His influence was immense. In an age of war, poverty, and rising barbarism, his words and teachings had an appeal that is difficult for us to grasp now. The classical world was collapsing, and the mood of the times was to turn away from the old gods, the old rationalism, and the old ways, and seek something that would answer the needs and wants of the harried and simple man. Men had become tired of the pursuits of rationalism, money, and temporal power, and longed for an ethic that would provide certainty and comfort amid the chaos, and a hope for eternal life after a physical death. No other Church theologian (save Aquinas) has exceeded him in influence.

The new faith promised what the old religions could not: a chance to share in the fountain of grace offered by God's only son, who sacrificed himself for the redemption of every man. And no other religion of those turbulent centuries could match Christianity's profound ethical and moral teachings. His Confessions is a monument to that ethic, and the voice of the age. It is the sincerest book ever written.

5 Reasons I Am Not A Men’s Rights Activist

March 18, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

I, Billiford Honky Chubbs, am not a men’s rights activist.

Doubtless, some of you just imagined me saying that in this guys voice; but let me say it once again; I am not a Men’s Rights Activist. There are many reasons for this—well… five… so instead of a big witty introductory paragraph how about I jump right into them.

1. MRA’s Are Asking For Rights

Rights have always been granted by the powers that be either because they’re afraid men will take those rights through disobedience, or that men have already begun taking those rights through disobedience (sweet, violent disobedience) and the granting of rights is a last ditch effort at placating them. Men's Rights would entail a profound, culture shifting change in whatever country that enacted it. Thousands of people would lose their jobs, and hundreds of thousands – if not millions – would lose their ill gotten pay-cheques and financial means. Giving rights to a cause like the gays is easy – nobody is going to get shot because they openly support mos, and the economy doesn't take a hit when two butt pirates plug each other up Friday night.

On the contrary; gay marriage means more bureaucratic jobs created to cater to Mr and Mr Browndick, and when they get divorced there's more money to be made off their ruined matrimony. If there was any actual cost to giving gays rights then Obama would be on the tube every night denouncing homosexuality as one of the great sins of our times. The destruction of the frivolous divorce industry alone would be catastrophic to the robber barons and the lampreys perpetuating it. MRA's asking the government to pretty please give them rights is a futile waste of time.

2. Men's Rights Are For Weak Men

The majority of fervent MRA's come across as… well, to put it bluntly – losers. I admit, it pisses me off to see hard working guys get raped in divorce court, or to lose an opportunity at a career or entrance to a university because affirmative action means that women get preference. Yet why are all these divorced men marrying such horrible women in the first place? If you ask, you'll probably hear a cliché like "She wasn't the woman I married" but how big of a crock of bullshit is that? Any guy with actual experience with women can tell you that temperamentally and mentally, women are teenagers. Date them and their true colours begin to show after 2-6 weeks. Who woman are at 15, barring some cataclysmic event, is who they are for the rest of their lives. So for all these guys who get ass raped in court; their wives really were angels until they got that ring on them? Really?

Sorry, but I doubt it. There were always signs that the woman they married was unworthy of marriage; it's just before the marriage all those annoying, greedy habits of hers were ignored because these chumps were just so damn happy to be getting steady sex. They were blinded by the pussy because they couldn't get the milk from the cow without spending cash on dates and buying their future wives presents to buy her love. They couldn't see that they had simply rented their wives infatuation with money instead of manliness, and as soon as they put a ring on it all her obligations to him in terms of romance are done. She's won.

If men are unwilling to better themselves and learn the true nature of women (especially now, since there's no excuse due to the internet) so they can attract women through manliness instead of Beta Bucks, then they do not deserve sympathy or rights. This is the culture we live in, and there's no turning back the clock no matter how hard you stamp your foot guys. Adapt or languish. Work harder than women and beat them in the workplace, or get a career women refuse to enter because it's not a comfy office environment. As a man, Men's Rights would be nice to have but the guys who really need it have almost always put the chains on themselves. It's ridiculous to cheer on a movement of men like that, let alone be a part of it. If a man can't handle his women on his own, than no amount of laws on his side will make her submit to his will.

3. Real Social Sexual Change Lies Outside Of Rights

There's an old political strategy called Politique du Pire, which essential translates into Making Things Worse. It is a strategy which involves a minor political group intentionally aggravating a powerful political group into making said the powerful overreact against not just the aggravator group but everyone, causing increased suffering and misery amongst the masses which, in theory, would make everyone align against the superior force.

The whole of social sympathy in the west is geared toward women, sexual deviants (gays, transsexuals, etc), and the worthless segment of minorities who refuse to assimilate into the wider society. Women of course receive the majority of this sympathy. Politicians and media suck up incessantly to the ‘fairer’ sex. They constantly prattle on about how women are now the bread winners – then turn around and spout the ridiculous lie that they somehow make 70% less then men do. Movies and television portray women as being ass kicking Amazons with strength equal to men who can whore around, ignore all their financial obligations and still find the perfect prince charming to marry them the moment they want to settle down. Then news sites run stories about women suffering in the dating world, with clichéd headlines like ‘Where have all the good men gone’. Society has it’s hand directly on the pulse of woman’s happiness, and whatever is making them unhappy is studied and addressed.

And what makes women today unhappy? Manly men who treat women exactly how they treat themselves. Men who pump and dump whores, leaving them as scraps for future MRA’s to marry. Men who know that unmarried woman over 24 are a horrific waste of time and therefore only target the young, fertile femmes who haven’t slept around. Women love men who are confident and intelligent enough to treat them as the inferior beings they all know they are, yet unless they’re young and chaste these men almost never marry them. And that causes women intense unhappiness. And unhappy women upset the current societal masters, and in order to study and combat women’s unhappiness they’re going to have to study the problems between the sexes.

The more men who learn to be men, who treat women as inferiors and give value only to women who have sex with a small number of men and marry young, the more unhappy today’s modern woman will be. And to make those women happy they’re going to have to do something to start making men happy. One stud leaving a trail of ten broken hearted whores behind him is worth more (in terms of actual social change) than a thousand MRA’s picketing outside the local courthouse.

4. Men’s Rights Don’t Encourage Men To improve Themselves

Back up to the first point, MRA’s are busy asking for change instead of making a change. They want respect handed to them. That’s not how it works with men. As a man, you get respect for what you do and who you are. I only have so much time and energy to lend to social movements. I’d rather focus on encouraging five guys to make real change to themselves. If a man wants to live a better life, then he must do the following—lift weights; read great books, old and new; and realize and accept the truth of your and society’s reality. Fuck fretting about rights. As a man, fret about yourself and your own goals. The more men with fit bodies, intelligent minds and unshakable confidence, the less we’ll need Men’s Rights – we’ll already have a legion of hard ass sons of bitches taking those rights by the sheer force of their being.

5. Women

Let’s play pretend for a moment. Imagine for the last fifty or so years, there has a been a movement announcing that Blacks were superior to Asians. Asians are ridiculed in the media and blatantly told that they’re inferior to Blacks. Blacks are given more benefits, more legal power, and have their asses kissed while Asians are told how evil they are just for being Asian and that they should suck it up.

Then, after so many decades of being shat on, Asians begin to stand up for themselves. They begin to form movements for their own interests, and individually they start to become really awesome. Suddenly, there is a Asian Rights Movement. While ridiculed and belittled, Asian Rights Activists begin to recieve mainstream attention and recognition. Soon, although small, ARA’s begin to meld into the beginnings of a real political force. ARA’s appear on talk shows, radio shows, news shows and papers. Books about the Asian Rights Movement begin to be printed, the authours going on the circuit and addressing all the problems Asians face in today’s society.

And all the authour’s are black. All the ARA’s giving interviews are black. Black people are talking, as if they have authority, on what it’s like to be an Asian in today’s society. Only black’s in the Asian Rights Movement are given any kind of credence or voice. On the public stage, Asians are pushed to the background of the movement that is supposed to represent them. Isn’t that ridiculous sounding?

Well it’s no less ridiculous then women in the Men’s Rights movement. Women make up a large portion of MRA’s and not just as quiet supporters or cheerleaders as they should be. Many are among the forefront of the current Men’s Rights Movement. Men On Strike, which is currently the most mainstream literature about the problems facing men today, was written by a woman. Who then went on talk shows and talked about the book… to other women. Two women, gabbing about how the difficulties facing men. Imagine two black people on a talk show discussing how hurtful it is to be called Gook, or Chink, Or Slant Eye. They might have a slight idea but really, they don't know.

Any movement which claims to represent myself or other men, with such a pervasive female presence, is one I'm not going to be a part of. Women have no real idea what it's like to be a man. We're genetically different and our lives are lived very, very differently. Yet the MRM's is flooded with women trying to take the helm, trying to represent 'men'. And if a movement is being spearheaded by people who can't even understand the grievance of the people they're supposed to be representing, how can they be trusted to act in our best interests? The answer is that they can't. And the fact that the female presence in the MRM – beyond simply agreeing with it or giving moral support – is tolerated by the majority of MRA's is probably the biggest reason I do not consider myself a part of the movement; even though my goals and desires do match up with many of theirs.

So there you have it! Five reasons my e-mail is going to be flooded with angry hate letters and Return Of King's is going to be called the worst thing ever to happen to the Manosphere. Men – stop asking for change. Just make it.

The 4 Important Shit Tests Rocky Balboa Passed To Win Adrian

March 18, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Television and movie wives have been a staple in the fabric of American entertainment for as long as any of us can remember. From Carol Brady to Joanna Eberhart to Skyler White, these women have influenced western culture for decades. But as the years passed, masculine traits began to seep into their personas like a slow poison and before we knew it the on-screen traditional American Housewife was extinct. It wasn't long before women in the U.S. predictably followed suit. A quick look at the steep decline over the last 60 years sheds light on this runaway train.

Leave It To Beaver

The 50s and 60s gave us June Cleaver, the gold standard of what a wife should be. Doting, nurturing, and supportive, Mrs. Cleaver was the picture of femininity and grace. Her loyalty and deference to her protective, capable husband was the blueprint for women to emulate if they wanted a chance at a happy and fulfilling life as a domesticated homemaker.

The Cosby Show

Clair Huxtable was the TV wife of the 80s but this is where we start to see a noticeable change. While it's presumed that Cliff is the de facto head of household, it becomes rather clear that Mrs. Huxtable is the man of the house. When there was discourse in the family Cliff stepped in a precious few times while Claire was the judge, jury, and executioner much more often than not. The icing on the cake was that she, of all things, was a lawyer (and we all know how happy and fulfilled female attorneys are).

King Of Queens

The late 90s and early 2000s all but put the nail in the coffin of the traditional on screen housewife by force feeding Carrie Heffernan down our collective throats. The witty Mrs. Heffernan was a slick talking, fist pumping paralegal with a brash attitude and a short temper. She undoubtedly wore the pants in this relationship which was evident from the very beginning. Carrie's only redeeming qualities were her perky tits and ample ass but weight gain quickly diminished her aesthetically pleasing figure. Surprise, surprise.

Last of a dying breed

One of the last great television/movie wives makes her first appearance in the 1976 motion picture, Rocky. This timid but cute pet shop employee that stole Rocky's heart is none other than Adrian Pennino, who later became who we all know as Adrian Balboa. Most of us know the Rocky story but few acknowledge the true reasons she played such an important role in his life. One of those reasons was that she was a quality woman.

The Stallion running solid game

When Adrian met Rocky she was a shy, young, pretty girl with a submissive demeanor. Best of all, she hadn't so much as gotten in line to ride the carousel. Yes, gentlemen, Adrian was a virgin. Now Rocky wasn't the sharpest tool in the shed but even he recognized that women like her were becoming increasingly rare so he did what any man would do and took her off the market immediately.

Adrian enthusiastically took to her role as Rocky's girl as would any woman in love. Aside from cooking the meat he famously tenderized with his fists, she studiously tended to his aches and pains from training, enthusiastically offered him post-training sex, and supported him when he doubted his ability to go the distance in his upcoming fight against the heavyweight champion of the world, Apollo Creed. All of this was before she became his wife. Adrian added real value to Rocky's life because she followed his lead and seemed to be the genuine article as far as quality women go.

The other reason Adrian brought the best out of Rocky is one that is oft missed by the blue pill masses. As innocent and rare as the future Mrs. Balboa seemed to be, let's not forget one important factor: she was a woman. And while every woman is unique in her own way, their operating systems are identical. That is, all women shit test! From the most chaste Madonnas to the sluttiest whores, all women are programmed to test your mettle as a man. The reason for this is simple: if a woman is going to invest 9 months of her life carrying a man's seed, she's going to make damn sure that he has strong, masculine genes that will be passed on to her offspring. As a result, her operating system kicks in and employs a series of tests to ensure that he is a worthy donor.

Now keep in mind that most of the time this is all done on a subconscious level. When a dominant alpha male gives her 'gina tingles, she's seldom thinking thoughts like "This man is displaying masculine traits that I want passed on to my young. I must mate with him." All she knows is that she wants to be fucked stupid and her hamster is in overdrive searching for reason to justify it. She is utterly incapable explaining her insatiable desire for all of her holes to be plundered by alpha cock but her OS is on auto pilot making sure she isn't about to be impregnated by some spineless beta. Concepts like "shit test" and "cock carousel" hadn't been given actual names until recently but you can bet your salty man juice makers that they were all too prominent back in the 70s.

That said here are the 4 most important shit tests of one Adrian Balboa.

Shit Test #1: His way of life

> Adrian: "Why do you wanna fight?"
> Rocky: "Because I can't sing or dance!"

Right off the bat she tests his manhood by challenging his lifestyle early on during their first date. The answer Rocky gives her is brilliant because it sets the tone for the relationship. His response tells her in no uncertain terms "Well that's a silly question, so I'll give a silly answer." He does what he wants and doesn't feel the need to justify this to her or anyone else. Alpha move, Stallion. He passes her shit test with flying colors and is handsomely rewarded with her virginity. (see: Shit Test #2)

Shit Test #2: My brother is my keeper

So now Adrian has the tingles and finds herself in Rocky's apartment. The slut shields are definitely up as she goes full throttle with some of the most impressive, rapid fire LMR (last-minute resistance) I've ever seen. We all know that LMR is just another shit test and so did the Italian Stallion. So he summons his inner Don Juan and systematically disarms every layer of her defenses.

> Adrian: " I wanna let my brother know where I am. I think he might be worried."
> Rocky: "I'll call your brother."
> <Rocky flings open the window>
> Rocky: "Yo Paulie!!!! Your sister's with me!!! I'll call ya later!!!"

Well played. Adrian knows damn well that Paulie was probably too drunk to care about much of anything. She's standing by the door so she's definitely hesitant about the situation she's in but she's still there. Her hamster is out of control waiting to be satiated. Rocky, who is completely relaxed on his couch, stays in the set.

> Rocky: "It's alright—you're my guest."
> Adrian: "I've never been in a man's apartment before."
> Rocky: "They're all the same." <gesturing>

This was handled beautifully with gentle, well placed sarcasm. Her snowflaking (yes, virgins snowflake too) doesn't phase him in the least. She's sitting with him at this point so her defenses are weakening. Being keenly aware of this, Rocky moves in for the kill:

> Adrian: "I don't think I'm comfortable. I should leave."
> <Adrian stands up>
> Rocky: "But I'm willin' to make the best of this uncomfortable situation"
> <Adrian moves to the door. Rocky intercepts her>
> Rocky: <softly> "Would you take off your glasses?"
> Adrian: <dumbfounded> "What?"
> Rocky: "The glasses….please."
> <Rocky removes her glasses>
> Adrian: <timidly> "T-Thank you."
> Rocky: "Do me another favor?"
> Adrian: "What?"
> Rocky: "Could ya take off that hat?"
> <Adrian takes off her hat and becomes rather attractive>
> Rocky: "I always knew you was pretty"
> Adrian: "Don't tease me…"

…and she was his for the taking. Masterful escalation by the champ. He had a clear understanding that Adrian's introverted disposition combined with her lack of sexual experience meant he would have to gently and carefully escalate lest he scare his prey away.

The look in a woman's eyes when LMR is destroyed

Throughout the exchange her body language quickly went from "no" to "yes". Even when she made an "attempt" to leave she offered little resistance when Rocky intercepted her at the door. She wanted to be taken as all women do. As soon as she lost her hat and those horrific glasses, her deflowering was a foregone conclusion. Adrian never stood a chance.

Shit Test #3: Apollo is bad for your health

Fast forward 6 months. Rocky is basking in the afterglow of his new found celebrity after nearly pulling off the greatest upset in the history of boxing since Cassius Clay beat Sonny Liston in 1964. Things could not be better. He's got a little extra coin from his share of the purse from the Creed fight, Adrian is now his wife and pregnant with his child, and he is Philadelphia's new favorite son. Life is pretty damn good.

But it's not long before the money runs dry and the Balboas fall on hard times. Rocky's provider instinct kicks in and tells him to get back in the ring to support his growing family. And wouldn't you know it, the perfect opportunity to drops into his lap when Apollo Creed challenges him to a rematch that would be worth millions. Slam dunk, right?

Wrong. The newly minted Mrs. Balboa forbids her husband to trade punches with the champion because she's "worried about his long term health". While this is very noble of her, this is simply another shit test. No woman in her right mind would prohibit her husband from accepting an opportunity to set the family for life financially. Sure, Adrian pouts and protests but her hamster secretly wants Rocky to defy her and maintain his alpha status to reassure her that the decision she made to willingly accept his seed was the correct one.

Her hamster gets its wish and true to form she throws a fit (another shit test). But like the true alpha he is, Rocky stays the course. Adrian eventually comes around (as women who belong to alphas always do) and watches her husband become the new heavyweight champion of the world, forever changing their lives.

Shit Test #4: You can't win!

The last and final shit test administered by Mrs. Balboa was the most significant because Rocky is literally risking his life having agreed to fight his most deadly opponent, Ivan Drago. At 6'6" and 260 lbs, Drago was a lightening quick fighter with super human strength. That strength was on full display when he killed Apollo Creed in an exhibition bout.

Drago kills Creed

Balboa and Creed became best friends when they joined forces to help Rocky regain the heavyweight title he lost to another fierce opponent, Clubber Lang. When Apollo died in the ring at the hands of Drago, Rocky's objective was clear: avenge his fallen comrade.

When Adrian learns of his decision, she hits him with everything she's got to try to talk him out of it. She broke out the heavy artillery telling him this fight was suicide among other things. She even tells him "You can't win!" Brutal. But Rocky Balboa is a true alpha and regardless of what the love of his life thought, said, or did, he knew he had to stick to his guns. Fresh out of options, she pulls a last second power move and tells Rocky she would not be going with him to Moscow to support him ringside. This, gentlemen, is a major league shit test. Even the most battle-hardened Super Alpha would be hard pressed to admit that he didn't, at the very least, reconsider his decision. Remember, he's been married this woman for years and truly loves her so it could not have been easy to get on that plane by himself. But like before, Rocky stays true to his task and starts his journey alone. And like before, Adrian rushes to his side and cheers him to victory.

Conclusion

While it's common knowledge amongst ROK readers that women aren't as necessary as they once were for a man's long term success and fulfillment, there's no denying that a good woman has the potential to increase a man's value as well as his quality of life. Don't get me wrong, banging sluts is great fun—there are plenty to go around and the abundant supply isn't dwindling any time soon. But when a man gets his hands on a decent woman who understands and abides by traditional sex roles, has no discernible signs of having ridden the carousel, and finds legitimate joy in pleasing him, it would be to his advantage to let her stick around for a while. Rocky understood this and acted accordingly.

Now Adrian could certainly be a handful as we've seen above. But make no mistake about the fact that she tipped the balance in her husband's favor in the two most difficult fights of his life. Never forget that before Adrian showed Rocky her support for his rematch against Creed, Rocky wasn't giving it all he had during his training. The fact that his new wife didn't have his back visibly affected him. Ready or not he was getting in that ring because it was what he had to do as a man. But if he continued his half-assed training, Apollo would have most assuredly ended Balboa's career, or worse. It wasn't until Adrian told him she wanted him to win did he train with the conviction necessary to dethrone the champion. The same thing happened in Russia. Rocky started his journey alone but Adrian's physical presence gave him the extra resolve to beat Drago.

Few titles in this world are more alpha than Heavy Weight Champion of the World. The money, fame, and status that comes along with this title is more than enough to satisfy the hypergamy of the vast majority of woman. But regardless of title, wealth, or social standing, women will always be women and the shit tests are coming. Count on it. Rocky loved his Adrian but his mission came before her and it showed. As a result, she grew more attracted to him with every shit test he passed. Even when he risked his life by fighting Ivan Drago, Adrian couldn't help but be more drawn to him, win or lose (Roissy Maxim #200: Chicks dig guys willing to risk an early, gruesome death. Expendability is a DHV).

But what if Rocky tried to justify himself when Adrian questioned his way of life or gave up trying to close the deal when she threw up that epic LMR? And what if he backed out of the rematch against Creed or caved into her demands to throw in the towel against Drago? Chances are he would never have had the spectacular life he was afforded as a result of failing her shit tests. Sure, he may have been able to accomplish a few minor goals here and there but Adrian's attraction and devotion to him would have been gravely compromised. On the other hand he may have had a great life had he never met her. Being a single, rich, champion prize fighter would have offered him unlimited access to the paradise of poon. As awesome as that life would be let's not kid ourselves here fellas—nothing feels better than having a quality woman in your corner. But if you want a quality woman you have got to be alpha because all. women. are. like. that. Even the rarest of snowflakes like Adrian Balboa.

How Communism Is Becoming Interwoven Into America's Cultural Fiber

March 18, 2014 | by Samson Lamont | Link | Original Link

I think now more than ever it is of the utmost importance to school our younger brothers who are just starting out on their journey that one of the fundamental truths of life is nothing ever really changes. In the words of Lord Byron,

> There is the moral of all human tales;
> 'Tis but the same rehearsal of the past,
> First freedom and then Glory – when that fails,
> Wealth, vice, corruption – barbarism at last.
> And History, with all her volumes vast,
> Hath but one page…

Throughout the course of human existence, there have been many empires and civilizations. In their infancy, the exploded onto the world stage with a vengeance, usually throwing off some oppressive yoke of the previous regime and ushering in a new age. When they rose, they used military might to assimilate different lands into their empire and made rapid advances in technology and ideas, culminating in being recognized as a beacon of inspiration and hope for the future. When they inevitably fell, the pattern of events leading up to their demise was always the same, and the cycle began anew with a different civilization.

When you know what the warning signs are, you can better prepare yourself for what the future holds. Unfortunately for us, most of the younger generation in the West don't even recognize these signs, and the ones that do can't be bothered to pay attention to them. That is something we shall have to remedy.

"War Is Upon You Whether You Would Risk It or Not"

The first thing you must understand is that we are not living in a time of peace. And I don't mean Iraq and Afghanistan and all the things going down abroad. I mean right here in our own country, we are in a state of war.

It is a mistake to look at dealing with the effects of feminism as just putting up with spoiled, entitled bitches and learning how to deal with their endless shit tests so you can get in their pants. It is not some phase or fad that will eventually fade away. You must recognize feminism for what it truly is: one of the arms of Communism, with its goals being to break up the nuclear family, effectively weaken the country from within, and to eradicate any form of masculinity or aggression, thereby reducing the number of people who can engage in dissent.

Remember, no matter what you call the system or ideology, be it fascist, totalitarian, communist, socialist, or dictatorial, the one thing they all have in common is the complete and utter annihilation of dissent. In the words of somebody, "Dissent is the highest form of patriotism." The cornerstone of any truly free society is the right to openly and peacefully disagree with a prevailing idea, law, or policy without fear of reprisal. Once the right to dissent is eliminated, freedom no longer exists.

The WorldCom of Ideologies

Now some of the younger readers might not be too familiar with the term Communism. That's because you know it as Socialism, Progressivism, Liberalism, or Social Democracy. Same shit, different bull. I don't use any of these synonyms because, just as we should engage in fat-shaming and slut-shaming, we should engage in Commie-shaming.

One of the Left's favorite tricks is rebranding. Communism is still a bad word here in America, especially with the Baby Boomers that grew up during McCarthyism and the Red Scare in the 50's and 60's. So the Left refers to them only as "socialists" or "progressives" now, to disguise their true intentions. Since the Boomers are approaching the twilight of their years and are slowly fading from political and cultural relevance, the Left can indoctrinate younger generations in the new nomenclature and in a sense effectively erase the negative association between the word Communism and its synonyms.

Another aspect of rebranding is a phenomenon known as Ideasthesia, which is when certain sounds in a language are tied to ideas or perceptions. For instance, it's an "urban legend" in stand-up comedy circles that emphasizing and using words that contain hard consonants is funnier than using words with soft consonants. The same could be said of aggressive or negative perceptions. Like with the entire German language.

Therefore, Communism, which starts with the hardest consonant sound, is a much more aggressive word than Socialism, which has none. Ever wonder why the word cunt is so much more offensive to American women than bitch, slut, or whore? It has the same meaning as pussy, and a woman (probably) won't go nuclear if you call her that, so what's the big deal? It's partly because it starts and ends with a hard consonant. There is no nice way to say that word. You could try it with a shit-eating grin on your face, and that would probably just make it worse. Precede it with "fucking", and you'll achieve a glorious full feminist meltdown.

Yuri Bezmenov, The Great Prognosticator

To really illustrate the connection between Communist ideological subversion and our current P.C.-saturated, equality-obsessed culture, I'd like you to meet Yuri Alexandrovich Bezmenov, who was a KGB operative for the Soviet Union in the 1960's and who defected to the United States in 1970 when he became disillusioned with the Communist system. Keep in mind that this interview was conducted in 1984, exactly 30 years ago. The parallels between what he predicts and what is happening now are… disturbing.

Sour Grapes

4:30 – 8:17 Yuri explains the difference between our free-market Capitalist society and a Communist one. A common phrase heard by brainwashed Leftists is "Well it really doesn't matter what system you live under because they're all the same: corrupt and run by tyrants." This is the argumentative equivalent of sour grapes, aka being a diabolical hater, in game:

"That guy's always with hot women while I'm by myself, but that's only because he has money/fame/looks and I wouldn't want to fuck those sluts anyway" translates to "You've proven that my ideology is bullshit, but that's only because all ideologies are bullshit and there is no perfect system, including yours. So suck it."

True, there is no perfect system, and of course corruption will exist as long as there are human beings, therefore certain levels of corruption are to be expected in any society. In order for good to exist, evil must also exist, since they are simply two sides of the same coin. The difference is, by keeping moral values high and shaming bad behavior, a society can mitigate corruption and find a balance.

America: Then…

If you were able to cut the rampant racism from our Golden Era of 1950-1960 to even current levels of racial acceptance, in my mind you would have achieved as close to a utopia as you were going to get with the greatest system in the world, Free-Market Capitalism.

We built the greatest middle class and the greatest economy in the history of humanity. A man was paid an honest day's pay for an honest day's work. Our creativity, ingenuity, and ambition were unmatched while our women were feminine and content to stay home and do what they do best, which is rear children and take care of their families. Homosexuality was treated like what it is: at worst a deviant perversion and at best a chromosomal aberration. Either way, it wasn't celebrated, and was tolerated as long as it stayed behind closed doors.

A man's word was his bond.

The elite of this country understood that to have a prosperous nation, you had to have a strong middle class, a strong nuclear family, and strong moral values. Workers were valued and had names, not just numbers. As Yuri states, even our prisoners had rights. And while rights may be man-made ideas determined by the powerful, at least they were upheld and considered sacrosanct.

Compare the past to the present, and you'll see that in a span of less than 50 years, creeping Communism has eroded all the hard work and sacrifice of our ancestors. The middle class is all but extinct and our economy is a joke. People want an honest day's pay for no work at all. Our populace is lazy, spoiled, arrogant, and fat, while we build nothing of value here anymore.

We all know what happened to our women. Thanks to feminism, the nuclear family is gone and homosexual perversion is not only deemed normal, but is now openly promoted, accepted, and forced on us. Honor and integrity are now quaint remnants of a bygone era, existing only in small pockets of civilization. Workers are basically drones or expendable cannon fodder, known more by their number designations than by their names. If you are a man, the validity of your rights is determined by man-hating feminists and homosexuals and you are now guilty until proven innocent. Long story short, we are inexorably headed towards the hell that Yuri describes.

WTF Guys. China?

11:00 – 13:15 It has been comprehensively covered on this site how American corporations are clearly promoting the P.C./Feminist agenda. Since we've established that the agenda is a Communist one, we're basically shooting ourselves in the foot. Here Yuri describes how we are making the same error that we made with the Soviets. He points out how American corporations were nourishing the Communist system by making grain deals with the Russians.

Fast-forward to today, and you see that almost everything in this country is made in China which, despite their relaxation on certain policies recently, is still a Communist country with a deplorable human rights record. In other words, they treat their people like shit.

We owe China, a Communist country, over a trillion dollars in debt. When you don't pay a debt, what happens? The bank takes your house, car, or business, or some goon takes your kneecaps. You don't have to be an economist to understand that eventually China's going to want their money. We have a floundering economy that's resulted in us raising our debt ceiling and having our credit rating dropped, and we owe what effectively amounts to a one-party totalitarian state with a rapidly expanding military over a trillion dollars. Result?

The Great Egalitarian Socialist Utopia is a Pipe Dream

Pay close attention to the words and phrases Yuri uses, and note how they correlate to the ones used in the West today. He predicts that we'll eventually end up like the Soviet Union, using a gulag system where we'll work for free under the glorious system of "socialist equality." Sound familiar? You can't throw a rock in any direction in this country, including both up and down, without hitting some idiot screaming about equality.

This may be hard to swallow for some, but there is no such thing as equality. Life isn't fair. Deal with it. Strong/weak, beautiful/ugly, tall/short, smart/dumb, rich/poor—some people are just simply better than others. It's up to you, and you alone, to elevate yourself and overcome your shortcomings.

Leftists love erroneously pointing out that the constitution says all men are equal. Wrong. It says all men are created equal. We all come into this world as drooling bundles of joy who are unable to take care of ourselves at first and must rely on others for survival. Once we're young adults, the race begins, and your success in this life will be determined by your merit and hard work. True, some are born with greater economic advantages due to their parents' wealth, but a lazy wealthy person cannot make the same accomplishments as a poor person with unlimited drive, ambition, and a never-give-up attitude.

In another highly recommended video featuring our friend Yuri that breaks down step-by-step the process of ideological subversion, he verifies this claim. Equality must be earned, and cannot be given. The Leftist hamster cannot accept this. They would rather drag the strong down to their level at the bottom than improve themselves and rise to the top.

The Story Of The American Bachelor

March 18, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

An American feminist waited impatiently at her boyfriend's apartment for him to take her out to their weekly expensive dinner. The boyfriend's roommate, a single twenty-something man who shared the modest two-bedroom apartment, was hosting a poker game in the living room. As she watched the five friends lounging around the table, smoking cigars and laughing about women, the feminist realized that in all of her trips to the apartment, she could not recall ever seeing the roommate working. She interrupted a hand to ask the roommate how he was able to lead a life of such leisure.

"I started an internet business that pays the bills, so I only need to work a couple hours a day." The feminist asked why he didn't work harder to make more money. "I make enough to support my needs. Why do I need to do any more?"

"But," the feminist wondered aloud, "what do you do with the rest of your time?"

"Well, that's easy," the man replied. "I enjoy my spot in the middle of the city, lift weights, read books, go out with my friends, and have flings with girls. I have a full and busy life."

The feminist scoffed. "It sounds to me like you're one of these lonely man-boys I've read about. I think what you really need is a woman to show you the true meaning of life. I'm a lawyer and I have plenty of strong, independent, attractive friends who you would be lucky to date."

"Is that so?" The man said with a tinge of a smirk across his face.

"Yes," she continued. "With my help you could get a girlfriend and start to build a life with someone. She would have a high-paying career, so you could afford to move into a fancy place and actually buy some nice things for a change. She'll be very sexually experienced and know exactly what she wants, so you know you're special because she chose you out of all the men she's been with. Eventually, if you're good enough to her, you can get married and move to an even bigger house outside of the city. You'll have children together and take great pride in providing for your wife and family."

The man asked, "But how long will this all take?"

"Oh, about 20-25 years." The feminist replied.

"But what then?" asked the man.

"Well," the feminist began, "since men make a lot of marriages end in divorce, it might not last forever. But even if you get divorced and your wife gets to keep the kids, you'll at least have the satisfaction that you've built something long-lasting and made a man of yourself."

"So then what?" the man asked glibly.

The feminist hesitated.

"Oh, I know," the man said. "I've read about this on the internet. It means I'll have the freedom to get my own apartment in the city, lift weights, read books, go out with my friends, and have flings with girls."

The feminist stared in angry silence while the man returned to his poker game.

Tinder Is A Microcosm Of American Culture

March 19, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

In the 1980s, there were personal ads. This required a woman to come up with a few sentences about herself, contact a newspaper or magazine and pay for the ad, wait for her phone to ring, agree to a date, meet the man, and then make a determination of her level of attraction to him. Let's say only 1% of the female population would go through the efforts of placing a print ad.

In the 1990s the internet came along. Sites like Yahoo Personals made it a bit easier to place an online ad for the woman seeking a companion. Aside from the online medium, it was relatively the same as the print ad. With the ability to email, the man and woman could exchange pictures online after dialing in to AOL or another service provider prior to meeting. We can assume the ease of the internet raised the participation level of females to using this medium to 5%.

In 1995 Match.com was born and eventually became very popular. Girls would have to set up a profile, write about themselves, pay a monthly fee and then either contact others with a message, or wait to be contacted by a man who searched out their profile and initiated a conversation. Let's put forth an educated guess of about 20% of the dating female market used Match.com or something similar.

Eventually in the 2000s sites came along like Okcupid and PlentyOfFish, which required even less effort. No payment needed, easier to search through and message people, and so on. As these online mediums became more accepted, so did its usage. My incredibly scientific research pins the market usage at 40%.

The latest evolution is Tinder. This application requires the least amount of effort one can imagine. After you upload some of your photos, girls can just sit there and tap yes or no (or swipe left or right) to indicate if they like a particular male or not. No information, interests, hobbies or other personal details are revealed. Ask any single and dating girl about Tinder and she's almost guaranteed to have heard of it, and probably uses it.

Tinder's Effects On Girls

Girls now have the ability to be instantly validated. They can have endless attention by just opening an app on their iPhones. Whereas before they would have to be hit on in person, or open the website to see their messages on Match.com, or even the apps for OKC or PlentyOfFish to see what messages they got, now they literally sit there like robots tapping the screen of their phone for the same thing.

Countless times when I'm out at a bar, eating lunch, on the subway, walking the streets I see girls on Tinder. They just tap, tap, tap, tap and are oblivious their surroundings. During this past Superbowl, I was at a sports bar and saw groups of girls there drinking, on their phones, and not watching the game or talking to each other. Just tapping.

On the plus side, if you are looking for easy sex Tinderellas are pretty damn slutty. So while I do fault the app for creating this lack of effort on the part of women, I will admit that it has made it very easy as a male to find sex. Tap, text, bang.

Tinder IS America

As the title of this post suggests, Tinder captures the state of America today. We are a nation that has sacrificed all efforts for comforts, values for ease. Guys and girls both can now avoid going out and meeting people the old-fashioned way and just sit at home and tap tap tap. It's mindless and develops no social skills in the individual.

Idiocracy was a movie from 2006 that alluded to our cultural state today. While housed in jest and comedy, there are some disturbing similarities beginning to surface:

> As the 21st century began, human evolution was at a turning point. Natural selection, the process by which the strongest, the smartest, the fastest, reproduced in greater numbers than the rest, a process which had once favored > the noblest traits of man, now began to favor different traits. Most science fiction of the day predicted a future that was more civilized and more intelligent. But as time went on, things seemed to be heading in the opposite direction. A dumbing down. How did this happen? Evolution does not necessarily reward intelligence. With no natural predators to thin the herd, it began to simply reward those who reproduced the most, and left the intelligent to become an endangered species.

> The years passed, mankind became stupider at a frightening rate. Some had high hopes the genetic engineering would correct this trend in evolution, but sadly the greatest minds and resources where focused on conquering hair loss and prolonging erections.

Reality TV. Seamless. Tinder. Everything is designed for us to just sit around or minimize our mental activity, or both. It's scary and sad at the same time.

Tinderfessions

This twitter handle, Tinderfessions, brings us the anonymous confessions of various Tinder users. If you've ever doubted how slutty girls are, or how much they seek quick validation, this should give you a view into the real state of American girls these days. Here are some choice ones:

> Record for how many Tinder guys I've hooked up with in one day: 8 – Robin
> I like to swipe right on guys who are friends with my brother, they come over to hangout w/him & don't leave until they've fucked me – Kylie
> I have had tinder for about 5 days now and I have over 400 matches and I have fucked four guys already – Janet
> 2109 matches and still going strong. I've never met one of them in person and I plan on keeping it that way. – Kate
> Tinder guys are clingy…I just wanna fuck & move onto the next one. – Julia

We've discussed ad nauseam here and other places how while quick and fast sex is great, it comes at a cost to civilization as a whole. Tinder is just another step towards the degradation of society here in America. I can't imagine how things can get simpler than just tapping, but there is always something.

How To Date Several Girls At The Same Time

March 19, 2014 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Juggling several girls may look easy, but there's more to it than meets the eye. It's a fine art that requires laser-like attention to detail, planning, creativity, and—above all—poise. Unfortunately, unless you've met the woman of your dreams—an unlikely proposition if you live in the United States—it's a near-necessity in today's dating market. Like pancakes, it takes a stack of these low-nutritional-value hoes to satisfy your appetite.

Big talkers and arm-chair Casanovas will tell you to simply declare upfront that you aren't "looking for a girlfriend" or that you're "keeping your options open" or something else like that. This is almost always bad advice, from someone either talking out of his ass or who lives a lifestyle so different from your own that they're totally out of touch with the reality of the average cat's life. The average guy can't pull this off, and the average girl won't put up with that shit.

When in doubt, lurk in the shadows.

Keep them physically, and mentally, separate.

There's an old toast, "to our wives and mistresses: may they never meet." Remember that keeping your women separate is your singular mission. This isn't just a physical task—keeping them from walking into the same frozen-yogurt place at the same time—but also a mental one. Keep your names, stories, and timelines straight. I shouldn't have to say this, but the safe route is to never refer to a girl by her name (to avoid saying the wrong one), re-ask questions you're aren't 100-percent about ("what was that movie we saw together last time?"), and feign having a bad memory ("I'd forget what day of the week it was if it weren't for this sweet Casio watch").

Track your prospects with an organized system.

Choose your own adventure, but I use a large post-it note with basic data than I stick on my calendar and update regularly. This serves as a daily prompt to contact and see my girls in the correct intervals to prevent decay in fresh leads or disgruntlement from regulars. Prioritize your "bottom bitch," but always attend to new customers with industry.

Put your phone on lockdown.

I'm convinced 75 percent of guys get caught because of sloppy phone game. Put a password on your phone and change it regularly. And, if you're getting more serious with one girl, put the others into one of the several fine text-hiding apps that are on the market today. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

Put your computer on lockdown.

Another 20 percent of guys get caught because of sloppy laptop game. Use a different browser for your shenanigans than for showing cute-animal videos to your girl or letting her check her Facebook. Since roaming eyes are as a big a danger as anything else, it's also a good strategy to learn the keyboard shortcut for quickly locking your computer (Windows Key + L on Windows machines). If you're like me, you have completely separate computer for public usage. No one but me touches my filthy laptop.

Invent several friends, and talk about them regularly.

This is an important step since it will plant the seed for future alibis. You'll need at least two or three fictional friends, each of whom will meet a different need. Avoid referring to them by name. You'll need one who lives in a neighboring town, but who you visit regularly. This will explain extended absences or sudden disappearances. You'll also need an "unattractive" female friend—or male friend with a "clingy girlfriend"—to explain away all of the hair clips, tampon wrappers, and other bullshit that girls will invariably shed in your apartment but that you may miss in your routine sweeps.

Talk about your life on a need-to-know basis.

Answer questions as if you're talking to cops: only offer up the information requested. Withhold unnecessary details about stories dealing with risky aspects of your life. She doesn't need to know that you're going to New York for exactly three days and four nights. You're going to "be away for a few days" and will be back "next week." That's it. This practice will leave you vital wiggle room when needed.

Keep an erratic schedule.

Girls are like dogs: the moment you do something twice you've created a pattern. And they can sniff out skullduggery in the slightest changes in your behavior. It's best to avoid this problem altogether. See your girls on different days, at different times, and in different intervals. Like P90X, it's all about pussy confusion.

Manage your semen.

This is an often-overlooked aspect of successfully managing multiple women. Even if you're a sexual beast, your third day in a row won't be as strong as your first. A tepid bang might not get you "caught," but it'll be the kiss of death with a new girl. Give yourself at least one day of rest before an important date. If back-to-back nights are inevitable, put the lower-priority girl second. If the lower-priority girl must go first, only bang her once and save the rest of your juice for the next night.

Pickup basketball has explained away scratches on my back, bruises on my chest, and an array of other bedroom injuries.

> Her: How did you get a scratch under your shirt?
> Me: We were playing shirts-versus-skins and I was on skins. These guys really need to clip their nails.
> Her: Playing with your shirt off is kinda gay.
> Me: I agree.

Deny, deny, deny.

Like Bill Clinton, never admit to wrongdoing—even in the face of incontrovertible evidence.

Monogamy may be on its way out—as evidenced by girls brazenly declaring themselves “polyamorous” or shamelessly bragging about their sexual exploits as if they’re accomplishments—but exclusivity is still the tacit expectation. If you’re going to sneak around, you still have to do it right.

(Note: This article was written as an unofficial update and homage to this masterpiece.)

The Awesome Temporary Power Of Young Attractive Women

March 19, 2014 | by Samuel Goodman | Link | Original Link

More than once, a woman has told me that at some point in her forties, she became invisible. Before then, she was accustomed to walking down the street and having men smile at her. People were so kind almost everywhere she went. In stores, she was warmly treated. In a bar or coffee shop, strangers would approach her and start up a conversation. Like some 1950s advertisement, the world was full of friendly waves and welcoming nods. This is the magic spell of being a young attractive female. It is an awesome power, but one that most women are largely unaware of until the day it finally disappears.

Actually, We Do Know The Power Of The Dark Side

The allure of a pretty, young woman is substantial, and men struggle to resist it. I've often thought that cheerleading would decline in popularity among high school girls if they knew exactly what was in the minds of the men who saw them in those outfits. As all men know, it is sexual. If you are a slender, pretty, teenage cheerleader, every man you encounter wants to have sex with you. None of us care one iota about your cheer, your spirit, or your acrobatics. The whole thing is a joke; we want to look at your pussy. The fourteen-year-old passing you in the hallway at school, your male teachers, your classmates, your father's friends, the bus driver, even the old men in the nursing home where you volunteer, we all want to fuck you.

When you're up there with your pom-poms shouting, "Go Team!" we are thinking the most nasty things you can imagine—anal sex, bondage, cumming on your face, you name it. If you encounter about 1000 men between the ages of 13 and 80 over the course of your year, probably 80% of them are fantasizing about having sex with you. Yes, your classmates are masturbating ferociously and craving you with great intensity. We may act nonchalantly in your presence, but that is not how we feel behind closed doors.

If you are young and attractive, every man who smiles as he passes you on the street is thinking one thing: “I want to fuck that girl.” We do not smile out of kindness, not in the way we would smile at a puppy or a little kid. As you walk by, raw sexual images are what we envision. Fortunately, men have a modicum of willpower. Although a pretty sixteen-year-old might flirt with her teacher, virtually all men in that situation will resist temptation. But, oh boy would there be temptation! Every year, a few highly successful men in positions of power risk everything just to have sex with an attractive young female.

You’ve Won The Lottery

You float through life in a way that others can’t even imagine. Everyone is so darn nice to you. We are nice because we want to fuck you. That is the only reason. But you think that people are genuinely nice, that the world is nice. The guy at the Abercrombie store was so patient and helpful. He wanted to bang you in the dressing room. The 50 year old man at the DMV who failed you on your driver’s test was so sorry about it, apologizing in the kindest manner. He couldn’t pass you, but he so wanted you to suck his civil servant cock. This is how it goes. You believe you have earned your received kindness based on hard work and character. That is incorrect. It is only by virtue of the body you inhabit.

Take Off Your Makeup, The Party’s Over

But one day, you become invisible. The store clerk is impatient. No one cuts you any slack. People become professional, distant, businesslike. No one smiles at you in the street. You have lost your magic power and that loss comes with aging.

Now you are living in the real world as it is actually lived by most people. You have awoken from a dream and every kindness shown to you has to be earned. Nothing is free any longer. I think about the conversations I’ve had with women in their late 40s and beyond. There are no good men. Why can’t I find a man? Where have all the men gone? Well, ladies, the “good men” are out there trying to sleep with much younger women. I think to myself, you know how lonely and desperately horny you feel right now? Aching to have even a semi-attractive, non-disgusting man want to spend time with you and make love to you? Well, this is payback for when you were young and had a sea of men in your orbit. You flirted with them and wasted their time. You mocked them for their horniness and neediness. Now you know their suffering. It is your just retribution.

Always Depend On The Cruelty of Strangers

that someone else feels longing, pain, and suffering when they are around. To these women, a man's decision to like them seems an arbitrary choice, as if he were deciding, "oh, I think I'll have roast beef instead of chicken." In fact, a man has no power over what compels him. His attraction is raw, visceral, and when not reciprocated, painful. No man would put on a tuxedo, tuck a copy of Bride magazine under his arm, and flirt with a group of unattractive, overweight 34-year-old women. We would see the cruelty in it. But a young pretty girl may have no qualms about teasing the men she encounters by pretending to offer up what they want. A man's memory for this behavior is long, and some will enjoy the revenge which comes from becoming a particularly cruel player.

Once I was at a party when two very nice looking, beautifully dressed women in their late forties approached me to flirt. Soon, they started commenting on the lack of good men. Normally, I would just smile and shrug, usually saying something like, "Who knows where they are? Perhaps hiding under a rock or stuck in the sofa cushions?" This time, however, I said that I know where the good men are. They are attempting to have sexual intercourse with women twenty years younger. I said that it is a fact of human biology that high quality men are just not interested in women their age. They were surprisingly reasonable and admitted that I was correct.

Many men hate the fact that attractive young women cast a spell over us. Unless you inhabit a horny man's body, you can't even begin to appreciate how intensely a beautiful woman affects us, how we struggle to stay focused when you are around. Maybe one reason men seek to be players is that it helps weaken your power over us. We dislike that your very presence draws our attention to thoughts of fucking, no matter what we may need to accomplish at the moment. We resent that you have it so easy in life just because you are thin and pretty, whereas we have to earn every kindness that comes our way. You say life has not been that easy. You complain that your boyfriend cheated on you, but an older woman has no boyfriend. You complain that you got in trouble at work for your performance, but a less attractive woman never got hired in the first place.

Trading Places

Here's a secret for us men. Ever wonder what it is like to have people treat you extra nicely and warmly? It's easy. Just get a good haircut and put on a moderately expensive, well-tailored suit and tie. Women will not automatically want to have sex with you, so the comparison is not perfect, but walk down the street. People will smile at you. Go into a store. Buy a pack of gum. Approach a stranger and ask for directions. The world will treat you better.

Sadly, for aging women, there is no suit they can put on. Botox and plastic surgery will never elevate you back to the exalted position of a pretty girl under age 30. Perhaps you can take comfort in knowing that you once held enormous power over men, but now it is some other woman's turn to possess it, however fleetingly.

Two different women: one at 26 and another at age 44. Only the younger one affects us.

Only 16 years separate this 26-year-old and this 42-year-old, but the difference in how men see them is dramatic.

Can an older woman be beautiful? Absolutely, as these lovely women ages 70, 84, and 97 demonstrate. But we view them with respect and admiration, not—of course—in any sensual way. Who wouldn't want a nice grandmother like this?

If you are a young man, you just don’t look like a sexual object to most women. However, to quote a popular meme, “It gets better.” Stay in shape and with every passing year, your odds will improve. Even at age 45, you’ll be bagging chicks aplenty.

The Red Pill Can't Bring Back What We've Lost

March 19, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

The Matrix movie gave us the red pill concept that "we've been lied to." Red pill or blue pill—accept the truth or go back to the pleasure and suffering of your dream world. We love red pill for the bitter truth it brings. However that truth is only the beginning. In many ways we are looking in the wrong place for answers. In the movie there is a small scene, easily forgotten, when Neo visits the Oracle. The young boy tells him:

> "Do not try to bend the spoon, that is impossible. Simply understand that there is no spoon. Then you will see it is not the spoon that bends, but yourself"

On face value this is hockus pockus, Zen bullshit, but I've meditated on this phrase a lot. It is one of the most excellent pieces of wisdom, and to consciously understand it and then put it into your life will create many changes. This same phrase is used in martial arts like Tai Chi. When you can bend like water, no one can attack you.

> Neo: What are you trying to tell me? That I can dodge bullets?
> Morpheus: No, Neo. I'm trying to tell you that when you're ready, you won't have to.

The old fashioned concept of a relationship or marriage no longer exists.

I've tried four LTRs, multiple years each, different women from different parts of the world. I've also tried game and ONS, hookups, PUA, etc. Neither gives a perfect solution. All my LTRs however ended up in a kind of weird competition, where instead of team work, we were struggling with each other for resources and using each other. Why? Simply because a woman does not step inside your world for protection. She doesn't need it. She has options. She is running her own agenda. She might not even know what that agenda is.

Having sex with any woman, outside of a prostitute or a cheesy ONS, opens you up to a relationship with her, at least in her eyes. It is therefore very important to define what exactly it is that you want from a woman. How to protect yourself and how to make sure she isn't using you?

I've spent the last couple of years trying to bend the spoon with pure alpha and I can tell you it's a waste of time. Guys like Roosh have bent the spoon, by not even attempting to get into LTRs. Spinning plates, game, mini-relationships are other options, but even players become a little disillusioned after a while. Deep down they are still seeking some kind of commitment from a woman.

The reason for this is because an LTR is much more equitable. You obtain many fringe benefits of female company outside of sex. You wouldn't hire a secretary just for a week, so why would you start a relationship just to chuck it out and start again. You wouldn't do it in your professional life, so why the hell would you do it personally?

The red pill ignores a huge tract of history

What has set the world (and women) free and changed the playing field is not feminism or new age sensitive men, but technology. Farmers didn't free slaves from the goodness of their hearts—they freed them because automation was becoming cheaper. All around the world slaves were being liberated as mechanized farming took over.

Women's liberation followed decades later, as technology improved rapidly. Red pill tells us that we've been lied to as men. That feminism is bullshit and looks out for neither sex, and basically amounts to a spin-off of Marxism. If the USSR was the Catholic Church, feminism is the Baptists or Mormons, just some splinter ideology along the same lines. This is fine on face value. The red pill also tells us that by adopting a more masculine frame, by understanding more of what it means to be a man, and by putting women in their place, that things will work out much better on all fronts—not just with women but professionally, financially, socially, and so on.

What's wrong with this picture is the same thing that is wrong with men's attitudes in most of their approaches to women: it puts all the onus on the man. If you're not getting what you want from your relationships and sex life, then it's your fault for not being alpha enough. It's your fault for not being strong enough. It's your fault for not having tight game. It's your fault for not having big muscles.

This is like telling a guy who's drowning in an Arctic uce flow that he just needs to swim faster. The guy is going to freeze to death in a couple of minutes, long before he reaches dry land. Swimming faster will not make much of a difference.

Red pill tells us that women like to be led, that they appreciate a strong alpha male and that if you just improve yourself, everything will go your way. Just swim harder dear fellow and soon you will be able to climb out of the icy waters of sensitive men and hardened feminism. This is bullshit.

Were women obedient, loving and kind to men because alpha men led them well?

OR

Because THEY HAD NO OTHER CHOICE and their very survival depended on it.

I know which one I'm putting my money on.

Red pill is just a caffeine booster, it ain't gonna fix a broken leg

A woman today is free. She can do whatever she likes. She can seek education and employment on her own merits, she can open her own bank account, lease her own apartment, buy her own furniture, and get artificially inseminated at a sperm bank. She has absolutely no need for a man. She can build her own career and do as she pleases. As much as her genetics might make her more easily led, she always has the option not to be led. She's like a dog with several masters.

Females used to rely on men for their very survival, but today they don't and this has never been the case in hundreds of thousands of years of human evolution. Today a woman can walk down the street, at night, on her own with little fear. Many streets have CCTV. She has a cell phone in her pocket to talk to anyone if she's in trouble. She most likely has a car or can hail a passing cab that is safe and reliable, fully registered and traceable. They don't truly need us, and because of that, relationships no longer work.

From a woman's point of view, the natural incentive (danger) to maintain a relationship is gone, not because of feminism, or men being too soft, but because of technology. Throwing sexual relationships away is one way of bending to the new times. Everything is disposable now, a huge compromise we've had to make. I don't know about you, but I want fine bone china and silverware, not some paper plate and plastic cutlery.

I can have the qualities I want from a woman, with performance, obedience and my expectations met if I enter into a business-like relationship with her from the very beginning and give her an incentive (most likely financial) to fulfill her side of the bargain. Otherwise I am involving myself with another person, a relative stranger, and opening myself up to all kinds of personal liabilities.

Red pill tells men to labor like mules

Game and spinning plates and so forth can work, but it's trying to take something for nothing, just as women tend to do in LTRs. The problem with taking something for nothing is it usually involves large amounts of hard labor. Women have to work over time to emotionally dominate their husbands and it makes them both miserable. Real players have to make a virtual profession out of hunting new lays. Not many have the time of day for that long term and good luck once you hit the mid 40s.

What remains of the LTR is some kind of contractual employment situation. This is after all where most LTRs end up anyway, with contracts and lawyers. Hire a maid or housekeeper, a secretary or a personal assistant and include sex in the job description. In this way you'd have the equity of a long term relationship, with performance incentive, hierarchy, alpha, leadership and boundaries already laid out.

I am sure there are other possibilities worth discussing but what we cannot do at all is try to follow old school attitudes and ideals. Instead we must accept the old fashioned male–female dynamic is long gone. Bend yourself, before someone else bends you.

The Differences Between Alpha Adam And Thirsty Theodore

March 19, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

One question that I get continually through email and my twitter, is how does a player in development know the difference between being 'thirsty' and a leader when dealing with women? This is a great question and I've decided to break this down by telling the story of 'Thirsty' Theodore vs. Alpha Adam.

'Thirsty' Theodore is in his mid-twenties, has recently secured a good job working as an investment banker making 6 figures. He's of average looks, height and weight, but has improved his personal style due to reading my blog. His 'thirst' is very real though and he hasn't learned about the Law of Abundance, nor has actually applied the game articles on this blog. He's content in believing that his high status job is enough to woo the ladies.

Alpha Adam is also in his mid-twenties, but does not have a good job as an investment banker. Instead, he's bar tending at his local bar, while saving money to start his own company. He lives modestly and beneath his means, choosing to save money for his future business endeavors, instead of living life on the edge and spending everything he makes. Adam is also of average looks, height and weight, but has improved his fitness and is in the best shape of his life, by focusing on building up his body in addition to is savings account. Lastly, Adam has scoured this blog devouring the free information on game and has applied it in his life. Adam's learning and application of game principles have been bearing fruit and his game is growing increasingly better.

For all intentions and purposes, Theodore and Adam are equals. Except for one extremely important difference: Theodore is 'Thirsty' and Adam is an alpha in development.

Let's examine a few different situations and how they each deal with them, in order to shed more light on what the line between being a leader with women and being a 'thirsty' beta bitch boy with women entails.

The Approach

'Thirsty' Theodore approaches a girl on the street by running after her as she passes him on the opposite side of the street. He dashes through traffic, narrowly avoiding being crushed by a public transit bus, in the hopes of catching up to the 'cute' girl in tight yoga pants.

Alpha Adam happened to be walking down the same street at the same time and notices a guy (Theodore) panting out of breath dashing through traffic to reach an average looking girl in tight yoga pants. He continues walking headed to the gym. He has allotted specific time to workout and nothing gets in the way. Especially not an average girl in tight yoga pants walking on the opposite side of the street.

Adam check-ins at the front desk to his local gym and then proceeds to blast through a workout focused solely on himself. He's made such improvement in the gym, he barely notices the hotties in the gym who continually eye fuck him as he works out. Adam notices, but his workout comes first. Adam finishes his workout feeling pumped and on top of the world.

He walks out of the gym and approaches the crosswalk, where a hot girl in tight yoga pants is waiting for the cross signal. He casually looks over at her and a small smile escapes his lips. She smiles back. “I’m Adam, what’s your name?” “Michelle. Just get done working out?” she asks. “No. I normally wear workout clothes and walk around sweating like a whore in church”, Adam retorts with a smirk and a wink. Michelle giggles and punches Adam’s arm softly, an obvious indicator of interest. Just then the cross signal flashes ‘Walk’ and Michelle starts to cross the street.

Adam continues his confident gait, but doesn’t scurry to keep up with Michelle. He’s walking on his terms, living his life and Michelle just passed through it. “Slow down Ms. Michelle”, Adam barks and Michelle looks back slightly surprised, but clearly happy that Adam was dominate enough to command her attention. She stops in her tracks waiting for Adam to meander up to her. Now in unison, they finish crossing the street. Adam already has his phone out and puts it in Michelle’s hand. “Put your number in. If you can keep up we’ll grab a drink sometime”. Michelle’s face lights up and she promptly types her number, first and last name into his phone. Adam already knows when a girl puts her last name in your phone too, this is another Indicator of Interest. “Cool”, Adam says. He turns to go leaving Michelle standing there basking in the glow of encountering an Alpha In The ‘Wild’.

Meanwhile, Theodore is sitting in a Starbucks dejected contemplating his last pitiful approach. Let’s rewind and see what happened with his ‘thirsty’ approach.

Last time we saw Theodore he was dashing through traffic and narrowly avoided getting killed by a public transit bus. He catches up to the average (but in his eyes ‘cute’ girl) in tight yoga pants. “Excuse me miss!”, Theodore yells out of breath. The average girl stops and turns. “Yes?” Theodore pauses for a couple of seconds to catch his breath. “I noticed you walking from across the street and would like to take you on a date sometime”. “Umm I don’t really do dates”, the girl responds. “Well, it doesn’t have to be a date, but if you allow me to take you out, then I can prove to you I can show you a great time. See I’m an investment banker and I-”, she cuts him off before he can finish. “I have a boyfriend, so no that’s not going to happen”. Theodore’s face falls and before he can respond, she turns on her heel and saunters off. If Theodore wasn’t so blinded by his ‘thirst’, he would have noticed the extra ten pounds of fat squeezing through her tight yoga pants. Theodore watches her walk away, before hanging his head and ducking into the Starbucks adjacent to the street.

The Date

‘Thirsty’ Theodore has lucked out and has been setup on a blind date by his cousin. Her name is Brandy. He hasn’t had a date in months and can hardly contain his excitement.

Alpha Adam texts Michelle later that evening this exact text: “Adam here, the sexy muthafucka u met crossing the street. hittin up xyz bar tmrw nite for drinks. join me" Michelle texts Adam back 15 minutes later agreeing to meet for drinks. Adam waits 40 minutes and responds with this exact text: "koo. skirt n heels" Michelle responds back immediately with assorted emojis of laughter and excitement. Adam doesn't respond.

Theodore gets reservations for the most expensive restaurant in town he can find for his blind date with Brandy. Instead of following the 11 Step Prep To A Night Out blog post, Theodore instead rushes around like a maniac waiting to the last minute to prep for his date. He arrives to the restaurant flustered and as usual, out of breath.

Adam has a very productive day working online doing research for his company he's going to start, has an intense workout and follows the 11 Step Prep To A Night Out routine to a T. He almost forgets he planned to meet with Michelle, due to being so involved with his own self-improvement and goals. He had planned to meet Michelle around 9pm and gets to the bar at 9:15pm. He was busy and had shit to do that came first in his life. In essence, you could say Adam was selfish about self-improvement. Michelle got to the bar at 9:10pm and was sitting at the bar waiting on Adam. Adam saunters up casually, pulls her in close for hug initiating physical contact from the get go and then orders a round of drinks, while stating she would grab the next round. Adam was aware of the importance of getting a girl to invest in you physically, emotionally and financially from the get go.

Checking in with Theodore, his 'thirst' is coming across strong in this date. Brandy is cute and eager to be fucked, but Theodore just cannot contain himself. He talks for almost an hour over dinner about his career and how much money he makes while clearly showing that his false bravado is hiding his deep insecurities. The irony is, Brandy thinks he's cute and just wishes he'd shut the fuck up and lean back. See, Brandy hadn't been fucked properly since she was fucked and dumped by Adam months before. Adam had given her the ride of her life, but due to her request for Adam to remain monogamous, she had been put on the back burner.

To this day she still hadn't been fucked like Adam had fucked her and she not only wanted that feeling again, she NEEDED it. Unfortunately, she could already tell Theodore wasn't the man for the job. She excused herself to go to the bathroom. While away from the table, she text Adam begging to see him and that her pussy was his if he wanted it. Adam didn't respond. Adam was busy having drinks with the hotter Michelle.

The Close

The night continues on and Adam has bounced to another bar with Michelle. Michelle physically can't keep her hands off of Adam and she clearly needs to get fucked. Adam grabs one last shot at the bar for the two of them, which gets comped due to his having learned how to get a nightlife venue On-Lock, and then grabs Michelle's hand leading her outside and into a cab. He takes her to his spot and proceeds to fuck Michelle's brains out. After the second round of sex, Adam checks his phone and notices that Brandy is blowing him up asking to come over and get fucked. He ponders for a moment and then decides he has enough energy for one more round. He tells Michelle he has to get up early and kicks her out. She's had a great night and is eager to set up plans for another 'date'. Adam states he'll check his schedule and closes the door.

Brandy walks back to the table where Theodore is smiling like a bumbling idiot. She has a feeling of puking his 'thirst' is so real. 'Why can't he just act casual and relaxed?', Brandy thinks. She orders another drink on his tab and leans back to listen to him talk about his plans and hopes for the future with a wife, two kids and a nice house in the suburbs.

Theodore clearly never learned that you don't go into detail like that on the first date and continues to spill his brains leaving zero mystery and zero room for her to be attracted. Brandy's phone text message alert sounds and she quickly checks it while nodding her head at Theodore's nonsense. "OMG! It's my girlfriend, she's upset her boyfriend dumped her so I have to go. So sorry", Brandy exclaims to Theodore, while quickly gulping down the last of her drink. She's not paying for it anyway so she might as well take advantage. "Let's do this again soon, I know another great restaurant we ca-", Theodore trails off as Brandy is running out the door. "Would you like to see the dessert menu sir?", the waiter asks. "No it's fine", Theodore responds while hanging his head dejected once again.

Brandy pounds on Adam's door excitedly, but Adam doesn't answer. Pissed off, Brandy calls him repeatedly before Adam picks up answering the phone mumbling through his sleep. "What?" Brandy knocks on the door while still on the phone. "I'm outside!" she exclaims. Adam mumbles something imperceptible and opens the door, before turning to head back to bed. Brandy walks in while ditching her clothes as quick as she can. She eagerly jumps into Adam's bed eager for the alpha cock she's been craving, needing, wanting with every bone in her body and doesn't even notice the open bottle of vodka, the half eaten Swedish Fish and Michelle's panties lying on the floor.

Adam rolls over and goes to sleep. 'She can wait till morning', he thinks. She's not going anywhere.

Get rid of the 'thirst' and learn how to be a real man. Go here.

Why Women And Gays Should Not Be Allowed In Male-Safe Spaces

March 20, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Nothing seems to generate greater anger in new Return of Kings readers than the following statement on the about page:

> Women and homosexuals are prohibited from commenting here. They will be immediately banned, and anyone who replies to them will also be banned.

The idea that not every space would not allow women or gays strikes many white upper class liberals as misogynistic, homophobic, and bigoted. Recently, Roosh made a new rule that men who respond to female commentators, thereby validating their entrance into a male-only space, will be also be banned.

The reality is that men and women have inherent biological differences. This is the first agreed upon community belief of Return of Kings. Because of these inherit biological differences, men and women have different social and cultural needs, some of which can only be fulfilled in gender-specific safe spaces. Likewise, straight men and gay men have different social and cultural needs, that cannot always both be accommodated in every space.

Catering to gays and women would require fundamentally changing Return of Kings in such a drastic way that it would no longer fulfill the needs of straight heterosexual men, and alienate men from the space they created. Just as I wouldn't enter a women's group or a gay club and demand they make chances to accommodate my needs as a straight man, I expect that women and gays wouldn't enter male-only spaces and demand they change to accommodate the needs of women and gays, yet that is precisely what has happened in every historical male space that has been socially integrated.

Women Demand Male Spaces Be Changed

It would be one thing if women were able to enter male-only spaces and integrate to the existing social rules, but women frequently demand drastic changes to male-organizations in order to feel "comfortable" and avoid being offended. These changes frequently undermine the stated mission of the very group they are trying to join.

In recent times, women have attempted to ban the word "bossy" in the workplace, ban sexual jokes in the workplace and at tech conferences, even when privately whispered between male attendees, ban masculine design and thought from wikipedia, ban certain types of characters in video games, science-fiction, and fantasy, ban grunting in gyms, ban deadlifting in gyms, and ban peeing standing up in Sweden. These are just the few, and I'm certain readers could easily supply additional stories and links.

This isn't just a recent phenomenon. In 1674, women tried to ban coffee houses, because they were threatened by the political and intellectual discussions taking place in the male-only coffee houses. It's thought that the discussion in these male-only coffee houses was the reason the enlightenment came about.

When women got the vote and entered the previously male-only space of politics, one of their first actions was to ban alcohol, leading to one of the most violent and crime-ridden periods of American history. Prohibition created real world problems many men had to die for. If women had their way, they would never have been allowed the alcoholic drinks and caffeinated beverages they now regularly intoxicate themselves with in modern times.

Women Do Not Allow Men In Female-Only Spaces

The idea that women should be allowed into male only spaces is a double standard, as men are frequently not allowed into female-only spaces, even ones they have legitimate claim to. Although men are the victims of domestic violence and sexual assault just as often as women, many shelters are battered women's shelters and refuse protection to male victims, in violation of federal law. Girls are allowed into the boy scouts, but boys are not allowed into the Girl Scouts, Brownies, or Girl Guides.

When one boy sued the UK Girl Guides for discriminating against him by denying him entrance, a spokeswoman for the guides responded:

> 'We strongly believe that in today's world there remains a vital role for such a space, where girls can be themselves during a formative time in their lives without the pressures of having boys around.'

Why are men not allowed the same spaces?

Gay Groups Demand All Spaces Allow Public Homosexual Displays

Gay groups had made similar demands of straight organizations. Recently, the Boston St. Patricks Day parade was labeled homophobic, for their policy prohibiting signs with over sexual or political references. News outlets reported the story as if organizers were banning gay organizations, when in reality they were simply banning public displays and references to genitalia at a family event. Gay organizers forced a holiday parade to Irish Catholic traditions to conform to the same standards as a pride parade, alienating the Irish Catholic families the event is for.

Judging by the coverage of the Winter Olympics, you'd think they were hunting gays like Christians in first century Rome. In reality, Russian law only prohibited gays from promoting homosexual sexual activity to children, and was primarily aimed at stopping pedophilia. Putin publicly stated gays would be welcomed at the Winter Olympics and treated with the same hospitality as all other guests, but because Russia is the current political enemy of the United States, Western media exploited the desire of gays to promote their lifestyle to children for propaganda purposes.

Gay organizations demand that public displays of homosexuality be permitted in every space, ignoring that every type of sexuality is prohibited from certain spaces. As a straight man, I understand dropping pick-up lines at women's group or shelter for rape victims would be incredibly inappropriate. Women in those groups want a safe-space, free from male sexual advances. Many men also want spaces free from overt sexuality, and in this respect prohibiting gays serves the same purpose as banning women. The discussions about masculinity that take place on Return of Kings would not be welcomed in a gay club, and the public displays sexuality that take place in a gay club are not welcomed at Return of Kings.

Male-Only Spaces Help Men Become Better Men

In my personal life, I've been a part of men's groups, and dated women who attended female-only groups. Neither of us ever demanded to invade the others space, but instead supported each other in our individual gender-specific self-development. My girlfriends understood that allowing me to develop my masculinity in the company of other men would only make me a better man for them, and I understood that allowing women to develop their femininity in the company of other women would only make them better women for me.

I've seen men's groups have a profound effect on the men who participate. Many men find it difficult to talk about their challenges in the presences of women who might judge them for the problems they face. Male-safe spaces allow men express themselves in a way mainstream integrated culture does not allow.

Likewise, many men have experienced deep personal transformation through the manosphere, and other online communities of men dedicated to self-improvement. Return of Kings and the manosphere in general is known for speaking truth in a very blunt, sometimes confrontational style, many women would find insensitive. As a man, I enjoy being challenged, and would prefer a harsh truth to a pretty lie.

The women and gays demanding entrance into straight male spaces are not interested in men's needs or self-development. Because they feel disconnected from their femininity as women, or disconnected from their masculinity as gays, men's attempts to connect to their own masculine power threatens them. Rather than develop themselves or their own space-spaces, they attack others personal growth, and unique culture.

The message women and gays have sent is essentially, "let us into your all male-spaces so we can change them to suit our needs or we'll call you misogynists, homophobes, bigots, and the worst labels our culture has." With that attitude, it's no wonder men don't welcome them in.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Women Can’t Handle Rejection

March 21, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Last month, a woman was arrested on Delta Airlines flight 1189 that was bound from Baltimore to Salt Lake City, Utah. Like any sane, fun person would do, she had a few drinks prior to boarding the airplane. As is often found, females tend to be very sexually promiscuous once under the influence of alcohol.

So what did the dashing young lady do once she had her fill of liquid courage in the form of vodka cranberries?

She hit on her fellow passenger.

> A Delta flight from Baltimore-Washington to Salt Lake City — widely considered America’s two sexiest metro areas and the corridor between them is usually thought of as the Bermuda Triangle of Arousal — was the setting for the attempted sexytime that went so very, very wrong.
> The woman, who was described as “very intoxicated” reportedly made several sexual advances to her male seatmate, who refused. This allegedly made the woman intensely angry, as you’d expect from almost any drunk, horny, sexually aggressive citizen. As you can hear in the video, she then became loud and abusive, threatening to “fucking kill” the man, and then once she was restrained with handcuffs, things got even worse.

Below is the in-field video of her seduction:

Notice the confident opener, aggressive body language, and willingness to push past the resistance in order to get a close. I give her an A+.

Except, this video was taken after the male victim had already turned down her advances. This was her reaction – and I swear, I've seen the same exact scene play out in the grocery store – when a parent turns down a five-year-old's consistent badgering for a donut.

She was so out of control that the pilots on flight 1189 were forced to divert to Minneapolis, Minnesota. Here is the video of authorities escorting her off of the plane. Before you wonder why they're taking the male victim off of the plane, look a little closer. Or, you could, you know, vomit.

There's no sense in wasting time debating whether she is a man or woman – for all intents and purposes, it is a female. Now, let's re-write this story with a male seducer:

A man was arrested last night on Delta flight 1189 from Baltimore to Salt Lake City. Once on board, he ordered a Jack and Coke for the flight. He was flirting with the passenger next to him. After flirting with her for an hour, he asked for her number. She responded in a shrill tone, saying that she wasn't interested. The male flight attendant, upon noticing that a female passenger was facing unwanted advances, immediatley intervened, handcuffing him to the back flight attendant seat for the remainder of the flight. Upon landing, the aggressor was questioned by police and a restraining order was put on him.

While this fictional story may be a little absurd, we all know that if we directly substituted a male for our lesbian dyke in these videos, he'd end up in jail, and probably not just overnight.

The real lesson to be taken from the story is not what the media portrays, which is that of a drunk, horny woman who lost control of her sexual impulses. No, the real lesson to be learned is that women can simply not handle sexual rejection. They are so used to dozens of thirsty men fawning all over them that when they actually stick their necks out and get the door slammed in their face, they go batshit insane. It is a blow that their psyches are simply incapable of handling.

I know from personal experience, and I'm sure many other readers can attest to this, as well. Turning a girl down for sex absolutely infuriates them. Of course, the mainstream media would never mention that you can completely use this to your advantage.

For starters, your self confidence. Turning a woman down puts you in the seat of power, and gives you a cocky demeanor. It signals to you that you don't need this particular woman, because you are already satisfied with what you have. It knocks them right off of the precious pedestal. Every man should reject a sexually aggressive woman at least once in their lifetime just to see what it feels like.

Two, even if you have slept with the girl already, or are even in a relationship, turning a girl down for sex is a great way to instill a little dread. It will make her wonder if she is doing enough to keep you, which will result in her putting more effort into pleasing you. I recently turned down my girlfriend's sexual advances in a non-direct way – basically by just passing out. Her reaction in the morning was priceless.

A relationship is most healthy when there are opposite polarities – you are the king and she is Cinderella – not the princess version, mind you – the servant. Perhaps though, if this sexually aggressive woman on flight 1189 looked more like Cinderella and less like a dyke, we wouldn't even be having this discussion.

Meanwhile, judging by the fact that there were no prominent follow-up stories on this situation, I'd wager that the approacher got off with a slap on the wrist. It's a shame it's a slap on the ass that she really wanted.

She should have flown on United instead.

10 Reasons You Should Become A Survivalist

March 21, 2014 | by Mjolnir | Link | Original Link

If you are the kind of man who reads Return of Kings, you are aware that all is not well in our current political, economic and cultural situation. You've taken the red pill, and the deeper you go, the more you believe that the layers of lies are endless. Manosphere sites are excellently documenting the perverseness of modern culture, and the mocking exposé of lies is amusing and intellectually stimulating. But as abstract as all of these truths about feminism and our hollowed out culture might seem, they lead to disastrous real world consequences in due time.

If you are honest with yourself, as all men should be, you know that the decline is happening and that our situation is going to get a lot worse before it gets better. Average people are increasingly conscious of the bad times that loom, but most consider it too painful to seriously contemplate. When questioned closely about what the future holds for America, most people get a worried look, and mumble something about how things will work themselves out. Reject this passivity and start concrete preparations for all emergencies, short or extended; leave rationalizing away tough truths to women.

The benefits of having modest preparations for a power outage or the extreme weather in a specific area should be obvious. Time after time people are "surprised" by disasters that they knew were inevitable. Assembling food, fuel, equipment and supplies for three days without electricity seems simple, and yet many Americans have little more than a can of tomatoes and a flashlight with dead batteries to weather the next emergency. While the basics to live for a few days in a grid down (no electricity, no water, no hearing gas, no sewer) situation are the absolute minimum that a sane person should have. But I believe that preparedness philosophy must go far beyond readiness for local events.

Every doom and gloomer has a pet theory about The End Of The World As We Know It (TEOTWAWKI), ranging from nuclear war to environmental destruction. TEOTWAWKI has been a preoccupation of peoples for thousands of years, from the Norse Ragnarok to the Christian Revelation to Saint John. It's easy to mock such predictions; after all, "The World" is still here. And yet history is littered with extinct civilizations, "worlds," if you will.

I'm not here to convince you of a specific theory of what will cause the inevitable collapse of the American nation state, because whichever one of the many plausible theories turn out to be correct (I personally believe that a slow, but accelerating economic collapse is already well underway), the conclusion is the same: We go from a world of cheap oil, super markets, and HBO On Demand to one in which daily survival is precarious. Our sick civilization can't stumble on much longer, and it becomes us to prepare ourselves materially, physically, mentally, and spiritually. Calamity may strike tomorrow or years from now; it may unfold over the course of hours or decades, but it will come to America as the logical conclusion of our poor choices.

Acceptance of the preparedness movement has risen in the last six years, breaking down the stigma of "survivalism" that the news media handily associated with militias and cults in the eighties and the nineties. Thanks to the financial decimation millions of American's experienced to benefit our corporate overlords, it became increasingly mainstream to be ready for the next event. The fallout of 2008 awoke many to the reality that the federal government will do nothing to help them in their hour of need. Prepping and survivalism aren't just for your crazy uncle any more.

Preparedness is a rewarding journey, and I've compiled a list of reasons why you should take the first steps toward it immediately. You will see that getting ready to survive isn't a theoretical project; it will dovetail with many of the game and personal improvement goals you probably have already.

1. You will learn useful skills

As Robert Heinlein said, "A human being should be able to change a diaper, plan an invasion, butcher a hog, conn a ship, design a building, write a sonnet, balance accounts, build a wall, set a bone, comfort the dying, take orders, give orders, cooperate, act alone, solve equations, analyze a new problem, pitch manure, program a computer, cook a tasty meal, fight efficiently, die gallantly. Specialization is for insects." Survival encompasses a broad skill set that can improve you in almost every area. Cooking tasty meals from scratch is a trick that you can put to work right away of or dinner dates. Become a handy carpenter and you can do your own repairs and build your own furniture. All of the skills you need to learn, like sharpening a knife, using a saw, and mending clothes all have great value in your current life.

2. You will see the world with different eyes

Are you ready for a second regimen of the red pill? A preparedness mindset will make you look at the world differently. When you go to a supermarket you won't just see aisles of food. You'll see exotic crops from all over the world, delivered by a tenuous, fossil fuel driven supply chain managed by complex computers. When you look at American cities, you will see places that would become unlivable within weeks of the grid going down. You will see highways that would quickly become parking lots if thousands tried to flee at once. You will see that America is addicted to excessive consumption and waste. You will see that people don't care about tomorrow as long as they have their luxuries today. Start asking yourself "what if?" questions. What would you do if you lost your job? What would you do if you couldn't buy food at the grocery store? What would you do if you couldn't get gas for your car? How would you evacuate in an emergency? Why is our the government increasingly treating citizens as enemies? Why are we encouraged to mindlessly consume instead of making things for ourselves?

3. You will meet interesting people

The preparedness movement is broad, and can encompass anyone from Amish farmers to investment bankers. I've met many people in my travels who made preparedness part of their lives, and every one of them was an interesting person who taught me something. Growing up in Alaska, I helped a retired hunting guide build an addition on his log cabin homestead that was so remote that it could only be accessed by a Super Cub bushplane or a long walk through pathless woods. From a conspiracy theorist friend who ran a gun store from garage to hippies in a yurt commune, the preppers I've met have been fascinating people to be around.Prepared folks are always eccentric and sometimes even a little crazy, but the practical lessons I've learned from them have been invaluable.

4. You will meet a better quality of women

There is a significant minority of sensible American women who don't want to live the dramas that are advertised on reality TV and the Internet and who reject mindless consumerism… and I'm not just talking about hippie chicks who don't shave body hair. That's been one of the best aspects of prepping for me: meeting like minded women who are ready to dispense with lifestyles and start actually living.

5. You will get into shape

Much of the fitness culture is driven solely by aesthetics, but a healthy body is vital to survival. If you don't have a strong body, you don't have anything. Wilderness hikes, back packing trips, snowshoeing, running, kettle balls, spinning, and old fashioned lifting sessions; anything to contribute to your overall stamina and strength is good. Remember to cultivate all around excellent fitness instead of focusing on one aspect of training too much.

6. You will conserve money and natural resources

Preparedness is an opportunity to cut expenses in many areas. The skills you've learned, like cooking and automotive repair turn into huge cash savings. By buying food and other consumables in bulk, you can get much more for your dollar. A variety of do it yourself projects, as modest as a few vegetable beds or as ambitious as building your own house will further contribute to a frugal lifestyle. By eliminating waste in all areas, you will have more funds to save, invest, prepare, and travel. All of this contributes to attaining a state of financial preparedness, living debt free and frugally, making wise investments, and keeping adequate money in savings. The goal is to be recession proof, rendering the whims of Wall Street irrelevant to your life.

7. You will be inspired

I read a lot of survival literature, both fiction and nonfiction. These stories show a man what is possible with determination and perseverance. Hatchet, which I read when I was younger, is the story of a boy who finds himself stranded in the Canadian wilderness with nothing but a small ax and the clothes, using his wits to survive the summer. Louis L'Amour's novel Last of the Breed is another great fictional story of an US Air Force pilot escaping a gulag in the Soviet Union, surviving the harsh Siberian winter as he flees across the wilderness. But the best stories are the non-fiction stories, the ones that make you realize how insignificant your personal challenges up to this point have been. The account of Earnest Shackleton's Antarctic expedition aboard his ship The Endurance is one classic. Lewis and Clark's account of their transcontinental expedition is another timeless story, as the explorers lead their party through the heart of the uncharted North American continent.

8. You will develop eat healthier eating habits

A nutritious diet in America is seen as status symbol and a fashion statement rather than a path to a sound body. Expensive diets come and go every year, each touted as the ultimate in what you should eat. Imagine that you didn't just eat a gluten free or Paleo diet to keep up with the newest fad. Instead, visualize using strength and a rugged constitution to carry yourself through life threatening situations; your diet becomes a primary concern. Your prepping habits and skills, like exercise, home cooking, gardening, hunting, etc. both necessitate and facilitate a good diet.

9. You will have fun

Prepping is a gateway to many hobbies. Shooting, which is a vital survival skill for hunting and self defense is also something I enjoy recreationally. Gardening is relaxing, as well as interesting opportunity to learn about botany, geology, and meteorology. Cooking becomes a way to eat tasty way to feed yourself and explore new cuisine.

10. You will become more independent

Enjoy the confidence you gain when you know that you are resilient no matters what the future holds. At a time when everyone is completely immersed in a society that is against all things masculine, you will be able to live on its outer edges as a free man.

If you are a red pill man, you may think that there isn't any hope for defeating the forces against us. But consider how quickly the other side would evaporate as their blue pill beliefs hit the hard rocks of reality. As men who are learning to see the world as it is, rather than the way we want it to be, we enjoy a significant advantage. If you're reading a blog like this one, you are already on the path to mentally preparing yourself. It is time to accompany those mental preparations with concrete physical preparations as well. Winter is coming.

Women Have No Sense Of Justice

March 22, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

Arthur Schopenhauer, the great German philosopher, conservative and instructive read for all red pill men, said:

> …the fundamental fault in the character of women is that they have no "sense of justice." This arises from their deficiency in the power of reasoning and reflection, but is also partly due to the fact that Nature has not destined them, as the weaker sex, to be dependent on strength but on cunning; this is why they are instinctively crafty, and have an ineradicable tendency to lie. For as lions are furnished with claws and teeth, elephants with tusks, boars with fangs, bulls with horns, and the cuttlefish with its dark, inky fluid, so Nature has provided woman for her protection and defense with the faculty of dissimulation, and all the power which Nature has given to man in the form of bodily strength and reason has been conferred on woman in this form.
> Hence, dissimulation is innate in woman and almost as characteristic of the very stupid as of the clever. Accordingly, it is as natural for women to dissemble at every opportunity as it is for those animals to turn to their weapons when they are attacked; and they feel in doing so that in a certain measure they are only making use of their rights. Therefore a woman who is perfectly truthful and does not dissemble is perhaps an impossibility. This is why they see through dissimulation in others so easily; therefore it is not advisable to attempt it with them. From the fundamental defect that has been stated, and all that it involves, spring falseness, faithlessness, treachery, ungratefulness, and so on.

Contemporary heterosexual dating in America demonstrates just how right the great thinker was. In the past two months I have been on seven dates. This resulted in three bangs, all on the first night. Not bad numbers, I guess, but no one with much experience with American women these days will be surprised to learn that out of the four women who weren't interested in me, only one could be bothered to respond to my calls and texts. Nor is it a coincidence that she was not an American.

I had been a gentleman from beginning to end. Common courtesy—or basic human decency—would therefore dictate that these women were obliged to respond to me with something like: "Thanks for the drinks, but I just didn't feel a connection. Good luck and take care." It's not at all pleasant, of course, to tell someone that, but it is the right thing to do, and a minor inconvenience that takes all of about 30 seconds. Still, contemporary American woman, no matter how well you've treated them, have very little sense of justice. And the rare exceptions—distinguished female lawyers, for instance—tend to be strikingly masculine, and thus quite unattractive.

Many men have noticed that while attractive American women expect us to do all sorts of things for them—pay for dates, buy their drinks, shell out for their birthday, for Valentine's Day, for Christmas, and on and on—very few of these women are inclined to do anything for us. They don't know how to cook, nor do they want to cook for us. I have often noticed that even when they go dutch on a date, a feeling of resentment is subtly evident from their body language. Given their perverse self-interest and sense of entitlement, it simply doesn't occur to them that they should do something for you in return for what you have done for them. In spite of feminism, things should not be fair or complimentary. You owe them—end of story.

I have had the following experience with countless American women, in situations both where I was already hooking up with them and only pursuing them. We've been exchanging texts. She's answered each one within a few minutes. Then I say something like, "So, want to grab a drink Friday night?" And I am met with silence. Now if I say to a buddy, "Hey, what's up with hanging out tomorrow night?" he will usually let me know—he won't just leave me hanging. But even if you're a high value guy, American women often have no sense of propriety here. For them, the brief awkwardness of saying "I'm busy" or "I don't want to hang out" is not outweighed by the feeling that they should show a little respect to a guy who's not only giving them awesome orgasms, but treating them pretty well.

Men should, however, understand that from puberty until they near middle age, all women who are even mildly attractive live under the almost constant and overwhelming gaze of men. Wherever they go—school, work, the supermarket, the cafe, the bar—they encounter men who want to sleep with them, and the age of texting and social media makes this even more intense. As a result, it becomes natural for women to regard men like insects in summer: we are pesky creatures to shoo away (to flake on) whenever women are not in the mood for our attention.

Yet on the whole, women are endlessly fickle and capricious; their analytical powers—such as they are—don't come with much steadiness or backbone. Letting people know where they stand, like notions of honor and obligation, are often no more than inconveniences to be shrugged off. It is for the same reasons that women tend to be so ungrateful and disloyal.

To a man—that is to say, a rational and analytical being—it would seem, on the face of it, that treating women with respect—your dealings with them being governed by justice and honor—would lead to success with them. But as every American man who isn't stupid or a pussy eventually learns, this is far from true. There are very few American women who won't burn you if you take this dangerous approach, and the exceptions are mostly fat chicks, who, you better believe it, would be entitled, ungrateful cunts if only they could.

It is because they have inferior minds and little sense of justice that the words of American women are so often meaningless and contrary to what they actually want. For example, when they say they want a "nice guy," what they really mean is one who will spend money on them, realizing their deep sense of entitlement. If you think otherwise, I encourage you to be that nice guy in the sweet, emotional way, and see how that goes for you. If they were straightforward, they'd simply say: "I want a guy who will spend money on me," but here, of course, is where they employ their well-known talents for cunning and dissimulation.

If you've ever caught a woman lying, you were perhaps struck by the uncanny skill and nonchalance with which she did so. While they have a deserved reputation for being the illogical sex, women may be recognized for their superior ability to manipulate others, especially men. Of course, any sense of justice is no obstacle here.

I have known many American women whose friends were mostly men. These women, unusually smart and rational for their sex, all told me that they couldn't stand other women, owing to all the drama, cattiness, petty resentments, and so on. So they hung out with men. Of course, the latter were mostly betas who really just wanted to get laid. But they are blameworthy only for allowing themselves to be friend zoned; after all, most American women aren't good for anything besides opening their legs, though one hopes that feminist cattle might soon be used to improve our lagging agriculture industry.

Since, then, this is how most attractive American women are, how shall a man act toward them? In the first place, apply that leading principle from the manosphere: be aloof and show little or no emotion. Be sure also not to expect any gratitude or decency from them. Because, as Schopenhauer pointed out, women are deficient in the power of reasoning, with very little sense of justice, it is a grave mistake to expect rational and fair behavior from them, even when you yourself have been eminently so.

Don't be fooled either by women who seem to be very nice or different from most. Most likely, the exception won't last. If you don't keep up a certain emotional reserve, your kindness will lead to pain: all of a sudden, she won't be such a sweetheart anymore, but will prove to be unaccountably selfish and false, aided by a remarkable talent for rationalization that can only leave you bewildered and bitter. For it cannot be stopped by man, neither does it make sense. You need to keep women feeling that they have not got

“all” of you emotionally, because this is the only way to control them: through the mind, making them pursue what they don’t have.

You cannot take too much shit from women; still, you must let a lot of their nonsense go: if you call out every hotty for every little thing, you won’t even get that many bangs in before you have to replace her with another lovely little vampire. I used to call out women for flaking. I found it usually led only to more flaking. So now I just wait things out, resolving with each fresh flake to be smarter and stronger than women and not let them get the best of me. Here it helps always to be working on several at once. You cannot count on a single woman—or for that matter, any woman—but when juggling several it will usually happen that you pay less attention to the less attractive ones: these, then, will tend to go crazy for you, at your call when the 8s and up flake. And in short, having a rotation of women will keep you from paying much attention to one. This is excellent in these dismal days when the more aloof you are the better, especially when dealing with stunners.

Whether you are monogamous or a player, calling out American women requires great subtlety: you must be commanding yet terse; get in and get out. Let her see where you stand, then show her, by having a take her on your own terms or leave her attitude, that you won’t go for any drawn-out drama: otherwise there may be no end to the thing (besides her mirror, she lives for just that), and in her delusional narcissism she will get fed up, and stroke her hamster rationalizing: “I’m not gonna settle for this asshole. I’m gonna do me now!” (What had she been doing all along?) Indeed, if you call her out in just the right way, she will be extremely turned on. The reason is that American women are deeply twisted and have a perverse desire to be emotionally tortured, which corresponds to their desire to be dominated in bed (and note that here the career-type, or “strong and independent woman,” is no exception—she is actually one of the most sexually submissive type of women around). In fact, it is because American women have it too good that so many of them are drawn to assholes. Being psychologically askew, they require men to treat them like shit in order, perversely, to balance out their self-important, princess mentality. It is as if human nature itself punishes them for being out of whack.

Finally, every player must be willing to apply these words from Nietzsche’s Thus Spake Zarathustra: “Thou goest unto the women? Remember thy whip!” Just make sure it’s a strong one. These pretty beasts are intractable.

Women Don’t Want What Feminists Want Them to Want

March 22, 2014 | by Psanctus | Link | Original Link

It is beyond fallacious to claim that radical feminism is a war waged solely on men—it is absolutely a war on women as well. As noted by many writers on this website, a great deal of feminists scream “choice” at the top of their lungs, and then immediately turn around and tear their dear sistas to shreds for not making the choices they approve of. This has been well documented: rants by shrill harpies such as Amy Glass are refreshing precisely because they’re honest. Rather than rolling her eyes and otherwise being coyly bitchy to women who want to be happy with their husbands, raising their kids and keeping a great and loving home, she’s outright calling them traitors to themselves and to the cause.

Choice? Bullshit.

However, even in the blue pill world, even in the female mind that’s been told — in direct opposition to the laws of conservation—that she can have everything while sacrificing nothing, certain truths are beginning to unfold. Specifically, that there are things women do not want, and that no amount of counterintuitive programming can force them to want.

Women don’t want to be equals in bed

It would be wearisome to provide endless links so try this exercise instead: google “What do women want in bed”, surveys and whatnot. You’ll encounter a number of top 10 lists. Every single one of them will include an entry about D/S fantasies, calling the man “Master” and catering to their whims. Most of them, such as this gem, will have straight-up rape fantasies as the number one thing that women gush a torrent over.

I have dated several self identified-feminists in my younger days, and funnily enough, when I look back, they were far more likely to be ultra-submissive in bed, wanting to be degraded and “put in their place”, than their non feminist peers. Sublimation, perhaps? Whatever; there’s a reason 50 Shades of Gray sold roughly infinity copies. Women want—and the modern woman wants desperately—to be submissive in bed. No feminist doctrine can make her wet or keep her dry in defiance of that.

Love letter to feminine submission comes out, repressed femininity across western world creams itself.

Women don’t want to be anything other than conventionally beautiful

A particularly butthurt entry on Jezebel cites a survey by Escentual.com. The idea was that men and women would identify their favorite features from different celebrities and morph that into a whole. The writer is “creeped out” by how both men and women came up with thin, extremely feminine, full lipped, long haired, perfect skinned ideals. She clearly sees it as a betrayal by women.

Now, we all know about the cancer of go girlism but the truth of the matter is, very few women can completely BS themselves at the subconscious level. Somewhere deep down they know that the myth of endlessly fluid beauty standards is bullshit. While there are hot curvy women (Christina Hendricks from Mad Men) and hot skinny women (January Jones, also from Mad Men), there are no hot wrinkly women, no hot fat women, no hot fugly women. And there never were, and never will be.

Tellingly, feminism has not made a dent in bullshit diet fads for women. Now, fad dieting is a ridiculous and worthless cop out, but the fact that there’s such a huge industry around it aimed mostly towards women clearly reveals their means that they aren't buying the fools gold that feminists are selling: that you will be loved no matter what you look like. Every fat girl, even the caustic go-girls, especially the caustic go-girls, know this.

And so do all women, even the so-called supports of the (ironically named) "body-positive" movement. Watch these fat girls put up nauseating pictures of themselves, and an endless rush of their hotter, skinny friends will smother them in praises and "OMFG U SO HAWT GURLL." Tell one of those girls to stop hitting the gym and eat a pound of cake a day, though, and note the just-swallowed-a-porcupine expression. They've been caught in a lie, and will stammer something about how they're never really that hungry, or that this is their natural body type and its no better or worse than a whales natural body type.

Bullshit. They would slit their wrists before looking like their Hindenburg buddies, and everyone knows it.

Women Don't Want To Work As Much As You Think They Do

This is the big one. The pay gap myth in the US has already been addressed on this website—women tend to earn less because over a lifetime, because they tend to do less work than men. Its equal pay for equal work, but that's a hard pill to swallow for the "equal rights but zero responsibilities" harpies. So I'm not going to focus on that. Instead, let me link an article from the New York Times that was so delicious it made me lick my lips: a survey "discovered" something that everyone had always known but in the last few decades had conspired to forget: Women don't enjoy working away from home.

They simply aren't wired to receive the same competitive rush of succeeding. Coupled with various studies over the years that point out how much more biologically attuned mothers are to having children and how much they enjoy the act of child rearing, it made NYT readers lose their minds. The very top commenter coalesced into one inane comment what was surely going through an abundance of small minds: "Instead of concluding…that women weren't built to lead, the author should have offered up a solution".

What solution, toots? You wanted the authors of the survey to solve biology? To solve a million years of evolution? You CAN work, girl, you can work hard and do well, but you'll never be as fulfilled as a man who does the same. He is moving in accordance with his natural role—and getting the biologically mandated positive feedback from his own brain for it—and you are rebelling against yours. I hope the rush of defiance is enough.

There are, furthermore, more and more women who are awakening to this and subtly disengaging from feminism, mouthing off the common slogans while quietly starting to cherish, instead, what comes naturally to them. More women are choosing to be housewives or just more "traditional" because feminism's promised land has come, and is decidedly underwhelming for men and women alike.

So be of good cheer. While it may seem like an uphill struggle against a feminized society, understand that feminists are fighting a far more doomed battle: they are attempting to surmount the core natures of the very women they claim to be fighting for.

Slowly, as more red pill truth seeps out, those women will abandon the feminist ideal as a false idol that never made good on its extravagant—and impossible—promises.

An American Beta Male Story

March 23, 2014 | by Mikeyangelo | Link | Original Link

Everything seems to go smooth in the beginning of most new relationships. Almost even too smooth. You wanted a girl that you desired, and you obtained that desire. It made your confidence rise much higher than normal. The relationship flowed the way it wanted to, until one of you decided to put the water into a canteen. I mean, she cooks for you, licks things the other girls wouldn't, and surprisingly this one "isn't" really into that drama stuff.

Fast forward 6 months

As time goes on, you start becoming a little complacent. Your car gets dirty, your hair becomes more greasy, and you smell like Hot Pockets. You pretty much text your girlfriend the same shit each morning. When you get off work, you go to her house, watch Netflix together, and then have sex. This is your new life, but it only sounds bad on paper.

You guys were having sex almost everyday for the first 6 months. Now It's dropped down to about 3-4. You say to yourself, "Damn, I thought this girl was chill." Maybe the "infatuation stage" is starting to fade. Whatever, Naomi Russell would never do you wrong.

That month you guys get in your first argument. You're both laying on her crooked mattress. You try to follow a specific blade on the ceiling fan while it spins, because your life is boring.

She randomly asks, "Why did you favorite Samantha's tweet?! You know she's a slut!" You say, "Baby, I only liked it because I thought it was funny. I'm sorry!"

She glares and then rolls over.

“Baby, I’m sorry. Why’re you mad at me? I won’t do it again…”

You try to kiss her. She pushes you off, but you keep persisting.

She says, “Okay, Okay! It’s fine, just go to bed.”

She forces herself to give you a quick kiss, and then you both go to bed.

Fast forward 2 years

Everything seems to be going good for you. You guys have had your ups and downs, but it’s all worth it because you love this girl. She might even be your “soul mate.” No girl has ever made you feel the way that she makes you feel.

Whenever a girl flirts with you in public (while you’re with your girlfriend), you overtly reject the girl in an exaggerated manner to prove to your girlfriend that you’re loyal. Most of your paycheck is spent on opulent restaurants and miscellaneous gifts for her. Her happiness is your happiness. You’re always the one to initiate sex. A lot of times she’s stressed out from work, and would just rather sleep, but she agrees to it 38% of the time. You rationalize that “It’s almost a good thing that we don’t have sex as often. The wait makes it much more enjoyable.” The thought of marriage and kids with this girl makes you smile with tears of joy. You’re the luckiest guy in the world.

Fast forward another 6 months

You went into the relationship feeling like a king, but now your confidence has started to become a bit shaky. How did this happen? It’s probably just all in your head.

You’re laying on that same crooked bed. She’s in the shower while you’ve refreshed your Facebook page for the umpteenth time. New notification?! Nah, just a rave junkie who sent you another invite to his glow in the dark basement party. As you scroll past all the pictures of the pregnant Hispanic teens, you eventually come across a picture of some douchey guy who went to your school. He’s showing off his four pack abs and his new garage tattoo that he just got on his chest. It says, “Shane” in cursive. That’s his first name.

You look at the comments on it, and notice your girlfriend posted a heart emoji on the picture. Shane responded, “u sexy girl.” Your girlfriend “liked” it and said, “That’s the nicest thing anyone’s ever said to me, Shane :)” Your cortisol levels rise, your face turns red, you’re about to go ape shit.

Your girlfriend opens the door to her room. She’s wearing two towels. One on her body, and one on her head wrapped up like a turban. In an insecure tone you say, “Why did you post a heart on this Shane guys photo?!” She becomes defensive and says, “Do you remember in October when you favorited that slutty girls tweet? Now you know how I feel.”

You: “That’s fucking different. You’re actually flirting with this guy. Do you think he’s cute, or something?”

Girlfriend: “No way! He’s ugly. I honestly just liked his tattoo.”

You: “It’s his first name on his chest. Are you kidding me?!”

Girlfriend: “What, you don’t trust me?”

You: “Of course I trust you, sometimes I just feel like you do stupid things.”

Girlfriend: “Well it doesn’t seem like you trust me. All you ever do is bitch and complain. It almost feels like you’re not even trying in this relationship anymore.”

You: “Baby, I love you more than anything in this world. I would die for you, I would sacrifice anything for you! Please, it just makes me upset when you do those things. Promise me you won’t do it anymore.”

Girlfriend: “Fine, I didn’t know it would upset you. I won’t do it again.”

You heard the mainstream advice that It’s good to communicate in relationships. The more you communicate, the more everything will work itself out is what you tell yourself. Your baby would never intentionally want to hurt you. If you have an issue, or if something makes you feel uneasy, you will address it with her and talk it out. This makes your future with her feel even more promising. You’re still the luckiest guy in the world.

Fast forward 3 weeks

Everything’s going good. The sex is still as frequent (38% of the time you ask for it), and strangely she has had an unusual pep in her step. You don’t really think much of it. You whisper to yourself, “I love my baby so much.”

Fast forward 2 days

It’s 5 p.m, Friday evening. You haven’t seen your baby in two days. It felt like a month. You put on your favorite shirt, some slacks, sprayed on your favorite Usher Raymond cologne, and went over to her house to take her on a dinner date. You pulled up in the driveway, and noticed her car wasn’t there. You texted her, “Where are you?” No response, so you call her. Still no answer, so you call her again. Forty minutes later you get a text from her, “On my way sorry!” Fifteen minutes later she pulls up. She hops in your car, smiles, and then kisses you.

You: “Where were you? You were supposed to be ready by 5:30.”

Her: “I was with Suzy, she wanted me to do her nails. I’m sorry I made you wait, baby.”

You: “Oh, It’s no worries. How’s she doing anyways? Play some music on your phone, let’s roll.”

Her: “Sounds good.”

She plugged her iPhone into the auxiliary chord, and asked what song you wanted. You said, “I don’t know, you choose.” She sighed and then put on The Weeknd’s new album. You wondered if she was just pretending to like it to seem cool. She probably was, the album wasn’t that good. You can’t help but stare at her while you’re driving. “You look absolutely breathtaking tonight. You never cease to amaze me, baby.” She smiles and says, “Thanks, baby.”

Her phone vibrated extra loud from the pennies in the console. You look down and see a message that reads, “Shane: here’s da vid ;)”

Your heart sinks. You forget that you’re driving, and almost swerve into oncoming traffic. You grab the phone quicker than she does, she tries to fight you for it. This bitch might kill you. In the midst of the cat fight, you accidentally play the message from Shane. You can’t see anything, because she’s still trying to grab her phone. But the audio played through the speakers. It was your girlfriend’s voice, moaning louder than usual. The voice in the speaker said, “Oh my god, Shane. It’s too deep.” It almost made you puke.

She freaked out on you. It was “your” fault for never “trusting” her in the first place. It was “your” fault for not being “emotionally supportive” enough through the hard times. You wept, and apologized. It started to make sense, maybe it really was all “your” fault. You were willing to continue the relationship, because she was your world. It was too much for her though, so she broke up with you that night.

You laid there in your bed. Thinking of what you just lost—how your whole world just dissolved into nothingness. You tell yourself, “This all could have been resolved if I was more nice to her. If I communicated with her more, and just loved her better. I’m such an idiot.”

The night felt cold, even with the heater on. You lamented with tears into your pillow and popped a Tylenol PM so you could sink into oblivion. The next day, you googled “How to get my girlfriend back.” After twelve hours of straining your eyes, and a thousand shitty Yahoo answers later, you finally came across a site that introduced you to the red pill. It looks like you may be the luckiest guy in the world after all.

3 Ways To Stop Being A Little Bitch

March 23, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

We're living in the age of weakness. The average modern man is becoming a bigger and bigger pussy. From living in constant fear of his boss to living under the control of his bossy girlfriend, the average man has sacrificed much of what it means to be a man. If these weak behaviors weren't enough, his body is so soft it could be used for a baby wipes commercial and his style is closer to that of a woman's.

Below I'll cover the three most common ways I see men showing weakness on a day-to-day basis. Catch yourself doing these things, recognize it, and then stop.

1. Stop apologizing

If there was a way to capture the frequency the word "sorry" is used in conversation over time, I'm positive that it would be at its peak in 2014.

Yes, there are situations that warrant an apology, but they're few and far between compared to how much I hear the word used. I constantly hear men apologizing for the stupidest things everyday. Yesterday I witnessed a man apologize to me repeatedly at the gym as he shuffled behind me to get to a piece of equipment. I didn't have to move.

He had room. At most, an "excuse me" was warranted on the first occasion. But no, he was so afraid he was going to offend me that continued to cry "sorry" like a little puppy.

Another example I can recall involves one of my personal training clients. Every time he had trouble learning a new exercise, his first instinct was to apologize to me. Give me a break. I don't expect every movement to come to you naturally. And if you're frustrated that's okay, but why are you apologizing to me? You're paying me to help you learn this shit.

So stop fucking apologizing everywhere you go. You're not hurting anyone's feelings, and if you do every once in a while, it's not the end of the world if you don't apologize. In today's day and age, I'd rather err on the side of not apologizing, rather than risk becoming addicted to it's use and being a bitch. And in the rare occasion that you have harmed someone, it's better to act to fix the situation rather than bombarding them with a storm of "sorrys".

2. Stop explaining yourself

This might be my biggest pet peeve. Especially when I catch myself doing it. A lot of guy's first instinct, when they say something that isn't met with immediate praise and acceptance, is to start rationalizing what they said. This screams weakness and lack of self-confidence louder than anything else I can think of.

To continue my stream of personal training examples, yesterday I informed a lady that I'd no longer be conducting sessions after 6PM. I knew this was a situation where I might jump the gun and offer a big explanation up front, so I prepared myself. I started by simply stating, "No, going forward I can't do Thursdays at 8PM." Rather than explaining why or try to appease her initial reaction—I waited. Of course, she asked me why, and commented how perfect it worked out for her at that time. I responded by saying I simply decided not to do late sessions anymore. I may have lost a client, but I was prepared for that outcome and didn't let my instinct to please everyone get in the way of what I wanted.

If you don't get instant validation of something you say, that's okay. Leave the burden on the other party to ask a question or make a counter argument before you start droning on and defending what you said.

3. Stop complaining

Everyone has a friend or family member that complains a lot. Do you think of this person as confident or strong? No, they appear weak. Their constant need to express how things aren't going perfectly for them is just annoying. And it's no wonder that "bitching" has become a synonym for "complaining"—when you complain you embody a defining characteristic of the classic bitch. When you complain you're really saying "I don't like the way something is going but I'm too afraid or lazy to do anything about it myself so I'm going to tell you about it instead."

Have you ever been on a date with a girl who just moans and whines the entire time? It's the worst, and it immediately disqualifies her for anything long-term. Realize that it's no different when you complain. You annoy anyone who you complain to, and you condition yourself to bitch about things instead of manning up and doing something about it.

How Professional Athletes Show Us The Importance Of Fathers

March 24, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

While the glorification of single motherhood in America continues to pave the way for the destruction of Western Civilization, the importance of fathers is only recently being acknowledged in both the political and social arena. Though this acknowledgement in the media is often a backhanded dig at men (that teen who robbed the liquor store did it because he didn't have a father at home so it's a man's fault!) it is starting to gain respectable traction, albeit much too late.

Numbers never lie

There isn't enough time in the world to address all of the havoc wreaked by fatherless homes on a macro scale but one need not look any further than professional athletes in the U.S. to see a direct contrast between the men who grew up with fathers, and those who did not. One would think that with all the advantages they have (money, masculinity, status, physical superiority, etc.) they'd automatically all be alphas as we define them in the 'sphere but nothing could be further from the truth. Looking at the situation involving Mario Williams will make you cringe with embarrassment, shake your head and think to yourself "How the hell did that happen to him?" Sad thing is, there are many more cases like this in all 4 of the major sports leagues in America.

As widespread a problem as this is in the world of sports, there are, however, a precious few athletes that fit the mold of a true alpha. Each of them come from different walks of life but one thing they all have in common is they had strong fathers as examples growing up—a tremendous advantage when it comes to navigating the landscape of wealth, women, and the locker room.

A dissection of six of the most well known American professional athletes world-wide (active or retired) will show how having a strong male presence growing up makes a significant difference in the way their lives on and off the field.

The Haves

Michael Jordan, Tom Brady, Derek Jeter. These names are synonymous with greatness—oh, and they're pretty damn good on their respective playing fields too. These three men enjoy a global stardom rivaled by few. Between them they have amassed a whopping 14 championships. To be the best in the world at anything for an extended period of while simultaneously thriving outside of your craft takes an alpha approach. The will, the desire, and the killer instinct necessary to attain this level of excellence simply cannot be taught by a woman.

His Airness

James Jordan was a hard working equipment manager from Brooklyn with a rock solid work ethic who moved his family to Wilmington, North Carolina in search of a better life. With the help and support of his wife Deloris, they instilled their children with that same diligent ethos. Their son, Michael, benefited the most from this and became arguably the most famous athlete the world has ever known.

The symbol recognized 'round the world

The Jordan brand and image will be recognized worldwide forever. Anyone who doubts this should go to their local Footlocker and witness the bedlam that ensues when the latest edition of his basketball shoes hits the shelves. Jordan also won 6 NBA Titles in 6 tries and is regarded as the greatest player in the history of the NBA. More than a decade after his retirement he's still flexing his alpha muscle as he is currently the majority owner of the Charlotte Bobcats, made $90 million last year in endorsements alone and also married her.

Michael Jordan's work ethic was legendary and his competitive drive was off the charts. It's said that he was confrontational, uncommonly demanding, and even punched teammates. In retrospect he isn't as quite as loved as he used to be what with former teammates regaling us with stories of his infamous tirades but he is still revered for his unyielding lust for victory. We recognize a super alpha when we see one and Jordan is just that. This 30 year run of dominance is highly unlikely without the presence of a strong male leader. A leader like his father, James Jordan.

Captain America

On August 8th, 1977 Galynn Brady gave birth to a baby boy named Thomas, after his father. Thomas Brady was a blue collar Catholic who ran a conservative household. With his wife studiously by his side, he raised his son with laser focus and an iron will that would later propel him to superstar status earning him nicknames like "Captain America" and "The Golden Boy".

Tom Brady is widely regarded as one of the greatest quarterbacks in NFL history and for good reason. He's won 3 Super Bowls in 5 attempts and has set numerous records along the way. Tom Terrific earns a cool $15 million a year not counting his endless upscale product endorsements, he's married to International Brazilian supermodel Gisele Bundchen, and lives in a $20 million home surrounded by a moat. Put simply, he's kicking life's ass.

Brady simply does not put his name on burger joints

To amass and maintain a life like this takes hard work, perseverance, and a belief in himself that could only have come from the influence of a solid household led by a man who understood the importance of traditional family values.

King Of Gotham City

Dr. Sanderson Charles Jeter is a substance abuse counselor who served in the U.S. Army where he met his wife, Dorothy. Together they provided a strong foundation for their son, Derek, who grew up to become one of the greatest shortstops on the most storied franchises in Major League Baseball history. One of the many rearing methods Dr. Jeter used to mold Derek into the man he is today was making him sign an annual contract that stated what behavior was acceptable, and what behavior was not. This helped pave the way for their son to handle the rigors of being in the spotlight of playing for the New York Yankees.

Derek Jeter has played in 7 World Series and won 5. He's a first-ballot hall of famer and has amassed enough wealth to last him and his family several lifetimes. Jeter also has a reputation for being a playboy, having dated some of the most beautiful, talented women in the world. Actresses, singers, models, you name 'em—he's banged 'em. However, the most remarkable feat he's accomplished with his high class harem is that we never hear about any drama or nasty breakups with any of these women… ever.

He is the master of his universe and keeping things under the radar is a skill he's perfected. His ability to seamlessly float from one hottie to another before the public even realizes who his latest fling is mystifies even the nosiest of NYC gossip magazine reporters. Doing this under the bright lights of New York City is difficult but the Yankee captain makes it look easy. The icing on the cake is that he has no children that we know of (which is no accident). Derek Jeter is a red pill alpha to the core. This is the end result of being raised in a home with a man like Sanderson at the helm.

A small sampling of Derek's impressive notches

The Have Nots

Alex Rodriguez, Terrell Owens, Mike Tyson. These names are synonymous with—well—a lot of things. Yes, each of these men were considered the very best at what they did at some point and yes, they have all made a shit load of money. But money isn't everything as the saying goes and these guys are the poster children for this idiom. Having earned more than $705 million (est.) between them has not kept their lives spiraling out of control in public. What's their common thread? Men like James, Thomas, and Sanderson were nowhere to be found in their lives.

Latin Loser

Alex Rodriguez is one of the most infamous athletes in U.S. history. As recently as 5 years ago this guy was on top of the world. Rodriguez was the highest paid baseball player ever making $27.5 million per season, he was well on his way to breaking the most hallowed record in sports (the career homerun record), and he played for baseball's most successful franchise, the New York Yankees. His fall from grace after the revelation of his alleged steroid use wasn't much of a surprise because, believe it or not, A-Rod wasn't well liked to begin with.

So why was this talented, mega-rich, professional athlete with male model looks disliked by both sexes? A lot of sports fans point to his perceived disingenuousness. Or maybe it's that teammates and coaches (current and former) have opined about his passive aggressive personality. It's also believed that Rodriguez surrounds himself with some pretty shady individuals which has provided more than its fair share of public drama. If we combine the aforementioned narrative with the endless anecdotes of his lack of character from people who have spent time with him, we get the answer to this question that's stared us in the face all along: Alex Rodriguez is a beta. Regardless of how rich or good looking you are, a supplicating persona does not win you genuine favor with the masses. And how does a guy who's made $325 million in salary become a beta you ask? Take a look:

> "Dad left us when I was 9," Rodriguez said. "What did I know back then? I thought he was coming back. I thought he had gone to the store or something. But he never came back…it still hurts."

Mystery solved.

T.O.

Terrell Owens will walk into the Hall of Fame as one of the greatest receivers ever to play in the National Football League. His career numbers are only surpassed by the greatest receiver ever, Jerry Rice. But adjectives like "diva" and "drama queen" have been used to describe him and trust me when I tell you he has earned those labels. A quick search on YouTube will reveal the melodramatic circus that has plagued his career since he started gaining notoriety in the late 90s, such as crying like a girl (masculine men cry on television all the time but this was of the feminine nature) during a press conference when reporters attacked a teammate of his for doing sit ups in his driveway to attract attention to himself in the midst of a contract dispute. His life has been one soap opera after another.

It gets better. Not only has he reportedly blown through more than $80 million in career earnings, he has 4 children by 4 different women (no wonder he's broke) and appeared on Dr. Phil to be emasculated by said baby mamas on national television. No need to speculate on how this physical freak with hall of fame talent got to this point:

> He is chasing, and it is sad. It is sad that Owens' father lived across the street from him when he was a child and his father wasn't involved in his life. It is sad that Owens was raised by a strict, almost paranoid grandmother and that he didn't see his mother much because she worked two jobs.

Enough said.

Kid Dynamite

Mike Tyson is a man who needs no introduction. Once known as "The Baddest Man On The Planet" Iron Mike became the youngest heavyweight champion in history at the tender age of 20. His vicious, first round knockouts were the stuff of legend and his youth ensured us of many more to come. Tyson did not disappoint. Of his 50 career victories 44 were knockouts, most of which came in spectacular fashion. He was poised to possibly be the pound for pound greatest prize fighter in the history of professional boxing.

But without the guidance of a strong male role model in his life, Tyson's life was bound for trouble. His father abandoned the family right after he was born leaving the burden of raising him and his siblings squarely on the shoulders of his mother. Mike got a brief reprieve in the form of Cus D'Amato, who took the 13 year old Tyson under his wing, into his home and introduced the troubled teen to boxing. For 6 years Mike had a father figure in his life showing him the ropes in and out of the ring but D'Amato died one year before Tyson won his first title. Although his mentor made a significant impact in his life, the damage from the first 13 years of his upbringing had already been done.

D'Amato mentoring young Tyson

Without the tutelage of D'Amato to guide him through the treacherous waters of fame, Tyson's life was afflicted by bad decision making and many other problems that eventually lead to his downfall. Signing with Don King (who allegedly stole over $50 million from him), his marriage to Robin Givens, and his rape conviction in 1991 were all pitfalls that could have been avoided had the only father figure in his life had been around for just a bit longer. Most of the public is well aware of the many other self destructive exploits the former champion has involved himself in and thanks to his recently released autobiography, we now know the gruesome details.

Iron Mike is more of a cartoon character than anything else these days but he appears to be doing better for himself. He's been in a few movies and performs a riveting one man Broadway show that he uses as a platform to give a raw and unfiltered account of his life. But he was forever changed the day his father walked out on his family leaving him and his siblings permanently damaged.

Who would disagree now?

Feminists and egalitarians are always quick to point out the exceptions to the rule as "proof" that fathers are unnecessary. Sure, there are plenty of successful men who were raised by single mothers and good for them for persevering despite a critical disadvantage. But for every LeBron James they squawk about, at least 20 Andrew Lucks can easily be referenced to crush this weak attempt to use the exception as the rule. Feminists also have a knack for highlighting mistakes super alphas have made.

Yes, Tom Brady has a kid with another woman and yes, Michael Jordan went through a very expensive and public divorce, but the Golden Boy's son's mother is an an accomplished Hollywood actress and Jordan has more than recovered financially and has made a major upgrade in the wife department. Alpha's aren't perfect, but they always manage to come out on top in the end.

American professional athletes are a microcosm of the sad state of masculinity in the U.S. Men who have the rare fortune of having a strong paternal influence from boyhood to manhood stand a much better chance to live a life of true dominance.

What House Of Cards Tells Us About Money And Power

March 24, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

There aren't a lot of shows on television today that have won more popular and critical acclaim than Netflix's "House of Cards". Available to all Netflix subscribers, the political drama focuses on the exploits of power-hungry congressman Frank Underwood as he cunningly manipulates his way to ever greater amounts of influence within the American political system. Frank is willing to do almost anything to increase his power, a fact that makes every episode quite enthralling.

The show's second season was released in February of 2014, but today I want to examine a statement Frank made during the first season regarding a former subordinate, a man who once was a part of his congressional staff and had left public service for an extremely lucrative career as a lobbyist:

> Such a waste of time, he chose money over power. In this town, a mistake nearly everyone makes. Money is the McMansion in Sarasota that starts falling apart after ten years. Power is the old stone building that stands for centuries. I can not respect someone that doesn't see the difference.

Frank's words here appear on the surface to work as a pretty strong indictment against the notion that money is in any way more significant or worthwhile than power. In my perusal of many discussions online relating to the show, I have seen Frank Underwood (along with quotes like the one above) used to substantiate claims that money really isn't everything, that it is overrated and unsubstantial when compared to less tangible things like love or, in this case, power.

Are they correct, though? Does Frank Underwood's story validate the notion of money over power? It would were it not for a simple truth:

Money Is Power

The choice Frank talks about is usually not nearly as stark as he made it out to be. Power often doesn't come absent money, and this is a big reason why your typical congressman is quite well off. Your average US Senator is worth just under $3 million, and that's just account for assets that they are required to disclose publicly. When you start talking about the more powerful, well known and influential members of congress (ex: Pelosi, Issa, Cantor, etc), you begin talking about much larger sums of money than that average.

Money is, more often than not, the main gateway to power: it is the wealthy that get a leg up in the race for elected positions or in the race for influential political appointments (e.g., the appointment of Hank Paulson as Sec. of Treasury, among other similar appointments). Political fundraisers are some of the most powerful people in this country. They use their money and the vast connections they've obtained to raise money for political candidates, who in turn often depend on them. Some have gone as far as to say that these people are basically puppet-masters, pulling strings in Congress and ruining the democratic process because their cash is giving them too much influence. This view is not entirely without merit—these people can often control the political narrative with the money they spend funding political campaigns and producing political advertisements, nevermind the business and investment interests they can leverage in their bid to encourage elected officials to do what they like.

Names like Warren Buffett, Koch (both brothers), Sheldon Anderson, and many others who are much less well known (Steyer, Singer, Schlosstein, Norcross, etc), are really some of the most powerful men in the USA, more so than all but a handful of men or women in Washington. These are people whose wealth and fundraising prowess give them control over much of the political narrative. They can almost totally lock down politics in their local stomping grounds (state or municipal elections and appointments, for example) and they can essentially buy influence in the federal legislature. Congressmen grovel to these people — there are hedge fund managers out there who have these men and women lining up outside of their offices just to get a word in edgewise.

In the developing world, the relationship between money and power is even more obvious thanks to lower transparency (more unchecked corruption, nepotism, etc), greater inequality, and other crucial factors. Consider the Philippines, one of the largest nations in South Asia, where political power is almost entirely held up by a handful of wealthy families.

Or consider Thailand, where the control wealthy political dynasties wield is even stronger. It's bad enough that the Prime Minister's seat in that nation has essentially been passed around in a single family for the better part of a decade now. Why have they been able to hold onto political power? They're obscenely rich, that's why.

I could go on, as these narratives play out in a lot of other developing countries where a cunning individual with just a few million dollars can essentially buy his way to the top.

For all of its outward promotion of the idea that power is more worthwhile than money, House of Cards actually does plenty to affirm the contrary view and does little to contradict any of what I wrote above.

Consider the following (possible mild spoilers here, you've been warned):

—Who is Frank's most powerful rival in the show? Answer: Raymond Tusk. Why is Raymond Tusk so powerful? He's got absurd amounts of money, which he has used to discreetly exert significant amounts of influence on the political process in Washington for decades.

—Who is the President of the United States in "House of Cards"? Garrett Walker. How did Garrett Walker become the President of the United States? He became bosom buddies with one of its richest men, Raymond Tusk, as the CEO of Tusk's airline. This relationship made him rich as well, and got him a direct line to the White House.

—Who is a major foreign player in the second season of House of Cards? Xander Feng. Why is Xander Feng such a big factor? He's a billionaire.

Remy Danton, the man that Frank derided in the quote I mentioned earlier in this article for choosing money over power, actually gained MORE power by moving on. He had more influence as a highly paid lobbyist than he did as one of Frank's not-so-highly paid congressional henchmen. He didn't have to sacrifice power at the altar of the almighty dollar—he got to have his cake and eat it too.

It is also worth noting that House of Cards, in its bid to give you good drama, doesn't tell you the whole story about the influence money has in politics. To keep it simple, the show makes money seem like less of a game-changer than it actually is, and it is that creative license what allows Frank to directly lock horns with someone like Raymond Tusk and other really wealthy people (thus creating good television). In real life, big players like Tusk and Feng have a much easier time influencing US politics with their cash than the show let's on, and their activities are FAR harder for the likes of Underwood and his henchmen to expose or counter.

And, of course, we cannot forget how Frank Underwood himself got started in politics to begin with: he married a VERY rich woman and rode her money to his first seat in congress. Money was Frank's gateway to power.

At the end of the day, I think that the false dichotomy presented in House of Cards is a source of comfort for some. The idea that the accumulation of financial wealth and the acquisition of power don't usually go hand in hand can serve to make those who are pessimistic about their ability to acquire large amounts of money more content with their lot in life. People feel more comfortable believing that the almighty dollar isn't quite so almighty after all, and that their lack of money doesn't put them at a tremendous disadvantage relative to the wealthy with regard to and the ability to make a difference in our society.

That's a fine way to generate warm fuzzies, but digestion of the red pill necessitates the absorption of fundamental truths, and the truth here is this: money is power. Gifted fictional political titans like Frank Underwood can't avoid that reality, and neither can you.

The Cycle Of Societal Wealth

March 24, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A recent article in Al Jazeera's English website discussed what it called the "cash hoarding crisis" that plagues the American economic scene today. Wealthy corporations have amassed, and continue to withhold from circulation, huge amounts of capital that might otherwise be used to help the economy. According to the article, corporations now possess liquid assets equivalent to all the money the federal government spent in 2012, 2013, and part of 2011. A related and frequent topic of discussion is the widening and apparently unbridgeable gap that now exists between the rich and poor in America; income inequalities are the largest they have even been, and continue to grow. Even worse, this hoarded wealth buys unprecedented influence over the American political system. With this background, it is useful to reflect on how such lopsided situations have been resolved historically. It is a decidedly mixed picture.

With all due respect to the America's Declaration of Independence and the French Revolution's "Declaration of the Rights of Man", man is everywhere born unfree and unequal. Heredity, environment, and innate ability all combine to create disparities in achievement among men. Some men, by virtue of superior ability, heredity, luck, social position, or inheritance, will always be able to amass more money and influence than others. Nature is aristocratic or oligarchic, not communistic.

The increasing concentration of capital at the top of society is an inevitable trend in social development. To an extent, it is also a favorable one. The labors of the rich banker or businessman does fulfill a creative function in history: he finances the free flow of goods and services, awakens the creativity of artists and scholars he supports, and contributes to the abundance of consumer goods valued by all. Without the rich banking families of Renaissance Italy (e.g., the Medici) there would have been no Michelangelo or Da Vinci; and without the J.P. Morgans of America there would have been none of the large endowments for libraries, museums, or artistic grants that have made America the envy of the world in this respect. Business is the lifeblood of a healthy society.

Solon, newly appointed archon of Athens, argues for reform before the Athenian nobles

But this concentration of wealth at the top comes with a price. Left unchecked, wealth and the power it readily buys can act as an obstacle to social change. The rich, left secure in their mansions and gated communities, become increasingly isolated from, and unsympathetic towards, the plight of the poor and dispossessed. Gross inequality destabilizes society. Resentments simmer, social injustice grows, and meaningful reforms are blocked at every turn by the forces of privilege and influence. Many historical examples illustrate this. I realize that historical examples are always hazardous, since history is so rich in detail that almost any example can be used to prove any point; and the historian, even by his choice of adjectives, can betray his secret prejudices. Yet we proceed.

According to Plutarch, in Athens in 594 B.C. the income disparity between rich and poor was so great that social stability began to be threatened. The poor, weighed down with debt and taxes, began to talk openly of revolt and violence. Corrupt courts and oligarchs used every ruse of legal legerdemain and statutory slight-of-hand to keep them down, and to prevent meaningful social reforms from being implemented. By good fortune, a rich businessman named Solon was elected to the archonship of Athens. He was the Franklin D. Roosevelt of his time: although of aristocratic lineage, he recognized that violence and chaos would engulf the state if the abuses of the rich were not checked.

Solon gave debt relief by devaluing the currency, abolishing debtors' prison, and reforming the loan system. He reformed the income tax structure by making the rich pay at a rate twelve times that of the poor, made the courts more fair and open, and provided that the sons of men who had died in Athenian wars would be educated at government expense. Although the rich wanted his head, and screamed bloody murder at Solon's confiscatory policies, he held firm. It is generally conceded today that his reforms averted social violence in Athens. He was the type of man who only comes along once in a century.

The ancient Roman Republic took a different course, and the result was two generations of violence and civil war. Although the Romans have never been equaled in the art of government, they failed in the task of reforming their republic to meet the challenge of economic expansion. In Rome, the expansion of the republic's power around the Mediterranean brought fantastic riches and influence to the ruling classes. Italy's great landed estates—the latifundia—had generated a class of super-rich oligarchs that owned the Senate and treated it as their private playground. The concentration of wealth, and the misery of the lower classes, grew unchecked year by year, until finally a brave tribune named Tiberius Gracchus determined to confront to oligarchs and save the republic from revolution.

Tiberius submitted legislation that would have capped land ownership to 333 acres per person; he proposed to reform the corrupt courts; and like Solon he would have provided debt relief in the form of debt cancellation or modification.

Tiberius Gracchus appeals for reforms before the Roman Senate

The Senate refused. Tiberius appealed directly to the people in a series of masterful speeches, but the rich incited violence against him, and he was killed in a riot while campaigning for reelection in 133 B.C. His brother Caius tried to continue his legacy, but he too was thwarted by the Senate, and died by his own hand in 121 B.C. In the wake of his death, thousands of Roman supporters of the Gracchus brothers were slain by Senatorial proscription. The Roman Republic was engulfed in a generation of civil violence, with competing strongmen—Catiline, Marius, and finally Julius Caesar—vying for control of the reins of power. In the end, the republic as a viable institution was destroyed, and in its place was an absolute monarchy as the only alternative.

One of the themes of economic history is the alternating concentration and dispersion of wealth in a society. As time progresses, inequalities among men multiply; the wealthy sectors of society aggregate more and more wealth in their hands. This upward concentration of money brings with it a resistance to reform, an unresponsive political system, and a rigged judiciary and legislature. Eventually, this concentrated wealth is redistributed downwards, either by peaceful means (as in America in the 1930s and the 1960s), or by violent means, as in France in 1789, in Germany during the Reformation (when German princes confiscated Church holdings), or in Russia after 1917. The warning is clear.

The martyred Gracchus brothers, Tiberius and Caius

In contemporary America, fabulous wealth has been concentrated in the hands of a few. The public has waited for meaningful reforms to take place from Congress on a number of social issues (health care, defense spending, infrastructure improvement, education, etc.), yet nothing meaningful has happened. Congress is now the plaything of the rich and powerful, a tool of venal special interest groups. The chief executive has been reduced to being a mouthpiece of the moneyed sectors, whose job is only to read platitudes and inanities from the teleprompter.

The student of history watches all this from the sidelines, with a mixture of frustration, apprehension, and fear. People cannot be marginalized, ignored, and kept down forever. Permanent gridlock is not a condition that can exist indefinitely. Unless major changes are made, democracy may become a relic of America’s past, to be replaced by social unrest, violence, or demagogic strongmen promising reform. The outcome is still in doubt.

Is Civilization Worth Saving?

March 25, 2014 | by inhumanist | Link | Original Link

ROK seems to have been established on the feeling that men are returning to their rightful places in the world. I want to evaluate that title. Many people associate kings with the great civilizations of history. Is this association necessary? Is civilization too often assumed good without a closer look? Civilization is also associated with busy-body bureaucrats, military conscription, unjust institutions, and collectivist tyranny. Is civilization worth saving?

What Is Civilization Good For?

I like to define the good of civilization this way: when father and I go off the ranch to work for a day or two, we expect to return to the women and children taking care of the ranch. We expect most everything to be the same as when we left it. We expect our trip to be profitable. We expect the fruits of our labor to be useful toward our clan and enjoyable for our people. This is civilization to me.

If we returned to our home and it was a smoking ruin, and our clan's little dead bodies were littered about the ranch, we would not consider this civilization. We would consider this the opposite of civilization.

Extending this concept, when we promise our property or labors in fealty to the strong men who would lend us protection and patronage, we expect the faithful protection they've offered in exchange. We expect to be considered a "good guy" when the agents of the Protectorate inspect our activities, and we expect the Protector to be somehow accessible should we request his appeal.

Lastly, when we feel like most of the people around us are generally trustworthy, sharing a common value system which is taught to them by default from birth, we consider this civilization.

When Civilization ATTACKS!

Our current civilization of dehumanization and a reign of managers has led to problems in society. I believe the epitome of this tendency is the Civil Rights Movement. The words “civil rights” so perfectly embodies the evolution from natural rights to the managerial, nanny state tyranny we see today. Civil rights are wholly derived from civilization deciding that it has become more powerful than whatever arrangement it was the civilization was initially found upon. In the West, our civilizations were founded upon Rome, Greece, Christendom, the Renaissance, the Reformation, the Enlightenment, and free markets. This foundation, absent a monarch, is known as classical liberalism.

After the Enlightenment we eventually entered the modern period. The modern period is governed by the managerial mentality: everything in life has a neat little solution that an engineer will be along shortly to remedy. Conservatives in America are actually better described as classical liberals. The real right-wing Conservatives I know are monarchists still pissed off about the French and American Revolutions. Modern liberals came to be called “liberals” through evolution of their original label “social liberal.” This evolution is noticed in the opening chapters of The Road to Serfdom by F.A. Hayek, written in the 1940’s.

Whereas Natural Law was founded upon universal philosophical arguments going all the way back to Aristotle, modern Civil Rights are founded on nothing more than naked utilitarianism asserted by the civil government. What is naked utilitarianism? The economic engineers—the planners—evaluate a problem in society and design a technocratic solution to our problem. There are seldom actual mathematical models calculating "utils" provided to procure the greatest good for the greatest number of people—utilitarians and their voters often just go with their emotional urges to devise and sell the social engineering plans to the masses.

An important step they miss is the definition of "problem." A utilitarian cannot use utilitarianism to define problems or their scope. The utilitarian is stuck with naked assertions and uninformed assumptions about how things ought to be run in this world, often blowing problems way out of proportion and prescribing overbearing solutions that just cause even more problems. It never strikes them that racism and sexism should be solved by personal moral enlightenment. That's too slow for progress, and nobody gets a cushy government job in that scheme, so they just bring out the ban hammer and smash away at whatever they perceive as "racism."

Are you offended that I question civil rights? Ask yourself this: when does the Civil Rights Movement end? When does affirmative action end? When does disparate impact end? When does feminism and political correctness end? Not even the best civil rights advocates can describe such a condition. Not even the utopian dreamers can conceive of their utopia. They are perpetually aggrieved. There will never come a day when some future Nancy Pelosi marches out onto the Floor, throws up her hands, and says "Well, we're all equal now. Good job, everyone!"

Who Is The Sovereign?

As with all political questions, we always end back up to who is sovereign in this world? Some would say it is the head of State. Some would say it is the scientist. Some would say it is the father. Some would say it is We The People. Feminists want women to be sovereign. Religions establish the Gods or Fates as sovereign. Post modernists ironically muse that there is no sovereignty at all.

ROK seems to fall into the camp that, at least, men are sovereign and need to return to their places. This is a good start, because men are definitely very high within the Great Chain of Being. However, with sovereignty come some ugly realities. Male sovereignty means male responsibility. Yikes! The manosphere is full of men who have no interest in civilization, society, or The Great Chain of Being. And I don't really blame them. Studying the great Philosopher Kings of our past also reveals that even the great sovereigns themselves can often feel lost in this world of vanity and the chasing after winds; his is a hard-fought order which will probably come to ruin when the next man takes the crown; his is a house full of crap he's collected which he can't take into the next life anyways.

Literacy and Laziness

One thing I didn't mention that is good about civilization is literacy. If it weren't for civilization, I would not be able to sit here and cite Aristotle and Natural Law in a discussion freely read by people all over the world right now. If not for our Western civilization, I would probably right now be writing yet another poem about how great Muhammed is. However, I have to admit that so-called art in my modern and post-modern civilization is far worse than reading through the hadith or Leviticus. Leviticus may put me to sleep, but at least it doesn't make me want to murderously scratch my eyes out, like modern art or womyn's studies does. Our civilization is marred by obesity, drug addiction, and hubris. So is civilization worth saving? Should we fear its demise? Whom shall I fear?

4 Things I Learned From Copyediting My First Book

March 25, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Among those of us who look to the internet as sources of side income, copyediting and copywriting are looked upon as solid but unsexy methods of making a bit of coin. There are several threads on the RVF that paint it as an ideal job for reading and writing enthusiasts. On the surface, it provides a location-independent source of income where a man can set his own hours and choose his clientele. I recently copyedited a manosphere book for a fairly well-known author, and like any other first venture I learned a few non-intuitive truths that added to my understanding of the profession.

1. You Can’t Put Lipstick On A Pig

Though the book was from an author I respect, in any editing job there’s always an initial fear that the writing will be beyond repair. Luckily, the author had a clear and consistent plan and executed it well. My changes helped the work to sound more professional and expand on some of the important points, but had the writer not possessed the requisite strength of content from the beginning I doubt anyone’s editorial review could have saved it. When I made side money in college editing essays, the pieces I felt the worst about sending back to the authors were the ones I had improved significantly, but still sucked anyway because of the bad starting point. If the ideas are good, the quality will show through. If the ideas are bad, the best copyediting in the world will not produce a winner.

2. You’re Not Living The Tim Ferriss Dream Life

Looking to sip margaritas while watching your bankroll explode? This isn’t the line of work for you. Reading words on a page sounds easy, but it’s incredibly exhausting work. You’re grinding with maximum attention on the copy at all times. It's possible to improve your speed (and therefore earning potential) up to a certain point, but you never reach the "set it and forget it" point that many location-independent business models strive for. Whether you're improving the writing with suggestions about ideas or simply fixing typos, every time you fail to fix an error it's a black mark against your brand. It's stressful, hands-on, reputation-driven work that isn't for everyone.

3. Customers Will Pay Well For Quality Work

Though some of my favorite blogs feature content about starting writing or editing businesses on oDesk, Elance, Fiverr, or other websites, they are quick to point out that at the outset you are competing against other people who will "work" for bottom dollar. Since I already have a job to pay the bills and my free time is valuable, it is more important to me that I make decent money on the occasional jobs I do. Because of my reputation writing at ROK and other ventures, and the fact that I was willing to prove myself by editing a small portion of the book before the author committed to paying me, I was able to command significantly more than I would have made on services where the writer is going in blind.

4. Emphasize Customer Quality Over Quantity

I don't need this side hustle to pay the rent. Thus, I don't have to take on customers who impose unreasonable deadlines, are inflexible with their requests, or want to low-ball me. In any business there's an inflection point where taking on new clients just for the sake of having work provides headaches larger than the amount of money you're earning, and "firing" your worst clients is a proven business strategy. Luckily I am still far away from that point. Being able to serve customers I like and respect while editing work on subject matter that interests me (manosphere topics) provides work that I actually look forward to, which might not be true if I cast a wider net to make a few extra bucks.

For the reasons mentioned above, copyediting is a solid way to make extra money that aligns with activities I enjoy and am good at. Like any other side hustle, however, there's a startup cost to building your reputation, finding customers, and getting into the groove of each new job, as well as many lessons to learn along the way. But it's not bad work if you can get it.

5 Signs You're Not The Only One She's Sleeping With

March 26, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

As I discussed last week, Tinder has been an incredible enabling agent in women's slutification. Every day that goes by the women of the West become more and more like men. Quicker to have sex, more likely to have multiple partners, and recently—more likely to have multiple partners at the same time. Over the past few years I have noticed a few "tells" girls inadvertently provide which usually mean that you're not the only one she's fucking.

Preface

A few things to keep in mind:

- This is not a guide for a first date—you should assume every girl is fucking another guy, especially if you are not already providing her with her penis craving.
- Similarly, these signs are based on behavior once a girl is comfortable enough with you and not just based on a few dates.
- You also must not be the jealous type. If she feels she has to hide things from you, then her actions could stem from your behavior and not her own actions.
- Do you even care? I used to but not anymore. I'm not currently looking for an LTR and I know I sound like a broken record but the reality is that this is the way things are today. An overabundance of options couple with the societal acceptance of female promiscuity means more likely than not she's riding the concurrent penis pogo.

Finally, realize that women are both incredible liars and manipulators, and sometimes oblivious to everything. So while these may serve as a tell, you can never be certain as they may be intentionally throwing you off or just too caught up in their own worlds to realize they are presenting something as a tell when it really is not.

1. The Phone Is Face Down

> If the girl you're dating rests her phone face down guess what…you're not the only one she's fucking
> — Law Dogger (@LawDogger) March 22, 2014

I've dated some girls casually that whenever the girl has her phone out and she leaves it on the table, the counter, the couch, wherever it may be, it is always face down. Why is she doing this? To hide something. And what would she want to hide from a guy she's regularly seeing? Probably the screen of her phone showing a text notification from some other guy. The last thing she wants you to see is "Mike Irish Pub" or "Joe Tinder" popping up as a text notification.

2. She Checks, But Does Not Respond To Certain Texts

99% of all girls engage in mindless banter with their other girlfriends via text. They love to text back and forth and if you've ever laid in bed next to a girl when she gets a text from one of her girlfriends, they will always respond and quickly, even if it requires no response.

So if she doesn't respond right away? It's a guy. This one is a bit trickier as girls usually have many many orbiters and other guys that will incessantly text them even months after one failed date. So take this one with a grain of salt. But as a generality if she continuously gets texts that she checks but does not respond to in front of you, chances are she doesn't want to respond for a specific reason.

3. Downtown Denial

Now I'm not suggesting that you are, or should, go down on a girl every time you have sex… not my style, care or concern. But if she doesn't let you eat her out and she usually does, it's because there was a dick in there less than 12 hours ago. Yes sometimes they can just not be in the mood for it, maybe she hasn't showered or thinks her period is coming. But as conniving as a girl can be, a part of her does stop them from letting their regular guy put his mouth where another man's dick has just been.

To a lesser extent it can be applied to blowjobs and sex. If she suddenly starts giving you blowjobs when she didn't before, it may be because she feels guilty about sucking another guy's dick. No sex may be because she just had sex the same day. But to be frank once you start getting girls to open up to you, as I am starting to be better at doing, you will be shocked. Most have no problem fucking two guys on the same day, making out with a guy after blowing another guy hours before, and so on.

4. Her "Friend" Is Always Without A Gender Specification

This one is self-explanatory. If she’s referring to past or future plans with a “friend” and does not say girlfriend or use “she” then it’s a dude. Craftier girls will just say she even if it is a guy but some girls like to hamster themselves by just withholding details as opposed to outright lying.

5. The Surprise Cooch Shave

Assuming she does not already keep her vagina shaven and you’ve had sex with her more than once (as the first time maybe she wasn’t expecting sex and wasn’t ready), if she randomly shaves it’s because she is expecting sex with someone else. This is accentuated if the shave occurs on a day she didn’t see you, e.g. she shaved it on Saturday and you are seeing her on Sunday.

Take Away

Again these are not definitive signs but something you should keep an eye out for. These days you should just assume she is sleeping with others until proven otherwise, which unfortunately is an exercise in futility in itself.

Women Do Not Understand Themselves

For us men, it is important to understand that women are by nature so irrational and emotional, so capricious, fickle, and flaky, that often what we perceive to be games is for them simply ordinary behavior. We are vexed because they appear needlessly evasive or unreliable. Actually, they are just being women—that is to say, quite different from us, much less logical, constant and straightforward; and if we want to succeed with them, we need to try to understand them as they are and adjust our expectations accordingly.

Of course, this is not easy to do. Few women in the Anglo world today have much to offer besides that delightful hole between their legs, so if it weren't for the fact that we need sex, men would certainly prefer the company of their fellow men, shunning women as second-class citizens—which, after all, has been the rightful practice in most of the world throughout most of history, and among the wise ancients in particular.

The two genders are so different that they naturally spend much of life misunderstanding one another, though they don't even know this, unable to ever escape their own particular point of view. Men interpret women through a male point of view. Women interpret men through a female point of view. And the result is a kind of general incoherence. No wonder it often happens that as they end a relationship, men and women see only what the other person did wrong: again, being unable to see how their actions are perceived by the other. This reveals a significant limitation with respect to whether people are really "together" in a relationship, and like many other difficult things in life, it shows how ultimately alone each person is, a reality that is both humorous and sad.

Take for example the well-known female shit tests

We men know that women subject us to them in order to see how we will respond. What can they get away with? Are we strong enough to check them (that is, not too nice), or do they need to find an alpha (if for nothing else, to fuck on the side)? I used to think women were always aware of what they were doing. I assumed their motives were clear to them but opaque to us, concealed as we might expect from those uncannily subtle and sneaky creatures. But age and reflection have shown me that the matter is more complicated.

No doubt women generally do know what they are doing in creating shit tests, but with women as with men, motives are often unconscious. And in the case of some shit tests, it seems women are actually just being moody, bitchy, capricious, or irrational—in short, being women, rightly called the Second Sex (denoting inferiority) until that term became unacceptable in the modern world. And though to a man's rational analysis this behavior may seem to be a game, or a test, or whatever, there are times when it is not intended to be that—when women are merely living their usual lives of folly, caprice and confusion: so child-like, variable and illogical that analytical thought does not suffice to make sense of them.

Women do not make sense

If they are more "emotionally intelligent" than men, it is not because of superior reasoning abilities, but rather because they are so other-oriented: in the first place, as mothers and nurturers; and in the second, as beings who spend all life under the overwhelming gaze of men—so that they must develop keen powers of observation and intuition. But for all that, women do not understand themselves. The works of Montaigne, of Dostoevsky, of Nietzsche—these and other testaments to deep self-knowledge are products of the male mind, with its steady rational character.

And so, since women are endlessly confused—utterly clueless as to their real needs and motives—we find that once we give them what they want, they don't really want it. Thus the nice guy soon becomes boring (or indeed, clingy or needy), as the cocky guy soon tags Miss Independent. "Why won't he call me," wonders the sad woman, and yet when men do call (or text) often or regularly, she usually becomes flaky. Women are deeply changeable and unreliable, and the only reason that they still want a strong man is that without one their lives are so lacking in direction and decisiveness that it's a wonder they ever know whether they are coming or going. (Note: watch women closely—the more attractive the better: their very body language will frequently reveal just how half-conscious they are. I find this to be especially evident when I'm out running night game.)

What, then, should we men do here? My answers will be well-known to many red pill men and students of the manosphere. We simply cannot allow ourselves to care much about women. This is a grim reality since, after all, there are times in every straight man's life when he needs some emotional intimacy with a woman. Still, unless you maintain a certain level of emotional unavailability, you will necessarily make yourself prey to the most unreliable thing in life: the heart of woman, particularly dangerous in our selfish and narcissistic era.

You must also be very patient. Don't let much of women's nonsense bother you—after all, there is no end to it! And most of the time, if you just play it cool and wait it out—as if you don’t really care about them, and if possible, doing this with wit and charm—you will likely get what you want—which is sex, of course. For precisely how to call women out, see my post “Women Have No Sense of Justice.”

Here sports furnishes a useful analogy. John Stockton—one of the greatest point guards in NBA history—was only 6’1 and 175 lbs. Yet he was known for being tough, fearless, and dirty, all while showing virtually no emotion, though quite a lot of unwavering poise. That is how men must be with women. And, deep down, they want that, though it is important here not to believe them when they say they want a “nice guy.” In truth, women themselves are vampires for the most part. But as the weaker sex—both intellectually and physically—they simply must conceal their real nature since otherwise they’d be exceedingly vulnerable.

Women are prone to misunderstanding men

I said at the beginning of this post that women often misunderstand men. Here is a common and representative example. Because we are naturally more logical and assertive than they are, it often happens that when a man is simply making a point in a direct way, a woman will take it personally. He is “attacking her,” it will be thought, or “creating a hostile work environment,” as feminists so frequently phrase it. “Why are you so mean?” she will ask. For women are extremely sensitive to tone and to the seeming emotional character of contexts and situations. Hence, where a man thinks he is simply stating his considered views on something—doing so without any kind of unmanly sugarcoating—a woman will think the matter is about her personally, even though he is only being objective, impersonal, disinterested, etc., etc. Or again, just because a point is unpleasant, she will be quick to think it is “wrong” for that reason (often in some kind of vague moral sense), thereby showing how little regard she has for truth in itself.

There’s no simple solution to this problem. I, for one, will not emasculate myself—will not be some spineless sugarcoater—so that women won’t be “offended.” Fuck the HR department. My view is, explain to women that they are wrong to be upset—the issue isn’t personal. If that doesn’t work, oh well. We live in a very touchy time, and so few people among us are even worthy of respect that a man who goes out of his way not to offend them hardly deserves to be called a man. Before you know it, we will all be dead and most of us forgotten anyway. That “hostile work environment” really doesn’t matter much in the end. You can get your living another way, and in a manly one as well.

Notwithstanding many pernicious liberal illusions, it is a terrible mistake to believe men and women are meant to live in harmony, that they are to smoothly complement one another, and that they are equal. Just as with families and good friends, a certain measure of discord is unavoidable between us. In fact, a lot is. The sex drive is so relentless, with the survival of the species itself at stake, and human beings by nature so self-interested, that not peace but war is the natural and inevitable state of affairs between the sexes. No wonder that as we age and learn better, lasting love and fulfillment come to seem like so many phantoms. The fact that the psychological relations between men and women amount more or less to warfare corresponds to the nature of the sex act itself, which, after all, is fairly violent, with the man being assertive as the woman is passive. But of course, a man who would understand such dark truths as these must first see past the liberal illusions concerning equality and fairness that obscure them.

The Price I Paid for Helping a Single Mom's Child

March 26, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

I was stupid. I admit it. But let my foolishness and naivety serve as an example the rest of us can learn from.

We all know you do not help out single moms (well…more so than you're already forced to through taxation), but you never ever help out their kids. Allow me to explain.

I was brought up poor. I didn't have much in the way of toys growing up, and the biggest let down to me as a child, perhaps even to this day, was waiting Christmas after Christmas for just ONE toy I desperately wanted, only to rip open my "gifts" and see that my parents had used Christmas as another excuse to buy me the staples in life they were obligated to.

Clothes. Socks.
School supplies.
Etc.

So I meet a "fan" over teh interwebz who is a single mother. I'm not bigotted, just firm with single moms, and so I accept her friend request and we develop a friendly online relationship. Over the months, however, I find out that her child doesn't have much in the way of toys. The father is not around and the mother is tight on money. And so I harken back to those cold wintery days in the early 80's where I desperately wanted a REAL toy, only to have my months' worth of hope crushed. Not wanting the kid to experience the same, I idiotically let my emotions get in the way of my brains and asked the single mom what the kid wanted for Christmas.

The kid wanted some kind of Barbie doll set. Figuring this would make the young girl happy (and more than happy to oblige reinforcing beauty, femininity, and other female standards on a young girl) I said, “Give me your mailing address.”

Went to the Amazon, purchase said Barbie doll set, and mailed it to the young girl. Thanks ensued, smiles were had, and dare I admit I almost felt like I did something selfless and Christmasy. The kid got her gift and her Christmas would go down as a pleasant and memorable one.

Fastforward 2 months.

I’m on the facebook and I see this same single mom, desperate for money, woefully outgunned by the events that transpired before her, whose child was no more than a stranger’s purchase away from an unsatisfying Christmas, celebrate the purchase of a… (are you ready for it?)

60 inch screen TV.

Pictures and everything included, there it was, a 60 inch TV this presumably cash-strapped single mom had just bought.

Somewhat perturbed, I inquired, “Dude, what’s with the 60 inch screen TV purchase? I thought you couldn’t even afford your child gifts for Christmas.”

And in true financially and mathematically ignorant American single mom form she said, “I’m purchasing it on a five year plan. You gotta live life!”

Indeed.

The lesson from my stupidity is not one of not helping out children. Nor is it that we shouldn’t feel some pity or sadness for the child-victims of single parent households. But rather to realize those children are beyond our help because any form of assistance, aid, or charity must first go through the single parent. In other words you can’t just go up to some kind on the street and give them money no matter how genuine and altruistic your intentions, as it would be pushing pedophilia. Ergo, since the single parent (99.96% the times the mom) is the head of the household, any help intended towards the kid must first go through her. And since by default and definition single parents have bad judgement, you can expect whatever charity you intend towards a child to be wasted or squandered at least partially.

The core of the issue is that the biggest problem children of single parent households face isn’t one of poverty or lack of toys. It’s the fact they have the inferior parents they do. And since it isn’t the kid that needs fixing, but rather the parents, there’s not much your altruism and charity can do to help out those kids no matter how much you pity them.

All Men Should Own A Gun

At the end of the day if you're not prepared to kill someone and you don't have at least some basic skills in using firearms, there may come a time when someone might kill you or someone you care for. Owning a gun and being able to use one ought to be like owning a car.

The failure of gun control is laughably highlighted in both the UK and Australia. In the UK all handguns are illegal with hefty mandatory sentences, so now most criminals are not only armed, seeking the strategic advantage of weapons everyone else are forbidden to own, but are also happy to use their guns, when the sentences for killing are not much worse than the sentences for just having a gun. If I am about to get caught but I can kill you and get away with it, I might as well.

My choice of handgun is a Glock 34 – 9mm. Its long barrel gives it a bit more accuracy than the standard Glock 17 or the shorter Glock 19, making it fun for target and sport shooting. It's a little larger to carry, but not much bigger than a .45. semi auto and since I'm not planning on carrying it under my jacket for drug deals in the hood, it's fine with me. Some people prefer revolvers, as they are simpler and don't tend to jam, but a semi-auto 9mm gives you 17 rounds in the clip. Even for target shooting that makes it more interesting.

Glocks are ugly and look like the choice of gun for a policeman to me, but they can be customized:

The parts on most glocks are interchangeable and one of the things I like best about these guns is the extended 33 round mag and the fact the manufacturer designed them to be automatic, as showcased in the movie Mr. and Mrs. Smith during the Home and Garden shoot out. It makes movies much more fun when you begin to spot the different models and brands. With a small aftermarket machine part on the end of the slider you can convert any glock into a fully automatic uzi type weapon. There are also many sights, shoulder rests and other customizations on the market.

Amazing what you can do with a handgun, by adding some accessories, although for the cost of all this lot, you might as well buy an assault rifle.

Whilst owning an automatic weapon might seem like a crazy and potentially illegal idea (the parts are legal, installing them is not), you simply have to take a few red pills and think about the situations where you might need it. I've had friends who were stuck in hurricane zones where lawlessness was the order of the day. Their stories don't play well. Within a few days people were ready to kill just for clean water.

Laying down some automatic warning shots is going to be more than enough to show any hoodlums you're serious and is more intimidating than a regular 9mm semi-auto. Whats more if you are not a trained professional with hours of practice under his belt, having 33 in the clip and the ability to spray, is probably going to work far better in a crisis situation.

For more tactical (and fun) purposes I have a Mossberg 590, which is the choice of Navy Seals. This shotgun is more easily reloaded than the popular Remington 870 used by many law enforcement departments—the feeder stays up and out of the way as you feed the cartridges in, whereas the Remington is prone to 'bite' your finger and catch. If you are on a budget the Mossberg Maverick is a tuned down version that goes for a couple of hundred bucks. Something I learned lately is you can buy a single shot one ounce shell for a shotgun, instead of all the small spray – now that's gotta hurt.

I haven't bought a hunting rifle yet, but I am thinking of the Remington 700 SPS AAC with Muzle Brake and Suppressors. For accuracy and price it seems highly rated. Although it's the civilian model, the base of the Remington 700 forms snipers rifles used by the US military.

Budget allowing, I might look for an assault rifle for a bit of fun in the future. The AR-15 or AK-47 is a good choice because they can easily be modified back to automatic setups with a few cheap aftermarket parts that are not illegal to own. Ohhh, how dangerous, I hope I don't lose my mind and take a trip to the local shopping mall, but frankly I could probably do a fair amount of damage with a knife, a car, or even some basic household ingredients you can make a bomb with.

Of course shopping mall shootings catch the media's attention and cause much outrage and government warblings, but just like "money is the root of all evil" being false, it's people that kill people not guns. Whilst it may seem unnecessary to own all this hardware, and while there are probably more fun things I could spend money on like computer equipment, professional music gear, or extras for my car, I think having a few weapons around is an interesting and useful diversion and if any shit does ever go down, they'll be worth their weight in gold (if not more).

I'm no kind of survivalist or doomsday freak, but stories I've heard first hand of natural disasters, kidnappings and general government failures make me think seriously about being able to take care of myself if needed. I know I can shoot or even kill someone without a second thought if the situation presents itself. That doesn't make me a psycho it simply makes me ready.

Guns can also be fun and valuable. Some of the old 1800s Winchesters and Colts are collectors pieces worth tens of thousands. The Winchester rifle below from 1871 is going for $57,000

A .45 semi auto would make a nice addition to any collection with the Swiss made Sig Sauer being the choice of Navy Seals.

The old Remington 1911 would be fun to own, widely used in WW2 and Vietnam, but they are largely superseded these days.

Aside from that, perhaps I'll add an old Thomson Sub Machine gun and a Barrett to my bucket list. Some guys like motorbikes and cars but you have to sit in traffic with everyone else. Boats and planes are great if you have the budget, but for the time being a few firearms are cheap, fun and will keep you safe if needed.

And since we love red pill so much, Agent Smith can be seen using the Desert Eagle which also comes in a .50 caliber version. That packs some serious punch, although good luck hitting the target, the thing must kick like a mule.

Whatever your momma told you about guns—forget it—firearms are fun, relatively cheap and cool to own. Don't believe propaganda about gun accidents in the home. Something like 75% of home intrusions, where the gun owner chases the criminal off, are never reported to the police. I mean really, are you going to sit up for half an hour waiting for the cops to come and do paper work, or go back to bed and pound your girl, whose wet from all the excitement?

8 Reasons To Date A Former Fat Girl

March 27, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Return of Kings stance on fat girls is clear. Fat women are an unattractive social drain unworthy of male attention. But what about girls who lose weight and become fit attractive women?

Unfortunately, we live in a culture where obesity is the norm. Many women grow up with unhealthy eating habits promoted by fast food culture, powerful lobbies, and the USDA food pyramid. Unhealthy body types are validated by fat acceptance, and millions of dollars of advertising by companies like Dove. The small minority of women who manage to break away from social conditioning and achieve the healthy bodies they actually want are vilified and attacked by those who don't have the discipline to do the same.

Women who used to be fat, and now have toned, fit, healthy bodies are often better partners than women who have always had the same body-type. Here’s why:

1. They Have Less Ego

Former fat girls understand that men’s attention is a reward they have to earn by developing their feminine beauty. Women who’ve always been thin feel entitled to male attention, because they’ve always had it. Since they’ve never had to work for men’s validation, they don’t value it, and treat others with a princess mentality.

Women who’ve lost weight are willing to put in hours at the gym to make themselves worthy of male attention. They’re humble, hardworking, and don’t consider going the extra mile to please their partners beneath them. Because they had to work for what they have, they value it more.

The difference between women who just won the genetic lottery and women had to work for their body is like the difference between trust fund brats and entrepreneurs who built their business from nothing. They might have the same net worth in the sexual market, but their character is strikingly different.

2. They Love Male Attention

Fat girls typically lose weight in order to get male attention. They know that men value physical beauty, and rather than shame men's sexual preferences, they honor those preferences by making themselves more attractive.

If you compliment a former fat girl on her looks, she'll light up and thank you, rather than rolling her eyes or writing you off as a needy man. Women who've lost weight see male sexual attention as a sign that their hard work loosing weight and improving their looks is paying off.

3. They've Developed Their Sexual Skills

Whereas hot girls can lie in the starfish position when in bed with a man, less attractive women have to develop compensatory sexual skills to keep men around (that's code for great blowjobs.) Since men aren't getting off on their bodies, less attractive women can only please the men they want by being absolute freaks in bed.

When women lose weight, they don't forget the sexual skills they developed when they were less attractive. A former fat girl will still have the mindset of a woman who has to work extremely hard to please men in bed years after she's lost weight. Most of the time when I've had a woman offer anal on the first date, or grin when I suggest bringing my camera into the bedroom, I usually find out later that she only recently developed the thin feminine form that initially attracted me.

The one sexual experience women who've lost weight aren't usually open to is threesomes, because they feel threatened by more attractive women. If you let the girl know sharing you with another woman won't jeopardize her relationship to you – or instill sufficient dread such that she feels she has to have a threesome to please you – most women who used to be overweight can become open to a threesome.

4. They Have A Higher Sex Drive

Obesity is correlated with lower sex drive. Not only do overweight people have less physical energy to exert themselves in bed, but they probably aren't getting the nutrients necessary to properly balance their hormones. A woman who switches from eating Oreos and carmel lattes to green vegetables and grassfed beef is going to experience a surge in her sex drive comparable to a fourteen year-old boy going through puberty.

When I lost weight myself, not only did I feel happier, and have more energy, but my hormones balanced, and testosterone increased. I felt like a horny teenager again, and was practically drooling on every woman I met. Women who lose weight experience similar changes, and will want more sex than they've ever wanted before in their life.

5. They Are Easy To Approach

Because former fat girls still see themselves as a six or lower, they judge your relative value as higher even when they have the body of a nine or ten. If the woman you're talking to only recently became a nine, you might find it's as easy to talk to her as it would be to talk to a six. This is another reason not to be intimidated by more attractive women.

Add to that the fact that former fat girls want it so badly they spent hours in the gym or months on a disciplined diet just to get men to hit on them and are now experiencing a surge of sex hormones, and you've got a woman who wants to be approached and taken by a man. These are the kind of women who will thank you after you have sex with them.

Plus, women who've lost weight hang out in places you already go if you're a healthy man. Gyms, crossfit classes, health food stores, farmer's markets, and any activity dedicated to healthy living will probably have a few women for whom developing their bodies and living healthy is a new interest.

6. They Have Healthy Habits

While women you pull from clubs and bars will want to go out for beer, pizza, and cigarettes afterward, women who've lost weight will want to maintain their figure by eating healthy food. These women often know how to cook for themselves and enjoy sharing what they make.

If you've got an interest in health as well, you can easily invite these woman over to cook dinner with you, teach her a healthy recipe, or introduce her to juicing. Rather then getting to know her in noisy bars or franchise coffee shops, you can spend the afternoon outside on a hiking trail, and then tear each others clothes off on the kitchen floor after making kale shakes.

Most women hit a wall in their late twenties, when a years of heavy drinking, partying, and unhealthy choices catch up to them. Women who don't take their looks for granted practice healthy habits that maintain their beauty, making them better candidates for long-term relationships.

7. They Have Greater Self-Discipline

Losing weight requires self-discipline. It requires a daily commitment to stick to whatever diet or exercise program you've chosen, even when well-meaning friends or the culture around you repeatedly offers you unhealthy choices. Women who've lost weight have to develop a higher degree of self-discipline than the average American woman, commit to something they value, and stick with it even when challenges arise.

The attitudes developed in physical fitness have direct applications to other aspects of life. A woman who is willing to question what her culture tells her about food and her body, is also willing to question what her culture tells her about men and relationships. She is more likely to be an independent thinker, and have stronger character.

8. You Can't Tell She Wasn't Always Fit

After hundreds of squats and months of eating slow-carb, even the most chunky women can develop a toned athletic figure. Most of the women I've dated who used to be overweight told me so only after I began talking about my own health practices. I would never have guessed had I not seen the shocking before photos of their transformations. Men don't care what a woman used to look like, only what she looks like when she's with him.

While it can be amusing to mock fat girls, I respect anyone – male or female – who transforms their body for the better. Women who get in shape show character traits that are healthy and desirable. And of course, having a smoking hot body doesn't hurt either.

Has Female Attention Whoring Finally Reached Its Peak?

March 28, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, I have an exciting announcement. It is entirely possible that shallow, shameful attention whoring by females in American society has reached its peak capacity. Truthfully, I don't know how it could get much worse than this.

The All Girls Vegas Trip

Yes, there are "girls nights out", and plenty of groups of female friends take trips to Vegas and plenty of other places together, but this is taking it to a whole new level of attention whoring. From the FAQ page on the website, you can see what these "All Girl Vegas Trips" are all about.

> (A) It's quite simple! The Clubs, hotels and pool parties we work with want to have good looking girls at their events and their is a WOW effect when 50 girls walk into a casino or nightclub as a group. All of our trips are paid for by Las Vegas Hotels and Management groups. The expense for this current trip including transportation, accommodations, selected meals, VIP bottle service, and drinks is being paid for by Tao Management group.

I'm sure there is a WOW effect. It wow'd me. But not for the intended purposes, but because this is the perfect example of everything that is wrong in society. Why does this business model work? Well, because when guys see fifty girls in line they think,

"Hey, this will be the one place that isn't a sausage fest, let's go!"

Next, they proceed to drop $75 to get in the club. Note that this doesn't include any drinks, this just gives them privilege to buy drinks. Next, they buy three drinks at $15 a pop, which puts their total for the night up to $120. On top of that, that's probably a low estimate of a drink tab for a high-end Vegas club. That's double what the girls paid for the entire trip and accommodations. With a few hundred chumps in the room, it's only a matter of time before the clubs have broke even on their initial "girl" investment and are raking in the dough.

> (A) The requirements for our trips are simple.
> ➢ Girls must be of 21 years of age or older.
> ➢ Girls agree to follow the exact itinerary of attending the nightclubs and pool parties, including transportation to and from each location and arrive as a group at all venues.
> ➢ Once accepted Girls are required to pay a non-refundable $60 fee to hold your spot on the trip.
> ➢ Girls understand that if at any point they will-fully divert from the itinerary, they are no longer considered part of the group and/or trip. They will be responsible for their own accommodations for the remainder of the trip. This includes their access to venues, clubs, meals and transportation back to San Diego.
> ➢ Girls agree to attend each scheduled event with a positive attitude, take photos as a group.
> ➢ Girls agree to sign an insurance liability release waiver/form from SFiNX Productions & TAO Management Group pertaining to the duration of the trip.
> ➢ Girls agree to sign a 'No Drugs' policy agreement to protect SFiNX Productions & TAO Management Group.
> ➢ Each Girl must agree to work with their SFiNX chaperone to help organize and > coordinate their group of friends throughout the duration of the trip.

> (Q) What is covered as part of the "all-inclusive" trip?
> (A) The following items are included complimentary as part of this trip
> - Roundtrip bus transportation to/from San Diego/Las Vegas
> - Hotel Accommodation for 2 nights (excluding room service, incidentals & other miscellaneous charges or expenses)
> - Snacks & drinks on the bus ride to Las Vegas
> - Giveaways from sponsors including watches & shirts among other things
> - Appetizers & Drinks at LAVO Lounge
> - VIP Access & Bottle service at LAVO Night club
> - VIP Access & Bottle service at Marquee Nightclub
> - VIP Access & Bottle service at Marquee Dayclub
> - Appetizers & Drinks at TAO Nightclub
> - VIP Access & Bottle service at TAO Nightclub
> - VIP Access & Bottle service at Marquee Nightclub
> - VIP Acces & Bottle service at TAO Beach

I realize this may sound bitter, but man it must be cool to get free vacation weekends and everything paid for simply because you were born with a pair of tits.

The level of this goes far, far beyond the attention whoring seen on girls nights out. As if Tinder, OKCupid, and every white knight at the bar weren't contributing enough to the over-inflated egos of American females, now we have legitimate businesses piling a group of girls together on a bus, and whisking them away to Vegas so they can bask in the spotlight of men drooling all over them.

Yet, these are supposed to be the best memories of a young woman's life. A house has been replaced by lavish hotels. A husband has been replaced by a thirsty dude begging for permission to buy them a drink. Saturday morning cartoons with the kids have been replaced by Saturdays lying in bed, dealing with splitting headaches and hazy memories of the poisons and cocks consumed the night before.

It is yet another lie that society has told young people, and women are the unfortunate victims of this one. They are told to party away their 20s with the assumption that a good man will sweep them off their feet the day they turn 30 and are ready to settle down.

While it's hard to feel bad for a woman considering all the free stuff a vagina entitles you to (just see above list), I actually do. Alas, all of the attention in the world in the forms of free drinks at these events, "swiped right" pictures on Tinder, and OKCupid openers will never replace the true happiness any normal, sane, healthy woman receives from authentic relationships, family, and simply being a natural, feminine being.

Certainly, they do relish in the lifestyle, like they are supposed to. It's too bad they sure as hell wouldn't be open to finding Prince Charming on an All Girls Vegas Trip. It isn't until much later that they are very forcefully fed their own red pill in the form of The Wall that there is no Prince Charming at the end of the party tunnel waiting to rescue them. I just hope the free weekend in Vegas is worth it.

The Renaissance Of Modern Man

March 28, 2014 | by Seth Rose | Link | Original Link

In 1454 Johann Gutenberg printed his Gutenberg Bible, using his recently invented printing press.

In 1501 Michelangelo began sculpting his statue David.

In 1513 Niccolo Machiavelli published The Prince.

What an amazing period of time the Renaissance was. The Renaissance, translated as 'rebirth', saw a blossoming of art, literature, philosophy, politics, science, and invention unlike anything the world had ever seen. This period influenced the Reformation and Enlightenment, all of which have shaped the modern Western world.

What makes the Renaissance even more incredible is that just over a century prior to the aforementioned events an unimaginable terror ravaged Europe: The Black Death. Estimates say that one-quarter to upwards of one-half of Europe's population was killed.

To make matters even more horrifying, Dante Alighieri wrote his Divine Comedy a few decades earlier, in which he paints a terrifying depiction of hell. The masses were fearful and helpless. They were staring death in the eyes every day. Many felt that they were in the midst of the apocalypse.

Yet, despite all of that European civilization flourished after that. Some say that the Black Death helped to facilitate the Renaissance period through a number of socioeconomic changes such as creating a labor shortage which in turn increased wages allowing for a better standard of living.

An interesting topic for historical debate yes, but I think what is more important is seeing that humanity was able to not only survive, but grow. Many had apocalyptic fervor, but more than a century later the continent had reached a level of unimaginable success.

History, what is it good for?

The most important thing about learning history is taking lessons from the past and applying them to the present. So how can these events of the past be applied today, specifically towards men and masculinity? Think. Is there a force in today's Western world that is wreaking havoc on men and their masculinity? You guessed it: feminism. Feminism is the Bubonic Plague of the Western world. It is a force that cripples men leaving them feeble and weak.

So how can we stop this plague? Is there some sort of socioeconomic vaccine men can take? As a matter of fact there is. This vaccine doesn't have a name, but it comes in a red pill.

This red pill isn't easy to swallow though. In fact, it is not like any pill you are familiar with. You don't swallow it with a glass of water; it is absorbed in the mind. Unfortunately, not all men will be able to take this red pill. Some minds simply cannot tolerate this pill and although their bodies will remain intact, their masculinity will perish. A sad fortune yes, but it is what the future holds in store for most men.

As with 'The Great Pestilence of Europe', an incredible number of men will suffer, but perhaps this is the way it was meant to be. Essentially, feminism will 'thin the herd', by wiping out all men who didn't take the red pill. These men won't just disappear though. In fact, they will likely prove a road block to the well being of men who took the red pill, but these men can be bypassed. For you see, these men are weak from not taking the vaccine. They're bereft of masculinity, and without that they are no match for the man who has.

There is, however, one glitch with the red pill. In order for this pill to work, one can't just swallow it and be done with it. One will need to constantly nourish one's mind and masculinity, or else their fate will be just as bad as the man who didn't take the red pill at all.

So where to start?

Study The Classics

An important reason that the Renaissance came about was that scholars in the 14th-16th centuries had rediscovered texts from ancient Greece and Rome. These texts opened up a whole new world for them. Great thinkers such as Plato and Ptolemy allowed these scholars to think in a new perspective and add it to their existing worldview creating a new paradigm that lead to the Renaissance.

The fact that Return of Kings has numerous articles highlighting the wisdom of classical works is a fantastic start to bringing about the Renaissance of modern man. By studying the classics one will not only have a profound understanding of the world around them, but how to prosper in it.

The following are several examples of classic works that will provide one with invaluable insight:

- Meditations by Marcus Aurelius
- The Republic by Plato
- Confessions by St. Augustine

In fact, Return of Kings is an example of what this article is about. It is about a resurgence of masculinity and wisdom for modern men. Men in the western world lack these things and it is the goal of this site to restore them. Studying the classics are a suitable defense against the plague as a standalone; a homeopathic and ancient treatment, if you will. If one takes the red pill and studies the classics, one will be impervious to the plague.

Develop Yourself

After that man must go on a journey of self-development. He must continue to learn all he can and absorb as much wisdom as possible. He must make a concerted effort to better himself each and every day, improving both his mind and body.

You may be thinking, well improving my mind and body is admirable and I will indeed do it, but what about sex? Ah yes, sex, our carnal instinct. It is something that can't be ignored and must be fulfilled.

One must tread carefully when mating though, because if one has sex with a female who has been subjected to the plague, than he himself becomes susceptible. One must only fornicate with an infected female for a limited number of times or else one's chances of catching this plague increases dramatically. The solution to this is to find a plague-free female, and mate with her. Those women are scarce in the Western world, but if one goes abroad they're plentiful, although sadly the plague is beginning to spread quickly.

Strength In Numbers

One of the reasons feminism is so powerful is because they are united, men are not. Man has always been a selfish creature and we have yet to change our actions and thoughts accordingly to adapt to this modern world. Strength in numbers is key; help yourself, then your fellow-man.

If you read this site regularly, or other manosphere blogs, this is essentially what is going on. A man has achieved success in either one or several fields and then has started a website or written a book passing this information on to others; this is how change happens.

Like Johann Gutenberg's invention of the printing press, the development of the internet (Thanks to the almighty Al Gore) allows for a dissemination of ideas. While the internet has a mind-boggling amount of information, if we > "Adapt what is useful, reject what is useless, and add what is specifically [our]

then united we can bring about this Renaissance.

It will be a lengthy journey. The Renaissance didn’t reach most of Europe until the early 16th century, about a century and a half after the plague. It will take some time yes, but it is well worth the wait.

I also believe that all men have some sort of innate talent. This goes along with developing yourself. Once you have uncovered your talent, skill, gift, etc. continue to hone your craft and then share it with the world. Record your thoughts and actions for the sake of posterity. The works of Renaissance-era men sit in museums and have inspired people for centuries; your work can do the same. We must not think only for the benefit of ourselves. Remember, men must be united and lift up his fellow man. Then, and only then, can we see a Renaissance of modern man.

The Reign Of The Useful Idiots

In my last post, I introduced you to Yuri Alexandrovich Bezmenov, a Soviet KGB propaganda agent that defected and came to America in 1970 when he became disillusioned with the communist system and saw it for what it actually was: totalitarianism. I broke down the first part of his 1984 interview about ideological subversion and how the Soviets used it in their attempt to destroy the "decadent Imperial West."

I also showed how the tactics they were using then, namely promoting the myth of equality and destroying the nuclear family, are the same ones being used now to subvert our capitalist system here in America to usher in what will eventually become a totalitarian regime.

In this post I'll break down the middle section of the video and show the correlation between what Yuri describes and what is happening now in the West.

The Useful Idiot's Role

We begin at 31:50. Gentlemen, meet the Useful Idiot. In layman's terms, a useful idiot is a puppet. They are true believers, thinking that they are working towards "progress" and "equality", all the while blissfully unaware that they are demoralizing their country from within.

As Yuri explains, these are people (or their flunkies) who hold positions of influence and power across a broad spectrum of people within society. Their purpose is to infect the rest of the civilization using said influence, destabilizing not only moral values, but also the economy, defense systems, and any other essential facet of a strong nation.

By inciting moral decay and economic catastrophe, the demoralization, destabilization, and inevitable collapse of the society is assured, creating a power vacuum and transition of authority to the new totalitarian rulers. As I stated earlier, useful idiots can be found in almost every major aspect of society. Let's break them down.

Intellectuals

These useful idiots are the so-called leaders of academia. They are people who have spent years and what amounts to the price of a small condo in any major city to attain a worthless degree in a practically useless field. Unlike STEM fields or trade schools, these subjects have limited real world or pragmatic use, and the accolades heaped upon their practitioners are excessive for the actual good they do society. Examples of said fields include, but are not limited to:

1. Women's Studies

Fuckouttahere

2. Gender Studies

Rrrrawk! Gender is a social construct! Rrrrawk! Gender is a social construct!

3. Fat Studies

4. Anything That Ends In Studies, Evidently

5. Political Science

1) Be reallyreallyreally good at lying. 2) Possess no soul. Congratulations, you just saved 200 grand.

6. Anything In The Liberal Arts

The word liberal is IN the name.

7. Psychiatry

A.k.a. Grifting 101, or how to sucker women and weak mangina males into paying you $200 an hour to tell them what they already subconsciously know but their Warp 10 rationalization hamster won't let them accept. Congratulate them on their "breakthrough", but remind them they still have a long way to go and you'll see them next week. Rinse and repeat. This field is mostly made up of feminists and pussified BetaMax™ nerds who, in the very definition of irony, are emotionally crippled themselves and can't deal with their own inadequacies.

The above idiots tend to be the loudest when screaming about equality. This is because the educational system in the West is nothing more than a collection of leftist indoctrination camps that are run by radfems and betas and comprised of roughly 60% women who've been raised on feminist theory and believe The Patriarchy is real. Radical feminists want equality because that's their way of moving the goalposts closer to give the illusion that they're men's equals. Betas want equality because women said so.

These people have spent the last 50 years brainwashing our youth in communist propaganda. The principals and deans who run these camps today are the same hippies who were in college during the Woodstock era. They've risen through the ranks, poisoning three generations of our young people with their asinine notions of feminism, free love and experimentation, rampant drug use, and the hippie version of "freedom", which apparently is doing anything you want with zero accountability.

These radical notions have resulted in a plethora of man-eating harpies and emasculated men, open sexual perversion and confusion in the form of LGBTQXYZ;-)!%whatever-the-fuck, legalizing drugs (marijuana's just the start), and millennial females.

Journalists

True investigative journalists have been replaced by talking head political pundits whose sole job is to disseminate propaganda to their followers. The problem is most of the time these people aren't actually journalists, just useful idiots with useless degrees, who fit a certain mold that gives them some sense of credibility with their base.

Take Rachel Maddow. She doesn't have to know what she's talking about because she hits every single Popular Leftist Pundit branch on the tree. Let's see, bull dyke lesbian with a severely short haircut, man-jaw, complete lack of femininity, and a ridiculously low voice for a woman? Check. Lack of factual knowledge compensated for by snark and shitty jokes? Check. Female? Jury's out.

Lesbihonest, the people who listen to her don't care if she's right. All that matters is she feeds their hamsters by regurgitating the same tired feminist rhetoric in a sarcastic and condescending way that makes them feeeeel intellectually superior, while still being completely wrong.

Yuri mentions that one of his first assignments was working for the Novosti Press Agency, which was a propaganda front for the KGB tasked with disseminating Marxist/Leninist ideology. Of course we have similar agencies, but the number of publications in Western print media being used for the purposes of subversion is far too long to list here. However, if you really want the perfect example of such a publication, you need look no further than this rag. This collection of glorified toilet paper was founded by this woman, who has the audacity to call herself a journalist. She is without a doubt one of the greatest contributors to the demoralization of our great society.

An admitted asset of the CIA and self-proclaimed Marxist, she's used Ms. Magazine as a front to spread communist ideology to Western women for decades in the form of "women's liberation". Ms. Magazine was founded in 1971. Within two years abortion was legal in the United States due to Roe v. Wade. Slutty women were now free to kill their children simply because they got pregnant, but weren't done riding the cock carousel and wanted to keep the party going instead of taking care of their responsibilities like an adult.

Every bitchy attitude present in American women that acts as a turn-off for any sane man with half a ballsack is a direct result of her influence. "You go girl. You don't need a man girl. You're a strong, sexy, independent woman girl. Your man ain't shit girl. It's your body girl." Reality check, girl. Unfortunately, her aging carcass probably won't be around for the transfer of power to our new totalitarian masters, so she won't get to experience it firsthand in all its horror. All I can hope is that she's allowed a brief reprieve from her torment in whatever circle of Hell she lands in to witness what her efforts have wrought.

Political Prostitutes

We'd be here all day. These useful idiots are found here and here, among other places. Apparently being in a firefight in 120 degree heat wearing over 100 lbs. of gear is the same thing as sitting on your fat ass in an air-conditioned room answering some questions.

Entertainers

Being an actor or entertainer is still on par socially with prostitution, like it was in Ancient Rome. To re-emphasize what I stated in my earlier post, if you study history you'll find that with each new rise and fall of an empire, there are the same patterns.

When a new empire is in its early glory phase, actors are shunned, mocked, and looked down on. This is because the more practical and pragmatic professions are the ones looked at by society with the most respect, since they play the greatest role in accelerating the empire's prosperity.

In keeping with Rome, these would be soldiers, doctors, stonemasons, architects, politicians, blacksmiths, farmers, even butchers, bakers, and candlestick makers. These professions were respected because they actually provided a useful service to society. Actors and entertainers did not, and were rightfully viewed as little more than distraction.

On the flip side, as each empire starts its inevitable decline, acting and other frivolous entertainment that started as a brief escape from the harsher realities of everyday life suddenly become the focal point of discussion and culture. People who were once considered no better than street whores are suddenly paragons of perfection and beauty, worshipped like the Pantheon of Olympus as some coterie of divine beings whose lifestyle you should now spend all your time trying to emulate.

As it was already pointed out, 99% of these people are lucky to be hard 8's in the real world. I'm not saying they're useless, but when you basically have the same job as a six-year-old child and play make-believe for a living or can't actually play a musical instrument but can push some buttons on a beat machine that makes the sounds for you, then the amount of money, fame, attention, and praise you receive is ridiculously disproportionate to your worthwhile contributions to society.

Since we've already established that feminism is simply communism in drag, all you have to do is look at Hollywood and the media to see the plethora of demoralizing and subversive ideas being shoved in our faces every day. There are now successful "men" who are no longer just letting their wife hyphenate her last name, which is bad enough, but engaging in some serious simpology by taking their wife's last name and putting her name first. Jay-Z's an alpha my ass.

Soon you won't be able to use any word that "shames" a woman or gay person, joking or not, without being brought up on charges, even if you aren't talking to them. Saying slut, fattie, whore, lezbo, bitch, fag, or cunt will be a punishable crime. Douche(bag), asshole, rapist, pig, loser, pinky-dick, creep(er), motherfucker, fat-ass and their synonyms will not only be acceptable to say, but will be encouraged and cheered.

America: The New Never-Never Land

How does all this tie in with communism and ideological subversion? Make sure to watch at 49:55, where Yuri speaks about how the KGB was very fascinated with a con artist religious leader who was charging useful idiots from America like Mia Farrow 500 bucks to come to his school and "meditate." In this case, meditation consisted of getting high as fuck and sitting around staring at your navel. These idiots would take this nonsense back to America and soon everyone was doing it to emulate a celebrity.

The key point is made at 52:12, when he says that the goal is to demoralize a nation by distracting its citizens' opinions, attention, and mental energy from problems in the real world, and to instead have them focus on non-issues and basically live in a fantasy world.

When you combine legalizing drugs, a childish you-can't-tell-me-what-to-do attitude, and zero accountability with feminism, a cult of celebrity worship, internet porn, video games, comic books, and the movies based on them, what you get is a populace that becomes stuck in a state of perpetual adolescence.

Children in adult bodies who are content to get high and then immerse themselves in a fantasy world instead of being productive all day in business or engaging in self-improvement are now celebrated. These people are easy to manipulate and control as long as you keep the mindless entertainment flowing.

There is no other group of useful idiots in the Western world more complicit in its demoralization than those in pop culture. They have been anointed as the sanctioning body of what's acceptable and cool in society and what isn't, and have made cultural Marxism in all its forms the cool and acceptable thing to do. These poor souls believe what they're doing is progressive and that they're leading us toward the Great Egalitarian Socialist Utopia. What they don't realize is that they're being played like a cheap guitar, and soon the song will be over.

Why Are The Most Vocal Feminists Also The Ugliest?

March 29, 2014 | by Vincent Vinturi | Link | Original Link

When I was writing my last article, "When Her 'No' Means 'Yes'", I considered the possibility that it might cause a bit of a stir. But the magnitude of the enraged reaction it received on Twitter and Facebook was far beyond anything I had imagined.

> How is it possible that 14,000 people have liked this trash on Facebook? It makes me want to puke. http://t.co/Sx3pgftzYb

> — Lisa (@EcoLisa) February 7, 2014

…and so forth. On top of that, my eBook on overcoming last minute resistance to sex was banned from Amazon following the nagging of a nasty HuffPo columnist.

With morbid curiosity I waded through the Twitter feeds and Facebook messages of people calling me every name under the sun. They had absolutely no qualms about publicly calling me a rapist, demanding that I be castrated, suggesting I ought to be imprisoned, butt raped, and finally—perhaps after the sequential fulfillment of the previous punishments—executed.

A Statistic Feminists Have Ignored

In the process of sifting through these humanitarian Tweets and shares, I happened to notice something interesting: there is a strong correlation between how loudly a woman screeches her “I’m a victim of the patriarchy”, “all sex is rape”, “men are oppressors” feminist party line and how physically unattractive she is.

In short, the most vocal feminists are the ugliest.

To sexy girls and to guys who get a lot of ass, this all likely comes as no surprise. The ugly girls in school never got to date the cool guys. They wouldn’t even look at them. The pretty girls got all the attention, hosted all the cool parties, and generally enjoyed a higher quality of life. They received copious attention from the worthiest males by virtue of their superior genetics and social status.

So sadly, many of the ugly, socially awkward, unwanted chicks—rather than work to improve themselves and make lemonade out of lemons (as we encourage men and women alike to do here at ROK)—found an ideology that elevates their misfortune into virtue: feminism.

Opiate of The People

It’s no coincidence that the most insidious ideologies of the world, those responsible for incomprehensible death and destruction, always portray their target market as victims. This is the first prong of the strategy. The second prong is to sell these emotionally vulnerable folks a beautiful dream in which they are elevated out of their quagmire with little to no effort on their part and are simultaneously revenged against their evil oppressors.

Communism, for instance, depends on poor people hating and feeling victimized by the rich, because it's the rich's fault they're poor. "If only communism were instituted, our poverty would disappear!"

WWII Nazism depended on convincing the German people that the Jews were to blame for all their problems. "If only we got rid of all the Jews, our businesses and communities would be restored to their former glory."

And finally, feminism—perhaps a more virulent ideology than even the communism that destroyed my fatherland—feeds on perceived patriarchal victimhood and sells a dream to women that is heinously divorced from natural law: equality.

Of course, any time you go against nature the result is always weird and perverse (as Tuthmosis kindly pointed out).

[image]

The Vicious Lie Being Sold To Women

Woman are told, in effect: "You're no less attractive than those other girls. Just because they won the genetic lottery doesn't mean they're better than you. All women are equally beautiful by virtue of having been born. You're just a victim. You've been exploited. Men are to blame. They're hideous oppressors. All of them. (Psst…let's get 'em!)"

Shakespeare wrote, "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned." But old Bill didn't get it exactly right.

If a beautiful woman is scorned, it won't be long before another man comes along and helps her forget all about the last guy who broke her heart. That, at least, confers acknowledgment of existence to the woman.

But if an ugly woman is ignored because no quality man would want her, no matter how witty and spectacularly GIF-laden her Tumblr blog may be, that is the ultimate scorn. It's less than scorn. It's a total indifference to her existence. A vacuum.

…and nature abhors a vacuum.

How Attractive Is The Average Internet Feminist?

Curious to quantify this phenomenon, I went through over 200 tweets from angry, female feminuts and rated the ones who had photos on the ubiquitous 1-10 attractiveness rating scale. Further, I mentally appended a "WB" or "WNB" to each datum ("would bang" and "would NOT bang", respectively) to indicate relative penetrability.

A Representative Specimen (WNB):

An Attractive Outlier (WB):

On average, the angry female Tweeters hovered at 6/10. Frankly put, the majority of these chicks are Quasi Motresses.

I get it: being ugly sucks. But you know what? We all have our own bag. So come on, ladies. Gather yourselves up, have some pride and make the most of this short life instead of blaming others—in this case, men—for your problems.

Feminism is warm and consoling like an opiate. It makes you feel good. It exonerates you of having to improve yourself, to move forward and to make honest assessments about yourself at the expense of your ego.

Now I admit that there were a few sexy girls amongst the Tweeters who threw me for a pleasant curveball. If it weren't for these few attractive outliers, whose genetic largess graciously brought up the average, these girls could singlehandedly constitute the non-human cast of Lord of The Rings.

After going through all of those hyperbolic, inane Tweets, I'm in bad need of a shower and a booty call to one of my sexy Thai girlfriends. The catharsis is complete. Now it's time to put these foul harpies behind me and get back to living the good life.

4 Reasons The “Ban Bossy” Campaign Is Mindless Narcissism

March 30, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

A hilariously predictable social campaign has kicked off in America. It is to ban the usage of the word “bossy.” Apparently, what holds girls back from pursuing their dreams of becoming 1%er’s is being referred to as bossy when they are growing into adulthood.

To properly understand this social idiocy, understand the ideological posture that leads to censorious campaigns such as these. Proponents of this avenue of thinking think they that words greatly matter and effect oppressed populations in ways that their oppressors cannot understand. Further, they make the assumption that you can glean what a person thinks of X, Y or Z simply based on usage of one word alone.

Usually, the afflicted believers will lead commentary on “Banning Bossy” with the glib assertion “words matter” and then go on to cite studies they never have read nor considered their statistical methodology. Usually, as seen in the video above, inherent sexist bias that values male leadership at the expense of female leadership results in the usage of the word bossy. This is to dissuade females from becoming the leaders they would have been without being violently verbally assaulted by the word bossy.

These sorts of campaigns are based out of female political narcissism: feminism. Feminists think that any reason they or other females never became the millionaire space-cowgirl rock stars they thought they would become while growing up is because of anything but themselves. The most alluring and most used social fiction is the folder of male misdeeds towards women: sexism, misogyny, patriarchy, sexual harassment, rape and anything that women only understand as coming from men towards themselves. “Banning Bossy” utilizes this framework, as the untold assumption is that this is done from men towards girls. Even if they are to admit that women do this to girls, the default retort would be that those women suffer from sexist “Stockholm Syndrome” and are just reflections of male sexism.

To fully understand the ignorance and narcissism behind the movement, consider these points:

1. There Exist Real Biological Differences Between Men And Women

Ideologies like feminism usually assume that men and women are not different biologically at all—aside from their genitals—so they assume any perceived difference in the behavior of the average man or woman to be a social fiction. This mindset has a limited but useful approach in certain professions—namely, psychology. Psychologists often assume their patient's issues are resultant of social forces in their lives; assuming this means they believe every person that walks through their door can be healed. Naive? Yes, but necessary to avoid morally judging clients and writing off seriously damaged individuals.

That being said, any social movement aimed at "equalizing" males and females that ignores biology is completely deluded. The "Ban Bossy" movement isn't chock full of neuroscientists, evolutionary biologists or anything at all. It is dominated by celebrities, businesswomen like Sheryl Sandberg and female college students. You think these people are familiar with basic evolutionary theory? You think they understand what the Baldwin Effect is? From a pop culture standpoint, have they read Steven Pinker's brilliant book "The Blank Slate?"

No, they have little desire to pursue the hard sciences like biology, ironically proving Pinker's views on gender. They consider life to be a social construction, so that any individual woman has the desire and ability to compete with the top dogs of men. Not only does this deny simple genetic differences between humans (IQ, for instance) but also assumes that men and women do what they do simply because of socially enforced norms. Yeah, that's why lesbians in America place less emphasis on physical appearance than heterosexual females, and gay males place a hyper-emphasis on physical appearance that heterosexual men do not.

Still, while they ignore biology, they also have a massive blind-spot on who socializes boys and girls.

2. The Campaign Ignores The Supreme Primacy Of Females Raising Children

As I observed in my post "A 3 Point Primer In Female Privilege," women have the privilege of dominating the homes of America. Women run most all homes, have a level of control over children that men do not enjoy. Media reinforces this, often portraying men as latter day Elmer Fudd's, stumbly and befuddled man-children, not fit to tie their own shoes. Men who are not men until they have the approval of a woman and are not considered civilized until they exist under the watchful and morally superior yoke of a female.

However, this is just the beginning. Women overwhelmingly dominate the compulsory educational system and are increasingly making up the administration of said institutions. They are the social workers, babysitters and other family members that usually help care for children are female. The feminist rebuttal would be that this a social construction, but the Mosuo of China suggest that women—even when free of patriarchy —are incredibly interested in raising children with other women, with fathers as an afterthought.

What this means for the campaign isn't just that women are biologically predisposed to want to care for children, this influence means that women have a greater impact on the future of children. How can the campaigners speak truthfully about girl's self-esteem being harmed by the word with the not-so-implicit premise that this comes from boys and men? Either the harm comes from mostly women, or the harm isn't there at all. If the campaigners truly wanted to help women, they would need to narrow this campaign's scope to women. Yet, they don't do this and they refuse to address the real concern the women are increasingly becoming the only influence in children's lives.

3. The Educational System Has Been Promoting Girls For Many Decades

Narcissists love to pretend that the world starts and ends with their lives. What most of these “Ban Bossy” believers don’t understand is that the school system has been promoting girls for decades.

We can fudge with the dates a bit, but I think it would be clear by the 1960’s, the school system has been obsessed with turning women into better capitalists. Women overtook men as enrollees in college in the early ’80’s and TV shows have been shaming men for decades for thinking any profession or undertaking isn’t for girls or women. The system—for almost a half century– has been doggedly and ruthlessly promoting girls into every profession. As a side note, I cannot understand why girls and women need so much encouragement, support and resources to do what they want. People do what they want—the heart wants what the heart wants, after all—if anybody needs so much assistance, something is amiss. And, no, it’s not patriarchy, sexism or misogyny.

“Ban Bossy” adherents don’t seem to understand that girls have been strenuously promoted for over two generations now. Maybe, just maybe, the reason there aren’t as many leaders (translation: women wanting to climb the corporate level till they reach their level of incompetence) is that women either don’t want to be “leaders” or they wisely realize it to be the rat race most men realize. To pretend that the reason that girls and women haven’t risen up the ranks as Beyonce and Sheryl Sandberg would want them to is because the system doesn’t want them to is hogwash.

4. “Ban Bossy” Is The Narcissistic Apogee Of Female Egos

If you think the reason you didn’t reach your potential is due to the usage of one word towards you as a child, you need a long, hard look in the mirror. More specifically, if you are a woman and didn’t get to wear snappy black Prada heels with your Dolce & Gabbana dark azure power suit at your high-status job — not too manly, but creative and expressive — where you do really important stuff on things is because of sexism, well…

First, that so-called retrograde sexism died long ago. As previously noted, schools and media have been beyond vigilant to police and smoke out any notions that women shouldn’t do things men do.

Second, and most importantly, this isn’t about girls. You see any girls in the video? All I saw were grown women, women with powerful careers, money and status. What are they complaining about – do they think they deserved more than they have acquired in life? No, this is about the women and mothers watching. You know, those stuck in a crappy, low-effect marriages, with a clutch of disoriented kids and a boring job that they wish would appreciate them more, you know, as a human.

“Banning Bossy” is no more than disaffected female egos who thought they were going to smash the glass ceiling of capitalistic, creative or any sort of high-status endeavors. They thought they would be Sheryl Sandberg, Beyonce or Jane Lynch — a CFO, famous musician or actress. Those narcissistic dreams didn’t get burned off in college, nor dashed by reality in their later 20’s. No, they ended up surrounded by the normalcy of middle class, not the high-brow world of money, power and fame. They have to suffer the utter indignity of marrying a regular man, having regular children, and having a regular, middle-class job where they know they are increasingly expendable.

Campaigns like this serve two confluent purposes: one, to give purpose they are going to change the world for the better (read: forcing their daughters to become the women they couldn’t be) and also assuaging their own ultimate narcissistic wound of not becoming everything in a world where they were taught they could be anything.

Trapped in a world far more interested in exploiting them via gaining an income and blowing it on media-created wants, girls and women pass not from father to husband, but from schools to corporations and government, with the ever-present eye of the media guiding and influencing them. Girls and young women justify all this with the vainest of all hopes: that they accede into the 1%. At best, they land in the comfortable and privileged aspirational 14%, but that is agonizingly close to their dreams. They may brush elbows with women whose lives they think they should be living. At worst, they mire away in the banality of a middle-class life. The height of their boring day job might be gossiping about whose marriage is collapsing or if that ugly bitch from HR is cheating on her husband with the head of Legal.

In sum, the “Ban Bossy” campaign is little more than repackaged narcissism through the lens of gender and male-blaming. The lonely hearts that take up with the movement are young women beginning to spin a defensive web of why they will never become CEO of a fashion company. For older women, it is those who want to use girls and young women as objects to act out their own failed lives, while pretending it was untoward socialization that they never got to wear sexy but tasteful suits as the head of HR at Goldman Sachs.

TL;DR: Women to Sheryl Sandberg: “You stole my life!!!” Also, blame patriarchy. And men. And words.

The Single Most Effective Exercise Any Man Can Do

March 30, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

If I were to survey every guy in my gym and ask them what's their favorite lift I imagine bench press would be the overwhelming answer. And that's just what I've come to expect in today's disappointing everybody-follow-the-leader culture.

What's the best exercise?

However, If I changed my question and instead asked what's the best exercise you can do, many would probably stick with their original answer firmly believing that the bench press is, in fact, magical. But some would smarten up and say the squat or the deadlift. And in terms of the most muscles worked per exercise or the highest degree of difficulty those last two answers aren't wrong. But, if I had to prescribe just one exercise to the average man today, it wouldn't be any of those.

Combating a weak lifestyle

The row is so vital for men to perform in this day and age because it serves to correct the biggest postural problem our society faces: the forward slouch. This is when your shoulders round forward and you look like the humpback of Notre Dame.

Today, everything we do is in front of us: we lean forward to type on computers, we drive our cars using steering wheels that we grip in front of us, and then we goto the gym and we make matters worse. We bench press, we cycle, and we run – all anteriorly dominant movements that make this problem even worse. The end result is a severely overdeveloped chest and anterior shoulder muscles, coupled with a disturbingly loose and weak upper back. This is the cause of weak posture.

Instead of standing straight and tall, we slump forward and appear nervous. We appear shorter and less confident. And the problem extends far beyond appearances. Recent studies have even linked our physical stature to our mental attitude. When we stand up straight and take up large amounts of space, we assume a matching and measurably more confident mindset. When we cower and slouch forward, we similarly adopt a matching mindset – this time timid and weak. If men weren't already getting soft enough as it is, this only intensifies the depressing downward trend.

If your posture isn't perfect you must act now to fix this problem. Forget building muscle or cutting fat, when you strengthen your back, stretch your chest, and begin to assume a correct posture – you'll look far more confident and strong. You'll shoulders will appear broader, and your chest bigger. You'll feel the same way, too. And it will take only a fraction of the time to see a big difference when compared to trying to alter your body composition.

While this article is aimed at men, women should take note too–correcting their posture will lead to visibly larger breasts and a more perky appearance, two things all men find attractive.

Why Chivalry Is Dead

March 31, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

It is often said that chivalry is dead, but why is that so and who is mourning? A recent article lamenting the rarity of the gentleman within the millennial male populace would seem to provide something of an answer to that question. The author of the piece, Hope Rodriguez, contends that millennial men are severely lacking in gentlemanly traits, and explains to us why they should "man up" and correct these errors.

> 1. Elevator etiquette
> I don't care how big of a hurry you're in, or how slow she may walk, if there is a female or five on the elevator with you, you hold your arm in the door and let them off first.
> 2. R-E-S-P-E-C-T (sing it to the tune of Aretha Franklin)
> If a female walks past you, for God's sake, do not turn your head and stare at her behind. If she is talking to you, don't stare down her shirt. If you're driving down the road, don't honk or yell "hey sexy!!!!" Gross. Undressing a girl with your eyes is one of the most disgusting and degrading things you could possibly do to her. Don't worry about getting a date, you've already ruined it by being a pig.
> 3. Give up your seat.
> Whether she is old, young, pregnant, active, fat, skinny, whatever; if the bus, classroom, etc. is full, get up from your chair and offer your seat to a female who is standing. If you chose to stay in your seat and force ladies to remain standing, make sure you remember to take off your maxi pad on the way out. (oops, did I

> 4. Pay attention to the fact that the world is more threatening for females
> We are automatic targets everywhere we go, especially at night. I don't need to get into the subject of rape. Walk your female coworkers to their cars at night. Just watch out for the women around you, they'll definitely appreciate it.
> 5. Be polite.
> Compliment a lady today. They aren't going to automatically assume that you want to have babies with them just because you said they look nice today. You would be surprised by what can make a woman smile. Little things, men. Little things.
> 6. Hold the door.
> If we are pretty far behind, we don't expect you to hold the door open for us. It makes us feel like we need to hurry to the door. However, if there is a woman walking behind you or relatively close behind you, do NOT let a door shut on her.
> 7. Driveway etiquette
> My son will know that he will NOT drive up to a female's house and honk the horn or shoot her a text that says "I'm here, come get in the car." If a guy comes to pick my future daughter up for a date, and he honks the horn or texts her to pick her up, I'm going to walk outside and tell him to go home. Walk up to the door, knock on the door, and then walk her to your car. At the end of the night, walk her back to her door. I don't care if you're just friends or you're married. It's what you're supposed to do.
> Guys: man up. Bring back gentlemanly behaviors. It would definitely be appreciated.

Unfortunately for this author, her requests are simply incompatible with the notions of gender equality that our society has embraced wholeheartedly and integrated aggressively into its legal and social order.

For example, the modern man on an elevator with women has been raised and conditioned to respect those women as his equals. Equals do not receive special consideration over other equals on the basis of gender or any other marker. Equals are treated… equally. Providing the benefit of this etiquette to women simply because they are women would fundamentally contradict notions of equality that we're heavily invested in as a society. A man who truly believes in equality and all of the values that it represents is going to practice that elevator etiquette with everyone he meets regardless of gender. He will be polite to everyone. He will respect everyone. He will practice driveway etiquette with everyone, and he will hold the door or give up a seat for anyone who actually needs it. He will not engage in these behaviors selectively on the basis of gender because he has been taught not to discriminate in that way.

A few of Ms. Rodriguez's other statements betray outright ignorance, naiveté or both. Take these, for example:

> …Walk your female coworkers to their cars at night…
> … Compliment a lady today. They aren't going to automatically assume that you want to have babies with them just because you said they look nice today…

The first statement sounds like an excellent way to invite a sexual harassment suit or attract potential discipline for violations of workplace conduct. Your typical corporate millennial females are unlikely to tolerate this unsolicited "escort" on the part of their male coworkers, much less appreciate it. Unless they have already been deemed attractive by these females (most men won't be in this category), the men attempting to provide this escort will be labeled "creepy" at best, and accused of stalking at worst. No good can come of this.

The second just sounds naive: any man who has interacted with modern millennial females for any period of time will understand that many of them will jump to precisely that conclusion, and will also sometimes react negatively upon doing so. Hope Rodriguez is not a man and so could possibly be forgiven for not understanding these things at the outset, but she needs to change that if she hopes to have any advice she writes for men taken seriously.

That brings me to my next point: Ms. Rodriguez seems not to grasp the true nature of the chivalrous ideals she yearns for or the environment in which she currently lives. The concept of chivalry required men to be perfect gentlemen in their conduct, but said behavior was not intended for every female they met. It was more specifically designed to govern male conduct with ladies. Chivalrous codes of conduct required a gentleman to execute them, and a lady to receive them..

Ladies had their own rules to follow, and it was only through the adherence to those rules that they could qualify for the receipt of chivalry from a gentleman. Chivalric codes of conduct traveled on a two way street: the gentleman cannot exist without the lady, and vice-versa. Both genders were required to adhere to certain standards in order to engage in the chivalric exchange. The gentleman and the lady are like the yin and the yang.

Ms. Rodriguez is probably right to note that an ideal chivalrous gentleman would be more measured and restrained in his observation of an attractive female that he had not yet been acquainted with. He probably wouldn’t be too forward with her to begin with, and would remain exceedingly polite during his first interactions with her while avoiding overt sexualization.

In order to get that treatment, however, a woman would need to be the ideal lady. Ladies in the age of chivalry were modest in their conduct. They were not particularly sexually suggestive in their speech, dress or dance, and this made it relatively easy for a gentleman to approach and engage them in a more polite, less overtly sexual manner.

Most modern millennial women do not adhere to the codes of conduct inherent to the lady. Their dress is often highly sexually suggestive, designed to invite overtly sexual approaches and draw the very suggestive gazes that Ms. Rodriguez scolds millennial men for wielding. Their dance is often even more sexually suggestive, roughly approximating the act of intercourse itself.

Modern millenial females express their sexuality more openly and freely than any lady of a bygone age would have been expected to. A lady expecting to keep that label and thus benefit from the chivalrous conduct of a gentleman could not engage freely and openly in casual sexual relationships with multiple men while unmarried. She could not engage in simulated sex on dance floors with men she didn’t even know well (or even men she did know somewhat well). She could not walk around in clothing designed specifically to expose and draw attention to the more sexually alluring portions of her body. The modern woman can do all of this, however, and very often does. Why?

Because she wants to, and that's alright. Women have spent generations fighting for the ability to remove social limitations on their sexuality, and they now enjoy the fruits of that effort. Don't get anything twisted here: I have no problem with this and neither do most millennial men. Women are free to dress as they like, dance as they like and fuck as they like. I'm certainly not going to stop them, but there's a price to pay for all of this.

As noted before, the gentleman and the lady come together. One cannot exist without the other—the code of chivalry was designed with this understanding in mind, and it dealt with that understanding by creating standards of conduct for each gender seeking to participate in the chivalric exchange. When we freed women from the obligation to adhere to those standards of conduct, we necessarily freed men as well.

How can we change this and bring back the missing gentleman Ms. Rodriguez so desperately desires to interact with? Well, gentlemen require ladies. If you want more gentlemen in the traditional sense, you'll need to create more ladies in the traditional sense, and that would require a re-imposition of the same social and legal restrictions on female sexuality and expression that women have fought so hard to eliminate during the last few generations. There would need to be a rescission of the legal progress females in our society have made toward true equality.

To further illustrate just why this is, consider the way in Ms. Rodriguez's suggestion that men give up seats and hold doors (among other preferential and somewhat deferential things) specifically for women solely because they are women. Such behavior was once common, but why was this?

Because women were seen as the weaker sex. This notion of the inherently “weak” female governed the discriminatory legal and social landscape in which the code of chivalry was born and practiced. Men did all they did for women because of the implicit understanding in society that women, by virtue of their being women, were not equal to them. They were weaker and needed assistance and men, by virtue of their being men, were stronger and therefore obligated to provide that assistance.

Men are no longer behaving this way because they have been raised to understand that their female counterparts are not weak, but strong. They’re not dependent, but independent. They’re not inferiors, they’re equals. Our modern legal system takes these statements as fundamental, unassailable truths and uses the force of law to ensure that they are treated accordingly. This will, in turn, prevent men from doing many of the things Ms. Rodriguez would like them to, as they have become increasingly unable to see women as their true inferiors.

If Ms. Rodriguez wants the chivalric code to make its way back into the mainstream, she'll need to bring back the old view on gender relations that gave rise to it. Modern notions of gender equality will need to go out the window.

That is unlikely to happen, however. For all of her yearning for the "chivalry" of yesteryear, I doubt that Hope Rodriguez or any other modern woman would like to see the return of the social mores necessary to sustain it. Millennial women live in what is undoubtedly the best time to be a female in the history of humanity. At no point in human history have women been as wealthy, as free, as respected and as influential as they are today. The return of te social norms necessary to sustain chivalry in the traditional sense could only inhibit their enjoyment of all that, and they know it. Women have made their voices heard loudly and clearly: they will not tolerate this.

Hope Rodriguez seems like a nice girl and I'm sure she'll find a man to treat her well sometime soon (if she hasn't already), but she'll not succeed in bringing back the ways of a bygone age. Chivalry is dead and, at the end of the day, that's just the way that most millennial women want it.

The Eternal Recurrence Of Internet Outrage

Conflagrations of internet outrage all seem to follow a predictable pattern. A recent flare-up of outrage over a Twitter joke by comedian Stephen Colbert is just the latest manifestation of the endless cycle of imaginary outrage that has become permanent feature of the internet. In brief, a relatively humorless tweet supposedly making fun of Asians was released from the comedian's The Colbert Report Twitter feed. The tweet was noticed by a 23 year old female "freelance writer" and "activist" of Korean-American ancestry, who promptly decided to declare a crusade against alleged anti-Asian racism. A profile of Ms. Park has described her personal struggles:

> Park had her own struggles — primarily an eating disorder that she said lasted nine years. It was not until she started attending the University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign that she got into activism. She and her friends called out the administration for not cracking down on the use of an Indian chief mascot that had been retired by the school, but still lived on unofficially at sporting events.

Ms. Park appeared on HuffPost Live for an interview, where she came across as a neurotic, frustrated whiner. The interview was notable for this final exchange between her and host Josh Zepps:

> Park: I feel like it's incredibly patronizing for you to paint these questions this way, especially as a white man. I don't expect you to be able to understand what people of color are actually saying with regards to #CancelColbert.
> Epps: Being a white man doesn't prevent me from being able to think. It > doesn't prevent me from being able to have reasoned perspective on things.

> Park: White men definitely feel like they're entitled to talk over me. They definitely feel like they're entitled to minimalize [sic] my experiences, and they definitely feel like they are somehow exempt and so logical compared to women, who are painted as emotional, right?
> Zepps: No one's "minimalizing" your right to have an opinion. It's just a stupid opinion.

Park's "#Cancel Colbert" crusade was picked up by veteran screamer Michelle Malkin, a conservative pundit who thrives on the type of baiting, bashing, and attention-seeking that, in primitive times, were primarily reserved for star witnesses before the medieval Inquisition or jury trials for witchcraft. And so the latest firestorm of internet outrage was born. The three stages are by now relatively clear:

Stage 1: A random comment or event is injected somewhere into cyberspace.

Stage 2: A marginalized, neurotic person notices it, and seizes upon it to feed their attention-seeking impulses or repressed desires. Social media is used to generate a frenzy. Statements are cherry-picked for maximum impact, or simply invented. The person has a typical "accuser" or "informer" mentality. He or she is animated by hatreds and inner neuroses, but revels in the attention gained by simply making accusations. This is the type of person who would normally become an informer if he or she were living under an authoritarian system.

Stage 3: Other parties and media outlets join in the frenzy, more out of boredom and curiosity than anything else. Fake, insincere discussions about race, gender, sexism, racism, feminism, or any other politically correct topic ensue, and eventually fizzle out, with nothing meaningful having been accomplished.

Fake outrage in action: an accuser emotes about the unfairness of the world

Such is the predictable pattern of internet outrage conflagrations. And the predictable result is the resounding nothingness that remains at the bottom of the pot, after all the water has boiled away. They are tempests of nothingness, they are firestorms of vacuity.

One is reminded of the philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche's doctrine of the "eternal recurrence." According to Nietzsche, all of the events in this world were doomed to be happen over and over, in an endless and horrible cycle of repeated manifestation. The idea is an old one, appearing in Hindu philosophy as well as the doctrines of the Stoics and Epicureans; and Nietzsche himself probably took it from Heinrich Heine. The doctrine is not so incredible as it seems: if the universe has an infinite lifespan, and there is a finite amount of matter with a finite number of combinations, then it would seem to follow that the same events could unfold again and again.

Nietzsche confronts the horror of the Eternal Recurrence

Yet we can imagine poor Nietzsche nearly going insane while thinking of the nightmarish implications of his "eternal recurrence" doctrine. And this was in the 1890s, far before the internet age! One wonders how quickly our modern electronic madness would have shattered his fragile nerves. The Roman poet Virgil, who was viewed as something of a prophet in the Middle Ages, echoed the same idea of eternal recurrence in his fourth Eclogue:

> Now is come the last age of Cumaean song; the great line of the centuries > Begins anew. Now the Virgin returns, the reign of Saturn returns; now a new > Generation of descends from heaven on high…Yet will a few traces of old-time
> Sin live on, to bid men tempt the sea in ships, girdle towns with walls; and cleave
> The Earth with furrows. A second Typhys will then arise, and a second Argo to carry > Chosen heroes; a second war will be fought, and great Achilles be sent again to Troy.

Amid all the fake outrage, no one noticed a bit of contemporary news that would be far more deserving of Ms. Park's and Ms. Malkin's outrage. The city of Detroit just announced that it would cut off the water utility service of Detroit residents who were delinquent on their water bills. And how many are in arrears? About one-half of the city residents—over 140,000 people—are behind on their water bills. If over half the residents of a metropolitan area are unwilling to pay for water, it speaks volumes about the decay of the infrastructure in that city. I would guess that many other American cities have a similar situation, as they continue their downward spiral into poverty, debasement, and barbarism. Where is the outrage over this? There is nothing, not even a whisper. The barbarians are not at the frontiers: they are already inside the gates, and are multiplying from within, with the fertility of the simple-minded.

One is reminded of the civilizational collapse in Western Europe in fourth and fifth centuries A.D., as Rome's aqueducts and water system in Italy and Gaul slowly silted in and became unusable, as poverty, ignorance, and barbarian presence combined to throw the water system into disuse. The marshes near Rome ceased to be drained, as they had been under the Caesars; and slowly they arose again, and became breeding grounds for pestilence and malaria. From a population of over one million, Rome's population in the Middle Ages shrunk to under 50,000. It was the triumph of poverty and barbarism. But, of course, it would be asking too much for someone like Ms. Park to think in these terms. For she is one of the barbarians. She is part of that historical ferment of decomposition of societies.

I wonder if Ms. Park is as angry about Detroit's collapse as she is about internet ethnic jokes

For her and Malkin, being an accuser is an end in itself. Accusing stokes the inner fires of repressed feminine libido, brings inner rapture, and satisfies that related feminine lust for power and attention. The proliferation of informers and accusers is also a symptom of decomposition among nations. The rise in the power of accusers and informers proceeds alongside the stifling power of political correctness, and the strangling of independent thought. Tacitus says, in Annals IV.7:

> It was indeed the most deadly blight of the age that prominent senators > practiced even the bases forms of accusation, some with openness, and many in private. Nor could any distinction be traced between outsider and relative, between friend and stranger, between the events of the present and those of the past. Both in the Forum and in private homes, to speak of any subject was to be accused. For every man was rushing to be the first in the field and to mark out his victim, sometimes in self-defense, but usually through infection of what seemed a contagious disease.

Fake outrage and false accusations are now the favored tools of those who take delight in sacrificing the public good to their own private passions. The unrestrained exercise of these passions—which the media age enables—multiplies the bacteria of societal decay. It continues with a sure and steady velocity.

Perhaps, in millennia or aeons hence, when the next momentous recurrence of our civilization rolls around as Nietzsche and Virgil cyclically predicted, we will do better.

The Dating Success Of Asian Women Is Due To White Obesity

One interesting effect of the obesity epidemic has been an increase in the desirability of Asian women. Thirty years ago, nailing an Asian chick was a consolation prize for a white guy who struck out with his own kind. Indeed, in 1980 interracial marriage was fairly rare in the United States, with only 7% of all marriages occurring between people of different races. Nowadays, the intermarriage rate is 15% overall, but it is 36% among Asian females.

When Caucasian men marry Asian women, the couple is twice as likely to both be college educated and will make on average 20% more money than a white-white couple. Sociologists talk about all sorts of possible explanations: the desire of Asians to assimilate, the increasing acceptance of interracial marriage, the sexualization of Asian women as docile and subservient, the smaller penises of Asian men. All these explanations are probably wrong. I'm reminded of an old joke which explains the phenomenon of Asian women marrying white guys: Why does a dog lick its genitals? Because it can.

Thin Asian Girls are Upwardly Mobile

In our society, whites are at the top of the social ladder and people naturally want to marry up. In the past, when there were many fewer overweight white women, a man would just marry a thin white girl. Nowadays there are so few thin white females that men must look elsewhere. Because Asian women are substantially thinner than their white counterparts, it is only natural that their overall desirability would increase.

More importantly, when considering marriage, men have two great fears. First, that their wife will stop having sex with them and second, that their wife will get fat. Because even slightly overweight young white women are seen as likely to gain enormous amounts of weight during their childbearing years, a stick-thin Asian woman is even more desirable. The presence of many thin older Asian females in the population is evidence of the wise choice of marrying a young, thin Asian female. Look at any large group of 50-year-old women of different ethnicities. Among African-Americans, 90% will be obese, among the whites, probably 75%, but among the Asians, easily half are still thin.

Asian Women Have Become Popular… And Picky

Even ten years ago, I found that it was comparatively easy to date an Asian woman or get her to respond to me online. But now, they are becoming more selective. The nation's white guys have figured out that the biggest risk to a lifetime of marital happiness is a fat wife, and the best mitigating strategy is to marry an Asian.

Some men will argue that it is not just thinness, but better personalities which are driving the increase in white-Asian couples. This may be true, and certainly my own anecdotal experience is that attractive Asian women, especially foreign-born, are more likely to exhibit wifely behavior than pretty American white girls, but without being thin, these Asians would not get much attention.

Another possible explanation is that there are substantial numbers of Asian women who have little to no interest in Asian men. I often hear this from Asian chicks, but I've heard the same from black women as well about black men. It takes white guys wanting to date Asian ladies to make this sort of coupling happen. Still, the fact that many Asian women don't want to date Asian men does propel Asian girls into the white dating sphere.

Of course, some men have a negative view of Asian women and Asian culture generally. However, one should be cautious not to indict two billion women on the basis of two crazy psycho Asian ex-girlfriends. Casting aspersions on Asian women this way is relying on anecdote. Casting aspersions on white women who are three times more likely to be fat than Asians is relying on science.

Water Seeks its Own Level

This notion of non-whites marrying up and out of their ethnicity on the basis of a thin body was demonstrated to me dramatically when I was in an elevator at an area mall. In this case, the foreign ethnicity of interest was from India, but the principle was the same. In the elevator were two couples who did not know each other. The first couple consisted of a big, tall, fat, nerdy, doofus of a white guy with his slender, pretty Indian girlfriend. She was just all over him. Then another couple got on. He was a fit, nice looking guy from India with his fat, dweebish, unappealing white girlfriend. In virtually any other time in history, the white people would not be fat and they would be dating each other. Likewise for the Indians. But now with the obesity epidemic, everything had changed.

Although obesity has afflicted both genders equally, it has a strikingly disparate effect on dating desirability—only mildly hurting men but being absolutely drastic to women.

Therefore, the fat white guy made the obvious and correct choice. Since there are so few thin white girls, he dated a thin Indian girl instead. The handsome fit guy from India, on the other hand, gains only a small advantage by not being fat. Since white guys are poaching the thin women of his ethnicity, he concludes that since he must date a fat girl, at least he'll date a fat white chick.

One Asian Girlfriend Begets Another

The rise of Asian women functions like a positive feedback loop. As more white guys find they can't date a thin white girl, they decide to branch out and try an Asian. Soon, they discover that Asian women make excellent romantic partners. Certainly there are trashy, slutty Asian girls, quite similar to the white club chicks who are often derided in the manosphere, but generally speaking, Asian women are of high quality, with strong sex drives, nice bodies, clean, top-notch pussies, intelligent minds, and good values when it comes to long-term relationships.

There are many men like me who initially did not pursue Asian women very much, but in the search for a girlfriend with a normal body, ended up dating someone Asian and realized how rewarding the relationship can be. As more men have that sort of positive experience, it heightens their interest in future romances with Asians. Also, when you're in a long-term relationship, you begin to forget about your partner's ethnicity. You see your girlfriend as a specific individual, someone you love and care about, not as a member of any particular ethnic group. But if you are dating a fat chick, you never forget that she is fat.

This trend will only continue. With more white-Asian couples out there serving as role models, most of them college educated and upper-middle class, many young men will see this as a way out of the obesity epidemic that plagues their romantic lives. Asian women used to struggle with a dating disadvantage because of their ethnic features. Their eyes looked too narrow to white men, but almost no one talks about that anymore. When I was growing up, you heard lots of private jokes about funny accents and slanty eyes, but now, behind closed doors, the talk about Asian women is how much skinnier they are than the white chicks. Notes to Asian females: (1) Do not adopt our poisonous American diet, and (2) No one cares about the eyes any more. Save your money and don't get plastic surgery. We're looking at your thin waist and your little butt.

Mothers Have Become The Main Source Of Harm To Children

April 1, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Back in 2013, Aurora Snow wrote a letter to her son. For those of you who don't know who she is, Aurora Snow is a retired (aged out) hardcore porn actress with 384 films to her name. In fact, one of the first porno's I ever owned starred Aurora Snow, though I didn't know her name at the time. In Grade 7 a scummy little classmate of mine used to sell stolen DVD's and video games out of his locker. And being a horny little ragamuffin, I bought one of the DVD's; Gangbang Girl 27, starring Aurora Snow, Kami and seventeen well endowed gentlemen.

Regardless, I never knew the name's of the two young women getting a hardcore train run on them until Aurora's letter to her son went viral in 2013. Her letter itself is full of hollow rationalizations. For example, she claims to have done porn because;

> Your mom grew up very, very poor. In early 2000, I was going to school at UC Irvine, and although I was a high school honor roll student, scored high on tests, and spent week after week filling out applications, I was still drowning in student loans.

Aurora obviously doesn't know the meaning of very poor. She grew up in the prosperous town of Santa Maria, California. Money was obviously such a non-issue for her that she went to university instead of scrambling to get a job right out of high school. Poor for Aurora probably means that mommy and daddy didn't get her a new car for her sweet sixteen, or that she didn't have her own television in her bedroom.

She goes on about how the money in the industry was awesome, and the attention given to her made her feel good… essentially the only truthful parts of the letter. Then, at 28, with the wall flying fast at her preternaturally aged Porn & Party body, Aurora suddenly decided it was time to check FAMILY off on her list of Things I Totally Freakin' Deserve.

> I was a free spirit who could pick up and go at a moment's notice, but those feelings faded when I realized what I was missing.

A free spirit who had to be a human dumpster for men in order to buy her next meal. What was beginning to go missing were her youth, looks, demand.

> My priorities shifted. I was no longer the girl willing to do anything, instead I became a woman with a goal. I wanted a family, but first I had to find someone to create that family with. Not an easy task either. A dear friend of mine introduced me to a nice Midwestern farm boy who also happened to be in the entertainment field, creating TV shows. He was warm, charming, and very family-oriented.

I lost all enthusiasm for the more in-depth version of this article I was planning on writing when I read those words. Here is a porn star who freely admits she did everything and anything for money; being gang banged by every ethnic on the planet besides pygmy, receiving hard anal, having two penises in the vagina at the same time, literally guzzling semen… if you had the cash, Aurora would shamelessly do it. And what's her punishment for a life of selfish whoredom? She gets to settle with a genuinely nice man, one who's completely okay with the fact that his wife has had sex with at least 500 different men (though I would not rule out a number closer to four digits), and pops out a son. A literal son of a whore.

After living her 20's like the selfish slut she and most of today's women are, Aurora Snow got to start up a family at 32. She got to have her cake and is now eating it without a single, solitary worry. She's bringing a child into the world who is screwed from the get go. Her letter was written for when her son gets a little older and can actually understand just what a disgusting human being his mother is, but he'll know long before she pulls the letter out for him that he is the son of a literal whore. Kids at his school will be showing him pictures of his mommy getting pummelled by strange men. Her son's childhood will consist of everyone laughing at him, snickering behind his back, questioning his parentage, asking if his mom can come perform at their parties. Images of his mother being gang banged will haunt his psyche forever.

Aurora's son will be the one paying for her selfishness. I suspect her husband down the road will also pay his fair share for giving comfort to a horrendous human being like her, most likely in the form of cuckoldry or a divorce. Lord knows he likely has already contracted a few STD's that came from her dream job. As for Ms. Snow… we all know it; she, herself, will never pay a price for her terrible choices in life. Women never do. Women can sleep with a hundred men, put themselves into tens of thousands of dollars of debt, can lie steal and cheat everyone they come across, spread disease far and wide, party away their 20s's and even a chunk of their 30's and in the end they'll still meet a nice man willing to shower her with unchecked love and affection, not to mention oodles of cash and as many children as it takes to boost her ego. And it's the children which face the shame and consequences of their mother's actions.

A little while ago I wrote an article about a particularly repugnant woman named Rebecca Sparrow who chastised a couple of young mothers, even while she herself is a horrible human being who got to live the life of a party whore and then, at 35, got married to a doctor and started a family at the late age of 37. She writes at length about how horrible her children make her feel for daring to act like children. As Return Of King's founder aptly puts it;

Roosh_V Mod · 2 months ago

The worst part is that in 10 years those kids are going to google their mommy and find a long list of complaints she made about them. You don't need to be a psychologist to imagine the emotional damage it will cause. For them, schoolyard taunts of "your mommy hates you" will be supplied with actual printout evidence.

There's this woman, who's ultra libertarian political ideology caused literal physical harm to her children. She adopted two Haitian children, one boy and one girl, and moved them in with her one year old son. The Haitian boy began physically assaulted her real son. So she gave the Haitian boy back, like he was an unwanted toaster she got for Christmas and returned to Wal Mart for a refund. Her son, in his formative years, lived in a household where a person not of his skin colour physically assaulted him. Do you think he's going to share his mom's multicultural ideology? And will she face any sort of karmic justice because of the harm that resulted from her egotistical adoption?

Fellow ROK contributor Captain Capitalism gives us this example of a single mother whom claimed she couldn't afford a present for her child. So he bought her daughter a present, and then eventually found out the mother splurged on a big screen television for herself.

Runsonmagic brings us Jenny Erikson, a mother who frivolously divorced her husband (who helped with housework, went to church, provided for and was active in their daughter's lives) because of what basically amounts to: hey, why the hell not? Her daughters, who were very young at the time of the divorce, now live in a broken home. And is Jenny facing any harsh penalties for shattering their innocence and sense of family?

The examples of women causing their own flesh and blood children emotional and physical harm are numerous. And these mothers just don't care. And they aren't facing any consequences. A mother can literally kill her daughter and walk away scot free. The vast majority of divorces are initiated by women; to hell with their kids emotional health. The majority of criminals come from single mother homes. Children are far more likely to be sexually abused by the step fathers their mother's shack up with than by any step mother their father's become involved with. Postpartum depression is very common amongst new mothers and is often excused because she just can't help it right? Isn't it all those chemicals? Well…

> Approximately 25% – 85% of postpartum women will experience the "blues" for a few days. Between 7% and 17% may experience clinical depression, with a higher risk among those women with a history of clinical depression. Rarely, in 1 > in 1,000 cases, women experience a psychotic episode, again with a higher risk among those women with pre-existing mental illness. Despite the wide spread myth of hormonal involvement, repeated studies have not linked hormonal changes with postpartum psychological symptoms. Rather, these are symptoms of a pre-existing mental illness, exacerbated by fatigue, changes in schedule and other common parenting stressors.

So many, if not most, mother's spend those first few days after the miracle of birth hating their child because its existence inconveniences hers. It's an open secret that most women are mentally ill to some degree; millions of women in the United States alone are on some kind of anti-depressant or other personality controlling medication. It makes you wonder how many of today's mothers, not so far down, ever stop hating their kids.

On the numerous mommy blogs populating the net, there's a clear and pervasive undercurrent of hate and frustration with the children whom these blogs are supposedly centred around. Mothers write 2000 words about how frustrating they find whatever crime of the day their child did (that little weasel Timmy knocked over my latte and that snot nose Ynattirb drew all over my painting RUSRSLY?!!!): but then they temper it by adding, after all their anger and expletives "yet i love them lol". Like that somehow makes insulting and belittling their children in front of the world okay. If men lived by mom logic, every time our kids caused us the slightest hint of anger we could walk up to them and sucker punch our children to the ground, hoofing them in the gut while they're helpless and so long as we apologize afterwards everything's hunky dory so suck it up champ.

Today, western society has put all the power of a child's well-being and care into the hands of their mothers, with dad legally relegated to a kind of advisory role. And yet the vast majority of women in our current culture are incapable of being decent human beings in regards to themselves: their children stand no chance. Lately we've seen cracks and fissures erupting in the great Social Experiments, foremost amongst them feminism. While the thought that all these idiotic and harmful ideologies will fall within our life time is comforting, the fact remains that the damage to future generations has already been done.

It's being done today, right now, to children all across the west. And the vast majority of those doing the damage…those who are laying the foundations for the failure and frustration of the next generation…are mothers. The women of today are the some of the biggest losers of women that have ever existed at any point in human history. They focus exclusively on themselves and what they want. Their own flesh and blood children are no exception to this selfish rule. And yet we continue to give them near total control of our children to these piss poor examples of motherhood. We're not holding them accountable for the harm they're doing to the most helpless of human beings.

If there is to be any hope for future generations, we need to acknowledge that by default women (especially today's women) are not good mothers. They need to be controlled by and submit to men, and men need to be given the green light to enforce the superior will of man on their families. Misguided people rile about the Patriarchy, but under the patriarchy we created strong, moral societies whose humanism gave the world some of the greatest peace it's ever known, and whose social achievements put us on the moon. Children were raised properly and brought up to be good people, and everyone benefited. Humanity prospered. Society was just, people were happy, and progress wasn't an abstract dream but a wonderful reality.

After only a few decades of Mother's rule our society stands on the brink of a deep darkness. The legacy of feminism and matriarchy is shaping up to be hollow celebrity worship, crony capitalism, mass drug induced escapism, mass poverty and a world where progress is now a hijacked euphemism standing for the tyranny of politically correct demagogues who want to take away the hard fought for rights of individual freedom.

Mother doesn't know best. The great people's of the past knew that, and the women of the modern west have proven it beyond any doubt. It's just a damn shame so many children have to pay the price to prove it.

How To Know If You Should Do Something For A Woman

April 1, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

As the host of the Beige Phillip Show, learned pimp sage Dante Nero continues the work of Patrice O'Neal in his podcast, helping men to GYBB ("get your balls back") in dating, game, and relationships. Dante drops pearls of game wisdom such as "Everybody gets got," "All bitches are crazy" and "Always put yourself first" during this weekly one-hour program on self-development from an intellectual and socio-sexual perspective. Dante himself has slept with over 1000 women and has the wisdom to show for it. This man knows the hustle.

I was working my way through the show's back catalog recently, and was struck by how game knowledge in the manosphere and Dante's wisdom have virtually converged on a particular set of best practices. For example, a listener wrote in to ask this question: "Should I go to church with a chick to get in her pants?"

When I heard this question I immediately blurted out a particular phrase at my computer, and in true Beige/Black Phillip fashion, Dante knocked it out of the park. His advice boiled down to one principle that you cannot forget in your quest to control your frame with women:

"Only if you want to."

Sure, go to the church with the girl, but only if it's something you want to do independently of her request.The reasons for this are twofold. First, subjugating your wants and needs for anyone else makes you a weak person, independent of whether you're doing it for a girl. Second, women have incredible powers of intuition in this area. If you do something you don't want to do, she will invariably sense that you're making an exception for her, which lowers your value in her eyes. Women will only forgive so many of these slip-ups, and the earlier in the interaction you are, the more unforgiving they will be.

"Only if you want to" works so well because women almost never reward a guy who sucks up to them, instead going with the men who are confident and decisive in their self-interested actions. In the days of Black Philip, Patrice used to call this a "righteous" feeling—you have to do it with full confidence because it stems from your needs and desires, and without shame of its potential impact on others. Dante makes the excellent point that even if you get the bang, you've still been pimped because you put your needs second in line just to get some tail. Dante continues:

> "You do not do things to get pussy. You have to understand your value. If a chick falls in love with you, it's because you're loveable. She is not doing you a favor. You have acted in ways that warrant love. Her giving you love is a result. If a bitch says 'Damn you're amazing,' you're right bitch! All she's doing is recognizing what is already there […] I'm not getting goofy because you think I'm loveable. And if you don't, you're just not smart enough to get it."

This concept is a central tenet of game, and gives beginners an excellent guide in many situations where they tend to have difficulty controlling their frame. Nascent players can memorize all the lines in the book and approach aggressively, but only when they realize it's more productive to act in their own self-interest over the long term will they reach the intermediate and advanced stages.

Everybody does things for girls, but make no mistake : even the nicest of niceguys have that feeling in the pit of their stomach, the one that men are taught not to pay attention to, that you only get when you know you're getting played—whether that's giving a girl a ride to see another guy, buying her a drink after just meeting her so she sticks around, or going to some event with her when you'd rather stay home and read a book. In my blue pill days I would smother any prospect with attention because that's what conventional "game" told me was the best practice. Even then, though, I felt deep inside me that what I was doing was counterproductive, but I had no rational framework that allowed me to accept that feeling.

This guiding principle now provides part of that framework. If I'm legitimately having a nice time (especially in a foreign country) I'll buy a drink for a girl, not because I think it will directly help me to seduce her, but rather because I appreciate her company and I enjoy being generous to those who bring me value. I'll buy a girl a gift because I think it will bring her happiness, or call her randomly when I think she needs cheering up. But always because it's something that my will and desires dictate. Women will always respond much more to small tokens delivered in a righteous ways than grandiose gestures that are done from a place of weakness. Dante knows this, Patrice knew it, and the longer you're in the game, the more it will become obvious.

For discussion on this and myriad other game topics, I strongly recommend that you check out the Beige Phillip podcast. Along with Return of Kings and a select few other sites, it's one of the few real-talk resources out there for men looking to elevate their game.

Hanna Rosin's "The End Of Men" Is A Feminist Fairytale

April 1, 2014 | by TylerMilborn | Link | Original Link

You get the feeling after reading Hanna Rosin's The End of Men that the book's title is less of a fact and more the author's hope for the future. You get the impression that men have quit higher education and can't find their place in the new world, and the new economy, leaving women to pick up the pieces. In any event, the death of men has been greatly exaggerated. To call The End of Men a substantial academic work – or just an academic work – would be a mischaracterization. Even Rosin, in response to criticism of her dishonest use of data (more on that later), acknowledges that she's a journalist and no academic; the implication being that journalists shouldn't be held to exacting standards. If only that were true.

The End of Men was first published in 2012 and was generally well-received from publications such as Esquire, The Los Angeles Times, and The Wall Street Journal. This book has a broad scope. It touches on changing sexual dynamics, marriage and the workforce, the raising of children, and even violence. There may not be much of debate as to whether gender-based roles in marriages and relationships are changing (they are, unfortunately) or whether women participate more in the workforce than they did in the 1950s (they do). However, the scope of the cultural shift, whether the shift has benefited women, and Rosin's conclusions regarding how much men have fallen and how much women have risen, are where she gets into trouble.

To really understand this book you have to first know its author. Rosin is a feminist writer, a 40+ married mother of two young boys and a young girl. You can read her at Slate, The Atlantic, and various other publications. The End of Men makes clear that Rosin is a moderately savvy, albeit clumsy, writer who has no problem with manipulating data and anecdotes to support her conclusions. (To think that she has the rare gift of being as dense and ham-handed as Thomas Friedman would be to give her the benefit of the doubt she doesn't deserve.) But before we get there, let me give you two examples of how Rosin thinks men are doing in this new world:

1. "Now the new standards for male waxing and trimming are as stringent as they are for women."

2. "The 1999 movie Office Space was maybe the first to capture how alien and dispiriting this new feminized office park can be for men, and how resistant they are to adapting."

The stupidity of these two observations is obvious. As to the first statement, a woman who doesn't shave or even trim is a pariah, an endangered species (or married… or perhaps Japanese?) which I have never encountered, and a man who goes all-natural isn't likely uncommon. And regarding Office Space, she ignores what the film has to say about the soul-crushing monotony of life in a cubicle so she can fit the rebellion of the men into her feminist slant. To be fair, if all "feminized" offices will look like Initech, then let's burn them all to the ground.

Now, these two claims aren't just a good representation as to how Rosin can get simple trends and concepts absolutely wrong. They are faults in her logic and interpretation, cracks that reveal significant and deeper flaws in the book.

And these flaws are serious. Boston University Law Review has published an essay detailing the damning issues with The End of Men. This essay, written by Philip N. Cohen, concludes that "Rosin's tendency toward exaggeration and misrepresentation as fundamental to [The End of Men's] narrative and crippling to its credibility." Cohen butchers The End of Men, carving out the book's major claims and leaving little meat on the bones. He discredits Rosin's conclusion regarding "young women" earning more than "young men," and he takes apart her assertion that women are "beginning to crowd out" men in the fields of engineering and science. When it's all finished, it's clear that Rosin doesn't have a tendency toward exaggeration – she has a tendency to lie.

In response to this essay, Rosin wrote that she "hesitate[s] to get drawn into data wars." It's too late to complain about data wars after she fired the first shots. On a broader level, Rosin has an obligation to her readers to not misrepresent data in such a dishonest manner. To paraphrase Christopher Hitchens, writers who break that pact are to be despised.

Enter the dubious anecdotes

When Rosin isn't massaging statistics, she's giving us supposedly real-life stories on men who just can't cut it and the women who are making things happen. We see heroic single mothers, sexually liberated coeds, and young female professionals supporting their lazy boyfriends. But now that it's been established that Rosin is loose with the facts, what's to be made of these anecdotes?

First, they must be viewed skeptically. If Rosin misrepresents hard data, what's stopping her from manipulating – or even bullshitting – the numerous anecdotes in The End of Men? The question answers itself. Second, even if these anecdotes are true, so what? As Cohen said, "the story cannot survive on its colorful illustrations alone."

The faults don't stop there. One chapter in The End of Men is dedicated to young single girls mastering the hook-up. In Rosin's world, female participation in "hook up culture" isn't a misuse of valuable resources, a trade-off that favors men. It's empowering. Unencumbered with "the old-fashioned burden of protecting their reputations," women are newly "dominant" in the dating market and men are losing the "dating wars."

Bullshit. Though it can be said that women in the West have historically controlled the dating market by having the option choosing one suitor among many, women lose their control – and thus their dominance – when sex is cheap. Rosin writes that empowerment is there because a woman doesn't have to use sex to achieve the ends of financial security and social status; she can achieve these things herself. However, she does concede that this cheapens sex to "bargain basement levels," lessening the value of return sex has for women, and leading to women not getting, or at least putting off, the love and lifelong commitment that they ultimately desire. If that's a win for women, I'd hate to see what a loss looks like.

Women have less power than Rosin thinks

Supposedly tired of hooking up, one undergraduate is quoted as saying, "[What I really want is] some guy to ask me out on a date to the frozen yogurt place." These are the words of a girl who's playing a man's game according to a man's rules. And she's losing.

But Rosin doesn't just get the wrong read on young women. She also has a poor understanding of what men like and want. Perhaps she doesn't understand men because there's a lack of masculinity in her marriage and in her social circles. Rosin writes that she had a strong-willed mother, and perhaps she inherited her mother's need for control. She claims provider husbands have been resentful about carrying the whole economic load, when in fact men obtain fulfillment when they provide for their families. (To her credit, she recognizes that provider women can be resentful that they're the ones providing.) Rosin says the modern married man is "relieved to have a wife he can talk to about work or politics or anything else that interests him." Relief rarely comes in the form of talking to your wife about your day at work.

For all the above-mentioned issues, Rosin is the most out of her depth when she's writing about economics. You can't help but roll your eyes when she says that "women are like the Kia cars of the workforce." She claims female CEOs are more "highly prized" because "they outearned their male counterparts by 43 percent, on average" in 2009. You'd think that if female CEOs were so highly prized there'd be more of them. Yet, in the study she cites, there were only 16 female CEOs in America's top 500 companies. And according to Forbes, a few outliers skewed the results of this (never a good idea to compare the salaries of 16 women versus 484 men). This time, instead of changing the results of the data, she's merely using a poor study to support her narrative.

When women do well at work, Rosin thinks it's because the economy rewards their inherent strengths. When they do poorly, or don't succeed as much as they supposedly should, it's because the ambition of women is killed at an early age. This repeats the discredited myth, as noted in Christina Hoff Summers' The War Against Boys, that girls get shortchanged in schools and leave adolescence defeated. Rosin then goes on about how workplaces are getting feminized and how feminization of business is a necessary and good thing, examples of successful male-run companies be damned. Somehow, having more women in the workforce means "fewer pointless risks." You begin to wonder how Rosin distinguishes between "risks" and "pointless risks." She never gets there.

Now, I won't dispute that the workplace is becoming less masculine. But the reason for this change may not be due to economics. There has been a war on masculinity for years. The U.S. Department of Education has contracted with activists who think little league games encourage aggressive, violent behavior. Boys are encouraged to play with dolls, all for the sake of teaching children that gender norms, i.e. the natural desires of boys, are abnormal. When masculine behaviors are considered pathology, it's no wonder that there's a move away from them.

In closing, Rosin rehashes her unconvincing "imaginary comic book duo," first presented in the introduction, of Plastic Woman and Cardboard Man. Cardboard Man is a merely an unchanging relic. But Plastic Woman performs "superhuman feats of flexibility," and, through her "Napoleonic" appetite, "gobbles up new territory as she hangs onto the old." Well, how does Rosin want it? Plastic pertains to an ability to be molded by an outside force, but it cannot expand itself to gain new territory. Or maybe Plastic Woman is actually made of plastic? Who the fuck knows? Any way you have it, the metaphor – and ultimately The End of Men – falls on its face.

4 Lies Men Are Being Told About Women

April 2, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

We've all been there—at the bar with our buddies talking about our wives and girlfriends and the endless bullshit they yap about. Eventually one of them recites one of the many of the ridiculous relationship maxims Western men have been brainwashed to follow: "Welp, ya know what they say! Happy wife, happy life!" Like mindless drones, we all nod in agreement and pathetically clank our beers to reinforce the falsehood.

What we don't realize is that these tenets are not only untrue, but their application is best used by women when dealing with the men in their lives. These fables are so deeply woven into the fabric of the male psyche, it rarely occurs to us to flip the script and apply these credos to ourselves. And don't get it twisted, gentlemen, this has affected all of us. From men who are new to the red pill to those who swallowed it a long time ago, no man is completely immune to the effects of these tall tales cloaked as wisdom.

It’s not easy to deprogram the male mind from defaulting to the “execute feminine imperative in any and all situations” setting. Be that as it may, the first step in ridding your brain of these viruses is pragmatically breaking down the most prevalent aphorisms so as to render them transparent and subsequently fictitious.

“If mama ain’t happy, nobody’s happy” is another variation of this fallacy. In other words keeping your wife or girlfriend happy by focusing all your energies on her needs and wants according to how she’s feeling at that very moment promises happiness for both parties, while any deviation from this all but guarantees misery. This adage is by far the most damaging because of the money, time, and emotion that men invest trying to adhere to it. More importantly, it causes men to neglect many of their own needs such as physical fitness, financial shrewdness, and overall self improvement. Living by this unhealthy pattern ultimately turns you into a supplicating pile of mush waiting on your woman hand and foot while apologizing to her for her cheating. But hey, she’s gotta be happy right?

This, of course, is another classic example of women assuming that what works for men also works for them. A man getting attention from attractive women turns them on so they brag about all the “guys who are texting me” because surely, the laws of attraction are symmetrical. A ball-busting, wise cracking egomaniac with a devil-may-care attitude moistens her panties so the same thing is a sure fire boner maker right? You get the idea.

This experiment, however, proves that the “happy wife” proverb is not only false, but it applies directly to men:

> "Everywhere this article has been reported on they leave out the obvious, critical detail: WOMEN don't react well to always being agreed with by men. If the experiment had been done with the opposite approach (wife agrees with hubby) it could go on for years because both of them would come to find it satisfying and pleasant."

Men are simple creatures. All it really takes to keep us around these days is regular sex with minimal bitchiness and neuroticism. Sprinkle in an air of agreeability and you've got yourself a happy man. An American woman's definition of happiness is a moving target and it's proving increasingly impossible to hit. Accommodating her ever changing whims is quite the opposite of what keeps her coming back for more. Dread, jealousy, and outright cockiness is the recipe to keeping your girl hot for you. Replacing the word "wife" with "hubby" makes this a real nugget 'o knowledge but don't hold your breath for that amendment.

"Women age like a fine wine"

As recently pointed out, women don't handle rejection well. This axiom is the manifestation of that reality. Women simply do not age well. Sure, there are a few exceptions to the rule. If a woman takes care of herself by staying fit, eating clean, not smoking, not drinking excessively, not riding the cock carousel, and has good DNA there's a small chance she could look good into her early to mid thirties. But odds are Father Time will collect his debt for having afforded her a decade of absolute power over men. That said, the idea that a 38 year old woman is more sexually attractive than a 21 year old because she's "like a fine wine" and has "more experience" is laughable.

Regardless of how many women tell a 33 year old former party girl she's a great catch because of her great job, her impressive diversified portfolio, and her Masters Degree, she knows that her SMV (sexual market value) is determined by her physical beauty and not much else. She also knows that each passing year lowers her SMV, which means she will experience increasing rejection (directly or indirectly) from the opposite sex. Her inability to handle rejection will push her to the "fine wine" canard to cope with her decreasing desirability.

The problem with this coping mechanism is that it doesn't apply to her sex. It applies to men. Men age much better than women. Not only do we age better aesthetically, our experience also increases our SMV as the years go by. Sex, traveling, and education are just a few things that supplement our increasing attractiveness as we get older. An older woman with a PhD, thousands of frequent flier miles, and a porn star-worthy notch count is far from being a fine wine. She's probably closer to a half empty domestic light beer that's been sitting in the fridge for a few weeks teetering on the edge of undrinkability.

Beta males would never argue against this motto in front of women and more often than not they will outright support it while choosing to remain ignorant of the fact that it applies to men. People don’t think of men aging like a fine wine because wine generally has a feminine connotation. Further, replacing the word “wine” with “beer” (which has a masculine connotation) makes the saying false because beer does not age well and is almost never referred to as “fine”. Mix that grammatical breakdown with the typical mid thirties woman who, by this point in her life has a well-fed entitlement monkey and a bionic rationalization hamster, it’s no wonder no one has ever publicly challenged this statement or turned it on its head.

This phrase is particularly egregious because your woman is not your better half. She is generally unaware of anything outside of herself, she is more impulsive than you, and she is a slave to her emotions. Hardly the characteristics of a better half and those are just scratching the surface of the ocean of frailties she has. Tragically, the Anglosphere is rampant with men who proudly declare this self deprecating slogan that simultaneously emasculates them and pedestalizes their women.

While women love getting the initial kudos (you go gurrl!!) that come with being labeled “the better half”, they are ill equipped to live up to the title and they know it. Deep down, they’re not looking for an inferior mate. She’s looking for a man whose perceived value is higher than hers. When a man verbally acknowledges that his woman is superior to him in any way, even with a seemingly harmless expression like this one, she loses attraction for him even if his value is higher than hers. Uttering this phrase whether in her presence or not psychologically lowers your worth in her eyes. Say it enough times and her vagina will dry up like the Sahara. You’ll also notice her increasing attachment to her phone (that would be her actively looking for an upgrade—a better half).

How are women better served by endorsing this terminology? This one's obvious: Men are physically superior, more intelligent, more logical, take more risks, are better providers, aren't governed by our emotions (which has proven to be extremely dangerous), and are much better with money. The list goes on but those traits alone show that men are the undisputed better half—especially within the context of a sexual relationship with a woman.

Girls don't want to be superior to their men. In fact, when the responsibility of leading the relationship falls on them they fold like a bad hand at poker. They simply cannot handle it. If you want a steady diet of hilarity in your life, hang out with a couple whose relationship is lead by the woman. If you're wearing your red pill glasses you'll be stifling laughter the entire time.

If women acknowledged their men as their better halves it would psychologically keep them in their place as far as the sexual hierarchy of their union goes. Everybody wins.

"My wife is the boss"

I've been in sales for the better part of the last 15 years and I've heard every reason under the sun as to why they can't or won't buy. I'm ultra competitive by nature so when I don't get the sale it's a bit of a blow to my ego. Comes with the territory. But the one objection that frustrates me more than anything is when a man says to me "Well I've gotta run this by the boss" referring to his significant other. Some men even flat out tell me they have to get permission from their wives. When I hear this I feel like jamming the red pill down their beta throats, but I digress.

This cliché is similar to the "better half" in that the more you say it, the more life you breathe into it. Remember, women make horrible bosses and if she's in charge of financial decisions you're headed for trouble and blue balls.

On the other hand, women love being owned by a man. They adore, respect, and love a man who is in charge. Back in my beta days I talked to many girls who loved nothing more than to unabashedly brag about the fact that their man was in complete control. This made them happy and relaxed from relief that the decisions are being made by the real boss.

What has to be done?

There are many more of these ludicrous slogans buried subliminally in the Anglo culture. They all vary depending on the context and medium they're presented in but each and every one of them has one underlying design and purpose: to advance the feminine initiative while making the needs of men insignificant. Unfortunately women and men alike have bought into the message and it's crippling relations between the sexes. Men aren't absolved of blame either—we have to do our part by shaking ourselves free of these pseudo edicts by not fortifying said conjectures with our approval. That would be something worth raising our glasses to.

A Modern American Dinner

April 2, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

I met her last week, an internet girl in a city where the girls on the internet are actually attractive. Cute, thin and nice she put on a good front at first. I slept with her within three hours of meeting, but I don't judge a girl based solely on how fast I sleep with her. Be it irrational confidence or a blinded hamster rationalization on my part, I consider it more my skills than her level of promiscuity.

For our second meet I was lured over with the fact that her roommates were cooking dinner for her birthday weekend. Home cooked meal, I'm in. When I arrive she answers in sweats and a t-shirt. Sigh. It used to be that girls would wait until marriage to be "comfortable." Then it became when you were seriously dating. These days it apparently sets in on date two.

Upon entering the apartment, I meet her two roommates. The first is fat, second is obese. Neither are girls you would have sex with, even after digesting a barrel of moonshine.

One more person is present, a pretty decent looking guy (no homo). There's no way he's with either of them that would be ridic…he is dating the obese one. Shocked I sit down to dinner. I can't even concentrate on the conversations because I want to grab this guy, slap him in the face and direct him to the Roosh forum or ROK. My girl puts on a trucker hat that says "birthday bitch" on it and proceeds to tell everyone how fucked up she got this weekend. My attraction towards her continues to plummet fast.

Obese one starts talking about a guy at the bar who "wouldn't leave her alone," kept telling her how beautiful she was and wanted to buy her drinks. Fat one regales us with the story of the guy she went out with four times and then sent flowers to her work, and now she's cutting him off because that's "creepy." They tell me dinner is from a recipe in a book called 50 Shades of Chicken. Seriously. I am at a loss for words.

Finish dinner and the girls tell me to go relax as they put away the dishes. At least one sane occurrence so far. However obese girl's ~~bitch~~ man without solicitation cleans up and then starts making dessert. I give up trying to figure this guy out.

Of course they want to watch some reality TV. But not just any reality show, one about male gigolos who have sex with disgustingly fat or old women for money. These girls are loving the show, as is homeboy who apparently has zero self-worth by dating/banging this land whale. I want to gouge my eyes out and it shows, as the girls outwardly say how they're making a bad impression on me. Yet they just laugh and continue with another episode.

My girl sends a text and puts her phone face down. But she doesn't even really care that much to be sly. She starts texting another dude about when they are meeting again…right in front of me as my hand is rubbing her vagina. Girls have zero shame these days, it's remarkable.

I considered just leaving, but I was quite horny, needed my release since I don't masturbate, and physically I was attracted to the girl I came to see so I'll let her serve her purpose. I looked at her and felt sorry, the potential of such a cute girl wasted because of her misguided belief and consequent embracing of how modern women are happier being slutty and independent. Or whatever guides her and most other Western girls' actions these days.

The girls start going to their separate rooms but not before fat one tells obese one and her guy to keep it down during sex. That visual gets burned in my mind, sometimes I wish I stayed plugged in to the matrix. My girl checks her phone a few more times, we bang it out and when we're done she makes sure to casually mention it's time for me to get going. I had no desire of staying but it's good to know the masculinization of women has no boundaries.

Before I go to sleep I replay the night in my head. My first thought was what a bizarro world we live in where obese women have guys fighting for them and girls just use men for sex. My second thought was much worse. I realized this is no longer bizarre, it just is.

Why Men Need Dumber Women

April 2, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

The winds of change are blowing against feminism. Mainstream media is starting to shudder with the pre-tremors of a major earthquake set to bring feminism crashing down like a badly built high rise with weak foundations.

A new book by Susan Patton a Princeton graduate, called Marry Smart, advises its (female) readers to find smart and presumably ambitious men to marry. I haven't read the book myself as needless to say I am not seeking a husband, but her tome has set off a firestorm of scandal online, as women writhe in the throes of their first encounter with a little red pill truth.

I came across an interview with Ms. Patton while browsing The Wall Street Journal. It's women's stuff, but surprisingly refreshing to hear her candid and honest interview. Red pill seems to have a solid female ally.

She says women (if they want children) ought to look for smart men to marry while they are still in college and be prepared to commit to a solid relationship. The interviewer asks her outright if she thinks that feminism of the 80s and 90s gave bad advice.

She replies:

> "I think feminism has poisoned young women in so many regards. [It] has suggested to young women that they don't need men, that they shouldn't want men, that they should go it alone, that men are the enemy. This is terrible advice."
> "The genders are SO not equal and to tell our young women you are just the same as men.. you are not identical to men…"
> "…Men have an unlimited window of opportunity to get married and have children…. "

She goes on to tear apart one of our favorite punch bags, Sheryl Sandberg the COO of Facebook.

> "She is misguided. She is a very privileged woman who has come into great success through very many privileges and opportunities not afforded to most women.
> "For her to say that women need to work harder is terrible advice. Women don't need to work harder …. they need to stop being so politically correct."

Just as well with Sheryl deciding to redefine the English dictionary by trying to ban the use of the word bossy when referring to a woman. How this crap makes it to the pages of any decent publication, let alone Bloomberg that is meant to be home of serious financial news is beyond me. At least Murdoch is dropping a few red pills but The Wall Street Journal can only go so far in 2014; if you extrapolate the advice to women: "Marry Smart" it has many implications.

A man doesn't need a bossy MBA career troll in her mid to late 30s barging into his life and telling him what to do, demanding children although her best years are over, and ignoring the fact that due to spending more than a decade trying to be a man, she now has absolutely no idea how to run a happy and settled family home, much less support a working husband that enables her to be a real and proper stay-at-home mom.

Take it one stage further and throw a red pill alpha male into the mix and you see that if a man should decide that he wants to have a family, he's going to want and expect to pair up with a committed, loyal and submissive female that makes his life easier not more difficult.

Running a family home and having children is a massive undertaking in and of itself. The last thing a guy needs is a woman that has little skill in that area or gets depressed because she misses the excitement and validation of her past life and career. Since many women end up in bossy middle management roles, they start trying to build a home life with a man they see more as an employee, barking instructions at him, micromanaging him, and treating him like the office janitor, not a cherished king of his domain.

This is where dumber women step in. Women without college degrees and self-important careers are generally more skilled in the home-making department. What they lack in intellect they can make up for with bedroom and cooking skills (neither of which require formal training or a high IQ). What they lack in qualifications and career experience they can make up for with years of hands on experience taking care of nephews, nieces, neighbor's kids, baby sitting and so on.

If a woman wants to marry smart as Susan Patton suggests, she certainly doesn't need a college degree. Although campuses might prove quite good hunting ground for bright ambitious men, it's expensive and complicated to go to university. Far cheaper to simply date guys that are at top colleges without actually attending.

To marry smart a woman doesn't need many skills beyond looking her best, being choosey about whom she dates, and absolutely demanding about who she gets into bed with. Women can be quite useful and productive in certain work places. Pursuits like hospitality, tourism, nursing, childcare should be good on a woman's resume pre-marriage and it would give her something to do if she needs to pad out family income or once the kids grow up. If I ever did want to get into another LTR, that's what I'd be looking for. That's what any red pill guy would be looking for. Here we are back in the 1950s.

Girls in their 30s, in some bullshit office career, with a truck load of student debt, no asset to speak of, parents that are divorced, cheesy friends, and smartphone addiction, as you can find in most US and EU cities, are not worth having. They're never going to be able to marry smart, and it's about time they realized it. Once these whispers hitting the mainstream media begin to make waves in female circles, it will rapidly turn into a tidal wave of new fashion.

There used to be finishing schools and debutantes balls for girls coming of age to prepare for marriage. They were schooled in being polite, submissive and having home making skills. Suddenly English Lit and Gender Studies is going to drop off the map and home cooking, basic medical training, childcare and massage will jump to the top of the list? Men are no longer sucked into LTRs just because there is a sniff of pussy on the menu, so suddenly women will have to start providing “marriage resumes” if they ever hope to have a traditional family life. We all know how competitive and bitchy girls can get with each other, so I can only imagine where this will go if men start demanding what they deserve.

A tremendous amount of effort goes into putting a family together and both sides know full well the tragedy of pulling it apart. The saddest thing about feminism and it’s ‘terrible advice for young women’ is that it’s landed women in a pointless competitive struggle with men, which many girls freely admitted to not wanting. We could list literally pages of scientists, businessmen, bankers, political leaders, artists and so forth that have been pulled down by the poor quality women in their lives. Had women been encouraged to stand up alongside their men and embraced the very necessary female role in a man’s life; instead of divorce stats through the roof, millions of children brought up without a clear and present father and man’s lives mired in social and ‘relationship’ issues, humanity might have progressed further.

The family unit ought to provide the support system for a man. It gives him a little social life outside his work, children that love and adore him, a comfortable home to return to, and while the home is the woman’s domain and she might take charge of it, there always needs to be a ‘man of the house’. Who knows what some of those very intelligent (yet slightly beta) men might have accomplished if they hadn’t run into the brick wall of feminism and divorce.

Protein Bars Are Worse Than Candy

April 3, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

When I first became interested in health, I thought protein bars and power bars would be a good substitute for snaking. Over time I've found they don't help with weight loss, or building muscle, and actually drain your energy. After looking at the ingredients it's clear why.

1. Soy Protein

Soy protein is TERRIBLE for men. It will fuck with your hormones to the point where it has actually been known to make children start puberty earlier. The amount of estrogen in a couple cups of soy milk is equivalent to three to five birth control pills. The next time you see a someone eating soy protein after a workout, just imagine them reaching into their girlfriends purse and popping her birth control pills like M&Ms.

Nearly all protein bars have soy protein in them. Seriously, it's in everything. It's in Cliff Bars, Builders Bars, Luna Bars, Zone Bars, Balance Bars, Special K Bars, ProMax Bars, SoyJoy Bars (duh), and some Met-Rx bars. In most grocery stores, it's hard to find more than five protein bars WITHOUT soy in them.

And it’s not just protein bars. Government subsidies have made soy such a cheap form or protein that soy turns up in everything. While traveling, I went to get my protein fix through good ol’ fashioned beef jerkey, which listed “HIGH IN PROTEIN” right on the front. When I went to check the ingredients on the back, at the top of the list was “SOY PROTEIN ISOLATE.” After diluting the natural protein with preservatives, they had to add soy protein to the beef jerky to get that “high in protein” listed on the front.

Instead of labeling it “beef jerky” they might as well call it “estrogen pellets.”

2. Toxic Ingredients

So you’re going to avoid soy with traditional Whey Protein, right? Not so fast. Most whey protein is sourced from cows that have been fed corn, antibiotics, and the evil feminist plot that is soy. The milk, meat, and protein those cows produce is going to contain all the unhealthy ingredients they ate.

Unless you get whey protein that has been sourced from organic grassfed cows (which does exist) or non-soy based vegan protein, you'll be taking in all the toxicity of a factory farm. Because of this, whey has been linked to inflammation and long term health problems. However, like bacon and other factory farmed meats, the real problem is the toxicity created by the food industry.

Even bars listed as all-natural often come loaded with a bundle of unsafe, unhealthy artificial ingredients, including those typically found in candy bars. At the top of the list is high fructose corn syrup, better known as…

3. Sugar

Energy bars are manufactured for taste, not nutrition. The food industry understands that most people don't want to make real changes to their diet, they just want to feel healthy while eating the same thing they've been eating. You'll be hard pressed to find a major energy bar with under 20 grams of sugar.

Most protein bars have as much high fructose corn syrup as a Snickers bar. In fact, Snickers bars are listed has having 27g of sugar, and making their sugar content lower than some major protein bars.

It's so bad, Snickers released their own energy bar.

And why not? All they had to do was add some of that yummy soy protein that makes your daughter grow boobs two years younger to their bestselling candy bars.

Often bars will be listed as “low-sugar,” when they actually have 29g of sugar alcohol (I’m looking at you, CarbRite bars). Read the full ingredients – 4g of sugar doesn’t mean it won’t leave you feeling like the day after a five year old’s Halloween candy binge.

4. Carbs

You need a certain amount of carbs to build muscle. Most of the carbs found in protein bars are sugary, or toxic. Unless you’re trying to bulk so hard you don’t care what you eat, the carbs in protein bars are going to hurt more than help. You’d be just as healthy getting your carbs from Snickers bars, since they basically have the same ingredients.

Even the healthier protein bars usually have flour and grains. The rush of energy cause by sugar quickly gives way to a crash caused by the other ingredients. If you really need your carbs right after working out, have a shake or bring a bag of cashews with you.

I’ll admit, a few protein bars have nuts in them, which are healthy. But so do Snickers.

5. Price

Protein bars are expensive, especially if you plan to make them a part of your daily workout food. At 2-4$ a bar, they quickly add up to the the cost of a full meal eating out. Which would you rather have – three protein bars or a full steak burrito?

Compare the cost of a box of protein bars to a bag of Snickers. The ingredients are basically the same plus protein, but Snickers are well under a dollar each. Is there really 2$ worth of toxic whey or soy protein going into these bars, or do food marketers just know people will pay extra to feel healthy?

Save your money. If you want carbs, get sweet potatoes, if you want protein, get a clean organically sourced protein powder or grass-fed beef, and if you want snacks…

Make Your Own Protein Bars

It’s not hard. You can find hundreds of recipes online. My personal favorite are these protein cookies. Everything in them is healthy, and designed to increase strength and balance your hormones. Mix all the ingredients in a bowl, plop them on a cookie tray, and bake.

Most recipes combine powder or chopped material – protein, nuts, flax seed, health supplements, dried fruit – with a bonding agent to hold it together – water, almond milk, coconut oil, or almond butter. Put a layer of shredded coconut or chopped almonds on top and it’ll start to look like a fine desert, but with the health content of a morning shake.

Once you’ve got the hang of it, it’s really easy to and customize them for your needs. Want to balance hormones or increase sex drive? Add maca to your recipes. Want more than the 13-20g protein found in most bars? Just add more. (Note: high heat can break down whey protein, so use non-soy vegetable based protein when cooking, or make them cold.) Want more healthy fats? Use almond butter, coconut oil, or eggs.

If you can’t cook or find a woman to cook for you, you can always go back to sugar-coated estrogen pellets, or dipping Snickers in soy milk. But, if you want to eat healthy, avoid store bought protein bars, and make your own.

The Epidemic Of Flaking

April 4, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

As men take the red pill, and begin to learn game, most go through several road bumps on their path from basement-dwelling nerd to panty-moistening Lothario. It is certainly not an overnight process to become one.

From my own experience, and reading the stories of others, most men have issues even talking to girls – whether it be day game or night game. There is a period when one must endure mostly, if not outright, rejection. If the man survives this time, he eventually moves into the realm of having more substantial conversations when talking to women. While maybe those conversations go somewhere, most are dead leads.

Eventually, the man starts to generate real leads and gets legitimate phone numbers. Some of the women text back, some don't. However, if a man can persevere through learning to approach, leading a conversation, and number closing, he will eventually start to get some good leads with girls that are willing to go on a date with him. Then, the next bump in the road hits.

The flake.

The flake is simply another tool in a woman's arsenal to get the validation she craves from men without having to give anything in return. Much like American courtship in general, the phrase "give and take" simply does not apply – with the female taking 100% of the benefits and giving 0% of them in return to the male suitor.

Recently I wrote an article on my personal blog about how a woman's own sexual marketplace value is directly dictated by her ability to get a man.

> In the animal kingdom that we live in, status is king. The value of the man she obtains directly impacts the female, and dictates her own worth in society. Naturally, everyone wants to be at the top of the hierarchy, looking down upon everyone else. Females are naturally incredibly competitive creatures, especially amongst themselves. They want to show off, stab each other in the back for personal gain, and be more valuable to male's than all of their friends. This is exactly why you see the hot chicks with ugly friends.

A woman's sexual value will directly impact her self esteem. When a woman flakes, she was essentially using the man as a way to prop up her value, or at least confirm it to her inner self. If you think about it, it actually makes good sense. A woman is able to keep her value, therefore, her self esteem stays high. It is a vicious cycle in which thirsty men are feeding into it. This creates an epidemic – a disease spreading far and wide with no real cure.

Actually though, there is a cure. And it's quite simple.

To combat flaking, you simply cannot care. While you might not get your notch, perhaps the next guy to come across a girl will not have to deal with her flaking on him. Flaking is so bad, that it's not uncommon for seasoned players to set up 2-3 dates within a few hours of each other, so that if one falls through, you have someone to fall back on. This promotes outcome independence, which is catnip for a woman.

When I was dating consistently, if I planned a date for a Saturday, I would set up no less than two dates. I noticed that the flakes became less, simply because when I was making these plans, I came across as not giving a shit – because I didn't. Why would I, knowing that I would be seeing a minimum of two different girls that day? It never occurred to them to flake on me because they could sense I wouldn't care. Therefore, the entire self-esteem boost I talked about earlier is essentially taken away from them. Without "getting" 100% of the benefits (my attention), the desire to flake dropped significantly.

Granted, there are many other ways to combat flaking – if you poke around sites like this and the manosphere in general, you will find enough content written on flakes to make your eyes bleed. However, the key to remember is this: whoever cares less in a relationship has all the power.

The lesson is, then, to care less than she does. Setting up multiple dates is an easy way to accomplish just that. Plus, if you get laid on the first date and reek of sex on the second, it is completely in your advantage. The second girl will smell another woman on you, and she will be putty in your hands, waiting to spread her legs for you. Yup, welcome to American dating.

Is The U.S. Military Run By Beta Males?

I watched from a distance the frustration of a field grade officer when he had to put on a helmet, belt and ballistic eye wear to enter an army maintenance yard. His face revealed his shock at having to follow the rules meant for common soldiers. Then it changed to curiosity as he tried to don his reflective belt. His first attempt covered up his oak leaf. His second attempt covered up his skill and combat badges. Finally, like Goldilocks, he found the just right median the third time draping his neon yellow sash over his shoulder. He seemed content that he found a way not to cover his rank or cool badges so everyone could see how important he was. He then began wandering aimlessly looking for ways to assert his authority. At this time I realized that the military is run by beta men.

I know if my boss told me to lay down next to a shot up corpse so he could gauge its living height, I would refuse. According to “Mark Owen’s” book No Easy Day, this happened after the Osama bin Laden raid. Admiral McCraven had one of the Navy Seals lie next to the body to guesstimate its height. For all the elitism and toughness of Navy Seals, this obedience was surprisingly immediate. Remember that this service member is the pinnacle of what the “tip of the spear” in the US military is.

Remember all the retired generals that came out against the Iraq War? None of them spoke up while they were still in. That golden retirement at four stars trumps any form of disagreement with the political bosses. This same concept of “yesmanship” is apparent in other programs such as women in combat, weapons procurement, and other social engineering projects tried in the military. A great example of this would be the Marine Corps’ now dead Expeditionary Fighting Vehicle project. The generals behind that program did a complete 180 when it was cut and toed the party line that such a vehicle was unnecessary.

This betaness extends outside the realm of military operations and support. One has to remember that General Petraeus' downfall was the result of generals doing favors for housewives. A Tampa socialite got General Allen to write her a letter in a civil case. Another woman took offense to a perceived competitor for general officer access and began stalking. When the FBI got involved, it was discovered this other woman was a lover of David Petraeus. He resigned as head of the CIA. It would have been better if he stayed till he got fired. It would have been interesting to see him prosecuted for something he crushed so many soldiers in the 101st Airborne Division with his general letters of reprimand for adultery. Remember, these acts occurred while he was on active duty, and he is still drawing the retirement check so the Uniform Code of Military Justice has jurisdiction. But alas, such rules don't apply to those with the shiny stars as is demonstrated here.

In conclusion, it seems the hierarchy of obedience is used by betas to exert authority they would never have in the corporate world. One merely has to see a commander get hen-pecked by his obese wife to see this. Even better are those whose wives are banging that alpha PFC who works in the motor pool. They really illuminate this concept.

19 Tips On How To Get Over Your Ex-Girlfriend

April 4, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Ah the dreaded oneitis. Damn you oneitis. Damn you to the grave! If you're like me and have ever been bitten by this dreaded bastard of a 'disease', then you know it's probably up there with one one of life's biggest trials. Getting over the ex: how the hell does one do this the most effectively?

To start, let me explain exactly what oneitis is. Oneitis is quite simply put, an emotional reaction to a relationship with a girl, whether real or imagined.

I included 'imagined' in the definition because some men grow attached and put a certain girl on a pedestal who they've never even been in a relationship with. Remember that 'special' girl in high school who you fawned over? You thought she was the most pretty and unique woman in the world and you grew infatuated with having the chance to be with her? That's oneitis.

The most common form of oneitis is, when you date a girl, which could be for a few months or few years, and you make the same assumptions: she's 'the one' for you, she's the most unique girl and usually you are extremely attracted to her. This is dangerous territory to be in and I'll explain why.

As you are increasingly with a girl spending time together, having sex and living life, you get dopamine hits in your brain in the early stages of the relationship. This can lead to feelings of 'falling in love' and a bond is created, whether a real bond or imagined. A man can start to rely on the woman for those happy feelings (i.e. dopamine hits). There have been studies done that show sex and infatuation can provide 'hits' much like doing hard drugs. Once you get 'hooked' on the girl, guess what? Yep, you guessed it. You have to be around her more and more to get those hits.

What most men, or I should say average men do, is essentially put all of their eggs in one basket. They rely on that ONE girl to provide them emotional 'hits' of happy feelings and also rely solely on that one girl for their sexual pleasure. What this does is provide a severe imbalance in the relationship. While the girl could be getting 'addicted' to you as well (there have been studies showing after frequent sex with the same man, a girl's body will actually crave that same man sexually), the reality is that the average man's behavior becomes needy and dependent, both of which turn a girl off sexually and emotionally.

In my case, I invested so much time, energy, money and emotions into a girl who wasn't even worthy, nor ready for a LTR, that when she dumped me, it crumbled my world.

This is my point: slow down, get to know the girl slowly, think with your cranium and not your cock, limit your time with her, and make her invest more into it than you. While there's no magic formula that I'm going to drop on you, because time is the greatest healer, I am going to show you a process that can help the amount of time needed to get over your ex diminish.

Getting Over Your Ex: What The Hell To Do?

There are multiple steps involved with this process and every single one of them are necessary. It will not work if you decide to skip a step and do it your way.

1. Delete her phone number and ANY social media contact: Facebook, Instagram, Twitter, etc.

2. Block her on all forms of social media.

3. Call your phone provider and block her number (or do it through your smartphone).

4. Throw away anything that could remind you of her: pictures, gifts, etc..

5. Delete any photos or videos of the two of you and her off of your phone and computer. Empty the trash and save nothing.

6. Take a break from any social events where you could run into her. Steer clear.

7. Take out your calender and plan a getaway for yourself for 1 month out. This should give you enough time to get off work for a day or two. The idea to is get away for 3-4 days, or essentially a 3-day weekend if you work a regular 9-5 type job.

8. Book a trip for 1 month out. Use a credit card, some savings (don't blow it all, but within reason), whatever you need to do to book the trip.

9. If you don't workout, then immediately go to your local gym and sign up. If you don't have a local gym or are tight on cash, The Alpha Playboy has exercise routines that you can do at home. Start the program. Start working out. Exercise reduces stress in your body and releases endorphins which will make you feel better. Most guys slack on workouts after getting dumped, but you're not most guys. You're an Alpha Playboy In Development.

10. Spend 1 hour a day reading the RVF, specifically, the Game Threads. Read and absorb. This will help you make sense of Game etc.

11. If you had cut off your guy friends due to the LTR, then immediately re-connect and set up multiple plans with each friend to meet them and buy them a drink. You cut them off, so now you should apologize and re-start the friendship.

12. START GAMING. I know you don't feel like it, and you almost can't even comprehend how any girl could be as good as your ex, but this is key. Open your mouth and start talking to one girl a day no matter what. I don't care if they're average looking, or not your type, open your mouth, and spit some Game. If you're lost on what to do, Section II of this book covers Day Game and my other books cover everything from Gaming in Clubs, to Strip Clubs and How To Fuck A Girl.

13. Have sex with another girl as soon as possible. If you have an old fuck buddy who you used to bang before your ex, then get in contact and get your dick wet. Have sex. You might feel terrible afterwards, but trust me it gets better and is necessary.

14. Have sex with 10 girls. Now obviously I get it, it's not that easy to just go have sex with 10 girls right away, but if you're spending significant time meeting girls gaming, then you will be closing some of them and you will start having sex with multiple girls. This is key to your recovery. It might not take 10 girls, you may get over your ex by your 6th girl, but make 10 girls the goal and follow through.

15. Every time you feel like you can't breathe and you want to cry, then cry. Let it out. It's okay, but do it in private. There is a time and a place for everything and your own living abode is a fine place to let it out away from prying eyes.

16. With the trip that you have to look forward to, examine your personal style, haircut and grooming. Is it time for a new haircut? A new you? Make a list of improvements you could make and DAILY take action to improve yourself, if even for nothing else but for your trip. You now have something fun to look forward to.

17. Go on the trip and let loose. Get drunk, game girls, have sex, sleep in, stuff your face, this is your release from the bullshit. Being in a new place will help you get away from anything that could you remind you of your ex and will give you a fresh start for when you return.

18. When you get back, take a look at whatever goals, dreams or passions you may have laid to the side when with your ex and pick them back. Dedicate yourself to reaching those goals and put actual action behind those written down goals.

19. Have patience. Time heals all wounds. Depending on the severity of the oneitis you have, it may only take you a couple of months, but for some of you it may take longer. Don't beat yourself up. Almost every man has fallen hard for a girl and been dumped. It happens. You're NOT a loser, you just went beta with a chick, but it's okay because now you have a game plan to get back on track and the tools needed so that it never happens again.

Follow these steps to a T, and you will get over her.

The first time happens to most of us, because shit, we didn't even know any better, but after one time, there's no reason for it to happen to again. Trust me I know. I was stubborn and blind enough that I allowed it to happen to me not once, not twice, but three fucking times. I get it, I have been there and I know what it takes to make sure it never happens again.

This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

April 5, 2014 | by Nomen Nescio | Link | Original Link

Patriarchy has been extremely successful, despite its recent vilification. Most cultures worldwide are patriarchal – to find examples of successful matriarchal societies you either have to turn to ancient history, remote outskirts of the world or feminist fiction. However, this hasn't stopped the feminist collective from queefing out books and even a hashtag hailing the end of patriarchy in a textbook example of incestuous amplification.

What patriarchy, after its apparent downfall, will be replaced with remains to be seen. Hamsterizations aside, there is surprisingly little data available about what life would be like in a society made up of only men or only women. An enterprising social scientist might want to perform an experiment where groups of men and groups of women are left to their own devices, having to work together to survive against the elements and build a civilization from scratch. However, this scientist would have a very hard time convincing ethical review boards that the inevitable suffering of his participants would weight up against the value of the data.

Luckily, reality television is not bound by ethical constraints and once in a while, in its never ending quest for viewer ratings, reality TV accidentally performs a very interesting experiment that social scientists would never be allowed to do.

Quite a few years ago, I had the pleasure of watching the Dutch version of Survivor (Expeditie Robinson) with my feminist roommate. That particular season would have two islands, one populated by men and one populated by women. My roommate had been promoting that particular series to me and the other students in the house for weeks because it would show us, according to her, what a society run by women – free from the evils of patriarchy – would be like.

And it did. Oh it did.

Here is what happened: initially both groups were dropped on their respective islands, given some supplies to get started and left to fend for themselves. In both groups there was some initial squabbling as people tried to figure out a local hierarchy. The men pretty much did whatever they felt was necessary – there was no leader giving orders. Men who felt like hunting, foraging or fishing did so. Another guy decided he was fed up with sitting on sand and started making benches. Others built a hut that gradually grew and evolved. Another guy cooked every night. Within days a neat little civilization was thriving, each day being slightly more prosperous than the previous one.

The women settled into a routine as well. The hung up a clothesline to dry their towels, then proceeded to sunbathe and squabble. Because unlike men, women were unable to do anything without consensus of the whole group. And because it was a group of at least a dozen women, consensus was never reached. During the next few episodes, the women ate all their initial supplies, got drenched by tropical storms several times, were eaten alive by sand fleas and were generally miserable. The men on the other hand, were quite content. There were disagreements of course, but they were generally resolved.

Eventually, the people running the program decided something had to change. In order to help the women out, three men would be selected to go to their island. In return, three women would take their place at the men's island. The look on my feminist roommates face during this episode was priceless.

Initially, the three men selected for the women's island were ecstatic, for obvious reason. But then they arrived at the island and were greeted by the women.

'Where is your hut?', they asked.

'We have no hut'

'Where are your supplies?' they asked, dismayed

'We ate all the rice'

And so on. The three men ended up working like dogs, using all the skills developed by trial and error in their first few weeks – building a hut, fish, trying to get the women to forage. The women continued to bitch and sunbathe. The three women who were sent to the men's island were delighted – food, shelter and plenty of male attention was freely available. They too continued to sunbathe.

And that my friends, is what patriarchy is. My former roommate, unsurprisingly, is no longer a feminist.

Now this might all be a fluke, a white raven, an exceptional case not representative of society as whole. But that particular season of Dutch Survivor is not unique. CBS broadcast several Survivor seasons in the US, where men and women started off in separate groups. In most cases (the Amazon and One World), the result was the same. The men quickly got their act together, getting access to food, fire and shelter while the women spent a lot of time and energy on petty little squabbles, eating their meager supplies, getting drenched in storms and generally being pathetic. The opposite situation, where men didn't get their act together while women quickly built a functional micro society, has not yet been observed outside of feminist fiction, and it probably never will.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

5 Things Holding Back Young Men

April 6, 2014 | by The Conqueror | Link | Original Link

The manosphere is full of examples of how men can improve themselves. Everything from how to dress, how to lift, how to approach money, etc, can be found through a quick Google search. Regular readers of ROK are aware of the benefits of self-improvement and have some knowledge of red pill philosophy. However, what about the young men out there? The ones with no knowledge of game who are not in the position to just up and travel the world in search of self-improvement? Why is there such an uneven split between younger guys making strides in life and so many more floundering with no direction? I've seen a few things that seem to be holding back young men from their full potential. Here they are:

1. They have no path

A 20-year-old American college male, whether from a lack of father figures in his life or no adequate role models, have few clearly drawn paths of success that he can emulate. Gone are the days of rituals and rites to becoming a man, and only a handful of men experience the impact of wars that shaped many of our grandfathers' view of the world. Without a path, many young males fail to gather a sense of ambition. No one is telling them how to become successful.

With all the "girl power!" and push for women to grow their career, many young males are simply checking out. My belief is that this isn't from wide spread lack of options but rather the lack of any adequate reason. If you are 20 and can pull the hot sorority girl with no problem, why bust your ass to get into med school? If you are living off student loans and surrounded by girls who just want to hook up (Tinder), what reason would some guys have to bust their ass and head out on their own? This leads me to the next point…

2. They see too many girls

Typical American Campus

Undergrad degrees for women have exploded in the past few decades. From 9.1% in 1970 to 50% in 2012 (and now actually increasing past boys). In 1970 only one out of ten of your fellow classmates would have been a girl. Some campuses are actually experiencing a severe lack of men. You would think that would be perfect, right? Wrong.

In college, I was friends with a handful of good looking fraternity men who held parties at their apartment. Every week they got with a new girl. It was clockwork. What were the other dudes doing? Sitting in their dorm, waiting for their dream girl. The current college scene is skewed for guys who already know game (or have social skills).

Picture this: you are a 20-year-old college guy. You have a crush on that pretty girl in your Women' Studies class. You talk to her every day but can't work up the courage to ask for her number. You see her in class bragging about hooking up with more than one guy over the weekend. You will soon grow to resent "slutty" girls instead of just improving yourself and becoming a guy that girls actually want to hook up with. The common hook-up culture has been discussed at length, but those girls will be hooking up the guys who already know game.

3. They don't even lift

Young men are in poor shape. It's so bad that it's actually becoming a national security issue. Taking the time to become active is a long stretch (find a good program like 5/3/1 or Starting Strength and then spend 5 years improving yourself). For the chubby, young male who is bombarded with girls getting hysterical over "hot guys with abs," the process would seem near impossible. It takes a long process to get a body close to that. To look hot, women just need to put the cupcakes down.

4. They don't know about money

Few high schools offer classes on taxes and investing. Even few college men are taught anything about building a successful business and eventually become completely independent. Do you really think a young guy surrounded by slutty college girls would care about how to develop a 401k or what majors end up with better careers?

5. They aren't assertive

"If you're ever going to get promoted, you're going to have to develop a more assertive attitude. Just make sure you don't bring it home with you."

I'm talking about having the courage to simply be honest with themselves. To ask that cute girl out. To make new friends. Many young guys simply have no clue how to assert themselves or even hold eye contact.

What happens to those who are not assertive? Imagine having a hot, single girl as your roommate for over 5 years. And never being assertive enough to tell her how you actually feel.

MTV has a show called “Friend Zone” where you can see for yourself the lack of assertion in the modern younger male. Skip to 17:10 in this clip and see what could happen in this roommate situation after the guy spills his love to her (spoiler: harsh rejection).

The manosphere appears to be aimed at that frustrated man seeking to improve his life, but little is spent on on catching that guy who just started talking to girls or that guy who doesn’t have the means to quit his job and simply go abroad to bang hot foreign girls. I list these 5 reasons in order because this is what you get when a younger man addresses all these issues:

- The realization of what it takes to become successful and established in a career
- Knowing what kinds of girls to approach and avoid in college (and life)
- Starting the path to being fit and realizing what it takes to get there
- How to handle money and set up investments and stocks (long term finances)
- Having the courage to be assertive in classes and work and actually approach the girls you like.

With so many online resources, it may be hard for a college age man to actually make sense of it all. If you’re 19, do you have the ability to leave America for a poosy paradise? Probably not, so keep it simple instead and start with the basics.

The Secret To Mastering Eye Contact

After standing up straight, eye contact is the most important piece of non-verbal communication.

Imagine a man with an intimidating build and superb posture entering the room you're currently in. He slowly walks up to you, asks a question, and engages you in conversation. But he's unable to maintain eye contact for more than two or three seconds. When he entered the room and moved to approach you, you undoubtedly felt his masculine presence and a strong sense of confidence. However, as soon as you met him face to face and began speaking with him, your perception of him quickly changed. He was no longer a badass alpha male, but rather just another insecure man.

While that example was rather obvious and extreme, eye contact plays a huge role in your everyday life. It affects how you feel during any given interaction, and it affects how everyone else perceives you. Without being able to skillfully maintain—and break—eye contact, it doesn't matter how straight you stand up or how thick your back is—you'll still fail to create a powerful presence.

The Perfect Dose

Good eye contact signals confidence and builds comfort. It says I'm comfortable looking into your eyes and speaking with you.

Bad eye contact signals weakness and breaks rapport. It says I'm a nervous little bitch.

But good eye contact is more complicated than staring at someone like you're playing that game where the first person who blinks loses. When you practice this type of eye contact it comes off as creepy, like you're a serial killer or child molester. It makes the other person think you're trying to intimidate them or just socially unaware.

By the same token, failing to meet the other person's glance, or immediately looking away when eye contact is made, is also terrible. This is more common. It signals a lack of confidence and shows that you're nervous or intimidated by the person you're speaking with.

The secret to mastering eye contact is to maintain it for slightly longer than the other person can. This shows confidence, but also social intelligence. It says I'm in charge of this conversation, but I'm not trying to creep you out.

How To Break It

The second piece to mastering eye contact is knowing how to break it. This is pretty simple: when you break eye contact, look away to the sides of the person you're speaking with, as if you're thinking or picturing something in your head. Don't look down – this shows weakness and submission.

These rules should be applied to any situation. When you're talking to your boss, firm eye contact lets him know you're not his little puppy and should be taken seriously. When you're talking to your inferior, it acknowledges their presence, but also demands respect. When you're talking to a cute girl you mean to bed, it builds comfort, but also leads the interaction to ever-increasingly seductive and intense eye contact. In short, it's an unavoidable part of any interaction, and you'd be stupid not to consciously master it and use it to your advantage.

Why Do Women Suddenly Want To Become Video Gamers?

April 7, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

"Your a fukking pussy, u probbly couldn't beat my retarded bro wit both of his hands tyed behind his back."

I was 13 going on 14, rummaging around in an online gaming community then known as "The Zone." The game of choice was Age of Empires.

"Oh yeah, you wanna know why I got such a nice tan?"

"Cuz you a fag?"

"No, because I drug the bed outside last afternoon and pork-roasted your whore mother on it."

"Fuck u, u jar of dog piss. 1v1 in Room 19."

"It's on, shitheap."

Ah, the joys of newly minted adolescent boys trading cheap insults about slutty mothers and dog piss. We did, indeed, do battle and my reputation was well earned. My Spaniards ran rough-shod over his woefully unprepared Persians. He called me a "dick-sucking cocksucker" before whisking off into another game room, obviously licking his wounds after being castrated by a gay jar of canine urine.

Any place where men come to gather and congregate—especially during the tumultuous teenage years—isn't what anybody would call a "safe space." We form bonds—often life-long—with other males and we battle back and forth in groups. At the global level, it can take the real, important ways of war, politics, and general power conflicts. Human history has been overwhelmingly influenced by males simply because, as I shall sketch out, that women are not interested in agency or seizing power simply to exercise agency or have real power.

This dynamic is fully on display in the video game community, as men have built, nurtured and maintained the community for years. Even when called nerds, treated like losers by women, men who loved video games still played them. It can be a brutal place from a shit-talking standpoint, either you can develop a thick skin, or you find out you aren't cut from the right cloth to handle the banter. Competition can be fierce and reputations are difficult to make and easy to destroy. It is a mirror to real life, as people will shit-talk you, talk behind your back and often times don't act in accordance with your wishes and best interest.

However, a curious and recent development has occurred, with women demanding access to this largely male-exclusive enclave. As usual, the typical female narrative emerges: those sexist brogamers have prevented women from engaging in gaming for so long, it's time to change! They have swept into the video game community, set up shop and are making demands. As we see elsewhere in society, men are not men until they have a woman in his life, most likely "reforming" him so he fits her image of how men should behave.

Why did women wait until now to be gamers? And, no, I don't mean some person who plays solitaire on his laptop or "Words With Friends" on her bejeweled iPhone. The primary reason is simply that the star— the power— of the industry has passed. No, I'm not saying video games are dead or anything of that sort, what I'm saying is that women don't want actual power but the appearance of it. They don't want challenges, they want simple solutions fed to them by media, "9 Ways to Feel Better Right Now," "10 Reasons It Isn’t Your Fault You Married A Cheater,” and so on. They want empowerment, which by the nature of the word, means they want power handed to them, not taken.

The power that has been drained from video games is their ability to challenge the gamer. Video games are soft these days. I remember playing the original Super Mario for NES. There were no save games. Either you got it all right in one try, or it was start over from the beginning. Nowadays? Assassin’s Creed doesn’t even have a save function, as the game only proceeds if you don’t make a mistake. At worst, you are set back at most a few minutes, not an entire two hours. Early video games had shit for graphics, now some games have no substance and all flash. Guess when women wanted to be a part of the community?

A lack of real difficulty is the primary reason that women are now increasingly becoming gamers. The power of video games has been drained; there are no more frustrated afternoons where you try to find a way to kill a Red Dragon in Baldur’s Gate or deal with a horde of zombies in Resident Evil. Now, walk-through’s are nary a second away on Google with no worries about screwing up a game in epic fashion that results in a waste of 20 hours. Modern gamers are coddled.

It must be noted that the rise in online gaming, particularly for console games, has also been instrumental in drawing women to gaming. One of the primary reasons that Tomb Raider bombed with women—aside from the intimidating cleavage of Lara Croft—is that it involved a solitary female, isolated from society, fighting beasts and monsters. No group collaboration, no mindless affirmations —-just a woman and her guns fighting murderous creatures. Women—surprise!—need story lines and relatable characters in order to enjoy video games. Simple conflict doesn’t code for women, it has to have an emotional context to be understood. The desire for power, for wealth and fame apparently doesn’t work for women, it has to have a context. Once again, why are men so “over-represented” in positions of power?

Video games are not purely about entertainment through challenging the gamer to step up his game to meet the increasing difficulty of a game as it progresses anymore. Apparently, the most recent Mass Effect had significant homosexual themes. Insertions of homosexual characters into a story is a political act meant to challenge the “tolerance” of the gamer. By dumbing down games, it allowed not only women to find a home, but to increase video games popularity. Just like how liberals destroyed the educational system in order to “have access for all!,” video games have been reduced to a vessel for political correctness, illusions of personal accomplishment and personal fantasy – which is my final point.

Take this article about a woman who revels in her rank narcissism and celebrates a female character who is a "complete human." Apparently, she sprouted a ladyboner over the game Left Behind. In it, a limitless girl is girly but also methodically murders "a bunch of motherfuckers." The author seems upset that "nobody wants to be a woman." Well, yeah, no shit Sherlock. What man wants to be a passive-aggressive, back-stabbing person who thinks that power is gifted, not taken? Men, generally, don't want to be women because we want to take power, not have it handed to us. However, she betrays what often hurts women when it comes to gaming and why they are flocking to it now: she wants what she perceives as powerful entities affirming her life as a woman and girl. You know, the resultant behavior of women after the death of God in a society where paternalism has shifted to the government and corporations.

She is moved to tears when Left Behind ends. Why, you might ask? Because it has affirmed her as a person, a woman who is both girly and can brutally murder people. She blurs the lines between her life and the video game in a way that betrays her damning and self-defeating narcissism: it isn't good enough for her to kill people as a girl in a video game, but that that female character has to reflect her own life experiences. This isn't some Xena fantasy, it has to be Xena plus taking selfies with your bestie after a falling out. I bet Andrea Dworkin is turning over in her shallow grave. She reinforces the idea that she only plays video games to act out the girl and woman she wanted to be in real life. Since she was never that woman, she has turned to video games which don't challenge her at all, but give her an interactive movie that reinforces her fantasies:

That's part of what makes Left Behind so special: Here, Ellie is the sun, the lightbulb that the rest of the universe rotates around. And she shines.

She never got to be the "It" girl, so she turns to a video game that neither challenges her abilities, but gives her an outlet to slake her desire for historical revisionism and naked self-possession. This is another reason that women have gotten into gaming.

Playing Tomb Raider does nothing for women because a solitary female killing off wolves with a shotgun isn't aspirational nor self-reflective. Emotional context is necessary and, as the preceding female highlights, that context is often centered out of self-delusion. The woman is moved to tears because she finally has found a game that reflects her desire to act on those who upset her (the killing aspect; she doesn't confront people in real life) and her desire for a media outlet to value her relationships with other women (the Randi Zuckerberg problem).

This is the psychological progression: going from emulating Carrie from Sex and the City in real life to demanding an interactive video game so she can pretend to be Carrie on her Xbox. For this to happen, however, the challenging nature of male-centered video games has to be neutered. The banter I cited above? It has to go, because questioning people's personal identities is challenging for women, so men can kiss busting each other's ball goodbye. Mainstream games that approach the difficulty of Paper Boy for SNES? Sorry, but that doesn't affirm anybody's identities nor advance diversity or equality. It must be pretty triggering for a gamer girl to not measure up in the fantasy world of video games. Who can she blame if she can't beat a video game? White males?

What these female gamers are demanding is a "safe space" where their egos go unchallenged, undisturbed. The disruptive nature of male behavior—equally disruptive of male and female egos—leads to upset female gamers who simply want a space to be, where they get to act out what they either can't or, most likely, don't have the girl balls to do in real life. They demand games that are simply interactive movies, revolving around emotional relationships (what they call "complex" and "real" human relations) between people with, apparently, fantasies of killing people and blowing shit up… after taking selfies!

The roaring cacophony of political correctness that dominates modern dialogues betrays the utter emptiness of modern society. These female gamers are not happy women in any sense of the word. Their lives are so despondent and lacking in true substance that they turn to video games, not to pass the time or indulge in destroying the Packers as the Bears in Madden, but as an outlet for the lives they don't live in real life. When men question whether a woman is a true gamer, men are hacking away at a part of their beating heart. They start with themselves then see men as not-female and he must be doing X, Y or Z because she is a woman as men are not women. They port out the typical female-as-a-victim-of-men rhetoric that reveals their true unhappiness—the inability to find love and contentment with a man.

They are not simply looking for happy relationships with women. These women are seeking approximations of happy, loving relations with men. If that is the cloying worship of a gang of online gamer betas, so be it. If that is the fantasy of an alpha male romancing a female lead in a video game then game on! Inextricably bound up in the issues of seeking the trappings of power and fantasy is the fantasy of men loving them for who they see themselves as, not who they really are. The fantasies of power easily gifted to them is part of the fantasy, but it isn't complete without the concurrent bestowing of sexy men upon these fantasy women. Male worship is expected and positive attention from sexually attractive men is fetishized.

This movement exposes more than a few things about women. It exposes how often they see themselves as powerful and capable in their own minds, but fail to display that in real life, so they turn to media to smooth the ruffled feathers of their egos. They don't like challenges of any sort, especially to their self-identity. They crave male approval and will go to any length to secure it, even if to devalue it once it becomes rote and expected. Women want to be gamers now simply because it is easy—easy to fantasize about their idealized self, easy to secure male approval and worship, and easy to rock the boat and demand the world revolve around them.

The World Will Teach You

My grandfather used to have a phrase he would use when confronted with a situation that only wisdom and experience could fully explain. The world will teach you, he would say. At the time, as a much younger man, I always saw this as a frustrating response. It seemed too trite, too smug. But with the passage of time, and with more scars to my credit, I can now see the wisdom behind it. I now know what he meant. Beware the fickleness of fortune, for all glory is fleeting; don't be a slave to your base desires; and most importantly, know that you may be on top today, but that all good fortune can be snatched away in an instant.

These are lessons that immigrants and refugees like him know in their bones. Life has a way of compensating for great success by allocating us a measured ration of misfortune. Good fortune and ill-fortune are handmaidens, and will both eventually come to call on us, and never in circumstances of our own choosing. Over a long enough time span, a man's fortune always reverts to the mean.

Consider the career of the philosopher and statesman Boethius (A.D. 475?—524). In his style and substance, he straddles the worlds of classical antiquity and the Christian Middle Ages. Coming from a wealthy and distinguished Roman family, he received the best education of his day, becoming erudite in both Greek and Latin letters. Not content with scholarly pursuits, he decided to enter public life, and awed the Roman Senate with his eloquence, and roused the Roman masses with his benevolence. Men compared him to Cicero and Demonsthenes. Eventually he rose to serve the Gothic king Theodoric, who then ruled most of Italy.

Boethius's abilities made him enemies at court, and he eventually was wrongfully accused of participation in a conspiracy against the king. Theodoric, infirm of mind and body, probably listened to the counsel of his Gothic ministers, who likely resented Boethius's popularity among the people of Rome; and Boethius did not help his cause by proving inept in the game of palace intrigue.

The tomb of Theodoric

Theodoric eventually had Boethius thrown in jail and sentenced to death. It was a shocking reversal for a man who had during his entire life known nothing but success. And from this miserable place, this gloomy dungeon, he wrote one of the first books of prison literature and perhaps the most famous of all medieval philosophical works: De Consolatione Philosophae (The Consolation of Philosophy). Nothing focuses the mind as wonderfully as a death sentence. Drawing strength and solace from his classical studies, he set out timeless principles of fortune, fate, and how to seek the good life. He had learned well the stern and masculine ethic of the ancients, and had imbibed freely from that fount of eloquence and sagacity which the ancient writers represented. And in all his book, there is not one word of complaining or whining.

Fortune is various and fickle, says Boethius, and a wise man benefits more from bad luck than from good:

> For I think that ill fortune is better for men than good. Fortune always cheats when she seems to smile, with the appearance of happiness, but is always truthful when she shows herself to be inconstant by changing. The first kind of fortune deceives, the second instructs. The one binds the minds of those who enjoy goods that cheatingly only seem to be good, the other frees them with the knowledge of the fragility of mortal happiness. So you can see that the one is > inconstant, always running here and there, uncertain of herself; and the other is steady, well prepared and—with the practice of adversity—wise. [II.5]

The rich man, in his stupidity and venality, will hoard wealth, not realizing that it will all eventually be taken away:

> Let him load his neck with Red Sea pearls, and plough his fat fields with hundreds of oxen! Gnawing care will never leave him while he lives, and neither will his great wealth go with him when he dies. [III.5]

Boethius suggests that a wise man, if he enjoys great success, will always remember to behave in a modest and virtuous way. Why? Because the people he encountered on his rise to the top will likely be the same ones who will witness his fall. Never mock or insult those worse off than you; one day, you may find yourself among them. A wise man will not count it an evil if he encounters adversity, for this will test and harden him:

> A wise man ought not to take it badly, every time he is brought into conflict with fortune, just as it would not be fitting for brave man to be frightened every time the sound of war crashed out. Since for each of these the difficulty is itself the occasion, for the latter of increasing his glory, for the former of further developing his wisdom. And this is indeed why virtue is called virtue, because relying on its own powers it is not overcome by adversity….You are engaged in bitter mental strife with every kind of fortune, lest ill fortune oppress you or good fortune corrupt you. [IV.45]

And finally, we cannot call someone a real man who is driven and controlled by lusts. Chasing after sensual or material pleasures is demeaning, debasing, and brutalizing. Boethius says:

> The stealer of others' wealth burns with greed: you would say he was like a wolf. The wild and restless man flaps his tongue in pointless arguments: you would say he was a dog. The scammer rejoices in his tricks and frauds: he is on the level of a little fox…the weak and fearful is afraid of everything: he is reckoned like a deer. The stupid sluggard is numb: he lives an ass's life…a man is drowned in foul and demeaning lusts: he is gripped by the instinct of a filthy pig. [IV.55]

The overall impression given by the Consolation is that, on a long enough timeline, a man's fortune will sooner or later revert to the mean. Even if he is garlanded by success, this will eventually be counterbalanced by the visitation of some calamity. The universe, which he equates with God, has some built-in balancing principle, so that our successes will sooner or later be offset with misfortunes.

With this in mind, the wise man will behave accordingly. Cherish your true friends, for you will know who they are when disaster hits you. Do not denigrate those less fortunate than you, for you may find yourself among them. Do not tempt Fate by allowing yourself to be enslaved with pursuits for women, money, and glory. All of these things will be taken away from you in time. All dissolves into the receding mist of time and Nature's pleasure, as the foamy waves retreat from the sandy shoreline, leaving only an outline of what once was.

The poignancy of Boethius's philosophy is matched by the tragedy of his fate. On October 23, 524, the Reaper finally called on him. His executioners removed him from his cell, looped a cord around his neck, and strangled him. The cruelty and injustice of this end is overshadowed by the brilliance of his philosophical testament to the world. May we, in our hour of crisis, face our challenges with equal courage and stoic resolution. And if we think we know better than the world, and if we think we are exempt from the laws of fortune, we should think again. No one is exempt.

The world will teach us.

Why The Manosphere Doesn’t Need Anti-Semitism

April 7, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Parts of the manosphere have long been preoccupied with questions about the role that Jews play in modern society.

- “Why are so many of the most prominent feminists Jewish?”
- “Why are Jews so prominent in academia?”
- “Why are Jews so prominent in every facet of high-level professional life (law, medicine, media, etc)?”

It is not long after these questions are posed that discussions begin to get a bit more adversarial. Some go as far as to make absurd denials of the Holocaust’s occurrence, while others merely suggest a broader effort on the part of the united Jewish population to some mysterious and potentially harmful end (read: a Jewish conspiracy). Though many participants in these discussions seek to remain civil in their discourse, it is often not long before a number of anti-semitic voices begin to make themselves heard, backing their viewpoints with citations from the likes of David Duke and often damaging the legitimacy of the discussion beyond repair.

The manosphere doesn't need that. Let's take a second look at one of those questions:

"Why are jews so prominent in every facet of high-level intellectual and professional life (law, medicine, media, etc)?"

The answer to this one should seem obvious to many in the manospere, though ironically so. Denizens of the manosphere are not shy when it comes to discussions about IQ, its variations in different population groups, and the influence that said variations allegedly have on the respective roles that these population groups play in society. When it comes to certain minorities (blacks in particular), IQ takes on a prominent role in many a manosphere discussion, serving as a primary justification for arguments that stand against interracial unions, mass immigration, and integration. Many simply take it as a given that differences in group IQ (as measured by a host of studies on the matter) lead to differences in group outcomes. It is the difference in group IQ, they posit, that provides most of the impetus for socio-economic distinctions between some groups in western countries (ex: whites and blacks).

The studies used to substantiate the existence of these group IQ differences, however, do not merely speak of whites, blacks, and hispanics. Many go into plenty of detail with regard to the IQ of the Ashkenazi Jewish population, and have concluded that it is very high. Those who trust these studies and their conclusions about various group IQs are often the same individuals who ask the kind of questions posed at the beginning of this article: "Why are jews so prominent in every facet of high-level intellectual and professional life (law, medicine, media, academia, philosophy, etc)?"

When asked similar questions about the role of, say, blacks and hispanics in American society relative to American whites, they do not hesitate to point to IQ (the allegedly lower black and hispanic group IQ ostensibly explaining most of the socio-economic gap between these groups and others). The same urgency is not applied to questions about Jews. Instead, comment sections and forums in the manosphere that touch on the subject devolve into long discussions about Jewish conspiracies. Those who believe in the power of IQ as a determinant of outcome take it as a valid explanation for why some groups are in certain positions (they're where they "should" be), but do not accept it as an explanation for why other groups are in other positions (must be a "conspiracy"). Why is this?

I have my own questions about the extent to which IQ can be used to make such broad conclusions about different groups (read: I'm skeptical), but I'll leave those for another article. Suffice it to say that if you are someone who does not have those reservations and generally accepts the notion that IQ explains the bulk of the socio-economic circumstances that certain groups face across the globe today, then you should have no problem accepting the notion that IQ explains the prominent position Jews occupy in modern intellectual, political, and economic life. There should be no "conspiracy" in your eyes and no need for anti-semitic musings about united Jewish plotters scheming to destroy western society.

That brings me to another reason why the anti-semetic perspectives (along with their anti-nonwhite counterparts) in the manosphere should be left behind. The entire mission of ROK is to guide and encourage men in relation to the process of self-improvement. That means aiding men in taking close looks at themselves, identifying their faults, mercilessly eliminating said faults, and rebuilding themselves in a superior form that can yield superior social, financial and romantic results.

This is a long, difficult process that can only be slowed by placing undue focus on adversarial blame games levied at other people. I once wrote about how black America has predicted our future, and I believe such a sentiment is applicable here as well.

The African-American community spends an inordinate amount of time and energy discussing the white man and how much of their predicament is to be blamed on him. This has, in my estimation, had serious consequences on that population's advancement. So much energy is spent directing anger and suspicion at white people suspected of racism that some genuine problems within the black community go overlooked, passed on in favor of issues that fall in line with the adversarial mindset inherent to the racial blame game. Time, energy and money that could be spent on the substantive improvement of the broader community is instead spent on the maintenance of this suspicion. The consequences of this are substantial, and the entire community pays a heavy price.

The readers of ROK and sites like it should not seek to emulate this example. ROK's mission is one for men of all colors, religions and ethnicities. The division of those men into different factions in constant tension with one another can only hamper the progress any of them make on the road to self-improvement. The energy that these groups (all of which consist of men united in their concern with self-improvement first and foremost, but possibly divided by race or ethnicity) spend on one another is energy that doesn't go toward true self-improvement, and that is no good for anybody. Roosh recently lamented some of the ongoing trends in the manosphere:

> The manosphere used to be full of Biggies and Tupacs—now everyone is tripping over themselves to be Drake, blogging and commenting in the hopes they may get laid. (I apologize in advance to the large number of neo-Nazis in the manosphere for comparing them to a man of non-Aryan race.) It's hard for me to accept that the manosphere is well on its way to becoming a match.com for old people who hate blacks.

…and, apparently, Jews too. A look at many of the comment threads here at ROK and elsewhere would indicate that Roosh is right to be concerned.

It is in the interest of every young male truly interested in self-improvement to combat these trends. When the energy you spend on others is redirected toward the enhancement of your own being, good things happen.

We’re Surrounded By Smartphone Zombies

I wake up, shower, make myself pretty for the world and go to work. There are a few women working as secretaries for the company. It’s usually only seven in the morning when I roll in but their faces are already down and planted to their smart phones. When they notice it’s me they manage to peel their eyes away for a few seconds. I flirt with them, and since two are single mothers and the third is single in her thirties they eagerly drink it up. As soon as I go into the back their eyes flip back down to whatever important business is going on in iPhone land.

I go to whatever coffee shop my partner wants to. We stand in line, and I look around and see the professional women in suits and skirts fiddling around with their smart phones while waiting in line. I can’t tell if their zombified looks come from a bad nights sleep or the intense focus they have on their touch screens.

We go to a domestic jobsite, being let into the house by a bored looking wife. She barely acknowledges our presence, too absorbed with her iPad to even ask for our credentials. We could be two murderous rapists disguised as electricians but she can’t be bothered to check that; the 50% off I can see on the screen is just far too captivating for her to bother with such things as safety or courtesy. She points in the direction of the basement, and passing the living room I see her four year old daughter sitting on the floor in front of the television. Her eyes are glued to the commercial, the toys around her unheeded.

At lunch we find ourselves in a fast food joint. The same type of professional women from the coffee shop earlier are in here, ordering salads as if that’ll negate the large Mocha and Espresso’s they gulped down earlier. Their phones are still in their hands, their thumbs still jittering around the screen like it's possessed. I stare at some, wondering just what is so important that it needs their full attention while they're in the middle of ordering. Some look up for a fraction of a second, catch my eye, and I can almost see a struggle in them to maintain eye contact. The urge for the phone wins, usually within a few seconds, and I place my order with a cashier who almost seems startled that a customer isn't darting their attention between the menu and an electronic gadget.

At the end of the day, I park in the company garage and come in through the back. Out front the secretaries are still tapping away. I'm in too much of a rush to stop and flirt. Most days they don't even notice that I've gone by. They often ask why I don't hang out with after work. Personally, I believe it's because I just couldn't handle the excitement of being around such vivacious women.

I go home, eat, and head out to the gym. I plug in my old iPod Nano and go about my routine. In between sets I look around, seeing who's all in there tonight, who's making progress, if any particularly cute gal is mirin. There are several such cuties in attendance, slowly pumping their overly tanned legs on the treadmills and elliptical machines or half heartedly curling the lightest dumbbells. While on the machines they stare down, always down, their thumbs the only thing getting a real workout. In the free weight area they do five reps, drop the weight and spend the next three minutes tapping away. I marvel at their multitasking, admiring how their highly advanced brains can focus on their social media updates and texting while they do such strenuous exercises as running 3 km/hour and curling a 10 pound dumbbell four times. My mind has to focus so much while I squat three plus plates that I barely register the Katy Perry song playing on my Nano. I curse my mental deficiencies.

After the gym I get home and finally check my cell phone. Seven missed texts and two missed calls. Six out of nine are from my current bang buddy, wanting to 'hang out' that night. I text her back to still see if she's up for it and the reply comes before I can even snap my flip phone closed.

I go to her place, spend twenty minutes watching reality television while she juggles her smart phone, a laptop and the television remote, flipping between a cooking show and a wedding show whenever a commercial comes on for either one. Eventually I get bored and impatient and blatantly cup her crotch and the electronics go down for a half hour while we rock the Kasbah. I get up to wipe myself down and by the time I come back to put on my gitch the smart phone has reappeared. She barely mumbles half a sentence and a goodbye when I throw on the rest of my clothes and leave.

I get back home and casually glance at my phone. Thee new texts, with one actually being from the girl I just left asking if I was going to the social this weekend. I shake my head, honestly wondering if she sent me the text while I was physically in her presence. I reply with maybe, briefly check my article comments on Return Of Kings to further boost my ego and ban trolls, and go to bed.

I have been around a hundred different women that day and I doubt ninety percent looked up long enough to take notice of the world around them. The one woman I was physically inside had all the alacrity of someone riding high on novocaine. I'm sure at some point in the day most of these women will have posted or liked a status having to do with the complete dearth of available men in their city. That or the eternal complaint about how men just use them for sex; why can't any guy, like, just sit down and have a friggin conversation for once amirite?!!!!

When the sexbots arrive I honestly don't even think I'll notice a change in society. We're already living in nations of vaginally equipped robots. Finding a woman with a mind that thinks beyond 140 characters will soon be an impossible task. It's becoming increasingly pointless to interact with the female of the species beyond the purposes of getting your dinky stinky.

On the plus side; at least our sexbots won't waste our time with texts and reality television. The conversation will probably be better as well.

8 Essential Rules For Banging A Single Mom

April 8, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Men here know there are countless reasons dating a single mother is a terrible idea. Any man who unwittingly wanders into the clutches of one of these harpies is doomed from the start. Once she has her talons in him he's stuck raising another man's offspring and before he knows it, she's off looking for an alpha fux (her ex in a lot of cases) to compliment her beta bux. A no win situation for the poor sap.

But every once in a blue moon we run into a baby mama that not only passes the boner test, she has the art of mimicking a quality woman down pat. She's feminine, takes care of her body, and seems to know her way around a kitchen. Now before you guys start frothing at the mouth let me be clear: I will never advocate commiting to, dating, or God forbid, marrying these women. But if you absolutely must tangle with these tarts or are just starting out in game and looking for quick and easy lays to get your feet wet, here are 8 rules to follow to get what you want out of them (easy sex) without ending up like this…

8. Do not completely avoid giving off provider vibes

First off, I'm not suggesting that you act like Captain Save-A-Hoe. What I am suggesting is that giving off a bit of a provider vibe every so often can work in your favor. The reason is that the most important trait to an SM when ~~hunting for a target~~ looking for a man is his ability to provide for her children. When her radar picks up that provider signal she's desperately looking for she'll do anything to lock you down. Blowjobs on command, back massages, after-sex sandwiches, strip teases, you name it. She'll pull out all the stops to show you what a fantastic and unique and amazing woman she is in hopes of getting a commitment from you. Of course you're not looking for commitment or anything close to it but she doesn't know that and as long as she thinks there's a chance for it she'll continue to chase that carrot like a starving jack rabbit.

7.Never babysit for ANY amount of time

"I need to run in for cigarettes. Can you watch Timmy while I run in?" DON'T DO IT. Watching Timmy for four minutes will turn into watching him, his spoiled rotten sister, and his kid brother who needs his ADD medication every 30 minutes on a while she and her slutty friends have girl's night out.

Nip this in the bud the first time she tries it because this is also a shit test. Fail it and you're done. If she raises hell about it, next her. There are plenty of hot sluts out there without any snot nosed baggage.

6. Turn her into a bowling ball

Regardless of how hot a single mom is, her SMV is lowered because she has children. They would never verbally acknowledge this in public but they know the score. Not having much else to bring to the table she will concentrate her efforts in the bedroom to balance the baggage created by her rug rats. Take full advantage of this—turn her into a bowling ball and penetrate all three of her luscious holes. She will gladly participate in any debauchery your dirty mind can dream up to keep you around. Anal sex, parking lot blow jobs, sex tapes, and nude pictures are just the tip of the iceberg. Nothing is off limits and neither are any of her orifices.

5. The very first time she withholds sex, NEXT HER

A single mother withholding sex from you is a mathematical inevitability. The reason for this is that they're used to their vaginas being pedestalized by betas so they underestimate your need for sex. With this in mind, they attempt to pull this all-too-familiar power move to gain control of the "relationship." But a man like you has options and if you don't tolerate the hot, childless 22 year old putting your dick on detention, putting up with it from a 31 year old with a couple whipper snappers is a joke.

The first time she attempts to close her cooch for any reason simply stand up, smirk at her, say "It's been fun" and walk out the door never to be seen or heard from again. This is your only move in this scenario.

4. Use her as a fuck buddy, nothing more

Single mothers make great fuck buddies. They're unselfish in the sack and available all the time (watch how quickly they can find a last minute babysitter when alpha cock is calling). But making her anything other than a coitus companion is a huge mistake. As soon as she gets the idea that she's anything more than a moist hole for your salty swimmers she'll expect to be treated like a girlfriend thinking you've finally taken the bait.

"How 'bout the occasional coffee date?" Nope. Bang buds are for banging, not having romantic little chats over lattes with.

"What about watching a movie at her place?" Two conditions: 1) Her kids aren't there. 2) It leads to sex. Bounce like a bad check when the dirty deed is done.

"Friends with benefits?" Negative. She is not your friend and you ain't givin' her benefits. Leave that to her orbiters and the government.

Giving an SM any allowance of your time, money, or attention only leads to trouble. Underestimating her ability to weasel her way into your resources would be a gross misstep on your part. Don't give her that opportunity. Fuck buddy is the only status she deserves.

3. Do not get close to her children

Children of single mothers are yearning for a strong male presence and as soon as one makes an appearance, they latch on and don't let go. Who can blame them? When a child looks up to you, mimics you, and gives you a hero's welcome whenever you walk in the door it really has an effect on you. I know this from personal experience.

Do yourself a favor and do not connect with her children. Avoiding them all together is probably the best course of action. This should be quite easy as there is usually a custody order in place which requires them to spend a couple nights a week with dad. Schedule your trysts with her on nights when he's got the kids and this shouldn't be an issue.

2. Do not pay for anything

This one is simple, gents. There is absolutely no need to take out your wallet for a woman who gets food and shelter from the government, financial favors from white knights, and monthly payments from the father(s) of her child(ren). Period.

1. Do not get into an LTR with her

As obvious as this is there are a lot of men out there who don't understand that single mothers are damaged women that make terrible significant others so let me sum this up as succinctly as possible: a single mother wants nothing more than to trap a beta to provide for her children so she doesn't have to. As soon as she secures a commitment from said provider via shared residence, marriage, etc., she assumes her children are taken care of. On this assumption she then goes on the hunt for alpha cock to take care of herself, thus, satisfying her hypergamy.

Believing anything different will lead to your undoing.

Conclusion

Single mothers are at the bottom of the totem pole as far as LTR material goes but they do make excellent pussy pals if you know what you're doing. Her mission in life is to lock down a beta provider for her young at all costs. This makes gaming them is child's play and they will often treat you much better than their younger, hotter, childless competition. As long as you understand what they really want out of you and treat them accordingly, you'll have no shortage of these venturesome vixens willing to suck the life out of you for a chance at that social and financial security they so richly deserve.

Stacy’s Sculpture

April 9, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Stacy’s parents knew she was something special — she displayed extraordinary artistic talents at a very young age. So as a child they bought her an array of creative material to work with. Paint for drawing, journals for writing, and even a large stone for sculpting.

Stacy took a real liking to the stone and the idea of sculpting. The first few years she spent just outlining the design of the sculpture on the stone. Her friends and family would come by and see the outline and comment on its potential. It was too early to tell how it would turn out however.

After 5 years of planning and outlining, Stacy began to make small chips in the stone and implement her drawing. It was a very slow process, as Stacy would work on other projects in between. Nonetheless, Stacy would spend some time on it here and there and by the 10th year there was a clear outline in place of the earlier sketch.

As the years passed the sculpture began taking form. By the 16th year Stacy had finished a substantial portion of her sculpture. Now when people would come over they would all comment on its beauty and aesthetic appeal. Stacy was very proud but humble about her work, and always blushed when receiving compliments. She decided that her dream was to have the sculpture discovered and taken by a wonderful museum and displayed prominently for life, taken care of like only few sculptures ever experience.

The next few years Stacy refined the sculpture with small improvements. A chip here and there, some sanding for smoothness in various places. By the 18th year of its existence, Stacy’s whole town had heard of this sculpture, and people would ask to come by to see it regularly. But because Stacy lived in a studio apartment, there was only so much room for guests. She would screen for people that truly appreciated her art and limit the number of entries accordingly. It was a very tight fit, that studio, and Stacy did not want it overcrowded.

In its 20th year, a well to do and highly revered curator by the name of Jack saw the sculpture at Stacy's studio. He spoke to Stacy a few times and offered to buy the sculpture for a very high price. He informed Stacy of his plans, to house the sculpture in a private museum with nothing but the best care for it. After all, a sculpture this beautiful and in such a pure state was of high value. Despite this basically being her dream of only a few years prior, Stacy now receiving more and more attention for her sculpture declined the offer. "I can do better," she thought.

Stacy began to enjoy the attention her sculpture was receiving and although she didn't previously want to let everyone in town into her apartment, she couldn't resist. In the next five years or so, she would host viewing parties that would get very crowded. In and out, in and out were random people almost nightly. Occasionally guests would come into contact with the sculpture and cause minor scruffs and marks, but they weren't very noticeable. By its 23rd year, the sculpture was still beautiful but nowhere near as pristine as it was five years ago.

By now Stacy was loving the attention and it got to her head a bit. She believed that no matter what she did to the sculpture, people would still be lining up to get access to viewing it. She turned down multiple offers to purchase the sculpture. While none of them were as good as Jack's, they were still decent offers.

She experimented and altered the sculpture at times. She added some random color to various places on the sculpture. She was a bit careless with her previously strict rules about exposing the sculpture to the elements, and would leave it uncovered at nights or allow her friends to smoke cigarettes around it. Trying to be unique, she punched a few holes in her sculpture and hung circular metal objects from it. She even decided to chop off part of the top of the sculpture, listening to all her artist friends that convinced her it "would be cute" to do so.

Every year that followed, less and less people would come to see the sculpture. By the 30th anniversary of the sculpture's creation, Stacy was shocked to realize at how much the demand to see her sculpture had dropped. Whereas before people would be lining up to see it, now she had to put in a lot of effort in advertising and seeking out people to come.

A few years later barely anyone wanted to come see the once famed sculpture. One day a man named Jim — not a very wealthy, smart or substantial man — came to visit. He had not been able to see many sculptures in his life as he couldn't figure out how to access most of the viewings artists like Stacy had. Having seen one of Stacy's ads seeking people to come see her sculpture, Jim finally got a chance.

He could not offer much, but offered to buy it at a fraction of the price Jack offered. He also told Stacy he would put it on his coffee table next to his cat's litter box. Having not received any offers in years, and tired of having to promote the sculpture, Stacy agreed to Jim's offer. On the surface, Stacy believed this was a great end for her and the sculpture. After all, the sculpture did eventually sell and she had many many years of fun until it did.

idea that finally the burden of the sculpture was over, that she had reached her goal albeit a few years later than she wanted to. Yet instead of relief, she felt sadness. Instead of joy, she felt empty.

She eventually rationalized away her feelings and convinced herself she made the right decision and fell asleep. Jim was a nice guy and the sculpture would be in good hands, how fun all those endless viewing parties were, how individualistic she made her sculpture with the permanent alterations, and so on. Despite her surface happiness however, she could never get rid of this little twitch deep down — that she should have taken Jack's offer.

Why Contrary Game is Necessary

April 9, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

When you walk into the department store, the salesman is overly friendly and eager to assist you. No one is really that nice, so it soon becomes obvious he is an act: he just wants your money. You see through him, sensibly wary of his tedious charade.

It is otherwise with women. Their essential falseness is by no means obvious to men, as women are preternatural masters of dissimulation. Women themselves know their true nature, of course, and that is precisely why, deep down, so many of them cannot stand other women. The hatred women have for one another isn't just about competition: they also know very well just how worthy of contempt—how utterly fake and untrustworthy—their fellow women are. Hence the common female preference for the company of man, that much more straightforward and honest creature.

Men generally know where they stand with regard to their fellow men. Because of the superior power we exercise in the world and our physical strength, we are naturally more assertive than women, less inclined to conceal who we are. Yet most men never notice that it serves the interests of women to be such adroit actresses. So most of us never realize just how cunning and manipulative women are, or how little sense of duty they feel when it comes to something like keeping their word, or how easily personal responsibility and moral agency are shoved aside by their knack for rationalizing things (that is, basically lying to themselves and others), which is surely one of nature's most vicious adaptations.

In contrast to most men, the player is characterized by his knowledge of certain dark truths about women, truths that are borne out by a massive amount of experience. These truths lead him to do the opposite of what most men do. His reward is incomparable success, a variety and frequency of lays which non-players cannot enjoy.

Now one of the most important of these truths is the necessity of running contrary game, so effective in our perverse time. By “contrary game” I mean what is contrary to what most men do and also what is contrary to reason and to what women say. To understand just why contrary game is both necessary and effective, consider the nature of desire itself. This is easy enough to do. A little self-examination demonstrates what philosophers have always insisted: that desire is a kind of absence or longing which compels us to pursue, again and again, whatever will gratify it. It is not our natural or primary state to be gratified. The opposite is true, with the result that so much of life consists in trying to pursue the objects of our desire.

Contrary game is so effective because it is consistent with the nature of desire itself. While most men, wanting to get laid, make their interest in women clear, and go out of their way to do things for them, hoping to win them over, the player makes himself emotionally distant from women, and is hardly inclined to give them a free ride. He is cool and fun to be around, but he never acts as if he needs them. The psychological effect of this is to make women crave this elusive man, this very rare type who doesn’t seem “needy” or “clingy,” adjectives that, in our debased time, are synonymous with “kind” and “decent.”

The best sort of contrary game is simply not being a “nice guy.” Specifically, not giving compliments, not offering to pay, not calling the next day, or often, not asking if she got in OK, not getting her gifts—in short, not doing virtually anything that could represent an interest in women besides sex.

For the player understands that, despite what they say, women don’t really want a nice guy. By “nice,” women actually mean two things: a man who is friendly, polite and agreeable, or in other words, not a social retard; and one who will spend money on them, realizing their sense of entitlement. But the trouble with the nice guy is that he makes himself readily available, while desire itself is a kind of endless pursuit. To have tremendous success with women, you must make them like the vexed rabbit in the cartoon, your carrot ever dangling coldly in front of them.

So, women want what they don’t have. A related truth is this: that once they have it, they often don’t want it anymore—and this too is consistent with the nature of desire: fickle, fleeting, insatiable, and delusive. I myself learned both truths the hard way. Up until around twenty-seven, I was the classic nice guy with women. I wanted sex, and at times, companionship and emotional intimacy. To my rational mind, it seemed that treating women well—being kind and doing things for them—would lead to success. I wanted to have good experiences with them, so wouldn’t it stand to reason that I should be good to them?

NO! Reason is irrelevant here, and again, by being a nice guy, I gave women nothing to pursue: it was like walking into the casino and winning a big hand in minutes—where was the fun in hanging out to play for the night?

The principal business between men and women always was sex, it still is, and it always will be. Therefore, as a man your main goal in regard to women should be to turn them on. That is accomplished not by being nice, but by being very good at something, and by being confident, witty and charming. Of course, good looks help quite a lot too, but ultimately power and game are supreme.

Don't be deceived

In running contrary game, it is important to stay firm and not be fooled by the occasional woman you meet who seems like a sweetheart, or exception to the general run of cunts and vampires. Years after I understood that women don't really want a nice guy, I'd still allow myself to be fairly emotionally available to (some) women. I'd meet a woman and be rather distant in the beginning. But then, after she had been very sweet—having opened up, understand, because of my distance—I'd give in and start saying things like "looking forward to seeing you" and even doing things for her. But quite often, after just a few months (in many cases, weeks) the sweetheart would reveal her true nature: she'd turn ice cold, deeply ungrateful and disloyal, so out for herself as to have no regard for a man who'd been only good to her.

So these days I keep up an air of aloofness. The results are illuminating. At 33, I can get almost as much tail as I did at 23, even though I looked better ten years ago. This approach works because besides giving women something to pursue, and thus keeping the engine of desire chugging, I stand in contrast to most men, who are forever coming off as oh so nice and at the service of women. Women receive an overwhelming amount of attention from such beta men, so the rare aloof type seems downright exotic—and therefore very interesting—by comparison. Further, we live in very bad times, and while to a rational mind treating women well may seem only reasonable, to beautiful 21st century vampires you are likely to seem week, needy, clingy, etc.

Contrary game overlaps well with asshole game. In both, you are doing the opposite of what most men do and of what women say they want. I would recommend working in a little asshole game (being rude, flaking, using subtle put downs, etc.) with your general contrary approach. Asshole game must be used sparingly, however. Women have so many options today, and are such entitled princesses, that though assholes may be a turn on, there is still only so much asshole behavior they will take. Remember, "she is not gonna settle" and "she deserves better."

Fortunately, contrary game is not necessary with all women; for the most part, it is to be used in the rotten Anglo world. There are many women abroad, and foreigners in the English-speaking world, who will not burn you for treating them well. Similarly, these women—who really are women—play a lot fewer games, and don't hold back their feelings like the soulless players known as American women, for example.

Women Can’t Control Their Animal Instincts

The following may sound like a made up story, but it’s not. A friend of mine lives in Kenya and runs an exclusive resort. One time when on safari they discovered a baby lioness, just a few days old. They waited all night for signs of the mother, but she never returned. They took the lioness cub home, bottle fed it and it became the family pet. It grew up without other lions around, so it was tame like a house cat and freely roamed both inside and outside their residence.

For more than 10 years they had this incredible pet, until one evening my friend came home in a hurry to grab some paper work from his home office upstairs. He bolted up the stairs where upon he ran into the lioness on the turn in the staircase. She got spooked and took a swipe at him, ripping half his face off. He spent weeks in surgery. Although it was just an accident, the lioness having awakened her inner predator, became much more aggressive. She was impossible to keep as a pet.

This is almost all you need to know about women. All women without exception have that inner animal side. If you keep them around long enough and make an innocent mistake like my friend did, this aggressive side will come out. It’s well known that pregnant or nursing females in many species can be more aggressive than males. When she feels spooked or driven by pure instinct, she will strike. No matter what her background or upbringing, how tame and lovely she might seem, this trait is there without exception.

Human females are of course more complex than a simple instinctive lioness, so I will give you a few examples from my own life. There are many ways in which she befriends you and makes you think of her as a harmless pet, when in fact the lioness is waiting to come out.

1. This is all I’m going to get

I went to a strict boarding school, and when I left at 18, I’d had very little contact with girls. As soon as I started going out to clubs and bars, the girls just seemed to be all around me (I suppose after an almost military style education, I carried myself with a certain air). I was also renowned for my teenage rebel ‘don’t give a fuck’ attitude (and pockets full of drugs). Thus I never had to hit on girls or chase after them, they came to me. I found them immature, dull, and uninteresting.

After getting through multiple girlfriends in a short space of time, bed hopping with their friends and so forth, I ditched the whole lot. They all seemed the same to me. I watched friends of mine settle for ‘girlfriends’ and get into these awful teenage ‘relationships’ with girls that were so immature, needy, insecure and manipulative. My friends became sappy to be around when their girl was in the vicinity. They’d settled because they thought that was all they were going to get – the saddest thing is they were probably right. This was long before the hookup culture, so rather than get snared into relationships, I preferred to fly free and look for something better.

2. She’s Amazing (aka. Oneitis)

When you refuse to settle for second best, nature has to up the ante and give you more. It might leave you high and dry for a while, but after some months I met the daughter of a Spanish diplomat. She was 24, I was 19. She spoke four languages, had traveled the world, dated not only a senator but also a major drug dealer. She was light years ahead of me. Being with her I psychologically jumped from 19 to 35. I learned a lot from this woman, so when she joked about getting married, I stuck a ring on her finger. I did it largely for the ‘rebel’ factor since no one gets married at 21 these days. I was also after a diplomatic passport but sadly her father retired.

We had an idea to immigrate together and that needed a marriage certificate, so we had an ulterior and practical motive. It also put our parents in their places, shutting them up. One thing about getting married, especially when you are under 30 is it commands respect from the older generation. The whole thing was a blag really, and if I’d been a little smarter I would have leveraged it for wedding gifts, help to buy a house and etc., but I was too much of a tear away for that.

Just like the story of the lioness, she rapidly turned into a real ‘wife’. It didn’t matter that we’d go clubbing, smoked a ton of pot or had wild sex all night, she was married now. This female instinct came out from under the surface. She became dictatorial, demanding, and unsettled. She started controlling our direction and finally met a new BFF who poisoned her against me. The BFF wanted to match-make my wife with her brother. That of course failed dramatically, but my first LTR was over. Initially I made some very successful efforts to save it, but I realized that me being 25 and her now nearly 30; starting again with a woman 5-10 years younger, would be much more equitable. Her loss—I met her 10 years later, she was re-married with a fat ugly guy, who owned a small restaurant and struggling with a two year old kid. What a waste.

3. I’m Your Best Friend

I had a spare room in my place that I wanted to rent out. At the same time I met this chick who (rather ironically) called herself Cat. We struck up an immediate vibe. I had free tickets to a club, I took her out; we were all over each other. She said she was looking for a place to stay and I believed I had the perfect solution—flatmate I could bang. I gave her a key and told her to bring two weeks rent. She disappeared for 3 days, dumped her stuff in the room at 4am (waking me up), disappeared again, to return a couple of days later with a load of drugs and a new boyfriend, no rent in sight.

My place stank of pot, coke dust on the kitchen counter, empty vodka bottles and a total mess. No money for rent of course. A few more days passed by with no sign of her and when I finally caught up with her she promised me money. Disappeared again, came back with a whole crowd of people at 3am on a week night. I threw out the visitors and demanded money. She disappeared again for several days, where upon I left her shit on the side walk in front of the apartment, keeping her laptop as a guarantee on the rent she owed. I never saw or heard from her again. The laptop went on ebay some months later (after I uploaded all her nude photos she left on it). True story.

4. Her Word In Your Ear

You'll tend to take advice from your girlfriend since she has constant access to you. My second LTR was with a girl far less educated and well-traveled. She knew I was a great catch and once we moved in together she became increasingly insecure. She'd black ball just about anyone I was doing business with. She slowly steered my thinking over time, until I took decisions and closed down a perfectly viable business that just needed another couple of years grind until payday would arrive. I was only 29 so it seemed like I had all the time in the world. My ex-business partner went on to open branches around the world and made some millions. I did fairly nicely for myself on my own and her advice might have been quite reasonable, but I will never know what direction I might have taken without her influence. When I finally ditched her, she ended up in a psyche ward on antidepressants.

5. I Need You

A pet can be fun, but it invariably becomes a chore. After getting shot of the second LTR, I began dating a variety of girls. One was particularly sexy and fun in bed. She lived alone but we were a two hour plane ride apart. She was only 24 and had no real hurry to get all settled, but started pushing me to move in with her, or at least move near her. My business kept me away and I couldn't just move next to her overnight, nor did I want to. There's nothing like flying into town to stay at your girl's place and having her open the front door with a fresh home cooked meal on the table. If there was ever a keeper this girl was it, but by now I was well aware of the manipulative instincts of a female, so I cut her lose. She married a sales rep from a tobacco company and has a kid now. Her life must be dull as dishwater because she often tries to contact me on Facebook.

6. Ruling The Roost

As any guy who's lived with a girl can attest, the most laid back chick in nesting mode soon becomes the interior designer for Ikea. This instinctive nesting knows no bounds, to the point she will exhaust herself making the house nice for non-existent guests she needs to impress, whilst at the same time making you feel uninvited and uncomfortable.

There's not much defense for this kind of BS other than not inviting her to live with you in the first place. One girl I lived with became obsessed with recycling plastic bottles to the point she started doing it daily, and demanding I take the bottles to the recycling bin almost one by one. It was just across the street, but her OCD was on overdrive. One of the things that women do to take power in your life is start up rituals that are so mind blowingly trivial, you just comply to start with.

7. Sense Of Timing

Just like the lioness that had no sense of timing or execution, swiping its paw out of instinct, a women will often subconsciously strike for no particular reason. Several times when my business had moved ahead in leaps and bounds, the girlfriend of the moment would get restless, jealous, needy and instinctively try to drag things down, lest I leave her for better pastures. This of course had the net result of accelerating the outcome. If you are lucky enough to find a smart woman that supports you and sees your successes as her successes – like a politician's wife might, good for you, but keeping the motivation there in this day and age is almost impossible. In fact if you do anything 'wrong' they will very often vindictively attack, even if it's to their own detriment, the classic example being trying to shame you in front of friends or family with some pointless relationship conversation that she hopes to garner support for.

Animals and Gods

A man is a self-contained unit. He can fend for himself, feed himself and if he chooses literally plant his seed and walk away. He can chose to improve himself in any number of ways, and aside from getting laid, is not driven by hormones in anything like the way a woman is. A man is thus closer to being a god. At the very least he is consistent. If he chooses to be a consistent chimpanzee, that's his mistake.

A woman has a period, produces eggs, seeks a mate, gets pregnant, gives birth, produces breast milk and takes care of the infant, just like any other mammal. She also runs very much on herd instincts. She is tied to this her entire life. Her female state is impossible to completely remove. She is thus closer to an animal.

A pet you bring into your house can make a nice mascot, keep you company and even be useful to mind the house, but recall the story of the lioness and remember that even if she doesn't get aggressive, she will generally be a chore to take care of, just like a pet can be. There was an advertising campaign many years ago in the UK, designed to make people think twice before buying pets. "A dog is for life, not just for Christmas." I'll leave you with that thought and the lioness on the staircase.

Learn To Enjoy The Seduction Process

I gazed into the mirror examining the crows feet starting to emerge around my eyes. Late nights, heavy drinking, a dash of drugs and an arena full of grade A pussy will do that to you. 'I'm almost thirty though', I thought, 'I don't mind. Now I'm starting to really look like a man. Not a boy trying to look like a man, but a man who has lived life to the fullest'.

The crisp feel of a freshly dry cleaned dress shirt enveloped my frame as I buttoned it up.

The snap of my cuff links, as I popped them into my cuffs, brought a small smile to my face.

I tightened my watch just so and checked the time. It was right. Can't be wearing a classic watch and the time be wrong. That would be, well… wrong. 'The stories this watch could tell', I imagined, laughing out loud amused at my own imagination.

Turning the sound system up, Sinatra's golden voice filled my place with his soothing melodic voice. 'Damn could that cat sing', my mind raced with living in a time of the Rat Pack, where men were men and women were women and it was a good time to have balls swinging between your legs.

I smoothed pomade through my hair and parted it just so, leaving a dapper look in the wake of my comb. Perfect. Washing the pomade off my hands is always a pain in the ass, but the hard bar of soap did the job. I took my time washing my hands enjoying the feel of the soap and warm water. There's something about washing my hands that's relaxing.

I slid my suit jacket on and selected a pocket square from my collection. The silk felt smooth between my fingers and I used a custom personal fold before inserting it into my suit jacket pocket.

One final look in the mirror. 'This works like a motherfucker', I thought, as I smirked at my reflection and headed to my mini-bar. The best part is always saved for last and I selected a glass, checked it for smudge marks and dropped a few perfectly square cubes into it. I pondered for a second, before selecting a premium vodka and pouring a nice eight count of it into my glass. The smooth sound of the vodka hitting the rocks blended well with Sinatra's voice in the background. I splashed some tonic water into my glass and then grabbed a fresh lime from the icebox. Cutting it carefully, I squeezed two generous limes into my glass and now the work of art was complete.

The first sip is the best sip of the night and I savored the bite of the vodka combined with the tartness of the freshly squeezed limes. "Ahhh…", I exclaimed. With no one in sight, my inner alcoholic could be set free to proclaim his joy vocally at this delicious drink. I stepped out onto my balcony and inhaled deep into a fresh cigarette. Once again, the first drag combined with the first drink is always the best ones of the night.

"The SLS Hotel", I told my driver as I settled into my seat. Damn there's nothing like plush leather seats in the back of a SUV. Thank God for Uber, which has saved me more money and possible DUIs and always delivered me in style to my destination. I relaxed for a few minutes responding to texts from friends trying to meet up, party friends trying to get a hookup and sluts who were wanting both.

The driver prattles for a few moments and I try to drown out his cock-sucker lisp. Eventually my silence persuades him to shut the hell up and focus on driving instead of being my new best friend.

We arrived at the SLS Hotel in Beverly Hills and my driver pulled to a stop. Wishing him a safe night, I stepped out of the SUV and entered the hotel. There's certain places where I get a certain rush the moment I walk through the doors, namely the Cosmopolitan Hotel in Las Vegas. The SLS is not one of them, but I was there to meet a sexy girl for drinks, and I bring an aura wherever I go, so it is what it is.

The hostess smiled as only a pretty hostess can and asked if I had reservations. I dropped my name and her face lit up. "Oh you're blah blah blah, it's sooo good to have you. Your date is waiting", she prattled and I enjoyed the recognition. Might as well take it while you can. She ushered me to a corner table, where my lovely date was sitting looking perturbed at me having made her wait. Oh well, she'll brighten up about three nanoseconds after I open my mouth and drop charm that would make George Clooney jealous. "Blah blah blah blah", I said and just as I predicted, her face lit up, she smiled and then blushed. Game on.

I kissed her neck gently before sitting down and her expensive perfume hit me like a ton of bricks. 'Dear God this girl smells divine. I must have her', my mind screamed as I acted nonchalant and settled into my seat.

The best part of the seduction, in my humble opinon, starts and the witty banter and flirtatious conversation begins. You see, getting her naked is the icing on the cake and provides a 'finish line' for the seduction, but this part right here, the part where I can see her becoming increasingly into me, due to my body language and game, is where the sweet spot is. To seduce a beautiful woman is simply one of life's greatest pleasures.

She plays with her hair, bites her bottom lip and leans forward. My eyes are happy. The bait has been set. She is now on the hook.

She's in town for a week for a modeling shoot (she actually has a billboard I passed on the way to the hotel, but she's humble about it. She knows she lucked out being born with great looks and doesn't want to ride on it forever) and she's staying right there at the SLS Hotel. Logistics could not be anymore perfect and anyone who has experienced what it's like to deal with logistics in Los Angeles, knows this is a perfect setup.

Her leg grazes mine under the table and even through my tailored suit pants, I can feel the smoothness of her never ending leg. Her legs stretch for days and are toned with a golden tan of color making them even more memorable. I'm 'in love', but if for only a night.

Eating food with a sexy girl can be very sensuous and pleasurable. The key is to take your time and savor each bite, each sip of your drink of choice and the conversation. She's smart, but not a brilliant girl. She giggles at my consistent sarcasm and offers commentary on topics past the latest celebrity gossip and the hottest new club in town. She's just right.

I casually, but with dominance, suggest we take it upstairs to her room and she agrees while a blush spreads across her face. It won't be the last thing that spreads across her face tonight. My balls are full and ready to be emptied on her face, covering her gorgeous features and providing a masterpiece for my photo collection.

She grasps onto my arm as we wait for the elevator. Have you ever noticed that the elevator doors always open when you're heading to a meeting or somewhere important for work, but are always closed when you're about to take a girl to a room? It's an irony that doesn't escape me and the tension builds between us as we wait on the elevator. The sexual tension.

The doors open and luck is on our side as we are the only passengers on the ride up. The doors have barely shut when I push her back against the wall and we start to kiss. A kiss without passion, is not a kiss, it's merely two people swapping mouth fluids. She kisses me with her full lips and her tongue is soft and wet. I'm melting like a motherfucker. I run my hands up her legs and grab her ass under her flimsy dress. It's firm and small, but she is a model after all. Her skin is smooth that only a full body wax could provide and my boner is ready to rip through my suit pants and penetrate her.

Ding Ding Ding! The elevator doors open and an older couple stand watching us with mouths ajar at the sight of us breathing heavy and intertwined. "You guys make a great looking couple", I proclaim to them. (I enjoy enhancing situations where a normal person would abstain). They mumble a thanks before we scurry out and walk down the hall laughing.

Happiness has hit me. 'This is it', I thought, 'happiness in this moment'.

The moment we step through her hotel room door, we're ripping each others clothes off. I take great pleasure in ripping panties off and make no exception with her. Without sounding like an erotic novel and I'll skip the details we go to town and I fuck her raw, rough and with passion. This girl is a girl to be Deeply Converted. Beautiful, sweet and the attraction is extremely strong between us.

We lay on her bed after we cum and I pull a cigarette out to light it. "It's a non-smoking room Christian", she says. I smirk and respond. "You going to tell on me? Spray some perfume when I'm done". She giggles and asks for a drag. Leading always works and if she won't follow, then she'll be kicked to the curb and replaced within a week.

I lied. The best drag of a cigarette is right after sex. It's fucking perfect. I turn on the TV and lo and behold there's a Mad Men re-run. We settle in to watch and the seduction is complete. From snapping my cuff links, to the flirting over dinner, to this very moment, I enjoyed the process. The seduction starts before she's in your presence and it starts with you.

The point of this story about a slice of my life, is that seduction should be enjoyable. Of course your ego and cock want the satisfaction and there's nothing wrong with that, but take time to soak in what happens before and during the time you spend seducing girls.

If you learn to enjoy the process, the reward will be that much more fulfilling.

Learn to seduce. Learn to enjoy. Learn to take in the moment, because you might just never get the chance again.

God forbid I die tomorrow, but if I do, I would only regret the moments I didn't take time for, not the ones I did.

Life is short and life has moments where the natural high you're getting from the experience has you on top of the world.

These moments are fleeting. Take them in.

5 Dating Conventions That Women Killed

April 10, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Dating – as we used to know it – is dead. Hookup culture is the norm in America. These social changes are largely driven by women, and their need to avoid any feeling which might be "awkward" or uncomfortable. For the modern American "empowered" woman, the idea of needing a man goes against all the social programming she has received throughout her life.

Any behavior which might indicate genuine love or desire for another person is disappearing from the dating landscape, in favor of "combat dating" in which men and women compete to see who can love least. As a consequence, many of the conventions associated with dating are now dead.

1. Dates Are Dead

Going on planned dates and meeting up with someone based on prearranged plans is dead.

I'm not just talking about getting to know someone through spent time and courtship – that's been dead for much longer. I'm talking about making plans to do any activity that requires advanced planning or doesn't have a chance of leading to sex. The only people still going on "dates" are people going with their friends, or people they're not having sex with.

There are two reasons for this. First, smartphones make flaking incredibly easy. Two thumbs and a minute's notice can cancel any plan. Plus, smartphones allow you to contact anyone in your social network any time and see every other cool event you could go to instead. If you aren't the shiniest prospect, you will be flaked. Second, modern women have an aversion to anything that might make them feel "awkward" or put the slightest social pressure on them, and following through on plans made in advance is typically more commitment than women can handle.

For men, why spend two hours in a movie or playing mini-golf when you could invite her directly back to your place? Even men who meet in a public place usually choose one walking distance from their apartment. The only reason left to meet in a public place is because you think your date might be a secret internet-fatty, mentally ill (as one in four women are), or not ready for that direct an approach. While the first two are serious concerns, as a man you have the right to leave or kick someone out of your house for any reason. For many the risk of dealing with a crappy woman is less than the risk of missing a bang.

2. Cheating Is Dead

Because relationships begin without formal dating, they progress without formal labels. If no commitment is given, none is assumed. You can't cheat on someone you never said you were committed to.

It's well know, he who loves least controls the relationship. If a man is the first to ask for exclusivity, he is considered needy. Most men with options would not make this request, because it would mean they would have to stop dating other girls. Likewise, women typically have multiple options and do not want to appear like they need men. Since neither person wants to look like they need the other, most relationships operate on a “don’t ask, don’t tell” policy when it comes to sleeping with other people.

The corollary of this rule is that mate poaching is okay. Because even marriages can be broken up at a moments notice for the personal preference of one partner, there is no reason to respect the boundaries of another persons relationship. All is fair in love and war, and if you steal someone else’s partner, there are no social consequences, because it’s just part of the game.

3. Phone Calls Are Dead

Most young women are attached to their smartphones and communicate exclusively through apps and text. While it might seem like this would lead to more phone calls, phone calls require direct one on one communication in a context without looks or body language to fall back on. Phone calls also require a woman to give her full attention to a single man at once, which is more intimacy than most women can handle.

Calling women is considered needy and creepy. Since most women will not make a phone call, calling a woman shows greater interest in her than she would ever show in a man. Plus, women don’t answer calls from numbers they don’t recognize, so unless you texted her first and she took the trouble to save you in her contacts list, she won’t answer.

4. Technology-Free Relationships Are Dead

Relationships unmediated by technology are dead. Even if you meet face to face, the second meeting will be arranged through technology of some kind. Because women no longer make phone calls, communication will probably take place through text or some kind of app.

It used to be that technology was the domain of nerds and men who made things. Once Silicon Valley figured out ways for people to attention-whore through technology (twitter, facebook, instagram, early myspace) the internet was embraced by women. Now, I find women are the ones introducing me to new technology, constantly inviting to join apps or social networks I have no desire to be a part of – or worse, just assuming I use them. One girl told me the people who don't have a kik account are creepy.

When I first wrote about online dating, I wrote that "every site is a dating site for women." Now every app is a hook-up app for everyone. Even James Franco hooks up in a chat window.

5. Breakups Are Dead

Breakups – actually telling someone you don't want to see them again – are dead. The fade away is the norm.

Because no commitment is given, there is nothing to break. You just simply stop contacting someone without any warning or reason. Calling someone to tell them you no longer want to see them again would require acknowledging someone else's feelings and going out of your way to be kind to them.

Such a direct conversation might in inadvertently lead to intimacy, which is what all these behaviors are set up to avoid. In fact, replace the word “awkward” with “intimate” and the motivation behind most women’s behavior’s becomes appalling clear.

Just to review – wanting to get to know someone slowly over food, shared experiences, and face to face exclusivity is creepy. Typing “sit on my face” into a Tinder window is not.

Interestingly, this shift mirrors a larger cultural shift in the American attention span. Americans used to read books, now they reblog listicles. It might seem hypocritical of me to write that in a listed blog post, but most people won’t even read that sentence because it’s all the way at the end.

An Old Man’s Perspective

Ever since having an online presence outside of Facebook, I have not come across others in a similar position. During my month-long absence from Return of Kings, I paid a visit to the mystical land of Atropia. I seen and did many things in this place, including come across the proprietor of redonkulas.com. His name is Terrance Popp. He did not know I wrote for Return of Kings at the beginning of the exercise. I checked out his website and I decided it would not hurt to tell him.

Terrence Popp is an old Green Beret. He is so old that he was getting his combat jump wings when I was learning that red and blue make purple and painting my Skywarp doll to look like Starscream. This is significant because most of the cats I work with when doing deeds for Uncle Sugar tended to have email in high school. It is relatively rare to run across a Desert Storm veteran still in the military. It is even rarer to come across a Panama one. His experience and longevity is demonstrated in his videos

While he is of an older generation than I am, we came to common agreement on quite a few issues. Being a cog in the United States military machine is not as glorious as one would believe. Another concept is that the legal environment is not actually conducive to equality, especially to men. A person's competence gets more respect in their rank. All of these concepts we are complete agreement on. This along with reviewing his site made me decide to post it here.

You may be wondering what we did not see eye to eye on. Quite a few things actually, but surprisingly in an ostentatious environment such as the military, we tolerated each these differences of opinion. We both played that sandbox called Iraq so these opinions did not come from such experience. He truly has more empathy for those that would do him wrong than I do. He found my abstinence to alcohol consumption interesting,

I find the redonkulas.com quite interesting actually. The first thing that stands out to me is the owner uses his real name while putting the red pill to the Internet on verboten topics. He asked me why I don't use my real name on ROK. I told him nobody else did so I went along with that.

What do I think about the videos on the redonkulas.com? It does a good job presenting esoteric knowledge from the perspective of an old dude from the northern states. I personally would take the days to invest in dating a girl before moving furniture with her that he suggested and dividing it by 10. I also noticed some of his knowledge converges with returnofkings.com independently. He has also noticed that woman with horses are a bad idea. His particular brand of humor is somewhat unfamiliar to me because it seems region specific in its mannerisms but is quite interesting to watch. It also has many life lessons in these videos. So do yourself a favor and learn the hard way vicariously through Popp at redonkulas.com

7 Things You Need To Know About Filipina Girls

April 11, 2014 | by JoeSmith | Link | Original Link

I'm sure many readers of this blog have grown weary of the dating scene in your own country and have considered looking elsewhere (overseas). The Philippines is a popular choice for men like you, and for good reason: Filipinas make great wives, which I can speak from personal experience. Here are a few things to consider if you want to look for love in the Philippines.

1. Filipinas are not "mail-order brides."

This term (often used by those bitter about Westerners seeking foreign wives) is neither fair nor accurate. It's true that in past decades men would buy mailing addresses of women in catalogues. But even then they weren't "ordering" a wife. They were simply getting contact information and it was up to the woman to respond or ignore letters from long distance admirers.

Now the term is completely antiquated. I first met my wife online and we met in person some time later. Most of the guys I've met with Filipina wives have very similar stories—none of them "bought" their wives.

2. Filipinas are very open to dating and marrying older men.

I'm significantly older than my wife. Some of my friends who found love in the Philippines married women 20 or more years their junior. Not all Filipinas marry older men, of course, but they are much more open to it than Western women.

Let's pretend a Western bachelor in his late 30's or 40's is thinking about settling down and getting married. His options in his home country may be limited to women who past their prime in terms of beauty and fertility even if he is successful and reasonably attractive. He won't meet many women in their 20's who are interested in romance with him unless he is rich and famous.

His options are much, much different in the Philippines. This same bachelor would probably have 19-year-old women telling him he is "guwapo" (handsome). Filipinas are especially attracted to Caucasian features, so this average-looking guy would find he has suddenly been promoted to rock-star status as far as his dating options go.

3. Filipinas consider the practical implications of marriage.

Some may argue Asian women are only attracted to Western dollars, not men. There are gold-diggers everywhere, but I think this is an unfair assessment of Filipinas. Money does play a role, but it does so in virtually every woman's decision of whom to marry.

I think Asian women in general understand the practical implications of marriage that the Western world largely ignores. An older man can offer stability and maturity while a younger woman will usually be more beautiful and fertile. A Western man may be able to offer a level of financial stability that an Asian woman could not find with a man in her own country.

4. Filipinas are slim, petite, and attractive.

Someone recently posted an article here about obesity among American women and reached this conclusion: "The rise in the desirability of Asian women is due to their lower rates of obesity." I can't really argue with this author's assertion. The obesity rates in the Asian countries I've been in are nowhere near the 50% you'd see in America. Most guys who visit the Philippines are simply blown away by the beauty of the women. Their dark hair, dark eyes, naturally tanned skin and slender figures are a welcome change of pace for many.

5. Filipinas tend to be conservative in terms of sexual values.

This is not to say that all women in the Philippines are virgins until they marry (though it is not unheard of), but most Filipinas tend to express their sexuality only within some kind of committed relationship. They are, generally speaking, not promiscuous and very faithful within relationships.

6. Filipinas value family and motherhood.

Feminism and secularism has convinced Western women that the 20-something years are best spent climbing the corporate ladder and riding the sexual carousel. Women in the Philippines, by contrast, place a high value on becoming wives and mothers. Filipinas can and do work outside the home, but she'll always consider her family the first priority.

7. Filipinas are proficient in English.

A typical woman in the Philippines speaks at least two or three languages: Tagalog/Filipino (the national language), English (taught starting in the elementary school years), and one or more local languages. I've had the opportunity to travel to other Asian countries and I found the people in the Philippines much easier to understand. This can be a big advantage if you are thinking about finding romance.

Final Thoughts

Does all this sound too good to be true? Take a vacation in the Philippines and you'll see what I'm talking about. You may never want to return home.

The Rising Epidemic Of Cheating Wives Who Want "Freedom"

April 12, 2014 | by Andrew Cash | Link | Original Link

If you would have asked me to write about this subject ten years ago, you could have as easily been asking me to write in hieroglyphics, charting the constellation of our galaxy. Unfortunately, today I have learned in the school of hard knocks that "Good Girls Go Bad" in the blink of an eye.

Let me say from the onset that I am a 47-year-old African-American male, with one child, a few small businesses and have been married for twelve years to a wonderful wife—all the things a man could hope for in a life. Did I mention that my wife recently told me that I have been in an "open marriage" for three years?

Open marriage, as in, you date who you want and I date who I want, but let's just keep it on a "Don't ask, Don't tell" basis. The only problem is that I was never apprised of the new, now 3-year-old, status of our marital arrangement. How did I just recently find out that I was in an open relationship you ask? Well my wife told me so.

I do not come to you as an angry and jealous husband. I come to you as a man, who, after consulting with over twenty male friends in my age group (35 to 50), discovered that almost all of them have experienced the same problem. That is to say that they are, or were all, married men who have recently learned that their wives are seeking the company, affection and sexual gratification in the arms of other men. Surely these are neglectful cheating men who are getting what's coming to them? Not quite so fast.

My friend asked, “How old is your wife?”

I answered, “Forty-two.”

“Did you catch her, or do you just suspect?”

He had just rebuilt his marriage after a two month separation from his wife after finding out that she had several affairs with various handymen for the past two years. He promptly moved out and did not contact her for 60 days. She begged for reconsideration and disclosed that this was totally out of character for her and that she felt the marriage was far more important in her life than any meaningless affairs. You can hear the depth of the remaining scar in his voice as he spoke.

Man #2

After ten years of marriage my buddy thought he had it all figured out. His kids were out the house. The business was soaring. The wife just celebrated her 40th birthday in style with a big expensive 40th blowout event.

Then…

Facebook.

My buddy is not on or does he care to ever use Facebook. Heaven’s truth. He describes it as “The Devil.” After seeing his wife’s open Facebook page laying on the bed when she went to the store, my buddy found that his faithful wife of ten years, whom he had plucked from abject poverty and placed into Atlanta’s socialite scene, was madly head over heels crazy for the company’s… security guard.

On Facebook everything is over the top FABULOUS and MAGNIFICENT. What quickly followed was the obligatory picking your scrotum up off of the floor moment. Man #2 reached terms for a divorce after the wife disclosed that she no longer wanted to be in an exclusive relationship, and that this is what she wanted in her life. No love, less wifely obligations and more FREEDOM. Freedom is a familiar theme here.

He is now 52, dating, anti-marriage and trusts no woman.

After his wife of seventeen years cited that she needed a bit more FREEDOM in her life, she promptly took the four kids and moved out of their 5000 sq foot home and moved into a 1200 square foot rental unit a mile away.

She had not yet revealed that she fell in love with sexting her newly conditioned 45-year-old body to several random men and that she felt ALIVE and FREE when she did this with them. She also neglected to reveal that she had fallen “Madly and unapologetically in love” with the husband’s cousin, who lives in the same neighborhood.

Man #4

An 8-year marriage of a deputy ended when he caught his partner in bed with his wife. Result: No shooting, just a divorce and three confused kids.

Man #5

He has settled into an open relationship (see aforementioned definition), with his wife after finding out that she now wanted threesomes with men and women, preferably in the comfort of their home. She enjoys hosting. His wife now believes that love and sex were meant to be freely given and received. The 60s are back!

He figured that, after consulting a divorce attorney, it was "cheaper to keep her." Result: A highly sexed, loveless marriage that came, seemingly out of nowhere.

These are a few of the examples. Not all-encompassing, but a good cross-section of my male friends—all over 40, all of whom are financially successful, all of whom thought they knew their wives and all of whom thought they had "good girls."

What I've Learned

While I'm no expert, I do know that:

- A 2012 UK adultery survey showed that, of 4000 cheats, women typically maintain 2.3 extracurricular lovers while men typically have 1.8
- The typical woman starts to stray at age 37 while the typical man starts at 42
- There are 1.8 million unique monthly visitors on the hook up site for married people AshleyMadison.com
- Women are initiating 70-75% of all divorces
- The 7 year itch is REAL!!! Most women experience an "identity crises" after 5 married years. They resolve to act on it or not after around 7 years of marriage.
- All of my buddies stated that their wives wanted to feel "ALIVE" and seek "FREEDOM" from responsibilities and marital obligations.
- All of my buddies' wives were between 37 and 47 with the vast majority around the 40-year-old mark
- The word "good girl" is now a badge of dishonor to the modern 40-year-old woman's mind.

There are four kinds of cheating wives:

- The Emotionally-Starved Wife
- The Angry Wife
- The Wife Who Seeks Excitement
- The Sexually Deprived Wife

But back to me. I went into my marriage with the belief that if the marriage was not going to be successful, it would not be because of neglect on my part. What I realized is that men are not prepared or educated on the extent to which women mentally and physically change.

We remotely are prepared for the fact that women have monthly menstruation cycles. Bloating. Deflation. Depression. Low Libido. We are prepared for their strong maternal desire. You know, “Honey, let’s have a baby!” We get that. But no sister, mother, aunt, grandmother or cousin ever says…

> “Listen Cuz. After you make sure that you listen to her attentively, don’t watch the sports channels too much, stay in shape and watch what you eat, be conservative in your spending while lavishing her with gifts, be an attentive father (but not like creepy uncle Rudolph or Freaky uncle Fred), be mature in your conversation but kid-like in your playfulness with your wife, sex them like a 25-year-old stud-horse while being gentle like an old Harlequin Romance Novel, and be innovative like that Steele guy in 50 Shades of Grey, you also have to be sure to compliment them E-V-E-R-Y, waking moment of your conscious life or she will feel justified with cheating on you.”

Instead, what we get and have gotten leading up to the wedding and the day of the wedding is “You got a good girl there” or “Oh, she’s definitely a keeper” and “You better be good to that one” (with the finger wave and the sideways stare).

All Bullshit!!

I did all that! Ask her. Twelve years of marriage, five years of courtship. I did all of the above and what is the glorious reward?

- “I thought we were both doing it.”
- “We did talk about flirting with other people.”
- “I just need some space.”
- “I just want to express love and freedom as I see fit.”
- “You’d be surprised how many other women are doing it.”

The silver lining is that she doesn’t want a divorce. No she just wants FREEDOM! And, I can have FREEDOM too, like Solomon Northup in 12 Years A Slave.

Burch: Well, my boy, how yah feel now?

Solomon Northup: I am Solomon Northup. I am a FREE MAN!

This freedom applies as long as she doesn’t find out any sordid relationship details, because of course, she still is a bit jealous and doesn’t want to get hurt. But nothing in our family life needs to change other than that.

Really?

I ask, “What about diseases”? She says, ”Condoms.”

What about curfews? “Oh, we’ll respect each others’ time.”

What about friends seeing each other out with new partners? “I haven’t really thought about that.”

What about me spending money on other women? “Well, I haven’t thought about that.”

I ask, “After three years of hiding and creeping and deceiving, you haven’t thought about how that all works out on my side?”

She says, “Nope.”

My friends and I have all come to realize that the financial cost for infidelity is usually always borne on the man. That is, the dates, the wining and dining, are on the man’s dime. In divorce, even due to the infidelity of the wife, the women usually get the children. Even when both persons earn equal pay, the emphasis in the courts is to make sure that the woman maintains the standard of living she is accustomed. Even without kids in the picture.

There is an assumption in society that men who are cheated on are somehow complicit in the deeds of the women, that deep, deep down in the musty murky bowels of the infidelic belly of the misdeed, the husband overtly or covertly tried to silence the women’s independence, change who she really is, minimize her sexual needs, or demean her importance as a mom or wife.

I am here to say that sometimes people inexplicably change.

For better or for worse. Women are just as capable of despicable acts of selfishness as men. That while Tiger Woods, David Duchovny, Arnold Schwarzenegger, Kobe Bryant, Magic Johnson and the Jesse James’ of the world are highly publicized, when was the last time you heard of a female of any celebrity seeking treatment for “sexual addiction”? This includes Madonna, Leann Rimes, Princess Diana, Kim Kardashian, Coco, Elizabeth Taylor, Heidi Klum, Jessica Simpson, Tea Leoni (with Billy Bob Thornton?). No sex rehab for these scorned, neglected, wonderful women.

My wife and I are currently in counseling. The scars of my wife’s recent revelations are rippling throughout our personal and business relationships at breakneck speed. My wife still professes that her family and relationship are the most important things in the world to her while at the same time insisting that these covert affairs mean nothing to her.

I’m not exactly sure why I felt the need to put these emotions into print, but I feel disappointment and anger, in need of a cathartic release. I never felt so isolated and betrayed like when I found out that I was the lucky winner of an open marriage.

In true “Never Let Em See You Sweat” spirit, I haven’t shed a single tear at the potential destruction of an entire way of life I had attentively sought to build, because if she wants an open marriage, then it will be open for me, too. The hoochies are begun falling down like bowling pins for me. Strikes, no spares. Rick James, Love Them and Leave Them. The caveman never really dies. He just gets frozen in the ice until it's time to thaw. Like a newly unearthed sleeping neanderthal, I'm having my fan, but it's out of necessity, not by choice.

So on behalf of my twenty friends and the many silent minority—but rapidly turning into the majority—of married men with 40-ish year old wives, the good girl can go bad in the blink of an eye. Keep your eyes option.

Women Are Incapable Of Solidarity

April 12, 2014 | by UpperLowerClass | Link | Original Link

Once in a while, I enjoy reading feminist blogs. I'm sure I'm not alone in this—there's a certain guilty pleasure in reading the histrionic ravings of women whose entire purpose in life is to pursue their vision of a wholly misandristic, leftist dystopia. There's a healthy dose of schadenfreude to be found in watching these bitter, lonely, sexually undesirable women wallowing in miseries of their own creation.

To the feminist, there's a rapist around every corner, the entire world is conspiring to pay her less money than men, and mean words that strangers type on the internet might irreparably damage her self-confidence. Despite the sobering reality of how feminism is contributing to the decline of civilization, I draw small comfort from the fact that at least some of these women actually believe the bullshit, and I sincerely hope that they are as miserable and fearful in real life as they appear to be online.

Recently though, I had what might be called a minor epiphany while reading a feminist's tweets. I realized that feminists can't get along with each other.

I actually follow a few feminists on Twitter, and they follow me—even a few radical ones. To their credit, a few of these women seem to have the same tolerance for free speech as I do—a rarity in the feminist echo chamber. I was reading a few tweets from this woman (we'll call her 'Maria'), and I was struck by how pathetically self-loathing she is.

To hear her tell it, Maria has been cursed by a cruel joke of genetics. As if the universe itself were plotting to create a living contradiction, or biological comic relief, Maria is a radically feminist woman… who is white.

I'd say that a good 60% of Maria's tweets are a bizarre combination of her railing against the "discrimination" she faces as a result of a condition she didn't choose to be born with (womanhood) while simultaneously apologizing profusely for a condition she also didn't choose to be born with (being Caucasian). The irony is completely lost on her. Nobody is sorrier for slavery than Maria is. Anytime she makes a statement about the tribulations of plodding through life while being burdened with a uterus, she has to qualify it with "Now, of course, I'm certainly not saying that I have it as bad as a WOC" (woman of color). Maria is infatuated with her gender, but despises her race.

So as I read through Maria's hilariously sad and apologetic musings today, I was vaguely aware of the fact that I've seen her brand of bullshit everywhere in the feminist community. But more importantly, I was struck by how that same bullshit is conspicuously missing from the manosphere.

For anyone who suffers from Twitter addiction as I do, the #SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen hashtag from last year, created by feminist Micki Kendall, was an absolute gem. Basically, all the non-white feminists got angry because feminism is way too racist; and most of the white feminists apologized because they had no idea they were being racist.

But factions within the larger umbrella of feminism don't stop at traditional accusations of racism. Feminism still remains largely divided on whether transgendered women are actually women, or just men (rapists) pretending to be women. The debate has polarized many feminists, with popular opinion nowadays seeming to sway more in favor of inclusion.

Feminists don't even seem to be capable of accepting the omega males who choose to become "allies." Of course, as is typical with weak men, these "allies" are happy to accept being spurned in the hopes of being awarded some female attention at a later date.

Across the board, feminism features deep schisms based upon perceived racial biases, distrust of transgendered people, and inclusion of male allies (white knights). You can't go to a feminist website without seeing feminists virtually ripping each other's throats out in competition for who is the "purest and most oppressed." White feminists have to tiptoe around minority feminists, for fear of being perceived as "marginalizing the way WOC experience the patriarchy." Male feminists have to tiptoe around every feminist with a vagina, for fear of being blacklisted as a "mansplainer."

You know where they don't do that bullshit? The manosphere.

I've never seen a black single father start a flame war because he feels like the men's rights movement doesn't talk enough about the racism he lives with (even if he actually does deal with racism in his life). I've never seen a divorced white guy explain that "O*f course, the alimony I pay isn't nearly as bad as what MOC have to endure."*

I know a few men who are now openly gay, but they have children, child support payments, and alimony from previous marriages. I know gay men that were always openly gay as well. All of these men are staunchly anti-feminist (yes, non leftist gay men DO exist). I don't ever think to myself, "Fuck this guy, he doesn't have any right to talk about things that concern hetero men!"

I also know more than a few women who have the courage to stand against feminism too. I don't spurn them, nor do I see others in the manosphere doing that either.

Nah, fuck that. There is no tiptoeing around in the world of men. We have little tolerance for bullshit; and we don't have the desire to get wrapped up in petty fuckery, because we only concern ourselves with real issues of relevance. Men don't give a rat's ass what color you are, who you like to fuck, or what you do with your free time. If you share a few core beliefs with us, or more importantly, stand against the same things we oppose, you are an ally.

The enemy of my enemy is my friend.

You can tell that feminism is utter bullshit because they have no solidarity. They sit around all day imagining oppression where it doesn't exist. When the outside world stops giving them attention, and they begin to sense that they have no purpose, they do what all groups of women do when they're bored—they start fights with each other. Feminism, the supposedly noble cause, descends into a massive cat fight with every individual dropping the charade of altruism and desperately clamoring to receive more attention than anyone else.

Feminists are not women who have different traits than traditional women do. No, feminists are simply women who have rejected all the virtuous characteristics of womanhood while retaining only the undesirable traits of femininity. They're petty, catty, selfish, backstabbing, narcissistic, competitive, and incapable of real altruism. In perhaps the most humorous caricature of female stereotypes, these women can't even be amicable towards men (allies) who agree with everything they say! They continue trying to fight with submissive white knights, simply because feminists enjoy fighting.

After observing feminist behavior for quite some time, I have to disagree with Ms. Kendall. Solidarity isn't for white feminists. It isn't for feminists at all. Solidarity is for men.

“Rick & Morty” Shows The Utter Hopelessness Of Modern America

Rick & Morty is a new cartoon on Adult Swim. It was created by Dan Harmon (creator of Community) and Justin Roiland. You can watch the pilot here, as well as other episodes.

The premise of the show is a young boy—Morty—who lives with his parents who are in a broken, high-conflict marriage. They got married because Morty’s father (Jerry) knocked Morty’s mother (Beth) up in high school, so Morty has an older sister named Summer. His alcoholic grandfather Rick moves in with them, bringing all the baggage he dragged Beth through as a child. Beth still idolizes her father, despite his failings.

They all live in a middle class home and both Rick and Morty go on all sorts adventures that Rick basically forces Morty into. Season One isn’t complete yet, but so far we have an episode with dogs taking over the world while Rick and Morty incept Morty’s math teacher, Rick tries to build an amusement park inside a dying alcoholic’s body and another where Morty tries to cobble together an adventure but they end up arrested for “murdering” a giant and Morty almost gets raped by a pedophile in a bar bathroom.

Rick is a brilliant scientist with a deeply troubled history. He abandoned Beth's mother at an early age and his history is vague at this point. All we know is that Rick has run from just about any serious emotional or psychological commitment. His extraordinarily intense devotion to science has clearly resulted in a life of sheer brilliance. Second to this devotion is his crippling level of alcoholism. He is seemingly in a perpetual state of drunkenness with his constant belching, drooling and drinking out of a small drink container (his spaceship is always full of beer bottles). Rick is terminally mean and self-centered. He rarely treats Morty with respect, often just treating him as an object to advance his own ambitions. He does display compassion, but only in extreme situations, such as when he realizes Morty was almost raped.

Morty is a 12 year-old boy who has all the typical trappings of young men his age: just hitting puberty, awkward with girls and a not-yet solidified sense of self. He doesn't have a good relationship with his parents, as his parents are more interested in their own lives than the lives of their children. His sister, Summer, immerses herself in the mindless trivialities that most girls her age, 16, drown themselves in. As for Morty, we don't know too much about his interests at this point, as Morty exists primarily as an extension of Rick. He shows an interest in video games and nurses a gigantic crush on a girl named Jessica at his school.

The show certainly benefits from the creativity of its writers, who have a biting and dark sense of comedy. Rick has some excellent one liners, as does Morty. The show has very good pace and none of the episodes so far have even been close to clunkers. They came out swinging and have delivered in every episode.

An easy observation about the show is that is a pretty explicit allegory about how alcoholics treat people around them. So far in the show, Rick has almost killed Morty's crush Jessica, let dogs take over the world, exploded a giant, naked Santa hovering over the US in space and turned the entire world—except Morty's family—into giant preying mantises, then into "Cronenburgs." Rick exhibits no compassion or empathy and cares only about his scientific exploits and his incessant drinking. The episode that featured the amusement park has Rick sitting back, nursing a drink as Morty and his crew are facing death from diseases like Hepatitis B attacking them.

A wider view is that the show is an allegory for how late-narcissistic societies operate. The young Morty is somebody who—in class—might wonder aloud why blacks didn't just rise up and challenge slavery and racism. The nervous fidgeting of his female classmates might tell part of the story, maybe a black classmate might have stray thoughts about Morty's "racism," but what Morty would be showing is how he hasn't learned about the system, about America. He hasn't internalized the utter hopelessness of modern America. Like Morty is learning through both his parents and Rick, Morty is quickly learning that he is a cog, a building block in a descending society.

What Morty shows off is the painfully honest idealism of a young boy. He entertains notions of romance with a young girl. A girl untainted by the Sexual Revolution who may very well end up on the wrong side of 30, childless and a bitterness that surges through her veins in a way only a person with estrogen also surging through those veins can understand. His aborted attempts to connect with Jessica have always been thwarted by Rick, as Rick either gives Morty bad tactics (when he provided Morty with a love potion) or prevents him from connecting with her when she shows interest. Blocked from experiencing life as any young boy needs to in order to grow, he is shunted into Rick's fantasy world.

Rick displays a startling levels of indifference towards Morty's parents (Jerry and Beth). One episode starts with Rick and Morty walking into the kitchen, as Jerry is—yet again—fretting over his tenuous relationship with Beth. Rick grabs a generic beer from the fridge, pops it open and wonders aloud, "Yeah I get, you knocked up my daughter, Jerry. Most marriages end in failure so who cares." Morty is mortified, as is Jerry, but Rick doesn't care. He tells Morty to follow him and as Morty is learning he does just what Rick says.

This is a subtle allegory to how adherence to narcissism works. Morty's sublimation of his identity into Rick's desires is clearly indicative of an unhealthy relationship, but given Rick's only concern with his interest in his identity and his alcoholism, it is a narcissistic relationship. What Rick is showing Morty is how modern America works. You either get busy conforming and doing what you are told by "experts" in media or you get busy identifying yourself as somebody who is a problem. Your existence, at times, is painfully aware to those around you, like in Inception.

Morty is quickly learning that to play the narcissistic game and seek their approval is a fools errand, but a game he doesn't know how to escape. Much like most American men, they can feel the bombs going off around them, but have no idea where they are coming from. They see their fathers stripped naked in divorce court and they see their friends treated like dry husks of meat by indifferent females. Guys might play the MRA game and talk about "misandry," but that is just as misguided as women bitching about "misogyny." The system doesn't hate you—it simply doesn't care about you at all. Stop trying to convince yourself that the system gives two squirts of piss about you; we are all nothing but one face in a sea of millions.

As for Morty, personally, he is realizing his own lack of autonomy and ability to find love a young boy needs. His own sister has already strung up the white flag and is completely superficial and addicted to social media as a substitute for real, human connection. His parents? Still arguing, having 3 out of 7 good days and more interested in their own self-image. Beth sees herself as a woman trapped in a failing relationship, but does nothing to ameliorate the situation. Jerry feels he doesn't deserve Beth and ports this out as jealousy and weak, controlling behavior. Jerry is a classic beta whose problems stem from believing he doesn't measure up as a man and is threatened by people who he perceives to be better than him.

The truth is that Morty is the typical young boy who will most likely become a beta. A beta is simply a man who wants to want to be a man, but he has little willpower to transform his life. He might end up like Rick, who has alpha credentials with his indifference, brilliance and naked self-absorption. Yet, we see what train Rick enters the station as: a man who will die from his own addictions and predilections. However, most likely, Morty will end up a listless beta, one who has no sense of healthy family life nor the ability to be independently attractive to females. He will have fantastic stories to tell—as any boy who endured such abuse has—but will never do anything but pique a woman's interest temporarily.

That being said, you may think that the show is more art than science, but the truth is that anybody who has endured such untoward childhood experiences has a vast array of stories to relate. I have a female friend whose alcoholic father has resulted in her having a litany of engaging—but deeply saddening—stories to tell. Just like Morty, she has so many fantastical stories that a regular, healthy listener could question the story-teller. Sure, she isn't talking about building theme parks inside a homeless alcoholic, but the stories are similar in the sense they are both fantastical and disturbing.

In many ways, Morty is undergoing what so many men have undergone—a long-term mourning—when you come to terms with reality. The hangover from being "red pill"—or whatever that term means now—can be crushing. Like receiving a call that former friend has committed suicide, all you can do is sit back and let the realization wash over you. Morty certainly hasn't committed suicide, but his innocence is next on the executioner's block.

We all have to admit some reality just to exist; even "blue pill" guys have to admit certain realities are truth just to function. However, we all need to admit many “red pill” ideas to flourish in society. It may be subconscious, but we all need to realize certain truths in order to succeed in modern society. This should come from fathers and handed down to their sons, but we all know the paucity of quality fathering in modern society. Morty exemplifies this, as his own father is primarily interested in his flailing relationship with Morty’s mother. Summer and Morty are nothing but afterthoughts for both Jerry and Beth. He isn’t there to help Morty understand himself, women or society at large.

What is most striking is Morty’s fall from innocence that Rick dispassionately forces. He takes a young boy, making the most of his terrible, yet unremarkable, childhood and forces him into the role of a hero. This is no saccharine tale of a young boy finding heroism; no, Morty is forced into his role and needs to succeed just to survive. Morty isn’t a hero of his choosing, but a boy desperate to survive his next scare with a giant, naked Santa or falling off a cliff. Just like the system in his real life, Morty knows that Rick doesn’t truly care about him. Morty will chase the possibility of approval—like gay folks chase gay marriage—but the system will only approve of anything because it is beneficial to the system. This isn’t about love or compassion, but the bottom line, labor costs. Morty costs nothing as far as Rick is considered.

The episode Rick Potion #9 had a curious ending. Rick punts the ball again, using a time machine to travel into a world where Rick didn’t destroy the world but one where Rick and Morty die quickly after saving the world. Taking the places of their recently deceased selves has Morty’s mind completely blown. They bury the bodies of their other selves in the backyard and they go inside. Rick grabs a beer and Morty walks through his home—as his parents are arguing, yet again—shell-shocked as he can’t fathom living in a world where everybody died, but exist as approximations of themselves to Morty.

That is a chilling allegory of narcissism. You can sense the people around you, but they are nothing but projections to you. They don’t exist as independent people, but people whom you have detailed dossiers on. They are nothing but jagged, fragmented memories; broken ideals about who they are or who they should be. What is qualitatively lacking is a real appreciation for their independence.

Most importantly, Morty shows he isn't this. The lines under his eyes as he slogs past his parents shows he is used to this reflexive unhappiness, that parental failure is a given in his life. He shoves off to sit beside his sister on the couch. Summer is mindlessly on social media, yet again. Morty sits backs, his mouth agap as he contemplates his new reality, with the same inhabitants, but in a new, alternate world.

In sum, Morty will most likely become a beta. Dutifully following Rick around does nothing but hurt him, even worse than his parents have hurt him. However, he has shown slight signs that he could transcend all the bullspit sprayed his way from his parents and Rick. The show does highlight the poor family life that so many boys have and also highlights how many betas are born at the hands of narcissistic alphas who only see boys and men like Morty as tools to advance their life.

A Basic Principle That Will Change Your Life

Curtis Jackson was born and raised in the South Jamaica neighborhood of Queens, New York. He was raised by his mother, a cocaine dealer and a lesbian. She died when he was only 9, and he moved in with his grandparents.

It didn't take long for him to get involved in the street life. "When I wasn't killing time in school, I was sparring in the gym or selling crack on the strip," he recalls. At the age of 16, he was caught with a gun while walking through the metal detectors at his high school. His grandmother found out, and sent him to a correctional boot camp.

He soon left, and gave himself the nickname 50 Cent, a metaphor for "change". At 21, he began rapping in his friend's basement, and quickly recognized his innate talent for making music. Three years later, in 1999, a group of producers working for Columbia Records noticed him and signed him to a record deal.

But it didn't last. On May 24, 2000 Jackson was in the car with his friend. He got out to fetch some jewelry from his grandmother's house. When he returned, he sat back down, and another car pulled up beside them.

He was rushed to the hospital, where he made a miraculous recovery and was released just days later. The bullet fragment was left in his tongue, however, due to caution for the many nerve endings in the area. When he got out, he was informed that Columbia Records had dropped him and shelved his upcoming album. They wanted to distance themselves from the violence and controversy that now surrounded his name.

Rather than getting discouraged and giving up his hopes and dreams, Jackson proceeded to shift the bleak circumstances into his favor. He started by retreating to his girlfriend's house in Pennsylvania to recover, avoid the men that put the hit out on him, and plot his return to music.

He made a game plan. When he was fully healed, he headed to Canada, where he could record music under the radar. Jackson proceeded to record song-after-song. He reinvented himself, embracing his violent street rep and his newly realized voice, which featured a distinct hiss – a side effect of the remaining bullet fragment in his tongue.

In 2002, he independently released the product of all this plotting and hard work, a mixtape fittingly titled Guess Who's Back? The mixtape gained instant popularity and launched Curtis "50 Cent" Jackson right back into the spotlight, where'd he stay for years to come.

Make your own luck

Jackson was able overcome seemingly impossible circumstances and not only survive, but thrive, because of his knack for opportunism. In the bleakest of times, he sensed a rare opportunity, and then put everything he had into turning it into gold.

Most people live their lives on autopilot. When an unexpected opportunity comes their way – something they aren't familiar with – they ignore it or decline it. They prefer to maintain their routine ways.

50 Cent demonstrated what could be done by embracing an opportunity that most people would never even see. Yet people turn down real, obvious opportunities every day. How often do your hear a friend or a colleague tell you that they were offered that dream position in Hawaii, but chose to decline it? They just felt more comfortable doing the same old, same old instead.

You have to avoid this trap. Whenever an opportunity presents itself, you must embrace it. It will make your life more exciting, more fulfilling, and more successful. Nobody remembers the man who took one job and stuck with it until he died, retired, or was fired. No, history remembers the bold and the brave.

You must be ready to identify a new opportunity at a moment's notice. And, more importantly, you must be prepared to embrace it. 50 Cent did this more than once. The legendary rapper has time and time again displayed this skill, producing businesses, books, movies, video games, and more. He simply doesn't let an opportunity pass him by. And that's why he's so successful.

When faced with a similar set of circumstances, the average man would've died off or faded into a dead-end life of crime and drugs. But 50 Cent didn't. We must learn an important lesson from his success. We must do the same, and take advantage of every new opportunity that presents itself.

At the end of the day, there's no such thing as luck. Luck is just a term that the weak and fearful use to describe those who take advantage of opportunities – those who aren't slaves to their routines – those who dominate life.

My Experience

While I don't have an example as striking as 50 Cent's, I certainly try to embody this principle and take on new opportunities whenever I can.

A few months ago, while I was working out, I received an email. It was an invitation to be part of a fashion show. They needed trainers to coach the models on stage as they sported the latest line of fitness apparel.

My initial instinct was to delete the email and continue my workout in peace. But I recognized this meant I'd be passing up an opportunity to do something different. So I quickly replied: "Count me in."

I had no idea what to expect, but I showed up regardless. It took place at an upscale nightclub in downtown Boston. I won't go into details, but it was an experience I'm glad I didn't miss.

My time that night was split between hanging out with models, drinking free drinks, showcasing some exercises – and my muscles – on the runway, and having a crowd of college girls who attended the show competing for my attention.

Take Action

Gentlemen, you must recognize opportunities and act on them. You must make your own luck. You can't live the life of a mindless chump who passes on doing new things by default. It will be your end. You probably don't realize how many opportunities are placed in your lap. You probably don't realize how lucky you could be.

To take action and begin seizing these new opportunities, you simply have to keep your eyes open. When someone asks you if you want to do something or go somewhere and your initial instinct is to pass and say no – stop. Think about it. Are you saying no because it genuinely doesn't interest you on any level? Or are you saying no because it's something new and you'd rather stay inside your own little comfort zone?

Ask yourself: what would you be doing instead? Is it something so valuable that you can't try this new thing out? Do you really have anything to lose? Be honest with yourself. Try new things. Make your own luck.

Why You Should Contain Your Envy

April 14, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Humans are envious by nature, and there is a strong tendency in our society to take advantage of this reality for the sake of financial gain. Your typical American citizen is bombarded daily with images of what appear to be impossibly excellent people living impossibly excellent lives, and subsequently encouraged to get as close to that ideal as possible by spending all that they can.

This consumerist ruse is effective, and that is understandable: I know a good hustle when I see one, and I can't knock it too much. Here at ROK, however, we're in the business of looking behind the ruse. That means looking for the truth behind the facades that drive our consumer culture, and using that reality you discover to form your own understanding of society as it really is.

L'Wren Scott's recent tragedy has provided some recent insights into the reality behind the image you're sold.

> To look at her carefully curated Instagram feed, designer L'Wren Scott was a 1-percenter, a gold-plated member of the international elite: There she was on vacation in India with boyfriend Mick Jagger; at his retreat on the island of Mustique; about to board a chartered helicopter; lounging poolside in gold jewelry and designer sunglasses; stretched out on a private plane, using her $5,000 Louis Vuitton handbag as a footrest.
> "I always say luxury is a state of mind," Scott told The Sunday Times of London last November. "Because for me, it really is. It's legroom, it's a beautiful view, it's great food at a great restaurant you've discovered because you obsessively read Zagat, as I do."
> And then, last Monday, she committed suicide, hanging herself in a $5.6 million Chelsea apartment that likely did not belong to her. Within hours, Scott's life was revealed to have become an elaborate facade — her business at least $6 million in debt, her fashion-world friends and celebrity clientele unaware of her despair.
> "Ironically, last week I said to three different people, 'I wish I had her life, look at her life — she's always somewhere fabulous and fancy,' " stylist Philip Bloch told WWD. "You think, here's someone who has it all. You just never know."

Though it turns out that Scott may have actually owned the apartment, she was indeed in a pretty poor financial position. Her seemingly glamorous company was on the verge of collapse, she was being forced to cancel appearances at London Fashion week and her tab to creditors totaled nearly $8 million. She was married to a very rich and successful man, but was a colossal professional failure in her own right. The dream she'd spent a lifetime working to create had, for all of the glitz and glamour on its surface, amounted to nothing but a financial catastrophe.

Scott’s story has gotten the conversation about false displays of success and opulence going in the mainstream media, but hers was far from the first warning of its kind. People don’t realize how many of our society’s most envied are really just fronting. Take typical comments like the following:

“Oh my god, look at that dress she wore on the red carpet! so beautiful! she must be so rich to be able to afford that! I need to be her!”

Reality: dress is a loaner for promotional purposes, designer gets it back after the awards.

Same goes for the jewelry, by the way.

"Man, Justin Bieber got arrested! but look at that Lambo he was driving, that shit was fly. I'm gonna get it like that someday or die tryin'!"

Reality: Justin Bieber rented the car, it doesn't belong to him. This is a common practice in the entertainment industry – many of the famous stars who talk about the fast cars they have don't actually own (or even lease) them; they rent them for short terms or get them loaned from labels. For all you know, your favorite entertainer can't even really afford as much as you think: he or she may be pulling in millions, but you can bet that they're often spending millions too. They live expensive lifestyles that necessitate that high income. And when that income declines, few are ready to deal with it.

"Yo, look at [insert name of well known pro athlete here]'s house! And those whips! Dude is ballin' so hard!"

Reality: dude has a mortgage on that place and many others, he doesn't own them and probably never will. His monthly expenses are astronomical. He lives paycheck to paycheck despite having a seven figure contract. The sick cars you see in front of his house are probably leased and, in some cases, are loaners given for promotional purposes in return for meeting certain advertising obligations (which many athletes often fail to meet, often getting their cars taken back). The majority of NBA and NFL athletes you see will be broke or close to it soon after they finish playing.

> When former NBA guard Kenny Anderson filed for bankruptcy in October 2005, he detailed how the estimated $60 million he earned in the league had dwindled to nothing. He bought eight cars and rang up monthly expenses of $41,000, including outlays for child support, his mother's mortgage and his own five-bedroom house in Beverly Hills, Calif.—not to mention $10,000 in what he dubbed "hanging-out money." He also regularly handed out $3,000 to $5,000 to friends and relatives. Former big league slugger Jack Clark filed for bankruptcy in July 1992 while still playing, listing debts of $6.7 million and ownership of 18 cars—17 of which still had outstanding payments.

I'm sure that the lifestyles Anderson and Clark led impressed a lot of people, but what was really there? Not much.

As previously stated, average folks are constantly faced with images of people who seem to live lives that vastly surpass the quality of their own. These images are put in front of people in order to stoke the human being's natural tendency to envy its fellow man, and it works. The goal is to get people to strive to meet the standards displayed in these images, and to spend accordingly to close the gap. The end result is a culture in which the image of an elite few has a tremendous impact on the way everyone else seeks to live their lives, as so many are willing to go to almost absurd lengths to close the perceived gap between themselves and the ideal individuals they see on television or on social media. Unfortunately, most fail to realize that the ideal lives they seek to mimic are mere facades, often generated at great personal cost to their owners. Too many are content with the mere appearance of success (tenuous as it may be) and too few are willing to take the time to ensure that solid, legitimate foundations underlie the image.

It is imperative that every red pill male recognize these truths and avoid the dangerous pitfalls associated with them. The road to true self-improvement is a long one, and there aren't any shortcuts. You might never succeed entirely in this battle: as I noted before, man is wired to want to "keep up with the Jones'" to some degree and there are going to be times at which you will give in to the temptations presented by that trait. And, of course, there will be times at which playing the game serves a purpose for you: it's not a bad idea to market yourself, provided you're not mortgaging your future in order to do it.

It is alright to indulge a little, so long as you do not lose sight of the bigger picture. By understanding the nature of our envy and seeking to build the self-discipline, awareness and control necessary to contain it, one can successfully ensure that they are never led to financial, emotional or social ruin by its ravages. You will see the images of extravagance put in front of you and, instead of running blindly to mimic it at all costs as you count stars that may not exist (as many athletes, entertainers and other often idolized individuals have done, sometimes with fatal results), you will understand the existence of facades and take the time to slowly construct your own excellence on top of a real foundation of true self-improvement, never compromising your financial or professional security in the process. It is this restraint that will ensure that your success will be one that can last for a lifetime and will be for more than just show.

A Brazilian Man Talks About Game, Social Media, And How His Country Is Changing

My interview series continues. I recently met up with my friend Gilmar Santos, a Brazilian guy whom I've known for some time. I've learned a great deal about social dynamics in Brazil from listening to his incredibly detailed breakdowns of the dating scenes in different parts of the country. Gilmar is also a man of broad knowledge and deep introspection, a combination that is becoming unfortunately all too rare these days. His insights on the impact of social media on the dating scene in his country, on physical fitness, and on spiritual development are valuable, and worth our careful attention. During our last meeting, I asked him if he would be interested in sharing his observations on Brazilian game and other topics with the Return of Kings readership. What follows are the highlights of our conversation.

Quintus: Glad you could join us here at ROK, today, cara. I know things are busy for you these days in Parana state.

Gilmar: No problems, Quintus. Thanks for having me here. You guys at ROK have been on a roll lately [laughs].

Quintus: But all fortune is fleeting, right? [laughs]. So, you're living in the city of Cascavel now, right? Give our readers a little information about your background.

The city of Cascavel

Gilmar: I was born in Sao Paulo and spent most of my childhood there. I lived in Portugal for a few years in my teens before returning to SP for college. My current job gives me plenty of mobility inside the country, so every 2 or 3 years I am given an opportunity to relocate. This was, in fact, one of the reasons I took the job, and because of this I got to live in the Amazon region for a couple of years, and am now in Parana, a state in southern Brazil. If all goes as planned, my next stop will be Minas Gerais.

Quintus: I remember being really impressed with your English abilities when we first talked. You probably speak it better than most natives.

Gilmar: [laughs]. Well, I have my moments. There is no such thing as an easy language.

Quintus: How does your current city where you live compare with other Brazilian cities you've lived at in the past?

Gilmar: Brazil is a big country, so there are a lot of cultural and racial differences according to region. Broadly speaking, the further north you go, the more African and Indian blood will you find. On the other hand, the population in the southern states descend from European immigrants (Italian, German and Polish, mostly). The city I'm currently living in is a medium sized one in Parana. Lots of blondes and redheads. Blue and green eyes are common. If you like European type girls, you're in the right place, but you won´t find the postcard Brazilian morena.

Another view of Cascavel

A suggestion I would like to make for foreign guys going to Brazil is to get off the beaten path and skip big cities like Rio, Sao Paulo, Salvador, Florianopolis and such. Try going to second and third tier cities, and even small towns. You will probably have a better time with the women and will get to know the real Brazil.

Quintus: Absolutely. That's been my experience not just in Brazil but in other countries as well. One of the topics we've really mulled over is the impact of social media on game in Brazil. I remember only five years ago in Brazil, a regular cell phone was good enough. Now it's all about Tinder and smartphones. What changes have you seen in the male-female dynamic recently?

Gilmar: The relation between the sexes is clearly becoming more westernized at a rapid pace. As a matter of fact, I look to the USA as a sample of things to come in this arena. I've observed that the media is pushing the same feminist, girl power agenda, and it looks like this is happening on a global scale, the same strategies being used everywhere. Social media such as Facebook and Instagram have given women a lot more power when it comes to dating up and having a wide range of choices in men with minimum effort, or no effort at all.

Here in Brazil people started using Facebook in 2010, which was when I noticed girls had suddenly become a lot pickier and flakier, their attitudes also having changed for the worse. I guess the best way to describe it is that there is now a big push for both girls and guys to construct this whole fake (or quasi-fake) identity revolving around social media. Guys are relying more and more on these "virtual identities" they've created for themselves, rather than putting in the real work of self-improvement.

It sometimes feels like all my hard work on self-improvement and personal knowledge has become obsolete with the rise of fake social media, smartphones, and online dating. It's hurting the old-school game severely.

For me this is the key point: the mania to create this false social media "identity" that has no bearing on reality. And for some reason, the girls are just oblivious to it. It seems like the fakers are able to get by on their faking. I'm seeing a lot of guys with no game posturing on social media. Women, they're just not that self-aware. But I have to say that most guys are as much to blame as well. Too much bad game out there, too much kissing ass.

As you know, I put a lot of effort into my appearance and I've been lifting for many years. I've also experimented with many different approach styles. But it seems like girls are becoming more and more fixated on the electronic game than anything. Guys with bad game are now able to flood the market and bring down the general level of game for everyone. Heck, when I was in college I used to ride a bicycle to class and there was no shortage of cute girls to pick up.

Quintus: I suppose I should tell readers here that you are an impressive physical specimen…[laughs]. Very muscular dude, good job, and good appearance.

Gilmar: Flattery will get you nowhere, QC [laughs].

Quintus: So, how have you had to adjust your game to deal with these changes?

Gilmar: Well, most guys in Brazil are playing the social media game, which is basically posing as if they were rich and famous in their online profiles, as well as taking loans to buy luxury cars and status items to impress girls. I am not liking it. I've tried to talk to some of these guys, but I'm at the point now of just letting them go. Either they get it or they don't. I get the sense Roosh has reached this point too.

But I am doing the opposite of what the trends are here. I think game should be genuine and come from within, so my choice has always been to focus lately on holistic self improvement, which is basically cultivating mind and body, as well financial independence and internal values such as confidence, masculinity, and things like that. Your writings reflect a lot of the same values I have.

I don't consider myself a master of game and my goal isn't to bed as many women as possible, but to enjoy good relationships with quality women as part of a meaningful life. The older I get, the more I see that the ultra-player lifestyle is part of a man's sexual adolescence, and that a mature man is naturally inclined to start a family and become a patriarch on one way or another. But it does take two to tango. The fact is that there is a shortage of women who are relationship material, so guys are forced to choose between celibacy and pumping and dumping.

Quintus: I agree with that, and it's a difficult issue to deal with. Our natural instincts are being distorted by social trends. How do you see feminism on the rise in Brazil?

Gilmar: Of course, it definitely is. A few years ago, girls with tattoos were rare. Now they're becoming more mainstream. We're seeing more deliberate uglification. Luckily our culture emphasizes personal appearance more than, say, the US or England, but the general trend has been a relaxing of female standards. Which always hurts men.

The current party in government, called "PT" ("Workers Party", of Marxist ideology) has been pushing this feminist agenda since they rose to power.

Many feminist laws were passed, abortion is now practically legal in Brazil. A woman has only to fill in a form stating she was abused in order to get an abortion… no further questions asked. Lately the government has been financing a "rape awareness" campaign, just like the one in the States. Like I said, the same strategies are being used everywhere. And of course, men just sit there and do nothing.

There are still interesting girls, though, although rare. I've come across blogs and internet groups created by Brazilian women who are promoting traditional values. If you think about it, this is crucial for them too. Like us, they have no healthy role models to look up to nowadays, so they must look back to the past if they want to remain feminine and become worthy of a relationship.

Quintus: And that's the paradox, isn't it? Their blind rush to embrace feminism contains the seeds of their own disintegration as women. They're being seduced by liars, frauds, and social misfits. But I am doubtful that most of them really understand this.

Gilmar: Isso, cara. I can't disagree with that.

Quintus: How old are you now, and what aspects of your game have you been working on lately?

Gilmar: I'm 32 years old. Weight lifting and healthy nutrition have been a part of my life for a long time now. I try to surround myself with positive influences not only through friends and acquaintances, but also by reading good books and listening to quality music. Travelling is also very important to me, as it opens the mind to different ways of living and helps overcome negative patterns of thinking. I rarely watch TV and have recently deleted my Facebook profile.

As you know more than anyone, the cultivation of spirituality is an essential part and perhaps the basis for all self-improvement. As strange as it seems, I'm also working on developing a genuine connection with women nowadays, and also trying to look at them with compassion. This of course doesn't imply being a simp or a lackey. The truth is that the relationship between the sexes has turned sour, so we're all prisoners of angst and hatred from time to time.

I find that these emotions are ultimately destructive and it is necessary to maintain good spirits even in our current social climate, and that's where spirituality has its importance.

Quintus: I know. It's like this transition period we're in between the collapse of one moral system, and the congealing of another. What other self-improvement moves have you made recently?

Gilmar: Well, my latest was deleting my Facebook profile [laughs]. Perhaps a small thing, but it has freed up a lot of time that was wasted in a non-productive activity. Facebook is like a virtual drug. It's simply a bad influence to have on your mind. There's no point in having a profile unless you're famous or have a business you want to promote.

I'm also switching my focus to day game, as I think it gives access to women of better quality both in terms of looks and personality, and you also get to engage them without their façade of arrogance. You've always been a big fan of Japan day game.

The fact is nightclubs are becoming bad places to pick up women in most cases. I've noticed that they are going there more for social validation, not to meet guys (unless you're the DJ or the owner). Also, as a guy who has a lot of diurnal activities, focusing on night game is too much of an energy drain for me. This is not to say I don't go out at night, obviously. I just don't put all my energy in it.

Quintus: Yeah, I've been seeing this more and more in Rio. We both share an interest in physical fitness and spiritual questions. Do you find that these opposite interests complement each other, and help your overall game?

Gilmar: I do. In my view, physical fitness serves to care for the body through exercise and diet, while spirituality and philosophy focuses on the care of the mind through the cultivation of beneficient internal values, while also structuring one's priorities in life. I see MikeCF as a big proponent of this. Nowadays it's easy to fall prey to nihilism and depression, which are in the end very self-destructive.

That's when you drop your standards for women and start banging anything that moves. That's when you bang just for the sake of banging. Wrong. You've ripped into other guys for doing this, and rightly so. These periods have never been fulfilling and have instead led to depressing experiences and a lot of wasted time. Behaving like an animal has never been the answer for me, but I'm no saint either [laughs]. I guess I'm trying to find a middle ground.

Quintus: We've had some great talks about how to deal with life's big questions. Have you been getting more into philosophy lately? What explorations have you made into the country of the mind?

Ayahuasca in the Amazon

Gilmar: I'm a big fan of ancient philosophy, particularly that of the school of Platonism. I've also recently started studying Vedic philosophy [from India] and was surprised by how similar it is to the teachings of the Platonic school. It's like they're saying the same things with different words. I don't agree with the modern materialistic worldview, and I think it inevitably leads to nihilism.

Quintus: I agree with this, of course. There has been a lot of cross-cultural influences over the centuries. It's not easy to say who influenced who. Now, what is theurgy?

Gilmar: That's a question that begs further explanation. As you know, I lived in the Amazon for a while in close contact with native tribes. The real treasure I gained from my time living in the Amazon were my experiences with the substance called ayahuasca. And by the way, ROK writer Runsonmagic wrote an article on this as well.

To cut to the chase, ayahuasca is a shamanic brew that enhances perception and serves, according to Amazonian Indians, to purify and align body and mind. When ingested in a proper ritual setting, with prior individual preparation, following a traditional shamanic ceremony it will lead to the perception of higher worlds or spheres of reality. My initial skepticism was eroded by numerous such experiences.

And what's more: ayahuasca is one of the many doors to these mysteries. I've found, after study, that these higher spiritual worlds are known by different cultures, although the names used to describe them differ from place to place. Theurgy is the work accomplished by accessing these divine realities and progressively setting one's life priorities straight.

Quintus: I've roughly familiar with these doctrines. Theurgy is touched on in writers of late Neoplatonism, in the late classical period, such as Iamblichus, Porphyry, and Proclus. They're not well known outside of specialist fields, unfortunately. How have these studies helped you personally?

Gilmar: They have granted me a deeper insight into my own nature, as well as that of different aspects of reality and life, such as the roots of philosophy, the original meaning and intent of medicine and health, the natural roles of men and women, the importance of carrying oneself with dignity and humility. They gave me a clear sense of right and wrong, so that I now know when I have to change my attitude and thus have more responsibility for my actions. Although these studies give you a more profound view of things, they also make you humble, because they show how small and shallow our knowledge of the world is. Your mind is really blown away when you start experiencing these things instead of just reading about them.

Quintus: Absolutely. I'm glad you've shared these experiences with us, Gilmar. I hope other guys can get a taste for what is really out there. How can you be contacted?

Gilmar: I am a member of the RooshVForum, although not as active as I'd like to be these days. My username is "Brazilianguy." Anyone wanting to contact me can find me there.

Quintus: Brazilianguy. Well, that's original…

Gilmar: Behave yourself, QC.

Quintus: You're going to join us again soon, right? We want to hear how the next Amazonian trip goes.

Gilmar: Of course. Thanks for having me, man.

Men Must Find Their Own Male Space

April 14, 2014 | by BSTAZ | Link | Original Link

My evangelical mother insisted my brother and I participate in a weekly high school bible-study. Our granola group leader was moving to the Czech Republic to teach English and our new leader was, you could say, not normal. This older gentleman, well in his forties, was the epitome of quiet, professional, badass. He didn't talk much at first. As time went on he called each and every kid in my group out on their bullshit, including me. He taught us how to think critically. He taught us to shoot. He watched us make mistakes, and freely helped when we asked. One of the most important lessons he taught me though, mainly by example, was to be a force-multiplier, not a one-man island.

When I went to college I was without my support system. I fell apart pretty quick. Wandering around the local downtown on a December evening, avoiding studying for finals and looking for smokes, I happened upon a hole-in-the-wall cigar shop off in an abandoned corner. I plopped my ass in a chair inside the cramped establishment as the twinge of quality tobacco smoke crawled up my nostrils. There were four men huddled around a small table, with a bottle of single-malt and some cards. They eyed me, unsure if I were a temporary interruption, or one of the drunk college kids common in the area. I kept my mouth shut and listened.

The men spoke about women, cars, sports and everything in between. They were all of different backgrounds and ranged from mid-thirties to late sixties. The only employee, a slender middle-aged man, would seldom speak, but commanded attention from the others. Just as I was analyzing the scene, the man calmly turned to me, and in a manner that was stern yet inviting, pointed to a specific cigar near my seat, and said "ditch that cigarette, grab one of those and pull up a chair."

After a night of bullshitting and listening to countless stories, debates, and man-chat, I went back to my dorm. I dragged my roommates back with me the next day. The same men were at the cigar shop and seemed to cautiously appreciate the injection of youth. We were all intelligent, well spoken and knew our place in the social hierarchy of this weird little bubble: rock bottom.

The four men from the night of my introduction were not the only members of this small society. Other men came and went. A rhythm was noticeable among the regulars. Like clockwork, evening would come, and parts of the group would appear, sometimes the entire ensemble, and a quorum would be had on the red stone pavers out front, well into the night.

As time went on, the regulars of that shop guided my college buddies and I with care and concern that grew out of a slowly earned trust. Not everyone saw eye-to-eye, but respect was paramount. That shop was the safest place I knew to take my problems or ideas with school, women, work, and even my family. Despite moving away, I still go back whenever I can, and regularly speak with others who found sanctuary from the world in that little spot. That happen-chance stop on a December evening years prior, became one of the turning moments of my manhood.

Men need male companionship

To wander without aim or companionship is not beneficial to any man. And to leave other men to the same fate of chance as I is negligent on my part. That cigar shop had nothing special about it. Sure the ever-present cloud of smoke, hugging the low ceiling, helped keep the weak of heart out, but it was not unique. Men congregated at that spot because there were other men there; men of virtue and morals, all alphas in their own right. What kept these men together was the effort made by one man, the shop employee, to call them, invite them and remind them of their haven, amid their busy work and social lives. A male safe space isn’t actually a physical space, its a network. This site being a prime example.

The employee of the cigar shop was like my group leader in high school. They are force multipliers, they are leaders. Men need to forge the bonds that tie us together. Alpha males will always be driven, and consequentially busy. It is the leader who takes the bit of time to gather the group, which generates a male-safe space. If every male adopted this small responsibility, and helped form groups of men to which they were accountable, wherever they may be, male safe spaces would not be hard to find. In addition, mentoring younger men would be much simpler, as a group has more resources than a lone mentor. Most importantly, a space would be less vulnerable to detrimental influence, due to the increased difficulty for unwanted members to make their way in.

Find other like-minded men, make commitments, and grow your space. Seek out the space you need rather than sitting there like a beta wishing you would stumble upon it. If you can’t find a space that fits, make the space you want and make it well.

Find your network

We men are, if anything, logical and intelligent. That last thing men want, is to waste time on someone who is a lost cause, or repeatedly displays behavior that labels them a risk. For those of you who are currently in the position I used to be in, here are some simple guidelines to follow when you go looking for a network of alpha males.

1. Pay attention. Watch with all your faculties.

2. Listen. Biggest key to listening, which seems to be confused these days, is to keep your trap shut. Talking is not listening. Listen to men who speak to other men with virtue and justice.

3. Be prepared to contribute something. After you've passed the probationary period (often unspoken, but existent), you will be accepted as one of the group. "Probation" is different from space to space, some may require little vetting, others may ask you to pledge your firstborn. Do not expect a network to allow you to leech their resources without giving of yourself, be it time, wisdom or other.

4. Make the effort. I'm not saying be a bitch, but make the effort to keep in contact, schedule and follow through. Phones have been around for a while and they aren't for playing games all the time.

5. Admit your mistakes the instant you become aware of them. Of all the men I consider equals or elders, each one is well aware of the struggle that is manhood. The one thing they don't put up with, is an individual unwilling to acknowledge their mistakes, or even worse, someone who fails to learn from them.

Barber shops, golf courses, pool halls, shooting ranges, club houses, and many other bastions of masculinity is what our fathers and grandfathers grew up in. It's left to us to stop the political correctness, femininity and general pussification that is invading them.

Never Trust Men Who Are “Good At Relationships”

We all know him. He doesn’t want to talk to girls because “no good girls go to bars.” Once your group gets him out, he’s the one buying drinks to get women to interact with him, and engaging them in boring conversation. When he finally gets a girlfriend (who he usually meets through work or online dating), he’ll skip out on sporting events, poker nights, and other masculine spaces that are necessary for men to maintain their sanity and the identity of their sex.

He’s the relationship guy. Not only is he immediately willing to subjugate his interests to those of a woman, but he will also trumpet this as a part of his identity that prevents him from running game on girls, becoming a “player,” or generally improving himself at all. The key phrase to listen for is when they brag about being “good at relationships” or “built for relationships,” despite nearly every past relationship ending in being cheated on, mistreated, or taken advantage of by their girlfriend.

After much observation, I have concluded that men who self-identify as being “good at relationships” inevitably have terrible game and should be avoided in general. Here are 4 reasons not to allow this type of man into your inner circle:

1. They are experts at lying to themselves

The “good at relationships” label is a weak excuse for these men to reduce cognitive dissonance about their lack of success with women. They can’t attract high-quality girls or keep girls interested, so they have to believe that their “skill” with women only presents itself under limited circumstances. This mentality acts as a barrier to personal growth.

2. They can't see that they are inherently supporting a contradiction

Being "good at relationships" is a self-contradictory term. The men who use it congratulate themselves for putting effort into relationships, which shows they are implicitly valuing the relationship more than their partner. This paradoxically means that they are unskilled at relationships with women, who thrive on masculine energy and are aroused by having to seek a strong man's approval. Herbs who fawn over them in support of an ersatz Hollywood-driven relationship ideal repulse them, and relationships with these types of men will either be short and brutal, or long and dreary. Despite repeated failure when pedestalizing girls, "relationship guys" never learn this lesson.

3. They are followers

Modern societal programming tells men that they should be subservient to the women in their lives. Despite hundreds of thousands of years of evolution as the stronger and more capable sex, men today are all too willing to give their balls away for the chance at some physical intimacy. Even more disgusting is that many men today actually wish to be bossed around by a woman and will gladly give up their agency even in the absence of sexual gratification

4.They are selling themselves short

It's often said that men are the gatekeepers of commitment. Why, then, would a valuable man openly advertise that he prefers to give away this value rather than save it for someone worthy? It's just as inherently undesirable for long-term commitment as a women who gives her body away freely. Behavioral economics experiments confirm that pricing influences our valuation of a good, and men who act as if their commitment is worthless will be treated as such.

The correct frame to hold is that only a select few girls are given the privilege to discover a man's immense value in a relationship context. On the rare occasions that I have a girlfriend, I know which attraction buttons to push while maintaining a counterbalance of aloofness and vulnerability that keeps them coming back. Why would I give this away for free? The men who are truly "good at relationships" would only display the skill after a girl gives significant value of her own through traits (sweetness, kindness, nurturing, loyalty) other than her sexuality.

It's tempting to talk your fellow man out of this frame, but the vast majority of the time you will be wasting your breath. It's easier to simply avoid these types of men for close friendships, or in any major role in your life. While players have the bad reputation for pussy begging, it is the "good at relationships" guy who is more likely to sell you out for the approval of a woman.

What Real Rape Culture Looks Like

Anna recently celebrated her birthday, but her party was a muted affair. Not many people feel like celebrating in times like these. Their country has been at war for six years. Most don't really know the reason why or how it started; Anna herself was merely twelve when it began. All she knows is that the city she lives in is bombed often and most of the men in her life—friends, family, lovers—have been conscripted by the army. Many of them have died while others are listed as missing in action. Some have come back from the front horribly mutilated, missing limbs, minds shattered.

Anna's unsure when the war will end but despite the calm reassurances of the country's leader (who become leader for life twelve years ago, when she was six), rumours circulate that her country is losing the war. Anna suspects this is true since the evidence is all around her. All the men save those too old or too young have been placed in uniform and marched off. Incessant bombing raids by the enemy's air force, obviously uncontested by her the pilots of her own country, occur on almost a bi-weekly basis. Leaflets dropped from enemy planes inundate the country side, and even though the security forces have threatened anyone who reads them with death, trusted friends have shown them to Anna. The leaflet's say that the enemies forces are closing in on their country's borders with alarming speed.

Anna is scared yet has no idea what to do. Her father is gone, brothers too. Her mother was grievously wounded in a bombing raid and is hospitalized. She is on her own, and tries to live life as best she can.

One day, to the east, Anna hears a battle being fought close to the city. Soon thereafter many of her country's soldiers enter the city, retreating west as fast as they can. Anna desperately wants to join them, but this city is her home. Her mother is in the hospital here, and if she leaves how will her brothers and father be able to find her? There is also the fact that enemy soldiers are closing in from the west as well. In the end she does not see the point of fleeing. She hopes for the best.

The next morning the enemy arrive. A motley force of weary faced men and women riding on tanks with submachine guns slung across their backs fill the streets. During the day they drive through the city in column after column, seemingly numberless. Most soldiers seem to pay her no heed; a couple even wave Anna over and offer food. Having been near starvation for the last year she cautiously accepts it, thanking them in her language even though they can't understand each other.

Toward evening columns begin to stop. Soldiers dismount off tanks to prepare their dinners. Anna see bottles of alcohol begin to circulate, and as the sun settles she listens to an ever increasing chorus of gun fire rattling in adjacent neighbourhoods and raucous laughter echoing off ruined buildings. Anna locks her door and tries to go to sleep.

A few hours later the screams begin. Women's screams. More laughter. Anna rolls out of bed and peeks out the window. Out in the street, illuminated by headlights (the electricity in her city has been out since February) she sees clusters of enemy soldiers. In the middle of them she sees pale, writhing bodies. Women. Women surrounded by men. They're being raped. Suddenly Anna notices a soldier notice her, and she retreats away from the window. Within minutes her door is kicked in. Three soldiers rush in, blinding her with their flashlights. They shout at her in their language.

"I don't understand you!" Anna cries back.

"Come! Come!" they bark in a crude attempt at her language.

Anna shakes her head and screams as hands grab her by the arm and hair. She's forced outside into the street.

"Stop! Let me go!" she pleads.

A fist hits her. Her head is yanked back. The cold barrel of a pistol is shoved against the side of her head. She can actually feel, not just hear, the hammer being pulled back.

"Fuck you!" the owner barks in her ear. "Fuck you!" another shouts as he strikes her again.

Her dress is ripped off, her underwear thrown aside. There is no hesitation. The moment she's forced down to the street a soldier begins to rape her. He finishes inside Anna quickly, but another jumps on her before the first has even pulled up his underwear. By the time the fourth one finishes Anna feels numb. They surround her, laughing, occasionally kicking or shoving a gun into her face. There are even women in uniform watching, goading their countrymen on. Occasionally, when the light passes over exposed male genitalia, Anna sees sores and bumps, sure signs of venereal disease. Sometimes, when it's close to her face, Anna imagines she can even see crabs squirming in their pubic hair. And the whole time pictures are taken of the assault like she's a hunter's trophy.

Eventually it just seems to stop. Her vagina is mutilated. Anna gathers her rags about herself and drags herself upstairs to try and sleep.

The next day she visits one of the few doctors not conscripted into the army. The line into his inadequately staffed and grossly under-supplied office goes around the block. In the improvised emergency room she is crudely disinfected with very little medicine, and the doctor only has enough stitches to sew up the worst parts outside her vagina. He can't get the rips inside her because he's far too busy and ill equipped to do so. She goes home and tries to let her body heal itself. There is no one there to comfort her and with the water not running Anna can't even take a bath to clean herself.

Anna is raped again that night and several other times thereafter. A tell tale bump appears after weeks of living like this. She's pregnant with the enemy's child. She could never tell which one of the dozens of men who raped her fathered it.

This horrifying scenario is what millions of German women in 1944 and 1945 lived through when the Soviet Red Army swept toward them. It's undoubtedly what many women throughout history on the losing sides of war faced. Nothing I wrote above was made up or exaggerated. In 1944 the Red Army on the Eastern Front of World War 2 finally began closing in on Nazi Germany. As soon as they left Russian soil Soviet soldiers began to rape en masse. Not just Germans either. Women in every country west of Russia were indiscriminately raped. This even includes Holocaust survivors. Yes, Soviet soldiers drove up to the death camps, saw the mounds of naked bodies and emaciated women within the barb wire and their first instincts were to begin raping every woman with a pulse.

Today's western women really have no idea how lucky they are to live in societies where the vast majority of men are sickened by the thought of rape and consider it one of the worst evils imaginable. Can any western woman of sound mind, in her vilest imaginings, honestly envision any of her male peers being able to rape a woman freshly liberated from Auschwitz? If so, I'm be more concerned about the morality of the woman.

The main inspiration for this article came from Anthony Beevor's book The Fall Of Berlin 1945. Beevor is one of the première military historians writing today and for any history buff who doesn't know him I recommend anything he's written. Here are some examples from his book to illustrate what a real rape culture is;

> "Yet there still seemed to be little idea of the degree of horrors in store for them. The most prevalent for girls and women of all ages was gang rape.

> "Red Army soldiers don't believe in "individual liaisons" with German women… Nine, ten, twelve men at a time – they rape them on a collective basis."

> "In fact victims could be as young as twelve years old. 'The NKVD group attached to the 43rd Army discovered that German women who had stayed behind in Schpaleiten had tried to commit suicide. They interrogated one of them called Emma Korn. "On 3 February," she told them, "frontline troops of the Red Army entered the town. They came into the cellar where we were hiding and pointed their weapons at me and the other two women and ordered us into the yard. In the yard twelve soldiers in turn raped me. Other soldiers did the same to my two neighbours. The following night six drunken soldiers broke into our cellar and raped us in front of the children. On 5 February, three soldiers came, and on 6 February eight drunken soldiers also raped and beat us." ' Three days later the women tried to kill the children and themselves by cutting all their wrists, but evidently they had not know how to do it properly."

> "Once soldiers had alcohol inside them, the nationality of their prey made little difference. Lev Kopelev described hearing a 'frenzied scream' in Allenstein. He saw a girl, 'her long, braided blonde hair dishevelled, her dress torn, shouting piercingly: "I'm Polish! Jesus Mary, I'm Polish!" ' She was pursued by two inebriated 'tankists' in full view of everyone."

> "It seems as if Soviet soldiers needed alcoholic courage to attack a woman. But then, all too often, they drank too much and, unable to complete the act of rape, used the bottle instead with appalling effect. A number of victims were mutilated obscenely."

> "…there was no chance of escape. Nuns, young girls, old women, pregnant women and mothers who had just given birth were all raped without pity."

> "If anyone attempted to defend a woman against a Soviet attacker it was either a father or a young son trying to protect his mother. 'The thirteen-year-old Dieter Sahl threw himself with flailing fists at a Russian who was raping his mother in > front of him. He did not succeed in anything except getting himself shot."

Events like that would be hard to read about even if they were fictional. Yet this really happened, and the fact that it did in a supposedly civilized area of the world, less then 70 years ago, is chilling. That's why it's beyond infuriating to hear things like 'the west has a rape culture' or that men who perpetrate seduction game are 'rapists'. To use a phrasing they themselves love, I submit that the bored idiots who claim that we in the west perpetrate a rape culture have no idea how utterly privileged they are.

They're unintelligent, they're ignorant of history and just saying that they live in a rape culture belittles the real victims of rape and trivializes the millions of women living in real rape cultures (which, 'coincidentally', all exist outside of the West). Hundreds of thousands of men forcing themselves on hundreds of thousands of women is a rape culture. A few episodes of Law and Order where the rapist gets off and women feeling regret after having a drunken one night stand with a stranger is as far from rape culture as the Earth is from the Sun. There is no comparison.

Admittedly there were rapes on the Western Font of World War 2 perpetrated by American and Anglo forces. Yet the numbers pale when compared to the Soviet army, and gang rapes did not occur on any type of comparable level with western soldiers. For the most part, when western soldiers liaised with German women they provided food and cigarettes and other luxuries and the German women willingly slept with them. Nowadays we call that dating. And the western allies didn't rape out France or Holland or Belgium, like the Soviets raped out Eastern Europe.

Women in the west are extraordinarily lucky to live with such civilized men. And yet they and their pathetic manslaves are trying to destroy our once phenomenal and nowadays mostly all-right culture by voting in politicians and parties who are already flooding our countries with non-western men from societies that have real rape cultures. Here, I'm going to show you two pictures from two proclaimed rape cultures, one real and one supposedly real. Can you tell, at a glance, which one comes from the western 'rape culture' and which one comes from the Middle Eastern rape culture?

Perspective is a powerful thing. Utopian daydreamers and overeducated fools who think Jean-Jacques Rousseau wasn't full of crap are going to be forced to get some the hard way as our society degrades under the masses of the 'heroic' third world types they're forcing open the gates for. Real rape cultures do exist, and they currently exist exclusively outside of western countries. However, as our elites and their cronies continue to import citizens from these cesspools, a new rape culture will take root in our once safe nations. We are already seeing the beginnings of rape culture taking hold in the Scandinavian countries as more and more Middle Easterners are welcomed in, and it's likely that, if immigration trends continue, the woman of the larger western democracies will soon suffer the same scale of rape that their Nordic sisters are already being subjected to by unchecked diversity.

All I can say is, thank god I'm a man. The west of the future doesn't look so bleak for it's Y chromosome children.

The men and women of thoughtless liberalism will reap what they sow. I hope they enjoy it, and don't forget to tell their or their partner's rapists how much they honour their rapist's culture while they assault them. I'm very sure all those German girls were telling their Soviet defilers something similar.

A REBUT AGAINST THE EVENTUAL SO WHAT THEY WERE NAZI'S COMMENT

Hey Billy, who cares? After all most of these raped women were Nazi's! They deserved it.

I expect a comment like that to pop up at some point, and to avoid posting a wall of text in the comments I'll post it up here.

Dear sirs or madam, if you honestly think like that then you're heartless and wrong. Here is how the German elections in 1933 played out. Here is a census giving a rough idea how many people lived in Germany at the time (remember, not all of voting age). According to the census, there were 65,362,115 Germans in 1933. According to the voter turnouts, 44,685,764 million voted (71.6% of the population; total percentage of the voting age population unknown). Of the 44,685,764 million who turned out to vote, only 17,277,180 voted for Hitler. The Nazi party did not even win a majority, since a majority would have needed to control 324 seats and the Nazis won only 288. Hitler was never voted in as a dictator. He gained absolute power through the historically unfortunate death of Paul von Hindenburg, back room political shenanigans and manipulating political policies that the public had no control over or say in. Out of 65,362,115 Germans, only 17,277,180 could legitimately be called Nazi's and blamed for what happened to their country. Using my shaky math, the total percentage of legitimate Nazi's in Germany who voted for Hitler was 26.43 percent.

Roughly 3 out of 4 Germans did not deserve anything that happened to them, the majority of the raped women included. Many girls raped by the Soviets were not even born when Hitler seized power, and many more at the time were children or young teens who could not vote or understand the reality of politics. Like their young male counterparts doing most of the fighting and dying in a war they had no decision in starting, these women and girls had their lives ruined by a minority of the population. The political parallels to today's progressives are eerie, and just go to show how letting even a small group of radical people with evil, ignorant and selfish agendas influence the rest of us can doom everyone.

5 Things To Do Before You Lose Your Job

April 15, 2014 | by Vajra Veer | Link | Original Link

You may have got your current corporate job right out of college, or been there for 2 months or 10 years. It doesn't matter. You are at risk and could lose your job any day. Rather than go through things you can do after you lose your job, when it could be too late, I decided to write about things that you can do now to ensure that you are in a better place when you do lose your job.

1. Make contacts and keep in touch

I have seen this many times before where people (including myself) add to their Linkedin contacts they met along the way. But with most people, the list of contacts go stale. Not a lunch, not a message, nothing, as in zilch. I'm not saying get in touch with everyone, even though that's not a bad idea if you have time., but what you should definitely do is get in touch with those you know somewhat intimately, maybe through a project, training class, mutual colleagues, etc. In other words, prioritize that contact list! Do schedule a lunch with them. You should be going out to lunch with someone from a prior job or project at least once a month.

So do you shoot the shit at lunch time and talk about how many bangs you notched last month? NO. You ask what they do, what are their challenges, what is the career progression like, and what frustrates them about their current position. There's a myriad of other questions you can ask too. Also, ask if they would leave that position if the right opportunity came. Remember, this is a chance for you to help them as well. The information gathered through a $20 lunch could be gold and can mean the difference between a shitty career and an amazing one.

2. Keep your options open

What do I mean by this? While I don't mean mack girls on the internet, I do mean “pipeline.” My meaning of pipelining in this context is different and maybe unusual to some. If you followed step one above, that means you should be lining up interviews. “But Cobra, I haven’t left my job yet.” Fear not. Just because you interview does not mean you need to jump off a ship that’s underway and get your dick chomped off by sharks without knowing how to swim.

You are just testing the waters or throwing a net to gather good information. You can simply search the internet for jobs or you can take a day off to get face to face with a potential employer you can easily build a rapport with (for later use if necessary). Recruiters are available in a lot of professions to do your approaches for you. However, use your head and do not let them push you into any job even if you have the slightest discomfort. You’re doing this to assess your own value. It’s a game. Do you find one girl and once you get her, you get married, settle down and have kids? If you’re a manosphere reader, you know this is not the case with most of us. So why would it be any different with your job where you spend at least a third of your day? Enough said.

3. Don’t respect your boss or company too much

I’ve seen this many times and will see it again. Shit, even I can’t help it. What I’m saying is WATCH IT. A decision against your favor can be even more swift than the Quintus Curtius ban hammer on ROK and the RVF banhammer combined. If for example an acquisition of your company happens overnight, your job could be at risk. It is happening to me right now. That relationship that you have invested in so dearly with all that over time and extra work can remain meaningless even long after you get the termination axe. There are roles that exist straight up to middle management and even some at the top levels (e.g. Internal Audit) where this rings true.

BUT, there exists another side of this spectrum where the axe is not so swift. Herein lies upper management. No matter what happens, these guys are generally safer than the lower end folk, with their bigger incentive bonuses, stock options or both. Also, the investments they made in relationships (higher net worth individuals they had access to) will provide them more value in the long run. If they do get the axe, it usually tends to be like a gentle virginal bang. They have earned that (supposedly). Remember, you are your own man. Figure out which end of the spectrum you’re on and act accordingly. If you don’t have access to upper management, do things to better yourself in other ways outside of work so you are the one getting the virginal bang.

4. Be social with your work mates

Maybe you know you aren’t going to have this job for long so you build this arrogance about you. “But Cobra I don’t have an arrogance, I just don’t give a fuck.” Okay, STOP. If you don’t give a fuck, it will show and this no fuck attitude will come to fuck you back doggystyle. This is not some club or the mall and you’re not running asshole game. So, do yourself a favor – be social with those around you. Ask about their life, lie about yours too. Build a goody-two-shoes reputation.

Is that beta? Maybe. But, is it going to provide you a higher chance to earn a longer stream of income? YES. In some jobs where skills are generally saturated, your ability to perform that job won't mean shit. But, how people perceive your demeanor will. Beta is fine here. (Upper management jobs are different—you can be a bit of an asshole and get away with it.)

5. Figure out what you want

This is tough when everything around you screams this is where you'll stay for a long time. Don't let it fuck with your head. Develop your own thought process. Realize that the work place is not a microcosm of the world. Not at all. It is a world created for the man, by the man. This man dictates who takes the shit, who it rolls to and who deals with it.

Now associate what I just noted with a company's organizational chart. It will now make sense as long as you remember that shit rolls downhill. The man who dictates will generally be so far removed from the shit. You have to decide if you want to be dictated to or be the one dictating. The latter is a difficult ladder to climb but more satisfying as many on the manosphere can attest. The former, however, can only be possible if you have been successfully doing #1 to #4. Set an outlook. Goals come from outlooks, because if your outlook is fucked, I can guarantee you that your goals will be totally fucked. This is coming from someone who had a shitty outlook for years along with consequently shitty goals.

Think about a time when you were on top of the world and felt like you could do anything. That mental image of yourself, is that what you see now? If that's a yes, stop reading. If it's a no, then ask yourself this: is your current job helping you get there? Be honest with yourself. If you're in lower to middle management and don't have access to upper management then the answer is no. Another way to think about this: did you ask if there are things that you can do right now that will provide better access to upper management? If the answer is some version of "Just do your job right now and we'll let you know," it's time to think ahead for yourself.

Meditate about this every day for at least five minutes, because it will help you develop an action plan. Maybe that means looking at financing options. Maybe it means looking into what makes a small business successful. Maybe it means, you want to be a physician instead of a finance guy. Whatever it is, remember that this last step will not be taken overnight. It will likely be a combination of baby steps that will turn into stronger man steps if you keep to it.

Is Modern Man Becoming A Sexual Scavenger?

April 16, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

With the rise and spread of feminism in the modern world, the options for a man to find a good, virtuous mate have been drastically reduced. Men thus have the following options to choose from:

- Learn game to sleep with as many women as possible, and put off commitment as long as possible
- To go in for relationships with modern, feminist women
- To live the life of a beta/white knight/mangina who supplicate with women for sex and commitment
- To choose a life of celibacy and renounce women
- To travel to find a "good" woman in traditional societies which have not been touched by the disease of feminism

The last option is a difficult (yet achievable) option for men, who must travel away from existing feminist societies in the western world to achieve that goal. For other men (specifically those who choose the second and third options), these choices carry huge risks of transforming these men into sexual scum "scavengers".

> Scavenger (noun):
> 1. An animal that eats on dead plant material, carrion, or refuse.
> 2. A person who searches for and collects discarded items.

Even the man choosing the first option—the player armed with game—is choosing to "scavenge" scum at some point in his life, considering that most modern feminism-bred women have morals of scum, especially when it comes to sex. But still, his promiscuity with such women is not actually "scavenging" (the reason why will be further explained below).

Compared to other men, the player still has the option to sleep around with women of his choice even if chances are that he may not always be able to choose whom to have sex with. Armed with game and a developed skill of determining women's psychology and character by both observation and experience, his greater option lies in being able to choose women of his choice when it comes to commitment, and on some occasions his game also helps to snag a "good" woman.

Yet most of the time, he is socially accused of pig-like sexual "scavenging" (a common feminist derision of non-committing players or sexually active men), without understanding what sexual "scavenging" actually means.

Who's at risk, and what is sexual scavenging?

The player, who sleeps with sluts, is in fact, not a sexual scavenger. The beta, who chooses to commit to a slut, is in fact a pig-like sexual scavenger. Why?

Scavengers eat refuse and don't leave leftovers of it. They search for and collect discarded items. That's exactly what the beta (or any other man) who commits to a slut, becomes. The player—even if chooses to sleep with a slut—does not fall in the scavenger category, as long as he does not commit to her. Sampling a slut is separate and different from committing to a slut.

Commitment thus demarcates male promiscuity from male sexual scavenging.

The average beta often makes the choice of settling down with a woman who's had her share of men in her prime. But what is he? Isn't he then choosing to scavenge for life, the discarded sexual leftovers of men who've used that body for casual sperm injections before? Thus for men choosing the second and third options mentioned earlier above, the risks of actually becoming a sexual scum scavenger are huge.

The dilemmas for modern men

With the majority of modern women being bred in the scum of feminist ideology, the average modern man in a feminist society who chooses not to learn game to interact and sleep without commitment with typical modern slutty women will often lose sexual access due to his own limiting beliefs. His sexual life is then fraught with greater dilemmas of choosing either to masturbate or scavenge women who've been used before (by committing to them) since he won't learn game.

Players, PUAs or any other men with game or red pill wisdom understand these dilemmas and thus avoid this pitfall. The hypocrisy from society they usually face later is when the same feminist society, which incipiently created a permissive and promiscuous environment of commitment-unworthy sluts around them (while ironically taking no blame for creating these very conditions), later reviles these men by calling them "PIGS."

And what is their crime to deserve this title? They chose to seduce without committing to these sluts. But realistically, they were often just pumping their wild oats in women—who'd already been programmed by modern feminism—to slut it around and celebrate it.

Why didn't (or don't) these men commit?

Modern feminist societies, celebrating the sluttiness of women, have taken away the responsibility of self-imposed chastity and decorum from the shoulders of average modern women, as compared to their predecessors. With the acceptance and rise of female promiscuity, social prostitution and "liberated" sexual decadence in modern societies, men—armed with game, money and understanding of female psychology—have the chance to experience more sex than ever before. Yet with each new sexual conquest, the distrust of the opposite sex ironically increases in the male mind when it comes to the perception of sexual chastity of modern women in general.

Right from primitive times, a man's woman—in the context of a committed relationship—was a symbol of his inviolable "honor" and, more importantly, social respect. Women were traditionally pursued for marriage by taking into consideration their lineage, beauty, wealth, status and virtue (not necessarily in that order).

In modern times, however, with the destruction of female virtue due to feminism, the "honor" and social respect of men in the context of relationships has itself become undermined and threatened due to stooping levels of typical modern women's virtue. Men with game or red pill wisdom who are aware of this truth thus choose to sidestep the snare of commitment to these (unworthy) women.

The slut-wifing beta in comparison

But this undeniable truth is often ignored by feminism-brainwashed, thirsty beta men who are often willing to commit to “save” modern slutty women (or actually themselves from sexual famine). The “savior”complex in relationships (to save sluts through commitment to prospectively save his own sex life), is common among these feminism-bred betas. The result? The slut-saving, white-knighting beta often willingly chooses an unenviable fate for himself.

Because his dishonorable choice to wife-up other men’s cum dumpsters is what actually constitutes as sexual scavenging, isn't he then the actual pig? By choosing to mate up with a sow-like woman like her, he actually ends up collecting and having sex with a woman who's a sexual left-over (discarded sexual refuse) of other men, much like an actual pig eating refuse.

There is nothing honorable in it for a man, for no slut deserves "love" or help—and certainly not commitment. The lesson to be learnt here for men is that when forced to sexually adapt in a typical modern society of feminism-bred, slutty scum-like women, male sexual scavenging is infinitely worse than uncommitted male sexual promiscuity. Opting to choose a life of potential cuckolding and having sex with a slut via lifelong commitment is incomparably worse than having sex with a slut (or sluts) without commitment.

But in spite of these underlying truths, the defeatist soul of the slut-wifing beta disregards them, nor does it chastise him for thinking that he couldn't find someone better, thus successfully completing his transformation into a sexual scavenger.

Feminist society, in fact, encourages and lauds him by rationalizing his sexual scavenging as a "noble" deed of "manning up" (and often exemplifying him to other men, with the social goal to similarly provide future partners for used up sluts). It also puts social tusks on his snout like a boar, to target the men who didn't (or don't) fall for the same bait as he did. Nevertheless, both these traits are often mutually non-exclusive and found together in these men.

You'll find a lot of men willingly choosing or subtly forced to undergo this subtle transformation of sexual scavenging in modern feminist societies. Thus, has not the average modern man become—or reduced himself to—a sexual scavenger of scum?

Through The Looking Glass

My first year of law school I was paired up with a mentor. His name was Jeff, a very nice guy actually and we kept in contact with each other throughout the years. Fast forward to today and our lives are very, very different.

You see Jeff ended up marrying a girl who happened to be very rich, attractive and nice. They now have several kids, live in a palatial estate in a well-to-do suburb of Chicago and partake in a traditional life where he works and she stay home with the kids. I'm far from the family lifestyle as you know.

Every so often I have some work out in Chicago and every time Jeff would invite me to stay at his house. And every time I would decline, opting for a hotel to either do some light gaming while traveling for work, or just relaxing and enjoying some alone time.

A few weeks ago I had to be in Chicago again and like clockwork I got the invitation from Jeff again. Except this time I accepted it.

Why I Accepted

I enjoy my lifestyle. There is always room for improvement but I am generally content overall. But that doesn't stop me from both hearing externally from numerous people about how what I'm doing is wrong (remaining single, traveling all the time, not having "roots") and once in a while questioning myself about the same thing — which I view as healthy. I don't want to just pull a blanket over my head and blindly assume all my decisions are correct.

So I wanted to see what life was like for someone that not only got married, but got married to an attractive girl who was rich, traditional and extremely nice. I wanted to see if this would also make me happy, to have chosen a path that most would consider a high standard of familial life.

On The Surface

Let's get the main observable negative out of the way immediately — his wife is now fat. Granted she's been pregnant for a large portion of the past decade (6 kids), but I've seen enough thin girls during pregnancy that I don't buy that excuse. She does now take boot camp classes multiple times a week however since finishing up her last pregnancy, so there is that. Putting that admittedly large negative aside, she is still extremely nice (as far as I can tell), takes care of the kids and cooks elaborate and delicious meals from scratch.

Back to the other easily observable positives in Jeff's life. He lives on a 15+ acre estate. There are so many rooms here I've gotten lost trying to find my bedroom multiple times. There's close to a million dollars worth of cars in his driveway, which itself is so long you can't see the main road from the house. He has two live-in housekeepers. As easily as your friends would offer you a Bud Light he offers me glasses of Blue Label (which I gladly accepted). Basically, money is of no concern.

Even his kids are amazing and I don't even like kids. Granted they are still kids so there were a few crying incidents, but overall they are insanely well-behaved. More than that they are all good-looking and extremely smart. I had a conversation with his 3-year old girl that was more substantive than some dates I've been on. If I ever have kids his would be the ideal I would strive for.

But On The Inside…

He was a dead man. At dinner one night I watched him as he held his youngest son, an infant, and for minutes on end he would just stare into space with empty eyes. You can tell when someone is looking off to the side thinking about something. This was not it. It was a robotic, dead gaze.

One of the mornings on his way to work his wife innocuously asked him about a bill and whether it was paid. He snapped at her in an angry voice that seemed to be unwarranted and something that happens after months of being passive-aggressive. Healthy minds don't react like this.

Random family and friends showed up during my few days there and everyone was having a great time besides him. I felt bad. Here is a guy who will never have to worry about money in his life, has probably the best kids a person could ever ask for, and aside from his wife's weight gain which will hopefully be reversed with the start of a new exercise regimen, she still is nice and very traditional. Yet he is the unhappiest person I've interacted with in a while.

My Thoughts

I'm very happy I finally accepted Jeff's invitation. I had a chance to see what my life could have been like had I not only veered down a traditional path, but one that at least superficially is about as ideal as one can ask for.

It would be an absolute lie for me to say that I'm 100% certain that my chosen lifestyle is the right one. I believe it is but I keep an open mind and welcome thoughts to the contrary. When people ask me about my lifestyle, I tell them about it but don't preach it because everyone is different.

And while I realize one example does not make a rule, there is no escaping a few undeniable truths. If I really wanted to just get up and go to Europe for a month, I could. In a few weeks I'd arrange for work to be taken care of, sublet my place out and off I go. Jeff has six young kids and a wife — it's highly doubtful he can even escape for one evening let alone a month.

For some having a Bentley in your driveway makes you happy. For others like myself, it's freedom. Having a coffee in a random Siberian cafe puts a smile on my face. One probably much larger than any Jeff has had for a while.

April 16, 2014 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

Men have been imprinting their bodies for decades. Cultures like the Pacific Islanders and even the Vikings have long respected a tradition of tattoos. These cultures would be shocked that people today are treating tattoos like a human graffiti wall. They would even be more shocked that women in Western cultures are getting more tattoos then the men. It’s time to put my empirical knowledge of being around tattooed sluts to use and teach you what different types of tattoos mean.

Small coin-sized tattoos all over her body

Female rationale: A female who gets small tattoos on her body wants to rebel. She wants to be seen as a strong unique individual but can't handle the pressure of doing so in full earnest. This allows her to rationalize being a unique person with the feasibility of covering it up when she needs to be.

Tips to getting her in bed: A woman like this is generally not a full blown slut. Light teasing should work well with some gentlemen game thrown in her or there. Don't over do it with the negging since these females are exceedingly self conscious.

Names of former lovers or husbands

[image]

Female rationale: Women in general are enjoy the moment. That guy who domestically abuses her for 30 minutes a day will be seen as a superhero because he plays her emotions like a yo-yo and is the perfect complement to her volatile frame of mind. She believes that the relationship will eventually end up like a Disney fairytale. A permanent shallow sign of this commitment is to ink that person's name.

Tips to getting her in bed: Women who do this are horrendously clingy. Aloof game will work wonders on them. Make sure to have an escape plan because she will falsely accuse you of a crime if mad enough.

Quotes on her body

Female rationale: Check the Facebook, Pinterest, and Tumblrs of young modern-day women. Besides posting numerous gifs and being lazy participants in activism, most of them are filled with childish psuedo-intellectual quotes. Women are wooed by the same “empowering” quotes that teenage boys are, though teenage boys simply enjoy slogans like “hard work beats talent” for their own sake. Women, on the other hand, are so enamored by such quotes that they want to use them as a template for life. The template is not an internal one like most sane people, but one to give them daily encouragement merely to live.

Tips to getting her in bed: Women who have these tattoos are basket cases. Standard issue game is deadly on them, since they fall for any confident man who acts like he doesn’t need her.

Anorexia tattoo

Female rationale: Take the rationale of quotes on the body and expand it even further. Women who get this sort of tattoo want to advertise their “struggle” by becoming a lifelong victim. They need a physical embedded reminder of their mental illness to stop from relapsing. It’s an advertisement of mental illness from the kooky women of first world countries.

Tips to getting her in bed: Tuthmosis already wrote the reasons to date an anorexic chick. My game tips are to take her out to food choices that anorexics have pigeonholed as “healthy.” Try places like sushi, vegan, and lean ethnic food. Preposition for oral fast as possible because once you get oral sex from them, everything else falls into place. Women with food problems generally are loose with the first date blowjob. Use that to your benefit.

Stars

Female rationale: The reason that you see so many stars on women is because it is the most affordable tattoo on the market to get (it's incredibly simple for most tattoo artists to do). Especially for the quality that these chicks are willing to pay for. The female rationale is getting a cheap tattoo. Follow the trend but don't spend too much money or time at the tattoo shop. Star's generally don't have a contrived deeper meaning but the blue star (a blue star on the wrist might hint that she's a lesbian). Yet, we at ROK know that most chicks are two dates with an alpha away from riding penis again.

Tips to getting her in bed: Regular game with a touch of flash will work well here. These chicks tend to be heavily into recent pop culture than any other group of females I know. Keep the pop culture references heavy and make sure you're watching the food tab. Women are cheap with their bank account but don't mind putting you in debt. Get separate bills if out for food.

Slut zone!

Female rationale: Take some tailor measuring tape. Put it around a chicks belly button and measure from there to the thighs. This is called the slut zone. A woman who gets a tattoo here both wants and adores male attention. They want to emphasize that they want men to stare down there. They know that the men they target have been with quite a few women and want to advertise that they are a piece of sexual meat. This area is the perfect place especially with low cut jeans or a thong to get male attention.

Tips to getting her in bed: Women who get these tattoos are like bodybuilders looking for protein. Replace protein with penis and you get the mental picture. They will use their body and more importantly sex to get their goals. Some women just want alpha attention. Others might want to have half your property. These types of women barely work in a LTR. DON'T EVER MARRY THEM OR EVEN COMMON LAW MARRY THEM. Have a story for the beginning, middle and end. Stick with it or you will get hurt. Any woman who lets a tattoo artist tattoo an ass or pelvis art piece for hours is a slut. If this doesn't set up your slut anti-missile defense, nothing will.

These aren't all the tattoos but should give new players a morning dose of coffee. Women have been taking male customs and butchering them since the dawn of time. And now they want to have their cake and eat it too, meaning they will slut it up while young, with their "unique" tattoos, and then they'll find a thirsty provider beta that doesn't understand her tats are an advertisement for all the past cock she has had.

How To Get Respect As A Man

[image]

Respect. One word that captures one of the defining qualities of what it means to be a man. Every man wants to be respected. This is an innate quality in all of us, similar to all women wanting to be beautiful. Both are needs, but not many men or women are truly respected, just as we know most women are not beautiful. Why is this?

The simple answer is that most men live average lives, work an average job, make average wages, fuck average women and are buried at the end with a handful of funeral attendees.

To quote the fictional character of Don Draper from the superb television show MadMen, "You want some respect? Go out and get it for yourself".

This is not only a classic quote, but is the hard truth. See, in our current day there's an issue with people (especially youth) of entitlement.

- "I want to be famous!" (What have you done to be celebrated for?)
- "I want to be rich!" (Is sleeping in everyday going to help you with that goal?)
- "I deserve to date the quarterback of my high school!" (No bitch you don't. Start with a treadmill.)
- "I don't want to work hard to be successful. It shouldn't be this hard!" (Listen you ungrateful spoiled brat: If you're afraid of hard work, then you don't deserve success)

If you haven't heard one of these statements made, then I'm sure you've heard something similar.

People today, feel entitled to success that they don't deserve.

As men in our quest to be respected we must examine what it is about each of our respective lives that commands true respect. Obviously, everyone's life has worth and a modicum of respect is due to an individual as long as they don't give reason to not respect them. However, what can a man do to get respect above the threshold?

Here's a few tips to building a life that commands real authentic respect.

5. Respect Yourself

If you don't have discipline, look down at yourself, have an inferiority complex and are full of self-doubt, then don't be surprised when your fellow peers don't respect you. Respecting yourself is the first step to the foundation of building respect. Start recognizing your strengths and make yourself into the best man you can be. As you go through this process, you'll find that other's will respect you more.

4. Every Man Should Build Something

For whatever reason, building something from the ground up does something to a man's character. Maybe it's the hard work, the courage to risk it all, or the feeling of accomplishment against great odds, but whatever the exact reasons are, building a business, or becoming great at something, helps you not only respect yourself, but get respect from your fellow man.

Regardless of your personal opinions of Mark Zuckerberg, Donald Trump, or Ted Turner, they are respected for building businesses. Sure, Donald had a great head start, but he didn't rest on his laurels and live his life as a trust fund kid. He used it to build an empire. Mark, although I personally detest Facebook, built something from nothing and became a billionaire because of it.

3. Don't Be A Doormat

Nothing makes me lose respect for a man quicker than a man who allows himself to be a doormat. Stand up for yourself, don't be shit on and have an opinion. This doesn't mean that you have to be a loud mouth opinionated fool, but it does mean that you should have a damn backbone. Men who stand tall and stand for something are respected men. You may not like them, but you respect them. I would rather be respected than liked. The difference between wanting your peers respect and wanting to be liked is a huge. Wanting respect will drive you to become your best. Wanting to be liked is what women do. Know the difference.

2. Learn To Handle Women

Men who have learned how to handle women are respected men. Why? Because we all know how damn hard it is to become great with women. If you do this for yourself, then not only will you have a grip on an aspect of life that most men do not, but you'll also gain the respect of your peers. This doesn't mean you're sending them naked pics of your latest conquests and hoping for your ego stroked, but instead become a man that others can count on to get solid advice about women from. Think more the Godfather and less American Pie.

1. Follow Your Passion

You have a passion. If you don't, than examine your life and find out what it is that you can't live without and that you want to become great at. Any man who is at the top of their respective field is respected. Remember respect is earned, not deserved, so decide today to build a life that you respect yourself and watch your peers start respecting you.

Honestly, as a youth did you dream about working an average job and banging average girls? Go here.

What A Cult Leader Who Think He's Jesus Can Teach Us About Humility

April 17, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

> "Do not try to be superior to the people around you."

These are the parting words of Vissarion, a Russian cult leader who believes he is the Second-Coming of Christ, when asked by a Vice documentary crew what advice he'd have for Western viewers to follow.

It might seem odd for a man who claims to be Jesus to suggest humility, but when you look as Vissarion's actions it makes sense. Vissarion's movement Church of the Last Testament lives a relatively simple existence in the mountains of Siberia. Their community does not eat meat, practices traditional sex roles, and lives a peaceful agrarian lifestyle. Despite having thousands of followers who believe Vissarion is Jesus Christ himself, he rarely appears publicly, and seems to have little desire to proselytize or spread his message. His appearance in this Vice documentary was his first media appearance in three years.

The Comparative Mind

Vissarion is not the first spiritual teacher to suggest avoiding pride. The Bible itself says "pride cometh before a fall." The desire to feel superior to others has been discussed by many spiritual teachers, as coming from the comparative mind. The comparative mind is the part of the ego that is constantly comparing us and our accomplishments to others.

“He has more money than me. She’s more attractive. He’s weaker.” The comparative mind oscillates between pride when it compares itself to someone it deems itself better than, and shame when it compares itself to something it deems itself worse than.

Rather than basing its value in the absolute universal truth of who a person is, the comparative mind bases it in the relative constantly changing value of how it measures up to the relative success of others. This kind of thinking leads to a narcissism, mood swings, and a constant struggle to be better than everyone around you.

There is a parable about the comparative mind that appears in several cultures. A shopkeeper was constantly comparing himself to his rival across the street. He obsessed over who did more business, who made more money, and even whose wife was prettier. One day an angel came to him and said, “behold, the Lord has smiled on you, and I will grant you whatever you wish for.” “What’s the catch?” the shopkeeper shrewdly asked. “Whatever you get, your rival will be granted double. If you get a thousand dollars, he will get two thousand. If you ask for a beautiful wife, his wife will be twice as beautiful.” The shopkeeper thought for a moment, and then replied, “Blind me in one eye.”

This is the comparative mind at it’s worst. This is why Vissarion adds after his warning against seeking superiority, “that intention leads to death.” Yet the comparative mind is all around us. It is at the heart of the ego. I saw the comparative mind throughout the documentary on Vissarion, in his followers, in the documentary host, and in myself.

The Documentary

When Vissarion’s followers appear on camera, they describe him as the “only source of information for all answers,” convinced that he is the one true teacher. Interestingly, by calling him superior to other teachers, they miss the point of his teachings. The idea that believing “our God is superior to your God” has lead to war and death throughout human history is something Vissarion and the most skeptical atheist can agree on.

Vissarion’s community practices traditional sex roles. Boys and girls are educated separately. Boys are taught “to build a house and comprehend the masculine profession.” Girls are taught to respect men because “man is a creator. He is a master.” Men and women are taught to live in peace with one another in harmony, and avoid taking each other’s roles.

When the teacher at the girl’s school suggest the documentary host bring his girlfriend, he calls it an offer for “brainwashing my girlfriend into misogynistic slavery.” It’s clear he sees the Western emphasis on equality as superior to Vissarion community and traditional sex roles. He looks down on the men and women for marrying young and taking on traditional roles.

In doing so, he actually ignores that most of Vissarion’s followers are there by their own choice, and very happy with this way of living. In holding Western equality as superior to traditional roles, the host actually misses the entire intention of the movement for equality, which was to give men and women the freedom to make their own choices about what roles they play – including the freedom to make traditional ones. As one follower replies when asked about people becoming followers, “if this person [Vissarion] can help them, why not?”

The documentary host himself is a somewhat pudgy American, who sneaks chocolate covered ice cream in before trudging up the mountain. Despite being in a beautiful foreign country, he finds himself wishing for American conveniences. He’s sloppily dressed, and somewhat scattered and effeminate in his mannerisms. He seems somewhat shocked by the religious and cultural beliefs that have been common throughout most of human history. Watching him throughout the documentary, I found myself judging as inferior to the people he was interviewing, and myself as superior.

Of course, who am I to judge? From another perspective, he’s traveling the world making cool documentaries. Sure, ice cream isn’t the health choice I’d make, but for someone experiencing a blood sugar crash, ice cream is a step up in terms of his energy. And more importantly – what do I gain by comparing myself to him in any way? As a writer or an artist, I can offer a different perspective, in the hopes it benefits others, but his life is his to lead, and my judgement is mine alone. If I were to judge him, or make his perceived shortcomings the focus of my work, I’d miss the intention I have when I read or watch content online, which is to improve my own life, not tear others down.

This is what Christ meant when he said, “judge not, lest ye be judged.” If you play the game of the comparative mind, there will always be someone better – someone stronger, wealthier, more attractive, better with women, older, wiser, or more successful looking down on you. You won’t be able to enjoy or be grateful for what you have because you’ll be constantly comparing it to artificial standards to see if it is enough.

Replace Comparison With Gratitude

Vissarion's community could hardly be considered superior by Western standards. They don't have money, cell phones, trendy clothes, a social media presence, or any of the things Westerns consider essential. Yet, watching the documentary I found myself wishing for their lifestyle. Vissarion has created a space where men and women live in harmony with nature and each other, in spiritual community with traditional sex roles, healthy living, and gorgeous views. Who wouldn't want to live there?

But even this desire to live someone else's life comes from the comparative mind. I know my path isn't to run off to Siberia to join or a cult or disappear into the woods (yet), and I suspect it isn't the intention of our readers. Rather than comparing our lives to theirs, it's better to appreciate what each of us have and begin allowing more of the experiences we're drawn to in others into our own lives. Could I spend more time in nature and community where I am now? Absolutely. Could I drop some of the judgements I have and focus more of my attention of the things I'm grateful for? Easily.

Despite having thousands of followers who see him as the Son of God, Vissarion seems to have little desire to increase his control. If anyone would be tempted to seek superiority, it's a cult leader. Perhaps Vissarion has been down that road and seen where it leads. It is said "the greatest power requires the lightest touch." Where other cults go door to door spreading their message, and hunting down apostates, Vissarion offers very little for his critics to push against. By not claiming to be superior, he creates space for others to soften and hear his message.

During the documentary, Vissarion's message to his followers is that we are "all students in the school of life." Perhaps rather than seeking superiority, Vissarion would have us simply seek to explore, learn, and grow. Despite having a message of love, his message has been misinterpreted by many of his own followers, and transformed into a message of superiority. Hey, wait, that sounds like another famous spiritual teacher I've heard of. Maybe this guy is the Second-Coming of Jesus Christ after all.

How To Run Game In 2014

I noticed long ago that when I'm aloof and emotionally unavailable, women go crazy for me and want me to be their boyfriend, sometimes even obsessing over me. Conversely, when I make my interest apparent, and am what they say they want, a "nice guy," they tend to find me needy or clingy, and soon enough get bored and move on to the next guy who will get them excited, at least for a little while. There used to be exceptions to this grim rule, however, and every few months or years I'd enter into a fulfilling relationship with a quality woman, who didn't punish me for being a human being with feelings or what she said she wanted.

Yet in the last few years I have found virtually no exceptions: if I don't run aloof game, I am not successful—simple as that. I am 33, and though I don't look as good as I did at 23, I am still a pretty attractive guy who has his life together and some game to boot. So I must surmise that the explanation for this lies not with me, but with women. And it is clear what is at work here: as more and more players and even ordinary men are realizing, women in 2014 have even more options with respect to dating than they did only five years ago. The other night I was on a date with a mere 7 who remarked that her POF account had over 100 unread messages.

I sometimes try to imagine the incessant attention attractive women now get thanks to social media and all the dating sites and apps, and it is simply staggering. Meanwhile, as their options increase, it is the opposite for us men: more men pursuing them means more competition for us. Hence the increase in flaking and women simply losing interest in quality men who have not even done anything to turn them off. For women, dating is like one of those cable packages with 300 channels. There's always something new to check out, and so they do.

If you want to see what American women are like today, it's illuminating to look closely at the body language of the many attractive women on POF, OKC, etc., paying especial attention to their lips and eyes, features which are so expressive, and therefore revealing. The women almost invariably have a smug, self-satisfied, haughty look, which goes perfectly with the generic narcissism in their profile descriptions. "Can you keep up?" is probably the most common question in these profiles, since, after all, the little Instagram celebrity is always zipping off to do something oh so cool and important.

Today I have to work a lot harder than ever to keep up a rotation, or even to have an ongoing FWB who won't simply fade out of my life for no clear reason and without any explanation. This was not the case even five years ago, but, given the course our highly technological and feminized culture is on, women's options and power are increasing each year. Human beings are naturally full of unrealistic expectations concerning happiness and their wants generally, and now that they get so much attention from such a variety of men, most attractive western women are not going to settle for anything less than perfection. Of course, that doesn't exist, so what these women are really waiting for is the wall of their 30s. And yet they will continue to be insanely picky until that sad time suddenly arrives.

Nor has there ever been such a lack of propriety in women. Flaking, again, is rampant, and getting worse every year. Likewise, once they have decided they no longer want to see you, women will simply cease contact with you, without any pangs of conscience. And yet, we still often hear that there are no gentleman anymore. But in the days when there were gentlemen, there were also ladies: the two held together a complementary social code, and it is incoherent to expect men to be gentleman when you can't even be bothered to let us know where we stand in regard to you, however "awkward" it may be to do so.

We can understand what is going on here by viewing it as the high cost of freedom. Human beings, at base, are bundles of monstrous egotism; we need societal constraints because without them, we will incline to pursue our own interests without any regard for the effects on others. This is basically what attractive women are able to do today, so the question for us men is, how can we best make our way in this condition that is so overwhelmingly difficult?

Give women the masochism they crave

"Why won't he call me?" "Will he ever call me?" "Does he just want me for sex?" On the surface, it would seem awful for a woman to be asking herself these questions. After all, she wants a "nice guy," she says. But in truth, modern western women are fundamentally perverse, and far from wanting a nice guy, what they really want is to be emotionally tortured by a man who is as cold and taciturn as Clint Eastwood in his movies.

The long, drawn out agony of wondering when you will call, and why you don't want to be her boyfriend, is in fact the romantic ideal, despite all the empty talk about the desirability of nice guys and gentleman. The ugly truth is that in today's dating scene attractive women thrive on emotional deprivation. If you think I am wrong, run both aloof game and sincere, nice guy game: I assure you that the former will almost always work, while the latter almost always will not. I've been in the game for about ten years. I run night game, day game, and internet game in one of the largest cities in the country. So I have a massive amount of confirmation that what women want most of all is to be tortured by the rare man who doesn't want them. Guys who aren't this way are nothing but white knights and beta orbiters, on hand only to be used and to inflate women's vile egos.

Women also want physical masochism. Have you ever noticed that when you let out a groan as a woman is sucking your dick, she groans in response? The reason is that female sexuality is extraordinarily receptive. A woman's pleasure corresponds to your thrusts. She is passive while you are active. When I pick up a woman before throwing her down on the bed, she usually squeals with delight as soon as she feels herself being taken control of by me. I've never known a woman who didn't like to be pounded hard, to have her hair pulled, to be spanked, and so on. But many women have told me that in their experience, most guys are afraid to do this stuff. These well-meaning men don't want to hurt their little princess.

Don't be afraid. While it is necessary today to hold back emotionally, when it comes to sex you need to be very forward and at least somewhat aggressive. I am not talking about punching women in the face or anything like that, but the more you physically overwhelm her, the greater will be the woman's arousal. As a result, her pleasure will be greater than that which she has had with most men, so that she will want to come back for more.

You may also be able to get some women emotionally hooked on you by employing the following trick that has worked for me over the years. For this, it helps to be a big, muscular, well-hung guy, but if you aren't one, do your best anyway. Get in the missionary position. Now wrap your arms tight around your girl's torso while smothering her face with your chest and shoulders. Plunge your dick as deep into her as possible, and hold it there for a while. Now start pounding, while keeping her completely enveloped. Now and then free one arm up in order to take hold of her hair and pull her head back. Last as long as you can. There seems to be something about the intense dominance and intimacy of this position that weakens women and makes them attached to you.

Of course, though giving women the emotional and physical masochism they crave is the best game you can run in 2014, there are no guarantees that this will work or that the women you run it on will stay with you. When I was in my early 20s, women my age actually showed emotion and wanted to enjoy you the person. Today, young women are conditioned to be players, though that's an easier game for them to play than it is for us. I am frequently shocked by how easily young women can have sex without feelings and how they do not feel at all attached. They really are as coarse as the coarsest men around. In short, the dating scene has changed a lot in recent years, and in all ways it has been for the worse.

Be A Single Man During Your Twenties

April 18, 2014 | by Viriato | Link | Original Link

Frederich Hayek started his great work The Road to Serfdom by dedicating it to all socialists. Although this article does not remotely compare to Hayek's book, I start by dedicating it to all men in their twenties who currently are in a monogamous relationship with a women.

I have noticed that the vast majority of men, who like me are in their twenties, are desperate for a relationship. Regardless of their gaming skills, most men are chasing poon in order to find a girlfriend.

Even when I first came in contact with the Pick Up Artist movement I noticed one characteristic common to the vast majority of its members: they were all desperate for a girlfriend or soul mate. These men were learning, through an emotionally painful process of trial and error, the tricks of how to get laid, yet they were anxious to waste all those hard-earned skills in the sole quest for a monogamous relationship.

In the red pill community this phenomenon doesn't seem to be so widespread, but a considerable part of the red pillers are in the constant search for the high quality woman, or the 'unicorn'. Some even claim to have found it: a pure maiden, who isn't hypergamous, dishonest and slutty. As this enlightened man wrote in 'The Red Pill' subreddit the existence of the 'perfect feminine lady' is utter bullshit.

For many years I saw this as a rational behavior. I was washed up with the 'soul mate myth', thus seeing as a reasonable quest the search for a lifetime monogamous relationship with a female. Simply put: I didn't understand the nature of women, neither I perceived the path my life was taking.

You Think You Are “In Love”?

After some careful thinking, to which swallowing the red pill greatly helped, I observed that the vast majority of men who were in a relationship or were eager to get into one are motivated to do by of one or more of the following reasons:

1. They keep searching for a girlfriend because they want regular access to a vagina.

2. They keep searching for a girlfriend because they are afraid they’ll never get laid, or at least, they’ll have to put a gargantuan amount of effort to have sex.

3. They keep searching for a girlfriend because they are a game denialists, and therefore they think the human mating dance is all about either money, looks or luck (and so the ‘dating game’ is a waste of time in their perspective) .

4. They keep searching for a girlfriend because they are afraid that they’ll be forever alone.

5. They keep searching for a girlfriend because they need a woman to complete their life, share their weaknesses and establish an emotional connection.

6. They keep searching for a girlfriend because they think not all women are like that, or they’ll find a pure maiden who isn’t hypergamous, dishonest and slutty.

7. They keep searching for a girlfriend because they are afraid to be judged by society, or they think that being in a monogamous relationship is the ‘right way’ of expressing your masculinity.

The list above is not thorough but it mentions the most likely scenarios. There is just one thing these guys don’t realize: they are misled by their own beta attitude. What happens is that infatuation, fear and lack of perspective about life in the younger years leads many young men to believe that they are “in love” (whatever that is) with a particular woman.

For the monogamous 20-year-old fellow reading this: you are not in love pal, you are just letting your personal shortcomings, fears or social conditioning dictate your life.

Feminist cultural conditioning has had the effect of turning men into beta pussies, selling them the idea that a long-term monogamous relation with a woman in the pedestal is the ‘superior way’ and an absolute necessity in order for a guy become a true man. This is why you think you are in love. This why you feel you “can’t live without her”.

Reality And Biology Favor A Bachelor’s Lifestyle

Men have a biological tendency to polygamy. We have testosterone, which naturally creates a bigger sexual impulse. Also evolutionary forces side with us, having shaped our masculine behavior so that we would ‘want’ to impregnate the biggest possible number of females.

Also let’s consider the typical male human being passing through his twenties in the Western society. He is—or at least should be—in his physical prime. His energy and libido are at an all time high. He has few responsibilities. In addition, specific cultural movements have ‘liberated’ his female counterparts, and slut behavior is at record numbers. Communications and transports are easy and cheap, making the supply of pussy virtually infinite.

Now I ask—why would he want to be in a monogamous relationship? Why would any young man even consider it? We have the biological impulse against it. Social and circumstantial conditions have never been so optimized to a bachelor’s life.

Single Life Teaches Valuable Lifetime Lessons

The advantages of a bachelor’s life in terms of personal growth of the young man are completely ignored by society. Leading a successful single life implies that the man eventually learned an important set of skills: how to take calculated risks, how to understand body language, how to manage a tight schedule, how to be a good conversationalist and persuasive, how to handle random social situations (and women), and how to have fun and be entertaining. He’ll inevitably will acquire an ‘abundance mentality’ and become more positive in his outlook towards life. The successful bachelor also learns how to be an emotional rock with women, a feature that probably his parents haven’t equipped him with.

These characteristics will prove to be useful as you go into your thirties and reach your sexual prime. By this point you’ll have understood the nature of women (and their interchangeability) and so you will be able to make the most out of this phase. Also, you won’t let the emotional fallout caused by drama from women’s behavior affect very important parts of your thirties, such as your professional performance or your social circle.

Furthermore, experimenting and discovering in the dating arena brings lifelong benefits that will blend with your personality. You’ll learn to adapt to diverse (and sometimes adverse) situations and make the most out of them. After some time, whenever you are in social gathering you’ll be constantly analyzing the human social dynamic, receiving information about the environment around you that most people are unaware. Taking it to an extreme: you’ll become a “profiler”, being able to diagnose someone’s personality and intentions based on body language and other subtle behavioral hints in a few minutes. This can be of vital interest to other aspects of your life.

Self-Improvement Will Become Your Biggest Asset

Every now and then, there is a point in a man’s life where he sits on the couch and thinks “now I reached the top, now I can rest”. We have all done this mistake. It is a recipe for failure. Stagnation means failure because life is constantly changing.

A successful single life is a synonym for constant adaptation, for constant growth, for constant self-improvement. In order to get frequently laid you’ll have to work and improve yourself on a physical, cultural, professional and personal level. You’ll have to be growing constantly in this areas. The minute you want to sit on the couch and live off the earnings of your current pussy kingdom is the minute you’ll acquire a loser mentality.

A single life during your twenties will teach you how to keep your tools sharp to face the constant change. After a few years, self-improvement will be just one of your personality traits. It will become your second nature, not just something you do because your girlfriend told you were fat or you simply don't make enough money.

This is the greatest lesson you can take from being single in your twenties: in order to be successful in an ever-changing reality you have to be constantly improving and growing. Sad part is you'll only learn it if you try it. And don't worry, you won't miss the 'unicorn.' She simply doesn't exist.

5 Things I Learned From My First Trip To Europe

Unplugging from the matrices of society and beginning your own journey down the red pill opens the doors to many new things. How to understand women, the bullshit of the workforce, finances, and the freedom you get from traveling the world are some of the many opportunities whose doors are swung wide open when you awaken from the coma society puts you into at a young age.

Travel was one of the few things I had done very little of in my short lifespan. I was determined to remedy that, as I wrote this in a post earlier this year here at Return Of Kings. I booked a trip to Europe last December, for a total of 20 days. I burned through nearly all of my vacation time that I had saved up at work. I knew that if I didn't take this opportunity soon, I would regret it. So, I took the plunge.

After now traveling through Wroclaw, London, Barcelona, Rome, Prague, and then New York City on the way back to California; I can confidently say that my eyes have been opened. Never in my wildest dreams had I ever planned to leave the Sunshine State, but now in no situation whatsoever can I see myself living in California permanently for the rest of my adult life. I do not know where my next calling is (New York is at the top of the list, admittedly), but I can say this with the utmost confidence – travel changes a man. It will open your mind.

With that being said, here are five things that really stood out to me that I discovered about myself, American culture, and more while abroad.

The Creative Juices Will Never Flow Faster

Once I was relieved of my usual cubicle duties, my mind was freed. It is difficult to explain how exactly these floodgates open up so drastically, but I was amazed at how much deeper my thoughts were once I had stepped away from work for a few days. I would say it took about three days of freedom, as well as a fair amount of drinking, admittedly, and all of a sudden ideas began coming.

I had book ideas, business ventures, blog posts, and potential product concepts all coming to me at a speed I never realized my brain was capable of producing. Today, my first day back at work, do you know how many new, exciting ideas came to me from a creative aspect?

Zero.

A man's life was not meant to be lived in an 8×8 prison cell with dull grey fabric walls. Even a woman's kitchen has more space.

America Is Spreading, And Fast

As stated, I visited five countries/cities:

1. Wroclaw, Poland
2. London, UK
3. Barcelona, Spain
4. Rome, Italy,
5. Prague, Czech Republic

I suspected that Poland and the Czech Republic would be the biggest culture shock to me. I suspected London, Barcelona, and Rome to be relatively Westernized. However, even in “poor” countries like Poland (one girls reaction as I nearly ripped apart a 10 PLN bill was priceless), the American way of life is spreading fast. Smartphones are common. McDonald’s and Kentucky Fried Chicken are everywhere, and you’ll be hard pressed to find a coffee shop more popular than that garbage chain Starbucks.

However, despite the fact that American culture is spreading rapidly, you do have a bit of an “American God” factor at play in these countries. My California driver’s license was the biggest and easiest value demonstrator I’ve encountered in any situation. I played the hell out of that thing – even introducing myself as “California Kyle” and seeing how far I could take it.

If you have game in America, I can definitely say you could do well overseas. If you suck with girls here, I doubt you’d be better off in any country.

Solo Travel Can Get Lonely

I had by far the most fun in Poland, when I had a great wingman with me (Lucky Lothario), and in New York City with my girlfriend. Traveling solo can get lonely, especially during the day. While I met other tourists every day, and made friends at night, the amount of energy it took to get myself into a social mood constantly was draining. By the end of the trip, I had almost nothing left in the tank to go out and meet people. I nearly fell asleep in a bar in Prague at about 9:30pm on one of my final nights.

With that being said, if I had company the entire trip, I would not have gotten as much enjoyment out of it. I also think living in a foreign country would be vastly different, when you establish routines and make new friends. However, doing the “tourist” thing constantly solo is not something I would personally recommend.

I Knew I Was Making A Mistake By Seeing So Many Places

Everyone told me; I didn't listen.

Five countries in the amount of time I had is simply way too much. It is hard to account for travel time for airlines and public transit to city centers, in many cases what was supposed to be three days in a city turned into two due to being delayed. I knew going in that I was really going to be pushing the limit, and I learned my lesson.

I wanted to see Poland because I'd heard so many good things. I needed to see London with the possibility of moving there for work. I had heard Barcelona's nightlife was legendary (quite the contrary, I found it to be a bit of a disgusting shit hole). I have always loved Roman history, so I wanted to sight-see there. I'd heard Prague was a gorgeous city with a lot of gorgeous girls (truth).

Overall, I did everything I wanted, and needed, to do. I will try not to have regrets about my logistical choices. But, if I were to do it again, I'd spend a minimum of a week in a city if I truly wanted to immerse myself as a local and get the most out of a trip.

Post-Vacation Hangover Is Real

This trip was amazing in so many ways. Truthfully, I looked forward to coming home when I was at the tail end of my time in Europe. Now that I'm back in California, and back at work – I can't wait to go back.

Cars, fancy apartments, and other materialistic items are cool, and I'd never deny that I enjoy all of those things. The problem is, to buy all of those things, most (not all) will need this shitty thing called a corporate job. A corporate job which allows you a vacation for, on average, two weeks a year. Two weeks a year in which you can unplug before you return to your life as a legal slave, working for peanuts to make your bosses millions.

Fuck them. There are ways around the system, and I'll find them and abuse them until my last breathe. I have too many places I want to see, and not enough time on this planet to see them. The materialistic items pale in comparison to the experiences and memories of this trip that will stick with me for years to come. When I'm lying on my deathbed, it won't be my 401k bringing me happiness; it will be my memories of the world; and the people and cultures within it.

This was not my final good-bye to Europe. I'm just getting started.

I had enough adventures on my trip that I'm blogging about it near-daily on my blog. If you're interested, stop on by and check out the travel series so far:

Why Asian Women Are Better To Date Than American Women

April 19, 2014 | by Kilmister | Link | Original Link

"Once you date an Asian girl, you will never go back." Men often hear something similar to this from other men who have dated Asian women, meaning women directly from Asia, not American women of Asian descent. This is important because American women can be completely obnoxious and entitled. When an American-born Asian women behaves in that manner, it is actually tenfold more annoying.

Living in Hawaii, I am surrounded by Asian and American women. So I have tried to take advantage of this and go out on dates—if you can still call them that—with Asian women as well as American women. I immediately noticed stark differences in the way they conduct themselves.

Pre Date

Arranging the date is far easier with Asian women. The Asian woman listens and happily accommodates with any recommendations. She is just glad to be in your company and whatever plans you make are almost irrelevant to simply being with you.

The American women is indecisive, whiny and wants you to make all the decisions. If you offer up something she does not approve of she will say so, but not offer any alternatives, not to mention the 30% chance she will flake all together. As a man, you are already annoyed with her but you move forward with the date anyway.

Appearance

In Hawaii things are naturally quite casual, but for a first date you still step up your dress a little. At least some jeans and a button up. This is Hawaii, again, and unless you have been here you have no idea how casual it is. George Clooney said it best in The Descendents, "Some of the most powerful people in Hawaii look like bums and stunt men". However, Asian women will actually tend to overdress a bit. But when she opens her door in a nice sundress, hair and makeup done in a subtle but striking manner, combined with the pleasant aroma produced by her favorite perfume or body spray, you are fine with it. You feel good knowing she put forth effort to look good for you, for herself and doing so in tasteful way. You are proud to have her on your arm.

Your American date meets you at the bar or in the parking lot of her condo. If she dressed up at all it is in a dress too tight and too short for anyone not earning meth money on a street corner. She has on so much makeup that Bozo the Clown would be resentful. In Hawaii she will usually just show up with her hair pulled back in a ponytail. Maybe some jean shorts a size too small and a tank top or t-shirt with a bra that shoves her tits up into her throat. Revealing much more while simultaneously making her less attractive. Sure, you want to bang her, but that is all.

Conversation

So begins the general conversation one would expect to engage in on a first date. For an Asian women this means listening and politely asking questions, while showing a genuine interest. Again, she is sincerely happy to be in your presence and is actually quite enthralled. She doesn't interrupt or make judgmental comments. She wants to know more about you, not your income or how you can benefit her. She will drink water, maybe a martini or craft beer you recommend. Conversation is pleasant and she answers all your questions with a refreshing authenticity.

The American woman immediately orders a draft beer or maybe a shot of Jameson. At the very least the latest trendy drink, perhaps a mojito. She wants to talk about her and only her. When you talk about yourself, she interrupts and somehow still makes it about her. Negative comments pepper the conversation like "I can't stand my roommate, she is such a bitch" or "My job sucks, everyone is a bunch of assholes." All this while texting friends and checking Facebook every three minutes. By the end of dinner she is bombed and semi-belligerent, swiping' spoonfuls of desert off your plate after she said she was full and didn't want her own. She will make the obligatory "let me pay" gesture. But we know she never intended to anyway. Only thing she brought was her ID, iPhone and some backup birth control.

After Dinner Antics

We come to the end of the date and as you walk the Asian women back to the car, you find yourself with her arm hooked around yours and you are opening her car door for her. Not because you feel obligated to do so, but because you actually want to. She deserves to be treated well, and you reciprocate. You may end up getting coffee somewhere and then drop her off back home. Maybe a kiss, maybe not. But you are okay with it because it was a pleasure to be out with her, you feel content. She expresses her gratitude for the evening, so much so it is almost uncomfortable. When you get home you find a text on your phone thanking you again. A delightful experience.

The American women will often request you go out to do more drinking and bar hopping, even inviting friends. If you just want to get laid, you go along with it. Not saying it isn't fun, it can be. You end up in some dive bar and she hammers down more Fireball shots on your tab. Maybe she lunges at you in the bar and you end up in a full make out session right there, perhaps more. Classy? No, but still fun. You end up going back to her place and she may or may not invite you in for some easy sex. If not it is only because she wants to appear like she has a sliver of class. It's all an act because you will be balls deep on next date, no question. No gratitude, no "thank you" text messages. Just an entitled attitude because this is what all men do for her. It was a fun date, sure. But you have little to no respect for her and any chance of her coming to the company Christmas bash went right down the toilet, the same place her head now rests.

Asians win. Flawless victory.

Every Man Should Have A Talent With His Hands

April 19, 2014 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

A man's brain is the most powerful conscious entity in the known universe. It's a smorgasbord of ideas, pulses, urges, and a zest for experimentation which have elevated us from a sticks-and-stones society a mere 12,000 years ago to successfully manipulating and containing the electrons which are flowing through the computer screen you are staring at right now.

Amazing isn't it? But for every bright idea (or fortunate accident) which has been molded into something amazing over the course of written history, something had to put those ideas into action. Those actions, in well over 90% of all cases, involved a man's hands. A man should be just as talented with his hands, along with his intellectual and social capacity, in order to be a well-rounded and king-like individual.

A significant minority of men already utilize their hands everyday as part of their primary job requirements. Mechanics, welders, electricians, carpenters, plumbers, pipe fitters, and HVAC technicians are all skilled tradesmen who provide essential services that keep our modern lives functioning properly. We commend you guys for your work, especially since the skilled trades do not get the recognition and respect they deserve in our university and white-collar obsessed culture. However, a hand-dominated talent should not be limited in scope to just blue-collar employment. All men, whether they are white-collar workers, students, or the unemployed, should craft a talent of their own that extends beyond computer wizardry and 'the art of one-handed typing'.

A unique artistic, musical, fighting, or performance talent is what makes you you a man of unique distinction and a cut from a different cloth of all the C++ and HTML experts out there who routinely follow the same lines of code every day. Women by the way, love men of distinction (primarily because most are utterly lacking in it themselves). There are simply far too many hand-dominated talents out there to brainstorm into a single article, but I have included six prominent examples which are readily available to most fellas out there, and are primarily pursued for recreation. The first four also have a good element of social bonding and gaming potential attached to them, while the last two are mainly just for shits and giggles.

Guitar

Arguably the world's most popular instrument and a major component of American popular culture for the second half of the 20th century, guitars are just plain awesome and their skilled maestro's are both envied and respected by men and women alike, all over the planet. Many beers and friendships has been shared among men, and many a woman's knickers have magically dropped in close proximity to this instrument.

Guitar is probably the best all-round talent on this list. The only major drawbacks are that they can be relatively cumbersome for travel and it requires throwing down a bit of money. Decent guitars start at around $300 and skyrocket in cost with incremental improvements in craftsmanship and overall sound quality. But in the long run it's absolute chump change. The healthy combination of social and personal enjoyment which comes from being skilled in this timeless instrument will potentially last until your bones are too brittle to hold down a chord.

Teaching yourself from scratch, improving your skills, and learning new songs also essentially costs nothing now, thanks to a plethora of Youtube videos available right on your laptop. Finally, if you needed any more motivation to learn guitar, these two gentlemen make it look way too easy. Otherwise, just enjoy the tunes. Some other good licks can be found here and here.

> "I've had three wives and three guitars. I still play the guitars." – Andres Segovia
> "The guitar is a miniature orchestra in itself." – Ludwig van Beethoven

Bass Guitar

When I was younger, like many other clueless individuals, I was under the impression that bass guitar was just an "easier" and "lazier" version of a regular guitar since it had just four or five strings instead of six. How wrong I was. Master bass playing is an art form and it takes years of diligent practice.

Some advantages of playing bass are its attractive solos while playing certain jazz, fusion, Latin, disco, and funk styles. Also, if your ever looking to join a band, bass players tend to be at an advantage over 6-stringers since the pool of available bassists are often substantially lower.

The drawbacks of learning bass guitar follow in the same footsteps as regular guitars (cost and portability issues), but are exasperated even further since they tend to be larger, heavier, and don't do a world of good down by the campfire. But if you can slap around a sexy bass-heavy tune like this rendition of Patrice Rushen's 1982 hit "Forget Me Nots", you wouldn't want to have it any other way.

Drums

Can't complete a musical group without some good ol' drums. The problem is a drum set is so large it's not meant to be moved around on a frequent basis, and the noise pollution for your family members, flatmates, and nearby neighbors can be quite a predicament.

But hell, if your going to drive your family, flatmates, and neighbors crazy you might as well go all-out and fucking go nuts. There is definitely a lot of talent and drum-stick swinging enthusiasm coming from Combichrist drummer Trevor Friedrich in this video, even though I am personally not a fan of the music.

Bar Flair

Flair bartending is the practice of entertaining patrons with the dazzling manipulation of bar tools and liquor bottles whilst preparing their drink. It is completely arrogant and unnecessary, and while some male patrons may find it mildly irksome (knowing it's an unspoken fishing lure for bigger tips when they just want to get their god damn drink), the vast majority of bar and club goers tend to respond positively.

Young female customers in particular tend to completely gobble it up with praise, tips, and possibly even slipping over an unannounced phone number. It's another classic example of how women "claim" they despise arrogance and other show-off behavior, and yet misconstrue it for confidence all the time. Particularly when they are being gradually liquored up.

The primary disadvantage in learning this skill is that you will have few formal opportunities to put it to show, unless you are actually employed as a bartender or throwing a raucous house party. Mucking up and breaking the bottle also causes an expensive and embarrassing mess for yourself. Proceed with caution, and preferably over a pile of sand.

Zippo Tricks

A 'Zippo' is a reusable metal lighter which has been manufactured in abundance since the 1930s. In fact, the 500 millionth Zippo was manufactured as recently as 2012. They remain very popular as durable "windproof" lighters which can stay lit even in harsh weather. Overall, the basic mechanism of the lighter has remained unchanged even after 80 years in existence, and a wide variety of tricks have been conjured up over the years which utilize some amazing dexterity to ignite and extinguish the flame.

The disadvantages of learning Zippo tricks is that this skill likely won't bring about the same level of female attention or social opportunity that some other activities do (not to mention a lot of the tricks are too damn hard and appear to defy the laws of physics).

However, it’s fine for just general tomfoolery and it’s cheap and highly portable. A new Zippo lighter can be had for less than $15 and it fits right in your pocket.

Throwing Knives

Didn’t your mother tell you not to play with knives? There are essentially no practical benefits when messing around with knives, and only a laundry list of things which can go wrong (serious injury and/or death for instance). Still, it’s a pretty bad-ass skill when safely demonstrated in a controlled environment, and nothing quite screams “alpha male” and “leave me alone” like this scene from The Bodyguard.

Concluding Remarks

Whatever path you choose to follow, treat it in the same manner as the Spartans or the Japanese. Be disciplined, be relentless, and strive for nothing less than perfection. Also have some fun, and preferably a lot of it. The path to masculine self-improvement does not always have to be an uphill battle.

The Obsolete Man: The Death Of The American Mind

The Obsolete Man was an episode of the Twilight Zone that first aired in June 1961.

In the episode, we see an authoritarian government that has absolute rule over its citizenry. A complete suppression of free speech, free thought and a complete devaluation of literature, arts and religion. A dystopian atheistic regime purportedly based on logic and reason, but is based on coercion of thought backed up by the crushing power of the state.

In this world, a librarian is brought before a tribunal that determines the value of its citizens. The librarian, Romney Wordsworth, engages in a heated debate with the Chancellor. The Chancellor determines that since the state has banned books, a librarian is inherently obsolete. The librarian reveals he believes in God, a belief that has been banned by the state.

The arrogant Chancellor, in his smug self-possession, agrees to have Romney appointed a personal assassin who will not divulge Romney's preferred way to die. Further, the Chancellor agrees to have Romney's "liquidation" televised for the nation to watch. Romney knew he had gotten under the Chancellor's skin, so he invites the Chancellor to come to his room an hour before his liquidation.

In his authoritarian bluster, the Chancellor sweeps in and lectures Romney about the supreme importance of the state and how people's value is determined by authority figures in government, not from the value that people bring to their fellow man. The Chancellor falls for Romney's plot, as the room is locked, so when the Chancellor tries to leave after asserting the state's superiority over a lowly librarian, he finds he will die with the low-status librarian.

The Chancellor is immediately distraught, not just at his imminent demise, but also because he will die with a low-status person because the state fundamentally values nobody – not even a high-ranking Chancellor. The Chancellor eventually breaks, exclaiming "Oh, God!" and starts beating on the door right before the explosion. Romney looks at him calmly as he reads from his Bible as the Chancellor escapes at the last second before Romney himself is killed by the blast.

The Chancellor, having survived, realizes the horrible truth that the state values you only has long as you bring value to the state. Since he devalued and made a mockery of the state by begging for his life on live television, he is deemed obsolete by a new chancellor.

In his trademark brilliance, Serling orates:

> The chancellor, the late chancellor, was only partly correct. He was obsolete. But so is the State, the entity he worshiped. Any state, any entity, any ideology that fails to recognize the worth, the dignity, the rights of man, that state is obsolete.

A potential interpretation of this episode is that the state has no business in determining what people should be able to engage in their professions. In a free market, if people find a librarian provides a valuable service they will pay for, then it is legitimate. The state should not be calling the shots on who gets to be deemed to be relevant and those who would executed as obsolete.

Imagine protesters agitating against a policy or law being considered in Congress.

Abortion rights activists: Hands off my body you sexist males!
Gun rights supporters: Let us have our guns back!
Gay marriage advocates: Please let have equality with heterosexuals and have our marriages subsidized and recognized by you!

As TLP pointed out, see the problem developing here? The problem isn't whether the government should do X, Y or Z, it is that we inherently accede to the framework the state is all-powerful and we need to petition the government for rights. Instead of wondering, "Why does the government decide who is or isn't married?," we demand equality in the sense that all of our relationships are judged by the state. It is a victory if you are a fan of narcissistic authoritarianism.

What the government gets wrong, we ignore everything it does that we agree with. In The Obsolete Man, would you have been upset if the Chancellor deemed a doctor relevant because he was an expert at heart surgery? You wouldn't even blink an eye probably. That is the problem, we have been taught to ignore authoritarianism when we agree with or if it suits our needs. We only get angry and agitate for superficial change we it does not.

The episode is purportedly about the failures and dangers of a totalitarian state, seemingly with no ideology but an incredibly strong dose of moral puritanism. Moral puritanism is a personality disorder that was initially embodied by the aptly named Puritans who settled in colonial New England after the Glorious Revolution. Their untoward psychology reverberates to this day still, most clearly embodied by mainstream political correctness and feminism.

As always, the AV Club isn't one to disappoint their liberal readership and I knew they would not like this episode, pretending to be put off by the religiosity of Romney. The reviewer gives the episode a B+, mostly for Burgress Meredith's masterful portrayal of Romney. The comments are interesting and revealing, as they so the discomfit with an atheist state being against logic and reason – betraying their narcissistic authoritarianism.

While a few commenters get the message that any ideology has the ability to fall in the depths of rank authoritarianism, many commenters are uneasy about that sentiment. Many are quick to nail Republicans, Christians and Mitt Romney to the wall as far more likely to enact an oppressive Christian theocracy. Apparently, they took The Handmaiden's Tale as plausible in modern America.

Anyway, this comment captures the narcissism:

> Totalitarian theocracies are much more plausible than a government of atheist "anti-free-thinkers."

Notice how atheist authoritarians are put in quotes, while theocracies are not. The commenter has a real difficult time handling that atheistic regimes are capable of suppressing thought. Plentiful historical examples aside, just in America, political atheists are a lock-step group. Conservative atheists, such as SE Cupp, are shunned in greater atheistic circles. What this commenter fails to realize is that authoritarian impulses may arise from religion, their root is in untoward psychology. You can't just will away religion and suddenly free-thought will reign supreme.

That is the sleigh of hand, though. This commenter would agree with that and then start talking about hegemonic modes of oppression based on the dominant group's desire to cleave the in's and the out's neatly. More dialogue about the real and invidious nature of hatred in society, as embodied by racism, misogyny and homophobia. In this entirely predictable approach, it would be revealed that they weren't against religion—or moral puritanism—-they just wanted an approach that reflected their indoctrination.

One of the greatest delusions somebody can have is that they are free-thinker when they are not. Many people mindlessly tune into MSNBC, Fox News, Daily Kos, The Blaze and are told that by tuning in, they are becoming free, becoming educated and empowering themselves. No, said person or people are just doing what they are taught in society – to conform to the views of authority figures, in whatever form they come in.

That is the liberal agitation here that is tellingly revealed by mainstream liberals absolute hatred of Fox News. They don't hate Fox News per se, they hate what it represents – the wrong authority figure. The anger is not over ignorance, it is not over hatred – it is the fact that one news outlet has broken from the lockstep of other media Toutlets and peddles lukewarm right-wing liberal fare. Before I go on, understand I am not critiquing liberalism as an ideology (even though I often do), I am critiquing how liberalism is expressed in society and why the underpinnings are so rotten.

Fox News represents what authority figures should not be: not liberal. The intense anger over the Bush administration, Fox News, and conservatives on the Supreme Court aren't about the actual policies so much as it is about the fact that authoritarianism has one fatal flaw: the mask may be lifted off and it is revealed there is no God. As TLP says, there is nothing worse than an unreliable God.

You could think, "Well, I don't believe in God, so I am cool." Supremely doubtful. Everybody has faith in something and, in America, there is a great change you value it in a puritanical way. Reconsider Fox News. The consternation over the alleged false reporting, distortion of facts may or may not be true. The reason it causes great consternation is those who need to believe there will always be a reliable authority figure out there.

Unemployed? Turn on the TV, hear about the green shoots in the economy.
Gay and suicidal? Turn on the "It Gets Better" project.
Upset over pro-life advocates? Turn on Rachel Maddow and hear how it is all about misogyny and male ignorance.

As usual, I am not so interested in the intent of the people engaging the acts, but why people pay attention. Remember, if you are watching it, it is for you.

The existence of Fox News suggests that liberal authority figures could wrong. It simply isn't just the fact that Fox News is doing what they shouldn't be doing as an authority figure, it is that they are undermining liberal authority figures. If MSNBC is unreliable because Fox News reveals serious inconsistencies in MSNBC's reporting, that isn't a problem—it will become the problem. Fox News will have to be discredited, as holding up MSNBC as the gold standard for worship takes precedence over all else.

You could fairly wonder why some liberals would get so mad over one news outlet producing allegedly bad, ideological news. That is a fair point, but it is dead wrong about moral puritanism. One key facet about puritanism is that they desperately seek converts to their psychology. Puritanism is about repressing anti-social impulses, so any deviation has the potential to cause great exasperation in the afflicted puritan.

Fox News represents that. Many liberals desperately want to openly censor, distort and engage in outright hatred. Their narcissistic self-image prevents them understanding they already engage in that. I recall a liberal columnist waxing about how Republicans win elections because they will do whatever it takes to win, unlike the honorable Democrats who have values about honesty, integrity and commitment to truth. A bunch of hogwash. Liberals engage in great levels of censorship and distortion of the truth, as their puritanism necessitates that. Their narcissism prevents them from seeing themselves as being what they are supposedly against. Sure, Republicans do that as well, but Democrats and Republicans are often two sides of the same coin.

Considering The Obsolete Man, in this context, it shows why some liberals are uncomfortable with the episode. Expansive, muscular government is vigorously trumpeted by them, so when they see a work that depicts that any ideology, when given enough power, will slip in jack-booted authoritarianism it can be disconcerting. When the all-powerful worshiped entity is shown to be inherently fallible, there has to be a greater entity to fall back on.

I can imagine the reactions: "Oh, the Supreme Court will save us!" or "The voters will toss those bums next election!," or, "Even if all those fail us, the arc of human history is toward justice and human rights, so we will always progress."

These are all excuses invented in order to not face the fact that "God," or all-powerful authority figures, cannot save you from yourself. Legalizing gay marriage won't solve your own inability to come to terms with your homosexuality or adding more regulations on X industry won't solve the fact that you mindlessly trust the system so much you don't do a little research on product X you are trying out. The system doesn't want you thinking for yourself, going your own way, much less asking questions that cut to the heart of the issues that America faces.

The system wants your fattening ass parked in the front TV at night and firmly in your cubicle in your mindless corporate job during the day. You exist to consume and produce for the state. If you do not do that, you have no value – you are obsolete. You don't exist for yourself, you exist to maintain the state.

The fact we have to petition for rights is the wrong question, the right question is why does the government limit our actions in the first place? I am not advancing a libertarian argument, but fundamentally questioning why we accept authoritarianism so willingly. Serling was only partly correct in his final oration—what he failed to note is that the state is already obsolete.

3 Easy Steps For Getting Women

The pickup artist world and the manosphere are packed to the brim with articles on how to attract women.

Some of these articles offer a certain tactic you can use. Others provide word for word scripts to be used in a particular situation. Others even analyze, in depth, the particular psychology behind specific words, actions, and body language tendencies.

I won't go as far as saying that these articles have absolutely no value, because they do. But I will say that they do far more damage to the average Joe's game than good. Far and away the best way to improve your game is to focus on improving yourself. Lift to get fit, read to learn, and try lots of new things. The women will come.

Don't spend all your time reading about how to get pussy. I made this mistakes years ago, and I see many other men making the same mistake today. Without possessing a certain confidence and actually talking to women, reading about it in too much depth will backfire and actually hurt your confidence and your game. Instead shift your focus to yourself and then take a simplistic approach to getting women.

Step 1: Approach

Fuck an opener. Whether you're at the bar approaching girls you don't know, or at a regular spot approaching girls you're somewhat familiar with, just be straight forward.

Make some small talk (or don't), tell her you think she's cute, and then ask if she wants to hang out. If yes, get her number. If no, tell her to take it as a compliment and move on.

Step 2: Setup Date

Fuck text game. Roosh provides the most effective script in his text game guide (see the yellow box below this post to get it).

Simply text her a couple days later and ask her how she is, and if she responds then ask her if she wants to hang out later in the week. If yes, suggest a place and time to get drinks. If no, move on. For the first date stick with drinks—no need to get fancy or creative. Also, pick a bar near your place.

Show up to your date and make small talk mixed with playful touching and teasing. Have a couple rounds, pay for them (this makes for an as frictionless as possible experience the first time around), and then suggest grabbing another drink back at your place. If she likes you, she'll come, even if you don't bang that night. Either way, take her back to yours, pour a couple drinks, start kissing, and then quickly escalate. If she won't come back, then try again, but if after 2 dates she won't then I'd move on.

All you're doing is asking for, and going after exactly what you want at each step of the process. I strongly advocate against worrying about game in any further detail until you've had some success – and even then it's not necessary. As you put yourself out there time and time again, you'll quickly develop confidence because you're more and more familiar with the process. You'll also develop more and more resistance to rejection and move on without missing a step when things don't work out.

Spend the majority of your free time improving yourself as a man. Maximize the efficiency of the time you do put towards getting women. And don't let the inevitable rejections and flakes get to you.

All Women Are Nymphomaniacs Who Crave Rough Sex

April 20, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Anyone who disagrees with the title of this article need only take a trip to their local supermarket. At the checkout you will find women's magazines, emblazoned with headlines offering women "Your Ten Best Orgasms Yet" or "How To Find Your G-Spot". Men's magazines (for filthy perverts) are foil wrapped on the top shelf. Girls can get the latest sex tips and titillation from the same checkout that granny buys her bag of carrots, 10 year old grandson in tow.

If women wanted to be more discrete about their thirst for orgasms, you can be sure laws would be in place against those magazines. The dildo is the best-selling sex toy, which is strange since men—not women—are renowned for masturbating. In the film "Nymph()maniac" we learn from the lead (nympho) girl that the human state can be summarized in one word: 'hypocrisy'. I think I'd agree, with the caveat that it be applied by default only to females; males do from time to time have a reasonable amount of integrity.

One of the things that irritates Red Pill men the most, is the double standard of sluts who play hard to get and put on the good girl attitude, while giggling with their friends about all the different lays they've had, often behind the boyfriend or husband's back. A recent article by Law Dogger got me thinking into a better approach to the eternal female problem.

Granny glances at the magazines, recalling her prime years of riding cock with a wry grin. She's not offended or campaigning for less overtly sexual material in supermarkets as you might expect. Nearly every woman has one dalliance, one cheat, one quick ride on the merry-go-round and the exceptions are due to:

a.) Health issues

b.) Religion, family, or peer pressure

c.) Having a husband or boyfriend that's consistently amazing in bed

Healthcare—and especially women's sexual healthcare—is vastly improved. Religion is an out of date and dying dinosaur, peer pressure is almost inverted today and that brings us to point C, the man in question.

Game and PUA proves to us that women are horny sluts and will bang if handled in the correct way. The question remaining is what you ought to be doing once you have her naked and splayed on your couch or bed, groaning and begging for you to take her with wanton abandon.

In a ONS, a possible (and amusing) solution would be to shame her and send her home. That might make her think twice about fucking random strangers, but few men will cut off their nose to spite their own face, plus its unlikely women will get the message, instead choosing to slander the man concerned. As Roosh noted in a comment recently, a girl will reject you after you reject her to avoid having to accept her shortcomings. This tactic does work with a regular girlfriend though. Getting her naked and horny and then switching on the TV and cracking a beer, will have her in a tail spin. Her demon/hamster will go apeshit. It will reveal if she's patient and sweet or totally self-centered. This is the female 'acid test'.

Pandora's Box

Head-games aside, women are far more sexually open and sexually adventurous than they used to be. They are fascinated with sex, as we can tell from their magazines. The lid has been taken off Pandora's Box and guess what? There's nothing inside. You can put inside whatever you want. The answer was on the lid all along, a small note stating : "All Women Are Nymphos".

Books like 50 Shades confirm this, as does the plethora of women's porno literature available online, covering subjects such as gangbangs and rapes. There are as many female subscribers to these sites as there are males signing up for video. With the 50 Shades movie scheduled for release in summer 2015, I'd say that red pill men everywhere should start researching and investing in a personal armory of sex toys, rope, gags, tape, gloves, anal lube, and whips. The battle of the sexes is not fought in the nightclub or bar, that's only the opening shots. The real battle is fought in the bedroom.

Women want to experience insane mind blowing gang banging sex. Rollo Tomassi's most excellent article, Saving the Best outlines a real life example in great detail. She might be a prude in marriage to prove to her husband (and herself) that she's not a nympho-slut, but she's had her dalliances (in this case a bisexual gangbang). I'd extrapolate and say that women are terribly sexually repressed and don't even know it. Even if they are busy riding a different guy each weekend, chances are they are still not getting the depth of sexual satisfaction they crave.

Men talk about the sex they'd like to have, women never talk about the sex they've actually had. This makes it difficult to know where a woman's boundaries truly lie, but we can certainly hazard a guess from Rollo's article and the odd porno. While I'm certain that deep down, most women want to commit to one man, and are better off avoiding multiple dicks, when the lights are out and the doors shut, and you're that man—you can have just about any experience you want with her, including bringing others into play. There are no limits.

In a recent article I discussed the "do not bend the spoon" concept from The Matrix. Another red pill movie is Fight Club. In one small scene we find Tyler (Brad Pitt) interrupted by Edward Norton as he fists Marla with yellow rubber gloves on. It could be glossed over as nothing more than a humorous scene, but it has been my approach to having sex with women ever since. I'll give you a quick example.

My baby momma was shit testing me for months. I assumed it was a natural way of trying to drive me out so she could breed with someone else. I tolerated it, did my own thing, but also guarded her and kept the relationship with her and my daughter alive. One evening she phones me saying she's got a very stiff back. I've suffered from back pain for years, and I know enough about physiotherapy to fix it. It's also a good excuse to get her naked and give her 'a good seeing to', but I do not approach it with the 'I'm going to get laid' attitude. Neither do I approach it like a White Knight rushing to the rescue.

I arrive around 9pm just as my daughter is going to sleep. I open my laptop bag containing my collection of sex-toys, including the Hitachi massage wand. I start on baby-momma's back and get her relaxed and move onto the thighs and then down to business. My intention is to deliberately NOT have sex with her, yet leave her wasted, passed out in a puddle of her own juices.

This is what I proceeded to do. I felt like I should have pounded her once she was half unconscious, but it was a question of losing the battle to win the war. Self-control is a wonderful thing. Next morning she's raving on the phone to me, even telling her friends about my techniques. I wonder if a cock is actually adequate to bring a woman to full satisfaction. It really needs some serious tools, at least a couple of hands: hence Tyler and his yellow gloves.

She let on that's she quite happy for me to tie her up and pound her every which way. She said she'd like to be disciplined even if she objects. Once you've got her warmed up and lubed up, you can truly treat a woman like a farm animal. A fine mix of pleasure and pain is what she needs to reach the best climaxes. Remember that a vagina is built to birth children 4-5 times the size of your average penis.

By not trying to bend the spoon, here I am in a situation that benefited me. You see women are dominated most easily when they are most sexually satisfied and since they don't know where their own limits are and are often too passive and unimaginative to find out, you will simply have to push the envelope. If you start gently pushing her boundaries you'll probably be as shocked as she is satisfied. Most girls are happy somewhere in the bondage dungeon, with several women involved, just before you draw blood and get into pissing and shitting. Being alpha is not just about the approach, it's about what you do afterwards. If she's seeing other men, it's because she's seeking that mind blowing sex (most likely unsuccessfully, since 'dudes' don't push it nearly far enough.)

Porno shows us what a woman will do with incentive, in porn some combination of attention whoring and money. Other women are motivated by different things. Game allows you to motivate them: after the panties come off, you do as you please, but you must do it right. Pumping your load out in 5 minutes does neither you nor her much good. My baby momma for example is adamantly straight, and even a little disgusted by lesbianism, but when pushed, especially during a 2-3 hour session, she agrees she'd like to try another woman in the room, if nothing else but to please me. "Thanks honey, we start tomorrow."

La Donna Manca El Catso

In Italy they have this expression for bitchy housewives, which roughly translates as the woman needs some dick. Now I am not saying that I am amazing in the bedroom, far from it. Perhaps I'd get a 6 or 7 for effort. Sure there are other guys better than me, but by putting the emphasis on pushing her limits, and leaving her wasted from her own orgasms and forgetting about my own needs, what happens is my needs are more than fulfilled. She's jumping for more and inquisitive about all kinds of extra 'activities'.

Law Dogger talks in his article about this lame date he had at a girl's house and how she opened the door in sweat pants, had lame friends, bad attitude, texted her other boyfriend in front of him, fucked him like he was battery operated and then expected him to leave. My solution to that situation is to patiently wait until the bedroom door is shut and the panties are off and go to town on her ALL FUCKING NIGHT. If she wants to play open warfare (or even if she's mild as a lamb) you still want to go nuclear and get the yellow rubber gloves to work. You might not want her shit on your dick, but sorry boy, you're at least going to have to get your gloves soiled. The ass is also an erogenous zone and the key to making her feel filled with that pain/pleasure sensation she needs. (You can also get to the G-spot quite nicely via the rectum.)

As Morpheus says to Neo: "When you are ready, you won't have to dodge bullets". The point is to be like water that cannot be punched or shot. Punch some water and all you get is a splash back in your face. Men are ruled by their hormones they want to bang the girl. This is their undoing. All the focus is on getting the lay, so the endgame becomes distorted. The endgame shouldn't focus on 'your' sex.

The white knight beta is like a frozen block of ice. He'll crack before he ever gets laid. The alpha is like a hot puff of steam. He bangs entirely for his own agenda. What we want is to find the balance in the middle and that only comes from wisdom, practice, intelligence, composure and skill. You also need to have a goal. If you want to run about serving women and never get laid, then white knighting is the way. If you want to run game every weekend, bang different chicks—go for it, but if that passes into hating on women, hanging out with losers, catching diseases and missing some of the best advantages of having a woman in your life, it becomes questionable. Catching fish purely for sport is ultimately just an expensive pastime.

In the middle ground we have the 'Zen Warrior' that women fall hard for. The George Clooney example is one, and in this case he relies only on good looks, charm, wealth and fame. He might be crap in bed, but no woman would ever experience that, because they are besotted with the idea of having sex with him. On the other hand I'm not as famous, good looking or wealthy as George Clooney and certainly not as charming. However if I can persuade a woman to get into bed with me, what she will experience will have her calling me. Not because I'm any good, but much like Tyler in Fight Club, I just don't give much of a damn about chasing tail, AND I want to see her in a state of total rapture losing her mind – then I know I have won.

The game is not over when the cock goes in (as most men suspect), it's over when she passes out AND calls the next morning for a repeat. This is why a ONS is a little pointless to me, because I want to win the whole war, not just a quick banging match. You simply cannot go to town on a woman first time you meet her, you need to stretch her boundaries (pun intended) over a few sessions—sessions where she's openly phoning YOU.

The Cunt

A woman is built not only for child birthing, but also for intense gang banging sex. A man can only do so much with his little 'sports-car' wiener, where her cunt is built like tank. You have a 9mm pistol, she has a hell fire missile launcher. It's not unimaginable that back in the caveman era, a woman's best defense against attack and her best shot at provisioning was allowing multiple men to pound her all night long. She is built for it, hence the rape and bondage fantasies seemingly ingrained into a woman's psyche and instinct. She might not need it every day like you want your quick nut, but when she needs it, elbows deep all night will be fine. The Houston 500 became 620. If a man did that he'd be lucky to make double figures.

The wise zen monk becomes a mirror, a clear lake in which women can see their own inner nymphomaniac. After catching a glimpse of that all they want is to jump him. If she tries to reach out and grab him, he just slips through her fingers. Will she make you cum in ten minutes, leaving herself feeling used and bitchy or will you bang her all night until she's walking sideways to work next week? Forget about getting laid, forget about the bang and the nut, think instead about the victory to be had on the battlefield. You want her unconditional surrender. You want her calling you back to give her more multiple orgasms, NOT calling you back because she wants to start a relationship with you. Relationships are for women—let them deal with all their nonsense. If it's over, she should be handing you across to her BFF, as an opportunity not to be missed.

Your mission should you chose to accept it is to fuck her silly until she's enslaved. Feminists, mothers, girlfriends, even self-professed nymphos are painfully aware of this and that's why they try to shame and criticize men. They are scared of letting go. There is a good reason for this: orgasms produce oxytocin and dopamine (heroin and coke). Get her addicted to the high dosage and she's all yours.

I've found—as many others have—that by getting very sexually overt and quite aggressive (at the right moment), she will do almost anything your perverted heart desires, and love doing it. This will then extend into her supplication in everyday life. If she's misbehaving it's because you have her on the wrong path or no path at all. In a previous article I mentioned that women are more like animals, due to their sexual role of birthing, etc. Nature forces a woman to give herself up to the reproductive process. As much as women want to try and take control and be in charge, what brings them the greatest peace is letting go of the last vestige of hope they might have of achieving this. The only way his happens is during sex. Fucking her senseless is how you tame her.

Don't be too alpha or too soft. Be clever, charming, smooth, and cunning until you've given her the first orgasm of the evening. Then get the rubber gloves out and go to town until she surrenders to the rapture absolutely and completely, and don't let her make you cum, at least not until you've been at it for 3-4 hours and she's passed out a couple of times. If you are with her all weekend, hold it until Sunday and she has to use her mouth because her pussy is too sore (swallowing is another way to get her hooked). Play her like she's a musical instrument. Ride her like you're breaking in a wild mare. Don't be afraid to get your hands dirty and buy yourself some tools. When you are done, don't forget to throw in a light dusting of affection. You can't be all bondage and no sweetness.

My only problem now is that I have wild nymphos phoning me for sex 2-3 times a day and it's all become rather tedious. Sex is no longer them doing me a favor, but them begging me for a favor. I literally feel like I have farm animals to tend to.

Perhaps it's time to go meditate in the mountains for a year. In the meantime you'll know how to deal with this:

The Most Civilized Frenchman Of His Era

Michel de Montaigne ranks among the wisest and most urbane figures in literary history. In an age of intolerance, religious fanaticism, and warring dynasties, his was a voice that cried out for understanding and moderation. He had the good sense not to get too involved in politics, and found his chateau's library a more congenial place for his survival than the exhausting intrigues of court life or the crash and rattle of the battlefield; and yet, more than his contemporaries, he was able to cast his influence down through the centuries as a paragon of rationalism.

He was born in 1533 in the Aquitaine region of France. His father was unusual for his day in having pronounced libertarian views on education: learning, he believed, should happen through seeing, doing, touching, and experiencing, rather than by rote memorization and physical discipline. The infant Montaigne was provided with an attendant who spoke to him only in Latin, so that he would learn the language in a natural way as if it were still a living tongue. In this way, Montaigne says, he was able to acquire a command of the old language as few others could, and "without books, rules, or grammar, without whipping or whining." His love of the classical authors is evident on every page of the Essays, which he generously packs with quotations and allusions.

Montaigne's family chateau

The ancient authors are better than the moderns, he held, because they focused on character and moral development as much as on knowledge. Yet he never allowed himself to become an introverted bookworm; he believed in the Renaissance concept of the well-rounded man. Training in physical hardships and combative sport was just as essential, he believed, as time in contemplative study.

In 1568 Montaigne inherited his father's estate as his eldest son, and Montaigne found the perfect opportunity to withdraw from the strife and conflict of the legal profession (to which he reluctantly belonged) and devote his hours to contemplation and study. His library contained over one thousand volumes bound in sumptuous hand-tooled leather, at that time a huge number for a private man to own. France at the time was wracked by religious conflict and extreme violence between Catholics and Huguenots (French Protestants): "I have a thousand times gone to bed…imagining I should, the very same night, have been either betrayed or slain in my bed."

His masterwork, the Essays, was written over several years beginning in 1570, and finally appeared in print in 1580. It is among the supreme achievements of European literature. His favorite authors were Seneca, Plutarch, St. Augustine, Lucretius, and Martial. He calls these volumes "meas delicias" (my delights), but never allows his admiration of them to turn into slavish paraphrasing. Through all his quotes and digressions, his voice remains uniquely his own. No one had quite written any literary composition quite like the Essays. He wanders from one subject to another, touching on hundreds, yet he apologizes for not discussing more. Through this jungle of genial discourse, a philosophy emerges that is characterized by tolerance, philosophical skepticism, humanity, and classical restraint.

He proposes to examine himself. "Que sais-je?" (What do I know?) he took as his motto, in the sense that he began with doubting all that he believed to be inherited knowledge. He seems to have become disillusioned with Christianity's doctrinal certainties, after seeing the bloodlust with which warring sects consumed each other in his day. And yet he maintained a fond preference for Catholic ritual and pageantry. Of all the ancient philosophical schools, he thought Stoicism the best, and retained Stoic leanings throughout his Essays; yet he also found much wisdom and wonder in Lucretius, and finally espoused an almost Enlightenment belief in an abstract "Nature" as a substitute for an all-powerful God.

The best education, he thought, was one modeled on the classical Muses, emphasizing character and a well-rounded focus on masculine virtue. Moderation in all things should be the rule. Even too much virtue can be a bad thing. Travel is a critical part of an education, as long as we have the open mind to process what we are actually seeing. "It was told to Socrates that a certain man had been not much improved by travel. 'I believe it well, said he, 'for he carried himself with him.'" The peoples and customs of the world can teach us humility, for "so many strange humors, sundry sects…diverse opinions, different laws, and fantastical customs teach us to judge rightly of ours." The reading of history, he thought, was also critical to an understanding of mankind and ourselves.

Like the ancients, Montaigne valued friendship more highly than amorous love between man and woman. He was deeply affected by the death of one of his close friends. To him, sexual infatuation with women was nothing "other than a tickling delight of emptying one's seminal vessels, as is the pleasure which nature gives us to discharge other parts." Marriage should by no means be based on erotic ecstasy. "I see no marriages fail sooner, or more troubled, than such as are concluded for beauty's sake, or huddled up for amorous desires." Most successful marriages eventually evolve into some form of non-erotic companionship with the passing of years. Yet Montaigne never darkened the pages of his Essays with a harsh word against women or his wife who had borne him six children; he seems to have married with no expectation that a woman could provide him serious intellectual stimulation (thereby, presumably, sparing himself much disappointment).

Physical health is the highest good. Care and maintenance of our corporal selves is the sine qua non of a productive life. All knowledge begins with our physical senses, yet we cannot trust reason. Reason, more often than not, may only be our inner desires masquerading as rationality. A healthy skepticism seems the soundest course: considering the multitude of ideas, creeds, beliefs, and laws in the world, how can we be certain that ours is best?

Fretting about the variability of doctrines, and the relativity of morals and creeds, is of no use either. "Men are tormented by the opinions they have of things, not by the things themselves." Yet just because morals may be relative, that does not mean they are worthless. Every time and place needs its own orthodoxy, its own way of interpreting the inexplicable cosmos.

The Massacre of St. Bartholomew: an example of the intolerance and fanaticism of Montaigne's day

In the end, we do well simply to accept the creed of our time and place. Flitting about from one religion to another does little good, since all religions are attempts to explain the unexplainable; and more good can come by losing oneself soothing religious ritual than all the pointless debates of the philosophers, which in the end lead us only to a paralysis of uncertainty.

What makes the Essays one of the most enjoyable of the great works is the reader's sense of having a direct connection with a civilized and urbane gentleman. He is without doubt the most civilized Frenchman of his age, and perhaps any other age. In Montaigne, there is no bombast, no windy declamations, no tiresome or shop-worn pontifications, and no narrow-minded bigotry. There is only the expansive spirit of man who wishes to know himself and his place in the universe, and is unafraid to expose himself for all the world to see.

He had the courage to embrace his foibles and fooleries, and refused to let his judgment of any man be clouded by the fogs of race, religion, or creed. In an age that produced religious censorship, arbitrary justice, and the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, his voice was among the wisest and most profound. We have rarely seen his kind since.

Why Do Black Women Love Scandal?

April 21, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

ABC's "Scandal" is a political drama about a woman named Olivia Pope who, having graduated from Princeton and Georgetown Law before serving as the White House Communications Director, now makes a living running a firm that protects the public images of the American political elite. Pope had gotten that position in the White House as a result of her work on the presidential campaign of Fitzgerald Grant (later President Grant), who she had started sleeping with. The show largely centers on the maintenance of this affair and the "deep love" that exists between these two characters (in addition to all of the scandals Olivia continues to deal with).

"Scandal" has generally been received favorably by critics and is a ratings success for ABC, but what is unusual is the source of this acclaim: the show's most extensive and vocal support comes from within the black American community, specifically the black female community. So addicted are these females to the show that their devotion to it has become something of a meme in black America.

Black men are not nearly as enthusiastic about the show as their female counterparts. Contrary to popular opinion, I don't think that this aversion to Scandal on the part of black men really comes down to race. I'd go as far as to posit that the show's interracial relationship is irrelevant (I certainly could care less), as there are other issues here. What truly perplexes me about this black female devotion to Scandal is the fact that the show seems not to be in line with the stated objectives and concerns black women are most vocal about. In fact, it seems diametrically opposed to them in some cases. Take the following issues, for example:

1. “Black Men Won’t Commit”

Black women are vocal critics of black male failure to man up and marry them. They lament the black man’s supposed unwillingness to commit and make a woman a wife, and state that he is often too willing to treat her like a mistress and fail to offer her the respect she deserves. There is a reason Beyonce’s “Put a Ring On It” became such an anthem among black American women—it reflected these longstanding critiques, which commonly find their way into mainstream discourse in American media. Long story short, black men are often accused of taking black women for granted, and black women resent this.

Meanwhile, in Scandal, Olivia Pope is a side piece that Fitzgerald Grant is never actually going to marry, a reality that places her in precisely the same position that black women continuously scold black men for putting them in. Scandal is depicting precisely the kind of relationship dynamic that black women claim to hate and, somehow, this doesn’t seem to bother the women who adore the show and aspire to be Olivia Pope.

2. “The Media Too Often Portrays Black Women As Jezebels, Not Wives”

Black American women have been vocal about their portrayal in the media for a long time, claiming that their characters are all too often portrayed as overly lewd, promiscuous, immoral whores with sexual attitudes that run completely counter to the “proper” conduct of a lady. They have also claimed that white women received the opposite treatment, with their stereotypes labeling them the “proper” wives and ladies.

Black women do not hide their resentment of this alleged double standard.

Scandal does them no favors, as the show appears to do nothing to contradict (and, I contend, actively reinforces) these stereotypes. The show's lead character is a black female, and her involvement in an affair with a married politician is central to the story. In fact, Pope's character history seems to add even more fuel to the stereotypical fire black women have been trying to extinguish with regard to their sexuality. Olivia Pope is an extremely well educated woman: she went to prep schools for almost the entirety of her early life before undergrad at Princeton and three years at Georgetown Law. She did not grow up in a money-scarce environment and is far from the stereotypical hoodrat you'd expect to be associated with the "Jezebel" caricature black women have been fighting. Olivia Pope is supposed to have "class".

And yet, despite all of that, Pope is still a sidepiece. She did not need to be: unmarried, eligible suitors were present in her life, but she did not want them. In fact, she turned them down specifically because of her desire to remain a married man's mistress. She voluntarily maintains her status as a side-piece despite his continued marriage and the presence of his family. All the while, Grant's wife Melody hasn't even had an affair, remaining loyal to him despite his infidelity.

Pope appears to be the much maligned black "jezebel" of old, whose allegedly uncontrollable lust and sexual appetite resulted in her engaging in actions that directly countered the ideal of the "proper" lady and could be considered immoral (ex: willingly maintaining very active sexual relationships with married men), while Grant's wife looks like the "proper", moral white lady standing by her husband. It would be difficult to draw up a situation more in line with old racialized American gender stereotypes.

Again, it would be another thing entirely if Pope was an uneducated chick from the hood.

In that scenario, you'd be able to put her behavior down to her lack of schooling or class. This is not the case, however: Pope has always been well-off and is incredibly well educated. By showing that even the most affluent, well educated and professionally accomplished black women will, when given the choice, elect to remain the sidepiece instead of becoming the lady, Scandal does a great deal to affirm and promote a powerfully negative old stereotype of the black female.

3. "Black Men Are Irresponsible"

Black women are vocal critics of black male failure in the household. Too often, black women say, black men step out on their children and their families. They cheat all the time. They are either never there at all or they're there but getting some on the side and not committing to fatherhood the way they ought to. This type of "dog" behavior is not ok and is undermining the stability of the black family, they contend. Black men "need to do better".

In Scandal, however, Fitzgerald Grant is a cheater who spends much of his time stepping out on his family for Olivia, his sidepiece. This obviously compromises his ability to fully commit to his responsibilities as a husband and father, and negatively impacts the stability of his family. Legions of black women love the relationship anyway. Odd, considering the fact that it involves a man engaging in precisely the kind of behavior that they have long voiced their distaste for.

4. “Black Men Overlook Black Women”

Black women are vocal critics of black male mate choice. They lament the notion that educated black men with options all too often select women of other races, shunning women who look like them. These men, they say, seem not to place enough value on black women, or simply don’t consider them good enough to stand by their side. By not making black women (and especially educated black women) a priority, these men devalue black females. Some go as far as to label this “abandonment” an act of disloyalty on the part of black men.

Olivia had a man who is (at least in the show's universe) the most powerful black male on the planet. Edison Davis is Pres. Pro Tempore of the Senate (3rd in line of Presidential succession) and likely one of the two or three most powerful legislators in the United States (he would need to be to receive and hold that kind of title, especially as a black male—note the dearth of black senators in the US today). The guy is the definition of the kind of "good black man" that black women spend so much time complaining about, the kind of man they say all too often doesn't make educated black women enough of a priority.

But Edison doesn't seem to fit that mold. He wants a black woman, and he wants her to be his wife. He knows all about her intellect and all of her degrees, and still doesn't shy away from the prospect of marrying her. And, again, he wants her to be his wife, not his sidepiece. What happens to him?

Pope blows him off (not once, but twice) in order to remain the primary sidepiece of a married man who won't wife her up and who is stepping out on his family (including his pregnant wife). Her explanation? A strong desire for "painful, difficult, devastating" love which Edison is just too decent to provide.

Legions of the show's black female fans cheer this on: they hate Edison with an almost unreal passion (he really doesn't appear to earn quite the level of disgust they have for him) and are happy to see him blown off in the way he was. Scandal's depiction of this relationship and the fanbase's reaction to it just doesn't seem in line with the complaints black women so often have about the educated black male's lack of respect for his educated female counterpart as a romantic partner. The explanation Pope gave is odd as well give the tendency of black females to complain about the pain and devastation their lovers frequently leave them with (via infidelity, lack of emotional support, failure to support children, etc, etc).

None of this makes sense. Why are black women so devoted to a show that depicts one of their own in a relationship with a man that involves all of the dynamics they've been vocally campaigning against for generations? Tulani Elisa at the Huffington Post has her own ideas as to why Scandal is so revered by her demographic:

> Shonda Rhimes has written a character that depicts black women as they see themselves and more importantly how they'd like society to view them.
> …Scandal shows us a woman that we can in some ways relate to and even more so aspire (loosely as it may be) to be like.
> …once a week for 60 minutes we're able to engross ourselves in ideals and excitement of the ever so complex, charming and clever life of a strong black woman.

Sounds about right.

Perhaps the most salient romantic advice I've ever read in the manosphere comes in the form of this simple saying: "Watch what they do, not what they say". Though apparently very simple and straightforward, this statement is remarkably profound in its ability to actually illustrate the legendary female inability to articulate their actual wants and desires. Scandal's popularity among black women merely provides further evidence of this within the context of the black American community.

Black women say they are bothered by men who take them for granted, cheat on their spouses and fail to fully commit to them romantically, but their action (adoration of Olivia Pope's character and pedestalizaton of her lifestyle) shows us that such things bother them much less than they care to admit. The same goes for their relationship with modern hip-hop: black women say they are disappointed by the rampant "misogyny" in certain crude hip-hop lyrics, but are among the most vocal supporters of those artists at the end of the day. Once again, action proves superior to the spoken word in its ability to illustrate the true wants and desires of a female.

Scandal shows black American women being what they want to be and living the kind of life they want to live. That life is one filled with the very things they noisily complain about: disloyal men stepping out on their families, a lack of wedding rings and the continuous justification of the very old, pervasive negative racial stereotypes about their sexuality they claim to oppose. In Olivia Pope, the modern educated black woman of today has found a visual representation of what she really aspires to be: a well-dressed, career-focused, permanent sidechick with a whole bunch of degrees.

More power to 'em, I guess.

3 Manly Moments From My Life That Are Total Shams

April 22, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Occasionally, a certain confluence of events will transpire in a man's life which creates one perfect moment of manliness which forever defines or accentuates his character. If he is truly unfortunate, this event goes unseen by everyone. If, however, he has the good grace to have witnesses to his manly deed, then he can often sit back and let the natural tendency of human nature toward exaggeration create a mythos about him.

It's odd really, how humans love to overhype and over blow what are often simple events. Frank goes hunting with Jesse, Frank lucks out and brings down a twelve point Buck with a single head shot, and later Jesse's liable to recount the story as: "The damn beast was charging right at Frank, antlers lowered, death and all of hell it its soulless eyes. Frank though, he just swings his rifle up … not even aiming … and puts one dead center in Bambi's forehead. Damn thing skids to a halt about a foot from Frank's big toe. Had ta have been at least twenty … NO! Twenty-four points!"

There's not really much wrong with this, even if the story does become silly and nigh unbelievable. I've just always found it amusing to hear such tales recounted when I know the truth of the details. A woman who banged a friend of mine told a gal pal that he had an above average sized penis. Then the friend went and told everyone else that her friend told her that he was packing eight inches and soon everyone in our circle was razzing our pal about his ten inch meat hammer. I've played hockey with the guy. I am shamefully well aware of what he's working with, but I don't dissuade the myth. It'd be a dick move, and hey, if you're going to have some kind of stereotype assigned to you an exaggeration of your penis size is definitely one of the better ones to have. It's just funny how people, some of whom know the truth, prefer a story to the reality.

I'm going to share with you now three examples of myths about myself shared amongst my friends, including both the exaggerations and the realities of each one. Try not to get too bored.

My First Threesome

I had my fair share of sex during my university years, especially during the first one when the excitement of being out on my own for the first time mixed in with the lack of standards that come with not knowing what is and isn't quality poonanny. By my second year I had a fairly good grasp on what my sexual market value is so while the quantity went down the quality went up.

But I wasn't in my second year when, after a wicked New Years party, I charmed two chicks so much that when I jokingly suggested they both come back to my dorm room they shrugged and actually decided to. I was surprised, much like the other people within hearing distance. I remember how shocked their faces were when the girls and I left for my residence.

I was still unsure if the girls actually intended to go through with it when we reached my room. I assumed that they'd flake out once we were inside…or worse, make out with me a little and then pass out in my bed instead. At that point I was basically expecting, as a best case scenario, that one would flake out and the other would stay for some fun.

The Reality

Yes. I had the threesome. And you're probably (not) thinking, hey! Right on Billy! Good for you brah! Well the truth of it is that my first threesome didn't happen exactly as I'd always fantasized. The ladies involved looked less like this:

and a lot more like this:

My first (and thus far, only) threesome was with two slightly chunky and very, very drunk girls. And it was awkward as hell. I had no idea what I was doing and neither did they. I absolutely failed at arranging and juggling them. There was no rhythm or tempo to anything we were attempting to do. It was like I had been shoved in front of one of the world's premiere orchestras as a conductor after only having had five minutes to skim Conducting For Dummies. None of us had a good time. At one point one of the girls was sitting on the corner of the bed, just watching me and the other one with one of the most unsettling stares I've ever been subjected to.

To this day I still wonder how I actually managed to stay at full mast the whole time.

When we attempted the classic tripod position I was nearly choked out. The heftier girl sat down too far and forward on my face and smothered my mouth and plugged up my nose. It felt like being a water boarding victim in some weird Abu Ghraib porn parody. I was squirming underneath her, awkwardly blowing raspberries in a dual attempt to please and breathe. Down on the other end, it felt like the other girl was having the world's laziest epileptic fit on my Johnson. I had just wanted the whole thing to end long before that point and boy, was I ever happy when the ordeal finally was over. I'm pretty sure it was the first sex I've ever had were I was happier it was over then that I'd had it.

Of course, the rest of the dorm never saw how unsatisfying and how utterly unsexy the threesome was, and most of those who heard the retelling did not get to see the low quality of the girls. And thus a terrible night of sex with two women you couldn't pay me nowadays to touch created a legend of a sexual Casanova in the dorms.

The Time I Had A Gun Pulled On Me

Growing up in my hometown was a bit like being in The Outsiders, except instead of me, Patrick Swayze and Matt Dillon rumbling with rich white kids, me and my friends ambushed and beat up brown kids. If it sounds bad, don't worry, they did the same thing to us.

Anyways, one day in junior high—I was in grade eight I think—a couple of Indians we knew from school (the woo woo kind, not the forehead dot ones) were hanging around my friend's neighbourhood. Since there were only four of them and seven of us, we courageously ran outside and began attacking them with hockey sticks. We only managed to get in a few good hits before they ran off. Another victory for Les Nationals!

A few hours later we all headed home. I and two other kids lived on the same street a few blocks over so we were walking together when a rusty old Chevrolet screeched to a halt on the road beside us. The Indians had returned. The back window rolled down and one of them leaned out with a handgun. The other two kids with me did the smart thing and ran off immediately. I was frozen in place.

Of course my 'friends' who ran off fled only so far as to find a safe hiding place to watch from. What they saw was me standing beside the car talking to the Indian, with the handgun pointed squarely at myself the whole time, before he eventually ducked back inside the car and it sped off. My friends then bragged about how I (and themselves, in some versions of the story) stared down some punk natives even though they had a handgun (sawn off shotgun in later re-tellings) pointed at us. Freakin' badass right?

The Reality

From afar, maybe I did look like Clint Eastwood.

Up close I looked a lot more like this:

I was scared shitless. I couldn't even think about how I was about to die. Honestly, I don't remember being able to think anything. The suddenness of the Indian whipping the gun out on me made me chomped down so hard from fear that I actually chipped a tooth (my lower left 1st molar for all five of you interested in that detail). He asked me if I wanted to die. I squeaked out a lot of begging no's; my voice was already screechy from being in the midst of puberty and it only sounded more pathetic from my rapid fire pleading. I was about to get down on my knees and actually physically beg them to not shoot me when the Indians decided to drive away.

So far from being a stoic, steely eyed bad ass staring down my potential killer, I was a quivering and laughable mess who nearly soiled himself… and I do mean nearly. After the whole affair I found the front of my gonch was wet. I'd like to say it was just from sweat, but I'm pretty sure I pissed a little. Thankfully, that little detail didn't make it into the Billy Bible.

Oh, and to top it all off, a week later I found out that it wasn't even a real handgun. It was a BB handgun. In my own defence, five or six hundred shots from that bad boy might have killed me, so I was probably in the right by being scared for my life.

I Knocked Out A Professional Boxer

I worked as a bouncer during university. The job was supposed to help alleviate my student debt, but most of my paycheques went to booze, drugs and pizza.

It was my first month at the job on a very busy Saturday night. I was standing watch in a fairly solitary spot overlooking the dance floor. There were other bouncers within visual range, including one on the balcony above me, and the whole team was just a radio call away, but for the most part I was entirely in charge of that little slice of the club. I had been at the job long enough to get a good feel on who was potential trouble and my eyes were soon drawn to a roidhead in an Affliction tee. He was making quite a presence of himself on the dance floor, bumping into people, puffing his chest out at any guy who dared complain about it. I knew he was a fight waiting to happen.

Not too long after I first spotted roid-o, some scrawny little farmer looking kid accidentally bumped into him. Words were exchanged, roid-o puffed out, and surprisingly enough scrawny bro stood his ground and made his own feelings known by flipping the bird. Roid-o moved in on him but by that time I had already hopped down into the dance floor. I stepped between them, telling roid-o to relax. One of the other bouncers watching from a perch above us saw roid-o push me and start a fight with me. The bouncer then saw me snap a punch at roid-o and knock him out with one hit. By this time the bouncer above me had called all the security to the dance floor, and within a minute we had a circle cleared out around the still dazed roid-o. The other bouncers shooed me off, standard operating procedure to avoid further aggravating the victim of our aggression.

I was summoned to the boss's office when the club shut down for the night. Other bouncers were already in there, watching security camera footage. On the crappy camera you could see me jump into the dance floor, roid-o get in my face, and then in a few seconds the dancers around us spread out as I knocked roid-o to the ground.

"Do you know who that was?" my boss asked me.

I didn't. Nor did I care, though I was afraid that I had knocked out his nephew or someone other bouncer's brother. It turned out roid-o was well known by others at the club. He was also supposedly a professional boxer, one of the best in the province. So for the remainder of my employment at the club I was known as the guy who fought and knocked out an actual boxer with one hit.

The Reality

After I had jumped down into the dance floor and told roid-o to relax, he told me to go and fornicate myself. Confused and, I freely admit, very intimidated by his attitude, I pointed to the club's logo on my shirt, identified myself as security and again told him to relax. I recall really, really hoping he'd take that advice (remember, I was all alone at this point and I had no desire to fight a guy with bigger traps than a Cardassian from Star Trek).

Obviously he didn't take the advice.

Roid-o tried to push past me to get at scrawny bro and I shoved him back. His hands started to come up and I swung out immediately. It was, to my own credit, a solid sucker punch. There was no squaring off, he threw no punches, and his attention was completely focused on scrawny bro behind me. My hit caught roid-o square on the sweet spot on his chin and he went down limp probably without having even realized he was in a fight. Roid-o was also a regular that I had never noticed before, and when I did afterward I also noticed that he drank profusely when at the club. In hindsight, I have no doubt that he was already ten or eleven beers deep that night and was practically pre-knocked out before I tapped him.

Plus roid-o wasn't a professional boxer. He was in a barely legitimate league. At best he could be called semi-pro and he never wound up going anywhere, languishing as just another lower mid-tier fighter wannabe in a bush league who expired in his early 20s and decided to cope by spending the remainder of his glory years getting way too drunk at a club and trying to pick fights with guys who are half his weight. If I sound a little bitter there, I am. Roid-o challenged me to fight in the ring many-a-time after that night and I made a point of never taking him up on the offer. Because I know he'd have slaughtered me.

So in the future, when you hear a story about a manly man doing manly things, look at it with an objective eye. Odds are what really happened is a lot more mundane and sort of pathetic than the story that gets solidified afterward. But hey, some men need their legends I suppose.

Not that I'm saying I'm a legend* or anything.

Though I am a legend. Just ask my friends, they'll tell you.*

The Golden Rule Works

April 22, 2014 | by MinisterOfWar | Link | Original Link

First a little disclosure. I'm a minister. Let's try that again. I'm a prison minister. We are trained theologians who work in a dangerous environment. We often come from diverse and unpleasant backgrounds. We use salty language and we are just as ready to fight as preach—because we have to be. Your average parishioner will not stab you with a sharpened toothbrush handle if you annoy him enough, mine will.

I come from, and work in, a place of harsh absolutes. Please don't mistake my roughness for a lack of love.

Doesn't like condescension. True story.

I know that many of those reading this article are not believers and that's groovy. I'm not trying to convert you. Evangelism is not my calling. I'm here because I hate it when bitter and unethical people try to misuse yet another perfectly good and logical teaching to undermine a simple Biblical truth.

When someone says, “Remember the Golden Rule” in an attempt to shame you for standing up for order over chaos, I hope that this little article will give you the confidence to say, “I always do.” Not because you are a passive doormat but because you understand that “Do unto others…” has two valid components: Call for Mercy and Chastisement of the Foolish. The weak and the cowardly deliberately avoid the latter function.

Tarnished Gold

“Do unto others as you would have done unto you.”

For as long as I can remember, and long before I became a chaplain, The Golden Rule has been applied by the weak as a stick to batter the strong. The cringing and narcissistic may set up the paradigm in one of the following ways:

“You can’t call me out for jumping in line because you don’t like being yelled at.” Head-exploding cognitive dissonance is required to ignore that I also wouldn’t want someone jumping in front of me after hours of waiting.

“You have to forgive me for stealing from you because you would want forgiveness.” No. I would want correction for being a thief. And how does calling out your crime, or even punishing you for it, mean I can’t simultaneously forgive you? Nice try.

“Do you want all your problems handled with force? Huh? Well? Do you?” No. Only the ones that require it. It would be an awkward life if we had to slap people for common activities like making a sandwich. I’m not even sure what that question means or how they conflated “resistance to idiocy” with violence.

Since a plurality of churches teach this same false and morally bankrupt interpretation, most of the people you know will agree with the line jumper in the above example. Somehow you are the one who gets stink eye for demanding civil behavior from others. In a mind-bending paradox, you are seen as barbaric. Their twisted take on the Golden Rule requires a deep belief that nothing is inherently worth fighting over and no one has any interest in becoming a better person.

None of this is surprising. The increasingly liberal church has been misquoting, or simply fabricating Biblical concepts for years. I would run out of pixels exploring the judgmental, greedy, emasculating and anti-Biblical teachings found in almost any street corner “church.” Throw a rock and you will hit some clergyman on his money grubbing head who has made a false biblical claim for such obvious fallacies as…

- God doesn’t believe in capital punishment
- God doesn’t believe in self defense
- Using good judgment is the same as being judgmental

All these misinterpretations are deliberate and have a central theme: Standing up for anything is wrong. Standing up forcefully for anything is evil or, more simply, being masculine is wrong. You notice it's never a biker, cage fighter, fireman, or soldier who pulls this tarnished "gold" out of their asses. It is always the weak, the guilty, and the demonstrably immoral.

As a result, the physically, mentally or spiritually strong members of our society may look at the Golden Rule as a leash, used ruthlessly by the weak and immoral to insure that everyone feels as awful about themselves as they do. Seeing no upside to the scenario, they may opt to ignore the rule entirely and fail to activate its greatest benefit: The instantaneous enhancement of a moral and polite society regardless of faith or religion.

It Doesn't Mean What You Think It Means

The last time a line jumper got in front of me (with his whole family) I called them all out and told them to get to the back of the line. The beta-male "father" of this group of rude, aggressive douche-hats adopted a threatening pose and told me I had better "relax."

In my most compassionate and ministerial voice, I told him I would beat him until his skin didn't fit if he decided to pursue the use of force.

He left and took his brood with him. But what about the crowd of people in line? Did they not appreciate that I stood up for order and common decency? No, they thought I was an asshole and said as much under their collective breath. Any form of resistance is repulsive to the weak. But I didn't care. I believe in the Golden Rule as it is meant to be practiced. And the truth is; I did that man and his family a favor. They objectively needed to change their abusive and entitled behaviors and discomfort is the only guaranteed method of achieving change.

Just ask anybody who used to be fat.

Slap a fool for Jesus

The upcoming body slam is brought to you by the Golden Rule

If I was mishandling a gun and somebody snatched it from my hand and slapped me in my stupid face before declaring, "What are you trying to do, moron, kill everybody in the fucking room?" I would like to think I would be man enough to know that this Good Samaritan had just Slapped Some Jesus™ into me.

The Prince of Peace was gentle, but not a pacifist. He took a whip to folks and got into at least one recorded brawl. Did He think violence solved problems?

Well, yeah… occasionally. Just read about His forecasted return for further clarification.

I'm not saying that offering a beat-down to every rude person you meet is the way to go. That kind of behavior just advertises deep weakness and insecurity. What I am saying is that calling someone out, when you really need to, for the benefit of themselves and society is exactly what the Golden Rule was written for. When the weak and false-minded assail you with, "Did you have to be so harsh with your nephew? I mean, what about the Golden Rule?" you should be able to stand up and say, "Well, if I was a lying, drug addicted, little turd, I would hope someone would do me the favor of pointing it out. Otherwise that would be a terrible way to go through life."

Ding! Golden Rule validated!

Why? Because "Do unto others as you would have done unto you" works both ways. If men start using The Rule as it was meant to be used—not only to offer mercy, but provide needed correction—then those that try to abuse it as a weapon will soon find themselves on the wrong end of another misused beta-favorite. "He who lives by the sword…"

If Your Girlfriend Insists On A Big Wedding, Dump Her

In a recent half-hearted troll attack, someone added my Return Of Kings email to the Martha Stewart living newsletters. It was a surprisingly enlightening experience—besides getting some great recipes for my slow cooker, I was exposed to the ridiculous "Martha Stewart Weddings" list, a daily email with advertisements about how to spend more and indulge yourself for "your big day."

Guys, listen up. If you put a ring on your girl's finger despite our slut-promoting culture, well-established divorce industrial complex, and pervasive portrayals of married men as incompetent and powerless dweebs, she is already winning the game. Despite all of these advantages, if your woman insists on having a large, extravagant wedding, it's in your best interests to end the relationship as quickly as you can.

Fancy weddings are the ultimate exercise of narcissism and commercialism in modern society. It's been observed countless times that women in the west want to get married, but they do not want to be married. They want the year-long attention of being in "wedding planning mode," culminating in the ultimate party where they are the supreme princess for the day. When it comes to fulfilling a role as a wife and mother, though, they will suddenly balk at any mention of tradition. Her unilateral insistence upon a large wedding reflects especially poorly on her character in these ways:

1. Financial Irresponsibility

The average american wedding costs $28,000. The median U.S. household income is $44,000. For anyone besides the super-rich, how can throwing a big party to commemorate your financial castration at the hands of the state be considered anything but irresponsible? Your sweetie would rather squander money (often much of it yours) on a lavish celebration rather than investments such as buying a house, saving for retirement, or traveling the world to educate yourselves. An expensive, pointless wedding is the ultimate display of low future-time orientation, a bad trait for someone to whom you're pledging half your future earnings in a legally binding contract.

2. Selfishness

Have you ever seen a dead-eyed man dutifully trying to choose between yellow and goldenrod for his wedding's place settings? Men don't enjoy planning weddings. Though they make up half of a marriage partnership (and usually more financially-speaking), a preference for a courthouse or a small ceremony is almost always ignored because it's "her day." This sets a poor precedent for future decisions you will make as a couple. If you give a mouse a cookie…

3. Herd mentality

Though the silliness of the modern wedding ceremony are fairly easy to elucidate, women are more susceptible to the whims and opinions of those around them. Disney movies have taught her from childhood that she deserves a grand storybook wedding. Her friends goad her into one-upsmanship by showing off their expensive engagement rings on Facebook and Instagram. Her parents want to bring the entire extended family to the ceremony to show off their success at raising a well-adjusted little girl. And the aforementioned popular media normalizes the extravagance and consumerism of the experience by suggesting she is somehow abnormal or deficient if she doesn't keep up with the joneses.

If you've committed yourself to getting married in western society, you've already made a tremendously risky move. If your woman insists that you dump a bunch of your hard-earned money into what amounts to a one-sided victory party, you know unequivocally that she will not make a good partner in the long run. Get out while you still can.

Get Your Fire Back

April 23, 2014 | by The Moose | Link | Original Link

At first you won't notice. You settle into routine, go about your activities without much other thinking. Your gym sessions, when you actually make it there, will be lackluster at best, going through the motions with the vigor of a Ferris wheel. You find you have aches and pains from…well…you're not too sure. Drinking more beers than you have fingers and toes on Saturday takes all of Sunday and part of Monday to feel normal again, and just a few minutes ago you said something akin to "I can't do X or Y like I used to."

Then it hits you. Like a palm forged from embarrassment and frustration, it hits you.

What happened to that fire? That absolute unbreakable spirit that dominates the psyche of strong young men? It just faded, the wind died down and now it is but a smoldering pile of coals, but you're way too young to feel this way. "Slowing down" like this is for geriatric people in warmer climates. You're about as aggressive as a pussy-whipped suburban dad who was forced to use his Corvette savings to buy a new minivan for his ever-fattening wife to drive the kids to soccer practice. Is this hormonal? Do you have AIDS? Maybe this is aging…can't be, I'm only twenty.

> "I thought I could have written about all the years where I made no progress, and felt very content with myself for no god damn reason at all. Whether I lost my drive or desire, I have no idea. However eventually I woke up one day and realized….holy shit I've been lifting the same things for years and years now. I'm not any stronger. I'm not any better. Fuck, I'm caught in the weight training version of Groundhog's Day!"

> – Paul Carter of Lift-Run-Bang.com

Contentment. To truly solve a problem it must be understood why it was allowed to happen. If a water pipe in your house leaks, it does not serve you well to just patch the hole. That is a Band-Aid solution, and Band-Aids are temporary. Think deeper, corrosion may be to blame; a blockage causing turbulent flow may be speeding up the corrosion. The same thinking must be applied to your recent epiphany. Let us brainstorm a little: males of this current generation, aged between 18-21, have it pretty good. Shelter, food, and water are, for the most part, of no concern. Post-secondary education is available for many budgets and fields of study. There is no major war taking place, so we don't have to worry about getting drafted and dying in a foreign town we can't pronounce. An unfathomable amount of free information, music, movies and porn is available at the tip of our fingers on multiple devices, and to top it off, you can drink, smoke, and gamble legally (I live in Canada). We are softer than our fathers and grandfathers who left us this wonderful life, by a tenfold. We are allowed to be comfortable, living on the edge is optional. We are allowed to be content too early, and contentment, although comfortable, dulls progress.

The fire in you, although weakened, is not completely smothered. You need to remove the ashes and damp logs, allow clean air to flow, and add some fresh kindling with a splash of gasoline. From there, larger and larger pieces of wood will be added until the campfire turns back into a raging wildfire. Start with your computer, or your smartphone, if you have one: Delete all the apps and other bullshit that doesn't complement your rebirth; memes used to be funny, but you're an adult now, delete 'em. Seek to master your chosen profession, or ditch the desk and learn a trade, if you need a change. Clean your fucking vehicle and put some women in it, and if going fast is your thing, get a motor between your legs. Start up a performance-based training program, straighten up your diet, and prepare to hit weight and rep PR's like clockwork.

Re-ignition. I'm proud to say that rather than surrender to mediocrity, I chose to reinvent myself by myself. I became my own therapist by nourishing my mind with quality information and my body with quality nutrition. I studied game on ROK and various books, and began dating one of the few girls in my town that wasn't insane. I learned to further enjoy my job as a pipefitter by committing to getting better. Hell, I even got back into snowmobiling, because few things beat the feeling of doing 120 MPH on a frozen lake.

I was back to my old self by the time I turned 21, my fire was once again burning strong. If a swift kick in the ass and a little excitement can't get you out of a slump, then you are broken. Get your fire back.

The Value of Self-Reliance

April 23, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

The world is always the same in that nothing is so constant as self-interest and the pursuit of pleasure. This truth never surprises. But one thing always does, and that is the life of self-reliance, it being so rare, and in our time more and more so.

Self-reliance is rare because few people are capable of it; they must rather rely almost constantly on others. Accordingly, if you observe humankind in general, you will quickly notice that the majority's beliefs and way of life are not individual but generic, derived from what John Stuart Mill nicely described as the "tyranny of public opinion." Their very psychology and inner poverty requires this, which indeed is quite comforting for them. And since the majority, in all places and times, are slaves to custom and public opinion, like children at the playground they feel an instinctive loathing for anything that is unlike them, and in particular, for whatever is noble and excellent, since they themselves are at best middling through and through. Moreover, because the majority's values, beliefs and sense of self are derived not from themselves, but fashioned in imitation of the commonest type, it follows that they are forever hostile to that rarest of things, individuals, since these stand in radical contrast to them, and so make them feel threatened.

And yet self-reliance, though so noble and excellent, is usually only a romantic abstraction. In practice, it presupposes discipline and sacrifice. It is hard work before it is freedom. In this it is analogous to excellence in the arts and the life of the mind and, I suppose, to the highest excellence generally. Certainly very few people are truly self-reliant. Mere selfishness and "rugged individualism" are something else, and self-reliance should not be confused with them.

The truly self-reliant person is one who disciplines himself not to rely on others to the extent that most people do. He has, then, a certain inner strength, as well as the judgment to know how self-interested and inconstant most people are, so that there is always an immense danger in relying on them. He is commonly a loner or even a recluse. For once experience has shown him that both the minds and characters of most of his fellow human beings are badly lacking and thus imprudent to associate with, he goes his own way, is indifferent to what most think of him, and simplifies his manner of life so that he is answerable to his fellow human beings as little as possible.

The self-reliant person is no joiner of groups or communities. If he cannot lead others, he usually would rather not engage them, for it is only thus that his power remains in himself. Nor is he fit to be some cog in a paltry machine, let alone to answer to the innumerable dullards and fools who triumph in our leveling (i.e., democratic) time. He appeals to his own authority, that is, to his own highest standard of excellence. He does not seek approval, network, play politics, schmooze, tell people what they want to hear, or engage in similar vulgarities in which academics, artists, writers, business people, and other types of organization man are quite happily at home. None of this is necessary, for the simple reason that his sense of self-worth is wholly in himself, and unshakable.

It is otherwise with most people, and hence that conventional abjectness and external (i.e., coming from other people) validation that means so much to them, and which is sure to render them likable and never in want of friends or company, since there's nothing the majority find more winning than a semblance of their own dullness and inferiority. Indeed, it's this that makes them so fond of group activity in all its forms. It is not in their nature to master a thing on their own. Organization man rather delights to work with his fellow team members, to do his part along with them, for the good of the team. But the self-reliant person has very few peers, and there's usually a decline in the quality of his existence once he leaves his own room.

When he walks into Best Buy or some such place, the self-reliant person sees a great many things he can well do without. The reason is that, for him, it is not worth sacrificing his freedom of consciousness in order to be able to buy the latest Ipod or whatever, since in order to do that he will have to work more than is necessary to meet his basic needs, and thereby lose time he could devote to worthier pursuits.

Such severe distinctions guide the whole conduct of his life. In choosing friends, for instance, he is far more selective than most, being far more discriminating. For, as Seneca says in one of his letters to Lucilius, "to consort with the crowd is harmful; there is no person who does not make some vice attractive to us, or stamp it upon us, or taint us unconsciously therewith. Certainly, the greater the mob with which we mingle, the greater the danger." And in another wise letter he explains that > accidents, though they may be serious, are few—such as being shipwrecked or thrown from one's carriage; but it is from his fellow-man that a man's everyday danger comes. Equip yourself against that; watch that with an attentive eye. There is no evil more frequent, no evil more persistent, no evil more insinuating. Even the storm, before it gathers, gives a warning; houses crack before they crash; and smoke is the forerunner of fire. But damage from man is instantaneous, and the nearer it comes the more carefully it is concealed. You > are wrong to trust the countenances of those you meet. They have the aspect of men, but the souls of brutes; the difference is that only beasts damage you at the first encounter; those whom they have passed by they do not pursue. For nothing ever goads them to do harm except when need compels them: it is hunger or fear that forces them into a fight. But man delights to ruin man.

Therefore, Seneca concludes, “withdraw into yourself, as far as you can. Associate with those who will make a better man of you. Welcome those whom you yourself can improve. The process is mutual; for men learn while they teach.” Of course, this presupposes the judgment to select persons of intelligence and good character from the ignorant and corrupt majority.

But for all that, the self-reliant person is no god. He is not altogether independent of others. In the practical affairs of life, he, like everyone, requires other people. But he knows that, as Cicero put it, “a good reputation is not worth raising a finger to obtain, if it were not that it is so useful.” Where others are driven by the desire to be distinguished in the eyes of their fellows, he is distinctly self-assured (and he alone!): he knows who he is and what he can do; therefore he seeks excellence on his own terms, not conforming to anything that might win him the esteem of his fellows, who, unlike him, rest their sense of self-worth on how others perceive them. He, by contrast, does things for the sake of their own value, and so, again, is the last person to go in for networking, schmoozing, flattery, and the usual vulgarities in which the majority are in their natural happy element. He possesses depths; these sustain him, and it is owing to them that he cannot go in for the cheap worldly games that are acceptable to the superficial majority. He knows that, as David Hume wrote in a letter to Adam Smith, “a wise man’s kingdom is his own breast: or, if he ever looks farther, it will only be to the judgment of a select few, who are free from prejudices, and capable of examining his work. Nothing indeed can be a stronger presumption of falsehood than the approbation of the multitude.”

For the self-reliant person, the highest value is freedom, and this entails the willingness to stand alone, even to be an outcast or hated since, as the great philosopher of self-reliance Ralph Waldo Emerson said, “to be great is to be misunderstood.” It is no easy life, but this is essentially what it means to be self-reliant. It is not necessarily a happier life than that of the person who is not self-reliant, but it is a more disciplined, stronger and freer one, and like the stoical life, it tries to avoid vicissitudes and minimize suffering: and to do so it is necessary to rely on oneself, not others.

Thus the self-reliant person responds to suffering by returning upon himself; indeed by inquiring deeper into himself: he contemplates his situation, and where others will join a support group or see a psychiatrist, he makes sense of things for himself; and through his conclusions will learn either to change his situation or, if the problem is beyond his control, to simply endure it. His power, then, is always in himself, while the majority rely on others, who, though they may provide emotional support (of which the self-reliant person, with his great inner strength, has less need), will often only lead him further astray, as we see in the case of psychiatry, or rather, the pharmaceutical industry, this sham religion that, like some corrupt pastor or priest, makes people numb but hardly less blind.

6 Tips For Getting Laid In London

April 23, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Now that the sun is out and the girls are dressin' less, most ardent seducers' minds will turn turn to the fresh tsunami of young hotties that flood the streets of the world's great cities each summer. While many ROK readers are based stateside, most will have cause to visit London at some point in their business or player lives. This is fortunate, for London is without doubt the greatest city for pick-up in Europe. I explain why below, while proffering some tips for how to go about big pimpin' in the big smoke.

1. Understand that London is Huge

The first thing to understand is that London is vast, its 8.3 million population only just below that of Manhattan, its surface area over twice as extensive. Sure, that means the population density is half that of the Big Apple, but take it from me, if you've ever tried to get on a the subway (or "the tube" as it's known) here during rush hour then you'll quickly see that the central districts (where realistically most game will take place, as opposed to the suburbs) are crammed with people. I spend a lot of time in Berlin, the next-largest European city, and believe me, there's no comparison.

London is easily the largest city in the EU and certainly the largest predominantly English-speaking city in the world after NYC. And as every player knows, size matters. There are literally thousands of opportunities out there every day, and the city's size cloaks each poon transaction in welcome secrecy.

2. Most Girls You Hit On Won't Be English

You may have read stories on the internet about English girls being only second to their US counterparts in drunkenness, bitchiness, entitlement and weight gain. You may also have read that they are not very attractive. While it would be unfair to taint all Brit girls with the same brush, and while some are extremely attractive, the truth is that for every Keira Knightly, you also get one of these:

Fortunately, then, not only is London massive, it is also incredibly multicultural. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, author of the Sherlock Holmes book, described it as “that great cesspool into which all the loungers and idlers of the Empire are irresistibly drained.” That was in 1887—fast forward 127 years and this phenomenon has only grown exponentially. Make no mistake—this is fantastic news. Economic insecurity in Poland and more recently Spain have meant literally thousands of young hotties have poured in, searching for waitress jobs and excitement. In January 2014, Bulgarian and Romanian immigrants were granted the same rights to work here as those from other EU countries. While this caused some consternation in the far right, UK pussy plunderers rightly rejoiced, for the girls from these countries are among the hottest in the world.

Beyond these nationalities, there are girls from pretty much every country in the world in London, studying, on holiday or looking to improve their career prospects. I’ve pulled Russians, Koreans, Africans and Japanese to name but a few. The streets are a veritable potpourri of different sizes, types and nationalities to suit all tastes, and nearly all speak at least a smattering of English.

3. London Daygame Is Second To None

All of this means that the conditions for daygame in London are arguably the finest on the planet, second only to those in Manhattan. Rightly, this means that the work of players like Krauser and the daygame.com crew has become renowned. With hindsight it was inevitable that a world-class daygame method should have originated here, given how perfect the conditions are. Visitors, understand this: within an hour and a half of touching down at Heathrow you can be in Oxford Street chatting up a cute Ukrainian girls before smashing her back at your hotel later that night.

Dedicated London practitioners speak warmly of the so-called “golden triangle” which spans from Piccadilly Circus across to Covent Garden then north to Oxford Street, and indeed these areas are packed not only with tourists, but also with workers and regular girls who live in the city hitting up the shops for that night’s club outfit. Topshop in Oxford Circus, which offers cutting-edge fashions at cheap prices is a mecca for girls from all over the world (Topshop recently opened a branch in NYC). This is a place you should visit at least once as the sheer number and quality of girls to be found here is astounding—from models to hipsters to European royalty, every chick wants a piece of the Topshop pie.

4. London Is A City Of Tribes

Beyond the mainstream melee of its center, London is a city of tribes, so know the type of girl you want to meet before you come and then position yourself accordingly. Very roughly, it breaks down like this: for rich English, Arabic and Russian girls, and aristocracy, head for Chelsea and hit up clubs such as Bouji's (once a favourite of Prince Harry) or Bodos Schloss in Kensington. These places can be hard to get into so it's worth taking out a membership with a concierge service like TLC beforehand. For Euro-skanks head to Mayfair and check out Mahiki or Project. For hipster girls go East to Shoreditch and Dalston and hit the Hoxton Pony or the Hoxton Bar & Grill. For rock chicks, go north to Koko in Camden. For bottom-of-the-barrel drunken-tourist pump-and-dumps you can't do better than the meat markets around Leicester Square like Zoo Bar and Tiger Tiger. Like an epicurean faced with a sushi menu, decide on your preferred flavour and then indulge.

5. Logistics Are Not Your Friend

Armed with this insight, you should now make an informed decision on where to stay, because believe me when I tell you that logistics in London are a bitch. This is one spread-out city, so if you pull a girl in Hoxton but you are staying in Ealing then good luck keeping her ‘gina tingles fizzy during the hour-long $100 cab ride back to your spot. Pick a hotel close to the scene you are most interested in targeting. If you want to stay centrally then you can’t go wrong with the W on Leicester Sq, the Soho Hotel or the Sanderson just off Oxford Street. For Mayfair, try the Hilton or the Grovesnor. For a hipper, more laid-back vibe in Shoreditch, I’ve heard great things about the Hoxton Hotel.

Black cabs are usually plentiful depending on the time of night and your location, and can be flagged down in the street, but it’s also worth downloading the Addison Lee app which allows you to order a car at any time day or night via your Smartphone.

6. The London Underground Is A Goldmine

Underutilized even by players who live here, the subway system here is an absolute goldmine when it comes to meeting women, simply because it is the city's great leveler. Everyone uses it at least sometimes, even celebrities—it is only the super-rich who eschew it altogether. I have probably pulled as many lays from the tube as I have from clubs in my time here. Forget the meme that Londoners are unfriendly: most girls travelling to and from work are as bored as hell and welcome a well-calibrated approach if you are well-dressed and confident. One good idea is to open on the platform before you both get on the train. That way you can continue the conversation in the carriage easily without her getting embarrassed, as no one need know you just met. Another thing you must always do is ask early on where she's getting off, then plan to either get her number in good time, or alight with her for an insta-date.

Hopefully these pointers should help make your trip to London a successful one, but if you have any questions be sure to hit me up before you come.

The Mistress Method

Perhaps the most effective way of maintaining a healthy relationship in a LTR, is through my custom Mistress Method. This is a method that I have perfected over years and used successfully as well, providing both a happy LTR for the girl(s) involved while maintaining my sexual needs.

The gentlemen reading this right now, who don't desire to run the roads into late in the night chasing notches, will see the benefit of this method. While you may desire one girl to call your 'own', you will find as it always happens, that you will grow tired of just having one sexual outlet through her. The solution is of course, to have a side dish to your main meal. That side dish comes in the form of a mistress.

To start, the girl you select to be your mistress, must be a girl who is content with being a side-girl. There are no exceptions. If you like a drama free life and don't want to get caught up in the drama that can arise from juggling another girl behind your main girl's back, then choose a girl who is okay with that setup. We'll use Jeff as an example of how this would work.

Jeff is a 42 year old man who has a 28 year old girlfriend. She's sweet, has a good character, is helpful to him, physically attractive and overall is a good catch. Her name is Patty. The only problem is, is that Jeff has grown tired of just having her as his only sexual outlet. They have dated for a little over a year and while it's been smooth sailing, Jeff needs some outside pussy. One day while heading home from the gym, Jeff spots a young girl (Amy), 21, with a body to die for. She's hot, sexy and he approaches her. She gives him his number and later he sets up a night to grab drinks together.

The date goes well and Jeff smashes the new pussy he has been craving. After the initial date, Jeff sets up to meet her again and she agrees. She's all about having fun and Jeff is a fun guy. Jeff meets her and comes clean. (Note: this type of game is different then building a harem. When building a harem, one should not be obvious about his other girls and shouldn't reveal everything, but when getting a mistress, it's good game to be upfront on what you're looking for.)

Jeff explains he has a girlfriend and everything is good, but that he's looking to spice up his sex life with another girl. Amy says she understands and besides she's not looking for anything serious anyway. She just wants to have fun, have new experiences and enjoy her college life. Perfect.

Now you're thinking, "Yea but what's in it for Amy?" What's in it for her, is that she gets to have new experiences with an older cat who can show her a good time once a week, or maybe twice a week.

He's NOT paying for her companionship, but instead shows her a lifestyle that she's not accustomed to by the younger guys. Instead of going to a college party and playing beer pong, she's getting picked up by Jeff and taken to a hot club to pop a bottle. Instead of trying to get into a college bar where the frat boys are begging to fuck her, she's getting picked up by Jeff and taken to Malibu for a night in a nice hotel. The difference in him directly paying Amy and just showing her a good time is key.

There has to be something that is a hook for her. Now Jeff may have the sexual prowess of a male porn star and after the first fuck, Amy is down for whatever, as long as she gets to get fucked by Jeff on the regular. This happens too, but I'm writing this situation based on what I have seen, experienced and what is realistic.

Jeff now has his main girl Patty, who he is considering marrying if all goes well after another year or two and maybe popping out some kids as well, but he now also has his sexual needs taken care of and for minimum energy expended. Amy can date who she wants and fuck who she wants, but at the end of the day she's still fucking Jeff.

Amy is young, impressionable and her thirst for new experiences have even caused her to want to delve into threesomes with another girl. Who more perfect to share that experience with than Jeff, who clearly is nothing more than a guy who's fun, fucks her and doesn't judge her. This opens up even more opportunities for Jeff to get his rocks off with Amy in new sexual experiences.

An arrangement of sorts like this is a great way to stay drama free, expend little to no energy in maintaining the outside girl and still have your main girl.

Obviously, this type of situation doesn't come without it's own risk of your main girl finding out about your mistress, but I'm about to break down exactly how to keep this on the down low and keep your risks minimum.

Risk Mistress Management

Here is a list of what you need to do to keep things on the up and up with your main girl and still have your mistress. At one point with your main, it may become obvious you have a mistress(s) and she may choose to look the other way. That is almost a perfect situation because then you have your main girl who keeps the house and tends to your kids, while you still have outside pussy.

- Keep a separate phone for your mistress only. She has the number and no one else. It can be a cheap throw-a-way phone.
- Store the phone somewhere where it's literally impossible for your main to find.
- Only meet with your mistress no more than twice a week.
- Never have your mistress to your place of living: house, condo etc.
- Never let her know exactly where you live. If she knows and one day gets mad, she could show up and bring the house down, especially if your GF lives with you.
- I would highly suggest using a fake name with your mistress. It's just fucking and a little hanging out anyway, no reason to get personal.
- Always get a hotel room, or stay at the mistress's apartment, house or condo.
- Always shower, scrubbing yourself clean of that fresh, new young pussy smell that hotties have, before meeting your main girl.

- If possible, always plan to hang out with your mistress, so that after you hang out with her you have downtime before seeing your main girl. This gives you some downtime to chill out and regroup. Rushing from fucking your mistress will only cause you to forget something and show up with makeup on your neck etc to your main girl.
- If your mistress rides in your car, search the fuck out of it before your main girl gets in it. Girls are sneaky as hell and also tend to be messy. One dropped lipstick between the seats can wreak havoc with your main girl.
- Avoid certain parts of town when with your mistress. Always take her to spots that none of your social circle frequent. The further out of the way, the better.
- Avoid any daytime activities. Only hang out at night when it's dark.
- Always wear a condom, or even better, personally escort her to the doctor to get implanted birth control.
- Have a pre-talk that if she ever gets pregnant, you"ll pay for the abortion and make sure she knows it's not an option to have the kid. Granted, if she absolutely wants the kid, there's nothing you can do, but still make your point.
- Don't get into long phone calls and text message paragraphs. Keep it short and about logistics.
- Keep it fun, light and always about having a good time with your mistress. You don't get serious and she won't get serious, especially if you're only seeing her at most twice a week. Girls are down to fuck too and this will keep her emotions at bay.
- Keep your game tight with her, but don't over game her and get her wrapped up in you.

Always cover the angles so that you don't reveal your mistress to your main…but, if you slip up and she accuses you of cheating, here is the #1 Rule to Follow. You ready?

DENY. DENY. DENY.

Whatever you do, don't confess. A girl will rationalize your behavior away regardless of how obvious it is that you're cheating, if you deny, hold frame and have sufficiently gamed her.

Having a mistress isn't for everyone, but it's worked effectively for men for decades, so why not you? No matter how sexy your main girl is, every man desires new pussy. Be smart and have your cake and eat it too.

Honestly, in your youth did you dream about living in a nightmare of a relationship? Solve your girl problems today. Go here.

American Children Are The Prisoners Of Women

April 24, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Male children are the prisoners of women. Over fifty percent of men are born into single mother households without a father or male authority figure present. Women who choose to keep their children's father around, do so only on a provisional basis, with the legal right to separate him from his children at any time she chooses. For all intents and purposes, the children are hers, and she merely allows their father to see them.

Even if the father is present, the nurses, therapists, school teachers, and caregivers around the child are virtually all women. The formative years of the life of the average American male are dominated and ruled by women. These years are marked by routine and institutional abuse that pathologizes masculinity and trains men to seek women's approval more than their own joy.

Infancy

If a child is born male, he is immediately rushed from his mother's arms to surgery where part of his genitals are cut off in procedure euphemistically known as circumcision. Circumcision is almost always performed without anesthesia, or only an ineffective topical anesthesia, causing the baby to scream in pain as the most sensitive nerve endings on his body are cut off and discarded into the trash (NSFW video).

No medical organization in the world recommends this procedure. America is the only first world country to perform infant circumcision for non-religious reasons. The most common reason given is aesthetic preference—specifically the preference women, who frequently lack comparative sexual experience with the natural male body. Circumcision is the first and greatest change forced on men for women's approval. The implication of circumcision is that the natural male body is disgusting and diseased, that men are born wrong and in need for fixing, and that the penis and male sexual pleasure is not important.

This procedures teaches the child his feelings do not matter, and that his body is the property of others. While feminists prattle on about "rape culture" and "my body, my rights," the boy will know on some level that his consent did not matter, and he did not have the right to his own body. This act of sexual violence will be spoken of only in jokes, as will all acts of violence against men.

Childhood

After infancy, the boy is sent to school where over seventy percent of his teachers will be women. Hereafter, it won't matter if he has a father present, because eight hours a day will be spent attempting to please to women, in an institution run by women for women. School is a feminine environment, where feminine traits like obedience and cooperation are valued over masculine risk taking and challenging.

School teaches boys that their self worth comes from the approval of women through supplication. Boys are told to sit still and obey female authority figures, rather than their own masculine instincts. Just as they were physically disconnected from part of their masculinity in infancy, they will be emotionally disconnected in the school system.

No previous civilization in recorded history would have ever considered imprisoning it's youngest and most energetic members indoors for eight hours a day, and considered submission to such a system pathological. In our society, natural male behavior and childhood energy is what is pathologized. Boys who refuse to sit still or exhibit the natural male instinct to play, explore, or rough house are frequently drugged or expelled. Over 20% of boys will be given prescription drug meditation.

> Imagine if most teachers were male and they were encouraging parents to drug 20% of little girls

— John Durant (@johndurant) March 27, 2014

The message is clear. Supplicate to women, or there is something wrong with you, and we'll reprogram your mind with drugs till you obey. Just as in infancy the male body was pathologized, in male childhood, the male mind is pathologized.

Adolescence

Having spent his in entire life being forced to supplicate to women for their approval, the average American male repeats this strategy in his romantic efforts. And why not? The entire culture around him reinforces it. Men are portrayed in popular media as incompetent and clueless with women, and those who are competent are labeled assholes, players, and users of women.

The only sources most young men have about women are the mainstream media, the internet, their equally clueless peers, and women around them. Women's concern when teaching men about sexuality isn't men's success, but women's comfort. Neither men nor women seek comfort in romantic relationships, we seek excitement. Women's advice on approaching women fails catastrophically for most men.

Men enter the world of sexuality with little or no guidance on the questions that actually concern them. When they ask questions about how to get girls, they are shunned as predatory and accused of objectifying women. By this point, the idea that men's pleasure does not matter, and men should seek women's approval is so thoroughly ingrained that men have trouble even talking about their sexual questions.

Unable to sleep with women, young men turn to pornography. The average American male will see more pornography at thirteen than existed in the world fifty years ago. Watching pornography actually changes the brain, reorienting men's arousal from his own personal experience, to a thirst for passively received novelty. Many men who have quit porn have found their social skills and focus dramatically improved. For this reason, social awkwardness is increasing among men, in scientifically observable ways.

While the man watching porn is told he is objectifying and degrading women, but the woman doing porn is told she is empowered. This is because a man watching porn is not seeking a woman's approval, whereas the woman doing porn is looking for approval. In either case, the concern is always women's approval, not for the man who lacks the skills to find sexual pleasure with actual women.

Backlash

Every stage of this process occurs only with the conscious consent and action of women. A man could easily reach the age of twenty without knowing a single adult male mentor, including his own father. The system of nurses, teachers, and therapists perpetuating the abuse of the American male are female dominated professions.

After over a decade of abuse, what attitudes do you think most men will have toward women?

There are two ways human being respond to unhealed trauma—they repress the experience, or act it out on others. Facing abuse is incredibly difficult, and facing unacknowledged institutional abuse is even more difficult. Most men prefer to say "I'm fine," take the blue pill, and shove their feelings down. They label anyone who calls attention to their abuse a misogynist, and continue the pattern of seeking women's approval formed in childhood.

The other path is bitterness and acting out the abuse through genuine chauvinism. Women frequently accuse men with negative attitudes about women of having "mommy issues," but the problem actually goes much deeper. Men have issues in every female dominated setting from school to birthing industry. Even the therapists men might seek to discuss these issues with are mostly women. If men hate women, it isn't because of lack of experience, since women dominate men's early life. Whatever men become, it what their female caregivers have made them.

There is a third path—healing. Healing requires fully feeling and acknowledging the abuse and allowing yourself to let go of the patterns associated with it while still holding the perpetrators responsible accountable. In this case, ending the institutional abuses of men require men to stop caring about what women think about them, value their own pleasure and sexual experience more than women's approval, and find ways to play, explore, and grow free from women's constraints.

All of this can be avoided by not abusing men in the first place. Natural male instincts are entirely healthy, and do not require correction through surgery, drugs, or forced cultural conditioning. Men are not born wanting to supplicate to or hate women. The qualities women dislike in men can be traced back to the treatment men routinely receive at the hands of women when they are young. When women value the masculine, and reflect that value in how they treat men during their earliest years, they will get the men they desire. Until then men must liberate themselves by putting their own joy, freedom, and purpose first.

3 Reasons Why You Should Ride A Motorcycle

April 24, 2014 | by Atham Lupus | Link | Original Link

There are a few skills that a man should have and most of them are covered here on ROK. Here's one more: ride a motorcycle. If you can't ride a bike, you are forever gonna be part pussy. Period. Same thing if you can't drive a stick but that's another article. Looking cool is a benefit not to be discounted, but the better reason is that riding will make you a better man by forcing you to confront and overcome fear, learn and use new skills, and to ignore social disapproval. All of those are central to and necessary for a successful life.

1. Overcome Fears

Overcoming normal fears is essential if you want to get anywhere, at anything, in this life. Put fear aside and do what you came for.

This happens. Get over it.

Riding a motorcycle is frightening. That's a fact. Any rider that tells you otherwise is lying to you, to themselves, or both. Sailing along with nothing much between your soft self and the road at speed had damn well better scare you—it's fucking dangerous. Your own mistakes, and those of others, have at a minimum Very Serious Consequences. Throw the bike down the road and you will at best wake up the next day feeling like you took a mob-grade beating. But it's also fun as hell. So you have to learn to overcome your fears and get on with the task at hand.

2. Learn A Skill

Learning to understand a skill set, master it, and employ those skills under stress is another key to success at anything. Instincts are what your brain automatically does, skills are learned responses to situations. Skills are what make us the smart monkeys we are; without the skills learned, refined, and passed from man to man, we are capable of nothing.

Not crashing is a skill.

Riding a motorcycle is a skill. A very technical learned skill that includes mental and physical components. Learning to read the road surface and camber, the topography of the land, the clues to usable hazards are all high level mental process that have to become automatic. The physical act of moving around on the bike requires strength and balance. Learning to make yourself look where you want to go and not focus on a road hazard, to push yourself down toward the road rushing past to get the thing around a corner, to brake progressively in an emergency, not just grab in a panic—those are mental and physical skills.

3. Take Some Heat

Knowing who you are, and what you want, and standing up for it in the face of disapproval, is yet another key skill.

Safe. But you'll die of boredom.

Announce that you bought a bike and at least half the people you know are going to tell you about their friend/neighbor/family who had a cycle and crashed it and how badly they got hurt. Some of the stories will even be true. And they'll work around to that smug, superior tone and ask "Don't you know how dangerous those things are?" And you have got to just look them in the eye and say: "Yep."

You cannot learn to ride, even at a novice level, without investing significantly in controlling your fear, skill acquisition, and the self-confidence to put that to use.

In the Pantheon of Badass, there are exactly zero men who had access to and didn't ride motorcycles. Zero.

Here's how to start:

Training

Get some training. You rode dirt bikes as a kid at your cousins farm sometimes means you know not a damn thing. Find your local MSF class and sign up. It takes one weekend in most places to go from zero to licensed, and they provide bikes. You'll need much more practice to get really competent. Figure one solid season if you make a study of riding.

Gear

Get some gear. Don't turn it into a faggy fashion splurge, and don't let the safety freaks oversell the dangers. Got a decent, heavy leather jacket? Great, you're halfway there. If not you can pick up reasonable textile jackets for less than $200. Get some good gloves and a sturdy pair of boots for another $200, and a helmet for $100. Get a second one to later to lend out to girls. In the beginning you are going to be a fair weather rider, so skip raingear for now. What, how, where, and when you ride is going to dictate your eventual collection of stuff so for now just buy halfway decent or used equipment (except for helmets).

The Bike

The near-perfect Basic Bike.

Get a bike. This is the part most people get wrong. A bigger bike is not a better bike; you do not need 1000cc crotch rocket and you'll look like a dipshit on one until you really know what you're doing. Look for an older dirt bike of 400-650cc or inexpensive Japanese naked bikes. These types do not hold value well at all, and often get ridden very little and traded in on bigger machines so dealers have them cheap. $1500-3000 is plenty to budget.

If you buy from a dealer, you have a sense that the machine is mechanically safe. Most dealers will do a basic safety check and offer a 30 day warranty, but you'll pay more. If you want to buy used, take along a good friend that's been riding for a few years. Again, and I cannot overemphasize this, don't buy a big ass bike, a super cool vintage Euro bike, or a fucking HD. You are going to drop the thing. Fact. A cheap bike falls over better. Nobody but you (and you shouldn't) and insecure posers give a shit what you ride. Ride a fast bike slow and you look like a fool, ride a slow bike fast and you're a god.

So there you go, for a couple grand you just got the chance to practice some of the most important skills you'll need in life. Oh yeah, and women love a man with a bike.

7 Things You Should Know About Getting Laid In San Diego

April 25, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

"You Stay Classy San Diego" – Ron Burgundy

Much like most of America, the ladies of San Diego hardly keep it classy these days. Of course, this is not necessarily a bad thing. Less class equals more sex, and girls give sex out more freely than ever, though only to a handful of guys. San Diego is one of those cutthroat cities – where, if you have your shit together, getting laid can be as simple as shooting fish in a barrel. However, competition can definitely be tough, and I would never recommend anyone move here for the girls, regardless of how incredibly difficult it is to have to cope with 70 degree weather 10 months a year.

If you want to move, or take a vacation, to San Diego, here are some tips to get you started.

The “Man Diego” Name Rings True

San Diego is often referred to as “Man Diego”, and it is commonly said that the only rain we get is “when it rains men.” You know that moment when you walk into a bar, and you see twice as many guys as girls? Many of you often grumble at the site, and curse yourself for going out that night. In San Diego it’s not that uncommon to walk into a venue and see four or five guys for every one girl.

Yes, you read that correctly – 4/5:1

The reason for this:

The Military Presence Is Huge

There are some 7 bases within 15 miles of each other in the actual city of San Diego, plus Camp Pendleton only 30 miles up the road in Oceanside. To illustrate my point, I’ve included the below snapshot.

This means that there are drunken Navy and Marine boys running around all the time. They often have quite a bit of money to blow because they live in the barracks and therefore have no living expenses. While they don’t have game, the sheer number of them means that girls get endless attention, drinks, and as a result their bitch shields are often sky-high. In addition to that, they are all in good shape. While good fitness will not make up for a total lack of game, if you are not in good shape then it simply makes you look worse in a sea of cock.

Be better than average.

The Stupid SoCal Girl Vibe Is True

The dumb “like, OH MY GOD!!!” mentality that you always hear about beach girls is very much true. Many girls here are incapable of thoughtful conversation, iPhone-obsessed, and have the attention span of a child. However, don’t let this dissuade you; dumb girls are often quite easy.

So far I’ve highlighted some of the downsides of the city, but let’s end on a positive note, shall we?

There Are A Lot Of Quality Girls

Yes, the numbers with other guys are shitty, but remember that the population of San Diego is well over a million people. Many girls are in good shape, athletic, and are in general, good-looking. The city overall is very active due to the year-round gorgeous weather, which means that many people pride themselves on keeping themselves in top beach shape year round. Of course, this also depends on where you go. If you wander into the suburbs of Poway, you’ll find your fair share of fat single moms. Stick to the coastal areas and you will be able to find slim and attractive girls.

Diversity

Mexicans? You’re 20 minutes from Tijuana. Asians? Hit up UCSD. Slutty sorority white girls? Head towards SDSU. European Au Pairs are all over the place. San Diego is a like a buffet where you can sample a bit of everything. If you’re foreign, girls will just drop their panties. I had a friend from Australia who came over for some work training for two months. He abused the shit out of his accent, and enjoyed himself, to say the least.

Tourism Is High, Especially On Spring Break And Summer

It's easy to meet girls that are vacationing here who will fuck you. After all, they're on vacation and just want some fun, therefore it "doesn't count."

Daygame Is An Untapped Market

95% of guys here have terrible game. As mentioned, it is mostly drunken Navy and Army boys making laughable approaches and blowing money only to get blown off. If you can approach, you are way ahead of the game. In addition, San Diego is not a huge, well-known city. Most girls do not get approached during the day. It is not a place like New York or London, where I can recognize the area simply because I've seen a zillion daygame videos filmed there.

Fact Checking Emotional Propaganda

When I was making a purchase at my local bookstore last week, the cashier solicited me for a donation. This donation was for a charity dealing with sick children or something. I told cashier I came here to buy a book not make donations. I guess she realized I am not one to be guilt tripped into doing things and told me that many people do not have the courage to say no. This pressure to comply due to emotional appeal has run rampant in America. When people make decisions on how they feel or manipulated by their feelings, not many good things can come of it.

Usually I do not delve into the details of the various schemes and manipulations that powerful people do in order to influence people's behaviors. Someone actually fact checked one sales pitch for the limitation of guns. This exercise in breaking down an argument outside of the emotional shows that emotion is all it has. While the premise is guns, the method is pure emotional appeal.

Legislators Unanimously Supported HB 1840 to Stop Domestic Abusers from Getting Guns While Under a Restraining Order; Governor Inslee Signed Bill Into Law Today

Washington Mayors Against Illegal Guns and Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America today applauded Governor Jay Inslee's signing of HB 1840, bipartisan legislation that will stop domestic abusers from getting guns while under a restraining order. The bill was supported by domestic abuse survivors and advocacy organizations, law enforcement, gun violence prevention advocates and the National Rifle Association.

The new law is a major step forward for common-sense guns laws in Washington—it will help save women's lives and protect families from gun violence. Recent research has found that women are five times more likely to be murdered in a domestic violence situation if a gun is present and that two-thirds of women who are murdered by their current or former intimate partners are killed with guns.

"I would like to congratulate all the people who were involved in passing HB1840 into law: the Governor, my former colleagues in the legislature, and the survivors of domestic violence and gun violence who traveled from all over the state to testify in Olympia," said Seattle Mayor Ed Murray. "This is how we should work together to make our communities safer."

"I'm so grateful that our legislators did the right thing by passing this bill. This type of legislation will help prevent other women from going through what I experienced," said Courtney Weaver, a domestic violence survivor who was shot in 2010 by her former boyfriend. "The Governor signing HB 1840 into law today is an incredibly good thing for Washington."

The Mayor of New York City, Michael Bloomberg has decided to throw his hat in, as well as his capital, in a political fight against the NRA by spending an estimated fifty million dollars to start up Everytown for Gun Safety @ Everytown.org. If you go to his website, one of the articles pops out on the front page is an "analysis" of the over sixty "school shootings" that have taken place since the Newtown massacre on December 12th, 2012.

In this era of political rhetoric and ideological echo-chambers, there is little in the way of fact-checking and realism with statistical data. The media is off panicking the masses of soccer moms and metrosexual dads that mass shootings are a growing epidemic, apparently none of whom look at the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports of homicides every year. Of the sixty-two incidents on Everytown's "analysis", only one can be classified as a mass murder. The FBI is quite clear that a "mass murder" involves the homicide of four or more individuals with no cooling off period between the murders. The article would lead readers to believe that there have been sixty-two incidents of similar scope as the Sandy Hook Elementary School shooting. But this is simply not the case.

With a total combined death toll between the sixty-two "school shootings" of 39, it's hard to match them up to Newtown, which in one incident saw 28 deaths, including the perpetrator, Adam Lanza. Despite what the media might portray for politics, ratings, or profit, such shootings are exceptionally rare. Of course, a large amount of the focus is on the AR-15 reportedly used,the gun control advocates would like gullible Americans to think without which Adam Lanza would not have been capable of such carnage. But if you remember the Virginia Tech shooting on April 16th, 2007. Seung-Hui Cho managed to kill 32 people, then himself, with nothing more than a .22LR caliber Walther P22 and 9mm Glock 19; the Walther with a magazine capacity of ten rounds and the Glock a bit more at fifteen. There is little discussion of firearms in the Everytown analysis, probably because they are virtually all handguns or the suggested firearm for home defense of Vice President Joe Biden, a shotgun.

Let's look at that the lack of analysis this "analysis" gives us, as it's little more than a picture of a crying woman and a list of schools at which a firearm was discharged on or nearby campus grounds since December 2012. Thirty-nine people dead, because of school shootings, between December 13th, 2012 and mid-April 2014. It's hard to find statistics for causes of death even near that number. The United States averages roughly 51 deaths due to lightning strikes per year, over the last 20 years; according to NOAA. According to the CDC, there was an average of 3,533 unintentional drownings per year for the years of 2005-2009. Yet where is a politically motivated and affluent billionaire to launch a safety campaign outlining the dangers of pools or thunderstorms?

The fact that Mayor Bloomberg has taken Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel's now infamous quote "never let a good crisis go to waste" to heart, is no surprise. But who thinks about the political realities of why someone is making moves against one of the GOP's biggest political lobbies, using a tragedy like Newtown as the crest on their flag; when they are busy being emotionally compromised by the idea of children being gunned down in their school classrooms?

Among the 39 deaths, there is a justified case of self-defense, a possible case of self-defense, and seven cases of nothing more then suicides by firearm. The biggest trend among these “school shootings” is the shooters and victims are young black men. This reality is in stark contrast to the media image of upper-class white elementary school kids gunned down by socially awkward psychopaths with AR-15’s or other “assault weapons”. Few if any of the mainstream gun safety campaigns reflect the reality of gun violence. Remember, you are more likely to be killed by bee stings than you are to be shot on or around a school campus.

In conclusion, this emotional appeal by Mr. Bloomberg seems to be all about coercing a population into following his politics through emotional appeal. His advocacy gives them an audience of motivated people controlled by their emotions. What could a powerful person do with this audience aside from campaign against guns. I signed up at this website to get the newsletter. This newsletter only talks about political activism for those that seem to not be able to make up their own mind. Be aware of those that appeal to your emotion, because they may not appeal to your interests.

The Most Successful Businessman Of America

April 26, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Titan is the biography of John D. Rockefeller, founder of Standard Oil, a company that played the largest role in establishing the oil sector in the United States using both controversial strong-arm tactics and brilliant business foresight. The book starts from John's childhood and makes its way to his death, finely detailing his life, family, and business experiences, giving you a personal look into one of the most notorious figures in American history.

We first learn of John's childhood. His father Bill was a snake oil salesman who would sell his cancer and pain cures at inflated prices to naive townsfolk. Other times he would arrive into small towns acting deaf and dumb to unload his stock of novelties. He was also a philanderer who would cavort with other women, eventually settling into a bigamist marriage in another state, leaving John, his siblings, and his mother little money to fend for themselves in Ohio.

> Before long, Big Bill roughly disabused Eliza [John's mother] of any high-flown romantic notions she might have had about matrimony. Far from renouncing his girlfriend, Nancy Brown, he brought her into the cramped house as a "housekeeper" and began having children, alternately, by wife and mistress. In

> Perhaps out of a self-protective instinct, Bill taught his children to be wary of strangers and even of himself. When John was a child, Bill would urge him to leap from his high chair into his waiting arms. One day, he dropped his arms, letting his astonished son crash to the floor. "Remember," Bill lectured him, "never trust anyone completely, not even me."

His disciplinarian and religious mother gave him many tools to be a good businessman by the time he was a teenager (he was in charge of several household responsibilities due to the absence left by his father). When it was time for him to look for a job at 16, he cold-called nearly every respectable firm in Cleveland.

> Despite incessant disappointment, he doggedly pursued a position. Each morning, he left his boardinghouse at eight o'clock, clothed in a dark suit with a high collar and black tie, to make his rounds of appointed firms. This grimly determined trek went on each day— six days a week for six consecutive weeks— until late in the afternoon. The streets were so hot and hard that he grew footsore from pacing them. His perseverance surely owed something to his desire to end his reliance upon his fickle father. At one point, Bill suggested that if John didn't find work he might have to return to the country; the thought of such dependence upon his father made "a cold chill" run down his spine, Rockefeller later said. Because he approached his job hunt devoid of any doubt or self-pity, he could stare down all discouragement. "I was working every day at my business— the business of looking for work. I put in my full time at this every day."
> …the job prospects were momentarily bleak. "No one wanted a boy, and very few showed any overwhelming anxiety to talk with me on the subject," said Rockefeller. 29 When he exhausted his list, he simply started over from the top and visited several firms two or three times. Another boy might have been crestfallen, but Rockefeller was the sort of stubborn person who only grew more determined with rejection.

He began working as an accountant, learning the double-entry bookkeeping system that would later be important in helping him understand which parts of his oil business were gaining or losing money. He was a natural at it…

> Despite his youth, Rockefeller soon came to feel that he was being underpaid. When Tuttle quit in January 1857, Rockefeller was elevated to chief bookkeeper, performing, at the age of seventeen, all the tasks formerly discharged by the departed partner.

He never felt appreciated at his firm, so he took a 10% interest loan from his father and started a partnership at the age of 18 that bought groceries and produce in bulk before selling to stores. By the age of 20, he had gained more business experience and wisdom than those 10 years his senior.

> When he rested his head on the pillow at night, he warned himself, “Because you have got a start, you think you are quite a merchant; look out, or you will lose your head— go steady. Are you going to let this money puff you up? Keep your eyes open. Don’t lose your balance.”
> Having discarded several older partners, the young man had no real business mentors, heroes, or role models and was beholden to no one. John D. Rockefeller was not only self-made but self-invented and already had unyielding faith in his own judgment.
> With fluctuating market conditions, he sometimes needed to send shipments to New York with great dispatch and personally rushed down to the railroad tracks to motivate his freight handlers. “I shall never forget how hungry I was in those days. I stayed out of doors day and night; I ran up and down the tops of freight cars when necessary; I hurried up the boys.”
> Twenty-nine-year-old John D. Rockefeller demanded that seventy-four-year-old Commodore Vanderbilt, the emperor of the railroad world, come to him. This refusal to truckle, bend, or bow to others, this insistence on dealing with other people on his own terms, time, and turf, distinguished Rockefeller throughout his career.

Once he moved into the oil refining business, a big constraint on his profits became railroad shipping costs. He was able to gain rebates since he shipped so much (the rebates were essentially bulk discounts), but this received criticism for being unfair and was soon declared illegal because railroads were seen as “common carriers” that should serve the public interest. Whether you need to ship 1 barrel of oil or 1000, the cost per unit should be the same. John argued against this, stating that shipping 1000 barrels should have a cheaper unit price, but the public did not agree, even though bulk pricing is quite the rule today with business.

Even after rebates were made illegal, John still partook in them with handshake deals. It was the source of much of the attacks he received for being a monopolist robber baron. The rebates were effective, however, in squeezing out his smaller competitors until he controlled over 70% of the oil business in America.

> Economic historians often cite the exuberance of Gilded Age businessmen, their red-blooded faith in America’s future, without noting the constant uncertainty > that lurked underneath. As Rockefeller's story shows, many of the age's most controversial business practices were forged in a desperate spirit of self-preservation. "It was forced upon us," Rockefeller said of Standard Oil's genesis. "We had to do it in self-defence. The oil business was in confusion and daily growing worse. Someone had to make a stand."

> For his admirers, 1872 was the annus mirabilis of John D. Rockefeller's life, while for his critics it constituted the darkest chapter. The year revealed both his finest and most problematic qualities as a businessman: his visionary leadership, his courageous persistence, his capacity to think in strategic terms, but also his lust for domination, his messianic self-righteousness, and his contempt for those shortsighted mortals who made the mistake of standing in his way. What rivals saw as a naked power grab, Rockefeller regarded as a heroic act of salvation, nothing less than the rescue of the oil business.

If he didn't buy out his competitors outright, he would temporarily undercut their prices so that they wouldn't eventually drag down his own business. He wanted to bring stability to the industry by cooperating with other firms, not only to save on freight through rebates, but to limit production and keep oil prices high so that refining remained profitable in the turbulent period of early oil exploration.

> If, as he asserted, Standard Oil was the efficient, low-cost producer in Cleveland, why didn't he just sit back and wait for competitors to go bankrupt? Why did he resort to the tremendous expense of taking over rivals and dismembering their refineries to slash capacity? According to the standard textbook models of competition, as oil prices fell below production costs, refiners should have retrenched and padlocked plants. But the oil market didn't correct itself in this manner because refiners carried heavy bank debt and other fixed costs, and they discovered that, by operating at a loss, they could still service some debt. Obviously, they couldn't lose money indefinitely, but as they soldiered on to postpone bankruptcy, their output dragged oil prices down to unprofitable levels for everybody.
> Rockefeller and his associates had long been haunted by two antithetical nightmares: Either the oil would dry up, starving their network of pipelines and refineries, or they would drown in a sea of cheap oil that would drag prices below their overhead costs. At one panicky executive-committee meeting in the early 1880s, it was even suggested that Standard Oil should exit the business and enter something more stable. After listening quietly to such defeatist talk, Rockefeller stood up, pointed skyward, and intoned, "The Lord will provide." Rockefeller tended to see a heavenly design in all things and was convinced that the Almighty had buried the oil in the earth for a purpose.

He was essentially the sole reason that anti-trust regulation came into being…

> With his customary thoroughness, Rockefeller had devised an encyclopedic stock of anticompetitive weapons. Since he had figured out every conceivable way to restrain trade, rig markets, and suppress competition, all reform-minded legislators had to do was study his career to draw up a comprehensive antitrust agenda.
> Standard Oil had taught the American public an important but paradoxical lesson: Free markets, if left completely to their own devices, can wind up terribly unfree. Competitive capitalism did not exist in a state of nature but had to be defined or restrained by law. Unfettered markets tended frequently toward monopoly or, at least, toward unhealthy levels of concentration, and government sometimes needed to intervene to ensure the full benefits of competition.

He had dedicated critics attacking him and the Standard Oil trust. It was known as a "trust" because he collected independent entities under the Standard Oil banner without micromanaging their business. He didn't have a 100% stake in every subsidiary of Standard Oil.

> As the trusts' power rippled through society, he said, it corrupted every corner of American life. The noble experiment of American democracy was being undermined by businessmen who had grown more powerful than the state and controlled its elected representatives. "Our system, so fair in its theory and so fertile in its happiness and prosperity in its first century, is now, following the fate of systems, becoming artificial, technical, corrupt."

He was mercilessly vilified in the press. One of the reasons for it was that he had a rule never to talk to them. Back in the days before public relations, corporations didn't know how to deal with the media in a way that would make them appear favorable. Unfortunately for John, this allowed them to set the narrative of his business dealings in the worst way possible. The public was all aboard when Teddy Roosevelt came in to break up Standard Oil. Only problem is that it made John even richer.

> Those who had seen the Standard Oil dissolution as condign punishment for Rockefeller were in for a sad surprise: It proved to be the luckiest stroke of his career. Precisely because he lost the antitrust suit, Rockefeller was converted from a mere millionaire, with an estimated net worth of $ 300 million in 1911, into something just short of history's first billionaire. In December 1911, he was finally able to jettison the presidency of Standard Oil, but he continued to hold on to his immense shareholdings. As the owner of about one quarter of the shares of the old trust, Rockefeller now got a one-quarter share of the new Standard Oil of New Jersey, plus one quarter of the thirty-three independent subsidiary companies created by the decision.

> Rockefeller's stepchildren would be everywhere: Standard Oil of New Jersey (Exxon), Standard Oil of New York (Mobil), Standard Oil of Indiana (Amoco), Standard Oil of California (Chevron), Atlantic Refining (ARCO and eventually Sun), Continental Oil (Conoco), today a unit of DuPont, and Chesebrough-Ponds, which had begun by processing petroleum jelly. Three offspring— Exxon, Mobil, and Chevron— would belong to the Seven Sisters group that would dominate the world oil industry in the twentieth century; a fourth sister, British Petroleum, later took over Standard Oil of Ohio, then known as Sohio. It was certainly not their intention, but the trustbusters helped to preserve Rockefeller's legacy for posterity and unquestionably made him the world's richest man.

His religious upbringing didn't encourage much in the way of vice…

> Since evangelicals abstained from dancing, cards, and theater, Rockefeller restricted his private life to church socials and picnics, where he could play blindman's buff and engage in other innocent pastimes. As a model Baptist, he was sought after by the young ladies. "The girls all liked John immensely," said one congregant. "Some of them came dangerously near to being in love with him. He was not especially attractive in his person and his clothes were strenuously plain and well worn. He was thought much of by these spiritual minded young women because of his goodness, his religious fervor, his earnestness and willingness in the church, and his apparent sincerity and honesty of purpose."

Women back then were made of a different stock, using the church to guide their lives and family. They had values that were primarily concerned with being a good wife and mother instead of careerism and attention seeking. His wife, Cettie, was unquestionably faithful to him for their entire marriage. Not until she was dead did he let loose a little…

> Rockefeller increasingly used the afternoon drives as opportunities for hanky-panky. Wearing thick black or amber goggles to screen out the sun, he sometimes borrowed a veil from one of the lady passengers and laced it dramatically across his face and wound it around his ears. He sat tightly wedged in the backseat between two buxom women, usually neighbors or visitors, with their laps covered by a blanket, and he became notorious for his hot schoolboy hands roving under the blanket. The man who had been a model of self-mastery now seemed, on occasion, an itchy-fingered old satyr. Tom Pyle, the head gardener and gamekeeper at Pocantico, steered the second car in the daily motorcade and was often astonished at his employer's outrageous behavior. When Rockefeller's car stopped one afternoon at a traffic light, a young woman riding in the backseat with him suddenly burst forth and scrambled back to Pyle's car. "That old rooster!" she said. "He ought to be handcuffed." Pyle noted that some local matrons enjoyed the hot seat and frequently returned for more. "I > never decided whether different women received different treatment or whether some found it acceptable to be pinched by a ninety-year-old multimillionaire.”

His thoughts on business…

> “Often the best way to develop workers— when you are sure they have character and think they have ability— is to take them to a deep place, throw them in and make them sink or swim”
> As Rockefeller instructed a recruit, “Has anyone given you the law of these offices? No? It is this: nobody does anything if he can get anybody else to do it.… As soon as you can, get some one whom you can rely on, train him in the work, sit down, cock up your heels, and think out some way for the Standard Oil to make some money.”
> “And I rejoice also that we are charitable and sweet-spirited to these jealous, small men who made it the business of their lives to try to pull us down because their vision did not extend beyond the ends of their noses.”
> As the organization grew, he continued to operate by consensus, taking no major initiative opposed by board members. Because all ideas had to meet the supreme test of unanimous approval among strong-minded men, Standard Oil made few major missteps. As Rockefeller said, “We made sure that we were right and had planned for every contingency before we went ahead.”

> The committees encouraged rivalry among local units by circulating performance figures and encouraging them to compete for records and prizes. The point is vitally important, for monopolies, spared the rod of competition, can easily lapse into sluggish giants.

A recurring theme in the book is that men who made decisions out of anger or irritation often suffered large downfalls (one man sold out to a young Rockefeller in anger for $1 million when his share would have ended up being worth $900 million). John always remained his cool, never once suffering a monumental business blunder. He was also a secretive man who did not like displaying his wealth, going out of his way not to show off (compare that to the behavior of Jay Z, whose record company Roc-a-fella is named after John).

> Schooled in secrecy, he trained his face to be a stony mask so that when underlings brought him telegrams, they couldn’t tell from his expression whether the news was favorable or not. Rockefeller equated silence with strength: Weak men had loose tongues and blabbed to reporters, while prudent businessmen kept their own counsel. Two of his most cherished maxims were “Success comes > from keeping the ears open and the mouth closed" and "A man of words and not of deeds is like a garden full of weeds."

> Never dazzled by New York, Rockefeller was insulated from the beau monde that threw costly dinners and costume balls and frequented the theater, opera, and clubs. He had no interest in debauchery, and it is hard to picture him milling about with portly men smoking cigars or women wearing expensive furs and jewels. The newspapers noted his total boycott of social functions. As one periodical said, "He never entertains notables, his home is never given to entertainment, and he follows the policy of self-effacement at all times and in all places." Although he joined the Union League Club, Rockefeller did not feel comfortable with the splendor of the Astors and Vanderbilts.
> "Great wealth is a great burden, a great responsibility. It invariably proves to be one of two things— either a great blessing or a great curse."
> He liked to say that "a man's wealth must be determined by the relation of his desires and expenditures to his income. If he feels rich on ten dollars, and has everything else he desires, he really is rich."

Nonetheless, wealth did bring him isolation and loneliness…

> Rockefeller had few, if any, real friends and was isolated by his wealth. Visiting Rockefeller at a southern hotel around 1910, Gates found him rather lonely and forlorn and suggested he contact some cultivated local men. "Well, Mr. Gates," said Rockefeller, "if you suppose I have not thought about the matter you are mistaken. I have made some experiments. And nearly always the result is the same— along about the ninth hole out comes some proposition, charitable or financial!"
> "I have lent and given people money, and then seen them cross the street so that they would not have to speak to me."

This scenario would be repeated for his son, who was essentially a slave to the massive fortune that his father gave him.

In his later years, John focused on philanthropy. His donations eliminated hookworm in the South, spurned development of high school education, upgraded teaching standards of medical universities, and introduced scientific research at the advanced level of what was happening in Europe.

> "Instead of giving alms to beggars, if anything can be done to remove the causes which lead to the existence of beggars, then something deeper and broader and > more worthwhile will have been accomplished.”

Is John D. Rockefeller a man who should be celebrated or reviled? He was viciously anti-competitive, putting many men out of business, though he did have a price stabilizing effect on oil which was beneficial for consumers. At the same time, his associates bribed public officials to eliminate competition and prevent anti-trust legislation. Perhaps to atone for these sins, he gave away most of his wealth by the time he died.

I see him as a brilliant but morally gray man. While I don’t agree with much of his actions, I don’t see him worse than the business elite we’re forced to endure today, especially in the American finance sector. It’s no surprise that stripping away finance regulation has led to many of the abuses we saw in John’s time but on a more technologically advanced level.

Even though the timeline was all over the place, this was an excellent book that painted a clear picture of the man and what made him a business success, while offering enough personal details that you felt like you knew him. Highly recommended.

Hidden Ovulation Is A Girl’s Best Friend

April 26, 2014 | by Giovanni Dannato | Link | Original Link

Mewling, sticking their butts in the air, rubbing on things. These are the typical signs of an animal in heat. Women are no different except they run a lucrative biological con game by pretending they’re always in heat.

Going into season every month makes human females unusual among animals, but they are only really fertile a few days each cycle. The other 90% of the time men are getting played. With most animals, it’s blatantly obvious when the female is ready to ovulate and she never lies. With humans, it’s nearly the opposite.

1. High Heels – Lordosis

Cats, dogs, horses, rats, it doesn’t matter. When the female is ready to mate. Her back arches and her butt and genitals are put on prominent display for passing males. The formal name for this is the lordosis reflex. Human females do it too.

A few days of the month, her ass protrudes more than usual and the small of her back tightens inward, pushing out her boobs for fullest display. This is the posture that gives her that sexy walk that makes men slaver for her. The time is right and the man that has her may well spread his genes.

So imagine the attention she gets if she can fake it—every single day. Whether foot-binding in China, corsets in Victorian times, or high heels today, this has been one of the most popular forms of counterfeiting through the ages.

2. Perfume – Pheromones

Around that right time of month, she exudes a subtle feminine scent bound to attract suitors from miles around. So naturally, she finds a way to simulate it every day so she can extract whatever she wants to the max by using perfume, which radiates the olfactory promise of sex. Perfumes, of course, have been part of her arsenal since at least the beginning of history.

Ancient Egyptian Perfume Bottle

3. Makeup – Facial Flushing, Bedroom Eyes

As ovulation grows near, her face grows flushed, and her eyes and eyelids grow sultry, shadowy and dark. Even her eyelashes seem to somehow darken and swell.

As with the other signs, humans are hardly the only example:

With makeup she can make it look like she's always about to drop an egg and even exaggerate an effect that would normally be subtle. The harder she's trying to get things from men. The more makeup she uses.

Ancient Sumerian Makeup Kit

4. Lipstick – Flushed, Swollen Lips

Right before that egg drops her lips flush valentine card crimson, plump up, and get that smooth, juicy, kissable look.
Thankfully, it's easy for her to fake it with enough lipstick and lip gloss.

Women come programmed to play con games on men to manipulate them at their expense for the good of the species. She doesn't have to be taught to use these tactics (at the minimum, she's naturally receptive to being taught them). Otherwise, it's hard to explain why these tactics would be so consistent across time and place.

The very existence of hidden ovulation tells us we're biologically set up to be used. It's not a bug but a feature, which makes men more similar to seahorse males that share in the costs of reproduction by actually carrying the babies himself—or male praying mantises that lose their lives to become baby food. Natural selection cares absolutely nothing for our individual interests or pleasure. Pleasure or pain is just a bait and whip to get us to perform our functions until we've outlived our usefulness to the species.

However, men are natural problem solvers. As individuals, many men don't content themselves to let nature play out on autopilot. We try to manipulate fate in our favor and hack the system. Should we have been able to spread all over the planet and hunt woolly mammoths to extinction? Human intelligence allowed the species to move beyond its obvious preset plan.

We can become conscious of the underlying biological truths of our species and use this knowledge to maximize our own interests instead of living by instinct alone. If the most successful reproductive strategies grow more complex, with more work performed on the conscious level, the effect is necessarily eugenic. Becoming more aware and hacking the reproductive system is a service to the human species just as was learning to start fires or throw spears.

A good beginning is for men to understand how they are being manipulated. The first step in avoiding the trap is knowing of its existence.

How To Build Social Influence Like A Cult Leader

Chizuo Matsumoto was born in 1955 to a large, poor family in Japan. He was born with glaucoma and subsequently lost all sight in his left eye, and retained only partial vision in his right eye. This caused him to attend a school for the blind, and pursue a career in acupuncture – a traditional Japanese occupation for the blind.

His acupuncture education led him to studying Chinese fortune telling and meditation, and this eventually instilled a belief in him that he possessed supernatural powers. In 1984, Matsumoto changed his name to Shoko Asahara and started Aum Shinrikyo, a group that began as a simple meditation and yoga class in his one bedroom apartment.

Shoko quickly became more radical. In 1992, he declared himself to be "Christ" and preached a belief system that combined aspects of Christianity and yoga with the writings of Nostradamus. He promised his rapidly growing group of followers that he would take upon himself the sins of the world, and, in turn, absolve them of their sins and transfer to them a set of supernatural powers.

Over the next few years, the group continued to attract more members, and, at the same time, controversy and attention from the Japanese public. Leading up to 1995, Shoko and Aum Shinrikyo were involved in various murders of members who tried to leave, assassination attempts of heads of other religious sects, kidnappings, and weapons manufacturing.

In 1995, the group, now numbering as many as 9,000 followers in Japan and 40,000 worldwide, reached its boiling point. On March 20, Shoko ordered a number of the group's members to release sarin, a deadly nerve gas agent, onto five lines of the Tokyo subway. 13 people died, 50 were injured, and nearly 1000 temporarily went blind. He sits on death row in a Japanese prison cell to this day.

You must speak in terms of their values and interests

Despite creating a violent cult, and using it for evil intentions, Shoko demonstrates a powerful concept that nearly all persuasive leaders throughout history took advantage of: speaking to other people in terms of their own interests.

The fact is that humans are inherently selfish. We care about our own lives and our own success. And this isn't a bad thing – we all need to take good care of our bodies and minds in order to prosper. But you must avoid the trap of becoming too self-centered and subsequently losing the ability to focus on other people.

Shoko gained his following by preaching something that was valuable to prospective members – forgiveness of sins and the promise of supernatural spiritual powers. Bear in mind, his prospective members were religious minded people with an inclination to believe controversial spiritual prophecies. He took advantage of this and gave them what they wanted – forgiveness and power.

When you deal with people, you must do the same. You must realize what it is that they want, and you must give it to them.

No, I don't mean that you should physically give them material gifts like money or cars. I also don't mean that you should offer them false promises to exploit them, like Shoko did. I used him as an example merely to demonstrate the power of this simple technique.

What I do mean is that you must be able to relate to the interests of whoever you're talking to. You must be able to identify and speak to what it is that motivates them. Doing this correctly will grant you instant influence and respect in their lives. It will allow you to open them up and operate on a far higher level than the man who simply drones on talking about his own problems and desires, both annoying and tiring his conversational partner. It will set you apart.

After you've built a strong mental and psychological foundation by believing that you'll succeed, and adopting the body language of a dominant individual, you must turn your attention outwards. Focusing your conversation on the other person is the final piece of the puzzle to creating an undeniable presence.

My Experience

I haven't started my own personal cult, but I have consciously used this principle many times. The freshest example in my mind is the last time I asked for a raise.

The single biggest mistake most guys make when asking for a raise is talking in terms of their own interests and accomplishment. On second thought, the biggest mistake guys make is not having the balls to ask for a raise in the first place. But when they do, they tend to fail miserably.

Put yourself in the shoes of an employer. If one of your workers comes to you and asks for more money, you sure as hell expect him to convince you that he's worth it. The last thing you want to hear is about how he's been working more hours or just had his biggest month in sales. Yes, these things please you, but in less he considering leaving immediately, it won't give you much reason to throw more of your money his way.

You must take the opposite approach and talk to your employer in terms of his interests. In my recent case, this meant telling him that if he increased my hourly rate by 33% I would be able to allocate more hours to his firm (as opposed to my other gigs). I continued to explain that this would translate to the ability for me to work on a large new project the company was just taking on, and I knew they were short-handed. This would allow them to complete the project far sooner, and in a far more efficient manner.

He immediately saw the immense value I would bring to the table by granting me a raise, and promptly gave it to me – all because I spoke to him in terms of his interests, not my own.

Take Action

By focusing your conversations on other people and their interests, you're able to effectively use your mental confidence and strong physical presence to build influence, respect, and rapport in others. In short, it's the third wheel of the presence triangle that, when used together, will allow you assume the identity of socially dominant man.

To implement this principle into your life, simply start to approach all of your conversations with the purpose of speaking to your partner's interests. If you're asking for a raise, this means talking about what you can do for the company.

If you're trying to build rapport with a stranger, this is finding out what they like to do, and then asking them more about it. For example, anyone who talks to me about fitness or entrepreneurship immediately engrosses me into the conversation and quickly establishes themselves as a friend.

The applications for this concept are endless. If you're trying to build attraction with a girl you just met, you should push to learn facts about her, which you can in turn use to tease her. Most men make the deadly mistake of trying to talk themselves up or talk about things that they might have in common with the girl. Stop. She doesn't care about you yet. She cares about herself – use this to your advantage, make her feel comfortable in your presence, and then tease her and touch her to build attraction and make her feel dominated by your presence. Droning on about your cool job will only serve to bore her.

Where Beta Males Are Polished To Perfection

Part of being plugged into the matrix is buying into the ludicrous myth that working in an office making $40,000/year with benefits and a 401K with stock options is the path to financial solvency and subsequently a happy life. To be fair, there are parts of this have some measure of truth but one of the biggest reasons we relentlessly pursue careers in a fancy building is to impress the ladies.

There's little doubt that there is a certain sophistication and status that comes with wearing a shirt and tie to work Monday through Friday for 40 hours a week. Truth is women do look favorably on men who are well-dressed on a regular basis. Most women drool over men in uniform but most of that sex appeal is the stability that uniform represents. A man in a suit is in his uniform and boy is it ever the pussy magnet. Proof of this can be seen on weekday mornings in any coffee shop across the West. Baristas in every corner the Anglo sphere shamelessly flirt with men in suits every morning because the Beta Bux side of her hypergamy is directly engaged.

However, there is a terrible price to be paid for selling your soul to the office devil: your balls. Outside of a few law firms and a hand full specialty or auxiliary office environments, the typical Western office job is a soul sucking, testosterone draining cesspool masquerading as the best way to earn a living. Now that females make up most of the work force, feminist laden agendas and rules have made the work place a source of anxiety for men. The mentally draining monotony of their work is pressure enough without the long arm of girl power friendly regulations to keep them in line. Gone are the days of male dominated offices where the presence of a female was only needed to answer the phone, make the coffee, look pretty for visiting clients, and fuck the boss if his day was particularly stressful.

A few hours in an average cubicle farm is enough to depress even the most crimson of red pill alphas. The men look defeated and are uncomfortably twitchy, the women are overweight and overconfident, and the smell of the bad coffee serving as the backdrop is the icing on the cake. Yet despite all of the evident deterrents, men fall all over themselves trying to land one of these precious positions. Unbeknownst to them they're merely enrolling in the finishing school known as The University of Beta for their Masters Degree in Pussification.

Sanding

When Western men graduate from college they are an unfinished product—an undistinguishable wooden figure pre-treated by feminine conditioning and ready for refinement. They enter the woodman's shop with dreams of promotions, power lunches, and the keys to pussy paradise. They know that with hard work, dedication, and playing by the rules they'll be up to their eye balls in beautiful young women fighting each other for their hand in marriage.

The first step in the beta refinement process begins by making them as physically unattractive as possible. Making them sit for 8 hours a day is just the beginning of their new found sedentary life style—a far cry from college life. Intramural softball and ultimate frisbee made it relatively easy to stay in shape on campus but the most exercise they'll ever get in an office is the occasional bathroom break and a few trips to the vending machine for an energy drink loaded with sugar which will surely add to their expanding waist lines.

As if sitting on their asses all day isn't bad enough, most hum drum offices employ dress codes that discourage males from exhibiting any kind of individuality. While women can wear pretty much whatever they want, men are often restricted to wearing khakis or slacks and prohibited from wearing shirts in colors that are out of the ordinary or "loud"—code for "anything other than white or taupe."

Now before women reading this and start yammering about the faux dress code for women in the new hire packet, we all know it's almost never enforced. You and your fellow cubicle cows wouldn't make a daily habit of vindictively whispering about Ashley's revealing outfits if the human resources heffer stopped taking cigarette breaks every 15 minutes and actually did her job.

Along with allowing women to check their Facebook statuses and talk on their phones at their desks (or anything else not pertaining to being a productive employee), this further drills the idea into the mind of men that women can do whatever they want, whenever they want, without repercussions or accountability simply because they're born with vaginas.

So now that the rough edges of our fledgling betas have been carefully sanded and smoothed out, it's time for the next step.

Staining

The betapalooza known as the common American office is rife with badly dressed men with high pitched voices and bad ties. There's also no shortage of overweight, unattractive women prancing around as if they're at the top of the sexual food chain. Having worked in these hell holes myself, I'd say that 95% to 99% of the average female office worker falls between a 0 and a 6/10. Sure there's the occasional 7 and the even rarer 8 but they're few and far between and wouldn't be caught dead socializing with a beta other than to get ahead or manipulate some sort of favor or favoritism.

Unfortunately this makes the 5s and 6s the crown jewels of the office work force. The newly sanded beta is exposed to these subpar, mediocre fatties hour after hour, day after day, year after year. After a while they actually believe that these portly princesses are the cream of the crop. Eventually their mindset is stained with the false reality that fleshy office broads are as good as it gets. Every so often they'll attempt to throw terrible game at Ashley but they'll fall on their faces because they're unable to give her the tingles like the unemployed guitar player she's banging.

This is a harsh reality for men after being fed the Disney dream their entire adolescent lives. A man's natural ability to adapt to his circumstances (however bad they may be) works against him in this case because his mind tells him that he must eat shit, pretend it's caviar by calling it and treating it as such, and like it. The result is an entire generation of males who have accepted the fact that their world is only inhabited by two kinds of women: the desirable ones impossible to win over with the faulty tools they've been given and the beefy ones who require expensive dinners and gifts before giving them the privilege of seeing their unsightly naked bodies. This is the very point where feminists have men right where they want them.

Curing

Into the kiln the beta goes to permanently harden the principles instilled in him. The meeting room is the perfect place for this procedure and an office job provides plenty of opportunities. The endless meetings are enough to drive a man insane. There are meetings, meetings about meetings, and more meetings after that. That familiar sigh that makes its way from cubicle to cubicle when that delightful reminder pops up on his screen is the sound of men knowing that they are going to be, yet again, subjected to the hot box known as the meeting room.

The proverbial heat is turned on the moment they walk in and take their seats. Any man who walks in and happens to be in relatively good shape in is subjected to just a little more sanding as meetings are often catered with foods like doughnuts, soda, chips, and a number of other salty, sugary goodies specifically designed to smooth out any remnants of coarse surfaces. Employees are expected to sit, take notes, and not speak unless spoken to or given permission when their superiors see their hand raised like a kindergartener.

Worse yet is that men can't even look at women in the eye (or in their general direction) unless they are addressing them. Even then they might be labeled creepy if they hold eye contact for a fraction of a second too long. Meetings are the ideal environment to solidify the notion that men are the buffet and women are the diners. Step out of place or do anything to attempt to make yourself different or attractive during a meeting (or anytime between 8 and 5 for that matter) and there will be consequences "up to and including termination". This fear tamps down a man's testosterone driven intentions and over the course of time, passive beta behavior becomes who they are. The kiln has done its job.

Buffing

The final process in manufacturing a beta male is the all powerful Human Resources department. Provocative statements and covert flirting have given way to political correctness and double standard laden, loosely defined sexual harassment claims. One of the many traits that makes a man a man is his ability to clearly communicate what he thinks in a way that leaves little doubt as to what his intentions or ideas are. Another is his desire and ability to take what he wants when he sees it. Neither of these is allowed in a Western office. Want to spit red pill truth to your office buddies about the differences between men and women? Prepare for a summons from the heffer's office if you're within earshot of hefty Heather. Want to ask that hottie in accounting what her plans are this evening? Be ready for an email from HR.

The bottom line is that human resources only seems to exist to make men afraid of being men. Even the male members of management are at the mercy of HR. If they don't adhere to the female friendly bylaws or act as though the world is coming to an end when a woman is "offended" they too are out the door. The fact that most human resources departments are made up of women further cultivates the fear that men have of women in the work place which inevitably spills over into their lives outside of normal business hours. Think of someone you know or have met who's terrible at talking to women. Chances are he's working at Pick-A-Name Corporation in Suite 300 of the McTower Building downtown.

Our fresh batch of betas are now a finished product. They've been buffed to a shine and ready to be at the beck and call of vapid fatties everywhere.

Is there a cure?

Learning a new language and moving abroad or starting an internet business to become location independent are a couple of viable solutions that have been utilized by many a former beta. But short of learning like Neo or your web company going public overnight, this is going to take time. So what's a man to do in the meantime?

One of the quickest and most effective ways to get out of and reverse the damage of the cubicle is to work a blue collar job. Drive a forklift, work construction, be a mechanic or any of the numerous trades that are not only free of feminist inspired regulations, but serve as the last frontier where a man can truly be himself. You'll find it liberating to be able to talk about the apple shaped ass of that Hooters waitress or about how your buddy got divorce raped by his land whale of an ex wife. No conversation is off limits and over time you'll begin to notice your increasing wittiness and decisiveness in your daily conversations with men and women. You'll begin to sound more like a man.

Your sex life will also improve as a result of your new physically demanding job. The woman in your life will be sexually reenergized as your physique transforms from the pear shaped softy you were into the rugged mountain man she has rape fantasies about. She'll be more than willing give you consistent welcome home blow jobs when she sees you kick off your dirty work boots as opposed to your overpriced dress shoes.

There are many, many more advantages of getting off your ass and actually working for a living and I encourage readers to add them. You may not make as much money starting out but the benefits are something you cannot put a price on. Not the least of which is finally dropping out Beta College and getting your balls back.

Why You Must Not Place Women On A Pedestal

April 28, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

I've written extensive on the necessity of game in the past. Recently, I came across an old comment on Dalrock's blog that shed further light on the pitfalls of pedestalization and the consequences men face when they fail to embrace the necessity of game and the red pill.

Meet Michael:

> Hello. Is there an introduction board for this website? My name is Michael. I've been reading this website for 3 days. I'm shocked to see everything I've experiencing written in such a perfectly stated way. Never before have I seen a blog/media outlet so perfectly written. The writer is surely a genius. I'm amazed and relived to see so many responses. It means I'm not alone.
> I'm 32 years old and have never been married. Unfortunately (or fortunately I'm not sure which anymore at this point) I have no kids. I am single and alone and not dating anyone. I live in Los Angeles. My income was $120,000.00 (net earnings after creative deductions and business taxes) in 2011. Income is projected to be $170,000.00 (net earnings after business taxes) in 2012. I'm exactly the kinds of "independent man" women claim they want. I drive a luxury car with an amazing apartment in Los Angeles directly on the beach. It's quite a panty moistener and costs me $6,000.00 per month. I work from home because an office would cost at least another $2,000.00 month. I keep in great shape. Gym 3-4 a week + running + organic diet (I spend $700-$900.00 a month on organic foods and supplements) I was raised in a Christian "7th Heaven" (old TV show) type household. We always went to church. Strong hard working father figure was always present for me and my siblings. I went to private school, university, law school, and then started my own practice at 28 years old.

My parents met and married in college. They have been married for 39 years. And it hurts me to the core to be 32 and unmarried. Alone. Without a loving wife. I feel pain from it every single day. It's like a sharp invisible dagger constantly stabbing at me. But perhaps I'm part of the problem listed in the graphs above. Let me explain why:

I went to the same college my parents met and married at. I was hoping to meet marry and settle down. Instead I was met with hundreds young college aged women who were NOT interested in marriage. They were interested in: 1) Partying 2) Having sex. College was 24/7 fuck fest. At first I was able to begrudgingly "socialize" in this element. What do I mean by "this element" within this context? College: Extreme social promiscuity, cheating, drama, drugs, and parties. I was an observer but NEVER a direct participant because my heart would not let me. This eventually caused me to stick out as a third wheel observer on campus. Someone who was always "not mixing" or "participating". As a result I never enjoyed the benefits. I rarely dated. Instead I was sneered at. Cute girls flicked their fingers at me. I was used by women as a person to tell their problems to. I was passed over. I was seen as "weak "lame" and "boring". I was ignored in the hallways, library, classes, by these women. And it didn't help I was cash strapped broke working a minimum wage job and eating Raman noodles..

The vast majority of these young hot girls vigorously pursued college life sex like you would not believe. They had sex with a large variety of guys. What I personally call "lily padding". These girls did anything and anyone in the name of "fun" (fun=parties, fun= sex with new people, fun= drugs, fun= raves, fun = frat party etc.

It hurt me to watch these girls go out of their way to pursue and spread their legs for complete losers. COMPLETE LOSERS. I'm talking: Hi I work in a carnival part time, I'm covered in tattoos, I have no job, I failed my minimum wage drug test and I'm in a band. These guys were losers. Some did not even go to the college! They would hop a bus stay with friends and get laid THAT NIGHT.

Many nights I could not sleep because of the girls getting fucked hard… 1,2,3,4 dorms down. The dorms were old military barracks from the 1940's with vents through the ceilings. It was very loud. All the time. I remember how much it hurt to be rejected by one girl in particular I had my open hopeless romantic heart set on… We had a lot in common. I pursued her like a complete gentlemen – and was eventually turned down. That same weekend after getting turned down I got to hear her getting fucked hard and loud in the room next door. The guy who lived there was a super scraggly unattractive heavy drug user covered in tattoos > majoring in “music studies”. This girl was young hot thin beautiful in her physical prime. I never said anything. But I felt so hurt she turned me down for casual sex with a guy like that.

> This guy was very open about his exploits with her and told me not to worry because practically every guy he knew fucked her. As the years passed the same thing happened again and again, and again and again, in various ways with all kinds of unrelated girls. What I mean is: I was looking for a LTR leading to marriage. I would meet trade numbers talk and “feel” a girl was a good person. Then she would do other guys. Or I would find out things like this. When this kind of thing happens to me over and over all through my life….it hurts me and makes me doubt senses. What is wrong with me that my heart is telling me she is a good person when she is clearly not?
> As time went on I was labeled “husband material” by the girls on my campus. This phrase continued to plague me into my late 20′s. This label resulted in ZERO DATES all through college. I wasn’t “down with it”. I wasn’t “participating” etc (sex, drugs, parties, etc.) My heart wasn’t into it. So I wasn’t entitled to any of the benefits (having sex with young attractive girls in their prime etc.). However party guys, flash in a pan athletes, loser guys in bands, wanna be DJ’s and self-professed “club promoters” – were ALWAYS getting these girls at their youngest hottest physical prime. Basically the more of a loser the guy was… the more these women would have sex with them. Hot sorority girls flocked to Football players like a butterfly’s on a beast. It didn’t even matter if the guy was black. College athletes did not even TRY to get laid.
> One night I had enough. I confronted a room of 8-10 gorgeous white girls. These girls were 18-24 years old. I asked them if they planned to get married. All seemed to say more or less – YES. I asked what their future husband would think about their behavior. I was immediately met with hostility. I was told the future husband would “never know” and “it’s none of his business”. The girls said they knew exactly what they were doing and were planning to “have their fun” (fun= partying, fun=sex, fun=going on spring break etc.) and would “settle down later”. I asked: when are you planning to settle down? They said: “It depends” and “probably around 27, 28” or “maybe sooner it depends”. I really put the girls on the spot. During our exchange they saw I was upset. They told me I should be happy because “nice guys finish first in the end”. I told them you cannot have your cake and eat it to. Then I was told by Kaylene (a young thin super sexy blonde with curves in all the right places (who BTW refused to date me even though we were friends and according to her roommate had sex with almost 30 guys in one semester) she told me “Michael let me tell you something: not only am I going to have my cake eat it and eat it too. I’m going to have it with ice cream and sprinkles”. All of the girls laughed and smiled in agreement.

The person described in these anecdotes is not atypical. Young Michael was a standard “nice guy”. He was a religious, traditional blue pill dude who has been raised to internalize naive, unrealistic views of female sexuality. These views encouraged him to place women on a massive pedestal and he was hurt very badly when he found out that they don’t belong and, more importantly, have absolutely no desire to be put there.

The pedestalization is key here, and I know because I have wrestled with the same issue for the majority of my life. Michael’s experiences are made especially painful by his excessive and premature emotional investment in these women. It is this investment that makes the mere thought of their interacting with other men painful for Michael. To him, these young girls were “princesses”, and he their prince. Each was considered a potential wife and mother to his children.

For the other dudes on campus who may have some understanding of red pill truths and thus knew not to make this excessive and premature emotional investment, interaction with these girls had far less potential for emotional trauma on their part and a much stronger potential for the formation of a sexual relationship that was capable of fully satiating their needs. There are no princesses or princes in their minds and no wives or mothers, just ordinary young girls and young guys looking to meet and have fun. Enjoyable, sexually gratifying relationships are much easier to maintain under these substantially more realistic pretenses.

When you forego the red pill and approach things from Michael's blue-pill provider perspective, however, you put yourself in a tough position. It is one thing to watch any old girl getting treated like a sex toy. It is another thing entirely to watch (or listen to, or even hear about) your "princess" (girl you pedestalized, emotionally invested in, etc) getting treated that way. Catching feelings early and often in this manner results in a lot of pain 99% of the time because the girls usually don't wish to live up to the high standard you set for them by placing them on a pedestal, and the amount of early emotional investment you put in usually means that anything less than that behavior results in terrible discomfort and insecurity.

> "That same weekend after getting turned down I got to hear her getting fucked hard and loud in the room next door. The guy who lived there was a super scraggly unattractive heavy drug user covered in tattoos majoring in "music studies". This girl was young hot thin beautiful in her physical prime. I never said anything. But I felt so hurt she turned me down for casual sex with a guy like that."

The end result is a situation in which the girl has a vastly disproportionate and entirely unwarranted degree of control over an individual guy's mental state, a fact that only further lowers his sexual appeal to her because women have a hard time respecting men they can control like that. They want a man, not a puppy dog.

Even the mere hint of her flaking or showing interest in other men in the manner most young, liberated western girls typically do can send this guy spiraling into deep depression. Anything more serious (i.e. the sounds of her getting pounded out by another guy, or even the rumor that she had been or is being pounded out by another guy) could totally destroy him.

When a man puts a woman on a pedestal and makes too large of an emotional investment in her too early, he’s asking for misery. Such an action is akin to placing a pistol in the hands of a given female, putting her finger on the trigger, and having her point it directly at your chest at a short distance. You can count on her to pull the trigger, intentionally or otherwise, because she is not going to live up to the responsibility you have given her by essentially handing her total control over your mental state. She doesn’t want that responsibility and, even if she did (no young woman really does), one could not fairly expect her to meet it. Handing total control over your emotional state to a woman is about as blue-pill as it gets, but that is where excessive pedestalization will lead you.

Now, what exactly were the girls' opinions as to where they stood with men? How did they prefer to be seen? What did they want? Well, that's clear if you look at their actions. They responded to the men who didn't put them on a pedestal. In this I am actually reminded of a popular song from my childhood by Train entitled "Meet Virginia".

In the chorus, it is said:

> Well she wants to be the queen
> Then she thinks about her scene
> Pulls her hair back as she screams
> "I don't really wanna be the queen"

Some of these girls will talk about how they want a "nice guy" (they said as much to Michael). To the naive who do not understand the value of female action over female words, it may appear that they want to "be the queen" — they just want a good dude to treat them like a princess. This leads to blue-pill provider men like Michael (who are the most effusive in their praise of these women) proclaiming their status as "nice guys" and expecting to easily lure attractive women as a result of this.

When push comes to shove, however, these girls have no desire to stand on the pedestal men like this set up for them, and will usually run when presented with it. They see an unsolicited invitation to be his special queen or princess and they reject it. Most don't want to be treated like mere sperm receptacles either, but when given the stark choice between Prince Michael Charming "nice guy" here and the attractive but douchey player down the street who isn't going to worship the ground they walk on just because they happen to be decent looking females, they will usually choose the latter. This is a stark choice, but it is one that young women all too often face in the modern world of dating.

Why do they make that choice? They're young, well provisioned, and have no need to give a fuck about the benefits a dull beta like Michael could offer them, at least not at that point in their lives. They just want guys who can turn them on and show them a good time, and the dull beta can generally do neither.

Now, we must speak to the limiting beliefs Michael holds that further mark his failure to ingest the red pill and highlight his need (as well as the need of other men like him) to do so. Michael spends an inordinate amount of time thinking about the interactions that other men have with the women he has pedestalized. His pedestalization not only makes it difficult to deal with the sexual choices made by his "princesses", but also with the fact that men he perceives to be "less than" him are gaining more sexual access than he is. This group of males would, apparently, include musicians and athletes, particularly black ones:

> Hot sorority girls flocked to Football players like a butterfly's on a beast. It didn't even matter if the guy was black.

It is implied here that the fact that their race didn't matter somehow makes the situation he describes more dire, as though these women would and should, in an ideal world, weigh the race of the men they pursue much more heavily. That these women would be less inclined to restrict sexual access to an attractive black male simply because he is black seems odd to him.

It is here that Michael veers into the unfortunate (but, sadly, not entirely unexpected) morass of racial insecurity that makes it even more difficult for me to sympathize with him. Michael's insecurity, excessive pedestalization and entitlement leads him to throw "other" men (in this case, people of color, athletes and musicians) under the bus in order to assuage his own sexual insecurities. Time that could be spent correcting his shortcomings, conquering his insecurities and becoming the kind of man these women may genuinely find more attractive (read: the kind of man they can't easily manipulate) is instead spent whining about what "other men" are doing, and why he thinks they shouldn’t be doing it.

This is not the mentality of any sexually successful male in our modern society, and it provides a perfect example of precisely what a red-pill male should not be thinking or doing. By setting a host of racial, occupational and socio-economic barriers for who he thinks attractive women should and should not associate with and whining about their failure to adhere to said boundaries, Michael seeks to avoid necessary self-improvement. He feels women should be attracted to him, maintaining a sense of entitlement to their attention. When he doesn’t receive it, he doesn’t ask what it is he isn’t bringing to the table or seek to make himself a more appealing target. He, like far too many “nice guys” just whines about the men who are appealing without actually doing anything. He sees and hears women he finds attractive associating with men other than him and just stews in self-pity instead of doing anything about it. The hard process of self-improvement takes a back seat to comfortable pastime of whining, groaning and moaning about why everyone else has it wrong.

Michael wants to dictate who it is that these young females find attractive. Women, meanwhile, have made it abundantly clear that they have no desire to adhere to any guidance or restriction put forward by Michael or men like him. They want to fuck who they want, when they want, and how they want. Michael cannot change this, no matter how much he complains.

If you are Michael and you do not like who these females are associating with and would prefer that they instead view you as a viable alternative, you have one option: better yourself and become the kind of man they will find genuinely attractive. Find out what it is that these women like about the men you think they shouldn't be seeing, and beat them at their own game. Do not merely talk about how you are the superior option: get out there and prove that you are the better option.

Merely whining about the kind of men they DO find attractive will accomplish nothing, as these females do not care about your feelings and will not allow them to govern or limit their sexual freedom. The days of individual men exerting near totalitarian control over female behavior are gone, and they are not coming back. The genie will not go back into the bottle and the old “traditional” ways our grandparents lived by in 1952 will not become a norm again. These women have their freedom, and this is the choice they have made (and will continue to make): they want men who are genuinely attractive and know how to turn them on. They do not want sensitive puppies like Michael whose emotions they can easily manipulate and destroy. Such men repulse women, and no attractive young girl will settle for such a specimen if she doesn’t have to (and now, more so than ever before, such women do not have to).

With the rise of the manosphere and sites like ROK that are dedicated to informing men of red pill truths and assisting in the digestion of those ideas, the excuses for the existence of men with Michael’s attitude are dwindling. Men of the modern world must either take the red pill and adapt to new sexual realities via self-improvement or accept that they will be left behind.

A Revolt Against The Excesses Of Revolt

I have recently been reading the autobiography of one of my favorite historians, Will Durant. The book is entitled Dual Autobiography, as it outlines the life not just of Will Durant, but also the life of his wife Ariel. Mrs. Durant assisted her husband so considerably in the later stages of his monumental multi-volume opus The Story of Civilization that she was given the credit of co-authorship of the final volumes. Their life struggles and trials make for fascinating reading; I had always admired them for their literary qualities, and was happy to discover that I could admire them for their personal qualities as well.

One passage caught my eye and arrested my attention. Mrs. Durant describes a lecture she delivered in 1927 to a group of "modern women" (what would now be called feminists). The topic of the lecture was the ultimate purpose of female "emancipation." Daring to take an unpopular line with her ardent assemblage of auditors, she urged women not to cast off their traditional roles too hastily. Her words are so prescient, and so uncannily accurate, that I must quote them here at length:

> I accepted the emancipation of woman as a natural result of the continuing Industrial Revolution, replacing domestic drudgery with gadgets and cans…But if emancipation meant a revolt against marriage, and an exaltation of career above motherhood, it would bring a regrettable masculinity in women and a corresponding effeminacy in men. What will be the gain when women wear pants and men have soprano voices?…What shall we say of the many abnormalities that have increased in…our age of transition? The progress of inversion, perversion,…a third sex?…Have we the right to say anything if men wistfully long for a home while women crowd tearooms, cafes, and cabarets?…So I pleaded for moderation, for "a revolt against the excess of revolt."

Remember that these words were delivered in 1927. They predict precisely that trajectory of gender relations that has played out in the past eighty years; and unfortunately, we are now forced to admit that Mrs. Durant's admonitions went unheeded. This "progress of inversion and perversion" [of the sex roles] has become a reality. We now have precisely the type of society she warned us to avoid: female exaltation of career over all else, the deliberate masculinization of women, the corresponding effeminacy of men, and the rise of an androgynous and neutered "third sex" that has completely withdrawn from the human mating game. These are the general contours of American society in 2014.

The modern man enjoying his leisure.

Inevitably, another question arises. Are these changes part of the natural, inevitable process of human evolution, or are they simply symptoms of our civilization's deepening decay? The question is a critical one. For if these changes are a natural outgrowth of technological development, then we are forced to admit that traditional masculinity is doomed. The human male may himself become something of an evolutionary dead end, fit to join that long list of other extinct genera of humans: paranthropus bosiei, homo australopithecus, homo neanderthalensis, etc. Take your pick.

It is not out of the question. My imagination was fired a few years ago when I read of the discovery in 2003 of homo floresiensis in Indonesia. It is now generally accepted that this diminutive "hobbit man" constituted a distinct species of human, and may have been alive as late as 14,000 years ago. Imagine that: an entirely different species of human, coexisting with modern man on remote islands in Indonesia, possibly even up until historical times. That there existed ages in which more than one species of human walked the earth is for me an incredible concept. Only last month, news reports announced the discovery in China of another new species of Stone Age human, called "Red Deer People." This type apparently also existed as recently as 11,000 to 14,000 years ago. In evolutionary terms, 14,000 years is the blink of an eye. What a strange, wondrous world this is! These new discoveries remind us just how complex, unexpected, and diverse the story of man is. We are only beginning to scratch the surface of our history.

Homo floresiensis on display

The point here is that social changes, in the long run, can have serious consequences for the survival of the species. The deliberate destruction of the masculine ethic in the West may, over time, set modern man down the path of extinction. Those bloated, wretched freaks lurching about in the aisles of the average suburban Walmart store may be a frightening harbinger of humanity's future.

But I cannot bring myself to believe this. This would be a future too dark to contemplate. I prefer to believe that our current social woes are a temporary hiccup in the later stages of that Industrial Revolution which has haunted mankind since the 1780s. No doubt old James Watt, tinkering with his steam engines in England at that time, could never have foreseen the insidious consequences of his revolution. Yet I curse him just the same. Women have not become "emancipated" so much as industrialized. They have become drafted into a vast slave army of anonymous drones, willingly or unwillingly, whose function it is to slave away in meaningless jobs, so that they can become better consumers before the altar of the moneyed oligarchs.

Call me delusional. But I prefer to take the position that feminist excesses and abuses will eventually prompt a furious backlash from both men and women. Mrs. Durant's exhortation for a "revolt against the excess of revolt" will become a reality, as the oligarchs running Western societies realize that they cannot sit atop a social dung heap and govern effectively. A corrective movement will be born (or may already be here) that will seek to restore a natural and healthy balance among the unhappy genders. If both men and women have degenerated and lost their previous vigor, perhaps this is due in America to the unparalleled period of ease and luxury of the decades since the 1930s. As Tacitus says,

> Nam militares artes per otium ignotae, industriosque aut ignavos pax in aequo tenet. [The arts of war are lost in a world of leisure, and peace levels equally both the man of action and the dullard. Annals XII.12]

The dullard and the man of action become equal quantities in times of leisure. In this world of tumult, this cyclone of conflict, we can only tend to the sacred flames in our innermost temples, and take care that their flickering lights do not go out. For my part, I refuse to become what the prevailing social conditions want me to become. I refuse to accept homo Walmartensis as the prototype of man's future. I refuse to let the light die out. And if that means we go the way of the Neanderthal, or some other evolutionary dead end, then so be it. We will still be nobler and greater than the forces that destroy us. For, to paraphrase Pascal, as we die we will know we are dying; whereas of its victory, a heedless and unfeeling society will know nothing.

How Not To Deal With High School Bullies

April 28, 2014 | by Vic Lenser | Link | Original Link

In one of the ten largest school districts in the State of Texas, a particular document has been circulating through the email space of public education: "Ten Cost Effective Strategies for Bullying Prevention," from the Texas School Safety Center.

The document highlights expectations and procedures regarding bullying, which relies upon the definition of "bullying" according to the United States Department of Health and Human Services (the food stamp bureau), which itself launched the initiative in response to efforts by the Obama administration.

The very first problem with the initiative is the definition of bullying to include both physical and emotional abuse. Bullying literally means "using strength or power to harm or intimidate those who are weaker." This refers to actual physical harm or the threat of physical harm.

Emotional abuse, which includes shaming, is very different from physical intimidation or violence and is therefore NOT actual bullying. You can read through the strategies for yourself, but I'd like to point out three that I selected in particular and interpret them with that important distinction in mind.

#3: "Create a Safe and Supportive School Environment"

Translation: Make a promise to all students that the place where they spend most of their waking life will be completely devoid of any real-world consequences for being a mediocre human being or being different from the overwhelming majority of their peers.

Bad Idea Because: Members of the current generation of high school youth need to understand that the world will pay more mind to their merit, appearance, and self-portrayal in regards to what it has to offer. Mediocrity does not realize dreams.

#7: “Create and Enforce Clear Rules Pertaining to Bullying”

Transation: Criminalize the behavior of students who either insist upon higher standards of behavior from their peers or seek to define and protect the boundaries of their own social/cultural sphere.

Bad Idea Because: Without the phenomenon of shaming, entire civilizations would have crumbled by now, for they would not have had the means to prevent threatening levels of social deviance. Imagine how world history might have turned out if bullying had been prevented among the youth of Sparta.

#9: “Infuse Bullying Prevention Education into Existing Curriculum”

Translation: Indoctrinate all students, even at the cost of academic achievement, to the belief that all forms of bullying or shaming are wrong and can even be legitimately eradicated.

Bad Idea Because: Bullying has been a reality for millennia and will continue to occur as long as our species survives. Convincing our youth otherwise destroys one of the fundamental motivating factors for self-improvement: the perception of mediocrity within oneself.

Bullying vs. Shaming

This aforementioned credo, like many others circulating the public sphere, confounds two distinct terms under one blanket definition, i.e. “bullying” and “shaming.”

At ROK, “shaming” often refers to fat-shaming, slut-shaming, LGBT-shaming, wimp-shaming, loser-shaming, nerd-shaming, and so on, without all of which American society would descend into a pathetic, diluted version of its former self. School districts, feminists, liberals, and society at large consider verbal shaming to be on the same level as physical violence that needs to be addressed in the same way as actual violence. However, bullying by its true definition (physical violence) is not only already against school policy but is actually against the law.

What is not against the law is shaming. In fact, any attempt to prohibit one person from shaming another is a violation the First Amendment, or sites like ROK would not exist.

We had a saying when I was growing up: “Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words will never hurt me.” It meant that our caretakers were responsible for protecting us from physical harm, but before punishing perpetrators of verbal insults, they taught us to stick up for ourselves and develop thick skin. Under the current social paradigm, being made fun of or feeling shamed in any way is emotional abuse and is therefore bullying. Are there laws against emotional abuse? Does it matter? Only if shaming is emotional abuse.

But it clearly is not.

> to shame: to make someone feel ashamed; to cause someone to feel ashamed or inadequate by outdoing or surpassing them

In other words, excellence = shaming. This idea is what lies at the heart of American Mediocrity. Don't do great things, because your greatness is going to make me feel uncomfortable, therefore emotionally abused, ergo you should be punished for being awesome.

Shame should inspire greatness. When someone does better than you and either points it out directly (verbally) or indirectly (through their achievements), those feelings of inadequacy you're feeling are supposed to motivate you to do push harder. Shame also helps people obtain awareness. Not only by perceiving greatness but also by—gasp—getting made fun of. But instead of seeing it that way, school officials and the federal government want to replace the "Sticks and Stones" philosophy with a victim mentality.

Shame Is Good

By their rationale, students who become aware of their own inadequacy—be it through verbal notification or simply by perceiving those who outdo them–are victims who need to be protected. Who are these victims? What type of behaviors or characteristics lead to feelings of shame?

In males:

- being physically weak due to lack of involvement in athletic activities
- claiming that marching band is a sport (but it's got P.E. credits!)
- wearing t-shirts that depict cats, rainbows, or cats on rainbows (you'd be surprised)
- bringing a My Little Pony lunch box to school
- reading books intended for pre-teen Japanese girls (Manga)
- going out with fat chicks
- white knighting for girls

In females:

- the obvious: being fat, slutty, loud, obnoxious, or rude
- wearing pajamas in public
- taking too many selfies
- bad hair
- addiction to Starbucks

Pussy. Nuff said.

People who engage in the above listed behaviors would raise their standards if they were made fun of. With the support of school staff and wise parents, they would learn to overcome the ridicule by improving themselves. Teaching them that they are victims only results in more of the bad behavior

As to the physical abuse, I have a solution for that as well.

How To Really Deal With Bullying

My father often tells amusing stories about how his school dealt with bullying between boys. First, violence was strictly prohibited in his school, and the punishment was severe. On the other hand, fighting was sanctioned, as long as there were supervisors present… and boxing gloves.

In today's world, the high school bully faces a punitive response to his unchecked alpha tendencies, leading him down a path of prison-like discipline placements. Conversely, the one being bullied begins a path towards complete and total pussification, since he never learns to really stand up for himself.

In my father's day, the boys would work out their differences in the gym. The bully would get checked by a real challenge, and the bullied always earned a little respect, even if he got walloped. Am I advocating that kids get into fights? In a way, yes I am.

Was mich nicht umbringt, macht mich stärker

If a bully beats the snot out of another kid, they both look bad. The former is a heartless jerk, and the latter a spineless wimp. On the other hand, if a bully picks on a kid but meets a fight that ends more-or-less evenly, they both still look bad, but in a good way.

A couple of guys working out their alpha aggression on each other may be billed as "macho pigs," but they automatically look tougher and manlier than the chuckling idiots that stand off to the side and watch. Whether anyone wants to admit it or not, getting into a scuffle where both people walk away can actually raise a man's value.

Conclusion

Bullying is going to happen, just like premarital sex among teens is going to happen. We can't stop it or eradicate it, but we can teach those involved with it.

In my youth, I had to deal with bullies. I was short and thin as a rail. I wore glasses and had braces. I knew more about Lord of the Rings than I did about getting in shape. People picked on me. I fought back. I won. I lost. I learned. I grew up. I graduated high school. I became more confident. I got active and more fit. I banged girls. Hooray.

We need to understand that bullies have always been and always will be a part of life and society. Instead of treating recipients of mild "physical abuse" as helpless victims, school districts should try the following three strategies:

- Teach bullies to use their strengths for leadership and self-improvement.
- Teach the bullied about physical strength and true confidence.
- Teach young men how to fight, and give them a safe space to do so.

Another viable option could be mandatory castration of all males. Just cut off every young man's testicles so there won't be any problems with testosterone and therefore aggression. It's the feminist approach, and it's already happening figuratively in schools and homes across America. It produces meek, sexless boys and Amazonian, overachieving girls—Harry Potters (but without magic powers) and Hunger Games heroines.

How To Avoid Feeling Down And Out

April 28, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

One of the best concepts in Roosh's book Bang is the idea that approach anxiety is caused by ancient instincts. Approaching a woman was inherently risky. Her father, brother, cousins, her tribe, etc. might viciously attack a man that was seen to be making a sexual approach. By understanding approach anxiety, we can more easily observe it within ourselves and thus over ride what is in reality, rather out-of-date 'software'.

The worst you risk these days is a stern look from her boyfriend or perhaps a shove. I was hitting on a girl half my age recently when her boyfriend showed up. He got all macho and insecure, but I smiled and gave him a pat on the shoulder. Men today are law abiding and try to avoid violent confrontation, simply because it's more trouble than it's worth. "I won't if you won't."

Feeling Beaten

In an extension of approach anxiety, I was trying to think into why that heavy feeling comes over me when I've made a mistake, been rejected by a girl, or failed in a business transaction. For example, not long ago I had a great conversation with a girl I met at the station. I had to run to catch my train, but not before establishing a highly sexually charged rapport with her, getting her number and finding out that she considered herself bisexual. I don't have a lot of time these days to pick up women half my age, and this one seemed to be a catch and a sure fired threesome in the making.

Disaster struck and somehow I erased her number from my phone. It's a trivial matter, but it made me feel irritated, annoyed and even a little depressed. I went through the old process of Denial – Anger – Depression – Bargaining – Acceptance.

In more serious cases (eg. wife or girlfriend cheats), the man in question often takes matters onto his own shoulders and 'beats himself up' more than he probably should. Other examples of business failures, bankruptcies and so forth that can also leave a man feeling beaten down, not wanting to take risk, and backed into a corner.

Why? Could Roosh's explanation of approach anxiety, hold true for some kind of 'failure anxiety' ?

While it can be good to take a little break and clear the air after a failure, in many cases getting back on the horse after a fall is a far better approach. The reason for this is because we are not really defeated, only defeated by the moment in question. Another opportunity will soon come along that allows us to easily succeed. Quite often these failures actively seem to proceed a 'moment of truth' when it all becomes good. Being in the right place at the right time requires being there. It's just at that hopeless moment when things might go in your favor. Proceeding cautiously after a setback is only valid in specific circumstances.

In the book Poker Mindset that I reviewed a few weeks ago, several psychological concepts are taught. Firstly, avoiding ‘tilt’. This is when a related or even unrelated event makes you angry or depressed and sets you off on a self-fulfilling prophecy of failing by default to prove you are a failure. Many shit tests are designed to unbalance a person until they slide head long into a self-created disaster. A woman’s shit test is a form of this, meant to disempower the man and make him freeze up.

More important than simply understanding the processes is understanding why they occur. Just as approach anxiety is inbuilt ‘software’ that is largely useless to us today, so too, feeling beaten, or reverting to ‘beta’ behavior. It is something that is designed to keep us ‘safe’. In the past when we were beaten up or didn’t catch the deer when hunting, we were better off feeling beaten because backing down kept as alive for another day. These inbuilt feelings of nervousness, tension, depression, loneliness, sadness, and loss stopped us taking further action, keeping us alive. The reason approach anxiety can be so powerful is precisely because it was designed to cope with life or death situations. In a purely animal setting, the young male stag that fails to beat the alpha in a mating rut, must back down lest the alpha outright kill him whereas in the human realm, doubling down, upping the ante or “going for the kill” is exactly what is needed.

This process also explains what we call “oneitis”, because the loss of a mate meant that a new mate had to be found, but finding a mate could be a dangerous pursuit. Thus our animal programming naturally makes us feel low, blue, and depressed to slow us down on that mission. NOW UNNECESSARY! One of the reasons why people love a successful underdog is precisely because he has overcome this animal programming.

Bouncing Back

Ask yourself the question: Is it life-threatening for me to have another shot at this right away? If not then take another shot at it no matter how bad you feel. Better yet, shake off the bad feeling, just as it’s necessary to shake off approach anxiety.

By practicing this attitude I’ve found that it’s possible to polarize the bad feelings into good feelings; to use them as markers and propulsion. At very least they represent a force to push against. For every action there is an equal and opposite reaction. Rather than yielding to the bad feeling, instead I gather up a good feeling equal to the bad one.

In terms of cold approach, that twinge of anxiety you feel, now becomes fuel for your pick up engine. In terms of business and professional success, setbacks now become an enjoyable part of the drive that pushes you ever onwards. It’s the adrenaline rush as you base jump off the 3000ft cliff, rather than the anxiety that stops you dead in your tracks. Become an adrenaline junkie and at the same time, learn to rationally cover your risks, instead of running on animal fear.

Something that I’m guilty of is exaggerating the ‘disaster’ to a point of absurdity. In Al Pacino’s Two For The Money (brilliant movie), he explains how the gambler loves to lose. The thrill is in losing and then realizing that everything will be okay; a crippling yet rather exciting life strategy. A way to get beyond this is by embracing it. In any bad situation, simply exaggerate the outcome to absurdity then laugh at yourself for how stupid you are being.

> "I lost my phone, now I'm going to wind up homeless and get nailed in the ass every night by roving gangs of evil demons."

We can convert almost any bad moment, stress, anxiety or setback into an enjoyable reason to carry on. Engage and amplify! The only thing left to do is retain a cautious and rational judgment as to whether that is the correct course of action, whilst avoiding reactive or passive 'tilts' that only dig a deeper hole.

When my first LTR ended, I remember lying in bed, feeling terrible, and telling myself that I must never feel like this ever again. I had that lovestruck, bluesy, hopelessly depressing attitude where without that one woman at my side, life was meaningless. I avoided women for quite some time afterwards. Now we see the process that is taking place. A circuit breaker has blown altering the poor humanoid that a life and death situation has occurred and he should lay low for the foreseeable future. WRONG!

Having established this as BS the first time around, the second time I failed in a multi-year LTR, I went out on a date that same evening I put my ex on a plane home to her mother. I was in bed with a girl within two weeks. I pushed very aggressively and without knowing about game, I somehow tapped into natural, latent, instinctive abilities to bounce back and be a winner. I applied the same concept to business and making money. Lately I started applying it on a daily basis to any small set back. What's more is that by appreciating the entire process that is going on, it becomes so much easier to tap into and leverage it for good.

Many men (with myself being the master of this) are simply too smart for their own good. They are constantly thinking, rationalizing, and strategizing until they wrap themselves up in knots. That combined with a little approach or failure anxiety leaves you screwed, producing a state of self-inertia and inaction, enough to cripple the most simple endeavor.

- Learn how to 'switch on' when you need it. Psyche yourself up. Remember the moments you 'killed it' and download that attitude (music can be good for this).
- Ride the wave of your own fear and enjoy doing it.
- Think into the real risks rationally and carefully (emotionally and physically there are usually almost none—most risks are financial or social).
- Employ strategy and attitudes that support YOU. Laugh at your fear—steal the fire from the devil.
- Ignore basic animal instincts—they are almost always defunct.
- Learn to take the jump in the moment.
- Learn to think and make decisions under pressure. Engage and amplify, with amplify being the important part once you are in the fray.
- Jump past failure and on the flip side be cool to success. Being over excited about successes brings larger disappointment when failures happen.
- If you are stuck, look for a small and easy success that you can rinse and repeat.

- You'll never get off the ground if you don't put your feet down.

If you read the biographies of almost anyone who has been successful you will find the same formula repeated again and again. I can't say I've been any kind of expert at mastering it until lately. The reason for this is that many times I've run on dumb luck and thus not been able to understand the process in a way I could easily repeat. Other times I've passively wallowed in my own self-created failure for years. I hope I have the process clear now and I trust these concepts will be useful to other men out there.

There Is Little Difference Between Women Throughout History

One of the biggest pieces of narcissism that plague our corner of the web is that we think we are among the first to unravel the true nature of women. That we men today, through whatever means we used to discover it, are among the first to know what women think and the fundamental aspects of their nature. Well, sorry to deflate your ego but men throughout all of history have known exactly what women are. What they want, how they act, and all their shortcomings.

My first encounter with an 'ancient' mind who knew the truths I was just beginning to guess at as a moody high schooler came from Friedrich Nietzsche and his book Beyond Good And Evil. Amongst the many examinations of human nature in the book, Nietzsche finds time to describe women as they are; flightly, duplicitous, incapable of any great thought outside those concerned with gossip and sex. Yet he did not write these truths from an angry perspective. Nietzsche described the numerous shortcomings of women simply as a fact of their nature. When I first read his book, I thought Nietzsche some truly radical, forward thinker—here was a man from the 19th century perfectly describing the women of my generation! As I later discovered, he was just one of thousands of writers throughout the whole of human history who knew just what women are, and how they've always been the same since time immemorial.

The current generations have been brainwashed into thinking that women are by default some sort of angelic being, which can do no wrong, which is perfectly chaste and loving and monogamous; so it's not surprising that many of us hold a certain pretentious pride in our belief that we have unravelled the mystery all by ourselves. The fact is that the true ancients already knew what we think we have recently uncovered.

Juvenal was a Roman poet born sometime in the 1st century. Amongst his works are the Satires , a collection of poems centring around social issues from Juvenal's day (which, depressingly, are the same ones we face today). To show you that we are far from the first men to know women, I offer to you some brief excerpts from Juvenal's VI Satire: Don't Marry. I suggest reading the Satire in full when you have the chance.

From: SatVI:25-59 You're Mad To Marry!

> Go prostrate yourself in worship at the Tarpeian shrine, go sacrifice a gilded heifer to Juno, if you should happen to find a woman whose life is chaste. There are so few of them fit to touch Ceres' sacred ribbons, whose kisses wouldn't appal their fathers. Fasten a garland to your doorpost if you do, deck the lintel with marriage ivy. Is one man enough for Hiberina, then? She'd sooner confess under torture to being happy with only one of her eyes. 'There's a girl on her father's estate in the country whose reputation is good.' Try her at Gabii, not in the country, try her at Fidenae, then I'll grant you the father's farm. Who says she's not been carrying on in the caves or on the hills?

Even in an era when the goddamned patriarchy supposedly ruled with an iron fist, an age that knew no concept of effective birth control, a time when being a single mother would assuredly leave an ordinary woman destitute and forever burdened; women were still sluts. Some people blame things like the female favouring marriage laws, the birth control pill, or feminism for making today's women into rampaging whores, but they've always been so. Even when there was no societal safety net or byzantine system of white knightery to save women from their own short sighted and often selfish decisions, they still chose to act in vile ways.

It does not matter where she comes from either. Oh, she's a sweet little country girl from the corn fields of Nebraska? She grew up on a Dairy farm in rural Southwest England where there were no temptations? Surely she must be as pure as the first winter's snow. Move her into Omaha city without daddy around and see how traditional she is then. Take her to a club in Bristol, and see how pure her country ways are. Odds are the traditional country gal that is oft touted as being the last bastion of the good girl in today's society was getting railed in a Ford 4×4 when she was 14 on some back country road.

Women are sluts. It's in their nature. They were sluts when the walls of Jericho were being built, and they'll remain sluts until the moment Earth begins growing mushroom clouds.

From: SatVI:60-81 Look At Them In The Theatre

> Can you find any woman that's worthy of you, under our porticoes? Does any seat at the theatre hold one you could take from there, and love with confidence? When sinuous Bathyllus dances his pantomime Leda, Tucia loses control of her bladder, and Apula yelps, as if she were making love, with sharp tedious cries.

> You're marrying a woman who'll make Echion a father, Glaphyrus, the lyre-players, or Ambrosius with his pipe. Let's set up platforms stretching along the narrow streets, and decorate the doorposts and lintels with laurel boughs, so your noble child, dear Lentulus, there in his tortoiseshell cradle, shall remind us of Euryalus, perhaps, the gladiator!

How many husbands, fiancés and boyfriends in the 20th century alone have been cuckolded by artists and athletes? There was never an age in human history where a woman with sexual options valued a noble husband more than some grungy loser sitting in a dank building strumming his strings. Hell, I bet even back in the Stone Age the cave women were creaming themselves more over Oog, who discovered blowing into a hollow wooden tube would create high pitched sounds, than Uk, who spent all day going out and getting mauled by predators in order to bring meat home to the tribe.

From: SatVI:82-113 What About Eppia?

> Eppia, wife of a senator, ran off with the gladiators… She forgot her home, her husband, deserted her sister, shamelessly, left her country, her wailing children… Though, as a child of a wealthy family, she once slept in a richly decorated cradle on soft, downy pillows, that sea voyage concerned her little; nor her reputation… Though the reason be just and virtuous, for taking risks, women are still afraid, their hearts frozen with terror, trembling in every limb: yet they're courageous when daring shameful things. If a husband demands it; then, boarding ship's a pain, the bilge is sickening, sky spinning round and round. But with a lover, her stomach's fine. A wife will vomit over her husband, a mistress eat with the sailors, stride the deck, and delight in handling the stubborn rigging.

Remember the story about this woman, who ran away from her marriage and four kids in Florida, to go all the way to New York to live in a tent during Occupy Wall Street while spending the whole time getting banged by a bunch of losers? As Rollo Tomassi so succinctly puts it:

> A woman who wants to fuck you will find a way to fuck you. She will fly across the country, crawl under barbwire, climb in through your second story bedroom window, fuck the shit out of you and wait patiently inside your closet if your wife comes home early from work – women who want to fuck will find a way to fuck. The girl who tells you she needs to be comfortable and wants a relationship first is the same girl who fucked the hot guy in the foam cannon party in Cancun on spring break just half an hour after meeting him.

It has never mattered to women in the whole of history that she has responsibilities or a family to look after; if she falls in lust (which most of her gender do) while supposedly betrothed to another man, she'll abandon her entire life, her entire future, to go get railed by the object of her cardinal desires. Thus, it ever was. Thus, it will always be.

Bye hun! Bye kids! I'm abandoning you to go bang an Aerosmith cover band!

I have one more excerpt from the satires dear reader, before I let you get on with the rest of your day. I think it is one that is most relevant to our modern society.

From: SatVI:286-313 What Brought All This About?

> What brought this monstrous behaviour about, what's its source you ask? Their lowly status used to keep Latin women chaste, hard work kept the corruption of vice from their humble roofs, and lack of rest, and their hands, then, were chafed and hardened from handling Tuscan fleeces, when Hannibal neared Rome, when their husbands manned the towers at the Colline Gate. Now we suffer the ills of a long peace. Worse for us than war this luxury's stifling us, taking its revenge for an empire won. No single kind of crime or act of lust has been lacking, from the moment we were no longer poor… It was filthy lucre at first that brought these alien morals here, effete wealth that's corrupted the present age with revolting decadence. Does Venus care about anything when she's drunk? …Go on, ask yourself, why Tullia scornfully sniffs the air, what that infamous Maura's foster-sister says as Maura passes by the ancient temple of Chastity in the Forum, here's where they halt their litters at night, to make water, and drench the goddess's statue with flowing streams, and take it in turns to ride and squirm under the moon. Then it's off home they go: and when the daylight returns you'll wade through your wife's urine to call on mighty friends.

In the Anglo countries, America especially, many of the youth in the 1920s and 30s and 40s suffered hardship. As a result of their massive victory at the end of the Second World War, these countries experienced an overnight explosion in peace and prosperity. It didn't take even take two generations for the children of these countries to become corrupt. They were born corrupted. In the 1950s, under the watchful eye of her veteran father and homemaking mother, little Suzie all-American played with her expensive toys and wore her clean new dresses and grew up with everything her parents never had. By the time she was 20, Suzie was getting high and screwing strangers in the mud like a pig at music festivals.

Women in prosperous societies will always fall into irresponsibility and lustful decadence, regardless of men's stance on the matter. The only reason Afghani women stay at home and wear burkas in public is because they live in a culture which would literally kill them if they did not. If the harshness of Afghani culture lessened, or became truly prosperous in almost a heartbeat like America experienced in the late 40s, it would take only ten years before the Afifa's and Ehteram's were regularly booze cruising to Afghanistan's long beach, flashing their boobs at Muhammad for a free Buttery Nipple from the Tiki bar and going to the men's room in the club to do a line off his meat before sucking it off.

There is much wisdom about human nature that has been written in the millennia's of history. It behooves anyone seeking knowledge of why the world is as it is to seek out the great writers of the past and read their works. There's more there waiting for you there than some good old fashioned, unchained misogyny.

I'd also like to thank the folks over at the Red Pill Reddit for providing the link to the VI Satire even though I'm pretty sure you guys hate me.

3 Reasons Why Travel Doesn’t Make Women More Interesting

April 29, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

It’s a well-worn cliché that travel provides a cornerstone for masculine development. This blog’s creator and many other like-minded quality writers have shown us that getting out of one’s comfort zone is a necessity for a man to grow into himself. There is a reason that ROK’s travel archive is bursting with stories of picking up girls in Brazil, language study and culture shock in Eastern Europe, and why every man should go on a pilgrimage. We learn from putting ourselves in unfamiliar situations so that we can be better equipped for our lives.

In contrast to this purpose, I’ve noticed a growing issue in modern western dating culture—the rise of “travel bug” females who fetishize the stamping of their passports over any type of sustained self-development. From the “let’s sit at a tropical resort” tedium to the backpack-across-Europe-and-get-drunk-in-hostels phenomenon of rich white twentysomethings, I’ve reluctantly come to the conclusion that traveling rarely makes a female any more interesting or desirable. This is why:

1. There is no struggle

When a man travels (on a non-prepackaged deal or tour), he has to earn every bit of his enjoyment. Just for basic living purposes, a man is forced to navigate a place amidst a foreign tongue, figure out the local cuisine, and learn which areas he can and cannot go at night. This says nothing of the steps necessary for ensuring a fun trip, including maximizing the logistics of his living arrangements, finding the best nightlife spots, forming relationships with locals, and figuring out how to attract the country's women. It is in these moments of uncertainty and occasional struggle that character and self-knowledge is forged.

Girls know little of that—people will bend over backwards to help a young American female because they know she is, in all likelihood, in their country to get drunk and find a mysterious foreigner for anonymous EatPrayLove sexcapades. The locals will put on their best attempts to speak English, buy them drinks, show them around the city, and protect them from interlopers. The increased risk of "danger" to females while traveling is often mitigated by staying in close-knit groups of fellow travelers, which does promote safety but retards the rate at which learning and self-development can occur.

2. It doesn't lead to any deeper understanding of the world

Most girls travel to "YOLO." We men are certainly guilty of traveling partially to fulfill our carnal desires, but it's obvious that the best travel bloggers have gotten far more out of their adventures than simple sex stories. Men use travel to develop an understanding of human nature and contrast the lifestyles and traditions of other cultures with their own. Often they find foreign lifestyles and ideals to be superior to their own, leading to an important questioning of one's worldview. Have you ever heard a woman wax philosophical about the superiority of lifestyle in another country? This type of self-reflection rarely occurs, and when it does, it is cut short by the realization that they have it much easier at home, where feminism gives them myriad rights and few of the responsibilities bestowed upon women in other cultures.

3. The Pokemon mentality

I've heard countless stories of girls collecting stamps on their passports, traveling several different countries over the course of a short time. What's the point of this type of scattershot journey? Much like the interest in possessing the newest iPhone, handbag or, BMW, having the fullest passport is the newest status symbol among educated upper middle class Anglophones. It provides a "Well, when I was in…" conversation piece that they can use to dominate a conversation and show their worldliness. In the worst cases, they think "catching them all" makes them more experienced in life, often to the point of talking down to those who actually have a much better depth of understanding from their travels.

I've been on many dates with girls that have traveled far more than I have, yet most of their stories revolve around getting drunk in bars with other English speakers or taking pictures of their meals at expensive, tourist-focused restaurants. Relatively few have taken time to learn a foreign language on their own, formed lasting relationships with locals, or push themselves from their comfort zone to solve problems while abroad. Though your initial instinct may be to respect a woman as more worldly and educated due to a well-traveled past, I would caution against it. Often, it is the very opposite.

The Benefits Of Having A Good Wingman

April 30, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Preparing Yourself

Having a wingman you can depend on makes your gaming life incredibly easier. However, before you begin searching high and low for that great wingman, you must do two things. First, you must be a good wingman yourself. To reach this level, see my fellow ROK writer's article here. Knowing what makes a good wing can make you appreciate how amazing a benefit it is to have a high quality wing you can trust when you are out gaming. Moreover, no high quality wing wants to be with someone who can't reciprocate.

Second, to elaborate on one of the requirements from the above-mentioned article, you should go out solo to develop and hone your own skills enough to be able to operate without the reliance of a wing. Then, not only will you be able to take the assist a wing gives you to completion, but you can also appreciate how easy it is to not have to go out solo. Don't get me wrong, going out solo is fun and rewarding, but it is harder than having that good wing.

Finding A Good Wingman

I will not sugarcoat it and say this is easy, but it is possible with some effort. As we get older more and more of our friends drop into the LTR or marriage zone, diminishing our available pool of known gentlemen to select a good wing from.

The more difficult way is to meet them out while gaming yourself. It can happen, but I would not rely on this method. The easier way is to put yourself in a position to meet like-minded people, and see who you have some "wing chemistry" with. I've met a few people off the Roosh forum and while almost all of them are solid people, you tend to only click with a few for gaming purposes.

I have no problem giving credit where credit is due. Upon relocating from LA, one of the guys I met up with turned out to be a great wing and someone I was able to game easily with. On at least two occasions off the top of my head, he has been directly responsible for my success. The first we approached two girls standing on the patio of a bar, and within minutes he had my girl's friend out of there. He didn't end up going home with her (he went home with another girl), but he gave me enough of a window to isolate and leave with the girl I was speaking to.

And as recently as this past weekend, which I reference in the below tweet, he literally just had a girl waiting for me at a bar. That my friends, is a good wing.

> Not all wings are created equal. @HDLie knows what he's doing. Had a drink and a girl waiting for me at a bar this weekend. Respect
> — Law Dogger (@LawDogger) April 28, 2014

Developing The Wing Relationship

Now imagine if you take a good wing, and go out with him hundreds and hundreds of times over the course of years. That is the situation for myself and one of my buddies. We have been gaming, on and off, for 15 years. You develop almost a sixth sense of what the other one is doing, having done this so many times that it becomes second nature.

I was keeping a live journal of my Russia trip this past summer. Upon recounting a night where my buddy and I met up with one guy in Moscow, he had the following comments regarding our means of operating:

> Had a really good time at the club with you guys, have to say you and your friend were working the room pretty darn well and your buddy is a really funny guy. You guys have a laid back vibe but know when to turn it up, and sort of instinctively know what each other are doing at all times out there too.

If you and your wing go out enough together, you will reach this level. You will know what the other is thinking, what he wants to do, and what you should do at any specific time. Another example — this time being my words recounting one night from the same Russia trip — also copied from the live journal I was writing:

> Some new guys come up, and one of the other guys doesn't give up on the girls. The bangable one makes eye contact with me a few times and smiles and I smile back. These girls also keep pounding shots, I saw them take 4 shots from when they first got to the bar, all after 6:30 a.m. They are hammered. I keep waiting for any opportunity that the bangable one is alone for one second so I can go in there, but these guys won't give up.
> Finally I look at my buddy who's standing next to her, point to the bangable blonde and mouth to him "tell her to come over here" while doing the come hither motion with my finger. He understands me and immediately he taps her on the shoulder, tells her whatever and she comes over to me. Honestly sometimes I'm spoiled with such a good wing.

The girl and her friend jumped in a cab with me, but it ended in disaster after her friend vomited inside the cab. Despite the hilarious but sad ending, the fact remains that without having such a good wingman, that opportunity would not have arisen.

I realize how fortunate I am with my buddy of 15 years, but as I point out above it is possible to develop and foster a new wing relationship. In the end, a wing is not necessary by any means and there is a lot of personal development one can accomplish by going out solo. But a good wingman can do wonders to alleviate some of that effort.

Let Hard Experience Be Your Teacher

April 30, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

At 21, I looked back on my teenage self and said: “I thought I knew something about life back then—what a young fool I really was!” At 27, I did the same in respect to my 21 year old self. And now that I am 33, I look back on my 20s and think I was just beginning to figure life out. No doubt that once I reach my 40s, I will reflect on my current stage in life and see similar ignorance.

It is illuminating and ironic that no matter how old we are, there is always a sense in which we are fools: future experience adds up to show us how little we really knew at any particular time. Meanwhile, wisdom is something which few people ever seem to possess. It is rarely attained before middle age, and few of us exhibit much of it even in old age. In Walden, Henry David Thoreau, still only in his late twenties, remarked how little his elders had to teach him, despite their superior life experience.

In our unreflective time, any thoughtful young person has all the more reason to feel the same. Indeed, today, human beings, flooded on all sides by gadgets of distraction, are not much inclined to learn from experience or consider life in general. It is as if we ram our heads against the wall again and again, unaware that it hurts to do so, unsure why we do so. There has never been less of an appreciation for wisdom in our culture, or fewer old people who actually have much to teach the young. Moreover, facile psychiatrists are on hand to provide us with quick fixes for the problems of life: by simply swallowing some pill or other, we can become numb enough to endure. These secular priests are also happy to play the common rhetorical game of reducing whatever problem we have to a “chemical imbalance” or defect in our environment or background. So that, instead of changing and taking responsibly for our lives, everyone gets a free pass and we can get back to watching American Idol and eating Cheetos.

In the past, it was much more common for people to learn from experience—the old functions of both religion and philosophy, at their best—and to deal with the problems of life by endeavoring to live a balanced life. After all, only this makes life happy, or at least worth living. It is of the utmost importance to learn from experience, and to do so early in life, for we all naturally set out in life full of unrealistic expectations. We have zealous notions of happiness and fulfillment. We think we will make a fine place for our self in the world. We think that if we treat others well, they will treat us well too. For human beings are fundamentally good, governed by a sense of fairness and working together to realize the common good.

These are, in fact, nothing but illusions—what we want to be the case, not what is so. The world is a vast fraud, ruled by self-interest and essentially corrupt, as history shows on every page. Human beings are deft knaves and dissemblers, and hence the wisdom of the maxim that though your friends may seem sincere, it is only your enemies who are always so. It is well to trust people only insofar as they are essential to your own well-being. And rather than giving them "the benefit of the doubt," give yourself the benefit of prudent distrust. People are quick to criticize politics and politicians, yet they would not be so if they were more cognizant of what frauds people are in general, as they would then have more realistic expectations from the political domain.

To see just what a sham human relations are in general, consider the common experience of being done wrong by another human being. Of course, no one can get through life without having been harmed by others a great deal; like pain and death, it is unavoidable. Now I have no doubt that your experiences here have not been so different from my own. For the most part, I have found that few people are willing to take responsibility for having done me wrong. It is far more common and natural for them to simply rationalize things; in other words, to basically lie to me and themselves. And there seem to be two reasons for this. In the first place, many people really are so blind as to have no clue about how their behavior affects others. In the second, people will know, but ignore the knowledge, for the reason that it is painful to confront, and they'd rather avoid confronting this pain than adhere to any sense of duty they pretended to feel toward me. Of course, everybody pretends to be good and just, and to take morality very seriously, but most of us are mere self-interested pretenders. Unless they are forced to do otherwise, people will often take doing the right thing about as seriously as they take saying "nice to meet you," that often hollow but yet necessary phrase.

You are lucky if while you are still relatively young, you develop a habit of reflecting on your experiences and looking critically at other people. Otherwise, your future holds a most disenchanting education in store for you: your expectations from life and other people will collide with reality, resulting in considerable anguish and suffering. Is it not this that makes many middle-aged people and many of the old distinctly bitter and gloomy?

It has been my own difficult yet ultimately good fortune to have acquired a fair amount of dark knowledge while still fairly young. When I was an undergraduate, for example, I thought I foresaw an excellent career ahead of me as an English professor. After all, I had always loved good books and reading, and had a certain facility with words, so the choice seemed fitting. But once I got to graduate school, I saw that success in academia required a lot more than intellectual merit: sucking up to and playing politics with odious half-men and resentful feminists was indispensable. So I gave up the academic life. Now I am a writer and kind of roustabout whose goal is to survive while having as little to do with society as possible.

The reason is that I learned a lot from my time in academia. Having reflected on that experience, and on what I have known of human beings in general, I no longer believe there is any context in human affairs that is not human-all-too-human, to borrow an apt term from Nietzsche. It is simply not enough in life to be good or even great at something and also a decent human being. You have to level yourself down and play the petty games of the obtuse and vulgar majority, carefully dancing like a clown around their envy, resentment and herd touchiness generally: an affair that will be intolerable to the extent that you are made of better stuff than most people. These herd games vary, of course, according to time and place, but they are always insincere, even as people remain all smiles and so very good and just on the surface.

Conclusion

Learning from experience comes down to making your expectations consistent with reality. So, for example, just as I learned that my hope of finding a fulfilling and distinguished career working with others was a sham, so I have learned that my former goal of finding a woman who was not only attractive, but also intelligent and kind, was just another chimera, to be left behind like the baseball cards and action figures of my childhood. Besides the fact that attractive women in America tend to be boring, stupid and morally repugnant, just as smart, interesting and kind women tend to be fat and ugly, there is this significant problem: that real love is a lot of hard work and compromise, while contemporary social conditioning could not be more adverse to this.

Every man, like every woman, has unseemly elements in his nature; yet modern women, chasing their illusions of perfection, will not hang in there with you once your human-all-too-human side emerges. And in short, today people want only the good parts of dating and romance. They seem to think we can have the good things without accepting other's deep flaws and imperfections. This is perfectly in keeping with the nature of a society modeled on convenience. Now if, like me, you don't subscribe to this delusion, then the best you can do is to limit your expectations from dating and romance. Aim to meet your biological need for sex while now and then coming upon that rare woman whose company you can enjoy. Beyond this, you are searching for a phantom.

While it is quite unwise to expect much from life, and least of all from your fellow human beings, the best lot for anyone is to get satisfaction from ongoing constructive work. This essay may not be good news, but the act of composing it has engaged my mind, and thus afforded the sort of small satisfaction that, taken together with other ones, makes my life worth living, or at least bearable.

The Definitive Bible On Health Supplementation

April 30, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Examine is a 1001 page reference book on using supplements based on stated effects such as increasing power output, increasing muscle mass, decreasing blood glucose levels, and so on. It has compiled research on 200 specific supplements to help you decide where the science stands. If a study receives an A or B grade on affecting cortisol, for example, then the supplement did show an increase or decrease in cortisol levels if taken (you can follow the links provided to review the research yourself). It also tells you how significant the research is with descriptions such as “minor,” “notable,” or “strong.”

The beginning of the book gives a broad summary on which supplements you should be taking based on common deficiencies in our diets, particularly Vitamin D and K:

> The RDA for vitamin D is roughly 400-800 IU, and the optimal level is roughly 2000 IU minimum. The only people who do not need to concern themselves with vitamin D are those that live within the tropics and have frequent sun exposure > with bare skin (wearing a t-shirt and shorts is not enough).

> The RDA for vitamin K is roughly 60-120 mcg, and the optimal level is roughly 1000 mcg. This optimal level is mostly the same for both vitamin K1 and K2. It should be noted that while many sources may claim to hit the RDA for vitamin K, they have poor bioavailability – your body is unable to extract the full amount from said foods.

Two additional examples are zinc and magnesium:

> Zinc is not usually a concern for non-athletes, but it is excreted in higher amounts when a person sweats to a higher degree. In instances of high mineral excretion from sweating, then zinc supplementation would be useful. Alternatively, oysters provide it in the diet.
> Magnesium does not have a really good single-food source aside from some nuts (the high calorie count of which limits how much can be consumed). If most of the foods in your diet contain appreciable levels of magnesium then you can avoid supplementation, but if too much of your diet is lacking magnesium then deficiency is likely.

The next section alphabetically reviews approximately 200 supplements ranging from 1,3-Dimethylamylamine to Ziziphus jujuba. I picked two supplements to review: caffeine and zinc.

Caffeine

Caffeine has many stated effects. The book looks at these different effects and gives them a grade:

B	Anaerobic Running Capacity	↑	★★☆ Notable	7 studies	Appears to benefit anaerobic cardiovascular exercise, perhaps due to combination antifatigue effects and increasing power output
B	Power Output	↑	★★☆ Notable	9 studies	There appears to be a reliable and significant increase in power output (both weight lifting as well as cycle ergometer measurements) in both trained and sedentary persons with doses of caffeine exceeding 5mg/kg, assuming the subject is not caffeine tolerant. Tolerance, or lower doses of caffeine, are not as effective.
B	Aerobic Exercise	↑	★☆☆ Minor	3 studies	An increase in aerobic exercise capacity is noted with caffeine, possibly secondary to increased free fatty acids and adrenaline

The above screenshot shows three effects of caffeine (the book details approximately 20). Studies are grouped within each effect to help determine an overall grade of efficacy.

From the caffeine portion we can conclude that it helps notably on three fronts: power output (i.e. lifting), anaerobic activity (i.e. running), and increasing wakefulness. If you are using caffeine for another purpose, like improving memory, the research does not support it. Drinking an espresso or two before your workout would seem to help more than not.

Zinc

Zinc is quite popular in these parts for its effects on increasing testosterone. Does the research support this claim? First, let's examine what the book says about dosage:

> Different chelations and forms have different weights and dosing protocols. Zinc is most commonly dosed in either the 'low dosage' range of 5-10mg or the 'high dosage' range of 25-45mg. The low dosage is a daily preventative that reduces the risk for deficiency, and the high dosage range is the one used to prevent deficiency in persons who have more than just a dietary deficiency working against them (athletes, diabetics, etc.). There is zinc 'superloading' protocol using up to 100mg zinc daily, and while this is confirmed to be safe for short term usage (2-4 months) it is well above the tolerable upper limit (TUL) of 40mg and thus not advisable for prolonged supplementation.

Here is a screenshot which shows the summary of zinc's effect on testosterone:

B	Acne	↓	★☆☆ Minor	4 studies	Orally supplemented zinc (in the dosage range of 30-130mg elemental zinc) appears to be effective in reducing symptoms of acne, although the effects are modest at best.
B	Testosterone	↑	★☆☆ Minor	5 studies	Both chronic/excessive exercise as well as a zinc deficiency are associated with abnormally low testosterone concentrations, and in these states supplementation of zinc increases testosterone. There is no inherent increase in testosterone with zinc if either of those two conditions are not met
B	LDL-C	↓	★☆☆ Minor	3 studies	A decrease in LDL cholesterol may occur when a zinc deficiency in obese persons is being normalized.

It appears that zinc supplementation only increases your testosterone if you are definitely zinc deficient or physically active. If you have normal testosterone levels and are not physically active, these is not yet any evidence to show zinc will help you.

I'm not currently on zinc. I feel that my horniness is fine (though lower than 10 years ago) and I do engage in light physical activity. The research suggests that unless there is a genuine problem with my blood testosterone level, the supplement is likely a waste, but then again I do sweat heavily, which is a way that zinc escapes the body. Based on this information, it seems that a low dosage experiment for one month would by a justified call just to observe the effects, but I shouldn't expect much in the way of concrete change.

The second part of the book may be more useful for some: it lists the health goal you want along with the supplements that show the most promise in achieving that goal. Most goals are revolved around specific biological gains that weightlifters would be most interested in, but it also has more general outcomes. I looked at cognition and insomnia.

Cognition

Here's a screenshot with the supplements that offer the most benefit in terms of cognition, though under certain circumstances (when experiencing fatigue or an otherwise depleted state):

B	Panax ginseng	↑	★☆☆ Minor	4 studies	An increase in cognition is seen acutely and thought to be due to anti-fatigue effects, with nonfatigued individuals not experiencing an increase in cognitive performance
B	Rhodiola Rosea	↑	★★☆ Notable	4 studies	Notably effective assuming fatigue is being reduced. There is insufficient evidence to evaluate rhodiola's effects on cognition without the fatigue reduction aspect
B	L-Tyrosine	↑	★☆☆ Minor	3 studies	Tyrosine appears to effectively improve cognition during acute stressors (altitude and cold being tested most); this appears reliable if the acute stressor is present, but may not be an inherent increase in cognition and it is unsure if it applies to chronic stress and fatigue.

This is the first time I've heard of rhodiola rosea. Clicking over to its fact sheet, I learned that studies show it has positive effects with fatigue, subjective well-being, cognition, and depression. If I wanted to improve my cognition, rhodiola would be the logical first supplement to try.

Insomnia

I am a light sleeper with problems staying asleep (I've been recently using a white noise machine to muffle city noises outside my window). The guide shows that melatonin is the gold standard when it comes to improving sleep, without exhibiting any side effects.

LEVEL OF EVIDENCE	SUPPLEMENT	CHANGE	MAGNITUDE OF EFFECT CHANGE	SCIENTIFIC STUDIES	COMMENTS
B	Melatonin	↓	★★★ Strong	4 studies	Melatonin is the reference drug for insomnia related purposes, and appears to be highly effective at 3mg (time release formulation) or lower concentrations when taken before sleep.
C	Vitex agnus castus	↓	★☆☆ Minor	1 study	Can reduce insomnia that is a side-effect of PMS, although the influence on insomnia in other scenarios is not known.

Who is this book for?

This book isn't for casual lifters or guys who have no health problems they want to address. It's more geared for men who can answer yes to the following questions:

1. Are you taking supplements right now? If so, you'll find this book useful to not only find out whether you should continue taking those supplements but if there are other substances that could be more effective.

2. Do you plan on starting an intense workout program with a goal to greatly increase muscle mass? Instead of relying on anecdotal evidence that you read on the internet, you can use this as a reference guide to develop your own supplementation program.

3. Do you have nagging health concerns that could be treated naturally before pharmaceuticals? Guys in their younger 20's are probably in tip-top health, but the older guys past their prime would get use from the book's recommendations.

How this book can be improved

I'd like to see a section that details likely deficiencies for men based on age range. For example, it could have a "30-35 years old" section that lists the common biological problems that group is having and which supplements make the most sense in taking. Maybe it's possible my body is lacking in something which I don't realize.

Another improvement can be in expanding the introduction. I want to learn more about supplementation in general and even read case studies on how men solved their problems with a custom program. For a reference guide of this length, it would make sense for the author to essentially provide a "supplementation for dummies" intro that is geared to beginners, because right now the book assumes you already have some familiarity with supplements.

Conclusion

To say that this book is thorough is an understatement—I've never seen substances analyzed in such a meta manner. The main issue is the price versus the reward. It would be a marginal call for me because I'm not a heavy lifter or have significant health concerns, but identifying just one or two supplements that would improve my life would make its cost worthwhile. It also helps that the author puts out free book updates for buyers that reflect that latest research.

Examine is not a book that you buy and read in one sitting. It's meant more as a reference guide that you check periodically as your health goals progress. Unless you can answer yes to at least one of the three questions above, it's safe to skip. Otherwise, I predict you will get value from it.

I'm especially pleased that Examine is involved in sponsoring ROK for May since I can see it offering a direct health benefit to ROK readers who are more inclined to physical self-improvement than the general population. Stop Being An Average Man

Read closely, because I'm about to offend some of you. We're all men, right? We can handle some constructive criticism, right? We can handle hearing what actually is, instead of what we wish it was, right?

In every man's quest for success, what is one factor that must happen before he makes it?

You have to get fed up with being average. Period.

You must get sick and tired of being the status quo and an average man in order to reach your full potential in life. You must realize that if you want to be truly successful, you have to want it as much as you want to breathe. As much as you want that pretty girl that's in your class. As much as you want the dream life and success, you must ask yourself, do you really want it? Are you willing to sacrifice in order to have it? Are you willing to make real sacrifices.

I'm talking about turning your phone off, selling your TV and Xbox, saying 'no' to attending the latest party, telling your girlfriend "No, I don't have time to hang out, I'm busy with work", and even steering clear of your family if they bring you down with negativity and hatefulness. That's the kind of sacrifice I'm talking about.

Some of you, God bless you, have been spoiled your whole life. You may have grown up with a silver spoon in your mouth and you may have been bailed out of every bad situation by your family, but if you really want to become an independent man with your own success, it's time to let go of the tit and blaze your own trail.

Some of you, God bless you, are spoiled brats. You don't know what real pain is. This is the softest generation of all time. The absence of pain creates weak men obsessed with material goods, but lacking an inner fire.

You know where I get my motivation? Inside my soul.

I wasn't raised with money, didn't come from money, and sure as hell won't be left any money when my family passes. I knew in order to be successful, I would have to wipe away my crocodile tears of dismay at not being born into privilege and put my nose to the grindstone. Coming from the place I have come from and experiencing real pain, I can tell you right now, that the pain will make you better.

It will make you stronger.

It will make you more independent.

It will make you smarter.

It will make you into a man.

My path from pain hit it's all time low when I was homeless

The pain of being alone and broke without a dollar and having no idea where my next meal would come from is incredible pain. The feeling that if I died in any of those moments and who would really care, will either break a man, or set him on a different path.

I knew that in those moments I wasn't being all that Christian McQueen can be, but I didn't know how to get out of the situation. I was lost, full of despair and started to lash out at those who were successful.

- "Well that motherfucker got lucky!"
- "He was born into it. How the hell is someone who's poor with no connections supposed to get ahead in this life?"
- "No one gives a flying fuck about me, my situation, or my goals and dreams. Fuck everyone, I don't give a fuck anymore." (My go-to saying.)

Let me tell you something and read this close, because it might just change your life: Your attitude of bitterness and hatefulness will destroy you. (It almost destroyed me.)

There's no ifs, ands, or buts about it. It is a poison that will destroy your soul, breed in your mind with bitter thoughts and manifest itself in your actions. Get a hold of yourself and decide that the only one responsible for your failures and successes is yourself. This is key, because your claiming responsibility for everything good and bad that has happened to you will empower you.

You cannot start your quest for greatness, unless you realize that it's in your power to make it happen.

No more depending on Dad.

No more depending on Mom.

No more asking your grandparents to bail you out.

No more relying on the government to pay for your food.

No more begging, no more pleading, no more asking for a handout.

You have to make it happen.

You have to take control of your life.

You have to make the right choices.

Only then can you get yourself out of the gutter and on the road for success.

I speak from experience of being down and out, broke and lonely. What flipped the switch for me was taking responsibility for my actions and realizing that my negative actions had created a prison of consequences. As I took responsibility for those actions, the prison walls of consequences that seemed insurmountable started to dissipate and I made another chance for myself.

Read that again: I made another chance for myself. I turned no opportunity into an opportunity. You have to get creative and take the initiative. What is that for you? I don't know your situation, but you know it better than me.

You have to make yourself an opportunity.

You have to seize every moment of every day to be successful.

If you think that you can sleep in and spend more time on Facebook dreaming and success will eventually come, then you're in for a helluva rude awakening.

Stir that hunger inside. Stoke the fire. Get rid of the bitterness. Get rid of the hateful attitude to those who are doing better.

I'm telling you with all of the sincerity in my body, that the pain you're going through will be the fuel for your success, if you don't allow it to define you, but instead allow it to refine you.

I wish the best for everyone who reads this article, and while I'm sure the naysayers will eagerly scroll down to the comments to leave scornful and spiteful comments, let it be known that even they can change and live a better life, if they only let go of the bitterness and take hold of their future.

If you choose to ignore sound wisdom based in real life experience, then realize this my friend: you are only hurting yourself.

No one said it would be easy.

No said it would be a smooth road.

No one said that becoming truly successful isn't one of the hardest, if not the hardest journey of your life.

But read closely: if it was easy, then everyone would be successful. Do you want to be everyone? Or do you want to rise above?

Determine today that you are fed up with being average and are committing to being the best that you can be.

Need practical life advice on becoming a better man? Elevate Your Life and check out my blog.

5 Stupid Photos Girls Can’t Stop Taking

May 1, 2014 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

One of humanity’s greatest mistakes was putting a camera in the hand of every woman. Not only did it convince an entire generation of chicks that their banal activities were art, it allowed them to gorge themselves on bottomless portions of attention-whoring. Nowadays, the average gaggle of girls spends half their day taking pictures of one another. They spend the other half uploading them to their various social-media accounts, and compulsively checking back for “likes.” To make matters worse, these pictures are completely bankrupt of even a crumb of originality.

It’s well documented that women are particularly susceptible to copy-catting. But originality is rarely the goal. Just looking cuter than your friend doing the same thing is enough. It used to be just about duck face and Myspace angles, but today’s woman has discovered new ways to walk with the herd.

5. The So-Called Ugly Selfie

Despite the argument that the “ugly selfie” is some sort of political statement against conventional beauty standards, it’s little more than the latest flavor of female attention-seeking. The message is obvious: “Look, I can look cute even when I make a silly face.”

BURRRR
SO ICEY!

4. Mustache Shots

I’m not sure where the whole thing originated, but girls became obsessed with having mustaches seemingly overnight. I can’t help but suspect this is merely another instance of the latent penis envy that a growing number of women exhibit in their daily behavior.

3. Cliché Travel Destination

Traveling is one thing. Taking that same shot in front of Machu Picchu or “straightening” the Tower of Pisa is another.

2. Novelty Races (Especially by Fat Girls)

The number of girls suddenly interested in doing 5Ks has mysteriously increased with the proliferation of smart phones. Why? Because it's the perfect photo op. This is especially popular with dumpy semi-fatties, who can use their pictures as plausibly evidence that they're actually "athletic," and are merely genetically predisposed to being overweight (not that they spend the other 364 days of the year chugging Starbucks Milkshakes). It should come as no surprise that some of these races involve eating unhealthy junk food as part of the "challenge."

YOLO

1. The Butterfly Pose

This has quickly become the duet (or group) pose of choice. The format is simple: (1) Hug your bestie tightly with one arm, forming a Siamese twin-like bond in the center; (2) Position your exterior arms akimbo; and (3) Tilt your head slightly to maximize "cuteness." This pose has become so ubiquitous, I challenge you to scan any social-media site for five minutes without seeing it a dozen times.

Attention whoring and copy catting may very well be the female condition, but unless we enforce some degree of originality, we'll continue to be barraged with an endless stream of the same. Next time you see one of these played-out photos, be sure to call it out.

Donald Sterling’s True Mistake

May 1, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Donald Sterling’s biggest mistake was not what many people claim it to be. It wasn’t that he made racist remarks past and present, while owning a sports team in a league dominated by African-Americans. It wasn’t even the mistake that he got caught making racist remarks to the directed to the same culture of people that makes him millions of dollars on a cell phone recorder.

No, Sterling’s one mistake is so simple that it slaps those in the face who understand male/female dynamics. Sterling mistake was that he never learned game. He never needed it. When you have billions in the bank, you don’t need it to get girls. However, you need it to keep them in check.

This situation demonstrates that while fame game may be the most powerful allure to a woman out there, having game is just as important. If Donald Sterling had an ounce of game in him, he probably would not be in the situation he was dealt this past weekend, which now includes a lifetime ban from anything related to the NBA, and a mountain of pressure to sell his team, the Los Angeles Clippers.

To start, despite his enormous wealth, Sterling got married. Granted, she is the mother of his three children, but with his wealth it was foolish to allow her access to all of his assets. Certainly, as his wife hit the wall and began aging, Sterling yearned to take advantage of the pussy being thrown at him which comes with the territory of being worth billions of dollars.

Take a look at his wife—you certainly can’t blame the man. The mistress is definitely an upgrade, though with his dough he he could still probably do better.

More than likely, Sterling could have gotten away with having a mistress and maintaining harmony in his marriage, but he didn't follow the golden rule of having a mistress—to be discreet about it and deny it to his grave. Had he done so, she probably would have turned a blind eye to the whole thing.

However, Sterling rationalized that to keep his new hot piece of ass around, he needed to lavish her. This was not limited to the basics, but instead, he outfitted her with a $1.8 million duplex, and filled out the garage for good measure to the tune of two Bentleys, a Ferrari, and a Range Rover.

I know us car enthusiasts are thrilled to see her using the Ferrari to its full potential.

Apparently, Sterling still thought this wasn't enough to keep her around, because he then gave her permission to fuck black men and do whatever she wanted in the bedroom:

> "The audio recording has a male voice – identified by Stiviano and the NBA as Donald Sterling – chastising Stiviano for posting pictures of herself with black people to her Instagram account and admonishes her for wanting to be seen with black people. The male voice on the recording says that Stiviano can do whatever she wants in private, including having sex with black men, but should not post photos of them to the internet or bring them to Clippers' games."

Sterling was basically the wife to his mistress, willing to look the other way as long as she kept it in private. He should have followed his own advice in his original marriage, because as soon as his own mistress was out in plain view for the world to see was when his ~~gracefully aging~~ washed-up wife struck back.

Sterling's estranged wife, Rochelle, naturally does not like her husband giving out public gifts of affection in the form of expensive Italian sports cars, so she sued the mistress for the values of all the lavish gifts Donald had bestowed on her. Rather than recognizing the need to jump ship, Donald continued his relationship with her. He was so unwilling to walk away from this particular vagina (and into any number of willing new ones), that he set himself up to get played by her.

And play him, the mistress did. Both women had superior game to Donald Sterling, which is why he will ultimately end up the sacrificial lamb in the court battle over what is truly peanuts to the Sterling family.

Celebrities have it easiest, but they also get played the easiest. The next time you wish you could had fame as a DHV, just remember that fame without game ultimately makes you the real game.

Should Men Ignore Negativity?

May 2, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Many popular bloggers have publicly stated they won't write about or give their attention to the antics of those they disagree with anymore. Even writers who've made their name bashing feminists, extremists, and opposing social views are starting to wake up to the idea that focusing their attention on negativity won't make there be any less of it in the world.

At the same time, many of these same men discovered the websites, ideas, and communities that have improved their lives by first noticing negative patterns in culture around them. So which is it? Do we ignore the negativity in the world or tell everyone who will listen about what needs to change? Will paying attention to the problems of the world drain our energy or keep us vigilant? Is there a way we can leverage that negativity for our benefit?

When Seeing Negativity Is Helpful

Seeing negativity in others can be helpful when it allows us to see the negativity in ourselves. In order to let go of a pattern, you first have to become aware of it. Because we are resistant to seeing our own faults, sometimes it is easier to see them in others. Seeing the problems of the world can be a stepping stone to correcting those problems within ourselves.

When I first discovered Return of Kings and similar blogs, I knew I was not a feminist, but I still held many of the negative beliefs associated with that worldview that I had been indoctrinated with growing up. Reading critiques of feminists allowed me to see how those ideas had influenced my own thinking, let go of those beliefs, and become a happier person.

For someone just discovering Return of Kings or red pill philosophy, reading responses to negative ideas can be helpful if the reader still hold those ideas himself. Most men go through an angry phase when they discover how they were lied to about women, relationships, and attraction growing up. Anger is a perfectly natural stage of grief, but eventually one must move past it into acceptance, integration, and creating the life you actually want, rather than dwelling on the life you used to have.

When you know what you don't want, you know what you do want. Seeing negativity can be incredibly helpful if it makes you aware of the patterns you need to let go of and the positive direction you actually want to go. By reveals the contrast between where you are and where you want to be, negativity can be a positive force that points us in the direction of what we are really wanting.

When Seeing Negativity Is NOT Helpful

Dwelling on negativity is not helpful when it is done merely to feel superior to others or to juice feelings of anger and victim-hood. This is the most common reason people read, write, and talk about negativity in the world. Studies have shown readers are most likely to click on headlines that produce feeling of anger, and because publishers want page views, authors have incentive to write stories that appeal to these feelings. "Hate-reading" or producing and consuming content that is meant only to infuriate is the most dominant and common form of writing online.

This type of content transcends all political and social demographics. Conservative sites will publish articles bashing liberals, liberal sites will publish articles bashing conservatives. Environmentalists, feminists, men's rights activists, Christians, gays, and virtually every movement or subculture online has a website dedicated to chronicling the most outrageous actions of their opponents. Even within movements, members will generate traffic by bashing one another and publishing articles that serve only to divide or tear down their communities.

The most reason people focus on others failings is to feel better about themselves. I've written about the comparative mind before. It's much easier to compare yourself to an overweight underachieving whiner, than it is to take yourself from good to great. It's even harder to just be content, happy, or grateful for the things you have. It's easier to avoid the feeling you might not being enough, if compare yourself to someone who clearly doesn't think they're enough.

Likewise, creating a story that you are a victim of all the evil and misguided people in the world is an excuse to avoid action or change. Saying that feminists are keeping you down is the conservative man's version of "the dog ate my homework." While the world may create obstacles, these obstacles can make us stronger if we treat them as creative challenges and opportunities for growth.

The question men need to ask themselves when reading negative news stories is whether or not they are using information to become more aware of what they truly want, or whether they are using this information to create a story about why they can't have what they want. For most men, becoming aware of the negativity around them may initially helpful, but staying in that negativity is not.

When Talking About Negativity Is Helpful

Talking about negativity in the world is helpful when you are using your speech to change that negativity. If you are part of a community that is participating in a negative pattern, then speak up about it. In this case, you are not giving your attention to negativity, but your own transformative power to change it. The same way noticing negativity in the world can be an opportunity to let go of it, pointing it out in your community creates an opportunity for the community to change, and for those who no longer wish to participate in it to change or leave that community.

Whether or not writers chose to write about the problems of the world depends on their audience and goals. For men who already know what they want, spending lots of time on the problem isn't helpful. Sites dedicated to a more general audience might benefit from some contrast, so their audience understands the problem enough to accept the solution.

Personally, I enjoy delving deeply into problems because I see them not as problems, but as challenges. My goal when I write about negativity isn't to complain, but to make men aware of the patterns involved so they can clear those patterns within themselves and the community around them.

What matters most is the intention. Are you writing about the negativity in the world to enlighten others and change it, or to complain and create a story about why change is impossible?

When Talking About Negativity Is NOT Helpful

Most of the time men focus on negativity, it reflects more about them than the person they're bashing. If a conservative man was to obsessively watch gay porn, blog about gay porn, and talk about gay porn because they "can't stand all those gays having sex" you'd probably assume that they were secretly attracted to men, and just couldn't admit it to anyone including themselves.

Just as there are bloggers obsessed with men's attraction to men, there are bloggers obsessed with men's attraction to women. Several writers devout their entire blog to bashing men who study game and seek to improve their sex lives. They call these men "players," "misogynists," and "rape-apologists" the way a closeted preacher might hurl the word "fag" to cover up his own homosexual attraction.

If you obsessively read sites by players, blog about players, and constantly talk about players because you "can't stand all those players having sex," you're probably secretly attracted to the player lifestyle and and just can't admit it to anyone including yourself.

Likewise, women who constantly blog about rape often have rape fantasies.Women who constantly blog about fat acceptance wish they were pretty and men were attracted to them. And many of the men who constantly blog about feminism wish they had the privileged and attention they believe attractive women command without having to put in the work necessary to achieve it.

All of these men and women blogging about the things they hate could experience many of the privileges they ascribe to the opposite sex if they took the energy they dedicate to complaining about what they don't want and put it into improving themselves and pursuing what they do want. Jealously is a powerful force, but building yourself up is much more rewarding than tearing others down.

Conclusion

The best way to change the world is by focusing on who you truly are and what you truly desire. Use the contrast of every negative experience to point yourself in the direction of what you prefer. Negativity can be a positive force if you treat it as a creative challenge rather than an excuse to avoid change. The process of transforming negativity into positive experiences can be incredibly exciting, if your intention and focus throughout the process is positive.

The 7 Essentials Of Happy Manhood

May 2, 2014 | by Vincent Vinturi | Link | Original Link

1. A Man Needs Adventure

[image]

Man needs adventure like he needs air. It tugs at him from his very core, calling him to go. Go where? Somewhere, anywhere. One of my gals blew my mind one night when she said “you know, we discovered the whole Earth, yet we’re afraid to go anywhere.” How right she is.

Adventure is a powerful catalyst for a man’s growth. It means going into the unknown, unexplored, undiscovered. It is the facing down of danger, uncertainty and unfamiliarity. It is a means of sharpening your awareness, your resourcefulness and your calm under pressure. Adventure grows nerve.

Notice how when you don’t go anywhere for a while, you start to feel bored, stagnant and repetitive. Even an otherwise interesting life can become a mundane routine without an occasional foray into the unknown. Adventure restores your relish for the quotidian and banal. And since life consists mostly of this day-to-day stuff, learning how to enjoy the little things is vital.

Take a trip to somewhere you’ve never been. Go alone. Hitchhike. Couchsurf. Book a ticket to another country and scare the crap out of yourself. You’ll come back home brimming with life and renewed enthusiasm for your life goals. Works every time.

2. A Man Needs A Tribe

Humans are group animals. We have an inherent need to belong to a group of like-minded people and to jockey for status within that group. The higher the status we're able to achieve, the better we feel things are going. There's a primal reward mechanism in our emotional circuitry that sends us feel-good chemicals for ascending to the upper echelon of a worthwhile hierarchy.

Not only that, but a good tribe supports you, encourages you and, equally as importantly, calls you out on your shit. They keep you honest and they keep you hungry. Even if you're an introvert—actually, especially if you're an introvert—you'll never feel whole without earning your place in a strong tribe.

But pick your tribe carefully. If you don't, their pettiness, childishness and complacency will rub off on you. But if you pick well, the bonds you make and the warmth and inspiration of other, similarly driven people will keep you on the straight and narrow of responsible manhood. And you may develop friendships that will last a lifetime.

3. A Man Needs Exercise

A man who doesn't test and strive to surpass his physical limits only really lives half of life. Life is in the body as much as it is in the mind. Your body is the vehicle that navigates the roads of existence. And you can choose to drive through life with a primitive model-T or a badass, tricked out sports car. The choice is yours.

Perhaps the very best form of exercise for a man is heavy lifting. The benefits are innumerable but allow me to enumerate a few anyway. It reduces stress, improves your look, skyrockets libido, reverses aging and imbues you with a ton of confidence. While calisthenics, swimming, yoga, etc., are all fine and good, they simply don't bring about the incredible physiological response that ass-to-the-grass squats, heavy deadlifts and heavy presses do.

Try a few weeks of heavy lifting and you'll quite literally feel like a different man. Give it a few months and you'll be hooked on the feeling. Just ask Arnold:

4. A Man Needs To Know How To Fight

[image]

A man's got to know how to defend himself and those he cares about. If you're burning your candle at both ends and living an exciting life of travel and adventure, chances are good that at some point, some idiot is going to get in your face.

Learning how to fight also entails understanding when not to fight. But when it can't be avoided (or when you just feel like, fuck it, I want to fight) then you can't just stand there and get your ass handed to you. Learn how to throw a punch, an elbow and a knee. Learn how to shoot a double leg and how to choke a fool out. Learn basic headlock defense. Learn something useful.

With Brazilian jiu jitsu, boxing, muay thai and mixed martial arts gyms mushrooming all over the world, there's really no excuse not to at least learn the basics of self-defense. You may never need to use what you learn. But it's better to have the skills and not need them than to need the skills and get the crap kicked out of you (or worse).

5. A Man Needs Women

Men need women. Lots of them. The hotter the better. You can have all of your other ducks in a row but if you can't attract and seduce the kinds of girls you want, you'll never feel complete as a man. And don't let anybody feed you the feel-good B.S. that whether or not you possess this ability, it has no bearing on your worth as a man. It does and everybody knows it. So do something about.

The man who 'gets it' can go basically anywhere in the world, enter into just about any social situation and probably manage to hook up with a cute chick. This is a skill (yes, a skill!) that maybe 1% of all men have taken the pains to refine to a high level. Call it ‘game’, ‘seduction’, or ‘pick up’, this ability to get girls is simply non-negotiable for a man who wants a full life.

When you can fill your days and nights with the company of beautiful, sexy, quality girls, your whole existence will be incredibly rich and colorful. For all the mischief they cause, without women, the life of men would be missing all its juice.

6. A Man Needs Money

God, we’ve been duped so much. Ever hear that “money doesn’t buy happiness”? Well, that’s only semi-true. Money doesn’t buy happiness by itself. I’ve met a lot of miserable men with fat bank rolls. I bet you have too. But it’s rare to meet a broke dude who has the ability to enjoy life the same way that a man with means can.

The idea that you can be broke and happy is a slap in the face to any guy who has ever been truly broke. I’ve gone from relative rags to relative riches twice and I can confirm that the only enjoyable parts of being a bum are the lack of immediate responsibility and the prospect of building a new life the way you picture it.

It’s true that living in your car can satiate the need for adventure. But that excitement soon gives way to the realization that you’ve got to crawl out of a big ass ditch and make something of yourself before life passes you by.

Money isn’t everything but it’s a lot. It gives you the ability to live according to your own terms. It’s not the end but it’s certainly the best means to a lot of your ends, whether it’s traveling, enjoying fine dining, indulging in your hobbies, or what have you.

7. A Man Needs Alignment

Alignment is hard to describe to somebody who hasn't felt it. If you've never tasted sugar, then no matter what I do, I won't be able to convey the taste of it to you. I'd have to force a spoonful of sugar in your mouth for you to comprehend it.

When you're moving in the direction you want, according to your own vision of how you want your life to look, and you're doing everything in your power to make that vision a reality, you'll feel 'aligned'. The methodology to achieve this feeling is really quite simple: you ask yourself "what do I want?" and you do that thing. As a corollary, when you encounter something you don't want to do, then you do not do that thing.

This is a topic I explore in my book, Real Natural Manhood. And it's often misunderstood. You may say "how can you ever achieve anything in life if you avoid doing some things—many things, in fact—that you don't want to do?" This question sounds valid semantically but if you simply try what I'm suggesting, you'll see for yourself just how it works.

What I mean is this: if, for instance, your most burning, overarching desire is to travel, own an online business and chase tail all over the world, then you will do whatever's necessary to make that happen. And you will want to do it, even if you want to do it. If, on the other hand, you become a doctor because your parents guilted you into it, and you married because you were pushed by your church pastor, and had kids because our grandmother kept insisting that you owe her grandkids, then every action you take will have the fragrance of reluctance. It will all be an act.

Supporting somebody else's vision for your life is the saddest kind of waste a man can allow. Martyrdom has no place in the superior man's life. Everything must come from a deep sense of "what do I want?" Then, any sacrifice you make won't be a sacrifice. It won't be some empty martyrdom. It will be a challenge that you welcome because it's on the road to where you want to go. And that's the difference.

The Disturbing Relationship Between Feminism And The Occult

May 3, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

To begin with, I want to share a real-life experience of a friend who was in a “relationship” with an Eastern European girl who dabbled in the occult. To condense his long saga, his girl was your typical “traditional,” “feminine” girl who cooked for him and provided great on-demand sex (often with incapacitating post-orgasm hangovers). Everything seemed “perfect” between them for six months or so, but all along this time, little did he know that she was a closet “witch” who was casting “love” spells on him “to bind” him to her.

Succubus, witch, and “girlfriend”— all in one. He later discovered that he’d gotten more than what he had bargained for.

A spell gone horribly wrong

Gradually, things got predictable and boring as the relationship progressed and the passion faded. Her subtle, capricious demands soon became overt domination, which prompted him to seek an immediate closure to the relationship. This triggered the worst in her.

Hell hath no fury as a witch scorned

He then proceeded to have a harrowing time. He shared how he discovered she was stashing used condoms with his dried semen, shaved hair and pictures for her occult experiments to “bind” him before he finally kicked her out of his home. Not to mention she had even tried to “hex” his food to complete the binding on him.

Things then turned very ugly, with her first trying to stalk him (after he kicked her out), then psychologically intimidating him, and when all that failed—she tried to screw up his social and professional reputation however she could.

He was strong enough to resist her attacks, but his relationship was a compelling enough inspiration to learn about the occult, and to discover the common ideology it shares with feminism. Since readers may or may not believe in the paranormal, the point deduced from this story which will be primarily focused upon below is the surprising link between feminism and the occult.

The first revolt against patriarchy

The glorification of the female form, beginning with Lilith, the supposed first wife of Adam (who disobeyed him and is considered to be the first “feminist”) is an integral part of the occult, unlike in the patriarchal Abrahamic religions.

According to occult belief, Lilith was Adam's first wife, the archetype feminist that every man marries and then divorces. She constantly argued with Adam and refused to lie under him during copulation by saying they were "equal."A text of the "Story Of Lilith" can be read here. Her refusal to submit to Adam is said to be the first revolt against patriarchy.

Occult and feminism in the modern world

Feminism has its roots in the occult and witchcraft. A point well established by Mitch Horowitz, author of "Occult America" .

Modern progressive feminist society has in many ways become a covert, occult-driven society. Reverence for the "Goddess" or "Divine Feminine" (a concept common to witchcraft, feminism, liberalism), beginning with the rise of the "Goddess movement" in Anglo countries and coinciding with second-wave feminism in the 70's, has become more prevalent in the present day. A resultant product of five decades of feminism and its associated spirituality (occult).

Today, we're bombarded day in day out, everywhere by occult symbolism through media. Just type "occult symbolism" in any search engine on the web and see the results for yourself.

Blue-pill (beta) culture, which typically romanticizes the concept of an ideal, sentimentalized love, has all its roots in the occult, as seen with the recent increasing consumerism of romantic occult-themed cinema by modern societies, especially by the younger generation.

Most female occultists of the past and present held the belief of the psychological superiority of women as compared to that of men. Similarly, masquerading as a movement for women's rights, feminism—as a cruel ruse—tells women their natural biological instincts are "socially constructed" to oppress them.

Feminism's social engineering, designed to destroy gender identity by interchanging gender roles, is actually a movement for women to covertly promote a hatred for men, as well as indirectly serving as a driving force for the occult (or its concepts), for they both often share a common ideology.

Feminism's mission to give any woman however worthless and undeserving she may be the power to lead men like bridled horses or yoked oxen whichever, whenever, and however she wants to is analogous to the witch who'd supposedly "control" a man to do her bidding, through "magical" manipulation.

Connecting the lines from the dots

Is it a mere coincidence that the repeal of the Witchcraft Act in the UK in 1951, coupled with a revival of occult/witchcraft coincided with the rise of feminism? To illustrate this question further, an excerpt from an article which came out a few years back (you can read the article in full here):

> "Why has witchcraft gained such a hold in our Christian-based society? Certainly there are several factors. Many witches are fervent feminists. This is probably the main contributing factor to the rapid growth of the movement. Following ancient > rituals faithfully, the Wiccan religion is female-dominant—the high priestess leads the ritual ceremonies. The fertility goddess always receives the primary worship. Wicca is tailor-made for women who desire power and authority over men. True Christianity is solidly patriarchal. This fact grinds away at feminist philosophy. Feminists who have not been able to successfully change Christian teachings to their own liking have embraced Wicca."

Another article that came out last year shows how witchcraft and the occult is actually growing at a rapid rate more than any other faith in the Anglo sphere. Considering these trends of revival of witchcraft in the West, the Anglo sphere seems more or less likely to be significantly paganized by the end of this century, especially with more and more feminism-bred women choosing it as a "spiritual" path.

Witchcraft around the world

After "registering" its first legal witch, Romania, the famed land of Dracula, became the first country to legalize (and tax) witchcraft as a profession in 2011 (a likely possibility sooner or later in the West, considering current trends).

In Russia and other parts of Slavic Europe (with a long-etched history of witchcraft), occult-beliefs are still prevalent. A lot of modern, educated women still practice witchcraft (usually "love magic") covertly—or if not, still believe in it.

The WHO estimated that there were more witches and sorcerers in Russia than practicing doctors in an article which was published four years ago. You could read about a visitor's journey into the heart of occult in modern day Russia; another article about the revival of occult in modern Russia; and another interesting article about the occult roots of the Russian Revolution. However, Russia seems to be taking proactive action in recent times to crackdown on witchcraft while promoting a reversion to Orthodox Christianity and patriarchal values. Other parts of Europe have seen a recent rise in occult practices, possibly due to occult glorification through media, and these rising trends are also seen in some parts of Asia and Middle East.

In matriarchal societies in Africa, witchcraft has always been practiced since ancient times. Africa faces a similar problem as seen in Russia: more witch doctors than real doctors. A lot of women still use "love spells" and "potions" to bind or control their men, and a lot more people rely on witch doctors to physically heal themselves.

What does the future hold?

The conspicuous correlation is the one between feminism and the occult in places where both are on the rise. It's often said that ignorance is bliss, but knowledge is power. It's the power of this knowledge and awareness about the link between feminism and the occult that every man should arm himself with so that he stays away from those women who share occult sympathies. As my friend learned the hard way, the risk isn't worth it.

Can Spirituality Or Metaphysics Help Us Become Free From Fear?

May 3, 2014 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

One characteristic of a masculine man is the quality of fearlessness. What does this mean exactly, and how does one attain such a quality? Fearlessness does not mean being stupid or reckless. It doesn't mean trying to walk across a busy freeway with the excuse "I am fearless". Retarded reality TV shows nowadays try to paint fearlessness as being a reckless moron.

In the ultimate sense, the fear of death is the greatest fear. If we can overcome that fear, then naturally we will be able to conquer all lesser fears. There is a reason why Tyler Durden told his friend in Fight Club that he needs to give up the fear of death because by doing so, he would be free to do anything.

> "Expose yourself to your deepest fear; after that, fear has no power, and the fear of freedom shrinks and vanishes. You are free."
> — Jim Morrison

This is turn brings us to the question of, what is the self. The fear of death is the fear that our individual selves will cease, our individual consciousness will cease into nothingness. Although science has not yet proven that there is a soul, there have been hundreds if not thousands of books written about near death experiences, that any unbiased person will accept that our consciousness lives on in an astral body after the death of the physical body.

> If you are not afraid of dying, there is nothing you cannot achieve.
> -Lao Tzu

Unfortunately, Eastern religions and new age spirituality, in the West at least, is plagued and infected mostly with beta types of men as well as liberal feminist women. But these eastern religions like Hinduism or Buddhism are not liberal at their root. You can go to Asia or India and see for yourself—Hindus and Buddhists are conservative people. It is unfortunate that so many men who subscribe to eastern spirituality in the West are manginas because this turns off masculine men from such philosophies.

I've found the most success personally by avoiding organized religious groups and just studying eastern philosophy books by myself, and thus I'm able to avoid the liberal interpretation that most Westerners apply to such philosophies. Wherever there is an organization of any kind, there will always be women, and thus such organizations will always be a watered down version of the truth, if not promoting outright falsehoods.

The ancient books of the East such as The Teachings of the Buddha, the Tao Ching, the Bhagavad-Gita, and the Vedas help us overcome fear by reminding us the truth about how transient life really is, how insignificant we truly are. Fear is primarily a function of the ego and these ancient scriptures and books shatter our ego by teaching us that we are basically just a grain of sand in a massive universe. Even if one conquers the entire world, they'll be forgotten within a few thousand years. That's not to say that we should not try to become men of greatness but to achieve that first we have to achieve greatness within.

Spirituality can also help us develop a mood of detachment. By reminding us of how insignificant our existence really is, we can cultivate a mood of detachment and aloofness. With such a mood of detachment, one no longer takes everything so personally because one is trying to not identify with their own ego anymore. Having a mood of detachment and aloofness will help you in most areas of your life as well.

Power comes from within. This is the masculine propensity. The female propensity, on the other hand, is that they want to be GIVEN power by someone else. And that is where eastern spirituality and metaphysics can help us. They guide us to conquer the self, and then you are truly capable of doing anything. That is basically what enlightenment is. In the days of old, such noble goals like the attainment of enlightenment was followed by many men and this produced men of noble quality. Men found strength from within, instead of trying to get validation from the external world.

A Primer On The Sex War Between Men And Women

May 4, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

No day is safe from news of you

Walking about in Africa maybe, thinking of me

The Rival, Slyvia Plath

In 2014, relations between men and women are little more than a smoldering, ashen trainwreck of a failed social experiment. What began as an unhealthy society has slipped and skidded down a mine shaft of sheer insanity. As much physical harm and frothing vitriol second-wave feminism has engendered, the roots of sexual disaffection between men and women can be carefully traced from the inception of America to the modern day and involves far more than feminism.

America was birthed at the hands of a subset of Christians known as Puritans. Seeking to escape theistic persecution in England, they crossed the Atlantic and settled in what is now Massachusetts. The Puritans were by all accounts a hardy, self-reliant and stoic group of men and women. However, history remembers them as an extremely rigid society based out of extreme psychological repression, using deep religiosity as a mask for dark impulses lurking underneath the veneer of social propriety. This repression is often well-represented by religious movements and similar left-wing movements such as feminism and Atheism+. However, this puritanical repression is clinically known as obsessive-compulsive personality disorder.

OCPD, at its beating heart, is based out of a fear of internal chaos. Instead of mastering all the anti-social impulses that any human has in their life, they run away from them, burying those impulses as deep as they can with work, perfectionism and, often, religion. Like I previously observed, these people are hard-working folk, reliable and usually upstanding citizens of their respective communities. However, this behavior is resultant of repressing fear, anger and other anti-social feelings. They place a preeminent importance on adherence to the rules of society, as their precarious identities hinge on rigidly adhering to them. They love punishment, abhor rehabilitation and generally seek to avoid “sinning” so they can feel free to judge others in the first instance.

This is the psychological posture of early America. Americans saw the expansive wilderness filled with foreign people as the physical manifestation of their internal conflict: that civilizing the rest of the world is up to them – they will set up a society with rigid rules that will ensure nobody sins and everybody lives life in strict accordance with their distinct flavor of Christian doctrine. They saw both a terrifying world teeming with unpredictable forces but also a righteous challenge. Thus, they set out to create their “Shining City On A Hill.”

While the nastiest manifestations of this were manifest in the Salem Witch Trials, slowly but surely this mindset began to weaken. As America grew and expanded from a predominately agrarian one into an increasingly urban one, the ruling elites pondered and enacted sweeping changes to society that would ultimately lead to the complete degeneration of sex relations.

Traditionally, the transmission of culture, religion and socialization of a child was done by families. Men would have their growing boys toil alongside them mending fences and tending to fields, girls would churn butter with their mothers and learn to sew and cook. Ignore the odiously ignorant painting of sex relations by feminists: in this setup of rigid sex roles, America was most peaceful.

This social setup was tolerable and peaceful enough primarily because of the palliative effects of marriage and chivalry. When men and women engage each other most as sexual partners, tasked with the sacred duty of raising children and preserving the marriage bond, society is stable. However, when men and women engage each other as economic, social and political rivals, the necessarily fragile and intricate relations between men and women fray. However, it isn't just the primacy of marriage bonds between the sexes, but also chivalry.

Chivalry, as a concept, exists in every society in the world. It often takes many different forms, complete with different social roles and conventions, but it is always based on a sex-based duty of men to women. To the trained eye, it is borne out of sex-based paternalism, but the feminist analysis leaves out 50% of the equation: the concept of female privilege.

American chivalry exalted the woman as a mother and a wife, her virginity prized more than any other aspect of her personhood. Yes, youth, looks and feminine domesticity were important, but the deep repression of sexuality catapulted the value of a woman's hymen to stratospheric proportions. Women were regarded as superior caretakers of homesteads, caretakers of youth and better curators of civilized communities. Women enjoyed primacy as men's moral superiors, while men claimed to be women's intellectual and political superiors. Whether this is true or not is irrelevant, as this simply was the mindset of America.

The adoring valuation of women as ladies had a dark counterpart in the ruthless devaluation of women who refused to conform to said norms. When women complained of violence towards them as women who refused to conform to the prevailing sex roles, they weren't actually talking about actual violence, they were talking about the brutal repression of sexuality in America. They could sense the repressed violence that men wanted to act out, but the surprise and revulsion against actual acts confirms they implicitly understand it will not be acted out.

Still, the greatest supporters of this social system was other women. Women having sex outside a martial contract with God and engaging in acts like drinking publicly or refusing marriage outright was supremely offensive to the average American female. The fear they wanted those things too drove women to be the harshest enforcers of this social order. To this day, man don't need to lift one finger or send a Tweet at a woman, this social order is completely upheld and enforced by other women.

However, this social contract is based out the family and local community being the primary or sole curators of this social order. Starting in the Gilded Era, the ruling liberal elites, looking to dismantle what they perceived as the inherent backwardness of the self-dealing family and primacy of religion over education, began to toy with ways of dismantling what they would eventual label "Christian patriarchy." This was never done with the best interests of the lower classes at heart: it was based out of finding ways of exploiting the lower classes so they could better fit with progressive desires for society. They first targeted blacks, Irish and Italian folk as needing remedial assistance to shore up what they perceived as deficient cultural practices.

Relying on ethnic and class prejudice, they convinced the public that these people needed an expanded educational system that did more than teach reading, writing and arithmetic—with one that educated the whole person. They created the juvenile justice system, relying on extreme cases of bad parenting to slowly bring children as a class primarily under the care of the state instead of the parents. Liberal elites in emerging fields like psychiatry and sociology began to expound theories of how the state and private experts could better teach children and educate parents on the art of parenting. The rapidly expanding scope of government and corporate power coincided with expanding urban areas.

Eventually, they brought every class in America under the tutelage and purview of learned elites and technocrats and used the criminal justice system, family services and educational system to disempower parents. Instead of parents shielding children from the crushing power of the state, children were shielded from the love of parents. Liberal elites may have been exploitative and possessed a critical level of prudence, but they were not unintelligent. As early as the 1910's, they began to notice that their reforms were not having a positive effect, but were simultaneously creating great levels of anxiety in parents that resulted in children with great levels of anxiety. Freud penned his essay "On Narcissism" in 1914, as he noted shifts in the psyche of patients who presented themselves at his practice; by 1976 Sheldon Bach observed:

You used to see people coming in with hand-washing compulsions, phobias and familiar neuroses…now you mostly see narcissists.

The absolute degradation of the American family at the hands of liberals had a predictable effect on women: they were the first to reject marriage. "New Women" in the Gilded Age rejected motherhood and marriage, flappers in the 1920's flaunted their curves in public and would shamelessly flirt with men in public. The carefully proscribed relations between men and women had begun to crumble as the state and elites began to pick away at an institution they did not understand. As women became worse mothers and fathers worked away from home at factories or as businessmen, the American woman justifiably became terrified of motherhood and wifehood, as she could not draw on positive experiences of her mother as a youth. These weakened links between love, marriage and childrearing birthed the "Sexual Revolution." Women sought to extricate themselves from the bondage of commitment and children.

Yet, that is only half the picture. As chivalry began its slow death, the curtains were raised on the resentment between men and women. Women resented being placed on the pedestal of masculine adoration. They resented the rigidity of sex roles based not on the needs of men and women, but on the sick repression of anti-sociality, specifically male anti-social behavior. This class resentment was exploited for economic gain by corporations and government.For example, marketers shamelessly targeted flappers in the 1920's to smoke cigarettes, framing it as liberating from male influence. It was further exploited for economic gain as women were eventually turned into tax-paying capitalists, with elites hijacking second-wave feminism. The uncontrollable rage of those feminists—ironically highlighting the worst stereotypes of women as shrewish victims—was sublimated by corporations and the elites and shunted women into roles of wage-earners. Why work with a man as a wife when you can work for The Man?

The combination of women pursuing what amounted to middle-class wages and rejecting the framework of marriage and love based on socially destroyed notions of chivalry, men and women were brought into direct class conflict. Conflict in the workplace, in bars and clubs and in the shams of relationships they would be compelled by human biology and psychology to form. The ratcheting up of demands by women on men highlighted the emergent narcissism: the ridiculously heightened expectations of the opposite sex while leaving space to blame men for their failings to meet their standards. What was once the gingerly tended to sex roles based on mutual dependence, chivalry and primacy of the family was drug down the rabbit hole into sexual Hell of social narcissism.

The tenuous but stable fiction of American sex relations was eventually exposed as a fiction. Not a fiction of biology, but psychology. The unraveling of relations between men and women were heralded by progressive elites, only to see it turn from sexual rancor into pure, blind rage. The fumbling attempts to put the sexual Humpty Dumpty back onto the wall of mutual dependence, chivalry and sex roles was embodied by the consequent actions of liberals to try to turn the twisted trainwreck of sex relations into more than what it would become.

In the movie Beetlejuice, the character of Otho finds a book called The Handbook For The Recently Deceased. By finding this, he confirms his suspicions that the house is haunted and he can profit from it. He skims through the book, finding out a way to summon the ghosts of a house, involving the procuring of the garments that the two married people wore to their wedding. He thinks he has hit the money jackpot, as he thinks he can reliably sell the house as being haunted. What Otho and the erstwhile investors don't know is that through Otho is really performing an exorcism; his fiscal lust and arrogance have blinded him from realizing that.

He lays out the deceased woman's wedding dress and the man's tuxedo on the lengthy dining room table. He brings prospective investors to the haunted house round the table, with them clasping hands as they all channel their energy into the summoning. Otho beams with pride as the bride's white dress is filled with the corporeal form of the dead wife; the eyes of the potential investors sparkle as the tuxedo of the dead husband is filled with the form of a man.

The pride and bedazzlement is short lived, as the two star-crossed lovers age quickly and badly. They quickly grasp their hands together, looking into each other's eyes, searching for a love that is soon to die. The youthful pull of their hands turns to the brittle grasp of aging fingers, the firmness of their original grasp turning to dust scattering about on the table. They reach out to each other's faces, his ossifying hand embracing the line of her jaw before disintegrating into nothingness. Their eyes gaze longingly at each, as the rapidly increasing chasm of reality separates the two.

The investors, formerly stunned and impressed, begin to demand that Otho right this situation. Otho hurriedly flips through the manual. He realizes that he has no idea what he has wrought. He was so preoccupied with what he thought was simultaneously so self-evident and fiscally appropriate that he ignored all else. As he impotently flicks through the book, all he has to say to his most important investor is:

It's too late, Charles. I'm sorry.

This scene from Beetlejuice is an allegory for what relations between men and women have become. What started with a sense of duty and love towards the other sex became a sex war started by elites who viewed sex relations as something to be used for pecuniary gain. It was based out of ignorance of human psychology that prioritized not just fiscal gain, but illusions of social progression. Elites watched as their subjects became objects who shrunk from one another. Endeavors to ameliorate the situation by definition could not work because the framework embodied by the situation needed to be jettisoned, not engaged in. They locked themselves into a situation which necessarily lead to the destruction of the prevailing social fabric.

In their ignorance of humanity and puritanical psychology, they pushed across America's Rubicon. They pushed into territories where no man should deign to go. Intelligence often devolves into arrogance and, as Otho did, American liberals thought they knew more than they did. They bit off a mighty powerful bit of psychology, only to find a Cujo-like beast behind it that was no match for any salve they could toss at it.

The space that sexual puritanism occupied—along with its concurrent approaches of mutual dependency, chivalry and sex roles—was blasted apart and replaced with nothing that could defend against what lay beneath. All that was left was pure exploitation of the wasteland that developed.

And, maybe, an apology.

An apology that could never amount to more than the mindless flicking through of a discredited Bible. An apology that could never be sincere. An apology that could only truly lie to itself about what it means.

Don’t Let Women Rule Your Life

May 4, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Before you dismiss this article and conclude that it doesn’t apply to you, keep reading—it applies to all of us.

I won’t be hating on women either, so if you clicked in hoping for female bashing, you won’t find it here. I’m writing this article to caution you, and to remind myself, against the dangers of depending on women for validation.

You must be cautious and avoid falling into the trap of allowing women to rule your life. This doesn’t only mean to avoid taking orders from your wife and not be her bitch. No, men allow women to drive them crazy and control their thoughts via many other means as well. Below are the most common.

1. The Crush

This is the typical trap that men who haven't taken the red pill fall into. They live in a fairy tale world where they endlessly search for the one.

One day they notice a sweetheart at work, or meet a friend of a friend, and they fall in love. They start to dream of going on adventures with this girl. They start to picture their wedding and fantasize about raising kids together. She's perfect, they think. They haven't even flirted with the girl, yet her presence has already established complete control over their mind.

If this is you, realize that you're investing time and energy into someone who's done nothing to deserve it. Ask her out and begin to date her or get rejected. Either way you can move one with life.

2. The Girlfriend or Wife

Everybody has a friend who pussy-whipped. He barely hangs out with the boys. Worse yet, he spends all of his free time with his girlfriend or wife.

There’s nothing inherently wrong with having a girlfriend or being married. There is something wrong, however, with ceasing to cultivate your own personal growth and any other relationships because you have a partner. You must realize that you can only depend on yourself in the long run. If you fail to dedicate time to improving your mind, body, and career you’ll pay for it in the long run.

If this is you, schedule time into your week to spend working on yourself, whether this means hitting the gym or just reading in peace. Also, don’t forget your male friends.

3. The Ex

Putting your ex on a pedestal is a trap that’s all too easy to fall into, even when you didn’t do so before or during your time together.

If you had a good relationship, then you undoubtedly shared a number of memorable experiences. It’s normal to romanticize the best parts of the journey, and forget the forgettable parts. This often cultivates a weak mindset, where you believe you may never find another girl as good as your ex and subsequently fall into a depressed state. In other words, the memories of your ex dominate your thoughts and establish control over you.

If this is you, the remedy is twofold. One, you must meet and date other women to alter the false sense of reality you’re beginning to develop. Two, you must take advantage of your newfound free time and use it to read and refocus on your own personal goals and development.

4. A Lack of Women

The symptoms of this are strikingly similar to that of the crush. This is the man who hasn't been laid in years.

Sometimes this causes him to forego the possibility of meeting women and altogether accepting defeat. This is bad. What's worse is if he dreams of women but fails to act on it. Either way, women, or a lack thereof, have stained this man's life. His fear and lack of confidence have built a wall around him, limiting his own self-worth as a man.

If this is you, you simply must approach women and go after what you want. You can't let your current state of scarcity dictate your future with women.

5. An Abundance of Women

This is the player who puts all of his time towards bedding new women. It sounds great, and it is great on some level. But there's a grave danger.

If approaching, dating, and banging is all you ever think about, you're at risk of losing sight of your own best interests. Your life is full of women, yes. Your life also revolves around them. They've gained complete control over your thoughts and your actions.

If this is you, allow yourself to take scheduled breaks and evaluate non-women related goals, such as things related to career, fitness, or travel.

Why Declining Fertility Rates Are Not A Good Thing

May 5, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Fertility decline has been an ongoing trend in the western world. This fact has delighted many westerners, as a recent NYTimes OP-Ed helps to illustrate. In the article entitled "Bye Bye, Baby", authors Michael S. Teitelbaum and Jay M. Winter tout the benefits of population decline. I wanted to take the time to respond to the op-ed and, in doing so, hopefully bring to light some of the pitfalls of the anti-natalist perspectives so many in the west have taken in their rush to welcome population decline:

> NEARLY half of all people now live in countries where women, on average, give birth to fewer than 2.1 babies — the number generally required to replace both parents — over their lifetimes. This is true in Melbourne and Moscow, São Paulo and Seoul, Tehran and Tokyo. It is not limited to the West, or to rich countries; it is happening in places as diverse as Armenia, Bhutan, El Salvador, Poland and Qatar.

Indeed, sub-replacement fertility has spread across the planet. A quick check of statistics indicates that 115 countries (out of the 224 for which fertility rates were estimated) maintain fertility rates south of 2.1.

Though this sub-replacement fertility trend is not limited to wealthy western nations, it is certainly most prevalent in them. The only wealthy western nation with a recorded fertility rate north of 2.1 is Israel. The list of nations below that threshold is dominated by advanced East Asian and European states.

> In reality, slower population growth creates enormous possibilities for human flourishing. In an era of irreversible climate change and the lingering threat from nuclear weapons, it is simply not the case that population equals power, as so many leaders have believed throughout history. Lower fertility isn't entirely a function of rising prosperity and secularism; it is nearly universal.

The authors are not entirely incorrect here. Slower population growth does create enormous possibility for other forms of progress. Demographers and economists have long been well aware of this reality and have even gone as far to coin a term for it: the demographic dividend.

What is the demographic dividend? The term refers to the short-term benefits nations get due to sudden declines in fertility rates (fewer children being born to each woman). These declines create a positive effect because they work to reduce the dependency ratio, which measures the ratio of dependents (children and older individuals of retirement age) against the number of productive workers (generally citizens in the 18-59 age range). When high fertility rates begin a sudden decline, the number of dependents (children in this case) goes down relative to the number of productive, working age citizens.

This is good at first, because suddenly you’re left with unusually large masses of working age people (products of the last high fertility generation that had many children) who are themselves having few children (thus leading to fewer dependents). Because they are not having as many children as their parents did and are therefore devoting less of their time, resources and energy to family formation, they can be highly productive and spend more. This oversupply of working-age labor relative to dependents can do wonders for economic growth. China’s remarkable run of economic progress over the course of the last several decades has largely been due to this.

This demographic dividend is great… for a while. The problem is that eventually that unusually large mass of working age citizens begins to age and leave the working age demographic. Their productivity declines, and in time they become dependents themselves. The fact that they had few children now begins to work against them, as there are not enough working age citizens to pick up the slack and maintain the productivity they once had.

As a result of this, the dependency ratio climbs back up again. Productivity declines, economic growth stalls, and other issues (e.g. high social welfare expenditures, higher costs of labor, low tax revenues, etc) creep up.

China was able to take advantage of the demographic dividend for the past 40-50 years. That dividend is about to run out, and it may do so before China is able to catch the west's level of economic prosperity. This means that China may be forced to face the same severe demographic issues that the west is facing without the benefit of having achieved western wealth and prosperity. The same potential pitfall faces Brazil and other nations that have seen fertility declines and are beginning to take (or try to take) advantage of the demographic dividend.

It is one thing to talk about the “enormous possibilities” created by population aging and decline, but to do so without a serious consideration of the price that must be paid is to be rather disingenuous. Population decline almost certainly has the potential to create more problems than it solves, especially for nations that do not have western levels of affluence.

Since the authors are celebrating the rise of sub-replacement fertility in some relatively poor, non-western nations, let’s explore that angle a bit more with a comparison. We’ll consider two countries with sub-replacement fertility: Armenia and Canada.

Both have very low fertility rates of around 1.6 children per woman. Both must confront the problems associated with this reality: decreased labor supply, higher labor costs, high entitlement and social welfare expenses, decreased tax revenue and so on. Which of these nations is better equipped to deal with these issues?

Canada is a very wealthy nation by global standards and is well known as such. Many people are anxious to emigrate to Canada, and Canadians are therefore fortunate enough to be able to supplement their labor force with educated migrants from poorer nations across the globe. Though this creates its fair share of issues, it does have the benefit of allowing Canada to fairly easily mitigate the costs associated with the low fertility of its domestic population that could otherwise have the potential to severely cripple the Canadian economy. Canada's wealth also allows it to do all of this while still sustaining many of the social services its people have come to rely on and consider essential to the well-being of the citizenry. This affluence gives the Canadians more room for error when decreased tax revenues and other pitfalls associated with declining fertility appear.

But what of Armenia?

Armenia is not a wealthy country and cannot count on a steady supply of talented foreign migrants anxious to make it home. Many will say that this is a good thing, but that reality also limits Armenia's ability to deal with the increased labor costs, decreased labor supply, lower tax revenue and higher social expenditures associated with its below replacement fertility rate. The fact that many of Armenia's best and brightest young people (the kind of people the nation would need in order to have any hope of making any significant socio-economic improvement) are migrating to nations like Canada and the UK only further complicates matters by exacerbating the issues described above relating to the labor supply.

For wealthy nations like Canada, sub-replacement fertility and population aging are smaller issues than they could be. The most serious and potentially devastating impacts of population decline are mitigated in these nations by their affluence and their ability to draw on more fecund global population pools to offset their domestic demographic declines. For nations like Armenia, however, sub-replacement fertility represents a vastly more dangerous prospect. The phenomenon creates substantial problems that these nations are often ill-equipped to deal with, especially when combined with high rates of migration of their best and brightest to nations like Canada (who, again, count on the arrival of said talent to offset their own demographic issues).

Sub-replacement fertility can represent an insurmountable roadblock for nations like Armenia on the path to western levels of prosperity: they may have a shot at benefiting from short-term demographic dividends, but they do not come anywhere near western levels of wealth as a result of said trends (read: they get old before they get rich) and when the window for the dividend ends and dependency ratios creep back up (halting economic growth), they are left stagnant and unable to close the still massive socio-economic gap between themselves and the western nations they hope to emulate.

Is it responsible to promote the spread of sub-replacement fertility in nations that are really not prepared to deal with the consequences that may come with it and could potentially be doomed to eternal socio-economic inferiority by it?

> Rapidly declining fertility — especially if rates go very low — does pose challenges. Yet it also can provide substantial benefits that have received less attention.
> First, as noted, fertility decline is associated nearly everywhere with greater rights and opportunities for women. The deferral of marriage and the reduction of births to two, one or none across so much of the world — and, again, in countries that are still far from rich — are broadly consistent with the higher educational attainment and career aspirations of young women. It is no surprise that the hand-wringers over fertility decline are usually men.

These authors do themselves no favors in the credibility department by equating legitimate concerns about sub-replacement fertility to useless, irrational misogyny. The fact is that sub-replacement fertility is an issue. A society in which the reduction of births declines to “one or none” is not a sustainable one. That’s not misogyny, it is fact.

There is also another issue touched on here, one that a couple of users in the article's comments section astutely pointed out:

> Also of interest is quality of childraising. What portion of declining fertility is from single parent households, parents of poverty, parents of low educational attainment and parents of substance abuse.
> Lower fertility is not a problem if the children are properly raised. But if they are not, we are setting up a long term problem.

> Generally lower birthrates are correlated with higher education, higher earning and generally a better quality of life. Upscale, if you will. The implications of this study appear to be that the burden of the educated and affluent, in terms of support of the poor, development of technology and advancement of the human condition in general, will increasingly fall to a smaller and smaller group.
> This is good why, again?

This is an issue that again raises questions about the sustainability and positivity of sub-replacement fertility as a norm in many parts of the world. As the authors of the article noted, lower fertility is correlated with higher education. The better educated and professionally successful women are, the fewer children they have. Is this a good thing?

Think carefully about who we want raising our children: those with higher levels of education and more professional success (and the financial resources that come with that) are generally considered to be more ideal providers of homes for children than those with low levels of education, limited finances and limited professional success. When we think of an ideal environment for children to come up in, we imagine one in which they will have the benefit of growing up with the wisdom and knowledge of well educated, informed parents to guide them and the resources to enjoy all that they'll need to be successful (money for youth sports, summer camps, quality education, a safe neighborhood, etc). It is the educated woman that is most capable of providing all of this, and yet we see here that it is these women (and their equally well-educated partners) who are in fact having the fewest children.

Is it responsible to promote the spread of sub-replacement fertility if we understand that it will lead to fewer children being born to those who we consider most capable of proper childrearing? Do we want to outsource an increasingly larger share of our childrearing efforts to those who may lack the education and financial resources to do it properly? Keep in mind that this increasing separation of high education and professional achievement from fertility (which, as the authors note, is a natural result of the growing sub-replacement fertility trend) may well create future generations that are less well-adjusted and less well provisioned on average as they grow into adulthood, and perhaps less able to make the great technological and social advances we will need to make in the future in order to create a greener, safer, more equitable world.

Are those who cheer for sub-replacement fertility alright with this outcome? The concept of an “Idiocracy” seemed like a mere satirical comedy at one point, but we could very well be heading in precisely that direction if caution is not taken.

> Third, by enhancing the employment and career experiences of young adults, lower fertility can also bring about greater social and political stability. High-fertility societies commonly produce large numbers of young adults who have trouble finding productive employment — many experts have attributed everything from terrorism to the Arab Spring to this “youthquake” of disaffected young adults in the Middle East and North Africa — but this begins to change 20 to 30 years after fertility rates start to decline.
> By then, young adults are no longer in great surplus relative to labor market demand; their relative economic value for employers begins to rise and their economic and career prospects improve. Over time, this should facilitate marriage and family formation.

And what if those young adults are being forced to support a much larger older generation above them? The authors are quite right to note the dangers of "youthquakes", but they again neglect to note the side effects of the solution they promote. When the supply of young adults relative to labor dries up, it is usually accompanied by a massive increase in the number of dependents. These dependents are expensive, and it is the relatively small generation of young adults that will be called on to support them.

Wealthy nations can soften this blow a bit by importing intelligent young people from elsewhere, but even then the price must be paid. For poorer nations, the consequences are far more severe.

The comments on the NYTimes Op-Ed are even more optimistic about the prospects of declining fertility:

> I am not an economist, but given that in so many countries we have been unable for years to employ everyone who is already here and needs employment, and that possibly the gravest problem humanity faces is the overconsumption of resources and overproduction of toxic waste products that are destroying our world — I'd say that a falling human population is the best news I've heard in some time.
> In fact, despite falling fertility rates, the increasing population is something we should still be worried about. Due to population momentum, the population is going to continue to grow by more than a billion people, and that is a problem because of global warming – the earth's resources are not infinite. Even though fertility rates are declining almost everywhere, there is still a large unmet need > for contraception in the remaining countries with high birthrates such as Niger. Those who care about the health of the planet and its people should celebrate falling birthrates, and hope that the human population peaks soon.

These comments indicate where much of the enthusiasm for population decline comes from: the belief that it will save the planet. This belief is based on the assumption that smaller populations with lower fertility rates do better by planet Earth than larger, more fertile populaces.

The problem here is that there is no strong evidence of such a correlation between population size (or growth) and environmental harm. The nations that pollute the most, consume the most and contribute the most to global greenhouse gas emissions are not the largest or most fertile. They are usually the relatively small, relatively infertile nations of the affluent west. Wealthy western Canadians and Australians are not particularly numerous and do not tend to be particularly fecund, but they have more cars, buy more things, travel more often, eat (and waste) more food and use more electricity than their peers in places like Mozambique, Ghana, Uganda or Yemen.

> Looking at a country's total carbon emissions doesn't tell the full story of a country's contribution to global warming.
> China, for example, is the world "leader" in total emissions (6018m metric tonnes of carbon dioxide) since it overtook the US (5903) in 2007. But all that really tells you is that China is a fast-developing country with a lot of people.
> A more useful measurement is carbon emissions per capita (person). Under that measurement, the average American is responsible for 19.8 tonnes per person, and the average Chinese citizen clocks in at 4.6 tonnes.

> Examining CO2 per capita around the world also shows us the gulf between the developed world's responsibility for climate change and that of the developing world. While Australia is on 20.6 tonnes per person (partly because of its reliance on CO2-intensive coal) and the UK is half that at 9.7 (explained in part by relatively CO2-light gas power stations), India is on a mere 1.2. Poorer African nations such as Kenya are on an order magnitude less again – the average Kenyan has a footprint of just 0.3 tonnes (a figure that's likely to drop even lower with the country's surge in wind power).

This is why it is folly to assume that one can save the planet by merely decreasing the number of humans on it. You can't assume that a smaller number of people are going to consume or pollute less.

Everyone is very quick to acknowledge the downsides of population growth, but they're much slower to recognize the equally acute danger posed by rapid aging and decline. There could be a heavy price paid for that ignorance if we are not cautious.

Is Progress Real?

May 5, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The Roman writer Aulus Gellius relates an amusing story in his book Attic Nights (Noctes Atticae, IX.4). Returning from Greece to Italy and stopping at the port of Brundisium, he decided to visit the local market and see what was available for sale. Finding some bundles of old books by eminent Greek authors, and attracted by "their extraordinary and unexpected cheapness", he purchased them with relish. His enthusiasm was short-lived. After examining them on two successive nights, he found them to be filled with childish fables, incredibilities, and myths masquerading as fact. The authors assured readers, for example, that the Scythians consumed human flesh; that cyclopses existed in northern Europe; and that a race of men could be found whose feet were turned backward.

Gellius was further chagrined to find an apparently learned writer claiming that some Illyrians possessed two pupils in each eye and could kill a man by glaring at him; and that "in the mountains of the land of India there are men who have the heads of dogs, and bark, and that they feed upon birds and wild animals." He notes that his own countryman, Pliny the Elder, had occasionally related similar nonsense in his monumental

Natual History (Historia Naturalis). Reaching the limit of his endurance, Gellius says: "These and many other stories of the kind I read; but when writing them down, I was seized with disgust for such worthless writings, which contribute nothing to the enrichment or profit of life."

His contempt was understandable. But perhaps Gellius was a bit too hard on Pliny and the other clueless scribblers. Man's knowledge of the world was more limited than what we know today. He forgot that those writers did the best they could with the information available to them at the time. It is not that his predecessors were stupid. It was just that they did not have the benefit of reliable travel reports, scientific instruments, and consistent ways to disseminate knowledge. No doubt our remote descendants will laugh at our own pitiful ignorance of the solar system and its mysteries. I hope that, as they smile over our own printed absurdities, they will extend us some measure of sympathy.

Have we progressed in knowledge and understanding since Gellius's day? There are many faces of knowledge, and progress in all these faces is uneven. In science and technology, of course, we are far ahead of our ancestors. But in morals, the training of character, and virtue, the answer is much less certain. Our instrumentalities have become more advanced and complex, but our purposes and instincts remain the same as they always have been. Seen in this light, "progress" amounts to little else than new ways of achieving old goals. We fly around the world in dazzling times, and communicate with another at an instant; but have we really advanced beyond our ancestors in ethics and morals? We sense, somehow, that ancient and medieval man may have been wiser than we in emphasizing art, spiritual values, and beauty, rather than the vulgar worship of the latest gadgets of science and technology.

Ancient historians, for example, often valued character and moral training over historical precision. They recorded imaginary speeches, portents, and oracles, but there was a purpose behind these rhetorical exercises. History was viewed as a teaching tool for character and moral development. No modern writer can compete with, say, Plutarch, Livy, Quintilian, or Thomas a Kempis in moral training. Contrast this with our own day, where education overemphasizes factual knowledge, but completely neglects training in leadership, character, and morals. The results are obvious, and assault our senses every day.

So is progress real? The French writer Bernard Le Bovier de Fontenelle (1657-1757), in his Digression sur les Anciens et les Modernes, made some important observations in this regard. According to Fontenelle, there had been little or no progress since ancient times in poetry, literature, and art, but there had of course been considerable progress in science. Moreover, each nation goes through stages of development. In its infancy, a nation devote itself to pure survival; later it cultivates the works of imagination, like poetry and art; and in its old age, it devotes itself to science and technology. For Fontenelle, progress was real and tangible. Only a fool would doubt that man had made tremendous strides toward his perfectibility across the centuries.

There is much to be said for this view. But perhaps I am that fool that Fontenelle speaks of. Looking at world history since the beginning of the twentieth century, it is now clear that science is neutral, rather than a gateway to utopia. It can kill us just as quickly as it can save us. Reading the works of ancient and medieval man, and learning about their societies, shows that perhaps imagination truly is more important than knowledge. Somewhere along the line, once the Age of Reason began in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, Western thought made a conscious decision to place its faith in science and technology, at the expense of its spiritual and imaginative heritage.

In doing so, it forgot the profound power of the imagination in opening the doors of perception. The rejection of our spiritual heritage has cut us off from other ways of perceiving the world, ways that do not involve machines or mechanical intermediaries. The Orientalist scholar Henry Corbin, who authored many books on Sufi mysticism, believed that the “imaginal world” was every bit as real as the physical world. For Corbin, the mystic’s world of imagination was the “isthmus” or bridge that connected the corporeal world with the imaginal world of the Divine. Without a cultivation of the imagination, he held, a man could never hope to achieve true enlightenment. By polishing his soul, a man could achieve unique knowledge of the Divine Essence. The West’s great intellectual mistake since the Age of Reason, he believed, was to place all its faith in technology and turn its back on its Eastern spiritual legacy, which spring from this “imaginal world.”

We cannot be sure Corbin was wrong. All around us, I think, is evidence that the great thinkers of the Age of Reason may have placed too much faith in “reason” as a cure-all for man’s woes. We have access to more and more, but seem to perceive less and less. We are drowning in information, but are more ignorant and unfulfilled than ever. The breakdown in discipline is a direct result of the abandonment of our ancient moral code, which sprang from imaginative religion. Every untried youth of twenty now believes himself fit to pass judgment on the intellectual heritage of millenia.

Reason deceives as much as it enlightens. As man becomes more and more aware of the failures of reason in advancing man’s progress, it may be that the social pendulum will swing back towards a greater emphasis on character, faith, spirituality, and ethical progress. For progress to be real, we will eventually realize, it must take place across a wide spectrum of human knowledge, and this includes the imaginative world. True and lasting progress means harnessing the imagination for creative endeavor, training the character and conduct to cope with the strains of earthly toil, and tapping into that hidden reservoir of potential that every man possesses, but few men use.

Even Gellius would have agreed with that assessment.

Why Are American Women Acting Like Men?

May 6, 2014 | by Kilmister | Link | Original Link

We all know that all-to-familiar sound. You are sitting in one of your favorite late night hangouts when a sound that resembles something close to a pack of hyenas in heat pierces your eardrums. It is a group of 5-10 girls, most likely in their 20's, shrieking in unison as they celebrate another Vegas Bomb. Nails of a sloth across a chalk board would be more inviting than this horrific mating call.

Listening to them you would think that a naval vessel just docked in the harbor. They are loud, obnoxious and their conversations laden with profanity and vulgarity. Everything is hyper-sexualized. One girl is half in tears because she slept with Billy on the first night and now he is ignoring her texts, which has probably happened to her a dozen times or more by now. Her friends reassure her that Billy is just an 'asshole' and it has nothing to do with her giving it up easier than a hooker that takes Discover Card. Feeling better, she grabs the nearest pole and sticks her ass out and does some sort of mating dance known as 'twerking' to draw in more horny suitors, one who will inevitably take her home for the night and never call again. Even if he doesn't, she has already projected herself as a trash bag ho, and really that is all that matters. The group tosses back some more shots and continues their antics until the end of the night at which point half are crying in a cab on the way home and the other half are in some strangers' beds.

Meet the modern American 'young lady'. The one who apparently thinks she is man. How this happened, or why it happened is a source of debate. I'm not implying that young men and women can't party and behave reckless or risqué—it's fairly standard and reasonable for young people to do so. However, until recently the majority of these young women would still at least attempt a feminine front, even if deep down they were trashy.

It used to be deemed shameful to behave in such a manner, especially in public. Openly trashy behavior is now not only tolerated, but encouraged by young men and women alike.

Men generally do not mind a woman who can be ‘one of the guys’, per se, but not at the cost of her femininity. It is a complete turnoff to hear a women swear excessively, drink beers from a can, smoke cigarettes and be openly vulgar, violent or over sexual. This is not Sons of Anarchy and most men don’t want ‘old ladies’. Okay, they get our jokes and are not offended by our crude male behaviors, but the key word is male. Women should act feminine, not masculine. Straight men are not interested in dating or having sex with other men. We like women because they are just that, women. Women should be fairly soft spoken, polite, and carry themselves with at least a certain degree of modesty and mystery. Dare I call it class.

“I’m gonna get me some dick tonight girl.”

No man who is going to show a woman even an ounce of respect wants to hear that. He may hear it and initially think, “Great, this chick is going to be an easy lay,” but when he wakes up to the smell of her alcohol breathe and stale cigarettes, he will immediately regret his decision and formulate a plan to escape her place or get her out of his house as quick as possible. “Want to get breakfast?” says a voice under the covers that resembles Clint Eastwood after gargling acid soaked gravel. “Nah.”

“What was your name again?”

Anyone see a dance floor recently? Can we even call it dancing anymore? To me it resembles more of a public orgy. Half naked girls ramming their asses into the nearest crotch. Next to her another one is wrapped around a man’s waist and riding him like a rodeo bull. Tongues swapped and body parts groped without even names exchanged. I am sure a lot of fathers out there would be quite honored to see what their little princess is up to this particular evening. Make him proud, ‘ladies.’

“I’ll fuck that bitch up! SLUT!”

The language coming out of these girls mouths is deplorable. To hear a women drop two or three ‘F bombs’ in a single sentence is not uncommon. Listening to them verbally shred other women in the ultimate act of hypocrisy is not only disgusting, but a huge turnoff. Not to mention the ultra-aggressive types that want to verbally or even physically scrap with other women in their vicinity. And of course there is open discussion about their sexual encounters and conquests. Did their mothers conduct themselves like this? Not likely.

“I like having lots of sex with lots of guys on Tinder but wish guys would stop proposing. I’m 19, way too young to be tamed ” – Angie

I recently came across a Twitter page called Tinderfessions. This is where anyone can post Tinder experiences anonymously and share them via a Twitter feed. You will notice the majority seem to come from women and that their crude and vulgar language equals or betters the men. Many will say that this type of young female is not the norm, but I argue it is far more the norm than anyone wants to admit. Here are some samples:

"This is typical male hypocrisy!"

We already know females are going to counter this with some feminist bullshit about how women have the right to act like men do and it's all so hypocritical. Maybe it is, but as noted many times before, these same women have no right to wonder why men don't treat them as 'ladies' or call them back. They need to take a hard look at themselves. Femininity is attractive and respected. They should try it sometime. To think some sucker will put a ring on those fingers someday is an absolute mockery to the sanctity of marriage. And trust me, whoever those fools are, they will only get the PG version of her past. Why? Because she knows it is shameful.

Men Need To Demand More

Men, young and old, need to demand more from young women. A 23-year-old guy may be loving that girls these days are so easy and predictable. But when the time comes and he wants to find a good woman, a good mother that will teach his daughter how to carry herself with respect and dignity, what then? As great as it might be for a young man today in the prime of partying, care-free life, his future options are bleak. Only he can change that by demanding more. Does he want the lips that were wrapped around countless cocks kissing his kids goodnight? Boys will be boys, but at the end of the day they want to come home to respected, dignified and feminine women. Not the female version of their fraternity brother.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Girls Who Lack Fatherly Discipline Become Broken Women

May 6, 2014 | by ephemerae | Link | Original Link

To a mature man, the idea that growth must come from pain and suffering is a given. Although traditional rites of passage for young men are on the steady decline, most are still faced with enough external and internal stressors to adapt to become well-adjusted men. Consider the following excerpt from day 296 "Growth" of Deng Ming Dao's "365 Tao":

> We only grow when we are challenged. Muscles do not strengthen without resistance. Mental faculties do not sharpen without critical thinking. The spirit does not soar without something to excite it.

Taken in the context of opposition to disapproved social norms, a young woman's burgeoning personality and worldview today is tainted not only by external stimuli, but also by the complete absence of opposition to how this stimuli manifests itself. A generation of young women have been raised on Disney movies with a deep-seated princess mentality, yet once the appropriate age is reached to be exposed to the harsh realities of the world, the veil is not lifted. In fact, extra layers upon layers are thrown over her head, further blinding her to natural social and sexual dynamics. The trend continues on, perpetuating itself as young women are encouraged to cherish once insulting terms like "slut" and "bitch" as they revel in the depravity that is their lives.

At best, they remain emotional children, a toddler fiercely attached to an entitled princess lifestyle, stuck in a grown woman's body. At worst, a manipulative, deceitful, and sadistic murderer. Consider the following two women's stories, and how they reflect back on our culture of unwillingness to discipline women.

Elizabeth Wurtzel

Born into a middle class family in New York, Wurtzel was raised by her mother and only had brief contact with her father from time to time. In 1994, her memoirs "Prozac Nation" were published, written about her major depression during her childhood up until her time spent at Harvard University as a journalism student. As to be expected, the book deals with her largely self-imposed prison of depression, as she seeks refuge in drugs, alcohol, meaningless sex, and general rebellion.

Despite the subject matter, her book was subsequently turned into a full length motion picture in 2001 to critical indifference. Following this, Wurtzel managed to find work as a music critic, while writing a few more mediocre books including "Bitch: In Praise of Difficult Women."

Regardless of her extremely low LSAT score, she was accepted into Yale Law School. By her own admission it was due to her "…other accomplishments," perhaps implying her notoriety or mild celebrity status. After receiving her J.D. in 2008, Wurtzel failed the New York bar exam. Despite her lack of credentials, she controversially presented herself as a lawyer in several interviews during the years that followed. Upon finally passing the bar exam in 2010, making her legally able to practice law, she then proposed publically that bar exams be abolished, but not before penning the ultimate post-wall tell all at Elle magazine.

Unlike many feminists, Wurtzel had the brains (post-wall albeit) to finally bring into focus some misunderstood truths, as she states:

> "Whoever said youth is wasted on the young actually got it wrong; it's more that maturity is wasted on the old."

Simply put, Wurtzel is another woman who was raised in a broken home, in an environment with little to no boundaries to stop her from drowning in her own sorrow. She then became defined by the very things she pretends to hate: attention seeking and diving into complete self-absorption, substance abuse, and promiscuity. Her later years were filled with writing more books about her regrets of those decisions. She's another woman whose value plummeted with every passing year, but she never became self-aware of this fact. Wurtzel sums up her entire adult dating career with this gem:

> "I attract (and seek) bottle throwing, foot stomping, door slamming, pot clanging, hair pulling, and, above all, a lot of loud screaming and walking out in a huff—usually leaving me crying, wondering what just happened, or, more often, too astonished to cry."

Karla Homolka

Notorious rapist and murderer Karla Homolka showed early signs of mental instability. Born to a Czech immigrant father and Canadian mother, Homolka's early life was marked by a drunk and emotionally absent father and indifferent mother. As a young girl she was known to abuse animals (foreshadowing sociopathic behaviour) as well as being bossy and domineering. As she grew older, constant fights with her parents became the norm. As she and her sister hurled insults at her alcoholic father, he withdrew into the basement to escape a house full of overbearing women.

During her high school years, she dabbled with alcohol, drugs, and surprised friends with detailed sexual encounters which included bondage, rape fantasies, strangulation, as well as her supposed suicide attempts.

Soon after, she began dating and eventually married Paul Bernardo, her accomplice in the infamous rape and murders of three women in the early 1990's, one of them being Homolka's own sister. Homolka had stated early on in the investigation she had been abused by Bernardo and was a forced accomplice in the rape/murders of the three women. She pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of manslaughter and served 12 years. Shortly before being released from prison in 2005, videotape evidence was found showing Homolka had lied and that she was a very involved participant, leading to nationwide outrage at her pending release.

In an article detailing the letters Homolka had sent from prison to author Stephen Williams, journalist Christie Blatchford went on to say:

> "What is particularly compelling – and telling – is how radically different are the faces she presents"

Homolka's lack of strong guidance during her formative years led to sociopathic and deeply narcissistic behaviours as an adult. She was a broken woman, shifting from one personality to the next in an effort to evade reality. Increasingly becoming detached from it, she found solace in the arms of a man as charismatic and strong-willed as she needed, but it was too late. The strong hand she was seeking was in fact that of a madman, and the intimacy she craved was distorted and corrupted, manifesting itself in violent sexual tendencies.

While only one of these stories is an extreme example of a woman gone wrong, they both share one important factor: the lack of a strong father figure in their lives. While it would be unfair to attribute all of their shortcomings on this, the commonality begs certain questions. How important is discipline to a young woman? What effects does a lack of fatherly discipline have on women? What can we do, as fathers or not, to prevent this type of behaviour?

Just like a winemaker controls the vigour of his vine to create a more pure and elegant vintage, or the blacksmith tempering steel to construct incredibly strong objects, women must be checked in order to avoid uncontrollably adverse behaviour. If the world shapes a man, then women must be shaped by us.

Who Do You Want Your Daughter To Marry?

May 7, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

I am relatively close to one of my distant female cousins. She is what I would coin a "decent catch," in that she is attractive, a rejector of feminism and is at least somewhat understanding of our ways (she agrees that women are better off feminine and being the submissive ones in the relationship). In other ways, she is highly judgmental of my preferences in women (youth and bisexuality to name a few).

But all of that is irrelevant because her thoughts and what type of girl she is does not matter as much as the abstract situation discussed here. Tonight I am meeting her "serious" boyfriend for the first time, the type of boyfriend she only introduces if marriage is potentially on her mind. This will be the third meet-and-greet of this kind.

The first guy was what we now term to be a beta. The type that would send her unsolicited flowers, write songs and poems, all of that rom-com shit. Truthfully, he was a very nice guy and likely would never cheat on my cousin, and showered her with endless love and attention.

The second guy was the overcompensating alpha. The first night I met him at dinner, he berated the wait staff at a restaurant for trivial things to show off how "cool" he was. Meanwhile, this guy lived at home with his family and could not participate in substantial conversations due to a lacking intellect.

The third guy I meet tonight. And it got me thinking if this was my actual daughter… what type of guy would I want her to marry?

The Standard Beta

Initial reaction is to say I want my potential daughter to marry an absolute and complete softie of a guy. Why? Because I know how I and others like myself think. When I see a girl, my first thought goes to fucking her, and fucking her as hard and as quickly as possible. Is this really the type of guy I want pursuing my daughter?

I want her to have the guy that will never cheat on her. That will accompany her to all her inevitable brunch parties and not complain. That will bring her flowers unsolicited. That will ask her what she wants for dinner, only to supplement that with watching whatever movie she put in their joint Netflix queue. To quote one of the better movies regarding male-female dynamics, I want him "to be the guy in the PG-13 movie everyone's really hoping makes it happen."

But is that the appropriate metric? Specifically, hoping for a guy that would moreso put my mind at ease as a father, as opposed to taking into account my daughter's best interests.

What Makes Her Happy

To answer my rhetorical question above, it is not the appropriate metric. Rather it is what actually will make her happy.

If you are still plugged in to the matrix, you will adamantly argue that the Standard Beta described above is what will make her happy. And that may be true for a few select girls. But as we here at ROK know, and you readers hopefully agree, that is far from what makes a quality girl actually happy.

More likely than not, a variation of ourselves will be what brings true happiness to your actual, theoretical or eventual daughters. Read any number of evolutionary psychology and biology books and they will agree – the masculine, dominant man is the type who gives the feminine woman what she wants, needs, and desires. Not the bozo that agrees with all her requests and opinions and assumes the little spoon position under the snuggie as they watch Bravo together.

I don't have a daughter and, frankly, at least as of now hope that I never will. So I can't say that if I reach that moment, I will be rooting for some 100+ notch count alpha to be the one that marries her… knowing his mind is filled with memories of depraved sex acts one of which consists of my little girl. But I also know that I don't want my daughter to be in a loveless marriage leading to an eventual divorce and romps with the gardeners.

This is a question I hope I never have to answer.

The Value of Leisure

May 7, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

"Happiness is leisure." One of Aristotle's most-quoted maxims, this terse sentence expresses one of the fundamental truths of human life. And it is a pretty simple one. For leisure is necessary for virtually any activity that makes us happy. Such an activity is intrinsically worthwhile, in the sense that we do it not for money or for the sake of any other burden, but because it is inherently good or satisfying. The only exception to this rule is that rare sort of work people actually enjoy, and which they'd do even if they did not get paid. This exception is something of a moot point, however, for there is effectively no difference between work and leisure if the former finds us doing what we want; that is not work in the commonly burdensome sense of the word.

Why are so many of us unhappy in this country today? There are many reasons, of course, far too many for me to cover in this article, but I have no doubt the common lack of leisure is a big one. Observe most people in any big city during working hours. They are endlessly harried. Commuting to work is an anxious hassle. Work itself is a frenetic and monotonous drudgery in which others—many of them quite base human beings—effectively stand over them shouting, "Produce!" Meanwhile, our society is wildly touchy, so that the slightest politically incorrect infraction, whether uttered in the flesh or posted on social media, may well get one fired. And all this is how it is for those who have relatively good jobs!

In Life Without Principle, Thoreau said "most men would feel insulted if it were proposed to employ them in throwing stones over a wall, and then in throwing them back, merely that they might earn their wages. But many are no more worthily employed now." Are these words not more applicable to our time than they were to the writer's own? I know many co-workers at my weekend bouncer gig who have full-time jobs in banking, accounting and other lucrative professions. Still, they wait tables or serve drinks on the weekend; some even do so during the week: and all for what? Is not all this throwing of stones—as it were—done for the sake of mere material ends; that is, so that people can pay their rent or mortgage, keep up their vehicle, buy the latest Apple product, and so on?

Yet I see that there is an immense non-monetary cost here: working so much, they are without sufficient free time to do the things that make them happy. Doubtless there are many people in this country today who do not even know what makes them happy (just as they do not know themselves in any deep sense); these good team members are so busy getting ahead that they have not learned to develop a variety of satisfying interests and hobbies, without which it is impossible to be a well-rounded human being.

To be sure, considerable blame here must fall on the powerful people who make life much more expensive than it has to be. But greed is nothing new in human affairs, and it is always a person's own responsibility to make wise decisions. To live by debt is to devalue your leisure, and with that your very happiness.

From Diogenes to Socrates, the ancient Greeks thought that there is a sense in which you don't just own your house: it also owns you, its care detracting from your leisure, which is really a synonym for freedom.

If you value your leisure, and if you want to be free, you must have the discipline to do without. I own much less than most people. But the good news, for me, is that I am a lot freer. My main expenses are rent, food and public transportation. Therefore, while so many others are working 60 hours a week or more, I can spend a lot of my time reading books, writing articles like this one (which I don't do just for the money), exercising, or simply being happily idle. It goes without saying that while I do all this, I do not have a bunch of tiresome fools telling me what to do. It also goes without saying that I don't have a wife or children, since the highly expensive domestic life is the most wretched trap around today.

Many people believe that "time is money." I should rather believe that time is life, and that while we all need money, this need is really a simple animal one. If we look to history, we do not find that great and lofty spirits valued money above all else. They were out for glory, or excellence, or fame—at any rate, for much more than material wealth.

An utterly Philistine commitment to a life of moneygrubbing is sure to make a person boring, undeveloped and incomplete. By contrast, anyone who greatly values leisure—and who, therefore, achieves some competence or even mastery in a variety of pursuits over time—is sure to be quite interesting and exceptional.

Just how a person spends his leisure reveals a great deal about him. If a grown man tells me he spends most of his free time watching American Idol and playing video games, I simply will not consider him the equal of a man who devotes much time to studying a foreign language, playing the guitar, or tending to a garden. You can deem me an elitist, but in order to value some things, we must devalue others: the very notion of value—inherently comparative—vanishes if we are not willing to make certain distinctions.

In one of his dialogues, Plato says that the gods made man in jest, in order to laugh at him. From politics to the workplace to dating, I seem to meet with one farce after another today. Contemporary life seems to be the work of some cruel satirist. Yet I have no doubt that the endless spectacles of stupidity and vulgarity I see all around me would not be so prevalent if more of us had a sense of the value of leisure. More people would then spend time cultivating their minds, rendering them more intelligent and, I should also think, a bit more dignified. And, what is a value I can't stress too much, they'd spend more time alone with themselves, understanding who they are and what matters to them. Who needs a trite self-help book or dope-pushing psychiatrist when you can examine yourself?

Still, it may be thought that human nature is fundamentally base on average. To draw on Plato once more, the great philosopher held that most people fall into the category of what he called "souls of appetite." Interested neither in the pursuit of power ("souls of ambition") nor the life of the mind ("souls of knowledge"), they basically live for pleasure, usually of the animal sort. And that most Americans would rather watch reality TV or post trivial thoughts on social media than read a good book or play an instrument does seem to reveal something significant about human nature itself on average. After all, this is what people choose to do when they are free to do what they want.

Anyway, you need not be like the crowd. Value your leisure: sharpen your mind and nurture your spirit; contemplate yourself and character. For to value leisure is ultimately to value yourself.

6 Tips On How To Get Laid In Las Vegas

May 7, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

There's no city like Las Vegas to satisfy your carnal desires, and here are five tips from a Vegas Insider to help you get your dick wet in Sin City.

Without further ado…

#6. Book A Hotel With Great Logistics And A Good Reputation

Let's be clear: A lot of game is about logistics and Vegas is no different. While The Strip is set up with good logistics in general, especially compared to other cities such as Los Angeles, I didn't say 'good' logistics, I wrote 'great' logistics.

Be smart and spend a bit more on a good hotel that's within proximity of the top clubs and which has the best hotel bars as well as having a good reputation. Not so fun fact but reality: girls are shallow. Just the way it is. If you say, "Yea I'm staying at Hooters. Afterparty in my shit room, let's go!", you're going to get 80% more resistance than if you're staying at the MGM Grand, which is across the street and has a great reputation.

Here's a list of very good hotels that I have personally stayed at, as well as my clients based on the following criteria:

- Logistics
- Reputation
- Service
- Clubs
- Hotel bars
- Girls staying there

Note: Based on when you book a room, it's not much more than staying at average hotels. Planning in advance gets you better rates on travel sites etc.

Best Hotels To Stay At And Pull To In Vegas

-Cosmopolitan Hotel (Marquee Day and Night Club is located here, as well as 3 very good hotel bars: Bond Bar, Chandelier Bar and Vesper Bar)

-MGM Grand (Hakkasan, the #1 Top Vegas Club is located here, as well as multiple hotel bars)

-Aria Hotel (Skip the whack nightclub Haze inside, but logistics wise it's beside the Cosmo and across from the MGM as well as being a newer major hotel. Pro-Tip: The rooms have electronic black out shades which is great for getting some rest when the blinding Vegas sun is out and you're just hitting the hay at 11am)

-Encore Hotel (Also home to Sinatra Restaurant where you get the real Rat Pack Experience, as well as mega Top 5 Clubs Surrender and Encore Beach Day Club. There's also multiple top restaurants, great mini hotel bars and you're next door to Wynn which houses XS Nightclub, another Top 5 club)

-Trump Hotel (Although it stands alone across from Encore and Wynn, you can get reasonable rates due to the hotel not having a casino, it's a 5 Star Hotel and you're essentially across the street from Encore and Wynn where the aforementioned clubs call home. Lastly, girls don't flinch when you tell them where you're staying.)

#5. Pre-Stock Your Hotel Room With Alcohol, Mixers And Condoms

Nothing will cockblock you more than a nun on Sunday, than pulling a sexy girl or two back to your room and not having alcohol and mixers. Sometimes they need to quiet that hamster and alcohol always does the job.

Here's what you do: get a bottle of vodka, a bottle of whiskey and some Coke and Sprite from the gift shop in your hotel. If you really want to save money, then when your cab picks you up from the airport have them take you by a gas station on the way to the hotel. You'll save even more money buying it from there instead of the gift shop.

Lastly, don't forget condoms. This has completely fucked up the vibe for me when she asks for one and I don't have one. Something about having to go downstairs and get one kills the motherfucking mood, so don't make the same mistakes I have and pre-stock them in your room.

#4. Roll With 1 Good Wingman And Avoid Packs Of Dudes

Unless your crew has the money to drop thousands on bottle service at top clubs, avoid like the plague rolling with more than one other wingman. It will cockblock the fuck out of you.

Yes, of course there's times when multiple dudes will roll out, pop bottles and everyone takes girls back to the room to fornicate, but this isn't usually the case. You're better off rolling with a wingman and Table Hopping: making friends with dudes who have bottles, bring some girls to their table then peel off the interested ones and it doesn't cost you a dime.

This also makes it easier to skip lines to clubs, that without a table or a connection, can literally last hours.

#3. Work The Hotel Bars To Warm Up For The Clubs

This is one that many cats forget about, or skip and it's a goldmine for warming up.

Here's what you do: Roll out with your wingman around 9pm, to one of the hotel bars such as Bond Bar at Cosmo. Get some drinks and post up. Ease into the evening shooting the shit with your buddy, then around 10:30PM roll to another hotel bar such as The Chandelier Bar at Cosmo. There spit some game and continue warming up 'practicing' your game on the 6′s, 7′s and occasional 8′s. This will get you ready to rock when you hit the club around midnight.

Pro-Tip: The only real negative of hotel bars is they tend to be inundated with escorts. You'll spot them easily enough, because they are usually alone, dolled up to the nines, are sitting alone and will scan the room making eye contact and smiling. Unless you're used to very hot women smiling at you and even waving, then take notice: she's probably paying her bills with her pussy. Steer clear, unless that's your cup of tea, but be aware because they do undercover stings all the time with cops posing as escorts.

#2. Keep Your Vibe Fun And Light

Everyone goes to Vegas to have fun, unless they're pro gamblers who are all about their money and business. Lighten up, plaster a smile on your face, and have some fucking fun! The Vegas Vibe is all about fun and having a good time. If you have a morose look on your face and are slouched in the corner glaring at everyone around you, don't be surprised when girls avoid you like you have the bubonic plague.

When you're spitting game with girls keep it all light and fun. Don't delve into heavy topics at all and look for similarities in your backgrounds. Here's some sample questions I ask and look for that help me and the girl make a 'connection'. People love to connect with their own 'kind' in tourist cities, which helps build comfort and rapport with her.

"Where are you from?"

"Where are you staying?"

"How much trouble have you gotten into so far?"

"When did you get here and when do you leave?" (This is key. If she's leaving that night, than work fast or eject so you're not under a time crunch to pull her)

"You seriously look like trouble. This isn't good." (Said with a small smile and laugh)

#1. Getting Laid In Vegas Is ALL About Approaching And It's A Numbers Game

The beauty of Vegas and why it's the #1 City to Have A One Night Stand, is that there's limitless options of bars, hotel bars, lounges, clubs and most are all within walking distance on the Strip. This creates an environment of literally thousands of girls in the city who are there to party.

The key to this is you don't need to waste time working on a girl for hours.

If you approach a girl and she's cool, but acting very hesitant about hanging out without her friends and getting to know you more, than simply EJECT.

I do it constantly. Then again I have very little patience. Point is though, you can approach until your legs fall off and you'll generally, not 100%, but generally meet a girl who you click with and you can take it from there. There's no reason to waste hours trying to convince a girl to hit up Drais Afterhours with you. Approach, smile, spit some Game, be light and fun, grab their hands and head to the next club, or spot.

The saying that Girls Just Wanna Have Fun, has never been more true for Las Vegas.

Combine that with What Happens In Vegas Stays In Vegas motto and you have a combination of girls who travel to Vegas literally everyday to have fun, open their legs and have an experience. Who better to give it to them than you?

The “History” Of Online Dating

May 8, 2014 | by Masculine Profiles | Link | Original Link

While Ronald Reagan and Michael J. Fox invented the Internet in the early 80’s, online dating has been around for almost ever. For as long as humans have felt the need to mate, many have recognized that finding an appropriate mate can be difficult. Originally, online dating was referred to as a personal classified ad in a newspaper. The first personal classified ad was placed around 1700 in Great Britain by Catholic priests looking for young boys to do the Lord’s “work.” Next thing you know, everybody and their mamas’ were placing a personal ad in The Daily Courant, albeit on the down low.

In the early days of what would become online dating, many people looked down upon those finding love in unconventional ways. They thought these people were looking for love in all the wrong places and that they would find no fine girls, simply ugly faces. In the 1700 and 1800’s if you had not managed to find a spouse by the age of 21, people would attach a stigma to you. Still, the losers of the sexual marketplace were not deterred. These men placed personal ads in newspapers and hired ‘matrimonial’ agencies to find wives.

“Online” Dating Begins To Take Off

When men began to have success finding love through the classifieds, women soon began to post ads themselves, not just responding. Then in 1841, Susan B. Anthony coined the commonly used term, “We’ll lie about how we met” to avoid being stigmatized while going about her whoring ways.

Soon factory workers were spilling stories of girls they met through the personal ads while on the job. Tales of conquests from the personal ads began to become similar. The tales usually started with the lady stating, “We’re not having sex” then later followed by a “I never do this” or an “I didn’t expect this to happen”, and finally ending with a “Usually I don’t do that.” The workers were baffled and wondered if they had been dating the same ~~whore(s)~~ women.

Once the 1900’s rolled around, the personal ad began to go mainstream. Not only did factory workers, railroad workers, and whores peruse them, many servicemen did as well. This ushered in more women to the ads. During World War 1, servicemen began placing personal ads for ‘pen pals’ and ‘friends’ when they were overseas and had eventually tired of shoring cheap Asian hookers.

Jump to WWII and modern online dating as we know it begins to take shape. In 1941, a statistics based matchmaking service opened up in New Jersey. Then in 1956 IBM created a computer based dating program ran by an IBM card-sorting machine similar to the one sold to Hitler for use in concentration camps. Rumor has it Marilyn Monroe and JFK matched up perfectly using this system.

Beginning Of The Modern Era

The 70’s saw the personal ads gain a large following, while video-dating services gained some mainstream popularity in the 80’s. Then, Bill Clinton unknowingly invented what we call modern online dating in 1995 when he sent an email to some secret Internet fatty (SIF) about getting a hummer in the oval office. While fat chicks have been giving great head since forever, once word that the SIF swallowed the presidents’ babies got out, online dating became the cool thing to do. According to Bill, the only reason he didn’t get impeached was because he showed enough congressmen how to get hummers from their interns by pressing ‘Ctrl+C’ and ‘Ctrl+V’. Although it all could have been avoided if it weren’t for the time he forgot Lewinsky had a gag reflex.

Alas, then in 1998, Tom Hanks starred in some rom-com about romantic emails and anal. While ‘You’ve Got Mail’ was a cinematic nightmare if you had male genitals, it propelled meeting a lover online into new heights. Now every ‘Sex & the City’ slag east of the Mississippi was trying to get their rocks off by finding their own Mr. Big through online dating.

The film worked wonders by erasing much of the negative stereotypes surrounding online dating. Influential people took note and realized there was money to be made in the online dating industry. With the rise of the ‘.Com’ bubble, online dating sites where popping up all over the Internet.

Online Dating Today

Fast forward to 2014 and online dating is everywhere. Your friends do it. Your colleagues do it. Hell, even your sister does it. It has been estimated that over 40 million Americans have tried online dating. The stigma surrounding online dating is all but completely eliminated.

While sites like Plenty of Fish, OkCupid, and Match.com brought online dating into the mainstream, Tinder finished the job. Tinder eliminated almost all strategy necessary for men to have success in dating online. If a girl you found attractive and “swiped right” to does the same, you “match”. Then you are allowed to message each other. A few quick messages and you get her number. Then it’s off to texting to set the date up.

While many older players still despise online dating, the fact remains that using the Internet to facilitate getting your dick wet is pretty fucking easy. The key to online dating is to not become dependent on it.

No matter what society says, its fucking weird if the only way you can meet girls is online. A man or an “alpha male” should meet women during his day-to-day life, when he goes out on the town for a night, and if he so chooses, by dating online. With online dating, as true in most areas of life, moderation is key. Still, it is tough to deny that online dating is a great tool for the budding player to use.

The Moment I Saw Women For What They Really Are

May 9, 2014 | by Fry Koskenin | Link | Original Link

All systems were “go” when I was in my twenties. I had an exemplary education, a fit body, a well-paying career, a pretty girlfriend, and most importantly, many solid ambitions, which included finding “the one.”

I considered myself to be a regular guy in many ways, and was quite happy to do what humans do, without thinking too much about it. I had always assumed that a soul mate could (and should) be found, and that love was real, and that a mutually beneficial and supportive partnership was the end goal. I had assumed that any lover, girlfriend, fiance, or wife that you risked bringing into you home and life was, in fact, a loyal and devoted ally, or at least strove to be. How wonderful it must be to have a trusted partner in crime—a loving manager in your corner—someone with whom you can actually share your innermost hopes, dreams, fears, and weakness with—someone who has your back no matter what.

My first glimpse that something might be disturbingly amiss with my programming happened on my 30th birthday.

My 30th Birthday

The day before, my beautiful and always-wonderful girlfriend asked me what I wished to do for my big day. We were tight, comfortable souls and always had a great time together no matter what we were doing. I felt like she could read my mind and that she enjoyed my quirks and virtues alike. Life was pretty good, and my request was simple. I told her that all I wanted was for her to come over and have a sweet and relaxing time with me, and that we’d have diner at my place, drink some wine, watch a movie, and cuddle. I added that I really wanted her to give me a back and shoulder massage, because I love receiving back and shoulder massages. And she thought that all sounded wonderful. It was set to be an evening of simple, divine perfection.

But early into the next day (my birthday), we touched base and she informed me of a change in plans. She had run into my neighbor (a fat, disgusting, hairy Afghan woman with whom I have nothing in common and no desire for any kind of association) earlier in the day. And though this woman and my girlfriend were mere acquaintances at best, and though my girlfriend confessed to having no interest in developing a friendship with her, she somehow felt it necessary to oblige her intrusion into my special day. Upon hearing that it was my birthday, my unpleasant neighbor, for whatever reason (possibly as a means to bond with my girlfriend), insisted on having a little party for me at her place, complete with diner, cake, and candles. When this was explained to me, I of course wanted no part of it, and said so.

With a sneer that I just couldn't hide, I made it known that I didn't want to go to that party and that it was my birthday and that I should be able to do what I wanted to do. My girlfriend, however, was not pleased by my objections and she argued many irrelevant reasons why I needed to go. In an instant, things turned icy between us, and a minute later I was forced to acquiesce to our new plan, because I still wanted to get laid that night.

So I put on a happy face and we attended the little party, but my girlfriend could sense that my glum heart wasn't into it, and afterward, we had a fight about it. Needless to say, I did not get my back massage, nor did I get laid.

I steamed silently for a few days after that fiasco, and she never once apologized for how things turned out. The whole situation, though very minor in the grand scheme, seemed deeply wrong to me. I wondered how any trusted ally of mine would so quickly sacrifice my special day for such trivial concerns. It struck me as a form of betrayal. And so for the first time in my life, I witnessed a ripply distortion in the Matrix. Evidence of an alternate reality had appeared and something did not add up.

The First Time I Had Anal Sex

It was a few naive years and similar disappointments later, and I was dating a fiery fit sex-pot with the best ass any of my twenty buddies had ever seen. Whether we had a future or not remained uncertain, but we certainly enjoyed our time together for many months until I blew my back out.

After 10 years of 405-pound deadlifts, a disk spontaneously decided to protrude something fierce and compress my S1 nerve root like a motherfucker. As a result, I was double dosing my prescription Vicodin and chasing each one with vodka. I was still in such pain that I could barely roll over or crawl to the toilet. It was a very bad two days, spent mostly on the floor.

My girlfriend nevertheless wanted to come over even though I vehemently explained to her that I'd be completely useless. But she insisted, and said that we'd have a mellow evening enjoying my booze and opiates, and that she'd give me a back rub. Oh yes! And it was nice enough, before it turned ugly.

It was in the early morning hours and when I was at my weakest that she spontaneously turned on me, and hard. She wanted to have sex but I was simply not in the mood and she ripped me for it. I told her that I was in so much pain that I should probably be checked into the hospital, but she was not having it. She wanted dick and she wanted it now. It was a test. It was too bad though, for both of us, that eight Vicodins, a bottle of Russian Standard, severe pain, and the normal fatigue of the wee-AM hours combined to make me utterly disinterested.

I told her that I all I wanted to do was to go to sleep (no, that I needed to sleep!) and she chastised me hard. I could not believe that she was being so difficult. She proceeded to taunt my strength, my manhood, and my character before demanding that I put my dick into her ass that instant.

Of course I tried, and did, but it was all much less than vigorous or enjoyable. My head was spinning, my cheeks were flush, my dick was half-soft, and my back, buttocks, and pelvis felt like they were filled with loose razor blades during every tentative trust. And as that disaster finally fizzled out most ingloriously, she bitched me out with more venom that I ever thought possible. And then I got angry.

I could not believe that she was pulling this shit. In my single moment of need that decade, she simply could not behave for six hours and support me. She could not take a back seat, in even the smallest way, to my very real needs. What in the hell was wrong with this insane cunt? And then it occurred to me that I had brought a stealth predator into my sanctuary, and when I was most vulnerable to boot. She was not my ally and not my friend, and certainly not when my needs diverged from her most frivolous whims. I felt abandoned and sad, but mostly angry. How dare she pull this shit! But she did dare, and it only made my most miserable night that much worse. I could have strangled her.

As I clenched my teeth and gathered all of my remaining strength to simply sit up in bed to yell at her at 3:30 AM while she was heading out the door, something changed inside of me.

A New Awareness

For the first time, I was able to fully compile a decade's worth of separate but perplexing distortions in my reality to see that the Matrix existed. I saw the shadows on the wall for the illusions that they were, and as a result, many of my prior romantic aspirations instantly dissolved.

My true epiphany was that all humans are individuals first and foremost, and competitors, and the tool that women most use to compete is deception—they make you believe that they support you. But they never truly do. Their ulterior motives are 100-percent selfish and at any time or place, even your most dire needs can be set aside for little or no reason. So what sense does it make to give them the keys to your innermost sanctum? My foolish optimism was transformed into a healthy mistrust, and I moved forward, a bit heart-broken, yet surprisingly satisfied and even humored by finally knowing the rules of the "real" reality.

Now I laugh about all of this unnecessary strife, and take a certain sick joy in knowing that it’s unwise to ever fully relax in a woman’s presence or expect that she unquestionably has your back. It has liberated me from so many burdensome concerns, and for that I am grateful. You just can never fully trust what women are thinking or might do, and you should plan accordingly. And a bit of unease is always prudent when you know that a vampire is watching you sleep.

Going On A Cruise Is Stupid

May 9, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Two weeks a year.

That's the average annual escape time from the office your average American citizen who is part of the full-time workforce gets. It's not a lot of time, so it says a lot about a person based off of how they choose to spend these precious two weeks a year. Since my return from Europe, many people in my office have asked me about my experiences. Once I finish my stories, they inevitably launch into their own travel plans for the upcoming summer – and I feign interest as they rave about their upcoming all-you-can-eat cruise ship vacation.

It's not just one story I've heard about an upcoming cruise, but a half dozen people within throwing distance of my desk are taking a cruise this summer. Truthfully, all I can really think of when I hear their excitement is, "THAT'S how you want to spend your vacation?"

Apparently though, they are not the only ones, as the cruise industry expects there to be over 20 million cruise-goers in 2014, with 60% of those hailing from North America:

Cruise Industry Statistics	Data
Annual cruise industry revenue for the US economy	$37.85 billion
Number of cruise industry jobs in the US	314,000
Annual number of cruise ship passengers	20,335,000
Percent of cruise passengers that originated in North America	60 %

Before I continue further, I must make a disclaimer: I have been on a cruise. Two, in fact. The first one was when I was 14, and my grandparents dragged myself and 30 other family members (the horror) on a cruise from Los Angeles to Mexico and back for three nights. The second one was when I was 19, and my now ex-girlfriend invited me on a two week vacation – Disneyworld and the surrounding parks for a week, followed by a week long cruise through the Bahamas and Caribbean.

I would be lying if I said I didn't enjoy parts of the second cruise with my ex. The first one with the large family?

Never again.

But really, sitting on a boat is not travelling – and here's why…

A Cruise Ship Is Simply Consumerism

Now, especially after taking my little jaunt through Europe, I fail to see how people say they're "travelling" when in fact they are doing little more than floating on a water-based hotel and shopping mall. There are food courts, swimming pools, poolside service, and of course, no shortage of places to buy overpriced alcohol.

In addition to that, there is no stepping out of the box as far as food goes. The people who don't fill up on the unlimited microwave pizza and ice cream are treated to your typical American buffet full of processed garbage.

8 Hours Is Not Long Enough To Experience A Country

I spent three days in most of the places I visited on my trip and I now know I would need a minimum of three weeks or more in order to really get a cultural experience in a foreign country. Cruise lines though are always advertising how you can, "Experience Rome in just X HOURS!"

Their idea of "experiencing Rome" is placing you on a bus to the city center, shuttling you around the city in the most efficient way possible, piling you into a restaurant with Americanized food, and generally making it so all you have to do is show up and barely have to converse with the locals.

Oh, and did I mention the prices of these cultural experiences?

The Prices Of Excursions

When I went to the Bahamas with my girlfriend, we swam with dolphins in Nassau. Her parents footed the bill at $200 each. Yes, four hundred dollars so that we could splash around and throw a couple of fish to a dolphin named Hercules. Of course, we were one of ten people in the group, and the session was half an hour. Meaning that dolphin was billed out at $2,000/hour. Was it a cool experience? Of course. However, the prices of these excursions are simply out of hand for the experience you get. $200 was more than I paid to rent an apartment for four days in the Czech Republic.

Finally, You're Around A Bunch Of Americans

This means fat people wearing bathing suits, girls with bitchy attitudes, and parents that can't control their children. You're stuck in the middle of the ocean with hundreds of them for at least three nights in most cases.

On top of that, most cruise ships have at least one hairy chest contest while at sea. If this isn't enough for you to stay away from cruises, I don't know what is.

Do Something Better

Jump around to a bunch of countries like I did. Go backpacking, hitchhiking, or hell, take an actual vacation where you sit around and do nothing. Just don't do it while sitting on a boat surrounded by men with hairy chests and soccer moms who haven't lost any weight since they popped out five kids.

If you do, you're just like every other American – too lazy or afraid to embrace the risks of planning out your own adventure, instead of letting a cruise line do it all for you.

When my co-workers return from their respective cruises, I'll have no need to ask them what they did. I already know they did the exact same thing twenty million other people are doing this year.

The Legacy Of Gomer And Hosea Lives On

May 10, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

The Hebrew Bible story of Hosea and the “harlotry” of his wife Gomer bear immense significance in today’s times. Hosea 1:2 refers to Gomer (the daughter of Diblaim), alternatively as a “promiscuous woman” (NIV), a “harlot” (NASB), and a “whore” (KJV) but Hosea is told to marry her according to a divine command.

Background

The prophet Hosea is recognized as one of the greatest prophets of the eighth century B.C., along with Amos, Micah, and Isaiah. Hosea, both by his life and preaching, taught vital truths about the love of God. He was a prophet of the Northern Kingdom during and after the reign of Jeroboam II, and was the only writing prophet from the Northern Kingdom of Israel (Amos came from Judah and preached in the North). When he began his ministry, shortly after Amos, both kingdoms were at the height of their power and prosperity. According to the Book of Hosea, Hosea was then commanded by God to marry a “prostitute” (the meaning of the word “prostitute” itself here could carry many meanings).

The New Jerusalem Bible reads “Yahweh said to Hosea, ‘Go, marry a whore, and get children with a whore; for the country itself has become nothing but a whore by abandoning Yahweh’” (Hos. 1:2 NJB). The issue of whether Gomer’s whoredom was literal or spiritual has often been a contentious topic of debate with scholars, as well as the story of Hosea is often a naturally difficult subject for a number of people (especially men) to deal with.

The real lesson to be learnt is about the spiritual adultery (idol worship) of a nation which abandons God and falls into evil— represented by the adultery and harlotry of Gomer. In this case it’s forgiven by God, represented by Hosea’s forgiveness and magnanimity towards Gomer, as commanded by God. Hosea’s sacrifice of personal honor for following divine commands represent some of the bitterest pills that a noble and honorable man could ever swallow.

Hosea and Gomer’s story should not be viewed superficially as the general condonance of female infidelity by men—to be made later as a social role model—because Hosea was specifically following divine commands in relation to Gomer, as his wife was to represent a spiritual theme of a nation turning away from God. He wouldn’t have married or forgiven her had he not been divinely commanded at first. This command thus does not pertain to mankind on the whole.

Another similar example often misconstrued by feminists to condone modern female sexual immorality is the example of Jesus forgiving the adulterous woman. This example is often abused by modern women to justify their sluttiness/whoring without taking into consideration the warning which Jesus gave the woman in parting, “Go and sin no more”, a commandment which modern slutty women often hypocritically ignore to continue their sluttiness, while continuing to abuse Jesus’s “Let he who is without sin cast the first stone” statement, to preclude judgment for their own sexual immorality.

Fast forward to modern times

The spirit of Gomer didn’t die. It can be seen in modern feminist societies, which have given women indulgences to openly emulate her example and embody her through deed with social permission to spite both men and patriarchy through the platform of feminism today.

Hosea’s example also lives on in cases of modern men choosing to marry whores, and those men choosing to condone spousal infidelities within marriages, often out of ‘undying love’. But the tragedy here is Hosea’s example has been misconstrued to both exploit and demean men in the context of such relationships by cheating women and permissive modern society to increasingly devalue male territorial instincts and self-respect.

Gomer's legacy – fictional fact or factual fiction?

In modern feminist societies, you have an emerging trend of men marrying former escorts or prostitutes (along with a more common trend of men marrying sluts), and the social acceptance of it. While Hosea was commanded to marry an adulterous woman due to a divine command, some modern men often choose a similar decision out of own free will or due to modern social conditioning.

But Gomer's legacy also lives on in marital infidelity, the result being surprising enough to show that modern women don't lag behind men in the "cheating" department as otherwise thought, just like how Gomer continued to shamelessly cheat on Hosea.

Female infidelity has itself become a rampant disease requiring proper analysis to avoid. What could be the reasons? Affluent lifestyles as compared to our predecessors with increasing financial gender equality? Or simply more gender interaction, both in actual and virtual reality?

Nevertheless, the defining feature in these trends of marital infidelity is that women's greatest strength and men's greatest weakness in the game of cheating is often the human mouth, or secretiveness. Men typically can't stop boasting about sexual conquests, while women are simply better at lying and keeping sexual secrets. Thus the real figures of female infidelity may itself be much more than actually polled.

Trust becomes the primary casualty

Naturally, trust takes a beating. Couple that with modern women typically feeling lesser guilt about cheating (with moral responsibility being taken off their shoulders by feminism), as compared to men.

Thus, modern man's distrust of women is a male psychological reaction primarily elicited by the decadence of feminist society.With modern society even turning against men for showing natural territorial jealousy in relationships, the misandry bubble in society further concretes into a formidable monster that modern men often find more difficult to come to terms with.

The crime of paternity fraud

Paternity fraud is an offense (realistically speaking, a crime) to cuckold men and deceive children, committed by only one guilty gender—the female one. Of course modern men won't name their children as Lo-ammi ("Not mine"), like Hosea—even if they suspect potential paternity fraud—so the only recourse they have is parental testing, a modern technological adaptive solution available to men.

Though banned in some places if conducted secretly, and illegal without consent of both parties, many men—fearful of cuckolding—bypass this by traveling to countries where testing is still available to ascertain paternal surety. With more instances of cuckolding rising in modern times, and men being increasingly unnaturally socially conditioned into becoming cuckolds, some men sometimes even choose the option of suicide.

The plight of modern men

Men forgiving (and living with) their wives' infidelities characteristically live a soulless existence of self-deception. One of the greatest self-deceptions a man can do to himself is assuming that his cheating partner will "change". In reality, it's actually circumstances which usually change in life; whereas people don't.

The forgiving husband of the cheating wife only sets himself up for further disappointments, because he undermines his own authority and self-respect in her eyes, while choosing to erroneously display forbearance towards her. Or some men correctly choose to end the relationship. But the sad truth is that men tend to always blame other men for their women's cheating, another dysfunctional feminism fueled social construct, which brainwashes men into believing that both women's (and men's) cheating are due to men alone.

No one can “steal” sex from a woman to make her cheat on her man (unless by rape). Cheating is solely a mutual decision taken out of personal free will.

Gomer lives on

Thus, the Biblical story of Hosea and Gomer bears immense credence in today’s modern societies which promote a culture of cuckolding, whore-wifing, and female infidelity permissiveness. With feminism often playing God in modern social gender interaction, and with modern men often choosing to act like Hosea whether by will or social conditioning, Gomer’s legacy thus thrives with gay abandon.

Do Someone A Favor By Criticizing Their Faults

May 10, 2014 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

Modern society teaches people to rarely if ever criticize another person. When people are in mentor positions where they have to tell a pupil how they are doing, they are encouraged to give out criticism that is nine parts "you are doing awesome" and one part "but it could be a little better if." However, in many cases this is not the best way to encourage someone to do better.

I am not saying that negative criticism is the best in all cases. Every person and situation is different so you should approach each one differently. Never giving positive encouragement will cause a person to burn out and quit over time, but using praise too often, especially when it is undeserved praise, can be just as devastating.

In my kung fu class a few years ago one of the recently appointed student instructors tried to do a spinning leg sweep on me during sparring. It didn't take out my leg, but it did kind of hurt (which was much more than I could do at the time and he started training at about the same time as me), so I congratulated him on how his sweep had gotten much better after the sparring was over. After I did this one of the younger instructors came up and told him in these exact words,

"Your sweeps suck, [pointing at me] because he is still standing."

About a year later, I was sparring with him again and it didn't take long for me to learn that if I wanted to stay on my feet I would need to jump back and get out of the way any time I saw him preparing for a sweep. A person on the street who didn't know him wouldn't stand a chance.

There is no doubt in my mind that my instructor's biting criticism helped him out much more than my beta positive encouragement. Negative criticism gave my friend real incentive to do better and left him to figure out on his own how to do better instead of someone holding him by the hand.

Another personal example is when I was taking piano lessons as a young kid about eight or ten years old. My mother signed me up for piano lessons with a hippie, new age piano teacher who flooded me with positive encouragement. However, she was completely unwilling to ever tell me that I was doing anything wrong. Useful advice was replaced by encouraging me to feel the music and let it come out naturally.

Since none of my mistakes were ever being corrected, I really sucked at playing the piano. In fact after two years of playing the piano I never learned that I was supposed to hold a quarter note for twice as long as an eighth note. I had no concept of timing whatsoever so I played every note on the page as a quarter note even if it was an eighth, half, or sixteenth note.

At that young age I had a nagging suspicion that something was wrong because the music I played didn't sound like the music played by professional musicians at all. My mother and my piano teacher could easily see that I was terrible at playing the piano so they decided that unceasing and uncompromising positive reinforcement was the best way to keep me from becoming discouraged and quitting.

Despite my doubts I didn't believe at my young age that my mother and my nice piano teacher would lie to me so I came to the logical conclusion that I simply had a different "style" than all the other piano players. I kept doing what I was doing since I didn't see any reason to change. If someone had come up to me and said…

"Hey dumbass, you're playing that wrong. You are supposed to hold those notes longer than those other notes."

…then I would have thanked him and possibly gone on to become a decent pianist, a skill that would no doubt come in quite handy.

Never be afraid to tell anyone, especially a child, when they are doing something incorrectly. Refusing to harshly correct someone who is on the wrong path in order to spare their feelings is one of the most selfish things that you can do. You are dooming that person to a life of mediocrity and never reaching their full potential.

The Top 3 Muscle Building Mistakes Men Make

May 11, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

While fat loss is undeniably the top goal for men and women today, I'm hoping building muscle will make a comeback for men. It's time to get over the desire to look like Justin Bieber and skinny teenage pop stars. Sure, women think he's cute. But they want to squeeze and cuddle with him, not have sex. For that, they want a strong man.

Having muscle mass and the brute strength that comes along with it is both practical and masculine, not to mention healthy. Furthermore, it doesn't matter how skinny you are – if you don't have a solid base of muscle then you won't look good naked (do I have to explain the evils of skinny fat?).

Without further ado, here are the top three most common muscle building mistakes guys make.

1. Overloading on protein shakes

Protein has become synonymous with muscle. While it does contain the amino acids that act as the building blocks for muscle, it’s essential that you recognize how much of it you actually need.

Bodybuilding recommendations are bogus. Eating one gram of protein per pound of bodyweight or more each day is excessive. While it’s not going to hurt you physically, it is going to hurt you financially, because protein sources are far more expensive that fat or carbohydrates.

The current scientific recommendation for maximum daily protein intake for strength athletes is about 0.8 grams per pound (1.75 g/kg) of bodyweight (1). I believe this number is even a bit high. But it’s a good number to shoot for to be safe.

The most important thing to realize is that you can achieve this number by incorporating a source of protein (chicken, meat, fish, eggs, etc.) into each of your meals. You don’t need to rely on protein shakes.

2. Lifting weights 5 or 6 days per week

We all know that lifting weights leads to the body's anabolic response that results in hypertrophy (the synthesis of new muscle tissue). I'm not debating this point. But using backwards logic, people often use this as justification for lifting weights almost every single day. More lifting = more muscle gains, right?

Wrong. The anabolic period takes place over a roughly 36 hour period after you lift (2). By slamming more and more lifting sessions into this window you aren't doing yourself a favor.

The anabolic processes in your body require proper rest and nutrition to work at maximum capacity, not lifting more weights. The take home lesson here is: go hard in the gym, and then focus on resting and eating to recover and build muscle so you can go just as hard on your next session, if not even harder.

3. Doing too many different exercises (aka confusing your muscles)

Muscle confusion is a concept that's gained popularity in recent years. It revolves around the concept that by constantly switching the exercises you're doing, your muscles won't get used to them, and then they keep growing as a result.

It's complete and utter bullshit.

Muscles don't have brains in them. You aren't confusing anyone, except maybe yourself. What we do know, however, is that by focusing on getting stronger across a small set of exercises, you will build muscle efficiently. To understand this it's important to note the two main ways you get stronger for any given exercise.

The first way is via neural adaptations. When you do a new exercise for the first 10-20 times, you'll always see rapid increases in strength. Don't be fooled, this isn't because your body synthesizes massive amount of muscle tissue when it encounters a new exercise. This is happening because your brain and nervous system are familiarizing themselves with the movement, and getting more efficient at doing it, with roughly the same amount of muscle (3).

The second way your body adapts to become stronger at a particular exercise is via hypertrophy – by building new muscle tissue (3).

So when you constantly switch between exercises, you'll acquire the neural efficiency for a wide range of exercises but neglect most of the muscle hypertrophy that you could achieve if you just stuck with a handful of movements that hit every muscle in your body.

What We Can Learn About Beta Males From Aqua Teen Hunger Force

May 11, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Aqua Teen Hunger Force is one of the original shows on Adult Swim on Cartoon Network. It is highly absurd, surreal and has some red-pill lessons about self-absorbed beta males.

Overview Of The Show

The first three main characters—Frylock, Master Shake & Meatwad—all live in house together. The other main character is their neighbor, Carl. Initially, the show was about the Aqua Teens solving crimes, but it evolved into a sort-of Seinfeldian show about nothing.

Frylock

The leader of the three, if you could call him that. He is very smart and if often battling with Shake over Shake's treatment of Meatwad. He is a father-figure to Meatwad. Despite his intelligence and general level-headedness, he often displays some simpy behavior towards women. His bizarre behavior usually involves dealing with women.

Master Shake

A classic narcissist. He has little capacity for empathy and is often the funniest character on the show. Despite his incredible naiveté and cruel behavior, he often displays a modicum of intelligence and education. His insecurity is right below the surface, and is often exposed as it relates to his ability to be attractive to women. He spends most of his time watching TV in the living room, talking lots of shit about how awesome is he, playing cruel tricks on Meatwad and engaging in hare-brained schemes with Carl.

Meatwad

A classic codependent. He lies a lot about his life, but he doesn't boast like Shake does. He is very dumb, but flashes ability to manipulate people – most especially Shake. He spends much of time in his room, playing with dolls and a cardboard box named "Boxy Brown." He isn't very compassionate, but isn't mean all that often.

Carl

The next door neighbor of Aqua Teens. He is fat, hairy, and a loser. He lives in house by himself, worships the New York Giants and drinks lots of beer. He has an above-ground pool that is often a point of contention between the characters. He gets manipulated and burned by Shake in some episodes. He is very lonely and often has conflict with the Aqua Teens. The only one he has a level of respect for is Frylock. He has a car he affectionately named "2Wycked."

Analysis Of The Show

Consider the psychological profiles first. Shake is an obvious narcissist and Meatwad is a codependent. However, you see how these roles can flip. In the episode Super Model, Shake travels to Guatemala to get some plastic surgery to enhance his appearance. Meatwad picks up on his serious insecurity relating to his looks and exploits it ruthlessly, giving him a bit of approval but withholding most of it, always suggesting he needs more work done. He shows how the roles can flip depending on the insecurities flashed by either party. The episode ends with Shake eating soup, depressed on the floor of Meatwad's room. With Meatwad out in the living room, it highlights the pure role inversion – Meatwad is in Shake's normal place, while Shake is in Meatwad's normal place.

Carl is a stereotypical omega. He's poor with a criminal record and nothing going on for him except watching porn, drinking beer and spending what little scratch he has on strippers and hookers. He has an incredibly poor relationship with both of his parents – some scenes show how cruel his father was to him – we see why his self-esteem is so low. While he flashes occasions where he really wants to change, he seems content to be stroking his cock in one hand, while downing beer in the other.

As for Frylock, he tries to stay above the fray of the two, often checking Shake's cruelty. Often, though, he just lets it go as he knows there can be no good ending to their interactions. One episode has Frylock dressed in a bad costume in order to bed a human female. His insecurity relating to his attractiveness is on full display. Both Meatwad and Shake are dismissive of his concerns – they seem to be thinking "Here we go again." Shake doesn't antagonize Frylock too much, though, as he isn't a target he can feel superior to on a continuous basis. Notice the dynamic here – Frylock at least tries in real life to get with women, but Shake it only concerned with his attractiveness to women in theory. That is a classic narcissistic trait.

The red pill analysis here is that these characters are varying archetypes of the "nice guy." Frylock flashes the most potential – with his intelligence, social comportment and general ability to see the world for what it is. He is ham-strung because of his two friends, but I think he wants it that way. He sometimes tries to flee the situation – one episode he does – but he always comes back. On some level, he feels a paternal connection with all the other characters, as they need him. However he needs them, too. I get the feeling it is self-handicapping. Can't change? Blame it on the fact you have a duty to Shake and Meatwad.

Shake is the quintessential narcissistic beta male. He is unattractive to women. Instead of self-handicapping or drinking himself to death, he lives in a world in his own mind. His outlandish shit talking is often hilarious, but speaks to a level of delusion. His incessant watching of TV reinforces this point. Such levels of media immersion are correlated to levels of narcissism, as you either identify or become envious of the characters. You start to live out lives you don't get to in real life. With too much engagement in it, it can lead to blurring the lines between reality and fantasy.

Shake displays this greatly, as he is able to cough up all sorts of information on movies and TV shows – all fictional characters. As for Carl, he engages in a form of narcissism as he watches porn constantly and is a drunk. Alcoholism is a form of narcissism, as is constant viewing of porn – as you are fantasizing about fucking those women instead of learning to fuck them in real life.

This is the reality of the beta male in modern society. Unable to come to terms with the sexual revolution, hypergamy and social decline, they check out and live lives in their own heads. When women talk about guys far overplaying their hand, such as on dating sites, they are right sometimes. Sometimes it is self-handicapping (intentionally picking women that far outstrip your SMV) or just plain thirstiness.

The thirst of a beta male isn't just sexual – it reflects the desire for female approval. Unable to get that positive attention as a child, they act it out through their sexuality. They may white-knight for female friends, but the thirst gets most palpable when presented with a sexually attractive female. They are acting out failed relationships with their mother – "I should just able to offer myself and that should be good enough." It reflects the stupid prevailing advice given to men, but it also has a level of immaturity to it. That line above is something a kid should be able to say to his mother and get unconditional love in return.

The show displays the lives of some low-status males. Often the show is surreal and has lots of blood, death and general debauchery. However, when presented with women, their hierarchies are flipped upside down. Suddenly the ball-busting Carl is a huge pussy. Think about it – if he just used some of that bluster and take-no-shit attitude (although he does put up with a lot shit from the Aqua Teens) with women, he would able to get some female attention.

However, none the characters have the ability to change. The Aqua Teens supposedly moved to Seattle from the Jersey shore, but in the same house with Carl next door.

Doesn’t matter what they do, they are trapped in their lives. They have the same recurring antagonists, the same recurring issues. It shows how stagnant our society is, reflected through the machinations of a fry box, milkshake and a wad of meat. Its’ a great show that is often hilarious (watch it high if you want a good ab workout), with some interesting social commentary that epitomizes the beta males of America.

14 Things That Happen As You Grow In Worldly Wisdom

May 12, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

We seek self-improvement in many areas: in physical fitness, language proficiency, travel, stimulating intercourse with women, professional advancement, and in growth of character and worldly wisdom. Our premise is that development in all these areas makes us better and more successful men. It is relatively simple to measure our progress in the first five areas I have just listed. They are readily quantifiable fields of endeavor. Years ago, when I wanted to maximize my score on the Marine Corps physical fitness test, for example, I would work towards running three miles in eighteen minutes, doing eighty sit-ups in two minutes, and doing twenty pull-ups.

But how is it possible to "measure" our progress in developing character and wisdom? Is there any meaningful metric that can be used? The question is an important one. Without some method of regular self-examination, we will inevitably make things easier on ourselves; we will slide into complacency. Advancement will come to a halt. We will become like the weight-lifter whose progress has reached a plateau, and then just fizzles out.

There are some signs that can be used as indicators of progress in worldly wisdom. If you are aware of what they are, you will be more likely to notice them. As you continue your humanistic studies, and (more importantly!) the flesh-and-blood school of hard knocks, you will begin to notice one or more of the following signs of maturing wisdom.

You begin making regular contributions and additions to your philosophy of life. Wisdom accretes slowly, like mineral formations building slowly in a cave from the steady dripping of water. As the poet Hesiod says in Works and Days (361-362): "If to a little you keep adding a little, and do so frequently, it will soon be a lot." You build your house of wisdom slowly, one timber and one shingle at a time.

You begin to notice connections between things (ideas, places, personalities, emotions, etc.) previously not perceived. Increasing wisdom and virtue opens doors of perception that were previously closed.

You begin to lose enthusiasm for being around people without ambition or purpose. Abandoning people or things that add no value to your life is an important step in forward progress. Keeping company with dullards, fools, and dissolute people will bring you to ruin sooner or later.

Depressions of the mind or spirit become less frequent and more tolerable. The philosopher Plotinus, seeing that his pupil Porphyry was suffering from extreme depression, encouraged him to take an extended vacation in Sicily. The change in routine did him wonders, and accelerated his forward progress in Neoplatonism.

You are less and less disturbed by the foolishness, absurdities, and cruelties of the world. A major sign of progress is to maintain one's calm in the face of the avalanche of nonsense which the world throws at us. I confess I need much improvement in this area.

Your style of discourse (in speaking and writing) begins to change. Refinement will inevitably become a feature of your discourse. As the gem becomes more polished and cut, it gleams more brightly.

You begin to lose your inflexibility in holding on to your cherished beliefs. What we once saw as doctrine, we begin to see as only one perspective. Certainty is the mark of a closed mind, and is murderous. The key lesson of philosophy is perspective.

You no longer feel the need to convince or convert people to your position. People will arrive at the truth in their own time, and on the backs of their own horses. Losing an argument or debate with another man will mean nothing to you. Aristippus, after being verbally lashed by another man, said "I who have been beaten in an argument will have a better night's sleep than my victor."

You become less governed by your passions, and more governed by reflection and reason. Unformed spirits are slaves to their fear, greed, envy, and rage. As a man makes progress in acquiring wisdom, he shifts his focus from the baser passions to the milder, less serious ones. Advancement of wisdom takes the edge off the destructive passions. Consider what the humanist Francesco Filelfo (Letter to Poggio and Valla, 1453) said about the destructive power of excessive passion:

> We do in fact commonly abandon reason from time to time and freely follow our passions. This often happens when we are taken in by the advice of friends who secretly hate us or are out for revenge for themselves: they goad us to fury, bringing us to such heights of passion that we upset all laws human and divine…Can there be any injury so grave as to drive you mad? For the man who lies is mad enough. This surely is the nature—the violence, the rage, the fury—of a troubled soul, that it knows no restraint…For as long as a man is deprived of reason's light, he perceives nothing clearly and judges nothing rightly. So it comes about that he is as one walking through deepest shadow, his road before and behind, his very destination unknown.

You become more focused on action, and less focused on excuses. The wise man knows that nothing in this world is attained without effort and struggle. He spends less time in fantasy, and more time in execution.

You begin to seek out other wise men and value their company. As Plutarch says, "And a young man improving in character instinctively loves nothing better than to take pride and pleasure in the company of good and noble men…"

You become more focused on attending to details. Carelessness and frivolity are feminine traits. The wise man, who seeks progress through study of philosophy, will begin to realize that this world is a serious place, requiring a certain sense of sobriety and application. The responsibilities of life should be embraced, not shirked.

You begin to see the unity of all things, and the love of this unity growing within you. As the great Nicolas of Cusa says (Sermon 144),

> Love turns into devotion by way of love, so that it is dissolved in tears. For it is like a fire that is applied to green wood, which burns one part while leaving another moist. Thus does love act upon the frigid soul…Therefore, love is the cause of order. When it ceases, order does too.

You become more and more drawn to the study of philosophy. If you care about the world and about yourself, then you care about philosophy. Its study will raise you to heights undreamed of. As Valerius Maximus says, in a brilliant aside in his Memorable Doings and Sayings (III.3):

> There is another strong and resolute soldiering of the spirit, powerful through letters, priestess of the venerable rites of learning: philosophy. Once received in the heart, she drives away every unseemly and useless emotion, confirms its entirety with the bulwark of solid virtue, [and] makes it more powerful than fear and pain.

There is an inescapable balance in life. The more difficult a goal is to achieve, the more worthwhile it will be. Acquiring worldly wisdom is the most difficult of all. You will mostly feel lost, bewildered, and confused. You will often feel like abandoning the pursuit altogether. But even in these moments, remember that you are progressing, even if you believe you are not. Watch for the signposts on the road, as I have listed them above, and continue on your journey. Allow others to help you. As the great humanist Lorenzo Valla said, “To take pleasure in the success of the good and the wise falls only to the lot of one who is himself good and a lover of wisdom.”

Why You Should Broaden Your Romantic Options

May 12, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

A German political party has recently found itself in the media spotlight as a result of a pornographic affiliation. The source of that affiliation is Ina Groll (aka “Kitty Blair”), a pornstar featured in many of the far-right National Democratic Party of Germany’s promotional campaigns. Groll has been relieved of her duties by the NDP, though not merely because of her pornographic career (which everyone had been aware of). Rather, it was the revelation of Groll’s participation in a specific scene that ended her budding career as a political campaigner. In that scene (contained in “Kitty Delivers Sperm”, one of her recent movies), Groll had sex with a black male actor.

> Ina Groll, who goes under the porn name ‘Kitty Blair’, had been widely featured in a high-profile campaign by the National Democratic Party of Germany (NDP).
> She encouraged men to join the party by standing outside election polls dressed in revealing outfits. As the face of NPD, Ms Groll attended promotional events and starred on posters, while making friends with many senior neo-Nazis across Germany. But the blonde model has now been fired after senior NDP officals watched her latest porn film – and discovered she had slept with a black man.
> Party officials were apparently willing to turn a blind eye to Ms Groll’s career choice, which saw her star naked in a number of adult films.
> But they could not ignore her sexual encounter with the black male in her latest movie, titled Kitty Discovers Sperm.
> And once Ms Groll’s actions were made public, a Facebook page was even formed to remove her from the party.
> One member of the party wrote: ‘Those who sell their body for money and disgrace their race have no place in our party.’
> Following lengthy discussions and a party meeting, NDP officials decided to sever all ties with the porn star.

This kind of thing perplexes me. Groll was a hardcore pornstar known for pushing some boundaries on camera, but none of that was enough to get her into trouble. These men were willing to associate with this woman when she’d been known for participating in numerous gangbangs and engaging in regular ass-to-mouth and urination play on camera, but a single scene with a black male was too much to take? A woman who gets pissed on and willingly slobbers all over unclean penises that have recently been removed from her posterior is fit to serve as the face of your political party, but a woman who has plain old intercourse with a black male is a problem?

Such aversion to interracial unions is not rare, but is it rational or is it just another limiting belief? Red pill males have different views on how the mating game should be approached, but I honestly think that these variations have no impact on the final answer to that question.

Let's say that you've recently taken the red pill and seen the world for what it is. You decide that, while the truths you're coming to understand about the nature of the modern mating game are not easy to come to terms with, you are going to accept them and make the most of them. You intend to "enjoy the decline", as they say. What does such a man have the gain from the availability of interracial pairings?

A whole lot. The modern mating game has been defined by the prevalence of women who are becoming increasingly free and open in the spread of their sexuality, a trend that is very good for young men looking to enjoy themselves and find sexual gratification. These women come in all colors – any given young man in this position can expect to often run into young, attractive, sexually free women who are not of their given ethnicity. A man who is not open to interracial unions severely limits his romantic options and decreases his potential to receive the sexual gratification he might be seeking. Broader options lead to more opportunities for fulfillment.

Granted, not all red pill men are like this so let us consider another scenario. In this hypothetical, you have come to understand the truths about the nature of the modern mating game and you still don't like them. Unlike our previous hypothetical male, however, you don't merely decide to "enjoy the decline". You want to resist it by embracing a more traditional approach to masculinity and romance. You want to find a good woman and raise a good, sizable family in accordance with this. What does this man have to gain from the availability of interracial pairings?

The answer is the same as before: a whole lot. Women who desire a more traditional approach to relationships and family formation exist all over the world and do still persist in great numbers, but they do not all share the same ethnicity or race. A man looking for such a woman only increases his chances of success by remaining open to interracial unions. This reality is especially pertinent for men of certain backgrounds: if you're a western male of, say, European heritage, you stand to gain more than many men of other backgrounds in other parts of the world by broadening your horizons in your search for a more traditional partner. You come from a part of the world and belong to a demographic in which traditionalism (along with the women who prefer to abide by it) is arguably less common than anywhere else: looking outside of the box ought to be your imperative if you want to make that traditional approach a focus in your romantic life.

At the end of the day, men truly concerned with self-improvement have little to gain by opposing interracial unions. We live in a world that is more connected and accessible than ever before, and that means that our planet's many diverse populations are more interconnected as well. Our predecessors seeking romantic gratification had to hope that they'd find a suitable mate in their town or region. Now, men can transcend those boundaries in search of what they really want.

Why erect another boundary in the form of race? Many dialogues in the manosphere attempt to do just, and I believe this to be a mistake. Any man (regardless of his background) truly concerned with romantic self-improvement should have no time for such limiting beliefs. I see men wasting tremendous amounts of energy getting upset at the prospect of interracial unions, but where does that get you? Why not spend that time and energy transcending cultural, racial and geographical boundaries and gaining access to a world full of attractive women who are interested in you? Why not spend that time and energy broadening your horizons and increasing your chances of finding what you want romantically? Why waste time getting upset when you can be getting yours and making your own romantic self-improvement a reality?

There are entire continents filled with women who may not share your ethnicity, but may potentially be more capable than others of providing the kind of relationship that would make you happy. Go find them. The world is your oyster, and you should treat it as such. Broaden your options, find what you want, and make it yours. Don't let inconsequential distinctions get in the way of your improvement.

5 Ways To Boost Your Testosterone

May 12, 2014 | by Clark Kent | Link | Original Link

I probably don't have to tell you just how important testosterone is to being a man. Healthy levels make us feel strong, confident, and aggressive. But lifestyle choices can and do affect just how much of the manly hormone we produce. Here are some tips for keeping your T levels high:

1. Forget "Testosterone Boosters"

I've been contacted by different supplement companies to see if I will promote a "testosterone booster" on my blog. I always ignore these requests. The reason is simple: I've yet to see any real scientific evidence (double-blind, placebo controlled studies) that any supplement actually increases levels of the manly hormone. I've seen these pills and powders come and go for over 20 years and none of them actually do anything except drain your wallet. I'll be happy to change my mind if something hits the market that is backed by solid research, but in the meantime I'd recommend you save your money.

2. Stay Lean

High body fat levels in men are associated with low testosterone and high estrogen (a losing combination). This makes sense—a fat body will produce more estrogen than a lean one. You may rightly argue that causation and correlation are not the same thing, but the evidence suggest being overweight is the cause (not the effect) of low testosterone in most cases. One study measured the body fat and testosterone levels of 821 men over the span of 4.8 years. As expected, fatter subjects tended to have less favorable hormonal profiles. The researchers reached this conclusion:

> "Longitudinal analyses showing no influence of baseline hormone levels on change in anthropometric measures imply that body composition affects hormone levels and not the reverse."[1]

Is it possible to be too lean? Maybe. The calorie restrictions required to get down to 4-5% body fat may be just as bad for your T levels. One study tracked a drug-free bodybuilder as he dieted from 14% down to 4.5% body fat for a competition. His testosterone levels dropped and incredible 80%.[2] This is one of the many reasons anabolic steroids are so popular among competitive bodybuilders.

You will look and feel better if you can maintain a reasonably lean physique (maybe 8-15% body fat).

3. Sleep

Consistently getting a good night's sleep is another way to make sure to keep your T levels high. One study measured the effects of sleep deprivation on the testosterone levels of ten healthy men. Their hormone levels were tested the first three days with ten-hour bedtimes (retiring at 10:00 p.m. and getting up at 8:00 a.m.). The men were then subjected to sleep deprivation, only getting a five-hour bedtime for the next eight nights. Their testosterone levels dropped anywhere from 10-15% as a result of the sleep deprivation. This is especially remarkable when you consider the mean age of the subjects was 24—what should be a peak as far as testosterone production is concerned. In other words, even young men are not immune from the effects of sleep deprivation.[3]

Here's another bonus to sleeping well: it will help you stay lean. Losing sleep seems to cause several unfavorable changes as far as hormones that control appetite and fat loss. It makes you feel hungrier, making you more likely to eat too much.

4. Eat Broccoli

Broccoli is great because it is full of fiber and has virtually zero carbohydrates. These properties have made it a staple of bodybuilding diets for decades. But broccoli is also helpful for hormone balance and (indirectly) boosting your testosterone. Broccoli contains a phytochemical that helps to minimize the effect of estrogen in your body. These chemicals basically convert estrogen to “friendlier,” less potent form. The end result is higher levels of free testosterone.[4]

5. Drink Less Alcohol

Alcohol use has been shown to have a negative impact on testosterone levels in several studies. The negative correlation between alcohol consumption and T levels is not completely understood, but here are a few things to consider:

1. Alcohol itself seems to have a direct (negative) impact on the production and/or synthesis of testosterone.

2. Alcohol abuse damages the sexual organs as well as the liver and other organs.

3. Some types of alcoholic beverages (such as bourbon, beer, and wine) are high in phytoestrogens–chemicals that mimic estrogen when ingested. Even “moderate” drinking levels have been shown to lower testosterone levels in some men.[5]

Conclusion

Let me give you some final words of advice:

I mentioned not spending your money on “testosterone boosters.” The same goes for most bodybuilding supplements. Stick with the basics: creatine monohydrate, protein powder, a multivitamin, and fish oil (you may want to add vitamin D3 if you don’t get much sun exposure or are dark-skinned). The same is true for “fat burner” supplements: most of them are overpriced caffeine tablets (there are a few exceptions which I have written about on my blog). Be skeptical of the hype when it comes to supplements.

Keep the “90% rule” in mind. I realize most of us can’t follow these tips 100% of the time. I’m not saying having a beer or pulling an all-nighter every once in a while is going to turn you into an effeminate, doughy beta-male. But what you do most of the time matters and will affect you for better or for worse. If you can follow these tips 90% of the time you should have great results.

One more thing: I’d advise you to get your testosterone levels tested while you are still young. This will give you a baseline to compare against as you age. If you need testosterone replacement therapy at some point you will have an idea of what your levels were in your peak.

Women Are Wimps And That’s Not a Bad Thing

May 13, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

During the last winter, I had to change over to a 24 hour gym for two months because of some rough scheduling at my work. I wound up having to go to the gym around 11:30 at night. The crowd at that time consisted mostly of the temporary floaters—people who would come in for their free week trial and disappear back to whenever they came when it expired—but there was a small collection of regulars I quickly noticed. Two of these were a butterface with a sweet bod and her chubby but cute faced friend.

The length of my routine and the two girls usually co-ordinated. Sometimes they’d be there before I’d get in, or vice versa, and sometimes they’d leave before I did… again vice versa… but for the most part the three of us showed up and left around the same time. We never became friends. We never even talked really, just exchanging a few lame pleasantries from time to time whenever we happened to pass by each other without our headphones in.

One night I had a hook-up scheduled, so I hit the gym earlier then normal. This was on a weekend night, so none of the regular or temporary crowd was in there during my routine. Finally toward the end I noticed butterface show up and begin her work out. I left to hit the showers. By the time I came out the cute faced chubbikins had arrived. I caught them both briefly looking toward me, then around the gym. They were talking about something and their body language piqued my interest so I pretended to do something involved with my gym bag just outside the men’s room so I could listen in. This is what I heard:

Butterface: “Are you sure you want to work out alone?” She said it in the same tone as someone would ask: “Are you sure you want to walk naked through rape alley after sundown?”

Cute chubalubs: “I’ll just wear one of the alert bracelet things.”

The gym is often unstaffed, so they provide a weird USB stick looking thing with a button on it and a strap that can go around your wrist. If you hit the button, emergency help is contacted.

Butterface: “Are you sure?”

At this point the pair walked away from me, and I couldn’t hear the rest of their conversation over the gym music. Soon they came back and walked into the girl’s change room. I went out to the attached parking garage, began warming up my car, and by the time I was ready to drive away I saw Butterface and Chunky Cute walking out to their cars.

By this night I had been going to the gym for awhile. I had spent a lot of nights in there with one or the other of those two girls; just the two of us, alone, at the gym. And yet because I, the man, was leaving early, these two chicks had decided not to do their routines. I knew from working out with her for awhile that Butterface wasn’t even done half her routine by the time I came out of the showers, and Flab Abs had literally just shown up and hadn’t even begun. But because a man they were comfortable with wasn’t there to watch over them, these two cut and ran.

I drew a crude layout of the gym (you may have to click for a better view). It’s not drawn anywhere close to scale. It’s attached to a mall in a good part of the city.

In order to get into the gym, you have to pull up to the parking garage and be let in by one of the two security guards who work the gate. The parking garage itself is one level, long and sort of narrow. At the back is the entrance to the mall. You can see clear across the garage from one end to another, and at night when the mall is closed the only vehicles in there belong to the gym goers and the security guards. On average there were four to nine cars out there, all spaced far apart from one another. There were no concrete pillars for ne’er-do-wells to hide behind, and if anyone was crouching beside a car they’d be seen right away. And every twenty to forty minutes, one of the security guards hops in a cart and does a lazy patrol of the garage itself; not that they need to, since two of them overlook the only way to get into it at all times. And being as it was winter in Canada, anybody who'd have snuck in and waited beside a card would have had to put up with -30 degree Celsius temperatures (-22 Fahrenheit for you yanks).

There are several cameras in the parking garage, and in the hallway connecting it to the gym and the mall proper. After I decided to write this article, I counted the total number of cameras. There are nearly 30 cameras in the gym alone, and from the security monitor I sometimes saw when I talked to staff in their office, the cardio area (where the two girls spent most of their time) could be seen in varying degrees by 20 of them. The treadmills face a large window that a wrecking ball would have to whack twice to break. The gym doors are locked after 7:00 P.M. and require a key card to get in (unless the alarm goes off, in which case it unlocks to become a fire exit). The only other entrance into the gym is through a super heavy steel door on the outside of the mall that you'd need dynamite to blast open. The gym itself is well lit, wide open with no places for anyone to hide, with alarm buttons spaced liberally around it. A security guard out in the mall regularly patrols past the entrance to it, and a few times he even came in and gave the gym a casual glance as well.

The gym is the fitness equivalent to FortKnox, monitored by dozens of cameras, with at least three security guards within screaming range. There are alarm buttons within twenty feet no matter where you are in there. In order for a rapist to get in, he'd have to have the training of a US Navy SEAL, with a precisely timed plan worthy of an Ocean's Insert Number movie. And even then; should he make it in without being noticed, the Green Berapist would have to grab chubbaloves or butterface within four seconds before she hit the button on her wrist alarm or bolted over to one of the numerous other ones on the wall.

And with all that security, these women still didn't feel safe unless there was a man in the gym with them. Remember, I wasn't friends with these girls. We never said more than ten words to each other at any one time. But the fact that I wasn't going to be in there that night made them so wary that they actually cancelled their routines and fled. The country could collapse into the most nightmarish police state imaginable, with ten thousand troops goose stepping down the streets at all day and night, cameras with night and thermal vision covering literally every inch of our homes and cities, with random police spot checks, and women still wouldn't feel safe unless a man they were trusted was in the room with them.

I'm not sure if Universities in other countries have them, but here in Canada most schools host an event called Take Back The Night. A mob of women get together at night, usually ten or eleven, whenever the sun's gone down, and they go on a big march through the nearest neighbourhoods. The point of this is to prove that women don't have to be afraid to walk around at night. This pointless, you go grrrl self schlicking usually makes the papers or local news, if the city is big enough. Pictures of 'brave' and 'empowered' womyn marching through the evil after sundown streets are clipped and shown around in the fem-centric classes as a big pat on the back. And after that, they never again brave the streets after sundown until next year's Take Back The Night.

The funniest thing about this is that, in all the videos, pictures and stories of it, you never see the dozen or more police officers off to the sides of this march (mostly male) or the numerous boyfriends, beta friendzonee's, male faculty and sneaky bastards looking to get some walking along to the side to protect these 'strong' girls. My first year in university they asked the guys in my dorm to march along, and we got outrageously drunk and did so. One of the guys from my dorm ran ahead of the march, put up his hood and stumbled out of a dark alley shouting, "I'm a rapist! I'm a rapist! I'm a rapist!" as he ran up and threw his girlfriend over his shoulder and took off with her. Not one girl tried to stop him and help their empowered sister, even though at the time nobody knew who he was. In their defence, they may have been too distracted with the rest of us guys who were slowly jogging in front of the march, screaming "ZOMBIES! WATCH OUT THERE'S ZOMBIES!" So the biggest symbol of female empowerment at many universities wouldn't happen without the protection of men the female students trust, but don't tell them that—that's like—misogynist or whatever.

And for my last tedious example…

A chick I went to high school with has since become an avowed and very vocal feminist. And I don't mean one of those bored chicks who think being a vocal radical involves spouting off feminazi slogan on Facebook and Twitter; this chick is involved with political parties, has given a speech for feminism the prime minister of Canada was attending and rumour currently has it she's even writing a book about Millenial Feminism (she actually has a publisher lined up for it).

I'm sickened by the thought, but I'm even more amused by the events which happened at one farm party we went to in Grade 11. The farm kid's parents had built a new house on their property a few years before, and their old one was a creepy two story brick thing they used for general storage. At some point in the night we all became convinced it was haunted (drunken 16 year olds aren't that hard to convince of anything after all) and a few of us decided to explore the house. Me and two other guys went up to it, and two girls, including the future first female prime minister, decided to tag along. They were very vocal about how brave they were, and how wussy we guys were since the three of us had been standing at the back door debating about whether or not to actually go in when the girls showed up.

So we went inside and Miss Feminism taking a slight lead. We entered the living room and all of a sudden three cats came mewling past us. Miss Feminism screamed and literally jumped into my arms, burying her face into my shoulder like a frightened child. She refused to get off, and I wound up piggy backing her through the rest of the house. The other girl and one of the guys left after the cat scare as well, and unfortunately the rest of the house was pretty boring so I didn't get to hear her scream anymore. Still, the whole time Miss Feminism cowered on my back. Her bravery lasted about twenty seconds into the spooky adventure, and she spent the rest of the time shrinking behind a man.

And later that we fooled around in my pup tent, though I'm not sure if that was a reward for 'protecting' her or just something that sloot had planned beforehand. Either way, go Feminism!

It'd all be hilariously absurd except Miss Feminism, and other women like her, are influencing our culture toward unrealistic expectations of women. They shout from the roof tops how every girl out there is Buffy the Goddamn Vampire Slayer. They need not be fearful of anything; this is a grrl's world, just get out there sister and start kicking ass and taking names. They tell their sisters that they don't need no man to protect them or make them feel safe.

But they do. There's a reason why later tonight, when I walk to my friend's place after sundown, I won't encounter any women walking on their own even though there'll be tons of men doing just that. And I will be going through good neighbourhoods to boot. There's a reason why women rarely show up alone to night clubs and bars and raves and other such events, even though there are usually ample amounts of security there. Women are weak, dependent beings. They need men in their life to function beyond a scurrying, fear filled sustenance level of existence. And strange men don't suffice for them either; the faceless forces of police and EMS workers and fire fighters and security guards. Women need personal protection from a man they trust. This is a fundamental fact of the sexes which has been true since the dawn of our species, and will be true right up to the moment we no longer exist.

For all their blah blah blahing about how empowered they are, the moment any woman feels threatened her first instinct is always to turn to a man she trusts. All this isn't a bad thing, and the sooner we as a society acknowledge this unchanging fact of life, the sooner we can start fixing the other crap that's wrong with us. Women are vulnerable and inside (not even deep down inside either, just under the surface inside) they want to be vulnerable. And most men want them to be as well. The depressing evidence is all around us about what happens when women pretend to be as strong as men.

Two Essential Questions You Must Answer Before Accomplishing Anything

May 13, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

I was at the gym a few weeks ago when a young man approached me just after I had finished my squats. He explained that he was a beginner in the gym and asked about the best way to progress toward being able to lift an impressive amount of weight.

"Oh, that's easy — just keep following your 5×5 program and…"

I stopped myself.

"Sorry, I misspoke. It's simple, not easy. Just keep following your program consistently, push yourself, and good things will happen."

I walked away from the interaction pondering what I had just said. My correction was only subtly different from my original statement, but I believe it advocated a completely different mindset. Humans are wired to take the path of least resistance, and there are few things worth accomplishing that are actually easy to do. There are clearly two are clearly two different spectrums to consider when evaluating the method of accomplishing a goal. The questions you will ask yourself are:

Is it easy or hard?

Is it simple or complicated?

Easy vs. Hard describes the distance to the goal. Something is easy if it is tangible, immediate, and low-effort. Things that are hard require sustained effort and go against our natural state of intertia. There are few "Easy" things to do that will set you apart from the average person, because if it were easy everyone would do it.

The other spectrum, Simple vs. Complicated, describes the complexity of the solution. I have found that my best accomplishments are borne out of habits that are relatively repeatable and easily communicated. Complicated things require more explanation, more nuance, and are easier to forget or ignore due to the many steps involved. When you are evaluating different paths to a goal, this is how you may see the combination of these factors out:

Easy and Simple

If your life is a bank account, the Easy-Simple situations are the withdrawals that, over the course of time, will leave you broke. It's both simple and easy to get fast food — just head to the drive-thru and hand over your money, and you can be eating delicious poison within minutes. It's easy and simple to play video games, or lurk on online dating sites from the comfort of your home. These solutions are accessible and require little dedication. The exception here is the direct solution to fixing a minor problem — supplementing zinc to fix a deficiency, for example. However, any large-scale change (rather than just a hack) that is marketed as Simple and Easy is likely fake.

Easy and Complicated

The wisdom to recognize these deceptive situations is of paramount importance. Easy-Complicated situations often contain a needless number of details, but promising quick and reliable results without putting in much work. In other words, this is the domain of marketing gurus. Pyramid schemes, goofy exercises, and workout supplements come to mind as things with mechanisms that are difficult to explain but supposedly require low amounts of effort to show results. The complexity of these solutions is often baked in to distract you from seeing the true hard (but simple) solution.

Hard and Complicated

Some things worth doing will fall into this category—achieving mastery, rather than competency, in an area is often Hard-Complicated. However, for the majority of life's goals, a solution in this quadrant means you are not taking the most efficient path to your goal. Which brings us to…

Hard and Simple

These are the solutions you should search out for most of your problems. We live in a world where most goals have an established blueprint for success, and more often than not these steps are easily communicated in a few sentences. However, the implementation of the advice will require dedication, sweat, perseverance that few are willing to muster. Want to build muscle? Start a business? Improve your diet? Make more money? These things all have fairly simple steps, but require significant effort to execute over the long term. Key indicators for these methods is that they are sustainable and easy to summarize, but you must fight against your inner inertia to do them over the long term. They also tend to show small but incremental returns that help verify their worth

There are exceptions, but for most goals in your life, you will be best served by following the Hard and Simple methods of making progress.

Anna Karenina Is One Of The Earliest Examples Of Red Pill Truth

May 13, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

(Warning: this review contains spoilers of the book Anna Karenina)

In an age of Tinder, Snapchat, fast hook-ups and even faster divorces, it is tempting for many to wistfully imagine a past in which the excesses of female behaviour were tightly controlled by a strong patriarchal system, freeing men (and women) of the many difficulties that plague inter-gender relations in 2014. Students of classic literature know that things have never been entirely rosy. Leo Tolstoy's Anna Karenina, which was serialized in The Russian Messenger between 1873 and 1877, remains one of the greatest studies of hypergamy and its effects ever written.

Praised by both Dostoevsky and Nabokov as Tolstoy's greatest novel, Anna Karenina tells the story of a woman who leaves her stern, unemotional husband Alexei Karenin for dashing cavalry officer Count Alexei Vronsky, charting their ensuing affair and Anna's eventual downfall. In counterpoint we are presented with the experiences of Levin, a deeply ordinary but decent landowner (and avatar for Tolstoy) and his relationship with Kitty, a young socialite related to Anna through her brother's marriage. Both women's narratives dramatize female hypergamous desire and show its damaging effects on family life and the men involved, as well as on themselves.

The Power of Alpha

We are left in no doubt that Anna is an exceptionally attractive woman—Vronsky notes not only her beauty but also her 'elegance and the modest grace of her whole figure' and 'an excess of vitality [that] filled her whole being' when he first catches sight of her. Vronsky himself is every bit the dashing cad:

> 'A very fine sample of the gilded youth of Petersburg . . .awfully rich, handsome, with influential connections, an aide-de-camp to the Emperor, and at the same time very good-natured — a first-rate fellow… he turns out to be educated and very clever — a man who will go far.'

Ticking pretty much every DHV box going, it is little wonder that both Anna and Kitty soon fall in love with him—in fact, it is his raw alpha presence that is the initial motor that sets the plot in motion.

When the novel opens, Levin is on his way to propose to Kitty. Tolstoy draws him sensitively, but we see all the same that he is gauche and not at ease in society. Kitty's mother is particularly keen that her daughter favours Vronksy, who has also made his desire for her plain, even though we sense that he is a somewhat feckless, superficial man:

> 'In her mother's eyes there was no comparison between Levin and Vronsky. She did not like Levin's strange and harsh criticisms, his awkward manner . . .

> Vronsky satisfied all the mother's desires: he was very rich, clever, distinguished, with a brilliant military career before him.'

We can intuit that Kitty's mother is tingling at the thought of Vronsky, and so we see the universal effect a hard alpha has on the feminine across generations. It is also interesting to observe how mothers will aid their own daughter's hypergamous instincts (perhaps as a way of living out their own cougar fantasies). Sure enough, although Kitty is fond of Levin, she rejects his subsequent excruciatingly awkward proposal, expecting to accept his rival's instead. Levin goes back to his country estate, crushed by the refusal, but all does not turn out well for Kitty either. The grand ball where she expects Vronsky to propose comes and goes, but he spends the evening flirting with Anna instead. This causes her to become physically ill, so much so that she has to go away to a spa where she becomes interested in religion—she becomes the very definition of an alpha widow, spoiled for other men.

Female Cruelty

Anna, meanwhile, returns to her husband in Moscow, pursued by Vronsky. After the three meet when Karenin comes to collect Anna at the station, she reflects on his goodness, honesty and kindness, but wonders why 'his ears stick out so' — the first overt indication that she has lost attraction for him. It is interesting to note that Karenin is at no point portrayed as a beta schlub — on the contrary, he is a powerful man, a high-ranking government official. What he lacks, though, is passion, and, we sense, a high sex drive. It is these qualities that Anna's hypergamous antennae locate in Vronsky. When Vronsky asks if it's impossible they might be together:

> [Anna] exerted all the powers of her mind to say what she ought; but instead she fixed on him with her eyes filled with love and did not answer at all.

Having thus accepted Vronsky's love, even though she remains married, Karenin now begins to experience the full cruelty of his wife's emotional departure. How terrible—and yet how familiar to anyone who has suffered female infidelity—-the following lines are:

> 'He saw that the depths of her soul, till now always open, were closed to him. More than that, he knew from her tone that she was not ashamed of this … As he spoke he looked at her laughing eyes, terrible to him now in their impenetrability and he felt the uselessness and idleness of his words. '

Rollo has written somewhere that when a woman loses attraction for a man she becomes colder to him than if they had never met—Tolstoy encapsulates the phenomenon clearly here.

Meanwhile, Kitty's sister Dolly tries to explain to Levin why his proposal was rejected:

> 'When you proposed to Kitty she was just in that state when it was impossible for her to give an answer — she was undecided between you and Vronsky; she saw him every day, you she had not seen for a long time. I admit that had she been > older . . .’

While the reference to Kitty’s age is an attempt to sugar the pill, this is simply one woman’s justification for another’s cold-blooded behaviour. And the fact is that Kitty did give an answer—she refused Levin. What Dolly means is that Levin had forced her into a corner, making it impossible for her to vacillate for as long as she would have preferred to optimise her hypergamy. To put it crudely, Vronsky was Kitty’s first choice, but she would rather have kept Levin dangling until such time as Vronsky had put a ring on it, keeping him on hand as a kind of insurance policy.

Cashing Out

Burned by Vronsky’s refusal of her for Anna, and getting older, Kitty now makes it obvious to Levin that she has had a change of heart, and they marry. Tolstoy makes it very clear that her decision is hastened by her having passed the peak of her SMV curve. She loves Levin because ‘she completely understood him, because she knew it was necessary for him to love, and that all that he loved was good’—hardly a grand passion. A wedding guest remarks that she ‘has grown so much plainer’ , and another that she looks as though she is being married against her will—clear indications that this is a woman ‘cashing out’ on her remaining attractiveness by settling for a wealthy beta provider. That their ensuing honeymoon (and consummation) is described as ‘shameful’ and unhealthy’ merely underlines the point.

Meanwhile, Anna and Vronksy elope and leave for Europe together, an almost unthinkable move, given the degree of shame that this would bring on a society women. In this way, Tolstoy emphasizes the lengths to which women will go when motivated by their biomechanical instincts. In a particularly painful scene at the opera, we see Anna shunned and scorned by respectable (and hypocritical) society women. Even more disturbing, Anna leaves not only her husband but her own son for Vronsky, a separation which does not trouble her much (at first). That a woman is capable of turning her back on even her own child in the face of powerful sexual attraction to an alpha male is a red pill truth many would rather remain unaware of.

Disillusionment

Both Vronksy and Levin end up with the women that they desire, but neither is content.

> Vronsky meanwhile, in spite of the complete fulfilment of what he had so long desired, was not completely happy. He soon felt that the realization of his longing gave him only one grain of the mountain of bliss he had anticipated. That realization showed him the eternal error men make by imagining that happiness consists in the gratification of their wishes.

Levin too becomes disillusioned as Kitty is possessive of him, interested only in trifles and hampers his ability to pursue his passion for agriculture and academia. This is a stark reminder of that most important of red pill principles: men must always ensure that women are secondary to their main pursuits, and never the central focus.

Anna's eventual suicide, motivated by Vronsky's slow emotional detachment from her, is the tragic consequence of her hypergamous instinct, and a chilling reminder of the power an alpha presence has to make a woman forsake her family, and finally derail her life. The novel is a classic examination of the dark side of female psychology and is a corrective to those who would blame the rise of feminism for all of society's current ills. While early feminist ideas were slowly gaining credence in Russia in the nineteenth century, they were by no means commonplace, and society as a whole remained staunchly patriarchal. Anna Karenina demonstrates that while feminism today may enable hypergamy, it has existed forever as a fundamental driver of female behaviour.

The Value of Machiavellian Game

May 14, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

Let us consider, for purposes of game, the greatest though the most infamous passage in all political philosophy:

> He who neglects what is done for what ought to be done, sooner effects his ruin than his preservation. For a man who wants to make a profession of good in all regards must come to ruin among so many who are not good. Hence it is necessary to a prince, if he wants to maintain himself, to learn to be able not to be good…For if one considers everything well, one must find something appears to be virtue, which if pursued would be one's ruin, and something else appears to be vice, which if pursued results in one's security and well-being. (Chapter 15, The Prince)

For such unflinching realism Machiavelli has incurred the enmity of ages. People have loathed him rather as they might the weatherman who tells them to prepare for natural disasters. Evil reigns in human affairs, yet the majority live by rosy illusions, and instead of confronting reality as it is, they'd rather despise or persecute a person who sees it undraped, that being so much more convenient, as well as a righteous way to vent their spleen (to repress which is so crucial to civilization).

Still, it remains true that there is a necessary limit to just how well we can rationally treat other people. While we may act on the highest sentiments in our relations with trustworthy friends and family (though even here, of course, we are not safe from the the possibility of suffering), these sentiments cannot reasonably be extended to humankind in general, whom, since we do not know them, we have no reason to trust. Our friends and family and colleagues depend on us for their own well-being. Hence self-interest is checked by the same, to at least some extent. It is not so with most other human beings, and that is just why throughout history nations have, whenever possible, viewed one another as sources of possible gain. "War," Thucydides said long ago, "is a matter not so much of arms as of money."

The Machiavellian understands that, from the workplace to romantic relationships, if you always do what is right or just, while assuming others will do the same in respect to you, then you are sure to bring about your own undoing. The reason is that human nature is essentially self-interested and deeply corrupt, its worst parts made all the more powerful by social structures and other circumstances far beyond our control.

After this bit of foreground, I want to discuss the value of what I shall call Machiavellian game. Just as "it is necessary to a prince, if he wants to maintain himself, to learn to be able not to be good," so a player—or any man who wants to get laid regularly without paying for tail—must learn not to be good to women, for the dark truths described above are especially applicable to them. Now it is a truism here at ROK that attractive women have a lot more options than we men do, options that result in endless flaking, games, fickleness, and innumerable other reasons not to count on The Second Sex. But it is also true, irrespective of these superior female options, that a man must run Machiavellian game because of the very nature of women. Let us, then, have a look at this nature.

Understand The Nature Of Women

1. To begin with, women are driven above all by a boundless narcissism that transcends all social conditioning and that silly academic cant called "patriarchal objectification."

For no matter the time and place in which she lives, the supreme desire of every woman is to be like Helen of Troy: to walk into the room and watch with haughty delight as all the men fight over her and all the women look on with vicious envy: "She thinks she's so cute, but look at her ankles—so thick!" "I know, right! She probably had a boob job, too." "Didn't she tell Jen so?"

This boundless narcissism is the reason why most attractive young women today live to be on display. "Follow me on Instagram," reads Nikki's Tinder profile, and don't those 246 duck faces just make you want to bring her home to mom? If only you could "keep up"!

Just about every good looking young woman now sets her Facebook profile to the public setting. If you say hello to Brittany on the street she will probably deem you "creepy," but she is happy that any number of strangers can see just how pretty she looks online—the more "likes" the better.

Or consider the staggering number of women who do porn, looking with seductive glee at the camera as they imagine the innumerable men who will see them gagging on some stranger's cock.

In short, the narcissism of women is not only limitless; it is frequently perverse.

The narcissism of attractive women finds them in a state of quasi-sexual arousal even when they have no desire to have sex itself. It is easy, and a lot of fun, for a 22-year-old stunner to go out this Saturday night with her tits and ass hanging out, and to let half a dozen men buy her drinks, each of whom will get a phone number, though never a text back. Having rough sex (some of it perhaps floating around the web) with her FWB(s?) every other night, and with several other men texting her incessantly—some of them studs, some of them even high value men—she has no desire to get pounded on this night of YOLO. Still, it is a turn on to be on display, and psychologically intoxicating to be fawned over while she is.

With an ego so vile as to deserve a special place in hell, and overwhelmed with male attention, today's hotty is highly receptive to Machiavellian game; that is, to a sexy sociopath with all the swagger of Robert Deniro in the scene in Goodfellas where he walks into the bar and, all wit and bravado, slips everyone a bill. When I pull hot young chicks at my weekend bouncer gig, it isn't because I say, "Hi, you look really pretty tonight; could I take you out to dinner sometime?" It is rather because I say cocky, somewhat insulting things like: "Did you come here right from church in that skin-tight dress? Good to see classy women still exist!" "Hey, I remember you from last weekend; still need a personal trainer?" "You know you're violating our dress code again; didn't I tell you last weekend was your final warning?" "Hey, sorry I flaked on you the other night." And so on. The pussy being wet from my (rare) boldness and humor, it's now a matter of transitioning to small talk and logistics. Of course, the flaking and games are still prevalent and inescapable, but this approach is unspeakably superior to that of any generic beta, who merely gets in line to be walked on, that poor well-meaning yet unwitting fellow.

2. The second defining characteristic of women is that they are, at bottom, shameless prostitutes.

Is there a stunner alive who doesn't believe she is entitled to free drinks, dinners, and so on (even though she has her own job, place to live, car, etc.)? And what is this sense of entitlement if not a willingness to trade pussy (or rather, what is best for women, its mere possibility) for material ends? Deep down, even if only unconsciously, all attractive women think of themselves as commodities, and in regard to men their main question, even in 2014, is how much they can get in return for spreading their legs or allowing you to pursue them as you hope to get some. How many women there are in our age of "equality" who simply do not feel right about having sex with a man unless he has bought them dinner first! With the exception of college-age girls, whose biology has not yet led them to consider the looming wall of their 30s, 8s and up are forever expensive; and this reality differs in degree, not in kind, from the more straightforward one of simply paying a whore to suck your dick.

3. The final defining characteristic of women is their lack of any sense of justice (I refer interested readers to my article on this subject).

Don't be fooled here. Yes, women are all smiles and "awws" at the sight of puppies and kittens, and in many instances more compassionate than men, but in all this they driven by mere instinct, by their genetic endowment as nurturers. In order to do the right thing in a rational sense, whether it's keeping your word, following through on a plan, or whatever, a person must have a mind that can analyze what should be done, and the steady resolve to carry out the action. Women, however, tend to have neither ability.

They are generally devoid of a sense of justice for the same reason that they don't excel as philosophers and composers: a powerful analytical faculty, backed up by a constant will, simply isn't there. You met a hotty and ran such superb game that she offered you her number and made you promise to hit her up. You did, but still she flaked. Why? There may be any number of reasons, but in any case, letting you know what's up is not something any attractive woman takes seriously. She'll shrug it off like the sweet text from the lawyer who spent $200 taking her to dinner last night (her boyfriend thought she was watching a movie with Jenna, herself a soulless cunt happy to cover for her BFF).

Women are similarly heartless when it comes to cock-blocking and undermining their girlfriend's relationships out of jealousy. Indeed, the female lack of a sense of justice seems closely related to the narcissism that is her driving force. Many a woman who is not getting enough male attention may thereby incline to persuade her girlfriend that the great guy she has been seeing is "not right for her." The neglected 5 will wear the mask of concerned friend skillfully; in truth, she is driven by malicious envy of the 8, that more successful attention whore.

Conclusion

Simply understood, Machiavellian game comes down to knowing that most women are bad, and therefore not to be treated well or shown any interest other than sex. It is most effective when you can work up a charming and exuberant air. I myself find humor to be very useful to this end. You may want to spend some time thinking up a number of cocky and witty openers, and then more cocky and witty lines with which to follow. Be patient, however, with the obtuse vampires. You'll meet with many "huhs?" since understanding an inventive joke requires at least half a brain. As a great French aphorist put it, "All wit is lost on a person who has none."

To run Machiavellian game is to assume as a matter of course that the pretty woman you just met is a wicked beast and that any sweet exception will actually turn out to be the same. For when it comes to "good girls," exceptions tend to be ephemeral illusions. Nor can anything be done to change the inconstant and unjust nature of women. The wind blows, and now your sweetheart's feelings—that vague bundle of confusion—change and she "just isn't feeling it." Too bad you didn't get a prenup! Your cynical older buddy warned you, son of man.

To be sure, however, in some failed relationships it is simply human desire itself that is grimly at work. The good girl is really still that, but, like you, she was duped by animal passion, which tends not to last, and which is by nature a kind of novel game put before us: a ghost of pleasure and happiness to chase, lest our days be more lonesome and dreary.

5 Reasons Never To Date Women In The Clergy

May 14, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

She was a platinum blond.

I was the dance instructor.

Naturally, I took advantage.

However, after what amounted to no more than a month-long courtship I realized it was not going to work out and kindly let her go.

Then things got crazy.

She showed up at my doorstep at 3AM one night with lingerie underneath her jacket.
She constantly called me and e-mailed me.
Through friends I found out she was drawing pictures of me.
And other even weirder things (that shan't be mentioned here) that drove me to consider a restraining order.

There was certainly a lot more to this unique lady I dated, but one of the things that stood out about her was that she was an ordained priestess for some kind of Gaia-Earthy-Pagan faux religious thingy or another. I would go on dates with three additional "Ladies of the Cloth" (one an actual "witch") and in all instances all of them were batshit insane.

Ergo, all men need to be warned about what they're getting into when they decide to date a woman of the clergy.

1. No Sex (usually)

Understand, unless the woman is of the hippie-dippy Paganesque type religions, you are not getting any from a woman of the cloth. Of course there's always the chance you might, but if they've gone to the lengths to get a Masters in Divinity at a seminary and commit themselves to God, that is some serious religious hamster you are going to wrestle with.

2. By Default You Are Ranked Second

God or Gaia or Jesus or Vishnu or whoever the hell she's committed herself to is the most important thing in her life. Not you. It's just like dating a born-again, except they actually have read the Bible and know their religion and don't need to rationalize away their visceral desires for you. When they say "Jesus is my life" they aren't joking.

3. Hypocrisy

Though well-intentioned, understand the hypocrisy of nearly all women who are in the clergy. NOT ONE real religion, in it's original form, allowed for women to be pastors, priests, rabbis, or imams. This means if a girl REALLY believed in that religion then she would accept and respect the religion's rule that women are not allowed to be clergy. It's like churches allowing gay marriage. Not that I'm against gay marriage or don't want women to have the right to become clergy, but if a church allow for such things then it is admitting it was wrong in the past, bringing up the question "Well what else were you wrong about?" It calls into question the validity of the entire religion.

Ergo, if the woman is a pastor or a rabbi, etc., not only is that religion likely of the "churchianity" variety, but she herself did not respect the religion and is using it primarily for her own personal aims. Which in turn leads us to…

4. Ego and Selfishness

Again, there most certainly are kind, genuinely well-intentioned women of the cloth. But not all of them. Most of them looked at religion like most of their 17-year-old male counterparts contemplating a career in religion—an easy degree, a way to get out of 'Nam, or (worse) an immediate path to power. Imagine the ego maniac that declares a political science major thinking at the age of 17 they have the wisdom or right to rule over other people. Or the education major who loves the idea of pontificating over a captive audience of 13-year-olds. Clergy is no different. You are the shepherd, they are your sheep. It's just too tempting to get power before the age of 26 (if you burn through seminary fast enough). Alas, this is why most people (male or female) in religion are there first and foremost for themselves, merely using God as a convenient and "noble" excuse to pursue power. This technically ranks you 3rd place behind her and "God."

5. They're Insane

And finally, they're batshit insane.

Again, yes, I'm sure this one time at band camp you knew this one female pastor one time who wasn't insane. All I ask is that you go date a sample size larger than I have and we can do a statistical study. In the mean time, I know that every single one of these girls I dated had major mental issues.

Problems with intimacy, problems with control, anger issues, mind games, abusive pasts, destructive pasts, and a weird “eeriness” about them that I just couldn’t put my finger on.

This is no guarantee you will find a boiled bunny in your pot when you come home, but I will merely state there are four datapoints strongly suggesting a trend and that you could perhaps expect the same.

The truth is, though, you should just avoid dating women of the cloth in general. The lack of sex alone is reason enough, but when combined with all the other baggage and complications that comes with it, you’re wasting the one life God has given you on this planet.

A Basic Guide To Selecting Wine For Women

May 14, 2014 | by Mark Law | Link | Original Link

Last time we went through the reasoning process to understand wines that can match your tastes. Today we will explore another subject—choosing wines for your women.

We are making the following assumptions: that you prefer young, attractive girls who have unfortunately been weaned on a steady diet of vodka-lemonades and alcopops, and are thus ignorant of the distinction between Champagne and Prosecco. This demographic is all about fruit, flavour and fizz, with little awareness of the subtle nuances of fine wine. As a man, it is your role to take her hand and guide her within this new, diverse and exciting world.

Imagine you are with your lady, sitting at a wine bar as she defers to you for wine selection. After reading this article you will know exactly what to order for her.

Immediately we will ignore red wines, as most neophyte women will be unfamiliar and closed to the bitter, drying sensation of tannin. We will also ignore rosé – while it is a diverse and interesting category, most people (and therefore most women) still view rosé as low-budget, sweet, pink water – the last thing you want is for her to think of you as cheap.

We will only focus on white and sparkling wines, preferably with only 1-3 years of bottle age; this means you can select a vintage from as far back as 2011 with reasonable confidence (as of this writing). This is good news for you, as most wine is made to be consumed within a short time frame anyway, and it will not be difficult to find something in a suitable price range.

Sauvignon Blanc

Sauvignon Blanc has garnered a high reputation these days due in no small part to New Zealand, from which many examples of aromatic, fruit-driven wines have come. Because of this many other countries have tried to capitalize on this by jumping on the bandwagon and increasing their plantings of Sauvignon Blanc.

Key regions – New Zealand, Chile, Australia, USA (California), and France (Loire Valley).

Riesling

Riesling is an often under-appreciated varietal that come in many expressions, from dry and zesty to sweet and luscious. Germany is the best example of this, with their Prädikat system acting as a guide to indicate ripeness and sugar levels.

Key regions – Germany, Australia (Clare Valley, Eden Valley, Tasmania), France (Alsace), New Zealand and Canada.

Pinot Gris

Pinot Gris is usually picked when quite ripe, which translates to high potential alcohol, however many winemakers will ferment Pinot Gris only to off-dryness, resulting in a wine that is not overly hot and retaining a touch of sweetness and lots of fruit character. In some cases there is limited skin contact that can contribute some texture.

Key regions – France (Alsace), Australia, New Zealand,

Sparkling Wines

Keep in mind that sparkling wines do not begin and end in Champagne, otherwise you will burn through your wallet in short order. Sparkling wine is basically still wine that has retained residual sugar in the bottle, and yeasts are allowed to ferment this remainder to produce alcohol and carbon dioxide.

Be careful with anything that has an age/vintage declaration and terms like Late-Disgorged and Dégorgement Tardive, as this suggests extended time spent on lees, the dead yeast cells that were used during winemaking. While this imparts some interesting yeasty and brioche characters to the wine, some women will be put-off by it and assume the wine is tainted. Stick to Non-Vintage (NV) wines, denoting a house style of wine that aims at consistency and vibrancy.

Key regions – Sparkling wines are produced everywhere; there is Crémant in France, Cava in Spain, Prosecco/Asti/Moscato in Italy, and Sparkling wines from New World regions such as Australia, USA, New Zealand and South Africa.

Dessert Wines

Dessert wines are a diverse and varied category, with many methods of production to create a product with substantial residual sugar. As with any dessert, these should be consumed in moderation. As well as the Prädikat system indicated above, you should also familiarise yourselves with the terms below:

Late Harvest | Late Picked | Vendange Tardive – Grapes are allowed to attain a high level of ripeness, increasing sugar levels and making it more likely to produce a sweeter wine.

Botrytis | Noble Rot – This is a fungus that sits on the grape skins and penetrates them to extract the water. This concentrates the acids and sugars in the berries, allowing for a sweeter style of wine to be made. Dried apricot characters are typical of this style of wine.

Conclusion

Even by limiting our range of considerations there's a large selection to choose from, so picking the right wine for your lady companion should be no challenge. Confidently make selection and tell her, "This is what you're drinking." Cheers, and enjoy.

Every Day You Get A Little Closer To Death

May 14, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Imagine you've been shot to pieces and have seconds left to live. Or perhaps you are on your death bed, cancer has eaten you alive and you've got minutes left to live. Or hey, maybe you'll be lucky enough in this polluted world of leaking radioactive power stations and genetically modified crops soaked in toxic chemicals to live until your old age and die peacefully in your sleep.

Now, take your girlfriend, wife, squeeze, ONS, or slut you just met two minutes ago and look them in the eye. Think if they are the one you want to say your last goodnight to. Would you want this person holding your hand at your bed, or at the side of the road as you gasp your last breath after a tragic car accident?

The plane you've taken on a weekend vacation is going down. It's out of control approaching the ocean at 1000 km/h. Whose hand do you want to hold? Or would you rather just grab your own balls and wish them goodbye? A meteorite is about to hit earth, would you want to spend your last evening with this chick?

I wonder how many men in LTRs would admit quite the contrary. Suddenly most of the women I've dated and even the ones that lasted, giving me an unhealthy dose of oneitis, fade into background noise.

In a hospital situation, where doctors know that death is near, I'd probably just want to be on my own and take a last look at the blue sky out of the window. Thus I'd need a woman in my life that might understand that she needs to leave, without me having to expend my last ounce of vitality on getting the bitch to follow instructions. Better still perhaps having people care for me in this situation would just be an emotional burden I don't really need. Take your pity and fuck off and let me embrace my own death.

The Clock Is Running Out

Ultimately, life becomes so much easier when you put it into finite terms. We think we'll live for ever, but in truth we are all in the process of dying. It's happening a little slower than we can easily comprehend, but it is happening. The ultimate red pill truth is both the easiest to understand and the hardest to embrace. Smoking might kill you a little faster, but it's life that's the real problem.

These moments you are wasting on my paltry writing are part of your dying breaths. There are only 10,080 minutes in a week. You spend roughly half of those on sleeping, eating and other mundane bodily functions and chores, leaving you with only 5,000 minutes left in a week and you've just wasted five of them right here.

How many minutes are you going to waste on that cuntbag you are with, who offers you nothing more than a warm hole and a bucket load of unbalanced emotional blackmail? You'd get a better rush doing some auto-erotic asphyxiation than fucking that tart.

How many minutes are you going to waste in that shitty job that's going nowhere fast and barely pays your monthly living costs. It would be more interesting living under a bridge in a cardboard box than dreaming your life away in a cubicle.

How many minutes are you going to waste on those ‘mates’ who drink too much and talk nothing but shit? How many minutes are you going to waste on your dysfunctional family that always manages to put an imaginary gun to your head over something? Why is that TV or computer screen so fucking captivating that you allow precious minutes to slip by? Is your apartment, car, motorbike, gun, boat, gym, etc. so important that you can’t do without it ? Every few breaths you take, every blink of your eye, you are a few moments closer to death.

Tick Tock

If you can take anything with you at all it will be the experiences, the internal video dialogue, the screenshots imprinted from your eyes onto your soul. You can’t take your digital camera or your smart phone library of photos with you. All those selfie photo-ops do is to stop you from appreciating the actual moment in time you are living.

I’d strongly suggest that you start imprinting interesting and exciting things on to your soul, lest it finish this life feeling emptier than used McDonald’s wrapper . That doesn’t mean you have to drop everything and run off to meditate in Tibet or sail single-handed across the Pacific Ocean, but you must live each breath with a conscious focus, a vigor and vitality that they deserve.

Suddenly the whole subject of females becomes rather unimportant and there are so many better things to do, and if some bitch should even dare to switch on the slightest little girlie head games, childish crap that’s barely tolerated in a high school because the kids are not old enough to know better—just walk away. It’s as simple as that.

Climb up the nearest hill and watch the sunset. Take a run along the beach. Walk though the forest. Go dance like a maniac to some techno music. Jump in a freezing cold lake. Shoot a gun, climb a mountain, run around in the local park like a kid. Climb on the roof of your building and watch the stars. Walk up to strangers and just say hello. I guarantee you in this frame of mind, you’ll be ten times more confident than they are.

Do just about anything to make yourself feel alive and free while avoiding anything that makes you feel trapped and restricted. You know what will happen. Lots of other people will start joining in, because they want to feel free as well. If there is a hell it’s right here, right now, buried in our own psychological state, and if there is a heaven it’s in every living waking breath and in every conscious experience we absorb.

In between their activities, the animals when they have nothing else to do, just sit and watch and wait. That is when they feel alive and their soul downloads whatever snapshots it needs to take with it. An animal has a constant hardwired fear of death, because it doesn’t have the capability to rationalize it’s own death and it’s environment is more dangerous, yet even in that limited state it is still able to appreciate it’s life.

When was the last time you did that?

The only reason we are afraid to feel alive, is because we are frightened of realizing that we are in the process of dying. The only reason we are obsessed with getting laid, is because it’s about the only time we naturally feel alive, without having to make a little effort to do so. The only reason we are losers, is because loss and failure makes us feel a little more alive. We’re frightened of success, because that requires really living, which means accepting that death is around the next corner.

Women Should Not Be Allowed To Vote

May 15, 2014 | by Steve McMahon | Link | Original Link

At the dawn of the 20th century, Britain had the greatest empire the world had ever seen. It stretched from the boreal vastness of Canada to the ice floes of the South Pole, from the scorching deserts of Egypt to the steamy jungles of New Guinea.

In 1900, British king Edward VII ruled over a quarter of the world's population. His navy was the largest, most modern, and most ruthlessly efficient fighting force on the planet. His was the empire on which the sun never set, the undisputed global leader in science, technology, and commerce.

And then, in 1918, the British Parliament made a historic mistake. It gave women the vote. In 1920 the United States followed. Women's suffrage rapidly spread around the world. Nearly 100 years later, how's that working out for us?

Men were free in 1900

A man in Britain or the United States was free to say what he liked, subject only to the ancient laws on slander, treason, and incitement to crime. Men were the heads of their households, and they commanded respect as fathers and husbands. The majority paid no income tax. You were free to start a business without having to fend off legions of government busybodies. There was no welfare state, the only people who expected to live off their fellow men were beggars and drunks.

Western civilisation was unashamedly patriarchal and capitalist. Masculine virtues had propelled Europe out of the dark ages and colonised the New World, creating mighty new nations from scratch. Freed from feudalism and serfdom, the fertile mind of Western man produced an incredible series of discoveries and inventions. These allowed our forefathers to tame the forces of nature which had dominated and immiserated human beings since the first primitive hominids gazed in wonder and fear at a sunset on the African savannah.

Electricity let us push back the night. The steam engine brought us factories, mass production, and railways, which made mass prosperity and mass transit possible for the first time. Modern agriculture eliminated the ancient evil of famine in every country that bathed in the light of Western science. The world began to knit together as the primordial forerunner of the internet—the telegraph—brought regions and then nations and then continents together in almost instantaneous communication.

Nikola Tesla holding in his hands balls of fire

The intellectual crowning jewels of the West lay in its universities, from the medieval institutions of Europe to the Ivy League. These were places where serious and ferociously bright young men studied law, philosophy, and science. Where the secrets of the atom were probed, life-saving medical advances were made, astronomers mapped the cosmos, and engineers dreamed of ways to take us there, one day, into space.

The Western world in 1900 was not Utopia. There was poverty, bigotry, and injustice, but opportunity was real and a man with grit and ability could make something of himself. Many of the richest and most famous men of that era had been born poor and were self-taught.

Where stands Western civilisation today?

Men are not free in 2014

Most Western countries have a labyrinthine code of laws designed to jail you for saying the wrong things. Even in the United States, which stubbornly clings to its First Amendment, a man's career can now be ruined and his reputation traduced if he offends against the latest dictates of political correctness.

Half or more of your income ends up in the pockets of the government, thanks to its bewildering array of taxes. Fathers and husbands—when they're not being ridiculed as the butt of every joke on television—are second class citizens. If your wife decides she wants to take your house and your children away from you, she easily can with the full force of the law behind her.

If you try to start a business, you will find that not only are you not free to hire whoever you want, but you must also satisfy every whim of town planners, environmental bureaucrats, and health and safety commissars—all of them paid for by you, the taxpayer, to tell you what to do.

Another thing that you, the taxpayer, are funding is the welfare state. The welfare state exists to allow lazy people who don't feel like working to live off you without going to the trouble of begging you for your money. The welfare state pays single mothers to squat out feral kids by multiple men without having to hold down a husband to pay for it all. The welfare state means the government is substitute Daddy for these women and their bastard offspring.

One fifth of US households now claim food stamps. That's 47 million Americans, living in the richest and most successful society that has ever existed, where food is cheap and plentiful beyond the wildest dreams of people living 100 years ago, who are supposedly so pathetic and helpless that they need the government to feed them, as if they were children.

Our universities have become a bizarre combination of daycare facility, pick-up joint, and grotesque circus of left-wing drama. Universities are no longer places for serious thinkers to hone their minds. They're places where braying young idiots go to learn to parrot feminist and Marxist slogans before reality punches them in the face with the realisation that their joke degrees are worthless.

The days have gone down in the West. Behind the hills, into shadow.

How did it come to this?

The state of modern society is a disaster for many fathers. But of all the self-inflicted wounds perpetrated on Western civilisation, votes for women was the most easily avoidable. It must have seemed like a good idea at the time, in 1918 and 1920, when Britain stood at her peak and the United States looked to the century ahead with supreme confidence. But women are not like men. They don't think in the same way. They don't understand or value freedom the way men do. Women have a herd mentality. Rugged individualism, healthy masculine debate, and raucous male laughter offend their sensibilities.

As soon as American women were allowed to vote, alcohol was banned in the United States. The temperance movement had been a female dominated nuisance for decades, but now hopelessly misguided female busybodies had electoral power. It was a farce that turned a nation into lawbreakers and birthed organised crime on a massive scale.

Slowly but inexorably, the United Kingdom and the United States, and other societies that allowed women to vote, began to tilt leftward. Welfare states were created, largely because women feel that it's not "fair" to allow people to succeed or fail on their own merits. And it's not "fair" that a woman should have to rely on the father of her children to support her, when she can make men in general pay for her upkeep through the tax and welfare systems.

Government, which had once been small and limited, began to spread its tentacles like a rape-beast from the sickest Japanese anime porn until it penetrated the lives of every citizen. Taxes started to rise in order to pay for all these new entitlements and programmes, and an entire caste of useless bureaucrats emerged to run them. Family and divorce law gradually warped into the anti-male Kafkaesque nightmare it is today because of politicians chasing female votes.

As with most female demands, capitulating to women's suffragists didn't satisfy them. Not content with invading the traditionally male space of political affairs, women started insinuating themselves into every other masculine sphere. The universities admitted them, which is why male students today find themselves harangued about imaginary "rape culture". They swarmed into the workplace, which is why working men today find themselves terrified of sexual harassment or discrimination accusations from spiteful female co-workers. Even the military became feminised and sensitised, with deleterious consequences for the fighting man.

The modern religion of the West—political correctness—is every feminine vice writ large: bossy, deceitful, petty, and false. Almost everything that is wrong with modern life can be traced to the decline of masculine virtues and their replacement with feminine vices. For civilisation itself is the triumph of masculine energy, vision, and courage.

For the sake of our civilisation, for the sake of all men and women, we must undo this historic wrong turn. Women have no business voting in elections for public office, let them stick to voting for things they understand, like the X-Factor. This may seem like a quixotic idea. But remember—so was women's suffrage, once.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. How To Forgive Your Family

Mainstream sources often paint parents as beyond criticism, but most men had different childhood experiences than the picture perfect image created by Hallmark. I've written about the problems of American childhood before, but I've also written about using negative experiences for a positive purpose. Since mother's day was this past week, many of you may have recently called or spent time with families you do not get along with. Here's how to heal that relationship.

Who Are You Angry At?

When someone apologized to the Buddha for a previous insult, he said "don't worry, those people no longer exist." What Buddha meant was that the person who was apologizing to him now was different from the person he was when he insulted Buddha earlier, and that Buddha himself was a different person than he was when he received the insult.

The Buddhist doctrine of reincarnation is misunderstood. It is not that you travel between lifetimes, but that you actually die and are reincarnated in each moment. If one cell is replaced in the body, you are a different person. Since your body is constantly changing, you are actually a completely new person moment to moment, and every change is a total change.

While this may seem esoteric, for me it was actually the key to forgiving my parents. I began meditating and studying zen shortly after moving out of my family's house, and needed a way to handle my anger. Over time, I realized that the family I was angry at was not the family I knew now, but the family I had when I was a child.

In the present, I consider my parents close friends, but when I was a child my parents were clueless twenty-somethings with no idea how to raise a kid. After twenty years parenting experience, they're much better at the job, but when they started they were clueless. The parents I was angry at were not the parents I have now, but the parents that existed twenty years ago.

Furthermore, the "me" that was angry at them was not the present me, but the me that existed when I was a child. At the present, I'm a highly capable adult, who can take care of himself. As a child, I depended on my family for love and survival, and when either need felt threatened I resented them for it, and created negative patterns to compensate. The me that was angry in the present was not the adult me, but stuck energy from when I was a child.

Letting Go Of Stuck Energy

Intelligent men are often tempted use clever rationalizations to ignore what they are actually feeling. Arthur Janov, the founder of primal therapy, calls these rationalizations defenses. Once you understand them, they're pretty easy to spot. When someone says, "I hate my parents, but…" the "but" is a defense, or a qualifying statement used to avoid feeling the full emotion. It would be easy to dismiss childhood feelings by saying "I hate my parents, but they're different people now" and use Buddha's wisdom to avoid moving stuck energy.

Healing any pattern requires two things – becoming aware of the pattern and letting go of it. Our culture has a prohibition against any anger against women, particularly mothers. The phrase"mommy issues" is more often hurled as an insult against men than used in healing context, despite that fact most almost every man and woman I know has some issue that can be traced back to childhood experiences. The stigma against criticizing women and mothers actually silences men's feelings and prevents them from healing.

Psychologists know that it is not the hurt or anger but the defense against it that causes suffering. If you are experiencing resentment against someone, try allowing it flow through you in a way that does not harm the other person or yourself. Amplify it ten times. Express it fully. Most people cannot maintain fully expressed rage for more than two minutes without it giving way to another emotion or new realization.

There are hundreds of healing modalities and artistic outlets that can move stuck energy. A major misconception about healing work or psychology is that it is all about "blaming your parents" for your life. In reality, it is about taking full responsibility for your life, rather than living the patterns your family established for you. Get help if necessary, and heavily qualify whoever helps your. You wouldn't let anyone who wasn't qualified repair your car or run your finances. Hold the person who works on your soul to an even higher standard of care.

Dealing With The Present

Americans are incredibly defensive about any criticism of their parenting skills, particularly when that criticism comes from the recipient of those parenting skills. Acknowledging wrongdoing as a parent means letting go of the narcissistic self-image of being a good parent and actually becoming one. Unfortunately, narcissists often make terrible parents, and we have a generation of narcissists raised by the greatest generation of narcissists.

For this reason, even if you let go of anger against your family, they may not apologize for or recognized the harm they've done. In fact, many family members will continue to act out the same negative patterns they established when you were young, and resist any change or personal growth that would cause either person to shift the previous power dynamic.

If you family is continuing to act out old patterns in the present, you have to set boundaries. While moving stuck energy is helpful, if you don't behave differently now you'll get more energy you have to shift. Standing up for yourself in the present will not only make your life better, it will affirm that you are no longer a child, but an adult who can protect himself.

Call your family out when they belittle you. Cut them out of your life if they cannot comply. Let them know what behavior is required if they wish to participate in your life, and that they can take it or leave it. Have the same frame you'd have when qualifying any other relationship in your life. You are on your path, and your purpose, and anyone who supports that ride is welcome to join, and anyone who doesn't is welcome to leave. If this sounds like the same frame to have when handling women, that's because it is.

Changing Your Family

It's said that in spiritual circles that "the world is your mirror" and that everyone you meet is simply reflecting your own energy back to you. I noticed when I changed who I was, everyone around me changed as well, including my parents. When I began setting boundaries with my family, and they began showing up differently. Unable to get what they wanted through manipulation, the genuine care my family had for me came through.

I saw that my parents were actually just very afraid I would turn out badly, and thought controlling and scaring me would protect me from negative influences like sex, drugs, and masculinity. Of course, because the energy we put out is what we get back, their fear made me rebellious and angry.

When confronted with the choice between losing me or participating in my life on more loving terms, my family realized how much they wanted to be a part of my life. When I let go of the resentment I had towards the people they used to be, I was able to accept them as they are. Now, I consider my family to be close friends, and enjoy spending time with them.

If you change who you are, let go of past resentments, and set new boundaries, don't be surprised if your family starts showing up differently. In fact, don't be surprised if everyone in your life starts showing up differently. This process of can be used on any relationship. Change yourself, and you change your world.

The 41 Commandments Of P*ssy

May 15, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Out of all of the articles I've dropped on Return of Kings, this is one you should definitely bookmark, because you can use it the rest of your life. This article will help steer your interactions with women in the right direction and keep you from losing your sanity. It includes axioms that I live by which I have put together over the years of dealing with hundreds of women and these commandments have stood the test of time over and over again.

If you adhere to these, then you will be years ahead of your peers and it will save you a ton of bullshit experiences with women. OK…so here we go:

#41. Who you marry will be the most important decision you ever make in life. Better make sure she's up for the job.

#40. Never get married or get tied down with a woman who you're settling for. You will be miserable. She will be miserable. And life is too damn short to spend it with a woman low in caliber, personality and desire to suck your cock dry every motherfucking day.

#39. Believe a woman the first time she SHOWS you who she is. Don't allow your emotions to blind you to her flaws and shortcomings.

#38. Women are not the enemy. They are merely following their inherent nature. Learn how to handle them and you will be rewarded with their positive attributes. Flail about blindly and be cursed with their negative attributes.

#37. Women are led by their emotions. Therefore, learn to use their emotions to your favor. Become the puppet master.

#36. Your greatest defense against the manipulations of women, is to learn game. There is no substitute.

#35. Always lead a woman in the relationship. If you don't know how, then learn how.

#34. You are not to be the bitch in the relationship. If you have to pause and think about it, you are.

#33. Women are just as sexual, if not more than men. They crave depravity. Do not be fooled.

#32. ALL girls think they are unique. 99.9% of girls are not unique. Do not be fooled.

#31. The moment you feel you cannot live without a certain girl, is the moment you have officially put her pussy on a pedestal.

#30. Less is more when dealing with women.

#29. Be ready to walk away from the relationship at any time for any reason. If she acts up, be ready to walk. If you stay you will lose a small piece of self-respect, until eventually you won't even know who you are anymore.

#28. Never take advice on sleeping with women FROM women.

#27. If you can’t see who’s the sucker in the relationship, then you’re the sucker, my friend.

#26. What is unsaid when communicating with a woman is often times more powerful than what is said. Learn to use your eyes when flirting with women and conveying sexual tension.

#25. If you get caught cheating, always, always, always deny. Deny until death and she will eventually get over it.

#24. Always treat a woman’s tantrums like you would treat a child’s. Firm and unpersuaded.

#23. Buying gifts, groveling, begging and changing for a girl will never keep her around. You’ll only intensify her disdain for you and speed up her hunt for an alpha cock.

#22. If you think she’s cheating, she already has. Learn to trust your instinct. It’s ‘talking’ to you for a reason.

#21. Never fully trust a woman. It’s not in their nature to be trustworthy. Self-preserve by only allowing for 60% of your trust given after a full and long courtship of at least 2 years.

#20. Never get married before 30 and always marry a younger woman. No exceptions.

#19. You’re not really ready for a relationship until you know what’s out there. Go fuck 20 women. When you get done, go fuck another 20. Then you might have an idea of what you want.

#18. The moment you make a woman “your life” is the moment she’s preparing to walk out of yours.

#17. The only thing that matters to women between the ages of 18-26 is: “Does he make my vagina wet?”

#16. Women would rather be with a psychopath broke bad boy, then a stable, sane beta bitch boy.

#15. Never regret cheating.

#14. Don’t put pussy ON the pedestal, put it UNDER the pedestal.

#13. Always fuck her like it’s your last time before you go to prison.

#12. Frame IS game. If you don’t learn to have a strong frame, your ‘game’ will always be weak and you will always struggle with women.

#11. Always let her say “I love you” first. She’ll love you more for your self-control.

#10. Watch what a girl DOES, not what she SAYS.

#9. If a girl dumps you, never take her back. She will never respect you the same and the relationship is doomed to fail.

#8. If you notice one red flag take note. If you notice two red flags prepare to eject. When you notice three red flags, you had better be out the door.

#7. Women lie. Get used to it. Learn to play the game better than them.

#6. The more money you get, the more you will attract women who are attracted to resources. Learn to put on a ‘Humble Front’ at first in order to screen the golddiggers out.

#5. Women are hypergamous. Get used to it. Learn to develop yourself into a High Value Man.

#4. The moment you invest more into the relationship than she does, then you’re already fucked and you’re starting to ‘lose’ her.

#3. Never put aside your personal goals and dreams in order to please a woman. You won’t please her and you will be miserable.

#2. You will never lose a woman by having other admirers, but you will lose women by concentrating all of your efforts on one. You won’t just lose the one you’re focused on, you’ll lose all of them.

#1. If you don’t choose to learn game, then don’t be surprised when the wool gets pulled over your eyes by a woman. Game is the great equalizer.

How A Sitcom Shoved The Blue Pill Down Our Throat

May 16, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

One of America's most popular sitcoms of the last decade, How I Met Your Mother, concluded on March 31st of this year. For those who are not familiar with the show, How I Met Your Mother takes place in New York City (seemingly like every other sitcom), and follows the lives of the lead character, Ted Mosby, and his four friends – Marshall Eriksen, Lily Aldrin, Barney Stinson and Robin Scherbatsky. The show was at its best in it's earlier seasons (1-4), but predictably became a money-milking part of CBS' weekly lineup in its later seasons. Despite this, I continued watching the series until it's conclusion of this year.

When the final episode aired, I was filled with disgust. Not because I was particularly upset with the way the plot of the show ended, but because the show blatantly shoved the typical bullshit young men and women are fed every day directly in the audience's face. The show was never a "red pill friendly" show, but the last episode reinforced every blue pill lie society feeds to people. So, how did each particular character play a role in this?

Marshall Eriksen And Lily Aldrin

These two were the “dream couple” – they met in their first semester at college and have been madly in love since. By the end of the show, they have two children and are expecting a third. Everything seems good on paper, which is exactly what is so wrong with the relationship story they tell.

For example, in earlier seasons, Marshall left his high-paying corporate lawyer job to volunteer his time as an environmentalist. Now, we at ROK know that your status, and therefore, your job, are directly tied to a woman’s attraction to you. Is money everything? Absolutely not, but it is foolish to think that a move like that would increase a woman’s attraction. Overall, throughout the series, Lily gives off the typical entitled, selfish attitude of your average American woman – and of course, Marshall puts up with it and only falls deeper in love with her every single day.

I would never want a relationship like that.

Barney Stinson

When the show first began airing, Barney was a prolific womanizer and New York City playboy. He was so good, Law Dogger even dedicated an entire article to lessons that could be learned from Barney's ways. He was the prime red pill example of the show – so of course, they cast his character with a gay man in Neil Patrick Harris. But, I regress.

As the show progresses, Barney begins to mature. He used to declare things along the lines of, "The point is, marriage is stupid. Every day new 22-year olds go into bars…" and "Oh…you're thirty? Bye."

However, everything changes. Instead of banging his way through the tri-state area of New York eternally, he ends up in dysfunctional relationships that make him fat, has multiple engagements with sluts (stripper included!), and ultimately ends up marrying one of the other main characters, Robin. Ultimately, Barney becomes blue pill to the core, as he hangs up what he enjoys so much for the "everlasting" company with one special, which rarely works out.

Robin Scherbatsky

Speaking of Robin, by the end of the show, she is a career-obsessing, carousel-riding, post-wall woman waiting for a beta to come in and save the day. Throughout the series, she consistently turns down the affections of nice guys (save for a few exceptions), instead she revels in dating men based off of the firmness of their abdominal muscles.

More on Robin in a minute.

Ted Mosby

Ted is the ultimate blue pill dork. In the show's pilot episode, Ted meets Robin in a bar and goes on a date with her. At the end of the night, he professes that he loves her – and really means it. He also steals a blue french horn from a restaurant as a gift to give her – on their first date. While it doesn't work out with Robin in that specific circumstance, he eventually does date her on and off throughout the show. Throughout the show, Ted does date a plethora of beautiful women by being a nice guy – which we all know doesn't really work.

Due to his neediness and overall attitude, Ted dates women who are simply out of his league (see below) because that's politically correct. Every man wants to think that they can obtain this kind of talent while being a supplicating wuss. While Ted in the show as portrayed as a beta male who succeeds (good job, good apartment, nice to girls), in real life he is simply the chubby man hanging on to his girlfriend at the party, wearing an over sized polo tucked into his khakis and rocking a pair of white New Balance tennis shoes to top it off.

HIMYM Conclusion And Final Lie

How I Met Your Mother tops off their politically correct show in spectacular fashion, in an attempt to shatter every red pill theory. As I mentioned earlier, Barney gets married to Robin, the washed up slut. In the meantime, Ted finally meets the girl of his dreams (the majority of the show revolved around his search for love) and ends up having two children with her. She is cute, but not extremely hot – in real life, she'd be happy to settle down with a guy like Ted, who has excellent status – good-looking, sociable, and holds the honor of being the youngest architect ever to design a New York City skyscraper.

However, three years later, Robin and Barney get divorced. Barney goes back to being a player, and Robin throws herself into her career, forsaking her friends because she doesn't want to hang out with her ex-husband all of the time. A few years after that, Ted's wife, Tracy, passes away due to illness. So what does he do?

Of course, he runs (literally) back to Robin a few years later when his kids give him the approval to date again. In the final scene of the show, Ted shows up at her apartment and rings the doorbell – holding the same blue french horn from their first date many years ago. So here we are – Robin is (by the show's timeline) about fifty years old, and she still has beta men pining after her.

This is a terrible message the show sends to young men. This show is enforcing the idea that it is good to pursue washed-up, over the hill sluts who, frankly have already had their chance in life. By all accounts, Robin was a hot girl in her 20s living in New York City – she had every opportunity to make better choices, find a good life partner (rather than a former player), but she wasted the majority of her prime being your typical entitled and selfish American girl.

It's too bad that she got rewarded for that with another blue french horn from Ted the beta.

7 Things I Learned From Working With An Office Whore

May 17, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

One of my previous gigs (before I discovered the red pill) was in a multinational media firm predominated by women. In hindsight, I see that office as a soul-crushing nightmare for a red piller to work in because the boss was himself a mangina who was under the influence of his mistresses in the office.

She was a mature, progressive feminist spinster (previously a professional call-girl) from the FSU, whom he had given an insignificant job in the HR after having tasted her 'goods'. I had subconsciously nicknamed her as Madame du HR, out of her self-confessed outspoken fascination for medieval French courtesans. She was an average looking, thin, long-legged pale woman with a conspicuous plump ass, but notable for her sexual allure and pull over men.

In spite of her ‘job’, a respectable family background and a higher education, she used to prostitute herself for money on weekends—to business clients, male coworkers, or any other rich influential man whom she met and caught a fancy to at work—and sleep her way to money and professional influence. The office had effectively become her brothel to ply her wiles on men.

After being on the same team with her, she expectedly made her move on me (like she did on everybody else), which I rejected out of both personal and professional ethics. But during the time I worked with her, I learnt some valuable lessons about workplace prostitution.

1. Work place and part-time voluntary prostitutes are as common as professional prostitutes.

Sleeping with the boss, business clients or coworkers for career gain or influence is prostitution—just as sleeping with a man to influence him to pay for domestic or personal expenses. These girls are no different from the working girls on the street whoring themselves for money. That’s what Madame du HR used to do—and often glamorized her own lifestyle to female interns. They were ‘trained’ by her and graduated as full-blown whores themselves to dominate men by the time they left their jobs.

2. A woman's sexuality often gives her more power and influence than her professional skill.

Madame du HR spent most of her office hours chatting on the phone or idly surfing the web at her desk. In spite of being inefficient and incompetent, and the numerous times she was often reprimanded for her "non-professionalism" by the boss himself (sometimes in front of all the staff), she surprisingly retained her job. The reason? Because of her ass (her sexual exploits).

She often mockingly boasted how sexually 'addicted' the boss was to her ass, which afforded her the professional immunity.

3. Voluntary prostitution is a self-rationalized delusion of utopia that women harbor to subconsciously destroy their own character.

Madame du HR's deadpan justification when I rejected her advances was, "You know what, I am a whore. But I know why I am doing it. It's just another job, like any another profession." She had firmly rationalized her choice to whore herself.

It's common to see a lot of modern women having the Pretty Woman complex (a role model for some)—especially from the FSU, to choose voluntary prostitution (a notorious stereotype with some truth), even though prostitution is a social evil. A lot of women keep sponsors for social benefits and end up marrying them, even while having boyfriends, without any qualms about it.

The ability to compartmentalize between love, sex and friendship is a trait unique to whores and sluts. With her dissociation of sex from emotion, a whore often destroys her own nurturing (emotional) ability to bond through sex – a trait unique to the emotional nature of women.

Whores can thus neither nurture nor bond to a man because their minds are self programmed to detach themselves from their emotional natures. Sexual loyalty is a joke for them while sex or love becomes merely an act or a profession, without emotion.

4. Whores can't deal with rejection and lack of attention even more as compared to ordinary women.

After I rejected her, I faced intrigue and double-standards within the office (due to her sexual influence on the male management).

She made sure to make my office life miserable. Whores need attention because of their fragile egos, while real women need respect. And I had unknowingly implied to her that I rejected her because she was a whore (thus bruising her ego), even though I didn't call her one.

Things became tense if she saw me even casually complimenting a female client or coworker—I was often given inexplicable disciplinary talks in the boss's cabin about professional 'etiquette' (while she continued to whore herself to men with impunity right under his eyes). I then realized the depth of a mistress's power in an office.

5. Never get involved with women who pursue you (especially at work).

I've seen many men falling for this bait which usually entails a hidden trap—female control over men—not only in that office, but also in other real life situations.

Madame du HR embodied that– she aggressively pursued men whom she wanted to control (using sex). The men who fell for her sexual bait predictably ended up as her slaves.

6. Never fuck with the boss's mistress.

A no-brainer which most of my male colleagues there failed to follow. The result was forced subservience to her, who dominated them by often threatening to reveal their shenanigans with her to the boss. She used fear as well as sex to control them.

It's often said never to mix business with pleasure, but what's more idiotic is the stupid dog which shits in its own bed. The man who fucks the boss's mistress becomes a toy boy pup of sorts, whose professional life then becomes a minefield with the detonation trigger in the hands of the eaten forbidden fruit (the mistress).

7. Never work where whores rule.

A lot of businessmen offer their mistresses a job in their firms. The ensuing problem for the male staff is that they then have to actually report to two bosses: the actual male boss and his mistress. Looking at her behavior, I sometimes wondered whether the boss had deliberately hired her as a spy, to seduce the male staff on purpose so as to create both a professional fear (for fucking her) as well as to pry out their personal secrets (which he could then exploit to dominate them).

For the man refusing to sleep with such women, working in such places is where you often have to be reluctantly subservient to a glorified prostitute, not to mention the countless double standards and intrigues you'd have to endure for scorning a whore who wants to call the shots in the office. Yet you simply can't afford to piss her off. Offices where whores rule are actually mangina producing factories.

Conclusion

Needless to say, after two years, I quit that soul-crushing job to regain my freedom again. A lot of my ex-colleagues still say to me that in retrospect how I could've possibly risen to higher ranks within that office had I not rejected her. I reply that not all pussy is worth the risk. Sometimes there's a choice in life between a piece of ass, and *peace of mind. I*t's better to choose the latter to maintain your freedom and dignity.

What Plato’s Allegory Of The Cave Teaches Men

May 17, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Plato’s Allegory of the Cave appears in a section of the Republic called ‘The Supremacy of Good’ where he stresses the importance of goodness as a universal goal. The allegory is presented as a dialogue between Socrates and Glaucon, Plato’s brother. Although written in around 380 BC, the allegory (and indeed the rest of the Republic) has strong relevance today for men unplugging from conventional thinking about women and society – in fact, it could be taken as a metaphor for this process.

Plato introduces the allegory as ‘an analogy for the human condition – for our education, or lack of it.’

> ‘Imagine people living in a cavernous cell down under the ground; at the far end of the cave, a long way off, there’s an entrance open to the outside world. They’ve been there since childhood, with their legs and their necks tied up in a way which keeps them in one place and allows them to look only straight ahead.’

They are kept captive ‘since childhood’ and only allowed to look in one direction. This is the experience of many brought up in contemporary Western culture. Here, awareness of the world is mediated by mainstream culture: television, movies, celebrity’s Twitter feeds and Instagram accounts.

> ‘Imagine also that there are people on the other side of this wall who are carrying all sorts of artefacts. These artefacts, human statuettes, and animal models carved in stone and wood and all kinds of materials stick out over the wall; and as you’d expect, some of the people talk as they carry these objects along, while others are silent … they’re no different to us … do you think they’d see anything of themselves and one another except the shadows cast by the fire on to the cave wall directly opposite them.’

The captives, who are ‘no different to us’ are not only solipsistic, unaware of those around them, but crucially what they think they know of the world is false. In fact, they are only seeing shadows. More than this, they are seeing shadows of objects that are themselves only effigies of real things – statuettes, models and so on. They are not one but two steps removed from reality.

Robin Waterfield, who translated the Republic in 1993, speculates that ‘the bearers of the effigies may be the poets, politicians, and so on who have formed the prisoners’ views about morality and similar matters.’ In other words, the manner in which they see the world has been carefully formed for them by those with a clear agenda:

- Poets (read: artists) seeking profit or to support the dominant political ideology. Two modern examples are the music industry and reality television, which lull the viewer into a false sense of comfort while simultaneously promoting the virtues of acquisition in a feminised culture.
- Politicians concerned with maintaining their own power.

In truth, the two act in concert in maintaining the system we are familiar with in 21st century Western society which promotes docile, sheep-like inactivity in the masses.

> ‘What do you think would happen . . . if they were set free from their bonds … Imagine one of them has been set free and is suddenly made to stand up, to turn his head and walk, and to look towards the firelight. It hurts him to do all this and he’s too dazzled to be capable of making out the objects whose shadows he’d formerly been looking at. And suppose someone tells him that what he’s been seeing all this time has no substance and that now he’s closer to reality and is seeing more accurately because of the greater reality of the things in front of his eyes. . . Don’t you think he’d be bewildered and would think that there was more reality in what he’d been seeing before than in what he was being shown now?’

Here we find a perfect analogy for ‘taking the red pill.’ Typically, when a guy first stumbles on game and the manosphere, a change occurs in his perception of the world that can be described as an awakening. You often hear of men who spend days, even weeks reading blogs and books, going from one head-smacking realisation to the next as their former certainties are dashed and their suspicions about the true nature of women and relationships are confirmed. Certainly, that was how it was for me. This often presages a period of disbelief and denial – surely this isn’t really how things are? It can’t all be true, can it? Rather than face the firelight of reality, he would instead prefer to ‘run back to the things he can make out’ – the shadows.

But things only get worse from here. Plato then has Socrates describe the prisoner being dragged from the cave and out into the sunlight:

> ‘Wouldn’t this treatment cause him pain and distress? And once he’s reached the sunlight, he wouldn’t be able to see a single one of the things which are currently taken to be real, would he, because his eyes would be overwhelmed by the sun’s > beams.'

The road to enlightenment, the shedding of one's illusions, is never easy, especially when these illusions have been present since childhood. Staring reality in the face is like staring directly at the sun – it is painful. This is why many men choose to retreat back into blue pill thinking. For them it is simply too painful to do otherwise.

Gradually though, the man who persists is able to adjust to his new circumstances. The released prisoner is at first able to discern only shadows, then real people, then the stars and the moon, and then finally the sun, before coming to understand its role as life's progenitor.

The Intelligible Realm

In this new state of awareness, the former captive feels sorry for the remaining prisoners who have built up a whole belief system on false premises. Conversely, should he to return to the cave, its inhabitants would reject his newfound wisdom, and would sooner kill him then allow him to rescue them. Such is the attachment that many of us had to our former thinking. But for Plato, striving towards 'the intelligible realm', the 'source and provider of truth and knowledge [synonymous here with 'goodness'] is a prerequisite for intelligent conduct either of one's own private affairs or of public business.' In other words, as hard as it may be, it is vital for men to seek 'truth and knowledge' and to stare life directly in the face if they wish to be successful in relationships or in the wider world. This is manifestly true – one need only think of the many examples of men whose success with women has been improved significantly with game, or whose business lives have been transformed using red pill principles.

Perhaps most importantly, Plato has Socrates go on to say that the educated must go back down to the cave to share the benefits of their experience with the remaining captives. In the context of Republic, this is about government: it is better for a community when its rulers are awake. The analogy still holds good for our purposes, though. There is an old saying that goes 'you have to give it away to keep it.'

If you are reading Return Of Kings, it is likely that you have a more advanced understanding of the way things really are than many of your friends. Try to help them out – there's no need to get on your soap box, but just seed out little nuggets of red pill knowledge when appropriate. If a guy wants to know more then tell him. Direct him to this website. Let's treat our blue-pill brethren kindly. It is better for our society if we do so, and besides, we all know where they came from, because we once resided there too, before we were dragged, blinking, out into the sunlight.

How To Get Rid Of Approach Anxiety

May 18, 2014 | by D B | Link | Original Link

The good thing about approach anxiety is that it is self-created, which means that you are creating it and you can stop it. The annoying, fear-inducing feeling called “approach anxiety” is not something that is out of your control and will always be with you; it’s only there because you are allowing it to exist by way of your thinking.

Approach anxiety is activated when you think in ways that cause you to feel anxious, nervous, fearful and hesitant before approaching a woman. Guys who don’t suffer from approach anxiety are those who think in ways that make them feel confident, relaxed and even excited about approaching women. To get to the point where you automatically think in a confident rather than an anxious way, I recommend using what I call “Bridging Mindsets.”

Fixing Your Approach Anxiety With Bridging Mindsets

Bridging Mindsets allow you to feel confident enough in the moment to approach a woman. After a while, you get to the point where you are truly confident and don’t need to use these “training wheel” mindsets to get you to approach. Bridging Mindsets are necessary for overcoming approach anxiety because the settings of human psychology don’t allow us to permanently change from being anxious to confident, depressed to happy or fearful to fearless in one step. The “psychological divide” between anxiety and confidence is too vast and the only way to permanently get across it is to build your own mental bridge. Just like you created your anxiety by thinking in certain ways, you now need to create your confidence by thinking in new ways. You need to “bridge your way across” the divide that separates confidence from anxiety. You cannot do it in one step.

If it was possible to go from anxious to confident in one step, there would be a quick trick or magic mindset and we’d all use it. Psychologists would know about it and the pharmaceutical companies that sell anti-anxiety pills would lose a lot of money. Yet, there is no quick trick and there is no single, magic mindset that instantly fixes approach anxiety. The only way to overcome approach anxiety is to work your way towards a state of confidence so strong that feelings of anxiety become unnecessary, irrelevant and redundant. To do that, you need to create a mental bridge that leads you away from anxious thinking and towards confident thinking.

Examples of Bridging Mindsets

Here are some examples of using Bridging Mindsets to put all of this into perspective for you. If you use “Anxious” mindsets before approaching a woman, you will naturally begin to feel anxiety. However, if you use Bridging mindsets for long enough, you will eventually get into the habit of thinking in way that allows you to feel confident at all times.

Rejection

- Anxious mindset: I will probably get rejected if I approach.
- Bridging mindset: No guy is compatible with every woman he meets. If we’re not compatible, that is fine by me – I’ll just approach another woman who is more compatible with me.
- Confident mindset: This woman will like me. I’ll go talk to her.

Conversation

- Anxious mindset: I will probably run out of things to say.
- Bridging mindset: I know a few things to say to start a conversation, keep it going and keep it interesting, so I should at least be able to get a brief conversation going. I’ll approach her and give it a try.
- Confident mindset: Women love talking to me and I love talking to them. I’m going to chat to that girl over there. She’ll be happy that I came over for a chat.

Other people

- Anxious mindset: Other people are watching. They will probably think I am a creep, loser or sleaze for approaching.
- Bridging mindset: Other people are more worried about how they are being perceived by others; they aren’t sitting around worrying about what I am doing. It is completely normal for a guy to walk over and talk to a woman in an easy-going way. I’m not walking over and trying to pick her up, I’m just going over and having a chat. If we are compatible and it feels like we should exchange numbers or keep talking, I will do that.

- Confident mindset: Other people? I don't care. I'm going to talk to those girls.

Completing the pick up

- Anxious mindset: If I don't get a phone number, kiss or sex then I have failed and have been rejected. I probably won't be able to complete the pick up and the women will think I am a loser for trying to pick them up.
- Bridging mindset: You can't complete every pick up because no guy is compatible with every woman he meets. I'm simply going to go over, have a chat and see if we're compatible. If we are, I will look to escalate to a phone number, kiss or sex. If not, no problem – I'll just talk to some other girls.
- Confident mindset: I'm going to get this woman's number, kiss her or have sex with her.

See how it works? You have to "bridge" your way to confidence. After using Bridging Mindsets for long enough, you will eventually get to the point where you automatically think in a way that allows you to feel confident. To put this into more perspective, I will explain the Confidence Building Process.

Confidence Building Process

1. Bridge

Use Bridging Mindsets to feel "confident enough" in the moment to approach women.

2. Gather

When you approach women, focus on gathering as much positive evidence as possible that you can approach women and are getting better at it.

By “positive evidence” I am referring to anything that went well with the approach (e.g. the women were happy to talk to you) and anything that is getting better (e.g. your confidence and conversation skills are improving). If you try to use this Confidence Building Process without gathering positive evidence from real life approaches, it will not work and your approach anxiety will remain. Step 2 in the process (gathering positive evidence) is essential to overcoming approach anxiety because you need that real life evidence to support your new, more confident way of thinking. Without it, all you are doing is “thinking positively” and we all know that positive thinking is no cure for approach anxiety.

3. Repeat until confident

Repeat Steps 1 and 2 until you automatically begin to think in a confident way about approaching women, without having to use Bridging Mindsets. When you reach this stage, your approach anxiety will be gone and you will be able to confidently approach women at will. Anxiety or nervousness won’t even have a chance to exist in your mind because you will feel confident about the approach and confident in your skills with women.

How long does it take for a guy to get from Step 1 to Step 3 in the Confidence Building Process? That depends on how often he approaches and how much positive evidence he gathers to support his new, more confident way of thinking. From my experience helping guys with this problem and from overcoming it myself, it takes most guys about 3-6 weeks to completely get rid of their approach anxiety using this process.

More Examples of Bridging Mindsets

When you’re at Step 2 in the process, you really need to put some effort into thinking in a more confident way. The best way to do this is to continue using Bridging Mindsets until you get to the point where your confidence is consistent. Eventually, your confidence will become so strong that it won’t make any sense to feel approach anxiety. Your natural way of thinking will be that of confidence, so anxiety will feel unnecessary and irrelevant when it comes to approaching women.

Here are some examples of Bridging Mindsets that you can use as you’re going about your everyday life, or right before you approach a woman:

- I’m getting better at this.
- I’ve been learning a lot of great stuff and my confidence is improving.
- Approaching women is becoming easier and easier for me.
- My conversation skills are getting better every time I practice.
- I’m getting better reactions from women most of the time.
- I feel more comfortable in interactions with women now.
- Approaching women is becoming fun.
- I no longer allow anxious thoughts to pollute my mind.
- I can feel my confidence growing stronger everyday.
- I can’t wait to talk to more women.

If you don't use Bridging Mindsets and instead continue to allow anxiety-inducing thoughts to overwhelm your mind, then you will only be adding fuel to your approach anxiety. Here is the type of anxiety and fear inducing thinking that you need to avoid when going through the Confidence Building Process to eliminate your approach anxiety:

- I've tried to approach before, but I just get anxious.
- I can't do this.
- Women are too picky.
- Women reject guys all the time.
- I've been rejected before, so it will just keep happening.
- I don't know what to say to women.
- Women don't make it easy for me.
- I'm no good with women, so there is no point in trying.
- I can't get any better.
- I'm stuck like this.
- I guess I'll just have to stick to porn.

To truly overcome your approach anxiety, you must make a conscious decision to change the way you think about approaching women. Procrastinating or hiding from the problem will not get rid of it; you have to tackle it head on. You must stop thinking in the ways that cause you to feel nervous, fearful and anxious and start thinking in the ways that make you feel confident and that push you forward to success.

When Your Approach Anxiety Is Eliminated

When you bridge your way to true confidence with women, you eventually get to a point where your confidence becomes so strong, consistent and authentic that you don't stop to think before an approach. You are no longer worried about whether things might go wrong or what you're going to say, so you just approach when you see a woman you like. At that level, approach anxiety doesn't even have a chance to exist because you are confident and you're just doing whatever you want.

We Are Lucky That Approach Anxiety is Fixable

If approach anxiety were an untreatable disease, then we would all be doomed for life and would have to resort to porn or to accepting unattractive women who hit on us once in a blue moon. Yet, approach anxiety isn't a disease and it isn't untreatable. Approach anxiety is created from within a guy's own mind by his own thinking and that is a good thing because it means that it is fixable. When you go through the process that I've described in this article, your approach anxiety will eventually disappear and be replaced by a strong, authentic and consistent state of confidence.

However, let me make one thing absolutely clear: this only works if you do Step 2 in the process. You can't eliminate approach anxiety just by thinking about it. You must gather real life evidence that you are getting better at approaching women, that women are responding more positively to you and that you are feeling more and more confident around women. If you avoid approaching women and try to “think your way to confidence” all you will be doing is useless positive thinking. You have to do Step 2 in the process to give yourself real reasons to feel more confident and to start letting go of your anxiety.

What The Fuck Are We Doing

May 18, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Yesterday I was enjoying a beautiful spring day in New England, laying down and reading in a park, when a thought entered my mind: should I be concerned with the advancement of mankind as a species or with my own personal life's journey.

I suppose these two things are not mutually exclusive, but nonetheless I couldn't shake this dilemma. On one hand, if it weren't for those who dedicate their lives to researching cutting edge technology, we wouldn't have many of the devices that make our lives easier today. We may still be in the paleolithic times or the middle ages.

But does the latest technology really even make our lives easier? You can definitely make the argument that devices like smartphones – in all their glory, gigahertz, and mega-pixels – are actually a huge detriment to society. They take away from having real experiences and replace them with kids and adults who visit some ancient monument like Machu Picchu only to stare at a screen the entire time they're there. And while improved food production techniques have allowed the population of our planet to rise exponentially, this has led to overpopulation, disease, and problems of it's own.

However, I can't take a hard stand against human progress. The medical field, for example, is something whose progress I can only view in a positive light: it serves to directly improve our quality of life.

When I picture someone who's dedicated his life to the progress, or the advancement of technology, at least, I think of Steve Jobs. He's undoubtedly considered a great man, but if you read his biography it's unclear whether or not what he sacrificed – in many cases this was his own happiness – is something that I'd sacrifice in exchange for his achievements.

The flip side of the coin, and the argument that I support, is valuing your life's journey above all. That is, thinking of your life as a story and spending your days making decisions that will fill this story with unforgettable experiences and remarkable growth. This means not taking anything too seriously, including yourself. It means not trying so hard to please your family, friends, girlfriends, or strangers that you sacrifice your own best interests– your own story. It means putting your physical and mental health above everything else.

I'm not advocating being the tyrant who sacrifices his close ones for his own personal gain. No, I want my story to be one of the respectable alpha who dominates his own life and is also a good friend and supportive family member. To do this you must maintain an unwavering integrity. You cannot let an obsession with money, women, or any other desire blind you. Everything is temporary, including our lives, and we must proceed with this fact at the forefront of our mind.

We must invest our time into pursuits that will reward us with rich experiences and a sense of personal growth. The good thing is that often times these pursuits end up offering value to all of those around us. This can could be through dedication to cutting edge research that culminates in a life saving device or simply through writing books that motivate people to change their lives for the better.

Regardless of what path you choose, viewing your life as a story can serve to help remove you from your immediate circumstances and emotions, and allow you to make level-headed choices that will lead you in the right direction.

How To Turn Your Girl Into A Nympho

May 18, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

There is excellent information in the manosphere but much of it focuses on the negative traits of women and feminism. What we need to do as men is turn those negative traits to our advantage. Game and PUA uses the female's natural traits to get her into bed. Beyond that there are a variety of directions you can take her to. If you just want to bang different chicks and have sex the way you want it, well, rinse and repeat. There's nothing much more to say. However even the best players admit it would be nice to have a woman (or two) on lock down. A way to do this is by turbo charging her sexuality and having her coming back for more.

To turn any girl into a nympho you simply have to make her embrace the sexual beast she is. Getting a girl to the stage where she's so desperate for sex that you are doing her a favor by just being in the same room with her is a great feeling. It can be done and by giving her the best sex of her life, you can have her dreaming of you, anxiously checking her phone for your messages, and hanging on your every word. I've spent good money getting into a nightclub, only to have my girl announce before midnight that she's so horny she ditched her underwear and is ready to go home and have me pound her every which way. It makes life so much easier if you can convert her into a nympho, because then she is chasing you for sex.

Once you get a woman into the bedroom, the game is not over. It has only just begun. So much of the focus of men, is on getting laid, that the temptation is to hump away for 5 minutes like a love sick puppy dog, nut, and call it a notch. If that works for you, fine and good, but in the long run, there are more advanced levels you can accomplish by making the effort. If you have sexual access to any woman, all you need to do is change your attitude away from "Yippee, I am getting laid" to "How long and how intense can I make sex for her?"

Think of it like a sport. It's not exciting just to be playing the sport, you want the high score, the trophy, the victory, etc. If it's the first time you get a new girl in bed, take command, control yourself and go all night. If it's a girl you already sleep with or a stale LTR, find a way to isolate her and change the intensity level by a factor of 10.

Men need 'some sex' while women 'are sex'. Think of her entire body as a giant sexual organ. You can tempt, tease, stimulate and excite her in so many many ways. Think of the most intense sex you have ever had, when the girl is just losing her mind, then make it 10 times more intense and make it last 10 times longer. Net result—she's hanging for you to give her a repeat of that experience. The more you repeat it, the more addicted she gets, until she is openly thirsting for sex.

Better yet, she's thirsting for sex with you, because she associates that mind blowing sex only with you. If you are the safe bet AND give the most exciting mind blowing experience, guess who she's calling? It will take a couple of weeks of elbows deep fucking, you have to make an initial investment, but suddenly you will find her dressing sexy, acting extremely proactive, openly engaging you for sex, strutting about the house naked, offering you oral or anal when she has her period, etc. You will go from struggling to seduce her, to getting tired of her constant advances. I can barely get past the first drink, never mind make it to a night club, before she's steering the evening straight into the bedroom. It's very economical, if somewhat one dimensional.

Some basic pointers…

In a previous article I wrote, some commentators in the forums suggested that I was advocating becoming some kind of man whore. This is not the case. I am simply saying that many girls have not had the depth of sexual experiences to turn them into nymphos. You need to train her and break down her boundaries. A prerequisite is picking the right kind of girl. One who is more shy about sex, more openly seeks an LTR/boyfriend, and one that is amenable. There is no point in trying to invest in a vapid, slutty, lost cause, extrovert that's already been on the cock carousel for years. That type of girl is a pump and dump. The other I'd describe more like a pump and inflate. One is a cheap $20 toy, the other is a real vehicle.

Slow it down

Sex by animal standards is a dangerous moment. She is extremely vulnerable to attack or social shaming. Thus she tends to rush it, to make you nut as fast as possible. When you nut, she's won. She's got your seed, you're done with. So restrain yourself. Tease her, tempt her, lead her on, but cool the pace right down. Having a relaxing setting helps. This is obviously impossible at 4am behind the dumpster outside the nightclub and can also be tricky if she has flat mates plodding around the apartment. You want her 100% isolated.

Make sex a kind of on again, off again social activity, instead of a mad sprint to a relatively lame climax. Fuck her until she passes out and when she wakes up do it again. I've spent a week without leaving a hotel room and that girl became 100% my bitch for two years. You are the boss. Once you've penetrated her and she's yours, take charge, switch off her cell phone, lock the bedroom door. Invade her realm. Take her prisoner. You have all the time in the world.

Music helps a lot with this. I like running MTV because there are lots of sexy images. Make sex into a lively ongoing interaction that lasts hours (and keeps her entertained). The longer you have her splayed, the less time she has for BFF chat, other men, female BS, etc. Don't fuck her for 15 minutes, nut and then lie back and turn on the TV. Instant fail. The more sex you have the more sex she will NEED. Fuck her non stop from Friday night until Sunday night and who do you think she is calling next Friday? Women are desperate for entertainment, and what is more entertaining than sex?

Forget it

Don’t worry about your sexual experience. That will only increase in quality as you increase the quality and intensity of her experience. The complaint of many guys is they can’t be bothered with girlie chat to get her in bed. Tolerate it the first time and you’ll never have to bother again, because you’ll be too busy with your fist up her asshole and your dick in her mouth. Make it so nothing is more entertaining than sex. Make it so she feels that any time you’re together and not having sex, precious time is being wasted. It doesn’t matter if you don’t cum at 11am or 3pm or 6pm, drilling her is better than talking to her and you’ll get yours later tonight. Better yet, when you finish without cuming, she gets confused and wants to try again, and you still have all that sex drive ready.

Positioning

Show her you are stronger. Women always have this knack of finding the most awkward spot in the bed, right against the wall or on the edge. Move her. Pick her up, grab her hips or legs and drag her about. Bend her over the bed. Move to the table or dresser, force her up against the wall. Do whatever you damn well please. Never let her finish the interaction. You might stop to rest, but keep stroking, make her rub you and carry it on. Make it last for hours and you decide when you’re done.

Keep Your Pants On

It’s extremely empowering to have a naked woman in the bed while you are still partially clothed. This will also help you stop her hurrying the experience. Notice that women will often rush to unbuckle your belt, or start sucking your dick. Don’t let her. Often they are so anxious to be penetrated that they don’t bother about diseases or condoms. Why? They are hiding their own insecurities and stress. Relax her and take your time.

Use your hands, unwrap her and get her naked, play with her like she’s a new toy. A woman’s entire body is a sexual organ. When she’s aroused, stroke her skin with your fingernails and a feather touch (you can actually make a woman cum just doing this), work her nipples, finger her and make her taste her pussy. Force your fingers down her throat, choke her around the neck, etc.

Make her cum a couple of times first. She’s wants you to penetrate her, so the longer you make her wait the better. Don’t let her be like a cheap hooker from TJ that blows you in two minutes and goes back to the bar for another client. She doesn’t get off that easy—we’re going all night baby. No means yes, and screaming means “I want more”.

The goals are:

- Have her howling and make her pass out and then start again.
- Go all night long and all next day. Marathon session.
- Take her so far beyond a regular sexual experience that she spends the next month thinking of you, dreaming of a repeat, anxiously checking her phone for your messages. You say weekend away and she’s already packing her bags.

- Eclipse anyone else she has been with. She'll remember you on her death bed.
- Turn her into your bitch. A woman will NEVER disrespect a man that does her right in the bedroom.
- Fuck her all night like you are 5 different guys visiting her one after another. That's what she secretly wants.

Understand that she is built for sex, whereas you are only built to inject some sperm into her. Therefore (initially) you need to make extreme efforts to completely satisfy her. Don't let your male ego get in the way, and don't let her tricky female nature make you cum the first time she does. You milk her; it's not the other way around.

Make the sex so good, that you are doing her a favor. In truth women need the emotional reboot of sex more than men need their release. Put the woman in her place and she's all yours. If there is any hope of repolarizing women to be feminine, then Red Pill men everywhere need to roll up their sleeves and start ploughing the fields. We have an entire herd of unbalanced women out there to be taken care of.

Men crave sex by default, women crave sex once their neural pathways are trained. The more you train her, the more demanding she will become for the sex. If a girlfriend is flaky, an LTR is bitchy or a wife cheating, there is only ONE reason for it—she needs more sex. Persuading her is game. Nailing her until she passes out is smart.

Men get frustrated because it appears so easy for a woman to find a sex partner. In some cases this is true, but generally speaking girls cannot just go and hit on guys, they must wait for guys to come after them (hence all the dressing up, makeup etc.). It's not hard to turn what appears to be a strength into a weakness. If she's hungry for sex, she can't just go and hit on guys. She has to take into account the risk factor more than a man and the quality of the sex is not assured. It's way easier for her to phone the current man (YOU), than try to find a replacement.

How To Distinguish A True Friend From A False One

May 19, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

That friendship is a precious thing is a truism no one disputes. The ancient Stoics went so far as to value it more highly than love between man and woman. We cannot be sure they were wrong. Yet the question of how to distinguish a true friend from a parasite or a flatterer is one worthy of serious reflection. Our relationships with our peers are vital to our well-being and survival; and time spent with false friends is time never to be recovered. Let us examine this question, and see what features of the false friend can be identified.

The most dangerous type of false friend is the flatterer. He insinuates himself into our good graces by adroitly playing on our vanity and character flaws. Excessive praise casts doubt even on the sincerest friendship, and slowly corrupts the bonds of rectitude between men. Flattery conceals itself in true friendship, and is not easily identified, being closely intertwined with emotion, feeling, and our course of dealings. Since friendship is commonly the result of similar tastes between men, the parasitic false friend uses these common interests to gain a toehold into the doorway of our emotions, and there embeds himself. Just as a tick lodges itself in the ears of animals, so the parasitic friend also seeks out the ears of his patron, and uses his voice to gain entry into our sympathies. These are the primary traits of the parasitic friend:

Lack of a fixed character

The parasitic false friend has no fixed character of his own, and will adjust his opinions and positions with regard towards his environment. Like the organ-grinder monkeys of old, he will hop and gyrate to the tune of his patron, with a smile pasted on his face for our amusement. He shapes his own life on the lives of those he wishes to seduce. His method is to evaluate carefully the disposition and interests of his target, and then to build common ground with showy displays of sympathy to those interests.

Inability to speak the truth on relatively simple matters

The habits of dishonesty and mendacity, once acquired, are not easy for the parasite to shed. Such habits become permanent. They implant themselves in the consciousness of the flatterer. For this reason, you will find him denying the reality of even relatively unimportant things. He is an expert in using qualifiers, hedges, and slithery language in such a way that it is difficult to pin him down on topics of importance.

Seeking out men of influence and position

No flatterer or parasite even sought to impress a lowly or impoverished man. Rather, he seeks to ingratiate himself with someone whose coattails he can ride. Surveying history, we note how frequently men of power and influence have been corrupted by parasites and flatterers once they reach the heights of power. Why is this? Even men of sound judgment feel the isolations and pressures of responsibility, and long for an emotional release. The parasitic courtier, advisor, or sycophant provides this emotional release, at least in the short term. But the consequence is the degraded judgment and ailing faculties of the patron. Little by little, the patron becomes more isolated, more divorced from reality, and ultimately ruined. Examples from history could fill volumes.

Constant displays of subservience to his target

With true friends, there is little or no jealousy or rivalry. So a true friend will feel content, or apathetic, if his friend is more successful than he in some area. But the parasitic flatterer is ever mindful of his desire to be a minion to his target. He will make displays of his inferiority and subservience: his desire is always to remain “below” his target in ability or achievement. He wants not honest equality, but pandering subservience.

Desire to please above all else

A true friend will not hesitate to speak the truth, even though it may be unwelcome; but the parasite will place primary importance on the maintenance of good feeling. For this reason, he is very dangerous. The parasite’s only goal is to echo the feelings and sentiments of his patron. Diseases of the body are often easily identified by their physical manifestations. But experience shows that afflictions of the soul are due to our vices, which are often hidden. The parasite feeds our vices and our delusions, thereby contributing to the spreading corruption of virtue within us.

His appearance in times of need

The false friend is especially attractive to us in times of hardship. We are at that point vulnerable, having been weakened in our resistance by the cruelties of fortune; and the flatterer has an instinctive sense of timing in this regard. While a true friend will not desert us in times of need, the parasitic false friend will hover about us, expressing his sympathies and seeking access to our hearts, but will never offer meaningful assistance.

His varying behavior with you and with others

Having no strong character himself, the parasite’s behavior will vary greatly depending on whom he is talking to. He may praise you in private, and yet around others will offer subtle words of criticism to undermine your purposes. Filled with envy of others, he is unable to restrain his jealousies, and will swing from mood to mood depending on the whim of the moment. A true friend will never criticize or undermine you in the presence of others, as he knows that this would put both of you in a bad light.

His desire to inflame the worst instincts of his patron

The parasitic friend secretly despises his patron, despite his excessive flattery, and will cater to the worst vices of his target. A true friend will try to prevent harm from coming to his friend, and will do nothing to encourage his baser instincts. But the false friend, being full of malignity and insolence, takes secret pleasure in seeing his patron dragged through the mud of vice.

These, then, are the hallmarks of the parasitic false friend. I have used the pronoun “he” in reference to such a person, but could just as easily have substituted “she.” Both genders are equally capable of such behavior; and the danger may even be twofold when sexual intimacy is present in the equation. Lady MacBeths exist in real life, if only we know where to look.

Our best defense against the false friend is knowledge of ourselves. When we know ourselves, and do not allow our heads to become too puffed up with flattery, we will not allow the parasite entry into the corridors of our emotional sympathies. But how difficult to know oneself! We will spend our lives trying to know ourselves. As Seneca says (Epistulae XLI),

> In every good man a god dwells; but what type of god, we know not.

Another defense against the false friend is a thorough knowledge of men and their motivations. This, unfortunately, can only come from long experience.

But enough of these matters. We will say one more word regarding the qualities of true friends. A true friend will avoid the extremes: he will rarely use false flattery to manipulate his friend, and at the same time, he will be careful not to speak in a way that is too brutally honest. Sledgehammers make bad counselors. Constructive criticism should be delivered with delicacy, just as a bit of seasoning will enhance a dish, but not ruin it. Too harsh of a delivery of criticism will sew a lasting resentment into a friend's heart. A man can forgive anything except an excess of honesty.

Why Michael Sam Will Get What He Deserves

May 19, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

On May 10, 2014, Michael Sam became the 249th overall selection in the 2014 NFL Draft. By choosing him with their final selection (a 7th round pick), the St. Louis Rams made Michael Sam the NFL's first openly gay player. A 6'2" 260 defensive end and member of the University of Missouri football team, Sam had garnered SEC co-defensive player of the year honors in 2013 and made himself into a consensus All-American. He came out publicly after the end of his senior season at Missouri, and has been a highly politicized figure ever since.

This politicization has placed both the Rams and the NFL in a precarious position. If Sam makes the Rams' roster and earns playing time, he will become the first openly gay player on an active NFL gameday roster. Many are anxious to see Sam succeed and it is for this reason that he will be the subject of much media attention. If he enjoys the relatively long, prosperous NFL career that so many wish to see for him, there will be a lot of positive press to go around. Sam will get credit for persevering and annihilating barriers, the Rams will get credit for giving him the chance to do so, and the NFL will get credit for "changing the game".

> I feel like the world is a better place after hearing the news about Michael Sam being the first openly gay man drafted to the NFL.
> — Michelle Morgan (@MichelleMorgan_) May 11, 2014

> Watched @MikeSamFootball's reaction. I cried like a baby. His boyfriend is ADORBS. Good for him all around.
> — Ally Maynard (@missmayn) May 11, 2014

It will be another story entirely, however, if Sam fails to make the Rams roster or ends up having a very short NFL career. A quick glance at some of the tweets that were posted late during the draft by those anxiously awaiting his selection makes that clear:

> If only Michael Sam said he had a girlfriend named Lennay Kekua he'd have been drafted. If he said he assaulted her? 1st round!
> — Dana Houle (@DanaHoule) May 10, 2014

> It's pretty sad that it's the 7th round, and Michael Sam hasn't been drafted yet. This isn't because of football. It's because he's gay. Sad
> — Bruin Country™ (@UCLA_Nation) May 10, 2014

> Michael Sam did lead the SEC in sacks and 99.999999999999% of those types of prospects get drafted sooooooooooo. Guys? Guys? Guys?
> — Chase Ruttig (@ChaseRuttig) May 10, 2014

> Michael Sam still not drafted? Clearly teams are worried about the fact a gay player terrifies them… I mean his intangibles.
> — Chris Kluwe (@ChrisWarcraft) May 10, 2014

> I stand with Sam, but now I am sitting. Teams keep passing SEC DPOY for small school guys with less stats & tangibles Crazy @MikeSamFootball

> — Brendon Ayanbadejo (@brendon310) May 10, 2014

Many of those indignant about Sam's relatively low draft status note that a player as accomplished as Sam at the collegiate level should not be in such a perilous position on the fringes of the NFL. Someone like Sam, they argue, should never have to wait too long to hear is name called. He was too much of a dominant player to be ignored, and for this reason they conclude that Sam's sexuality was what kept him out of the earlier rounds of the draft and may force him out of the league before his time.

> Sam was co-Defensive Player of the Year in the best conference in college football, but the former Missouri defensive end wasn't chosen until the 249th pick overall — seven slots before Mr. Irrelevant was crowned as the last pick in the draft…
> …Yet amid all of the back-slapping for the NFL, there's an essential question: Why did it take so long?
> Why did Sam have to wait until a team used what is generally regarded as a throwaway pick? Sam demonstrated great courage in revealing before the NFL scouting combine in February — under the pressure of being outed — that he was openly gay. He also made an apparent great sacrifice.
> There were punters and kickers chosen before a player who led the Southeastern Conference last season with 10½ sacks and 18 tackles for loss. There were players from small schools who played against less-accomplished competition, who were chosen before Sam. There were undersized linemen just like Sam, chosen before Sam. Was this because Sam is gay?

> It sure seems that way, no matter what we've heard about the NFL culture being progressive enough — with the league advancing a Respect in the Workplace agenda — to tolerate a player without regard to his sexual orientation.

If you take the time to really understand the nature of the NFL Draft and Sam's relation to it, however, you'll quickly come to understand why those who ascribe Sam's low draft position to politics are misguided or uninformed. Michael Sam wasn't one of the last picks in the NFL Draft because of his sexuality. He was one of the last picks in the NFL Draft because he is, quite frankly, not an impressive NFL prospect. In fact, he doesn't even really have a clear position at the pro level:

> Taking the narrative aside, I think Sam could be a reasonably effective player in a 4-3 defensive line rotation, or a run-side endbacker in a 3-4, if he improves his technique and finds a way to use more pure power on the field. The speed probably is what it is, and that's a problem — because edge-rushers need more than the burst he currently has, and tweeners who move inside require far more ability to move people than he's shown.

Sam isn't powerful enough to be a regular down lineman, and he isn't athletic enough to be a linebacker. At 6'2", 260, Sam is undersized, but so are many other D-Line prospects. The problem with Sam is that he lacks both the athleticism and the strength to make up for his lack of size. Players with Sam's combination of negatives (undersized, slow, stiff, not very strong, mediocre technique) do not tend to be drafted much earlier than Sam was. In fact, they don't tend to be drafted at all:

> He had a very productive senior season, but is considered a tweener at the position due to his size, and his poor combine results had some scouts questioning whether he will even be drafted at all. ESPN tweeted out that in the last six combines, twenty players at the defensive end or linebacker spots were Sam's size or smaller and also ran a 4.91 40-yard dash or worse. Only three of those twenty were drafted.

One could be tempted to cite Sam's production at the college level as justification for claims that he was drafted too late, but the statistics regarding that production are actually quite misleading:

> Sam produced big time, but… There's no question that Sam had major production this season, as he led the SEC in sacks and tackles for a loss (which includes sacks). This is probably why he was named SEC defensive player of the year by the media, and co-DPOY (with Alabama linebacker C.J. Mosley) by the coaches. However, you have to look at the circumstances of his production. Namely, most of it came in three games of a four-game stretch against inferior competition: Arkansas State (three sacks), Vanderbilt (three sacks) and Florida (three sacks). Sam had a total of a half-sack in his final six games, until he made a huge play on basically the final play of the Cotton Bowl.
> So basically in his final five games plus 40 snaps against Oklahoma State—the best competition Sam faced all season—he had no splash plays. The right tackles he faced (as a left end he didn't go against Texas A&M left tackle Jake Matthews, a projected top-10 pick) in that stretch were more of what he will see in the pros. The right tackles he beat up to gain his production likely wouldn't be on NFL training-camp rosters.

When asked to face quality opposition at the college level, Sam didn't respond well. He had 11.5 sacks in 2013, 9 of which came against just 3 teams: Vanderbilt, Florida and Arkansas State. I'd call Vanderbilt an above average SEC side in 2013. Florida was poor, and Arkansas State is a mid-major squad from a decidedly inferior conference. When faced with stronger opposition (Auburn, Tennessee and Texas A&M all had NFL caliber linemen), Sam was almost invisible.

Finally, one can examine the NFL's record with regard to highly accomplished college players and see that Sam is not the only one to go through a draft without hearing his name called until the last second.

> Jackson Jeffcoat was ESPN's No. 2 best available DE entering day 3. Ten DEs have been drafted today.
> — Max Olson (@max_olson) May 10, 2014

> Jackson Jeffcoat had 49.5 sacks in four seasons at Texas, including 13 last year. Was an AP All-American. Anyone want him? Anyone?
> — Tom Fornelli (@TomFornelli) May 10, 2014

Jackson Jeffcoat was Sam's equal in more ways than one. Sam was a consensus All-American in 2013 – so was Jeffcoat. Sam was the Defensive Player of the Year in his conference, just as Jeffcoat was in his own. Sam was first team all-conference, and Jeffcoat was first-team all conference. Jeffcoat was, in fact, more highly decorated in college than Sam — he received the Hendricks Award in 2013, an honor given annually to college football's best defensive end (Sam was a semifinalist for the award).

In fact, you could very well make the case that Jeffcoat was a better NFL prospect than Sam. Jeffcoat had more sacks in 2013 than Sam did (13 vs. 11.5), and also had a much larger career total (26 vs. 18.5). Though Jeffcoat is lighter than Sam (247lbs vs. 261lbs), he is taller (6'3" vs. 6'2"), stronger (18 bench reps vs. 17) more explosive (36 inches vs. 25 inches on the vertical jump) and quite a bit faster (4.61 vs. 4.91 in the 40 yard dash at the NFL combine). Sam put up mediocre numbers in agility tests (7.8 second 3-cone and 4.7 second shuttle), while Jeffcoat was the combines leading performer in each of those examinations (6.97 and 4.18 second times, respectively).

Whereas Sam doesn't really have a position (he's undersized for a down lineman and nowhere near quick or agile enough to work as an NFL linebacker), the equally undersized Jeffcoat has shown enough athleticism to work as an outside linebacker and speed rusher in the NFL, meaning that he could arguably have an easier time adjusting physically to the NFL game. Objectively, Jeffcoat had at least as good a case as Sam did for a chance in the NFL, if not a better one.

Unlike Michael Sam, however, Jackson Jeffcoat did not hear his name called by any NFL team during the 2014 NFL Draft. How can this be explained? He has no character issues, comes from a powerhouse program known for building successful professionals (2014 will be the first year since 1937 that not a single Texas Longhorn has been drafted) and has NFL bloodlines. Was Sam more worthy of an NFL draft pick than Jeffcoat?

> Out of the Hendricks Award winners since 2002, only three went after first round, all were drafted. Jackson Jeffcoat the recent anomaly.

> — Wescott Eberts (@SBN_Wescott) May 10, 2014

Had Sam been in the position Jeffcoat is right now (undrafted), there would be an uproar about football's "homophobia" and unjust "blacklisting". Because the situation is reversed and Jeffcoat's personal life isn't worthy of any headlines, however, we don't hear much about him. We also won't hear much about Henry Josey (Michael Sam's college teammate and a 1000 yard rusher), Jordan Lynch (2013 first team all-American, 3rd place in 2013 Heisman voting) or Brock Jensen (3 time national champion). Will those who insist that Michael Sam hasn't been given a fair shot and hasn't been drafted high enough also stand up for these players, who were not drafted at all?

We don't know what the future holds for Michael Sam. We know that he will get a chance to earn an NFL paycheck, and how well he takes advantage of that opportunity remains to be seen. He could be an also-ran or an all-pro. Whatever the result, his sexuality must not obscure attempts to evaluate his career objectively.

Many observers will be very quick to tie any failure of Sam in the NFL to his sexuality (just as they insisted his low draft position was due to his coming out) and make a host of excuses for him, but that does injustice to the NFL (who are perfectly capable of evaluating talent on merit alone), other players (many of whom are quite wrongly assumed by Sam's supporters to be less deserving of an NFL spot than Sam is and do not deserve to be dismissed in such a way) and Michael Sam himself (who needs to be judged for his exploits on the field, not his personal life).

The reality is that Sam is a 7th round pick with quite a few flaws, and while there are plenty of reasons to believe that he can be a success in the NFL, there are also plenty of good reasons (reasons that have nothing at all to do with his sexuality) to suspect that he will not have a long NFL career. That he has gotten an opportunity despite these flaws when so many similarly (if not substantially more) gifted players haven't even been drafted should say all that needs to be said.

Michael Sam will get what he deserves from the NFL — nothing more, nothing less.

Can A Flaky Chick Be Fixed?

May 20, 2014 | by Alan Morrison | Link | Original Link

From my and many other people's observations of the world today, it would seem that the full-blown flaky chick has become widespread in the female population — an accepted way of being, on an ever-increasing basis over the past couple of decades. You can now even download an 'app' questionnaire from iTunes called "Is she a flake?" as a litmus test to apply when you meet a girl. So why the huge rise in the Flaky Chick Phenomenon? There are many reasons for this — social, psychological and historical. These aspects are developed in full in the unabridged version of this article (link given below). But here in this extract I want to ask the question: Can a flaky chick be fixed?

Many men think that they can “fix” a flaky chick. This is a huge illusion. Any man who becomes emotionally involved with a flaky chick is setting himself up for a great deal of misery. The flaky chick can make herself seem very appealing at first. She is often intelligent, attractive, creative and engaging and manages to seduce many people into being friends with her and admiring her. But if a man becomes intimate with her, he will begin to notice little things which ring alarm bells. This will increase until he realises that he has become involved with a monster from whom he cannot walk away unscathed. If he is a very weak character, the two of them can get stuck in a relationship of co-dependency and feed off each other’s destructive pathological patterns. Many marriages and partnerships exist in that “flaky chick/weak male” state for years.

Flaky Chicks Fear The Alpha Type

An interesting observation is that flaky chicks can hardly bring themselves even to catch the eye of the more alpha type of male — the very one who would most likely be able to “fix” her in the best kind of a way. They find such a man so catastrophically threatening that flaky chicks almost pretend that those men don’t exist. This is because of the possibility of rejection or abandonment either due to his ability to see through them (which he does) or because they fear that such a man will not be interested in them (which he won’t) or, if they were to embark on a relationship with him, he would soon reject and abandon them for another (which he most certainly would!). Flaky chicks will look right through such men. They will even cross the street to avoid them.

Some of the more new-agey type of flaky chicks will say such trendily amusing lines as: “That guy’s got really dark energy” to conceal their fear. What they really mean is that they are frightened stiff of him because he’s no fool. It is interesting that many flaky chicks are attracted to the new-age scene, mainly because they can disguise their inner terrors behind a smorgasbord of “spiritual” jargon, hypnotic chanting, “transformational energies” and supposedly “higher consciousness activities”. I know quite a few Reiki Masters, Aura Therapists, Life Coaches, etc., who are among the most flaky chicks of all in their personal lives — who’ve left a mountain of abused male wreckage in their wake — yet who manage to pass themselves off to the public as enlightened beings! The perfect cover.

The more conventional, less hippy type of flaky chick will hide her fear behind an assertion to her friends and anyone who will listen that the more alpha type of male in her vicinity is a shallow womanizer and therefore should be shunned. Whether or not this is true is completely irrelevant to the flaky chick. She is not interested in truth —only in surviving intact from threats to her ego; so she will invent any story which assists that goal. The reality of course is that she is frightened to death (literally) of anyone who she feels will see beyond the external image she presents to the world and right into her secretly broken, messed-up, strung-out little heart.

Flaky Chicks Exist As A Bid For “Girl Power”

Flaky chicks are massively on the increase in the present era. This is due to a number of social and psychological causes. It has almost become the norm for a girl to be flaky in some circles — something to be cultivated, a sign of some sort of zany “Girl Power” and a way of “resisting the patriarchy” in a social setting. The female must always be seen to have the upper hand to right the balance which has allegedly gone all the way of men for thousands of years, etc. This kind of skewed thinking has made a contribution to the flaky chick phenomenon, and she is construed by many women as an independent and liberated example of women who don’t need men.

Most women will not tolerate any criticism of a woman or groups/categories of women. Indeed, there is almost a conspiracy to keep this behaviour out of view or shove it under the carpet and claim it doesn’t exist because to discuss the very idea of flaky chicks is deemed by them to be “sexist”, offensive to women and patronising — misogynist even, a symptom of patriarchy putting down women — even though many of those same women would have no problem spending their time putting down men.

Every year dozens of articles and books are written about the rise of the sociopathic male which, in many ways, is true. Yet no one denounces those works as sexist, offensive or misandrist. It seems today that one can say anything derogatory about men (even if it is patently untrue); but to make reference to unwholesome developments in the realm of women is anathema and must be airbrushed instantly from the world of letters. This is reminiscent of totalitarian dictatorships such as one finds in George Orwell’s “Nineteen Eighty-Four”, where to criticise the regime even in the most constructive of ways means instant denunciation and ostracism by “the Party”. Whatever happened to the equality allegedly sought by women today?

Is The Flaky Chick Concept “Sexist”?

Many women would go so far as to deny that there is an issue at all, claiming that the flaky chick phenomenon doesn’t exist and that it is a sexist concept. The issue, however, is not whether the idea of the flaky chick is “sexist” but whether or not it is true. Obviously, it would be wrong to malign women in totality, or any gender/social/racial grouping. But it is not wrong to expose behaviour or phenomena — regardless of what grouping it is in — which undermine social cohesion and good relationships.

We don’t expose flaky chicks because they are women but because they are flaky. It just so happens that by far the majority of flakes are female. (The same is true of Borderline Personality Disorder, where it is officially recognised that about 75% of sufferers are women). I love women as women, when they behave like real women, but the huge and growing number of flaky chicks out there — ranging from teens to forty-somethings — are a blot on the map of life today and are letting down their gender, not to mention the wrecked relationships and vast number of men who have been damaged by them.

Flaky Chicks Exist Because Many Women Do Not Value Men

Another factor in the rise of the flaky chick phenomenon has been because a very large number of women simply do not value men anymore. Men are seen as the enemy, the competition, potential rapists to be used for sex or money and even abused and ignored but never respected, admired or adored. This is not an exaggeration. As proof that men are not valued in society to the same degree as women, consider this: how often, in media advertising, do you see the men portrayed as incompetent, subservient idiots and the women as calm, in-control problem-solvers? This is a way of devaluing men by social engineering.

As another example of the way that men are no longer valued, if a woman cuts off a man’s penis and throws it in the garbage it is treated as a huge joke. Snickers all round. He must have done something to deserve it. The woman is almost celebrated as a courageous heroine who has acted out what many women secretly desire to do while the man is shamed forever. Newspapers write jokey columns about it and they compete with each other to create the wittiest headline. Videos about it become a viral frolic on social media with many women cheering them on. However, if a man cuts off a woman’s breast and throws it on the fire, there would be international outrage. A day of mourning would be declared. Minutes of silence would be held everywhere. Special ribbons in honor of the mutilated victim would be designed and worn across the world. Newscasters would feel obliged to wear one. Using a specially-supplied educational kit containing a picture of the amputee, schoolteachers would hold sessions for their classes on women as the victims of male violence.

The same kind of process happens if a woman kicks a man in his testicles. In spite of the potential for serious injury, it is treated as something to be snickered at. Not very serious. Bit of a joke really. Guffaw, guffaw. She is congratulated (“You kick ass, go girl!”) and there is a sense of victory and payback among many women. Yet if a man kicks a woman in the crotch, he would be immediately arrested for serious assault and held up before the world as a disgraceful example of male violence and part of a “rape culture mentality” by attacking a woman in the most sacred area of her anatomy. One can say anything about men today and it is completely acceptable. But to make any kind of criticism of a woman is deemed to be sexist and misogynist. It is this kind of imbalance in the failure to value men to the same degree as women in society today which has prepared the ground for flaky chicks to feel that they can abuse men with impunity because they “kick ass” too. Kicking men’s ass today is the new cool. Whatever happened to the oft professed notion that all women want is equality with men? (Rhetorical question, no need to respond).

Flaky Chicks Exist Because Of A Downgrade In Politesse

Coupled with that, there has been a general downgrading in politesse during the last couple decades. People in general just do not feel the same desire to be courteous and respectful to others, or to have a sense of duty and honour (remember duty and honour?). This has had fallout in the sphere of man-woman relations, as gallantry or courtliness are frowned upon as prehistoric, while showing favour or courtesy to a woman are often perceived as being the signs of a philanderer, or “grooming”, or even as a case for a sexual harassment lawsuit!

Flaky Chicks Exist Because Of Poor Parenting

Another cause of the rise in the flaky chick phenomenon is that we are now reaping the result of at least one whole generation of poor parenting. Girls who have been “spoiled to death” and/or “princessed” by their parents (especially the father) during childhood are almost destined for the role of “Entitlement Princess” in teenage years and adulthood.

That, coupled with other forms of defective parenting, such as sexual and physical abuse or abandonment and rejection, often generates that heady mix of Narcissistic Personality Disorder and Borderline Personality Disorder — the foundation of the full-blown flaky chick.

Flaky Chicks Are Inwardly Terrified Of Rejection And Abandonment

What is it that lies at the heart of the full-blown flaky chick's pathology? What is it that fuels her shockingly selfish behaviour and feelings of entitlement? My own researches have shown me that a very high percentage of flaky chicks have been in repeated abandonment/rejection scenarios at a sensitive age or they have been physically or sexually abused. One of the principal motivations for the flaky chick's comportment is a fear of rejection or abandonment. Her whole world is concentrated on keeping these two elements out of her life.

The ordinary way of dealing with those things is to take action after they have happened. But the flaky chick lives in such a state of subliminal terror that she takes action before they have taken place — and in very drastic ways. This is one of the reasons for her huge anger if her strategies are uncovered. The façade must be maintained at all costs. The front must be preserved, whatever it takes. For the flaky chick cannot ever fully give herself to a relationship for fear of being rejected or abandoned. Most people know that rejection or abandonment is possible in a relationship but they still take the risk anyway. They reckon it's worth it.

For the flaky chick, however, any notion of rejection or abandonment is akin to death. Her game is control and she has mastered the art. That is why she breaks off suddenly and inexplicably during text messaging. That is why she will disappear for days on end. That is why she reneges on appointments. That is why she tells lies to put people off the scent. These are all strategies to avoid commitment, to avoid being there for the other person. They are all strategies to deny love — to obstruct relationships.

She cannot give herself completely to anything or anyone for fear of rejection or abandonment. So her scattiness and unreachableness, in her own mind, keep her safe. She is "all over the place" so she doesn't have to commit herself to one place alone. She manages to garner enough admiration from casual observers, general friends and acquaintances, so she doesn't need to act out with them. Therefore they are often fooled by that façade and will never believe that she is the wife or lover from hell. But those who have been most intimate with her have tasted her terror and the bloody wrath which results from it.

So when you bring together that acute terror of abandonment or rejection with the narcissistic elements of being unable to withstand even a hint of criticism and an obsessive horror of being put down or having the narcissistic bubble burst, you can begin to understand the desperate interior pathology of the flaky chick, disguised behind her cool and engaging exterior.

Flaky Chicks Are Actually Rapists

The flaky chick is not some relatively harmless womanly aberration about which we can have a playful chuckle. The full-blown flaky chick is the female equivalent of the male rapist. Rape of any kind is an appalling crime. It is a violation of the whole human being in all senses. But if we think of rape merely in its physical aspect, then we are failing to understand the meaning of violation. Even a woman who has been raped will tell you that the experience was a blow to much more than merely her body.

The flaky chick violates men. It may not be rape in the technical sense of the law or in how most people think of it; but it is the equivalent. To deny this would be a staggering act of willful ignorance. A man who has suffered at the hands of a flaky chick in a lengthy relationship will feel just as violated as a woman who has been raped. In fact, such a man will feel as if he has been repeatedly violated rather than having had just a one-time experience in a park or alleyway. Many men have been completely broken and permanently traumatized by the women referred to in this paper as flaky chicks. I have spoken to many of them and much has been documented elsewhere too (see here for example). These are urgent words and are not to be taken lightly.

Epilogue: Flaky Chicks Cannot Be Rescued

Please do not imagine that you can play the dashing Knight and rescue the full-blown flaky chick. No matter how much compassion you may feel for her, no matter how much you think you understand her or can help her or redeem her, she is a law unto herself and she will never let you get near enough for her to be helped. She has no conception (or, rather, cannot allow herself to have any conception) of the full extent of her condition and will do everything she can to convince you and everyone else that it is you who is the deranged one.

Walk away and preserve your sanity, your integrity and your dignity. That is the only counsel I can give. This woman is beyond help or redemption, as too many men have discovered to their cost.

Dear ____, A Farewell To My First And Only Love

May 20, 2014 | by Gary | Link | Original Link

Dear _____,

I would marry you. I would spend forty hours a week error-checking code or filing papers so that we could have a family together. I would put blood, sweat, and tears in on the job and I would never have sex with another woman if you would always be there. There was a time when I could start a family and consequentially have a purpose, but the chances of this happening in the present are bleak. I will proceed to explain why our relationship will inevitably fail.

You're about to head off to college. You've worked hard your whole life for this. You'll have so much freedom—what will you do? Right now, you're a beautiful young girl. You know how to make me happy. You take care of me. You make sure I eat when I am too preoccupied to remember. You let me rest my head on your lap and play with my hair when I'm depressed. It's lovely. I could die next to you.

But this won't last.

The reason I get to enjoy this is because your parents sheltered you from the world. You went to private school and were kept in a religious bubble all but the last two years of your life. You resent your parents. I was lucky enough to enjoy the fruit of their efforts because this world will ruin you. Most men don't even know what it's like to date a girl like you. They only know the ones incapable of love that this society creates.

By missing the first ten years of public school, you missed ten years of constant male attention. You are only just now realizing the power you have over men. You're a very attractive girl. When you post a picture on Facebook and get near a hundred likes, it feels good, doesn't it? It must. You know there are at least fifty guys who you come into contact with every day who would give you the dick at the drop of a hat.

You will soon realize you no longer need to try to make me happy, that you don't have to dress nicely, that you don't have to take care of me. You'll realize there are tons of men willing to take just your body. You won't put forth the effort.

You don't appreciate the amount of work it takes to keep your interest. I am an entertainer. I have to be your clown to keep you interested. I can only keep up the act for so long until you get bored and move on to the next clown who puts on a better performance. How nice it must be to live a life in perpetual state of searching for entertainment.

At least it seems perpetual. Ten years and 47 dicks later, facing the inevitable depreciation of your only real asset, your looks, you have the epiphany,

"I really just want a family and someone to take care of me."

You may come back searching for me.

At this point, I will have fashioned a life for myself in which women are treated as sexual objects. Women will only exist in my life for the dopamine fix that sex with them brings. I will explain why I won't take care of you:

"_____, western civilization ruined our potential family. It split us up to go to college because our 'futures' are more important than preserving the strongest bond you will ever have with the opposite sex. It told us we have years to find the person we were going to settle with, until we were incapable of love."

And then we will both mourn what we have missed out on.

Have fun in college.

Play Sports, Don’t Watch Them

May 20, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

It was late Tuesday night and I was contemplating taking a walk to my neighborhood bar. I needed to get out of the house, but on an off night like Tuesday, it was iffy if they were even open much past 10PM. I decided to risk it in that the worst outcome would be that I’d get some exercise. However, as I approached my bar I could already tell it was not only open, but based on the number of cars parked in the lot, likely heavily attended. I walked in and sure enough it was packed. A ton of people, all excited and quite festive.

I ponied up to the bar to get my standard Rumpleminze when I asked the bartender “Hey, what’s with all the commotion? You guys usually close early on a Tuesday.”

He looked at me with a blank stare, shook his head pitifully and said, “Clarey, only you would not know there’s a game on.”

I looked around and he was right. Don’t know how I didn’t see it before as everybody was wearing jerseys, but there on the screen was Minnesota’s beloved home-town hockey team, The Wild, taking on the hated and despised Chicago Black Hawks.

I quickly deduced that this wasn’t just a “regular game” as the decibel level indicated people were heavily vested in the game. The Wild would come close to scoring, the bar would erupt. The Blackhawks would get a penalty, the bar would cheer. And after looking at the screen I realized this was a “do or die” playoff game The Wild had to win as they were already down 2 games to 0 in the series. It was already the third period with only 6 minutes left to go, and The Wild were up 2-0, so it was likely The Wild would win.

Which they did.

And then high fives were about, additional shots ordered, and talk about how “we” beat the Blackhawks ensued.

As people celebrated I smirked at my bartender. He knows me well and already knew what I was going to say. Attempting to pre-empt me he said,

“Clarey, don’t you dare…”

But I cut him off.

“Yeah man!!! WE did it!!! WE beat the Chicago Blackhawks! Alright, man, dude I totally knew WE were going to win this one!!! Boy it sure is great that OUR team, the one WE own and physically participate in beat that other team owned by all those Chicago Blackhawk fans!”

He shook his head and dismissed me as he attended another patron, but neither he nor any of the other bartenders ever argue with me because of one simple reason:

They know I’m right.

Many of us slam on women for wasting time, money, and resources on stupid frivolities in life. Glamour type magazines, Harlequin romance novels, chick flicks, “Round-House-Kicking-Chick-Cop Shows,” clothes, worthless masters degrees, flirtini’s, soap operas, other men’s children, spas, trinkets, etc., and deservedly so. The reason is that women squander their vital economic resources and thusly not only become financial liabilities themselves, but disproportionately cause the financial problems of the country as a whole. Matter of fact, if women were to spend their money ONLY on needs and not frivolities, nearly all of our financial problems would go away.

However, men are largely hypocritical when making such accusations because we too waste our precious resources of time and money on something just as pointless and stupid – professional sports.

Understand a couple things about professional sports and why it is a wasting of your precious few moments in this life.

One, the professional athletes are not YOU. THEY won the game. YOU did not. The athletes who are out on the field, the rink, or the course have nothing to do with you. They don’t know you. They don’t care about you (personally). They’re not even from your local area. This doesn’t mean they don’t appreciate their fans, but there should be no emotional or psychological attachment to any professional sports team. Sadly, and all too often, you see people at a bar unwarrantedly get excited and prideful when “their” team wins, while at the same time, angry and depressed if they lose.

Two, not that there’s anything wrong with taking in the occasional game or watching the Super Bowl, but when doing so realize you are sitting on your ass. You’re not doing jack. Matter of fact, you’re probably stuffing your face contributing to your obeseness. The athletes on the other hand are doing all the real work, you are merely living vicariously through them. Again, who doesn’t love tailgating before a Minnesota Vikings game? But if it’s a religious experience, where you need to attend every game, or heaven help you if you bought season tickets, you are paying a dear opportunity cost, your physical health not being the least.

Third, sports are ultimately irrelevant. I always love watching people watch the Olympics because it ultimately boils down to;

Who can throw the sphere the furthest.
Who can twirl the prettiest on the rink.
Who can do the most flippy-things in the air.

None of it…

Cures cancer
Boosts economic growth
Promotes freedom and liberty

Alas, this is why everybody knows who got traded to New York, but doesn't know what the national debt is as a percent of GDP.

Finally, the financial cost. Forget the tickets, think of everything ancillary to those tickets. Parking, food, drink. You'll spend more money going to a football game than you will in three nights of clubbing. But if you take a false pride in a team that you neither own nor play for to the point you pay $250 to wear another man's jersey, it borders on having a problem. This kind of spending over the course of a life could very well easily put a kid through college or rapidly amortize your mortgage.

The ultimate point is to realize what professional sports is and isn't. Professional sports is entertainment, nothing more. It is not a religion, it is not a club, it is not a soap opera, it is not a community affair. It is a group of highly talented athletes executing amazing physical feats that ultimately mean nothing in this world. Does this mean you shouldn't watch the occasional game?

No.

Does this mean you should never take your son to see the heroic Twins battle against the hated Red Sox?

No.

But if you take a personal, psychological, or emotional vested interest in whether one group of guys throw the orange sphere into the ring better than another group of guys, then you are already down the road to a Blue and Green psychopathy.

Is Return Of Kings Really The Most Repugnant Website On The Internet?

May 21, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

For those of you who have even a modicum of intelligence, common sense or just plain old perspective, you needn't read this article. This article is aimed at… nay, dedicated, to the men and women who compulsively read our site so they can turn around to say how utterly despicable we are. The age old wisdom of "If you don't like the show, just change the channel" apparently does not apply to these people, our 'haters' if you would. So if you aren't an idiot, if you aren't a selfish cretin, if you aren't a terrible human being, you need not read further. You already realize the absurdity of us being considered one of the worst websites on the internet.

We here at Return Of Kings get a lot of hate. Those with twitter feeds especially are subject to much ridiculing and out and out bullying. Of course, those disparaging against us would never in a million years consider themselves bullies, since they're such good souls that they're clearly above such things… even as they accuse us of being loveless losers, of being rapists, of being molested or bullied as children with that last implication used in an insulting, not sympathetic, manner. Many contributors encounter something like this on a regular basis from those self proclaimed 'good' people:

"HA HA YOU PROBABLY GOT RAPED AND BEAT UP AS A KID LOL THAT'S WHY YOU TRY TO FORM RELATIONSHIPS WITH WOMEN GO KILL YOURSELF"

At their heart, sites focused on game and other masculine centered topics—a poorly named collective largely known as the manosphere—have essentially one goal in mind; to make men's lives better. And for that simple, humanistic goal we receive a lot of hate. On game sites where men try to impart other men with wisdom about how women act in the dating world, on how best to attract women, numerous comments from feminists and their beta manslaves permeate the comment sections, leveling accusations of those who practice game as rapists.

They say that we're pathetic; which admittedly, we are. We spend hundreds if not thousands of hours trying to increase our sexual appeal to women, learning how to best utilize our looks, learning how women think and how best to make a pleasing impression upon their minds. In short, we who practice game dedicate a good portion of our limited time on this Earth trying to please women, which really is pathetic compared to what a woman has to do to 'game' men; essentially just be thin and show up. And we men do not complain (loudly) about this disparity. We willingly rise up to the challenge because we love women. And somehow that makes us monsters.

Other then discussing how great it is to be with a woman, sometimes us manosphere types like to discuss other topics relating to men in the modern west. We share a common abhorrence and repugnance at how men can robbed of their entire lives in divorce courts, even when women initiate it, or how men almost never get to raise their children afterward even if the mother is a selfish beast who brings dangerous men into her children's lives. We discuss how bizarre utopian policies like homosexual normalization or unchecked multiculturalism have always destroyed societies rather then progressed them. In other words, we discuss the truths of the world, without lies or politically correct thought police censorship.

And for that we are apparently the worst site on the web. The utter irony of that tends not to sink in to the hate mongering feminists, beta manslaves and other parties who proclaim us to be monsters. It is classical propaganda misdirection.

Yet think about what the internet is. It is everything. Literally every type of person, every personality type both good and bad, is represented on the internet. It is statistically impossible that game and manosphere websites even rank in the top 10,000 of the worst thing on the internet, and dammit that sucks considering how much effort we put in to being as controversial as possible. Need some examples of worse spheres in the online world?

Death Porn

It is impossible to understand how we are the worst website when sites dedicated to pornography like Vore and Guro exist. Vore is sexual imagery of people being eaten; a woman wearing lingerie being devoured by a giant snake would be considered Vore porn. A man with an erection being eaten by wolves is Vore porn. Guro, on the other hand, is sexual imagery where the man or (and far more commonly depicted) woman is being mutilated, murdered, massacred and otherwise killed. It goes beyond the concept of snuff films; these are acts of horror created not to satisfy an urge to see someone die, but to see someone die and have the viewer be AROUSED by it. There are no masculine focused sites that cater to such disgusting imagery, and this is undoubtedly one of the first articles of any in this corner of the web where the words Vore and Guro are mentioned.

And these two genres do not cater to a small, niche market in some dark soulless corner of the internet. This porn is wide spread. There are tens of thousands of images in existence to cater to the disturbingly large amount of people who eagerly masturbate to these images. There are hundreds if not thousands of forums and sites created solely to cater to these people. There are many, many more pornographic sites that are not exclusively dedicated to showing these images, but have them available for anyone who wants to see them. Even youtube has slide shows and videos of these acts.

If I posted a response video to some feminist, talking about how her idea that all men should have some of their semen forcefully taken from them is not only barbaric but a crime against nature, it would be deleted within the hour for violating youtube's terms of, like, making her feel uncomfortable or something. If I posted a video showing drawn images of a man cutting a woman's breasts off, then feeding her to a Komodo dragon, it would stay up for years and have thousands of views from people masturbating to it.

A little while back, a video of an attractive Asian woman abusing and murdering bunnies and kittens made the rounds on numerous social media services, including Facebook, where it wasn't removed for at least two weeks. Our Facebook page is suspended on a regular basis. Our current suspension came about because a plastic dildo was in the one of the article's pictures. A real life video featuring bunny murder and a plastic sex tool; which of those two things sounds worse to you?

Death Sites

Then there are site's whose sole function is to display pictures of real death for people, whatever their motivations, to gawk at. The big one when I was a kid was called Rotten. Our school's computers blocked pretty much every known porn site but death sites were readily available. You weren't allowed to watch Tory Lane consentingly pleasure herself with a big ol' dildo, but it was perfectly fine to look at Chris Farley's bloated corpse or see the aftermath of what happens when a hungry bear meets a happy camper.

"HEY BOOBOO! Watch-a me eat this, hitch-a-hiker!"

You can watch videos of American troops being hacked apart, blown up, or being shot by snipers but no, let's get outraged about the site which says girls who have short hair are damaged. Really, the fact that our opponents are angrier at Return Of Kings than Juba the sniper says a lot about their morality.

Rape Sites

There are forums for rapists. They hide behind cutesy names or require a logon but they are easily found. There are disclaimers by the administrators saying that the forums and sites are purely for 'fantasy', and within these forums people 'fantasize' about how best to rape women. They discuss methods on how to physically abduct women, on how to break down their will and make them into sex slaves. They write long, passionate soliloquies about how fulfilled they are by forcing themselves on top of helpless women. Many people think the worst form of rape is when a woman gets drunk and has a regretful one night stand. The uncensored thoughts of the people on rape sites would dispel all notions of that quaint belief. Ted Bundy was a demon, and there are a hundred ones like him at this very moment giving each other tips online about what street in which city has poor lighting, the blind spots of any cameras on them and which routes they notice girls walk most frequently.

Cannibal Cafes

There are sites for cannibals. For those of you who, up to this point, think this article is exaggerating a safe search for you to do is to look up Armin Meiwes on Wikipedia. This man posted on a 'fantasy' site dedicated to cannibalism, found a mentally disturbed man and then ate the disturbed man. At least Marilyn Manson got an album out of it. Who knows how many other scenarios like Meiwes have played out, thanks to the internet, that we will never hear about?

Paedophiles

See that adorable little guy above us? Odds are you've seen him before. That's Pedobear. Cute idn'e? He's the mascot for paedophiles on the internet. All though Pedobear started as a joke, the people he represents most certainly at not. There is a massive, pervasive amount of paedophiles who exist online. Their existence isn't even a scare tactic like Rainbow parties or other such nonsense—online paedophiles are one of the great blights modern civilization has produced. Though most paedophile sites and forums are heavily guarded, since they're one of the groups who deserve to be hunted down that actually are, there are numerous soft sites that feature only drawn or computer generated images of young girls and boys being molested. Somehow these get through legal loopholes, but despite the social stigma of child pornography, Loli (short for Lolita) porn is thriving and its fans are numerous. It's almost a certainty that you know someone who has or continues to masturbate to it.

Those are just a few examples of the thousands of grotesque groups that thrive on the internet. And yet when we try to warn naïve, inexperienced young men that a woman with a tattoo or piercings in places other then her ear has undoubtedly had at least five different penises in her, and to safe guard his heart and love from that slut, we're proclaimed to be the biggest monsters online. When we try to tell women who may not want to give their bodies up to several different men that the slut shame they feel is normal, proper and warranted, and that their sisters who do give it up en masse are damaged goods worthy of only one night stands, we're the height of evil.

The claims against us, like many of causes of Social Justice Warriors, are grounded in two things; lack of perspective and laziness. They complain about Return Of Kings because it's easy and gives them instant gratification. When they share our articles amongst each other, nodding their chubby chins in fierce agreement about how evil we are for not wanting to work for a female boss, they feel good. They feel like they've done something, even though in reality they've done nothing at all except preach to their own idiot choir. In their safe, self centered white bread world, men who assert their manliness are the ultimate evil. They've never had to stare evil in the face, even though it's less then 20 characters and a Google search away.

This site, and the manosphere in general, are not even close to the worst thing online. In fact, instead of going around online looking for things to get offended at, how about you Social Justice Warriors back up your self righteousness with a real feminist cause? Forget #bringbackourgirls and Boko Haram. The United States State Department estimates that 50,000–100,000 women and girls are trafficked into the US each year for sex slavery. Even if the real number is much smaller, there are still a significant amount of women who desperately need help in your country. Think one of them might appreciate a self appointed crusader? Y'all ain't no excuse that they're all the way over there in Africa.

These girls are in your neighbourhood. Stop writing your witty rebuttal in the comments, go to the house next door and see if Michelle Knight might need some help before filing a complaint against Return Of Kings with whatever thought police organization you have bookmarked.

The day that we're the worst site on the internet would be a good day. It's also a day that will never come. There are a lot worse things on the internet then male pride and misogyny lite. The world outside our bubbles is a dark and scary place. Our haters should be thankful that there are still some men around who put up with their misguided hate mongering while trying to create more men who can protect them from the bad stuff out there.

Civilization Is An Illusion

May 21, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

The train is crowded, it being rush hour, and fairly quiet and orderly. Almost everyone looks like a working professional. Almost everyone is certainly that. But there is more going on here. Behind this orderly and civilized appearance there is an underlying irrationality. This anyone can infer simply by analyzing his own thoughts and thought processes, undoubtedly irrational as they often are, with certain impulses appearing from we don't know where, or why. Of course, much of what we do and value seems rational, and so these things are. Still, our attachment to our desires, beliefs and endeavors tends to be irrational in character. These matter to us in a way that reason hardly controls or fully comprehends.

We can see this most of all in our desire to preserve ourselves at any cost. Certainly our irrational part is our oldest one. The illusion of civilization stems from overlooking it while overestimating our rationality. Easy enough to do, given how complexly organized is the materiel character of our lives.

There must be at least 70 people in this section of the train. Each of them can be understood as a particular history of symbolic meaning, or of language. So that, in a sense, the world in which we live together means something different for all of us. Yet the notion of civilization seems to imply that there is some universal order or other, some order of symbolic meaning which holds for everyone. There is no such thing. And the illusion of civilization stems as well from the near universal tendency to equate one's own life and particular point of view with reality itself. Now of course, there is, for human beings, no other world. But every particular point of view comprehends a good deal of mostly unperceived irrationality, and it is this that belies what is called civilization, essentially a rationalist misconstruction.

Look at this man to my right. Who knows what weird things—what wicked things, even—he may do. Look at this man to my left. Who knows what trauma he may have endured, and what harmful inclinations he may have in consequence. Though both men look “normal” and “civilized,” our nature is bottomless, and so unpredictable and complex that no mere appearance does justice to anything.

Therefore it is not unreasonable to speculate about anything a person might do or have done, even though his appearance makes him seem the most ordinary Joe, indeed Mr. Civilization. And in general, though most of us look normal and rational, throughout life we are influenced by the irrational in all sorts of ways we tend not to perceive or consider, from sexual urges to anxieties and fears and resentments. We know this from the common experience of “losing our cool.” But common though this is, we still think of ourselves as fundamentally rational creatures. And yet, every day the news informs us of incidents of violence all over the world, precisely what it is that gives history such a dark and terrible cast. If we actually applied this knowledge to our notion of the human condition, we should find it difficult to believe in the illusion of civilization.

A very intelligent psychiatrist once remarked to me, “the normal family convention has no attendants.” Likewise, there is, properly speaking, no one who is normal, no one who has not had countless irrational thoughts, anxieties and fantasies. As many psychiatrists readily concede, there is no real science behind the DSM’s classification of “mental disorders.” In practice, the term normal does little more than denote people whom we have no reason to fear, who are no threat to our own well-being. But of course, conflict is a natural feature of life, in both the individual psyche and in our relations with others. Still, because our perceptions are generally superficial, it is easy, especially for those of us who live in the relatively peaceful and prosperous First World, to believe in the illusion of civilization, a notion that contains and indeed requires a massive minimization of human conflict.

That we should believe in civilization isn’t surprising

Again, we tend to be unaware of the power of the irrational, intellectuals as much as the rest of humans. Most of us, moreover, are unaware of the extent to which even our shared experience always contains a certain element of solipsism, not accessible by other people. For again, each person can be understood as a kind of particular symbolic history, one which no one else can understand nearly as well as we can (provided we our thoughtful people who do try to understand ourselves). This is not to say that there is no objective reality, only that we are all particular beings that know it only as particular beings, just as we can only know so much about other people, including how they perceive reality, and what it means to them.

It is very easy for a person whose own life is relatively rational, safe and orderly to make the mistake of thinking his life is the human norm, or representative of the whole. But go into the worst part of town, then speculate as to whether its inhabitants would be likely to share your point of view. If you take Lancaster Avenue across City Line Avenue, going from Lower Merion, Pennsylvania into West Philadelphia, you enter a place where the word civilization means something very different from what it means in the place you came from. In Lower Merion, most homes have a security system. In most of West Philly, there is little security, and violence is a way of life.

If we were not prone by nature to delusive hope, we would better see that irrational conflict is universal, undermining what we simplistically call civilization. Yet hope comforts the emotions as it clouds the eyes. It fends off the greatest of psychological evils, fear. Modern science, too, obscures the tragic truth of life, allowing us to believe precisely what we most want to: that we are less limited than we actually are, and that there are no problems that modern progress and technology cannot solve. Meanwhile, humankind is really like a child who, never learning from his self-induced suffering, is condemned to repeat the same old predictable folly.

That civilization is an illusion explains how readily and spontaneously huge masses of people can erupt into wars, riots, fights, and other irrational frenzies. Now, again, with our limited minds we unconsciously tend to equate our own phenomenological experience with reality itself. Yet if we could access the minds of our fellow humans, we would be faced with such a stupefying overall bewilderment—such an unending variety of impulse, thought, belief, fantasy, illusion, delusion, hallucination, and so on—that we could not possibly believe in civilization. We would rather have a terrifying sense of the underlying chaos of things. No wonder the other animals, with their superior senses, fear and avoid us as well as each other.

But though civilization is an illusion, it is like religion in being one that it is good to keep up. It is good for people—so egotistic and intractable—to fear something, whether it is God, the law, or whatever. Indeed, the freedom of secular, democratic societies seems to culminate in chaos, so that humankind eventually requires the order provided by traditional authoritarian lawgivers.

In fact, it may reasonably be thought that these persons reflect the permanent disposition of our nature, for if we look closely, we will find that even in secular, democratic societies people are given to all manner of slavish though sometimes subtle hero worship, proof of which is provided by US, People and the like unreadable magazines. This is a kind of herd idolatry related to the love for demagogues. Nor is there ever a time when the mass of people do not have some politician or other before whom to prostate themselves. And the disposition to this behavior seems to differ in degree, not in kind, from the masses' general attitude toward authority and persons of superior ability and achievement. Not to speak of the odious fascination with the most inane "celebrities."

The Purity Of Non-Western Thinking

May 21, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

I was on a date with a South American au pair today and I had a thought when she — without an ounce of worry — started talking about gay guys. Far from a groundbreaking discovery, yet it was still something that never connected in my mind before. Could it be our less than fond desire of the Western culture stems from the fact that it is simply unpure?

Let's think about what people always say when they travel:

- People are so care-free
- People are rude
- People are direct
- People enjoy life
- People are not politically correct
- Girls are feminine
- Girls are passionate
- Girls are homemakers
- Men are masculine
- Men are the older ones in relationships

And so on. If we compare to the West:

- People are in a constant state of stress
- People are "so nice!"

- People get offended by almost anything
- Girls are like men
- Men are like girls
- Cougar societies
- Sex is at best a poor attempt of a c-class porno or at worst some obligatory relationship side effect

Obviously not all foreign cultures are the same but the general idea is that people outside the West tend to enjoy their lives more by adhering to their actual desires, as instead opposed to taught behavior or preconceived societal ideals.

So when we refer to feminism or Western society as a virus, it is exactly that. Think about how a virus works. You take an already infected host, who sneezes or coughs or otherwise spreads the virus somehow. An unsuspecting host gets infected, the virus replicates and takes over. Now that person can spread the virus. In other words, it is a manufactured state of being.

I wrote a similar article here, but focused more on the male/female dynamic in courting and relationships. This is more general and broad in nature, and meant as more of a question posed than an idea analyzed.

Humans are meant to function a certain way and we have substantially deviated from that here. So perhaps it is the purity of foreign travels that excites us and makes us happy. That instead of having a redbull at 3pm to get through the workday, you have a mid-afternoon siesta in Spain. That instead of standing in line at Starbucks, you sit in a cafe in Italy sipping espresso watching the locals. That instead of being labeled a creep, the 19 year old is equally turned on by your age as you are by hers.

5 Sex Tips That Make Her Want To Come Back For More

May 21, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, welcome to one of the most important blog posts you'll ever read. All of the effort you've put out in developing your game comes down to one final aspect: can you fuck her so good, that she'll keep coming back for more?

If you've had any doubts about your sexual prowess, this article will lead you to the pussy promise land and will ensure that you have some tools to take it up a notch. Pun intended.

5. Focus On The Psychological, Not Just The Physical

I get emails weekly from readers who ask what is the best position to fuck a girl in and how long they should have sex for before cumming. Hear me loud and clear: fucking a girl properly is only partially physical. *The rest is psychological.

Turning her on physically is a part of the process, but turning her mind on and getting into her head is what you want to do. This separates you from the boys who are trying to utilize every sex position known to mankind to impress her. Guess what? You're not impressing her, in fact, she's sick of switching positions every two minutes.

How do you get into her head and turn her on?

There are two main aspects of this:

1. Talking Dirty To Her: open your mouth and vocalize the interaction.

"You like that don't you?"

"That pussy feels so good"

2. Lead Her Through Commands

Don't do this:

"Would you like me to fuck you hard?"

"Do you want to do doggy style?"

No no no. You are an alpha caveman and you command her. She is there to please you.

Do this:

"Suck my cock hard. Slobber on it."

"You're my slut"

"You're my dirty girl. Eat my cum"

"Open your mouth. Open your mouth my little whore. Swallow my cum."

"Spread your pussy"

"Hold your ass apart baby" (doggy style)

Note: Use “my” to provide ‘ownership’ of her. Just saying “you’re a slut” doesn’t help create the connection that Deep Conversion sex creates and can also put in her mind that you’re judging her, which will close her legs faster than a barn door in a tornado. Always use “my”.

4. Dominate Her Physically

Get the concept of the two of you lying on a bed of roses and gently having missionary sex out of your head, if you ever want to keep her around. That shit doesn’t fly. You have to manhandle her and always be dominant, leading, and taking control.

Read closely: Women want to be ‘taken’ by a man.

When she hops into bed with you, she’s hoping that you’ll know what you’re doing and will rock her body, not ask what position she’d like to try next. If you could get a glimpse into a woman’s mind you would be stunned: they are just as sexually ‘dirty’ as men, if not more so.

There’s a reason why the best selling book 50 Shades of Grey has women wet all over the world: they love this shit.

Any alpha playboy in development should know these few core positions and utilize them. Anything other than these is gravy, but these are great dominating positions that have served me well for over a decade.

Haven’t had any complaints, just compliments.

Doggy Style

The Jackhammer (best G-spot position)

“Ride My Cock” (or commonly known as Cowgirl)

Anything more is fine, but these are great tried and positions that allow you to dominate and to ‘rest’ in the last one. Usually girls get off from riding a cock as well, so if you actually want to make her cum, then sit back and let her ride you for a bit.

Note: Clearly there’s tons of other positions that you can use, but start practicing with these. Practice makes perfect.

3. Get Rough Within Reason

Girls today are jaded by multiple partners, being frequent porn viewers themselves and sexual experimentation to the 9th degree. What alpha males get, is that women actually fantasy and enjoy rough consensual sex. This is a part of the desire to be ‘taken’ by a man and ravished like it’s the last time on earth that two humans have sex. Here’s some tips:

-Pull Her Hair:

Grab towards the base of her head, not at the end.

If she has longer hair, you can wrap it around your hand while fucking her doggy style. Do a couple of hand wraps with her hair and pull consistently. Guaranteed she gets wetter than Free Willy.

-'Choke' Her:

When I say 'choke' her, I mean apply some pressure on her throat with your hand, but ensure that she's down for this by gently grabbing her neck during sex. If she freaks, then she's not ready for it, or may simply not like it, but I have only met 2-3 girls out of the hundreds I've fucked who didn't like it. Most do, but test the waters.

-Spit On Her:

I'm not talking about hawking up a lugi and spitting it in her eyes, I'm talking about gathering a small amount of spit in your mouth and spitting on her tits, pussy, mouth and face. Start with spitting on her pussy, then nipples, then have her open her mouth by commanding her ("Open your mouth my little slut") and spit in her mouth. This is highly fucking erotic.

-Have Her Eat Cum Off The Floor Or An Object While Holding Her Head Or Her Hair:

If you shoot your load on her face, then odds are some cum will hit the floor. Cum on a mirror, the floor, or a glass coffee table and grab her by the hair/head and have her lick it all up on all fours.

Say this while doing it: "Eat my cum up. That's my good whore. Lick it up, lick it up. Good girl". She'll eat it up and be 'eating' it up in her mind too. Don't be a pussy, you can have her Windex it later. Your material goods will survive just fine.

Rest assured gentlemen, the most innocent looking girls are the most slutty in bed. Unleash her inner slut with these moves.

2. Don't Try To Please Her, Have Her Please You

This is a big one gents. You have to get it through your head that by using frame and dominance, her pleasuring you, provides pleasure for her. Alpha males are dominant and get what they want from women.

They are not pussy footing around, eating a girl's pussy out for an hour trying to make her cum. There's a time and place for that, but not in the initial stages from ONS to repeat hookup partner.

To put this in simple terms: g*irls love to suck and fuck an alpha males cock and biologically have the instinct and craving to get his seed.*

In other words, bitches want your cock n' cum when you're a High Value Male. Period. This is a fucking fact that will never change.

Girls reward alpha males who take charge, with their pussies. This has always been this way and always will.

She is your plaything and you should treat her as such. Fuck her like it's the last time you'll ever have sex again and do it for your pleasure, not hers. Ravish her, dominate her, open her mind by looking her in the eyes and talking dirty to her and you will rock her fucking world.

Many a time, I've had sexy sluts tell me, "I love how you just take me and you're like a wild animal while we're fucking". Think about that: "wild animal". You sure as hell won't get a girl worked up by lying under the covers and gently penetrating her in the missionary position.

Note: I'm not saying every sex session has to be pussy pounding time, but for one night stands you should focus on the techniques I've laid out for you. These are tried and true and once she's hooked, you can venture into mixing it up sexually.

1. Be Spontanenous

You know where my least favorite place to fuck a girl is? A bed. Yep, it's fucking boring to me. My favorite place is a public restroom in the handicap stall. At my pad? Her bent over my bathroom counter facing the mirror. She has one leg on the counter and I'm behind her fucking her while pulling her hair and maintaining eye contact with her in the mirror. Powerful stuff.

Want to really turn on a girl, get her wetter than Niagara Falls and have her truly get hooked on your sexual prowess? Get Spontaneous.

The reason why sex gets predictable between partners is because they get into routines. You have to live in the moment.

- Pull in her the alley behind a dumpster up against the wall, hike her skirt up and go to town.
- Slip into a one toilet restroom, lock the door and bend her over the counter.

Obviously be smart and make sure you're not within plain sight, but mix it up. Girls love the randomness and excitement that having sex at the drop of the hat provides them and you will too, if you stop thinking of sex of always having to take place on a bed. You'll find that as you incorporate mixing up where you have sex, that it'll unleash an animal like instinct in you, and you'll ravish her body.

How To Survive A Modern Day Witch-hunt

May 22, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Witch-hunts are becoming increasingly common. A list of over a hundred names purged from their jobs for unpopular beliefs or controversial statements can be found here. American political warfare has reached the same state as actual warfare, where the line between combatant and civilian is blurred. Americans used to put aside their political beliefs to work together, and now they actively use their beliefs to purge each other from the public sphere through modern Inquisitions.

This is guide for surviving modern witch-hunts. If you or someone you know is the target of a witch-hunt, or in a position where you could be targeted for a witch-hunt, please forward them this article.

Preventative Medicine

Just as traditional witch-hunts were not always about purging actual witches, modern witch-hunts often target innocent men for political reasons. You do not have to actually be a witch to be targeted by a witch-hunt. The best cure is prevention—don't wait till you're a target to develop a strategy.

Develop an anti-fragile persona. Anti-fragility is a term coined by author Nassim Taleb, to describe any system that gets stronger under stress. A wine glass is fragile and shatters under stress, but your muscles are anti-fragile because they get stronger when you use them. A public figure like Ann Coulter can get away with making statements that would get another person fired from their job because she has an anti-fragile persona. When people write about her, it gives her publicity and drives her book sales up. As Hunter S. Thompson put it, "if you're going to be crazy, you'd better get paid for it."

Be self-employed. If no one hired you, no one can fire you. Artists who own their own intellectual property and entrepreneurs who own their own business find themselves in an anti-fragile position. Had Orson Scott Card been a hired-gun on the film adaptation of Ender's Game rather than creator of the underlying intellectual property, he would have certainly been purged for his views on gay marriage, the way he was purged from the Superman project he was writing. Because he owned Ender's Game books, his film collaborators could only distance themselves, but not fire him.

Find your tribe. Most people who survive a witch-hunt do so because they have a loyal fanbase or tribe they've aligned themselves with. You do not have to have an inherently political business to align yourself with a tribe. While it might not seem like a family business making duck calls lends itself to conservative Christianity, the reason the patriarch of Duck Dynasty kept his job was because he aligned himself with a very large, loyal, and vocal Christian fanbase.

Being self-employed with an anti-fragile persona, and strong tribe will actually set you up to benefit from and monetize witch-hunts. Yes, modern political discourse incentivizes divisive behavior and extreme views. If you think that's bad, wait till you see what the dating market incentivizes.

Expect The Inquisition

Realize it's happening. The biggest mistake the targets of a witch-hunt make is not realizing a witch-hunt is happening. They are good-natured people and assume their opponents are too. They believe there's just been an honest mistake and if they can explain their position clearly it will clear the whole thing up. Wrong. As Science-fiction author Vox Day writes about his own purging from the Science Fiction Writers Association:

> Most people have the causality backwards. They think the purge is taking place due to whatever it is that they did or said. That's not the case. It is taking place because of who you are and what you represent to them. The truth is that the faction behind your prospective purge already wanted you out and they are simply using the nominal reason given as an excuse to get rid of you.

Never apologize. They don't want an apology, they want your job. Apologies are blood in the water. If you apologize, you're telling them you can be shamed and their tactics are working. There is not a single incident of someone giving a public apology and their apology ending a witch-hunt against them. Remember, it's not about what you did, it's about who they are. Hold your frame, agree and amplify, reframe, but never apologize for who you are or what you believe. They may not like you, but they will respect you.

Expose your opponents. Write down and publish everything your opponents do. When Adriana Richards purged a python-programmer for a private a joke at a tech conference about the word "dongle," she was counter-purged from her own job.

Purges are rarely carried within the rules. Vox Day's opponents bent SFWA rules, Mozilla CEO Brendan Eich's political contributions to stop gay marriage were private at the time he made them, and Donald Sterling's statements about race were illegally recorded. If your opponents try to do something in the dark, drag it into the light.

Remain in the truth. If you're under scrutiny, don't give your opponents a real scandal they could nail you for. Don't lie. Never do anything illegal. Stay blameless. Make sure anything you say about your opponents is entirely factual and clearly documented. Also, if you haven't found a tribe, as mentioned above, do so immediately, because none of this documentation will matter unless there is someone willing to read it.

Go On The Offensive

Counter-purge. Once a mob has been assembled, they will have blood. Make sure it's not yours by giving them a new target. Call your opponents out by name. Return of Kings and similar bloggers have managed to survive several witch-hunts by writing SEO-friendly articles documenting opponents actions using their full name. You can read a breakdown of this strategy here and here. Calling-out your enemies also prevents future attacks and ensures no one without an anti-fragile persona will even consider attacking you.

Make firing you difficult. When the film studio Paramount was considering firing Francis Ford Coppola from The Godfather because they didn't like Marlon Brando's iconic performance (they couldn't understand what Brando was saying), Coppola made a list of everyone who could replace him as director – assistant directors, associate producers, etc. – and fired all of them. The studio had no idea what to do, since firing Coppola now meant shutting down the film. A week later Coppola was nominated for an Oscar for writing Patton, and the studio backed off. If you aren't an owner, make yourself irreplaceable.

Find the real enemy. The controversial statements made by NBA owner Donald Sterling were illegally recorded by a woman with ties to Magic Johnson. Johnson and his partners have been trying to buy the LA Clippers. Purging the current owner would certainly be convenient for Johnson.

Most purges are not initiated for their stated reasons. Accusations of thought crime are often a cover for political control. There are even rumors that Mozilla CEO Brendan Eich was actually purged for refusing to to build NSA surveillance into his browser. It's easier to fight your enemies when you know who's pulling the strings.

Conclusion

Remember that no one can harm you without your consent. The mob can only control you if you need something from them—money, validation, acceptance, etc. If you can find other ways of fulfilling your needs, you can live life on your own terms. Think of this as an opportunity to expand your abundance. Own your own business, create your own art, and align yourself with people who accept who you are. If someone comes after you, shine the light of the truth on them, because even if you lose the world, you gain your own soul.

5 Reasons Why You Need To Grow A Beard

May 22, 2014 | by Wanderlust | Link | Original Link

A good beard is a very special thing. Like a properly tailored suit, it can make a man really look like a man, and worn correctly it can be one of the most effective parts of your style arsenal. Best of all, it's a gift from nature, and it comes for free.

Starting at about the age of 15, most young men are told by their parents that they must shave their faces clean in order to look proper and respectable in society. Oh how wrong they were.

About 6 months ago, I threw out my shaving cream and razors and began letting my beard grow as it naturally does on a true man (also trying the no-shampoo challenge). The results of my beard experiment are in, and it has been a tremendous success. I have no intention of shaving, and I will now tell you some of the reasons why growing your beard is something every man needs to try.

Even George Clooney is happier with a beard.

1. Women Love It

This is one of the biggest immediate upsides to growing out your beard. Women simply love it. Even the ones who claim they 'don't like men with beards,' or they 'think it looks gross,' will be lined up around the block for a chance to pet it once it starts really filling in. When I go out to a bar with friends, or especially if I'm playing music somewhere, the women in the place will walk up to me and touch it. Sometimes petting it, squeezing it, running their fingers through it, and often times without even asking.

I get opened by women with so many different lines, almost all related to my beard. 'Oh my gawd, is that real?' 'Wow, how long have you been growing that?' 'Omigosh I haven't seen a beard like that in years!' But they all end up wanting to touch it, no matter how they start the conversation.

It also works wonders when I'm opening on a girl. After a very short opener, she is sure to ask about my beard, which gives me an excellent excuse to initiate physical contact. I can take her hand and lead it to the beard, or if the setting is right and interest level is high enough, I can wrap my arms around her and gently rub it against her cheek. This is especially effective for getting her all tingly between the legs because it makes her think of how it will feel being in bed with me and my beard. Bottom line: it works.

2. It Makes You Feel Masculine

There's something special about the feeling of having a full beard. Even though I'm nearly thirty years old, I still feel more like a full-grown man when I look in the mirror and see my beard. It's as if the man hiding within the boy for all the years before has just recently been allowed to grow out. There's a natural ruggedness and toughness that's associated with men who have full beards, and when you see your face without the oppression of razors, you develop a new appreciation for your own manliness. (Bonus: No more worry of razor burn or five o'clock shadows!)

This internal development will also carry into a greater amount of confidence. You'll find yourself walking taller and standing stronger than you did with a little boy's face. You'll find that you look at yourself differently in the mirror, that you look at other people differently, and that others look at you differently as well. This leads me to the next point that…

3. It Demands Respect From Others

Men with full beards have a certain air about them; a respectable, authoritative air. It's not the look of a fresh up-and-comer. It's cultured and refined. It's the look of a man who's seen the world and has more than a few tales to tell about it. It's the look of the well-traveled professor, of the doctor who's saved more people than you've even met. And more importantly, it's the look of The Most Interesting Man In The World.

This style can be very intimidating in social situations, especially when paired with the right persona. A man with a beard always seems to know where he's going, always knows what he's doing, and whenever questions arise he's the one you turn to. It commands respect from both men and women, of all ages.

I've found that even in the sprawling metropolis in which I currently live, simply walking down the street with my beard makes people move out of the way, as if I am parting the Red Sea (much like another famously bearded fellow). People see you coming from a mile away. A man with a beard never seems to be wandering aimlessly, using his face carpet as a natural GPS.

4. It Forces You To Buck Social Norms

Despite the amazing things that a beard does for one's self-confidence and self-image, a full beard being worn well has become a relatively rare sight in today's feminized world of bald faces. Even presidents don't have the balls necessary to sport a full beard any more. The last one who dared to was in the 1800's.

While people will respect your beard, many will not like it. Akin to a scrawny man standing next to a ripped lifter, they don't like being intimidated by your masculinity and being made to look like a woman next to you. While they may come up with different reasons why you shouldn't have one (homeless people have beards, terrorists have beards, etc.), it all boils down to one simple fact: they feel weak next to a man with a beard.

A man with a beard makes it very clear to the world that he goes his own way. He eschews the modern style and trends of androgyny in favor of allowing his natural masculinity to be on display to the world. This is seen in almost all aspects of life, as we are supposed to shave before any important event. Shave for your first date. Shave for your job interview. Shave for your inauguration. All blasphemy.

Once you grow your beard, you must own it and continue to do so through all the naysayers and contrarians who demand that you capitulate and shave. And if anyone has the gall to tell you to shave, a stern look and a grunt should be enough to put them back in their place. Remember, their attitudes come from a feeling of weakness.

Does this guy look like he takes shit from anyone?

5. A Beard Forces You Into The Alpha Mindset

As I've mentioned before, wearing a beard will significantly change your personal interactions with other men and women, as well as with the general public around you. Throughout that time, especially while it's growing in and isn't yet strong enough to speak for itself, you will have to endure bullshit and pressure from many different sources around you, whether it's work, friends, or family.

You will also experience more success, albeit sometimes harder won, in your many aspects of life. You will learn to appreciate yourself more as a strong man, as a decision maker, as someone who makes their own way and their own destiny. You will find your decisions and actions further emboldened by your mindset, which cyclically increases your self-determination and discipline.

In other words, it creates a strong alpha mentality. A man who owns his beard also appears to own the world around him. He makes his decisions and sticks with them, he is not one to be second-guessed. To all who see it, a beard is a sign of strength and masculinity. It is a reminder of how nature intended man to be: powerful, confident, and self-assured. Because a man with a beard is a man to be feared.

5 Signs The American Education System Is Doomed

May 23, 2014 | by Thatcan Dideguy | Link | Original Link

There was a time when going to school meant you were going to learn. A time where discipline was expected and lessons learned. I had the idea to become a teacher. I had an image in my head of men sitting in leather chairs surrounded by walls of books, smoking cigars, sipping brandy, discussing philosophy, and history among other things. To my surprise and horror the education system where learning actually takes part is a thing of the past. I am majoring in education and will graduate soon. If you have ever felt like you have too much spare money and sense of achievement lying around and need somewhere to take it than majoring in education is the perfect place for you. Our current educational system in America is

- Almost completely taught by women
- Heavily regulated by the government

So surprisingly it is hard for knowledge and learning to flourish and grow in a place when everything is done for emotions and an agenda.

1. The Self Esteem Nazis

"It's not Billy's fault that he is 200 pounds at age 12!!!" says the teacher. In my mind I think then who the hells fault is it? Doritos? The parents? Are they force feeding Billy? We had an assignment where we had to address how we would handle a kid who was fat's self-esteem and to my shock and surprise "lose some damn weight" or maybe "don't have the BMI of a hippopotamus" was not the "correct" answer according to my overlords—I'm sorry, I meant professors. In my evil dirty man brain I thought "Hey Billy is not doing himself any favors by being fat so maybe…I don't know…he should lose some weight, maybe hit the gym or stop eating so damn much". Wrong! Evil! Obviously what Billy needs it to be told he is fine the way he is because you know he is an individual of merit.

2. Androgyny Is A Virtue

I did something horrible. Your computer will most likely explode after reading the following sentences so I apologize in advance. When addressing a group of students I said "you guys." Let it sink in, I know I am a horrible person, no need to tell me. I had points taken off for this statement. Call me crazy but I just thought "you guys" sounded a little better than "you individuals of the multicultural and diverse non gender specific world." Again I was probably using my damn patriarchal dinosaur brain. I just cannot imagine what it would be like (again most likely because of my dirty male brain) to be a little girl and hear the words "you guys." I am not sure how many lives I destroyed that day but I am sorry for every one of them. It is people like me that create 200 pound 12 year olds.

3. "Protect" The Precious Children

We had an assignment where we had to state what we would say and do if a misbehaving student was assigned a "guardian" (someone to keep the kid in line). In this case the guardian was an ex-Marine assigned to a misbehaving boy we will call him Johnny. "What do you think about this?" asks the professor. I think great—smack Johnny next time he acts up I can't reach from here. Again not the right answer. No we were supposed to take the side of poor little Johnny. You see it is not Johnny's fault he acts up. Apparently there is some evil being out there ruining all of our kids. (You know since it is obviously not their own decisions or God forbid their fault). We should probably instigate a nationwide manhunt.

4. No Testosterone Allowed

The origin of evil, the original sin, is testosterone. Even the word makes me shudder. If kids (i.e., boys) get into a fight that they are expelled and deemed evil by the school board. Fighting is a normal part of male maturity and when you bottle it up it finds other ways to release itself. As long as no one seriously gets injured then a fight every now and then really isn't that big of deal, especially when compared to the alternatives. However the school system in its endless effort to quell testosterone wherever it may be found declares fighting an evil. Then we wonder why so many Americans are fat and retarded, on top of being soft.

Do you remember all those school shooting that happened in the 1920's when kids could bring guns to school (in the back of their trucks on gun racks)? Yeah, me either. Am I advocating that kids should bring guns to school? No of course not, especially not with this generation. It was different when kids had to survive with hunting and grew up with guns in rural areas. All I am saying is that maybe every now and then we could use some common sense for solving our problems.

5. Children Are King

Another assignment we did is where we had to do a presentation where we introduced ourselves to a class of virtual students. Now there were six students and each had a unique "personality". What would happen is when we would begin our introduction one of the kids would either interrupt or one would pull out her phone. Other teachers failed the test so when I got up there I figured I would handle this like a soon to be adult should.

When the phones were pulled out I said put the thing away. I said that if she didn't stop she could leave. Wrong answer, I failed the test. Instead I was supposed to placate and cave to the student. Why? Because I wasn't supposed to argue with the student—I was supposed to "involve" the student. What does this mean? This means that I was supposed to ask her if she could use her phone to help look something up for me. So essentially as the teacher I wasn't allowed to interfere with the student's precious will. Again we wonder why American is falling and these are just my limited experience within the past two years.

Believe it or not but coddling does not produce well-adjusted individuals. Crazy, right? If you take anything from this I hope it is that self-education is the only education. Our education system is a joke and unlike most jokes this one has consequences. However, as we know a large part of being a man is being self-reliant (yet another thing the educational system deems a sin). So until next time if your ever wondering why Johnny can't read yet think he deserves to be a billionaire you will know why.

4 Signs You're In A Poisonous Long-Term Relationship

May 23, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Several years ago, prior to my red pill education, I was in a blissfully miserable long term relationship with a girl I had met at college. Yes, you read that correctly – blissfully miserable. Meaning that I hated my life with a passion, yet somehow it seemed that this was how it was supposed to be. I did everything in my power to please her, practically apologized 24 hours a day, and my entire life orbited around her schedule, needs, and desires. I stayed in this poisonous relationship for nearly two years, as it slowly wore away at my soul.

In my defense, she was hot and on the school's dance team, so there was some prestige involved in it. Still, I was a fool.

Why did I take so long to get out of that relationship? I am fairly confident it was because of a combination of things – sitcoms, seeing my family's relationships, and the general rule of American households that a happy wife, girlfriend, or significant other results in a happy life. This gave me the impression that I should do everything in my power to please her, which only worsened things.

Eventually, I did get out of that relationship, and after having a few weeks of mourning, I moved on relatively quickly and was instantly happier. It felt like the burden of the world had been lifted off of my shoulders. Then I started finding sites like ROK, and the rest is history. Now, I feel an obligation to pass my knowledge on.

If your long term relationship begins to start exhibiting the following signs of poison, get out.

You Dread Time With Your Friends

Keeping up separate social circles is a key part of a healthy long term relationship. Nobody likes two people who are stuck to each other like glue, and usually those two people grow to resent each other. So, why would you dread time with your friends?

In my case, it was because my girlfriend guilt-tripped me and generally made me feel like shit whenever I wasn't spending time with her. A girl who is so dependent that she can't stand the thought of you spending time with anyone else (male or female) without her being there is someone who will wear down on you very quickly. Needless to say, you can't bring her along every time to hang out with your group of friends, as your buddies will come to hate her even more than they already do.

The Sex Stops

This one is obviously easy to spot, and will happen gradually. A headache here, a stomachache there, and all of a sudden you're left with your hand every night. A girl who no longer craves your meat pounding her silly is a woman who has one foot out the door. As soon as she starts denying sex, or even worse – using it as a weapon – is the moment your relationship is doomed. Continue down the path of the relationship if you wish, but realize that there is a good chance you're going to end up like a dog begging for scraps at the dinner table – like me.

In the case of my relationship, I went the last eight months of that relationship without getting my penis touched once. So much for not fapping. On top of that, we lived together in the same apartment for three of those months, and the other five we regularly spent five nights a week in the same bed. Sometimes, she would put little stars on my calendar for nights that she agreed to get intimate with me, but then, when sexy time rolled around, she would rescind that offer, usually because she had a headache. Shocking.

You Apologize More Than She Does

Girls are irrational, live-in-the-moment creatures who will start nuclear explosions within your relationship out of nothing. Half the time, I don't even think they realize what they're doing. Therefore, she should be doing the majority of the apologizing in the relationship. Under no circumstance should you apologize to sooth things over, which is always what I did. A typical conversation would go like this:

Me: "What's wrong? You're in a bad mood I can tell."

Girlfriend: "Nothing, wow."

Me: "Okay baby I'm sorry."

Girlfriend: "Leave me alone."

Me: "Okay sorry again."

You should only apologize if you are truly wrong and can admit your mistake, and then apologize once. After that, the discussion is over.

She Asks Permission To Cheat On You

Girlfriend: "So…I'm feeling kind of distant from you lately. There is this guy at work who likes me. Do you mind if I like…hook up with him? To see if it will rekindle our spark?"

I'm not proud of it, but I told her to go ahead, but warned her I might not be around after. I also told her not to talk to me until after. She went over there, and nothing happened (supposedly). She showed up in tears and said she was sorry. I forgave her at the time and things resumed as normal, but the relationship only lasted another month, fortunately.

Thankfully, I figured out game, and eventually decided to give the relationship thing another go. This time around, I've noticed the exact opposite of many of these things – she doesn't care about me hanging out with friends, I can hardly keep up with her sex drive, she apologizes more often than I do, and she worries far more that I'd cheat on her than vice versa. She tells me all the time that she is truly happy, and I can see it in her eyes.

I look back at my last relationship and can laugh at it now, as it has been a couple of years. However, I'll be honest – writing and editing this article made me feel sick to my stomach.

Just for kicks, tonight I'm going to tell my girlfriend we can't have sex because I have a stomachache.

The Psychological Sexual Desensitization Of The Modern Man

May 24, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

It's often said that sex lies between the ears, than between the legs. The brain controls the body, and plays an important role in sexuality. A sexual mind thus also contributes significantly to a healthy sexuality.

However, men today face higher cases of psychologically induced sexual burnout and dysfunction as compared to their forefathers, in spite of living in a time where modern health care has increased human longevity than before – a classic case of how we've added years to life, but not life to years.

Humanity is today living in increasingly permissive times. Though this may seem like men could enjoy and experience sex much more than their predecessors, what has to be also noted that this has also ironically contributed to the psychological sexual desensitization of modern men, in subtle ways.

These are some of the major factors which lead to modern male psychological sexual desensitization:

1. Stress and low self-esteem

The problem: Stress is one of the top-most killers of male sexual desire. Men often eat pressure or stress on a daily basis in modern commercialized societies, leading to premature burnouts of both men and male sexual desire. It's often said that when poverty knocks on the door, love flies out of the window. In modern commercialized times, you could add sex to that statement as well. We've learned how to make a living, but not how to make a life.

Throw in modern day inflated sexual ideals regarding penis size, ejaculation time, sexual skills etc. and the average modern man then has enough unrealistic pressure from society (and often from his partner) to perform as a porn star in bed, thus contributing to stress from performance anxiety. Sex then becomes a gladiatorial fight to prove a man's virility to his over-expecting, socially brainwashed partner, often disconnecting it from the pleasure principle, eventually leading to male sexual burnout. Throw in continued usage of male aphrodisiacs to boost performance, and you're looking at long term health problems.

Similarly, male sexual desire is linked to male self esteem. The man who's stressed out will often experience loss of sexual desire, which could cause moments of performance failure – adding to more stress and lower self esteem – leading to a downward vicious spiral of sexual agony. Couple that with a bad woman in his life, who constantly demeans and devalues him – and his brain is then put off from sex. A healthy male ego is as necessary as a healthy body, for a healthy state of mind which leads to an interest in sex.

The solution: Stress management. Get professional help if needed. Stop entertaining unrealistic expectations of yourself, especially in the sexual arena. In sex, it's only pleasure which counts in the end. Eat well, exercise, take care of your body, respect and know its limits – you have only one. Focus on financial independence, which can liberate the common source of all stress in the modern world. If that job or your partner is killing your mood for the romp, then it's time you looked elsewhere for an upgrade.

2.Pornography

The problem: The dangers of porn rewiring the male mind to alter male sexual desire are well known. Even worse are its effects on happy, fulfilling relationships–to eventually destroy them. The average man masturbates more with access to porn, leading to sexual depletion and a whole range of other dangerous sexual and psychological problems, which further damages his sexuality.

The solution: Quit porn now, for addiction to it is a serious issue. Concentrate on seeking sexual release within a real woman, learn game.

3. Sexual excess, sexual frustration and sexual depletion

The problem: Familiarity breeds contempt. Just like how monogamy eventually leads to sexual boredom, so can sexual excess, as sexual thirst determines the demand and value of sex.

With the general permissiveness of modern women, sexual abundance is increasingly possible for men. However, not all men have the same sexual desires, tastes and capacity, which vary over time. Either way, every man's sexual threshold limit which when exceeded leads to sexual disinterest, due to both sexual familiarity and sexual depletion caused by possible excess.

On the flip-side, the sexually frustrated man experiencing a sexual famine often seeks other alternatives for sexual release, which can put him also at risk for psychological desensitization towards females, because his brain has rewired his mind to seek alternatives.

The solution: Self regulation, both of personal sexuality as well as of exposure to external sexual stimulus (visual or manual). What has to be realized is that sexuality, while being the most powerful need of the human body—is finite and needs to be conserved, as life itself is finite. Sexual release should neither be suppressed or over-expended, but regulated.

4. Oversexualized modern societies, feminism and male baiting

The problem: Similar to porn rewiring the male mind, so does an oversexualized society. This has not only destroyed modern men and women, but even corrupted children. A popular YouTube video below, quite shockingly highlights that.

Men are constantly barraged with sexually suggestive visuals in oversexualized societies in real life. How much could they possibly handle?

One of the functions of sex is to create bonding. With the liberal sluttiness of modern women in oversexualized societies, some men living there then choose to psychologically shut off from sex as these women represent no potential for forming relationships or having children with in a traditional family role model. Thus, modern social liberal trends could even affect birth rates.

However, the greatest danger of an oversexualized modern society is not only in over-eroticizing male psyche into sexually objectifying women, but rather more is the eventual psychological desensitization of men to the visual sex appeal of female body. Oversexualized modern societies often produce over-stimulated, sexually frustrated men by cock teasing them relentlessly with oversexualized modern female behavior, just like hungry dogs being baited with an elusive bone.

With modern women behaving more provocatively than before, the average man eventually trains to numb his brain— to care less for female visual sex appeal—as if being stuck in a permanent mental sexual refractory phase, much like the psychological adaptation of men living in nudist colonies among nude women. Men are thus forced to subdue their natural sexual responses to this form of male baiting. This abnormal forced suppression of the natural male sexual response can lead to voluntary celibacy, or problems like sexual depletion due to excess, or in some exceptional cases neurotic homosexuality.

But modern feminist women represent a more potent agent to further complicate the problem of male baiting by coupling it with man shaming (to destroy male self esteem), thus creating a frustrating form of sexual temptation with often risks of legal entrapment.

To quote from The Anatomy of Female Power, the example of the termagant feminist:

> "The termagant (the shrew, scold and harridan of old) is a misandrous sadist whose greatest pleasures come from man-baiting and man-bashing. She resents the matriarchist code which would have her pretend that she is not boss to her man. Under the banner of feminism, she can truly blossom. … The termagant claims for herself absolute freedom of conduct, and would punish any reaction, however natural, she provokes from men. She is the type of woman who would wear a miniskirt without panties, a see-through blouse without bra, and swings her legs and wiggles her arse as she parades up and down the street, and yet insist that no man should get excited by her provocative sexual display. Any man who whistles at the sight is berated for male chauvinism."

Thus, in this case, it's familiarity, disgust and often non-accessibility that breeds contempt.

The solution: Learn game and bang sluts (the logical way to adapt to the present social decline to find sexual release). Travel throughout the world; see different cultures to interact with different people (especially if you're presently living in an over-sexualized society). Practice meditation or spirituality to declutter and control the mind. Learn a new skill or language. Study philosophy. Focus on self-improvement.

Awareness is the key to preservation

See the world for it is, and not what it seems, and recognize the dangers of sexual desensitization of your mind – to save and conserve your sexuality well into your later years. A lot of men live their entire lives without self-discovery. Discover and nourish your talents.

Every man on this planet is a creator, for he bears the seed of life in him. Honor your masculinity and sexuality, respect it and like all good things in life, value it – just don't dissipate it.

7 Words Men Use To Describe Women (And What They Really Mean)

May 24, 2014 | by Kilmister | Link | Original Link

I read a piece today titled, 7 Words Women Use to Describe Men (And What They Really Mean). It was fair enough, but I don't really know or care too much what terms women use to describe men. However, it did inspire my own list. 7 Words Men Use to Describe Women (And What They Really Mean.)

These terms may or may not be familiar to some. These are terms that are used among my social circle of friends and a couple may be somewhat unique to you. While others are pretty universal and well known.

"Shank"

Shank is the absolute bottom of the barrel. Busted, beat, fugly are other more common terms. To be honest, I have only heard this one among friends. But I think it is the perfect descriptor. On the standard 1 to 10 scale these girls are hard 1s or 2s. Never any higher. These poor girls are so hideously grotesque even the most desperate man would rather just beat off before he put his penis anywhere near her. The kind of girl you would not even fuck with a stolen dick. Shank chicks are usually fat, but still somehow have small breasts. Their ass can often be found in the front and you know what they say, "Guys don't make passes at girls with frontal asses." I think you get the picture.

[image]

"Cute"

Cute girls are usually the more publicly tame and reserved type of female. The prototypical 'girl next door', if you will. They dress in a more conservative fashion and wear just the right amount of make-up. Think Zooey Deschanel as the definition of the 'cute' girl. These are the girls you are proud to bring home to mom and have the most marriage potential, if you are into that kind of thing. They are extra sexy because when you get a cute girl behind closed doors and bring out that sexy part of her, she becomes hotter than the hottest slut in the club. Cute girls also tend to be a little awkward with themselves, making them even more adorable. My personal favorite.

“Nice”

Fat. If someone uses ‘nice’ as the first and only descriptor, she’s a beluga whale. They may also describe her as having a ‘pretty face’. Red flags all the way.

“Slut”

Universal term used by men and women alike. While the most obvious trait of a slut is her aptitude for riding dick, it can also be a perception. There are sluts out there that may not be having even half the sex as they are perceived to be. At the end of the day perception is all that matters. Sluts have very low self-esteem and need constant attention to fill that huge void within their soul. Sadly, they only understand negative attention. The cycle of hopping from dick to dick only worsens the self-loathing as they seek acceptance from men in the only way they know how—sex.

Sluts are usually somewhat physically attractive and suitable for banging (a solid 6 to 7 on the standard scale). Sluts like to go out dressed as provocatively as possible and drink copious amounts of alcohol to deaden their inner pain as well as give them the courage to power through another painful night of despondent sex.

There is also the secret slut who is more outwardly conservative and secretive about her slutiness, but underneath the basic principal of the slut is still intact. Despite the recent explosion in accepted slutty behavior, under no circumstance should you marry or even date a slut. She will never be able to get enough attention to fill that void, and this will inevitably lead to infidelity.

“Skank”

Skanks are essentially the same thing as sluts emotionally, except they are more the white trash or ghetto type of girl. Picture a trailer park slut or inner city beastie. She is always 5 years or so behind in slut fashion and has way too many piercings. While all sluts have a tendency for tattoos, the skank tattoos are often homemade or of jailhouse variety, commonly on or around the breasts. Skanks still prefer the ‘tramp stamp’ of the early 2000s as well. Misspellings are common and it is not unusual to see a baby portrait resembling some sort of demon like creature. If you thought the slut had daddy issues, the skank has daddy issues that are even too taboo for me to discuss here.

“Hot”

Hot is obviously another universally accepted term used by men and women alike. This is but more subjective as everyone may have their own version of what they deem hot. To me nothing is ‘hotter’ than that cute, awkward girl behind closed doors. But most guys would say ‘hot’ is somewhere between an 8 and 9 on the standard scale. Usually hot girls know they are hot and it makes them enormous pains in the ass with an even more entitled attitude than average women.

Hot women are good for eye candy and sex, but to date one is a prodigious task that is usually not worth the reward. She usually brings nothing to the table except her looks and those fade. Being deemed ‘hot’ she never had to cultivate personality or intelligence as everything has always been handed to her. She is often dull and vapid. Attention is her goal and loyalty is not a priority. There are always exceptions, of course, but in general hot women are a hassle and only worth short term companionship. Often times hot girls are deceptively hot. Meaning once the make-up is off and the body enhancing clothes are removed, she is actually couple points lower. ‘Hot’ tends to be an overused term thrown around too freely.

“Smoking”

I don’t subscribe to the mentality that there women out there that are universal 10s. A 10 is basically an 8 or 9 that fits your own personal tastes the best. Say you are into red heads. A 9 red head is going to be a 10 to you while to me she may be an 8 or 9, but definitely not a 10. But ‘smoking’ is the top of the scale, no question.

Bonus: “Thick”

I was only going to do 7 but as I was writing I remembered my other favorite, ‘thick,’ used to describe a girl with a little extra meat on her bones for something to grab onto. A lot of guys, like myself, enjoy this. I especially enjoy a thick ass and legs. But here is where it gets dangerous. First, usually a thick girl is a Twinkie or two from disaster. There is a thin line there, unless it is that rare fitness thickie. More often than not a thick girl is curvy in all the right places. The catch, she only has a window of maybe ten years before it goes south, literally. They need to work extra hard to maintain that shape.

Women who describe themselves as ‘thick’ need to understand the difference between ‘thick’ and just plain ‘fat’. Don’t describe your body type as thick when your ass resembles my 40 inch flat screen as opposed to Beyonce. See the difference? Thick is curvy and firm, fat is flat and gelatinous. That is just hard truth and it’s important that we all know the difference. I can’t stand when fatties call themselves thick. Thick girls buy their jeans at Forver 21, fatties buy theirs at Best Buy.

What Liberals Don’t Understand About “Angry White Men”

May 25, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Self-proclaimed masculinity expert Michael Kimmel had an excerpt of his book, “Angry White Men: American Masculinity At The End Of An Era” published some months back on Salon. As with most of his work, he focuses exclusively on white men—especially rural and poor men—and endeavors to understand how white men collectively see themselves in society.

Of course, the only satisfying approach to these group of people is to treat them as class oppressors of women and racial minorities then assume their issues stem from primary narcissism and encourage to “man up!” and ditch their infantile, hateful masculinity in favor of an enlightened standard of masculinity devoid of any substance and completely based on other people’s approval. Here is what what Kimmel and his ilk generally believe:

The modern era is one characterized by increasing level of diversity and equity. As such, the mindset of the white male needs to change. Instead of feeling that it's their birthright to have good jobs and avoid poverty, they need to understand that the playing field is leveling and they might find themselves in extreme poverty and disadvantaged, just like how everybody who wasn't a white male was before. Instead of getting angry and not voting for Democrats, they need to understand that it is those others—Republicans—who are hurting them and they need to embrace progressive policies. By doing this, they can stop opposing feminism, environmentalism and socialism and instead understand that not being a progressive is based out of a reflexive state of fear of change and hatred of anybody who doesn't look like them.

First off, Kimmel shows off he has zero understanding of basic human psychology, much less American psychology. Kimmel advances the queer argument that white males who appeal to their fathers and grandfathers legacies are displaying white male entitlement. This isn't entitlement in any sense of the word, but a common and healthy desire for males to follow in the footsteps of their fathers. Kimmel is thoroughly urban, as such I think he instinctively feels urban fathers are an average worse than rural ones.

In Kimmel's world, (urban) fathers are nebbish, frightful little rodents that feel the need to constantly apologize for their existence, most especially politically. From this posture of failed fatherhood, he is immediately suspects anybody better relations with their fathers. His constant smearing of these men as full-throated hatemongers is wholly off-base. When he explored these communities, he found a foreign world with healthier relationships.

As I observed about my own upbringing in rural America, the idea that there is all this hate and fear freely expressed and flooding the community is laughable. Rural America is psychologically healthier precisely because the omnipresent eye of mass media, marketing and access to technology and public works is greatly diminished. As such, people learn to depend on one another. That is much more healthy then the urban mindset of slavish dependence on corporations and the state.

Christopher Lasch wrote an afterword to "The Culture Of Narcissism," in which he observed the decline of the family and home life had resulted in the rise of the influence of mass media, peer groups and "helping professions." He further observed that this decline and the rise of large bureaucracies and wider media had resulted in the creation of folk with distinct psychological issues. Some of these, he listed, are cloying displays of independence while being wholly dependent of those around you, terror of close, emotional relations and heightened anxiety of what those around you think of you. Lasch said that all of these traits are indicative of narcissism, a mindset that wasn't truly realized socially until the radicals of the 1960's came around.

This is why Kimmel doesn't understand American society. When he speaks of white male entitlement, he is talking about white males being more narcissistic than their female and racial minority peers. That patently isn't true, as women collectively are more narcissistic than men and men often are the codependent in the story of their wive's life.

Further, this is new. America was not born a narcissistic society, but a highly morally puritanical one. When Freud first started out analyzing people psychologically, he encountered mostly neurotics and obsessive-compulsives. Later on in his career, he found increasing numbers of narcissists coming in. This trend has been observed in the psychiatric community for decades. To say that the issue with white men is the long-held sense of entitled masculinity isn't just factually unsound, it has the ring to it of people who think that if they were just born a white male, they would have the license to chase their dreams.

To people like Kimmel, they seem to think the reason white men rise to power is that they are encouraged to do so from youth, as a result of white supremacy and misogyny-based patriarchy. This would be laughable if it wasn't so dangerous. People like him only seem to think people do the things they do only because they were allowed to do so. What this is indicative of is a person who doesn't believe in free will.

They feel the crushing weight of media, corporatism and government bureaucracy, but instead of actually challenging what is hurting them, they take up non-issues. Instead of challenging the power media has in how people feel about themselves, they demand that plus-size women be featured in media. Kimmel thinks society gives white men a license that it doesn't to others—it's changing, though!—and that's why they rise to the heights of success.

People do what they want, period. Michael Kimmel doesn't understand that anybody who claims they can't at least strive for X, Y or Z in modern America is deluded. In world in which everybody is taught they can be anything, it is psychologically disturbing to realize you can't be everything (have it all). He is propping up delusions of his readers (mostly white women) who want to think the reason they haven't become a somebody is that they weren't allowed by society to be somebody. While the latter clause may have a hint of truth to it, the former is a childish view of life. If you didn't achieve your dreams it is overwhelmingly true for three reasons: you didn't try, you weren't talented enough or you didn't luck into it. The first two explanations are abhorrent to the narcissist, so the latter reason—pure luck—has to be the reason.

"IT'S FULL UP OF FREEDOM-LOVERS, JUST LIKE ME AND IT'S GONNA BE PARADISE."

They reason Kimmel and his fans hate on white men is that they think the success that a white man achieves isn't his to own. That was supposed to be their life but white supremacy and patriarchy set a firm bar against anybody but white men enjoying success in society. That is completely false. The reason white men like the recently deposed Brendan Eich cause so much anger and rage is that these people want to want to be a CEO, but either do not put in the work or do not have the talent, so they claim pure blind luck (white male privilege) is the reason CEO's are predominately white males. They think success just happens and isn't a result of hard work and talent.

Moreover, Kimmel doesn't seem to get just why these white men get into right-wing politics: they are purposefully avoiding people like Kimmel. Kimmel's life is about offering men progressive palliatives to American rage: wholly repress it and instead of expressing it, port it on media-approved themes of race and gender. These men don't want to be the self-abnegating beta progressives that Kimmel wants them to be. They don't want to have to walk an incredibly fine line of political correctness so that they have to avoid being labeled "one of them"—racist, misogynist, homophobe, etc. Kimmel doesn't understand that right-wing groups can easily pluck these men up is because left-wing groups have nothing to offer white men.

Finally, Kimmel doesn't understand the role of race and sex in these men's lives. First, Kimmel is flat out wrong about white men and race. A queer—and false—idea progressives have is that poor white men are obsessed with blaming blacks and hispanics for the problems in America. Maybe that has a stab a truth to it in the South, but for the rest of the country these sorts of white men are only surrounded by fellow white people. These white men are not thinking of racial minorities in their ideologies. You can't simultaneously be indifferent to a racial minority while also actively hating them. They are thinking of their own communities, where many women live off government money after getting pregnant with a couple different rough-hewn bikers. They are angry at the broken social contract between men and women in their communities, not hating on black folk.

As far as this broken contract, this is a direct result of the Sexual Revolution and the dismantling of chivalry, putting men and women in direct class conflict. Men and women are different and have very different wants and needs. Men are justifiably upset that women are crappy mothers, not just to men but also to other women.

The problem is messages on standards for girls and women have to come from other women, not men. So men get upset that women are failing each other so badly. True, they don't think this consciously, but it is evident why men refuse to view media directed at women: it reminds them how poorly modern women behave. The utter lack of seriousness that women comport themselves is unnerving to men, who are not allowed socially to comment on this, only to watch women behave like infantile morons.

Kimmel thinks that it is men who hurt women and women's problems come from men or patriarchy, not women. He doesn't understand that even if that was 100% true, it wouldn't matter because women maintain the system they call "patriarchy." Women watch rap videos with degrading lyrics, they run the cosmetics and educational industry and consume most of the media aimed at celebrity gossip and relationship tips – all concepts men like Kimmel would denounce as tools of the partiarchy. The presumption every man is some latent rapist or abuser of women is incredibly tiresome and, once more, is why white men are not a left-leaning demographic. I can't imagine anybody but an Uncle Ruckus who would stick around in ideological waters that constantly demean and insult you.

At the end of the day, white men are upset they are presumed to have all this social power—when, in fact, they don't—and watch the same people and groups completely ignore all the power other groups have, most especially white women. The blind feelings of superiority coupled with the concurrent obsession with symbiosis (let's all hold hands, celebrate diversity and repress our rage!) on the left all drive white men out. White men simply can't identify with the narrative that their accomplishments are a result of unearned privilege or that if they don't achieve success that they need to learn to live with it, as the star of the white man has long passed.

That isn't a winning argument, nor is it one based out any facts or real analysis. Kimmel has his voice simply because all the white women reading need an excuse for their personal disquiet about the arc of their life. Oh, if only they were born a white man!

No One Would Have Died If PUAHate Killer Elliot Rodger Learned Game

May 25, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

On Friday, May 23, Elliot Rodger killed six people because he was frustrated and angry from not being able to experience intimacy with women. He left a trail of Youtube videos, internet postings, and even a manifesto that clearly details how his sexual frustration was the principal reason for his murderous rampage.

Six lives would have been saved if there was a societal mechanism to steer sexually frustrated males like Rodger into learning self-improvement, game, and masculinity, the very values that are taught here and on many other manosphere sites that inexplicably have been attacked, disparaged, and even sought for eradication by the American media and blogosphere, men's rights activists, "PUA haters", and progressive organizations like the Southern Poverty Law Center. All these groups are complicit for creating a cultural environment that allowed this massacre to occur. It is them who must accept responsibility for these seven deaths and make the moral change to their ideologies in order to prevent such an act from happening again.

It's important to state that Elliot Rodger was undoubtedly mentally unstable and required professional supervision. Diagnosed with Asperger's, he clearly exhibited narcissistic and sociopathic traits that no doubt prevented him from empathizing with others. Nonetheless, his videos and writings do display an above-average intelligence and the propensity to connect with individuals in certain cases. He was not that much worse off than many socially awkward males who grew up isolated as teenagers, unable to perform well in social interactions. I've personally interacted with men who functioned lower than him, but were later able to successfully meet average-looking women and achieve intimacy with them.

Rodger's manifesto clearly states that his utter failure with women drove him to murder. The problem that he experienced is not unique—many men in Western society graduate from high school or college to realize that they have absolutely no skill or ability to seduce the opposite sex. We live in a society where being shy, normal, or a little awkward is duly punished by entitled American women who have been encouraged to pursue exciting and fun casual sex in their prime with sexy and hot men as a way of "experimentation." They are enabled by the culture to seek out bad boys while rejecting the nice guy who is "boring." This behavior continues until they find that they are past their physical prime, whereby the nice guy is plucked from a spartan sexual existence and expected to keep his mouth shut when a trickle flow of informational torture reveals that his bride-to-be has experienced more than a dozen different penises in her vagina, anus, and mouth—the same mouth that is supposed to kiss his future children good night.

The choices presented to Rodger

What options does a man like Rodger have if his existing social ability is simply not able to attract the women he wants? What should he do to enter a relationship with a reasonably attractive girl who has not yet had dozens of penises inside her, who is sweet and kind instead of bitter and jaded from becoming a professional attention whore on Facebook, Tinder, and OK Cupid via the iPhone that she's addicted to? It depends on who you ask. Here are the answers that Rodger either received or could have received:

His university

Rodger should have checked his male privilege at the door and atoned for the sins of thousands of years of "male patriarchy." He was likely exposed to infantile "trigger warnings" during the course of his education. He received direct propaganda that insinuates all men are potential rapists. American universities are becoming firmly anti-male with their extreme left ideology and policies. Just recently, the Justice Department has ushered in directives that attempt to restrict the definition of consensual sex, making any attempt by Rodger to fornicate with a female at a college party a potential rape encounter that would have gotten him kicked out of school without a trial. Pro-female policies now dominate most American universities. Rodger would definitely not have received a sympathetic ear to his plight.

American media and organizations

They have been telling him for years that he's a sexist creep without even knowing it, and that only feminism, the promotion of female needs above men, is the true path to "equality." Before he would even find a useful resource that helps him learn how to meet women, he would have been exposed to endless articles demonizing those resources as racist, misogynist, sexist, homophobic, transphobic, and cis-normative (whatever that means). Think I'm exaggerating? Here are some examples:

- Promotion of masculine ideals is trolling
- The manosphere is misogynist
- Return Of Kings is offensive
- Private communications of “pickup artist” deserves mockery
- Writing dating tips is misogynist
- Game hurts “everybody”
- Only sexist women are receptive to game
- Misogynist web sites denounced by organization who shared information with the FBI
- Yours truly nominated to be the worst person on the entire internet
- Yours truly the most misogynist man in the world for teaching societal truths and game to men

The amount of negative publicity written about Return Of Kings, me, game, and the manosphere in general seems endless if you spend just a bit of time on Google and Twitter. It’s clear that any mention of game in the mainstream sources that Rodger would definitely have been exposed to (the sites above receive millions of unique visitors every month) clearly shows that he would have been inclined to develop a negative opinion of game before fully knowing what it’s about. It appears that a goal of many popular publications is to inoculate and brainwash men like Rodger into believing game is actually equivalent to rape.

PUA Hate and Men’s Rights Activists

Would Rodger have received help for his loneliness if he found MRA’s and PUA haters? Definitely not. MRA’s would simply sit him down and detail how male circumcision and male rape by women are the most pressing concerns of men today. They would have given him absolutely no aid on solving his loneliness problem, advocating for him to instead become a victim.

PUA haters, best exemplified by the forum PUAhate.com, are even more dangerous. As an active member of this site, Rodger was surrounded by a community of men who nurtured and cultivated his hate. These men don’t believe in game and instead think the only path to a healthy sex life is to be rich and good looking, two beliefs that Rodger actively believed. It is through PUA Hate where he was able to meet other virgins and mentally unstable men to provide him with comfort while encouraging his budding hatred not just against women for serving him rejections—something that pro-game advocates accept as normal—but also society as a whole for not giving him what he believed he deserved. To give you an idea how twisted the members of PUAHate are, his rampage was actually praised. There are not many sites on the internet where someone is lauded as a hero for killing others, but PUAHate is one of them:

PUA Hate suddenly went offline, but we must wonder if Rodger used the site to privately communicate with other men to actively plan out the killings, and if more of them are in the works. I wouldn't be surprised to find out in the future that the site's owner destroyed evidence that showed how Rodger's PUA Hate friends knew of his intentions.

His parents, psychologists, and professors

They also did not provide Rodger with useful answers. His parents were aloof and his father never taught him how to be good with women (the manifesto details how supplicative his father was to Rodger's stepmother). His psychiatrists likely wanted to pump him with meds to zombify him, maybe even trying to label his frustration with women as latent misogyny. His professors would push the leftist dogma where men are the source of all societal problems. He should humble himself, they'd prescribe, to others who don't have as much inherent "privilege" as himself.

Return Of Kings, The Red Pill, RVF, myself

If Rodger came to me, he would have received actionable and effective advice. He would have been exposed to material detailing how socially corrupt American society has become, and how being a beta male provider—his principal strategy in trying to get laid—is no longer useful in achieving intimacy with women who now see men as entertaining clowns that should provide them with excitement, drama, and tension. After these truths would be painfully delivered to Rodger, he would have to make the personal choice to accept them or not, but based on his intelligence level, I have little doubt that he would, as it would match what he saw on campus with what he termed "obnoxious" (i.e. "alpha") men getting the girls he wanted.

After digesting the red pill (our sphere's metaphor for truth), he would start his game training. I've clearly laid out a program that has helped thousands of men who were in almost the exact same situation as Rodger. There is no evidence that Rodger executed even basic game theory. We can't say for sure if he would have been a good student of the game or achieved high success from using it, because his mental illness no doubt affected his faculties, but the bar to success for him was low. According to his manifesto, all he wanted was a date. As in… one date. Take a look at his own words:

> I was hoping I would get some sort of answer from girls [from posting my Youtube videos]. IN fact, a small part of me was even hoping that a girl would see the video and contact me to give me a chance to go on a date. That alone would have prevented the Day of Retribution, if one girl had just given me one chance. But no…As expected, I got absolutely no response from any girls. […] Women don't care about me at all. They won't even deign to tell my why they've mistreated me. This just shows how evil and sadistic they are. Oh well, they will realize the gravity of their crimes when I slaughter them all on the Day of Retribution.

Would the teachings that this part of the internet offer give him that one date? Would the advice of the men on RVF have given him the encouragement, motivation, and support to stop wallowing in self-pity and grandeur to approach women with the game that women today want? The answer is yes. I firmly believe that we would have given him his date, and it's this date that would have quieted his deranged propensity to kill, or at least postponed it until an intervention could have occurred. Only game and red pill truths would have been sufficient in changing this deadly outcome. Everyone else, from his parents to his university and especially to the media he may have consumed, absolutely failed to help him in a way that we definitely could have.

Even after the killings, the media is parading out the phantom spirit of misogyny, perpetuating a tired cycle of shaming men in the name of protecting women, even though Rodger killed more men than women.

- Elizabeth Plank says we need to stamp out misogyny, even though Rodger developed a hatred for everyone in society
- Jessica Valenti says misogyny kills, even though four men died compared to two women

Who cares about the males that Rodger killed, because, like, misogyny! The disregard for any concern for men, including the ones killed by Rodger, means that more men will churn through this toxic anti-male culture, maybe one day deciding that killing is also their only option for deliverance.

I was not in a different boat than Rodger

I know Rodger would have been helped because I experienced much of what he did. I was lonely and lacking in female affection, but this was way back in 2001, before game was treated as the devil it is today. There was no cultural barrier for me to learn its principles. There was no PUA Hate that would've allowed me to connect with other bitter, demented, and possibly criminal men. There was no Buzzfeed (everyday sexism!) and Huffington Post (homosexuality is great!) to brainwash me into thinking that approaching women and having masculine sexual desire is sexist or misogynist, or that I must embrace a pro-homosexual lifestyle and the needs of gays over my own. There was no institutional formula in attacking what I learned and what thankfully gave me the intimacy I desired.

Seven people are dead because society has decided that shy and awkward men like Elliot Rodger do not deserve a girlfriend and that there is absolutely no way to improve his loneliness and loserdom through learning game or any other social behavior. At the same time men like him are ostracized, there is no legal means for him to solicit prostitution (in California) to release his biological and very pressing urge for fornication. Current cultural dogma wants to sweep the millions of lonely men like Rodger under the rug while instead focusing on gay marriage, "street harassment," lack of empowered girls in video games, "rape culture," and the horrors of letting young girls wear pink and play with dolls.

The new "let them eat cake" is "let these socially awkward privileged losers have xbox and pornhub." Yet we still feign outrage and surprise when every so often one of them picks up a gun and starts shooting. The same people who attack game refuse to give men like Rodger a way to achieve sexual happiness, and for that they are indirectly responsible for these deaths, which could have been avoided if Rodger was steered into game and not shamed for it.

More people will die unless you give men sexual options

Until you give men like Rodger a way to have sex, either by encouraging them to learn game, seek out a Thai wife, or engage in legalized prostitution—three things that the American media and cultural elite venomously attack, it's inevitable for another massacre to occur. Even game itself, as useful as it is on an individual level, is a band-aid fix upon a culture which has stopped rewarding nice guys while encouraging female whoring to benefit only the top 10% of alpha males, all in the name of societal progress. Game is a tiny release valve on a cultural pressure cooker where meaningful relationships have become sick, fractured, and unfulfilling compared to the time of our grandparents when traditional sex roles existed. Game may not have led Rodger to find his dream girl and live happily ever after, but it would have given enough results to stop him from killing six innocent individuals and himself. Until you allow and encourage all men to get sex by some means, these massacres will be more commonplace as America's cultural decline continues.

What Is The White Man’s Burden?

May 26, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

If you have taken the red pill and spent enough time following the dialogue in mainstream media, you may have noticed the existence of a particular double standard with regard to diversity. Though the benefits of multiculturalism are advertised aggressively in western societies inhabited predominantly by Europeans, there does not seem to be quite as much urgency in the push to spread multiculturalism to many of the other relatively ethnically homogenous nations elsewhere on Earth. This double standard is the product of a few factors: historical reality, white guilt, and economic necessity.

Historical Reality

Western Europeans, in the process of conquering most of the planet, created the most diverse and globalized polities man had ever seen. They brought most of the non-European world under their dominion: Western European religion spread across several continents (thanks to eager missionaries and aggressive evangelizing foreign policies), Western European languages were soon spoken on every inhabited continent, Western European laws were followed on every continent, and—thanks to the prolific activities of adventurous Western European men—Western European blood has spread through non-European populations on many continents and is quite extensive in certain parts (e.g.: the existence of hundreds of millions of mulattoes and mestizos across Latin America, the 20-25% European admixture present in the African-American population, etc).

None of this was the result of mere happenstance: Western European powers insisted on bringing the rest of the world closer to their own, and took that mission seriously enough to label it a mission, or a “burden.”

This political, social, and biological influence is key in discussing why so many feel it’s natural for Africans, Asians, Mulattoes and Mestizos to migrate to Western European lands en-masse, but not to places like Japan, Belarus, Bulgaria or South Korea. West Africans (to use on example) speak Western European languages (generally French or English), worship Western European gods (most are Christian), abide by Western European legal systems and often carry Western European names. This is why people often assume that they could “belong” in France or the UK, as opposed to Japan. The same goes for East Indians, Filipinos, and many other migrant groups. That cultural link is crucial to promoting the greater feasibility of “diversity” in Western Europe relative to other places, helping to drive the double standard.

White Guilt

Long story short, Western Europe took over the world and some bad things happened in the process. Many Western Europeans who understand the history of their expansion are aware of these bad things, and feel very guilty about it. Many of those who possess this guilt are in positions of influence and power (the elite are often the guiltiest), hence the tendency for white guilt to manifest itself in the policies and broader mainstream norms of societies dominated by said Western Europeans. This also is crucial to the promotion of diversity in European dominated lands relative to others.

None of this is meant to dispute the notion that non-Western Europeans may be capable of some of the very same historical activities that modern white guilt is based on. At the end of the day, however, it is Europe that succeeded in carrying out these activities on a massive global scale, one that simply isn't matched by any other group. Nobody in recent history has come close.

Had other population groups (say, West Africans) been put in the same position of power that Western Europe has been in for the past 500 years or so (near complete and total dominance of the globe and all of the people on it), would they have been any more benevolent? Probably not. The reality, however, is that none of those population groups have been in that position of power. All of them have instead been largely subordinate to Western Europeans, the only humans who have been in that position of strength.

This is why white-guilt (and much of the political correctness and assumption of the "white man's burden" that goes with it) is an issue for many Western Europeans, but not for Africans, East Asians, Native Americans or Eastern Europeans. The Western Europeans who feel ashamed of their history may understand on some logical level that serious atrocities, imperialist or otherwise, have been committed everywhere by everyone, but at the end of the day it was their far more expansive conquest that stands out and, thus, makes them feel a bit more uneasy. The much greater extent of their dominance across the planet relative to others has led to a greater sense of responsibility relative to others for the ills and misfortunes felt across the world. That is what helps to further drive the double standard.

Economics

Globalization and the mass importation of cheap foreigners benefits the economic elite. By encouraging the notion that their nations need the “diversity” provided by these foreigners, one can ensure a steady supply of this cheap labor and the higher profit margins it can help guarantee. Western Europeans pioneered the concept of globalization and Western European-dominated nations are the most common among the global economic elite, hence the tendency for this idea to be more prominent in Western Europe than it is elsewhere. That being said, they’re not alone in this (Arabs and East Asians are also known to import laborers, and Eastern Europeans, Latinos and black Caribbeans do it occasionally as well).

These are the realities that have helped create a double standard in which the achievement of a goal that everyone should ostensibly strive for (diversity and multiculturalism) is instead treated primarily as a another form of “White Man’s Burden”. These same realities will also ensure that said double standard endures for a long time to come, for better or worse.

The Power Of Choice

May 26, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Jared Diamond's masterful Collapse: How Societies Choose To Fail Or Succeed is a collection of case studies of societies that were unable or unwilling to correct defects which ultimately led to their destruction. The book's examples include, among others, the Anasazi culture of North America, the Vikings of Greenland, the Mayans, and even modern Rwanda. But for me, the most haunting example of collapse discussed is Easter Island. Diamond explains in great detail how the decline and collapse played out, taking advantage of the most current scientific research. The resulting story is unforgettable. The lessons emerge with stark clarity, if only we are willing to hear them without comforting prejudices.

When most people think of Easter Island, of course, they picture the great monoliths erected there by the inhabitants centuries ago. Seen today, the island is nearly bare, with no trees over ten feet tall. But it was not always so: the island was once a thriving ecosystem, with extensive forests, numerous bird species, and a wealth of other fauna. When humans first arrived there about A.D. 900, it was densely forested, and was capable of sustaining numerous tribes and a relatively high population. When the first Europeans "discovered" the island in the 1720s, they found it very sparsely populated, the inhabitants reduced to a mean and pitiable state of existence, the landscape denuded of trees. What had happened?

The scientific evidence makes it clear that overexploitation of resources by the natives set in motion a chain of events that pushed the inhabitants over the brink. Trees were an important resource for the islanders: they were used for cremation, construction of statutes, and habitations. But the islanders were unable—or unwilling—to manage their natural resources in ways that ensured their continued renewal. Gradually, perhaps nearly imperceptibly, the resources began to dwindle. Warning signs were ignored or rationalized away. As deforestation proceeded, animal life became extinct or went elsewhere. Crop yields plummeted. Native plants, birds, and animals melted away.

The islanders then began to compete with each other more and more fiercely for an ever-declining volume of natural resources; vendettas multiplied, intertribal warfare flared, and a pall of hostility and fear descended on the island. As the trees vanished, the islanders were unable to build boats to escape to other islands: they became trapped in their own hell, doomed to fight each other in perpetuity for the last crumbs that the barren land could offer. Eventually the islanders began to starve, and feed—literally—off each other. As wild meats became unavailable, and escape off the island became impossible, the natural consequences followed. Cannibalism stalked the island, animating its folklore and infecting its archaeological sites. Perhaps the islanders compensated for their misery by focusing more and more on the empty ritual of building and raising statutes, as their means of sustenance melted away. It is a haunting picture, impossible to forget.

Diamond muses on a question worthy of some reflection. He asks, “As an islander cut down the last tree, what would he have been thinking?” Cleverly, he notes that modern analogues offer a possible answer: “It’s about jobs, not trees!” or “God will take care of it!”, or “Next year will be better!” Such responses are easy to imagine, and have the ring of truth. Just as many today are in denial about resource depletion and global warming, so we can imagine that the ancient Easter Islanders may have had some soothing, face-saving explanation for why they were unable to take action to avert disaster. Reason can always be counted on to provide justification for our vices.

Denial is a curious thing. We choose to ignore the problems that confront us, because doing so involves some degree of self-examination. I have often noticed that when people or businesses are confronted with problems, they will continue to do the same thing over and over again, even when such a course of action has demonstrably failed. In some cases, speedy and decisive action may have saved a situation that was allowed to degrade to the point of no return. And then it becomes too late for remedial action. Diamond notes that even the modern Easter Islanders are unwilling to believe what had befallen their ancestors. “Our ancestors would never have done that!” was a common response when he discussed the history of the island with them. Delusion is of old date.

Why does this happen? I think the answer is that on some level, people, organizations, or nations make a conscious choice. They choose to fail or to succeed. Faced with a fork in the road, we are all forced to make a choice. And the truth seems to be that some people actually prefer to fail. Perhaps failure validates some hidden prejudice, or secret self-destructive impulse, that they have; or perhaps they find it impossible to extricate themselves from the situation in any other way. The motivations are many and varied. Without doubt, the power of choice is not a burden sought by all. Some men prefer to have no control over their fate, despite their assurances otherwise. Freedom brings responsibility, which for many is an intolerable burden. Slavery is an intoxicant. It first blackens, then dulls, the edge of our initiative.

But it still is baffling to outside observers to see a situation, that might have been remedied, continue to spiral downward for no justifiable reason. Call it the power of the irrational. Easter Island’s collapse highlights the power of choice as a constant force in mankind’s affairs. For me, it is a reminder that we, and we alone, retain the power to sketch the contours of our destinies.

How To Grow In Times Of Pain

May 26, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

We all go through rough patches. Maybe you were just fired. Maybe you recently experienced a touch breakup or divorce. Maybe a close family member unexpectedly died. Maybe you just broke a bone or were diagnosed with a certain medical condition.

When tragedy strikes, we tend to gravitate towards one of two directions. We can lose touch with reality and let ourselves fall into an ever-descending cycle of depression and self-pity. Or we can look at our circumstances as a fresh start and inject a renewed sense of focus and determination into our lives.

The latter is obviously preferable. It tends to ignite a period of rapid growth, where we leave the past behind and embrace a future that's distinct from what we'd prepared for. However, getting to this point and avoiding the easier path of why me's and fuck my life's is not straightforward, especially when everything you see and do seems to be a reminder of your misery.

Oftentimes people cope with the chaos by pursuing obsessive behaviours. It could be working 80 hour weeks. It could be playing video games. It could be trying to hook up with as many girls as possible. It could be abusing alcohol or drugs. These are all natural responses. And they usually work– at least better than sitting around and crying. Unfortunately they tend to be quick fixes that lead right back to the pain once you've burnt yourself at whichever activity you threw yourself into.

I've cried to myself before. I've also pursued obsessive behaviours. A different approach is going back to the absolute basics. From my experience, this tends to be the route that gets me – and keeps me – out of the ditches most effectively. It guarantees a grounded emotional state, healthy thoughts, and a physically fit body. And when you create these conditions, a period of personal growth is almost unavoidable.

Below are the habits that I incorporate into my life in times of pain or loss. Whenever I find myself with extra time on my hands that could be used to whine or bitch, I take up one of these activities.

Prerequisites: Sleeping and eating

You must sleep at least 7 hours per night. No excuses. Without a solid sleep schedule you can crumble even during happy and energetic periods of your life. You must also eat basic foods that comfort your stomach and give you sustained energy. Cooking, even basic meals, is also therapeutic. You must ensure that these two cornerstones are well maintained in order to recover and prosper.

1. Workout

You must exercise your body in order to release the tension you've built up inside your body and your mind. I love lifting and playing basketball, so that's what I do, but anything that's enjoyable and physically challenging works.

2. Meditate

Whenever you're feeling anxious close your eyes and focus on deep breathing for 5 minutes. It will keep you grounded and prevent you from slipping into negative mental states.

3. Read

I recently saw a quote that said that 30 minutes of reading has never failed to lift one's spirits. It's true. And you learn. Just grab an actual book—browsing the internet hardly counts as focused reading.

4. Write

Writing is equally therapeutic. Write about your life and your daily realizations. When you put your thoughts on paper, you're forced to develop them. I've learned a lot about myself from just sitting down and typing for 30 minutes.

5. Brainstorm

Everyday, think of 10 ideas. It could be 10 mobile apps you could develop. It could be 10 articles you could write. It could be 10 vacations you could take. It could be 10 things you're grateful for. It serves to exercise your mental muscles and explore the endless possibilities that are available to you.

6. Approach

No matter how shitty you feel, go out and approach women. Even if you just say hi to three girls, it will get you outside of your comfort zone, outside of your home, and outside of your head.

Irresponsible Journalists Are Using Elliot Rodger To Push A Privileged White-Girl Agenda

May 27, 2014 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

The unholy sorority of short-haired women "journalists"–and their bearded lapdogs–just found a new accessory for their white-girl victim narrative. A few days ago a deranged college kid, at the end of his rope of isolation and social awkwardness, tragically killed six innocent people in Santa Barbara, California. Despite his self-assessed "good looks" and driving "a nice car," he claimed to have never so much as kissed a girl. He'd come to resent not only the women who'd ignored him since he'd arrived in the lively college-party enclave of Isla Vista, but also the men who had been successful with those very women.

He made a series of chilling videos charting his growing resentment, and belonged to a online forum called PUAHate, where he commiserated and criminally conspired with other social rejects to exact revenge on the people they collectively blamed for their failures—commercial pick-up artists ("PUAs"), women, and miscellaneous internet commentators on men's issues. The site, which had the word "hate" right in the title, was replete with angry screeds against each of those categories. Unfortunately for all of us, at least one of its members made good on their hundreds of promises (still visible in cached copies of the now-deleted website) to "ruin the lives" of their supposed victimizers.

PUAHATE.COM

The Forefont Of The Anti-Pickup-Artist Movement

REVEALING THE SCAMS, DECEPTION, AND MISLEADING MARKETING TECHNIQUES USED BY DATING GURUS AND THE SEDUCTION COMMUNITY

The PUAHate killings are many things. They're a disturbing glimpse into the effects of a prevailing social milieu that—through technology and coddling—favors social isolation and self-pity over old-fashioned socialization and "coming out of your shell." They're a view into what a mentally ill young man, deprived of affection and inclusion—by both sexes—is capable of. They're a commentary on the massive differences between online communities that encourage positive self-improvement and those that peddle in hatred, violent imagery, and self-defeatism.

Perhaps this should come as no surprise, but, like a childhood game of telephone, this story has quickly mutated in the hands of irresponsible and incompetent "journalists" with a long track record of making any story in the news fit the same set of political talking points. Not letting a tragedy go to waste, internet feminists Amanda Hess, Laurie Penny, Amanda Marcotte, Anne Theriault, Patrick McGuire, Nicole Flatow, and their ilk pounced on this story, immediately forcing it to fit their standard narrative, and flying in the face of intellectual honesty and nuance in the process. In lieu of responsible analysis, they've managed to explain away the entire thing with their catch-all bugaboo, "misogyny." An incredibly complex set of circumstances, that led to an equally complex and tragic outcome, has been reduced to their explanation for every other privileged white-woman's problem.

In doing so, they reproduce the violence of that tragic day and re-victimizing the victims by cynically distorting the truth to benefit their intellectually bankrupt agenda.
They profligately squander an opportunity to arrive at real answers, and instead force-feed their readers and the countless victims-by-proxy the same vacuous propaganda.

These "journalists" and their stories have several things in common:

They wheel out the same-old "misogyny" chimera.

The catch-all phrase "misogyny" has quickly turned into the internet-feminist's version of the "War on Terror," a never-ending conflict with an invisible enemy that can never be defeated and could be anywhere. Like George W. Bush, they raise the "terror alert" color from a permanent orange to red whenever they sense the tide turning against their narrative. This was again the case with the PUAHate killings.

Rather than recognize that Elliot Rodger (and PUAHate) reserved some of his most poisonous hatred for men, particularly men from ethnic-minority groups, they elide the part of his ideology that doesn't fit their version of events. Even the relatively few writers that manage to acknowledge that the PUAHate Killer made racist remarks online, quickly return to "misogyny" as the overriding force in the acts. They also fail to distinguish between Rodger's true hatred of women, and men who simply are critical of certain women. In their hands, basically anything that doesn't unequivocally praise women becomes misogyny, whether you're a crazed murderer or a guy who simply thinks having no domestic skills, and being proud of it, is a deal-breaker in a woman.

They cynically ignore the fact that he killed twice as many men as he did their precious white girls.

Missing White Girl Syndrome, where a white woman's life is worth more than anyone else's, makes its unambiguous appearance. Several stories that have focused on Rodger's supposed hatred of women as the singular factor in the murders fail to acknowledge that Rodger, in fact, killed four men and two women. One story leaves out the Asian victims of his crimes entirely. Rodger may have resented women, but he expressed equal hatred for the men who were successful with those women. His actions bear this out. But, we mustn't forget that he murdered two lily-white sorority girls.

They deliberately collapse categories of disparate male communities so they can pin this horrific crime on all of them.

Commercial "pickup artists," men's rights activists (MRAs), and men's interest sites (the manosphere) are wildly different communities with very little overlap except that they're populated by men, and to a certain extent, talk about women. Commercial pickup artists sell products, ones that center on meeting women using a particular (and often flamboyant and public) style. Men's rights activists are chiefly focused on complaining about injustices in the legal system, often adopting the same sort of victim-narrative approach as feminists. Men's interest sites focus on self-improvement, and fulfillment in life (including their love lives) through living an independent lifestyle, understanding the nature of women and men, and disconnecting from the robust set of harmful myths fed to today's young man (often borrowing the phrase "taking the red pill" to describe the process).

But these writers, whose elite educations suggest they're intelligent enough to tell the difference, deliberately collapse these extraordinarily different realms into one category—places that supposedly espouse "hatred of women"—then try to pin this horrific crime (through insinuation) on the entire fake category they've invented in her mind. This is both transparent and intellectually dishonest.

They absurdly conflate “pickup artists” with their opposite–people who actively despise them.

Saying Elliot Rodger practiced “pickup artistry” because he belonged to PUAHate is like saying a Williamburg hipster eats meat because he’s president of a vegan club. It’s as incoherent as it is laughable. Rodger firmly rejected “pickup artistry,” self-improvement, and self-awareness. He belonged to a community devoted to not only discrediting pickup artistry, but in fact ruining the lives of people they perceived as its purveyors. Using terms like “alpha,” popularized all over internet nowadays, certifies his status as a “pickup artistry” follower as much as a suburban white kid’s use of hip-hop lingo turns him into a legit gangsta rapper.

They base their conclusions on a fundamental misunderstanding of “game.”

Game is little more than the colloquial term for what a man does to meet and attract women. It’s not “manipulation” any more than a girl wearing makeup, high heels, and a padded bra is manipulation. Game is talking to girls with confidence; being provocative, but also charming and interesting; and recognizing the difference between what a girls says she wants and the traits of the guys she actually leaves the bar with.

Despite the popularity of the term with the hoi polloi, game doesn’t equal “negging,” an old, and relatively marginal, practice engaged by commercial pickup artists over a decade ago. Wearing nice shoes is game. Doing yoga in a studio populated with actresses is game. Asking a girl for directions to a place you’ve been to ten times, as an excuse to spark a real conversation with her, is game. Game has existed since men first walked out of caves and subtly inserted killing three mastodons into his grunts at the tribe’s resident hottie. It will still exist when we all return to those caves.

They ignore the role of broken systems and Rodger's acceptance of a defeatist set of beliefs.

Elliot Rodger didn't kill people because he didn't like women. He killed people because he was mentally ill, had a crippling obsession with his race and his own looks, and was willfully ignorant of what today's woman is actually attracted to. This cocktail fermented into a growing rage, for which he had no outlet. Moreover, he was goaded on by a community of fellow degenerates (PUAHate), who played into his personal insecurities, likely fed him violent ideas, and reinforced the notion that the die has been cast for him. As far as Rodger was concerned, he couldn't improve his social skills and his appeal to women (that is, learn "game") and realize his potential.

Finally, a series of broken systems failed him. His parents failed to train him in basic life-saving social skills, and a female-centric mental-health system failed to recognize the unique problems faced by a young man today.

They write off some young men's frustration with a shitty dating market as "entitlement."

The PUAHate Killer didn't feel he was "entitled" to sex with women. He mistakenly (and delusionally) felt he was doing everything right, and was perplexed by the fact it wasn't working. Of course, he wasn't doing anything right. He was doing what a bunch of other supremely unsuccessful men, and a clueless feminized media, told him was right: pretending to be a "perfect gentleman," acquiring expensive stuff, avoiding those evil "pickup artists" with their "game," and waiting for the women to line up outside his dorm.

But, in the real world, a man has to account for realities in the current dating climate or face the sort of loneliness that would drive a normal man crazy, never mind a sociopathic one like Rodger. The same things that impressed your mother wouldn't impress today's iPhone-addicted, Tinder-using, NuvaRing-wearing 20-something.

They pathologize and criminalize plain-and-simple guy talk.

The great irony is that the overriding problem here isn't "misogyny," but instead the very misuse and abuse of the term. It's the mislabeling of plain-and-simple guy talk on how to be attractive to today's woman as "manipulation" or "hatred of women" that's creating a generation of disaffected, isolated, and confused young men with nowhere to go for answers. In pathologizing and criminalizing communities of men talking about men's stuff, these writers are complicitous in the mental anguish of clueless men like Rodger, and in the acts that they commit. They drive them into unhealthy shitholes like PUAHate, rather than healthy, positive communities of supportive men talking like men talk.

Don't trust the mentally ill to comment on the mentally ill.

Whether you agree with my views on women with short hair or my assessment of male feminists or not, there's little doubt that these writers are dishonest and incompetent, at best, or deluded and dangerous, at worst. Their pathological obsession with the privileged white girl's catch-all of "misogyny"—at the expense of any other explanatory apparatus—seems to suggest the latter. In either case, their work makes it patently clear that they have zero credibility on the tragic PUAHate killings. They've displayed time after time that their agenda is, and will continue to be, finding their misogyny bogeyman under every stone. And that's it.

When the answer is actually something else—as it is with these tragic events—you simply can't trust these so-called journalists.

Strict Gun Control Will Not Stop Spree Killings

May 27, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

> This great evil. Where does it come from? How'd it steal into the world? What seed, what root did it grow from? Who's doin' this? Who's killin' us? Robbing us of life and light. Mockin' us with the sight of what we might've known. Does our ruin benefit the earth? Does it help the grass to grow, the sun to shine? Is this darkness in you, too? Have you passed through this night?
> – James Jones, The Thin Red Line

I'd like to say that I was surprised by Elliot Rodger's shooting spree this week, but honestly, at this point, I can't even pretend that I am. Sadly, I think most of you reading feel the same way. Horrific events like these are so common place in our modern world that we've reached a point where we almost expect mass killings on a clock work schedule. While talking to my mom on Saturday morning I casually mentioned how there was spree killing a few hours before. "Another one?" she asked casually, almost off handedly. She's not a callous woman, but she, like so many others, has seemed to have developed a kind of numbness to these tragedies. I, regrettably, have not.

Always curious as to what people other people think about such extreme events, I started to read various news sites and blogs with posts already up about Rodger. One of the standard sites I go through for stories like these is the CBC (Canadian Broadcast Corporation). The articles on the CBC tend to be extremely biased and contain numerous intentional omissions in order to sell the progressive narrative of the CBC's staff, so I gave the article on Rodger itself a quick going over before I scrolled down to the comment section. I do this mainly because, although the CBC article itself is usually a biased mess, if they allow comments on it the article's comment section is a fairly unbiased representation of what Canadians on the whole are thinking.

For such an extreme situation, I was foolish to think that the comment section for this tragedy would be unbiased. The top comments (in terms of likes) were a mixture of those who blame guns for everything and those exposing the worst cultural attribute Canadians possess—our holier than thou attitude toward Americans. Here's a couple of examples of what I mean, taken from the top of the Most Liked comments from when I was browsing through:

> When are the American public going to realize that the fight against terrorism has to begin with the NRA, the biggest urban terrorist group in the US or possibly the world?! The rant by the father of the victim was well put and well needed. May he be granted peace and justice in his loss.

Another:

> This guy was suicidal, but why the hatred, the lust to kill? Is this what America is about—blame others, externalize your problems, kill ? I think America is one of the most dysfunctional countries in the world. No public health care, satisfy your own lusts and desires at any cost, and don't settle for good enough. Sick place.

And:

> Three legal semi automatics and 1000 legal rounds legally sold to a 22 year old legal wacko. Wake up Americans, this doesn't happen to countries with gun controls. What about your theory of good people with guns being able to stop these? Oh well, we can debate it again next week with the next legal slaughter.

Obviously we Canadians are so much better than Americans. It's strictly guns and American values which are the problem. No frustrated young men ever go on a rampage in Canada, right?

On April 15, 2014, a fifteen year old male stabbed four people in a mall in Regina, Saskatchewan. The fifteen year old's motives weren't immediately apparent and as Canadians like throwing their dirty laundry under a rug while they turn their nose up at America's, there has been little public interest or outcry to determine why this young man went on a rampage. It's likely that all we'll hear is that he was fifteen, a male, and stabbed four people for no apparent reason.

On the same day, a Province over, Matthew De Grood went to a house party in Calgary, Alberta, and stabbed five people to death. Matthew was twenty-two years old, a University student with good grades and hopes of furthering his education in Law School. His father was a senior Calgary Police Officer, and a gun was likely available for Matthew to use though in the end he chose to murder five people with a knife. So far his motives for doing so have not become clear.

On January 31st, 2013, in the city of Vancouver, British Columbia, Jerome Bonneric stabbed six people in an apartment complex and stabbed a seventh (a responding officer) outside.

Clearly we Canadians do not a have a moral high ground from which to cast judgement at our American neighbours. America is not the only country producing angry young men.

The April 2014 Canadian stabbing sprees both happened just six days after sixteen year old Alex Hribal went on a knife rampage at his school in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. He stabbed and wounded twenty-one people.

So perhaps stabbing sprees committed by young men are simply a North American phenomenon.

On May 21st, 2014, Cheng Chieh, a twenty-one year old university student , boarded a subway train in Taipei, Taiwan and proceeded to stab several passengers, killing four and wounding at least twenty-four others.

So besides the fact that these were all young men, most of whom were students, what is the common factor in their sprees? All used knives, not guns, to commit their violence. Taiwan has very strict firearms control, but that didn't stop Cheng Chieh from killing.

My home nation of Canada has three classes of firearm control (non-restricted, restricted, prohibited). You can't just walk into a hunting goods store, lay down some cash and walk out with a handgun. Nothing stopped Matthew De Grood from walking into a party and leaving five bodies in his wake. Even in the supposedly gun crazy nation of America, Alex Hribal chose to stab his fellow students. Even if America had the most stringent system of gun control on the planet, blood would still have been spilt.

Young men the world over are engaging in horrifying acts of violence against their peers. It's far overdue that society stops touting bumper sticker solutions such as More Gun Control. Three bodies were removed from firearm spree killer Elliot Rodger's apartment, and they were stabbed to death. The underlying reasons as to why so many young men feel the need to lash out against people who have done them no harm are complex, and these reasons need to be examined instead of being airily dismissed with a call for more legislation, more laws and more control over the law abiding rest of society. If people want to cause mass harm, they'll do it any way they can.

Ban guns, ban knives, ban bats, ban violence, ban everything, and we'll still have solved nothing. Our cultures need to take a good, long look in the mirror and think about why these young men, so many of them at the dawn of their lives, are so angry with themselves and us that they feel the only solution they have is to kill. Why are we creating so many monsters when we live in such an age of comfort and luxury undreamed of by our ancestors? Why do so many young men feel like they have no hope of ever living a fun, fulfilling life in our times? It's a tough question to answer, and I hope one day we will actually try to do so.

Louis C.K. Bows To Fat Acceptance

May 27, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

I am admittedly a huge fan of Louis C.K. and his distinct brand of iconoclasm. Louis is a sort of modern cultural soothsayer, a self-effacing yet bold appraiser of the absurdities of our modern world. Though I don't watch much television, I make it a point to see his FX program as often as possible, so I was surely disappointed last week to see C.K. attempt to address the the issue of fat acceptance. And, this time, Louis simply got it wrong.

The scene occurs when a hefty waitress, Vanessa, pursues our protagonist by repeatedly asking him out. Louis is obviously uninterested despite getting blown out when trying to talk to any of the attractive waitresses at the comedy club. Louis later ashamedly agrees to a pity date with Vanessa after she buys him off with hockey tickets, and on the date she launches into a tirade about the difficulty of dating in New York as a fat 30-something woman. The thrust of the argument is that women are not allowed to mention the misery of fatness, while men (e.g. comedians) are rewarded as "adorable" for pointing out the foibles of being a fat person.

Anyone who is paying attention to the social tradewinds of the anglosphere knows that this premise is wrong. The ever-burgeoning fat acceptance movement has attempted to make it socially unacceptable to voice the elemental disgust that comes with observing fatness, working against the deeply ingrained disgust for obesity that we harbor in our lizard brains. Fat people enjoy activist groups, fat-only magazines, increasing prevalence of "plus size" models, fat celebrities, and a placating culture that refuses to tell anyone that they are living their life in an unhealthy manner. Despite the fact that it's never been easier to be fat in our society, Vanessa continues with the litany of things that she feels entitled to.

> "Why do you hate us so much? What is is about the basics of human happiness — > feeling attractive, feeling loved, having guys chase after us, that's just not in the cards for us? Nope. Not for us."

This absurdity is where Louis failed in giving a voice to this movement, because their struggle is motivated by greed and delusion rather than equal rights. Having people chase after you is now a basic human right? In the same way fat women are invisible to men, men of low status (e.g. "betas," "losers", etc.) are similarly invisible to women. We can replace her complaints with the equivalent male arguments and observe their absurdity:

> "Sure I'm a cheeto-munching slob who lives in my parents' basement, has no career prospects, poor social skills, and spends all day reading the internet. But why do attractive women hate us so much? What is it about the basics of human happiness, being desired, getting easy sex with women, having female heads turn as we walk into the room that's just not in the cards for us?"

Can anyone see the second paragraph eliciting any modicum of sympathy in our society? She continues:

> "You know what the sad thing is? It's all I want. I mean, I can get laid. Any woman who is willing can get laid. I don't want that. I don't even need a boyfriend or a husband. All I want is to hold hands with a nice guy, and walk and talk —"

The male equivalent would be this:

> "You know what the sad thing is? It's all I want. I mean, of course I can get a fat girl who be my girlfriend. Any guy who is willing to put up with enough agony can get a girlfriend who walks all over them, spends their money, and cheats on them. I don't want that. I don't even need a rotating harem of 9s. All I want is to have girls desire me for some occasional casual fun without too much trouble and commitment."

The first part of the statement is the only part of the soliloquy that hints at actual Red Pill understanding—women can always have sex, but it is commitment that eludes females of low sexual marketplace value, just as sex is what eludes men of similar status. Any man expressing these sentiments of entitlement would first be laughed out of the room and then deemed a monster for his outrageous demands despite his low status. But because it is a woman making irrational complaints, it is no surprise that Jezebel, HuffPo, and other blue pill media outlets are in love with Louis for "creating a dialogue" about the issue.

The funny thing is, despite her undesirable looks, Vanessa is portrayed as being smart, funny, and charming. The truth is that there are truckfulls of incel neckbearded Redditors who would line up around the block to date a nice person with so many nice qualities, even in a highly competitive city like New York. Undoubtedly, though, these are not the men whose attention she craves. No, "all" she wants is to hold hands, walk, talk, and be wooed by a nice attractive guy. This is the central absurdity of her sense of entitlement, and beyond a cursory look at the issues Louis does nothing to convince us that we should feel bad about it. In fact. the absurdity of her complaining is put into high relief by the background of the scene, where we see dozens of people rollerblading, jogging, and biking past them in the park, actively improving themselves rather than complaining about a lot in life for which they bear a significant amount of responsibility.

As others have predicted, we are moving towards a society in which men will be increasingly penalized for their innately-specified preferences for young, attractive, fit, and feminine women. Louie is usually on-point, but this bit of airtime marks a disappointing concession to those trying to erase the idea of personal responsibility and meritocracy in our society.

Facebook’s Newest Change Shows That Older Women Are Getting Desperate

May 28, 2014 | by Brian Logan | Link | Original Link

Recently, Facebook rolled out a new change. As many people know, a person’s relationship status was—unless proactively hidden—a matter of public record on Facebook. Many people took delight in sharing their relationship status with the world. This became, for all intents and purposes, the hallmark feature of Facebook—a chance for people, particularly females, to brag about their new beau online.

Now, if your want to know somebody’s relationship status, you might have to press an “ask” button. A host of people, mostly women, are now choosing to keep this information private. I did a cursory check the other day, and noticed around ten women I know—all single/single mothers—that have made the crossover.

I sense a whole new market for game theory here—how to successfully pick up women by using their “ask” button!

So why the sudden change then? Could something be amiss in relationship land?

In a recent CNN article, Facebook was noticeably evasive on the topic. MoMoZhou, a Facebook representative, stated that, “This feature provides as easy way for friends to ask for information that’s not already on your profile.” Hmm… ok. Another Facebook spokesperson stated that, “buttons have been available on mobile and Web for a few months for other profile information.” Ok, thank you for that.

So again, back to my earlier question. Why the sudden change? Let me go ahead and toss my hat into the ring on this one.

1. Single older women are having a meltdown

Her relationship status was fun five years ago, when she was “single and ready to mingle.” Now, her continual inability to grab a guy is becoming bothersome. People, particularly other women, are starting to talk. If she is so attractive, why can’t she catch a man? What’s wrong with her?

This fact becomes unbearable around Valentine's Day. Single women are forced to watch the countless photos of flowers and chocolates that their married friends are receiving. It's amusing to see married women take delight in torturing their single "friends." They will inflict pain upon a single woman that no reader of ROK would ever dream of doing!

And of course, there is a blatant irony at work here—the fact that a single "modern" woman is hiding her relationship status. Wait a minute… I thought you were proud to be a "strong and independent " woman? I heard for years how you don't need a man. Shouldn't you be proud of your single status? Shouldn't you declare it loudly, instead of choosing to hide this fact? Well, as we all know, feminist hypocrisy knows no limit. It makes a profession out of saying one thing, but doing another.

Thankfully, Facebook has saved the day for these women. They will be allowed to continue their narcissistic romp across the information landscape. We will, for the time being, not be able to see that they're perpetually single. They no longer will be perceived as a girl that cannot catch a man—now they are a mysterious possibility again. They have a "get out of jail" card for the moment.

2. "Modern" women, particularly older ones, are finding it harder to attract a man. And that's a good thing.

Some people in the Manosphere claim that women, regardless of what they do, will never have to pay the piper; there will always be some thirsty beta to come and save the day. This may be the case in some places. However, this new move by Facebook seems to be suggesting otherwise.

Facebook felt the need to help women hide this information. It needed to protect their fragile emotional worlds from being damaged publicly. But what is the underlying cause of all this?

To better understand the issue, I think we need a statistical analysis. We can use the recent Pew report as a reference here. According to the nationwide report, the marriage rate in the US is at an all time low—down from 72% in 1960, to 51% today. Also, the divorce rate continues to be higher than it was in previous eras. Lastly, 40% of Americans now find marriage to be obsolete. Needless to say, the opinions of men are rarely polled in these studies. That being said, we can make this hypothesis based on the information; statistically, the institution of marriage is sinking like a Led Zeppelin.

What does this mean for the average single mother? Or, more particularly, a dysfunctional woman who destroyed her first marriage, thinking another sucker was just around the corner?

It means that there are fewer suckers than she thought. Given her hypergamous nature, a woman in her late 20s or early 30s will instinctively seek out an older man. Therein lies the problem. Many older men have already been burned. Some are in the midst of an ongoing nightmare with the ex: they cannot see their son, they are paying alimony, she left him for a ski instructor, etc. These men simply do not have the resources to make another mistake. They cannot afford to pick up the tab for a single mother with three daughters.

Summary

This leads back to Facebook and the new changes to its relationship status page. There were a plethora of single women who, even after advertising they were single, were unable to land a guy. They miscalculated plan B. They thought a quality relief pitcher would arrive to take over for the previous starter. Men would continue to arrive in droves, much as they did in her early twenties. But sadly, these guys aren't arriving. The fact has started to hit home—and it stings. Houston… we have a problem.

By changing her relationship status to "ask," she is essentially waving the white flag. She is saying that she lost a battle that she thought she could win.

Let's hope that things continue to go into the tank for these women. It's only when people have hit rock bottom that they are able to gain some humility. And if they gain nothing more than that, it will be a pleasant addition to their personalities.

The Difficulty Of Understanding Other People

May 28, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

"Simple and faithless as a smile and shake of the hand."

—T.S. Eliot

You recently had a job interview that, like the fancy dinner date from last weekend, you believed went very well. Still, just as that woman whom you seemed to charm has since flaked on you, so you have not heard back from the hiring manager, even though he had seemed impressed with you. This is a mystery. After all, the man said you had a unique skill set, your resume speaks for itself, and you were confident and articulate, asking smart and informed questions. Nevertheless, unbeknownst to you, there was "something about you" that he didn't quite like. So you did not get the position, and remain puzzled as to why.

So it is often with human relations and relationships. For the simple reason that other people's minds are theirs and not our own, we can never quite be sure as to what they think of us. Here, then, is a truth that, though simple, is yet enormous in its effects, and we therefore do well to keep it in mind.

The old cliché that "all the world's a stage" exists for good reason. Not only is it true that knowledge of other minds is by definition uncertain, all human beings are at least somewhat adept at dissimulation, and some of us are masters of it—the Second Sex in particular. Nor is this altogether bad, for there are countless times in life when it serves our interests to keep others from knowing what we think of them. ROK is a website devoted to game, and like a good politician, a player is basically an adroit actor. But there is a dark corollary here: if, in a world ruled by self-interest, everyone is an actor to some extent, then we must be mindful that just as we have some skill at lying, dissembling and all the rest, so others do too, making it wise to view them with some amount of suspicion and distrust. And yet we do not want to take this habit of mind too far; like naivete, paranoia is no virtue.

When two attractive women meet for the first time, something like the following hilarious exchange will often occur: "I love your shoes! Where did you get them?" "Thanks! At Macy's. And I love your hair—it's so adorable." The compliments are of course ironic.

They function to conceal (and perhaps somewhat discharge) the mutual and deeply competitive hostility the women feel for one another. The trite jargon of corporate America—the universal insistence, for example, on being a “good team member”—is similarly hollow. But it serves a valuable purpose, creating an atmosphere in which every smiling sycophant is supposed to be a part of some big happy family: a kind of pragmatic phoniness which serves to conceal the vile egotism and exploitation that are the real driving forces in the pursuit of “success.”

But while in these examples the real motives of human nature are plain enough, that is by no means always the case in human affairs; and it is only through hard-won experience, by which we come to possess shrewd and discerning eyes, that we can undrape other men and women, then seeing them for what they are, which is usually something rather unpleasant to behold.

When it comes to heterosexual dating, men must understand that it is instinctive in women to appear other than they are (and it’s this talent, by the way, that makes them so good at professions like sales and marketing, and indeed anything that involves deceit but not courage). The reason is that from puberty until middle age women live under the overwhelming gaze of men, with all the pressure and anxiety that comes with this. Here manipulation and deception function as tools whereby women survive or excel in the world despite their inferior reason and lack of physical strength. If player rule #1 is approach and approach, #2 should be distrust and distrust.

It must also be understood that just as women are natural born actresses, so they have an extraordinary knack for detecting male motives, however well these may be concealed. You may be quite a smooth player, with charm and agreeable BS coming out of your ears. For all that, many women will still see through you, even though you may think otherwise. Because women excel at telling people what they want to hear, and at not telling people what they don’t want to hear, it is only natural that women should be very keen at noticing when others try to do either to them. The ability to intuit what other people are all about is also the reason why, deep down, so many women can’t stand other women: they know only too well how petty, unjust and utterly fake their fellow women are.

A genius, and an aristocrat by temperament, Sigmund Freud was sometimes disdainful of “ordinary people.” But even so, he found them inexhaustibly fascinating once he looked beneath the surface and saw them in all their complications and complexities. However good we may be at “reading other people,” there is no doubt that we often fail to see much of what there is to them. I have a close friend who is a fierce man, obstinate, prickly and quarrelsome. Given this aspect of his character, you might not think he is also a man of great sensitivity and compassion, with highly nuanced thoughts, feelings, and tastes. But that is just what he is.

Having dated many attractive American women, it goes without saying that I have known many entitled brats. And yet, being a student of human nature, I have often observed, even in these women, in many respects so unattractive internally, aspects of them that were deeply compassionate and caring. Of course, no one would expect that from a woman whose haughty POF profile reads as a list of demands.

To some degree or other, every human being is a bundle of contradictions. For however it may be shaped and, in our time, horribly perverted by societal conditioning, human nature is an irreducibly complex endowment. It is like a story without end, and we can never be sure what will issue from it. It follows that people—all people—are more many-sided than we tend to perceive. Then too, we rarely perceive them in much depth. Even in close friendships and romantic relationships it often happens that a person suddenly shows us another side, or, as we may say in anger, "his true colors." Where it had been all along, this other side or these true colors? Somewhere within his character or personality. Why did we not see it before? Either it was perceptible but we missed it or it was not so; it had not yet been called forth by the right occasion. And in any case, this gives human affairs a strange and bewildering character.

For simply consider language itself, so messy and bound by nature to produce misunderstandings. How often there is a gap—though not necessarily recognized—between the intention of an utterance and its interpretation by our interlocutor. You meant one thing, your friend understood another, and then your attempt to clarify things is itself misunderstood! It is one of the more regrettable aspects of the age of texting and email that in these impersonal modes of communication there is no tone or inflection to help convey meaning. Take away the human voice, leaving only words on a screen, and misunderstandings of others—already common and inevitable—become much more widespread. We think we have people right; in fact, we don't even know we have misunderstood them. Thus the human scene resembles a kind of vast ignorant comedy. Innumerable relationships and marriages do not work out, and how easy for a mass of finger-pointing ignoramuses to blame the other person for "what wasn't meant to be." Time to "do you," to be sure.

The Socratic maxim "know thyself" is perhaps the world's greatest piece of wisdom. Everyone should consider it his duty to follow it. Knowing others is rather more difficult. We must still try to do so—we have, after all, to put up with one another!—but here we must always remember that our knowledge is bound to be partial, tentative, incomplete. Of course, this also holds for human knowledge generally; "the last word" on contemporary physics will not be arriving any time soon.

Liberalism makes much of the virtue of tolerance, and though it is more limited than people tend to perceive, it remains essential in human relations. But the unavoidable problem with tolerance is that human beings are generally poor at understanding or relating to what they have not themselves experienced. What is more, we are by nature so irrationally self-interested that it is futile to expect each other to be exemplars of tolerance—the delusion of many liberals. In general, in order for peoples of very different backgrounds and opinions to tolerate one another, they must first remove whatever they would find offensive in their fellow man. But obviously this is not tolerance; it is mere hypocrisy.

In our time, many people are quick to say “don’t judge me” since they are both wary of hypocrisy—always so prevalent—and concerned that others not say the unsettling truth about them, to which they are often blind. But though it is foolish to try to get through life without judging other people—a robust notion of value is impossible without it—it is indeed wise to do others the service of never believing we have understood them in full or “summed them up.” There is an important difference between a “judgment free zone”—that fearful, coddling and most unmanly thing—and endeavoring to have as nuanced an understanding of others as our limited minds can afford.

Elliot Rodger Is The First Male Feminist Mass Murderer

May 28, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Since originally publishing an article describing how a male-friendly culture encouraging Elliot into self-improvement (game), legal prostitution, and foreign marriage with Southeast Asian women would have prevented his murderous rampage, I did something that most people won't bother to do: I read his manifesto. Not even halfway through, I began to understand exactly why the media has been pushing the narrative that PUA (game) may have been the cause: Rodger was one of their own.

Here is the PDF of his manifesto. If you take the time to read it, you will likely come to the same conclusion I have that Elliot Rodger is in fact a feminist. In other words, the killings of six individuals stem in part because of his mainstream feminist beliefs that, after intersecting with his dark traits of narcissism, entitlement, loserdom, and hopelessness, led him to kill. The fantastical mainstream media articles you have come across trying to pin Rodger upon us is nothing more than a defensive measure to distance themselves from a killer that was a card-carrying member of their own progressive club.

Here are ten ways in which Rodger and feminists have an overlapping view of the world:

1. He put pussy on the pedestal, just like feminists do

Feminist theory speaks a whole lot about equality, but it's actually an ideology that seeks to absolve all women from their amusing but sometimes dangerous stream of mistakes. Feminism (and progressivism in general—they might as well be interchangeable terms) treat women as flawless snowflakes that must be coddled and spoon-fed happiness and validation. Any act by a woman, even if it results in failure or bodily harm (like an abortion), is an "empowering" statement of independence and strength, while any failure by men is seen upon as proof that they are out-of-touch doofuses, a fact that is readily displayed on television, movies, and advertising.

Rodger's manifesto exactly matches this feminist belief. He shows little genuine hate towards the object of his affections—women—and their poor choices, instead lashing out against the men who were successful with those women. Feminists do the same, always ready to blame men for their failures in life, even going so far as saying that society would be better without men, who are mocked as mere "sperm donors." In spite of the bad choices that women make by dating bad boys at the schools he attended, Rodger gave them a pussy pass and continued to believe that they were flawless angels who should be cherished, especially the blonde ones.

Rodger's hate for those men isn't much different than that hate displayed to me and my colleagues here at ROK. Just take a look at this supposedly professional woman having an embarrassing emotional meltdown on a news show because she didn't agree with what I said, resorting to blatant distortion and lies about "rape culture" and other such nonsense that was unrelated to the piece she was critiquing:

Elevating women as the superior sex, which is what both feminists and Rodger have done, means that discrimination and outright hatred must be then applied to the "inferior" sex—men. It's no surprise that the most violent killings performed by Rodger were on his three male roommates with a knife, who surely endured more suffering and pain than the cleaner executions he did on his female victims.

2. He was awash in blue pill knowledge

We have an often-used metaphor called the "red pill," which stands for the pursuit of truth concerning human nature, no matter how painful those truths can be. The opposite of the red pill is the blue pill, of people who choose to be placated by lies describing reality. Both feminists and Rodger were firm adherents to the blue pill world—of believing in a way of nature that doesn't actually reflect actual human behavior. For example:

- Both Rodger and feminists believe that attraction should be automatic and easy instead of being based on sexual market value or other components that can be changed (such as game).
- Both Rodger and feminists believe that men should be blamed for problems of society or personal relationships.
- Both Rodger and feminists were deluded into having standards way beyond their level of attractiveness (e.g., fat feminist cows actually think they should be able to date a good man).
- Both Rodger and feminists believe that all a man has to do to get a girlfriend is to be "nice" and a provider, a strategy that no longer works in today's America.
- Both Rodger and feminists hated players who did well with women

As final proof that Rodger was as blue pill as you can get, simply reverse all the gender references within his manifesto and pretend it was written by a woman. What you would then have before you is a pity party of a self-absorbed feminist who thinks that men are the cause of all her problems. If he lived a couple more years, I have no doubt that Rodger would even be a proud moderator of the Blue Pill subreddit.

3. He didn't believe in self-improvement, just like feminists

In spite of all the loneliness and pain that Rodger went through, he still couldn't be bothered to lift one finger to improve his station. Compare that to what we teach here at ROK, where we strongly advise you to start your game training with at least 100 approaches, with the expectation that you'll probably have to do thousands during your lifetime. In Rodger's manifesto, all 140 pages of it, he details only saying "Hi" to one girl and practically running away from fear. In other words, he did one aborted approach with zero follow-up. That's not game anywhere in the game universe, and if he came to us saying that he has yet to get laid after putting such an half-assed attempt, we'd tell him to do 10 solid approaches the following day and stop whining like an entitled child.

The fact that Rodger was a member of PUAHate, an online community of social retards who despised game and believed only Brad Pitt and millionaires can get laid, further highlights how vehemently anti-game he was. Why wasn't he open to improving himself? Why wasn't he ready to expend the labor to make himself more attractive to women? For that answer, we might as well ask some feminists, who share the exact same belief as him in not having to lift a finger in making yourself more attractive to the opposite sex. Look no further than feminist's cause-du-jour, fat acceptance, a culture of de-improvement—and frankly, de-evolution—where women gain massive amounts of weight and then flaunt their blubber on social media, ready to attack any man who dare finds their display to be unattractive or repulsive.

Fat acceptance has become so pervasive that we had to dedicate one whole week on ROK tearing it to shreds, but in spite of that, not much has changed. America continues to get fatter and feminists continue to attempt to normalize obesity as actually being beautiful, just like how Rodger tried to convince himself of the idea that having a BMW would be attractive to women.

Take a look at this quote by Rodger:

> Everyone treated me like I was invisible. No one reached out to me, no one knew I existed. I was a ghost.

Does that ring a bell to you? It's almost identical to the rant we recently witnessed on the Louis CK show when a morbidly obese female went on to whine and bitch about how being a fat ass is not getting her the man she wants. It's no surprise that fatties rushed to praise Louis CK for his act of sedition against men and acceptable standards of beauty. There is almost no difference between Rodger and a modern American woman who subscribes to feminist thought.

Now take a look at this passage:

> All of the hot, beautiful girls walked around with obnoxious, tough jock-type men who partied all the time and acted crazy. They should be going for intelligent gentlemen such as myself. Women are sexually attracted to the wrong type of man.

Let's do a swap on the genders:

> All the handsome men walked around with blonde bimbos who don't have a good career like me and knowledge of reality television shows. These men should be going for a strong, empowered, independent, fabulous woman such as myself. Men are sexually attracted to the wrong type of woman.

The overlap in mindset would be comical if it didn't result in tragedy.

Another question worth asking is this: when today's American woman can't find the man of her dreams, does she look in the mirror and blame herself? No, she blames men for not finding her unattractiveness attractive. This is actively promoted by feminist thinkers on the most widely read American blogs like Buzzfeed, Gawker, and Huffington Post. Rodger shared this same viewpoint. His manifesto is dripping with entitlement of why girls don't find him to be "marvelous" just because he happens to own a fancy pair of sunglasses. Feminists and Rodger, it turns out, are like two peas in a pod.

4. He believed that men should be chivalrous and kind, like feminists do

Please don't forward us another listicle on a feminist-friendly blog about how men need to be nice, friendly, and awkwardly consensual by applying legalese speak in the bedroom before passionate fornication. Rodger believed much of the same, thinking that you had to be a "supreme gentleman" that catered to the material and emotional whims of women, doing everything possible to please them in exchange for a sexual reward. We can only imagine how nauseatingly "gentlemanly" he would have been if he actually managed to land a date on his terms.

I have no doubt he would have agreed with just about all the mainstream bullshit advice on being a gentleman, particularly the Thought Catalog piece The 20 Rules Of Being A Modern Gentleman. There is also a Buzzfeed quiz titled How Much Of A Gentleman Are You? that Rodger would have gotten an A+ on. The end result of his loneliness (killing six people) was obviously not gentlemanly, but before that rampage he treated girls with a gentlemanly shyness, reverence, and respect that feminists would have applauded him for. Rodger and feminists believed in the exact same demeanor that men should have around women.

5. He hated game, like feminists do

No one hates game more than feminists, who have gone so far as to equate it rape ([1], [2], [3]). They absolutely despise any attempt by men to improve their value in the sexual marketplace because then that would mean fewer men to put up with their obesity, short hair, or bad attitude. Rodger believed the same, going so far as becoming an active member in the PUAHate community which dedicated the bulk of their efforts to criticizing game and its adherents like a woman's gossip circle. (On PUAhate there had been over 100 threads criticizing me and other ROK staff.)

Would you be surprised if I were to tell you right now that Rodger and a mainstream feminist shared the same views on PUAHate and game? I hope not, because that's exactly what I found. A popular feminist writer who has worked for Newsweek, Jezebel, Buzzfeed, and Dissident magazine, Katie JM Baker, publicly declared that PUAs (i.e. us) are actually worse than PUA Hate.

> The men that lurk in the PuaHate forums are almost worse than the PUAs themselves…

Let that soak in for a second. Feminist rage is so deep and emotional against game that they have supported a forum with "hate" in the title that cultivated and gave comfort to a mass murderer. I gave Baker a chance to change her opinion about believing a forum of hate was less worse than men who practice game:

She responded with childish text-speak

A feminist refused to reverse her position that game practitioners are not worse than Rodger's favorite hangout. That tells me that Rodger and Baker would get along very well in their hate for men like us who teach game and try to improve men's lives.

6. He subscribed to The Young Turks Youtube channel, a feminist darling

This is a minor point but one worth mentioning. We don't know how knee-deep he was into The Young Turks liberal positions, but it's a fact that he was not a subscriber to my channel or forum. We can only speculate as to how much TYT molded his pro-feminist view.

7. He hated alpha males, just like feminists do

Whenever a feminist encounters these parts, she immediately bashes our alpha/beta concept of male sexual hierarchy. She instead spouts tired cliches that are supposed to help men in their pursuit of sexual happiness but which actually do nothing of the sort:

- “People are people!”
- “Just be yourself!”
- “Don’t be an asshole/creep/jerk/rando!”
- “Having sexual standards is, like, misogynistic!”

Of course these phrases don’t explain human mating behavior and why some men get way more women than others, but that’s no matter since feminist theory does not have the slightest intention to explain the world in an accurate or truthful manner.

Like feminists, Rodger despised alpha males, who he called “obnoxious.” Here’s some relevant quotes from his manifesto:

> I noticed that there were two groups of cool, popular kids. There were the skateboarder kids, such as Vinny Maggio, Ashton Moio, Darrel, Wes, and Alex Dib. And then there were the boys who were popular with girls, including Vincent, Robert Morgan, and [redacted]. They all seemed so confident and aggressive. I felt so intimidated by them, and I hated them for it. I hated them so much, but I had to increase my standing with them. I wanted to be friends with them.
> I thought all of the cool kids were obnoxious jerks, but I tried as best as I could to hide my disgust and appear “cool” to them. They were obnoxious jerks, and yet somehow it was these boys who all of the girls flocked to.

If Rodger was alive right now, he’d be giving feminists high fives for sharing the exact same viewpoint on sexually superior but “horrible” males who have figured out the dating game and what women actually want.

8. He shared many personality traits with your modern American feminist

Rodger might as well have been a woman, which has raised speculation if he was actually gay. He took selfies like women. He was addicted to Facebook like women. He was obsessed with his appearance. He was narcissistic, vain, and materialistic. I wouldn’t be surprised if he was also addicted to his iPhone like your standard issue American woman. Heartiste does a good job of highlighting the similarities:

> [The effeminate male, like Rodger, is an] indictment of this infantile Millennial generation, which daily provides evidence that their ranks are filled with effeminate males who, like women, expect the world to cater their needs, no questions asked, no demands made. Elliot Rodger couldn’t stand how unfaaaair girls were to date uglier men than himself, how unfair life was that his car and clothes weren’t a magnet for hot white sorority chicks, how unfair the cosmic laws were to require of him a little bit of effort if he wanted to put an end to his > virginity.

> Egotistic, attention starved, solipsistic, passive aggressive, perpetually aggrieved, and unwilling to change when posing as a martyr feels so damn good… there's your new American manlet, same as your new American woman.

Like I already mentioned, a quick find/replace gender swap on his manifesto will pass the Turing test in convincing most spectators that he was actually a 22-year-old empowered feminist who participates in "Take Back The Night" walks and thinks that posting mindless #YesAllWomen tweets on Twitter comprises her good deed of the month. Rodger was effeminate and a negative person overall simply because he possessed beliefs that are undoubtedly shared by feminists.

9. He wanted to be a social justice warrior, just like feminists

He had a victim complex of being held down by invisible forces outside of his control. Feminists also believe that the "patriarchy" is holding them down, and they flock to Tumblr to reblog facile images and memes to spread lies that men make more than women for the same work, for example. These Tumblr crusades have even led to my own family being prank called at late hours, all because my words hurt their feelings, just like Rodger's was hurt that pretty girls didn't find him automatically attractive.

It turns out that Rodger was a budding social justice warrior, perhaps not far from establishing his own Tumblr beachhead:

> I formed an ideology in my head of how the world should work. I was fueled both by my desire to destroy all of the injustices of the world, and to exact revenge on everyone I envy and hate. I decided that my destiny in life is to rise to power so I can impose my ideology on the world and set everything right. I was only seventeen, I have plenty of time. I thought to myself. I spent all of my time studying in my room, reading books about history, politics, and sociology, trying to learn as much as I can.
> I seriously started to consider working towards writing an epic story. I was always creating stories in my mind to fuel my fantasies. Usually those stories depicted someone like myself rising to power after a life of being treated unfairly by the world.
> To be angry about the injustices one faces is a sign of strength. It is a sign that one has the will to fight back against those injustices, rather than bowing down and accepting it as fate. Both my friends James and Philip seem to be the weak, accepting type; whereas I am the fighter. I will never stand to be insulted, and I will eventually have my revenge against all those who insult me, no matter how long it takes.

Both Rodger and feminists feel the only way to get what they want out of life is not self-improvement, but attacking others they disagree with. Their shared ideology is one of destruction. We have to wonder if Rodger would have eventually participated in any feminist event like SlutWalks to right the world of fantasy injustices that prevent them from being seen as beautiful, marvelous, gentlemanly, and so on.

10. He was not far away from being the epitome of a white knight, a man that feminists collect for their friend zones

If you see a feminist in the wild, a white knight won't be far. He's the man who enables her false view of the world and provides her with good feels and encouragement for her social justice campaigns. While Rodger wasn't quite a white knight in this sense, he nailed all three white knight components:

> 1. He is the ever-present servant.
> 2. He pines silently for a single woman.
> 3. That woman wants little to do with him, and it shows.

In other words, if you inserted him in feminist company, he would be the glove to their chubby bear claw fingers. His personality is wholly compatible with how feminists believe men should behave: servile and wimpy while never taking real action on their sexual desires.

Conclusion

The only things in common that Rodger had with us is that (1) he wanted sex with attractive women, and (2) he had a functional penis. That's it. The overlap of thought and belief between Rodger and feminists, however, should convince you beyond a reasonable doubt that Rodger was in fact a feminist, even if he didn't himself know that his peg fit snugly into the feminist hole. I've actually met self-described feminists who were less feminist than Rodger was.

While I stand by my argument that game would have helped Rodger, I am beginning to wonder if being a feminist was the seed that drove him to desperation and delusion, eventually leading to a tragic loss of life. This line of thought is worth pursuing by people who want to understand why a man felt that taking other lives and his own was seen as the best solution. You definitely won't read about this conclusion in the media, which is too busy trying to toss Rodger to our side like a hot piece of coal, even though Rodger shares absolutely no similarity in thought and behavior to game practitioners.

I have logically come to the conclusion that Rodger was in fact the first male feminist mass murderer that we have seen in America. I'm afraid that if the feminist ideology contained within Rodger's head is allowed to continue spreading, we are likely to see more violent acts by men who believe in the exact same things that feminists do.

How To Increase Your Sexual Prospects Before Even Using Game

Crash 'n Burn

The other morning I went through my typical routine of getting ready for my workout. I stretch out, down a bottle of water and a cup of black coffee and hit the road for my 5 minute trek to my complex's weight room. The weight room attendant is the typical try-hard blue pill beta. His clean shaven face, shoulder length hair pulled back in a greasy wannabe pony tail to show his "bad-assness", and his ever present protein shake makes me chuckle every time I see him.

The first thing I noticed about this dude when I first met him was his horrific breath. Morning breath is one thing but this guy's chronic halitosis was of the worst variety and was a tell tale sign his chompers hadn't been intimate with a toothbrush in quite sometime. With Limp Bizkit blaring over the sound system (his choice), I put in my ear buds to attempt to drown out the residual "fuck you's" spewing from the speakers and start warming up for my squats when a solid 8 whom I'd never seen there before walks in to sign her name. Billy Bad Ass immediately springs into action and starts running terrible game. I didn't hear the interaction but it was obvious she wasn't interested. After a pathetic attempt to have a conversation with her (he tried to corner her while she was on the elliptical machine), she finally packed up and left. I doubt she'll be back.

A little while later another guy walks in gives the attendant some sort of cheesy secret handshake and starts a conversation. They're friends. On my way out I overhear one of them ask "Why are bitches so fucking rude?" Clearly they'd been discussing Don Juan's crash-and-burn with the hottie earlier. I've seen this more times than I'd like to admit and that last one was the last straw for me.

The Ugly Truth

Men neglect the basics in terms of what it takes to resemble and act like a man—the very prerequisite of attracting the opposite sex. And these men wonder aloud about "what's wrong with women" or "why are girls so hard to approach" or "why are they so complicated" on a daily basis. Men here know that the answers to these questions are vast and that solving the poonani paradigm takes time and work. But if a man doesn't master the basics, he will never come close to finding the resolutions he needs.

First off, let me be crystal clear: game is necessary to consistently bed high value (read: hot) women without getting taken to the cleaners in some way, shape, or form. Granted, there are plenty of men with zero game who enjoy the company of beautiful girls. Rich men have harems, high-status men have romp rosters, and good looking men have good looking girls at their beck and call. But the trick is to fuck them on the regular without allowing them to take their pound of flesh before, during, or after the sex fest is over. That's game.

There are, however, a few ways for men new to game to get a head start with the ladies whilst honing their skills in the Venusian Arts. I'm not going to promise you that making these simple, yet effective changes will instantly cause women to throw their panties at you, but you will certainly start to notice a few more glimpses from the fairer sex. Now most of these changes will seem blatantly obvious at first glance. The reason for this is that they've been drilled into our heads since we were yay high.

Granted, the majority of us exercise one or two of these routines every so often but precious few men use all of them persistently and this is where we fall short. The fact is, these changes can easily be made within 24 hours, but it's important to understand that most of these modifications are habits. For these strategies to work, they need to be executed faithfully and maintained regularly—a small price to pay to increase your potential pussy pool.

Dress Better All The Time

The older I get the more I notice that a lot of men don't put enough time into their wardrobe on a consistent basis. It frustrates me to no end when I see dudes at 7-Eleven looking like vagabonds because they threw on anything they could get their hands on for the short trip to grab a pack of cigarettes. What these guys don't realize is that their bad choice in threads, even for a short time, is costing them opportunities.

Your choice in dress conveys a lot about who you are as a person. It gives people a pretty good idea about how to treat and address you, and more importantly, what your value might be. Hobos are generally treated with pity because they're dressed pitifully. Men in suits are treated better because their wardrobe choice commands more respect. Simple concept. The importance of what you choose to wear is magnified tenfold when dealing with women because they instantly assign value to most everyone they see based solely on their clothing. Much like men assign value to women based mainly on their physical beauty.

Everyone's style is different but there are a few universal rules when it comes to attire. On that note, I would highly recommend checking out Virgile Kent's blog for an in depth perspective on all things related to the male wardrobe. This dude knows his shit as far as style is concerned so I visit his site at least once a week for tidbits on tightening up my vestment game. And for those of you who might think he's like the typical homosexual-esque "fashionista" on Lifetime, Oxygen, or any number of gurrrl power channels, I can assure you he's far from that. VK is the foremost expert on picking the right threads to make you look like a man and will point you in the right direction in every aspect of dress from head to toe.

VK will also advise you to make sure you're looking good all the time and I concur 100%. Nobody's suggesting you put on a three piece suit for a quick trip around the corner for a bottle of water. But a wrinkled t-shirt and dirty jeans will most assuredly repel that ample assed yoga pants stretching brunette ahead of you in the checkout line. Taking a little extra time to wear clothing that accentuates your masculinity and confidence might just coax her to turn around and ask you if you've ever tried the organic spinach she's buying as an excuse to strike up conversation.

Mind Your Personal Hygiene

Personal hygiene is paramount when it comes to women. It is often the difference between getting an opportunity to spit game at her and getting dismissed altogether. The three most important aspects of your daily hygiene regimen are oral care, the hair on your head and face, and the way you smell.

Breath

You can have everything going for you but if you approach a woman and your breath smells like hot garbage, you're out. Period. Nobody should have to tell you to brush, floss twice a day, and tongue scrape at this point in your life but, again, this is something I find a lot of people, men and women alike, neglecting. Minty fresh breath is your goal so start paying attention to oral care and you'll notice you're more confident with women—especially in close quarters (like the checkout line) where it counts.

Hair

Changing your hair style these days is as easy as walking into a salon or barber shop. Look online, or through magazines to find a style that you're comfortable with and fits your facial profile and change it up. Anything but the boring shit you've been sporting on your dome for the last 5+ years. Hell, maybe even take a razor and go with the bald look. Whatever your choice make sure it's masculine and appealing to the eye. Trust me when I tell you that the women you see on a daily basis will definitely notice and respond.

Facial hair is extremely crucial and probably the most important change you can make to entice the opposite sex. The reason for this is that it represents raw masculinity to the core. Women overwhelmingly respond much more favorably to a man with facial hair than a man who is clean shaven because they want to be ravaged by a man who exudes a ruggedness. I could go on about the many studies that prove this (Google it) but I'm basing this purely on anecdotal experience and field reports from fellow red pillers. So grow a beard, a gotee, an anchor—anything to avoid having a baby face like the typical office beta. Do not forget to maintain your look. It takes work but nothing looks worse than an unkempt gotee. The bottom line here is that facial hair quite literally makes the man.

Scent

Few men understand the importance of the way they smell in regards to attracting the opposite sex. The bulk of us either pay no attention to it, or worse, bathe ourselves in cologne. The solution to this is simple. Find a body spray or cologne with a clean, light scent that doesn't overpower and give yourself a few sprtiz's on the neck, arms, and chest before heading out. If a woman thinks you smell good, she will tell you.

Paying close attention to your hygiene on a daily basis will swing the odds in your favor when it comes to attracting women. I'm not suggesting you become a pretty boy who checks himself out in mirrors all the time. But brushing your teeth when they feel "furry" after a day or two or breaking out the razor when your beard starts looking sloppy isn't gonna cut it either. Making damn sure your hygiene game is rock solid all the time is the key. Girls are much more likely to converse with a man who has carefully manicured facial hair, fresh breath, and a clean, masculine scent emanating from his person than an average baby faced schlub with greasy cookie cutter hair, bad breath, and no discernible scent because he's too lazy to implement good habits.

Be genuinely unique

A lot of people tend to do the same things to stand out or be different (hipsters and "emo" people come to mind) so avoiding what everybody else does to attract attention will automatically set yourself apart from a lot of those people. Unapologetically doing the things you like to do will separate you from most. Finding unique ways to express yourself during everyday tasks without the appearance of trying too hard is what will capture the imagination of women.

For example, I'm a smoker. So are a lot of other people. To stand out from the typical cancer stick inhaling crowd, I roll my own cigarettes with black cigarette papers. I also invested in a carbon fiber butane lighter and bought a cool cigarette case with a black matte finish with my initials engraved on it. When girls see me light my black cigarette with a blue flame coming from a slick looking lighter it piques their interest.

Somehow they always manage to find themselves near me asking what kind of cigarettes they are, telling me they're cool looking, or asking for one which gives me an excuse to flash my cigarette case (they sometimes ask me what the initials stand for—I make 'em guess and never tell them). This gives me the crack in the door I need to run game as striking up conversation at that point is child's play. I've gotten more than my fair share of lays from conversations started in the smoking area and all I did was spend a little coin on a few things to help separate myself from the herd.

Girls are drawn to a man who marches to the beat of a different drummer, not some chuckleheaded drone who goes with the flow. It's important not to come off as a "peacock" as some PUA sites would advise you to do. Women see right through this ruse and will flat out ignore you and have a good laugh about it with their friends later. By the same token don't be afraid to push the boundaries either. Put your balls on the line and see what happens.

Taking some time to explore your interests and devising different ways to carry out monotonous daily activities in an uncommon manner is a sure fire way to get the female hamster wheel spinning in overdrive wondering just what the hell it is about you that has her panties moistening.

Get a forearm tattoo

While tattoos on chicks are generally trashy and a pretty good sign she's a slut, they have a great effect on the way a woman perceives a man in a sexual context. Tattoos are edgy and masculine because they convey excitement and rebellion—chick crack. More 9s and 10s are banging guys rocking skin art than ones that aren't. And the ones that aren't definitely want to. I'm not suggesting you run out get sleeves just yet but a well placed tattoo instantaneously puts you into another class of male as far as sexual hierarchy goes.

Getting a forearm tattoo allows you to show your new found edginess without much effort. Just wear a short sleeved shirt or a collared shirt with the sleeves rolled up and you'll immediately project that "I don't give a fuck" attitude that girls eat up. Being able to easily cover it up when necessary is what makes the forearm the best place for your new tat as you can conveniently go from rebel to businessman in a few short seconds.

Whatever you choose to ink into your skin, stay away from mainstream tattoos like tribal armbands that every meat head out there has. Be original but remember, this tattoo is for you so make sure it means and projects something significant to you. Female attention is merely a side effect of this decision so the air of subtle rebellion is the key here. Stoking the flames of her curiosity enough to ask you about it is what you're going for and as soon as she does, Game on.

Take away

As stated before, a couple of these are pretty obvious and putting them into practice will up your SMV in the blink of an eye. Yes, you'll have to learn game to supplement it but you have to crawl before you can walk and making these changes will help ease you into getting used to getting attention from attractive females on a regular basis. Nobody goes from beta to Cassanova in a day but this will help you take a gigantic first step in the right direction.

How To Become A Superhero

May 29, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

While walking in the park, I passed a group of grown men in comic book t-shirts and fedoras pretending to be superheroes. They were completely absorbed in their game, and their childlike enthusiasm was both pathetic and weirdly endearing. It was clear these men longed for some sort of adventure or experience absent from their lives and had turned to fantasy to fulfill it. It got me thinking – what would it take for men like them to live their fantasies out in real life, rather than just imagine them?

Superhero stories dominate our culture. Every month or two a new superhero film smashes box offices around the world. I grew up on comics, and I love these stories. Something in comics speaks to young men on a very primal and spiritual level. People dress up at these characters, attend conventions, and want to live in their worlds. I can understand why.

There are masculine virtues portrayed in superhero stories that go back to ancient times and mythical traditions. Our culture has lost and even demonized these virtues in other forms of entertainment, but not in the modern mythology of comics. Men are drawn to these characters, because they embody what men wish they were.

Fortunately, men do not have to simply read about greatness, they can become it. I know a lot of men who spend their time in fantasy, be it in comics, video games, films, or other passive pursuits who might find their lives more fulfilling if they started pursuing their desires in reality.

I write this guide in the hopes that by using the cultural language of superheroes, I can encourage a few passive men to take action in the world. Here’s what you’d have to do to become a real life superhero:

Get In Peak Physical Condition

Superheros are in peak physical condition. While our culture says all bodies are beautiful and gets angry when healthy men and women tell it otherwise, superheroes only have one body type—jacked. Comics have often been accused of showing unrealistic images of women, but like Roman and Greek art, comics show an idealized body type for both sexes. Actors who plays these characters have to undergo months of rigorous dieting and conditioning in order to achieve the body type they are naturally drawn with. If you want to be a hero, start training.

Develop Unique Skills

Superheroes have unique skills. Many heroes are supernatural or cosmic in nature, but others are just highly skilled men like you or me, who've trained in a unique filed. Most know some form of fighting or martial arts. Many have mastered technical, scientific, or business skills that are totally unique. If you're interested in learning, there has never been a better time than the age of internet. Any skill you could imagine is out there. If you want to be a hero, be constantly learning new skills.

Develop Your Style

Superheroes have style. I'm not just talking about the costumes (though, I'm at least talking about those), but the intention behind them. In a culture that says physical appearance don’t matter superheroes place a massive amount of importance on how they present themselves. Superheroes use their visual appearance to demonstrate their values. As modern clothing becomes more casual, androgynous, and bland, superhero costumes stand out as a bold statement. If you want to become a hero, ditch the screen-printed t-shirts and dress like the guys whose images are on them.

Reinvent Yourself

Superheroes reinvent themselves. Every superhero has a origin story, where a chance event, personal trauma, or difficult challenge forced them to grow into the hero they are now. Rather than shrink from challenge, superheroes use their worst experiences as leverage to become the best version of themselves. Going from being a daydreamer to a real world success will take massive change. If you want to be a hero, be willing to grow and change who you are.

Find Your Mission

Superheros have a mission that goes beyond their own personal happiness. They have a greater spiritual purpose which drives their actions and benefits the world around them. Often this can purpose can be reduced to a simple maxim like “with great power, comes great responsibility.” This mission or purpose guides all of their actions, even when it forces them to make uncomfortable or difficult decisions. If you want to be a hero, find a mission and dedicate your life to serving the world in some way.

Put Your Mission Before Your Woman

Superheros put their mission before their woman. Putting your mission before your woman is the central tenant of game. If you internalize this concept, many other things fall into place. Superheroes often sacrifice their personal relationships for their mission in the world, and are even willing put loved ones in physical danger if it means doing the right thing. If you want to be a hero, you must have a purpose that is more important to you than women.

Find Mentors

Superheroes have mentors. Central to most origin stories is a teacher, or guide who gives the hero the skills he needs to move forward. The X-men all attend a school for gifted individuals lead by a compassionate psychic. Superman found records his father left him. Spider-man had his uncle to show him that he needed to use his powers responsibly. Mentors can take unusual forms, but most great men were taught by great men. If you want to be a hero, find mentorship.

Join A Team

Superheroes form teams. The X-men. The Avengers. Even a loner like Batman has the Justice League. While we can do great things independently, we can do even more in community. If you want to be a hero, band together with like-minded individuals who share your purpose.

Be Willing To Endure Hatred

Superheroes are often hated and feared by the people they are trying to protect. They still do what's right, and never apologize for who they are or what they believe. In a culture where men are constantly being told to check their privilege, superheros see their unique background and gifts as something to inspire others rather than something to be ashamed of. Know that if you seek to improve yourself, there will be people who feel threatened by it. Do it anyway. If you want to be a hero, be unapologetic about it.

Superheroes Embody Masculinity

Writing this list, I noticed that much of what it takes to be hero lines up with the advice of the manosphere. Finding a mission, working in a community, and achieving physical mastery are all aspects of traditional masculinity.

In a different era, those young men I saw pretending to be superheroes in the park would have been sparring. Someone would have seen their desire for adventure as young men, put a sword in their hand, and trained them as warriors. Now, our culture values consumption more than heroism, so we sell young men the dreams they want to live as fiction, but never give them the tools they need to take action.

As I was reflecting on the comics I grew up reading, I realized I am now living the virtues I'd read about as a child. When I passed those men in the park, I was on my way to a martial arts class. That evening I blew off a girl who wanted to see me to work on projects I was passionate about. I have a purpose that goes beyond my own happiness, and a community of people who work on it with me.

I feel hopeful even when I see introverted or awkward young man immersed in fantasy, because I know what's possible. I used to be one of those men, but I changed my life one hour at a time. You can too. Don’t settle for merely reading about adventures, take action and live them.

8 Tips For Getting Laid At Work

May 30, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

The modern corporate world is a difficult space to negotiate. What with ever-increasing constraints on personal freedoms through draconian HR laws, it's surprising that anyone stays employed for more than a week. And of course, the 'job for life' certainties that the baby boomer generation enjoyed are now as quaint as the Charleston and smoking indoors. This is why many men from this corner of the internet choose to opt out, establishing lifestyle businesses that enable them to work remotely to a much freer schedule.

For those still chained to the corporate treadmill, though, a recurrent question occurs: should one game at work or not? If you're like me, you work in a contemporary office environment servicing an industry such as finance, travel, law or advertising, then it is likely that you are surrounded by a plethora of hotties. I am employed in a huge office complex in London housed in a tower overlooking Canary Wharf, the city's key financial hub. Every day thousands of young women in their early twenties, many of them hot, pour in through the doors. Given that the requirements for female work-wear are commonly a lot more lax than for men, many of them are impressively attired in high heels, slinky pencil skirts and strappy tops ballasted only by the generous breasts contained within.

Given this high traffic, fecund with erotic opportunity, should I wade in and treat the place like a nightclub on 'Free Shots for Ladies' night, or should I keep my gaming for outside my place of gainful employment? Many guys would argue the latter: 'don't defecate on your own doorstep'. A contrary view would be that, given the transient state of the employment market, the likelihood of both you and her both still working there in even six months time is slim, so why not take advantage of the environment simply as another venue to meet women? Each man must make up his own mind on this. If you decide to go ahead then proceed with caution: know your company's polices and don't do anything that could get your fired. Then, observe the following tips for pulling an office dime piece:

1. Be Clear In Your Mind About What You Want

First off, you should be very clear in your own mind about what you want. Obviously this will vary depending on the girl and your situation, but think carefully. A long-term relationship with a colleague is not ideal (unless you're ready to throw in the towel entirely — hopefully not the majority of ROK readers!) because you'd be together all the time and would have no privacy whatsoever. A quick pump-and-dump, while possible, is not advisable either. The girl might get clingy, leading to all sorts of problems. In my view, the best arrangement is a casual fuck-buddy — a girl willing to engage in no-strings fun from time to time without any hassle or emotional involvement. This is entirely achievable, if you follow my ground rules.

2. Avoid the Colleague-Zone

Similar to the friendzone, the colleague-zone is a feature of the modern working environment that's easy to fall into, and almost impossible to get out of afterwards. When a new girl starts in an office environment then typically a chode crystal of hungry guys will form around her pretending to be interested in the minutiae of her boring corporate CV. Oh wow, so you used to source market data for agricultural product start-ups? That's so cool. Cut that shit out right now—don't be one of those guys. If you start off by making tedious small talk about work, you might as well cut your balls off. She will compartmentalize you as just another workmate and you will get nowhere.

3. Take Your Time: Be Mysterious

Sometimes truly great game is doing nothing. Hang back. Take it easy. Watch others make their mistakes and wait. I usually don't say a word to a new girl for several weeks. This will mark you out as not thirsty, and also somewhat mysterious. Remember, girls love guys who are unobtainable and who are enigmatic . Be that guy. She will be intrigued — all the other guys have been falling over themselves to take her to lunch or out for cock-heavy, sexless post-work drinks: why haven't you? Create attraction by refusing to fall into the typical beta frame.

4. Dress Well And Walk Round Like You're the CEO

'You can't play hard to get if you're hard to want.' If you're a scrub, then you can hang back for as long as you like and she's still not going to be into you. Fortunately the work environment offers almost unparalleled opportunities for dressing and acting like you're the man.

First off, suit the hell up. Girls love that Don Draper shtick. Many workplaces in the marketing and digital spheres allow their employees to dress down these days, but coming in wearing a pair of ratty chinos and an ill-fitting polo is not going to do you any favors. I'm not going to talk too much here about how to dress (there are plenty of great resources online for this, Christian McQueen's blog for one), but it's all about fit and details. Buy a decent quality suit then get it tailored so it's snug round the waist, shoulders, arms and legs. Wear cuff-links and pocket squares. If you like, experiment with waistcoats and braces. Avoid having everything grey and black — splashes of bright color can be really effective. Good shoes and a good, classic watch will finish off the outfit to a tee.

Once you've got your clothes right, think about your posture. I often get comments from girls who say they were attracted to me because of the way that I walk. Think about it like acting — imagine you are a slightly arrogant CEO. How does he walk? Head held high, shoulders back, with a swagger because he doesn't give a shit what anyone else thinks? Start walking like that yourself immediately. It doesn't matter if you don't feel congruent with it yet. Just do it. You'll soon find that your confidence catches up with your physicality. Meanwhile, your snappy dressing and your cocky poise will send out pussy moistening gamma rays to the ladies around you.

5. Be Man to Woman: Avoid Cockblocks

In the early stages, if you pass her in the corridor then simply smirk and fix her with a knowing look. The idea is to establish a flirtatious vibe between you before you've even spoken. The external reality of the office structure is immaterial to the alpha male: he sees the women around him not as co-workers but as women.

When you do finally get talking to her, keep it light and jokey in front of other people. Don't seek approval: just be cool. You are keeping your powder dry for when you are alone together.

Wait for an appropriate moment, then, when she's alone and you're both out of earshot, ask her directly to come for a drink, just you and her. Look her in the eye, speak slowly, and leave no doubt in her mind that this is a sexually motivated invitation, rather than a meet-up to discuss the Robson Asher account. Remember, passive cockblocking can be a problem at work—mother hens rise up quickly in offices looking to 'protect' younger women they're jealous of, and even if the girl likes you she may be nervous about looking bad in front of her colleagues, so keep it discreet.

If she rejects you then no problem, back off—nothing lost. If she accepts, then great—game on.

6. Get Sexual Quickly

Take her out for a couple of drinks and escalate quickly. Initiate touch early on and ramp up tactile and verbal flirtation fast. The aim is to get her off the fence and to either reject you quickly or to go to bed with you. Ideally the latter, ideally on the first night. Push for this. If you don't have sex after the first meet-up, she'll have time to consider the effects going with you might have on her standing in the company, career, relationships with other colleagues etc. Circumvent all of that by seducing her quickly.

7. Be Very Discreet

Whatever you do, be very, very discreet. Resist the temptation to tell anyone at work what is going on between you too. Typically guys get a lot of validation from telling their buddies about their conquests—the desire to do so can be even greater in work, where you might gain man points for sexing a particularly cute girl. Don't. If word gets round then the girl will likely retreat and you will have killed the golden goose. No more illicit sessions in the stationary cupboard. Keep it strictly on the down-low between you two. Also, don't communicate with her via work email—use Whatsapp or Facebook Messenger as normal. Don't leave a trail. Ideally, no-one at your office should even be aware you know one another. I rarely speak to my girl at work: most of my colleagues would have no idea we are even acquainted. This is how it should be.

8. Pick Your Targets With Care

Standard game advice applies here — don't use this article as an excuse to fixate on one particular girl at work you've been lusting after since the millennium. If you've been working together for more than a few months and there is no flirtatious vibe between you then game over — it's not going to happen. You're better off going to your local club to game there instead. In fact, you should be doing that already. Work game should never be a mainstay, and the only way you're going to get good with women in general is by going out a lot and practicing. You can then brings those skills to the table at the office for the right girls. Ideally you want to work on someone who is new and so hasn't had time to colleague-zone you yet, or better still, someone who works in your building but in an entirely different department. It’s easier to maintain an illusion of mystery that way, and there will be fewer ramifications if things go wrong.

The Misery Of Modern Day Conversation

May 30, 2014 | by alexminus | Link | Original Link

A few months back I noticed my father and his younger brother having a conversation about each other's life. My uncle is a brain surgeon in the US and my father is a first generation immigrant living in a Third World country where he raised a family. They were talking about stuff that I did not find particularly interesting however what struck me was the way the conversation went about.

During the conversation both my father and his brother took long pauses of up to several minutes before speaking about something. They felt no compunction to be funny or to tell a good story or a need to hold the other person's attention. In short, they did not feel any need for validation or approval from the other person. I first thought that it is because they are brothers and have a level of comfort that enables them to do so, but when a mutual friend came along the pattern repeated—there were long pauses that were not at all awkward, most of the talk was mundane, and no one tried to one up the other or cut the other person in the middle of the conversation. This to me was absolutely striking as I have experienced exactly the opposite.

Audition Conversation

Whenever I am around with a friend of mine there is an instinctive need among both of us to talk non-stop, we both fear dead air like the radio business. A common result of the anxiety is that we usually run out of things to talk very quickly and rack our brains at 100 miles per hours to come up with something, which usually leads to exaggeration and padding. I have noticed the same with all of my friends and the situation becomes even more hopeless in front of girls where it is almost like an episode of a cookie cutter talent show with one minute to impress the judges.

In a group, the environment becomes even more desperate with everyone trying to out-talk and outshine the other person. This reminds me of one group discussion sessions in colleges or job interviews. The saddest part in the whole story is that there is no judge or a reward to be given for “winning” the conversation

The tendency of people to lapse into an audition mode as soon as there is a conversation through non-stop talking is what I would call the Audition Conversation. And as with so many other things this is an American export which as the Rome of modern world decides the culture in the provinces. The typical two-minute attention span of an average American is now finding its way all across the world, which has led to people approaching any conversation like an audition where they seek to keep the attention of the other person, rather than have a fulfilling, stress relieving conversation of my father’s generation. Conversations nowadays have the exact opposite effect.

The remedies that I suggest for the above mentioned problem are my own and I have only personal experience to vouch for, these are as follows:

1. Do not talk if you don’t want to

This is not as facile as it seems and the key to mastering it is to practice it. I stopped trying to impress or humor the other person and did not talk when I did not have anything to talk about. It was awkward and tough in the beginning, but you will eventually lose the anxiety.

2. Do not fear the other person leaving

This is a common fear that people have in this insane validation seeking society of ours. I no longer try to drag on a conversation when it gets tiring and usually leave when there is nothing to talk about or I derive no further utility from the company of the other person. This again will be difficult at first, but after a few attempts it will come naturally to you. Beware however that you are organic in your withdrawal and the other person does not feel that you used him as a therapist without hearing his side of the story. The best time to leave is when the conversation becomes stale and you will know when it does.

3. Do not ridicule

Now this one is a little more nuanced than a simple ‘thou shalt not’. Genuine light banter is almost always a part of any healthy conversation and there almost always develops a pecking order in any group which has been together for any length of time. However, my problem is with assholes that deride and mock someone in a group as a method of attention whoring. Yes, you may get a few laughs from people you don't care about but more often than not you will create long-lasting bitterness in the person at receiving end of your mockery. The rule that I follow is simple: only mock people whose mockery you can laugh off. Take special care not to use the mockery method of getting more air time when meeting new people.

4. Do not heckle

Many times there is more than one especially motivated audition contestant. This usually leads to constant heckling, abrupt cuts and an all-out poisonous environment. Let the hecklers sort it out among them and take your leave as soon as the discussion degenerates into a heckling match.

5. Do not exaggerate

This is probably the hardest step to follow. As human being we instinctively crave drama. All of us deep in our hearts want titillation, deeds of valor or anything which would add spice to our mundane life, but the problem is when we make things up to fill that void. This manifests itself most remarkably in our tendency to over-dramatize a mundane event or even a different event that takes place in our lives. You have to stop the urge to exaggerate your deeds and that by itself will take away the validation-seeking mentality which has been bred into us by the pop culture of our times. You also have to let go of the need to cast yourself as the hero or winner of the story or claim a moral victory when the facts suggest clear defeat or surrender. In other words, do not lie to yourself.

These are protocols that I suggest would be useful for the manosphere, especially when the manosphere is taking the leap from internet to the real world and various meet ups are inevitably arranged. In the end I would like to tell all readers that conversations over time will be much less stressful and productive once the audition mentality is gone.

Helpful Tips For Men Who Want To Take Their First Overseas Trip

May 30, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

It has now been more than a month since I returned to the United States from my trip around Europe. In that time, I've had a lot of time to reflect on it and where I'm going with my life. I've written about it in great detail, laid out a plan to leave California, and am taking steps towards building income sources that will give me more freedom.

Hopefully, the posts here at ROK and at my personal blog have inspired you to want to take your own trip around the globe. Since releasing this blog series, I have received numerous comments and emails asking me how I did it. Common questions include:

- How did I get the time off of work?
- Why the countries I chose?
- How much did I spend?
- What are the best resources for cheap shit?
- What are your general tips?
- Does it get lonely?
- What would I do different?

I'm going to answer all of these questions once and for all.

How did I get the time off of work?

I am fortunate enough to work for a company that gives me three weeks (nearly four after other holidays we are given off, such as founder's day and our own birthday) of paid vacation off of a year. For the record, I work as a data systems engineer for a large company. I understand that it will not be that easy for everyone. Firstly, three weeks of vacation is nearly unheard of in today's world. Most people consider it good if they get two weeks off, much less close to four. I'm also lucky enough to have a cool boss who let me take such a large chunk of time off in total.

If your situation is not as good as mine, don't fret. You can still make a world trip possible, but understand that it may just be shorter. Even if your first trip is only a week long, it will at least whet your appetite for more. If you really enjoy it, and want to start traveling more; well, you may have to consider a job move within sectors or perhaps an entire career change.

Why the countries I chose?

Well, when I first planned the trip, I didn't have a girlfriend.

I am very much attracted to white girls, especially the girls of Europe. I find their accents sexy, their generally slim bodies irresistible, and their mannerisms impeccable. My initial plan was to spend a week in Wroclaw and Prague and just try to nail as many chicks as I could during that time frame. My plan was to arrive on Thursday, go out Thursday-Saturday nights, and then try to line up dates for the following week. I had also planned to daygame every day and see where that led me.

Then, though, I decided to be exclusive with one girl of my small harem – and I am still very happy with her. Once we got together, I decided I would shift the focus of trying to bang European sluts and check out a few tourist spots that I had always wanted to see.

So, how should you choose a country? It depends what you want to do. Do you want to nail a bunch of chicks? Well, pick countries that have women you're attractive to. From there, do research on sites like the Roosh V forum, and other expat websites and see what cities have the best situation for your preferences. Only after you have done this should you even consider booking a flight.

How much did I spend?

Here is a breakdown:

- Round trip from California to Europe = $1,300
- Apartments – $50/night (rough estimate) for 14 nights in Europe (I'm excluding NYC because I splurged for a nice hotel) = $700. Note: I had private rooms in every country, but shared an apartment or B&B in Poland, London, and Rome)
- Flights within European countries = $200 (average $50/flight)
- Everything else (food, drinks, public transit, souvenirs, etc.) = $1,200

Grand total = $3,400

That's for two entire weeks. Understand, these are rough estimates. This should show though, that it is really not that expensive to travel overseas for a brief period of time. It is also important to note that I was not trying to budget at all – I was using my credit card very willingly, eating out constantly, spending a lot of money on tour bus passes, souvenirs, and more. In addition, I also waited until the last minute to book some of the flights and apartments.

The $1,200 I spent on "everything else" could easily have been reduced had I given a crap. But I make good money and wanted to enjoy myself, but I recognize not everyone is in the same situation.

Look at it this way, if you can save a couple hundred bucks a month you could easily save enough to take a trip in a year.

You have no excuses not to.

What are the best resources?

- For flights, see Skyscanner.com or Kayak.com – these apply to transcontinental flights, as well inner-Europe flights. I would imagine they are the best resources for flights within other continents, too.
- For apartments, see AirBNB.com or if you prefer, couchsurfing.com
- For picking a city, check out the Roosh forum for detailed logistics and field reports.

What are your general tips?

Firstly, pick a place that you are genuinely excited to see – don't just go somewhere because some other people tell you that you should go there due to the ease of women, nightlife, etc. I had always wanted to go to Europe, much more so than South America or Asia. So, I went.

Secondly, try to get in a position where money is not a huge object. I'm not saying you should be racking up massive bar tabs every night of the week, but you shouldn't feel bad about splurging for a couple of nice meals out or a ticket to see something you are passionate about. Understand, too, that the American dollar goes very far in a lot of places. For example, a three course meal with beers, soups, and wild boar was a $27 for two people in Poland.

Lastly, try to find someone to go with, at least part of the time. It is critical to find someone who has similar interests as you. If you want to game, bring a wingman. If you want to do tourist stuff, bring someone interested in history. While spending time alone on a trip is awesome, it can get lonely and take you into a negative state.

Does it get lonely?

It absolutely does, and anyone who tells you otherwise is simply a liar. Like I said in the previous paragraphs, bring a wingman to help with this. On a positive note, being alone gives you time to self-reflect and to push yourself to the limits.

What would I do different?

There is no way in hell I would visit as many countries as I did in the short period of time.

I would be much more inclined to visit a country for at least a week, maybe two. It takes at least that long to get familiar with the people, to learn the nightlife spots, and to start to feel comfortable.

After all, the whole point of travelling is to push you out of your personal comfort zone and to immerse yourself into other cultures. It is quite literally, a culture shock. This takes time to adapt to, so you won't get a true impression of a country, and whether you'd like to come back, without adequate time to do so.

I would also take trains to opposite countries as opposed to flying. The reason? If you want cheap flights, you better be prepared to be taking off at 6:00am. This means you have to be at the airport by 5:00am, meaning you have to leave for the airport from the city center by 4:00am. The problem is, most public transit doesn't run then. So you're stuck with taxis or shuttles, which can get expensive.

Plus, the time saved is not all that:

- Time to the airport from city center: 1 hour
- Time waiting for flight in the airport: 1 hour
- Time in flight: 2 hours
- Time to get off plane, get baggage, and get to shuttle/taxi/train: 1 hour
- Travel from airport to city center: 1 hour

Total: 6 hours, assuming no delays

You can take a train, which has far less bullshit than flying. You can show up ten minutes beforehand, don't have security to deal with, you'll have plenty of room in your seat, and most trains stations are right in the middle of the city – meaning you're often within walking distance to your apartment or hotel. On top of that, trains are less likely to be delayed than flights, and you aren't forced into taking early times due to price. I definitely would have taken trains from country to country rather than flying, in hindsight.

The website Seat61.com is excellent for train information throughout Europe.

Other than those two points that I mentioned, I wouldn't change a damn thing.

How To Harness The Power of Fear

May 31, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> "Great achievers are driven, not so much by the pursuit of success, but by the fear of failure."
> -Larry Ellison

On April 11 (or April 29) 711 AD, an army of 7,000 soldiers under the command of an aged, 75 year old Berber general named Tariq bin Ziyad, crossed the straits of Gibraltar to land at Mons Calpe, with the help of Julian, a Spanish nobleman who was the Count of Ceuta.

Little did Tariq know that he was destined to be the general responsible for leading the Arab conquest of Visigoth Hispania, and that his name would be etched forever as one of the most important military commanders in Iberian history. Tariq bin Ziyad is known in Spanish history and legend as Taric el Tuerto—Taric the one–eyed—a defect he supposedly made up for by being ambidextrous.

According to legend, Julian's daughter Florinda had been raped by Roderick–the Visigoth ruler of Spain–after she was customarily sent to Roderick's court to receive an education after he came to power. Julian was so incensed that he resolved to have the Arabs bring down the Visigoth kingdom. Accordingly he entered into a treaty with Tariq, to secretly convey the Arab army across the Straits of Gibraltar, as he owned a number of merchant ships and had his own forts on the Spanish mainland.

Tariq had recently been appointed as the governor of Tangiers by Musa bin Nusayr, the Arab governor of North Africa of that time. Julian further encouraged Musa to invade Iberia, telling him of the people's sufferings and the injustice of Roderick, while giving him a cause for conquest by apprising him of the innumerable riches, palaces, gardens and beauties of Hispania that would be found (while secretly being incensed for Roderick's rape of his daughter). Julian even supplied guides for Tariq's army.

After landing his army, Tariq concentrated his troops onto the hill of Mons Calpe, now known as Gibraltar – a Spanish derivation of the Arabic name Jebel Tariq meaning "Mountain of Tariq".

According to legend, he ordered the burning of the ships that had brought his troops from Africa. Tariq remained unmoved by the appeals of his soldiers who wondered as to how they would return.

In reply, he gave an inspirational historic speech to his soldiers to motivate them for battle, from which below is an excerpt:

> "Oh my warriors, whither would you flee? Behind you is the sea, before you, the enemy. You have left now only the hope of your courage and your constancy. Remember that in this country you are more unfortunate than the orphan seated at the table of the avaricious master. Your enemy is before you, protected by an innumerable army; he has men in abundance, but you, as your only aid, have your own swords, and, as your only chance for life, such chance as you can snatch from the hands of your enemy. If the absolute want to which you are reduced is prolonged ever so little, if you delay to seize immediate success, your good fortune will vanish, and your enemies, whom your very presence has filled with fear, will take courage. Put far from you the disgrace from which you flee in dreams, and attack this monarch who has left his strongly fortified city to meet you. Here is a splendid opportunity to defeat him, if you will consent to expose yourselves freely to death. Do not believe that I desire to incite you to face dangers which I shall refuse to share with you. In the attack I myself will be in the fore, where the chance of life is always least."

This emboldened his soldiers enough to rout a more sophisticated and bigger Visigoth force in the Battle of Guadalete, opening the way for the subsequent capture of the Visigoth capital of Toledo by Tariq's irrepressible forces, and the rest is history.

An example replicated through history

Tariq's example had been replicated before and after him by a lot of famous generals to successfully motivate their soldiers to often achieve battle greatness in human history.

In 334 BC, Alexander the Great flamboyantly burned his ships upon arriving in Persia. As his few thousand troops were facing a few hundred thousand of the enemy, one of his commanders asked, "How will we get home?" Alexander replied laconically, "We'll use their ships."

Similarly, in February 1519, Hernán Cortés, already a wealthy Conquistador, accompanied by about 11 ships, 500 men, 13 horses and a small number of cannons, landed in the Yucatan Peninsula in Mayan territory (modern-day Mexico). He wanted to accomplish something that one man could not—to conquer the vast treasures of the Aztec empire.

By landing in Veracruz (modern-day Mexico) with his men, Cortés acted in defiance to the Governor of Cuba of that time (Velazquez), and put himself under the direct command of King Charles of Castile. So single-minded and focused was he on his objective to conquer the Aztec empire, that unfazed by the scarce supplies and rampant disease his men were facing, he uttered three historic words to his men after landing on the shores of Veracruz: "Burn your boats".

Two years later, in August 1521, Cortés led a coalition army of Spanish forces and native Indian warriors and captured the Aztec emperor Cuauhtemoc (Guatemozin) and Tenochtitlan—the capital of the Aztec Empire—to annex the Aztec Empire to Spanish suzerainty.

Survival of the fittest

What was their secret of success? These great men simply used the power of fear as motivation.

Everyone wants to be free of fear. To be free from fear, one must return back to one's comfort zone. The definition of a comfort zone varies for each person. But the most primal of comfort zones for every living being is the security of life.

And the most primal of fears every living being has is the fear of death—a fact well explored by the English philosopher Thomas Hobbes, in his book Leviathan.

Fear generates the adrenaline response of "flight or fight". Eliminate the option of flight, and the only option left is to fight. Whether it may be in the wild or in the domestic world, all creatures struggle the hardest when it comes to their basic survival. Humans are no different, for the desperation and urgency brought by the fear of death, or the will to live, is what often compels humans into superhuman acts of courage, strength and achievement due to the desperation created by that fear. Desperate circumstances call for desperate actions, for one is out of one's comfort zone.

CONQUER, OR DIE. EAT, OR BE EATEN.

Tariq and Cortes pushed their soldiers to their limits, to reject failure, to make them struggle to return back to their comfort zones. What was better than the fear of death without an option of retreat, so as to rid their soldiers of complacency or mutiny, to awaken their spirit of self-preservation which would force them to fight till the very end? By burning their ships, they made it sure to their soldiers that there was only one way to go— to fight to win, to survive.

Fear can create Power

> "Forget safety. Live where you fear to live."
> -Rumi

The transmutation of fear into drive and courage often yields success, power and achievement.

Great entrepreneurs have always used fear as a motivation to smash through obstacles, to drive through the wall which prevented them from achieving success, to motivate their employees similarly like Tariq and Cortes, ultimately creating power and success.

The fear of failure, the fear of living an ordinary complacent life, and the fear of not living up to one's true desires, potential or ideals have all been the motivators for ordinary people to come out of their comfort zones to push themselves beyond their own limits. The fear of losing power, after having achieved it can also create an unstoppable drive to retain it. Motivation without fear often leads to a lack of commitment, ultimately yielding mediocrity.

You cannot toe-dip if you want to achieve success in any endeavor.

Face your fears

One of the reasons for the greatness of the human species is its adaptability to uninhabitable, fearsome conditions by using its intelligence (the highest amongst all species on this planet). Yet the numbing fear of such circumstances has not prevented mankind from successfully adapting to them, and has also led mankind to transmute those fears to not only conquer this earth, but also penetrate into regions of deep oceans and outer space. Mankind could not have discovered the immense hidden power within itself had it chosen to cower in face of those fears.

We've all come a long way, and we've still got a long way to go. On that path full of challenges, it's up to you to rise up to your fears, realize your potential, and eventually achieve greatness.

The Gentleman’s Guide to Bourbon

May 31, 2014 | by Demitrius Rex | Link | Original Link

One often overlooked aspect of a man’s image is his preferred spirit of choice. While this may seem a trivial point of concern, a man’s signature drink speaks volumes about his level of refinement. Don’t believe me? Picture your average guy in a downtown bar. Put him in an expensive blazer and tie with neatly trimmed hair and quality footwear:

Now, place a can of Bud Light in his hand. You just made a judgment about him. Remove the Bud Light and replace it with a martini. Different guy. A fruity red frozen drink in a long-stemmed glass with an umbrella? Different guy again.

A man’s signature drink is both his ultimate accessory and a powerful personal statement. As is the case with icons like James Bond and Don Draper of Mad Men fame, a drink can come to define your character as much as the car you drive or the clothes you wear.

For men seeking to stand out from Vegas bomb shooting, keg standing, beer chugging frat boy crowd, allow me to introduce you to the quintessential man drink: bourbon.

Bourbon has enjoyed a renaissance among men of class and distinction and as a bartender and resident of Kentucky's bourbon country, I am proud to see arbiters of taste learning to appreciate America's native spirit.

Of course, its important for you to know what you are talking about, know how to properly taste bourbon, and to have respect for the craft. Bourbon is distinctly different from other spirits, and knowing those distinctions can be the difference between you looking like a showboating know-nothing or a refined gentleman of great taste and culture.

Take the time to learn what separates grown men from the forever-frat-boys and you'll be more than a few steps ahead.

Know What You Are Talking About

Every bourbon is a whiskey, but not every whiskey is a bourbon. Unlike whiskey, bourbon is regulated by United States Federal Standards that state all bourbons must have the following characteristics in common:

- bourbon must be produced in the United States
- bourbon must consist of no less than 51% corn
- bourbon must be bottled at no less than 80 proof
- and bourbon must be aged in brand new, charred, oak barrels for no less than 2 years.

While all bourbons follow the same four point blueprint, whiskeys are not regulated as strictly. Some whiskeys can be clear and dangerously high in proof, as is the case with "moonshine", or can be created from any mish mash of grain that produce sub par or low proof spirits. But with bourbon, you can trust what's in the bottle.

97% of the world's bourbon comes from the American state of Kentucky. While it is not mandatory that bourbon originate in Kentucky, the state possesses some of the purest and best tasting limestone water – a key ingredient in bourbon distillation – and one of the best climates for grain growth and barrel aging.

Bourbons fall into two categories: “single barrel” bourbons and “small batch” bourbons. Occasionally, a master distiller – the person responsible for the finished product in a bourbon bottle – will discover a particular barrel resting in the perfect location in the facility where bourbon barrels are stored (called a rick house). Deciding that nothing more needs to be done to improve on the whiskey, he will bottle it straight out of the barrel as a single barrel bourbon. On other occasions, he may discover that he can produce a better tasting bourbon by blending several different barrels together, thus creating a “small batch” bourbon.

You will also encounter “wheated” bourbons and “rye” bourbons. These descriptors indicate the second predominant grain in a bourbon’s composition (with corn, of course, being the primary grain). Whereas corn lends a natural sweetness to all bourbons, wheated bourbons are notably smooth, and rye bourbons tend to be on the spicier side.

Knowing the differences between single barrel, small batch, rye, and wheated bourbons will make you more intelligent than most bar patrons, and will improve your ability to select a good bourbon.

Know How To Taste Bourbon

Newcomers to bourbon often complain that all they can taste is alcohol – a sure sign of an unrefined palate. Tasting bourbon, or anything else for that matter, is a skill that must be developed with practice and attentiveness. To truly appreciate bourbon requires that you sniff it, swish it, and of course swallow it.

Seventy-five percent of what we perceive as taste actually comes from our sense of smell – therefore in order to properly taste a bourbon, one must first smell it. Rather than inhaling your whiskey deeply and slowly, use short, quick sniffs. Doing so will improve your ability to perceive the subtle fruit, floral, earth, wood, and candy-like aromas that the untrained taster is unable to recognize.

When it comes to our sense of taste, we generally sense sweetness, saltiness, sour, and bitterness on different parts of the tongue. In order to pick up on these tastes, take a small sip of bourbon and roll it around on your tongue so that a little lands in every part of your mouth (here, we call swishing ones bourbon around in the mouth the “Kentucky chew”).

Bourbon gets its taste from the water, the types of corn and other grains used in the composition of the bourbon, the yeast strains used to ferment the bourbon, and the barrel aging process. Yeast strains from fruit trees and berry bushes gives different bourbons different subtle fruit notes. As bourbon rests in its barrel, the wood absorbs and releases the bourbon repeatedly over the years, giving the bourbon flavors of toasted oak, char, vanilla, and caramel.

Some bourbons are thick and heavy, and sit on your palate like syrup. Others are very light bodied and almost evaporate on your tongue. Pay attention to these as you taste your bourbon.

Finally, swallow and take note of the finish. Is it uncomfortable to swallow, or does it go down smooth? Is the finish bitter, sour, sweet? Does the pleasant aftertaste last long after you have swallowed, or does the taste evaporate quickly? The finish is where a truly excellent bourbon stands out from the crowd, and can be enjoyed long after you have finished your pour.

A fine bourbon will possess both a pleasant aroma, a strong flavor, and an interesting, pleasant, long lasting finish. These are the things you are looking for – not a fancy label or a brand name you read in a mens magazine.

Respect The Craft

When a man of refinement enjoys a bourbon, he is enjoying generations of apprenticeship, years of aging, and decades of carefully honed craftsmanship. As a man who has witnessed the love, dedication to duty, and life force that master distillers have invested in their craft, so help me God if I see any of you dumping coke, sprite, or fruit punch in a fine bourbon, I will slap your glass out of your hand and dismiss you from the bar.

Chugging a fine bourbon is a cardinal sin on par with polluting it with inferior substances. Bourbon is a spirit that is meant to be sipped and enjoyed slowly. Respect the time that it took to make your whiskey by taking the time to truly taste it. Besides, no worthwhile woman will be impressed by your ability to kegstand, shoot, and chug your way to unconsciousness.

As a side note: men will often take shots of bottom shelf bourbon to aid their game – a practice that can lead to regrettable consequences. Let it be known that while some refer to alcohol as a “Liquid Panty Remover”, puke is far better known as “Liquid Loneliness”, and if you are drinking to improve your game, the only thing you will score is a free ticket to Alcoholics Anonymous.

Once you have found a bourbon you truly love (and there is one out there for you), use it to craft a signature classic cocktail that matches your tastes and personality. Classic cocktails like the Old Fashioned, Manhattan, and the Revolver are routinely consumed by gentlemen of substance as crucial mediums for telling their personal story in a split second. These gentlemen know that standing at a crowded bar, your drink order is not merely a declaration of your alcohol conveyance preferences – it's you in a glass.

At Bourbon of the Day, our mission as bourbon brand ambassadors is the transformation of our readers and guests into better bourbon drinkers with reviews, tasting notes, and lifestyle guides.

Revisiting Lorena Bobbitt: Why Would A Woman Cut Off A Man's Penis?

June 1, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Outside the operating room of a sex-change doctor, a tray of penises

There is no blood. This is not Vietnam, Chile or Buchenwald. They were surgically removed under anesthetic. They lie there neatly, each with a small space around it.

The anaesthetic is wearing off now. The chopped-off sexes lie on the silver tray.

One says: I am a weapon thrown down. Let there be no more violence. . .

Sharon Olds, The Gold Cell

On a balmy Virginia evening in the summer of 1993, Manassas law enforcement received a bizarre call from a young woman named Lorena Bobbitt. She told authorities she had used an eight-inch carving knife to sever her husband's penis and had flung it from her car window into an open field in the countryside.

The police responded immediately, arresting Lorena and commencing an intensive search search for the lost penis, which they would eventually find. Bobbitt was questioned and asked why she had committed such a heinous act, stating:

He always have orgasm, I never have orgasm. He's selfish. I don't think it's fair, so I pulled back the sheets and did it.

Was this an open and shut case of sexual frustration resulting in the cleaving of an allegedly selfish penis? No.

Lorena Bobbitt, an Ecuadorian immigrant, met her husband, a marine named John Bobbitt, at a military ball. Their whirlwind romance culminated in their marriage in June 1989. The relationship was known to be incredibly stormy and fraught with jealousy and sexual rancor. John was an irascible alcoholic who alleged put her down constantly and, as per Lorena, was emotionally and physically abusive. Lorena, herself, was known to be a highly jealous woman, famously remarking she would chop his penis off if he ever left her. Neighbors noted the couple frequently engaged in lurid, heated arguments.

On the night of the gender-based genital mutilation, it is undisputed that John had gone out and had drank heavily with friends. What was disputed was what exactly happened once John came home. Lorena claimed he came into the bedroom and forced himself on her. John claimed that he had told her that he wanted a divorce. As with any ugly, tempestuous relationship, frequent threats of abandoning the other spouse was common for the Bobbitt's. It was with this backdrop that this story made international headlines.

After Lorena claimed he raped her, John was arrested on marital rapes charges. His trial was a quiet affair that resulted in his acquittal. When the same female prosecutor brought charges against Lorena for malicious wounding was when the feminist carnival of rage and ignorance commenced.

The sleepy town of Manassas was swarmed by masses of reporters and supporters of Lorena, covering the trial with great aplomb. At the opening of the trial, the prosecutors argued that Lorena did what she because of vengeful anger. Her female defense counselor had a different take:

[My] client was "a battered woman in the classic sense" who acted in self-defense out of an "irresistible impulse" in response to years of physical and mental abuse at the hands of her husband. [I] would describe the Bobbitt's marital relationship as a "reign of terror" punctuated by ongoing violence perpetrated by the husband upon the wife, who was suffering from depression and a legitimate mental disorder caused by the trauma of the ongoing abuse.

Feminists were quick to draw universal conclusions from Lorena's situation. The NYTimes characterized Americans has having "A Million Lorena Bobbitts," alleging rape and domestic abuse was commonplace and institutionalized in American society. Prominent feminists like Ellen Goodman opined that, as per usual, society was erecting straw feminists to attack Lorena Bobbitt. A woman penned this note to the NYTimes:

Prof. Catharine MacKinnon of the University of Michigan and the writer Andrea Dworkin long ago pointed to the institution of marriage as a legal cover for the act of rape and the permanent humiliation of women. Lorena Bobbitt's life has been a poignant instance of that nightmare, which elicited a bold and courageous act of feminist self-defense. As one who recently returned from a conference of feminist activists in Europe, I can assure readers that the Lorena Bobbitt case has galvanized the women's movement worldwide in a way the Anita Hill case never did. No feminist is advocating emasculation as the weapon of first choice. And some women question the political prudence of 'sociosexual vigilantism.' But whatever the judgment of America's patriarchal legal system, Lorena Bobbitt is for most feminists no criminal. She is instead a symbol of innovative resistance against gender oppression everywhere.

The jury for the trial had seven women and five men. It concluded after a couple months, with the jury acquitting Lorena, citing her years of abuse that caused the irresistible impulse that lead her to mutilate her husband's genitals. After the trial, Lorena tried to keep a low profile, even though she was arrested for attacking her mother a couple years later. John tried to cash in on his infamy by filming a couple pornographic films and tried to start a band. Years later, Lorena started a non-profit aimed at helping abused women via family and community means.

As was seen with Clarence Thomas and Anita Hill, only when incensed passions cool off can we truly understand and contextualize a sex-based issue in America. It is undisputed that this wasn't a clear cut case of some sugar-and-spice attractive young woman a victim at the hands of a hateful male, but a relationship born of mutual tension, anger and abuse. Neither party was innocent in any sense of the word. Lorena's defense counsel successfully tried to peddle Lorena as some shrinking violet in the face of brutal male entitlement.

Sure, it is easy to convince a jury of injurious conduct visited upon your client when you blatantly ignore the bad acts and possessive jealousy of your client. It is easy to paint a portrait of marital violence and rape when the oils of that portrait are the alleged and subjective declarations of one party. It is easy to lie when the political winds are at your back.

Lorena, for herself, simply benefited from the hysterical nature of relations between American women towards men at the time. Her life and trial was simply swept up in the greater narrative of male misbehavior as championed by feminists. Her defense counsel's ability to manipulate the jury into only seeing Lorena purely as a victim—instead of a woman in a mutually antagonistic relationship—was just a product of the times.

It could be speculated that Lorena slipped away from the spotlight in the aftermath of the trial because she truly was a victim in the vein her lawyer spun. However, what is most likely is a woman who was so dispossessed because she wasn't held accountable for her actions. She was the one to call the police, not her husband. It wasn't patriarchy, sexism or rape that possessed her to phone the police after she disposed of her husband's penis—it was guilt. She knew what she did was horribly wrong and utterly disproportionate to what her husband did to her. Just because people seek to inure themselves from punishment for their guilty acts doesn't mean they want to live in a world where the guilty walk free.

As for John, he seemed to be some sort interminable drunk who could barely hold down a blue-collar job. He most certainly was acquitted of raping Lorena, but it is more than clear he was one half of a mutually abusive relationship. The tumultuous nature of their relationship was balanced on one hand by his drinking and mostly likely balanced on her end by her green-eyed jealousy. A match made in Hell, indeed.

The aftermath of the media frenzy had feminists licking the gendered blood off their rapiers for years afterwards. While some outlets ran some opinion pieces with some semblance of rationality, the needlessly hysterical nature of the proceedings not only clouded the ability of the public to understand the individual relations between the Bobbitt's but also the relevancy of that relationship to wider society.

As we have seen with the reckless social commentary on Elliot Rodger, American society still cannot understand individual's impulses to violence, much less the social weight to appropriate to said acts. We either get narratives of male oppression to justify female violence or narratives of male privilege to condemn male violence.

Generally, the politicization of what necessarily is an individual's reaction to the perceived or real inequities in their life is atrocious for social analysis or policy. We get outlets regarding male violence an extension of male privilege, but what about female violence? Is female violence simply an individual woman's decision or a reaction to social conditioning?

The critical lack of truly considering the nature and being of female violence is simply part and parcel of how America works. There is little money in truly analyzing female violence, much less truly understanding why women violate men. However, there is money in ratcheting up the sex war between men and women—all the while promising the salve of reconciliation—and deliberately inflaming political passions to advance narratives—narratives that will necessarily favor women as they are providing the click-through's.

That being said, America has a long road to hoe if we ever hope to transcend the muck and sophistry surrounding the violence individuals chose to engage in. I am holding my breath on that ever happening, as the way modern media is constructed 100% militates against that. Rage is too profitable to ever go away as the drumbeat of media coverage. The truth of reality—much less respecting the dignity of the people covered—doesn't sell papers or get incensed viewers clicking a provocative headline.

Presently, Lorena is married with children, working as a hairdresser; John is still some sort of anti-social poser. Their terribly sexually charged relationship that erupted in Lorena trying to divest him of what she saw as the source of his power became a national obsession, much to the glee of feminists. As I noted above, the penis exists as an obsession for feminists as a symbol for male power. One woman's desperate attempt to keep her man in her life became feminist's rallying cry for female oppression at men's hands. It mostly certainly didn't involve that at all, but it shows how little feminists and America understand why individuals resort to such extreme violence to maintain their identity.

America's utter fascination with violence will not go away any time soon, so long as we remain so fixated with those who choose to indulge their rage. After all, if you are reading it, it is for you.

The Rise Of The Brony And The Death Of The American Man

June 1, 2014 | by Phil Elmore | Link | Original Link

The birth of the “Pajama Boy” meme, part and parcel of the debate over the government takeover of healthcare in the United States, underscored an important trend in our nation. This trend was NOT the increasing “juvenilizing” of the American male, a trend that has seen expanding numbers of grown men return home to live with and leach off their parents. Rather, it was the increased AWARENESS of the trend—a growing understanding that “Pajama Boy” and his ilk represent a category of male one will encounter in day-to-day life. But “pajama boy” is a feeler, a tendril, a probing tentacle of a greater mass of cultural foolishness.

The nucleus of the cancer is found in the “brony” phenomenon (and movements like it). The reason it is a problem is because it facilitates the deconstruction of necessary social gender roles. Stated another way, there are (or were) social rules for how men and women are to behave. When men adhere to these rules, when they conduct themselves according to these social guidelines, they enjoy more success overall. They appear and behave as if they are worthy of respect, of treatment as adult men, of female attention, of reproduction and families.

If they fail to conduct themselves according to these rules, which have been established over centuries of social interaction, males become “unworthy” in the minds of other adults and in the perception of potential female companions. To be branded unworthy is a self-fulfilling, self-perpetuating cycle of behavior, for once rejected by the sphere of adults, adult work, adult tasks, and adult responsibilities, the “juvenilized” male retreats into a world of fantasy, play, and diversion. Cultural analogs can be found in the “grass eaters” of Japan, to cite just one example. These are males who have given up on female companionship, on productive work, and on adult responsibility, not because (as they may or may not claim) they are happier that way, but because, having forsaken adult rules of behavior and conduct, they have found that no social community of adults (or adult women) will tolerate them.

Giving Up Childish Things

First Corinthians 13:11 reads, “When I was a child, I spoke and thought and reasoned as a child. But when I became a man, I gave up childish things.” It doesn’t matter if you are a Christian, an atheist, or an agnostic; this verse is the centuries-old acknowledgment of a societal norm that itself developed over centuries. Children grow into adulthood. Adulthood requires a casting off a childish things and ways.

What characterizes children? They are impulsive. They are irresponsible. They break the rules and then try to avoid the consequences for their misbehavior. Left to their own devices, they will not be productive. They do not or cannot support themselves. We accept these traits as perfectly normal for childhood. A six-year-old who was obsessed with the practical realities of starting a business or overly concerned about questions of personal honor would be either a genius or a psychopath. Adults do not expect children to behave according to adult rules. The process of raising children is the process of introducing them to grown-up responsibilities and rules of behavior on a gradual basis, encouraging them to drop “childish things” and childish ways in favor of responsibility, productivity, and maturity.

What Characterizes An Adult Man?

What characterizes a functional adult and, in this specific case, an adult male (a man)? A man takes responsibility for himself, his well-being, and his sustenance. He engages in productive work to his own benefit and in support of his family (if he chooses to start one). He understands that a man is judged socially by how well he keeps his word and how consistently he meets his obligations—in other words, he understands and operates according to personal honor. He is capable of defending himself in a sometimes dangerous world and understands this “warrior” function of the human male. He takes pride in himself and in his possessions and in the upkeep of both. These qualities make him “worthy” to the human female. When he displays these qualities he is understood to be a worthwhile investment by the opposite sex. He enjoys the corresponding attentions of women to the degree that he demonstrates his value.

These are arguably subjective guidelines, but they are also readily observable as cultural facts. This is how adulthood and childhood work and compare. This is what one observes when one takes the time to analyze either in the context of modern society and its evolution over thousands of years. But to acknowledge these realities is also to acknowledge a cultural blight growing within contemporary culture. “Pajama Boy” is a waypost on that highway to pussified male hell. The fast lane on that route to juvenile waste could be no better represented than by the "brony" phenomenon. We will therefore refer specifically to this particular tendril of cultural blight (while understanding that many others exist).

It is not normal for a grown American male to celebrate, exult in, and proudly promote a love of entertainment intended for little girls. There may well be functioning adult men out there, particularly fathers, who aren't bothered by (and who may even be entertained, in passing) watching programs like "My Little Pony." A rational adult man does not tell the world how much he loves My Little Pony, however. He does not indulge in this kind of childish foolishness for two reasons. First, this is entertainment very obviously intended for children and females, geared toward female sensibilities, and to revel in it betrays a lack of manliness on his part. Second, over-indulging in children's entertainment is a diversion that facilitates shirking adult responsibility.

The Wretched Man-Children Of Popular Culture

In other words, a brony is a wretched, immature male who engages purposefully in behavior and entertainment that should have been left behind when he transitioned from childhood to manhood. His devotion to a children's television show calls into question his ability to function as an adult and to adopt and maintain adult responsibilities. All adults are, wisely, suspicious of age-contemporaries who exhibit inordinately immature personality traits. If you work in an office where the shirt and tie are the norm, you don't give big projects or bigger responsibilities to the guy in the pink "Friendship is Magic" t-shirt. If you are looking for an adult to babysit your children, you do not select someone your children consider a playmate, who shares their interests and dresses as they do. If you are a woman selecting a mate, you do not choose a "man" who behaves and comports himself as an overgrown child, an immature man-baby exulting in entertainments appropriate to preteens and tweens.

A superb example of how this attitude affects one's function as an adult was recounted recently by Aja Romano in The Daily Dot. On 24 April, 2014, Romano reported on a disturbing incident at the Bay Area Brony Spectacular Con, described as a fandom convention for the television show, "My Little Pony: Friendship Is Magic." Staffers at a vendor table for Sacramento's "Sac Anime" reportedly struck up a friendship with an 11-year-old girl. When that girl reported that a grown man in a brony t-shirt had tried to grab her and take her to his hotel room, the staff of Sac Anime apparently allowed the girl to hide in their midst.

Supposedly the staffers felt they were "prepared to physically attack the human trashheap [should he try] to [mess] with her"—as if a grown man and would-be kidnapper would be at all dissuaded by the bared teeth and ridiculous posturing of a group of anime fops who cater to a customer base of stunted, sexually confused child-men. Worse, the staff of Sac Anime never alerted security to the presence of a potential sexual predator in their midst, apparently because they felt their readiness to leap upon the brigand in question was sufficient to resolve the situation.

Bronies, Furries, And Their Ilk Are Children, Not Men

This is a single example among many you'll find wherever this type of juvenilized mind congregates. This is the type of thinking that children exhibit. An adult would alert security and the authorities because an adult would understand the dangers. A grown, functioning man, if alerted to the presence of the predator in question, would likely attempt to apprehend that predator and hold him for the authorities, on the idea that this is what grown men do to keep safe the public at large. Children, by contrast, believe they and they alone are sufficient to contain such a situation. Children misunderstand the danger to the public and don't bother to alert anyone else to what they perceive as their localized drama. Children are more concerned with telling the Internet about how brave they were in protecting their new friend. They want the story and the credit that comes with telling it.

Children aren't concerned with overarching issues affecting people in general, because children are self-centered. We expect them to be because that is a natural facet of their mental and emotional development at that age. It is these qualities that must be discarded as children mature.

The brony and countless other related indulgences—"furries" again spring readily to mind—represent the arrested development, the derailed maturation, of the American male. A male who embraces childish things, who cannot adopt adult dress and behavior, is telling you he is not ready or able to accept adult responsibilities. A population comprising such incapable, weak-minded man-babies would collapse in short order. As our own culture sags under the weight of these useless Pajama Boys, it is no wonder, then, that our own foundations are beginning to show serious cracks. The brony and his ilk are the horsemen of an adult apocalypse. The brony's rise presages the extinction of the rational, responsible, grown-up men who once formed the backbone of our society.

Your Time Is More Important Than Her Feelings

June 2, 2014 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

If you're the type of red pill man who doesn't abhor the idea of a steady relationship, and you haven't spent the past few years in a coma or in prison, you've likely come to the realization that there are, in effect, next to zero women out there worth considering for anything more than a casual fuck-buddy arrangement at best, a one night stand on average, or a "Jesus Christ, get me away from this bitch" at worst. This is especially true with the biggest entitlement queens of them all: American women, with an emphasis on American white women.

Return of Kings publishes a lot of great articles about getting laid and the variety of tools and techniques at your disposal to do so. However, sometimes your own sanity takes precedence over the desire for sex. This article will focus on some of the different types of conversations and situations that I have encountered on first dates, in social settings and in the early stages of courtship, and on the kind of mindset that is compulsory when dealing with the modern American female in 2014. I will also provide some ideas you can use to make an escape when you deem it necessary. Because sometimes this shit just isn't worth it.

"Oh my God, I love dogs! I have a Pomeranian named Shasta! I have a bunch of pictures of her on my phone—wanna see them?"

Do you want to see 148 pictures of some little faggot dog wearing a pink sweater?

Me neither.

If you entered a relationship with this woman, would you want to be seen walking down the street with little Shasta? What about scooping up little Shasta's turds with a plastic poop bag on your hand in front of some hot chicks? Or worse yet, what about a group of construction workers who, incontrovertibly, will be speculating amongst themselves about how often you allow random men to diddle around with your butthole? What about driving around while little Shasta takes a piss in your car?

I sure as hell won't allow that to be me and I'm willing to bet that you won't allow it to be you either. That's the territory of a bitch-boy: a man so grateful to be getting a taste of pussy that he would gladly be seen with a leashed-up wingless fruit bat wearing a dog collar and a cardigan. Fuck that guy. What about going for the one night stand? You can't take her to your place because Shasta will need to go potty and mommy can't be gone all night. Do you want to go back to her place and have to play with little Shasta and listen to your potential one-nighter give baby talk to a small dog like it's a real human being? Of course you don't. Masculine men don't own, walk or even go so far as to pretend to like diminutive ankle-biting rodents masquerading as canines.

It's time to get a move on.

Solution:

Say the following: "You know, I would love to see those pics of Shasta. But you see, I have this big crack on my ass and I don't know what to do about it. I'm going to head to the emergency room to get it checked out—nice meeting you." With a bewildered expression she will tilt her head sideways as you walk away… and I'm not talking about the dog here.

"So, Lisa was saying that you were seeing an Asian girl, you got yellow fever now? Is that, like, your thing now or something?"

No, I have 'dealing with women that aren't like you' fever. This is the same type of single American white woman that will give you dirty looks if she sees you in public with a woman of another ethnicity or, as in this scenario, go so far as to make a snide comment if she learns that you date outside your race. The fact that just last year she was making regular trips to long bone Jerome's house for some snake is of no consequence to her. That exchange program in Spain where Roberto and Javier gave her an unprotected pig roasting is also, now, somehow irrelevant. Remember that for you it's yellow fever, or you must have a fetish, or you have a little dick or you're an anime porn addict. For her, though, she was just getting it out of her system, experimenting, trying something new and having some fun.

Solution:

Pinpoint a few of her flaws. Remember, this is an American woman—she has more problems than a skydiving emu. Figure it out and then light her up. With this particular woman I went the subtle route (it was a social engagement and I was politely asked by the host to be somewhat nice to people). Start by alternating your glances between her eyes, stomach and tits, and then say the following: "Well, for an Asian girl she had an incredible rack. You know, Asians get a bad rap for being flat-chested all the time, but this girl? God damn! Certainly, being a slender size 1 helped to make them look even bigger too."

Want to face derision from single American white women? Date an Asian. Want to become the anti-Christ? Date a thin Asian with bigger boobs than your average American white woman (fat white titties don't count). This particular American woman was slightly above normal height and just north of about 130 lbs. with a bust size on the smaller side of average. Needless to say she went away and, for some odd reason, felt no need to talk to me ever again.

However, this didn't stop her from going around and telling anyone who would listen about how I'm such a huge asshole. In that case, you simply up the ante by telling everyone that she's a racist and that you have no interest in any kind of discourse with such an individual. Be sure to drive home the point that anyone exhibiting such close-minded bigotry got exactly what they deserved. Anyone that disagrees with your position will be at risk of being labeled racist themselves, and nobody wants that.

The smell of her pussy makes your eyes water.

So, there you are. You've put in the effort throughout the evening and are getting to the good part with a particularly attractive American woman. Everything is progressing quite nicely, and you're sliding her panties off… then, you catch a whiff. The famous movie quote, "You're gonna need a bigger boat," would not have been necessary if the original vessel had been coated in a thin layer of her vaginal juices—even Jaws wouldn't fuck with that, and would have been off the coast of South Africa eating seals by daybreak.

Are you desperate to the point that you would stick your pecker in something that smells so foul? Certainly not. The possibility of an STD or some sort of other infection is very real. The majority of women out there have the presence of mind to understand their own bodies and execute the proper hygiene regimen to prevent such a situation. There's no need to hang around with a woman that doesn't fall within this group.

So what's a man to do?

You know it's time to bail out with the quickness, but how to do it?

Solution 1a:

If you don't care about her feelings: "Well I don't know if you're aware of this, but I'm pretty sure your pussy could be used as bait to catch Alaskan crab. I'm out of here."

Solution 1b:

If you care slightly about her feelings: "Sorry, but I've got work early in the morning and this isn't happening tonight. I need to get going."

Solution 1c:

If you actually care about her feelings: “Listen, I was recently seeing someone that I had strong feelings for and I really don’t think I’m ready for this right now. You’re fantastic, and if I was in a better emotional state I would be really into this, but I need to lick my wounds a little longer. My apologies.”

The thought of going with 1c is vomit inducing. Of course, solution 1a is the way to go. Within five minutes of your departure she’ll be scrubbing down her cooch with a Scotch-Brite pad and a combination of isopropanol alcohol and her own tears. At a minimum the next guy will thank you for it and, seeing as this is an American woman, the next guy will probably be one of your friends.

“While I don’t agree with everything about the movement, I can say that I identify as a feminist.”

Oh, here we fucking go. This is the deal breaker of all deal breakers, gentlemen. In the real world it’s actually rare to encounter a true to-the-core feminist. You know: the obese, tatted, short-purple-haired losers with black rim glasses and IQ’s of about 105 (that think they’re in the 130’s because they went 40k into debt for a degree that qualified them to work at the mall).

However, you will regularly meet ample quantities of American women that lean towards the ideology with less conviction but are still attached to the principles enough to cause a man potential agony. These women must be avoided at all costs. False rape accusations, using the system against you and simply being an all-around insufferable bitch are just surface scratchers for what this beast is capable of. Show this one absolutely no mercy and ensure that she spends the remainder of the evening snuggled up with her precious felines.

Solution:

Say the following: “Well, I can say that I identify as a man that’s getting the fuck away from you then.” Also, feel free to leave her strong independent ass with the bill. No, not half of it, all of it—drinks are on her for the night. Hearing the words “I’m a feminist” in any way, shape or form should result in you making a beeline for the door with your car keys in hand. Consider it a matter of principle.

Also, just in case she decides to make a scene in front of the other patrons as you’re making your exit, turn around and address everyone and say, “Well, how long would you stick around if your date just told you she contracted AIDS from a gangbang?” Then continue leaving. Sure, it’s a lie… but who gives a shit? The whole establishment thinks a feminist has AIDS—I see no problem with that.

In Closing

The point of all of this is to demonstrate that you don’t have to put up with anything that you feel is beneath you. If you’re like me and you don’t want to spend 10 minutes having an annoying conversation about some little shit-eater dog, then don’t. If you don’t feel like sticking around to buy a self-proclaimed feminist drinks, then leave. Women are more than happy to flake out, stop texting, make excuses and lie with no regard for anyone but themselves. Common decency is not so common in this day and age.

Gentlemen, there are no dating rules anymore. There is no etiquette and you don’t owe anyone a fucking thing. If you’re interacting with a woman and she exhibits deal breaker traits or says things that you find unacceptable then call her on her shit in devastating fashion and leave, or just leave without saying anything. It’s your call. Admittedly, my approach is not for everyone–I simply don’t give a shit. However, I understand that plenty of men do care to some degree, and that’s completely fine. Whatever your approach, this simple fact remains: there is no need to waste even one extra minute of your precious time on someone who doesn’t deserve it. There is only one person in charge of the choices you make, the actions you take, and the happiness you create. That person is you.

Furthermore, understand that your actions don’t require an explanation and that you don’t have to remain silent. You don’t have to pretend that you’re having a good time if you’re not. You don’t have to tolerate insolence just to be nice or because it’s what’s socially expected of you because, after all, what’s socially expected of American women these days? You don’t have to pretend that it’s okay when a woman says she can’t cook, doesn’t clean, spends the date paying more attention to her phone than to you, has thousands of dollars in credit card debt or won’t shut the fuck up about her ex—because none of that is okay. Time is not a renewable resource and your free time should be spent doing exactly what you want to do, when you want to do it and in the company of people you want to do it with. And even though your money is a renewable resource, it should never be squandered on the undeserving.

Last—but certainly not least—never, under any circumstances, sell yourself out for a piece of ass. Only the weakest of men jump through hoops, pander and move mountains just for a minuscule slice of the mediocre pussy pie. Why sell your soul if there’s so little to buy? I can guarantee you that when you deservedly embarrass, challenge or temporarily destroy a woman’s self-esteem she will never forget you. All those guys that just smiled, laughed at her bullshit and kissed her ass? They’ve all been forgotten and written off, but that asshole that didn’t hesitate to lay forth a strong dose of stone-cold reality and didn’t make any apologies for preserving his own interests? For better or worse, that’s one bastard that she will remember for a long time to come.

The Lives Of Great Men As Moral Instruction

June 2, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

There is no better school of instruction for our own lives than in learning about the lives and trials of great men. By following their experiences, struggles, and adversities, we can in some way calibrate our own responses to life's inevitable whirlwinds. The reward is made even greater when the narrator of such biographies is an urbane, classically-trained rhetorician whose primary focus is on the moral development of his readers. Just such a teacher is Plutarch.

Plutarch (c. A.D. 45- c. 120) was a Greek writer who received the best education possible in his day; he served in several official posts, and received official recognition from the Roman emperors Trajan and Hadrian for his extensive writings. Plutarch is primarily famous for his Parallel Lives, which is a compendium of comparative biographies of famous Greek and Roman statesmen. His other major work, the Moralia, is a collection of essays, dialogues, and observations on various moral and philosophical subjects. Both of these works make for wonderful reading, but I want to focus on the Parallel Lives here, as it is more likely to be of interest to the average reader.

There is no other work quite like Plutarch's Parallel Lives. He must have had to collate and synthesize dozens of original sources, much of it in a language that was not native to him. Some of what we know about major figures of antiquity appears in no other work than in his. Plutarch's main motivation was to examine what factors made great men great, and how the average man could employ those virtues. He pairs an eminent Greek with an eminent Roman (choosing figures with lives that roughly had some things in common, such as Theseus and Romulus, Lycurgus and Numa Pompilia, Solon and Publicola, etc.), and outlines the life of each figure. Then, in a conclusory essay, he compares both figures and tells us the key virtues of each, and why he believes one was better than the other. This comparative technique suits his purposes admirably: it brings into sharp focus the qualities, decisions, and actions that made each great man great.

Another virtue of the Parallel Lives is the quality of the writing. There is here no turgid prose, no boring digressions: every sentence counts, every paragraph sparkles with anecdotes, explanations, and an epigram that drives home the author's point. This is history presented as a moral exercise. We can judge the quality of the Parallel Lives by their unbroken popularity down the centuries. They were cherished by Renaissance humanists, plundered for plots by Shakespeare, pored over hungrily by Montaigne, and beloved by Napoleon. Scarcely has any one book so instructed statesmen over such a long period.

The most important quality of the Lives—what gives it its charm–is that Plutarch is writing as a teacher of young men. He is concerned with our development and sincerely wants to be our guide. In his day, the education of young men was concerned as much with the development of character and morals as with the imparting of knowledge. (This focus, of course, is sorely missed today). Modern biographies do not normally provide this sort of thing: they are more concerned with cluttering their narratives with footnotes and scholarly apparatus than with helping us become better men.

There are many versions of the Lives in print, and choosing which one can present something of a problem and a compromise. Plutarch's original plan was to have the reader work through each pairing together, and then read his comparison essay at the end. Unfortunately, the Lives stretch through several thick volumes, and many readers will not want to wade through them all. Buying the entire set is not practical for most (although recommended). Some readers will only want to read about Greeks, some only about Romans. Editors over the years have often chopped up the Lives in various ways, which does violence to Plutarch's literary plan and pedagogical purposes. From examining several editions of the Lives, my opinion is that retaining some of Plutarch's comparative pairing scheme is vital. I like the Penguin editions the best: the editors group the biographies into periods of time and by nation, but still keep the best comparative essays.

Some Final Comments

I want to close this article by saying a few related words. My desire to recommend Plutarch's Lives to our readership grew out of some recent events in the news that all readers will by now be familiar with. It occurred to me that now, more than ever, young men are in critical need for instruction, guidance, and self-improvement. Never before have so many been so lost, and so in need of guidance. The quest to enrich, ennoble, and improve our young men has become, to use the words of H.G. Wells, "a race between education and catastrophe."

Frequent readers will note that I have long emphasized historical and philosophical topics as ways to make larger points. There is a deliberate reason for this. By invoking the past, I have tried to remind readers of the glories of leadership, character, and masculine virtue that can change their lives. By bringing up the past, a time before masculine virtues were shamed and punished, we remind readers of the glories that will be theirs in the future if they follow the right paths. We want to inspire, uplift, and ennoble you. "The mind is not a vessel to be filled," says Plutarch, "but a fire to be kindled."

We at Return of Kings have been unapologetic and relentless in our quest to improve our readers' lives with actionable, specific advice and wisdom. Sadly, there are forces which do not want to see our young men improve themselves: these forces seek to emasculate our young men, to turn them into compliant hewers of wood and drawers of water for their ideologically driven overlords. One can even imagine a future where classical knowledge will be driven underground, purged from schools, or bowdlerized, as not being in tune with modern political correctness. The degradation of humanistic learning has come as a direct result of the feminization of society. We cannot permit this to happen. The commissars of modern culture don't want you to know too much about history, about how things were like in previous eras. This would invite uncomfortable questions, and uncomfortable comparisons with the sorry state of masculinity today.

Of our detractors, not one commenter—not one—has ever mentioned our focus on improving the minds and bodies of our readers. But we go about our work regardless. We know our readers better than they. We have lived their same struggles, hungers, and secret aspirations, and always viewed the inner longings of our brothers with patience and understanding. We know that many of our readers, in this era, are being allowed to flounder helplessly in a wilderness not of their own choosing, with their masculine potential denigrated or scorned by a media elite that values only you-go girlist frivolities and feminist dialectic. This tide will be reversed. And we will forever remain passionately dedicated to restoring the lost glory that once was ours.

Why Abortion Shouldn't Be Taken Lightly

June 2, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

A woman in New Jersey recently made headlines with her recent abortion or, more specifically, her desire to put it on film:

> Emily Letts, a counselor at a New Jersey abortion clinic, decided to film her own abortion and post it on YouTube as a form of positive inspiration to women who are contemplating having the procedure but worry that they might feel guilty afterward.
> Letts has no such guilt. She recalls the procedure with fondness. She even describes it as "birth-like," and said it made her feel good, just like giving birth would.
> Letts, whose job involves encouraging women to have abortions, sees her own abortion as an entirely positive experience, and hopes the video will prove to be both instructional and morally persuasive. She feels better about herself every time she watches the video, according to Cosmopolitan.
>
> "Still, every time I watch the video, I love it," she wrote. "I love how positive it is. I think that there are just no positive abortion stories on video for everyone to see. But mine is."
> The disturbing video has been viewed 10,000 times on YouTube. During the three-minute procedure, she repeatedly tells herself how lucky she is. She also hums to herself.
> After the abortion is over, she says, "Cool. I feel good."
> Letts writes that having an abortion and giving birth produce similarly happy feelings. Despite aborting her child, she kept the sonogram.

This incident has highlighted for me a key pitfall of the pro-choice perspective: its potential to desensitize us to the loss of human life.

It is not uncommon, for example, to hear those in the pro-choice camp compare the act of abortion to masturbation, arguing that men who oppose abortion ought to feel similarly distraught over the loss of their ejaculate in the wake of a masturbatory act.

This is folly, of course. When those men masturbate, they release individual sperm cells. The equivalent to such an act would be a film of a woman disposing of individual egg cells.

When an individual egg cell and an individual sperm cell combine, however, the result is the beginning of a human life cycle (the formation of an embryo which, after 9 weeks, becomes a fetus). An abortion is an act designed to exterminate that life. This is a fundamentally different from the act of masturbation or egg harvesting because you are no longer dealing with individual sperm or egg cells (which, on their own, can never produce a human life). A human embryo/fetus is a different thing altogether—it is a human life. The “abortion is just like masturbation” argument is disingenuous in its failure to just accept what abortion really means.

An abortion is a concerted effort to end a human life at its very earliest stages. You are not eliminating a bunch of cells—you are eliminating a developing human being. That is what it is. Those who adopt a pro-choice perspective are within their rights, but they need to be honest about what that means. One need not exaggerate it, or downplay it, or make false comparisons to utterly incomparable acts: just accept it.

When we accept abortion for what it is, we can truly see the madness in the action of women like Emily Letts, who wish to downplay the significance of the act. There is nothing “cool” about the act of extinguishing a human life at its very earliest stages. It is not “fun”, “positive” or “birth like”. Abortion is a necessary evil at best, an option to be chosen in the face of very poor alternatives that can be avoided in no other way.

A pro-choice perspective that encourages the legality of abortion for these pragmatic reasons is not out of line, but a pro-choice perspective that seeks to promote abortion by (a) pretending that abortion is something other than what it is, (b) de-emphasizing the value of human life, or (c) all of the above is ignorant at best and downright malicious at its worst. When we encourage abortion, we can’t forget the seriousness of the consequences of that act: it may be necessary to suffer them in many cases, but they can’t ever be taken lightly.

Again, none of this is to say that people should never support the right of women to terminate a pregnancy. There are some good arguments behind the pro-choice position and I understand them. The tolerance for abortion as a necessary evil, however, should not ever be mistaken for or molded into the promotion of the act as an ideal outcome. Abortion is not a desirable outcome and should never be treated as such: in an ideal scenario, the act would be legally tolerated, but also very rare. Women like Emily Letts who forget this must never be taken seriously.

What Real Equality Looks Like

June 2, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

The meddlesome government in the UK recently passed a law banning insurance companies from giving women cheaper car insurance. Although the stereotype of the dithery woman driver at an intersection is beyond doubt, it's the young tear-away males who have more car accidents. I can attest to this, having rolled a car the day I passed my driving license. Luckily I was on a long farm driveway, so the police never got involved.

It would seem fair enough for insurance companies to reward women, who drive safely and statistically have fewer bad accidents, whilst being wary of men under 30, who statistically have more accidents. Insurance companies are using nothing more than basic market forces. Socialist governments are very fond of banning that kind of thing, so what we have is the drive for equality starting to catch up with the females. You cannot ultimately have your cake and eat it. Suddenly car insurance premiums for women leapt 30-50% overnight.

The insurance companies fought back against the legislation and now simply reward safe drivers and those who take advanced courses and have a clean record. The person's sex is no longer a consideration—not that it's an invalid one really, but big brother has spoken.

Are we all drone worker bees?

Corporations like Google frown upon staff dating each other, which is understandable as it's counterproductive to the dry corporate attitudes needed to get work done, but it is also inhuman. Founder Sergio can confirm this, as he left his wife for the chick that markets Google Glass. (She's 13 years younger and pretty cute for a corporate type—the two-way google glass sex tape could be an industry first). If the bosses can't stick to the rules, then what chance do the rest of the hive have?

The drive for so called equality is an absurd one and if taken to its logical conclusion will result in many privileges women enjoy being curtailed. The last time anyone got the door for a lady was probably pre 1970s, yet half the female work force only go into the office to find a husband. If they can't date co-workers, what are they there for? Thus we see the flip side of equality starting to crimp the women's standing in society. Equality emasculates men and defeminizes women. Let's now think into what real equality would look like.

No more make up

There's no particular reason why females should come into work all daubed up in a half inch of war paint. It's tribal, insecure, unnecessary, and representative of a double standard.

No more silly shoes

Why should women get to wear high heels and platform shoes? A man wearing such garb would be considered odd, unless he had some physical impediment. Brightly colored, overly casual, sexy, flirtatious footwear is unnecessary at best and often times completely impractical.

No more long hair

A few outlier males in the tech department may be tolerated with a ponytail, but as a rule men are expected to keep their hair 'short back and sides', especially if they plan to represent the company to the public or climb the ranks. Why should women be treated any differently. I wonder if the females in military combat roles will be permitted to sport the latest beehive doo under their blast helmets?
"In coming RPG – hang on, let me just tie my bangs out of the way".

No hair dye

Most men are happy to age with grace—there is no need for anyone apart from actresses to slather their hair with carcinogenic chemicals just to impress others.

No more silly clothes

A court room or board room is one of the most formal settings and yet women seem able to wander into work, adorned in brightly colored, figure hugging clothes, loose fitting open neck shirts and all manner of relatively informal garb. A basic suit and tie will be fine from now on. Wendy Davis pictured below is a Senator for Texas. Imagine if a male rocked into the Senate looking like that.

No more jewelry

A man who wears more than a basic wedding or signet ring, is already moving into the realm of gangster or rockstar. Why would women be permitted into work places dolled up like they are attending the shaman's war dance? Nevermind bead necklaces, earrings have to go as well. I didn't know Nancy Pelosi was running for Senate comedian.

No maternity leave or babies

All in the name of equality of course. Why should a company consider a woman any differently than they consider a man? Squeeze it out and get back to work.

No allowances for female-specific health issues

No headaches or period pains. PMS is not an excuse. Women are often seen getting the benefit of the doubt in areas concerning kids, family and their personal health. Now that we are all equal this must obviously stop.

No female issues and no women's rights

Since we're all equal now, a woman can never be given the benefit of the doubt or held in higher regard than any man. Even the most hardened feminist, bleating for equality ultimately shoots the entire movement in the foot.

No frilly underwear—sports bras only

Sexy garb is not only impractical and distracting it can be taken as a sexual attention grab. There's no reason for women to use anything other than totally practical under garments. Plain Jane for everyone.

What's more is that perhaps it's the women that have been conned more than the men forced to tolerate it all. We can continue the list to the point of absurdity to see how real equality would look like:

- No special female politicians (minister for women etc.).
- No female categories in sports. You compete according to your skill set not your genitalia.
- No unilateral divorce.
- No women's only gyms, schools, prisons, clubs, etc.
- No ladies night, or easy entrance to bars and clubs. We're all just punters now.
- No using female head games, emoting or sexual leverage.
- No gender-specific bathrooms or changing rooms.
- No quotas for female staff. People are hired according to raw talent.
- No allowance for females being physically weaker.
- No special quotas for schools and universities. The best students move ahead on their performance.

Finally of course we should consider roles in which men take a far greater risk and endure harsh working conditions. All in the name of equality, men should demand equal numbers of females in dangerous and arduous industries such as mining, oil, container shipping, construction, and deep sea fishing while greater numbers of men relax in part-time jobs at salons, spas, daycare centers and in charity work. Pre-schools are almost all female staffed, because what mother would want to leave her 3 year old daughter with a strapping, muscly, bearded man? She can think that way, but it's not equal opportunity employment, is it?

No one would want to live in this ridiculous world

Not even the most butch feminist would agree with this list, even though in truth it represents the most correct version of equality. The only other option is for men to start rebelling and dressing up for work like Keith Richards or David Bowie.

Masquara, eyeliner, bandanas, headbands, loose open neck shirts, crazy platform and high heeled shoes, wild haircuts, dyed and permed hair, loads of jewelry and flamboyant garb. We can roll up to work looking like a cross between Ali G, Mystery on the hunt for a threesome and an extra from Hunger Games.

Just Another Day In The Office

Both worlds are cartoon and ridiculous

By exaggerating and extrapolating the current trends we get a clear picture of how society needs "a cold hard slap in the face with a wet fish". Ultimate equality will see women losing far more than men, while the current state of affairs is a botched job of double standards, gas-lighting and a few ugly women who'd rather be men spoiling it for the majority of feminine women. What it also does is spoil femininity for the real males who can handle the pressure of being a man and enjoy having a real woman in their life.

Equality is a drive towards the lowest common denominator. It's not the averaging to the median that politicians use to sell the concept with. The farce of communism tried to create an equal market place for everyone, a society that is absolutely fair and unbiased. A few hundred million murders, and seventy years later, what they ended up with was no market place at all; having fallen to the lowest common denominator, where no one had any incentive to be anything other than the most average sociopathic version of themselves. It stands to reason that if you inhibit the high fliers of society and cut off that side of the curve, you do not land at the average of what you originally had. Rather you reduce the overall average to a much lower level.

It only needs one genius to write an amazing symphony or produce a new piece of technology that makes life better and more beautiful for everyone. As Tyler mentions in Fight Club:

> "We've all been raised on television to believe that one day we'd all be millionaires, and movie gods, and rock stars. But we won't. And we're slowly learning that fact. And we're very, very pissed off."

But we don't need to be pissed off. We can just adore and appreciate the men who break the envelope and enjoy the world around us for what it is. We can adore and enjoy the beautiful feminine women.

Equality or jealousy?

A free system gives opportunities for great men (and women) to make the world a better place for those on the lower side of the average curve. That has to be better than dragging everyone over to the low side and imposing unnatural rules which end up ruining it for everyone.

What To Do If You Have A Worthless Degree

June 3, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

Arguably the most despicable and disgusting transgression against the youth of America is the purposeful and intentional brainwashing of said youth by the education industry. From kindergarten on you are indoctrinated to believe education is the key to success and conditioned to spend anything it takes to get a degree in whatever your heart desires. Teachers, counselors, administrators, deans, and professors perpetuate this scam by telling you what you want to hear, ensuring that when the time comes you are more than willing to take on a 6 figure debt load, the proceeds of which you mindlessly hand over to your indoctrinators posing as professors. In exchange you get to enjoy the "college experience," become a "well-rounded person," and after forfeiting 4-8 years of your youth you get a piece of paper that says you are indeed an educated person.

Then the real world hits.

Unbeknownst to you, once you graduate from college you are of no use to the education industry. They've already sucked $150,000 in property taxes out of your parents, and an additional $150,000 out of you for a college education. You no longer have any financial blood these education vampires can suck out. Ergo, you are dropped like a used hooker and for the first time in your life you do not have the social, financial, mental, emotional, or institutional support of a school or college. Your full time job since you were 5 is gone, and with it your social structures and the regimen that provide you some (albeit ultimately fabricated) purpose in life.

Making matters worse is your degree is likely worthless. You did precisely what your educational indoctrinators told you and majored in what your heart wanted. Unfortunately, this means degrees like English, Philosophy, Art, Sociology and other humanities degrees that may have cost your $150,000 to obtain, but do nothing to boost your salary above $8/hour. You do some quick math and start to realize the severity and the financial impossibility of your situation. You don't even make enough money to pay interest on your debts and if you look far enough into the future, you realize at least the next two decades of your life will be ruined as you desperately try to pay back your loans.

But the worst part is the dread that slowly metastasizes as it becomes progressively and increasingly clear that not only are you never going to achieve your dreams, but that life is going to be much harder, harsher, and painful than you thought it would be. Everything you dreamed of is not only no longer, but has been replaced with a life that is infinitely worse. It can be crippling, devastating, and depressing. It is without a doubt the worst time in your life.

But fear not, for there is hope. Because you aren't the only person this is happening to. Matter of fact, you're just one of tens of millions of young people who got scammed by your professors and the higher education system. The question is how you're going to react to this, which will ultimately determine the quality of the remainder of your life.

Forgive Yourself

The first thing to do is to realize your situation really isn't your fault. I say this not out of a namby pamby touchy feely leftist way that dismisses people's outlandishly stupid decisions in the hopes said outlandishly stupid people vote for me, but rather because it's true. It isn't your fault. You've been sitting in an indoctrination facility for 13 years. Teachers purposely lying to you so their industry may profit off of you. Your parents, equally unaware merely echoed the advice your schools were telling you, and besides, it all started when you were…

5.

If this doesn't enrage you, I don't know what will. But you should at least grant yourself a reprieve for doing what your politically-motivated elders told you. This not only will allow you to see who the true enemy is, but will alleviate you of a life-time of emotional and psychological pain falsely blaming yourself for your situation.

Realize There Wasn't Much Opportunity To Begin With

Forgiving yourself is one thing, but also realize all the poppycock your elders were telling you about "oh the places you will go" and how "the world is your oyster" is precisely that—poppycock. With economic growth at 1/2 of what it used to be in the 50's, there just plain isn't the economic, and therefore, career opportunities that once were. Therefore, whatever you thought you were going to achieve at the idealistic age of 21 was very statistically likely NEVER GOING TO HAPPEN ANYWAY. Combine this with the glut of baby boomer workers who need to work past retirement, making career advancement an impossibility, and there is a reason I recommend not trying until you're 35.

Replace Your Impossible Dreams With Attainable Ones

Since you were fed pie in the sky bullshit since you were 5, your dreams are equally pie in the sky bullshit. They're not attainable. However, a man cannot live life without having dreams. The key to a successful life, however, is to have dreams that are real and attainable.

This usually means dialing back your dreams a bit. At the age of 10 I desperately wanted to be a Veritech fighter pilot. At the age of 20 I wanted to be an investment banker. Both were equally outlandish because both were not based in reality. You need to sit down, do some serious thinking, take inventory of your desires, take inventory of your surrounding environment, and come up with dreams that are within your ability to achieve.

Don't Throw Good Money After Bad

Your passion may be what you studied in college. You truly wanted to become a poet. You truly wanted to become a lawyer. But like the show "Shark Tank" people's passions do not trump reality. The reality is that there are too many liberal arts majors, too many lawyers, and too many business majors. Because of this, the biggest risk posed to you in your moment of post-graduation weakness is to double down on your path and either get a masters in your field or pursue an MBA or law degree.

Don't do it.

If a 4 year degree and nearly a quarter century of your life didn't land you a job, an additional 2 years and $170,000 in debt will only make a bad situation worse. There is no shortage of middle aged women, recently divorced who thought "I'm going to get my masters" as some kind of empowerment or career move, who only end up LITERALLY RUINING THE REMAINDER OF THEIR ONE AND FINITE LIFE ON THIS PLANET. They have damned themselves to a life of financial servitude and instead of a life of leisure and enjoyment, they now have one of fear, fret, stress and misery. Do not become the "highly educated" 60 year old woman who can't retire until she's 83.

Skills And Trades

Adjusting your mentality and ensuring you don't fall into the graduate school trap, does nothing to ensure food is on the table. Your quickest and most direct way to solve this problem is to (ironically) head back to school. But this time, not for more worthless leftist propaganda, but instead a skill or a trade.

Plumbing, electrical work, auto mechanics, computer networking, welding, you name it. Something that takes a short time to learn and people are willing to pay for.

Thankfully if you already have a degree a 2-year certification is actually just 1 because you have completed all those unnecessary pre-requisites. However, unlike your "Bachelors in Environmental Science," interrupted with weekly benders, now is the time to take your education seriously, put your nose to the grind, and bang out your associates or trade certification as quick as possible.

This does not mean that your life, your purpose, your meaning on this planet will be defined by your trade. But having a trade will be the tool by which you support yourself, claw yourself out of debt, and permit you to pursue your newly-established and realistic dreams.

Cut Your Spending To Minimalist Levels

With your student loans you are now no doubt acutely aware that debt is slavery. However, you are already born with an often unspoken debt—the amount of money you must raise to keep yourself alive. This "life debt" is just as real as a car loan or your student loans, but unlike your student loans or car loan, you need to pay this debt to live. Food, clothing, and shelter are the debts no person can avoid.

However, this does not change the fact that debt (in all forms) is slavery. And your "life debt" is a slavery to something just as despicable as the holder of your student loans—an employer.

Men have a natural aversion to bosses, authority, and employers. The reason is simple: when you are working for them you are not doing what you want. You are not free.

The solution is to minimize your spending.

In my book Bachelor Pad Economics, I explain that you really only need $15,000 a year to live. This will provide you with more than enough money to pay for food, clothing, and shelter, but also provide you the maximum amount of freedom in life. You only need to work part time to raise this amount of money, or if you want to bang out 2 months in the Bakken oil field, you can free up the remaining 83% of the year for your own pursuits.

Regardless of how extreme you take minimalism, do not be an idiot and buy new cars, fancy clothes, $14 martini's and all the other bullshit media and marketers try to force down your throat. They are merely selling you chains.

Self Employment

Though beaten to death on ROK, the importance of self-employment cannot be emphasized enough. The reason is that it really is the only true source of freedom and happiness. Agreed, some rare vintage of men can and do succeed as employees, but for most men being an employee is antithetical to happiness. Upon graduating with a trade certification, establishing a new career in said trade, and paying down your student loans, your next step should be to start a business on the side that will invariably grow to be your main source of income and grant you freedom from your employer. What this is depends on you, your dreams, your preferences, and perhaps even your trade. But in the end it is your business, not your degree, where you "follow your heart and the money will follow."

In the end, recovering from a worthless degree is without a doubt going to be the most difficult challenge you face in your life. It will cost you at least a decade of your life and cannot help but to lessen your overall quality in life. The issue is whether you mope, cry, whine, and bitch like OWS protestors, women demanding make work government jobs, or cry babies demanding a bailout no different than the banksters, or become the epitome of a man and do the best you can with the life you have. Because the truth is the latter will enjoy his life, the rest will just merely waste it.

What To Do When You’re Caught Cheating

June 3, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

The line on cheating girls is pretty firm around these parts. If she does the dirty on you then she’s done. Period. There can be no going back. Once she has consciously chosen to violate the boundaries of your relationship — whether spoken or not — then she has disrespected you as a man. If this happens, then simply wish her luck, send her on her way, and never speak to her again. Simple. If you give her another chance then she won’t respect you and the likelihood is she’ll just hop on the next alpha cock to swing by on the carousel behind your back.

What should you do, though, if the boot is on the other foot, and you are the one who has eschewed the steak at home for the nice juicy 22-year-old hamburger at the pool party with the long legs and the cute ass? Many guys who take the red pill and get into game, realizing that female dating practices are more duplicitous than they had previously been led to believe, decide that they may as well pursue their own self-serving strategies.

These men date girls concurrently and build harems. In doing so, they run the risk of being detected, particularly if they are relatively inexperienced. This can lead to problems, especially if it is the guy's preferred girl who has found out.

In such circumstances, what should the alpha male do?

Always Deny

The first point, and probably the most important, is that when confronted about an infidelity, real or imagined, you must deny everything. Coming clean simply does no good to anyone. Christian McQueen's 25th law of pussy states:

> #25. If you get caught cheating, always, always, always deny. Deny until death and she will eventually get over it.

This is vital. To do otherwise serves no purpose — she will be hurt and your relationship will not be salvageable. Also, and perhaps more importantly, the true alpha should not be accountable to a woman or compelled to answer her every question. And the irony is, she doesn't want full disclosure anyway. So deny and give her the choice either to accept your story or to bail: it's up to her.

Caught Red-Handed

How about if you are caught red-handed? What if she actually saw you in the act with the sultry Spanish chambermaid at the Standard? Or if the evidence against you is otherwise so compelling that you cannot possibly deny what's happened? What do you do in this instance? My advice, based on personal experience, is that you say the following:

'So you caught me. It is what it is. I appreciate you won't want to see me anymore, so I'm going to go now. Goodbye.'

Don't apologize. Don't feel or act guilty — after all, you only followed your biomechanical instincts as a man, and therefore you have nothing to feel guilty about. Don't explain. Whatever you do don't attempt to negotiate, however much you like her. Simply pack up your things and get the hell out of there.

Why do I advocate such an extreme course of action? Well, for a start, to apologize, try to wheedle your way back into her affections or otherwise atone or 'set things right' is immediately to fall into her frame, and that is the very last thing you want to do. Male infidelity, when discovered by the female, presents an interesting paradox. On the one hand, it demonstrates a lot of things about the perpetrator that are perversely attractive to women: preselection by other chicks, bad boy tendencies, dark triad characteristics, etc. And in theory a man with a truly alpha frame ought to be able to openly sex other girls without his main squeeze complaining (think sultans, rock stars, celebrities, film stars, and those sports stars who've publicly cheated and had their wives 'stand by them', unwilling or unable to kill the golden goose of alpha).

The problem though — and this is something I had a particularly nasty experience of in my pre-red pill days — is that coming clean also puts you dangerously on the back foot.

And if you're not careful, this can lead to pussified, beta behavior that will get you dumped quicker than you'd flick a fat chick left on Tinder.

Several years ago, I got caught on a dating website by an ex-girlfriend. The evidence was cut and dried—she knew that I'd been cheating. Because I was into this girl (she was unknowingly my 'main girl' in a soft harem) I apologized profusely for my 'mistake' and did everything I could to 'make things right'—taking her on holiday, out for nice meals etc. My strategy seemed logical enough—basically I tried to counterbalance the 'hard takeaway' (in game vernacular) of my 'alpha' cheating behavior by dialing up my softer, more romantic side. You'd think this would work, right? Wrong.

At first things were okay, and she seemed to appreciate the increased attention I paid her. But after a while I got caught in a negative cycle. Time and time again she would bring up my infidelity. On each occasion I reacted by doing something nice to try to make her feel secure. Ironically, this achieved nothing more than framing me anew as a beta provider. It was a losing game. In the end, she lost attraction for me and ended the relationship for good.

How much better might things have worked out had I simply walked out without a second glance, or an apology. True, I may never have seen her again—but that would have saved me six months of hellish tantrums and jealous nagging, not to mention all the cash I dropped on her in that period. Alternatively, though, she might have come back to me, having had time to reflect and reassess the situation. Actually, this outcome is more common than you might think. I've had girls come back to me after I've cheated on them since, because I have learned to develop a frame of 'my way or the highway.' And it is a truism that girls are more attracted to men who treat them badly than not.

So next time you get caught out cheating, simply mile, shrug and walk away. It will either save you a whole deal of pain, or it might just enable you to reestablish the relationship with the right frame and the right balance of male-female domination.

The Touchiness Of Contemporary America

> What if the Church and the State
> Are the mob that howls at the door?
> –William Butler Yeats

Strange days are upon us, hard to behold amid all the blinding glitter. In sports, for example, a player can hardly even question the officiating—despite the many scandals in recent years—without being fined or suspended. And when it comes to minor tiffs and scuffles, the natural athletic testiness that was readily shrugged off up until around the mid '90s is now scandalous, the stuff of "anger management issues." Socrates, when his debunking sting had prompted a fellow Athenian to strike him, as many did, would simply shrug off the blow, remarking that he had been done no serious harm. Such was the wisdom and hardiness of the great man who knew that, after all, life is always already hard enough. Today, by contrast, to use virtually any kind of assertive language is to create an "intimidating environment." Frank and direct speech is effectively "abusive." Meanwhile, the tireless Dr. Phil cannot save everyone from the trauma of a bruised ego or hurt feelings, so more and more melancholy Americans must become doped up on Prozac.

It was wise of John Stuart Mill to argue in On Liberty that "the only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilized community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others." Such a point of view is central to the modern world and democracy. But contemporary Americans are too easily "harmed." Taking our cue from the touchy upper and middle classes (mostly spineless Anglos), we will use just about anything that some find offensive as justification for exercising power over others. “The ozone layer is thinning,” many proclaim, but what they most long for is protection from their fiery fellow man! So you had better be careful about how you tell your neighbor not to blast his music at 3am. Before you know it you may have a “protection order” against you! Such is the silly thin skin of Americans in 2014. Again, your boss may be a domineering idiot, but you must endure him, team player. Do not object, or he may decree that in order to keep your job you undergo “sensitivity training” or take an “anger management class,” though he himself is the monster.

The banning of directness

A little while back, living in Florida, I had an interview for a copy-editor job at a company called Postcard Mania. Though it had the good sense not to hire me, the aptly-named company did turn out to be a crazy bunch of slaves and ninnies; for, in order to maintain “positive office morale,” each team member had to follow an instruction manual comprised of some of the wonderful ideas of L. Ron Hubbard, great American original. The ostensible aim was to prevent “office politics.” But another one, I could see, was to make natural, frank talk about unfairness unprofessional by definition. Good team members were not to voice discontent among themselves. There was a “procedure” to follow; it was necessary to go to the person of the proper rank. And from past experience in such situations, I could not help believe that most of these bland working cattle had no objection to the paltry bureaucracy; such servile conformity seems quite acceptable to the culture of “success.”

Today it is common for a pair of teenagers, fooling around as teenagers do, to be labeled “sex offenders” even when the age gap between them is only a few years. One might reasonably think that, like sexting, such hook ups are the business of the teenagers themselves and their parents or guardians. Still, by a mere touchy and fearful misuse of language, it happens that when a few years later a potential employer does a background check, they find that the potential employee is a “sex offender.” Immediately there arises the mental image of some dirty old man hanging around a school playground. So much, then, for getting that future good job, horny young men and women!

All of these examples, extremely dangerous misuses of language and evidence of idiotic touchiness in the American way, recall Jonathan Swift’s definition of the human as “an animal capable of reason.” Though Americans think they are free, the control of consciousness, thought and language that stems from our narcissistic sensitivity, is endless and endlessly subtle; and the only sure thing, besides its existence, is the almost universally smug response to it: the lunatic, self-righteous assumption that it is just. And again, here it is the upper and middle classes—and the highly educated among them—who lead the way.

Larry Summers and Ariel Sharon

In Writing Poetry After 9/11, Marjorie Perloff asks us to > Take a seemingly straightforward little sentence, Cornell West's declaration in April 2002 that Harvard's President "Larry Summers is the Sharon of Harvard." Earlier, West had made numerous comparisons between Sharon and Hitler, so that, in essence, he was here saying that Larry Summers is like Hitler. So inured are we to this sort of double talk that few people object, and the trustees of Princeton promptly and unanimously voted to give Professor West a Chair. But the remark is not only inaccurate and slanderous; it is meaningless.

> The notion that a university president who actually dares to challenge the work of one of his chaired professors can be compared to a prime minister, deploying what many take to be extremist, excessively violent tactics in his war against the Palestinians, makes no sense. In a democratic society like ours, university presidents actually do have freedom of speech. Summers had not done anything to West except, possibly, to humiliate him by suggesting that he produce more hard scholarship and less popular writing. What it has to do with Sharon is anybody's guess, except that what West is saying is that they're both, you know, bad guys! Bullies!
> But now let's take the comparison the next step. One may hate Sharon, but just how is Sharon like Hitler? I suppose West links them as twin oppressors and murderers of innocent people. But Sharon is fighting what is in essence a civil war: before 1948, there was neither an Israel nor a state called Palestine, and the complex question is how these two ethnic groups can conceivably live together. Sharon was voted into office in a democratic election, and, no more than his Labor predecessor Ehud Barak is he likely to remain Prime Minister for long.
> Hitler, by contrast, seized power by criminal means, could do whatever he liked (which is hardly true for Sharon!), and set in motion a calculated plan to kill off anyone who could be shown to have so much as a drop of Jewish blood. He also exterminated other ethnic and social groups and nations. If Sharon were a Hitler, he would already have taken over Jordan, with Egypt next on his list. To call Sharon Hitler is thus simply irresponsible, as it is irresponsible to call Milosevic a Hitler. Indeed, all three of these cases are quite different.
> ## The limits of language
> It was Wittgenstein who taught us that the limits of language are the limits of our world and that each word or sentence had to be understood in a particular context. When Christopher Hitchens dared to criticize Islamic Fundamentalism, the cry of "Fascist" immediately went up! Never mind that Hitchens has been a Socialist all his life; if he says X, then it must be Y. But Fascists were real people who practiced real things like stamping out all dissent in the Italy of entre deux guerres, like killing their enemies in cold blood, and running a hideous dictatorship. What did Hitchens do? He dared to say in The Nation that perhaps > the U.S. needed to defend itself against the attacks of 9/11. When the adjective "Fascist" (or its close relative "McCarthyite") is applied to such an opinion, the language cannot help but be debased.

How the academics and intellectuals chimed in like the people watching The Jerry Springer Show! What orgies of fellow-feeling! Very religious experiences, and I regret only the absence of snake-handling and speaking in tongues, though, to be sure, Summers might someday join with the adulterous Tiger Woods and Jonathon Edwards in order to give all of us "a national apology."

We should feel grateful for people like Marjorie Perloff who perceive such wild misuses of language and who aren't afraid to oppose them. They are the invaluable custodians of thought and its expression. Without them, we shall be less likely to perceive the cant all around us, as dear to academics and intellectuals as it is to politicians and the media. Indeed, it is telling that ordinary people of good sense tend to perceive this cant where those in the professional class do not.

The response to Larry Summers—glib, obtuse and self-righteous—is precisely the sort of thing that keeps so many of us afraid of offending the politically correct orthodoxy. You had better not have the wrong views on gender, race, immigration, climate change, renewable energy, foreign affairs, etc. If you do, you are sure to be attacked, often after having been misunderstood. Call this the mob mentality of the intellectual crowd.

Tolerance and political correctness

It is ironic to note here that, with respect to tolerance, most people believe our secular, liberal democracy represents a huge improvement on traditional, more authoritarian governments. But are we as tolerant as they think? No. Political correctness is in fact the liberal version of the very intolerance liberals purport to oppose; the hypocrisy is that in order to consider themselves tolerant, people require that others submit to their own intolerance. Hence, instead of actual tolerance we have mere hypocrisy. This makes for a weak and spineless culture, and in this grim context we can easily see the wisdom of G.K. Chesterton's maxim that "tolerance is the virtue of the man without convictions." Immanuel Kant is also apt here: "If man makes himself a worm he must not complain when he is trodden on."

In the past few years I have encountered several women who used to have an "abusive boyfriend." It is interesting that the abuse was never physical, only "verbal," because from what I could tell what these women understood by "abuse" was usually nothing more than men refusing to put up with their bullshit. For most attractive young women in this country today are so blindly self-interested, and so devoid of any notion of personal responsibility, that they either do not see or else just do not care about how their behavior may drive any man who is not a chump to lose his temper. A man refuses to be a typical whiny white woman's doormat, telling her, for example, to "shut up and cut the shit," and now he is some kind of villain. This way of thinking is like that of the many minorities and white liberals who assume that a white police offer pulling over a black man is in itself evidence of racism. In both examples we have a rash and simplistic view of human affairs, driven by a herd tendency to resentment and victimization. Many Americans really do not understand basic cause and effect or the full contexts of their relations. Things do not work out as they want them to; they do not get what they want; ergo, they have been wronged.

Consider another example, that beloved academic shibboleth the "social construct." For many academics and intellectuals, bent as they are on asserting an agenda of resentment (for there is far more of this than any serious notion of social fairness, to effect which very few of us are really prepared to change our entire way of life), it simply cannot be that all human differences are not reducible to different types of social constructions. Even if empirical evidence seems to support the contrary belief—that is, to provide evidence of natural differences—it is necessary to project (and thereby assert) some discrimination or bias in the method: so that, after all, we are all still the same—that is, one big liberal happy family!—and all differences reducible to varieties of social constructions: a result that leaves the agenda of resentment intact, with its important notion of victimization, used by academics and intellectuals to present an appearance of righteousness and even rebellion, or as they put it in their stilted way, "transgression."

Or else the method and evidence won't even be considered: the conclusions are not consistent with people's a priori beliefs; therefore they must be rejected, by a show of moral outrage, of course. This fidelity to the omnipresent truth of the social construct is really a kind of fundamentalism or neurosis. When reading about the nasty, irresponsible responses to anything contrary to this and other academic idols, I have sometimes thought of John Locke's insight into the character of the prejudiced person:

> …if, after all his profession, he cannot bear any opposition to his opinion, if he cannot so much as give a patient hearing, much less examine and weigh the arguments on the other side, does he not plainly confess it is prejudice governs him and it is not the evidence of truth, but some lazy anticipation, some beloved presumption that he desires to rest undisturbed in?
> –Of the Conduct of the Understanding, sect. 10."Prejudice"

Bias serves self-interest

The dark truth is that, like intolerance, human touchiness arises naturally from our cognitive limitations. Most people, it is clear, do not consider things disinterestedly, and it may be that they cannot. After all, few of us ever learn to think with much analytical rigor. Meanwhile, bias serves self-interest—the most powerful force in human affairs, as everyday life overwhelmingly displays. So, most people are not objective. Reason serves their particular passion, which they are ever keen to advance. As Francis Bacon wrote in The New Organon: "The human understanding is not composed of dry light, but is subject to influence from the will and the emotions, a fact that creates fanciful knowledge; man prefers to believe what he wants to be true."

And so it happens that when they contemplate a certain thorny subject, people usually try to confirm an a priori view; regardless of the context or what might be added to their knowledge, they perceive things in a distorting light. They don't examine the matter analytically and objectively, then make a judgment. They examine it in terms of their ideology. A post-hoc rationalization of their evaluative endeavors, the "truth" is determined by their particular desires. And often they do this unconsciously, thinking they are objective where they are merely biased. They intend to set other people straight, but are in fact quite ignorant.

If people are generally all eyes and ears for whatever is going on around them, it is because people themselves are all eyes and ears. No wonder that throughout the course of life we encounter many more assertions than arguments. Truth, as most of us can understand it, is a poor player in an unforgiving world of anxious self-interest. Moreover, it is hardly the mind's primary function to discern truth (advancing belief is clearly something else). Otherwise myth should not have preceded science. Physics should have come before animism. The mind, rather, is pragmatic by nature, and there is no prima facie reason to believe rational reasoning is any more natural to us or altogether superior to what is imaginative and to what is not rationally the case: it all depends on one's purposes. And if it is the mind's primary function to allow us to realize basic animals needs and impulses, then it is hardly necessary that everyone should be able (or even want) to get at the truth with much accuracy or precision.

Here it is no wonder that the gross distortions and simplifications we so often find in the media are not always deliberate. Quite often, people are simply mistaken, doing what they can with their particular (limited) mental equipment. And yet, many people are thrilled to be informed of inaccurate scandal and other false though juicy news, because these afford pretexts for their tendency to righteous indignation, and what is much the same thing, for their anger and hatred. If a scuffle breaks out in a bar, and one person ends up getting the worst of it, there are often many people around who are happy to get in on the fun, to kick a man when he's down, as the saying goes. So it is with any sort of controversy. Tapping into their unconscious anxieties and fears, to their resentments and spleen, people will rush to have an opinion. The result is a distortion which serves an utterly irrelevant purpose: but by thus venting their discontent they are able to get on with the hard work of living.

On a similar though more primordial level, outright violence and conflict provide a crucial outlet or escape: like getting drunk or having sex, they relieve anxiety, so that life becomes more vital and interesting than we feel when performing the same burdensome tasks day after day. In life we are like children who need to replace one game with another.

Conclusion

Though our time is marked by an unmanly touchiness that causes many foolish and seemingly avoidable problems—a touchiness we will eventually get over as material conditions become less comfortable (like spoiled children, we owe this touchiness to our high quality of life)—observation shows that there is an irrational obstacle, just touched on, to the virtue of tolerance generally: that people have many unconscious fears, anxieties, and resentments that often surface unawares, but which are still evident in things like the West-Summers affair. These create distorted perspectives which sometimes reflect the way people want reality to be, sometimes the way they don't want it to be, sometimes both. In all this, human nature remains intractably self-interested, however it may don the masks of morality and speak loftily of liberal intentions.

In the practical affairs of life, a completely disinterested person must be essentially fearless, but almost no one is that. We should therefore expect to encounter many gross misunderstandings and misinterpretations that create countless problems and miseries. For a skewed sense of reality is a permanent feature of our condition; there is no reason to think it will change, as though we were somewhere meant to interpret things clearly and distinctly.

An Open Letter To Asian Men Of The West

June 4, 2014 | by Steven Kendall | Link | Original Link

Consider for a moment that pussy is a tradable good in the sexual marketplace, and that its quarterly performance, whether good or bad, has measurable impact on the majority of men. Unfortunately, but not surprisingly, this majority does not include you. Pussy's fluctuation on the S&P bears no consequence on your personal life, because by virtue of your being a Western male of Asian descent, you don't own even a single one of its stocks. Like a Wall Streeter who's been caught red-handed cheating the system, you've been banned from ever reveling in the joy that is trading the commodity of a warm, gushy vag. Of course, your ban is more for night-and-day reasons than the Wall Streeter's—that is, due to your race—but it's a ban, no less. Knowing this, you do your business elsewhere. In fact, as I scribble down these words, you've just finished negotiating a very different type of exchange: trading in your useless cock for yet another set of Magic cards.

The dismal reality you find yourself in is that women don't want you for anything except the occasional help on a computer or numbers-related problem. Without knowing it, you are at all times competing with your one billion brothers and cousins to be the World's Least Fuckable Man. Your own female counterparts are producing half-white babies at a spiraling rate, but you, on the other hand, have been left virtually unchanged amidst the media's push to promote interracial dating; women of other races would sooner make love to a cucumber than to be seen with you in broad daylight. You are, for all intents and purposes, an uncool, unsexable, unfriendable, school-sentimental, library-loitering, grade-greedy, work-wallowing boob of a fucking loser.

Of course, this prejudice extends far beyond the vaginal sphere. Men don't respect you.

The public neither supports nor stands up for you. Your social value is zero. You lack a diversity of friends. Those few members unfortunate enough to be considered indispensable to your crew are, without doubt, Asian themselves, and therefore just like you. Together you roll to any and every event with fake unapologetic pride. But you and I know better, that behind the veil it's all just overcompensation for the feelings of worthlessness and self-hate engulfing you whole.

"I Am At Cause"

The problem is twofold. Number one, consider that, despite all the above, you haven't yet discovered your true threshold for pain. Sure, it hurts to be reminded that you're a loser, but regardless of my saying it here, you already know this to be the persistent mindset held by society at large. So that's not the problem. The problem is that either you know but are denying, or don't know and are therefore oblivious to, the fact that everything so far discussed in this letter is a product not of other people or things, but of you.

Up until now, you've shown adamant resistance in taking responsibility for the totality of your life. You cause the successes, but the failures, especially regarding women, you keep imputing elsewhere. Stop playing that game. Retire. Cut the bullshit and change right now. I am responsible for the totality of my life.

Transcending Your Race

Number two is equally important and it's the problem I'll be discussing from now until this letter's conclusion: it's the problem of never having transcended your race. This, my fellow Asian men of the West, is the real reason I'm writing to you now. Not as a coach in the dugout, not as a spectator deep in the upper deck. I'm right where you are, on the field of experience, playing the same game you're playing, sporting the same exact digs you're sporting. The difference is I've already withstood the onslaught of my being an Asian male in the West long enough to ascertain the best way to slip the cuffs and taste the freedom that is pussy in abundance. The solution is right there, contained inside those three words, "Transcend Your Race."

The term serves as a very simple but powerful reminder that, despite everything you've been taught, you do not have to identify as being whatever race or ethnicity chance so blindly conferred upon you as a life sentence all those years back. You had no say in the genetic makeup meeting that took place prior to your birth, so to spout pride (or shame, even) for being a certain skin color or for belonging to a certain ethnic group, is like bragging about "your" Seattle Seahawks winning the Superbowl. Your contribution was illusory. There is no merit. There is no achievement.

Get this on an emotional level and you'll begin to wake to the consequences that inevitably follow:

1. You are now required to turn your back on that which you've made both your life's sultan and scapegoat: the media, with particular emphasis on Hollywood.

The lone script you've been reading from since catching a TV airing of Breakfast at Tiffany's for the first time—that it's fuck the yellowface, the caricatures, the "herro" accents; that you're done with the fobby landlords and the fried rice and the Jackie Chans and Leslie Chows of the world; that you demand an Asian George Clooney be cast as a repeated lead in non-math, non-kung fu blockbuster hits—that same horrible script you've been clinging to can now be ripped, torn, crumpled, and disposed of in the nearest trash can. Hollywood can now depict Asians any way it likes. The correlation you once thought to be indelible—the "less Asian" and more desirable the character, the better your sex life—is no more. You now realize the inanity of such a sick, dependent relationship, and can acknowledge that celebrity "role models" are for women, not men.

This picture doesn't affect you anymore.

2. You have a new mantra regarding all things Asian-related, and it's simply, eloquently, inexorably—"Who gives a fuck."

The infamous shy, effeminate, good student, bad driver, big brain, tiny wood stereotype. The derogatory names and even the Holy Grail of Asian betrayal: white-cock worship from your own females! None of these can sway your sensibilities one way or the other anymore. Tina Lu can stuff John Smith's meat in her mouth as many times as it takes for her to feel full, and it's fine by you because you're now on the other side of the walls meant to fortify Calvin-esque, predetermined identities.

This picture doesn't affect you anymore either.

Moving on now from the mental to the somatic…

3. Working out and improving your physical appearance becomes mandatory.

The revelation sets in rather quickly that you do not have to be bound to bad haircuts, thrift shop wardrobes, nor prepubescent body frames forever. The "I'm fill-in-the-blank because I'm Asian" excuses don't work anymore. You're short, skinny, and feminine-looking in the face? So what. Life is unfair. You're dealt the cards you're dealt—now play. Nick Vujivic is without all four limbs and still it would be a gross understatement to say that the man has been getting along "just fine." You can keep marinating in the misery of conceded defeat, or you can resolve to work your ass off to sculpt a physique that women find desirable. Do for yourself what needs to be done and in three months' time you'll be shocked at the new man reflecting back at you in the literal and proverbial mirror.

4. With your armor of excuses now completely dismantled, you have nothing to hide behind anymore.

It’s time to start approaching beautiful women, Asians and non-Asians alike, with the intention that you are going to date and bed them. Remember that success always follows failure, so long as you’re prepared to keep failing.

Conclusion

The above in its entirety is my solemn promise to you. Take responsibility for your life. Stop being Asian, not out of self-hate, but because you no longer wish to be a prisoner of inherited definition. You’re done representing an entire race, ethnicity, skin color, country, and area code. You now represent yourself. For better or worse, you are your own man. Learn to become what serves you best, vow to quit the excuses cold-turkey, and holy shit, put the fucking Magic cards down and go get your goddamn cock back.

Respectfully,

Steven Kendall

What I Learned From A Weekend Of Forgetting The Red Pill

June 4, 2014 | by Erik Fomorian | Link | Original Link

Presumably, many of you found your way to the Manosphere after a particularly crushing failure with a woman. I am no different. Simply put, I closely followed the beta-provider-chump playbook for over a year, sacrificing my individuality and compromising my masculinity for my now ex-girlfriend, only to be rewarded with infidelity. Spending many sleepless nights and much of my time at work searching for guidance on what I may have done wrong eventually led me to Return of Kings.

Never before had I been exposed to such unapologetic, harsh, and raw truth. After reading many articles on this site and others like it, I began to adopt the principles of game, lifestyle, and masculinity into my own life. Being raised in a fairly traditional (by American standards) environment, understanding and applying the lessons I learned here felt natural. I began to approach women, lift weights, neglect my comforts and luxuries, embrace my masculinity, and see the world for what it really is.

Despite a few scattered failures, the results were almost immediate. I felt I had swallowed the Red Pill and was a fledgling alpha male. After a few months of enjoying the path of self-improvement, I completely and utterly regressed. I write this article as a cautionary tale, hoping that anyone who is new to these philosophies will learn from my mistakes.

The Regression

The girl I mentioned earlier, after months of zero contact, reached out to me. Her now ex-boyfriend put her through the same scenario she had put me. My initial reaction was mostly vindication, but a soft spot remained and I attempted to comfort her. It was so easy to fall back into the same patterns and mentality that had set me up for failure before. Even equipped with all the knowledge I gained from RoK, I did almost everything I was not supposed to do. I began texting back immediately, approving and commending everything she did, I even told myself “she’s different.”

The final straw that led to my full regression was when she invited me to spend the weekend of her birthday with her, due to having lost most of her friends in her last breakup. I accepted. What makes this even worse is the fact that I now live over six hundred miles away from her. I know, I can actually feel all of you shaking your head.

Ignoring The Red Pill

I showed up, brought presents, bought her food, drove her all over town, and dedicated every minute to her. I was a sick puppy, desperately seeking her affection. Everything a white-knight, beta-bitch would do, I did. Despite her invitation, I was treated with what felt like polite, yet forced tolerance. She was constantly attached to her phone, rambled endlessly about nothing, and was pretty much a terrible host. I know what you’re wondering, and no, in the two days I spent with her, we did not hook up. I left her home for mine feeling dejected, beaten, and stupid. I was stupid.

In the weekend I spent with her, the advice and principles I learned at RoK were floating around in my head and I willingly rejected them. I told myself over and over that this girl is different; she truly is the one exception. I knew how pathetic I looked, I knew how much I deserved to be chastised, and I knew how much the writers I’ve come to respect would shake their heads at me. I knew all of this and still continued playing the part of the beta.

For all my misguided efforts, I spent the homeward six hundred miles with an awful pit in my stomach. I was once again sad, hopeless, and without direction. I gave myself over to the thought that maybe this is the best I could ever hope for in my life. What a shitty existence. I was back to square one.

What I Learned

In my nine-hour drive I ran the full gamut of emotions. I was a mess, until it finally hit me. I had put myself in this situation, I have no one to blame for my current position except myself. The moment I rejected the ugly truth is the moment everything started sucking again. I was still afflicted with an aggressive case of oneitis, and I did nothing to fight it. I put my emotional wellbeing in the hands of someone who had a terrible track record of keeping it intact. In short, I gave myself over to the enemy. Even though I still felt like shit, it was reassuring to know that those feelings were my own doing. I may be an idiot, but at least I still have control over my life. I now realize that my rejection of the red pill is what got me into this sad state.

I never want to feel like that again, and I know you don't either. If you are relatively new, or are having a hard time agreeing with the philosophies espoused here, I want to help stop you from making the same kind of mistakes I did. Whether you want to dive right into these philosophies, or you are still skeptical of this whole "red pill" thing, there are a few basic truths that will guard you if you adhere to them:

1. Oneitis is a very serious threat to your emotional well-being. Never forget that there are millions of women in the world—odds are very good that many of them are better than the one you're currently pedestalizing.

2. Self-improvement should be your number one priority. The goal isn't solely to get laid—the goal is to become a well-rounded, well-adjusted, masculine man. The conquest of one or many women may be part of your journey, but never the destination.

3. Most western women are selfish and do not care about you. Due to being constantly congratulated and praised by white-knights and beta orbiters for having a vagina, they are conditioned to believe they are infallible.

4. Take care of yourself. You cannot count on anyone to fully have your back. Realize that you are one hundred percent in charge of the situations you expose yourself to. When in doubt, err on the side of selfishness.

Keep these truths in the back of your mind in your everyday life. It may all sound bleak, but I believe it is the acceptance of these truths that will actually lead to happiness. These are not lessons you want to learn multiple times.

How To Become A Man If You Grew Up Without A Father

June 4, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

The famous words spoken by Jesus on the cross, signified his feeling of abandonment from his heavenly Father, but how many young men reading this right now have thought, or said the same? Whether you believe in the Bible or not, it is of no consequence to gaining insight into becoming a man without a father.

There are scores of young men in the world who have been raised by single mothers and without any real male leadership and it's a serious problem. Anyone that tells you that a boy being raised by just his mother is healthy and doesn't affect him is an outright fool and I won't even waste my time typing up a rebuttal. If you fall into the camp of having been raised without a real father figure, or you're a mentor to young men, then keep reading.

"I don't even know how to speak up for myself, because I don't really have a father who would give me the confidence or advice." -Eminem

First off, before I drop some tips to becoming a man without having had a father influence, let me be crystal clear about one thing: the lack of a father or father figure in your life is no excuse to sit in the corner and cry about how bad your life is. You must take ownership of destiny and take the right actions in order to become the best man you can be. Don't let an absent father fuck up the rest of your life. Don't let an absent father hold you back from making goals and attaining your dreams and fulfilling your vision. Don't let an absent father turn you into a monster. Don't let an absent father become the excuse that turns your promising life into a joke. Take control. And now here's a few ways to do that…

"It is easier for a father to have children than for children to have a real father." -Pope John XXIII

5. Claim Your Birthright

"Wait a minute Christian, how can I do that when I don't even have one?" Good question and here's how: by making your own birthright. Think about the word 'birthright'. According to dictionary.com it means this: any right or privilege to which a person is entitled by birth.

Drop any idea of any physical assets being associated with a birthright, because as you can see, that's not even the definition. I didn't get anything when I was born besides a meal and some milk and I can guarantee that I won't be left anything when my father passes, but that is okay.

You want to know what your right and privilege is?

You have the right to live more abundantly. If you've been born of sound mind and body, then you're already blessed with the tools necessary to become successful and live happy. Will it be hard? Yes. Will it come easy? Probably not. Will you become the best version of yourself with work and discipline? You can.

You have the privilege of reading this right now. "Wow Christian, I knew you had an ego, but damn, really?" Hold up. I'm not saying that from a place of ego, what I'm saying is that you've found this one site on the internet and you have found yourself reading this particular article and for that you're already at an advantage over the other young men who haven't or who may never read it. Read, apply and pass it on.

You have the right to take control of your destiny. As aforementioned, if you've been born of sound mind and body, then you have everything you need right now this very moment to take control of your life. Would it be easier if your father was a famous senator and you had a trust fund? Probably, but that may not be the case, so stop fucking comparing your childhood to others and start prepping today to make your future better tomorrow.

4. Get An Adult Male Mentor

I'm being specific on saying a 'male' mentor, because there's some things that only a man can teach you. Don't believe the lies that society tells you in school that women are interchangeable with men and there's no difference. It's complete and utter bullshit. Find yourself a male mentor who has the following characteristics:

Older than you. He doesn't have to be 50 years old, but find a man who's lived some life.

Successful in business. No exceptions. Want to be a loser? Learn from losers. Want to be successful? Learn from those who are successful with not only business, but in all areas of life to a certain degree.

Self-made. Are you going to take advice from a man who's been handed everything they want in life without lifting a finger? What value will he really give you? Find a mentor who is self-made and who's been through some real life. That is someone who can teach you what to do when you have literally no one to count on and don't know where your next meal is coming from. Real begets real.

Offers something. Every mentor I've ever had was a man who I brought something to the table. When I was broke, I offered to clean the offices, mow their lawn, or clean their cars in exchange for advice. When I had a little money, I would buy them a drink for their time. When I got even more money, I would cover the restaurant tab and bring pretty girls along for the evening. The point is, to not expect something for nothing. Any mentor worth his salt will break this down for you in the beginning.

Remember, even if you don't have a dime to your name, you still have yourself. Be a young man of service and busy, successful men who may become your mentors will take notice of you. Especially in this current day when many young people act like entitled brats. You'll stand out if you're respectful, have manners, act appreciative and actually listen and apply their advice.

3. Read Biographies Of Great Men

Now this might seem petty, but if you have literally ZERO connections, no money and are not in a good environment at all, then do what I did as a child: got to the library and check out some books for FREE. Last time I checked the library is free (although watch your late fines) and get some biographies of great men. Based on what field you're interested in, let's say computers, then read Steve Jobs biography. Into acting? Read Marlon Brando's biography. His is excellent because although he had a father, their relationship was quite strained.

Reading these books will do two things for you:

1. It'll show you that many great men had strained relationships with their father, or didn't have one around at all. Knowing that you're not the only one and that you two can be great will help you get your mindset right.

2. You'll be getting great real applicable advice from men who are pillars in their respective fields. It's about as close to having them as an actual mentor. I used to and still do occasionally when my schedule permits, read and re-read biographies of great men and absorb as much as I could. It will give you hope. It will give you direction. It will show you that you can still make it, despite the lack of a father.

2. Your Birth Father Doesn't Have To Be Your Father Figure

Let's say that your real father is in prison, or drifts in and out of your life so infrequently that he might as well not be around. That's fine—don't make him your father figure. Do Step #4 and find a mentor regardless who may become a father figure of sorts to you. Trying to depend on a flaky person who through blood may be your father, but in spirit is like a leper, is a waste of your time. This is part of becoming a man. Realizing that you have to take control of your life and make what you want out of it.

If he's undependable, then don't depend on him. If he's a liar, then don't trust him. If he's a lazy broke fuck, then don't take business advice from him. Let's keep it real: most fathers do their best (in theory), but there's a lot of shitty fathers out there. If you have a good one, then be thankful and bless him every day, because it's quickly becoming not the norm here in the States.

The world needs better fathers and true masculine leadership starts at the home, branches out into the neighborhood and culminates in a country that is productive and conducive to prosperity in which men are treated like men and women act like women and children know their place and are respectful and a blessing to their parents, instead of a curse and bringing shame upon their families. If you're a good father and you're reading this, then I commend you with every ounce of respect in my body and I mean that sincerely.

1. Get A Spiritual Father

Now before you start throwing soda cans at your computer screen, I never said get religious. What I am saying, is that having a belief in a higher power will help guide you through tough times. While Christianity has done an excellent job of putting forth the message of a “heavenly Father”, I’m not here to preach or teach you one way or the other. I’m here simply to tell you that getting a spiritual higher being that you can pray to and spend time meditating on will center you unlike anything else. Follow your instinct and gut. There are fakers and charlatans out there who will try to lead you astray, but be smart and do your homework.

I can only speak for myself and when shit hit the fan, just knowing I had a higher being I could say a silent prayer to, kept me sane and I’m still here, so perhaps there was ‘someone’ watching over me.

I’m aware this article barely scratches the surface of this deep issue, but perhaps it will help you get on the right track. I get knocked continually for offering products, but I really do want today’s young men to turn into great leaders tomorrow. I honestly and truly believe that the only way this world will turn around from it’s tailspin into a fallen Rome, is if men take the helm and become the leaders that we should all be. Instead of tearing each other down, let’s remember that when men bind together and put forth effort, worlds change and mountains are moved. Never underestimate the power of unity among men.

Become the best version of yourself here.

The Importance Of Cultivating A Killer Instinct

June 5, 2014 | by Allen Van Zant | Link | Original Link

After a certain amount of time doing cold-approach pickup, say two or three years of consistent action, some guys will begin to get good. They're getting lays, one night stands, and quality girlfriends. But these guys will be in the minority. Most "pua's" will still be toiling in frustrated obscurity, desperately scrounging for a random piece of action.

What is it that separates the players, the guys seeing real results in the field, and the have-not scroungers? A killer instinct.

What It Is

At a basic level, the killer instinct is simply a mindset cultivated and refined over time. It's confidence juiced up on a triple dose of steroids and grounded in total belief in your own agency in the field. You feel bulletproof. Frictionless. Like a 100-foot-tall Titan in diamond armor.

To go more in-depth, the killer instinct is the complete acceptance of and identification with your most primal desires as a man. It's a taste for blood, a lust for the hunt ingrained in the very marrow of your bones. And the willingness to confront fear, shame, and rejection over and over is the price of admission.

But once you possess the killer instinct, those painful emotions will begin to wane out in the field. There's no shame and no second-guessing of motives at this level of game. The delay between the initial urge to approach and making your move shrinks to zero.

Amazing things will start to happen when you run game—approaching becomes effortless, like a natural expression of your inner state. Women often won't put up any resistance to the approach. Instead, they'll make sexy eyes and giggle like little schoolgirls when you step. Makeouts happen easily, and same night lays become possible.

What It Looks Like

When you're out at the bars, it's easy to spot someone with the killer instinct. They have an aura of total self-containment, barely seeming to notice anyone outside their own group. They're constantly smiling and laughing, intensely focused on whoever they're talking to. They're in their own world. They can be confident to the point of being intimidating, but they have an almost magnetic effect on women in their vicinity. Women hover around them, and even bump into them on purpose.

To someone with a weaker frame, a guy with the killer instinct can come across as "crazy." But he's actually in complete control and very aware of the effect he's having on others. He's excited and energized, but not excitable. Nor is he unstable or erratic. He's extremely solid in his body language and swift and decisive in his movements.

A perfect example of the killer instinct in action is Iron Mike in his late 80's prime:

Now you obviously can't roll into the club swinging 'bows like a gorilla on PCP. But you can most definitely channel that kind of energy when you're running game. You have to get VICIOUS out there. But you've also got to temper the fury, to calibrate and focus it like a laser. It's easy to get hyped up out in the field, but ability to wield that sexual energy like a surgeon's scalpel is a subtle thing that only emerges over time.

Getting A Taste For Blood

To attain the killer instinct, you must completely own your darkest thoughts and feelings as a man. I'm talking about the deep-level Freudian weirdness here, folks. This hidden part of the subconscious is often referred to as "The Shadow Self" in psychology.

You must acknowledge, accept, and incorporate these thoughts into your personality. They're completely normal, as unsettling as they may seem. And you're not necessarily acting on the desires, unless you're into the S&M scene, maybe you will, but harnessing them. The energies are already there, so learn to channel them like sexual rocket fuel when you're running game.

You have to bring it all into the light- Accept your desire to dominate. Accept your desire to be the king. Wear it like Sauron rocking the One Ring:

If you're just starting out, this can be a scary thing. It's an advanced stage of personality development that requires great effort and ruthlessly honest self-reflection. Again, you can't just flip a neurological switch and say, "Okay, now I have the killer instinct, time to go full-Hulk on these girls."

Attaining the killer instinct takes time. But like all of the fine-grained realizations that arise from the game, it's ultimately the result of having a strong work ethic and constantly pushing your comfort zone in the field. There's no magic bullet, no secret shortcut "the pros use." Just good ole repetition. If you want to be a killer, you've got to break out the strop and sharpen the blade.

The Elliot Rodger Massacre Marks The Beginning Of The War Against Us

June 5, 2014 | by Samson Lamont | Link | Original Link

Don’t Shoot The Messenger

I’ll get right to the point: the Isla Vista shootings are a hoax. Anyone who’s watched Elliot Rodger’s pathetic videos and read his manifesto can see that he’s playing a character to some extent. I’m not saying that he doesn’t have issues, but his delusions of grandeur are so over the top that it just rings false. It’s like watching a bad audition for a D-list movie serial killer from someone who can’t act for shit. You get the feeling that some Hollywood scriptwriter just created a character based on the “loser” template that feminists apply to all the members of our little community. Socially impotent, whiny loser that’s addicted to World of Warcraft and can’t get pussy blames all of his problems on women and wants to kill them all due to his own inadequacies.

There’s multiple YouTube videos out there using the media’s own footage showing ridiculous inconsistencies and logical fallacies about this “massacre”, but I thought I’d condense and collect them here to illustrate that this hoax was perpetrated with only two goals in mind:

1. To once again try and add even more worthless and unconstitutional gun control measures, eventually leading to a government gun grab which will leave us with no way to defend ourselves against tyranny, and

2. To create in the minds of society-at-large a permanent, subconscious link between members of our community and psychopaths like Elliot Rodger, cementing into the collective consciousness that from now on any time someone is identified as a “PUA”, “MRA”, etc., they will immediately be lumped into the same crazy, pathetic pile as that fucking Martian.

The Art Of Crying Without Crying

Our first batter up is Richard Martinez, supposed father of supposed victim Christopher Michaels-Martinez. Note the hyphenated last name. Just like that giant walking vagina Jonathan Martin, here we have another feminist lawyer mother (Karen Michaels) involved in a major event who couldn’t stand to bend the knee and take her husband’s last name because patriarchy, misogyny, strong, indeblah, blah, blah. Coincidence? Methinks not. Richie is a lawyer as well, and a proud alumnus of the Will Ferrell School of Acting, specializing in the “Burgundy Method.”

In the words of the illustrious James Lipton, “You are a DELIGHT.”

Who’s On Third? Definitely Not A Man

Next, watch Abbott & Costello here seamlessly transition back and forth while reciting obviously pre-written statements. Clearly the architects of this thing neglected to do any research, because if they had they would know that nobody that goes to UCSB is that eloquent. You’ll notice that Costello keeps looking off-camera towards someone who’s clearly coaching her on what to say, and she even receives a nudge from Abbott when she fucks up her lines (e.g., 2:13). I’m sure law school graduates such as our very own Lawdogger will recognize the anchor’s blatantly leading “questions”. She’s not really asking them anything, she’s feeding them what they need to regurgitate back to her.

Clue #22 that these girls’ vaginas aren’t the only things fishy here is that UCSB was ranked the #1 party school in the western world by this very website, and I doubt they got that reputation with women like these. Two of these things are not like the others.

Elliot Rodger, Living God?

Apparently Santa Barbara County, which is one of the wealthiest counties in America, uses a couple of Mexicans to clean up their crime scenes, as opposed to the legally required CTS Decon Teams they use everywhere else. If you look closely in the video you can even see the 9mm bullet that their forensics team just left in the middle of a blood puddle instead of bagging and tagging it as evidence in a homicide.

Now, call me crazy, but I’m beginning to suspect that Elliot Rodger may indeed possess the divinity that he laid claim to in his laughable videos, because any other time a bullet flies through a human head, it usually keeps going until it impacts something solid enough to stop it, like a wall, or gravity drags it to the ground. Elliot’s bullet, however, did not keep going. It appears to have miraculously just dropped straight to the floor after exiting Christopher’s head. Also, Elliot seems to have pulled off the world’s first Immaculate Murder/Suicide by blowing both his and someone else’s head off without leaving any blood, brains, or itty-bitty pieces of skull everywhere.

While whining like a little bitch about why his $300 sunglasses and a car that's an average starter car for any teenage Southern Californian girl isn't getting him Grade-A poonani, he demonstrates his divinity by once again buttfucking the laws of physics in the "hills of Montecito." His only mistake was getting a first-year USC Film School student to do that sloppy green screen work. (Ignore the shitty soundtrack.)

We all remember when green screen first came out in films and how horrible and fake it looked. You could tell it just didn't look quite right. Your local weather girl gets better results than this. Evidently, the people who orchestrated this farce clearly believe that most Americans are either too stupid or too lazy to catch the plethora of fuckups in this little production, because they really phoned this one in. Unfortunately, they're correct. I wouldn't be surprised if they have Elliot "resurrect" himself from the dead in a few weeks just to see who would actually believe he's the Antichrist.

Just Because You're Paranoid Doesn't Mean They Aren't After You

This is what they call an orgy of evidence. It just fits together too nicely; perfectly supporting radical feminists' public assertions that we're all like this. We here know better. Our group is predominantly men who have crossed over and are learning self-improvement and discovering masculinity in order to GET women, not murder them indiscriminately. Elliot Rodger and bullshit like PUAHate.com is the world we've left behind.

Now I'm sure there are some of you even within our little brotherhood here who will look at what I've posted above and say that I'm paranoid or delusional, and that this is a site to learn game, not entertain conspiracy theories. That's fine. To each his own and you don't have to believe what I do; however, there is more to red-pill truth and masculinity than just learning game. Much more. Keep in mind, the namesake from which we draw the term "red-pill" was not a story about a man being pulled out of a dystopian fantasy world just to learn how to get some strange. As with its inspiration, the classic Nineteen Eighty-Four, it was about opening your eyes and piercing the veil of lies and propaganda that keep you under control.

In truth, the previous videos relate more to the gun control issue that I stated earlier, but this is nothing new to anyone with their eyes open. The primary issue we should focus on here is summed up in this conversation between Chris Hayes and someone who appears to be Glenn Quagmire in a wig.

You can see how they attempt to mock or trivialize what we stand for. They put quotes around "Men's Rights Movement", inferring that it's not to be taken seriously or even a real thing. They refer to us as a "crazy subculture" and "macho dudes", their voices dripping with snark. They say the phrase Alpha Male and immediately laugh condescendingly. You can tell by the fact that he won't shut the fuck up and settle down that he fervently believes what he's saying from the crown of his head down to his smooth Ken Doll nether-regions. All of this tells the public that we're basically a male cult, a bunch of loonies that should be at best ignored and at worst demonized.

Rest assured, the more they emphasize that our supposed misogynistic attitudes are fueling these women-hating losers' desire to kill, the closer we will become to being considered a hate group. As Roosh mentioned, we managed to make them run away; but make no mistake, they merely retreated to lick their wounds and formulate a new strategy with which to combat us.

You Gotta Fight! For Your Right! To Be A Man???

Personally, I don't believe in the phrase Men's Rights Movement, simply because it implies that our rights as masculine men are things we've never had and have to fight for or earn. Wrong. Our rights as men are INHERENT. The moment you were born, you inherited dominion over this planet as a member of its dominant species. Our forefathers tamed the beasts of the field, sea, and sky. They developed technology which helped us evolve from Neanderthals that communicated with grunts and gestures to the advanced civilization we are today. They unlocked the mysteries of the physical world with science and mathematics. They built anything that was worth building or taking note of.

Our rights as men need not be fought for because they were already ours to begin with. The only thing standing in our way is having the testicular fortitude to stand up and TAKE BACK that which is ours by birthright.

It won't be easy, but what worth having is? You must resign yourself to the fact that you will be hated. You will be called homophobic, racist, misogynistic, intolerant, and hateful. You will lose "friends". Your own family may turn against you. Mine has. Hell, you may even earn the honor of being named the "most-hated man on the Internet" and "The Web's most infamous misogynist", like our founder. Should your nom-de-guerre be exposed and your true identity comes to light, you run the risk of losing your job or, if they get their way, even your freedom.

It is in these moments, when I feel the cognitive dissonance of rebelling against my programming combined with the fear of going against social norms and risking ostracization, mockery, ridicule, and persecution that I remember two simple truths. The first comes from that patron saint of red-pill knowledge, George Orwell:

The more they hate and try to condemn us, the more secure I am in my conviction that we're right.

The second truth comes from this alpha motherfucker right here:

I'm sure I'm not the only one who's noticed that all the alphas on that show are portrayed as evil bastards, while all the "heroes" are Fag-O-Trons, white knight manginas, or women; just another purple-pill show with blue-pill bullshit masquerading as red-pill truth. Then again, what do you expect from an admitted feminist?*

So drop your cocks and grab your socks boys, because we've been brought out into the light for the rest of the world to see, to be put on trial in the court of public opinion for what I'm sure will, if Godwin's Law holds true, eventually amount to crimes against humanity! Make sure to poke, prod, shame, and infuriate (whether online or in public) every fattie, commie, feminist, faggot, and incel (WTF?) hater you can; and when the white knights step up, put ‘em on their back pockets and move on.

Let’s get those feminist hamsters up to Warp 10 and run those little bastards until their furry little hearts burst. Until next time, stay true to what you believe in and don’t concern yourself with the opinions of the sheep. I’ll leave you with this quote from Bernard M. Baruch: “Be who you are and say what you feel, because those that mind don’t matter and those that matter don’t mind.” Be well, men.

The Republican Party Needs To Go Away

June 6, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Reflecting on the situation

I was talking with a gentleman in the recent past about the political prospects for the 2016 presidential election. The usual blue pill topics of abortion, gun-control, immigration, and gay marriage came up. This gentleman informed me that he was voting Republican no matter what merely because he would not vote Democrat. This made me think of the duality of the two-party system and the role the Republicans play in it. It appears today that the Republican Party exists to provide a common enemy for the vast left-wing coalition that makes up the Democrat Party. Without this common enemy, there would be no unifying factor within the Democratic Party.

Observations

I find this strange that fundamentalist Muslim immigrants vote for the same party as LGBTQXYZ social justice warriors. Why is this? It is clever identity politics at work. Why do these two disparate groups vote for the same party? They do simply because they cannot vote for the other one. If the other one did not exist, they would actually have to make a choice against each other. This would shake up politics for the better.

I could go on and on forever on the cognitive dissonance of Republican policies as compared to their party platforms. Even though they state they are of a different ideological grouping, the shot callers of the Republican Party are quite similar to the shot callers of the Democrat Party. For the sake of brevity, I will use a lone Republican politician as the example here for both of these concepts. This example is Rafael Edward Cruz. In case you didn't know, he is the junior Republican Senator from the state of Texas. It would appear he forsaken the name his parents gave him to appear more American to voters. He is known as "Ted" Cruz.

It seems this Senator Cruz might actually make a run for the 2016 presidential election. This could be a problem, since the United States Constitution says only natural born citizens who have reached the age of 35 may run for president. You see, Senator Cruz was born in Canada to an American mother and a Cuban father. While legal theorists have argued that natural citizen means someone who would be one at birth due to his mother's or father's citizenship, the issue is the fact that some elements of the Tea Party have made the natural born citizen case against President Obama. If the Tea Party would support Cruz for President, it would highlight their hypocrisy because President Obama's mother was also a United States citizen.

His political grandstanding and theatrics in the Senate have made him an effective symbol to the opposition. They use him as a symbol to unite very many disparate groups. While he has become a star to the Tea Party over such issues as gun control, the affordable care act, and NSA surveillance, he has not actually done anything to further Republican policies in an affirmative way. It almost appears to be controlled opposition to me. When one looks at his education, he comes from the same place of many of the liberals he opposes came from. He did his undergraduate studies at Princeton University and he went to law school at Harvard. Those places are not known for their indoctrination in "prying it from my cold dead hands". Another interesting facet of his life is that his wife works for Goldman Sachs. Apparently, she is some sort of VP. This is a very big red flag because American politics is known for nepotism.

What would happen if the Republican Party ceased to be a mainline political institution in America? The first major occurrence would be the breakup of the Democrat Party. Without such a unifying enemy for everyone to oppose, the Democrats would implode due to ideological differences under their own tent. This would shake up politics and make people more honest to their constituents. As I said earlier, abortion, gun-control, immigration, and gay marriage are merely distractions. Important issues such as deficit spending, infrastructure development, and building the industrial base are far more important. Both parties appear to be on the same page on these issues, judging from their actions not their words.

A new idea to shake up politics

Why work to destroy Republican influence? They are the weaker of the parties in a two-party system. In order to break the left-right paradigm found in American politics today you have to get rid of one of them. The Republican Party is the easier target. While I may agree with some of the policies on the platform, they seem merely to exist for their own power on the "not democrat" vote.

How does one work to lessen the influence of the Republican Party? Simple, do not vote for them and do not donate any money to them. What happens when the Democrats get total control? I can read demographical statistics—the Democrats will get total control in the future anyway. It is better to bring that day of reckoning forward instead of kicking the can down the street and giving federal retirements to ungrateful politicians on both sides of the aisle with that extra time. If you cannot bring yourself to vote Democrat, just write your own name in the ballot. Do not give away your vote by default.

New York City Spinsters Fly To San Francisco To Meet Rich Beta Nerds

June 6, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Every now and then, the gods bless us with a natural experiment that proves our concepts down the marrow. Recently a new “dating” service attempted to match up NYC spinsters with men in Silicon Valley. These golddiggers-in-training are well past their prime, as you can see in the below group photo, and that assumes that some of them actually ever experienced a prime.

Not the best of what NYC can offer

They have been tainted by hundreds of combined years on the cock carousel, of getting rode 50 Shades-style by aloof men who didn't ultimately didn't want to wife them up. In spite of an American dating market that values the vagina as if it was a large nugget of gold, they believed that pulling a Roosh was the solution to their problem. Of course they are called adventurous and open-minded while we're sex tourists who "take advantage" of "poor" foreign women, but let's give them the benefit of the doubt for a minute. Can they now find it in their souls to put all their cock experience and Tinder hookups aside to find the rich beta male they can have a family with?

> On the plane, my seatmate flirts with the dashing Qatari journalist sitting between us. I eavesdrop, then ostentatiously put my earbuds in, but in fact I am still eavesdropping. When we land, they exchange business cards. This girl is not messing around.

Not a good start. A girl is flying over to meet rich nerds, but can't help herself in getting tingles for a good-looking guy.

> All 16 dates are occurring simultaneously at the same bar, which is a blessing, since gossiping about dates is more fun than actually going on them.

Drama and gossip is more important than talking to rich betas, I'm sure.

> My first date is Greg, a tall, dark, and handsome 37-year-old Yahoo employee who used to support himself as a professional pickup artist, though he prefers the term "social coach." Moved by a character in The Game known as "Juggler," a young Greg sought Juggler out and apprenticed with him, eventually working full-> time for Juggler's company, Charisma Arts. "Honestly, most of the guys I coached just needed to practice eye contact and basic stuff like smiling," he says. Did it work? "Well, a bunch of them have girlfriends now. And I don't."

(I was never into Juggler's style of self-effacement in order to show some kind of 'authentic' vulnerability.)

It's soon made clear in the article that the dating agency couldn't find the promised rich men who wanted the golddiggers. What a surprise that sharp millionaires aren't lining up to meet week-old milk.

> Greg 2.0 agreed to participate in our bicoastal dating experiment because he loves San Francisco so much, he wants to evangelize. He's looking for a serious girlfriend, and while he talks about these deeply personal matters, I exercise my peripheral vision in search of Greg 1.0 [Juggler].

The PUA provided more tingles than the nice guy. American women are the first to shame game tactics, but they can't help using "peripheral vision" in seeking them out.

Which would you bang?

> Alexa, a 24-year-old pop singer who has a song called “Twitter (Spaces in Between My Heart),” summons a bunch of jocks she met that morning at the gym. (Alexa’s first date offered to take her and the female friend of her choice to Napa Valley. She declined.) When the guys offer to take us to a hip-hop club, Alexa bends over and announces, “I’m gonna twerk my little thang!” A few drinks later at the club, my thang gets into a few undignified positions, too.

It must be humiliating for the nerds to think these girls want to meet them, flying across the country to do so, only to bring along cocks that they just met a couple hours prior. It’s almost like a pathological obsession to seek out cock (alpha or otherwise) in creating an orbiting universe of men around them.

> Some of the men at this party are more eccentric than those we received as matches. A programmer who donated “several hundred dollars” to the Crowdtilt likens the donation to “giving $2 to a homeless person.” In an affectless voice, he analyzes the relative Asian-ness of each of my facial features, then explains his frustration with online dating: “I prefer to use reality as my platform. There’s zero latency, no lag. Do you know what lag is? When you do something online, you don’t get a response right away. Meeting women in reality — boom! — fully responsive.”

The programmer man has a great point—real-life interactions have no latency.

The author finally met a rich guy, but apparently nothing happened:

> I meet an angel investor who admits he gave to the Crowdtilt to butter up CEO Lauren Kay so she'd accept his money. "With these Y Combinator companies, sometimes so many people want to invest that they end up turning down money," he explained. He'd given money to the Dating Ring to secure the chance to give even more money to the Dating Ring. He wouldn't tell me how much he invested, but did mention a desire to buy an airplane.

The insinuation of buying a jet provided zero tingles, even though these women predominately wanted a rich beta (it would be like me flying to Ukraine to meet a beautiful girl, finding an 8, then rejecting her because she has a different accent than mine). Once a woman has had her mind primed to reward tingles over resources, she can't easily make the switch back.

> Around midnight, I am informed that half of those girls are curled up in the fetal position, crying. I report to the triage room, where I stroke a woman's hair while trying to hide how excited I am to eat my brownie, now that I know it is strong enough to make grown women cry. This is also a good way to evaluate men, if you're into sexy bad boys.

In spite of being surrounded by both alpha and beta cock for days, the women are not happy and resort to crying for no stated reason. Their health is apparently good, they are solidly middle class, they are educated, and they are surrounded by all types of men, who they often reject for trivial reasons. What more can they possible want in order to be happy?

> After five days of nonstop meeting and greeting, the tacit permission to ignore everyone is a sweet relief. A 32-inch seat in economy class has never felt so private.

A mission to meet men in a sausage city still failed. It's clear to me that no matter how old these women get, and how lonely they become, they will be unable to accept "settling" for a beta male programmer or otherwise normal man, simply because their asses have cemented to a carousal that—as far as we're led to believe by the culture—is supposed to only be part of a "sexual experimentation" phase. Too bad for these women that they've made it into a permanent lifestyle that will prevent them from long-term pair bonding and motherhood. The ultimate irony is the following picture, uploaded with excitement on Instagram by one of the female participants:

Carousels indeed.

A Close Examination Of Elliot Rodger's Twisted Manifesto

June 7, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

When I finished reading Elliot Rodger's manifesto, I felt like I just read a script whose main character had shades of the combined personalities of Taxi Driver's Travis Bickle + American Psycho's Patrick Bateman + Psycho's Norman Bates .

If you'd download his manifesto, you'd find within it:

The word "sex" (including associated derivatives) is found a whopping 189 times.

The word "game" is found 89 times – overwhelmingly pertaining to Rodger's penchant of video games.

The word "retribution" is found 72 times.

The word "virgin" (and its derivatives) is found 70 times.

The word "blonde" (including "blondes"), is found 60 times.

Blondes, whether male or female, are Rodger's fixation, and his racial ideal.

The word "hate" (including "hatred") is found 48 times.

The word "pain" and "suffering" are found 32 times and 39 times respectively.

The word "kill" is found 38 times.

The word "reject" (including its derivatives) is found 34 times.

The word "deserve" (including "deserved") is found 30 times, mostly in his self entitling statements.

The words "jealous" *(*including" jealousy) and "obnoxious" are found 29 times each.

The words "superior" (including "superiority"), and "inferior" (including "inferiority") are found 12 times and 26 times respectively.

The words "envy" and its derivative "envious" are found 26 times and 12 times respectively.

The word "God" (including "Godfather" and "Goddess") is found 13 times throughout the document – out of which Rodger refers to himself as 'God' on 9 occasions. The only instance of the word 'Goddess' appears when he describes a blonde (his fixation), which shows he used to pedestalize blondes as divine.

The word "player" (with its derivatives) is found 9 times, and not a single instance of it deals with seduction (game) theory.

The word "alpha" is found 7 times, and only two instances of it are linked to the word "alpha male".

The word "PUA" is found 3 times, and each instance deals with the site PUAHate.com

The word "pickup" is found 3 times, and none of them deals with seduction.

The words "slutty" and "whore" are found once each.

The words "red pill", "misogyny" , "manosphere", "beta" , "seduction (or seduce)" are not found even ONCE.

Elliot Rodger was mentally ill. His manifesto reveals that people around him saw the red flag of his mental problems, but callous neglect of his case further led to his misanthropy.

I mentioned before about the social dangers which modern men face, which contribute to the psychological sexual desensitization of modern men. Mentally ill men like Elliot Rodger who are in need of proper counseling and support, cannot adapt to the dysfunctional social paradigms that we have constructed and are presently living in.

Elliot's mind

Rodger's twisted personality from the manifesto reveals:

- Psychological problems
- Inability to accept that life isn't fair
- Thinking was primarily emotional, not logical
- Extreme jealousy, covetousness and capriciousness which would later drive his rage
- An entitled mindset wanting and expecting everything without effort
- Pedestalization of sex, and self-loathing because of his virginity
- A love of utopian fantasy and materialism
- Hatred of anyone who irritated his grandiose dreams
- Fear of physical confrontation, rejection and associated flighty behavior
- Attention seeking behavior by whining and crying
- Racial fetish: blonde fixation and white race pedestalization – half-Asian Elliot pedestalized white blonde females as the ultimate women
- Racial antipathy to those who he considered as lower races
- An inability to separate facts from fiction, and believe anything which held emotional appeal to him
- Self-pity whenever something was denied to him
- A crabby demeanor which used to take hurt to imaginary slights
- A need to fit into the crowd through sexual validation
- Distrust towards his family and others
- Passive-aggressiveness, secretiveness and sneaky behavior
- "If I can't have it, no one should" mindset
- Emotion driven feminine responses (e.g. his approach to eating)

My favorite part of the trip was the breakfasts at the hotel. The hotel we stayed at was quite luxurious, even by my standards. And the breakfasts… they were absolutely delicious. Every morning there was a buffet full of delectable choices, such as crispy pork sausage, croissants, bacon, ham, roast potatoes, all kinds of fruit, and much more. On every one of those mornings, I stuffed myself like there was no tomorrow. I was deprived of sex all my life, so the only vice that I could derive a sense of pleasure from was eating delicious food. I took full advantage of that on this trip. My high metabolism prevented me from getting fat from it.

Furthermore, the timeline of events in his manifesto reveal that the actual seeds of misanthropy took root much before in Rodger's teens, and not after he came to university. He was already a latent misanthrope, waiting to explode, by the time he had reached his school.

Exploring the numerous factors which led to the violence

(click on thumbnails to expand)

An envy driven personality:

1. By nature, I am a very jealous person, and at the age of nine my jealous nature sprung to the surface. During playdates with James, sometimes he would have other friends over as well, and I would feel very jealous and upset when he paid more attention to them. Feeling left out, I would find a quiet corner and start crying. My mother and Kim were very understanding, and did the best they could to console me.

   On the rare occurrence that my mother would have Maddy and Mo over for dinner, or if we would go to visit them at their house, Maddy often played with my little sister Georgia instead of me, and this too made me jealous. I remember all the times I cried when this happened.

   Jealousy and envy... those are two feelings that would dominate my entire life and bring me immense pain. The feelings of jealousy I felt at nine-years-old were frustrating, but they were nothing compared to how I would feel once I hit puberty and have to watch girls choosing other boys over me. Any problem I had at nine-years-old was nirvana compared to what I was doomed to face.

2. offer. Groups of young people walked about in their little cliques. It reminded me to State Street in Santa Barbara, as well as Isla Vista. As I watched all of those obnoxious boys walking around with their beautiful blonde girlfriends, I wanted to run them all over with my father's Mercedes SUV. I fantasized about how delightful that would be. To literally crush their lives to a pulp, just like they had crushed mine. I tried as hard as I could to hide my envy-fueled rage from Philip and Addison. Philip was easy to fool, but Addison could tell how enraged I was. Addison knew me all too well.

Narcissism:

As time progressed, I realized how hopeless everything in my life was. The chances that I will ever rise to power and right the wrongs of the world were extremely slim. I had absolutely no idea or plan of how to acquire any sort of power. It was naive of me to think that I could one day become a dictator. The only thing I could do was fantasize about it.

And do read the paragraphs where he refers to himself as "God".

Exposure to pornography at a young age:

One time while I was alone at Planet Cyber, I saw an older teenager watching pornography. I saw in detail a video of a man having sex with a hot girl. The video showed him stick his penis inside a girl's vagina. I didn't know anything about sex at the time. I barely even knew what sex was. I was slowly starting to develop sexual feelings for hot girls, but I didn't know what to do with them. To see this video really traumatized me. I had no idea what I was seeing... I couldn't imagine human beings doing such things with each other. The sight was shocking, traumatizing, and arousing. All of these feelings mixed together took a great toll on me. I walked home and cried by myself for a bit. I felt too guilty about what I saw to talk to my parents about it. I was quite shaken for a few days.

This was among the very first glimpses I had of sex. Finding out about sex is one of the things that truly destroyed my entire life. Sex... the very word fills me with hate. Once I hit puberty, I would always want it, like any other boy. I would always hunger for it, I would always covet it, I would always fantasize about it. But I would never get it. Not getting any sex is what will shape the very foundation of my miserable youth. This was a very dark day.

Negative childhood experiences with females:

At this camp, an incident happened that would scar me for life. The first time that I was treated badly by a girl occurred at this camp. I was innocently playing with the friends I made, and they were tickling me, something people always did because I was very ticklish. I accidently bumped into a pretty girl the same age as me, and she got very angry. She cursed at me and pushed me, embarrassing me in front of my friends. I didn't know who this girl was... She was only at Pinecrest for summer camp... But she was very pretty, and she was taller than me. I immediately froze up and went into a state of shock. One of my friends asked me if I was ok, and I didn't answer. I remained very quiet for the rest of the day.

I couldn't believe what had happened. Cruel treatment from women is ten times worse than from men. It made me feel like an insignificant, unworthy little mouse. I felt so small and vulnerable. I couldn't believe that this girl was so horrible to me, and I thought that it was because she viewed me as a loser. That was the first experience of female cruelty I endured, and it traumatized me to no end. It made me even more nervous around girls, and I would be extremely weary and cautious of them from that point on.

A permissive society and media which over-sexualizes young children, making them think sex as a form of self-validation:

1. The boys in my grade talked about sex a lot. Some of them even told me that they had sex with their girlfriends. This was the most devastating and traumatizing thing I've ever heard in my life. Boys having sex at my age of Fourteen? I couldn't fathom it. How is it that they were able to have such intimate and pleasurable experiences with girls while I could only fantasize about it? I frequently started asking myself. This was an all-boys school... How in the hell were those boys even able to meet girls to have sex with? I wondered. I hoped they were lying. I hoped against all hope. Hearing that really shook me to the core. Words cannot describe how much hatred and envy I felt for those boys. That hatred would only fester the more I suffer from my sexual starvation. I was too scared to tell anyone about it, and I hid it well... for a time.

2. The very last day of Ninth Grade was the worst. I was having P.E. at the gym, and one of my obnoxious classmates named Jesse was bragging about having sex with his girlfriend. I defiantly told him that I didn't believe him, so he played a voice recording of what sounded like him and his girlfriend having sex. I could hear a girl saying his name over and over again while she panted franticly. He grinned at me smugly. I felt so inferior to him, and I hated him. It was at that moment that I was called to the office. When I got there, my mother was waiting for me to take me home. I cried heavily as I told her about what happened earlier. That was the last day I ever set foot in Crespi Carmelite High School.

3. At father's house, we watched the movie Alpha Dog after dinner one night. This movie depicts a lot of teenagers and young people partying and having sex with beautiful girls, living the life that I've desired for so long. The main character is a fifteen year old kid who has sex with two hot girls in a swimming pool. I was so envious that I delighted in his death at the end. I remember thinking that I would rather live his life than mine, even though he died. He had sex and I didn't. The movie deeply affected me emotionally, and I would think about it for some time afterwards.

4. One day I found some posts on the internet about teenagers having sex, and I was once again reminded of the life I had been denied. I felt that no girl would ever want to have sex with me... And I developed extreme feelings of envy, hatred, and anger towards anyone who has a sex life. I saw them as the enemy. I felt condemned to live a life of lonely celibacy while other boys were allowed to experience the pleasures of sex, all because girls didn't want me. I felt inferior and undesirable. This time, however, I couldn't just stand by and accept such an injustice anymore. I refused to continue hiding away from the world and forgetting about all the insults it dealt to me.

Peer shaming for males using sex:

During that same week, I had a climactic meeting with Philip and Addison where my noxious feud with Addison Altendorf reached a boiling point. We went on an outing to the Griffith Park Observatory, as we usually did when we got together. This time, my arguments with Addison were very intense. I tried to insult him as much as I could, in a petty attempt to get revenge at him for all the insults and slights he dealt to me. We went back and forth at each other for the whole evening, to the chagrin of poor Philip who had to put up with it. By the end of the night, Addison said something to me that was so offensive it will haunt me forever, and it rang true: "No girl in this whole world will ever want to fuck you."

I already felt that no girl in the world wanted to fuck me. I was a kissless virgin after all. That was the sole reason why I was suffering. But to hear it come from someone else, someone like Addison, really caused it to sink into core of my mentality and emotions.

That whole night made for a very vile and wicked experience. I decided not to see Philip and Addison for a long time.

His conjecture that he lacked a support base:

1. My misery became harder and harder to bear, and none of my parents understood my plight. My father thought that all was well with me. How could he be so blind? He was so caught up in his failing work that he didn't care about how my life was turning out. I cursed him for it. My father never made any effort to prepare me for facing such a cruel world. He never taught me how to attract girls. He never warned me that if I didn't attract girls at an early age, my life would fall into a miserable pit of despair! Again... How could he be so blind? I asked myself constantly.

2. Soumaya returned from Morocco, and she was very angry with me due to the way I acted while I was there. She effectively kicked me out of father's house, and because I was eighteen, she was allowed to. Father didn't do anything to stop her, being the weak man that he is. This is how it has always been. Father has always given Soumaya free reign to impose her rules on the household. He gave her all the power.

   This act officially ended the one week-one week arrangement, and mother's house became my permanent living place.

   Not only did she kick me out of father's house, but she forbade me to go there even for a short visit. And still, father didn't do anything about it. Father kept saying that the house is her house as much as his, and that she has the right to kick me out. No! I am the eldest son! The house should be MY house before hers! This caused any respect I still had for my father to fade away completely. It was such a betrayal, to put his second wife before his eldest son. What kind of father would do that? The bitch must be really good to him in bed, I figured. What a weak man.

Realization of a modern twisted masculinity social paradigm at a young age:

I also observed the girls. I was still very short for my age, and most of the girls were taller than me. I hadn't reached puberty yet, but I was starting to admire female prettiness. There was one group of pretty, popular girls, and they all seemed to like hanging out with that boy Robert Morgan. I didn't yet desire girls sexually, but I still felt envy towards Robert for being able to attract the attention of all the popular girls. What was so special about Robert Morgan? I constantly asked myself.

I thought all of the cool kids were obnoxious jerks, but I tried as best as I could to hide my disgust and appear "cool" to them. They were obnoxious jerks, and yet somehow it was these boys who all of the girls flocked to. This showed me that the world was a brutal place, and human beings were nothing more than savage animals. Everything my father taught me was proven wrong. He raised me to be a polite, kind gentleman. In a decent world, that would be ideal. But the polite, kind gentleman doesn't win in the real world. The girls don't flock to the gentlemen. They flock to the alpha male. They flock to the boys who appear to have the most power and status. And it was a ruthless struggle to reach such a height.

It was too much for me to handle. I was still a little boy with a fragile mind. Thinking about such things would only crush my innocence, and it eventually will. But not at this point. I subconsciously wanted to

Formation of his 'asexual utopia':

Addison was once in the same position as I, but right when he succeeded in integrating with the popular kids, he betrayed me and treated me the same way the popular kids treated me, as if I'm lowlife scum. The world truly is a brutal place, where a man must fight a bitter struggle against all other men to reach the top. Humans are nothing but vicious beasts in a jungle.

I delved more into learning as much as I could from books at Barnes & Noble. I expanded on the political and philosophical ideals I concocted when I was seventeen, and I soon became even more radical about them than I ever was before. It was all fueled by my wish to punish everyone who is sexually active, because I concluded that it wasn't fair that other people were able to experience sex while I have been denied it all my life. I started to have the desire to create a world where no one is allowed to have sex or relationships. I again saw that as the perfect, fair world. Reproduction can be accomplished without sex, through artificial insemination. Sex is evil, as it gives too much pleasure to those who don't deserve it.

Modern shallow cultural materialism which shaped his perception of life and how he sought to emulate the rich out of envy:

1. While roaming around the after party, I bore witness to many successful young men who pranced in with their hot model girlfriends. Some of them were even actors my own age, stars of the movie. I had a particular burning hatred for the actor Alexander Ludwig, who I saw sitting arrogantly on a couch as people crowded around him in adoration. I hated everything about him; his golden blonde hair; his tall, muscular frame; his cocky, masculine face. That boy could get any girl he wanted. His life was completely opposite from my own. If only I could get a taste of how he lived for just one day... As I saw all of these successful young men with their beautiful dates, I became even more convinced about how important money and status was in attaining a desirable life of love and sex. It made me even more obsessed with my goal of becoming wealthy at a very young age. That was the only way to live life.

2. There had to be a way for me to become wealthy. I continued to see it was the only way I would ever have a beautiful girlfriend and lose my virginity. My ultimate dream was to experience the pleasures of love and sex with girls once I become rich enough to be worthy of them, and then I would settle down with a beautiful girlfriend and have beautiful children with her, whom I would raise up to live a much better life than the one I've had to suffer through. That would be the most satisfying vengeance against all those young people who thought they were better than me. If I could show them that I lived such a life, my purpose on this world would be complete. To see the look on all of their faces once I've risen above them... I couldn't imagine anything sweeter.

3. was meant for me. Who else deserved such a victory? I had been through so much rejection, suffering, and injustice in my life, and this was to be my salvation. With my whole body filled with feverish hope, I spent $700 dollars on lottery tickets for this drawing. As I spent this money, I imagined all the amazing sex I would have with a beautiful model girlfriend I would have once I become a man of wealth.

4. I immediately thought about that couple, and how impossible it was for me to have the same experience as that guy. Impossible, as I was at that point. But it would be possible for me to get a tall, blonde, sexy girlfriend if I was a multi-millionaire! Oh yes, it would be very possible. Becoming a multi-millionaire is the ONLY way I could have such an experience, and winning the lottery was the ONLY way I could become a multi-millionaire at my age. As I stared at the Powerball jackpot that was over $500 million, I knew that I HAD to win it.

A perception of a dysfunctional world for which he never found answers:

In Santa Barbara, I spent almost all of my time in my room, brooding. I began building on all of my philosophical views and theories about the world. I had to question why things were the way they were. The world is so twisted, and I wanted answers.

Psychological problems:

In addition, I was a bit shocked when Spencer told me that he used to have a girlfriend. It was a casual comment that came out of a conversation we had. I didn't understand how a chubby and unattractive guy like Spencer would have been able to get a girlfriend, while I've never had the chance to. The guy was three inches shorter than me, and even I am considered short for my age. I could not fathom how such a thing was possible, and I concluded to myself that this former "girlfriend" of his that he mentioned must have been just as unattractive as he was. There was no need for me to be jealous. After a few weeks of living with him, I realized that I had a psychological problem with his presence in my apartment. Even though there was no trouble between us, I hated having someone constantly in my vicinity to judge how pathetic my life was. I could hide the details of my lonely, celibate life from the rest of the world, but I could not hide it from Spencer. The fact that I never had any girls over to my room was clear enough that I was an undesirable outcast, and I hated it when people knew this about me and judged me for it. Spencer was there to witness it all, and I would eventually come to hate him just because of that.

Racist bigotry:

My first week turned out to be very unpleasant, leaving a horrific first impression of my new life in Santa Barbara. My two housemates were nice, but they kept inviting over this friend of theirs named Chance. He was black boy who came over all the time, and I hated his cocksure attitude. Inevitably, a vile incident occurred between me and him. I was eating a meal in the kitchen when he came over and started bragging to my housemates about his success with girls. I couldn't stand it, so I proceeded to ask them all if they were virgins. They all looked at me weirdly and said that they had lost their virginity long ago. I felt so inferior, as it reminded me of how much I have missed out in life. And then this black boy named Chance said that he lost his virginity when he was only thirteen! In addition, he said that the girl he lost his virginity to was a blonde white girl! I was so enraged that I almost splashed him with my orange juice. I indignantly told him that I did not believe him, and then I went to my room to cry. I cried and cried and cried, and then I called my mother and cried to her on the phone.

How could an inferior, ugly black boy be able to get a white girl and not me? I am beautiful, and I am half white myself. I am descended from British aristocracy. He is descended from slaves. I deserve it more. I tried not to believe his foul words, but they were already said, and it was hard to erase from my mind. If this is actually true, if this ugly black filth was able to have sex with a blonde white girl at the age of thirteen while I've had to suffer virginity all my life, then this just proves how ridiculous the female gender is. They would give themselves to this filthy scum, but they reject ME? The injustice!

There were about one hundred people at that party, and everyone was socializing with a group of friends except for me. I walked around in my drunken confidence for a few moments, helped myself to the beer they had, and tried to act like a normal party-goer. I soon became frustrated that no one was paying any attention to me, particularly the girls. I saw girls talking to other guys who looked like obnoxious slobs, but none of them showed any interest in me. As my frustration grew, so did my anger. I came across this Asian guy who was talking to a white girl. The sight of that filled me with rage. I always felt as if white girls thought less of me because I was half-Asian, but then I see this white girl at the party talking to a full-blooded Asian. I never had that kind of attention from a white girl! And white girls are the only girls I'm attracted to, especially the blondes. How could an ugly Asian attract the attention of a white girl, while a beautiful Eurasian like myself never had any attention from them? I thought with rage. I glared at them for a bit, and then decided I had been insulted enough. I angrily walked toward them and bumped the Asian guy aside, trying to act cocky and arrogant to both the boy and the girl. My drunken state got the better of me, and I almost fell over to the floor after a few minutes of this. They said something along the lines that I was very drunk and that I needed to get some water, so I angrily left them and went out to the front yard, where the main partying happened. Rage fumed inside me as I realized that I just walked away from that confrontation, so I rushed back into the house and spitefully insulted the Asian before walking outside again.

Inability to handle exposure to modern over-sexualized female behavior:

I remained in my hometown for a couple of weeks, and then I went back to Santa Barbara, the place of beauty and romance that I've had to suffer in lonely hell. I only signed up for online classes for the Spring semester, but that was only to placate my parents. I didn't see the point in even bothering with college anymore. Having to walk through SBCC with all of those beautiful girls strutting around in their revealing shorts, showing off their sexy legs... It is torture, because I know that they would all reject me.

After a Spring season spent in absolute despair while other young people lived healthy lives of sexual pleasure, summer arrived. Summer is even worse than Spring, especially in Santa Barbara. Flocks of hot, young girls go out in their shorts and bikini's, further tantalizing my sex-starved body every time I look at them. Knowing that they gleefully show off their desirable forms, yet they would never give me a chance to be their boyfriend only increased my already boiling hatred towards all women. I could not leave my apartment without seeing at least a few of them. The only place I could go where I could be at peace was the Lake Park in Goleta. I spent a lot of time there, trying to establish a sense peace and serenity whenever my loneliness in Isla Vista became too unbearable. As I looked at all of the beautiful trees around me, and the towering mountains in the background, I wondered how a world so beautiful can be such a dark and cruel place. Indeed, a beautiful environment is the darkest hell if you have to experience
2. it all alone, while other men get to enjoy the company of women.

On one of the days in July, when I was roaming around Girsh Park, a group of popular college kids arrived to play kickball in the fields. They all looked like typical fraternity jocks, tall and muscular. The kind of guys I've hated and envied all my life. With them came a flock of beautiful blonde girls, and they looked like they were having so much fun playing together. One of the girls did a handstand in the grass, and her sexy bare stomach showed as her shirt hung down. All of the girls were scantily clad. Rage boiled inside me as I watched those people who thought they were better than me enjoying their
3. pleasurable little lives together. The rage was so intense that I couldn't take it. I was insulted too much. I

On Halloween weekend, I made the wise decision to go home to my mother's house. There was no way I was going to torture myself by staying alone in my room while the entire town of Isla Vista erupted in raucous debauchery. All of the tall, hunky jocks that girls love so much will be having all of the sex and all of the fun, while an unwanted outcast like myself would rot in loneliness. I imagined that some attractive guys who only visited Isla Vista for the Halloween event will be getting laid that weekend. They'd be getting sex from just one night in Isla Vista, while I'm still a virgin after living there for over a year. It was too unfair. I wanted to punish them all. I imagined how sweet it would be to slaughter all of those evil, slutty bitches who rejected me, along with the fraternity jocks they throw themselves at. To see them all running from me in fear as I kill them left and right, that would be the ultimate retribution. Only then would I have all the power. They treated me like an insignificant little mouse, but on the Day
4. of Retribution, I would be a God to them. They will be the mice, and I will be the predator. I considered

Hatred of people who had sex:

I visited my mother's house quite often in the Autumn. To my extreme rage, I discovered that my sister now had a boyfriend, and that she had lost her virginity. She had casually "dated" boys in the past, but never to the serious extent that she did with this one. This one was a half White, half Mexican named Samuel, and I immediately took an intense disliking to him when I was first introduced to him. He seemed like the typical obnoxious slob that most young girls are sexually attracted to. Georgia invited him to my mother's house all the time, and it angered me to watch him lurking about, eating my mother's food and drinks, and making use of my mother's house. He was freeloading off my mother, and she didn't even realize it.

I eventually grew to hate him after I heard him having sex with my sister. I arrived at the house one day, my mother being at work, and heard the sounds of Samuel plunging his penis into my sister's vagina through her closed room door, along with my sister's moans. I stood there and listened to it all. So my sister, who was four years younger than me, managed to lose her virginity before I did. It reminded me of how pathetic I was, that at the age of twenty-two, I was still a virgin. I hated her boyfriend as well. My sister said that he's been with other girls before her, and I'm sure he lost his virginity at a much younger age. It is such an injustice. The slob doesn't even have a car, and he is able to get girlfriends, while I drive a BMW and get no attention from any girls whatsoever.

My sister even showed me a picture of one of his ex-girlfriends, a pretty brunette white girl. My hatred towards him only intensified after that. I refused to speak to him whenever he came over, and I constantly pestered my mother to ban him from the house, but she refused to heed my demands. Even worse, she constantly talked about him admiringly. He reminded me of Leo Bubenheim, a typical obnoxious boy who has been able to experience a great sex life from a young age. An enemy had now infiltrated the household of my mother, the one place in the whole world where I've always sought refuge from injustice. Things were getting too out of hand.

They decided to take my sister's boyfriend Samuel to England with them, and upon hearing this I became very infuriated. Samuel was my enemy, someone who has enjoyed a happy life of sex while I have starved for years. And now my own mother was paying for his ticket to England, something he doesn't deserve. I felt so betrayed by my mother because of this. She should have been more considerate for how I would feel. I am her son, and she should be on my side. But then again, my mother is a woman, and women are all mentally ill. There was no way she could possibly understand my point of view.

2.

My whole world twisted even deeper into darkness and despair as my depressing life continued on. My hatred for people who have sex festered inside me like a plague. I frequently went on walks around town to brood over how hopeless and unfair everything was. It was better than being stuck in my room all the time. When I saw young couples walking around at the mall, my anger and hatred intensified greatly. It was the worst torture ever to see them making out and being intimate. My life, if you can call it a life, was living hell.

3.

Fallacious thinking that women respond more to reason than emotion when it comes to attraction, and his subsequent inability to accept the reality:

I titled one of the videos I uploaded "Why do girls hate me so much?" in which I ask the entire population of women the question I've wanted to ask them for so many years. Why do they hate me so much? Why have they never fancied me? Why do they give their love and sex to other men, but not me, even though I deserve them more? In the video, I show that I am the perfect, magnificent gentleman, worthy of having a beautiful girlfriend, making the world see how unreasonable it is that I've had to struggle all my life to get a girlfriend. It is my attempt to reason with the female gender, to ask them why they have mistreated me. I was hoping I would get some sort of answer from girls. In fact, a small part of me was even hoping that a girl would see the video and contact me to give me a chance to go on a date. That alone would have prevented the Day of Retribution, if one girl had just given me one chance. But no... As expected, I got absolutely no response from any girls. The only responses I got were from other men who called me names and made fun of me. Women don't care about me at all. They won't even deign to tell my why they've mistreated me. This just shows how evil and sadistic they are. Oh well, they will realize the gravity of their crimes when I slaughter them all on the Day of Retribution. How dare they reject a magnificent gentleman like me!

2. I hated all of those obnoxious, boisterous men who were able to enjoy pleasurable sex lives with beautiful girls, but I hated the girl's even more, because they were the ones who chose those men instead of me. It was their choice. They are the ones who deprived me of love and sex.

Misanthropy born out of sexual frustration:

His following statement at age 17 directly rebutts feminists who fallaciously accuse PUAs and the manosphere of influencing Rodger into "misogyny".

1. I began to have fantasies of becoming very powerful and stopping everyone from having sex. I wanted to take their sex away from them, just like they took it away from me. I saw sex as an evil and barbaric act, all because I was unable to have it. This was the major turning point. My anger made me stronger inside. This was when I formed my ideas that sex should be outlawed. It is the only way to make the world a fair and just place. If I can't have it, I will destroy it. That's the conclusion I came to, right then and there.

   I spent more time studying the world, seeing the world for the horrible, unfair place it is. I then had the revelation that just because I was condemned to suffer a life of loneliness and rejection, doesn't mean I am insignificant. I have an exceptionally high level of intelligence. I see the world differently than anyone else. Because of all of the injustices I went through and the worldview I developed because of them, I must be destined for greatness. I must be destined to change the world, to shape it into an image that suits me!

2. I wanted to do horrible things to that couple. I wanted to inflict pain on all young couples. It was around this point in my life that I realized I was capable of doing such things. I would happily do such things. I was capable of killing them, and I wanted to. I wanted to kill them slowly, to strip the skins off their flesh. They deserve it. The males deserve it for taking the females away from me, and the females deserve it for choosing those males instead of me.

   Ever since I was seventeen, I often fantasized about becoming powerful and inflicting suffering upon everyone who has wronged me in the past, but I never thought I would actually do it. At this point, after going through so much suffering and injustice, all of my innocence had been swept away. The world had been cruel to me, and it molded me to become strong enough to actually have the capability of returning that cruelness to the world. I had never been a violent person in nature, but after building up so much hatred over the years, I realized that I wouldn't hesitate to kill or even torture my hated enemies if I was given the opportunity.

His 'day of retribution' was to be on the 'good looking' individuals whom he hated:

It's too graphic to quote in entirety here. Search "retribution "in his manifesto to read it in detail.

I will torture some of the good looking people before I kill them, assuming that the good looking ones had the best sex lives.

The final phase was also to include some members of Elliot's family. A misanthrope who believes in even not sparing his own family, that was what Elliot Rodger had become.

Evasion from authorities allowed him leeway:

After only a week passed since I uploaded those videos on Youtube, I heard a knock on my apartment door. I opened it to see about seven police officers asking for me. As soon as I saw those cops, the biggest fear I had ever felt in my life overcame me. I had the striking and devastating fear that someone had somehow discovered what I was planning to do, and reported me for it. If that was the case, the police would have searched my room, found all of my guns and weapons, along with my writings about what I plan to do with them. I would have been thrown in jail, denied of the chance to exact revenge on my enemies. I can't imagine a hell darker than that. Thankfully, that wasn't the case, but it was so close.

Apparently, someone saw my videos and became instantly suspicious of me. They called some sort of health agency, who called the police to check up on me. The police told me it was my mother who called them, but my mother told me it was the health agency. My mother had watched the videos and was very disturbed by them. I don't suppose I'll ever know the full truth of who called the police on me. The police interrogated me outside for a few minutes, asking me if I had suicidal thoughts. I tactfully told them that it was all a misunderstanding, and they finally left. If they had demanded to search my room... That would have ended everything. For a few horrible seconds I thought it was all over. When they left, the biggest wave of relief swept over me. It was so scary.

It was all because of the videos. I must have expressed too much anger in them. I immediately took most of them off of Youtube, and planned to reupload them a few days before the Day of Retribution. This incident made me realize that I needed to be extra careful. I can't let anyone become suspicious of me. All it takes is for one person to call the police and tell them that they think I'm going to perpetrate a shooting, and the police will be coming to my door again, demanding to search my room. For the next few days, I felt extremely fearful that they could show up anytime. I kept one of my handguns with a few loaded magazines near me just in case such a thing did happen. If they did show up, I would have to try to quickly shoot them all and escape out the back window. I would then have to perform a hasty mockery of my plans, with the police on my tail. That will ruin everything. Thankfully, all suspicion of me was dropped after I took down the videos from Youtube, and the police never came back.

What does one infer from reading all the above passages?

Mental illness + sexual frustration + racial bigotry + twisted callous permissive social paradigms + violent culture + class warfare+ callous treatment of his case, inspite of an attempt of intervention by his family = Monstrous rampage of misanthropy.

A mud-slinging campaign of irresponsible lies

With debate still going on the possible causes, feminists have already solely blamed PUAs and the manosphere for this tragedy. I wonder—before launching a war of irresponsible criminal yellow journalism full of myths which seeks to solely associate Rodger's violence with PUA and manosphere influence—did these feminist mud slingers bother to even read his manifesto and analyze it to identify these numerous factors, and to even understand that his psychotic misanthropy began much before his teens, and that he was anti-PUA himself?

One of the absurd apologetic theories being thrown around by feminists is that misogynists hate men too. Isn't 'misanthrope', the correct word for such a person who has hatred for both sexes?

Was Elliot Rodger in fact mentally ill, and not a PUA-influenced misogynist as claimed by feminists?

If Elliot Rodger was really a PUA-influenced "misogynist' as claimed by feminists, then:

- Why didn't he approach women?
- Why did he want to kill men as well?
- Why did he frequent an anti PUA site, which rubbished PUAs, i.e. PUA Hate.com?

In the timeline in his manifesto, Rodger discovered PUAHate in the spring of 2013 (at 21 or so), much later after his hatred of 'young' and 'beautiful' people who got sex had already been formed in his mind. Rodger had originally planned his day of retribution to be on Halloween 2013, and he had chosen Isla Vista because of the surplus of 'good looking' people there.

His actions and manifesto reveal psychotic misanthropy, rather than 'misogyny', which any individual who bothers to logically analyze his manifesto carefully, can conclude. He repeats his hatred for both genders who had sex, while he even planned his 'First Phase of Retribution' by beginning to first target men (his male roommates).

Are PUAs to blame?

'Game' is 'seduction,' practiced by both genders since antiquity. What would you call Casanova or Ovid who wrote Ars Amatoria in 2 AD, if they were alive today? PUAs that practiced and preached game. What were their lives all about? Seducing (picking up) women.

Even women practiced and taught 'Game'. Read the lives of famous courtesans from medieval Europe or from antiquity, who were versed in the same art of 'seduction'. Ninon de Lenclos was one example of a 'female PUA', for she even trained men on how to seduce women.

We're living in a modern world where these historical characters have either been romanticized or glorified by literature, movies, folklore, etc. So aren't these people's media-peddled influences too responsible for 'influencing' Elliot Rodger – if it is really so as according to feminists—because they too were PUAs?

An integral part of PUA game theory is to approach women. Rodger talks several times of 'pain and suffering because of women' in his manifesto, all because he assumed women rejected him, without even approaching them! This shows he never followed PUA game theory, and instead he was full of excuses. Again, he was a game denialist – a reason why he frequented the PUAHate site.

Elliot Rodger's traits were of the Nice Guy who self-pitied and self-loathed himself for not getting sex from his ideal women (blondes). He was nowhere a PUA, and definitely not one from the manosphere. If he was ever PUA-influenced, he would've focused on self improvement and on ridding himself of his fears of approaching and interacting with women. Most importantly, he would've understood and accepted that female rejection, flaking, and male baiting exists in reality. Instead, he avoided the people whom he thought were 'judging' him (particularly women whom he liked)—of whom he was afraid. He lacked confidence, paramount to be the 'alpha' he hoped to be.

Elliot had also built psychological walls around himself. His manifesto reveals that he would've rejected help from men to help him with women, because he would've perceived them as braggarts trying to demean him:

A few men who are successful with women have offered me help and advice about this in the past, but nothing ever came of it. I suppose they want to help because it would be a boost to their already big egos, and also because they feel sorry for me. People should feel sorry for me. My life is so pathetic, and I hate the world for forcing me to suffer it. I feel sorry for myself.

Thus, PUAs and the manosphere did not influence his crime, as he hated game theory, the men (PUAs) associated with it or men who were 'successful' with women.

Twisted modern social paradigms, the stigma of male virginity, and a covert war of misandry

I also observed the girls. I was still very short for my age, and most of the girls were taller than me. I hadn't reached puberty yet, but I was starting to admire female prettiness. There was one group of pretty, popular girls, and they all seemed to like hanging out with that boy Robert Morgan. I didn't yet desire girls sexually, but I still felt envy towards Robert for being able to attract the attention of all the popular girls. What was so special about Robert Morgan? I constantly asked myself.

I thought all of the cool kids were obnoxious jerks, but I tried as best as I could to hide my disgust and appear "cool" to them. They were obnoxious jerks, and yet somehow it was these boys who all of the girls flocked to. This showed me that the world was a brutal place, and human beings were nothing more than savage animals. Everything my father taught me was proven wrong. He raised me to be a polite, kind gentleman. In a decent world, that would be ideal. But the polite, kind gentleman doesn't win in the real world. The girls don't flock to the gentlemen. They flock to the alpha male. They flock to the boys who appear to have the most power and status. And it was a ruthless struggle to reach such a height.

It was too much for me to handle. I was still a little boy with a fragile mind. Thinking about such things would only crush my innocence, and it eventually will. But not at this point. I subconsciously wanted to

In his manifesto, Elliot learns this by himself at age 11.

He uses the word 'virgin' 70 times throughout his manifesto to loathe himself. Clearly, Rodger felt stigmatized for remaining a virgin in a culture which promotes permissiveness, and often validates a man's manhood (worth) and social value through copulation. Not that society owed him or anyone of us with sex. But often baits us with it, through media and real life without taking responsibility for it.

Society today presents twisted concepts of masculinity to modern men through media and real life scenarios. As explored from this article:

> "Some lonely, dejected men may perhaps need reminding that nobody owes them sex or a relationship, ever."
> "Self-pity and self-loathing are not attractive traits, but they're not in themselves misogynistic."

(Elliot's traits of self pity and self loathing)

> "There is a danger in labeling men like this as misogynists or creeps, and it is not just the emotional harm to the men themselves. As feminists will be the first to explain, our culture polices masculinity. Those who deviate from an assertive, even aggressive masculinity are shamed as wimps or with homophobic slurs."

Some of the links below (some from feminist sites) are all related to the internet rage against the Nice Guy syndrome – what Elliot embodied.

Who's pushing the need for a "nice guy" to be an "alpha" here?

Contemporary women themselves often acknowledge preferring the nice guy for marriage, but not dating, in a twisted modern social paradigm. Thus nice guys finish last, even if they do somehow manage to finish at the finishing line. Elliot Rodger was 22. Some say that he should've hired a prostitute to get laid. But he states that he found them to be beneath him:

[image]

Elliot Rodger's lifestyle was actually what the cultural left espouses for modern men. Didn't feminism contribute to this violence? Rather, some say that "violence doesn't have a race, a class, a religion, or a nationality, but it does have a gender." This reeks of the modern inflated misandrist meme of feminists that all men are predators.

Are men the violent gender alone?

What about females raping men, almost as often but under-reported?

What about men facing female violence and brutality, but quietly 'sucking it up', due to modern social conditioning? What about feminist violence towards children through abortion? Are these women then not 'misopedists'?

Game theory redux

In the modern world, with the shifting of gender roles, resurgent seduction theory has changed. The 'nice guy' or 'chivalrous gentleman', as seen above, is now often the ideal only in fiction, not reality. As we read Elliot's manifesto, his experiences from his social environment and college life further corroborate this fact.

We're living in an increasingly permissive society which baits and bombards us with sex. Can we deny this fact? A person with modern game knowledge understands this, and adapts his game (i.e. seduction strategies) accordingly. Rodger couldn't handle nor do this.

He chose a passive approach to attract women: focus primarily on appearance and displays of wealth or status—hoping to generate attraction and expect women to initiate or chase –as he had seen wealthy men being chased by women.

Reading his manifesto, one wonders whether his coy approach to attract women, was also possibly influenced by him misconstruing the Law of Attraction with his mentally ill and fantasy filled mind:

[image]

Elliot Rodger's case has many analogies. The story of Max Wade , published on ROK earlier, too shows some similarities minus mental problems: quick wealth and status seeking mindset, inability to handle rejection, easy access to arms, a blonde fixation, and an entitled complex that women owe sex because of cash and status. Again, was Max Wade red pill or a PUA student?

The degeneration of Rodger's utopia

Elliot's manifesto reveals a grown up male who felt his masculinity being policed by permissive ideals which he felt he had to validate through sex, while he saw women around him whose sexuality wasn't policed at the same time. Women are the gatekeepers of sex and even more so with today's liberal twisted modern social paradigms of sexuality. Rodger couldn't accept this fact, as he thought he was a superior 'gentleman' who 'deserved' sex.

[image]

Today, women are not as socially constrained as their predecessors when it comes to mate selection and initiation of sex. Women (and men) unanimously say that 'no one is "entitled" to sex'. You can only "entitle" yourself to a legalized "sexual right" – e.g. within marriage, where sex becomes a conjugal "right", not a conjugal privilege.Sex has more or less become a conjugal privilege within marriages, thus "entitlement to sex" within marriages itself has become a contentious topic of debate, leading to sometimes sexless marriages.

Twisted masculinity and dysfunctional permissive social paradigms cannot be handled by the mentally ill

Men today have adapted themselves to permissive modern society by either choosing to go with the flow of social trends to be indifferent and jump on the feminist bandwagon, or learning game to adapt to it. The sexually frustrated 'nice guys' risk turning misogynist or even worse, misanthrope, like Rodger. These double standard laden social paradigms cannot be understood by mentally ill men, who need counseling and support.

Rodger's case was that of a mentally ill child who could never get his most cherished desire—sex with his ideal women, i.e. blondes. He felt his life would've had meaning if he got validated through sex and losing his virginity. Our permissive modern society conditions young adults and youngsters especially to assert their sexualities by losing their virginity as soon as they attain puberty while adulthood and self-worth is validated through permissiveness and sex partner count. Again, not everyone can partake in it. At the same time, no one is entitled to it.

'Elliot Rodger was a misogynist virgin loser' is what some people have unbelievably commented in numerous blogs and articles. His crime was undoubtedly unforgivable. As seen above earlier, Elliot's behavior leaned towards misanthropy. But why is his virginity highlighted to be stereotyped as a criminal or dysfunctional trait? What effect would these twisted social paradigms have on growing up children and the mentally ill? To highlight a culture which celebrates sluts and shames virgins?

An average male today, however, tolerates twisted modern social paradigms of sexuality and male baiting 'to fit' into modern society. But, our society must look within to address these very hypocritical social paradigms, to understand the law of cause and effect in this scenario.

Ancient Sparta used eugenics to select the fittest individuals to include in their society, while those who were unfit were thrown into a chasm on Mount Taygetos in their infancy.

[image]

We have the same eugenic paradigm for modern men to prove themselves, albeit in a psychological, sexual and social way. The Mount Taygetos of twisted modern masculinity eugenics today is administrated and policed by permissiveness, male baiting and feminist ideals. You either suck up and man up to these twisted societal paradigms, or you fail to adapt, only to be discarded to live a life of a sexual reject aka 'Nice Guys' or get branded as a 'misogynist' or a 'player' if you choose to 'exploit' this scenario . But mentally ill individuals like Rodger cannot adapt to this, and so they need counseling and adequate mental healthcare.

With due course of time, Elliot's case will also fade from people's memories. And all these factors will unfortunately continue to thrive in our culture.

How To Get Connected In The Club Scene

June 7, 2014 | by Ivan Herrera | Link | Original Link

I have met a lot of guys over the years that experience “club burnout”. They no longer have a desire to go to the high end dance clubs because they feel it is expensive, too loud, they don’t score the girls they would like to, and they don’t have very much fun. Add on top of that the anxiety of possibly not getting in at the door and you have a recipe for a lot of frustration. Even in the manosphere and self-development community you will find leaders coming up with elaborate excuses, one author in particular even concluded that “Clubs are the worst places to get laid”.

I believe these are the symptoms of a lack of proper club game and a lack of the structure and process that should guide you in any pursuit. With this article I will show you how to optimize your club experience and have more fun, meet promoters, expand your social circles, and pull more quality girls. But let me start with my red pill story…

My Story

When I was around 24 I had one event that put me on the path to learning game and swallowing the red pill. I was a single guy in Miami attacking the nightlife on weekends, making friends, and approaching women. I was excited by the atmosphere and short skirts. I had prepared myself by getting into sick shape and dressing well. One night I met two sisters from the Midwest vacationing for the week. One of them was a solid 9 with a tight one-piece and the trashy ankle tattoo to boot. I thought if I played my cards right, she would be on my dick just like she was on my cousin's the night before. She was a slut and everyone knew it, but I had no game plan because all my programming up to that point was to put women on a pedestal.

I thought if I took her to and her sister to some great spots that I would win her approval. I already had it, but I was too hesitant to act. So I invited them and a few friends for a night on the town. I drove my group to the best clubs in Miami. At the Fontaine Blu bar I isolated her for a few minutes and she told me how good looking and in shape I was, even hinting that we should hangout by her hotel that night. I didn't act. Instead I took everyone to the club.

It was a loud crowded place in South Beach called Mansion. We hung out, the girls loved it. "What do I do now?" I thought. I guess I'll walk around with my buds. Minutes later a bald-shaven guy dressed in an opened collared-shirt with wing decals grabs her on the dance-floor. She is reluctant to dance but she submits. He is with his buddies at a table getting bottle service. They are friendly and motion our group over for a few drinks. Meanwhile, the bald guy is getting more aggressive, she pushes back with a smile, but he gets even more aggressive. Within a few minutes he is lifting her up and pinning her against the wall. She starts to love it. They are now in full embrace with her legs around him making out. He takes her over to the table and she straddles him and begins gyrating and unzipping his pants.

I was disgusted by the sight, I couldn't believe a girl despite being an established slut would respond to this. Wasn't I the taller, better-looking, and better-dressed guy that she had already built rapport with? Shouldn't I get the girl? I drove home at the end of the night fighting back tears knowing that someone who I thought was lesser than me was banging my 9 and not me. I knew something had to change, that's when I Googled "dating and women" and discovered Game with a capital "G".

I am now 30

As I write this I am reminiscing on a Sunday afternoon about last night. I pulled up to my favorite club in the MPD (a trendy area of NYC) and met my promoter friend outside. I typically hit the same spot every weekend because I have scored 6 for 6 at this spot the past 6 weekends with minimal effort (but tight game). This is a huge change from years past when I would simply go to a new club every week on nothing more than a whim, and get blown out in numerous "sets". Your friends will tell you "lets try X spot tonight" or "lets go somewhere new, explore". To hell with that jazz. If you want consistent results you must be consistent in your venues, your social circles, and your game.

Wait… wtf is a "Promoter"?

If the word "promoter" draws a blank in your mind than you have much to learn about the club scene. You might think you are just supposed to get in line and if you are lucky enough to get into a quality club you just have to "be awesome" and "have fun" and "approach approach approach!". If you are a PUA you probably think this is the testing ground for your canned material and hoop-jumping to try and hook up with semi-attractive women. This is all well and good if you have low expectations, but like anything, approaching the nightclub with a process in mind will have a gradual and cumulative effect as it scores you more benefits and more lays with higher quality. Lets lay some foundational material…

Promoters are your social hubs. It is their full time job to seek out cool/attractive/wealthy people and bring them in groups to clubs that do business with their organization. They get paid for it. In NYC full-time promoters typically have up to 7 events a week 5 days a week at different venues. In this article I will show you how to meet these people.

First of all, get it out of your head that the highest value persons in a nightclub are hot women. Wrong…

Men are of the highest value in a club. Men have all the power. They own the house. They are the managers, the bouncers, the owners, and the promoters.

Women are the currency. And clubs are a currency exchange. “You bring your girls, I will bring mine, and we can trade” is your modus operandi when you go to the clubs. If you come to the club broke, you need to put your game skills to work at the venue and bring girls to your circle, introduce them to your promoter, make him feel like a king. In other words you are not “pushing for the close” on every approach, you merely want to introduce them to your social circle.

If your circle is appealing enough, they will stay. If you are appealing enough, they will hook up with you. If you find yourself fighting to keep the girls attention, your circle’s center of gravity isn’t strong enough. It should be dense, with your promoter friend in the middle. You should push your way through people to make the introduction. Create a scene where people are meeting people because of you. Why?

The introduction

The power of the introduction is immense. Most pickup material is about cold-approach pickup. Even though there is a beauty and art to the cold-approach pickup, it is still the minor league of the dating scene. The introduction is cold-approach’s wiser older brother. Being introduced is much more attractive to a woman than someone introducing himself because it creates instant social proof.

Women are social creatures and prefer pre-approved suitors over complete strangers. If you imagine the dating scene as a 10 point system, the introduction will place you 2 points higher in value than a cold-approacher due to familiarity and social proof. In a woman's mind, a man who cold approaches must be out of options. Be the man with options. This is the reason you see scrawny guys with no game score with 9-10s. Its because they don't have to "game".

The reason I scored so easily with my promoter friend is because when you have game in a situation where you need none, you will hookup hand over fist. It isn't even fair. I receive the introduction, 2-5 minutes of friendly banter, hold hands, dance, kiss, push/pull, pull to apartment. And the beauty of the social circle hookup is that I don't have to "isolate" like in the cold-approach. I have pre-approval from the group so I can game, grind, make out with my girl in front of all her friends. I can sit down and put her on top of me so she can give me a lap-dance and dry hump me in front of all her friends because we are in a space of maximum comfort. Her friends are not trying to cock-block because social circles love to see people hook up with familiar people, they hate to see their friends hookup with "randos".

Yeah they are the staff girls but you get the picture. Quiz: Who do you approach?

Imagine you are locked in with a girl and her friends see you and ask themselves who you are. There can only be two answers: (1) "I don't know, some rando" or (2) "oh he's a friend of so and so." Now you can imagine why its better to have pre-selection working for you rather than against you. Answer 1 will likely get you cock-blocked. Answer 2 will get the hamster wheels spinning, "Who is this person? Should I know him? He's obviously part of the group so I should know him!" Even if you know no one, act like you do, introduce your promoter like he's someone important. My promoter in NYC would introduce me to girls he met only once on a pass-by 15 minutes earlier and I would still pull. You and your promoter are the seeds of a social circle, you just don't know it yet.

Finding the promoter

By now you are probably sold but have no idea how to find the promoter. There are ways to get on list's using websites and social media, searching facebook events, meetup.com, etc. Many promoters target tourists by using facebook/meetup or various tourism websites. But I have no experience with this, maybe you can do some research and report back to me.

I have met promoters organically, from the approach. For example, one night I saw an athletic black guy standing at the bar with a Russian 9 puffing on hookah. I knew he was high status from a mile away. Most "PUAs" would not bother to talk to this man because "I'm not gay I only talk to chicks! I like poosy! He is the competition! I will AMOG and take his gurl! becaus I am teh pickup mAster!!!" This is foolish and not socially calibrated.

I pull up next to the bar to order a drink and make an offhand comment like an indirect pickup: "That smells great what is that mango?" He responds that it is pineapple and that I should try it, so he hands me a plastic hookah thingie and I take a hit. I cough and joke at how inexperienced I am. I make friendly conversation with him and his girl. He is from the midwest like me so we talk about making it in NYC as I joke and do "guy kino" (i.e grab his tricep as you make a point). Within a few minutes he thinks I am cool so we exchange contacts. He said, "I am a promoter you should come out and party with me, I promote at the spots with the hottest girls." Shit, you don't have to tell me twice.

My first night out with him we came in with a group of around 16 at a club in the Meat Packing District. I believe I was one of 4 other guys. The girls complained that there were too many girls. Yes you heard correctly, women believe it is a problem when there are too many girls. Believe it or not merely having a penis means you are of value to attractive young girls hanging out in a club all by their lonesome. Demographics is the key word. You must seek clubs and social circles with an excess of women. He introduced me to a tall blonde FOB Russian that night. I pulled.

So the moral of the story is that you need to stop being so queer and afraid of approaching/talking to high value men, for they are more valuable than a singular hot girl. Look, we all want pussy and we are all out to get it, but building strong alliances is more conducive to that goal than the cold approach. There are already enough game aware-guys running their routines at the bars and clubs in big cities like NYC. Now get your team together and compete at a higher level.

During my game development I tried to figure out which were the optimal “sets” to open. I arrived at the conclusion that “2 sets” and “3 sets (one couple/one single girl)” were the best opportunities to exploit on a night out. I hope after reading this you realize that the best “set” is the “Alpha Male Set”: The stylish great-looking guy with an athletic build who is surrounded by women and seems to know everyone at the club. He is the one you should approach and be friends with. He will introduce you to the girls and give you the social proof you need. But you must offer value as well.

Challenge #1: Find a Promoter. Party with said promoter.

Challenge #2: Introduce 10 girls to your promoter friend in one night.

Challenge #3: Get laid with one of the promoter’s girls.

Challenge #4: Promoter gets laid with one of your girls.

Side Challenges: Pull girls from other tables to yours. The line I settled on for the most success is “I need you guys to make the crossover” after a tap on the shoulder and pointing at your table. Bonus points for carrying the girl to your table.

Additional notes to understand:

1. Not every promoter is socially savvy.

Some are only in it for the girls and will not be down with bringing guys along. You see these promoters often by themselves or with a handful of girls that are bored and looking around the room because there are no guys to talk to. My promoter is cool with me coming solo or bringing a friend because he knows I have game. But if you are contacting a promoter through the internet and haven't demonstrated value yet, you should be bringing at least a girl the first time. Bring a date to demonstrate you are a guy that actually gets girls. Your opening line when contacting a new promoter should be, "Hey man, going to be out this Saturday with my girl and some of her friends," regardless of if she is bringing friends or not. Remember that promoters gets paid based on how many girls they bring so this line will flash a few dollar signs in his eyes.

2. Respect the promoter's business

And understand how he gets paid. Don't scare away girls with overly aggressive and assholish behavior.

3. Bring girls to the venue, don't be stingy with girls.

Especially bring your slutty F-buddies. They are usually more fun. From here you can get a reputation for bringing hot/fun girls and get VIP treatment. A relative of mine mastered this to the point where he could get any guy tossed. He went to this spot twice a week for an entire summer and got the place completely "on-lock", as Christian McQueen would say.

4. Don't be cheap.

People often get turned on by the idea of getting free drinks and get stingy as a result. You should use that unspent cash to tip generously and pitch in for extra bottles (promoters can get extra bottles at cost, pitching in a 20$ or two will keep the party going).

5. Keep trucking in pursuit of your goals.

I first started going to clubs after college and didn't have much success for years despite being tall, dark, and handsome. I was frustrated for years because I didn't have proper structure guiding me. I spent a whole year sexless in Miami in my early twenties. By 27 I was coaching guys in my local PUA lair in NYC about proper club game. Now at 30, I am completely at ease in any club and I just want to learn new languages and travel.

6. Do maximize your fun.

If you don't have a 9-5 job, meaning, your career doesn't require you to be up early in the morning and show up wide-eyed, you MUST make connections in the club scene to maximize your pleasure. In NYC I have been to some very exclusive parties (where you absolutely MUST know someone to get in) with ridiculous F-M ratios (70%) that were hosted on weeknights. Unfortunately, I did have a 9-5 so I could only go to a few of them.

7. Dress well.

8. Read all of McQueen's material.

Conclusion

I was putting the finishing touches on this article very recently after having moved to Chicago, a city with a dating market terribly skewed in favor of women. One night I sent my Russian ex packing from the hotel we were staying at in downtown Chicago. I decided to suit up and go out on the town by myself on Hubbard St, a trendy downtown hangout. I focused on this aspect of my game. After an hour hanging out at a popular club I spot a 6′ 4″ very muscular guy with a tan and 4+ girls with him (noticing a trend yet?). He has a huge grin on his face as he jokes with the bartender and seems well established. So I tap him on the shoulder and say:

“Dude, I thought you were this player on the Blackhawks for a second then I realized they are playing tonight! You an athlete?”

He laughs and goes, “Actually I’m a personal trainer, but I did play some hockey.”

“Yeah that makes sense, what are you celebrating tonight?”

“Thats sick. I knew a promoter in NYC and got into some awesome parties because of him.”

“Well, I’m your guy here in Chicago, here is my card! Those are my girls over there. Come over, I’ll introduce you.”

Shit, you don’t have to tell me twice.

The Day The Music Died

June 7, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

It’s easier than ever to become a creative artist, and yet what we have on offer is largely disposable ‘toonz’ and fast food music. Take for example Coldplay. They could be said to be the modern equivalent of Pink Floyd—four wacky British guys with quirky songs and videos, catchy tunes with some soulful content. Their music is not bad compared to itself, but roll back to 1975 and look at Pink Floyd. Incredible live shows, deep philosophical soul searching lyrics, ground breaking instrumentals and solos, captivating concept albums that dig deep into the human condition. Comparing Coldplay with Pink Floyd is like comparing Diet Coke with 12-year-old single malt.

At the same time that Floyd were plying their trade, we also had harder and heavier Led Zeppelin. Intense riffs, original production, amazing lyrics, 10-minute master pieces. Everyone copies them, but nothing compares. Jay-Z or Kanye could be said to be the modern equivalent of Bob Marley, but their offerings—although reasonable—are feeble in comparison, as is their personal artistic ethos, that largely revolves around attention whoring, money grubbing and media hype.

The Corporate Stranglehold?

Back in the day, the music industry was controlled by a few major labels that could pick and choose what artists they released. Yet the mass of amazing music being released and rising into mainstream perception was extraordinary. Today anyone can download some music software to their laptop, and produce an album in the comfort of their own home at zero cost, using professional tools they could only dream of 30-40 years ago. They can upload it to sites like Youtube, iTunes, Facebook, reaching an underground audience at zero cost. With internet radio stations and cable channels running 24/7, commercial airplay is far easier. You can shoot a music video on an iphone in 1080HD, whereas just 10 years ago, you’d be shooting on 35mm at $2000 per minute shot and $1000 a day camera rental.

Arguments are made that the media and corporations have a stranglehold on creative art and yet nothing could be further from the truth. On the other hand, in the 60s, 70s and 80s, the opposite was the case. A struggling band was absolutely reliant upon mainstream labels, not only to promote their material but invest huge sums of money in their production costs. Without a six figure recording budget, bands had to play live to hear their own album.

In 1986, Metallica’s debut album on an indie label (Megaforce Records) was supposed to be called “Metal Up Your Ass”, but the record label vetoed the name, resulting in it being called Kill ‘em All, in reference to wanting to kill all the record companies. The name is hardly offensive by modern standards, but we can immediately see the restraints that artists had to deal with, until the digital age began a decade ago.

So where did all the art go?

Strangely there is precious little music released today that has any depth, quality, or originality to it. It's not that corporations are suppressing good artists, or that it's impossibly expensive to get ahead in the creative world—it's that artists are producing shit and the general public is lovin' it. Just when you'd think it couldn't get any worse than Britney Spears, along comes a dozen copy cats from Kesha to Katy Perry. Then Miley Cyrus drags popular music straight into the whore house.

The only way to create any more sensation and attention grabbing would be for her to start dildoing herself live on stage, Bangkok style. How long will it be before a chic makes herself squirt on the audience, to leverage outrage and promote her new single? Perhaps Jim Morrison of the Doors was right when he pulled out his penis on stage, inciting a riot by telling the crowd they we're all morons. Bob Marley puts it well:

> No sun will shine in my day today
> The high yellow moon, won't come out to play
> I said darkness has covered my light,
> And has changed my day into night,
> Where is the love to be found,
> Will someone tell me because life, sweet life must be somewhere to be found,
> Instead of Concrete Jungle, illusion, confusion,
> Concrete Jungle .
> No chains around my feet, but I'm not free
> I know I am bound here in captivity
> And I've never known happiness, and I've never known sweet caresses
> Still, I'll be always laughing like a clown
> Won't someone help me?
> Cause, sweet life, I've got to pick myself from off the ground, yeah
> In this here concrete jungle.

Performing Seals

You cannot call performers like Rihanna, Britney, Gaga, etc. artists in the true sense of the word. They are neither suffering for their art, nor conveying any kind of lasting message about the human condition. They are mere circus animals trotting out neat little ditties that come and go and need constant replacement. You can never replace The Doors, Floyd or Led Zep, anymore than you can replace Beethoven, for the simple fact that they produced real music—Soul Food as Bob Marley called it.

Artists had to make real sacrifice in the past to produce great material, but today you can just fire up a laptop and you are an instant singer/ song writer / producer, with the quality of a noodle soup packet. Dark Side of The Moon sold 50 million copies, remaining in the Billboard Top 100 for 741 weeks from 1973 to 1988. While Gangnam Style, the top clip on youtube gets a billion hits and the follow up flops.

It’s not only about artists copying each other in a mad race for pseudo art and commercial success—it’s the general public thirsty to lap up the never ending stream of musical diarrhea. The popularity and success of shows like American Idol and X-Factor show exactly what the blue pill public craves.

Everyone Is A DJ

Today’s concept of a DJ is a commercialized distortion of what a real house DJ was. Nineties DJs were artists—it was nigh impossible to beat match on vinyl and limited pressing underground releases were tricky to get hold of. Modern DJs are nothing more than monkeys that press play on the machine, and wave their hands in the air. A real DJ took you on a journey, on a trip. He brought you up and down and moved your body and mind and as he carefully matched the next tune. The two blended together, one off moments in musical history were created. Today, while fiddling with a smart phone, you numb your ADHD with vodka or ecstasy and jiggle about like a baboon (and fuck like one after).

In the days when ecstasy first hit the streets, I recall clubs going until 9 or 10 am on Sunday until the owners, afraid to lose their licenses, had to call the police to cut the power. Never mind getting the crowd out—the DJ himself just wouldn’t stop. A party was a hedonistic, shamanic experience not to be missed. Today a party is a lame load of wannabes out to impress, waiting for something to happen, and then drifting home at 2am.

I was unlucky enough to have David Guetta play infront of an apartment I was staying in. After speed-loading a few CDs, the guy couldn’t get off stage fast enough. DJ? More like a piss take. Would you pay Mick Jagger $150 a ticket to watch him play CDs for 90 minutes?

Something has gone astray with our music. There is creativity in the movies and TV, but it’s a different medium that requires little input from the audience. We sit there like stunned dummies as the latest, greatest computer animation whirls in front of us, but we leave the cinema none the wiser, pacified and waiting for the next installment.

> And the people bowed and prayed to the neon god they’d made
> And the sign flashed its warning in the words that it was forming
> And the sign said the words of the prophets are written on the subway walls
> And tenement halls, and whispered in the sounds of silence

Back in the day before there were a dozen screens in every room, we’d roll a couple of joints and sit back and listen to some Floyd or Led Zep. We’d conjure up our own imagery, we’d talk, discuss, philosophize about their content. We were alive. We were conscious. A concert, rave or club-night carried a sense of being a part of something. 500,000 people, including myself went to the show below. It was like a coming together of humanity to celebrate the fall of the Berlin Wall. So many people showed up they didn’t even bother collecting tickets.

At New Year's Eve 2014, I wound up at Disneyland (long story). After paying $100+ a pop, I've never seen a crowd of people more subdued. They stood in the rain for an hour before midnight, with barely a smile or a cheer, politely jostling each other in silence for a better vantage point; eyes glued on the Disney Castle, waiting for action time. The light show and fireworks were flawless; afterwards the people shuffled off home, like droids whose masters had flipped a switch. Could Simon and Garfunkel have been any more prophetic? NYE in San Quentin jail was probably more lively.

We love that numb state of being plugged into the Matrix. "Entertain me, entertain me!"It's depressing but other than spiking the water supply with acid, I don't have a solution to this problem. I will however shine a light on it and continue to be a torch bearer for hedonism and music/art that conjures up true feelings and embraces reality. Even artists like Banksy who try to shake up the masses are met with smiles and nods of acceptance and yet his audience just drifts off back to sleep.

> Sending off a glancing kiss, to those who claim they know
> Below the streets that steam and hiss,
> The devil's in his hole
> Oh to sail away, To sandy lands and other days
> Oh to touch the dream, Hides inside and never seen.
> Into the sun the south the north, at last the birds have flown
> The shackles of commitment fell, In pieces on the ground
> Oh to ride the wind, To tread the air above the din
> Oh to laugh aloud, Dancing as we fought the crowd
> To seek the man whose pointing hand, The giant step unfolds
> With guidance from the curving path, That churns up into stone
> If one bell should ring, in celebration for a king
> So fast the heart should beat, As proud the head with heavy feet.

The Biggest Mistake A Man Can Make

June 8, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Stop and think for a second: what periods of your life do you remember as being the highest of highs– happy, gratifying, and marked by growth?

And what periods of your life do you remember as being the lowest of lows– depressing, frustrating, and marked by stagnation?

I can immediately recall one period for each of the above. One of my best moments was when I made the move to quit my 9-5 and attempt to build a personal training business from the ground up. I put everything on the line in hopes of achieving a lofty goal. And I did. And at the same time I prospered in other areas of my life.

One of my worst moments was in my second year of university when I was unsure of what I would choose as my area of concentration. I stagnated, not just academically, but in all areas of my life– women, fitness, health, happiness, etc.

What is the thread that ties these two opposing periods together? I'm convinced that it's the presence or absence of a dedicated mission in my life.

You Must Never Be Without A Primary Mission

When I was crushing it, I had a well defined mission that I was directing all of my daily efforts towards. This drove me forward and filled me with a sense of purpose, inspiration, and vitality.

On the other hand, when I was a depressed sophomore in college, I had nothing that even came close to resembling a primary mission, goal, or purpose in my life. I was drifting through my daily routine. And everything around me was crumbling as a result.

The second you find yourself without a primary objective that you're actively pursuing is the second you're liable to enter a depressed, unproductive period of your life. You simply cannot fall into an unconscious groove. A man without a purpose – without something to work towards – is emasculated. He is impotent. He is unable to function anywhere near his potential.

The key is to catch yourself when you're feeling down, confused, or lost. You must catch yourself when you begin to fill your free time browsing the internet mindlessly or playing video games. You must identify your lack of a mission. And then you must fill the void.

And It Doesn't Matter What Exactly Your Mission Is

The biggest mistake you can make once you realize you need to provide your life with direction is being indecisive about what that direction should be. In the end it doesn't really matter. It could be writing a book. It could be obtaining a specific position. It could be creating an app. It could be learning a martial art. It could be packing on 20 pounds of muscle. It doesn't matter.

As long as you create a goal that you can work towards and immerse yourself in, you're deeper masculine need for a purpose will be fulfilled. You'll avoid spending all your down time trying to distract yourself from living life with the internet and silly fantasies.

And, most importantly, your mood, energy, and overall character will be elevated. You'll feel revitalized. You'll feel amazing. And you'll undoubtedly begin to exude these feelings outward, invigorating and attracting everyone you come into contact with. In short, you'll be crushing it.

Our June sponsor is Good Looking Loser, a red pill-themed resource for goal-driven men who desire to improve their sex life, appearance, self-esteem, bank account, and quality of life. You may have already seen in-field videos of the author on Youtube:

Good Looking Loser discusses a wide range of topics including getting laid, performance enhancing drugs, style, personal finance (largely passive income), health and fitness, and male enhancement. Here's a sample of posts you will find on the site:

- How To Pick Up Girls If You Are Nervous
- 4 Common Rejections You'll Face
- The Basic Guide To Getting Laid On Plenty Of Fish
- The Numbers Game – A Comprehensive, Definitive Look At Your Real Odds

One thing I like about GLL is that it gives you a game perspective from a guy who already gets positive female attention and invitations to approach (a solely cold approach game system is not necessary for all guys). Learn more about his system over at Good Looking Loser.

Why All That Glitters Is Not Gold

June 9, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

I've discussed male thirst before and explained why thirsty men are a problem. Today I wish to examine how such thirst can distort male perspective on the reality of maintaining relationships with attractive women.

Marko Jaric is a man who appears to have had a lot going for him. He spent 15 years (1996 – 2011) playing professional basketball, with almost half of those (2002 – 2009) spent in the NBA. It was at this peak of his career that his romantic exploits became the envy of men across the globe. In 2008, Jaric began seriously dating 26 year old Adriana Lima, then a Victoria's Secret Angel. Lima was herself at the peak of her career – she was one of the world's most well compensated and well recognized models, and widely considered one of the world's most beautiful women. They were married in 2009 and she was soon pregnant with her first child (born 2010). A second baby followed in 2012.

Though all seemed well, there was trouble in paradise, and that trouble has come to the fore now:

> Former NBA player Marko Jaric and Victoria's Secret model Adriana Lima have split after five years of marriage. "After long and careful consideration, we have decided to separate after five years of marriage," they said in a statement to People. "We are grateful to be the parents of two incredible young daughters that we will continue to co-parent. We would greatly appreciate your respect for our family's privacy as we begin this delicate next chapter for all members of our family."

The Serbian media has offered some additional information as to the reasoning for the split:

> Brazilian model Adriana Lima has hired a team of lawyers who will divorce her from Serbian basketball player Marko Jaric, because he allegedly cheated on her.
> Lima allegedly complained to a friend during filming in Istanbul and the Turkish media immediately carried out this news. It is also said that Adriana is seeking custody of their daughters Valentina and Sijena. She does not want alimony nor the house in which they currently live. "Once I forgave cheating, the second time I will not," the supermodel supposedly told a friend.

Assuming that Jaric's infidelity isn't a fib and had something to do with the split, one can easily predict the response of most men to the news. Most will label Jaric an idiot, and go on to post several photos of Lima (mostly older shots taken several years back when she was at the very peak of her modeling career) before asking "Who would cheat on that?!!!" They will go on to talk about how lucky Jaric was, and how he should have done everything in his power to maintain what he had because that is what they would do if they were in his position. Attractive women are, in their mind, the ultimate prize and they cannot see why any man like Jaric would not work tirelessly and unconditionally to hold onto them. This is only the perspective of a man on the outside looking in, a view that can only be held consistently by men who have not interacted extensively with very attractive women and are a touch starved (read: "thirsty") for their attention.

Marko Jaric has been married to Adriana Lima for over half a decade now. He’s put two children in her. He’s had intercourse with her hundreds (if not thousands) of times. He’s lived with her for half a decade. He’s seen a personal side of her that none of us have ever seen, and knows things about her that are simply not public knowledge.

If you’re a typical guy, your knowledge of Adriana Lima comes from beautiful photos of her appearances at events or modeling lingerie for Victoria’s Secret. This surface image is all that you have to judge her on. Jaric, meanwhile, has had occasion to know Lima when she’s out of the public eye with her guard down and no need to censor herself or maintain a public image.

Who knows what she’s really like? Who is the real her? Marko Jaric is much more well equipped to answer this question than any of us are. Perhaps she’s a miserable bitch at home. Maybe she’s a cheater herself, but keeps it hidden well. Or maybe she’s not a great mother. Maybe she’s cold in bed and not particularly intimate with him. Maybe she’s just not all that compatible with him on a personal level.

Or maybe she’s a great mother and wife and he’s just a disloyal prick. We don’t know.

When examining relationships involving other men and beautiful women, too many guys let her beauty blind them to objective reality and guide them to a perspective that puts all of the onus on the men in the relationship to do it all, and assumes them to be entirely at fault whenever things go south. They neglect the fact that beautiful women are not perfect (nobody is), and have as many faults as anyone else. Men have become so thirsty for the attention of these women and so utterly supplicant to them that they’ve forgotten that they’re dealing with flawed human beings just like themselves, not divine angels absent human imperfection. This failure to see the humanity of the beautiful women, in turn, hampers the ability of these men to approach them realistically and form sold romantic relationships with them.

We only see Jaric and Lima’s public personas – we don’t know who they actually are. We see Adriana in public, but who is she really? For all we know, she could be an excellent woman who has done absolutely nothing to earn this behavior from Jaric. It is just as likely, however, that her private persona (the one Jaric can see and we cannot) is one that would make us understand why a man like Jaric would give her up. Too many men, blinded by beauty and their own thirst for it, are unwilling to consider this second possibility.

This is why it is important for any red pill male to quench the thirst, ditch the pedestal, recognize female humanity and act accordingly. Don't let a woman's beauty and your thirst for it blind you to her faults, or coax you into ignoring them at your own expense. All that glitters is not gold.

Why America Has Become Infected With Rape Hysteria

June 9, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

This past weekend, I went to a movie theater for the first time in a few months. Before the coming attractions rolled, there appeared on the screen a public service announcement in which the American president, vice-president, and assorted A-list actors (Daniel Craig, Benicio Del Toro, and Steve Carrell) lectured us solemnly and earnestly on the imaginary problem of "non-consensual sex" on college campuses.

What a truly remarkable spectacle. One would think that these political and cultural figures were speaking of a topic critical to the survival of the human species, so serious and grave were the tones. I began to think more and more about this little announcement as I left the theater, and how incredible it was that the head of state and vice president of the world's most powerful nation actually had taken the time and effort to advise the public—with all the other varied issues on their agendas—about a problem that was entirely imaginary.

Even I, jaded with long experience with American male groveling before the altar of feminine frivolity, was taken aback. I could hardly believe it. But I should have known better. This is America, after all: where no effort is spared and no flight of fancy left unindulged to cater to female hysteria.

There are antecedents for such behavior from national leaders. Delusion is of old date. In 1597, King James I of England published a treatise, in the form of a Socratic dialogue, called Daemonologie. Although we may chuckle today in smug superiority at James's credulity, witchcraft was no laughing matter in the sixteenth century. Thousands of men and women were persecuted—many horrifically so—for a "problem" that was entirely imaginary. James's book delves into the subjects of necromancy, ghosts, demons, and witchcraft with great enthusiasm, and makes his case that demonology not only exists, but that not believing in these sinister bugbears is itself a sin.

Has human nature advanced at all since 1597? Or have we only shifted our prejudices and delusions from witchcraft to other fantasies, like "rape culture"? I wonder what our remote descendants will make of our delusions, and whether they will scratch their heads at our belief in imaginary rapes, just as we scratch our heads at James's devils, demons, and fairies.

James I's delusions in the service of power

James I was an intelligent and educated man. How could he allow himself to be sucked in to such delusions as belief in witchcraft and demons? The answer to this question lies in an understanding of human nature and the requirements of power. He was a king, and kings need to keep their thrones. Human nature needs obsessions and fixations, in the same way that a dog needs to gnaw on bones; and systems of power and control thrive on creating and maintaining imaginary evils, so that their populations can be kept in a permanent state of turmoil. An uneasy population is a compliant one. Public service announcements in James's day were a bit different from what we see now, but the purpose was still the same: to whip up the public into a frenzy about an imaginary problem, so that they become more compliant and open to suggestion. It is a tactic as old as government itself.

The alleged "problem" of endemic "rape" across the country is entirely imaginary. Many authoritative studies have shown that crime of all types has been in steady decline for years. Yet, these feminist apostles of doom continue to trumpet the approach of the Apocalypse. Yet there are darker forces at work under the surface. It is often forgotten that such Cassandras serve a useful purpose for the forces that hold the reins of power in America: (1) they help to enforce cultural orthodoxy, and identify dissenting voices for persecution, and (2) they permit the power structure to solidify and perpetuate its hold on the population. America's rulers find it useful to deflect attention away from the real problems of society (vast income inequality, declining wages, sexual repression, masculinization of women, mediocre education and services, etc.) onto imaginary problems. In such ways can the greed and theft of the American oligarchy be perpetuated at home and abroad.

I know a very sincere man who was infuriated by the public service announcement. He asked how it was possible for men of obvious intelligence to believe such nonsense, and to permit themselves to make statements in the service of such stupidities. It is an important question, but a naïve one. These political figures and big actors in question don't really ask themselves whether they "believe" in rape culture or not, in the same way that a courtier of James I in 1600 would not have paused to reflect meaningfully on the "truth" of witches's Sabbaths. These are cynical, amoral people, who care only about their own positions.

Ultimately, it is not a question that concerns them. What matters to them is power. Feminism is the dominant religion of the day, and they must—if they want to work—toe the party line. They know what they need to do in order to keep their salaries flowing, to get reelected, to keep their hold on their audience, and to maintain their thrones. That is as far as the thinking goes. On some subliminal level, of course, I think they convince themselves of the truth of their delusions. Reason can justify any weakness or vice. White knighting and mangina behavior is an expression of subservience to power. It is the ultimate form of degradation. And this is why I have more scorn and hostility to feminism's male supplicators than to feminism itself.

In Europe's religious wars of the sixteenth century, a principle emerged which summarizes the necessity of doctrinal orthodoxy among a ruler's subjects: cuius regio, eius religio. This Latin phrase may be translated as: whose region, his religion. It was meant to convey the idea that the population under the control of a certain prince should accept that prince's religious doctrine, or else they should move elsewhere. In the modern era, princes find it useful to adhere to the same principle: subscribe to my doctrine, or else. In America, the prevailing religion is feminism, and the message conveyed the entirety of the culture is: you'd better toe the line, and believe in its demonology, or you are going to be persecuted. Not to believe is itself a sin.

There are other reasons, of course, for the propagation of the fake "rape culture." Some of these reasons have much to do with the idiosyncrasies of American society. American is a society steeped in fear: historically, fear of Indians, slaves, communism, terrorism, drugs, etc. Our society is a sexually repressive one, compared with most others, and for a repressed person, there is a perverse cruelty in denying sexual satisfaction to someone else. Most of the strident advocates of the "rape culture" (and their loyal league of manginas and white knights) are abnormal men and women. Miserable and repressed themselves, they wish to make everyone else just as miserable. There is also delight in being an accuser—it confers power and status, and is a form of attention-whoring.

Goering at Nuremberg: understanding the requirements of power

So the requirements of power dovetail with the perversities and attention-whoring of "rape culture" advocates. It makes for a toxic mix. I remember reading a comment that Hermann Goering once made to one of his interviewers during his incarceration at the Nuremburg war crimes trials. The interviewer, a psychologist, asked him how he and his henchmen were able to seize and maintain control of the German government for so long. Goering chuckled and said, with his unique mix of brutal cynicism and charm, "It's easy, really. If you want to control people, all you have to do is make them believe they are under attack from someone or something. Then you can do whatever you want."

I think James I would have agreed with this.

America’s Culture Of Narcissism

June 9, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The street heats the urgency of now
As you see there’s no one around

—1979, The Smashing Pumpkins

Christopher Lasch published his best-selling book The Culture of Narcissism in 1979, at the close of a tumultuous, confusing decade in America. Modern American liberalism, having entered the decade replete with boundless confidence of its ability to transform society, had fallen into a dazed retreat. Neoclassical economics could not explain the coexistence of unemployment and inflation, the Sexual Revolution had stripped sexuality of its puritanical elements but brought Americans no peace and the cock-sure radicals of the ’60’s had abandoned their political pulpits and turned to New Age therapies to quell the inner emptiness that pervaded the ’70’s. America teetered on the brink of the ’80’s, unsure of the future of the state of America, but vaguely sure that the ’80’s would result in the rebirth of altruism and selflessness. Christopher Lasch argued otherwise.

Lasch, before the publishing of The Culture Of Narcissism, was a little-known professor of history at the University of Rochester. He was at first a neo-Marxist, but his views evolved dramatically over the course of his life. He was always an impassioned critic of liberalism, critiquing the superficiality that underpinned so much of radical work in his time. By the time he published The Culture of Narcissism, he had fused conservative critiques of culture with Marxist economic criticism of capitalism and Freudian psychoanalysis.

The book is a brilliant jeremiad that seamlessly fuses American history, sociological and psychological analysis with a strident critique of modern capitalism. He argues that individual cultures work out distinctive approaches to raising children and, as such, produces adults with personalities tailored towards to adapting to the prevailing cultural climate. The social invasion of the self by American society, he argues, has resulted in American personalities that mirror clinical narcissism. He observes that anxiety, a lack of self-identity, an obsession with personal autonomy and a fear of sexual intimacy are endemic to the collective American psyche and are symptoms of narcissism.

He identifies the collapse of the American family as the primary vehicle for this social depression. Liberal reformers, starting in the Gilded Age, saw the state as a tool to produce better, more productive citizens. They created courts of juvenile justice and created the social work profession, operating under the assumptions that not only was the state more capable of raising children into productive, healthy adults but also that children were “an asset of the state, not property of the parents.” This mindset quickly backfired even before flappers started bearing their ankles at speakeasies and reformers began to retreat partially and modify their ideas, but did nothing to truly stem the crushing power of state bureaucracy that gained more steam every decade in America.

This was coupled with the expansion of corporate influence on society. Advertising and marketing quickly became indistinguishable from propaganda by World War II. Seizing on the anxiety created in parents by liberal reformers, self-styled experts—like Dr. Spock in the ’40’s—profited from book sales, advertising aimed at convincing parents they would be better parents by purchasing their products and supporting bureaucratic entities that depended on private production of goods. Corporations moved from endeavoring to inculcate a Protestant work ethic in workers to striving to make workers better consumers, who would pursue wealth not for any sort of moral reason, but simply to consume for consumption’s sake.

Further, the collapse of religion, art and sex as a reprieve from the reality of life signified a society devolving into self-absorption. The ruthless devaluation of the past was coupled with an overriding preoccupation with the present that represented a society that was only interested in what can be gained today, not what should be saved for tomorrow. What formerly represented peaceful, enjoyable departures from the monotony of life became therapeutic necessities to just exist in society. Society, simply, became a day-to-day grind just to exist in a future-less society.

For his part, Lasch’s masterful command of American history and social perception make the book a simultaneously difficult but enjoyable read. His Marxist critiques of economics comes across as juvenile and uninformed at times, but his critique of consumer culture is incredibly compelling.

Further, his critiques of feminism and heterosexual relations are more than a bit naive about the reality of sexuality and he certainly gives feminists more latitude in their claims than he should, but he identifies the problems that necessarily inhere in a sexual revolution. He correctly identifies that the Sexual Revolution wasn’t a proactive movement, but a reaction to a society that doesn’t value commitment or family life.

Unfortunately, as with any man with a vision that probes into the deepest recesses of the human condition, he caused much consternation to those who needed to hear his message most. Conservatives lauded his book, but failed to appreciate the nuances of his critiques about the collapse of the family. Most of those conservatives were fervent supporters of Reagan, a President who did nothing to stem the invasion of the family by bureaucrats. Liberals were more mixed in their views; feminists hated the book with a fiendish rage, while other outlets were more sympathetic to his message about the importance of the family and traditions related to religion and culture.

After the publication of his book, he was unwavering in his critique of liberalism and liberalism's concomitant devaluation of the family and religion. He would go on to pen an afterword in 1990—just years before his death—observing that the Yuppies of the '80's did nothing to stop the rank self-absorption of America, as many in the '70's had predicted they would. In it, he sagely observed:

The best hope of emotional maturity, then, appears to lie in a recognition of our need for and dependence on people who nevertheless remain separate from ourselves and refuse to submit to our whims. It lies in a recognition of others not as projections of our own desires but as independent beings with desires of their own.

More broadly, it lies in acceptance of our limits. The world does not not exist merely to satisfy our own desires; it is a world in which we can find pleasure and meaning, once we understand that others too have a right to those goods. Psychoanalysis confirms the ancient religious insight that the only way to achieve happiness is to accept limitations in a spirit of gratitude and contrition instead of attempting to annul those limitations or bitterly resenting them.

Lasch would go on to pass away a few years later, a victim of a metastasized cancer, for which he refused chemotherapy. He noted to one of his doctors that living for the sake of being alive is a uniquely American mindset and not who he was. He was 61.

His dogged, relentless criticism of the closing of the American psyche was misunderstand by most. Conservatives embraced his exhortations about the importance of the family while doing nothing to stem the invasion of family life. Liberals either refused to admit the error of their ways or gave weak support to his assertions, while doing nothing to ameliorate the social devastation of America.

Men get lost sometimes as the years unfurl and the effect of their decisions in life become difficult to contextualize. Lasch compiled a record of liberalism that showed how profoundly cruel it was on the family, which he referred to as the “haven in a heartless world.” The so-called altruism that underlain the impulses of liberalism had not lead to a better society, only a more self-absorbed and desperate one. Conservatives refused to take seriously that which Lasch laid bare, only using his book to clobber liberals over the head for political gain.

Yet, that is the fate of those with sight beyond sight: rarely—if ever—are they truly appreciated in their lifetime. Only with hindsight can the truly brilliant be fully understood.

The Truth About Anabolic Steroids

June 10, 2014 | by Clark Kent | Link | Original Link

Let me start with this: I do not wish to promote the use of anabolic steroids. I hope, in fact, you will avoid (or at least delay) steroid use after reading this article. But I also don't believe the media hysteria about the dangers of anabolic steroids. I can't expect you to believe me if I do nothing more than regurgitate exaggerated warnings.

What are steroids? Here's a very simple answer—anabolic steroids are synthetic hormones related to testosterone. If used properly, they can cause an athlete or trainee to get bigger, faster, and stronger than his natural genetic potential.

Where did they come from? German scientists discovered testosterone in the 1930's when Hitler was trying to find ways to develop "super soldiers" (makes me wonder if Stan Lee knew about this when he created the Captain America character). They also figured out a way to synthesize this hormone and put in a syringe.

Anabolic steroids were studied further in the 1940's. The Soviet Union and East Germany used them to enhance the performance of Olympic athletes. America caught on and began developing its own formulas. This led to the development of the second steroid, dianabol. These drugs were banned in the Olympics in 1976.

Human performance has since been permanently altered. We'll never know just how many medals, trophies, and championships were won with the help of "pharmaceutical assistance."

Let's fast-forward to the 1980's, my teenage years. I still remember the first time I saw a commercial for a bodybuilding supplement. There was Lou Ferrigno, drinking some concoction from a blender (one of Joe Weider's products). The advertisement claimed he drank said supplement before lifting weights. I figured if it was good enough for him it was good enough for me. I started drinking this (awful-tasting) stuff before football practice. This was the beginning of my expensive obsession with bodybuilding supplements.

This was long before the internet, so many naïve young men like myself got our information from the magazines. They were filled with pictures of steroid-using bodybuilders along with articles about the dangers of steroids. Young men like myself were fooled by the marketing and believed we could look like the pro bodybuilders with hard work, and of course, supplements.

I grew up idolizing guys like Arnold Schwarzenegger and Sylvester Stallone—both of whom used steroids. I never really knew just how much of a difference drugs made in the physiques of my idols. I've seen some of them admit to using drugs in interviews, but many seem to downplay the dosage and cycles they used.

80's muscle (and fashion)

The US government decided to classify steroids as Schedule 3 drugs with the passing of the Anabolic Steroid Control Act of 1990. Congress ignored the advice of the American Medical Association, Drug Enforcement Association, Food and Drug Administration, and the National Institute on Drug Abuse—all of who agreed these drugs did not create psychological or physiological dependence (more on this later).

One of the first paradigm shifts for me came with a magazine called MuscleMedia 2000. This early 90's publication actually interviewed bodybuilders about the "S word." Someone was finally acknowledging the proverbial 500 lb. gorilla (with bulging biceps) in the living room.

The Internet came along a few years later. Information about steroids could be freely discussed on websites and forums. I began to learn the truth about these controversial drugs. Just as the discovery of testosterone changed human performance, the Internet has changed human knowledge. Supplement companies and their publications no longer had a monopoly on information.

The legal status of anabolic steroids has apparently had relatively little impact for those who really want them. Professional bodybuilders now use higher doses than ever (and usually add growth hormone and insulin to the mix). Modern bodybuilding contests have become a freak show and the aesthetic proportions of competitors from previous decades are a thing of the past.

The bodybuilding world isn't the only place where these drugs are still widely used. Hollywood stars regularly use steroid cycles to bulk up for roles. Professional athletes are always trying to stay one step ahead of testing methods. Steroids are here to stay as long as there is money to be made from muscle.

The Hype vs The Facts

Why are steroids illegal? It has little or nothing to do with health or addiction. They were made illegal in response to doping in the Olympics. Why create a sweeping public policy (against the advice of all affected health and law enforcement agencies) based on issues with Olympic and professional athletes? Your guess is as good as mine. I find it odd that you can go to the corner store and legally buy cigarettes (which are proven to kill you) but you are treated like a criminal if you buy something to put on a few pounds of extra muscle. What you see on mainstream media is usually misinformed hysteria. Let's cut through the hype and talk facts.

Are steroids dangerous? Yes… and no. Remember this: anything you inject or ingest can be dangerous, depending on the dosage and duration. Taking an aspirin for a headache will probably ease your pain. Taking the whole bottle may cause a permanent nap. Every drug (including over-the-counter medicine) has the potential for side effects. Anabolic steroids are no different in this regard.

One problem with the current laws is difficulty in conducting proper research—imagine the red tape and legal issues involved with testing what is now a schedule 3 drug. But here are a few things we know, based on studies and anecdotal evidence:

The primary danger of steroid use is unpleasant (though not life-threatening) side effects. These include gynecomastia (enlargement/development of breast tissue in men), testicular atrophy (shrinking of the testicles), baldness (especially if you are genetically inclined), acne, infertility, and impotence. The severity and duration of these would depend on multiple factors, including individual physiology, the specific drug used, and the dosage/duration. Most users manage these side affects by taking drugs to prevent them and limiting the duration of a steroid cycle. Post-cycle therapy drugs can also be used to minimize the effects of coming off a cycle.

What about health issues? I think this is the least understood aspect of these drugs. Oral steroids tend to stress the liver and kidneys. Blood lipid profiles (cholesterol/triglycerides) can be negatively affected during a steroid cycle, but it isn't clear whether or not this has any negative effects on long-term health since things usually revert back to their normal state after the cycle is over.

Now let's return to something I wrote earlier: risk is correlated with dosage and duration. A judicious cycle over 8-12 weeks can help you gain 15-20 lb. of muscle beyond your genetic limit (and probably produce even more drastic gains in strength). The risks of such a cycle are likely minimal, and the potential rewards may far outweigh them.

This is especially true for Hollywood actors. Let's take Manu Bennett, for example (pictured above). Steroids were a part of his winning the role of Crixus in Spartacus. He used them in his mid-thirties to build an impressive physique for a role as a MMA fighter. The movie deal fell through and a broke Bennett was forced to earn a living as a day laborer. But the producers of Spartacus saw his photo and wanted him for the gladiator role. Bennett immediately began training (this time without steroids) and re-gained most of his muscle. From day laborer to action star—I'd say his cycle paid off. He is now in his mid-40's and hasn't ruled out using steroids to prepare for future roles. Can you blame him?

Final Thoughts

Let's say a young trainee approached me and asked about using anabolic steroids. This would be my advice:

1. Forget about it if you're a teenager. I just don't think it's wise to mess with your hormones when you've barely started shaving. I also suspect steroids may cause premature closure of growth plates, possibly stunting growth (there's no ethical way to prove or test this, of course, but it seems quite feasible).

2. Train at least ten years to build your foundation of size and strength first. Take advantage of being at your natural peak years of testosterone production (early teens through twenties). Learn how to lift, eat and rest. You'll be surprised at what you can do naturally if you put your mind to it.

3. Decide if the benefits of a cycle are worth the risks for you once you've reached your natural potential. The extra muscle or strength is not worth the legal risks for me. Impressing a few meatheads with my bench press isn't worth sharing a prison cell with one.

4. Do plenty of research before trying something if you decide it is worth the risks. Don't mess up your body or health with a poorly planned cycle.

5. Forget any bogus supplements that claim to be "steroid alternatives." There is no such thing.

Stop Associating With Losers

June 10, 2014 | by Dom Torres | Link | Original Link

One night after class I ran into a buddy of mine who I haven't spoken to almost all semester and his friend who I've spoken to once briefly. Let's call my buddy Justin and his friend Andrew. We were all done with classes and heading towards the train. We were shooting the shit on the walk to the train talking about classes, teachers, and plans after graduation.

Once we got inside the train station the conversation shifted to a mutual friend of ours. Let's call him William. My friend told me that William was all of a sudden hitting the streets and bars solo to approach women. This caught my attention. William is a tall guy (6'6) of Eastern European decent, not a model but decent looking. They told me he got rejected by about 30 women last weekend and both laughed full-heartedly. They expected me to join along but I didn't.

Our train came. They continued to make fun of William for being desperate and a loser for allowing himself to get rejected by that many women. I remembered the time I hit the bar with William. Back then he didn't have the balls to talk to a single girl—he was the ultimate lurker. I was impressed by the change he made and pointed out that I thought it showed initiative not desperateness.

They both said, "Nah that's desperateness" at the same time.

I posed the question, "Is it desperate to go after something you want?"

Andrew replied, "Well no, but not like that. You want to be the cool guy who walks into the room and girls are automatically attracted to."

I took a moment to think of an appropriate answer. The only men I know that have women hitting on them are very good looking guys, celebrities, fictional characters in action movies, or guys who wear axe.

I asked, “So if women aren’t throwing themselves at you then you should just stay home and jerk off?”

Both responded they would rather jerk off then get rejected by that many women.

Our train arrived at the platform where we needed to transfer onto another train. There was a break in the conversation.

As we walked upstairs to catch our second train, Justin asked me what my notch count was. Once I told him Andrew instantly interrupted saying, “Wow you count? That’s so sad.” Mind you my notch count is only in the 20’s. It isn’t an astronomical number one could have easily lost count of.

Justin pointed out that he counts as well (his is 11) but his friend still deemed it a sad act.

I waited till we boarded the second train to ask Andrew how many women he had been with. The answer was three. Gee, I wonder how he didn’t lose count?

Although Justin did not think counting was sad, he did believe my notch count was creeping up to the “gross” level. He proudly said, “I would never sleep with that many women because I want a wife and it looks bad on your life resume.”

The irony of his statement was that out of all three of us, the guy with the “gross” notch count could snag a girlfriend first. All I had to do was text one of my fuck buddies and ask them to be exclusive; without a doubt they would jump on the offer.

There was a second irony to his statement. Two years ago we were discussing our notch count and mine was significantly lower than his (I was at 1 and his was 5). He made fun of me for my lack of experience, and now when the tables are turned, experience is gross.

There was another break in the conversation as we got off our second train to wait for our last train. Yes, taking that many trains is common in New York.

As we waited, Andrew told us the advice he gave William. His words of wisdom were to ignore girls and pay them no mind—that they will come to you. Our player of the year with three notches was preaching hard. Maybe I can get him to submit a post on gaming for ROK.

Our third train came. The subject changed to a less controversial topic. Three stops later my stop came and I exited the train giving the two a pound, determined to put distance in our friendship.

I caution every man to be aware of people like this. Weed these disturbances out of your social circle and life. These are the types of people who will label you a steroid-using meathead the moment you begin to get serious in the gym and lift more than them. These are the type of people who will call you anti-social the moment you begin to do better than them at school. These are the people who will call you a desperate loser the moment you walk up to that hottie they’ve been eye-fucking for an hour.

As good as it may feel to keep them around with the intention of proving them wrong or for old friend’s sake, it’s not worth it. Every time you fall they will push you down further because it’s how they rationalize their immobility and how they feed their rationalization hamster. They're too lazy or afraid to take life by the horns so they want to see everyone around them on the same sinking boat. Anything to the contrary is a threat that must be shut down with ridicule.

Find friends who will high five you for getting rejected by a hot girl because they understand how much balls it takes to walk up to a desirable woman. Associate with these people and you're more likely to achieve success.

The Case For Our Retrenchment

June 11, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Daily Beast published a surprisingly red pill article titled "Watch What You Say, The New Liberal Power Elite Won't Tolerate Dissent." I highly recommend you read the whole thing but here are a couple highlights:

> As the modern clerisy has seen its own power grow, even while the middle class shrinks, it has used its influence to enforce a prescribed set of acceptable ideas. On everything from gender and sexual preference to climate change, those who dissent from the official pieties risk punishment.
>
> The rise of today's Clerisy stems from the growing power and influence of its three main constituent parts: the creative elite of media and entertainment, the academic community, and the high-level government bureaucracy.
>
> The Clerisy operates on very different principles than its rival power brokers, the oligarchs of finance, technology or energy. The power of the knowledge elite does not stem primarily from money, but in persuading, instructing and regulating the rest of society. Like the British Clerisy or the old church-centered French First Estate, the contemporary Clerisy increasingly promotes a single increasingly parochial ideology and, when necessary, has the power to marginalize, or excommunicate, miscreants from the public sphere.
> Today's Clerisy attempts to distill today's distinctly secular "truths"—on issues > ranging from the nature of justice, race and gender to the environment—and decide what is acceptable and that which is not. Those who dissent from the accepted point of view can expect their work to be simply ignored, or in some cases vilified. In the Clerical bastion of San Francisco, an actress with heretical views, in this case supporting a Tea Party candidate, who was pilloried, and lost work for her offense.

The above should contain no new information for you. The continuous witch-hunts and deceit by progressives have been long known in these parts.

The article clearly highlights not only the power of the cultural elite, which I described recently on my blog, but it's growing power. I won't deny that more people are taking the red pill every day, but for every one man who does, we lose thousands more to blue pilldom, with no hope of their eventual enlightenment because of the extensive brainwashing they face from all corners of their existence. There are currently 22 million Americans enrolled in university, and millions more join the ranks every fall. I ask you: which ideology will quickly become their default? Not ours, for sure. Judging by the size of the manosphere, we are but a drop in the bucket, a drop that remains the same size even as the bucket increases in height every year.

It is now clear to me that squaring off with the enemy is futile. For proof take a look at what's happening to the Men's Issues conference. Since announcing the conference, free-speech hating feminists are doing their best to cancel the event, enlisting their usual media allies for help, which has required the organizers to raise $25,000 for insurance and security. The conference will probably go on, but for what concrete benefit? How many men will their message reach?

That money could be better spent. With $25k you could create viral videos for Youtube that have the potential to reach millions instead of a thousand or two. We can't organize conferences like them. We can't expect fair or positive attention in the press like them. We can't expect support from anywhere, and while I respect the MRA attempt, I can't help but think of it as trying to organize a Jewish Issues conference in Hitler's Germany. Let's not mark ourselves with an easy bulls-eye for them to shoot at.

This is what I recommend:

1. Burrow within society, Fight Club style.

This is not the time to make a stand. Conditions are not ripe for an open-air battle. Instead we must continue finding men who already lean red pill instead of trying to convert blue pillers. There are many men in gaming and bodybuilding spheres that would be open to our message. We should find them with masculinity-themed articles before we publish one similar to "The 9 Ugliest Feminists," which surely pisses off the enemy (and makes me laugh), but only sends us garbage traffic and few conversions. All feminists know of ROK, but not every masculine man does. We must find them first.

2. Attack only when we have a clear advantage.

The recent Elliot Rodgers massacre showed that we don't have numbers to drive the conversation or have a substantial impact altering the mainstream narrative. We can properly defend ourselves, but no matter how correct we are, the cultural elite will only broadcast ideas or quotes that are taken out-of-context and make us appear to be cannibals. We must only attack when victory is assured—when we can isolate a liberal blogger or reporter and hurt their credibility in the eyes of Google. We must pay them no mind unless we can cause definite pain, because their megaphone is more than 10,000 times larger than ours. We can not win using their tactics.

3. Align ourselves more closely with traditional conservatives.

A lot of you may find this to be unsavory, but we must find natural allies to defeat the enemy. A positive and somewhat recent development is the American Enterprise Institute, a possibly neo-conservative organization, tearing down feminism with precision. They have published many clips that overlap with our beliefs. Two examples:

While they probably won't rush into our arms, it would be stupid to blacklist their productions when their success can only aid our cause. If we can help their videos get a larger audience, we should.

ROK took quite a beating in the wake of Elliot Rodger. We sustained heavy fire from Think Progress, The Young Turks, Raw Story, and a dozen other blogs, not to mention a constant barrage on Twitter. But we did not stand down. We did not have to change one word of an article we published. It's this type of success that could lead to false confidence, foolishness, and overreach in attacking an enemy that is still much stronger than ourselves. We must instead be patient and bide our time to continue honing our message, searching for minor advantages here or there that provide us with openings that we can exploit. As long as we realize that we are not truly strong, and victory is not possible in the short-term, I believe we'll be able to survive. My utmost concern is not winning, in fact, but self-preservation. We're still not even assured of that.

The Importance Of Standing Your Ground

June 11, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

A recent experience last week and a thread over at the forum prompted this article.

In most aspects of life, the rules you set in the beginning of the interaction or relationship end up becoming the rules for the duration of it. If you are a boss and allow your employees to constantly come in late, guess what they will think that behavior is acceptable and it will be harder to retrain them later on. On the other hand, should you admonish them on their first late appearance, they are put on notice that this behavior is unacceptable. At that point they can choose to abide by your rules (maintain employment) or not (quit).

Of utmost importance is that you must hold your ground. To threaten and not follow through is a sign of weakness.

Women are no different. How you set the tone of the relationship is how it will likely proceed from then on. Note however this is not some trick for you to get what you want, but rather a mentality and a frame you should keep. Moreover, you have to be prepared for losing the girl. But here is the great part…in losing the girl you will be better off because you are not compromising on something that you do not want and do not enjoy. A few examples:

The Ukrainian Gamble

Last year I was living in Kiev and I met a rather attractive girl at some bar and went out with her a few times that week with no bang. My buddy and I were soon coming to the end of our time in Kiev. Our next destination was Odessa and we were in a gambling mood, so we thought we would tell this girl and one of her friends to come with us for a few days of partying and hopefully banging.

Now I was more than aware of the risks – these girls coming for just a free trip and us becoming sexless innkeepers. However, she had slept over before with some tit play and her friend stated she was interested in my buddy. Admittedly he was taking a bigger risk than me.

But to minimize our risk, I made certain to establish some things up front and stand my ground. So when the conversations escalated between my girl and I on how the logistics would work for a such a trip, they went a little like this (note – yes this is how I dumb down my English when communicating with foreign girls):

> Her: Ok we come, we get two bedroom apartment and me and my friend sleep in one bed, and you and your friend sleep in the other bed.
> Me: No.
> Her: No? Why?
> Me: If you want to come with us and stay with us, you sleep in my bed and your friend sleep in my friend's bed. If not ok, get own place.
>
> Her: (Angry and confused face). I don't think so.
> Me: Ok, get your own place and we can meet for dinner one night.

After a few minutes of her huffing and puffing, asking why and so on, she went and called her friend, they chatted in Ukrainian for a few minutes and she came back.

> Her: Ok, but I cannot promise sex.
> Me: Are you saying NO sex, or that you just cannot guarantee sex?
>
> Her: I cannot guarantee it, we will see what happens.
> Me: Ok, that's fine.

We went on the trip, both of us banged on the first night and it was an absolutely awesome few days. Nothing but sex, them cooking and cleaning for us, and they even paid for the first night and transportation there since we couldn't figure out how to do it. In the end, we actually saved money by having them along.

There is no doubt in my mind that had I not stood my ground and held the line with regards to them sleeping in our beds, there would have been a much less chance for sex. I set the rules and was not willing to move from it. And had they not agreed? I still would have been better off. There would be no point in sharing an apartment with girls that were sleeping in separate beds.

Delusional Demand Girl

The above demonstrates holding your ground and you get the girl in the end. But as I mentioned, this is not always the case.

I met a girl a few months ago. Typical American girl that was delusional as to her self worth, but cute, great body and incredibly rich. Nonetheless my investment was minimal as we would just meet for sex and the occasional drink out.

Last week she texted me to ask if I wanted to come to some party and when she told me the location of the apartment I said yes because, well, it's one of those areas that only the truly rich can afford. I'm never one to turn down an opportunity to further integrate myself into social circles like this.

I arrive and the place is stacked with talent, free drinks and catered food. I try to get my buddy over because I fully believe in Banging it Forward, but he is on a date. I stick around, have a few drinks and we head back with the girl to my place.

Upon arrival, she refuses to have sex stating that "all we do is have sex." Well no shit. At that point I was tired and just fine with passing out, but then she continued on:

> Her: The next few times we hang out, we are not having sex.
> Me: (Laugh loudly)
> Her: What are you laughing at?
> Me: No.
> Her: No what?
> Me: I have zero interest in you if we are not having sex.
> Her: What! Are you saying you only want me for sex??
> Me: No, I'm cool with hanging out too but not if there is no sex. Like I said, I have zero interest in you if we are not having sex.

She got off the bed, grabbed her stuff and left. Happily I went to bed. She texted me the next morning asking how I could be so rude and that she was incredibly pissed off, and to not throw out her bra that she left behind. I never responded. Did I lose the girl? Probably… But I'd rather lose her then go out with her on a nonsexual basis, even once.

At this point in my life and given her value to me, this was my preferred outcome.

Do Not Listen To Others' Characterization Of Your Actions

She (or whatever third party) may claim that you are an asshole, that you are selfish, that you are giving an ultimatum etc. As to the first two things, congrats yes you are. Be selfish and be an asshole—it is your life and if you do not want to tolerate something, then don't. Same thing with the supposed ultimatum—you are just stating your rules and she has the option to comply or not. If not, no harm.

Here's one of my favorite things to say if this comes up. Tell her that "there are plenty of guys that are ok with seeing you and not having sex. I'm not one of them." Then encourage her to go have sex with other men.

Your Ground Is Completely Subjective

There is no person other than yourself who can decide where to draw the line, and what ground to stand upon. Had the above example been another girl in my rotation, I maybe would have been fine with a few nonsexual dates. Perhaps the girl was enjoyable to be around whereas this one was not, or perhaps she was bisexual and there is added value to sticking out a boring date or two.

The point is that your ground is your ground. It can change based on the girl, or based on your situation. If you are having sex with 10 different girls and one of them wants to just go to a museum with you, sure why not maybe you would go. If you have a large work deadline and just want to bang one out, your tune may be different.

Since sex is a big part of all of our lives, we can conclude by speaking about sex again. If the first time she denies you sex and you protest but then give in, it will become a practice. She knows you will break and she will use it as a manipulative tool in the future.

To borrow my fellow ROK writer's response to the thread above (credit: Tuthmosis), if she denies you sex and you tell her something along these lines:

She may walk. Or she may stay realize that she will never see you again and rescind her demand. Either way, if you have actually decided upon that line in the sand you want to take, then no matter her decision you will be better off.

Why It’s Important To Develop An Insane Degree Of Self-Love

June 12, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Too many men walk around thinking that the women they desire are superior to them. In the unlikely event one of them accepts him for sex or a relationship, he assumes she must be doing him a favour, that there must be something “special” about their relationship. Beware, for this is how pedestalization, obsession, and heartbreak breed.

Women, we are told from a young age, are attracted to “cool” guys. The problem for those of us who are not naturals is figuring out what “cool” actually means and how to embody it. The most powerful piece of advice about meeting women I have ever been given, one that changed my whole paradigm of thinking and levels of success, was that I should assume an insane degree of self-love. Now, the truth is there were probably already things I liked about myself, but social conditioning had taught me to be humble, not to brag, to keep my head below the parapet, and be a nice guy. None of these behaviours helped me with women.

What did help was when I started communicating an irrational, almost absurd sense of self-confidence to the world through every element of my behaviour, from the way I walked to the way I spoke, to the way I dressed. This isn't about being bigheaded. It's more about recognising what's unique and amazing about you and being proud of it. Once I had achieved congruence in this and carried myself as though I were a big deal, suddenly and mysteriously my world changed as women previously out of my reach started to make themselves available to me, and men began to defer to me. Very quickly, a truth that I had never been aware of before was revealed to me: the individual, not society decides what "cool" is for him: each man gives himself permission to be cool.

What does “cool” mean?

I remember looking at the popular kids at school and wondering, when you broke it down, what was so great about them. Many weren’t particularly good-looking or intelligent. They didn’t have good taste in clothes or music, yet they still carried themselves as though they were something special. I often wondered why this was so and who had “given them permission” to do so. I imagined it impossible that someone like me, someone so inherently uncool, could ever behave with such entitlement. For a while, I actually believed that somehow I wasn’t allowed to dress fashionably, because those cool clothes were for other people who were already cool.

Utter nonsense.

In fact, “cool” is a self-designation: no one else gives you the permission to be cool, and no one is magically endowed with the quality of coolness from birth. It is a mantle that you assume for yourself, and you can do so today.

Remember, there is no such thing as consensus. Even if every single person in your immediate circle says you’re a loser or acts as though they think so:

- You don’t know that’s what they’re thinking for real.
- There is no empirically correct measure.
- There’s a big world out there, and others will think differently.

Understand this now: It is you who makes the decision to dress cool, act cool, and be cool. You give yourself permission, and you should never seek it from anyone else. Become the embodiment of that ideal image of yourself you hold inside.

Resistance

As you start to make changes to yourself, you may experience social pressure from other people. If you buy new clothes, for example, then people used to the “old you” may complain or criticize. Ignore them. Their thoughts are irrelevant. They don’t really care what you wear or what you are doing with your life. They are merely trying to push you down to your former position in the hierarchy so that they can feel better about themselves. Remember, a wise man once said: what other people think of you is none of their business.

Deluded self-belief

Your ultimate goal, though, is not mere coolness. You should aim beyond that for a deluded degree of self-belief. Your aim should be to walk around as though you are the most exceptional guy on the planet. If you accept the principle of the non-existence of consensus, you will see that no one can either give you permission to act this way or refute that you have a right to—you are free to do whatever you want. So how do you achieve this almost delusional state of self-regard?

- Give yourself permission to do so.
- Seek role models relevant to you and mirror them.
- Fake it to make it.
- Don’t allow any contrary evidence to enter your reality.

The first step is to make a decision, and you must make it absolutely. The second step is really important and helped me a great deal. Pick out celebrities and other people that you admire for their charisma, cool image, and behaviour—and copy them. Think about how they dress, their mannerisms, and how they talk, walk, and act, and find ways to copy them without appearing incongruent. Read interviews with them or better still meet them if you can to suss out how they think, their attitudes to life, and how they handle common situations with a view to adopting their mindsets for yourself.

Celebrities I have channelled include Robbie Williams (when he was younger) with his alpha body language, complete conviction in his own attractiveness, and cheeky humour, and Russell Brand, whose idiosyncratic dress sense, florid verbal style, and laser eye contact I admire very much. Both display dominant male characteristics and have very tangible self-belief. I would also add Jay Z to that list, as his grace, warmth, and humour are a welcome sheen on his ultimate alpha male persona. On the other side of the spectrum, you might consider someone like Harry Styles, who is boyish, scruffy, and relatively unconventional in looks but who has genuine charisma and great style. The people that resonate most with you and have the most congruence with your personal style are the ones to model.

Also, try to ensure that all the influences you are receiving are positive—music, movies, books. Don’t watch too much television. Listen to unsentimental music that will get you fired up and hungry, like rap and techno. Don’t wallow in sad love songs, soap operas, reality shows, and other beta frivolities.

Why Should You Adopt Deluded Self-Belief?

- Because in order to be truly attractive to a wide range of women, you have to be prepared to stand beyond what “polite society” regards as normal social conduct.
- Entitlement is attractive.
- People will believe a narrative that is presented to them strongly and consistently.

The important thing is that your self-esteem should be excessive, and this needn’t necessarily be based on anything tangible other than the decision you’ve made for it to be so. That is all you require.

The third point is particularly significant. People are essentially gullible, tending to accept what they are told. If you continually relate to them in a way that suggests you are cool, in the end, they will believe it (assuming you have your fundamentals down). This is why advertising works. Consistency is the key. Soon enough, people will accept the cool persona you present. Those that don’t you should simply ignore or phase out of your reality. And the best way to appear consistently cool?

Have a primary mission or passion that has nothing to do with women.

Real men are doers, not passive consumers.

Choose something that you love doing, whether it is music, sports, photography, writing, or art, an activity where you produce—put something out into the world. Make that your number one focus and you will find yourself impassioned and full of vital energy, which will communicate itself to those around you. Having a passion will make you less vulnerable to the negative emotions of others and will make you cooler in their eyes.

Finally, make sure that you have a group of other men that you can talk to—male friends are valuable to you. Centre yourself by catching up with them once a week and talking through your problems and successes. Male influence will keep you balanced and on your alpha path. Make sure they are men who understand and are encouraging of your mission, who are actively working to improve themselves too. Stick with the winners.

How Should Men Deal With Today's American Police?

June 12, 2014 | by Thomas More | Link | Original Link

What exactly are our rights when dealing with the police? I have to be honest here and say I as well as many others are highly suspicious of their nature. I want to first mention that as a law abiding citizen I am not anti-cop. I think Fred Reed sums it up best in his cop columns:

> You may not like cops. Few do. They can be arrogant, impatient, rude. They can weary of a demanding, complaining public. Most are good people. A few are not. They are what we've got. They are out there, 24/7, with the psychopaths, the crash victims with the cartilage white where the flesh is gone, the week-old dead found by the reek, the snot, the blood, the cum, the maggots, the screaming half-crazed fifteen-year-old rape victims, the charred children caught in the fire with their guts exploded, the aged drunk women pissing in their pants in alleys and trying to crawl, the baby's brains on the windshield. You might get a bit odd too. You might get real damn odd. Think about it.

However there is a problem that has to be addressed, and that is quite simple: as the United States moves from a free society to a neo-sovietized one (yes I know America is already considerably less free today, but relax, it's going to get even worse), the police essentially cease observing the traditional motto of "to serve and protect the community" and become the mere tin soldiers of the current system.

Unfortunately you will find yourself having to deal with the police sooner or later. Although they hold the upper hand and regardless of how thuggish some may be and what they may say to you in order to manipulate you into giving up your rights, it behooves all of use to know the best way to proceed. Bear in mind that most of the times dealing with the men in blue (some are now the men in black SWAT attire) is NOT a matter or win or lose, but rather a matter of break even or lose.

The videos posted here may not necessarily give us a definitive answer, as interactions with law enforcement is anything but linear. The answers may lie somewhere in the discussion to follow this article. There are many mitigating factors: including the community, situation and the temperament of the officer in question.

How did some police go from decent men who walked our streets i.e. the constable on patrol, to become, to put it politely, over enthusiasts with badges? How did some become the mortal enemy of John Q. Public? One factor I would wager is when they became separate from their beat. That is to say that their patrol commonly is not in the same neighborhood where they live. Back in the day, the cops were locals and judged situations with a certain level of compassion and there were either no arrest quotas, or none like today. The genuine violent piece of shit were dealt with properly (police station walls were painted red for a reason).

By the same token, your typical Friday night drunk and disorderly only rated a slight kick in the pants, just enough to wake the guy up. Often times the cop usually knew him and would say, "Go home Harry before I call your wife," knowing full well that being yelled at by the ol' ball and chain would serve as a better deterrent than any amount of lock up could.

Today it is common to have the police posted in areas where they are strangers to the community. When they are not working, many members of the law enforcement insulate themselves from the civilian population. They hang out with other police and personnel and reside in communities whose neighbors are also police. Most disconcerting is the overall attitude they have about people. I have a friend who was a cop, and he told me the police see people in two classes: us and them (i.e. those who work in law enforcement, and those who are the masses to be treated like sheep). Many members of the police tend to have a dislike for people in general which gets exasperated by both the media and having to deal with genuine lowlifes on a daily basis.

Why criminalize men for no reason? There are several factors, one of them being privatized jails. Over-criminalization has an obvious purpose: to increase municipal revenues for city and state and even the federal system. Essentially any man today in the States could be fined or arrested for anything, and in fact I would wager between all the unreasonable laws that exist and the extreme penalities for violating such laws, that it is somewhat impossible for any man in the USA not be in violation of something. This is of course, how things were during the Soviet Union.

To give you an idea of what privatized jails are about, visit these links:

- Private prisons big business
- Cheap prison labor

We have the highest per capita jailed citizenry than any other nation in the world. Justice, among many things about the USA, is becoming corrupted. Although the percentage of privatized jails is quite small, given the current trends of America I see the number of non-state owned incarceration services and institutions growing over the next few decades.

So what can one do? The Flex Your rights video touches on the basics: always demonstrate respect even if the police officer is not showing any. Never show aggression, because remember: at the very least the State will try to throw an absurd fine your way for revenue purposes. Worse case scenario a good Rodney King beating and a night in jail could be added in for good measure.

As mentioned earlier, it does depend on the officer and the circumstance. It may be a bit over the top to say that the same training and indoctrination used to make the police callous might have been used when training various personnel in the German extermination facilities, but without a doubt officers today are instructed to become detached from civilization in order to properly fulfill their directives regardless of how unconstitutional the directives may be (increase revenues, arrest quotas).

Knowing the kind of mindset the police have, I have found that it's best to always remain calm and never show fear while at the same time never showing anger either. Smile. Yes, if done at the right times and not too much, smile like he is an old buddy of yours you have not seen in a while. Don't overdue it, but smiles can be a powerful interrupt, and when a cop is trying to be a brute, a pattern interrupt is what you need. I'm not saying this is guaranteed to work, but it did work for me one time when I got pulled over. The key here is to break through the default robotic shell that the officer has built up through his police training. The more civil you are the better the outcome in the end, including if your case comes to court.

These are indeed difficult times we are living in for those of us who are fully aware of what freedom is. We are witnessing first hand society becoming more toxic, stupid and tyrannical to men with each passing year. But Sun Tzu said it best when he stated to "Choose your battles wisely". Dealing with today's police requires a finesse until a civil war comes to pass or some other major shift that puts this country back to on constitutional terms, where everything across the board becomes sane again, including law enforcement.

Your Game Must Be Strong To Pull Off An Open Relationship

June 13, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

The one-ended open relationship is every man's dream scenario—when he is allowed, or even encouraged, to fuck anyone whom he wishes, while having a girl waiting at home who is loyal to him, and him only. Really, if you think about it, what isn't to like about that situation if you are the man?

Nothing.

All of his sexual needs are met, and his loyal girl is unable to dangle sex as a reward or utilize it as a weapon. He gets his variety from a sexual standpoint, and at the same time, he gets all the comfort and stability of a full-time monogamous girlfriend. Granted, he probably has to deal with more jealousy and shit tests than he would if they were monogamous, but that is a small price to pay for complete and guiltless sexual freedom.

Proposing The Open Relationship

Recently, someone on Reddit (these are the archives, as the original was taken down) attempted to pull off an open relationship on both ends, and had it blow up in his face. Read the full article if you please, but in short, the writer is feeling unfulfilled—the reason being that he is stuck in a monogamous relationship who is, in his own words, “a big girl.” He writes:

> Eventually I realised that the best thing for me to do would be to open up the relationship or break up with my girlfriend.
> I spoke to her about this and, well, it broke her heart at the time. She was sobbing on me the whole night of me talking to her about it, saying she wanted to be monogamous and she didn’t like the thought of an open relationship at all. She asked for a couple of weeks to think about it, which happened, but when we spoke about it again she told me she still didn’t want to do it. I had to tell her at this point it was this or break up as I didn’t feel fulfilled. At this, she said okay, she would try the open relationship.
> So, in short, she agreed to the open relationship even though she hated the idea as she didn’t want to break up. She wanted to know how an open relationship worked so I set down a few ground rules and boundaries which we both agreed to. Mainly things like.. sleep with whoever you want whenever you want, but always with protection. Casual dating is allowed as long as the person you’re dating knows the situation (since it’s hard to sleep with someone without a date first). Our relationship shouldn’t suffer and we still need to be there for each other. etc.

If we are doing an honest assessment of this man's work, he didn't do that bad as far as carrying out the proposal (ignoring the fact that he committed to serial monogamy with a fat girl in the first place). He did not give in to her demands, and did not cave when she pulled the waterworks on him. He stood his frame and told her it was his way or the highway, and by all means this was the correct move.

If you are casually dating a girl, and she flat-out demands monogamy, it is best to hold your frame and refuse to commit. If she relents and agrees to keep seeing you, you are in the driver's seat. If you relent and cave to her wishes, you end up relationships like these; her frame outweighs yours and you are left to have your soul crushed slowly and painfully.

In short, the reader got what he wanted. Or so he thought.

The Situation Backfires

The writer's problem is that he had little to know understanding sexual marketplace value or dating dynamics in general. As you can read below, the situation entirely backfired on him, as she began riding the carousel at full speed while he could not even secure a coffee date.

> Less than two months later from this, she's signed up on FetLife too and now 100% enjoying herself. There are men crawling all over her, her profile, her pictures she's put up. I know for a fact that she's been on a heck of a lot of dates, both with people from the website and off it, and I also know she's been intimate with many of them too (I keep seeing comments on her pictures saying vulgar things like 'God I miss my mouth around those beautiful breasts' etc from other men who I know she has been on dates with..)
> Me, on the other hand? I've not hooked up with anyone, and only had one date. All the women who seemed to be interested in me turned out to only want to flirt online and only wanted attention, and when I brought up meeting up with any of them I got rejected.

Any man who had read ROK would know that online dating is a woman's paradise for attention whoring and cheap sex. Judging by the way that he wrote that she was, “on Fetlife too” leads me to believe that he openly encouraged her to sign up for this website, where she was obviously going to meet horny men who wanted to fuck her.

So here is this “big” girl whose monogamous boyfriend crushes her heart by asking for an open relationship, and he then hands her the key to get all of her self esteem back and more through the cock carousel. But that is exactly what he did, and it continued to go downhill from there.

> Just this past Friday night I go out to the late night shop, and on the main road I find my girlfriend standing outside a pub with a guy, holding hands and making out. He was at least 6’4, muscles everywhere you look, arms covered in tattoos (which I know my girlfriend likes). I feel like shit. My girlfriend sees me, immediately breaks away from him and comes over smiling all over her face. She hugs me, kisses me, then the guy comes and introduces himself. It was awkward as fuck honestly, but my girlfriend didn’t seem to notice at all. After stupid chitchat I tell them I need to get going, at which my girlfriend tells me she loves me, kisses me and that she will text me the next day as she wanted a date with me the next night. She then says she’s going to go into the pub to visit the bathroom, and asked her “date” to wait outside for her and then after they’ll “get going” (back to her place I assume..).
> tl;dr: Asked my girlfriend for an open relationship so we could both date and sleep with other people. My girlfriend has been on way too many dates and I’m sure she’s hooked up with a good few too. I havn’t. Feel the open relationship has gotten way too unfair towards me and I want to close it, but because it was my idea I don’t know how to bring it up to her. Need advice on how to do this and close the relationship again.

What Can You Learn?

As stated, this man’s strategy towards pulling this off was poor from the get-go. To start, if he was going to pursue this open relationship, he should have already had some legitimate solid leads cooking (not just girls he was playing instant message tag with), or at least had enough game that he could confidently go out and successfully pull a girl that very night.

You see, him sleeping around would have actually made this girl more attracted to him, as women typically will get the tingles when another woman is interested in her man. The same is not true in reverse. Most normal men will feel nauseous of the thought of another penis inside of their girlfriend’s vagina.

If he had played this correctly, it is more likely that his girlfriend’s hamster would have gone haywire, and she would have turned to all sorts of tactics to get him to spend the majority of his time and sexual energy on her and not other women. He would have reaped the rewards of a loving, doting girlfriend while still being able to get some ass on the side.

Instead, he handed her a loaded gun.

Had he any knowledge of online dating, he would have known she was going to get bombarded with attention, even if she weighs 300 pounds. Meanwhile, he realized that the majority of the women are online dating sites simply to attention whore, with little-to-no intention of every stepping foot out on a date.

Of course, once his girlfriend got a taste of the situation (a beta for her emotional support, with his approval to fuck all the alpha cock she wanted), she was hooked. As soon as she struck first, and his jealously arose before hers did, the game was over. His attempts to return this to a strictly monogamous relationship will fall upon deaf ears. Most likely, they will break up sooner rather than later, and she will continue down her path of racking up notches. Eventually, she will tire of this, or become too obese and ugly for her to continue to receive attention. It is then that she will return to the writer and likely accept his terms of monogamy again.

I sincerely hope he is not foolish enough to do so.

While I do not claim to be an open relationship expert, there are plenty of people around this part of the Internet that have pulled them off to great success.

One thing I do know is: if you're going to propose an open relationship with a girl, make sure your frame is strong and that you can actually seduce a girl yourself.

Or, you could just get a mistress. It seems a hell of a lot easier.

Stop Talking About What You Are Going To Do

June 13, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Sitting in a bar booth in the not-too-distant past, I listened to someone speak of his grandiose plans to break into the restaurant industry. I have heard this plan so many times previously that I could speak the specifics of it before the words came out of his mouth. I figured I must have heard this plan 10 times before. This time though I decided to break the "Groundhog Day" cycle by asking this gentleman what he has done to further his plan. Instead of receiving examples of actions to further his plan, I got the "deer in the headlights look". I concluded that this restaurant planning was nothing more than a delusion similar to those hoping to win the lottery. I do not think this restaurant plan will ever be brought up to my presence again.

It is good to have hopes and dreams; the lack of action on any projects is the greatest obstacle to success. One good plan acted upon is better than 10 great plans fantasized about. This applies to grand strategies on your career as well as what you going to do today. Failing to act on any good plan instead of actually acting on it leads to lack a success and wasted time. Repeating this over time leads to failure by default against any possible competitors.

"A journey of a thousand miles begins with a single step" – Lao Zi

Even the simplest goals require an actionable plan. Sometimes what appears as simple goals actually require complex planning behind them. Getting girls requires a method to get them and place to bang them. Getting in shape requires the discipline to exercise and the facilities to conduct workouts in, no matter how simple they are. You cannot get a corporate job without owning a good suit. No matter how complex a goal is, it can always be broken down into simple tasks. Going back to the restaurant example, an oversimplification of the tasks involved would be acquiring seed capital, formulating monetary policy, handling local laws and ordinances, and making a business plan. These relatively simple tasks can be done from one's computer in his free time. Other goals can also be broken down and acted on from home if one was willing and able to do such thing.

It seems motivation is the key obstacle to people who fantasize about success. How does one get into the mindset of acting on goals? Simple, you start small with little tasks to do. Do you have trouble accomplishing tasks? Write down everything you wish to do today. Check off each item as you do it. I have noticed that when I make such a list I get all the tasks done before 10 AM. When all of your tasks are done, make another list to accomplish before the end of the day. They can include simple things such as cleaning the car, taking out the trash, sending noncommittal and vague texts to various women in your harem, and other things you can be proactive about.

Another way to stay productive is to use your time is 2-for-1. Bring a book relevant to your goals while you wait for the doctor or getting new tires put on your ride. Use your phone to keep up on your industry of choice after moving furniture with your woman while she starts telling you her life story. In both instances staring at the ceiling was replaced with productive activity.

It is important to be proactive because a great many things in society exploit those who are reactive for profit. Those last minute airline tickets, that candy bar at the gas station at 3 AM, paying to rebuild an engine due to the worn out timing belt are all examples of things that get very expensive when they could have be very cheap. Planning and acting proactively is much cheaper than being reactive

Next time you are kicking back at the house with nothing to do and decide to fill in the void by firing up the Xbox, try writing down some things you could get done in that time instead. You will be surprised how much productive time is wasted when you watch the latest episode Game of Thrones. A man that stays on track towards goals and acts on them will be a lot closer to accomplishing all of them than anyone merely talks about them. In addition, working on accomplishing goals will give you new things to talk about.

10 Different Types Of Blowjobs

June 13, 2014 | by Oracle Z | Link | Original Link

One of the least things a modern woman can do for her partner is to provide the perfect blowjob for his fetish in return. Even if she does learn to master all the described types here, she'd still benefit in many ways—from strengthening her facial muscles to improving her Duckface (for taking selfies), her agility, and her general oral skills.

How to rate a blowjob

Before proceeding to discuss the types of blowjobs, it's important to know how to rate them at first. Rating a blowjob is the same as rating a sexual encounter.

The rating factors are as follows:

The important ones among these are the pleasure level, female expertise (fellatio skill), time duration, comfort (difficulty level), and orgasm intensity factors. A good blowjob is when these factors significantly contribute to a pleasant, memorable experience. And an exceptional blowjob is the memorable one which she provides to get you in the mood even if you're not in it.

Don't worry if some of the below blowjob types appear bizarre, since some cunnilingus techniques you'd find online are equally the same. If you can improvise and add to this list, then all the better.

1. The Idiot's or Virgin's Blowjob

Description: Involves her role-playing the virgin who's sucking cock for her first time (a good opportunity for her to rediscover her lost "innocence" and reclaim her "virginity", especially if she's a slut). A word of caution though: a lot of closet sluts successfully use this blowjob to masquerade themselves and ensnare ignorant men (idiots) into 'relationships' by performing it during the first encounter, thus the alternate name "The Idiot's Blowjob" (for the idiot who falls victim for this type).

Time Duration: More than 5 minutes

Pleasure: Depends on how much you enjoy her role playing

Comfort: Average

Orgasm intensity: Depends on her expertise

Female expertise: Not much, her acting (faking) skills are more important for this one

2. The Hiffy or Caveman's Blowjob

Description: Essentially a super quick, rough blowjob. Most sluts master it with practice in risky public environments or gangbangs. Involves fast sucking with vigorous bobbing of her head, and plenty of digital stimulation of your genitals. This blowjob usually doesn't last long as the primary focus is more on a quick orgasm and less on quality, sensual tactile pleasure.

Time Duration: Between 30 seconds to 5 minutes at the maximum

Pleasure: Negligible to average

Comfort: Negligible to average

Orgasm intensity: Depends when you last ejaculated

Female expertise: Little to average as you vigorously thrust while she just nods

3. The Messy Blowjob

Description: A blowjob which involves you ejaculating everywhere (on her or the surroundings), except in her mouth. It's called a messy blowjob because it usually creates a mess at the end of it. Perfect for men who like to see their women drenched in their cum, and women who like cum showers. All types of blowjobs can all end up as a messy blowjob depending on just the target of the climax. The risk factor is that an irresponsible messy blowjob can land you in a mess (think semen stained items).

Time Duration: Variable

Pleasure: Variable

Comfort: Variable

Orgasm intensity: Strong enough to create a mess

Female expertise: Variable

4. The Standard Blowjob

Description: A relaxed and slower version of the Hiffy in more comfortable surroundings. A standard among most couples throughout the world, but deserves mention here because most men usually can't distinguish it from the other types (to them, a blowjob is just a blowjob). But even blowjobs have different types and labels, just like how women have.

Time Duration: More than 5 minutes

Pleasure: Variable, leaning more towards average. A bad blowjob is however quite common in this type, especially from unenthusiastic women in committed, secure relationships

Comfort: Average

Orgasm intensity: Depends when you last climaxed

Female expertise: Average

5. The Gourmet Blowjob

Description: Involves edible items (food essences). Marinate her favorite essence profusely on your shaft and make her fellate you. Works perfect when you want her to go down on you after you've just taken a piss. The taste of her favorite essence on your dick will then mask the last drops of urine dribbling out into her mouth, making it unnoticeable to her.

(In contrast, eating pussy is often like noticeably eating raw liver— and in worst cases, like eating rotten seafood.) The gourmet blowjob also works effectively when she's thirsty or starved. Keep repeating the procedure till orgasm. For men with wilder, kinky fetishes—read the addendum at the end.)

Time Duration: More than 10 minutes

Pleasure: Good to Excellent

Comfort: Relaxing, comfortable surroundings needed

Orgasm intensity: Often powerful

Female expertise: Exceptional

6. The Vocal Blowjob

Description: Involves exaggerated dirty sex talk and animated vocal sounds of her gurgling and choking on your dick (deep throat thrusting could also achieve that). However, this blowjob becomes irritating when repeated frequently.

Time Duration: More than 5 minutes

Pleasure: Variable

Comfort: Don't attempt this without complete privacy

Orgasm intensity: Depends on her expertise

Female expertise: Good for sucking, exceptional for vocal and acting skills

7. The Handicapped Blowjob

Description: Involves use of her mouth and tongue on your genitalia exclusivément, with no hands involved at all. You could hog-tie her for added effect. Works best when she salivates profusely during the act. Ball game with her wet tongue is an added bonus considering the exhausting difficulty level of this blowjob. Stop before she passes out due to exhaustion, else you'll have agonizing difficulty extracting yourself out of her unconscious mouth.

Time Duration: More than 10 minutes

Pleasure: Good to very good

Comfort: Good

Orgasm intensity: Good to very good

Female expertise: Exceptional

8. The Acrobatic Blowjob

Description: Works best with lightweight, skinny or petite chicks. Hold her upside down while thrusting in her mouth in the standing position or…

…assume the above stance with you squatting on her face with her under you on the bed, facing away. Lower your dick in her mouth and teasingly rub your nutsack on her nose for added tactile pleasure. Just don't fart on her face (often an involuntary and uncontrollable reaction due to the intense tactile pleasure generated in that position), since this could disastrously make her swoon in the middle of the act, thus prematurely ending the experience (and possibly your relationship). A similar tragedy could occur if you lose your footing to end up crushing her face under your ass, especially if you're overweight.

Time Duration: More than 10 minutes

Pleasure: Average to Very Good

Comfort: Difficult while standing and can result in a debilitating back problem when attempted with the wrong (fat) woman.

Orgasm intensity: Powerful especially if you're squatting on her face

Female expertise: Exceptional, to particularly handle involuntary farts

9. The Python Blowjob

Description: Involves her slowly swallowing your dick inch by inch—very much like a python swallowing its prey—and vigorously massaging your dick with her tongue while you're inside her profusely salivating mouth. When she slowly swallows your dick completely to reach its base, she then explores below by flickering her warm wet tongue on your nutsack, like a snake.

Time Duration: More than 10 minutes

Pleasure: EXTRAORDINARY

Comfort: Good to excellent

Orgasm intensity: POWERFUL

Female expertise: EXTRAORDINARY

10. The Porn Star's Blowjob

Description: A combination of three or more or all the above blowjobs, giving your girl full porn star skills. The KING of Blowjobs.

Time Duration: More than 20 minutes

Pleasure: EXCELLENT

Comfort: A hassle free environment is essential for this one

Orgasm intensity: SUPER POWERFUL

Female expertise: EXTRAORDINARY

Addendum: Ball Game and the South Hole

A perfect blowjob is often incomplete without her slurping on your balls. A generous slathering of her warm saliva with her flickering wet tongue on your scrotum will often generate a rock hard erection and ensure a powerful orgasm. The technique mentioned in the Gourmet Blowjob of making her lick her favorite essence off your balls can assist you to heighten your arousal and pleasure. For more adventurous and kinky men, make her lick your perineum and probe your backdoor with her tongue, while she gives you a warm, wet hand job with her soft palms. In conclusion, each man must experience a perfect blowjob from his woman sometime before he dies.

The Real Nature Of Politics

June 14, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

In his penetrating book Straw Dogs, John Gray observes that "in the Persian Gulf, poor and rapidly growing populations need high and rising oil prices to survive. At the same time, rich countries need stable oil or falling oil prices if they are to continue to prosper. The result is a class Malthusian conflict." We are accustomed to a certain way of life, and are by no means inclined to live a less comfortable one. Oil-rich nations, for their part, do not wish to sell oil at prices which serve their interests less than ours. How to deal with this conflict? By occupying them under the guise of liberation.

So much for what's news in the world. All liberal societies, with their ease and comforts and rights, are founded on conquest, and citizens who want comfort and prosperity, must continue to depend on exploitation, both at home and abroad.

The ignoble lie of the State and the necessity of evil

The truth is that evil has always been essential to collective life; one group is cheated as the other gains, and we are compelled to feel lucky if we are the latter. "What are kingdoms [or nations] but great robberies?" asked St. Augustine. "What are robberies themselves, but little kingdoms [or nations]? The band itself is made up of men; it is ruled by the authority of a prince; it is knit together by the pact of the confederacy; the booty is divided by the law agreed on."

Many are indignant when our government uses the language of liberation to gain control of oil in the Middle East, but let's ask ourselves whether we are prepared to face the truth about what must be done in order to maintain the kind of life we have come to expect. We are not willing to hear the grim reality expressed frankly and straightforwardly, just as we do not want expensive oil or to forgo our First World ease and convenience generally. The hypocritical language functions to keep us from owning up to a dark reality about which we should prefer to be ignorant, like children whose parents tell them their dead pet has gone to heaven. We may feel guilty for our complicity; still, as often happens in life, we are torn between self-interest and the very evils done to others on which it depends.

Here in this interdependence, with one nation gaining as another is plundered, is the strongest argument for socialism; but we know from the last century that that project, even if noble in sentiment, is unlikely to go well. Nor is it plausible to believe other nations would decline our unprecedented power and domination, if it were available to them. Why, after all, do they strive so hard to compete with us? Global politics is not some friendly competition, like miniature golf. It concerns the sustaining of life itself, and here there is much necessary competition, conflict, and evil.

"It makes no difference what men think of war"

So said Judge Holden in Cormac McCarthy's Blood Meridan. And: "…war endures. As well ask men what they think of stone. War was always here. Before man was, war waited for him. The ultimate trade awaiting its ultimate practitioner." This is the primary and essential condition of the natural world, prior to all morality, which must frequently revert to it.

Of course, aggression and destructiveness are not unique to human beings. "If hamadryas baboons had nuclear weapons," says E.O. Wilson, "they would destroy the world in a week." "Lions and tigers and bears, oh my!" runs the well-known refrain in the Wizard of Oz, but it was only with the invention of the rifle that such deadly animals cease to lord the earth over human beings. Physics tells us that at the subatomic level the world is sheer energy. It is this that keeps the monstrous killing machine in motion. Here I want to quote an apt and overwhelmingly vivid passage from Schopenhauer's philosophical masterpiece The World as Will and Idea:

> Yunghahn relates that he saw in Java a plain far as the eye could reach entirely covered with skeletons, and took it for a battlefield; they were, however, merely the skeletons of large turtles, five feet long and three feet broad, and the same height, which come this way out of the sea in order to lay their eggs, and are then attacked by wild dogs (Canis rutilans), who with their united strength lay them on their backs, strip off their lower armour, that is, the small shell of the stomach, and so devour them alive. But often then a tiger pounces upon the dogs. Now all this misery repeats itself thousands and thousands of times, year out, year in. For this, then, these turtles are born.

It is with the same ferocious necessity that conquest and empire ultimately stem from insatiable desire itself, which characterizes life everywhere. It is also true, notwithstanding utopian liberal thinking, that there are simply not enough resources on earth for everyone to live as he wants to and, more and more, expects to. Fierce conflict over material goods is inescapable, and accordingly, it is the principle theme of human history. Finally, it should be understood that it is in the (irrational) nature of the individual to subordinate all other considerations to the blind pursuit of his own desires, regardless of the disasters that may follow. Politics, in short, is bound to be a bloody mess.

Necessarily competitive, like politics and the arts, sports provides an illuminating analogy with respect to why some ferocity is essential to life. Anyone who has played sports or seen them from the inside knows that the best athletes are not just the most talented, the most skilled, the most hardworking, and the smartest; they are also, crucially, the fiercest, the toughest, and the most ruthless. Hence Michael Jordan, Kobe Bryant, Isiah Thomas, Larry Bird, John Stockton, Karl Malone, Johnny Bench, Ty Cobb, Pete Rose, Lenny Dykstra, Roger Clemens, Jason Varitek, Dick Butkus, Ray Lewis, Bill Romanowski, Ronnie Lott, Lawrence Taylor, Brett Favre, and so many others.

The nature of this list parallels the highest excellence in the arts. From Dante and Michelangelo to Milton and Wagner and Charles Mingus, the arts number a great many formidable individuals. Time and again it has been said of them that they are obsessive; they will do whatever it takes to achieve excellent works. So it also with the world's great statesman, who are so single-minded in their vision. Vladimir Putin, for example, is wiser than his critics. Unlike them, he understands that conquest, domination, exploitation, etc., is the inevitable essence of politics. The Obama administration pretends to be indignant about Putin; in truth, its real concern is keeping Russia from becoming a superior world power. And so the world goes, a righteous sham that is rarely seen as such, and in which those who do see it for what it is had better keep quiet.

The essential brutality of politics is a topic about which we can learn much from Ralph Waldo Emerson:

> Churchmen and men of refinement, it seems agreed, are not fit persons to send to Congress. Politics is a deleterious profession, like some poisonous handicrafts. Men in power have no opinions, but may be had cheap for any opinion, for any purpose, — and if it be only a question between the most civil and the most forcible, I lean to the last. These Hoosiers and Suckers are really better than the snivelling opposition. Their wrath is at least of a bold and manly cast. They see, against the unanimous declarations of the people, how much crime the people will bear; they proceed from step to step, and they have calculated but too justly upon their Excellencies, the New England governors, and upon their Honors, the New England legislators. The messages of the governors and the resolutions of the legislatures, are a proverb for expressing a sham virtuous indignation, which, in the course of events, is sure to be belied.
> In trade, also, this energy usually carries a trace of ferocity. Philanthropic and religious bodies do not commonly make their executive officers out of saints. The communities hitherto founded by Socialists, —the Jesuits, the Port-Royalists, the American communities at New Harmony, at Brook Farm, at Zoar, are only possible, by installing Judas as steward. The rest of the offices may be filled by > good burgesses. The pious and charitable proprietor has a foreman not quite so pious and charitable. The most amiable of country gentlemen has a certain pleasure in the teeth of the bull-dog which guards his orchard. (“Power” from The Conduct of Life)

Like Machiavelli and Edmund Burke, and unlike most “political scientists” (the phrase is humorous, as if politics allowed for such precision and rigor), Emerson’s views are based not on theory or abstract principles, but on observation of how people really are. Emerson understands that a certain ruthlessness—“of a bold and manly cast”—is necessary in politics. For like the world whose endless problems it reflects, politics is too too difficult and too messy always to be answerable to morality. Moral compromise is in fact the essence of politics, since the world it tries govern is itself deeply compromised. Knowing this, Socrates insisted that the person who really wants to make a big difference cannot go into politics, it being the worst possible place for that lofty intention.

For the great reformer is always an enemy of the State, and ultimately, of the people themselves: of their bad qualities, to which they are often blind; and the last thing they want is for anyone to draw attention to these. So that the person who sets out to change everybody for the better is lucky to get whatever he can done before being put to death for his “evildoing,” “treason,” “sins,” etc., etc. The ingratitude of the people goes perfectly with their ignorance as to who their true leaders are.

You Cannot Turn A Whore Into A Housewife

In her attempt at debunking Roosh in the above clip, Ana Kasparian brings up an age old argument against game and notch counting :

- What are players going to do if they also want women to be good girls?
- Why shouldn't a woman sleep with whoever she wants and have her sexual freedom?
- Woman are fed up with the double standard of being whores if they sleep around and prudes if they don't.

In the past women were supposed to use sexuality to engage men for their provisioning with a view to building a family. Thus both men and women made careful judgements and considerations before they launched into a sexual relationship. Family has become to many women nothing more than an accessory, a Gucci handbag. Like the handbag, a family can be discarded or replaced on a mere whim. It was women who were the pillar of the family unit. Men were always focused on provisioning and technology. Not much has changed in their department.

Despite today's loose sexual morals, women will not sleep with any man. If they did, during commuter hours we'd have monkey style orgies at every train station. Women validate the man they have sex with, even if it's just a one night stand. She has options and will pick the one that 'wows' her the most. In this regard, a woman can only be a 'prude' or a 'whore'.

So What Is A Whore ?

The mistress of the King was a whore in the queen's eyes—she gave up easy sex for temporary gain. Essentially a whore is a woman who is easy with sex to gain some fleeting social advantage. Money is only one kind of advantage. A woman who accepts drinks, diner, or leverages her status in return for a casual sexual relationship is quite simply a whore. There is no other term for this interaction. If girls truly want equality and casual sex, they better run a tab with their boyfriend, because men are hardwired to invest in women on the basis of it having a future.

If a woman chooses to behave like a whore, that is her choice. What she cannot do is be surprised when men treat her as such. A man who sleeps on a park bench and drinks two bottles of vodka a day can certainly have his fun and freedom, but he should not be surprised when he is treated like a vagrant.

You Cannot Make A Housewife Out Of A Whore

By setting aside family values for casual sexual encounters and careers, women everywhere flung themselves into whoredom. There is no other way of looking at the situation for the simple reason that women generally expect some 'benefits' from having sex with a man. In the past the ONLY advantage was provisioning and family. That made a woman a 'prude' (in a good way) because she held out for family. It meant that a man who made an investment in a woman and declared his undying love should, if he played his cards right, obtain a return.

Today, as any man with 'game' knows, it's cheaper and quicker getting laid in a bar than finding a paid prostitute, because whores are everywhere. If you press the right buttons, most women will fuck for 'no charge', although in her mind she is obtaining some 'value' from the interaction—thus making her a whore. It is however a vapid and hollow existence where sex is exchanged for some fleeting social validation. Of course women who try to ply male attention, free drinks, etc. without giving up the goods are labelled prudes (in a bad way), because family values are entirely off the table, as per the above title. Women are not even interested in relationships, they are happy just to leverage their sexuality any old way.

In the past women wanted to see a good hearted, loyal male with skills and status that could provision them in a family setting. They reciprocated by bringing their own skills and feminine grace. Today's women are too busy dropping E, getting drunk and studying useless English lit and gender studies degrees to bring anything valid to a relationship. You want to talk about double standards, lets start with the whores who expect a myriad of benefits from sleeping with a man, whilst bringing nothing but their well worn cunt to the table.

More Double Standards

Women want cheap thrills, casual encounters, and crazy sex. They want a man that gives them tingles, that validates them, that catches their attention for however short period of time that might be. It's up to them to decide on whatever catches their attention tomorrow. Any kind of romantic ideal or future 'life together' is swapped for the whores social validation currency.

To men everywhere the discovery of the red pill truth that nearly every woman out there uses sex to leverage advantages in any way she can is a shocking realization. All most men ever wanted was to love and be loved and set up a happy family somewhere in mundane-ville. Making ends meet, and being loved by a woman and taking care of her was enough for us.

In the past being loved and taken care of by a man, and loving and taking care of her children, was enough for a woman, but now it's not. She needs an MBA, a lively university life, a pseudo career, a good jig on the cock carousel, a little cunnilingus with her BFF and perhaps the odd orgy or two. She needs a few bad boy weekends away on a motorcycle ride and frequent 'girls nights out' that involves her doing untold shots and dancing on the bar until she's giving BJs under the table and having anal in the restrooms. "Eww on those guys that want to fall in love and will do anything for a girl—they are soooo creepy."

If you want to talk about double standards, let's talk about these girls who've slept with dozens of guys and then expect to lock down a husband and raise kids. That's creepy.

Now to answer Ana's questions:

What are players going to do if you also want women to be good girls?

Women have decided to become whores. They easily swap sex for any perceived social advantage. A player is a realist. He triggers the whore's payment system so the sexual transaction is validating for her in someway. Those that hate on PUA misunderstand that it's women who hold the key to sex. If women chose not to be whores, players will be out of business.

Why shouldn't a woman sleep with whoever she wants and have her fun and sexual freedom?

Sure she can, but that would make her a whore. She always validates the man in some way. The more short term the validation, the more of a whore she is. If she's not validating for long term relationships or family, she's degrading her potential standards in favor of a quick jig. She will do that for whatever reason suits her in the moment, just as the King's 'whore' of a mistress does. Very few women fuck like promiscuous gay men, just for the pleasure of fucking.

Woman are fed up with the double standard of being whores if they sleep around and prudes if they don't.

Men love whores and prudes. They especially love a prude that wifes up with them and opens her sexuality just for them. What they don't like is whores pretending to be prudes, or the general vapid disloyalty of whores. They particularly dislike sharing whores and find they cannot build a stable family life with a whore. Whores become dull and they are emotionally detached. They see sex as transactional. Whereas sex, or dare I call it 'love making,' is how a woman bonds emotionally to her man. Guys like Elliot Rodger aren't interested in whores and their social transactions. He wanted to fall in love. You call it entitlement—I call it adult maturity.

Sadly for his old fashioned ways, once sex has been abused for random fucking, love is no longer available. Science shows that women who've had more than ten sex partners have difficulty holding down a marriage. Once a whore always a whore. Men should then treat those women accordingly. If women want to be good girls and wives, I am sure plenty of kind loving men will appear. There are no double standards, only two standards to chose from. Sadly, even those that pretend to chose the latter are often whores in disguise.

Family Values

All men long for that female element in their lives, but most women seem intent on behaving like whores. So be it. What we'd hoped for from women like Ana, is not another wizz of the hamster mind, but some real discussion as to how the hell a stable society is going to continue if we all just fuck like monkeys, according to which male has bananas available today.

Smart animals and stable human societies take great care over breeding and rearing their young. People in messy unstable societies fuck like rodents and hope for the best. The real double standard is women expecting to be able to fuck around like whores and treat sex like it's a commodity while aiming for hectic male-orientated careers, and then think they can later revert to stoic family values and raise children. This is the most crass and disgusting female entitlement that is never mentioned in the whore/prude complaint feminists make.

It's an 18-year commitment to raise a child, a process largely involving the mother for the first 10 years. It should also increasingly involve the biological father as the child matures. Today's women are unfit to be mothers, because they neither have the parenting skills, the knowledge of running a home, nor any kind of morals in regards to seeking out or holding down a marriage. Sex is just a bargaining chip to be used for free drinks and Facebook likes, while husband and kids are a handy social validator when tits start to sag at 30+ and their pseudo-career turns out to involve hard work. Men can be accused of crashing marriages, but often times the wifewhore makes their life so restricted and miserable its difficult to blame them. Such is our shopping mall culture, complete with it's raving gun men and dead bodies. This is the action and consequence of female sexual emancipation, better known as whoredom.

On The Importance Of Fiction Writing

June 15, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Life isn't a support system for art. It's the other way around

On Writing, Stephen King

The simple truth in modern America, men are not as interested in reading fiction as they should be.

Frankly, this is very unfortunate for the mind and spirit of American men. Fiction, since the dawn of mankind, has nurtured men's souls, provided entertainment and solace in meager times. It has been an outlet for the myriad of emotions and thoughts men have. The ability to suspend disbelief and run and roam through the wilds of imagination has been a very real tool to provide refuge against the trials of human life.

The power of a great tale and polished storyteller exists in every society. Whether it is simply storytellers of yore who would draw bar patrons around a rapacious fire and tell fantastical tales to their rapt audience or modern writers of today—typing away into the night on their Mac books—the power of a fictional story cannot be denied. Whether the point of the yarn is to inspire, horrify or transmit cultural or moral values is irrelevant. Fiction has a real and firm place in every society.

In America, the greatest writers either dabbled in fictional world or made the crafting of fictional tales their sole pursuit. From Edgar Allen Poe, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Herman Melville, Mark Twain to H.P. Lovecraft they all polished the art of crafting fictional worlds. When confronted with the limitless world of imagination, they were able to hone their literary voices, for many purposes. Poe haunted readers with his chilling tales of the queer and horrific, Hemingway dazzled readers with his masterful command of storytelling.

Yet, it isn't just the simple value of a well-told tale. Fiction writing allows a writer to explore the metes and bounds of the human condition. Books like Robert Penn Warren's All The King's Men help us understand the nature of power and ambition in America, John Updike's Rabbit novels explore the state of a man against the back drop of social changes in America. British writers George Orwell and Adlous Huxley both explored themes of dystopia in their fictional novels. Fictional worlds allow writers to test theories about how the world works against believable and relatable hand-drawn characters. Also, it can be subversive, as fiction allows a writer to criticize people or institutions indirectly.

The distance from reality that fiction affords us to see the world through different lenses. Swedish writer Henrik Ibsen shed light on the coming internal anguish of Western women in A Doll's House. The play is about a woman who absconds wholly from her family life, foreshadowing the coming malaise of heterosexual women and the concomitant collapse of the family. Margaret Atwood's execrable The Handmaiden's Tale explores the modern woman's sheer terror of family life, sex and religion. In it, a totalitarian Christian sect takes over America, resulting in the collapse of gender equality and the creation of a world based on violent hierarchy. While both of these yarns are based out of unhealthy thought patterns, it sheds light on the perspectives of women.

It might be tempting to dismiss fiction as purely speculative as it allows imaginations to run wild, whether to personal horror like in The Call Of Cthulhu by H.P. Lovecraft or to fearful feminist alchemy like in the aforementioned The Handmaiden's Tale. Even in the case of Margaret Atwood, it allows one to peer into the mind of the author and the minds of her audience. Which is a key value of fiction: it allows us to see what is popular or popular to certain folks and, hopefully, we can learn something. We can learn of the inner dread of Americans by Stephen King's sheer popularity, we can see how terrified feminists are of men with their speculative patriarchy fan-fiction.

In sum, we can derive much value from fiction. We could enjoy a yarn about a rapid dog like in King's Cujo; we could appreciate a muckraking novel about the meatpacking industry like in Upton Sinclair's The Jungle. Regardless, value of fiction stems from its ability to allow us to suspend disbelief and step into an alternate reality. It could inspire or horrify us, it could allow us to consider and appreciate different viewpoints. No matter what, fiction simply allows us see a different version of reality. The purposes of that vary widely by genre or author, but it gives us humans a temporary departure from the drag of day to day life.

Here is a shortlist of fictional novels that I have enjoyed:

- Shadowdale, Richard Awlinson
- As I Lay Dying, William Faulkner
- Silence Of The Lambs, Thomas Harris

- Lord Of The Flies, William Golding
- Carrie, Stephen King
- Firestarter, Stephen King
- Cujo, Stephen King
- Pet Sematary, Stephen King
- Intensity, Dean Koontz
- Lady Chatterley's Lover, D.H. Lawrence
- Dr. Jekyll And Mr. Hyde, Robert Louis Stevenson

Are You Actually Living A Life You Chose?

June 15, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Look around you. What do you see?

Do you see great men conquering their fears and living a life they enjoy – a life that they chose? Or are they living a life that was chosen for them?

More importantly, are you living a life that you consciously decided on – one that you hand picked based on your personal preferences and desires? Unfortunately for most men in today's world, the answer is a loud and resounding no. The average man has been following the path of least resistance since he was born.

His childhood and adolescence were the highlights of his life. By the time he's entered the labor market and reached 30, he's all but given up on seeking out new life experiences. Instead of looking for continued growth or further accomplishment, he's living in a state of contempt and resentment.

He spends the majority of his time working in a cubicle that he despises, because it was the first or only job offered to him. He dates or marries a girl that he's barely even attracted to, because she was a friend of a friend and practically fell into his lap. Or he's lonely and single.

Yes, there's a small subset of men who live a life they thoroughly enjoy – one that they've intentionally created. They work for themselves or at a job they deliberately selected, and they date several girls at once, or just one that they're authentically attracted to and who adds measurable value to their life. But these men are the exception. They only constitute a fraction of a percentage of the population.

The average modern man is on the decline. He's moving farther and farther away being the independent and confident adventurer, and closer and closer to being the social

Welcome to the age of weakness

Gentlemen, welcome to the age of weakness, where standing out and seeking what you want is not only rare, but also looked down upon by the jealous masses.

They hate to see someone break free from the chains that have held them captive, stopping them from making positive changes or seeking a life that they truly want – especially if it's a friend or close acquaintance. It only serves to remind them of their own fears and insecurities – the ones that they don't have the balls to confront.

At this point, I must stop and ask you the following questions: Will you be held back? Will you let the increasingly average lifestyle of the day be forced upon you? Or will you break free and actually work towards creating a life that you want? Will you cease to be another mindless freak that simply lives and reacts?

The only way to break free from this self-devouring cycle is aggressively. You must consciously and forcefully dominate life until you find a way out – better yet, until you create a way out.

You can't wait for the right moment

You can't wait for the perfect set of circumstances. You can't wait for someone else's hand to pull you out, either. You're born alone and you die alone. At the end of the day you're the only person you can count on.

It's up to you to become a man who dominates life. Otherwise, you're destined for the default path: being dominated by life. And the symptoms of each of these conditions go far beyond the two examples of work and women that I mentioned above.

For example, the dominant man has a social presence about him that can't be ignored. His aggressive approach to knowing – and getting – what he wants manifests itself in a supreme sense of confidence. He stands tall, smiles, looks you in the eye, and tells you what he must – without a second thought about it. The average Joe tends to come off as nervous or stand-offish. This is a result of the many underlying insecurities he constantly carries around with him. He's unsure of what he wants, and this puts him in a state of constant fear.

So are you dominating life, or have you fallen a victim to simply existing and passing by the days until you die?

This is an excerpt from my new book Dominate. Read reviews and get it now by clicking here.

Why Russell Wilson Is On The Right Track

June 16, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Russell Wilson is a Super Bowl winning quarterback known for his athleticism, arm talent and posie under pressure. Despite his excellent on-field attributes, however, some of the most recent headlines regarding Wilson have dealt with his life off the field:

> Seattle Seahawks QB Russell Wilson is filing for divorce from his wife Ashton … after 2 years of marriage — and less than 3 months after earning his first Super Bowl victory.

> Wilson just made the announcement, saying … "I have made the difficult decision to file for divorce. Clearly, decisions like these don't come easy."
> Russell and Ashton have known each other since high school in Virginia — and they started dating during their college years.
> They got married in January, 2012 … just a few months before Russell was drafted by the Seahawks.

The timing really is perfect.

Wilson was only a 3rd round pick in the 2012 NFL Draft and his rookie contract pays him around $662,000 annually. Quarterbacks with his kind of resume (2 Pro Bowls, Pepsi Rookie of the Year, Super Bowl winner, etc, etc) are usually making at least 15 to 20 times that amount of money. Russell Wilson's backup quarterback, Tarvaris Jackson, will be making $1.2 million this year, twice what Wilson is getting.

Rookies cannot renegotiate their contracts until after the end of their 3rd year, which is why Wilson is stuck for now. After the end of this upcoming season, he is going to get a massive raise. His soon-to-be ex-wife will be able to have some claim to the relatively small amount of money he's already earned (probably just a few million if we combine his first and second year salaries with endorsements he's gotten), but she will now be unable to touch the bulk of his career earnings, which are going to come in this next contract.

How big will that contract be?

> Wilson's San Francisco counterpart Colin Kaepernick just signed an unusual deal potentially worth $126 Million. It is possibly the lowest guarantee a starting quarterback has ever seen, though there are ample performance bonuses. But Russell Wilson already has a Super Bowl ring, and the reputation that makes him > a perfect candidate for product endorsements (via Seattle Pi):

> "So if Kaepernick – a quarterback who's helped his team to two-straight NFC Championship Games and one Super Bowl appearance in just a year and a half as a starter – is worth $21 million per year, what kind of cash could a quarterback with a 4-1 playoff record over his first two seasons – including a Super Bowl win – command?
> "According to ESPN's Adam Schefter, up to $25 million per season…
> "That would make Wilson the highest paid quarterback in NFL history today."

And, again, Ashton Meem (formerly Ashton Wilson) won't be able to touch any of that.

The move is perfect for a man in Wilson's postion. He's only 25 years old, right in his athletic prime. He is young enough to have a very realistic chance of spending another decade in the NFL. As a young affluent man with a lot of status, he's going to have tremendous opportunity on the dating market.

Ashton Meem was a pretty young lady, but the females that are soon to be (and likely already are) chasing Russell Wilson down are going to be on another level.

This is a big reason why I often suggest that pro-athletes never settle down until they come to the end of their careers. Even the last man on an NFL roster has a legion of female admirers, and the physical quality of these women is quite high.

It is one thing to be a young man looking at physically elite women on television or in magazines (most young men are used to pining for such women from a distance), but few ever get to the stage where such women are abundantly accessible to them. For most men, their contact with these women is limited to thirsty pleadings on Instagram, Facebook and Twitter.

The world of the pro athlete is a very different one. Most of us are aware of the fact that pro athletes are very attractive to women, but I think few truly understand the deeper implications of that lifestyle and the deep impact it can have on the men themselves and their relationships. Once you reach the level Wilson has reached, physically elite women become abundant. You don't chase them, they chase you. They start tweeting you, sending friend requests on your Facebook, following all of your social media accounts and delivering private messages aimed at getting closer to you.

> @KyrieIrving Ha! That's a good song
> — Hannah Stocking (@HannahStocking) February 15, 2014

> "@HannahStocking: @KyrieIrving Ha! That's a good song " that it is pretty lady =)
> — Kyrie Irving (@KyrieIrving) February 15, 2014

(Note: Irving proceeded to fly this girl and her friends out to Cleveland to "hang out" with him not long after this; she's one of many)

Men at a certain level can do more than merely ogle these women on Vine, Facebook and Instagram. They have an honest chance to meet these females in person. When I say “meet”, I’m not talking about being invited to some silly autograph session they are holding or passing them by at an airport. I’m talking about direct invitations initiated by the women themselves.

Beautiful women who would not give most men the time of day (and turn down dozens of approaches from typical men on a daily basis) will actively pursue you, planting themselves at your hotel or apartment building in the hopes of running into you. The mere hint of your appearance at a given club could be enough to singlehandedly draw dozens, perhaps even hundreds of these women to the venue, all dressed to the nines and anxious to speak to you.

It goes further still. Before you know it, she begins to follow you on Twitter. She starts sending random tweets in your direction, then direct messages after you follow her back. She starts angling for a meeting – maybe drinks, dinner, lunch, whatever. She gives you her number. She talks about how she can't wait to meet you. If she is particularly bold, you might just start finding risqué photos in your inbox before long. And it isn't just her – there are several other women, all just as beautiful, approaching you with precisely the same enthusiasm. Some will be unknown hometown and campus co-ed smokeshows with thousands of beta orbiters but no social media or internet fame. Many will be like the girl in the Twitter exchange above (Hannah Stocking): beautiful women with hundreds of thousands of online followers and at least that many male orbiters who would kill to meet her. They'll all be totally focused on you.

What would you do if you were essentially being hunted (perhaps borderline stalked) by not one, but several gorgeous women (each pined for by many thousands, if not millions, of men who are almost totally invisible to them), all going out of their way to get your attention?

Most men don’t know, since most men will never be in this position. But I can tell you this: if you were in a committed relationship before and you suddenly find yourself in this position, you’re going to have a very hard time remaining loyal no matter how much you think you “love” your pretty girlfriend. Most normal men, when put in that position and faced with that test of loyalty, fail miserably.

Most men will never know this kind of abundance, and most athletes are entirely unprepared for the experience. Many get locked down with their high-school or college sweethearts only to get swept away by the avalanche of model-quality ass that is thrown at them upon the signing of their rookie contract. It is something that only the most experienced, mature players (the Derek Jeters of the world) are really equipped to handle well, and even they took time to get there.

Many men are quick to judge other males who find themselves in this position, but this is unwise. As Bill Burr once said (credit to commenter Zelcorpion for noting it):

> Bill Burr:
> "I'm gonna judge Tiger Woods? I golf, I don't walk off the 18th hole and there is no busload of Scandinavian women waiting to fuck my brains out. Sorry ladies, gotta go home to the wife."…
> "There is nothing out there (for famous men) to prepare you for the platoon of whores waiting on the horizon. Braveheart – faces painted, skirts on, running down the hill to jump on your dick in front of your wife, they don't give a shit."
> Until you know what it feels like to reject a busload of Serbian hotties and NBA-sluts, then no man should judge this guy.

Russell Wilson is a very good guy. He grew up in a great household with the guidance of two great parents who set an excellent example for him. He is a genuinely high-character man…

…and even he can’t escape the realities associated with being a man at his level of professional accomplishment. As a young, extremely athletic Super Bowl winning quarterback with 2 Pro Bowls to his name and a whole lot of money, Wilson is on track to experience a level of abundance that perhaps only one in every 100,000 men ever gets close to. By leaving this marriage now, he gives himself the best possible chance to take advantage of that state of affairs and also minimizes the almost certain financial hit a future divorce would have cost him (athlete divorce rates are north of 80%—if he didn’t divorce now, it likely would have happened later at much greater expense).

Many athletes fall victim to the pitfalls associated with romantic life at their level, particularly the expensive divorce (or the threat of it). Russell Wilson has deftly sidestepped this obstacle, and for that he should be commended. If more athletes could follow his example, fewer stories like the one below would need to be told:

Well played, Russell. Well played.

How Our Enemies Can Help Us

June 16, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A few days ago, a friend was talking to me about some injustice he had suffered from one of his enemies. He was justifiably furious at having been wronged. While I sympathized with him, some later reflection on the matter cast the issue in a different light. It may even be stated, in the form of a general principle, that the vindictive actions of our enemies can serve as instruments for our continued upward growth and development. How this may be so, we will examine in this essay.

There can be no love without hate; no surfeit without want; and no real achievement without failure. The actions of our enemies make us appreciate the good things in life, and cause us to value more dearly the positive things of this world. Who can know love, without having experienced the sting of rejection? Who, never having gone hungry, can appreciate the satiety that comes from a full stomach? And who can appreciate the intoxication of victory, who has not felt the bitter sting of failure?

The actions of our enemies harden our sensibilities, and sharpen our cognitive faculties, so that we may be on our guard in life's inevitable struggles. The mountain goat conditions his stomach on rough fare, and grows strong on the bitterest and most miserable of food; yet he who feasts only on delicacies gradually becomes effete and lacking in fortitude. The vulture, because he feeds on carrion, is counted by us as a disgusting and wretched animal; but for the ancient Romans, experienced in divination by auguries, he was a favored animal and good omen. For a vulture never attacked a living man, and performed a useful natural function in removing a source of pestilence.

Our enemies teach us to be wary, and force us to watch our behavior. Your observations of your enemy will cause you to note his negative qualities: his meanness, cruelty, stupidity, and cowardice. Your increased awareness of these traits will help you to avoid them yourself; our enemies in this way become a form of external regulator. Only a fool will make no effort to learn from his enemies. And if we are honest with ourselves, even an enemy's criticism may hint at some secret deficiency on our part, and may cause us to redouble our corrective efforts at self-improvement. As the philosopher Diogenes (Diog. Laert. VI.46) noted, we often permit attacks on ourselves by our own improper conduct:

> To a young man who complained of the number of people who annoyed him by their attentions he said: 'Cease to hang out a sign of invitation.'

Rare is it that some evil befalls us that we did not in some way allow to occur. Reflection on our contribution to our misfortunes will bring increased awareness of our own self-destructive conduct. Finally, it may also be that our enemy has positive virtues of his own, worthy of our own imitation or instruction. Give credit where it is due. To be blinded by hate or anger is to miss an opportunity for reflection on how we may improve our own lot.

When we are the target of abuse, our first impulse will be recklessly to respond in kind to the abuser; but calmer reflection may teach us to seek out what was the source of the criticism. By so identifying it, we may correct some flaw within ourselves. Even enemies have eyes, and may see us with more clarity than friends. Our lovers, family, and friends will hesitate to be too honest with us. Affection clouds objectivity. As Plutarch says, quoting Antisthenes (De capienda ex inimicis utilitate, vi.):

> And so [it has been] said well that those who wish to lead a good life ought to have genuine friends or red-hot enemies; for the former deterred you from what was wrong by reproof, the latter by abuse.

An enemy's slanders also will cause us to take note how odious words of vituperation and calumny can be, so that we may avoid such mistakes ourselves. I remember when I began my career of arguing court cases. In those days, I would feel it necessary to respond to every insult, every slight, believing that such tit-for-tat tactics were necessary to get my point across. It was only later that I began to realize that allowing myself to descend into the mosh pit of mud-slinging accomplished very little, and detracted from the legitimate merits of my argument. Gradually, I learned to let my arguments speak for themselves. I avoided all intemperate speech and action in arguing my cases, and took care to let the effects of anger subside before responding to statements from the opposition. In this way, my results improved dramatically. Experience in dealing with hateful enemies also sharpens the edge of our courage, as confrontations become easier to bear with experience. A virgin blade is of dubious keenness.

We should be thankful for an enemy who attacks us openly, since a man brandishing a drawn and raised dagger is easier to identify as an enemy than a man hiding a sheathed one. There is no enemy more dangerous than the one who lies in wait. As the number of bad characters we encounter in our lives is many, it is a good thing to be able to identify them as quickly as possible. Few enemies in our lives will pay us the compliment of revealing their hostility openly. They make our lives easier by declaring their intentions in advance. A quote that illustrates this point well is again by Diogenes, of whom it is said (Diog. Laert. VI.50):

> Being asked what creature's bite is the worst, [Diogenes] said, 'Of those that are > wild, a sycophant's; of those that are tame, a flatterer.'

Finally, an enemy can teach us the value of letting go of petty hostilities, and the redeeming virtue of forgiveness. Who may be an enemy one day, may become a friend on another. Few things are permanent in this world and, above all else, Fortune has a perverse sense of humor in making the unlikeliest of things possible.

Our Critics Are Adult Children

June 16, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

It is a guarantee that you, me, and anybody who subscribes to truth/red pill and insists on speaking to it, standing by it, and advocating it will receive all sorts of flak, criticism, and hatred. This is the result of having such a successful culture that we've been able to work up the wealth and borrowing capacity to effectively pay for the lives of three generations. Unfortunately, this has spoiled those same generations resulting a population that is delusional about how the real world works, is weak and entitled, but above all else is egotistical as they have done nothing noteworthy with their lives, but still think quite highly of themselves.

However, in you come like a bull in a China shop, bottle of whiskey in hoof, yelling harsh truths such as…

"Sociology isn't a real degree!"

"Men like skinny girls!"

"Stop having illegitimate kids!"

and

"People who don't accomplish anything in life are the ones most prone to invoke the word 'privilege'!"

…you not only hurt their fragile feelings, but force them to look in the mirror and realize what truly sad and pathetic people they are.

Naturally, since they have nothing else in life and you committed the cardinal sin of exposing them, they don't stop and take your constructive criticism seriously, pondering the valid point you made about them wasting their one finite and precious life on this planet. No, instead, their lizard brain kicks into high gear and goes into full defensive mode and identifies you as a threat. Therefore, while you're trying to make the point that a 37 year old single mom getting her Masters in Creative Writing who will only find employment because of an unneeded government make-work job really isn't anything to be proud of, said person will become emotionally enraged and attack you.

Now, since you are being factual and not emotional, while your assailant is doing the opposite, you can expect whatever criticisms you're about to receive to be personal in nature. And we've all heard them before to the point they're predictable:

You live in your mother's basement.
You can't get any.
You have a small penis.
You're gay.
You're ugly/fat yourself.
etc. etc. etc.

None of which have to do with the points you made.
None of which advances or builds off of the previous conversation.
None of which actually brings about a genuine and productive solution.

However, to the rookie you'll take personal umbrage to these assaults and abandon the argument to defend your honor. To the novice you'll become frustrated that these people lack the capacity for logical, reasoned, intellectually honest, and unemotional thought. But to the experienced, seasoned veteran you will realize that you really aren't dealing with an equal, but rather an adult-child that is throwing a tamper tantrum because you refuse to lie to them to keep their fragile world facade up.

But there is one other thing the "seasoned truth dispensing veteran" must do beyond handing out mirrors and forcing people's faces into it. And that is ensure that everything your critics and haters say about you is a lie.

For example on my youtube channel, it is now damn well near a DAILY occurrence I get accused of living in my mother's basement. I also receive flak from various "Monday Morning Work Out Quarter Backer Theoreticians" that I don't lift. And as always there is the never ending chorus that I can't get laid and am "alone." (I've even had people question my motorcycle riding abilities).

But no matter how distasteful I find these lies, no matter how viscerally angry I used to get at such accusations, I no longer do for one simple reason:

They're not true.

I do not in fact live in my mother's basement.
I do indeed lift three times a week, running three times in addition.
I have more miles motorcycling than most Sturgis fanatics and,

hard as it is to believe,

I do have a girlfriend (sometimes we even have sex)

The larger point is that you can give no quarter to your critics, adversaries and enemies. The reason why is that if you live up to your word, and practice what you preach, then you are not a hypocrite and therefore not assailable. Worst still for your critics, they not only have to wrestle with the truthfully-stinging facts and observations you've made of them, but they now have to live with the fact even their personal attacks on you are wrong, and therefore whatever tacit, subliminal theory they had behind it (e.g., you just hate women because you can't get laid, that's why you hate single moms who get Masters in Creative Writing) is also wrong, ergo THEY are wrong and (GASP) you're observations about them might be right!

But the biggest purpose in ensuring that whatever your critics say about you is a lie is that it ultimately calls into question their authority and accuracy. No matter how emotional, no matter how enraged, when they are lying about you it calls into question everything else they've said about you and gives you cache and credibility over them.

Ergo, about the only thing you and other truth-insisters may be legitimately accused of is being rude or impolite, perhaps even of being mean. But even there that is more of a function of the thin-skinned, cry-baby, woeisme, checkyourprivilege, victim-whoring weakling population we have today than any malice on your part.

The Story Of Lattouf’s Mother Shows The Dangers Of Egotistical Women

June 16, 2014 | by Shady | Link | Original Link

I recently came across an Arabic story which I thought resonated quite well with ROK/red pill beliefs. It was written by Lebanese writer Maroun Abboud (1886-1926), about a woman whose bitterness and refusal to accept her age led to the downfall of both her and her son. This story, set in early 20th century Lebanon and titled “Lattouf’s Mother”, seems to almost perfectly demonstrate the dangers of overblown ego, as well as those of a letting a woman wear the pants in the house. The excerpts I use in this article are my own translation from the Arabic version, as I could not find an English version, and anything between [brackets] is my own writing.

The Prologue

The story begins with showing us how Jamila, AKA Lattouf’s Mother, is in denial, and also goes on to describe her exceptional beauty.

> Jamila had reached 40 and lingered there.
> Years go by and she stands there, unmoving, and whenever asked of her age, her eye breaks and she answers: around forty. Those who do not know her would think her to be her daughter-in-law’s sister, not mother-in-law. The pens of the years had not drawn a single boor line onto the page of that face, for there were none but lines so fine like the sword’s edge. Lattouf’s mother was a rarity of her time: attractive beauty, a tall, straight stature, neither fat nor delicate, almond-like eyes that verified the news of Harut and Marut [two angels who were sent down to Babylon to test the people's faith by performing deeds of magic], that kept in them the glitter of youth until they were extinguished. Those who looked closely would see that she was of no small nose, but its greatness was lost in that vast valley.

It then goes on to detail how she was quite the commanding woman:

> She was great and stubborn, a ruler by her order, in control of her husband and cousins, no order of hers denied, and consulted in dilemmas, a word of hers would ignite the village, … If she were in a place other than the narrow space of the village, she would have been of great social standing.

It seems she was quite carefree, except for when she thought of her son’s potential marriage:

> The fop would walk around as if she were a 15-year-old. … Her mind was only occupied when she thought of her son’s marriage.

A Mother’s Ego, A Son’s Spinsterhood, And A Husband’s Submission

However, it seems that her arrogance, attitude, and general disdain of others were what kept potential spouses from her son:

> She attempted to marry him to large houses, but did not succeed. Her son was a handsome young man of able mind, but people’s daughters feared his mother’s arrogance and attitude, and therefore would steer clear of her house.
> Lattouf’s mother would not keep her tongue off of people’s daughters, as every time her son suggested one to her, she would mock him and deny him by saying: “I thought you understood. Tasteless boy. Lowlife.” This girl’s mother is this, and that girl’s father is that, and so the days went on, and Lattouf reached the age of thirty-five, still unmarried, and his mother could not find a fitting daughter as she claimed.

Lattouf’s mother was putting her own image ahead of her son’s marriage and the continuation of her family.

> Lattouf’s mother was not inclined towards getting her son married. She refused to become a mother-in-law, and her being would shiver and shudder at the idea of becoming a grandmother, being called ”Nana.”

Eventually, Lattouf’s male spinsterhood began looming dangerously near (he had just turned 35). This was not a culture or time where he could just take the red pill and go self-improvement/MGTOW/PUA for several more years, as this is set in a Lebanese village sometime in the beginning of the 20th century. He therefore decided to just get married already:

> Eventually, Lattouf grew tired. His coming old age warned him by drum and horn. One day, he came back home to his mother with the girl he had chosen. [At some point, they have a kid together, which will be mentioned later.]

With Jamila for a mother, things inevitably ended poorly:

> She accordingly welcomed him with her footwear on his face and nape [back of neck]. His father attempted to intervene, so she brushed him off with the standard “shut up and sit down somewhere.” He would shake his head and fall silent.
> He was a man run by his woman, more obedient than a ring on the finger. For this docility his son was attributed to his mother [Lattouf took her name rather than his father’s.]

And so she kept nagging her son to return his wife, but he held resolute:

> “Lattouf’s mother insisted that his wife be returned, but he retorted: “We have been married, mother. Do not tire yourself. What God has done, no human can undo.”

She even goes to wish death upon her own son:

> “May God take you away, you’ve become a philosopher, fool!”

The Aftermath

Since her orders were not obeyed, she had a breakdown and fainted. She even tried to attack a reverend:

> And she would scream, and whistle, and go green, and go red, and shake as she was afflicted with both fever and cold. Finally, she fainted. The coma went for long and pulse disappeared, and so the reverend was called. She later woke and so saw the reverend waiting near her, and tried to snatch him by the beard, and so he ran, and heard her saying: “If my eye meets his, we have a bone to pick. He marries my son and does not ask of me, his beard must be cut.”

Her daughter-in-law kept treating her well, but Lattouf’s mother repaid the kindness by treating her progressively worse. Eventually, things came to a boil:

> And so as the days went on, she calmed down, but her life detoriated. Her daughter-in-law would do her well, and she would only get more distant and disgusted: if she saw her she criticized her, and she would talk behind her back, and rarely would she eat her food. All of this and the daughter-in-law was patient with her, complimenting her and doing her well, and she would only become more cruel, until eventually, the scales balanced, and so the battle heated, and it was ferocious.

She could not handle the lack of attention that age and her drying well of beauty wrought upon her, so she invested heavily in cosmetics and traveled to Beirut to buy dresses.

> ...and returned to the village like a newlywed. She abandoned the headscarf and instead covered her head with a pink veil, as if she were competing with her daughter-in-law and one-upping her. However, she got no attention from the people; the yellow [disingenuous] smiles mixed with bitter mockery were killing her, and so she only went deeper into ruction.

She felt betrayed and thought everyone was against her. One day, she walked into the author’s house:

> She walked in on me one day with her grandson. She sat down and seated him next to her. No manners and no greeting. She seemed concealed as if she wanted to say nothing, or as if she knew not where she was. I did not approach her lest she make a scene, but when the wait became too long, I said to her, smiling: “It seems you have swallowed your tongue. God be with you.”
> She answered with a coldness mixed with repulsion: “May God not be with you, and may peace not be upon you. You’re all against me. The forsaken has no friends.” She said this as she pulled a little pastry out of her inventory, a > remainder of what she had gotten from Beirut, and handed it to the boy, saying: "Know why I like this boy?"

He shrugged his shoulder in the negative.

> "Because tomorrow he will take my revenge."

A long argument happens where she complains about how everyone betrayed her, with the author repeating to her multiple times: "Life is turns. Your turn is up." As she ran off, he tells her: "Your son is dying, oh Lattouf's mother, he has become ripped apart."

It all ended in battle between her and her daughter-in-law:

> It was a decisive battle between the mother and her daughter-in-law, and Lattouf aimed his gun to his head threateningly, so his mother screamed and grabbed his hand, and the gun went off and pierced the womb that had held him nine months, and such the tale ended: The mother in the grave, the son died in prison, and his wife went to another man.

Lessons To Be Learned

Don't involve yourself with such a domineering, egotistical specimen of woman, and if you do, keep her in check. Such marriages can only take one of three paths:

1. You are of equal or near equal dominance on the alpha scale…

…and you and your wife are stuck in an eternal battle of who can "out-alpha" the other. That's not a happy way to live. Alternatively, you may end up in a state of sub-optimal, but acceptable, happiness, but I wouldn't count on it.

2. You are significantly more dominant than her…

…and she submits. This is your best option as your quality of life will remain high.

3. She is significantly more dominant than you…

…and you end up the stereotypical pussy-whipped husband with negative ballsack volume. This is a sad specimen of man whose wife will subjugate him and make him miserable. She will also cheat on him.

Don't be like Lattouf's father, and don't marry Lattouf's mother. It will end up in no good for anyone involved, and will make the very angels weep.

Men Should Start Calling Out Women On Their Creepy Behavior

June 17, 2014 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

"Creepy". It has to be one of the most despised words among the manosphere, as it is used primarily by females to denigrate and humiliate the males who are on the receiving end of this overused adjective. I say enough is enough, and it's time for men to take back this poisonous word and hurl it back at the general direction of women whenever feasibly possible. It's easier than you may think, because women are out there doing creepy things all the time.

The Basics

Buzzfeed actually did a (rare) clever video in 2013 which showcased the hypocrisy of what would be considered creepy between the sexes. You see, all sorts of things are OK to do if your a woman, but the instant you attach a penis to a human being those very same actions will become "creepy", and women think they have full permission to denigrate you and attack your self-esteem in it's wake.

Additionally, this recent segment of 'Today Tonight' which is broadcast in Australia, ran a story on the discriminatory policies and attitudes against men in the country. It highlights a growing trend in these "feminist" countries, where all males are considered potential predators and fathers showing their children affection in public can be misconstrued as "dirty old men". Women were given a free pass when put in the exact same scenario.

So in quick review, if your girlfriend, female friends, acquaintances, or random females on the street ever do any of the following things…

- Call you or someone else “daddy” (other than her actual daddy)
- Make any sort of verbal expression of sexual interest (and not just discreetly)
- Do surprise piggybacks or jump on you in any sort of amorous display of affection
- Hang out at the park without any friends or offspring
- Compliment the appearance of babies (take it a step further and include Facebook baby pics)
- Prance around the house in your over-sized T-shirts as casual wear or sleep wear
- Takes pictures anywhere near the vicinity of children

It’s creepy, creepy, creepy! Women should be called out on their behavior and reminded that if men did anything similar, they would be “creeped out” or “weirded out” by what we were doing. Do anything in your power to make women feel self-conscious about this. It will help to minimize the chance that females will ever throw this toxic word at you themselves, in order to damage your pride and self-esteem. Also it’s a good idea to keep tabs on whatever creepy behavior she displays. This way you will always have a laundry list of things to retort with, should she ever dare to call you the dreaded “C” word.

(Note: If a hot friend or acquaintance is hitting on you for the first time then maybe it’s not a good idea to call out on “creepiness” at that moment. Save it for a later date after the conquest has already been completed through sexual congress.)

Other Creepy Things She Does

If she ever starts a conversation with “I saw on your Facebook that…”

Women, the laughably hypocritical creatures they are, think it’s completely fine to initiate banter with whatever she recently saw on your Facebook account, but are given the full green light to label you as “creepy” if men ever did the same thing towards women. Tell them something like this. That’s really creepy. Why would you do such a creepy thing like that? Don’t you realize what your doing is really creepy? I would never want to date such a creepy person.”

However you choose to retort, always put the word ‘creepy’ into every sentence.

Staring

Everybody stares at something once in a while. Women in particular love to brand men “creepy” if they get temporary lost in a mental vortex which results in a brief staring spell at a person or object. So is your woman pissed or irritated at something? Is she dead-focused on her cell phone or just temporarily spaced out and a little bug-eyed? You guessed it, she’s a creeper. Let her know.

Meeting you at work unannounced

Women do this far more often than men and it's admittedly a bit unsettling, not to mention the purpose of the visit is generally over mundane and trivial concerns. Unless it's an emergency, can't they just conjure up the willpower to leave men alone for just eight hours?

Taking pictures or filming you in your sleep

Women have a soft spot for this one, and the smartphone generation has made it easier than ever for women to take a quick snapshot or video of their comatose lover or "friend". Just ask Justin Bieber, who became one of the most famous victims of this creepy corner of the female mindset while touring in Brazil.

Anything you don't like about them

Here is where things get really strange in the whole concept of "creepiness", according to the warped thinking of the female brain. A key thing to remember about women is that if they're comfortable around you, nothing you do is creepy (even if it kind of is). However, if she doesn't feel comfortable around you, everything you do is creepy. Just saying "hi" to a woman is creepy if she doesn't like you. So is there anything in particular you don't like about a woman or group of women? Are the beluga whale "Woo Girls" at the club annoying you? Let their creepiness be known!

Final Statements

Persistence isn't always a virtue, but women have overused the word "creepy" to denigrate potential suitors for far too long. Remember: If she feels comfortable, nothing you do is creepy. If she doesn't, everything you do is. So treat women the exact same way they interact with men when everything is less than celestial in your relationship. Like bipolar hypocrites.

Ram the word "creepy" down their throats so much until they choke on it, and hopefully exorcise that word from their vocabulary permanently. 99% of men who are ever labeled “creepy” are not actually creepy at all, just misunderstood and somewhat awkward individuals who need to learn a little game theory and put it into practice. That’s all.

However, lots of women out there are creepy, and unfortunately their creepiness will be overlooked as long as they’re hot. Hell, women like Laila (Overly Attached Girlfriend) can even make a comfortable living by impersonating a stage five clinging, social media stalking, staring, obsessing, female creeper on Youtube. It’s highly doubtful a man could.

Why The Ukraine Crisis Is A Red Pill Vs Blue Pill Superpower Clash

June 17, 2014 | by The First Auarian | Link | Original Link

Having recently spent time in both Odessa (Ukraine) and Simferopol (Crimea), I have had the opportunity to observe first hand the situation on the ground (while enjoying the pussy parade obviously).

Welcome to Ukraine, where U can and I can!

Whenever you visit the Eastern side of Ukraine vs the Western side, you are hit with slight but obvious differences in culture. Though quite red pill in nature, the western part of Ukraine is slowly being corrupted by the west and seduced by the promise of uglier dykes and pussified men in Europe.

The Path to the West! – Gay

The Differences

On the seafront, which we'll call the East, people are more conservative and consider Western Ukrainians to be fascists, homosexuals, etc. The Eastern Ukrainian side is more alpha in their culture and treatment of girls while the Western Ukraine is becoming westernized. This major disconnect is why the two sides are currently warring. It isn't like both sides are any less corrupt in their day-to-day practices or the way the culture is set up, but the East just realizes that the path to folly and failure is the road of the EU and the US.

The most obvious signs of these are in the behavior of the women. While most Ukrainian girls are attractive with big tits and a pert ass, always wearing high-heels and make-up, when you get down to the actual seduction process, which invariably ends up in having to go on a date or two with the bombshell of your weirdest fantasies, you tend to notice the differences.

Privet!….I am Fappina Bigassowski

As an example, the last two girls I danged (date-banged) from the Eastern and Western parts of Ukraine had some minute but significant differences. I'll be taking Odessa as an example of the East (although it is more to the south) and Lviv as an example from the west (it used to be part of Poland).

The two girls in question were both 9s by American standards, 8s by Ukrainian (excessive makeup, 21, well dressed and heels), but the similarities end there.

Eastern Ukraine (1993 Vintage)

On a date with East U, I was relaxed, had to significantly tone down my default American-asshole game vibe, and actually enjoyed conversing with her for the duration of the date. All this without having to think about blowing my brains out due to an annoying accent (Coastal American) and annoying conversation (she was surprised that I had read entire boring tomes of Dostoevsky). She never took out her cellphone after we sat down to enjoy each other's company.

She also expressed genuine admiration for the fact that I had graduated high school in my early teens and was traveling at such a young age. She gave me no shit about being young when I met her (I was 19 and had lived in a dozen countries with my family all my life). Our whole interaction was one where she had a vibe of "I could love this man." The conversation flowed easily with her asking me more questions when I fell silent, always engaging me. Sexy time exploded after a similar second date and was passionate, though in hindsight I scared her with my Opa-Choke-you style. I still talk to her.

For someone who has been exposed to the girls of Scandinavia and the Anglo-world, both Ukrainians will seem equally pleasurable and bangable, but for the connoisseurs of cunt who have spent some time in the sex mine that is Eastern Europe, the differences become obvious. They aren't as drastic as a bottle of Cabernet Sauvignon from Avignon vs 1 buck chuck from Trader Blow-Joe's, but they are different enough to consider one a "rare vintage" and the other a "good vintage."

When you go on a date with the aforementioned object of your lascivious lust, you notice that East U girls tend to be much more pleasant, polite and less shit-testing than their West U brethren. They know how to apply make-up more artfully unlike the shovel sized gobs on the Western front and know how to pleasure a Man's Mind and Penor. Not only are they more interesting to talk to (as interesting as a girl can get), but they also are absolute-orgasm-inducing raw-pulsating quivering-with-delight-sexual-fantasy-realizing sexthings.

We want You!….to taste our Sauvignon Poontang

Western Ukraine

Coming back to the comparison, the West U girl made me feel more at home (the US has been home for the past few years), so you can imagine where my cock was headed. I had to amp up my asshole game by 30% (significant difference compared to the East U girl), had to slap the cellphone out of her hand in the beginning of the date, and generally had to put up with "ooh the US is so awesome" and "ooh girls there are so free." When I told her that the US is great for money but shit for people she started to slightly argue before I asked her how to say "Shut up" in Ukrainian to promptly use on her.

She found my background interesting but it is more in a way that says "I'd love to BANG this guy." The conversation was pleasant but there were more awkward pauses and I had to deploy my "You're so cute…. like a dog" line and disinterested cocky rambling game. The sex was on the first date with minor resistance. She fucked like a champ. I felt like I was fucking what a pleasant American girl would have been like in the 1940s wartime.

To put both in perspective, The EastU girls are the ones you can love and the WestU girls are the ones whose attitude and facade you can swat away with minimal dominance, kinda like teenage mid-western girls who haven't become cunts yet. Both are better than Anglo-pussy.

The Men

Now the reason for this not-insignificant difference can be traced back to the Men of EastU vs the Men of the WestU. While both know how to put their girls in place, the men in the West display a much more beta streak once they have a girl compared to the Smackdown Alpha Love the EastU men endorse.

Ohhh….I gasmed!!!

I have yet to see a girl misbehave in public in Simferopol or Odessa while I've seen three smackdowns in 6 months in Lviv. Now for those of you saying "He still smacked her didn't he?"—yes little fart-smellers, he did, but the difference between the two men are this: the EastU Men let their girls know that they are the boss and it is NEVER in question while the WestU men let their bitches freak out a little before establishing dominance.

The embrace of smartphones is significantly more in WestU while EastU girls have straight up told me they hate smartphones. Consequently, the attention whoring is slightly more in WestU than EastU (WestU girls have legions of beta complimenters on FB while EastU girls put up hot pictures on VK and get no likes). Thus, the twit-brained attention spans are different, its like being in a Back to The Future movie with prettier feminine girls and seeing their future implosion into self-centered idiotic attention whores.

Apart from the factors above, the pussy is delicious. Although if you miss home, you will see slightly homo guys in WestU (it is still not open enough but the homo-dar pings strong on some of them) while the EastU will scare the neck-beard off your pudgy SWPL ass the first time around. It is no surprise that most of Ukraine's most powerful deals with Russia and Russian industry is focused on the East while Western Ukraine is comparatively lazier, more "artistic," and contributes 30% less to the Ukrainian GDP. Culturally and Economically, WestU is a hugely better version of California which is the worst state in the US. So that's saying something.

Considering the grandaddy of all alpha countries is Russia with the most delicious harlots available to man, is it any wonder the EastU wants to kick the shit out of WestU and embrace Mother Russia. Wiser Hornier minds say, obviously not.

The End

Take me away to that special place…. that (BLOWJOB) place!

Learning A Language Is The Ultimate Act Of Self-Improvement

June 18, 2014 | by Wanderlust | Link | Original Link

If you are reading this, I will assume that English is your first language. In the linguistic world, you hit the jackpot. People who are born into an English-speaking family and country will have little necessity in their lives to truly learn a new language. This is exactly why it is absolutely crucial that you, as a driven and motivated man, put in the time and effort to do the one thing that most people in the world simply do not — learn a new language.

I won't patronize you by telling you that it will be a hard task; that much is obvious. In fact, it's probably harder than you think. There are no shortcuts, and it will take much longer than you would like to feel the progress you want. However, there is good news as well. There are tools and strategies that will help you along the way. There are even ways to get a native-speaking private tutor for very cheap. And the payoff you feel as you make progress and become stronger in the language and in your overall cognitive ability is like nothing else.

All of this doesn't make a bit of difference though unless you have the proper motivation to begin learning a language and stick with it. While some may argue the benefits of language learning for game, which are undeniable, I think that the greater good comes in the form of self improvement. The first area of development and the first hurdle in learning a foreign language is…

Self Discipline

Learning a new language is simply the most consuming activity there is in terms of time input and mental work. With proper daily practice, a person could learn an instrument from scratch and be proficient within a year. A year of daily practice will barely have you conversational in a new language. With the goal of becoming functional in a language you will have to invest at least 30 minutes a day, though an hour is preferable, for at least a few years.

When I talk about functional, I don't mean knowing how to order another beer at the bar. I define functional as being able to live and work in society using only the target language. Essentially, being able to read, write, listen, and speak about any topic up to about a high school level. While learning some of a language is better than not learning at all, the real benefits come from a high degree of proficiency.

The level of self discipline it requires to achieve this level of mastery is monumental. It will require a plan of action as well as the ability to follow through with that plan, even when it means eschewing other activities in favor of your language work. This is your brain workout, and just like you wouldn't skip your gym routine to have a beer and burger with your friend, you can't skip this either.

Figure out what kind of learner you are, and play to your strengths. Some people do well by memorizing vocabulary, especially using Memrise. Others may gain more from speaking practice with a native, which you can get on iTalki. One of my personal favorite methods is practicing through text messaging, where I have the benefit of being able to analyze and dissect the sentences or phrases that I read, and I'm able to pick up proper usage from that. But whatever you do, it has to be done daily, and with a way to check yourself as well. This leads to the next great benefit of language learning, which is…

Self Assessment

Language learning is different than many avenues of study or work because of its infinite nature. Language is a constantly expanding and evolving entity, a truly living being that can never be completely mastered. This nature lends itself to high degrees of subjective evaluation when trying to determine progress.

As you begin learning a new language and start to progress, you will have a huge burst of immediate ability as you learn the basics, things that can generally be considered objectively. Basic conversation elements, the ability to introduce yourself, numbers and colors, and creating basic sentences are among these objective markers at the beginning of your journey. Once you pass the basics though, the road to fluency becomes a lot murkier.

Depending on your specific goals and reasons for learning the language, you will likely study things differently than other people on a similar proficiency level as yourself. When I'm out with some of my friends who are learning the same language as me, it's very common for me to ask my friend the meaning of something he says, and the other way around. We often learn different things from different settings and experiences, so we can share those with each other to continue improving while we still learn what's most important to each of us.

This is why the personal skill of self assessment is absolutely imperative to your continued success. You have to constantly be testing yourself, whether with flash cards or against a natural language environment if possible, and determine where your progress is satisfactory or where it needs improvement. An easy first step for this assessment and growth is to learn a new phrase and resolve to use it three times in regular conversation during the coming week. By the end of that week it should be ingrained as a standard part of your vocabulary.

The most important and beneficial aspect of this is that it forces you to be completely honest with yourself. There's nobody here to pat you on the back, and there's nobody here to laugh at you for making a mistake. The only grade you get is how satisfied you are with your own performance. Sometimes you'll feel great about it, maybe surprising yourself with how much you've progressed recently. Other times you might get the shit kicked out of you in a verbal discourse and realize you have to dust off some old study materials. Either way, the only judge and the only impetus for improvement is you.

This self reliance and self assessment translates into other parts of your life as well, such as being in the gym and watching your form in the mirror or making sure you do your reps until failure, then pushing yourself for one more. It's a mindset that grows to accept nothing less than the absolute best you can give at any one time, because it's the mindset necessary to properly develop language skills to the point of functional proficiency.

One of the side benefits of this demanding mentality is that it helps develop a tremendous amount of…

Self Confidence

When you first begin learning a language, your confidence will likely suffer. This is especially true if you find yourself immersed in a native language environment and you can't understand anything going on around you. The first time I moved out of the US for an extended period of time, I went from understanding everything around me to suddenly not even knowing how to read a menu. You feel like a toddler again, but without family to guide and help you. It's a swift kick in the balls, to say the least.

The good news is that this functions as a J curve. Although your confidence will go down at first, it will soon rise to new heights. With no crutch and the right attitude, it's possible to quickly start picking up a language. You begin to recognize words here and there, and soon you are making complete sentences on your own. The thrill you get from the first time you say something that's not memorized from a phrase book and people understand you is one of the most exhilarating moments in your life. It gives you an enormous boost to your self-confidence.

You'll find your desire to study increased as well as your desire to speak the language and show off your new-found abilities. You'll feel more comfortable speaking with others, in both your native and target languages. You'll also grow much more comfortable speaking with new people you don't know, because that's much of what you have to do in order to practice a new language. This can be especially beneficial if you ever have approach anxiety, which everyone does to some degree. You'll be able to do cold approaches on girls you don't know, practicing a language and game at the same time.

You'll also feel greater confidence in the other things you do. For any business, class, or hobbies you in which you participate, you will always remember that you have been able to conquer the mysteries of an entire new language, an ability is so complex and demanding that we are the only known species to be able to do it. On top of that, most people can't or don't do it. You are in the mental 1%. And that embedded knowledge will show in your every action.

Conclusion

In essence, learning a new language can be the most important thing you do in your life for yourself. The journey will help you grow and discover more about yourself. It will illuminate the ways you think, both good and bad. It will broaden your horizons and capacities in all aspects of life. It will try you and test you, it will knock you down and kick you. But most important of all, at the end of the day you will be that much stronger and more well-rounded for it. So stop reading this and go get started on your new language.

Reflections On My Freshman Year Of College

June 18, 2014 | by Truth Teller | Link | Original Link

So my freshman year of college is over. I had a period of idiocy where I started to believe some of the ultra-left wing bullshit that American colleges try to drive into their students. As a result, I posted some things over on the RVF that I'm not proud of, and I feel as though this is a good place to apologize for it. So gents, I'm sorry that I regressed into white knighting at some points on the forum. Roosh was right to suspend my membership, and I've decided to take time actually doing things rather than writing about them.

My freshman year was, all in all, a formative experience. I learned more than I thought I would, and I also found that the Western world is much worse than I thought. On the other hand, I met some really great people and hooked up with a few women, eventually dating one for awhile (more on that mistake later). Overall, if this is what my first year was like, I'm eager for the next three. So without further ado, here's what I've learned from my first year:

1. Most men are bums

It's true. Most men suck. Most men can't be forced to get off their asses and do anything. They're completely happy with staying exactly where they are and not advancing emotionally or intellectually. I've lost count of the number of times that I had to take shit from guys over not following what they considered "the rules" for an interaction with women. Too many men still believe in all the typical "nice guy" bullshit that I had to forcibly unplug myself from. I don't think I've mentioned this here, but my red pill awakening began when the first girl I dated tried to have me locked up. Why? Because I believed in the “nice guy” shit, that being all sweet and nice to her would result in my getting back with her. Total nonsense, and I wish that today’s me could beat some sense into 15 year old me. Despite the fact that most men suck, you’re going to meet some good guys. That brings me to the second point.

2. Although most men are bums, some aren’t

95% of guys are still plugged into the “women as a prize, I have to win her” mentality. To me, that’s the most important red pill you can take. Most men refuse to acknowledge that embracing the fact that you want to fuck her silly gets you with her. I’m not talking about direct versus indirect, because that has its own place. I’m talking about embracing your masculinity, putting your balls on the line, and making the fucking approach. So if 95% of men suck, then there’s 5% who don’t. That 5% is who you want to surround yourself with. Some of them, like me, decided to learn game. I encouraged one such guy to join me, and I found a few others who were learning on their own. These guys rapidly became my friends. Other guys who showed an ambition, a drive towards something greater also became my friends. These are guys who aren’t happy with comfort zones and refuse to stop improving. Other guys I met through my social circle. These guys become my friends because they’re (a) cool guys and (b) they often are good game models.

3. Avoid relationships

I ended up in a relationship with a nice, feminine woman for the better part of my second semester. We had a lot of sex, and she got very attached to me. I wasn’t as attached, due to having an abundance mindset. When she violated my boundaries, she knew. I liked the girl, and even after we broke up, we ended up hooking up. We both lost our virginity to the other, for the record. Anyway, I feel as though while she was a good girl, I shouldn’t have gotten into it like I did. I got into it because I was basically shamed by a guy who can’t hook up with fat chicks into dating the girl I dated. Yeah, not very “alpha,” right? Anyway, as a result of the relationship, I lost at least five opportunities. Some of my old “nice guy” mentalities took hold. I would go out with my buddies, drink and spit game. But I never went beyond number closing, which (as you guys know) doesn’t mean shit in and of itself. And then, to top that off, I never really used any of those numbers.

4. Learning game is tough, but fun

I entered college with an academic understanding of game. I knew how it worked, I had a few products, but I never had actually approached a woman and started talking to her with the intention of sleeping with her. But as soon as I got there, I jumped into game. I approached something like 15 women in two nights once, and that was what it took to get over nighttime approach anxiety. I approached four women in a row once and was blown out by all four within 30 seconds. That was probably the worst I’ve ever been in terms of game. That night made me re-evaluate what I was doing, but all in all, I got a hell of a lot better because of it.

I quickly figured out that I was making a lot of beginner mistakes (and I probably still am), but I worked on fixing them, and I got a lot better. My body language has massively improved, and so has my tonality. I'm now trying to break into direct day game, and it's been a hell of a lot tougher than I could've imagined. The state part is the worst, in my opinion, and although I no longer have approach anxiety at night, I still have it during the day. By the way, I highly recommend this article for anyone trying to break into direct day game as well.

Some of my most fun experiences have come from game. Going to a party, spitting game at some girl, and then going back to her dorm and fingerbanging her in the stairwell is something I'll never forget. My first college make out, where I said nothing and let body language do the work, was an amazing experience. Learning game is fun. Yeah, you will have experiences that suck like getting pulled away from a girl who's clearly into you to refill the bucket, but the victories far outweigh the defeats. Again, I'm glad I started.

5. Women can be crazy

When I broke up with the girl I was dating, my fraternity had a date party. I saw this girl I knew in the middle of the street and very calmly walked over to her. I told her about it and and she came with me. She apparently thinks game is "creepy" and we don't talk most of the night. Yes, part of that was my fault. I got more drunk than I should've, but I also got cockblocked most of the night and became more aggressive than I wanted to be. This girl turned out being a crazy feminist, by the way. I take her back to her place and leave her. She offers to teach me how to get girls. I tell her that I'm not interested. She then proceeds to send me three paragraph length texts about how I'm creepy, wrong, whatever. I tell her "goodnight." She then proceeds to send another paragraph and a half of bullshit. I delete her number. It turns out that she's a serial monogamist and that my fraternity president (who's what some would call a "higher beta") had experienced the same thing. She then tried to bitch him out about not taking her, because he was with another woman. I've spoken about ten words to her since, and the general consensus around the fraternity is that she's nuts.

6. Game is a hot commodity

Yes, I'm not a master at game. I'm honest about that. That being said, since I have some, I'm better off than 98% of all college guys. I lived in a hall with 16 other guys. Out of the 16 of us, four of us (including myself) fucked women. Another guy had the bag of phone numbers, but never understood that numbers mean very little in and of themselves (I learned that the hard way). And yet another guy only was able to do stuff while blacked out. He was shocked at what I told him in terms of game. That being said, game still was incredibly useful. It wasn't just the fact that I got laid and made out with a few girls. It was the fact that my self-confidence and body language improved to the point where girls would eye fuck me when I walked down the street. It was the fact that a girl I hadn't spoken to for 3 months would look at me with the "fuck me please" eyes. Sadly, I didn't actually fuck her.

Conclusion

These are only a handful of the things that my freshman year taught me. I'm still working on my game, and I'm finding that the more I do wrong, the better I get. I'm looking forward to another year of college, and I plan to better myself so that I can recognize the goals I've set. Anything less than those goals (involving grades, women, etc.) would be a failure. And by the way, it's good to be back.

5 Game Tips For Newbies

June 18, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Alright newbies, I'm about to drop some golden game knowledge to get you kickstarted on your personal path to pussy. It's easy for vets to write about advanced game techniques, but sometimes I forget that the 'basics' of game are actually the foundation for great game. Thus, here are five game tips that I have put together over a decade of pulling hotties through trial and definitely error.

5. Get Off The Computer And Start Approaching

Listen, I know you're learning a shit ton by reading ROK, my blog and other game material, but it's key to put it into practice as well. Don't be a keyboard jockey and just read, read, read. You must apply the information that you're taking in, otherwise you won't understand exactly why and how it works. The best way to learn how to get a girl's number, what to text her to set up a date, how to escalate physically and the all important close, is to read about it yes, but then go out into the 'real world' and apply it. Read + Apply. By following this simple formula you will tailor make your own game style and only then will you reap the rewards. If you're getting discouraged, check yourself: have you been applying all of the game knowledge you've been reading up on?

4. 'Failure' Is Your Friend

You're going to 'fail' in your journey to become good with women. Guaranteed. You will have a girl on a date, everything is seemingly going great and then she'll 'go to the bathroom' and never return. You'll get a sexy girl's number and she'll never respond to your texts. Guaranteed. You'll be about to stick your dick in a girl and she'll vehemently say 'no' and you won't fuck her. Guaranteed.
