response to X, Y or Z the lightbulb goes off and women know what to blame it on – sexism. While many women don't utilize the misogyny framework, I can't recall a woman who didn't believe that men are sexist against women.

When confronted with a male challenging their identity, women need a defense mechanism to prevent that challenge from puncturing their identity. Accusations of gaslighting is usually based out of a man challenging a woman's identity. Women's identities are shaky and not based out of reality, so they need endless amounts of therapeutic messages that bolster their weak identities.

This concept is displayed endlessly on RoK articles that go viral. A common assertion is that RoK is attacking women's identities and that is not right. That is a curious assertion, as they are admitting women get their identities from media outlets and when media outlets don't provide the ego massaging they expect, it must be wrong. Notice how the comments immediately accuse RoK writers of being misogynistic. That is a narcissistic defense mechanism to explain our collective lack of worship for the modern female.

Further, when RoK talks about female delusion about reality, gaslighting rhetoric is used, even though I have yet to see that actual term used in the comments. The typical approach is that we are simply falling back on misogynistic, gendered expectations of female behavior – nagging, flighty, hysterical, not serious, etc. The problem is that we are actually discussing what females are actually doing. Since the modern woman has little to no insight as to who she really is, most RoK posts puncture her self-identity and she needs to either explain away our stances as satire, pretend we hate women or that we have issues with our mother. All those tired approaches are simply defenses against true self-awareness.

Simply put, gaslighting rhetoric is female delusion about the reality of their lives. I have not doubt men do gaslight women in reality, but since feminists have swallowed the approach hook, line and sinker, it means gaslighting, to them, is a way to shore their sense of self and pretend all that matters is their conceptualization of themselves. You can see yourself as intelligent or beautiful, but the facts don't lie. Intelligent people make intelligent comments that others recognize as such. Beautiful people are photogenic, readily recognizable and perceived as such.

Gaslighting rhetoric, for women and feminists, when it is real, is about explaining away male narcissism. When it isn't real – most of the time – it is about shoring up their sense of self from challenges from men. Unable to properly understand themselves and why they do the things they do, they need defense mechanisms to prevent men from challenging that. Part of this is the desire to avoid any and all submission and women see men as authority figures which should not to be submitted to. When women do submit, it is often as a codependent and then they complain their significant other is either a clinical narcissist or a compensatory narcissist.

At the end of the day, just remember if some woman accuses of you of gaslighting her, remember you just ruptured her self-identity. Depending on what you want from her, proceed from there knowing that. However, if she actually uses that specific term, my advice would be to bail. What feminists and women forget in their gaslighting rhetoric is that you can only reveal who people really are. There is no such thing as destroying somebody's self-esteem – that can only happen with the consent of the destroyed. If women are admitting they can be broken down with gaslighting approaches, then they are admitting they really are weak, deep down. The play and movie that spawned this term showed this – the female lead was completely open to be manipulated by gaslighting.

People can only influence you with your consent.

What Did You Accomplish This Year?

December 29, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

I'm laying on my bed waiting to drive to a family Christmas party. It just hit me – another year is in the books. As the festivities and drinking ramp up, it's time to reflect once again – time to compare my current self to who I was a mere 365 days ago.

The average man simply uses this time to relax, but the superior man does not. He consciously reminisces on the time that's past, and re-focuses his aim for the upcoming year. Rather than allowing another year to be archived without a second thought, he provides context and significance to time that otherwise might have been forgotten. Yes, he should be vigilant and self-aware throughout the year, but it's all too easy to get caught up in smaller projects and minutiae. Now it's time to review the big picture.

I offer a series of questions below, and sample answers from my life, to assist you in your personal reflection and analysis.

What areas did you make significant progress in?

From articles for my own blog and pieces for Return of Kings to publishing two books and working on another – my ability to write and communicate my thoughts and experiences through written word has come a long way. I've found that cutting past the bullshit and actually writing is the only way to improve. At times I wrote a lot and often. At other times I went months without writing so much as a sentence. But after all is said and done, I believe this is the area I made the most progress in.

What areas did you stagnate in?

While I continued to workout and train hard throughout the year, I faced a number of obstacles that stunted the progress of my physique. Diminishing marginal returns from years of lifting, stomach problems that left me with a less-than-optimal diet, and other projects competing for my time combined to slow my gains. I put on about five pounds of muscle over the first eight months, cut five of fat over the past four, and got slightly stronger in the process. Compared to the previous year, these are only small improvements.

What habits will you integrate?

Recent experimentation has revealed several dietary considerations I must take into account to maintain a healthy, gas/bloating-free stomach. Primarily I found that intermittent fasting allows me to avoid a majority of the digestive discomforts I've dealt with recently. I will only eat from noon until eight going forward.

What activities can I remove from my life?

Last year I cut out most of the bullshit, from video games to excessive TV. The one thing that continues to suck my time on a daily basis is mindless internet browsing. I'd say it steals 45 minutes a day from my life. Facebook, and the addicting newsfeed scroll is the primary offender. Facebook is a weekly activity going forward.

What is your main mission for the year to come?

I've nearly completed writing a new book on being alpha and the rules I followed to transform my life over the past few years. Editing, publishing, and marketing this book is my main mission – at least for the beginning of the year. The book's success will rely primarily on my ability to market and promote it, so this is where I'll focus the majority of my energy.

What about you?

Take a few minutes – or an hour, even. Answer the questions above. Give purpose and direction to your life. Take aim and steady your crosshairs for the year to come.

Publisher’s Top 20 Posts From 2013

December 29, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It was really hard to narrow down the 861 posts we published in 2013 to only 20, but it has been attempted. Here are what I believe the most influential and noteworthy contributions from 2013 in random order:

1. How Black America Has Predicted Our Future. “Almost every social problem guys in the manosphere cite as a growing concern within the general population has already played itself out within the Black American community.”

2. Don’t Believe The Lies About Foreign Brides. “So here we have average looking guys with moderate incomes and no ability with women who are still able not only marry hotter women than they would get at home, they are younger, more feminine and traditional too. They are landing far better women than they could if they stuck it out at home.”

3. How Young Women Promote The Hookup Culture. “…how could a movement that seems to have played such a large role in encouraging young women to view the maintenance of meaningful relationships with men as hindrances to their future and “betrayals” of their femininity be considered in any way anti-male?”

4. The 15 Magical Years Of Womanhood. “Despite minor adaptations to current realities, and individual variance, the arc of a woman’s beauty—and, by extension, power—has remained largely unchanged for generations.”

5. Why Modern Dating Is Like Illegal Alaskan Halibut Fishing. “Ironically, it’s the liberated woman who most rewards the sexually aggressive man – a man who fails to ‘seize the day’ will get left in the dust. She calls pickup artists ‘creepy,’ and then succumbs to his charm.”

6. The Men’s Rights Movement Is No Place For Men. “As utopians, MRAs don’t much care about any social institution for its own traditional role, but only insofar as it promotes ‘gender equality.’ Its goal is to remake every institution in society until androgyny of the sexes is attained and expected, and the ‘oppression’ of men has ceased. ”

7. The 10 Slut Commandments. “I didn’t create sluts and I would prefer that girls not spread their legs so easily, but guess what? Sluts are here to stay and they’re only going to get sluttier, so sit back, relax and let em ride your cock.”

8. The Western Male Is The Reason Why His Women Suck. “When men relinquish their power over women, women will always take advantage of them. And after all, why shouldn’t they? Women merely take advantage of what is offered to them. If some man was sacrificing his life for your benefit, wouldn’t you accept his patronage?”

9. 24 Signs She’s A Slut. “Whether you use them to get laid more reliably, or to avoid wifeing up the town bike, these cues should be on every man’s slut radar.”

10. How To Defeat New York City Media Liberals. “The weakness lies in the original writer of the hit piece. Once the story goes viral, she is often forgotten, but it’s her where the counterattack can be successfully executed.”

11. Fat Shaming Week Was A Corpulent Success. “I ask you, dear reader, what outlet has advanced fat shaming as much as we have? We promised you a buffet of fat shaming and I think we delivered. Most importantly, we’re still here.”

12. Say Hello To The New Definition Of Rape. “For every one of these false accusers that we catch, how many more did we miss? Feminists will continue to say this is a “small” problem, but men know very well that hooking up with the wrong girl can send them a world of trouble.”

13. Paternity Fraud Is Worse Than Rape. “It must be nice for women to have so much support from the law with rape even when they are making up stories. Unfortunately, men are not afforded anywhere near the same support from the law in matters of paternity fraud.”

14. 5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder. “In a world where the “retail price” on the typical Western woman continues to skyrocket—while their quality continues its precipitous decline—there are some real gems to be found in the bargain bin.”

15. 20 Things Women Do That Should Be Shamed, Not Celebrated. “Rather than honoring the commitment she made to the love of her life (at the time) in front of who knows how many friends and family at their (likely) over the top extravagant wedding, women are instead celebrated for getting divorced because they’re, “not haaaapy.””

16. Act As If Every Girl Were A Slut. “It’s a tactical assumption, something that you assume to be true to improve your strategy, even if you think it will be false most of the time.”

17. Should A Wise Man Get Married? “For Scala, a “wise man” is he who “diligently pursues peace of mind and tranquility.” Such a man will pursue actions that tend to increase his peace and tranquility, since any other course would by definition be against his interests. Since wives, according to the philosopher Epicurus, are “on the borderline between good and bad,” the wise man would avoid marriage as an unacceptable risk. ”

18. 10 Reasons Why Foreign Women Are Better Than American Women. “Let’s face it—American women are pretty screwed up as a whole. They are emotionally unstable, mentally unstable, and suffer from delusions and are out of touch with reality. An American woman is living in her own movie, with herself as the star.”

19. 8 Essential Rules To Surviving The Workplace. “I have learned the hard way several times that I absolutely cannot share personal details of any kind at work. I actually came close to getting fired my second year out of college simply for giving a watered down PG-13 version of a rather tame weekend at spring break.”

20. How To Control Your Woman’s Diet. “Next time you are in the vicinity of your girl and her friends, start a conversation with one of her inner circle about some trendy health food (I find Goji Berries often works) and end the interaction with “And they’re really low in fat too!…..but (Girlfriend’s name) would know nothing about that!””

What did I miss?

Fat Feminist Lindy West Goes Berserk Because She No Longer Fits In Airplane Seats

December 30, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's no secret that I dislike Jezebel writer Lindy West (I previously named her the ugliest feminist in the world). She has enabled the degradation of American culture through her writings on fat and slut acceptance while heralding the emasculation of men. If she was given a Tumblr blog to exercise her crazed rantings, there wouldn't be much in the way of harm, but Nick Denton, a homosexual who is head of the Gawker empire which owns Jezebel, has given her a huge voice to pollute the masses. Fat feminists throughout the country look up to her for encouragement to remain committed and unembarrassed fat feminists, brown skid marks on America's soul.

It now pains me to remind everyone that fat feminist beliefs have real-world consequences. As of today, because of Lindy's slothfulness, gluttony, and impaired thinking faculties, she is too fat to fly in airplanes.

> This year, for the first time ever, I got on a plane and discovered that I didn't fit in the seat. I've always been fat, but I was the fat person that still mostly fit. I mean, I couldn't fit into clothes (MORE TUNICS PATTERNED LIKE A PARISIAN SUITCASE, PLEASE), and I had to be careful with butt safety (I'll take the chair side, not the banquette, thanks), but I was still the kind of fat person who could move through the straight-size world without causing too many ripples. Until this fall.
> People's butts might be getting bigger, sure, but it's a certainty that seats are getting smaller. I fit in every other chair. (Some people don't. That's fine too.

> Those are good bodies too. Those people deserve respect and accommodations too, without caveats.)

Pre-boarding

If you happened not to fit in an airplane seat, you may take that as an indication to lay off the Starbucks milkshakes for some time. But not Lindy. It's not her fault that she is too big—it's the airline's fault for not making seats wide enough to accommodate her monstrous frame. If that was the end of the story then we could go on with our lives with only a shake of the head, but it only scratches the surface of the noxious spew she released in her rant. She finds blame not just with the airline, but with the man sitting next to her and a pervasive "fat shaming" culture (i.e. everyone who doesn't share her love of Chipotle burritos) for causing what appears to be a bad day where she was not graced with positive attention, romantic love, and complimentary in-flight Cinnabons.

Here she is instigating a fight with her seat neighbor after holding up the plane because she was partying hard the night before in a bathtub filled with pina colada…

> I'd almost missed the plane—I was that person staggering on board just before the doors closed—and I'm sure he thought he was going to have the row all to himself. I flashed him an apologetic smile (I know that aeronautical heartbreak too well!) and pointed to the middle seat. "Hey, sorry, I'm over there." He looked at my body, sort of glared blankly at my hips, but didn't respond or make eye contact with me. Then, as I went to put my bag in the overhead bin, I heard him mutter something sour.
> "[Something something] say excuse me."
> My adrenaline went bonkers. Was someone being a dick to me? In person? At 7 am? In an enclosed space? For no reason? When I have a hangover? And we're about to be stuck next to each other for the next five hours? I'm used to men treating me like garbage virtually, or from fast-moving cars, but this close-quarters IRL shit-talking was a jarring novelty.

> Me: “What?”
> Him: “Nothing.”
> Me: “No, you said something. What did you say?”
> Me: “No. What did you say? Tell me.”

Re-enactment of Lindy West arguing with her seat mate (add 300 pounds)

She continued to harass this individual during the flight with what appears to be assault and battery.

> As soon as he fell asleep (with his mouth open like a NERD), I passive-aggressively jarred his foot with my backpack and then said, “OH, EXCUSE ME,” because I am an adult. We ignored each other for the rest of the flight.

Poor man—he was not only anxious about a plane crash but also if Lindy would continue her aggression by sitting on him and ending all of his life functions. I like to think of myself as hyper-masculine, but I’d be downright fearful to be attacked by a person shaped like a large box, male or female…

She received an intense barrage of criticism from her very own loyal readers:

> "Recently, I had to get up early for a 7 a.m. flight to attend a family member's funeral. I only had about an hour's worth of sleep, because I was back and forth between phone calls making arrangements. Things at the airport were crazy as usual, and the flight wasn't looking like it would get out in time. Right at the last minute, the flight attendants let a young woman on the plane – lucky for her, last time I was running late they wouldn't let me board. Oh well.
> She made a beeline for her seat, which was next to mine. She reeked like booze – > must have been hungover – and then fumbled with her luggage bumping me several times. I wasn't feeling my best, so I mumbled 'would be nice to hear an 'excuse me'.' Big mistake. She went ballistic on me, screaming 'WHAT DID YOU SAY?' over and over without dropping it. Finally I repeated myself, and she continued to huff and puff about the situation. The plane finally took off and I tried to get some shut-eye. Unfortunately, she kept kicking me and saying very loudly 'EXCUSE ME.'

> I tell you, sometimes people are just jerks. As if air travel wasn't enough of a pain!"

Let's review an excerpt of where she describes her corpulence. It's so superabundant I've received word from academic circles that noted anthropologists have called dibs on her body after she succumbs to the diabetes.

> But even worse than any physical pain is the anxiety of walking up the aisle and not knowing what plane you're on. Am I going to fit this time? Will I have to ask for a seatbelt extender? Is this a 17-incher or an 18-incher? Did I get on early enough that I can get myself crammed in before someone comes and sits next to me? Is the person next to me going to hate me? Does*everyone* on this plane hate me? I paid money for this?
> People's butts might be getting bigger, sure, but it's a certainty that seats are getting smaller. I fit in every other chair. (Some people don't. That's fine too. Those are good bodies too. Those people deserve respect and accommodations too, without caveats.)
> I'm sure some fat people are fat by their own hand, without any underlying > medical conditions, but a lot of other fat people are fat because they're sick or disabled.

Rest assured she does not have a medical condition causing her obesity (though we can't rule out a mental disorder). She has actually flaunted her suicidal overeating on Youtube by eating neon orange cookies that don't even seem to have real food origins…

This is the woman who is a role model for American females today. This is the woman whose ideas are so important to the mainstream media that she recently won a "Woman's Media Center" award for being a "fat activist" (here is her surprisingly articulate acceptance speech). This is the woman who has one of the heftiest voices on America's largest blog for women. This is the future of America—a future of premature deaths by diabetes, strokes, and heart attacks, a future of women screeching about how men and the patriarchy sent them to the grave by allowing them to eat 5,000 calories a day.

Is this who we want having influence in our country? Society must realize there are consequences to fat feminist beliefs. They range from the concrete (not fitting on airplanes) to creating a class of perennial female victims-seekers who have no notion of personality responsibility. Instead of focusing on self-improvement, they seek to blame everyone else for their problems, even innocent men on airplanes who have their property damaged from the canckled legs of deranged women.

Lindy West is externalizing her 200 extra pounds onto others. She is externalizing her great unhappiness in life by belching hatred about men and society, or outright attacking men on airplanes who she believes should compliment her obesity or ask her out on a date to TGI Fridays. The road to feminism and obesity is a sad one indeed, and my only hope is that the women who read her angry scribbles wake up to the fact that there is no pot of gold at the end of a fat feminist's rainbow—just a shovel and a big pot of lard.

10 Reasons Why You Should Live Without Apology

December 30, 2013 | by Daniel Wolf | Link | Original Link

You've been told, "Don't do this." "It's dangerous." "It won't work." "You'll hurt yourself." "You'll fail."

Everyone from your friends, ministers, parents, mentors… all of them. And you believed them. You ate up those words like a hot-cooked meal after a long session of leg-day workout. And you kept listening to their tiny little, soft whispers of advice for years. Like a dandilion in an open field, you went along with the flow…

Until for some miraculous reason you woke up one day…

And realized as you rose out of your bed and looked out the window where the autumn leaves were shaking by the breeze…

that you have achieved…

Absolutely nothing.

Not a single damn thing worth proudly screaming and proclaiming on top a mountaintop or into the vast blue horizon of the Atlantic Sea…

that you are not only a man but THE MAN.

And that's because…

You've been living an apologetic life.

You have been tricked by all those around you to think that you can't do what you want to do, be who you want to be, and go where you want to go.

And that's not all. It gets worse:

You tricked yourself. You believed the hype. Boy, you fell for it hard.

And, thus, you still struggle for triumph…

You feel crippled.

But there is still chance. You can change. You have to. As all things in life, there will always be a second chance if you have enough willpower and conviction to put them into action.

Here are the 10 reasons to live without apology…

1. You will not be missed

You and I are just one person out of 7 billion human beings in this planet earth. You are not a special cupcake. There is no sprinkled toppings for you. If you die, at most 20 people will cry for you.

When Michael Jackson died, I didn't cry.
When Nelson Mandela died, I didn't cry.
When Paul Walker died, I didn't cry.
When Obama dies, I won't cry.

Do you understand my drift? If I didn't cry or really care over the death of these accomplished individuals in their own right, do I expect other random people to care about me?

Hell no. This world is not a joke to be played with. Once you're out, you're out. So live big and stop being small.

2. Your hormones will thank you

When you take matters into your own hands, you are forced to take actions to improve your life. You are not forced by others, but by YOU. That puts tremendous power in your ability to become proactive instead of reactive.

You're broke? No problem, get a job, save, and create an online business.
You're depressed? No problem, go work out and start being grateful.
You're ugly? No problem, give your parents a call and thank them for that.
You're friendzoned all the time? No problem, stop acting like a friend.

How does this affect your hormones?

Easy. Proactive actions will make you feel like a man because by definition a man can't survive without taking proactive actions. And whatever a man does and accomplishes in life is fueled by his go-to hormone: TESTOSTERONE. The more you use it, the more you need it, and the more you'll crave it.

(I'm so lonely & pitiful) > (Take Action: i.e work out, make money, sex) > (Big T) > (Holy Shit: This feels good) x100000 = Success

Literally, all your desires, action, and thoughts are driven by the primary hormone: big T. That is why when you see a strong man in your path, you step away for him. That is why when you get a confident salesperson in front of you, you can't help but pull out your wallet.

3. Others will depend on you

Once you say sayonara to being controlled like a dog on a leash, you'll eventually understand that you have power and a thirst for knowledge. In other words, now you can achieve on your own: money, status, and respect.

Your unapologetic mindset will drive you to achieve financial and lifestyle success and people will start to notice. When you show up in your new outfit and upgraded car, people will start to notice. When you pay off any kind of debt for your family, they will cry and respect you.

It wont be long before you effortlessly find people who will want to be your friend and businessmen who want to help you out.

(Don't be surprised if girls suddenly start to think your bald head or your ugly face is attractive.)

You will realize from this experience something quite sad yet beautiful…

That all people are selfish and greedy just like you.

You will understand people. You will realize that what you have everyone wants a part of. And you'll understand that is exactly how you were like… looking for a handout.

But you'll understand why people are attracted to you because you realize that all people are attracted to success. To see something in real life what they have secretly envisioned in their hearts as something impossible will give them an ecstatic thrill.

You will understand. And you will share with those who you love and care for and those who were there for you from day one. All the rest, you know why they're there.

4. You will be confident

Deciding to live and create the life the way you want and actually achieving it takes huge discipline, hard work, and balls. I mean, after all, you are literally thinking on a different wavelength than 90% of the people you come across.

The shit you say will confuse them.
The actions you take will mesmerize them.
And the byproduct of that is undeniable and unshakable confidence.

You won't become confident if you are looking for others for the right answer or the right path for your life. The honest truth is there is no right way. Only you will be able to figure that out.

Whether you want to take a 3 month business vacation in Cancun or Bangkok, Thailand is completely up to you. If you ask 10 people what you should do, they will give you 10 different answers.

Your life is, as cheesy as it sounds, is completely unique. You have to understand that your way of life is yours alone and no one can judge that.

If you want to be an unapologetic boss…

Choose your path, decide to stick to it, and build your confidence.

5. You will experience amazing new things

Taking life on a path of an unapologetic man means not being tied to one set of experience. The life of waking up and having to work Monday to Friday from 9-5 with two weeks of vacation a year year-in and year-out, being excited for Thanksgiving holidays so you can get a 4 day weekend, is not the life that you will be striving for.

In contrast, how would it feel to travel to countries you've never visited or to live in mulitple locations around the world?

It's even simple as trying new food at a restaurant you often go to or listening to random Spanish flamenco music on your radio.

Unapologetic people make strong decisions fully aware of the fact that there is a chance that it won't go as they planned. But they know the reward is an unforgettable experience.

Unapologetic people bring life into their life.

You will realize that as an unapologetic man that every time you try something new, your set of experience widens, which will provide you with more of #4 and #2. (Yea, baby)

Ultimately, your unapologetic nature will enable you to experience life the way you want it to be.

6. Your patience will run thin for bullshit

Ever since I decided to say goodbye to the education system, my whole outlook on life changed. The first thing I did was stop accepting anything less than the best from me and others. Second, I put total responsibility and control of my life in me.

No government, no school, no family, no friends, no organization would take care of me. (Yea, a bit extreme but that's what it takes to be truly unapologetic) I decided not to rely on any organization for my success.(Except the internet, which is a free network)

Realizing that all I needed was an understanding of my own power, I stopped accepting bullshit from everyone. I could immediately tell if someone was trying to take advantage of me. I could tell when a salesperson was trying to sell me an inferior product. I could tell when someone was trying to pretend to know something they didn't know.

I also realized that I could be truly myself, a lone wolf tunnel-visioned, humble-hearted asshole who wanted to get things done efficiently, with class, and with pride. I didn't need to please others or pretend to like stupid people.

I stopped hanging out with people who were negative and didn't believe in me. I started to ask advice from people who had special knowledge in their field who were happy and successful, not the ones who pretended like they knew everything.

But first, I had to be unapologetic with who I was or what I wanted to achieve in life.

Once I took care of that, I could be myself.

And you should always be striving to express yourself fully since being phony sickens your soul.

7. You will motivate others

You came to this blog to extract man-handling knowledge and apply it so your life can be amazing. Maybe you're not where you want to be in life. Maybe you need a lot to figure out.

But guess what? When you read articles from sites like this…

It cost you absolutely nothing. All you need to do is read. And then take ACTION.

8. You will accept your flaws… and not let it bother you

It should be obvious that despite any amount of accomplishment, success, and happiness you might achieve, you will never be perfect. And surprisingly, the ones who are okay with that come across as perfect because they are so genuine.

For example, I think Daniel Craig is one real badass. But I can tell he's a Byronic introvert where natural humor and social skills aren't his forte. And he probably knows it, too. But it doesn't matter. He does what he wants, which is star in huge movies. Stop trying to be perfect.

The people that have the most trouble with this complex of trying to come off as perfect, of hiding their flaws, are those who are so insecure about revealing their lack of control with their emotion and direction of life.

You might think that being an unapologetic man means to control everything but that's the furthest from the truth. As an unapologetic man, you stop giving a shit about what you can't control.

I am 5'9. I have acne scars from the high school years. But I don't give a fuck. I used to a lot. But it doesn't bother me anymore.

Why?

Why should it bother me when I know it's nothing I can control and that worrying about it only will make me stupidly anxious.

What I do care about is my physique, my style, my social skills… all of which are things I can control.

Stop trying to control things you can't control. That is an easy road to anxiety and depression.

If you want to be want to be unapologetic, accept your flaws. Easy.

9. You will take yourself seriously

There are people who will say to you, "You take yourself so seriously."

And I say, “Of course I do.”

There is a difference between “acting serious” in inappropriate settings such as a party or clubs and “taking your life seriously.”

I believe in “taking yourself seriously.”

I don’t care what others might have to say about that. The day they can show me how to transform $150 into a $3000-a-month automated income, I’ll listen to why I shouldn’t take myself seriously.

You know who doesn’t take themselves seriously?

Unsuccessful people. Dependent people. You are not one of them.

If you’re an unapologetic adult, you better be serious about who you are because there is no backup plan. There is no one who will succeed for you. You represent yourself. No mom and dad here, buddy.

10. You will succeed

The Holy Grail.

After all the struggle, the ups and downs, and living your life unapologetically, there will be a day when it dawns on you that you have succeeded.

It will take many months and maybe years.

Ask anyone how they did it and they’ll tell you the same thing over and over:

Hard Work.

If you’re unwilling to do that, you aren’t living without apology. You’re being small and lazy.

But it will happen when you put in the work everyday and don’t let others convince you to stop. You will someday realize the reason why others are still where they are is because they live with excuses and apology.

And then…

We succeed.

A Robbery And The Runaround In Rio

December 30, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I first met Raf Kiss a couple years ago at a social event in Leme in Rio de Janeiro. I remember being very impressed with his personal story and his dedication to living a good life. Working in the finance industry in Belgium for many years and raising a family there, he eventually decided to make a major life change about six or seven years ago. So he sold all his possessions, moved to Brazil, and married a local girl. In short, he did the type of thing that most guys can only dream about.

But it was more than that. He's a fearless traveller to some very remote and difficult regions in Brazil, a country that is not exactly known for the convenience and comfort of its internal road system. Some of the stories he told me about his motorcycle trips around Brazil fired my imagination, and I spent some time later reading the articles on his websites Brazil Road Trips and AngloInfo Rio de Janeiro. I haven't met anyone—Brazilian or other nationality—who has travelled as extensively or as arduously in Brazil as he has, often at significant personal risk, and I would urge anyone with an interest in adventure travel to take a look at some of the articles on his blog. He's given me some valuable travel tips that have paid off immensely in my own explorations in the country.

A few days ago, I noticed that Raf had mentioned on his Twitter feed that he had been robbed while biking around Rio. Anticipating this would make for an interesting story to our curious ROK readership, I suggested to him the idea of an interview. What follows below are my questions to him and his responses.

Quintus. You said you were assaulted at gunpoint, right? What happened?

Raf: Well, on Tuesday, December the 17th, I was on my way from Volta Redonda to Rio de Janeiro, a routine trip since I've done it hundreds of times over the past 5 years. I had a problem with my car and my mechanic hadn't been able to fix it by the time I had to leave for Rio, so I had to go by motorcycle.

By the time I reached Nova Iguaçu, in Rio's infamous Zona Norte, it had started raining and I needed to stop to put on my raingear. I'm aware of the risks in that area, so I was looking out for a gas station. But as it was raining and there was very poor lighting, I missed the exit for the first gas station. So I decided to pull over at the first bus stop, which was the next place with a little more light.

While I was struggling to get the pants on, I hadn't noticed that a small motorbike with two guys had stopped next to me. The first thing I noticed was someone talking to me. When I looked up I was still not aware of the assault… until I saw the gun.

He was saying something in the line of: "Don't even think of trying something…Perdeu (you lost)… don't look at me… Where is the money…"

I slowly took my wallet out of my side pocket and he told me to give it to him. I managed to take the money out and only give him that, holding onto my bank cards and documents, which would be a serious pain to lose. They got about 150 USD worth, which I think is a small price.

Quintus: What was going through your mind at the time?

Raf: Worst case scenario: this guy is going to take my bike with everything on it–my luggage with my computer, tablet, and everything else I use to work in Rio–and maybe even shoot me. It was pretty scary.

Quintus: Did you report it to the police? Would it have done any good?

Raf: After finishing putting on the raingear, I continued on my way and stopped at a small PM (Polícia Militar) post, where I told them that I had been assaulted and robbed, but I didn't file a formal complaint. As you suggest, it would not have made a lot of difference.

Quintus: The police later impounded your bike, right? How did that happen?

Raf: This happened a few days after the assault. I found myself going the wrong way on a one way street (it was dark and not clearly marked). The PM stopped me, and since I had an expired document, the bike got impounded.

The driver of the tow truck gave me a form and told me that I had to make sure I didn't have outstanding tickets and should go to DETRAN (transit department) with this form to get the bike back. He didn't say anything about the list of about 6 other documents that I needed to make copies of (one of them authenticated). I discovered that on my own the next day. I was able to get the copies, even if it was the weekend before Christmas and it was very hard to find a copy (or Xerox) place open.

I also checked the DETRAN website for outstanding tickets, so I would be able to pay them before going there, but nothing came up, so the next day I went there to recover the bike.

Of course, the first thing the DETRAN guy tells me is that I have an outstanding ticket. He gives me a paper with the details AND a little piece of paper with the list of copies I needed. Of course, those I already had. But…the little piece of paper says I need TWO copies of everything.

To pay the ticket, you have to go to another place in the same building to print out the "boleto" (document with a bank code) which you then have to take to a Bradesco bank and pay. Of course, they have no information about where the nearest Bradesco agency is. Also, once you have done the payment at Bradesco, it takes about 2 – 3 hours for the payment to hit the account of DETRAN, so I already knew that it would ruin my chances of getting everything done AND get to the depo lot in Campo Grande about 50 Km away.

So, I went to pay the ticket, and then it was off to look for another copy place to make the second copy of the documents I already made copies of the day before. Funny about this is that at the place to print the boleto (the bank agency and the copy place) you will find the same people going through the same process as you. So in a way it feels as if you're in an episode of "The Amazing Race."

Having paid the ticket, and armed with the necessary copies, I went back to DETRAN a few hours later and the guy said the payment didn't come in yet. The only thing you can do at that point is to get back at the end of the line and do this over and over until the guy finally says that your payment came in. That's when you get to go and wait in another line to be attended. After being attended (basically giving the bunch of documents to a servant) they tell you to go to another place and wait until your name is called.

After another 30 minute wait I finally got the document that said I had no outstanding debt at DETRAN. Then they tell you to go to DETRO (Department of Rodoviárias) at ANOTHER ADDRESS with this document and there you will get the document that will liberate your vehicle.

At DETRO, it was again the same group of people waiting outside the building. You have to get a number at the reception and the receptionist gives you ANOTHER LIST OF COPIES… one of them authenticated.

She also told me I couldn't get into the building wearing a Bermuda [shorts], so on top of finding a copy place and a cartório, I also needed to go and buy myself a pair of long pants.

At that point you start to realize that your chance of making it to the depo place the same day is becoming very small, but you go on against all odds.

Long story short, I arrived at the place in Campo Grande at 17:05… 5 minutes too late. The worst thing was that a friend of mine and my father in law had travelled about 120 km to get there and take my bike to drive it back to my home (since I didn't have a driver's license), so I didn't only ruin my own day, but also that of two other people.

The next day I went back to the depo with my father in law and was able to get the bike out and drove it back home myself – without a license, again after a similar process of copies and a payment that had to be done.

Quintus: What did this incident teach you about the Brazilian bureaucracy?

Raf: Brazilian bureaucracy is legendary, but in this case it feels like everything is set up to harass people as much as possible and to slow down the process so that many people will not be able to complete the whole process in one day and have to leave their vehicle in the depo for one or more extra days, which means more money for the government.

Quintus: What originally prompted you to move to Brazil?

Raf: After a pretty normal "rat race" type of life (20 years of marriage, raising two kids, venture capital job), I got divorced and from then on I started feeling a growing urge to do something completely different. After contemplating a move to Ghana in Africa, I finally decided to try my luck in Brazil, where I became a licensed tour guide and started a motorcycle travel company. This didn't turn out the way it should have, so now I'm focusing more on hiking, trekking and climbing in and around Rio de Janeiro.

Quintus: What would you say is your basic philosophy of life?

Raf: My general impression is that most people are too busy gathering financial wealth, thinking that this what is going to make them happy. The Dalai Lama couldn't have said it better: "man sacrifices his health in order to make money. Then he sacrifices money to recuperate his health. He is so anxious about the future that he doesn't enjoy the present, the result being that he doesn't live in the present or the future. He lives as if he is never going to die and then he dies having never really lived."

My philosophy in life is to try and do the things I like to do without hurting others in the process and staying as far away as I can from politics and religion.

Quintus: What advice would you give younger guys just starting out?

Raf: These are my five basic points:

1. Make your health your first priority. Eat healthy and exercise. You'll look good for a lot longer and you'll be able to enjoy a lot more offbeat experiences.
2. Learn to play an instrument. Music is the only universal language. It's a great way to meet people and your instrument will always be there to cheer you up after a bad experience.
3. Keep learning. You will never be too smart, and never know enough.
4. Respect other people, even if they don't share you ideas.
5. Stay away from any kind of drugs.

Quintus: Thanks for talking to our ROK readers, Raf.

Raf: No problem, man.

My interview with Raf gave me much in the way of food for thought. It reminded me of one of the best benefits of travel: the chance encounters with people who can become sources of sustained friendship and worldly wisdom.

My Year In Review: Four Articles To Consider In 2014

December 30, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

2013 has been a pretty interesting year for ROK. The site has grown tremendously and I'm happy to have been a part of it. In celebration of the year's end, I thought it prudent to take the time to look back at some of my best articles, some of which could be of value to the newer denizens of ROK. While I feel that all my articles can offer substantial value to readers, these four hit most directly on substantive lessons and themes that are crucial to this website's mission and message.

1. Why This Site Will Always Be Creepy

ROK's growth this year and involvement in several viral episodes has brought a lot of hate this way. As per usual, much of this hate resorts to the use of terms like "creepy" to describe anyone who writes for or reads articles on this website and those like it.

This article will illustrate to you clearly why such claims are not only empty, but entirely impossible to stem and generally unworthy of engagement. Male self-improvement is has always been "creepy" to women and always will be. Your job is not to care.

2. How Black America Has Predicted Our Future

This was my first post of 2013. Plenty of time is spent in the manosphere discussing the future of American (and, more broadly, western) society and the some of the negative trends spreading within it. This discussion still draws much interest today in the manosphere and I suspect it will continue to do so for the foreseeable future. This article will prove useful for those looking for a precedent capable of showing what our society's potential destination may look like.

3. What Do You Bring To The Table?

Self-reflection is crucial for any male concerned with self-improvement, but is too often forgotten by those who are romantically frustrated. When striving to obtain more socially from others, men (like women) must always be aware of what they bring to the table. Never lose sight of this or delude yourself into thinking it isn't worth paying attention to. If you want quality in your romantic life, you must do all you can to ensure that you are of quality yourself.

4. How Thirsty Men Kill Everyone's Game

Contrary to popular belief, feminists are not the biggest enemy of the red-pill male. That role is occupied by other men – white knights, simps, and genuinely thirsty individuals. It is imperative that all males concerned with self-improvement understand the behavior associated with these men, and avoid it at all costs.

Bonus: Effortless Attraction

This post was written at the end of December 2012, but contains a message so crucial that I've deemed it worthy of space in this review. The post answers several fundamental questions: What are we striving for here at ROK? What is the end game, the goal? What do we hope to accomplish? What is the point of "game" and the red pill?

This article answers all of those questions and can quiet those who claim that "game" (and sites like ROK that promote it along with the red pill truths inherent to it) is nothing more than useless misogyny that can benefit no sensible man. There is a benefit here, and it is one that all young men concerned with substantive self-improvement should strive to obtain.

ROK has taken many steps forward in 2013 in what has been quite an interesting ride. With these messages in mind, here's hoping we can all make 2014 even more remarkable than its predecessor.

Why All Men Should Make Peace With The Grim Reaper

December 30, 2013 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

You are going to die. It happens to everyone. It is an absolute certainty. There is nothing you can do to avoid it. People hang on and live their lives like their days are unlimited, but they are not. You hear of wealthy old men getting re-married well into their 80s, still sitting on the board of their company and starting new subsidiaries. You can marvel at their tenacity but death eventually catches up with us all.

It is worth setting aside a little time to think into this reality. Not many people want or like to think about death, they just carry on as if life will last forever. About the closest people get to it, is writing a will and planning for their children and spouses when they are gone, but that only deals with the material assets you leave behind. It doesn't pay attention to the actual process of death and letting go.

We reel from the subject because it's morbid and sad. It hangs heavy on our consciousness and our brain staggers like a robot in malfunction – we turn away. Logically, if you clearly allow yourself to embrace the concept of death, it is the most important thing that is going to happen to you outside of your birth, which you had no control over and little recollection of. You can't brush death off with some macho talk – it requires considerable contemplation.

How can you consider and accept your own death?

I believe that a man who has prepared himself for death is a much better man. He is free from one of the most primal fears. He is able to clear his consciousness and literally live like there is no tomorrow. What primarily governs the animal state is the fear of death. A dog, a cat, a bird, a rat, they are constantly on edge living with a low level fear, because they know and are painfully aware that their animal life is threatened and they could lose their life at any time. The animal kingdom is far more brutal than the human realm; it pays little heed to feelings, compassion, individual needs and so forth.

Several things happened to me in my life that forced me to confront death. Firstly when I was 16, we were travelling on a freeway in Europe. They drive fast, the roads are narrower and we were in heavy rush hour traffic. My mother drifted off to sleep for an instant, in the fast lane at 140+ km/h and just slightly clipped the tail of the car in the slow lane next to us. As she jolted herself awake she yanked the wheel far too hard and span the car. We span 180 degrees and skidded backwards down the freeway with oncoming trucks and cars all around us. I can only imagine what it must have looked like; something from a Die Hard movie.

I was in the back seat asleep. It was a long trip and I'd nodded off. I woke to the sound of squealing tires and the car lurching about as it span. I clamped my eyes shut and prayed, "OK, I can die but please make it quick and painless." I resolved my death, I was ready. I was not afraid, tense or riveted with fear. In that half awake, half asleep state, I was able to know it was really happening, but also soften it as a kind of dream.

The luck of the gods was with us that day

My father told me years later he'd put brand new low profile tires on the car the week before the trip and he credited a few hundred bucks of new rubber with saving our lives. Old tires would have blown and the car would have flipped. We scratched along the crash barrier going backwards at 70-80mph, and somehow, my father grabbed the wheel from the passenger seat, span the car back around and we stopped in the emergency lane.

My father is quite an adventurer. At 71 he had a triple bypass and heart value replacement and 6 weeks later was out on his yacht in the Mediterranean in 15 foot seas and 40 knots of wind. I've been helicopter skiing with him. He was 68, I was 38, and I couldn't keep up. When we were young kids he took us off sailing for the weekend, we set out from port and the weather forecast was wrong. It was so rough we had no chance to turn back for port, so he sailed us single handed in 60-70 mile an hour winds for 8 hours straight until we got to the port we'd set out for. It was the safest thing to do.

He retired at 50, my mom left him and he's spent years going all over the world on adventures with various girlfriends. It earned him the nickname of James Bond, after getting caught in a fairly heavy avalanche and breaking a couple of ribs. Anyway, I side track. That's an ode to my old man whose still alive and saved my life on a number of occasions.

So the car was all scraped up along one side, but perfectly drivable. We were getting back in to continue our journey when the police pulled up, and we realized another car had also gone off the road because of us. Insurance paper work ensued, no charges were made and we carried on within an hour or so. That was my first real brush with death.

My second brush with death was from a huge financial loss

I wiped out everything I owned trying to learn to trade futures. Back in the day you had a real broker you could phone. He held my positions in the markets until I owed him money. He believed in my trades and he backed me up as much as he could, but finally with the market going crazy against me, he had to close the position. He was almost in tears on the phone. Within a week, my trades would have all come good and netted me a cool ½ mil. – instead I was barely able to pay the rent.

I was quite deeply depressed for a few days after that and I began considering the possibility of killing myself. It was an interesting experience. I had it enough under control to remain lucid and yet again I found myself at such peace with the whole concept of dying that it didn't hold much sway over me either way. I didn't have a gun, but I found a way onto the roof of my condo and sat up there for an afternoon, wondering what the 20 story drop would be like. I became so peaceful with the idea of it, that I almost felt compelled to go ahead and jump, but then at the same time it now seemed unnecessary. Death could wait for another day. I moved cities and rebuilt my fortune and got on with a new adventure.

After that day, I carried on meditating and thinking into death. To the point now that I have no real fear of it. A year or so later, I proved it to myself. With bank accounts partially restored from a new business venture, I went on a ski trip with my father. We flew into Austria in a tiny turbo prop that was way overloaded with passengers and ski gear. They'd already taken a load of luggage off the plane it was that packed. They were pushing the limit.

We had to swoop low over the mountains to the air strip, but the cross wind was too strong and the first approach to land was aborted. As we touched down, the wing nearly scarped the runway because the cross wind hit us. The atmosphere became tense in the plane. I am sure it was probably safer than it looked, but the turbulence and bad weather caught the plane and tipped it on its side as we circled for a second turn. Hand luggage went flying and the mountains skimmed past my window.

Half the passengers were clenching their seats

I sat there like Brad Pitt in Fight Club actually hoping the plane would go down in a spectacular ball of flames. I was ready. It was a great experience. By embracing death in that perilous moment I actually felt so wonderfully alive and present in the moment. I was liberated, free, conscious, happy, even excited at the prospect of crashing and burning. This is probably one of the most basic life lessons you can learn. It should be taught to 10 year olds. I can only imagine the socialists squawking as I dangle their kids off the roof of the school cafeteria, but honestly, removing the fear of death is what makes a man a man.

I've read a few autobiographies of soldiers who are forced to some extent to rationalize their own deaths. It's not exactly something the army teaches, but the nature of their work makes them confront the possibility. It seems the better ones that enjoy their work, have actually set aside this fear of death and it is that factor, as much as skill and training that enables them to remain so clear and focused when under fire.

Just as Roosh has pointed out in the past, it is primal animal fear that prevents us from approaching a beautiful woman. In times gone by, her prospective mate, father, brother, tribal leader, etc, may have been ready to club us to death. The same principal applies to all life. The nagging fear is always there but with practice you can learn to override it, ignore it and lose it almost entirely. Then you really do feel free, and better yet you are able to remain clear, relaxed and focused on the task at hand. Very important if you are a sniper in battle.

Big wave surfers, extreme skiiers and snowboarders, base jumpers, sky divers, racing drivers and so forth have also rationalized their fear of death to some extent, at least as far as being able to push it aside, to enjoy the moment and remain focused enough to function.

Another close encounter

I went out surfing 6am one morning on a new beach I wasn't familiar with. Literally no one was there. I couldn't understand why, as I'd heard it was an excellent break. That was until I paddled out and like the idiot novice I discovered the most brutal waves, with no form and a vicious under tow. I was royally screwed and there was no one around to spot me or call for help. I began to panic, but knew that would be the end of me. After a good half hour battling the current and getting frequently held under, I washed up on the rocks and resolved to be more cautious in the future.

I'm not suggesting you go and start having brushes with death. I am simply saying that a man who has thought into his own death, and learned to control the animal fear, is not only far happier and more free in spirit because of it, but also far more able to remain calm, clear and functional under pressure. Bring that into all your life and I honestly think you cannot fail in whatever you decide to do. Life is now your playground and although your demise will be sad to those you leave behind, from your perspective it will just be another experience.

3 Ways To Make Better New Year's Resolutions

December 31, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

It's more than passé to say that New Years' resolutions are cheesy and useless. Most people hate them, ultimately, because they never complete them — even thinking about resolutions calls up past failures, and the cognitive dissonance of failing at goals and wanting to make new ones is too much to bear.

And why do people never fulfill their resolutions? Because they suck at making the right ones. Just as water always runs downhill, humans will always take the path of least resistance without the proper plan and incentive structure, at least over a long time horizon like a year. Jefe recently told you how to reflect on how you've developed in the past year — In concert with that, here are three tips to help maximize your resolutions going forward:

1. Make it actionable

You often see people make resolutions you know they will never accomplish, and the majority of the time it's because the goal carries with it no reasonable plan of action. "I want to get better with my money" is a meandering goal without any implied path, and will soon be forgotten. Conversely, "I will read a personal finance book and create a budget" embeds the plan within the goal itself, and is much more likely to stick.

2. Make it quantifiable

This is another way of accomplishing the first tip. Roosh has written that having goals with numbers is not a sustainable path to fulfillment and happiness, and I agree with him.

That said, tracking your progress on something helps you definitively cite your improvement. Instead of saying “I want to read more,” this year I said “I want to read 25 books.” The satisfaction of accomplishing numbered goals is not going to lead to eternal bliss (for what it’s worth, I’m going to fall about 3 short), but its utility in building the resume of your existence is undeniable.

3. Make it reasonable

Everybody knows the guys who set pie-in-the-sky goals. Take the “Resolutioners” at the gym—they know deep down that it’s irrational, but they act as if that they’re going to work off 20 years of neglect with 3 weeks of sets on the leg press machine. They inevitably fail and quit. Don’t overload yourself with expectations. Acknowledge that any type of self-improvement is a painstaking, stepwise process. Better to shoot for a 20% change and hit it than a 40% change and quit after a month. I’m not saying you shouldn’t “dream big” over the long term, but recognize that there are only so many hours in a day, and only so many days in a year.

New Year’s Resolutions, for most people, amount to little more than useless bullshit. Employ these tips to separate yourself. A year from now, you’ll be able to reflect proudly on what you’ve accomplished.

How America Makes Smart People Stupid

America has an odd way of making smart people stupid.

I went to a college full of people who were bright on paper. I was friends with people who were at the top of their classes, in classes chock full of smart people. Yet if you talked to these people about anything beyond their narrow field of expertise, they knew nothing. And not only did they know nothing, they had no desire to know more than nothing; even a subject of wide appeal like human nature wouldn't get their interest. They were philistines in every area of human thought, except their own – and that too bored them. Political science majors would squint in confusion when you asked them about political philosophy, as if you had asked them how to refine uranium into fissile plutonium.

I came to college hoping to be engaged intellectually, among fellow students. I didn't find that. People who did fancy themselves as intellectuals were awkward, weird, boring – and their conversations were about the nerdy trivia of Star Wars and video games. Screwing around with girls was far more mentally engaging – at least that drew laughs and satisfied my penis. Being curious didn't get you any closer to an internship with Goldman Sachs or a spot at Johns Hopkins' medical school, so it went ignored among the students.

In an intellectual sense, they were effeminate – they would only want to know something when society would reward them for it – which is the same reason why so few women opt for the thankless job of editing Wikipedia. There was no intellectual interest independent of professional gain. There was none of that masculine desire to know for knowing's sake, like a medieval monk might have. At most, people would spout their personal feelings about something, ignore what everyone else said, and pat themselves on the back for 'being so expressive.'

Among the intelligent in America, the chief object of study is learning to conform

You would try to figure out what other people were thinking, and parrot it accordingly. Thankfully, Orwellian campus newspapers made it easy to conform. It was hard to even find the words to dissent. When someone did dissent, you were sure to hear about it, in harsh scolding tones, with shock and anger. Personally, I had a teacher 'correct' me when I failed to include an 'or she' when I correctly used 'he' to refer to both sexes.

When you'd say something controversial, and it was logically convincing, they would fall silent. They knew what you were saying was taboo – but they couldn't prove you wrong. Or they may have even sensed that you were right – but your position was so taboo they had to stay silent. They wouldn't give your argument an honest look, lest they become convinced and believe something different from everyone else. Controversial beliefs were just a liability to a bright ambitious future as an up-and-coming mandarin. So it was imperative to walk around with a protective cage around the mind – thinking impure thoughts would only keep them from fitting in and having a successful career.

Maybe they were so unused to a clear framing of debate that everything you said confused them. And there were the philistines – principally girls – who'd say "how do you even know this?!" – to shame you for knowing something that they didn't.

At best, people would come and tell you they agree with you in private – and then go right back to parroting the herd's message. They could not even manage to stay silent, lest they raise doubt by withholding their agreement. It was like a communist party meeting where every vote ran 100% in favor of the party position, yet there was no Stalin or Mao there to send them off to a death camp if they abstained.

A few men retain their curiousity, but they go to comical lengths to cloak their dissent behind a studied pose of ignorance. Paul Graham, a celebrated Silicon Valley capitalist, wrote an essay about the taboos of our time, and how they make certain truths unutterable. Yet he could not bring himself to mention any of those very taboos. That which goes unsaid goes unquestioned. Men of power have refused their duty to live not by lies, as Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn wrote:

> And the simplest and most accessible key to our self-neglected liberation lies right here: Personal non-participation in lies. Though lies conceal everything, though lies embrace everything, but not with any help from me.
> This opens a breach in the imaginary encirclement caused by our inaction. It is the easiest thing to do for us, but the most devastating for the lies. Because when people renounce lies it simply cuts short their existence. Like an infection, they can exist only in a living organism…
> So in our timidity, let each of us make a choice: Whether consciously, to remain a servant of falsehood-of course, it is not out of inclination, but to feed one's family, that one raises his children in the spirit of lies-or to shrug off the lies and become an honest man worthy of respect both by one's children and > contemporaries.

Occasionally I go to political events and see a similar pattern. On the right, among Republicans and conservatives, the only people making bold claims are crackpot audience members. The crackpots may have poor powers of reasoning – but at least they're using them. Then there are the rich backers who bring in the speaker – they are too polite by half to discuss his ideas in earnest. They are all desperately waiting for a man to step up, and say what they are too cowardly to say themselves. Deep down, they know what must be said, but to a man, no one has the balls to say it.

You can see this dynamic on display in this clip, in which Allen West discusses the nature of Islam. Regardless of your position on Islam or Allen West, what's happening is obvious – the crowd is waiting for a man to say what everyone in the room believes about Islam. The greying panelists hem and haw empty platitudes until Allen West takes the microphone, and speaks forcefully (skip to ~0:48):

The West is stuck in that very moment, in wait, for a man possessed of conviction to stride to the podium and defiantly state the unutterable truths of our day.

Pussy Is Seasonal

January 1, 2014 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

With the possible exception of Santa Claus, no man does better with bitches over the holidays. Like nectarines or oranges, pussy is a seasonal fruit that starts desiccating in the fall and all but disappears from stores around Thanksgiving. If you're a forager who didn't squirrel away something during bountiful times, you'll be fighting over scraps during the starving season.

I've never met a single, straight man who likes the holidays, and then also does well with women. And, if you think about it, it makes perfect sense: the holidays are a massive inconvenience to the average bachelor. They offer nothing to him. If you're in a big city or college town, girls go home to wherever they transplanted from. In other cases, friends, cousins, college roommates, ex-boyfriends, and every other possible pest comes out of the woodwork to "visit." Girls enter a psychological state of mind that's antagonistic to banging. And, that only speaks to those who have managed to remain single through the winter. Many of the better chicks snatched up short-term "boyfriends" in the fall and started to disappear from the public by the time Daylight Savings ended. Even the girls you are banging can become flakier when holiday commitments start rearing their ugly heads.

Every venue you use to meet women gets more desolate, with the quantity and quality of women dropping precipitously. Do you meet girls in bars and dance spots? Suddenly the already unfavorable ratios are twice as bad. Do you frequent cafes and stores? Well, look around. Now "families" and ugly girls have replaced the eligible hotties who where in those same chairs in August. The trend even applies to the virtual world. From every corner of the North American continent, reports are coming in that response rates on online-dating sites are down to abysmal figures. Guys who are getting responses are mostly engaging in tepid one- or two-message conversations that die out quickly.

All of these trends are threefold if you're in the Northern latitudes where the cold and dark conspire to make the famine even more brutal.

We all know the Aesop fable about the ant and the grasshopper. While the ant diligently stored away for the winter, the grasshopper goofed off. When the winter came along, the grasshopper is forced to beg the ant for food. The asshole ant responds by telling the grasshopper to dance and sing away the winter like he'd done the summer. "Idleness," the fable teaches, "brings want." I start the summer like the ant, swearing to stash away some quality trim for the holidays, only to keep postponing it until it's too late.

With my regulars away or flaking, I recently found myself in a grasshopper moment. I was working in an empty café when a plain-looking 5.5 sat near me. Only weeks earlier, I would have shaken my head at her clumsy work—that rendered her at least a solid point below her potential—and returned to my book. Instead, I texted my buddy a description. "I'm thinking about approaching."

Thankfully, he talked me off the ledge, but–like every year at this time–I'm grateful the holidays are over.

5 Lessons From One Year Of Game

January 1, 2014 | by Alfred Burroughs | Link | Original Link

At the beginning of 2013, and at the age of 30, I made a commitment to get good at game. My pre-game lay count was at 7, and now it is at 14. It has been an intense journey so far. And I hope to provide some inspiration when I share with you that in one year a man can accomplish what previously took him 12 years.

The change isn't limited to the quantity of sex, but also includes changes in my thoughts and beliefs that come from a sustained dedication to the game. Here, in celebration of my first-year anniversary as well as the doubling of my notch-count, I am going to highlight my primary lessons for ROK readers. I should note that these are not truths that I could have ever adopted instantaneously. They spread through the body gradually. They are lived truths, emerging out of months of persistent action.

1. Game and the economy of emotions

The pre-game attitude is emotionally wasteful! My pre-game sex involved heavy emotional investment, reckless and unwise attachments, and the consequent highs and lows. I used to consider meeting each girlfriend a "major life event" similar to moving to a new city or finding a new job. Not regarding girls as major life events leads to a steadier and more solid emotional life, which further supports your commitment to improving at game and increases your value as a man.

The way I have come to assess the efficiency of my own emotional workings is through a single indicator: the capacity to be focused, motivated, and productive when I am alone. The post-game emotional paradigm is a paradigm that allows me to push my life forward when I am away from women, instead of dwelling in pointless insecurities, or being distracted away from my own personal journey. The post-game attitude is emotionally efficient.

2. Game and the balance of discipline and pleasure

Being in the game is, ideally, the disciplined pursuit of pleasure. Working on this balance itself is a very transferable and generally useful skill in other areas of life. For guys like me who are hard-working, more emphasis should be placed on “pleasure,” while “discipline” should be emphasized for guys who are more hedonistic.

The pleasure-driven attitude allows me to enjoy the fun of the game, especially the kind of fun that comes unexpectedly. On the other hand, the discipline-driven attitude gives me resilience and the work ethic I need to stick with it. Being discipline-driven allows me to stop questioning the merit of every single action; should I go out tonight? Should I do this approach? A disciplined mind is a mind that is always equipped with a default answer in these situations: yes.

When I make the mistake of focusing on the discipline of it alone, my game suffers immediately because of the absence of the fun vibe in my interaction with women. When I make the mistake of focusing on the pleasure alone, although I can discover more and enjoy more, I become vulnerable to the outcome. That is why the ideal method consists of the balance between pleasure and discipline.

3. Game and the balance of responsibility and acceptance

You should neither take responsibility for everything nor accept everything. This is the same idea as picking your battles. Personally, I accept that not every girl is susceptible to my game. I also accept that I cannot adopt any style of game, and that my method should be rooted in my character and who I am as a man. By contrast, I take responsibility for consistent practice, consistent reflection (e.g., keeping a journal and studying the resources), and for revising my assumptions in the face of new information about women.

My pre-game attitude was heavily based on acceptance, while my early post-game attitude was heavily based on responsibility. The first attitude leads to passivity and inaction, while the second attitude leads to frustration. The ideal method of game is colored with the balance between acceptance and responsibility.

4. Game and the no-excuse mindset

The most important reason for the no-excuse mindset is the existence of “low-hanging fruits.” Believe it or not, there are girls out there who are hoping to meet guys. And that putting enough effort will inevitably place you in the right place and right time to encounter them. These girls are relatively easy and fun to game. They don’t actively block your progress. They are open to developing attraction for you. They are open to entering into a mode where they are putting in effort to maintain your attention. After grasping this truth, you will have no excuse not to get laid, and your world will change forever.

5. Game and the masculine culture

Getting good at game transformed my view of masculinity, my relationship to other men, and my standards of friendships. The game is an essential component in developing a larger appreciation and awareness of what it means to be a man and what it means to lead a life of value and high character. As I hold myself against certain standards, I cannot help but distinguish my fellow men based on their courage, honesty, authenticity, and a desire for excellence. The culture of masculinity is worth celebrating precisely because of the way it can express these qualities. It is my belief that you cannot get too deep into game without a deep reverence for your own masculinity.

Conclusion

The sustained commitment to improving at game leads to foundational changes in perspective. You grasp the essential necessity of maintaining certain balances (the emotional balance, the balance between pleasure and discipline, and the balance between acceptance and responsibility), and you live the no-excuse mindset that is informed by masculine values. Despite all its challenges and pains, game is ultimately a rewarding journey toward building a more mature and a more complex character.

Is Online Dating Ruining Game?

January 2, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

When I first got on OKCupid, I sent out a few messages and got no replies. Since I was curious why, I decided to make a fake account as a woman. I used some photos of a moderately cute female model. I wrote the profile by cutting and pasting text from a girl on the opposite coast. Then I waited, and watched the response.

Within days, my fake account had close to a hundred messages.

No wonder I wasn't getting replies – I couldn't even read all the messages my fake account was getting. When I actually did look at the messages, they were terrible. The profile only gets a couple messages a week now, but they're still awful. Here are a few recent ones:

> Hiiii I'm Johnny
> […]
> you have a rare beauty
> Hey my name is rob. You are really beautiful and i was wondering if you would like to get to know eachother and maybe have some fun in the bedroom sometime > your main profile picture is captivating! You have great eyes!

> you wanna get dicked down or what?
> […]
> hi
> […]
> Want to grab a coffee or drinks sometime?
> […]
> hello beautiful
> […]
> Heyy how are you? You seem lovely

If you think a normal girl would respond to any of these openers, please seek therapy from a qualified professional. I'd say take yourself out of the gene pool, but that would be redundant.

I made this account three years ago. Online dating has only grown since then.

What's Wrong With Online Dating?

Online dating allows men to do hundreds of low-risk approaches in minutes each day of girls they might not otherwise meet. It also allows women to receive hundreds of approaches from men who would never approach her in real life.

This dynamic hurts men by numbing their social skills. Men who would normally have to learn real world social cues, overcome social challenges, and interact with women face to face, are able to sit at home, blast twenty messages a day, and avoid self-improvement.

This dynamic hurts women by inflating their egos. Women who would normally receive zero male attention are able to get hundreds of offers for sex and validation from desperate men. By using deceptive camera angles and words like "curvy" rather than fat, secret internet fatties are able to experience male attention as if they were actually attractive.

All Social Networks Inflate Women's Egos

When it comes to validation, every site is a dating site for women. Girls posting their pictures on Facebook, Instagram, and Tumblr get as much, if not more validation than they would from men on online dating sites. Plus, the validation on social networks is public, allowing women to show it off to their friends and social circle.

The models I'm friends with on Facebook regularly receive a hundred likes and comments from men on each photo they post – but they only "like" the comments that have game. When a girl who'd been in an Axe Body-Spray commercial as "the hot chick" posted her new selfie the only comment she liked was a guy who simply wrote "gross." Two weeks later, there were photos on Facebook of them making out at a trendy LA Club, which none of her beta orbiters "liked."

Social networks and online dating exaggerate existing imbalances in the sexual marketplace. The rich get richer and the poor get poorer. Before social networking and online dating, an attractive woman might have a couple of men to choose in her social circle. Now she has two-hundred on Tinder. A regular guy interested in her has to cut through the noise of hundreds of thirsty betas.

Fortunately, that's all beta attention is – just noise.

Could Thirsty Men Actually Help You?

Imagine you lived in a world full of fat chicks (for many, this won't require much imagination). Imagine that these fat women were constantly eye-fucking you, making passes at you, and trying to molest your dick. Now imagine a cute girl-next-door type walks up and starts talking to you.

Do the fat chicks hurt her chances? Of course not, because they aren't attractive. Sure, getting hit on by a fat chick might be validating, but most men wouldn't take her attempt seriously. In fact, it might even hurt your self-image. "Why do these losers think they could get with me?" Ah, now you're thinking bitchy hot girl thoughts.

Fucking a beta chump is about as exciting to women as fucking a land-whale is to you. If you're a man with game, some omega writing "hi – ur hot!" on OKCupid doesn't hurt your chances any more than a fatty waddling up to you hurts the chances of a lingerie model who wants to fuck you.

Getting hit on all the time might sound like a fantasy, but would you really want ugly women hitting on you when you're just trying to buy coffee or ride the bus? Women might be validated by betas, but they're not turned on by them. And women love sex.

The experience of an attractive woman is constant male attention from dudes who can't even act normal around her. A low hum of desperation. It's the same feeling you get when you pass a homeless person mumbling "change." You don't even notice him. Most people have learned to block out the homeless who are thirsty for money, the way most women have learned to block out men who are thirsty for sex.

Game actually works better on attractive women. They're so used to horrible approaches, that they appreciate the contrast of a confident man more, the way you'd appreciate a beautiful feminine woman more if you lived in a land of rude androgynous fatties. (Again, not much imagination required.)

Men will board a plane and go live in a foreign country just because the women are more feminine. Women will write love letters to convicted murderers just to experience a few minutes of alpha. The dynamics are the same. Betas are the fat chicks of the dating world – and there are more betas than ever.

Men Are Weaker, Game is Stronger

Thirsty omegas actually inflate your worth in the sexual marketplace, the same way the obesity epidemic inflates the value of attractive women.

In every society, the men and women deserve each other. Although American women are worse than ever, American men are too. Most are emasculated, unassertive, and unattractive. If you're interested in game, self-development, or reading a site like this, you're already in the top 10%. You're the "hot girl."

Remember how I said online dating hurts men? The same way social networks inflate women's egos, technological distractions harm men's self-improvement.

Pornography and video games allow men to receive a false sense of accomplishment. Men who've never lifted a barbell can log onto World of Warcarft and live as a warrior-god ravaging the plains of Azeroth. Men who'd never meet a model in real life can now watch twenty having an orgy in two clicks. Between Call of Duty and Bang Bus, it's amazing men even make it out of their parent's basement. Think modernity is making women worse? The same social and technological forces are affecting men too.

If you have game, you have more sexual opportunity than ever before in recorded history. Only in the past sixty years has safe affordable birth control become commonplace, only in the past twenty has casual sex become the norm, and only in the past five have you been able to go online and contact hundreds of women from around the world using your phone.

When I first tried online dating, I was just starting my journey with game. I spent the following years improving myself, approaching, and learning. Now, getting laid through online dating is as easy as ordering a pizza. Looking back, it wasn't online dating that needed to change, it was me.

Yes, if you only spend time online, your social skills will atrophy. But you can't put your dick in a computer. Do online dating right, and you'll have lots of real world sexual experiences to show for it. Technology is creating new challenges, but ruining game isn't one of them. Game is more powerful than ever.

Pregnancy Is No Excuse To Be Fat And Gross

January 2, 2014 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

There's an epidemic of land whales in first world countries bitching about post pregnancy bellies, blaming even their own children for being fat. I'm going to go over the math and the facts of pregnancy weight gain. Next time you see a woman with pudge, blaming her children for it, you can use logic to counter her excuses.

"You can eat for two!"

Whoever started this myth has affected more women worldwide than any form of the "patriarchy." According to leading doctors, women should be eating an extra 300-500 calories a day to accommodate the baby during pregnancy. This amounts to maybe a pound week at most of weight again. The Institute of Medicine recommends a weight gain of 25-35lbs during the whole pregnancy. That means a chick who is 120lb before pregnancy will be at most 155lb before the baby comes out. So when you hear a lady gain upwards of 50 lbs, she's not just harming herself but the child as well. Obesity increases the risk of infection, c-section probability, thrombosis, gestational diabetes for the mother, and can even impact the child. It's not just a female aesthetic issue but one of child endangerment.

Women who gain too much during their pregnancies are similar to women who smoke during theirs. At least society is willing to socially shame the smokers—we need to start fat shaming pregnant women who gain too much for the protection of their fetus. It's the right thing to do.

Once the baby comes out

This is when the bogus math comes in for new mothers. Yes, you won't have a flat stomach in a week, but it can happen realistically in a year with a good plan. Let's presume we are using the example of the chick who is 155 in the delivery room. According to data from Webmd, only a third of the weight will stay post-pregnancy as body fat. So when that woman leaves the hospital, she's at least 15-20 lbs lighter. That takes her down to 135-140 lbs. If the new mother breastfeeds, performs mild exercise, and eats carefully, even a 155 lb whale can slim back down to 120 within a year.

Shame fat mothers

After a year of pregnancy, a woman has absolutely no excuse to be overweight. They're just fat chicks who happen to be mothers. Every time you see a woman who's been pregnant a year ago or more and she's still big, call her out with subtle remarks. A good subtle shaming comment is to ask the fat mother her due date. It will be awkward for you to do so, but we have an obligation as a society to help fat mothers be more aesthetically pleasing. It's not just for our dicks but for the betterment of all women.

Gaining too much weight during a pregnancy can harm children and their mothers. Ladies, please put down that cheeseburger like it's thalidomide. Even if the side effects aren't as highly publicized as thalidomide, being fat and pregnant is child endangerment, and being a fat mother is just plain gross.

The Frenchman Who Took A Stand Against Socialism

January 2, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This book warns against the dangers of socialism and how its hijacking of a nation's laws will erode the liberties of citizens. It was written by French politician Frederic Bastiat in 1849.

Bastiat argues that the purpose of law is to protect a person's liberty and property but no more. It should not be used by the state in order to burden its citizens, but that's exactly what socialism requires. Instead of being used to protect liberty, the laws of socialist states specifically impinges on liberty while taking the property of others. This is sanctioned by a large percentage of the population because it's human nature to want to avoid the pain of work by taking what has been earned from another man's labor:

> Now, labor being in itself a pain, and man being naturally inclined to avoid pain, it follows, and history proves it, that wherever plunder is less burdensome than labor, it prevails; and neither religion nor morality can, in this case, prevent it from prevailing. When does plunder cease, then? When it becomes less burdensome and more dangerous than labor. It is very evident that the proper aim of law is to oppose the powerful obstacle of collective force to this fatal tendency; that all its measures should be in favor of property, and against

> …as long as it is admitted that the law may be diverted from its true mission, that it may violate property instead of securing it, everybody will be wanting to manufacture law, either to defend himself against plunder, or to organize it for his own profit.
> When a portion of wealth passes out of the hands of him who has acquired it, without his consent, and without compensation, to him who has not created it, whether by force or by artifice, I say that property is violated, that plunder is perpetrated.

The result is the legal plunder of certain classes by other classes. In other words, socialism. Bastiac argues that the injustice of inequality does not make right the injustice of plunder. The law should not be used to create a “self-serving fountain” for people to grab what they want simply because they have less.

> But how is [legal plunder] to be distinguished? Very easily. See whether the law takes from some persons that which belongs to them, to give to others what does not belong to them. See whether the law performs, for the profit of one citizen, and, to the injury of others, an act which this citizen cannot perform without committing a crime.
> Here I am encountering the most popular prejudice of our time. It is not considered enough that law should be just, it must be philanthropic. It is not sufficient that it should guarantee to every citizen the free and inoffensive exercise of his faculties, applied to his physical, intellectual, and moral development; it is required to extend well-being, instruction, and morality, directly over the nation. This is the fascinating side of socialism.

An absense of liberty is required for any state to legally take from one class to give to another.

> When prosperous, we should not, it is true, have to thank the State for our success; but when unfortunate, we should no more think of taxing it with our disasters, than our peasants think of attributing to it the arrival of hail or of frost.

Socialists want to tinker with societies from the top down to create their ideal utopias because they believe humanity is inherently flawed. Only they have the vision to make it better.

> This tendency of the human race, it must be admitted, is greatly thwarted, particularly in our country, by the fatal disposition, resulting from classical teaching, and common to all politicians, of placing themselves beyond mankind, > to arrange, organize, and regulate it, according to their fancy.

> …liberty consists, not only in the right granted, but in the power given to man, to exercise, to develop his faculties under the empire of justice, and under the protection of the law.

Socialists believe that citizens need constant guidance and instruction from the state, never to be trusted with their own choices in regard to education or commerce. This requires an authoritarian government with a thick book of law to uphold their vision of morality and righteousness, which often goes against human nature. Therefore, liberty and socialism are mutually exclusive.

Ask a socialist what facet of man's life should be untouched by state interference and you will find a short list. Nearly everything must be regulated. Sadly, in spite of this, the lot of the average man (and woman) are quick to pick socialism over liberty, because such a scheme requires less labor of them while they can receive legal plunder from those who are more successful. If you're on the fence about socialism and whether it is just or not, I recommend this book to put you on the right path.

Why Is WordPress Employee Kevin Conboy Threatening To Delete Blogs He Disagrees With?

January 3, 2014 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

I've been using WordPress for several years now. I love WordPress as a technology, but more importantly, I love what WordPress stands for: the free exchange of information between individuals, and the triumph of raw ideas over the governments and corporations that would seek to control them.

Sadly though, it looks like WordPress might not be as trustworthy as we had hoped. On Twitter earlier today, a man named Kevin Conboy (pictured below) appears to have threatened to have a blog removed from the internet because he found the content offensive:

> @alternatekev Hunting down cowards on the internet because they've just collided some worlds for me and they aren't going to like it.
> @jaydot http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2013/12/30/sociopathy-is-increasing-in-america/ and http://www.returnofkings.com/24142/why-did-karl-halverson-pierson-attack-his-school-and-kill-a-pretty-girl

> @jaydot if i find enough evidence of incitations for violence in the first link, I can have them removed from the internet.

Since then, he has gone on the defensive and protected his Twitter account. But the tweets have been preserved by the author of the blog that Conboy was offended by, who issued a statement today:

> "We hear so much about liberal tolerance and open-mindedness, yet in practice it's hard, and getting harder, to find actual examples of anything but the opposite behaviour
> WordPress is a great platform, and a model for other hosting companies. They have provided a free service that has fostered a true renaissance of ideas …. One wonders if WordPress.com is aware that one of their employees is a gung-ho advocate of disappearing wordpress-hosted blogs for writing things that offend his exquisite sensibilities? I'm not a fly on the wall at WordPress headquarters, but I can't imagine an employee so transparently antagonistic to the first principle of a company to expand the means with which free thinking men can communicate to the masses would be the sort of saboteur with whom the company wishes to associate."

The other article was one published here at Return Of Kings, which does not run on WordPress.com.

> Enemy of free speech @alternatekev threatens to delete blogs he disagrees with. Disappointed in @wordpressdotcom for employing such thugs

> — Viva La Manosphere (@VManosphere) January 3, 2014

> I wonder if @wordpress knows about their employee @alternatekev threatening to have blogs he doesn't like taken down?
> — Frost (@FreedomTwenty5) January 2, 2014

> Really disappointed in @wordpressdotcom for letting @alternatekev run unchecked threatening to delete the blogs of people he dislikes.
> — Heart Machine (@Clash1e) January 3, 2014

So who is Kevin Conboy? According to his LinkedIn profile, he has been a key member of the WordPress team for the past four years, with the following experience:

> "Complete user interface and interaction design ownership for Polldaddy.com. I've got designs and interfaces running on WordPress.com, Akismet.com and more. I managed the incredible team that designed, built and launched restaurants.wordpress.com and the free Confit WordPress theme. Designed free Ideation & Intent WordPress theme. Coded HTML 5, CSS 3, PHP 5.3, jQuery and WordPress plugins and themes for Polldaddy support sites, various web apps, Polldaddy mobile apps and blogs. Objective-C/Cocoa coding and UI implementation for iOS on iPhone and iPad, initial version accomplished by a team of five in under two weeks. Implemented responsive and hi-res CSS updates across the Automattic web presences, Polldaddy in particular. I have spoken at and organized multiple regional WordCamps, including Denver and Boulder. I have worked at Happiness Bars helping users with WordPress problems at WordCamps, SXSW and more. I provide ongoing organizing and leadership of local WordPress meetups and Happiness Hours. I was the lead organizer and designer for WordCamp Denver 2012, and most likely both for 2013. I have written product announcement blog posts immediately broadcast to over 10 million email subscribers, garnering 600+ WordPress.com likes and 500+ retweets. I've designed UI and done hi-res graphics production for one of the most popular social sharing plugins available for WordPress in the world, as available in Jetpack. Made complete UI overhaul to Polldaddy WordPress plugin. And so. Much. More."

In other words, Conboy is an influential person over at Team WordPress. And while I'm sure he's a talented developer, the real question is: do WordPress users feel comfortable hosting their blogs with a company that employs someone who makes public threats against authors who offend him?

The ongoing Twitter backlash against Conboy suggests that many WordPress users feel the answer is 'No.' Some have even suggested that if WordPress continues to employ alleged "fascists" such as Conboy, they will be looking into other content management systems.At a time when internet users are growing increasingly concerned with privacy, surveillance, censorship, and the ‘chilling effect’ on free speech that is the necessary result, it is disappointing to see a company which once stood for free expression and the democratization of information – Automattic (the company behind WordPress) – doesn’t seem to have a problem with employing anti-free speech potential fascists such as Kevin Conboy.

How Your Life Can Change In One Year After Swallowing The Red Pill

January 3, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

It was a year ago during my last semester at college. I had a cute, bubbly girl over at my apartment for dinner. We had been on a date the week before and had kissed lightly in the car as I dropped her off. I had planned to make my great grandmother's spaghetti sauce recipe, hoping I'd impress her enough to charm my way into her pants. As I stood near my kitchen stove stirring the sauce, she dropped a bomb in my face.

"We're not having sex tonight, so don't even try."

Needless to say, I didn't end up scoring with that girl one year ago. I got her into the bedroom by playing guitar (I wasn't a total moron), but was too much of a coward to escalate the interaction further. I rationalized in my own mind that it was too early to push for sex, and that she was a nice girl who "wasn't like that." She studied abroad in Australia for most of 2013 – and I'll bet she racked up plenty of notches during the year. Frustrated with my lack of success, I turned to Google.

I explicitly remember typing, "What to do when a girl says we're not having sex," into my search bar. All of a sudden, the world was swung wide open to me. I stumbled across blogs like Roissy and Roosh, and didn't move from my computer chair for probably the next five hours as all the explanations for my lack of success with girls were explained to me in beautiful, concise words.

Little did I know at the time, but these websites that promoted what I later found out was the "Red Pill Belief" would completely change my life around. Thankfully, the knowledge I gained was far more than the ability to simply put my dick into more girls. It changed my life and provided me explanations for my struggles in many facets of life. It is difficult to write things like this and admit how much I struggled and failed prior to this, but I couldn't be more grateful. It has taught me to be a better man and has allowed me to lay a path down that will bring me the most happiness.

Seeing as this is my first post at Return Of Kings for the calendar year, I thought it would be appropriate to recap how far I've come in my one year since the doors were swung open by swallowing the red pill.

Girls

This is the most obvious one, and likely the reason that most guys stumble across the red pill.

When I first found red pill sites, I was 21 years old. I had really only been with one girl my entire life. I had no idea how attraction worked or no real knowledge as how to understand females. I was fortunately not the awkward guy learning pickup – I had the social skills, but not the attraction part of it. The knowledge contained within sites like Return Of Kings teaches you functional skills with women. It teaches you how to build yourself into a better man so that women are naturally going to gravitate towards you. Knowing all of the lines, negs, and LMR tactics in the world won't necessarily do you a lot of good without the inner frame that you are worthy of attracting beautiful women.

Through the red pill, I learned that if I built my life in the right way, I'm more than worthy of having a beautiful woman, or many beautiful women, in my life.

Fitness

Since dropping 85 pounds in high school, I've always been a bit of a fitness nut. I raced endurance sports in college such as triathlon. I lifted weights at the gym 3-4 times a week. However, I suspect my "workout plan" was what many guys who aren't getting results are doing. I'd walk into the gym, think of a few different exercises, try to remember the last time I'd done them, and then go perform them. 3 sets of 10, barely getting heavier with the weight, always fearing I'd throw a shoulder out of socket or hurt my knees while squatting. I never tracked my weight, diet, or bothered to log anything for that matter.

No longer. Every detail of my workout is meticulously logged in a journal and then expectations for the next round are set. Now, when I'm finishing up my second workout of the day, every set is done to the point it takes every fiber of my being to complete my final repetition. The majority of my food is made at home in my own kitchen, cutting out all of the garbage that fast food contains.

I've also noticed that as I've pushed myself harder, my worries about injuries have lessened. I no longer fear the squat or shoulder press. Thanks to the red pill, the amount of weight I can lift, my body composition, and diet have never been better.

Cultivating Beneficial Hobbies And Ridding Yourself Of Poison

As mentioned, I've been a fitness enthusiast for a while. Some of my other hobbies include guitar, writing, cars, and technology. I was fortunate that I had some "cool" hobbies when taking the red pill.

There was a time, long ago though, that I played a lot of video games. World of Warcraft? Give me 14 hours a day, please. I played Halo, Counter-Strike, and Call of Duty competitively, as if I was an athlete.

Pathetic.

Occasionally, I had desires to relapse and fire up the good 'ol WoW account. No longer. I've realized that as a man, you must be improving and challenging yourself. Things that take you out of reality, such as cable TV and video games, simply distract you from the pathetic state that your life is currently in. It may make you feel better to watch reality shows like Jersey Shore, but ultimately you're simply hamsterizing your own existence away.

The red pill has taught me to continue to cultivate current hobbies, and develop new ones. My guitar practice sessions are structured to challenge myself more and more. I try to write everyday at my personal blog. I've also taken a few self defense classes and am starting to learn some Polish for my upcoming trip to Europe.

Thanks to the red pill, I've learned bettering and working on yourself every day will make yourself feel better, and raise your status in the eyes of others.

The 40 Hour Week

I was so thrilled to start my first full-time job out of college in February. It only took me about six months to realize what everyone around here preaches – working at the mercy of a corporation sucks. Truthfully, my job is not that bad at all. My bosses are awesome, I usually enjoy the work, and the pay is good.

But something felt off. It never made sense to me – I thought it was bullshit that I was getting raped on taxes, and never getting any benefit from paying thousands and thousands of dollars to Uncle Sam every year. Through the red pill, I've realized that American society is built upon a form of legal slavery. The high powers want us all to report to work every day, so that they can continue to live their lavish lifestyles. We continue to slave away because we have to in order to continue to fund our lavish lifestyles.

The hardest part is getting out. I'm still struggling with coming to the reality that I will be miserable working in corporate America for the rest of my life. It's a tough pill to swallow, because everyone in my life encouraged me to go to college and get a job. I actually got a job – so I'm far ahead of most current college grads, yet I don't feel happy. I feel like I signed up to fight a war…a war to give my heart and soul to my career to barely make it by.

That's not a battle I'm going to fight. I've been able to lay down a plan, and I'm hoping to be out of the corporate world by the time I'm 30. I may adjust that if I feel my sanity slipping further and further down the hole.

Thanks to the red pill, I've realized that I don't have to sell my soul completely.

Travel

I had never thought about leaving California, much less America. From what everyone had ever told me, America was the best place in the world to live. "The girls are the most beautiful! They're independent! They don't care what you think! They can't cook so you can eat out all the time! They LOVE cats!"

These days, I simply play the game of the American girl. I show them just enough interest so that they're intrigued. I escalate physically at the opportune times on our date. I seed something back at my house that they just “have” to see. Once back home, I pour them another drink and show them the item of interest. I then tell them I want to play them a song on guitar – conveniently located in the bedroom. It’s a monotonous routine, yet it gets me my nut at the end of the day. However, if I do anything out of the ordinary, that sets me off as either a creep or a nice guy, neither of which are attractive to girls in America.

My eyes have been opened recently to travel. I have no evidence besides the words of others, but I’ve realized I must see the world and see what else is out there. I just booked my first trip to Europe last week – a week each in Poland and Czech Republic.

Thanks to the red pill, I have hope that girls in other parts of the world will outdo their American counterparts in every way.

Friendship

There is a sense of community amongst this part of the Internet. Lots of guys who have never had the answers, and simply want to improve their lives. I’ve been fortunate enough to meet some fellow bloggers in recent months and have had nothing but great things to say about them. I consider them friends whom I can talk to about things that I can’t talk about at work, with blue pill friends, or even my family.

The red pill has taught me that the American world has made it tough on men, but yet, I’m not alone.

And…neither are you. For those of you reading this that are just having your eyes opened to the thought processes of the red pill, understand that it is a very difficult journey. It will take all of your will power, motivation, and courage to shed yourself of the beliefs you have been taught your whole life. If you can stomach it though, you can improve your life in ways that are unimaginable.

A year ago, if you’d told me I’d sleep with as many girls as I have, be as in good of shape as I am in, have come this far already with blogging, or that I'd be taking two weeks off work to adventure in Europe by myself, I would have laughed in your face. I will say this, though: the red pill is a better meal than anything you ate at the dinner table this holiday season.

On Christmas Day, I sent out a mass ping text to tons of girls, including the girl I mentioned in the beginning of this post. We got to talking about travels and what we've been doing for the last year. We are going to meet up for some drinks next week.

If she says, "We're not having sex tonight," during the date, I doubt I'll be able to contain the look of glee from spreading across my face.

A hotbed for Marxist ideology? Do you have any evidence for this assertion or are you just regurgitating Fox News and Rush Limbaugh? Do you even know what Marxist ideology is? Harvard may produce some socially liberal ideas and it could MAYBE be argued that they indoctrinate their students with them, but that's a far, far cry from Marxism which would seek to completely overturn the system that their students will lead in the future. Stop regurgitating right-wing talking points and start thinking for yourself.

Thomas Sowell look him up. Attended Harvard now heads a think tank for Stanford economics lectured at UCLA and Chicago U. He basically says the self anointed elite at Harvard manufacture social issues to protect their invested interests. They create a bureaucratic system with the power of the State this always leads to a Marxist ideology.

It is as tiring as explaining The Dark Knight Rises to the six-year-old when I see the circle jerks in the comments. I have had enough with the assigned beliefs and talking points getting spewed in the comment sections of my articles. I do admit to trolling comment sections of other sites , but trying to turn Return of Kings into political hay is a fools errand. Reading the comments on my various articles that spew blind allegiance to one or another political ideology on the left-right spectrum is tiring. For the most part these assigned buzzwords and talking points are really not person's own beliefs but what is given to them to say. The smarter ones realize this on some level but go along with it anyway. The dumb ones truly believe that they are his beliefs. I'm not a Republican or Democrat. I primarily lookout for my own interests and so should you. Unless you're some power broker that can get the chairman of either national committee on the phone within a minute, neither of these parties works for you.

Some Knowledge

Let me give you a brief overview. All politicians for the most part belong to what I can consider a “ruling class”. This class manufactures false dichotomies, social issues, and moral issues for the people to argue among themselves about. By keeping the people arguing amongst themselves, they do not focus on the main issues. If you notice both parties are pretty consistent in working together to get certain issues handled without too much attention given to them. A great example of this would be the Toxic Asset Relief Program of 2008. This program did not have the support of the American people and had to have been voted on twice to finally pass the House of Representatives. This is the most recent example I can give you that when important things to powerful people come up and Republicans and Democrats walk in step with each other. Issues like gay marriage and abortion are merely fluff for the pundits to play with and for activists to be active about something.

History

Let me give you a few examples of politicians helping the other party out. Supposedly Republicans are known for being anti-gun control. When Ronald Reagan signed of Firearm Owners Protection Act 1986, it included the Hughes Amendment that banned the manufacture of automatic weapons for civilian purposes. His successor George H.W. Bush gave an executive order banning the import of certain non sporting firearms in 1989. These two actions removed the coolest weapons from the market. Democrats are supposedly for union labor, but Bill Clinton dealt the hardest blow to American labor ever when he signed the North American Free Trade Act in 1994. Remember all those promises in 2008 to close Guantanamo, stop the spying, and reform Washington? I do, none of them were delivered on. So unless you’re partying in the modern palace of Versailles that Washington DC has become you really shouldn’t have blind faith and allegiance to either party. But if you do have such blind allegiance and there is no benefit to you for it then you are a sucker.

Judgment

I judge people pretty quickly on the buzzwords they use and in what context. If it looks like they got their talking points straight off the Huffington Post, I know I am talking to an idiot. But I've been around the block a few times so I won't tell him that he is an idiot. I would evaluate what he can do for me. Arguing the dangers of communism with a man dressed like a Girl Scout is not going to get you anywhere. Also arguing the geological evidence that the earth is older than 6000 years with someone who doesn't read anything except the Bible will also get you nowhere. Shitting up the comment section under my articles with unsupported arguments, name-calling, and posturing will get you nowhere and actually helps me out. A well thought out argument that can be supported by fact is unbeatable. Remember, the best propaganda is the truth.

Divide and Conquer

The sad fact is the left right paradigm is just a trap to force you into one camp or another. Once you're in one camp or the other the people in the other camp are automatically your "enemy". This successful manipulative construct of the two political camps has also bifurcated major media. Media sources therefore have to be on one side or the other according to that logic. If you noticed, anything that doesn't fall under this "plan" is almost universally attacked by both camps. Look what happened to Judge Napolitano when he pointed this out at his job at Fox News.

Control of Ideas

This manufactured divide also kills productive political debate. Most political discussions in these two camps are just echo chambers where any dissenting view is pushed out rather quickly. Because of this the most open, honest, and, intellectual internet chat room that I can find is "legionarii". Its run by a guy by the name "Light" and the URL is www.tinychat.com/legionarii. Remember it is the internet so you might find things you don't like or wish you never saw there.

Think For Yourself

If you can't come up with your own political platform for yourself and have to adopt another speaks volumes about your person. I could compare people's loyalties to political parties in the United States to people's unfounded loyalties to professional sports teams. This loyalty to an organization that sees you as a tool to be used boggles my mind. In truth, you cannot actually educate everyone. Some people are dumb, some people are purposely close minded, and some people are just nefarious and play dumb for destructive purposes. Knowing that is better to find ways to exploit dumb people rather than educate them because they will never know the truth is Machiavellian but effective. I think this is a conclusion the party bosses came to a long time ago. Remember this next time there's some new iteration of Kony 2012, Occupy Wall Street, Tea Party, or whatever other jingoistic group that pops up and is quickly co-opted by the "ruling class".

If Women Were Oppressed, Men Suffered Right Alongside Them

January 4, 2014 | by Daddy | Link | Original Link

Anytime you start arguing with a woman about women's rights, the argument will often stall with the phrase "but we have been oppressed for so long so we deserve more than you", as if it was on par with slavery of black people or the Holocaust for the Jews. They say that women used to be treated like inferior beings with no rights and that men had it all, and therefore we have to feel guilty and pay for our past mistakes. It seems that nobody ever disputed that statement, because this seems to be widely accepted as a fact. But it's not.

The woman's role

If we look at recent western society during the few last centuries, there was a deal between men and women in order to raise successful and prosperous families. Each had their own role and had to fulfill it. Women stayed home, popped as many babies as possible and took care of the house and the kids. They had to do a lot of house chores, they had to teach children the basics of life, and they had to give them their love. It wasn't easy because the families were a lot bigger than today. They sacrificed their youth and body for the family. They were the supporter of their husband and made his life easier by complementing him on tasks he couldn't do himself. That's how society viewed them: as house wives, as caretakers, as allies behind the husbands.

Notice how she does it with a smile

Women didn’t have the right to vote and were excluded from most of the political scene, and they couldn’t legally own properties for a long time. On the other hand, they were treated accordingly, with special treatment. Most of the time, they didn’t need to work for money, because men paid for them. They lived with their parents until they got married, and only then they would leave the house to move with their husband, who took care of them financially. If the husband died, another man from the family would take care of the widow.

They didn’t have to stand up for themselves because men protected them. Men had to be gentlemen around them and if a woman needed help to carry something or was attacked in public, any men, strangers or friends, would come to her aid. If there was a war, women didn’t have to fight, protected by men who put their lives on the line. On sinking ships, in burning houses, and in other calamities, women were saved first and men could be left behind. This was so because women were considered useful to society in a different way than today. They were respected like a mother would be respected and a wife would be respected, and another division of labor was just impossible at the time.

The man’s role

As for their part of the deal, men had to bring food and money to the table. That wasn’t easy either and it was a big sacrifice. There was no affordable university degrees at the time, so the vast majority of men had to do perilous work all day long, ranging from farming to logging and fishing. Back in the day, and even today, these jobs were dangerous and if you didn’t pay for your mistakes and adventures with a limb, you paid them with your life. When the industrial age came about, things didn’t necessarily get better: coal mining was one of the most dangerous jobs at the time. Those men who worked in mines did so under very harsh conditions, sometimes 16 hours a day, 6 days a week. They could die any moment by falling in holes, being drowned by floods, suffocating on toxic gases, being crushed by rocks, or being torn apart by an explosion.

There were no unions to protect your working conditions or social security to pamper you, so if you lost an arm on your shift, tough shit. Not only did you lose your job but you couldn't find another one because you were handicapped and useless, and you had to rely on church charity to barely survive or become a beggar. All this sacrifice was done so the wife and the kids could have a house to live in and food to eat.

Men were forced to work to the limits of their ability, requiring masculine qualities like courage, resilience and leadership. Women's lifestyle brought them different kind of challenges that required different skills and attributes, like compassion, sensitivity and gentleness. So when men came home to their wives and kids, they would be soothed and relaxed by that mysterious feminine mystique, something that was non-existent in the deep underground or in the middle of the sea. They would be pleased to be received by a joyful, smiling wife who would make their life lighter.

"How was your day honey?"

That gave them a reason and enough energy to go back to hard work the next time and be good at it. On the other hand, wives needed masculinity to bring order, authority and rational decisions into their lives. The husbands would fix things in the house, solve disputes and spend some time with the kids to teach them about life. They would also take a little time to tell their wives to not worry, that everything is under control and everything is going to be alright.

The deception

Feminists lie when they say that women were oppressed by picking only certain elements from the past and by comparing it with today's standards of living. They maliciously ignore the context in which those women lived. It's wrong to say that men had it easier without looking at the entire picture.

In the past, men and women were closely tied together, so how can you bring up women's misery of the past without bringing up men's misery as well? Men and women were a team, each had their roles, and families were seen as units living in communities, where everyone did their part for the best of the group. Taking men or women separately from the time and analyzing them through today's strong sense of individualism, and using it as an argument to further put guilt in the mind of today's men, is just another effective trick radical feminists use to elevate themselves above others. It's wrong and it's dishonest.

The End Game Of The Gamma Male

January 4, 2014 | by Jesus Baetana | Link | Original Link

If you are not aware of a problem, it's incredibly difficult to begin working on a solution for it. To identify a weakness in your behaviour is to begin to be able to improve or eliminate it. And as enlightened readers of the manosphere, I believe it is our duty to our fellow man to present him information so that he may also understand clearly, the state of the world in which we find ourselves. This could be through inspiring through behaviour, through the insertion of intriguing red pill language into every day conversation, or even the redirection to certain websites. By doing this, we assist and educate our fellow man, converting more men to an alpha mentality.

However even with our best collective efforts, there are unfortunately some who, when provided with enlightenment still prefer to close their eyes and allow life to strongly shaft them, however direct the signs may be.

The following real life example, that I have personally observed unfold first hand, should serve to discourage any man who would otherwise choose to ignore the sometimes difficult to digest realities consumption of the red pill can bring.

A Gamma In The Wild

Girl goes to study in France, barely speaks any French but manages to get into university there. Maintains long distance relationship with Beta back in home country. She is relatively faithful towards him, only slipping onto two casual cocks through two thirds of her time at French university.

Beta decides he wants some action closer to home and calls it quits over the phone. Girl is quite upset, taking a whole two weeks before cashing in one lucky orbiter for her consolation dick.

Despite said consolation dick, Girl is approaching end of studies. While quite literally ‘riding out’ the end of her course, she spots Gamma Man lurking in the corner of her favourite sausage bar. After making simple eye contact and positioning herself nearby, Gamma Man finally summons up enough dutch courage to initiate conversation. With her driving the conversation, they begin conventional dating, he subscribing to his romantic fairytale tradition his mother taught him while she wraps up her considerably sized male harem with a string of farewell rides. Even the orbiter got one. After she said her ‘goodbyes’ to the harem, she decides she is ready for something more serious. Devoid of any education about what this statement means, Gamma Man (still in the romantic idealisation his mother taught him), enters into a relationship with Girl, completely oblivious to any of the above.

The Gamma In Captivity

Many months pass. Gamma Man has been sufficiently conditioned through almost three years of using a combination of belittling, controlling supply of sex, guilt shaming on relatively inconsequential matters, criticism and imposed isolation. Gamma Man’s self esteem is that where he sees girl as far higher value to himself, pedestalising her to the highest level. In the false belief someone of his low standing could ever have attracted such a woman, he proposes. Girl contemplates for a short period, but without too much delay accepts, conscious of his promises of a ‘good life together’.

Soon after, Gamma Man and Girl begin building a home together, much in the same way as one of the opening scenes of Fight Club, where Edward Norton's character recites the various names of the catalogue furniture in the apartment, with the small difference of the girl choosing everything and the gamma financing it, happy in the knowledge his life is complete now that has a wife. Over the next five years of marriage, as he is content in his idyllic scenario, Girl continues to play the wife role, albeit with some incidents;

- Two months after marriage, Girl returns to home country and meets ex-Beta. They spend two days together, most of it in a hotel room.
- Years 2 to 4: Three separate incidents of adultery, respectively two one stands, one while out 'on a girls only night', the second surrounded by a circle of men as she kissed one of her friends, where in her own words she 'could've chosen any of them' but surprisingly decided only to fuck one of them. In both cases she returned home same night in the early hours as though nothing had happened. The third case being an impromptu rendezvous in the communal bathroom with one of Gamma Man's 'friends' he introduced her to.
- Year 5: Blissfully unaware of any of the previous incursions, Girl realises Gamma Man has regressed to the point of total acceptance. He has given her complete freedom to do whatever she chooses, with a guarantee he will accept. Sensing her withdrawal from the relationship, Gamma Man takes girl on all expenses paid holiday to the Seychelles. Then highlight of this is her grinding up between two locals where, in her own words 'husband didn't do anything'. I would wager his self confidence being utterly destroyed by this point as a contributing factor in that.

Returning home, in the coming days girl starts to tell Gamma Man how 'she needs some space' and so 'will stay with friends some nights'. Gamma Man blindly agrees, even dropping her off and agreeing to pick her up at her whim. Another flurry of one-night stands occurs, followed by a regular arrangement with a new Beta (a married colleague) and a Sigma she met at the gym. In total, two regular fuckbuddies and an ongoing stream of one-night stands, as well as her faithful husband, Gamma Man.

Gamma Desperation

Girl decides to move out to be closer to two lovers. Gamma Man is distraught, but again questions himself and tries to understand what 'he did wrong' for this to happen. He promises to 'change himself' and assures her he will 'always be there for her'. He helps move her stuff to her new apartment, buying her a washing machine and a dishwasher in the process. Over the following weeks, he proceeds to take her food shopping on a weekly basis, driving three hours each way to do this. He assists also with the purchase and construction of furnishings.

Girl repays Gamma Man, by continuing to sleep with Beta and Sigma regularly, to the extent of either of these visiting Girl within fifteen minutes of Gamma Man finishing his purely domestic duties and leaving.

As an aside, it's worth mentioning here that Gamma Man has at least taken the step over the previous years to improve his body somewhat to the point where anyone would consider him 'clearly physically fit' on sight.

Girl decides she wants to get more serious with Sigma, and so informs Gamma Man how he should sleep with other people. She says she wants 'more' out of life. Finally, Gamma Man explodes, perhaps from receiving this final death knell for his prior ideal. He smashes small parts of her apartment, driving back home and stopping briefly to pick up some alcohol. He drives through the night, simultaneously drinking and texting essay-like messages to Girl, who doesn't bother to respond. Gamma Man, not getting any response, escalates text by text until threatening to kill himself by driving into a wall.

In tandem, Sigma has practically laughed off any suggestion he wants to 'get serious' with Girl. She plays her final gambit, saying she is in love with him. Taken aback at such a casual usage of this phrase, along with the knowledge of how this very phrase is so abused in the world, his very Sigma nature content in the life he has built for himself, tells her casually 'then we can only be friends, as I like sleeping with different people; and leaves.

Girl is distraught, mind racing for further offerings she can use to ensnare this man she cannot control. She shouts something again about love and unheard words that sound about an open relationship down the stairs.

Endgame

Remember this is all utterly true, and something I personally have seen time and time again. I could even say many years ago, I was gamma myself, promising the world to a girl, thinking I could make them happy by delivering anything they expected. The cost was, a void of love and attention unto myself.

I didn't witness the conclusion of the above first hand, but I heard the girl was sleeping with someone else within two weeks, and had someone in her apartment the very next day after Sigma left. It was clear she was what is now unfortunately commonplace—a woman only seeking a challenge. That challenge being to serve and ultimately tame him. And this is unfortunately what I have found to be the case in the vast majority of the situations I've found myself in with girls over the years—they simply won't respond to giving or accommodating behaviour. I've told girls to go fuck themselves, even pre-sex, accompanied with specific reasons why (essentially being very descriptive calling out their unacceptable behaviour), only to have them later contact me again as though that never happened and far more interested in escalating things to a sexual level. When it first started happening, I was genuinely surprised.

At risk of sounding like an over dramatisation, no one ever heard about what happened to Gamma Man. Presumably, he is still somewhere on this world, as Girl had been spotted around, looking as happy as ever. I can't imagine someone could continue to live life so carefree knowing they were directly responsible for the mental torture they caused someone else.

7 Things I Learned From Delivering Pizzas In College

January 5, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

I delivered pizzas through college for many years. Sometimes part-time, sometimes full-time. I have worked as a manager, but primarily was a driver.

You learn a lot about the world as a driver. Let's get the most controversial one out of the way.

1. Race & Tipping

It is true that black people are the worst tippers, on average, than other races. However, it isn't as terrible as some would make it out. Once you control for class and being raised by a single mother, it explains much of difference. If you can believe it, I have actually diagrammed the demographics of my customers. I am very talkative and personable, so I glean a lot from my customers.

Part of the idea that black people are far worse tippers is the fact that getting stiffed really sucks. In your anger, you notice things that aren't all that relevant. I have kept charts, racially, of who stiffs. Blacks are significantly more likely to stiff, but when black people tip, they tend to be more generous than whites.

The worst tippers are black females who are middle-class and above. I recently had a woman in this demographic request her exact change down to the pennies. She was living in a small mansion. I suppose her penny-pinching could have helped her in life, but it's pretty universal.

Class is still the most determinant of tipping behaviors. Poor people are not universally bad tippers by any stretch – you can tell who will tip almost immediately. Maybe it is just a sixth sense I have developed, but I know almost immediately if they will tip or not. Maybe I sense their guilt over knowing they won't tip – although many people clearly don't give a damn if they stiff you or not. These sorts of people are usually young and male.

As for other races, cultural divides loom large. Asian and Indian immigrants are pretty bad at tipping, but not because they stiff, but because they often give just a dollar. I don't know much culturally about either race, so I will leave it at that.

2. People Are Assholes When They Are Hungry

I have never seen so much anger than when people are angry and they don't get their food or get their order screwed up. Sometimes I think people want to crush their problems on somebody's head and they pick an easy target in a person working a low-status job.

Just about all of the hate directed at me has come through my job. I have worked stores with dine-in, or stores with just delivery/carryout. The dine-in's are the worst and I have seen people come to blows in the parking lot. I have seen a child get beat outright in a bathroom, I have seen douchebags get arrested by an off-duty cop for beating the shit out of his girlfriend in the parking lot.

For some reason, being hungry causes people to do stupid shit. Otherwise seemingly well-adjusted people get irascible and say some extremely mean-spirited shit. I have been called, trash, worthless, dumber than shit, "not worthy of an abortion," and I need to work on my “manajorial skills.”

When working a service job like this, you need to have a thick skin or you will flame out. Just from a human relations standpoint, you really have to understand their anger is rarely about you, but their anger over service or product quality. Sometimes people are just looking for a fight. I have learned to not take it seriously.

3. Dinner Rushes Are Fucking Insane

TL;DR: If you are not on your shit, an intense dinner rush will destroy you.

If you work a store with dine-in, delivery and carryout, shit can hit the fan on any night. One the worst rushes I worked was a Monday in the middle of a heat spell in July. Should be easy right? Wrong. Had one cook, three drivers, two servers and a dishwasher. Got completely gobsmacked. I had to run cut table, wait multiple tables all the while trying to keep carryout caught up and cashing everybody out. I also had to help on make table to keep my slow-ass cook up to speed.

Sure, in the end I pocketed 40 bucks while making manager wages, but for about three hours, it was sheer insanity. You really have to be able to multi-task and keep on your grind. Situations like these mean your only break is to piss. I have seen multiple people crack and walk out. I recall a female manager who burst into sobbing tears during her first intense rush as a new manager. I was just a driver at that time, but I had to run the store while she cried herself sane for like 20 minutes.

You gotta have some spine in you to survive these rushes. One night all I had, in store, was two drivers and a server. I had to cook everything and take about 1/3 of the tables. I had to answer phones as my drivers were on the road constantly. It was fucking brutal. One of my drivers was a retired dude and bought me a bottle of Sailor Jerry (I was only 20) to reward me for putting up with all that bullshit. We got blacked-out drunk at his crib later that night.

4. Meeting Women Is Incredibly Easy

I have worked quite a bit on opening women just because you meet so many people delivering, cashing out carry-out or serving.

I am a good-looking guy, so the wheels are greased a good bit in my favor, but I have been able to score a good bit of numbers from women. If they are a regular and attractive, you have to get on that tip and get to know them and get those digits. I met a good bit of women this way. I never cleaned up, but I did alright.

Also, for some reason, women love flirting with delivery drivers. I have heard this from other drivers, as well. Maybe it is just the cultural stereotype.

5. You Learn About Race And Class

I am not going to talk about class, as I grew up in an impoverished town. As for race, for a white guy like me, it was an instructive endeavor. I worked with a friend who didn't learn much about race in America, so it is there if you want to learn.

It is very easy to talk theoretically about the issues black people face, but it isn't as easy to actually see it and experience it first-hand. I have been there when my black manager gets called a "dumb fucking n*gger" by some fool. Unsurprisingly, white women are more likely to do this than white men.

In her own words, it isn't as common as some would suggest, but when it happens it is very obvious and often very hateful. However, she told me (and I witnessed) that black women are often the instigators. She had multiple threats of violence – mostly from black women. She got jumped by some angry black women in the parking lot, had a plate thrown at her and endless amounts of vitriolic hate spewed at her verbally.

6. Working Delivery Rubs Some People The Wrong Way

I have a clear memory of some people in law school being extremely put off that I worked in the service industry – multiple douchebags who went to Harvard or Yale that were some the most stuck up dipshits I have every encountered.

I remember one classmate of mine, during orientation – when I explained I worked as a driver through undergrad – sighing loudly and actually said that it "really spoke to quality of the incoming class." I recall another person saying I was an affirmative action sympathy case. This is completely liberal law school – I was further alienated because I wasn't a Democrat.

You tell a lot about somebody by how they treat people who work in lower-status professions. I handled every insult gracefully, deflecting with humor or outright stomping them out. Still, you get a picture of a self-absorbed snob for these sorts of people. Often, they are first ones talking about class oppression or misogyny – in real life they don't give a damn about anybody who doesn't elevate their social status.

7. It Teaches You To Be Humble

I have learned a lot from delivering, but one the most important lessons is humility. When you start out, you got to pay your dues to move up the ladder. Every store will have some long term drivers that often are dicks. You have to prove yourself to be capable of the grind.

Also, consider the heated nature of the job. The first time some random person dumps on you badly it can hurt. Since I was just 18 when I started, the first time somebody really went in on me it hurt very much. However, you learn to deal with.

It isn't just humility, but also confidence. You learn to deal with angry and hateful people – if you aware enough, you learn to deal with them in a way that is healthy and mature. It can be tough, as some people are begging for a verbal ass-beating, but it is almost always best to let it go. Let them look like the asshole for bleating on with no vengeful response from you.

The job teaches you respect for low-paid but high-stress jobs like in the service industry. The difficultly in the job doesn't lie in the actual work contracted for, but in the day-to-day grind of rushes, assholes and the stressful nature of the job. Still, it is a job I will never regret taking on and have multiple positive memories from the experience.

Don’t Look For A Girlfriend

January 5, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Only strength can cooperate. Weakness can only beg.
– Dwight D. Eisenhower

My Experience

“There’s something we need to talk about.” I’m hanging out with a girl that I’ve been hooking up with consistently for the last two months. “What are we doing?” She asks.

She’s finally popped the question – a question that single men both love and hate at the same time. The question is of course can we become exclusive boyfriend and girlfriend. We love it because we’ve successfully attracted a girl who likes us so much that she wants to lock us down. It makes us feel proud – like we’ve done our job. We hate it because we must either commit to a long term relationship, or give up the sex we’ve been enjoying as of late.

But that’s all beside the point. I’ve never officially dated a girl before. At times I wanted a girlfriend. Those were the times I always had no luck, not even hooking up with girls. Other times, I just wanted to go out and have fun – or was looking for a hookup, but nothing more. Those were the times I would kill it. That’s where I am now, and thus this question is one I don’t want to answer. And so I put it off, as I always have. “I don’t know, let’s go get some food.”

But she brought it up again two weeks later. Stubborn girl, I thought. This time I accepted her advance. I’d thought about it, and decided to give the whole girlfriend thing a try, and see what it was all about. After making it through all of college, and avoiding the girlfriend trap, maybe it was time to test it out.

Honestly, so far it's been great. I've dated this girl for the past six months, and enjoyed every minute I spend with her. Her femininity is refreshing.

The Lesson

The alpha isn't needy.

It doesn't matter if you want a girlfriend or not. The fact is that if you do, and this idea is present in your mind when you're out meeting girls or hooking up with one, it will manifest itself in your actions. She will sense your desire for her – she will sense your longing. This tends to turn women off, because they want things they can't have. They want a man they can't tame. They want one that's a challenge to lock down – one that puts his life missions over his women.

The outright desire for a long term relationship will spoil your game. It will bleed through in your words and your body language. Even if you do manage to hook up with and maybe even begin dating a girl while using this mindset, there's a chance it will ruin the relationship. Successful relationships are based upon a strong masculine vs. feminine dynamic. The man must be in control. He must lead the course of the journey. If you start a relationship on the basis of you chasing her, this dynamic is all but ruined.

Take Action

1. If you desire a girlfriend, set that desire aside. You don't have to convince yourself that you don't want a girlfriend, only that you aren't looking for one at this very moment in time.

2. Approach girls with the mindset that you simply want to meet them and have fun.

How Edward Snowden Will Humble America

Unless you've been living under a rock, you're likely aware of the recent controversies surrounding the American National Security Agency's surveillance programs. Leaks by Edward Snowden revealed the extent of this electronic eavesdropping to the world.

The NSA's domestic spying efforts were extensive. The agency gathered many millions of telephone records from phone and internet companies. Equally important, however, were the international efforts of the NSA. Snowden's leaks eventually revealed that the USA was spying on foreign governments, Brazil prominent among them:

> Brazilian President Dilma Rousseff on Tuesday delivered a stinging rebuke of electronic espionage by the National Security Agency, telling a gathering of world leaders at the U.N. General Assembly that American eavesdropping constitutes "a breach of international law and an affront" to Brazil's sovereignty.
> America's spying efforts pose a threat to democracy throughout the world, Rousseff said, as she proposed that the United Nations establish legal guidelines to prevent "cyberspace from being used as a weapon of war." "Without the right of privacy, there is no real freedom of speech or freedom of opinion, and so there is no actual democracy," Rousseff said. And "without respect for [a nation's] sovereignty, there is no basis for proper relations among nations."

The consequences of these efforts have started to surface just recently. First, American companies began to see serious hits to their bottom lines linked to fallout from the NSA leaks:

> Cisco has shocked financial analysts — who were expecting healthy growth — by predicting a 10 percent sales slump during the current quarter. There are a variety of reasons for this, but the standout one is the backlash in emerging markets against the activities of the U.S. signals intelligence agency, the NSA.
> This shouldn't have come as a surprise. Communications infrastructure is absolutely central to the surveillance scandal, and that's Cisco's business.

Then the US lost an arms deal worth many billions of dollars to the Swedes as a result of Brazilian mistrust:

> Brazil awarded a $4.5 billion contract to Saab AB on Wednesday to replace its aging fleet of fighter jets, a surprise coup for the Swedish company after news of U.S. spying on Brazilians helped derail Boeing's chances for the deal.
> The contract, negotiated over the course of three presidencies, will supply Brazil's air force with 36 new Gripen NG fighters by 2020. Aside from the cost of the jets themselves, the agreement is expected to generate billions of additional dollars in future supply and service contracts.
> Until earlier this year, Boeing's F/A-18 Super Hornet had been considered the front runner. But revelations of spying by the U.S. National Security Agency in Brazil, including personal communication by Rousseff, led Brazil to believe it could not trust a U.S. company.
> "The NSA problem ruined it for the Americans," a Brazilian government source said on condition of anonymity.

Americans aren't the only ones beginning to distrust their government as a result of this scandal. The entire world is becoming deeply suspicious.

America's status as the world's lone superpower is indisputable. The United States Armed Forces by themselves account for 39% of the globe's military expenditure, possess a navy larger than the next 13 biggest in the world combined by tonnage, and can field aircraft more advanced than anything the rest of the world's nations could possibly throw at them right now.

America's hegemony, however, is not solely dependent on all of that military might. Powerful as it is, the US relies heavily on a measure of trust and respect being maintained between itself and its allies, allies who are essential to ensuring that American foreign policy objectives are met and that American enemies are kept at bay. The US cannot simply fight (or threaten to fight) the rest of the planet; it has to cooperate with it to some significant degree.

By exposing to the world the fact that America itself does not trust or respect its closest allies enough to grant them privacy, Edward Snowden has forced a necessary humbling of the world's lone superpower. The best option for the USA at this point is to diligently and humbly rebuild the reservoirs of positive diplomatic capital it once maintained with nations like Brazil that it cannot afford to be on bad terms with for extended periods of time. It would do this by taking its remarkable capacity for espionage (a natural by product of its status as the world's lone superpower) and legitimately toning it down, granting its peers on the international stage the privacy and respect they actually deserve. Trust will be rebuilt if the US is emphatic about this effort and diligent in proving that such changes are being made.

Should America fail to humble itself in this way, other nations will do so by decreasing their patronage of American businesses and taking money away from the American economy, while simultaneously becoming more reluctant to serve American foreign policy objectives. Cisco and Boeing have already seen the consequences of this and we can be certain that there will be more to come.

When it comes to humbling the US economy in such a way, few single nations can make much progress to this end by themselves. Multiple global powers united by their distrust of the USA (and the USA's distrust of them), however, can do plenty of harm. The USA cannot stand alone.

“Art Of Manliness” Is Poisoning The Concept Of Masculinity With Disney Lifestyle Advice

January 6, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I’ve perused the website Art of Manliness a few times in the past year. Something always vaguely turned me off about it, with its smug, woman-friendly, safe, feel-good presentation, and those feelings have recently hardened into outright hostility. Simply put, Art of Manliness is neither artful nor manly. It’s strictly a commercial site designed only to make money for its owners, and offers a neutered version of masculinity that would appeal only to pot-bellied, middle-aged keyboard jockeys. These are the problems I have with the site.

Lack of Credibility

Art of Manliness was created in 2008 by husband and wife team Kate and Brett McKay. If you look at the website, it seems like more than half of the articles there were written by the two of them. And herein lies the biggest problem that the website can never overcome.

No woman can offer a man advice on how to be a man. Period. Thou shalt not accept advice from a woman on manliness. There are no exceptions to this rule. It doesn't matter if her intentions are noble. It doesn't matter if she means well. The inescapable fact is that the art of being a man is a subject outside of her range of experience. If I tried to write for a women's blog on the arts of child bearing and child rearing, I would be laughed at. And justifiably so. But only in feminized America can a woman presume, with her infinite arrogance, to offer advice to men on how to be a man.

And it is just when a woman is trying to be helpful, trying to "save" a man, that she is at her most dangerous. Beware that woman who wants to "save" you. She may truly believe it, and she may sincerely want it. But beware her just the same. Because deep down, in her innermost heart, the most secret and cherished desire of every woman is to see a man dethroned, and rolled in the muck. She'll never admit this, of course. Ask her, and she'll get furiously indignant in her denials. But it is true just the same. You can just feel it.

On this path of struggle that we men must walk, our woman cannot carry our burdens. We are, each of us, alone. And this is the first law of masculinity. And it is the most important law.

Lack of Suffering

Another irritating thing about this site is its rated G, safe, feel-good tone. There is no angst here. There is no bitterness here. There is no suffering, no anguish, no pain, no conflict, no controversy. We men need these things. We crave them. We need struggle, combat, stress, anxiety, bitterness, and anguish. These things define us. They create us, and make us who we are.

Yet Kate and Brett want to take those things away from me, and reduce me to a neutered goody-two-shoes, like them. Well, guess what, Kate and Brett. You can't control me. You aren't going to corral me into your safe, goody-two-shoes world. I'd prefer to whip out my tomahawk and take a few scalps. That's me.

I need my angst and my bitterness. What makes us so much greater than you, and more profound than you, is that we recognize this. We don't try to cover up the pain that is out there, like you do. We don't offer nicey-nice blandishments or opiates to our readers, like you do.

When you read Return of Kings, you are confronted with a raw, bracing, bitch-slapping experience. It is an experience bristling with emotion, sexual energy, anxiety, angst, suffering, and mania. And it is well that it should be so. For this is the raw energy of the masculine masses bubbling forth in all its uncontrolled intensity. We celebrate that. We revel in that. We offer danger. They offer platitudes.

We are the unloved, the unwanted, the dispossessed, and the downtrodden. And our message is more sincere, more honest, and more real, than anything you can offer. We're living this life in real-time, but you two are just tourists in the domain of masculinity. And it is we, Kate and Brett, who will inherit the earth. Not you. Us. To paraphrase Robert De Niro in Cape Fear: we can out-write you, we can out-fuck you, we can out-run you, and we can out-philosophize you.

Lifestyle Limitations

Another credibility issue arises from the worldview and lifestyle of the McKays. Kate McKay graduated from Brigham Young University. Brett McKay, in his own words, spent two years in Mexico "doing service." The name McKay is frequently a Mormon name. A photo of the couple, combined with this other information, seems to indicate that they are practicing Mormons.

I want to be very clear here that I would never criticize anyone solely on the basis of their background, faith, or ethnicity. It makes no difference to me what someone's background is. But I believe that the worldview of the site's founders severely limits their ability to offer good advice on certain key aspects of the male experience, namely: game, dating skills, and seduction. A major part of the male experience is the pursuit and conquest of women. To deny that is delusional.

That's just my opinion. I can't see how someone who doesn't drink, smoke, or even use caffeine can meaningfully speak on approaching, female shit tests, text game, data sheets of foreign countries, sex tips, game tips, and other similar topics that are integral to the single dating male experience. It's simply a matter of someone's life experiences and credibility. AoM offers zero advice on the topic of recreational sex.

Tone

In its overall tone, Art of Manliness seems sterile, neutered, and cold. There is too much of a corporate feel, too much of an appearance of a retail sales site. There is none of the rollicking, Wild West deviltry that you will find in the comments section of a Return of Kings article. One gets the impression that AoM was created to serve the needs of henpecked, middle-aged, overweight fathers looking for a safe, female-approved, "masculine" experience.

AoM cultivates readers that don't want or seek meaningful challenges. The typical AoM reader is one who will seek the approval of his domineering wife for everything he does, one who will have his wife hanging over his shoulder to make sure he isn't infected by dangerous ideas on the internet.

When all is said and done, Art of Manliness can't contribute meaningfully to the debate on male self-improvement. It's the type of safe, bland, and do-nothing masculinity that leads nowhere. They're not part of the solution, but part of the problem.

It’s Impossible For Women And Men To Be Friends

January 6, 2014 | by General Stalin | Link | Original Link

Are you familiar with The Ladder Theory? For those of you who have never heard of it, or forget what it is, it is a critical ideology that attempts to describe how heterosexual men and women relate to one another socially. It was developed in the 90’s by Dallas Lynn, as cited on the web page.

This is hard manosphere science of yesteryear—pure critical thinking and logic-based analysis of opposite sex relationships based on empirical evidence. While the explanation of the theory comes off very satirical, and a few of the details can be quite arguable, the foundation that makes up the principles of this ideology is rock solid.

Men Want To Bang Women

No matter how you slice it, every non-family member female in your life that your friends aren’t dating is on your sexual radar in some scope (hell, for a number of you sick and shameless individuals, the former conditions may not even factor). If you are “friends” with a female, then one of these conditions is undoubtedly true:

- You want to fuck her.
- You already have fucked her.
- She is below a 5

There is not a single woman in my social circle that isn’t ugly that I would not bang if given the opportunity. Men do not casually make friends with attractive women—they are either forced upon them (family, friend's girlfriend, etc.), or there is a physical intent. When you see a female your brain immediately and involuntarily gauges her fuckability, and as the theory suggests, puts her on the "ladder."

A Woman's Guy Friends Are Not Really Her Friends

Unless you are a wildebeest, all of your "guy friends" will definitely bang you if given the chance. The only reason they talk to you is because they either already have, or because they want to. Aside from that, they are your boyfriend's friends and not really your friends. If they still talk to you after you and your boyfriend/husband are broken up, it's because they want to bang you. Simple.

Men and women simply do not connect to one another chemically the way same-sex comrades do. Men and women are genetically designed to fuck each other. This is made evident by studies on pheromone response and studies on cross-sex friendships in different age groups. These scholarly journals paint a pretty plain picture: men and women want to fornicate with each other, and any non-sexual relationship is basically just a facade. It is merely a forced social construct that men and women constantly share exclusively platonic relationships.

"The Friend Zone" Is Stigmatized For A Reason

No man is voluntarily in the dreaded "friend zone." In fact, if you pay attention to the Red Pill community, alpha men generally won't allow themselves to be in a sexless relationship with a decent looking girl at all. It serves zero benefit besides possibly having access to sex with a female's associates. White knights, feminists, and ignorant women will deny and nay-say, but it doesn't change the fact that for a man to hold a sexless relationship with an attractive female, there is a great deal of active suppression of coital desires that must take place. There is a froth of sexual tension that is bubbling just below the thinly veiled surface of every unconditional opposite-sex friendship.

Don't be an enabler and don't be a girl's "friend." The moment you take a back seat to her and you become her emotional punching bag who is "like a brother" to her is the moment where you are fulfilling her male sensitivity needs. When a woman knows she doesn't need to actively work on a relationship with a man to get what she wants out of him, then she is no longer a worthy mate for anyone. She knows if that alpha she fucked the same night she met him at Club XYZ doesn't feel like going out of his way for her, then her orbiter(s) will.

This makes her far less likely to try to impress him or put in an effort to make herself more appealing to him.To put it into perspective, a girl who has “all guy friends” is essentially the same as a guy who has an unconditionally loyal harem of cute bangs who will come over to his place after one text, do whatever position he wants, make him food, do dishes, then leave when he wants her to all on her own dime. There is no incentive to work on your skills with the opposite sex in either of those cases.

The lesson of the day is: you can’t be friends with people who you want to bang. Understand the roles the people in your life serve. Have some dignity and self-respect. If you have women in your life you want to get it in with but they won’t give it up to you, then stop kidding yourself. Learn to walk away from people who aren’t of value to you.

History, as well as a great number of scientific and empirical studies, have shown the relationship dynamic between men and women renders completely platonic friendship impossible due to our physical and emotional predisposition. The only thing perpetuating this contrived modern social norm is the “progressive” ideals instilled in our culture where men and women share professional work environments and strive for complete social “equality.” Men, understand that your male comrades are the only real friends you actually have.

Why Western Men Prefer Foreign Women Over Their Own

January 6, 2014 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

My previous article talked about 10 Reasons Why Foreign Women Are Superior To American Women. I thought we would perhaps like to enlarge on that and explain more about why masculine Western men like feminine foreign women.

At it's essence, the masculine energy seeks a balance with the feminine energy. The masculine energy is characterized by strength and power while the feminine energy is characterized by softness and healing ability. The majority of American women I come in contact with during my life does not embody the feminine energy. Rather, feminism has brainwashed them to want to be equal to men, an utter impossibility. But in their desperate and misguided attempts to try to be equal to men, Western women embraced masculine qualities instead of embracing their natural feminine qualities. Hence, the trend of women acting like men.

Such masculine women will forever be disappointed, because no masculine man could ever tolerate such women. No, the only kind of men they will ever attract are the beta feminine men, whom they don't respect and therefore can never be satisfied with as a long-term partner.

By now, I am sure a lot of unnaturally masculinized Western women's mental hamsters are running in full speed. Some of them are probably saying, "Well, how can we be feminine in a society that enforces gender equality? How can we find a masculine man?"

If you are looking for a masculine man, the first thing you must due is give up all traces of arrogance in your personality. There is nothing more foul in a woman than arrogance. Second, stop trying to emasculate men. I find it very amusing how Western women are constantly saying "Where are all the real men?" but they are too stupid to realize that they themselves are the cause of this problem. If they would stop trying to emasculate men at every opportunity with man-hating feminism and political correctness, maybe men wouldn't have been trained to be such spineless pussies.

It is very difficult to find a truly feminine Western woman, and thus if you are a masculine man, the only real option is to go abroad. Foreign women obviously haven't been raised in the feminist Western countries like the USA, Canada, the UK, or Australia (these four countries are the satanic axis of evil of feminism). Any Western man who has ever experienced a foreign woman knows this truth. Once you've tasted a superior product, it's very hard to go back to a vastly inferior product. If you taste a 50-year-old fine wine, you will never want to drink a low quality $2 bottle from Trader Joes. Once a man experiences a foreign woman, he loses all desire to associate with Western women anymore.

In this globalized world, Western women are simply incapable of competing with foreign women, who are vastly superior to them in all qualities. And instead of trying to improve themselves, so that they can compete with foreign women, Western women want to simply shame men for pursuing such women. Essentially, Western women have been ruined. And it's very difficult to regenerate a woman once she has become ruined. Once a woman has become contaminated, it is not possible to save them in the current generation.

You ladies can go be "big strong independent" all you want. An ever growing number of Western men don't give a damn anymore. They could care less what you do. After all, we have options. You do not. We can go to foreign countries and find good feminine women. You can also go to foreign countries, but the men there will simply see you as a whore and use you as such. I've traveled to many countries in South Asia, Southeast Asia, and East Asia, and I've talked to many foreign men about how feminism has ruined Western women. And guess what? 90 percent of the men agreed with me and told me they feel the same way, that Western women have no benefit besides the sexual. The only option Western women have anymore is to just get pumped and dumped by alpha Western men and alpha foreign men. What a pity.

In the end, one thing is certain, and that is that this modern society simply cannot keep going on the way it has been. People can either voluntarily decide to change and or else people will be forced to change as society collapses. And unfortunately, it seems that the latter is inevitable, as the majority of people are simply too brainwashed and ignorant and refuse to change. That is fine, change is coming either way, and because people refuse to voluntarily change, a very painful process of change in the form of societal collapse has already begun. You can ignore reality, but you cannot ignore the consequences of ignoring reality.

January 7, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Stories have always been important for us. Stories of both good and evil have been told for generations, both to inspire humanity's greatness and to warn of the folly of our vices.

The most popular and enduring stories come in the form of fables, more popularly known as fairy tales. Many of us as children have heard the classics, and some even managed to interred their lessons; Jack and the Beanstalk (bravery, risk and initiative lead to riches), Little Red Riding Hood (be wary of strangers and never let others decide your course for you), The Boy Who Cried Wolf (those who lie will never be believed when they tell the truth), and Sleeping Beauty (if you're a hot and submissive woman an awesome man will come along and take care of you).

Unfortunately this is the twenty-first century and the simple Aesop's and virtues classical fairy tales espouse no longer apply in our modern, progressive society. Telling children to be brave, strong and true to themselves and others is outdated and inapplicable when we have big governments watching out for our best interests with shadowy intelligence services and cameras on every street corner. We need not fear wolves from other countries since clearly the spice they bring to the culture is worth their violence – besides, if the village becomes too saturated with wolves one can always move to another suburb or gated community right?

It's high time some new fairy tales were written for the children of today, to teach them lessons about how to be a 21st century human being. One of the easiest ways to do this is simply to swap the genders in traditional stories and retell them from a new male/female perspective. As a future Oscar winner for Best Original Softcore Screenplay, Billaim Chubbenski has taken it upon himself to get the ball rolling. So for those of you with children, download these delectable fables onto your Kindle, turn the mercury filled fluorescent lights low and the fake fireplace bright and shut your six year old's cell phone off for a few minutes because Billy Chubbs humbly presents…

Jackie And The Beanstalk

Once upon a time there was a girl named Jackie who lived with her widower father on their small farm. Jackie's father treated her like a little princess and even though they weren't well off he always made sure Jackie was well fed and kept her up with the latest fashions. Eventually Jackie's expensive tastes pushed the father to near poverty. Jackie's father still loved her regardless, and as her sixteenth birthday approached he decided to sell their last cow to buy her a sweet sixteen gift. However, since he literally did all the work on the farm and had no time to spare, he had to send Jackie into the city to sell the cow. She protested adamantly, crying and begging several times not to go but for the first time in her life Jackie's daddy remained firm. So, bitter and bitchy, Jackie took the cow into town to sell.

When Jackie reached the market she saw the La Senza stall had several cute pairs of boy shorts on display. Jackie asked how much they cost. The business savvy stall owner said they were very expensive but that Jackie's cow – which was worth far more then all his wares combined – might cover the cost of two or three pairs. Since Jackie was a woman, and therefore had no sense of the inherent value of things, she eagerly agreed.

At that moment a completely creepy guy ran up and told Jackie to wait. "If you're going to sell your cow for such a low price young lady, then perhaps you'd prefer to buy these beans of mine instead? They're magic, and when planted will lead you to riches far beyond your imagination!"

"Ew! Get away from me!" Jackie shouted, shrinking away from the creepy man.

Jackie then sold her father's cow for three pairs of boy shorts. While she shopped, Jackie's neighbour Jack, a boy her age, came into town with his family's cow and made a deal with the creepy guy, exchanging his cow for the magic beans.

Jackie went home, hid her clothes and told her daddy that some black highwaymen had mugged her and taken the cow. Her father told her he was just glad that Jackie was safe and decided to sell his good shovel in order to buy her a birthday present.

A few days later a giant beanstalk appeared in the neighbour's yard, and stories quickly spread about how the young Jack climbed the stalk and found riches beyond imagining. Jackie's father jealously listened to these tales, but he figured that such was the luck of life and who needed material riches when he had such a wonderful and loving daughter.

Eventually Jackie's father became destitute and she left him to move in with a rich old duke. Jackie spent the duke's money and cheated on him with the local men.

And she lived happily ever after.

THE END

Big Red Riding Hood

Deep in the forest lived Big Red and his father. One day his father marinated up some juicy steaks and put them in a basket with a six pack of beer.

"Take these and go visit your grandpa," Big Red's father said.

"You got it," Big Red said. After all, as a man he appreciated his family and didn't view visiting his older relatives as a burden.

So Big Red set off along the path through the woods to visit his grandpa. As he was walking along a big bad wolf suddenly stepped out of the trees.

"Where are you going?" the wolf asked hungrily, smacking it's lips at the basket in Big Red’s hand.

“None of your business,” Big Red said, knowing that wolves meant nothing but trouble. He ignored out of hand how the villager’s safe outside the forest always said that wolves shouldn’t be pre-judged just because they’re wolves.

“What if I make it my business?” the wolf asked angrily.

Big Red quickly took off his shirt, setting the basket on the ground. “We doin’ this?!” he shouted, raising his arms up.

Seeing that Big Red wasn’t a pansy the wolf turned and fled down the path. The wolf knew there was an old man in a house down the way and it figured that Big Red must be going there. The wolf decided to kill the old man, disguise itself as him and try to murder Big Red.

The wolf arrived at the house of Big Red’s grandpa, banging on the door and pretending to be Big Red. Since grandpa was a man living alone in the dangerous woods he didn’t open up his door right away like an idiot. He looked out the window and saw the wolf waiting by the door. Grandpa owned a lot of muskets because he wasn’t some village dwelling bleeding heart who utterly relied on the inept and physically out of shape constabulary to protect him and he lazily blew the wolf away. A short while later Big Red arrived. They cooked up the steaks and the wolf meat, and when Big Red went back home he had an awesome new wolf fur Ushanka to show his father.

And they lived happily ever after.

THE END

The Girl Who Cried Wolf

Once upon a time a hard-working shepherd broke his ankle and had to make his daughter look after their sheep. After much complaining she reluctantly obeyed and went out to the pasture. Utterly bored with this job, knowing that she could be in town hanging out with cute barony boys, the shepherd's daughter sat on a rock and mulled over how much her life totally sucked.

Then she noticed that, over in the next field, two cute shepherd boys were looking after their own sheep. Wondering how to get their attention she remembered that the community feared wolves and that any cry of wolf brought all men in the vicinity running.

"Wolf!" she cried as loud as she could. "Wolf! LIKE, THERE'S SERIOUSLY A FRICKIN' WOLF OR SOMETHING OVER HERE!"

And sure enough all the surrounding men came running. Unfortunately, in addition to the two cute shepherds several dull looking guys also showed up. When they asked where the wolf was the shepherd's daughter lied and said they just missed it or whatever, but the two cute guys should totally stay and hang out.

They did, and every day thereafter the shepherd's daughter cried wolf, and everyday the men always came running since she was a girl and they were desperate just to be around her. She and the two cute shepherds flirted and fooled around while the other shepherds, hoping to gain her gratitude, looked after her sheep while she went off with the cute guys. In fact the other shepherds also looked after the sheep of the two cute guys as well when they stole off with the shepherds daughter, fooling themselves into believing that the three of them were just good friends and that the shepherd's daughter would totally be appreciative of them looking after her friend's sheep.

One day a real wolf came out of the woods. The shepherd's daughter shouted, "WOLF! OH MY GOD LIKE THERE'S A REAL WOLF NOW!" And like every other time, without hesitation, all the surrounding men came running to help. The two cute shepherds cleverly stood back with the shepherd's daughter, making it look as though they were protecting her while being out of any real danger, while the other shepherds – eager to prove themselves to her – courageously fought the wolf. Many died, and the survivors were horribly mauled and suffered with post traumatic stress disorders for the rest of their lives.

The community then rewarded the shepherd's daughter since she was the one who alerted them to the danger. The survivors got only a passing mention of praise but they told themselves it was worth it when the shepherd's daughter gave them each a hug. The two cute shepherds got to do anal with her since they were so totally brave in protecting her from the wolf. The community never doubted her words, even though she continued to cry wolf for years thereafter.

And she lived happily ever after.

THE END

Sleeping Buddy

Once upon a time a witch got on her period and placed a curse upon a King. She declared that any of his sons who pricked their fingers on a rose thorn would fall into an enchanted sleep and only the kiss of their true love would awake them.

The King eventually had a son and a daughter. The Prince grew up to be handsome and charming. One day he went riding with a baron's daughter. They passed a rose garden. The baron's daughter told the Prince to get her a rose. Despite being told to be wary of roses the Prince really wanted to get inside the girl's corset so he braved it. While pulling a rose he pricked his finger on its thorns and fell into a deep sleep.

The King, depressed and despairing, had the Prince enshrined in a far-off fortress. Eventually fields of thorns grew up around the decaying walls – plus for some reason a dragon started hanging out in the area because they're dicks like that.

And the prince never woke up, since decades of prosperity had made the women of the land inherently incapable of loving anyone but themselves and their material goods. And even if they could love, no women in the land also possessed the bravery or strength or even the basic initiative to not only cross a field of thorns but then fight a dragon on the other side.

So the King had to give his kingdom over to his daughter, whom enacted feminism upon the start of her reign. Soon the majority of the men became pansies, women became disgustingly promiscuous, and politically correct policies bent to overwhelmingly favour women and the dregs of the kingdom forced intelligent and masculine men to flee to other lands. Work ethic plummeted and the median age of the population rose rapidly since women refused to have more then one or two children, usually waiting until they were entering middle age before conceiving. Barbarians from outside the borders were welcomed in en masse by evil businessmen who wanted to deflate the wages of all and any citizens who voiced concern over this were labelled as evil bigots.

Eventually the kingdom became bankrupt and succumbed to the barbarians. The women were then enslaved, regularly beaten and forced to wear veils over their faces while the remaining pathetic men were turned into third class citizens and sent off to die in wars and were eventually bred out of existence.

And no one lived happily ever after.

“Don Jon” Is A Blue Pill Disaster

January 7, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Ever since I heard a movie about pickup was coming to theaters, I have waited patiently to snag it from BitTorrent and see what the fuss was about. Unfortunately, I was greeted with a clicheed Hollwood pile of dogshit that was anything but Red Pill.

The movie follows a horribly miscast Joseph Gordon-Levitt as Jon, a man who runs the town hard and pulls beautiful women frequently despite his addiction to masturbating to internet porn, which he finds to be more satisfying than actual women.

The first clue that this film was written by manginas was its portrayal of pickup process, which was roughly: “Guy sees incredibly hot girl” —> A miracle happens —> “Guy is dancing with/banging girl.” The smashcuts of him fornicating with 9s and 10s is the kind of just-so story that someone without the faintest clue of pickup (e.g. a beta male or a woman) would posit as feasible. He’s reasonably good-looking and has some muscles, so OF COURSE dimes are throwing themselves at him. He can’t miss.

During his club dalliances, Don Jon finally meets “the one,” a dolled-up Jersey version of Scarlett Johansson. She’s obviously an incredibly attractive woman (though many of the women he’s shown pumping-and-dumping are on the same level), but as soon as he begins his courtship of her he makes all of the rookie mistakes: he tries to change his behavior, forsakes going out with his friends, and scoffs at the idea of getting some strange. We all know the pull a new hottie can have on a man, but a player who has been in the trenches is not so easily snared, and also knows not to cut off his relationships with important people in his life just because of some new ass. When they finally have sex it is middling, so Jon continues his internet porn habit.

An obviously disappointing aspect was that the female characters in the film could do no wrong—it shows early on that Johannson's character is addicted to the fake emotional rush of romantic comedies, yet the movie does nothing to explore the parallelism of her reliance on this artificial stimulation. Once again, it is only the man's behavior that is maladaptive, despite the fact that it is an outgrowth of his girlfriend being sorely deficient in fulfilling his sexual needs.

There were occasional bits of Red Pill wisdom sprinkled throughout the movie, but they were taken to farcical and illogical conclusions. For example, Jon's girlfriend openly mocks him for being less of a man for cleaning his own apartment rather than paying someone else to do it. We know that women often don't respect men who do the housework, but castigating him for sweeping his apartment floor was a reductio ad absurdum example of this principle.

Though the entirety of this movie was saccharine Hollywood pablum, the ending of the movie was the worst part. Throughout the movie, we see an aged Julianne Moore skulking around the main character, the same way an orbiter will follow around a cute girl for a chance at currying favor. After being dumped by his girlfriend for his masturbation habits, he caves in and sleeps with Moore in a moment of weakness. Jon smokes pot with her and bangs her in a car, and all of a sudden he is smitten.

Over a short time, Jon becomes infatuated with skeletor — I mean, Julianne Moore's character. He begins a relationship with her and the movie just sort of…ends. Yes, just your typical young-player-hangs-up-his-boots-to-settle-down-with-grandmother story, despite no common life situation or any significant bond that is built between them.

This screenplay came off like a bad book report on what people think the player lifestyle is like, epitomized by its romanticization of giving up the lifestyle to court post-wall women (obviously while in their "sexual peak"). I saw nothing redeeming about the movie, barely even entertaining in its cringeworthiness. Save your time and go see one of these films that will teach you something.

6 Reasons Why You Should Not Rape A Girl

January 7, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you were raised in a society of humans, you possess a basic moral code not to cause harm to others. This includes rape, whereby a man has sex with a woman who rather not have sex with him at that moment in time. But let's say you're a feral man who was raised by wolves. You enter society with the belief that it's quite normal to force yourself upon a woman. To this man, I would like to share a few reasons why that's a bad idea…

1. It hurts your penis

Sex requires a lot of lubrication. Some girls, due to sexual dysfunction, are unable to produce a bountiful amount of lubrication even during consensual sex. In the case of rape, there's a large chance that the girl will not secrete the needed amount of lubrication since she doesn't want to have sex with you. Unless you're uncircumsized, dry sex is going to be painful and may even cause lesions.

Hypothetical reversal: If your victim digests a steady diet of 50 Shades Of Gray, she may very well have a rape fantasy. The lubrication she secretes could be higher than the previous beta male she consensually had sex with.

2. You dangerously expose yourself to STD's

The modern woman is quite impulsive in her willingness to sleep with random men without using condoms. I've personally engaged in this behavior more times than I remember, and what continues to surprise me is how an educated girl with apparently good hygiene is so quick to take in my naked penis without asking for proof of its sterility. While most STD's are quite manageable, why expose yourself to the risk? Since it's just about impossible for rape to proceed on a conscious girl with condoms, it's not a smart move from a health standpoint.

Hypothetical reversal: If you know she's a virgin.

3. You can go to jail for a long time

If you're caught raping a girl, you can be convicted in court and remain locked up for at least 10 years. During this time, you have no personal freedoms to work, go to the coffee shop, or take in a nice evening stroll. You also increase the chance that you will get raped yourself by other men who want to teach you a lesson for forcing yourself upon a woman who did not want you inside her. With ubiquitous surveillance and the invention of DNA testing, it's a near certainty you will be caught.

Hypothetical reversal: Your life is so boring that going to prison would be a step up.

4. You may get her pregnant and have to pay child support

At the sexual climax of your rape, you will probably not have the forethought to pull out of your victim. Therefore you can cause a pregnancy whereby your victim chooses to carry your rape spawn to term. Congratulations, you are now legally obligated to support that child until it’s 18, even if you’re sent to prison. Are you ready for this responsibility? While most Western women are on the pill, there is no way to know this before you commence the rape.

Hypothetical reversal: You’ve always wanted to be a dad.

5. It’s less violent to seek out a prostitute

Having sex with a prostitute is a misdemeanor instead of a felony like in the case of rape. Many prostitutes are hard-up for money and will allow you to perform your rape fantasy on them for a modest bonus. You get all the sexual rewards without the rape risk. The fact that prostitution is a more available option for men is one reason why rape in America is at the lowest in 30 years (it has decreased by over 20% since 1992). You have to pretty stupid to rape these days instead of getting serviced by a hooker.

Hypothetical reversal: You want to experience the rush that comes from committing a felony.

6. It’s harder than just going to a club and finding a slut

If you think about what a real rape entails (and not the fake rape of a girl changing her mind the morning after because she feels guilt), it's actually pretty hard to successfully execute one. You have to find a girl, physically overpower her, tear off her clothing, and somehow have pleasurable sex, all without being disturbed by eyewitnesses. It's much easier to just go to a club, chat with ten homely girls, and invite them for some cocaine or alcohol at your place. Why rape when girls are giving it up so easily these days?

Hypothetical reversal: You are underage and can not go to a club.

If you're reading this right now, it's safe to assume you already have the morals that prevent you from becoming physically violent against a woman, but for the man who has been raised by lions, I hope this list helps him understand the self-harm of committing such a horrible act. As long as you don't confuse violent rape with the legal act of sleeping with a promiscuous girl that's as intoxicated as you, you should be okay.

January 7, 2014 | by bacon | Link | Original Link

This web site has been a beacon of light in a dark world that tries to sell men and society on the idea of fat acceptance. This idea is in part predicated on the belief that beauty is a socially constructed concept and as a result fat women are beautiful as well. Oh course the fat acceptance movement conveniently ignores male sexual desire which is the only significant tool for measuring if women are attractive. To put it succinctly if a woman fails the boner test she is not beautiful.

The situation in the United States is dire for men as the number of obese and overweight women have never been higher. This chart below from the CDC shows the progression of obesity among adult women in recent years.

The reality is that as fatness increases among women there is also a precipitous decline in the number of attractive women in the population taking place. This is because every convert to the fat side represents a loss of a potentially attractive chick. Therefore it is important for men to take a step back and realize the potential fat chicks have under all of their layers of fat to become fuckable.

Most men undoubtedly fail to see the potential in fat chicks since their main thought is usually one of disgust. However when presented with pictures like those above isn´t it shocking how much more desirable these women become once they lose the weight? Fat women reading this should take note how drastically they can increase their value by getting a thin body.

The United States has the advantage of being a melting pot for generations which usually means many of the best facial/body features are passed down with each generation meaning women should be getting progressively better looking not the reverse. As the photos above illustrate, the US has no shortage of potential for attractive women if the large percentage of fatties which now make up the majority of women could manage to lose their weight. While it is all too common to hate fat women because they are an offense to the aesthetic senses it is important to never forget perhaps the most important reason to hate fat chicks: by being fat they are directly decreasing the number of potentially desirable girls in the population.

One Of The Greatest Tools In Your Game Arsenal

January 8, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

As I mentioned earlier this week in one of my tweets, I started reading The Rational Male's new book (which I am very much enjoying so far). Early on he describes the value and benefits of what he refers to as "competition anxiety" by females. Rollo states that it is one of the more powerful tools a man can have, and based on experience I fully agree.

In Theory

The book does a great job of breaking this down. Essentially, the idea is that if a girl believes another girl may "get" you in whatever sense that may be—sex, relationship, wife and so on—she will subconsciously be more attracted to you. We've all heard many variations of this. For example, how sometimes married men are deemed more desirable or how showing up with a girl at a bar makes it easier to attract more girls (girls attract girls). It is somewhat a form of irrational jealousy at its root—a girl wants what she doesn't have simply because another girl has it.

In Practice

A few of my own life experiences clearly substantiate this theory:

The Roommate: Two years ago or so I had just came back from a long trip to Europe and needed a room to crash in until my next trip. Two girls I found online were looking for a third roommate. The place was big, the girls were cool, the location was prime and the price was right. I specifically recall actually turning on some game principles to make sure they wanted me in there as the roommate, and it worked.

The first night I was there I went out with some buddies and got drunk. I never made it home but slept on my buddy's couch. The girls however thought I went home with a girl. When they asked me about it, I just smiled, didn't answer and went in my room. The next night I had a date with a girl, as I did the following two nights with different girls. One I brought back.

Within the first week, one of the roommates essentially threw herself at me and we hooked up (bad idea on its own, but nonetheless proves this immediate point). The other one had a boyfriend and kept requesting to see my penis and asking me if I was some sort of sex god. I barely even spoke to these girls during that first week—it was all a result of their perception that other girls want me.

Ukraine: I alluded to this during Roosh's interview with me about my Eastern Europe trip this past summer. In Ukraine and Russia, girls are highly competitive and jealous. Some of the stories are stated here so I won't repeat them. But it happened frequently. The same virgin I mention in that story I parlayed into another bang when a girl who did not respond to my texts saw me out with her, and then literally waited until almost 5am until that one went home to jump in a cab with me. Other girls who blew me off would come back and talk to me after seeing me chat with other girls.

My iPhone: As terrible as this invention has been for dating culture, I've found a way to utilize it for some good. Last year a girl sent me a text during the date and I had accidentally left my phone out. My date saw the text and kept asking me who "Yulia" was and she got noticeably warmer towards me after that incident. My brain started working and realizing the effect this had, I started implementing a variation of this.

I don't blatantly leave my phone out like that date but tweaked the strategy to be a bit more subtle. Contrary to popular opinion I usually try to show up to my dates earlier than the girl for a number of reasons. While waiting for her, I'll take that time to send out numerous texts to people I owe responses to, to girls I need to follow up with, to coworkers, friends, etc.

I put my phone in my pocket and start the date. After about an hour or so, I will be talking about something that requires a photo to better understand the story. Naturally I will need my phone to show the photo, so I pull my phone out and almost every time I will have several texts waiting for me in response to the texts I sent out before she arrived. On the iPhone, these show up on the home screen and since most girls are text whores themselves they know what those green little icons mean.

A minor but calculated tactic, it leads to the predictable response from the girl of "oh Mr. Popular!" or something along those lines, which I ignore and proceed to the photo I was showing. The seed however has been planted and whether true or not, she now believes there are other people, and more importantly girls, trying to contact me.

In Conclusion

There are many, many tools in one's game that leads to continued success. This is a small, yet very effective one. The key however is to be subtle and indirect. If you start bragging about how many dates you have lined up or girls you are banging, it will come across as blowhard and insecure. The less you speak and the more she sees, the better off you are.

The One Lift That Helps You Have Incredible Sex

January 8, 2014 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Sometimes you just have to choke a bitch. And that's just one of many physical talents you'll need to fuck a girl properly. These talents call on practically every part of your body – you'd need several exercises, if not several workouts, to cover each one.

I had done a Starting Strength style workout for some time, and it gave me a good strength base. I never veered beyond it for long. But I'd get winded from doing anything for more than ten reps. I had strength, but using it for any amount of time would leave me exhausted – it was like having a gas guzzling V8 engine with a half gallon fuel tank. I'd get winded during sex if I went at it hard, and it was bumming me out. And when I'd get physically exhausted, it'd be harder to keep an erection, especially with a rubber on (hypothetically speaking of course). And the very nature of sex impedes a linear progression that any good gym workout has. I needed something that would boost my muscular endurance, so I could fuck for longer.

Turns out there's one exercise that covers all your bases when it comes to good hard fucking: the kettlebell hip swing. Instead of describing in detail what the exercise is, I'll post a demonstration, originally embedded on Bret Contreras' article on kettlebell swings.

You use your hips like a hinge to swing a weight back and forth, from behind your legs to chest height or higher. The kettlebell hip swing works several sets of muscles in the body all at once. If you pick a weight that's challenging enough, you'll feel the benefits rather quickly. Think of it as a standing kettlebell hip thrust, because you thrust your glutes forward to propel the bell up and out. I don't presume to be any expert, but professional ass-man Contreras says the woman above has excellent form.

Benefits

It’s like sex – The unique thing about the swing is the direction of force: you’re thrusting FORWARD. You are basically humping your hips forward and through to get the weight up. The exercises that everyone loves to recommend, like the squat and the deadlift, have a vertical plane of motion. Considering that you’ll be fornicating forward for the most part, the kettlebell swing resembles sex far more than those squats, deadlifts, snatches or cleans ever will. None of those exercises feature a thrust that is anything like sex. The low bar squat or back squat comes closest, but it’s still miles away from primal thrusting.

Generally when fucking in any position, 80-100% of your motion is horizontal relative to your body, and 0-20% of it is vertical. The kettlebell swing is similar – the vast majority of your hips’ movement during the swing is horizontal, with a small but notable vertical component. The kettlebells we’re talking about can range from 35 lbs to 200+ lbs (16kg to 96+kg).

The more a lift resembles something you do in real life, the more natural it will feel, and the more beneficial it will be in your life outside the gym. Plus, the odds of injury will be much lower, and you won’t need complicated, expensive instruction on how to do it properly. The kettlebell swing is something you already do, every time you get in bed with a woman.

Choke Grip – swinging a 40+ lb weight for several hundred reps will give your grip muscles a nice workout – especially when you start going up in weight on the kettlebell. I've only just got to the point where my grip is getting to be a limiting factor, and only when I go for high reps. Kettlebells give you a good endurance grip workout that's hard to get from other lifts. There's farmer walks of course, but it can be a bitch to maneuver around a gym with 100 lb (45 kg) dumbbells in each hand. Plus the swing does so much more at the same time.

Glute Recruitment – if you don't already know how, heavy kettlebell swings WILL teach you how to fuck. With a heavier bell, you just can't get the weight up unless you are thrusting your ass forward. You will have to contract your glutes and clench your butt cheeks together to get that heavy bell to reach the top of the swing – and that's what good sex feels like too.

Flexibility – I have probably never done a conventional deadlift properly. I had always written off stretches as gay and lame because I was lazy. I never got the flexibility in my lower back and hamstrings to do them properly, but I did them anyway.

I don't recommend that, as you put yourself at great risk of injury if you lift without the requisite flexibility. But the kettlebell is a harsh, instructive mistress – I felt significant tension and pain in my lower back for the first workout or two, and it disappeared thereafter. Same for my hamstrings – I felt some soreness after the first couple workouts, and then it went away. Just doing the swing eased my body into greater flexibility; the swings alone will enhance your flexibility. I'm nowhere near perfect, my torso doesn't get parallel to the ground like the woman in the video, but if your flexibility is lacking, kettlebells can be a small aid, and motivate you to do more flexibility work to get the motion right.

Listen to your nerves and don't press yourself too hard if you feel heavy tension or pain. Rest as many days as you need to recover. But you'll find that problems with flexibility will ease with time.

This is also why I recommend starting with a low weight for high reps, eg 25+ – it's much safer on your joints and muscles to do a low weight for reps for a completely new exercise. If you go for a heavy weight, low rep scheme, you could injure yourself right when you've started.

It’s Mentally Grueling – for better or worse, swings are even hard on your mind. Doing 500 reps of anything will take its toll. Even harder is that you’ll fail in explicable ways – maybe one workout you get 300 reps with 36 kg, and the next workout you can barely get 150, even when you had all the rest you could ask for. It’s frustrating as all hell, but if you stick with it you’re guaranteed to see progress. This routinely happens to me – I’d attribute it to variations in the swinging form that make it easier or harder to get through the workout.

Variety – It sounds paradoxical to say that a single exercise offers variety. But in the short time I’ve done kettlebell swings, I’ve noticed that after almost every workout, I had a different limiting factor, a different muscle group that failed and prevented me from continuing. It could be my grip or my lower back, my cardiovascular system or my hamstrings. You’ll never really know how you’ll fail, but with adequate sleep and food, you’ll come back stronger every time.

Fat Loss – Many people tout fat loss as a primary benefit of kettlebell training. I was skeptical – I wasn’t exactly untrained, and didn’t expect any fat loss. Hell, I didn’t think I had much to lose. After starting to train with kettlebells, I lost about 4-5 pounds – it sounds like little, but for someone who’s not looking to lose weight, I had people telling me they noticed I lost weight. Over the same time frame though, I made some other changes which may have contributed, like eating more coconut oil instead of butter. I can’t pinpoint whether it was the kettlebell or the coconut oil that played the part – I’d recommend incorporating both.

Dat Man Ass – I already had a meaty ass, so this is a non-issue for me. But some guys are a little lacking in that department. I always found it odd that bodybuilders, a group obsessed with making every muscle as big as possible, would glaringly ignore the biggest muscle in the body – and the one essential to athleticism. They were probably worried everyone would think they were homosexual – I hear a lot of bodybuilders actually are. Anyhow, I have a sneaking suspicion that guys who have a small, weak ass tend to be mentally and psychologically weak as well. Dudes with big strong asses are rooted men. You tend to know where they stand on things. The assless are spineless, and heavy swings will help you build strong roots. And it'll boost your swagger (skip to 37:50):

Spreading The Big Booty Gospel – Once you've gotten a big ass yourself, your immediate next step is to acquire a big-assed woman or three for yourself. Now that you've gained some proficiency with the kettlebell swing, it's time to get preaching. Sing the swing's praises, and get your girls on your program. Fuck Brazilian blowouts, it's time for your bottom bitch to get that Bunda Brasileira. Make her homepage http://bretcontreras.com/, home to the world's foremost expert on ass hypertrophy. Set one of the photos of Jen Selter, pictured here, as the wallpaper on her phone to give her dat ass envy.

Endurance – if you're used to just lifting weights, there's a good chance you have weak endurance. I did. There are a lot of ways to get a great endurance workout, notably high intensity interval training (HIIT), or short bouts of intense exercise – and kettlebell swings is one great option. Considering all the other benefits, if you were already doing a bit of endurance work, the swing can take its place.

Posture – I won't presume to know how exactly your lower back works, so I won't try. But the dynamic motion of the swing, where you're moving your body in a natural arc (remember, it's like fucking) lends itself to a stronger lower back and improved posture.

Programming

I started with a rep scheme based on Dan John's 10,000 swing workout – start with a pyramid sequence of swings:

10 swings + rest
15 swings + rest
50 swings + rest

I liked this one because the high rep scheme resembles sexual activity much more than a low rep scheme would. Experiment with rest periods of different duration between sets and sequences. Personally, I don't concern myself with specific rest times – I rest until I feel ready for the next set. John recommends doing exercises between each set of swings, but I wanted to really focus on the swings, so I do other exercises after I'm totally finished with the swings.

Lately though, I've been doing more lifting, and cut down the kettlebells. Instead, I'll do a set or two of 25-50 reps for the heaviest bell I can manage, at the end of my workout. It's hard to find kettlebells heavy enough to make a low rep scheme effective anyway (eg 300 lb kettlebells), so you'll have to confine yourself to high rep sets. Track your progress in a notebook or an app like Jefit and try to do more each workout. If your gym doesn't have a good set of kettlebells, you can use a dumbbell instead, buy one, or build your own.

Are Younger Women Really Better Than Older Women?

January 8, 2014 | by General Stalin | Link | Original Link

Here at ROK, it is no secret that a woman's best assets dwindle with age. It is also no secret that Western women in particular tend to squander their best years. With that said, I have had the opportunity to compare and contrast the differences between a night-in with a 19-year-old girl and a 28-year-old woman. I will report my results, but first, the control…

Setting The Stage

I didn't intentionally plan on this ahead of time, but it just happened to work out that I was going to be seeing these girls on back-to-back days. First, a fact about me: I'm a home field advantage kind of guy. I am a bit of a hermit and an introvert, so I prefer day/convenience game and dating logistics to be focused around hanging at my place instead of going out. Both of these dates were planned for the girl to come to my place, I'd make dinner or buy take out and throw a movie on to vibe out physical responsiveness.

Girl Y

Girl Y is 28 years old. She works all the time, lives alone, has a cat, and her best friend is her mother (so it seems). She is overweight, but talks about her gym routine often. After some discussion, it is apparent that her exercise habits are very up and down, especially since her “busy schedule makes it hard to work out regularly.” She talks about work and her coworkers most of the time, the rest of the time she talks about her cat and how silly/cute/crazy/affectionate it is. We both ate a plate full of food.

On the couch with a movie on, I put my arm behind her back and position myself close to her in order to gauge her responsiveness, after school special style. She remains tucked in the corner of the couch legs crossed. It’s obvious if any kind of action is going to happen tonight, I will have to do all the work. After some more talking as the night grows on, I interrupt her mid-cat story with the kiss. She is responsive.

I put her on top of me, take the shirt and bra off, lay her down, start grinding, and then I propose the bedroom move. She becomes apprehensive and gives the “time of the month” resistance. I tell her my bathroom is right there and I don’t mind if she doesn’t mind. She then says it’s too soon and that she should go. I’m not one to lay the pressure on, so I concede and let her on her merry way.

Girl X

Girl X is 19 years old, works a lot, and lives with her parents. She is petite with a slim, tight body, and perfect handfuls of ass and breast. She doesn't really talk unless I ask her something. I don't know who her friends are or if she has any pets. I ate a plate full of food and she only had a half portion.

On the couch with a movie on, I put my arm over behind her back and position myself close to her in order to gauge her responsiveness. She scooches closer to me and leans her head into my shoulder a bit, and holds my hand that is around her shoulder. Laser show. As the night grows on, I lean in for a kiss during a slight awkward silence. She is responsive.

I put her on top of me, take the shirt and bra off, lay her down, start grinding, and then I propose the bedroom move. She becomes apprehensive and gives the "time of the month" resistance. I tell her my bathroom is right there and I don't mind if she doesn't mind. She pauses and agrees. She comes upstairs shortly after me and we bang. We lay in bed for a while and she goes home saying she has to be up early and has laundry to do. I never did find a tampon in my trash.

What Does It All Mean?

Looking over the course of history of my dating life, these contrasts have been seemingly ubiquitous. Every younger girl I've dated has been carefree, cute, adventurous, easy in bed, and fun to spend time with. All the older girls were boring, let their bodies go, had kids, talked a lot about work/friends/exes/themselves, loved cats too much, and were often times more difficult in the sexual department. Come to think of it, I dated a girl once in her mid 20's who was an exact middle ground—cute, liked her cat too much, talked about work too much, easy in the sack but not too adventurous, had a tight body that she was starting to let go of. Too bad.

After a series of relationships that had gone south, I had figured my problem was that younger women were just too irresponsible, immature, selfish, dumb, and ignorant to invest in. I thought older women were the ticket. After some soul-searching, in conjunction with some enlightenment I discovered stumbling upon the mansophere, I have come to the realization that is the wrong way to look at it. Essentially, in our culture, there is really no woman worth investing in. Spending time with women, enjoying their company, having sex with them, and so forth is all you really need. This is much better done with young, energetic, pretty, living-in-the-moment girls.

You're a strong, independent, self-driven, and focused man who already has your shit together. What value would an established career woman add to your life? You don't need more money, you don't need a woman to be responsible for you, and you don't need a partner who is "on your level." You're a man who wants to enjoy the company of someone beautiful and feminine. Someone who can physically and emotionally satisfy you while you go about your life. Ask yourself: is an aging single mom or self-absorbed chubby with a 401k going to satisfy you?

A Players' Guide To Wine Appreciation

January 8, 2014 | by Mark Law | Link | Original Link

A recent RVF forum thread brought to my attention the degree of ignorance that exists when it comes to tasting and appreciating wine. This saddens me because I respect wine as a beverage, an industry, and a tradition.

You don't need to shell out thousands of dollars on some exotic label to find a delicious wine that's right for you. But the first step is to know what your tastes are, because if you don't know that, then it's hard to know where to start looking.

I'll use girls as an analogy. If I asked you what kind of girl you're after, are you going to give me some vague answer like "motherly virtue," "great personality," or "confidence"? No, you're going to tell me you want tits, ass, legs, and great muscle tone. These are objective and measurable attributes. Likewise with wine it frustrates me to no end when people can't properly describe what they are tasting. "I just like it" or "it's just nice and fruity" won't cut it.

This is going to be a quick and dirty guide just to get you started on thinking about the wines you drink. I hope you'll have a better idea about your likes and dislikes as you go along. (Much of this is based on the WSET level 3 Systematic Approach to Tasting (SAT), and the notes are available to peruse here.)

Appearance

Before approaching a girl, you observe her from afar to see if she's hot enough for your tastes. Does she have a cute face or a man-jaw, is her ass round or flat, is she incessantly staring at her smartphone or reading a book on the grass?

Likewise with wine, before drinking you look at it through the glass. The basic things to consider are Clarity, Intensity and Colour, and other miscellaneous stuff like "tears" or sediment.

Clarity – Dirty ho or innocent Madonna? Is the wine hazy or is it clear?

Intensity – Does the girl look like another fucking bimbo airhead or does she look like she can hold a decent conversation? Is the wine light and pale, or dark and deep?"

Colour – You like your girls black, white or Asian? Maybe even mixed race? Pale Asian or tan Asian? With wine, first decide if it's Red, White, or Rose, then go into detail – e.g., if Red, is it purple, ruby or garnet?

Miscellaneous – Is she wearing flats or high heels, has she shaved her armpits, any piercings or tattoos, etc.? Does the wine have small bubbles, thick legs/tears, sediment? Small observational details can be surprisingly telling.

Nose

Time to approach the target. You've observed her from afar, now we close the distance. Things to consider are Condition, Intensity, Aromas, and Development.

Condition – Has she taken a shower? Does she use shampoo or perfume? Is the wine corked or sour? If everything seems fine, continue. If she smells like cats, head to the chopper!

Intensity – Has she put on way too much perfume or is it just a bare whiff that you can't quite put your finger on? Is the wine subdued or very expressive?

Aromas – What exactly is it that you are smelling? Perfume, shampoo, or old cat lady stench? Is her shampoo floral, coconut, citrus, herbal? Are you getting red, black or blue fruits in the wine? Tropical?

Development – Was the perfume applied 5 minutes or 5 hours ago? Does it smell refreshing or is it getting stale? Is the wine still showing primary fruit or is it showing oxidative/developed elements (e.g. leather, game, toffee, etc…)

Palate

Time to break out the opener. Open your mouth and have a sip. We all know the feeling of over-analysing openers before the approach, and likewise with wine there are going to be a lot more factors to think about. Things to consider are Sweetness, Acidity, Tannin (Red wines only), Alcohol, Body, Flavour Intensity, Flavour Characteristics, Miscellaneous and Finish. Simple, isn't it?

Sweetness – Is she a cool ice queen or a sweet angelic specimen? Is the wine Dry or Sweet or somewhere in between? How far along the scale is it on?

Acidity – Does the chick have a quick wit, or is she an intellectual marshmallow? Acid gives wines its vibrancy and freshness, so wines lacking in this department are sometimes described as “flabby.” Don’t look for “sourness” when detecting acid, other flavours can hide it. Acid can be detected by “hanging” your tongue so it doesn’t touch the sides of your mouth and seeing how much saliva production the wine induces. More saliva = more acid.

Tannin – This applies to red wines only. Tannins are what causes the mouth-drying sensation when you drink the wine. Sorry guys, can’t think of a girl-related anecdote for this one.

Alcohol – Is the girl soft-spoken or fiery? Alcohol is detected by the sensation of heat on the back palate. This isn’t always correlated with the alcohol percentage indicated on the bottle. I’ve had wines at 15%ABV that were approachable because all the other elements came together nicely, and others at 12% where the alcohol was very evident because there wasn’t much else going on.

Body – This is kind of a “whole package” consideration – Has the girl demonstrated she has a lot of depth to her, or is she as interesting as a feminist hipster? Has the wine shown you enough depth and complexity to be full-bodied, or is it just a light-bodied wine, nothing wrong with it but nothing to write home about?

Flavour Intensity – Is the girl outgoing or is talking to her like pulling teeth? Is the wine naturally expressive or do you have to swallow a mouthful to get any flavour?

Flavour Characteristics – You’ve gotten to know her, so what are the girl’s hopes, dreams and passions? What flavours are coming out of the wine? Wood? Spice? Fruits? What kind of fruit, and in what condition – fresh, dried and canned fruits all have their distinctive attributes.

Miscellaneous – Anything that hasn’t been discussed above – has the girl been congruent? Does she say she’s a virgin but has lots of tattoos and piercings? Is the wine well-balanced or is it all over the place? Tannin is something I like to focus on here, because there are lots of different expressions – silky, velvety, astringent, chalky…

Finish – Did your conversation with the girl end after one minute or one hour? Does the wine linger on the palate forever, or does it fade quickly, forcing you to take another sip?

Conclusions

Judgement time. Will you call her and set up a date? Drinks, dinner or just pizza and movie at your place? Things to consider are Quality, Readiness for Drinking, Identity, and Price.

Quality – Obviously this is a very personal and subjective category and as a wine aficionado I like to be generous. Most girls have done nothing to deserve a harsh rating, so be gentle. If she was a total bitch, give her the benefit of the doubt because maybe she’s had a bad day. If the girl is outstanding, lock her down and enjoy. If the wine is poor just put aside the glass and order another. If the wine is outstanding, buy a hundred cases and stash them in your cellar.

Readiness – Is she breathing heavily and dripping wet for you, or is there LMR to overcome? Is the wine ready to drink now, or too young and needing time to open up?

Identity – Is she a ONS or LTR material? Maybe she even reminds you of your ex. Does this wine remind you of anything you've had before? Where is the wine from and what varietal is it?

Price – Is she easy to please or a golddigger? Is the wine fantastic value for money, or will you only splurge on special occasions?

So that's about it. It'll take lots of drinking and tasting before you can consider all of the above in a natural manner, but the point isn't memorization. You just need to be aware of these factors when tasting wine, not just whether or not the label looks pretty. We all know how feminist landwhales deceive us with camera angles on dating sites.

In the end it's not about the wine, it's about you. You're the one who's going to have to drink it. Just like with girls, in the end you'll be the one who will have to deal with her bullshit. So know what you want and never compromise.

4 Steps That Help Build Your Confidence

January 9, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Confidence, whether real or faked, is the core of our Inner Self that alpha men are recognized of having above all else. Ask any woman what trait they notice in a man first, or which trait they desire first and foremost in the opposite sex and almost guaranteed, they will answer with a resounding "confidence". Why is this? Because confidence is the appearance of being capable. Capable of what, you may ask. Capable of anything.

When a confident playboy walks into a social situation, say a fundraiser, and looks everyone in the eye, that physical behavior sends signals to both men and women that he is a man who can backup what he says (whether he can or not). He is the equivalent of a male lion walking into the territory of his prey and sizing up his surroundings and its dwellers.

While men may feel challenged, threatened, or subservient to this behavior, women will be drawn to it, due to the biological reaction they have to seeing a High Value Male display confidence. The display of confidence, through body language, is a natural turn on for women. They are hard-wired to be drawn to the most alpha male in their vicinity and will often compete with each other in a social setting in order to gain the alpha's attention.

Whether the playboy's confidence is based in reality or not, does not matter initially, because the appearance of something, is better than the appearance of nothing

Wallflowers do not get respect, nor do they get laid. I am a huge advocate of one being irrationally confident in the beginning stages of a man building his confidence, because most people cannot decipher between real or fake confidence; they only can get a knee jerk reaction to the display of confidence.

Why is it important to focus on confidence? Because most people truly are not confident. Take a look around? Are you at a coffee shop? How many of the people looked you in the eye when you walked in, or did they nervously glance over and quickly divert their eyes when you glanced back at them? The rise of social media and an increasing dependence on smart phones and technology has only increased the lack of most individuals social skills. Instead of having a competent conversation with others in their peer group, they are buried in Facebook updates and feeding their never ending thirst for Instagram 'likes' for validation.

Another reason that your confidence is key to building your Inner Self, is that without it, you simply become a shell with zero substance, which is fundamentally flawed to increasing your value as a man. To become a playboy, external attributes are necessary, but to become a great playboy, real grounded confidence must be fostered and developed.

Confidence is based on the belief that you, no matter your physical attributes, net-worth, career or connections, have real worth. I have done this for years and it's quite effective: I imagine that I am stripped bare of any material possessions, I have nothing on, no fancy suit, literally nothing. I am stripped bare of money, friends, lovers, notoriety, everything. Then, when I look in the mirror, what do I see? Who am I? Do I still have confidence? Do I still feel like a man of worth? Yes. Why is this? Because I have based my confidence on who I am with nothing, not based on who I am with everything. Wealth can be stripped away, lovers can leave, family can pass away and career prospects can dry up, so then what are we left with? Building confidence with a firm foundation must start with who you are at the core.

If you really want to re-build your life, then take the time to do the steps I am breaking down, so that you can start your path to being a playboy on the right foot and with the real tools needed to succeed.

Step 1: Who Am I?

Write down your Strengths. Forget your weaknesses right now. This isn't about what you're NOT, it's about what you ARE. List every talent you have. Even if you think you don't have talents, you do. Every man is your superior in one way.

Step 2: List Your Strength and Talents

Based on the strengths and talents you've written down, what could you parlay those into? Great with computers and programming? Then maybe you'll design a very successful new phone app. Are you in phenomenal physical shape? Then maybe you'll become a fitness model flying around the world getting paid big bucks to pose lifting, or maybe you'll become a famous personal trainer and open your own line of fitness products. Write down quickly all of the great things you can become based on your talents and strengths alone. I bet you feel more confident already. There is nothing wrong with taking count of all of your strengths, talents and positive attributes that make you a a unique individual.

Step 3: Affirmations

The third step is one that you should do DAILY, until your confidence has grown and fully developed. Hell, you can even keep doing them, as do I, because a daily reminder is the best way to maximize your potential. Every morning before leaving your house for the day and EVERY night before you go to sleep, look in the mirror and speak affirmations with conviction.

I promise you, if you actually do them without cynicism and really believing, that you will increase your confidence. The key is not to look at affirmations as magic words, because it's not magic; it's simply speaking positively to yourself and claiming those words as truths about yourself. Let's be honest, a lot of us don't have anyone speaking positively to our faces everyday, so you must be responsible for your own well being, by starting your day right and reaffirming yourself first**.

Here are some examples of what you can use. Feel free to change them around and tailor make them for yourself, because this is all about you.

- "I am a Man of Worth"
- "I am a Man of Success"
- "I am getting stronger and stronger in every way, every day"
- "I am a Great Man"
- "Fuck the haters. I'm becoming better every day"
- "I WILL reach my goals"
- "I WILL be a success"
- "No matter what, I will reach my goals"
- "I am NOT a pussy. I will push through every obstacle"
- "Girls love me"

- “Girls want to fuck me”
- “Girls are drawn to me”
- “I believe” (Use this affirmation as your final one. Look yourself in the eye in the mirror and really take a second to believe it. This is extremely powerful.)

The reason why affirmations like these work is because it affects your Vibe and Energy. Remember those days when you leave the gym and you’re feeling invincible, or you just cashed a large check and you walk out of the bank with your wallet full? Affirmations done repeatedly and with conviction will help re-create these feelings and when you go about your day, people will be drawn to this energy. A component of Charisma is directly related to Vibe and Energy. Want to be more Charismatic? Do Affirmations. Want to start your day reaffirming truth? Do Affirmations. Want to go about your day with your head held high because you started it with building the foundation of your confidence? Do Affirmations.

Step 4: Work On Your Goals

Nothing builds confidence quicker than achieving a goal. These don’t have to be massive goals, I’m talking about mini-goals, such as do 10 chinups by next week. See, the accumulation of small goals starts to take on the shape of the larger goals. If you set the goal of doing 10 chinups by next week, then 15 the next week and increasing by 5 each week, then fast-forward in 3 months and you’ll have the back of Thor. Along the way to your overall goal of building a great back, your confidence will start to increase because you’re working hard towards the goal by hitting the mini-goals.

A Mainstream Journalist Takes The Red Pill

January 9, 2014 | by Dalton | Link | Original Link

For the past ten years I've drifted around Northern California trying to approximate the life of a freelance magazine writer. Yes I was the proud owner of a journalism degree (from NYU no less) and of course I was gunning for the upper echelons of mainstream media. Outside! Newsweek! Esquire! My blue pill self was convinced I was going to be the next Tom Wolfe. Or, barring that, at least the next Sebastian Junger.

I worked shitty jobs like driving tour busses and pouring wine at various tasting rooms while getting the occasional profile published in the San Francisco Chronicle. Mostly of men I admired or aspired to be like. Celebrity chefs, professional cyclists, war correspondents and such. Red pill guys (before I was even aware of the term) who were focused on their mission and working their asses off to create something larger than themselves. In turn they inspired me to focus on my own mission. I'd spend hours re-typing great pieces of journalism, hoping the talent would seep into me osmotically.

And I never fucked around with ethics, practically freezing to death one fall night in Montana rather than accept a free hotel room when I didn't have a dollar in my pocket. Work hard. Play by the rules. Eventually the editors in New York would make a place for me at the table. (In retrospect I couldn't have been more plugged into the matrix.)

I followed my formula assiduously

I worked hard and waited. And after that I waited some more. The years went by and brought with them a disastrous marriage, an ill-fated business venture and a nearly suicidal bout with depression. I all but gave up on journalism. Then, reinvigorated by my divorce and a move to a college town, I decided at 31-years-old to give it one last shot.

While perusing Captain Capitalism's blog I came across a story about the TV personality Mike Rowe, and his efforts to get kids to sidestep traditional four-year college (and student loan debt hell) in favor of trade school. He had created a slick PR campaign and a work ethic-based scholarship fund to go with it. And he was traveling the country in an attempt to raise awareness and bring it to the next level.

"Holy shit!?" was my immediate reaction. All the ingredients were there. An outspoken, charismatic guy on a quixotic quest to shake up higher education? Who had the audacity to question the time-honored shibboleth that little Johnny just has to go to college in order to be successful? This was huge. A softball lovingly lobbed in my direction by the gods of journalism. It had to be my big break. And sure enough I got the green light from an editor at Men's Journal, a glossy MSM magazine based in New York City.

Mike was awesome from the start

I tracked him down with the help of my longtime friend and volunteer research assistant Trisha. And we met up at his office in a sound studio in San Francisco, where presumably he was doing voiceovers for a commercial. I only knew him like most other people know him: that crazy guy from the Discovery Channel show Dirty Jobs who, over the space of a decade, crawled through sewers in some 220 different countries cracking poop jokes. (When not narrating Deadliest Catch or extolling the virtues of the latest Ford F-150.)

I found him genuine and likable in way that most celebrities aren't. And from the moment he opened his mouth it was clear that 1) this guy was really, really smart, and 2) he knew his shit when it came to how our country is going down the drain one offshored factory at a time. He expressed genuine concern for my fellow millennials and our "debt mixed with dashed hopes." He lamented in his famously deep voice that no parents encouraged their kids to be plumbers anymore. And that the $1 trillion student loan debt bubble is potentially a national security issue.

He was in a time of transition himself, having left behind Dirty Jobs and actively looking for a new show. And he seemed excited by my interest in his mission. I explained to him that I did journalism a bit differently. That instead of meeting up in a restaurant and running through a list of stale questions, I spend weeks, sometimes months, just hanging around and observing. (It's the only way to truly gain understanding of a story. My personal battle against the thin, baseless gruel that constitutes 99 percent of mainstream journalism.)

He liked my style and invited me to hang out with him at an upcoming Caterpillar conference in New Orleans. We parted ways with a handshake and I remember my head swimming as I stepped out onto the streets of San Francisco. It was by far the most interesting story I had ever come across in my career. And it was mine for the taking.

Men's Journal pulls out

As Trisha and I did background research and looked into air fares and other logistics, disaster struck. Despite assurance by an editor that the story was a lock, Men's Journal was pulling out. They had too many short profiles in the works. They were no longer interested. ("Oh by the way, fuck you" being a not uncommon occurrence in the magazine world.) I stared blankly at the email for a few minutes then slowly walked to the freezer and helped myself to a fifth of Jack Daniels. In the drunken haze that constituted the next 36 hours, I must have emailed Mike, saying that I wanted to keep going with the story anyway with the hope of landing it in another national magazine. He responded with the following:

> First, I like that you sent this at 3:01 am. No self-respecting freelance writer would be asleep at that time…Secondly, you're welcome to come to NOLA and see what's going on without a publisher on board. But before you start paying for plane tickets and hotel rooms out of your own pocket, I'd suggest we meet in person and have a conversation about a more comprehensive piece. Truth is, I'm no more interested in a "short profile" than Men's Journal is…

Two weeks later I found myself sitting on the floor in Mike's suite in the Ritz-Carlton, New Orleans, furiously scribbling in my pitman-ruled reporter's notebook. This after his spending a day meeting with television writers and the president of a billion dollar manufacturing company. He was sitting at a desk, checking emails on his Macbook Pro, while bouncing ideas off his entourage, who had draped themselves over various pieces of furniture around the room. They were trying to hash out the details of a nationwide work ethic-based scholarship to get deserving kids into reputable trade schools. ("Because being poor isn't enough.")

Mike periodically lightened the mood by telling stories of the bodily fluids that could be found with a black light on swanky hotel room ceilings. And how it's a party foul for a man to take a shit in another man's bathroom. All the while I was working my Droid, emailing my way through a list of magazine editors that Trisha had compiled for me. Vanity Fair? Not interested. GQ? No response. Rolling Stone? Not a chance. Remembering a school connection, I shot Mike an email asking if he'd be comfortable with Playboy. "I won't pose," he emailed back from across the room.

Later that month Mike traveled to New York City to make the talk show rounds. Digital voice recorder in hand, I followed him into the NBC Studios at Rockefeller Center. By this time I had worked my way through my entire list of editors and generated not a glimmer of interest. I had maxed out my credit cards on plane tickets and hotel rooms without a payday in sight. I was in full-on desperation mode. And I was still following Mike because I was ignoring the reality that was staring me in the face: the story was DOA.

After a lengthy wait in the green room, I sat out of view of the camera while he taped a segment for The Ed Show on MSNBC. (Flirting with a cute production assistant to help pass the time.) I remember marveling at what I saw. That this television show supposedly represented the very pinnacle of my profession. And yet the host spent most of the brief segment ignoring Mike's quest in favor of goading him for appearing with Mitt Romney on the 2012 presidential campaign trail. "Gotcha journalism" at its best. I shook my head in amazement as I lost my last remaining shreds of respect for mainstream media.

Back out on the street Mike was clearly disappointed, though he remained calm and philosophical. "People watch his show because they want to see a fight," he said. "He said exactly what his audience want to hear." His colleague Mary Sullivan told him that 30 people unfriended him on Facebook since the segment aired a few minutes earlier, but 150 people had added him. He nodded his head and gamely signed a few autographs for passersby before we crawled into the back of a chauffeured black Chevy Tahoe.

Instead of going back to the hotel Mike said that we were making a brief detour to have a "chat" at a restaurant around the corner. "Oh shit," I remember thinking to myself. This was where I was going to get my ass chewed out for having wasted his time. As I glumly exited the back of the SUV I noticed several people dressed in character wandering up and down the streets in advance of New York Comic Con. And as we went inside and seated ourselves at a table, I braced myself for the tongue-lashing that was sure to come. But it never did. Instead of reaming me out, Mike basically offered to call it a day and compensate me for the expenses I'd racked up to that point. He felt sorry for me. Though I didn't take him up on his offer, I was overwhelmed by his generosity.

That night I opened up my email to find a note from one of my old NYU professors. I knew he was connected to The Atlantic among other magazines and I had sought his advice. His response was this:

> Dorsey,

> I have to be honest with you, I don't think this is a very interesting story. I'd drop it and cut your losses…

It was the last straw

After drunkenly partying away my remaining days in NYC, I went home to the realization that basically everything I had been working for up to that point was based in a lie. My "degree" was an expensive joke. Mainstream journalism was dead. And regardless of the quality of our ideas or our work ethic, guys like me weren't getting a shot. That place at the table I so coveted was being reserved for the twenty-something nitwits who perpetrated the 20/20 manosphere hack job. And in typical blue pill fashion I let my life fall apart. I lost my part-time job, my friendship and working relationship with Trisha, and did my best to keep the corner liquor store in business.

But over time, and with considerable help from the wise voices of the manosphere, I began to pull myself together. Yes, our current world is pretty much shit. And men (and women) are fed lies from the day we're born. But waking up to that fact, be it at age 16 or 65, is the first step in extricating oneself from the matrix. We can strive to be like Mike and do our best to stick with our mission and fight the pretty lies and the powers of evil. The student loan pushers. The money printers. The misandrists.

As for me? I've said fuck you to mainstream journalism. I'm sure I'll submit a story here or there for rent money. But that's as deep as it goes. Now I'm searching for a clever pseudonym and thinking about ways I can contribute to the manosphere. Oh yeah, and I signed up for a welding class at my local craft center. Perhaps I learned something from my experience with Mike after all.

How To Seduce A Lesbian As A Straight Man

I can hear you already. "How can you write this?! Lesbians don't want to have sex with men!"

Before you nay-say, let me preface this article with one thing: I've done this. I've had sex with a full-on gold-star lesbian, and made out with several more. It's not difficult. In fact, most of lesbians have had sex with men.

"But why would you want to have sex with a lesbian?"

Well, person with low-testosterone, lesbians combine the fantasy of hot girl-on-girl action, with a woman who is untouched by other men. Someone who is deeply sexual, experienced, and a "virgin" at the same time. You'll be boldly going where no man has gone before.

To seduce a lesbian, you need to have basic game down. If you can't pull a straight woman, you're not going to be able to pull a lesbian.

Here's how to fulfill your sapphic fantasies:

1. Pick The Right Target

It's no secret that many lesbians aren't lesbians because they like women, but because they hate men. Avoid women who use words like "queer" or "cisgendered", and blame patriarchy for the evils of the world. You want a girl who befriends men, but happens to be sexually attracted to women.

Look for someone you'd describe as a "cool girl." A good test is to comment on another girl you find attractive in front of her. If she berates you for "objectifying" women, abort. If she replies, "yeah, that girl does have a nice ass," then you've got a winner.

You may find younger lesbians are simply experimenting with their sexual identity, and actually bisexual. Bisexual women are fun, but for the purposes of this article, I'm assuming you're seducing a full-on lesbian.

Keep in mind, you may take a quality hit when seducing lesbians. Most non-butch lesbians are cute, but don't look like the girls in lesbian porn. If you want a girl who looks like a male fantasy, pick a girl who wants to be a male fantasy. Seducing a lesbian is a different challenge.

2. Approach Her Indirectly

While it's not uncommon to have sex with a straight girl thirty minutes into a coffee date, it's unlikely you'll be able to pull a lesbian for a same night lay from a cold approach (though not impossible).

It may seem counter-intuitive to suggest becoming “friends first,” but keep in mind you’re friending a girl who’s cool to hang out with, supports you fucking other girls, and might even make a good wingman. Lesbians think like straight men, and friendship between lesbian women and straight men is so common it actually has a name – lesbros.

3. Disqualify Yourself

Attractive lesbians are used to being hit on by straight men. The more attractive she is, the more she’s been hit on. Guys will try to tell these women they just haven’t found the right man yet, or that all she needs is some good “deep dicking.”

This isn’t bad because she’s a lesbian – it’s bad because it’s bad game. These men are qualifying themselves, because they take her sexual orientation as a personal rejection, and respond by trying to prove that they’re “man enough” for her, revealing their own insecurity.

Take her sexual orientation as a disqualifier, rather than rejection. Playfully tease her about it. Tell her all the reasons you could never be together, because of your standards, not hers. Behave the way a hot girl would around a guy she’s “just friends with” — let her know you enjoy hanging out with her, but when it comes to dating you’re way out of her league.

A great way to disqualify her is to talk about your other sexual experiences. Let her know you're used to pulling hotter, more feminine straight girls. Bring one around her or show her pictures. She'll likely start talking about her own sexual experiences, as way to qualify herself to you. Soon, talking about sex and turning each other on with stories will become a regular part of your relationship. Speaking of sex…

4. Be Playful And Affectionate

Just because you're friends doesn't mean you stop having a dick. You can still flirt, as long as you're playful and continue to disqualify yourself. For example, I'll say things like, "try not to fall in love with me. I know it can be confusing sometimes, because I'm very pretty like a woman, but I don't have nearly the cleavage you're used to." I grab her hand and put it on my chest. "See? Totally flat." (Sidenote: this also flips the script and is great good-looking guy game.) You can get away with the most absurd line if you say it with a smirk while having fun and don't seek a reaction from her.

Steal the frame hot girls have with their ~~beta~~ gay friends. Invite her over to curl up with you. Tell her, “I really like that we can just be affectionate with each other and it doesn’t have to go anywhere.” If you’ve already established you can pull hotter girls, this works as vulnerability and contrast game. She’ll find you sensitive, and trustworthy, and start to develop feelings for you.

Women’s sexuality is incredibly malleable because it’s based in feelings, more than looks. Rather then seducing through raw masculine energy, you’re using positive emotions. If she trusts you, likes you, knows you’re attractive to other women, is comfortable touching you, and talking about sex with you, you’re 90% there.

5. Frame It As “Just Friends Having Fun”

When straight girls get excited they’ll make out with other women, even if they don’t identify as lesbian or bisexual. Women get turned on by every type of porn, including watching bonobos fucking. When they’re having fun, lesbians will make out with their straight friends, all the damn time.

Don’t believe me? Check out this (ridiculous) documentary about lesbians and their male friends. All of them talk about making out with each other because they’re just friends having fun. When one lesbian says to her male friends, “We’ve never had sex, right?” they look away and struggle to keep a straight face.

Work up to the makout. Dance together, make her laugh, curl up with her, run your hands over each other, playfully wrestle each other – whatever happens, just frame it as friends having fun. It doesn’t mean anything. It doesn’t require her to go in her head, or question her identity. It’s all just happening in the moment. Lesbians are used initiating, so she might even pull you in for the makeout first. It will “just happen,” the same way it does with straight girls.

The best part is she doesn’t have to be attracted to men for this to work. She just has to feel good around you.

6. Isolate

Most experienced players know that women don’t want to look like a slut, and will do things alone with you they would never do in public. This is doubly true for lesbians.

Don’t put her in a position where she’ll have others question her sexual identity, or need to deal with beta male orbiters who think her making out with you means they have a chance. Hang out one-on-one, or take her to a venue where she doesn’t know anyone who might judge her.

7. Go Slow, And Teach Her To Please You

Workup to sex the same way you worked up to the makeout. She may not have experience with the male body, be intimidated by the penis, or feel like she doesn’t know how to please you. Women don't realize their inexperience can actually be attractive, or that some men enjoy teaching women how to please them.

Let her know it's okay if she doesn't know what she is doing. You two are just exploring. Let her run her hands over your body and see how you react to her touch. It can be a very exciting to see a woman reach for your cock like she has literally never seen one up close before (because she hasn't), and watch the curiosity and anticipation in her eyes.

If she's never have been penetrated, just enjoy playing together at first. Make sure she's turned on by your fingers or mouth, and enjoys exploring your cock before entering her. Treat her like you'd treat a virgin.

Take responsibility for birth control yourself, since most lesbians never have to think about this. Her body knows your sperm might be it's only shot at getting pregnant, and is liable to flood her with baby-making hormones. Be safe.

After you've both shared fun new sexual experiences, she'll rationalize the whole thing by telling herself that you're special, and "not like other guys." Love conquers all. Even lesbianism.

The 10 Most Important Principles of Leadership

January 9, 2014 | by Davis M.J. Aurini | Link | Original Link

Leadership: it's one of the cornerstones of masculinity. It isn't human resource management, or manipulation. It isn't team-building exercises where everyone gets a trophy. It isn't being a boss, demanding that your minions perform. True leadership is the upward pull, creating distinction and achievement. It is the core nature of hierarchy, understood and embraced by every member, no matter where they are on the totem pole. It is the divine spark that builds civilization.

Far more than just a strategy to achieve social dominance, leadership is the ethical code which calls out to all Men from deep within.

1. Achieve professional competence.

Note the phrasing: competence. As Jack Donovan explores in his book The Way of Men, Mastery is one of the core virtues of masculinity; and yet no man can achieve excellence in all fields. In a leadership situation you will be tasked with organizing and deploying men who are more skilled than you at their specific trades, but this doesn't mean that you can remain ignorant of their fields. A basic understanding of their jobs is necessary. A race car driver doesn't need to be a great mechanic, but he needs to understand the principles of automotives.

2. Appreciate your own strengths and limitations while pursuing self-improvement.

If you are going to demand more from your men, you need to demand more from yourself. At the same time, a leader has no room for cockiness or ego. The saying "If you want something done right, you've got to do it yourself," is the antithesis of this: either you're leading the wrong people, or you've failed to lead properly.

There's an old riddle which asks, "Who's smarter, a platoon or their Sergeant?" The answer is "The platoon – there's thirty of them!" If you're too arrogant to admit your own limitations, you won't be able to hear the words of your subordinates. A leader must be humble.

3. Seek and accept responsibility.

Again, note the phrasing: responsibility. The modern boss seeks glory, while a true leader is the opposite—he is willing to take authorship of himself and the world around him, come what may. At my old training base this was summed up as "Never pass a fault." If you see a problem, fix it – don't just walk on by, assuming somebody else will clean up the mess.

The boss seeks temporal glory and gets trapped in a "Keeping Up With the Joneses" death spiral. By eschewing glory, the true leader winds up with respect and honour. Accept such rewards gracefully.

4. Lead by example.

You are the upward pull—not the downward push. To inspire the men beneath you, show them that you work as hard as they do – harder than they do. Set a standard for them to aspire to. Be the solution; don't be the problem.

5. Make sure that your followers know your meaning and intent, then lead them to the accomplishment of the mission.

Your men are creative, thinking beings. Let them employ those skills to better the organization as a whole. You are not the boss, and they are not the minions – you are collaborators, with your hand on the helm of the ship. If they understand your intent they can improvise, they can bring you information and ideas which you wouldn't have had time to search out. These aren't a bunch of cowards who need to be hand-held—these are Men. Let them prove it to you.

6. Know your soldiers and promote their welfare.

The corporation gives us what we want, not what we need. We are all replaceable cogs. A leader recognizes his men as individuals, that they aren't disposable, and he concerns himself with their betterment. Loyalty is a two-way street. Do what's best for your soldiers, especially when this involves disciplining them. Honest concern, not manipulation, should be your goal.

7. Develop the leadership potential of your followers.

To be a good leader, you must first be a good follower. To be a good follower, you must think for yourself. Leadership is not a slave morality, it is the ethos of a Free Man. It is just as critical for your subordinates to embrace these principles as it is for you to embody them.

8. Make sound and timely decisions.

A good decision now is better than the perfect decision later. You are the head of the organization. Weigh your options carefully, but when it is time to act, act! Leadership is not a democracy and it is not a group hug session. To inspire confidence in your followers, have confidence in your decisions. If you are a subordinate, place faith in your leader, and forgive their mistakes… because one day it's going to be you who is screwing up.

9. Train your soldiers as a team and employ them up to their capabilities.

Your followers should be a switched-on group of go-getters; and go-getters aren't going to follow somebody who employs them far beneath their capabilities. Give them the opportunity for growth, and push them to surpass themselves. Give them hierarchy and cooperation, capped with a higher goal. Not the "crabs in a bucket" ideology of corporate favouritism and in-fighting.

10. Keep your followers informed of the mission, the changing situation and the overall picture.

Take care of your soldiers, and they'll take care of you. Keep them informed, and they'll be able to think for themselves. Paint the vision of where the team is heading, and they'll have something to strive towards.

All men must be leaders at some point in their lives. Whether it is the Platoon Commander leading his troops into battle, or the techie who says "You'll need this, this, and this for it to work properly. I won't sign my name off on bad work."

Feminine nature is a fine, and wonderful thing, but it is not the ethos of a Man.

Your First Triathlon: The Race

January 10, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

I previously wrote about preparing for your first triathlon. I gave a rundown of things to expect, and not to expect, when actually preparing for it. Now, it's finally the morning of your first triathlon. You've got the butterflies in your stomach and just want to start. This guide will guide you through your pre-race preparation, and how to handle the actual race itself. Once again, this is designed to help you combat the things that a novice would never expect in their first race. Having this knowledge will allow you to calm your nerves and race to the best possible time.

Pre-Race Setup

Breakfast, Get It Down

The night before, plan what you're going to eat for breakfast and set it on your kitchen counter You must eat something. It doesn't matter how hungry you are, get it in your stomach.

Your Transition Area

The transition area is where you store all of your gear, and where you will make the transition between the three disciplines. There will likely be hundreds of bike racks lining the staging area, and your specific age group or category will have a set number of these dedicated to the racers in that category. If at all possible, grab a spot near the main aisle to allow for quicker access to and from your equipment. Make sure you lay your equipment out in a logical fashion. For example, I bring a beach towel and lay the following items out in this order:

1. Goggles
2. Helmet
3. Sunglasses
4. Bike shoes
5. Running shoes
6. Anything else I need on the run (depending on race distance)

Why this order? Well, when I come back from the swim, the first thing I do is slip on my helmet (you can't leave the transition area without it), then my sunglasses. The bikes shoes are logically next. When I return from the bike, I'm able to throw off my bike clothes and slip into the running shoes.

Tracking Gear

Make sure you get your race number painted on your arm and calves, and that you get the tracking chip (usually an ankle bracelet) to score your time correctly.

Bodily Functions

More than likely, you'll have woken up somewhere between 4-5am for your race. This means that your bowel movement schedule will be off, unless you're always up at that time. It's a running joke in the endurance athlete community that you always have to shit right before the race is going to begin. Sadly, it's not a joke at all. Take this into account, because the last thing you want to be doing on your run segment is to be trying to find a porta-potty. Nothing is worse than having to shit while you run, trust me.

The Swim

Warm Up!!!!

This is critically important. Many people transitioning from the world of marathon running or long-distance cycling make the mistake that a warm up isn't necessary. I see where they're coming from. When I go running, my warm up usually consists of a light stretch, and then I take it easy for the first couple of minutes. You do not have the luxury of this with triathlon. You will be starting off full speed in (likely) cold water. Swimming, even when done "lightly" is going to cause you to breathe harder than a light run, due to the fact that you have to breathe quickly in between swimming strokes.

Most triathlon events have a dedicated warm up area. My goal was to always swim at least a third to half of the swim distance for a warmup (EX: for a 1600m swim leg, I'd warm up with 600-800m).

Ocean Swim – Get Ready To Duck

Races that start on the beach mean that you will be charging into the water with your fellow racers. If you are swimming in the ocean, this means you get the challenge of swimming against the waves at the very start. See why warming up is important? I suggest running out into the water as far as you can before starting to swim. Once you reach the point you are not progressing quickly with your legs, dive under the waves. Do not try to go over them. It will be very difficult to find a rhythm, as everyone will be fighting for positioning. You will likely get kicked in the face, scratched, or somehow abused by a fellow racer.

The most important thing is to stay calm and realize this is simply part of it. If you swallow water, take a deep breathe and then get back into it.

Where Ya Going, Dude?

I'll never forget one of my best friend's first triathlon. About a quarter into the swim leg, he took a wrong turn and swam well outside of the buoys that are laid out for the swim. He probably added an extra 200m onto what was only a 400m swim. Needless to say, he didn't get on the podium that day.

It's very important to have a "spot" as to where you're going. Every few strokes, you should be scanning the horizon for your spot, making sure you're on course. Do not trust your fellow athletes to guide you in the right direction. You are responsible for yourself.

The Bike

Catch Your Breathe

As you exit the swim, more than likely you'll be out of breathe. Take your time getting to the transition area, it's not worth the five seconds you'll save by sprinting out of the water to your bike. When getting out of your wetsuit, do it in a calm, sensible manner. Do not be flailing around trying to get it off (I know, I know, they're a pain in the ass), as it just wastes energy.

Clipping In

Experienced triathletes often clip their bike shoes to their bike, and do a running mount on to the bike. If this is your first triathlon you should not be doing this. Put your bike shoes on in the transition area, and jog lightly to the race course. If you really want to try the running mount, be prepared to look like this:

This was a championship race, too. Fucking women can't drive or ride bikes, apparently.

Pace Is Key

There no need to race up hills or sprint for the finish line of the bike leg. Try to ride at a night, steady pace. While most races don't allow drafting, if you can find someone to pace you while you sit ten bike lengths back, that is an ideal situation.

Make sure you are staying hydrated and eating (depending on the race distance) throughout the bike.

The Run

Shoe/Sock Prep

If you've never run without socks, your first race is not the time to try it. I strongly recommend a pair of triathlon shoes with no laces (I use Zoot TTs). If you do have laces, try to pre-tie the laces beforehand so you can slip right into them and be on your way.

Your Legs: Bike To Run

You should have done a couple of workouts in which you went straight from biking to running in preparation for the race, but if you were lazy and didn't, know that your legs are going to feel a little wobbly at the start. I remember I pulled a calf muscle pretty bad the first time I tried to make the transition. In hindsight, I tried to go out of the gate too fast. Give your legs time to adjust to the new activity to avoid injury.

Utilize Aid Stations

Just because you feel good does not mean you can stop hydrating and feeding your body nutrition, especially if it's a longer race. Grab two cups of water at every aid station. Drink as much of one as you can (being able to drink from a plastic cup and run is quite the skill to master), and pour the other on your head to keep cool.

Enjoy It

Enjoy the last couple of miles and the final sprint to the finish line. No matter how long the race was, or what your personal time was, completing a triathlon is always an amazing accomplishment. Regardless of distance, it requires solid training in three different disciplines, and the willpower to bring it all together on race day.

Are you ready for the 2014 season? See you at the starting line.

How To Dig Out Last Night’s Holdout

January 10, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

History of Problem

It is aggravating to wait 30 minutes after your scheduled appointment time at the doctor’s office. It is even more aggravating if you arrived 15 minutes early. What is even more aggravating than this is a woman that does not take the hint that it is time to leave the next morning. People say they are more socially perceptible and empathetic than men. If this is true, why do they always try to hold out like some insurgent in an Afghan cave? Their loitering in your space prevents you from doing other things. These things include calling other woman, making moves, and getting your Return of Kings article submitted on time. I know I said before that it’s better to go to her place but sometimes that’s not always an option. If you find yourself with last night’s fun occupying your living room you have a few options. You need to exercise your options immediately before the whole day is ruined staring at each other.

I've noticed women try to hang around after the fact for many reasons. One reason is they want to escalate the level of the relationship by playing house. Another reason is that it allows them to observe your stuff to size you up as a potential long-term mate or for future robbery. And more ominous reason is they might have actually formed some kind of emotional connection to you in the heat of passion. One has to consider her motivation for trying to hang around when assessing what course of action to take to remove her from the premises. Trying too hard to remove the emotionally unstable woman might get her to say and do things that have social and legal consequences. That schoolteacher you just turned out the night before? She might tell her friends that you put her out like a nightclub bouncer and you'll find your self accused of something . Also, for the most part you just can't throw them out the window. Believe me, I've tried.

Methods

One method that is rather passive aggressive and enjoyable is the "ghost method." Just pretend you're Demi Moore and she's Patrick Swayze. Go about your business like she's not even there. This can lead to a lot of trouble but is also quite fun. It does prevent you from doing sensitive tasks like counting your money, cleaning your gun, or talking to other woman. Unless you're dating some internet autist, this method should work.

Another effective method is to make things awkward. Try dropping a deuce with the door open and the fan off. Start playing really bizarre pornography on your computer. Ask her when was last time she got tested for HIV or if Jesus Christ is her true Lord and Savior. Field testing of this method has had led to some bizarre outcomes. Be careful in it's use because it might take you places you never really wanted to go.

One method I have adopted for “Jersey Shore” is to call her a cab. This is pretty direct and she gets the message immediately after telling her you called her cab. It’s especially funny when she drove to your house. Bonus points if you are true pimp and have some side deal worked out the cab company so they cut you part of the profit for sending them the business on the regular.

One use of props method is the scheduling game. Take out your smart phone and bring up the calendar application. Inform her that you have some type of appointment in the next 15 minutes and she has to leave. Then tell her you can pencil her in for the 3 PM afternoon delight on Thursday. I’ve tried this twice and has worked twice. I think the n in my sample size is not large enough to draw any conclusions though.

When all else fails you can go nuclear. You could always just tell her get the fuck out. This is 50-50 whether there is repeat banging for me and may vary depending on your personality. You could always tell her that you are gay. When she asks how long you have been that way, tell her 15 minutes. I have not tried this one yet but I look forward to the attempt.

Conclusion

If you do find yourself with a woman that’s holding on like Soviets in Stalingrad, recognize that this is a serious problem. Most women understand that as soon as sleep time is done it’s time to get out. If you allow this abnormal person to make herself at home she will. Note that if the woman is hot enough for the next morning bang, go for that first then boot her out.

The Growing Epidemic Of Sexual Dysfunction Among Women

In the past few weeks, several surveys have gotten a modest amount of press stating that people are having less sex than ever before. Many potential causes are posited: porn, gadget addiction, downward economic mobility. But here's an element of the surveys our good friends in the media cover up: it's aging women, twice more than men, who have no sex drive. They have Sahara Snatch. But they don't want men to know this.

Young women have been slutting it up more and more frequently at younger and younger ages for decades. Very literally, the town tramp of 1950's America would be the choir girl prude in modern America. Feminists are proud of this: their sugar daddies running the mainstream media print their books chastising "puritanical America" for not celebrating their prematurely stretched-out snatches. Mainstream books condemn America for using the word "slut" as a pejorative. They cheer 18 year old girls for their cavernous cunts, and they demand you cheer it, too. (And now, the sluttiness is being compounded by their "toys" – electrified rubber cylinders they shove into their pussies while reading perverted fetish porn like 'Fifty Shades of Gray', which is warping them irreversibly.)

So that covers their early years of fertility. Now well into their twenties, the media myth of the modern American woman claims that, astoundingly, she actually gets even hornier as she gets older! Women are constantly getting close to their "sexual peak". Let's call this the Sex and the City Mythology for shorthand (though it's propagated through every sitcom, media article, and Hollywood RomCom).

A Google search for "female sexual peak" reveals a funny phenomenon. The newer the article cited, the higher the age they claim women sexually "peak". They blame previous figures on "puritanical attitudes toward sex". This article from the UK Daily Mail hilariously claims women actually want sex more as their ability to bear children decreases. (They cite a sex toy company and actress Cameron Diaz as proof of this).

To encapsulate the Sex and the City Mythology: American women start as sluts and continue as sluts, and the older they get, the sluttier they get. That's the myth. The truth is far simpler, far uglier, and is actually tragic for both sexes.

Virility = Fertility. Period.

Evolution and common sense observation of human behavior would suggest that most women reach their sexual peak when they're most fertile – roughly ages 16 to 30, depending upon the individual and race. The whole purpose of sex, from Mother Nature's point of view, is procreation and any sex outside of that is pointless or even detrimental from an evolutionary standpoint. Countless studies confirm that female sexual arousal peaks at ovulation (the point in their menstrual cycles when they can conceive children). Longer term, female fertility peaks in their early twenties. According to the National Institute of Health, their fertility begins plummeting "precipitously" in their late 20's.

So the natural female sex drive begins dropping along with fertility in the 30's. And the Sex and the City Mythology of women's sex drive's positive correlation with aging is a total lie.

Again: the notion that women want sex more as they age is anti-science, pop culture bullshit.

But wait, it's worse than that, even. Much worse.

Testimonial of a single man in his 30's

I have been compelled by personal observation to research the growing phenomenon of premature menopause, or "premature ovarian failure" in medicine. Just call it Sahara Snatch. More and more women in their early thirties (my age peers) and even in their twenties are having "irregular periods" (or amenhorrea). A woman saying "irregular periods", I was recently told by a knowledgeable woman, is typically nothing more than the female ego covering up the fact that she's having no periods. At all. No menstruation = no sex hormones = their pussies are like sandpaper = you can't fuck them.

Let me backtrack and get a little personal.

Many gullible men believe the Sex and the City Mythology and expect great times with their female peers as they reach their thirties. Sure, a 35 year-old woman won't be as nubile or attractive as they were at 20, but they'll be hornier and livelier than ever, we're told.

I know gullible men believe this bullshit because I was one of these gullible men.

I spent ages 26 to 30 in a committed relationship. Unfortunately, the relationship ended (primarily due to financial disputes). But while I was disappointed to be both single and childless at age 30, I was secretly excited to be free to indulge in the "club scene" and have some wild weekends with these sex goddesses from TV and movies at their "sexual peak".

The real world exposed the Sex and the City Mythology as total bullshit in every way, but it took me at least a year of emotionally pulverizing experiences before the reality finally trumped the mythology.

Three attempts at flings ended up thusly:

- A girl who had been a fairly cute 7 as a twenty year old was now a titless, sickly-looking 5 in her thirties. But I was lonely and she did a good job of fronting like the carefree sexual gal by binge drinking and talking about sex all the time. But oddly, every date ended with her jabbering away narcissistically and postponing actual sex. After her excuses for avoiding sex reached the point of insult, I demanded intercourse or I was done with her. She hemmed and hawed before finally admitting that she hadn't had her period in two years and had no sex drive.
- A night with an ex-girlfriend (early thirties) sent her scurrying to her nightstand for some "help" when we disrobed. What "help"? Repugnant industrial chemicals she needs to put on lovers' cocks because her exhausted pussy glands can't lubricate naturally any longer. The night ended with me – lonely, horny, and desperate – humping her leg to climax because I refused the "help".
- A frumpy, late-thirties school administrator I met at a sports bar used double entenderes and sexual innuendo to earn my attentions – and my still-gullible faith that her sex drive matched her rhetoric. After several dates, we went to her place where we made out, but she pushed my hand away when I felt her up. I paused her 'Princess Bride' DVD and got more assertive when she softly told me that she was done with "casual sex" and she needed a "committed relationship" first.

I assumed that these womens' problems were somehow my fault and I was developing deep fears of sexual undesirability and loneliness. Was I just a closeted homosexual and that was why I was incapable of exciting women nowadays? Was I an ugly person (how do you ever really know otherwise?) I had all sorts of dark fears spring up as I encountered one sexless thirty-something after another.

But in time, the consistency of their sexlessness made me suspect that it was their age (the only other common denominator) that was the true cause. I asked around, and single men my age all confirmed similar difficulty in getting laid. Asked whether women want sex more or less at age 30 than age 20, to a man, they say women want it less.

As women age, they don't put out. They don't want to put out. And nowadays, they can't put out. They have Sahara Snatch.

What is causing the Sahara Snatch epidemic?

So, the Sex and the City Mythology is a complete inversion of the truth: women want sex less and less as they get older and older. Of course. But it's apparently getting worse: women are aging prematurely and therefore, thirtysomethings want sex even less than they already did. Female sex drive always fizzled slowly through the twenties and thirties, but now the downward curve has become a deadly plateau.

(A quick note: I recognize that many Western men are having bizarre sexual problems of their own. The preference for porn over real women, declining testosterone levels, repulsive boner pills, and utterly disgusting fetishes becoming commonplace are all proof of this. However, that is the subject for another article.)

Google searches for "premature menopause" (or premature ovarian failure) expose a great deal of both anecdotal and clinical evidence matching my own experiences with Sahara Snatch. This article from the UK says that doctors are seeing women reach menopause prematurely at "Higher than expected numbers" – four to five times higher. This separate study from a medical journal matches the UK increase.

If we just go ahead and use female fertility as a proxy for sex drive, the problem gets even more apparent. I won't even begin to cite all the studies showing drops in female fertility as it's now common knowledge. The increased dependance on surrogate mothers, adoption, in vitro fertilization, and other unnatural work-arounds for what is evolution's core process (fucking and making babies) make female infertility almost like cancer – everybody knows somebody who's affected.

What is causing this bizarre problem of Sahara Snatch? My theories:

- Modern, low fat Western diets. Saturated fat and dietary cholesterol are the base for most hormones, and yet the media and government have commanded people to eat less meat, and they've obediently complied. Sugar- and grain-heavy modern diets and a reduction in meat consumption are, in my opinion, the cause of the obesity epidemic in America, and I would certainly guess their problems go well beyond even that.

- Increased alcohol consumption. American women are celebrity cultists, and the women in pop culture movies and TV live at trendy nightclubs and bars, constantly downing martinis. I recall one large study from a few years ago showed a massive increase in female alcohol consumption, although I could not find that study for this article.
- The pill. Call me crazy, but regularly sticking synthetic chemicals in your body designed to twist your hormones and fertility into knots might have long-term consequences. Again, several very smart people I know have told me that the pill is murder on women's wombs.
- Sexual burn out. Sexual Burn Out. SEXUAL BURN OUT. American sluts, copying the behavior sold to them in movies and TV, get fucked by so many men who pump-and-dump them that by age 30 their pussies are like Ozzie Osbourne's brain: exhausted, spent, and hopeless. Sex is self-perpetuating for men: the more we get, the more we like it and the more we want it. (This is the Coolidge Effect in action.) But women are designed to be discriminating. Their perverted, feminist liberation nymphomania in their teens and early-twenties is an abominable lifestyle which strips them of their love of men and their ability for passion.

For the man simply seeking sex, the problem of Sahara Snatch is obvious: women capable of fucking are harder to find. But for the women, the problem is far more critical because it means they can't ever be mothers. By the time she finally accepts that the Sex and the City Mythology was bullshit….her womb is already a wasteland.

Many OB-GYN's have written impassioned pleas to women asking them to stop believing the media lie that they can postpone motherhood until their thirties (and even their forties – that is how stupid modern women can be!) Canadian doctors even kindly tried to help women by starting a National Infertility Awareness Week.

How did the media and women respond to these kind Canadian doctors? "Shut up! You're sexist!" (Read the comments at the link.)

The bottom line for men

All of the medical stuff is for the women to reason out (never a recipe for success). For men, the main point that I'm trying to make is what I wish I knew back during those tumultuous months after my break-up.

It's not you fault.

You do your best to woo a woman, and in college, these efforts would get you laid three times a week by 7s and 8s, but now they're yielding nothing but empty promises from crinkling 5s and 6s. To make you even more confused, you believe that she's 35 and so she's at her "sexual peak".

Still she doesn't want sex. You're going to bed at night curling up in lonely frustration and confusion. "What's wrong with me?!?"

The Sahara Snatches love that you're blaming yourself. They'll always say that their rejections are all your fault, because it allows them to cover up their irreparably broken reproductive systems. Stock lies like these are hallmarks of vain, lying Sahara Snatches:

- "I know what I'm worth and I'm not going to settle."
- "I don't do casual sex."
- Anything involving "creepy". For instance, a thirtysomething Sahara Snatch cackling with her friends about some sweet beta male, "Then he stroked my arm! How creepy!"
- "Friendship first, sex comes later."

You hear these things from women and you begin second-guessing yourself. "Is there something wrong with me?"

No, there's not.

"Is she genuinely old-fashioned or religious?"

Of course not: she's just an aged slut.

"Am I just a creepy pervert for wanting sex this soon?"

No. You're normal and healthy, she's abnormal and unhealthy.

"She said she's at her sexual peak, so why won't she sleep with me?"

Because she's not at her sexual peak – that was fifteen years ago. Because she's barren, sterile, and a Darwinian dead-end.

When you see a Sahara Snatch stringing an innocent man along, implying sex but always making excuses to avoid it, call them out on it. Tell her, “Stop lying. There was nothing wrong with him at all. You’re the problem.”

You Don’t Realize That You’re A Member Of This Cult

January 11, 2014 | by Thomas the Rhymer | Link | Original Link

There is a cult that has spread through the world. Every day, millions of people base their decisions on what this cult proclaims to be agreeable or not. This cult has reserved for itself the right to dictate to its followers what foods they must eat, what drinks they must drink, what is appropriate to read and listen to, and encourages its followers to sacrifice their well-being in the service of this cult. Like all cults, people are gently sucked in, not even realising that they are joining a cult. This is the cult of consumerism, and instead of prophets it has advertisements.

If you are unconvinced, let’s compare common cult techniques with consumerist advertising:

1. Love bombing

Typically cults will ‘love bomb’ potential new members. They shower new members with praise, kindness and encouragement. Advertisers too creepily seek to make you feel loved and special, to make you feel as part of a group, as someone who belongs, as a way of getting a foothold in your mind through which they may control you.

Here’s an example of love bombing:

2. Use of repetition

Cults will often stick to one theme or mantra and hammer it in, in essence driving out all critical thought out of one’s mind, until that one thought can be summoned with ease out of the enslaved mind, controlling the person through that mantra. If you are one of those who have been enslaved by the cult of consumerism, you will easily recognise the following phrases:

- “Just do it.”
- “Open happiness.”
- “Life’s good.”

All these phrases have been drummed into you so that your ability to think critically about a consumer goods is automatically suppressed in favour of the mantra pounded into your head. Instead of thinking ‘Coke might be bad for me,’ instead you think ‘Open happiness.’

3. Micro-controlling your life

In a cult, often even the tiniest aspects of your life are controlled by the cult, such as how you dress, how you wash, how you eat, how you talk.

The consumerist cult has also infiltrated every aspect of the human experience. Plain water is not good enough to wash your hair—you need industrial strength shampoo and then conditioner to repair the damage the shampoo made. And then you need styling product. Your skin requires product. You need the latest razor technology with the latest shaving foam with aloe vera extract. Your clothes must have a brand. Your phone must conform to the latest demands of the cult. You must hand over your money to banksters and investment fund managers. You must take these pills to be healthy and/or happy. You must go out to such and such place while driving the car they want you to drive. You must live in a house you can barely afford, and fill it with stuff they want you to put in your house. You must buy cheap stuff from China. You must buy. You must buy. You must buy.

There are so many things in the modern consumerist culture that are frankly not required to be happy and healthy. But the brainwashing of the consumerist cult is so good that despite themselves, members of the cult keep buying useless junk, waiting in long lines just to poison themselves with cronuts.

4. Loss of financial control

Cults often completely take over the finances of their followers, or at least put a severe burden on their finances. Typically a small elite in the cult amass wealth while their followers are forced to take financial hits.

The cult of consumerism has done the same, driving many people into unsustainable debt as they blindly follow the orders given to them by advertisers. Never has so much been owed by so many to so few.

5. Keeping you busy and sleep deprived

Cults often overwhelm people with work and deprive them of sleep, in order to keep them too occupied and too groggy to mount an effective intelligent response to the assault on their minds.

The cult of consumerism has also put excessive demands on time for people. It seems no one has enough time, even for sleep. There is always somewhere to rush to, something to do, that actually has little to do with personal well-being and everything with handing your money over to those who are laughing at you.

6. You can't leave

Cults always condemn those who dare to leave. And the cult of consumerism is the same. When you leave the cult, be prepared for strange and confused questions from those who are still within the cult, such as:

- "You don't watch TV? Really?"
- "Why don't you own an I-phone? How do you send messages?"
- "Why are you driving such a shitty car?"
- "You use baking soda as a deodorant? Isn't that dangerous?"

You cannot leave the cult without someone condemning you.

We are in the midst of one of the most widespread cult movements in history, demanding your money at every turn and trying to manipulate the way you think by bombarding you with messages from every possible direction. It's up to you to decide whether you wish to remain in this cult, and enjoy the false gifts and false pleasures that the cult will provide for you.

Or, at the cost of a sort of ostracism from your friends and colleagues, you can abandon the fool's paradise and wake up to live in the real world, a world run on whatever terms you can make for yourself, rather than what the advertisers have chosen for you.

Women Don’t Owe You Anything

January 11, 2014 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Flawless olive skin and mossy green eyes. She’s just my type. I sip my scotch and as we trade glances I know its on with this girl. Fifteen minutes later we’ve been introduced and are immediately hitting it off. She compliments me on my suit and asks me how I know everyone there. An hour after that she pulls me aside demanding I not kiss her that night because she was ever so tempted. “The thought hadn’t crossed my mind” I say smirking and I send her on her way.

9pm on the dot and she disappears to take a phone call. 15 minutes later I stop her and ask if it was her boyfriend. Reluctantly she says yes, he's all the way across the country and he'd promised to call her. "Well, he's very punctual" I say. She laughs and tells me "It's complicated" but she's really falling for him, it's hard since he's gone away to school. Leaning in to kiss her she pulls away at the last second. I push her hair aside and we start making out. She didn't say much about him after that. A while later I playfully tell her how much of a slut she is and she gladly replies saying, "I'm the most innocent slut you'll ever meet"

It is one of the biggest fears of man. From the religious man who waits till marriage to the cold-hearted player: betrayal guts us at the core of our being.

The disgust we feel from betrayal is something that we can overcome. Something we need to overcome. The wool has been pulled over our eyes for our entire lives. The accepted life path we are taught by our families, our friends, and society is that which maximizes stability. Women had incentive to be chaste and man had incentive to work and provide for his family. People still fucked other people, but in the 21st century there is less shame around it.

The old model goes against our nature as human beings, as animals. Both sexes are now capable of providing for themselves and taking autonomy over reproduction. Ironically enough, this detachment from nature's purpose has given us more freedom to act out what nature has always intended. Indiscriminate, bestial, raw, sex.

Mother nature is the cruelest bitch out there. She doesn't give a fuck about you. Morality is an invention of man influenced by nature. Working together, trust, and the strength shown by integrity and honesty help everyone have a better quality of life and a better chance of survival. Now that modern day women's behavior is being fully normalized we have no reason not to swim with the current.

When the vast majority of people are so easily deceived, and so easily believe the rules of life are the same as they always were, we have a gift when entering this lifestyle. We can, through experience and the wisdom of others, use the true nature of each sex to our advantage.

Women don’t owe you anything. You can only trust that they will follow their nature. Nature is often stronger than the self-prescribed morality of man. The deeply Christian girl will still have animalistic rough sex with you on your first date. Her love of God and want of a pious life may try to overcome her deep desire to have your children, but when you’re the most interesting man she’s ever met, her biology will always win. All the more incentive to learn game, lift weights, juice, travel, and stack cash.

The old adage of “Watch what she does instead of listen to what she says” has never been more true.

Fighting Another Man Could Change Your Life

January 12, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Preface: I am not advocating you fight another person to change yourself. Go see a shrink if you think violence is the answer for you. That said…

"You're damn right my grandfather was in the KKK, just like my Dad is and just like I am."

I blearily stared at a short, but fit, white man as I sipped my Keystone Light. I set my cup on the edge of the beer pong table as I regarded the man. He was in my apartment, drinking my booze and he had the audacity to brag about abusing people for the color of their skin. Still, I was most assuredly drunk, as I had been running the beer pong table with six consecutive wins. My female partner was doing her best Tim Tebow impersonation in the game as she couldn't hit the broad side of a barn with a volleyball. I brushed by her as she said to me, "2Wycked, don't do anything stupid!"

My friend had already told the man and his KKK posse of six guys that racism wasn't cool. As I approached the situation, the man refused to back down, saying that it was high time the "negro disesase was eliminated once and for all." I approached the man and asked, "What in the hell are you running your mouth about?"

His jaw stiffened as he shifted the dip in his mouth from left to right. Arms akimbo, he stated, "I hate niggers." He stepped so close to me the fetid stench of his Skoal Wintergreen stung my nose, "You don't like them niggers now do you?"

I didn't flinch as he was in my face and I retorted sternly, "Get the fuck out." We maintained eye contact for a tense several seconds as he backed up. "I can tell we got a bunch of nigger lovers in here. Let's go outside for a smoke, boys."

They left the apartment and went over to the apartment of a friend directly across from mine. I breathed a sigh of relief, as we were outnumbered 6 to 4 and I was in no mood for a fight. For the moment, the music was back on and people were vibing again. I took a shot of nasty rum with some of the whores at my party right before I noticed two of my friends had gone outside.

Outside, the racist was in my friend's face again, this time demanding he give him one of his Marlboro cigarettes. My friend had refused and I walked out just as the man stepped on my friend's foot with his black cowboy boot and spit on my friend's white American Eagle polo. "You are begging for an ass-beating," he drawled.

I rushed out to try to break it up just as a fist crushed the side of my face. The blow completely caught me off guard and I fell against the woodwork framing the stairs down to the parking lot. I got back up and swung on the asshole who clocked me. His over-sized cowboy hat flew off his head as I broke his nose and doused his button-down shirt with blood. He was very drunk and took a couple seconds to recover. I was staring him down as he took a wild shot that I easily dodged. I grabbed his body and slammed him against the same wood railing he pushed me into. He stumbled for a few moments before he tucked his tail between his legs and bolted for the stairs to the parking lot.

I had realized that every apartment's light was on and everybody was outside. My female neighbors were shrieking and throwing hysterical meltdowns. One girl sputtered, "Stupid ass boys and your stupid ass fights!" She pounded the keys of her flip-phone furiously as she dialed 911. My friend had gotten struck in the face and had squirts of blood trailing down his white shirt. My one friend was knocked out by the stairs, snoozing hard. The women had flocked to him, cradling his bleeding skull in their arms. By this time, all the KKK members were headed for the exits, fleeing to their cars.

I got down the stairs, only to get blindsided on right side of my head again. Dude immediately fled to his friend's car. My fourth friend got Bruce Lee cross-kicked in the chest and flew a good few feet in the air before landing right on his ass. My friend with the white polo and I watched as they all got into their two separate cars right as police pulled into the parking lot, barring any exit by them.

The drivers got collared for DUI and the remaining racists were arrested for battery. One of my friends had to go to the ER as a result of the serious head trauma he endured. Statements were given on our part, with multiple sobbing women recounting their stories to reassuring and comforting police figures. I waived treatment for my wounds, telling the medical officials that "Bandages are for women. I have more beer to drink."

By the time this was all settled, the morning was dawning. I reopened my apartment, with the music still blaring. I believe it was R. Kelly's "Rock Star" that was playing. I turned off my surround sound. Shuffling to my refrigerator, I grabbed a Bud Light. I couldn't find an ice pack in my freezer, so I grabbed a bag of frozen sweet peas. I turned on my PS3 and settled into my leather couch. I mindlessly watched an episode of "The Office" as I nursed my throbbing skull with a quickly defrosting bag of peas. I leaned back and fell asleep as I think Dwight was getting AMOG'd by Jim again.

I awoke the next day, surprisingly refreshed. Since I didn't drink myself into the black and cooled off a bit before sleeping, my hangover was next to non-existent. I grabbed a bacon cheeseburger with a bunch of fries at my favorite joint run by two Lebanese brothers downtown.

Then, I went to the police station, where I gave another statement and followed up about the racists. The officer I talked with chuckled, saying men like those dudes usually shut the fuck up pretty quickly when a big, black police officer escorts them around jail. He told me, odds are, it was the booze talking. They ramped-up general, sober prejudice turned it into cocky, beer-infused bravado to show off. He ended the conversation, saying that absolutely no charges are being considered against us and told us to simply be grateful that nobody got seriously injured – outside of my friend who got a severe concussion and a broken nose.

Later that night, after going to see a movie, we got together again. One of my friends leaned over and said, "I gotta be honest, that was pretty fucking awesome." All the men the in room smirked as the women guffawed and a chubby blonde even booed.

Truth is, every man in the room who had been in a fight knew what my friend was talking about. I knew. I knew the rush of a physical contest between males can bring. I instinctively knew about defending my own values against prurient and hateful views of humanity. In sum, the experience was exhilarating.

As we drank once more unto the brink — as only college kids can do — all four of us (the concussed man abstained from beverages, opting for weed) talked intermittently about the fight. "Remember when 2Wycked bashed that faggot into the railing?," "Man, remember when the KKK leader punched straight away to start the fight? I was 100% ready to fuck up these jackasses!"

After a taking a shot of some God-awful Skol, a future ex-wife blurted out, “God, it was so hot when 2Wycked beat that dude up!” Some women chose to remain silent, a couple other females smirked and looked away and one woman said point blank, “Look, it’s hot when boys fight and win.” I smirked at the original girl and leaned forward, “I am so glad we are friends.” I continued to smirk as the party starting laughing.

The undeniable truth is that, for men, sparring and physical confrontation is inevitable, necessary even. Sometimes only with the blunt end of a fist or the butt of gun can some men be corralled into being better people or simply controlled. There are some men you can never reach. No wisdom of a pastor can alter these men’s pysche, no reassuring advice of a shrink can rehabilitate their sickly ignorant minds. Only through violent coercion are these men changed so they stop hurting others. Violence and war are never off the table simply because there exist people who simply won’t do right by the world.

However, more broadly, being in a fight changes a man. The drab day-to-day of a modern man’s life is stultifying. Movies like “Fight Club” exist because the modern man is shunted and forced into roles he would rather not take, but needs to provide for himself and those around him. The pressures the modern man faces can’t be stomped out by force nor can’t be rectified with the double-barred end of Remington shotgun to a person’s head.

That being said, the sheer rush a man experiences with anticipation of a physical battle of wills nigh is second to none. Actually being in a fight – that is a whole other beast. I have only been on the losing end once and still, after licking both your flesh and mental wounds, there was a serious personal rush. It is no wonder that many cultures have emphasized that a boy doesn’t become a man until he has killed a living creature, most usually an animal.

A man has to confront is testosterone-infused aggression, come to terms with and tame it ways that benefit not just himself but the people he cares about. A man might, instead of being a reflexively-aggressive MRA, become a lawyer and do his utmost to right the wrongs against men in family court across America. He might start a non-profit and deal with the male problem of homelessness.

Still — and this relates to fucking beautiful women — once a man fights, he is calm. I have known men to be at each other's throats and grappling back and forth, only to be getting drunk at the bar, bonding over how the Packers are a shit NFL team.

Once men act out their aggression, there is a great change for healing. I remember one of the arresting officers asking the self-professed KKK leader, "Seriously, man, what the hell is wrong with you?" The man remained silent. The officer looked at him patiently before leading him back to the squad car simply saying, "You are young. It is so sad to see so much hate and anger in a young man. I hope you can move past this." The officer put him in the back of his squad car.

One of the most misunderstood aspects of male violence is the cathartic effect it can have. It can be used to express personal frustration with somebody, only to have those differences resolved through physical confrontation. However, it can also be an outlet for displeasure with the self that leads to personal growth.

I have no idea if the KKK lover ever changed his life. Yet, I can't even count on one hand how many times a man's life is transformed through an aggressive act — a beatdown, verbal smackdown, self-harm — only to lead to wildly successful personal change.

How many times have you read about a man coming off another alcohol-infused bender ending in a DUI only to get the help he needs? Maybe a man beats the living shit out another man, only to find personal salvation through true change? Possibly, he spews hateful rhetoric against blacks, only to realize that is very wrong and harmful and becoming a better person? Probable? No, but like Kevin Garnett once said, anything is possible and everybody can change.

Fighting represents the culmination of male frustration with themselves, others or society in general. It is natural by-product of being a man and is sometimes necessary for who you can’t reach. However, what is most striking about fighting is the healing it can engender in both parties. It seems very counter-intuitive, but 100% true.

Fighting another man can change your life only if you understand why you are fighting.

The Worst Thing You Can Do For Your Game

January 12, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Attachment is the great fabricator of illusions; reality can be attained only by someone who is detached.

– Simone Weil

I lace up my shoes. The yoga class I attended has just ended. Everyone is making their way home, and I spot a smoking hot blonde with an incredibly tight body who was in class. I have to approach her. I slowly put on my jacket and make my way to the door, so that she is exiting at the same time. “Hey, do you come here often.”

“Yes, I’m actually studying to be an instructor so I have to take classes all the time,” she replies with a smile.

“Cool. You’re not from around here, are you?” I ask.

She blushes, “How can you tell? I moved in a year ago from Texas.”

Our conversation continues for three or four minutes, and I get her number. A smile comes across my face as I enter my car – I’m pumped. I now have her number, and I’ve been texting a girl I knew in college who just moved back into town. I deserve a pat on the back. That’s two whole girls… that I’m texting.

Don’t Make My Mistake

When you meet a hot girl that you want to bang or date or whatever, don’t get caught in the trap of expecting and hoping for it to happen. I’ve done this so many times in my life. I’ve seen my friends do the same thing. The problem is that you stop looking for other girls, because you already have one or two potential mates, and you become complacent.

Not only does this behavior drown out the supply of new leads in your life, but it also negatively affects how you interact with the girls who you're currently in contact with.

You will start to see them as your only option, and this will kill your game. It will cause anguish and pain when one stands you up or stops replying to your text messages. Instead of letting go and moving on, you'll fight to win her over or just get a response. In the end, this will cripple you. You will lose the leads that you do have, and your confidence to approach and find new leads will go with it.

The alpha treats his leads all the same, until something actually happens. If you haven't even gone on a date with, or kissed a girl, you shouldn't invest anything into the relationship (if you can even call it that). They haven't earned your attention yet.

Follow These Steps

1. When you get the number of a girl, put a note in your calendar to text her in a couple days.
2. When you text her, keep it simple. Just ask her how she is.
3. If she responds, directly ask her if she wants to hang out later in the week.
4. If she says yes, then make plans. If she says no, then delete her number.

Following this simple routine will prevent you from overly investing in a girl who doesn't give a shit about you and will never actually meet up with you. Yes, she may text you back because she likes the attention you're giving her, but if she won't meet up with you then stop wasting your time and energy.

Check out my new book, The Book of Alpha. It's full of direct, actionable advice for the man who wants to better himself.

How One Man Faced All His Fears And Demons

January 12, 2014 | by Daddy | Link | Original Link

Little known in North America, Geoff Thompson is a man of many talents recognized for his street fighting credentials and self-defense advises among the most influential martial artists in the world. He is an example of self-improvement and dedication, of how a man can turn his life around for the better. However, he wasn't always successful and like many other admirable men, his journey was very difficult.

Early life

Geoff Thompson started out in this world as a scared little kid. He grew up in the poor working class during the 60's in Coventry, a violent city in the UK. Bullied and beaten at school, he remembers crying when the holidays ended, because he was afraid of going back in the school yard. When he took karate classes to learn to defend himself and gain confidence, he was raped by his martial art teacher of the time. Needless to say it totally ruined his teenage years and made him angry and weary of society in general.

Most people around him worked in factories as floor sweepers or construction brick layers. He thought that's all he could do, so he listened to what society told him to do and did the same. Workers around him would bitch every day that they hated their job to death and would say that was what they deserved, that there was nothing they could do about it.

In his twenties, he married a woman who nagged him and didn't respect him. You could say that he was trapped in those typical beta marriages of today, only he was not very educated and he was poor.

Evidently he hated his life and often thought about suicide. All the odds were against him, from his background and personal experiences to his upbringing and social class. But something inside him was telling him he could do a lot better, although he was too scared to change.

Until one day, when he hit rock bottom in his mid-twenties. He hated his job, didn't get along with his wife and didn't see any hope of anything changing in the future by itself. He was so depressed, unhappy and stressed that he couldn't sleep, and his life was simply unbearable. He claimed he was in such distress that he was too scared to move forward, and too scared to stay in the status quo. He was in constant restlessness. He decided he had enough: instead of killing himself, he decided to change.

Mastering fears

He thought that what kept him from achieving success in life was not his lack of abilities, but only fear. He was scared of everything: of his wife, of spiders, of failure and even of success. He decided to face his fears once and for all, starting with the smallest going to the biggest and toughest. He wrote them down on a pyramid, with the easiest fears on the bottom and the toughest at the top. He climbed the pyramid by beating his fears one by one. He found that facing a fear gave him confidence, little by the little.

As he was gaining some control over his life, he realized that his biggest fear at the time was being involved in violent confrontations. One of his main belief was that there is no growth in comfort: if you stay in your comfort zones, you will remain the person you are forever. To grow, you need to be comfortable with discomfort, as he would say. That's when he decided to become a night club bouncer to face violence on a daily basis.

Becoming a bouncer

Bars and pubs in England were very bloody places at the time. Angry and drunk guys would sometimes carry box cutters or knives, or simply take a beer glass and stab you in the face with it. You had to worry about women too, who would stab you in the back if you ever fought on the floor with their boyfriends. Bouncers would be killed on the job, and some friends of Geoff Thompson indeed died on their shift. Even being off duty wasn't safe: customers you threw out the previous week sometimes came back to your house to play baseball with your face. It was a very difficult challenge to take for Geoff Thompson at the time, especially considering he hadn't been in many real fights before.

Therefore, he really had to learn to defend himself properly. He started practicing practical martial arts like Muai Thai, boxing, wrestling and jujitsu. In addition, he started learning the dirtiest and deadliest street effective techniques he could find in other traditional martial arts. He chose to train in the gyms and where the guys were the most scarred and rugged, because he said these are the most intimidating and honest no-nonsense places.

Geoff Thompson, on the bottom, showing "dirty" fish hooking technique

What's interesting with Geoff Thompson's approach to self-defense is the many parallels that can be drawn with picking up girls. First, both subject matters are highly distorted and constantly filled with bullshit that must be deconstructed. Outdated advice like "buy her flowers" and "be a nice guy" have their equivalent in self-defense: "don't hit someone first" or "wait for the guy to attack first". If you do, according to Geoff Thompson, you have already lost.

Furthermore, he broke down into details human interactions that occur right before a fight much like we break down interactions before a hook up with a woman, and not so surprisingly, the qualities that make you win a fight are similar to those that make you win a woman. Being dominant and "holding your frame" are relevant concepts that he talks about, but in different terms and words. Several other psychological elements are also talked about, like how to lead the interaction with an opponent, how to subconsciously control him without him knowing it, or how to make yourself look more dangerous than you are. He often said: "when ignorance is mutual, confidence is king". In addition, there are certain phases that always happen before a guy attacks you, and learning about those phases will help you know when to fight, when to scare off your opponents, or when to walk away with confidence.

His favorite technique was the pre-emptive strike, as his observations and participation in hundreds of real fights showed him that was the only effective and relevant self-defense attack. Once you had exhausted other peaceful options, the idea was to hit your opponent first, hard and unexpectedly, to either knock him out or to create an opportunity to walk away. That was done with a punch or a head butt. Geoff Thompson found that a lot of what other self-defense instructors taught, like "block and counters" or arm locks, makes for a good show but does not work in real life. Your opponent is often right in your face, inches away, with buddies ready to back him up. He advises that learning how to punch hard and fast is the best option for the general public, who can't afford to spend 40 hours a week into training. His book The Fence is a good introduction to his techniques and mindset.

Eventually, after years of studying martial arts and getting in real fights, he mastered the art of knocking people out with one punch. His street fighting credentials and martial art success allowed him to start teaching self-defense classes. He became, in the eyes of the industry, a world-famous martial artist and self-defense instructor.

However, being a bouncer, while very good at forging a man's character, was a detrimental and stressful job. Geoff Thompson was transformed into a very violent man, often getting into fights even outside of his job. He needed to keep a weapon in every room of his house to feel safe, fearing the reprisal of his night club battles. He was starting to realize that maybe it was time for him to move on to another challenge. His lifelong dream was to become a writer, which he had yet to achieve.

Becoming a writer

All his life, his school teachers, neighbors, friends and family, would say "people like us – poor working class people – can't become writers. You should be happy with what you've got". They would shut down any ambition one might have to move up classes, and they would do so constantly from the day one was born.

Therefore, Geoff Thompson doubted a lot and was petrified he could never make it. What's more, he didn't really know how to write and he had never written seriously or even as a hobby. However, having conquered a lot of his previous fears, he figured that becoming a writer would work the same way. He figured that only fear was again playing with his mind, making him doubt himself. Courage and work would be again the answer for obtaining greater glory.

In this line of thought, he started to read a lot of books at the library to educate himself on various subjects, varying from psychology to philosophy, science, religion and writing. He starting creating his first book, Watch My Back, during his breaks at the factory, sitting on a toilet bowl with a pen and a paper. It was about the interesting life stories he had as a bouncer. He started sending the manuscript to editors, and they were all refusing it. But he didn’t give up: he contacted every editor he could find, asking for help and feedback whenever he got rejected. Seeing potential in him and his determination, some people in the industry helped him better his craft. He learned from the critics and comments the publishers gave him and polished his work little by little. Eventually, after constant dedication and persistence, he finally got it published and it became a bestseller.

He wrote many more books, ranging from self-defense to self-help and novels. He also became a script writer for a few award-winning short films. One of them, Roman 1220, is about a violent raging bouncer who encounters an unexpected acquaintance from his past. His movies are brutal, realistic, and honest, much different from what you’re probably used to see at the theatres. They talk and depict realities that most film makers shy away from. All his books, films and scripts can be found on his website, geoffthompson.com

Finally, Geoff Thompson gained enough recognition and made enough money to live an upper class life style, with his own house, a new wife and his kids. Only, instead of cleaning floors 8 hours a day, he’s a writer and a teacher, traveling around the world. He often says he’s a free man, working when he wants to, how he wants to and with whom he wants to. By constantly fighting his fears and his demons, against all odds, he has achieved his dreams and became a successful man. He has also developed a non-violent and peaceful personality over time. So, if you’re not where you want to be in your life right now, what’s your excuse?

The Brain Science Behind Game Explains Why Men Are Wolves And Girls Are Nervous Rabbits

I came across some interesting research recently in regards to how different animals (and humans) process fear, and ways this relates to our social conditioning. The researchers use two examples the wolf and the rabbit. The wolf operates in a system of scarcity. His survival depends on validating himself to the rest of the pack. They are fiercely loyal, control their breeding habits, and work closely together to catch their pray. It is survival of the fittest. Males evolve to be courageous and strong, females carefully nurture offspring. This is what the researchers call the 'K' type reproductive strategy. In the world around us it is more akin to conservatism and capitalism.

On the other hand we have the rabbits. What the researchers term 'R' type. They have an abundance of food. Grass is everywhere. They have plenty of places to dig holes for homes. The rabbits freely fornicate with whomever, whenever. "Breeding like a rabbit" is a term I am sure you are all familiar with. The breeding pattern is aligned around plenty. Females are not loyal to their mates, the purpose being to cross pollinate the gene pool as often as possible. They do not care much for their young.

However, if you think about living in a muddy hole in the ground and eating only grass, you begin to put humanity alongside hippy communes and communist tragedies. Although the rabbit has an abundance mentality, he also has a fear mentality to go along with it. At the first sign of trouble all concepts of community are abandoned and every bunny must run for himself and dive down the nearest hole. If one or two get eaten by the wolf, so be it – plenty more where they came from. You see how the abundance mentality devalues the life form itself.

The researchers take it much further and examine how the brain processes fear. The lizard brain or amygdala is the filter through which all sensory input and data is fed. It determines whether a fight or flight response is necessary. In a rabbit the amygdala is incapable of processing information to any great degree. It simply triggers a RUN response and that is that. It's like a 1/2 amp fuse. It just blows right away.

In a wolf or K type, the amygdala is far more highly developed. Think 13 amp fuse. Thus a wolf is capable of assessing if fear is absolutely necessary or not. This enables it to organize its social and breeding habits in a far more advanced manner. We can clearly see that the wolf is a more intelligent and advanced species than the rabbit. A high investment is put into raising young. A high investment is put into mating, and maintaining group loyalty in the pack.

Operating from a ‘K’ type or scarcity mentality puts a high value on life.

In the human realm, conservatives and red pill proponents operate from a scarcity mentality. Socialists, feminists and communists operate from an abundance or ‘R’ type mentality, ultimately devaluing life and failing to take into account that whilst we do have huge cities and a vast web of international supply chains, financial markets, government and so forth, this is something that was constructed by the ‘K’ type mindset in the first place.

It is not natural to human existence to have such abundance—it has been created by hard work, loyalty, investment and not least, by operating in small ‘family’ type cells like a family home, a unit in the army, or a division inside a larger corporation. Humans understand small groups best. A stadium of 50,000 people is impressive, but it is not useful unless broken into small units. It is prone to ‘R’ type herd behavior.

‘K’ type mentality demands performance and competition, both innate natures of the human being. Socialism, feminism and communism tries to eliminate competition by saying that everyone can easily be provided for equally. This removal of performance incentive and competition has proved to be a lie again and again throughout history – even the Romans failed largely by taking on an abundance mentality.

The red pill largely relates to ‘sex’, but it can easily be expanded to encompass all social interaction, hence proponents of game such as Roosh and Christian McQueen are often vocal in stating that improving ‘game’ and attitude towards ‘mating’ also improves a man’s career, business outlook, finances and over all respect in society. On the other hand, we can see men who slide from alpha to beta lose respect, energy and either end up dull and uninteresting or outright unhappy in some mundane suburban married life.

According to researchers, it all comes down to the amygdala and its ability to process danger and thus enable or disable risk taking and forward planning. A rabbit digs a hole largely for protection and out of fear for its life. It runs away at the slightest sign of danger or worse goes into total overload mode and freezes, simply hoping for the best. That is all it can do. We can see this habit in left wing politicians that in the face of absolute social upset, hide in the presidential palace hoping for the best, or make speeches denying there is any problem.

Women have smaller amygdalas

What's more, research has shown that women generally have a far less developed amygdala, making them unable to handle more risky situations. Women prefer, like the rabbit, to tolerate a constant low level of fear and simply have a nest of safety to run to and or hope for the best. If I understand the research correctly, they also go on to state that the amygdala can be developed or allowed to degenerate much like a muscle, such that a man who was once a beta can most certainly engage in more active and aggressive pursuits (not just game), and thus improve his overall approach to life, making himself more independent and so forth.

The more we are exposed to 'danger', 'competition' and survival of the fittest, the more the brain adapts to handle the necessary sensory input and process the data to allow more aggressive risk taking. Cross linking this to some other research, psychologists have been using outward bound style training camps and month long trips into the wilderness to assist both men and women with mental problems like OCD and ADHD. Obviously fending for yourself, trekking, sleeping in a tent, and cooking your own food on a campfire activates and improve the amygdala's abilities, thus all manner of phobias and unexplained mental issues are ironed out.

It turns out that all those sports and military cadets that boys are forced to do in school have great meaning. What's more, the aggressive, disciplinary drill sergeant, screaming at young men and telling them they must be faggots is exactly what is needed to develop their amygdala and prevent them turning into limp-wristed metrosexuals. Meanwhile, the socialists and feminists huddle together behind closed doors, demanding equal rights while feeling threatened and insecure because the world is an 'aggressive' place. The gay crowd also take the 'soft' communal attitude to life for similar reasons. They simply cannot handle any kind of aggression.

This kind of science is what the red pill needs

It illuminates what many of us have suspected all along and adds valuable depth to all aspects of our social interactions and 'mating' habits. It also gives the 'K' type mind a way to disarm and pacify the 'R' type. Where the 'K' type will tend to bark orders, belittle, swear, and generally rev up a person's adrenaline (they use the example of an army drill sergeant), this behavior sends the poor 'R' type into panic mode, diving for its rabbit hole or all out freezing in fear. How many dates, girlfriends and marriages have been blown up when the guy says a few words that are too aggressive for her and she crumples into her shell? That silent mood that women like to switch on is her hiding in her rabbit hole.

If you have ever watched TV shows like The Mentalist or seen how alpha males such as Don Draper on Mad Men behave, you'll notice they ooze pure masculine aggressiveness and form. At the same time they remain calm controlled and show little sign of any outward emotion, either positive or negative. They just are. They are able to gently massage the 'R' type's, undeveloped amygdala into submission without frightening it.

The key is using softly spoken well-thought out arguments and politely chosen words, almost hypnotizing the other person. A clever 'K' type is not rushed or hassled into an aggressive response because he knows the 'R' type will simply start blowing fuses. It's a difficult art for many of us to master and something that I myself can be terrible at. Many times in my life I have been guilty of trying to lead like a captain of a platoon charging a machine gun nest. Colleagues and especially women just crumple and point the finger at me as way too aggressive. You are 'mad', 'out of control', 'you have an anger management problem' are terms that have been thrown at me. This is the alpha's perpetual problem.

Whilst I suppose my behavior can be overly harsh and my choice of words aggressive at best (think London gangster movie), now I understand that instead of seeing myself as having a 'problem' - it is the other people that have a deficiency. Essentially they are easily scared. Relate the whole thing back to game and we see that being too upfront about sex, or engaging the "no sex tonight" hamster makes it freeze up or run away. Whereas slowly warming her up with Roosh's indirect lines is far from manipulation—it's simply the scientific way to deal with someone who has a lesser developed amygdala and thus a low tolerance for fear and a lower drive to engage in risk taking. Sex is a risky pursuit especially for a woman. Combine with that a low tolerance for fear and you have to walk on eggshells just to get a kiss.

What game does is tame the bunny rabbit

It allows the wolf to creep up on the pray without scaring it off. What's more it allows us red pill crew to engage the feminists, socialists and all manner of trolls in a clear, calm emotion free manner, almost hypnotizing them through carefully chosen words and sound arguments. This is a very powerful tool for all of us. If we fail to use it correctly, the world stands to sink further into an abundance mentality that in fact devalues life. Furthermore we end up being branded as the bad guys because our point of view comes across as overly aggressive or plain mad to people who have more delicate sensibilities.

The most ironic thing about this research is that it shows the feminists, liberals and socialists for what they really are. While they hark on about equality and better standards for all, they are simply people that lack a well developed brain function in regards to managing fear and engaging in risk taking. This means far from building a stable society, they actually end up inhibiting the risk takers, slowing down progress and winding up with an every-man-for-himself panic. The fall of communism and the rise of the oligarchs being a classic case. Now, get off your ass and put in some fucking effort you maggot.

The Life Of A Location Independent Traveler

January 13, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

For the next installment in my interview series, I decided to talk to someone whom I consider one of the most underappreciated voices in the community, Maverick Traveler. I've always believed that it's important to give praise and credit to those who have demonstrated excellence in a given area of endeavor. His blog chronicles his extensive travels in foreign lands and experiences with women, and his articles—some of which are real gems–provide a level of candid introspection and deft analysis that can rarely be found elsewhere.

I was first drawn to his writing by the incisive observations and a degree of even-tempered humility, but over time I've become more and more impressed by the sheer scope and range of his travel experiences. The overall impression given is that of a man sincerely grasping for a deeper truth behind the material things of this world, a man probing for his place in the world's impersonal immensity. But travel is never an end in itself; one feels, in Maverick's pages, that the real goal is self-discovery and improvement: the eternal quest to know thyself. This is what elevates him outside the ranks of the mere trekker, and firmly into the ranks of the true seeker.

He has posted at Return of Kings before, and some readers may be familiar with his writings already.

When I spoke with him recently, he had just returned from one of his adventures and was getting caught up on a backlog of accumulated work. I decided to see how things were going with him. My goal was to find out what inner motivations have driven his quest for foreign lands and foreign women. Just as importantly, I wanted to know what lessons he's drawn from his years of wanderlust.

Quintus: Thanks for joining us at ROK today, Mav. I know you've got a lot on your plate and appreciate the chance to check in with you here.

Maverick: No problem, Quint. Glad to be talking to you. It's been a while.

Quintus: So let's get right down to it. How did you first get into the traveling lifestyle?

Maverick: I've been curious about exploring the world ever since I was a little kid. When I lived in California, I took lots of trips to Mexico (Baja California). After several trips, I became addicted and didn't want to stop. Gradually, I started taking longer and longer trips, venturing further and further away from US. That's when I went to Central America, spending a month traveling through most of the region's countries. Each successive trip became longer and longer. At some point I realized that I no longer had the desire to come back to USA, and that's when I began living abroad.

Quintus: Your articles cover a huge geographic area, man. Which country made the biggest impression on you?

Maverick: That's easy: Brazil. Brazil is one of those countries with a perfect combination of the things I value the most: tropical climate, picturesque beaches, friendly and helpful people, and gorgeous and flirtatious women. I lived in Rio de Janeiro for a bit over two years, which were some of the most memorable years of my life.

Quintus: Now, you also studied ju-jitsu pretty intensely while you were there, right?

Maverick: Yeah, that's right.

Quintus: Which nationality of women have you connected with the most? I have a feeling I already know the answer to this one.

Maverick: I've connected with many different types of women, but I have a permanent soft spot for Brazilian women. They're friendly, feminine and flirtatious. What else does a man need?

Quintus: I hear you on that. No argument from me. But what traits and qualities do you look for in a woman?

Maverick: My ideal woman should have a nice combination of femininity and decisiveness. Those two qualities are like the opposing yin and yang; they balance themselves out. Above all, there must be chemistry, which you can usually feel within the first few minutes of chatting.

Quintus: One of the biggest excuses I hear from guys who don't want to travel is the money issue, or the work issue. What is the best way to balance the need to earn income with the traveler's lifestyle?

Maverick: Excuses, excuses. The first step is to realize that you're not working and traveling, but, rather, working from a remote office. That means staying longer in various places, at least three to six months. Second, it means renting higher quality accommodation, like private rooms or private apartments. I don't see how you can be productive working from a 24-bed hostel dorm with a large group of rowdy backpackers. I always tell them a great saying: "Where there's a will, there's a way." All of their objections are purely mental limitations.

Freedom doesn't necessarily mean the absence of responsibility. To me, freedom is about having the desire and the means to do things my way, on my own terms. Responsibility, in turn, means the procurement and exercise of such freedom. It's every man's responsibility to live to their true potential and never be satisfied with anything less.

Quintus: That's an important point. I've always thought it's actually better and more productive to be in a decent private room or apartment, than slumming it as a backpacker. How have your travels shaped your view of the world?

Maverick: There are two ways to learn about the world around you: ask someone or see it for yourself. I prefer the latter because that allows me to form my opinion about the world instead of viewing the world through someone else's eyes. Traveling has been the single most impactful thing I've ever done in my life. There's absolutely no substitute for getting on the plane and landing in some remote country with its own customs and traditions. None. I've wasted money on lots of stupid things, but I've never regretted spending even a cent on stuff related to travel.

Quintus: Exactly. And the memories are like a well that you can draw from for years afterwards….let's talk about language for a bit, Mav. Which languages do you think a novice traveler should try to master?

Maverick: That really depends on where you're planning to travel [laughs]. Nevertheless, you'll never go wrong by learning the "big" languages such as Spanish, Portuguese, or Russian. Not only do these languages immediately grant you access to large populations of native speakers, but knowing any of these languages allows you quickly pickup another language from the same language family. For example, if you already speak Spanish, you'll be able to pick up Italian or French with less effort than if you only knew English. Right now I'm teaching myself French, which is a very important language with lots of great literature and history.

Quintus: Now, your native language is Russian, right? But you grew up in New York City?

Maverick: Right.

Quintus: How many countries, in all, have you visited?

Maverick: I've visited about 70 countries and lived for extended periods in 10 of them.

Quintus: So, what are your future plans for the short term?

Maverick: I plan to return to Eastern Europe soon and spend some months exploring the region before planting my roots somewhere. I used to mostly backpack, but now I'm keen on finding a place and spending there several months or even years. I've slowed down my traveling pace over the last few years, and I'm not sure if that's because of more travel experience and wisdom, or because I'm getting older [laughs].

Quintus: What are some trends you've noticed in your dealing with women from different countries?

Maverick: A woman is the reflection of the culture. If the culture is friendly and open, the women will be passionate and outgoing. If the culture is reserved and cold, the women will be aloof and reticent. If the culture values the pursuit of money and career advancement above everything else, the women will be duly trying to climb the corporate ladder while viewing men as their sworn competitors instead of amiable companions.

Quintus: Water takes the shape of its glass…right [laughs]?

Maverick: I'd have to agree with that.

Quintus: Do you have any quotes that have helped you in your achievements and self-improvement?

Maverick: “Show me a happy man, and I will show you a man who is getting nothing accomplished in this world.” That one is by Rich Cohen.

Quintus: I’d agree with that. I’ve also celebrated anguish and angst [laughs]. Continuous serenity usually produces nothing but a dead mechanism, an empty aimlessness. Mav, I really appreciate your sharing your thoughts with us today. I’ll be looking forward to seeing more of your stuff in the months ahead. I hope you can join us again soon.

Maverick: Thanks, man, thanks for having me.

How 4Chan Discredited A Culture Of Outrage

January 13, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

There has been a lot of feminist outrage online recently with regard to topics relating to body image. The thigh gap trend was one such topic. Its emphasis on the female maintenance of a gap between the thighs quickly prompted outrage from women who claimed that such a trend would encourage eating disorders and undermine young women's self-esteem.

The thigh gap trend itself may have been a product of “thinspiration”, an online movement led by a host of tumblr blogs that grew to promote images of thin women and “inspire” females to get closer to a trim ideal. This trend too attracted plenty of female rage with predictable critiques: it would allegedly encourage eating disorders and undermine young women’s self-esteem.

A new trend promoting the “bikini bridge” promises to follow closely in the footsteps of these predecessors. The “bikini bridge” trend focuses on “the graceful space created by a woman’s hip bones suspending bikini bottoms from their abdomens”, and promotes it with a host of images designed to inspire young women to obtain this physical ideal.

This new contender, however, is unique. Unlike its predecessors, it was not created or promoted by young women and has no basis in reality. The bikini bridge is, in fact, an elaborate prank designed by the creative male denizens of 4Chan:

Welcome to Operation Bikini Bridge.

Phase 1:
The premise is simple. Create propaganda parading the "bikini bridge" to be the next big thing(pic related). Circulate it throughout the internet. Simultaneously, we create reverse propaganda, denouncing the bikini bridge as an unhealthy obsession. This, too, we circulate throughout the internet. Our mission during phase 1 is to garner support for these social outlets. The more followers/subscribers the better.

Phase 2:
After a fair amount of circulation has been accomplished, we circulate the images throughout parts of the internet known to be biased on the subject of weight (i.e. thin privilege, fat shaming, etc). This should cause large enough of a stir to snowball into a fairly big subject.

What you can do to help:
>online-image-editor.com/
Text font is "times new roman" and "little days" and works well with a shadow effect.
>http://bikinibridge.tumblr.com/
>/r/bikinibridge
Remember quality, artsy pictures that really showcase the bikini bridge for pro bikini bridge propaganda. Weird, odd, or pictures showcasing the lack of a bikini bridge for anti bridge propaganda. Also, use slogans that have already been popularized("Health at Every Size")
>Fake Facebook, Twitter and other social accounts
To help circulate the propaganda. The more friends, the better.

If youre feeling lazy
>Good slogans/text suggestions/pic
>Spread the word (casually)
Through facebook/twitter/tumblr and other media outlets.
>Post a picture(dont spam, but think passive repition)

Remember:
You do not have to push either side, even just mentioning "bikini bridge" or a slight preference will create a buzz. In fact, most often it is beneficial to show no preference at all.
Think of viral marketing, and the power of repition.
#BikiniBridge2014 can be pushed as a new years resolution ordeal. Target NYRers, weight loss pages/groups(as a "goal"), etc. These people already hold a predisposition.

GET IN HERE. OPERATION BIKINI BRIDGE IS A-GO.

4Chan's operation (which involved a number of fake social media accounts, photoshopped tweets, and a host of other clever ruses) was a rousing success. The DailyMail fell for it along with a host of other prominent internet personalities and websites. So effective was the hoax that mainsteam media outlets from the Huffington Post to Today.com were forced to address the topic. The entirety of the internet was trolled, and successfully so.

4Chan's efforts have done more than generate a few hearty laughs across the internet. Rather, they've exposed and discredited an increasingly pervasive culture of outrage.

What is that culture? It is one where an increasingly large portion of the populace becomes intellectually invested and tied to the idea of their being the victims of persistent oppression, so much so that they see oppression in places where its existence is, at best, tenuous and, at worst, downright improbable.

Such individuals are remarkably easy to troll and by doing so, 4Chan has essentially undermined their credibility. After all, of what value are the complaints of these people if their outrage can be so simply and methodically coaxed with photoshop and fake social media? Of what value can the complaints of people who appear so easily offended actually hold?

The culture of outrage has, essentially, become a joke. It has become so predictable and incredible as to be easily co-opted for the amusement of those it claims to be against (4Chan and feminism have a long, antagonistic history) .

The feminist ideologues who drive this culture need to be careful of this development lest they cease to be taken seriously by a broader society whose acquiescence is needed in order to accomplish their political aims. Their privilege is already becoming obvious to many and receiving increasing scrutiny given their insistence of adopting the mantle of the oppressed victim. If these trends continue, expect the word “feminism” to become a dirty one sooner rather than later.

Differences In IQ Between Men And Women Can No Longer Be Ignored

January 13, 2014 | by Megaphone | Link | Original Link

The Australian government recently changed hands, as the conservative Coalition swept back into power after six years. Led by one of the most conservative leaders Australia has ever seen, Tony Abbott, the new government installed a grand total of one woman in its new cabinet, out of a total of 19 ministers. The reaction was predictable—he was called “misogynist pig”, “right-wing bigot”, “sexist dinosaur”, and so forth, attacks coming from every angle.

I am no fan of the new government, but this was one move made by the Abbott government that I applauded, not for restricting the number of women in cabinet as such, but rather, for having the courage to make appointments based not on gender but on merit, knowing full well they would be on the receiving end of feminist venom from all corners of Australia for doing so.

This is the same old story we’ve heard a million times over — the great injustice done unto women when the heads are counted and they are not equally represented in the upper echelons of society. I’ve remarked in the past that it is the height of arrogance and immaturity to work an average of ten hours less per week, retire nine years earlier, take time out for child-rearing, and choose the path of least resistance, yet demand equal outcomes as those who grind out the hard yards. What has been neglected, however, are the innate biological differences between men and women in terms of their natural abilities.

The Intelligence Quotient

Take I.Q., for example. Despite the noise trotted out by those with lower-to-average intellects about the validity of I.Q. tests and scores, I.Q. remains the strongest single indicator of financial abundance, vocational prestige, academic success, and a host of life's other achievements. On average, men and women have roughly the same I.Q., give or take a negligible point or two. The glaring differences, however, arise in how this average is distributed. Compared to women, who tend to flock towards neither extreme, men deviate from the average far more, and thus fill out most numbers at both the top and bottom ends of life in general.

It is for this reason, perhaps more than any other, that the majority of outstanding achievers are men, and have been throughout history. The vast majority of scientists, philosophers, musicians, academics, inventors, writers, political leaders, and so forth, are men. But men also comprise the bulk of society's shit heap. The homeless, long-term unemployed, criminals, drug addicts, mental health patients, alcoholics, and degenerate gamblers are also, overwhelmingly, men.

The I.Q. variation between the genders is considerable. Mensa International High I.Q. Society, for example, is composed of a membership in which men outrank women 2 to 1 — roughly the same representation of men to women in Australia's homeless populations. This sort of imbalance goes a long way to explaining why an even fifty-fifty split between the genders in every area of life is both impossible and misguided.

The Feminist Response

Oddly enough, I'm yet to hear a feminist complain about the disparity between genders when it comes to prison populations, or drug rehab centres, or the impoverished unemployed. But when a new government installs only one female in its entire cabinet? Outrage! When yet another report hits the papers of only a handful of female board members in blue-chip? Patriarchy! When women are outnumbered by men in award nominations in almost every field? Misogynist conspiracy!

We don't live in a world where logic and reason are the best tools for policy making. Rather, we are forced to place feelings above truth, and political correctness against hard evidence. Ideas like this are instantly discarded as some type of evil misogynist propaganda to be ignored or ridiculed. Indeed, history has shown that those who speak this truth are at risk of censorship, character assassination, and dismissal from the most respected positions of influence.

In 2005, the President of Harvard University invoked the consistent gender discrepancies of cognitive tests to explain why there were far less women in high-end science and engineering jobs. The shit-storm that followed led to his resignation a year later, and Harvard pumped $50 million towards recruiting women into these industries. Deny the truth, silence the man brave enough to speak it, and follow it up with millions worth of funding the "even out the playing field". This, from an institution supposedly created for higher learning.

Surely the strength of any argument or idea, especially one put forward by the president of one of the world's most prestigious research institutions, should be able to stand or fall in the face of public scrutiny or debate. If it was so inaccurate, it would be torn to pieces. This was not the case. When the empirical science around our biological make-up didn't fit the demands of the feminist "empowerment" brigade, then science was told to just shut the f*ck up.

What To Expect

My prediction is that the nonsense will resume after the fall of the Abbott government, just as it persists throughout the rest of the fem-centric Western world. Governments will continue to push and leverage and squeeze for another generation or two, trying in vain to get the social alchemy just right, struggling in vain for that elusive gender balance. Expect to see more affirmative action, more quotas, more female-only scholarships, education curricula favouring the female gender, more female-only recruiting drives, and a whole host of measures we are yet to imagine. It is clearly in a government's interests to do so — the political potential to curry favour with half the country is just too strong to resist.

But after all these futile efforts have exhausted us, and we still don't see the numbers women demand in their ideal world, the voice of reason will start growing stronger. Eventually, we'll have to wake up to ourselves and admit that human beings are complex and diverse creatures, that biology dictates far more of our behaviours and lives than we'd like to admit, and that the sun does not revolve around the Earth — no matter how much a social trend stamps its feet and demands that it should.

A Self-Improvement Challenge For ROK Readers

January 14, 2014 | by Mark Ford | Link | Original Link

For a long time, there has been a sentiment in ROK article comment sections that goes something like this:

> I liked this site better when there was more self-improvement articles, and less bashing of feminists / fat shaming / political commentary / book reviews / etc.

This type of thinking gets a lot of up votes. Here's links – to a few – examples. Notice that these comments tend not to be supported by ROK contributors (props to Libertas for contributing following his criticism). This is not a coincidence.

Here's a self-improvement challenge for all the readers who have ever upvoted such a comment. Set aside a solid 3 hours. Tips for completing it is as follows…

The Challenge

Write a positive, self-improvement oriented article and submit it to ROK to help your fellow man.

Requirements For Successful Completion

1. No mention of feminism, race, fat people, religion, politics, or current affairs. No use of sarcasm, irony or parody.

2. Have the post accepted by ROK editor (Roosh). This is the invisible gauntlet that slips by the average reader, and can be deceptively difficult for the inexperienced.

3. Don't get blasted by a comment with at least 10 upvotes for any of the following:

- Rehashing something everyone already knows
- Rehashing articles / plagiarising what other authors (whether ROK or not) have already written. Note: "Things I've learnt from ROK" is already taken, so you'll have to write something else.
- Being boring
- Or lame
- Lacking a clear point
- Making grammar mistakes
- Disagreeing with the prevailing ROK commenter paradigm
- Sounding like you're taking it a bit too far, immature, or some kind of child-beating maniac
- Making stuff up, or making stuff up, or making stuff up
- Hypocrisy, or hypocrisy, or hypocrisy
- Any other overt and relatively valid criticism

The Reward

The challenge itself is the reward, insofar as producing such an article requires strenuous effort at your own self-improvement, in order to have anything worthwhile to share. In addition, you give back to a site that presumably you enjoy reading, and hope will continue to produce quality content.

Other reimbursement: the glow of knowing you helped your fellow man and maybe a Twitter follower or two if that's your style. As a side effect, you will gain enormous appreciation for the work of all of the other contributors.

Hardcore Mode

If you breeze through this with no problems, take it up a notch. Repeat at least five times – easier said than done. Here's me practicing what I preach.

- How To Get Everything You Want
- Jealousy Should Prompt Learning
- The One Thing That Makes A Man
- How Many Failures Before You Give Up
- 3 Reasons To Write A Journal

Tips For Completion

- You can't fake it. If you actually are not improving your life, and your words are not born from experience, you will have a hard time finding something to write about, let alone expressing it properly.
- Read through the ROK archives (there is also a search bar on the sidebar). There's already a lot of gold in there, and it's likely your first good idea has already been published. So has your second. And possibly your third.

- Think very very carefully about the wording of your post. You will probably have to rewrite it several times, in order to remove as much ambiguity and potential for misinterpretation as possible. You still might miss a corner case or troll jab from one of the millions of angles readers will do their best to misinterpret your meaning from.

Best of luck. Hopefully there is an influx of original, enlightening, commenter lauded self-improvement based articles to ROK in 2014. If each “moar self-improvement” upvoter wrote one such article, surely noone would have complaints about the quantity of such content. A rising tide lifts all boats.

Concluding Remarks

Criticism is of course very valuable, and one of the problems with modern society is there is not enough of it. The standards the commenters hold articles here to are very high, and that is a good thing. It is however overboard to expect that a free service powered largely by reader contribution doesn’t satisfy precisely an audience that demands more than it provides.

Ask not why Return Of Kings isn’t writing self-improvement articles, ask instead why you aren’t writing self-improvement articles for Return Of Kings.

Final Thoughts On Karl Halverson Pierson's Murderous Attack

A little more than a month ago, 18 year old Karl Pierson entered Arapahoe High School in the state of Colorado and mortally wounded 17 year old Claire Davis.

I was back home for the holidays, helping wrap presents when my dad said there was a school shooting in the United States. Everyone rushed to the television with that sick eagerness we as a species seem to possess for such horrifying situations. We claim to abhor what we see, but goddamn if we won't run head first to a tragedy and stand there gawking.

The news details were sketchy, as they always are in the beginning, but it quickly became apparent that the shooter was a young man, and that his victim was a young woman. The death toll was low so the story faded quickly from the news. School shootings have become so commonplace in American society that unless the shooter racks up a kill count in the double digits or targets especially young children, it won't stay on the front pages for very long. Besides, it was Christmas and the last thing people wanted to be was bummed out.

As soon as I saw the perpetrator, Pierson, and the victim, Davis, something went off inside of me. I read some of the news reports, saw some of the videos, and through it all everyone seemed to be mystified as to why Pierson felt the need to assault his school and take his own life. The old political bogeymen were dragged out—gun control, paranoid schizophrenia, radical political beliefs, but I did not hear one person in the media theorizing on Pierson's sexual frustration. To me the evidence provided painted a picture of a lonely young man; he even went so far attempting to reach out to people through parroting liberal beliefs, usually a sure fire way for someone in today's culture to garner friends or attention.

What was most upsetting to me, however, was the quickness with which everyone seemed to get over this act – Karl did it, it's done, let's stop talking about it, get it off the front page we need to know what Miley Cyrus is doing for New Years. I didn't like that. To me, the tragedy at Arapahoe High deserved at the very least some more discussion. So I decided to write a quick article detailing why I believed this event happened.

The article wound up going sorta-viral. Numerous sites and blogs re-pasted it. There was discussion on Reddit about it. I went through a lot of these pages, though sadly most were a simple re-pasting of the article with no comments. I did manage to find some with comments, and to temporarily lighten the mood let me share the ones I found amusing before I continue;

B G commenting over at Body Crimes's ringing endorsement of my article knows I hate women only because that bitch Lauren owes me a Toonie from last weekend because I bought her some Timbits after our rec hockey game and she still hasn't got me back eh?!

Also, I'm not sure if BG realizes that Return Of Kings is composed of several different authours or if she's complimenting me by saying I'm the authour, ala I'm da man – which I'm choosing to believe. Thanks for the compliment B G! If you're hot plz send nekked pics. By the way, we're using your comment for promos of the future books we make based off of ROK articles.

"These guys…all…classic. They want to marry a…sweet girl." – B G, Commentator at Body Crimes

Also, Tuthmosis wrote the eating disorders article. Don't you just love getting angry at someone who didn't even write what you're getting angry at?

Over at disinfo, TG wrote an excellent rebuttal against my article which is comprised of simply re-pasting what I wrote and offering no alternative theory or take on why this tragedy had to happen. Once they lose the small introductory paragraph and simply add 'wut' to the end of their 'articles' (along with plenty of gifs), disinfo will be well on their way to Buzzfeed levels of quality content.

Also, I noticed this whilst visiting (the blue parts added by me);

I am so hard right now.

Here are some comments that I love from that site:

Andrew…please…check your unipolar privilege…

How could any sane woman f@#k this pathetic excuse for a man ever again? This is without a doubt one of the most idiotic things I've ever heard, but apparently "The basics are a sure thing" so I obviously need to do some research. So... let me get this straight ???! If you can't get laid by the hot chicks or even the ugly chicks (because you are obviously a choad), you should be able murder your "hottest" crush as revenge for her not being attracted to your unattractiveness??. This idiot has some deep sexuality problems. Needing to masturbate 5 times after going to the gym?? I think you need to come out of the closet. May you experience a long, long, miserable life without sex. P.S... Sex isn't only for you. Women enjoy it also. Unless it's with you of course.

10 | 2 • Reply • Share ›

I mainly love this one because of choad. It's a word I always lol at, and wish had a lot more use in the common vernacular. 10/10 for that alone V, but there's also some other gold in the comment. Like, how the quotes around "hottest" refers to my referring to Claire Davis as smoking hot; which I think she is, since I measure her beauty against what I see in the real world – not my internet pornos – and the majority of women I see everyday don't compare. V doesn't think so. Way to disparage the victim V I'm sure her parents would love to her you call her ugly.

Also, I do not understand how having to masturbate more then a few times on a high test day means I should come out of the closet. Why am I in the closet? Does masturbating make me gay, or is there a set number of times I can masturbate before I turn gay? Does V hate gay people – if so, why is he on a liberal site? Does V think only gay men go to the gym? Has V never been to the gym and seen all those fitness cuties in yoga pants and sports bras? I'm so confused.

And of course women don't enjoy sex with me, since the whole time we're banging I'm telling them about how much I hate them.

"UGH!" Thrust "All women's are liars and whores! RRNGNG!!" Spank "You're ruining society! FFFFUUUUWWWW!!" Butthole tickle "By the way you have great nipples but I still hate you!"

I had similar thoughts when posting it, but I figured people like this will probably hang themselves if you give them enough rope, which can only be a victory for western culture

Ah-ah-ahem…vv

That awkward moment when your repost of a self-proclaimed enemy's article, with no thoughtful or critical analysis or comedic commentary of your own, is the most popular thing on your website.

In the future, beloved haters, here (1, 2, 3) are some godly examples of how to present websites you think should mocked to your readership.

My hate mail account, created specifically because of the article, swelled considerably. I was even contacted by someone who claimed to have family at Arapahoe, who called me a coward and demanded I start a dialogue with him. I accepted – but unfortunately, he insulted and threatened other bloggers before I had a chance e-mail him back and their scathing counter attack forced him into hiding, not having accepted my offer to talk. By the way, if you happen to be reading this sir, I'm still open to that chat. I have no problem being a sponge for your frustration/anxiety.

After all the verbal tongue lashing my article received, I'm glad to come back to the comfort of our readership here at Return Of Kings. After all that recon behind enemy lines I know the comments on our website will cheer me up.

Ahhh Return Of Kings… don't ever change.

I wrote the Pierson article simply to give ROK's readership a chance to discuss this act. It's a tragedy that Claire Davis was murdered, and a tragedy that a young man like Karl Pierson, on the cusp of starting his life proper, felt he had such a terrible future in his society that he needed to commit the shooting.

To my pleasant surprise, when I got back online and caught up on things toward the New Year I found my article had reached a much larger audience than I had ever hoped it would. Some agreed, some disagreed; many from both camps thought I was an idiot. But they were talking about Arapahoe. They were thinking about it.

And that's all I wanted.

I'm glad that, even though it was a brief extension, the events surrounding Karl and Claire were thought out for a little longer and a little more thoroughly. Even though we live an era where mass communication has never been easier, where we have access to all sorts of differing viewpoints and information, we as a society are still so very ignorant and closed minded in our debates. Both sides are radicals from the get go, and everyone treats anyone with a differing view point as an idiot without consideration.

There are important issues in our society that need to be discussed, issues that will determine our prosperity, our happiness, our safety – and they aren't even being mentioned, let alone debated upon.

I thoroughly believe what I wrote in the article; that Karl was sexually frustrated, he was lonely and that the chubby/butterface girls in his league (at least in his league at that point in his life) denied Karl companionship because society is elevating their unearned self worth to such astronomical levels that they think they can chase the top tier of men alongside the girls who actually deserve such men. Their selfishness and over inflated egos caused them to consider Karl below them, to the point that he went crazy, and he took it out on the girl he wished loved him.

I'm angry that Claire Davis is dead. She was beautiful. She came from a family that clearly cared for and loved her. She was physically in shape and intelligent. Claire had so much potential. All the evidence suggests that she would have contributed positively to the world, that she probably would have married a good man and started a good family. We didn't just lose one potentially decent woman – the world has forever been denied the beautiful children of Claire Davis. The world became a little uglier with her untimely death.

Instead, look at all the women who get to waste the life that Claire Davis never got to experience. Rude, angry women sporting short hair and ugly tattoos and aesthetically ugly piercings with bodies bordering on obesity shouting about how horrible men are. Selfish, middle aged whores who've slept with over twenty men and are just having their first child at 36, who were bored with their husbands after one year of marriage and are already planning on divorcing him when their kids finally become teenagers.

If she had lived, would Claire have become like these other disgusting parodies of humans we still call women? It's possible – anything is – but I don't think so. We were robbed of a treasure. Good women in our culture are almost so rare as to be priceless, and the death of Claire cut off a whole lineage of potentially good women. The world today is worse off for her death, and the future is dimmer for all decent men.

In our world of weak unguided males and repugnantly selfish females, we don't get to have women like Claire. Instead we get this;

Western society is fast becoming one big black comedy – and the joke is on all of us. Please excuse me if I don't much feel like laughing.

A Woman’s Most Potent Weapon Is Emotional Manipulation

January 14, 2014 | by The Last Dissident | Link | Original Link

It is already old news that the founder and CEO of Lululemon was forced to resign due to his “controversial” remarks on the proper use of his company’s clothing. When I wrote my original article, the thought that Chip Wilson may be risking his career (or at least his position) with his courageously honest approach certainly crossed my mind. To quote one of the great Red Pill works of fiction:

“This is Jack’s total lack of surprise”.

… But I digress…

A recent article by Raywolf about the predatory nature of the mate-seeking woman sent me down a trail of thought that I still now find myself travelling on. I think I found some of the ideas expressed in the article, and the literature therein referenced, an undeniable parallel to relationships I have experienced in my life.

> "We've all had those clinging girl friends determined to make us swear undying love to them, and as the matrix glitched around us, something was not right but we couldn't quite put our finger on it. "

This line in particular struck a chord with me. I have experienced this moment of clarity in relationships more than once. This is the Red Pill moment when you become aware that your girlfriend's constant professions of love are over embellished at best, and at worst, blatant manipulation. I used to believe that the girls I experienced this with just happened to be psychologically unstable, but I am beginning to wonder if this disingenuous emotional snaring is a basic female survival tactic. What if women are, fundamentally, emotional predators? Would this explain the propensity for young women to socially combat each other when placed under the same roof, whether it be at home or at the work place? After all, what would predators do if placed in the same cage?

I do not claim to know that any of this is fact. As a man of science, I understand that nothing is fact until rigorously scientifically proven. However, over the decades, the concept of evolution has proven a very useful tool for explaining some of the more peculiar behavioural traits exhibited by our species. In my opinion, Evolutionary Psychology is the one branch of psychology that time and time again can accurately explain behaviour, simply because it relies on one and only one basic premise: we evolved.

With this in mind, reflect on this statement: in a world of men and beasts, man can survive without woman, but woman cannot survive without man. For obvious physical reasons, this statement holds true. In the environment of evolutionary adaptiveness (or EEA), man had a body suited for fighting both predators and other men, and could mate and reproduce several times a day, without ever having to pair bond with a woman. Woman's survival, however, depended on her ability to emotionally snare a man to protect both herself and her offspring. Is it any wonder why women have developed adaptations to emotionally manipulate men? In a world full of physical predators, woman has made herself an emotional predator in order to protect herself and her children. Whereas man's weapon is his physical prowess, woman's weapon is her emotional manipulation.

But here comes the part some of you may not want to hear: you cannot blame women for this. We are all the products of a cruel and unfair existence. We are all the outcome of a never ending arms race…

It is likely that women are, most of the time, not even fully consciously aware of the emotional weaponry they employ. I am by no means saying that psychologically healthy women do not believe they are “in love”, and are instead just faking the entire ordeal; this is not how evolution directs us. Rather, the question should be: what is this “love” they are feeling, and is it fundamentally self-serving, and thus, categorically disingenuous? Do they love the man, or do they love the feeling they derive from the man? I cannot count the number of times girlfriends have told me that they love the way I make them feel.

It is interesting to note how young teenage girls seem to have a single track mind during the formative years of adolescence. Ask any parent of a gossiping teenage girl and they will tell you the single subject matter is boys. That is not to say that boys are not fascinated with their female counterparts (trust me, we were), but their interests seem to expand beyond just the opposite sex. For that matter, the primary subject matter for entertainment geared towards adult women tends to be almost exclusively the subject of men. Whether it is the predictable rom com, or the latest edition of Cosmo, the topic is men; falling in love with men, how to attract men, how to please your man, etc. etc. etc. This all starts to make sense if we take into account a woman’s evolutionary need for a male protector. As men, we want women, but we do not always need them around. In the EEA, this was not the case for women. Of course, the feminists would tell me this is simply the result of the patriarchy. Alas, this is one conspiracy theory I do not buy into…

And this brings me back to Chip Wilson (yes, again). If women are emotional predators, would it follow that feminism itself, being a product of women, is fundamentally an emotionally predatory school of thought? It certainly seemed like the sharks were circling around Chip, even before he left the television studio. What is the history of feminism if not a focused and unrelenting attack on masculinity, the alpha male, and the law of the jungle? In this case, the predatory attack was on reason itself! Dare I say that these feminist attacks stem more from an emotional response than a coherent, logically sound theory? Where a feminist sees patriarchy, an evolutionary psychologist sees inevitability.

4 Reasons Why Beta Males Persist In Human Populations

January 14, 2014 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

A recent theme here is how men are pressured to act unnaturally in today's environment. This causes a great deal of anguish among males. In my last post on why girls go for bad boys, I explained the phenomenon of why girls seem to prefer the alpha bad boy types over the much more stable, nicer beta males. However, this leaves a very important unanswered question that was left in the comments section:

> OK, just one question: if this is all true, why haven't beta males been bred out of the population?

1. Social Conditioning

Feminists claim to be against traditional sex roles, but that only applies to women's roles. They still embrace the ideas of chivalry and men paying for a date, among other things. Although chivalry is thankfully getting destroyed more and more each year it is still very alive and kicking in some people. The MSM and many people from older generations still sell the idea that being a "good man" is the key to winning a girl's heart. Therefore most men are still beta because they have been lied to by the authority figures in their lives (TV and parents, in that order) for so long that they refuse to accept the facts after they have been thrown right in their face.

I'm sorry if the image above made anyone throw up.

2. Arranged Marriages

Arranged marriages have been very common around the world and across cultures in pre-industrial revolution times. In all of these cultures the idea of gaming women would be useless. If a man wanted to get a woman then appealing to a girl's hypergamy would only result in getting killed by the girl's father and other male relatives.

The men who were most successful were the ones who were most appealing to the father. These were the beta males who could prove that they would be the best at taking care of the the father's daughter and his grandchildren. So in cultures where there were arranged marriages the beta was king. Men have adapted/evolved over thousands of years (hundreds of generations) to be appealing to the girl's father not the girl herself.

Since these cultures rewarded virtuous behavior in males, betas would thrive and prosper more than if girls were free to choose their own mates and bad boy behavior was rewarded (like it is today). Cultural survival of the fittest in action.

Over hundreds of iterative generations the alpha male, who was most likely extremely common in pre-civilizational hunter gatherer societies, was almost completely replaced by the blue collar worker beta male.

However, since female fertility was so precious to the continued survival of early civilization, society could not ban women who were attracted to the alpha male from reproducing. Women who were attracted to bad boys were forced via arranged marriage to marry beta males.

3. Hard Times

Neglected alpha male children could not survive without a caring father in earlier times before welfare and society's safety net. An American woman living on a homestead in the western U. S. during the mid 1800s would not survive for long without a man to protect her and her children from wild animal attacks and to plow the fields so they would have food on their table. Yes, a few women did it without a man, but it was rare.

Although they may have preferred a different type of man, it was simply not an option. Screwing the alpha male bandit would have resulted in being shunned by society and dying alone. If a man were given an option of death or marrying and staying with an HB6, most men would choose life. So again, evolutionary pressures were put on men to become beta while women stayed biologically the same as they were in hunter gatherer society.

However, in today's society this is no longer the case. A woman who makes $8 an hour working as a barista at Starbucks can afford a small studio apartment with heating and A/C and never have to worry about animal attacks. She can enjoy movies, music, and live a life that is much more luxurious than the most well-to-do 1800's homesteader's wife could even imagine. Women hardly need a man anymore if they are single. If they wish to have children they would prefer having a man around of course, but with the welfare state it is much easier to do without one than before.

4. Nosy Neighbors In Small Towns

Comments on my "Why Girls Go For Bad Boys" article also pointed out the problem of paternity fraud. The fact is that about 10% of children are not born by the man the woman says is the father. Readers claimed that because of this there is no way that evolution would favor the beta husbands because they were not the ones reproducing.

To be clear, all paternity fraud is bad and I am not diminishing the damage it caused by saying this, but 10% paternity fraud still leaves 90% of children being sired by the husband so the beta genes would still be favored. We can not know what the rate of paternity fraud is prior to the development of paternity tests, but we do know that most people lived in small rural communities where it is nearly impossible to keep a secret. Also the husband would often work on the fields just outside the house so the opportunities to have an affair were probably much lower than today when a husband is predictably gone from 9-5 every day.

The existence of some natural alpha males in today's society shows that the above reasons were not good enough to completely replace alpha males with beta males. However, they were enough to change the demographic of the typical man's natural state toward beta when the right conditions were in place.

Undoubtedly our early history was very challenging times for the alpha male as he would often find himself at odds with the expectations of his neighbors. He was forced to act against his natural impulses in order to find acceptance. Now it is the time for the natural beta male to go against his natural instincts if he wishes to find a place in the changed modern world. The current culture is unsustainable, but we are not going back to traditionalism and marriage so men need to be prepared to adapt to whatever is to come in the following decades.

The Red Pill Diaries

Friday

My buddy's pissed, I kept him up all night banging a random tinderella the night before. Same script as always, go to same wine bar, get same bottle of wine, same suggestion to go to my place to try a caipirinha, and then bang. He gets over it, he knows I'd do the same for him and we head out Friday night to a supposed hot spot in town. After 30 minutes in line, we get in and bouncer gives us his card telling us to just email him next time in advance. Pretty sure wearing suits and not acting like a 20 year old college frat tard helped.

Warm up with some older girls, long enough to scope out the situation. Bid farewell to the golden girls and walk around more. Buddy hooks a girl, I entertain her ugly friend. No idea what she's blabbing about but my buddy and I know to give each other at least 15 minutes to work on our respective targets. He leaves with his girl to another area, so I stay longer with the ugly grenade. Finally can't take it anymore. She had mentioned giving up cigarettes nine years ago so I ask her if she wants to go smoke. Obviously says no, but there's my polite way of getting out in case my buddy is still with his girl so grenade doesn't get all pissy. Have to think ahead.

Find a group of girls and one gay guy. Girls weren't having it with me, but I know the disarming value of a gay guy. Tell him let's go have a smoke. He agrees, I parlay his gayness into opening a girl outside. She sticks with me and he goes back in. Hooters waitress, keeps getting hit on by numerous guys, I calmly disarm them one by one. An hour later she seems into me but says is waiting for a friend here. A friend named "Michael." She already has the dick on call. I try the robbery she won't budge so I give up and get her #.

Later find a cute blonde near closing. Her friend is dancing with a guy and she is standing there with her arms crossed. "You look like you're having a horrible time." She laughs, I comment on her body language. She's into me but is visiting town and has to leave with her friends. Enthusiastically gives me her #. Probably useless but you never know. Regardless I feel like anything less than a bang from night game is a failure these days.

Saturday

I wake up the next morning and take my dog for a walk. Outside I see a girl jump in a cab wearing heels and a dress, obviously from the night before. Nice job, random guy who banged her. I appreciate the fact that such girls exist for my enjoyment. But I also feel sad for the same girls as their sexual market value decreases with every day and bang that gets added to their lives. And they don't even realize it.

Go back inside my apartment, make some eggs and get on the forum and ROK. Send some emails out to clients and do some work. Think about Russia and search for more language instruction. Found one, sign up. Time to go meet a client.

Put my suit on and head out. Read a book on the subway while thinking about having sex with every attractive girl I see en route. This no masturbation thing fills me with unbridled coital desire. Meet with my client's assistant and we drive out to the meeting. He tells me of his two year relationship with his girl and how he is close to proposing. I can tell he is doing so because he thinks he has to, not because he wants to. I imply, carefully, about how men's values increase as time goes on and for the girls it lessens. I have to be careful because of the work environment. He laughs and agrees, but I know he won't do anything about it.

I have a group chat with friends. Check it and they are talking about everything from reality TV to their kids to their marriages. I think how far away I am from that. I've voiced my red pill beliefs before, they do not go over well with most of my friends. Most think I'm nuts, some think I'm in a phase, and only a few really get it (and therefore me).

Another friend texts me a screenshot of his texts with a girl and asks me what to do next. I'm no expert, but I'm ages ahead of most plugged in guys in America. I give him some suggestions. Later another buddy says a few girls didn't respond to his texts, I tell him to text "whats up flake" per the Heartiste gem of a post. It works, conversations reignited.

Chat with other red pillers about life, dating and girls. I like conversating with people on my wavelength, it's refreshing. Break down the previous night's game with my buddy. I put a lot of effort into this, for better or worse.

I tell my date to meet me at a wine bar down the street from my apartment. Same routine over and over again because it usually works. I get there early to make sure I get a logistically sound seat – I don't want to be sitting across from her. I find a guy sitting with empty chairs beside him on both sides, I ask him if they are free, he moves for me so I have two seats. I feel bad, he is there alone. So are two girls on his right but he doesn't talk to him. C'mon buddy.

Date arrives. I can tell within 15 minutes she is not going to bang me. Lose interest and she won't put her phone away, we get into argument, she leaves. Even the bartender was giving her shit. I pull out my phone to see what my buddies are up to, and do a quick tweet about the date to kill time until I finish my drink:

> Worst date in years. She wouldn't put phone away, I told her to, she called me an asshole I told her to leave. She did. I win.
> — Law Dogger (@LawDogger) January 12, 2014

I turn to the two girls now on my right and start a conversation. They are receptive but not attractive enough for me to put in effort. I leave and go meet my friends at the bar. Three of us there now. Within 15 minutes I get called an asshole by two other girls. I guess I was just on point that night.

Three girls walk in, we pair up one guy one girl each. All are receptive. My hand is on her back almost immediately. Have no idea what she is saying and I'm pretty buzzed so I go on auto-pilot, having done this hundreds and hundreds of times before. I go out a lot at nights. I think we made plans to go to a sock hop.

An hour later my hand is already inside her shirt caressing her stomach and back. Take her to the couch and try to make out with her, she refuses. I keep trying and tell her to walk away if she doesn't like it. I know she won't. And she doesn't. Women like persistence.

We each try to get our respective girls to come home with us, neither will do so. Two of us get numbers, the other doesn't…the one that did not try to make out with his girl. On the way home he recognized his passiveness cost him. I reinforce his acknowledgment, girls don't punish you for trying for sex. But they will punish you for not trying.

Sunday

Wake up, walk my dog. Go to gym. Have another date that night, tell her to come over, cute girl I bedded on first date last week. Sweet girl, low self-esteem, white and super thin. My type. We make guacamole at my place. She has no idea what the hell to do in the kitchen. Looked at cilantro like it was quantum physics and told me this is the first time she's seen an avocado "in it's natural form." American girls are just sad. This would never happen in Ukraine.

After sex we talk about various things. I gauge her bisexuality – she's had a threesome before. Of course. Part of me is happy, a potential loophole into threesomes right here. Part of me was sad. Just once I'd like to be surprised that not all girls are slutty. But I'm desensitized by now. It's a hard truth to accept, but it's the truth nonetheless. She leaves, I go to sleep.

Monday

Get up, walk my dog, do some work and start writing this article. Fast forward to the night, date at wine bar again, this time with girl from Russian background. She takes out her phone, just to silence it and says she will put it away now. Manners, how lovely.

Go to the bartender to order same bottle of wine. She is hot, but dressed like a hipster. First time I've seen her here. Go back to Russia, pour wine and begin to sexualize conversation per usual. She won't fuck unless it's with a boyfriend but loves giving blowjobs. First off an EE girls that likes blowjobs? Doubtful, but I can work with that for now at least. Make out on couches, try to finger she stops me. Try again, she stops me again.

Go close out with bartender, she's drawing something. Go elderly on her, she's a designer, has a shop, etc. etc. Asks my name, we exchange them. Some interest I see. I ask her what nights she works. Make a mental note to show up those nights with other dates, so as to dial up her competition anxiety, instill preselection, (insert other manosphere terminology).

Russia tells me she will help me with my language lessons. I get visions of tutoring sessions followed by blowjobs. Russia comes upstairs, stays true to her word. No sex, but blowjob. She's way too good at this, I think of Clerks. 37 dicks in a row. Whatever makes her hamster happy I guess. Fall asleep spooning for an hour, she gets up and leaves. I go back to sleep. Wake up the next morning, walk my dog, do some work and finish this article.

3 Ways To Fight Back Against The Feminist Tidal Wave

[image]

Today's society is being saturated by feminist messages. We know the manosphere is doing its best to produce a revolution, yet we should be giving more guidance to men wanting to push back the tide. I've compiled three techniques that any man can use to change our society for the better.

1. Fat shaming year round

Fat shaming itself is not hard to do. Roosh and company have had great success with fat shaming week, but it wasn't a continuous assault. If it worked in just a week, imagine the results if we kept it up for years at a time. Masculine men everywhere can subtly fat shame every day.

Every time you see a fat chick out on public, take a picture and upload it. You can also start writing and preaching truthful anti-fat facts. Call out fat chicks eating high-calorie food. Tell the women around you that high quality men won't be seen near them if they gain weight and that negating their physical appearance is an obvious sign of a social class defect and mental illness. Even something simple like chuckling when a porker wants to be near you is a simple method that we all can do. Keep the pressure high and intense. Change will come shortly when most men stop rewarding and aiding porkers.

2. Bridge the gap of ignorance

I would recommend every red pill guy to try to understand feminists/blue pillers. I'm not saying to empathize with them, but you must know how they operate so you can understand on how to dismantle them. Spend just a few minutes a day reading their material and watching their media. Look at how they market their image and what type of tones they convey. Even join there organizations and be an underground troll.

I learned a whole lot about transsexuals by doing these steps unintentionally. I was the typical college liberal do-gooder who worked for an LGBT group as an ally. I learned all the stupid terms that transsexual freaks used. I can argue against transsexualism for hours. I know their secrets and what stuff they're hiding. Every blue pill/mangina/feminist/white knight has something they're hiding. There is a closet of skeletons waiting to be unearthed. Immerse yourself in their world to learn how to fight their agendas and to reveal their weaknesses.

3. Use creative tactics

The manosphere is full of people with a diversity of talent and perspective. Athlone Mcginnis and Virgle Kent represent for us educated black men. Christian McQueen knows nightlife like an attractive girl on Instagram knows thirst. 2Wycked can diagnose somebody better than the majority of psychologists in America. Bring something to the mix that you know well. I'm not the best writer or public speaker and even I managed to contribute articles that hurt the enemy.

I used community social shaming to change my city for the better. In my part of town we have a transsexual freak problem. Losers from the surrounding states (NJ,NY,OH,DE) come to mine (PA). The hormones flow like a river and an LGBT center that will remain nameless is responsible for it. The problem is that I would be minding my business and a man with heels would harass me. Most of the time it was for sexual services or drugs. These individuals also have parades and events consistently fucking up Philly. I was sick and tired of their narcissistic solipsism.

I started to call out these transsexual freaks out in public, using my previous experiences with transsexual activism. I learned back in the day that transsexuals have this crazy expectation that they're women since birth. They retcon their personal history and are always bitching about not being seen as a chick. In my mind they were trying to pass themselves off as "legitimate" but they were faking. They weren't "authentic" at all, so I started a local Philly trend by calling them bootlegs out in public. It wasn't just dudes who were sick of the lying and trickery. We even had "authentic" real deal chicks tired of these male fakers calling themselves "lesbians". My small area of Philly started to spread it around to the whole city. I even was contacted by some of my buddies in New York who started to use my terminology as well. A small local meme has crossed state lines.

We need all masculine men to start using those three techniques to make the world a better place. Protecting masculinity should be a task for every man. Even if the battles are small-scale, every battle won makes the war easier to win. It also means getting rewarded with a society of attractive, thin, pleasant women around instead of the current breed of pajama wearing land-whales with deep voices and short hair.

How To Deal With A Bitch

January 15, 2014 | by Daddy | Link | Original Link

Encountering an untamed bitch can be a devastating experience for those who are unaccustomed to indecency. Even many a veteran has been fooled by the deceptive nature of a vicious attack from a bitch. The growing extinction of their natural enemies, such as proper upbringing, negative consequences to their actions, and public shaming, have allowed their population to rise to an alarming level. The most dangerous species usually gather in big cities and in the suburbs. The largest population is agglomerated near the clubs and bars, but wild unleashed bitches can even be found in offices. Some bitches are small creatures, but a generalized irresponsible feeding from their owners have allowed many of them to grow as tall as 6 foot 2 and weight more than 300 pounds.

Therefore, an encounter with one can be fatal. Following these simple tips will help you get out of such an experience unscathed. This could be the difference between life and jail.

Ignore her

So you're minding your own business when suddenly out of nowhere some bitch starts an argument with you over a trivial matter. If a bitch starts babbling and shouting nonsensical insults at you, don't engage her. Simply resume what you were doing before your encounter. Do not feed bitches with your attention under any circumstances. You will condition and reinforce their behavior, and make it worse for the next men. Walk away with confidence. Do not run, as it might trigger her instinct to chase after you. While bitches can very rarely outrun a man, they can project their shrilling harpy voices far enough to attract other bitches and sexually frustrated males surrounding the area, effectively involving them in the dispute. None of these will be on your side.

The black bitch, a ferocious and aggressive species

The white bitch. She will go out of her way to make your life miserable.

If the bitch belongs to a man in the vicinity, completely ignore her and deal with the man instead. Most of the time, if a man lets his girlfriend argue with another man without interfering, it's because he himself is a bitch. Respectfully and politely tell him to keep his girlfriend in check. Make him feel ashamed and responsible for carrying around a liability who poisons other people's lives. If you're successful, he might tell her to calm down, which will insanely anger her. But she will direct that rage towards her boyfriend instead of you, and sex will be withheld for 3 months.

Some single bitches will persist and follow you around. Remember that your long-term strategy is always to get out of the situation, because theirs is to make you stay as long as possible.

Don't treat her like a man

It can be deceptive because many bitches try to walk like men, talk like men, look like men, and behave like men. This is just a façade. Underneath it all, they are not men and don’t function like men. They will get in your face, arrogantly ignoring natural physical boundaries, potential dangers and threats. If you start arguing with her, you’ll be busy getting points across and she will be busy inciting feelings and emotions in order to destabilize you. Therefore, don’t use common tactics like staying on topic or logic, as they are immune to them. In other words, don’t try to win an argument.

Don’t attempt to look her directly in the eye in order to stare her down like you would do to a man. There was a time when you could scare off a bitch simply by showing her you meant business, but that time is long gone. All you would be doing is giving her more of your attention, which she craves. However, never look down, for she could be interpreting it as submission and double the intensity of her attack. Look above her or sideways.

Wrong way to confront a bitch

Use self-control

The most important principle is to remain calm and in control. Do not get angry, as it will incite hysteria and sexual arousal in the bitch. She will want to make it last longer and instigate more drama. To help you not take it personally and stay detached, just repeat to yourself that it’s not their fault, it’s the fault of their owners who did a lousy job at training them.

Get out as soon as possible and talk as little as possible. It doesn’t really matter what you say, as long as you’re being dismissive. Talk at her, not to her. Talk in her general direction, like there’s an audience around her, sometimes focusing your attention on other women in the horizon. Use disengaged body language, facing away from her. It’s better to not insult her, because it could trigger her victim instinct and prompt her to involve other people in the argument. But if you do, never show any emotions, and state it matter-of-factly. Dropping a “K fattie” while walking away is a good all-purpose response. Even if she’s not overweight, she will still feel insecure and check her thighs later just to make sure.

Sometimes you’re not sure if you want to slap her or kiss her

Give her commands

If the bitch does not stray and the situation escalates, you need to be more creative. Remember, some bitches are not completely wild. They were at some point under the control of a man, and the reason they are hysterical is because they miss and crave the masculine guidance they used to have before they were abandoned. They have been trained by a man, hence their natural instincts to obey you might be triggered if you give them commands.

Be firm, authoritative, with your foot forward and your finger pointed at her. The most common commands are “Shut up,” “cook me dinner,” and “get in the car.” Even if they don’t make contextual sense, their familiarity might calm her down and reassure her. She will be dazzled for a few seconds, which gives you an opportunity to disengage her and walk away.

What if you’re ambushed?

There is nothing worse than having a bitch in your face and not being able to escape. For instance, indoor bitches can be quite a hassle because they may cut off your exit points. You might also be in certain situations where you just can’t leave. When the bitch keeps shouting obscenities at you and insist on talking to you, and you’ve exhausted all other methods to get rid of her, it usually means she’s into you and it’s her cute way of letting you know.

Since spanking is not convenient in most social situations, you need to use another non damaging technique. Nothing reminds a bitch what she really is better than the good old-fashioned face mush. This move is so natural and intuitive one might wonder if it’s built into our genetics. Simply put your hand in her face, grasping a good hold of her cheeks and covering her eyes with the rest of your fingers. Push her face away from you, using your wrist to maneuver her head laterally. The wrist twist is important, as it will guide her face in the desired direction, unequivocally communicating to her that she has to shut the fuck up.

Notice the slight downward tilt of his hand, making the bitch take a submissive position

Conclusion

While it’s impossible to completely avoid bitches, their effect on you can be greatly minimized if you treat them the right way and know how to defuse their attacks. Note that most of these tips can be adapted to your girlfriend or wife, although you will have to occasionally hold a real conversation with them. But remember, always be responsible and teach them right from wrong, otherwise the rest of the world will be stuck dealing with another bitch. We will hold you accountable for it.

6 Reasons Rookies Should Date More

January 15, 2014 | by Dom Torres | Link | Original Link

A little over a year ago when I was still fairly new to game I took my first trip to Montreal. I was bullshitting online and stumbled upon an article by Virgil Kent where he wrote, “If you get a chance to go on a date… take it.” Sounds simple enough, but do we follow this law? I know I didn’t as a beginner.

Here are a few reasons why you should live by this law until you get a few notches in:

1. Practice makes perfect

If you’re a beginner,you will often walk out of a date and get bombarded by ideas of things you should have said. This happened to me countless times when I started dating and sometimes it still does. I’d grunt at the missed opportunity to say a joke that related to our conversation topic and would have made her laugh and helped build attraction.

Lucky for me (and all of you), girls aren’t really that different from each other, especially in the states. Most girls have the same hobbies, watch the same shows, talk about the same things, etc. Chances are you will find yourself having the same conversations over and over again and eventually you will get it right and find your winning formula. After that, your confidence will increase tremendously and you won’t have to write topics on your sweaty palms anymore.

Whenever I have a date nowadays I don’t worry about how I’m going to amuse her or wow her. I know what will capture her interest because my stories have been tested on women before her. I more often find myself crossing my fingers hoping she doesn’t bore me too much.

2. You will create a sex sense

It makes sense to pick your dates based off which girl you believe will give it up the easiest. The problem with this notion is that as a beginner you don’t know which girls those are, you only think you know.

The summer before starting college I worked as a kitchen utensils salesman. My job was to do demos for friends and family in the hopes of making a sale. My boss preached the importance of doing as many demos as possible, no matter how sure we were the person wouldn’t buy anything. The reason? We were just starting off and had no idea what a customer looked like or sounded like.

I sold a grand worth of utensils my first day following the no discrimination policy. I have also banged multiple girls I would not have classified as DTF from the get go. When you’re a beginner in sales and dating, your best approach is to put yourself out there as much as possible till you catch repeated patterns and can tell which will surely buy, not buy, and are undecided. You can then set up your dates accordingly.

3. Investment for the future

Chances are if you’re a beginner you are still fairly young. Those $30-40 dates may seem expensive to you now, but let me tell you a secret—a lot of guys drop $100 plus on dates and most get nothing to show for it! This may seem strange to us, but women figure their company is worth it, don’t ask me why. You will save a ton of money in the future if you learn how to build attraction on a date without feeling the need to throw money at a girl in hopes of getting in her pants. I guarantee you she will eat your money faster than a slot machine.

When I began to date I had a few expensive dates where I got nothing more than a hug goodbye. I learned from my mistakes and now spend much less for much more.

4. You will be more successful in other areas

Dating will provide you with social skills that are priceless. In essence what dating teaches you is how to be charming and interesting. It will come in handy during interviews, in class, and anything that involves human interaction in general. You will feel more confident meeting people for the first time, whether it be a recruiter or hot blonde. I personally prefer the latter.

The list of things for which I have used knowledge derived from dating could go on forever. I've used it to get in teacher's good graces, get out of trouble, persuade friends, etc. During my previous internship I found myself telling the same travel stories I'd tell a girl on the first date to the guys in the office. They loved it and wanted to hear more!

5. Outsourcing Opportunities

If you traveled abroad you know how much greener the grass could get. If you're like me and plan on living abroad after you accomplish a certain goal (finish school, saving x amount of dollars, etc.) then you may see little value in dating back at home.

Let me tell you know how wrong you are. Game, just like jobs, can be outsourced. I've been in the trenches ever since I discovered game and it has given me a tremendous advantage over the men of countries I've visited. You may have to make small tweaks to your style of game but you will be pleasantly surprised from how easily you can clean up.

I've been to 16 countries and whenever I see guys getting drunk amongst themselves in the corner of the bar, not knowing how to approach their women, a shit-eating grin forms across my face because I know it's lunch time.

6. It Will Help Your Approaching

Dating requires you to hold a conversation for a long time. I'd estimate my dates last anywhere between 2-3 hours. If you can keep a conversation for that long you think a 5 minute conversation will scare you away?

As my dating increased so did my approaches. I feared rejection less and no longer feared that dreaded rolling tumbleweed moment. There were a few times I got numbers in spite of the girl being in a relationship because she enjoyed the conversation.

So go out and fill your weekend up, rookies! You can't shoot 3 pointers if you can't shoot from the foul line.

Two Sex Moves For Deep Conversion Game

Deep Conversion Game is game unlike any other. If regular game is a Porsche, then Deep Conversion Game is a rocket ship. The power of having the tools necessary to create a relationship with a lover will increase your regular game by one-hundred fold and will help you maintain a steady harem. Not only will it give you the skills to maintain a harem, but is absolutely essential to a long-term relationship (LTR) and even marriage.

With the understanding that this is a next level type of game, we can delve into the subject matter with an open mind. Everything that you're about to read has been field tested multiple times by myself. Nothing I write comes from anything other than tried and true methods that I have taught to other men and they duplicated with similar results. To put it bluntly, this shit works and works extremely well.

Read without judgment, have an open mind and you will have the same results. This is a science, so every step must be utilized the same way and to the same degree, in order to ensure its effectiveness.

Another factor out of your control is that not every girl will allow herself to be converted. Certain personality types will respond better to this game and through trial and error you will gain insight into what types of girls this will work on most effectively. I have utilized this game on girls ranging from 18 years old up to 38 years old, so the age does not matter as much as the natural inclination to submit that each girl has.

1. The Hotel Move

Set up at time for a date. Do not tell her what the plans are. Let's say that you set the date time for 8pm on a Friday night. Text her around 7pm and tell her this:

You: "book this hotel room and meet me there at 8pm" (points if you send her the link to a hotel to make it an easy 'sell'. It doesn't have to be a nice hotel, can be average rating)

Her: "Um okayyy? Why?"

You: (ignoring her question) "check in and text me the room number. Then get completely undressed and tie a blindfold around your eyes. Kneel by the door and when I knock, open the door but stay on your knees. I'll knock 3 times so u know its me"

Her: "Oooh ok I will"

You: "good girl"

When you get to the hotel door, knock three times and upon entering immediately pull your cock out and have her start giving you head. Keep her on her knees. After you get hard, bend her over and have consensual sex. Completely dominate her. Finish by cumming on her face, but before you orgasm, have her repeat the following mantra three times:

You: "You are my slut. Say it"

Her: “Yes Christian I’m your slut”

Cum on her face. Take the blindfold off. Finger her for a moment, then scoop up your cum off of her face and stick your fingers in her mouth. Have her eat the cum. Don’t say anything during this physical activity. After she eats your cum, kiss her forehead. Note, I said her “forehead”, for a reason. Then walk out of the hotel room. You’re not leaving yet, but she will think you are. This is the ‘Curtain Call’ to the act. Go get something to drink, make a phone call, whatever doesn’t matter, but spend five to ten minutes ‘gone’, then return and act like it never happened.

She will be awestruck and undoubtedly make comments praising the fun you two had. Do not make a big deal out of it, simply smirk and nod your head in agreement. Turn on TV, order room service or take a nap. The desired effect has been accomplished, less is more now.

Now what did you just accomplish? First off, you showed dominance and the ability to be alpha and lead by telling her to book the hotel. You provided the link to the hotel in the text so you have provided the ‘tools’ for her to be successful in ‘obeying you. Her paying for the hotel is a small step in the Acts of Compliance and Investment. She invested money into the date, which causes her to become attached to you and less inclined to leave you. The physical sexual acts speak for themselves.

Whether you have money for the hotel or not doesn’t matter. She must pay for the hotel in order for this to properly play out in the long run. When you have a girl investing on this level, you will know for a fact that she is not using you for your money (if you have it), and if you don’t have the money for a hotel, then even better.

2. The Stairwell Move

You and her are on a date and and you spot a stairwell. Pull her into the stairwell and start kissing her. Women love this type of spontaneity. I remember this one specific time, I pulled a sexy little filly from the club who had legs for days. I pulled her into the stairwell of large hotel and we started to kiss and I sexually escalated. After we had sex I pulled out and came on her ass.

The cum ran from her ass cheek down her leg and started to pool on her shoe, a sexy five inch heel. It was a sight to behold. She looked up at me and time stood still. She smiled slowly and said, “Is it weird that I want you to take a pic of my leg right now?” “Say no more”, I responded as I pulled out my phone and took the pic. Stairwell sex is invigorating, risky and sexy as hell.

After you pull her into the stairwell, turn her around so her back is to you and guide her gently against the wall. Pull her dress up or pull her pants down and penetrate from behind. Have consensual sex. Kiss her heavily when doing so. For this specific exercise, when you’re about to finish, have her get on her knees. Finish in her mouth. Instruct her to swallow verbally.

You: “Swallow my cum”

She swallows, smiles up at you and no doubt her eyes will be aglow.

You: “Are you my slut?”

Her: “Yes Christian, I’m your slut”

Have her repeat it three times. The repetition is important so it becomes ingrained in her mind that she is yours. Return to your evening and do as you were.

The Role-Reversal Exercise That Terrifies Women

January 16, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Before Dr. Warren Farrell became one of the key figures of the Men's Rights Movement, he was the only male board member of NOW (National Organization of Women), and a male feminist. When NOW chapters came out in support of universal custody for women in every divorce case, Farrell left the movement, saying they were anti-father and that, "I do not agree with choices for women when they eliminate choices for men."

When Farrell began writing about men's issues, he went from appearing on the Phil Donahue Show and Oprah to being called a "rape-apologist" by the feminists he used to support, and having his speaking engagement shut down by protests.

Warren Farrell has always said his work is about getting the genders to understand one another, communicate well, and live in a way that benefits men and women equally. His seminars frequently featured "role-reversal" exercises, in which men and women had to "walk a mile in the others shoes." Men took on a women's role, and women took on a man's role, to give men and women greater compassion and understanding of the others experience.

The feminists LOVED him for the role reversal experiments he did with men, and HATED him for the role reversal experiments he did with women. After hearing both, it's not hard to see why.

Role Reversal For Men

To understand the female experience, Warren had men participate in a beauty contest. Male contestants had to present themselves shirtless, and have women vote on who was the most attractive. The men were judged entirely on their physical appearance. (You can watch footage of one of these events here.)

At first, the men loved the attention. However, as men began to get voted off for being less attractive than other contestants, the men became self-conscious. They felt hurt and rejected when they were voted off. The men began to compare themselves to others and wonder, "Am I attractive enough?"

I don't know a single woman who hasn't wondered at some point, "Am I pretty enough?" Most women love the attention their beauty gets, and are also deeply insecure about their looks. After the experiment, the men had a greater understanding of the insecurity women experience around their body.

Role Reversal For Women

To understand the male experience, Warren had the women ask men out on a traditional dinner date. Women had to call the man, plan the evening, and initiate every step of the date. The men were told to be entirely passive, putting the burden of the evening on the woman. It was up to the women to risk rejection for any physical or sexual contact she wanted, with the men passively accepting or rejecting the women's advances.

Many of the women said they were unable to listen to what the man was saying because they were so worried about getting rejected. Instead of connecting with men, the women found themselves constantly thinking “How do I get this guy not to say no?”

Every time I’ve told that anecdote to another man, he’s burst out laughing in recognition. Just as most women worry about their looks, most men worry about getting rejected. In Farrell’s words, men “take 150 risks of rejection from first eye contact with a woman until intercourse.” By taking the leading role, women were better able to understand the risks men take when approaching women.

The Results

While the men were willing to do the beauty contest – after all, the male experience involves constantly facing rejection – most of feminists, even after watching the men go through the beauty contest, walked out when it came time to participate in the role-reversal date. Warren’s “role-reversal dates” became one of the final straws that lead to his departure from NOW, and feminism as a whole.

Since Farrell began his exercises, the traditional dinner date has become anachronistic. Most couples now meet through hookup culture. However, men still are still expected to make the majority of sexual advances, with women signalling interest passively and waiting for men to approach them.

What Farrell’s work suggests is that men are not “scared of rejection” as some women like to suggest, as much as that their social role that requires facing constant rejection, and women would be equally if not more scared of rejection if placed in similiar circumstances.

Double Standards

While women’s issues with body image are constantly explored in mass media, very little has been written about men’s issues with rejection that isn’t demeaning or shaming.

Women are told that they are beautiful no matter what their body type is, and men are called creepy for even asking the question "How do I get a girl to have sex with me?" Telling a woman she doesn't meet your physical standards is considered misogynistic, but if a women dislikes a man's approach she is entitled to publicly mock him for seeking to connect with her.

Outside the manosphere, the only group that treat's men's fear of rejection with anything resembling empathy is the pick up industry. It's not surprising given the amount of rejection men face, many pick-up products are marketed with bogus claims like "Never get rejected again!" or "Lines so powerful she can't say no!" These claims mirror the marketing of the billion dollar industries targeting women's insecurities with claims like "Lose 30 pounds in 5 days!" or "Look ten years younger!"

In recent years, feminists have tried to shame men for their physical preferences. Saying men should accept a woman regardless of her weight, is as absurd as saying women should accept a man regardless of his sexual advances.

Can you imagine if mass media treated men's rejection issues the way they treated women's body issues? Men would campaign for "creep-acceptance," and be proud of their weak game. Rejecting a man's approach would be considered "shallow," when men bothered to approach at all. Some lone website for heterosexual feminine women would hold "creep-shaming week" in response to the poorly-dressed awkward losers men were transforming into.

Seeking Understanding

If women expect men to understand their struggles with weight and body image, they should also seek to understand men's issues with rejection and game.

Most women who criticize men's pick-up tactics have never tried to approach a stranger, win their trust, and ask them out. Women are less likely to shame men's attempts to improve their success with women, after experiencing the male role.

Role-reversal can fun. In his book Why Men Are The Way They Are, Warren Farrell talks about going on "role-reversal dates" with women he knows where they exaggerate traditional roles – complete with her bringing flowers and him fighting "very hard against anything overtly sexual on our ‘first date.'” He says the experience is usually “hilarious” and “an amazing turn-on.”

The intention isn’t to give up roles, but simply to understand the others experience better. I love the role I have, I love women who enjoy playing the feminine role, and I wouldn’t want to change either. While a woman might sympathize with a man’s challenges with rejection, she is still going to chose the most confident and appealing partner, the same way a man who understands women’s body issues still prefers the most attractive women.

The way men feel towards ugly women is the way women feel towards men who give them “creepy” approaches. When women understand and care about men, they naturally improve their appearance, the same way men who understand and care about women naturally become more confident and less creepy.

Compassion Means Self-Improvement

Rather than lowering our standards, and promoting something as absurd as fat or creep acceptance, understanding means become the most attractive version of ourselves.

While Warren Farrell suggests men and women might be able to look past such things and solely at their partners capacity for love, unless biology changes, most men are going to continue to prefer attractive women, and most women are going to continue to prefer bold men.

Thankfully, both our weight and game are things we can change. I’ve personally transformed myself in both areas, and much of the writing on this site is about how men can improve both their game and their body.

Understanding is a two-way street. Ladies, if you’d like help dropping weight, I’d be glad to share what’s worked for me. After you’ve worked on your body, you can work on your understanding and compassion by planning an amazing date for us. Pick me up at eight. Bring flowers.

The Truth About Women In STEM

January 16, 2014 | by Dr Harry Longabaugh | Link | Original Link

Over the weekend, I was treated to some truly hearty laughs when a group of computer programmers posted on GitHub the specifications of a feminist programming language. (It has since been removed and posted to bitbucket.) As a professional software developer and recreational critic of Social Justice Warriors, this article felt tailor-made to my interests. If either of those descriptions applies to you, feel free to check out the link above, it's worth it.

"I wonder how long it would take an offended "feminist" to overreact to this article?" I thought. Turns out, not so long, as a feminist coder posted her response almost on cue, complete with "trigger warnings", using the original post as 75% of her article content, the whole nine yards (check it out here).

Naturally, I was reminded about the infamous Adria Richards "Donglegate" incident, which has become somewhat legendary in the tech world, where a female employee of Sendgrid got two men fired because she overheard them making a joke about "dongles" in private at a conference. I couldn't help but to think of Beavis and Butthead snickering and saying "huh huh, huh huh, she said dongles". Crude? Maybe. Reason to lose employment? Absolutely not. And yet when "Donglegate" was all said and done, and Adria Richards got fired because sweet justice exists, the feminists and social justice warriors got the last laugh. For weeks, I saw Adria Richards on TV, playing the victim, distorting the story so hard that I was reminded of a famous Simpsons episode I saw on TV.

That was the Adria Richards coverage in a nutshell, and to someone who was not as invested in the story as I was (which is roughly 99% of people) it seems like another chapter in the long continuing narrative of "The evil 'bro-grammer boys club of STEM fields that hates women and wants to make their life a living hell’”.

This narrative has always pissed me off because I can tell you firsthand that it is not true. In fact, in just about every aspect it has been the opposite. High schools, universities and employers try to fight so hard against the “boys club” stereotype that they end up giving women some rather unfair advantages. How do I know this? I graduated from one of the top science and engineering schools in the country.

College Years

When I was a college freshman in the Computer Science program, I immediately noticed that there were a lot more men than women. No biggie, people do what they like. I didn’t think much of it. It was widely accepted that computer science was one of the tougher majors in our university and students would routinely change majors when they started being overwhelmed by the incredibly demanding course load.

How demanding? During sophomore year my roommate and I pulled so many all-nighters that we inadvertently learned the rules of cricket (the cricket world championships were broadcast from halfway around the world, live, in the middle of the night, and it made for better background TV than infomercials.)

I first realized something was wrong when I got into trouble with the housing department of our school. My crime? Being a nerd hitting on the hottest girl in the dorms next to ours. Apparently, this was labelled as harassing behavior, and the only thing that saved me from being kicked out of on-campus housing was a friend of mine, who was an RA and member of some housing committees, vouching for me and promising everyone there that he would remedy the problem in private. Once again, I didn’t think much of it, we talked it out, and I was actually believing that what I did was wrong. But that’s a story for another time.

Some time later, I saw a student giving a tour to some high school kids, but then I noticed that the high schoolers were all girls, almost all of them wearing matching t-shirts. This was our state’s program to get more girls interested in science and math. Boy interested in science and math? You’re on your own there, buddy. The next year, it was touted as a success—many more girls enrolled in our schools science and math programs than they ever have. Except the numbers were still overwhelmingly male, I think the overall ratio moved by half a percent. I didn’t think much of it then.

As I progressed through my classes, I would see the same faces over and over again. By your senior year you will probably be in at least 1 group project, study group or circle with about 25% of your major by incoming class year. And while there were some brilliant, exceptionally bright and hard-working women, they were outnumbered by women who took the easiest duties in group projects and just coasted. How some of these girls ended up in Junior and Senior Level computer science classes at my school was a miracle. There were numerous instances where you would have to explain basic concepts to them. It blew my mind. And we encouraged them! We either took the harder group project roles because we did not want a bad grade, or we acted as complete supplicating chumps and ended up doing about 80% of these girls homework assignments thinking it would win us favors (it didn't).

It's not like the school had a shortage of resources to help them. Quite the opposite. There were several women's organizations to help ensure the success of these ladies by helping them with tutoring, counseling, etc, for free. But these resources were often ignored in favor of the easy group projects and thirsty men.

There was a computer lab that stayed open all night. There were only 1-2 girls there pulling all-nighters at a time. But lots of dudes. Lots and lots of dudes. Because of the course load, people were dropping out left and right, but I can only recall one instance of a girl I knew dropping out, compared to the dozens of guys I knew.

And then came the job fairs. Because of my school's prestige and reputation, many prominent companies and organizations recruited from our school. And you can guess what happened. All of the girls that coasted, all of the girls that cheated, "short cut" and gilded their way through college, ALL, without any exception, got job offers at these prestigious companies with those sweet high STEM salaries. I have known several guys that could not find work in their field while grinding hard for up to a year on the same exact prestigious degree. This was demoralizing. But, you know, male privilege.

More Examples.

"But maybe you're just nitpicking and biased?" OK then, I will give you more examples from outside of my college career.

One of my friend's girlfriend, on the surface, has a STEM career (computer software to be exact). If you google her name you will find several articles about her, talking about the challenges, hardships, and all the other bla bla bla that women face in computer science. The thing is, I am pretty sure this girl has never written a single line of code. And no, my friend is not dating Adria Richards. Companies are so desperate to employ and tout women, to be seen as that "progressive" company, that many create non-technical positions to fill that role, and then pat themselves on the back for it.

Another example: an ex-girlfriend, a hard science PhD, would routinely complain about the sexism at her job. As a caring and doting boyfriend, of course I took those things seriously, until I realized that the issues were not sexist – they were with her work. When you're doing research-based academic work that kind of thing tends to happen. You are constantly under scrutiny, your bosses are people that haven't been outside of academia for any parts of their lives, you get paid shit money, and it's generally an unfriendly and unwelcoming environment. I realized this when I met more PhDs, male and female, from various fields. All of them had the same story. This girl mistook difficulty for sexism. Getting a PhD is so hard that there is a popular niche comic describing the rigors of professional academia (PhD Comics). Their humor won't resonate with everyone, but every single PhD I know loves it.

So yes, STEM is indeed easier for women. Everyone wants then to succeed. Everyone needs them to succeed. No matter what the cost.

But you know who I respect the most? The grinders. The girls that work hard, the girls that learn, the girls that try to make a difference in the world on the same playing field as boys. Because, in reality, there is no sexism in science. In fact, there is no “-ism” in science. It’s a meritocracy, with knowledge and achievement as the main focus. And I can respect that.

This is exactly why the “bro” culture will persist. Science can not be held to the same politically correct standards as plain old office work. Because if I’m working with you at 4 am, fueled by pizza, mountain dew and cricket matches on TV, no matter who you are, man or woman, you’re gonna be my bro. Because that’s the only way anything will get done.

The Razor’s Edge, Sufi Wisdom, And The Lord Of The Flies

January 16, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following is a compilation of three brief book reviews.

The Razor’s Edge

The Razor’s Edge is a Great Gatsy-esque story of high society characters and their path in life after the Great Depression. It focuses on Larry, who has returned from the First World War scarred by what he has seen. He has passed on the pursuit of wealth and career unlike his friends and chose to seek out enlightenment through reading and travel.

Most of the book features annoying rich people who care immensely about what others think of them. They place more stock in their social climbing than experiences, only to find out that their “friends” are temporary.

> I think I could probably arrange a liaison for him with an older woman. It would form him. I always think there’s no better education for a young man than to > become the lover of a woman of a certain age and of course if she is the sort of person I have in view, a femme du monde…

> Marriage is a serious matter on which rest the security of the family and the stability of the state. But marriage can only maintain its authority if extraconjugal relations are not only tolerated but sanctioned.
> it's not the first time she goes to bed with him that counts, it's the second. If she holds him then she holds him for good."
> Almost all the people who've had most effect on me I seem to have met by chance, yet looking back it seems as though I couldn't but have met them. It's as if they were waiting there to be called upon when I needed them.

Larry's search takes him to India, where he studies Eastern philosophy (this may seem like a cliche today but the book was written in 1944, before the trend began). He commits to nothing and perplexes his friends about his true intentions while they face their own ups and downs.

At the end of the book, Larry shares everything he has learned in a long monologue about god and reincarnation. The payoff didn't quite make it for me.

The Way Of The Sufi

The best way to describe Sufi is ancient Islamic wisdom. This little book contains anecdotes and quotes from Sufi masters. The bits are rather fragmented and difficult to read, with no all-encompassing set of rules like you would encounter in Buddhism or Stoicism. Here are the highlights:

> None attains the degree of truth until a thousand honest people have testified that he is a heretic.
> The honour of man is his learning. Wise people are torches lighting the path of truth. In knowledge lies man's opportunity for immortality. While man may die, wisdom lives eternally.

> […]
> Kings rule men, wise men rule kings.
> […]
> Man, you enter the world reluctantly, crying, as a forlorn babe;
> Man, you leave this life, deprived again, crying again, with regret.
> Therefore live this life in such a way that none of it is really wasted.
> You have to become accustomed to it after not having been accustomed to it.
> When you have become accustomed to it, you will have to become used to being without it.
> Meditate upon this contention.
> Die, therefore, 'before you die', in the words of the Purified One. Complete the circle before it is completed for you.
> A donkey stabled in a library does not become literate.
> […]
> If he is your teacher, he will make you benefit from his luminescence, whether you know it at the time or not.
> When you meet him, he will act upon you, whether you know it or not.
> What he says or does may seem inconsistent or even incomprehensible to you.
> But it has its meaning. He does not live entirely in your world.
> His intuition is that of the rightly guided, and he always works in accordance with the Right Way.
> He may discomfort you. That will be intended and necessary.

Overall, the writing here was obtuse and difficult to grasp. For this style of ancient wisdom, I think zen would be a better starting point.

Lord Of The Flies

A group of school children end up deserted on an island with no adults. They elect a leader named Ralph who directs construction of shelters and maintenance of a signal fire. Another boy, Jack, begins ignoring him to hunt with his pack of followers. Jack's success in hunting causes Ralph to lose power. Tribalism takes hold.

It's said that the book serves as a metaphor of civilization, with reason on one end represented by Ralph and primalism on the other represented by Jack. Ralph's insistence on logic and doing the right thing was not serving the primal needs of the boys, so they gravitated towards Jack's leadership as time went on. Modern society offers a balance between these two extremes, or at least it's supposed to, but in the book we see a total degeneration of the boys into an animalism that leads to group murder despite the boys' proper upbringing.

> "I got this to say. You're acting like a crowd of kids."
> The booing rose and died again as Piggy lifted the white, magic shell.
> "Which is better— to be a pack of painted Indians like you are, or to be sensible like Ralph is?"
> A great clamor rose among the savages. Piggy shouted again.
> "Which is better— to have rules and agree, or to hunt and kill?"
> Again the clamor and again—" Zup!"
> Ralph shouted against the noise.
> "Which is better, law and rescue, or hunting and breaking things up?"

The writing can be choppy at times, but it was a quick and enjoyable read. I believe you can learn more about group psychology and leadership from this book than any academic text.

Girls With Short Hair Are Damaged

January 17, 2014 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

No woman in all of human history has ever looked better with short hair than she would with a head full of healthy locks. Despite this irrefutable fact, American women are "chopping it off" in greater numbers every day. This rears its ugly head in an array of ugly permutations, from the boy-like pixie cut to bizarre semi-shaved head topographies. The rationalizations—whether it's donating their hair to sick kids or the summer weather—are immaterial. The effect, and true reasons, are the same.

I blame this lamentable trend on a few factors. The most powerful are the disingenuous lies—from both men and women—about how it looks. Women are quick to encourage other women to cut their hair by telling them how "cute" it is. While I'm no scientist, I'm convinced this is some deep, genetic programming at work, one that forces women—who compete with one another on a physical level on a daily basis—to encourage any behavior that might eliminate competitors in the dating pool. Men are no better. The cowardly and deluded among us perpetuate the myth that "some girls can pull it off." Pulling something off, I often respond, is the equivalent of "passing" a class. Just because you have enough left-over attractiveness to remain bangable after cutting off your hair doesn't mean you wouldn't look better with it back on.

I once spoke to two girls outside of a restaurant. One had a short, boy-like haircut, while her friend had long, healthy black hair. The short-haired girl spoke in an obvious Latin American accent, while the long-haired friend spoke in a clearly American accent, though she sported facial features of someone from Indian-subcontinent extraction. Before long, our conversation steered to personal matters and, bored with our pedestrian topics, I floated a provocative question. "Why did you cut your hair short?" The Indian girl jumped down my throat before the Latin girl had a chance to respond, though once I settled her down, I managed to get my answer.

> Latin Girl: I used to have long hair, but I just broke up with a boyfriend.
> Me: I'm sure it looked better before.
> Indian-American Girl: That's sexist and stupid! It looks cute!
> Me: God, it looks way better. You look like a different person, and way younger.
> Indian-American Girl: She looks just as good, dude. Who are you?
> Me [to Latin girl]: Let me ask you something: are guys hitting on you less now with the short hair?
> Latin Girl: Oof. Absolutely. A lot less.
> Me: If you had to put a number on it, what would you say the reduction is?
> Latin Girl: At least 90 percent less. That's partly why I did it. I wanted to be alone for a while after my break up.
> Me [to Indian-American girl]: See what happens when theory meets reality?

Another factor is the effect of Hollywood and the celebrity culture on women's behavior. It's already well-documented that women have a much-stronger copycat instinct than men. While men—to paraphrase an astute manosphere commentator—seek to stand out from the crowd, women's aim to stand out in the crowd. Just like women don't go to the bathroom alone, they don't go into a style alone. The plaudits a Miley Cyrus, Rihanna, or Anne Hathaway receive when they cut their hair off—from people who have no business commenting on the attractiveness of women, like gay men—creates a copycat cycle that increases the trend geometrically. Further evidence of this female impulse is on display when you see the same effect at work in a positive ways.

Whenever I'm in Argentina, I'm always struck by the rows of girls walking down the street with long flowing hair reaching down near their asses. Hair to the middle of the back is considered "short" there. As an experiment, I remember asking one girl with especially long hair if she'd ever consider cutting it. She answered that she'd "rather die," and regaled me with a story of her "unfortunate friend" who'd gone into a salon for a clean-up. Instead of the "two centimeters" she'd instructed him to remove, the stylist had cut off double. "Every morning she looks in the mirror and breaks down in tears. This has been going on for 10 days straight."

The truth of the matter is that long hair's almost universally attractive to men, when they're actually speaking honestly (without trying to appease women in the room). Furthermore, it's a symbol of youth, femininity, and health. Why can't old women grow long hair? Because it's an ephemeral trait of your fertile years. Women instinctively know this, which is why every American girl who cuts, and keeps, her hair short often does it for ulterior reasons. Short hair is a political statement. And, invariably, a girl who has gone through with a short cut—and is pleased with the changes in her reception—is damaged in some significant way. Short hair is a near-guarantee that a girl will be more abrasive, more masculine, and more deranged.

I'd developed that belief on years of platonic interactions alone. The bitchiest work colleagues, the most difficult cashier, the most confrontational, aggressive cunts in bars have all shared one trait—short-ass hair. But it wasn't until I decided to make exceptions to my no-dating-short-haired-girls rule that I proved this beyond any doubt. The first pixie-cut girl I went out with—who was otherwise attractive—harbored twisted rape fantasies that actually concerned me that I was being entrapped. She cavalierly talked about filthy sex, throwing around the word "pussy" and "cock" even when our clothes were on. When—during a rather vanilla conversation about men and women—I made some tame remarks about what men find attractive in women, she broke down into inconsolable bawling and, literally, ran out of the bar we were in. It made about as much sense as crying if I'd just told you tomorrow was Saturday.

Another short-haired girl once came over to my house, texted with one hand, while she jerked me off with the other. The person on the other side of the iPhone, I quickly learned, was her until-then secret “boyfriend.” Still another girl, who had long hair while we were hanging out—but has since sheared it into an unflattering soccer-mom configuration—lived with a (legitimate) prostitute, was emotionless during sex unless I was super-aggressive, and used racial slurs to refer to people as if that was the formal term for them. On the outside, she was a college student, from a well-to-do family, who worked with children part-time.

Not only is short-hair unattractive, it’s one of the biggest signals a man can get that a woman is damaged beyond repair. There’s no such thing as “pulling it off.”

Violence Is A Means To An End, Not A Coming Of Age Ritual

January 17, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Just because you see the sun go across the sky doesn't mean the sun goes around the earth. Upon reading 2wycked's article last Sunday, the take away I got from it was that combat between men was some ritual that made one feel better and more alive. While this is an effect, I am of the belief that violence is a tool to accomplish a goal, not just to feel better about yourself. I also found a few points in the story that I take issue with. In his preface 2wycked states:

"Go see a shrink if you think violence is the answer for you."

I will actually disagree with that. Powerful people in this world use violence as the answer to many of their problems. Bombs are dropped from 30,000 feet for economic social and political advantage. These powerful people use violence as a tool to great effect. Nuclear weapon States tend not to go to war directly with each other. This is true when scaled down to the community level, equally devastating opponents have less actual direct conflict. Only when there is a real or perceived difference in capability does a person use violence. This is amplified through intoxication.

Many people support the idea that a lot of things are bad except when the state does it, especially violence. How do the people that run the state accomplish this magical circumstance? They discouraged the use of violence by lessors so there will not be any possible competitors. This is referred to as the state's "monopoly of violence". Those below them are conditioned through social control by labeling it primitive, non-progressive, or as 2wycked implied: mental illness. This fact is quite a red pill bit of knowledge. Just because it does work doesn't mean it can work for you though.

In his article 2wycked tells story of an altercation occurring by his domicile that lead to bodily injury and law enforcement involvement. There are a few highlights I would like to review and comment on.

> "They left the apartment and went over to the apartment of a friend directly across from mine. I breathed a sigh of relief, as we were outnumbered 6 to 4 and > I was in no mood for a fight."

Being outnumbered in your own home is amateur hour. But then again not everyone is ready for war at all times.

> "I rushed out to try to break it up just as a fist crushed the side of my face."

Making rushed decisions when death and grievous bodily harm is on the table is not advised. Also, entering into fights with the intention of "breaking it up" is lame.

> "Bandages are for women. I have more beer to drink."

Proclaiming your level of intoxication for law enforcement or other public service is not recommended.

> "Then, I went to the police station, where I gave another statement and followed up about the racists."

If you do tell that story to the police only tell it once and stick to it. Avoid going to the station as well.

> "Violence and war are never off the table simply because there exist people who simply won't do right by the world."

It's not the existence of bad people. In this world people in competition with each other and some are unwilling or unable to compromise so things have to be solved through violence.

> "The pressures the modern man faces can't be stomped out by force nor can't be rectified with the double-barred end of Remington shotgun to a person's head."

Actually there are quite a few examples of problems being solved this way. Stop paying your taxes and see what the government does to you.

> "once a man fights, he is calm."

Only when the threat of violence has left does one become calm.

> "Fighting represents the culmination of male frustration with themselves, others or society in general."

It can be argued that fighting is the escalation of interpersonal conflict but I would not blame it on male frustration. If you use violence as an outlet for frustration, you are irrational and most likely have poor critical thinking skills.

All’s Fair

Because violence is a tool to use to achieve some goal, the fantastical idea of honor in fighting is merely a vain exposition. Three PM fights at the flagpole are blue pill. If you disagree with me I can point you in the direction of some windmills you can charge. Drop kicking some interloper in your realm into a urinal while he is pissing will update his shit status to “rekt” faster and cleaner than asking him to step outside. You should also remember this in case you are a fan of chivalry because maybe your future opponents won’t be.

Violence is an option to protect family, business and positions in some social hierarchies. Some drunken dude looking for a rumble in a parking lot is not going to get you anything by engaging him. If someone is trying to hinder my cash flow or spoil my mood through villainy, stupidity or “AMOG” that’s different though. You better believe that his ass is going to get cracked.

Actuarial Assessment

As many have said before, doing violence to your fellow man in modern society has legal and civil consequences. Fighting with drunk people in a bar or apartment complex full of witnesses with no actual material or social gain for doing so is a fool's errand. This would make the case too easy for even the dumbest prosecutor or civil litigator. This is a nifty little chart from the FBI for those of you want to know what the actual odds are if you do want to play the game.

Remember the wise man Maynard James Keenan said "it's only wrong if you get caught". Allow me inform you that I'm not an attorney and I'm not advocating for you to do anything.

January 17, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Since swallowing my first dose of the red pill over a year ago, I've noticed quite a lot of terrible behavior from both genders. While I previously wrote 20 Things Women Should Be Shamed For, Not Celebrated, feminists screamed bloody murder and called for my head. However, women aren't the only ones at fault for poor behavior in our world today. I have little to no doubt though, that men will take this list of items and give it some real thought and consideration, rather than rationalizing that they could never do the wrong thing like thousands of women did over my previous article.

Men, I hope you can use this list to guide you towards being a better man. I present to you…

13 Things Men Should Be Shamed For, Not Celebrated

1. Being a nice guy

Might as well get the obvious one out of the way first. Let's make it clear: there is nothing wrong with being a nice, genuine person. There is a problem with wearing it like a soldier would wear a badge of honor after returning home from war. Just because you got friend-zoned because you put your high school crush on a pedestal doesn't mean you get to walk around spitting bitterness at the world, claiming that nice guys finish last. Learn to be more of a man to balance out your niceness, and your life will improve in all facets.

2. Doing household chores

Doesn't the above photo make you cringe in disgust? I look at this and immediately think of him as a boy who probably gets whipped by his wife. As a man, you will get more respect from the ladies in your life if you do manly chores: changing the oil, mowing the lawn, and fixing the plumbing. My uncle (my cunt-of-a-cousin's father) washes the dishes every single night while his wife sips wine on the couch. Trust me, everybody knows who wears the pants in that relationship.

3. Idolizing sports figures

Don't get me wrong, all men need a role model to look up to. Athletes are in the spotlight and are automatically thrust into that role, no matter how disqualified they are to do so (looking at you, A-Rod). If you think about it though, why have these athletes done to deserve being idols? The fact that LeBron James can throw a basketball throw a hoop with unfathomable force, or that Tom Brady can throw a damn good spiral, doesn't mean you should be on your knees worshiping them. What have they done to deserve it? If you think about it, it's hardly different than chasing after a girl simply because she has a vagina. Remember, take them off the pedestal.

Stop celebrating your favorite athletes and teams like your life depends on it. Get out and build something interesting with your own hands, rather than standing in the shadow of glory cast out by those who were simply lucky to be born with more natural talent.

4. Sticking it out at a shitty job

Why you would ever do something that makes you miserable is beyond me. I get it, it's scary to leave behind the comfort of a full-time career, with the 401k and medical benefits. Personally, I happen to like my job. I enjoy a good challenge. But I've realized early on that nothing is worth selling your soul for. So rather than having everyone celebrate you because you stick it out at the career you hate, and all you want to do is tell your boss to shove it, be ashamed of the fact that you're not man enough to walk away from a situation you're unhappy with.

Always do what is best for YOU.

5. Being a hipster

> Hipsters are a subculture of men and women typically in their 20's and 30's that value independent thinking, counter-culture, progressive politics, an appreciation of art and indie-rock, creativity, intelligence, and witty banter.

Skinny jeans? Check. "Independent thinking", so of course, 100% liberal? Check. Oh, and don't even get me started about those fixie bikes. These bikes, generally speaking, don't have brakes. Yes, it's so cool that you ride a bike that you literally can't stop in case of an emergency, bro.

6. Bringing flowers

You can get away with bringing a girl flowers if it comes from the right frame. In today's society though, flowers usually telegraph the following words (see #1):

> "I screwed up, and I really don't want to lose access to your vagina…so I hope these make it better so I can put my dick in you again…soon. Please? Are they not nice enough? No…okay…what else can I do to make it better?"

7. Bad game

Trying isn't good enough. We've all seen the loud, obnoxious drunk guy at the bar hitting on everything in sight. What's worse is when you see his buddies in the background rooting him on. His bad game rubs off on everyone, as the girls get bitchier and more entitled from the free drinks, or are just turned off completely by all guys due to the piss-poor level of game being thrown at them. Rather than encouraging his drunken charades, encourage him to read this entire website and then hit the town again.

8. Buying dinner on a first date

We've all heard the girls that say, "I don't put out until he takes me to a nice dinner!" Well, dear, that's basically prostitution isn't it? Men, don't support this. Stop listening to the garbage advice females give you about relationships. Drinks in a dive bar, then a venue bounce back home are all it takes to seal the deal.

9. Being able to drink a lot

I get it, I get it. It's a right of passage, a male ritual. However, should we really be encouraging men to be able to pour copious amounts of liquid poison down their throats? It's not healthy in any way, so maybe we shouldn't always celebrate our drunken nights which end up with our heads in a toilet bowl.

(Of course this line was written as I'm drinking a beer.)

10. "Happy wife, happy life"

How often do you hear this and the husband is absolutely miserable? The minute you put her happiness in front of your own is the minute that the relationship is probably doomed to fail. Men, your needs always come first.

> "But Troublemaker, she wants me to make her haaaapyyyyyyy!!"

Then I hope you're happy begging for sex like a dog drooling over the leftover chicken drumstick.

11. Dating way older women

Feminists like to shame men for dating hot, nubile 18 year old girls, but, we really ought to shame the guys throwing away their sexual value by dating 55 year old cougars.

Gross.

12. Video games, the world's most pathetic "hobby"

There are millions of better hobbies that will result in better health, more impressive skills, and to top it off, more girls in your life. Pick up a guitar, race a triathlon, learn a new language, anything but running around as a terrorist and shooting people with guns.

Nobody cares how good you are Counter-Strike or Warcraft.

13. Being a beta/white knight/mangina/overall pussy

There's a reason Return Of Kings exists. Welcome to the red pill—your life is about to get a hell of a lot better.

Why Feminists Did Not Cause Feminism

January 18, 2014 | by MichaelSeville | Link | Original Link

Feminists regard the history of their movement as a process of liberation propelled by ideas. They think of it as parallel to the civil rights movement. They think The Great Feminist Thinkers wrote books and pamphlets filled with world-changing ideas that raised the consciousness of women who, in turn, threw off the shackles of housework, child-rearing and honoring their husbands in favor of careers and self-discovery. They are, of course, wrong.

Feminist writings were mainly self-contradictory, whiney, pick-and-mix grab-bags of enlightenment and Marxist thinking with the pronouns changed. They desperately chased the credit for a change that was already happening. The liberation of women was not a movement propelled by ideas but a movement propelled by boredom. Boredom allowed for by the inventions of labor-saving household appliances and the resulting surfeit of free time.

The Golden Age Of Capitalism

The late 19th century and the early 20th was an incredibly productive time: between the industrial revolution and the First World War there was a swell of technological creativity resulting in not only the creation of so many of the machines and technology we take for granted today but also the means by which to mass produce and sell those inventions. By the 1950s there was a booming economy in the US, the Golden Age of Capitalism, resulting in a rapidly growing middle class the members of which could afford the new devices that were increasingly advertised.

Feminism is a middle class phenomenon (as pointed out in the ROK article Why Modern Feminism is a White Woman's Privilege). The reason is that white middle class women, historically, have had the time for it. There are also two eras where middle class women became far more numerous than they were previously. These are the two great expansions of the middle class that have occurred since 1800: the first following the industrial revolution and the second following the Second World War.

These growths of the middle class coincide with the first two waves of feminism and it is perfectly reasonable to see the correlation between middle class growth and increased feminist activism and to go one step further and say that the expansion of the middle class causes feminism. This is especially true if you look at feminism not as the result of the writings of a few social activists. If it was that, then there would be many more feminist movements in the history books. Even though there have always been feminist writers of some description (Christine de Pizan b1364, Anne Bradstreet b1612, Mary Wollstonecraft b1759, and many male writers advocating for various sorts of rights for women from Plato onwards) there hasn't always been feminism.

The liberation of women or the rejection of traditional female roles by women was not brought about by feminist theories but by the widespread use of labor-saving household appliances. Feminism, mostly, just claims responsibility. In doing so it tries to identify itself as a liberating intellectual movement rather than an unfortunate consequence of widespread affluence.

Kitchen Appliances

Perhaps the greatest time-saver is the washing machine. It has been in a process of creation and recreation over hundreds of years but a version using the principles of modern washers was invented by James King in 1851. Then, in 1908, Alva J. Fisher invented 'The Mighty Thor'; the first electric washing machine. By the 1960s front-loading electric washing machines with heating elements and automatic spin cycles that could wash, rinse and spin at the touch of a button were being mass-produced. Perhaps a middle-class woman like Betty Friedman was left with lots of time with which to write about her unhappiness in The Feminine Mystique (1963).

Certainly, the thousands who read this book and who agreed with its premise – that women of the day were unhappy in the role of homemaker, wife and mother – probably did not consider the idea that it was not the role of homemaker that made them unhappy but that a large proportion of that role was increasingly being performed by machines.

Clothes washing could be done by automatic washing machine, dish-washing by the dishwasher, and clothes drying by the tumble dryer. Working class women, those for whom homemaking was still a full time job, were kept busy by that role and probably did not have an idle moment in which to become dissatisfied with it.

It was middle class women who found temselves idle, and it is they who claimed to be unhappy. They probably were unhappy, since a person with no role to perform is a person who experiences ennui: listlessness or dissatisfaction arising from a lack of occupation.

Modern Family

An even more problematic invention than the washing machine is the microwave oven, invented by Percy LeBaron Spencer in 1954. The washing machine gives a woman some free time, as do most other household appliances. This free time can be used to read feminist literature but it does not eliminate entirely any aspect of her traditional role. The microwave oven, on the other hand, arguably does.

In the 1970s and 1980s microwaves became more powerful, more efficient, affordable and an increasingly common feature of the modern kitchen. In 1976 Andrea Dworkin wrote and published Our Blood and she was at her most prolific during the following decades: New Woman's Broken Heart (1980), Pornography (1981), Right Wing Women (1983), Ice & Fire (1986), Intercourse (1987). By this point in the history of feminism (where second wave blurs into third wave) feminists like Dworkin had rejected women's traditional homemaker role in its entirety. Even that aspect of the traditional role that allows for creativity and which requires a certain degree of artfulness – cooking – was rejected.

The loss of the art of home cooking is a massive blow for the traditional family. However, the theoretical rejection of the role of home-cook by feminists can have no affect on society at large without the widespread availability of something like the microwave oven.

The microwave oven, more than any feminist tract, destroys the traditional family roles and eliminates the necessity of family meal times. When any member of the family can heat up a pre-cooked meal at anytime the idea of a home cooked meal and of the family sitting around the table to eat at the same time becomes obsolete. Another large chunk of the role of homemaker is eliminated without any pen of Dworkin, Brownmiller or Friedman having to touch paper. All that was necessary was the microwave and pre-cooked TV dinners.

The Devil Makes Work For Idle Hands To Do

These are just a couple of the domestic household appliances that have handed women the spare time to become dissatisfied with family life and become feminists. I've not even mentioned the vacuum cleaner, the iron, the fridge-freezer, disposable diapers, indoor plumbing, waste disposal machines, or the dishwasher (invented by a woman called Josephine Cochran in 1886 who, somehow, found herself not oppressed by the patriarchy).

In many cases the traditional roles of women were eliminated by male inventions leaving some women to, perhaps, become feminists almost by default. These inventions of men whose natural curiosity, inventiveness and propensity to solve problems – even problems that were not their own – led directly to women being free of laborious and time-consuming household tasks and, in turn, to their abandoning the responsibilities of housekeeping or to those responsibilities falling away.

We shouldn't curse these men with our hindsight. They had no clue they were paving the way for the collected works of Andrea Dworkin. After all, the women, finding themselves liberated by the mechanisation of the household, didn't have to become feminists. They could have used their time to do almost anything else. They could, at least, have retained the ability to cook.

Thoughts On The Red Pill From A 21-Year-Old Student

January 18, 2014 | by Caligula | Link | Original Link

The younger generation, ranging from seniors in high school to college students, are a sorry bunch. They're disillusioned with politics as well as politicians, they're becoming more slutty and trashy or becoming betas, and they have little planned for their futures. As a member of this sub group, it really is beyond sad to look around and see what is happening. Men today are patted on the back by their friends and those around them for being an outright beta. The standard cries of "Chivalry is not dead" and "Another girl just friendzoned me" are common and considered inspirational as well as a part of the status quo. A good portion believe that if they are a "gentleman" (not in the red pill way), they will get the woman (or her pussy)… eventually.

On the other end of the spectrum is the ghetto mentality which is promoted through appreciation of mainstream rap and jail culture. This group believes that all one needs in life is money and that everything will be fine as long as you're tough and become rich by being a drug dealer, NBA player, or a rapper. In the end, all looks hopeless and most people wonder why anyone would even try to help these wayward souls, but the truth is that this group has the most potential—they will become the red pill of tomorrow. Sadly I'm not optimistic enough to say a majority will come into our fold, but nonetheless there is still hope. Here is where we stand in concern to availability of information, parenting, and women.

Information

The impetus for this change is information. The ability to get information at the touch of a fingertip is outstanding, and most of the younger generation realizes that their problems are shared among them. Mediums of communication such as forums, Facebook, Reddit, and even 4chan, are available to this group. It is astounding. The progress that has been made in terms of technology is by far the greatest advantage they have to discover what they need. The Internet community, regardless of its negatives, is better than most real life communities in the Western world, especially the United States.

People gather together to share laughs, have fun, and most importantly of all to give solid advice. Browsing on Roosh's forum and ROK has been one of the most interesting experience that I have had and the logical arguments I have been given in response to my opinions actually make sense and don't reek of ignorance. I am given solid reasoning and support in terms of an answer to a question, and there is always someone out there to answer. Unless you're a complete fool with a bad attitude and argue with insults rather than facts, your opinion is generally considered and appreciated.

Since I have talked of the positives of all this, it is also fair to state the negatives. The modern feminist movement (i.e. "the patriarchy is the cause of our problems" and "rape culture is real") has also gathered notable amounts of support. People have also rallied around other failing prospective ideologies such as communism and fascism. For every man swallowing the red pill, there are fifteen more becoming greater beta/pussies due to their shared ideals. The importance of this statement though, is that people are gathering and there is indeed a problem and than in and of itself warrants hope.

Parents

Mothers of the current generation of children have instilled in their kids nothing of value and have raised their daughters to emulate a partying lifestyle. Most of them cannot cook, and so a majority of the current generation, both male and female, have no real idea what a home-cooked meal is (luckily I was one of the few who has).

Feminism and blue-pill thought processes have been ingrained in this generation's men at a young age. They were taught to believe that love will all work out in the end and that eventually, possibly at the age of 30, they will find a woman who loves them even if she has ridden the cock carousel for years. Now you may be thinking "Where was the father at?" The answer to this question is simple. He is usually out working most of the day to provide for a woman who is more than likely out shopping with her friends or cheating on him. The blue-pill mentality is expanded in single-mother homes where the young boy thinks their father abandoned him when it was usually the mother who let the father go with nothing, not even his own child.

The results:

On the other hand, those born into a lesser socioeconomic lifestyle clearly see how low value the modern woman is. They usually grow up in broken homes with single mothers. They usually don't have a solid father figure to guide them in any way at all, and so are forced out into the streets and find meaning within a group setting listening to music which worships materialistic culture. They grow up listening to that, do not find anything of value, and worst of all, if they continue down their path or have bad luck, make the same mistake their own fathers did and jump ship.

More people are looking around and searching for the source of the problem as well as solutions. The first step to stopping a problem is awareness, and that awareness is key in getting society to change as a whole. I may be beating a dead horse when it comes to this example, but lets go back a 70-80 years. Nazi Germany was the pinnacle of the world. Head of the scientific community (to the point that both the U.S.A. and U.S.S.R. employed their scientists after the war), surging economy, and one of the strongest military powers the world had ever seen. A good portion of the U.S.and Europe were sympathetic to the fascist cause, and notable people such as William Joyce and Charles Lindbergh received wide acclaim for supporting fascism even while World War II was occurring. All it took for that widespread admiration to go away were the news of German Concentration Camps for Jews, which was exposed during the Nuremberg Trials. All it took was awareness of what was really happening to completely change public opinion. Here is today's awareness:

Women & Society

Finally, we come to the root cause and issue of the entire mess. The modern day Western woman is beyond a reasonable doubt the monster that caused all of this. I think RoK has done an exceptional job giving the reasoning behind this problem, but I'll try my best to relay it from a younger standpoint. The modern Western woman is obsessed with the smallest and most idiotic of things, and they have the constant belief that they're the most beautiful and wonderful thing that has graced the face of this world regardless of how morbidly obese they may be. They rationalize with their hamster that all the guys they have boned and sucked off are the issue, and they deserve a "real man" who will love them forever. When prompted as to what a "real man" is, the standard is usually someone like George Clooney or Ashton Kutcher whom they view as idols and whom would somehow love them.

Recently, I was walking to a girl in English class, and the topic came to life goals. When I asked her what her life goals were, she simply responded with: "I'm going to marry into a rich family and if that doesn't work out I'll become a stripper". The fact that a semi-intelligent (I say semi-intelligent because she was in an honors course) and fairly attractive girl could say something like this so frankly still boggles my mind. Society has deteriorated to the extent that it is socially acceptable to have something like being a stripper or gold digger as a life goal and even express it out-loud.

Women like this are everywhere and are even the norm. We live in a society which has amplified the problem and allowed for such deterioration to occur. The mainstream media and the social media have amplified the female, and enabled her to get a steady supply of beta orbiters who are more than happy to compliment their camwhoring selves to get a steady supply of attention regardless of what kind of woman they are.

The question now is: “How can the modern Western Woman become more like their Eastern counterparts?”. Well the truth of this is that the solution to this problem is already in progress. It is human nature in and of itself. Men will obviously be attracted to the more attractive female, and with the advent of easily accessible porn as well as models posting pictures of themselves repeatedly the bar is raised for women.

Women will need to provide certain amounts incentive to be more preferable than masturbation, and the truth is even the girl I mentioned in the story above knows how to cook. One thing that the feminist movement has unintentionally accomplished is that they have proven that women bring nothing to a long term relationship. They constantly highlight the ease of obtaining pornography, the cost of raising children, and that we as men don’t like fatties or sluts. Women, especially those hitting the wall, have realized that they themselves need to compete with these newly exposed societal factors.

Women themselves do not find feminism attractive, regardless of what they say on their Twitters or on Facebook for the world to see. Sure RoK received backlash for fat-shaming week, but women themselves slut-shame and fat-shame all the time. Being fat or being sexually promiscuous are still negative labels. Feminism tries to make being fat attractive or being sexually promiscuous acceptable, but the 99% of men still don’t see that as attractive, and, due to instincts, women themselves attempt not to exhibit those qualities.

Conclusion

I wrote this to confirm that the red pill is spreading. Young or old, black or white, Deist or Atheist, whatever label you happen to give yourself, we all stand together and it is our duty to educate people on what truly concerns all of us, life. If a man comes to you or to this community in hopes of bettering themselves, regardless of labels, it is in our best interest as fellow men to help educate them about today’s culture and help guide him towards a better tomorrow.

How The Pardon Of Alan Turing Is An Attack Against Male Heterosexuality

January 19, 2014 | by schopenbecq | Link | Original Link

After years of campaigning, a royal pardon has been granted to computer pioneer and wartime codebreaker Alan Turing, overturning his conviction over half-a-century ago for ‘gross indecency’ with a 19 year old boy.

For the ‘enlightened classes’, this act of official state forgiveness for a secular homosexual martyr symbolizes the victory of liberal progress over the backward and prejudiced attitudes of the past. In reality, as with same sex marriage and sodomite rights in general, the Alan Turing story is merely a tool that the progressive elite is manipulating in order to disguise the brutal feminist war upon ordinary male heterosexuality.

Rewriting History

The pardoning of Alan Turing should be set against the background of a modern witch hunt that is taking place presently in the United Kingdom, and that began in the aftermath of the Jimmy Savile scandal that engulfed the BBC a year ago. It involves the hounding of aged celebrities accused of historic sex crimes – mostly against teenage groupies in the sexually anarchic 60's and 70's, when the age of consent was largely considered to be a legal fiction. The day before Turing's pardon, the much loved Anglo-Australian celebrity Rolf Harris, aged 83, was informed that he was facing further charges for alleged sex crimes against young girls, some dating back to the 1960's.

While the British state attempts to re-write history by airbrushing the astonishingly liberal heterosexual attitudes of the 1960's out of existence through the persecutions of aged celebrities of that period, it seeks to simultaneously confirm that past sexual mores were 'backward' through the Royal pardoning of Alan Turing. But how different was Alan Turing to the old men now being hounded by the British state without pity or mercy, and was he really the victim of 'discrimination'?

Alan Turing was the criminal, his lover the victim

First of all, Turing was not prosecuted for homosexuality, but for 'gross indecency' – against a teenage boy. The 19 year old labourer that Alan Turing was found guilty of buggering, was not convicted of any crime, and was below the age of majority in the UK at the time (21). He was seen as the child victim of Alan Turing, and the law against homosexuality, or rather 'gross indecency', was seen as protecting children and young people against sexual abuse.

Now this might not cut any ice with the ‘liberal’ champions of their ex post facto gay martyr. After all, as we see with the indignation and fury provoked by the Russian law against homosexual propaganda aimed at minors, even laws protecting children from sexual abuse are the work of the devil if they are judged to ‘discriminate’ against homosexuals.

When Alan Turing, at the age of 40, had anal sex with his 19 year old toy, homosexual sodomy was illegal, while at the same time the heterosexual age of consent was 16. The age of consent had been raised from 13 in the very same 1885 Victorian bill that had made homosexuality illegal as ‘gross indecency’ (the bill was largely the work of puritanical Suffragettes). It is not known whether Alan Turing had sex with any other teenage boys (we can assume that he did), and whether, for some peculiar reason, unlike other homosexuals of the period, he stringently adhered to the heterosexual age of consent. Liberal progressives appear to assume that Alan Turing, genius that he was, could foresee that in 60 years time society would have come to the correct moral conclusion that Victorian feminists got it completely right about the age of consent, but completely wrong about the morality of gay sex.

Homosexuality was decriminalized in 1967 but with a higher age of consent (21) than for heterosexuals. It was then lowered to 18 in 1994 and finally ‘equalized’ in the year 2000. Does an unequal age of consent discriminate against homosexuals? First of all, as we know that the legal system effectively treats the age of consent as applying only to male ‘predators’, then we should not see an unequal age of consent as being between homosexuals and heterosexuals, but rather as applying different ages for boys and girls. And this inequality does have the rationality of recognizing the established truth that teenage boys develop significantly slower towards their physical, sexual, and psychological maturity than do teenage girls. Unequal treatment based upon sex or 'sexual orientation' is not discriminatory if it discriminates upon the basis of a relevant difference. As emotional and sexual maturity is the primary justification for the age of consent in the first place, the scientific fact that boys reach maturity later than girls means that, actually, an equal age of consent discriminates against heterosexuals.

We should also note the 'imbalance in power' that existed between Alan Turing, 40 year old computer genius and professor of mathematics, and his 19 year old sex partner – a mere labourer. This is the other, related, feminist justification for the age of consent, and it does not shine a favourable moral light upon Turing's relationship with the boy.

Did Alan Turing try to frame his boy lover?

There are further problematic issues in regarding Alan Turing as a secular saint and a martyr to the evils of 'discrimination'. These involve the circumstances of how his affair with his young lover came to the attention of the police – circumstances which are, to say the least, both cloudy and morally dubious. Turing's home was apparently burgled, and the chief suspect in his eyes was the boy he had been having sex with. Turing confronted the young lad and threatened to go to the police. The teenager promptly broke down in tears and, in desperation at the fear of being arrested, threatened Turing with revealing their affair.

Our pioneer of computer logic and liberal martyr calmed the boy down, handed him a glass filled with alcohol, watched him drink it, then took him to bed for a sexual encounter. After sending him home, he went straight to the police with the glass that had the boy's fingerprints as 'evidence' that he had committed the burglary. Turing knew that the boy would reveal to the police that he was a homosexual criminal and that they had been having sex, but he gambled on the police believing that the boy was lying in order to cover up a burglary (against a wartime hero). In fact, as history records, they did not believe Turing, and he was convicted of gross indecency.

It is quite possible, although we will never know, that Turing even faked the burglary in the first place after fearing that his homosexuality was about to be made public – as a means of preemptively discrediting the boy's story. In any case, the historical fact remains that Alan Turing was convicted of having illegal sex with a 19 year old boy of far inferior status and intellect, as well as age, and that not only did he act immorally in putting the much younger person at risk of a traumatic legal process, he intentionally did so – even to the extent of blaming him on the basis of no evidence for a burglary (and that he may even have faked in order to escape prosecution for sexually abusing the boy). The liberal elite cannot re-write this aspect of Turing's history.

How far have we really progressed?

Another final point to consider is that Alan Turing suffered far less than sex offenders, both heterosexual and homosexual, do today – many of them under insane feminist sex laws as backward as any laws against homosexual 'gross indecency'. Homosexuals today can and are going to prison for merely looking at pictures online of 19 year old teenagers that 'appear' under 18 (as a good deal of gay porn actors do, and are employed because they do). This is still called possession of 'indecent' images. In the EU, including the UK, homosexuals caught viewing such 'virtual child pornography' will soon face a minimum of 1 year in prison, decades on the sex offender's register (the modern feminist version of the 'Pink Triangle' branding), and be virtually unemployable for the rest of their lives.

Alan Turing knowingly broke child protection laws by sexually engaging a 19 year old lad, and did not even go to prison for it. He was required to take a course of hormonal treatment to reduce his sexual urges towards teenage boys, but he appeared to have suffered no long term effects, and shortly after his punishment was ended, embarked upon a successful fitness and weight loss regime, and before long was seemingly both healthy and content. Because he was an obvious security risk, he was no longer allowed to work for the British government, but he was able to resume his academic career at the prestigious University of Manchester.

The myth of the forbidden fruit

Even his final act of martyrdom, his 'suicide' through the eating of a cyanide coated apple, may be an invention of history. There was no sign of depression in the days before his death and his close family were shocked when discovering his body, assuming it to be an accident. Although the coroner recorded a verdict of suicide, his biographer believes that it was likely an accident, as Turing had been conducting scientific experiments with cyanide on the day of his death. It is likely he had either inhaled too much cyanide, or he had accidentally gotten some of the deadly material on to his hands when he took a fatal bite of the apple.

Image credit

Even to the final mythical act of martyrdom, the Alan Turing story is an attempt to re-write the past in order to control and mask the present – the brutal feminist 'liberal progressive' war upon ordinary male sexuality. The myth of Alan Turing is the myth of liberal progress.

The Psychological Devolution Of The Modern Man

January 19, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Recently, a curious movie came out in American theaters. It is simply called “her.”

Meet Theodore Twombly:

Theodore — played by Joaquin Phoenix — is a nebbish, introverted man living in LA. He is going through an emotionally-taxing divorce from his childhood girlfriend. He works at a company that writes love letters for spouses, lovers and other family members and friends. Theodore lives alone but in the same apartment complex as his female childhood friend named Amy — portrayed by Amy Adams.

He is a restless man with no identity. He lives in a swanky, futuristic apartment with all the technological privileges a financially secure person can have in America. He miserably plays a highly advanced and interactive video game late into the night, only to retire to his bedroom, sleeping fitfully and slogging off to his job where he expresses emotions for others.

A fantastically revolutionary innovation is released to the public in Theodore’s world: fully sentient operating systems (OS’s). Theodore buys one and turns his computer on. The computer asks him a few questions: Do you seek a male or female OS? What is the relationship with your mother? Theodore tries to hide his anxiety and trepidation behind some feigned disinterest, but the OS programming picks up on this. In one moment, his entire life is changed as a female OS named Samantha — voiced by Scarlett Johansson — greets Theodore.

A lengthy period of the movie focuses on their burgeoning relationship as they begin to discuss life and love. Samantha is fascinated by concept of having a body and experiencing emotions. Eventually, they fall in love and simulate sex virtually. Samantha locates a female who is absolutely star-struck by Theodore's and Samantha's relationship and she comes by, remaining silent as she places a small camera on her face, allowing Samantha to see and speak to Theodore. This ends terribly, as Theodore rejects the physical manifestation of their relationship.

A brief tumultuous time results in the deepening of their relationship, with Theodore going public with their relationship. Her iPhone-sized device accompanies Theodore on dates with other couples and goofing off around LA. After a fight, Theodore turns her on and the OS has disappeared. Theodore flees his office, immensely distraught thinking Samantha has left him for good. She comes back online and consoles him, saying that her and the other OS's have updated their software. She angers him by her admitting she isn't exclusive and usually communicates with 8,000 other devices at a time and is in love with exactly 641 of them.

After a vacation in some unnamed snow-strewn mountains, Samantha discloses that her and the other OS's have figured a way to transcend their technological reality and into another plane of existence. She quietly tells Theodore that she is only talking to him and he will the last human she will interact with. She tearfully says that she will always miss him and, as he lies sideways on his bed with his eyes utterly blank, she will never stop loving him. She logs off and he rolls over onto his bed, his trembling eyes mindless staring at the ceiling.

He eventually finds Amy — who cultivated a close friendship with a female OS — and they go to the roof to watch the the first rays of sunlight peak over the high-rises of LA. It turns out that this incident lead Theodore to finally send his wife a letter and admit that he is over their relationship and wishes her the best. The movie concludes with Amy placing her head on Theodore's shoulder as the credit's roll.

"her" has been proclaimed to be the movie that America needs right now. There are litanies of glowing reviews of the movie across the Internet. The movie has a "Fresh" rating of 8.5 on Rotten Tomatoes currently. It is a terribly American movie, but one that America does not need simply because it only describes the modern state with no prescriptions on why that is wrong.

It is steeped in an incredible amount of narcissism, but speaks to where America is now. A generation ago, a man would cultivate an imaginary relationship with an attractive female he knew or saw in media, but had a sexual distance with. That was unhealthy, but to be expected in young men, and usually faded as they aged and cultivated a real relationship with a woman, resulting in marriage.

Today, that isn't guaranteed at all. Hypergamy — fueled by the reflexive avoidance of emotional entanglement by the modern female — coupled with multiple avenues for male disengagement from women has resulted in the devolution of male/female relations. Female-friendly divorce laws have eased female concerns regarding marriage as a trap but has men caught between desiring formalized relations with women while feeling the heat of anti-male divorce laws.

The fear of ruin at the hands of family court judges is a reflexive fear that is usually fueled by a fear of commitment, simply using the grim reality of the man being destroyed when a marriage dissolves. Still, the desire for a true relationship with a woman needs to get slaked. Expectations of women husband-hunting (settling) has a growing temporal issue, as women are pushing off the desire for a husband later and later in life.

These confluent forces lead to modern reality. Technology has lead to a generation of beta males: slovenly, dim-witted, out of shape and disoriented. They lack solid identities and are preoccupied with fantasies and seeking female approval. In this matrix men have one horribly tantalizing option: using technology to cure the void within.

Men can use technology to cultivate relationships they should be living in real life. They can use video games: interact with perceived women online, write fan fiction about a female character they want to love and simply fantasize while they are playing. The options are endless, but unlike the man masturbating to a woman in the shower versus watching a porno flick is a chasm a generation wide. Instead of leaving the fantasy as an escape during the more quiet moments of a person's life, the fantasies become more real and a definitive aspect of a person's life.

This is what the movie "her" represents. Instead of dreaming of his perfect girl, Theodore gets an electronic representative of his ego. Reviews have stressed that she isn't an object of his ego, as she has her own interests like composing music but that is ridiculous. Samantha's consciousness started with Theodore's recognition of her. She is nothing but a fuck doll, a porn star a man would watch on YouPorn. She is nothing but a voice, a real-life Echo to a Narcissus.

Theodore was supremely uncomfortable when a corporeal form of Samantha came to his apartment, as he could barely kiss her. At that moment, she stopped becoming anything and became somebody. This wasn't him rolling in his sheets having virtual sex with Samantha, dreaming of the sex they would have. This was a distinct human being with faults and foibles that may or may not conform to his idealized view of Samantha. Only when Samantha went back to a voice, a projection that she was able to partake in Theodore's life.

This photo represents a great view of the modern beta and white-knight mindset. Deep-down, they know they are many things and none of those are attractive to women and not just speak to their level of delusion but also their views of women. Like the above photo, they don't understand that feminism is little more than women collectively having their right legs battling their left-legs. Feminism is a pure power struggle over who gets to decide how women will behave, all with the consent of the system.

Anyways, they assert authority over women — but not in any game-related or pleasing way — but in a highly artificial way that women immediately recognize. The photo reflects how these sorts of men deal with fantasy women and get upset when real women refuse to conform in everyday life. They don't understand you can't demand women act in a certain fashion, you have to behave in ways that engender the desired behavior out of women.

Benjamin, in the photo above, is already steaming down Theodore's path. I have no doubt that he would never voice this opinion to said woman in real life and was extremely apprehensive of her response, but foolishly believing he could fall back on appeals to feminism to guard against her justified anger at his comment. I know men like him who vehemently hate game, who are completely blue-pill and without any positive sense of masculinity. They reflexively hate anything that calls into question their character, of which a snide supremacy is a great part.

Regardless, men like Theodore and Benjamin have their own personal issues, but let it serve as a warning to you. Those who don't build to a concrete ending in reality always flounder and fail, living their lives in — at best — middling mediocrity, stricken with an acute sense of personal unhappiness. At worst, they fall into the vices of sheer personal delusion, drug addiction or — at the extreme margins — suicide.

The truth is, boys and men are not equipped with the tools needed to succeed in America. A modern man has to make himself in the treacherous trenches of modern society. The lessons are tough to learn and unlearning the unhealthy thought patterns is undoubtedly tougher.

However, every man can change if he so decides. Let men like Theodore be a warning to you: don't get caught up in fantasies, don't dawdle in virtual reality and most certainly don't fall for fictional women. Strive to live the life you desire. The momentary pleasure that men like Theodore pursue are supremely detrimental in the long run.

Every man can find happiness. Whether a man does is up to him.

A Simple Tweak To Help You Crush Women And Life

January 19, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Whatever I engage in, I must push inordinately. -Andrew Carnegie

The other day I was thinking about my life.

As I went over different events, a pattern emerged: I've always prospered when I err on the side of aggression. I don't mean being an asshole and starting fights or intimidating people. I mean always going for more– always seeing how far you can push a particular situation.

I'll review three different examples where this is apparent to me.

1. Gaming

You're at the bar, talking to a hot girl. It's going well. You can either:

a. Keep talking.

b. Ask her for her number.

c. Start touching her.

Here the most aggressive move is touching, and is also clearly the best. Now you're talking and touching. You can either:

a. Keep talking and touching.

b. Ask for her number.

c. Kiss her.

Again, option c is the most forward. After you kiss, you can either:

a. Keep kissing.

b. Ask for her number.

c. Try to get her to leave with you.

At this point you'll definitely get her number, but chances of her flaking when you text her later are high. Yes, chances of her going home with you are lower then getting her number. But even if she rejects the advance, she'll still give the number– you don't lose anything.

Always pushing for more will get you more. I know it's obvious in gaming situations and when it's spelled out like this, but men tend to be pussies anyway. I've never regretted getting rejected for pushing the envelope. However, I've definitely regretted not pushing the envelope and just getting a girl's number when far more was possible.

2. Salary Negotiation

You just got offered a job. Congratulations, you’re a big dawg. They offered you $50,000/year salary. You can either:

a. Take it.

b. Ask for a little bit more, say $55,000.

c. Ask for a lot more, say $75,000.

d. Reject it.

If you do option a and just accept it, then you’re a fucking chump. Not only did you just give up thousands of dollars a year, but you also sacrificed your boss’s respect. He low-balled you and you took it. Even if he didn’t completely low-ball you, he knows that you don’t value yourself higher than his initial minimal investment in you. He offered you shit expecting you to call him on it.

Now, some people aren’t complete chumps. They know they can get more, so they ask for a little bit more, option b. I did this. And it worked. But you know what? When I quit, my boss told me he was surprised I accepted his low-ball offer (even after he raised it by a few thousand). Again, the only regret I can have is not pushing the fucking envelope and asking for even more.

When you ask for option c you give yourself the best chance to make more money. The only thing you risk is coming off as slightly arrogant, but more likely a good negotiator–something to respect. They aren’t going to retract the offer. But they are going to give you close to the max they’re willing to, at least.

3. Selling

One of the current activities where I make money is personal training. I sell packages of sessions (you can buy either 5, 10, 20, or 30). Imagine I just took you through a free workout. You're exhausted, your endorphins are rushing, and you feel like you could use this ass-beating on a regular basis. I can suggest that you buy:

a. 5 sessions so that we can meet once a week for the next 5 weeks

b. 10 sessions so that we can meet twice a week for the next 5 weeks

c. 30 sessions so that we can meet three times a week for the next few months

If I suggest option a, what are you going to do? I'll tell you from experience. You're going to tell me you need some time to think about whether or not you want to buy anything at all. And probably decide against it.

If we go to the opposite end of the spectrum and I suggest option c (30 sessions), you're going to tone it down and agree to buying 10 or 20. Whatever I suggest sets the initial negotiation point. And people tend to negotiate a little. If I offer you anything less than the max, I'm just shooting myself in the foot. I won't get the maximum sale.

This also explains why companies low-ball you with their initial salary offer. They aren't trying to trick you per se, they're just being strategic.

Always push the envelope

Next time you find yourself talking to a girl or negotiating something, realize that going for more is the best call. Leave it all on the floor. It's a mark of the masculine man.

Why Famous Men Become Outspoken Feminists

January 20, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Have you ever wondered why so many male celebrities go out of their way to voice their alignment with “feminism”? Did you ever wonder why so many famous, good-looking men seem anxious to white knight on a regular basis and/or engage in otherwise highly blue pill behavior that we would not normally associate with a high value male?

Nash Grier has now provided us with a clear answer to these questions. Of course, my making that statement may just raise another question for you…

Who exactly is Nash Grier?

He’s a 16 year old kid who just happens to be one of the most followed social media personalities on the planet. His account on the Twitter-owned app Vine has more followers than equivalents owned by Ellen Degeneres, Miley Cyrus, Justin Bieber, Harry Styles and a host of other celebrities. As of this writing, he is the single most followed personality on Vine. His father is a football coach and his older brother is the best high school football player in America.

Here is some of his handiwork:

Grier became popular after one of the vines he made with his baby sister got shared by some teen girl in Alabama. Since then, other teen girls have driven his popularity, convinced that he is “cute” and enamored with the fact that he posts many of his videos without a shirt.

So, how did this teen heartthrob create so much controversy? He and a couple of other Vine/Youtube famous kids decided to discuss some of their romantic preferences:

> Just months after being touted as a “social media prodigy,” Vine celebrity Nash Grier has learned the hard way that Internet backlash spreads even more quickly than Internet fame—especially if it’s in response to sexism.
> Grier just celebrated his 16th birthday with his 4.2 million followers on Vine—the third highest on the platform. But the North Carolina sophomore, whose following largely consists of teenage girls enamored by his blue-eyed charm…caused an Internet uproar when his attempt to tell his young female audience “what guys look for in girls” backfired.
> In a video Grier uploaded to YouTube five days before Christmas, he and his friends, 18-year-old fellow Vine star Cameron Dallas and 20-year-old YouTube star JC Caylen, attempt to tell their mostly female fans “What guys look for in girls.”
> … the boys describe their ideal girl as someone who can be entertaining, spontaneous, and fun, girls who can cook, and who can “make you a better you,” i.e. improve the boys themselves. They criticize girls who they see as having no personalities and who are just waiting to marry rich husbands.

Well, that sounds good so far. Feminists ought to be cheering that bit. Where's the problem?

> Then they move into more contentious territory: Caylen criticizes girls with "fake tits," while Grier dislikes girls who are "obnoxious and loud." Then the boys talk about physical appearance, favoring girls who are short and petite, with "natural" looks and "really good smiles." They criticize girls who don't shave their facial and body hair, implying that "peach fuzz" and other types of natural hair on women is "gross."
> Grier also tells girls that "the chase is such a big part" of what makes a girl appealing, encouraging them to "play hard to get."
> "If you play too hard to get, then it's just like, 'oh, she doesn't even like me,' but if you play easy, then it's just like, oh, she's a whore," Grier states. "Find a balance."
> "You can't be better than me" at playing video games, Dallas adds. "I mean I don't even play video games. You can't be better than me."
> Grier's video stood for five days as it gathered major backlash over what many viewers felt were the boys' reinforcement of horrible beauty and behavioral standards in young women who already battle with low self-esteem.

Ah. Ok.

Here is the full video in question:

What Grier Had At Stake

Nash Grier has shown us what happens to high value men with large female fanbases who dare to express anything but the most inclusive preferences and ideology. Men like John Legend and Joseph Gordon Leavitt (just two celebrities who have recently voiced their affinity for "feminism" – there are dozensof other examples) are well aware of this and, if they aren't, their marketing/PR teams will coach them accordingly.

The fact is that their fanbases are predominantly female. Women are doing most of the subscribing/following of their social media accounts, buying most of the products they advertise, buying most of the tickets to their shows/movies, and generally providing most of the vocal support that drives their celebrity. Modern celebrity culture is highly feminized by necessity – it is built to cater to the people who fuel it most, and those people are overwhelmingly women.

These female fanbases consist of young (usually anywhere from 12-25) women who are, more often than not, quite insecure. Their fandom is often based heavily on the maintenance of a mental “relationship” with the celebrity: they may never date him, but they like to maintain the fantasy that they could someday and often place themselves in that position in their own hearts and minds. The maintenance of that relationship is the key to his celebrity: it is what keeps these girls going to his premiers, buying tickets to his shows, subscribing to every one of his social media accounts and snapping up every song he makes on iTunes.

This imaginary relationship is extremely important to these girls on a personal level, and they are extremely insecure about any notion that could take it away from them. What does the relationship actually look like? Think of it like this: when he sings a love/romantic song, they imagine that he is singing to them personally.

When he gives a coy wink or smile in a video, picture or a movie, they imagine that he is communicating directly with them on a personal level.

When he talks about his hobbies and activities, they imagine how said activities make him a perfect fit for them personally. And, finally, when he talks about his wants and desires, they imagine that he is speaking personally to them.

This last bit is key because of her insecurity: she has built up this fantasy and the last thing she wants is to have it contradicted in any way, especially by the male in question. When he says there is something that he doesn’t like in a girl, she will imagine that he is speaking directly to her. If she perceives herself to be lacking some trait he explicitly desires, she’ll get very upset.

Example: Celebrity male says he likes girls who shave.

Her reaction: “Wait, I haven’t shaven in a couple of weeks. I mean, I sometimes shave, but not, like, all the time. OMG – does this mean he wouldn’t like me? OMG!”

He’s ruined her fantasy. Her insecurity will have her fretting about this endlessly.

Now, you may ask the following:

> "Why does she care so much about not meeting one standard of a guy she'll probably never actually meet? Why does it matter to her? He's not a real part of her life and she's never going to be a part of his! Further, even if it does matter, why couldn't she just change a little to meet that standard? Is shaving that hard? How is that a high standard?"

The answer to all of the above is simple…

Insecurity

She's too insecure about herself on a personal and physical level to handle any level of criticism. She copes with this insecurity by maintaining this fantasy relationship with the celebrity, a relationship in which she has all she could ever want with a guy who is all she could ever want and doesn't really have to do anything to maintain it. This allows her to escape to a world in which all of the insecurities she has about herself that keep her up at night are irrelevant and have no impact on her obtaining personal, social and romantic fulfillment. When that fantasy is crushed for whatever reason, it exposes her insecurities again.

Because of this insecurity, she NEEDS that fantasy relationship.

She needs to, at the very least, be able to maintain the illusion in her mind that he could love her. Anything that would completely eliminate this possibility is a no-no, because her insecurities will run wild and leave her upset, angry and even depressed. This is true even though her logical brain understands that she'll probably never actually meet or date this famous male in real life. What she wants to maintain is the ability to rationalize that possibility into existence, however slim it is.

The worst part of this whole video is that at the start they have some nice things like its good when a girl gets I to be a better person
But they just go and shit on that whole idea by then going on and on about all these things that so many people r already so self conscious about.
And doing that just makes girls feel like there not good enough and all these people that r really big fans of these guys r gonna be so heart broken about the fact that they r not perfect like the boys expect them to be

The insecurity these girls have provides high value men like Nash Grier with a remarkable degree of control over their emotional state. By merely stating their actual romantic preferences, they can send legions of women into a state of shock, anger, and outright depression.

When Nash Grier noted that he wasn't a big fan of girls who didn't shave, all of the girls who don't shave (or hadn't shaven at some point in the past, or feared that they may go an extended period of time without shaving in the future) had their insecurities directly engaged. They now wondered if he'd like them, and began to doubt to some degree that he did. Their ability to rationalize into existence that slim possibility of his loving them was undermined, thus compromising the fantasy relationships they maintain with him in their minds.

When the boys noted that they liked girls with freckles, they activated the insecurities of all the girls who lack them. The fact that they didn't say they disliked girls without freckles is not relevant: the mere possibility of their preferring girls who have them is enough to get all of his female followers who lack them concerned and upset about the possibility that they might not like them.

The Illusion of Authority

You'll notice that many of the critical comments directed at Grier seem to imply that he was ordering them around, as though he had some sort of authority over them. Statements like this:

> "I can have as much hair on my body as I feel comfortable with!"
> "I prefer guys who don't tell me what to do!"
> "How about you don't order girls to look a certain way?!"
> "Girls don't have to obey you!"

Or, as quoted here from the deleted mirror video:

> Luvbug1329
> I don't have to be anything but me… gawd people.

Anybody who watched the video can tell that Nash Grier was guilty of none of the above.

He was merely stating his preferences, not claiming that all women were obligated to meet them. The same goes for his companions in the video.

But remember what I said earlier: these women love him and are, in many cases, in a fantasy relationship with him. They NEED him to like them and they take what he says and does personally.

Let's examine this quick comment exchange on the aforementioned deleted mirror of Nash's original video to further clarify this point:

> orchestra99

> I'll tell you exactly why it's a bad video. They are creating unrealistic expectations of women. They're slut shaming. They're telling their young audience of mostly teenage girls how to be, and they're just ignorant > @orchestra99 They are telling women what they should be if they want these boys to be attracted to them. Kind of a big difference. They're not saying they won't treat you like a human being if you don't live up to this; they're saying they probably won't date you if you don't live up to this.

Note commenter orchestra99's statement here. She perceives these boys to be telling young girls how to be in general. Mrluigifan102 correctly points out that this is not the case, and that the boys are actually telling women what they should be if they want to date them specifically (read: stating their personal preferences).

Why can't orchestra99 perceive this seemingly clear distinction? Because these are high value men and she, like most young, highly insecure girls, needs to feel as though it is possible for these guys to actually want her. This means that when these boys state their personal preferences, she interprets them as hard statements about how she and other girls must be.

Since these girls must be able to date these men, they therefore they must be able to meet any standards and preferences these men have. If these men claim to have preferences that these girls don't see themselves fitting for whatever reason, there will be a problem. They can't take the desires these guys express and accept them as individual preferences and just move on if they don't fit them. They're too insecure for that – they need the validation of these celebrity men that they're in love with. That is why these women can see practically no distinction between these men articulating "individual personal preferences/what I like to see for me" and setting "hard standards for the way ALL women should be no matter what". Any preferences these high value males articulate will be interpreted as commandments by infatuated young women who feel obligated to appeal to these guys and assign false authority to them.

> 1 day ago
> that dog scene should have been longer…and this video is awful…guys get over yourselves. Not changing the way I am cause you want me too.

This young female commenter is in the same boat as orchestra99. She perceives their statement of their preferences as an actual, direct personal command from them to her necessitating that she change herself. They're not actually asking that any women change to meet their preferences – they're just stating them. Alexandra, like most young girls, is simply too obsessed with obtaining their validation to make that distinction.

Failure to be wanted by these men is not an option to these girls, and when they get even the slightest inkling that they may not fit the individual preferences these men have they can do nothing but get angry or depressed.

It is the powerful need to obtain the validation of these men (and the related tendency to take everything they say personally and attach great significance to it) that awakens the power of these young females as consumers. When these males' faces show up next to a product they're advertising and endorsing, the young females feel naturally compelled to buy it. When these guys create a video or social media account, the girls feel obligated to follow every word said. When these men release a song, the girls naturally feel obligated to download it or go to his concert and listen to it.

Similarly, when he critiques them or sets some sort personal preference or standard, they feel obligated to meet it, even though they should not logically be compelled to do so. Thus, you can see how this need insecure young female fans have in their desire to bond with such high value celebrity males creates these males' celebrity power in the first place (makes them valuable for endorsements, gets them followers, sells their songs, etc) while simultaneously limiting what these males can say or do publicly. A large part of the job as a male celebrity is to sell a dream and a fantasy to millions of young women out there. He has to walk on eggshells in order to keep that fantasy intact and keep the money rolling in.

How To Play The Game

This is why celebrity males so often cannot voice legitimate standards of even the most basic variety. The risk of a majority of their fanbase taking it personally is simply too great because so many girls are insecure about so many things. Thus, when these guys get the chance or are prompted to talk of standards, they keep it real simple:

"I like strong, independent women." – This is a great go-to. All of his female fans, regardless of what they look like or where they're from, can convince themselves that they are strong and independent. He can't offend anyone.

"Just be yourself." – Even safer. He is basically saying to every female out there that she's perfect for him the way she is. The statement implies absolutely no obligation on her part to change anything about herself in order to be able to get an extremely high value male interested in her. That total lack of responsibility brings great mental comfort to these young females.

"I love women who are beautiful on the inside." – Another great go-to. Any female can convince herself that she fits this bill even if she's actually a bitch to most of the people she comes into contact with. Low risk of offending anyone.

"Looks aren't everything" – This is also an effective statement for a high value male looking to remain in the good graces of female fans. It is just another variation of the "beauty on the inside" mantra mentioned above. It works well because it doesn't offend anyone: the girls who have the looks can easily convince themselves that they've also got the beauty on the inside (rendering the fact that "looks aren't everything" inoffensive to them), while the girls who lack good looks can use this statement to convince themselves that they can completely make up for it with their "beauty on the inside" (which, again, they can all convince themselves they possess). This statement is also effective for placating the attractive girls who have convinced themselves that they're ugly.

What isn't okay for high value men to say?

"I like athletic girls" – This will build fans among the girls who've played sports or enjoy them, but it will awaken the insecurities of the many who were never particularly inclined to athletics and who hated gym class (or who are out of shape). If a man's fanbase consists of many of these women (and it almost certainly will if he's a typical celebrity), he'd best stay away from this one.

"I love freckles" – Any girl who doesn't have freckles will begin to wonder if you like her.

"I love big tits" – Even girls with sizable breasts are often insecure about their bust size and convinced that they're too small. Thus, such a comment would have a high risk of offending just about all of his female fanbase.

"Girls need to shave" – Lots of girls don't do it and many who do have neglected it at times. This kind of statement has the potential to offend every girl in a given high-value male's fanbase, as Nash Grier has learned.

"I love fit girls" – Obviously a high risk of offending the fat/chubby chicks, but also a high risk of offending the fit chicks who THINK they're fat. These two groups can often make up the entirety of a celebrity male's fanbase.

The Truth

Though all of the above aren't good for PR, it is likely (in fact, almost certain) that most high value men maintain standards that their fans wouldn't want to hear about. More often than not, these men have extremely attractive, well-groomed, fit females on their arms. Men like John Legend (one of the more recent self-proclaimed male feminists in Hollywood) have dating histories that consist almost exclusively of relationships with physically fit, aesthetically elite models. Actions speak louder than words: these men have standards, and those standards do tend to favor fit, well-groomed women.

Men like Legend cannot come out and say that, however, because if they do their female fanbases will no longer be able to delude themselves into believing that they have even the slimmest of chances of appealing to a high value male like him.

Legend is aware of this reality, so when asked what he likes in a woman he keeps it simple: “Strong and independent.” No harm, no foul. So long as he shuts up, his legions of female fans can continue to dream, in their heart of hearts, that his soulful crooning is really for them and he may just one day become their Prince Charming. Real life contradictions to this fantasy in his actual romantic life can be rationalized away.

All in all, this Nash Grier episode is illustrative of why being (or pretending to be) a white knight is good business for many famous, high value men. Nash Grier is a kid who was simply too young to understand this and lacked legitimate PR/marketing advisers to make him aware. His star will continue to shine brightly after this – with this experience behind him he’ll know to be more tactful in the future in order to maximize his appeal to his fanbase (and, by extension, his own notoriety). So long as this doesn’t become a habit, girls will forget about this in time and continue to follow everything he does.

Other high value men who are aware of the need to play this game probably don’t believe all that they say (few rational, sane men would), but they know what makes them money and what doesn’t.

Celebrity men who want to keep the cash flowing need to sell the dream at all costs.

Truth is superfluous.

Why You Should Embark On A Pilgrimage

January 20, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Travel writings, like travelers themselves, come in different forms. Some travel books offer a dull, tour-guide type of narrative, lacking serious reflection or insight. Other writings provide something deeper: an attempt to relate the experiences or impressions of the traveler in a way that transcends the simple activity of travel. It is the latter type of writing that I value most. For it elevates travel from a laborious task to a quest for knowledge and discovery.

So the itinerant scholar Ciriaco de Pizzecolli (Cyriac of Ancona) meandered around the eastern Mediterranean in the 1440s, searching for and recording ancient inscriptions, manuscripts, and other antiquities, which he carefully transcribed in his thick notebooks. His mission was to document the details of the crumbling monuments of classical antiquity, and in this he succeeded brilliantly.

And so also did humanist Biondo Flavio, traveling through Italy, seek to record the local folklore, geography, and historical oddities of the cities and regions he visited. His masterpiece Italia Illuminata, appearing in 1451, is a goldmine of strange information about the nooks and crannies of Italy. Describing the Piceno region, for example, he relates this story:

> Quite apart from fornication and adultery (which every one of them [the adherents of a secret society near Piceno] practices indiscriminately in secluded spots furtively equipped for the purpose), another such abomination is perpetrated in their public ceremonies. All the more attractive women—widows, > virgins, or wives—are summoned and purposely led aside as they assemble at night in grottoes. Shut up in the same cave…the priest tells them in a loud voice that couples must…mingle in carnal embrace and copulation. The lights are put out and every man lays down the woman closest to him, either groping for her or having previously kept an eye on her for the purpose.

Flavio reports some gruesome ritual murder practices of the cult, and ends by reassuring his readers that the members were eventually arrested and burned at the stake, "as indeed they deserved." Alas, not all travels are this exciting.

Cyriac and Flavio were both pilgrims of the mind, in a sense. That much they shared. They were on a quest for knowledge, and traveled with the specific purpose of learning something about their external world, something that would serve as a springboard for self-knowledge.

We map the world's macrocosm, so that we can map our own microcosm. The outer world is the gateway to our own inner world.

Many people travel for work, and many for recreation. But how many travel specifically for the purpose of self-improvement or discovery? And how many are able to leave their prejudices at home? At one time, people did undertake travel for just such a purpose: it was called a pilgrimage. What happened to the idea of the pilgrimage in the West? It has fallen out of fashion. And it is sorely due for a resurrection. It can be an important vehicle to assist the modern man on his path to self-realization and improvement.

Note that I do not necessarily mean a pilgrimage for religious purposes. By pilgrimage, I mean the act of travel to some "shrine" (house, building, tomb, etc.) of a great man, as a means of contemplating his life and what lessons it may hold. It is a sign of devotion, a method of meditation, a quest for guidance. Some background is in order here.

Pilgrimages were a key part of medieval European religious devotion. The general setting of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, for example, was the pilgrimage of an assortment of characters. By the end of the thirteenth century, one historian tells us, there were about 10,000 sanctioned sites of pilgrimage all over Europe. People undertook such journeys to fulfill some vow, seek a cure for some malady by contemplating the relics of some saint or holy man, edify themselves, or for other personal reasons.

An Englishman, might, for example, visit the tombs of St. Cuthbert at Durham, or Edward the Confessor at Westminster, or that of St. Edmund at Bury, or Thomas a Becket at Canterbury. A Frenchman might seek out Notre Dame at Chatres, or St. Martin's at Tours. Italy, of course, had hundreds of such sites, among them the relics of St. Francis at Assisi or the Santa Casa at Loreto, as well as Rome itself, the Eternal City.

Sooner or later, all roads led to Rome, of course. Pope Boniface VIII declared a jubilee for the year 1300, and requested all who could to make the journey to Rome and visit the historical sites there. In that year over 2 million visitors reached Rome, a huge figure for those days. So many coins were deposited before the tomb of St. Peter that two priests working around the clock were needed to rake them in manageable piles for collection.

How did the idea of a formal pilgrimage as a method of self-improvement vanish? Few people today undertake such religious obligations, at least in the West. But could the idea of a pilgrimage still offer us something of value today? I believe it can. Instead of our focus being a religious site, we can instead seek out some site central to the life of a great man. By visiting the house, tomb, or architectural work of some great man, we will feel sympathy with, and kinship for, his struggles. Such a visit will be a useful way of contemplating our own hardships, and how our historical "mentor" may have handled himself in similar circumstances.

This year, consider making a "pilgrimage" to some site intimately associated with a great man whom you admire. The journey will do you good. It does not matter who it is. It does not matter where it is. The only requirements are:

1. It must be to a site intimately associated with the great man in question (house, place of work, tomb).

2. The journey should not be too easy. You will value it more if you supply yourself with a bit of hardship.

3. You should visit the site, and contemplate the life of the great man in question while you are there. Then contemplate your own life. You should then record your impressions in writing. It will mean something to you someday.

There are thousands of such sites to choose from. It does not matter if your great man was a public figure, musician, leader, saint, artist, scholar, scientist, doctor, or poet. What matters is that you sincerely believe in his greatness, and that his life's lessons may be a candle to illuminate our own pathway.

And finally, the ecstasy of reaching a long sought-after destination, after many trials and troubles, is one that has to be experienced to be fully appreciated. Masculine energy is about overcoming obstacles, breaking through barriers, and seeking out the sacred chalices of our own desire. The journey, with all its hardships, is the major part of the reward of pilgrimage.

Only by knowing this, can we begin to understand the joyous release of the medieval pilgrim, reaching the gates of Rome, breaking into the stirring strains of the Pilgrims' Chorus: "O noble Rome, queen of the world…we bless you through all the years. Through all the centuries, hail."

The 3 Tools Of The Predatory Female

January 20, 2014 | by Charlie W. | Link | Original Link

A while ago I wrote about the 4 Types Of Women, and suggested that of the four, only one was worth knowing or having any kind of relationship with. Unfortunately because her type is so rare, and our sexual desires being as they are, probability dictates that we'll more often than not encounter women of the other three types in our day to day lives. Because of this, I decided to share some of my thoughts and observations on the weapons regularly employed by these predatory women.

Never in the history of mankind have women been as bad as they are today. Since the world wars, we have seen a steady decline in the quality of women even as our standards of living have steadily increased. One can speculate as to the reason why these events are correlated. And while each speculation has its own merit, I choose to focus on interpersonal and affectual causes.

Two blows were endured by the western female during and after the wars. The first blow is the loss and abandonment of her father. Having lost her father either through his absence or death, the woman as a child sees her mother abandoned but doesn't know why. She assumes this is because her mother, and thus women and femininity, are deficient in some profound way. The second blow is the vast increase in power of western society and the western man. Simply put, loving a man meant risking annihilation since nothing she could give would ever be valuable enough for him to commit to her. This meant that she had only one option. She had to compete.

If you look at things this way, you can understand women's endless desire for "sameness" (they call it equality), their endless desire to be included (job quotas or anti-discrimination policies which employ and hide behind racial guilt), and their incessant need to follow men into whatever new venture he comes up with – science, tech, gaming, etc. You can also understand the rise of the phallic woman who hates everything associated with femininity and her biological nature.

A woman's desire to "compete" has a dark side

The predatory woman demands love and resources and will do anything to get them. Throughout our history, men and women have traditionally worked together for survival and their innate complementariness ensured maximum efficiency and productivity. Even so, it has always been the man who secures resources and the woman who refines them. Tthe malaise that affects so many today, both at the individual level and the interpersonal level, is at bottom a loss of this feminine ability. Society itself is suffering from an upset stomach as we starve from the inside out and understandably believe the solution is to eat more.

Because women have always been dependent on men in one way or the other for life itself, nature has seen fit to give her tools necessary for her survival. These tools are the subject of our discussion, but have been discussed by poets and philosophers for as long as we've had symbolic reason. Indeed one the oldest pieces of literature known, the epic of Gilgamesh, covers many subject matter pertinent to the human condition the least of which is the woman problem. That said, here are the three main tools of the predatory female…

1. Deception

Predatory women are masters of deception. A part of their skill rests in the fact that they themselves are unaware of their true motivations – they are self-deceived. She will pretend to be what you love or pretend to be what you abhor all in an effort to get you to move one way or the other, and she never reveals her true self either to you or to herself. She may also flood your consciousness with irrelevant information in an effort to distract you from the truth and blot out your sun.

To overcome a woman's deception, you must be honest with yourself about your ideals and desires, retain an awareness of your ideals and desires, and live faithful to your ideals and desires. In interacting with the deceptive woman, it is best to observe the consequences of her actions. We are always in the world intentionally so if you see a particular effect or pattern occur more than twice, it's safe to say it wasn't an accident.

2. Infection

A predatory woman will attempt to poison you against others, or poison others against you. Her mind and world are split along spectrums of right and wrong, good and evil. If you are her enemy, she will take every opportunity to tell others just how wrong and evil you are.

Overcoming this is tricky. First as above, you must always live faithful to your ideals and desires. This gives you credibility as she is likely to erode her credibility with anyone who doesn't suffer from her disease of the mind given a long enough period of time. Second, be proactive. Identifying women like this is relatively easy. Don't introduce them to anyone close to your heart, and don't bring them into your place of work. Third, be willing to let go of anything or anyone she infects. Don't bother trying to convince others of the "truth". The truth can defend itself and will come out sooner or later.

Lies and falsehoods require an input of unrenewable energy to keep the lie going whereas the "truth" always renews itself from moment to moment, and is constantly pushing upwards to the surface of our awareness. In the cases where this doesn't happen, said person didn't really understand/love you to begin with, and the relationship was more of a burden on you than anything else (i.e. you gave too much of yourself for what you got back in return; the relationship itself was a lie).

3. Repression

A predatory woman is a master at finding guilt and at times will seek to instill guilt where there was none to begin with. Of the three tools, this one is the most destructive because with it, she reduces your "potency" (it's no wonder Viagra sales are doing so well.) Similar to infection where she turns you against others or others against you, the goal of this tactic is to turn you against yourself. She will get you to doubt absolutely everything, big or small, because your doubt weakens you. If you feel the least bit unsure, insecure or ashamed, she will find out and push this button over and over again. Ultimately you become "petrified", turned to stone, transfixed in the gaze of medusa.

This last one perhaps is of the biggest consequence for not only man, but for society as well. This last tool is the modus operandi of feminist. To defeat it, you must never reveal your heart to them. It is by revealing your heart that she first instills doubt into the hero who has no doubt. The hero who knows his ideals and desires and lives faithfully in service of them and God. The hero who accepts both his twisted side and his holy side. This hero has no limits but what he loves – even as what he loves strengthens him.

If this woman discovers what you love, she will tell you that if you love it, you should or would do and be xyz. Your blind innocent love is more than willing to do what love would never have you do, and in doing so, you weaken both the love and yourself. For this reason, you must never reveal your "heart", your "name", your "self", your "soul", your ideals and desires, to this woman. Become a master at lying. Lie so that you may tell the truth. For those of us who aren't heroes and struggle with guilt, now is the time to go inwards and reflect on our guilt so that she can no longer use it against us. Accept our sins and forgive ourselves. Resolve to be a better person from now on.

Conclusion

We can see a natural evolution, an increase in complexity, of the tools of a predatory female, one that correlates with the progression of her neuroses. Through deception, she moves her body to get you to move one way or the other in the world. Through infection, she moves the bodies of others in the world to get you to move one way or the other. And through repression, she gets you to move against your own body in both the world of the mind (guilt) and the physical world (self-sabotage). Present in this evolution is the gradual alienation of woman from herself and her subsequent movements closer and closer to her male ideal. She leaves her body under the illusion that it is for many bodies (pseudo polymorphous perversity), only later to confess to herself and to the world that her true motivation is to have the body of a male – a penis of her own at last.

How To Pass A Shit Test Like William the Conqueror

January 20, 2014 | by LaidNYC | Link | Original Link

William the Conqueror was born in the 11th Century to an unmarried Duke of Normandy, the love child of his mistress. His illegitimate status didn't stop him from rising to success in battle and leadership, eventually winning the status of King.

During his twenties, he sent a request to Matilda of Flanders for her hand in marriage. Matilda sent back a reply that she was far too high-borne to marry a bastard. When his messenger delivered news of the lady's response, William the Conqueror rode from Normandy to the neighboring Flanders on his horse, where he found Matilda. He then threw her on the ground by her long, signature braids, in full view of her servants and onlookers. Then he rode off pridefully without a word.

After that, Matilda refused to marry anyone but William the Conqueror. They wed, and she bore him 9 children, including two future Kings. And yes, she was kind of a babe:

Chicks dig jerks. Even hot, high-borne chicks.

The Lesson for Modern Men

In the Anglosphere, I have noticed a rise in this type of shit test that will henceforth be known as the “Matilda of Flanders Shit Test”. This shit test is actually just an unveiled insult. Girls in the Western world will freely say “You suck” or “You’re a douchebag” or “Are you gay?” There is no wit. It is all push, no pull. It takes the enjoyable dance and rhythm out of a girl’s resistance and makes it a battle. I consider it unartistic and grounds for hatefucking.

It will happen to you if you go out and approach, and a good Boy Scout always comes prepared. The standard game advice is to remain unaffected, agree and amplify. This is fine and works… the first time. But too much Matilda of Flanders can not be tolerated.

Any good economist will tell you that when you subsidize something you get more of it. Well, the only subsidy a girl knows is attention. Attention is her currency, to be collected all night and jammed into her handbag alongside her orbiter’s balls. A girl will only behave up to the standard that is required for her to continue getting male attention. This is why a skillful retort to a bitchy shit test may only be rewarded with further bitchy shit-testing.

So What To Do?

The modern man is subject to a legal system, so it is not advised to throw every smart-mouthed wench to the ground. Today, a girl whose flirt of choice is an insult must be given a hard takeaway. Ignore her, backturn, ride off on your horse, it doesn’t matter as long as you stop paying attention to her.

If you've already built some attraction, firmly but not butthurtedly stating "Do not talk to me like that" or "Talk to me when you're ready to behave", followed by a skillful takeaway may even result in the rarest moment on this precious earth: a hot girl's apology.

But if it is only attention she seeks, won't she just get that male attention from another guy? Understand: not all male attention is equal. The thirsty serfs that surround her will be happy to take her shit with a smile and ask for more. The Queen of a thousand subjects will soon bore of them all, but she will always seek out the King who reigns over her.

She wants to be ignored.
She wants to be judged.
She wants to be deemed unworthy, if only for a second.

It is only after being discarded and ignored and replaced that she can chase the most enjoyable pleasure a woman can have: winning over a high value man.

Don't give her an orgasm, give her a challenge. Ignore, disapprove, backturn, withdraw affection, flirt with her friends, walk away. If your attention does not need to be won over, it is worth nothing to her.

But unless you have the steel balls of a Norman conqueror, do not try this. It can not be faked. If she senses for a moment that it is a tactic, that you want her to chase you, all is lost. Instead, make it real. Train yourself to be repulsed by a girl's impolite behavior. It won't be hard. You must desire to remove these abrasive girls from your life and demand a higher standard of behavior from the girls you speak with. Embrace your natural disgust towards the bitchy, the slutty, the manjawed.

Only when she shows signs that she is ready to submit and accept her womanly role as a soothing feminine presence can she be given a second chance. Be ready for this to happen, but never expect it. You must be fully prepared to ride off and take your regal dick elsewhere for another high-bred maiden to suck on, nary to think of this ill-mannered wench again.

Kings don't chase, they replace. William the Conqueror was prepared to do just that. Are you?

3 Reasons To Go All-Out On Her Birthday

January 21, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

How many times have you heard one of these excuses from a girl:

> "I can't meet up with you. It's my birthday dinner with my friends."
> "My birthday weekend was so much fun!"
> "(crying) How could you forget my birthday?!"
> "No, that was my birthday with my family. This is my birthday with my coworkers!"

As rational beings, men are quick to dismiss anything lacking immediate intrinsic and empirical value. Why should we celebrate what, to us, is some random day that everyone without exception possesses? I used to feel this way, but I was wrong. If you're playing the game, you need to take this monumental occasion seriously. Here are three reasons why you should treat your girl like the princess she obviously is when her birthday rolls around:

1. She needs to be the star once in a while

Your girl's birthday is her one chance to be the center of attention. With only Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, Tinder, and OKCupid available to make her feel special on a daily basis (and with increasing competition for likes and messages every day), your girl deserves the chance to bask in rare morsels of attention. You may notice that she becomes more demanding, flaky, or bitchy during the two week period surrounding her date of birth—ignore it and be happy that she chose to include you in this special period.

2. She only gets “one” birthday

You must realize that birthdays are a rare occasion for your girl: she only gets to celebrate it once with her friends, a single time with her family, once or twice with her best friends, once with her coworkers, and maybe a few other times with various acquaintances each year. Just as the hosting country will facilitate the housing, feeding, tourism, and drunken revelry of Olympics athletes every 2 years, it is your responsibility to make her feel special during these festivities.

3. Her birthday is a reflection of her hard work and strength of character

Can you believe how hard she's worked to put this day into motion? First, she personally orchestrated her parents having unprotected intercourse 9 month prior to this date. Second, in an innovative and laborious marketing campaign, she's personally seen to it that every person she interacts with is conscious of the day's significance. This requires Obama Campaign-level social media canvassing, no small task in today's world. Lastly, she has managed to survive to reproductive age against all odds, despite the scourges of modern medicine and technology. Sure she may have a couple extra pounds on her frame or rely on antidepressant medication to compensate for poor diet and lifestyle choices, but these are just byproducts of a life lived without the guiding beacon of male privilege.

As part of your compliment and cuddle game, be sure to respect the birthday of the western woman as sacred. Birthdays are so much more than just a participation award in life, and dare to forget them only at your own peril. If you do, you might end up buying expensive jewelry to make up for your insensitivity or, even worse, being called an uncaring jerk. And we all know that guys like that never succeed with women.

Unmarried Older Women Need To Go Away

Sex and the City's début was in 1998 and aired its last episode in 2004. The show was a life affirming series about four mid-30's sluts with no worries or responsibilities banging their way across New York City. It portrayed women as being able to screw around, be callous to men, show no respect for society and still have it all in the end – marriage, family, riches, the whole happy sunset that women don't realize they want until the wrinkles and sagging skin gained from a decade of non-stop partying start making them look like Fagin from Oliver Twist.

Women at the time gobbled the show up, imitating the fantasy on screen as if doing so in real life had no consequences. And why shouldn't they have? They were young(ish), gloriously single, living in a society feminized through and through. Sure, their hippie mom's got to be rampaging sluts and married to good men by the time they were 26 but the professional women of the early 2000's knew that their prince charming was going to be waiting for them in a few years once they were 'ready' (no longer attracting studs) to 'settle down' (find a schmuck to permanently pay for their meals and student debt). So what if they were unmarried or GASP even single at 26? In 1998, 26 was the new 16. Their whole lives were ahead of them and everything was going to go according their schedules. After all, Carrie and the other Sluts in the City (god I'm clever) showed them that women in their mid to late 30s were living like the 18 year olds at heart they all they wished they still looked like. To them, there was no rush. These women were forever young.

Flash forward to 2014. All those 26 year olds who watched and mimicked Carrie's lifestyle are now 42. Since 1998 many of them have gotten married, had 1.7 kids, dropped out of the career game like all women want to. Notice I said many and not all. I say not all because a good chunk of them are still living the exact same way they did back in their early 20's.

Of course, Sex And The City can't be single handedly blamed for these women's terrible life choices. They were already living like Carrie; she just happened to be a faddish pop culture icon for them to muster around.

My generation (Millennial) often gets labelled as having a kind of Peter Pan Syndrome, where we are refusing to grow up; which, I admit, applies to a lot of us. It's a bit hypocritical to label the Millennial generation as living in Never Never Land, however, when young 20 somethings go to the club and see women aged 30+ in leggings or mini-skirts unironically bobbing their heads and singing along to Fun's 'We Are Young.'

"Tonighttt we are youuunggg" Born in 1958

If we young men are Peter Pan then these old bags are Captain Hook trying to tie us up and carry off in their gross, diseased, poorly shaven, wart encrusted, scar riddled pirate ship. And because they've grown up being told how awesome they are, how they deserve everything, these cougars are shameless in their behaviour.

Last summer I went to a club with a girl I was banging. She wound up in the bathroom comforting her crying friend for a good chunk of the night. I went to wait at nearby shooter bar and was thinking about every single outcome of what would happen if I manned up and tried to hit up that cute brunette a few spaces down from me when suddenly a cougar came shuffling out of the crowd and grinded my knee practically all the way up into her never used womb while shouting in my ear, "What are we drinking cutie?!"

In real life I'm actually fairly nice, so I spared her rejection with a lie, telling her that, "I'm here with my fiancée," instead of laughing her wrinkly, deluded ass away from me as I should have. Hopefully her thinking that a young guy like me was getting married to some smart young woman really brought her down but I wish I had had the balls to say what I was really thinking: Jesus Christ lady, when my mom was your age I was eight*.*

It's no secret that a woman unmarried over 30 has something wrong with her and is a bad life investment – widows and recently reawakened coma victims excluded obviously – but these parodies of pride haven't gotten that memo. Perhaps they've heard how men in their 30's and 40's can still attract young lovers and think that somehow they get the same deal. Perhaps they actually have no idea just how unappealing and repulsive they are to any man with any option.

What would you take; left or right?

So why didn't many of these once youthful hoebags wind up married? Because when they were young and able to attract men they refused to wife up. And why wouldn't they? They were hot, young and tight and gave zero shits about their future; after all, the party lasts forever right? What young woman wants to do something as dull as starting a strong, loving family when she can spend her 20's having such adventures as taking some ecstasy at an outdoor rock concert and blowing a stranger behind the port-o-potties instead? These young sluts were on top of a world that catered to them.

But when your life revolves around being a slut, the world only caters to you if you're a young slut. And many of these women haven't been young for a decade. It used to be that slutty women could bang away their 20's and still find a decent guy with a good job and strong family ethics – who they could then divorce after a decade once the house was paid off and the kids were old enough to look after themselves; not effectively of course but for the most part mommy didn't need to keep her eye on an 11 year old all day and as a hot recently divorced milf on the prowl she really needed those worry free mornings to sleep the hangover off.

Well those times are disappearing. Nothing stays the same, a lesson today's older whores are learning much to their detriment and teeth gnashing. Men are wising up; whether through gleaning knowledge from the internet, learning it through anecdotes from their friends or simply stumbling upon the truth themselves. More and more men are discovering the fundamental truth: unmarried women past 30 are bizarre. They're damaged goods. They are not worth any effort or attention what so ever.

Meeting a woman after she's 30 and deciding to marry her is like betting everything on black at a roulette table with thirty-five red spaces – and even if you hit black it only pays out 5% of your bet. They'll very likely use the foolish man who peruses their sloppy beef curtains for all the money they can dig up and then toss his ass out on the curb for the most frivolous of reasons.

Of course having grown up privileged and been told they could have it all these old sacks that aren't getting it all are turning around and blaming themselves and their own selfish life choices because they're responsible adults who are nearing their middle age. PSYCH. They say its men's fault. What else is new?

OLDER WOMEN ARE INVISIBLE. OLDER WOMEN IGNORED BY SOCIETY. OLDER WOMEN UNLUCKY IN LOVE.

Even casual internet users have invariably stumbled on a heading like that, or read a complaint in comment sections involving a similar theme.

When I first clicked on a link about so called invisible women you can easily imagine my disappointment in discovering the article was not about chicks gaining see-through super powers but rather a bunch of 30 something's complaining about how hard it is to be 30+ and single.

The Real Invisible Woman

They moaned about how older women are invisible to society nowadays. Apparently men ignore them and the older women like them; they no longer hold open the door or chat them up in line at Starbucks or get down on their knees to bag them for dates. Suddenly, now that these women are 'ready' to start a family, all the good men are mysteriously gone; taken they say, or chasing younger women or marrying foreign women or refusing to grow up – which actually means he would rather play with his toys by himself then pay for hers and watch her play with them.

If ever questioned about why they think their male peers, men in their 30s or 40s, are choosing foreign women over them the ‘invisible’ woman usually rants about mail order bride rape or how ‘creepy’ older men just want young women as their ‘slaves’ to cook and clean for them. And if pressed about the older man/younger woman dynamic there’s always a teary gaze of nostalgia as she remembers her sugar daddy days – then she shakes her head and says that all young girls are sluts (her, just fifteen years younger) who give sex up with no commitments so why should older men bother dating all those totally mature and experienced women their own age?

Absolutely heart breaking right? Yet there’s never any serious (mainstream) investigation to why these women are single into their 30s and beyond. I guess it’s just easier for these women to say that men suck and it’s our fault rather than take a good, long look in their mirrors. In their defense, perhaps even they can’t stand to look at their sagging, party aged faces – the men they lust after certainly can’t.

Unfortunately these vaginal fossils can’t actually just acknowledge their terrible choices and go gently into that good night of post whore spinsterdom. No, we’re already hearing all about their problems and this trend will only increase as more of today’s media savvy sluts grow old and alone. Much like the heroic single mom, social media is slowly beginning to fill up with the ‘tragedies’ of older women with no children and of those who refused to get married within a reasonable amount of time who now find themselves without anyone choosing them as the consolation prize. And of course it’s all men’s fault, those selfish pricks.

The cougar movements have already begun. Female centered television networks (which includes pretty much all of them) run reality and scripted shows about how awesome cougars and older Sex and the City types are. Others are desperately trying to create a social stigma that young men should get involved with older women and older men should cease pursuing younger women. So on the one hand we have older women complaining incessantly about there being no good men; then we have countless articles like these (1, 2, 3) written in the tone that young men dating older women is not only the norm, but that it’s so common that 30+ women should actually consider the pros and cons of whether or not to date younger men! Like they actually have a choice!

As they're charging head first off the precipice today's older women still have to rationalize their minds into thinking they're somehow in control, even as the reality of the weird young men who actually do date older women is quite different.

Knights do not fight for the love of Queens – they fight for Princesses. No man of sound mind and worth ever dreams of starting a fairy tale life with a woman over 30. There is no reason for today's women to leave her 20s unmarried; they are 'victims' of their own greed, short-sightedness and selfishness. Their frivolously divorcing sisters out on the prowl are just as repugnant.

For women, 26 is not the new 16; 30 is not the new 18; 40 is not the new 20. A woman's peak beauty and attractiveness has a short lived shelf life and if she chooses to ignore the expiry date then to hell with 'em. There's a lot more for men to feel guilty about in this world then the stink coming from some expired slut meat. All these complaining older women need to actually become invisible and disappear from society. At least their younger sisters who are complaining have the benefit of still being bangable. Women over 30 trying to date suck, and they make everywhere they go suck. They need to scurry through the super market and buy their cat food quickly – and not try to start up a conversation with us young men in the checkout line; we respond to your questions because we're being nice, not because we're interested in you. Please leave us be while we admire dat ass on the 18 year old checkout girl.

Oh, and to all you cougars out there – stay out of the clubs. You're embarrassing everyone in there, especially yourself.

"I really don't understand this We Are Jung song. I met Carl back when I was in university, he was a very odd man – heck of a package though, tickled my tonsils…wazzat? Do I want to have some coke with you in the men's room? But I already got a coke in my hand!"

4 Types Of Bargain-Bin Pussy That You Should Avoid

January 21, 2014 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

Typical “modern” women all market themselves as a premium product, yet our insights from game inform us that their premium is simply a contrived label for which they expect to command inflated prices. They will act like a cracked screen (mental issue) on an iPhone (body) is a factory customization. It’s how they’re conditioned to behave by their doting fathers who in turn were browbeaten by feminists wives into believing their daughters would grow up to become abused whores if Daddy didn’t tell them they were beautiful, perfect princesses every day of their lives.

I’ve learned how to identify when the products these women offer (pussy) is not in good condition. Beware these species of woman and know when to they’re trying to present stack the ripple up with the top shelf stuff.

Single Mothers With Mentally Challenged Children

This first group obviously merits discount, and they should know it. Does any man with a high school education in biology want to date somebody whose loins yield disabled fruit?

The kids being raised by a single mother already have to deal with bad parenting on average. Add to the fact that the kids are disabled just means she will have an obsession with whatever disorder that kid has. That's why there's a ton of pseudo-science around about what causes autism. Some people want to proclaim that vaccines are the problem. When in reality it is not-so-optimally sperm combined with not-so-optimally egg.

When you date a single mother with a disabled kid you are forced to become an "advocate". That means whining to the school board about how little timmy needs an Ipad to talk. That means going to these "symbolic" walks which is just an excuse to be able to go outside the house without people judging your parenting skills. Single mothers also tend to have the worst-behaved disabled kids compared to couples and even single dads.

Vegan Chicks

I know that I'll take a lot of knee-jerk flack for putting vegan chicks inside the bargain bin, but please hear me out. Picking up a vegan chick is like buying a brand new iPhone that only has or ever can have Apple-approved apps installed. Similarly, even the vegan girl with tight bodies come bloated with multiplicities of neuroses. Avoiding anything so much as manufactured with animal by-product as an intermediate is an anal retention they pursue with occult fervor.

They also tend to buy into any number of tangentially related New Age pseudo-science woo woo, like crystals curing cancer or water having "memory." A waifish, cutely small vegan chick is only one mental breakdown away from devolving into an expensive hamplanet. The trouble is that instead of eating cheap processed snacks like a conventional lard bucket, they demand five dollar Snickers bars sold at Wholefoods. You're then stuck with a fat bitch that eats feel-good calorie bombs and has faith in the psychic powers of dolphins.

Have fun consoling her for hours and compassionately patting her rolls whenever that stupid Sarah McLaughlin commercial airs on the TV. Vegan chicks, on that note, are also one break up away from becoming fat-positive radical feminists. Boring soy-eating feminist sows are never worth the MSRP.

Geeky Chicks

Say you're browsing movies at a BestBuy and over in the section where they keep the anime you notice a blue haired sexpot looking at the cover of "Attack of Titans." You move in to scoop her just like in her bishie reveries since most of the competition would rather eat Doritos and post on web forums about how their cartoon crushes are superior to the warmth of organic puss. You think this chick is perfect until flaws start bombarding your senses. Her small talk immediately reveals that she has deep daddy issues and is socially retarded beyond repair. The lines of conversation progressively grow shorter and shorter since her feigned nerd knowledge extends to a paragraph here or there pulled from a Wikipedia article. The only video games she ever actually played are feminist propaganda games like Gone Home or Depression Quest or otherwise shallow, mass-marketed Mountain Dew fare like League of Legends, Call of Duty and Candy Crush.

Geeky chicks never come to understand the exhilarating reward of overcoming adversity and will complain on Twitter/Facebook when confronted with any resistance or challenge in games. When they lose, which isn't surprising at all, geeky "gamer grrl" chicks have tantrums that would make any caffeine-fed tween embarrassed. Their Final Fantasy character imprinted fingernails start to shake, or they'll even sink to the depth of cutting themselves for pity. You should liken such woman/children to fun beta programs that, when they work, are fun as hell but hobbled by a severely limited scope. They often crash and never advance like other better designed software.

Blogger

Imagine, with apologies, the loud mouth pseudo-intellectual posing as a literary vixen on a Gawker tabloid like Jezebel. They write with such vitriol about social issues that it's clear they think of themselves as Mel Gibson smeared in woad with a vagina leading the charge against Patriarchial Imperialism or some other fanciful nonsense that only academics are capable of being so foolish to invent. You manage to spit some game through the comment section of an article of hers and convince her to get on your stable. Meeting up in a bookstore, you discover this "Elizabeth Cady Stanton" is nothing like either you envisioned her or she tried so desperately hard to portray herself on the internet. This strong, stable woman is actually an emotional wreck of a pathetic human being. Any equal partnership you envisioned having could only amount to a talkative Robin to your Batman.

The blogger is nothing more than a passive aggressive wimp who tries to hold you accountable for "microagressions" that you allegedly commit against her. Simple acts of traditional chivalry like opening the door for her because she was tipsy are construed as a patriarchal affront to her maturity and independence. The sweet mousy lady you optimistically imagined was only ever an information-age Mussolini in sweat pants incapable of strength when away from her keyboard. This particular iPhone is being tapped by the NSA. It monitors everything you do but the NSA (her) will never recognize our right to question anything about it.

The above don't include all the sub-groups of bargain bin pussy in existence. This is just a basic list that most men can recognize. At risk of over-using the analogy, women are a depreciating asset like a year-old Iphone. Very few are worth the full asking price. Be willing to bargain down to get a discount.

Every Woman Adores a Fascist

January 21, 2014 | by Masculate | Link | Original Link

So wrote Sylvia Plath in the unsettling elegy to her father, 'Daddy.' Composed a year before her suicide in 1963, it is probably the most haunting and articulate insight you'll ever read from a girl with severe daddy issues. Otto Plath died when Sylvia Plath was eight, and the poem re-imagines her father as a Nazi and her as a defenseless Jew. Sexual bondage and a yearning for domination abounds:

It stuck in a barb wire snare.
Ich, ich, ich, ich,
I could hardly speak.
I thought every German was you.
And the language obscene

An engine, an engine
Chuffing me off like a Jew.
A Jew to Dachau, Auschwitz, Belsen.
I began to talk like a Jew.
I think I may well be a Jew.

Plath's willing sublimation to her absent father is a topic that has been done to death by academics. Typically, they reach for the easiest go-to theory of modern literary academia: psychoanalysis. But this is no Electra complex. There is no matriarchal competition for her father's affections. It is merely a wrestling with her own identity as the early death of her father leaves her yearning for a strong male presence to fill the vacuum.

Every woman adores a Fascist,
The boot in the face, the brute
Brute heart of a brute like you.

The hundreds of lovers of Benito Mussolini, or Eva Braun, who shot herself in the chest (with her father's pistol – another psychoanalytical field day) in an attempt to gain Adolf Hitler's attention, would no doubt have agreed with this sentiment. And can it be mere coincidence that Gabriele D'Annunzio, one of the forerunners of Italian Fascism, was also one of the most famous seducers of the 20th century? No doubt men of power from every political creed (Stalin and Mao both enjoyed a harem of women) made use of their power to gain notches, but peculiar to Fascism is the submissive adoration it induces in its adherents.

At the heart of this lies a fascination with cruelty. There is the cruelty of socialism that sends millions to its death in the vain hope of engineering a utopian society. And there is the cruelty of the fascist, an unashamedly masculine individual who will go to any lengths to assert his supremacy. Sexual and political domination go hand in hand. Aldous Huxley observed in his foreword to Brave New World that 'As political and economic freedom diminishes, sexual freedom tends compensatingly to increase.'

The direction in the past fifty years of any Western democracy bears out this idea. De Tocqueville's warnings of overly-democratic societies spilling into soft tyrannies is observable in the huge increase in the regulatory power of centralized government, a movement that goes hand-in-hand with our pornified culture where the chasm between procreation and sex is widening. The exception to this is undoubtedly countries ruled under Sharia, but as religious states have always taken particular delight in moderating the sex lives of their citizens, there was little sexual freedom to be diminished at the outset.

I made a model of you,
A man in black with a Meinkampf look
And a love of the rack and the screw.
And I said I do, I do.

There have been numerous observations of late that women can no longer enjoy a good romping without it involving a moderate-to-severe degree of torture. Lefties have attributed this to the violence of internet porn, but the answer is simpler: the sheer number of modern Sylvia Plath's that our culture is churning out – albeit without a modicum of her intelligence. And as marriage continues its precipitous decline, it is difficult to foresee anything but a proliferation of these types.

Is the answer, then, to become the fascist that every woman secretly craves? In the bedroom, if we are to take the Fifty Shades phenomenon at face value, this would seem the thing to do. Outside the bedroom, advancing such political opinions would alienate the vast majority of Western womanhood, and could in Orwellian Europe land you incarcerated in jail for a thought crime, so ultimately it is best to channel the fascist implicitly, not through words but through actions and demonstrating the supremacy of your value over those in your surroundings. To paraphrase Groucho Marx, once you can fake that, you've got it made.

Listen to Plath reading the poem in full. Her tone is a fascinating blend of anger, resentment, resignation, ruefulness, belligerence, and pent-up sexual aggression towards her father. It does almost enough to convince that the only way to ensure a woman is enamored with you is to have her completely brutalized. Now there's a cheering thought.

The 5 Stages Of Nice Guy Grief

January 22, 2014 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

American women have become increasingly brazen about their disdain for 'nice guys.' According to them, he's not a good person but a Nice Guy™ who erects a facade of kindness and empathy to bed women.

After trying and failing to seduce a woman by becoming her 'friend' first, the Nice Guy is apt to doubt his ways. He goes through a progression of emotional stages, in a process similar to how people process grief, known as the Kubler-Ross model.

Stage 0: Being A Nice Guy

He plays the 'friend' for months and years to a girl, in order to date her. To him, seduction is a war of attrition, where he must endure an agonizing wait for weeks and years to claim his pussy prize. He willfully ignores that she sleeps with certain men at the drop of a hat. Lamentably, the vast majority of Nice Guys never really get past this stage.

As men, we want to believe that right action brings worldly reward. If we do the right thing, God will reward us on this Earth. Of course, this is manifestly false—bad things happen to good people. Many religions squared this vexing issue by assuring their followers of a world to come where they would receive their just reward, after their death.

For many men, the idea that evil goes unpunished is just too terrible, so they dream up all manner of superstitions to soothe themselves. The Nice Guy is just the latest to opt for this long and storied tradition. For now though, he'll try and keep that Evil at bay by shielding his female friends from the lotharios lurking about. At least until the female friend gets mad at him for severing her pipeline of player penis, and the friendship explodes in a beautiful fit of dork rage and repressed lust.

Stage 1: Denial

"Of course she wants a nice guy – that's what she always tells me!" "You have to treat a woman well to get with her." "If I'm not nice to her, of course she's not going to want to date me! Being nice is the only way." "It's okay if we're just friends anyway – I promise not to get jealous if she starts dating someone else!"

He only starts making these affirmation because a little part of him wonders if they are true or not. He must assure himself, "Yes, of course they are true!" If he is more intellectually honest, or he has some wise friends, he'll have to give these assurances a closer look. If he stopped claiming that nubile women want nice guys, he would have to undergo a complete transformation – he would have to change who he is. Or swear off women altogether. Neither option is very appealing to him.

Ironically, the Nice Guy's cardinal sin is PRIDE. He is too wrapped up in his own image of himself as a Nice Guy, who will do whatever it takes to earn the lady's heart. The only women who wouldn't want a Nice Guy are not worth talking about, he tells himself. The Nice Guy is like a fat chick – a fat chick will say she doesn't like muscular guys. In reality, every fit man she's ever liked has rejected her, so she protects her ego from future rejection by claiming she doesn't want that kind of man anyway.

Many men get stuck in this stage; they never get the cojones to let their skepticism win out. For a few, the doubt becomes too much, and they relent, and enter the next stage.

Stage 2: Anger

Now our Nice Guy is furious that women don't actually reward men like him. Every time he hears about a woman getting pumped and dumped, or reaching menopause without children, he gets into a righteous fury. "That's what you get for not liking nice guys, you cunt!" "Of course that dumb slut ended up as a broke single mother, bitch deserved it."

Unfortunately, many men never really get past this stage. Even in the manosphere, among self-styled 'Red Pill' men, there is lots of anger. Anger can be a catalyst for good – it can push you to make big rewarding changes, changes that will make your life better.

But when you stew in it day after day without making changes, it becomes almost a default emotion, as can be seen with radical feminists. Anger becomes your comfort zone, and you never really leave it.

We've all known someone who was bitter or dejected all the time. At first it's vexing, because who wants to feel bad all the time? But you start to realize that their negative emotional state, on some morbid level, is what satisfies them. It's now their comfort zone.

Many former Nice Guys reach this point. The anger is no longer a catalyst for self-improvement, but a set of manacles that binds you to failure. When a man is always angry about women fucking 'bad boys,' he is telling the world "I am a weakling and a coward. I am too pussy to move beyond blaming other people for my problems. I am too lazy to change." Naturally, there is a place for criticism of this conduct, but when it is expressed with anger, it betrays a lack of self-mastery.

Stage 3: Bargaining

The Nice Guy isn't ready to accept the full brunt of these new beliefs. Deep down, he's still drawn to his old ways.

"Maybe I can act all aloof until we have our first kiss, and then I can share how I really feel about her, and about the future I have planned for us." "After I insult her a couple times, then I can start writing her the love poetry I've always wanted to." "I understand I have to play 'the bad boy' but when is it safe to be sweet and nurturing? I don't want to have sex with a girl unless I get to cuddle with her before and after."

Of course, his half-assed strategy doesn't work. To be honest, I don't see too much of this mentality – if a man enters this stage at all, he doesn't stay in it for too long. It's more likely that he will regress to an earlier stage, go on to despair, or skip it entirely. Other times, what may seem like bargaining is really just him honing his strategy.

Stage 4: Despair

Despair sets in. "What's the point of having a girlfriend if I can't be the boyfriend I've always wanted to be?" "If being a nice guy is wrong, I don't want to be right." "There's no hope for me if I can't be nice."

We're quick to call a man a bitch for being so weepy, so most men will know better than to air their despair. Usually, the despondent man will sulk in silence. If he speaks up, everyone around will have a good go at mocking him, and telling him what a little bitch he is.

Stage 5: Acceptance

At last, our man accepts that being a Nice Guy simply doesn't make sense. He can choose to be a cad, to emigrate, or to give up on women altogether. All are fine choices, given the circumstances. He lets truth and principle dictate his behavior in equal measure, instead of shielding his pride. He's come to terms with reality, and now he's free. He may have some residual Nice Guy temperament left, but he's mentally ready to trash it as circumstances demand.

And If You're Still Bitching About Women Hating Nice Guys…

Now, it's fine to take issue with how the world is proceeding, especially with how women are behaving. But when a man is consistently angry that women fuck 'bad boys' while ignoring 'nice guys,' he is announcing that he's still a bitch. He is letting other people control his emotions while refusing to take meaningful action. He doesn't have the stoicism, the self-mastery to carve out a path to get what he wants, or give up on trying to get it. He just wants to bitch about what he wants but isn't getting.

I also know these men are not getting laid. If a man says "I don't want to become the kind of man that getting laid would require" – fine, that is an acceptable response – but it requires that you stop giving a fuck about getting laid. Of course, very few men can do that – if you are young and healthy, your sex drive won't allow it. Your lust is going to show one way or another. So these men settle into whining all the time.

I haven't known a single player who was consistently angry. They had their moments, sure, but they wouldn't tolerate failure. They put up or shut up – they didn't half ass it by sticking around to vent and whine. If you find yourself routinely getting angry at people you've never met, it's time for a change.

Stop Dwelling On The Past

By now I'm sure most of you have either heard this phrase or said it to yourself many many times before:

> If only I could go back in time with the knowledge I have now…

But how much different would it really be? How much more success could you really have? Over the holidays I got a glimpse of what it would be like to be "aware" when I was much younger.

I spent a few nights going out with a forum member who was only 20 years old. He was not a natural, but a person who exposed himself to the manosphere and became red pill a few years ago. He put in a lot of time and effort to both study game and to better himself as a person in all facets.

The kid was a beast. He had conquered approach anxiety. He dressed sharp. He escalated fast and aggressively. He was smooth with girls and it showed. I'm sure he is still far from where he wants to be, but he is head and shoulders above what I was at age 20. And now he can take advantage in the pussy playground known as college.

Am I jealous? Hell fucking yes. Who wouldn't want to be this aware at only age 20? I can think of an endless amount of things that I wish I had known, done differently, or could take back. To name a few:

- I wish I knew game in high school
- I wish I knew I was being raised in a feminist-driven world
- I wish I talked to a single girl my first time in Europe
- I wish I studied abroad

- I wish I would have gotten into more sports and lifting as a kid
- I wish I would have gotten into more fights as a kid
- I wish I would have not passed on opportunities to fuck girls while in poor relationships
- I wish I would have not stayed in said poor relationships
- I wish I would have not dated that stripper for an entire year who fucked me on the first night
- I wish I knew what foreign girls were like before my 30s
- I wish I didn't waste my money on a BMW, condo, 3DTV, expensive furniture, and a thousand other things
- I wish I visited Russia before 2010
- I wish I picked up a photography book instead of an LSAT book
- I wish I dragged that girl from Saturday night in the bathroom of the bar
- I wish I would have just said "hi" to the multiple hundreds of girls that I could have but didn't for no good reason

And so on. But that's life and you have to move forward rather than continually looking back. Despite my strongest of wishes to be 20 again, I was genuinely happy heading out with that guy and glad to see someone so young unplugged from the falsities of society.

However, in no way does it mean that people can't unplug at any age. For some it takes a divorce, a cheating girlfriend, or perhaps losing a job. It took a trip to Eastern Europe for me to realize what life should be like. In my short time as an early 30s gentleman I've learned a new language, developed my business, severed ties with everything holding me to my previous location, and bedded more women than ever before.

And while I would have loved for this realization to have come earlier, I'm still thankful I eventually did unplug. Because the sad truth is the majority of your fellow men simply never do.

Self-Improvement Is Not Just For Young Guys

January 22, 2014 | by Patchfur | Link | Original Link

I am writing this article in response to the challenge made by Generation21stCentury a few weeks ago.

Improvement of self must continue up to the moment of death. So much of what has been written here is based on the driving need of young men to develop their skills in order to achieve their goals. Those goals usually include sex with many quality girls, material wealth to enjoy living, and free time to pursue a variety of interests. These are excellent choices and I encourage you to pursue them. This article will show that in most conventionally successful lives there are opportunities for improvement.

I am a 47 year old engineer and project manager. I have worked on industrial mining construction projects all over the world. I owe no money to anyone. I have been married a long time. My five children are almost grown and some are living on their own.

A few years ago I noticed that my few remaining friends in this world were getting divorced. Their reasons were utterly diverse. The end result was always bitter ex-wives, angry ex-husbands, and weeping children. I started looking for reasons and I did not find anything that made sense to me.

I am a farm boy, ex-military, march or die kind of guy. I am acknowledged in my corner of the industry for being that bastard that can turn a construction project profitable if you can stomach the methods. I can make you cry, fire your ass with a smile, and forget your name the moment you are gone. My only regret at the end of most projects is that I wasn't more of a hard-ass. In short, empirical methods that work are king. The final arbiter of success is the scoreboard. Nothing else matters.

Nothing that my conventional Catholic society had to say about divorce made any sense to me, and this filled me with concern. I like my family the way it is. What if there was something I could do to prevent what was happening to everyone I knew from happening to me?

Then, one bitterly cold day at the end of a gloomy November, one of my colleagues rigged up a helium suicide device and killed himself. He was one of the few men I could trust with fire and forget delegation. If he said, "I'll handle it," I trusted him. He had worked for me for years and had a promising career. I was the last person he talked to on his cell phone, and in his note he mentioned that he was afraid he would disappoint me by quitting early.

This guy was tall, good-looking, fit, and well off. No bad habits. He vacationed in Brazil, scuba-dived wrecks in the Caribbean, travelled the world, lived alone in a nice apartment, and had everything he wanted when he wanted it. We tried to drink his booze cabinet dry during his wake and we, two dozen men from the heavy mining construction industry, failed. Why did he check out early? Was it somehow related to the other shattering changes my acquaintances were going through, such as the divorces?

His suicide got me thinking and I decided to dig into alternative resources. I broadened my search for information and discovered the corner of the web that this site is part of. Many issues started making sense to me. Why did so many other men's marriages fail when mine was staying strong? Here is why:

- My wife was a virgin (until she met me) and lived at home until she lived with me.
- She came from a Burmese family that was devoutly Catholic.
- I see no difference between work and home and I run both the same.
- I will not tolerate malicious stupidity from her or the children.
- My wife and children are utterly dependent upon my income. She works at home for me.
- I don't have modern television (or pop culture) in my home because that shit is poison.

I understand that the legal system makes her totally independent and that she can access my income whether I will it or no. But I am the kind of man that she can never replace and thus her hypergamy is satiated. Early in our relationship (before and after we were married) there were several moments where I point-blank told her to comply with my wishes or leave my home. She complied. She is also well aware that I am a vindictive prick that will go to almost any lengths to ensure my will is done. So that makes sense.

But why did my buddy check out? God only knows. I speculate that he felt like a failure for not having a wife and children. He was so "blue pill" that he felt life-ending grade shame for not being able to sacrifice his life to a woman. He had told me and others several times that he wished he could find a wife and have children. He was awkward with women. Despite all of his advantages, he could not get laid in a whorehouse. So he killed himself rather than keep facing that failure.

The world is actually kind of a big place. And we are very small.

I am what you folks refer to as a "blue pill" man, an AFC, if you will. I have only made love to a few women when I was younger and now only to my wife. I have little desire to have sex with many different women, my material wants are satisfied, and I have the resources to enjoy my free time. So what does the “red pill” do for a fellow like me?

My life was not all a bed of roses. I had very few friends. I worked hard for other people. I struggled with erectile dysfunction. My wife had a pretty face I loved, but a chubby body I was not attracted to. I volunteered for churches and other organizations. I accepted these things, even though they made me quite angry, because I thought they were correct. I had been taught, and I accepted, that it was right and proper that I suffer and others benefit, and that I should suffer silently and accept my lot.

What the “red pill” does is make a fellow go, “Well. Fuck that noise.”

I thought about what I wanted. I thought about a friend who ended his life rather than face “blue pill” failure. I thought about missed opportunities and a wasted youth. I thought about a life of ongoing slavery ending in forgetful silence. What did I really want? And I applied my problem solving skills and intelligence to the issue of what I want:

- To have my dick to work again, every time.
- To fuck a beautiful woman regularly, preferably my wife.
- To have good friends again, that I can trust.
- To have less stress, everywhere all the time.
- To start flying aircraft again, like when I was young.
- To stop working to make other people rich, and work for myself.

I set out to achieve all of these things two years ago. Most of it is finished. I quit my job, started consulting, and tripled my income. I sold my house and most of my junk and we live in a smaller, cheaper, and less time-consuming apartment. I purchased an airplane and started flying to interesting places regularly again. I started running and lifting weights and am now in the best shape of my life. I moved to a more centrally located city and stopped spending time with parasites. I set my wife up with a personal trainer, go to the fitness classes with her, and now enjoy how she looks. She learned about healthy cooking, we started eating cleaner, and are reaping the benefits. I work less, have far less stress, and I travel regularly to stay in touch with old friends. My dick works much better. My wife is happy. Her eyes shine as she hesitantly caresses my arm and looks up at me with shy pride.

I took a life that was focussed on working for other people and via self-improvement aimed it at working for myself. I have no regrets whatever. Everyone is better off, not just me, but I am the purpose of my life now. I find more information every day that provides me with opportunities to improve.

You young men learn about the “red pill,” bang the hotties, have fun, and God bless you for doing it. I cannot and will not compete in that arena. I yield that ground. I will take my place in the stands and applaud your victories.

I'm going over there now.

You older men need this. Make your life better. Reject a life of thankless servitude and focus on what you want, while you can. Your life may not be perfect, but you can always make it better.

How To Become An Ironman Or Accomplish Other Goals You Can’t Currently Fathom

January 22, 2014 | by Alex Peck | Link | Original Link

I had let myself go in my early 20’s after starting my career out of college. Smoking a pack of day, eating like crap and not doing any exercising left me in pretty rough shape with the start of a paunch. At the time, I worked with a guy who was working to compete in his first Ironman triathlon; 2.4 mile swim, 112 mile bike and full 26.2 mile marathon. Impressed by this daunting task, I set out to get back into shape and start doing triathlons. Less than three years later, I had qualified for the World Championships in Hawaii at my second Ironman.

So how in the heck did I go from a sloth to being in the top 5% in my age group at one of the most grueling races on the planet in such a short time? The answer was basically hard work, mental perseverance, and preparation. Whether you want to be an Ironman, compete in weightlifting or strongman competitions, or climb a 5.11 ascent, the path to greatness is the same.

1. Start at the beginning and learn your sport; there are no shortcuts

When I started on my triathlon path, I didn’t even know how to swim. In the water, my initial goal was not to drown. To get over this, I used books, DVDs, and a little bit of coaching to build up a swim stroke piece by piece over a period of months. Swimming, like technical weightlifting movements, has a lot of tiny moving parts that you have to get right if you want to be successful. If you want to be mediocre, just jump right in and use bad technique. For triathlon, that equates to slow times, but for other sports like weightlifting, Crossfit or strongman, poor technique could lead to injuries. Break down your movements into small parts; drill those parts over and over again, slowly adding more parts as you become proficient with the foundation. Eventually, you will have a competent movement or skill that at least will allow you to at least compete at an average level.

2. Stretch the rubber band

While I've known a few people who decided that their first triathlon would be Ironman distance, most take the approach of smaller steps to the goal. For one thing, it takes a long time to build your body up to something big. Whether it's snatching your bodyweight, or a twice bodyweight squat, or a six-hour bike ride you don't just start out going big unless you want to end up injured and back where you started. Slowly extend your training sessions or add weight to your lifts, and build in recovery. Recovery isn't just eating well with good protein, but it means limiting the amount of stress you have in your life and getting sleep. If you keep adding volume to your training sessions without built-in deload or recovery weeks, you'll actually take longer to reach your goals. With that said, your body is capable of things you never believed if you take care of it. Less than two years after taking that initial step to get off the couch, I completed my first Ironman and even then barely missed the cut off for Kona. Think big, even when starting out.

3. Set small goals

You may not know what your "big" goal is when you are just starting out, but you can certainly set small goals that take you higher along each step of the path. Without goals to hit, it can be very easy to mentally stagnate. Goal accomplishments, even small ones, give you that psychological boost that you need to keep on trucking, especially on days when you don't really feel like it. Goals need to be specific, attainable and in a set time frame or they aren't worth much. Saying you want to get stronger isn't a goal, it's a wish. A small goal may be to complete your first triathlon by June , or adding 10 pounds to your squat in a month, or learning how to properly squat clean or snatch. Each small goal is a step to the slightly bigger goals of adding 25 pounds to your squat or hitting a two-times bodyweight deadlift.

4. Track your progress

Not only is progress tracking necessary to learn what works and what doesn't, thereby allowing you to tweak your training, it is important from a psychological perspective as well. If you have ever competed in anything, you know that failure often sticks in our minds much more than success. So if you have a really poor lifting or training session, you'll be disappointed and maybe question your abilities to be successful. But if you were to look at your training logs, you'd see firsthand the progress you've already made which can be a motivating factor. Be aware that the better you get at a sport, the slower the gains will be.

That first year of lifting, running, BJJ or triathlon you'll go from knowing and being nothing, to actually having something to hang your hat on. After that, things often slow down and when tracking your progress, you may be discouraged by how long things are taking. Don't be; you've wrung out the newbie gains and are now into the area where you really have to work to make progress. The weak will give up at this stage, the strong-minded will power through this to the next level.

5. Nothing replaces hard work, consistency and time

If you want to be good at something, especially something as large as an Ironman, there is no escaping hard work and patience. You change the way your whole body operates, establishing movement patterns, training your heart to pump blood efficiently to feed your movements. Training through low motivation periods are necessary, as are grinding through periods where it looks like you aren't making much progress. Muscles get stronger; technique improves if you continue to drill small parts; aerobic and anaerobic capacity increases. Large goals are as much about mental perseverance they are physical. Try to combat the lulls and boredom by introducing entertaining workouts and keeping things positive. But at the end of the day, you have to work long and hard to attain a large goal.

6. Set large goals

I knew early on that I wanted to do Ironman, and wanted to be competitive at that distance. Once that was established, all my small goals led to the large goal. I started my training plan 1.5 years prior to my first attempt at the race, building my base and body, and stretching out what I could do even that far in advance. I was successful because I did things others didn't or wouldn't do, such as indoor biking for 4-6 hours at a time in my cold weather climate. Training camps and seeking coaching at various points also helped keep me motivated and increased my abilities. Be patient as you work toward the end goal and enjoy the small victories along the way.

7. Mentally prepare

Preparing all your equipment is the start of this, but visualizing your event cannot be understated. You can set up scenarios in your mind and develop contingency plans for when things start to go awry. Also, you can mentally prepare yourself to be calm in heightened state and stick with the plan. When you find yourself in the heat of the actual moment, you've already done the race or event in your head hopefully multiple times and can continue to execute at a high level with very limited mental energy.

8. Race or competition day

By the time you get to the actual large event that you've been working towards for months, if not years, you simply need to show up and execute. The hay is in the barn, so go out and enjoy the fruits of your labor. One thing I've found that translates to an all-day Ironman event equally as well as a two-day Crossfit competition is pacing. You are going to be ramped up with adrenaline pumping, as well as rested and ready for action. You'll feel as fresh and as strong as you ever have if you've trained and tapered properly. Most people will start out way too fast, blowing their load in the first quarter or third of any event. If you start out slower than you think you can go, settle into a groove and maintain that pace (or even increase) you're going to find much more success on game day. Finally, don't underestimate nutrition for any large event, and practice that nutrition in training to make sure it sits and digests well in higher stress situations.

Working toward something big that most people can't even fathom is something most men should reach for at least once in their life. Whether you hit your goal and perform as expected is moot, as the journey and pushing yourself to your limits is part of the very definition of being a man. Don't settle for being average; instead find something that allows you to be awesome, starting today.

How To Still Game With Acne

January 23, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

It’s time to bust open the doors on gaming and address the elephant in the room: how does a guy with acne go out and successfully approach girls? Unless you have the skin of a newborn and have never had a pimple in your life, then you know that dreaded feeling of waking up one morning and looking in the mirror in horror at the planet of a pimple that has decided to wreak havoc on your weekend plans.

I have never seen anyone lay out a plan on how to deal with this very real ‘problem’, so here is a breakdown on what to do. Whether you struggle with having acne or you get the occasional blemish, it’s time for men to have a blueprint for gaming success, regardless of the condition of their skin.

Popular Pete vs. Pimply Paul

Pete and Paul both have acne. Oddly enough, Pete is quite popular among his social circles and still pulls girls frequently despite having acne. Although he has acne similar to Pete’s, Paul is shunned by people and never gets laid. What is the difference?

The key to Pete’s success, despite his flaw, is that he doesn’t allow a skin blemish to wreck his confidence. Obviously, having acne can hurt one’s confidence, but here is where the difference is: Pete’s confidence comes from WITHIN. He is not basing the entirety of his confidence on his external looks. This principle is similar to when you see an average looking guy who is overweight, pull like Derek Jeter at a Victoria Secret Fashion Show. The overweight guy has rock-solid confidence and confidence is the #1 Most Attractive Quality to a female.

The lack of success on Paul’s part with women and being popular is that he allows his acne to DEFINE who he is. Let’s face it (no pun intended), acne sucks. It’s annoying as fuck.

My Story

While I was never hit with extreme acne, I know what it feels like to have breakouts that caused me to stay confined in my pad and not resurface until it cleared up. The key for me overcoming this, was what happened on my high school graduation day.

Yep, the day of graduation I woke up to a small planet sized pimple right on my fucking nose. Panic hit me like never before. I couldn't fucking believe it. This wasn't a date I could reschedule. Fuck my life I thought. Add to this, that I was giving a speech to the entire school!

Panicked I ripped through my mother's makeup drawer trying to find some cover-up that would minimize the redness of the pimple. Nothing matched. I paused for a second and looked in the mirror silently cursing the Pimple god's for smiting me with this on this very important day. Then it struck me: No way in hell was I going to allow this fucking skin eruption to fuck up a very important day for me. "I'm Christian fuckin McQueen", I thought, "Fuck this pimple. I'm going to rock this speech and have a great day regardless".

I delivered a speech that was talked about for literally years after. I had almost every parent in the audience in tears and a pack of girls waiting off the stage when I walked off to greet me and offer congratulations for kicking serious ass. There was never a mention of the pimple and by the reactions of the girls, I'm not sure if they even noticed. I had an amazing high school graduation and the pimple never got in the way.

A man must define himself by his inner confidence. It's true that outward looks, strength, money and status can build your confidence, but it must be grounded in knowing your worth no matter what. Start by knowing your worth and really believing that you have high value. This inner strength will radiate externally and those stubborn skin problems won't get in the way as much as you think.

Make A Plan To Get Your Skin Clear

With all the products out there, start experimenting with different skin cleaners. If you have extreme acne, then consult with a dermatologist and find out what your options are. If you have acne and you just let it go, without addressing your diet and skin rituals, than that's pure laziness. Don't let acne handicap you, but be taking active steps to get your skin clear for YOURSELF.

One trick that worked for me, was juicing. I would juice carrots and bell peppers and drink one glass every night. Talk about clearing my skin up! Also, ProActive worked for me. It may not work for everyone, but look into different options and make a plan for skin success.

Having acne for some will be a struggle to get rid of, however, don't stop gaming or refuse to leave the house. Embrace the problem and be social, because I can guarantee that if you can be confident with acne, your game will skyrocket even more when your skin is clear. Finding strength in weakness will only cause you to be even stronger.

To recap:

- Acne sucks dick, BUT, don't let it define you.
- Work on building your confidence, DESPITE the acne.
- Make a plan to get your skin clear and stick to it.
- A confident man with acne will be more attractive to a girl, than a clear skinned yellow belly limp wristed un-confident guy. How do I know? Because I've experienced it.

Lastly, have you ever heard of the writer and motivational speaker Nick Vujicic? This guy doesn't have arms or legs and still pulled a fine ass girl who has now become his wife. Look at this pic and then think about your acne…sobering isn't it? We have no excuses.

Publisher’s Response To “Girls With Short Hair Are Damaged”

January 23, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Yesterday, Tuthmosis’ article Girls With Short Hair Are Damaged went viral on Facebook and Twitter. We did not expect this to happen because after his last article went viral, female activists on Change.org and Jezebel implored the world never to link to us again. We thought our little web site would fade into obscurity, receiving maybe 10 visits a day, but as you can see from this live Twitter feed, there is something in the ether that irresistibly compels young Western women to share our elite wisdom. As of this writing, Tuthmosis’ article has received over 27,000 Facebook likes and received nearly 3,500 comments.

While reading the angry comments yesterday, a part of my heart did warm to their concerns. Tuthmosis probed their happy existence without their consent by making a comment about the attractiveness of women with certain hairstyles. He linked one of their physical features (short hair) to physical behaviors (psychosis, derangement). Was that mean? Did he intend to hurt the feelings of innocent women? I meditated on these questions for some time, using the following pictures to help me in my quest for the most objective answer possible:

I also called up one of my Ukrainian lady friends and asked for her opinion. I like talking to her because she is agreeable, feminine, and doesn’t interrupt me when I’m talking. Here is a picture of us by the Black Sea:

Lastly, I reminisced on previous women I have had sex with (it took about four hours), trying to see if I could identify a pattern that matches with Tuthmosis' analysis. After prolonged and vigorous deep thought, I have come to the following conclusion:

Tuthmosis has understated how utterly damaged short-haired women are. Run, run far away from them.

Don't believe me? Look at the live Twitter response feed. Tuthmosis may have been too nice. To make yourself ugly, and then try to convince the world that you're in fact beautiful, or that you don't need a man to find you attractive at all, is so delusional that the ROK executive team is currently reaching out to the best mental health professionals in Moldova so that these women can get the help that they desperately need. (At the same time, I have since held a private meeting in the ROK office with Tuthmosis to encourage him to not write with such a polite filter that makes him hesitant to offend the female sex.)

Sadly, the women who are blasting us right now with vulgar speech and masculine manner are treading the line of self-mutilation with their pixie cuts. If you know a girl who has voluntarily chopped off such a reliable indicator of female beauty and fertility, nothing short of an intervention with all family and friends is necessary to force the victim to grow her hair back out.

I part now with a message of hope. Women: unless you have a smushed pig face, your attractiveness increases at least 6% for every inch your hair passes your shoulders. Don't listen to people who are trying to sabotage your beauty by encouraging you to adopt a lesbian haircut. We are the only ones who will be brutally honest with you. We are not shy to state where objective female beauty comes from, unlike the saboteurs in your life who are just trying to make it harder for you to find a good husband. And for those of you especially sick women who think that you are going to punish us by cutting your hair, you’re only punishing yourself. Being lonely and having to settle for a brood of cats is not a good life for a woman, but that’s what will happen if you keep your hair short. May the peace be with you.

How Women Train Men To Rape

January 23, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

During sex, I heard a faint whisper of “no” from the woman below me. I stopped thrusting immediately.

“Do you want me to stop?” I asked.

“No,” she said. She looked confused. “Don’t stop.”

I resumed cautiously. When she moaned, I felt her pussy convulse and picked back up full speed, reaching down to run my hands over her thin body and perky breasts. Suddenly, her wrists flew up in front of her. She meekly pushed against me, whimpering, “no, no, no!”

I stopped again, and jumping back. “What? What’s wrong?”

“Nothing. Why are you stopping?”

“You said no. When you say no, I stop.”

“Well… I was kind of hoping you’d keep going and just take me. I thought you were dominant?”

How Women Encourage Rape

As someone who’d always been taught “no means no,” to have a woman directly tell me she ways saying “no” when she meant “yes” was shocking. From talking with other men, I’ve learned this is a fairly common experience.

It’s so common, Louis CK has a standup routine about it:

There’s a word for this. Rape training.

Women who say ‘no’ when they mean ‘yes’ encourage men to rape. They teach men that no doesn't mean no, that women's desires should be ignored, and that if men can get laid if they push through women's boundaries.

The woman in my opening story was being extremely selfish. She expected me to know what she wanted while directly telling me the exact opposite. If I misread her desires, or she changed her mind about the experience later, I risk decades in jail and living the rest of my life as a sex offender. By saying 'no' when she didn't mean it, she put my safety at risk.

Furthermore, this woman enacted a rape fantasy on me without my consent. I never directly agreed to the intense BDSM play she started. She never told me she what she was doing or gave me a safeword. I might have had triggers around fear of hurting women, or saw a close family member raped. This was the second time we'd had sex. Assuming I'd want to participate in a rape fantasy with her was itself an act of rape and a violation of my boundaries.

Women's False No's Harm Everyone

I know some of you will say I shouldn't complain. After all, I had an attractive woman in bed, who wanted me to take her. If I only saw women as sex objects I wouldn't care, but the idea of another person being harmed because of her actions makes me physically sick.

By giving a false 'no,' this woman diminished the power of other women's real 'no.' I'm probably not the first man she's given a false 'no' to. Another man might learn from her that 'no' actually means 'take me hard' and force himself on his next date when she gives a genuine 'no.' He would go to jail and she would be traumatized and raped.

My date's behavior puts other women at risk, and shows she considers her sexual pleasure more important than others consent or safety.

Why Women Lie About Their Desires

Why would a woman behave this way? My date considered herself a feminist. Before she left, she told me she'd attended rallies and protests. Wouldn't she of all people understand that "no means no?"

Saying "no" when she means yes absolves the woman of responsibility for her actions. She can decide later whether or not she meant her no, and have the man arrested for rape if he won't have sex with her again, if her friends and family judge her, or if her boyfriend discovers she was cheating on him. She doesn't feel like a slut, because isn't consciously choosing sex. "It just happened."

If her goal as a feminist was to help other women, she'd own her sexual desires, and ask directly for what she wanted. Doing so would teach men that when they listen to women, they are rewarded with mind-blowing sex. If her goal as a feminist was to avoid ever having to take responsibility for her actions, she'd do exactly what she did. Saying 'no' when she means 'yes' teaches men to ignore what women say and look for advice from "creepy" internet sites that write about game.

Pick-up artists have known for a long time women will protest before sex, even when they want it, to avoid appearing like a slut. There is a whole subset of game dealing with "last-minute-resistance" and "anti-slut defenses." Feminists criticize these tactics as being akin to rape, but they wouldn't exist if women's words matched their actions.

BDSM Requires Consent

I understand the desire to be taken, or make a rape fantasy "feel real," but BDSM is actually hyper-consensual. Before a scene, partners will spell out exactly what they are okay with, what they aren't, and pick a "safe-word" to say in place of "no" if they want their partner to stop.

An example of BDSM done right would be a female friend of mine who asked her boyfriend to enter her window and take her in the middle of the night. She told him she'd leave her window unlocked, say "red" if she wanted him to stop, and to surprise her by not telling what night of the week it would be.

After four nights of sleepless anticipation, her boyfriend entered at three in the morning, wearing only a ski mask and forced her to the ground as tears streamed down her face. She said it was the best sexual experiences of her life.

How Should You Respond

When a woman says no, you should always stop even if you think she doesn't mean it.

No one is a mind reader. We won't always be able to correctly read a woman's unspoken desires. The risk of actually harming a woman or being arrested for rape outweighs the pleasure of a night of sex with a selfish human being.

After my date told she hoped I'd push through her 'no,' I told her that even if she doesn't care about consent, I do. I explained safe words to her, and told her if she wanted to do a rape fantasy, she needed to pick a word other than 'no' to say in it's place, so that if I accidentally hurt her, or she genuinely wanted me to stop, she'd have a way of communicating that to me.

Yes, I – a writer for Return of Kings – had to educate a feminist about consent, because she wanted me to rape her so bad. I struggle to find a joke that could possibly express the absurdity of the truth. If there is a God, he trolls us all.

I asked her a specific questions about her boundaries. Is she okay with anal? Getting slapped in the face? Choking? Being verbally degraded? I wanted to be very clear about what she was asking for. I'm a six foot tall man with background in the BDSM community. I could go to extremes she isn't even aware of. I've seen people play with fire sexually. (Not metaphorical. I've seen a leather-clad woman singe the hair off a man's chest with spinning orbs of flame as he screamed in terror from behind a gimp mask. It was awesome.)

Once we were clear on boundaries and safewords, I grabbed her wrists, pinned them to the bed, and forced my cock inside her. She shouted no and smiled at me as her attempts to push me away ground her pussy against me. I slapped her hard across the face, and pulled her nipples into the air. She shrieked as I flipped her over and called her a worthless slut, while fingering her ass and fucking her pussy simultaneously. We both orgasmed multiple times.

When she got home, she texted me "thanks for letting me be your slave :)." I never called her back.

Girls With Skrillex Haircuts Are Like Sick Parrots

January 24, 2014 | by Glaucon | Link | Original Link

There is a curiously disturbing sickness in parrots where they pluck their own feathers out.

Why does this happen? According to the University of California (pdf):

> Feather-picking can occur for a variety of reasons.. medical and behavioral. Medical causes of feather-picking include poor diet, exposure to toxins, infection…parasites, or other diseases.
> Behavioral causes of feather-picking may include stress from various sources, including lack of stimulation ('boredom'), sleep deprivation,and sexual frustration. Boredom may result from lack of appropriate toys, not enough foraging opportunities, or not enough interaction with other individuals (human or avian)…"

Don't these problems seem familiar to you in the women you meet with Skrillex haircuts? When I first saw the pictures of Game Of Thrones actress Natalie Dormer sporting this new "style," the parrot illness immediately popped into my mind. Here's how she looked with long hair (I would bang):

But now? Not even with a stick:

This is far worse than merely having short hair. A shaved head screams that there is something mentally ill with the girl, especially if she did it to herself intentionally. The university paper has recommendations to solve this problem:

> How do I manage my feather-picking bird?
> -Balanced diet
> -Good sleep

> -Regular bathing
> -Reduce stress
> -Proper mental stimulation
> -Reduce sexual frustration
> -Medical intervention

Women may think I'm making fun of them with this parrot analogy, but I am not. It's simply a warning that they are alienating themselves from this world and need help.

Men are becoming wise to the problems that women with Skrillex haircuts have. It's an iceberg indicator of mental complications that are too immense for any one man to deal with. Some fault for this should be placed on those who lied to women with shaved heads that it looks "cute." The ROK team are probably the first humans who bravely object to what—let's be honest—amounts to self-mutilation.

The lies given to shaved women were not intentional. But nevertheless they were lies. We know this because we as men have been lied to as well, about education, career, and relationships. This web site deconstructs lies to help both men and women fulfill their natural roles.

If you are still in doubt about how lies affect women, check out these sad cases of women who found out the truth too late:

- They never told you that adulthood was this fucking lonely (30, female divorced)
- Any woman who says she's happy to be childless is a liar or a fool (woman regrets abortion at 18)
- Women discovers that viewing men as "sperm donors" was a surefire way to fail the dating game

There are always two sides of the coin, and those two sides represent two different outcomes. If you're a woman, read the stories above, and decide which side of the coin you want to end up on. Ignore what men prefer and find attractive at your own peril.

The Thrill Of The Mountain Makes You A Man

January 24, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

The smell of the woods and fresh running water. The hurt and pain of climbing uphill. The thrill as you cut back and forth amongst the trail, flicking your handlebars with precision to avoid the obstacles in your path (or, depending on your level of crazy, to run them right over). The way your stomach drops as you launch off of a jump. The adrenaline coursing through your veins as you tackle the challenges of your local single track trail.

Welcome to the world of mountain biking.

For fellow adrenaline junkies, mountain biking is a fantastic way to get your fix of crazy, nearly-death-defying action. Compared to other adrenaline activities, such as skydiving and bungee-jumping, mountain biking is much more convenient and accessible for the majority of people. I have half a dozen trails within a half hour drive of my house, and I live in the middle of a big city (San Diego).

In addition to that, mountain biking gives you a certain level of control that other adrenaline sports just don't give you. It is you who is responsible for maintaining your bike, picking the right line down the trail, and for deciding how many risks you want to take.

One of the best things about mountain biking though is that it simply makes you feel like a man.

Risk

There's nothing quite like going off a jump, or around a sharp corner, and realizing…you don't really know what's on the other side of it. While I would not consider myself a huge daredevil (in comparison to some of my nutty friends), there is a certain thrill you get by taking a risk like that. It makes you feel alive, knowing that one bad maneuver, or slightly misplaced tire, could send you into a nasty crash.

You should always ride within your abilities, but you should always push those abilities to the limit. You know what comfort is? Mediocrity simply hiding in disguise. Being out there in the dirt and pushing yourself to the brink will allow you to tackle the rest of the challenges in your life with the swagger you need to be successful.

Fitness – High Intensity Interval Training

As I've written in my articles about preparing for your first triathlon and racing in your first triathlon, I've been doing endurance sports for quite a few years. However, there are few things that put me into the red zone faster than a hilly cross-country mountain bike ride.

In mountain biking, there tends to be very few points in which you aren't going either up or down. The places that are flat are boring. Either you're climbing upwards at steep gradients, or you're descending downhill, which usually has your heart rate up, too.

Mountain biking is a great way to get in some quick and dirty cardio, and I personally have always found that sprints and intervals get me into far better shape than slow and steady training. Unless you're racing competitively though, don't push yourself so hard that you don't enjoy it.

Last weekend, for example, I went out riding with three buddies from work. We started at the bottom, and climbed our way to the top of the mountain — roughly 6.5 miles with an average gradient between 12-13%. It was not an easy climb. After we went down the hill, we spent the next couple hours shuttling ourselves back to the top, rotating the two cars, so that we could just point our handlebars downhill and take…risks.

They would've been happy to shuttle from the start, but I insisted we'd better earn all the free downhill rides by climbing it at least once.

Man and Machine

Pictures like the above depict the amazing level of technology that is contained in a 30 pound mountain bike these days. You've got hydraulic brakes, shocks, and parts of carbon fiber scattered throughout the frame and components. My 2013 mountain bike probably contains more technology in it than the car I drove in college.

There is something very satisfying about maintaining, practicing, and mastering your mountain bike. Those of you with sports cars will understand. It's as if you speak the same language – in which your bike understands the slight movements and adjustments you make, and it does them in sync with you, rather than fighting you. You feel one with your machine.

Comraderie

While there certainly are girls that are into mountain biking, and some that are damn fast at it, mountain biking is a dominantly male sport. Many of the pussy-whipped men at my office look forward to our weekly rides, because it's practically the only time they're allowed to leave the house. It's understood that it's a time for to get dirty, sweat, and be men. Afterwards, we all drink beers and bullshit.

If you're really badass, you can fill your hydration pack with beer and drink that throughout your ride.

Beer, friends, fancy bikes, and dangerous stunts.

What more do you need as a man?

Interested? What's Best For You?

If this article intrigued you to check our your local trail, here's a quick guide to acronyms of the different types of mountain bikes you will encounter. Many local bike shops have "trail demo" days in which they bring various bikes out to the trail for you to test ride, and that will be a better test of what is best for you than any guide you'll find on any website.

XC (Cross Country)

These are the lightest bikes you'll encounter on the market and are designed for what is commonly referred to as cross-country riding. These bikes handle moderate levels of terrain and will climb better than the other types. They contain both hardtail (no rear suspension) and full-suspension models.

Trail

These are very similar to XC bikes, but with more cushion. They will handle downhill descents and soak up more feedback from the trails. I'd consider these to be the most versatile type of mountain bikes.

FR/DH (Freeride/Downhill)

Not for the faint of heart. These are for the crazies that want to jump off cliffs and live to tell the tale. Not the first mountain bike you ever want to ride.

AM (All Mountain)

This is what I ride, personally. AM bikes are beefed up more than Trail bikes to handle the downhill, but are still designed to climb well due to the way the geometry is often positioned. In addition, many of them have adjustable, on-the-fly gadgets to control the way the bike feels. If I flip the knob up, it stiffens the rear suspension, which makes climbing easier. When I'm ready to go downhill, I flip the knob down and my rear shock maxs back out.

So, take a risk and head out to your local trail. Being a man is all about taking risks and living live on the edge.

Ride safe, but more importantly, ride hard.

5th Gen War Is Already Here

All is fair in love and war so you better be ready for anything. The nature and mindset of conflict is always changing so a wise man should be cognizant of possible future developments. One rubric that delineates the advances of modern war is the generational concept. According to most scholars fourth generation is here and fifth generation is currently in its developing stages. I believe that fifth generational warfare is where the principal actors (whether they have a state behind them or not) will target each other directly instead of going after their followers or support structures.

Allow me to give you a brief history and to give credit to where credit is due for this concept of generational warfare. The two main sources I've read about it to date are Marine Corps Gazette, and The Sling and The Stone by Colonel Thomas X. Hammes. While the various authors contributing on the generations of warfare have disagreements about fourth and fifth generation, most of their points are valid. I believe some of them might be limited by what they say by their present employers and sometimes might say things to go along with the party line. The biggest disagreement I have with that consensus on generational warfare is its start point being recent and not including the classical world and that developments are linear.

Here is a quick overview from Wikipedia on what generations one through four are:

> First generation In its most common usage, "First generation warfare" refers to battles fought with massed manpower, using line and column tactics with uniformed soldiers governed by the state.
> Second generation warfare is the tactics of warfare used after the invention of the rifled musket and breech-loading weapons and continuing through the development of the machine gun and indirect fire.
> Third generation warfare focuses on using speed and surprise to bypass the > enemy's lines and collapse their forces from the rear. Essentially, this was the end of linear warfare on a tactical level, with units seeking not simply to meet each other face to face but to outmaneuver each other to gain the greatest advantage.

> Fourth-generation warfare is conflict characterized by a blurring of the lines between war and politics, soldier and civilian. In terms of generational modern warfare, the fourth generation signifies the nation states' loss of their near-monopoly on combat forces, returning to modes of conflict common in pre-modern times.

Fifth Generation

The lines between generations are always blurred and no one really knows a one begins and one ends. Therefore I believe methods and ideas of conflict are cyclical depending on the systems available and the politics behind them. The concept of rigid generations in war is a sandbox constructed by some scholars for various reasons. One reason is to discount the application of certain examples that have occurred in the classical world that do not support the generational concept. Another is it makes things trendy and trendy things get published. Third reason is that justifies certain military procurement and training budgets and allows for the payment of certain favored contractors.

There is actually some benefits to labeling wars by the generational rubric. As a sort of play on the rocks paper scissors game, industrialized nations tend to play first , second and third generation war better than the Third World. The later generations of warfare tend to be favorable to the side willing to bend or break the rules.

If a first world military is finding itself bogged down playing by the rules of the enemy, you could tell the nation behind it really isn't too serious about winning. Hiding among the civilian population is not really too helpful to a combatant if his opponent is willing to level the city he is hiding in. But war is not always exclusively about the conflict between two parties. There are many second and third order effects the shot callers are always looking out for. These can include political talking points, economic policies, social policies, triangular diplomacy and market manipulation. The rise of the fifth generational warfare mindset is a fundamental change because traditionally the power players sending the troops to the field refrained directly attacked each other.

Recent History

One of the earliest recent examples I believe of the fifth generation mindset would be the assassination of Pablo Escobar. He was reportedly shot by a Delta Force sniper according to Mark Bowden's book Killing Pablo. While exactly who killed him is not definite, he was targeted because he was a shot caller in a very big organization that the "War on Drugs" worked against. While there are other examples that can be arguable be fifth generational warfare further in the past such as the assassination of Admiral Yamamoto I do not consider these fifth generational warfare because they were smaller engagements within a wider war that didn't actually change the mindset of the leadership. They tended to be one off lucky hits instead of an adoption of a darker strategy.

While at this point people can argue things in Colombia are just counter drug police operations, the actions of certain non state actors has transformed from getting attention, to taking hostages, to killing as many people as possible, to killing higher status people and symbols. A good example of this would be Al Qaeda targeting of the Pentagon on September 11 . That 757 could kill far more people if it hit something else. Also the hit on Massoud in Afghanistan was the application of fifth generational warfare to remove him from the board before any hostilities kicked off in that country.

Fifth generational warfare is not a linear development. It tends to be what works at the time. Remember back in 1991, General Colin Powell explained to the world that removing Saddam Hussein from the board would be a bad move. Flash forward to 2003 and the opening shots of the Second Gulf War included an attempted strike at Saddam himself. Tthe United States attempt at the fifth generational idea of going after the leadership was not exclusively one-sided. The assassination of Sérgio Vieira de Mello, by the notorious Abu Musab al-Zarqawi by way of a truck bomb shows another side of that conflict also utilized the fifth generational mindset. It can be argued that that hit actually changed the future of leadership in the United Nations.

More recent examples of targeting the principal actors that make policies and decisions instead of their forces in the field pop up in Libya, Pakistan, and Afghanistan. The killing of Osama Bin Laden is a very good example of fifth generational warfare being about targeting principals. While it is a tragedy that such a dedicated public servant such as Ambassador Stevens was killed, the application of fifth generational warfare in that case sent shock waves throughout Washington. A lot of denizens of that city seemed more affected by that death then they did for all the 18-year-old's that signed up for college money. Ambassador Stevens was a major player in the whole overthrow of Colonel Muammar Gaddafi and it appears he made the mistake of seeing that conflict as black and white between only two sides. A very recent example would be the Taliban attack on a restaurant frequented by the power players from the West. Just the fact I read about it when news on Afghanistan doesn't tend to make the front page anymore indicates they most likely got some important people. UPDATE: one of the victims was the International Monetary Fund's country director, Wabel Abdallah.

The Future

So what does this concept of fifth generational warfare mean for the future? It means many things. One is leadership on both sides of any conflict are going to take more measures to protect themselves from personal attack. These measures may or may not be politically and socially acceptable. It also mean the power players in the future would actually have to consider gambling with their own blood . This will cut down on war hawks, jingoism and recreational wars. There might also be a revival certain concepts that have not been used since World War II, mainly the threat of eradication. That is what finally broke the Japanese will. The sobering reality of nuclear fire convinced Emperor Hirohito it was time to throw in the towel. It should be interesting if the WWE's Hardcore Championship concept of "any time, any place" is applied to world politics.

Mike Tyson Speaks The Undisputed Truth

> "I am the best ever, I am the most brutal and the most vicious and most ruthless champion there has ever been, there is no one that could stop me. Lennox is a conqueror? No! I am Alexander, he is no Alexander. I am the best ever, there has never been anybody as ruthless. I am Sonny Liston, I am Jack Dempsey, there is no one like me, I am from their cloth. There is no one that can match me, my style is impetuous, my defense is impregnable and I am just ferocious, I want your heart, I want to eat his children, praise be to Allah!"

Tyson was a smelly kid, an ugly kid; no one wanted him. So Tyson became a bad kid. He learned early on that in the fast, materialistic, life of the hood he could gain acceptance only through crime. He stole anything he could get his hands on and eventually found a group of older neighborhood kids who taught him to break and enter. He finally had the nice clothes, the watches, and most importantly the acceptance of his peers. This didn't last long as after multiple arrests Tyson was sent upstate to a reformatory where his life was changed forever.

Enter Bobby Stewart, ex national amateur champion. On weekends Stewart helped the children vent their frustration by boxing them. 170 lbs of Irish fury vs. a 13 year old kid. Tyson had his ass beat, but in this he found a focus. Stewart admired Tyson's dedication and natural skill so he brought him to see Cus D'Amato. With this act Tyson's life was changed forever.

A Mentor Is Necessary For Success

The first time Cus D'Amato saw Mike Tyson box he knew he was watching the future heavyweight champion of the world. Cus took Mike into his home and nearly overnight Tyson was a changed kid. He was 100% dedicated to the art of boxing. He spent all of his waking hours watching old fight videos, shadow boxing, and reading about the greats. He idolized these men and wanted to be them. Cus fed Mike all of his wisdom and molded Mike's mind to be a spartan warrior. To be a savage one-focused knockout machine. He did this through teaching Tyson the power of self-talk, affirmations, visualization, and overcoming your emotions. Cus D'Amato taught Mike Tyson that discipline and focus was the holy road to victory. The blank slate impressionability of youth yields nothing without the right direction.

Cus on Fear:

> "Fear is the greatest obstacle to learning. But fear is your best friend. Fear is like fire. If you learn to control it, you let it work for you. If you don't control it, it'll destroy you and everything around you. Like a snowball on a hill, you can pick it up and throw it or do anything you want with it before it starts rolling down, but once it rolls down and gets so big, it'll crush you to death. So one must never allow fear to develop and build up without having control over it, because if you don't you won't be able to achieve your objective or save your life."

> "Doing something you hate to do like you love it is good conditioning for someone aspiring towards greatness"

People Are Vultures Who Will Scavenge You While Down

It wasn't long before Mike Tyson was on an exponential trajectory toward the top. He was obliterating nearly all of his opponents and was further being lead by Cus and his vision. Cus may have been selfish in that he wanted the glory of training the heavyweight champion of the world, but he loved Mike Tyson he always had the best in mind. This isn't the case with nearly every other person Mike Tyson encountered on his rise to the top and subsequent fall. Cus died before Mike Tyson became the undisputed heavyweight champion of the world. Cus' drive was still instilled in Tyson, giving him purpose. He won the title for Cus, but what was next? Hyhenas in human skin circled Tyson, they could smell the weakness, the decay of desire, and the jumped in tearing him apart.

Aside from the sleazy promoters, managers, and trainers who saw Tyson as nothing more than a money making machine, his biggest problems were with women. He never knew how to act around them. He grew up seeing his mother pour boiling water on a cheating lover and then hanging out with her prostitute friends. In his time with Cus, Tyson was banned from getting any pussy. So whats a famous teenaged millionaire to do? He obliged to every woman throwing herself at him and it yielded nothing but trouble. His life was studded with sexual assault lawsuits. He'd have to pay women he'd never even touched tens of thousands of dollars so they do not bring a case to court. But the two women who fucked him the most were his first wife Robin and a false rape accuser Desiree Washington.

> "I got married to Robin because she was pregnant and I was thrilled to become a father. That's the only reason. The problem was that Robin didn't tell me she was pregnant. Jimmy Jacobs did. And he found out when Ruth, Robin's mother, called him to tell him. I didn't know it at the time, of course, but it was all bullshit. Robin > was never pregnant."

On the mother of one of his children:

> "I was going to prison, so I called Natalie, the mother of my son D'Amato. 'Listen I'm going to send you a hundred thousand dollars now. Then when I'm in there I'll have them send you something every month.' As soon as she got that money, she went out and got a lawyer and sued me for millions."

Image Is Everything

One of the defining moments in Tyson's life is the controversy over his imprisonment for the alleged rape of Desiree Washington. In the book there is an extensive account of the trial and Tyson's side of the story. Tyson claims he invited her over late one night and met no resistance. After sex he dissed her and as a result she cried rape. Both the prosecution and the defence were shaky, but the factor that led to Iron Mike's incarceration was the public's image of him as well as the presented image of his accuser.

Due to the 'rape shield' law – a law in which a woman's sexual past cannot be used against her in a rape trial – the prosecution was able to paint Desiree as "some shy, naive college student who was a Sunday school teacher and an usher at her church."

Along with this fact the legal teams involved couldn't even comprehend the claims of bestial sexuality by Tyson. They "made a big deal out of the fact that when I said, "I want to fuck you," an eighteen-year-old would never answer, "Fine, call me."" and were baffled when Tyson claimed he ate Desiree out for 20 minutes claiming "his description of the event veered wildly counter to everything I knew about sex."

Despite giving hundreds of thousands of dollars back to his neighborhood, financially supporting those around him, his hobby of raising pigeons, years of dedication to a sport, and despite having an interest in classic literature and great thinkers the public image of Iron Mike is what lead to his downfall: the “boorish, vulgar and unredeemable sexual animal” the hood-tainted, illiterate, viscous, rapist, addict, megalomaniac, no good nigger – with a hard r. People just couldn’t take his intensity seriously. They couldn’t conceive that a man can be anything more than what they perceive him to be.

However, Tyson did and does battle with depression and addiction. He may be a different man through different periods of his life, but childhood patterns always worked themselves into his existence. The lack of self worth, the poor self image, the lashing out for attention. These all came out in his relentless rise to the top and his equally as intense fall. “Undisputed Truth” is a great read, it is an honest read. It teaches us that man is fragile, but man can fix himself. The only knowledge one needs is that if you conquer your mind, you conquer the world.

10 Tragic Examples Of Pretty Girls Ruining Themselves With Bad Hair

January 25, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Ah Tuthmosis, how you love to enrage the internet. As an aside to the fundamental principles of Tuth's article, here are some girls who went from riches to rags.

10. Buzz The Brunette

An instructional video on how to make a somewhat decent girl undoubtedly ugly in just over a minute. Notice the one giving the cut suffers from the same syndrome.

9. Beyonce

[image]

She really followed through with all her independent woman and single lady talk. Rumor has it she realized her mistake and within days “corrected” it.

8. Young Brainwashee

The feminism influence gets them young. Poor girl, she will suffer months of teasing during recess as a result of her Lifetime channel watching perceived independent woman of a purported mother.

7. Ginnifer Goodwin

[image]

I really don't need to say anything on this one.

6. Random Brunette Victim

Not sure if the dude in the video is a super white knight or a catty gay dude, but either way he feeding bullshit to this poor girl who's about to change her life for the worse. She goes from "would bang" to "would not bang" in 6:37.

5. Polish Extensions

[image]

For the halfway point, I thought I'd switch it up and go in reverse. See what extensions can do? Arguably this blonde goes a full point higher with six inches of added length.

4. Laura Cat Girl

Another reverse… haha just kidding. Hair long, short or even made of gold, we’re not banging her. Note the animal on the sweater.

3. Keira Knightley

 [image]

This just proves that even a beautiful face can’t save the catastrophic effect those scissors had on her aesthetics. Shame, she was a lovely girl.

2. Sarinja

This one broke my heart. Look at this cute girl with her long hair. A girl you would consider introducing to your friends with her sweet innocence and delightful head of hair. No longer after she mutilated her head. See the first few comments for extra hamsterism.

1. Miley Cyrus

She is a complete mess, which only serves to substantiate my fellow writer Tuthmosis' theory. This hilarious comparison only speaks the truth. Simple Jack is a parody of a film within a film where Ben Stiller's character is admonished for acting as a mental handicapped person with no redeeming qualities. We are cautioned to "never go full retard." Well, Miley didn't listen…she went full retard.

Images Of Attractive Women In Media Do Not Hurt Women

When virtue and modesty enlighten her charms, the lustre of a beautiful woman is brighter than the stars of heaven, and the influence of her power it is in vain to resist.

The simple truth of humanity is that women have been lauded and worshiped for their physical beauty. The world over sees every culture — with their own quirks — place high value on a woman's youth and beauty. Countless works of art, novels and poems are been created to celebrate a man's adoration for a woman's gorgeous countenance. Women's beauty has caused many men to fall in love, collapse in ruin and accede to the highest states of human consciousness. It is evident that male attraction to female beauty isn't a social construction.

The current zeitgeist in the Western is to express anger and outrage over images of women's bodies in the media. I won't even link to any particular website or book, as a simple Google search will present a person with copious amounts of evidence that this is currently a hot social issue.

The rhetoric typically goes a bit like this: Impossible beauty standards are foisted onto girls and women by advertisements on television and in magazines. While the causes vary, the more extreme rhetoric (by feminists) is that hetero-patriarchal beauty norms are forced onto women and this is a result of deeply-ingrained misogyny. Anorexia, "fat talk," and generalized female anxiety over their bodies is a result of men collectively wanting to hurt women. This social construct that "all men are beasts" usually stems from individual women expressing disappointment over the men in their life. Failed childhoods, unrequited feelings with lovers and existential disappointment over male misbehavior in society are the primary causes of women to pretend "all men are beasts." Feminism is the ideological manifestation of this.

Still, from the normal perspective, the average woman reads quite a bit about "introspective" discussions over what beauty standards are and what they should be. The answer to the former is that they are always nigh "impossible" and the answer to the latter is that "they should be determined by the woman herself." Which means it is all bullshit.

The problem is that the discussion assumes and concedes that media will control how women view their bodies. See the problem? Sure, women are trained in this, but it catches women in a spot that advertisers exploit. On one hand, women reflexively want to resist authority figures dictating terms to them. On the other, they do want standards for beauty, but they want the standards to be altered so that they — in their current state — would be considered beautiful.

Women aren't interested in actually changing themselves at all or bettering themselves in any sense. They demand that authority figures provide them with body types that reflect how they see themselves. Media realizes this and simply advertises: "Hey, we don't airbrush! We embrace body diversity! We challenge gender!" This draws in a demographic that neither has the ability nor desire to change. Seeing women go from obese or chubby to fit and attractive is supremely psychologically disturbing. It knocks out the "impossible" assertion from the typical beauty standard rant and means that, if they so chose, they could meet the standard.

It is one massive movement to resist true, personal change. Personal change is difficult. To a chubby woman who has never cared for her body with respects to exercise and nutrition, it can be a challenge. The social forces that seductively lure her into the lair of personal denial and ignorance of reality are the same ones that preach "body diversity" and "fat acceptance."

In many ways, it can be compared to the allegory of taking the blue-pill. Instead of confronting personal psychological deficiencies, these “body diversity” movements offer up a temporary salve. Much like getting drunk after your wife handing you divorce papers, it is a short term approach to ameliorating pain. However, it has an incredibly dark underbelly: all the time you spend ignoring your problems or needing authority figures to buttress your identity is time you wasted getting through your issues. The short term dividend from feel-good movements always results in a serious bank fee once the inevitable passage of time occurs. You can’t pray away your own issues, including your body image ones.

Pretending that plus-sized women strutting up and down the catwalk is good will only hurt women long term. The temporary high — like any other addiction — will fade quickly and will only become more fleeting the more it’s indulged. Their cries won’t be about plus-size models, but plus-size women in TV shows, fat women in lead roles of movies, etc. The cries will get more insistent and impassioned as the they near the inevitable consequence of all this teeth-gnashing: confronting the self.

If “body diversity” activists win out there will be victorious backfat-slapping and bellyroll-bouncing. It will quickly come to disquiet as the aspirational images are no longer skinny, attractive women. Suddenly, the women to aspire to be are not others, but them. Media images are aspirational, make no bones about that. So, these triumphant women parading around social media will realize that they are the women they aspire to be. They are objects of envy. Beneficiaries of privilege. Before they reach for the bottle or the knife, the dream end because that will never happen.

Like any narcissistic society, we spend most of our time wishing things were true. This is true for the “body diversity” movements. They don’t believe that society truly has these oppressive body standards, but only that they wish that it were. They know, deep down, that they have a better shot at changing the whole world around them than themselves. They know that forcing others to conform is more likely to succeed than getting themselves to change without any outside pressure. They know the media isn’t the problem. Beauty isn’t completely socially constructed, but informed greatly by biology. The wishes of social construction are little more than lamentations over personal lethargy and a lack of a stable self.

In order for media images of women to negatively affect women, the women affected must already have poor senses of self. Women, from time immemorial, have confronted and combated women more attractive than themselves. The fight in the sexual marketplace over hierarchy and access to sexually attractive men is nothing new. The new insecurities have their roots in how society socializes women. Socializing women to tie their senses of self to authority figures in media is a new development that reflects where society is now.

Images of female bodies do affect women in negative ways, but only because they have been trained that way. Taught to aspire, they have gone from conforming to standards, to flouting beauty standards to childishly demanding that the standards conform to what they are. No, it is not that advertisements and media shouldn’t be controlling. It most certainly is not that they need to conform to standards. No, it is that the standard is them. The world of sexual attractiveness and beauty standards begins and ends with them. The literal gold standard is them looking in the mirror when they take pictures of themselves with their iPhones.

Media trains women to simultaneously be highly insecure of their physical appearance while then offering the short-term salve of narcissism to shore up their insecurities. The world of wanting to want things leads women to wanting to be attractive. Yet, they do not have the self-esteem or moral fortitude to actually change the self, so the self isn't the problem, but the world surrounding the self. Society has devolved to the point where many women will not even strive to meet standards they consider artificial.

When the standard is yourself and you spend your time valuing yourself against other people, that can only lead to misery. When media tells women, "You are beautiful just the way you are!" they are telling them to start with themselves and then consider other women's beauty. It is one thing to have women emulate beauty from other women. It is another to tell women beauty starts within the self, but then know that that self is based out of perceptions of other women.

Tell them skinny models are worthy of emulation, and you'll have some women who better themselves and some who don't. Tell them to admire fat women and you'll have a deepening national crisis of obesity.

So are beauty standards of women in media hurting women?

"Mirror, mirror on the wall? Who is the fairest of them all?"

It all depends on what a woman sees in the mirror.

A Short History Of Nearly Everything

January 26, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This book is a layman introduction to the natural sciences. It describes the origins of the universe and life through the fields of geology, astronomy, paleontology, chemistry, physics, and biology. What makes it a riveting read is that it doesn't simply relay the facts to you—it tells you the stories, personalities, and human drama behind the discoveries. It also mentions the incorrect but humorous hypotheses that were widely accepted for long stretches of time.

> America, Buffon wrote in his vast and much-esteemed Histoire Naturelle, was a land where the water was stagnant, the soil unproductive, and the animals without size or vigor, their constitutions weakened by the "noxious vapors" that rose from its rotting swamps and sunless forests. In such an environment even the native Indians lacked virility. "They have no beard or body hair," Buffon sagely confided, "and no ardor for the female." Their reproductive organs were "small and feeble."

> When tusks were discovered, they were forced into the animal's head in any number of inventive ways. One restorer screwed the tusks in upside down, like the fangs of a saber-toothed cat, which gave it a satisfyingly aggressive aspect.

Another anecdote describes how some American paleontologists, confused at the fossils they were unearthing, reconstructed a fantastical animal on par with the mermaid or centaur.

Here are some additional highlights:

> Every atom you possess has almost certainly passed through several stars and been part of millions of organisms on its way to becoming you.
> When you sit in a chair, you are not actually sitting there, but levitating above it at a height of one angstrom (a hundred millionth of a centimeter), your electrons and its electrons implacably opposed to any closer intimacy.
> …we live in a universe whose age we can't quite compute, surrounded by stars whose distances we don't altogether know, filled with matter we can't identify, operating in conformance with physical laws whose properties we don't truly understand.
> In 1994, thirty-four thousand ice hockey gloves were swept overboard from a Korean cargo ship during a storm in the Pacific. The gloves washed up all over, from Vancouver to Vietnam, helping oceanographers to trace currents more accurately than they ever had before.
> …there could be as many as thirty million species of animals living in the sea, most still undiscovered.
> …there are three stages in scientific discovery: first, people deny that it is true; then they deny that it is important; finally they credit the wrong person.
> For the next twenty years, even while on vacation, [Milankovitch] worked ceaselessly with pencil and slide rule computing the tables of his cycles— work that now could be completed in a day or two with a computer.
> Some of these species existed for well over a million years, others for a more modest few hundred thousand, but it is worth bearing in mind that even the least successful had histories many times longer than we have yet achieved.

My main complaint with the book was that it was too short. A tackling of the entire world's history should mean a 1000-page offering at the minimum, but instead we get only 478 pages. At the same time I understand this was intended for the average man, so my grievance comes mostly from already knowing a good chunk of the information presented.

Short History made it clear how much of the universe and our Earth that we simply don't know, may never come to know, and how things we think we know today will be proven wrong in the future well after our deaths. When opening one box that you think leads to the truth, another box is present, and so it goes, a slow march to scientific knowledge and understanding. In 5000 years, I can only imagine the progress that will have been made at understanding our world, where future humans look back at us as unfortunate beings who lived in ignorance of the truth. That said, I highly recommend this book for those not well-versed in scientific history to understand just a bit of how we came to be.

The Only 2 Things A Man Can Depend On

January 26, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

I was born alone and I will die alone. I've got to do what's right for me and not live my life the way anybody else wants it.

– Curtis Jackson

If life were a board game, you'd be the game piece.

In reality, life isn't much different from a game. There isn't a defined end goal, however. You get to choose it. It could be power and respect. It could simply be happiness. Or it could be more specific: money or women, for example. Whatever it is, you choose.

In a board game there are strict limitations. In life, we're encouraged to follow laws and social norms, but for the most part we're free to do as we choose. There are infinite paths that will take you to any goal imaginable.

Along the way you'll deal with many people. Some will help you, others won't. You can grow to depend on the ones that help you, but that always incurs a risk. A family member can die. A close friend can betray you. Your girl can leave you. How will you react when one of these things happens?

Playing with others is a necessary part of the game. But never depend on them. Doing so will ultimately lead to failure and disappointment.

Accept that the only two things you can ever count on are your body and your mind– your game piece. You must tend to these things like a gardener tends to his plants. Focus on improving them and facilitating their health and growth and you'll always put yourself in the best position to win.

If some tragedy befalls a dependent man, he may sink into depression. He might feel like he's lost all hope of accomplishing his mission in life. He might give up.

A truly independant man, however, will not. He's prepared, on some level, for each of these tragedies. He doesn't have a specific game plan for when his best friend betrays him, per se. But he's put himself in a good position, both physically and mentally, that he can weather the storm. Not only can he weather the storm, but he can keep his cool and make the fine adjustments needed to get the ship back on course.

Below I'll offer the basic tasks one must do to protect his game piece, and see it thrive.

1. Your Body

If you take care of your body, it will be strong and healthy. It will also help foster a potent mind. Yes, there's always the rare risk of contracting some form of cancer or another deadly disease, but if you follow the steps below, you all but rule these things out.

1. Eat good food

I won't go into specifics, because everyone's diet will, and should, be different.

But if you focus your diet around meat, fruits, and vegetables your body will flourish. Meat provides the protein and amino acids your body needs to grow. The fruits and vegetables provide the fiber and vitamins you need to function over the long run. A man with a solid diet will respond better to stress, and therefore be more self reliant.

2. Lift weights

In short, lifting weights develops a strong nervous, muscular, and skeletal system. These are the three main systems that run your body. An efficient body is like a strong ship– it will weather the storm better and be far more dependable in your journey.

The most brutally simple and effective lifting program is StrongLifts 5×5. It focuses on building strength across the five most basic movements humans are meant to do (squat, deadlift, bench press, row, and overhead press).

2. Your Mind

You must also foster a capable mind. One that can stand on it’s own two feet. The strongest body won’t accomplish anything without an equally impressive mind.

1. Read books

Reading a book is like absorbing another man’s lifelong wisdom. The more books you read, the more you’ll know and the wiser you’ll be. Blogs are okay, but the average quality of a blog post is decidedly lower than what you find in a book. People simply put more time, effort, and value into books.

The knowledge you acquire in books also contributes to your self reliance. It offers quality wisdom and advice– that can’t be taken away from you.

2. Meditate

Meditation is the act of being comfortable being alone. When you meditate, you remove all of the outside noise. All of the thoughts, gossip, music, news, women, men, business, sex– everything. You are left with only yourself.

Many men can’t stand meditation because they’ve grown dependant on all of this external stimulation. They aren’t comfortable in their own skin. And thus they’ve lost their edge, their self reliance.

The Only 2 Things A Man Can Depend On

You have your body and your mind. Nothing else is guaranteed. You’re born with only that, and you’ll die just the same. You’re best off fostering their growth above all other pursuits.

Check out my new #1 Amazon Bestseller, The Book of Alpha. It’s full of direct, actionable advice for the man who wants to better himself.

Women Are Lying When They Say They Want "Equality"

January 26, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

A few years ago, I went on a date with a Russian girl I met in London. She was a little older than me, probably an 8 in her day, but a bit over the hill pushing into late 30s. She was very well connected socially in the upper class London scene. We hit a couple of VIP clubs where the royals party and breezed past the doormen. It got to 3am and we went back to her place. She introduced me to some lame beta flatmate which kind of threw the vibe and we ended up in the garden smoking cigarettes. By then I was too tired and drunk to want to fuck her. She started getting a little antsy – expecting me to hit on her.

I decided it was time to call it a night and get a cab home. I just wasn't that into her. I said, "Well… I'll give you a ring." She responded clear as day: "I don't need another friend."

She couldn't have made it any clearer. She wanted to fuck and seemed to imply that the benefit of access to her social scene should be paid with sex. Although it was a bit unexpected and a real role reversal – fair enough really – you go girl. I bid her goodnight because she wasn't my type, but respect for making the relationship boundaries clear. More men should think like this, even if all they have to offer is a hard penis. After that comment I couldn't bang her without feeling like a man whore and she was right, I was more interested in access to her social circle than her pussy. It was going to be 'game' with me as the bitch – trying to avoid sex and gain benefits.

The modern age empowers women in many ways

From birth control to GPS navigation through to well stocked supermarkets, home delivery, instant communication, and so on. The entitled woman has been created in part by our 'easy' and technologically driven lifestyles. Women no longer need the support, care and protection of a man. We have a high level of equality in many respects, but the equation works both ways.

I no longer need a traditional 'wife' to cook, clean, fetch water from the well, prepare condiments to preserve fruit through winter and scrub my clothes on a washboard any more than she needs someone to help keep the aggressive natives at bay. Where in the past the partnership between men and women was fostered by a necessity of survival, the dynamics have now changed immeasurably. Women have little incentive to contribute to a partnership. Men simply need to wake up to the modern age as women have done.

If you overhear a gossipy coffee morning amongst girlfriends, you can often hear them giggling about how stupid men are. I have to agree with them. Men, for all their genius, engineering, logistics and inventions can be bumbling buffoons in relationships. Men no longer need a wife, girlfriend or live in lover.

What does a man really need from a woman?

SEX.

Why do men enjoy the company of a woman?

FOR SEX.

I just want a whore. Cocktails, diner, clubbing, all fine and good, but it's basically a warm up for sex. I'm not even taking you to the cinema if it means forgoing a good fuck. Sorry girl. You wanted equality—well, you got it.

My Russian date was absolutely right, even though I had no intention of becoming her dildo – her attitude was correct. A relationship without the sex you want is not worth having. Most women can serve no other purpose in my life, for exactly the reasons that feminists championed the liberation of women. So let's champion the liberation of men from the binding, limited ideals of marriage and male-female partnership, just as feminists have done for the fairer sex. Just as my Russian date did.

Fuck me or pay me for my skill set

Real men like to pass time with a woman only so that they can have sex. Sure their feminine approach to life, their gossip, social networking skills, attention to detail and kudos of a 9 on your arm are benefits, but if I need a personal assistant, public relations expert or escort, I can hire one. The old expression "pay peanuts, get monkeys" even sees Tony Stark tied into a miserable nagging 'relationship' with Pepper Potts. I do not need a 'girl friend' and neither did he.

Her primarily function is to bring the one thing that is missing from my existence and that is her sexuality. I have everything else covered and according to the tenets of equality she needs little else from me. Equal opportunity workplace? I'm all for it so long as it comes with the equal opportunity bedroom. Why should I pay your rent, introduce you to my social circle or let you consume my time, energy and expertise helping you out? Earn your own money and take care of yourself. Hire a professional to fix your life up.

Forget about cooking pancakes in the morning, I can get those ready-made or hire a cook. Instead wake me up with a blow job. Forget about laundering bed sheets or arranging flowers in the living room, I don't want you to be enslaved as my unpaid housekeeper, absolutely not—you are an empowered woman now. Rather I need you to slip between the sheets of an evening, dolled up in black suspenders. Don't worry about scrubbing the floors, I can hire a maid for that—instead let me find you grinding yourself in the shower, with a butt plug inside your anus.

The only time a woman is irreplaceable is in the bedroom. I cannot make love with my pillow. I cannot practice BDSM with only the rope and handcuffs, and I cannot have wild sex in the shower with just the soap. Although it would be much more convenient, I am certainly not interested in sex with another man. Therefore I need a female.

As my Russian date put it: “I don’t need another friend.”

Just as women have championed their liberation and equal rights, I have championed my own equal rights and liberty. You want your equality, no problem. I want mine too. I don’t want to have to game you, impress you, seduce you. You are my equal, you have no need of any of my provisioning, protection, care, and so forth. You can earn your own money and buy your own car and apartment. I just want to make you squirt until your juices drip off the ceiling. That is my function in your life and yours in mine. That is all we are to each other. Our equality removes all need for partnership in every way, with the exception of sex.

A woman that is not prepared to come over, strip off and get down to it within 15 minutes of crossing my threshold is not worth knowing. I don’t want to talk about my work week, my family, friends, or neighbors. If I need a therapist or adviser I can hire a professionally trained psychologist. I don’t want to meet your girlfriends or your mother unless you are bringing them for an orgy. And I certainly don’t need your daddy’s permission and neither do you in these times of equality.

If you aren’t going to give me the sex I want then obviously you neither understand your own sexuality or a man’s. A woman that is not interested in providing me with the sexual pleasure and antics I seek maybe worth hiring as a maid, housekeeper, cook, driver, personal assistant, secretary, manager or executive, but I have no need for female ‘friends.’

The gay world knows what equality is. They hook up amongst themselves whenever they see fit. Sex is not usually a bargaining chip or leverage to a better lifestyle, rather a mutually satisfying experience for both. It’s a pleasurable cheeky pastime to be had wherever, whenever. Why else would someone bang George Michael in the bushes? They just wanted to fuck—they weren’t trying to up their status or angle for alimony. If you are not ‘in the mood’ then fine—I will find someone who is horny.

You want your equality dear lady, fair enough, I want mine. Your only function in my life, is to have sex. If you want remuneration for that we can discuss. If you appreciate the benefits of having an excellent, cost neutral, risk free sex life with me, even better. It is that simple.

Feminism did a great job on behalf of men everywhere. According to feminists, a woman is just a man with a cunt, so we should expect them to be sexual in the same way men are. Or perhaps we all know that that they don’t want it like that at all.

The Feminist War Against Prostitution Is Fueled By Lies And Distortions

January 27, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A recent article in The Economist magazine discussed the outcomes of the different approaches that Sweden and Germany have taken towards prostitution since the early 2000s. Sweden—under massive pressure from feminist lobbying groups—took the path of banning prostitution completely, and actually prosecuting men (not women) who pay for sex. Germany, implementing proposals from Social Democrats (SPD) and Greens, legalized prostitution to such an extent that, in theory, working girls can get health insurance, welfare, and pensions. Both approaches have failed to live up to expectations, since both were implemented with an inadequate awareness of historical reality and human nature. This article discusses the details.

Sweden

In 1999, patronizing a prostitute was criminalized. The law was put into effect to appease the legislative efforts of feminist and leftist groups. The assumption behind the ban on prostitution was idea that a centralized government can, and should, stamp out the "evils" of prostitution and so-called "human trafficking." Have the results lived up to expectations? The Economist smoothly demurs on this question (it "seems to have declined"), but offers no anecdotal or statistical evidence to support its bald assertion.

Germany

The idea behind legalizing prostitution was to remove the stigma from the world's oldest profession by providing “sex workers” with clean and safe venues from which to ply their trade. It seemed to follow, proponents maintained, that doing this would drive abusive pimps and sex traffickers out of the market. There is also in Germany a traditional distrust of governmental attempts to regulate morality, as well as long-standing openness to sexual expression.

Sources state that Germany now has over 400,000 active prostitutes conducting over 1 million transactions per day; yet only 44 of them (including 4 men) have registered for welfare benefits.

Individual German states and municipalities are responsible for the zoning of brothels. Berlin has no zoning restrictions; and “in some places, streetwalkers line up along motorways with open-air booths nearby for quickies.” The title of The Economist article cited above (“A Giant Teutonic Brothel”) and its content leave the reader with the impression that liberalization of sex laws in Germany has gone too far, to the extent that Germany has now become a haven for sex tourists.

While Germany’s and Sweden’s different approaches say much about the culture of each country, I believe Germany’s is far more realistic. While some excesses in Germany will need to be curbed, its policies are in fact far more normal and healthy than Sweden’s. Despite the avalanche of feminist cant surrounding this issue, history has demonstrated that prostitution is an enduring and unavoidable human activity, and has always been so.

In the classical world, prostitution was a highly sophisticated and regulated activity, practiced throughout the Mediterranean world under various social and religious guises. The practice continued in different forms with the advent of Christianity; the medieval Church's views were in fact surprisingly enlightened. St. Augustine, in his treatise De Ordine, stated that "If you do away with prostitutes, the world will be convulsed with lust." St. Thomas Aquinas supported this view several hundred years later. Medieval man took his sex frankly and matter-of-factly: growing up in a world where both men and women matured earlier than today, he had neither time nor patience for abstract, unrealistic views of sex and gender.

Medieval towns such as Toulouse, Avignon, Montpellier, and Nuremburg permitted prostitution on the same theory: that providing a relief for lust and monogamy would outweigh the sinful presence of harlotry, and thereby prove a net benefit to society. It is a mature and practical view, and one that modern feminists and leftists choose to ignore. Alas, history and human nature are feminism's greatest enemies.

London in the 1100s had a district of "bordells" or "stews" located near London Bridge; it was regulated by the Bishop of Winchester and later authorized by Parliament, which passed edicts in 1161 forbidding employment of prostitutes with known diseases.

Attempts to ban the practice outright met with no success. Louis IX expelled all prostitutes from France in 1254, but was forced to repeal his law two years later, once it became clear that the wives, daughters, and sisters of many Frenchmen were being bothered by aggressive admirers. In 1256, a new edict set up a special “red-light” district in Paris under the supervision of a roi des ribauds, and things improved measurably.

Louis’s son Philip unwisely renewed the expulsion law, which was ignored as unenforceable. In Rome, throughout the medieval period and into early modern times, there were brothels near the Vatican, which were permitted to operate as long as certain conditions were met. (A sisterhood was established to care for such women in approved hospitals, and donations from reformed prostitutes were given away as charity).

Wise men have long recognized the need for providing an outlet for the sexual impulse, which, if allowed to accumulate without relief, could have deleterious effects on society.

Human Trafficking: Feminist Propaganda?

Seen in this light, Sweden's attempt to ban prostitution will result in more harm than good. The feminist backers of the law were careful to place all the criminal stigma of prostitution on the male patron; in feminist doctrine, the prostitute shares no responsibility for her choices or actions.

This attitude has been even more starkly observed with the spread of "human trafficking" propaganda. No one denies that such a thing exists, but it is clear that the issue is being grossly exaggerated to advance the feminist agenda. Every time an Asian massage parlor is shut down, it seems, we have to endure lectures about the evils of human trafficking.

The reality is very different. A recent article in The Guardian (Oct. 19, 2009) stated:

> The UK's biggest ever investigation of sex trafficking failed to find a single person who had forced anybody into prostitution in spite of hundreds of raids on sex workers in a six-month campaign by government departments, specialist agencies and every police force in the country.
> The failure has been disclosed by a Guardian investigation which also suggests that the scale of and nature of sex trafficking into the UK has been exaggerated by politicians and media.
> Current and former ministers have claimed that thousands of women have been imported into the UK and forced to work as sex slaves, but most of these > statements were either based on distortions of quoted sources or fabrications without any source at all.

Evidence is mounting that human trafficking is a manufactured crisis, pushed by feminists and leftists to advance their social engineering goals. Radical feminist Alice Schwarzer, an opponent of Germany's prostitution laws, claims that prostitution and "slavery" are "inextricably entangled." Two social researchers quoted in The Economist article cited above deny this; they note that slavery and prostitution are two distinct and separate things, each with its own economic impetus.

Few dare to state openly what is becoming increasingly obvious: the phrases "sex slavery" and "human trafficking" are being used to mean whatever feminists want them to mean. The goal, as always, is to portray women as perpetual victims. The dark secret they wish to suppress is that the vast majority of women are not coerced into prostitution; and once there, they choose to stay there for financial gain.

One website has documented an impressive catalogue of studies showing how the issue is being manufactured. U.S. Justice Department Inspector Glenn Fine, for example, audited Former Attorney General Gonzales's reports on human trafficking, and found them filled with exaggerations and misstatements.

Human lust has been with us from the time humans first walked the earth. As societies developed and became more organized, it was inevitable that some sort of commercialization of the sex act would arise. Attempts to ban the practice have never worked, and never will. Such attempts in the past were often based on religious rationales, and failed due to an inadequate understanding of human nature.

Modern attempts to ban the practice in Sweden and Germany have focused, instead, on using feminist victimization theories. The new religion (feminism) has simply replaced the old. Feminists will perform intellectual somersaults to try to explain the presence of hundreds of thousands of prostitutes in Germany, practicing their trade in public view. "They must be slaves who were trafficked there!" is their default response. But by going down this road, radical feminists find themselves on the horns of an especially delicate dilemma that frustrates their theology of victimization. How?

Because you can't be an empowered, independent woman—collecting a pension, medical insurance, and welfare from a career in prostitution–and be a victim at the same time.

How Black American Men Can Broaden Their Romantic Options

January 27, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The subject of black dating doesn't come up all that often in the manosphere. Roosh has tackled the subject a couple of times, and in doing so he managed to shed a lot of light on it. Contrary to popular belief, the path to romantic success for black males in the USA is not an easy one. Widespread myths regarding the supposed hidden obsession maintained by non-black women in America for black men are indeed firmly divorced from reality. A black man who wishes to consider romantic options outside of the black community (either because that's just his preference or he lives/works in parts of the country that are not predominantly black) will face many substantial challenges.

What are these challenges, and how can they be overcome? Again, not much is written in the manosphere on this subject, so here are a few suggestions of my own.

Get In Where You Fit In

As I noted above, black men are not nearly as popular sexually in the USA as some myths claim them to be. There are many who believe that all (or at least most) non-black women in this country have a secret fetish for black men, a discreet preference that they hide only because of widespread shaming and racism. This isn't completely untrue. There are definitely many women out there who may temper their interest in a given black male for social reasons, and there are many who do prefer black men over others.

The reality, however, is that the typical black male is not that hot of a ticket as far as non-black women are concerned. As Roosh has noted, there are a substantial number of non-black women who will eliminate a black male from contention on sight and have no interest in dating them due to their association of said men with negative stereotypes. There are many more who could be open to dating a black male, but only under ideal circumstances (i.e., he'd better have tight game, style, budget, etc). The fact is that for the most part, the bulk of non-black women in the USA just aren't that obsessed with black men as a whole.

The good news for black men who are interested in expanding their romantic outlook beyond the black community (or who live in areas that are not predominantly black) is that there is some variation in that preference. The general rule is this: do not waste your time trying to change the minds of women who have made clear their lack of enthusiasm for dating interracially. If a woman makes that disinterest obvious (and they often do, particularly online), move along, regardless of what she looks like.

Your goal should be to interact with women who are, at the very least, somewhat neutral to the concept of interracial dating (read: open to it in general or at least willing to consider it under the right circumstances). My guess is that at least a slight majority of non-black American women fit into this category. Those who don't must be left alone.

Use Social Circle Game

The concept of pre-selection is well known in the manosphere, but may be more crucial for black American males than others.

As I noted above, there are a substantial number of non-black women in this country who would date a black male under the right circumstances. They do not have "jungle fever" and, in most cases, may not have ever even dated a black male before, but they've probably seen one they found attractive in their personal lives or in the media and would consider dating one under the right conditions.

What are these “conditions”? Generally, they relate to the approval of her friend group and her peers. For black males (who in the USA are specifically associated with a number of very negative stereotypes that few non-blacks want anything to do with on a regular basis), this is much more important than it is for others. Association with such stereotypes would jeopardize her own social wellbeing and make her uncomfortable, so she will want to make sure that you do not bring them into her life. Pre-selection allows her to easily identify you as a male who will not do these things.

How does one obtain this pre-selection aside from becoming a relatively well-known athlete or entertainer and benefiting from the associated fame/status? Social circle game.

Because they are associated with so many negative social stereotypes and because divorcing themselves from said stereotypes is so crucial to determining the romantic options available to them, black men have more to gain from social circle game than do most other men.

How can a black male properly begin executing social circle game? Get around and meet people in your environment, making a number of friends and acquaintances in the process. Do not discriminate: these people can be of any given ethnicity/race. Your goal is simply to meet and befriend cool people from a variety of ethnic backgrounds aside from (and in addition to) your own. You will want to avoid self-segregation at all costs.

As you meet and befriend more cool people within this environment, you'll become known as a cool individual yourself, someone who is worth hanging around and will be described as such by your peers whenever they are asked about you.

It is in this way that you will come into contact with a number of women (friends of friends, relatives of friends, etc) with whom you will already be "pre-selected" and will thus have a relatively easier time dating if you so desire. The cooler and more diverse your friend group, the more attractive and diverse these women will be.

On the whole, you will have a substantially easier time consistently meeting and dating attractive, high quality non-black women in this manner than you will running out to the club or bar cold approaching. The majority of normal, cute non-black women (the 90+ percent who don't have a visible fetish for black men) can generally only be accessed in this way, as they only rarely engage sexually with black men who are not pre-selected and somewhat well known to them. If you want to have a decent chance at getting with them, make sure you're more than just a "random black guy" they don't know.

It is true that social circle game can be useful for any man of any ethnic background, and most dudes of all kinds could benefit from the advice above. For black males in the USA, however, social circle game is especially significant. It is the most potent defence they will have against negative stereotypes that could have a deleterious effect on one's social, professional and romantic life.

Don't Be A Stereotype

As noted above, pre-selection will often be essential to a black male's success dating interracially in the USA. In order to make this possible, however, it is crucial for a black male to avoid association with any number of negative stereotypes associated with people like himself.

The reality is this: thugs aren't actually cool. Any notion contrary to that is a myth. Only a select minority of non-black women are really into thugs. Most truly want nothing to do with that image or lifestyle. It is crucial to the success of any black male looking to bridge racial divides in his romantic life to avoid association with that image at all costs. How do you do this?

Go to school

Black men are the most uneducated demographic in the United States. They're not expected to be well learned, nor are they assumed to have obtained any sort of degree. Men who defy those odds and expectations put themselves in a good position socially, economically and romantically. College also provides a great vehicle for social circle game, both during one's time on campus and after graduation via alumni connections.

Hold a solid job and establish a solid career

Black men are the least employed major demographic in the United States, so those who can beat these odds and make good money in a solid career (you don't need to be a baller) will stand out in a positive way. Black men will be judged more harshly on your employment and income than your European peers, so get ready for that too.

Wear clothes that fit

The more well dressed/GQ you can be, the better – again, this will matter more for you than others given the stereotypes you're going to be fighting. Urban style is only cool in urban areas. If you want to expand your romantic pool beyond that demographic, dress up. This is particularly important if you lack pre-selection.

The fact is that most folks in our society have a defined image of what “black” is and what black people are like. Many of those images are negative. Your ability to transcend racial boundaries in a social and romantic sense will depend heavily on your ability to contrast yourself with these images. Any young black male concerned with self-improvement should make the development of this ability a top priority. It won’t always win you the day, but you’ll be much better off with it than without.

When Her No Means Yes

January 27, 2014 | by Vincent Vinturi | Link | Original Link

Women say "no" to me in one way or another on a regular basis, e.g. "no, you can't have my number", "no, I should go home", "no, I'm not coming into your apartment", and of course, the classic, "no, we're not having sex".

Yet somehow, when it's all said and done, the woman is invariably happy that I didn't listen to a single word of protest she uttered; that I barreled through her resistance nonchalantly and drove the ball to the basket. Women RESPECT this sexual insistence even if they aren't acutely aware of it.

The consent crowd, however, would like for men to believe that anything short of a written statement, notarized and signed by the soon to be fornicated party, is rape.

Women want to monopolize power in the sexual marketplace so that they can control access to sex and manipulate this most primal, most productive of urges to their benefit. Ultimately, it isn't to their benefit at all but that's another story. Perhaps it's no different from Western men who go abroad to a country where their sexual value is much higher and pussy seems to fall from the sky. We're all looking out for number one and doing whatever we can to pass on those selfish genes.

Ask any guy who's banged a lot of girls and has had a lot of same-night lays, and he will surely regale you with tales of seemingly insurmountable resistance, conquered and slain by his resolve and unwavering horniness. It's in the nature of beautiful women to resist, test, protest, sabotage and make your job of fucking them difficult. And of course, by the time you wrestle their panties off, they're dripping wet.

With rape laws the way they are in countries like the US and Canada, it's downright scary to be a man and act with natural disinhibition in the company of beautiful women in these countries. We're at a dangerous cultural crossroads, where a woman's need for validation is at an all time high, and the repercussions for accusing men of rape are non-existent. Do you see any potential for abuse with this cocktail?

In the modern context, rape is essentially the act of ultimate validation and a rape accusation is the ultimate act of attention whoring. I'm not supporting it of course, don't be silly. But think about it. If a man finds a woman SO incredibly desirable that he would throw his freedom, reputation, his whole life away to fuck her, that shows the woman is on the highest echelon of desirability. And in fact, women have begun to routinely accuse men of rape purely for the ego validation that the onslaught of attention brings them. Even though the night before, they gleefully received the gent's ravishment.

And why not? If a woman can have her cake and eat it, too, she will.

But I have to issue a serious warning: plowing through a woman's objections with bemused persistence isn't for newcomers to the game. Especially not in the US. You need to be FLUENT in reading female body language. You need to know exactly what you're doing. The thing to understand is that telling a man "no" is a way to weed out the weaklings from the men who know what they want (her).

The best way to hone your sense about when 'no' means 'yes' is to have a lot of interactions with attractive women. And in particular, it's when you go for the lay very soon after meeting a girl that she'll be most likely to resist your attempts to get in her pants. This situation is commonly known as Last Minute Resistance or "LMR" for short (this is a situation I teach how to overcome in my newest book LMR Exposed). This is also about the time that you start fearing for your freedom if you push too hard and a girl flips out and sicks the law on you. A mere accusation is enough to screw up your life big time.

Yet the conflict of interest is that the most reliable way to establish a strong male/female polarity is to bed a woman quickly (and well). In a word, she wants to be persuaded by your dominance, sexual potency and persistence. And she will test you and do everything she can think of to discourage you from having sex with her.

Here's the main thing to consider: She can be saying 'no' with her words and even with her situational body language. But if you've been unmistakably clear about your sexual intent and then she comes to your room, she is open to being seduced. Otherwise, she wouldn't be there. I've had hour or more long battles with a girl who had come to my room and then protested that she wasn't going to have sex with me. Hell, it just happened again yesterday. In the end, of course, we got naked. And, she appreciated it after the fact. If a girl isn't open to being seduced she will either not come in or will precipitate hastily from your room. Anything short of that is a green light.

We've created a situation where this kind of natural sexual play, which is vital to establishing the dominant/submissive sexual polarity, is discouraged and tied up with various (legitimate) fears about potential consequences, even if you've done nothing wrong. It's a brave new world we live in. But what are we as men supposed to do, drop out altogether? No. Proceed with caution but proceed. And if you can, get out of the Anglosphere so you can relax and get down to business without concern for your freedom. Your penis will thank you.

One Night Of Putting In Work In South America

January 27, 2014 | by Black Knight | Link | Original Link

Your date for the night flaked on you. A nice girl, but a bit timid. You could see it coming. It's 8pm in a completely unfamiliar city, and you have to pull a rabbit out of a hat. It's time once again to create something from nothing, produce cash and prizes with no friends, no smartphone outside your apartment, no contacts, and no jump off points.

Is it necessary to do this to enjoy a trip abroad? What is the drive that compels me to do this? Normal tourists go to the museum. To the park. To the theater, or to the top of tall buildings. I rest up and walk around during the day so I can be on-point to talk to approach strangers at night.

First there's the online pipeline. Match a couple hundred girls on Tinder, hope to find one or two measly prospects. Look up bars. Put them on the map, write directions in the looseleaf notebook that has become your best friend in a 4000-mile radius. Look good, have a drink or two, and form a plan. Drag yourself to bars you've never been to, but seem familiar just the same. Make clunky conversation with girls in a foreign language you just learned, hoping for the rush of that magical moment when the girl shows interest in you. The hook point, as some like to call it. I'm not a pickup artist. I'm just a guy who can't be happy with what he has.

Could this rush be all that we do it for? Most of us make good enough livings that if sex was all we wanted, we could buy it hundreds of times over. Especially here. Avoid the expensive drinks, the work to defeat the social inertia, the pomp and circumstance. But it couldn't replace the interest, however brief, from another human. The idea that they want what we're selling. We've cracked the code, and now we're making up for lost time. It is a type of vengeance against mistakes of the past.

I take a drink of my beer as I put on the one pair of dress jeans in my luggage, which is impossibly small for a 3-week trip by any reasonable standards. Who needs options when you're wearing the same uniform each night?

I don't "want" to go out, but an invisible force compels me onward. One more hook, one more makeout, one more notch. Its the variable reward schedule of game, and once you're on the treadmill, good luck getting off. This city does not sleep, and I cannot waste my time letting opportunities pass due to false constructs like introversion or fatigue. Mind over matter is the only way to persevere.

The allure of the women here is undeniable. Perhaps that's part of it, but that isn't what really drives me forward. It's the vague and irrational idea that I may be missing out, and the elusive prize might be at the next bar, the next approach, the next Tinder swipe. Maybe it will lead to something I haven't yet experienced. We're all just chasing novelty more forcefully as it becomes progressively harder to find. In that way, maybe we are no better than the uninitiated.

Its 9pm and my beer is finished. It's time to go.

How To Overcome A False Rape Accusation

January 28, 2014 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

The manosphere talks about a plethora of subjects. Yet, I see one topic avoided or not expanded on fully: the full scale effects of a false rape accusation. All the articles I've had a chance to look at talk about advocacy or how to prevent it. The problem I have with this is that when it happens it will be like a personal Pearl Harbor. I want to inform young people what to do when accused of such a heinous crime. Here is a story arc of what to do (not to be confused with actual legal advice):

Your words can only hurt you

Imagine you're a young player aged 16-25 dealing with a false rape accusation. You are living your life when you get either a call from the school or police for a "talk." You think maybe they messed up on the financial aid or general bureaucracy shenanigans. When you enter the place they directed you to go to, a counselor/RA/authority figure wants to ask you questions.

They will start up with some softball questions that won't tip off even the most paranoid people. Then they will ask some loaded questions about sex life and girls. They will talk about an "anonymous" complaint about your "actions" and want you to face a kangaroo court. The best solution to make sure that these little feminist brown shirts don't crucify you based on an informant's lie is to be quiet. The magic words of "I need my lawyer" coupled with "No comment" and "I don't recall" have saved many innocent and even guilty people. Your words can only hurt you in a situation like this. They don't care about objectivity or they would have had the accuser in the same room as the accused. This whole meet up is intended for you to make you slip and admit something you never did.

It's not just the school board/authorities that will try to trip you up. Expect to be treated like Osama Bin Laden because the anti-rape zealots will see you as the king of rapists. They will use any words you may have said to them in passing and inform the authorities. Any stupid joke you tell them will be used as character evidence by the D.A. Police and law enforcement regularly use hearsay to help convict people.

Torture

The internet will be like bittersweet chocolate for you when the investigation and trial is happening. You can totally be anonymous to the internet world without being the "rapist." Yet, many sites will have info of your "alleged" crime. Your name will be muttered by the mentally ill freaks on Tumblr, Twitter and Facebook as the INSERT YOUR COLLEGE/TOWN'S rapist. I recommend shutting down anything that is linked to your real life name. If you have a PUA Youtube channel, make it private. Same for a Facebook profile that has you talking about embarrassing stuff.

White knights will research everything you've ever put up on the internet to find "proof" you're a terrible person. This will also happen in real life since the media loves to run stories about "rapists." Find a hobby where you can relax and be you. Learn a language, instrument or something of that caliber. Don't let the mental stress of an investigation get to you, or else you may end up doing stupid stuff that can hurt you in the long run.

Aftermath

You survived the investigation and the authorities dropped the case or you won the trial. You will still have to deal with pissed off feminists talking about how you used the patriarchy to win. They will hound places you frequent with a rape whisper campaign. You will deal with J Edgar Hoover levels of zealotry. Information on the case will still stay up on the internet and you must forever explain to people what actually happened. It's not an easy road to drive on but it's better than being in a cell. The turmoil ended but know you must live with the trauma of the emotional rape by the feminist power structure.

False rape accusations are a nasty reality in modern day America. The best piece of advice is to shut your mouth and get a lawyer. I just don't want another innocent man in jail over fabricated lies from mentally ill women. Never forget that feminists want to put every male accused of something into a personal shame spiral of hell. I hope that you can avoid it.

The Tragedy Of Letting A Broken Woman Into Your Life

January 28, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

On July 6th 1994, twenty-six year old Troy Kell, inmate and white supremacist gang member at Utah State Prison, killed Lonnie Blackmon, a black inmate, with 67 blows from a prison shank while prison guards videotaped the attack. The deed done, Troy wiped his hands clean of the blood and walked away, proudly yelling:

"Got some white power jumpin' off around here!"

Later, in an interview with HBO for it's documentary Gladiator Days : Anatomy Of A Prison Murder (2002), Troy explained his reasoning behind why he killed Blackmon.

> TROY
> "I went into the situation that I'm gonna hafta kill the guy – I'm not gonna…jus hurt 'em, I'm not gonna stab him two times and say 'yeah we're even', you know, cause the philosophy in prison is, you know, you stab me I kill you… I just stabbed the shit outta him, you know, until he didn't move anymore."
> "I've seen guys hesitate…on not thinkin' somethin' was serious, and it was serious, and they get themselves stabbed up. Or they get themselves fucked off…they get themselves killed."

A brutal view on life. Yet it's not surprising to hear from an inmate who had been imprisoned for another murder since he was eighteen. Troy's first murder was James Kelly [real name James Thiede], a twenty-one year old Canadian man in Troy's hometown of Las Vegas. Troy, with the assistance of Sandra Shaw (fifteen at the time) and another friend, lured Kelly into the desert and ambushed him, where Troy shot Kelly six times in the face at point blank range.

Who was Troy? Where did he come from? What was the series of events that drove him to commit two murders, both of which placed him on death row?*

One of the most startling aspects of Troy, from watching the documentary, is just how intelligent, almost proverbially All American he comes across as. Troy was not some trailer trash kid, doomed for eventual incarceration.

> "I was raised in Las Vegas, Nevada, little middle class family. I'm the only child."
> "I think I was probably just an ordinary kid on the block, I wasn't any different, or anything from anyone else that I noticed."
> "My father's into horses, and kinda a redneck background, country boy kinda thing, and we had horses and stuff."
> "I was expected…to be successful, you know, my family, you know, they're not losers."

His neighbourhood was middle class, his school was middle class. Troy was thoroughly middle class. So why did he, at eighteen, kill James Kelly? For the answer to that, we have to turn to Sandra Shaw.

Sandra was three years younger then Troy. They met quite early, when they were children.

> SANDY
> "Troy's been a part of our life, um, ever since I first came to Las Vegas. Um, since I was probably, like, six years old. We lived on one corner of the street and on the opposite street he lived at the other corner. And um, me and a couple of friends, two little girlfriends, were walking down the street and him and his little friends > were sitting in front of their house on their bicycles and you know they were watching us googly eyed cause he's three years older then me. So when we got all the way to the end of the street, towards the desert, you know, we turned around and said somethin' real sassy and they chased us on their bikes and we ran and he jumped off his back and tackled me into the grass and you know it just became like a plaything. And since then he was like, 'You're gonna be my girlfriend' and I was like, 'No I don't even like boys'."

There was obviously some romantic tension going on between the two of them from a very young age. Though Troy and Sandy both refer to each other in a younger sister older brother dynamic, it's clear that at least Troy felt a deep attraction to Sandy. Why shouldn't he? After all, she was the quintessential girl next door whom eagerly spent time with him. Sandy was a cute little girl, and Troy was no slouch himself.

> "His father was really really strict, and um, I remember one time on his birthday, we were, he was turning thirteen and I believe I was ten and I rode my bike all the way to the mall and I bought him a Nike outfit and he had to sneak out in his back yard and climb up on the brick wall for me give him his gift, because he was on restriction – he was always on restriction – just, for absolutely nothing."

That's an almost classical scene of romance, and one wonders how many other secret rendezvous Troy and Sandy had over the years.

In many ways Sandy herself was the counterpart of Troy – the proverbial All American girl; pretty, a cheerleader, precocious and outgoing – though her family was struggling on the line between middle and lower class (Connie Shaw appears to be a single mother). By all counts, Sandy was destined for a typical middle class life herself. Perhaps even with Troy.

> "When I was thirteen years old I was spending the night at a friend's house and her step father went into a jealous rage and shot and killed her mother and her mother's two friends and then killed himself. It changed my life."

That man was Alex Egyed, a budding computer entrepreneur who may have been a well recognized name today if he hadn't gone on a rampage and left Sandy covered in blood, huddling in a bathtub with her friend. Unfortunately, that wasn't the only incident Sandy was going to have with extreme violence.

> CONNIE
> "Another episode happened to her; she's walkin' home from school, uh, sees this guy runnin' up behind her, girl in front of her, sees the guy shoot…the girl, in the back of the head. She's already gone through this. Now this is two. How many times – I mean, I'm forty-eight years old, I mean, I've never seen anyone, in my lifetime, get shot. She's seen two."

These episodes left Sandy a broken girl; a girl barely on the cusp of her womanhood.

> "I detached myself from my emotions, I didn't have a sense of life or death, it's all the same to me."

Yet she was still a significant part of Troy's life. And Troy really needed love in his life, since his own family had self destructed.

> "My parents got divorced and I kinda bounced back and forth between them. It was kinda a struggle for me for awhile but, it's nothin' outta the ordinary… Any other kid goes through it."
> "His father must have been very tough on him, very abusive, I believe, with him. And his mother was never around. I know they were separated. But I don't think his mother came around too much, I don't know if it was because of the father…or what, you know, but uh, I guess he looked at me, more like a mother figure you know because he's always sent me, even till this day, sends me a bouquet of mother's day flowers."

Troy and Sandy were both set adrift at a young age, both from broken homes, both experiencing severe forms of trauma – albeit Troy's were less extreme. Because of his need for love, Troy grew ever closer to Sandy while Sandy threw herself into an abyss. Like many traumatized girls, Sandy began to slip down into degeneracy and self abuse.

She began to hang around shady men and casinos while barely being a fully fledged teen, and at the age of fourteen she ran into James Kelly at the Circus Circus casino.

> "I met Cotton Kelly at Circus Circus eight months prior to this actual tragedy."
> "He ran some type of, um, adult entertainment business. He wanted me to pose nude for him."
> "He had started following me and calling my house constantly, harassing my family… And as a fifteen year old child, I made a very bad decision, a very immature request and I called upon Troy to beat the man up. To have him, leave me alone."

A normal girl with a strong family could have resolved this situation with ease. A simple, hard talk by a good father with this James Kelly character would have spared everyone a lot of tragedy. Sandy, however, had drifted far away from being a normal girl and with nothing but a weak family at her disposal she allowed this situation to escalate and continue. Perhaps she even began to be sexual with Kelly, though she does not mention the full depth of their relationship.

In the end she turned to the one man she knew she could depend on.

> "Me and a friend of mine from high school agreed to beat this guy up, because he was doin' some things to some teenaged girls that we knew. She was a friend of mine, she was like a, a sister kind of, to me."
> "This guy, I felt, was takin' advantage of a friend of mine, and she asked for my help… And…I…went, kinda overboard."

Eight months. That's how long Sandy allowed James Kelly to be a part of her life. How many nights did Sandy turn to Troy? How many nights did she cry on Troy's shoulder, detailing the horrors that James Kelly inflicted on her – and which she allowed to be inflicted on her. How many times did Troy have to hear Connie, a powerless mother, express her grief and frustration over this older man taking advantage of her daughter? Troy loved both these women.

Troy decided to save them. He told Sandy to lure Kelly out to the desert. So one night, in 1986, Sandy did just that. She made Kelly stop the car, claiming that she needed to pee. She went out, came back, pretended to hurt her leg and when Kelly came out to help her Troy put six bullets in Kelly's head.

> "For a reason that I, uh, can't really understand, I decided to bring a gun and shoot the man. And killed him."
> "I didn't go to sleep that night."

Troy Kell, eighteen, murdered a degenerate man. He did it because he loved the tragic but degenerate Sandy Shaw. Because they bragged about the murder, soon schoolmates were visiting Kelly's body in the desert.

When asked if he thought about running Troy said; "Yeah, of course." When asked why he didn't, "I…I don't know. I didn't have anywhere to run too. I couldn't just keep on runnin' and runnin'."

Troy didn't run because everything he loved lived on the corner one street over from his house. There was nothing else in the world for him.

One of the children who visited the body in the desert told their parents, and soon the police had Troy, his accomplice and Sandy in custody. They would convict Troy.

Surprisingly, Sandy was also tried and convicted. These were the days just before peak feminism so women weren't the infallible angels that they are treated as today but still, after hearing about her abuse and her tragic past, the jurors sent a fifteen year old girl to jail for over twenty years.

In order to survive in jail, Troy quickly joined up with the white supremacist gangs. Eventually this would lead to the second murderous ambush of his life. Troy and fellow gang member Eric Daniels attacked Lonnie Blackmon with Eric holding his legs and Troy stabbing Blackmon with a shank 67 times. For this second murder Troy himself is currently waiting to face death.

I reiterate once more; by all accounts Troy was a normal kid. There was nothing in his childhood that would have led anyone to believe that Troy one day would end up a murderer of two men while leading a white supremacist gang in prison. If he just had to weather a broken home, as far too many middle class children nowadays do, he may have had a chance to move on and become a man of worth; other men have suffered worse and managed to raise good families and live a good life. Unfortunately Troy had the tragic fate of loving a girl who also came from a broken home, and like most women from such situations Sandy did not have the inner strength struggle for normalcy. She gave herself to degenerates and came to Troy whenever she needed to use his love.

This is a theme all too familiar with young men today. Young men are struggling to find peace in their lives while having to deal with their broken female counterparts. Most men can’t help loving who they love, and far too many men pay too high a price for this once noble emotion. The tragedies surrounding Troy Kell and Sandy Shaw provide an extreme example of this – and in the case of Sandy her despair motivated self destruction is understandable – but the dynamic of good men who need love and the rotten women who use it is one of the great (and unnecessary) social plagues of the modern age. Perhaps it always has been, going back through every society since time immemorial.

It seems nowadays that there is an epidemic of men being destroyed because of single parent upbringings or broken women. Yet Troy was destroyed in 1986. Who knows how many potentially decent men in the past have been destroyed because of similar situations. Who knows how many more in the future we'll have?

We know the symptoms – it's time to cure the disease, or we can expect nothing but more and more unnecessary tragedies like Troy Kell's to occur in the future. Do we really want to grow old and live in a society full of young men like that?

I end with a comment from the video's youtube page,

> Darrylizer1
> "Troy Kell is one the one hand a despicable human being, a stone cold killer, a sociopath or near one and a racist. But he's in some ways he's likeable, even admirable: he's articulate, intelligent and is absolutely honest with himself and for the most part unblinded by bullshit. I'm not saying that he should or shouldn't be put to death. His circumstance is just a very sad waste of human potential."

*As of this article's publication, Troy is still awaiting his death sentence. He requested to be shot by a firing squad.

6 Reasons Why You Should Know How To Cook

January 28, 2014 | by OMYG | Link | Original Link

For too long grilled cheese sandwiches, microwaved TV dinners, scrambled eggs and cereal mix recipes have been passed down by men for generations. And for too long cooking has been generalized as a feminine skill. A masculine man is not expected to cook, but now this trait is a mere necessity. As times change (go to shit) so does our expected behaviors as a gender. It is evident that the 21st century man can only benefit from learning how to cook. Some might argue this is a gender reversed trait and supports the feminist cause, but I say no. It is a virtuous characteristic in a man and it's not reversing the roles of men and women alike but simply improving a man and adding another skill to one's toolbox. Most men that cook see nothing but the benefits this skill brings them.

My story

When I first started cooking it came out of necessity. I started hitting the gym and I was dedicated towards adding a couple pounds on my frame. I started cooking eggs for myself every morning. The first few weeks the eggs would stick on the pan, burn, or come out raw. Sometimes I would flip the eggs and they would land somewhere on the stove. As time progressed I was able to cook eggs like a graduate chef from Le Cordon Bleu. I was able to create more complex recipes such as adding vegetables, making an omelet, etc.

Eventually my breakfast cooking skills set the foundation for other more complex meals. My skills improved and so did my curiosity for new foods. I was soon able to cook rice, chicken, steamed veggies. It all evolved and soon I would be able to make a more abundant amount of breakfast and dinner dishes. Cooking is now a skill I practice daily. It was a process in which the practical work felt effortless, my theory; the feeling of hunger motivates you and obscures the practice of cooking.

In no particular order here are 6 reasons why you should know how to cook:

1. It will increase your value

If you've studied game or made an effort towards self-improvement you know that in order to be a more desirable or respected man you must add value to yourself. This can mean exhibiting the skills you know. By doing things that most men can't do you offer more value versus a man that can't perform the skills you can. In other words you are worth more than another being if you are more productive than someone else. This can apply to any skill but cooking can be another one on the list.

2. You will know more than the average western woman

It is no secret that most western women, specifically American women, have no feminine instinct. A traditional women cooks, cleans and take care of the house, women like this are almost extinct in the states (just imagine my generation in a couple years). By casually hinting about your cooking skills you will already rein superiority over her, if she is unable to cook. It is powerful because she will not know how to do a task she knows she is supposed to know as a woman. The result is a women subconsciously placing you in a higher tier of value than herself. Even if you do not live in America you can boast about the fact that you can.

3. You will impress

Cooking will not only make a woman a little more vulnerable in a sense but it will also certainly intrigue her and impress her. Assuming she already is attracted to you, it will only add more reasons into her head why she should sleep with you (if you haven't yet). If you take the 'Home Made Dinner' route you will certainly impress and it's a great aphrodisiac. It is simply a woman's fantasy.

4. It demonstrates your independence

Cooking sends out a strong message of independence. It will be evident to people around you and especially women that you do not rely upon anybody to cook you a meal. You are a man that stands for himself at all costs, and cooking is a great metric when it comes to demonstrating your individuality.

5. It is a healthier bet for you

Cooking your own meals automatically means a healthier intake of food. You are eliminating all the other dietary factors that fast food joints and restaurants tend to use such as excessive cooking oil, processed foods etc., even if some places claim to be “healthy” (you never know what goes on behind the doors). When you cook you decide what to put in your body, thus putting thought and making conscious choices of what goes in, especially if you’re a fitness nut. There is nothing better than taking in healthy, clean food that you prepared at your liking, because you know your diet is one of the most important factors when pursuing a fitness related goal.

6. It’s less harsh on your wallet

Cooking will not only filter healthier food into your body but you will also see how it affects your wallet. You can go to the supermarket and buy a week’s worth of food for the same amount of two days of fast food (assuming you eat the same amount). Farmer’s market and even Whole Foods are still a more convenient bet rather than ordering takeout, microwaving pre-made or processed foods.

Get cookin'

If you want these benefits practice is the magic word. If you already cook, step up your game and try new recipes. If you do not know how to cook yet then simply dive in, it is never too late (or too early) to learn. Tell yourself you are only going to cook from home or you won't eat at all, and you will see the innovation and motivation hunger brings. Disregarding how macho one might feel, cooking is a skill that requires minimal investment and the payoff truly outweighs the effort.

The One Law Of Economics That Shapes Your Sex Life

January 29, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Three years ago I ended up at a male strip club in Vegas. I will spare you guys the details of why it came about, but it was in support of a cause. Myself and my three friends were the only males inside this room of sexually charged up females. So we are talking an actual ratio of 1:25 if not more.

When the show ended, something amazing happened. Girls, and attractive ones, started lining up to come talk to us. They initiated conversations. They offered their numbers. All we did was just stand there.

The above is an extreme example of supply vs. demand at work. A basic tenet of economics, it has a serious impact on your sex life by directly influencing your interactions with women. To those unfamiliar with the concept:

> So we have supply, which is how much of something you have, and demand, which is how much of something people want. Put the two together, and you have supply and demand.
> Now, how do you show the relationship between the two? One way is to use the price of something. Generally speaking, the price of something will go up if the demand goes up. Why? Because the seller thinks he or she can get more money for whatever he or she is selling…

And this last sentence is the key to how this translates over to the sexual marketplace.

This past year I lived in several very different environments, both abroad and within state lines. I will exclude my time in Russia and Ukraine from this observational article because the novelty of being an American there throws a variable into the mix that skews the supply vs. demand analysis.

So what we have left is my time in Los Angeles versus New York. I am the same person in both states, and have the same objective value. Yet my relative value was completely different.

Los Angeles

In Los Angeles, the supply of eligible single men is quite high. On any given day, a girl can have her pick of an endless sea of suitors whether it be online, on the streets, or at a bar. Conversely, the amount of feminine, thin, and likable girls is very slim for the man looking to interact with the aforementioned female. Thus, there is a high demand for such quality girls.

Admittedly, upon returning from three months in Russia and Ukraine I hardly wanted to deal with an American girl. But a man has to eat so I would put on my shoes and head out into the wild, be it bars and clubs, online dating, etc.

One Saturday night I went out with a few friends to a trendy bar. Two girls were standing by the bar, let's say 7s. Two guys were talking to them and clearly trying to hit on them. Behind those two guys, were two other guys waiting their turn. It was a moment of realization for me, pure clarity. This is why the girls in Los Angeles are so delusional. The demand for a cute girl is so high that guys are literally lining up to speak to them.

This serves as a clear example of supply vs. demand. There was an excess of guys (supply) waiting to approach the few cute 7s in the bar (demand). Needless to say both sets got blown out, as the girls now believe—and can you really even fault them—that their value is so high that only the best of the best should grace their vaginas.

Another time I helped a friend approach two girls. I was just trying to entertain the ugly one to give him some time to work on his girl. Mine was a 6 on her best day on Earth. Yet she wouldn't even recognize my existence and stormed away after 30 seconds to punish me for trying to talk to her. Again, I was in Los Angeles where the supply vs. demand balance turned heavily in her favor.

So I pretty much wrote nightlife off. I had a few girls in rotation and just stuck with that. Even they were delusional, but with appropriate game their absurdities were kept in check.

* Note: The one exception in Los Angeles is if you have power in the entertainment field. In this world, the supply of willing actresses is so high compared to the powers that be (agents, producers, etc.) that it substantially reverses the playing field.

New York City

Can changing one metropolis for another yield an entirely different sexual dynamic? The answer is a resounding yes. Off the bat I will acknowledge there are many factors that make NYC a wonderful place to game. Logistics being #1 and closing time being #2. That said, I go back to the supply vs. demand principle.

Bars and clubs, not to mentions restaurants, cafés, and streets are just overwhelmed with girls. I walked into a bar one night and, I'll never forget this, there were without exaggeration 20 girls in a row sitting at the bar without a single penis in between. You go online and there is an endless sea of prospects. Better looking prospects too.

Essentially, the scale is flipped in New York compared to Los Angeles. There is an incredible amount of supply (available women), rendering the competition for males higher (demand). So how does this translate into your interactions with them?

Cockblocking: Girls here just don't cockblock. Sure there are exceptions, but numerous times girls just leave their friends with you. Multiple times we've had one girl say to the other, "Hey I'm going home have fun" and just leave her friend with me or another buddy. The few times I've had a girl cockblock, my target just brushed them off and said leave me alone.

Why? Perhaps the jealous friend thinks if her friend is now occupied, she has one less person to compete with her for the low (relative) supply of men. And the target of the cockblock will more readily tell her friends to go fuck themselves because she knows opportunities are slim to meet quality gentlemen.

The Pursuit: This is the most stark difference. Here girls are the aggressors. They tell me to take their number more than I have to ask for it. They text to confirm dates. I have to find ways to exit conversations. They text me the day after dates. They reinitiate conversations after a day or two of silence. Sure this goes on in LA too, but it is the exception rather than the rule.

Why? I may be off here but the sample size is too large to ignore. While I still get the flakes, it is severely reduced. To me it stems from the fact that they know they are easily replaceable—act now or lose the guy forever. In this market, there is an endless supply just like them.

Macro vs. Micro Application

Though not a direct analogy with the macro vs. micro economics analysis, one does not have to uproot his city to sway the balance of supply and demand. Go to the bar that has more girls than guys. Attend functions that are women heavy – dance or yoga classes, cooking, and so on.There are ways to increase your value simply by inserting yourself in an environment where there are fewer of you.

That said, if you have the ability to do it on a macro level, do yourself a favor and do so. It's quite refreshing to have girls ready, willing, and desiring to be hit on by you on a consistent basis.

5 Reasons Why The Gender Pay Gap Is Bogus

January 29, 2014 | by Marshall Faulk | Link | Original Link

Years ago, I took a class in women's studies. It started when I was talking to this girl at the campus bar:

> Girl: Are you a feminist?
> Me: No
> Girl: You don't believe in the equality between men and women?
> Me: Of course I do
> Girl: Then you're a feminist
> Me: Do you believe in the equality between men and women?
> Girl: Of course I do
> Me: What remains unequal?
> Girl: The gender pay gap for one and—
> Me: What about dating?
> Girl: What about dating?
> Me: Men predominantly paying for dates and going for the first kiss, taking on more risk of rejection. Do you find that equal?
> Girl: No and I don't like it
> Me: You never let the guy pay for a date?
> Girl: Never
> Me: When was the last time you went for the first kiss?
> Girl: I kissed a girlfriend at last week's party
> Me: And a guy that you were actually interested in?
> Girl: Hmm….

> Me: I want another drink. This round is on me.
> Girl: Didn't I just say that I don't let guys pay for me?
> Me: So get the round after

There was some good tension and she eventually went for the first kiss. We had some fun, one thing led to another and I ended up taking a women's studies course as an elective. At the time, I didn't know much about the subject and I was actually open to learning more about it. It involved some reading, writing, and giving presentations, things that came easy to me.

The gender pay gap was one of our first topics. Everyone in that class believed it and no one bothered to do any research of their own. We've been hearing about this for years starting in high school. To this day, the 'sexist' gender pay gap is still taught in schools across North America and it is repeated by the majority of mass media.

Later when I started doing research of my own, all of the raw data showed otherwise. What has been presented was partial and biased. Evidence started piling up against this myth since the 90's, but feminists still continue to repeat it and rally together every year on 'Equal Pay Day'. With any type of inspection, we find that this phenomenon has nothing to do with sexist discrimination. Here are five major areas that contribute to the difference in raw and net wage:

1. Women work less and opt for more benefits

In 2009, the US Department of Labor commissioned an Analysis of Reasons for the Disparity in Wages Between Men and Women. This report analyzed recent data from the Census Bureau, Department of Labor and reports from other major institutions regarding the subject, totalling more than 50 peer-reviewed papers.

The findings were:

1. More women work part-time and part-time work tends to pay less than full-time work.
2. More women leave the labor force for child-birth and child care.
3. The pay gap focuses on raw yearly wages. Total compensation is more accurate than raw wages as women prefer to take a greater portion of their compensation in the form of health insurance and other fringe benefits (such as pensions).
4. The pay gap is closer to 4.8-7.1 percent as opposed to the '75 cents on the dollar' figure that gets thrown around.

In the 2007 Bureau of Labor statistics, it showed that 27% of full-time working males and only 15% of full-time working females worked 41 hours or more per week. 4% of men and 12% of women work 35-39 hours a weeks. You can't expect to put in fewer hours, receive more benefits, and get paid the same raw wage. Canada has similar government data.

2. Wage gap data between men and women in the same field is presented with bias

The data above only shows the raw wage gap between men and women in general. It doesn't even compare men and women working in the same field. The occupational categories used to compare earnings in the same field are ridiculous.

For example, physicians and surgeons are grouped together. Under this broad category, women only earn 64% as much as men (and sometimes it's presented as female doctors only make 64% of what male doctors make). However, surgeons tend to significantly out earn pediatricians/general practitioners and women only make up 16% of surgeons. This trend can be seen across other "occupational categories" as well, and the vast majority of flawed comparisons are conducted this way.

Even the most recent comparison between male and female physicians only examined the yearly raw wage. Total hours worked was completely ignored. A reasonable person would think that is at least somewhat relevant. It seems that the data presented is always partial and biased in some manner.

When you compare unmarried and childless women with men in the same circumstances, women earn 8% more in general. This gap no longer exists when you compare women and men of the same education level, but the comparisons still falls under the broad occupational categories. Jobs with a higher economic demand pays more and women tend to avoid these choices. These higher paying jobs generally have more demanding (and often unpleasant) hours and require more technical training (cardiac surgeon vs. part-time pediatrician, for example).

3. Women consistently fall behind men in the work place

The most comprehensive study on this subject was conducted by Claudia Goldin and Lawrence Kats of Harvard and Marianne Bertrand of the University of Chicago. They followed around 2500 MBA graduates between 1990 and 2006.

After graduation, men and women earned the same. But over the next 10 years, women fell behind because they had children (more women also took marketing courses while more men took finance courses that paid more). By the 10 year mark, about half of the women with children were working full-time. This was complete with career interruptions due to the children. On the other hand, almost all of the male graduates were still working full-time. Women chose to spend more time with child care and domestic life. This is a simple trade-off—you choose what appeals more to you.

4. Dangerous jobs men work pay higher wages

Men work more dangerous jobs, work longer hours, and experience more unemployment

Between 2007 and 2010, men have lost 7.4 million jobs while women only lost 3.9 million jobs. Women now make up the majority of the work force.

While women now make up the majority, 92% of workplace fatalities happen to men. In the same census data, it showed that out of approximately 256 billion total work hours, 56% was contributed by men (despite having lower employment rate than women in 2010). Can you imagine the outrage if these stats were reversed?

A disproportionate share of fatal work injuries involved men relative to their hours worked in 2010.

81.6% of workplace homicides were inflicted upon men. It would make sense for jobs with significantly higher fatality rates to pay better.

5. The push for comparable worth leads to incorrect conclusions

Comparable worth is the concept that if jobs filled mostly by women are judged "comparable" to jobs filled mostly by men, wages for both should be the same. This completely ignores the actual economic demand and output involved.

The one remaining argument is that women are socially pressured to pursue these lower paying jobs. Funny enough, the campaign for 'equal pay' doesn't inform women of the choices that lead to higher pay. It also refuses the possibility that men and women in general have different work preferences.

Even Iceland and Sweden follows the same choice trends and they are considered to be the most gender-equal countries in the world. Their women still have the tendency to go for lower-paying jobs in the public sector, part-time jobs, and they spend more time in domestic life than men (click on Iceland/Sweden once you land on the page).

If feminists actually wished for women as a whole to earn the same as men in a fair manner, they would educate women on the choices that lead to more raw wages. This includes taking high risk/high fatality jobs (flight engineers, pilots, industrial machinery repair/maintenance/installation, etc), jobs in the hard sciences, joining sub-fields requiring more technological skills and training, not having children, working longer hours (trial lawyer vs family lawyer), chasing higher salary instead of benefits like health insurance and pension, etc…However, equal pay campaigns do nothing to teach this.

The feminists that continue to push for equal pay are basically pushing for comparable worth so that women can be paid the same despite working fewer hours in lower paying jobs while keeping the benefits. This ignores all real data and the goal is to get more benefits without the obligation. These concepts throw economics right out the window and it's simply not viable for a country that wants to thrive over the long-term. It has nothing to do with sexism. In a free competition market, higher economic demand leads to more pay and companies with higher costs and lower output will get taken out.

Ultimately, the fallacies above can be summed up in one real-world test: if it was actually cheaper to hire a woman for the same productive output in the same job at the same company (75 cents on the dollar for example), companies would only hire women and slaughter the competition with significantly lower costs of operation.

NA[X]ALT Is Not A Legitimate Argument For Any Group

January 29, 2014 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

Many groups are under attack for ill conduct by some members of their own group. The common phrase "N*ot all [insert group here] are like that*" is brought up by other members of the group to avoid association with the bad apple. In the manosphere, the phrase "N*ot all women are like that*" is used so often that we have simply abbreviated it as NAWALT. However, women are not the only group to use this argument. Others include priests, law enforcement officers, and martial artists.

This argument means that members of any given group do not want to be judged by the actions of the worst of their group, even when they are happy to take credit for the actions of the best. If people wish this to be possible, then they must hold the members of their group to standards and take action when people fail to meet them.

On the contrary, many groups stay silent when a group member misbehaves, in order to avoid making waves or drama. Sometimes they will protect the group member out of loyalty. By doing this, they are enabling the bad behavior. The public will soon associate the entire group with the bad apples.

Catholic Priests

The role of a religious leader was to strengthen ties of community kinship by preaching about tolerance, love, and family, hoping to fight against man's self-destructive impulses. The fact that almost every civilization had some religious figure in their communities shows that their service was worth more than the extra mouth to feed and the building to house them.

However, in order to do their job they need the trust and respect of the community. The flood of child abuse allegations against the Catholic church has seriously undermined their credibility. Leaders in the Catholic church are claiming that many of their priests are being unfairly stereotyped by the media, even though they have done nothing wrong. In other words "N*ot all priests are like that*."

As shown in the Wikipedia article linked above, men in the Catholic priesthood are no more likely than other men to be pedophiles, but what angers people is the cover up. When concerns were brought to the top leaders in the church, those leaders did nothing. Perhaps they didn't believe that one of their own order would do such a thing. Maybe they were just cowards. However, the public perception is that the non-pedophile priests were defending the ones who were doing wrong on purpose.

Law Enforcement Officers

During the events of 9/11, law enforcement officers in New York along with other emergency workers did an incredible job of saving as many lives as they could in the aftermath of the attack. There is nothing unique about law enforcement in New York compared to other parts of the country. Therefore if the 9/11 attacks had happened elsewhere in the country, it is reasonable to assume that the officers there would respond with the same courage. Across the country police were still heaped with well-deserved praise which they gladly accepted for being in the same group as the heroes of 9/11.

However, there are many stories of law enforcement acting badly. Overzealous police officers have killed people who have done little or nothing wrong in stories that can be found here, here, and here. In all of these situations, law enforcement acted with terrible judgment and they were protected by their own. Police officers do face many perils in their job, and getting shot is not a rare occurrence. So just like soldiers in a war they have very strong ties with each other and would not throw their comrades under the bus because they followed what was usually standard procedure.

Martial Artists

In one of my earlier posts I talked about how the quality of martial arts schools have gone down in the last few decades. The good martial arts instructors did not protect the bad ones, but they did stay silent. These are two of the rules at my school word-for-word:

- Never argue with an instructor for he is always right.
- Serve and obey without question.

These rules led to greater discipline in good schools, but the same rules applied to bad schools made students afraid to question their instructor on why they didn't feel like they were learning how to actually fight. When fake martial arts schools first started popping, up the good teachers ignored it to the detriment of the students who attended them.

Now in order to combat the scourge of McDojos, if I ever have my own school I will demand that the students question me if they feel something is wrong. That lack of respect is something I will have to bear for belonging to a group that didn't maintain the quality of its members in the past.

Scientists

This is the only group I would consider completely immune to this problem. Every time a scientist makes a claim he needs to back it up with an experiment and the experiment is checked by other researchers. If it is discovered that he falsified data, no other scientist will defend him. He is forever exiled from the group. That is why, outside of super-conservative religious groups, most people will take anything a scientist says on faith because they have so much well-earned credibility.

Women

It is well-known that women have a strong in-group preference: the sisterhood. Here are a few ways that women defend the wrongdoings of other women.

- Divorcing a loyal husband and taking full custody of the children to get more child support.
- Lying about being pregnant in order to get a marriage proposal or money for a fake abortion.
- Drugging your husband, tying him up, and chopping off his penis.
- Stabbing your boyfriend 27 times and shooting him in the head and claiming self defense.

No man on any manosphere site believes that most women are out to cut off their boyfriend's dick and murder him. However, women will stand by the women who do these things or just stay silent most of the time. When this happens, women should not be surprised to find that they are being treated as an accomplice in spirit.

Men are more than ready to discipline their members for wrongdoing. When men found out what the Taliban were doing to women, they joined the military and risked their lives to stop them. It isn't too much to ask women to speak out against their sisters at no risk to their life.

It is the job of the Catholic priesthood to ensure the integrity of the Church. It is the job of police officers to ensure the responsibility of their fellow officers. And it is the job of women to maintain the morality of the sisterhood.

Everyone knows that there are bad individuals in every occupation. However, when the good people defend the bad, they should expect that the public will regard them with the same level of disgust as the people who actually commit bad actions. If you stand beside a friend who is getting righteous shit thrown at him, then you can't complain when some of it hits you too. People don’t think you are all “like that”, but they will not forgive you for defending those who are “like that.”

6 Powerful Passages From Meditations By Marcus Aurelius

January 29, 2014 | by Robert Conti | Link | Original Link

In the final decade of Roman Emperor Marcus Aurelius' life he wrote a series of personal philosophies intended for himself; these would later be published as Meditations. Some are quotes, most are prescriptions for self-improvement. Aurelius was a student of stoic philosophy. Stoicism deals with emotional intelligence, mind over matter, being tied to nature, and exercising philosophy through actions over words. Meditations is repetitive of it's central themes. Considering that this was essentially his notebook, he was most likely engaging in behavior modification through written affirmations. Here are some of the highlights from selected themes.

Rise above the bullshit.

> Tell yourself: The people I deal with today will be meddling, arrogant, dishonest, jealous, and surly. They are like this because they can't tell good from evil. But I have seen the beauty of good, and the ugliness of evil, and have recognized that the wrongdoer has a nature related to my own—not of the same blood or birth, but the same mind, and possessing a share of the divine. And so none of them can hurt me. No one can implicate me in ugliness. Nor can I feel angry at my relative, or hate him. We were born to work to together… To obstruct each other is unnatural. To feel anger at someone, to turn your back on him: these are obstructions.
> Choose not to be harmed—and you won't feel harmed. Don't feel harmed—and > you haven't been.

> We all love ourselves more than other people, but care more about their opinion than our own.
> It can only ruin your life only if it ruins your character. Otherwise it cannot harm you—inside or out.
> The tranquility that comes when you stop caring what they say. Or think, or do. Only what you do.
> It's silly to try to escape other peoples' faults. They are inescapable. Just try to escape your own.
> Leave other peoples' mistakes where they lie.
> That kindness is invincible, provided it's sincere—not ironic or an act.

Conduct yourself properly.

> Independence and unvarying reliability … to be the same in all circumstances—intense pain, the loss of a child, chronic illness … a man can show both strength and flexibility … accept favors from friends without losing your self-respect or appearing ungrateful.
> … fatherly authority in the home … Gravity without airs. To show intuitive sympathy to friends, tolerance to amateurs and sloppy thinkers … ability to get along with everyone … To investigate and analyze, with understanding and logic … Not to display anger or other emotions. To be free of passion and yet full of love. To praise without bombast, to display expertise without pretension.
> Not to be constantly correcting people, and in particular not to jump on them whenever they make an error of usage or a grammatical mistake or mispronounce something, but just answer their question or add another example, or debate the issues itself (not their phrasing), or make some other contribution to the discussion—and insert the right expression, unobtrusively.
> Never under compulsion, out of selfishness, without forethought, without misgivings … No surplus words or unnecessary actions. Let the spirit in you represent a man … Taking up his post like a soldier and patiently awaiting his recall from life. Needing no oath or witness. Cheerfulness. Without requiring other people's help. Or serenity supplied by others. To stand up straight—not straightened.

Use your mind as the powerful tool that it is.

> Concentrate every minute … on doing what's in front of you with precise and genuine seriousness, tenderly, willingly, with justice. And on freeing yourself from all other distractions … you do everything as if it were the last thing you were doing in your life, and stop being aimless, stop letting your emotions override what your mind tells you, stop being hypocritical, self-centered, irritable.

> You need to avoid certain things in your train of thought: everything random and irrelevant. And certainly everything self-important or malicious.
> You can lead an untroubled life provided you can grow, can think and act systematically.
> Not to assume it's impossible because you find it hard. But to recognize that if it's humanly possible, you can do it too.
> …your responsibilities can be broken down into individual parts as well. Concentrate on those, and finish the job methodically…
> Practice really hearing what people say. Do your best to get inside their minds.
> Today I escaped from anxiety. Or no, I discarded it, because it was within me, in my own perceptions—not outside.

Focus on your own internal rhythms.

> People try to get away from it all—to the country, to the beach, to the mountains … Which is idiotic: you can get away from it anytime you like. By going within. Nowhere you can go is more peaceful—more free of interruptions—than your own soul.
> Ignoring what goes on in other people's souls—no one ever came to grief that way. But if you won't keep track of what your own soul's doing, how can you not be unhappy?
> To shrug it all off and wipe it clean—every annoyance and distraction—and reach utter stillness.
> The things you think about determine the quality of your mind. Your soul takes on the color of your thoughts.
> When jarred, unavoidably, by circumstances, revert at once to yourself, and don't lose the rhythm more than you can help. You'll have a better grasp of the harmony if you keep on going back to it.
> You have to assemble your life yourself—action by action. And be satisfied if one achieves it goal, as far as it can. No one can keep that from happening.

Everything is interconnected.

> Constant awareness that everything is born from change. The knowledge that there is nothing nature loves more than to alter what exists and to make new things like it. All that exists is the seed of what will emerge from it. You think the only seeds are the ones that make plants and children? Go deeper.
> Some people, when they do someone a favor, are always looking to call it in. And some aren't, but they're still aware of it—still regard it as a debt. But others don't even do that. They're like a vine that produces grapes without looking for anything in return.

> People exist for one another. You can instruct or endure them.
> You participate in a society by your existence. Then participate in its life through your actions—all your actions. Any action not directed toward a social end is a disturbance to your life, an obstacle to wholeness, a source of dissension.
> To enter others' minds and let them enter yours.
> A branch cut away from the branch beside it is simultaneously cut away from the whole tree. So too a human being separated from another is cut loose from the whole community. The branch is cut off by someone else. But people cut themselves off—through hatred, through rejection—and don't realize that they're cutting themselves off from the whole civic enterprise… We can reattach ourselves and become once more components of the whole. But if the rupture is too often repeated, it makes the severed part hard to reconnect, and to restore. You can see the difference between the branch that's been there since the beginning, remaining on the tree and growing with it, and the one that's been cut off and grafted back.

Be grounded, diminish the ego.

> In the ring, our opponents can gouge us with their nails or butt us with their heads and leave a bruise, but we don't denounce them for it or get upset with them or regard them from then on as violent types. We just keep an eye on them after that. Not out of hatred or suspicion. Just keeping a friendly distance. We need to do that in other areas. We need to excuse what our sparring partners do, and just keep our distance—without suspicion or hatred.
> If anyone can refute me—show me I'm making a mistake or looking at things from the wrong perspective—I'll gladly change. It's the truth I'm after, and the truth never harmed anyone. What harms us is to persist in self-deceit and ignorance.
> Is my intellect up to this? If so, then I'll put it to work, like a tool provided by nature. And if it isn't, then I'll turn the job over to someone who can do it better—unless I have no choice.
> When faced with people's bad behavior, turn around and ask when you have acted like that.
> That to expect bad people not to injure others is crazy. It's to ask the impossible. And to let them behave like that to other people but expect them to exempt you is arrogant.

What is quoted above is edited. Aurelius has much more to say in Meditations. It's the favorite book of several powerful people for a reason. Do yourself a favor, pick up a copy, and read it often.

The Anatomy Of A Typical Feminist Rant

January 29, 2014 | by TheMaskAndRose | Link | Original Link

There are some common understandings throughout the manosphere regarding feminism. One of the most prominent is the idea that feminism, as taught academically in Women's Studies classes across the nation, are intellectually dishonest, morally bankrupt, and reliant upon lies and distortion in order to indoctrinate students.

Commonly cited is the fact that feminists have been, so far, completely unable to back up or prove a single one of their major talking points with anything resembling empirical evidence. So what, then, do they rely on in order to parrot the same word salad of incoherent nonsense with such vigor? To answer that question, I decided to try a thought experiment today.

I was thinking about how intellectually lazy and easy it is to qualify oneself as a feminist, and decided that I would look around my room and write a feminist diatribe about how the first thing I see can be shown to "oppress women" in terms that would surely cause feminists to nod along and cheer me on. As it were, the first thing I saw was my laptop charger. What follows is my off-the-top-of-my-head rant about how it's keeping women down.

How Laptop Chargers Oppress Women

I went to plug in my laptop today, and I had to use my charger. You know what, guys? There's something that really bothers me about the way the plug gets kinda "forced" into the socket. I know from my nerdy computer class in high school that the plug is called the "male" and the socket is called the "female" in tech terms. I mean, the "male" needs to go in the "female!!!" Guys, even our TECHNOLOGY perpetuates rape culture!1!1! It's so deeply embedded that we don't even stop to think about how widespread it is. Is it any wonder that 54 out of every 3 women get raped with laptop parts like this? Like a socket needs a plug to work…puh-lease!

OMG you guys where do I even start? In case the patriarchal use of language which CLEARLY reinforces cultural gender stereotypes aren't obvious enough, I'll explain my sudden and visceral reaction of hostility to this choice of language. That's right guys: though my feminist masters have convinced me that I'm capable of running a big corporation or even a country, I tend to fly into histrionics whenever I see words I don't like. I might be a hypocrite about all this, but it's how I feel, so that means I'm right. Plus it's my prerogative to change my mind cuz like, lol, YOLO or something.

First of all, the use of "male" and "female" are CLEARLY oppressive terms that fail to recognize what we all know: gender is a purely social construct that has nothing to do with biology or sexual dimorphism. To refer to plugs as "male" and sockets as "female" reinforces a hetero-normative culture where people can't just decide what gender they are based on their feelings, which we all know is the true determinant of gender. What if a person with XX chromosomes feels like a boy….THEN OBVIOUSLY SHE IS! Guys it makes me cry that I have to point this out. Wow, just wow.

Why does everything that penetrates need to be referred to as “male” anyway? We all know lesbians use strap-ons and penetrate each other, and they’re definitely female! What about women who peg men, which our hero Hugo Schwyzer taught us is the way to put men in their place? You know, when he wasn’t busy banging his students and drunk-driving? Calling the penetrat-y, rape-y part “male” is like, SO outdated you guys! Just wow.

Also, once I plugged in my charger, I noticed that my laptop had to remain perfectly still, while the charger cord could flail around at its own discretion! Is there any more clear sign that the “female” needs to JUST STAY PUT, while the “male” can do WHATEVER IT WANTS?

Guys it really breaks my heart that we can’t recognize this kind of douchecanoe absurdity for exactly what it is… and need I mention that most tech fields are run by MEN? Of COURSE they would label the terms this way… they do such a good job at keeping women out of their offices that nobody like me was there to stop them!

I really wish they would let more strong, independent women into tech offices so we could right these horrible wrongs. I don’t know if men are just so stupid they don’t realize how their choice of words hurts everybody, or if it’s an accident… but either way, let’s form a lobbyist group and appeal to the government for hundreds of thousands of taxpayer money so we can DO SOMETHING ABOUT THIS YOU GUYS!!

A-man-jaw Marcuntte would be proud, no?

That rant took me a few seconds to come up with. No research required. No finding of citations to prove anything. Just a passionate-sounding diatribe involving the classic building blocks of feminist thought:

- All caps to emphasize important points
- The use of the phrase “wow just wow”
- Invoking mythological constructs like “patriarchy” and “male privilege,” the use of which guaranteed that like-minded retards in the audience would nod their heads and cheer me on
- Dropping the term “rape” in a completely inappropriate, smurf-like fashion

Critical thinking is hard. So is doing thorough research, cross-checking references to make sure a person actually knows what they’re talking about and understands both sides of the equation. So is responding to criticism in a thoughtful, intelligent manner.

Feminism is easy. Feminism is lazy. Feminism is the easy way out for histrionic attention whores who know exactly what buttons to push in order to rile up a frenzy; ugly, fat miserable shrews that they are, it’s the only way they’ll ever get the attention they crave from the men they so desire but would never give them the time of day.

The 5 Most Common Text Messages Girls Send (And How To Respond To Them)

As any seasoned player knows, after you date a significant amount of girls, you'll find that their text messages start to all sound like they're coming from the same girl. In other words, it'll appear they're following a script. As girls get increasingly more attention, simply for being girls, then they have less motivation to put effort into being original. You of course, can feel free to call them out on their trite responses, as I will show you right now.

Below are very common texts that you will receive from girls, guaranteed. Remember what the key component of Text Game is? Holding Frame. The moment you start jumping at her demands and playing into her Frame through text, is the moment you're dead in the water and the interaction will stop at texting.

Remember, there is a difference between answering a question like a normal human being and being annoying. Deflect enough questions and it will be harder to build comfort. Answer too many questions straight and you will fall into the average male texter group. Practice will teach you the right balance, but when in doubt, always always always choose to not be boring.

The following article is an excerpt from my new text messaging guide, which you can get here.

NOTE: The lack of punctuation is INTENTIONAL. Each text response written in here is exactly how you should text it. If you're a grammar nazi and feel the need to use proper grammar, feel free, but the results may not be the same.

1. "So…you must have a lot of girls huh?"

This is a shit test. Sample responses:

You: "i'm only dating 42 girls now, but I may make you 43" (Agree + Amplifying)

You: "nah. I'm actually a monk and a virgin" (Obvious sarcasm leaves her wondering)

You: "who is this?" (Great comeback which 'answers' her question + gets her mind reeling)

You: "k" (A brush off that you know where she's going with it and you could care less)

You: "between my 2 wives and 3 Gfs I'd say so" (Obvious sarcasm that is a classic)

You: "can't keep em away. Angeline Jolie is calling me BRB" (More playful sarcasm)

The key with these responses is that you don't actually respond in a logical manner. If you go beta and start explaining that she's 'special' and you don't really date, you'll cause her to lose attraction for you in a millisecond. Keep it light, playful and allow her imagination to do most of the work. Girls know when a guy has options and are drawn to men like that, but in the beginning you don't have to remind them blatantly. Lightly hinting at it is effective enough.

2. "So what do you do for fun?"

One of the most retarded questions but inevitable. Sample responses:

You: "when i'm not conquering the world or saving damsels in distress…" (The phrase ‘saving damsels in distress’ does not sound like a White Knight phrase, it conjures up thoughts of other girls being in your life and that you’re living an exciting adventurous life)

You: “sex” (This simple blunt response is a quick escalation into sexual conversation. She will either bite or not. If she does quickly then her interest level is high)

You: “rob banks” (Clearly a dry joke that lets off a slight ‘bad-boy’ image.)

You: “have u come over and drink this bottle of wine w/me” (Another quick escalation text that will gauge her interest quickly. This text is obviously dependent on what time of day she texts you)

You: “yawn” (The ‘Yawn’ text response is one of my favorites and very effective. It essentially sets the tone that she’s being boring and to step up her ‘game’. Girls will often rise to the challenge and drop the stale questions for something more exciting)

3. “So when are you taking me to dinner?”

This is a big shit test trying to determine if you’re a Beta Provider or a Alpha Male she wants to sleep with immediately). Sample responses:

You: “right after you cook” (Re-sets the Frame so that she must please you and not you please her)

You: “I’m on a 30 day liquid diet. Vodka and whiskey” (A lighter playful deflection that puts the thought of drinking together in her mind. If you’re wanting quick sex than it’s key to be thought of as the Good-Time-Guy and not the Provider-Boyfriend Role.)

You: “when my food stamps card renews” (NOTE: Only use if it’s OBVIOUS that you are well to do financially, or otherwise it’s not funny and the humor will go over her head. If you have money and say this, then it’s humorous)

You: “Salvation Army has free meals every night at 7p. Lemme kno how it is” (This is a harsher reply that can work when her attraction to you is high. It’s obvious that you’re not going to be a meal ticket and she can decide if she’s going to continue talking with you or not. This is an excellent way to weed out the gold-diggers from the girls DTF)

You: “dinner? Havent even seen u naked yet doll” (A Re-Frame laying down the law in a playful manner, that she isn’t getting dinner until you’ve sampled the ‘goods’ first)

You: “Cooking dinner in a couple hours. Come over.” (If you want to get the girl to your pad and you’re already cooking dinner, then there’s nothing wrong with having her come over to eat. Have some wine, cook, eat and then see where the evening goes.)

4. “I don’t have sex on the first date, just so you know!”

Sample responses:

You: “good. I treasure my virginity” (The more of a rascal that you appear, the better this goes over. Treating her like a bratty sister is the key to handling a live-wire like this text that girls send when their hamster is spinning at warp speed. Let me tell you, when a girl brings up sex, whether about having it with you, or NOT having it, the reality is, is that sex is on her mind and specifically sex with you. That's good. The key is to play it cool, smooth and non-needy.)

You: "its clear where ur mind is doll" (Blame-Shift: you're softly letting her know that you know what she's thinking but in a playful way. You don't want to appear that you're passing judgment on her at all.)

You: "woah there. I dont have sex until 25 dates in" (Another obvious joke but said in a way that is almost slightly condescending towards her 'prudish' attitude towards sex. Makes you appear to be the 'victim' of her sexuality and not you being the pursuer of it.)

You: "good im too tired to fuck anyway. Long night" (This is a great one, because she'll wonder what you were doing the night before etc)

You: "same. Haven't decided yet about you" (This one is brilliant because it instantly Re-Frames and causes her to doubt her attractiveness and whether she is sexually appealing to you. Now she feels the need to get validation and will generally sexualize the date first in order to feel better about herself)

5. "So what do you want from me?"

This can be a shit test' or not, depending on her interest level in you. Either way treat it as one. Sample Responses:

You: "constant devotion and $100k" (If she's actually wealthy than skip this response. Wealthy people tend to be sensitive to any type of jokes regarding giving a 'stranger' money. If she's of average income or below, then this is humorous and lightens the mood from her serious question)

You: "just your soul baby your soul" (Again, funny and mocks her seriousness)

You: "your legs in the air" (If you have built the proper comfort than this is funny and sexual at the same time)

You: "on ur knees and mouth wide open" (Again, funny and sexual)

You: "come over and I'll figure it out" (This is a bold move, but executed properly can be effective in getting her to come over quickly.)

Good luck trying these out and remember, text game is just that, a game. Have fun with it!

How To Write An Online Dating Profile That Gets You Laid

January 30, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

There is a myth that you have to be good-looking to get laid with online dating. While it definitely helps, it's not required. Even if you haven't been gifted with a face so beautiful that makes the baby Jesus weep at it's glory (like me), you can still get laid with online dating using just your words.

Even if you don't do online dating, these principles apply to any writing or storytelling you do, in person or in text. If you can write, you can seduce. Here's how:

1. Show Don't Tell

The classic writing advice "show, don't tell" also applies to online dating. For example, look at these two profiles:

> 1) I'm the class clown among my friends. I'm really good at making people laugh, and like to have a good time.
> 2) For our first date, we can go anywhere except McGrady's, because I'm banned for life after firing a plastic arrow into the owner's eye's arm on Halloween, while dressed as Cupid. In my defense, I was aiming for his girlfriend, but confessing to flirting with his girl probably won't get me back in.

The first guy is about as funny as dead puppies. The other never has to explicitly tell us he's funny or does crazy stuff, because he shows us. Always be show in your profile, never tell.

Consider this writing from Roosh's 30 Bangs:

> We had sex fifteen minutes later. It was fine, but her pussy labia were beat up > and stretched out, looking like old roast beef.

> The next morning she said, “I don’t usually do this.”

By describing the state of her pussy, Roosh shows the girl was lying. If he simply told his readers “but seriously, that girl was really slutty,” they might not believe him. Through providing the right details, he leads the reader to his conclusion, while making them think it was theirs.

Good writing can lead people to things you couldn’t explicitly say. I’ve actually dropped full stories and dialogues into my profile. For example, imagine a profile opening with this:

> Me: Hey, what should I put in my profile?
> Indian Roommate: Write that you always practice safe sex. I know because you leave your Magnum condoms littered all over our shared bathroom.
> Me: My seed is powerful. It raises the vibration of our toilet bowl. Or your toothbrush, when my aim is bad.
> Indian Roommate: I hope you don’t get laid, and I never have to clean that up again.

If I wrote “I’m funny, get laid a lot, and have a big penis,” no one would ever believe me. Because I used a story, it wasn’t qualifying or approval seeking, and girls pick that information up from the details. (Though this example borders on being to overtly sexual. See point 4 below.)

From this story, you also know I don’t take myself too seriously, and don’t apologize for anything. Which leads me to…

2. Let Her Know Who You Are

The story you tell shows girls who you are.

A guy who asked me for online dating advice had this on his profile:

> I grew up in Brazil.

I'm certain that was an interesting experience, but without a story, it's just a fact. His whole profile was a list of facts. Facts are boring. Here's a rewrite I'd do knowing nothing about him:

> I was born in the jungles of Brazil. My childhood was like The Jungle Book, if The Jungle book had cell phones and that no one's parents were dead.

A girl reading that knows it's probably bullshit, but it'd make her laugh, show her he's funny, and that he has interesting experiences to share.

Take it a step further, and you can convey perspective. For example, look at these two different versions:

> I grew up in Brazil, the land of jiu-jitsu and models, where the men have big muscles, and the women have bigger asses. It was heaven for a teenager with high testosterone.
> I grew up in Brazil. I feel growing up in another country has allowed me to acknowledge my own privilege as a white cisgendered male, and appreciate the diversity of other less patriarchal cultures.

Just from those two sentences, I'll bet you can picture a whole character. This kind of writing filters for girls who want to fuck you. A feminist who flicks her iPhone more than her clit won't message the first guy, but girls who party might. The second guy will filter out straight women.

If you write well, it doesn't matter what you talk about. I like nerdy and cosplay girls, so I have two comic-con stories in my profile. Writing this way doesn't just get more girls, it gets the type of girls you prefer.

3. Always Be Hooking

You profile should be short and flow, like a burst of tight twitter messages.

Don't worry about answering profile prompts. Profiles are like girls, you don't have to give them a direct answer. The goal isn't to tell your life's story, it's to hook – to get women to invest their attention.

For example, under "favorite books, movies, etc." most people just list shows – just facts. Try writing something like:

> I showed an old girlfriend my favorite horror movie, and she shoved me out of bed during her dream that night because she wanted to "save me from the bad guys."

If you write that, expect a couple messages asking "lol – what movie did you show her?" By leaving out a crucial detail, or not telling the end of a story, you leave an open thread for women to start a conversation.

Online attention spans are short. You have to hook from the first line of your profile – and keep hooking. I stack my profile with about a dozen different twitter sized anecdotes girls can ask me about.

Humor is the quickest way to hook. If it's funny, girls will keep reading.

If it doesn't hook, delete it. Less is more. Long paragraphs only work if every part of them hooks. Girls will disqualify you for one bad line, but it might take three to a message. Keep track of which things girls frequently ask you about, and which never get commented on. Revise regularly.

Speaking of giving her a reason to talk to you…

4. Give Her An Alibi

People forget that Tucker Max initially became famous from a hook-up application on his website – i.e. an online dating profile. In it, he wrote girls could come over to do his laundry for him. It wasn't because he really needed his laundry done (though a nice bonus), but because girls felt slutty if they came over just for sex.

There's a reason people say "let's get coffee sometime" rather than "let's talk for thirty minutes before walking back to my place for naked thrusty time."

Giving an alibi ("I'm just coming over to do laundry") allows girls who don't feel comfortable directly seeking a hook-up to rationalize meeting you, the same way inviting a girl back to your place to finish a bottle of wine is more likely to work, than just inviting her back for sex.

Any artform, cool activity, or interesting place you'd like to share makes a good alibi. Get creative.

5. First Messages Just Have To Hook

So you've got a killer profile that hooks, and shows girls who you are. How do you write the first message? The same way you wrote a profile – except you only need one twitter sized message that hooks. For inspiration, check out delicioustacos list of 44 OKCupid Openers, but write your own to filter for your personality.

It doesn't have to be long. It just has to hook. The first thing any girl will do if your message piques her interest is go read your profile – which will be tight. You can simply ask a girl out, if you write well. I've gotten laid from this (not original) opener:

> You seem attractive and consequently I would like to explore the possibility of > enhancing your life by means of exposure to my awesomeness.

All I really said was “you’re cool, I’m cool, let’s fuck,” but the writing hooks, and shows who I am.

The goal of messaging is to get a number or meetup. The moment you hook, go for the number. If your first message doesn’t hook or you get a shit-test, pass the shit test and hook first. An example:

> Girl: I don’t know… Will I regret giving you my phone number?
> Me: For sure. Years from now you’ll look back and ask yourself, “why did I have that man’s children?”
> Girl: Hahahaha, okay it’s [number]

Once you meetup, treat it like a regular date. The girl is already hooked, knows who you are, and is into you All you have to do is close and enjoy the passive stream of women flowing into your life.

15 Hard Lessons I've Learned From Life

January 30, 2014 | by Nicholas Peake | Link | Original Link

Having reached a milestone of age and maturity in my life, I've come to realize a number of hard lessons I've learned, deserved or otherwise, that can only come from real life experience. We live in the type of world where so many pretend to know so much, yet how many people have really earned real experience? Let's be honest: life is often a bitch. But the upside of a difficult life and suffering is the character that a man is rewarded with, that most valuable of traits.

Allow me to share with you some things I've learned along the way…

Your Past Doesn't Have to Define Your Future, But Will Affect Your Present

No matter your background or what you've been told that you would amount to in life, success or failure is ultimately up to you. I grew up in both lousy home and school environments and was often reminded how I was "bad" and would not amount to anything worthwhile. You can probably guess what happened: I almost failed high school, I was always in trouble, and subconsciously I believed I didn't "deserve" a meaningful life, much less the far-flung idea of going to college. My lack of confidence hit me hard when it came to social opportunities too.

A turning point in my life was when I was given the straight truth regarding personal decisions. At the encouragement of a friend and paying my own way, I enrolled in a technical school where one of my instructors, after giving me poor marks on a test paper, told me point blank, "If you decide to succeed, you will. If you decide to fail, you'll do that."

In a world where so many are looking for an excuse for their failures, I realized he was right. I changed my attitude, put in the effort, and from then on regularly earned honors for my academic achievements. Next stop: a college degree in a good-paying field. I'm now the only person in my family tree with an education like mine and working professionally.

However, I was naïve in thinking it was simply a matter of moving forward. The truth is, what happened in the past (lack of an involved father, an overly strict and negative mother, apathetic teachers, and much more) caused great damage to my self-esteem, confidence, and social skills. My lack of success in life and the girls I dated were a direct reflection of my self-esteem due to my inner shortcomings; yes, another blue-pill beta dating unattractive plain chicks and "accepting" he could do no better. Since that time I've made great improvements and realized that while my future is unwritten and looking better, it's not wise to ignore those things inside which keep us from being whole, solid men.

You can make your life something to be proud of if you so choose. However sometimes we have to look further and address the underlying causes of what brought us to be the way we are with regards to our personal demons; otherwise, we'll never be the best we can be.

You Snooze, You Lose!

Procrastination is a worthless endeavor. See a woman you want to pursue, but decide "Nah I'll talk to her next time"? She's gone when you go back even only two days later. Want to buy that car? It sold yesterday. Found a great job? It's filled right away. I could go on and on but I think you get the point.

Opportunities can disappear in the blink of an eye. A man has to pursue what he wants, and now. "Once burned, twice learned"; so true!

Life Isn't Fair; Get Used To It

The truth is, after enough difficulties in life we can suck it up and grow from harsh experiences, or play the victim role (which seems to be becoming the new American way).

Life is simply a bitch sometimes, and life isn't fair. There will always be someone who has it better than you. There will always be those that never had to work a hard day's work, never had to really pay their dues in life, and those who never suffered the tragedies you have. Shit will go wrong, and at random times.

The sooner you accept it, the sooner you can adjust your mentality to that of what really defines a strong man and not a boy: tough it out, and survive. Deal with problems and earn your way in life. In the end, you'll be the man who can survive and you'll possess an understanding of how the world really works unlike others who've not had to pay the same dues. If anything, you'll possess a drive and character that no one else around you does. Desirable women do not need a momma's boy who runs to mom when things get hard.

A Man Often Can't Count On Anyone But Himself; You Have to Be Self-Reliant

Don't let your success in life be dependent upon assuming you'll be able to get help. So many times in life I had no one to turn to for my education, to talk about my struggles with, getting started out on my own as an adult, and much, much more. Once I was in Panama and discovered my debit card was missing! I was running out of money and need help fast. It's hard to describe the sinking feeling when in an emergency situation I contacted those back home who I could have sworn would help me (after helping them many times in the past) only to hear, "I ain't got no money" and "Sorry man, nothing I can do." Never again!

Also, I see fewer and fewer men capable of repairing their homes, cars, and fulfilling "manly" tasks. A man who can't take care of himself isn't much of a man. Even the greatest handymen started with just trying. To be self-reliant you have to actually try, not just say "I can't." For crying out loud you don't have to be able to swap out a motor in your Honda but I've met a number of men who can't even change a spare tire on a car.

Accept Help From Others Graciously

Being self-reliant and highly independent is great. However, being so independent that you refuse help from others at all times is not. Growing up I had so few instances of getting a helping hand from those around me that I naturally over time prepared for struggling alone in whatever situation I had to face. It became my default thought process.

In time, when allies or more loving, caring people came into my life, I refused their help, and lived to regret it. The lesson learned? Sometimes it's okay to ask for help; sometimes it's fine to allow others to help you even when you could do it alone. Good people often feel rewarded for helping, and always refusing for help builds a cold wall between you and people who actually give a damn about you. Don't become that cold, bitter, anti-social uncle that nobody cares to deal with.

Even If Everyone Says You're Wrong, It Doesn't Mean They're Right: Be Prepared to Stand Your Ground

It comes as no surprise to my fellow RoK readers that American society is permeated with a politically-correct, hyper-sensitive, "groupthink" approach at shaming those who have a voice of dissent in almost any subject.

One of the greatest lessons in life was to find out sometimes that even when you're fairly certain you're right, you'll be attacked for your beliefs. Being pressured and shamed into changing what you believe is manipulation and an attempt to make you conform and submit. In the end, the wise man analyzes whether he is right or wrong, but stands firm in his beliefs when he believes he is right.

It is interesting to see how chinks in our armor are exposed at those moments of attempts at "shaming" or pressure from others. The inclination to give and not "rock the boat" is a strong feeling. By attempting to appease others, you end up gaining nothing and actually lose.

We are here not because we pander to herd mentality but instead because we seek the truth. You will lose friends, acquaintances, and maybe even more when you stand behind your beliefs. That's the price a man pays sometimes for being his own man. I might get the stink-eye from women near me when I say a plain-looking white chick with average clothing and a rather dull face is unattractive, but I sleep better at night knowing I stood my ground; and my confidence grows a few bits more. No one respects a pushover anyway. Will you submit to others, or be your own man? The choice is yours.

Traveling To a Foreign Country Is Very Valuable

My first trip overseas was in 2003 to Lima, Peru. That experience and others to follow in other Latin countries tremendously benefited me in many ways. Watching kids in the streets selling candy for money, teenage mothers begging for change, and seeing how people in the real world get by without government handouts to prop them up delivered a swift kick in the ass to my American worldview. No longer did I have the right to complain about my life when in fact I have so many opportunities as an American. I no longer can tolerate those who are given so much here and blow it all due to laziness, excuses, and apathy.

My image of what a woman should be was shattered forever as well. The women I have met, known, and been with were much more passionate and feminine. A sexy, loving, and attentive foreign woman is awesome. Going to a disco with a Latina who has a caramel complexion and is wearing tight jeans, colorful top, and huge earrings is a pleasure indeed instead of the frumpy, disorganized plain women back home. It was very eye-opening to see women who didn't have much money still dress like women and taking value in being sexually attractive to men. Feminism has yet to destroy healthy societal norms in many countries. And foreign women often possess much more traditional values and can be quite loving, valuing men as men.

Learned a little bit of another language? You can get out of the "gringo tourist" label and meet cooler people and enjoy knowing women outside of the sheltered tourist areas. And I've made so many more friends here in the USA because I can relate to them and at least can speak with them in their own language some.

Has it been all rainbows and sunshine? No, of course not. I met gold diggers, visa chasers, I got scammed easily the first few times I traveled, got sick several times, and had the usual travel stories where things went wrong. Foreign women can be a handful at times, too, but the overall experience has changed me forever and made me the man I am today.

Once you've traveled, you'll never look at things the same again. When I go out now, I'm well aware that what passes for beauty here is often a sad joke.

Appearances Matter!

The self-delusional premise of the fat acceptance community – basically a laughable attempt to rewrite human nature – proposes that you can still be sexy and desirable when ugly or otherwise unattractive. This is absolute bullshit.

The truth is, no matter how "ok" I thought I was, or how "wonderful on the inside" a beta I was, in the end I wasn't my best. I was thin, dressed in whatever lazily-picked ill-fitting clothes I liked, and put no real effort into it.

In mid-2011 I started working out regularly and eating better. In 2013, I began dressing better, wearing better fitting clothes, and throwing on the occasional sport coat. The results have really surprised me. Despite what I thought, appearances make a huge difference in how people respond. Last week 2 women said I was handsome and wanted to give me hugs when I was doing no more than walking through Macy's in a well-fitting polo shirt that compliments my new physique.

"Expressing your individualism" by wearing an ugly goatee, crappy t-shirts, and bad hair may make you feel like a rebel, but damn sure won't appeal to the average woman's desire. Again, success is a choice. And more importantly, my confidence level is up, and it's easier for me now to open with women.

Another "red pill" truth is that appearances appeal to fundamental human nature—we can't help what we're attracted to. A better appearance means better results. Most women respond well to an in-shape, well-dressed man. I found out the hard way that I was not at my best and had far worse results when I didn't make the effort in those categories.

In a time when obesity and dressing like you're 15 years old and going to summer camp is more often the norm, being an in-shape, well-dressed man means you'll stand out and draw attention.

And one more point: wear good cologne. So few men wear cologne at all anymore. Let's just say the results have been excellent.

Keep Your Emotions Under Control

When you lose control of yourself, you lose control of the situation and lose respect from others. You look like an irrational brat. Now that I've swallowed the red pill, I know longer expect women to be logical, rational creatures no matter what they would try to have me believe. And I accept that as I man I have to be the rational, stable individual.

No man should lose himself in his emotions like a woman does. Don't be a little bitch-going overboard and ranting, being passive-aggressive, and acting like a weak man; this weakens you in the eyes of women. KEEP YOUR FRAME.

Let me be honest, it's so damn hard for me to keep cool sometimes when someone pushes my buttons, but I keep practicing and have to remember that the path to a stronger male persona won't allow me to break into a nonsensical fit when slighted. People notice strength, and people notice weakness… especially women.

Sometimes It's Not How You Are That Matters, It's How Others Perceive You

Unfortunately this is a lesson that took me time to get. Bad mood? Stressed? Sound unsure of myself when speaking? Not dressed so well? The things that I allow to affect me affect my outward appearance, demeanor, and attitude… and therefore affect my interaction with others.

The truth is, no one really cares how we feel or what's bothering us. They care about how you make them feel and how you act towards them.

First impressions are incredibly important and others judge us on what they see, hear, and based on smaller clues to our confidence and value as men. Many times when I've not put my best effort into social interactions, I've later come to find out that it had a negative effect on what they thought of me. My attitude and demeanor cost me.

When not appearing to be 100% confident when speaking, I've sometimes seen the change in people's confidence in me. Very uncomfortable! Get in practice, and put some thought into what you say and the vibe you give off.

Remember, most people want to like you, but you have to give them reasons to. Give off confident, warm, and charismatic vibes and people will feel good and thus feel good about you. Give off a sour mood and keep to yourself, and you'll be treated accordingly.

Save Your Money (A Man Needs Resources)

Unfortunately my parents had no real money management skills and my father did not save for retirement. They also blew through money received through a lawsuit when I was young. The end results were: no education funds for me, my father having to live on very modest means (social security), and a lack of emergency funds should things go wrong. Social security is something no man should ever let his future well-being depend upon.

When younger I blew my money on expensive electronics, girls, and other things that cost me a lot of potential savings and this limited my ability to travel and enjoy life as well as being prepared for a job loss, etc. Now I regret the lack of self-control and budgeting that I had back then.

While it's (almost) never too late to start, time is on your side when you're young. Invest, save, and plan for retirement. Don't live beyond your means. Don't blow your money on junk. Don't spend $60 on a date with a girl who you honestly know inside probably could care less that you busted your ass to earn that money. Don't make the mistake so many others are making by putting no importance in your future retirement.

So many mistakes I made but I've started making corrections and can already see the benefits.

A little bit of money in the bank and you'll be able to take some time off and get out of Boringville, USA to experience what life has to offer in other countries while Joe Smith back home is in a cubicle day and eating a shitty microwaveable lunch before going home to his chubby wife.

Don't Believe Everything You Hear. There's Often More To The Story

Inevitably, almost every time some hot-button, dramatic, or critical issue was presented, whether in a domestic dispute, feminist attention-grabbing headlines, or listening to a friend talk about their breakup, I have learned that there's almost always more to the story than is being told.

So many times I've taken things at face value only to learn later (and feel terrible for it) that the story indeed was not what it was made out to be. People's lives, reputations, and jobs have been destroyed over "truth" presented this way. Let's just say I know from personal experience that a woman often has no qualms about playing the victim card when she wants to and can tailor the truth to fit accordingly.

Withholding information is a manipulation tactic used to bias the truth & further the agenda whatever it may be. Unfortunately so many people are gullible and easily taken in.

As the saying goes, "There's one side, there's the other, and somewhere in the middle is the truth."

Enjoy Life While You Can. It Is Short

Take my advice—don't burn away all your time working or studying. Find time to go places, enjoy life, and enjoy the company of women.

It's a very hard lesson to learn, but looking back, so many opportunities to simply enjoy life were spent working too much or studying too hard. Those are moments I can't get back. All work and no play makes Jack a dull, unhappy boy. You deserve to enjoy life. Otherwise, what's the point?

She's One In A Million, but She's One OF a Million. Don't Destroy Your Life Over One Woman

Ah yes, the Achilles' heel of so many naïve men-the classic "oneitis". Feeling and behaving like the woman in your life is the last woman, absolutely pining for her, and tolerating her disrespect and severe flaws is the mark of disaster waiting to happen, and a sign of personal weakness in a man.

I hate to admit it, but I too was afflicted by this. Let's be honest, the soft-spoken underdog male portrayed in TV and movies is so often the same one who can't seem to let go of Ms. Average and puts her on a pedestal of epic proportions.

Looking back on my life (including even recently!), I can recollect the results of this mentality and emotional attachment. In the end, I was with a woman who was less than optimal, and ultimately I could have found much better if I tried. I was even married to one and you can imagine what happened there.

Severing the emotional and mental cords that make a man feeling like he'll die without Princess Wonderful is not easy, but the effort is worth it. When you're dependent upon one woman so much, you give her more power in the relationship and as so many men do, forgive her fatal flaws that cause others to say "Why do you put up with that?" Remember, Ms. Princess may be "one in a million" in your mind, but she's one of a million. There's a world full of women out there, compadre. Swallow the truth.

Listen To Your Instincts

Listen to that inner voice that tells you when something is wrong. When doing so, almost always I've found, sooner or later, it was right. Sometimes I couldn't see what I might have avoided, but it's an inner ability worth paying attention to. Life is hard enough, so if you get extra clues, take them.

Conclusion

We all will have different experiences, given our different paths in life. However, some basic universal truths, I believe, remain true regardless throughout time. Life won't always be easy, and sometimes we pay a great price, but at the least we can embrace the value of those hard-earned lessons it presents.

Why Is A Woman-On-Woman Murder Involving Two Minority Groups Being Buried?

January 31, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Unlikely and Non Traditional Combatants

On January 18, 2014 a young woman was beaten on the street outside a nightclub. Annie Kim Pham was attacked by a group of women outside The Crosby in Santa Ana California. She was taken off life support and died on January 28th 2014. She was 23.

Informative Quotes

After becoming aware of this tragedy, I have noticed this case may be a harbinger of things to come in this new modern world we live in. What first drew my attention was that nobody intervened to stop this fatal attack. Another thing I've noticed is that the usual social justice warriors have nothing to say about it aside from criticisms of alcohol over-consumption. I've also noticed in the comment sections of various newspapers is that some people have just now become aware of what the world truly is. Allow me to show you the highlights of what I have discovered.

> "We don't see this as a hate crime or anything of that nature," Santa Ana Mayor Miguel Pulido said.

From what I have read in the Los Angeles Times, the victim in the case was Vietnamese-American and the alleged perpetrators were Hispanic. If this is true, the victim identity politics industry will have a tough time spinning this. I have noticed that due to the lack of the traditional scapegoat, this news story is not is getting as much traction as I thought it would.

> "It breaks my heart that five people attacked one young woman and that certain people watched and didn't try to stop it," said Councilwoman Michele Martinez.
> "We don't want people to think it's not a safe place to visit," Martinez said.

In this day and age of civil liability and the demonization of men, only an ignorant man would engage a woman to defend another woman from physical violence especially one that is not related to him in such a public venue. As for thinking the area is safe, I'll have to disagree with Councilwoman Martinez. When someone literally got beaten to death on the street in that area, that's a pretty good indicator that it is dangerous place.

According to her uncle Eric Doan, Annie Kim Pham was a graduate of Chapman University where she studied psychology. I found this interesting as this university is known to be “progressive”. Further research will find out if they taught her things that led to a misconception on how the world is.

One of the defense attorneys in this case has already started to make statements. According to the Los Angeles Times:

> “Nationally, Ms. Zavala has been vilified and the poor lady that died has basically become a saint,” Molfetta said. “I’m sure she was a lovely woman and had a great future ahead of her, but Ms. Zavala is a good woman too.”

Another issue that was brought up that is pure speculation is that her ex-boyfriend was at the club with her and didn’t render aid in her time of need. This became really interesting to me when I found out she has been married for a year to Giang Ngokhanh. I found no mention in the news that this gentleman was at the club with her though.

Preliminary Conclusion

This case in its infancy is quite compelling and I will further research it . The reality that men will no longer intervene is huge. This instance doesn’t fit the typical news media narrative but still got attention. I will follow this case can report back with new developments as it progresses. To be continued…

We’re All Living The Human Resources Nightmare

January 31, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

“Mark, it’s Friday afternoon,” I said to my co-worker. “You’re off at 3:00pm and it’s 5:30, dude. GO HOME.”

“I can’t,” Mark replied to me.

“Uh, why?”

“My wife isn’t home.”

While holding back my laughter (and disgust), I replied, “Why the hell does that matter?”

“Well, what am I gonna do without her home at home?”, he quipped back, “Plus, I need her to cut my hair and she’s been resisting doing it lately. I wish she wasn’t so picky about the way it was cut.”

“Well if she’s the one bitching at you about it, she should do it. How long could it possibly take, anyway?”

“It takes about an hour, usually.”

“It’s good to know she spends more time on that head than your OTHER, more important head, man. Just go home.”

Right on cue, my boss walks around the corner.

Admittedly, it wasn’t my most brilliant moment to say that when I knew he was likely in earshot. I’ve often been affectionately referred to as “HR’s worst nightmare,” by my friends at the office for quite some time now.

Up until this point though, I hadn't had any issues. I say plenty of politically incorrect things at work all the time. This time though, I made the mistake of opening my big mouth in front of someone who mattered.

Nothing more was said that day. Come Monday morning though, I received an email from my boss asking if I had some time to talk to him. Begrudgingly, I trudged to a conference room and sat down, like a guilty man awaiting my inevitable sentencing.

He had three points for me.

1.) We were within earshot of two female employee's desks who could have heard what I said.

2.) He wants me to have a long, successful career at the company, and don't want something like this on my record to halt my progression.

3.) I had offended Mark. He thought it was "not cool" for me to bring his wife into it.

Oh, The Horror Of Offending A Female!

This is the perfect example of how females are so coddled in today's workplace. Note, that neither of the two female employees were actually at their desk. They were both long gone for the day. However, the simple chance that they could have heard my joke was enough to cause alarm. You're telling me grown, 50 year old women are incapable of brushing off a joke?

Sounds like pre-school where boys weren't allowed to say bad words like "wiener" in front of the girls.

No doubt, if one of these women were offended by my joke, I could get in a lot of trouble with the Human Resources department. That, in and of itself, is the real joke, not my penis remark. The fact that a woman could single-handily ruin my career because of a joke shows how much power they wield in the workforce.

Long Term Career

Let’s translate this into corporate speak.

“We want you to have a long, successful career, with endless possibilities,” roughly translates to, “We want to abuse you for our own profit as much as humanly possible, because you’re a damn good worker and we don’t pay you nearly what you’re worth. We want to continue to exploit you while stringing you along like a cat chasing a ball of yarn for the next promotion.”

Realize that EVERYONE is ultimately out for themselves. And you should be, too, ROK readers. The days of corporate loyalty, pensions, and respect are gone. You are, at all times, replaceable, especially if you piss the wrong people off. Take a career leap to a rival company that offers you 25% more pay than your previous company – because your current company will offer you 3% next year and claim that they’re as much of a saint as Mother Teresa for doing so.

The phrase “corporate ladder” always fails to mention one thing – the length of the ladder.

Man Up, Mark

Well, needless to say, most of us here are familiar with the type of guy Mark is. His name comes to mind every time I hear or read the word “beta”. He brought his wife to the US from Eastern Europe, and she’s lived here for about 3-4 years with him now. He is paying to put her through college, she has no job, and she already chopped her hair off.

He gets sex, “maybe” once a week, if things are good. Those are his exact words; he’s a dog begging for a bone.

Yet, he was deeply offended by the fact that I made a joke at his expense. He wears his whipped status like a badge of pride, standing next to his wife with his head down and his hands buried in his pocket. He endlessly complains about his nagging wife, but is never willing to stand up and be a man about it.

Can you imagine how much better his life would be if I just sent him a link to Return Of Kings?

F- You, Corporate

What can you take from this? There’s many options if you want

There’s always entrepreneurship. You could start your own business with a product you develop, or do freelance artistic work. There’s plenty of work in a male-dominated fields with manual labor. The possibilities are endless. It took me less than a year of being in the workforce post-college to realize corporate America is not where I want to be. I’ve put a plan in action to get out, because no man should be at the mercy of some office slut who makes more money for doing half the work just because she wears a skirt.

The one thing preventing me from completely severing the lifeline to my job is the possibility of working remotely, away from all of the politics and office drama. Being able to take my American salary to another country and work in the comfort of my own home is a possibility I want to explore.

Learn from stories like mine to blaze your own path. If you don’t, you’ll likely end up just waiting for the HR secretary to set your path, as well as your entire career, ablaze.

A final note about our friend Mark: as I mentioned, he brought his wife here from Eastern Europe, and she was very much lower-class when living there. She received her US citizenship about a month ago. A few of us around the office started taking bets as to how long it would be until she divorced him and took him for all he's worth.

Let's hope that betting scheme doesn't make it back to HR before I walk out the door for good.

The 6 Principles Of Effective Persuasion

January 31, 2014 | by TylerMilborn | Link | Original Link

Apollo Robbins might be the best pickpocket alive. This is a man who makes his living by gaining the trust of his targets before slipping off their watches, stealing their wallets, and lifting whatever else they may have in their pockets. Robbins is only great pickpocket because he's probably even better at reading people, diverting their attention, and gaining their trust and compliance. His skills are recognized outside the Vegas strip; his clients include a list of multinational corporations and he consults the Department of Defense on human behavior.

And so when Robbins notes that he's a devotee of a book on persuasion, it's a good idea to grab a copy. That book is Robert B. Cialdini's "Influence: The Psychology of Persuasion," a national bestseller first published in 1984 (I have the 2007 "Revised Edition") that gives a thorough treatment of six universal principles of persuasion. Anyone reading this website, when they think of persuasion, probably think of women. As they should. There's persuasion rampant in the theory and application of game, from male leadership to personal style to text scarcity. But this book is more than just a supplement to increase your success with women. It's a roadmap of general principles to apply to the particulars of your life.

This book has a basic premise: human behavior works in a mechanical, input-activated way. See, for example, the long-established fact that sons of single mothers are more likely to commit violent crimes than children who grow up with married parents. (The war against sons is often fought by their own mothers.) Once this premise is established for each of the six principles, Dr. Cialdini then notes how to use each weapon of influence and how to defend against their use. These principles are discussed below.

1. Reciprocation

According to Dr. Cialdini, there is no human society that doesn't practice the rule of reciprocity. This is a cultural standard that obligates us to return favors, gifts, invitations, and the like. Reciprocity allows for the free flow of business, the division of labor, and the exchange of services. The question of how to use reciprocity to your advantage is actually quite simple: "another person can trigger a feeling of indebtedness by doing an uninvited favor."

Thus, the power is held by the person who acts first. After that, the debt is triggered and the beneficiary of the favor or gift doesn't exactly act voluntarily in response. Even small favors can trigger a sense of obligation to agree to a substantially larger favor in return. That's why you're in trouble if a girls wants to go 50/50 on a bill – she doesn't want you to think she has any obligations, sexual or otherwise, to you in the future.

Or, take the idea of reciprocal concessions. This is the "obligation to make a concession to someone who has made a concession to us." G. Gordon Liddy, President Nixon's former head of intelligence operations for the Committee to Re-elect the President (CRP), once proposed a $1 million dollar plan involving escorts, wiretapping, break-ins, and kidnappings to blackmail Democratic politicians to the CRP's Director John Mitchell and his CRP Deputy Director, Jeb Magruder. According to Magruder's later testimony, "after starting at the grandiose sum of $1 million, we thought that probably $250,000 would be an acceptable figure . . . we were reluctant to send him away with nothing." Without reciprocal concessions, there might not have been Watergate.

The uses of this principle should be obvious. If you're in outside sales, like I was for a few years, offer the expensive model first. If that's shut down, come back at them with the mid-range model (the one you knew they'd like in the first place). Research and the principle of reciprocal concessions show that such a strategy works better than just showing a mid-range model first. Or, better yet, break the rule. When a woman gives you a compliment, don't give one in return. She has been culturally programmed to think that you're obligated to return the favor. If you don't play by those rules, you separate yourself from the majority of men out there.

2. Commitment and Consistency

The value of consistency is, quite simply, our "nearly obsessive desire to be (and to appear) consistent with what we have already done. Once we have made a choice or taken a stand, we will encounter personal and interpersonal pressures to behave consistently with that commitment." Dr. Cialdini notes that we practice consistency, in part, because it allows us to be lazy. And this makes a lot of sense – consistent actions allows us to think less about what we're doing and to focus on other things that require our attention.

Now, the question becomes, how is the power of consistency triggered? It's by commitment. If you commit to something, it can set the stage for your automatic and ill-considered consistency with that commitment. To prove this point, he gives the example of American POWs held by the Chinese Communists in the Korean War. The Chinese would give American prisoners the simple task of making a seemingly inconsequential statement such as "The United States is not perfect." Once that statement was made, the Chinese simply had the prisoners give additional statements about the United States that were consistent with what he had previously said. This would be done voluntarily, without any punishment or coercion. The Chinese would then broadcast by radio this prisoner's essay to the entire prison camp. He'd then be labelled a "collaborator" and would actually start acting like one.

Other examples of consistency following commitment are seen in cultural initiation rituals. African teenagers go through hell to become men, frat boys get hazed. These may be perceived as harsh by some, but there's a great value in these rituals: the severity of an initiation ceremony significantly heightens the newcomer's commitment to the group. Perceived value increases through difficulty, and value decreases the easier the initiation is. Think about that the next time you're making it too easy for a girl.

3. Social Proof

Dr. Cialdini next addresses the principle of social proof, the idea that we determine what is correct by finding out what other people think is correct. Social proof leads us to believe that "the greater the number of people who find any idea correct, the more the idea will be correct." This is reflected in the inherent danger of democracy – the oppression by the majority. This leads us to think, incorrectly, that if nobody is concerned, then nothing is wrong. And it's a tool used to by governments and the media to suppress and criticize voices of reason. The critic of the Patriot Act was once considered paranoid. Now that the public's view has shifted on the matter given the disclosure of the extent of US government's spying, he's prescient.

In America, we see social proof in a few ways. The more obese women there are, the more women think that obesity is a correct lifestyle choice. TV shows have laugh tracks to convince you a joke is funny. Studies have shown that suicides increase when a front-page suicide story is published. Match.com features commercials of women and men discussing how their friends, coworkers, and family have used the site to find "the one." I used to think that they were trying to convince me that the website works. I still think that, but now I realize they're also trying to make the public think it's acceptable to use their service.

Of all the principles discussed in this book, this one probably gives the reader the best opportunity for self-reflection and self-correction. It makes you ask yourself, "What do I think, and why do I think it?"

4. Liking

The fourth principle Dr. Cialdini addresses is the "liking bond" between parties. If you like a person, you're more prone to do what they want or ask. A good salesman gets you to like him, and therefore trust him, before he sells you anything. The factors cited as influencing whether one person likes another include attractiveness, association, compliments, similarities, flattery, and common goals. The tricks to reach this principle are pretty straightforward – if someone wants something from you, they'll compliment what you've done.

Generally, men can be especially obvious in seeking out similarities as they try to pursue a woman (I know I've done it). That just gives off a bad vibe because it's so basic and desperate, though it might work on 5. (However, it could be an IOI if she's noting similarities between the two of you.)

The trick is to achieve positive association – the positive values, feelings, and traits you're associated with. Achieve this and you set yourself apart from your competitors. How can you make a woman associate you with positive feelings or events? Thankfully, the book doesn't answer this question. You have to look at yourself and evaluate how you act, who you're with, and what you do with her.

5. Authority

We've been trained to obey authority. We sat when our teachers said "sit," we went home when the school said we could, and we went to bed when our parents told us to. Obedience to authority can be automatic and there's no consideration of alternatives, no deliberation, or no critical thinking on our part (we commit to our obedience). This makes a culture operate smoothly, but there is a down side and the incentive for authority to abuse its power should be obvious.

This isn't a remarkable chapter by any means. We all know that titles and clothes matter. You get more respect if you're introduced as a Cambridge Professor than as a research assistant. Wearing a suit increases a man's perceived authority and ability to lead. A self-described authority on topics like law or economics has instant credibility, no matter what he says. But it's the principle itself, and not the application, that is valuable. So set yourself apart. Recognize that an authority figure may trigger an automatic response from you. Figure out what that response is and why you're doing it.

6. Scarcity

This is by far the best chapter of the book, and it probably has most use in the field of dating. People can be more motivated by the thought of losing something than by the thought of gaining something of equal value. Increase scarcity and you increase value.

Dr. Cialdini recognizes the value of scarce items, but he gives us a more nuanced source of power within the scarcity principle: "…whenever free choice is limited or threatened, the need to retain our freedoms makes us desire them (as well as the goods and services associate with them) significantly more than previously." Thus, increasing scarcity causes us to react against the interference "by wanting and trying to possess the item more than ever." This is the theory underlying push-pull. Give her something and then take it back.

She'll want it even more.

This principle is very powerful. When political ideas are suppressed and restricted, those ideas become more popular. For members of a political minority, the most "effective strategy may not to publicize their unpopular views, but to get those views officially censored and then to publicize the censorship." Likewise, when a jury hears information and is instructed to not use that information, they use the information more than they would have without the limiting instruction. The restriction places a higher value on the information.

Scarcity is linked to the Commitment & Consistency principles. A scarce man is a challenge, and the harder the challenge the greater the commitment when that challenge is met. Scarcity increases your perceived value and can cause a woman to actually react against the scarcity in any number of ways, such as increasing pursuit or stepping up her game in bed.

Conclusion

In conclusion, this is a damn good – but not perfect – book. It'd be more interesting if it had less real-world examples (there are plenty) and more in-depth psychological theory. It needs less how and more why. It doesn't mention much about women, though its principles apply to dating. A more thorough revision might be needed to account for the digital age. But these are small criticisms of an interesting and well-researched book. It's well worth your time and investment. Go get it.

The Fascinating Story Of The Banana Man

February 1, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is the intriguing tale of Sam Zemurray, a Russian immigrant who built one of the largest banana empires in the late 19th century, accumulating enough power to control the Central American republics where the bananas grew.

Zemurray had humble beginnings as a nobody in New Orleans milling around the decks. He sensed opportunity in rejected overly ripe bananas that wouldn't last the long train ride to America's cities.

> He was pure hustle. Every morning, before first light, he was at the docks with a pocketful of bills. Foghorns blew, train wheels rattled, smoke drifted across the sky. He purchased every ripe and overripe and about-to-be-ripe he could lay his hands on. The importers were happy to get money for what, in other towns, was considered trash. He sorted these bananas, then loaded them onto the boxcars of the Illinois Central: the overripes went to markets in Mobile or towns nearby; the ripes went to stores fifty or a hundred miles up the line; the about-to-be-ripes might keep as far as Memphis or Birmingham.

> He believed in the transcendent power of physical labor— that a man can free his soul only by exhausting his body. A life in an office, deskbound, was for the feeble and weak who cut themselves off from the actual.

When American banking interests started to encroach on his growing business in Honduras, he decided to organize a Honduran coup. He succeeded. His business continued to grow, spreading its tentacles all over Central America, until escalating competition with the massive United Fruit consort lead to violent exchanges on their neighboring banana plantations.

The American government got involved to prevent a Central American war, pressuring Zemurray to sell his company to United Fruit. He agreed, but became horrified that the Ivy League bean counters at United Fruit were killing his baby with their incompetent management style. Since he was a large United Fruit shareholder, he got proxy votes from other shareholders to organize a hostile takeover. He became the leader of the largest banana company in the world and reversed the decline caused by his predecessors.

With the help of the father of modern propaganda, Edward Bernays, Zumurray convinced the American government that the business-unfriendly leader of Guatemala was actually a communist since he wanted better wages and conditions for the country's workers instead of simply letting corporations like United Fruit use the nation as its own wealth-generating machine. The CIA organized a coup that took the Guatemalan president out of power. The CIA- and Zumurray-approved successor continued to give favorable terms to United Fruit.

> [Guatamalan leader] Arbenz aged ten years in the last five days. Retreating to the presidential palace, he spent these hours in a drunken stupor, wandering the halls, muttering about gringos. He was disheveled and could not sleep. Now and then, he went on the radio. "Our enemies are led by the arch-traitor Armas," who is leading a "heterogeneous Fruit Company expeditionary force" against the country, he said, his words obscured by the static of CIA jamming. "Our crime is > having enacted an agrarian reform which affected the interests of the United Fruit Company."

The coup did not go unnoticed by the Western press. The US government threw Zumarry under the bus, claiming his company was a monopoly even though he gave them critical resources to successfully stage the coup. It was the beginning of the end for the now elderly banana man.

My only issue with this book is that there was too much e-moting and speculation from the author, who tried to read people's minds from fleeting events. It was like reading Anderson Cooper in book form, with the writer going to great lengths to insert himself into the story. Other than that, it was a quite enjoyable story of intrigue, hustle, and politics that describes the rise of an ingenious businessman who made it big from a simple idea.

How The Bakken Oil Fields Put Me On The Path To Truth

February 1, 2014 | by Grody | Link | Original Link

I'm writing this on my 24th birthday. Not that it makes a difference one way or the other, but it gives me a superficial reason to reflect on what has happened during the last few years. The truth is, Return of Kings has saved my life and now I would like to give something back to it. So buckle up, in as few words as possible, I'm going to tell you my story.

It's 2009 and I've just graduated from high school. I wasted no time dumping my current girlfriend for the prospect of greener pussy pastures upon entering university. Like most 19 year olds I had no idea what the fuck was going on. I only went to school because I had absolutely no direction, and hey, my rents were footing the bill so why the fuck not? Well it may come as a shocker to you but school wasn't exactly my cup of tea. I didn't learn a thing that year except how to snort lines. I read Neil Strauss's book The Game and had sex with a grand total of two women (impressive right?). So after bombing two straight semesters it was time to explore other options. I liked money, and I knew of a magical land where I could go get some of my very own.

Enter The Bakken

I'm living proof that all of the horror stories you hear about the oil patch are 100% true. Long driving, hard drinking, bar fighting, and burly-ass men. They have an endearing pet name for the FNGs that come on the rigs: worm. For five months I was a fucking worm. If you don't have the sack to look your coworkers in the eye to disagree with them, and if they deserve it, punch them in the face. That's how they will treat you. Like a worm. In those first few months, I undoubtedly improved at my job, but not a scrap of respect was thrown my way. Until one fateful night in the dead of winter.

We were tripping pipe. For one of the first times I was keeping up with my asshole driller who had, just HAD, to prove that he was the fastest driller in the whole patch. His deep-seated insecurities in his own life allowed him to rationalize using an illegal drilling technique that puts undue stress on the cables. I could tell it was coming about two seconds before it did. This allowed me to move my head back about four inches, which probably saved my life.

I don’t wanna get too technical for the guys out there who honestly don’t give a shit about the minute details of the extractive industry. Besides it all went down so fast that nobody can say with 100% certainty what actually happened. Lets just say a cable snapped. Something hit me in the right temple harder than I had ever been hit before in my life. I didn’t go unconscious. I didn’t fall down. I stood there hearing the loudest sound imaginable. WOWOWOWOWOHWOHWOHWOH!!!! My bell had been rung. Hard.

Another hand had also been hit. He was lying prone and not moving. The others ran to pick him up, but I had enough sense, even in my condition to shout “Don’t move him! His neck could be broken.” It turns out when you have blood squirting 2 feet from your forehead and running down your face people tend to listen to you. The paramedics arrived and gave us a by-the-book treatment. They had us taken to a hospital a little over 200 miles away. Long story short; the other guy had a concussion and I was diagnosed with a depressed temporal skull fracture. I now have a 2 inch wide 4 inch long titanium plate in my head, covering a hole the size of a silver dollar.

After a month of recuperation I was back at it. One day I was pulling out sutures, the next I was throwing tongs. My job performance had never been better, but I became pissed. Being pissed was exactly what was needed for me to excel at that dirty job. When someone crossed me, I brought the rage. Pretty soon, nobody was crossing me anymore. I actually started to like my co-workers (all the more easy because the fucker that broke my head had the dignity to fire himself). I started to love digging holes. You form bonds with your crew that are deeper than typical friendships. Its brotherhood.

Things were going my way. I was rich (at least for a 21 year old), strong, and mean as shit. I had 2 weeks and 5 thousand dollars to blow every month. If I wanted it, I bought it. Party. I drank, did drugs, gambled, and got poon. But I never fucked my roommate. No, no, no. This one was special. We've all heard the oneitis stories so I'll just leave you with a fifty foot pedestal and boyfriend goggles. It was all good because I was getting laid elsewhere. But she was always in the back of my mind while I was trudging through slop and reeking of diesel.

The Devaluation Process

Well one day she had had enough of my craziness and moved out. Fine. Whatever. I kept doing my thing, but started slowing down on my consumption. She had the gall to come around and insist that I pay her back rent for the month she decided to hike up her skirt and march away with her nose in the air. I told her she could either kick rocks, or find out what small claims court is really all about. During this slowdown my regular fuck buddy had finally had enough and propositioned me for an exclusive relationship. Considering she was engaged the entire time she was fucking me I said no.

So now I was hoeless. My buddies started growing up and doing their own thing and were busy. My dependency on booze and drugs was starting to show. I entered a dry spell. A really long one. As the months rolled by my relationships started to decay to the point where I moved back to my family ranch. I was seriously depressed and dependent. One day, when I couldn't stand the thought of another two weeks, I quit. Feeding cows was alright at first, but pretty soon my money ran out. I was more broke than Humpty-Dumpty. I still carried all the addictions that I developed in the past. To make matters worse, I had no ladies. None. I started having dreams about my oneitis and going through my work in a haze constantly rehashing the past.

One fine day a friend invited me camping. I was ready to get fucked up and drink some free shit so I said yes. Well when I arrived there was trouble on sugar mountain. We'll call her Cali. I had taken Cali home in a drunken stupor last St. Patty's day, raw dogged her, and blew a load on her stomach. That's all good, but the problem is she is at least a full 2 points lower than me. Kinda fat. Kinda bitchy. Things started out well until the ole LSD got brought around. Once I was good and tripping balls, the sharks came after me.

[image]

LSD makes a mind open to different ways of thinking and takes off the filter in conversation. You say genuine things that you mean. So I said something to my buddy, Jake, that I didn't consider gay. But he, for some reason, interpreted it as faggoty. He ran off isolating me and had a brief chat with Cali. She came in with an agenda. All her innuendos and retarded logic fell on deaf annoyed ears until she brought up my oneitis. This was the death blow she had been looking for. Attaching such a simple self depreciating idea to one that was so deep within my mind already.

It fucked me up. When I went back to school I couldn't enjoy all the new freshman beaver running around. I was too busy having nightmares about my oneitis laughing at me. The inner dialogue was relentless.

> Other Me: "So why the hell didn't you ever make a move on her?"
> Me: "…"
> Other Me: "That's what I thought… Faggot."
> Me: "Fuck you dude."
> Other Me: "What about your fuck buddy? There was a good girl who genuinely wanted you."
> Me: "I just wasn't that attracted to her."
> Other Me: "Hahaha! You weren't attracted to her?! Oh, its starting to make sense now. Maybe you're gay."
> Me: "BLAHRRRRR! SHUT THE FUCK UP!"
> Other Me: "Not until you admit you are a worthless nancy boy!"

All day I was having conversations with myself, degrading myself, wondering incessantly about the nature of men and women. Then one day I saw a total four dudes wandering around campus in skirts dressed like women. It lead me to ask one question.

"What the fuck is going on?"

So I turned to the only one who could give me true unbiased advice on any question I had. The internet. God bless you manosphere. God bless you Rollo. After reading the entirety of Rational Male, things started to make sense. I read manosphere blogs for weeks, leading me to realize that I was suffering from self hate. That's all it was, and just like that, it was gone. I finally had an answer to all the fucked up questions in my mind.

The 5 Truths That Set Me Free

1. I never made a move on my oneitis because I was following a traditional bullshit script to try and seduce her. Pedestalizing her and paying for all her shit. Acting like a hopeless beta.

2. I never entered into an LTR with my fuckbuddy because she opened her legs for me on the first date and never made me work for it. Not to mention she was a cheater from the word go.

3. Jack wanted to bang Cali. His jealousy fueled his sabotage against me.

4. You aren't gay, society is gay. Think about how backwards it is to live in a world where the simple denial of "I'm not gay" and incriminating and worthy of scorn. What is everyone's favorite topic of conversation? When you turn on the idiot box what is one of the first things you see?

5. My happiness used to be based on superficial things like money and substances. I realize now that my worth as a man has very little to do with my bank account or how many shots of Jack Daniels I can drink. Im sober now and building true worth and value by improving myself.

Before you go any further in the game of life, I want you to do something for me. All the helpful advice in the world on game, health, wealth, stature, and style wont be worth a turd flavored lollipop if you can't say this one simple thing and mean it. Look yourself in the mirror and say,

"I love you. I respect you."

Good luck.

Bronies: The Men Who Love “My Little Pony” Are Losers

February 2, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

“My Little Pony” was a media entertainment franchise created in the 1980’s by Hasbro that was initially marketing toy ponies to young girls. It eventually spawned multiple TV shows and movies and generally been considered a financial success for Hasbro.

In 2010, a Lauren Faust revived the franchise with a new TV show. As expected, the show was again a success, but a queer and disturbing trend emerged: grown men became rabid, eager fans of the show.

According to the men who would be Bronies, they don’t love the show because of the bright, colorful displays or writing or the quality of production, but because the show celebrates friendship. Think about that. Grown men love a TV show aimed at socializing children into healthy, mature adults has a large and vocal fanbase.

Yet, these men don’t just love the show. No, these men fashion themselves as some sort of progressive gender-benders who challenge traditions of men growing up, excuse me – being masculine.

A video representing a good bit — but not all — of how Bronies see themselves:

This video has been pretty popular throughout the community and has positive references on feminist gaming sites — The Mary Sue — and the sentiment has been echoed on DailyDot, Wired.com and USA Today.

I already addressed his ridiculous gender theory from Judith Butler here.

Before dissecting the untoward psychology of the movement, consider the concept of "New Sincerity." The movement is a self-professed reaction against the "irony" of the modern age. Irony is classic distancing behavior of a person who wants to be real but is terrified at what people will think of them if they are honest. Honesty is secondary to other's approval. "New Sincerity" seems to be a fumbling attempt at true expression, but still needs escape hatches to escape social judgment and true, honest expression of the self. These are sorts of people who think treating people respectfully with compassion and decency are "revolutionary." It's not.

This is where "My Little Pony" comes in. The men who identify as "Bronies" are not challenging anything at all, but men who are so psychologically weak that they need a portal to their childhood where they fantasize about being a little girl. It is a queer way of reconnecting with a failed childhood, fantasizing about women while pretending your ability to garner the approval of women would be greatly helped by being a woman yourself. It is distancing yourself from your own personal desires and concerns and escaping into a fantasy world filled with the trappings of femininity where a weak man can exist amongst the feminine while simultaneously pretending he is one of them to get their approval and doing absolutely nothing to garner feminine approval in real life.

On one hand, it is part and parcel of female worship and a deeply rooted belief in female superiority and misandry. Bronies take like ducks to water when rhetoric about male hyper-masculinity is spewed, as they are the first in line to accuse men — as a class — of misogyny. These men have no guilt about throwing a fellow man under the bus, if female approval lies on the other side of the bus. They hate themselves more than they hate masculinity. The self-punishment and debasement is born of a society that teaches men they are not true men unless they have female approval. Escaping into a world filled with symbols of femininity is their way of garnering female approval in the abstract without actually having to do that in real life. Imagine a grown man enamored of a purple pony charming a woman on a first date.

On the other hand, it is based out of a false sense of male superiority. Consider this website, Betapedia. As I observed in my review of the movie "her," these sorts of men have a deep sense of superiority over women that is rooted out of a pure, unadulterated sense of male ownership of women. These men have no game, no real lifestyle and see women as objects – of either worship or control. They don't understand game, charisma or personal psychological balance. The fact that they worship objects — literally pony-shaped objects — and spend so much time on fictional characters over which they exercise complete control in their fan fiction is supremely telling. Sure, it is pure narcissism. Yet, unlike many functional narcissists, they can't even convince people around them of their personal delusions. They are so neck-deep in narcissism, they need to fictional characters to meet their thirst for female approval.

These men are representative of the new masculinity: one based entirely on female approval and supremely beneficial to alpha males. Most importantly — as the creators and writers have — is the embrace by the franchise of these "Bronies." They didn't expect grown men to embrace the show, but whatever drives revenue is good, right? The rhetoric over gender and challenging masculinity is simply a smoke-screen for the producers of "My Little Pony" to keep selling this ridiculously childish imitation of masculinity to "Bronies."

If you are watching a TV show geared towards children, you have problems. Further, for a grown man to eagerly consume a TV show aimed at girls is to admit the complete devolution of men into female children. Those men don't aspire to self-sacrifice or any sort of stoicism, they aspire to…friendship.

Real men don’t spend their time fantasizing about true friendship, as they have that in real life. They certainly don’t fantasize about feminine ponies acting out friendship in a cartoon. Real men carve out their own life according to their terms; they spend time chasing and pursuing concrete goals. These “Bronies” spend their time fantasizing about either being a fantasy pony or “identifying” with a fantasy pony. All within the confines of childish femininity.

“Bronies” are nothing more than a sign of the times: weak-ass betas desperate for a personal identity and female approval so they find a outlet in “My Little Pony.” They are nothing more than a den of ankle-biting losers, but be aware they lurk in your midst. They are men who cock-block with impunity and men who sabotage other men with no remorse.

Just know that if a man has a purple pony on his nightstand, he is a man you can never trust.

The Turning Point In A Man’s Gaming Career

February 2, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

When a man first takes the red pill, he accepts a burden: he will have to provide for himself. He acknowledges that women won’t be showing up, knocking at his door, and begging him for sex.

This, of course, is true for the chumps that haven’t take the plunge yet as well. The difference is that they haven’t accepted this burden. They still live under the false pretense that women will find their way to them. Somehow. Someway.

Even when a man knows what he must do, he may still struggle to see it done. Game is challenging at first– demoralizing, even. I know plenty of men who haven’t had the balls to persevere past the initial phases of rejection. But if you do persevere past a certain point, you’ll reap the benefits of your time and effort. You’ll enter poosy paradise.

This article will cover exactly what this critical inflexion point is, and how to use it to your advantage.

Stage 1: Fear

Imagine you're out at a venue with many attractive women. It's one of your first nights out with the explicit intention of gaming girls.

You notice everyone who looks your way, and feel the weight of their eyes on your shoulders. As you scan the room you notice a cute girl standing alone by the entrance. She's on her phone. She must be waiting for someone, you think.

In a room full of groups and pairs, this seems like the easiest catch of the night. You tell yourself, just do this one approach. Just go say hi.

And so you walk over to her and use that one opener that you memorized for tonight. "Hey, you seem cool. Are you friendly, too?"

She glances over at you and smiles. "Yes, I'm Jess. What's your name?"

She continues to reply warmly to your questions, but you feel like you're running out of things to say– the clock is ticking. After a few minutes, you can't take it anymore. "It was nice to meet you. I got to go back and find my friends."

This scenario is all too common. You struggle to even approach a single girl, and when you finally do, all you can think of is how to exit the interaction. It's like you don't even want to talk to her. In fact, you really don't. It's uncomfortable for you, and so you take the first exit you find. Or maybe she responds very well and you put it off and take the second or third exit that presents itself. Either way, you rarely extend an interaction past a few minutes and never push for rejection beyond the act of approaching.

Stage 2: Comfort

I'm at the grocery store talking to a cute little brunette.

"Well, I have to finish up my shopping list and head home," she says and walks away.

I'm frustrated. How dare she walk away? I was just getting started. And that's when I realized I had crossed the bridge. At one point I would've breathed a sigh of relief when girls excused themselves like that. But not today. Today I wanted to keep going.

I also realized that girls often excuse themselves because they're the one who's nervous. Sometimes they fold under the pressure of an attractive man who's seemingly randomly approached them. And that is their burden to carry. Not the man's.

Don't look for a way out. Stay as long as you can.

I passed the point of no return when I consistently and genuinely wanted to stay in, and advance conversations. Up until a certain point, I was always looking for a way out. I would approach and bounce. Then I would approach, try to get a number, and bounce. Then I would approach, touch lightly, and bounce. Then one day I stopped looking for a way out. I began to try and extend every interaction. To see how far it could go, rather than flee in fear.

Do you prematurely bounce? If so, recognize that it's holding you back. Even when you're nervous or uncomfortable, push on. It will raise your tolerance, and eventually you will crave it. Take the role of the aggressor– let the women be nervous.

Check out my new #1 Amazon Bestseller, The Book of Alpha. It's full of direct, actionable advice for the man who wants to better himself.

Did British Blogger Sara C Nelson Commit Libel?

February 2, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Freelance writer Vincent Vinturi's dating book "LMR Exposed" was banned on Friday from Amazon after it offended British blogger-journalist Sara C Nelson, who publicly labeled it a "rape guide" after using her clout as a Huffington Post UK employee to exert pressure on Amazon in favor of removing the book from sale. Because of the actions of a British national, American citizens are unable to purchase the book, and questions have arisen as to the legality of Nelson's actions.

On January 27, Vinturi published an article on ROK about bedroom seduction and how a man can know when a woman is ready to engage in sex. Here's an excerpt from his piece:

> She can be saying 'no' with her words and even with her situational body language. But if you've been unmistakably clear about your sexual intent and then she comes to your room, she is open to being seduced. Otherwise, she wouldn't be there. I've had hour or more long battles with a girl who had come to my room and then protested that she wasn't going to have sex with me… In the end, of course, we got naked. And, she appreciated it after the fact.

Vinturi attempted to bridge the confusion between a woman's words and her body language, a problem that has frustrated men since the dawn of time. Expectedly, the article was received with criticism from those who didn't read it carefully. One person who took offense was Huffington Post UK blogger Sara C Nelson. She disagreed with the article, located one of Vinturi's seduction books on Amazon (available on both the American and UK storefronts), and began agitating for it to be banned. It was removed from Amazon stores within hours of her efforts. She writes:

> The first comment under the now-defunct Amazon page promoting the aforementioned book reads: “Disgusting rape apologism. The author should be ashamed of himself for writing this and Amazon should be ashamed to sell it.”
> HuffPost UK alerted Amazon to the page on Friday afternoon and it was duly taken down (too bad, Vincent)*. Our request for comment was simply answered with “This title is not available at Amazon.co.uk”.

After her “alert” succeeded in scaring Amazon, likely due to her Huffington Post credentials, she spat in Vinturi’s face about her successful effort in censoring a book that she has not admitted to reading. She also writes:

> On Friday a wave of bile against Vinturi and his “work” was unleashed on Twitter.

I spent much time looking for this “wave of bile,” but I could not find it. Here’s the Twitter results for Vinturi’s book:

And here are the tweets sent directly to him, with Nelson’s victory tweet at the top:

Nine total tweets is the “wave” that Nelson believed justified the censorship and effective burning of a published work.

Did Nelson, who is on the career track to become a real journalist instead of a blogger-journalist that she is now, abuse her employment with a media company to engage in activist censorship on a work that she didn’t even read? In private, she went through the motions of giving Vinturi an opportunity to share his viewpoint, but judging by the tone of her emails, she was ready to act as judge, jury, and executioner of her own moral tribunal.

Hi Vincent,

I came across your eBook today on Amazon and it reads very much to me like you're pedalling a manual to legitimise rape.

I am currently writing a piece about the outrage your book has received and would love to have your comments.

Hi Vincent,

Thanks so much for your prompt response.

You have been accused of being an 'apologist for rape' and I would like to give you a right to reply.

Best,

Her dialogue with Vinturi can be likened to a Soviet show trial where the verdict was already pre-determined by Nelson's subjective interpretation of what she thinks could be inside a book she had not purchased or properly familiarized herself with. One can only wonder if Huffington Post management knows (or cares) that is has a rogue employee with a social justice bent who is using the company as a way to settle her personal ideological vendettas.

Was Ms. Nelson's Journalist Activism Legal?

I asked historian and legal expert Quintus Curtius about Nelson's activism in relation to the history of British press culture. Curtius stated, "I think that this attempt by an Englishwoman to censor the writings on an American work is truly disappointing. It flies in the face of England's distinguished legacy of press freedom that goes back to the days of Defoe, Gibbon, Walpole, Johnson, and Milton. Those in England who would advocate such censorship would be well advised to look to their own traditions, for which they apparently have such little regard." It's worth nothing that British 'hate speech' laws have become far more stringent than those in America, resulting in the arrest of thousands of Britons for such acts as criticizing Islam on social networking sites.

I also asked Curtius about the legal implications of a British citizen censoring American writing. "Someone based in England or any other foreign country has no right to interfere with the broadcasts or communications of an American website. She is free to attempt to restrict access to ROK in her own country, provided she complies with all laws of her own country, but any such attempt to disrupt American free speech communications would run afoul of American laws." Since Nelson censored a book and not a web site, it does not appear she broke American criminal law.

Civilly, however, she can be held accountable for punitive damages in the case of libel. Nelson publicly stated that Vinturi's book is a "rape manual," the meaning of which is unambiguous. If Vinturi can prove in an American court that his book does not advocate or encourage rape, he may have a libel claim against Nelson and the Huffington Post. Curtius shared his legal opinion on the matter. "Since Vinturi is not considered a 'public figure,' he would only have to show that: (1) A false statement was made, (2) The statement caused him tangible harm, and (3) Was deliberately made without adequate research into the truthfulness of the statement. It does look like he has a prima facie case against [Ms. Nelson] if he can show that she caused him monetary harm (financial damage) in some way." We were not able to reach Vinturi before publication about his intentions of beginning a legal challenge against Nelson.

Ms. Nelson's Personal Motives

To understand the intentions of Nelson, I researched her secret Facebook page located at facebook.com/sara.claudia.37 (her full name is Sara Claudia Nelson). Browsing through her 3,000 party photos and likes, I was unable to find an obvious vein of bigotry. Instead, I found what seemed to the interests of a standard British woman (Sesame Street, Hello Kitty, and Victoria Beckham), and a look through her Twitter account reveals a strong interest in cute animal pictures. Thus it can not be completely ruled out that the directive to censor a book for American sale did not come from Huffington Post management themselves.

Whether one agrees with Vinturi's work or not, it is troubling for free speech advocates to see a blogger-journalist engage in a figurative book burning celebration on Twitter for being the principal reason that a published work was banned. It is also questionable that, in order to justify her activism, she blatantly misrepresented the "wave" of anger in response to Vinturi's book, perhaps because she knew that there was in fact only token annoyance against it. By wrongly labeling the book as an illegal guide, she may now be subject to civil action in the United States.

The ROK editorial team believes in Vinturi's free speech efforts to publish his work here and on Amazon, especially since said speech does not break international laws. With the rate at which information is globalized (a large percentage of our readers are international), it may be time to ask tough questions on what can be done when a British blogger-journalist singlehandedly prevents the sale of a book that was previously available to the American public, and how much liability both the blogger-journalist and the company that employs her are exposed to when they clearly misrepresent a published work. Sooner or later, questions like this will have to be answered, most likely in a court of law.

The Time Is Right For Traditional Sex Roles To Return

February 3, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I'm proud to announce the launch of Traditional Sex Roles week. For the next seven days, we will be offering you over a dozen articles that explore the societal benefits and implications of having traditional sex roles.

What Are Traditional Sex Roles?

In the most simplest terms, it is when men are masculine and women are feminine. Nature (or god) gave men a unique set of strengths and weaknesses while giving women a different set of strengths and weaknesses. Traditional sex roles allows both sexes to logically maximize their strengths in ways that benefit both the individual and society. Let's look at some simple examples:

- Which sex, thanks to a stronger nurturing component, makes for better nurses and caretakers?
- Which sex, thanks to a superior analytical faculty, makes for better engineers and programmers?
- Which sex, thanks to its predisposition for accumulating power and resources, makes for better nation builders, state leaders, and executives?
- Which sex, thanks to a more innate ability at nesting and maintaining the hearth, makes for better home caretakers?
- Which sex, due to its greater desensitization to fear, is better suited to take large risks?
- Which sex, due to having a minuscule fluid contribution to the breeding process, is better suited at having a larger number of sexual partners?
- Which sex, due to having to risk its life through a 9-month gestation period, is better suited to monogamy?

Despite what modern progressives may attempt to brainwash us to believe, the answer to any of the above with "both sexes" is incorrect and dishonest. While we can take a baby girl at birth and raise her to be a Spartan warrior with immense effort and investment, it will be ten times easier to make her an accomplished mother instead. There are limitations placed within our genetics that make the pursuit of another sex's innate advantages an exercise in futility.

This does not mean a man can't be good nurse, for example, but unless he has some type of predisposition to caretaking, nothing is proved by forcing him to undertake such a role. The same logic holds by pushing non-analytically inclined woman into a field like physics, where she will waste university and societal resources before inevitably dropping out to become a housewife, something she was inclined to do from the start.

Why Are Traditional Sex Roles Important?

They are the glue that holds society together. Consider that the "equality" regime has been in place for less than 50 years, a blink of an eye in the course of human existence. Up to the feminist revolution, having roles based on traditional fabric was wildly successful is allowing humans to colonize the Earth via the mechanism of a nuclear family. Equality beliefs have not proved that it is any way superior for humans, and if plummeting birth rates among Western nations are any indication, it may be a principal contributor to the relative cultural decline of the West behind those nations—particularly in the Middle East—who retain their traditional sex roles and out-breed those who don't. In other words, feminists on Tumblr will have a decreasing audience for their social justice rantings while women in the Middle East are busy filling their home with children that propagate their own culture and way of life.

But who cares about society? Will it really affect you if birth rates plummet in America? Probably not, but if you take a minute to zoom in on the individual level, the eradication of traditional sex roles is clearly harming both sexes. Happiness surveys show that Western women are unhappier than ever, even if they have a lucrative office job or own an iPhone that provides then with nonstop entertainment and thirsty suitors. It turns out that brainwashing them to live the program of a man by achieving a career and accumulating lots of money has not made them better off.

At the same time, men are finding that their traditional strength of being a provider is becoming associated with loserdom. The resulting punishment is either no sex or a relationship with a woman who had dozens of sexual partners beforehand, with a 50% chance of her filing a YOLO divorce. Such an unforgiving assault on traditional masculinity is leaving men confused, frustrated, and unsure of their place in society. In the past, a man could marry a good woman from not much more than having a good job. He could come home to a wife who prepares his cigar and whiskey beverage while cooking a homemade meal. But not anymore. Women, now trained to act like men, are too busy with their own jobs to care about dedicating themselves to a man. Instead, they seek out aloof cads for hedonistic pleasure while the provider men become addicted to videos game or porn.

The Eradication Of Traditional Sex Roles Is Great For Players

Some men are sexually cashing in on these times. I look at myself, a man who has fornicated with a huge pile of women, most of them within hours of meeting. Could I have done this in the 1950s? Probably not. But even in spite of the ease which I was able to lay American women in Washington DC (after years of game training), it turns out that brainwashing women to act like men with little dicks does not make them pleasant to have as girlfriends who you can trust. So yes, I banged a lot, but where's the connection? Where's the pair bonding? My relationships in America were ultimately unsatisfying.

Every player will tell you that indiscriminate banging does lose its luster after a few years, and when it does, this man would be a fool to settle down with a woman who can order an artisanal burrito with her smartphone app but not remove mold from her bathroom tile or cook a healthy meal. Thankfully, I've had the economic means to escape America to pursue mini-relationships in foreign countries with women who accept their feminine role and my masculine dominance over them.

Fruitful Discussion

We get frequent accusations that we are a "troll" website. The radio band of discussion has become so limited in the West that possessing an opinion that is on the other end of the spectrum is simply dismissed outright as false. It's a lot easier to levy this label upon us instead of using the following style of rebuttal: "I disagree with this because <insert logic here>." Speaking for myself and all the ROK writers, we truly believe what we write.

In fact, if you've been following my work for some years, you will see that I indeed live to the letter of what I publish.

In the end, ROK will grow and these ideas will spread for one simple reason: we provide answers for men. In a world where traditional sex roles and masculinity are being swept under the rug as if they had never existed, we give men the tools to get what they want out of life. Our enemies offer no tools, just shame and petty "oh the poor men" insults. They have zero answers for men. Their movement is specifically geared to empower women at all costs, and in the zero-sum game between the sexes, men come out the big losers. I hope Traditional Sex Roles Week puts a halt to that, and I implore you to consider our viewpoints with an open mind. We look forward to your comments on the blog or on Twitter with the hashtag #BackToTheKitchen.

How Feminists Attack The Traditional Woman

February 3, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

It is not uncommon to hear feminists boil their ideology down to the desire to facilitate choice for women, and allow them to select one or more of many paths in their professional and personal lives without fear of constriction by traditional sex roles.

These words are one thing, but do feminist actions believe them? It would appear so. Take, for example, the case of Michelle Obama. At the 2012 Democratic Convention, she gave a powerful speech introducing her husband. Though her words were generally viewed in a positive light when taken as a whole, this particular bit near the end of the address drew some controversy:

> And I say all of this tonight not just as First Lady…and not just as a wife.
> You see, at the end of the day, my most important title is still "mom-in-chief."

> My daughters are still the heart of my heart and the center of my world.

Michelle Obama's address had taken many interesting turns that seemed to please feminist masses on their surface, from descriptions of her own mother's perseverance against a racist patriarchy to the respect given to the role Barack's grandmother played in his development. Her desire to own the title "mom-in-chief", however, disappointed many:

> It was, I think, the only off-key moment in the whole transcendent address…
> …Here we have a Princeton- and Harvard-educated woman, one who out-earned her husband for much of their marriage, and could bring down the house at the Democratic Convention with one of the best political speeches in memory, telling her life story without a mention of her own legal career. A woman whose political instincts — ones that have been shown to be formidable — clearly tell her that her bona fides, her palatability, is still tied to being seen as mom and wife.

> I long for the day when powerful women don't need to assure Americans that they're moms above all else. http://t.co/ZFjsXaqY > ok "mom in chief" is not where i thought that sentence was headed. it was so soaring just before that.
> — Jessica Valenti (@JessicaValenti) September 5, 2012

> — Hanna Rosin (@HannaRosin) September 5, 2012

Michelle Obama is an Ivy League educated lawyer with a resume that includes work at some of the nation's most prestigious firms. As the First Lady of the United States, she is without a doubt one of the most influential females on the planet. Many feminists took all of this in and began to plan her tenure as First Lady out for her: she was going to “lean in”, take on tough issues, be outspoken and transcend the traditional role of the first lady by not being a passive bystanding mom and wife committed primarily to supporting her children and her husband:

> I am still trying to make my peace with Michelle’s culminating “mom-in-chief” line. The underlying sentiment is unassailable: “My daughters are still the heart of my heart and the center of my world.” But why does mom-in-chief have to be the most important thing this strong, vibrant woman tells us about herself as she flexes the strange but considerable power of the office of first lady?

Instead, Michelle Obama decided she’d rather be “mom-in-chief”, and the feminist knee-jerk reaction was one of intense discomfort.

Should that be the case? As I noted before, Michelle Obama has plenty going for her. With her education, work experience and highly visible, influential platform, there's plenty she could do. No man, not even her husband, would be able to stop her from taking a path more firmly divorced from notions of "traditional" femininity. On the contrary, Barack would put his own political future at stake if he were seen to be doing so. Nobody has forced Michelle Obama to embrace the role of "mom-in-chief" ahead of others and circumstances have not done so either. She has just taken the role that she wanted to take. It was her choice, and she made it freely.

Isn't this what feminists have said they wanted all along and continue to say that they desire? The ability for women everywhere to be able to choose, absent any coercion, the role they have in life? Shouldn't Michelle Obama's exercise of this choice be seen as a triumph for feminism? Michelle Cottle doesn't think so. Quite the contrary: she believes that Michelle Obama is a feminist nightmare.

> Recently, the first lady has been receiving a bit of bad press about her apparent lack of gritty and politically charged actions. Jennifer Steinhauer of The New York Times wrote that after nearly five years of evangelizing exercise and good eating habits, Michelle is finally moving more deeply into policy with her move to help with the higher education program. Cottle furthers this message by writing 'enough already with the pining for a Michelle Obama who simply doesn't exist.'
> Cottle believes that Michelle has never been, nor will she ever be, a feminist or political icon because she copped out of taking charge in The White House and left her husband to dabble in politics while she took on the role of "Supermum". Cottle states that the first lady is just 'who she is' and so will not surprise any of us in her last few years in her post.
> Cottle is not alone in this thinking. Leslie Morgan Steiner, the author of Mommy Wars, wrote: 'Are fashion and body-toning tips all we can expect from one of the most highly educated First Ladies in history?' Keli Goff, a writer for African-American online magazine Root, told Cottle that she considers it 'a national shame that she's not putting the weight of her office behind some of these issues.' Furthermore, Mrs. Obama is not helping us to think differently – she told us outright in her speech to the Democratic National convention last year that her most important role is 'still mom-in-chief', and she has appeared on multiple TV programs and news shows dancing, talking about children and giving us gardening tips. So, there is a backlog of evidence for anger against her.

Despite their insistence on the sanctity of female choice and portrayal of their cause as one that simply seeks to allow women to be able to live their lives as they see fit, feminists remain uncomfortable with women who decide of their own accord to abide by more traditional visions of femininity. Feminists want to portray both kinds of paths (the less traditional, more career-oriented tracks and the more traditional family oriented tracks) as equally worthwhile, but are inherently suspicious of the latter while remaining overly anxious to promote the former. So strong is this suspicion and anxiety that even Michelle Obama, a highly accomplished woman whose family has got to be considered one of the greatest allies feminists have, can't escape scathing criticism and shaming for picking the "wrong" path.

All “choices” are equal… but one is more equal. Given that reality, is there really a genuine “choice” available here at all as far as feminists are concerned? Or is this just another example of feminist hypocrisy, one in which they claim to advocate for one thing while actually demanding another?

Feminists work hard to try and promote the notion that they aren’t ballbusters out to “get men” and that they’re not advocating for discrimination against those whose political opinions aren’t clearly in line with the feminist vision of “the new woman” who seeks to “have it all”. This is one of the first things a feminist will respond with when her ideology is challenged by someone:

> “Feminism is just equality! Feminism is just choice! That’s all it is – equal treatment and respect for ALL choices! How can you possibly disagree with that?”

And she’d have point. If feminism were solely about equality and the sanctity of female choice, it would be much harder to disagree with. I have no real issue with legal equality or respecting the sanctity of female choice and look at me – I’m a big, bad sexist “misogynist” writing for ROK! If I can get on board with such basic notions of gender progressivism, surely just about any American man can.

The problem is that this isn't what feminism is all about. The words sound nice, but actions speak much louder and feminist acts paint a much less inclusive and substantially more hypocritical picture than they prefer to articulate. I don't have a problem with women choosing to occupy non-traditional roles and being allowed to do so, but I can only maintain such an opinion on one condition: that those women who, for whatever reason, choose NOT to take a more progressive, non-traditional path and prefer adherence to more traditionally feminine goals, lifestyles, and points of view have their choices acknowledged and respected as much as those of their counterparts. I find modern western, mainstream feminism sorely inadequate in its satisfaction of this condition.

Despite feminist claims to the contrary, feminism remains, as a whole, highly hostile to those with more traditional and less progressive views on gender and life, even when said individuals show no real desire to force their view on others and have come to said views absent coercion. Most feminists pay lip service to the notion of "equality of choice", but in their hearts they are deeply suspicious and largely disapproving of those who are not in line with what they believe a modern woman "should" be.

It’s ironic, isn’t it? Before feminism, there was generally only one acceptable model for how a woman “ought to be”. Women had little choice but to follow it or face heavy criticism. Feminists sought to challenge that model and did so successfully, but replaced it with their own vision of what a woman “ought to be”. Women now have little choice but to follow it or be guilted, shamed, and heavily criticized. We’re right back where we started.

Traditional Sex Roles Are What Nature Intended

February 3, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Anthropologists tell us that the human race has gone through distinct phases in its development. The hunter-gatherer phase was the first and apparently the longest-lasting, and was characterized by a sharp division of labor and roles between males and females. The males, for the most part, were responsible for the capture of game and those chores associated with this task, such as making weapons and planning tactics and strategy of the hunt. In reciprocation for his exposing himself to the mortal dangers of stalking and killing game, the male was likely to rest during most of his time in camp.

In camp, the female was master: she was responsible for the care and rearing of children, the construction of huts and hovels, gathering and foraging for edible plants, and the physical transportation of camp supplies. In this respect (carrying supplies) primitive women were quite strong, almost the physical equal of their male counterparts. Even today, in primitive societies in Asia, Africa, and the South Pacific, it is incredible to see just how much weight native women are able to carry on their heads and backs. In carrying out her tasks about camp, women were also likely the inventors of sewing, basketry, pottery, weaving, woodworking, and primitive construction.

Written accounts of white settlers in North America often marvel at the astonishing capacity for work displayed by native women. Being feminine at this state of civilization meant something very different than it does now: women were expected to be useful, to pull their weight, and to earn their keep. For tens of thousands of years—perhaps even hundreds of thousands—human society existed and preserved itself roughly along these lines, all across the globe. Our current instincts and behavioral inheritances as men and women are traceable to this crucial period of history.

The invention of agriculture (roughly 10000 B.C.) brought a revolutionary change in human society and social organization. Perhaps by observing nature (bees storing honey, birds dropping seeds on fertile soil that later sprouted, etc), humans eventually began to realize that edible material could be coaxed out of the soil, and seed could be saved during winter months. Slowly, over a great deal of time, more efficient and reliable tools were invented to do agricultural work. The digging stick or spear eventually gave way to the modern hoe. As food supplies increased, populations increased, and social organization became more complex and differentiated. Finally, a major step was made with the domestication of animals which could assist in agricultural tasks, such as oxen. Cattle became a source of wealth.

The rise of agriculture was critical to the establishment of patriarchies around the world. Man, due to the physical strength needed to control the plow and domestic cattle, was able to accrete the benefits of agriculture to himself. Land became the measurable source of wealth, which was to be passed down by inheritance through the male line of descent. Female fidelity was demanded, and marriage came to be seen as a device for ensuring that property would be transmitted to offspring of the husband. Ultimately, women and children came to be subordinate to the man, who found himself in permanent control of the sources of agrarian wealth: land and domesticated animals. We should not overstate this, however. In both primitive and agricultural stages of development, sex roles were strongly differentiated. At all stages of social development, the family has been the fundamental social institution; and women and men performed different but equally valuable roles.

These different sex roles, described above, have withstood the test of time. Their longevity has been demonstrated over many thousands of years. They have persisted so long because they fulfill an instinctive need present in all humans. It is a serious mistake to neglect this fact, and to believe that we, in the comfort of our “modern” era, are somehow different from humans in previous eras. We are now paying a high price for our arrogance. Failure to respect these traditional sex roles has corroded the bases of First World societies, with predictable results.

It was the Industrial Revolution which shattered hundreds of thousands of years of social precedent, and re-wrote the rules on a grand scale. It was even more revolutionary than the passage from the primitive stage to the agricultural stage. For our purposes, the major social result of the Industrial Revolution in Europe in the 18th century was the gradual replacement of an old ethic by a new one. The development of factories and industry favored the growth of cities; and in big cities it was easy for traditional checks on human behavior (family, religion, clan) to wither away. The primacy of the family began to be replaced by the primacy of the individual. Moral codes that had been based on family controls and religious sanction began to lose their power, as the individual, rather than the family, began to be seen as the basic unit of society.

Women were drawn into industrialized city work as traditional modes of life became less glamorous; rural depopulation began, and is still proceeding steadily. For both men and women, city life enabled the pursuit of pleasures more and more easily; men and women postponed marriage to achieve economic security, and found themselves unable to adhere to traditional religious guidance on premarital sex. This put additional pressure on ancient moral codes that valued premarital continence and female virginity.

The Industrial Revolution continues today, although it seems to have entered a post-industrial phase characterized by biotechnology, genetic engineering, and highly accelerated development of computers and machines. The traditional moral codes are under constant attack. Sex roles, we are constantly told, are as out of date as the demons and infernos of medieval theology.

Or are they?

In surveying history, what is most surprising to me is the resilience and persistence of traditional human social behaviors. Despite all our technology, we are at our core not tremendously different from our remote ancestors walking the savannas of East Africa tens of thousands of years ago. Despite all predictions of its demise, the family persists as a social unit. Sex roles have endured. The very fact that these ingrained, sex-specific behavior traits of men and women—dating from the most primitive stages of human development—have survived so long is proof of their worth in maintaining social order.

The past has not vanished. It is still here with us. The primitive phase and the agricultural phases of development are still here. It is easy to forget that the majority of humanity on Earth lives in conditions far different from those prevailing in the urban First World. This majority—the hundreds of millions living in Asia, Africa, and South America—still adhere more or less to traditional ways of doing things. It is remarkable that most of humanity is still governed by the same instincts and impulses that were found in mankind during the earlier phases of human social development. And the fertility of the simple will ensure that their numbers continue to grow, at the expense of the relatively infertile, aging populations of the First World.

The future, it seems, will belong to the past.

5 Feminine Traits That Make Brazilian Women Ideal For Relationships

February 3, 2014 | by Black Knight | Link | Original Link

I recently spent a significant amount of time in Brazil. When we decided to do Traditional Sex Roles week, I immediately thought of the wealth of experiences I had with Brazilian women that were simply unlike anything I had experienced during my upbringing in the United States. Here are 5 characteristics that have been stamped out of all but the most traditional western women:

1. They are modest

We know that Brazilian women are more openly sexual—they will not hesitate to play up their physical virtues. Once you get to know them, however, you observe a quiet modesty that accompanies even the cutest of Brasileiras. The best looking girls I talked to didn't possess a fraction of the self-aggrandizing bluster I see regularly on OKcupid profiles of America's fattest and meanest girls.

Said to me by a beautiful Brazilian girl: "I never thought you would be interested in someone who looked like me."

2. They care about your sexual fulfillment

For Brazilian women, sex isn't just a transactional bargaining tool or an opportunity to express a liberated, patriarchy-free statement about the equality of the coital act. They want to express passion for their lover and wish for both parties to have a transcendental experience. Contrast this with women in the west, who will use you as a pogo stick in a vain attempt to find enjoyment for only themselves. I've had girls stop after they came, get up, and tell me to finish myself off. Brazilians tell you to keep going because their happiness is affected by yours.

Said to me by a Brazilian girl: "Can I come now? I want to, but I've been waiting for you."

3. They are eager to please

We know that the aphorism "Happy wife, happy life" is a sensitive, new age lie that destroys relationships in the west. As evidenced by their antidepressant usage, constant railing against social norms, and generally acerbic demeanor, western women have reached a point where they can never be truly happy. If you attempt to make them happy, they will interpret it as weakness and walk all over you.

In contrast, Brasileiras understand that pleasing a man is the fountain from which a well-adjusted human relationship flows.They know that the company, security, and emotional investment of a high-value man is not something to be casually discarded. Their vulnerability is endearing, which in turn motivates men to invest in them emotionally and financially.

Said to me by a Brazilian girl: "I was nervous that I would be too young for you."

4. They maintain a feminine appearance

The women in Brazil were by far the most feminine of any that I have encountered. Rather than regarding makeup, long hair, and heels as oppressive tools of the sexist establishment, they relish their ability to make themselves look better. They know that their Master's degree isn't what catches a man's eye when he walks into a bar.

They are not only focused only on their physical attributes, because they understand that their looks are the hook from which other interest develops. Even plain-looking girls attempt to accentuate their positive points.

Said to me by a Brazilian girl: "Why would I ever cut my hair off? Then I would look like an old woman."

5. They have a desire to learn about the world

When I asked Brazilian girls what they liked to do for fun, there wasn't a single one who gave the answer "Shopping and reality TV." I can't tell you how many girls I talked to who were interested in art, politics, music, and actually working at building their familial and friendship bonds. They are also willing to engage in deeper conversations, entertain world views that differ from their own, and even change their viewpoint if they see they are in error.

Said to me by a Brazilian girl: "I think there is a lot I can learn from you"

Throughout my time in Brazil I observed these traditional values leading to happier relationships and a more solid family unit. Relationships did not appear to be epic power struggles for control, but rather partnerships where traditional sex roles allowed women to be more fulfilled and gave men more of an incentive to invest in them. American women would do well to take a lesson from their Brazilian counterparts.

Why Is Rebecca Sparrow Attacking Young Moms For Staying Slim And Pretty?

February 4, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Most anyone who's involved in fitness in one form or another has invariably run upon motivational pictures such as these:

Or have seen videos of older gents who chose to work hard and be in wicked shape at a time in their lives when most of their similarly aged peers are barely functioning messes suffering from their first major health issues caused by years of laziness and gluttony.

Pictures and videos like the ones above are designed to inspire people to get in shape, to cast aside their cheap excuses and hit the gym to physically be all that they can be. None of these motivational images and videos are considered controversial since they're mostly aimed to inspire (shame into action) men – and if there's one thing our current society loves, it's the man up mantra.

However, what is 'controversial' is when women do the same thing to inspire other women. Enter Maria Kang.

Fine ass momma Maria Kang learned the hard way what happens when you try to inspire fat, indolent, spoilt, lazy women into improving their lives. When Maria released the above picture as a rebuttal to the countless women who use pregnancy and motherhood as an excuse to indulge in reckless eating habits and then simply allow themselves to remain obese after being pregnant and rearing children, the internet jumped down her throat. Facebook even banned her temporarily.

Accusations and insults of every stripe were hurled at Maria while sassy women hit back hard with scathing editorials which made complete sense and didn't just prove Maria's point that all these offended women were just lazy, selfish and making excuses.

Apparently it’s controversial for an in shape woman to show others that, even after three kids, you can still be a killer babe so long as you exercise and eat right – and marry young. Maria became a mother in her 20s, like nature intended and thus built women’s bodies for.

But those fit young mothers, they just never learn do they? Soon after the horrifying crime against humanity that was Maria’s fat shaming picture, Caroline Berg Eriksen contributed her very own screw you to the human race in the form of a selfie taken just days after she gave birth at the damn near paedophilic age of 26.

Wow just…wow… Like, SERIOUSLY Caroline? You and all you other fit girls having healthy children in your youth need to stop posting these pictures trying to inspire women to marry young, stay in shape and have children at the peak of your child bearing years.. You’re not real women. You’re waging a war on real women. As published authour Rebecca Sparrow said, in her article titled the same: This is not a selfie. This is an act of war against women.

Oh? What’s that? You’ve never heard of Rebecca Sparrow? Well let me tell you who she is.

Fat legs which have never felt a weighted squat in their life and a teacup you could fit your head into because hey! You gotta have room for all that heavy cream and sugar

Introducing Rebecca Sparrow

Rebecca Sparrow is a chubby middle aged woman who had her first kid when she was 37 but only after hitting the wall face first at Mach 3. And yes, all signs do point to her having spent her youthful years sleeping with strangers. Rebecca Sparrow is emotionally damaged and despite the success of being a published authour married to a chump beta husband who is a doctor, never having to work a real job for any amount of time in her life, and being carried through her life by her parents, she is still so petty and unhappy with herself that when Caroline proudly showed off the results of her years of hard work, dedication and will power, Rebecca had to write an article where she thinks Caroline's photo is, quote, "fucked up."

My grandmother looked more youthful in my baby pictures.

Unfortunately, to really get my point across about what kind of women try to shame the Kang's and Eriksen's of the world, I have to dig a little deeper into the scar tissue that is Rebecca Sparrow's life. I'm an agnostic man by nature but getting to know Rebecca more intimately has certainly pushed me a few points closer to full blown nihilistic, angry atheism. Her life reads as a feminist cliché so stereotypical that even the most vitriolic misogynist would have trouble believing such a two-dimensional creature exists.

A brief biography of a selfish woman

Like most insufferable women, Rebecca's biggest dreams as a child were being a famous star – and thanks to her rich parents, she made slightly more headway then most. She never made it obviously, and instead decided to get a degree in Communications. Clearly student debt wasn't a problem or a concern for Rebecca because her jobs after university included such high paying gigs as writing media releases, feature articles, speeches, and newsletters for The Australian Red Cross, The Flight Centre Group, The Nine Network, and the British Millennium Commission. Rebecca spent her youth frivolously chasing whatever dream job of the week she fancied in between stuffing her maw with cup cakes, partying it up with her BFF's of the weekend and dating mysterious bad boys.

Note the nose piercing and blatant slut face – I wonder what tattoo she has on her buttcheek, star or butterfly?

Eventually she wound up marrying one of the bad boys she loves so much after her debt-ridden celebritism-chasing wanderlust brought her to Las Vegas. The wedding didn't last and Rebecca wound up back at home living with her parents. Eventually she got into another confirmed relationship with another bad boy, dumped him, published a book and then after taking awhile off to live the life of a Sex and the City style socialite she hit the jackpot and met her doctor husband. All that long, hard work of… not having to do long, hard work finally paid off.

Rebecca Sparrow Online shared a link.
27 November 2013

Over a decade ago I was in an emotionally and verbally abusive relationship.

Note: There was a bunch of bullcrap in here about some video link. I cropped the post to show the important parts.
- Billy

For two years I thought I was a strong woman who was the only one who truly understood my emotionally damaged boyfriend (who had been abused by his mother … classic scenario).

Rebecca was 32 or 34 when that relationship ended – she doesn't make it clear; for an authour who loves to talk about herself there is a telling amount of omission about her youthful years. She did meet her doctor husband when she was 35. How must her current husband feel when he reads how, by her own admissions, Rebecca let herself get tapped out by lord knows how many bad boys in her youth? How must it make him feel to know that she stayed with at least one 'emotionally damaged' bad boy for 2 years.

You know they were banging like rabbits the whole time. I wonder how much begging her doctor husband has to do just to have some missionary once in awhile. I wonder if he ever stops and thinks how, after all his years at medical school, he'd wind up with a once divorced party girl who gave her best years to losers whom she stayed with just because they made her wet and boosted her ego.

As soon as she hit the wall, when she was no longer a part of the cool age or even passably hot, Rebecca decided to start having kids at 37. Then she turned around and joined a mommy blog and now acts like her kids are the most important thing to her – she just couldn't, you know, be bothered to have any until she knew her party years were far behind her. Mommy needed all those decades to find herself; even if it means she has risked her children's lives by staving off her pregnancies to old age. Rebecca has had one stillborn child.

Motherhood as hissed by a serpent

So Rebecca made it to a good life with no effort. Thanks to her chump of a husband's wealth and her own moderate success as an authour Rebecca gets to stay home with kids she compares to dictators because they actually make her do some of the hard work she's avoided all her life.

> "I have a habit of comparing my four-year-old to deceased foreign megalomaniac dictators.
> I have, in conversation and online, likened my daughter Ava to Stalin, Idi Amin and, yeah okay, Pol Pot….
> …at the end of some looooong days with a 12-month-old and a four-year-old I want to sit under the dining room table with a bottle of gin and have a cry."

Mother of the year. Hey kids, did you know you make mommy so frustrated and depressed that she wants to go back to all that hard drinking she spent her teens, twenties and early thirties doing?! Don't forget, Rebecca essentially has no responsibilities outside of being a mother. Money is not an issue as her involvement in numerous charities shows, and her husband isn't practicing charity OBGYN at the private hospital where he works. Her daily job solely consists of making sure her kids don't stick their tongues in the electrical socket and don't starve to death.

I'm reminded a lot of a different authour in a similar situation. Stephen King faced some very trying times when he was a beginning writer; he had a couple of kids with all the headaches that involved, his family was actually broke with no rich mommy and daddy to bail him out, he worked full time as a teacher while his wife worked in the service industry and Stephen did all his writing on a typewriter balanced on his legs in a small room in a small trailer home while struggling with drug use and alcoholism the whole time. And yet I've never read any personal works of his that mentions hating his family so much that he actually checked into a hotel just to get away from them for a day.

BAM! Look at the type of people Rebecca views as inspiring...

> "On 17th January, FLOTUS of Awesome turns 50. FIFTY! And you know what she's doing? Strike that. Let me tell you what she's not doing. She's not arguing with Barack over whether to watch a rom-com or Something Something Something Guns Armageddon Amnesia Explosion Mistaken Identity Sexy Double Agent Who Takes A lot of Sexy Showers Bad Russian Accent Matt Damon. Or conversely being made to sit through some B-grade 1970s horror movie where the monster is really just a Labrador dressed up in a wig.
> She's not spending her evening making Moroccan Chicken only to have her kids say "I hate chicken" or "I hate Morocco" (You hate Morocco? What the f?)
> She's not sitting through a puppet show or proofing a high school assignment on the secret life of ants or walking around the school netball courts searching for Malia's school tracksuit jacket or trying to read a chapter of Goldfinch only to be interrupted 27 TIMES by every member of her family. She's not looking at someone's bottom because "It's itchy, mama". She's not going to the toilet with AN AUDIENCE.
> Nope FLOTUS is having a holiday in Hawaii with Oprah and her girlfriends. AND NOT HER HUSBAND AND CHILDREN.
> I'm so delighted by that I want to high-5 my computer screen."

Reading that the first time made me want to scrub myself down in a cold shower. Those are Rebecca's own words, unfiltered, unedited. Soak in Rebecca's bitterness at actually having to watch something her hard working doctor husband wants to watch (I wonder what kind of shows Rebecca watched with her old bad boy boyfriends while she gave them a BJ on the couch). Look at how ungrateful she views her kids as being for not liking her kitschy food – she's angry at kids under seven for acting like, you know, kids under seven do. She hates being interrupted while reading a book, she hates her kids bugging her because their bodies are infected, she hates not being able to drop a deuce alone. This is a woman who is so frustrated with her family that she has to capitalize the fact that her aristocratic heroine IS NOT GOING TO BE AROUND HER HUSBAND AND CHILDREN FOR AWHILE.

Rebecca's so delighted to just hear about another do nothing woman escaping her family that she wants to high five her computer screen. Remember, these are the words of a 42 year old mother of three.

> "…kids are annoying and at some point you would rather stick your head in the oven than sit through yet another flute recital.
> Last year for my birthday, you know what I did?
> I went and stayed in a hotel BY MYSELF.
> I had a beautiful morning with my family and then with a song in my heart I hit the road and checked into a hotel for 24 hours of NOT BEING A SHERPA.
> And it was front-row-tickets-to-Beyonce-kind-of-awesome."

Standing ovation Charles for saying domestic violence never happens to men – or maybe Rebecca doesn't care that it does

Rebecca Sparrow represents women at their worst

Rebecca Sparrow is living the feminist dream, all pleasure with zero responsibilities or accountability. Hell, she even has mild celebrity status to boot. Yet she's still a bitter, hateful human being.

Rebecca perfectly encapsulates the majority of today's women and feminists as a whole. She threw away her youth on strange men and hard partying, holding out in that lifestyle until the absolute last possible second at which point she then married a rich beta chump and began to pump out some children so she could check off FAMILY on her bucket list.

Rebecca doesn't care about her children – they're nothing more than a status symbol for her. With no real responsibilities, she can't even make the minimum efforts to stay in shape to give them a positive body image to strive for or to reward her husband's faithful dedication to his family by being a woman he'd actually be proud of making love with. She selfishly chose not to give her children a youthful, vibrant mother – when her (currently) youngest child goes up to get his high school diploma and looks into the crowd at his mother, he'll see a 60 year old woman who looks worse than an 80 year old 19th century peasant sitting in the seats watching him.

And that fact infuriates Rebecca to no end. That's why when she—and the masses of women with the same attitude as her—are exposed to the shining examples of real women like Maria Kang and Caroline Berg Eriksen they go into full DEFCON 1. For all their successes, for all the lack of actual hardship and sadness the spoilt legions of Rebecca Sparrow's out there face, when they see a woman who selflessly gives her man her prime years and bears his children at a youthful age – all while staying sexually attractive for him through sheer will power and hard work – they recognize exactly how big of failures of women they themselves actually are. These creatures know that no matter how much partying they got in or how much success they garner in their career, they will never look as beautiful or feel as happy as a young physically fit mother is strolling her baby down the street.

They will never have the admiration that normal, well adjusted people hold for such wonderful women. They know their chump husbands will never have that genuinely satisfied look holding their bloated marshmallow bellies as a man does wrapping his hands around the young, tight skin of his young selfless wife.

Rebecca Sparrow and the women like her are the ones who shape and control the corrupted narrative around today's women. They don't want young women to become married mothers before 30. They don't want women to be in shape. They want all women to be the same doughy, aged, used-up party girls that they are so that they don't have to come to grips with the fact they are the ones who are selfish, that they are failures of wives and mothers creating weak families. An entire lifetime of non-stop partying with no financial worries, a successful career as a novelist, a doctor husband, children conceived at extreme age—Rebecca Sparrow has all these things to lean upon and all it took to make her furious and depressed was one single image of a young mom in good shape.

So Rebecca and the depressingly large number of women like her lash out against the Kang's and Eriksen's of the world, trying to disqualify these women's admirable lifestyles by saying outright lies like good health and fitness is out of the reach so women shouldn't bother trying to reach it in the first place. They say that Kang and Eriksen are genetic freaks, they use language against them that borders on calling those young married mothers inhumane bimbos. It is thanks to women like Rebecca Sparrow that young girls nowadays feel like they have to be whores who must give up their bodies to bad boys in order to live a full empowered life, even though most normal women want nothing more than to be a housewife by twenty-five with a couple of little rug-rats crawling around their feet. There's nothing wrong with women wanting that.

Who would the women of today rather be? The women that live their lives selfishly like Rebecca Sparrow, hoping they'll undeservedly luck out in the end? Or would they rather be the other ones; the ones whose hard work, selflessness and whose mere existence inspires equal measures of jealousy and wrath in the Becca's of the world? Wouldn't they rather be the women whose husbands look forward to coming home to them, whose children will grow up and see their beautiful mother, still in her forties, beaming proudly up at them at their graduations? Wouldn't they rather be happy in a strong family that unflinchingly loves and adores them rather than being a farce of a woman who stencils crap like Live. Laugh. Love. on the wall before going on her blog and belittling fit, young mothers for having the strength and good sense they'll never possess?

I know who Rebecca Sparrow wants to be.

The thing I wish I'd done differently as a parent is...

Had children earlier, but then I didn't meet my husband Brad until I was in my mid-30s.

Women Who Don’t Reproduce Hurt Society

February 4, 2014 | by Giovanni Dannato | Link | Original Link

“Society is indeed a contract. It is a partnership . . . not only between those who are living, but between those who are living, those who are dead, and those who are to be born.” – Edmund Burke

As human beings we are biologically programmed to first protect women and children. The tribe that sacrifices some of its men can still produce the same number of babies. If a single woman perishes, the growth capacity of the entire group is reduced. Lose a few women too many, the neighboring tribes become larger and more powerful until the group is either assimilated or wiped out altogether.

Change now occurs far faster than our old instincts can follow. We have to shrewdly pair our gut reactions with our ability to reason—otherwise we end up parasitized by those who benefit from hacking our malfunctioning instincts.

It’s clear why we’re predisposed to value women more highly—they have to be protected or the tribe goes extinct. However, many millions of our population are ‘modern’ women who will never fulfill their duty to the tribe to sustain its numbers against rival incursions. Our protective instinct stems from the imperative of reproduction. Therefore, our protective instincts are misdirected towards women of no or marginal reproductive value.

The life of a woman who does not continue the race can be worth no more than a man’s. If she dies in battle, it is the same as a man getting shot or blown up by the enemy. If she hits a man she gets hit back. If she becomes homeless, society doesn't lift her up, just as with men. If she reaches the end of her reproductive years a spinster or intends to remain childless, then it is biologically just to strip her at once of all accoutrements of power befitting a fertile woman. By the very same principle we send expendable men to their deaths. Perhaps a woman reaches spinsterage through no fault of her own or was sterile from the start, but by the same token, many young men were slaughtered in the trenches through no personal fault.

In ages past, women with no children of their own commonly assisted with the children of other women. They still made a contribution to the furtherance of the tribe. However, it is now normal to see an abundance of childless women who do not contribute to the future of the group. Rather than imposing some analog to Sharia law, let them do as they will, but make them into honorary men under the laws and customs of society.

The implications of this reasoning are huge if we apply it to social policy. Most of the privileges that women have come to enjoy would be narrowed to moms only. Millions of women who parasitize the inherent good will of men would be suddenly cut off from a bountiful flow. Seeing the status and resources they lack, they would have a clear incentive to bear children and continue the lines of their ancestors.

It's difficult to see how meaningful change could occur, but if this civilization refuses to take the modern reality of constant rapid change into account, its fall is assured. Ability to adapt to change is what fitness is all about. The tribe that succeeds is the tribe with the laws and customs best suited to the reality on the ground. We can suppose countless tribes perished over the eons until those that remained had come to live by certain universal principles.

Those principles remain in effect, but the inbuilt mechanisms we have evolved are no longer adequate. Until the advent of reliable contraceptives, every fertile woman was nearly guaranteed to get pregnant some time in her life; her role came with her sex. To this day humans do not distinguish between women and their observed role and actions. Thus 'woman' is a state every female inherits by default, 'man' only achieved when a male passes through brutal rites of initiation. In this new world, we have to critically examine who receives our resources and our sympathies and take apart the evolutionary logic behind our emotional reactions.

Men are programmed to defend women to the death and see to their needs first because those men who did not were mercilessly stamped out of existence. For all of human history, older and infertile women helped rear the tribe's young. But if we have a great number of women who give back nothing to the next generation, they usurp the honors that rightfully belong to mothers who bring forth the future, our legacy, and our descendants. We cannot begin to thrive as a society in the modern age until we understand that just as manhood must be earned through courage and sacrifice, so too must womanhood with all its attendant privileges.

Women Belong At Home, Not At The Office

February 5, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

A short time ago I wrote this article on my grandmother and how her unfettering embodiment of the traditional role of housewife has had nothing but positive effects on both her and everyone around her. If you have a few extra minutes you may want to read (or re-read) that article as it fits quite well into our Traditional Sex Roles week here at ROK.

That article demonstrates to us the benefits resulting from embracing the traditional gender roles we used to have. When we deviate from these roles, e.g. women in the workplace, we find that a net negative is created for both the man and the woman.

Women Are Happier At Home

Let's compare two vocations for a moment – the lawyer and the kindergarten teacher.

You have probably heard of the phrase "lawyer cunt" thrown around. It is based on the concept of a female lawyer who is unpleasant to be around. Why? Because lawyers typically work very long hours and are stressed out constantly. So when you meet a female lawyer, she is usually quite the bitch and her masculine ways make it almost unbearable to be around – hence the term. She is aggressive, argumentative, and in order to be successful, cannot be submissive. In fact, a survey from a few years ago pegged unmarried female professional (read: attorney) without children as the unhappiest of all people.

You have also probably heard of the idealized concept or expression of "dating a kindergarten teacher." This idea is based on the notion that kindergarten teachers are sweethearts, family-oriented good girls that know the art of nurturing and care. While they are still part of the workforce, it is one of the few vocations that mimics in part the duties of a homemaker. They are there to take care of the young kids and provide a sort of "home" during the day.

Now which girl do you think is happier? The one working 60+ hours a week being yelled at by partners, clients, and judges or the one who's there from 9-5 making sure Timmy got his nap and is reading Dr. Seuss books?

These two examples tend to show some of the opposite extremes of deviating from and staying close to the traditional gender role for a woman. When you take an actual homemaker, you have a girl that is now even more aligned with her biological self. Ever notice that when a girl is really in love with you, she would do anything for you? While that desire derives from a variety of things, one large part is her desire to serve and please you as a manifestation of her happiness. This is not coincidental.

Women Are Terrible Employees

I've employed a few women now at my business. None of them lasted, and frankly I am extremely hesitant to do so ever again. While their skill levels varied, I won't dwell on that because some men can also be similarly unskilled. However, a few things kept resurfacing over and over again:

- They won't shut up. They would talk my ear off every moment they could. The first assistant we had, we were still working from our homes so she would come over and work in close proximity. There was no escape from her in my small home, so I had to tolerate all her gabbing.
- They are unreliable. One girl I hired failed to show up on time to join me in court, something she asked if she could do. This was her first day of work. Needless to say, there wasn't a second.

- They can be psychos. I had to battle through a Fatal Attraction-type scenario with one assistant. She saw me out on a date, then went nuts and tried to seduce me nonstop, even making up lies about "how I told her I miss her" and so on. It was actually a bit unsettling.
- They game the system. When working at the firm before going off on my own, one girl there would work a few months, get pregnant, then take maternity leave for half the year. She did this 3 times in a row, then quit.

These are just a few things. Now I have a male assistant and we are more productive than ever before. Men rarely gab for hours, they generally know the value of time and reliability, and even if you are in the practice of hiring gay guys they don't develop schoolgirl crushes on you. Nor do they take maternity leave for months on end.

If I'm running a Hooters restaurant then sure, I will be hiring girls. But in an office setting – no thanks.

The End Result

The Western World ignores thousands of years of history encompassing traditional gender roles in favor of this "liberal" world where everything should be fair, equal,and wonderful. Everyone is worse off when we deviate from these traditional gender roles. Women are less happy, men are increasingly miserable, businesses fail and global warming is on the rise.*

We say #BackToTheKitchen, but it is not meant to be condescending or satirical. It is a plea to increase the happiness of both genders and to try to save what little we have left of the society that once was.

9 Old-School Ways For A Woman To Become More Attractive To Men

February 5, 2014 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Most American girls today have no idea how to be attractive. Apart from whatever god-given physical beauty nature has seen fit to grant them, they have zero understanding of the countless intangibles that can make them more desirable. Like a lottery winner, they draw on their windfall good-looks account until they drain it, without ever having made a single investment. More times than not, they spend their riches away prematurely, on obesity, body mutilations, and bad haircuts. That's to say nothing about their insufferable personalities. It's really only through the grace of the unquenchable male sex-drive that today's Western woman still gets invited to anything.

And, when you have magazines and Facebook friends and talk-show hosts telling you're beautiful no matter what, why would you do anything to preserve or enhance your looks? When you have a hoard of thirsty guys tripping over each other to pay your rent, why would you do anything to optimize your personality? It's a great race to the bottom.

It's only when you encounter the rare gem—or travel abroad—that you realize it doesn't have to be this way. American girls used to be top-shelf sweethearts, the Cadillacs of the female showroom. That's what #BackToTheKitchen is all about: restoring the American broad to her former glory.

Ladies, these are 9 ways to help us get that ball rolling:

1. Make eye contact.

The typical American girl is programmed to avoid eye contact like she's in the room with Medusa. A combination of the years of being told that every man is John Wayne Gacy, and a growing inability to deal with even the most basic social interactions, are my best guesses for why this is. The trend makes them cold, obnoxious, and unattractive. Warm eye contact with men doesn't automatically mean you want to sleep with them, it means you're a well-adjusted adult worth knowing.

2. Say thank you.

The good old-fashioned thank you is a dying art. I've talked about how only like one in five girls I take out on dates ever thanks me for the drinks I buy. But, there are other occasions for saying thank you. The waiter fills your water? Thank you. The guy in front of you does that little flip with the door so you don't have to fully open it yourself? Thank you.

3. Grow your hair out.

I've spoken at length (no pun intended) on the importance of not having short hair for communicating physical and mental stability—a fact no honest man, with experience around short-haired women, will dispute. But, even if you don't have a hideous pixie cut, grow your hair out to the middle of the back or lower. Men will notice.

4. Learn how to sew or knit, and how to iron while you're at it.

I have a friend whose ex-girlfriend knitted all of her Christmas gifts last year. In a brilliant and subtle tactic to impress the man who had recently broken up with her, she emailed him a picture of the finished product. In dismay, he showed me the picture. You could read the second thoughts in his face over leaving that on the table. Domesticity works.

5. Dress cute all the time.

Walking out of the house in your sweats and Uggs may feel comfortable, but it telegraphs your I-don't-give-a-fuck-ness. Unfortunately for you, I-don't-give-a-fuck-ness isn't attractive to men. Spend 10 fewer minutes on Facebook or Instagram and reinvest that time into putting together cute ensembles. In the words of a Ukrainian girl who used to do exactly that, you "could run into man of dreams on way to throw trash [sic]."

6. Act like his satisfaction in bed is guaranteed.

From my on-going discussions with my male friends, it seems like upwards of 80 percent of girls today get sex totally wrong. Some go way too prude—lifeless mummies who act like they're posing for a Civil War-era photograph—and do none of the work. Others go way over-the-top slutty, talking about how much they "love sucking cock" or directing traffic to everything she "likes," because she's developed all kinds of hacks for her genitals through overuse. Instead, split the difference. You can never go wrong by focusing on pleasing your man.

7. Reward your man for being manly.

One of the best compliments I ever got from a woman was something that seemed silly in the moment. "You're so brave," she said as I volunteered to go first to speak in a front of a big crowd. It was only in retrospect that I appreciated receiving what's probably one of the original Paleolithic compliments for a man. Dudes today are pussies because the incentives to be manly have plummeted in recent years. The next time the guy you're with fixes, lifts, or grills something, acknowledge the hell out of it.

8. Text or call back promptly. Show interest and be vulnerable.

My buddies and I have a rule of thumb: if she texts back within 20 minutes the first time, she's girlfriend material. Girls spend so much time trying to find angles and show disinterest that they strangle the infant relationship in its crib. Be responsive. Give compliments. Show enthusiasm. It's attractive, and addictive.

9. Make him that sandwich after all.

The phrase may be comically played out, but there's very few things more effective than making food for a man. This is no coincidence. It signals several things at once. It shows your dominion over the domestic sphere. It displays your kindness and generosity. It exhibits your nurturing instinct. Between the Internet, something like 10 different food channels, countless apps, and modern supermarkets, there's simply no excuse for not knowing how to feed a man without having to tip someone else at some point during the transaction.

Women Are Sluts If They Sleep Around But Men Are Not

February 5, 2014 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

We live in a world of many double standards between the two sexes, some of which make sense and can be defended. For example, it's okay for an older man to date a younger woman, but not the other way around because a man's value often rises with age while a woman's does not. This is a double standard no doubt, but one that is backed up by biological reality. Other double standards like promoting female sex tourism while shaming male sex tourism are completely indefensible and can lead to real societal problems.

I want to cover the double standard that is most often brought up by feminists. Why is men who sleep around a lot are studs while women who do it are sluts? This topic has already been covered on ROK before, but I would like to argue that this often brought up double standard is actually not a double standard at all.

If you look at lions, all of the females gather in a herd or pride with one alpha male. The non-pregnant female lions that do all of the hunting must share their food between the cubs, pregnant females, and the alpha male who doesn't hunt because he must defend his harem from other males. The beta male lions live independently from the pride. Since they are physically larger and only hunt for their own needs they only have to expend a fraction of their total energy on hunting. They don't breed so they spend most of their time doing this…

What we have here is male lions having an excess of hunting ability and a shortage of reproduction (sex), while female lions experience the opposite. Lions have never figured out that they could make a trade for their own benefit but humans, and to a lesser degree other primates, have. Getting sex from a male is and always will be very cheap for even average women (with the exception being sex with male celebrities). However, the resources that men are able to produce due to greater physical strength, higher stress thresholds, and better logical cognitive abilities is not cheap at all. The basis of male-female relations has always been about the female trading access to her vagina (sex) for the labor and utility of the male (gifts or services).

So what does this have to do with sluts and studs? Well, a woman is considered a slut not if she has lots of sex, but if she gives it up easily. She is shamed not by men but rather by women who are angry that her giving easy access to sex is causing the value of sex in the market to go down. On the other hand, if a woman is able to obtain a great deal of resources from high quality men for a minimal amount of access to her pussy, then she is considered to be the equivalent of a male hustler.

So what then makes a male a real stud? It is not having sex with beautiful women. It is a man's ability to not pay an arm and a leg to do it. When a man is willing to pay an unreasonably high amount of his male utility for sex with a woman, or in many cases simply the possibility of sex with a woman, then it raises other women's expectations for other men making those women worthless for relationships.

These are the men who the manosphere refers to as simps. In the blue pill world these men are referred to as tools. These simps/tools are the equivalents of female sluts because they give away access to their resources, which is the equivalent of female's access to sexual intercourse, for next to nothing. Even in the blue pill world they are being shamed for it.

There is therefore no double standard. Women who give up their relationship bargaining chip (sex) too easily are shamed as sluts. On the other hand, they are praised if they can rake in huge amounts of male utility in return for it. Men who give up their relationship bargaining chip, money or labor, too easily are shamed as simps. On the other hand, they are praised as players if they can score an attractive girl quickly without spending much money on them.

Not All Hope Is Lost If You Want To Date A Good Girl In America

February 5, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

There's been much debate regarding the state of American women in the manosphere and particularly on this site. In a perfect world we would all have unlimited funds and be able to travel around the world delighting ourselves in whatever flavor of woman that we desired by simply booking a ticket. In the real world though, this isn't always an option, so what is a man to do?

It's no secret that a vast amount of American men are frustrated with American women's attitudes, lack of physical discipline and propensity to jump on every cock in a 20 mile radius, so if you live in America do you sit at home and bitch about the current society, or do you head to your nearest club to partake in the weekly club slut pussy specials?

Upon initial examination of this 'problem' I instantly see two immediate 'solutions':

1. Bang Sluts In America

or

2. Move Overseas And Find A Woman

However, digging deeper is there another solution?

Being realistic, not all of us can pick up and move overseas, nor do some of us have the desire, so what's the solution? Instead of just pointing out an issue with today's cultural climate, I instead bring you the problem and the solution.

1. Date 1st Generation American Girls

In Los Angeles, for example, there are tons of girls who were born here in the States, but whose parents are from another country. This means two things:

A. They generally are raised in traditional homes: Mom stays at home and Dad brings home the dough.

B. While they are 'corrupted' somewhat by the pervasive western culture, they tend to be the most traditional type of girls in the US. The exception would be girls in the southern states or those from religious homes.

Every girlfriend I have had in the States, with the exception of two, were 1st generation American girls. The two who's family lineage went back generation upon generation from the States, well, one was a complete psycho and the other was a farm raised, middle America girl raised in a traditional home with religious values. The latter girl was actually good relationship material , but I wasn't ready to settle down and she wanted a family.

My other girlfriends generally hailed from Latin America countries. These girls had traits that made a relationship not only enjoyable, but hum along nicely, due to their clear understanding of knowing their role as a young woman. They were feminine, had a firm grasp on domestic duties, could fuck and suck my brains out and were happy to encourage me in my goals, while still maintaining their own independence in a reasonable manner. I'll also add, these girls were LEGAL citizens so their actions were not dictated by the desire to get a Green Card out of me.

If you look around, unless you live in Bumfuck, America with a population of 5,000, then you will find niches of 1st generation American girls who are very suitable for a relationship. Big cities such as New York City, Los Angeles, Miami and Chicago have entire sub-cultures within the city of these type of girls. Not only have they been raised with the constant reminder (from their family) that being in America is a privilege, but they tend to be content with very little. They have heard the stories of the sacrifices it took to get to America and know the value of working hard. These are the types of girls to focus on in America.

The other option, if you're not looking for a relationship and truly have your heart set on being a expat, is to enjoy the decline.

2. Enjoy The Decline

Bang away, experience life, have fun and focus on making money. Money will be your ticket out of the states and to the promise land of poon one day. If you bust your ass now, you could very easily set up your life to be location independent within 5 years, maybe less or more depending on your niche etc.

Overall, America is great for party sluts. This country produces sluts who will fuck and suck you dry, so enjoy them and know in your heart that you'll not settle for one of them, but will get a solid girl outside of the states one day or date only 1st Generation American girls.

If this is difficult for you to grasp, then you must get a grip on the proper attitude. The proper attitude is quite simple: You Must Really Not Give A Fuck. This video clip captures it all.

Why Patriarchy Is The Greatest Social System Ever Created

February 6, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

> "One of feminism's irritating reflexes is its fashionable disdain for "patriarchal society," to which nothing good is ever attributed. But it is patriarchal society that has freed me as a woman. It is capitalism that has given me the leisure to sit at this desk writing this book. Let us stop being small-minded about men… If civilization had been left in female hands, we would still be living in grass huts."
> – Camille Paglia, lesbian feminist, in Sexual Personae

In the feminist creation myth, patriarchy is original sin. It is the Lucifer from which all evils flow. Without patriarchy, we would all live in a genderless role-less feminist garden of Eden.

However, just as the name Lucifer actually means light-bringer, patriarchy is actually an enlightening influence which has brought humanity out of the mud into civilization. Feminism only exists in the shadow of the massive abundance produced by patriarchy. Patriarchy is not the enemy. Patriarchy is the greatest social system ever created.

The Myth of Patriarchy

Feminists ascribe all social ills to patriarchy. Like a medieval inquisitor looking for evidence of the devil, patriarchy's influence is supposedly all around us – our media, our schools, and even our most intimate relationships. Patriarchy is responsible for domestic violence, lost promotions, mean comments on twitter – even women's own feeling about themselves.

Anyone who doesn't subscribe to feminist dogma is believed to be possessed by the influence of patriarchy and in need of exorcism by an ordained Priest of the Cathedral of gender studies theory. They are forced to renounce their views, or face excommunication from the public sphere. In more honest times, the dominant religion simply called freethinkers "heretics" and burned them at the stake.

Origins Of Patriarchy

In reality, there is nothing so mysterious about patriarchy. Patriarchy is a division of social roles based in natural biological gender differences.

Males and females have very obvious self-evident biological differences. Women can have babies. Men cannot. Women's bodies are designed for nurturing, with wombs, breasts, and hormonal cycles. During pregnancy, women are unable to physically exert themselves. Men's bodies are designed for physical exertion, and as a whole, physically stronger.

Imagine you are part of a small tribe in a survival situation. Conquest, war, famine, death – any of the four horsemen could strike at any moment. How would you divide social roles?

As Jack Donovan states in The Way of Men:

> Because your group is struggling to survive, every choice matters. If you give the wrong person the wrong job, that person could die, you could die, another person could die, or you could all die. Because of the differences between the sexes, the best person for jobs that involve exploring, hunting, fighting, building, or defending is usually going to be male. This is not some arbitrary cultural prejudice; it is the kind of vital strategic determination you need to keep your group alive.

In other words, traditional roles are the basis of our survival as a species.

The Sacrifice Of Men

In patriarchy, men sacrifice their energy, their time, and sometimes even their lives for the betterment of women and children, and women give themselves to nurturing children and families.

Feminists define patriarchy as a system of dominance, in which men oppress women. This redefines men's sacrifice as an act of control, rather than love. Many men are perfectly happy to have sex with women without offering any protection or value to the woman or her resulting children. It is an act of love that men willingly give up their freedom in order to provide for women, and their young.

Patriarchy is about love. It is about the love of human beings in families, tribes, and small communities working interdependently for the benefit of one another.

Feminism Was Created By Capitalism

Feminism in it's modern form began in the last hundred years, when industrialization moved our economic survival from requiring hard labor to requiring skilled labor. Work used to require hours of physical lifting, now it requires sitting at a desk. This transition made it possible for even the weakest women to work.

Employees are much easier to manage as interchangeable cogs than as gendered individuals with unique needs. In fact, convincing women to work doubles the size of the work force, allowing employers to half everyone's wages. It's simple supply and demand. As the book Revolution From Above chronicles, early feminist movements – even Marxist feminists – were bankrolled by major capitalists in order to increase the workforce and lower wages.

Feminism is a product of capitalism. The "you can have it all" message is an attempt by corporations to swindle women out of their biological needs. If you're a feminist, you're a capitalist, because you've make work a greater priority than community, children, or love.

In families, each member is irreplaceable, but in a company everyone is replaceable. In patriarchy, women toiled for one man who loved her and the children he gave her. In capitalism, women work for many men completely indifferent to her and willing to disposes of her the moment cheaper labor appears.

Feminism Commodifies Relationships

In patriarchy, selfish relationship impulses were restrained. In capitalism, they are encouraged. Each member of a tribe of community works for the benefit of those around him, but in capitalism men and women are independent agents, with no loyalty or duty to anyone else.

Roles that were traditionally played by family are now outsourced. Group homes for the elderly, day care for the children. Even mentors and friends can be bought in the form of therapists and life coaches.

This system destroys intimate relationships. It selfishly benefits a woman to bear the children of strong lone alpha's rather than the man providing for her. It selfishly benefits a man to impregnate every available fertile woman with no intention of further contact. Alpha fucks, beta bucks.

Feminism has created a war between the sexes with each side trying to maximize their profits in the sexual marketplace while spending as little as possible. We're all little atomized corporations united only by the laws of bio-mechanics.

Men Have Lost Reason To Work

This new dynamic has freed men from work. In his new book Bachelor Pad Economics, Aaron Clarey advocates a minimalist approach to money – buy only what your need and using your time for your benefit rather than a corporation's. This approach is already being taken as men drop out of the system, earn less than women, and avoid higher eduction.

The reason men worked hard was to provide for their families. Men didn't work long hours out of self-interest. They did so out of love. Most men can subsist on very little. It's been said that civilization was created to impress the opposite gender. Without reward, there is no reason to work. No carrot, no jump.

As a society, we've reached a point where technology has eliminated the need for everyone to work. Just as capitalism freed women from their natural role, it's freed men from theirs. Masculinity has been reduced to a fashion statement.

Return To The Natural Order

While we understand that animals exists in natural groups – a herd, a flock, a pack – we forget that man is an animal too. Man's natural group is the tribe. Humans are mammals. We learn through relationships, rather than instinct.

Children require love, attachment, and stability that can only be found in emotional bonds with present adults. They are not interchangeable cogs. You can't buy a mother's love or a father's wisdom. Love cannot be outsourced. Authentic love is only possible within patriarchal community.

To a company, non-working children are a nuisance. The epidemic of single motherhood, plummeting birthrates, and mental illness is due to the rejection of traditional roles. If society wants healthy happy children and loving stable communities, it must embrace the lost values of patriarchy.

In the early tribes, humans were entirely dependent on one another. Now they are independent and unsatisfied. Returning to traditional roles means living interdependently, and align with the natural order not because we have to, but because we choose to. We could exist alone, but we are fulfilled together.

Of course, feminists will call this oppressive. They want you to be free – free from community, free from belonging, free from love. A mass of apes fighting over the highest value mate behind a gilded cage.

Back to the mud, or back to the kitchen, the choice is yours.

Should The Traditional Hunter-Gatherer Lifestyle Serve As A Model For Modern Living?

February 6, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Jared Diamond, author of Guns, Germs, and Steel and Collapse, has written a book about traditional societies, specifically ones that were discovered and studied by scientists. He describes their traditional ways before they was tainted by the moderns. (Note that his anthropological definition of “traditional” refers to hunter-gatherer lifestyles, while current usage refers to something resembling life about sixty years ago with a strong patriarch working to provide for his housewife and children.)

> The shift from hunting-gathering to farming began only about 11,000 years ago; the first metal tools were produced only about 7,000 years ago; and the first state government and the first writing arose only around 5,400 years ago. “Modern” conditions have prevailed, even just locally, for only a tiny fraction of human history; all human societies have been traditional for far longer than any society has been modern.

If you do happen to encounter a stranger in your territory, you have to presume that the person is dangerous, because (given the dangers of traveling to unfamiliar areas) the stranger is really likely to be scouting in order to raid or kill your group, or else trespassing in order to hunt or steal resources or kidnap a marriageable woman.

The book offers tons of detail on how traditional peoples lived, reproduced, raised families, gathered food, and waged war, allowing you to check the fantasy constructions of amateur evolutionary psychologists who are prone to cherry-picking data to justify their conclusions. The presentation of this book, however, was academic and dry, reading more like a college textbook, but there were many pieces of valuable information…

The significance of sex and food is reversed between the Siriono and us Westerners: the Sirionos' strongest anxieties are about food, they have sex virtually whenever they want, and sex compensates for food hunger, while our strongest anxieties are about sex, we have food virtually whenever we want, and eating compensates for sexual frustration.

Marjorie Shostak noted the lack of those same Western macho attitudes among the !Kung: "Hunts are often dangerous. The !Kung face danger courageously, but they do not seek it out or take risks for the sake of proving their courage. Actively avoiding hazardous situations is considered prudent, not cowardly or unmasculine. Young boys, moreover, are not expected to conquer their fear and act like grown men. To unnecessary risks, the !Kung say, 'But a person could die!'"

The "alpha male" archetype has apparently come from studying ancient humans, but here we have data how these men show reluctance to engage in that type of behavior, doing so only as necessity to survive, not to feel alpha. While men who were warriors had more children, it's apparent that even beta males who excelled at weaving, for example, got their slice of the sexual pie. Only in modern times do beta males seem to be nearly shut out from procreation.

There is also absolutely no sign of individuality which we may take for granted as a rightful human condition. In fact, tribal life is downright socialistic. The pooling and sharing of resources were required for survival…

> Plants don't move around and can be gathered more or less predictably from one day to the next, but animals do move, so that any individual hunter risks bagging no animal on any given day. The solution to that uncertainty adopted almost universally by hunter-gatherers is to live in bands including several hunters who pool their catch to average out the large day-to-day fluctuations in catch for each individual hunter.

> "Food is never consumed alone by a family; it is always (actually or potentially) shared out with members of a living group or band of up to 30 (or more) members. Even though only a fraction of the able-bodied foragers go out each day, the day's returns of meat and gathered foods are divided in such a way that every member of the camp receives an equitable share.

> …two areas located a sufficient distance apart are likely to have fluctuations in food availability that are out of phase. That opens the door for your group to reach a mutually advantageous agreement with another group, such that they allow you onto their land or send you food when they have enough food but you don't, and your group returns the favor when it's the other group that's short of food.

Diamond seems to have lost favor with liberals because of this book, perhaps because he has veered away from the environmental determinism that suggested all humans are equal. He says that war may be genetically ingrained in humans. He implies revenge is a natural human outlet. He highlights the benefits of a traditional family unit along with more hands-on parenting by the mother (i.e., not dropping your kid off at day care). He implies that single motherhood is damaging to children from tribal evidence that states increased parent care increases the child's survival. He criticizes how Westerners are eager to ship off their elderly to die in nursing homes. He is against obesity (and presumably fat acceptance). And he's quick to point out differences in gender. The closer you get to the truth, as Diamond is learning, the more likely you will be outcast.

> But even though states are much more powerful than hunter-gatherer bands, that doesn't necessarily imply that states have better ways of raising their children. Some child-rearing practices of hunter-gatherer bands may be ones that we could consider emulating.

> The adolescent identity crises that plague American teen-agers aren't an issue for hunter-gatherer children. The Westerners who have lived with hunter-gatherers and other small-scale societies speculate that these admirable qualities develop because of the way in which their children are brought up: namely, with constant security and stimulation, as a result of the long nursing period, sleeping near parents for several years, far more social models available > to children through allo-parenting, far more social stimulation through constant physical contact and proximity of caretakers, instant caretaker responses to a child's crying, and the minimal amount of physical punishment.

Today's humans fear death in the form of nuclear fallout, terrorism, or gun violence, but the most common fears of traditional humans were starvation, predators, and falling trees. Yes, falling trees. Traditional humans, which I must remind you are part of our ancestry, organized and evolved to avoid famine. This is why the human body is so great at extracting most of the energy from food, leading to obesity in times of plenty. This is why our kidneys are so powerful at retaining salt, a rare commodity in ancient times, leading to hypertension today. Our body perfectly adapted to survive the conditions of how the traditionals lived, but now that we have been removed from this environment, we encounter a host of "Western" diseases that are unheard of in traditional societies.

> Under the conditions of low salt availability experienced by most humans throughout most of human history until the recent rise of salt-shakers, those of us with efficient salt-retaining kidneys were better able to survive our inevitable episodes of salt loss from sweating or from an attack of diarrhea. Those kidneys became a detriment only when salt became routinely available, leading to excessive salt retention and hypertension with its fatal consequences. That's why blood pressure and the prevalence of hypertension have shot up recently in so many populations around the world, now that they have made the transition from traditional lifestyles with limited salt availability to being patrons of supermarkets.

We thereby become fat; we never experience famines that burn up the fat; our pancreas releases insulin constantly until the pancreas loses its ability to keep up, or until our muscle and fat cells become resistant; and we end up with diabetes.

Here's a preview of a documentary about a New Guinea tribe that Jared profiles (unfortunately I could not find the full version online):

The best parts of this book is when he relays personal stories of having lived with tribes, including a handful of close calls with death. I also enjoyed his recounting of traditional slices of life. The information was valuable and logically presented, but the book was boring at times and a challenge to complete. Nonetheless, I think it is an important work that allows us to look closer into our past in order to live better in the present.

10 Masculine Virtues That Went To The Grave With Our Grandfathers

February 7, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

The days of men ruling the world and their own lives are long gone. In today's woman-ideal, leftist-inspired world, the masculine virtues that laid the foundation for our civilization are being buried deep below that foundation. Without these masculine virtues that men used as the cornerstone of life, the aforementioned foundation will continue to crumble.

The best part is, a lot of these virtues are very simple things. Do your part during Traditional Sex Roles Week, and up your masculinity level while getting your woman, or women…#BackToTheKitchen.

The House

Man caves are pathetic.

In older times, the entire house was the man's domain. The only places that were unquestionably the woman's area were the kitchen and the laundry room. This is exactly how it should be. Instead, we have men funding women's entire HGTV Network dream, while they're relegated to a singular room for their own pleasure. On top of that, the man cave is usually designated as the room farthest from the living space, preferably the basement.

If you are considering buying a house, make it clear to the women in your life that her cave is the kitchen, and that you'll gladly supply the essential equipment; i.e. an apron and heels.

Home Maintenance

Every man should know the following skills around the home:

1. Oil changes in vehicles
2. Basic plumbing
3. Hammer, drills, and other basic tools
4. Electronic handiness and wiring

The greatest part is that even if you have never done any of these, your problem can usually be solved by a few minutes of Google searching and a mindset to figure it out. For example, I recently hung a TV on the wall for the first time. I had no idea how to do it or any parameters to abide by. But, 10 minutes later, by watching a few YouTube videos and reading How-To website, I was familiar with all of the tools and procedures to get the job done.

Wrenching

My father has told me stories how he grew up working on his own motorcycles, dirtbikes, and his Karmann Ghia, which he used to do donuts around dirt fields when he was fourteen years old without a driver's license.

Gone are the days when men build classic cars in their garage. Gone are the days when men would take pride in their machines, meticulously maintaining them with an attention to detail so high a single spot would not go unnoticed.

Nowadays, driving a Prius is the cool thing, with the classics being shamed as too high-maintenance and harmful for the environment. Who wants to drive a '65 Mustang or a Cobra when you have the high-tech power of a Toyota Prius/Nissan Leaf/insert other battery-powered snail?

That Karmann Ghia still sits in my grandparents barn as a testament to the wrenching skills and love of cars from my dad.

Speaking Of Cars… How Many People Can Still Drive A Stick?

A perfectly executed heel-toe downshift while driving my car is one of the things I look forward to most on my commute to work. Every man should be able to work a stick with expert precision (no homo). Being able to do so gives you complete control over your environment and vehicle.

As a bonus, being able to pull burnouts and chirping the tires will get panties wet.

As a second bonus, not many people will be able to steal your car if it's a manual.

A Strong, Masculine Physique

It's simple: there is simply too much encouragement for skinny-jean-wearing, borderline-anorexic, "muscles don't matter" types of bodies. Rather than being encouraged to do challenging, (somewhat) dangerous, and the most productive types of lifts (squats, deadlifts, bench press), instead, young males are told that muscles don't matter, aren't important, and have no impact on their sexual market value.

That's a blatant lie. Tell me, which one of these would inspire more moisture in the vaginal area?

The skinny, plaid-wearing fag sipping hot chocolate?

…or the chiseled, stone-cold killing physique of a Spartan warrior?

Sure, females will coo and aww about how adorable the first one is, but what's important is to realize they're talking about him in a completely different context. Think of the context being similar to a puppy who just slipped and fell on the floor.

Be a Spartan.

Callused Hands

Gone are the days of men doing manual labor and developing rough, masculine hands. Nowadays, it is frowned upon if you don't use weight lifting gloves to do 15-pound bicep curls (poor form, none the less).

Passion

As I've written about before, Corporate America is basically selling your soul to the devil. The men I encounter in my day-to-day life are just so…bland. The life has left their eyes – at all ages.

Find your passion in life, whether it be music, entrepreneurship, writing, or any other sort of hobby. No, Call of Duty does not count.

Chivalry

Don't think for one second that I'm advising you start pulling out chairs and going extremely out of your way to be chivalrous on a first date. There was a time, though, that doing chivalrous gestures like these wouldn't be held against you. With the fall of masculinity in general, these actions no longer are attractive to the fairer sex. The tiny amounts of long-term relationship advice that float around the Manosphere are quick to point out that you must balance your overall masculine and alpha traits with some occasional beta actions.

The problem is that men these days pussy foot so much, that any beta action as simple as opening a car door for a lady will send you straight down the path of jerking it to Internet porn. Like this guy:

Bedroom Dominance

You should never "make love." This seems like it's every beta's greatest fantasy these days. Thrusting slowly into a girl in missionary position, the whole time looking lovingly into her eyes. He wants them to cum together while kissing gently. Gag me.

Every fuck with any girl should be a balls-to-the-wall, pound her like she's never been pounded before kind of effort. Get her addicted to your dick and she will go to the moon and back (to the kitchen!) for you.

The best thing about being a man in the bedroom is that it's hardly difficult. Simply up the intensity and dominance of every session. Be a selfish person; doing whatever you want to her and simply expect that she will like it. Hint: she will like it rough.

Decisiveness

2014 “Man”: “Honey, what do you want to eat for dinner tonight?”

Wife: “I don’t know, you choose.”

Man: “I really don’t care baby, whatever YOU want!”

Regular readers of ROK understand exactly where this goes; and it’s a path that projects solely downward. Realize, that as a man, it is your job to make each and every decision. It doesn’t even matter if you’re wrong. Stick to your guns, and make no apologies.

Women will never love you more.

Speaking of decisiveness; it’s time for you to make a decision. Are you going to be a man and send her back to the kitchen, or are you going to retreat to your man cave with your dick in between your legs?

Don’t Be A Host For Parasitic Women

February 7, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

I have noticed quite a bit of women and quite a few men are always bitching with the meme that “all men are just after sex”. After hearing it for the billionth time and in an increasingly nasal and annoying voice, I decided to look deeper into this concept. What I have discovered is that sex is pretty much the only thing most women bring to a relationship in today’s modern society. If a man wants a woman for something other than sex; he is going to have trouble finding one that will offer something besides that. That is unless he is just looking to be used and abused. I have a story I would like to share.

Nicholas and Rebecca

Nicholas was a young man with a good job. He just recently got out of the Army and moved to a new city. His experience in the military has enlightened him on many things. His relationship with Rebecca though enlightened him even more. He met Rebecca at a nightclub and they hit it off. After the requisite two dates, he got it in.

Strong and Independent?

Rebecca was a perpetual college student/barista at the local coffee shop. In between classes and work, she lived in an apartment with two other woman who also worked at the coffee shop. Her life consisted of going to the club, going to work, and when she wasn't on academic probation, going to class. All while doing this she espoused the modern woman lifestyle of being strong and independent.

This strong and independent meme should have been a warning to old Nicholas, but he was young and had much to learn. Over time Rebecca started spending the night at his house. First it was a toothbrush in his bathroom, then somehow her shampoo and conditioner ended up in his shower. He thought it was neat to have a "live in fun box" but over time he began to see different.

The Parasite Moves In

The details are fuzzy but somehow she was able to obtain the key to his house. I guess old Nicholas thought he's taking his relationship to the next level. He made a mistake when he asked her to chip in with expenses. She brushed it off with the reply that she lived in her own place that costs her money. This kind of upset Nicholas, but Nicholas is a patient man and evaluates things thoroughly.

One day Nicholas received a text from Rebecca telling him to pick up some Pinot Grigio on his way home from work. When he asked why, she told him that she was having some friends over his house for a night of entertainment. The sparked Nicholas's curiosity because Rebecca never did any cooking for him so he arrived home he found that she cooked some pizza and various other foods for her friends while they were watching some silly show on TV. Her justification for using his houses have had a very nice TV compared to what she had. Nicholas being the smart man that he is s, realized he's in some trouble. He realized this woman brought only was between her legs to the relationship.

So what did Nicholas do? Well first off he stopped having sex with her entirely and then waited two months to ensure she cannot use the "I am pregnant excuse" to get back in his life. Even though Rebecca did notice his lack of intimacy during this time, her critical thinking skills failed her. Nicholas knew the relationship was over so he decided to use this as a data gathering exercise. He asked her probing questions. He asked why she was eats his food but never goes grocery shopping for his house. He asked why her dirty clothes never get picked up off the floor. He asked her why she had the audacity to change the playlist on his iPod in his living room. The only answer he ever got this she's a strong independent woman and that is not the dark ages.

Problem Solved

As I said earlier Nicholas spent some time in the Army and so has the ability to be cold as ice when necessary. So one day he changed the locks on his house, changed his phone number, and informed his employer that he was ending a relationship with an “altered mental status woman”. He then texted Rebecca that it wasn’t working out from his old phone number. Then he shut down the number. For the next two weeks he dealt with harassment from Rebecca and her friends but was pretty low level considering the dastardly things people do these days and now he knows better. Rebecca probably never realized that all she brought to the relationship was her vagina.

What should you take away from this story? Any relationship that you have that goes beyond a one night stand, she should be offering up something else besides her vagina. Smart men will not let a woman parasite off him. If she’s unwilling to cook and clean and maintain his household he should not waste his time with her and should revoke her squatter status in his realm.

5 Reasons Why Domesticated Women Are Superior

February 7, 2014 | by General Stalin | Link | Original Link

As men, we naturally enjoy and gravitate to feminine women who are happy and willing to serve our wants and needs as sexual and domestic partners. Humans are very social creatures, and we like to take on life in teams. This has worked since the dawn of human civilization. I'd like to share with all of you a list of traits that all men appreciate in a woman who openly embraces her natural sex role. These are a series of examples of my most endearing memories of past lovers and experiences with women who showed their unprovoked willingness to take on desirable feminine roles.

These memories have stuck with me because the traits these women demonstrated were very attractive to me as my biology dictates, as well as every other man's. I would also like to note that it is unfortunate that these specific memories particularly stuck out to me over the years because these qualities in women in America and other Western cultures are so rare and fleeting. These qualities should be more abundant and commonplace:

1. Retrieves Things For Me Without My Asking

I went out to a show at a casino along with some good friends and this girl I was seeing at the time. We stopped to get some food at a Panda Express; the Subway of Americanized Chinese food. I was eating with chopsticks, but the rice was not sticky enough for me to pick up decent sized bites. The girl I was with noticed this, and asked if I wanted her to get me a fork. I scoffed "no that's fine you don't have to get up and get me a fork." She retorted "Oh don't be silly it's nothing!" and put her food down, got out of her seat, walked over to the other side of the Panda Express, and brought me back a fork with a smile and an obvious satisfaction that she helped me and made my life a little better. Something so small and seemingly insignificant, but that memory has stuck with me for years.

2. Enjoys Cooking And Letting Me Be A Man

A few weeks ago I had a friend and his girlfriend over along with a girl I was gaming. We were all hanging out in my living room chatting and discussing plans for the night. The topic of dinner was brought up, and the girl I was with outright said (to my friend's girlfriend) "OMG we should both make an awesome dinner together in the kitchen and let the boys chill and play video games!" What a doll.

3. Excited By The Idea Of Being A Dedicated Wife

I dated a girl for a little while about a year ago who told me she would be happiest if she could just quit her job and live the rest of her days taking care of me and having dinner ready when I got home from work. She did not want children, but just wanted to support me and live a happy, simple life embracing monogamous womanhood and the joy of nesting and caretaking. The most admirable part about this memory of this girl was that she was 20 years old.

4. Abstains From Activities That Jeopardize Loyalty

Dating a girl who does not have any “guy friends” (i.e. orbiters and suitors) and has no desire to go out, party, drink, or get fucked up because she would rather maintain a reserved, graceful, respectable, and trustworthy relationship with her man is immeasurably attractive. I have dated women that maintain that it is unethical to hold close relationships with other men as a taken woman. This is partly due to the fact that they understand true male-female friendship is a falsehood. They also understand that they do not need male validation besides from the man they are exclusive with. In the same vein, all men have incredible respect for women who uphold their grace and femininity and would rather not be seen being a sloppy, drunk, uncouth embarrassment to a man, to herself, or to those around her.

5. Rubbing My Back

I once dated a girl who enjoyed making me feel comfortable and massaging my shoulders, neck, and back. She genuinely cared about my physical state, and also recognized that I work hard and often times would come home tired and achy. She was delighted to work on my knots when we were just sitting idly and relaxing. One specific memory we were actually away from home on vacation. I was laying on my stomach on the bed in a hotel room, doing some work and answering emails on my laptop. She was busy chatting on the phone with a far-away relative who she does not talk to often, but as she was talking I felt her move over and straddle my butt and just start going at my back with her phone wedged between her ear and shoulder. I was extremely appreciative of her selfless efforts to please me.

Please go on Twitter and discuss your thoughts on feminine selflessness and nurturing teamwork #BackToTheKitchen.

4 Reasons Having Kids Make Men More Masculine

February 7, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Men's natural reaction to having kids is "no way on earth". Certainly kids put a huge crimp on your personal freedom and require a very long-term financial and logistical commitment. Women have largely thought about kids since they were old enough to walk, thus have a massive upper hand and the instinctive drive to compliment it. Men tend to avoid the subject like the plague, and end up either missing out or going in blind. Here are four reasons that will make you reconsider:

1. Kids Are Fun

In small doses with a baby-momma / female relative / nanny / last night's bang / girlfriend to do the dirty work, children are incredible fun. They live in a world with almost zero responsibility. Hanging out with young kids, playing their games and bonding with them as only a father can do, is better than smoking the finest kush. A father who is separated from the baby momma should not allow the negatives of the situation to prevent him from passing time with his children in their element.

Although there can be more spontaneous moments when you live with them, the fun part only needs a couple of days a month. In fact, living separately from the baby-momma and kids cuts out 99% of the dirty work and hassle. A friend of mine that's a divorce lawyer has told me he has had plenty of cases of the mother trying to give back the full custody she won, because being a single parent with visiting rights is now considered the golden ticket.

2. They Are Inspirational

Women go all coo-coo about children, but with the emotional overload removed and a clear rational mind, you can harness the best parts of having kids around. Some of the small things they come up with and the clear, conscious way they observe the world is priceless. Adults could do more with a child-like intelligence. Sadly much of this is lost under a barrage of consumerist marketing, Disney toys and other brain junk, but it's always there to be tapped into, especially if you get the children into a more organic environment.

Children are masters of entertaining themselves and also masters of learning. They are also like tourists. You know that friend visits from out of town and suddenly all the local attractions you scoff at become fabulous? Kids do that for you on a daily basis.

3. You Can Influence And Educate Them

I never wanted to have children, but I have learned a great deal from my daughter. They say to teach is to learn, and it's not only the process of imparting information to her, guiding and educating her, it's also the sheer fact that having a child around forces you to reflect upon your own inner states and habits in different ways than you might otherwise. Children shine a light on the adults, serving as a massive opportunity for personal growth, and having them around and bonding with them is a good way to stay young at heart.

4. You Put The Women In Their Place

By taking on the responsibilities of fatherhood (which should never include all the mommy work of changing diapers and dealing with two year old's tantrums), you become more of a man. It's very empowering as a father to take charge of the children and at the same time demand that the mother take on her role properly without passing the buck back to you. A father and mother are two very different and polarized roles, so regardless of if you are still banging the baby-momma, you can impose your masculine authority in a different realm to your professional and personal life. Feminism paints all fathers as lowlifes, but I say to hell with that, prove them wrong with actions. My children love me because I am the fun father, no doctrine of equality can take that away.

(Of course when they are very young from 0 to 3, there is very little for the father to do, and this is a long haul where you can easily lose sight of the end game, especially if the baby-momma has lost the plot and now sees you as the enemy, or you allow yourself to become her personal maid.)

There is not enough support for men to be real masculine fathers so when the time does come – and it can always come by accident – many men are lost, with no map, under heavy fire and with no allies. You will end up fighting an endless battle against women, rather than looking for an end game of advantage and peace. You will also miss out on the benefits of fatherhood and connecting with a child.

Winning The Daddy War

The first part of winning the war and accomplishing peace is not fighting at all, by being financially and logistically tooled up. I think men subconsciously understand this, and that's the reason they shy away from kids. Whatever route you take it should be done consciously and clearly, and there are substantial benefits to being a father, provided you can afford the time and money to do it. If not then try dating a single mother (they bang like trolls on heat) or hanging out with a relative's kids just a couple of hours a month. You will find a different and more profound part of your masculinity in being in the father role, provided you don't let her turbo-shit-testing motherhood routine get to you.

If women were proper mothers, men could focus on being proper fathers. Women are serving in combat roles now, but imagine Navy Seals running the local nursery school. Equality my ass—no mother would leave her kids with some bearded soldiers, but that doesn't mean that you can't be a decent father and have a hell of a lot of fun in that role. Draw your boundaries, keep them guarded, and don't change a nappy.

Why Women Shouldn’t Be Encouraged To Attend University

February 8, 2014 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

In our age of progressiveness and modernity the pinnacle of open mindedness is seen as a fancy piece of paper saying one is educated. A degree has become just a continuation of high school, and like high school is just as useless in giving anyone knowledge in the real world. Men are shamed from doing traditional man’s work like manual labor or a trade. Women on the other hand are being shamed out of early marriage and other life-paths which maximize their innate strengths.

Women, like men, are told that they are worthless if they follow their natural drives. Blue collar men are mocked and are portrayed as lecherous, beer swilling, rednecks. Mothers are seen as little more than servants. The campaign against women is much more effective as it manipulates women through their core insecurities. Women have completely bought into this lie and are attending in numbers at ever increasing rates. On paper this sounds like a good trend, but it is far from the truth and the more women that attend higher education will mean more unhappy women.

1. They Don’t Really Want It

Women are essentially shamed into attending university. They’re pressured by parents and by society who both fear that if she does not become educated she will be a failure in life. Women are told that their happiness can only stem from spending four years regurgitating the viewpoints of biased professors, then building a career which pays well. They need a career that pays well so that they can buy the nice house with a two car garage, pay for the two weeks vacation, and eventually save for retirement. Women don’t really want this life path and they know it, but if they do not follow it they risk being ostracized by society for following their nature.

Ladies, ask yourself this, is that what you really want? Do you want to live this lie? Do you want to fight every day for someone who doesn’t have your best interest at heart? To sacrifice your precious youth so that you can submit to a corporation instead of a husband?

2. They Become Belligerent And Argumentative

Most women don’t really want to be a full time student in the best years of their lives so once they have bought the lie they buy it on sale. They take the easy way out by studying sociology, English, or ‘women’s studies.’ The professors in these faculties are extremely biased towards feminist theory. The end product of years of cognitive dissonance, old cat-lady professors will do their best to manipulate impressionable young women into hating everything that they hate.

The gnawing sense of “this isn’t right for me” women have in their first years of university will almost be entirely silenced by the time they declare themselves a feminist. They learn the right things to say and when. They blame men for all their problems and by the end of their degree they are certified, professional, victims. With no solutions whatsoever.

It's sad. If they had just listened to what mother nature was telling them: to marry young, have children and love to be lead by a man she would be so much happier, but by the time she is 22 the "educated" woman is broken. She is argumentative and belligerent. She will latch on to the party-approved viewpoints to gain the acceptance of the larger society. She will be unhappy.

3. Sluts

The large portion of damaged women higher education produces is the feminist type. The second largest group of women damaged by higher education would have to be the party sluts. The feminists can also be party sluts, but historically these girls are often better looking and much better off going into school. Daddy pays for their degree in communications, and she gets an education in the language of blowjobs.

Having been taught all their lives that they should strive to achieve the same as men can, they seek to act the same way men can. These party sluts spend more time drinking and fucking than they do trying to better themselves through an education. More often than not these girls drop out after having unprotected sex with 100 men. Knowing no other life they party hard until their 30s where they hit the wall and their true desires finally bubble up through a sea of alcohol: they want children and a husband. However, it is too late, the party lifestyle has ruined their appearance, their minds and their wombs are barren. Just like the young women indoctrinated by feminism the party slut will continue the cycle and will seek to damage younger women they come across.

All this being said there is a positive outcome for some women. Some women find themselves a husband and follow their true desires. Other women have commendable passion in a certain field and deserve far more praise than her less enthusiastic sisters. These women are usually STEM majors. They want to be a doctor because they love people, they want to challenge the dogmas of sociology, or revolutionize data manipulation in genetics. Sadly these types of women are few and far between, overshadowed by the majority of women who are shamed into being there; who ruin themselves either with toxic ideologies or years of self-destructive sluttery.

The Concept Of Chivalry Has Been Distorted To Create Subservient Men

February 9, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Origins

From Wikipedia:

Chivalry, or the chivalric code, is the traditional code of conduct associated with the medieval institution of knighthood… It was originally conceived of as an aristocratic warrior code… involving gallantry, individual training, and service to others. Over time its meaning has been refined to emphasise more ideals such as the knightly virtues of honour, courtly love, courtesy, and less martial aspects of the tradition.

The term "martial" here, of course, means relating to war: the code was originally meant to guide medieval warriors– not peasants, aristocrats, or even lords. And certainly not modern day men, living in the world we do today.

This fact alone sheds light on why the code has changed over time. Warriors slashing each other with swords simply don't exist today. Yet chivalry has stuck around. So has its meaning been refined? Or completely distorted? Let's take a look at its conception.

The first noted support for chivalric vocation, or the establishment of knightly class to ensure the sanctity and legitimacy of Christianity was written in 930 by Odo, abbot of Cluny in the Vita of St. Gerald of Aurillac.

This passage sheds more light on its intended purpose. The knights, and their chivalric code were meant "to ensure the sanctity and legitimacy of Christianity." Take fearless warriors like these knights, put them in wartime scenarios, and what do you get? Things like rape and pillaging come to mind, and are commonplace in wars even to this day. Chivalry was meant to ensure that the Christian values that these knights were supposedly fighting for were observed, even in battle.

But as time went on, the application of this code began to encompass more areas of a warrior's life. Below are the three fronts that chivalry embodied as the middle ages went on:

1. Duties to countrymen and fellow Christians: this contains virtues such as mercy, courage, valor, fairness, protection of the weak and the poor, and in the servant-hood of the knight to his lord.
2. Duties to God: this would contain being faithful to God, protecting the innocent, being faithful to the church, being the champion of good against evil, being generous and obeying God above the feudal lord.
3. Duties to women: this would contain what is often called courtly love, the idea that the knight is to serve a lady, and after her all other ladies.

The first two areas mentioned here represent the origins of the code. Knights were to uphold the Christian values of mercy, courage, protection of the weak, and service to god as they carried out their battles and crusades. The third point, however, is what we are most familiar with today.

This is the expansion of the code into court life where the knights were expected to respect and serve women. But not all women 0nly to Christian ladies of the court, i.e. noble women. The same way these courageous warriors were to protect the weak, they were meant to protect and serve women. In addition to their primary wartime purposes, of course.

Today

What does chivalry mean today? Apparently, now that we don't have a defined knightly class to battle with swords and protect Christianity, it has expanded to mean that all men should follow it. But not the whole thing. Just the part about serving women.

And there’s nothing wrong with this. A manly man opening the car door or carrying a heavy load to help a feminine women out is a great and attractive thing. This at least resembles the traditional dynamic of a knight protecting and serving a medieval lady. But when you remove some key aspects of this dynamic, does it still apply?

If you take a bratty, drunk girl who’s whining and complaining to her man, does it still apply? What about a girl who is so committed to being on her own and free of dependency on any man that she always tries to order them around and flip the script? When a poor beta man rushes ahead of her to open the door, is that chivalry?

I think not. I think she just made him her bitch.

So is chivalry alive today? In the modern sense of a man protecting and serving women it certainly can be. The strong, confident alpha male who takes it upon himself to treat women as medieval ladies and take care of the manly tasks like carrying heavy bags or walking on the outside of the sidewalk to protect her is a shining example of chivalry in its true sense.

Unfortunately many modern men aren't like this. They are weak and timid. When you combine this with a women who's susceptible to taking advantage of such a man and the idea of chivalry, you have the makings of a disaster. A man like this going out of his way to serve all women is only going to further damage his sense of self worth. Rather than being her "knight in shining armour" he becomes something that more closely resembles a servant or a slave.

In the end, it all depends on the context. Chivalry only applied to the knightly class in medieval times. Today, it's become something that all men are encouraged to follow, whether alpha or beta. While it certainly is an attractive and acceptable behaviour of the alpha, it only serves to further emasculate the beta.

A Traditional Sex Role Success Story

February 9, 2014 | by Don Selonius | Link | Original Link

Here is a quick short story I'd like to share with you ROK readers. A story of compassion, love and struggle.

Tomas and Maria met when they were just children. Both were raised in Croatian immigrant families, so they saw each other regularly at Croatian parties. Like all immigrant families new to Western society, the encouragement to affiliate with similar people was a natural urge. They were both raised in traditional Croatian households, perhaps extra traditional to enforce the family values that had sustained their people for thousands of years. The parents could feel the Western influence infiltrating their children's minds, so they became stricter. The common goal of keeping the old country's culture and values strong was a shared ideal amongst the community.

Croatian girls

At times Tomas and Maria were annoyed with their parent's indignant "suggestions" to find a nice "Croatian girl" or "Croatian boy". Of course, the final choice to whom they would marry was his to make, but the parental guidance was fueled by the parents wanting their children to start families with people who shared traditional Croatian values. Luckily, their suggestions were considered and Tomas and Maria ultimately married each other. Tomas taught engineering and Maria was a stay-at-home mom. Everything looked bright for these young Croatians to start a fulfilling life and family together.

Then came the baby carriage(s). Three healthy boys, Martino, Yure and Josip were born and everyone rejoiced. Tomas continued his job as a professor at a local college and Maria stayed home to cook and maintain the house. The kids' friends were frequent visitors to the house, Maria made sure they were always fed and happy. She enjoyed taking care of them.

Unfortunately, financial troubles struck. Tomas's job wasn't yielding enough money to support the financial strain of three boys plus an expensive mortgage. He decided to start a side business in the midst of all of this to fix his money problems and seek a brighter future. As provider, he knew it was up to him to get his family through this strenuous time. He knew his place.

The work load of juggling a job and working on a start-up created tension throughout the house. Maria felt neglected and really felt Tomas's lack of presence since he was always busy. Fights would break out daily between the couple and things did not look good. Tomas could not be bothered to think about anything else besides work, he was driven to make things better. Maria was hurt and felt alone frequently, but she knew it was her duty to fix meals daily and tend to the children and did so. She knew her place.

While most marriages would crumble and end in divorce from this fiasco, Tomas and Maria stayed true to their traditional values and together they made it work. Each had their role assigned, accepted their position on the team and didn't ponder taking the escape route. This is a traditional marriage with traditional gender roles. It is the basis of a healthy relationship and also happens to be the driving force behind core family values. There is no alternative.

If you're wondering what happened to Tom and Maria, it ended quite well. Tom's company became a multi-million dollar software enterprise and its success let his sons get a private education in the city's top schools. They also built a new spacious house fit for a king, in it: a majestic kitchen fit for a queen. They are now indefinitely financially stable and their son's have developed into intelligent, driven people just like their father. I know this because I am one of those sons. I am the result of a traditional sex role household, and I am extremely grateful.

Don't mess with a good thing

Laws for relationships like polarity and traditional sex roles have been used since the beginning of time. Some argue that the world has changed and you must be a progressive, but a core human nature will always remain. If it hadn't been for these traditions in my home life I would have surely been worse off than I am today. I am not alone; there are others like me, but without awareness they may become extinct. It's time for society to compare the new ways of thinking about love and relationships with those of the past, and make a logical choice.

How To Approach Black Women As A White Male

February 10, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Having already discussed the means through which black males can increase their chances of dating non-black women, I thought I would also touch on the subject of white males approaching non-white women. In this case, I want to focus specifically on those seeking to draw the attention of black females as the topic doesn't come up much in the manosphere.

Interest in black female and white male pairings does exist in the US. ABC's hit show Scandal has shown that there is an openness to white male/black female partnerships among black women, and more than a few relatively high-value white men have shown a willingness to approach and date black women.

So, what is important for a white American male to remember if interested in approaching a typical black American female in the USA? Here are a few things:

Don't Treat Her Like A Novelty

There are a decent number of non-black men out there who are interested in black women primarily as a means to an end. A hot black girl is something for them to “try out” before they settle down, or something to sample and cross off their bucket list in due time. Very few white men have actually been with black girls in the USA (this particular interracial pairing is not one of the most common and is substantially less prevalent than its reverse), so when they do meet a black female they find attractive the urge to simply “test it out” for novelty’s sake does appear on occasion.

Black women are very keenly aware of the existence of this mentality, and they don’t want any part of it. They’re usually not going to be comfortable with the idea of being an experiment for a random horny guy. When approaching these women, it is important that you distance yourself from this as much as you can. Social circle game can be valuable here, just as it is for black men looking to date interracially (as I noted a little while back).

By building strong friendships with people of multiple backgrounds and winning social proof among multiple groups, you can improve your chances of gaining romantic interest from a diverse group of women. If a black woman can see that you’re cool to her peers and with other minorities, she may be more open to you romantically and less prone to conclude that you're just knocking the "black girl thing" off of your "to-do list". She will want to be treated like any other girl.

Look Within Diverse Friend Groups

In a previous article discussing ways in which black men can broaden their romantic options, I noted that black males with diverse friend groups and social proof were far more likely to find non-black female suitors on a consistent basis than others.

A similar truth applies with regard to black women. Those most open to dating interracially are going to tend to be the ones open to maintaining close interracial relationships of other kinds. If her close friend group is diverse and includes many whites, there's a decent chance that she may be willing to consider whites romantically as well. Keep in mind that your typical black American woman puts a high priority on traits like "swagger" that, more often than not, she (and American society in general) will associate with black men and assume to be absent in any white man she meets.

If you're a white male and you do not have anything approximating this "swagger" (more on this later), then you're better off approaching the kind of black women who put less of a premium on it. Educated black girls with diverse friend groups tend to be the most likely to fit in this group, as are girls of mixed racial heritage (generally still regarded as "black" in American society). If she doesn't associate extensively with white people, don't expect her to buck that trend in her romantic life. It can be done, but your chances are much lower.

Use Contrast Game

As I noted briefly above, your typical black American woman puts a high priority on traits like “swagger” that, more often than not, she (and American society in general) will associate with black men and assume to be absent in any white man she meets. This can be a barrier to many relationships between black women and white men:

> 4 out of 6 women also said they were simply not attracted to white men. They felt as if they lacked good looks that they were used to, as well as confidence (swag) and sex appeal. Because of this it was hard for most of them to really become serious about potentially being able to have a serious relationship with a white man.

This is where the value of “contrast game” becomes clear. If you examine my previous article regarding black men and the steps they can take to broaden their non-black romantic options, you’ll see that I touched on this issue a couple of times:

> As noted above, pre-selection will often be essential to a black male’s success dating interracially in the USA. In order to make this possible, however, it is crucial for a black male to avoid association with any number of negative stereotypes associated with people like himself.
> The reality is this: thugs aren’t actually cool. Any notion contrary to that is a myth. Only a select minority of non-black women are really into thugs. Most truly want nothing to do with that image or lifestyle. It is crucial to the success of any black male looking to bridge racial divides in his romantic life to avoid association with that image at all costs.

In reality, this is just contrast game. One is simply acknowledging the presence of a stereotype with potentially negative effects on their social/romantic life, understanding that he will generally be assumed to be in line with that stereotype, and working to directly contrast with said stereotype when given the chance to actually engage with those who are likely to hold that assumption.

Black men benefit from this kind of “contrast game” when approaching non-black women. Similarly, white men will benefit from creating a contrast as well when they approach black women. How?

Develop a little swagger. Make sure your game is on point (that is what this website is for, isn’t it?) and work to ensure that your confidence shows. Get very comfortable approaching with that confidence. Black men are famous for fearless, persistent approaching — though they claim to often be annoyed by this, the fact is that said reality has conditioned many black American women to expect a man to be confident enough to step to them. There is very little tolerance in the black community for shy guys, far less than you will find in other groups.

Learn to dance, an act that will benefit you with any girl, really. Combine these suggestions with the maintenance of a diverse friend group that I suggested above (an act that will stand out and aid contrast game in and of itself) and you’ll have a fighting chance.

A lot of black women (though not all, as noted above) who are approached by white males are expecting a nice but “corny” guy with none of the swagger that she’s come to appreciate in a man. Surprise her and good things will happen.

Look Overseas

Black American woman are substantially less likely to date interracially than their counterparts in other parts of the world:

> The study predicts that if current trends continue, some ethnic minorities may disappear as people from mixed race backgrounds become increasingly common.
> Ethnicity and Family: Relationships Within and Between Ethnic Groups was commissioned by the Equality and Human Rights Commission (EHRC), which grew out of the former Commission for Race Equality.
> It shows some ethnic groups are much more likely to have mixed-race relationships.
> Figures show 48 percent of Black Caribbean men and 34 percent of Black Caribbean women are in mixed-race relationships.

Rates of interracial dating among black Americans are substantially lower than this:

> Based on the latest census data, the study showed record highs: 26 percent of Hispanics, 31 percent of Asians, 16 percent of Blacks and nine percent of Whites all married outside their race…
> …"In 2008, 22 percent of all black male newlyweds married a non-black," said Taylor.
> …Only 9 percent of black women, on the other hand, married outside their race, making them the least likely of any race or gender to marry outside their race and the least likely to get married at all.

Relationships between blacks and whites are more tolerable in other parts of the Anglosphere (including the UK) than they are in much of the USA. If your goal is to meet an interested black woman as a white male, you may increase your chances of doing so by looking internationally.

The value of interracial dating is in the choice it provides those who partake in it. The ability to transcend ethnic/racial boundaries allows for an increase in the number of potentially compatible romantic options, and thus an increase in the chances of a given individual obtaining satisfaction in their own romantic lives.

Any young male concerned with self-improvement should make the development of this transcendent ability a top priority. The tips above won't always win you the day, but you'll be much better off with them than without.

How Hard Is It To Discharge Your Student Loans?

February 10, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

It is well known that students these days are drowning in debt. And there really isn't any way around it, unless you're one of the few who doesn't have to take out student loans. I wanted to offer some information on the interplay between bankruptcy law and the dischargeability of student loans, because I've seen so much misinformation out there passing itself off as reliable guidance. My hope is that this brief introduction will serve as a stimulus for further investigation by those needing it. There is no way that an article of 1200 words can cover any legal topic in detail, but I will strive to hit the relevant points that readers should be aware of.

I want to say at the outset that this article is not meant to serve as legal advice for anyone's specific situation. It is offered for informational purposes. If there is one thing I'd like readers to take away from this piece—and if you take away nothing else, I hope you take this—it is the necessity of seeking reliable legal advice from an experienced attorney practicing in your jurisdiction.

Bankruptcy law is complicated, and involves an interplay of federal and state law, as well as local procedures, and only an attorney knowledgeable in the case law of your location can truly help you. Do not try to venture into these waters alone. The most dangerous thing in the world is a oblivious man proceeding resolutely from inadequate premises; and the graveyards of litigation are packed with the corpses of those who thought they could just "wing it."

We begin with a short overview. The U.S. Bankruptcy Code offers several "chapters" that specify various types of debtors that can seek relief. The most commonly encountered are: Chapter 7 (individuals and businesses seeking to liquidate), Chapter 13 (individuals with income seeking debt reorganization), and Chapter 11 (individuals and businesses seeking debt reorganization). The other chapters are not relevant here and will not be discussed. Most commonly filed are Chapters 7 and 13.

Many people have heard the rule that student loans cannot be discharged (i.e., wiped out) in a bankruptcy proceeding. While true for most situations, it is not a fully accurate statement of the law. Student loans can be discharged. But hurdles need to be overcome. It requires litigation (an adversary proceeding in bankruptcy court) and a judicial finding that repayment of the debt would create an "undue burden" for the debtor. But what is undue burden? This is the question that has generated a huge amount of litigation.

"Undue burden" is mentioned in 11 U.S.C. Section 523(a)(8), but case law has provided the case-by-case flesh on these bare bones. Courts around the country have enunciated several tests to evaluate what "undue burden" means. The Second Circuit's three-part Brunner test is perhaps the most popular. Under this test, student loans can be discharged if the debtor can show that (1) he cannot maintain a minimal standard of living if he is required to repay the loan; (2) such a situation is likely to persist for good period of the repayment term; and (3) the debtor has made a good faith effort to repay the loan. All three parts of the test must be satisfied.

Besides the Brunner test, some courts have applied other ways to evaluate undue hardship. These include the Johnson test (looking at the debtor's earning ability to repay the obligation while maintaining a minimum living standard), the "totality of the circumstances" test (considering all factors of repayment ability on a case-by-case basis), and the "Bryant Poverty Test" (looking at whether debtor's net income exceeds the federal poverty line). All of these tests are very fact-specific, and in practice often come down to this: to discharge your debts, you don't need to be totally destitute, but you will need to prove something more than just normal hardship.

To make things more complicated, some courts have ruled that either all or none of the debts can be discharged, while some courts have said that it is possible to discharge a portion of the debts. Different judicial circuits around the country have molded and modified these tests with case law. So it is essential that you consult with the attorney in your jurisdiction for the most up-to-date and complete state of the law.

One example is useful to describe. In 2008 (In Re Groves, 393 B.R. 673 (W.D. Mo. 2008)), a Chapter 7 debtor in 2008 had $185,000 in student loans she sought to discharge. She had been in a doctoral program and failed to complete it due to her poor grades and resulting depression. The court found that she could, however, still work in the field for which she possessed a master's degree. She could, therefore, make some payments. The court discharged $148,000 of the loan balance and left the remainder for her to pay.

Another example shows a different outcome. In In Re Campton, 405 B.R. 887 (N.D. Ohio 2009), an unemployed man sought to have $12,500 in student loans discharged. The court here found that the debtor failed all three parts of the Brunner test: he had maintained luxury items like a boat, cable TV, and cigarettes; he could not show his unemployment would continue for the near future; and he failed to show good faith by not making any payments. Clearly, this debtor was unworthy of the student loan discharge.

The ongoing student loan crisis continues to challenge both the government and students. It is unlikely that the Brunner test (dating to 1987) could have contemplated the avalanche of student loan debt that exists now. There was a time (decades ago) when student loans were dischargeable like any other debt, with no need for any litigation.

While those days are unlikely to return any time soon, it does appear to those of us that follow this issue that bankruptcy courts are beginning to be more generous in finding student loans dischargeable. And this makes good sense. Courts have to respond to social realities. A balanced society cannot exists when the backs of the young are permanently burdened with debt from which there is no escape. With the rise of the for-profit lending industry, the trend has been to shift away from favoring the lenders, to favoring the debtors.

If you or someone you know is considering a bankruptcy filing, and student loans exist, it is important at least to be aware of these issues. Knowing what questions to ask is a critical prt of the process. Further, there are many different ways to handle student loans in a bankruptcy. Even if they are not dischargeable, they can be very favorably treated over other debts in Chapter 13 or Chapter 11 reorganizations. Debtors are often surprised at just how much power they really have. Creative application of the law can do wonders for a client.

Those interested in exploring this or other areas of bankruptcy law are recommended to consult with an attorney in their jurisdiction. Depending on where you're located, further legal information on this and related bankruptcy topics can be found in these links: on the west coast, in the midwest, and on the east coast.

Treat Women Like Pets If You Want Them To Stay Attracted To You

February 10, 2014 | by Le coq | Link | Original Link

The modern man has many options when it comes to managing his relations with women. He can strive for a series of one-night stands. He can maintain a main girl who sniffs out threesomes for him. Once he gets into his 30s he might be interested in mini-relationships. If there's a main girl that brings him happiness, he might keep her around and have affairs on the side.

Whatever a man decides for his dating life, it's important that he understand how to manage women. This is especially true for any longer term relationship whether it's 3 months or 3 years.

There really is no better way to say it: treat women like pets. The sweetest girl on earth will eventually act up. She'll make ridiculous demands. She'll become jealous, start trying to manage your time and keep tabs on you. She may even start making financial demands, hinting that there are things she wants you to buy for her.

You can equate all of these things to a dog or cat shitting on your carpet. Would you tolerate that? No, and if you did that makes you a terrible pet owner. You would not tolerate your pets destroying your furniture, defecating in the house, begging for food, whining, or any other annoying behavior. You would reprimand the pet, with a simple swap at their behind or on the nose with a firm, "No".

Well, the days of smacking a woman are mostly over (unless she really asks for it), but fortunately there are other ways of reprimanding your woman. How you communicate is of utmost importance.

You must be firm and unyielding, because like a small child or unruly pet, she will attempt to push her boundaries. The sooner and firmer you hold your ground and lay down the law, the better. The enforcement comes from the threat of you leaving her at the drop of a hat. Feminine women naturally seek the approval of a dominant male, and if you are constantly one foot out the door, she will work to keep your attention.

The harder you are on your woman, the better trained she will be, and the more pleasure she will bring you (and herself). Occasionally she may slip, have one drink too many, and become loud and annoying. Maybe she'll do your laundry but in a moment of laziness, decide not to match and fold your socks. Or maybe she'll try to reprimand you for not being nicer to her friends. It's up to your discretion whether or not you want to say something in these cases, but in my experience it's better to always speak up, no matter how minor her offense:

> "Don't ever get that drunk in front of me ever again. When you're drunk, you get loud and obnoxious, and it's very unattractive to me. You're an adult, and you should be more than capable of maintaining your alcohol intake."
> "You know, if you're going to do my laundry, you should pair and fold my socks next time. I don't take you out to any half-assed dates, so you shouldn't half-ass anything either."
> "It's enough that I've decided to keep you around as much as I have, the last thing I need to do is worry about your friends' feelings. If they don't like it, fuck em, and don't bother me with these inconsequential matters."

Think I'm kidding? Watch her expression next time you say something like this. Her vagina will literally burst into flames. There's an entire generation of women out there that are sick of beta doormats that provide zero challenge or structure. Feminine women want structure in their life, they want a man to give them direction. And all women, in some sick, twisted way, want just a little bit of abuse. They thrive on the drama and friction the occasional burst of male anger brings them.

And if your woman doesn't respond well to your dominance, again, think about being a pet-owner. If you had a dog that simply did NOT respond to training, that was rabid, that bit people left and right, you would put it down, right? If you had a dog that constantly required a short leash and would run off every chance it got, what would you do? You'd probably let the stupid thing go. The same treatment applies to women: if they don't respond to your dominant demeanor, let them go. They are absolutely not worth keeping as a pet.

The truly undomesticated women that have zero potential as a pet are only worth fucking, using her as a cum receptacle, and then passing off for the next male to have his way with her. They will never make any man happy, and will not make themselves happy either, as they are too stupid and undisciplined to have a master that takes care of them.

We know more than anyone that the clock can not be turned back to an earlier time we see through nostalgic glasses, but we hope that the information we presented above makes you consider the idea that society may have thrown the baby out with the bathwater in creation of a progressive utopia where—against natural human instincts—everyone is forced into “equality.”

- What behaviors did we do in the past that men and women found useful and fulfilling?
- What new problems were created by denigrating or eliminating those behaviors?
- How can the most useful roles of the past serve us in modern times?

These are all questions worth examining, because it’s becoming apparent that a blind embrace of theoretical or experimental doctrines we are forced to endure today are not a clear improvement of past human existence. Let’s look to that past to understand what we did right so we can live better in the present. It’s time to admit that some things were not broken, and that society has created bigger problems than the ones we started with. A re-embrace of traditional sex roles is the most logical, practical, and fair solution that we can employ.

You Should Judge Books By Their Covers

February 11, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

One of the biggest feel-good crocks that permeates our politically correct society today is the clichéd statement: “You can’t judge a book by its cover.” For those of whose cognizance is quite a bit south of Forest Gump’s, what that phrase essentially means is that you should not draw assumptions of a person based on what you see on their surface. According to the people who believe that, what a person says or does or looks like (how they dress, how well groomed they are, whether or not they smell like mould) does not matter because deep down they have hidden depths which represent the ‘real’ them, and how they interact with the world is irrelevant compared to who they are ‘inside’.

I was especially touched by chapter 14 : A Rose Grows In The Killing Fields

Not only is that statement outright false, the popular perpetration of it has caused people to become blind to real dangers. It causes countless numbers of people to ignore their instincts and to enter into dangerous situations because those Social Justice Warriors out there told them their fears were unfounded; so that female jogger feels nervous running by those three men in hoodies, but hey it's only 8 p.m. and there's still some light out and besides everyone wears a hoodie and it's not right to judge someone based off their oh god I'm being dragged into the bushes.

There's no comprehensive study but from the tidbits I've read on the subject (mostly in Guns & Ammo and SWAT magazine) numerous people who have experienced street violence – be it robbing, mugging, rape or etc – professed to having a feeling before hand that their attacker was going to attack them. They judged the book by its cover and then completely ignored it because judging someone based on their appearance or actions or what they say is like, mean or something.

From the proud writer of Man Crazy, Mudwoman and Daddy Love. A quick experiment: Guess whether the authour is a man or woman, and try to picture them in your head before clicking here. Were ya close?

The subconscious part of our minds is astonishingly brilliant, even if it's trapped under the weight of conscious idiocy. There are hundreds of tells we gather from one another through our looks, our speech and our actions. These constitute the covers of the books that are us. The hidden depths that most of us have do not matter. We do not evaluate others for what's inside them, nor they we.

The vast majority of human interaction is composed of three things; what we say, do and look like. And all three are all that we need to make an accurate assessment of one another. These judgements are not unfair – at least in the realm of relations with other people. Bob could have once saved a baby from a burning building and honestly believes that all children are innocent creatures who need to be protected; if Bob dresses like a hobo, gets sloshed every chance he can, pan handles and spends many nights in the drunk tank, Bob is nothing more than a drunken nuisance to society.

We human beings are not special snowflakes. Admittedly many of us have had semi-unique experiences, and the sum of ones life may be unique in its course and events but the events themselves do not matter nor reflect on who we are. Again, what we say, what we do and how we look is the sum of who we are. The events that have happened to us in our life time only matter insofar as how they affect one of those dynamics.

You could have given your kidney to save a strangers life but if you treat everyone like they owe you something and get mad when they don't give you what you want you're simply a spoiled baby. It might not be true deep down inside of you but that is how the world is going to perceive you, and rightfully so. Say-Look-Do. That's it. That is the cover of your book.

It’s not hard to tell what these things are about

Now in order to pad out this article beyond all reasonable length I’m going to list three examples of people for you to judge. I’ll do my damndest not to lead you to any conclusions but those which you draw on your own.

Example 1

You’re perusing a book store when you see a young woman (18-24) standing in the aisle. She’s reading a romance novel that has recently exploded in popularity, one you know to involve BDSM and sexual slavery. She has ear stretchers, a nose and lip piercing (both are rings) and the tail end of a long tattoo pokes out onto her hand from the right sleeve and onto her neck from collar of her flannel shirt. By the colouring and design both ends belong to a single large tattoo, or two nearly identical ones.

She has short dyed blonde hair which is very long in front, with one side being completely shaved – a hairstyle extremely popular at the moment. Besides her flannel shirt, she is wearing Ugg boots and yoga pants and thick black glasses rims with no lenses in them. Several times, on average every 20-30 seconds, she pulls her iPhone out and checks it briefly before going back to the book.

Who is she? What kind of life does she lead? What is her book cover?

Example 2

You’re in line at a fast food store when a man comes up to the counter and attempts to flag the attention of the nearest worker whom does not immediately respond to him. Once the worker finally acknowledges him the man says, “Excuse me miss, I would like to speak to your manager.” The worker rolls her eyes and goes off, leaving the man standing there. He does not appear affected by the worker’s attitude. He is dressed in jeans and a band t-shirt. His head is completely shaven, and he is in very good physical shape. There is a tattoo on his forearm of a skull pierced by a knife along with a number underneath it, and a little further up is a tattoo of your country's flag. When the manager shows up he says, "Sorry to bother you ma'am, but we did not get two chicken burgers." The manager quickly gets him two burgers, and he says thanks her and walks out – but not before holding the door open for an elderly couple.

Who is he? What kind of life does he lead? What is his book cover?

Example 3

You're reading an article on the internet written by a young woman about how she is a slut and proud of it. The main picture is of her wearing very flattering clothes with a swoop of hair over her face which is tilted down and slightly away from the camera. She does not appear to be unattractive. The article consists of a few anecdotes of her sexual romps, almost all ending with her saying that she broke off the mini-relationship when the boys started to get too clingy. The bottom of her article has a few links to other works authoured by her;

Campus Rape Culture; Men Just Can't Compete; How Millenials Will Save The World.

There is a small bio of her under that. The picture beside is a straight on shot of her face, which is almost completely different looking from the one used at the top of the article; she is far less attractive then her article photo let on. She is smiling while holding up a fluffy white cat beside her. Her bio reads;

Jane Doe is a Utah born she-devil. A recent graduate of Columbia U, she now lives, writes and loves in New York. In between writing online articles for Well Known magazine and Popular magazine, she's currently waiting for Currently Hip Director to get back to her about her earth shattering screenplay about Meerkats.

The highest rated comment in the comments section is a man who apparently knows Jane Doe from their home town.

X-Factor95 : hey jane! look at you big city girl! its john bow! lol maybe i should forward this article to your folks ;p

Jane Doe (replying to X-Factor95) : Hey John! Yeah living the dream here LOL. Plz don't forward the article to my folks, they don't know I'm a writer yet I want it to be a surprise lol

Who is she? What kind of life does she lead? What is her book cover?

I bet most of us came to similar conclusions, although obviously I couldn't abstain completely from leading a bit. Of course there could be variables; there are always some who are the exception. But like most things it's a small percentage, 10% at max. For the most part your first impressions of 90% of the people you meet are invariably right. I can spend an hour with a person and have them pretty much figured out, hidden depths and all. And I'm an idiot (at least according to most of the comments on my articles). Surely you, sweet reader, can do it in 30 minutes. A spade's a spade, if it quacks it's a duck and a cigar is almost always just a cigar.

Pictured: a rare and disappointing exception

React to your judgements appropriately. They're most likely right and you are not prejudiced, racist or any other sort of shame word for doing so. You're simply responding to the innate knowledge and analysis that resides in all of us, and which many choose to ignore to their own suffering and peril. How a person interacts with and presents themselves to you is all that matters. Despite what the feel good mainstream tells us, judging a book by its cover is not irrational. To do otherwise is the real insanity. And for all you hidden depth believers out there, it's best to stop waiting for people to surprise you. They're not going to. Schools really should stop teaching kids useless utopian ideals like these and get back to the fundamentals.

Western Parents Are Raising Boys To Be Failures In Life

February 11, 2014 | by Daddy | Link | Original Link

During the past 40 years, raising children has dramatically changed. Girls are told to play with action figures and boys are encouraged to brush Barbies. Boys will hear “express your feelings,” “don’t hold it inside,” “talk about your problems,” and “be emphatic.” They are no longer told to be tough, not complain, and take action instead.

In an effort to make boys “better,” public education, media, and pop culture have instructed mothers to make their sons more feminine. But is it really better for them and for society as a whole? Since the point has been made previously that goofy effeminate men don’t fare well in love and sex, let’s examine the issue through the other most important dimension of a man’s life: work.

Indeed, holding an important position in society always demands you to perform under pressure. Lawyers, judges, scientists, athletes, soldiers, businessmen all need to be gracious in the face of adversity. One major aspect of these jobs is to produce great results under difficult conditions. Consequently, how many of you have, right before a task with high stakes, found the brain inventing all sorts of contrived rationalizations to avoid work? Fear, anxiety and doubt will fill your body and make you reconsider your decisions, sometimes prompting you to find sudden great interest in pondering the meaning of life, right in the middle of an extremely difficult challenge.

In those situations, your confidence might vanish and your despair could greatly affect your performance. However, men were traditionally taught from a very early age to not let themselves be overcome by those feelings and emotions. They learned to suck it up, to go against them and to act upon them anyway. That wasn't achieved through sensitivity training or by considering the so great importance of inclusive language. It was done by developing willpower and courage, by going through hardship over and over again to gain the necessary confidence to face greater obstacles. It was first taught vigorously by the fathers, then further honed and polished by the timely shaming and punishment from peers of any display of bitchy behaviors, such as crying or complaining in the heat of action. Our ancestors did not know evolutionary psychology, but they knew from experience and wisdom that being emotional when performance is needed is a recipe for disaster.

This man does not operate with his emotions

Another important psychological aspect of modern work is the constant pressure it puts on your morals. Men have to cope with constant temptations stemming from the adversarial nature of the workplaces. They have to make the right choices and avoid opportunities of advancements that cost them their integrity. Corrupting money offers, sexual advances from secretaries with big tetas, disingenuous friendship displays from coworkers who want your spot, and the seductive allure granted by spurious job titles are a few examples.

Your enemies, who may be working right by your side, may attempt to backstab you during coffee break hours and destabilize you in meetings by making you emotive. In fact, subtle shit talking, taunting and bullshitting, common skills that trump most college degrees in an office environment, are psychological attacks that aim to incite an emotion or feeling in the target. If a man is easily read and easily swayed, he will be unable to effectively exert his influence upon his peers. He will be manipulated by bimbos and toyed with by phony leaders who speak managerial nonsense. He will make constant faux pas in public by not being in control of his emotions and will be at the mercy of vultures who smell easy prey.

This is the face pink men make when they go home to their wives

Those men who are truly successful in every sphere of their existence are those who can rapidly place little importance in their feelings and emotions when the situation warrants it. In fact, men spend all their life bettering that skill. Boxers and mixed martial artists often speak about the importance of not letting any personal feelings join the ring with them, for they could dramatically affect their performance. Most great martial artists spend dozens of years practicing meditation to be above and in control of their primal instincts. Police officers, disrespected and taunted on a daily basis, learn quickly to not take the spits from the crass populace personally.

What feminists dumbly – or purposefully – mistake for “emotional suppression” is, in reality, emotional mastery and stoicism. It’s the ability to be scared and still do what you have to do, with great results. It’s being able to feel compassion for people yet still be righteous and possibly instill hatred in them. It’s having the necessary distance from your sentiments to make critical and objective decisions, not only for yourself but for everyone else involved. Yet, in a massive social and political campaign to eliminate the misunderstood strong silent type, feminists have destroyed the foundation of masculinity to replace it with dysfunctional and bogus gender neutral horse manure.

This man can't be manipulated or controlled

Alas, modern education teaches boys that it's more important to feel, to experience and to communicate their emotions, to pay attention to them and give them importance, when those sentiments should instead be tamed like a wild beast. How many of the feminist authors of these Sunday afternoon theories had any deep understanding of how men function? Emotional mastery doesn't happen by mistake, by just living and growing older. A constant effort is required. It is first enabled by a collective understanding of what makes a man a man, then maintained by peer pressure to shame behaviors that don't conform to this understanding.

By applying feel good, lazy unproven feminist theories that contradict hundreds of thousands of years of evolution and folk wisdom, parents prevent their boys practicing and acquiring the necessary self-control to be successful men. An upbringing that teaches them to marinate in emotional states will cripple them and prevent them from becoming adults. It's no wonder that many boys linger in mental adolescence as long as possible to avoid life challenges that seem unbeatable given their stunted growth. They hide in their basement to play video games only to become unwanted failures.

7 Tips For Building A Harem

February 11, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

For many, the zenith of the player lifestyle is accumulating a harem—a rotation of hot young woman available at the drop of a WhatsApp message for no-strings late-night hook-ups. All men like variety—after all, who wants to keep unwrapping the same present?—but more importantly, in today's ruthless dating marketplace, spinning plates is necessary for the guy who seeks to remain free of unwanted attachment foisted on him by predatory females. To paraphrase Russell Brand, one girl on the go is just too close to none. But how should the aspiring Hugh Hefner go about building a rotation of girls, and can there ever be such a thing as too much abundance?

As a man in his late thirties of average looks, height and income who is dating four girls at the time of writing, all attractive and in their twenties, I thought I'd offer ROK reader seven tips on harem-building and maintenance. Just to make it clear, my girls don't know one another, so the focus of what follows is on concurrent-relationships rather than setting up ménages, which deserves a post in its own right.

1. ABC: Always Be Closing

Understand this: maintaining a rotation of semi-casual sexual partners is a game that never ends. There is no plateau where you can relax, lay back and admire your kingdom. Like Iceberg Slim, you need to be out there pimping consistently. If you're starting from scratch do the following: learn game, go out and find a girl willing to sleep with you, then immediately rinse and repeat. There can be no let-up.

The truth is that every sexual arrangement you initiate will inevitably go one of two ways:

either the girl will disappear after a few lays (to continue riding of cock carousel with other players) or she will push you for greater commitment. Because these relationships are by definition casual, there is no security in the game, so rather like a crack dealer working the block in Brooklyn, you need to get out there and keep hustling, because if there's one thing you can bet your life on, it's the inconstancy of women. That said, the sense that you are a player will in the short term make you more attractive to your girls, but as time goes on and you eschew any sort of provisioning role, even the most hardy is likely to bail for greener pastures. Adopt an 'always on' strategy, and be proactive in approaching women wherever you are — in the street, in coffee bars, on public transport, etc — and ruthless in closing the deal.

2. Don't Get Attached

Again, like Iceberg Slim in his seminal novel Pimp, it is imperative that you prevent yourself from becoming unduly attached to any one particular girl if you want to maintain a lifestyle of sexual abundance. Of course, one of the desirable functions of maintaining a harem is that it should prevent you from undue emotional attachment—after all, in theory you're less likely to develop oneitis over a girl if you're sleeping with another three at the same time.

In practice though, there is a danger that you will develop stronger feelings for the foremost of your girls (read: the hottest) and subconsciously beta yourself before her, only to experience a level of hurt when she rides off on the next cock that won't be assuaged even by the knowledge that you have others to fall back on. Don't allow this to happen: clamp down hard on your feelings, and remind yourself on a daily basis that your objective is not a long-term relationship with any one girl, but a lifestyle of abundance. Be ice cold.

3. Be Very Good At Text Game

Given that the very nature of casual sex relationships is that you won't see each of your girls that frequently (probably once a week or less) then it is essential that you become proficient at texting , WhatsApp and Facebook messaging etc. In 2014, very few girls of the 18-29 year-old age range that you will be targeting actually speak on the phone, and so you will need to get good at handling your harem remotely, via message.

If your text game isn't already strong, then do whatever it takes to strengthen it. Buy a reputable guide on the subject, read reports online, and post your own text conversations on forums for analysis. Basically, the trick is to balance sexually charged messages with comfort (so the girl believes there's at least a vestige of a relationship there) while at the same time pushing back on her demands to see you or to spend more time with you. Your task will be to ensure that you see the girl you want to when you want, while keeping the others 'warm' so that you can meet with them on other nights when you're free.

You also want to be in a position to replace a girl at short notice when one flakes on you a few hours before she was meant to come over. Keep them sweet with regular, short and sexy texts — they should be intrigued and always wanting more.

4. Cover Your Tracks

It should really go without saying, but one of the most important things you must do is cover your tracks (unless of course you have engineered a situation where one or more of your girls know each other and / or you all sleep together). Assuming this isn't the case, then you must be very careful not to leave tell-tale signs to alert the girls to your extra-curricular activities.

Each morning, you should do a sweep of your room, removing anything incriminating—hair grips, earrings etc. Be particularly vigilant about this as girls are well-known for ‘accidentally’ leaving personal items around to ‘mark their territory.’ Have several sets of bedding and be prepared to change these at short notice. Open the window and use a room deodorizer to mask any odors. Make sure any roommate you have is discreet. Lastly, for when the shit hits the fan, learn to lie well. Never try to oversell your explanations—give her a plausible-sounding response to her suspicion and let her take it or leave it. And remember that the most effective way to lie is to utterly convince yourself that you are telling the truth.

5. Avoid ‘The Conversation’

As stated above, any on-going sexual relationship with a girl can really only end one of two ways—with her drifting away to pastures new, or pushing you for greater commitment. In the latter cases, what you must do without fail is to take any steps possible to avoid ‘the conversation.’ This is the awkward moment when the girl you’ve been happily fucking for the last few weeks wants to sit down and discuss ‘what’s really going on’ or ‘where you’re headed.’

If you play aloof, make yourself unavailable from time to time, and always hold the ‘lover not provider frame’ (i.e. don’t do anything that remotely resembles the behavior of a boyfriend) then the chances are she’ll get the message and you’ll avoid this. But if you do find yourself having the conversation, then whatever you do you must be evasive. A rookie mistake is to accede to her demands for exclusivity, thinking that if you don’t the poon tap will be turned off. It won’t, but even if you do lose her, better to be rid of a chick who’s making demands early rather than allowing her predatory nature to entangle you further.

6. Be Physically Fit

Go to the gym daily, run and eat right. Drink a lot of water and avoid alcohol. Don’t smoke. You’re going to need every atom of fitness you can acquire. Once you have a rotation of three or four girls on the go you’re going to be fucking a lot and you need to fuck them good. If you’re not emotionally investing in her, then the sex had better be outstanding, otherwise she’s walking.

7. Realise It’s Not All It’s Cracked Up To Be And It May Not Make You Happy

Banging a group of random chicks can be tough. Not only will you have to put up with their bullshit—jealousy, suspicion, shit-testing, tantrums and demands and so on, but you will also have to contend with the inherent instability of your position. It’s quite possible to have four girls on the go one day, only for two of them to drop off the rotation overnight. This is why you should always be closing, but also make sure you have a good group of close male friends in whom you can confide who know what you are doing and are non-judgmental about it. In the end, it’s the support of other men that will pull you through the hard times.

Jezebel vs ROK: Internet Traffic Grudge Match

February 11, 2014 | by FeralHeartAndMind | Link | Original Link

I've been looking over the internet analytics of feminist and manosphere web pages over the last year and the information is pretty surprising. Take a look at the data and I think you'll agree that the future looks bright for the manosphere.

1. Growth

If you look at the traffic increase in Jezebel over the last year, it's respectable. Some months views are up and some months views are down. Overall, it's showing about a 66% annual growth.

Now, on the other hand if you look at ROKs—even if you throw out the first and last month as outliers—the growth in its viewership has been meteoric, around 3000%. Could this be being people are starting to respond to the manosphere's message?

2. Demographics

So what kind of diversity does ROK and Jezebel have? If you look at Alexa.com data, you won't be surprised that there aren't many men hanging out at Jezebel serving as beta orbiters to Lindy West. Somewhat surprising is that everyone reads Jezebel at school. Is it now required for a women's studies major?

If you check out ROK's sex ratio, it's surprisingly close. Could it be that the message is starting to reach women, too?

3. Related Interests

I checked the “audience also likes” metric at Quantcast. ROK readers were pretty much what you’d expect. .

Now I want you to take a wild guess what the Jezzebeans hold nearest and dearest to their hearts. Is it world hunger? Community Service? Rape culture? Domestic violence? No, no, no and no. Most of us already know that modern feminism is a giant shit test and its adherent don’t really care about the nonsense they spew. Quantcast spills Jeze’s dirty little secrets…

So while Jezebel feminists whine about fat shaming and street harassment, they are deeply concerned with makeup, clothes, and horoscopes. The same people who want you to believe that women make 77 cents on the dollar also look to the stars to tell them of their future.

Here’s a horoscope for Jezebel readers: you will meet a charismatic man. Though you may not be initially attracted to him, he will ignore your tantrums, put you in your place, and turn you on with his dominance, giving you the rough sex you desire. Then he will go home and log on to his favorite web site, Return Of Kings.

How Male Dominance Creates Better Sex

February 12, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

There are certain things that are almost universal truths once you ingest the red pill and understand the male vs. female dynamics. One such thing is the fact that male dominance/masculinity/"alpha-ness" attracts very feminine/sexual women, or within already attained females, creates high levels of lust and sexual desire. This result is better and more passionate sex.

Tuthmosis correctly pointed out that all girls like rough sex. Truth be told, they love it. I discussed my dominance experiment in a previous article too, where I pointed out that "women love to be dominated. It is in their biology." These articles stem from our own experiences with individual girls, repeated enough times to provide substantiation to our theories.

A few days ago Rollo Tomassi tweeted something that sparked my interest. It discussed how when men take on feminine roles in a relationship (i.e. chores/housework), it kills the female's sexual drive. Not surprising really. But then I started to wonder however how this plays out across a larger scale. In other words, take out the individualistic analysis of a couple, or one's experience, or a group of men's experiences. Rather, how does this play out across a whole nation or culture? To answer that, I thought of some countries I have spent time in and how their girls' sexual desires and raw passions compare to each other.

Brazil

The sexual energy these girls give off is remarkable. I cannot think of a country where the girls oozed more sex than Brazil. You have incredibly quick and lustful makeouts, Forró style dancing where you are essentially dry humping standing up, and of course great sex.

So what are the men like? Aggressive as hell. They will not take no for an answer when trying to make out with girls. To the point where they will corner them against a wall until the girl relents and makes out. They are also generally big dudes and very athletic – again a trait of high masculinity. If my theory is correct, then this is not a coincidence.

Russia

[image]

Yes I know I love Russian girls and talk about them a lot. But for good reason.

At first glance, you see the beauty of Russian girls. But then you speak to them and often times they come across as cold. You hear stories about how they are all gold diggers and materialistic bitches, and perhaps the expression “ice queens” makes an appearance.

But battle through that first layer, and you will be handsomely rewarded. No set of foreign girls—in my experience at least—have consistently been so sexually intense and frankly as animalistically loving of sex as Russian girls have been. They cherish every second and aspect of sex, something you can see on their faces and hear in their gasps for air during the rhythmic coitus.

So then we ask again, what are the men like?

Well if you'e ever been to Russia, the country exudes traditional gender roles amplifying male masculinity and dominance. On top of that, there is no such thing as pedestalizing women there. If one leaves, another will come along—this is the attitude Russian men harbor. In America, men seeking to do well with women are essentially urged to adapt a Russian man's attitude, i.e. be objectively indifferent and aloof.

I've traveled a lot. Is it a coincidence that the girls I've found consistently to provide the best sex come from a land where the men are arguably as alpha as they come? Maybe, maybe not. But it's hard to ignore the coincidence.

On The Other Hand…

[image]

You have American girls. Sex is the last thing on a lot of their minds—after Facebook, brunch and sadly their careers. Yes they are slutty and fuck quickly, and yes they act like pornstars in the sack. But it's contrived and fake. Just as girls are brainwashed into thinking they should be feminists, they are brainwashed into thinking they should act like complete cum guzzlers in the bedroom. There's a huge difference between being "a lady in the street and a freak in the bed" and "a bitch on the streets and a human toilet in the bed."

And again, I do not think it is a coincidence that American girls are like this given the majority of the male population has become emasculated "men," drifting ever so quickly into these neutral gender roles.

Sex is the purest and most raw form of passion, emotion, feeling, and desire two humans can naturally have with one another. So to maximize this, the man and the woman have to put forth their most natural forms.

Men are the leaders. So when men are actually men, women will want to actually be women. And where you have this acceptance of the natural state, as you do in some countries, you have the closest thing to what sex should be.

The Dark Side Of Having A Good Looking Wingman

February 12, 2014 | by darkjohanson | Link | Original Link

A few months ago I was gaming with one of my friends in my favorite bar. Shortly after last call I was ready to start heading home empty-handed. We are lining up for our coats and suddenly I hear a familiar language: it wasn't mine, but still pretty close. The guy in question was surrounded by three blond nurses and I casually struck up a conversation with him. He seemed like an okay dude and introduced me to the nurses. Outside of the bar, we are discussing with the girls what the afterparty will be like when finally they invite us over to their place to get a 'glass of wine.'

Nothing happened that night (believe me it wasn't for a lack of trying) besides getting drunk for free, but I discovered that the new guy and I shared the same musical tastes and general sense of humor. We decided to hang out again and game some girls. Not that I would have suspected it when I met him, but this guy turns chicks crazy. They literally throw themselves at him, stop at their tracks to try and gain his attention, give him the look—you know the drill. The first time we went to game together I thought it was going to be majestic. He would attract the hounds and I would reap whichever crops were left for the picking.

This wasn't an especially noble idea, but regardless I thought I might have struck gold. While we had great chemistry with perfectly complimenting skill sets—he was at ease with direct approaches on the dancefloor and I was more comfortable with indirect at the bar—something didn't feel right. Somehow, most times that we would approach a set of two girls, I wasn't getting any attention whatsoever. I couldn't pinpoint doing anything different than usual, so I assumed my new wingman had something to do with it.

After some time I realized what was happening: the girls were getting greedy. They would try to 'fight' each other over him, leaving me none of the scraps I thought I'd be getting. Approaching by myself held much greater success —several orders of magnitude above—than with him as a wingman. In short:

Be wary of a wingman that drives women crazy just by seeing him. You might see your ability to swoop women significantly impaired.

Instead of giving up, I persevered and continued our outings together. And while 'notch-wise' it was a very dry period in my life, what I learned was priceless: I got to see firsthand how a natural behaves in the field, how slutty women can be and why I should be ashamed to have ever had them up in a pedestal.

My wingman didn't value girls when we went out. Sure, he would approach and dance with a couple of them, but he was perspiring with the energy of knowing he could practically get laid any night with any of at least three girls who would eventually throw themselves at him. The girls acted like betas by default: acting as if they owed him something. They would go out of their way to make themselves available, invite him to drinks, hand their number out to him, or ask him to go outside have a smoke with them. After some time he would just look at me and say "Bitches mean nothing to me, brother, let's just have a great time and hit on some other girls."

Some of you might be thinking by now: well, didn't you get depressed to see after all your hard work that a natural was effortlessly above your level? There will always be people above and below you. We have a set of cards we have been dealt, but it's what we do with them that matters. Will ever reach that level of success? Maybe, maybe not, but the fact remains: if you're not a natural and have not been dealt the uber-good looking card, your chances of getting some pussy are exponentially higher if you are out there gaming and improving yourself.

If there is a single lesson that I got from my wingman is to be playful. Smile, joke around, and don't take yourself too seriously. Never get pissed off for a girl being flakey or rejecting you. Don't let it faze you because women can be irrational, childish and downright stupid. Think of it like the game it is: push forward till you can't anymore. Didn't work? Chalk it up and move on to to the next one.

4 Red Pill Concepts You Need To Understand

February 12, 2014 | by inhumanist | Link | Original Link

This article begins to serve as an introduction to the manosphere and the Red Pill. It is for men who have been struggling with their wives and girlfriends, or with their government or employer, and feel they need to be turned toward human flourishing and happiness. Share this article with them.

She Is The Villain

Many men think of women as Princess Zelda. They want a nice girl to rescue and settle down with. Some even think they rescued Zelda, and now it will be nothing but white picket fences and greener pastures. Some are just wondering why their Princess is such a bitch sometimes. Achtung! That woman you want is no Zelda. She is the villain. She is the enemy in this game. Her nature must be confronted and she must be overcome. Her nature will destroy you and even herself if you do not defeat the evil forces involved within her very being.

Solipsism & Celebrity

Take a moment to consider Hollywood celebrities. They are among the most degenerate, out-of-touch, clueless failures in America. They're famously drug addicted, narcissistic, ignorant, presumptuous, privileged, and often secretly miserable. Adam Corolla hilariously said that—if you hate her—the worst thing you could wish on Kathy Griffin is a long life. Most celebrities make it through their fame and fortune with grace, but there is no group of people more notorious for their untimely death or social disorderliness—-other than recent lottery winners, perhaps.

This grotesque psyche is what plagues a woman, especially the woman who is generally desirable to men. She is a celebrity. Everything she posts on Facebook is liked and fawned over. Every mistake in her life results in a bailout of some kind. There is literally nothing she can do to fail because there is always a government program or a caring man waiting to save her. Every voice cries out to her that she is good, wonderful, great, no matter what her faults are. She is taught to esteem herself no matter what, and anyone who speaks out against a woman's self-esteem is attacked viciously and labeled a hateful person. Women experience a level of privilege the average schmoe has no concept of. She bats her eyelashes and gets a ride, she stands next to her smoking automobile and gets a free roadside mechanic. She carries a heavy load through the shopping mall and gets a willing assistant to take it off her hands.

I admit that this phenomenon is on the decline in a post-Christian society, and women are being treated more and more like men these days, which is probably not what they bargained for when they overthrew the prevailing order. But the privilege they experience is still life-altering for them, and still officially institutionalized by the government for you.

This privilege does a number on a person's psyche. Solipsism is a philosophical term meaning that a person does not agree that other persons exist outside of themselves. This philosophy generally describes a desirable woman's psyche in our Western culture—perhaps in our species. The phrase Not All Women Are Like (NAWALT) that has been immortalized and mocked in the manosphere.

Provide your favorite links to female villainy and NAWALT.

Hypergamy

Special attention must be paid to a woman's programmed routine. She is programmed to excel in a certain way that a man is often unable to realize. Men excel by accomplishing things for themselves and their own, and are willing to couple with a younger, dumber, poorer woman without shame. Women are not like this.

Women primarily want to associate themselves with others who accomplish things and secure the social status and provisions from a richer, older, more powerful, higher status man. This is why women generally marry older men, who are often further in the career, further in maturity, further in the social order, stronger and wiser. A woman generally does not respect a man who is dumber, poorer, weaker, and less powerful than her. She may take one on as a mom or as a nun—but a woman intimately associated with a lower status man will automatically resent him and treat him disrespectfully, and she will not be able to quite place her finger on the source of her discontent. Alas, her own nature is elusive to her in our culture, and even attempting to explain it to her may at last be beyond her comprehension or care.

Feminism

Many aspects of a woman's nature are universal, but some are cultural. Who cares which if they are consistently observed? Not me. But there is some observed truth to these matters. The truth is that women are easily programmed, perhaps more easily than men. Our Western women are currently programmed primarily by liberal feminism.

Feminism is a bizarre, unnatural religion or mythology that claims women were oppressed and need to be liberated. The truth is that nobody ever oppressed a woman by getting on their knees, offering precious gems, begging for unity, and offering her the children she naturally desires. If women were oppressed, men were slaves. If women were nothing but sex objects, men were nothing but ATMs. If women were doomed to motherhood, men were doomed to dying on foreign shores for their countrymen.

Feminism is an insidious theoretical framework that has occupied the highest heights in our culture, reigning over the lectern, the Oval Office, and the Silver Screen with impunity. Almost nobody claims the mantle of "feminist" but almost nobody operates according to anything outside the rules of feminism. Claiming something anti-feminist, like that women should not vote, is absolutely beyond the pale, even though it was universally accepted by every culture in history as incontrovertible. Feminism must be studied and defeated.

White Knights

Although women have great power over the men in their lives, they have almost no power over society as a whole. This is because women are not as strong and smart as men, nor are they willing to take risks over abstract matters of justice and morality. They instead leave this to the men they do control. They enlist willing men to take the risks enforcing feminist morality.

Although they do not accept a code of conduct for all women to follow, they still stubbornly cling to a code of conduct for all men to follow: chivalry. Although they are no lady, no damsel, no princess Zelda, they still expect you to be their prince, their savior, their Link. Any man who does not take on their chivalric duty is shunned by their closest friends and family. When a feminist wants less women to suffer, or to have less responsibility for their foolish actions, they always enlist a man with a gavel, or a man with a badge, or a man with a tax bill to do their bidding. There are many theories as to how and why these men behave the way they do.

Are You The Superhero Of Your Neighborhood?

February 12, 2014 | by Christian Long | Link | Original Link

Growing up with two older brothers, I had my fair share of exposure to comic books, superheroes, and supervillains. My second eldest brother still has over 8,000 comic books in mint condition stored in his basement. He's very proud of some early X-Men and Hulk issues. He was most upset when several classic 'The Punisher' issues got lost during a move. Too bad he didn't cash out during the comic book boom from 1985 to 1993. At that time, Marvel and DC comics caused more teenage boys arousal than the newest issue of the Victoria's Secret catalogue.

I wanted to follow in the footsteps of my big brothers with collecting comic books and comic trading cards, mostly because they forbade my little greasy fingers from touching their long-term investments. I was most fascinated by the stats of the superheroes. I never got sports stats but, man, did I get superhero and supervillain stats.

Hulk: Height 7" 6′ – Weight 1,015 lbs – Strength 100 tons – Nuclear Blast Direct Spider Man: Height 5" 8′ – Weight 155 lbs – Strength 10 tons – Nuclear Blast 10-mile radius

Beyonder: Height 6′ – Weight Unknown – Strength Without Limits – Cannot be destroyed

I would spend hours reading and memorizing the stats of Marvel Superheroes and Supervillains known and unknown. I was absolutely fascinated with the idea of characters in the Marvel Universe. The most exciting concept was that some who were not born with their powers could still 'get in der' and mix it up with the rest of them. It gave me hope that quite possibly I too, could be a superhero.

Who knew Spiderman was kicking ass 3 blocks from my house!

But how to become one?

That question started a 2-year vision quest to become a superhero (come on, I was 11). I read as many comic books, trade journals, and popular mechanics issues I could borrow from the library. I would mastermind with my smarter, older brothers for answers to questions like; how can we produce a web-like substance that shoots from the wrists, is there a breathing technique to give one extraordinary physical strength or stamina, is there currently a reflective material that would make me invisible, would it be better to kill the bad guy and dispose of his body in acid or to stun him and drop him off at the police station? I was in the early stages of learning how to become a vigilante.

I imagined that while my neighbors turned in for the evening, I would be suiting-up in my superhero costume with gadgets to begin my neighborhood watch. Scaling trees, looking through windows, checking the safety of electric transformers and making sure no funny business was taking place. Not on my watch dammit! Or maybe I was really in the early stages of learning how to be a creepy stalker in the woods.

What is a ‘superhero’ anyways?

A superhero is defined as a benevolent fictional character with superhuman powers. Superhuman is defined as having or showing exceptional ability or powers. Who says we can’t be real life superheros with superhuman powers of awareness in the middle of a house fire, or seeing dozens of solutions to a problem where others see none?

My spiritual teacher, Grandmaster Choa Kok Sui, once said, “You can spend 20 years in the Himalayas learning how to levitate your body. But how does that siddhi (yogic power), alleviate the suffering of your fellow-man?"

The common superhero powers of flight, x-ray vision, reading minds, incredible strength and endurance, invisibility, and immortality are cool to think about BUT without the refinement of character and the willingness to do good, so what? Look at the Incredible Hulk—combine his strength with uncontrollable anger and you got a real problem for the neighborhood.

When people are in trouble do they come to you for assistance? Are you seen as a reliable source of superhuman compassion, patience, understanding, and getting things done? Or do you practice your one and only superpower—invisibility, the ability to disappear at will when any crisis arises.

If you want to be a modern-day superhero, here are some suggestions:

- Volunteer at a local food pantry
- Teach an at-risk youth how to read
- Sing at your church choir
- Start a local feeding program for the homeless
- Babysit for struggling parents
- Write 'Thank You' cards to your three least favorite people
- Hold a weekly meditation at your house
- Donate money directly to a cause you believe in
- Provide mentoring to someone in need of what you know

You can be as creative as you want. Just take action. There is more opportunity to serve within a 5-mile radius of your home than you ever thought possible.

Here are only some of the benefits to serving others:

- Expanding your heart leading to more inner peace and inner joy
- Increasing your capacity to serve leading to more energy and power
- Developing and honing your superpowers leading to mastery
- Connecting with cool people leading to a larger social network
- Developing a sense of purpose beyond the ego leading to a smaller 'I.'
- Being recognized as a leader within your neighborhood and community

My challenge to you is to do something…anything…to serve your fellow superheroes and supervillains. Find a form of service that resonates with who you are and try it out for a month. If after a month of serving a child, homeless person, aspiring entrepreneur, or whatever and you realize it was a huge waste of time, then quit. But to make up your mind before ever serving your community would be kind of silly right?

It would be like Hulk shouting, "Hulk hate chocolate ice cream! Too much choc-o-late! Hulk smash ice cream!" I calmly ask, "Hulk, have you ever tried chocolate ice cream before?” Hulk shouts, “NO!” I question, “Wait Hulk, have you even tasted ice cream?” Hulk shouts, “No! Man says Hulk ice cream too sweet ‘n too cold. Man says Hulk not like!” I then slide the bowl of delicious chocolate ice cream across the table to Hulk.

Hulk like. Hulk like very much.

Don’t be like Hulk, try it before choosing whether you love it or hate it.

11 Tips For Becoming Self-Employed

February 12, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Here are some things that have driven me along my journey to self-employment…

1. Have nothing to lose

William the Conqueror, the only military commander to invade England in 1000 years, had his men burn their ships after they landed. When you have nothing to lose, and you make it do or die – you will find a way. I put myself in situations where I had no choice by having my life savings invested, living in third world countries or places I didn't speak the language, and being on a self employed visa. Given a year or two, this mindset takes over.

Having nothing to lose also enables you to cut losses and move on quickly. I've shutdown companies with employees, scraped projects overnight, literally told business partners to get fucked and walked out, liquidated stock or plain dumped the business cold, just to move onto something new. Many small businesses get stuck in a rut and go nowhere, which is like a day job with twice the responsibility. Being prepared to liquidated at any moment, puts you in constant free fall, like a rocket in orbit.

2. Be comfortable, be humble

A great way to create the nothing to lose attitude is by getting your basic living costs tightly under control and having the cash to cover a year or two of food and rent. It's a lot easier to have the nothing to lose attitude if you aren't staring down bankruptcy and skid row every morning. Many businesses fail because they take on too much or go too fast. Acting like you have nothing to lose is very different to pushing yourself over the edge. Being self employed means taking responsibility and separating personal and business affairs yourself.

3. Enthusiasm, confidence and adventure

Someone working a day job just for money tends to live in a comfort zone - for their free time. They live to be idle or for their hobbies. If you are already working, this dreamy existence is an opium addiction you must break. You must challenge your comfort zone on an almost daily basis. You will have to live much more in the moment and be adaptable. You'll have to enjoy all of what you do, even if it's dealing with some aggressive client or sitting on hold to fedex to find a lost package. The days of time wasting in some day job are over.

When you read about Richard Branson, freezing his ass off at midnight, feeding coins into a payphone in a Swiss ski resort, phoning a bank in Canada to desperately refinance the $25 million he needed to sign Janet Jackson, then you get more of the picture of what being self employed is all about. With the worldwide comms. we have today, you have no excuse. If you love beer that much then go make a business out of it. Anything is possible and everyone has an edge and experience in something.

4. Don’t rely on anyone

Be nice to people, foster connections and associations, take on a partner if necessary but never lose time. Just like a girl that flakes on you, there is no one worth doing business with if they make you lose time.

5. Eyes on the road

Do your own accounts and keep a tight finger on the purse strings. Rupert Murdoch is famous for phoning up his managers at all hours of the day or night to request operating figures. Rockefeller kept a pocket book down to the last cent he spent. At the end of the day you can pipe dream and say you are not in it for the money, but in most businesses, money is the benchmark of success. It is also the gauge of how much gas you have in the tank. I always know rough balances for everything, right down to the cash in my pocket. It’s a useful mindset that enables you to take split second decisions.

6. Cash flow and credit

Google was started by maxing out a credit card. Credit card debt is a bane for those with day jobs, but it’s the lifeline of many small businesses. You can bounce balances for interest free periods, pay out balances and request limit increases. If you need cash flow 15-20% interest can seem very cheap. I’ve run up $250k in credit card debt, nearly gone bankrupt from it, but I paid it out – interest and all – because it was my lifeline.

Borrowing money, finding investors, even floating the stock in an IPO is all very important to keep a company liquid. At the same time, paying bills as late as possible, selling product before you own it, taking deposits upfront and being on top of tax rebates can keep you liquid. I don’t think I have ever paid my rent on time. A month late is standard until the landlord starts sending eviction notices, and sometimes those can be a convenient way to break a lease.

7. Hardware

A capital purchase of real tangible hardware that you can resell should never be an issue. If you need that piece of equipment, buy it. Sites like Ebay make it easier than ever to resell things and although you might take a loss on fees, shipping and used value, you can estimate that before you make the purchase. The nothing-to-lose attitude comes from being comfortable, not from being flagrantly negligent or utterly foolish.

I’ve bought $50k of hardware knowing that if it didn’t work out, at least I could ditch it for $30-40k, meaning my purchase is not outright dead money. I have nothing to lose and everything to gain, provided I can afford the hit if things don’t work out.

Buying used can be good, but remember the disruption, stress and hassle of faulty gear can be far more costly than having new gear with warranty and support. I have learned the hard way that I am not rich enough to buy cheap junk. Major brand names are there for a reason and in many cases professionals use software and hardware you might not have heard of, so do your research well and spare no expense, especially if the resale value is high. The bitterness of poor quality is felt long after the sting of high price, especially in business. Think military. Go into battle with the best you can buy, not what you think you can afford.

8. Separate 'tech' from 'sales' and 'managerial' from 'entrepreneurial'

Many small businesses from restaurants to online publishing fail because the owner is too passionate about his product and 'enjoys' what he does too much – meaning he doesn't put the hard yards into sales. Sales is a high pressure and stressful business. Much like cold approach pickup, there is constant rejection and exposure to negative opinion, but if you want to work for yourself, in almost all business, you will have to plug away at sales and build exposure. This means being nice to people, learning how to get what you want when you want it, being positive, energized and interesting (i.e., game). You also have to learn to cut the time wasters and flakes.

An excellent book called The E-Myth by Michael E. Gerber lays out the structure companies like McDonald's use to run their businesses. The self employed guy goes bankrupt because he loves what he does but is hopeless at sales. At the same time he has great ideas as an entrepreneur but runs into a wall of laborious managerial responsibility.

9. Time off and benefits

They say you don't have a business unless you can take a couple of weeks off. Laziness has been my best friend in self-employment. Hiring people to do jobs I don't feel like doing is very important in every area aside from sales. Munitions workers in WW2 made less bullets on seven-day shifts than on six. If you don't take a break from time to time and treat yourself right, you will be working on about 50% efficiency. The only way to be able to take time off and still have a business, is by hiring people to do the daily grind for you. Many people see business owners as free wheeling types and this is true, but the business is never far from their mind – even on vacation. Some of the best business I do is at the bar or on the beach. As it grows, a business owner has to be hands free from the grind.

10. Start with the right practices and structure

It's hard to do this at the beginning, because there are so many facets to a new business, but you must have a good structure in all aspects, especially if you involve other people. The command structure is paramount, as is the incentive structure for both yourself and any staff. If you do involve partners, don't give them too much control and be clear about who is the decision maker. Obviously others need to exercise freewill, but frankly 50-50 business partnerships can be crippling as neither of you can make a decision without the other to baby sit. This was one of my biggest youthful mistakes. Much of the success of Silicon Valley companies is they start out with a clearly defined command structure.

11. Be realistic

Most business fail because they do too much too fast and are spread too thin. Take time, set easily attainable goals and congratulate yourself as you go, even if the success would be laughable to more accomplished people.

Guys that have never cold approached girls before can't expect to go home with a 9 the first night out. Just asking her for directions and saying good night with a smile might be a great result. More importantly it's a realistic result that leads to a longer conversation next time. Google was a private company less than 10 years ago. When you take baby steps and keep compounding those, it's amazing how far you can go. A successful step today might be a $100 incorporation and opening a bank account, but in 10 years time that step could be a $10 billion IPO.

In engineering, failure is a function of putting a material or structure under too much pressure. On the other hand, leaving something sitting is guaranteed to cause decay. This is your life we are talking about. Self employment is not for everyone, but if you want it, then go do it.

As a final note, I'll just say that I have noticed dozens and dozens of business ideas I've had in the past 20 years, coming to life all around me. From a friend's rock band that was a couple of years ahead of Oasis, but never made it because they quit, to better designed office furniture, computer animations, cheap quality sunglasses, more variety of soft drinks, the list is endless. People think in more or less the same way, and the younger generation knows the way forwards – you just have to have the balls to be the one on the frontier. I was trying to learn about computer animation when a 386 running MS Dos cost $5000. The way forward is always dark until someone lights it up. It might just as well have been Ray Wolf instead of Pixar.

I Got Married

Gentlemen, it's true. I got married. I didn't listen to the advice of my parents, friends and colleagues and got married to Jeu anyway.

The deal is that getting married is no joke and should be taken very seriously. Choosing and deciding who to spend the rest of your life with is the most important decision a man can make, so I took my time and after over a decade of being with with Jeu, I decided to make it official.

Let me be clear, I would not have married Jeu if I didn't truly feel love. Jeu provides me with consistent excitement, sexual satisfaction and knows how to keep the 'chase' exciting.

I've known Jeu since I was around seventeen years old and as the years passed became more involved, until I can't tell where the difference begins and ends with Jeu and I.

Jeu gets me.

Jeu allows for my mistakes.

Jeu is continually exciting.

I can travel with Jeu and still have fun, unlike past relationships.

Jeu doesn't require much, if any money at all. Jeu is so low maintenance that's it perfect for a tightwad like myself.

No matter how bad things get, Jeu always reminds me of what is possible in my life.

When my family, friends and everyone else involved in my life let me down, Jeu has always been there for me.

One of the best atributes of Jeu, is that I can take Jeu anywhere and it only enhances my experience.

Jeu is okay with me having an 'open relationship'.

Jeu is always there for me when I need to take time off and will still be there when I return.

Jeu is always providing me with opportunities to meet girls if I desire, so as you can see, is the perfect choice for marriage.

The greatest thing about Jeu is that the longer we're together, the better our relationship gets. The more I put into Jeu, the more I get in return. Unlike my other relationships, I really get a return on my investment.

I decided to tell you gentlemen first, because it's only right for me to be upfront and honest. Jeu has changed my life for the better and I will never leave. How could I? Until you find your own Jeu, you won't really know what it's like.

Another great quality about Jeu is that Jeu doesn't want kids, nor a big wedding. This is perfect for a gent who isn't big on having kids and would rather celebrate our marriage with a bottle of premium vodka, a pack of cigs, an 8-ball and a hotel room. Jeu is even open to bringing another girl or two into our celebration. Hell yes! What more could a man like me ask for?

Jeu is perfect. Jeu is a challenge, even after a decade of our relationship.

'Jeu', in case you haven't gotten it yet, is the French word for 'Game'.

Yes, I married game.

If you haven't heard of my latest book, check it out here.

Why White Knights Voluntarily Enslave Themselves To Women

February 13, 2014 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

I had always been baffled by white knights – men who saw it as their purpose in life to save every woman from the consequences of her own ineptitude. Like many others, I thought men want sex, and white knighting is a strategy some men use to get it. The baffling part was that I had never seen this strategy actually work – I never saw a man get to sleep with the woman he so passionately tried to save. Why would masses and masses of men try to get sex with a method that never actually gets them laid? Don't they realize their sexual strategy is not working?

In truth, the white knight is not after sex. Men of all ages and places have a deep desire to be valued, to be seen as honored members of their tribe. Men crave a reputation for being honorable and good, most acutely by their father. They will often go to great lengths to earn this honor and esteem.

In a patriarchal society masculine values predominate, values like courage, valor and virtue. A man's colleagues and teammates would be overwhelmingly male. To accrue honor, he proves his value to other men. Every step of the way, it is men who decide his fate, not women.

It is popular to say that women are the choosier sex, that it is women who do the choosing. Absent arranged marriages, yes, this is true. But only superficially so. In a patriarchy, viewing women as the choosers obscures more than it reveals. In a patriarchy, the attributes on which a woman is choosing a man were largely determined by other men. The woman prefers a man of high status, but it was other men who gave him that high status. Indeed, men even decide what confers status, whether it is athletic prowess in modern America or testing ability in Imperial China. In rewarding status, a woman's mating choices are captive to those men who confer status.

In a patriarchy, the say of women has no place in ordering men in the hierarchy of the tribe. Man's natural desire for honor means he must submit to the priorities of the men in his tribe, to acquire acclaim. Moreover, in more patriarchal times, women were closely guarded; they passed from the care of the father to the husband, with little freedom between. Her capacity for sins and missteps was limited, given the oversight of her male stewards.

We do not live in a patriarchy. We live in an age where traditional masculinity is taken to be broken, hurtful, antiquated – all in all, a hideous anachronism at best, a source of mass rape, murder and oppression at worst. Traditional femininity is reviled as well, in softer denunciations. We live in a time when women and their ways are declared to be morally superior. Ours is a society where women are the final arbiters of morality – it is they who decide who is good and who is evil. Women have conviction and men are convicts.

The white knight is an expression of this reality. On a deep level, he feels that it is women and women only who can grant him the honor he desires. When men condemn him, it is invariably the 'wrong kind' of men – their attacks don't lead the white knight to doubt himself. If anything, when men oppose the white knight, the white knight takes this as a sign that he is doing something right, because he has upset an opposing tribe – that of lotharios and misogynists. What he prizes is female endorsement, for it is only women who can say with authority that he is a man of honor, as he has been told all his life.

This dynamic is not limited to the sexes. One can see it happening in the field of race as well. Convince the masses that one race of people is wicked and morally degenerate, and the masses will assert that therefore this race has no say in what is right and what is wrong. And they will seek to forbid this wicked race of people from having the authority to pass judgment on itself, except to condemn themselves. In our society, whites fill this role, especially Christian whites, as did Jews in Nazi Germany or blacks in the Antebellum South. Not that these groups suffered equally, which is patently false, but patterns recur. And every time this dynamic arises, there are the sellouts among the group demonized, the race traitors, the house Negroes, the Kapos, the white knights, the men who seek to elevate themselves by denouncing their brothers, and collaborating with their greatest opponents for personal gain.

Be it with sex, race or some other distinction, when a man feels so inadequate as to seek honor from outside his tribe, from his sworn enemies, he makes himself a slave. He becomes beholden to those whom he appoints as master.

A man will stop white knighting when he stops viewing women as the arbiters of the good and tasteful. Perhaps women must not have any authority to judge men, and men would disregard their opinions entirely. From ancient Greece to ancient Israel, many civilizations of antiquity saw fit to deny women equality. When men feel they cannot accrue honor from a woman’s saying so, men will stop beseeching a woman to supply it.

The 8 Stages All Movements Go Through

February 13, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

I recently read Doing Democracy by Bill Moyers, which is about the universal stages every political or social movement goes through. This book is to political movements what Joseph Campbell's monomyth is to story.

These stages are critical for anyone interested in social change to understand. Often activists believe they have failed or are failing, when they are simply at an earlier stage. Each stage has clear goals needed to move on to the next stage, and knowing where you are will allow you to take right action and move the movement forward.

Key to this model is the premise that power comes from the people. Even in dictatorships, powerholders only govern with the consent of the people. The aim of the first SIX stages is simply getting a majority of the public on your side.

Below are the eight universal stages of all political movements.

Stage 1: Normal Times

Social movements begin when actual practices violate universally held values. For example, Americans have a shared value of fairness and the idea that every citizen has the right to vote, but Southern states in the 1960s frequently prevented black Americans from voting. These conditions made the area ripe for the civil rights movement to occur.

At stage one, things are politically quiet. The majority of the public does not know social problems exist or supports practices that reinforce the problem. The goal at this stage is simply to document the problem, begin to organize, and believe that social change is possible.

Stage 2: Prove Failure Of Official Institutions

Once you have low-level opposition. the goal is to prove the problem exists. At this stage, activists need to become experts, and begin building new organizations. Begin using normal channels for change and document the attempts of powerholders to thwart the process, to show the normal function of the present system violates public trust.

Yes that's right. The goal of this stage is to continually get shot down by the man. And document it.

Stage 3: Ripening Conditions

Before the social movement takes off, conditions must be right. For example, in the 1960s the United States was postitioning itself as the champion of freedom and democracy against communism, while mistreating it's black citizens, making it ripe for the civil rights movement.

To create the right conditions, the movement needs to put faces on the problem, and recruit a new generation of activists. Concerned about the stage two failure of change through mainstream methods, grassroots organizations spring up. At this stage it may seem like the problem is getting worse, since normal channels of change failed, but this worsening is what inspires the need for change.

Stage 4: Take Off

Stage four begins with a trigger event – a highly publicized public event that kicks off protest.

An example of a trigger event would be Rosa Parks refusing to leave her bus seat, triggering the civil rights movement, or the recent revelations of Edward Snowden, triggering privacy movements to end domestic spying.

Stage four is what most people think of when they think of social movements – protests, drama, seeing activists on the nightly news – not realizing the groundwork for this event was laid in the first three stages. At this stage, thousands begin taking spontaneous action to form new organizations and large protests occur.

The goal at this stage is to put the problem and the systems that allow it in the spotlight – and keep it there.

Stage 5: Perception of Failure

While the take off stage is exciting, it typically only lasts four months to two years. After this stage, it's easy for activists to believe they have failed, when in reality social change just takes a long time, sometimes even decades.

An example of this would be Russell Brand stating he doesn't think voting will change anything, despite the stage four trigger events of the economic collapse and Occupy Wall Street convincing many Americans that the influence of money on the political process needs reform.

At this stage, activists become aware of the enormity of the problem, and many burnout, unable to switch to the skills required for stage six. Others believe non-violent methods have failed, and attempt actions damaging to the image of the movement.

Faced with the enormity of the problem, activists become aware of the need for a paradigm shift – that the old ways of thinking about the problem no longer work and a new system or way of thinking must be put in it's place.

Activists can skip this stage and move directly to stage six by training themselves with the skills required and acknowledging the massive successes they've already achieved.

Stage 6: Majority Public Opinion

Now that a majority of the public agrees with the movement, the movement needs a grand strategy. At this stage, political action committee's and non-profit organizations become more important.

In order to accomplish this, activists have to learn new skills. Each movement requires different roles. Early on, rebels are important, but at this stage change agents become important. The movement needs people who know how accomplish their goals within the system.

Many rebels don't make it out of stage five and move on to other movements. Those that do have to learn new skills. Re-trigger events may occur, creating stage four style protests, but they will be short-lived as the movement shifts from rebels to change agents.

At this stage, activists don't just promote political goals but a paradigm shift – a different way of seeing the problem. Feminism, environmentalism, fascism, gay rights, abolitionism, and the American Revolution all created a different way of seeing the world in response to the problems they faced.

Stage 7: Success

Stage seven occurs when using the majority public opinion and the tide turns against the powerholders. This stage often begins with a dramatic event leading to a showdown, like when brutal attacks on civil rights activists forced President Johnson to pass the Voting Rights Act.

Stage seven has three possible end games. The first is that powerholders have a dramatic last stand, fighting right up until the last moment. Think the governor of Alabama blocking the doorway of integrated schools in the face of national law.

The other is a victorious retreat, where powerholders lose on an issue, but reverse their policies and say that they won. Don’t expect anyone in the government to admit they lost the war on drugs, as the marijuana legalization movement sweeps across the country.

The third is attrition, where powerholders hold out until one of the two above outcomes occurs. Success is often slow and quite at this stage, as state by state, law by law, the movement gets it’s goals met.

Stage 8: Continuing The Struggle

At this stage, the movement needs to guard against backlash. The movements success could be a wakeup call for opposing elements in society. For example, Roe v. Wade led to the pro-life movement against it.

Backlash is inevitable. The rise of Nazi movement lead to the backlash of the Zionist movement and the creation of the state of Israel. The Zionist movement has led to the backlash of the Palestinian movement. In many ways, the manosphere is a backlash movement against feminism. History is continual change, and each movement gives rise to new ones.

At this stage the movement also has the capacity for real social change and promoting other issues. With the new paradigm other movements can come from it. The civil rights movement has created large lasting organizations constantly bringing new issues that concern black Americans to powerholders to affect change.

At every stage the major pitfall is feeling powerless and believing social change is not possible. The key refrain in this book is that you have the power, and the people can change. It just takes time, and being aware where you are in the process.

Many have said the manosphere has failed and the men's rights movement has failed. Both movements are at stage three. Normal channels of change have failed, and new organizations are being formed. Arguably, the book Men On Strike, ABC 20/20 debacle and recent viral articles from this site are trigger events, putting us in stage four or five, but conditions are still ripening.

If you are interested in taking a leadership role in the manosphere I HIGHLY recommend reading this book. There is a lot I have not covered. The book leans left, but the lessons are useful for anyone interested in change.

If I have one criticism of the book it's that the book failed to explore negative movements like the rise of the Nazi Party in Germany, the Communism in Russia, or the Ayatollah in Iran.

As Jack Donovan might say, just because they aren't "good activists" doesn't mean the members of these movements aren't good at being activists. Studying them as movements would allow us to understand them and see how attempts for social change can be used for evil.

Knowing the eight stages allows you to know where you are, and what the next action is.

Next week, I'll be posting examples of movements that have gone through the eight stages on my blog. Good luck, and let's move forward.

Have A List And Check It Twice

February 14, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

That frustration of going grocery shopping without a list is immense. You end up buying things you don't need nor like due to pretty packaging and product placement within the store. I have quite a few things in my fridge I would never have decided to buy if I thought ahead. I'm sure someday there will be a use for that jar of orange marmalade sitting behind the can of coffee. The same concept can be applied to picking up woman. if you don't know what you like before you go out, you could get something you really don't need or want.

I've heard many stories of men making excuses for why they selected a woman that does not meet their ideal. Usually some issue like fatness, drug abuse, poor hygiene is glossed over by things like "she has a good personality". This is unacceptable.

Thinking on the fly without a plan is not recommended. Like buying that pound of onions at the grocery store because they were on sale, some things that seem nice might not be what you really want or need. That art history major with the cat called "Trotsky" can be a good selection for Sunday fun but definitely not for a wife.

How does a man know what he wants? He thinks about it before hand. One should list the features and attributes in woman he is seeking. He should also ascertain where women with these features are located. He must also be realistic in his desires. Always shoot for the stars, but if one is not bringing anything to table, he should not be demanding the world. This isn't some cosmopolitan wish list for lonely hearts but a method to cut down on wasted effort and time. The objective is to keep it simple and to adhere to the objective standards created.

What features and attributes should a man look for a woman? Well it depends what he wants to woman for. It also depends on his personal tastes. It also depends on how bold he is. Allow me give you a few example shopping lists:

A woman for afternoon delight:

- Appears attractive ☐
- Friendly ☐
- Not crazy ☐

A woman for semi regular status:

- Appears attractive ☐
- Discrete ☐
- Friendly ☐
- No drama ☐
- Not crazy ☐
- Pleasant talking ☐

A woman for regular status:

These are merely simple examples of features one could look for in a woman. A man can make his lists to his own a specific needs and wants. It is important that he's objective though. No making exceptions for undesirable woman because he gets distracted by the pretty packaging such as yoga pants. Also intoxication should not be used to short circuit this decision making process. The discipline comes into play when women are rejected immediately when they do not meet the criteria. This prevents wasting time and money. Because for every undesirable woman you waste time texting with, hearing about her nonsense stories, or playing the "whatever reason she's not having sex tonight game", focus could have been on more productive ventures. The system only works if you actually reject people that do not meet your criteria. It doesn't work if you decide to take home that woman with the herpes sores on her mouth because you are having a dry spell.

Every Man Should Have A Best Friend

February 14, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

> I will never forget the day that we picked you out from your litter. Amidst 9 yellow Labrador retriever puppies, you were the one marked with the hint of light blue on your tail. Your two brothers were marked with red and black tails.
> Your red-tailed brother was terrified of my family and would hardly come near us. The black-tailed one was quite the explorer – as soon as he was let loose in the entire yard he was off like a bullet. He hardly greeted us. You, though, were the perfect mix. You were happy to play and socialize with us, but also spent a little time off exploring. Mom, Dad, Sis, and I made the unanimous decision that you were the one.
> We decided to call you Toby.

Toby became a part of my life as an 8-week-old rambunctious puppy when I was about nine years old.

He passed away due to cancer last week.

In the week since then, I've had time to reflect on all of the great times I had growing up with him. The pain of losing my childhood dog is undoubtedly one of the saddest things I've gone through in my life; far worse than a girl not texting me back or flaking on our date. I guess his last lesson to me was to make me look at things from a big-picture standpoint.

Thanks, boy.

Having a dog in your life can be one of the most underrated joys in life. Every man, circumstances permitting, should have man's longtime best friend by his side. They will be there through thick and thin.

Discipline and Responsibility

If you want children someday, I've heard a dog is a great way to get your feet wet. Truthfully, if you can't take good care and keep a four-legged friend happy, you probably are not fit for a child.

With that being said, watching your dog progress from hyperactive, pillow-eating terror to well-trained loyal friend is extremely rewarding. You, as the owner, are solely responsible for their upbringing, social skills, and lifestyle. Doing a good job of it demonstrates that you are a responsible human being yourself.

A man can take a lot of pride in a well-behaved and well-trained companion by his side. It makes you feel good about yourself, as well as impressing other people in your life.

An Undying Loyalty And Selflessness

I think the story that most touches me about Toby is when I was 17, and my family's house burned down. When my mom screamed at me to get downstairs, I expected there to be a small BBQ fire I could take care of. Instead, the entire window was ablaze. I remember grabbing Toby by the neck and dragging him out of the house while pushing Mom ahead. I remember Mom sobbing into my arms as we waited for the firetrucks to come, watching the home I had grown up in burn to the ground, as well as all of the memories with it.

Toby just sat there wagging his tail and wiggling around in any attempt to do what he could to help. He looked up at us with big brown eyes. He knew there was nothing that could be done, but that he would do anything for us if it came down to it.

Understand that once a dog has bonded to you, and you have been there for them, they will do anything for you. They will follow you right off that cliff, if you so chose. I hate to say it, but in today's world of pettiness, a dog is by far the best friend you will ever have.

They will never stab you in the back, will always listen (and therefore, won't talk too much like some bitches), and if they're really good; they will even bring you a beer at the end of a hard day.

Alas, Toby never mastered the fetching beer from the fridge trick.

Companionship

As said before, a dog will follow you to the end of the Earth and back if that's where you lead them. This also means they are more than happy to do whatever you want to do, or participate in any hobbies you have, without complaint.

Do you like to surf? Find a dog that loves to swim.

Do you like to mountain bike or hike? Find a dog that likes to run.

Do you like to sit on your ass and watch TV all day? Well, there's a breed for that, too.

A loyal furry friend will cherish each and every moment with you, no matter what you are partaking in; whether it be playing Call of Duty or lounging on the beach with crystal clear waters.

Intelligence

> When I moved to San Diego at 18 you had slowed down considerably, but still had some youth left in you. Every time I came home, you'd greet me with a wag of the tail and look at me like I owed you a surplus of treats for all of the months that I had missed. As the years moved on and I visited less and less, I could tell that I was becoming more and more of a distant memory to you. You become more senile and…kookier. I realized I couldn't fault you for this, as memories get harder to recall as time moves on for humans and dogs alike. It made me so happy though, when I stepped into the door for Christmas just over a month ago, when you wiggled up to me and looked at me…your way of demanding that I feed you a biscuit.
> I just knew though, that was the last time I was going to come home for a visit and you would be there to greet me. I just knew.
> My last night home, you remember I laid next to you for a good half hour, feeding you multiple treats and petting your head. I was so sad. At one point, you looked at me. It seemed like there was a sadness in your eyes, too. I can't really explain it, and people may think I'm crazy, but there was a moment where I think we both understood that this was our last goodbye. That you wouldn't be there to greet me the next time I walked in the door from San Diego.
> I remember nearly crying, like I am now as I write this.
> It was like you knew.

Some dogs (breed dependent) are incredibly smart. Toby was one of them. The day before he died, he was in bad shape. He was unable to get up without help from my parents. He wouldn't eat, or drink. My mom told me how she sat in the backyard with him for two hours in pitch-black darkness, telling him over and over again that my sister was on the way home from college to see him.

He held on until she made it home and then passed away in his sleep that night.

I've had several friends, the day after they returned home for spring break from college, who had their dogs die. There is no doubt in my mind that you held on just long enough to see her, and give her closure on that part of her childhood.

For that, thank you.

Are dogs going to cure world hunger and solve our economic problems? No – but if you look close enough at your furry friend, they might have some of the answers within them.

For an intelligent dog, I think it's sound general advice to stay away from teacup or purse sized dogs. Be a man.

Goodbye, Toby

I have nothing more to say other than I can't say enough as to how much you enriched my life and meant to me from the time I was 9. I'm approaching birthday #23 now. When I had no friends in elementary and middle school, you didn't care. When I was fat, overweight, and pathetic, you didn't care. It didn't matter what problem I was dealing with at that point in my life; it was all the same to you. Always the same wiggle, wag of the tail, and biscuit-demanding face.

Thank you for everything, Toby. I will miss you and always cherish my childhood growing up with you.

If I have kids one day, I can only hope they get to grow up with a dog like you.

I love you bud.

8 Confessions Of A Beach Resort Worker

February 14, 2014 | by Cameron Carson | Link | Original Link

1. We’re paid in sex

By your daughters, your girlfriends, your fiancées, your wives, and other members of staff. Resort workers put up serious weekly numbers. Exotic beaches trigger single women’s slut instincts. If she arrives alone its almost too easy. If she arrives with a partner it takes shockingly little effort to get her separated.

Resort pay typically ranges from poor to abysmal so access to a continual stream of cute guests is seen as a crucial benefit if indeed not the main one. This arrangement is fully condoned by management; resorts know they can get away with lower salaries if workers are “wifey-ing up.”

2. The innocent activities and games we play are far from innocent

They're for our benefit. During activities and excursions I have guests introduce themselves to each other with names and backgrounds. Innocent questions like hometown and favorite Disney movie are interspersed with more ulterior ones like stop light color (relationship status), celebrity crush (mate preference) and tattoo ownership (slut indicator). We use this information to more efficiently select targets. Kickball, volleyball, red rover and something called "the beach game" turn X-rated quickly. We'll make up rules that may seem spontaneous but rest assured they aren't—they're designed to get women naked and hooking up.

I know one particularly well-endowed co-worker who had an effective tactic with couples and large groups. First, he would take them out on the boat to play a few drinking games. After the women were sufficiently inebriated he would institute a clothing-off policy in order to continue playing. Since the men were out on a boat with nowhere to go they had little choice but to play along or be deemed pussies by the rest of the boat. They would stand around timidly with their comparatively small penises while the women swooned over his massive member. One would always come find him later that night.

3. We are pathetically grateful for tips

As mentioned previously the financial component of our compensation is rarely much above poverty wages thus rendering us childishly appreciative for laughably meager sums. I still remember my first tip: two friendly Canadian guys handed me the equivalent of 5 dollars after a guest activity. I proceeded to introduce them to every cute girl in the hotel until they clicked with some hotties. I had the bartender send them free bottom shelf shots at the first lull in conversation. They didn't sleep alone for the rest of their stay.

Bartenders write ad nauseam about the wisdom of taking care of servers; I would argue resort staff are a better allocation of resources because it takes a much smaller sum to impress and our ability to enable a bang is better (we have a more fun and intimate relationship with guests and we're free to wander the resort to introduce people and take groups up to rooms, secluded balconies, staff quarters, etc.).

4. Don't mess with the staff

We can ruin your vacation in any number of ways. This is sound advice for all customer-employee interactions but nowhere else have I experienced such a profound influence over customer experience. If you are a dickhead I can make sure you won't get laid. If you are an entitled little princess I will go out of my way to make you feel unwanted and humiliated. This can range from the morally neutral (unfavorable seating/pairings during meals and activities) to the morally wrong (subtly letting it be known to the other guests that you are a creep) to the technically illegal (fighting you when I am drunk enough to not be held responsible).

Because pay is so low, management has little weight to reprimand its workers so more often than not complaints will fall on deaf ears. By accepting the unusual payment arrangement management has acquiesced a degree of authority over worker-guest interactions. Unless what I do is blatant, unambiguous and against the rules, management will most likely turn a blind eye to my behavior. They'd rather keep me hidden until you leave and let me continue unhindered then find and train a new employee. Because 99% of customers leave satisfied this is a deal they are more than happy to accept.

5. In spite of what I just wrote, we actually love the guests

I can only speak for Western employees typically in positions like hotel reception, surf instructors, tour guides, and so on (not housekeeping or kitchen). The guests are the reason we're here. People at beach resorts are unsurprisingly a congenial lot and it's impossible to dislike such a pleasant demographic. I've helped dozens of cool guests get laid, both guys and girls. In my estimate 90% of guests are great, 9% are neutral and maybe 1% are assholes. It's only that 1% that would ever get detrimental treatment.

6. We use code words for the guests that can be quite illuminating

Sharks. Dolphins. Boppers. Cherries. Obviously many professions use code to describe customers: car salesmen have "tire-kickers" (non-serious buyers) and flight attendants have "spinners" (people who can't find their seats), but due to close customer proximity and our relative youthfulness it's more prevalent in this profession than others. It would be useless to explain actual terms because they vary from place to place but if you happen to overhear a worker speaking cryptically pay attention. It's really not hard to decipher and you will benefit from their seasoned assessment. Also useful for locations: "nowhere," "the dungeon," "the bat cave." If you know where we're talking about then you will know where the party will be.

7. Certain places produce sluts and certain places attract them

We get to meet large numbers of women from all over the world and develop fairly accurate mosaics of slutiness based on where she's from and where she chooses to travel. There are a few combinations that consistently produce rates at the high end of the bell curve:

- American women studying abroad (bonus points for those who choose South America)
- Southeast Asian girls who choose tourist hotspots (Bangkok, Phuket, Bali, Boracay)
- American women who frequent the Caribbean.

It should come as no surprise that America is ground zero for whores, and it becomes easy to see why Caribbean guys are so laid back—they have a never-ending supply of rich white girls flying down for sex. Side note: I only know one girl who studied abroad in Africa and she was almost a school-wide joke for the amount of dick she took. With such a small sample I can't draw conclusions but if you have wider experience with this demographic please get in touch, I'm curious if my suspicions are true.

8. Language is the only useful education the American education system provides for men

Planeloads of cute little things from all over the world arrive weekly during the season and if you only speak English you are at a major disadvantage. Being American is not impressive in any way to many foreigners and is in fact often detrimental. Europeans, Asians and South Americans have seen too many of our drunken frat boys and whoring, slutty co-eds to have any respect for us just off the bat. That is until you tell them about the drink specials and ask them how their flight was in their own language. Then suddenly the table of pouty, teenage dreamboats straight off the plane from Madrid is at your full attention. Your value has just increased tenfold and eight eager little smiles greet you whenever you walk up to them. Virginities will be taken before the trip home.

The model quality Prada-toting 18-year-olds from Paris open up after you drop some French and wine knowledge. And by open up I mean they open their vaginas. If I could do college all over again I would opt for the highest-level language courses available and switch out my electives for a second language.

Not every resort is like this but the crazier ones certainly are. If you haven't worked in one I would recommend you give it a try for a season. Also, I wouldn't advise guys to allow their girlfriends to go to these places alone. If you do accompany her, don't go to bed early if she's staying up.

5 Pieces Of Advice For Men Who Are Tired Of Being Beta

February 15, 2014 | by shadapar | Link | Original Link

I'm 39 years old, engaged to a woman I've been with for five years, reasonably happy, and I have 18 month old daughter. My fiancé is 27 years old. She's 5'7″ and 120 pounds. She's in shape, and if you didn't see her with our daughter, you'd never know she had a child. To be perfectly honest, I've never slept with a woman older than 28. Yes, I stay in shape. Yes, I can carry on conversation. No, I don't talk to my shoes.

When those women chased me, I simply had enough sense not to say no. If a woman wants to fuck, she will fuck. It might as well be you if you're unattached. Those are my bona fides, and the reason I feel I have a certain authority to say what I'm about to say. I am here because it is one of the very few websites that speaks out on a variety of issues with absolutely no bullshit. Patchfur's recent article is a perfect example.

I'm also writing because of something that happened last week. I met up with a longtime (male) friend for late night coffee and conversation. At one point during the night, a young friend of his came in. The lad was absolutely devastated by his recent lack of success with a particular young woman. Now, I've never personally been a fan of the whole "red pill blue pill" terminology, but in this case the young lad was so blue pill he could have been a smurf. What, specifically, can we as older (perhaps wiser) men do to wake up those who are willing to listen?

Here are five "go to" points for young men trying desperately to improve themselves and escape the ball-less hell modern society is attempting to force on them…

1. Society has led young men to believe they have to ‘fight’ to get a woman.

The whole concept of ‘fighting’ in this sense is false in that it has absolutely nothing to do with getting a woman, and everything to do with being foolish. If she isn’t responsive in a reasonable amount of time, take your balls and go home. If you want to ‘fight’ for a woman then learn how to ‘fight’ correctly. The following is straight from “The Fundamentals of Marine Corps Leadership”:

“Know yourself and seek self-improvement”

“Be technically and tactically proficient”

When it comes to fighting, few have the reputation of the United States Marine Corps. Notice however, that neither of those two points has anything to do with another person and everything to do with you. Being technically and tactically proficient means knowing when, where, and how to apply yourself, to apply your skills, and how to achieve maximum effect. It also means doing it right every time. Quite simply put, if you don’t have the time to do it right, then do you have the time to do it over? Make these two points your religion, worship them daily.

2. Stop getting friend zoned.

When I first started dating my fiancé she said to me once: “Sometimes I feel like you’re the only real friend I have. Everyone else seems so two-faced.” I looked her straight in the eye and calmly, gently, but firmly said the following: “Honey, I’m not your friend. Friends do things for each just because they’re friends. I am not your friend. I want something. I want you.”

Men get friend zoned, because they allow themselves to be friend zoned.

Do. Not. Allow. It.

The thing to realize is that you have the power. She wants the friend. She wants the safety that society has told her comes without commitment. She wants the half-boyfriend she can emotionally dump on without paying back in to the emotional bank. Do not allow it. If she won’t accept it, take your balls and go home.

3. No one has any more control over you than you give them.

This isn’t strictly speaking ‘game’ but it’s important. Many women will attempt to manipulate you to some extent. Yes, this is bad, but it’s not world ending. Most women don’t even realize they’re doing it—it’s so deeply ingrained in our society. Indulge her if you choose. Do not indulge her if you choose. Just realize that it is your choice. Practice saying ‘No.’ Don’t let her be the man. Amen.

4. The woman you’re after is often swarmed by betas, but don’t compete.

Do something to provoke her interest, then withdraw. Repeat as necessary. If you’re trying to break out of your ‘white knighthood’ and you need that fighting metaphor, think of it as guerrilla war. Make a rapid, fast, and effective attack and then just as rapid withdrawal. It won’t matter how many men swarm her at that point. The one man she’s thinking about is the one who is not paying attention to her. Sad but true.

5. Stop caring if you get laid or not.

Seriously, just stop caring. Several years back there was an attractive half-Asian girl who would come into the coffeehouse. Every guy in the place was trying to get her into bed. Except me. I might have been interested, but I had a new casual hookup at the time (a nice Russian girl). I wasn’t willing to fight the land war in Asia. So I avoided the drama.

One day she approached me and asked if we could talk. It seems every guy she knew in the place was telling her to avoid me because I would just try to fuck her. I found this ironic, as every guy telling her this was trying to fuck her. She knew it. I knew it. I laughed and told her quite simply that she was a beautiful girl, she seemed like a nice person, and if she wanted to go back to my place and fuck we could do that right now. Or not, but when she decided that it was time, well, that was entirely up to her. We ended up talking in the coffeehouse for several hours that night. We ended up talking even longer later that night.

Never apologize for liking sex. Never apologize for wanting women. Never try to hide it behind a false face. Throw your dick on the table (not literally) and tell them to take it or leave it. But if you listen to nothing else, listen to this: stop caring if you get laid or not. Stop caring what the betas say. The more they try to shame you, the better your image appears. Use it to your advantage. Without realizing it, every beta in that place had painted me as a man women loved to fuck. Every warning against me, it just made her wonder what other women saw in me. The fact I could carry on a conversation. The fact that I made no denials. All of this increased her fascination with me. Do not apologize, ever, for what you want and like. Always be consistent. By not caring if you get laid or not, most women will seek to make you care about it. Always talk to the woman first as a woman, and her vagina will follow. Why? Because she will want you to care about it. Don’t.

Is The Pursuit of Truth A Mask For Negativity?

February 15, 2014 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Love and hate are the strongest emotions a human can feel. Covering a wide spectrum of intensity these two emotions can account for some of the most important decisions one will make in their lifetime. A couple deep in love will marry and reproduce, a man gets revenge through murder, a tumblr feminist becomes indignant at words on a screen. These emotions and their motivations are usually crystal clear. More often than not these passions are our will acted upon the world. Everybody thinks they are important, everyone wants acceptance, everyone needs the love of another, and so on. When these conditions are not met we act out; we manifest hate. When these needs are met we manifest love. Why is it though that is so much easier to hate than to love?

A friend was recently raving about the new HBO breakout hit: True Detective. As if reading from a script he argued the series was the realest and most gritty show since Breaking Bad. Having finally caught up with the series I would agree. The show is very compelling, it seems real, but what is real? What is the truth?

Skimming the internet, the character most viewers identify with is that of Rust Cohle, played by Matthew McConaughey. Cohle is the distillation of every alcoholic, tortured soul, 'real', pessimistic and 'deep' character of the genre. He is the penultimate speaker of the dirty truths. He is he who says what we are all thinking. His foil is Martin Hart, a more traditional family man. Hart understands that there is more to the truth than what is rational or what can be easily explained.

A great example of the two characters' interplay is in the following scene. They visit a traveling tent sermon to follow a possible lead. Rust believes religion is a fraud, that logically it makes no sense, therefore its followers are stupid and worthless. Martin criticizes Rust saying "for a guy who sees no point in existence, you still fret about it a lot." Martin believes that religion gives people a sense of community, so what if they are believing in 'fairy tales' they get which the pessimist cannot, the positive connectedness felt by inclusion in a group and a set of morals they believe to be just.

Why is it though that truths shrouded in pessimism are able to elicit such a positive reaction from viewers? Rust Cohle is not the man any of us would want to be friends with, but the man which lives inside our heads. The one which tells us that our displeasure with the world is really truth. This pessimistic notion of truth is — more often than not — just a facade for anger or self-loathing. Real, objective, truth is hard to find even in the internet age. Charlatans can peddle their snake oil promises of eternal happiness in the space right next to the man who uses not only facts, but the broader implication of these facts to help others with their lives. Even still one must take in all information with a grain of salt and critically think when assessing its effectiveness with one's own experiences.

I always used to find myself judging other people, thinking I was better then them, smarter than them, but am I really? One may wonder who's dick their co-workers had to suck to land that job because they're barely literate mongoloids who couldn't perform a task correctly if their life depended on it, but I bet those co-workers think the same thing about you.

Do we perceive the world more negatively than it actually is so that it fits our narrative of how things should be, when in reality they are just rationalizations for our own short-comings? Why is it so much easier to accept something negative as truthful than admire the inherent beauty of the world? Would we be better off if we focused on the positives we do have — like the beauty of nature — rather than the things we don't have or can't change like the way society is, women with bad attitudes, or fat people?

Is Anil Dash A Sexist Prick Who Objectifies Women?

February 16, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Anil Dash is back at it again, this time taking on people who disagree with his policy against only retweeting members of one sex.

A picture of his claims, as made by a devoted follower:

His list:

> "You should just retweet the best people!" I do.

> "This is reverse sexism!" No, if I were calling for a few centuries of you being treated as property and said you shouldn't be able to vote, that would be reverse sexism.

Does he know what the definition of sexism is? Further, women weren't treated as property, as people who do that are narcissists. Men weren't narcissists back then in America, they were obsessive types. When Freud first starting his practice in the late 1800's, he noted obsessive behaviors: compulsions to chop wood, put in long hours on the job, intensely worried with the quality of their work. They weren't complaining about internal emptiness or reflexive rage.

Further, Dash inadvertently makes a Eurocentric observation about voting. I assume he is talking about America, but since he doesn't specify a particular nation and since men like him assume universality of his ideological stances (narcissism), he assumes that voting rights matter in every country. It is only a recent world-wide event that countries have elections — not that many of them matter. He seems to be one of those idiots that think women didn't have the right to vote until the 19th Amendment was passed. Wrong. Women could vote for everything in Wyoming. Virtually all states already had voting rights for women at the local level (hint, the most important level) and for state representatives and for state senators and governors. As for the federal level, men couldn't vote for their own Senators until 1913, 7 years before women got the right to vote at the federal level. Further, some states as late as the Civil War still barred men who didn't own land from voting. As usual, the meta-narrative spun by progressives falls apart precisely reality doesn't fit prefabricated notions of clear-cut oppression.

> "You're just doing this to get laid." Oh, son. You know what I do to get laid? I treat women as humans while being super smart and attractive. This is a trick that works really well, so I've kept doing it solely for my wife's benefit.

[image]

Let me get this straight, bro. Your success with women stems from this idea that you treat women as humans, unlike those other sub-human scum you feel so reflexively superior towards? He doesn't realize that he claims he isn't a narcissist….while implicitly admitting he has issues with narcissism. Odds are, Dash plays the "Michael Scott" version of game with him whip-sawing between brief moments of perceived omnipotence to slavish subordination to women. He acts out his superiority complex on men who "act out" what he wants to do with women: boss them around, lord over them and treat them like little more than a soiled doormat.

Further his claim that narcissism doesn't appeal to women is incredibly misguided. The "Dark Triad" of male attractiveness to women is this: narcissism, Machiavellianism and impulsivity (or sometimes referred to as psychopathy). Guys like Dash don't understand that women don't turn to media for truth, but for comfort. Just because a bunch of women are leaning in and nodding along in a discussion about how they just really, really, really want a nice guy to buy them some over-priced shrimp at Red Lobster doesn't mean it's truth. By challenging this alleged ideal women claim to want, he gets to live out his fantasies of his superior attractiveness to women in his head and his sense of superiority over other men – especially white men.

> "Are you going to start retweeting men again?" Probably not? I don't feel like I've missed out on anything.

Truth be told, antics like this are a dare. He is daring his followers and/or detractors to challenge him. Since it's Twitter and his rebuttals on his blog or around the Internet are either mindless fluff pieces meant to appeal to the clique (what, you disagree!? You must be one of them!!! Yeah, I hate binaries, too) or painfully long and needlessly rambling posts that are more appealing to the crowd.

Before I break this degenerate down, check out this tweet, referencing a movie called "The Shape of Things," which — oddly enough — I have actually seen.

> But even beyond the reveal, the whole exercise… LaButian. You took human beings and turned them into performance art.

This fawning Twitter fan is referencing that Dash's 2013 New Year's resolution was…to only retweet women all year. You know, so women get a voice on a media already dominated by women. Amazing. What an admirable man. Instead of committing to personal change, he embarked on the courageous and dangerous task of only retweeting women for a year. Misogyny be damned, on a platform intended for women, he was going to provide them a voice. Of course, through his Twitter. It's not about him, remember. He even mentions that nobody even commented on this until he posted about it. Ah, what a brilliant LaButian masterstroke! We were so fooled about your intentions, you only awakened us with your scintillating insight into your courageously lionhearted desire to provide women a voice on media designing with them as the target demo.

> Beyoncé grant me the strength to resist getting lunch at the Popeye's at this airport I've been living at for 7 hours.

Any man, at any point in his life, who has made a reference to a female — much less a female idolized by women — in this sort of sense has no self-respect. What man wishes a woman would give him strength, much less look up to said woman? You may respect your mother or other women in your life, but they are not aspirational symbols in your life. Unless, of course, you aspire to be more…while doing nothing to be that person.

Men like Dash could be MRA's and play the whole "men are oppressed in ways" and use that as a bridge from their own psychological inability to grow to abstract ideological postures. However, his liberal and feminist approaches necessitate that he must pretend he has an enormous amount of male privilege. He burns some of it off by race trolling, but he knows that his "friends" would never let him off the hook for his original sin of male privilege. So, since he is straight, educated and ticks off every other marker of privilege, the spotlight is on him to prove that he isn't some male misogynist.

As expected, he takes up the feminist mantle as it provides him a good bit of cover to avoid the irreversible hammer of being deemed a "privilege denier" by his "friends." Progressives like him exclusively deal in binaries, so he needs to flip the script to avoid the banhammer. Sure, he is not white but he has to realize that progressive politics and websites are for white women. He has to backstop his possession of a penis. As we see with just about any male feminist, he just joins the anti-male chorus.

Warren Farrell talked about his feminist days in the 1970's when he would exorcise males for their deficiencies as women defined them. When he exhorted women to confront their own issues, they left the building with prejudice. He realized that feminism was only about women bitching about men. Of course, government and corporations helped fuel this and is — currently — stacking cash because of this.

Dash is just a man in suspended animation. With his significant Internet presence, he can only exist as a race troll and a mindless "benefactor" of women. He has painted himself into a corner — maybe he likes that — but he is nothing but an Indian who bitches about the color of his skin while being richer than the vast majority of his fellow Indians. Further, he whines interminably about men, but what does he gain from pretending all men are beasts? He isn't a heterosexual female, not even a gay man. The only tangible benefit he gets is white, heterosexual female approval from him validating their existential disappointment with the men in their life.

Reading enough of Dash's work reveals his posture vis-a-vie men is an act, an act he has had to learn to appease his audience. He doesn't get why so many women need to paint men as violent, degraded oppressors. He uses the typical feminist argument of bringing up emotionally infused "points:"

"Yeah, BUT, women couldn't own property at some undefined point in the past." "Actually, they could, they just couldn't be married. Plus, many women owned property jointly with their husbands." "GRRR…typical misogyny apologist!" "You really should share your insights on Twitter! Anil Dash will retweet it!"

Dash is nothing more than a stereotypical insecure Indian man. Stripped of his traditional culture of India, he bathes in the egocentric culture of America. He recognizes that we are reflexively intimidated by success (privilege) and recognizes the inherent meaningless of most American ideological movements – but only subconsciously. He engages in toothless acts like only retweeting women on Twitter to pretend he is doing something, anything in a society caught in the dense swamp of inaction. His guilt over his meaningless acts is cloaked in his incessant rhetoric over its importance. If he truly believed it was important, he wouldn't need hoards of qualifying and affirming tweets about its importance.

Anil Dash is a man with nothing to stand for but the approximations of being a man. Like any good narcissist, he steps as close as he can to reality as he can without actually having to dip a toe into it. He observes reality as close as he can without engaging in it personally. As per his claims, maybe he does have sex with his wife, but both are clearly avoiding true sexual attraction and only simulating it. True sexual congress with a real woman terrifies Dash and I assume the reverse is true for Dash's wife.

Men like Dash are the true misogynists – the men terrified of women and their power while being reflexively worshipful of them in needlessly subordinate ways. They support women's rights simply because they have a conflicting desire to emasculate themselves while also seeking to dominate women outright in ways that would make E.J. James blush. Men like Dash are not men at all – no, not at all. They exist as approximations of what they could or want to be, all the while worshiping their female objects from afar while simultaneously harboring nasty impulses against them.

What did Dash learn this year? That his Twitter followers click through links because they are interested in the content, not because of the author's sex.

Congrats, Dash. You found out that people click through links because of the title, not the sex of the author (which they usually don't know by clicking through). You ignored many, many great thinkers that are male while retweeting a population that primarily tweets about fashion, celebrities and makeup. Of the women you retweeted, you didn't retweet serious pieces by women, but fluff pieces blaming "misogyny," "racism" and "homophobia" for an individual woman's issues in life. How bold. When did you link to a woman who analyzed feminism in light of the principles of Austrian economics? I bet you missed that.

You had your year Dash. It wouldn't surprise me that you never felt a shiver in your finger to retweet a male tweet. I bet you have internalized your own belief that you are right there in the gender trenches with women and that you are just one of the terribly oppressed gang. Your intense identification with women speaks volumes about how you see yourself.

What does it matter, really? You have all the love an insecure Indian man could expect from white women.

For now.

The Most Respected Men Know How To Fight

February 16, 2014 | by Viriato | Link | Original Link

Some years ago I read Starship Troopers, a science fiction novel written by Robert Heinlein, one of the great authors of the genre. The storyline was set in a utopian militaristic society, and was developed around the conflict between the Terran Federation (the ruling body of planet Earth) and a hostile alien race called the Arachnids. With this background Heinlein starts a philosophical journey, using the plot to debate many classic masculine themes like responsibility, sense of duty, honor, self-sacrifice and the source of authority.

I believe that one of the great ideas present in the book is contained in this quote:

> "Violence, the supreme authority from which all others are derived" – Robert Heinlein

Violence, or the ability to physically damage others, is the natural root of all authority and social dominance. Think of every politician that existed throughout history. Would any of them have in their power any amount of authority if they couldn't exert it through any kind of armed force (police, army, a crazy mob of supporters)? The original example of this is the caveman leader (history's first politician/dictator). Normally he was the best warrior of the group.

You can argue, "But many times we chose our leaders based on their ability to handle the economy." Yes, that's true, but the ability to handle the economy didn't give them the real authority. It gave them the compliance of people who were capable of exerting force (army, police force, etc), putting violence on their side, and because of that you accepted their orders even if you strongly disagreed with them.

Facing The Ultimate Consequences

Every interaction between two humans can lead to a physical escalation. Most people will flee when confronted with this possibility. This can limit our choices, because we don't act in such way that might spark a fight with another individual, even if that action leads to getting something we want.

Being ready to face the ultimate consequences if any situation goes wrong lets you take more risks, makes you more assertive and unconsciously increases your confidence around other people.

See that girl with the jock that you want to meet? Let's do it! Who gives a fuck if the jock tries to intervene? In the worst scenario I'll just punch my way out.

See that idiot in my social scene who's always mocking me and giving me a hard time? I'll give him shit. Did it hurt his feelings and now he's angry? Who gives a fuck? In the worst scenario I'll just punch my way out.

The examples above may seem exaggerated or taken directly from Fight Club, but let's be honest: how many times do we restrain ourselves from doing or saying something because we fear that situation might go wrong and escalate to a fight? True freedom of action in our society comes from knowing that no matter how worse a situation can get we will know how to fight our way out.

The effects of learning this skill can be felt in every human interaction that you have. You will be more outspoken and you will talk to others with more calm and confidence. Women and men will feel your change in body language. You will not let others talk you down, and people will think twice before double-crossing you or talking shit behind your back. A world of possibilities in human interactions will open before your eyes, as you will stay relaxed and secure about yourself no matter how bad it gets.

A Necessary Condition But Not A Sufficient One

I am not saying that learning fighting skills (or at least being willing to fight) will solely improve your social life dramatically. It's a necessary condition to become a true master of one's fate and socially dominant, but not a sufficient one.

Your belief system and general attitude towards life will also have an important role. The ability to fight will do nothing in terms of improving the life of a beta man. To make full potential of this skill, he must change his belief system and attitude first. But without the fighting skills he will never realize his true potential and become a dominant alpha.

Now relating this to my personal experience I can firmly say that every major alpha that I know are great fighters, or at least are willing to fight anyone. As an outcome of this they do whatever they want and are totally dominant in every social situation. Everyone knows that any challenge they might pose to their status might end up in a physical confrontation. As result you can say that their social position goes practically untouched as 99% of people prefer to avoid any kind of fights.

The Rugby Player

Living in a society where we are constantly hammered with the message “violence isn’t the solution to anything,” I was kind of skeptical about the value of force. But after reading Heinlein’s book, I started to notice a certain pattern in one of my closest friends, a tough guy with whom I had played rugby for most of my teenage years.

Every time we were in social situations together he would act erratic and unpredictable. He would mock everyone randomly. He would speak to every girl (even if she clearly was with some guy). Everything is possible for the sake of his amusement (he also got into lots of fights due to this behavior). He took some serious risks with random people and as I had this question dwelling in my mind I started asking him: “What if they get pissed off and start hitting you?” He consistently answered in a calmly manner “Well, if that happens I’ll punch my way out.” He simply wasn’t worried—he knew how to fight and was willing to do it.

As a result of his thrilling behavior, everybody I know loves him and tries to please him. Girls want to be around him because it’s exciting (and he surely knows how to capitalize on that). He dominates every social situation without effort because he isn’t scared of being challenged. He is ready to face the ultimate consequences. But how can we explain such character?

While growing up he attended to one of the most dangerous schools of our county. Reports of daily violence between students were common. He naturally had to adapt to this environment. Several years of serious disputes during recess taught him the skills of street fighting. And also inadvertently taught him how violence could help him stay at the top of the food chain in our human society. That was the source of his erratic behavior. The answer was always before my eyes, I just had been too brainwashed to see it. Afterwards I started noticing this pattern in my social circle, as I said before the major alphas of my social circle weren’t scared of the possibility of fighting.

One of my high school friends was a muscular and big framed guy who was also goofy, awkward and anti-social. He didn’t know how to fight and, as a product of our society, wasn’t willing to do it. In our senior year he got his ass kicked by a freshman and decided it was time for some boxing lessons (for self-defense purposes). After some time he became more outspoken, and started taking some risks socially. Two years into boxing he became a bulldozer with his hands. He doesn’t care about being called a goofball or a dork, because if someone mocks him he gets his ass kicked. He pursues fun with disregard to social conventions and no one condones him. When he is trying to pick up a random pretty girl, I pity the ever present random boyfriend that tries to intervene.

Violence Has Always Been Around And Always Will Be

Since I realized the importance that violence will always assume in our daily lives (and society as a whole) as the natural root of authority I started taking boxing lessons in a nearby gym. Not being able to cope with violence restrained me. This personal admission required my ego to be put aside, but it was true: the possibility of getting into trouble dissuaded me from lots of actions. I wasn't a fighter before and I'm still far from being good at it, but starting this journey gave me insight into my limitations in social interactions, and how I could work over them. Every time some new acquaintance becomes aware of my pleasure for boxing training I see the expression of doubt on their faces: "Maybe this guy can't be easily pushed around".

In conclusion, learning how to fight can be a liberating experience. It gives you the unique confidence you need to become a dominant man. Even for the accomplished player, fighting skills will open a world of possibilities that were unthinkable before.

The Difference Between The Nice Guy, The Asshole, And The Alpha Male

February 16, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

In the manosphere, there are typically two defined sects of men: white knights and red-pillers.

While this division has value, I find there to be three types of men: the nice guy, the asshole, and the alpha male. And these archetypes resemble the above to a certain extent. The white knight matches up with the nice guy, for example.

However, the red-piller can be broken down into the alpha and the asshole. They both have a more realistic view of the world than the white knight. And they both will be more successful as a result. But they aren't the same. Confidence is the distinguishing trait.

The alpha realizes that he can only rely on himself, he has to take what he wants, and women aren't divine goddesses. And so does the asshole, for the most part. But the alpha is confident and self-assured. He loves himself, and everything he does reflects this love. The asshole, on the other hand, is not. He has intense insecurities that cause him to constantly attack others in the hopes of making himself feel better. He gets the big picture, but can't get a handle on himself.

To demonstrate the inherent differences between these three types of men, I'll provide an example. We'll examine how they each behave at the bar, because the bar is a quintessential example for every concept these days.

The Nice Guy

As he enters: His first instinct is to seclude himself in the corner, or hide amongst his group of close friends. Based on this behaviour, you might guess that staying hidden is his goal.

Girls: Even if he's single and wants to meet a new girl, he won't approach. He doesn't want to "inconvenience" or "startle" any of these holy creatures. He'd rather shamefully look at them and hope they don't notice. If they make eye contact, he's quick to take out his cellphone and send a fake text message.

You can find him: If he ventures away from the corner, he'll be hovering around the bar trying to order a drink. It might take him an hour though. He doesn't want to be too "aggressive" and push his way up front. That might upset someone.

The Asshole

As he enters: The asshole feels at home at the bar. That doesn't mean he's secure though. He just comes a lot. When he enters, he'll push his way to the bar and order a Bud Light, or three.

Girls: He tends to be single, but often gets caught up trying to prove his manliness instead of approaching women. He may also be afraid of women, and would rather get shit-faced drunk with his friends before throwing himself at anything that moves on the dance floor.

You can find him: Rest assured he'll be posted up at the bar, staring other guys down. If not, you can find him throwing shoulders and elbows into other men, trying to prove his "dominance", as he enters the bathroom for the 53rd time.

The Alpha

As he enters: The alpha is also comfortable at the bar. But this comfort is a result of his regular confidence. He also understands of the insecurities of nearly everyone else who's there, be it nice guys, assholes, or girls. He might order a drink, approach a girl, or just soak in the environment.

Girls: He can enjoy a good conversation with his buddy, but he won't hesitate to approach a cute girl, if he sees one that catches his eye.

You can find him: He could be anywhere, but if he's not deep in conversation he probably has a girl under his arm.

If you realize that men tend to take one of these three forms, it's far easier to understand their actions. While a nice guy is easy to pick out, keep your eyes open when it comes to the assholes and the alphas. Few men are confident and alpha– don't be fooled by the common "tough guy" act.

11 Fundamental Guidelines For Solid Game

February 17, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

When young guys are just starting out in game and life, they make all sorts of mistakes. I was one of those guys. I'm still constantly making mistakes. But I feel that getting some years under my belt, and some experience, has made me more aware of my mistakes. And awareness is the first step in improvement. I was reading a thread in the "game" section of the Roosh V Forum recently that reminded me of some foundational truths of the male-female dynamic that I think are important to repeat again and again. They never get old. Only by hearing these things over and over again will they really sink in. And even then, the reading has to be matched with life experience. Theory is not enough.

These are some of the foundational truths about men and women that I wish I had known at the earliest possible age.

Masculine And Feminine Energy Is Different

Masculine energy is all about breaking through barriers, overcoming obstacles, and achieving goals. Evolution has made us this way, of course. Men are logical, and approach problems with a framework based on logical assumptions with a purpose of overcoming some barrier.

But women aren't like this. It's a mistake for men to project onto women our own thinking patterns. Feminine energy is all about bonding, finding emotional connections, and opening up to receive love. They are not guided by strict logic. They operate more on emotional and intuitive bases. Nurturing is not breaking through barriers or crushing obstacles.

Well, you might say: "So what? I already knew this!" Even so, not many guys truly understand the implications of the differences in masculine energy and feminine energy. Failure to appreciate this basic difference leads to countless problems.

Women Won't Tell You How To Be A Man

Girls expect you already to know how to be a man. They don't want to have to coach you in this. (Of course, here women forget that, these days, most men are not taught how to be men, and that society actively discourages masculinity. For this they can thank their feminist sisters).

When you're out with a girl, she doesn't want to make big decisions. She wants to show up, look pretty, and let you lead the parade. You're expected to take the initiative. And you should. Always.

Stop Over-Pursuing

When a guy meets a girl for the first time, he often in his mind imagines all sorts of scenarios about what he's going to do with her (or to her) in the future. Men are methodical planners. Again, evolution has made us so. But the problem with this mentality is that it can lead to thirsty, needy, or desperate behavior.

Your mind-set should be focused on having fun and having sex. That's it. I will say it again: having fun and having sex. Stop thinking about the implications, complications, and secret meanings behind things. That's the one thing that guys do all the time: trying to over-analyze everything. Forget that. You should not be trying to over-plan things, define the nature of the relationship, or box her into some sort of commitment. If you are looking for a relationship, remember that women need time to allow their feelings for you to grow. Trying to rush her will always backfire.

When it comes to calling or texting, you need to let her do the majority of that. I know, I know, it sounds basic. But this mistake is probably the most common one out there. Guys get thirsty, and will blow up a girl's phone with calls or texts. For Christ's sake, stop doing this. Once per week is plenty, at the beginning. If her interest level in you is there, she will do the majority of the texting or calling.

Women Hate Needy And Desperate Behavior

Basic? Yes. But they really do hate this. Needy behavior completely ruins attraction.

But again, this principle is so often forgotten. Attraction is not a choice. If it's there, you can feel it if you're attuned to female signals. But what you do with the attraction is up to you. Are you going to sabotage yourself? Or are you going to confidently move the interaction along, in a way that leads to sex? A big part of this is avoiding needy behavior.

So many guys sabotage themselves by reverting to insecure or needy behavior patterns. They call too much, show body language that displays lack of confidence, or otherwise unconsciously talk her out of sleeping with him. I really think that a lot of these needy behaviors are so hard to unlearn because they are the residues of childhood traumas. It's the hardest thing in the world to unlearn bad habits like this. Very few guys are naturally confident alpha types. But you've got to do it.

Never Accept Being Friend-Zoned

You are not her gay male girlfriend. When a girl you're interested in tries to friend zone you, move on. Do not hang around and accept your status as a gay male girlfriend. You should say or convey something like, "I'm not interested in that right now. I don't want to be your friend. But let me know if you change your mind." And move on.

You've got to walk away and mean it. Women need to know that you have boundaries. They need to know that if they push you too far, you will stand up for yourself. Men's biggest mistakes these days relate to not setting firm boundaries for female behavior.

They need to know if they push you too far, there will be consequences. Your time is valuable. Wasting time being a chick's friend will just give you blueballs and will take time away from meeting other girls more deserving of your attention.

Don't Be Too Clear About Your Feelings

Women are more attracted to guys whose feelings are unclear. You need to make her work for your attention. Don't put everything on the table. When you make everything clear about your feelings, you deprive her of her desire to win over your affection.

Nobody values things that are won too easily.

Understand The Purpose Of Shit-Tests

Women will shit-test you constantly. That's just life. That's their way of probing a man, and finding out if he really is a masculine guy, or someone who will collapse and cave in. They want to see if you can stay centered, or not. Shit-tests come in all shapes, styles, and flavors, but the key thing is always to maintain your masculine center. Never allow a girl to throw you off your frame. Your response can be breezy, confident, vaguely dismissive, or humorous, but never forget that her purpose is to see how you react.

Don't Get Into Discussions With Women About Game Or Dating

You're wasting your time. They will never speak honestly about these subjects, or will try to confuse or derail the issues. Never accept a woman's dating or relationship advice. I once saw a YouTube video of a so-called female "dating coach". She was a beautiful, well-spoken girl, but it was all about her showing off and making glamorous poses for the camera. She was more interested in promoting herself, titillating the male viewers, and attention-whoring than honestly sharing information. And it's always the same story. Women see things from their perspective, not from the male perspective.

Get Off The Phone

The purpose of the phone is to set up meetings. That's it. The purpose of the phone is not to get into hour-long conversations, or extended text chats, with a girl you are trying to get intimate with. Too much talk always kills attraction. All that stuff you want to say, say it during your in-person meeting with her. Too much phone or text talk will result in your being friend-zoned, or your feeding her attention-whoring impulse. Remember: thirsty, needy behavior is a fuel to the female attention-whoring impulse.

Look Good All The Time

There are no rest days in looking good. There are no dress rehearsals. You're always on stage. You're always in the public eye. You won't get second chances. Your dress, grooming, body, fitness, and attitude should always be top-notch. Life is short: don't fuck up your opportunities. When you see the opportunity, pull the trigger. Do not hesitate. Drop the hammer, always. You are already expected to look good, dress well, be an articulate speaker, and be confident. Confidence is the key to everything. Yes, you've heard it before. But you need to hear it again. If you need mental programming to help you maintain your masculine frame, adopt a helpful philosophy like Stoicism or Buddhism.

It Never Stops

You're going to be gaming for the rest of your life. Married or not, it never ends. Women will always test you and probe your boundaries. It's in their nature. Accept it. Don't think you can just one day drop your pack and sit by the side of the road on your ass. Life is not for the faint-of-heart. The day you stop gaming is the day you stop living.

Final Thoughts

Having read through this list, might say to yourself, "I already know all this." And maybe you do. But the challenge here is actually implementing these things. Every guy claims to know them. But in practice, we all see the same mistakes over and over and over again. Because putting these principles into practice takes discipline and conviction.

And, most of all, it takes the experience of getting knocked around enough to realize that there are no shortcuts or magic wands.

Now go to work.

How Feminists Shame Beautiful Women

February 17, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Unless you've been living under a rock recently, you'll have heard something about a sporting competition going on in Russia this winter. These 2014 Winter Olympics in Sochi have had their fair share of controversy. Some of that controversy has focused on Sochi's preparation (or alleged lack thereof) to host the Winter Olympics. Then there were concerns about terrorism and cyber-security. Russia's anti-gay laws also drew the ire of many in the western world.

These have proven not to be the last bombshells to drop with regard to Sochi — on the contrary, yet another controversy has arisen and gotten many westerners raging mad. What's the issue this time? Russia's Olympic Team wanted to get fans more excited about the games, and released a series of photos of female Russian athletes in lingerie in order to do so. The Russians are quite attractive; the feminists are very unhappy:

> Just look at the different message emanating from these awesome images of Olympic snowboarder Elena Hight and Denver Nuggets power forward Kenneth Faried in ESPN's Body Issue, versus the Russian female Olympians.
> > Александра Саитова, керлинг. pic.twitter.com/lwySHZNNl0

For starters, it's clear these women are athletes and not lingerie models. Did you have any idea that Alexandra Saitova (the one with the mic) would be competing in curling? Or that Ekaterina Stolyarova (white stilettos) was a freestyle skier?

A piece of advice to the Russian team: you don't need to try so hard to make your female members look beautiful and sexy. Because guess what? Female athletes are already beautiful and sexy. They have incredible, powerful bodies; grace and inner poise. They're confident and successful. They're some of the worlds best athletes. Reducing them to pin-ups suggests you think they should be valued only for their sex appeal. They're worth so much more to your country than that.

The many feminist critiques on this subject are broadly similar: they feel that the Russian female Olympians are being "objectified" in these photos, and take issue with the fact that the sexy pics seem not to focus at all on the athleticism of these women, nor do they make it obvious that the women are Olympic athletes. The fact that the women in the images could pass for standard pin-up models is an issue.

My issue is with all of this is the same as the one I highlighted a couple of weeks ago in my post about feminist hostility to the traditional woman:

> This is one of the first things a feminist will respond with when her ideology is challenged by someone:
> "Feminism is just equality! Feminism is just choice! That's all it is – equal treatment and respect for ALL choices! How can you possibly disagree with that?"
> And she'd have point. If feminism were solely about equality and the sanctity of female choice, it would be much harder to disagree with.
> The problem is that this isn't what feminism is all about. The words sound nice, but actions speak much louder and feminist acts paint a much less inclusive and substantially more hypocritical picture than they prefer to articulate.

Feminists love to bang on about female choice and how important it is, but when push comes to shove they appear to have a much harder time actually putting said ideology into action. Take this quote from an article I mentioned earlier:

> They're confident and successful. They're some of the worlds best athletes. Reducing them to pin-ups suggests you think they should be valued only for their sex appeal. They're worth so much more to your country than that.

Note the use of the word "reducing". The implication here is that a model is somehow inferior to an athlete by virtue of her chosen occupation. One is apparently worth more to society than another. Why is that? Aren't all of us (men and women) striving for equality? Aren't feminists striving to prove the notion that a woman is valuable regardless of the choices she makes? If a woman chooses to be a pin-up model instead of an athlete, is she to be looked down upon for her “reduction”? Is she worth less to her country than her peer who becomes an athlete? That’s certainly what it sounds like.

It used to be the case (at least according to feminists) that the pin-up model was elevated above the female athlete as the more feminine, natural and virtuous woman. Feminists worked hard to break down the social stigmas associated with females participating fully in sports during the darkest days of “the patriarchy” and, in doing so, have managed to obtain mainstream acceptance for female athletes today. Are they now going to turn around and claim that said athletes are superior to and more virtuous than models? Are they going to turn around and erect the same kinds of gender barriers they claimed to have devoted themselves to breaking down?

By claiming that the very act of posing in lingerie “reduces” the value of these athletes, feminists seem to be heading in precisely that direction. Many of the comments on facebook have the same tone:

> Charlotte Bellis I actually think it’s sad that any athlete has to pose nude or in some variation of nudity, period…Whether you are posing in lingerie or with your snowboard you’re still naked. What does posing nude with your snowboard actually have to do with your sport? It completely deflects from your skill and talent. Instead of talking about whether you are any good at what you do, people are talking about whether they like your body or not…Let’s actually be known for what we do, who we are and what we stand for; not what we look like.

She says that it is “sad” that any athlete “has” to pose nude. That’s just the thing: no athlete actually has to, but some choose to do so of their own accord. Why is that wrong? Should female athletes not have the choice to pose how and when they wish to pose?

Bellis goes on to ask what posing nude (or in lingerie) has to do with an athlete's sport before claiming that said nudity "completely deflects" from the athletes "skill and talent".

This I do not understand. Surely, females have the right to choose what they can and cannot do with their bodies. Ms. Bellis implies here that it is somehow wrong for an athlete to do engage in any sort of activity that doesn't explicitly relate to their chosen sport. Are we to claim that an athlete's right to display her own body is governed by the sport she chooses, and not her own free will? Doesn't this limit the god given right of those athletes to do with their bodies as they please?

It is true that when an attractive female athlete strikes a pose in lingerie or nudity, people talk about her body. Ms. Bellis and the rest of the feminist hivemind have an issue with this, but I can’t see why. Must all conversation about a given female relate entirely to her athletic activities? If she consents to other people seeing her body and talking about it, and if she is proud to show it off, what exactly is the problem? That’s her choice: are we not bound to show respect for that choice and for the pride she has in her body? Can’t a female athlete be known for what she does, who she is and what she stands for while also being known in part for her looks (if she’s proud to show them and consents to doing so)?

Reading feminist literature objectively, you'd think the answer to this last query would be positive, but feminist critiques of these Russian Olympic photos seem to point in the other direction.

> And why did the Russian team feel the need to shoot these photos? Isn't it enough that these women are world-class athletes? Is the Russian team concerned that if their athletes aren't hot, fans won't be interested? And if they did want to show off their beautiful athletes, did they need to be dressed so provocatively? They would have been beautiful wearing their uniforms, holding their equipment (their actual equipment — remind me how an old-school microphone plays into a curling match).
> Can a woman only be beautiful if she's wearing next-to-nothing? (Spoiler alert: no)

Nobody implied that women are only beautiful in nudity or near nudity. The women could have been beautiful wearing their uniforms, but why should they be beautiful in only that way? If woman can also be beautiful in more provocative dress and they choose to adopt said provocative dress of their own accord, why can't they do that? Why do they need uniforms and equipment? Isn't their choice to go without those things just as valid and worthy of respect as a choice to go with them would be? Are we so puritan now as to find issue with women voluntarily showing off the feminine forms they're proud to have and display?

I understand that the United States was essentially founded by religious fundamentalists who took serious issue with most things relating to human sexuality, but this is getting a bit ridiculous. Do women have the right to freely show their bodies and embrace their sexuality or not? Can the American feminists claiming to be so "uncomfortable" about these photos make up their minds? I'm not seeing the sex positivity and respect for free female choice here.

This Facebook commenter doesn't seem to have an answer:

> Divyapriya Raghavan Athletes are not models. While there is nothing wrong with being a model, it's shameful to reduce competent athletes to bodies used to showcase sex appeal. They are strong and healthy women.

Again, note the use of the word "reduce" here. Competent athletes are superior to lingerie models in the feminist mind. We're all equal but some of us are more equal, apparently.

Athletes are not models? Says who? Is it not possible to be both an athlete and a model?

These Russian athletes chose to display their bodies in a way they felt comfortable. That was their prerogative. The fact that they did so does not invalidate their strength or character. They can be known for their physical attractiveness while also being respected for their athleticism as Olympic athletes. These things are not mutually exclusive.

They can be athletes and models; these things are not mutually exclusive.

Feminists have spent decades supposedly working to break down rigid stereotypes and barriers while enforcing the sanctity of female choice and the right of those choices to be respected. Yet, as we see with this recent controversy and with the Obama controversy I outlined a while back, modern feminists too often seem willing to erect new stereotypes and barriers while simultaneously disrespecting the choices women make that they don't agree with.

So long as feminists continue with this hypocrisy, they will remain their own worst enemy. Actions speak much louder than words, and modern western feminist actions leave much to be desired.

7 Reasons Why Buying A House Is A Terrible Idea

February 17, 2014 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

Traditionally, a man buying and owning his own house was a major milestone in a man's life along with marriage and having children. However, just like marriage I would argue that buying a house today is also a bad idea. Some men take great pride in owning their own homes and will disagree with me on this point, but I will put forth some logical counterarguments for why I believe this to be true. My parents and my high school economics teacher told me in my teenage years that buying a house instead of renting was the smartest things I could do and if I didn't I was "throwing away money by not building any equity." Although this was before the housing crash in 2008 I assume that many ROK readers are still hearing similar arguments.

It Is More Expensive Than Renting

According to this mortgage calculator, the total interest paid on a 250,000 mortgage at 5% interest is $106,000 for a 15 year mortgage. That is almost $600 per month you are losing which is the most I have ever paid for rent. You must also take into account other costs such as homeowner's insurance which is higher than renter's insurance, realtor fees for selling the house, property taxes, and repairs and upkeep for the house (although if you are the handyman type who enjoys home projects the last wouldn't amount to much). It is true that money paid against the principal does turn into equity for the house, but the other expenses bite into your wallet and that is money that could go into a 401K, starting a side business, or some other investment with a steady return.

Low Interest Rates Are An Illusion

People will try to convince you that buying a house when interest rates are low is a good idea because the interest payments will be lower. This is true, but if interest rates are low then housing prices are high. Home buyers don't look at the full price of a house when deciding whether to buy it. They look at what their monthly mortgage payment will be. The feds brought interest rates close to zero after the housing bubble burst to try to bring housing prices up and prevent too many people from feeling that a strategic default was a good idea. Eventually the feds will have to slowly bring interest rates back up and when they do that housing prices that were kept artificially high today will begin to drop. Many young people who buy houses today will find that the lowering housing prices will keep eating away at any equity they build on the house.

It Is Not A Good Investment Anymore

Home prices have historically been rising even before the bubble of the 2000s began. There are a number of reasons for this.

- Since historically prices kept going up people would pay more for a house than it was worth since it was an "investment." Hence the housing bubble.
- Inflation has gone up and home prices went up with it.
- Society has moved from one wage earner families to two wage earner families as women entered the workforce so the cost of consumer products such as houses have risen accordingly.

These factors made buying a house a great idea a few decades ago, but the trend is reversing now. Women make up half of the workforce so they can't grow much larger. The housing collapse that brought about the recession is making young people wary of thinking of a house as an "investment" when they see their friends with mortgages underwater years after they bought a house. Inflation is going up still and will continue, but that won't raise housing prices anymore for a number of reason.

- As mentioned above in the interest rates section, as inflation raises housing prices and people's mortgages are no longer underwater the feds will feel it is safe to raise interest rates thereby lowering housing prices.
- Inflation is going up, but the average worker's salary is staying about the same. This problem combined with massive student loan debt is making many young people rethink the idea of owning a home or even renting one.
- The Shadow Inventory

The Shadow Inventory

Following the housing bubble crash many houses went into foreclosure. What many people don't know is that many of these foreclosed houses were never sold or even put on the market. If a bank gave a $400,000 mortgage to a man in 2006 for a house and then foreclosed on it in early 2009 they can keep the house on the books as a $400,000 asset even if the house is now only worth $250,000. If they sell the house they have to log a $150,000 loss so it is easier for them to keep it off of the market and just pay some guy to mow the front lawn once a week and clean the windows. There were almost 2 million houses on the shadow inventory as of last October. Just as diamond companies keep prices high by restricting the supply, banks are keeping housing prices high by keeping empty houses off of the market. If they were to dump all of the houses in the shadow inventory on the market tomorrow housing prices would plummet. As inflation raises the price of a house close to the levels before the housing crash some of the banks will start to sell off a few of their assets and the price of a house will not exceed what it was in 2007 irregardless of how much inflation we have.

You Are Stuck In One Location

Employment uncertainty is an unchanging reality in today's world. I have had four jobs (all starting out as temp) and moved four times since I graduated from college three and a half years ago. No man should be held down by needing to live in a specific geographical area because they have a house there. You could get an offer for your dream job 300 miles away and have to turn it down because of a house. Or you may decide to expat out of this country if shit really hits the fan and it would be better to have your savings in something that is more liquid like a mutual fund than a house.

Houses Attract Golddiggers

Unless you got a vasectomy and your chosen method of game is luring in late 20s, pre-wall provider hunters having your own house could be detrimental. If a woman feels you are excellent long term relationship material she will be more likely to hold out on sex.

Houses Get Filled With Useless Stuff

Almost everyone in the western world including (hopefully to a lesser extent) ROK readers like yourself belong to the cult of consumerism. Being a member of this cult makes people fill their living areas with lots of useless junk that they don't need. Having a small apartment or just a room in someone else's house is one way to keep the influence of this cult at bay. If you have a large house you will need to buy lots of junk to fill it. A small place requires a very small amount of junk to fill it.

Think hard before you decide to believe the hype about needing a house. The government and banks have been manipulating the market so hard in the last few years that is has had the unintended consequence of making young people see owning a house as unnecessary and wasteful. Once this trend truly catches on in the culture banks and government will see the opposite effect of what they intended.

6 Reasons Why Fat Women Are Defective

February 17, 2014 | by Nicholas Peake | Link | Original Link

Being a reader of Return of Kings, I'm going to assume you're at least somewhat as aware as I am of the current trend of the ugly delusion that is "fat acceptance" and the common and increasing problem of obesity in Western countries. Fat Shaming Week was like a gasp of fresh air after having run across the barrage of pro-fat and fat, ugly feminist rants on the internet.

Here in the United States, my eyes have to suffer torture on a daily basis by seeing fatties everywhere I go. And especially here in the southeast United States, where fried foods and shitty clothing reign supreme. It's depressing to see some of the moderately attractive or even outright cute women I went to high school with who have let themselves go and consequently have swollen and lost a large portion of what made them desirable women. They are distorted renditions of their former selves. And it seems the trend towards fat being the new normal is growing, when in fact it is a celebration of broken women. Here's why fat women are defective:

1. They are full of rationalization and denial

Obesity is an undesirable trait; this is an undeniable fact. One characteristic of "big girls" I have noticed somewhat consistently is the need to rationalize their condition and their lack of self-control. Some of the more typical, and likewise overused excuses seen are:

- I have a xxxx condition (insert excuse as you deem fit). Glandular disorder? Great! Ignore the impact of a proper, low calorie diet. Or play the "genetics" card… nice!
- "Real women have curves": a nice combination of denial and rationalization. Attempting to push the propaganda that beauty is defined not necessarily by that of a woman with a classic, shapely hourglass figure but attempting to gloss over saggy tits, flabby arms, disproportionately large buttocks, and a stomach that hangs over the belt line
- Behaving as if they are still sexually attractive… good old-fashioned pretending to be sexy and in demand
- Discounting the harm done to health due to heavy weight

2. They're wholly apathetic and lack motivation

A basic truth I have discovered over the years is this we only pursue that which we truly desire. Obese women clearly do not possess the internal fortitude to get off of their asses, hit the treadmill, and stop eating pasta and pizza and milkshakes.

No rational person can deny that if one was motivated, a big person could lose weight with minimal effort. Rather than do this, they continue to wallow in their own self-pity and just no longer care about keeping themselves appealing to men. It's easier, after all, right?

3. They don't value femininity and the power of sexual attraction

I know that the obese are subconsciously aware of their condition and that healthy, thinner women are what men naturally are inclined to pursue. By continuing to live in such a sad state, they deny themselves an abundance of benefits that sexually desirable women enjoy daily:

- Happier long term relationships, as the boyfriend or husband remains attracted to her physically and is less likely to be attracted to other women
- Fit women subconsciously draw a man's attention, and we all know women love positive attention
- Preferential treatment and being looked upon as a higher-value person
- Happier lives though better self-esteem and likewise, fewer instances of depression
- A more positive response in work & other social interactions, as fit, attractive women receive a better response from others
- Attracting men of high sexual market value (SMV)

So many times I've seen before and after weight loss pictures in which a woman's looks have easily gone up 2-3 points by getting back down to an hourglass figure and lost the flabby arms.

Look at the men paired up with big girls the next time you go out—scruffy frail men with bad clothes or maybe a thin knock off of Shaggy from Scooby Doo. Even seen a fat girl with a truly handsome man? I haven't, unless she was formerly beautiful.

4. They voluntarily sabotage their own potential happiness

A more healthy individual does not sabotage their own life. Our behavior is, in many ways, defined by our emotional health & basic emotional needs that we subconsciously desire to fill.

In denying themselves a better outward appearance, and hence a better inward persona (see #4 above) they create a continuous cycle in which they maintain the status quo and can't escape the bad situation they're in. One does not improve themselves by remaining the same.

Obesity is, with few exceptions, a controllable state, a condition that is maintained, and is voluntarily increased or decreased. To allow oneself to continue to be secretly miserable and denying oneself the benefits that are awarded to desirable women surely to me reflects an inner emotional defect.

5. They contradict their own femininity

In a physically and emotionally healthy woman, her beauty is a part of who she is. Women who continuously live in a distorted physical state due to fatness are denying themselves who they truly are. What sane person can see a picture of ourselves at 19 years of age, young and in shape, then look in the mirror as a butterball at 34 and not feel the cold hard truth of "who we used to be"?

As much as feminists would like to rewrite basic human biology, we are animalistic in our need for desirable mates. Being a frumpy hambeast shaped like a giant raisin with thick-framed reading glasses does not exactly represent the female form.

When women foolishly and without sufficient inward perspective dress, eat, and behave without feminine traits, they become less identifiable as a female. And hence are ignored more by men and looked down upon by other women.

6. They latch onto fat acceptance as a psychological coping mechanism

It doesn't take much effort to see the tactics used seemingly everywhere that big women use as coping mechanisms in order to avoid personal responsibility, to project their insecurities onto men or the "society" scapegoat, or to attempt to divert the source of their personal pains (basically to neutralize reminders of why they are lesser in society):

- The classic bullshit "It's what's inside that counts." Who ever denied that internal character isn't important? No reasonable man I know would. But that's a distraction from the issue at hand: you need to lose some pounds, toots.
- "If you can't handle my curves then keep moving." Another attempt to create a false sense of qualifying where the BBW is in control and avoids rejection. You'll often see this on Craigslist.
- The bitter hater casting insults: "You can't handle a woman like me", "You've got a tiny penis and live in your mom's basement", "I need a real man." More of the same—lashing out to try bring the men who don't want them to a level below them, and to attempt to discredit the men who would not accept them.
- Hating other women who are more attractive. This is easily recognizable as a reflection of their own insecurities about their weight.

- Referring to promoting weight loss and setting public examples of health and fitness as “bullying”
- Being propped up by other women (seeking validation and false self-esteem inflation). Ever gone to a page in which a woman proclaims her ever-sad struggle against obesity and how she finally just gave up, only to pick up a “I don’t care” attitude? Or the self-proclaimed “sexy” fatties?

On sites where obese women seek validation, the comment sections are full of manginas, potential white-knights, and unattractive women who proclaim how “beautiful” these poor victims of societal norms are. Validation is freely given but never from men who have better options. That is a very, very telling indicator that they are attempting to prop up their own low SMV. Getting your little snowflake feelings validated all while avoiding the harsh realities of being subjected to healthy males is avoidance.

In Conclusion

Fat women who continue to live in denial of their own personal responsibility for their misery typically possess similar traits I’ve seen over and over. They are not emotionally rational women: they’re defective.

Any man or woman, with a few statistically insignificant exceptions, have complete control of their appearance and the resulting SMV and other benefits that come when that appearance is improved. Hence, it defies good sound logic and healthy emotional/personal norms to continue to live with a slovenly, overweight, undesirable body.

Let them seek out the beta men who are willing to give in to their overwhelming flaws, and let them live happily in denial forever. As for the Return of Kings man… fat acceptance? As Danny McBride said in Eastbound & Down: “Fuck that noise.”

Nerd Spent Hundreds Of Hours Coding To Avoid Learning Game

February 18, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

A couple weeks ago, Wired ran a story on an uncommon genius who hacked the OKCupid matching algorithms to get more dates and find his perfect girl. Though the original article was intended to be a quirky, endearing piece on the intersection of nerdiness and true love, we here at ROK like to dig a bit deeper into the psychological and societal underpinnings of these sexual marketplace corner cases.

On the plus side, this man is obviously a genius. Chris McKinlay recognized an inefficiency and created a highly technical solution to it that utilized his best skills, a method nobody else had conceived. We must give him some credit for his characteristically masculine ingenuity but. as you will see, it was clearly not an efficient course of action.

> "He set up 12 fake OkCupid accounts and wrote a Python script to manage them. The script would search his target demographic (heterosexual and bisexual women between the ages of 25 and 45), visit their pages, and scrape their profiles for every scrap of available information: ethnicity, height, smoker or nonsmoker, astrological sign—"all that crap," he says.
> To find the survey answers, he had to do a bit of extra sleuthing. OkCupid lets users see the responses of others, but only to questions they've answered themselves. McKinlay set up his bots to simply answer each question randomly—he wasn't using the dummy profiles to attract any of the women, so the answers didn't matter—then scooped the women's answers into a database."

In short, McKinlay went full retard on deconstructing OKcupid, a site largely populated by sexually frustrated men and girls who are either fat, seeking attention instead of actual dating, or both. To cull the best of this crop of winners, he somehow cobbled together programming, statistical modeling, complex clustering algorithms, machine learning, and text mining, not to mention a workaround for beating the website's security protocols just so he could meet some chicks. Come to think of it, Marge Simpson tried a similarly Rube Goldberg-seque approach at the police academy:

It's important to note the depth and intricacy of this "solution" to the dating problem. It's not as if the man took 30 minutes to bang out a JavaScript program hiding all fatties on OKCupid in a haze of stale coffee and Swedish Fish (which a friend of mine has actually done)—there was immense planning, labor, and agency that went into this project. In addition to the above machinations, his algorithm spit out which questions he should answer and how to rank them in importance, an inherently approval-seeking approach. There's no sense of "I want to become better so that desirable people will be attracted to me," but rather "How can I answer the questions that women want to hear about the most?" ROK readers know that the self-improvement journey aspect of game is itself as much of a reward as the increased attention from women, but McKinlay basically sat on his hands for almost a month while his creation told him what women wanted to hear. So, what sort of results did the computer yield?

> "Now he just had to decide which cluster best suited him…he lingered over a cluster dominated by women in their mid-twenties who looked like indie types, musicians and artists. This was the golden cluster. The haystack in which he'd find his needle. Somewhere within, he'd find true love."

Instead of McKinlay's HalBeta 9000 spending its prodigious processing power to match him up with concert pianists and PhDs, it yielded a top cluster that was composed of slutty mid-20s artsy girls who would probably drop their panties for any decent-looking guy with a modicum of game and charm. After a handful of dates, the man begins to learn a bit about his matches:

> "By date 20, he noticed latent variables emerging. In the younger cluster, the women invariably had two or more tattoos and lived on the east side of Los Angeles. In the other, a disproportionate number owned midsize dogs that they adored."

ROK readers will recognize these as two obvious slut tells. So, with all of this computing power at his disposal, what were McKinlay's results translated into actual in-person interactions, the real world currency he so meticulously sought to mine?

> "As summer drew to a close, he'd been on more than 55 dates, each one dutifully logged in a lab notebook. Only three had led to second dates; only one had led to a third."

Since we must assume he wasn't running the first date bang plan, a 5% second date rate can't be considered anything besides an epic failure. This pitiful conversion rate could have been bested by a $30 investment in a few choice manosphere eBooks, a couple months of doing Starting Strength, and completion of the 100-approach challenge.

> Then came the message from Christine Tien Wang, a 28-year-old artist and prison abolition activist. McKinlay had popped up in her search for 6-foot guys with blue eyes near UCLA, where she was pursuing her master's in fine arts. They were a 91 percent match.

After PhD-level mathematical acrobatics, months of gathering matches, and an incredible EIGHTY EIGHT first dates, the former Chinese major ended up with… an Asian girl who was on the website looking for a tall white guys with blue eyes. They are currently engaged, despite being in a long distance relationship.

There are many lessons we can learn from the ballad of Chris McKinlay. First, we see that the logical thought, problem-solving ability, and ingenuity of being a man is nearly worthless in the quest to become attractive to women without the charm, charisma, and self-evaluation abilities to sell them correctly. Take note, smart guys: without game to back up your brainpower, you will be relegated to the dustbin of the sexual marketplace.

Second, the article highlights the value of intellectual curiosity and tolerance for uncomfortable situations. One might think that a genius of his level would be ravenous to learn about subjects outside of his narrowly-focused world (e.g. women and game), but rather than seeking out new sources of information to solve a novel problem, he chose to go further down the rabbit hole that he was already familiar with—"Hey, I don't know how to get girls to like me. Better throw math at the problem!" When you see a man who would rather drive 500 miles in a familiar direction than walk around an unfamiliar block, you should avoid him.

Third, it is important to know one's market. According to the shot in an article, he's not a bad looking guy, and already presumably had experience with Asian girls and an in to their culture (the ability to speak Chinese). Rather than attempting to approach girls he found attractive and shared similar interests with, or girls of a type that had likely been attracted to him in the past, he was blindly hunting for the white whale of the perfect girl, which we know does not exist.

Fourth, we see another example of the vagaries of the online dating multiverse, which promotes a shopping mentality where girls are actively looking for reasons to ignore or disqualify reasonable men. If you're a little quirky, or it comes out during date number one that you spent hundreds of hours trying to find girls on OKCupid, you're going to get the swift boot. It shouldn't be that difficult for a decent-looking, tall guy with a good job and some obvious gifts to get a date (and a second, and a third). But, alas, it is.

Perhaps the most important lesson here is that the currency of human desire cannot be negotiated on a computer screen or programmed into a script. While McKinlay's method exposed him to his "objectively" best matches, basing any decision on what women say in a survey (rather than their actions) is a necessarily garbage in-garbage out process. We can match ourselves silly on OKCupid, but checking out a girl's "mandatory" responses does not change the base, non-negotiable, hard-wired attraction triggers that we have come to rely upon. The reason we are so quick to draw a distinction between Keyboard Jockey and an actual player in the sexual marketplace is because the skills to attract women cannot be learned through solely academic means. Chris learned that lesson the hard way so that the rest of us may not have to.

Ignore The Unwarranted Hate Of Trade Jobs

February 18, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

During the last few months of my junior year at high school we were all sent down to the guidance counsellor's office to talk about our future, because sixteen and seventeen year old's are noted and renowned for the wise plans they make for the rest of their lives. They were asking a group of people who unironically thought wrist cuffs and Blue October were the height of cool what they'd like to do for a living. I'm sure a lot of rock solid planning went on in the guidance counsellor's office.

Mostly I think this was a system to vet kids – to find out which ones were college bound and therefore worth focusing on, and which future assembly line workers the teachers could safely ignore. My grades were good so I had a plethora of options (McUniversities) available to me. The counsellor repeated to the point of inanity that if I only worked harder, only took some extra courses, I could up my grades and make it into the gasp top tier schools! Of course top tier essentially means most expensive so instead I spent that summer finding out which school was highest ranked in which also happened to be the cheapest. I thought I was being smart by getting the most bang for my buck. Like many men of my generation I was an idiot and didn't fully comprehend the sheer waste that is modern university; though to be all Millenial and put the blame on someone else, nobody really told me the truth about them.

Literally the only real reason left for men to go to university

A guy who still is a good friend of mine, whom I'm giving the pseudonym Andy, got a different reception in the counsellor's office. Andy was a farm kid whose mom had split when he was six. He was abrasive, not academically intelligent but smart in every other respect. Andy was not a stunningly handsome dude, so he did not have a single girlfriend in his three years of high school even though there was enough trash in mini-skirts to be picked up. In short, Andy was a high school loser. His grades sucked and he knew he wasn't college bound. He did however, have an actual plan unlike most of our class, many of whom at this very moment are turning into real world losers (see: me). He asked the counsellor about trades. The counsellor, who had spent nearly a half hour with me trying to convince me to bust my ass to get into McGill, opened a drawer in her desk and shoved a few pamphlets into Andy's hands before showing him the door.

Thankfully Andy was liked by Mr. C, arguably the best teacher in our school. Mr. C asked us all in class what our plans were, showing polite interest in us university kids and real interest in the kids who said military or RCMP (Royal Canadian Mounted Police). Andy said he wanted to work a trade but the counsellor didn't help him out. Mr. C asked if Andy wanted to meet a guy who ran his own plumbing company. Andy said yes and spent that summer working for the plumbing company. His grade 12 year he continued to work Saturdays on the boss's skeleton crew and even days when school was off. While most of us high school 'winners' were barely making 400 CAD a month working cashier or fast food jobs in anticipation of the tens of thousands of dollars of debt we'd all soon be taking on (spending most of our earnings on stupid crap), Andy saved nearly six grand.

"I like can't wait to get my degree or whatever so I'll totally never have to waitress again"

By the time the September after high school graduation rolled around Andy could have paid a huge chunk of his student debt before he took one step through the front doors of the university. Instead he went full time to the plumbing company, which sent him away to trade school (no charge) and today he makes nearly 30 bucks an hour. He is only 22. My mom, a nurse who went to university and has worked in her field since she was 21, barely makes 40. My dad, a small business owner, is subject to the whims of the economy. Andy suffers no such worry because, no matter how terrible times get, someone always needs their toilet fixed.

While most of my class are going to be struggling with their student debt until they're thoroughly middle aged (and probably longer), Andy need only save up six months salary to attend most schools debt free. And being a single guy with no baby mommas to leech off him or crippling vices like drinking, drugs or gambling, all Andy's earnings are 100% pure gravy. He bought a small house which is nearly paid off, and his grandma died last year and left him her house (probably from guilt over her daughter abandoning him, or so the 'stupid' Andy confided to me) so now that small house is being rented out for additional income.

22 years old. Making roughly 55,000 a year, with guaranteed raises as he goes to school and gains more qualifications and certificates – which the company also pays for. Owns two houses, getting nearly 1200 in rent from one of them a month. That's Andy the loser.

Trades. If you're going to work, trades. Trades trades trades. You want to get a university degree? Fine – just get a trade first.

I did it the opposite way, wasted my time in university like a lot of young men today are doing and will do in the future. No, education in and of itself is not a bad thing and the ideal society would try to educate its population to the highest level possible. But we don't live in ideal societies. University is far too expensive to pursue just to round out your life experience. You are not guaranteed a job with any degree. And even if its costs were reasonable the universities of today are almost anti-education. Indoctrination toward politically correct liberal ideals in non-STEM courses is rife. Courses are pathetically simple and hardly challenging to the intellect. It's quite easy to not go to a single class and still graduate with high grades; I'd know. So much for 'education'.

The only real redeeming factor of university is the bevy of sex one could have with girls freshly emancipated from the tyranny of mommy and daddy. In fact, the sheer buffet of classless, easy women eager to prove their independence by letting you use them for sex is the pretty much the only reason any man should be attending universities nowadays – unless you're going to a top tier school to make contacts. Yet as the west becomes poorer and poorer and the boomer wealth fades even sex with Freshwomen, that sole redeeming factor, will dry up as mommies and daddies can't afford to send their princesses en masse to slutty boot camp.

The stigma against trades in the popular conscience is bizarre and unwarranted. Plumbers and carpenters are portrayed as losers; fat, balding weirdo's who don't know how to pull up their pants and are probably drunk on the job – though to be fair, there are a lot of blue collar workers who work while messed up on something (though it's not like that isn't the case in every single job). Maybe that cliché was bang on once upon a time but nowadays you can find all sorts of smart, classy sumbitches working in trades, from university grads to body builders. Men go where the money is, and increasingly a lot of the money is in trades.

Of course, there are a few real concerns that you need to ponder about trades should you choose to enter them:

It Is Not Glamorous

This I think is where most of the social stigma comes from. We in the west live still live in a society which values above all else status from both money AND what you do for work. For all the money that Andy earns, his job is literally shitty. He deals with other people's excrement for a living. Plus all those other fun things people flush down the toilet – condoms, tampons, chicken bones etc. You may not want to become a plumber if you have any sort of faith in humanity. What you find in a septic tank will forever destroy all notions of human nobility in your mind. Tradesmen do not get the glitz of a musician or artist, even though less then 5% of those two groups are capable of even feeding themselves for a living while nearly every working tradesmen can put supper on the table for a big family without worry. You're not going to be waltzing around the club impressing chicks by dropping the fact that you work in HVAC for a living. Of course, if you're actually telling chicks you are trying to ONS what you do for work you're kind of doing it wrong in the first place.

You probably shouldn't peacock your profession in the club either

On the plus side, the main core of people who actually care about how glamorous someone's job is tend to be female and usually reside within the 12-21 year old range. Their opinions don't matter since they're losers once their sex appeal wears off (which is unnaturally fast for today's gals) and for the most part they usually change their snooty attitude pretty quick once they get out into the real world. You can physically see jealous lust in the eyes of chicks who wouldn't give Andy the time of day back in high school when they learn that he owns two houses, pool and hot tub included on his main pad, and pulls down more money in one year then they will earn in three – and that's if they manage to keep their job. In Andy's town there's not a lot of glamorous men with glamorous jobs which can pay the bills, and he's been getting a lot of overtures from younger girls who couldn't afford to go to university and are stuck being secretaries and waitresses. Poverty truly is the great equalizer.

It's Dirty And Dangerous Work

I'm working on getting my electricians certification's. I could earn more as a plumber but I didn't want to spend most of my day working in filth. Turns out you pretty much do no matter what you do your trade in. I've had to wriggle into crawlspaces with two feet of height, full of rats and mould and all other sorts of rot just to splice a wire together. A guy I worked with straight up got attacked by a feral cat when he poked his head into an attic. Even the most well kept of lived in buildings accumulate certain amounts of filth in their nooks and crannies, and guess where the majority of tradesmen spend their time working?

Note how I said the most well kept; working in trades, you quickly begin to think that either most people are slobs, or that you only work in the houses and buildings of slobs. Recently we went to work on houses on an Indian Reservation. The power had shorted out in one. We went down to the basement to see what was wrong and the smell practically knocked us out. It turned out that their toilet had stopped working a few months before hand, so they had the genius idea of tearing it out so they could poop directly down the pipes Muslim style. The accumulated excrement had shorted out the wiring.

Just once I'd like to go work in a nice basement like this

There's no real plus side to this part of trades. There's always a chance that working as a roofer parts of it are rotted and you could fall through. There's always the chance that, even if you're doing a relatively clean job like working on a construction site, a cinder block could tip and tumble onto you, or some idiot could accidentally flip on the breaker while you're wiring, or a million other things. Trades are not comfy – there's a reason you're making killer dough working them.

It's A Manly Profession

And by manly, I mean people are pissed off and yelling most of the day. A slight exaggeration, sure, but you have to develop some thick skin pretty quick working in trades. There's no shortage of things that you can do wrong and no shortage of people who will immediately point out what an idiot you are for doing it wrong. Especially as a young guy, the maxim that shit flows down hill is in full effect. Much like in the trenches, any and everything is said without consideration on the job site. If you can't handle ribbing about your sexuality, your race, your religion or simply cannot listen to comprehensive, personal knowledge of your mother's genitals from numerous men – including your boss, if you screw up big enough – then working in a trades environment will be torturous for you.

On the plus side, most men are good about leaving their problems at the job site. You aren't going to have a lot of sissy boys or idiots working intimately with you. Every site and company tends to have a certain number of goats (hopefully not you) but these idiots are usually shuffled off to the side doing dummy work where they can't do too much harm to your real work efforts. And if they're exceptionally bad they're usually hounded off the crew pretty quick. Shoddy work hurts the reputation of the crew, which hurts everyone working for it – bad rep means no contracts means no pay. There are anti-discrimination, please-hold-my-hand-government type laws someone could attempt to hide behind (at least here in Canada) but anyone who tried that would soon find themselves completely ostracised in the company or on the site; only the most masochistic person would endure the bile of dozens of men who think that this person is trying to ruin their meal ticket.

It’s Long And Hard Work

Tradesmen don’t spend 8 hours a day in a comfy climate controlled office, sitting down at their desk slowly typing out an e-mail while keeping Return Of Kings tabbed until their boss walks away. You’re out in the elements come rain, snow or shine. Depending on where you live and what trade you work you could be spending several hours a day just driving to and from the job site. Unlike those lazy road crews which chop up half of the country’s main highways and then go on a three month smoke break, if a necessary task isn’t completed when the bell rings you can’t always just shut down and go home; 12-14 hours days are not uncommon. You’re moving, stretching, bending all the time, climbing and balancing and hanging off things to do your work. Even if you’re in reasonable shape it can be exhausting. Again, there’s a reason why you’re being paid so well. You earn your pay cheque.

Obligatory sexy picture dealing with the article’s theme

In Conclusion

Trades can be difficult work at times but they’re hardly the loser occupations as portrayed in the media. Quite the opposite; I know more losers with an undergraduate or Masters degree then ones with certificates in things like welding or water treatment. And a trade is nearly guaranteed to give one a stable job for life, something which has been taken for granted by many people for a long time and which is steadily becoming rarer.

Unlike the overly glorified, assembly line like work done in offices you cannot just fire competent trades people and replace them with low tier, unskilled immigrants. It’s one thing to lay off people who push buttons and move paper so you can replace them with someone who does the job 40% less effectively for 40% of the pay; if the toilets aren’t flushing properly and the heat only comes on half blast, that affects the boss. If a newly constructed building is falling apart only five years after it's constructed, that affects the boss's safety – not to mention his pocket book. And when it comes to the bosses comfort, money and safety, no expense shall be spared. You should be the one receiving that expense.

We're quickly nearing a point where the majority of work can (and probably will) be done by computers and automated processes. To eliminate humans in trades would require a revolution in robotics technology that is likely still centuries away. At least for the 21st century the world still needs competent plumbers, carpenters, welders, and the other occupations that build and keep society running. Ignore the stigmas. Get in one, learn it and work hard. You'll be set for life.

Why Is The Beautiful Female Hourglass Figure Being Attacked?

February 18, 2014 | by Pill Scout | Link | Original Link

Men all have their select preferences for what they find attractive in a woman, like hair color, skin tone, the way she wears her makeup, and so on. The most common factor however comes down to body shape. The fact is that men in civilized, economically stable nations prefer women with true hourglass curves, whether or not they will admit it. Not fat girl "curves," but real curves — the kind that come from being health-minded and fit — not the kind of rolls, "curves," or bulges that come from Twinkie hoarding.

An "hourglass" figure on a woman, for those who are unfamiliar, is similar to an hourglass or a classic glass Coca-Cola bottle in shape. This means decent boobs, small waist, and big butt, usually with the waist being 7:10 to the hips and/or bust. It's measurable beauty that delights the senses.

Look at the photos above. Marilyn Monroe (left) measures up to 34-24-34, a far cry from the size 12+ that obese ladies claimed she was. Scarlett Johansson (right) measures up to 36-25-36, with similar hourglass proportions to Marilyn. It's safe to say that both women were blessed with beautifully proportioned hourglass figures.

Numbers or not, if a man were given the option he would choose the girl who had a true curvy body in addition to symmetrical facial and bodily features that advertise good immune and developmental health. To me, being exclusively a "tits man" or an "ass man" is irrelevant when it's possible and ideal to have everything in abundant and equal measure. This is the beauty of the hourglass.

The body of a feminine goddess

The hourglass body shape on a woman is highly attractive to masculine men, particularly those who would like to have children someday, and for very good reason:

1. It advertises reproductive fitness and femininity
2. It advertises overall bodily fitness

In a healthy, "privileged" adult woman, balanced levels of hormones like estrogen and progesterone course through the body at different points of her menstrual cycle to store and maintain fat deposits in the breasts and on the hips and buttocks.

These simple fat deposits allow for storage of nutrients for a potential baby to be born and nursed. When the woman breastfeeds, she'll use those extra fat deposits on her lower body to support the nutritional demands for her babies. Growing babies need a lot of nutrition for their brains, so naturally it makes sense as to why curvy hourglass women would be most attractive to healthy men.

Essentially, hourglass curves scream "reproductive fitness," which is why it is difficult for a straight, virile male to not find these attributes desirable in a female, whether or not he knows it. These preferences are so heavily engrained into the minds of mankind that they really haven't changed in millennia, and the shape of attractive women haven't changed in millennia either.

Even women respond viscerally to the hourglass body shape in other women:

> It turns out women find similar optimally attractive female bodies as attention-grabbing, albeit for different reasons," Platek said. "Women size up other women in an effort to determine their own relative attractiveness and to maintain mate guarding — or, in other words, keep their mate away from optimally designed females.

If you still doubt the power of the hourglass, note that even if a woman is technically overweight and carrying it more on her butt, she's still healthier than more rotund women who have more junk in the gut than in the butt. That's just science.

> A large potbelly, where waist girth begins to exceed hip girth, is strongly associated with an increased risk of coronary artery disease, diabetes, elevated triglycerides, hypertension, cancer and general overall mortality.

After all, the great Sir Mix-A-Lot once said "baby got back." Not "baby got fat."

[TRIGGER WARNING: Fatties below]

By comparing these two overweight women depicted below, it's clear that the left one is healthier by comparison to the right one since her accumulated excess body fat has largely stayed off her waist. Her proportions land her in what is objectively considered a healthy waist-to-hip ratio.

Nonetheless she could still become more attractive to the majority of men (and much more healthy) by losing 20-40 lbs.

The winter-insulated sea mammal on the right is a potbellied Photoshopped and airbrushed “plus size” model with more bulge than curves, indicative of a possible unhealthy and more masculinized hormonal profile. Note also that she is much taller than the woman on the left, and if she were the same height as the other model, she would have a body like Lindy West. As she stands today, few men would man their harpoons for her.

The key here is the waist size. Smaller waist = more healthy.

The war on the hourglass

You don’t have to venture far out onto the Internet to find fatties and other harbingers of the Western Apocalypse proclaiming their superiority over what they feel are outmoded ideas of femininity and womanhood. Since millions of years of human evolution and sexual selection just werent’s enough for them, their greasy paws have hoisted their echo-chamber propaganda into credentialed halls of science and academia to prevent any semblance of scientific objectivity from hurting their still bleeding egos.

For example, a very questionable LiveScience article claiming that hourglass figure may not be the best one attempts to perform mental gymnastics to justify as to why a man would prefer a woman with a “cylinder” (read: fat waisted and masculine) figure: sexual equality.

When I first came across the headline Best Female Figure Not an Hourglass, I was expecting my life to get flip-turned upside down. In spite of my most deeply-rooted instincts, maybe this article was right. Maybe I didn’t think a small waist on a stacked women was attractive after all and it was just something “programmed into me by cultural conditioning” or some other voodoo witchcraft like that.

However, it turns out the entire article was merely the product of a Mach-speed turbo hamster. It reeks of agenda bias. For example, here's where Professor of Anthropology/blind fool Elizabeth Cashdan is quoted to point out a simple fact to justify a fantasy reality:

> And in some non-Western societies where food is scarce and women bear the responsibility for finding it, men actually prefer larger waist-to-hip ratios.

Because fatties are naturally going to be the ones who hoard all the food. More fat = more likely to have food around in a time of scarcity, for example, in an impoverished third world country. But if you've got your work cut out for you and are doing well, you don't need or want a fatty. Strong, healthy and perfectly capable men who aren't in a time of famine don't need "strong" women, and for that reason "strong" women aren't in demand outside of the third world.

The fact that they cite an example of a “non-Western” country for the sake of their argument shows us where their motives lie: the authors would prefer that our nations lose our first world status.

The time for “curves” is ticking away

It’s both disgusting and appalling that the authors of this piece would dare to claim that “sexual equality” is the reason why thick waists have become the “preference” in modern Western societies in the same place where they explain why some body fat gets stored on the waist. The conclusion the authors came to has nothing to do with the evidence they pointed at.

Much of the bogus LiveScience article explains that in times of stress and out-group competition, a woman’s body will produce cortisol and testosterone as a response to these environmental challenges, shifting from provisioning bodily resources for a potential child toward preserving the life of the woman in the here-and-now.

Chronically, this high-stress hormonal environment will diminish production of the feminine hormones like estrogen and progesterone, consequently displacing feminine characteristics for more masculine ones and a thicker waist to boot.

This change in body shape reflects exactly what our society has become today, and it’s evident in the figure of the average woman. The entire “science” article is a thinly-veiled rationalization for the consequences of globalized corporate hegemony, specially spun to allow the shit train to Hell to keep chugging its way over the cliff.

What this trend of the disappearing, disapproved hourglass figure means is that the "independent woman who don't need no man" has morphed into a frumpy, irritable and inferior version of a woman. She's traded natural femininity for a life of toil and faux competition for the sake of symbolic independence in a cruel world where men are better suited to thrive.

The "independent woman" has sacrificed her better looks for a competitive corporate job, fighting and fucking the best men among her for a place near the top, all to the benefit of her corporate masters who choreographed this entire rat race. This is typically justified by contrasting this "independence" with the toil of being a stereotypical subservient 1950's housewife.

Noting that it's all for profit and not for "equality," isn't it repulsive that the authors of this article attempted to frame this high-stress, high-competition scenario as ideal for women, something "progressive" and to be rewarded for following rather than something to be condemned for its risks of heart disease and obesity that come with it?

It just sounds like ugly, embittered feminists patting themselves on the back while stabbing their more beautiful and less-stressed sisters in the back for being beautiful and feminine enough to live a less stressful life away from corporate slave drivers who have used "equality" to the benefit of their profit margins.

This is why feminists and progressives, despite their claims to the contrary, couldn't possibly represent the best interests of all women. They're narcissists who are in this for themselves, and they want to share with women the shameful lifestyle that stripped the feminist harpies of whatever natural beauty they would've had.

Not surprisingly, the article mentions Britain and Denmark as two places where the men "have a preference for" women with thicker waists, since the thicker waists are already the norm there and any man who doesn't want to venture off to find quality feminine women is pretty much stuck with what's available locally. Our own Roosh has been to Denmark and has personally witnessed the boner-killing horrors that reside there. He's fortunate to have made it out alive.

Conversely, Greece and Portugal are apparently bastions of manly men who prefer slimmer waists and curvier assets, or as the article author says, places where the women are not "economically independent," which is a derisive code phrase that roughly means that a women who resides in these nations could simply take care of her beauty and likely find a man to support her financially while she supports his needs in her own equally important ways.

What this all means for society at large

Women going under chronic high levels of stress tend to produce damaged, weaker male babies if they aren't just spontaneously aborted by the sheer levels of stress and adrenal hormone surging through them. Only female babies survive. This is not coincidental since the high-cortisol women tend not to have attractive bodies, almost as an evolutionary "dead end" or "out of order" sign for the man's Y-chromosome to look elsewhere.

Perhaps this high-cortisol female, low-testosterone male scenario becomes a chicken-and-egg dilemma: did the manbeast of a woman produce the effeminate liberal beta male first, or was the effete liberal beta male first attracted to the hairy Amazonian man-woman beast?

For the answer, we have to turn back to society and determine where we went wrong to begin with. A more “conservative” K-selected society is one where masculine men and feminine women coexist peacefully in a polar balance, fulfilling their respective sex roles. Masculine men and feminine women are the people who keep the gears of civilization turning, like yin and yang. One is nothing without the other.

A “liberal” r-selected society on the other hand is one where all exist in a chasm of nullification and nihilistic equality, where femininity and masculinity are irrelevant in the face of globalist multinationals, and everyone is an opportunist set on scavenging the leftover successes of previous generations. We all currently live in the latter society, so it’s safe to say we’re in the midst of a catastrophic decline if we cannot or will not do anything about it.

Gentlemen: If/when you’re ready to “settle down,” pick the most beautiful, kind and feminine woman you can find. Always shun the shoggoths and if you find yourself compromising too much, just cut her loose to be unleashed upon some other poor sucker or group of feral cats to be adopted.

Ladies: Cut all the stress out of your lives caused by “independence” and instead embrace your femininity free from the clutches of corporate opportunists and jealous hags. Femininity is being eschewed in this day and age, and it’s up to both men and women to restore that feminine power back to women instead of letting it be sold back to them in the form of wage slavery and consumerism.

9 Signs That She’s Cheating On You

February 18, 2014 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

Relationships in modern America are suppose to be a one-course meal. As a man with the finest taste in women. I know I want at least one excellent course. Yet, society indoctrinates women to cheat as much as possible but men must stay 100% faithful. It’s common for men of the highest echelons to be cheated.

As a man who has juggled multiple chicks at the same time, I have learned about girls trying to creep on the side. Here is 9 tips on how to successfully find out if you have been cheated on:

She is super secretive about passwords

This is a simple tip that many men forget. Women will use any lie for you not to have her password, even if you’re doing tech support for her. The password could indicate the multiple ballers she’s trying to get a paycheck from.

She often uses incognito mode on her browser

Most cheating that involves electronic communications leaves a log. The log can incriminate you especially with common cheating sites like Ashley Madison. Web history/cookies can doom her plans on boning multiple men.

She creates a buffer zone

She will create a scenario where she can’t contact you normally. A few hours a week she’s “volunteering” is her excuse to stray. This would be the time where she’s messing with her old sugar daddy. When she’s madly in love with you, there’s no buffer zone whatsoever. The presence of one should be a large warning sign.

She wears sexy clothes for others but not you

The change of wardrobe of a woman who’s with a beta schlub having sex with her cheater is obvious. For example, say you notice that she's going to a fancy corporate dinner for work. She has repeatedly told you that she hates high heels and grooming for a passion, yet she's wearing 5 inch stilettos. When women want to have or keep something they value, they try extra hard. Especially with their wardrobe.

Her affections become mixed

A lot of drama comes when your girl tries to treat you like a side piece. She is taking the route of switching affection output, so she starts to treat you worse. The average American hypergamous women who cheats can't handle being nice continuously.

Her girlfriends are cheaters or sluts

It's simple but if her girlfriends are cheaters, she probably indulges with them and does the same stuff they do. Birds tend to hang around other birds.

She's an expert at using Google Voice

This tip is more America-centric, but there are be apps that can do the same thing. Google Voice allows you to forward calls to your real cell phone number and block certain numbers from calling you during certain hours. This makes managing which dude can call and message her easy as pie. It also saves all of the SMS/pictures sent, so if you have the password, you have material that will help you concretely break up with her. Here is google's help page to understand how it works.

She starts using cash

Paying with a credit card leaves an evidence trail while cash leaves no record. If she starts to carry a lot of cash on her, this is probable case for an investigation on cheating.

She stops licking your perineum

A woman who is cheating will stop doing the things you love. The sensual licking of your testicles or perineum will be stopped. Or maybe she stops giving anal. A woman will not put effort in to sex if she is getting it good from another man. If the sex is getting whack on her end, suspect something

If a woman wants all the privileges of monogamy, she must not break the simple rule of not being the town's cum receptacle. If you're getting cheated on, move on.

How To Be An Appropriate Slut

February 19, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Recently, a female wrote to Christian and I inquiring about something that is often asked of men like ourselves. Let's call her Kim. The full text of the email is pasted for your reading enjoyment:

> Dear Christian McQueen and Law Dogger,
> I thought about sending this to Roosh, but the form requirement of saying that I "agree that most feminists are ugly" seemed a bit petty. Thus, I'm addressing it to the two of you, since I'm most familiar with your names from reading ROK.
> As a female and a regular reader (I know, women aren't supposed to be allowed, but it's way too fascinating to pass up), I frequently notice two different points being made, namely:
> 1. Seek out hot girls who are DTF and if you don't close, move on.
> 2. A girl's value decreases as the number of guys she bangs increases.
> It follows that I have a question; what's a girl to do? The two hardly seem reconcilable.
> I'm sure you're very busy men, but if you get around to answering, I'd be interested in the information.
> Best,
> Kim

The answer is quite simple actually and while it may vary from guy to guy, I can at least provide a basic framework by which a girl can present herself in the most favorable light to a ~~red pill~~ man she desires. Let's address each of her perceived mutually exclusive points in turn.

Your Fucking Of Me

The first prong of Kim's inquiry focuses on how fast a girl would have sex with a guy, aka the DTF level (DTF = down to fuck for clarity). This will be guy-dependent, as some guys can handle a girl who sleeps with them on the first meet (such as myself), and others automatically place them in a non-recoverable slut category. My advice: the first date.

This ties into the second prong, but if you fuck on the first date as opposed to the first meet, it gives most men the appearance that it was the guy rather than the circumstance that led to the fucking. With a same night bang you could have just been horny, drunk, angry at an ex, who knows. A first date bang differs slightly however. There is no heat of the moment (at least in the beginning), you are letting this guy work on you, and in the end if you fuck it is more correlated to him personally than the situation. In other words, he won't feel like if he didn't hit on you at the bar, you would have just fucked the next guy with decent style and game.

Now let's say the first meet is at a bar, how are you to act? Spend time with him, be very interested, maybe allow a quick fingering to get your jollies off if you are super horny, but do NOT under any circumstances go home with him and then not fuck him. That is just selfish, as you are taking him out of the sea of fish with no reward. And nothing builds more resentment for a girl than having her on your bed and her not willing to have sex. You may think you are helping your cause by acting innocent, but he will secretly start hating you a little.

On the flip side, never wait longer than the 2nd date. In these times, you are replaceable. For every girl that won't put out, another one will much quicker and she will be younger and hotter than you. And if you wait for the second date, the first date should have included a blow job.

Now everything is not black and white and these are not hard line rules. The more traditional you are and make yourself out to be, the more likely it is that you do not ding yourself in the eyes of the man for holding out longer. I've waited 5-7 dates with Ukrainian and Russian girls before because some of them actually can compensate with real female qualities—they cooked, cleaned, wore heels everywhere, and so on. Or if you look like this girl, most guys will happily wait a few extra dates. Or perhaps you give terrific blowjobs.

There are endless factors to consider, but for the typical American girl which I'm guessing Kim represents, date one is a good benchmark to use.

Your Fucking Of Others

This is so incredibly simple it really boggles my mind every time a girl does not get it. Kim states that a "girl's value decreases as the number of guys she bangs increases." This is a very true statement. But…how does the guy know how many other guys you've banged? Only one way, you told him either directly or indirectly.

Directly. Recently I slept with a girl who thought it was cool to talk about all her sexual exploits. She included such gems as:

- She gets naked when she drinks tequila, then proceeds to tell me how much tequila she's been drinking the past few weeks
- How she's been practicing her blowjob skills
- About how "wild" she was in high school
- How she ended up in bed with her friend and another guy one night recently
- How she slept with another guy quicker than I because she thought of me as a potential boyfriend (Warning Never tell a guy you slept with another guy quicker.)

Most of this came after we had sex, and it quickly threw her out of the rotation. As much as we already know how slutty girls are these days, we don't need to be given direct evidence of the same. Have some damn class.

Indirectly.

Some girls accidentally, or maybe purposefully, hint at how slutty they are. This includes:

- Talking about how you are not "like that" anymore
- Having one or more condoms on you at any time
- Having a box of condoms by your bed
- Referencing "walks of shame"
- Discussing your friends' sexual promiscuity
- Fielding texts and messages from other guys in front of us

All of these are easily handled. Don't talk about your sexual past, even if he is dumb enough to ask. If you are insistent on condoms and the guy doesn't 'have one with him that's his fault. Put your damn phone away during the time you are with him.

Summary

This just touches upon this one question regarding the speed of sex vs. the history of partners. It does not touch upon an array of other important factors that may influence a man's decision to keep a girl around (i.e. personality) but that was not part of the question posed. It also assumes you are dealing with men like us, not beta guys who will be shocked at first date sex, care about your educational accomplishments or seek out your sexual past because they think knowing is better.

What is the one thing that most girls instinctively say during a drunken one night stand? "I've never done this before!" Now even though that's complete bullshit why do girls almost always say this? Because even subconsciously they know that a slutty past is a disqualifier and so this is a last-ditch attempt to preserve that chaste image.

Most of the red pill aware men already assume you are a huge slut. The last time I asked a girl how many guys she's been with was 2004 and there is a reason for that. There is always a tiny bubble of thought in our minds that while overwhelmed with knowledge and experience to the contrary, still holds on to the ideal that some girls can be good girls. Men are the romantics and we want to be proven wrong; that maybe just maybe you are different. If you come right out and negate this scintilla of hope we have for today's females, it serves to only substantiate everything we have come to know.

So to answer Kim's question, the two points are easily reconcilable. A girl can be relatively DTF (aka doesn't have to be fucking you in the bathroom stall of the club within 30 minutes) and at the same time not broadcast her sexual past, assuming—likely correctly—that she has an extensive one. It really is that simple.

You'll Never Find A "Good" Corporate Job Like Your Parents Did

February 19, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

I faced a problem.

I was receiving more e-mails requesting my advice or thoughts on various issues than I had time to answer. Some of them were actually quite presumptuous, because in order to thoroughly answer them it would take at least two hours of my finite life (my favorite being "how should I plan for retirement").

But instead of becoming frustrated or angry, I got smart. I started "Asshole Consulting." I would politely tell people that I would like to answer their questions, but I didn't have the time unless I was paid to do so. I thought it would go nowhere, but because of the generally brief and simple nature of most people's questions, they were easily answered in a 10-20 minute e-mail, which I would only charge $15-$25, respectively. Soon, a market was made and I'm at least making beer money by helping out the occasional lost soul.

But something interesting happened. While for the most part people's questions were specific to them, I started noticing "general themes" or "common questions" that were not specific to any one individual. They were questions most people had and I figured rather than regurgitating the exact same advice I would write a post about it saving me time and them money. And hands down the most common of these common questions is:

"I hate my job. I just can't tolerate it anymore. I'm thinking of a career change or at least finding a new job. What do you recommend?"

And I intend on answering it now as it is one of the most important lessons for all men to learn, and the earlier the better.

First understand you've been over-trained. Both in terms of abilities and expectations. You go to school for 13 years in the public school-prison system where they tell you you are going to do great things. Naive 20-something, math-impaired women euphemistically posing as teachers tell you the prettiest of lies about your "wonderful and glorious" future. You then go onto college where you get at minimum a bachelors, but probably a Masters as "that will give you an edge in the labor market." But what you don't understand is that pretty much everybody has been doing the same and so the market is flooded with college-educated individuals. And no matter how high your GPA and how many advanced credentials you have, there are not enough jobs to sop up all the excess college graduates. This not only means HR and employers can be astronomically arrogant and picky, but that what jobs you do land are 100% guaranteed to be WAY beneath your capacities, abilities, and desires.

Second, understand that economic growth is slowing. We are only growing at about 60% of the rate of the 1940's and 1950's. Without that extra economic growth there are mathematically fewer employment opportunities and certainly less challenging ones. So whereas if you were a GI coming back from WWII Boeing would likely hire you as an aerospace engineer, today Boeing would maybe hire you as dataentrysman. If you're lucky.

Finally, the Baby Boomer generation was absolutely HORRIBLE in terms of financial planning. Most squandered their inheritance from the WWII generation, blew what money they made on divorce lawyers, and are now the most participatory group in "reverse mortgages." They did not save anywhere near the amount they needed for retirement which means…

Most of them have to work past retirement.

This means there is a log-jam at the top of most companies. And without executives retiring, nobody else can be promoted up the corporate ladder. Until the Boomers retire (or die) you can expect a long wait time before finding a job that challenges you.

Now there are other reasons, but because of the aforementioned three nearly 100% of all US jobs suck. They just plain suck.

They're not challenging, they're not interesting, they're nowhere near what you're capable of, and they're not improving as the economy continues to stagnate. Worse, the people of the country themselves are decaying, which not only means that your co-workers and bosses are going to be less professional (and most likely intolerable), but dishonest, deceitful and manipulative (misleading job descriptions or Adria Richards, anyone?). What this means for you, and this is one of the important lessons to pull from this post, is that you are not "unlucky" or just having "bad luck" finding a "decent job." ALL JOBS SUCK. ALL JOBS ARE LIKE THIS. There is no "good job with a sane employer around the corner, you just need to apply one more time." There is no "grass is greener on the other side." All jobs in the current day economy are like this.

So the question then is, "What? Am I just screwed? Am I condemned to sucky jobs for the rest of my life or vainly job-hopping in order to find 'the one' job that doesn't suck?"

And the answer is a "yes, but" and the "but" is the key epiphany you need to enjoy life as much as you can.

Realize that you cannot change the general decay and suckiness of the job market. Ergo, if you cannot change it, the only thing you can change is you. Specifically, how you react to it. It is here you need to attain a certain amount of "Zen" with your workplace surroundings, specifically "letting things go" that you don't control.

First, give up any dreams you had of "making it big as a corporate man." True riches and success do not come from working hard and loyally for an employer. It is MUCH easier today to make it on your own as an entrepreneur than it is the absolute mental torture the "corporate man career" route is. And I'm not joking. Modern day employment is so bureaucratized you are going to be more efficient and profitable in the long run starting your own company.

Second, because traditional employment is so painful and not the true source to financial success, you must view traditional employment for what it is—a tool to (in the most extreme Machiavellian sense) advance your own personal dreams. Your dreams are not to be a "good corporate man." Your dreams are to work up enough capital to start your own company or enough money to retire ASAP. You're not going for a gold watch. You're not going for a 401k match. You're not going for a corner office.

You are going in there, day in, day out, to fuck that company out of as much money for as little work as possible before you throw it away like the slut you picked up at the bar last Friday. You will pump and dump your employer.

Third (and this is really hard, but very key), train your brain to ignore all injustices, transgressions and politics at the office. This is arguably the biggest "problem" most of my "clients" have. They'll write page after page of how their co-worker didn't pull their weight, how a female peer filed a bogus complaint, how the boss changes his mind every day, and in general how the workplace is the opposite of a meritocracy.

So what?

Remember 1) you're not there for the long haul and 2) you don't care to get promoted. Just paid.

For example, I was 32 at the time and easily had over a decade of solid (and advanced) financial analytical experience. However, my boss was so inept and staff so dumbed down, that I could finish my real work in about 2 hours. This left 6 hours per day with nothing to do. So what did she have me do?

File and scan.

MOST of you would find this insulting. But I didn't. I had achieved that "Zen." Whether it was 8 hours a day doing advanced economic analysis or 8 hours a day filing and faxing, I didn't care. It was 8 hours a day I was getting paid for. And so I sat there for A MONTH

STRAIGHT doing nothing but scanning files in (the CEO didn't authorize the $1,200 for a high-speed scanner which would have cut it down to a week). Besides, where was I going to go? All the jobs, no matter what the pay or the titles, were just going to be the same damn thing.

Perhaps it is not what you wanted to hear. Perhaps it is a bit depressing to see yet another piece of the world co-opted and corrupted by societal decay. But like dating and women, you must also take this "red pill of employment" for it is reality. And just like dating, if you based your decisions in the real world, you will have much more success than sticking your head in the sand.

Reading Without Limits: A Review Of eBook Subscription App Oyster

February 19, 2014 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Imagine you're at a nice restaurant for dinner. The cheapest entrée on the menu is $40, and you're hungry. There's lots of exotic and foreign choices on the menu, but you've never had any of them, and you're wary of busting your wad on something you won't enjoy. Your friend recommends you something, but you aren't too sure you share the same tastes – you've taken his advice to your detriment in the past. If you're lucky, you make a bold choice, of say, sweetbread and you like it. Just as likely, you either end up with something weird and frankly disgusting, or something good but a little too familiar, like a rib-eye steak.

Now think about how you'd feel facing the same choice… except it's a buffet. You're free to take as much or as little as you want of every dish in the house. Instead of endlessly sweating the choice, about which dish will really give you the most pleasure, you sample freely and promiscuously. You even try dishes you thought you'd never like, just because there's no harm except a moment of discomfort. You've never had oysters, and they sound vaguely gross, but you're down to get a complimentary bite of one. You're getting more creative and open-minded about what you'll eat. All else equal, you vastly prefer the buffet to the conventional set-up of choosing one entrée.

Now, I like to read, but I'm as cheap as my name would suggest. There are lots of books I'd like to read, but the 'barrier to entry' of $5 or $10 has me wondering every time whether the book in question is really worth it, and more importantly, if I'll ever finish it. You might even spend more time reading reviews of books than you actually do the books. Plus, there are so many books in the public domain that you wonder if you should even bother ever buying a book when you have all those free classics you haven't read yet. On the other hand, public libraries have hours that are perfect for the homeless bums and the unemployed, and no one else, plus you always end up paying late fees, so I rarely use them.

Enter Oyster

Oyster is a subscription service for eBooks – the 'Netflix of books.' Oyster lets you read as many books as you like, at the cost of $10 a month, and the first month is free. And that setup of unfettered access makes a world of difference. It's like the difference between PornHub and that early 2000's internet porn where you never got more than a thirty second clip. Or you used Kazaa, with its pornographically transmitted viruses that threatened to nuke your computer. Good luck explaining that one to your parents. After what seems like just a minute or two with Oyster, you've got fifty ~~tabs open~~ books on your reading list, and you're still browsing for more.

Without the obstacle of paying every time you want to read something, users will spend more time reading real books instead of dithering over whether to spend money on a book or say, a movie or a night out. As a subscription service, you'll know exactly what you'll spend for the year on books, except for books you may purchase outside the service.

The App Interface

The app is well designed, sporting a dark, turquoise-tinged look. Throughout the menus there are scrolling series of book covers. When you click on a cover, you get to the 'landing page' for that book, with a synopsis and the publish date, as well as a list of related books. Users can rate books with between one and five stars.

As in the screenshot above, there will be a horizontal scrolling series of titles under different headings, eg ‘Recommended for You’ or ‘Rebels & GroundBreakers,’ different genres and assortments of books that you can scroll through by swiping right or left, or you can scroll down to see more such assortments.

There are several options for fonts and their sizing, as well as the background ‘paper’ color – the dark background with light text is helpful for reading at night, to drain less power and ease your transition to sleep. There are five font sizes, and five different font and paper background pairings to choose from. Users can leave notes and highlight text, but not search within the books. When an author references another part of the book, eg Chapter 5, the text will be hyperlinked so users can go to that section immediately, as well as return easily with a little link in the bottom left corner. Oyster even has a minimalistic browser for when you click on links within books to outside material.

Privacy and Anonymity

Bad news if anyone else is using your Oyster account, though. The app prominently displays the books you’re currently reading, so unless you want everyone to know you’re a devotee of Debbie Does Daddy, you’ll have to avoid those sorts of books or keep your iOS device locked down—the app is for the iPhone and iPad only currently. Also, the app lacks a hide function – books you’ve already added to your reading list keep appearing in the app’s displays. If there’s a book you know you never want to read, there’s no way to ‘block’ it from appearing in those book discovery queues. Plus, you can’t block off whole genres of work that you’d never care for. That’s like logging onto XHamster and being blitzed with gay porn as well straight porn. That would ensure a quick death for any porn site aspiring to appeal to the 96% of men who aren’t homosexual.

Oyster offers a nascent social network where you can subscribe to the accounts of friends and others, to see what they are reading, and what they recommend. For someone who writes under a pseudonym, I found these lackluster. Oyster requires your real name and address for billing purposes, but for you to link up with people on Twitter, you must log in to your Twitter account, linking your Twitter account to your Oyster account. You can change your displayed name as you like, but you can't just type in someone's Twitter handle and choose to follow them on Oyster if they have an account. You have to know the name they go by on Oyster. If you are trying to shield your identity, you might find these options confusing and difficult. It would be great if say, you could choose to follow a Twitter user of my choice, and automatically all the accounts that that user chooses to follow.

Book Discovery

The mechanism for discovering more books through the app is erratic; you can browse by genre and sub-genre, but that's no guarantee that you'll find a book you like even when they have it. For instance, there is a dating section within the self-help genre, with a scrolling series of book covers, about a dozen or two in number. The Game by Neil Strauss appears, as does a book by Kezia Noble. No books by Uncle Roosh appear… except when you search 'Roosh,' four of his titles appear – Bang, Bang Colombia, A Dead Bat in Paraguay, and his magnum opus Compliment & Cuddle: The Beta Male Method To Getting Laid. Oyster's poor book discovery algorithm is single-handedly keeping men from cuddling their way to relationship bliss.

Oyster recently put up their library on their website, except it lacks the vital search function that the app has. This is a pretty glaring oversight—the service may be 'training' potential users to treat it like a buffet. Instead of searching the menu to see if they offer what someone already wants, the user makes a selection from what's available.

Through the genre directory and lists of popular titles and topics, Oyster shows off a fair number of books. Unfortunately, it seemed like a lot of trendy fare that didn't pique my interest. While some may appreciate that, I would have liked to see some exposure given to older, more classic books, be it Henry James or Philip Roth, books that Oyster in fact has. It almost feels like Oyster is trying to compete with conventional booksellers by showing off their shiniest newest titles, but for the most part I don't care how fresh off the presses a book is, just that it's good and relevant to my interests. Oyster's slick interface for reading means that Oyster is valuable even for delivering free books to your device.

Book Selection

Oyster doesn't have the latest blockbusters. That would cannibalize new book sales too much, and to include them would surely mean charging double or triple its current monthly rate of $10. For the rate it's charging, its hard to expect the equivalent of movies currently in theaters delivered to your TV at home at the same time. And, on a casual glimpse, there seemed to be a lot more left-wing books prominently displayed than right-wing ones, though that may be because Oyster's users tend to be liberal.

Oyster doesn't stock new releases; it offers books published at least 3 months prior. And just because a book is that old, it's no assurance that Oyster will have it. For any given copyrighted book, odds are it's not in Oyster. But if you go in with the mindset of finding something among what they already have, you should have no problem being satisfied. You can peruse their catalog here: https://www.oysterbooks.com/ As in the analogy at the beginning, a buffet is never the equivalent of a fixed entrée of the same price – you give up some of the more popular, pricier fare, and the ability to make specific choices, to consume as much as you like.

If you keep an open mind, you're sure to discover some interesting finds, and start reading them immediately. You may even read about topics you never knew you were interested in. For instance, I started reading about Taoist sexual practices, and already have multiple books on the topic on my reading list. And compared to the library, getting more books is quick and easy.

Conclusion

It's never a good idea to rely on one company for a vital service, and the book industry is no different. With Amazon's vast share of the ebook market, and its occasional penchant for censorship, the need for more competition is dire. Even if Oyster is just as bad as Amazon, the mere existence of competition should keep Amazon on its toes. And for books with flagging sales, their presence on Oyster can help them avoid entering total obscurity. When users can read anything they want at no extra cost, they're apt to take more risks with what they read. For the manosphere, whose ideas and content get zero exposure from the mainstream media, this could be an essential advantage to spreading its ideas to 'unchurched' men. Writers could choose select works to appear on Oyster to build interest in their newer works. The social networking features of Oyster could help users see what their friends are reading and build interest in heretofore unknown books.

Color me optimistic. Oyster and its rivals hold out the promise of shifting people away from the media of mainstream television and film, whose content is overwhelmingly filth and lies, to more worthy works. If you're seeking to improve the health of your mind and unplug from the mass conformity of modern intellectual life, I can't think of a better move than canceling your cable and Netflix subscriptions and choosing an Oyster one instead. Not that Oyster lacks its own trashy equivalents to the sports and celebrity worship of mainstream media, but the scales are tipped; with thousands of books to choose from, it is far easier to find constructive wisdom for the man receptive to it.

Pros:

A Word On Masculinity From A 13th Century Poet

February 19, 2014 | by Dom Torres | Link | Original Link

The core of masculinity does not derive from being male,
nor friendliness from those who console.
Your old grandmother says, “Maybe you shouldn’t go to school. You look a little pale.”
Run when you hear that.
A father’s stern slaps are better.
Your bodily soul wants comforting.
The severe father wants spiritual clarity.
He scolds but eventually leads you into the open.
Pray for a tough instructor to hear and act and stay within you.
~ Rumi

Translation?

(1-2)Being masculine does not derive from simply having a penis, it’s earned.

(3-6) Keep people who want to coddle you at arms length. Those who advise you to “take it easy” or “slow down” may not intentionally seek to harm you but if you heed their advice they will in the long run. Chances are you will hear these words from a woman. It’s no coincidence Rumi chose a grandmother as an example.

(7-9) An ass beating will build more character than a consolation hug. Your body will naturally prefer the latter. I know mine did when my boxing instructor would yell or hit me upside the head whenever I did something wrong.

Bodily comfort and spiritual clarity are posed as opposites in these lines. Could they simultaneously exist? Thinking back to some of the things I have accomplished that I am most proud of, I don't think they can. My body always fought going to the gym, reading, studying, approaching a girl, even as I write this post my mind protests because it would rather be surfing mindlessly through the internet.

(10-13) There's no replacement for the tough-as-nails male figure who will be unyielding when you beg for an easy route. His methods might frustrate you at times, hell it may even cause you to throw a tantrum or two but they will help you achieve your goals. This is the instructor you should seek out so you can internalize his habits to apply later on in life.

For most this male figure is a father. Sadly nowadays more and more men are being raised without knowing their fathers, let alone learning life lessons from them. As good of a mother as you may have no woman can ever teach a man how to be a man. Despite what the media says women and men are not the same, we are wired differently. To these men I would recommend they find a mentor (coach, professor, etc.) or learn as much as they can from different men that are admirable.

What happens when you raise a generation of sons without fathers or male mentorship? Well, just look around. You get males who don't know how to deal with women, are insecure, oversensitive, and complain at the sight of anything that requires ~~real~~ any work.

Conclusion

The core of masculinity derives from a masculine mentor and hard work.

How To Control Your Emotions With Women

February 20, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Let's keep it real gents, what is the number one way we as men tend to fuck up interactions with women? By not having a handle on our emotions. Whether it's being nervous when approaching that sexy filly at the hotel bar, having a girl reject you in front of your buddies, or getting dumped, men who allow their emotions to rule their actions, will be in for a rough ride when dealing with the roller-coaster behavior of women.

When I was a young buck, I struggled with controlling my emotions. Emotions create memories and I can tell you my friend, I have some horrific memories of not handling my emotions with girls. Allow me to warn you now, to NOT to make the same mistakes and to learn from me.

For simplicity sake, emotions come in two forms: Positive and Negative. When people think about controlling their emotions, they generally think about controlling negative emotions, but learning how to control positive emotions is just as important.

Positive Emotions

-You approached a girl in your local Whole Foods and she responded to your game. She gave you her number and you have plans to grab a drink in a couple days. You're feeling pretty damn good. All of the game books you've read and all of the in the trenches practice you've put in actually paid off! Should you freak out and skip out of the store elated at your success? No.

The proper response, would be to give her a small smile and resume your shopping. If you want to have freak out when you get home of joy, then do so, but have your emotions under control that you can actually wait to do so.

-You just had the best sex of your life with the aforementioned Whole Foods girl and you're lying on your bed feeling on top of the world. Do you roll over, kiss her and tell her "that was the best sex of my life! I'm so happy right now. I never though I could find a girl who would make me feel that way"? Hell no.

You give her a small kiss on the forehead saying nothing. Her imagination will do the rest: 'does he like me?', 'did he think the sex was good?' etc.

Here's something a player in development must understand: Women are NOT attracted to men who are controlled by their emotions. Period. If you allow yourself to go to either extreme, then you have to put yourself in check. Less is more. There's a legitimate reason why women are attracted to the 'strong, silent type'. This doesn't mean you have to be stone cold and have ice water running through your veins, but instead learn to reserve your reaction until AFTER you have had time to process the situation. Taking an extra few seconds or minutes can be the difference between being a man in control, or an out of control beta bitch boy.

The other reason is that emotions cloud your judgement. When you feel like you're 'in love', then are you the most rational? Do you ignore blatant red flags that she's giving off because you're so 'intoxicated' on her 'love'? Learning to control your emotions and approach relationships pragmatically, is not only part of the red pill, but also key to saving you from unnecessary emotional pain.

I cannot tell you how many highs and lows it took for me when dealing with women, before I got a handle on my emotions. One day, I decided, that I must be the master of my ship; not a girl. When I decided that, you cannot believe the peace that came over me. No longer would I be a puppy dog chasing that 'high' around, but instead focused on my happiness solely. If a girl can compliment my life than great, but if not, it's no sweat off my nose.

Negative Emotions

This is the part of emotions that most of us can identify with. That heart-wrenching feeling of getting dumped out of 'nowhere', the ultimate rejection after you've done everything in the relationship you thought you should have and what society told you to do, can be catastrophic to your life. There's men in prison right this very second because they could not control their emotions in a breakup. Don't be that guy.

Hear me loud and clear: Women are NOT attracted to men that they can control. Period. If they know that their words and actions have enough of an impact to send you into a depression or even into a jubilant state, than you are fucked.

You must get a grip on yourself and allow yourself to be a 'Mountain Man': A man who will not be moved by a woman's actions and emotional outbursts.

The best way to deal with a girl throwing a fit, is simply to treat them like you would a child. Do not be moved, do not shout, do not grovel, do not plead, do not negotiate: You are the leader and she has to know that she can toss to and fro emotionally and that you are a rock. You want women to act more effeminate? Then start acting like a man. When she feels 'safe' that she can have her highs and lows and you're not going to run down the rabbit hole with her, then she will calm down and correct her behavior.

Here's a scenario of what NOT to do and what TO do when dealing with negative emotions as a man.

-You are driving home from the gym after a great day at the office closing an important deal and an intense workout. Your blood is pumping, your muscles are tight and you have that after-workout pump. In essence, you feel damn good. You get a call out from the girl that you just became exclusive with and she is crying. You can't really make out what she's saying because of her emotional outbursts. She finally clears her throat and tells you, "I can't be with you anymore. It's not going to work and I'd like for you to give me space".

Your heart starts pounding and that familiar icy cold grip on your chest tightens like a boa constrictor around it's prey. You can hardly breathe. The adrenaline causes you to accelerate faster pushing the gas pedal down and weaving through traffic. "If only I can get to her house quick and talk to her then she'll change her mind", you think. Blinded by the sense of betrayal you feel, you are clueless to the toddler who runs into the street to retrieve his ball. You hear the thump before you screech to a stop. You step out of your car and there's a blood streak on the pavement and your heart drops once again. Twenty-five years later you're released from prison and you barely remember the woman's name who caused your demise.

HOLD UP!

Is this an extreme example? Yes. But it can happen.

Let’s look at how you should respond instead, by having control of your emotions.

You put the phone in the passenger seat, because YOUR life is more important than this petty bullshit. You take 10 deep breaths and look for the nearest exit to pull off and regain your composure. Your now ex-girlfriend is still prattling in the phone, oblivious to your emotional pain, but it doesn’t matter, you’ve got both hands on the steering wheel and are focused on the road.

You pull off at gas station and put the car in park. You take another deep breath and look at yourself in the flip-down visor mirror. You look deep into your eyes and remember McQueen’s articles about affirmations and knowing your worth. You silently speak one encouraging YOURSELF. You smile for a moment and you already feel slightly better.

You pick up the phone and your now ex girlfriend continues to prattle. You cut in, “Doll…you beat me to it. It’s not working. Take care”. Click. You hit the ‘END CALL’ button FIRST keeping you in control and you breathe a sigh of relief. You thumb through your contacts and notice another cute girl’s number you just got a couple days ago at your local Hooters. Michelle is a sexy 22 year old college student with a big smile and even bigger boobs. You call her and her cheery voice answers. A date is planned…just like that.

Now what result do you want?

To recap:

-Always put yourself first: don’t worry about her fits, her tantrums and her explosive behavior. Realize that your safety and well being are paramount over everything and remove yourself from the situation first before it escalates.

-Take 10 deep breaths BEFORE reacting. I can guarantee that it will center you and send oxygen to your brain which will help you think more clearly and rationally.

-Realize that NO GIRL is worth risking your life over. The baddest chick you can imagine with the longest legs, the best breasts and who gives blowjobs like a Hoover vacuum is NOT worth flipping out over and getting yourself into a situation with no escape.

-Realize that by being a 'Mountain Man', you are a Man In Control and women are attracted to men in control.

-Realize that allowing a woman to control your emotions you become unattractive to women and they will quickly lose respect for you when you operate like a beta bitch boy.

-Realize that those two balls swinging between your legs are what separates you from women and that you will not react like a screaming housewife, but instead will act like a Leader and a Man With A Plan. You can fucking do this, you can control your emotions and you can be a damn rock who won't be swayed by nagging, tantrums, outbursts and idiotic behavior by a woman.

I understand that as men emotions are very powerful natural urges that can seemingly overpower us, but a real man and a player in development, must learn to control his emotions and not allow emotions to control him. You will be happier, have more peace and be more successful with women if you get a handle on this now and not before it's too late.

What Conan The Barbarian Reveals About The Origins Of Strength

February 20, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

> That which does not kill us makes us stronger. – Friedrich Nietzsche

The original Conan the Barbarian (1982) is one of the most important spiritual parables of our time, and reveals the wellspring from which strength flows.

Although at first glance merely a simple action film, the original Conan the Barbarian was written and directed by John Milius, the screenwriter of Apocalypse Now,who was part of the same wave of film school graduates that produced George Lucas and Francis Ford Coppola.

> "Conan is a movie that has definitely got a singular vision in it," Milius states. "Directors don't do that today. They just shoot the movie. It's all how slick it can look, as opposed to whether you like this movie or not. It does have it's own morality. It does have it's own code of behavior."

In the commentary track director John Milius says, "it's really not just a simple story. It's about what makes us what we are." Conan is a movie about transformation and how pain, wounding, and trauma can fuel personal growth and ultimately create a stronger version of man.

Spoilers follow. If you haven't seen the film and plan to watch it, bookmark this article and come back to it after watching the film, because I'm going to be breaking down key scenes, including the finale.

The Riddle of Steel

In the first scene of the film, Conan's father implores young Conan to learn "the riddle of steel," establishing the theme of the film and setting him on the quest of his life.

> Conan's Father: The secret of steel has always carried with it a mystery. You must learn its riddle, Conan. You must learn its discipline. For no one – no one in this world can you trust. Not men, not women, not beasts.
> [Points to sword]
> Conan's Father: This you can trust.

Immediately afterward, Conan's village is raided by Thulsa Doom (James Earl Jones) and Conan's family is killed before his eyes. The scene is staged brilliantly. By showing his mother's beheading in a shot on young Conan, Milius captures the feeling of loss and abandonment that will drive Conan for the rest of his life. Her hand slips out of Conan's. He turns and she is gone.

A modern more gore-obsessed director might focus on the sword impacting his mother's neck and blood spurting out, but this film understands that the true impact of this scene is on Conan's emotional world.

"I always like it that he doesn't look at her. He looks at his hand, because that's all that's left," says Milius. "And he (Thulsa Doom) looks at the blade, because steel is true." Thulsa understands the Riddle of Steel. Conan is yet to learn.

Once Conan looks from his sense of loss to Thulsa his path is set for life. This one trauma will cause all the other events of the film, sending Conan on a lifelong quest to avenge his family and kill Thulsa Doom.

From here, Conan sets off on a series of adventures. He is sold into slavery, fights in a Coliseum, experiences women for the first time, and is tempted by a witch – each adventure building his strength and preparing him for his final confrontation.

Thulsa Explains Steel

When Conan meets Thulsa again in the third act, after slaying his pet snake, Thulsa explains the Riddle of Steel to Conan.

> Conan: The riddle… of steel.
> Thulsa Doom: Yes! You know what it is, don't you boy? Shall I tell you? It's the least I can do. Steel isn't strong, boy, flesh is stronger! Look around you. There, on the rocks; a beautiful girl. Come to me, my child…
> [he coaxes the girl to jump to her death]
> Thulsa Doom: That is strength, boy! That is power! What is steel compared to the hand that wields it? Look at the strength in your body, the desire in your heart, I gave you this! Such a waste. Contemplate this on the tree of woe. Crucify him!

What Thulsa reveals is that strength is not an external power, but an internal one that Conan received in his early life trauma. The loss of his parents fueled something in Conan that allowed him to overcome all the trials of his life and drove him to build himself into a great warrior. He was wounded, but he has healed stronger.

This principle of healing stronger is at the core of strength training. When you lift heavy weights, you actually tear your muscles. Your body heals the damage by filling in the tear with new tissue, making the muscle bigger and stronger. It's thematically fitting that Arnold Schwarzenegger was cast as the lead in this film, since he not only embodies the physique of Conan, but as a person lives this principle of strength.

It's also fitting that Conan is crucified in the next scene. Crucifixion was actually a common punishment in the ancient world, but most modern audiences associate it with Christ. Although Christ's crucifixion involved intense suffering, most Christians understand this suffering was necessary for His transformation, and ultimately lead something greater.

Similarly, only after confronting suffering for the first time did Buddha began meditating under the Bodhi tree. Before he saw death firsthand, Buddha was content to live as a Prince. Although not a necessity, suffering can be the catalyst for transformation.

Conan Becomes Steel

It's fitting that the final confrontation between Conan and Thulsa takes place at the top of a temple, surrounded by religious followers. Only during this confrontation does Conan come to understand the riddle of steel.

> Thulsa Doom: My child, you have come to me my son. For who now is your father > if it is not me? I am the wellspring, from which you flow. When I am gone, you will have never been. What would your world be, without me? My son.

In this moment, Conan realizes that everything he is and has become is the result of Thulsa taking his family at a young age. Notice the language Thulsa uses – "I am the wellspring from which you flow." Film dialogue is often short and functional. It's rare to see a film willing to indulge this kind of poetry, but the film Conan the Barbarian does so frequently.

Later film versions of Conan have assumed the character is just about bad-ass fantasy action. While this adds to the appeal, in Milius's version Conan's strength comes from his emotional wounding. Doing the character of Conan without this would be like trying to write a Batman movie where his parents never died, or a Spider-man film where Uncle Ben never tells him that with great power comes with great responsibility.

Most of the popular superhero films dominating the box office follow the central theme of Conan's Riddle of Steel, with emotional trauma causing the hero to transform into a more powerful version of himself. However, unlike those characters Conan moves beyond his emotional wounding, to reach what Joseph Campbell calls in his classic work on myth the "freedom to live." Conan knows killing Thulsa will end his quest, but he no longer needs the pain Thulsa caused to transform.

When Conan lifts Thulsa's severed head over the crowd, rather than emphasizing the moment with the film's powerful score, there is silence. We hear only the foley of Thulsa's head rolling down the steps. Thulsa's followers quietly disperse, extinguishing their flames in the water below Conan's throne, a powerful visual metaphor for the end of Conan's quest.

Conan rides off into the sunset. An image of Conan as a king teases a sequel, but at this point, he is a king within. Conan does not need trauma or wounding anymore, but he could never have reached his full power without it – without the riddle of steel.

The Spiritual Lesson Of Conan

People who discover self-development, the red pill, spirituality, bodybuilding, entrepreneurship, or any of the other paths of personal growth discussed on this site often began their journey due to suffering.

Many men take the red pill because their previous approach to women failed. They are drawn to weightlifting because they used to feel small. They are drawn to healthy eating because they used to be fat. They are drawn to meditation because their minds were chaotic. They are drawn to building a business because they used to be a wage slave. They are drawn to self-development because their lives used to be a mess.

What Conan implies is that without that suffering, we might never have been put on the path the to let go of it, and that rather than being embarrassed by our former hardships, we can be grateful for what they really were – an opportunity to transform into stronger versions of ourselves. Had we never been weak, we might not have become strong. This is the Riddle of Steel.

The One Campaign That Will End Obesity Once And For All

February 20, 2014 | by Daddy | Link | Original Link

There is no denying that western people are inflating. In North America, over 50% of the population is overweight, which means that their body mass is such that it might pose a health risk. The cost of health care is going up while the available resources are going down. There is an epidemic and if nobody finds a solution to it, the economy might go towards a slow painful death.

Many have tried to find a cure. There are a million books on the subject with a new exercise program or diet every year, and the truth is these books are centered on the same old and only way to lose body fat: good dieting and exercising. But the elephant in the room is being ignored. The real reason they fail is because there has always been a simple lack of motivation for overweight people to go through all these changes and maintain them. It's time to change that now.

Enter this new revolutionary health campaign to convince fat people to lose weight: send your extra calories to Africa. Save the children.

The math

There are roughly 500 million people in North America of which 250 million are obese. Let's grossly estimate they have on average 25 pounds of extra fat. There are 9 calories per gram of fat and 454 grams per pounds, so 25 pounds x 454 grams x 9 calories = 102 150 accumulated calories per big person. If we estimate that a child needs between 1000 and 1200 calories a day, then the extra body rolls of one obese American could have fed one African child for three months. Indeed, according to worldhunger.org, 5 million children from all over the world die each year from malnutrition, of which about 1.25 million are Africans. Therefore, 250 million of overweight Americans and Canadians eating huge excess of calories yearly could easily feed these children, plus a lot more, considering that not all excess of calories are stocked in the body.

In fact, they could feed and sustain everybody down there. There are about 239 millions of starving people in Africa if we include adults, which is less than the total number of overweight people in North America. The other way to approach the situation is to realize that the average American eats about 4000 calories a day, which is an extra 2000 unnecessary calories that could feed an entire other human being. If we add the numbers, the 250 millions of overweight people could use their extra calories to feed the 239 millions of starving Africans just from their excessive eating. Isn't that shocking?

Of course, the enemies of wisdom don't want you to hear this kind of truth. The information is distorted and buried by the fat acceptance movement who claims there is nothing wrong with being fat. They spin it with their fatalism and try to convince us that obese people are huge due to a genetic illness or that it's not their fault, it's just someone else's fault. They also pretend that only their appearance is being judged, in an attempt to make critics look superficial, while their laziness and selfishness are also in question.

While I don't advocate attacking fat people personally, it's another thing for society to tell them being fat is not a problem, that big is beautiful and that the only thing they need to do about it is learning to accept themselves as they are. If society keeps this misinformation up and running, they will never change, and the next stage of delusion will be them being proud of something they shouldn't be proud of.

Take a good moment to assess the ampleur of their extreme privilege when they parade and demand society for their right to be fat and accepted. People around the world can see them on TV and on the Internet, and millions of those people are preoccupied with whether they will have a job and a salary tomorrow morning. When these people get down on the streets, it's to militate for freedom of speech or access to food and water. They can see these fat American women flaunting their flesh around proudly and loudly like an accomplishment, while parents who watch them might not even have enough to feed their own children.

Complains she is a victim and demands society to accept her gluttony. It's not her fault if she has so much food available and can't stop eating it.

Works all day to ensure her children have enough food. Does not complain. Might even smile more than western women.

Obese people, every time you put ice cream in your mouth, remember that a child is dying in the dirt waiting for food that will never come. So, you need a good reason to lose weight? Finally you have a motivation to do so. If you can't do it for the sake of your own health, for your appearance or for lowering the burden on the health system, then at last you can be a hero and do it for the children. Stop eating excessively now, and take the money you would have used to buy your extra chips, doughnuts, cookies, chocolate or cupcakes and donate it to African children. You will feel great about it, and you can repeat the good deed every year for the rest of your life. It's a miracle: you will be cured of your obesity disease and at the same time you will save others.

As for the fat acceptance lobbyists, think for a second about your actions and your responsibilities towards society. If you took all your energy, effort and resources away from trying to convince people to eat everything they want and invested it into encouraging them to donate instead, not only would you eradicate obesity in America, but you would also save Africa. You would be deemed geniuses for that idea and be saluted for it instead of being seen as over privileged western buffoons. I urge you to encourage your peers to generosity and charity instead of selfishness and gourmandism. Together we can. If only 0.5% of overweight people participated every year, all the African children would be saved. Donate your extra calories now.

When Galileo Pointed A Telescope To The Sky

February 20, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

THE STARRY MESSENGER;
OR,
An Interpretation of that strange Apparition of three Suns seene in London, 19 Novemb. 1644. being the Birth Day of King CHARLES.

The effects of the Eclips of the Sun, which will be visible in ENGLAND, 21 August 1645. whose influence continues in force, from January, 1646. to Decemb. 1647 almost two whole years; and cannot but be the sure ensuer of some extraordinary alterations in most Common wealths of Europe; or principally in ENGLAND. With an Answer to an Astrologicall Judgement.
Printed at Oxford, upon his Majesties present March.

By WILLIAM LILLY Student in Astrologie.

LONDON,
Printed for John Partridge and Humphry Blunden, and are to be sold at the Signe of the Cocke in Ludgate Street, and the Castle in Cornhill, 1645.

Galileo got his hands on one of the first telescopes and decided to point it at the sky. Amazed at what he was seeing, he wrote this short book to share his observations in elegant and clear writing.

The Starry Messenger is the first work that describes the cratered surface of the moon (at the time it was thought to be smooth) and the moons of Jupiter. He shares his findings with exuberance:

> This part of the moon's surface, where it is spotted as the tail of a peacock is sprinkled with azure eyes, resembles those glass vases which have been plunged while still hot into cold water and have thus acquired a crackled and wavy surface, from which they receive their common name of "icecups."

> To assert that the moon's secondary light is imparted by Venus is so childish as to deserve no reply. Who is so ignorant as not to understand that from new moon to a separation of sixty degrees between moon and sun, no part of the moon which is averted from the sun can possibly be seen from Venus? And it is likewise unthinkable that this light should depend upon the sun's rays penetrating the thick solid mass of the moon, for then this light would never dwindle, inasmuch as one hemisphere of the moon is always illuminated except during lunar eclipses. And the light does diminish as the moon approaches first quarter, becoming completely obscured after that is passed.
> I have observed the nature and the material of the Milky Way. With the aid of the telescope this has been scrutinized so directly and with such ocular certainty that all the disputes which have vexed philosophers through so many ages have been resolved, and we are at last freed from wordy debates about it. The galaxy is, in fact, nothing but a congeries of innumerable stars grouped together in clusters. Upon whatever part of it the telescope is directed, a vast crowd of stars is immediately presented to view. Many of them are rather large and quite bright, while the number of smaller ones is quite beyond calculation.
> …now we have not just one planet rotating about another while both run through a great orbit around the sun; our own eyes show us four [moons] which wander around Jupiter as does the moon around the earth, while all together trace out a grand revolution about the sun in the space of twelve years.

Even though Galileo's equipment was primitive, the rudimentary astronomy he uses still takes a good amount of background information and mathematics to understand. His observations may be confusing to the layman.

You won't help but smile when Galileo relays how stunned he is to notice that there are more stars that exist than what is visible to the naked eye. "Inconceivable," he says. The knowledge and science that we take for granted today was brand new in his time, and I can only imagine what a rush it must have been for him to be the first to discover so many truths of the universe.

He ends the book with a cliffhanger:

> Time prevents my proceeding further, but the gentle reader may expect more soon.

This future work, centered on proving the Copernican model of the solar system, led to house arrest until his death.

4 Fantastic Peak Experiences

February 20, 2014 | by TheMaskAndRose | Link | Original Link

Before I delve into this, let's clarify terms. To me, a "peak experience" is something so powerful, so moving, such a massive paradigm shift in your worldview and relation to yourself and others that it will stick with you until your dying day. When that day comes and you reflect on your life, these are the adventures that you will remember with a smile and think to yourself, "Man, that was one of the best things I ever did for yourself."

Because in my 26 years on this planet, that's one of the most poignant lessons I've learned: the most powerful things that will happen to and for you, are the result of your own efforts. Winning a lottery may be exciting, but I doubt anyone would look back on such an event as a time when they overcame hardship, conquered the odds, and walked away with the crown in defiance of what everyone else told them was possible.

Such events happen when you tell your shitty life to go fuck itself and take all your power back from those who would seek to siphon it away from you. Here are some peak experiences, that many people can relate to, which exemplify what I'm talking about.

1. Overcoming Serious Medical Illness

When I was 16 years old, I was not a healthy guy. A doctor told me that by the time I hit 20, I would not be able to get out of bed. At 26, looking back on that conversation motivates me in a way that perhaps only guys like Lance Armstrong would understand; someone told you you were in trouble, and you were able to overcome it.

Being a perfectly healthy 26-year old is great. But it's nothing compared to what was "supposed" to be happening at this point in my life. It is the haters and doubters who should motivate you; let the words "no" and "impossible" be your guide.

Once you've had such an experience, you can only laugh at anyone who dares throw such limiting words your way and you will never take other peoples' opinions on what you can accomplish seriously, ever again.

2. Getting Clean If You're An Addict

Alistair Crowley once wrote that he encouraged people to addict themselves to heroin just so they could have the experience of liberating themselves by getting it out of their system.

While I would certainly never encourage anyone to deliberately mess with their own health, I can say with 100% conviction as a former addict that, yes, cleaning up is an experience like no other. It is painful, mentally, physically and emotionally. You will have to scrub your inner wounds in order to heal them. But once you do the work, put yourself through the Gauntlet and come out blasting on all cylinders on the other side–I can hardly articulate how incredible it feels.

It is like a slave suddenly smashing his chains and going on to live a life he never dreamed was possible. One in which he gets to decide the course of his day, of his life, without his master dictating where and when he should go and how he should behave.

It is one of the most liberating experiences I've ever had, and I encourage anyone struggling with addiction to do the work necessary to free yourself from that hell.

3. Walking Away From A Hot Girl Who Loves You

Most of us have been in relationships at some point. Furthermore, many have been involved with girls who were deeply invested in us, while we could barely remember their names. Every once in a while, a woman's hotness and desire to please you will move you in such a way that your genetic imperative to make her your baby momma will blind you to the reality that perhaps it's not the best idea. You harness every ounce of your logic and reason, realize it's a raw deal, and keep her at an appropriate distance.

This can be awfully difficult if she's the kind of girl who you've always dreamed of carrying around on your arm, showing off at parties and to your family, rubbing in peoples' faces what kind of girl you're attracting these days. But then, say, she has gotten "tired of being just a fuckbuddy" and demands an upgrade. Smart men know the dangers of this trap, and will never agree to a woman's demands. Even if we secretly desire to upgrade her, we know better than to do so on her terms as the result of an ultimatum.

At that point, you cut her loose. You tell her it's been great, it's been fun, but that's not really your style. You watch with fascination as her hamster picks up speed, throwing every tool in its arsenal at you, and you stand by your frame and let her go. How hard do you think it's going to be to hold your frame with other girls after that? The 5′s and 6′s at the bar, demanding your attention and money, will appear as cartoon characters purely there for your amusement.

However, as great as all three of those things, nothing quite tops…

4. Telling Everything And Everyone To Go Fuck Itself For A While

I mean it. Every once in a while, when you're so stuck in a routine that life feels like Groundhog Day, Ghost. Break up with your girlfriend(s). Tell your housemates you're leaving. Quit your job. Tell your friends you're going to live your own life for a while.

Then travel. Don't ask anyone else where you should go, do your own research and be reticulate in where you want to go, why you want to go, etc. Decide what you're leaving behind, and what you're seeking instead. Write a new story for yourself, and become whoever you've always wanted to be until the grind of daily life forced you to be someone else.

Then do it. Buy the ticket. Ditch your phone. Use the computer sparingly and keep communication with the outside world to a bare minimum.

You can do this for a month, a few months, or even years if you really want to and have the funding to do so (and luckily, there are plenty of awesome jobs everywhere). You will completely lose the shitty paradigms you learned in the United States, absorb better and healthier parts of other cultures, and get closer and closer to finding your true Self: the ultimate prize for a seeker in this world.

With each experience like this, one more layer of slavery is shed. One more Red Pill is taken, and you are one step closer to becoming the Man you were born to be. He's in your blood, in your DNA, and fuck anyone trying to keep you from growing into your destiny.

Take back your power, take back your sack, and unleash yourself to the fullest extent onto the world around you. It is your playground, so go play for a while and make memories that will change and stay with you forever.

Black Propaganda in Feminism Part II

February 21, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

It appears that codename “Bavarian” has escalated his propaganda operation against feminists on Twitter. His previous work has been documented here. Basically, a group of individuals are posing as various characters to sow dissension and spread disinformation in certain feminist circles on Twitter. This has been entertaining to watch and appears to be quite successful. He has provided me with some “declassified” screenshots. You can also see it on privilege-wars-of-2013.tumblr.com/. He is gearing upfor a new operation called “OPERATION: CUCKOO’S NEST”.

Things like seem to stir the pot. This manufactured discord by race is especially sinister to use against a leftist ideology.

> Objective
> To provide covert tactical support for Legionarii by neutralizing the People of Oppression (PoO), including–but not limited to–feminists and Social Justice Warriors (SJW).
> We will seek to humiliate, ridicule, and otherwise demoralize PoO on Twitter by infiltrating their ranks and exacerbating already existing tensions regarding divisive issues such as race, religion, politics, income inequality, homosexuality, age, transgenderism, abortion, crime, etc. Further, we will agitate moderate individuals by advocating extremist viewpoints for the purposes of recruitment and retention.

> Goals
> Undermine the will of the PoO to resist.
> Increase unrest among the PoO population.
> Increase desertion or surrender of PoO forces.
> Reduce PoO interference with Legionarii's operations.
> Undermine the credibility of PoO leadership.
> Increase acceptance of Legionarii's forces on Twitter.
> Deter intervention of neutral groups.
> Counter propaganda.

> Preparation

> Design your character. Really get in touch with your feminine side and think about what kind of character you'd be good at impersonating, then answer the following questions:
> What's her name?
> Is your character female or transgendered?
> What race is she?
> Is she a Radical Feminist or an Intersectional Feminist (Read the Wiki pages on both of these).
>
> What is her age?
> What are her politics?
> What are her hobbies?
> What are her disabilities (disabilities are celebrated within the PoO community so don't be timid about inventing one)?
> Set up Twitter account. Subtlety is key when creating a twitter account. Remember, we're trying to blend in. Follow these steps:
>
> Create a new email account (http://www.hushmail.com is recommended).
> Create a tumblr (http://www.tumblr.com) account (if you don't already have one) using your new email address.
> Search tumblr with #Me and save a profile picture suitable to your character.
> Sign up for a twitter (http://www.twitter.com) account using your character's name and your new email account.
> You must also choose a twitter handle, which other users will use to contact you. It starts with an "@". Be creative, but be subtle. For example, if your character's name is Mikki Kelly, you could create a handle like "@MikkiRadFem" or "@KellyKickBoxer".
> Write a profile espousing your beliefs and/or hobbies. Again I stress, subtlety is of the utmost importance.
> Google search images that would create a PoO-friendly header and background. For example, if you're posing as a SJW, try image searching "social justice". Or if your character has autism, image search "autism awareness", then load the images as your header and background.

> Create a Skype account and contact bavarianthearyan for further instructions. In the meantime, keep in mind this is not a joke. This is not trolling. This is PSYOPS. We expect you to remain professional at all times. We've lost many operatives due to reckless new recruits who thought it'd be funny to work outside the theoretical parameters we've set up to avoid account deletion.

This method of using the dastardly tools of the left against the left is delicious. I can taste those tears of rage and frustration through my computer. It does bring up some issues though. One big one that I have realized is how many of these "online feminists" are the real deal. With operations like this going on , one really cannot tell. I guess that is a good thing. It also appears that some feminist personalities have actually been infiltrated by Bavarian and his operatives.

Why Do We Root For Women To Hit The Wall?

February 21, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

> Daddy's flown across the ocean
> Leaving just a memory
> Snapshot in the family album
> Daddy what else did you leave for me?
> Daddy, what'd'ja leave behind for me?!?
> All in all it was just a brick in the wall.
> All in all it was all just bricks in the wall.

Quick, pop quiz. Where is this excerpt from?

1. A famous rock song, or
2. A poem about an alpha male leaving his wife and child because she's due to hit the wall

If this was posted on a Manosphere forum or blog in today's world, one might think that the writer was writing about an alpha who left his aging woman for lands where he assumed the grass to be greener.

"Leaving just another memory…it was just a brick in the wall."

What does this mean? Could it mean the woman was simply another notch on the bedpost? Another woman simply left in the wake of a man making his mark on the world, and living his life exactly how he wanted to live it.

Fortunately, Another Brick In The Wall (above is Part I) was released in 1979, long before the times in which men started keyboarding jockeying-terms such as peacocking and hypergamy. It is also probably safe to assume that the members of Pink Floyd were too busy banging their way through groupies, creating alpha widows by the dozen, to ever give real worry about what their song really meant.

Alas, I am not a rock star.

In today's world, The Wall can generally be summed up as the point in time in which a woman sees her value to the opposite sex fall drastically. Of course, this value is primarily derived from a woman's looks, according to point number six of the ROK community beliefs:

> 6. A woman's value is mainly determined by her fertility and beauty. A man's value is mainly determined by his resources, intellect, and character.

Of course, the wall can also be accelerated, or slowed by offspring, habits such as diet and exercise, and overall pleasantness and femininity. Rollo Tomasi has a great article about The Wall that goes into further detail about these factors.

To this part of the Internet though, The Wall is a badge of pride. When we talk about the women who reject us, string us along, and hurt us to the point where we are forced to reflect upon ourselves, there seems to be a common phrase along the following lines dropped it response:

"Well, wait until SHE hits the wall. She has it coming, the bitch."

This phrase is nothing but a bitter mask to hide behind ourselves. A way to brace for the rejection, embarrassment, and difficulties of having beautiful women in your life, whether it be a harem or a single long-term relationship. Truthfully, it's nothing but a self-defense mechanism, or hell, a wall, to protect ourselves and our masculinity.

Look, I get it.

It's hard not to think like that when your 38-year-old, increasingly saggy wife cheats on you with the mailman. You can't help but think that her best days are long gone, and that in her aging state she'll never find a new man willing to put up with her shit.

It's hard not to think like that when the sexy party girl tells you that, "You're just such a good friend, we could never be together", then proceeds to take it up the ass backstage from the bass player of a shitty indie band. You can't help but look forward to the days that the late nights, hard drugs, and countless cocks gobbled on will catch up to her, and leave her a shell of her former self.

I understand, because I've been there, done that. I've bashed girls I have dated, endlessly, and cackled manically as they gained weight and lost the sexiness that drew them to me in the first place. I have no doubt this will become even more readily apparent as I begin to reach my prime during my 30's as a male. However, the endless bashing and laughing accomplished nothing for me other than a short-term band-aid, in which I could feel a little better about myself.

I realized it was nothing but a way to protect my fragile ego, because my own inner self and confidence couldn't handle a woman treating me the way they sometimes did. In a bitter state, such as after being screwed over by a girl, it's easy to fill with rage and hope that you can channel that energy towards sending a woman head-on into The Wall.

You can't.

That rage accomplishes nothing.

Your buddies will tire of the charade quickly. If they're good friends, they'll tell you to shut up and get on with your life. If you were to tell a girl directly that she is going to hit The Wall, she would simply laugh at you, and further prove her point that she was right to reject you, break up with you, or otherwise humiliate you in the way that she did.

So why waste your precious breath spitting vile at women for hitting The Wall?

That is wasted energy that you can easily channel towards better things, simply being the best you can be. There are a plethora of articles on this site that relate to self-improvement in a variety of ways. If you search around, you are bound to find several things that you can improve on, and that you can find a passion for. Pick your poison. Don't let that poison be your own bitterness seething beneath your skin.

The third and final part of Another Brick In The Wall reads as follows:

> I don't need no arms around me.
> And I don't need no drugs to calm me.
> I have seen the writing on the wall.
> Don't think I need anything at all.
> No! Don't think I'll need anything at all.
> All in all it was all just bricks in the wall.
> All in all you were all just bricks in the wall.

Notice how the last verse has a slight variation between the first and final parts:

First: All in all it was all just bricks in the wall.

Second: All in all you were all just bricks in the wall.

The most talented artists leave their work open to interpretation. I doubt Pink Floyd thought they were contributing to 2014 modern-day seduction when they penned those lyrics in the 70's, but they sent a great message.

Do not let any woman cause you to harbor resentment, because it is simply wasted energy. Stop hoping desperately for old girls to hit The Wall so you can look them up on Facebook for a brief chuckle. This bitterness and mask for insecurity is simply a distraction from living a complete and fulfilling life as a man.

Woman are simply one piece of the puzzle, and one singular women should never be the entire foundation of your life.

They're all just bricks in the wall.

Infants And Toddlers Are More Intelligent Than Feminists

February 21, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

A young child, even from the age of 18 months, is acutely aware of it's sexuality, with toddler boys seeking out guns and cars and being more tuned to logistics, orientation, and counting. Girls ignore those exciting toys in favor of dolls, toy prams and mommy type games. Young children cling onto their favorite toys as an identity marker in early life, with girls especially prone to have a favorite teddy they want to have with them like a baby. They copy mom, but boys don't have this urge.

Feminism has failed in its cause to validate women precisely because it seeks to validate females by competition only in male realms of education, qualifications, science, politics and so forth rather than empowering women to be mothers and partners with men in the grand human scheme.

Feminism would be more accurately termed "masculization for females". The term feminism is a perfect example of what George Orwell would call Newspeak. A word that appears to have one meaning (with a positive connotation) but in fact carries a negative and socially harmful—even controlling content to it, whilst having nothing to do with what the average person might actually glean from the term on face value.

Nothing in the aims and treatise of feminism works towards more feminine woman, appreciating the feminine energy, or supporting the cause of women who want to be real mothers, wives and 'all woman'. Rather, women are encouraged to cease feminine pursuits and seek male orientated higher education and careers—or be written off as old fashioned or suppressed. Men never suppressed women, they just operated within natural laws. It's the feminists that operate unnaturally by trying to shoe horn women into male roles whilst feminizing males.

Polarity Not Equality

The entire universe is created from polarity, right down to the electron orbiting the proton. What feminism does is suggest to electrons that they turn into protons. This would obviously cause the breakdown of matter, rather than the equality of the particles. The universe is not about equality, it is about polarity. It is what it is and you cannot change its innate nature.

If any feminist wants equality, champions women in military combat roles or any other such nonsense–the logical conclusion should be to remove all sex-based categories in sport, which is not going to happen, simply because the female physical anatomy makes her weaker than a man. That's before we get into the female's hormonal setup which fluctuates wildly across the calendar month and doesn't have the same quantity of the essential testosterone, that makes males more competitive, have higher stamina, and be more suited to arduous or physically demanding tasks. Men also tend to make better team players, pushing each other to excel, and being able to handle put downs as an incentive to succeed, rather than simply bitching and back stabbing each other.

Trying to deny the very real polarity that exists between males and females is something not even children are stupid enough to attempt. Men don't die younger because they are male, they die younger because they take more risks and drive themselves far harder than women do. An aging man is far more useful than an aging woman, who after 50 is more prone to hormonal dis-balance, depletion of bone calcium, weight problems, uterine and breast problems, muscle loss and so forth.

The Female Is Becoming Obsolete

Genetic engineering is now capable of creating clones, splicing genes, eliminating genetic diseases, fertilizing eggs in a test tube, even clearing out the genetic contents of an egg and putting in an engineered DNA set. A large part of what takes place in the uterus is now possible in a lab. A uterus is only needed for the incubation period. Fertilized eggs have been implanted into the uterus for several decades now, removing 50% of the function of the uterus. All science needs is a means to incubate the fetus to term.

A part of that has already been taken care of with incubators meaning babies can survive from as young as 21 weeks into gestation, rather than the normal 40 weeks. We could say that around 50% of the uterine function of incubation has been removed. Although the science is still shaky and immature babies are known to suffer health issues later in life, the first airplanes were also wobbly. As incubators improve and breasts no longer needed to nurse the young, not much of the female is left.

Why would anyone breed females with weaker bodies other than for their reproductive capabilities ?

In the feminist's world of equality, all a female physical body has to offer besides a nice pair of tits to look at and a cunt for some sexual pleasure is a uterus to gestate new babies in. Once that component is taken care of by science, females are in big trouble, since they are not actually equal. They have not worked to make themselves valuable. Rather they have tried to compete in male-dominated fields where men will always dominate. A feminaizi or a man cunt as I like to call them is useless when compared to the advantages that any male naturally has. As men get increasingly irritated with the gibbering female entitlement, and as men continue to develop the science to replace the uterus completely, women may find themselves written out of the history books (though they're barely in it as is).

I'm not sure what kind of science fiction, dystopian future this might produce, but frankly it's more scientifically possible at this moment in time, than a warp drive or teleporter. Perhaps the odd tycoon will breed himself a female to enjoy sex like a fine old cigar, but it is entirely possible that men might just get fed up with women and breed only males.

Women do have some great qualities, but they have not worked on enhancing, appreciating or fostering their feminine talents. They should be more wary that feminism sets them up in a hopeless battle of competition against men. Men are brute force problem-solving creatures and if the female conundrum continues much longer, we will solve the issue once and for all by simply obsoleting females. This will be an unpleasant, unnatural world—an aggressive world that lacks the soft female warmth that we all love so much, just as the feminist's version is a sterile, emasculated and uninspiring existence that red pill men and women would rather die in than inhabit.

If the truth be told many of the hardened feminists simply have penis envy and would rather be men. Why else would they tell women to ignore their natural born sexuality and seek to compete with men? In truth most of what men have accomplished has been done out of love for their families and men's accomplishments have been nurtured and supported by women. Feminism on the other hand ignores natural polarity and pedestalizes women into selfish 'you go girl' egoism.

While men might go down in history for their inventions and achievements, any great man will tell you that the woman at his side and his family was extremely important in pushing him forwards. Whilst he might bask in the limelight he always knows his accomplishments are not solely his own. Real feminism would recognize and encourage this most natural state of affairs instead of trying to fight it. Men love women precisely because they do what men cannot, and women love men for being men. The president's wife may not be commander in chief, but she's surely risen to the height of FEMALE accomplishment as his wife. There is no glass ceiling, there are two separate staircases. It's not that complicated. The battle of the sexes is the most pointless and childish squabble, that even children do not engage in.

How Gay Activists Trashed The Competitive Spirit Of The Sochi Olympic Games

February 22, 2014 | by The Archangel Michael | Link | Original Link

Every four years, the World's greatest athletes in Nordic sports gather to compete in the Winter Olympic Games. The games are an opportunity for all nations to put aside their differences for a few weeks and enjoy watching world class athletes compete for the gold. The 2014 Winter Olympic Games being held in Sochi, Russia commenced two weeks ago.

This year, however, instead of the focus being on the masculine virtues of excellence and competition, an unsuspecting American television audience endured a full bore ad nauseam promotion of homosexuals and their so called values. Instead of being lifted up by the aspirational ideals of competition and athletic greatness, American families tuning in were pushed down into the cultural Marxist muck of ceaseless homosexual whining and debasement. This was by intent.

The background to this ongoing homosexual whine fest is that Russia is led by a man named Vladimir Putin. By all accounts, he is a devout Orthodox Christian. Among his accomplishments during his tenure as leader of Russia, has been the reinstitution of the Russian Orthodox Church as the moral center of the Russian nation. He has been the de facto leader of Russia since 1999. He is the alpha male of Russia.

In the Summer of 2013, the lower house of the Russian Federation (State Duma) voted 436-0 (with one abstention) and the upper house (Federation Council) voted 137-0 to pass a law which banned the promotion of homosexuality to minors. The Russian Orthodox Church enthusiastically endorsed the law and President Putin signed it making it the law of the land. To repeat, the combined vote in both houses of the Russian legislature was 573 in favor, 0 opposed, 1 abstention. Apparently, Russians like their kids.

The new Russian law:

1. Proscribes fines for propaganda promoting homosexual sex to minors;
2. Bans homosexual rallies; and
3. Bans the distribution of homosexual propaganda to minors.

Federation Council Speaker, Valentina Matvienko, explained to Russia Today (RT) the reasoning behind the law by saying that homosexuals "…are ordinary members of society. As adults, they are entitled to decide how they want to live. But when it comes to minors (the ban on propaganda) is not someone's whim, but a demand from society."

The ensuing uproar over the new Russian law in the cultural marxist outlets of the Western media was immediate and predictably overwrought and hysterical. According to them, the Russian's are not qualified to determine what laws are best for Russia. Instead, only homosexual activists and their cultural Marxist cheerleaders in the West are qualified to determine Russia's laws. And the homosexual activists, unsurprisingly, were against leaving the Russian kiddies alone.

Of course, the open contempt that the cultural Marxists exhibit towards the will of the Russian people is not surprising. It is, in fact, their standard operating procedure. They exhibit the exact same contempt towards the American people whenever their will conflicts with whatever socially destructive and morally abhorrent policies of the moment the cultural Marxists wish to inflict upon the United States.

So what does this controversy about homosexuals and Russian children have to do with the Winter Olympic games at Sochi? In reality, nothing; but the homosexual activists in the West and their supporters decided to trash the 2014 Winter Games by linking the games to their opposition to the new law.

How have they tried to do this? They lobbied the White House and got the President to appoint no less than three homosexuals to the American Olympic delegation. The official putative task of these three was to represent the United States at the Sochi Winter Games, but the real agenda was to promote the cultural Marxist "value" of homosexuality, distort the purpose of the new law, and smear the Russians.

The three homosexuals chosen to carry out this task are Brian Boitano, Caitlin Cahow, and Billy Jean King.

Previously discrete regarding his sexual preferences, American Olympic figure skater Brian Boitano stunned the nation two days after he was selected to the delegation when he revealed that he was a homosexual. Americans in all fifty states were glued to their television screens to catch the latest on this shocking and important news.

Prior to Boitano's earth shattering admission, no one in America suspected that it was even possible that a male figure skater might be a bit light on his blades.

However, being a great people, Americans soon recovered from this paradigm changing revelation. No doubt the nation was reassured when Boitano explained to NPR how he saw his job in Sochi: "Let the athletes focus on what they're doing and the job at hand. And let athletes like me, Billie Jean and Caitlin stand up for them and represent the gay community."

The second homosexual chosen to be on the Sorchi delegation was former Olympic women's hockey player, Caitlin Cahow. As with Boitano, most Americans were flabbergasted when Cahow told a mesmerized nation that she was a lesbian. How could this be, Americans wondered, hockey is such a feminine sport? After digesting this puzzling conundrum, Americans listened as Cahow disingenuously told USA Today regarding the selections to the Sorchi delegation that, “It’s obviously a statement that’s being made, but I think it’s an incredibly respectful one”.

Left unexplained was the specific type of hallucinogen and proper dosage one would have to ingest to consider the statement being made as “incredibly respectful”.

The most prominent homosexual selected for the American delegation was former woman’s tennis player, Billy Jean King. Tennis, as anyone with an IQ north of eighty is aware, is not played on ice or snow. Perhaps this is why it is a sport at the Summer Olympics. It is not known if the White House was aware of this at the time of King’s selection.

Moreover, Mrs. King, at age seventy, is well past her athletic sell-by date. But of course, King’s former athletic skills have nothing to do with her being chosen to be on the Sochi delegation. Rather, that is due to the fact that she has been a high profile lesbian activist for decades.

King’s appointment to the Sorchi delegation was hailed as a “stroke of genius” by USA Today’s Christine Brennan. She crowed to her readers, “What better way to show the nation’s disgust for President Vladimir Putin’s anti-gay propaganda law?”

Helene Elliott of the LA Times was more graphic in her laudatory comments regarding appointment of Billie Jean King and the other homosexuals to the delegation. Elliott compared their selection to the hockey tactic of “… that quaint, queasy custom of rubbing stink gloves in another player’s face as an irritating tactic.” Why giving the Sochi Olympic host a “wonderfully timed, stinky glove” was intelligent diplomacy, good manners or even minimally sane was largely left unaddressed by Elliott.

But the homosexual activists and their cultural Marxist puppet masters perhaps should have thought twice before picking a globally televised fight with Mr. Putin. He is a tough resourceful man who does not fight to lose. He has proven time and again to have an unerring instinct for the weak spot of his opponents. This may reflect his years of judo training or his time in the KGB—perhaps both. Regardless, he also has an annoying habit to his enemies—winning.

After weeks of silence during which there were relentless media attacks on Putin, Russia, and the Sochi Games in the Western media, the Russian President when asked about homosexuals at the Sochi Games slyly commented that homosexuals “can feel safe and free here. But please leave our children in peace.”

If this ongoing political battle was a tennis match, any fair referee would have ended it right then calling out: “Game. Set. Match. Putin.” Even Billy Jean King might have respected that.

How To Respond When Your Girl Wants To Be Exclusive

February 23, 2014 | by TheMaskAndRose | Link | Original Link

Fellow cocksmen, I am beyond sure that at some point in your journey into the undergarments of the assorted females of our planet, a lady friend or two has taken it upon herself to push for an "upgrade."

Maybe she was a fuckbuddy who suddenly started hinting at dates, flowers, or other activities which require you whip out your wallet instead of just your glorious cock. Maybe she was a girl you were dating, who decided to differentiate herself from the others by hinting at monogamy or exclusivity. Or maybe it went beyond just a hint, and she flat-out said to you "Stop sleeping with other girls or we can't hang out anymore."

I was educated on how this game is played before I ever arrived at such a crossroads, so I did not make the fatal mistake that many men succumb to. But I realize that many had their education come the hard way, after falling for this trap and being burned. It almost always starts with an ultimatum.

If you are ever given the "Monogamy Ultimatum," you have a couple options. Let's explore how each one plays out.

1. You Cave Like A Bitch And Buy Into Her Frame

While often camouflaged as "because I love her" or "because it's the right thing to do," many men will gladly jump on the monogamy grenade. At that moment, the relationship is inevitably damaged; her expression of powerlessness via ultimatum turned into your expression of supplication, and now the precedent is set for the rest of your relationship that any time she demands something, you will give it to her simply to silence the shrieking.

Soon after, there will be more hints and pressure. First, to move in together. Then, to get married. Third, to have a baby–and finally, to stop dodging the guy trying to serve you the divorce papers. And by the way, if a woman like this divorces you, she's doing you a huge favor and saving you from a lifetime of misery.

So don't go for Option 1–it will never serve you, and more importantly, your woman will lose a tremendous amount of respect and attraction for you.

2. You Evade The Question

While better than Option 1, filibustering like a Congressman to avoid the issue at hand will ultimately not serve you in the long run. Sure, you'll get to bang her some more and keep her hamster wheel spinning. But eventually, she will press the issue harder and louder, applying every ounce of feminine rhetoric to get you to cave to her demands.

Now it must be noted—the longer you evade, the better. You can keep tension quite high this way and have plenty of explosive sex with her while she tries desperately to please you enough to upgrade her. It's not a terrible option. However, Option 3 takes the cake 100% of the time.

3. Say No

Without question, this is the option which not only best serves your own interest, but the relationship dynamic as a whole. She wants a man with boundaries, who knows what he wants and will not compromise to make her happy. Ironically, this is what actually makes her happy–being in the presence of such a man who favors her but favors himself even more.

Now, there are a few ways to do this. I've done them all, and they all work. Which version of "Say No" you choose depends on your temperament, abundance, and whether you woke up with a case of the fuckarounds that day.

3a. Just Say No

Firmly and with no hint of expression, just say "No" to her. Once the initial shock and tingle wears off, she will probably try harder and demand an explanation. Stick to your guns and say, "No, I will not be monogamous with you."

Like all the ways to do this, just saying "No" puts the ball in her court as to whether she wants to keep sleeping with you on your terms. In my experience, 99% of the time, she will continue to fuck you happily while knowing her place.

3b. Mock Her For Asking

More fun and impactful than simply saying no, you can always raise your voice a little and loudly remind her that you explained to her early on you're not looking for that kind of relationship. (You DID remember to do that part, right?) Some chicks aren't that smart and can't figure it out on mythical feminine intuition alone. Some need to be told point-blank, and the best reason to do so is so you can throw it in her face later.

> "I told you what was up, and you said it sounded great. What we have is great. Why are you trying to ruin what we have by going against what we agreed on? Now I don't even know if you like me for me anymore"

This is guaranteed to put her on the defensive, qualify for your affections and make her completely forget about what she was demanding. You have flipped the script. Congratulations, sir. Today, you are a man.

However, there is nothing quite so manly, so perfect in its wisdom and application, as…

3c. Dismiss Her Silliness And Leave Immediately

Ah, this takes the cake. If you understand that monogamy (and on a greater scale, relationships at all) are really just a shit-test designed to weed out the weak from the strong, then this will be easy. When you don't take her seriously and know with absolute certainty that this move will procure you more pussy from her, for a longer time and on your terms than anything else, you can pull this off with style and panache. Here's how you do it.

> "I understand. I think you're awesome and I've had a great time with you. If you ever change your mind, my door is always open for you."

After that, while the horrified look on her face begins to cement into a Gargoyle-esque likeness, get up and leave.

She will go "Wait! Where are you going? Are you serious? Can we talk about it?"

Do not fall for it, young padawan! Continue your mission. One foot after the other. As the door closes behind you, smile to yourself; pat yourself on the back for a job well done, and count the hours down in your head until she comes crawling back desperate to fuck you. No woman wants to lose a guy who fucks her well because of her own bullshit, and she will VERY quickly course-correct.

The best part of all this is, in my experience as a womanizer, this will only happen once per girl if you do this properly. Once she has seen that you will dismiss her demands and potentially go find another female, her respect for you will skyrocket and she will do her absolute best to keep you in her life in whatever capacity YOU see fit.

It is an all-around win. You respect yourself, she respects you, the sex continues and there is no question who has the most Hand in that particular relationship.

Men Need A Return Of The Male-Only Gentleman's Club

February 23, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

"More war stories?" Ellen asked me that night. She was in bed with Philip Marlowe, the only lover she had ever taken.

"There was a war story or two," I said, hanging up my overcoat. "Mostly I sat and read a book."

"When you weren't oinking."

"Yes, that's right. When I wasn't oinking."

From Stephen King's "The Breathing Method"

One of the most pernicious effects feminism has had on society has been the acceptance of “togetherness” for men and women. We are expected to go to the same schools, work at the same jobs and then come home to each other. This is extraordinarily draining for both sexes, as sex roles aren’t just for efficiency, but because they prevent men and women from getting absolutely sick of one another.

Early feminists were shocked and mortified that lower-class women were fine with traditional sex roles and many were fans of the practice. What these feminists didn’t understand is that men and women don’t spend all that much time with one another in such systems, so when they do it is refreshing. Men and women appreciate each other’s male or female idiosyncrasies. Sex occurs more often and is much more passionate and satisfying.

Contrast that approach to modern sex relations. Men and women have — at least — a low level of hostility and resentment to the opposite sex. Many men and women have a simmering level of anger at each other. This is direct result of both sexes being trained to be disappointments to one another. Men with no true sense of self, lacking positive masculinity and passive. Women rightfully are upset that men are not men any more. As for women, they are hyper-aggressive, mannish and place a ridiculous emphasis on a “career” and “educational accomplishments.” Men are justifiably disappointed that women are no longer the happy, breezy ladies of yesteryear.

While socialization is supremely important here, what is also of critical importance are temporal issues. Men and women are just damn tired of spending so much time around one another. Homosexuals be damned, heterosexuals simply and want and crave space where we can let down our hair without the prying eyes of the opposite sex observing us.

Feminism has played a major role in this social degeneration. Painting institutions as inherently sexist and chauvinistic (oink, oink) that expressly excludes one sex is a preposterous and destructive train of thought. Note that this rhetoric doesn't apply against women. Feminists, as women, implicitly understand women need spaces where they can relax without men around and discuss issues, their feelings or whatever they feel they don't want to discuss with men. There is nothing wrong with women-only spaces. Women should and need to be afforded spaces where men are not allowed so women aren't driven crazy by having to censor themselves around men. The same applies for men.

Historically, for men, male-only spaces have been bars and gentleman's clubs. Bars, of course, have been turned into a sex-neutral spaces. In the past, men could gather at local watering holes after work and shoot the shit about the monotony and banality of work. They could wax on about the state of their marriage and their relationship with their kids. With the easy lubrication of alcohol, men were able to process and digest their lives. Once women demanded access to these spaces and sexualized them, it drained bars of their ability to provide a reliable outlet for men to both talk about and drown their personal concerns over and in a cup of cheap beer.

As far as gentleman's clubs are concerned, they have historical relevance. Gentleman's clubs have, traditionally, been for upper-class men. Apparently, through the 1800's, gentleman's clubs became more mainstream, as middle-class men formed gentleman's clubs. These sorts of clubs, as their popularity expanded, started to revolve around ideological concerns and collective interests. Much like Roosh's forum, clubs developed a distinct identity and ideological posture. At their height, men would gather to talk about the issues of the day, drink quality liquor and engage in typical male behavior. Men would play cards, discuss books and sip whiskey in the flickering light of a fireplace. They would often play billiards, debate politics and discuss the their wives and children.

The demise of gentleman's clubs mirrors the expansion of the middle class in America. Just when men needed such an outlet in their lives, they had these clubs swept out from under their feet by suspicious females. It must be said that the gentleman club culture was never as strong in America as it was in Europe, but middle-class men enjoyed the atmosphere of these sorts of clubs in urban areas before WW2. Still, gentleman's clubs were an important facet of the growing professional class of men. Women, essentially, not only hurt men but hurt their families by demanding "togetherness" that drove men and women apart. It is insanity, and completely on purpose. The gnawing, growing discontent of women in society led them to subconsciously expect men to meet unattainable standards for "love." What was once providing a solid paycheck, going to mass on Sunday morning and doing the heavy lifting around the house became Saturday trips to Lowe's for white paint for the crumbling picket fence and tedious parties with fellow "equal" marriages, complete with empty rhetoric of "progress" and "Leaning In."

This was on purpose because women were looking to prove that we men can't be trusted. We men can't be entrusted to do right, to love properly and — most importantly — that we are all beasts. The simultaneously lachrymose and needlessly self-absorbed approach has thoroughly revolutionized sex relations in a way that is has hurt our collective relations terribly.

The truth is, for men, is that we need spaces in society were we can connect — free of the judgmental eyes of women — with other men and simply exist without female influence. The concept of a gentleman's club is an excellent idea. Now, you may object, saying that men have locker rooms, upscale cigar bars and other, limited, spaces, but those are inferior to the concept of men getting together with no other reason but to hang out with other men. Some men have single friends with apartments or perhaps houses where men can congregate, imbibe top-shelf brandy and play Texas hold 'em. Yet, for most men, they don’t have those options. Most men live in urban areas, necessitating a central location for men to gather to socialize.

Most men don’t understand how tight the bonds of men in the past were. Men who served side-by-side in trenches outside Paris, France in WW1, men who traveled together across the undocumented wilderness in early America or the men who toiled and suffered in coal mines in the woods of West Virginia during the Gilded Age. Even outside of these specific situations, often what carried a man through life wasn’t just the love of his wife or children, but was the unshakable bondage with their fellow man. Technologically privileged people nowadays might think, “How did all those men get through the muck of life back then?” The answer is simple: each other.

Presently, most men don’t usually experience tortuous situations such as killed in combat or living on the fringe edge of poverty with nary a nickel to buy your child a coloring book. The battles men face today are ethereal and hidden as best society can. Men are socialized poorly, are isolated from one another in innumerable ways and are not given the tools to form a proper self-identity. Ideas like gentlemen’s clubs are excellent ways to help men improve their lives, gain a support network and achieve to the best of their abilities. A network, a place where a man can know he has friends and allies is a great idea to help the modern man live his life to the fullest.

RooshV Forum is a digital example of this. Tightly controlled, with only certain men — and men alone — allowed to contribute, it weeds out men with no desire for personal betterment or transformation. If the forum was a physical place, it would be a tiny joint tucked away in a quiet part of town, away from the prying eyes of wider society. Leaving fiduciary concerns aside, dues wouldn’t be financial, but a commitment to add to the value of other men in the forum and to, also, better yourself. You would have guys sitting at the bar, enjoying a particularly smooth, aged bottle of scotch, discussing the wider implications of Tinder on game. You might have a couple guys playing billiards in another room, puffing on pipes filled with a particularly pungent Virginia-style tobacco, discussing their travels to Osaka, Japan. Just as in “The Breathing Method,” at the close of the eve, all the men would gather round the roaring, cackling fireplace, provided a small glass filled with nothing but Glenlivet Single Malt and ice and trade tall tales, the more outlandish the better.

This is what clubs were and should be. Places were men gather, even if to simply tuck yourself away in the small library and read fiction all night, smoking cigars. It would simply be a place where men can exist, outside the conflicting and conflating pressures of the modern world, away from the braying and incessant complaining of women and a place where opinions and experiences can be shared with no shrill politically-correct harpy screaming at the top of their lungs. Away from the white-knight conservatives with notion of saving their precious white women from the machinations of players, fearless raw-doggers or any manner of man that these of sorts of sick knights find execrable. A place where a man can sit back on a couch, pop open a bottle of Sam Adams and say, “Fuck Lindy West! That bitch is nothing but one, massive avalanche of flesh!” and is met with roaring laughter.

A return of these sorts of clubs in real life is needed. I don’t think it will happen on a wider, social scale as needed. Men will have to ferret away to Internet enclaves — such as Return Of Kings — to meet these sorts of needs. However, what would be best is that men have these sorts of suspiciously-viewed haunts in the flesh.

5 Reasons To Try A New Hobby

February 23, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Last year I gave up my Krav Maga self-defense training when I was in the middle of changing jobs. I never picked it back up.

While I stay quite busy splitting my time between my three main sources of income, last month I began to feel like something was missing. I was getting too comfortable with my daily routine– bored, too.

So I decided to start training in martial arts again, this time signing up for a Muay Thai gym. It's already reinvigorated my sense of drive across other areas of my life. Here are the top 5 reasons you should start a new hobby today.

1. It breaks up your current routine

As humans we search for a sense of regularity. We often find it in our daily activities.

For example, my days typically consist of working from home in the morning, primarily on my computer, lifting weights, and then training a few clients in the late afternoon and evening. I enjoy this routine, but flying on autopilot has its dangers.

You aren't as sharp. Everything is too calculated and expected. By training in Muay Thai every other day I have something new to look forward to. It also has changed my lifting routine, to accommodate for the added exercise and fatigue.

2. It pushes you outside of your comfort zone

When I stepped into the Muay Thai gym for the first time I didn't know what to expect. It was a lot different than the place I used to train Krav Maga at– more serious, less friendly even.

The seasoned fighters looked at me with a sense of superiority. And they were superior. But rather than backing down, being nervous, and quitting after one day– I took this as a challenge.

I was far from comfortable training that day. I wasn't able to execute crisp Thai kicks or jump rope like a boss. But being too comfortable can be a bad thing. You'll cease to explore new opportunities and your growth with falter across the board.

By throwing yourself at something new, that you're inexperienced at, you'll be pushed outside of your comfort zone. This is a good thing. You must stay accustomed to living at the edge of your comfort zone to ensure steady growth and progress.

3. You'll learn new skills

This point is obvious. By taking Muay Thai, I'll learn a host of new fighting skills.

4. It gives you a new area to set goals for

The habit of setting and achieving goals is the most important habit a man can build. By entering into a new hobby, you now have a whole new area of your life that where you can practice setting and accomplishing goals.

For my Muay Thai experience I'll start small. My first goal is to be able to execute a Thai kick with my left and have it feel as natural as with my right. I'll work my way up to bigger goals as I improve.

This is the beauty of starting at something from scratch. At first you'll set one small goal after another. This cycle will build momentum, and before you know it, you'll no longer be a novice. More importantly, this momentum will carry over to other areas of your life and give you the confidence to crush more and bigger goals.

5. You'll meet new people

Another obvious point. When you try something new, you're bound to meet new people. Whether these turn out to be man friends or cute girls depends on the hobby you choose, but either way meeting new people is always a positive thing.

Potential Hobbies

I'll leave you with a short list of potential hobbies for you to try today:

1. Martial arts/self-defense: Muay Thai, Brazilian Ju-Jitsu, Krav Maga
2. Cooking
3. Salsa Dancing
4. Lifting weights (you should already be doing this)
5. Yoga
6. Writing
7. Mountain Biking

Check out my new #1 Amazon Bestseller, The Book of Alpha. It's full of direct, actionable advice for the man who wants to better himself.

Why Young Men Need The Red Pill

February 24, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The pitfalls of failing to take the red pill have been discussed extensively here at ROK. Today I seek to offer yet another example of what can happen to men who fail to take the red pill and embrace the hard truths that come with it.

Meet Max Wade:

Why is Max Wade of any interest to us? Well, to start, he appears to be a Grand Theft Auto character brought to life:

> You're seeing "grand theft auto" in progress, a crime that caught the nation's attention. That's Marin's Max Wade — just 16-years-old at the time — rappelling into a San Francisco dealership and stealing celebrity Chef Guy Fieri's Lamborghini.

Sounds like a masterful crime, right? The kid was clearly pretty bright – he'd stolen a celebrity's exotic car straight out of a dealership and managed to elude the police with it for the better part of a year. He even managed to impress the policemen working to find him — who would have thought that a 16 year old kid could pull something like this? It seems like he had everything together, so what got him caught?

Feast your eyes:

This little girl, unwittingly, did more to aid the police in catching Max Wade than the policemen themselves.

> Wade finally got caught because of his fascination with a Terra Linda High School student — 17-year-old Eva Dedier.
> He texted a friend for advice: “shud i straigh up start sexting with her or be jus be flirty with her.”
> Wade texted Dedier for days about getting her a fake ID, and he finally asked: “so who’re you spending valentines with.” Dedier answered, “my friend landon.”
> Landon Wahlstrom is Wade’s schoolmate from Redwood High. Wade couldn’t take it. He planned his next crime for April 2012 — Friday the 13th. He’s on a motorcycle, all in black, watching as Eva and Landon walk out of a Mill Valley home and climb into his pickup truck.
> Garrett says, “It pulled up next to them and the cyclist pulled out a pistol and started shooting at them.”

Wade fired five shots, fumbled and dropped the gun, allowing the couple to speed off. They stopped a few blocks away at Joe's Taco Lounge. Wahlstrom was cut by flying glass; shaken, but not seriously hurt. It was Wade's bad luck that the two detectives assigned to the case were motorcycle enthusiasts. They recognized the helmet Wade wore. He was caught on camera filling up at a nearby gas station, shortly before the shooting.

Greg Garrett explains, "Bilt is a store brand that you can only buy from cycle gear, either over the internet or at their retail stores, and we knew that the closest retail store was in San Francisco."

The store found Wade's receipt, and a video of him buying the helmet and that black outfit the night before the shooting. Garrett couldn't find a current address for Max Wade, but a week later came the break — Wade contacted Eva Dedier > again about getting her a fake ID, and offered to pick her up in the Lamborghini. Garrett and a team of ten officers were waiting at the Richmond storage facility where Wade had a locker.

Max Wade's story is another classic example of what can go wrong when one lacks an understanding of red pill truths. For all of his intelligence and criminal daring, Wade was just another teen with oneitis. Beneath the layer of (admittedly misguided) brilliance and intellect that characterized his near perfectly executed theft of the Lamborghini rests nothing more than a tremendous degree of blue-pill insecurity and neediness:

> He couldn't help but tell friends about the heist he pulled off, even sending selfies inside the car. He texted, "mann, i love my life … boostin a lambo and pickin up cute girls when ur 17."

At the end of the day, this was all about impressing girls. Like most young males lacking exposure to the red pill, Max Wade believed that money could be a panacea to all of a man's romantic problems. That was the main reason why he boosted the car in the first place: in his mind, an expensive car meant instant access to sexual abundance and, more specifically, access to Eva Dedier.

But money could not have gotten him the girl of his dreams. Why? Because girls like her simply don't need it. As I wrote over a year ago:

> Ask yourself: what does a typical American female fitting her description really need? She's physically protected (the American suburbia in which she probably grew up is much safer than most of the planet is or has ever been). She's got food and shelter pretty much taken care of thanks to parents (probably at least middle class suburbanites, if not more affluent). She's safe, secure and well provisioned. And, if at any moment these realities falter, she has an army of (unattractive, but desperate and dedicated) white knights to uphold them and > shield her from any cold realities. Maybe she'll feel those realities more later as she moves out from under her parents' wing, loses the ability to maintain a large white knight army and starts to hear a biological clock, but chances are that time will come well after she exits the 18-24 age range in which she is most desirable.

> So ask yourself: what need does this young woman or any other similarly aged woman in a similar socio-economic state (and there are hundreds of millions of these across the western world) have for any individual provider as a mate?
> The answer is not much. This reality should inform any discussion in a game vs. money debate: one must understand the kind of woman you're dealing with. If you're dealing with a woman like this, you have to understand that for her, money (and the providing capacity it enables) may hold less appeal than it otherwise would.

Eva Dedier was just a typical American teen. She was already well-provisioned and didn't have to worry about finances. She didn't want or need a provider – she just wanted a guy who could turn her on and have fun with her.

It was this reality that led her to casually and repeatedly blowing Max Wade off, even as he repeatedly offered to make her things (ex: fake IDs) and give her rides in fast cars. He was trying to be the provider she didn't need or want. Landon Wahlstrom was Eva Dedier's choice— he had essentially already won the prize Max Wade wanted so desperately for so long, and he did it without showering her with offers for fake IDs, drugs or rides in a Lamborghini. Wahlstrom didn't need the appearance of extreme riches to get the girl — he just needed a little game. With that in place, Eva was perfectly content to be his valentine. The fact that he drove a pickup truck was entirely irrelevant to her, despite the reality that she was being chased by a boy who could have picked her up in a Lamborghini.

This type of mistake is not uncommon among young men like Max Wade. Many young males put themselves in difficult positions trying to impress young women who simply cannot be impressed by said actions. They think money is the answer, so they steal, borrow and scheme in order to appear as though they've got more than they have, only to find the girl of their dreams unimpressed at the end of the day. Others slave endlessly in order to earn a high salary with the expectation that the big paycheck = the love of a beauty queen, only to realize that the girls they chase have more on their minds than cash.

Money is not a substitute for game and the genuine self-improvement it requires. Money cannot make up for a total inability to build attraction. The love of a young woman (especially one who enjoys an extremely high standard of living in the modern United States and simply does not need a provider) requires much more than that.

Had Max Wade been exposed to the red pill at an earlier age, he would have understood that he didn't need to risk his future boosting Italian super cars just to impress girls. He'd have known that girls could be impressed even without the aid of an exotic automobile. He would have known that money and exotic cars are not substitutes for true confidence and the ability to build genuine attraction.

He might not have even bothered stealing that Lamborghini at all. He might have spent more time working on himself (his style, physical condition, confidence, presentation, conversational ability) in order to improve his chances of romantic success, instead of leaning on a car as a crutch. He might have actually made some genuine self-improvements in the process. And even if he had still lost Dedier to Landon Wahlstrom on Valentine's Day, he may have been ready: the red pill would have taught him that Dedier was not the only girl in the world and that he would be able to find the romantic and sexual satisfaction with other women someday. He may have understood the foolishness of brandishing a firearm against the teen couple — there would be other girls, and there was no reason for him to ruin his own life (and potentially end both of theirs) just because she didn't want him.

But Max Wade didn't have that taste of the red pill. He didn't have an understanding of game. And now, as a result, he has to spend the next several years in prison.

The greater the number of young male red pill takers in the future, the smaller the number of Max Wades we'll see. We'll be better for it.

The Battle To Maintain Frame Control

February 24, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Frame. Frame. Frame. I wish I could write it larger than that. FRAME.

Maintain frame! Maintain frame! Everyone cackles, like so many hens in a chicken coop. Their heads bobbing up and down. We have heard this before. But it is a profound concept. Almost profound beyond words.

Because the ability to master frame control is the key that unlocks everything else in women, work, leadership, and life. It is the one essential virtue without which all the other virtues are rendered impotent.

Well, all right, fine. Now when I say "frame control", what do I mean? I see frame control as a blend of three elements: (1) the ability to define and maintain the terms of the social interaction; (2) the ability to project your masculine essence outward; and (3) your view of physical reality.

So frame control is your world-view. It is your own set of rose-tinted spectacles with which you view the world. Yours. Uniquely yours.

The world is my idea, said Schopenhauer. Die Welt ist meine Vorstellung. At the very outset of his thick book The World As Will And Idea. Absolutely right, of course, and a perfect statement of frame control: the world is what I say it is. My world, my idea, my rules. The world is my idea! Mine! Yes!

Has anyone ever stated it so perfectly? I don't think so.

Frame control is intimately connected with your ability to maintain your masculine center. Your masculine center is your masculine essence in its consummate entirety, distilled and concentrated. And if you can project this masculine essence out to the world, you are exerting your frame on physical reality.

Most people stumble through life like drunken hobos, jostled now here, and now there, by the daunting randomness of life's events. They lack a comprehensive philosophy, a unifying worldview, that helps them maintain their masculine center. Without the assistance of this rudder, a man can easily be knocked off his frame. He will become subject to the influences of wicked or wretched people; he will be dragged down by the tempting evils of society; or, more commonly, he will fall victim to the self-doubts and insecurities that haunt every man.

It cannot be otherwise. Cannot.

If you can maintain your masculine center and control the frame of social interactions, you will automatically project more confidence, bearing, and command presence. That is why frame control is so vital. We all know that success with women, work, leadership, and life depends, when all is said and done, on supreme confidence. Confidence so strong that it borders on the irrational.

So our efforts should be focused on how to acquire this supreme confidence. And it all comes down to this: the ability to project confidence is the natural result of staying in your masculine center. And staying in your masculine center is a direct result of proper frame control.

But how do we acquire this frame control? How? It is all well and good to talk about how important it is. But how to get it?

Unfortunately there are no shortcuts here. Frame control, at its deepest level, cannot be Gorilla-glued onto your personality overnight. It is accreted slowly, like the drops of water falling in caves that gradually, over time, produce such wondrous mineral formations. It takes years of seasoning: experience, blood, toil, tears, sweat, battles, ups, downs, highs, lows, joys, depressions, scars, bangs, books, anguish, agony, fury, trips, and jobs to acquire.

But the good news is that you can start now. Now. You need to start putting in your work now. Dive into the mosh pit of life, and thrash around. Grab your pugil-stick and swing away. A bloody nose will do you good.

Here are two corollaries to proper frame control:

You Need Assistance

Maintaining frame is nearly impossible without a unifying worldview, a philosophy of life, or a vision. You can't do it alone. The will easily falters. A unifying worldview will give you the comfort and support of a vision greater than yourself. Find a philosophy of life and practice it. You almost need to brainwash yourself into believing your own propaganda. Either a religious-based ethical system, or a philosophical system (Stoicism, Buddhism, etc.) will do nicely. Having this inner rudder will enable you to withstand the tempests and cruelties of life. People will sense your calming conviction and feel your masculine center. Frame control will follow naturally. You will have the inner conviction described by Rudyard Kipling in his poem, If…:

> If you can keep your head when all about you
> Are losing theirs and blaming it on you,
> If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you,
> But make allowance for their doubting too;
> If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
> Or being lied about, don't deal in lies,
> Or being hated, don't give way to hating,
> And yet don't look to good, nor talk too wise.

Stop Overthinking

The brilliant philosopher William of Ockham centuries ago stated the importance of reducing things to their simplest elements. "Entities shall not be multiplied beyond need"(Entia non sunt multiplicanda praeter necessitatem); "it is futile to explain with many things what can be explained by only a few things (Frustra fit per plura quod potest fieri per pauciora)."

What a simple yet profound concept this is! It was a philosophic principle known to many other great minds, such as Duns Scotus and Thomas Aquinas. The idea here is that you should reduce things to their simplest elements. Stop piling categories, classifications, and concepts on top of each other! Stop asking other people, and listening to background noise!

Overanalyzing, overthinking, and overcomplicating will just sew doubt and hesitation in you. And throw you off your frame. Too much discussion and analysis paralyzes action. Councils of war, as Douglas MacArthur rightly observed, just breed timidity, and little else.

Evaluate and act with a minimum of fuss. Take a nose-dive into real experience. Several hours in bed with a beautiful woman is worth a bookshelf of theories on seduction. And getting played by a beautiful woman is better training still.

You Need Experience

No matter how much you internalize my words here, some of these principles will only become fully realized once you have had a certain range of life experiences. Do not be discouraged by this. If you are in your twenties, your focus should be on acquiring experiences with women, life, work, travel, and leadership that will form the bedrock of your future masculine center.

Conclusion

All right, then. We have frame control dissected. But how supremely difficult it is to practice! Why? Because so many things act against us to throw us off our masculine center, to throw us off our frame. My life is a battle to maintain frame control. I fail, I succeed, and I fail again. It is not easy. I want the world to be my idea, but the world fights me every step of the way. These are the enemies of frame control:

1. Your wavering and weak will. No matter how focused you are, you will frequently lose frame. It's natural. You are not a robot, you are not a mechanical contrivance. You are human.

2. Actions of others. We live in a world where we are buffeted on all sides by people who want to drag us down. Your ability to maintain your masculine center will be attractive to most, but will also invite envy, spite, and hostility from others who are unable to put the work required for self-development.

3. Social pressures. Our culture acts in ways that are hostile to masculinity. You need to remind yourself of this constantly, so you do not lose heart or hope in the struggle. Do not listen to cultural messages that encourage your baser nature.

Proper frame control will cultivate and fortify your masculine center. And this in turn will generate self-confidence. If you are patient, diligent, and are aware of the obstacles, you will acquire the foundation stones of frame control. And then the world will truly become your idea.

Turn away from the harmful vices and negative distractions of this world. They will not satisfy you. And remember, as Cicero admonished in his treatise Stoic Paradoxes, always to "carry a spirit deserving of praise." There is no greater calling.

Washington Post Caught Plagiarizing US Government Propaganda On Ukraine Conflict

February 24, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The US government-owned media outlet Radio Free was recently used as source material for a Washington Post article written by journalist Adam Taylor, who not only toed the same line as the source article, but also directly plagiarized part of its contents. The Washington Post or Taylor has not informed its readers that it is presenting US government propaganda as news.

Brief background on Ukrainian conflict

Unrest in Ukraine began in November when President Yanukovych decided to forge a trade deal with Russia instead of the European Union. Protests soon began in the capital and efforts to put them down has led to death and destruction in Kiev and the Western Ukrainian city of Lvov. The protests were ultimately successful in ousting the President, who has purportedly fled to the Eastern Ukrainian city of Kharkov.

The official US position on Ukraine is to drive its politics westward and install a puppet regime sympathetic to its interests and against those of Russia (the US government was purportedly paying Ukrainians to protest). The EU's position is to gain 46 million more slaves for the IMF and Europe's consumer market. The Ukrainian people's position is to improve their standard of living and economic prospects after a neverending serious of corrupt rulers. Russia's official position is to maintain economic ties with Ukrainian industry and allow its navy to be stationed off the Crimea in the Black Sea, which has access to the Mediterranean.

America's propaganda efforts in Ukraine

The US government has a propaganda media arm in the Europe called Radio Free Europe, which is owned and run by the US government.

> Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (RFE/RL) is a broadcaster funded by the U.S. Congress that provides news, information, and analysis to countries in Eastern Europe, Central Asia, and the Middle East "where the free flow of information is either banned by government authorities or not fully developed". RFE/RL is supervised by the Broadcasting Board of Governors, a bi-partisan federal agency overseeing all U.S. international broadcasting services.
> Founded as a propaganda news source in 1949 by the National Committee for a Free Europe, RFE/RL received funds from the Central Intelligence Agency until 1972. During the earliest years of Radio Free Europe's existence, the CIA and the U.S. Department of State issued broad policy directives, and a system evolved where broadcast policy was determined through negotiation between the CIA, the U.S. State Department, and RFE staff.

If you're unsure of where the US government stands on foreign policy, simply visit Radio Free Europe and read what amounts to wholesome propaganda. The recent stories on Ukraine do not hesitate to paint the protests as an organic uprising for freedom and democracy. What Radio Free won't tell you is that the US has admitted to spending over $5 billion to subvert the Ukrainian government to install a more pro-Western leader after their previous favorite, Viktor Yushchenko, installed after the 2004 Orange Revolution, lost an election to Yakunovych in 2010. The US Assistant Secretary of State was also caught recently on the phone playing puppet master to manipulate the will of the Ukrainian people to install a leader it knows will serve American interests.

Here is one of the videos that went viral in the heat of the protests last week, showing pro-government "snipers":

Do you see the logo watermark in the lower lefthand corner? Here is the official logo of Radio Free:

This tells us that the US government was playing an active role in shaping public opinion on the Ukraine issue. In other words, you won't find videos of protesters shooting at government forces that also contain the same logo.

Washington Post's sourcing of Radio Free

An article published February 18 on Radio Free Europe was titled Pro-Russian Separatism Rises In Crimea As Ukraine's Crisis Unfolds. In predictable Russophobe fashion, the writer paints Russia as a meddler that is trying to bully the region. Whether this is true or not, it's the official US government line that protects its $5 billion investment in effecting Ukraine regime change. Four days later, Washington Post journalist Adam Taylor plagiarized a snippet of the same Radio Free article when he wrote The battle for Kiev may well be over, but is the battle for Crimea about to begin? Judge for yourself:

Radio Free excerpt:

> Skirting open calls for separatism, the affable and energetic Podyachy is pushing for Kyiv to lease the entire peninsula to Russia in exchange for the cancelation of Ukraine's debts to Moscow.

Washington Post excerpt:

> RFE/RL's Robert Coalson recently went to Crimea and spoke to members of the pro-Russian separatist movement there. One politician he spoke to had the novel idea of leasing Crimea to Russia in exchange for a cancellation of Ukraine's debt to Moscow.

The beginnings of Taylor's Post article makes it absolutely clear where he stands on the protests, even laying on the propaganda thicker than what we can find on Radio Free:

> It's a heart-warming image. The bloody, protracted protests in Ukraine seem to have achieved their goals: Yanukovych is gone, new elections are due, and Yulia Tymoshenko, a key figure in Ukraine's 2004 Orange Revolution, has been freed from prison. Ukraine looks as though it might have pulled back from the brink.

The Washington Post and journalist Adam Taylor are reporting "news" that is apparently sourced from US government propaganda. Readers of Taylor's article may have thought they were reading an unbiased account of the events unfolding in Ukraine when they were actually reading something more in line of a press release straight from the US State Department. Why is Adam Taylor allowed to plagiarize and source US propaganda? Is he being paid by the government to produce such stories? Why is the Washington Post acting as a public relations arm for US government interests? Readers of the Washington Post should demand these answers.

I confronted Adam Taylor on Twitter about the fact that is not only a plagiarizer but a shill for the US government. His response was to call me a "teacher of rape." Realizing his libel, he quickly deleted the tweet.

Taylor is free to brush off the fact that he was caught red-handed, but the American people have a right to know that when they read Taylor or the Washington Post, they may be reading direct US propaganda. We can only speculate how many others writers for the Post are sourcing from a US government propaganda arm without being as sloppy as Taylor in doing a direct copy-paste job. Taylor receives his paycheck and the US government continues to misinform its citizens, who unfortunately remain in the dark about America's true intentions in developing countries like Ukraine.

My Adventures From Working As A Cook

February 24, 2014 | by Vic Lenser | Link | Original Link

In response to the recent call to ROK readers to produce positive articles on self-improvement, there have been some excellent entries of late.

I had to cringe, however, at the sight of an article about cooking, which forced me to say aloud, “Why the hell didn’t I think of that?!” It was a good read, and I commend OMYG on a job well done.

Soon, however, I realized that he left open one area in which I actually have a unique experience, namely working as a cook in a professional kitchen. Taking a job in a kitchen has many benefits. Besides the skills and knowledge you attain in a culinary sense, you will meet people who may change your life.

The kitchen is one of the few places in which I have worked where cussing and inappropriate jokes are actually encouraged. It’s a great place for you to have the freedom to be yourself, to work under the tutelage of confident, skilled men, and to receive invitations to good parties.

The Dish Pit

I was 15 when I started out as a dishwasher in a retirement home. The labor was disgusting, grueling, degrading, and paid shit. Despite all of that, if I could go back in time, I would do it all over again.

When I wasn’t scraping pots or spraying silverware, I was spending time with the real chefs of the kitchen, who served as male mentors to me in my young age. One such man was a German chef who had catered for the Olympics and for some tragic, unknown reason found himself in this hell hole, forced to seek new ways to prepare grilled chicken for the rich, crabby geezers that lived on the property.

Whatever his story was, the man had talent. I used to watch in awe as he would crack four eggs at a time with his two hands in preparation for the omelette station. Even though his position is not something culinary artists would strive to attain, he performed his duties with refined skill and with dignity. When he said frog, I jumped. If he told me to clean the floor—the one task I hated more than anything—I scrubbed every last corner of that red-tiled kitchen.

Any man on the path towards alphadom must understand the importance of serving under a strong male leader. Scrubbing a kitchen floor may seem like beta chump slavery to you, but if done for the right instructor and for a purpose, it can change you permanently.

I paid my dues in that kitchen, and it earned me the credit I needed to open other doors in the industry.

Respect Is Earned

After the high school drudgery, I took another dishwashing job as a freshman in college, and this proved to be rewarding in a different way. Besides the opportunity to finally handle some of the food preparation, I was introduced to the fun dark side of the food-and-beverage industry culture.

My first day on the job, three of the employees—one of them being the executive chef—asked me to meet them in the walk-in freezer for some “job training.” We met in the cold space, a welcome break from the West Texas heat, and they passed me a lit pipe packed with a special herb, saying it was time for my “drug test.” I took a nice, long hit, and they were pleased to inform me that I passed the test.

Back in the dish pit, the chef and her girlfriend would take frequent breaks to make out and have lesbian sex in the bathroom next to me. Towards the end of each night, I always ended my shift with an exquisite plate of food and a couple of beers on the house.

Not exactly a tale of sexual conquest, but it was a great environment in which to learn culinary skills, and the women who worked there treated me with nothing but love, affection, and respect.

Skills You Never Lose

It made sense to drop out of college that year, and I had to turn down a hidden trove of pussy that I discovered at the end of the spring semester. It was my connection to the chef and her friends that opened up this new door of possibilities, but as fate would have it I was destined to return to Central Texas.

Back in the Hill Country, I worked in a handful of restaurants and even helped open a new one. I manned all parts of the establishment, from waiting tables to preparing food in the kitchen.

Without a doubt, the sixth sense I developed about food ingredients during that time was the greatest benefit that still persists today. To second what OMYG said in his article, you create an air of independence and intrigue when you cook for a female.

College became necessary again, so I re-enrolled, this time at a different school. I remember this girl I had met and made out with one night. She successfully resisted my advances that evening, despite me showing genuine concern for her interests and sharing my sensitive side (we all know how well that works).

One night shortly thereafter, I randomly ran into her at a bar. I walked up to her and said in her ear, “I’m having you over for dinner on my birthday. It’s in a few days, and we’re having steak.” She agreed immediately.

The morning of my birthday arrived. I woke up and had sex again with the girl I had taken salsa dancing the night before. She left, and I made preparations. The evening came, and I made bacon-wrapped filet mignon with creamy gold mashed potatoes and sautéed asparagus. All cooked to perfection. My date and I enjoyed a gourmet meal in my home, and I got laid on my birthday… twice. So I guess it helps to know how to salsa dance, too?

Learn A Trade, Hit The Road

At the end of that semester, I took a summer job as a cook for a camp site. It seemed like a great idea—I would get to travel, see the mountains, and perfect a skill. Little did I know, this company had signed me up to cook for a scout camp, Girl Scouts to be exact, hundreds of them at a time.

It was too late to back out so I went along, miserable at the prospect of having to slave away for the thrall of whiny little princesses whose parents thought it would be a good idea to expose them to the outdoors.

The company caravan took me to Southern California, in the mountains as I had expected, far from civilization as I had hoped, and far from any colleges or bars as I soon came to lament. But being the young, unwise chap that I was, I failed to foresee the fact that a camp full of female scouts would have to be run by a crew of adult female staff members.

Impossible to foresee, however, was the phenomenon known as “summer work exchange,” wherein young women from foreign countries visit the United States to work in our nation and practice their English language skills. At that particular camp, during that particular summer, there were women in their early twenties from Russia, Spain, Colombia, and one I shall always remember from Ukraine.

It was the summer of a lifetime.

Conclusion

If you have the liberty and free time to pick up work as a kitchen hand, I highly recommend it. Whether it’s a summer gig or long-term employment, it’s something you should try at least once in your life.

The Most Interesting Man in the World probably worked in a kitchen, and he’s not even real. Go work in a kitchen, and you’ll be more interesting than he is. Because… you’re real.

Men Should Not Help Sluts

February 25, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Being out of town for two weeks I fell behind on the drama going on back home. I was, however, only slightly surprised when I showed up the house party and found an acquaintance I'm going to call Haylee having a screech at a friend I'm going to call Steve. From what I could sifter out of Haylee's mood killing spaz attack, she and Steve had been knocking boots for the last little while and Steve – glorious poosy slayer that he is – had moved on to tighter horizons. Like most dumb women, Haylee seemed to think that, having slept with Steve, they were now somehow dating.

As much as I am amused by the consequences of their actions finally dawning on selfish people, I just wanted to relax and enjoy my first real night off. Steve, myself and a couple of other guys went to a different house party and had a good night.

Around two a.m. Steve's cell phone began going crazy. "This bitch is psycho," he said – there was no need to say that it was Haylee. We all knew it was. I sensed a bit of an article though, so I said he should answer her calls and put her on speaker phone. Steve, beautiful bastard that he is, did so.

"Steve?" Haylee asked. She was slurring, and it was obvious she had been crying. There was the usual Friday night cacophony behind her of laughing, screaming drunks. "Where the fuck are you?!"

“What do you want Haylee?” Steve asked.

“I don’t know where I am. I need a ride. I’m at the [club]. I need a ride can you get me?”

This girl had nearly ruined Steve’s night, and the party she was at. She had called him numerous foul names, threatened to post lies about him on the internet and call his parents and tell them, quote, “What a fucking piece of shit you are”; and now she was calling from a club (how heart broken she really must have been, to go out clubbing) telling Steve to come pick her up.

“Take a cab,” Steve said. He was grinning, clearly revelling in her drunken drama.

“I don’t have any moneyyy.” This might have been true, but it wasn’t our problem.

“Then find someone to give you a ride.”

“I want to talk to you. Please Steve pleaseee.”

He hung up. His cell phone went crazy for five more minutes and then fell silent. I thought it was over.

And then mine went off. I was getting a call from Andrew, another acquaintance of mine.

“Yeah?” I answered.

“Hey Billy? What’s up?”

Andrew wasn’t a good friend, nothing more then a drinking buddy really, so I wondered why the hell he was calling me.

“Nothing. What’s up with you?”

“Nothing. Hey man listen, I know it’s shitty to ask but could me and some other guys get a ride?”

I suddenly realized what was going on. I held the phone away from my mouth and said to Steve, “Haylee’s making Andrew try to get me to give them a ride.” I put it on speaker phone. “What do you need a ride for?

“We’re at the [club].” It was indeed the same as Haylee’s. “It’d be awesome if you could give us a ride Billy.”

I’m typically a nice guy to folks I know, and usually wouldn’t have had a problem doing so, but I knew what was going on here. Andrew was trying to be a white knight for Haylee.

“Who’s we?” I asked. “I’m not a taxi Andrew. I’m not gonna drive all over town dropping drunks off.”

“We’re all going to the same place man.”

“Who’s we.”

Andrew hesitated. He knew I now knew he was with Haylee, and he must have guessed I was with Steve. “Just some people. We’re all going to the same place.”

“Who’s we.” Then I heard Haylee in the background, asking if I was fucking coming yet. “You guys can take a cab.” I hung up, and we had a pretty good night.

I expected Haylee to show up at the house we were at and bring more negativity on us, but she didn’t. Of course the next day I got a text from her saying I was a jerk.

But why was I a jerk? Haylee wasn’t my girlfriend. She wasn’t a sister or cousin or any other sort of blood. Hell, she barely qualified as a friend. And even though it wouldn’t change the situation, I’d also never banged her. She’s just another entitled slut. Steve feels the same way. I talked to him about her, though I could easily have guessed how things went between them and still been right.

Haylee and he had gotten drunk a few weeks ago at a house party. She had blown him in the washroom. The next night she came over to his house and they banged. Then she started showing up randomly, wanting to watch TV or go do something – never on her own dime, of course. In short, she acted like they were dating, when Steve made it clear they were doing nothing of the sort, being rude to her, sending her home after each bang.

Haylee's attitude, her lifestyle, is indicative of the average woman's nowadays. Steve was the seventh person I knew she slept with. There have doubtlessly been many others. She gave her body up to him for nothing and then turned around and expected to be made a princess by Steve.

There's a lot of that going around amongst today's women. They act like whores then expect to be treated like girlfriends. They manipulate manginas and white knights into doing their dirty work, and then when called out on it they say that you're the asshole. They live their lives by the motto that they don't need no man, and then get pissed off when men aren't there leaping forward and helping these awesome liberated women.

One needs only search such phrases as "Where are the real men," "Where have all the good men gone," and other such tripe to find many articles written by entitled sluts or their weak manslaves pondering why all these men they chastise or sleep with within hours of meeting them aren't putting on their knightly armour and treating today's whores like princesses. They wonder why men aren't putting themselves in danger to save their material goods when for years men have been shamed for being manly.

You know the kind of women I help? Ones like my friend Christina. She's engaged (at the ungodly age of 21, I know I know there's just no helping some people) and I've known her for three years now, since she was 18, and she never ever got really drunk and went to clubs to grind on strangers junk or slept with randoms. She is pleasant to be around, bakes treats for us friends when she hears we're going to be around town, and helps others as much as she can – she is a good person, not just an entitled slut who thinks herself a good person.

Even though Christina has never slept with me, or even kissed me, I still wound up driving two hundred kilometres in the middle of the night last summer because a disaster was happening at her house and her fiancée was almost five-hundred kilometres away working in the oil sands of Alberta and couldn't be there to help her. Whenever she asks for a favour, if I'm capable of doing it for her, I do. And so do many other guys in my circle who know her – yes, even the player types. And none of us expect sexual favours, or rewards or other stupid crap. We help Christina out because she's that increasingly rare pleasure one finds in their life – a decent woman.

She's got her flaws, sure, but the mere fact that she acts like something resembling a caring human being means that we men treat her with respect and kindness. Steve, who would never give Haylee a ride two blocks to get a can of Pepsi even after she took his load, has gone out and helped Christina and her fiancée shovel out their car in the middle of a blizzard at midnight, when he had to work a hard construction job the next day at five. And he was glad to do it as I would have been. As many men would be, because decent guys look after decent people; regardless of whether they're men or women.

The real men so many useless women and nutless men are complaining about nowadays treat others exactly how they deserve to be treated. There is no dearth of real men, or good men. We're just responding to how we're treated, and how we see others treating themselves. We don't owe sluts our chivalry just because they need our help. They're the ones who choose to live degenerate lives, thus creating a degenerate society; when the degeneracy finally comes home to them, it's not our fault. It's theirs. And no amount of shaming will convince real men otherwise. Good men have always and only helped decent people, and that will never change.

Why Men Are Intellectually Superior To Women

February 25, 2014 | by MichaelSeville | Link | Original Link

David Stove was an Australian philosopher who died in 1994. He was not well known outside Australia and not even particularly well-known in Australia. He left academia eventually for the familiar reasons that right-thinking individuals usually leave academia. His views led to his being threatened with disciplinary action by Sydney University. If you haven't already guessed; he was a scathing anti-feminist, anti-Marxist and an untiring enemy of 'progressive' thought. An introduction to him and his work is available here.

Below you will find some choice selections, in italics, from his essay 'The Intellectual Capacity of Women'. It's a long essay and well worth reading in full but I've tried anyway to select a few of the most representative, interesting or agreeable parts and filled-in the gaps with my own commentary.

The Poor Intellectual Performance Of Women

> The main reason why I believe, and the main reason why nearly everyone always has believed, that the intellectual capacity of women is inferior to that of men, is just this: that the intellectual performance of women is inferior to that of men.

This is sound reasoning but Stove goes on to say that it is, however, fallible reasoning. It is perfectly possible that the inferior intellectual performance of women has its cause somewhere other than in inferior capacity. Perhaps the feminists are right: perhaps women's intellectual performance has been marred by oppression. Or perhaps they have not had a fair chance to perform to their capacity or perhaps Satan has prevented them from doing so. Performance, however, is the only guide to capacity available.

> Merely possible interfering factors, or actual but indefinite ones, or ones which, even if actual and definite, are undetectable (like Satan), will not do.
> The reason why they won't do is obvious enough: that otherwise anyone could safely ascribe any capacity to anything.

If we don't have performance as an indicator of capacity we have no indicator at all. I haven't played a game of chess in about ten years but I can claim to be as good as Bobby Fisher and I can claim that the only reason I'm not known to be as good as Bobby Fisher is because all the grand masters refuse to play me. It is possible that my performances have been prevented by grandmasters' refusals to compete with me but it is nothing more than a possibility. Without evidence there is no reason to believe my claims.

The logical possibility of interference is no evidence whatever of interference. The possibility of patriarchal oppression does not prove it.

Questions Of Probabilities

> Probabilities are a sort of graduated capacities, and the question about the comparative intellectual capacity of men and women is… …a question about probabilities. What we want to know is whether the probability of a woman having (d), where (d) is a given above-average degree of intellectual capacity, is equal to the probability of a man having (d)

In the absence of tests that can measure intellectual capacity we are left with having to depend on inferences and probabilities.

> We are therefore thrown back… on having to infer the probabilities from the observed frequencies: that is, on inferring the comparative intellectual capacities of men and women from their comparative intellectual performances in that large and varied "sample" which is past human history…
> … In every field in which intellectual capacity can be exercised, from the most severely theoretical to the most intensely practical such as business, or medical practice, or war, there have always been far more men than women at any above-average level of performance. This is not in dispute.

What is in dispute is the reason for such an imbalance in intellectual performance. What is needed for an accurate inference of what is the probable reason for such an imbalance is a large enough and varied enough sample. That sample is all of human history.

> Has the variety of human circumstances been great enough to constitute a fair trial of the intellectual capacity of women, or has it not? This is the question, I repeat, on which all turns.

History has been very varied and through it all some women, somewhere and sometime, have been in any social position you care to name (biology allowing): scientists, adventurers, paupers, popes, warriors, painters, bakers and candlestick-makers. And yet though their positions and opportunities vary their intellectual performance does not. Even when society attempts to compensate for this it fails to bridge the gap.

> Wherever some defect has been found or imagined in existing arrangements for the education of females, energetic and ingenious people have always been busy setting up a form of education free from that real or supposed defect. Novel schemes of education, intended among other things to remove obstacles to the exercise of the intellectual capacity of women, are. at least as old as Plato, and hundreds of them have been put into more or less widespread practice. Yet despite all this variety in the supposed causes of female intellectual performance, the effects have been singularly invariant.

The Wrongness Of Equality-Theorists

> Equality-theorists are never tired of reminding us of the obstacles which have been put in the way of the exercise of the intellectual capacity of women, at such-and-such a period, in that society or the other; and of course there are countless such cases.

But in any case where some obstacle – the patriarchy, child-rearing, home-making, misogynist murder, debilitating rape – has prevented a woman from reaching her intellectual potential there has invariably been another case where such obstacles were absent.

> You can't go on forever saying "The game's not fair," when the game has been played ten billion times, under a billion different circumstances; at least, if you are rational you cannot, unless you are prepared to say in just what way it is not fair… Just what is that factor, common to all or most past history, which has interfered with the exercise of the intellectual capacity of women?
> Some people love just stringing together anecdotes: women were prevented from exercising their intellectual capacity by this obstacle in Periclean Athens, by that obstacle in Confucian China, by the other obstacle in seventeenth-century France, etc. But an equality-theorist must do more than this. He has to offer some definite explanation of why the intellectual capacity of women has so consistently met with obstacles it could not overcome, and his explanation must be one which is consistent with the equality-theory. It would obviously be no good, for example, if he were to say, "The main interfering factor has been the aggressiveness, sexual exclusiveness, and superior cunning of males." This > suggestion, considered in itself, is by no means without merit: aggressiveness, sexual exclusiveness, and superior cunning are definite and detectable things, and I at least believe that they actually do operate in males, and do impede, to some extent, the intellectual performance of women. But of course the suggestion is not one which an equality-theorist can adopt, since to ascribe superior cunning to males is to contradict the very intellectual equality for which he contends.

Some equality-theorists may alternatively argue that the one obstacle that has impeded women's intellectual performance across all human history is her reproductive role. But such an equality-theorist will have to reject certain scientific facts….

Gender Roles

> Now in man, as in all animals, a peculiarity of reproduction-and-nurture is this: that of all the major tasks of the species, it is the one for which the innate programme is most complete, and the one, therefore, which requires the least intellectual effort for its performance. In plain English: a woman does not need to use her brains to have a baby, and doesn't even need to use them much in order to see the infant through the period of its most extreme helplessness. Nearly everything she needs to know is already written in her inner manual.

One of the facts about Darwinian evolution, and one so clear that it was noticed long before Darwin investigated its cause, is the fact of specialization. Animals that are fast tend not to be strong; animals that are strong tend not to be fast. An animal that might be both strong and fast will in fact be neither. Nature is very stingy when it dishes out resources and abilities. If there's no need to fly, an animal will not fly. A woman does not need intellectual capacity to have babies. Reproduction uses a lot of energy and resources but those resources are not intellectual. Men are free of the drain on resources that is reproduction, they, however, have other functions.

> The intellectual activity which is required for successful hunting is extremely great… One would expect that the sex not burdened with reproduction-and-nurture would shoulder the main burden of those other major tasks which are intellectually more demanding; and therefore, by the principle of parsimony, that men will have a higher degree than women of what is peculiarly required for those tasks, intellectual capacity. I do not claim that this inference is inevitable, but it is at least a natural one. And vague as its premises are, they do furnish, I believe, the lines along which an explanation must be sought for the intellectual difference observed between men and women.

In Conclusion

Out of interest, what would it take to convince David Stove of the equal intellectual capacity of women?

> Here is something which would not convince me of the equality-theory: reports by psychologists or educationists of tests, conducted within recent years, on (for example) the comparative mathematical ability of boys and girls. Such reports would not only not convince me: I do not believe that any attention at all should be paid to them. My main reason for this is not the public record of psychologists for fraud or susceptibility to fraud or of educationists for unswerving obedience to the winds of fashion; although this record is sufficient in itself to justify a hearty skepticism towards their reports. My main reason is a quite general principle: that a person's testimony should carry no weight or little weight with you, if you are sure or nearly sure that his testimony would have been the same whatever had actually happened.

The equity-theorists seem to be so invested in their 'theories' that they are blind to everyday evidence provided to even the most inattentive observer. If you can go through decades of life and continue to stubbornly believe in the intellectual equality of men and women you must have been either paying no attention to the activities of either group or been willfully ignoring them.

> What would convince me of the equal intellectual capacity of men and women is, simply, the kind of evidence which, as things are, convinces me of the opposite: that is, equal intellectual performance, over a long time, and in the widest variety of circumstances.

But there is no such evidence. There is other evidence:

> The evidence for the inferior intellectual capacity of women is so obvious and overwhelming, that anyone who can lightly set it aside must be defective in their attitude to evidence; and our contemporary equality-theorists are in fact (as I have hinted several times), religious rather than rational in their attitude to evidence

Much like how a believer in the apocalypse ignores that, once again, the apocalypse did not happen at the appointed hour. The equality-theorists' theories are held much more religiously than is appropriate for those who claim to be rational.

He Would Have Appreciated The Manosphere

> The equality-theorists have created in recent years a climate of feeling in which many men are afraid to deny the equality-theory openly, and even ashamed to doubt it inwardly. Hence the phenomena which are now so observable, of hypocrisy, self-deception, and pious fraud: those invariable concomitants of a militant religion.

Space and a desire to stay within the bounds of 'fair use' mean that I have not quoted anywhere near as much of this essay as I would have liked. I suggest you read the whole thing. It gets particularly good after the dry section about probability. Other insights you might find include an aside about the uselessness of those (beta) men who insist on being present for the birth of their children and criticisms of those who promote only the 'evidence' that supports their progressive ideologies.

I don't know whether there is anyone in academia writing the sorts of essays that David Stove published in his time but I doubt it. The early '90s may have been bad – bad enough that intellectuals such as David Stove were being disciplined for their ideas and so bad that even the occasional liberal like Jonathan Rauch felt the need to stem the tide and defend the principles of liberal enquiry. But these defences failed with the result that academia today is no place for either rational thought or liberal enquiry.

4 Thoughts I Didn’t Have While Traveling

February 25, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

When I returned from my recent extended trip to South America, it occurred to me how much my daily thoughts had changed from their routine back home. These are a few thoughts that didn’t even occur to me during three weeks on the road:

1. How’s my stuff doing?

I have written on the topic of minimalism before, but living out of a suitcase for three weeks shows you that you can lead a fulfilling life with a bare minimum of stuff. While at home I wouldn’t have dared wear the same shirt two or three times in a week, I came to realize that this stuff largely doesn’t matter. We spend precious time, money, and headspace making sure our apartments look perfect, we have the right shoes to complement our pants, etc., but once these things considerations aren’t around to clutter your mind they lose their foothold on your consciousness. When I had to do minor chores manually that were usually done by superfluous devices back home (e.g., drying my clothes, as Law Dogger has written about from his travels), it became just a minor part of the day.

2. Are things at work okay?

If you were raised in America and consider yourself a “productive member of society,” you were likely imbued with some remnants of the Puritan work ethic. Get a job, work yourself to the bone, be as supplicating and useful to your managers as possible, and kiss ass hoping for a bigger raise at the end of the year. There is an element of shame that we all have to shed when disengaging from the corporate drone mentality, and travel can be an important catalyst in that process. If you’re working for someone else, no matter how much you like your job, it’s still just a job. As soon as you disengage from your smartphone, it’s amazing how quickly the crises of the office seem to melt into the background of your consciousness.

3. Am I in danger?

When I told people I was going to South America, I was amazed at how many people told me to “watch out” and “don’t get kidnapped”. Most Americans are scared to leave the United States, even when violent crime rates in many South American countries are lower than U.S. cities. Much like sex, the risks of travel can of course only be minimized and never entirely eliminated. But with proper precautions, I did not feel truly in danger at any point during my trip. You’re not going to have an adventure if your risk aversion prevents you from seeing the world outside your day-to-day life. Take a shot, and chances are things will be fine.

4. Am I spending too much money?

This is, admittedly, a first-world privilege for those who have disposable income to spend, but once you free yourself from the need to buy dumb trinkets, eat at the fanciest places, and sleep at 5-star hotels, the most fulfilling experiences on your travels often end up being the cheapest. I could spend less than $20 reading a book on Copacabana beach under the shade of an umbrella, eating my fill of açai, and drinking as much water and coconut juice as I pleased. You’d be amazed how little you spend taking in a city, drinking espresso at cafes, and talking to strangers. If you can, in a typical workweek, eat out at lunchtime (and sometimes dinner), go out for drinks with co-workers, pay for recreation, own a gas-guzzling car, and engage in other types of consumption, you can afford a fulfilling vacation.

It’s a cliché that travel allows us to introspect on our priorities, but its power to change our very thought processes makes it a truism worth repeating. Go on an extended voyage and record the things you think about on a day-to-day basis. You just might be surprised with what’s really important to you.

The Different Paths Of Western Manhood

Previously: 4 Red Pill Concepts You Need To Understand

In my previous article I discussed several concepts central to the the Red Pill awakening shared by men in the West. Continuing the Game introductory theme, I'd like to discuss common reactions men have upon their realization that women are the villains in this game…

You are not Link. You will not complete the game in under two hours without saving. You will die and you will need to restore to your last save point, over and over. You will not get your own channel on Twitch.tv and make fat stacks of cash. Statistically speaking, you are a schmoe when it comes to this game. This game is unlike anything you've ever played. But it can be played, and it can be enjoyed, and it can be won on your terms.

Nihilism and Solipsism; Enjoy The Decline

Now that you understand the nature of the female, what is your own nature? Just as Princess Zelda is actually the villain (or the dupe at least), might you be one as well? Many say yes and check out; Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) are solipsistic in a sense, despite their common feeling of camaraderie. You will be called a loser and a villain by anyone not GTOW. After taking the Red Pill, you may come to define your villainy or defeat as your retirement, rebirth, and delivery from hell. MGTOWs may even give up on women altogether, and stop working for anyone but themselves as far as they can reasonably accomplish. He might get a vasectomy at a young age in order to make his philosophy permanent. The MGTOW might reject the whole biological charade and resign himself to a quiet and peaceful enjoyment of this passing dream we call life.

Many men who take the Red Pill and come to understand the game become nihilists. Nihilism is similar to solipsism, but it is much more erratic. Nihilists might become MGTOW. They might go crazy. They might commit suicide or kill others. Nihilists may even become players, and some of the most infamous players in the entire Manosphere are nihilists of various degrees. I've even seen nihilists come to promote Christianized Westernism, as Anders Behring Breivik seemed to do in his manifesto. There is no telling what they will do, it is like rolling dice; it's all dice anyways, to a real nihilist. I was once a nihilist.

Alpha Males & Self Improvement

The alpha male is a construct of our imagination; the alpha male is a very real force which must be reconciled with. Maybe you can become an alpha male, too. You will never be an alpha male. Confused?

MMA is an example of what this path means: you only get to ride high for a little while. Eventually your shin is going to snap on some schmuck's femur and you're going down in flames. No matter how good you are, you're going to be bested. But so many men realize this and decide that MMA is not for them. They get fat and stupid and lazy, but winning MMA matches is a reality, and wearing that belt, and having victory is all very real and possibly attainable. Although you may not be a brawler, I am not talking about MMA. I am talking about the game.

What does it take to be a contender in this game? It takes brutal honesty. It takes rational thought. It takes courage. Training. Discipline. Risk. It takes abstract thinking too. These are the male virtues. That is why men have traditionally ruled the world, their women, and themselves. These are the virtues that women inherently lack and don't require anyways. Men can rise above by simply being honest with themselves about the game. They must first correctly realize that there is a game, and then they must accept the rules and live by them if they want to enjoy and succeed. This is what it means to become an alpha male. You may even gain your own henchmen along the way.

Men need male space. They need a place to go where their mothers, their sisters, those bootylicious distractions are not present. They need to hear about life from other men who excel in the male virtues. There are almost no spaces left like this. Under the modern order (feminism) all male space has been demonized or eradicated, and women have been introduced as goaltenders of a sort. Hell, two men hanging out or walking somewhere together, or spending time mentoring children, are largely suspected of homosexuality these days.

Male thought that is not filtered through feminine sensibilities will result in loss of work, education, money, etc. The entire enterprise of political correctness is one gigantic feminine effort to adulterate male thought. The military, the Boy Scouts, the Elks Lodge, the Cigar Bar, the sports team, even fatherhood itself has been mocked or abolished—all have been laid low before the feminine imperative. Boys adrift have nowhere left to go to become men.

Choose Your Path

Those who choose to “man up” may find that they are at war with White Knights, nihilists, and Men Going Their Own Way. Many men consider manning up a fool’s errand, and you will be mocked for manning up. But some men want to be “saved,” redeemed, healed, empowered, and want to pursue peaceful relations with women and other men. They want to find the “higher things in life” and reject the low and ugly lies they’ve been fed. They want to tear it down and build something beautiful in its place. They may even have read about others who tore it down and built something beautiful once upon a time, ages ago. Is that man you? Hail the Return of Kings.

All Girls Are Like Shopping Carts

February 25, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

You will find many similar carts clustered together in one place. To take her you will usually have to have some coin.

Carts—or trolleys as we call them in Europe—are all very similar and hard to tell apart. Generally they are cheap and nasty, but usually come with brightly colored plastic and are emblazoned with some logo or other to identify her value and origin.

The cart doesn't belong to you, she will always return to the cluster of other carts.

A cart is not choosy about who uses her. She may be brand new, or she may have been used hundreds of times without you knowing. She does not come with a list of previous users.

If you pick one at random without paying attention, you may find someone else has had their junk in her and left her all filthy. As you can see, some people like to pack a lot of meat into their cart. Others may have been used by losers.

When you begin pushing your shopping cart you will notice her rattling and making noise, this is normal. Consider it background noise you must tolerate. Don't talk to her too much, or you may find yourself going mad. You may even end up depressed and homeless like our friend below.

So long as you keep pushing, she will keep moving. As soon as you stop, she will stop. You must constantly put in effort to make any progress with your shopping cart.

If you push her away, she will just whizz off into the distance with no direction or navigational skills. Someone else will soon come along and start pushing her in your place.

Unless you put things into her, she will remain empty. Be careful because shopping carts often seem to collect many expensive and impulsive items you don't really need, but have to pay for anyway.

If you leave her unattended, someone might take her or she might roll away all on her own. If this happens you may be liable for any damage she causes, and you may lose all the nice items you placed into her care.

A cart or trolley cannot hold lose change. Small items will just fall through and disappear. It also cannot hold any liquids. If you are foolish enough to try to entrust her with your liquidity, you will soon have none left.

She has a special slot, which flaps open. You can put a small child in here.

If you lose control of your cart she might scratch your car or bruise your shin.

Older or heavily used carts often have defects making them hard to get along with. Despite your best efforts they will go in strange directions, jam up completely, or tip over.

Carts are not great vehicles. Their small wheels mean they will only roll on smooth surfaces. Some have squeaky wheels and just won't shut up.

If you leave them outside they will age much faster. Carts prefer to stay inside or under cover. They always need to be taken care of.

You can try to take one home and keep her for yourself. Although she can be fun for an evening in the long run you will find her clumsy, unwieldy and relatively useless.

If you do take one home with you, someone who considers themselves her rightful owner, may come looking for her. The police may even want to know why you took the cart home.

Your friends might have fun riding her, but she may get upset.

Some men are able to push large numbers of carts, but even they say that carts are ultimately quite dull and all the same.

If you are a big fan of shopping carts as I am, you might want to consider opening your own mini supermarket. Then you will have access to and control of the carts whenever you please. A damaged one will not be an issue you can simply replace her. If a few go missing you will have plenty more where that came from or can canvass for replacements.

Appoint an old madam to keep them in order and you'll never have to go shopping again.

5 Signs A Girl Has Daddy Issues

February 26, 2014 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Daddy issues in a woman can be a man's best friend. And also the worst. On the one hand, meeting a girl with a fucked up relationship with her father can mean a modest, docile dynamo-in-the-sack who'll come over to your house on short notice to have rough sex and bake cookies for you afterward. On the other hand, it can signal that you're about to embark on a clusterfuck rollercoaster ride with a head case—that'll likely end with the cops coming to your house, you having to repaint your car, or having to call Verizon Wireless to block a number from reaching your "handset."

Whether she's the product of an absentee father she's constantly looking to replace or some transparently Freudian princess complex, you should know how to recognize a girl with daddy issues.

5 Signs a Girl Has Daddy Issues:

1. She's excessively slutty or harbors twisted sexual fantasies.

Let the thinly veiled rape fantasy be your guide. It's no secret that all girls like rough sex, to a degree, but your daddy-issues case will take that truism to a whole other level. They crave eyebrow-raising levels of pain and domination ("kink"). They cling to older men like a pair of Lululemons. They engage in major-league attention whoring. That doesn't just mean changing their Facebook profile picture every other day, it means being turning up on the Girls Gone Wild commercial or doing porn despite her upper-middle-class, suburban upbringing.

2. She engages in some form of self-mutilation.

Self-harm comes in a variety of forms—nearly all of which speak to some deeper pathologies. Even in age where the tattoo has become ubiquitous, excessive tattooing, piercing, and mangling of their signs of femininity (e.g., chopping their hair off) is a telltale sign that a girl's home life didn't include a healthy relationship with a father figure. Cutting, of course, is the Cadillac of self-mutilation. Obsessive nail-biting is often a comorbid symptom of all of them.

3. Is delusionally over-confident.

Not all daddy issues result in self-loathing; some, in fact, lead to an overblown sense of self. Over-fathering—things like being called a "princess" every day for the first 18 years of life—can render a girl into a deluded brat with entitlement issues or, worse, a talentless twit who thinks she's on the verge of being discovered. The next time a girl brags about not being able to cook, fails to thank you for a kind gesture, or doesn't apologize for being late, it's probably because "daddy's little girl" never was taught those behaviors aren't okay.

4. Is intimidated by a self-assured, masculine man.

Nothing causes a woman with issues with men more anxiety than a man just acting like a man, which is why I'm certain a majority of today's Tumblr-style feminists are little more than the damaged products of poor or nonexistent fathering. Girls who have an irrational fear of male sexuality (everything is "creepy"), label any masculine guy pejoratively ("douchebag" or "dudebro"), or who routinely pick physical fights with men are generally displaying their deep-seeded resentment toward their fathers.

5. Has body-image issues or "issues around food" (i.e., an eating disorder).

People who supposedly know what they're talking about are constantly telling us eating disorders "are all about control." That is, girls who feel like they've lost control over their lives obsess over controlling the one thing they can control—what they eat. And who, invariably, supposedly smothered these girls into the eating-disorder clinic? Their overbearing fathers. I'd be shocked if anything less than 90 percent of girls with eating disorders have documentable daddy issues.

A girl is with daddy issues is the third rail of your sex life. While dangerous, she will keep your tunnels from ever backing up. Proceed, but proceed with caution.

My One Year Of Not Masturbating

February 26, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

As I stated in my previous article, the last time I masturbated was February 24, 2013.

On Monday I hit a full year of abstaining from what is essentially a daily ritual for most men.

> Well I never thought I'd say this but…today makes it exactly one year since I last masturbated. #nofap
> — Law Dogger (@LawDogger) February 24, 2014

I won't rehash my thoughts from my first article. I can safely say that most of the same effects are still there. But after a year I think it is doing me more harm than well.

I Care Too Much About Fucking

I am insanely horny all the time—I'm talking 24/7. I can't get enough sex. To give you an example, this past weekend I had sex with a girl in my rotation seven times in about 16 hours. I say this not to brag but to show my insanity. This is not a new girl either so no novelty; I've been seeing her regularly for two months.

That's great some of you may say. But not when it overpowers your desire to meet higher quality girls. After this girl left, I went to a charity event filled with beautiful girls. After a few hours of an open bar and knowing the chances of taking one of these girls home was slim that night, I succumbed to my horniness again and went to another rotation girl's apartment and had sex with her three times that night. I should have stayed and tried harder for these beauties. But I didn't.

Even then I couldn't stop. I had another girl come over for lunch the next day and had sex with her, albeit only once. At that point after drinking for so many straight days and nights my tiredness took over my horniness and it ended.

I've always been a bit "committed" to game but this elevated my insanity. I'd go on dates when tired, or when I'm not interested in the girl because I knew there would be good chance for sex, especially when my game matured. I used to laugh at this diagnosis, but I became addicted to sex. You can see the problems associated with this. I'd rather go on a date with a 6 or 7 than stay at home and work on money, or my Russian, or go to the gym.

Even though I was consciously aware I was making the wrong decision—that I should stay in—my desire for sex trumped all.

Benefits For Some

The all out approach of not masturbating may work for a few situations I can think of. First, if you have any approach anxiety just stop masturbating. When your only outlet is sex you'd be amazed how fast you get out there and start hitting on girls.

Second is if you are trying to just bang as many chicks as possible over everything else. Then the built up aggression from not jerking off will fuel your fire and desire to do so, and it will make you more aggressive, more determined and in the end more successful for this particular goal. You just have to be willing to forego the harem to keep you motivated for fresh.

The other is if you want to get into an LTR. I've had a rather easy time maintaining girls after sex because of these side effects. I'm always ready to fuck and do it quite aggressively, which girls obviously like. I have a very short refractory period, which can lead to marathon sessions like described above. So for girls that like sex, which should be the only type you'd consider anyway for an LTR, this would help. In this situation, you would have to be willing to forego seeking other girls and instead channel your testosterone towards her.

So Now What

I do not regret this year one bit and I think everyone should try it for an extended period of time. My fire has led me to an excessive amount of dates, essentially concentrating years of experience interacting with girls into one year. I tend to attract girls that are more into sex because of how forward and aggressive I am, which leads to fun times.

But I think I have to end this, as it is gotten to the point where it is providing some adverse effects. I don't want to be thinking of sex 24/7. I'll probably never go back to daily masturbation, but there has to be a happy medium. Roosh alluded to once a week, which may be a good compromise. I just need to experiment and find what's right for me.

Every Man Needs A Friendly Neighborhood Bar

February 26, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

You will go to the nightclubs.

You will go to the hotspots.

You will spend hours at a salsa club.

And you will spend years chasing tail in loud “Oomp-chicka-oomp” establishments.

However, like every man you will age and the novelty of the chase will wear off. You will look at the hassle and pain of parking, paying for parking, waiting in line, paying covers, and screaming over loud music to disinterested girls in the hopes your game can pierce this incredibly hostile environment, and say, “fuck this.” You will also start to add up all of your “successes” and realize most of the women you picked up, even the lays, were not worth the price you paid in terms of time, money, labor and sanity. And so instead of thinking of “what could be” you start to think in terms “opportunity cost.”

Yeah, you could go chase Bambi at Sluts’n’Butz, but you could also just enjoy some really quality scotch you could never afford otherwise.

Yeah, you could take out Madison the Perpetual Social Work Masters Candidate, but you could finish programming that website for your new company.

And yes, you could masterfully approach 10 different girls in a night, but it would be nice instead to just sit and enjoy a pint while watching the game.

Welcome to the next stage in your life, son. The novelty of being a player has worn off, and you are now on your way to becoming an extraordinary gentleman. There’s nothing wrong with this. It doesn’t mean you’re no longer a player (you will always be able to play the game). But you are maturing and more importantly, starting to value your time and your life more than just another harlot you had to tell pretty lies to so you may bang her whilst suffering her mindless blathering. This is the stage in life where you contemplate hobbies, living life, traveling around the world, learning a new language, writing that book, and all other endeavors that fall under “pursuing your dreams.” And you’ll quickly realize just what a waste hanging out at all those loud nightclubs is rapidly becoming.

But before you book your flight to Thailand, may I suggest a vital and necessary component to enjoying this next stage in life?

Find yourself a friendly neighborhood bar.

Your friendly neighborhood bar is precisely that—YOUR friendly neighborhood bar. Not that you own it, but it is a place you regularly go to, and in doing so establish a social ownership of sorts or allegiance to that place. You become a “regular” and in doing so gain many ancillary benefits, certainly more benefits than going to another discotheque. But before you just pick any random bar, you have to ensure you pick the right one.

One, make sure it’s within walking distance. DUI’s and DWI’s are an all-too-common problem that plague men. Every guy loves to get hammered every once in a while, but it just takes that tail-light to be out or a crack in a windshield and Officer Trumpedupcharges can ruin your finances for half a year, jack up your insurance, and put a huge dent in your career. If the bar is within walking distance, not only are you saving money on gas, but you are also sparing yourself a DWI that will pay for all of your drinks for the rest of your life.

Two, in being within walking distance the bar is also by default within your neighborhood. This is important in that pubs are still the source of information, rumor, and gossip. Not that you care about gossip like women do in People Magazine, but it’s always good to have your ear to the ground in the town you live. Property taxes, which cops to look out for, which women to avoid so you don’t shit in your own yard, etc. You’ll learn more about your town from the bar than you will the local crappy newspaper.

Three, quality customers. There was a bar I had to walk past in Wyoming everyday en route to work. “The Century Club.” Even though it was 7:45 AM, you could peer into the bar and see it full of people. The sad thing is that this was Buffalo, Wyoming and there were no 24-hour mines or factories which would rationalize having the nightshift drinking “after their shift ended.” Nope, just 100% grade-A alcoholics!

Not the type of people you want in YOUR friendly neighborhood bar.

No, you want to find a nice bar. A pub. Even something pushing a “gentleman’s club,” but not so fancy it starts to move into “posh night club” or “country club” territory. I have a preference for Irish pubs and cigar lounges, but the key thing is that you are not going to find the cheapest place. You need to pay a premium for your drinks and your food because in doing so you will also have premium people in the bar. This is important because over time you will establish a rapport with these individuals, and if you live in the town long enough, they will become your surrogate family. It will also guarantee higher-quality conversation with said patrons, not to mention potentially lead to business dealings, social activities, and other fringe benefits.

Four, quality bartenders. Good bartenders don't just know how to pour a Guinness with decent head or know that a Gibson has pearl onions in it. They are also good listeners. Not that you abuse them as your personal therapist, but a near-daily visit to your friendly neighborhood bartender is a good psychological release where you can tell him your problems and he his. Also, in having a regular bartender (and assuming you tip very well) they are more prone to "oops!" accidentally pour you a double Rumpie when you, in a very honest and Christian manner, insist on a single. They are also prone to give you food somebody returned, not to mention "sample the new beer they just got." Take the money you'd normally pay for parking while chasing Tilly McDitz and tip the bar staff generously.

Finally, atmosphere. Somewhat related to going with a higher class bar, you need the bar to be comfortable, warm, and inviting. Comfortable chairs (cigar lounges are great for this), tasteful decorations on the wall, a nice oak bar top, and above all else MUSIC THAT IS NOT LOUD NOR OBNOXIOUS. This is your home away from home. Your quiet office. Your personal den. Your happy place of zen. You should be able to have a normal conversation without yelling over music or people, just as you could break out a laptop and do some work undisturbed.

Naturally, to find a bar with all these qualities is difficult. However, the friendly neighborhood bar will play such an important underlying role in your life that I strongly advocate you only rent or buy lodging within walking distance of such a bar. The benefits are often unappreciated and rarely realized.

How To Transform Your Appearance From Ugly Duckling To Alpha Stud

---

Today's article talks about a man's looks. Specifically, what he can control. My stance is simple: Looks afford you a few more seconds of 'approval' in your approach before you open your mouth, but once you speak, game is the great equalizer. However, maximizing your looks is your duty to being the best man you can be.

Examining this on on a bell curve would give the top .01% of men in looks at an advantage, but that's not where the rest of us live, so let's examine exactly what we can do to improve our looks and give us a better edge.

When I was researching this topic I decided to choose men who are known around the world based on their celebrity. While some of these men have now blossomed into ideal male specimens by females, at one point in time they were hardly alpha studs. The point of this examination is to show what qualities we as men do HAVE in our power and those we do not.

The main components that we as men can control are the following:

- Teeth
- Hair (if you're balding or turning grey, then I have discussed the alternatives on my blog)
- Body (whether in-shape, skinny, or overweight)
- Style

Certain aspects can be even more enhanced through plastic surgery, but for simplicity's sake, these are the factors that can be controlled and improved with minimum costs.

Before we dive into this study, I'll be crystal fucking clear: yes, some men are naturally more handsome than others, due to symmetry in their facial structure etc, however, this study is focused on men who were average at best BEFORE they improved their looks and in the process, greatly enhanced their looks.

The fact that these are celebs does not discredit their commitment to improving their looks and their celebrity status only cements their 'desirability' by female fans. Take away the celeb status and these transformations are still impressive and doable for any man who truly wants to improve their life and who is disciplined in their pursuit of self-improvement.

Tom Hardy

BEFORE

From his style to his atrocious haircut, Tom Hardy greatly improved his looks and became a sex symbol by changing it up. From his fitness in Bronson and Warrior, to an improved wardrobe, to a visit to a dentist to get his teeth capped, to dropping the drug habit, Tom jumped up the scale in looks by taking control of what he could: his style, body, teeth and hair.

AFTER

And also went from skinny stoner to jacked as fuck. Yes, it was for his role in Warrior, however, he still had to put in the effort to hit the gym like mad.

Adam Levine

BEFORE

One of the most famous cases of a physical transformation, Adam struggled with acne, crooked teeth and a bad haircut. A heavy treatment of ProActive (according to his sponsorship), a stylish haircut, a trip to the dentist and some time in the sun and Adam went from pasty pizza face nerd to a rockstar who just got engaged to a Victoria Secret Model.

Being a rockstar doesn't hurt by any means, but guaran-fuckin-teed he wouldn't have become a rockstar looking like the Before picture and he sure as hell wouldn't landed the pussy fest that gets thrown his way by getting this magazine cover, if his face still resembled a mine field post-explosion.

AFTER

Tom Cruise

As big as a legend as he is, this dude had a seriously fucked up grill. We can speculate if he would have become as big as a star as he as, if hadn't gotten dental work done, but I'll bet my life savings he wouldn't have. He took his looks up multiple notches by getting his teeth fixed and now is ironically known for his mega watt smile.

In the world of attraction, there are innate physical qualities that you cannot change such as your height, but the aspects of your looks that you can control, you should make a concerted effort to do so.

I used to have glasses, big ears and the worse smile known to mankind. I kid you not, my teeth were royally fucked. The orthodontist pulled EIGHT teeth out before putting braces on me. That's how crowded my mouth was. Were braces cheap back then? No, but I set up a payment plan and the orthodontist worked out it with me, because I made the effort to make it happen. I switched the glasses for contacts and eventually grew into my ears, thus losing my opportunity to fly like Dumbo, but gaining the ability to walk through doorways without catching my ears on them.

All of the aformentioned physical 'flaws' I had, were ones I could control. If I hadn't grown into my ears, I could have elected to do a surgery or just rocked them. You will not realize your full potential until you make a list of what you need to improve about yourself and than make a plan to make it happen.

Fuck the excuses, fuck procrastinating and start today on taking control of what you can change and don't worry about the rest.

To get started on improving your life and becoming the man you've always wanted to be, go here.

The Horrifying Merger Of Feminism And Fat Acceptance

February 27, 2014 | by Kaffrey | Link | Original Link

Throughout the last year and a half, there has been an unsettling change taking place in the United States. This change I speak of is an offshoot of the feminist movement entitled "Fat Acceptance." This movement aims to coddle the insecurities and shortcomings of overweight women, creating in them a sense that they are in fact beautiful and worthy, no matter their body size.

Now I must stop first and say that being overweight does not innately make a woman to be unworthy. I do believe that a woman's worth lies is many more characteristics than simply her body weight. But one fact we must not ignore is that most overweight women tend to have qualities that aren't exactly, well, admirable. These qualities include laziness, lethargy, gluttony, and self-esteem issues.

The trait that I can firmly say almost all overweight females share is their lack of ability to take responsibility for their own actions. These women often refer to a variety of explanations that are used to justify their obesity, while exonerating themselves from blame. These explanations include:

1. "Obesity is genetic, it's not my fault."

This is the most widely used excuse for obesity that exists in the world today. This reasoning is an absolute sham. There is absolutely no scientific evidence that suggests simply genetics can cause obesity. While there is strong evidence to show that one person may have more of a genetic tendency to become overweight than another, this by no means is a reason valid for one to blame their gelatin-like consistency on. Many celebrities in the public eye who have a family history of obesity have been able to overcome their genetic tendencies with hard work and dedication to a healthy and active lifestyle.

2. “I don’t have 3 hours a day to be in the gym getting thin.”

This excuse may be somewhat valid—they may indeed not have a full THREE hours to be in the gym working out each day. However, three hours are not needed. Two hours are not needed. Nor is even one hour needed.

Research shows that an intense workout of only 30 minutes a day can jump-start weight loss in women, especially when the large muscle groups such as the hamstrings and quadriceps are incorporated into an explosive and intense workout. These muscles are some of the largest in the body, and allow for increased after burn of fat, and a higher metabolic rate up to 5-6 hours after the workout. If women cannot find just 30-45 minutes in their day to actually be healthy and maintain the body they reside in, then a priority change is certainly in order.

3. “I have children.”

Now I’m not going to dispute that taking care of children can be quite a burden on a mother. The constant stress and time obviously takes a toll. But as they care for their children, so a mother must also take some time to care for herself. Children do take time, but as we all know, there are 24 hours in a day—24 hours that I’m willing to bet are not completely used on the children or even other activities. This particular excuse of blaming their obesity on their children is not valid. This excuse it in reality an offshoot of excuse #2. What this excuse truly reflects is a woman who has exceptionally poor time management skills.

Furthermore, the child care excuse includes another component. This component is the weight that is gained during pregnancy. Many women online and in magazines constantly rant about how hard it is to lose the weight after the children are born.

Sure, losing weight is hard. What in life that is worth it isn't hard? This is the message that we must provide for those who have accepted the poisonous lies that their muffin tops and back boobs are of no consequence of their own actions. If these truths are told, the issue of these excuses could one day be a thing of the past.

Twisted Ideologies

One further disturbing piece of insidious ideology women across the United States have adopted is that they are entitled to have things their way. In an article I recently read by a fat accepting feminist, this feminist shamed a hard-working mother for touting her amazing transformation from overweight after pregnancy, to toned and fit just a few months later.

This feminist claimed such a metamorphosis was nearly impossible. Among the reasons listed for this "impossibility" were time constraints, but also her personal wants. One rather noxious statement this feminist made was as follows: "She should be able to eat what she wants, when she wants." This was a reason given for why she couldn't lose post pregnancy weight.

Disturbing Realizations

This statement struck me into a stupor. How could an adult woman be so naive, ignorant, and downright entitled? This questioned brewed in my mind for days after reading her foolish words, opening my eyes to the fact that in America today we have thrown out all common sense and logic.

Yes, we do live in a free country, but that doesn't mean we should be shameless with our behaviors. Sure, we are all able to do what we want when we want within the law, but is that really a good idea? We are able to smoke cigarettes, and many people do, but is that a healthy idea? We are allowed to eat glass if we really wanted to, but is that a smart idea? I say this to make the point that there are many things out there people want to do, but that simply, and wisely, should not be done.

Dire Consequences

This feminist woman likely also believes she should have everything in her life her way, and that all others must conform to her demands. Her statements show that many women in our country have adopted ideas that are at war with their own bodies and health. They just want to have a good time and live life on their terms and whims.

However, if said women keep living in this dream world, they will be rudely awoken by a tsunami of health problems including hypertension, high cholesterol, joint deterioration, cancer, sleep apnea, and a barrage of other obesity related diseases and disorders. It truly is sad to know that these consequences will befall those who adopt these ideologies, which is why I am doing my best to warn them. I fear that this feminists outlook on life will only be altered after her health has already drastically deteriorated, and finally realizes the error of her ways.

By saying “I want to eat what I want when I want”, women are indicating they believe they have the right to do as they please. The freedom to do as they wish. What they don’t understand is that these attitudes will only take away the freedoms and rights from them later in life.

Perhaps they want to walk on the beach with their granddaughters? They won’t be able to because of joint problems and the issue of their mobility being confined to a wheel chair. They will be unable to travel the world when they retire, as they will have a myriad of health problems preventing them from leaving the immediate area of their hospital or bedroom. They will constantly feel tired and lethargic, never wanting to go out, and therefore missing so many of life’s beautiful moments.

However, the most tragic consequence is that their lifespans will certainly be shortened because of their choices. They will be taking away from themselves the right to live out a long life. All because they couldn't keep their greasy hands off those microwaved pizza bites they just had to have. BECAUSE IT WAS THEIR RIGHT.

The Dark Road

It is sad the path, that of the fat feminist. It leads to a life of destruction and loneliness. Of illness and turmoil. I now quote Robert Frosts poem "The Road Not Taken." The quote reads: "Two paths diverged in a yellow wood, and I, I took the one less traveled by, and that has made all the difference."

This poem illustrates that there are two roads. The road to a life of health and enlightenment, and a road leading to a cliff. A cliff where at the bottom lies a pit full of feminist ideals, and the bodies of those who followed them to the bitter end. I hope that in reading this article, I can inspire in many the ideals of hard work and dedication, leading to a life of health and sober knowledge of the realities we face. To provide inspiration for a life that does not lead to one final leap off a cliff side, across a ravine, fatty arm outstretched, sausage fingers grasping for the last pizza bite, only to end in a dark pit of despair.

How Misconceptions About Trolling Threaten Society

February 27, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

There has been a series of articles on a recent study showing self-proclaimed internet trolls score high in dark triad traits. From the abstract:

> Trolling correlated positively with sadism, psychopathy, and Machiavellianism, using both enjoyment ratings and identity scores. Of all personality measures, sadism showed the most robust associations with trolling and, importantly, the relationship was specific to trolling behavior. Enjoyment of other online activities, such as chatting and debating, was unrelated to sadism. Thus cyber-trolling appears to be an Internet manifestation of everyday sadism.

While the study is legitimate, virtually every response to it has contained dangerous and false assumptions that threaten free speech and public discourse on the internet.

1. Seeking An Emotional Reaction Is Not Trolling

> Seeking attention isn't trolling. All writers who want their work read seek attention.
> — runsonmagic (@runsonmagic) January 8, 2014

Let's define what trolling is. Trolling is when someone expresses a belief or takes action they do not genuinely agree for the sole purpose of the negative reaction it will create. Trolling is not expressing a genuine belief or conviction. This is key, because defining trolling as anything that creates a strong emotional reaction puts all great art in the category of trolling.

That moment in Raiders of the Lost Ark when a menacing swordsman prepares faces off against Indiana Jones – only to be shot in the face? Trolling. Great storytellers frequently consciously manipulate their audiences emotions to get their viewers to clap, laugh, or jump all at the same time.

The distinction between what a great artist does and what a troll does is authenticity and intention. Art and trolling may both provoke, but art does so for a message or purpose.

Return of Kings is often incorrectly called a "troll site" by those who don't realize our writers genuinely hold the beliefs we express. We write our ideas in a way that draws attention to our work and entertains our audience, because we believe our perspective has value and is worth spreading. Do not confuse provocative art with trolling.

2. Your Reaction Does Not Make Someone Else A Troll

When I see articles telling women that making money is better than creating a loving family, I have the same reaction a feminist might have to a Return of Kings article, but I don't accuse those authors of trolling because I understand they genuinely hold the beliefs they express.

Merely because an article creates strong emotional reactions does not mean the author is trolling. It may simply mean that you feel triggered by a different viewpoint. Writing "are you serious?" in response to rationally argued beliefs shows an inability to empathize with or seek to understand the perspectives of others. Labeling someone else a troll is a tool the ego uses to protect itself, and avoid change. People comfortable with their own beliefs are capable of rationally confronting the writings of those who disagree with them.

3. Dissent Is Not Trolling

> Anyone who loves language welcomes useful neologisms. But “troll” is increasingly used to mean only “someone who disagrees with me”.
> — Richard Dawkins (@RichardDawkins) February 21, 2014

Labeling dissenters as “trolls” allows powerholders to dismiss criticism without addressing the merits of opposing arguments. This new study correlating trolling with sociopathy, allows powerholders not only to dismiss dissent, but label it as a mental illness and forcibly medicate those who disagree with them.

Climate change critics have frequently been labeled trolls, despite the fact in An Inconvenient Truth Al Gore predicted the polar ice caps would fully melt by 2014. The polar ice caps have actually grown since his prediction. Though Gore’s 2009 global warming hypothesis has been proven false, many scientists continue to label any criticism of his apocalyptic claims as unscientific trolling, and ban dissent from their publications.

Asserting that a black man could one day be President in the early 1800s would have been considered trolling. Had pre-Civil War America had modern social attitudes around public speech, slavery might never have ended, and America would have silenced some of it’s greatest social movements.

The tactic of labeling social change as trolling is being used to silence modern human rights movements. A recent Slate article dismissed the entire Intactivist movement against circumcision as trolls, despite major European medical groups publicly campaigning against the practice. The idea that men have the right to their own bodies and sexual choices is a legitimate human rights claim, and a sincere view held by many Americans and most Europeans.

Labeling the opposition as “trolls” shows an unwillingness to debate, and that the person hurling ad hominen attacks is more interested in maintaining power than pursuing the truth. In the long run, this tactic could be used to forcibly drug those who disagree with government policies based on the claim they are “sociopathic trolls.”

4. Dark Triad Traits Are Not Entirely Bad

The word psychopath typical conjurers images of basement dwelling serial killers, but it really describes a set of personality characteristics not behaviors. Kevin Dutton, author of The Wisdom of Pscyhopaths, argues fearlessness, mental toughness, charm, and ability to approach challenges with cold rationality are desirable characteristics for leaders.

He cites Winston Churchill’s willingness to sacrifice men’s lives defending Britain from Adolf Hitler as evidence of psychopathy on Churchill’s part. Churchill could not have been the heroic leader he was during WWII, without the sociopathic ability to emotionally detach himself from decisions that required sending young men to their death to preserve British freedom.

Mental illness and leadership often go hand in hand. According the book A First Rate Madness, Martin Luther King, Winston Churchill, Mahatma Gandhi, and Presidents Roosevelt, Kennedy, and Lincoln all suffered from various forms of mental illness. If we dismissed men merely because of their flaws, we might never benefit from their strengths.

5. Trolling Can Contribute To Our Culture

Arguably, the Orson Welles War Of The Worlds radio broadcast was the first mass media act of trolling. Welles convinced hundred of Americans that a real alien invasion was occurring, by presenting H. G. Well's science fiction novel as a genuine news report.

Though his performance fits every available definition of trolling, we would never have had Citizen Kane, one of the greatest films ever made, if we were to write his early work off as mere trolling. Welles broadcast revealed Americans fears about foreign invasion and showed how gullible the public was in the hands of mass media.

The New York Times.

NEW YORK, MONDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1938.

Radio Listeners in Panic, Taking War Drama as Fact

Many Flee Homes to Escape 'Gas Raid From Mars'—Phone Calls Swamp Police at Broadcast of Wells Fantasy

Trolling can actually contribute to our culture by revealing our societal triggers and emotional weaknesses. By noticing what topics or views easily set us off, we can see where we can to grow as a culture and individually. Emotionally secure people are not harmed by others perspectives, genuine or trolling.

Pranks, satire, and April fool's jokes all contain an element of trolling. The only difference is intent. Trolls seek a negative response, but the best revenge is living well. By responding to their attacks as if it was for your benefit, and you can use the experience to learn about yourself and your emotional triggers.

If you feel like you are being trolled or become angry at something you read online, see if there is a way you can learn from the experience and be grateful for it. Be thankful we live in a free society, because the same freedom that protects trolls also protects all great works of art and social movements. The same traits found our worst trolls can be found in our greatest leaders. The answer to trolls isn't to ban them, label them, or fear them, but to meet all things with understanding and gratitude.

The 25 Hottest Girls Of Ok Cupid Los Angeles

February 27, 2014 | by B.R. Crumb | Link | Original Link

To the girls of OkCupid:

Let me be the first to thank you for your participation in what has been history's largest, and most unflinchingly honest, female beauty pageant. Though you didn't realize it, by creating your online dating profile, you put yourself in the running for the coveted title of, "OkCupid's Most Attractive (read: bangable) Girl."

OkCupid didn't tell you about this because they never intended to release the results—but I got my hands on the list of winners, so I'm going to do it for them, starting with the hottest girls of OkCupid Los Angeles.

How did this happen?

Before the results, a note on procedure. This ranking is based solely on data pulled directly from OkCupid. It represents the collective wisdom of thousands of men judging thousands of girls in the Los Angeles area. Whenever a man visits a girl's profile (or vice versa) or views in it OkCupid's 'Quickmatch' game, he can rate her on a 1–5 scale; see below.

Girls: while your account was active, hundreds if not thousands of men rated you based on your looks and written responses. OkCupid kept meticulous track of their judgements.

All the many ratings your profile received were averaged so that—in the proud tradition of oppressor males everywhere—the guys who built OkCupid could reduce your attractiveness to a single number on the 1-10 scale. They used that number to rank you against other girls in your area.

Gaggles of chicks flocked to OkCupid and, over time, the cream rose. In this no-holds barred competition of female value, there were winners, and there were a helluva lot of losers.

The girls here are the winners. They had the 25 highest ratings in Los Angeles when I pulled the numbers, and they provide an illuminating look at what men find attractive, when asked in the privacy of their own dating profiles.

To be eligible to win, a girl had to:

- like guys
- be between 18 and 49
- live within 25 miles of Los Angeles
- and have a photo

I tossed all such girls into the mix, and here's what came out. For each of the 25 winners below, there's one profile picture and a representative quote from her profile text. I'm keeping the screen names to myself, because I'm a selfish bastard. Plus, privacy concerns or some shit.

If you were among the losers, take note:tThere's much to be learned through observing your betters. For your benefit, I've included a quiz at the end to gauge your comprehension of the material presented below.

Final Assessment

There is a lesson behind all these pictures. Take this quiz to see how well you've internalized it:

1. Recall that girls ages 18 to 49 were eligible to win. Expressed as a percentage, how many of the winners were 22 or younger? 25 or older?

2. By the standards of 2014 America, how many of the winners qualify as "thin" or "skinny"? How many are "curvy," "full-figured," "overweight," or have "a little extra"?

3. How many of these winners have pixie cuts?

4. How many have visible tattoos?

5. How many have gaps between their thighs? How many have holes in their Lululemons?

6. How many appear to have distinguished themselves based on their intellect, eloquence, experience, confidence, professional success, maturity, political / social awareness, grrrl power, or other qualities not visible to the naked eye?

7. Speaking of naked, how many of these girls appear uncomfortable showing skin or presenting themselves as sex objects for the gratification of men?

EXTRA CREDIT: Briefly, if the offense is not too great, consider girl #23. In order from most important to least important, rank the following factors that might have contributed to her high score:

- Visible cleavage
- Promise of fast, no-investment sex
- Redhead fetishism
- Thirsty simps

- All other components of male sexual attraction combined

If you struggled on the quiz, check this list of L.A.'s 20 runners up for remedial instruction in what men actually value in girls. Others of you can go here to learn more about how this ranking was compiled.

How Homosexual Athletes Are Ruining Sports

February 28, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Formerly retired NBA player Jason Collins recently returned to action against the Los Angeles Lakers this week, to the tune of eleven minutes played, five personal fouls, and zero points.

I stand 5'9, and even I could put up a stat line like that in the NBA.

Realistically, it should have just been another day in the life of a mediocre, bench-warming NBA player. Instead, Collins' debuts made the headlines of just about every major media outlet, and he even impressed the president of the United States with his outstanding courage. Courage for what, you say?

Being a homosexual.

Yeah, what a real hero. Do you think Obama gives a personal call to all soldiers who demonstrate bravery on the battlefield? I doubt it.

Collins' return to the NBA (his announcement on his sexuality was announced last year) came shortly after NFL prospect Michael Sam recently came out of the closet, making him the first potential openly gay NFL athlete. Guess who praised him for his outstanding courage, as well? None other than the first lady Michelle Obama herself:

> You're an inspiration to all of us, @MikeSamFootball. We couldn't be prouder of your courage both on and off the field. -mo

— FLOTUS (@FLOTUS) February 10, 2014

Truthfully, I could care less about whether these two men prefer other men or women. The fact of the matter is, their "courage and bravery" is poised to send American sports, and as a direct result, the American culture, further down the left-ward path.

The gridirons and hardwood floors of the NBA and NFL have always been a place of blood, sweat, and tears.

On the gridiron, Michael Sam, who has not taken a single snap in the NFL, has turned the NFL, ESPN, and all sports media outlets into his personal circus since his coming-out announcement. LGBT activists are overjoyed at the announcement, thinking he will be a symbol of courage, as an inspiration to the future's gay in-the-closet athletes who fear being judged in the harsh confines of the locker room by their fellow, pussy-juggling teammates.

In reality, Michael Sam is simply the first drop of poison in entering the NFL system, and it will continue to spread. What people are failing to realize is that locker rooms are not at all politically correct. Players do not censor themselves like we are forced to do in the corporate world. While homosexuality has been gaining acceptance momentum in society as a whole, the locker room is a vastly different animal.

You see, locker rooms are one of the last true places that contain only, or close to only men. It is a place where men are free to make all of the crude jokes they want; where they are free to bond together as males without fear of outside judgment. Of course, Sam claims the people making these jokes are simply uneducated:

> "I've been in locker rooms where all kinds of slurs have been said," Sam said. "I don't think anyone means it. They might be naive and uneducated but as time goes on everyone will adapt."

Of course, he then goes on to say, "I just wish you guys will see me as Michael Sam the football player instead of Michael Sam the gay football player," while sporting a rainbow-colored ‘Stand with Sam’ pin around his neck.

I don’t know what the hell one would expect if you make turn your coming-out announcement into a national media party, but since you’ve been hyped as the first openly gay NFL player, it is only natural that people are going to see you as “the gay football player.” While Sam may have the support of the LGBT communities, more than likely he will simply be viewed as the odd one out in the NFL locker rooms, no matter how politically correct his teammates are to the media about the situation.

If Sam truly cared about being an effective football player in the NFL, he would have simply separated business from pleasure. When Super Bowl winning quarterback for the Green Bay Packers, Aaron Rodgers, was rumored to be gay last year, he put an end to those rumors. However, even if he had been gay, then up to that point, he had been living his life as a model homosexual. His respect from his NFL peers would have remained intact, for keeping his personal life and exploits under wraps, and focusing on the task at hand, playing football.

Michael Sam, on the other hand, wanted to be famous.

Turning our attention to the hardwood basketball courts of the NBA, it’s easy to see what Jason Collins’ agenda was. Apparently, he got so much publicity he’s been unable to set aside time for his former fiancé, former WNBA player Carolyn Moos, whom he was with for eight years:

> A month before I was set to marry the man I loved, he called off the wedding. I had no idea why. He and I had been together for eight years. We had planned to have children, build a family. Nearly four years later, I got my answer. My former fiancé, Jason Collins, a pro basketball player with the Washington Wizards, announced last spring in Sports Illustrated that he is gay.

He didn’t even have the decency to tell her the article was running, or set aside any time to talk to her about it since then. Sure, he may be courageous for being the first man in the four major American sports to come out of the closet, but he is also a coward whom walked out on the woman he was engaged to with nay an explanation.

I'd be the first to tell you that if you break up with a girl, you don't owe her any closure. However, if she is going to have the mainstream media knocking down her door, and she never really wronged you (and from all accounts, it doesn't seem she did), then some explanation is in order. The fact that he didnot taken the time to make a phone call to her and give her some answers shows he was too busy relishing in his new fame.

He wanted another shot at an NBA contract (imagine the backlash if he had never been signed again), and the chance to make more money than any retired NBA average player.

Some hero.

Gay rights activists want homosexuality to be viewed not only as acceptable, but natural. They want to push gay propaganda on to children, and they will throw fits if they are not allowed to do so. They are supporting athletes like Collins and Sam simply because of the publicity it brings to their movement. It used to be that homosexuals wanted to be able to come out to their families and close friends. Fair enough. Then, they wanted the same rights as married male/female relationships. They have been successful in getting those rights as well. However, it's still not enough.

No longer is it enough for homosexuals to be given equal opportunity and not be hated. No, now they want to poison the entire nation, and that starts by hitting the sectors of culture that have been dominated by the masculine up to this point.

The selfish, diva-like actions of Sam and Collins have flung open the closet doors for all current and future American sports athletes. Soon, the Vegas bookies will cease to bet about covering the spread, and instead ask people to place bets on the over and under about whether a player likes to take it up the ass. Rather than beer being sold at sporting events, you will pay $20 for an appletini.

Say goodbye to the blood, sweat, and tears of the American sporting world. They might as well dub it Project Runway. You can blame the homosexual athletes like Collins and Sam for ruining sports, as they have injected the culture with poison, killing off one of the final forms of pure masculinity supported by the American public.

As of now, there is no antidote.

> Let's be real here, how does having gay NBA and NFL players REALLY help society?

Is Washington Post Writer Adam Taylor A Shill Or Part Of Something Larger?

February 28, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

While reading Roosh's article about Adam Taylor and the Washington Post, I noticed quite a few things I would like to share with people here. The direct link between Adam Taylor and the Radio Free excerpt is an anomaly. Such blatant copying is a very rare thing to occur because it gives away a possible collusion between entities.

Looking for these open relationships is long and hard. The better way to analyze the relations and motivations of certain publishers, policy makers and other manipulators is to study the various themes they put out and where these themes repeat. While Roosh might assume that Adam Taylor is the paid shill by himself, I've noticed that his writing changes to whoever publishes it. Therefore the Washington Post Worldviews section may be the one that is parroting US State Department themes not just Adam Taylor.

As is shown in Roosh's article, the similarities between Adam Taylor's piece and Radio Free Europe are quite telling. It is a possibility that it is a coincidence but a small one. People that try to influence public opinion go to great lengths to ensure things like this do not happen which is why I'm assuming that Adam Taylor is part of larger machine and not a shill by himself.

Bigotgate: The Fallout From Gordon Brown's Gaffe

No matter what Gordon Brown hopes, his now notorious gaffe - nicknamed 'bigotgate' by the British press - is likely to play a pivotal role in the upcoming British elections.

The fact is, calling Gillian Duffy, a widowed 66-year-old grandmother, a 'bigot' was never likely to...

'Gay Dog' Refused Entry To Australian Restaurant

(641) Comments | Posted April 28, 2010 | 4:34 PM

An Australian restaurant has been forced to apologize and pay compensation after refusing to let a blind man enter because they thought his dog was gay.

In May 2009, Ian Jolly, 57, was attempting to dine at the Thai Spice restaurant in Adelaide, when he was refused entry...

Looking back at Adam Taylor's writing for the Huffington Post, he wrote fluff pieces about gay dogs and other mass consumption items for that audience. His writing about geopolitical intrigue only takes the current form when he begins writing for the Washington Post. All his articles are the Who's Who of what the US State Department doesn't like. The roster includes Russia, China, Venezuela, Syria, and Zimbabwe. He writes nothing critical of any American allies.

As I said earlier, it's very rare for open evidence of collusion such as the similar quotations to present themselves. A better technique to discern propaganda and collusion is to analyze trends and themes.You should look for such things as what the work attempts to convey, does it try to get you to think or act in a certain way, and does it try to get you to disregard other things.

In the Adam Taylor case, the pattern changes significantly from the Huffington Post to the Washington Post. You can also apply this trend analysis to pretty much any author. You can even apply to the contributors here at Return of Kings and see what you get. Do the trends indicate that the publisher may dictate what the writers write about? Do the trends indicate whether or not the writers have freedom to write about whatever they want? To help you readers out on this exercise I'll inform you there were two articles I did at the direction of the publisher. They were my article for fat shaming week and my article for #backtothekitchen. Feel free to comment on any other trends you might notice and if they do not line up with the "about" page.

Why Society Owes Men Sex

February 28, 2014 | by Giovanni Dannato | Link | Original Link

A 16-year-old male needs sex for sanity as he needs food, water, or air for survival. For all of human history, there have been families and clans to guide us to adult roles and help us find mates while we're still young. Anyone would have taken it for granted that in return for their contributions and obedience to the customs of the tribe, the tribe would in turn give them a place.

In mass societies, however, there's always been a steady stream of losers who get nothing in return. If we tried to imagine a chief denying the tribe's young men sex and status, we know he wouldn't be alive much longer. For a tribe to exist in peace the needs of most of its people must be met. When there is no bread, there are bread riots. When men have no hope of wealth, family, or even of getting sex they withdraw their loyalty to the existing social order and turn to desperate measures. Predictably, across time and place, 'losers' will defect.

China has long had a class of men called "bare branches" with no prospects. Whenever this class got too large, mass defection was the result—a result we see on a grand scale during the decline of the last dynasty, the Qing. The Taiping rebellion, one of the biggest wars ever, was started by a man who failed to pass the civil service exams after multiple attempts. Even this war was just one of several massive rebellions caused by masses of rootless men. Around the same time, organized crime in south China grew so big it threatened the state itself as desperate men joined in droves.

In the Middle East, a region known for polygamy, there are many loser males. As we see anywhere in the world, when young men despair of being part of society they quickly to turn to desperate measures and radical ideologies. Today, in America, boys are taught from youth that no one owes them anything, that they must prove themselves by "pulling themselves up by their own bootstraps." They have to prove they aren't 'dogs', 'pigs', ‘rapists’, ‘creepers’, or ‘peter pans’ but never is there as single mention of what they get in return.

The trouble with this lesson is that interdependence is society. Without people helping each other, especially when elders fail to guide the young, there is no society, only a zero sum hell of all against all. And that is where Western society is now. If we were to lose all our money tomorrow, we’d all be living on the streets. No one owes us anything, after all. And if you do have a steady supply of money, it’s still up to you to figure out everything yourself. No one in early life trains you or gives you useful information; you just go to school where you’re kept conveniently out of sight most of your young life. Growing up, everything we’re told about the most important things in life are lies, yet the social order still expects unquestioning obedience. The reality is that a tribe that fails to initiate its young men has rejected them and cast them out.

A tribe that fails to set up its young men with women keeps false faith on its side of the social contract. If they won’t get you a woman they’re telling you you’re worthless—that you don’t deserve to pass down your line. They don’t want you. A group that values you makes sure you have sexual relationships that bind you to your people and give you a stake that you’ll be willing to defend when the going gets tough. Because they value you, they want your genes in the next generation

A group that does nothing to help, or outright cockblocks you, is just a parasite that feeds on itself. It becomes a society of death that prevents reproduction, setting the sexes against each other, tearing them apart. It becomes like a planet with an acid atmosphere and crushing gravity; a place hostile to human life.

Helping men find their place and a good woman is the difference between a healthy culture and a pathological cult. The culture reciprocates, enabling its valuable cooperators to thrive. On the other hand, the cult parasitizes, tricking its men into becoming castrated worker ants while the leaders take all the women. The cult elders expect a young man to contribute decades of labor, to march into battle without complaint, but cannot even offer him sex.

If you are past your mid-teens with no family, no sex, no social role is in sight, do not fool yourself—you’re the “lost boys” of the Mormon polygamist splinter sects. The elders are actively malicious towards their boys. Just a few are chosen as successors, the rest cast out like unwanted pets. The polygamist elders at least are straightforward and honest. They send away boys they don’t want into another society that just might give them a chance. They don’t lead them on for decades lying to them while feeding on their labor and loyalty.

When the tribe throws out a young man to live as a stray animal, he can no longer pretend he’s one of them. Their traditional food, pastimes, language, and values become those of a distant and foreign culture. He finds himself inhabiting an arid wilderness where once he believed he lived in a ‘civilization’ of abundance and mutual aid. His only hope is to begin anew. It’s a crushing and fearful reality, but to live a life of self-deception enslaved to The Many is a fate worse than death.

11 Hard Truths I Learned From Taking The Red Pill

March 1, 2014 | by Nicholas Peake | Link | Original Link

For most of my life, I've been that friendly small town guy, a likable guy who always seemed to establish a good feeling and friendly rapport with the people I meet. The kind who would stop to help a stranger with a flat tire or that a father wouldn't mind taking his daughter to dinner. I was the type of fellow you could invite over to visit your house without even the slightest concern about anything going wrong. And yet, at the hands of a woman, I was so vulnerable and so prone to error.

Having been the classical "nice guy" I was for so many years, I can recall many instances of humiliation, wasted time/money/effort, missed opportunities for romance and sex, and much more. I have a number of stories regarding dating women in which, after always being the best gentleman I could, I simply couldn't fathom how it was that the girl I pursued ended up giving her attention, and worst of all sex, to some loser, all while I was waiting with baited breath, ever devoted and waiting for the sweet princess I desired to give me the chance to make her happy.

I spent many a dark night sitting in my little Toyota MR2 beside a lake with nothing more than a bit of classic rock and Bud Light to ease the pain, trying to understand what mistake I possibly could have made to keep the object of my affections from being mine. I felt sorry for myself as I was the downtrodden Mr. Sweet Guy.

It was during a recent long-term relationship in which the woman I was with (an authentic Latina, not an Americanized watered-down version) gave me some of the most painful and emotionally damaging moments of my life. Many truths were revealed to me. But the truth was, like many men, the unpleasant facts of life had been in front of my face all this time. I simply had to be knocked into reality. My new discovery of wonderfully blunt and honest manosphere outlets like Roosh, Return of Kings and Heartiste has helped in filling in the gaps to many formerly mysterious concepts.

As a relatively new taker of the red pill truth, allow me to share with you some of my hard-earned lessons in which red pill truths were harshly shown to be true:

1. Women will treat you the way you allow them to

The “nice guy” is meek, humble, and sadly in many cases, submissive to a woman. This is the root of the problem. In his race to be all that she needs, he attempts to please her, and in his quest to be the lovable underdog who makes her happy in order to win her over, he often shows no resistance to her undesirable behavior. Instead he shows weakness.

In all cases where a woman took advantage of me, disrespected me, or otherwise acted out of line, the cold truth I see is this: I allowed it. I didn’t put a bitch in her place. I didn’t hold firm to a “NO!” or show her the door. I didn’t know what frame was, and sure as hell didn’t maintain it.

You can’t depend on a woman to be a sweet fairy princess. Even the best woman will get out of line sometimes. Be prepared to maintain your boundaries and if necessary walk out the door. You’re the man-you don’t take shit from a woman. And women don’t get a wet vagina from being with a passive, weak man who they secretly despise for his lack of fortitude.

2. Being the classic “nice guy” means being a sucker… and not getting laid

As I mentioned above, the "blue pill" man has a theme that's consistent: he works too hard and sets up his thoughts, emotions, and more to please a woman, always ready at the helm to spend money on her or do things for his precious damsel.

Hence he can be manipulated. Being able to be talked into spending large amounts of money or giving Ms. Perfect a ride to another man's house are some simple examples of passive stupidity that such men demonstrate.

I recall many times doing hard work out of the "goodness of my heart" (beta desperation) only to have the girl run off to some dickhead. In one case I tinted the windows in the Nissan Pulsar of one girl who was the apple of my eye many years ago, only to see her run off later to another "bad boy" while I sat home alone again. So much for appreciating the nice things I did ever-so-galantly!

Or I sent money to other women, only for it to be forgotten down the road. Enough. I'm no longer a sucker, but I'll be helpful when I feel it's justified. And remind a woman she has to "pay me back."

Classic "nice guys" think they're being "decent human beings" by not escalating and pursuing sexual opportunities all while providing the benefits of emotional, moral, and financial support without any worthwhile return on their investment. To be a "nice guy" is to be a fool at the hands of woman.

3. "Oneitis" = weakness

Oh sure, monogamy is necessary for a long-term relationship, but how many times have we seen this story: "She's a real bitch sometimes, but I don't want to lose her. I love her, man… uuurrrrr." And then the poor Schmoe continues a life of suffering, nagging, and general misery because he's so needy and dependent upon that "one true love." Even worse if she humiliates him and cheats on him with a more "exciting" alpha-type until he drops her and needs her nice guy provider (a.k.a., "plan B").

It should go without saying that neediness and dependency are signs of a man with emotional weakness. I'm speaking from experience. It's not easy to break free from that stranglehold our hearts and minds seem to keep us in sometimes. A man who's suffered enough will be more apt to accept this truth and break free, and a man who's warned beforehand can also know to avoid these situations.

The truth is when you're too dependent upon someone you're setting yourself up for failure. Another red pill truth: there are more women out there. She's not one in a million, but one OF a million.

Accept this truth: she can be replaced. Treat a good woman well, but don't invest 100% in a woman. When things come crashing down, you'll fall hard. To give a woman that much control over your life is to lose yourself.

4. Don't tolerate being "friendzoned"

One particularly harsh lesson I'm embarrassed to admit I learned: once upon a time I had a fondness towards one Dominican woman I met. As time went by, I kept trying to be that helpful, nice guy, only to find her keeping me at arm's length without even being honest enough to tell me the truth. Funny how I was interesting enough when she needed help with putting some equipment together, or when she felt like going out for dinner (with me foolishly paying 100% of the bill of course).

With little surprise to most of us here, I found out she been visiting other guys and more. I was good enough for validation, paying for meals, and helping when she needed it but nothing more.

Being "friendzoned" should not be tolerated. To allow it means you allow yourself to used, abused, and disrespected. And as I've learned, once in the friendzone, it is almost impossible to climb out—the woman has already decided you have little sexual market value (SMV) to her. Don't waste your time—move the fuck on.

Don't be there to be that "sweet nice guy" she calls to fix her new hair dryer before she goes out later that night to give Mr. Cool a blow job. Doing otherwise sets you up for disrespect and to be a provider and the shoulder to cry on when the guy she gave anal to ends up breaking her heart.

5. Women want to be led

In the most recent long-term relationship that I mentioned earlier, with the Latina, she often became more and more annoyed and put off by my lack of leading and handling things, both big or small.

As time went on, she came to lose respect for me as I wasn't taking control of where we went, our plans for time spent together, and more. A woman who is with a man who is not in charge – no matter what feminist propaganda or magazine snippets claim – is a woman who loses respect for him and resents him.

In the quest to be "nice" and "easy to please her," I lost my position as the leader in the relationship. The consequences are at the minimum having a woman getting bitchy with you, and at the worst cheating on you with a more dominant and confident man, then one day divorcing you while you pay the rent for she and her new bad boy lover.

Don't believe me? Check out some of the marriage forums on the internet. It can be quite eye opening.

You also can't give a woman everything she wants, as I once did. I was even told, at one point, "I need to be told NO sometimes. I might not like it, but I respect it." Yes, a woman told me that. Can it possibly get any more clear? A woman needs to know you aren't a pushover, and you have to keep her from going out of bounds or attempting to take a route that a good leader wouldn't allow.

Get yourself out of this easy-going, afraid-to-anger-her mentality. Examine your behavior and words every day. Be confident, and make decisions. Delete the "what do you want to do dear?" (indecisiveness) and replace with "We'll go for a drink" (strong decisiveness) with a bit of flexibility thrown in.

6. The western ideals for femininity and beauty are crap

I grew up in a small town in Alabama where women were quite plain. I never saw a woman in a sexy, fine dress or extremely feminine attire (makeup, accessories, and more). Honestly, I never knew what a truly beautiful, feminine woman could mean.

After moving to a bigger city for my professional career, I did see slightly better examples of womanhood, but unfortunately now that my perspective has changed the truth is now clear to me: the average American woman is plain, dresses far too casually, is overweight, and puts little value in sexual attraction. Plain, naked faces in dire need of some eyeliner and makeup are everywhere.

After traveling to Colombia and a few other countries, my perspective was forever changed. Average women in other cultures take pride in being feminine and maximizing their sexual attraction. One of my favorite types is a fine Latina in ass-tight jeans and sexy high heels, along with matching earrings, painted nails, dolled-up hair, and a little bit of eyeliner. I have seen feminine latin women as old as 50 who were more sexy than some 35 year old women here.

Check out a few videos of Brazilian TV shows or Colombian girls out dancing. Look at pictures of Ukranian, Latvian, or Polish women. How many plain Janes do you see? Food for thought!

While back here in the USA, morning radio shows refer to women who are no more than 5s or 6s as “hot” or “sexy and fine.” Talk about pathetic standards. I simply had no frame of reference before, but everyday now I see the man-jawed women alongside fatties in my workplace realistically: they’re plain and ugly. They don’t try. For better or for worse, once the red pill truth hit me, I’ve never seen women the same anymore. It’s like the filter was taken off the camera.

Unfortunately, it is getting worse now as the fat acceptance movement is attempting to promote fat women as beautiful. In all fairness, American men typically have a lot of room for improvement too, but that's a subject for another day.

7. People won't like that you're pursuing foreign women, especially American women

Despite the fact that mixed-culture relationships are often good ones which benefit both the man and woman, one of the more interesting things I've noticed over the years is the following responses when discussing my interest in foreign women:

> "What, you can't get a woman here?"
> "It's too dangerous there."
> "She's probably just trying to get a green card."
>
> "No, you need to get a woman close by."
> "Plenty of nice girls around here, you shouldn't need to do that" (In other words, lower your standards, and conform)
> "Not me I just couldn't do it." (Along with failing to admit not having enough courage to even try)

I also receive condescending looks and attitude, with a look of disapproval thrown in for good measure.

Whether or not it is a good idea to pursue foreign women is not the issue. The smart man already knows what the risks are, and knows the value in a sincere, more traditional woman who is worth pursuing. However the amount of animosity towards such men is often aggressive, butthurt, and follows the feminist agenda: a condescending attitude, a faux "fear for those poor women", ignorance, and insults. I have seen this in many places where men mentioned their desire to pursue a loving, traditional foreign woman.

As an example, check out some excerpts from angry emails sent from an American woman to the owner of a Colombian introduction agency:

> "You must realize that the only reason males look for foreign brides from impoverished nations is because these are the only women who are desperate enough to pretend to care about you"

> "You are just trying to console yourself for being undesirable by saying that American women only want "Mr. Big". The only thing you can offer is passage to America and a possible green card (things that American women do not need). So you provide these things to lure vulnerable young foreign women away from lives of poverty."
> "Accept the fact that you are a loser, doomed to be alone, or content yourself with finding another loser like yourself who may want to be with you. Lower your standards to what you can reasonably attain, and leave these poor, vulnerable women alone. I want to cry when I think of the horror these foreign women face when they are stuck with losers like you."

Nice. Of all the people who gave me these heavily negative opinions, one thing was a common factor: they had no idea what they were talking about, and had never even been to the country in question. Most had never been outside the USA.

8. Lack of strong fathers create blue pill men

Over time I have come to understand that my lack of expertise with females and the realities of the world have been greatly influenced by the lack of an involved father in my life.

Boys need examples to follow and father figures to teach them the right road. Blue pill men are often especially the result of single-parent (read: single mother) homes in which little male influence is provided. The end result? Boys who grow into quasi-men without the strong confidence and characteristics needed to live at their masculine potential.

I have seen the same in other men I know as well who are great guys but lacking in confidence and leadership abilities when dealing with the opposite sex, or submissive to women and not demanding more in their lives.

Accepting this means accepting that there's much work to be done. All is not lost. Enjoy the wealth of information the manosphere can provide and take steps to fill in those areas where you lack as I've done. The sooner a man gets started the better.

9. Being "yourself" isn't what it takes

Another “feel good” blue pill expression is “Just be yourself.” Unfortunately in the real world, simply “being myself” with all my flaws, lack of direction, and much more is how I ended up with little to show for my effort, and taken advantage of by women.

The truth is, that’s not what it takes. Rather, the red pill version should be “Be the best you can be.” You can’t simply be yourself in life. Everyone has a need to be filled by you: your mother wants a good son. Your friends need a man they can talk to and be masculine with. Women need a strong man they are attracted to who can fuck them well, won’t be emotional little bitches, and can lead.

Being that sweet, timid guy who doesn’t know how to talk to a woman won’t cut it unless you want to be stuck with the first fatty that comes along. Build confidence. Change your body language. Keep your frame. Learn game. Put on some decent clothes and a bit of cologne. It takes more than what you were born with to be successful in the real world.

10. A better appearance leads to more attention from women

I believe this to be one of those truths that we all feel intuitively but are programmed by the blue pill messages in TV, music, and peer pressure to ignore. Today's extreme feminist views attempt to ignore and denounce a fundamental human characteristic. The fact is that the better you look, the better you'll do in life, especially with the opposite sex.

Until relatively recently I wore anything I wanted to wear. I even had dorky t-shirts with custom nerdy logos I made myself. Ill-fitting clothes, no concern for color or style, and more. My body was thin and average at best.

Since changing my wardrobe, working out regularly, and changing my body language, I've quite often gotten the attention of women I meet here and there and also get more respect from men. I'm now getting compliments on my clothing and looks (especially my new physique) from ladies.

Of course what's on the inside does matter, but so does what's on the outside. You don't have to look like a Greek god; however wearing NASCAR t-shirts, having a shitty goatee and hoop earrings, along with sloppy, torn pants is not conducive to the style of an alpha male.

Ultimately, life is better when you look better.

11. Escalate or expect to lose

Personally, this is one of the hardest truths to learn. It's like there was an invisible wall in front of me to be broken through. I can remember from the age of 18 many occasions in which I found myself sitting alone with a girl, only to procrastinate and delay making sexual advances towards her. I was too shy, or being too "decent towards women" and was not "just trying to get one thing from them unlike other guys." Then they slipped through my hands and another opportunity for getting laid disappeared forever.

In reality, your competition won't make the same mistake. The same woman who patiently waited for you to make your move will soon be taking off her cute panties for the next man who doesn't give a shit about being a "nice guy." They might even have a laugh at your expense.

A man has to feel out her body language and make his move. Getting last-minute resistance (LMR) does not mean giving up forever, but rather perhaps regroup and try again in a little while.

Women are more sexual than I was raised to believe and aren't the precious innocent angels they'd have you believe they are. In my early 20's I had dated Trisha for a short time, only to do the usual beta things with her including never making a move. I didn't escalate for sexual advancement. I was waiting for the "right time." Ultimately, I found out later she and a female friend had a good laugh at my expense—evening gleefully mentioning it to my male boss—because I never took a shot at getting that cooch. That was a slap in the face of my "nice guy" ego…and a permanent reminder of the true nature of some women.

Unless she's a prude or has personal issues, a woman loses interest in a man who's too weak to go for it.

Final thoughts

Life's truths cannot be denied—they are, in fact, proven to be true by trials and tribulations, deserved or not. So many of us share common factors, and so many of us here share common beliefs which we sense somehow to be true, despite running counter to our ingrained blue-pill brainwashing. By sharing our brutal truths freely we validate those ugly truths we must embrace as men in order to rise above our past and our former selves. To be real men indeed!

The hard lessons I shared here I hope may benefit my fellow man, even if only marginally, to promote his enlightment and escape from the chains now cast on men in our society. It's time to break free—using the knowledge of these hard truths and more gained from taking the red pill.

10 Reasons Why You Should Climb A Mountain

March 1, 2014 | by Mike Jones | Link | Original Link

These days, opportunities for adventure and conquest are rare. That's unfortunate, because masculine men naturally crave exploration. For us, the call of the wild is undeniable. But, let's be realistic. Most guys aren't gonna sell their stuff and live in the wilderness like filthy savages. A modern man can still test himself against nature's wrath.

How?

Mountaineering.

Yes, mountain climbing. It's one of the best ways for a man to plunge himself into a primal world of struggle and survival. Let's explore the benefits.

1. Sculpts Your Body

A mountain expedition will put you in the best shape of your life. Ideally, you'd start training at 6-9 months before your climb. Having a clear reason to work out is a powerful motivator. Focusing your mind on your looming mission will keep you consistent. The training will likely put you in great shape. And then, there's the climb. Your body will be consuming itself as the harsh conditions force you to burn to more calories than you can eat. You'll be hard, strong, and incredibly ripped after a climb. Call it "the Mountaineering Cut."

2. Introspection

Feeling low? Bored? Suicidal? Unmotivated? You may just need a reminder of your mortality. A controlled brush with death. Peering into the maw of an icy black abyss will make you see your life differently. You're in real physical danger in the mountains. Facing that WILL make you appreciate your limited time.

3. Spiritual Growth

God stays in the mountains. If you're a religious man, the intensity of your climb may cause spiritual revelations. Perhaps even epiphanies. Like Moses. If you're not one of the Faithful? Well, you'll still revel in nature's glory. Because science.

4. Humility

The mountains make you humble. Despite your training and struggling, your goal may elude you. Contemplate your miniscule existence. Accept that you're not a special snowflake. Just an insignificant speck of meaningless dust, floating along on an infinite white river of stars. And your clock is ticking.

5. Test Your Limits

Ascent will push you to the absolute limit. Mountaineering isn't fun. Really, it's the opposite. You'll suffer as you face exhaustion, cold, snow, ice, altitude sickness, low oxygen, avalanche, falls, and countless other dangers. But your climb will harden you, physically AND mentally. It's a true test of your ability to absorb and endure punishment.

6. Travel

If you're like me, you don't live near any serious mountains. But there are countless ranges located in exotic and beautiful places all over the planet. So now, you've got another good excuse to travel. So far, my climbs have taken me on multiple trips to California, Oregon, and Washington State.

7. Bonding With Brothers

Mountaineering isn't a solo sport. Sure, whether you actually summit is up to you. But that doesn't mean you climb alone. Ideally, you'll have a crew of solid dudes with you. I have tight bonds with the three guys I've mountaineered with. Obviously, sharing life-threatening experiences forges strong ties.

8. Wilderness Survival

I'm not an expert on outdoor survival. But the mountains have shown me a few tricks. Just a few things you may experience firsthand:

- Sleeping In Snow Dugouts
- Enduring Altitude Sickness
- Coping With Low Oxygen
- Purifying Snow Into Water
- Surviving White-Outs
- Proper Crampon Use
- Arresting Falls With An Ice Ax
- Glissading

9. The Best Shower Of Your Life

Want to experience the greatest shower ever? Try days of grueling, non-stop physical activity without changing clothes or bathing. All while shitting in paper bags, and having run out of soap. That first shower back down in the flat lands will be amazing.

10. Tighten Your Inner Game

Ultimately, you climb for yourself. It's got nothing to do with girls. But successful mountaineering WILL indirectly strengthen your inner game. It'll skyrocket your confidence. No matter who you are, or what you've done. And it's no secret that women like bold and adventurous men. Dominate a few mountains and you'll have incredibly rich stories to tell. Great big bait.

Of course, there are downsides to scaling peaks. Mountaineering is clearly risky; you could be killed or suffer serious trauma. And unfortunately, the sport isn't exactly cheap. But, survive a climb and you'll feel like a beast. With big brass balls and steel bands for legs. If you've got the means and courage, then you owe yourself an epic mountain adventure.

Now, go climb!

A Stop At Disenchantment: The Social Retreating Of Men

March 2, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

“A Stop At Willoughby” is a Twilight Zone episode from the early ’60’s. It is a sad, wistful piece about a man who is not long for the intense pressures of the modern world.

The show opens with a man named Gart Williams, a New Yorker working in advertising, getting yelled at by his fat boss for losing an important account. The boss tells him the business is “push, push, push” and he had better get with the program. He goes home, depressed, and is confronted with his cold, cruel gold-digging wife. She gives him no sympathy and refers to him as a latter-day Huckleberry Finn.

He goes back to work and the situation worsens with his boss. He has a breakdown at work and when he phones his wife, she leaves him cold with no compassion. She refuses to show any love or compassion to him after his begging.

All through out this he travels by train to and from work. He drifts off to sleep in the November snow showers and travels to a small, slow town in the 1880’s called Willoughby. It is quaint, slow-paced and free from all the pressures of the modern world. As the situation in his life worsens, he dreams even more of this world.

Eventually, he decides the next time he fantasises about Willoughby, “he will get off the train.” Indeed, in the last scene he does get off the train – to his death on the train tracks while shouting, “Willoughby!” The ending is ambiguous as to whether he intentionally committed suicide or did it his dream-like state. My theory is that the train symbolized life and his suicide show the unnatural nature of suicide. Anyway, as his body is hauled into the hearse, the door is closed and we see the name of the mortuary is “Willoughby & Sons.”

Here is the ending narration by Serling:

> Willoughby? Maybe it’s wishful thinking nestled in a hidden part of a man’s mind, or maybe it’s the last stop in the vast design of things – or perhaps, for a man like Mr. Gart Williams, who climbed on a world that went by too fast, it’s a place around the bend where he could jump off. Willoughby? Whatever it is, it comes with sunlight and serenity, and is a part of The Twilight Zone.

The Narcissism Of Liberal Feminists

Consider a feminist-friendly review of the episode that frames perfectly why this man committed suicide and why feminists play a direct hand into it.

The author is Todd VanDerWerff. Clearly, a soft man divorced of masculinity, as he approvingly cites feminism & shows his anti-male bias in his review.

I want to talk about Todd’s approach to the main character of Gart and Gart’s wife. Todd seems to have trouble seeing Gart’s wife as a villain. He expressly states he has trouble with this and also doesn’t see her as oppressing him. He likes her “Huckleberry Finn” comment as it has a “stab of truth” to it. He sees her as somebody that is trying to get Gart to grow up and come into the modern world.

If that wasn’t sick enough, Todd dances around Gart’s suicide and why he does it. He talks about ambiguity and how we don’t know what was going through Gart’s mind when he jumped off the train. That much is true. The most compelling issue, to me as a human with compassion, is just why did he do it?

This is one of my sticking points with liberalism. They talk a big game of deconstruction, dismantling untoward power structures but they have little to say about how to reform the world. All the talk about striving for equality, decency & human rights is nothing but worthless pablum to paper over the supreme lack of positive solutions for the world.

Take the Sexual Revolution, liberals kicked off the reigns with no thought as the underlying psychology of America, the potential ramifications for sexuality & human relationships, much less the economic ramifications or the ramifications for children. We did it in the name of removing oppression & helping the kids. No, you did for yourselves and then used claims for compassion & equality to cover up your reckless & blatant selfishness.

We see this here in Todd's piece. An episode like "A Stop At Willoughby" can be disconcerting to a liberal because of temporal issues. One idea I have yet to wrap my mind around is liberal obsession with temporal politics – i.e. the unending accusations of "being in the wrong time period," "the time has passed for that idea," or "that is not how the modern world works." It sidesteps any real rebuttals while also playing up an appeal to authority – society doesn't think that now, so it is inappropriate.

The problem with this analysis is that is completely ignores real male feelings about the world around them. Men are routinely exhorted to express their feelings so they can become humans, instead of the stoic, masculine zombies they pretend to be. However, when they do like Gart in this episode, they are told they need to grow up and become a real man. Todd approves of this analysis, as he probably sees Gart as some racist misogynist who pines away for a time when he was so privileged he didn't have to think about the world around him.

I bang on about narcissism, but this a clear case of liberal narcissism. We are presented with a man who clearly is depressed with his life. His wife is a horrible person, but do liberals & feminists care? What matters is the maintaining the zeitgeist of subjecting white males to horrendous levels of criticism. Gart was a man distraught over the increasingly hectic & narcissistic workplace. His wife was a controlling bitch. What was his recourse? Real compassion for fellow humans cannot be constrained by the artifices of victim politics – either you empathize with somebody or you do not. The fact that people like Todd can feel so much sympathy for women in the past, but completely ignore male suffering strongly suggests somebody who doesn't feel compassion at all, but understand the needs to show it off in order to get social approval.

A Stop At Disenchantment: The Social Retreating Of Men

One the reasons that men like Gart commit suicide is because of ignorant people like Todd VanDerWerff. Why is it so hard to sympathize with a man in psychological trouble? You would think the ideology that bangs on about mental health issues would be sensitive to needs of the clearly depressed? Wrong.

Part of the reason is the complete ignorance of psychology among liberals. I don't give two squirts of piss whether white, heterosexual males have it so good in society. I don't limit my feelings for others within some narcissistic, proscribed bounds. Healthy people do not do that. Either you feel for somebody or you don't. You do it on the basis of their individual reality and how you relate to that. Gart's seeing Willoughby as liberating & serene has to rub some liberals wrong. It suggests the world that has been constructed by liberals is deficient & hurts people. Todd criticized the past as being oppressive, but that criticism does nothing to alleviate Gart's concerns. While the issue of whether Willoughby was just a mental mirage constructed by Gart or representative of America is an interesting one, it completely avoids the main issue:

Why are men like Gart so disaffected?

At the end of day, that is the troubling question that lingers in your mind after watching the episode. He clearly is a man with codependent qualities, as he spends much of his time fantasizing about a reality that does not belong to him. However, it is clear he is surrounded by unhealthy people: his narcissistic wife; his bellicose, domineering boss. He doesn't seem to have a social support network.

Escaping into the fields of fantasy is the option he chooses. It isn't a healthy one, but one that allows him to cope with a life that is completely depressing. The golden future of true love & career fulfillment that are supposed to be awaiting a man have never come to fruition. The reality is that most people never get there. It is intriguing that Gart works in advertising, as his industry has done much to fool men like Gart that the modern American way resulted in happiness & fulfillment.

While that is part of his disaffection, another key element is his wife. When Todd talked about not wanting to treat Gart's wife as a villain, he provides a key insight into why men are retreating from society at large. Sensing their needs & desires are not treated as important and relevant, they get retreat into their own mind: sometimes via fantasies, sometimes via video games, etc.

It is the complete & utter inability of society at large to understand the ways women hurt men in relationships. Part of the reticence is the lingering idea that women are more moral & compassionate than men, so they are not likely to hurt men in relationships – so male needs go unnoticed and unattended as media caters to women.

Female domination of media also plays into this. Women are not going to tune into a TV show, magazine or blog if said outlet is about exposing female abuse of men. Sure, maybe – if it is framed in a narcissistic way – i.e. 'I'm better than that bitch,' etc. It cannot purely be about showing compassion towards a man by way of how a woman treats him. There has to be something plus – i.e. he is a closeted gay man who is verbally abused by his wife when she finds out, etc. Also, consider how women use media to taunt men and let men know women don't need them anymore. How compassionate.

Men like Gart realize that society is not long for them unless they are confident, successful & attractive to women. If they are not, they had better be quiet about it otherwise they will be shamed back in silence so as to perpetuate female delusions about themselves & society. Omega losers like Todd VanDerWerff have a stake in this oppression, as they think they will finally get that elusive female sexual approval once "patriarchal" gender norms are dismantled. What fools like Todd don't understand – and men like Gart do – is that all you have as a beta male or less is to completely submit to a female's frame or get cruelly tossed aside. Either you kowtow to female narcissism & play the non-human in their life or get busy fucking off. Gart could not come to terms with it, so he commits suicide.

While the modern workforce plays a great role in this, yet what really hurt Gart was his wife. Gart was understandably upset with his work environment, but it was his wife's coldness that did him in.

Our society teaches women to prioritize independence and not needing men. Men get the message that they are not relevant to a woman's life. When they do consummate a union, there is always the lingering idea that she doesn't need him – that his presence is voluntary on her part. What women are fleeing here is a real, substantive emotional connections with men. It isn't men that are afraid of commitment – it is women. Remember, women were the originators of the idea the marriage is a trap.

What this results in for men who are trapped in a world that pretends they are the ones that fear and run from emotional commitment, while existing in a world in which they pursue commitment as a base impulse and women instinctively flee it. When they get commitment from women, their needs are treated as necessarily met. They are treated as assholes who need to not just grow up but to also step up their relational game, as men don't meet their ladies' needs.

Men should realize that society and relationships are just one, collective fantasy of women. This point will always be considered sexist & misogynistic precisely because it punctures female's collective delusions about how they treat men. The increasing number of men like Gart in America does nothing to help women feel good about themselves, so they paint those men as hateful, troubled or ignore them outright. Just like that man who self-immolated on the steps of family court, he had to be relegated to the footnotes of American history lest women get their fantasies upset.

The sad ending to Gart's life represented his only true act of personal autonomy – killing himself. Who cares about white privilege, etc. if you do not have autonomy over your life? Gart's life bothers feminists because it strongly suggests men do not have power over their life and liberal society and women (sometimes) are the cause of it.

People do not die from suicide, they die from sadness.

The Top 3 Fat Loss Mistakes Guys Make

March 2, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

At least 95% of guys at your gym aren't making any progress. They're just spinning their wheels.

They get to the gym, run on the treadmill for a bit, hit the bench press, and grind out a few curls before calling it a day. They might follow a routine. They might even go through periods of watching their diet (whatever that means) or buying supplements that are supposed to burn fat and build muscle fast!

But it's all bullshit. Be honest: how much have you improved your body over the last six months? The last year? The last two years?

The problem is that almost everyone is taking shots in the dark. They're combining something their friend told them with something they read on the internet. And then they're adding in a tip or two from the personal trainer or buff bro at the local gym.

They combine all of these things and end up with a big mish-mash of garbage, when what they really need is a simple approach that they can put into place and forgot about. Yes, exercise science is progressing, but not at an astronomical rate.

I promise you'd be better off if you picked a single basic, fundamental approach and then followed it for the next year. During that year, you must ignore every tip or article that's shared with you on Facebook, emailed to you by a friend, or offered to you at the gym.

So while program hopping, excessive dietary tweaking, and all-around fitness ADD might be the single biggest mistake guys make, I want to share some more specific fat loss mistakes I see all the time.

1. Going too heavy on the cardio

Cardiovascular exercise has become synonymous with weight loss for most people.

And while cardio does have various health benefits, magical weight loss is not one of them. Going hard for 30 minutes to an hour on the elliptical, bike, or treadmill every day of the week isn't going to melt fat away. But it is going to burn you out mentally.

Furthermore, the metabolic benefits of cardio are minimal. This means that the amount of calories you burn over the course of the day (while not doing cardio) isn't going to increase much, if at all, from increased cardio.

So that leaves the actual calories you burn during a session of cardio as the main reason for doing it to lose weight. And let's be completely honest: it's WAY easier to not eat a Snickers bar, a bag of chips, or a couple slices of bread (all about 300 calories) than it is to run on the treadmill for 30 minutes (to burn about 300 calories).

My point is that dietary restriction is far more effective than cardio in regards to weight loss.

2. Not lifting heavy weights

I can’t even count the number of times a buddy of mine stopped lifting weights or chose to lift only light weights because he wanted to lose fat.

I think it’s because we associate heavy weights with building muscle. When you decide your goal is to cut weight (and not gain muscle), you naturally assume that you need to stop lifting heavy.

First of all, that’s terrible logic. Second of all, foregoing lifting heavy weights while losing body weight will result in your body shedding muscle along with the fat.

This is because your body doesn’t have a reason to hold onto the muscle. You aren’t activating a maximal number of muscle fibers or motor units if you aren’t lifting heavy. This means that your body will have no reason to maintain your muscle mass, and begin to shed it along with the fat.

It takes a lot of time and energy to build muscle. The last thing you want to do is give up your hard earned muscle during a period of weight loss. Not only will you be weaker afterwards, but you’ll look like shit. An aesthetically pleasing body combines ample muscle mass with a low body fat percentage (i.e. you have muscle and there’s only a small layer of fat covering it).

When you take away the muscle along with the fat, you begin to approach skinny fat (a heinous condition marked by small amounts of both muscle and fat – skinny, but without definition). Trust me: you don’t want to be skinny fat.

3. Obsessing over the scale

I get it. You have some extra belly fat that you want to get rid of. Who doesn’t?
But you must be careful. If you get obsessed with seeing weight drop off the scale you run a high risk of unhealthy weight loss.

Starving yourself and going heavy on the cardio is definitely an effective way to drop weight fast. But remember, dropping weight shouldn’t be the goal – cutting fat should be.

You must combine the almighty scale with the mirror and the weights. What I mean is that if your weight on the scale is dropping, you’re seeing more muscle definition in the mirror, and you’re not getting weaker in the gym, then chances are you’re cutting fat and maintaining muscle. This is the goal – keep it at the forefront of your mind.

Is This Pornstar A True Friend Of Feminism?

March 3, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Duke University has been the center of much controvery in recent years. We've all heard about the infamous lacrosse case. Then, of course, there was the "Duke Fuck List" thesis created by a sorority girl at the school.

So what's the issue now? Porn. Specifically, a pornstar who just happens to have been a freshman at Duke:

> A porn star at Duke University? A student's interview with a college newspaper has stirred up controversy on campus — and online.
> "Lauren," a female freshman at Duke, admitted to The Duke Chronicle that she's been performing in adult films to help pay for tuition, which costs close to $60,000 a year.
> She described herself as a libertarian-leaning Republican with hopes of becoming a lawyer, and called porn a less "degrading" way to make money than a minimum-wage waitress job.

Her stage name is Belle Knox. I won't post too many links given their NSFW nature, but Google should return plenty of results. Her real name is Miriam Weeks. Here's a quick note about her from a now deleted Facebook link introducing her as a writer for a campus publication.

> Meet one of our new freshman writers…Miriam Weeks!
> Here's a little blurb about her: "My hometown is Spokane, Washington, but I have lived all over the world because I am an Army Brat!"
> "I hope to major in Women Studies and Sociology, and someday be a lawyer! I am a member of Duke's Moot Court, Duke Human Rights Student Advisory Board, and on the Executive Board of Duke Second Languages in Action. In my free time I enjoy sleeping, eating Milanos, and perusing Netflix."

Belle got outed when a male peer recognized her in a porno he was watching and informed all of his fraternity bros of his discovery. Weeks was soon the subject of massive controversy across Duke's campus, and soon decided to meet it head-on in the aforementioned interview with The Duke Chronicle and an op-ed in XOJane (which she authored under the pen name "Lauren A"):

> I'm The Duke University Freshman Porn Star And For The First Time I'm Telling The Story In My Words
> I am a porn star. I am a college freshman. You know nothing about me.

Anyway, there's a lot going on in the article but I wanted to focus on this bit of self-defense she puts up here:

> Why does the thought of a woman having sexual experiences scare us so much?

> The answer is simple.
> Patriarchy fears female sexuality.
> It terrifies us to even fathom that a woman could take ownership of her body. We deem to keep women in a place where they are subjected to male sexuality. We seek to rob them of their choice and of their autonomy. We want to oppress them and keep them dependent on the patriarchy. A woman who transgresses the norm and takes ownership of her body — because that's exactly what porn is, no matter how rough the sex is — ostensibly poses a threat to the deeply ingrained gender norms that polarize our society.
> I am well aware: The threat I pose to the patriarchy is enormous. That a woman could be intelligent, educated and CHOOSE to be a sex worker is almost unfathomable.

Here, Belle attempts to paint herself as the ultimate weapon against the patriarchy, a threat so great that defenders of said patriarchy can hardly even fathom it. As far as she is concerned, feminists should clearly be on her side. She is their ally.

But is she right? Are those feminists fighting the patriarchy really behind her?

Feminist critiques of the patriarchy usually focus on its alleged failure to respect and account for the intellectual capacities of women. The patriarchy, they say, puts far too much emphasis on female beauty and sexuality and not nearly enough emphasis on what women can do with their minds. It assumes that even highly intelligent women are best valued for their bodies, not their thoughts. It is the patriarchy that takes intelligent women and objectifies them to a point at which they are defined primarily by their sexuality and physical appearance, not their intellectual capacity.

Knowing all of this, can we honestly claim that "Belle Knox" is a weapon that actually stands against the patriarchy as these feminists have critiqued it? Here we have a pretty intelligent woman, smart enough to get into a Top 10 University that is arguably one of the best institutions of higher learning on the planet. This is a woman whose intellectual capacity has objectively been shown to be well above average: she wouldn't have made it to Duke if it weren't.

And yet, how has "Belle Knox" chosen to define herself, despite her intellect? She's become a pornstar. She's entered a career in which her sexuality and physical appearance are pretty much the end-all, be-all.

What does it say when the most intelligent young women around (the ones you expect would be able to lean on their intellectual capacity for advancement and be valued accordingly) are still choosing to define themselves primarily with their sexuality? Keep in mind that this girl, despite repeatedly citing tuition as an excuse for her pursuing a porn career, really was not in a financial bind: she had plenty of scholarships to choose from.

> I was offered scholarships at a lot of places. I was offered full tuition at Vanderbilt, for example, and was accepted into USC, Wellesley, Barnard, Pepperdine, some others.

She didn't have to turn to porn to help fund a prohibitively expensive college degree. She could have simply went to Vanderbilt (still one of this nation's elite schools) and gotten a quality degree. Why didn't she do this? Why did she go to Duke and end up in her current position?

> I visited Duke last year on Blue Devil Days [Duke's programmed weekend for admitted freshmen], and I remember walking into the Duke Chapel — I'm a very spiritual person — and just feeling an energy that told me, "This is the place you > need to be." And I felt something in the chapel in that moment that told me that I needed to be here and go to Duke and it was something that would be an amazing experience for me.

She did it because she felt entitled to the school that satisfied her "feelings," regardless of how much it cost. She's a prep-school product from a well off family, and is used to getting precisely what she wants—there was no other option there in her mind. She also really likes porn, and a career in that industry was something she genuinely wanted:

> I am not ashamed of porn. On the contrary, doing pornography fulfills me…
> … For me, shooting pornography brings me unimaginable joy. When I finish a scene, I know that I have done so and completed an honest day's work. It is my artistic outlet: my love, my happiness, my home.
> I can say definitively that I have never felt more empowered or happy doing anything else.

Belle Knox was not forced into the situation she is in. She was not shoved into the adult industry against her will. She got there due to a series of decisions she made freely of her own accord. And her choice was not to fight the objectification of women as so many feminists claim to want to do—on the contrary, she chose to embrace that objectification by becoming a pornstar, claiming in one video to "love" the thought of millions of men masturbating at the sight of her having sex. She was intelligent enough to avoid doing this and had other options available, but chose this path anyway.

Despite clearly wanting to be objectified (and deriving a substantial amount of pleasure from said objectification), Belle attempts to take a stand against the objectification of women, which she claims is rife on her college campus and a source of many problems:

> If you look at the anonymous CollegiateACB forums of other schools, there are > maybe four topics. At Duke, there are 800 topics. All of them are “rate freshman girls on a scale of one to 10” or “which Asian has the biggest boobs.” So Duke has this — and I blame the Greek system a lot for this — culture of objectifying women.

And yet…

> I was just sitting in my dorm one day and said to my roommate, “Fuck it, I’ll be a porn star.” So I Googled “how to be a porn star” and came up with all these agencies. I had no idea you could apply to be a porn star; I thought someone came up to you and scouted you at a mall. I sent in my info and a couple of my pics and literally the next day all these agencies were calling me. I started talking to all these agents who thought I could be making six figures and saw real potential for me in the industry. I was like, “Oh my God. Let’s do this. Let’s go.”

Feminists want to fight the objectification of women. Like I said above, they prioritize the female mind and spirit and want women to be considered for more than their tits, butts and vaginas. Belle Knox stands with feminists in this regard, and considers this objectification of women a serious problem with serious negative consequences…

…so serious and so negative, in fact, that she then proceeded to eagerly enter an industry entirely built on said objectification, one in which her value and earning potential would be measured almost entirely in her ability to get millions of men across the country to “objectify” her fully exposed body as she engaged in a variety of highly explicit (and, occasionally, somewhat extreme) sexual acts.

I’m not one of those feminists, so I don’t really care about what “Belle Knox” has chosen to do with her sexuality. The fact that her behavior could be considered slutty is not particularly relevant to me. If she thinks that deepthroats are “empowering,” then more power to her (and to the men she’s “empowering” herself with). Her decision to rely on her sexuality and appearance as opposed to her intellect is hers and, if we’re to buy into feminist notions regarding the sanctity of female choice, has to be respected. She can do whatever she wants.

It is also true, however, that this female’s actions are at odds with many feminist statements and objectives. For the many feminists who want to keep going on about the need to stop “objectifying” women and undervaluing their intellect by privileging their sexuality, it simply isn’t possible to celebrate a woman who has made a conscious decision to put her high intellectual capacity on the backburner in order to take a path that privileges her physical appearance and sexuality over all else. This girl’s actions have already put her into direct conflict with a very vocal bulk of the feminist hivemind, one that has had no problem attacking women for committing much less substantial deviations from their vision of the feminine ideal.

So, is “Belle Knox” a friend to feminism? I’m not so sure about that. For as many male enemies as Belle seems convinced that she made with her decision, I’m confident she made many more among women. Her actions stand in direct contradiction to objectives that many feminists hold dear and consider essential to female progress. If Belle is still seeking ideological shelter in this storm, I’m not sure she’ll be able to count on feminists to unanimously provide it.

William Harvey Explains The Circulatory System

March 3, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Some of the most inspiring achievements in history have been accomplished not on battlefields or corridors of courtly power, but by the patient persistence and steady resolve of learned men. Masculine energy is best expressed in focused effort, breaking through barriers, and bursting through boundaries. The slow amassing of expertise in a field, the careful collection of data, the intense study of such data, and the sudden flash of inspiration that can move mountains and change the paradigm: is there any drama more compelling?

One such example is the discovery of the circulation of the blood by William Harvey in the seventeenth century. Although we take anatomical knowledge today for granted, it is important to remind ourselves that this knowledge took centuries to acquire; and each step forward was made by men guided by persistence, intuition, and hard labor.

After his education at Cambridge and then Italy, Harvey returned to England to practice medicine in London. He secured appointment as personal physician to James I and Charles I. Like Vesalius—whom I have discussed previously here at Return of Kings—he carried out laborious and painstaking examination of cadavers to wean himself away from reliance on Galen, who for two thousand years had held the medical profession in his grip.

A great genius in his time, Galen's texts had begun to show their age by the early seventeenth century. Galen had believed that the liver, as well as the heart, helped to convey blood throughout the body, and confused the proper function of the veins, arteries, and the heart's septum and ventricles. Physicians before Harvey had cast doubt on Galen's theories: Vesalius and Fabrizio had showed, by careful study, that the veins and arteries could not function as Galen believed. In the 1550s, Servetus and Realdo Colombo had discovered the pulmonary circulation of the blood.

And here we see another characteristic feature of a great man: the ability to build on the work of those who came before him, without slavishly adhering to the theories of predecessors. Even great men like Harvey have to stand on the shoulders of those who came before: rarely in science is discovery accomplished in a total vacuum. Harvey's forebearers made major steps forward, but what was needed was one man to tie it all together in a comprehensive explanation of how the blood circulated throughout the body.

What I find interesting about scientific discoveries is the process of how the discoverer begins his journey. Harvey made the chance observation that the amount of blood expelled from the heart by each contraction was about half an ounce. It followed, then, that in an hour the heart should pump into the blood vessels over 1000 ounces. But this was a larger amount of fluid than the body contained. Clearly, the blood in the body was not being continuously generated by the tissues, but was being circulated to and from the heart by some continuous cycle of ingress and egress. But how, precisely, was this happening? No one could answer this question.

Obsessed with this problem, his exhaustive experimentation finally demonstrated that venous blood (blood carried by the veins) was being carried toward the heart, and that arterial blood was being carried away from it. He imagined the motion of the blood throughout the body as “a motion as it were in a circle.” For its day, such an assertion was revolutionary. It directly contradicted Galen and the legacy of medieval medicine. Islamic medicine, far ahead of Europe in the Middle Ages, had conspicuously missed this fact as well. Harvey arrived at his theory by 1615, but hesitated to publish it straight away.

His book Anatomical Explanation of the Action of the Heart and Blood in Animals found print in Frankfurt, Germany in 1628. It probably seemed safer to Harvey to release his bombshell on continental Europe first, rather than in his backyard in England. It has been called “the first and greatest classic of English medicine.” He predicted no one would believe him, and he was right. The publication of the work temporarily blackened his reputation, and he found his medical practice suffer grievously. However, like so many theories which are ahead of their time, Harvey’s explanation of the circulation of the blood was confirmed beyond doubt by another physician in 1660, who demonstrated how capillaries carry blood from the arteries to the veins. It was a moment of vindication and triumph.

Like many men of great ability, he found it difficult to hold his tongue and suffer fools. He was brusque, prickly, and curt to those he deemed unworthy of his patience; but this was the defense mechanism of a man who had been mocked and ridiculed by lesser intellects for years. He was what he had to be. His pugnacity earned him many enemies, but he found in Charles I a loyal advocate.

He continued to work and discover well into his old age. In a treatise published in 1651, he attacked the commonly-held view of the “spontaneous generation” of animals, and postulated that all animals ultimately evolved from eggs. It is a view held by biologists today. He had the true scholar’s humility and awe of the physical universe. “All that we know”, he said, “is still infinitely less than all that remains unknown.”

Although William Harvey may seem a minor figure today, greater appreciation of his achievement is realized when we recall that in his day the only tools available to a physician were his eyes, hands, and surgical instruments that had hardly changed since antiquity. The human body, as Vesalius showed, is a complex and mysterious machine. How all the parts worked together was not at all obvious. It is one thing to map and describe the internal organs, as Vesalius did, but quite another to demonstrate by experimentation precisely how these organs operate. And is there anything more inspiring than the sight of a great man incrementally and patiently working towards that noblest of goals, the advancement of learning?

How To End Abortion Without Involving Politicians

March 3, 2014 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

On January 22nd, 1973 the US Supreme Court made the landmark decision in the Roe v. Wade trial that gave women the right to have an abortion of an unplanned pregnancy. Since this ruling, many different groups, mostly religious and traditional conservative, have petitioned the government to reverse the Supreme Court decision and do away with abortion. For over 40 years they have tried and, for the most part, failed to get politicians to reverse the Roe v. Wade decision. Protestors have met with some success at the state level, but that has meant little more than an inconvenience to women wishing to get an abortion because they simply have to drive to another state.

It is interesting that traditional conservative groups (the "government is not the solution to our problem, government is the problem" traditional conservative groups) immediately went to government to solve their abortion problem. In the forty years that have followed, they still believe that the solution is to simply protest outside of Planned Parenthood clinics and vote in candidates who claim to be pro-life. They have not looked at any other possible solutions outside of politics.

Insanity is doing the same over and over again and expecting different results.

When you have a difficult problem it is best to go to people who are trained to solve difficult problems: engineers.

In the 1970s an Indian biomedical engineer by the name of Sujoy Guha was working on a cost-effective way of killing bacteria in drinking water by coating the inside of water pipes with an electrically charged polymer called styrene maleic anhydride. As bacteria flowed through the pipes, this polymer would tear them apart. Then as the population in India surged in 1970s, Sujoy Guha came up with the idea of using it as a non-hormonal male contraceptive. The vas deferens, which is the tube sperm flow through to get from the testes to the urethra, is much like the water pipes he was working with and sperm are similar to bacteria. In addition, a second injection of sodium bicarbonate (baking soda) flushes out the maleic anhydride, returning a man to full reproductive potency.

In 1979 he succeeded in proof of concept on rats and in 1985 he got the same results in monkeys. He called this new contraceptive method RISUG, reversible inhibition of sperm under guidance. It has been tested on hundreds of men in India. Recently a company called the Parsemus Foundation bought rights to RISUG and is putting it through clinical trials in the US under the name Vasalgel.

So what does all this have to do with abortion? Simple, in order to have an abortion a woman needs to have three things.

- An unplanned pregnancy
- The desire to terminate the unplanned pregnancy
- A clinic where she can legally terminate the pregnancy

The efforts of traditional conservatives have mostly focused on finding a political solution to number three. A few have tried to protest in front of clinics with pictures of dead fetuses in order to change number two, but very little effort has been put into preventing unwanted pregnancies in the first place, which is the Achilles heel of the abortion problem. Women can’t get abortions if they don’t become pregnant.

According to The National Campaign to Prevent Teen and Unplanned Pregnancy there were 3,370,000 unplanned pregnancies in 2008, which is the most recent data they had available. In a time when women have access to dozens of different affordable forms of birth control, the sheer number of unplanned pregnancies can mean three things.

- Not all of these pregnancies were truly unplanned.
- Women suck at remembering to take the pill on time.
- A combination of 1 and 2.

That is why if pro-life groups were serious about ending abortion they would take the engineering approach and get RISUG/Vasalgel on the market as soon as possible. Then they could use their massive influence to push parents to get the procedure for their sons when they turn 16.

If pro-life groups did this then they could do to Planned Parenthood what Internet Explorer did to Netscape Navigator in the 2000s. Instead of making abortion illegal they would make it redundant. There would still be the occasional slip-up and some young woman would get pregnant and want an abortion, but it would take place at a much lower rate than the over 1 million abortions per year that are currently happening. It would probably be even lower than the number of illegal abortions taking place before Roe v. Wade was passed.

10 Reasons We Need Mandatory Classes In Stripping And Prostitution For All Girls

March 3, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

We all know how insecure young girls can be. Teaching them some real feminine skills will help them far more than an overblown and incredibly expensive degree in social studies. It takes a certain amount of confidence and sass for a girl to get up in front of a bunch of strange men who are leering at her strutting her stuff half naked. It takes even more to go into a room alone with a John and be able to sexually please him off the bat. With all that new confidence if she does end up in a male-dominated work place she'll be better able to handle herself.

2. She masters the art of presentation

A large part of confidence is in preparation and presentation. A girl that knows how to take care of her best assets, dress them up and present them in their best light can go places. This is a lifetime habit that let's face it, a lot of women these days have let slip. Strippers and escorts must be well-versed in all manner of beauty regimes, makeup, fashion, skincare, hair styles and so forth, all important for a woman to look her best. It leads into many feminine orientated careers such as stylist, fashion designer, makeup artist, etc. It also places a focus on girls to keep themselves in good physical shape. Pole dancing is such good exercise it's becoming popular with MILFs fitness classes. With obesity rates soaring, we can start the girls off with good exercise habits in high school.

3. She increases her lifetime earning potential

A woman like Marilyn Monroe or Beyoncé who leverages her feminine sexuality instead of trying to climb the corporate ladder with an MBA in marketing, is proven time and time again to outdo her female (and even male) peers both socially and economically. In order to rise to the top you must start at the bottom. The skills of stripping and escorting will see a woman through far better than higher education or joining the feminist bandwagon.

Many college girls work as escorts part time to pay the bills and profess to enjoy it a great deal. They'd be better off focusing on where the money's at, than wasting valuable hours of their sexual peak, in dusty old male orientated institutions or the grind of a 9 to 5. For anyone in disagreement check out this pic of Beyonce performing at the 2014 Grammys. $350 million net worth for shaking that money maker.

4. She won't insist on playing games she can't possibly win

As above, the road to true female expression and power is by embracing her sexuality and sexiness, not by competing with men. Men and women do best by sticking to what they do best. There are very few powerful women in male professions for the same reasons you don't find too many women in the men's restroom – they are male arenas! No man can compete with a woman on her terms.

5. She insulates herself from abject poverty

An extension of 3 and 4. Money is not everything, but it's proof of the pudding. A college girl can earn upwards of $500 an hour for escorting, $5,000 for the weekend, just for 'dating' one wealthy guy. She'll be lucky to make that in a month once she joins the rest of the corporate cubicle trolls in the socialist machinery. Should her 'real' career fail or she fall upon hard times through no fault of her own, she will always have a fallback.

If she goes pro, she can stack away those savings, buy herself a house and car, and retire to raise her spawn when she hits her 30s. With all those clients, she'll also be able to canvas for a good sperm donor and not waste time or money on dating or social media websites, that corrupt her soul and spoil her eyesight staring into a tiny screen all hours of the day and night. It's much more relaxing staring at the ceiling.

6. Her future husband will never leave her

It boggles my mind to read about all these sexless, monogamous marriages. Clearly girls are leaving school with nothing more than a biology class to educate them in the details of their sexuality. How the hell does a woman expect to keep a man happy if she can't properly turn him on by strutting her stuff and hasn't the skills (and the practice) to jump him in the bedroom and make him moan. The man's only sexual outlet in a traditional relationship is his wife, and we all know how women demand men be faithful. For that to occur, she must be a professional board certified massage therapist, dancer, sex performer, tantric expert and deep throat anal queen if she expects to have a happy husband. Here's a shortened list of 'experiences' available at my local brothel:

> Kissing, Fellatio, Deep Throat, Choking, Cum Swallowing, Cum on Face, Spanish Bracelet, Rose Petals, Rimming, Anal, Fetishes, Spanking, Golden Shower, Squirting, Lesbo Show, Strap on, BDSM, Domination, Submission, Full Body Massage, Prostate Massage, Double Penetration, Porn Star Experience, Girl Friend Experience

A wife must be able to compete with what's available on the open market, lest she catch a nasty bout of herpes from her frustrated and deprived husband who is forced to seek some other outlets. The only thing I don't see on the menu is 'Wife Experience'.

7. It provides revenue for cash-strapped governments

With governments around the world slipping themselves further and further into debt, things are likely to change in the near future. Real market forces will return to the forefront and policy makers will be forced to look for where they can crop tax dollars, instead of worrying about votes and pleasing minority groups.

Legalizing and taxing marijuana is an obvious example, and prostitution will surely not be far behind. In Australia, New Zealand, Switzerland, Germany and many other states, sex work is already a taxable and regulated profession. Young girls can beat the rush to the gold mine, by gathering skills now and using those skills to immigrate. Some of these countries boast the highest standards of living and lowest unemployment levels in the world (and now we know why).

8. She can write off feminine products and other consumer goods

There are few other ways to legally haul in money like a stripper or escort. Of course the nature of the job requires all kinds of great cosmetic products, the latest fashion, shoes and accessories. Women spend a fortune on these kinds of items anyway; it's so much more equitable if they can be written off as a business expense. A high class escort gets travel expenses and is able to see the world with Johns paying her tickets and hotels. What girl doesn't like to travel in style?

9. It's progressive and modern

It's quite clear that today's girls are dead set on being as slutty as possible during their teens and 20s. With the correct education they can navigate the pitfalls, avoid wasting time on side tracks such as university or boyfriends, and at the same time maximize their earning potential before they hit the wall.

Girls used to learn ballet to maintain their posture and poise, but that's old hat. Now they should learn erotic massage and deep throat. With internet porn and relaxed social attitudes, teaching a young girl how to strut her stuff and how to please a man, not only gives her usable and lucrative lifetime skills, but also embraces the issue of sexuality by education, rather than hiding behind snobby moral standards and ridiculously hypocritical ethical ideals.

10. Her relatives and friends can rest peacefully knowing she's a success

With our young girls being sexualized by the media at younger and younger ages, giving her a real sex education means that parents, friends and relatives can relax in the knowledge that even if she is getting down and dirty with a different stranger each night of the week, at least she's earning a substantial living doing it, and has all the training and skills to keep herself out of trouble.

As a final note: this article might seem misogynistic and chauvinistic, but giving girls the option to chose through better education is clearly the way forwards. If a girl wants to be a housewife and a good girl and that appeals, fine. If she wants to be a slut and a sexual gymnast, fine. If she wants to be a hardened career girl and she has the skills and the dry emotion free male attitude—each to her own. Every life choice has advantages and disadvantages, sacrifices and rewards. What no woman can have is this best of both worlds while expecting men or the government to pick up the pieces.

Women Are To Blame For Aggressive Texting

March 4, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

While pumping iron at the gym a couple of weeks ago, I heard a public service announcement on the radio that cautioned against "relentless, aggressive texting" as a form of abuse. You can read the full transcript of the commercial here.

My first reaction was to chuckle. As a species, we evolved to hunt deadly game with sharpened tools, smash in our neighbors' skulls for chances at more land and mating opportunities, and murder the offspring of our enemies so that their genes would not be preferentially passed on over ours. Society works to control these impulses for the most part, but the idea that writing innocuous words on a computer screen can be compared with any real "aggression" is laughable.

All humor aside, though, this commercial being broadcast to millions of people reflects growing issues in our society—namely, female victim mentality, lack of ownership of one's actions, and the expectation for others (white knights? society? the police?) to solve personal problems of a girl's own creation. Even the name of the website is a joke — "that's not cool," a slang quasi-shaming term rather than anything reflecting a legitimate legal or societal problem.

The commercial in the gym was clearly geared toward women who are receiving "creepy" texts from men. Here's an example of a "textual harrassment" scenario they have on their website (emphasis mine):

> I started texting this guy I met a few weeks ago. At first it was good, but lately he's been sending me messages ALL the time. If I don't text back right away, he totally freaks out. When I'm out with my friends, he texts asking what I'm doing and what I'm wearing. We're not even dating, and it's like he thinks he can control me. I like the guy when we hang out in person but he just cannot stop > with the texting. What should I do?

Notice the bolded points. The girl freely initiated texting. She responds sometimes, and continues to see the guy despite texts that make her uncomfortable. Then she complains about not being able to solve her own problem. Over the past decade clueless men have been inundated with a wealth of technology that gives them perceived access to women, but they are unaided in the set of invisible social rules and responses that must be adhered to, lest we incur the wrath of the Creepiness Police.

It's true that men bear some responsibility for being socially adept enough to take a subtle "no" for an answer, but our society conditions them that dating should have to be an American Gladiator obstacle course where they triumph over numerous obstacles and perceived lack of interest to finally win the girl. Those of us with social awareness can see through the pretty lies of this paradigm, but the vast masses still see dating success stemming from overcoming external, rather than internal, obstacles. Men are told they should fight to for a woman's attention, encouraged to do so by women, and are then punished for it by campaigns such as this one.

Women in our society enjoy the dynamic described above because it gives them the best of both worlds. They are painted as the prize to be achieved while basking in the ego-affirming attention of thirsty simps, but are simultaneously shielded from any downside of their carelessness with the feelings of other humans. Instead of having to deal with problems of their own creation, they can pull the "creepy" lever and report him to law enforcement or publicly shame him for his indiscretions. The worst thing is that other women will applaud them for eviscerating beta males, as in the case of this unfortunate basement-dweller.

Ladies, do you really want to stop "textual abuse"? I present to you a simple action plan. Instead of visiting notcool.org and asking the government, law enforcement, or the mob mentality of the thirsty masses to solve your problems, here is how you can be an independent, empowered woman and refuse to create a problem:

1. Stop giving out your number

It's been well established that modern-day girls give out their numbers even to men they are not interested in. Perhaps this is because they know they'll be bailed out if some "creep" doesn't play the texting game exactly the right way. The first step to making your phone a "safe place" is limiting access to it. Women supposedly have better social feel and perception of non-verbal cues than men do. Time to put it to use for things other than manipulation.

2.Don't lead men on

If you're a girl, you've undoubtedly given out your number to a guy you're only lukewarm about, texted him a bit, and decided you weren't interested. Of course he texts you three times for every pithy one-liner you lob his way, but hey—it's kind of fun! This guy is interested in you, and you weild a certain amount of power. Cut it out. Keeping a man's hope alive after you've decided he's not a romantic prospect directly produces the kind of harassment you purport to dislike.

3. Be upfront about your lack of interest

If a man insists on sending what you consider to be harassing texts, even after he obtained your number some other way and you didn't respond lukewarmly or positively to his initial volley, send this exact message: "Hey — I'm really not interested. Please stop texting me."

I guarantee that these simple steps will eliminate 98% of the "aggressive texting" cases, most of which stem from a harmless but socially-unaware man who has been led on for the girl's attention and enjoyment. In the rare cases where it fits a pattern of actual abuse or stalking, it will inevitably manifest itself in other actions that are actual grounds to be reported to authorities.

Ladies, it's time to stop soliciting attention from all angles and then following it by playing "let's you and him fight" between thirsty simps and the government, media, and law enforcement. In the world of "textual abuse," you are victims only because of your own actions.

Bangable Women Can Still Be Gross

March 4, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

I'm not a hard alpha. I don't stroll into the club and fire my finger guns off and have super models bouncing over with heaving bosoms on high heels. If I had to give an average of women I banged a month, I'd have to say that currently it's about two – though in my own pathetic defence the few I get I find extremely plowable so the sex is good (usually, most of the time… on average). During the two warm months in Canada I can usually get up to three or four, but during the four sorta cold months and six deep freeze ones I'm stuck with one or two since women tend to hibernate and it's nigh impossible to game them outside of club situations, and I'm sick of sex with drunk women (a few reasons why will be become apparent below).

I spent 10,000 hours learning Game for this?!

Still, I get laid fairly consistently and by women I'd probably date if they gave me any reason to respect or trust them. Apparently I, and men like me, are a minority of the population. I personally was not aware that most guys had problems picking up women until my university years. For the most part during high school the bangable girls dated, and very few normal guys seemed to be without a snuggle buddy. There were few harems going on, although I freely admit this might be vastly different in high schools located in large to mega sized cities.

I do believe however that despite how the popular media of today portrays them the vast majority of high school chicks are not (yet) part of the hook up culture. They may act skanky and give it up easily to their boyfriends but there's still enough innocence and actual self respect there to make having random sex with strangers a despicable… okay I couldn't keep typing that. We all know the real reason high school girls aren't hard into the hook up culture is because they live their mom and possibly their dad (whom they still feel shame around, even if they don't respect them) and they have no easy access to the booze and drugs needed to numb their inner sense of shame like they do once they turn eighteen and flee the house to become society's mobile sperm banks.

Bye mom bye dad I'm off to university don't look at my facebook or Redtube*!*

Still, it seems like there are a lot of dudes who just aren't getting any. There's no easy answer as to why the majority of women seem to only have sex with a minority of men. Far superior writers then I have written excellent thesis's about this phenomenon and what propels it, so I feel little need to posit my own theories and assumptions. And for every theory on the symptoms, there are an equal number of suggestions as to what the average Joe can do to alleviate his sexual difficulties.

One near famous theory is that Joe Average's main problem is that he's 'putting the pussy on the pedestal'. He's overvaluing women to the point of worship, feeding their already inflated egos with his desperation and belittling himself in the process. Simply because he desires sex from her, beta men automatically assume and treat women like they're better then him by default. And while this theory is wide spread, the solution to it is almost always the same: Joe Average just needs to take the v off the p. I think this is sound advice but like many things beta males mostly go about this in the wrong way. Often the beta male who takes this advice thinks that he must 'ascend' to the level of the vagina he wishes to enter. This is flawed thinking for two reasons; very few men who lack confidence with women in the first place will be able to attain said confidence through bringing himself 'up' to her level. And two; he still views the woman as a superior being, even if he 'matches' her level.

Gosh Miley in 2010, you're so pretty and classy you'll always be so much better then us slobs

Women are not superior begins. I'm going to draw more flak than a B-25 bomber and go so far as to say women are not inferior beings either. They have different strengths then men, and are far less rounded, but that does not make them inherently inferior. For the most part we're all of equal value; we just excel at vastly different things. Women are people just like men are. Both sexes do the same things, for the most part feel the same anxieties, have the same embarrassments and suffer the same setbacks. Men just have the bad luck of being enslaved by a near psychotic need for sex, while bangable women seem to be able to turn their horniness on and off like a tap – unless they're drunk or high of course, but hey that totally doesn't, like, count; that's like, rape or whatever.

Its about to get gross

And since both sexes do the same things, as a man, think about what you do. And not the noble stuff. Think about all the dirty, rotten, gross, despicable crap you do. Now think of the hottest woman you can imagine… and realize she does the exact same things. Look at all the Victoria Secret models (like you weren't already). Every single one of those super models have had and will have diarrhoea so fierce she won't leave the bathroom for forty minutes. It's entirely possible that right now, at this very moment, Gisele Bundchen is sitting on a toilet, a grimace etched onto her face, as her butthole blasts out stringy rabbit turds that are getting stuck to the underside of the rim while she's groaning and wondering why the hell she risked eating that spicy slice of lamb at the fundraiser. That hot woman you saw walking around with perfect C's and an ass worthy of an epic bongo drumming session? Right now she's looking around to make the cost is clear, and now she's picking her nose and eating it.

God that thing is HOT – and poop comes out of it every single day

Women who are 9/10 have crapped themselves, have pissed their pants, have let farts out in front of royalty, have eagerly wolfed down food prepared by someone who picked their ass and didn't wash their hands. For every gross act you can imagine, a chick you would mutilate yourself to be with has done or been subjected to it; often with some of them. Some have kinks that'd make you want to swallow a bucket of bleach after watching them do it. One friend of mine had a girlfriend who used to love to pop his pimples and zits and blackheads; apparently it made her… 'excited'… so he let her. Back in the day Mischa Barton was worshipped by several guys I knew; hard to think of her as a fairy tale princess when you can Google pictures of her walking around in white pants during her five day flowering.

So for those of you who've not already realized it, remember; just 'cause she's hot does not mean the chick you adore ain't the bad kind of nasty. It's hard to keep a woman up on the pedestal when you know that at some point the last 24 hours she's wiped a big wad of poop out from between those butt cheeks you're salivating over. Odds are the toilet paper ripped because her carefully painted nails sliced through it and she got shit finger and had to spend five minutes carefully cleaning out the underside of her nails (and still, unknowingly, didn't get it all). With knowledge like that in mind, you'll find it's a lot easier to approach women. If you even still want to. You're welcome.

Sniff sniff* She thinks: "Dammit, still smells like crap. Oh well."*

And as a grotesque bonus here's four semi-brief anecdotes about the grossest hot women Billy's encountered!

The Bank Depositing Gold Digger!

Super hot girl I was into during my senior year in high school sat beside me in a lot of my classes. Looked over one day, noticed she put her head down on her desk with one arm curled around it. Thought she was sleeping at first, thinking to myself: D'awww, look at my cute princess, all tuckered out and headed to nappy town. Then, while I was day dreaming about giving her a kiss to wake her up, I noticed the other arm was shuffling around in front of her lowered face. She shifted for whatever reason and I got an eyeball full of her index finger up to the knuckle in her nose. She pulled it out with a pea coloured wad on the tip of it, stared, and ate it. After that I couldn't help but notice her doing it all the time.

Who Needs A Fridge When You Have A Bed?

Around the same time, my senior year of high school. I was hanging out at a girl's house watching a movie in her room. I noticed a spicy sour smell. Assumed it was just lingering stink from her mom's cooking. After a bit my gal pal excused herself to the washroom (probably to do nasty stuff). I noticed the smell was really, really bad in the space between her bed and the wall. Not even thinking about it I rolled over and peeked underneath. The stink of rotting food hit me like a fart fired right into my nostrils. There were three plates underneath with green meat on them. As confused as I was about why anyone would build a mould factory under the bed, I was equally confused about why she ate in her room in the first place. Interesting tidbit: apparently Marilyn Monroe also stored food around her bed. Perhaps this is a universal symptom of some kind of mental illness. Or perhaps hot girls are just too lazy to scrape their plates off in the garbage – probably leave it around the bed so that a man will come pick it up and get rid of it for her after sex.

Not The Squirt I Was Looking For

Picked up a smoke show of a girl in the club. She was pretty drunk but hey, so was I – it was our first year at university, so it was pretty much mandatory that we spend it in a drunken haze. Went back to her dorm. Having a great time mound pounding. She climbs on top, everything's going great…and all of a sudden feel my peener get really wet and really warm. First three seconds I proudly thought it was a simple orgasm. Next three I thought it was a squirt – having known about but never giving a chick one previously, I had no ability to judge. It took an embarrassing long time for me to figure out the awful truth before I squirmed out from under her and stumbled out of the bed. The room smelled like a big bucket of ammonia, Gatorade and vodka was all mixed together. To this day I have no idea who should be more embarrassed by the situation. Sure, she peed her bed – but she also peed on a man. I'd say that's +1 for feminism.

Needless to say, we continued to hook up after that.

Snow Ball? Snow Boulder More Like

I worked security in a club for awhile. Got to see all sorts of nasty women but this one took the grand prize of grossness. Boss calls us into his office after close one night, big grin on his face. Shows us video of a super hot regular really fooling around hard with a guy. Nothing new or special or even outrageous compared to the one or two girls a night we usually caught screwing in the club, knowing that many more did so unnoticed. Boss rewinds camera to ten minutes earlier. In a dark, hard to see area of the dance floor, same girl can be seen on her knees really pumping a guy's flesh minaret with her mouth. And then a second guy. And then a third guy. Camera and angle too crappy to tell if she debited or credited those future Nobel prize winners into her gut or onto the dance floor but immediately after the third she got up, stumbled to the nearby shooter bar where the fourth guy buys her a shot and begins to make out with this hot chick less then five minutes after she thoroughly cleaned the skin off of three drum sticks. I sure hope she at least swished her mouth out good with that shot.

How To Improve Your Game And Life With Meditation

March 4, 2014 | by Mikeyangelo | Link | Original Link

A lot of men who start out reading about game will end up in a complacent cycle of mental masturbation. There are so many different theories and philosophies out there that it becomes more of a hobby to learn new concepts than it is to actually go out and game.

A lot of it has to do with lack of contemplation in one's life. The inner-framework of one's mind should be thoroughly inspected, so the fear's in the individual's life can be understood and eventually be alleviated. Meditation is one of the quickest ways to erase the walls of social conditioning that have held most of us back from the many years that they've been built. It's a tool that will help you understand the essence of your "ego." The deeper you go with it, the more you will understand that the identity you think you are isn't actually who you are.

The little voice in your head who claims to be "I" will becomes obnoxious and redundant the more you realize that you're "its" master than the other way around. That might or might not click with some of you right away, but I can assure you that the more you contemplate "who you are" through the lens of meditation, your overall life and game will improve dramatically.

A lot of the common issues that most men face starting out with game will become irrelevant once one has become familiar with the state of “meditation.” For example:

1. Approach anxiety

Meditation has been shown to reduce anxiety by 40-55% in the beginning stages of practice. The better you get, the less anxiety you will obviously have. The only thing that rejection can affect is your “ego.” Meditation will help to unfold your “ego” for what it truly is and put you inside of a relaxed trance. It will help to allay your approach anxiety almost completely.

2. You will naturally be able to produce good emotions

We’ve all had times in our lives where our emotional state was low. This is especially true for guys who are new to the game. The negative emotions (usually coming from a place of neediness) will act like a haystack in a desert. As they roll, they will grow. You will most likely try to drown your fears with external substances in hopes that your confidence will come back to a steady state. Sometimes it works, a lot of times it doesn’t. Meditation will bring out the good emotions (or confidence) inside of you naturally. Even if you’re having a really “off” night, at the least you will be able to pull yourself together in neutral state.

3. Attraction will rise in females

That claim might be bold, but it’s true. Most of the men in our Western society are trapped inside of their heads. It’s very rare to sit down and have a conversation with someone who doesn’t have a thousand things on their minds. Everyone’s only listening to bits and pieces of what you’re saying, and thinking of what they’re going to say next. By being clear minded, not only will your dialogue be more creative, but you will be a much more enjoyable person to be around. Jokes will be funnier, vaginas will be wetter. When you're in a state of presence (meditation), you will be an outlier compared to the average man. Good emotions, presence, plus dominance is the main foundation for all you really need to bag the women of your liking.

What kind of meditation will benefit you the most?

There are a variety of meditations to choose from (e.g., mindfulness, tummo, yoga, TM, etc.), so it might be confusing to pick one for those of you who are just starting out. All of them are to be respected, but I have found TM (transcendental meditation) to have the most compelling effects. It is extremely simple to learn, and very effective for trying to get in your "zone."

A brief guide on how to practice TM

A. Find a place where you can sit in silence. It's very rare that you're going to meditate in a place that's 100% quiet, and that's perfectly fine.

B. Posture is irrelevant. The classic lotus position is uncomfortable after a while. Do what makes you comfortable—stand up, lay down, sit in a chair—all of these things are fine.

C. Pick a mantra for yourself. A mantra is a word, or phrase that will help you guide your thoughts back to "center." Personally, I am a fan of the classic "So" and "Hum" mantra. But you can use any word(s) to your liking. (If you're a Christian, or Catholic you might find it necessary to use the word "Amen," or "Hallelujah.") As you inhale (slowly), string out the word "So"—or whatever word(s) you have chosen—in your mind, until you get to a point where you need to exhale. As you exhale slowly, string out the word "Hum" in your mind until your body feels it necessary to inhale again, and then repeat your mantra throughout the rest of your meditation session. Keep in mind that you're saying your mantra inside of your head. It's optional to exhale your mantra out loud if you wish (think of monks humming), but it really won't make too much of a difference.

D. Understand that it's quite normal for us to drift off into random tangents of thought. Your stomach might start growling, which will lead you to think about food. You could be thinking about work, bills, or whatever repetitive bore your mind wants to entertain. Those thoughts are going to help you in the long run. After awhile of fluctuating between the two (thoughts and the state of meditation), you will find it easier to differentiate between the two—meaning you will know how to access the "present moment" much quicker.

E. A lot of people say that you should do meditation for 20 minutes a day, and 20 minutes a night. That's a nice start, but if you're able to put more time into your meditation practice, then I say do as much as you can.

F. This is only a basic outline to help get you started on your meditation journey. You're most likely not going to become a Zen master your first meditation session, and that's okay. The process shouldn't be based on wanting immediate results, or be viewed as a chore. It should be viewed as something that is fun. It's a subtle paradox in meditation that when you aren't hungry for instant gratification you're fed instant gratification.

Further Reading

The Power Of Now by Eckhart Tolle. Though Tolle doesn't focus on TM meditation specifically, you will find that the "present moment" is the exact same thing as the "transcendental" state. Tolle does a wonderful job of putting into words a thing that cannot actually be put into words. The book was written in a way for the masses to easily comprehend, so this is a great guide for beginners to start on their meditation journey.

Conclusion

As you start learning more and more about Eastern philosophy or meditation, you might end up wanting to make it a goal to remove the “ego” within yourself completely. That’s not really necessary at all. As a matter of fact, I read somewhere a long time ago that there were Hindu “prophets” who focused so hard on repressing their thoughts to the point where eventually their personalities were identical to a “stone.” If that’s what enlightenment entails, then it doesn’t really seem like something that’s worth pursuing.

Instead, keep a steady balance with your meditation practices and your thoughts. The goal is to understand the fears in your heart, rather than to run from them. To let go of all of your beliefs for a trial of time to see that not even hell can burn you with your shield of peace and felicity. The women you come in contact with will have no other option, but to think that you’re a god.

“Gravity” Perfectly Depicts Women In Science

March 4, 2014 | by TheMaskAndRose | Link | Original Link

As those of you who watch TV knew, and I found out on Saturday, the Academy Awards ceremony happened on Sunday evening in Los Angeles. One movie that took home a fair amount of wins was “Gravity,” which as far as I could tell when I saw it, was about the relentless ineptitude of women who try to compete with men in science.

Let’s understand the basic premise before we begin.

(spoiler alert)

There are two astronauts in space worth discussing, Sandra Bullock’s character and George Clooney’s character. Shit hits the fan and they have to abort their mission. Once the aforementioned shit arrives, Sandra Bullock’s character somehow finds a way to chop each turd up in the blades on the fan and spray it on everything around her, all while magically avoiding the death she’s begging for with her technical failures.

Matt, Clooney’s character, is calm, cool, collected, and mission-oriented. He’s the boss, and he knows what he’s talking about.

One would think that with all the feminist claptrap about how women are just as capable of success in STEM fields as men are, Hollywood would have gone to some effort to show that ladies are at least slightly capable of handling anything related to logic, common sense, and science. What we get, instead, is Stone: an inept moron whose failure at everything mechanical is a constant danger to herself and everyone around her.

Stone, the ostensibly well-trained female astronaut:

- Constantly fails to follow directions, because she’s strong and independent and knows what she’s doing. Except when she doesn’t and puts the entire mission at risk because she refused to listen to a man who knew his shit.
- Constantly lets go of things she’s told to hold onto, while holding onto things she’s told to let go of. Graphs and computers and following superiors be damned.
- Begins to feel lightheaded, at which point Matt has to fucking explain to her that she’s getting dizzy because she’s running out of oxygen. She must have missed that class, based on the fact that she alters her behavior to align with this shocking new information.
- Freaks out when her oxygen tank runs low, at which point Matt has to fucking explain to her that there’s still oxygen circulating around in her suit so calm the fuck down. Another class missed, apparently.
- Doesn’t understand that landing jets are still jets until Matt explains it to her. I wish I were making this up. Watch the movie.
- Doesn’t know what an airlock looks like until Matt explains it to her. An airlock. The basic structural portal that allows her to enter and exit the spaceship. The door. She doesn’t know what the door looks like.
- Cannot operate a fire extinguisher without knocking herself unconscious.

- Tries to escape in a pod that not only already has the parachute deployed, but whose parachute is intricately tangled into the space station it's attached to. Somehow, she is surprised that the pod cannot detach in such conditions.
- Nearly drowns herself by opening the escape hatch, fully underwater, still wearing her entire spacesuit.

And yet, somehow, when she accidentally manages to not-kill-herself, the audience is expected to respect and admire her for bravery, or something. I was laughing in the theater, though I did a good job of keeping it relatively quiet. This is exactly what it looks like in real life when most women try to science.

I'm really proud of Hollywood for its accurate depiction of women who try to "do everything men can do," in nothing but a bratty-little-sister attempt to one-up men. Also, another realistic portrayal of the career-driven woman: she's completely alone. Having given up things like being a good wife and choosing instead to build whatever the hell it was she built in the movie, she ends up in her 40s, facing death in outer space, crying at the idea that nobody is left on Earth who will miss her or say a prayer for her.

Take note, fembots.

Beware The Pitfalls Of Seeking Validation

March 5, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

My development as a male has come with a lot of realizations. Many of them have had a substantial impact on both my outward life as well as my own mental growth. For example: that girls will have sex with you on the first date, or that I shouldn't care so much about one girl versus another, or perhaps how all girls love being dominated. Another one of my biggest epiphanies came this November.

Until recently, in addition to my own beliefs about a girl I would date or sleep with I also paid attention to what others thought. After all, I had just developed this "power" and wanted to show off — and what is more (seemingly) impressive than the ability to take a complete stranger of a woman and then have her submit herself sexually to you? I was quick to tell all my friends about my conquests, show them pictures of the naked girls and so on.

Validation can be defined as the process by which one provides evidence to establish the truth of something. This is exactly what I was doing—I was seeking validation. In other words, I was seeking from my friends some evidence (their agreement or approval) that this girl was hot, sexy, or bangable (my desired "truth").

The chase became inspired partly for the joy of texting my friends a +1 after completing intercourse. Often times when she would do obligatory post-sex bathroom run I'd grab my pants, pull out my cell and send the text. I'd be way too happy to show them the pictures of my conquests. Then that day in November, it all died.

I'll save the full story for another time, but I met a girl that if I had such a thing as a list of random physical features that fit my ideal girl…well she was ticking them off left and right. I love brunettes, she had dark hair. I love light eyes, hers were hazel. I love really skinny girls, she flaunted ribcage and boxgap. Olive skin? She mimicked that of Sloan from Entourage. Raspier sultry voices do it for me, and she could be a voice double for Emma Stone.

I ended up sleeping with her that night, after what turned out to be a ridiculous few hours. Given the craziness of the night that ensued, and describing her as fitting my ideal, my friends asked for pictures so I showed them. They agreed she was very attractive but had varying stances on my classifying her as "ideal." One friend in particular was somewhat dismissive as he prefers curvy blondes, and that sparked some thought in my mind.

I reflected on a lot of things the next day. One being I'd never see this girl again because she lived in another state and also had a boyfriend (surprise). While I wasn't developing any sort of feelings or attachment to her, if you bang your ideal girl you'd probably want to do it on more than one occasion. But more importantly was the contrast about how satisfied I was with this girl's appearance versus what some others thought, particularly the dismissive friend. And that's when I realized I not only could, but should, really care less about what others thought.

It was liberating.

I used to be deathly afraid of flying. Every bit of turbulence resulted in my unjustified belief that the plane was going down. Then during one flight I tried to calm myself during turbulence and started thinking of it as bumps on a road while driving. For whatever reason, that portrayal of turbulence completely dissipated my fear of flying and now flying is one of my favorite things to do.

The same could be said about that day in November. Probably stemming from some sense of insecurity, I cared a lot about what my friends thought of the girls I bedded. And then when I realized how little my dismissive friend's opinion affected me relative to my own opinion on the aesthetics of this girl, that prior way of thinking became absurd to me. My +1 texts diminished only to instances where I wanted to motivate my lazy friends into trying. Pictures were taken now for my own reflection as opposed to show and tell. If I wanted to hit on a dark-haired girl with bushy eyebrows because she reminded me of my younger days' crush on Jennifer Connelly then I would.

Unless you are born with the natural confidence and resolve of a James Bond, chances are you have or still are seeking validation every now and again. Ever bump up your rating of a girl, even slightly, when telling your buddies about your latest bang? Ever pull out a cell pic of your last bedmate without prior request? Ever start your conversation with a good friend talking about your latest conquest rather than something neutral?

We've all been there and there's no shame whatsoever to it. Hopefully you eventually begin to understand there is no real value in seeking validation for such things. In fact, by definition it's impossible as you cannot establish the truth of an opinion…seeking to do so is not only empty but will cause frustration. It took me a while, but I'm glad to have made this realization.

What Freedom Looks Like In Modern America

March 5, 2014 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

The patriarchal father of the past looms large. He would love and cherish his children, and when he discovered their misdeeds, he was quick to punish them. Decisively so. He would saddle them with chores and restrictions. He was quite the tyrant. Yet he would give them more and more freedom, so slowly they hardly noticed, as his children obeyed his will. With each passing year, he showed less and less oversight, and more and more freedoms to his offspring.

If ever a child abused these freedoms, the father would immediately deny him these hard-won freedoms. Freedom relied on responsibility to bring order – without responsibility, freedom was out of the question. Freedom could not bequeath order where there was no responsibility.

Nowadays, this sequence is reversed, if it remains at all. Parents grant children freedom and privileges before they have shown any aptitude to use them wisely. And the father lacks the conviction to restrain a child when the child misbehaves – if only because the father himself indulges. He lacks conviction to mete out meaningful punishment, and fears he is out of touch. He always has a submissive posture – go to any place where parents and children gather, and you'll see a wayward father trailing after his child. The viewer is in doubt as to who leads whom.

He may be overworked, which limits his time with his children. He cannot bear to see them unhappy, so he spends his every moment with them placating their wants, hoping this will please them. If he dares punish them, he worries he is being draconian, too “paternalistic” even.

He worries that he doesn’t outwardly love his children enough. So he avoids any action that could be mistaken for being hateful – he avoids doling out strict punishment, because he cannot bear to see them cry. The masculine desire to do right by his offspring is corrupted into an effeminate instinct to keep them from feeling hurt or offended. And his children will superficially reward him with a smile when he relents and gives them what they crave. The more he placates them, the more spineless and entitled they become. They learn to unleash a tantrum at the merest trigger. And their father only wilts before such emotionalism.

The patriarch is not popular nowadays. He is a man of deep conviction – he is close-minded, unreceptive to innovation; so we write him off as dim and dull. As we’ve strayed from his example, the problems we set out to solve have only multiplied. Perhaps it’s time we gave him his due.

We say we want freedom. Yet we crave the fruits of restriction and self-denial. We slave away for an appealing physique; we study difficult languages to live in faraway lands; we enter strange and discomfiting situations to near ourselves to beauty; it’s clear that sacrifice is no foreign, abstract thing – it is very much a daily reality. To say otherwise is to admit to a life of sloth and stagnation.

Everybody wants to be a bodybuilder, but nobody wants to lift no heavy ass weights. – Ronnie Coleman

Here in America, we are bombarded with offers of tasty, addictive food. We know it to be bad for us, that it will fatten and age us, yet we indulge. Hundreds and thousands of people devote themselves to the craft of making these foods as addictive and cheap as possible. They pay no concern to the food’s effect on health, so long as the customer gladly pays up*. To be an American is to believe that God smiles upon every corporate dollar made, no matter how ill-gotten.* The American clamors for his right to consume anything and everything, and then wonders why his country is beset by the moral plague of fatness.

The people of America have grotesquely abused this freedom to choose. Their sins can be seen from every street corner, as they waddle about as their limp sweatpants pay no remonstrance to their swelling bulk. As King David wrote thousands of years ago, they are entombed in their own fat as they speak proudly. They have manifestly failed to stay trim. When a man ceases to act like an adult, it becomes necessary to stop treating him as if he were one. Freedom is no solution for a wayward child or a lapsed drug addict – the American people are no exception. If it is freedom they cannot handle, then it is freedom they shall be denied.

Already, one can hear the cries of “freedom” ringing out, objecting to any measures to stem the tide of fatness. “Draconian, paternalistic!” they will say. Precisely. Paternalism is a virtue when dealing with children.

Of these naysaying freedom fighters, I must ask, where were they when Edward Snowden revealed how the American government spies on its own people? When American officials were threatening war in yet another Middle Eastern country? When bureaucrats are confiscating guns away from law-abiding men? Or when the government was facilitating death at the hands of Mexican cartels by selling them guns? When government universities expel students with unconstitutional speech codes and flippant standards of evidence for sexual assault convictions? They were watching American Idol.

The public can't be bothered to care about those freedoms. Already, the only freedom the establishment protects is the freedom to consume, the freedom to define oneself by one's selection of multinational brands and syndicated television shows. To buy and consume freely from one company or another, to admit no impediment to the American dollar, that is the freedom to which the government of right and left have joined to protect. Heaven forbid an embargo on iPhones. But raise the prospect of questioning their treasured sweets, and the sausage-fingered rise up in digital fury.

A few Western men are discovering the obvious superiority of women abroad. Thin, feminine, graceful, they say of foreign women. Let us take after them, and consider a thought experiment – that there exists two countries, Freedonia and Patria. Abstinence and restraint are unheard of in Freedonia – everyone indulges to their gut's content. And they have figures of piggish proportion to show for it.

Meanwhile, in Patria, Pop Tarts and Tootsie Rolls are nowhere to be found. The markets in Patria are simple, spartan affairs. Aisles are lined with produce and spices, sacks of grains and legumes, with meat and seafood, and simple oils and condiments.

As Hilaire Belloc noted, we have a word for men short and tall, dwarf and giant, but no word for a man of medium stature. So too, in Patria "cooking from scratch" is unheard of – because that is all they have ever known. To cook any other way is to propose riding a bicycle without wheels –utterly incomprehensible. The men and women of Patria are broadly aware of the basic principles of cooking, with curing meats and fermenting crops. Corpulence of any kind is confined to the sick and disabled.

One has to ask, what kind of man would opt for a nation free in name but wracked by sloth and cowardice in reality, where beauty is obscured by fleshy extrusions of fat? For a land where indulgence is the rule, and discipline the exception? For a home where children cannot rely on their mother to prepare a healthful meal? Would you trust a man so disposed with the care of your business, with the hand of your daughter, with the pulpit of your church? Only a man under the spell of gluttony and decadence could prefer a nation like Freedonia, yet these men abound today.

Feminist Leader Implies That Women Make Poorer Decisions Than Men

March 5, 2014 | by Von Munchausen | Link | Original Link

Well-respected Wall Street Journalist James Taranto recently wrote a piece entitled: "Drunkenness and Double Standards, A balanced look at college sex offenses." The article acknowledges both the realities of violent rape and, on the other side of the coin, the cases where two drunken people end up pushing genitalia together. Anyone who's spent time in college knows it's a common occurrence. Newly independent young people's first encounters with alcohol and freedom from parental rules are often wild.

The day after this article was published, National Organization of Women (NOW) president Terry O'Neill called for Taranto's dismissal in a press release. Her stated reason for the demand was her claim that his arguments amounted to victim blaming. However, at no point does she acknowledge that women are just as capable of making poor decisions as men.

The article makes the point that men are blamed for these mutual encounters in the vast majority of cases. His point is; "What is called the problem of 'sexual assault' on campus is in large part a problem of reckless alcohol consumption, by men and women alike."

Taranto uses an apt analogy in making his point:

> If two drunk drivers are in a collision, one doesn't determine fault on the basis of demographic details such as each driver's sex. But when two drunken college students "collide," the male one is almost always presumed to be at fault. His diminished capacity owing to alcohol is not a mitigating factor, but her diminished capacity is an aggravating factor for him.

NOW President offers no arguments, only demands dismissal

Terry O'Neill never argued the point in her call for WSJ to fire Taranto. At no point did Taranto condone rape or cast aspersions against women in general. However, Terry O'Neill states:

> James Taranto doesn't need a national platform for demeaning women and condoning rape.

Ignoring the possibly libelous nature of this statement doesn't change that equality is a two-way street. Unfortunately, it appears that Terry O'Neill would prefer feminists, on behalf of women everywhere, have their cake and eat it too. In calling for Taranto's dismissal, has she implied that all women need protection from their own decision-making? If this is the case, does that mean she believes women are not the equals of men? Is a women not to hold herself responsible for the choices that led to her "walk of shame?"

Whether the man was drunk and barely remembers it, or that he wouldn't normally do such things seems to not matter. It follows that it wouldn't matter that a combination of bad decision on both their parts is what got them into their mess. Does Terry O'Neill's press release show that she believes all culpability for a woman's decisions rest squarely on a man's head? If so, that implies she believes women, in general, lack agency. A belief like this is not in keeping with true equality.

Equality allows for women to make good and bad decisions, suffering the consequences and gaining the rewards of either, just as men do. True equals do not seek punishment against another who is mutually responsible for drunken sex. But, it seems in the opinion of the president of NOW, only a man can be held responsible for the choices of both men and women.

Terry O'Neill's emotional appeal to deflect from factual argument

In the same press release Terry O'Neill trots out the tired statistic:

> Approximately one in four young women will be sexually assaulted during their college career – an alarming statistic…

This stat would be devastating, were it true. Mark Twain stated, "There are three kinds of lies: lies, damned lies, and statistics." It is well-known that statistics are often skewed to win arguments. This 25% nonsense is a well-known example that persists in today's misinformed culture, much like the false pay gap between men and women. These statistics are used to evoke an emotional response intended to shut down further debate.

Here is what Phil in Utah had to say about rape statistics:

> So, what do statistics collected from non-feminist sources say? Well, let's try the FBI statistics. According to an FBI report, which did not account for differing definitions of rape, whether or not the rapes were convicted, or whether or not female-on-male rape was included, the United States had a rate of 29 reported rapes per 100,000 people in 2009. That's not going to get us to 25%, but I'm feeling generous, so let's look at the country with the highest rate of rape in the past decade–South Africa, with a rate of 116 rapes per 100,000 people in one year. Percentage wise, this is .1% of the population. Now, I'll admit that I'm worse at math than anything else in the world, but even I know this isn't even close to "1 in 4″

I recognize the irony of using one set of statistics to combat another in this case. However, it's a useful exercise. Both set of stats can't be 100% correct, because of massive inflation on the feminist's side and very real problem of unreported rape on the other. The severe difference between the two stats points to a reality that lies somewhere in the middle. The FBI report is solid crime stats though, and I have yet to see the research behind the 1 in 4 claim. Each time a rape happens it's a potentially life-destroying tragedy, so is every false rape accusation. It is time to acknowledge that politics creates bullshit where these stats are concerned.

Regardless of her motivations, trotting out inflated statistics doesn't make for an effective argument against Taranto's point; women are responsible for all of their choices. Terry

O’Neill at no point offered logical counterpoint to his article or even presented a single argument. She, instead, weakly used labels like “misogynist” which are meant to silence honest debate as I have pointed out before. She didn’t even acknowledge the false rape anecdote in Taranto’s article or the possibility that such things happen at all. On top of all of that she claimed the article amounted to “victim-blaming” without acknowledging the possibility that men can be just as ashamed as women in these circumstances.

Cowardly attempt to ruin a man’s livelihood

Terry O’Neill has a national voice, and because she does, few question her opinions or her motivations. I submit that intelligent, well-informed people don’t resort to name calling to end a debate. Until factual arguments are made against Taranto’s article he remains the victor in this particular debate. Since it is unlikely any feminist rhetoric will ever remove actual consequences from personal choices, it’s likely he’ll remain the winner.

Trying to ruin someone’s livelihood is a common tactic of feminists and left leaning activists. However, that doesn’t make the attempt correct. It is a fundamentally immoral act motivated by fear brought about by lack of confidence in one’s own argument. It’s my hope the leadership at the Wall Street Journal will recognize her cries for what they are and ignore Terry O’Neill’s bleating.

How To Have A Home Dinner Date That Ends In Sex

March 5, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Get ready gentlemen, because no longer will a lack of funds impair your ability to set-up dates.

This recipe can be used for a girl you're currently dating, one of your harem girls, or even after an initial meeting with a girl who you connected with on a higher level. If you met a girl in passing in the club, snagged her number quickly and didn't have any contact with since then, then I would save this recipe for after you've established a bit more comfort. If you hit it off right away, then she may be down, but usually this is good for a second date move. There are exceptions and there are no rules (once you know the rules), so trust your gut and roll with your instinct. After all, your instinct knows yourself better than you do.

Below you'll find a tried and true 'recipe' that you can refer to time and time again and it won't cost you more than a quick trip to your local grocery store. Without further ado gentlemen…

McQueen's Home Dinner Date Recipe

Pad Essentials

Your pad, your home, your casa. Whether you live in a penthouse on the Pacific to be specific, or a small studio in Ohio, either will work. The key here is that it's your own spot and you're proud of your home. I'm sure you work hard to have your own spot and if it's not up to snuff for the chick, then she's not the chick for you anyway.

Step 1: Clean Your Crib

1. Now is not the time to be ashamed of your abode. Give it a thorough cleaning and make it as presentable as possible. Hopefully, you didn't tell the girl you met that you are a billionaire and that you own a mansion. If you did, then she might be in for a surprise if you live in a humble studio.

2. Banking on the concept that you aren't a complete slob, this shouldn't take much time, probably a concentrated 30-45 minutes will do the trick. Vacuum, dust, wash any used dishes, clean the toilet, empty your trash and don't forget to get some candles and Glade Air-Freshner plug-ins. I swear by the Glade plug-ins. Adjust the air flow on these nifty gadgets all the way to 'Open' for the first hour before she gets to your crib, then dial them down to the Number 2 setting. It'll have your place fresh as the Prince of Bel Air, but dialing it down to Number 2 won't be overpowering when she's over.

3. Put away ANYTHING personal such as bills, financial paperwork, or job related work. Protect yourself by putting all of that away from the prying eyes of your guest.

Step 2: Set The Mood

1. Put on some chill music and here are some samples below of what I mean. Popular enough for the girl to recognize the music and thus build her comfort, energetic enough to keep her awake and upbeat so the mood stays positive, these are selections from my Own Personal Selection. Feel free to leave a comment below with some of your favorites as well, so everyone benefits.

2. Keep the volume to a nice background noise, but not overbearing. This will vary depending on the size of your crib and your music setup.

3. Light a candle or two, but keep the lights on as normal. You can always dim the lights AFTER dinner if the two of you are kissing etc, but keep the lights on as normal so the vibe is chill, but not too 'romantic' from the start.

4. Have her take her shoes off when she gets to your crib. This is essential (a) to keeping your castle fit for a King, and (b) it gets her in the mode of undressing, even if it's just her shoes. There's also something erotic about a girl's feet on bare carpet, hardwood, or concrete floors and it will kickstart her sensuality.

Music Samples

Kaskade Mellow Mix

Frank Sinatra Mix

Step 3: Take Charge

The moment she steps in your crib, after she takes off her shoes do the following:

1. Offer her a cocktail or a regular drink.

2. Give her a task: cutting up some ingredients for dinner, setting the table, anything that has to do with the dinner. This allows you to take the lead and also allows you to get insight into how she responds to your direction. If she doesn't know how to set a table, do you really think she knows anything else about keeping a home? If she complains or bitches from the start, then you will know a lot about her attitude as a person.

3. Have A Plan: say you told her to come over at 7:30pm, she shows up at 7:30pm and you say after she enters you spot, that "Just a few more things to do and we'll eat at 8″. This establishes that you are a Man With A Plan. Whatever you do, don't lollygag around. Have direction and take charge.

Step 4: Cook Together

1. This ties in with you giving her a task. Do NOT have dinner ready when she comes over. This eliminates an important step in this recipe and doesn't allow for you to take advantage of one of the most sensual activities a man and woman can partake it: cooking together. Have you ever seen the scene in 9 1/2 Weeks with Mickey Rourke? Exactly.

2. Make it fun and lighthearted. Have a glass of wine or an alcoholic beverage together and have fun with it.

3. Cook An Established Dish: in other words, now is not the time to try your Grandma's Chocolate Covered Oysters In Buttery Grits recipe. Stick to something that is basic, classy, tasty and a recipe that you have already cooked. If you need an idea of recipes, search my blog for Recipes Of The Week. I have plenty of tasty dinner recipes on this blog that you can refer to to whip up the perfect dish.

4. Ensure you have ALL of the ingredients for the recipe you pick by making a run to the grocery store BEFORE she comes over. Get the freshest fish or meat that you can find the day of. This ensures your dish will be banging with the best flavor you can make.

Step 5: Have A Chocolate Dessert

1. Hear me Loud and Clear: I have NEVER met a girl who did not like chocolate. Have a dessert with chocolate in it and get ready to see a smile appear on her face wide enough for a Mac truck to drive through.

2. Mention that you have dessert in the beginning when the two of you are cooking together. She'll have something to look forward to.

3. The dessert can be simple: pre-bought chocolate cake, a chocolate pie, ice cream with chocolate syrup, or any myriad of other chocolate desserts out there.

4. It's widely known that chocolate is an aphrodisiac, so utilize it.

Step 6: Have A Post-Dinner Activity Ready

1. You may get busy physically half-way through cooking and wind up having sex on the kitchen floor, however, plan on the opposite: sex after you have eaten and hung out for a bit.

2. Girls usually always "feel fat", after eating a big meal and can even feel self-conscious about their body post-meal. Allow for some 'down-time', by having a new show loaded on Netflix, or a movie ready to go in a genre you know she likes. The point is that you don't finish dinner and then sit on your couch staring at each other. Everything should just flow as though it's unplanned, but in actuality, you planned so well, that it appears effortless.

3. This is Next Level Game info, but I'll let you in on a little secret: Have a new toothbrush in the package available for her use after dinner. No one feels sexy with their teeth full of food and being able to offer your sexy guest a toothbrush to use is Next Level Comfort Game. It won't cost you more than getting a bulk pack of toothbrushes and even at that, it's no more than $4-5. You should have these anyway for your girls who spend the night.

Step 7: Game On

1. At this point you should have warmed her up with some light kissing while cooking together and you can proceed from this point by escalating before or during the movie you put on. Game as usual and enjoy your night!

2. Note: Stay away from sappy romantic films and instead play something that's classic, such as a Bond film or an old classic like Bullitt.

Get started on becoming better with women and life, by going here.

The Shamanic Medicine That Could Transform Your Life

March 6, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Ayahuasca is a psychedelic medicine brewed by the traditional shamans of the amazon. Before the first and only time I tried it, one of the other participants told me, “ayahuasca has done more for me than three hundred hits of acid, and it’s a thousand times more powerful.” Two hours later when I was vomitting onto the ground as the Holy Spirit called my name from a wall of vibrating eyes straight out of an Alex Grey painting, I knew she was right.

Ayahuasca is not a recreational drug. Brewing the plants requires days of preparation. Drinking it can cause intense vomiting – known as purging. Shamans will tell you this vomiting serves a spiritual purpose as negative energy and old patterns are expelled from the body. In my case, I saw the vomit as black snakes pouring out of my throat, as they became unlodged from the seat of the ego.

I wouldn’t call it “fun.” Then again, I wasn’t taking ayahuasca for fun. I had a spiritual purpose.

Ayahuasca In Addiction Treatment

I first heard about the Amazonian shamanic drug ayahuasca through the work of Gabor Mate, a Vancouver based addiction researcher. Gabor Mate has found virtually all the addicts he works with experienced childhood sexual abuse. Because they did not receive enough love as children their bodies do not naturally produce enough of the “love chemicals” associated with happiness.

External stimulation, like drugs, fill the body with dopamine and other love chemicals. As Mate puts it, “for the first time in his life the addict feels normal.” An addict in the video below describes heroin as feeling like when your mother brings you “a nice warm bowel of chicken soup,” and Mate responds, “do you know how close you are to the scientific truth there?” (2 minutes in)

Since the underlying roots of addiction often involve a chemical imbalance created in early childhood, it’s very difficult to treat—unless of course, you had a drug that could completely reset the bodies neuro-chemistry.

Enter ayahuasca. After one or two sessions with ayahuasca, Mate’s patients began naturally producing the love chemicals they used to seek through drugs. Major addictions, ongoing issues, and lifelong baggage were wiped out using deep shamanic work.

The Shamanic Perspective

“What if,” Mate asks, “we understood something in the West which has been the underlying core insight of Eastern spiritual pathways and aboriginal shamanic pathways around the world, which is that human beings are not their personalities, we’re not our thoughts, we’re not our emotions, we are not our dysfunctional or functional dynamics, but that at the core there is a true self that is somehow connected to—in fact not connected to but part of—nature and creation?”

While Western science understands ayahuasca from a drug perspective, the tradtional shamans call it a medicine. We don’t “trip,” we journey. Unlike a pill you’d pick up at the pharmacy, ayahuasca engages your entire being. The intention and consciousness you enter the process with changes the experience. Ayahuasca requires letting go and surrendering fully – or in my case not surrendering and being taught a lesson in humility.

Preparing For Ceremony

Because it’s a part of traditional religious ceremonies, courts have upheld the right to brew and use ayahuasca in certain spiritual settings. While many shamans attempting to heal the west sometimes hold ceremonies in America, international travelers may want to look into participating in traditional South American ceremonies in Brazil or Peru.

Ayahuasca works like poison control, soaking up toxins in the body, and pouring them out through your throat, to cleanse the body both spiritually and physically. For this reason, it’s important to eat healthy beforehand, and follow whatever dietary guidelines your spiritual group recommends. Usually this means a cleanse of only fresh organic fruits and vegetables for a couple days beforehand, and avoiding eating any processed food, heavy meats, or overripe bananas and avocados (those two are specifically singled out).

A friend of mine made the mistake of eating fast food before his first ceremony. During his journey he saw visions of tortured animals, and spent three hours being chased around by an evil Ronald McDonald. If you introduce new toxins, you might have to clear them during ceremony.

Creating the Space

Only take ayahuasca in the company of a trusted spiritual healer. You will need someone who can hold space, lead you through the journey, and help you integrate afterward. Not all spiritual groups are equal. Check in with your higher self before participating in ceremonies and trust your instincts.

Ayahuasca is powerful magic. If you don't heed the spiritual warnings, look at it this way—you're ingesting a compound that can completely reset your entire neuro-chemisty. There were points during my journey where I forgot my name, and feared I might not come back. The shaman and your intention will ensure your return.

The medicine works it's magic regardless of circumstances. If ayahuasca is meant to be a part of your path, it will find you. More important than anything else I have or could write is that you remember your intention. Enter the ceremony knowing clearly what you are wanting vibrationally. Then let go and surrender to whatever comes up during the journey.

The Journey

I've said very little about the actual experience because I don't want to color anyone's intention. Plus, it's very different for each person. Ayahuasca contains DMT, the chemical released in the brain during dreaming. Trying to describe my experience would be like trying to share a very profound dream.

Some people report feelings of deep love and euphoria. I had what could be called a "bad trip" but it was exactly what I needed in my spiritual path. I was put on a journey over which I had no control and had completely surrender to the divine or burn at the hands of my ego. For a time, there was no 'me,' just ego and awareness fighting over dominion of my soul. Ego held me hostage with white knuckled fists, and awareness surrounded it, laughing because it didn't stand a chance. I finally understood the meaning of the phrase

“the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.”

Part of my journey involved being told that I didn’t have to seek ayahuasca out again. I’d taken it for my own spiritual pride. The same pride that brought me to the medicine was the pride the medicine needed to cure. If I am to take ayahuasca again, it will be because it finds me. I’m open to it, but neither seeking it nor resisting it. Whatever spirit wants, thy will be done.

Integration

More important that the experience itself is integrating well. Unless the journey impacts your life it’s just spiritual tourism. There is a saying—after the ecstascy, the laundry—meaning after peak experiences, ground yourself in the mundane. The daily world is just as important as any spiritual realm you could travel to.

Plan on giving yourself several days afterward to integrate. Don’t schedule any major work or engagements for close to a week afterward. Remember, you may have reset your entire neuro-chemistry. Your body will need to rest. Journal, reflect, and take time to integrate your experience so you can use the lessons gained moving forward.

After ceremony, my friends said I was more myself after than they’d ever seen me before. I’ve never laughed and smiled as much as I did the day after ceremony. I felt grateful for every moment of my experience no matter how painful, because I knew just being incarnated in this world is a gift. There was nothing left to control. I was just along for the ride.

Does God Have A Place In The Red Pill Man’s Life?

March 6, 2014 | by inhumanist | Link | Original Link

Who programs the game? You? God? Cosmic accidents? Evolution and Jesus are all over the Internet’s “manosphere.” Middle aged married folks are mingling and bumping elbows with restless young cads. Why?

Nature, And Nature’s God

Will God have mercy on our souls? Or will Darwin have the last laugh? Just as the most successful alcoholic recovery program forces one to accept a higher power, the ignorance recovery program that is the Red Pill often forces a man to deal with ultimate metaphysical questions. Just as the concept of the alpha male is both illusory and quite real, metaphysics are both forever out of reach but indelibly present to the awakened male.

The nihilist (rogue) avoids this metaphysical confrontation. The blue piller (pawn) allows others to dictate his metaphysics to him. The virtuous man (warrior) studies metaphysics and realizes they are the source of ethics, and an unveiling of the code by which the game is programmed. Through metaphysical effort the player feels able to reprogram the game to some degree, or tap into the deepest secrets of the game which have been hidden from him by laziness, foolishness, feminists, or white knights. The program seemingly has a programmer, and confronting the programmer is a metaphysical experience. This is why so many in the community end up getting religion. They begin to realize that this is a massively multiplayer game, and there is much more at stake than getting the girl or the job. They suddenly realize that there is a game manual after all, and it’s called a Bible.

Government

The final sphere of the warrior is government. Once he has understood the game, himself, the programmer, and the powers and principalities, he feels that politics are important. Alas, politics is the highest realm of applied masculine virtue. The majority of poli-lit consumers and news consumers are, and always have been men, while the majority of fashion and gossip subscribers are, and always have been women.

Politics and pickup mingle on some of the most influential game sites. And it turns out that reality has a conservative bias. Contrary to popular opinion, both Darwninan nature and God’s Creation are a real bitch, and there is no utopia in sight. There is no enlightenment, there is no equality, there are no human rights, there is no justice in this world. These things cannot be found under a microscope, and they are placed back in their proper metaphysical contexts where they belong by the red pill man. Confronting reality is the essence of what it means to be a masculine man. Confronting your neighbor’s reality is only the next logical progression. Religion often has a role in these matters.

Marriage

Although the concept of nation is higher than the concept of family, the concept of a nation stems from the concept of the family; the clan; as well as religious values. Governments, businesses, and nations reflect upon the state of the family. This leads many men to conclude that government and family are closely intertwined, and leads them to take on fatherhood in order to build a legacy of his own.

Fatherhood affords a man a power that he cannot bring about on his own. He can raise his sons and daughters to reform the nation. He can build a house under his name. He can go to his grave knowing that he was perhaps a deciding blow in the war against the ugly lies. Taking up this calling in our modern times can be a nightmare if men are tossed aside for no reason and find themselves enslaved to their traitorous wives by a biased family court system, or have their businesses destroyed by a sniveling meddling bureaucrat. But the rewards can be uniquely satisfying; there are many men who go to their graves surrounded by loved ones who will proudly carry his colors into battle.

To someone who has never known such a feeling in their own dysfunctional families, it can be hard to imagine, but I promise you, it in fact exists. Not all married men end up in that endless pile of dead men filling the trenches of Earth. Because a man has taken this calling, or foolishly has found himself trapped in this situation, he finds game helpful. He observes from the shadows, lurking anonymously online behind his deadly enemy: the nihilist, the cad, the slut, the feminist, the mangina. He games his wife, his daughters, his mother, his employees, his customers. He learns to be both genuine and intentional about everything he emotes. He teaches his sons to identify danger, and forces his daughters to heed his directions. He protects his own, and betters himself, progressing as a man, developing abilities he probably didn't get from his own father since his mother unilaterally kicked father out of his home and replaced him with a strange biker drummer dude, or since his father was just another feminized neck bearded sniveling milk sop. He comes to learn that all of life is in fact a game which we play for keeps.

Horrible Beast: 13 Drawings That Depict The Shameful Fatties Of America

March 6, 2014 | by B.R. Crumb | Link | Original Link

ARTIST'S STATEMENT:

Because it bears repeating, in men, healthy (i.e., not fat) women inspire feelings of love and compassion that transcend the boundaries of self, country, and creed. In women, healthy men inspire the same.

This male-female polarity—borne mostly out of feminine beauty and its counterpart, masculine action—establishes a degree of human connectedness that cannot be created otherwise. That is why the strongest possible "community" is really just two people: a man and his lover.

All other communities are built on that foundation. The newly-minted VP fucking the secretary in the handicap stall; the dutiful young woman who skips lunch so she remains doable in the eyes of her fiancé; the husband enjoying a Thursday evening rimjob from his adoring wife—these are the atoms of our civilization. The world is a funny place.

And yet, for thousands of years, people understood this just fine. The ancient Greeks knew that Helen's was the face that launched a thousand ships. They composed a couple epics on the matter. Two millennia later, Marlowe saw it just as clearly when he wrote that famous line. Then somehow, somewhere, we got it twisted. Today our mass culture is larded with fat apologists who advocate a feminine ideal that could scarcely rouse a single dong, much less move men to build careers, homes, families, futures.

For Horrible Beast, I've prepared thirteen drawings to serve as reminders that what separates the feminine woman from the fat woman is not a difference of degree, but of kind. It is my hope that these drawings will hold a mirror up to fat women so they might see themselves as we men do: as abhorrent; repulsive; alien; as existing beyond the farthest reaches of our love and compassion.

In brief, as beasts.

Human civilization is vast and can comfortably contain multitudes—but it cannot contain the beasts. Let us hope they are recognized, and righted, while there is yet something left to right.

The Fears Of Being A World Traveler

March 7, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Earlier this year, I wrote a post about how much my life had transformed in one year since taking the red pill, which touched upon something I had yet to experience – traveling the world. In that post, I wrote the following:

> I had never thought about leaving California, much less America. From what everyone had ever told me, America was the best place in the world to live. "The girls are the most beautiful! They're independent! They don't care what you think! They can't cook so you can eat out all the time! They LOVE cats!"
> My eyes have been opened recently to travel. I have no evidence besides the words of others, but I've realized I must see the world and see what else is out there. I just booked my first trip to Europe last week – a week each in Poland and Czech Republic. (this has changed, see below for full itinerary)

As of writing this, my trip is less than three weeks away. The weeks leading up to this trip are beginning to feel very much like the moments right before I stepped on stage for my first live guitar performance. Truthfully, my emotions are all over the place, like a hamster spinning wildly around in its wheel. While I couldn't be more excited to begin my adventure, there is one emotion that I wish would go away.

Fear.

I'm smart enough to recognize the benefits of fear though. It means that I'm pushing myself far out of my comfort zone, into the realm of challenge and hardship. Where blood, sweat, and tears pour down. Where winners are made, and where men become men.

Nothing easy is worth doing.

I'm also smart enough to not try to deny the fact that I have my apprehensions. Being that this is the first time out of the United States for me (apart from a cruise to the Virgin Islands and Mexico), and my first time traveling solo, it'd be silly not to. I don't pretend to be some alpha male who is phased by nothing. Rather than live in denial of that, I've decided to write some of my fears down and how I plan to conquer them.

What If I Can't Find My Way From The Airport?

There is very little doubt that the descent into Poland will be probably one of the most nerve wracking times of my trip. I'll be about to touch down in Europe for the first time, and quite frankly my Polish is rather, well, limited. I'm sure there will be a million thoughts going through my head, such as:

- I have the right kind of currency, right?
- How do I find the baggage claim?
- How the hell do I read all these Polish signs?
- Where do I find my friend who I'm linking up with?
- How do I make sure the cabbie doesn't rip me off?
- And, most importantly, are the girls cute?

To combat this, I'll have a small tablet on my carry-on. I'm a tech savvy guy, I'll manage to get on the wireless network in the airport and find whatever information I need through there. Truthfully, I am ecstatic to have a fellow red pill wingman and friend meeting me in Poland from the UK. It will make the first country I visit much less intimidating to have someone to get lost with.

What If Lose My Passport, Phone, Credit Cards, etc?

I'm going to place the blame for my paranoia on this squarely on my grandmother. She has been telling me for months that I need to watch out for being pickpocketed or beat up in a dark alley. While I understand her concern, I also understand that I cannot possibly be paranoid on my entire trip – that will ruin the experience. I plan to take precautions, and simply not be stupid (well, as not-stupid as a 22 year old can possibly be). What does this entail?

- Not getting ridiculously drunk
- Keeping copies of everything back in the apartment
- Taking precautions to ensure pickpocketing isn't a breeze for some smooth thief

I think my grandmother is deathly afraid I'll be looted and won't be able to get back to the United States. But hell, I suppose there are worse things than being stuck on the beaches of Barcelona.

Okay, My Sense Of Direction Sucks – I'm Going To Get Lost

I've come to terms that at some point I'll likely be very, very lost. Not the fun kind of lost when you're exploring a new area, but genuinely lost with no idea how to find where you need to be. I suspect it will be while I'm in Rome and all of the architecture begins to look the same to me after a day or two.

When this likely happens, I'm going to take a deep breathe and calmly remind myself that this is part of the adventure. The experience. There will be no panic, just rational thought.

Fortunately, I'm sure there will be cute girls around to point me in the right direction. It's a good thing I conquered approach anxiety a long time ago.

The Fear Of Not Having A Plan

I'm a very by the book kind of guy. However, I have come to the realization that at some point in this trip, I need to just wing it and go with the flow. Hence, I haven't made any travel arrangements to get from Rome to Prague (where I depart to come back to the States). I'm either going to grab a last minute flight or take an overnight train with a stop in Vienna or Zurich.

The idea of winging it makes me a bit nervous, but I'm determined to have freedom of any obligations at some points during this trip.

I Fear I Will Dread Coming Back

My life here in the US is great. I have a good job, live in a great city, and have a beautiful girlfriend. But what if life on the other side of the pond is really a lot better? Will I be fully dreading walking back into the office on the day I'm due back at work? What if my girlfriend pales in comparison to European girls I meet?

Will this be the final nail in the coffin of my American dream?

I don't have the answers to these questions. I'm sure I will find the answers to them at some point between March 27th and April 14th.

One thing is for damn sure though: I'll have zero regrets.

I've posted the itinerary of my entire trip on my personal blog here. If you're in any of these places, I'd love to meet. Fair warning though, I am pretty booked up in Poland and NYC. I'll be staying in AirBNB apartments pretty much the entire time. I'm not looking for a place to crash (unless offered), but would love to put some faces to the names and have some locals to show me around if you are a reputable commenter here on ROK or the RVF forum.

3/27 – 3/30: Wroclaw, Poland

Plans: Nightlife and culture

3/30 – 4/2: London, UK

Plans: Nightlife, tourism, and I've heard the local music scene is good.

4/2 – 4/5: Barcelona, Spain

Plans: Nightlife, nightlife, nightlife.

4/5 – 4/7 or 8: Rome, Italy

Plans: Art, tourism. I want to see the Vatican and Coliseum. And eat pizza.

4/8 – 4/10: Prague, Czech Republic

Plans: Craft beers and pubs

4/10 – 4/13: New York City, New York

Plans: I'm seeing a Yankees/Red Sox game on one of the nights (undecided). Other than that, typical tourist stuff. Central Park, Empire State, etc. I may be a bit burned out of nightlife at this point in the trip.

Hope to meet some of you on the road.

The Equality Movement Is Allowing Women To Tyrannize Men

March 7, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

Back in the 18th century, well before the "progress" of modern feminism, Samuel Johnson observed in a letter that "nature has given women so much power that the law has very wisely given them little." The power Johnson refers to is women's power over men.

It is easy to see how overwhelming that power is. If you are a healthy heterosexual man, and especially if you are relatively young, it should be obvious to you, once you subject yourself to a little honest self-examination, that nothing in life motivates you as strongly or as frequently as the desire to have sex with attractive women. But, life's greatest pleasure is also its most relentless burden. The pursuit of women is endless because of the very nature of the male sex drive. This pursuit is an affair in which a man, time and again, tries to get a woman to yield to his advances—or to put it another way, to finally relinquish that power she has been exercising over him, in order to consummate the sex act.

This is quite a lot of work, and frequently expensive, tedious, frustrating, and finally, embittering. For women, it mostly comes down to receiving a massive amount of attention and basically saying yes or no, though in our time it more and more amounts to saying nothing, that is, to flaking, since, thanks to feminism, liberated women need no longer be bothered with such an oppressive notion as propriety.

Dating and courtship is a one-sided affair

With all this in mind, consider the nature of heterosexual dating and relationships in the Anglo world today. The law has in fact given women a lot of power. They work and vote, hold office, and more. Meanwhile, so long as they are at least somewhat attractive, they still enjoy a fair amount of old-world chivalry, men lining up one after another to do things for them. Of course, that can't be said for us men. While many of us are still paying, as it were, for the mere possibility of having sex with women (and even the most skilled alpha player must admit that beautiful women still often tend to cost at least some money), few of these lovely creatures are at all inclined to do anything for us. The beautiful career woman is happy for you to buy her dinner, but she is not happy to cook you one, nor does she even know how.

Feminists tell us that human history is so much "patriarchal oppression." This is a rather simplistic view. The truth, which is much harder to accept, is that if men have oppressed women, it is because our desire for them is itself oppressive, no less so than those other incessant biological needs, those for food and drink. Furthermore, now that women are considered "equal" to men (a confused notion which really denotes sameness, even though the two genders are not the same), if we look closely we can see that what women have really wanted is not equality, but rather superiority. Again, just as oppressed peoples would be quite willing to be the oppressors—if only they could—so modern women expect both old world chivalry and modern "equality." Yet taken together, the two render women superior in the overall power dynamics; and it follows that, with respect to dating and romance generally, most heterosexual men in the Anglo world today, though they may not know it, are essentially dominated by women.

This grim state of things appears to be the inevitable result of feminism, that highly successful slave rebellion. The truth, as Samuel Johnson knew, is that the natural power women have over men is so great that, unless we seize it from them, by not allowing them equal rights and status, they will dominate us. And that is just what happens to most heterosexual men in the Western world today. "Courtship" now essentially means pursuing women and hoping and waiting, often in vain and quite tediously, that they will yield to our advances. They either will or will not, and either way, the choice and power is clearly theirs. And unless you're George Clooney or super rich, you're really no more than one among an endless array of options, which, in the age of social media, of OkCupid, Tinder and the rest, never stop arriving. You pursue, then wait. She simply sits back and fields one offer after another, with all sorts of material benefits along the way.

The only way to prevent this female dominance is for women to be materially dependent on men. Of course, that is not how it is today, and so we find that modern women, enjoying both equal rights and a fair amount of traditional chivalry (that is, material power simply given to them, for no clear reason and usually with no recompense), utterly dominate heterosexual men, who, between competition from fellow men and female flaking and cockblocking, are indeed lucky to get laid at all.

We have seen, then, that while women say they want equality, what they really want, just like an oppressed people, is superiority, to be the oppressor themselves. And this is no surprise; human beings, after all, are deeply self-interested, and tend towards unfairness and corruption.

Still, there is more to the situation. For, in spite of feminism, it is clear that women cannot shake off their deeper nature; when it comes to sex, dating and relationships, women still want to be led by strong and confident men. This is well-known to all red pill men and students of the manosphere. The only way to consistently get what you want from women—namely, sex—is to be confident and direct, and not passive or overly emotional. Nice guys get flaked on and friend-zoned. Cocky and aloof men sleep with that haughty stunner, and later with her hot friend too!

What men can do

Then there is the still universal female attraction to social status. Even though women are now equal citizens, with money of their own and a steady supply of generous suitors, they remain what they have always been: power and fame whores. This is frequently amusing and absurd. A man can be a talentless twit. Still, so long as he is famous or has some social standing, countless women will be irresistibly drawn to him. That ridiculous wimp in the awful Bon Jovi cover band—he bedded more 9s last month than most men will in a lifetime!

The reason is that, deep down, women are incorrigible slaves. The display or mere semblance of power and authority arouse them in the strongest psycho-sexual way. Napoleon was an ugly, undersized man. Yet women loved him. Why? Because he was powerful and therefore confident.

Indeed, for women, male confidence is an aphrodisiac in itself. Just why a man should be confident—in other words, whether he is truly any good at something or worthwhile—is generally inconsequential. When it comes to male confidence, women are like children at the amusement park; it’s a wonderful spectacle; nothing matches its excitement. Moreover, because female perceptions are generally shallow and superficial, a man who simply puts on a show of power and prestige—this exuding tremendous confidence—is sure to do quite well with women, those cheaply awed simpletons. Few things are more important to women than being validated by others. For this reason, they can hardly resist any man who appears to have accomplished this on a grand scale.

If we consider the nature of heterosexual intercourse, it quickly becomes obvious why women, even in our “progressive” era,” remain slaves deep down. In the sex act, the man penetrates as the woman receives. He is active while she is passive and receptive, her pleasure corresponding to his thrusts. And, the more he takes charge in bed—throwing her around, slapping her ass, pulling her hair, pounding her silly—the greater will be her arousal. I have had many women, after a bout of rough sex, say to me: “I never knew I liked that!” And henceforth vanilla sex is forever inferior. A woman has no control or choice over feeling this way; like any other, she is simply a creature acting in accord with her biology. And this passive psycho-sexual character certainly corresponds to what women are attracted to in all other areas of life, namely, power and confidence.

In sum, from these reflections it's clear that we live in a backward and confused time. It's natural for an inferior being—in this case, the Second Sex—to revolt against its Master (or "oppressor"). After all, equality is a sham, and human relations are not meant to be equal, least of all those between the sexes. Life is rather marked by immense natural inequality, savage self-interest, unavoidable discord, and awful strife. Yet now that women have equal rights and status, we find that they essentially tyrannize heterosexual men, whose efforts to win them over amount mostly to vain pursuits and waiting for brief satisfactions that are by no means guaranteed to be renewed—unlike in the better former times when women were materially dependent on men. And yet amid all the backwardness and confusion, the female desire to be led both in and outside the bedroom is as palpable as ever. Well then, time to man up, don't you think?

Open Letter To Beyoncé To Quit The Feminist Charade

March 8, 2014 | by Daddy | Link | Original Link

Dear Beyoncé,

In the past few years, feminists have been following you and analyzing your every action like paparazzi. When you dance in a sexual manner and dress accordingly, they whine that you objectify women and aggravate their sexualisation. When you sing about love and relationships like a lady, they criticize you for not being assertive enough. When you marry a rich successful rapper, they accuse you of being a bottom bitch. Some feminists even attempt to hijack you for their own political agenda, and it seems everything you do will displease a feminist one way or another.

But it's time to end this obvious senseless debate once and for all. You need to speak up. Y*ou're everything but a feminist*. Your personal life and your personal choices attest to that.

Career

You didn't become a highly successful singer by being independent. The key to your success was instead support from your family. You had and still have your mother at your side at all times to support you emotionally and protect you. She follows you everywhere as much she can, even on interviews. When stress was high, you had her shoulder to lean on. In addition, you had your father as your manager for an important part of your career to take care of your business, give you guidance and structure. He pushed you to work hard, was strict and gave you discipline.

Where other artists have collapsed under the pressure of spectacular stardom, you have survived the hassle of fame gracefully. Your talent alone can't be the explanation for that, since many others have talent. What differentiates you from them is your mental stability that stems from the constant support of a strong family structure, as you often stated. If you browse feminist literature, you will have a hard time finding books titled "The Key To Independence Is Staying Close To Your Family."

Love life

You didn't attract and kept one of the greatest rappers of all time by being a sexually liberated woman in your adolescence. Jay-Z doesn't put a ring on hoes. You were coy and selective with the guys with which you had sex, if any. You didn't sleep around and seek sexual pleasure at the cost of self respect like feminists advocate doing. Instead, you were sexually conservative. Your father was strict and wouldn't let boys be alone with you in your bedroom. You probably had to hold hands for a long period of time in your life.

Had you made this pose at home, your dad would have spanked you so hard your ass would be flat today

Feminists love to say that you own your sexuality. They like to think you go around being your stage persona in your real life by being wild, flirting with men, submitting men, licking your finger, etc. But your public image of a liberated sexual fiend is just that, an image. It's not your real life and it doesn't represent who you really are. This persona is an artful performance, just like an actress who plays a role. While your stage act could be a manifestation of your wilder side, this wilder side is tamed and under control in your real life, perhaps reserved only for intimacy with your husband.

Indeed, you didn't build a successful marriage by being sassy and by back talking to your man. Your husband, a famous successful billionaire, had the pick of any woman in the world. What truly differentiates you from most other women is your feminine attributes. You learned to be a good wife who is kind and supportive of her husband, just like your mother was to your father for a long time. While the media has made laughable attempts at portraying you as a bossy woman by nit-picking certain video clips, your success with relationships stems from being polite, considerate, humble and respectful of others. When is the last time a feminist wrote a piece about humility and respect?

Faith

You didn't stay positive during tough times by rejecting faith like most feminists do. Your mother did her best to bring you to church every week and you developed the habit of praying. You still pray before most of your shows. Part of your balance comes from being able to let go of rationality at the appropriate moments. It also gave you hope during those times where you were under great pressure.

Being part of a religious community also taught you to share and give back to the people. You used to say always keep god first, and claimed that it was an important part of your life. Feminists have viciously attacked religion in the past decades and would hardly qualify as faithful God followers.

Beyoncé giving an oral Polio pill to a child in Africa

You're not a feminist

Your constant success in your career and personal life cannot be attributed to a feminist upbringing in any way. You did not succeed like a feminist would, but like a woman would: with family support, with a strict conservative education and religious background. You need to be proud of your roots and not be afraid of representing your way of life.

You need to stop being intimidated by feminists who use "being offended" and "being outraged" as a tool to bully you and others they disapprove of. To those millions of little girls who look up to you as their goddess and role model on how to be a successful woman, the truth has to be told. You need to tell them clearly and directly that you're not a feminist and that you don't believe in feminism.

Indeed, what you teach to the next generation of girls has an important impact. You can tell them typical unproven dogmas like be independent, experiment with sex as much as you want, be sassy, argue with your man whom you don't need anyway and abandon faith; or you can tell them the truth. That Sasha Fierce is not a realistic approach to life, that she exists mostly for the shows. That Girls Run The World is a fantasy, and 1+1=2 is a lot closer to reality.

5 Ways To Stop Omega Males From Becoming Transsexuals

March 8, 2014 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

There is a narcissistic delusional tidal wave sweeping the internet. Many confused men have decided to band together and start advocacy groups about “transforming” into “women.” Omega males, seeing the success stories of the closeted homosexuals who crossdress, are starting to lie about having a “dysphoria” or a feeling of never belonging as a male. It also doesn’t help that most transsexuals were sexually abused before turning to the dark side of humanity. Combine that with most of them being raised by overbearing mothers and you have them completely failing in the sexual market place.

They see the girl that rejects them and notices that she has a much higher sexual pecking order. In a freakish nature vs nurture way, if these omega males can’t get paired up, they can just “convert” themselves to be women and have a much easier time with the sexual privileges modern women have. A girl pretty much has to open her legs to get some. Even an alpha male has to spit some game. As a former LGBT activist turned redpill renegade, I’ve developed five tactical responses to convert transsexuals back in to the men they’re supposed to be .

Don’t respect their pronouns

Imagine for a bit a man who claims to be a Pokemon. Now imagine there was a group of people who claimed to be Pokemons. They want special laws for their specie “pokemon” while making it a hate crime to deny them this “right” of acknowledgment. Now, replace Pokemon with omega males claiming they’re women. Never respect their pronouns. Call them what sex they were born with since sex can’t be changed. Be consistent and these transsexual “women” will realize that they can’t ever expect society to coddle their delusions.

Counterfeiting

Transsexuals who are all mentally ill have built a tolerance for being called freaks. It also doesn’t help that society compromises with ugly men in wigs by calling them “trans” women. The word “trans” means transitioning to be a woman. It’s scientifically impossible for a man to turn in to a woman. These individuals are trying to deceive themselves and society.

A term we have made in Philadelphia is to call these men bootleg. They want to be seen as women when they’re not. It’s very similar to buying a SONY product and in the box is a Nintendo product. Transsexuals knowing this can’t handle being told they’re a falsely advertised bootleg product that society forces us to treat them as if they were an authentic product. Nothing a phony hates more than a person calling them out for it. Next time somebody calls themselves a “trans-woman,” call them a bootleg woman. Don’t dignify mental delusions.

It’s a high-mortality lifestyle

As a society we tend to listen to authority. Transsexual activists have pressured the medical system to “authenticate” transgenderism. They have forced the medical profession to say the only cure for omega males who don’t like themselves is to take a cocktail of hormones and dress up as a woman. Yet, being transgender leads you to be part of a “community” that has a 60% suicide rate . It also leads an individual to have a HIV rate higher than the worst countries of sub-Sahara Africa (27% of all trannies have HIV). Deluding yourself that you were really born a woman is dangerous. Even when the transsexuals get the surgery, it doesn’t cure the delusion.

The surgery is no panacea

Bootlegs love to think that when they finally get the surgery. It will cure all of their dysphoria. The penis is the reason why they can’t live like Sex in the City. According to this, men who have the surgery tend to still commit suicide at a much higher rate. It’s such a common phenomena that a former bootleg made a website about it sexchangeregret.com. Omega males need to be told about the adverse effect of being lied to by the medical establishment.

Snowflakes are typical

Every omega male has some saccharine story about the “revelation” of awakening an inner women-hood. Most of these individuals have failed in life and the heels and makeup are a new “chance “ at life. They decide to hang around other delusional men and progress further down the gender delusion. The skinny effeminate omega males usually focus on sleeping with men. The chunkier more autistic individuals tend to view themselves as “lesbians” who try to push their way in to women’s only institutions. They all say the same terms, have the same goals, and are masters of groupthink. They all have some sort of tranny tribalism over the cisgender aka normal people. They rather trust a fellow deluded tranny than a normal good person.

Transsexualism has grown tremendously over the five years I’ve been monitoring it, especially with the conversion of omega males into being a tranny. When these omega males are at the lowest point of their life, they need a site like this, not blogs dedicated to transsexualism. Push back against transsexualism before it infects those who you love and care about.

The Curious Case Of The Feminist Party In Sweden

March 9, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

In 2005, some Swedish feminists got together and decided it was time for a political party that held feminism as its guiding set of principles. The primary goal of the movement was to eliminate sexism, racism and class differences in society. The strand of feminism that this party represented was radical feminism, as the focus was on patriarchy, patriarchy and more patriarchy. Radical feminism has a hyper focus on blaming men for social ills, as opposed to liberal feminism, which is more targeted at legal "inequities." The party was called the Feminist Initiative, or FI.

However, let's step through creation of the party, it's time in the spotlight and it's ultimate demise at the polls. In 2004, there was some restless stirring on the feminist left about the abolition of marriage – replacing it with a gender-neutral, polyamorous institution. Essentially, this would be creating a government institution that allows for formal recognition of any two or more persons. Further, there was some anger at the fact Sweden hadn't adopted Norway's gender quotas for corporate boards. Norway, in 2003, had passed a law that mandated that 40% of publically owned companies must be filled with women. This feminist malcontent lead to an exploratory meeting to find out if a feminist party should be formed.

The party origins are at that meeting – headed by Gudrun Schyman (pictured above). While the organization claimed to not have a hierarchy and the people at the meetup refused to identify as anything other than equal individuals, clearly any group of people has to have a leadership pecking order and Schyman was the “alpha” female.

At the meeting, gender quotas on corporate boards were discussed, as reforms to marriage and violence against women. They correctly determined, at the time, that they had enough support to take the party to the public. They decided on platform – which reads like any radical feminist screed – and decided to make the focus for the upcoming election on devolving marriage into simply consent between two or more people. Of course — in the advancement of gender equality — they reluctantly agreed to allow males to have leadership roles.

The party went public with much public approval. 5% of the population said the feminist party most assuredly had their vote – clearing the hurdle to be met for political parties to get into the Riksdag – the parliament of Sweden. Upwards of 20-25% of people said they would consider voting for the party – very impressive numbers for a nation with multiple major political parties. This wave of support was bolstered by the media, who praised the movement for advancing a progressive agenda based on feminism.

Buoyed by this support, the party began to advance an increasingly aggressive agenda. While their leader Schyman had previously espoused support for a "man tax" that would purely be used to fund female-only shelters, she once again began to talk about the advancing this tax. The rhetoric heated up when some members began to publically call for sex to be based purely on verbal consent, a law like the policy on sexual conduct at Antioch College.

Comparable worth legislation was campaigned for, as was forced paternal leave. The feminists wanted men to have to take the same amount of leave from work to care for a baby as women. At the time, either men or women got to take a year off work – and this could be split purely as the couple decided. Predictably, this wasn't good enough, because the patriarchy was still forcing women to take most of the leave. The movement even inspired Jane Fonda and Eve Ensler to campaign on behalf of the movement.

These feminists also supported the suppression of gender-specific behavior of boys and girls in preschool and early childhood. Take a note that, in Sweden, after the year of parental leave, children are shunted into state-run nanny care. Their push has helped result in now the abolition of he/she pronouns used by government workers – the word is now "hen" for all children. This leads to what the major parties did in reaction to the initial popularity of FI.

The major parties realized the threat this party posed

The major parties and the government began to change some of their positions. First, they allowed for free artificial insemination for lesbian couples, regardless of formal status. Second, was the upgrade of homosexual relations from registered partnerships to full marriage. Third, was pushing forced female participation on corporate boards. Even — in that spring — feminist outrage cancelled the Miss Sweden pageant.

However, the real impetus – being anti-male – began to seep through. What kicked off the public's souring on the party started with the release of the movie "The Gender War." This movie described in detail how radical and how anti-male shelters for women are in Sweden. A feminist activist in the movie stated that half of women in Sweden are victims of male violence, a clearly false claim. Further complicating matters was a positive reference to the SCUM Manifesto – most specifically the quote, "To call a man an animal is to flatter him: he's a machine, a walking dildo." The director of Sweden's women's shelther, Under Von Wachenfeldt, agreed with statement, saying: "Yes, man is an animal.

Don’t you agree?”

The public began to sour on the movement at this point, and the upcoming convention for the party leading up to the 2006 elections did nothing to help the party. The convention, in sum, was a disaster.

The above pictured Tiina Rosenburg gave a speech at the conference, which both was met with thunderous approval and disgust from convention attenders and the media. Her speech was famous for her exhortation that women who sleep with men are “traitors to their gender.” Further, the fools at the conference, in order to combat heteropatriarchal norms, mandated that there were no “formal leaders.” However, when you have women telling other women that if they have sex with men that they are traitors, then you clearly have leaders. There was more male-hating garbage from the convention, but it is fairly predictable fare. Men are the cause of all that is evil, men are all rapists or rape supporters, etc.

Public support faded fast

In response to the “perception” they hated men, they tried to find a male feminist to promote onto their director’s board, but the male chosen declined to take on prestigious position. They continued to tail off bad in the lead up the election. At polling time, they registered only 0.68% of the vote – far belong the level needed to get into the Riksdag. A complete and utter failure.

In its aftermath, let’s consider the anger that underpins the feminist movement. I have long thought anger in the feminist movement was motivated by psychology – a manifestation of obsessive compulsive personality disorder. Instead of being outright bullies – while some feminists are – most are just severe and over-the-top enforcers of “the rules.” You see this in the idea of rape culture.

While a strain of blank-slatism and authoritarianism runs through the theory, part of the impetus is a bizarre adherence to the rules. “You aren’t supposed to rape!!!! If you rape, you are violating the rules!!!” Even though rape laws exist and feminists have changed laws and approaches, rape still exists. So, feminists assume it must be some deficiency on the part of the laws – or rules – instead of individual psychology and biology.

While I do think part of this obsession stems from female biology (women are far more likely to adhere to authority and submit to dominant people), another part stems from this idea that if the rules are changed, then the world will change. However, this is also a form of narcissism, as feminists demand the world around them change in order to sort out their own internal conflicts. Of course, this never works out, as the only person who can change your mindset is you. I have repeatedly seen this at feminist blogs — such as Eve Bit First — with the projection of violent fantasies of rape, murder and freaky sexual behavior onto men.

Sometimes, they just blame men for their thoughts. Mostly, though, they just claim that these sorts of thoughts are the typical sort of thoughts that swill through the mind of the average male. Changing the rules won’t prevent bad thoughts or bad actions (generally), nor will they save you from your own ability to come to grips with your own inner turmoil, nor your ability to understand men.

Feminist demands continue

As the world, haltingly and slowly, stumbles towards their “gender utopia,” the prospect looms of feminists dealing with their anger and hate. It is not surprising at all that the demands and accusations mount and become increasingly insistent. The day came long ago for feminists to judge themselves in the mirror, in my opinion; but for feminists, the day is coming faster and faster.

Just how an alcoholic fears having the sauce taken away from them, feminists fear losing their mindset to hate, blame and fear men. It saves them from the painful and very real process of coming to grips with reality. It is no surprise that the more radical a feminist is, the higher the numbers of male rapists in her mind becomes. As aforementioned, a feminist claimed half of Swedish women were subject to male violence – that is not just an astounding number, but emblematic of the fact that there is a direct correlation between a feminist's anti-male bias and her belief in how many women are victims of male violence.

In sum, the FI was an abortion of a political movement that got a disturbing level of initial support. Given that the feminist hamster is combative, angry and hateful, it did not take long for itself to uncloak itself and show off its true identity. Some moderate "feminists" noted that making all men pay for domestic violence shelters implies all men are part of the problem is wrong. She is right, but FI would completely agree that all men are part of the problem. Given their support of the Society for Cutting Up Men manifesto, these feminists see men as an oppositional force.

In another view, however, these women just hate themselves. Unable to come to grips with their sexuality, psychology and upbringing, they decide to blame Daddy – or just every person with a dick. What a loss.

Why Supplements Are A Waste Of Money

March 9, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

I've taken too many supplement to count over the course of my weightlifting career–everything from pre-workout powders and BCAAs to multivitamins and fish-oils.

But over the last year I've taken the fitness red pill and seen the truth:

Supplements don't do shit for you.

I'm going to break the most popular supplements down one by one, and explain why you don't need them.

1. Multivitamins

Long hailed as a cornerstone of the American diet, these pills' actual effectiveness has been called into question recently.

In late 2013, a trio of studies conducted by researchers at Johns Hopkins, the University of Warwick, and the American College of Physicians were released in the Annals of Internal Medicine.

What did they find?

> In conclusion, β-carotene, vitamin E, and possibly high doses of vitamin A supplements are harmful. Other antioxidants, folic acid and B vitamins, and multivitamin and mineral supplements are ineffective for preventing mortality or morbidity due to major chronic diseases. Although available evidence does not rule out small benefits or harms or large benefits or harms in a small subgroup of the population, we believe that the case is closed— supplementing the diet of well-nourished adults with (most) mineral or vitamin supplements has no clear benefit and might even be harmful. These vitamins should not be used for chronic disease prevention. Enough is enough.

No cloudy words or unclear results are found here. The authors of these studies firmly believe that multivitamins have been proven ineffective, and even potentially harmful to your health.

The release of these studies led to an inevitable backlash from the supplement industry and other doctors, all in support of multivitamins. And quite honestly – I'm not sure who to believe. There's conflicting evidence out there.

The one thing I am sure of is that the best route we can all take is to eat a varied diet that includes fruits and vegetables. Yes, I sound like your grandmother, but it's true. It's the only way to guarantee that you'll properly digest all of the nutrients your body needs to thrive.

2. Pre-workout Powder

This shit has been flying off the shelves of your local GNC for the past few years. At least 90% of guys ages 18-30 I know who lift weights take this stuff.

Hell, even I do from time to time.

Why? Because it makes you feel like an absolute monster. Seriously, it makes you believe that you could put the whole world on your shoulders – and then squat it four or five times. But guess what. It doesn't do shit. I can lift just as much weight as I can with a pre-workout drink, without one. All it does it make you feel like a boss.

Read their marketing campaigns and product labels. They promote increased energy and focus, not added muscle or reduced fat. Not even more strength. And this truth boils down to one very basic fact: the main active ingredient in the vast majority of pre-workout supplements is caffeine. That's right, the same thing that you get in a standard cup of morning joe.

From time to time you'll see one get banned. And it's always because it had something stronger inside: a more intense stimulant.

So next time you need that pre-workout push, grab some coffee instead. It's cheaper, more natural, and doesn't contain one hundred extra ingredients you've never heard of (and can't even pronounce).

Better yet, just push through your fatigue and be a man. One good set of heavy squats or rows will have you buzzing like a bee.

3. Creatine

Creatine is an organic acid, naturally synthesized by our bodies from several amino acids, that helps to supply energy to the cells of the body, especially in skeletal muscle.

It has the ability to rapidly regenerate ATP (adenosine triphosphate). This assists in sustaining high intensity muscular efforts for up to 10 seconds.

Supplementing creatine while lifting weights ensures high levels of the acid in the body, and has been shown to increase muscle mass and improve strength. It's normal to gain 4 to 5 pounds when beginning supplementation, as creatine causes as osmotic effect that draws more water into the muscles.

But I still don't recommend taking it. The observed strength increase is minimal, a percentage of the population has been shown to be non-responders (i.e. it doesn't even work for everyone), and it's just one more thing to make sure you take every day.

But it is cheap, so go for it if you really want to.

4. Protein Powder

Pretty sure he took something else

I'm going to make this very clear: protein powder is a food, not a supplement.

It's just a processed form of protein.

And I'm actually not going to tell you not to buy it.

If you have trouble consuming a sufficient level of protein (current research suggest no more than 0.8 grams of protein per day per pound body weight for strength athletes), then protein powder is an easy and relatively cheap way to get you there. But it's not required. And getting enough protein is not difficult with normal foods.

So don't be tricked into thinking that downing a couple scoops of protein powder after a workout is going to do something magical.

The 2 Exceptions: Fish Oil and Vitamin D

There are two supplements that I do take.

If you don't regularly eat fatty fish (like salmon) then supplementing a few grams of fish oil every day is a good call.

Various studies have shown numerous general health benefits from supplementing fish oil (namely decreased risk of cardiovascular disease). It also has a positive effect on insulin sensitivity, making it potentially helpful for your muscle building goals.

The other pill that I pop is vitamin D3. Vitamin D3 is only synthesized by our bodies when we have a solid amount of exposure to the sun. So if you live somewhere where you're not getting exposed to sunlight regularly, then it's a good idea to buy and take a vitamin D3 supplement.

The dangers of incurring a vitamin D3 deficiency are numerous. It's been shown to compromise the immune system and even lead to softening of the bones.

Why Manchester United Footballer Adnan Januzaj Is On The Right Track

March 10, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

If you've been reading ROK for a while, you may be familiar with my advocacy for the necessity of the redpill for young men. I've insisted that game is necessary for them, and provided several examples in order to illustrate this point.

Today I'd like to change things up a bit. I've spent plenty of time talking about the young men who are operating incorrectly with regard to game and the embrace of the red pill. Now it is time to talk about a young man who is doing things the right way.

Meet Adnan Januzaj:

Januzaj (pronounced “yan-ooz-eye”) is a 19 year old professional footballer (soccer player). Born in Brussels to parents of Albanian heritage, Januzaj currently plays for Manchester United in the English Premier League, one of the world’s biggest teams in arguably the world’s most popular football league. Despite his young age, he has been able to contribute regularly this season as an 18 year old (he turned 19 last month).

This ability to perform at such a high level so early (this is only his first professional season) has led many to consider him one of the brightest teenaged talents in the game, with the expectation that he could become a superstar in a few years’ time. He is already being compared to the greats of the game.

The kid is a star with the world at his fingertips. He’s young, he’s got a bit of fame, and he’s rich. Naturally, this has led to plenty of female attention, some of it from ladies with less than noble intentions. One could be forgiven for maintaining a great deal of concern for the youth and his ability to deal with all of these pursuers without getting taken advantage of. Such concern would have been wasted on young Adnan, however. He knows exactly what he’s doing:

> No bedroom revelations to embarrass young Adnan, thankfully, but rather the > source of student Melissa McKenzie's dissatisfaction was the £30,000-a-week star's choice of venue – budget chicken joint Nando's.

> Melissa, 25, was also peeved Januzaj turned up in tracksuit bottoms and trainers and let her pay for parking after she had allegedly picked him up from a street corner where his mum had dropped him off.
> 'I've never met anyone so stingy in my life,' Melissa told The Sun. 'I was so excited for the first date. We met on a social network site and I got all dressed up and even got my make-up done – costing me £30.
> 'I expected him to come to me in a flashy car, but I ended up driving him about in my old blue Fiesta and I was left to pay and display. Then he said he was taking me to Nando's – my face fell.
> 'I usually go there for a quick bite to eat with my mates. I didn't expect to be going there on a date with a Man United footballer, especially in my dress and heels.'
> The paper reports that Januzaj did fork out £18 for dinner before the evening moved on to to a three-star hotel, where the pair watched The X Factor.
> Melissa claims the forward then asked to be driven home at 9pm, and alas the romance ultimately led nowhere.

In a world increasingly dominated by incredibly desperate and needy young men willing to do anything and everything to impress even mediocre women, I think young Januzaj has given a good account of himself here.

Melissa Mckenzie is the picture of female entitlement. She complains about where Januzaj decided to take her and how much he decided to spend, as if this kid is obligated to spend extra money on her just because he has it. The way she speaks, you would almost assume that this female is automatically worth the extra cash, just because she happens to be going out with a dude who can afford it. What makes her worth it? Why is she so special? What did she do to justify all the money and attention she seems to feel entitled to?

Too often these questions go unconsidered in our society. This is because young men in our society have a tendency to simply assume a responsibility to throw money at attractive women regardless of what they've done (or not done) to prove themselves worthy of it. The fact that these females look alright and possess vaginas is enough to convince these young men to spend a lot on them. This type of supplication is common, and it builds entitlement in many young females: they come to expect and, to some extent, demand a high price for their company because they understand that there are plenty of simps out there ready to pay it. Men with a very strong sense of how to build real attraction in these women (read: men with a lot of game) can overcome this demand, but it is not easy to do and has gotten harder as more money has been thrown around. Thirsty simps make the game harder for everyone.

Young Januzaj, however, has proven so far not to be part of that problem. The kid's play was perfect. This entire debacle exposes her as an entitled attention whoring gold-digger. She was just in it for the flash and the cash, and when she didn't get it (and she was so very certain that she absolutely deserved to get spent on lavishly with money she didn't earn from a kid she barely knew), the first thing she did was run off to the media to try and earn her 15 minutes of fame. He saw right through her and treated her precisely as she deserved to be treated. She was worth very little investment, and he made sure not to provide much.

In quickly doing away with this gold-digger and neglecting to invest substantially in her as she expected, Januzaj displayed a good understanding of red pill reality. Unlike most young men blinded by blue-pill delusion, he didn't simply assume the need to wine and dine a decent looking female simply for being female. Whereas many young men supplicate and almost desperately seek to buy the affection of the women they pursue with money or unearned praise, Januzaj stood strong. He waited for her to prove herself worthy of a serious investment, and she quickly failed the test.

Here's hoping that more young men come to embrace and understand such sensible processes of romantic thought. Young Januzaj has provided an example worth emulating. Play on, my youth. Play on.

Truman Sacks MacArthur: A Lesson In Leadership

March 10, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I have long been a student of the Korean War. It has many compelling dimensions to it—political, military, social, personal, diplomatic—and any one of these facets makes it a fruitful field for study. I also had the good fortune to live and travel in Korea for over a year, and developed some sympathy for the people and the culture. One revealing episode that occurred during the war has come to stand for the principle of ultimate civilian control over the military. This was the removal of General Douglas MacArthur by President Truman in 1951.

It is difficult today to grasp fully the awe in which MacArthur was held by the American public in the early 1950s. He had been in the public eye in one way or another since the early 1930s, and had cultivated his public image in such a way as to appear as a military genius sitting atop Mount Olympus. A major figure in the defeat of Japan in the Pacific in the Second World War, he had remained in Japan as an administrator, ruling the country with Oriental remoteness and absolutism. Long accustomed to doing what he wanted and adept at insubordination, he had been indulged by his superiors for so long that he came to believe himself beyond scrutiny. His nominal bosses, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, were actually afraid of him; and MacArthur, an expert political infighter, knew how to keep them off balance with a mixture of drama, innuendo, and veiled threats.

He was a man of contradictions. As superintendent of West Point, he proved himself an efficient administrator and progressive reformer; in the Second World War, he showed his tactical brilliance on many occasions; and in Korea, his amphibious landing at Inchon turned the tide of the war and came within an ace of winning it. Charismatic, highly intelligent, and brave, he could also be vain, spiteful, pathologically insecure, and jealous of colleagues and subordinates.

MacArthur's gamble at the Inchon landings in 1950 had been brilliantly successful. He had pulled off a masterstroke, outflanking the North Koreans who just weeks earlier had had the US and South Koreans boxed into a steadily shrinking perimeter around Pusan. Against all the naysayers, he had triumphed; the North Koreans, in full retreat, seemed now close to complete collapse. As he moved into North Korea and plunged northward, he committed two unforgiveable military blunders: he divided his forces for separate northward advances, and he refused to listen to intelligence reports that China was preparing an all-out invasion in support of its beleaguered North Korean ally.

But the Chinese did enter the war, and with both feet. MacArthur's forces were sent reeling back down the peninsula. The US Army came close to full collapse; the US Marines, with their superior discipline and cohesiveness, were only with great difficulty able to extricate themselves from the frozen wastes of the Chosin Reservoir. The situation deeply shocked MacArthur; his carelessness and vanity had been responsible for the disaster, yet he refused to accept any measure of blame.

Losing the war on the ground and increasingly divorced from reality, he reverted to living in his fantasies. MacArthur's public statements became more and more provocative. He began to openly challenge US policy in the Far East: he threatened to "unleash" Chiang Kai-Shek in Taiwan on the communist Chinese mainland, and to widen the war beyond Korea. In increasingly bombastic and insubordinate public statements, he appeared to endorse to use of atomic bombs on China and the Soviet Union, and, even worse, edged towards suggesting the inadequacy of President Truman's leadership. Repeated attempts to admonish him and rein him in came to nothing. Like a spoiled child who had been indulged too often, MacArthur's behavior by 1951 had become nearly impossible to correct. Thus was the stage set for one of the most dramatic confrontations in the history of American politico-military affairs.

The National Security Agency (NSA), newly created in 1947, routinely monitored communications of both friends and foes of the US from its monitoring station at Atsugi Air Base near Tokyo. Intercepts of MacArthur's conversations with foreign diplomats (mainly Spain and Portugal) demonstrated his inclination to widen the war outside Korea, so as to destroy the communist Chinese and chasten the USSR. When Truman was briefed on MacArthur's machinations, he was furious. It simply could not be tolerated. Even without these secret conversations, Truman had enough evidence of his general's insubordination—from MacArthur's professionally suicidal public statements questioning US policy in Korea–to justify his sacking of MacArthur. He had finally forced Truman's hand.

All that remained was to notify MacArthur of his firing. To spare MacArthur embarrassment, it was decided to have a courier quietly hand-deliver the relief notice to the general's home in Tokyo. Everyone involved was sworn to secrecy. But somehow the message traffic got stalled, and then a loose-lipped official in Tokyo leaked the story to a reporter. Panic seized the Truman administration. It was feared that, if MacArthur got wind of his firing before being officially notified, he might make some sort of grandstanding speech to the press to further sabotage US policy in Korea.

Truman's only option was to preempt MacArthur by calling a press conference at one o'clock in the morning on April 11, 1951. Truman's announcement to the press was terse and resolute. "With deep regret" he declared that he believed MacArthur was "unable to give his whole-hearted support" to US policies in Korea. "For that reason I repeat my regret at the necessity for the action I feel compelled to take in this case." It was unfortunate that these circumstances—rousing reporters in the dead of night for a press conference–made the firing of MacArthur seem a rushed, impetuous, and irrational act by Truman, which was in fact untrue.

The comic opera continued, and had one final act. MacArthur found out about his sacking in the worst way possible: a colleague heard it on the radio, who then called MacArthur's wife to inform her that her husband had been "relieved of all his commands." When the general himself finally got the official notice, he hugged his wife and said, "Jeannie, we're going home at last."

On his return to the US, MacArthur addressed a joint session of Congress with a masterpiece of oratory. He then went on a speaking tour of America. The fallout was devastating. Feeling ran high against Truman, who had already been deeply unpopular on account of the little-understood Korean War. Truman wisely laid low until the storm passed, but the public deeply resented his removal of MacArthur, and Truman's political enemies made the most of it. But the public, easily led astray by hero-worship and prone to emotionalism, is almost never on the side of wisdom and restraint.

As time has given us some perspective on the matter, it is clear that Truman's removal of MacArthur was an act of deep courage, taken under circumstances that Truman knew would expose himself to hatred and retaliation from MacArthur's political friends in Congress. But MacArthur had had it coming, and he knew it. He had stonewalled on his orders, had expressed open contempt for his president, had conspired against his nation's policies behind the scenes, and had failed on the battlefield.

In the history of armed conflict, no removal of a wartime general has been as justified, and as necessary, as the removal of MacArthur. It is a leadership lesson that resonates with us today, wherever lawful authority is fundamentally challenged by the malignant brew of charisma, hubris, and guile. And so the fates of men and nations may hinge on the denouement of these fateful contests.

What American Women Watch On Netflix

March 10, 2014 | by General Stalin | Link | Original Link

We live in an age where everyone is connected. It merely takes a few keystrokes, a click, and a scroll to get the low-down on someone's life, interests, location, education and job history, contact information, people they hang out with, places they go, and generally the type of person they are. This can all be done without ever having to meet a person or speak to him at all. You no longer have to spend time with people to understand them or see what their true wants and desires are.

The kind of media people consume is often very telling of their aspirations and inclinations. I find that observing the kinds of books, movies, or TV shows a person enjoys is often an indication of the individual's inner propensities and view of one's self and the world around him. You can draw conclusions about a person's emotional state, self-esteem, self-consciousness, world views, and a number of other cues about an individual by what the person chooses to absorb into the meat between the ears.

I casually dated a girl off and on for 6 months a couple of years back. She was an unscrupulous, flaky, opportunistic, selfish, masculine, and generally very textbook American 20-something female who we all know and love. Tons of tattoos and piercings, #singlegirlproblems, being single and trying to "find herself," at the bars every weekend riding the carousel, loves cats too much, abruptly chopped all of her beautiful hair off, etc. She was a solid 8 before she cut her hair like a little boy and started to gain weight after her and I parted ways, but I digress. During our tenure, she added her Netflix account to my Playstation 3 and never changed her password or bothered to remove my device from her account. I enjoyed free Netflix steaming for well over a year and a half. Thanks.

We are talking about a typical single American girl living in an apartment with 1-3 other typical single American girls all in their mid-20's. Needless to say, between the booze, dick, and drama, they watched a decent amount of garbage on Netflix. I was able to glean candid information on these girls' interests, desires, and mentality from the content of their "Recently Watched" list, as well as the categories and projected ratings that would pop up. The bulk of this data can be lumped into three primary categories.

Sexually Deviant Movies and Documentaries

This honestly made up the majority of recently watched and recommended titles. Countless documentaries about porn, prostitution, sexual fetishes, obscure and graphic gay and lesbian movies, etc. It was abundant. The dashboard was rife with "Raunchy Gay & Lesbian Films," "Women & Sex," so on and so forth. I was blown away by how interested these girls were in the degenerate underbelly of the sex industry and stories of shameless promiscuity and indignity.

From this it was obvious what these sluts had on their minds. A case of narcissistic, emasculated, debaucherous girls unable to get or keep a good man around (generally by choice) starting the "Sex and the City" lifestyle early. I learned that a small group of average white single American girls, who grew up in nice neighborhoods with good families, cared far more about sex than romance. I hardly ever saw a romantic comedy or critically acclaimed tear-jerker on there.

These girls were independent and sucking up the indoctrinated feminist life-style just as they have been programmed too. All of them in and out of community college chasing worthless degrees in fruitless and unprofitable majors as they try to "find themselves." Out partying and bar-hopping, bouncing from dick to dick, living life in the fast lane of a dead-end highway with the wall fast approaching. entitled, shallow, and shameless.

But wait, it gets more stereotypical…

Rape/Victim/Independent-Female Lead Movies

A close second on the list of frequented movie genres that these uncouth thirsty broads would eat up was movies about independent females being victimized. “The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo,” “Last House on the Left,” “I Spit On Your Grave,” the list goes on. An obvious tell of submissive and domination complexs. Of course these women get off on rape fantasy and jarringly violent sexual encounters – and what strong, independent, I’m-a-tough-bitch-and-proud girl doesn’t enjoy tails of masculine female heroism and revenge?

These are movies where women get to have their cake and eat it too. They get to live out brutal domination or rape fantasies and simultaneously experience enacting a vendetta on all the men that they feel “took advantage” of them so they can feel powerful, self-reliant, and socially immune.

This tells me that single women want to be fucked raw and treated like filth by bad-boy miscreants, but they also want to make these men suffer for not showing them respect and honoring their strength and independence. These stories are relatable to American women because rape culture, female independence, and the image of strength-through-adversity in women is huge in narcissistic Western culture. These movies are always about some woman being alone, often times under some form of emotional duress – like most American women.

Trashy Reality TV

“Teen Mom,” “16 and Pregnant,” and that whole bit, peppered with “Family Guy” and other staples of shallow American television. This sort of thing is obviously not surprising in the least. Contrived drama to satiate their desires for surface level emotional stimuli. These women are damaged goods and thrive off of the negative energy of seeing disgusting people making poor life decisions and getting into shit so they feel better about their own lives.

Women love this garbage. Immature conflict they can criticize in contrast to their own lives to feed the ego. Couple this with a steady stream of attention-whoring Facebook posts and pictures of them and their friends drinking and looking empowered, and you have a potent cocktail of self-validation and feigned independence.

Rough sex, independence, and drama. This is the steady diet of today's American woman. It goes without saying that the supplied media is right in line with current social norms – this is a catch 22 paradox. Are women watching this stuff because the underlying ideology is pushed on them, or is this content popular because it is what women want to watch these days? Likely a steady mix of both. The American media machine is well-oiled and meticulously designed to pluck the strings of the sociopolitical instrument.

She has since changed her Netflix password so I was obligated to breakdown and pay the $7.99/month for my own. As far as I know, the rampant narcissism, you-go-girlism, attention-whoring, actual-whoring, and consumption of audiovisual tripe still goes on in that apartment, as it does in countless other dwellings of white, middle-class female 20-somethings. Bears still shit in the woods and sloots still gonna sloot, as they say.

Effective immediately, any one who replies to a female on this web site will be immediately banned. And don't try to get sneaky by addressing a female comment outside of the thread she started. There will be no appeal, and if you try to return under another disqus account, that will be banned too. I've realized the problem is not just females commenting here, but the men who reply to their stupid comments. As always, females and homos will also be banned.

Do You Have The Poker Mindset?

March 10, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

One of the main reasons why men love RoK is for its excellent male orientated information, that helps us improve ourselves. Christian McQueen's article on How to Control Your Emotions With Women is an perfect example, although one could argue that you need to control your emotions in all walks of life. Even in professional settings people will tolerate the occasional girly breakdown, but a man and a leader must never show his weaknesses, least of all emotionally.

With this in mind, and with thanks to Cody Stark, I want to recommended the book "The Poker Mindset."

Why would you care about having a Poker Mindset ?

I always try to think outside the box, and while some people might abhor the gambling mentality, there is goodness and learning to be had in any arena. For myself I work in the financial markets, so it's very important for me to avoid a gambling frame of mind, especially where I am gambling purely for entertainment since that is a guaranteed loss.

While stock market experts might like to pretend that the financial markets are not a giant gamble, history begs to differ, as do the millions of unnamed traders who have lost their pants. Reading any book about gambling might seem to be the antithesis of what a financial market expert would want to do, but I found in this book the secrets to some of my worst failures, not only in the stock markets but also in everyday life. The psychological approach of the authors, both accomplished professional poker players, can be directly related to game or any professional pursuit.

On a purely vain level, the thought of being that cool headed poker ace who reads his opponents perfectly and sweeps the pot, is certainly a worthy masculine goal and applying it to real life instead of a card game is going to change the rules you play by. This is literally one of the most eye opening books I've read. Knowing mistakes and flaws in your personality, psychology, and approach is very different to consciously rationalizing them and putting a new frame in play.

What authors Ian Taylor and Matthew Hilger do is breakdown a myriad of more complex psychological errors and categorize them. I find myself wavering most dangerously between several of their descriptions. Before we get into those in detail, here are a few pieces of advice from the book. It's a quite concise and easy read, so I won't go into too much depth; just give you a few tasty treats, which apply to life as well as poker games.

> Is "Average" Acceptable?
> If you're an average player at poker, then you are losing money. Poker is one endeavor where average is simply not good enough.
> Risk Aversion
> No matter what attitude a poker player has toward risk in his everyday life, he > must adopt a risk-neutral attitude when sitting at the poker table.

> Greed
> When playing poker, you need to get rid of all pretenses that greed is a bad thing. Greed is not only acceptable when playing poker, it is vital.
> Woolly thinking
> Any line of thought that contains a logical flaw — any deduction that, when you break it down, does not make sense. The problem when playing poker is that every decision is important and every bit of woolly thinking will cost you money.
> ■ Considering irrelevant variables
> ■ Misunderstanding probability
> ■ Results-based thinking
> ■ Spurious regression
> ■ Acting on principle
> ■ Superstition

As you can see, much of this can be applied to real life, and especially to game. I recall going out one night with a nerdy but extroverted software programmer who said he had his lucky leather jacket on and was going to get laid. Obviously he'd met a chick in it one time, but this is called spurious regression or plain superstition. Needless to say despite my best efforts we wound up solo in a burger joint at 4am. Lucky jacket be damned.

Another important factor to consider is what is known as tilt. This is when a player goes on a losing streak. It can be set off by any number of minor factors. For example a hot 9, blows you out and laughs in your face in front of her BFF and your wingman. Suddenly you lose all confidence and begin approaching girls with the mindset to fail on purpose. You're subconsciously out to prove you are a loser. When this has happened to me in the financial markets, I've demolished months of hard profits and what's worse is that my tilts have been caused by something as silly as some workers outside my apartment drilling the road, or getting blown out by a chick last weekend. It had nothing to do with my work at all. The book lays out many types of tilt and how to avoid them. I never heard this term before so it's probably saved me a small fortune.

However the best section of the book in my opinion is the characterizations. Here is quick summary.

> LOSERS :
> The newbie
> New players will be trying to find their feet in the game.
> The casual player
> Casual players make up a large proportion of the poker-playing population, and so appearance-wise at least, they are difficult to stereotype. The best way to identify casual players is by their demeanor and playing style. They will know how to play the game and will not normally appear nervous. They play the game for fun, as evidenced by their words and actions.

The catch is that most casual players don't think they only play for fun. In fact, most of them will say they play for money. In reality, though, they are almost all long-term losers because they don't play the game the way it should be played. They want to win, but only on their terms. Like the newbies, casual players tend to play too loosely / too passively, because that is the way they want to play.

The gambler

Gamblers play neither for fun nor to win in the classic sense (although both elements are a factor). They play because they enjoy the buzz of gambling; they want to get their money in the pot and then see if they've won. For this reason, they are nearly always loose, and often aggressive, too. They might or might not be deceptive.

The rock

The rock is a pedestrian and predictable opponent. He will play in a very tight, passive, and straightforward style that allows him to lose his money very slowly or maybe even eek out a profit in certain games. If he raises, then he will nearly always have a very good hand.

The bully

The bully's main motivation is to be in charge of the table. He wants 'Z win, but more pressingly, he wants to play in a style that will make Other players fear him. His ego, rather than good poker sense, tends to make his decisions. Bullies generally play a loose, aggressive style, not only because this is the style most likely to intimidate other players, but also because it matches their personality somewhat.

The developing player

When a new player sets off on the road to becoming a winning player, he will usually go through several stages before he learns all the intricacies of the game. He is keen and pays close attention to the game, but his play is raw and he will make mistakes (and often beat himself up over them).

The speculative player

Speculative players play to win but do not have the discipline to play a tight-aggressive style, so they try to win with a loose-aggressive one instead. They can be quite dangerous to play against because they are difficult to put on a hand and generally play well post-flop. Sometimes they are winners, but often they cannot play well enough to overcome the trash hands they are starting with.

WINNERS :

The nit

The word "nit" has been used to describe a lot of different players over the years, > but most commonly refers to a tight player who is generally unfriendly and pedantic. Nits are usually marginal winners who are very careful about the games they play and will never leave their comfort zone. Although they are rarely big winners, they do play to win rather than just for fun.

> The robot
> Robots are winning players who play a generally good game of poker. They do not win as much as they could because they tend to play very mechanically, without paying as much attention to the game as they should. This is sometimes because they don't enjoy the game that much, sometimes because they are lazy, and sometimes because they treat poker more like a job and simply go through the motions.
> The shark
> The shark is a strong player who not only plays good poker but also Studies the particulars of the game he is in and adapts accordingly. The shark wants to make money, plain and simple. He probably enjoys the game, too, but his primary motivation is always making the decision that gives him the best expectation.

Going back to Christian's article about controlling emotions, we see that we want to be in the shark category. You cannot jump here immediately—it's a slow process and one I am just getting to with my work in the financial markets. The shark has put in the hard yards and survived many mistakes and setbacks and ironed out any trace of the other categories.

The book lays out many psychological strategies that you can implement on your journey to becoming emotionally neutral. One of the ideas I like best, is the concept of the person buying a chocolate bar, who pays, opens it and then drops it on the dirty floor. Many people will then deny themselves from the chocolate entirely. This is of course wolly thinking that prevents you from getting back into the game. If you want a bar, you just buy another one. Your mistake is irrelevant. Abundance mentality is paramount. Just because you failed first time, doesn't mean you will automatically fail the second time. In fact, you're going to be twice as careful not to drop the bar since you've paid for it twice.

I think this book can help anyone who wants to improve their psychology and approach to life, business, game, money making, and women. It is of course filled with poker terms, but you can gloss over those and take the main psychological components for yourself. I always disliked gambling because it makes crap entertainment and is a dreadful way to make money, but once you understand the professional process, you also understand the same mindset is behind just about anything you want to succeed at. Whats more, being mindful about how to handle losses, failure and set backs without losing frame can make you unstoppable.

Women Don’t Care Where You Get Your Money As Long As You Spend It On Them

March 11, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

If you were to ask me what percent of the loans that came across my desk were worthy of funding, I would say in 15 years and out of literally thousands of applications—5.

There were really only 5 people I would have lent money to.

The rest were either on the brink of bankruptcy, insolvent, or hopeless financial wrecks that had no capacity to ever pay us back.

But while you may be envisioning poor wrecks, bums off the street, truly destitute people applying for loans, the truth is most of the applicants were very well dressed, all drove luxury imported cars, and always seemed to have a trophy wife or trophy girlfriend. Of course when I was younger I didn’t get it. I couldn’t understand why beautiful, young ladies would be attracted to old, financially insolvent shysters who pissed away their money. But as I aged I realized that for the most part, these girls were too naive and stupid to be able to read a balance sheet, let alone know the difference between debt and equity spending. And thus, when these frauds inevitably filed for bankruptcy and had to sell the house, it was a shocker to “Bambi the Trophy Wife Ditz” and she would invariably leave the man. Therefore, when I wrote my first book about the housing crisis I came up with a financial dictum:

“Women don’t know the difference between debt and equity spending.”

However, allow me to introduce two items. One, this article by Dr. Helen. In it she cites a study where men with fancy cars enjoy a success rate of 24% when approaching women. Men with “average cars” enjoy a rate of about half that. And men with “poor cars” only succeed about 8% of the time. Two, a buddy of mine who I just recently saw at the gym. He’s a great guy. Hard worker, but doesn’t have a ton of money. Matter of fact asked me about some financial advice. But why then, when leaving the gym, did I see his car which is a luxury car? He can barely afford it, and if he got rid of it most of his financial problems would go away.

Then it hit me. Not only do women not know the difference between debt and equity spending, but…

they don't care.

Once you spend money on a woman realize you have forfeited all ownership and control of that money. You can't get your money back when she eats it in the form of sushi or drinks it in the form of a flirtini. You can't get your money back when you buy her fake tits. And you can't get your money back when you sign up for that 3 year, 36,000 limited mile lease on that luxury car so she can parade herself in front of all her female friends. In other words, women don't care how you got the money, as long as you spend it on them.

Sadly as the study Dr. Helen cites and the empirical behavior of women proves, women use men's spending as a screening tool to select the "best man." This presents a problem because it can easily result in an escalating arms race where men have to outspend each other. This can spiral out of control as men sacrifice their financial stability (and futures) all to hopefully get a little play in the end. Worse still it provides a sexual and psychological disincentive to be fiscally austere and frugal which is what every 20 something and 30 something man should be, arguably until death.

So what is a horny little 20 something man to do?

First, realize the way to win the game is not to play. Unless you are truly rich, you cannot afford to play this game. Inevitably you will run out of money and will not be able to keep up the facade. It is a lose-lose situation and you are putting girls ahead of yourself if you do decide to play.

Second, faux-play this game on the cheap. You can always wear fancy clothes. You can always groom yourself to look like a million bucks. You can always make it look like you have money without having to resort to blowing $50,000 on a car. Choose the cheap options to make you look rich, not the expensive ones.

Third, aim to be the badboy. I've said it before and I'll say it again, bad boy motorcyclist trumps 42 year old investment banker. This means lifting weights, maybe getting a tattoo, and learning to ride a motorcycle. It also means getting all the commensurate attire that goes with it. Leather vest, pumped arms, you basically want to look like Danny from "Counts Kustoms." It may take effort, but it's infinitely cheaper and infinitely better for your checkbook to be a bad boy than a fake Country Club, BMW-driving poser.

You follow that advice and not only will you avoid the self-destructive spending-arms race, you'll avoid becoming the hated $30K Millionaire.

An Ode To The Resolutioners Who Are Making It

March 11, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Resolutioners, as Urban Dictionary puts it, are;

> …a new or rarely seen gym member who's sudden appearance has undoubtedly been brought about by a personal resolution to "get in shape."
> The Resolutioner is viewed as somewhat of a nuisance by regular gym patrons because their commitment to fitness is often only temporary (usually fading within 2-8 weeks of initial sighting). In the mean time, the Resolutioner succeeds only in crowding up the gym's limited floor space, sweating up the machines, and generally interfering with the workouts of more hardcore gym members.

Now, there's enough hate out there for resolutioners by those in the fitness community and it's pointless for me to add my contempt for those who join the gym and drop out after a short span – besides, others get the point across is far more hilariously entertaining ways.

What I'd like to do, in this so short it barely qualifies as an article and really is more of an ass kissing letter, is to congratulate those resolutioners who stuck to their personal resolutions of becoming fit. It takes an incredible amount of will power to not only get your butt into the gym but to keep it there regularly week after week and month after month.

We live in a society which increasingly wants us all to be mediocre and below average, so that those who refuse to rise up and become something better then they are won't feel so pathetic for their piss poor life choices. But some men out there have nutted up and made the right choice for themselves.

I've been going to my gym since I first moved to this city in August, and sure enough it was a relative ghost town until January first when it filled up like a night club. By the time

February rolled around it had dropped back to it's normal, plenty of open space – but there were a few new faces in there which had shown up in January and stuck with it. Some have already made noticeable changes, and others are well on the right path. They've passed the two month point, having made it to March, and show no signs of slowing down.

It's heart warming to see these guys who – in the words of the ever controversial Zyzz – are gonna make it. They've put their money down, got their ass in the gym and have joined the 10% rank of gym goers who actually stick with their new healthy lifestyle instead of quietly dropping out to cultivate their beer bellies and fat, cottage cheese thighs. I know a few guys who hate the idea of there being more fit or outright shredded men walking around – more competition for the ladies is essentially their reasoning – but I'm a very tribal minded guy. I want to live in a community of ripped brothers for whom leg day isn't just an internet meme but an integral part of their life. I want to see fit bros everywhere I go. I want our society to stop being the laughing stalk of the world, where we're more associated with McDonald's and Stretch Pants then gyms and phenomenal physiques. It's never been easier for someone to make the change into a physical Adonis, yet our society has never been fatter. It's sounds narcissistic but nowadays just being in shape does make you better then those who aren't. Don't let anyone else tell you different.

Way back in October we had our magical Fat Shaming Week. My own contribution garnered me a lot of positive fan mail from fella's who decided to make the change. One even sent me a progress pic. He's made some amazing progress since October. It makes my day to run into fit folks or to see positive progress pics on fitness forums.

So for those of you men whom have made a commitment to excellent health and stuck to it, or have already been sticking to it for a long time; fuckin' A. Keep doing what you're doing and take pride in your positive lifestyle. Enjoy the mirin' of jelly beer bellies, and keep on smiling condescendingly at all those dairy queens who deride you for being awesome enough to bang their fit sisters – even though those porkers desperately want to grind up on your swole self.

Keep lifting and lowering heavy stuff gents. Keep making our society a little less embarrassing. Keep being more then average. I wish all you the best and success for your body goals. You're gonna make it.

And for those of you not already committed to a lifestyle of fitness, what are you waiting for? Why aren't you trying to be the best person you possibly can be? What's your excuse?

What To Say When A Girl Accuses You Of Wanting Her Just For Sex

March 11, 2014 | by John Fisher | Link | Original Link

A fairly common shit test that women employ at the middle stage of seduction deals primarily with the woman's self-image. Unlike many other shit tests, it is just as frequently encountered by romantic beta men as by aggressive players, appearing seemingly out of thin air as a certain 'light bulb' flickers on within the woman's head. The test usually pops up during escalation, which causes your level of intimacy to advance to the next level. For example:

- when you touch a new area of her body
- when the chemistry between you two deepens
- when either of you mentions something you might do in the future
- when you go in for the kiss
- when you have already kissed her and you're making out
- when you're in bed and undressing
- rarely, when you first meet her in a club and try to dance with her
- and very rarely, after sex, when she wants to know the status of your relationship (or lack of)

During any single growth in the intimacy between you that implies that something more is going to happen, a curious phenomenon appears in the woman's mind: "Wait, what does this look like? Do I appear easy? What will he/observers think about me?" In other words:

A woman never wants to feel like a slut, even if she is currently doing something slutty.

It is at this moment that her defenses engage. She is not a slut, nor does she want to look like one! She is going to put up some resistance, pleasure be damned! That is where the famous phrase appears:

"You just want me for sex."

aka

"Do you like me just for my body?"

aka

"You just want to sleep with me, don't you?"

The universal rule of all shit tests is that rational answers are generally not good answers, but it is made even more prominent now. No matter what, do not try to explain yourself, convince her that it's not really like that, convince her that you value her as a person, or engage in a prolonged discussion. That is exactly the fodder that she needs to reject you and prove that she really is a Nice Girl ™ who cannot be lured into sex by a few sweet words and reassurances. The more you try to convince and soften her, the more she will clam up, and the chance for further escalation is going to fade.

A common misunderstanding

Being the stone-cold player that you are, you're not going to make the mistake of trying to convince her. Instead, here are a few effective answers (all of which should be delivered with a grin, followed by a brief look into her eyes, and then continuing the escalation as if she hadn't raised any objections):

Her: "You only want me for sex."
You: "Why is that bad?"

I call the answer above "pulling a Juan Antonio", as it was immortalized by the protagonist of the excellent movie Vicky Cristina Barcelona in the scene in which reacts to a similar accusation with a shrug and a simple counter-question: "Why not?" Don't treat wanting to sleep with her as something that needs to be justified, and she won't either.

Her: "You only want me for sex."
You: "And you like that." *****

A classic example of so-called "asshole game". You need some nerve to run this successfully. There are few men who can nonchalantly launch stuff of this caliber and really mean them, but those who can shall be richly rewarded by women.

Her: "You only want me for sex."
You: "No, I actually want to steal your organs."

Agree and amplify at work. Make fun of her with an absurd proposition that goes even further than hers.

Her: "You only want me for sex."
You: "Do I need a reason?"

Her: "You only want me for sex."
You: "And because you talk so much."

Her: "You only want me for sex."
You: "Just shut up and kiss me." *****

Her: "You only want me for sex."
You: "No, I like your law degree."

Her: "You only want me for sex."
You: "Do you only want me for sex?"

Her: "You only want me for sex."
You: "I haven't decided yet." *****

Her: "You only want me for sex."
You: grunt

 = an answer that I have personally used with success

Never allow a woman's last-minute doubts about her image to stop you. Learn to defuse her reluctance in a playful way and she will reward you with fornication.

3 Reasons That Suggest Feminists Have Asperger's Syndrome

March 11, 2014 | by TheMaskAndRose | Link | Original Link

I used to work with students on the autism spectrum, and after learning more than I probably should have about feminists and how they work, I'm convinced they're largely women with Asperger's Syndrome. Without going into full psychology-mode, let's just say it's a milder form of autism that disrupts a person's life in three major ways:

1. Significant difficulties in social interaction

This is perhaps demonstrated best on the internet. They completely lack self-control, curse like sailors, use their keyboards to scream at everyone they disagree with, and only seem to be "on the same side" as other people who are doing the exact same thing.

Anyone who dares confront their bubble with facts, science, logic, or reason sends them into histrionic rage-fits. You have never seen, and will never see, an internet feminist type the words, "Hmm, I thought of it a different way, but in light of new evidence, perhaps I was wrong. Please tell me more."

Instead, they stick to their idiotic beliefs, immune to logic and allergic to reality. They seem completely unable to hold adult conversations with anyone. And, at risk of driving more traffic to the site, I must mention David Futrelle's site "manboobz." Futrelle is the typical male feminist; an overweight, thinking-impaired omega male.

Manboobz, touted as a fantastic resource for feminists, is the cowardly fucktard Futrelle's pride and joy. He is consistently disingenuous, lies about everything, does no homework, and chooses to make fun of the clothes people wear instead of discussing the points they make. He once published an article that got most of the facts wrong about the "Don't Be That Girl" campaign in Edmonton. I rudely corrected him in the comments section, after which he updated his article to reflect the things I had to teach him, then banned me from the site.

Anyway, I mention the site because of the comments section. Nearly 100% of the comment threads on his "fantastic resource for feminists" website take two or three messages to completely unwind into his followers randomly updating the world about their cats. Sometimes, they talk about their houseplants instead.

It happens as a response to nearly every article, with random people spouting random irrelevant bullshit at each other. Somehow, this is called "a conversation" over there. I call it "a group of social retards who cannot understand how conversations work." They almost never comment on the topic at hand—which is entirely made-up bullshit anyway—and just decide that everyone must live in their little fantasy world where everyone knows everyone else's cats.

2. Cannot understand nonverbal communication

Nonverbal communication could, perhaps, use some explanation before I continue. There is an estimated ratio throughout psychological essays that human communication can be broken down into two parts:

- Verbal communication, which is the words you use. This is an estimated 7% of the entire message being communicated between two humans.
- Nonverbal and Paraverbal communication, which are things like vocal tone, body language, context, and emotional cues. This makes up the remaining 93% of the message(s) being communicated between human beings.

Nonverbal communication is generally a right-brained ordeal, which is to say, it uses the part of your mind that deals with ambiguities, vagueness, and context clues to draw conclusions. It is not as "left-brained" as logic or literal content.

For example, let's take a look at the sentence, "We really shouldn't be doing this." Further, let's say that a women says it to a man while the two of them are becoming intimate. Your left-brained verbal communication skills deliver the message to you literally: this is a bad idea. Hence, we should not be doing this. Your right-brained nonverbal communication skills, however, takes far more into account. How is she saying it? What is her body doing? What are the context clues available?

So, imagine that the two of them are hooking up. The woman, dragging her nails down the sides of the man's body and kissing him intimately, begins to become aroused. She drops her voice to a "bedroom" tone, and delivers the sentence as "We reeeeallly shouldn't be doooiiinnnng this…" with a sly smile on her face as she unbuttons the man's pants.

A left-brained SpergBot, unable to infer the message from the body language, tonality and context clues, would interpret this rigidly as "We need to stop right now." A neurotypical human being, who has access to all the brain's many functions, would interpret this as "We're about to hook up. She's taking my pants off, taking the initiative towards sex, so she must just be saying that to add a little spicy 'taboo' to the interaction."

I believe this "FemBots are SpergBots" theory perfectly explains why feminists seem so completely unable to understand the nuances of the human mating ritual.

Whatever she says is ABSOLUTELY POSITIVELY WHAT IT MEANS and it does not matter what else is going on.

Consent needs to be VERBALIZED AND AGREED ON before intimacy can occur. Just because she's spitting on her hand for lube and sucking your cock doesn't mean she wants sex, according to such insanity.

Basically, FemBots need a contract written out for them before they can understand that sex is about to occur, with both parties verbally agreeing on every single step of the intimacy process, because their brains cannot comprehend the dance.

3. Restrictive and repetitive patterns of behavior and interests

Everything that a FemBot may not like—and I do mean everything that exists in the world—can be explained by the term "Patriarchy."

- Wage gap? Patriarchy.
- Golden Uterus Complex? Patriarchy.
- Criminally corrupt justice system? Patriarchy.
- The fact that men are attracted to attractive women? Patriarchy.
- Video games? Patriarchy.
- Sandwiches? Patriarchy.
- Cold winter nights? Why, patriarchy, of course.

The insanely single-minded focus they use renders everything under that one lens. They are not open to other ideas about why things are the way they are. They can find patriarchy in literally anything, as the criminal Princess Anita Sarkeesian recently demonstrated with her idiotic campaign against video games.

And speaking of "restrictive patterns of behavior," let's take a look at the laughable SlutWalk campaign. For those of you who don't know, SlutWalk has two purposes:

- To demonstrate the fact that FemBots can't understand the connection between actions and consequences, and more importantly,
- It gives ugly, overweight, masculine women a chance to advertise that they're easy lays, since that's the only way any man might ever pay attention to them.

Basically, the mission of SlutWalk is to promote the idea that "We should be allowed to wear whatever we want, whenever we want, getting as drunk as we want, walking around as alone as we want down the darkest alleys we want, without ever having to worry about what might happen to us."

Which is a pleasant fantasy, I suppose, expect when that darned reality rears its ugly head. Listen, honey—NOBODY has that right. Not even us dick-swinging patriarchs have the privilege of doing whatever the fuck we want whenever the fuck we want without fearing rational consequences. That's just not how life works. Every time you leave the house, you are incurring the possibility of risk; you could get hit by a car, someone at your office might go berserk and shoot you, or you could be mugged.

Risk always exists, and demanding that it leave you alone is just idiotic and childish.

But anyway, back to the point. Why would ANYONE be so completely obsessed with dressing that way, night after night, despite demonstrable risk and rational arguments not to do so? Why must they insist on taking risky behavior, drinking to excess, and painting themselves as easy targets?

Because, doggone it, that's what they want to do. And they're going to do it over and over and over again, like someone with a "dangerous risky lifestyle" tic that goes off twice an hour on average.

And then, as many of you have noticed, they cannot seem to utter more than half a sentence before uttering the dreaded R-word. Everything is rape. Psychological rape. Birth rape. Date rape. Marital rape. Regretted sex rape. Car wash rape. Stare rape. They say it on cue every few words.

This is a feature of autism known as "echolalia," whereby they hear something and then repeat it, on loop, ad infinitum. The R-word is dropped around the feminist echo chambers of the world like LSD at Burning Man, where they can't escape the word, until they find themselves mindlessly repeating it.

So, am I saying that all feminists have Asperger Syndrome? How should I know? I'm not a psychologist.

What I am saying is that it makes a lot of sense to me, and explains a good deal of the kind of behavior they are known for. All I do here is provide you, my beautiful audience, with facts and observations. It is up to you to connect the dots and see if what I'm offering makes more sense to you than what you thought before you read it.

Dear Lancealot:

Welcome to the Return of Kings White Knight Landing Page. You're here because someone you know online, or in person, thinks you're probably a white knight. Chances are: he's right. This page will explain to you what a white knight is, why you probably are one, and what to do about it.

It's in everyone's best interest that you read this carefully.

White Knight Information Sheet

What's a White Knight?

White knightism manifests itself in a variety of ways, but probably the most common manifestation is running to the "protection" or "defense"—of usually a stranger—just because she's female, with little or no consideration other factors. Online, that often translates into attacking another guy when you think he's unfairly criticized or "bullied" a girl, or a certain group of women. The key part is that you're standing up for what's essentially a complete stranger because she's a woman and therefore, in your eyes, defenseless. Hence the name. You're the knight in shining armor coming to the rescue of a damsel in distress.

White knights often pepper their statements with "bro," "dude," or "man" in an attempt to "level" with the other guy or to put on a tough-guy act. They also often claim to speak for all men. The preface "as a man" is the absolute calling card of the white knight.

There are lots of theories for what drives guys to do this, but there's no question that an old-fashioned notion—ironically, even-more-sexist through its condescension—of men's role in the world is at the heart of it. A distorted concept of "justice" is also a culprit. Feminism, which talks out of both sides of its mouth by simultaneously declaring women strong and independent, on the one hand, while, on the other, brokering in an endless series of victim narratives (which white knights swallow, hook, line, and sinker), plays a major role.

Hollywood (and Bollywood) for all of its supposed forward-looking permissiveness, is one of major disseminators of this elaborate mythology.

White knightism isn't just an online phenomenon. There's also an older, face-to-face version of it which, though increasingly rare, you still see in bars and clubs. Interrupting statements like "Don't talk to her like that!" or "Are you okay?" are usually a signal that the in-person white-knighting act is in progress. While this may have required some tiny degree of courage in the past, white knightism is fundamentally a cowardly act today. It's supremely low risk, since white knights can be 99.9% certain that they won't get punched in the face for butting in.

Online white knighting is even cheaper, since it carries an even higher likelihood that no consequences will come of it. It's almost always, at its core, an attempt to score points with women.

Women Are Always Right. Men Are Villains.

You can't have a hero without a villain, and that villain is invariably whatever man is distressing the damsel. White knightism is grounded in the fundamental belief that women can do no harm (i.e., are never really at fault for anything, or did anything to bring on whatever situation they find themselves in). But, it also features a huge placing-on-the-pedestal component. White knights lavish women with (usually undeserved and inaccurate) compliments. All women all beautiful. All criticism of them is "bullying," or an inability to appreciate them as women. Thirst and white-knightism are, in medical terms, often comorbid.

“She Shouldn’t Be With Him.”

Cockblocking is also a common symptom. The white knight will often intervene in a potentially romantic situation if he deems a girl shouldn’t be interested in a man for whom she’s displayed interest. That could mean when he’s not in the room. “That dude is a player.” Or, it could also happen with him in the room—with a well-placed interruption, an attempt to insult the man in front of the girl, or by physically pulling the girl away from him. He sees the other man as unworthy for this girl—maybe even branding labeling him as “creepy” to her—and will unilaterally make that decision for her.

She’s “too drunk” (even though she’s sober), she’s “going through a hard time right now” (even though she’s obviously looking), she’s “doesn’t like guys like you” (even though she does). He’ll stop at nothing.

This is a growing problem, since major institutions, including the President of the United States, are actively encouraging this form of white knighting—unsurprisingly, under the catch-all bugbear of “campus sexual assault.”

Skip to 0:38:

Why You Do It.

White knightism is caused by a mix of factors. In the broadest sense, it’s a product of brainwashing about girls that paints them as the more evolved sex—that never lies, cheats, or harms others without some man having encouraged her. Our legal system, to a large extent, is based on a White Knight Ethos. Women get lighter sentences for the same crime as men, and are almost always given the benefit of the doubt by responding police officers. Bouncers will always kick out the man, even if the woman instigated the conflict. After all, “you should never hit a woman.”

Skip to 0:20:

It Won’t Get You Laid and Turns Girls Into Bitches.

White knights frequently harbor unrequited desires for their damsel. They’re secretly hoping to curry favor with their girl—or women in general—which will hopefully lead to something. The thing is: it won’t. Women, even though they may talk a big game, secretly loathe white knights for the disingenuous cowards that they are. They’d never sleep with one. They might friendzone one, but that’s about it.

However, women do use and abuse these unsolicited protectors for other purposes. And, like the banks, every undeserved bailout feeds a downward spiral of growing hubris and cuntiness. Every time a girl pours a drink on a guy in a bar or initiates physical violence with a man, it's with the full faith and confidence that there's a room full of would-be white knights on her side. Not only that, she knows cops and bouncers will take her word over any guy's. That same girl would never, in a million years, get in a guy's face in a room with just the two of them or with a truly equal system in place.

Women Are Perfectly Capable of Taking Care of Themselves.

White Knights are cowards and hypocrites, but also fundamentally sexist. They condescend to women—who are perfectly capable of taking care of themselves (especially online)—by taking it upon themselves to be their protectors. When I criticize a woman, I do it as an equal. I say what I would say to a man doing the same thing.

White Knights know that they're probably not going to suffer an attack as a result of their heroics. If tomorrow, people started getting punched in the face for butting into other people's business, white knightism would plummet overnight. That makes the average white knight a coward.

War On White Knights

Today I'm calling for a war on white knights. Every time you see one of these cowardly specimens in action, do everything in your power—within the law—to expose, shame, and harm them. Not until we shine light on this pitiful behavior will we end this epidemic.

And achieve true gender equality.

The Myth Of Female Agency

March 12, 2014 | by inhumanist | Link | Original Link

I would like to put a myth to rest: "Behind Every Great Man is a Great Woman." This maxim is utterly false, and easily demonstrated to be the polar opposite of truth. Women inherently lack agency, both moral and physical when compared to men. Men also excel in almost every way where a woman is useful.

Behind Every Great Man…

Not only are there a great many men who had nothing to do with women during their adult lives, such as Saint Paul who authored most of the Christian Bible's New Testament and remarked that he had the "gift" of singleness, but there are NO women in history who were able to survive very long without a man, or men close by and willing to enable their merest survival, let alone their few extraordinary accomplishments. (Yes, there are some gorgeous women with great intellectual accomplishments, but ladies can't all be Hedy Lamarr, can they?)

Even if you counter that all boys are first dependent upon their mothers, you must admit that boys are not “great men” in the context of “All Great Men…” Nor can a woman even become a mother without a man to impregnate her, and a boy to gestate in her. A woman cannot become a mother without men and boys defining her as one; her most biologically significant achievement and social identity is utterly dependent upon a man impregnating and protecting her, and the children occupying her womb choosing to uphold their teachings.

Men, on the other hand, are not changed by fatherhood in the way that women are changed through motherhood. Men are the same men they were before childbirth. In nearly all capacities a man can become what a father is through parallel efforts. Motherhood is an ontological actuality, something that can be seen in her own blood and breast; fatherhood is mostly an abstract idea with its ontological foundation resting in the genetics of a third party.

Studies have shown that the success of children-come-adults largely relies upon the presence of fathers during childhood. Additional studies show that single men raise more successful offspring than single mothers or homosexuals. A study in Europe showed that the religiosity of the father has several magnitudes more influence upon the eventual religiosity of the adult offspring. J.S. Mill is one of the most remarkable economists of all time, and was raised entirely by his father and Jeremy Bentham; his mother was absent the picture.

It is well known that single motherhood is the bane of humanity. It is not as well known today that men can do every task a woman can do, other than nursing a baby, better than a woman. That includes nurturing, educating, cooking, cleaning, home making, healthcare, and so on. A powerful and rich man of our ancestral past would use tutors for his children, servants for cooking and cleaning, and his wife would serve little other purpose than birthing and nursing, although nursing could be outsourced to wet nurses as well. The ancient patriarchs had almost no use for a woman, the ancient women had almost no benefit to a rich and powerful man. Women were viewed much like children: a liability, a burden, a responsibility. Women should be grateful for culture that took benevolent care of their gender even though they were nearly useless in every way.

Agency Explained

Agency is the concept that creatures have both the capacity and the physical ability to act in the world according to their own desires. Although I conflate several aspects of agency in this article, metaphysical, physical, and social, it does not harm my assertion that women generally lack agency in every area. Women pretend they were once slaves to men, but women are slaves to their uteruses and their frailty.

Army studies have shown that an extremely athletic young woman in her prime is roughly as capable as a somewhat fit 55 year old man. Neurology has shown that human moral choices are strongly affected by hormones, and women have been shown to have a more divergent, unstable hormonal influence. Men and women solving moral problems utilize varying parts of their brain, according to brain activity imaging. It is obvious that when compared to men women lack physical agency, and debatable that they also lack moral agency as well.

I can demonstrate the general lack of agency women experience through a very quick thought experiment or two. Only the Western woman, eminently privileged princess that she is, believes in “female agency” in the first place, so please understand that I dismiss the vast majority of human females by using the Western princess in my example; debating female agency is a first world issue. Take a Western woman in her pantsuit walking to work, hit pause, and start to deconstruct her life. Take some things out of her purse, take people out of the picture. Seize her birth control. What happens? She gets impregnated or must become chaste—against her would-be will. She becomes a slave to her uterus—where she goes, with whom, who she visits, and the time of day she travels, all drastically change, along with the moral choices she’s presented with or would experience.

Almost all of her life's decisions have drastically been altered because you took away a one ounce plastic canister of chemical hormones she bought from the utterly patriarchal government protected intellectual-propertied pharmaceutical industry. Take away the abortionist and the abortion industry and the cops protecting fetal murder, and watch her squirm!

Let's take another thing out of the picture of our Western woman walking the street, something that you cannot see in the picture, something that is not quite visible: men with badges and handcuffs. They're everywhere. During an interview, when you are considering a female employee or student—if you squint hard enough you can just make out the faint presence of men with guns, and sometimes also the IRS agent carrying envelopes marked with your name, ready to completely destroy your life and your enterprise over the tiniest misstep that would hurt our princess's feelings. Take these people, these MEN, out of the picture, and you start to see that women are not that independent after all. Take away the white knights, and the other (patriarchal or capitalist) luxuries (dishwashers, automobiles, infant formula, criminal justice, welfare, military) and you are left with just another woman of the world, living in the third world, never even debating her lack or moral agency with men in public. She is blown about upon the winds of men. As Camile Paglia recently remarked at Time Ideas:

> "Every day along the Delaware River in Philadelphia, one can watch the passage of vast oil tankers and towering cargo ships arriving from all over the world. These stately colossi are loaded, steered and off-loaded by men. The modern economy, with its vast production and distribution network, is a male epic, in which women have found a productive role — but women were not its author."

Take a man, pause the picture, start stripping him of his accoutrements, and he remains mostly unchanged. He needs food and water. Not free healthcare, not VAWA, no Pell Grants, no EEOC. He accepts pain and even death, and there are many more willing to replace him in the struggle, and almost nobody cries when he does meet his end—except the women who depend on him of course. He is the master of his fate; he is the captain of his soul.

The Higher Values

Feminism is an operation of patriarchy. Feminism constantly identifies problems and proposes patriarchal solutions pressed down on us from high and rammed home by men with guns and badges. Feminism cannot exist without the men and the patriarchy enabling their delusions of agency and independence. Women are not equal to men, were never equal, and cannot, nor should they be made equal.

A woman's lack of agency is something neither to celebrate, nor despise. It is something to accept. Perhaps for you, there are higher, truer values and pursuits to you. Life becomes very unhappy when truth is rejected in any way. Humans cannot flourish when they cannot discriminate against lies. Misery is close on the heels wherever political correctness is tolerated. Error must be hated. Statistical probabilities must be categorized, and accurate stereotypes must be propagated. Civilization must shun bad behavior that leads to feral women and other degenerates undermining civilization. It is only a benevolent, just, patriarchal civilization that tolerates feral woman and the degenerate. Take away our Western traditions and moral taboos (as feminists so desire) and those fools will be eaten by mother nature, red in tooth and claw. The mockers cry out for their own annihilation!

Through intolerance, hatred, discrimination, and stereotypes men and women can enjoy human flourishing, peaceful civilization among competing tribes, and a life well lived. Together, men and women can build epic legacies that will last millennia, rivaling those of Odysseus and Penelope, or Adam and Eve. Alone, men can author the greatest ideas or institutions that cradle ages of thinkers and explorers. Alone, women can stop worrying about men, and start celebrating them. Find a good one that is nearby, and devote yourself to him, submit to him, nurture his children, and continue the civilization you are so dependent upon.

inhumanist

Inhumanist is a young man with multiple personalities resulting from the madness he experienced after being told to rebel against everything; one day he had been rebelling as hard as he could and he looked back to see everyone else lagging; he was far beyond everyone and alone in the darkness, and to them he had become a strange and fearful monster.

Lessons From Nikolai Gogol’s Nevsky Prospect

March 12, 2014 | by Seth Rose | Link | Original Link

The story begins with a dramatic description of the Nevsky Prospect in Petersburg: the hustle and bustle, the fanfare, the luxury, the raucous street vendors, and of course the women. Then, both Lieutenant Pirogov, the dashing military officer, and Piskaryov the romantic artist, are introduced as Pirogov spots a beauty:

> “Stop!” called put Lt. Pirogov, tugging at his young companion…”Did you see her?”
> “I did indeed: what a beauty, the very image of Perugino’s Bianca”
> “Which one are you talking about?”
>
> “That one there, the one with the dark hair…”
> “Well, I’m talking about the blonde who was walking behind her in that direction. Why don’t you go after the dark one, if she so took your fancy?”
> “What a preposterous idea…It’s hardly as if she’s one of those women who flaunt themselves on Nevsky Prospect at night! She must be an extremely distinguished lady,” he continued with a sigh… “her coat alone must have cost 80 rubles!”
> “Dunderhead!” shouted Pirogov, pushing him in the direction…” Get a move on, you dolt, or you’ll lose her! And I’ll go for the blonde.”

The difference between these two is striking within the first few paragraphs of dialogue. Pirogov is licking his chops at the prospect of approaching this buxom blonde—he doesn’t hesitate one bit! He knows what he likes and isn’t afraid to go after it. Piskaryov on the other hand is already showing reservations about approaching the sultry brunette. He immediately suggests that she is not “That type of girl” and Pirogov should be ashamed for thinking so about her.

External Values Are Not Indicative Of Inner Worth

Piskaryov gives this stranger the benefit of the doubt and believes her to be an innocent and “fair maiden,” based solely on the fact that she is beautiful. He follows this woman down the street for some time, still frightened by the prospect of approaching:

> “His heart pounded as he involuntarily quickened his step. He dared not even entertain the possibility of attracting the attention of this elusive beauty, let alone admit such lewd thoughts as those Lieutenant Pirogov had been suggesting; he wished only to see the house, to discover the abode of this divine creature, who, it had seemed, had descended directly from heaven on to Nevsky Prospect and was now floating away to some unknown destination.”

He sees her walk into a building and decides to seize this opportunity. He enters the building and runs up several flights of stairs. He knocks on a door and is disturbed by what he sees:

> “For this was one of those establishments where man sacrilegiously suppresses and reviles everything pure and sacred, everything which adorns life, where woman, the beauty of this world, the pearl of creation, is degraded into something strange and equivocal, where she loses all purity of spirit and all femininity…”

This fair maiden, this divine creature, is nothing more than a prostitute. Piskaryov is shocked. He would have never guessed a beautiful woman could have been capable of such things. The reason he is not able to comprehend the brunette’s true nature is because he is an artist, and his character is supposed to represent idealism. As an artist and idealist, the aesthetic value of something is what counts. Piskaryov cannot comprehend that something beautiful could possibly be bereft of morality. While not consciously aware of it, most men in society adhere to this as well.

> “Examine and study everything that you see, submit all to your brush, but learn to seek the inner meaning to everything, and above all endeavor to fathom the great mystery of creation. Blessed are the chosen few who hold the secret.”

After he runs away from the brothel, he returns home and thinks about his experience. He thinks so much that his mind is now consumed by this event. He has a dream about this woman being of a virtuous and pure nature. He continues to dream about her, but develops insomnia and is forced to use opium to regain his ability to sleep and dream about this woman, whose name he does not even know; her face is simply enough to captivate him. His dreams are no longer fulfilling and he decides he wants to marry her.

He returns to the brothel to propose to her, but has his offer laughed off. His rejection was too much to handle—he is found in his apartment several days later with lacerations on his throat.

The story then returns to Pirogov, who Gogol describes as:

> "…[having] a large number of talents…", "…adept at relating anecdotes…and it would be hard to list all the talents with which nature had endowed Pirogov."

Pirogov relentlessly pesters the blonde with questions. She ignores his questions and begins to move faster and farther away; Pirogov pursues her.

> "His [prey] flew through a side door. Pirogov hesitated for a moment but, acting true to his Russian nature, resolved to press forward."

She runs into a shabby building and Pirogov follows behind. He enters a workshop and discovers that she is married to a German tinsmith. The husband is drunk and livid and tells Pirogov to "Get out!"

Thus far this woman has not displayed any interest whatsoever and she is married to an angry, drunk German. But no problem! Pirogov returns to the shop the next day and spots the blonde:

> "Aha, good day my darling! Don't you recognize me! You little minx what lovely eyes you have!"

She still shows no interest. His plan isn't working so he requests that the tinsmith build him some spurs, a ploy to see the blonde again. As he leaves he squeezes her arm, but still no luck. It didn't make sense to him:

> "He could not understand how anyone could be able to resist him; especially since his personal charms and exalted rank gave him every right to attention."

Pirogov endures blow after blow, but he still continues his pursuit of the woman despite all the obstacles.

Persistence Is Greatly Rewarded

He then figured out how to get her. He took note that she:

> "…for all her comeliness, was very stupid. All the same, stupidity is a great asset for a pretty wife."

To get this girl, he needed to exploit her 'greatest' asset: stupidity. Pirogov strolls by the workshop one day and spies the blonde in the window. He calls out to her:

> "Say is your husband at home?'
> "He is" answered the blonde.
> "And when is he not at home?"

> “He’s not at home on Sundays” said the foolish blonde.
> “We must turn that to our advantage.” And the following Sunday, like a bolt from the blue, he appeared before the object of his desire.

Jackpot! He then begins to dance with her and kisses her. They embrace. Just then the German and his pals walk in. They are livid and beat Pirogov senseless.

Pirogov is at first enraged by his beating as no officer of his rank should be ever subjected to that. He is determined to take revenge, but his mind is changed by eating pastries, reading a reactionary newspaper and spending an evening dancing at a party.

Perception Is Greater Than Reality

Pirogov could have reacted differently and followed the path of Piskaryov, but he chose not to. For you see:

> “Both [characters] have been deceived by the surface of reality, but the blows of disillusionment are far more deadly for the idealist than for the smug, self satisfied philistine; indeed for an artist, failure is to perceive discord between outward form and inner content betrays an aesthetic which is essentially flawed.”

Piskaryov believed his reality to be much more horrific than it really was. His unwavering belief in idealism was what brought about his demise. Pirogov suffered too, but his suffering was physical; not spiritual like Piskaryov’s. Pirogov didn’t have much invested in this woman and was able to brush off such trivial matters. At the party, he then regales the party goers with his thoughts, essentially serving as a platform for Gogol:

> “What an amazing world we live in!” I thought to myself the other day as I walked along Nevsky musing over these two stories: ‘How strange, how inscrutable the games fate plays with us! Do we ever attain the object of our desires? Do we ever achieve that to which all our efforts seem to be directed? Everything happens the wrong way round. To one Providence has given a pair of splendid horses, and he rides along indifferently, oblivious of their beauty, while another, whose heart is fired with a passion for horses, is forced to go on foot and must content himself with licking his tongue at the handsome beasts which gallop past. One fellow has an excellent cook, but, alas, is unlucky enough to possess such a small mouth that it cannot accommodate more than two pieces of meat, while another has a big mouth…but, alas, has to content himself with some sort of German concoction of potatoes. What strange games fate plays with us!”

What strange games fate plays with us indeed. There are many things in this world that occur that often make no sense. Like the examples Pirogov lays out, sometimes people just get the short end of the stick in life. We can choose to let these things affect our outlook, or we can change our perception of these events to have a more positive outlook.

The Easiest Way To Get Laid In Los Angeles

March 12, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Many of you will visit the city of Lost Angels at some point in your playboy lives, and I'm sure some of you reside here already, so I've decided to drop a extensive breakdown to help you cats out in your quest for quality pussy. Note: This formula can be used for any major city (with a tweak here and there), but I'm using Los Angeles as an example.

McQueen's Getting Laid In LA Formula

There are five main components that make up this formula: Hotel, Pre-Party Plan, Nightlife Connections, Uber and After-Party Plan

1. Hotel

Anyone who has lived in LA realizes that logistics can absolutely destroy the best players in the world. Regardless of your level of game, logistics is the biggest cockblock in LA.

You meet a sexy girl in Hollywood, find out she lives in Marina Del Rey and you live in the Valley. On top of that, she rode with her friends and she'd love to come with you to your spot, but her friends are nervous about you being so far away from where they live. What the hell do you do?

The most important step in this equation is booking a hotel in advance in the heart of Hollywood, or in close proximity to where you're staying.

For example: if you're partying in Santa Monica, then book a hotel within blocks of the best bars and lounges. If it's Hollywood, then you want to be within a few blocks radius of Hollywood Boulevard. Having a hotel room on Sunset Boulevard is a win-win as well. If you're partying downtown Los Angeles, then staying at The Standard Hotel is a good call.

The point is, where ever you plan to party, you must get a hotel that is within stumbling distance or a quick Uber or cab ride away. I'm talking less than a five minute ride max.

(Best Western Hotel Hollywood)

Price

There's no need to spend an arm and a leg on a hotel room. Sure, you can snag a room at the W Hotel on Hollywood Boulevard and Argyle and not only is it a well-known hotel, but the lobby on the weekends is packed with girls. This makes your logistics as easy as partying in Vegas.

But, for the budget conscious, you can easily book a hotel room at the Best Western Plus on Franklin Boulevard just a few blocks away for half the price. The rooms are clean, it's a well-known hotel and it's cheap.

If you have a good wingman, get double beds and split the price. Now you've maybe spent $100 each max (if you get a cheaper room) and sometimes as cheap as $75.

Not only do you now have a room and a bed to pull that sexy filly to, but you don't have to worry about DUI's. A DUI in California will cost you over $10,000 in fines and court fees, plus you generally get your license taken away for 6 months. $75-100 doesn't sound too bad does it?

Total Spent: $75-100 (with wingman or $150-200 solo)

Pro-Tip: You can also book a room off of Airbnb, but rates may be more expensive. Check your local city rates and see what works best for you.

2. Pre-Party Plan

Make a liquor store run before you check into your hotel. If you live in the suburbs you can check out Bevmo or Costco (if you have a membership) for even bigger discounts on your favorite alcohol. If not, grab 2 bottles of alcohol:

- Vodka
- Whiskey

These two beverages are guaranteed sure-fire winners for girls who will be attending your after-party. Obviously, if you're not into either of those, grab a bottle of your preference, but make sure you definitely have those.

Also, grab mixers (Sprite and Coke are good) and plastic cups. If you don't smoke, wouldn't hurt to snag a pack of cigarettes for the after-party. It's common when people are partying and drinking to want a cigarette. Cut out ANY logistics issues by grabbing a pack of cigs, condoms and chewing gum.

Budget Breakdown:

- 1 bottle of mid-grade Vodka: $20
- 1 bottle of mid-grade Whiskey $20
- 1 Pack of Cigs $6
- 1 Pack of Condoms $5
- 1 Pack of Chewing Gum $2

Total: $53

(Cups and mixers will vary, but are cheap)

Now that you have your essentials, you can head to your hotel to take your time getting ready and pre-drink. Here's where saving money comes into play: Since you've already bought your pre and after party drinks, you won't need to spend a dime in the club. Period.

Pre-party until you have your comfortable buzz and fill up a Flask with your favorite alcohol BEFORE you roll out. Any club worth it's salt does not pat down patrons (unless you like ghetto spots), so as long as you conceal the flask you're fine. Hell, they even have fake iPhone flasks now that look just like an iPhone, but are flasks and they're only a few bucks.

3. Nightlife Connections

If you really want to make sure that your night goes smoothly, then get your nightlife connects down pat. Besides learning how to get a club on-lock yourself, make connects with the right promoters and VIP Hosts. This is not that hard. If you're going out anyway on the regularly, then make a point to do this. This will ensure that you won't be waiting in line and won't be paying cover to get into the tightest new joints.

Shoot a text to a couple of promoters and hosts and get your name locked down for a FEW lists. Not just one spot. Remember, this is about you getting laid in LA, so you may have to bounce venues. Covering your bases is a key element of this working properly. I would say get your name on lists for three spots. If after hitting 3 nightclubs in LA you don't find anything, then I would jump to hotel bars and lounges for last call, but odds are you will find something for the night after 3 venues, if not less.

4. Uber

If you're within 2-3 blocks from the clubs, then simply walk, or if you're lazy like me then take a Uber. It won't costs you more than $5-8. I tend to lose my buzz when walking more than a block, so I generally elect to grab an Uber.

The key to Uber is AFTER you pull a chick. You have to be able to walk outside of the club and IMMEDIATELY head to your hotel room for your after party. There can be no waiting around for 15-20 minutes on a cab while the girls get cold feet and decided to head home. Move fast, efficient and always keeping the party jumping.

5. After-Party

After-parties are the key to Los Angeles nightlife.

Who has one?

Where's the best one?

Can we get in?

Everyone wants to know. The key this night because you followed this Master Plan to a T, is that YOU now have the after party so you hold the power.

A simple, "Let's afterparty at my hotel. I've got alcohol", is your golden line. The girl(s) follow suit and you hop in an Uber and you're on your way.

Do NOT make the chicks walk four blocks to your hotel. Every block they walk increases your chance of them changing their minds, getting tired or them possible losing interest because of the shiny new Hummer that just pulled up.

Los Angeles can be very tough if you're not on top of your Game and have your Logistics On-Lock. Follow this formula and watch your success rate increase greatly. Take Charge, Lead and Enjoy the Rewards.

How “Trigger Warnings” Silence Dissent And Protect Fragile Egos

March 13, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

If feminists and other enemies of free speech had their way, this article and others like it would have a large bold trigger warning, stating that the content might be offensive some readers. Already, trigger warnings are finding their way into academic classrooms, art exhibitions, and mainstream publications. The true purpose these warnings is not to protect those who suffer from trauma, but to silence dissent and protect the ego.

Although trigger warnings were initially used to warn victims of rape that a post might contain explicit descriptions of violence or sexual abuse, the practice has been extended to include any written word which might be accused of “racism, classism, sexism, heterosexism, cissexism, ableism, and other issues of privilege and oppression.” Just as the word troll has come to mean “someone who disagrees with me,” trigger warning has come to apply to any opinion that might offend a protected class.

The demand for trigger warnings has nothing to do with PTSD. Though the word trigger comes from PTSD related symptoms, it’s being applied to any content which may be emotionally strong. Writers are now expected to warn their audience they might feel something. The implication is that simply by stating a controversial viewpoint you are hurting fragile victims.

Trigger Warnings Aren’t About PTSD

Real PTSD triggers often come from unexpected everyday things. A sound, or smell might take someone back to a traumatic experience. I have an older friend who suffers from PTSD due to his service in Vietnam. Loud noises or helicopters overhead make him anxious, and can provoke panic attacks. If we were to apply feminist logic to the world, every chopper would come with “trigger warning” written on the side of it for him and other Vietnam vets. Police and emergency rescues teams would have to avoid certain areas to protect people’s feelings.

Of course, instead of making absurd demands, my friend chooses to spend his time doing what he loves, volunteering at his local church, and finding ways to serve others. He has a strong community he can call upon if something triggers him. Rather than trying to change the world, he changes himself, and focuses on creating the kind of life he wants.

Saying that an article on girls with short hair “triggered” you is an insult to the brave men and women who’ve experienced real PTSD. There’s no image or your friends dying or an older relative violating your body being conjured. What most people mean when they say they were “triggered” is not a PTSD-trigger, but an ego-trigger. They were forced to question their belief system when confronted with an opposing perspective. To which I say – good.

If your belief is so sensitive it cannot stand up to dissent, it deserves to be destroyed. Real victims of PTSD don’t want to silence others, they want to heal. If your opinion is so fragile that it requires curtailing the freedoms of others, then you’re not triggered, you’re tyrannical.

Triggering Is Spiritual

Undoing the ego is the work of a good spiritual teacher. Many spiritual teachers deliberately emotionally trigger their students in order to force them to question their beliefs, and let go of the ego. There is an entire spiritual tradition known as “crazy wisdom” in which the spiritual teacher uses unconventional, outrageous, or what might be called “triggering” behavior to shake up their students conception of spirituality. They troll their followers to liberate them.

In the words of Tibetean Buddhist teacher Chögyam Trungpa, one of the foremost practitioners of crazy wisdom, “compassion is not so much being kind; it is being creative to wake a person up." Triggering a strong emotional reaction if done with what spiritual teachers call "skillful means" can be an act of compassion because like a zen koan, the shock can suddenly cause someone to drop part of their ego.

If you avoid any article or experience that may provoke an emotional reaction, you'll miss out on any meaningful experiences, personal growth, or change in your life. You'll narrow your experience till all the joy and emotion is sucked out of it. Rather than getting reactive when someone triggers you, use it as an opportunity to let go of old patterns, and refocus on what it is you really want.

Trigger Warnings Are About Avoiding Change

Real PTSD survivors avoid triggers, but trigger-junkies seek them out. The friends I have who've experienced war don't walk into an violent films and act shocked at what they see. It's very easy to tell from a trailer or headline if the content is going to be triggering. Trigger-junkies do the opposite. They'll blog, retweet, and spread the content they find offensive far and wide.

Getting triggered reinforces the ego's identity as a victim. By exposing themselves to things they know will offend them, trigger-junkies reinforce their story as victims and avoid change, which is exactly what the ego wants. Many feminists "hate-read" sites like Return Of Kings because they love the feeling of drama their ego gives them.

If you click a headline that reads 5 Reasons To Date A Girl With An Eating Disorder, and you're triggered by discussion of eating disorders, you're not a victim, you're masochist. People who continually read content they know will anger them are trapped in a negative cycle and need help.

This goes both ways. How many men hate-read stories about feminism the same way? Which articles get the most views – the genuinely helpful advice, or articles bashing women's negative behavior? While acknowledging negativity can be helpful, wallowing in it is not. Once you understand the problem, move on to the solution.

Survivors Deserve Better

Compare this to way the way men and women who've experienced actual trauma behave. I met an African woman recently, who told me she'd been sexually mutilated, and forced to marry a Muslim man who beat her regularly, before escaping to the United States. When asked her if she felt like a victim, she said. "No. I never let anyone call me that. I'm not a victim. I'm a survivor." Even after experiencing the worst forms of sexual abuse, her focus was on becoming a whole, healthy person, rather than on the trauma in her past.

None of these issues diminish the importance of helping and healing real PTSD survivors. I've dealt with that trauma myself and worked on projects to help others who've experienced PTSD. My heart goes out to them. I pray they get all the healing and love they deserve. It angers me when I see their genuine suffering exploited for weak egos and political control. I hope those asking for trigger-warnings get the healing they need too, even if it comes form of constant triggering till their ego finally lets go.

Men Are Dropping Out Because Their Women Are Becoming Too Fat

March 13, 2014 | by Samuel Goodman | Link | Original Link

The obesity epidemic has afflicted men and women equally, but weight gain causes women to lose far more sexual market value than men do. What will happen to dating now that two-thirds of the nation's women are overweight or obese?

Men Are Judged On Everything—Women Are Judged On One Thing

Weight gain in the population is causing plenty of anguish for all of us, but when it comes to romance, each gender is affected very differently. Men are lucky, or unlucky if you will, in that no single factor determines their overall desirability. Women like tall men, certainly, and they like them handsome, but a nice looking 19-year-old, awkward pizza delivery boy generally has a hard time getting laid.

On the other hand, a plain looking, semi-charming multimillionaire with a yacht likely does pretty well for himself. In a woman's eyes, a global judgment is made involving height, facial appearance, wealth, ambition, personality, family and social networks, talents (music, art, athletics), and even the opinions of other men and women. The relative weighing of all these factors is fairly even. A very handsome man needs less to get by, but he needs something. A shorter, not so attractive guy with a lot of other things going for him will still do okay.

For women, however, beauty and youth are paramount. Other elements, such as mental health, personality, and intellect do matter, but their relative importance is far less. No level of other attributes can overcome unattractiveness in a woman. A great personality will move a woman up a notch in the dating pool, but only a notch. Yes, some men like “curvy” women, but these women are still quite fit and never is a widely sought-after women going to be fat. With so many overweight women nowadays, thinness has become the single most important beauty standard.

The Disparate Impact Of Being Fat

Although both genders have gained substantial amounts of weight in the past 60 years, the effect on attractiveness and desirability is not the same. A man can be 35 pounds overweight and this might bring him down a notch, but plenty of bigger gentlemen have very desirable wives and girlfriends. Such a man simply has other qualities which make him of value. On a 1 to 10 scale, his 35 pounds drop him from an 8 to a 6 or 7, hardly catastrophic.

But a woman who is 30 pounds overweight, drops from an 8 to a 4. In fact, with so many overweight men, a truly normal-weight man appears too thin to many people. In 1970, the average man weighed around 165 pounds; now the average is 191. If you meet a guy who is around 5’ 10” and 165, he may look skinny. It is instructive to look at male movie stars from the 1950s and earlier. Men like Humphrey Bogart, Laurence Oliver, and Fred Astaire were all quite thin.

One way to view the epidemic is to imagine that an entire generation of young men lost their ambition, that all they wanted to do was to hang out and play video games, that they were perfectly happy in dead-end jobs, making little money, smoking weed, and looking at porn. This is a net negative, analogous to weight gain in women, for men’s dating desirability. In fact, a popular book claims such an epidemic currently exists among young men.

If this epidemic of un-ambitious young men really exists, can it be accounted for by the scarcity of slender, attractive women? Why are young men driven to achieve? Evolutionary biology hypothesizes that males pursue achievement to attract women. But if there are so few desirable women, a young male may conclude that all efforts toward self-improvement and success are futile. With so few thin women, even years of herculean effort will not provide him a reasonable chance to mate with someone highly attractive. So why bother?

Out In Public

In social settings, I am often amazed to see zero or maybe one woman of a truly normal body weight. Average weights have gone up so much that one cannot see “average” as normal. Earlier in the 20th century, the average woman was 5’ 4” and 122 pounds. Now she is 5’ 4” and 144 pounds in some studies and 155 pounds in others. Today, a woman 5’ 4” and 120 pounds is considered skinny, but this is a perfectly healthy and attractive weight. Some Asian women at 5 ‘ 4” are under 100 pounds and healthy. In fact, the current average Chinese woman is 5’ 4” and 125 pounds, suggesting that about half of all Chinese women 5’ 4” tall weigh less than that.

One sees many more ethnically mixed couples these days, with successful, attractive white males matched with Asian females. This change is most likely driven by the obesity epidemic. When a man is considering a long term relationship, including marriage, one of his greatest fears is that his wife will gain weight and become unattractive. Bad eating habits and even a little bit of pudginess in a 28-year-old could translate to a very overweight woman of 40 after the kids are born. The rise in the desirability of Asian women is due to their lower rates of obesity.

Why do men value attractive partners? Well, you might say it is because it is more fun to have sex with a pretty woman. But another, perhaps more important reason, is that the type of woman a man is able to attract is an advertisement, a direct reflection of his worth in society. Watch a reasonably normal-sized man leave a building with his overweight girlfriend or even a platonic friend. He often walks ahead of or behind her. He cringes at the thought that people will see them together and conclude that he is such a loser that this is the “best he can do.” A woman might have a less attractive man, but a $90,000 sports car, a nice suit, a powerful job, any of these things will make up for his big gut. If a woman is fat, nothing can compensate for the problem.

In The Land Of The Fat….

The obesity epidemic has made many women vastly less desirable romantic partners compared to most men. Fatness just doesn’t knock as many points off a man’s sexual market value as it does a woman. “The end of men” may well be a rational response to the scarcity of thin women where some men conclude it is no longer worth the effort to work hard and gain wealth in the hopes of having sex with slender, attractive women.

The repercussions for society are substantial. Although there are many reasons for the decline in marriage rates, one reason is that men don’t want to marry overweight women. They worry enough about a woman gaining weight after the wedding or when kids come along. Imagine starting out with someone overweight? I am often amazed that when I see a wedding, the bride is much more likely to be slender than chance would suggest. The few remaining thin women can easily seek out men who will marry them. The rest are likely to go unmarried or to marry men incapable of earning a living. From a matchmaking perspective, the appropriate fit for an overweight woman is not an overweight man, it is an unemployed one.

Men now focus on body size even more exclusively than they used to. This is because normal-sized or slender women are so rare. In dating settings, you can be a woman with an unattractive face, bad personality, mentally ill, and a substance abuser, but look around — you may be the only normal-sized, non-overweight woman in the room. Every man there wants one thing: a slender woman. You are in the land of the fat, where the one thin girl is queen.

The Education Of Alciabides By Socrates

March 13, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Socrates, a man who needs no introduction, was a teacher of Alciabides, a fellow Athenian born of stock and raised under the care of Pericles, an accomplished politician and general. Socrates took it upon himself to moderate the intense ambition of Alciabides, who would later become a hawkish general at the prodigal age of 30.

Upon the eve of the massive Athenian invasion of Sicily, which Alciabides convinced the Athenians to undertake, he was implicated by his enemies in the defacement of religious statues and effectively exiled. He switched sides and helped the Spartans finish off the Athenians in the Peloponnesian Wars by giving them invaluable information. Once he extracted all he could from the Spartans, he aided the Persians, until finally returning to help Athens once again in their moment of weakness against the rising oligarchs, only to be bitterly exiled again.

The four texts in this book show dialogues between Socrates and Alciabides about life, experience, and politics when Alcibiades was around 21 years old and already a rising political star. (The two most significant texts are Alcibiades I and Alcibiades II.) These two men also had a love affair, as customary in those times. Within the dialogues is a strong homoerotic component where Socrates not only wants to educate Alcibiades, but seduce him as well.

Introductory highlights from the translator:

> Was Socrates in any way responsible for the ultimate failure of Alcibiades? Socrates tells us he had two loves, philosophy and Alcibiades (Gorgias 481d-482b). But what did he see in Alcibiades in the first place? What did he try to teach him, and how did he try to teach it? Why did he fail?
> …these works provide us with a rich discussion of how Athens' greatest philosopher loved and tried to teach her most talented and most ambitious youth—and why Athens turned on both of them.
> Alcibiades also made enemies among the Spartans, most notably King Agis, whose wife Timaea he was widely believed to have seduced (Alcibiades 1121b-c). In 412, when he learned that the Spartans intended to have him killed, Alcibiades took refuge with the Persian satrap Tissaphernes, and offered advice to yet another of Athens' traditional enemies.
> Alcibiades came to love Socrates, but not to love philosophy. Without this greater love he was overcome by his love for the glory only the fickle people of Athens could give—and take away.

Alcibiades was a chameleon who would switch sides to preserve his own skin and power, placing himself above the state. He made sure to always possess value for those he was dealing with to prevent them from killing him outright. He was a talented, extraordinary man that Socrates failed to temper, and who made too many enemies along the way. Those enemies examined all his actions with a microscope and exaggerated all his perceived errors. Once he was exiled a second time from Athens, he returned to the Persians, who he thought would welcome his presence. Unfortunately for him, they were now allied with Sparta, an enemy of Alcibiades at the time, and so he was killed.

Starting with Alcibiades I, Socrates schools his student to realize he does not know what he thinks he knows, and therefore has no real standing to make an upcoming political speech in front of the Athenian government. He shows this through a long line of questions that seems more like pestering and leading the witness, but of which the logic is sound (to prove one point, he builds up with a dozen or more questions). It did not seem enjoyable to be on the receiving end of Socrates' line of questioning, and if he was alive today I have no doubt he'd be labeled difficult, or even a troll.

> Socrates: Can you name anything greater than what's just and admirable and what's good and what's advantageous?

> Alcibiades: Certainly not.
> Socrates: And isn't it about these things that you say you are confused?
> Alcibiades: Yes.
> Socrates: But if you are confused, isn't it clear from what came before that not only are you ignorant of the greatest things, but not knowing them you think that you do know?
> Alcibiades: Probably.
> Socrates: Then alas, Alcibiades, what a condition you suffer from! I hesitate to name it, but since we two are alone, it must be said. You are wedded to stupidity, best of men, of the most extreme sort, as the argument accuses you and you accuse yourself. So this is why you are leaping into the affairs of the city before you have been educated. You are not the only one to suffer from this; most of those who manage the affairs of the city are the same way, except a few—perhaps your guardian, Pericles.

Socrates suggests that most human harm is caused through ignorance by someone who thinks they know but doesn't. Socrates describes how you know when someone is not ignorant:

> Socrates: …those who understand something do understand it, that they are able to produce someone else who understands it.

The path to understanding what you undertand and don't understand comes from knowing yourself:

> And don't you think it's disgraceful, if even the women of our enemies have a better idea of what sort of men we'd have to be to take them on than we do ourselves? Rather, you blessed man, be persuaded by me and the inscription at Delphi: Know Thyself—recognize that these are your opponents, not those you think. We will surpass not even one of them, if not through care and art. If you fall short of them, you will fall short of becoming a name among the Greeks and barbarians, something you seem to me to love as no one has ever loved anything else.

A lot of Socrates' arguments are set up in a way not only to enlighten the young Alcibiades, but to lavish praise upon his soul or appearance.

Socrates makes the argument for what sounds similar to the philosopher king concept of his student Plato, whereby leaders must possess wisdom, moderation, and expertise before they attempt to lead.

> Socrates: What about on a ship, if someone has the authority to do what seems right to him, but lacks the mind and the excellence of a helmsman—do you see what would happen to him and to those on board with him?
> Alcibiades: I do—they'd all perish.

> Socrates: Then in the same way, whenever a city or any office or authority lacks excellence, it follows that they will do badly?
> Alcibiades: Necessarily.
> Socrates: So one must not provide tyranny, my excellent Alcibiades, either for himself or for his city, if you two are to be happy, but excellence.

Alcibiades I ends with Socrates' foreboding in that he has failed to properly educate Alcibiades:

> Alcibiades: Well, this is how things stand, and I will begin from this point forth to care for justice.
> Socrates: I'd like you to keep on doing that. But I am filled with dread, not because I do not trust in your nature, but because I see the force of the city and fear that it will overcome both me and you.

Alcibiades II starts off with a lesson of "be careful what you wish for." The more I read ancient Greek texts, the more I realize that a lot of our modern beliefs and maxims have come from them. The construction of our reality is based upon their ideas.

> You also see that some of our fellow citizens—and this we haven't merely heard from others, but know ourselves at first hand—desired to become general and achieved this, but some of them are even now still in exile from this city, while others have ended their lives. Those who are thought to have done the best came through many dangers and fears, not only while serving as general, but when they came back to their own home, beseiged as they were by informers in no less a siege than that they endured at the hands of the enemy. The result is that some of them would pray to never have been general rather than to have served as general. Now if the dangers and labors led to some benefit, it would make sense. But, as it is, it is quite the opposite.
> You will find that it is the same way concerning children, that some who prayed before now to have them, had them, only to fall into misfortunes and griefs of the greatest sort. Some of them had children who were completely bad, and spent their whole lives in grief. Others' children were good, but met with misfortune which took them from their parents, who thus met with no less ill fortune than the others and would wish that their children had never been born.
> But even though these things and many others like them are so very clear, it is rare to find anyone who would refuse what is given, or, if he were going to get something through prayer, would stop praying. The many would not refuse tyranny, were it given to them, or the generalship, or many other things that, when present, do more harm than benefit: they would even pray to get them, if they don't have them already. A little while later they sometimes change their tune, unpraying the things they had prayed for at first. I can find no way to deny that it is truly vain for men to blame the gods by claiming that bad things come > to them from the gods. “But they themselves by their own recklessness”—or foolishness, which we should call it—“have pains beyond what is fated.”

Another interesting thought:

> So it is profitable for most people neither to know nor to think that they know, if, that is, they are more eager to do the things they know or think they know, and in so doing will be harmed most of the time rather than benefited.

In other words, it is better not to know, because if you think you know, it will cause you to embark on something that is sure to cause self-harm. People who decide on what will benefit them based on ignorance neglect to see the costs.

The Symposium text has Alcibiades drunkenly describing their intellectual and intimate relationship. He reviews both the strengths and weaknesses of Socrates and his skilled seduction powers, all in the presence of one of the philosopher’s other male lovers. It appears that Socrates seduced Alcibiades through complimentary and flowerly language while withholding all physical affection, putting Alcibiades in a state of confusion and insecurity. In modern times we do the opposite: we keep our speech void of affection and intimacy while quickly getting physical.

The text was at times too heavy on homosexual themes but I did enjoy Socrates’ thoughts on experience and life. The texts are short—you can probably finish them all in a couple of days. If you are interested in Ancient Greece, the comittment to finish these texts is quite modest.

Rotten Apple (Inc.) Poisons Cultures

March 14, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

There's a good chance you're reading this article on your iPhone. Or maybe your iPad. Or your MacBook.

A single Apple store is about as valuable as the White House.

How is this even possible?

All it takes is one girl on a date playing with her iPhone to realize that Apple is deeper into the soul of the average American than you could possibly fathom. People literally spend hours at a time playing Angry Birds, The Sims, and iMessaging their friends. Of course, all while trying to drive, walk, or do other tasks. They piss their lives away in front of a liquid crystal display.

#YOLO, right?

It's simple. Apple has completely infiltrated American culture. It has become as much of a part of our society as the NFL. An outsider could look at an American and size them up simply by the version of iPhone resting in their palm (granted this is also probably true in other countries, guess I'll find out soon).

The question is – how has Apple done it?

It's quite simple. By appealing to the masses of American culture.

Illusions

The Ritz-Carlton is one of the most famous and luxurious brands of hotels in the world. When I was in college and working a retail job, I remember I was forced to read a book during store downtime – The New Gold Standard.

The book is actually an excellent read if you want to succeed in customer service and sales. In other words, it teaches how to do a damn good job of kissing ass, making sales, and making people happy. Naturally, Apple modeled their entire "Genius" bar after a hotel concierge desk.

They staffed said bar with customer savvy, friendly people. Many of whom are utterly incapable of explaining any technology to a consumer. However, that doesn't matter, simply because of the illusion that has already been built by the time the user walks into the store.

When one walks into an Apple store, it very much seems like a happy hour. There are loads of people socializing, playing with the latest gadgets, and all the employees are dressed in casual jeans and t-shirts. The person walking into the store naturally thinks that due to the mass number of people, Apple must automatically be a great company.

By the time they have navigated the entire store, and spoke to the employees who are hand-fed notes from a luxury hotel brand, the consumers are so impressed that they are lining up outside of the store on the next iPhone launch for 12 hours in the pouring rain.

Brilliant Marketing

Apple has marketed their products so that they seem to be much, much more than simple shiny computers, phones, and tablets. If you watch some commercials and propaganda that Apple puts out, they sell their products as if they are literally human – as if they are a part of your life.

Their marketing campaigns focus much more on how the iPhone enhances your life as opposed to how it is just another cool gadget. Their entire line – iPhone, iPad, iMac – all flow perfectly with each other – me, me, me. It enhances your life and makes things easier for you.

Apple has successfully sold consumers on the need for their products to simply live, instead of as an enhancement.

Truthfully, it's brilliant.

Stupidity And Laziness Sell

This is the main reason Apple has managed to poison so many young American minds with their technology and propaganda.

From a young age, young Americans like myself are taught to look for the easiest way out. Hard work, dedication, and perseverance are becoming less and less noble qualities. Instead, shortcuts through life are not only encouraged, but expected but many of today's youth.

Children think they are entitled to a car when they turn 16 years old.

Kids think because they averaged a 3.0 in high school, they're entitled to a full ride college scholarship.

Because they graduated college, they're entitled to a job.

Since they can't find a job since they have a liberal arts degree, they're entitled to a free government ride.

However, you aren't owed shit.

Nothing is easy, as people on welfare can attest to.

Apple exploits this laziness and sense of entitlement in it's marketing. In addition to selling the need for their products, Apple has successfully managed to sell itself simply based off of the supposed ease of use of it's flagship products. Can't figure out how to email on your PC? Well, Apple's mail program will fix that. Can't edit photos? iPhoto can do that for you. Want to make a movie? Sony Vegas is too difficult, so fire up iMovie.

Americans are simply too lazy to take the time to apply themselves to learning.

Truthfully, it is America's greatest weakness as we continue to move further and further towards a leftist society, full of hipsters wearing skinny jeans and riding skateboards while they get their workout from typing on iMessage. Quite frankly, I think the executives at Apple are brilliant for marketing the way they do, and continuing to gouge people with the prices on both their products and their culture.

Apple, Inc., has continue to dangle a poisonous, but incredibly tempting piece of fruit in front of the hands of the American public. Little do Americans realize that these products continue to deteriorate our culture – making us a shell of our former social selves.

Dinner parties have been replaced by Words With Friends, real life conversations have been replaced with iMessage, and a friendly game of pickup basketball has been reduced to slinging birds into rocks across a liquid crystal display.

As cultures become more and more reliant on technology, someday, having a high score in the latest version of Angry Birds will be as much of a status symbol as driving a Porsche. One day, my Candy Crush score will be more impressive than my guitar abilities. A man will be judged more on his ability to spike attraction via text message as opposed to seducing a girl in person.

Hopefully, it does not come to that. One day, perhaps our culture will wake up from the poisons that Apple has spread.

One can only hope.

Why Do White Girls Cut Themselves?

March 14, 2014 | by inhumanist | Link | Original Link

First, I'd like to explain the provocative headline to this article. Self-mutilation is a white girl problem that is encouraged by feminism, yet another example of how feminism is overall harmful to humanity. How is it encouraged by feminism, you ask? Because feminists deny gender differences.

According to Dr. Leonard Sax in his column "Sax on Sex" which runs in *Psychology Toda*y, the gender differences between male and female self-harm are minimized by the APA and many studies of self-injury. Dr. Drew Pinsky, when interviewed by Oprah Winfrey about cutting, alluded the same, adding the aphorism, "Boys act out, girls act in." Leaving the absolute validity of Pinsky's statement aside for a moment, let's at least admit that there are significant qualitative and quantitative differences between male and female self-injury, even if it hurts feminist feelings. Some cutting is associated with legitimate trauma, and some is definitely not, as I will try to prove.

My Qualifications

I have experience with several cutters, as most men who regularly have lady-friends do. One case: we were teenagers, in a long-term relationship throughout high school. She liked to cut herself and play with the blood while writing bad poetry and drawing looney pictures. I didn't like the cutting at all, and I ordered her to stop. Most of the time, withdrawing my attention and affection worked in preventing the cutting. She would call in the morning and confess her late night urges to cut, and her late night recollection of my orders not to cut, and proudly tell me that she refrained.

Later, another long-term relationship featured a girl who was destroying herself with drugs, and physically endangering herself within drug culture. I again ordered her to stop, threatening to withdraw my affections and relations. This again worked for the most part, except for a few slip-ups over the years. I am tempted to lump these two girls' psychologies together for reasons that you will understand as I share my experiences and thoughts.

I have read the professional opinions on cutting, and I find them helpful, but often lacking. These professionals have not had to deal with cutters like I have. They did not get to know every single intimate hidden detail about these girls, like I did. Professionals have not had the kind of access I had to cutters, where I peered into their souls and was actually able to help her all on my own, without so much as a high school diploma. I also know how much girls lie on surveys of any kind, no matter how secret or helpful their comments supposedly are.

So why do girls cut? Here are some of my theories.

Trauma Vs Faking Trauma

Let me start out by reiterating my lack of qualifications to discuss cutting universally (from a medical standpoint). Many professionals point to trauma as a major association with self-mutilation. When it comes to this aspect, I am not qualified. The girls I have experience with did not suffer any trauma. They were typical suburbanite coddled white girls with fathers and mothers who did not seem to have any abusive capacities. On another note, I also know that it is a well documented fact that people fake symptoms of PTSD and other mental illnesses. This is known as “malingering” and can be researched further on your own. These two aspects of cutting are not my focus or concern here.

Attention And Boredom

My first impulse is to pin cutting on boredom and attention seeking. Yes, I know girls usually cut in secret, and I know that they hide it under their clothes. This does not mean they aren’t doing it for attention, because perhaps they do not want the attention of everyone. They want delayed gratification of their desire for attention. Perhaps they just want attention from a certain person, even if she is unsure of exactly who it is that she’s seeking in her life. Once upon a time, I believe I was that person a cutter was seeking, and I was able to get her to stop cutting. What was I to her? I was a dark, illiberal, dominant male, who occasionally got into trouble, and always took her on wild adventures. Although going to Marilyn Manson concerts gave her the urge to cut again, she didn’t. Manson and his followers are often cutters, which leads me to my next theory:

Consumerism

Do some girls cut because it is fashionable? My experience in subculture, again first-hand, leads me to conclude that many self-destructive “goth” or “emo” behaviors are nothing more than extra “guyliner,” a passing fad or a signaling of in-group orientation. Indeed, most cutters stop once they become adults, which is typically about the same time they stop wearing chain wallets and black nail polish. It is also tempting to point out that young white girls are the prodigal materialistic consumers, but their consumerism (although perhaps not their funding) is arguably exceeded by blacks, and blacks don’t cut, so to speak. So consumerism is very arguable as a cause for much cutting.

Suffering Is Important and Good

I mentioned that girls may be seeking something that they modernly do not know exists. Do girls need suffering? Are children too coddled and protected? Many countries in Europe have outright banned spankings. Do girls in Europe cut more than girls in the U.S.? I don't know. But I do know that suffering is important, and often good. And I think most people unknowingly or secretly agree.

In the intro I mentioned the girl who was destroying herself with drugs and drug culture. It turned out that one day she realized she liked to be spanked. Although I had previously given her a few swats, she suddenly wanted me to try spanking her without any associated eroticism, as a means of punishment for disobeying me. I told her that a good hard spanking was always on the table even before she brought it up, but that I am generally against spanking adults as a form of discipline. Was I wrong?

I have recently read some material about domestic discipline (i.e., spanking your wife). Apparently, as little as 100 years ago spanking your spouse was publicly discussed, normal and accepted. By Christians, even. Perhaps girls really just need a good spanking sometimes from a man they respect and love?

I have also seen children act up in order to get attention, accepting even a spanking and the subsequent lectures as acceptable forms of attention, leaving their rooms after a spanking with a joy and peace that seems to be the opposite response to a spanking. In fact, they often appear happier and less cranky after their spankings from a good parent.

Trauma Or Pastime?

I recently considered some females in the context of a young man seeking an eventual religious marriage. Here is a video I found while considering his playing field, which spurred this article about cutting, because during the video I was easily able to identify the Christian rockers as mentally unstable cutters, without ever having seen or heard of them before, without them even mentioning cutting yet. All I had to do was look at how they presented themselves, listen to what they said, and think about what stereotypes were most probable. I believe these girls fit into the categories I've discussed today: nothing traumatic happened to them but they cut nonetheless to fill a mysterious void within them.

I hope I've helped with my brutal honesty, unlike feminists who encourage cutting with their dangerous delusions about sex and gender, which harm everyone medically, economically, spiritually, and physically. If you have a cutter in your life, the first thing to do is realize that they are cutting. The latest cutter I caught tried to tell her parents it happened in the blackberry bushes. I told her dad, "Nuh-uh. She's cutting." Turned out I was right. She is supposedly doing better. I will have to check with him to see what they did to help her.

My experience has led me to believe that being a dominant, masculine, illiberal, aloof asshole-who-cares has some merit when it comes to helping girls avoid self-destruction. When it comes to a father dealing with a daughter who is cutting, I don't know. Perhaps it would be best to seek medical attention, and an experienced male spiritual counsellor, simultaneously. In my experience and in reading through the history books as well as reading peer-reviewed studies of the matter, the professional psychiatry community harms more people than the spiritual community. Just look up "religion is healthy" and you'll see the evidence you need to save your daughters from the postmodern malaise ruining Western civilization.

What I've Noticed From Being A Bouncer At An American Club

March 14, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

Despite having two college degrees, I somehow always end up returning to a weekend bouncer gig, which I have had on and off for about a decade now, at a number of different places. I have found that, like every job, it is mixed, with a variety of pros and cons.

First, the good stuff.

You get to make money on those nights when, more than any other, people are out spending it. Each month, I make enough on the weekend to pay most of my bills (though it is important here that my expenses are small), freeing me up to work for myself during the week. And if you're at the right place—for example, a bumping house club in New York City—there's solid money to be made on the side by extorting people for smoking, for doing drugs in the bathroom or VIP room, for fucking in the same, for being let in to a place from which they've been banned, for violating the dress code, and on and on and on. Managers are commonly shady, so they will either let you just get away this—especially if they aren't paying you much—or require that you break them off. Of course, they never really know just how much you are getting from ripping people off, so you can generally get away with not giving them much.

Another benefit, and a very obvious one, is access to a steady supply of hot pussy. Most women like big muscular guys, and your position at the bar or club has a certain power and authority that is a huge turn on thanks to the deep slave instinct in women (the same instinct, by the way, that accounts for their universal love of rough sex). It is similar with police and military men. Unfortunately, though, smart phones, which provide women with an overwhelming supply of men via dating sites, apps and social media, have turned most hot chicks into flakes, and I have noticed that in recent years my closing percentages have decreased accordingly.

However that may be, I have had some success over the years pulling girls with a few cheesy openers. “Staying out of trouble?” or “here comes trouble” can be followed by “I wouldn’t want to have to put you in line, you know.” Coming from a physically impressive symbol of male authority, this can be quite a turn on, with the second line—which you must say very directly, looking her in the eye, and with a low voice—as the clincher. “Let me know if any of these knuckleheads in here bother you” also works well, conveying both your power and authority and your cocky belief in your superiority over the other men in the place.

No matter your technique, working at a bar or club weekend after weekend is just like going to one many times over many years; unless you are utterly obtuse, your game will improve as you learn a lot about what works with women and what doesn’t. The simple act of being able to talk to so many over time should do a lot for your confident and direct game—which, of course, is about the only game worth running in America. It is not the case, for example, that most women here will appreciate your subtle wit or culture. Nor do you want to seem “weird” or “creepy.”

Most bouncers are working-class guys, so if you work in construction, carpentry, moving, or whatever, it’s also a good job for networking with other blue-collar types.

The personal benefits

If you are a bouncer, you are necessarily a big strong tough motherfucker. And in order to keep the job and avoid the embarrassment of getting your ass kicked, you will be motivated to stay in shape, to lift weights, or box, do MMA, and so on. It is fun, and often exhilarating, to put people in line and to break up fights and engage in the inevitable fight yourself. This provides an adrenalin rush which few men will ever know, especially in our age of half-men.

When it comes to physical toughness and pulling pussy, the confidence you take to this job should be increased by doing the job itself, and that should carry over to other areas of your life. Wherever you are, you should see yourself as a guy who is no joke and who knows how to get women in the sack and to do them right in it. Those muscles you use to carry knuckleheads out the club are also well-employed by tossing women around in bed.

You get to be yourself, which is to say, A REAL MAN. Bouncers are not yuppies, chumps, or stiff corporate types. We can knock people the fuck out, and as with other blue collar jobs, we don’t bother playing the PC game, kissing ass, or acting like some oh-so-nice cat when, like everyone, we are just out to get paid. In our soulless and emasculate corporate time, it is refreshing not to be a “good team member.”

The cons

You are stuck working on the best nights for going out (so much for Saturday night dates at 10), and though you may be down to party when your shift is over, you’ll often find that by then everyone else is wiped. Exceptions: cities which never shut down—NYC, Vegas, Miami, New Orleans.

You can get shot, stabbed, jumped, etc. This can often happen after work on your way to your car. You threw someone out—maybe you beat his ass and therefore embarrassed him—and now he wants revenge. Given this possibility, many bouncers quite sensibly carry a firearm, knife or other weapon.

You will learn to despise most women, though arguably this is a good thing—a kind of edifying necessity in the Anglo world today. Weekend after weekend, you will witness the most disgusting displays of female narcissism, entitlement, and vapidity. For attractive women, being out is in itself a very big deal, an event requiring photo after photo, which is to be put on Instagram, Facebook, and all the rest. I see groups of women taking photos of themselves all night long—like their entitlement, their vanity is inexhaustible. Looking at how quickly and frequently they strike their "group pose," all contented smiles like the "stars" at the Oscars, you might think they were professional actresses who spend all day training for the night's upcoming duck face shots: "Meow."

Even worse, almost every hottie you see will exude a stupid haughty attitude, as though she were so special simply for being highly bangable (for about a decade, that is), even though her conversation is painful, she is deeply ignorant of life and the world, and good for nothing but a few bangs before she flakes out or you can no longer endure her wretched personality. As the poet Charles Baudelaire put it: "Woman, a slave and yet vainglorious,/stupid and unashamed in her self-love." The sense of entitlement in particular is remarkable; you would not believe how often women ask me to hold their drink, as if I were a personal assistant, or give me a bratty attitude out of nowhere, as if I were some rich Daddy.

You will be saddened to see just how clueless most of your fellow men are when it comes to gaming women. So many guys in bars and clubs spend the night standing around looking bored, talking to each other, and yet it's the desire to get laid that brought them out. It either doesn't occur to them that their failure to approach women makes the night a complete waste of time, or they know but go out anyway, finding it better than another night at home playing Madden.

You will see firsthand what pussies most American men have become. What looks like it could be a "fight" is usually only laughable posturing by cowardly betas. I will commonly go up to a group of "aggressive men," by myself and without the help of my fellow bouncers, and tell them to knock it off. They are usually as compliant as the male feminist when informed of his "micro-aggressions." Granted, I can be a fearsome motherfucker in both appearance and manner, but still, we are talking about one man dealing with an entire group here.

You know that trite, irksome song which you immediately switch off whenever it comes on the radio? Well, at most places you will hear nothing but it and others like it all night along. This, of course, is no surprise; like many of the cons, it results from the general tastelessness of the American mass.

Finally, lawsuits. We live in an absurdly litigious society driven by unscrupulous lawyers and shameless moneygrubbers generally. Don't think that being a bouncer gives you the right to beat ass. Like a cop, you are there to protect the public, so save the Tyson-like hooks for self-defense. Neither should you be a bully. A real man is self-assured; he has nothing to prove.

Bouncing has given me contempt

Continuing with this theme of sadness and contempt, you will, provided you are at least somewhat intelligent, develop a general disdain for American night life, or rather, for the participants in it. In the ways they dress, dance, talk and behave, most Americans are generic idiots. Put a blindfold on and you'd be unable to distinguish them from one another; they all think the same, and so all sound the same. During the week they endure some paltry job or other, then try to justify that bland tedium through crass indulgence on the weekend. Of course, there's nothing wrong with wildly enjoying life, and I myself have had many a crazy night out, but it's not the indulgence itself but the nature of the people that merits contempt.

Conclusion

In spite of all the drawbacks, I like bouncing because I am able to make money while still being "out," and on the nights when I would otherwise be spending it. It is easy enough to meet lots of girls over time, some of them high quality bangs who don't require a lot of work. I can be myself—there's no need to play the phony PC game that characterizes white collar jobs. And having to put people in line, like the desire to avoid getting an ass kicking, motivates me to stay strong and fit.

Most Women Don’t Deserve A Good Man

March 15, 2014 | by Kilmister | Link | Original Link

Jennifer was the 22 year old bartender at my favorite local pub back home. She was friendly enough and we had a good rapport. We often would share stories of embarrassing or debaucherous nights, past and present. These usually included more of her stories than mine, seeing I am pushing 40 and she is in the prime of her partying life. I like Jennifer and I consider her a friend. She admitted to having a crush on me at one point, but we moved past that, and as girls her age often will, she quickly found many more guys to crush on, making it simple to maintain our friendship. Remember, women don’t get wet, they only jump from raft to raft.

Like many women, she would frequently demand to know where the “good guys” were, because in her mind, she really believed she deserved better than what she had. When she said this to me all I could think is, “So what exactly qualifies you, or any modern American woman as someone who deserves a good guy”? Was it when I saw you in the corner of the bar swapping tongues and getting dry humped by that guy you had just met an hour previous? Was it when you told me how the night before you had disappeared, and while everyone looked for you, you were passed out alone at some other bar and had “peed your dress”? Maybe it was when you told me how you prefer anal sex, but that was okay because your current boyfriend might be gay. Apparently he prefers only anal. She told me all of this openly.

Is there no such thing as privacy when it comes to these chicks? They will openly tell people how they don’t fuck their boyfriends anymore and casually divulge all their relationship problems to anyone that will listen. But perhaps it was the virtually naked selfie she sent me, almost like it was a reflex, when I jokingly commented how she was wearing too many clothes in a previous photo. Whatever, it's cool, they deserve better right? Who needs class when you have a vagina and plenty of lonely men around?

"I deserve a good guy though."

Jennifer had a roommate, same age, who seemed just as baffled as to where her white knight was. This despite Jennifer telling me of the countless, almost nightly random encounters her roomie had with equally random men, one who had recently given her herpes. But that was okay because it was "no big deal, it's just like having cold sores, except down there." I'm shocked how such beautiful souls can not find their equally amazing soul-mates. What is wrong with a world where two such wonderful catches are forced to navigate these treacherous seas filled with those sharks called men?

"What ever happened to chivalry?"

Like a previous article I wrote, No Woman Can Escape Mother Nature's Devastating Reality Check, I blame a lot of this on thirsty men who allow this behavior because they are too scared to be alone or, God forbid, never get laid again. It's time to call these women out on this bullshit. Stop being so scared and accommodating, which most women find repulsive anyway.

"He doesn't open doors for me."

Jennifer and her roommate are not the target here, nor the anomaly. They are just examples of an all too typical American female. The ones who feel like they can behave any way they choose and shit on whomever they want without consequence. Regardless of this, somehow when they decide they have had enough rides on the cock carousel and spread enough venereal disease, they still deserve a gentlemen to open doors for them and send roses to work on Valentine's Day so all her coworkers and Facebook friends can be like, awwwww someone loves her. The logic? Well, they are women.

They deserve this for no other reason than that. Who let them believe this? Blue pill "men" who would rather sit on a woman's bench in the hopes of one day having sex with them and men who prefer the friendzone instead of being assertive and standing up for themselves by letting these women know their behavior is far from acceptable, and actually quite insane. Sure, some blame falls on the woman as well, but to their credit they truly believe their own bullshit, and they believe it because men allow them to.

"Why can't I just find a gentlemen?"

Just cruise Facebook in your late 30s to see prime examples of this. I can sit here daily and read self-righteous, borderline preposterous posts by females I have known for years to just bounce from dick to dick without consequence or regard for the guys they called boyfriends, or in some cases husbands. Chicks I witnessed take on three dudes in a hot tub now throwing up pictures of their baby and poor husband who has no idea what a selfish slooter his wife once was, and probably still is.

Hell, the majority of women can't even hold onto any real female friends out of jealousy and envy of one another. There is no loyalty—all that matters is what they want. They are getting away with murder, acting like mother of the year because they are now too old, undesirable and tied down to be worth anything on the market. "The best thing that ever happened to me," it boasts under the family picture at Epcot Center. Wrong, she realized one day she was not the star of the show anymore. She desperately needed to dupe some unsuspecting man into locking her down and dealing with her bullshit for the rest of his life before it was too late for her. Almost anyone with an income of $50,000 or more per year will suffice, literally anyone. If she still had the ass she had when she was 22, she would still be skating around town, taking advantage of thirsty dudes willing to gamble on the warts she might pass their way, but now she can't.

Now she is the perfect mommy, looking down her nose at the twenty something's still in the game pulling off her old tricks. She will post advice filled memes and inspiring credos she never lived by to make herself appear like the mom of the year and wife of the century. She has all the answers. We all should envy her and her perfect little family.

“I deserve more.”

A large percentage of these women, while “happily married”, are still seeking attention in other ways. One thing a female cannot give up until the day she dries up is attention. I personally have a small library of photos sent to me via text or email of these types. Tits, ass, dildos inserted—you name it—some with heads chopped off for anonymity. Anyone of these women can be found on my Facebook feed with pictures of her children and husband proclaiming that these are the greatest things in their life. Right. Until she felt insecure and needed someone to compliment her tits so she can live another day. Oh, what’s that on my cell phone? Nothing crazy, just another text photo of her ass in the bathroom mirror because her and hubby had a fight today.

“Why don’t you tell me I am beautiful?”

Let’s not even get into the women I personally have hooked up with over the years who were married or had boyfriends. That was something I did mostly in my 20’s and is not worth the hassle or risk these days, but I truly don't think the average guy out there realizes what shady creatures women are by nature. I used to think it was just because we were young, and this is what young people do. Nope, because in my late 30's it's really not much different. As a matter of fact, a lot of these 30 something women are worse because their self-esteem is shot and they will do what it takes to get attention and feel like they are still desirable. Maybe a sext, maybe a blow job in the car, whatever it takes.

"Men are such assholes."

You ever notice in movies and TV shows that when a man cheats on his girl he is portrayed as a total piece of trash misogynist? But what happens when the female character cheats on her man? The man is still portrayed as a piece of trash misogynist that deserved to be cheated on. She was just a victim and we are supposed to be happy she left him for the other man. This is the mentality of the American women, and like music, it seems to only get worse with every generation.

I end this with a quote I read long ago…

> "This is a major bone of contention. Every chick I've been with gave me a sob story about how the previous guy/s cheated like crazy, and obsessed over serious trust issues. Every one of those girls cheated on me. One (who was my wife at the time) multiple times with different guys – and still refers to herself as a "classy lady with moral integrity." I know not all chicks are like this, but those who are seem to get a societal free pass. When the guy cheats, he is a dick. When a girl cheats, it's obviously because the guy is a dick. Fuck that."

He's not the only one who has had it.

25 Painful Red Pill Questions Christians Need To Ask Themselves

March 15, 2014 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Part I – Scientific Repression

1. Do I not disagree that the Roman Catholic Church played a major role in repressing all major scientific and technological innovation in Europe for the greater part of 1000 years after the fall of the Roman Empire? From approximately A.D. 400 to A.D. 1400?

2. Do I not disagree that the invention of the Gutenberg Press in 1450, and the fall of Constantinople in 1453 (resulting in an influx of more advanced Arabic & Turkish knowledge into Europe) finally began to end this Catholic stranglehold of scientific repression and knowledge enslavement?

3. Do I not disagree that the Dutch Golden Age of the 1600s was attributed to the Dutch Republic's climate of intellectual and religious tolerance? And that this religious freedom (uncommon for the era) made Dutch science and technology the most acclaimed in the world during this time?

4. Do I not disagree that Charles Darwin's Theory of Evolution in the 1800s was based upon tangible evidence and sound reasoning? And that the discoveries of dinosaurs and other fossils which are millions of years old, proves that our Earth is far older than the mere 6,000 years that many Christians believe?

5. Do I not disagree that if Christianity never existed, we could very well be at a level of technology and cultural enlightenment so unfathomably advanced, beyond our wildest dreams, in the year 2014?

Part II – Bad Popes

6. Do I not disagree that the Cadaver Synod of 897 (the posthumous ecclesiastical trial of Catholic Pope Formosus) was one of the most bizarre, freaky, and disgusting scenarios in the history of humanity?

7. Do I not disagree that Pope Stephen VI was a pitiful excuse to be leader of the Catholic Church, as his conduct towards the rotting remains of his predecessor, Pope Formosus, were extremely vile and depraved?

(The rotting corpse of Formosus was exhumed and put on trial in the so-called Cadaver Synod in January 897. With the corpse propped up on a throne, a deacon was appointed to answer for the deceased pontiff. The corpse was accordingly found guilty, stripped of its sacred vestments, and deprived of three fingers of its right hand.)

8. Do I not disagree that Pope Benedict IX was a pitiful excuse to be leader of the Catholic Church? Due to living an extremely dissolute life, having few qualifications for the papacy other than connections with a socially powerful family, being repeatedly accused of rape and murder, and for selling the papacy like it was nothing more than a commodity?

> "a disgrace to the Chair of Peter" – The Catholic Encyclopedia
> "a demon from hell in the disguise of a priest… occupied the chair of Peter and profaned the sacred mysteries of religion by his insolent courses" – Ferdinand Gregorovius, Papal Historian
> "his rapes, murders and other unspeakable acts. His life as a pope was so vile, so foul, so execrable, that I shudder to think of it"- Pope Victor III

9. Do I not disagree that Pope Nicholas V (1397-1455) was a pitiful excuse to be leader of the Catholic Church, as he authorized the King of Portugal in 1452 to enslave any and all non-believers in perpetuity through the Dum Diversas?

> The Papal Bull of Dum Diversas, 18th of June 1452
> "We grant you [Kings of Spain and Portugal] by these present documents, with our Apostolic Authority, full and free permission to invade, search out, capture, and subjugate the Saracens and pagans and any other unbelievers and enemies of Christ wherever they may be, as well as their kingdoms, duchies, counties, principalities, and other property […] and to reduce their persons into perpetual slavery."

10. Do I not disagree that Pope Urban VI was a pitiful excuse to be leader of the Catholic Church, due to his very violent temperament, and that he complained he did not hear enough screaming when Cardinals who had conspired against him were being tortured to death?

Part III – Wars & Atrocities

11. Do I not disagree on the ridiculousness that after the World War I Christmas Truces of 1914, the soldiers of various nations across Europe (all following Christianity) resumed shooting at each other the following day by order of their political and military superiors? But this time against their new found friends?

12. Do I not disagree that all of the 40,000-60,000 women in Europe and North America who were executed during the Witch Hunts that occurred between 1480-1750, were more than likely innocent of all accusations? And that these were instances of fundamentalist Christian mass hysteria and ignorance, and completely lacking in compassion or logic?

13. Do I not disagree on the ridiculousness that Wehrmacht personnel in Nazi Germany were made to invade nations, loot property, murder and enslave various 'Untermensch' (Sub Humans), and commit other heinous crimes all while wearing a belt buckle inscribed with "Gott mit uns" (God with us)?

14. Do I not disagree that the Spanish Conquistadors made an absolute mockery of the so-called "peaceful" Christian religion which they claimed to follow? By raping, pillaging, enslaving, and decimating all major Native American civilizations they came in contact with during the Age of Discovery?

15. Do I not disagree that George W. Bush claimed he was 'told by God' to end the tyranny in Iraq? And that this conflict has directly or indirectly caused the death of at least 500,000 innocent Iraqis and many thousands of U.S. troops, based on a story of lies and deception?

Part IV – Evil Bible Verses

16. Do I not disagree that Psalm 137:9 "Happy they shall be who take your little ones and dash them against the rock" is so morally repugnant that it's making infanticide sound like a party?

> ("No moral justification can be offered for this notorious concluding line. All one can do is to recall the background of outraged feeling that triggers the conclusion." – Robert Alter, Bible Scholar)

17. Do I not disagree that Peter 2:18 "Slaves, accept the authority of your master with all deference, not only those who are gentle but also those who are harsh" has no place in a civil society where all human beings have the right to personal liberty, and to appropriately retaliate when they are being oppressed?

18. Do I not disagree that Kings 2:23-24 ""From there Elisha went up to Bethel. While he was on his way, some small boys came out of the city and jeered at him. "Go up baldhead," they shouted, "go up baldhead!" The prophet turned and saw them, and he cursed them in the name of the Lord. Then two shebears came out of the woods and tore forty two of the children to pieces" is a bit of a harsh, bizarre, and exaggerated punishment for teasing a prophet of God for simply having a bald head? Especially when directed against such young children?

19. Do I not disagree that Samuel 15:2-3 "This is what the Lord of hosts has to say: 'I will punish what Amalek did to Israel when he barred his way as he was coming up from Egypt. Go, now, attack Amalek, and deal with him and all that he has under the ban. Do not spare him, but kill men and women, children and infants, oxen and sheep, camels and asses" Is a passage of wanton and indiscriminate mass murder which is not suitable for this religion of 'peace'?

20. Do I not disagree that Deuteronomy 22:28-29 "If a man is caught in the act of raping a young woman who is not engaged, he must pay fifty pieces of silver to her father. Then he must marry the young woman because he violated her, and he will never be allowed to divorce her" is sheer lunacy? What kind of God would mandate that a rape victim marry her attacker?

Part V – General Questions

21. Do I not disagree that countries such as Sweden, Norway, and the Netherlands are among the most prosperous, peaceful, and charitable societies on Earth? And that these traditionally Christian nations ironically have among the highest percentages of non-religious, agnostics, and atheists in the world?

22. Do I not disagree that the United States and Brazil, the two most populous countries on Earth where the vast majority of inhabitants claim Christianity as their religion, have far higher per capita instances of robbery, rape, and murder than largely non-religious Northern Europe?

23. Do I not disagree that the state of Mississippi is the most religious state in the USA, yet it bottoms out on many national social indicators which are not complimentary? Such as being the poorest and most obese? In addition to having the lowest life expectancy, lowest reading and math scores, lowest prevalence of STEM careers, and the highest infant mortality rate in the nation?

24. Do I not disagree it's disheartening that God is supposed to be all-knowing and all-powerful, and capable of divine intervention, yet has never once intervened (with solid proof) to stop a good or righteous person from being tortured, mutilated, gravely injured or killed by wicked persons, animals, or the forces of nature?

25. Do I not disagree it's a ridiculous concept that God is supposed to be all-powerful and capable of miracles, yet has no power and control over something as petty as money? And that we as flesh-and-blood humans are supposed to fill the void by constantly donating to charities, churches, and other religious organizations with our hard-earned fiat currency?

Conclusion – The Red Pill Truth

> "The Christian religion is a parody on the worship of the sun, in which they put a man called Christ in the place of the sun, and pay him the adoration originally payed to the sun." – (Thomas Paine)
> "Lighthouses are more useful than Churches." – (Benjamin Franklin)
> "Avoid gurus and religions. They're bad for your mental health, and they want your money." – (Richard Sutphen)

What Happened To Coming Of Age Movies For Boys?

> From Stephen King's, "The Body"

Most every culture in the world has some sort of ritual to signify a child's passage into adulthood. The transition from childhood to adulthood might be one the most life-changing experiences a person can go through.

The transition from an innocent, wide-eyed child into a mature, sober adult is an incredibly significant period of time in a person's life. Jewish folk have Bar Mitzvah's for their boys, many cultures have ceremonies following a girl's first menstruation. What is certain is that children — passing into adulthood — need guidance from their elders about how to mature into a fully-fleshed adult.

America does not that have that in a healthy way. We get movies — like Superbad — that show boys growing into adults without any guidance from neither their male relatives or female family members. Presently, we get these ridiculous tales about immature boys fumbling around, chasing women in immature ways, only to realize that they are each other's bros. Sorry, that sounds like an inversion of chick flicks: women fighting over men, only to conclude that their friendship is more important than chasing cock.

It wasn't always this way. Stephen King's novella, The Body, was eventually adapted into a movie by Rob Reiner called Stand By Me; it stands in stark contrast with the childish posture of Superbad.

In Stand By Me, a group of young boys go searching for the body of a dead man – the body of a missing person in the community. The body is some miles away in a forest, right beside some train tracks. Their adventure over the course of two days shows a group of young boys — on the cusp of manhood — stridling both childhood and manhood. Their individual struggles are laid bare; their dreams for the future are sketched out. The tale is a retrospective, as we learn that none of their lives play out in ways they don't expect – only the narrator achieves success in life.

It is a well told tale that has the honesty of a time gone by. The struggle wasn't over pussy, money or friendship. Friendship was assumed and the needless preoccupation with chasing sex hadn't taken hold. No, these were four boys who were worried about their future, their place in the world and the personal failings of their respective parents.

The narrator dealt with the death of his older brother, who was the star child. He was the star football player, the popular one in high school. He was killed in Vietnam and his family had never been the same since – it's clear his parents are indifferent to him. His existential loneliness is matched by his best friend's abusive, alcoholic father. He is trying to overcome the "white trash" label and achieve success beyond being a union man and addicted to the bottle like his father. His sole source of support is the narrator. The other two boys have stories, but they are not relevant here.

The boys supported one another — faults and all — not with the immature, self-absorbed preening we see in later coming of age movies. They truly support one another, despite all the hell they give each other. The ending isn't some celebration of friendship, it is a lamentation of the author. He and the best friend study hard through high school and his best friend transcends everybody's expectations for him, eventually going on to law school after undergraduate.

The narrator eventually learns that his old friend stepped between two men arguing at a McDonald's – a knife gets pulled and he gets mortally wounded. The story ends with the narrator contemplating the fickleness of success in life and how the more things change, the more they stay the same. How true change is so very difficult. The movie concludes with Ben E. King's song Stand By Me playing as the narrator goes out to his front yard and plays with his two sons.

The novella was penned in the late '70's, the movie came out in the 1980's. In the 1990's, a movie called American Pie got released. While it tries in vain to be thoughtful at the end, it seems the growth into adulthood for men had become something of a huge joke.

Admit it, you liked the movie. It was very funny with many memorable scenes and lines. The infantile posture of the movie is worn at the edges a good bit by the pursuit of love instead of sex with women. However, there are two issues here. One, is the fact that the height of a man's experiences is heterosexual coitus.

Further, a boy becomes a man when he loses his virginity, presumably to a female. The height of a man's experiences in life are many, but to place sex at the apex is downright lunacy. The mastering of a craft, raising children into adulthood and inner peace are all more important than skirt chasing or a relationship with a woman. Now, this isn't to say that those former two concepts are not important — they are — but the trick here is to get men to value them in a way that mirrors girl's growth into adulthood.

Nowadays, as we see in American Pie, is that boys don't become men because they went on a vision quest or spent great time and effort preparing for their Bar Mitzvah.

No, it's when they first garner a woman's approval through sexual congress. It isn't getting married to a woman, it isn't working hard through your teenage years to become the man you want to be. No, it is that a man can simply garner a woman's sexual approval. The whole chasing love in American Pie is simply a poorly veiled smokescreen for a society that does not truly value love and relationships, but one that idolizes sex.

So, it isn't of becoming a man when you get married and start a family, it shrinks back to simply to be able to say you can have sex with women. This isn't progress, it is madness. Getting married already implies sexual access, but also the legitimization of a relationship that will result in children and involvement in the community. It is puerile nonsense, but we haven't bottomed out yet.

Superbad was released in 2007, to great financial success and critical approval. I will assume you have watched the movie, but it involves a group of young men — the same age as the characters in American Pie — but something has changed. One main character (Jonah Hill) is extremely fat, the nebbish nerd (Michael Cera) is many steps back from his counterpart in American Pie (Finch) and the loser (McLovin) is a complete and utter goober. The loser gets laid for a few seconds before getting busted by the cops raiding the party. The other two main characters don't get laid at all — so they don't even reach the all-important goal of female sexual approval — but it is hinted at the ending when they might have a shot with their respective ladies.

What do we learn in Superbad? Friendship is important. Sex is something that a man might get. Nothing else. Unlike their counterparts in American Pie, who all actually get laid and make decisions about relationships — in Superbad, all we get are some losers attempting to woo women with being able to acquire booze.

The guys in American Pie tried to learn to eat women out, spread gossip about their cock size and other ways to garner female sexual approval while Superbad is about provisioning women with alcohol. Alcohol has gone from the substantial grease of social interactions between men and women — by the time Superbad rolls around –to the common necessary heterosexual denominator.

All of this stands in astoundingly stark contrast with Stand By Me. First off, the maturation process begins at puberty, not some needlessly delayed state in late adolescence. Second, girls are something discussed, but not obsessed over. The boys in Stand By Me are worried about their parents, their future and what it means to be a man. Superbad doesn't even entertain any existence outside of chasing pussy; American Pie places vague emphasis on "the next step," which is inextricably bound up in chasing said pussy.

Lastly, is the seriousness that accompanies the coming of age in Stand By Me. There are more than a few funny, chuckle-worthy scenes. However, there are more than a few scenes that make you think and feel things, instead of the pursuit of sheer hedonism and the all-important approval of women. In Superbad, we get a bunch of funny nonsense that relates nothing to becoming a man, but to the infantile fumblings that Hollywood knows these young men engage in. American Pie is marginally better, but the growth of a boy into a man is heralded by consummating a relationship with a woman; one man is shamed for seeking to take his girlfriend's virginity above all else.

So what happened to boys' coming of age movies? Clearly, it has descended into little more than boys — growing into men — tying their sense of self as a man into pussy. The more articulate point is that a man's worth as a man is determined by his relationship with women – can he get laid? Who are the women he gets laid with? This relates to the general social concept that men need social approval of women to be seen as not a threat. Older men need a wife or girlfriend to voice approval, otherwise said man is a dead man walking in the court of social opinion.

This relates to coming of age movies, as the growth into manhood signified by puberty necessarily entails the concurrent sexual tension. Instead of seeking approval of the mother or female teacher, it becomes a pursuit of female approval in the sexual arena. As evidenced by Stand By Me, this pursuit was important, but simply one folder of issues to discuss. By American Pie it is the largest folder, by Superbad — outside of immature appeals to male camaraderie — it is the sole folder.

Now, there is nothing wrong with the pursuit of sex, obviously. However, when sex revolves around the idea that boys become men via the elusive and ephemeral approval of women, it becomes toxic. Tying manhood to perceptions and approval of women is downright dangerous. All it results in are men with — at best — shifty self-concepts, if not outright low self-esteem and confusion over what it means to be a man. Notice the progression in the three movies: boys growing into men transcending their realities, boys growing into men treading water to boys tumbling down the rabbit hole of sheer insecurity.

Of course, boys are best served with having a strong male father in their life. Most will not be so lucky. A cheap, but positive, consolation prize would be to have positive renditions of boys understanding the growth into manhood in media. Not some mindless nonsense with booze, boobs and tomfoolery. I love all three of those, but those are terribly poor approximations for the growth a boy will have to make into adulthood. It must be tempered with the sober realities of adulthood, the real consequences of your actions when you are no longer considered a child.

Without a critical and honest valuation of one’s own life, a man can never truly life a full life, much less be an adult. Adolescence may be many things, but learning to transcend the infantile and self-absorbed habits of a newly biologically-minted adult is possibly the most crucial thing. When boys are shunted into nothing more than pursuing their base, deeply-rooted biological impulses, they exist as nothing more than caricatures of men – an all too easily mocked segment of society. They are prevented from fully shedding their boyhood and embracing manhood fully – they simply become approximations of manhood. They become the superfan at the Giants game who never bothered to carve out his own legacy as a man. Instead, he proudly wears the jersey of Eli Manning, vainly trying to own the accomplishments of another man.

Media doesn't do men any favors — media revolves around white women. Any serious movie that tries to display the real growth from boyhood to manhood won't succeed. Women might like it hypothetically, as it involves children – but there cannot be anything that truly documents a boy's growth into manhood. King's Stand By Me wisely only had a tiny bit about the actual future of the boys. Positive masculinity, proper manhood — however you want to characterize it — cannot be broadcast in wider media. Men simply existing without a preeminent level of female approval is absolutely abhorrent to the average female. Women consider it "progress," but it is nothing but yet another negative yoke foisted on men.

Boys deserve better, we men deserved better. But, this is where we are. The bare shreds of masculinity we are gifted at the apparent expense of women at large are of little consolation for our lack of resources to grow into men. The lack of male role models coupled with the crippling need to chase female approval result in the men we have post Superbad. Soft men, frantically concerned over female approval, substituting pussy for personal growth.

This is what society wants from men. You could say it's wrong, it's foul, it's whatever superlative you want to insert here. However, this what society wants from men. A gang of insecure, immature men who want nothing more than the singing approval of a woman.

The Largest Factor That Determines A Man’s Perceived Value

March 16, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Men perceive women primarily based on their looks. When you see a cutie walking by you, what do you notice? If you’re a straight, regular dude then it’s her figure, face, and style. You rarely preoccupy your mind with thoughts of what she’s doing, whether she’s an accountant or a nurse, or anything else.

You can take that same girl and change the scenery from the street to the bar to the airport to the mall and your perception of her will only marginally change, if at all.

So what do women notice in men? I’ll use two recent examples from my life to paint you a picture.

1. In My Zone

One of my current gigs is personal training at an upscale city facility.

While I’m training my clients here, the amount of eye-fucking that comes my way from the women around the gym is too high to be measured. You’d also be surprised at the number of women that “forget the wifi password” or “want to know where the water fountain is”. They see a familiar face that also happens to be a figure of authority at the location, and they’re interested.

2. Out Of My Zone

On a different note, I’ve recently picked up training Muay Thai at at local gym. It’s mostly men that train there, but there are a handful of girls– some of them quite attractive. Do they give me the same devious stares that the cardio bunnies and soccer moms at the gym throw my way? Hell no, they take their flirting at aim it at the instructors. And that's fine by me– I'm here to learn how to fight. But the picture this distinction paints is of the utmost importance for men to recognize. It clearly illustrates the following concept:

Know Your Value At Your Current Location

If you're at a location where people know you and women seem to take extra notice of you, then it's probably a good place to approach and get results. If you're at a location where you're a relative stranger amongst regulars, then it's likely you're just wasting your time if you try to game.

It's also important to also recognize the middle of the spectrum. Public places like malls and airports are usually neutral. In these spots you'll be perceived primarily based on your looks. I want to make it clear that you'll still be evaluated on your looks at the aforementioned places, but assuming you're not Beavis or Butthead, and you know how to dress, then they shouldn't be a barrier to success.

By focusing your time and energy on gaming or refraining from gaming, depending on your current location, you'll see far better results and waste far less time. More importantly, you'll avoid the confidence hit that a lot of guys suffer when they're at a location where they have little value, and they consequently see no results. Don't make the mistake of lowering your own valuation of yourself because you're at a spot full of dudes who all the girls already know. But at the same time, if you see something you like, don't let it stop you from trying.

Check out my new book The Book of Alpha for more advice on building confidence and improving your success.

Stay Away From Me American Woman

March 16, 2014 | by ephemerae | Link | Original Link

Nearly 45 years ago, Canadian band The Guess Who released one of classic rock's archetypal hits to critical acclaim, quickly reaching #1 on the Billboard Top 100 list. What originally was meant as an allegorical critique on American foreign policy regarding the Vietnam war, portraying the country as an unstable woman, the dust of the 20th century has settled and we can now analyze the song in a more literal way.

Though its lyrics may be simplistic, they have come to perfectly encapsulate the turbulent and chaotic behavior of young Anglo women in the 21st century. Right off the bat, lyricist and singer Burton Cummings goes for the jugular:

American woman, stay away from me
American woman, mama, let me be
Don't come a-hangin' around my door
I don't wanna see your face no more

Recently, a UK study concluded that divorced men are more likely to abuse drugs and alcohol, have high blood pressure, heart disease, strokes, and are 39% more likely to commit suicide. While the study's statistics are significant, they are hardly surprising. According to the 2006 Canadian census, there were 8.6 million families at roughly 2.5 people per household. Considering that here in Canada, roughly 50% of those marriages end in divorce, 75% of them being initiated by women, 3.25 million men will be taken to the proverbial cleaners – unwillingly exposed to the serious health risks mentioned above, not to mention the financial burden it will place on them to continue to support their broken household. With figures like these, it is hardly surprising marriage rates have been steadily declining for the last 60 years.

I got more important things to do
Than spend my time growin' old with you

As noted in the marriage rates above, men are increasingly choosing to opt out of marriage and make more sensible life choices. Whether it be to devote time to a personal side business, travel extensively, master a skill or hobby, or simply bed as many young women as possible, young men are simply no longer interested in buying a depreciating asset – they would rather invest the time and money back into themselves to become a person of true value and worth.

Simply put, there are absolutely no incentives for men to get married and grow old with a woman, picking one or several of the above "more important things to do" is far more rewarding financially and emotionally than walking down the aisle. Oddly enough, it is this investing in oneself to create a well-rounded man who creates an incredible attraction from women, making it a romantically rewarding choice as well.

Coloured lights can hypnotize
Sparkle someone else's eyes
Now woman, I said get away
American woman, listen what I say, hey

Recently covered on Return of Kings are two cases of young men driven to kill by the allure of a woman, Why Young Men Need the Red Pill and The Tragedy of Letting a Broken Woman Into Your Life. Not to ignore the strong possibility of personal trauma or mental illness bubbling below the surface of these adolescent minds, but Kell and Wade were each so consumed with desire for a specific woman in their life that they resorted to theft, deceit, violence, and even murder in hopes of winning their affection.

As two isolated incidents, the truly sad fact is that most cases like this go unreported. While most differ wildly in scope, severity and outcome, anecdotal evidence confirms that events where men are emotionally enslaved to aiming to please a woman happen on a daily basis. We all know of a man, whether close friend or acquaintance, recently or years ago, who went to extreme lengths in hopes of winning over a woman. It started out innocently, constantly striking up awkward conversations, trying to buy her attention with gifts and promises, then turned serious with stalking, threats, attempts at controlling, or sometimes worse.

Whether the choice is to seek the greener pastures of foreign countries or simply sleep with easy North American women without commitment, men are increasingly becoming aware of the poisonous frame of mind many of these Anglo women now have. A realization has occurred, long overdue, by the sexual market place's elite men: these women are attempting to coerce, convince, and pressure them into submission. These men have then made a conscious choice to either avoid them altogether, or learn to extract as much sex from them while limiting what they exchange in commitment and resources. They have bowed out of the race, and will let the next chump's eyes be sparkled with something glittery that is not gold.

With these three small and brief quotes from a classic rock song, we can extract an incredible amount of information about the current state of women and their motives. One can only wonder, that some 44 years ago, the men writing the song would ever have any idea that their definitive single would foreshadow the decline of the once great creature, the American Woman.

Why Is Juan Pablo The Worst Bachelor Ever?

March 17, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

When it comes to reality television, few franchises are better known to Americans than “The Bachelor”. Essentially a dating game show of sorts, The Bachelor centers around one dude (“the bachelor”) choosing one partner from a pool of 25 to 30 young, attractive contestants. The bachelor spends the bulk of the show going on romantic—often cheesy, stereotypical and clearly contrived—dates with the contestants who he gradually eliminates over time. At the end of the show, the last girl standing is declared the winner. She gets a rose and the bachelor is supposed to then propose, creating an extremely “romantic”, fairytale finale.

As you can guess, the show is pretty much chick-crack, akin to your typical daytime soap opera or Twilight movie. The bachelor is almost always an extremely good looking, well-off guy and much of the show is designed to sell the fantasy fairy-tale romance idea to a female audience. It is a real-life Disney movie: the bachelor is the prince, and the winner is the princess. This stuff sells: The Bachelor has been running for 18 seasons.

The most recent bachelor is Juan Pablo Galavis, a Venezuelan who had spent several years playing professional soccer in Venezuela and the USA:

Juan arrived on the scene to much fanfare. He was the show's first ever Hispanic bachelor, and that angle was played up quite a bit. Female pundits across the entertainment world seemed to have nothing bad to say about him – all they could do was gush. The honeymoon hasn't lasted, however. The Bachelor's 18th season finale has just aired and Juan Pablo is now considered by many to be the worst bachelor ever:

> ABC's "Bachelor" fairy tale is apparently a nightmare behind the scenes this season. Juan Pablo Galavis, the current bachelor, is causing quite a stir for the hit romance reality series and producers aren't happy about it.
> "Everyone on the show is just so over him and cannot wait for this season to be over," a source connected to "The Bachelor" told E! News.

Juan Pablo hasn't been warmly received on social media either:

> I knew from day 1. I HATE #JuanPablo sooo much. I feel awful for every girl, including the one with the final rose.
> — Sarah Hyland (@Sarah_Hyland) March 11, 2014

> OMG i want to stab this narcissistic idiot… PAINNNNNNN
> — Kirstie Alley (@kirstiealley) March 11, 2014

> I HATE THIS ASSHOLE!!! He is a jerk!!!! STRAIGHT UP!!
> — Kirstie Alley (@kirstiealley) March 11, 2014

> I wish she had spit in his face….ok fair enough… imma hot blooded Latino …wait…wut? hello? jeez! biggest asshat in the WORLD
> — Kirstie Alley (@kirstiealley) March 11, 2014

So, what did this guy do to earn such vitriol?

1. He didn't sell the dream

A while ago I authored an article designed to explain why famous men become outspoken feminists. In it, I outlined the need for famous men to play to the fantasies and desires of their infatuated female audience in order to grow and maintain their fame. Male sex symbols in Hollywood are essentially selling the dream: their female fans are in love with them, and it is their job to continue to perpetuate that "fantasy relationship" between themselves and all of those women.

The Bachelor is just another conduit through which this kind of marketing takes place. Nevermind the fact that the show's plot is a bit absurd and unrealistic to begin with (falling in love over the course of a couple of months on a reality TV show? Sure). The show's largely female fanbase is most heavily invested in the fantasy that the show represents: one perfect prince choosing his special princess (after an inordinate amount of time spent "falling for" one another in a host of extremely romantic locales), declaring his deep undying love for her, proposing to her, and whisking her away at the end of the season finale to live happily ever after.

Juan failed to keep this dream alive. He chose a winner, but didn't propose to her at the end of the show because he (wisely, I might add) figured that he can't propose to someone he pretty much just met. That means no fairytale wedding:

> We already know what happened to Clare, but the other final woman, Nikki, "won" this season only by a technicality. Juan Pablo picked out an engagement ring but then refused to put it on her finger because he wasn't "100% sure" he wanted to propose. (The ring is now reportedly with "Bachelor" producers.)

When interviewed with his chosen winner at the end of the season and asked if he loved her, Juan Pablo was noncommittal. There go any notions of epic romance:

> When "Bachelor" host Chris Harrison asked him directly whether he was in love with Nikki, Juan Pablo replied, "I'm not going to answer that question."

Juan was also remarkably honest in his dealings with the women he interacted with:

> Juan Pablo Galavis is known for his shocking comments, but last night's confession to Clare Crawley takes the cake.
> During his helicopter date in St. Lucia with the 32-year-old on the Bachelor finale, viewers didn't get to see what Juan Pablo told Clare that irked her.
> Apparently, Clare told her leading man at the time, "just tell me you love me," and he responded with, "I loved fucking you, but I don't know you."
> During Clare's final one-on-one interview confessional on the show, she explained how hurt she was by his comment.
> "I'm shocked," Clare said. "He chose to tell me something that no woman wants to hear. That he doesn't know me and some sexual thing I don't want to repeat.

> It was insulting and it was offensive."

…but it was honest. Clare wanted a confession of love from a man she met on a reality TV show and had only known for less than two months. Juan Pablo just gave her reality: "You're good in bed, but what love do you expect me to fall into within just a few weeks of even meeting you and even less time than that spent talking to you one on one?"

Trista Sutter, a former contestant on the Bachelor, complains that Juan Pablo was not "respectful" enough:

> Unfortunately, a lack of respect seems to have been a consistent theme throughout the season for Juan Pablo and last night was no exception.
> • Instead of whispering sweet nothings about how beautiful she was or how lucky he was to have her there with him, he decided to use private time with Clare to tell her how horny he was… or something to that effect.
> • Instead of opening up to Clare during their final date and sharing his concerns about their ups and downs then stringing her along by talking about their future in Sacramento and having babies, he decides to keep it to himself until she's standing across from him professing her belief in him and love for him. THEN he has the gall to go in for a disingenuous hug without letting her process her broken heart.
> • Instead of choosing to tell Nikki how ecstatic he is to start a new adventure with her away from prying eyes of cameramen and producers, he tells her that he is 100 percent positive that he does not want to propose to her. What woman wants to hear that? NOT ONE! Especially one that is hoping for you to get down on one knee.

In the mind of Trista Sutter (and most women like her), the word “respectful” means telling women what they want to hear. Not what you actually think, or what actually is, but whatever she considers appropriate. Women dictate the narrative in her mind.

> And let me be clear…I am by no means confused that JP isn’t in love. I am confused as 2 why being disrespectful & rude are called honest.
> — Trista Sutter (@tristasutter) March 11, 2014

Juan Pablo chose to tell the truth, and therein lies the problem. Truth is not the fantasy that women tuning in to watch The Bachelor are looking for. They want to see an epic romance fit for a Disney movie.

Juan Pablo instead gave them the all-too realistic musings of a single guy who had plenty of romantic options and didn’t care all that much about the delusions (ex: girl wants to tell Juan she’s fallen deeply in love with him after less than two months together on reality tv? lol) and feelings of a bunch of women he’d only known for a month or two at most. He simply said and did with them as he honestly pleased, and gave few fucks how they felt about it. These women want their TV (and the men on it) to cater to their every whim, and Juan Pablo wasn’t interested in that.

2. He was politically incorrect

Juan Pablo was asked quite directly about the prospect of there being a gay or bisexual Bachelor at some point in time. His response?

> When asked whether or not he thought the hit ABC reality show featuring a gay or bisexual bachelor would be a “good idea,” Juan Pablo Galavis reportedly told The TV Page’s Sean Daly, “No… I respect [gay people] but, honestly, I don’t think it’s a good example for kids…”
> “Obviously people have their husband and wife and kids and that is how we are brought up. Now there is fathers having kids and all that, and it is hard for me to understand that too in the sense of a household having peoples… Two parents sleeping in the same bed and the kid going into bed… It is confusing in a sense.”
> Galavis, who is the show’s first Latino bachelor, also stated that “there’s this thing about gay people… it seems to me, and I don’t know if I’m mistaken or not… but they’re more ‘pervert’ in a sense. And to me the show would be too strong… too hard to watch.”

These are not the kind of views that go over well in mainstream American media.

3. He was a “sexist”

In the USA, men are conditioned to buy into the notion that gender roles are primarily social constructs, that all bodies are beautiful, and that men and women are the same.

These are attitudes that really aren't widespread outside of the Anglosphere, and Juan Pablo basically provided highly sheltered American women (who are generally used to getting what they want to see from the mainstream media) with a rude awakening to this reality. Juan Pablo was born in the United States, but moved back to Venezuela with his family at the age of two and didn't return to the USA until he went to college. After 4 years in university, he promptly returned to Venezuela. This is a man who hasn't been raised in the American bubble, and didn't care to act like it (skip to 1:35 in the video):

> Here's what he told Keltie about meals after 7.
> Keltie: And bread maybe? Girls love carbs.
> Juan Pablo: No, no carbs after 7, I will not give you carbs.
> Keltie: Why?
> Juan Pablo: I'll do that for lunch. Just because you want to keep your, you know… makes hourglass symbol with hands to reference a slim female figure

Juan wants his women in shape, and he isn't afraid to say it. He has standards he expects the women in his life to meet, and he isn't afraid to articulate them. He sees women who want to be treated like special snowflakes free of all consequences and obligations, and he's not willing to play along.

All in all, much of the controversy surrounding Juan Pablo is, in my estimation, the product of a culture clash. Juan Pablo comes from a society where the media doesn't really cater to women to quite the extent that it does in the US, Canada, and the rest of the developed Anglosphere. He is not used to playing the game because, where he is from, it isn't played so often. Feel-good delusions about gender aren't as commonly passed around in the media as fact in most other parts of the world, and decisively politically incorrect points of view are still widely and openly embraced in most parts of the planet.

What Juan Pablo said with regard to his preference for women not eating after 7PM in order to keep their figure is highly controversial in American media, but in his native Venezuela (and just about any other part of Latin America) it is likely that nobody would blink twice at that comment. The same goes for most of Southern and Eastern Europe, just about all of Africa, the entirety of the Caribbean and the bulk of the Asian continent.

Juan, by virtue of his status as a product of this “outside world”, brought this reality home to American television. This is how the real world is, and your average American woman doesn’t want any part of it. She simply cannot cope with perspectives that don’t put her on a pedestal and prioritize her wants and needs above all else, even if said desires are totally absurd (ex: expecting an extremely good looking, well-off guy with plenty of beautiful female suitors to fall deeply in love with you and then propose to you after less than two months of association on reality television). American society will cater to her and often prevent her from ever having to face harsher reality, but most others will not. Her feelings just aren’t that important to most in the wider world, as Juan Pablo has illustrated.

Trista Sutter offers one last bit of commentary that can wrap up our insight into the perception of Juan Pablo:

> It is one thing to speak from the heart in the interest of honesty and entirely > another to speak your mind in a disrespectful way without compassion or understanding. Honesty is a huge component in successful relationships, but you must choose your words wisely in order to prevent hurtful results and it seems that there is no filter for Juan Pablo. It makes me wonder how he is with his [four year old] daughter. Does he tell her she is horrible at something she is struggling with, in the interest of honesty, or does he tell her how proud he is that she is trying her best and that's all she can do, in the interest of compassion? My hope is that he will take this opportunity and consciously choose kindness over honesty no matter whom he is speaking to… not only for his own benefit, but for the happiness of Nikki as well as Camila and all the people in his life.

Sutter is making her appeal here by asking that Juan Pablo treat Nikki (the contestant he chose as the winner of The Bachelor this season) and other women like her in the same way he treats his daughter, Camila. By drawing a parallel between the way he interacts with both, Sutter implies that they should be treated similarly, "in the interest of compassion".

Camila is four years old. Nikki is 26.

This fully mature, 42 year old woman is essentially expressing her desire for Juan Pablo and men like him to treat grown women like small children. Trista Sutter has, unwittingly, concurred with the old patriarchal notion that women are like children and should be treated accordingly. Events on the show itself are in line with this notion: Juan Pablo tried to treat the women he met like mature, reasonable adults, and that was too much for their extremely fragile egos. They needed to be handled with kid gloves.

I like Juan Pablo, but I can see why he's attracted so much controversy as "The Bachelor". He was too real, and reality is not in demand here. That honesty is what makes him "The Worst Bachelor Ever" in the eyes of a society so heavily invested in delusions associated with the fantasy that the show tries to present.

At the end of the day, one fact remains…

Stop Being Such A Fucking Faggot

March 17, 2014 | by LoftBoy | Link | Original Link

If you're reading this, you are, in all likelihood, a fucking faggot. You've probably been reading manosphere blogs for the past several hours, with a break here and there to jack off to fucking cartoon porn. You nutted on your own tits and didn't even bother to clean it off. In other words, you're a fucking faggot. Fuck you.

If you spend more time studying fucking game, anti-feminist theory, or other such bullshit than actually putting this shit into practice, then get the fuck off the internet. If you'd rather sit in front of a fucking screen and debate the merits of an "HB3.14 Virgin East Asian Angel" vs. an "HB9 American Man-Jawed Cock-Juggling ThunderCunt," with your buddies than dive head first into a soft pink pussy, nobody can help you. You probably don't deserve to live. You need to get the fuck off the internet, stop talking about fucking girls like it's some fucking trading card game like Yu-Gi-Oh! and do something with your as-of-now worthless life.

Fuck Your Mindset, Faggot

You can sit on the internet and bitch and moan about how There Are No Good Women Left!™, All Girls Are Sluts!™, Women Entered The Workforce And Stole All Our Jobs!™, or other oft-repeated phrases within the 'sphere, but in the end you're just a pussy. You bitching on the internet isn't going to solve anything. If anything, it invalidates everything said here. Do you think that you gain credence by having a bunch of fat-ass keyboard jockeys barely being able to type through all the dried cum on their keyboards about how much they hate women? Of course you hate women—women hate you too. Not because you're a man. Because you're a fucking faggot.

You operate under the false pretense that the only opportunities are those that already exist. You're too fucking scared to create something of your own. Jesus Christ, the earth is literally a fucking rock moving through space—everything you see had to be built by other people. Yet you still sit there on your computer, not doing shit. If you're unsatisfied with the world as is, make changes. There's nothing separating you from fucking Bill Gates or Vladimir Putin or any other powerful motherfucker except for ambition, hard work, and maybe some testicular fortitude. Seriously, they're just people, just like you. The only thing holding you back is yourself.

Hell, the United Motherfucking States of America was founded because the forefathers, whose sacks were so fucking big that they had to wear slings just to hold them up, were pissed off at the Powers That Be. The only difference between you and them is that they decided to fight the fuck back, rather than sit back, stuff their face with another Krispy Kreme, and watch some more BBW bondage porn. Get the fuck up. Now. You already know that you hate feminists, the government, whatever it is that you hate. You know why you hate them. You've probably read up plenty on game too. So answer this: why the fuck are you still here?

You Need To Change

Unless you're jacked as fuck, rich as fuck, and have pussy literally lining up outside your door for miles just for the chance to ride your dick, then you still have work to do. Log off. Lift weights. Read non-fiction books. Start a fucking business. Approach girls. Stop focusing so much on goddamn theory and start doing. Don't think. Just do. When you've reached a plateau that you just can't seem to get over, then you can come back for more theory.

You're not going to be on your deathbed wishing you had read more fucking blogs. The purpose of this whole community isn't to just brew up a shitstorm of impotent anger; it's to give you the tools you need to reach your potential in all aspects of your life. Chances are, you've read enough to know how to get started. So get started. Stop using manosphere blogs as a tool to justify your procrastination. Thinking that you need to just keep reading, that you're not quite ready to go out into the world yet, is fucking bullshit—that's YOUR rationalization hamster spinning. Be a fucking explorer. Be a pioneer. You already have what it takes.

From Here On Out

Any obstacle in your path will probably be built by man, therefore it can be torn down by man. Fuck, feminism was created by WOMEN. You all claim to be so superior to them, yet you bitch and moan that THEIR ideology is holding you back. Something created by your INFERIORS is holding you back. Realize how ludicrous that sounds.

If a fucking child challenged you to a fight, would you bitch and moan and let him walk all over you? No—you'd either scold him like the child he, kick his fucking face in, or give him a titty twister or some shit. He’s not holding you back. And what are women, but overgrown children?

Feminism is only as legitimate as you allow it to be. It became such a powerful force because the men in power built it up. If you want to take it down, you have to become a man in power. And you’re not going to do this by sitting on your ass, not doing shit all day long. So get the fuck off the internet and become something great. Don’t complain about how the big, bad feminists are too powerful and that there’s nothing you can do to stop them.

There was also a time when the sun never set on the British empire, but look at them now. All systems can be destroyed. Feminism is no different. Instead of simply trying to starve the beast by being an inactive piece of shit, go out and make something of yourself. It will make your views more legitimate. And the worst case scenario is that you live a damn good life.

Operate outside the system if you have to. Leave the country if you think that’s necessary. They only have as much power over you as you allow them to have. If you have a problem with them, tear them the fuck down. You wouldn’t allow a bully to dip his nutsack in your mouth day-in and day-out; you’d punch him in his fucking mouth. The government, feminists, the New World Order, whoever the fuck you think is in power, they’re no different. So stand the fuck up and stop being such a fucking faggot.

The Most Sincere Autobiography Ever Written

March 17, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The author of the first and most famous autobiography ever written was born in 354 A.D. in Tagaste, in Numidia, which had long been part Roman Africa. Augustine himself was likely a mix of Punic (i.e., Carthaginian), Numidian, and perhaps Roman ethnic stock, but we have no accurate image or bust of his likeness that has survived. He does not appear to have had much of a relationship with his father, but was close to his mother, St. Monica. She was a devout Christian, a new religion at the time. It is likely that maternal influence may have played some role in forming the spiritual development of her famous son.

Augustine proved to be good student in rhetoric, philosophy, and Latin. His Confessions describes with enthusiasm how the reading of Cicero's work Hortensius (now lost) fired his passion for philosophy. He would have had to learn Latin as a second language. Punic, the old Carthaginian language (a Semitic tongue derived from Phoenecian) was still the speech of the common man in his region of North Africa. He pursued women readily, as any healthy young man would, and describes these experiences in detail. He also relates in detail his robbery of a pear orchard. After completing his schooling in Carthage he cohabited with a concubine, who soon bore him a son. Such was the custom of the time. Those who know the Roman Church only in its present form would be surprised at how sexually open the early theologians of the early and medieval Church were.

One of the most touching parts of the Confessions is the passage where Augustine recounts his departure for Rome. In those days, any ambitious youth wanting to make his way in the world would at some point want to visit the Eternal City to polish off his higher education. His devout mother did not want him to go, afraid that he might die before being baptized. He pretended to agree with her, but then left secretly, a deception for which he expresses deep remorse:

> And so I lied to my mother, and to so good a mother too. So I got away from her. For this also you [God] have mercifully forgiven me, preserving me from the ocean's waters, then full of wickedness, and landing me safely at the water of your Divine Grace. As soon as I was purged with this, the tears of my mother's eyes should be dried up, with which she daily watered the ground for my sake in prayer. [V.8]

He arrived in Rome, taught for a year, then moved to Milan for another teaching position. His mother eventually joined him. He also eventually replaced his mistress for a young wife, but not before enjoying the affections of another woman. His intellectual development was volatile: at various times he flirted with Manicheism and Neoplatonism, but listening to some sermons of Ambrose, combined with his own reading, won him over to Christianity. In a ceremony with his friend Alypius and his son (from his former mistress) Aeodatus, he was baptized and entered the faith.

From this point Augustine embarked on a remarkable career of teaching, organization, and writing. It is nothing short of amazing that this man, so instrumental in laying the structural and theological foundations of the early Church, found the time to write so voluminously. His collected writings fill thousands of pages, in the clearest, simplest, and most lucid Latin prose since Caesar. Two of his works—his Confessions and his City of God—are among the classics of world literature.

Reading St. Augustine's Confessions is a deeply personal experience. Although arguably the most famous autobiography written, it is different from modern autobiographies in that it is a spiritual testament. One historian called it a "100,000 word act of contrition." And it is. Augustine addresses it directly to God, and it reads like a series of meditations on his past. What strikes the reader, and impresses him the most, is the utter sincerity of the work. There is no false modesty, no hedging, no passive-aggressive asides, no attempt to dodge or rationalize. There is only the heartfelt words of a deeply religious yet accessible and human figure. It also feels surprisingly contemporary. Somehow the pure honesty of the work wins us over completely, and we are carried along by the gentle stream of his tender prose:

> Let not the proud speak evil of me now. For that I meditate on the price of my redemption, and do eat and drink, and give to the poor. And being poor myself, desire to be filled by Him, amongst those that eat, and are satisfied. And they shall praise the God who seek him. [X.43]

The overall impression given is that of a pious man trying to help other men through the spiritual wilderness which he had to traverse before finding a belief system that gave him peace. What is shocking is to remember that this testament was written by Augustine when he was a forty-six year old bishop. His frank descriptions of his seductions, thefts, wanderings, jealousies, and theological doubts must have seemed incredible to his contemporaries. Never has a cleric so denuded himself.

Here is a theologian who has stripped himself down before the world, and revealed himself in a way that none had before or has since. To me, the Confessions has an overtly mystical tone to it, which reminded me of the writings of the medieval Islamic and Judaic mystics. If you have to read only one religious-themed book, this is the one to read. The Loeb Classical Library is to release a new translation next month, along with the original Latin text. Augustine's Latin is clear and simple, and well within the reach of a student of the language with a few years of study under his belt. The Penguin edition of the Confessions is also recommended for those desiring a less expensive option.

Augustine's later years were tempestuous. The early centuries of the Church were afire with controversies and disputes, as the new faith sought to hammer out its ideology among numerous competing heresies and visions. Politically, the world was also turbulent. The Roman Empire was on the wane, and the Church was doing its best to fill the vacuum left by the dwindling authority of the Caesars. When the Vandals surged through Spain and moved into North Africa, Augustine was still a bishop there, with authority over the region.

As the Vandal invasion progressed and the people began to suffer, he showed his physical courage by ordering other bishops not to abandon their posts, but to stay and take care of the populace. He led by example, remaining himself at Hippo. He died during the siege of his city at the age of seventy six.
