It happens. Although you will feel like you've 'failed', it's not failure so much as it is a learning experience. Without the letdown, the victory will never be as sweet. Without the rejection, the acceptance will never give you such a high. Without the blue balls, it'll never feel as good as when you dump a big creamy cum load on a slut's face. All of this I know to be true due to not only my own experiences, but the experiences that I have witnessed from other players and students of mine.

Don't be afraid to 'fail'. The only approach I've ever regretted, is the one I didn't do.

3. Get Your Own House In Order

While you pursue sexy girls and you continue on your quest for success with women, make sure that you're focused on improving yourself as well. I'll let you in on a little 'secret': the more that you develop yourself into a High Value Male, the more women will be drawn to you and the less work you will have to put in. Most importantly, don't develop yourself for women, do it for yourself. You come first. Your goals come first. Your dreams come first. Your finances come first. Your workouts come first. Your future comes first. The women are simply the result of your success.

Have you ever wondered why women are so drawn to famous men? There a few reasons, but the main reasons are these:

-The famous man is pre-qualified by other women. Women want a man who is desired by other women. This is called pre-selection. Have you ever wondered why once you get on a roll of pulling girls, that almost by magic other girls sense this and start chasing you? That's why. Women have a sixth sense for pre-selected men and when a man is famous it's the steroids version of pre-selection.

-Famous men are usually known to have wealth. Women are drawn to wealth for mainly security and sometimes vanity reasons. Most women want a man who can provide for her and a family. Whether they will actually keep the man around is of no concern. They have to open their legs for the chance to possibly get and keep him.

The point of breaking that down is this: focus on becoming the best version of yourself. Want success as much as you need to breathe. While doing so, also work on your game, so that you can be a well rounded playboy who can live a fulfilled life.

2. Don't Handicap Yourself With Online Game Only

I've noticed a trend in young players who are relying solely on online game and have zero real life approaches or skills. This is bad. I'm not saying online game is bad. It has it's place, but you will cut your game legs off at the knee if all you do is swipe on Tinder and send specially crafted messages on Plenty of Shrimp and OkStupid.

Get in the trenches. Roll solo to a bar, and start a conversation with someone. Anyone. Get your conversational skills to where they need to be. Take a kind-of-cute-girl home from the bar and fuck her. Get out and experience life. You will short-change your talents and have less great life experiences if you solely rely on online game. Delete the apps off of your phone if you have to for a couple of months and force yourself to approach during the day and at night.

The #1 reason why so many young players are relying only on online game is this: There is no real rejection with online game. It's safe. It's cozy. It doesn't 'hurt' as much.

Don't be a damn pansy. It's okay to get rejected. In fact the more you get rejected the better, because eventually you will become numb to it. Yes, I said 'numb'. I'm literally immune to rejection now. I don't give a fuck and I turn it into my own amusement if I am rejected. And trust me, I get rejected every night that I go out too. Any player that says they never get rejected is full of shit and is a liar. I get rejected. Roosh gets rejected. Krauser gets rejected. We all get rejected, but guess what? We don't quit, which leads me to the #1 tip for newbies…

1. Don’t Quit

Read closely and don’t get your feelings hurt: You will never become good with women if you quit after a few rejections. It simply will not and cannot happen. You must not quit. You must get balls of steel and decide that not next month, not next week and not tomorrow, but today, you will not quit in your quest for success with women.

You may get discouraged. That’s okay. That means you’re human.

You may delete every game e-book off your hard drive and burn every paperback game book you’ve ever bought, cursing their existence and calling us frauds, but the real blame is in the mirror. You have to be realistic with yourself and ask, “Have I really put the work in to become great with women?”. It is work, but if you have fun with it and treat it for what it is, a game, then it’s fun and opens doors in your life you would have never imagined.

Quitters never win and they never get the rewards that those who grind get. You have it within you to be great, my friend, so do just that: don’t quit, put in the work and I’ll see you at the top.

The most important ‘textbook’ you’ll ever buy, is now available. Get my brand new Campus Hustler system here.

Read More: Top 5 Best Response For When A Girl Says “I Love You”

How To Make Women Equal To Men

June 19, 2014 | by Daddy | Link | Original Link

We live in a society where human interaction takes a back seat to performance and results. What's more, with globalization, competition is at an all-time high. Therefore femininity and its behaviors, like compassion and sensitivity, are less needed by our societies that are work oriented. But since we love women and care about them, we need to help them be more productive citizens and help them be as efficient and as competitive as men.

Enter mannism, the philosophy of the future. It will bring equality and fairness to an even higher level by taking away the last elements that make women different from men. Let's take a look at this brand new ideology and its tenets.

The end of womanities

Instagram, Facebook, shopping, reality TV, women magazines, and going to the bathroom in groups would all be illegal, because they encourage gossip, and gossip leads to slender and libel. In addition, crying, giggling, whining, being emotional and wearing the color pink are factors that lower productivity and are unsuitable for a work environment.

Peeing while standing is a lot more efficient and fast

Women would be required to take desensitivity training classes to learn how to be stoic and logical instead, attributes that have allowed men from all colors and backgrounds to perform better for millennia.

Female attraction for richer men would be punished

Why do women like to marry millionaires? It’s usually for their money. It’s dishonest, because women should work for their own, like men do. Therefore, women who are attracted to richer men would be considered deviant and be sent to rehabilitation.

If a woman slept with a man who has an annual income of 50% or more than her, she would go to jail. So suppose you’re a girl in a bar, and some charming man starts flirting with you. He takes you home on a public bus and passes himself as a regular guy, but it turns out he’s rich. Tough luck Lolita. With this new law, it would be your responsibility to check his bank account, and if he gave you false information, it would be your responsibility to ask his relatives or check public records for information.

According to recent studies, gold digging is still the #1 source of income for most women around the world

These naughty perverted ladies would end up on a sex offender's list and be outcasts, unable to have jobs for the rest of their life. They would have to be careful for annual raises too, because their boyfriend of last year might not be legal this year. A 1% salary increase could lead to prosecution.

Note: richer men who have sex with poor women would not be prosecuted, because they are the victims.

All women would be turned into hoes

If women want to be equal to men, they have to behave like them with their sexuality. Shy and sexually reserved women would be brainwashed into thinking there is something wrong with them. Little girls, starting as young as possible when they are defenseless, would be educated through their parents, schools, TV, commercials, movies and general literature that the way to a man's heart is through sex.

Barbies and dolls would be replaced by dildos. Books titled "the key to a successful marriage: spread your legs on the first date" would be on the curriculum in the best universities. Oprah would make educational series about how sucking dicks is better than chocolate.

Family men need not to worry however, because there would be plenty of foreign bride agencies with good wife material available to them if they feel western women are not suitable to be mothers.

Divorce: money back guarantee

In case of divorce, men could get their money back. After all, if the woman changes over time, why wouldn't a man be allowed to have his investment returned? Women often act a certain way until they have their ring. At first, she was fit. Now, she's fat. At first, she was nice, sweet and caring. Now, she is a harpy whose goal in life is to make you miserable. How is it not false representation, and why shouldn't it be punishable by law?

At the wedding 5 years later

There would be a 5 years warranty stipulating that if the woman doesn't fulfill her part of the marriage (she withholds sex, she's a disaster in the kitchen, etc.), she can be returned to her family without hassle. That way, women would learn strange masculine concepts like accountability and liability, which means being responsible for your own actions and words, and they would be better human beings in the long run.

Pregnancy: it's our sperm

Men would have the choice to keep it, the choice to abort it, and the choice to force the mother to take care of it. Why? Because they deserve it. During conception, men do all the work inside and out, so they should also decide the outcome. It takes skills and courage for a man to sexually conquer a woman, whereas all a woman has to do is wear a "I will fuck anyone tonight" sign in a bar. In addition, spermatozoids have to race and compete against each other, while women's eggs just lay there and wait like a starfish. Eggs have no game.

Woman and her egg waiting to be fertilized

Child custody: no changes needed

Mothers always win custody battles. But the secret is that men never want the kids anyways. They have to pretend they do want the kids as a ploy, because if they didn't, the mothers would suddenly change their plea to force the fathers to have them. Don't tell anyone.

Women would still be expected to be feminine when asked to Masculinity in a woman is great for work, but when it comes to relationships and sex, it's a big turn off. Men want feminine women who are sweet, kind and obedient. Women who are happy, lighthearted and compassionate. They also want women who look great and smell good at all times. Therefore, in the context of their relationships, women would need to forget everything they learned at work and be women again.

But don't despair ladies, because for those few who get a little lost and confused, resources and help would be available to guide them in the right direction. A good start would be the book "Where did all the good women go?"

Conclusion

These changes would be for the better of society as a whole. Progression and high productivity must be attained for us to be victorious and crush the emerging competition from developing countries.

Sure, because life is a little rough sometimes, there might be a few women who decide to be outcasts, stay home and read horoscopes in their basements, but that would be a small price to pay for prosperity, wouldn't it?

Read More: How Black America Has Predicted Our Future

Daddy

Daddy wants to restore the once proud western civilization by reviving its core values. Follow him on Twitter

The Physical Exercise That Strengthens The Mind

June 19, 2014 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

There are far too many articles on ROK about exercises that benefit the body to count, but very few that address exercises that benefit the mind. In a world where constant mental distractions are the norm, the mind needs to be strong enough to filter these meaningless distractions out. However, instead we live in a world where people are losing the fight against these distractions.

There are many different ways to strengthen the mind such as traveling and seeing more of the world. However, for the ROK readers who don't have several thousand dollars and a few months of vacation time that is sitting around unused, there are cheaper ways. In fact unless you are in a wheelchair you have all the tools you need to do it from right where you are sitting in front of your computer.

Introducing the horse stance. It is a core exercise found in many Chinese martial arts. I am told not to give away any of the secrets of my kung fu school to the public, but I recently found out that horse stance is one of the basic stances in almost all yoga classes so apparently the secret is already out.

To do it put your legs about one and a half to two shoulder widths apart. Try to keep your toes pointed forward as best you can. Then keeping your back straight and perpendicular to the ground squat down until your thighs are parallel to the ground with your knees pointing out to the side. Before doing it read the part below on proper form to prevent knee problems. Hold this stance for as long as you can.

That is it. A good exercise should be simple and hard and this falls to the extremes of both. Every person's body is different so some people will struggle to hold it for 30 seconds. Among the 40,000 or so unique visitors to ROK every day there will be someone who has no trouble holding a perfect horse stance for five minutes even though they have never done it before. Good for you, please keep it to yourself.

Proper Form Prevents Injuries

This exercise will work many of the same muscles as the squat workout done at a gym. However, the form is different. The proper form for a squat workout involves the feet about shoulder width apart, knees pointed forward, and your hips go back when you go down. If you try to do horse stance with this form you will tear up your knees over time. When doing the horse stance your feet should be much wider apart, your knees should point outward, and your hips should remain forward. Both are good workouts, but they are not different variations of the same workout.

Due to lack of flexibility and being beginners most of you will not be able to make your form exactly the way I describe. I have been doing it for a long time (off and on) and even my horse stance form isn't perfect either.

The most important things to do to prevent knee problems is to make sure that your knees are pushed outward and never sink so low in horse stance that your butt is below your knees. To help get your knees out as much as possible do the butterfly stretch before you practice and don't wear tight pants. To make sure that you are squatted the right amount find a bo staff, broom, rake, or shovel around your house that has a round handle. Balance it across your legs and make sure you are squatted down enough that it doesn't roll off the front of your knees or roll back toward your body.

The most important thing to do in order to get the most benefit from this workout is to make sure your thighs are parallel to the ground. Again balancing a broom across the top of your thighs as described above is the best way to make sure you are doing it right. A high horse stance is a red flag for a McDojo in the martial arts world.

When I see something like this I feel the same way a weight lifter at the gym feels when they see someone violently rocking their body back and forth while doing a bicep curl.

Mental Discipline

The longer you hold the horse stance the more your legs will burn and burn. The burn will make your mind go into overdrive to rationalize excuses for why it is OK to give up and stop the burn. For me this generally starts after about three minutes into a five minute workout. To block it out I might try to close my eyes and relax despite the burn. Then I open them to see how much longer I have to endure the burn and see that only 40 seconds of burn have gone by. My legs are already burning and it will be another minute and twenty seconds of even greater burn before the burning stops.

BUT WAIT… My eyes were closed that whole time. What if it was actually a minute and 40 seconds that went by. I know that it wasn't but…

"It could have been."

"You have been getting better."

"Just feel how much your legs burn."

"And then you would only have 20 seconds more."

"It was definitely a minute forty."

"And even if wasn't four minutes is still good."

"NO, four minutes is FUCKING AWESOME."

"Most people in the world can't do three minutes."

“No one would blame you.”

All of a sudden you see that eighteen seconds have gone by and you have two seconds to make a choice. Do you give in or do you push back against those voices and do what you know you need to in order to make yourself the man that you want to be.

Self Defense Application

Being able to withstand pain is important in a fight. You won’t be able to block every punch and when one gets through your defenses you have to be able to shake it off immediately or get knocked out by the upcoming follow-up strike. You also have to have the speed and power to make it through your opponents defenses. Horse stance makes your leg muscles incredibly strong and your kicks as strong as a horse’s.

In the rise of fake martial arts schools across the country one of the responses to it has been the rise in instructors that do away with the art in martial arts and give only advice that they feel is 100% practical. While there is a lot of value in what they teach some of what they teach goes against what has worked for thousands of years before they were born. One of the most common pieces of advice from the practical self defense gurus is to just kick a person in the knee. The knees are a weak point and easy to break in the average person.

However, as a person gets better at horse stance the muscles and connective tissue in that person’s leg get stronger. Once he is able to hold horse stance for about an hour at one time his legs will be strong enough to hold against a side kick to the knee unless the opponent also practices horse stance. Since a lot of people get their fighting advice from practical fighting instructors, putting some horse stance into your workout regimen could save you a lot in reconstructrive knee surgery in the future.

Read Next: Bodybuilding vs. Building Your Body

Anton McDowell
Anton is a corporate slave plotting his escape who wishes he had taken the pill nine years ago, but is ready to start his life anew and help others do the same. When he isn't working the graveyard shift he is beating himself up in kung fu or enjoying a nice beer at one of the bars in his college town. Send your hate/love to

Is Charles C. Johnson Ripping Off ROK?

June 20, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

One morning last week I was perusing my Facebook feed will sipping my Earl Grey tea. An article linked by one of my friends looked familiar to me. I clicked on it and it looked quite similar to this one. This article of mine deals with Mr. Bloomberg and his Everytown.org's methods of tallying gun crime. This other article looked very similar. While Mr. Bloomberg's campaign against guns is well known and methods easily discerned, this article seemed more than coincidental convergence to me. From there, I started to investigate.

From Wikipedia.org:

> In espionage parlance, a cut-out is a mutually trusted intermediary, method or channel of communication, facilitating the exchange of information between agents. Cutouts usually only know the source and destination of the information to be transmitted, but are unaware of the identities of any other persons involved in the espionage process. Thus, a captured cutout cannot be used to identify members of an espionage cell.

The first thing I noticed was that the main content of this article was created by a third party. The third party in this case was Charles C. Johnson. The media citation was his Twitter account. But Douglas, people cite Twitter all the time, though? It happens, but in this case the Twitter user is also a Daily Caller author. If his discovery was original content, why did he not write about himself? What better way to dodge the plagiarism charge then to quote Twitter, thereby deflecting the blame to "unsubstantiated tweets" for the lookalike articles.. I wondered if this dude could have ripped ROK and then used Twitter to launder the concept.

After using Google to further my investigation, I found there are quite a few articles using the same exact Charles Johnson tweets with quite similar lead ins. They also were published chronologically close to each other. This could indicate collaboration in the effort.

From Bob Owens of http://bearingarms.com:

> The claims were quickly echoed—uncritically, and without even a cursory attempt at fact-checking—by reporters and editors from news outlets that should have know better. Shannon Watts of Mom's Demand and Erika Soto Lamb of Everytown might have gotten away with their outlandish claims… except that journalist Charles C. Johnson started looking at the underlying data for their claims, and posted what he found on Twitter in real-time as he found it. As he did so, the blatant deception from Bloomberg's gun control harpies quickly fell apart.

From Erika Johnsen of http://hotair.com

> Here's the Washington Post's version, too. Any school shooting is an unacceptable tragedy for which we should be looking for practical, effective solutions, and an average of more than one school shooting every week is all the more eye-poppingly horrifying. It sounds like we have an outright epidemic on our hands — but, have there really been 74 "school shootings" in just eighteen months? Charles C. Johnsen, a.k.a. @ChuckCJohnson on the Twitters, took a closer look at the various crimes that Everytown has been lumping into its list, and unsurprisingly, quite a few are undeserving of the designation of a "school shooting." Here's a sampling of some of his research:

From Jason Howerton of http://www.theblaze.com

> Journalist Charles C. Johnson dug deeper into Everytown's data on Tuesday and > published his findings on Twitter. He also criticized the fact that the group classified violent disputes and gang-related violence as “school shootings.”

I decided to tweet at the author of one of the lookalike articles with the smallest twitter presence. It is shown at the top. She has not acknowledge the accusation

.

What could it mean if these conservative media outlets are cribbing ROK content? It could mean they have no creativity or analysis of their own. It could mean they are trying to co op and control any traditionalist narrative. It could even mean they are trying to become what they rail against, arbiters of a monopolized political narrative.

In conclusion, it could possibly be an honest coincidence. The fact that my accusations have been ignored indicate otherwise. Maybe they truly want to just replace the current media courtiers to the system with themselves. What I do know though: I will be watching people like this closely in the future.

Read Also: Fact Checking Emotional Propaganda

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

5 Reasons Why You Should Be Doing Intermittent Fasting

June 20, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

As American obesity rates continue to soar, due to poor nutrition, vacations that make you fat, and general laziness, I can't help but notice all of the nutrition and fitness trends that circulate around from the "experts." The most common advice I hear, that everyone must abide by, are these points:

- You must eat breakfast the moment you wake up, the bigger the better
- You must eat eight small meals a day to "keep your metabolism going". This one makes me laugh because it is a direct contradiction to the first point.
- You must eat lots of carbohydrates if you want to have energy – in fact, carbs are GREAT for you!
- If you eat lots of fruits and veggies, you will automatically lose weight, but they fail to mention that eating 3,000 calories worth of rabbit food without exercising will result in you not losing any weight

The list goes on and on. At the end of the day, obesity "experts" don't actually want to completely eliminate obesity, and why would they? People are paying thousands of dollars for easy methods of losing weight like surgeries, consultations, and fitness programs. Doctors, like you and I, are in it to make money. Obesity doctors do not want to cure obesity because they would take themselves out of a job, for the same reason that fertility specialists encourage young girls to be on birth control when they are most fertile, because they get to then rob them financially later in life when they can't get pregnant.

Intermittent fasting has become very popular in recent years with blogs such as LeanGains pouring out a wealth of information regarding it. If you're not familiar with the concept, it involves cutting down your food intake to twice a day – none of this constant snacking bullshit. General guidelines are to allow for a 16 hour fasting window, with an 8 hour feeding window. Here is what my personal setup looks like:

- 7:00am – Wake up
- No breakfast
- Drink lots of water throughout the morning, and a cup of straight black coffee if I'm really hungry, as it seems to help stave off hunger
- 11:00am – First meal of the day, I eat at my desk.
- 2:00pm – Workout
- 3:00pm – Very, very light post-workout snack or just a protein shake
- 6:30pm – Eat my second meal, hopefully finish up by 7:00pm.
- Repeat cycle

This means that from 7:00pm – 11:00am, I consume no food. The only calories would be that occasional cup of coffee. Truthfully, my routine isn't perfect—the LeanGains site I linked before contains a wealth of knowledge about supplements you should be taking and the exact timing of your meals/workouts.

Here's five reasons why you should also try Intermittent Fasting.

Greatly Improved Clarity

When your body has to process food, it expends resources that are usually used for other bodily functions to do so. That's where the "food coma" term comes from – when you feel so tired you want to shut down, because your body is too busy processing the mountain of food you just piled into it.

Intermittent fasting eliminates this. When I wake up in the morning and start my work, I am much more mentally sharp than after eating. I attribute part of this due to it being early in the day when general mental fatigue has not yet set in, but certainly not all of it.

Self Discipline

This is something most people struggle with. They can't bring themselves to go to the gym, can't bring themselves to cook, and often, can hardly get themselves out of bed in the morning. Intermittent fasting teaches you discipline – you know the hours you can eat, and until then, you simply cannot. The allure of food is one of the most tempting forces out there. Don't get me wrong, it's hard to pass on the donuts everyone in the office eats in the morning, but I feel significantly more in control and awesome when I brush them away.

Eating Big

I recognize not everyone has the same outlook, but I personally love eating big meals. Part of this is because I sometimes lack self control once I get going. Before I know it, I'm rolling around and moaning about how I'm in a food coma.

The problem is, when you eat three large meals a day, you're bound to gain weight. Intermittent Fasting cuts this by 33%, which is huge. It makes it much easier to do the next point:

Control Your Weight

Just doing Intermittent Fasting alone, and not completely stuffing yourself at every meal will maintain your weight. You won't get ripped, and probably won't lose any weight, but you won't blow up and start putting money into obesity doctor's pockets. If you do workout consistently, then congratulations—participating in Intermittent Fasting means you can eat whatever you want and maintain your figure. I'm not saying eat a Domino's Pizza when you're aiming to get a summer beach body, but I generally eat whatever the hell I want and easily maintain my leanness.

It’s Not What Everyone Else Does

Your average person absolutely has to eat breakfast, because all of the experts say it is the most important meal of the day—one you definitely should not skip. Of course, their breakfast is rarely healthy. Typically, breakfast consists of sugary cereals, protein bars which are as bad as candy, and other easy to eat on the go meals that hold little-to-no nutritional value.

Your average person snacks constantly all day because they are told to do that.

Your average person eats whenever they feel like it, even if it’s well into the night.

Don’t be average, because your average person is a fat slob. If you’re having trouble knocking some weight off, or just want an easier way to control your weight, do your own research give Intermittent Fasting a try. It made my life much simpler.

Read More: 4 Reasons Why Your Diet Sucks

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

It’s In Our Nature To Judge Others

June 21, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> “Few people have the wisdom to prefer the criticism would do them good, to the praise that deceives them.”
>
> – François de La Rochefoucald

Red pillers draw a lot of flak from modern fem-centric societies. And one of the common brickbats pounded on a red piller is that: red pillers are judgmental, narcissistic misogynists.

The social conditioning an average man receives from the Matrix of modern society (what I prefer to call “the Hatetrix” for its hatred of red pill and reality) to be non-judgmental, is often significantly overwhelming.

Don’t judge others! Don’t upset the apple cart!

Personally, I don’t mind people judging me as long as it’s rational and backed with logical proof. I don’t want to sound as a judgment thumping apologetic here. My thoughts about why judgment is necessary represent my own ‘judgment’ on the necessity and importance of the faculty of judgment itself.

Everyone judges – to judge is natural

You bet it is. Everyone judges – right from the cradle to the grave. Every moment, every second that a human being spends in this earthly existence, is spent in judging life. Every act you take is an act of judgment, even if it is as inconspicuous as breathing.You are judging my article as you’re reading now, and will judge again after you’ve finished reading it. We are in fact all judging to live, and living to judge.

But what is judgment? Judgment is nothing but evaluation or discernment of evidence to make a decision. We judge or evaluate life experiences, situations, things, opinions, thoughts, and people based on the values, emotions and logic we adhere to. Nature has blessed humans with the faculties of sense, speech, hearing, taste, touch and intuition. What purpose do these faculties have? To help us evaluate. In other words, judge.

Why do we seek knowledge and education? To make better decisions (judgments) which lead to a better life.

Evaluation is as necessary as oxygen is necessary for life. Our entire lives are spent in evaluating life and what it shows us. Life is in many ways, a journey in evaluation. As long as you have a brain, you will think. And to think is a judgmental decision. Not to think is also a judgmental decision. To act is a judgmental act. Not to act is also a judgmental act.

The problem in the modern feminist societies is that people have become so thin-skinned that everyone wants to avoid being judged (in other words, evaluated). Which eventually breeds intellectual decadence, and usually moral too.

Of course we won't judge you! But, are you protesting or self-promoting?

Asking someone not to judge is one of the most unnatural things you could ask.What you're essentially asking the person to do is to act brain-dead and abandon their natural human faculties, which is itself unnatural as long as the person is alive.

Are we supposed to be this?

Even if the judgmental types don't judge you, it is because they've judged you unfit to handle their judgment or because they've judged not to judge you. Either way, you're still judged even if you haven't been technically judged. Criticism of the judgmental types by the non-judgmental types is itself an hypocritical act of 'judgment' by the 'non-judging'. Essentially proving the point that everyone judges – whether you accept it or not.

The Hatetrix Reloaded

It is only when people judge themselves and surroundings critically that they notice the flaws which need to be changed for improvement. How can you assess without judging? How do non-judges assess when assessment is itself an act of judgment? I've always wondered that.

What we fail to realize is the faculty of evaluation is an inherent natural and often involuntary function of the human brain. Being non-judgmental is to be stupidly non-evaluative–which itself is unnatural, and in some cases, tyrannical when forcibly imposed on others.

Maintaining a non-judgmental attitude is what corrodes rational thinking and replaces it with a collectivist mentality in society, which eventually leads to intellectual droning. Non-judgmental types typically deny the harsh realities of life to live a life of illusions, finding it difficult to awaken to see the real world.

The nature of judgment

Judgment is blind, and often harsh. It is blind to emotions, illusions, feelings and prejudices. It only seeks logic, reality and solid proof as its base. Judgment rarely makes everyone happy because everyone is unique with unique ideologies. There'd always be haters around us. Thus, we can't avoid making people unhappy when we judge. But that shouldn't discourage us from judging itself.

People fear being judged because they fear being evaluated. Judgment is indigestible for the weak hearted, the irrational and the emotional types which are found aplenty in the modern world. Emotion and irrationality often trumps reason in modern-day interactions, thus leading to solipsism in society.

Since emotionalism is essentially a female trait, women and feminized men typically find it difficult to accept judgment. There are innumerable examples in real-life and fiction throughout history to explain this, but the fictional analogy found in the Judgment of Paris – which led to the Trojan War in Homer's Iliad – explains this well aesthetically. Paris's judgment to award the golden apple to Aphrodite caused Hera and Athena to simmer in hatred and envy (an inability to accept judgment), after all the three had tried to win by resorting to bribe Paris. Hypothetically, it could be debated that the war could've been averted had Paris chosen any of the other two. But what must not be forgotten is that the apple which was the prize was thrown by Eris herself, to sow eventual discord – irrespective of whoever won it.

Know when and how to judge

Judge when it is right to judge, and how to judge. That's imperative. There's a thin line between judgment and ignorance, which leads to injustice.

Judgment comes from evaluation of facts to make a decision. Ignorance comes from utilization of prejudices and faulty proofs to make a decision. Understand the difference clearly so as to know how to judge. Most people actually live ignorant lives, using prejudices, personal whims and superficial proofs to 'judge' people. Thus it is not judgmental people who are worthy of criticism, but rather the ignorant ones who give judgment a bad name.

Knowing when to judge is also very important. Discretion and calculation in judgment is strength, for it shows wisdom and maturity. You can't afford to shoot off your mouth all the time. That's the stupidity of loose cannons that lack the art of timing.

Judgment creates Wisdom

> "A really intelligent man feels what other men only know."
>
> – Baron de Montesquieu

In his bestseller "The 50th law", Robert Greene mentions, "Do not be afraid of people's criticisms – without such feedback your work will be too personal and delusional" The book further elaborates this principle using the examples of 50 cent leaking a single from his G-Unit record in 2008 to obtain pre-release judgmental feedback from people about the song as well as to discover the recent changes in people's tastes about music. The feedback helped him to ascertain what his fans wanted to hear, and so he used his website to reconnect with his audience. Greene further demonstrates this principle, by explaining how Eleanor Roosevelt opened informal channels of criticism and feedback from the general public during her tenure as The First Lady. The goal was to acquire awareness through judgment.

I've had people rip some of my articles. But I don't mind, as I know they're judging me based on their values, which is a natural thing for everyone. But it's necessary and should be encouraged (unless if its' malicious spam). People's feedback, whether positive or negative, creates awareness about your audience (environment).

Embrace a judgmental attitude

Judge others freely, and allow yourself to be judged. Don't fear criticism and evaluation, and practice the same on those around you – even if it may be purely mental and non-verbal. It's one of your best friends—to know about yourself and others as well.

We often waste our lives trying to win over people with insincerity, deception and supplicating, obliging behavior. The connections we thus form are themselves fake and stand on shaky grounds of insincerity. Instead do yourself a favor and judge people, especially in context of intimate or personal connections. Sort the pearls from the pebbles. Use your time finding like-minded people instead of wasting it trying to meet opposite-minded people half-way.

Opposites may attract, but it's the similarities which eventually endure. Even to discover similarities, we first need to judge to identify. Live to judge, and judge to live, to live a life free of illusions.

Read More: You Should Judge Books By Their Covers

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

What To Do If You’re A Virgin In Your 20´s

June 21, 2014 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

Every once in a while, someone posts a comment that goes something like this:

> “I’m in my early to mid 20s and am still a virgin. I don’t know what to do.”

No one here will judge you for that, unless of course you are unwilling to make a change and improve yourself. But the desire to want to change and improve yourself has to come from within you.

Now, how can a virgin learn game? Even if such a young man was able to use game techniques in order to successfully get a woman and bring her back to his apartment, he would probably be clueless what to do next. We all remember the first time we had sex and if we are honest with ourselves, we remember how completely clueless we were about it. I myself was so nervous that I had to use viagra in order to maintain an erection. So if even game cannot help a virgin get laid, what is the solution?

One very realistic solution is that if you are a virgin and in your 20s is to find a sympathetic prostitute and let her know you are a virgin and that you basically want her to pop your cherry. The first time is the hardest and once you overcome that initial hurdle, it gets a lot easier after that. I would normally never encourage the use of prostitutes, but it may be a necessary evil for a lot of young men. In some cultures worldwide, it is almost an unspoken ritual that when a man reaches his 18th birthday, if he is still a virgin, his male friends will take him out and set him up with a prostitute and thus initiate him into adulthood.

Prostitution is something that should be treated as an emergency method. It is not satisfying for long term use because there is really nothing to be gained from it. Zero effort is required and so there is no motivation to improve yourself. Basically, just consider prostitution as "sex education" that you needed to learn in the early stages of your personal development.

Here is a strategy for men in their 20s who are still virgins and perhaps a bit shy or nervous around women:

Short term: Have sex with a sympathetic prostitute and overcome the initial fear of sex

Mid term: Depending on your level of comfort, start learning and practicing game. If you are having troubles learning game, consider taking a sex vacation to Bangkok, Thailand, and having sex with at least 10 women there. They may either be prostitutes or normal women you meet, it is up to you.

Long term: At this point, if you've fucked at least 10 women, you don't really have any excuse to be nervous about learning game and picking up women anymore. At this stage, stop all use of prostitutes and focus on practicing and picking up women.

One of the great things about making self-improvement one of the main focuses of your life is that it gets easier as time goes along, until it becomes natural. You'll notice yourself becoming more absorbed in a positive mind frame and less in a negative one. One of the most frightening things about being absorbed in a negative mindset, or even worse, being stuck in a depression, is that in many cases you do not even realize that you are in such a state of mind.

This is also why it is very vital to keep good associations. You take on the qualities of the people that you associate with. If you are associating with guys who live in their parent's basement and play World of Warcraft all day, you'll probably become like them. On the other hand, if you associate with positive male role models, you will gradually take on their qualities.

One of the worst things about modern America is that feminism has almost totally destroyed any real positive male role models for younger men to have. Finding a group of positive male role models cannot be overestimated. The good news is, is that if you are reading Return of Kings, you've already found a group of positive male role models.

Having positive male role models is probably the most vital part of improving one's self. Even in certain eastern religious traditions, an important teaching for those who want to make spiritual progress is to associate with spiritually advanced people. In a more mundane or material sense, the same holds true. Associate with men who are more advanced than you in personal development, game, or life experience, and do so in a humble down to earth mood. If you have a challenging or arrogant mood, you will never be able to learn anything.

Conclusion

If you're a nervous virgin in your 20s, there is no need to get upset or depressed about that. Some men develop a bit more slowly and may not have lost their virginity at age 14. In fact, the German philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer said the following:

> The nobler and more perfect a thing is, the later and slower is it in reaching maturity. Man reaches the maturity of his reasoning and mental faculties scarcely before he is eight-and-twenty;

Just consider following the above strategies and make the serious commitment to self-improvement. Give up bad association and find some good male role models who you can learn from. If you stay committed to the path and work on your game, you'll start having experiences that you did not even think was possible.

Read Next: How To Build A Beta Male

John Doe
John is the creator of the famous Boycott American Women blog. Check it out here: www.BoycottBitches.com

We Must Not Deny The Importance Of Fatherhood

June 22, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Some years back, a South African game reserve was faced with a problem: they could no longer support all the elephants on the reserve. As such, they decided to move some of the elephants to another reserve. Given the enormous size of elephants, only helicopters could safely transport them. Since adult male elephants are much heavier than females, the reserve decided to only transport female adult elephants and young males to another reserve.

After a few weeks at the new reserve, the rangers started to find the bodies of rhinoceros' violently gored to death. The rangers couldn't suspect poachers, as their tusks were intact. So, they found out it was the juvenile male elephants who had killed the rhinos. Further, it wasn't just the rhinos who had been stomped on and gored to death, as other animals on the reserve had been attacked by the young male elephants. This sort of behavior bewildered the rangers, as such violent behavior is unheard among male elephants.

The rangers realized that the problem was the lack of adult male elephants. They decided to find a way to helicopter adult male elephants to the reserve. Within weeks, the young males had stopped goring other animals and began to comport themselves as male elephants generally do.

While man is not a wild animal like elephants are, we both share a sacred duty to our younger kin. We both shoulder the duty and privilege of shepherding young males into the seriousness of adulthood. For human males, the ritual of ushering young boys into confident, masculine men is one of sublime gravity. Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan observed as such back in the 1960's:

From the wild Irish slums of the 19th Century Eastern Seaboard to the riot-torn suburbs of Los Angeles, there is one unmistakable lesson in American history: A community that allows a large number of young men to grow up in broken homes, dominated by women, never acquiring any stable relationship to male authority, never acquiring any rational expectations for the future – that community asks for and gets chaos.

On the grossest consequences of feminism and the concomitant collapse of the family is the devaluation of fatherhood. Feminism fosters and encourages "independence" from men in women. To be a single mother is a badge of pride, a social sign that you don't want or need provisioning—of any kind—from a man. In order to make this socially tenable, the concept of fatherhood must be ruthlessly devalued in order for women to make believe their male-free families are meeting the needs of their children.

Media and academia aid this devaluation in many ways. Books like Peggy Drexler's Raising Boys Without Men and Lenore Weitzman's The Divorce Revolution strive to convince women that men simply are not necessary for a functioning family. It needn't be argued that Women's Studies and the constellation of Critical Studies programs in academia have greatly aided in dismantling fatherhood. The swarming mass of media targeted at women serve to allay any concerns that women might entertain about being a single mother or tossing out her husband out onto the curb.

While this approach is loved by society—scads of single mothers who exist purely to spend men's money on products branded by capitalism—the effects are deleterious. Study after study finds a clear and direct correlation between fatherlessness and violence, sloth and depression in young males. Sites like ROK have to spend all sorts of time guiding, aiding and counselling young men who have no father or grew up with a weak or distant one. We see the malaise in real time, with movements like MGTOW, PUA's, MRA's, and even sites like 4chan give voice to the angry and conflicted souls of modern men.

A common sentiment that threads all these disparate movements together is the poverty of the modern man's soul. Unable to properly value themselves or find solid footing in life, young men find themselves adrift in society, coping with porn, video games, drugs and—most unfortunately—violence. They stew endlessly in their own juices, much like a middle-aged English teacher who fiddles with a couple novel manuscripts when he's had too much cheap bourbon. Unable to reasonably appreciate their place in their own life and society, they simply pass from experience to experience, none the wiser from it all nor any happier.

The bulwark against this listless melancholy is fatherhood. When fathers are present and strong, they combine both the firm hand of experienced maturity with the soft touch of love that allows boys to grow into strong, self-assured men. They place demands on their young from a place of paternal love in order for them to have clear, level-headed views on life and their place in it. They are there when the winds of cruel fate batter mercilessly on the souls of their young boys; they are there when their sons achieve their wildest dreams.

Fatherhood isn't just a necessity for raising healthy boys, it is a necessity to prevent social destruction. One need only take a cursory glance at black America to realize the structural problems that inhere when men are not present as fathers. The violence, laziness and general indifference of the stereotypical black man speaks mostly to the collapse of black men as fathers. Unable to transmit masculine values to their sons, boys grow up dominated by their mothers and their adulthood reflects this. You get men obsessed with shoes, fashion and unable to mediate their own testosterone-fueled aggression. They grow up to be men with no grounded sense of masculinity.

Some years back, I heard some news about a friend from my youth. He grew up in the shadow a sulky, working class mother. His father was a garden-variety felon with a strong like for cheap booze and loose bar skanks. His mother moved on from unstable loser to stable douchebag without a care for his needs. Despite her constant proclamations of love and devotion to her son, it was a cloying and superficial display that betrayed her ambivalence about her son. He was a smart, capable and handsome young man, but he had no stable sense of self or masculinity. Marijuana and whiskey were his choices as an adult to cope with the depressing reality of his life.

I got a call not more than a couple years ago and a friend told me that he had cashed in all his chips with a .38. I remember sitting back, remembering playing Twisted Metal with him and listening to crappy Top 40 radio in junior high. I remember trading tall tales about where we would go in life after we stole a six-pack of Mike's Hard Lemonade as sophomores. I remember graduating high school, the world before us, a world that was fit to be conquered by us.

I also remember hearing that he had taken his own life a few years later. His relationship with his mother was one of conflicted frustration, but what I remember most was his distressed relationship with his father. Being a man with an involved father, I couldn't understand the foreign look in his eyes when he spoke of his father. Some boys are called before their time to shoulder burdens that should be carried by adults. He had to learn to be a man with no man to teach him.

I can't help but wonder what his life would have been like had his mother and father ditched their ego's and put their children first? What if he knew he could call his father at any hour of the night, knowing his father is always there to help him navigate the confusing tides of life? I don't doubt for a second that he would be alive and well today if that was the case. Given his talent and smarts, I have no doubt at all that he would be a successful young man with a bright future ahead of him.

Yet, that is not the case. He lived in a society that tolerated and openly embraced men absconding from fatherhood, a society that revolves around what women want from men. If that is money, then she gets a child support order; if that is to be celebrated for having some random seed vacuumed from inside her, then break out the champagne. He lived in a society that devalued the positive value men bring to the table as devoted fathers.

He was simply one man, who is interred in a lonely cemetery in town nobody has heard of, but his story is emblematic of so many men. Listless with no substantive demands made of them by caring fathers, modern men are a rudderless rendition of their grandfathers. His fatal decision is an aberration for most men, but his personal disquiet is mirrored in the souls of far too many men in America.

Fatherhood isn't a concept to be taken lightly in any sense of the word. Fatherhood is the capstone of masculinity in a healthy society. The deleterious consequences that result from the erosion of fatherhood cannot be understated. Fatherhood, simply, is the bedrock of society. Any society that openly embraces the rearing of youth without male influence is a society due for a serious reality check.

Read Next: How Professional Athletes Show Us The Importance Of Fathers

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

The Only Thing That Matters In The Gym

June 22, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

When you step in the gym, what's the first thing on your mind? How crowded it is? That chick with the big booty on the stair master? Your job? The fact is that most guys bring a whole shit ton of mental baggage with them to the gym. And that violates the exact purpose the gym should serve to a man.

The gym isn't a place to show off. It isn't a place to let your insecurities consume you. It's not a place to pick up girls either. No, it's a place to turn off your mind and put your body to the test. It's been dubbed "the iron temple" by some, and that's quite the fitting name. When you walk into the realm of the iron temple, there should be only one thing on your mind: can you do better than your previous best? Have you grown stronger?

Here's why:

It builds character

Arnold Schwarzenegger said it best: “The resistance that you fight physically in the gym and the resistance that you fight in life can only build a strong character.” When you step under the bar for a set of heavy squats that takes you to your physical limits, you have to put it all on the line. It’s not comfortable. It’s not easy.

I don’t know of another activity where your progress can be so accurately measured. Growing stronger in the gym embodies the same cycle of development and improvement that you’ll face across all areas of your life. By training yourself to always push past your previous best in the gym, you ingrain this notion as a habit in your consciousness.

If you acknowledge this fact and begin to view the gym as a place to test your wit and push your limits, your newfound desire to improve will surface across all areas of your life. The same way you’ll grow a burning desire to hit the gym again and see if you can complete an extra rep on the bench, you’ll also begin to bring this same mentality to your other pursuits, be it attracting women, building a business, or otherwise.

It guarantees results

The second reason you must always strive to get stronger is more tangible: getting stronger guarantees a bigger, leaner physique. If you're gaining weight and getting stronger, this is a sign that your body is synthesizing new muscle tissue. Your strength increase is a direct result of additional muscle mass on your body.

If you're losing weight and getting stronger (or at least maintaining your strength), this is a sign that your body is shedding fat and holding onto the muscle. When you lose weight and don't focus on getting stronger, you'll undoubtedly get weaker.

This is a result of the fact that you're consuming less energy than your body needs to maintain its current weight. In this state it can either use muscle or fat as a source of energy. If you don't lift and focus on getting stronger, your body won't have a reason to discriminate between the two. As a result it will burn both fat and muscle. This is the reason it's common to see a friend drop 20 pounds yet still look the same. Yes he lost 20 pounds, but because it consisted of both muscle and fat, his body fat level either stayed the same, or barely dropped. He's gone from fat to skinny fat.

So there you have it: you must get stronger in order to build a better body, and also to foster a mindset of personal growth.

For an addictive, customizable approach to training and nutrition, check out my new book "Shredded Beast". Click here to read reviews and get it now.

Read More: The Biggest Mistake A Man Can Make

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

The Hypocritical Discrimination Of Relationships Between Young Women And Mature Men

June 23, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Recently, BuzzFeed writer Andrew Kaczynski commented about an interesting trend he observed with regard to data from the dating website OKCupid:

> These two charts from OkCupid founder @christianrudder's new book will disturb you deeply. pic.twitter.com/GPH7EVuFaq
>
> — Andrew Kaczynski (@BuzzFeedAndrew) June 6, 2014

Kaczynski thinks that it is "deeply disturbing" that men find younger women attractive. My question is this: why is this trend actually disturbing? Aside from the obvious biological realities (men are as naturally inclined to desire younger women as women are naturally inclined to favor taller, wealthier men), why are some of this nation's most progressive people so close-minded when it comes to age-gaps in heterosexual relationships?

Modern society has come a long way with regard to discrimination and the fight against it. In the romantic context, this has led to a lot of interesting changes.

Ethnic Boundaries

Religious and cultural boundaries that once stood in the way of many romantic unions have now largely been broken down. It was once quite difficult for a gentile to form a romantic relationship with a Jew in many parts of the developed world, with such unions coming under intense shaming and scrutiny from wider society invested in maintaining a separation between the two groups.

Today, such unions are fairly commonplace, and they are now often formed absent the kind of shame that was the norm during the adolescence of our grandparents. It simply isn't okay to throw vitriol at a Jewish-Gentile couple in this day and age. If the individuals involved in the union are consenting adults who enjoy one another's company, we rightfully see fit to leave them alone.

Racial Boundaries

Similarly, it was once quite difficult for those of African descent to form romantic relationships with non-blacks, especially those of European heritage. The social pressure and shaming directed at those who participated in such unions was astronomical, and even the legal system in the United States was oriented to crush such relationships until just over 50 years ago. Though such unions are still subject to a significant degree of negative social pressure, it is no longer politically acceptable in mainstream western discourse to throw vitriol at a black-white couple.

We leave consenting adults alone to make their own decisions, and we respect them. The same goes for other interracial unions. Unions between Hispanics and whites in the USA were once generally discouraged, but are now the most common inter-ethnic combination in the USA. Asians and whites mingle freely, as do Hispanics and African-Americans. If you’re an individual seeking to form a romantic union with someone outside of your racial or ethnic group, you no longer face the wall of social shaming and legal discrimination your grandparents may have come against.

Gender Boundaries

Society has come a long way with regard to the treatment of same-sex couples and their relationships. Gay men once had to live heavily closeted lives, even if they possessed large degrees of wealth or fame. The use of slurs designed to insult their preferences and their lifestyle was common in the mainstream media. People across society could voice their “disgust” for the “unnatural” acts associated with homosexuality openly and vigorously without facing any social consequences at all.

Today, prominent celebrities have to beg for forgiveness for merely uttering the word "fag". Gay men live their lives openly in the mainstream media in full view of the world. Mainstream television shows now feature homosexual couples and even go as far as to openly display gay sexual activity. Those today who voice their "disgust" for these "unnatural" developments are now openly and vigorously shamed and face severe social consequences.

Age Boundaries

One may be led to wonder why it is that, despite all of the progress described above, it is somehow alright to shame older men who seek to date younger women. Older men who seek to date younger women are regularly described as "pervs" in the mainstream media, even if their younger partners are fully capable of legally consenting to a relationship. Their desire to date significantly younger women is described as a societal ill by some.

Andrew Kaczynski argues that the mere attraction these older men maintain for younger women is “deeply disturbing” in and of itself. He implies that this attraction that male adults feel for female adults really is a problem that should, ideally, be addressed and corrected.

If someone were to write an article about same sex unions claiming that the attraction that lesbian and gay adults feel for adults of their same sex is “deeply disturbing” in and of itself, would Andrew Kaczynski agree with it?

If someone were to write an article about interracial unions claiming that the desires of those who seek to form relationships and start families with individuals outside of their ethnic or racial group are “deeply disturbing”, would they be right?

Somehow, I do not believe that many of those who are most vocal in their opposition to older male-younger female unions would take kindly to either of those hypotheticals. Despite this, they remain vocal in their opposition and shaming of age-gap unions, as though those who maintain a desire for younger women have no real right to do so. Older women who seek much younger men are exciting, daring, sultry “cougars”, while their male counterparts are nasty, dangerous and highly undesirable “dirty-old men”, “perverts” and “creeps”.

These people are fine with individuals who choose to date outside of their race, their socio-economic class, or their religious group and don't attach negative labels to them. They're alright with men and women who choose to date other men and women. They're alright with men and women who choose to change their gender and then date whoever they like. But an older man who seeks to date a younger woman is somehow out-of-bounds?

If discrimination is not alright, then it isn't alright. You're either committed to tolerance and determined to fully respect the choices that consenting adults make in their personal lives, or you aren't. You can't have it both ways.

Read Next: Why You Should Broaden Your Romantic Options

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

Ascent Into Eternity: The Unconquerable Will Of George Mallory

June 23, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

On June 6, 1924, two haggard members of the British Everest Expedition, George Mallory and Andrew Irvine, left their frozen canvas tent on the wind-whipped side of Mount Everest and made a final push to reach the summit. It was the culmination of months of suffering, unrelenting effort, and danger, and the two men were confident that victory finally lay within their grasp. For Mallory, an experienced and tenacious alpinist, this was his last chance to achieve what had eluded him in previous summit attempts in 1921: to be the first man to reach the peak of the world's most formidable mountain. Having lost the race to be the first to reach the North and South Poles, British exploratory energy had invested much in Everest expeditions. But Mallory and Irvine never returned. On June 21, 1924, The Times of London published a telegraph from another team member announcing their death. It said only, "Mallory and Irvine killed on last attempt."

The mystery of what had happened to them would continue to haunt Everest exploration ever since.

George L. Mallory (right). Victory, he felt, was finally within his grasp.

Fast forward to 1998. An American climbing enthusiast, Larry Johnson, emailed a twenty six year old German geology student and amateur climber named Jochen Hemmleb. Hemmleb had an encyclopedic knowledge of Everest expeditions. He had studied the subject intensely for many years and possessed an impressive archive of Everest arcana. He had published some of his writings on Everest exploration on a website for climbers, and had engaged in dialogue with other climbers in the website's forum section. Johnson and Hemmleb began a regular correspondence and eventually put together the idea of forming a commercial expedition to Everest for the purpose of investigating the fate of Mallory and Irvine. After countless false starts and frustrations, funding was finally secured, team members were selected, and the expedition finally moved forward in 1999. They called it the Mallory and Irvine Research Expedition.

As far as was possible, the plan was to retrace the steps of Mallory's ill-fated 1924 summit attempt. Over the decades, randomly discovered clues from climbers of different nationalities had suggested the presence of Mallory and Irvine in different places near the summit: a tent pole here, an ice axe there. But nothing was known with certainty. How had they perished? Where were they? Beyond these questions lay the tantalizing possibility that the two men had actually reached the summit. If they had, the world would have to acknowledge that Sir Edmund Hillary, reaching the summit in 1953, was not the first.

Mallory had had a formidable reputation among mountaineers; thirty eight years old in 1924, he was generally recognized as the finest climber of his day. Tall, determined, a natural leader with restless energy, and possessed of a powerful physique, he was one of those urbane explorer-adventurers that England seemed to produce in abundance in the 19th and early 20th century. He was of an age where his strength of body was tempered by the practical prudence befitting his years. Readers should remember that this was an era before the high-tech comforts we take for granted: before Gore-Tex, before labor-saving advanced mountaineering communications equipment, before synthetic materials, and before all the other comforts that modern explorers enjoy. Even bottled oxygen, that sine qua non of modern high-altitude mountaineering, was a novelty in 1924: Mallory himself only grudgingly accepted it after long debate.

Mallory and his men climbed Everest wearing woolen sweaters, leather boots, and clothing made from natural fibers. Looking at their "primitive" equipment now, with the knowledge of what climbers now take for granted, one is astonished at the toughness of these men. These were real men, not overgrown boys. And these were cultured men: in the frozen wastes of Everest, they would recite passages to each other from King Lear and MacBeth to pass the time and maintain morale. It was a different age. One can only grimace at the thought of what these men would make of our modern youth, with their marshmallow bodies, hover hands, neckbeards, and acquiescence to feminism. Take a good look at the faces in the header photo for this article, showing the members of the 1924 British expedition. And take a good look at this photo of one of its members, Theodore H. Somervell. Somervell coughed up the lining of his throat during the summit attempt, and kept right on going.

Theodore Howard Somervell, a tough and relentless member of the 1924 British Everest Expedition.

The 1999 expedition had a general idea of how Mallory and Irvine had approached the summit, and were operating on the assumption that they might have fallen somewhere near the Northeast Ridge of Everest. Eventually the expedition members approached the Northeast Ridge, a perilous route from which some climbers over the years had fallen to their deaths. Team member Conrad Anker, acting on intuition, began to search on a low slope near the Rongbuk Glacier, traversing the rocky ground for signs of an ancient corpse. He eventually saw a bleached-white form lying on the rocky ground wearing a hobnailed boot, and approached cautiously. It was a body, it turned out, that had been holding fast to the side of Everest for seventy five years.

The body of George Leigh Mallory as it was discovered in 1999

Most of the clothing had frayed away from the body, but the frozen white flesh had been preserved in Everest's unique environment. "The clothing was blasted from most of his body, and his skin was bleached white. I felt like I was viewing a Greek or Roman marble statute," said team member Dave Hahn. An examination of the name tag under the corpse's sweater revealed the name G. Mallory. The team members stood before the corpse in awe, hardly believing that they were viewing the remains of their fallen hero. What fortitude, what tenacity, in comparison to the over-equipped and pampered climbers of today! There was an inexpressible poignancy to the scene, a sense of kinship with those who had gone before them and participated in the great struggle to conquer the mountain.

With some effort, the team members searched the ground for artifacts and buried the body. The expedition had succeeded in discovering the fate of George Mallory, but the question of whether he or Irvine had actually reached the summit of Everest remained unanswered. No one really knows. Enthusiasts debate the issue with intensity, but it remains an unsettled question.

But what is beyond all dispute is the courage and tenacity of Mallory, Irvine, and the other members of the 1924 expedition. Laboring under conditions of extreme adversity, they set a high-water mark for Everest exploration that would not be matched for decades, until Sir Edmund Hillary achieved the first confirmed ascent of the summit in 1953. Actually reaching the summit has everything to do with raw guts and brute force, combined with favorable weather. The essence of masculine energy is breaking through barriers, overcoming obstacles, and achieving great things through unconquerable willpower and applied skill. To dream great things, to plan great enterprises, and to fight for their realization: are these not the secret flames that burn with unquenchable passion at the core of our being?

Look again, I ask you, at the fallen grandeur of George Mallory. Even in the repose of death, there is a supreme and silent dignity, and a heroic majesty, in this alabaster figure, preserved in startling whiteness and suspended in time, still grasping at the side of the mountain which had claimed his life so long before. He lies there still, every inch a man.

His fallen form chants to us its own regal poetry, to which we can add not a single verse.

Read More: The Return Of A King

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

A Guide For Getting Laid At Anime Conventions

June 23, 2014 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

Do you remember watching Dragon Ball Z as a young teenager? That is a scenario that many of us have gone through our youth. We would watch stylized cartoons from Japan as young children. Many of those children grew up and still wanted to enjoy cartoons of that nature as an adult. Some of those people decided to make conventions based on this premise (take a comic book convention but with the premise of Asiatic pop culture). These conventions aren't necessarily about the cartoons but the subcultures that it spawns.

The average convention goer is most likely the reverse of what you expect from a nerd convention. The skinny lanky nerd and his buddy the obese manchild are still going to conventions. They will be there giving presentations, but a whole new breed of people is in to anime.

This new breed is young attractive women with mental issues. Women have jumped on to the anime bandwagon. Most of them joined because they're the second tier of attractive women. They can't compete with the front runners because of a flaw or two (they might have the body but the nose is way too big). These women would be considered Bargain Bin to regular society. However, to anime loving nerds, these are the new 9's and 10's for the anime world. Women love it, because they have a ton of beta orbiters and some creepy omegas. They get to rule over and be the queens of anime conventions. I decoded the code for an alpha guy to go to these conventions and make that second string duchess bow down to your manliness.

Location

Not all anime conventions are made equally. The ones with the most participants usually have the better quality women. No chick is going to wear 5-inch heels and squeeze her ass in a corset for 50 neckbearded manchildren, but she will do it for 5,000 neckbeared manchildren. The smaller conventions attract the typical manchild and their female equivalent. I went to one of those small conventions and a dude in a dress was trying to hit on me. Go for the bigger conventions because the prettier girls will be there.

The next aspect of these conventions is lodging. Location is incredibly important for maximum efficiency. A hotel room that is a 10 minute walk or less is extremely preferable. In fact, if you want to, registering months before gets you the best deals and the best locations. Many conventions are host to college-like parties and having a bed nearby can be the difference of a bang or not. This is one aspect that you can't skimp on at all. It's easy to rationalize a fun night at the convention center with her vs taking a 40 minute drive back to your place.

Where to go

Most conventions on a bigger scale have a multitude of things to do. You can go play some imported SNES games or stay in some dark room watching VHS era fansubs. Most of it is actually counterproductive to getting a bang however. The places to go are not uniform as all anime conventions aren't alike but I will list the do's and don'ts. Specifically, stating the reason in a small sentence for those new to the anime convention game.

Don't…

- Most panels. These are mostly garbage and highly misleading. Most of the panels are run by beta's and transgender freaks. Some of them include buying body pillows and omega sex toys. Others include LGBT representation.
- Video game room. No quality ladies in there whatsoever. Also, the body odor is worse than a century old carcass.
- Burlesque and adult-themed shows. Most of these are populated by unattractive and disgusting women. You can't call them out on it because of the "harassment" policies made by white knights for anime conventions. Spend your time somewhere else.
- Video rooms. Mostly filled with obese neckbeards and mangina white knights. There are some exceptions but it's not worth the effort.

Do's…

- Dealers Room. This is a must. Imagine a place where you can day game all you want. Women are known to spend big bucks here. So they spend a lot of time in the dealers room. This is the venue to day game.
- Events focusing on Lolita. Lolita is a sub culture of Japanese fashion relating to a mixture of British Victorian fashion and Japanese fashion. Most women in this subculture are thin because Japanese companies don't cater to landwhales. These clothes are also extremely expensive usually meaning that these women have a rich daddy or a male sponsor. This combine with the fact that most of these women are more likely to have a personality disorder other than autism. If a woman is in to this culture she must keep thin and must be in to looking good. A great requisition for a bang.

- Raves. Imagine a nightclub filled with almost all betas and at least 20 percent of the women there are bangable. This is nightclub game for toddlers. The sharks of a normal nightclub are replaced by clown fish. Just make sure to card the girl because many under 18's love to get an older man from these sorts of events.

You're at the convention center and you notice scantily clad women in tight clothing. You think they might be hired guns to market body pillows. You don't know what to say or act. This is a common scenario for people going to game at conventions of that sort. Instead of spending 3000-5000 words writing a Tolkien length guide on this, I will write about the personalities that go to anime conventions and their backgrounds.

Types of females

Cosplay Girl

These women are dressed up as animated characters out in public. Most of them spend hundreds of hours to get the details down right. They also have to make sure their diet is right and everything matches. This type of woman is slightly smarter than the average American bar-fly. She can talk about more complicated subjects, but it comes at a price. There is a high chance that an attractive women walking around half naked at a convention center is mentally ill. I can ascertain that a lot of the famous cosplayers have personality disorders like borderline and narcissisism. Generally this is noticeable through things like cut marks, daddy issues, eating disorders and a lot of them are in to hard drugs. These "nerd" girls have the same problems as the average American girl. They are just slightly more intelligent and have lower self-esteem.

Game Tips: These women are constantly getting hit on by omega males. If you want to get her attention, ask for a photo. Don't hover-hand and have some witty banter. These chicks can appreciate alpha behavior. They're in a den of beta and omega males. A reasonably sane attractive man who takes care of himself and doesn't have mental disorders will do well. Just remember to have a separation plan. These chicks will do something rash if they perceived being wronged.

Landwhale

These are the main species of women at anime conventions. They're the thirstiest women in existence. These women require no game whatsoever but doing fat chicks lowers your reputation a lot if you want to be with the skinnier hotter cosplay women. You need to not let their advances succeed. The attractive girls will think something is mentally wrong with you if you slept with a hippo. Also, note that these are the chicks who publicly complain about "sexual harassment" because only creepy ugly men would give them the time of day. Even at the anime conventions themselves.

Game Tips: If you're enough of a degenerate to have sex with a landwhale from an anime convention, wrap it up. They are not the types to take care of their innards including the part you want access to. Vagisil and antibiotic's aren't a miracle cure for jumping in to the garbage dump of a vagina.

Crossplay

These aren’t women at all but I will tag them as such just because this is the type of degeneracy you will see at anime conventions. Many in the anime community allow transgendered freaks to parade around as women. Some of these people even go as far as try to pretend to be female anime characters. The anime community tends to say they’re more open minded, but if you call out a freak in a dress, expect all the neckbeards, white knights and fat chicks to explode with anger. All you need to do is say no and go on to the next.

Game Tips: ROK isn’t a homosexual blog. Go to Jezebel, Slate, or The Atlantic if you want tips on how to sleep with men.

Types of men

Fat Neckbeards

These are the mostly stereotyped males who go to an anime convention. They're fat, usually not into hygiene and have a multitude of social problems. Generally, these men will only offend through the olfactory gland. I can't state enough how smelly the overweight neckbeards are at anime clubs. It is probably illegal under the Geneva Convention to allow these men in the same room as POWS. These men are also white knights but aren't of the active kind. They just want to eat their fried foods and stock up on body pillows. Compared to all the types of men at anime conventions, these are the most benign.

White Knights

They’re quite similar to the neckbeard but more virulent. The white knight is fat but not as morbidly obese as the neckbeard. The neckbeard wants to sit in the videogame or video room most of the convention. The white knight has more energy to walk around. They will beta orbit the hottie even if she publicly calls them losers in front of their face. White knights and ugly fat chicks are the ones to be on guard of. They will do anything to stop a player from scoring, even by spreading horrendous false rumors. You may have compassion for the fat neckbeard, but I would give none whatsoever for white knights who want to impede your goals. They also tend to smell but that’s the least offensive thing about them.

Con Security/Con Staff

Con security/staff is a cheap excuse for the convention community not to hire actual staff. These are white knights with power. While you're trying to score pussy based on game, these men tend to try to use their miniscule authority to try to score. If they can't score, they will use any method to white knight possible, including following around the hot cosplayers trying to show you their authority. As a person who has known con security, these people are mostly dimwits who shouldn't hold any power at all. I'm not saying all people are bad on this position but you really have to keep an eye on them. These people will use their wraith to score pussy. These are the ultimate Machiavellianist in existence. Some are chasing for the pussy and the other to white-knight. A hellish combo.

Going back home

The convention ended and you're on your way back. You were able to get some notches but feminists have taken notice. They are writing articles like this about "consent". The undesirables of society (fat chicks, manchildren, ugly women) are trying to keep anime conventions in the domain of blue pillers. Anime conventions will always try to shut us redpillers out but if we start to invade, and remain stealth about it, they can't do anything. I hope I see more members of ROK at anime conventions. Cosplay chicks are sick of betas and need some alpha's to come to the conventions and satisfy their sexual needs.

Read More: 5 Dating Conventions That Women Killed

---

redpiller1985

Redpiller1985 is a dude who has been taught the red pill thanks to the greats like Roosh, El mech, and many countless other RVF contributors. Here is his twitter, if you have any questions or comments to send to him. Send a Twitter direct message if you want to talk about using my services to promote redpill ideas.

Is The Manosphere Having An Effect Upon Modern Society?

June 23, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

There is a lot of media buzz going on in regards to the manosphere. This is in part due to the Elliot Rodger shootings and in general because word has slowly spread, such that mainstream news outlets including The Washington Post and Daily Mail have started mentioning redpill, PUA, game, and the manosphere in general, as well as specifically mentioning Return Of Kings and Roosh.

I will take it upon myself to write some sort of clarification. I will avoid engaging in a negative intellectual blow-by-blow debate, since that is not in the spirit of 'red pill'. The best battle is one that is never fought, and thus I will instead provide a general direction to our philosophy, before it gets swamped with media outrage and ridiculous distortions.

Manosphere

The general emphasis is a positive one in which men exchange information, largely based on personal experiences. They encourage one another to focus on self-improvement. Of course from time to time there may be articles with a more critical or negative tone, but the most appreciated content encourages men to own their 'shit'.

The manosphere has grown up for the simple reason that the mass media is largely swamped with articles focused on the consumerist culture. There have in the past been other social movements that compare to the manosphere. For example in the 1980s, heavy metal music began in underground scenes and became very popular, because people (myself included) were fed up with cheesy synth pop. They wanted artists that could actually write and play. In the 1990s electronic dance music burst onto the scene with massive underground parties (many of which I attended), for the simple reason that people wanted to dance all night long and effectively 'have a ball'. Rap music comes from the ghetto and frequently mentions hard drugs, violence, and sexist and racial slurs, yet we find Jay-Z (famous for songs like 99 Bitches), now a media darling, 'hob nobbing' with President Obama. Art or open hypocrisy?

Popular things that we take for granted today were difficult to imagine or plain offensive in the past. My local pharmacy now openly sells dildos. Their license would been revoked ten years ago. When I saw Metallica play live in 1986 with about 400 other people, I never envisioned them playing stadium tours and in fact there was a large movement initiated by Tipper Gore (wife of Al), to prevent the so called negative and satanic messages in the music. Parents were concerned and newspapers such as Daily Mail wrote ridiculous articles proclaiming the end of days, as they did when the first acid-house raves were held in the early 90s. Instead Paul Oakenfold became a superstar.

In the same way that rap music's use of the 'N' word neutralizes and vents that stigma, the main thing to understand about the manosphere is it is written in a casual and colloquial male tone. Thus to a politically correct snob, it may appear to be aggressive, misogynistic, coarse, etc. Rather it is the conversation that men have been having for centuries in bars and pubs, in regards to their jobs, friends, girlfriends, wives, etc. For example the term 'ball and chain' is a comical way a man refers to his wife, going back tens if not hundreds of years. No harm is meant by it—it simply injects a little humor (and realism) into the commitment of being the 'man of the house'.

The 1960s and 1990s had 'new age' gurus proclaiming the age of Aquarius, selling millions of tacky books, and offering useless expensive seminars that gave only a feel-good head rush. The manosphere actually gives real tools that are field tested, and in many cases there is not even a profit motive. The manosphere calls on a man to take responsibility for his life. That's hardly a negative message.

Women are allowed their ladies nights, their female-only gyms, their overtly sexual feminine magazines and their tittle tattle conversations about exes. This is the male version and it's no woman's business—period.

Red Pill

Red Pill is a term coined from the Matrix movie. This trilogy is a veritable bible of Zen Buddhist concepts, self-improvement, changing your mindset via focus and concentration, understanding reality better, and overcoming negativity. Women's magazines are chock full of watery self-development content . Whilst that might help the odd bored house wife, us males of the world need a little more red meat.

Game

With women's sexual liberation and birth control, the dating market has changed. There is little respect for the chivalrous man who wants to fall in love or settle down for the simple reason that women, especially those in their 20s and early 30s, are not thinking 'long term'. They have been repeatedly told since the 1960s that they should sleep around, that careers are more important than kids, and that divorce is as easy and common as a Starbucks run. When the paper cup is empty, don't refill it—ditch it and pick up a fresh one.

To the heart-felt young gentleman who simply wants to engage a girl with a view to his future sex-life, meeting and dating women can now be an incredibly frustrating process (see Elliot Rodger). Everything young men have been told in regards to wooing a potential mate is patently wrong. There is no need to impress a girl with your status and wealth if she is not interested in marriage in the first place and simply wants a fun night out (and a damn good fuck afterwards).

The "Pick-up Artist"

Enter the pickup artist. He simply employs fun, focused, empowering and male orientated leadership techniques to wow the girls (and get them into bed). Welcome to the 21st century. Unfortunately you cannot tell women to have their sexual freedom and get their jollies on, then expect men to ponce about like Victorian gentlemen going down on bended knee with a diamond ring. Someone had the bright idea to tell girls to forget about kids and family, go out and get laid, behave more like men and hammer into higher education and careers. The real men have responded accordingly, understanding that there are clear differences, mentally, physically, emotionally and sexually (doh!) between males and females, regardless of their financial status or occupation. Apples and oranges are not equal (but they can still taste good together in a smoothie).

Fifty years ago, ladies and gentlemen would court each other for some extended period of time before the man pronouncing his undying love would offer her a sparkly fragment of polished compressed carbon as confirmation of this fact. He'd then wait another few months ~~to get laid~~ to get married. Today you buy her a mojito and then invite yourself back to her place, doing your damnedest to ditch her chubby friend, or failing that, simply angle for a threesome.

Whether you bother to exchange phone numbers or even first names is entirely optional. After sharing bodily juices, while realizing her mattress is not as comfortable as your own, you make a quick escape before dawn. Seeing each other again is unlikely and she's just as grateful for avoiding your parrot cage and hungover breath as you are not to see her without makeup. For that single night you will forever be Brad and Angelina.

Some people call this progress—I just call it the modern 'hook-up' culture. Red pill and most specifically PUA doesn't necessarily make judgments about what is right or wrong. Rather, it embraces the situation and puts it to the best advantage. If a man cannot find himself a sexual partner with a diamond ring, he can most certainly find one with pickup techniques. Babies are no longer in the picture so it's only about having some fucking pleasure, both literally and metaphorically.

Whores And Players

Many men lament the fact that true love is dead. They wonder how on earth they might be able to have children, much less hold down a proper wife and household, but they take the attitude that while the music is playing, keep on dancing.

I don't known what you call a woman that fucks around simply for free drinks or the head rush of a minor social validation, but in the past she was called a whore. These days it's most certainly nigh impossible to find a true lady who wants to court for months on end with a view to wed a gentleman. No sir, she'd rather have a cocktail and quick fuck. She needs to get some sleep as she has a business meeting in the morning.

I don't know what you call a man who's slept with hundreds of women. I most certainly do know that any man who says he wouldn't envy doing that is a liar. Most females are willing and able to ride the cock carousel, so today any man can become a player. If whores would like to find a more flattering term for themselves they are most certainly welcome to try. However, since women always angle for benefits in return for sex, unless they are true ladies looking to wed, they are whores to some extent. It's just the cold hard reality of sexual liberation. If the manosphere isn't the next underground movement to hit the stadium circuit tour, swinger parties might well be. At orgies, men and women are more or less sexually equal, albeit corrupted in a mating frenzy more suited to insects or rodents.

What is probably most misunderstood in the mass media is that players love women. They respect their choices to sleep around, pay their own rent and follow a professional career path. Yes sir. No one wants to get married and have kids, that's far too much hard work. Our selfish divorcee, baby boomer parents educated us well in that department.

What we dislike is the politically correct attitudes that seem to favor certain groups and point the finger at men. If we are all equals then let's shut the fuck up and get on with being equals. At this point in history, women, gay/trans men, lesbians, and people from different religious and ethic groups have as much equality and rights as anyone else. No one can point the finger at anyone, least of all red-blooded men behaving as men have done for centuries. The jury is out on whether open homosexuality causes a decline in civilization, but historical parallels from Greece and Rome don't bode well. Let's hope we don't have to learn the same lessons they did.

For better or for worse, drunk or sober, in condom or without, till dawn do us part.

The only ones that bite it are the children who long for a stable biological family unit with two active parents. Family is like a loaded gun in a monkey cage—someone is bound to get wounded. These days, egoists mistakenly called adults have selected children to take the hit. Grown men and women do not make sacrifices to grow old and raise kids together—they get plastic surgery and carry on the ~~fucking~~ dating frenzy. Kids can manage on their own. Well most can—some go on shooting sprees, others just quietly slit their wrists.

What becomes of society remains to be seen. The 2006 movie Idiocracy seems particularly prophetic and that is what the manosphere tries to caution against. Far from a negative social force, it's educating men in navigating the murky waters of loose sexual morals, telling them to become better men and better social engineers, teaching them how to get laid when diamond rings are laughable, when women are focused on ~~bed hopping~~ career paths and divorce laws are heavily stacked against men.

Most of all and what probably scares the politically correct crowd about the manosphere, is young men and even 40+ men such as myself are breaking free of the dogma of being emotionally blackmailed into 'doing what they are told'. Just as the heavy metal, acid house and rap scenes threatened the powers that be, so too are young people everywhere coming together to find their own way in the mess we call the modern era. You only have to look back 20 years to see what a joke the 'modern era' always is and how youthful, underground movements slowly rise up and improve everyone's existence.

> "It has been written
> Those who have the youth
> Have the future
> So come now, children of the beast

> Be strong
> And Shout at the Devil”

Read Next: 8 Ways The Manosphere Changed My Views

The American Dream Is Every Man’s Nightmare

June 24, 2014 | by Brian Logan | Link | Original Link

The American dream. A house in the suburbs, two children, two cars, and maybe a family dog. It’s the image that’s been seared into the American consciousness via countless television shows: Happy Days, Leave it to Beaver, etc. The desire continues to run strong in the American landscape. Anybody who has married friends can attest to this. Eventually, it’s out of the bachelor pad and into a suburban home with a manicured lawn. That’s where you’ll raise your future family and continue the tradition that was born in the aftermath of World War 2, when a swarm of GIs returned stateside.

Over the years, I’ve noticed that this dream is not important to American men. Most guys are content to get the most bang for their buck, whether that means living in an apartment complex, renting a room from a friend, or buying a cheap piece of land in the country. In over forty years, I never met a man that actually dreamed of owning a home in the suburbs.

This desire—to own a suburban home—is a female one. In short, it’s her American dream. While there are some exceptions to this rule (like 1%), this is by and large the case. American women dream of a future life in an affluent suburb. This raises some questions that all American men, particularly younger ones, should consider.

How will you pay for HER American dream? Can you really afford it?

If you do a cursory review of the numbers, you'll see the Mount Everest you're being asked to climb. And you don't need a PHD in Mathematics to figure out that it's too expensive to pay for a woman's "American Dream."

Disagree with me? Well, let's break down the numbers then…

1.. The cost of an average American home is $337,300; this requires a down payment of $67,460, and a $1400/month mortgage payment for the next 30 years.

In January of 2014, the average cost of a home in the US was sitting at a hefty $337,300.

So how will you afford this?

Well, first comes the down payment. As many homeowners know, it's recommended to put 20% down on a property. Anything lower than this comes with a slew of added costs and stipulations (such as PMI payments, limitations to the amount you can borrow, etc.). So 20% is the prudent move.

Well, 20% of $337,300 is a whopping $67,460. I repeat, $67, 460!

Do you have $67,460 in your savings account? Does she have that money?

Most Americans don't—not even close. In actuality, most young American men and women are entering their mid-twenties swamped with college loan debt. They've been scraping by for the last four to six years. They've been eating Top Ramen and soda crackers. They don't have $70,000 just lying around the house. If anything, they have $70,000 of debt—each.

But American wife doesn't care. She must have HER dream, regardless of the damage it produces.

So she'll look to borrow the down payment money from a family member—or, she'll pressure you to borrow it from your family. This is quite common. However, this trend is on the decline. A weakened economy is reducing the wealth of the average American, and fewer older parents have $70,000 to part with.

But let's just say, for the sake of argument, that you manage to get the $67,460 down payment. You secure a generous gift from Uncle Joe, who has dementia and two months left to live.

You put $67,460 down on a house worth $337,300—the loan with be roughly $269,840 when you get the keys to move in. Now, the current interest rate on a thirty year fixed income is 4.3%. If you go to bankrate.com, you can calculate the following numbers yourself. You'll find that a 30 year mortgage at 4.3%, on a total payment of $269, 840, comes out to $1,367.24 a month. Roughly $1400 a month.

It's more than you want to spend. But you drink a beer, she sucks your dick, and all is forgotten for the moment. But now comes stage two….

2. The house needs to be remodeled and a new car needs to be purchased. You're now paying roughly $2,000/month

Do you think your old couch from college, the one you're perfectly fine with, will suffice? You silly child. The entire inside of the house needs to be remodeled (even though fewer friends seem to visit you these days). The list here can get quite long: sofas, flat screen televisions, dining room tables, hardwood floors, new beds, kitchen remodeling, retiling of the bathroom, backyard pool and accompanying jacuzzi, garden landscaping, etc.

What's the cost for all this? Well, there's not an official number, but let's just say it's pricey. Many couples take out a second mortgage to pay for it. Others will put the tab on the credit card. I personally know of one couple who spent $150,000 to remodel their house. We can say, conservatively, that the new modifications for the home will cost an extra $300 a month.

Also, a new car (or cars) needs to be purchased. She can't be seen in a subpar vehicle. You wouldn't want her to endure that, would you? So you pay $10,000 more than you normally would to please her escalating ego. Purchasing a quality vehicle, of course, comes with a hefty monthly payment. Let's be conservative and say another $300 a month, on top of the second mortgage you took out for the remodeling.

So remember that $1,400 a month you were paying? Well, with the remodeling costs, along with the new vehicle, add another $600 a month to the bill.

You're now paying $2,000 a month.

You're growing more uncomfortable with this. It's more than you wanted to spend. You notice that you've recently developed acid reflux. Also, clumps of your hair have been collecting in the shower drain. And you're starting to drink earlier in the day. But here comes stage three. She tells you she's pregnant.

3. Having two children will cost another $2,000 a month; you're now paying $4,000 a month

She wants to have two children—a boy and a girl. However, now that your finances are imploding before your eyes, you're having second thoughts.

How much is this going to cost, anyway?

A recent article by Parenting.com, entitled "The Cost of Raising a Baby" breaks the news to us: "the average middle-income family will spend roughly $12,000 on child-related expenses in their baby's first year of life. By age two, parents are up to more than $12,500 per year." This cost does not diminish, but stays pretty consistent. Wisegeek.org chips in with, "it costs almost $200,000 US Dollars (USD) to raise a child from birth to age 18." $12,000 a year comes out to an extra $1,000 a month. So, if you have two children, that's an extra $2,000 to add to the mix.

That's $4,000 a month to buy HER American dream: a suburban home, remodeling, new transportation, and two children. I repeat, $4,000 a month!

At this point, you're contemplating divorce, suicide, or murder. She calls you off the ledge by assuring you, "We can do this together!" You live another day. Your mantra becomes that of Boxer the horse, in Orwell's Animal Farm—"I will work harder."

4. Spoiler Alert!

How much do you need to make to pay for all this? Well, more than $75,000 a year. The website, my360.com, states this point blank in their article, "You Cannot Afford a $350,000 Home with a $75,000 Household Income!"

And there's the rub. You see, the average American household, I repeat, household, only makes $50, 502 a year. So, if you're an average American family, you're still $25,000 short, at a minimum, from owning a piece of the American dream. HER American dream.

Summary

Financially, the "American Dream" is a man's nightmare. It's far too expensive. So it's best to circumvent the whole thing by not even dating an American woman with the intention of marriage.

Remember that bad financial decisions affect the trajectory of your life. Money provides opportunities: to travel, to invest, and more importantly, to fund YOUR dreams. If you squander all your income on a suburban house, your dreams will be like that song from Kansas—"Dust in the Wind."

Please forward this article to all the young men you know. Lord knows, they won't hear about it in their Economics 101 course.

Read More: Your Parents Were Middle Class Because Of The Soviet Union

Brian Logan
Brian Logan is a writer that spends more than half of the year traveling abroad. He believes in self-improvement via hard work, reason, and creativity. And oh yeah, he has a thing for hot Latinas that know how to cook.

20 Common Sense Tips On Learning Your First Second Language

June 24, 2014 | by darkjohanson | Link | Original Link

If you are committed to moving away from your country, at some point in life chances are you will have to speak a language that's not your own: Spanish, Portuguese, Russian, you name it. Here are a few tips to help you on your quest of learning a second language…

1. Figure out the reasons why you want to learn the language and write them down at the beginning of your notebook. This will help to keep you focused when you lose direction later on.

2. Choose carefully the learning method of your choice (an online course, a book, a university class) and stick to it for at least 3 months. Don't be that kid that complaining about his gym training program not working after 2 weeks working out.

3. Practice at least 30 min a day: it could be spent reading online, working on grammar, and speaking over Skype or in person.

Beginner level

4. Work on the basics to get you started, like asking for things (Where is X?, How much does Y cost?, Ordering food/drinks), and describing attributes (numbers, colors, sizes, good/bad, funny/sad, tasty/plain). There are some popular phrases available for translation from English to a gajillion different languages here.

5. Learn basic vocabulary and expressions. For translations, try Wordreference or Google translate. If you need to figure out how to pronounce a word, give Forvo a try; if you are struggling to find the right word to translate from English to your second language, it's always useful to try with synonyms you can find in Thesaurus or define the words you want to translate in order to make sure it's exactly the one you want in The Free Dictionary. Once you feel like taking a challenge, start reading simple children books in your second language. For example, for Russian children's books I found in Goodreads the following list here.

Writing

6. Start with short and simple sentences and go through them with your language buddy/teacher. Tangentially, when doubting between two different but similar expressions, I always do a google search of both and see which one gets more results (remember to search with the quotation marks so that the exact sentence will be looked for e.g. "sentence I am looking for".)

7. Do a few Duolingo tests. Duolingo is a website that offers free courses online for Spanish, French, Italian, German and Portuguese, which in practice consists of gamified tests involving translating words (e.g., English to Portuguese), writing down what you hear in audio clips and more. It's quite addictive and particularly great when you have spent some time without practicing a language and you need to get in the mindset.

Oral communication

8. Find a language buddy. In case you are not familiar with the concept, he or she will be willing to help you with their native language in exchange for one of yours. You can meet a few times a week and have some conversation. Making a quick search for "language buddy communities" can land you some interesting sites. I did a few searches for different European cities and languages and this one seemed the most active. You can of course skype a language buddy, but I would use this as a last resort: you wouldn't want weird noises or connection problems on top of the already existing difficulties of learning a language.

9. Focus on the vibe of the message you are trying to get across without over-relying on immaculate grammar use.

10. Start with simple ideas. Don't jump in with complex discussions about the meaning of life. Focus on media (movies, TV series), travels and hobbies. E.g. 'I saw a movie and it had these situations', 'I will travel to Bombay next month and I am really excited to see…', 'I really like to cook this and that plate', 'This weekend I went out and something unexpected/funny happened'.

If you are absolutely clueless, for your first session I would prepare some information about your background: 'I come from X country and I came here because Y and Z.' or 'What I like the most is…'. Ask your buddy some general questions and have maybe one small story to tell. The point of conversation sessions with your buddy is not to run a script you have prepared beforehand, but for your first time it may help things flow. But have that as a backup, because you want to try and let the conversation develop naturally—to get 'lost' speaking the language. If you are living abroad, do not hesitate to ask for advice on night venues—you might discover one or two new spots.

11. Make clear you are happy to be corrected and don't get annoyed if you end up being wrong most of the time. You are learning and stumbling through it is just part of the process.

12. When unsure about how to phrase a sentence, don't be afraid to ask. For example, "How do I pronounce Obrigado?", "How would you say <expression in English> in Portuguese?" (extra points if you ask these questions in Portuguese e.g. 'Tão pronunciada Obrigado?' or 'Como se diz <expression>?'). It's good to ask when stuck or curious, but don't fall in the temptation of turning the conversation into a discussion of grammar. Find the balance between learning and actually talking.

Intermediate level

13. Tackle abstract topics like philosophy and emotions. Try to tell stories.

14. Once you feel like you grasp most of the words and meaning in simple books, start reading internet forums and news articles.

15. Learn useful phrases a native person uses frequently and include them to your repertoire. Even at the first steps of learning a language, these phrases help you blend in a bit better, making your conversations feel more fluid and natural.

16. Listen to songs in the second language and go through the lyrics. Music tends to help significantly remembering words and expressions.

Advance level

17. Learn to tell a few jokes. By this level you should be able to understand spoken language seamlessly (TV shows, movies, two people talking in the street) and also literature (starting with contemporary and advancing slowly towards classics from decades ago). To follow up with the Russian example: Russian school curriculum literature looks like a good place to start.

Final remarks

18. Whenever motivation falters, visualize your goal, whether it be moving away, communicating better with local girls, or pursuing business opportunities. If all else fails, think what you have been through already. Remember where you began and where you stand today.

19. Book a trip to a country where you can practice your skills with the locals. Reap the advantages of showcasing your interest in their culture, which sometimes will help tremendously in building a connection. I'm not saying it will automatically get you laid, but it certainly helps certain situations.

20. Check your ego at the door. You are learning and your first couple of attempts will suck, like how you wouldn't attempt to deadlift 500 lbs off the floor on your first day in the gym. This is a marathon, not a sprint, so accept that progress comes slowly.

Read More: 15 More Language Learning Tips For Self-Study

---

darkjohanson

Darkjohanson is a man destined to learn the fine art of pulling girls sober in an alcoholic country. Detractor of 'smart' phones, social media and porn.

Women Fight For Attention On Facebook Like They're In A War

June 25, 2014 | by Kilmister | Link | Original Link

Facebook is without question one of the most revolutionary and significant creations of the 21st century. It has produced an information and social platform unlike anything we have seen since the invention of the television and the internet itself. The capability to reach billions of people around the globe in an instant. A platform to share important information and facts that otherwise may not receive the attention it ought to. The wonderful ability to reconnect or maintain relationships with distant friends or family. So leave it to women to take this remarkable invention and turn it into a tool for their narcissism and attention-grabbing needs. Women have the innate ability to make everything about them. The reverse 'Midas touch', if you will. Everything they touch turns to shit.

It is literally impossible to scroll through any Facebook feed and not be bombarded with selfies, pity me/look at me statuses and pathetic cries for attention from half the women in your friend list. Let me also say that yes, men can be just as bad. I have a couple males in my feed that post as much, or more, ridiculous trash than any women. But let's be honest here—there really is no comparison. Let's discuss some of the classic attention grabs we all see and what they actually mean.

Excessive Selfies

Probably the most obvious violation. A selfie or two for your profile pic—no big deal. But we all have those chicks that just need to affirm their desirability on almost a daily basis with yet another selfie. It is so contrived and non-spontaneous. We get it, you don't like yourself very much. You need constant reminders that someone thinks you are "so pretty" or "looking hot, girl." It is an incredible turnoff and an enormous red flag for anyone that would consider dating you. You are needy and will never be able to get enough affirmation to satisfy you.

Some take it further than others with gratuitous selfies scantily clad in the mirror, usually accompanied by a slutty expression on their face, basically just screaming “Please, someone tell me I am hot or I won’t sleep tonight!” Later on she probably will hit the club and guzzle down Vegas Bombs until she wakes up in yet another stranger’s bed. More than anything it is sad. Narcissism isn’t always for those with high self-esteem after all. Usually quite the opposite.

The “accidental” cleavage or ass shot is sadly obvious when you see it. “Check out my new necklace” is the caption, as it just so happens to be an overhead shot of it hanging around her neck while she is wearing a push-up bra in a tank top, virtually strangling herself with her own boobs. Yeah, you wanted to show us your necklace. “Love my new bathing suit!” Cue the ass in the bathroom mirror. Not obvious at all. Unfortunately blue-pillers will always be there to provide the comment fuel she needs, only perpetuating the problem.

Status Abuse

You have seen it, we all have. The pity me or awkwardly boasting status update. Usually quite cryptic in order to lure empathetic inquires and comments. Examples similar to:

“Some days you can’t win, I should just give up.”

“Why do I bother, I will just stay in bed all day.”

“Sick again, why me?”

Boo fucking hoo. We all have problems and bad days. However we don’t all feel the need to share it with the world and seek sympathy from the masses. It’s just another attention grab and it’s pathetic they need to go there.

Just as bad are the overly enthusiastic, “be jealous of me”-type statuses. Such as:

“I have the best life, I am so lucky”

“I never imagined I could be so happy.”

“Today was amazing, I have the best boyfriend ever, so blessed.”

Nobody gives a shit. They are simply just trying to win the endless competition they have with other females for who has the better life.

Relationship Wars

This brings me to another favorite. As noted, all of these things are for two reasons: attention and competition. Women are constantly competing with each other for attention and when it comes to their relationships, all bets are off. This includes regular photos of the happy couple on vacation, in their new house, or with the flowers she got for her birthday, and updates that say something along the lines of, “My boyfriend loves me so much.” It’s code for “Ha ha, my relationship is better than yours.”

These are things I personally believe should be left private between a couple.If she is going to do that, she should also tell us when she got busted sexting her co-worker. All her girlfriends will try to subtlety one-up with their own posts. Oddly enough, they feel obligated to ‘like’ each other’s garbage because they don’t want to appear envious, and they want her to reciprocate the ‘like’ when it is their own turn. I personally have witnessed women make their men re-create spontaneous moments so they could get a picture and post it on Facebook. Pathetic, to say the least. If she gets engaged, forget about it—before she even calls her mom she had 5 pictures of the ring on Facebook. A sad and predictable game with no real winners.

Agenda Of The Day

Facebook is also a great place to put on display your philosophical principles. Chicks love to do this. Problem is, their philosophies change like the trade winds here in Hawaii. Whatever will fits their agenda for that day and makes them seem as deep and introspective as possible is what they will represent, even though in reality they don't live by any of these credos. When they want a boyfriend, they preach moral fiber. When they want to be the party girl, they preach individualism.

For example, just the other day I read a meme—those pictures of something like a rainbow with some deep analytic quote scrawled across it—basically saying that women need to stop posting so many selfies and start being appreciated for their soul, not their looks. The same female proclaimed that she wasn't going to wear make-up anymore and how liberating it was. First, half her pictures are her sticking out her big ass and tongue simultaneously. In bars, in clubs, and at the beach, all in her tiny bikini. Second, only a couple days later there she was again in full slut regalia, and plenty of make-up, at a club dry humping another female. So much for that cause, I guess.

Wannabe Facebook Celebrities

Let me save the absolute worst for last. Personally I won't allow these women in my feed, but we all know the kind. The woman with several thousand friends and a page covered with nothing but half naked 'modeling' pictures. This is her claim to fame. Thousands of lonely men that shower her every photo with compliments hoping just to get one reply. I mean who knows, maybe she will fuck one of them if they comment on enough pictures, right? All she wanted to be in life was to be famous, no matter what it takes. Even if "social media slut" is the lowest form of fame there is. Often they are not even very attractive, which is why they can't be real models. Congratulations, you achieved every little girl's dream of being drooled over by men on Facebook who haven't seen pussy since they came out of one. Imagine if desperation only paid the rent.

Summary

We all know Facebook is a stage, and nobody is as happy or well-off as they appear. It's a big game for the self-loathers and wannabes. Cut the shit, and just start saying what you mean. "Tell me I am pretty," "Compliment my tits," "Tell me you are jealous of my unhappy relationship," "Make me feel like a celebrity." I think we would respect that more than the current game of Facebook chess, where you pretend your tits just happened to be in the shot and we pretend we didn't know that was the plan all along. That would actually be refreshing.

Read More: Has Female Attention Whoring Finally Reached It's Peak?

Kilmister
Host of the 100 Proof Truth Podcast, spreading truth in the dynamics of relationships between men and women, in particular exposing the hypocrisy and entitlement of the modern American women. Follow him on Twitter and Facebook

3 Things I Observed On My Manosphere Hiatus

June 25, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Sometimes our best insights are gleaned when we step back from a state of hard focus. I haven't written at ROK in the last few weeks due to a combination of writing burnout, work responsibilities, and wanting to concentrate on other ventures. I adopted a regimen of bare-bones involvement, keeping up with ROK and a few select blogs over that time. Once you step away from the daily inundation of information, electronic or otherwise, here are a few things you may tend to notice even more readily than when you are plugged into the network:

1. People tend to take everything at face value

Though our detractors would paint ROK and this movement in general as a monolithic echo chamber, my hiatus took me away from the often heated and intense debate of ideas that exists on ROK, on RVF, and on many similar blogs. In many cases an idea will be roundly explored from a number of positions and summarily discarded if it doesn't pass the smell test. After many discussions with people who blindly accept the normal life path, the most striking thing is that you ask them "why" and they don't seem to have an answer. Of course we knew this already, but it took unplugging a bit from the manosphere to demonstrate the huge percentage of people who are still unwilling to question orthodoxy. It seems that, indeed, man's natural state is slavery, and freedom is paradoxically a constant struggle to maintain.

2. The vast majority of people are inherently self-sabotaging

In the occasionally navel-gazing practice of reading and thinking about your own self-improvement, you often neglect to observe what actions others are taking. Pitiful examples are everywhere: men are poorly dressed on the subway and at the bar. Girls self-handicap with piercings, tattoos, and poor clothing that detracts from their natural gifts and makes people take them less seriously. If you want to reaffirm your commitment to yourself, spend a few weeks observing automatons shuffling to jobs that make them deeply unhappy simply because they are afraid of uncertainty. Watching others corkscrew further into misery was a much-needed reminder of the dangers of complacency.

3. Feminism just doesn't affect my day-to-day life very much

I've read so many well-written articles here and elsewhere about the ills of feminism in our society that I, admittedly, probably pay it more mind than necessary. Despite living in one of North America's strongest bastions of liberal feminism, stepping back from writing allowed me to better enjoy a reality that they have trouble penetrating. By creating a life of masculine hobbies like martial arts, weightlifting, and reading, along with not reading the news and limiting my interactions with women who self-identify as feminists, I've severely cut down on the day-to-day impact of feminism on my life. Once in a while I'll approach a girl who can't wait to talk about "social justice" and "rape culture," but in those cases I simply don't call her back. The ethos still pervades society and presages longer-term insidious changes, but I'm thankful that it's difficult to see them in my everyday life.

After a few weeks of casually observing the world without the Red Pill commentary in the background, I'm ready to jump back in. As with anything, I encourage all readers to take a brief hiatus to aid in connecting the concepts you've read about to the world around you. You may be surprised with what you observe.

Read Next: The Future Of The Manosphere

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

How Oneitis Almost Wrecked My Life

June 25, 2014 | by Man in the Making | Link | Original Link

I was a jolly lad of 12 years. I had just been enrolled in a kind of fancy Christian classical/liberal arts school along with my best friend, and boy, was I pumped. As I walked into the school with my dapper new uniform and my buddies beside me, I was excited about this new experience.

I had a blast going through my day. I loved my teachers, loved my classes, and knew I was going to meet some great friends. But then came Mrs. Davis's 12:30 Latin class. It started out just like any other class, with prayer and an introduction to the course. Excited to learn about my new classmates, I listened eagerly to them tell the class their names, where they lived, and their hobbies. Then, this one girl stood up and started talking. Her name was Martha, she lived in Atlanta, and she liked dancing. She was also the prettiest girl I'd ever seen in my 12 years.

Needless to say, as I got to know her, I developed a crush. Well, a crush is an understatement. I became obsessively fixated on her for four straight years, right up until age 17. I spent two years mustering up the courage to tell her I "liked" her, got friend-zoned, and spent another two falling into depression.

I just finished my junior year in high school, and am finally proud to announce, I am a red pill male. In what follows, I'm going to detail my journey from a promising young pre-teen to a miserable young adult in the depths of darkness, and back again into the light. Hopefully my story will show you how truly horribly the disease of oneitis can destroy a man's life.

The Former Two Years

At first, my crush didn't really affect me all that much. I was 12 and my balls had barely dropped. I still vehemently denied any sort of attraction to girls, like we all did at that age. However, the seeds were planted in my mind. Between my own obsession with the girl, and the poisonous doctrines of chivalry and monogamy taught by my school, a disaster was in the making.

Shit started to hit the fan when I turned 13. At this point, my friends were also starting to vocalize their interest in the opposite sex. I did as well. Unfortunately for me, I was not in Martha's league at all. I don't really remember the social dynamics all that well, but my clique just wasn't on the same level as hers. So, while my friends actually had the ability to get the girls they liked (who were on our level), I was stuck looking up to Martha. It really wouldn't have been so bad if it weren't for the fact that I had my mind set that the only girl I could ever like was Martha. There was no way anything could change my mind. And I believed it with all my heart. You can imagine how I felt when she got a boyfriend way above my league.

Now I was 14, and I was starting to understand the ways of the world a bit better. Most of my friends have girlfriends, school's getting harder, and Martha's body is beginning to fill out (quite beautifully, I thought). I started to feel left behind. I had always been a good student, but my grades had started to slowly drift down. I wasn't really interested in hanging out with my friends that much anymore. I was bitter because they had their girlfriends, and all I had was my obsession with Martha. I found solace in video games. Along with video games came obesity. With obesity, came self-consciousness and depression. Although I have to attribute some of this to my hormones as I grew up, I do believe that my fixation on Martha had the biggest part in it. If I had simply gotten over her, I would have lived a healthy teenage life.

Then it happened—she broke up with Andy. Unfortunately for me, it was because she had gotten really religious. You have to realize that at my school, most of the students were half-assing Christianity. They would vehemently defend it in one breath, and be cursing and jacking off in the next. Therefore, when I say she got devout, I mean it. She renamed her middle name after a saint, started wearing a head covering into church, and not one foul word escaped her mouth.

Out of desperation, I finally confessed to her that I had a crush on her for the past two years. She said, "Oh, well, thanks for telling me. You're a great friend. If you ever need to discuss something, just remember I'll be here." I went home and cried like a little bitch.

The Latter Two Years

The next two years, I became almost a hundred pounds overweight, lost all of my friends to stupid arguments, and played video games. The worst part, though, was that it was all because of the fact that I was so obsessed this girl. I remember spending nights on my laptop stalking her social media and crying. Talk about a beta male, I was the very definition of it. I cringe at the thought of what I was. A decrepit, miserable chunk of lard, jacking off to video game characters and whining about how much the world sucks.

I missed so much in those two years. I had no friends. I went to no social gatherings or parties. People looked at me with disgust (and rightfully so), and I was cheating my way through school. To think that one female could do this to a man is really scary. To think of what I could have been, a football player, or a musician, or even just a normal teenager, it's quite sad.

Now, what would the mainstream, feminized media make out of my obsession for Martha? Would they look at my whole story and reel back in shock at the devastation it wrought upon my life? No, of course not. Instead, they would say that my fixation on this one girl was cute, maybe normal. That although things didn't turn out in a good way, I "remained faithful" to my love, and never turned aside, even when I got rejected. It's the stuff that makes up tragic romance movies, right?

In reality, as we see here, though, the belief of obsessive feelings for one woman is extremely dangerous. There is no nobility in this state of being– only psychological and, therefore, physical self-harm. Of course, our feminized society loves this situation– where the female is some untouchable goddess and the man is only a lowly minion who cannot get close to her, except by her own will. They encourage the lowering of males, and the raising up of females on a pedestal. This is where the manosphere gets the term "pedestalization." When I started to read about the evils of feminism, I began to realize that this is what was happening to me. Suddenly, the stories of feminists destroying Western Civilization became very personal.

Recovery

Well, it turned out that Martha wasn't going through a devout phase. I heard she wants to go to college and get a theology degree. She can go be a fucking nun for all I care, now, because I finally took the red pill on December 31st, 2013, after having read ROK and other manosphere sites for a few months prior (that's an interesting story as well, but maybe for another time).

Disgusted at the state of my body, I began to attend a local gym and research fitness. I started an intense, 12 week program and diet that pushed me to my limits and forced me to discipline myself. I fell several times—some days I didn't go to the gym, other times I binge ate, or pigged out at a restaurant. As I went on the program, I began to realize how little self-discipline I had. My motivation got the best of me, however, and forced me to get back on track whenever I fell down. I'm 208 pounds right now, and am medically considered "mildly overweight" instead of morbidly obese. I still have a little ways to go, but the bulk of the work is done.

Working out wasn't the only change I made. I began to cut down on video game time and read more books. The Great Books collection had been sitting on the shelf in my house since before I can remember, and I decided to dive in headfirst. I had never been a stupid kid, but those books really challenged me. I remember spending an hour on one page of Plato's Crito, trying to understand what the hell was going on. Right now I'm starting Marcus Aurelius's Meditations, as well as listening to an audiobook of Plutarch's Parallel Lives. Although I still do play video games, it has taken the role of a hobby rather than the center of my life.

In terms of girls, my life has also changed dramatically. After losing weight, learning game, dressing well, etc, I get more attention from girls, and guys have started to respect me more. Although I'm still a virgin due to logistical reasons (living in a Christian home does that to you), there are two girls who seem sexually interested.

Finally, I gained direction in life. When I crawled out of the mire of self-pity and misery, I was directionless. I changed that promptly. I decided that, based on all the great men I had been reading about and from in the manosphere, that I wanted to become an entrepreneur and location independent businessman. Therefore, I took the steps required to do so. I began to prepare for the SAT and finally get enthusiastic about looking at colleges. I have a very good one in mind right now, and am about to take the ACT one last time. I cringe whenever I think about the utterly emasculated creature I was only a year ago.

It is easy to see from my story, and the millions of others that are out there, that oneitis is a horrible, dangerous disease, even in something as little as a teenaged crush. It is encouraged and exalted by the media to make men into slaves who are at the mercy of women. There is, however, an antidote to this cancer—a pill of the color red. Take this pill, and you will find the disease slowly, painfully, removing itself from your body. The process will be slow and agonizing, but the reward at the end is worth it. I am still in the process of shedding off my beta shell, but I am glad and impressed at the progress I have seen so far. Don't be a little bitch. Get rid of oneitis.

Read More: The Worst Bang Of My Life

Man in the Making
MITM is a young, recovering beta who loves life. He enjoys fitness, philosophy, and almost anything else you can imagine.

5 Ways To Deal With The Ultimate Cockblock: Smartphones

June 25, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

The emergence of smartphones in our society has reached all time highs and we are all aware that it's not going anywhere. If anything, smartphone usage will continue to increase with new apps and distractions, so how does a player cope with this cockblock?

Here's 5 ways to deal with the ultimate cockblock: smartphones.

5. Increase Your Value

High Value Males (HVM) don't get ignored as much as Low Value Males (LVM). This is a fact. If you find yourself getting ignored constantly by women when in their vicinity, then you my friend, should take a look in the mirror and see what you can do to improve yourself. I remember the days when no one was on their smartphone at the club and the only real cockblocks were maybe her friends, or beta orbitors, however, that's changed. What also has changed, is that the more I have invested in myself, the smartphones become less of a cockblock.

When you roll into a club, lounge or upscale bar suited up and looking like you stepped off an ad in GQ (not due to looks, but style and swagger), girls cannot help but notice. This automatically puts you in the top 5%, sometimes 2%, in the joint. The key here is that you're increasing your value for yourself first and foremost. The more you focus on your finances, fitness, style and game, the more of a 'great catch' you become.

Trust me when I say, that women will always notice a great catch. They're tuned to seek out the men of high value and you can become one with effort and investment in yourself. This doesn't mean that women will automatically chuck their iPhones in the trash when you approach, but they might just put them away. I've had it happen multiple times, because of the boldness of my approach and how I carry myself.

4. Tap Your Fingers On Her Phone Screen

This has become my go-to method, not only as a way to eliminate the smartphone as a cockblock, but mainly for my own amusement.

Here's what you do:

Let's say that you're talking to a girl, could be on a date, or could be at the bar and you just met her and have spit some game. At some point she pulls out her phone to check (insert any useless app here). Lightly tap your fingers on her screen. You're not looking to see what she's doing, you're merely reaching over and tapping your index and middle fingers on her smartphone screen.

She could be typing, swiping or scrolling doesn't really matter, what it does, is interrupt her distraction. In essence, you distract her from her distraction. What usually happens to me is this, but women tend to be the same, so try it out:

- She laughs and puts her phone away.
- She makes a face, lightly swats my hand away and then puts her phone away.
- She says “Stoppppp” with perfect vocal fry, looks at her phone for another 3-5 seconds and then puts her phone away.

Out of the 3 most common reactions I get, what is the end result?

She puts her phone away.

Is it slightly pesty? Maybe. Do I care? Not at all. It’s pesty for her to pull her phone out constantly.

When you do this immediately after the first time, you set a precedent. You won’t be ignored. If she feels a desire to be on her phone more than spend time with you, then eject. I once dropped a girl off at a gas station because she wouldn’t get off her phone (a couple of years ago) after I told her to. She was stunned when I calmly pulled off at a gas station and told her in a calm, but firm voice to vacate my car. You might be shocked, but that didn’t make her want to stop seeing me. In fact, the next time we hung out, she didn’t pull her phone out once.

Be the boss. Lead.

3. Do The Same To Her

She won’t get off the phone? Pull yours out and catch up on ROK articles.

But here’s the key, wait until she’s put hers away (if she’s done this a couple of times while you’re talking), then ask her a question. As she starts to get into a long-winded nonsensical description about her important life, pull your phone out and just absently nod at her, as you’re typing, swiping, and scrolling.

Watch how quickly she gets offended. Feign ignorance. She’ll get the message loud and clear and it won’t be the text message you never send her.

2. Completely Ignore Her

You know the best way to handle a child throwing a fit in a store? Ignore them and walk away. Watch how quick they shut the fuck up and run after you. Women are overgrown children, so do the same.

If a woman won’t get off her phone, stop whatever you’re doing and walk away. If you’re in a car, drop her off at the your local 7-11, or turn up your music and don’t let her turn it down, until you can drop her off.

If there’s one thing women HATE, it’s being ignored. Why do you think they love social media so much? Because they can get attention 24/7 for posting a silly meme, pic of their tits, or their Wendy’s Spicy Chicken salad. If she makes no effort to apologize, or put her phone away, you never had a chance with her boring ass anyway. Eject.

1. Take Her Phone Out Of Her Hand

I call this the Connery Cockblock Move. One of the reason Sean Connery is a legend, is because of his low tolerance in letting women act up. If they do, he has his own remedy. While pulling his move will probably land you in jail, this classic move I've dubbed the Connery Cockblock Move, won't when done properly.

Here's what you do:

Susie Jo is furiously typing, swiping and scrolling on her smartphone in your presence while you're on a date, or after you've invested a few minutes into the interaction with her. Calmly but deliberately take the phone out of her hands (don't try to see what she's doing, that's not the point of this move) and say this, "Not now darling", then smile.

Then turn it off and hand it back.

Change the subject and act as if it never happened.

Here's a few reasons why this is so powerful:

-Similar to how well getting a girl's phone number works with handing her your phone for her to put her number in, in that it establish dominance and proper aggression, this move also shows her that you're the boss. Women are sexually attracted to men who don't play by the standard rules of society and men who are not afraid to put a woman in check. Despite what they might spout off about women's rights etc, their pussies get wet over this behavior.

-It shows that your time is valuable. She can either have the privilege of spending some time with you without being glued to her phone, or you will correct her. Much like a child needs to be admonished, so do women.

-It shows that you're a man who does what he wants, when he wants and he doesn't tolerate rude behavior. There are always times to pick your battles, but the reason why this works so well is because of HOW you do it. You're not mad, you're not angry, you're not yelling—you simply but firmly take her phone, say "Not now darling" in a low deep tone, and then smile. The smile softens the physical move and when done correctly it can be even played as flirting.

Lastly, remember that when women are in your domain, you make the rules. I was at a major R&B star's Hollywood Hills house party one evening and before you could come in the house, you had to hand your phone to security for them to hold on to it. While the R&B star was doing this to protect himself from getting his house and person photographed in compromising situations, perhaps he also did this because he knows the tendency for women to constantly be on their smartphones. Smart move.

Do you think one girl really complained about this rule? Hell no. Because they were in the company of a High Value Male, although I'm sure they were seething inside for not being able to get a picture with him and post on Instagram for 369 likes.

On a personal level, I incorporate this at not only in my home when a girl comes over, but also in Soft Domains. For example, when I was in Vegas this past weekend with a Vegas Hangover Experience client, we did bottle service nightly. At one point a couple of the girls jumped on their phones to take pictures of the thousands of dollars of alcohol on our table.

While I can understand this, they then proceeded to start furiously typing, swiping and scrolling on their smartphones. I promptly told them, that when you're at my table, you're dancing and partying and that this isn't a Verizon store. They laughed, put their phones away and had a great night.

I was the boss.

I led the girls.

I treated them as overgrown children.

I did it in a kind and charming way and it wasn't a big deal.

Because I am a HVM and in that particular environment, even higher due to the bottle service, they complied.

The more you develop your game and lifestyle, the easier it is to set rules and see compliance.

The most hysterical part of that specific scenario is that later on one of the girls asked me if she could text her other five girlfriends to come to the table. She said and I quote, "I wanted to ask, because I didn't know if you want more girls at your table and also I don't want you to think I'm back on my phone again". Like a child, she asked for permission and I granted it to her.

Women want to be led, feel safe and have boundaries. If men start implementing these anti-cockblocking techniques on a massive scale, then perhaps women will start putting the phone down more and start interacting like normal human beings. Probably not, but guess what you can control? Yourself. Start using these techniques and don't let a piece of plastic cockblock you again.

Are you sick and tired of not getting sex with cute girls? Go here.

Read More: 3 Deadly Strategies To Use Against Cockblockers

How To Handle Women With A Ticking Biological Clock

June 26, 2014 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

You're a man on the verge of turning 30 or perhaps several years older. You've played your cards right throughout most of your adult life. You paid your dues in your younger years by building up your career or starting your own business. You regularly hit the gym and eat properly, resulting in a better physique than the majority of men around you at the same age. You've developed the necessary conversational skills not just with women, but people in general. You're well liked and respected by your friends, family, and colleagues. Lastly, attracting women has never been easier for you at any point in your life. This phenomenon is commonly referred to as "having your shit together." It's a good feeling. You know what you've accomplished, you're proud of it, and you have no plans on slowing down anytime soon. There's just one problem, though—women around your age realize you have your shit together too.

Your life has entered the stage where the Biological Clock Ticker, or BCT, has you in her sights. These women are sketchy and you must exercise strong judgement when dealing with them. BCT's can serve a vital role in the sex life of a guy pushing 30 or older. You will get some of your easiest lays from this demographic of single women. BCT's are one of the perks of getting older. They allow you to slack a little bit in your efforts to get laid, but force you to step up your self preservation efforts at the same time. This article will focus on the type of women that can be classified as BCTs, and on the pitfalls that await should you accidentally knock one up or find yourself becoming attached in some way. By the end, you will understand their mission objective and, as a result, be cognizant of what actions to take in order to properly game them.

BCT Age Range: 28-36

When you're in your early to mid-20's, women come and go. They're happy with the arrangement. Even if you were potentially interested in something more serious with them, they would have nothing of it. You know, it's all about having fun, not getting tied down, and having a 'go with the flow' attitude. However, once women get around 28 years old, their mindset changes a bit. Women would like you to believe it's because they've matured. That's bullshit, of course—the only thing that's maturing is their bodies, and it's not the kind of maturing to get excited about either. They begin to realize their tits don't have the same perky shape they once had, their asses are a little bit droopier and wider than they used to be, and their faces are beginning to show the signs of aging. They know time is starting to run out and they need to buckle down if they hope to find something serious before there are no good options left.

So, now that you're in the same age range as the BCT's, questions about "Where do you see this going?" or "Are you looking for something serious?" start popping in the early stages of dating. My initial thought is, "Yeah, I could be open to something serious… just not with the human equivalent of a set of tires with 80,000 miles on them."

By 28 years old, a typical single woman's past looks like this: she fucked a few dudes in high school, another 10+ during her college years, and then had a series of one night stands and mini-relationships in the five or six years following graduation. This gives her a partner count somewhere between 15 and 80. Does that sound like relationship material to you? Sure it does… if a dry spell has you to the point that you would fuck the crack of dawn and the fear of never finding anything better causes you to commit. For every year past 28 you can safely add a minimum of three new partners and, sadly, that's being conservative.

Bear in mind that BTC's past the age of 36 certainly exist, but for the purposes of this article will not be discussed. Why, you may ask? Because single women over 36 can go fuck themselves—that's why.

BCT's Are Generally Career Women

They've got the corner office that you don't care about, the degrees and credentials they think will impress you, and the job title they think gives you a raging boner—you know, stuff men couldn't give two shits and a greasy fart about. Sure, on a personal level their accomplishments are commendable. I respect any person, male or female, that puts in some serious effort to make something of themselves (if it was, indeed, truly earned and not a byproduct of some sort of "effective hiring quota"). However, a woman's career has never made a man more attracted to her. In fact, when a man hears a woman talk about how she's such a pipe swinging bad-ass at the office, he will immediately wonder how long it will be until she's a complete pain in his ass if she's allowed to stick around long enough. Luckily, since she's a BCT, she won't be sticking around for very long.

These women are following the teachings of their feminist masters to a T. They lived their lives much in the same way a man would. They went to college, got educated, landed a job, started making a bit of money, established themselves, and now that they're older have decided to start a family and 'have it all'. Unfortunately, there is no such thing as 'having it all'. Most women with full-time careers coupled with the responsibilities of full-time motherhood get burnt out. Among divorced couples where both partners have a college degree, 90 percent of those divorces were filed by the woman—clearly not worth the risk. Especially, when in my personal experience, the difference between a career woman and a bartender is the career woman talks about her job for 20 minutes before she talks about Facebook and Real Housewives of Wherever-the-Fuck.

BCT's aren't always career women, but this is generally the case. Most "good girls" that are truly interested in having families and getting married do so at a younger age. Recovering party sluts and divorced women who didn't have children with their ex-husbands can certainly be classified as BCT's. Single mothers can also exhibit a lot the traits listed here as well, but single mothers are like single women over 36, and can go fuck themselves.

BCT's Ask About Your Job Or Income

BCT's want to make sure the man they're planning on locking down has a stable career with a good income. There's nothing wrong with that and it's understandable. The problem is, as previously stated, they are career women (if they're not career women then they're just gold diggers). The vast majority of these women, despite their careers, are massively ridden with debt: student loans, typical bills, and credit cards. It's no big secret that women absolutely love blowing their money on things they don't need. You know those commercials for $30 skin cream that will reduce the effects of aging by 10 years in just a couple weeks? It's not men buying that stupid shit, that's for sure.

"No problem, they have their own money", you may be saying to yourself. Wrong, it's a huge problem and here's why. There's a lot of excellent material written on the subject of hypergamy out there. However, there's also a simple explanation for women's tendency to "marry up"— they want a safety net just in case they decide they don't want to work anymore. Despite all the feminist propaganda out there, many women do not want to go back to work after they have a kid. Many women that claim to love their careers are straight-up fucking lying to you— what else are they going to say? The truth? We're talking about women here, fella's. If she openly brought up the subject of not wanting to work, yet was loaded with debt—even the most desperate men would balk at that. The fact is many women are completely miserable working for a living. So guess what? She pops out a kid and makes the unilateral decision that she's going to stay at home and there's not a fucking thing you can do about it.

So where does that leave you? Well, you know that 70 grand in student loan debt for her bachelor's and/or master's degrees? Hope you like paying off degrees that aren't yours when you could have a new Mercedes, a pimpin' boat, or just save it for retirement. Chances are also pretty damn good that her irresponsible ass deferred those student loans—compounding the interest and creating even more debt. What about that $2,000 trip to Cabo with her girlfriends that she charged on her Mastercard? Hope you like paying off a vacation you didn't go on and where she fucked men that weren't you.

On the flip side, if a woman is hellbent on going back to work, you have to question how good of a mother she would be. It really is a double-edged sword. You're either cleaning up her massive financial mess or your infant son or daughter is going to be raised by strangers at a daycare. Neither situation is ideal. In fact, both situations are pretty fucking terrible, to be quite frank.

BCT's Try To Hasten The Progress Of Your Relationship

So you slept with a BCT on your first or second time out together. You're on the third date with her when she says, "I really want an exclusive relationship." You then say to yourself, "Ha! Fuck you, lady!" I've experienced this a few times in the past couple years and it still makes me laugh… in their faces. Be very cautious when you're dealing with someone that isn't allowing your relationship to progress at a natural and organic pace—they're rushing shit for a reason. They're BCT's and they've got a schedule to keep. If you're not going to be the one that jumps at the opportunity to completely fuck up your life by getting serious with one of these women, then they're going to move right along to a guy that will.

BCT's Talk About Babies

No surprise here, but it should be mentioned. If a woman is talking about how much she wants a kid within the first couple times you're out together—be on red alert. BCT's want a baby and they want it soon. In many cases these women don't care if the man is in the picture or not. All that matters is if he can pony up the cash to support it.

Always use condoms that are provided by you and are not nearing the expiration date—settle for a blowjob if you don't have condoms. If she has condoms of her own and offers you one, then go for sex if you have time to discreetly inspect the unopened wrapper in good lighting. If that's not feasible, then just pull-out despite the fact you're wearing a condom, just to be on the safe side.

If a BCT says, "Don't worry about it, I'm on the pill." your exact thought process should be, "I need to worry about this, this bitch isn't on the pill." These women simply cannot be trusted. Make sure to take extra special precautions with this type of woman. No man wants to be on the hook for a 216 payment child mortgage in exchange for a 10 second orgasm. Don't be that guy.

The BCT Vernacular

BCT's have their own dating lingo. As is standard with women, what they say and what they really mean are generally two very different things. The following is a short list of commonly used phrases popular amongst BCT's and the translation to what they really mean.

"I've had my fun and now I'm ready to settle down."

Translation: I've been on the express train to pound town for roughly 15 years with countless men. Now that my looks are deteriorating and my family is asking me, "When are you going to find a nice guy and start a family?" I've finally decided that I will try to nail down some unfortunate son of a bitch and drain him of his resources, happiness and ultimately, his soul. Short version: I'm a whore.

"I know that I'm going to make a great mom someday."

Translation: I think being selfish, vapid, and on anti-depressants in conjunction with drunken hookups and working eight hours a day in an office environment has somehow properly prepared me to raise children.

"I'm at an age where I'm just sick of the drama."

Translation: I love drama. In fact, it turns me on and I can't live without it. The truth of the matter is that I'm really a 14 year old girl trapped in an adult woman's body. I cause all of the drama in my life because I'm a juvenile pain in the ass and I want everyone around me to know it. You, as a man, better provide me with ample amounts of drama or else you will be considered boring and I won't want to fuck you. I might marry you and have kids with you, but rest assured, I will be divorcing you down the road and taking half your shit.

"It's so hard to find a guy that's looking for a serious relationship."

Translation: I perpetually disqualify myself as relationship material through an unwillingness to clean, an inability to cook, and by being an entitled bratty bitch. I also chase men that clearly have no interest in settling down even though I clearly understand they're not serious from the onset. However, I will continue blaming men for my piss-poor decisions and will make absolutely no effort to change my ways. As a result, I will continue with the status quo of being fucked and discarded due to my actions and deficiencies.

"I'm really looking for a guy that just 'gets it'."

Translation: I'm looking for a janitor to mop up the explosive diarrhea shit-mess that I call my fucked up life.

How To Game A BTC

In my experience, the best way to get into a BCT's pants is to insinuate there's a possibility for something serious without ever actually saying it. It gives them the chance to chase you a bit and work towards roping you in. The ambiguity of the situation will drive her crazy and she'll use her vagina as a means of trying to get commitment out of you. You want her to be unsure if you're a good guy or an asshole—operate between the two.

Remember, she's still a slut and she'll respond to your asshole wit and charms by wanting to sleep with you, but her new-found husband hunting goals might be holding her back. She may be saying to herself, "Oh, I won't fall for this shit again." This is especially true if she's been dating for a while and trying to get guys to commit, but keeps falling victim to a nail and bail. Ultimately, she will fall for that shit again because she can't resist what she likes. How long you want to keep her around is your decision. These women tend to be good about splitting bills and paying for stuff if they've gone out with you a few times. Your out of pocket cost per lay can be very low if you decide to keep one around for a bit.

The average lifespan of a BCT fuck-buddy arrangement is between one to three months. If you haven't committed to her by that time frame then she'll be gone, and will most likely be out with a new man within a week. That is if she wasn't fucking a different guy already.

BCT's have a tendency to not go quietly either, in my experience. To make the process of removing a BCT from your life more enjoyable, I've put together a little game for the ROK readership. Feel free to play along as she makes her exit.

In Closing

BCT's can make great fuck-buddies—they're eager to please, but always keep it in the front of you're mind that they're dangerous and not genuine. They're trying to charm you and get you to fall in love with them and, due to their high mileage, tend to know what they're doing in bed. These women are not for loving. Just because a woman wakes up one morning and decides that she wants to be a mommy and a wife doesn't somehow make her qualified for the job. They're qualified for the same thing they've always been: getting fucked and working a job in a perfectly air conditioned building. That's it.

If BCT's were of any true value, they would be in a long-term relationship already. Any reasonably attractive woman over the age of 28 has passed up numerous opportunities to be with a great guy. As established, BCT's tend to have major problems. It's not your responsibility, as a man, to play mechanic and fix the problems these women have created for themselves—you will not be rewarded for your efforts. There are plenty of men just around the corner that are more than willing to give these women exactly what they want. Let those guys adopt these bitches from the pound and give them a nice home with plenty of food, water, and chew-toys. A sucker is, indeed, born every minute. However, you know and understand the utility of these women. You can take great pride in knowing that sucker will never, and can never, be you.

Once you have established yourself as a man of worth by your mid-30’s these women will not leave you alone. By being in shape you will have a look they find aesthetically appealing. Through years of experience with women from the past you will have an attitude and personality they find themselves drawn to. And finally, through hard work and dedication from building your career, you will have a wallet that they would love to get their filthy little dick beaters on. In player lingo, you will have the alpha sex appeal they lust for coupled with the financial security of a Beta—a truly unstoppable combination not just for attracting a BCT, but for attracting all women.

Read More: Why There Is No Escaping The Biological Clock

A.V. Yader
A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

An Introduction To The French Revolution

June 26, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After helping America in its Revolutionary War, France was in dire economic straits. The price of bread was rising and protests were were becoming more common. The anger focused upon the aristocracy, who nonetheless fought against yielding their power or money. This set the stage for the French Revolution. This book gives a moderately fast recounting of events that serves as a strong starting point for further self-study.

> …the struggle between the monarchy and the aristocracy was transformed into a social and political conflict between the privileged and unprivileged classes. As the issues broadened, the solidarity of the privileged orders weakened.
>
> […]
>
> Bread was the people's staple diet. Most workers, who consumed about three pounds a day, spent half their wages on it, as opposed to about fifteen per cent on vegetables, oil and wine, five per cent on fuel and one per cent on lighting. Skilled workers such as locksmiths and carpenters earned about fifty sous a day > in 1789, masons about forty, labourers no more than twenty to thirty, so when the price of bread, normally about eight sous for a four-pound loaf rose above ten or twelve sous they had to face the prospect of hunger, and disturbances became commonplace.

>
> […]
>
> …the coffee-houses in the Palais Royal present yet more singular and astonishing spectacles; they are not only crowded within, but other expectant crowds are at the doors and windows, listening à gorge deployée to certain orators, who from the chairs or table harangue each his little audience. The eagerness with which they are heard, and the thunder of applause they receive for every sentiment of more than common hardiness or violence against the present government, cannot easily be imagined.
>
> […]
>
> He had fastened a green ribbon to his hat as an emblem of spring and hope and liberty. And he urged everyone else to wear some sort of green cockade in token of their support for the 'common cause'. Hundreds did so, some of them pulling off the leaves of the horse chestnut trees for the purpose, until, as Gouverneur Morris discovered, it became dangerous to be seen out of doors without a hat garnished with foliage. Then they all marched off into the city to search for arms. The crowd was becoming an irresistible force.

The modern French have done a good job manipulating public opinion that their culture is sophisticated and civilized, but they did unspeakable horrors to quench their bloodlust during the revolution, which I must remind you took place less than 225 years ago. You will not find written accounts of Americans behaving in such a manner.

> The leader of the mob rushed up to one of the carriages and plunged his sabre twice through the open window. As the passers-by gasped in horror, he waved the reddened blade at them and shouted, 'So, this frightens you, does it, you cowards? You must get used to the sight of death!' He then slashed at the prisoners again, cutting open the face of one, the shoulder of another, and slicing off the hand of a fourth who endeavoured to protect his head. Others of the mob then joined in the attack, as did some of the fédérés; and soon blood was dripping from all the carriages as the horses dragged them on their way to the doors of the prison. Here another mob was waiting; and when those prisoners who had escaped unscathed or only slightly wounded tried to escape inside, nearly all of them were cut down and killed before they could reach safety.
>
> […]
>
> …each priest was summoned before a makeshift tribunal before being executed. He was asked if he was now prepared to take the constitutional oath and when he said that he was not – as all of them did – he was taken away to be killed. Some bodies were removed in carts, the rest thrown down a well from which their broken skeletons were recovered seventy years later.

[…]

One prisoner who did not escape the assassins' blades was Marie Gredeler, a young woman who kept an umbrella and walking-stick depository in the courtyard of the Palais Royal. Charged with having mutilated her lover, she was herself mutilated, her breasts were cut off, her feet were nailed to the ground and a bonfire was set alight between her spreadeagled legs. As the heaps of corpses mounted, carts drawn by horses from the King's stables were obtained to take them away to the Montrouge quarries. Women helped to load them, breaking off occasionally to dance the Carmagnole, then stood laughing on the slippery flesh, 'like washerwomen on their dirty linen', some with ears pinned to their dresses.

[…]

'Do you want to see the heart of an aristocrat?' asked one assassin, opening up a corpse, tearing out the heart, squeezing some blood into a glass, drinking part, and offering the rest to those who would drink with him. 'Drink this, if you want to save your father's life,' commanded another, handing a pot of 'aristocrats' blood' to the daughter of a former Governor of the Invalides. She put it to her lips so that her father could be spared. Women were said to have drawn up benches to watch the murders in comfort and to have cheered and clapped as at a cock fight.

[…]

The Queen's emotional friend, the Princesse de Lamballe, who had been held in La Petite Force, was one of the most savagely treated victims. She had been stripped and raped; her breasts had been cut off; the rest of her body mutilated; and 'exposed to the insults of the populace'. 'In this state it remained more than two hours,' one report records. 'When any blood gushing from its wounds stained the skin, some men, placed there for the purpose, immediately washed it off, to make the spectators take more particular notice of its whiteness. I must not venture to describe the excesses of barbarity and lustful indecency with which this corpse was defiled. I shall only say that a cannon was charged with one of the legs.' A man was later accused of having cut off her genitals which he impaled upon a pike and of having ripped out her heart which he ate 'after having roasted it on a cooking-stove in a wineshop'. Her head was stuck on another pike and carried away to a nearby café where, placed upon a counter, the customers were asked to drink to the Princess's death. It was then replaced upon the pike and, its blonde hair billowing around the neck, was paraded beneath the Queen's window at the Temple.

[…]

Joseph Fouché, a frail former teacher who had become one of the most dreaded of the Jacobins, decided that the guillotine was too slow an instrument for their > purpose and had over three hundred of their victims mown down by cannon fire.

Here's a group of men preparing for their death:

> The most important matter that employed our thoughts was to consider what posture we should put ourselves into when dragged to the place of slaughter in order to suffer death with the least pain. Occasionally we asked some of our companions to go to the turret window to watch the attitude of the victims. They came back to say that those who tried to protect themselves with their hands suffered the longest as the blows of the blades were thus weakened before they reached the head; that some of the victims actually lost their hands and arms before their bodies fell; and that those who put their hands behind their backs obviously suffered less pain. We, therefore, recognized the advantages of this last posture and advised each other to adopt it when it came to be our turn to be butchered.

It was all a big Gladiator show for the mob:

> In Paris thousands of people went out regularly to witness the operations of what the deputy, J. A. B. Amar, called the 'red Mass' performed on the 'great altar' of the 'holy guillotine'. They took their seats around the scaffold with the tricoteuses, buying wine and biscuits from hawkers while they waited for the show to begin.
>
> […]
>
> 'The time has come which was foretold,' as Madame Roland had said, 'when the people would ask for bread and be given corpses.'

The fat, weak-willed king at the time, King Louis XVI, had neither the ability nor the strength to fight the revolutionary forces that would eventually take his head. When the revolt was bubbling to the surface, he sat on the sidelines delaying action or made concessions to the opposing forces that helped build their confidence and power. He phoned it in and paid with his life.

People ended up losing their lives for the most trivial of reasons, not unlike what happened in Stalin's Soviet Union:

> Another who had lost his temper while playing cards and, when reprimanded for behaving as no good patriot should, had shouted, 'Fuck good patriots!' was also brought before the Tribunal, condemned and executed.
>
> […]
>
> Jean Baptiste Henry, aged eighteen, journeyman tailor, convicted of having sawed down a tree of liberty, executed 6 September 1793… Jean Julien, waggoner, having been sentenced to twelve years' hard labour, took it into his head to cry 'Vive le Roi', brought back to the Tribunal and condemned to death… Stephen Thomas Ogie Baulny, aged forty-six, convicted of having entrusted his > son, aged fourteen, to a garde du corps in order that he might emigrate, condemned to death and executed the same day… Henriette Françoise de Marboeuf, aged fifty-five, widow of the ci-devant Marquis de Marboeuf, convicted of having hoped for the arrival of the Austrians and Prussians and of keeping provisions for them, condemned to death and executed the same day… François Bertrand, aged thirty-seven, publican at Leure in the department of the Côte-d'Or, convicted of having furnished to the defenders of the country sour wine injurious to health, condemned to death at Paris and executed the same day… Marie Angelique Plaisant, sempstress at Douai, convicted of having exclaimed that she was an aristocrat and that she did not care 'a fig for the nation', condemned to death at Paris and executed the same day.

>
> […]
>
> 'A man is guilty of a crime against the Republic,' declared Saint-Just, 'when he takes pity on prisoners. He is guilty because he has no desire for virtue. He is guilty because he is opposed to the Terror.'
>
> […]
>
> The Tribunal was no longer required to interrogate the accused before their public trial, since this merely 'confused the conscience of the judges'; now, in the absence of positive proof, juries must be satisfied with 'moral proof'. 'For a citizen to become suspect,' said Georges Couthon who had been elected President of the Convention the previous December, 'it is sufficient that rumour accuses him.' After the law of 22 Prairial everything, indeed, went on much better, in the opinion of Fouquier-Tinville: heads fell 'like tiles'. 'Next week,' he said one day, 'I'll be able to take the tops off three or four hundred.'
>
> […]
>
> A performance at the Comédie Française was interrupted by a Jacobin who stood up to object to the line, 'les plus tolérants sont les pardonnables'. When the audience told him to be quiet he went off to the Jacobin Club to denounce the actors who were all arrested.

In spite of all the murder and upheavel, the French people were no better off than before:

> To the sans-culottes it seemed that the gap between rich and poor was becoming almost as wide as it had been before the Revolution. Sudden fortunes were being made by profiteers and speculators who spent money as rapidly as they made it.
>
> […]
>
> The cost of living had by then risen almost thirty times higher than it had been in 1790. The police were accordingly not surprised when the annual celebrations commemorating the fall of the monarchy passed off in what they termed 'a state of apathy'.

One politician makes the strong case against the notion of equality:

> Absolute equality is a chimera. If it existed one would have to assume complete equality in intelligence, virtue, physical strength, education and fortune in all men… We must be ruled by the best citizens. And the best are the most learned and the most concerned in the maintenance of law and order. Now, with very few exceptions, you will find such men only among those who own some property, and are thus attached to the land in which it lies, to the laws which protect it and to the public order which maintains it… You must, therefore, guarantee the political rights of the well-to-do… and [deny] unreserved political rights to men without property, for if such men ever find themselves seated among the legislators, then they will provoke agitations… without fearing their consequences… and in the end precipitate us into those violent convulsions from which we have scarcely yet emerged.

Those in power at the time, the National Assembly, was composed of multiple factions. They played a putrid political game where everyone tried to get everyone else killed with endless scheming, intrigue, and denouncement instead of actually alleviating the plight of the lower classes who ushered them into power. Like a pinball, the power center went from right to left and back again until finally settling upon the middle class in the end, a group who wasn't a huge improvement over the artistrocrats. Many of those who helped start the revoultion did not live to see the end, when a general by the name of Napoleon Bonaporte used his army to gradually usurp control of the country.

This book was a fine introduction that gives you a basic history and feel for what happened, but if you want to really understand the French Revolution, you'll have to dig deeper.

Read More: "The Days Of The French Revolution" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How To Stop Armpit Sweating

June 27, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

A long time ago, I had a major problem.

Every time I stepped foot out of the house, if it was hotter than 65 degrees, my armpits would become as wet as Niagra Falls, spewing salty contents out, staining my shirts, and making me feel generally embarrassed about myself.

I had to figure out how to stop armpit sweating.

I Tried To Solve The Problem

I wore tank tops as often as I could. Grey shirts were completely out of the question, as were any shirts of a light shade that would soak through. White shirts became pit-stained monstrosities within a couple uses. I ordered extra-thick “anti-sweat” undershirts. My wardrobe was composed probably 75% of black shirts because I could not figure out how to stop armpit sweating.

I tried nearly every anti-perspirant on the market. I tried different soaps. I tried wearing different materials. Nothing worked.

How To Stop Armpit Sweating

Eventually, though, I figured it out. These days, I am happy to report that I am generally sweat-free unless it’s an extremely hot or humid day. Even on those days, it’s at least under control. Granted, I do not live in a very humid area and I am not entirely sure how my pits would react to that, but I’ve found that by taking a few steps, I’ve been able to stop armpit sweating.

I've saved a lot of money on white t-shirts, that's for sure.

Step 1 – Get Rid Of Soap

Stop washing your armpits with soap. If you think about it, soap is a chemical. A man-made and developed chemical. That means they (the developers) need to make a profit – even if that means manufacturing their business by selling the illusion of a problem, much like how doctors do too.

In this case, the problem is that you smell and you need soap. Except that water is a perfectly acceptable substitute, in most cases. I still use soap for the rest of my body, but I've done experiments when I've just used water to wash, and guess what – I didn't smell at all.

You must stop washing your armpits with soap.

Step 2 – Get Rid Of Anything That Says Antiperspirent

Once again, it's a scam. An industry created out of a fake problem, in many cases. They will continue to laugh their way to the bank for many years to come.

Now that we've cleaned house, here's how to stop armpit sweating.

Step 3 – In The Shower

In the shower, as stated, do not use soap. Instead, you should scrub your armpits out with a natural loofah. I used these loofahs for many years.

Will any old loofah work? Probably, but it depends. At first, they didn't work at all for me, nowadays it doesn't seem to matter. But they're only $7 for a pack of 3 off Amazon, so you really can't go wrong.

You must scrub the shit out of your armpits in the shower with the loofah – we're talking 30 seconds at least. Yes, it will burn like a bitch. To mitigate the burn, you can hold your armpit under the shower head and scrub at the same time.

Scrub each armpit for 30 seconds, and then scrub lightly with your hand and water to rinse it out.

Just in case you missed it, DO NOT USE SOAP.

Step 4 – Dry Your Pits Out

I'd recommend waiting at least five to ten minutes post-shower before you put deodorant or a shirt on. You must give yourself time to drive off, so scrub yourself good with a towel to dry off.

Step 5 – Go Natural

You already threw out anything that said antiperspirant, right? Good. The next step is to get a natural deodorant – Amazon or natural food stores are both excellent.

The most important things about the deodorant you pick:

- Generally the less ingredients, the better
- You want something natural – if a hippy would dig it, it's good.
- Unscented, or minimal scent – a lot of scented deodorants have unnecessary shit that makes you sweat.

I have personally gone to baking soda over the years, straight out of the box. My $2.50 carton from Walmart has lasted me an entire year. You can also buy Arm & Hammer deodorant stickers with baking soda as the primary ingredient. Your mileage may vary.

Ultimately the deodorant is the wild card, and you might have to experiment a bit to find out. I personally found that some of the natural sticks did not do a great job with keeping the odor away, which was a problem I had never had previously. Eventually I found one I liked, but then moved away from it in favor of baking soda.

Be willing to experiment, give each deodorant stick a trial run of a week and see if it improves.

The Psychological Part

I also think a large part of armpit sweat is psychological. If you generally have self esteem issues, stress, or other psychological drawbacks – sweat pouring from your pits is just the icing on top of it all. While I firmly believe the steps I've outlined above can stop, or at least, greatly reduce, armpit sweat, there is truthfully nothing better than being in a great position and having control of your life.

Even if that control just means wearing a grey shirt.

Read More: An Effective Alternative To Using Deodorant

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

The Difference Between Being A Man In 1914 Compared To 2014

June 27, 2014 | by D B | Link | Original Link

Life has definitely changed a lot in the last one hundred years.

Back in 1914, a man could follow a set life path and not have to worry too much about the slowly changing world around him. It was clear that he needed to grow up, get a job, get married, have a family and then prepare for retirement and death. Yet, for a man in 2014, life isn't so simple and straightforward anymore.

Here are just a few of the many differences between being a man in 1914 vs. 2014:

Marriage And Divorce

1914

In 1914, the highest recorded divorce rate in the USA was 10%, with the rate in most other countries being way below that amount. A man would be almost certain that when he got married, he and his wife would stay together until death. When a couple said, "Till death do us part" at the altar, it was a promise they were usually able to keep. Divorce was considered shameful, sinful and blasphemous, so even if a couple were unhappy in their marriage, they would stick together until the end.

2014

Divorce is now considered acceptable by many people and is sometimes encouraged by TV drama shows that glamorize the process of a woman divorcing an unsatisfactory husband, receiving her divorce payout and then finding a new and better man after getting Botox and a boob job. Statistics vary, but most suggest that a marriage beginning in 2014 has a 50% chance of ending in divorce anytime soon.

In many countries, the law requires that a man give his ex-wife approximately 50% of his assets (sometimes more) in a divorce settlement payout, which is enough to turn most men off the idea of marriage. Many men in 2014 wish that relationships could be like they were back in 1914, but the game has changed and relationships are no longer as certain as they once were.

Masculine Identity

1914

A man was expected to be strong mentally, emotionally and physically. He was the leader of the family or the “man of the house.” Women were encouraged to respect him and follow his lead. The man was responsible for “bringing home the bacon” and the woman was responsible for cooking, cleaning and taking care of their offspring. Generally speaking, his woman was completely reliant on him for her survival and protection and was considered to be a “good, upstanding woman” if she devoted herself to him. As a result of her position in society, a woman in 1914 needed a man more than anything else in life.

2014

A man is still expected to be strong mentally, emotionally and physically. If he wants to be the man of the house, he has to earn and then maintain that level of respect from his woman. His woman isn’t reliant on him for her survival or protection because she can now earn her own money, be supported by a government and be protected by the police and media. These days, women are often encouraged to follow their own dreams rather than devoting themselves to a man. A man is often seen as an “optional extra” rather than an “absolute necessity” in the life of a woman, which has left many men in 2014 feeling confused about their value and purpose in a woman’s life.

Life Expectancy

1914

According to statistics from Berkeley University in California, life expectancy for an American man in 1914 was a measly 52, with some men of course being able to live to 70-80+. Back then, a man had an almost certain life path all the way to death: Grow up, get a job, find a wife, start a family, retire and then he would definitely die. He could literally prepare his mind for death and accept that it was “how it is supposed to be.” Science could not save him from death, so he turned to religion instead and hoped for an afterlife.

2014

According to Wikipedia, life expectancy in 2014 for an American man in California is 80.8 years of age. All around the world, life expectancy is rising at a steady rate and it is predicted to continue going up every year from now on. In 2014, a man now has an uncertain life path on his way to death: Grow up, do whatever he wants and then he may or may not die at around the age of 80. If what TV documentaries like Through the Wormhole and Brave New World are telling him is true, then he may be looking at a life expectancy of 100-150 years if he can make it to 2045, when many scientists expect it to be possible to significantly increase human lifespan.

According to the best scientific minds in the world today, it will soon be possible to reverse ageing and bring our bodies back to being a health 30 year old, even if we are 80. It may be just be science fiction, but it also might also be coming true very soon. Even if a man in 2014 disagrees with the idea staying alive for longer, the questions of, "Do I actually want to stay alive for longer? What will I do with all of that extra time? Will my marriage last?" are now things that he has to face up to and consider.

Religion

1914

Most men believed in one religion and thought that every other religion was wrong. Anyone who didn't believe what he did was obviously an idiot and would regret it in the afterlife. A man's beliefs about the "meaning of life" was usually shaped by the naive and secular society around him.

2014

Most men in 2014 have now realized that humans have been guessing about the meaning of life for a very long time. According to Wikipedia, there are an estimated 4,200 different religions in the world and each of them think that they are right about the meaning of life. Eye-opening TV documentaries like I Was Dead (Discovery Channel) and reality shows like Long Island Medium (Home and Health Channel) argue that there is an afterlife. However, since no one really knows the true real meaning of life, most men in 2014 have decided to ignore outdated religious dogma and think for themselves.

Humans Running The World

1914

Humans were the smartest beings on the planet. We were destined to rule the world forever. We were forming stronger governments, getting better at enforcing laws and improving the efficiency and effectiveness of society. Men were in charge of pretty much everything and most women liked it that way.

2014

Science is telling us that AI (Artificial Intelligence) will become sentient by 2040 and when that happens, it will be able to link minds with other AI to become millions of times smarter than humans. It may get to the point where humans use AI as a tool to better run the world, or AI may decide that taking orders from us on how to run the world is like humans taking orders from cows.

We humans are already using artificial intelligence to better run the world in 2014. For example: Google is a non-sentient AI that sorts through millions of websites, articles, videos, audio clips and documents to return an accurate result to your search within seconds. We humans are using Google's artificial intelligence to become more informed and effective in life. In 1914, people had to ask each other for advice in person and would then be limited to the few opinions they could find. In 2014, a man can search through millions of opinions and find experts in any field within seconds.

Right now, humans are in control of artificial intelligence (e.g. Google), but when AI can think for themselves like we do, they may begin to actively influence, direct and possibly even lead humanity forward. Maybe that will be a good or bad thing in the future, but for a man in 2014, the growing influence of AI is now a significant part of his reality, whether he likes it or not.

Receiving Information

1914

A man's immediate family, his priest, newspapers and the small number of books available at the time were the main influences on his thinking. His perspectives on life were limited to his 1914 imagination and if he had any "out there" ideas about life and the future, most people would think that he was crazy.

2014

A man now chooses who he learns from and why. He is free to believe whatever he wants, say whatever he wants and argue about whatever he wants without having to worry about being burned at the stake. If he thinks in a certain way, he can be sure that there will be thousands, if not millions of people just like him who are talking about the same type of thing online. Instead of having to process the opinion of a few, potentially closed-minded people in his immediate life, a man in 2014 has to sort through the opinions, ideas and thoughts of people from all walks of life that coming at him in all forms of offline and online media.

The Correct Way To Live Life

Most people think that their way of living life is the "correct" way and that everyone else should just shut up and copy their way of doing things. If you asked the Japanese Samurai whether they would ever stop living the samurai lifestyle, they may have wanted to disembowel you for disrespecting their noble culture. To them, the way of the samurai was the only way, and for a time it was a great way of living life, but things changed and the samurai became irrelevant.

If you asked the noble gentlemen of early England whether they would ever consider recording a video of their girlfriend giving them a blow job, watching a bloody UFC fight or playing a computer game like Grand Theft Auto, they may have suggested that you weren't a real man and needed to be taught a stern lesson from your parents for thinking in a different way to the gentlemanly culture that they firmly believed in. Yet, things changed and those top-hat wearing gentlemen became a thing of the past.

Cultural change has been going on for as far back as we can look back into human history and it will continue. If you feel as though your way of living life is “correct” and “the way it should be,” then you might be in for a rude shock when the world around you continues to change in different directions to where you are going. Just because life was once about getting a house with a white picket fence, getting married, having two children, a stable job and a good car, it doesn’t mean that it will continue being that way forever.

Give Me Some Certainty!

Most people I know hate talking about this sort of thing because it makes them feel uncertain and begin to question their choices in life. They want to feel secure in their choices and don’t want the world to change anymore than it already has. Yet, the truth is that you can never be certain about whether or not you have chosen the right path in life; you just have to do what you really love doing and then hope that it works out.

If you’re looking for some certainty from this article, here is what I think you can be “fairly certain” of over the next 30 years:

1. Your culture will change

Just like the age of the samurais came to an end, so will the current cultural trends that many people believe as being the “right way to live life.” The hippies came and went, just like the “Me Generation” of Facebook addicts will slowly stop taking so many selfies. Things will keep changing and that is okay. You are not your culture and your culture is not eternal; you are you and your culture is just a passing phase in the history of humanity.

2. The climate will continue change, as it always has

According to science, the Earth's climate has been changing for billions of years without human intervention. Our current industrial society is definitely adding to the warming, but "global warming" is not all our fault. Climate change will continue to happen until we get to the point where we can control the climate and weather, which will hopefully happen when we master nanotechnology and have the help of sentient AI (Artificial Intelligence). By the way, I understand that AI or "controlling the climate" may sound sci-fi or impossible to some men, but the Internet, smart phones and computer games would have seemed that way to a man in 1914.

3. The world probably won't come to an end

If you pay too much attention to the media, you may begin to believe that we're all doomed, that food will run out very soon and the water supply will dry up and cause a war. Yet, if you listen to people who are at the forefront of business and technology, you will know that we plan to use nanotechnology to clean the water system, rebuild forests and create food from any material. Intelligent-looking people on TV will say that we're all doomed, but we're most-likely going to continue to gain more and more control over our world, just like we have been doing all throughout human history. We will run into problems along the way, but we always find a way to improve and make things better for humanity.

4. You will not fail

Many people will try to convince you that unless you copy their way of living life (e.g. get married as soon as possible, have a family, retire and then get ready to die), then you are "doing it wrong." In my opinion, life is no longer that simple and each man should feel free to choose the life path that makes most sense to him, while also being wise enough to know that he may have to adapt or completely rethink his life plan as the world changes around him.

People may knock your way of living life today, but in 30 years time when the world has changed even more than it has up until 2014, they will applaud you for believing in yourself and doing what you wanted to do all along. People will eventually realize that there is no "one way" of living life, so just do whatever makes you feel the happiest and most fulfilled and you won't end up feeling like a failure.

My Approach To Life In An Uncertain World

Personally speaking, I live my life as though I will die at 80 (i.e. stay with my current girlfriend for life, have a family and grow old together), but with the knowledge that I may get to live a lot longer, if what science is telling us is true. If my girlfriend and I break up in 40 years time instead of "till death do us part," I will not consider myself a failure because I didn't live the "set path life" of a man from 1914. Right now, it might seem like a "fail" to only stay together in a relationship with a woman for 40 years, but by 2054, I think that it will become totally normal whether we like it or not.

I may end up dying next week in a car accident or living for 500 years and then travelling throughout the universe in a spaceship built by super-intelligent AI, but right now, I'm feeling happy about the fact that my girlfriend cooked up a nice breakfast this morning and that I have the privilege to post up my thoughts on ROK.

I'm not afraid of the future because I don't care if things keep changing like they always have. I'm not attached to the current culture because I know that cultures have changed drastically throughout the ages. As a man in 2014, I look forward to the potentially amazing future ahead and I also accept that I probably won't ever get to live life like a man did in 1914, unless I go into a virtual reality that simulates that time period. Just imagine men from 2014 running game on women from 1914—fun times ahead.

Conclusion

It's hard to write a conclusion to this because what I'm writing about here is that there is no conclusion. A man in 2014 is living in a time when his future is open and uncertain and where the culture around him is rapidly changing. Most of us have grown up being shown a way of life from a different time period that just doesn't make much sense anymore, even though many of us may want it to fit into our current culture.

I'll close off this article by saying that for many millennia, we humans have been making this up the meaning and purpose of life as we've been going along and we still haven't got it all worked out. Life as we know it today will be history and old fashioned in the near future. The best that a man in 2014 can do is live his life by choice, rather than blindly copying what everyone else is doing around him. Do what makes you the happiest and most fulfilled and laugh at anyone who tells you that you're "doing it wrong." There is no "one way" to live life, but there are now many ways to live life that will make you feel happy and fulfilled as a man.

Read More: How To Run Game In 2014

D B
DB is a dating and relationship expert for men. Need more help with confidence, conversation or approaching women? DB recommends TheModernMan.com

The Importance Of Money

June 28, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

Money dictates the flow of human living in the modern world. Without money, life is often difficult and painful, and even more for a man. It helps to create freedom. I've seen both want and abundance of money in life, and I can say one of the most depressing times in life was when I was without money.

The importance of money

Money is a non-negotiable, indispensable commodity in every person's life. The possession of money is itself a resource and the usage of it can help to acquire resources. All the things we use in our lives have monetary value, whether directly or indirectly. Money's power is indisputable after the power of faith or self-belief in human life.

Money can buy you happiness

With money, you can often rule today's materialistic world. If you have enough money, poverty will never approach you. Contrary to what most people think, it is not money or the love of money which is the root of evil—it is greed, a love of power and authority, poverty, and a fear of want which are often the roots of evil in this world. Money is just a humble agent in this scenario, because money helps to create power and authority. Money helps to eliminate poverty. Money helps to eliminate wants in life, especially if the wants are related to commercial and even human interaction, as most human interaction in the modern world is now commercialized.

Money can buy you health

You can maintain your health even though you cannot rule your health. Money helps you with that. With modern healthcare increasing human longevity, money can help you to improve your health by letting you lead a comfortable, healthy lifestyle if you spend money on healthcare, whether it may be spending on diet and nutrition, working out, or just taking medication. A lot of people globally postpone health checkups because they don't have enough money to pay for health care bills. Again money's role in health maintenance is irrefutable.

Money is an aphrodisiac

Women and money are often inseparable. Money often helps to create power and reputation. Reputation creates authority. All chicks dig authority.

Money may not always be able to get you or retain the women you want, but it will definitely get you the women who want you for it. And there will always be women who will want men for cash. Whores have abounded throughout human history. Hell, whoredom is the oldest profession in humanity. The oldest profession itself is a proof enough how women gravitate to resources (cash), and offered and offer sex in return. Resources often open a woman's legs faster and more easily than game.

Even if your woman says she doesn't need cash and she loves you for what you 'are' as a man, the question to be raised is: are you a naked man living in a jungle using nothing? You're using the internet to read this post. Who's paying for it? Even if you're not, someone is.

Your identity as a man is your personality. What is your personality? Your personality is the cumulative accumulation of your wisdom, skills, character, education, upbringing, talents, career and style. How were these acquired? For free?

You acquired an education. Whether you actually went to a university or you studied at home, you are still 'paying' for it, or someone is 'paying' for it.

You go to the gym to build yourself, or you work out at home. You adopt the perfect diet to build yourself up, with the right supplements. Who's paying to buy your meals and gear? Or is someone paying for you? Either ways, money is still working in the background.

You're taking care of your body using the latest items for male grooming. You're getting the best wardrobe to accentuate your style. You're reading online and learning from someone on how to develop your style and game. Either ways, either you're paying for it or someone has already paid for it which they're passing onto you. Money again works in the background.

You developed your talents and skills. You might be a carpenter, a writer, a sculptor, a sportsman, a hunter or what not else. Either ways you needed the tools to practice to develop yourself. Those tools could be a computer, a book, a gun or whatever else. Either ways, someone paid for those tools which they passed onto you or you paid for it. Money's presence in the background again is indisputable.

After all this self-development of your persona, you met up a chick who liked you for what you were. She was attracted to your game, your haircut, your looks, your conversation, or your style. You gamed her and bedded her without spending a dime on drinks or what not. Do you think this was free? You may have not spent cash to fuck her, but you have spent cash to develop yourself which acquired the 'free fuck' with her. Money again talks in the background, and plays an important role in your 'free fuck' with her. That's why there is no such thing as a 'free fuck.' The fucks you get without spending cash are actually what I call as 'bonus fucks'. But it is the 'bonus fucks' is what you should concentrate on getting from women (i.e. the bangs without spending cash).

The fact remains that women are essentially attracted to resources and are hypergamous, and often transactional when it comes to intimacy. The barter system of interaction between the genders right from antiquity is a proof that resources were the key to securing women, even if resources were not often the key to securing them forever. Women will naturally gravitate to cash.

Money has a strange effect on the libido, both male and female. While money makes women wet, money also makes men rediscover their mood for sex. One of the worst bummers for most men when it comes to sex is financial stress, whether it may be for self or for your partner. Money is thus an important but underappreciated aphrodisiac.

An important sign of a keeper

One of the important signs of a woman that you should consider in a keeper is the woman who doesn't waste your cash and ferociously saves it like it's her own. An economical girlfriend is the one who should be considered to for a long term relationship or possibly commitment if she has other signs too. An endearing quality of a woman is her parsimony, when she stops you from spending for her, out of a sincere concern for your financial health. These women are the women you actually feel and want to spend for, because of their thoughtfulness. A live-for-the-day type chick who expects you to blow up cash, to get access to her holes is not the type for a LTR, unless if you're rich enough to afford her. The fact is that all women have a price, so focus on the one who gives you the maximum returns for the least amount of investment. Better game her to fuck her.

A great wingman

The best wingmen in your life are not only the ones who help with your game, but also those who save your cash for you. I've had financial parasites in my life (both chicks and buddies) so I've learnt it the hard way. But I've been lucky to have found great buddies with whom I have gone pussy hunting. One of the qualities of a great wingman is not only in helping you with your game, or helping to eliminate rival cock blocks, but also to determine which of your targets are the gold diggers, or the flakes looking for free drinks and the ones who can actually be converted into bangs with minimal spending. I've had these buddies who've stopped me from going overboard from spending on drinks on myself or girls or even them. In retrospect, I think such wingmen are a great asset for any guy to have. Sometimes your wingman can be the greatest leech that you have, rather than the flaky bitch you're trying to pick up.

Your real family or tribe

The real family in your life is not the people whom you're born related to by blood. They are rather the people who love you unconditionally for what you are as a person, no matter how you are and not conditionally for what you have. My own relatives have ripped me off at times. Money (or the lack of it) in your life thus is the litmus test that you must consciously consider every time when you're selecting the people to build your own family or tribe.

Since the world today is primarily a commercialized jungle, where emotions, feelings and attachment are often primarily a commercial investment, understand that money can be your best friend in sorting out the pearls from the pebbles among the people in your life. Money is an indispensable friend in your life, right from the cradle to the grave.

Read More: The Synergy Of Game And Money

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Learn How To Think Instead Of Believing In Lies And Conspiracy Theories

June 28, 2014 | by Jeremy | Link | Original Link

Belief is only useful where facts do not exist. Where facts exist, they are all that matter when attempting to assess a situation. Anyone who latches onto a story that happens to fit a smaller set of facts while ignoring the possible implications of other facts is limiting their reasoning to comfortable stories rather than opening their mind to the nuance of reality. Cultivating conspiracy theories is worse than beta, it's worse than white knighting—it is one step away from being a complete tool.

Let me restate myself for emphasis, you're a moron if you decide to ignore facts that are inconvenient to your preferred narrative so that you can maintain a comfortable or ego-invested lie. This is the foundation of red pill truth. Don't give up your reasoning and attention to detail when the first beta masquerading as a man tries to claim that something is a hoax or false-flag event. This isn't much different than listening to your favorite female oneitis target tell you how to be attractive for her when you're 18 years old. Sure, it feels good when a woman tells you how to be attractive to women, and her story feels like it fits the facts, but anyone who has digested the red pill knows that situation is like drinking poison.

Just because you believe the world is ending, doesn't mean that there's a US-government-generated earthquake targeted at you specifically. The conspiracy theorist mindset is wholly narcissistic, unable to accept that entirely bad situations can occur purely by random chance or (as is more often the case) by absolute human incompetence. This way of thinking is actually attractive to the remnants of the human brain that are primal, the old, lizard brain that tells us to go find a woman to have sex with. Worse yet, it really strokes our primitive egos when we feel like we know something that other people do not. These lines of thinking are attractive because they are extremely useful for keeping us safe in situations that could potentially go out of control quickly. Yet, this form of thought is an unmitigated disaster when all that is required is a little reading, thinking, and acceptance of all facts available for a rational explanation to present itself.

The human mind wants to believe something

If you're walking alone down a dark alley in a seedy part of a large modern city in the middle of the night, would you consider getting mugged to be a part of a grand conspiracy against you? Probably not, but you would be hard-pressed to explain exactly what circumstances led to your unfortunate encounter. In fact, you would have no facts on your mugging save the visual identity of your attacker at best. In this situation your mind would be free to come up with all kinds of stories that fit your limited set of facts. Yet you never see humans attribute muggings to the NSA, or the CIA, or any other clandestine organization of the world's governments. Why is this? Because our minds (for at least some of us) can accept the fact that we placed ourselves into a vulnerable situation and someone else took advantage of us. Our shared experience or human consciousness lets us understand that large cities have lots of people who want to do unsavory things to other people if they feel they can get away with it.

For centuries, sailors reported horrific events that led to the rapid sinking of ships. These stories literally led to areas on maps with the "there be dragons here" art. Sailors experienced horrible situations at sea, and the only explanation that made sense was a fantastic story completely outside of their own experience that happened to fit a portion of the facts.

Sailors at sea still experience those same situations that old-wooden ships experienced centuries ago, but with the benefit of science and modern technology, we now understand what a lot of these freak random events actually are. One of them is now called a "White Squall". It is nothing more complicated than a sudden, violent burst of wind that would blow ships on their side within seconds, often accompanied with enough moisture as to create sideways-rain. Back when all ships were powered by huge sails on tall masts, this event would naturally lead to the sinking of the ship and significant loss of life, if not the entire crew. In those days, these events must have seemed like some gigantic beast in the sky literally just blew their ship down, as they had no experience with how random weather at sea can seem. These days, with scientific investigation, we know these events to be the result of a sudden microburst.

Also on the list of things sailors experienced centuries ago, but had no rational explanation for, were rogue waves. Rogue waves could be deadly to any vessel not sturdy enough and without enough ballast to keep it upright. For old wooden ships with no deep heavy fin keel, this type of wave could literally turn the ship upside down, never to recover. This must have seemed like an act of God or sea monsters to sailors centuries ago. However today we know rogue waves to simply be an event that occurs relatively randomly, usually a result of the confluence of wind and ocean energy, along with a change in sea floor height. Sailors today know what they are, and they know where to generally look for them. Back then, it was some grand act of God or sea monsters acting against the sailors.

The human mind cannot stand an information vacuum

Where our experience can't inform us, we seek knowledge, and where knowledge fails us, we make shit up. This is just a truth of being a human being. Your brain cannot handle its own ignorance, and it hungers for understanding everything around it so badly that it will supplant rational understanding with your own imagination if you're not careful. This means that you need to learn how to use your brain properly, or you will literally do harm to yourself by believing bullshit. If you want to be a good example of masculinity, you cannot succumb to your animal brain when your life is hit with random events. By all means, let the animal brain take over and fight for your life if someone tries to murder you, or if you're about to have sex. But on a daily basis, your job as a masculine man is to remain rational and look at available facts when interpreting the world. Let the women succumb to fear, paranoia and animal thinking if they feel they must.

Science to the rescue

What pulled humanity out of this primitive set of behaviors was the slow construction of the scientific method from early thinkers, to philosophers, to the modern physicist/mathematician. Many people today regard science as some kind of ivory-tower of "authority" that is fallible just like the church. That, my friends, is bullshit. Science is a method of thinking, not a set of beliefs or a structure of authority. The authority that people practicing this method have does not venture far from their own expertise (though many of them would like people to think otherwise—smart people have egos too). Yes, ivory towers of over-extended thoughts cloaking themselves in the "guise of science" do exist in our modern world, but science is not a "gospel" over which only certain people have ownership.

Men need to learn the basics of this method if they're going to avoid sounding like a moron. Science is something you as a man need to practice in your daily life. That doesn't mean pulling out fancy electronics or mixing chemicals in a lab—it means accepting all facts available to you and constructing a proper narrative that is not falsified by any fact you currently have. Again, that means looking at all facts available, and building a story of reality that is not falsified by any available fact. If a single fact contradicts your story, you must change your story.

Arthur Conan Doyle understood this well enough to create a world-famous fictional character who thought this way instinctively. How embarrassing that we still have people on the internet willing to ignore facts so they can believe their fantasy or flaunt the empty backing for their intellectual ego.

The scientific method could be defined like this:

> 1. Define a question
> 2. Gather information (make observations of reality)
> 3. Create a possible explanation
> 4. Test your explanation with more observation of reality (for a lab, this means experimentation)
> 5. Analyze your new observational data. Accept any failure of your own ideas to match reality.
> 6. Re-interpret and draw your (new) conclusions.

That's a simplification for the masses, but just as useful for day-to-day thinking. The hardest part of that process is defining a good question. Any scientist worth their salt knows that coming up with a good question is actually excruciatingly hard. Children are actually better at questioning things than adults are, but alas they do not have the understanding of their universe from which to spring into useful questions.

There have been many thousands of scientists throughout history, who while having the knowledge and experience to perform very complicated analysis, were unable to formulate the right question, and thus their work was not focused on the actual problem they meant to try to address. The rest of that process is easy by comparison, but no less important in arriving at a proper understanding of your world. If you're going to be a man, this should be your default way of dealing with new information. When you stray from this method is when you get yourself stuck in pretty little lies.

This method is not a method for discovering anything. It will not make you creative at all. What it will do is prevent you from believing bullshit. It will keep your thoughts tied to reality so that whatever creativity or ambition you have, it will not suffer from misdirection.

Go forth and use it every day

The beauty of this method is that when new facts arrive at your doorstep you have a method for interpreting them and altering your perception of reality. The real difficulty is in imprinting this method into your thought pattern such that you never skip steps when considering the events around you. In a perfect world, you would have been taught this method from a young age, your fathers and teachers would have taught you how to think. Learning how to properly think, how to most efficiently use both your human reasoning and imagination is the most important skill any man will learn, bar none.

I am not saying you should replace your passion with some kind of caricature of Mr Spock. What I'm saying is that your passion is most useful when it exists in a mind that is not polluted with false perceptions of the world around it. In order to achieve that, you must learn how to think and reject lies when you see them. This requires elements of the scientific method, of testing your perception of the world and adapting to reality.

Epicurus was a good example of a man who understood that life was mostly about pursuing your passion, but that your passions can not be experienced in their fullness without your mind as a healthy ally in interpreting what you experience. I would recommend reading some of what that ancient man had to say.

We talk about learning game in the manosphere, but the dirty secret is that game is not a specific recipe—there are no magic words that will attract any woman to any man. Learning game involves utilizing a method of adapting your behavior to the world around you. How can you expect to do this if your thinking habits involve holding on to bullshit?

The specific steps of reasoning you'll have to go through to develop your game will in no way be identical to anyone else. You will require a method of observing and adapting your interpretation of reality. In analyzing your approaches, your encounters, and all the social situations you put yourself in, you will need elements of the scientific method to adapt yourself to what works for you. Without practicing this method you will get stuck with thoughts that do not conform to reality. When you find yourself repeating old bullshit thoughts, believing in fringe conspiracy theories, or altering your behavior to match pretty little lies, that is when other people will start regarding you as a lesser man. Don't be that lesser man, keep your wits about you and question your reality when the facts change.

Read More: Why You Should Learn Latin

Jeremy

Jeremy is an ignorant human. He actually thinks that someone might learn something from the bullshit he spits out with a keyboard. If he only spent more time actually approaching women instead of keyboard jockeying, the world would be a better place by about 1.43 x 10^-8 percent. Unfortunately women are not interested in their own human ignorance, if they were, Jeremy could be the ultimate alpha just by getting them wet with conversation about the depths of human misunderstanding.

The Root Of Communism Is Self-Hatred

June 29, 2014 | by Fry Koskenin | Link | Original Link

I have an intolerable grievance with communists. In truth, my situation has passed far beyond any form of gentleman's disagreement or matter of diverging political opinion. I no longer debate communism as if it held any merit whatsoever, and not even as a frivolous, impersonal abstraction, or a joke. Instead, I see it for the insidious, consequential, and very personal attack on my freedom that it is, and I will not humor its supporters any longer—for parasites deserve no standing.

One of the fundamental evils of communism is that its organizers don't allow people to opt-out. Instead, they force a person to either submit or fight; there is no neutral ground where a pacifist can escape from their sickly and destructive creed of corruption. This leaves a proud man only one course.

In short, I am now in open warfare with anyone who would support limiting my freedoms or stealing my wealth, and my current weapon of choice, though primitive, is powerful: my ability to craft thoughts and sentences. Let it be known, though, that when at war, I do not play nicely, nor do I adhere to the ineffectual principle of proportional force. Therefore, if a proud Obama-lover finds me at a cocktail party, she can expect to receive only shame added to mockery multiplied by contempt to the power of disgust. Our dictators are protected and untouchable, but their supporters are not, and it's high time that these worthless rats suffer for the mess they have made (and, in fact, always wanted).

Defining "communism"

It's a foolish waste of calories to discuss insignificant distinctions between many flavors of the same evil, and I'd prefer to not even know about terms such as socialism, Marxism, leftism, liberalism, progressivism, and the Democratic and Republican parties. Therefore, I lump these, and any ideology that sanctions theft for the purpose of allowing (or encouraging) its demanding supplicants to consume more than they produce, into the most derisive and convenient of similar terms: communism.

Let it be noted, however, that there is a huge divide between a citizenry collaborating on common infrastructure (and its natural safety nets in the forms of the family unit and voluntary [faith] groups) and having its wealth forcibly redistributed. The former is a fair, healthy, and productive pursuit, while the later is a wretched thing that kills incentive, steals men's pride, and forces an "all against all" mindset before collapsing any hope for greatness toward the humiliating standards set by the weakest and most botched members of society.

True Motives

So why does this plague upon mankind even exist? Why should one man break his back every day on this harsh rock, only to have a gun be stuck in his face and an ever-increasing portion of his work-product seized to pay for another man, who, cannot (or will not) fend for himself? Does every loser on the planet have a right to the working man's yield? As more and more parasites become reliant upon his output, what becomes of his "fair share"? Is taxing him at 50% about right? Or in times of national crisis (perhaps when a country's treasury has been purposely bankrupt by engaging in endless military exercise, or when a tidal wave of third-world immigrants are, for nefarious reasons, welcomed in), could this be raised to 70% or 80%? Where does it end? Why should a capable man get to keep anything at all?

The slick hucksters of communism will claim that it's a system designed to maximize the common good; that it's a safety net for society's unfortunate or infirmed, and that it provides the most equitable comfort to the most people—but they are lying. They advertise purely noble intent, and, without spending the energy to mentally play out the chess game, their false promises easily appeal to billions of tired and frightened zombies.

In truth, the communist's motivation has very little to do with altruism. Instead, it stems from intense jealousy, self-loathing, and a lust for revenge against nature. In short, they hate themselves for being irredeemably unfit and impotent, and thus, they want to see all reflectors of their failures burn. They want to destroy any standard of measurement and make winning impossible, because, if there are no winners, then there are no losers, and maybe then, they won't feel quite as bad about themselves. A large fraction of the world hates success in any form, and it was these suicidal miscreants who chose to raise arms first, but they don't get to have their way, not without receiving, at least, some harsh derision for it.

The Birth Of A Communist

Communists are born, not made. In any population, math demands that some members will rank above the mean, and some below. This happens—it is a part of nature. But normally, nature has a way of maintaining a healthy equilibrium by not letting the diseased infect the herd. Abandoning natural law has led our society to fall out of balance and be overrun by parasites.

The future communist is the timid, sickly kid who stumbled to a last-place finish during his kindergarten class' field day; this was his first taste of failure, and he didn't like how it felt. But be it an early disappointment in sports, academics, employment, relationship or any other constructive human endeavor, the communist-to-be is hard-wired to disengage from competition, fold under the natural pressure to produce, and sulk. As his pattern of laziness, fear, and jealousy is repeated through to adulthood, he forms his politics and seeks a utopia where everyone is exactly equal, and nobody loses—and he votes for that.

He should consider himself fortunate, though, that our society grants him the unearned luxury of consuming more than he produces (a temporary condition, given the inescapable Laws of Thermodynamics), yet he still remains restless and bitter. This gnawing unease initially perplexes him, until he realizes that it's not protection or security that he actually seeks—instead, the deepest part of his soul craves only the destruction of his betters. So long as the accomplished exist, and he has to approach them (not even so humbly) for handouts, he will be tormented by his shameful inadequacy (as he should be).

And so, only when he eliminates the positive half of the bell curve will he find peace. The irony of that pursuit, however, is that it'll ensure his own physical destruction; society will crumble, and he'll starve, but he won't care, for he'll now be as accomplished as anyone.

The Evidence

Some may argue that the goal of communists (discounting their obvious lie about helping the downtrodden) is to have power over their betters, but, though necessary to their plot, that is not the full extent of their hunger. Instead, the defective person's greatest secret desire is for everyone to be as ugly and dependent as he is, and so, with millions of like-minded impotent losers, he votes to impose handicaps and penalties as a means to destroy the healthy.

If the communists' end goal was simply power, well, they have that already. They could run a fairly prosperous and powerful country from the safety of their elected offices, and smirk as they collect tax revenue and distribute it to their chosen supporters.

But this is not enough, and they continue their craven pursuit of all-encompassing destruction. Why continue to bankrupt the country when you already control it? Why flood it with third-worlders when you know that it'll create a lower standard of living for even your own children? Why destroy our educational system when it will only crush our power and standing in the world? Why increase the hamstringing of productive industries when you already seize a large fraction of their output? The answer is that it's all about revenge, and burning it all down.

Reinforcing Their Shame

Communists outnumber legitimate, freedom-loving producers, maybe a thousand to one, so any direct battle against them is futile, if not dangerous. In the U.S., recent numbers show something like 90 million people of working age do not work. This is 28% of the country's 320 million persons. Add in children, retirees, and the vast number of people who work for the government itself, or work "non-jobs" where there is no actual production, and the thousand-to-one ratio might be pretty accurate. In short, there are a lot of desperate, dependent losers who don't take kindly to anyone asking them to pull their own weight. Nevertheless, why should parasites keep feeding without penalty? What do they bring to the table? Why shouldn't they at least have to beg for their handouts?

Producers have almost no way to escape this sinking ship, but so long as our diminishing freedom of speech still exists, I'm not going down without heaping a shit-load of shame onto a few communists along the way.

One night while drinking at a bar, one of my smug, self-righteous communist "buddies" stepped forward and boldly explained to me why it was a good thing that my health insurance premiums doubled under Obamacare, and that I was too stupid to know what's best for me or the nation. In a nutshell, I let him have it with both barrels:

> "What kind of man accepts a bailout, much less demands one? This sort of parasite should scurry day and night without imagining that he has a shred of dignity or pride, because he deserves none. Do you have any pride, knowing that your whole existence was made possible by others? I know what you desperate thieves are, and that it's self-hatred and jealousy that drives you. I know, that you know, that deep down you are a defective, frightened, evil little bitch who's incapable of surviving on this planet without aid from your betters. I know that you yearn to see those more capable and successful than you fail; I know that is the root motivation for your every vote, policy, and action. But just so you know, I am onto your pathetic scam, and I take it personally. I think those who support stealing my wealth and limiting my freedoms are the lowest scum imaginable, and better off dead… just so you know."

Obviously, he was not pleased, but he had no right to be in the first place. Communists will have their cake, but we should not allow them to eat it too.

Read More: Communists Are Successfully Destroying America

Fry Koskenin
is a 41-year-old nuclear-engineer-turned-artist living in San Diego, CA. He's fond of intelligence, achievement, danger, and beauty, and not much else. He loves his motorcycle and despises communists. Check out his latest books: THE MILL (a novel) and BAR POOL.

Don’t Take Yourself So Fucking Seriously

June 29, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

How do you react when things don’t go as you’d like? You get fired. You say something that makes the girl you’re flirting with run away. Your friend cancels on you at the last minute. Your girl cuts it off.

Most guys will act like the weight of the world was placed on their shoulders—like life as we know it has ended. It’s as if their job, girlfriend, plans, or friend was the only thing they had to live for. They’ll cry themselves to sleep and then bitch and moan to everyone they talk to for the next week or month. Instead of shrugging it off, learning from it, and continuing to live, they complain and get depressed.

This is known as playing the victim. It’s when you view your existence as a burden rather than an incredible opportunity to accumulate new experiences. You think that everyone is out to get you and that you have little control over your own life. You’re just waiting for the next bad thing to happen to you. One way people get trapped in this mindset is by taking themselves too fucking seriously.

The fate of humanity doesn’t depend on your success

When your friend fucks up it’s no big deal, right? He just got rejected by three girls in a row and you’re laughing your ass off and telling him to go for four. But when it happens to you, you start telling yourself that you’re ugly and girls think you’re a creep. What’s the difference? You’re taking yourself way too seriously.

Shit happens. Some things don’t go your way. Our reactions to unwelcoming circumstances define us. When the shit hits the fan will you curl your lip, grit your teeth, and curse the world for daming you once again? Or will you take a step back and realize that such is life, before smiling and proceeding accordingly?

View your life as a comedy, not a soap opera

One way to shift your mindset in times of pain or frustration is to change the lens through which you view life. In these times, when you take yourself seriously, it’s easy to view things as if they were happening in a soap opera—dreary music is playing, people are crying, and only negative emotions surface as a result. Instead you can view the circumstances as if they took place in a hilarious comedy.

You’re the main character, and you just got seriously fucked over. Or you just seriously fucked up. Is the world going to end? No. Focus on the silly, stupid, or ridiculous nature of the situation. This way you can shake your head and laugh it off. Even if the circumstances are heavy this method will allow you to take a step back and view the events that have just unfolded from a clearer, more grounded perspective.

In life, the people who take themselves and their circumstances way too seriously, even the wealthy or successful ones, ultimately lose. Rather than enjoying the things they experience, they focus on the negative and always find a way to spoil their own fun. This is not an invitation to be a lazy hippie, but rather a reminder to have fun and keep a lighthearted approach to life as you progress as a man and follow your goals.

For a blueprint to living a fulfilling, accomplished, fearless life, check out my new book Dominate. Click here for reviews and more info.

Read More: 3 Ways To Stop Being A Little Bitch

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Why Black America Must Be Careful

June 30, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

There is a serious crisis stalking America's black community right now, one that gets relatively little attention. That crisis is one of credibility.

This reality has been highlighted by, among other things, the recent prevalence of the knockout game, which has gained much mainstream media attention as of late. What exactly is "the knockout game", you ask?

> Pennsylvania schoolteacher Jim Addlespurger was walking home, minding his own business, when a group of teenagers knocked him out in broad daylight with no warning at all. He dropped face-down to the curb.
>
> It's called the "knockout game": teenagers knocking people out for the fun of it. They even target women and children. Cases are piling up, and police are on high alert.
>
> "It appears these are just random acts of violence," said former FBI profiler Clint Van Zandt. "There's no robbery, there's no rhyme or reason; it's just simply youths making a decision they're going to punch somebody out — sometimes as simple as $5 bet between themselves."
>
> Seventeen-year-old Marvel Weaver admits he played a version of the knockout game using a stun gun. He was caught and is now in jail.
>
> "It was a lesson learned," Weaver told TODAY. "Someone throws it out there: 'Want to play this?' And people go along with it and one thing leads to another, and it just goes all downhill."

Who are the perpetrators of this knockout game? They're almost unanimously young urban teens of African-American heritage, bored youths with little to do who figure that random assaults are a fine way to burn some time.

There isn't anything funny about this, as the consequences can be quite serious:

> After 17 months of waiting, a family finally learned how much time the man who killed their son will be in prison, reports CBS Minnesota.
>
> A Stearns County judge sentenced 18-year-old Jesse Smithers to 10 years on Thursday. Smithers admitted to delivering a deadly punch in a St. Cloud alley almost a year and a half ago, when on Sept. 21, 2012, Colton Gleason was walking with friends when a car pulled up, and Smithers got out and punched him. John says his son was the victim of a deadly "knockout game."
>
> "This group was out there and their intentions were very clear. This is unprovoked. They stopped and they saw someone they thought they could victimize," he said. "Colton didn't have a chance to even turn and defend himself when somebody blind-sided punched him."
>
> Jesse Smithers was sentenced to 10 years behind bars for delivering the fatal punch. He originally entered a plea of not guilty, but changed it to 2nd-degree murder in Nov. 2013.

This phenomenon clearly illustrates the growing crisis of credibility black America is coming to face.

Racism is definitely a problem in the United States, as it always has been. Discrimination in hiring still occurs on the basis of one's name and the color of one's skin. Lending discrimination still occurs frequently. The criminal justice system in the United States is still known to discriminate when it comes to sentencing, and blacks have paid a heavy price for that. Black America has legitimate concerns in the USA, and these concerns should be heard and addressed as best they can be. I fear, however, that they never will. Why? Because there are too many incidents like this:

> A 17-year-old has been charged in the beating of a man who was attacked while trying to help a boy struck by his pickup truck in Detroit.
>
> Prosecutor Kym L. Worthy said Bruce Edward Wimbush Jr. is facing charges of assault with intent to murder and assault with intent to do great bodily harm for > the attack on 54-year-old Steve Utash. He will be arraigned on Wednesday.

>
> The Roseville man was driving his truck on Morang Street near Balfour Street on April 2 when he hit 10-year-old David Harris.
>
> Police have said Harris stepped into traffic and Utash is not at fault. When Utash got out of his truck at the scene, police said at least a half-dozen people attacked him. He remains in critical condition.
>
> The boy was not seriously hurt.

That is just one of many examples I can point to involving incidents of undeserved violence on the part of blacks against non-blacks in the United States. This is becoming a trend, and people are noticing. More importantly, they're also seeing the reaction to this trend.

Had Steve Utash been a black man and his attackers been young white teens, this story would have been a national (perhaps international) sensation. Rallies would have been held all over the country, with civil rights organizers hearkening back to the days of lynchings and foretelling a "return of the old Jim Crow" to the USA. The reaction would be loud and substantive.

Yet when black teens are the culprits, things are quiet. All of the concerns I mentioned earlier with regard to blacks and the discrimination they face in the USA are quite serious, but these largely black on non-black crimes are no less of a concern. If black America fails to become as vocal and animated in a bid to eradicate the likes of "the knockout game" from its community as it is in its defense of youths like Trayvon Martin, then I fear that hostility directed at the black community from the outside will only continue to grow. This hostility will, in turn, fuel more discrimination and hamper current efforts to eliminate it.

This is only logical when you consider some of the concerns the black community maintains. One of these is the persistent fear black males sense in the non-blacks they associate with in public. Many a black male has lamented the fact that non-blacks they pass on the street often feel the need to lock their car doors, cross the street, clutch their purses more tightly, and engage in a host of other pre-emptive actions that mark the presence of the black male as inherently threatening. I understand this concern—I'm sure it hurts to be viewed as a threat everywhere you go if you don't actually intend to threaten anyone. Not everyone shares the Machiavellian preference for fear over love.

That being said, can we really blame those people for erring on the side of caution in a society where large numbers of young men of African-American descent have been known to randomly assault completely innocent people in public simply for shits and giggles? A society where violent black-on-white crimes are substantially more common than the reverse, and yet don't receive anywhere near the media attention their less common white-on-black counterparts would receive?

These are the realities that help to fuel discrimination. They are the realities that give credence to those harping on and on about inherent black violence, white supremacy, black inferiority, etc, making such individuals seem more legitimate than they are. These are the realities that feed far right-wing media pundits and political actors with the fuel they need to campaign for the roll-back of the progress blacks have made in the last 50 years, and the slow-down of anti-discrimination efforts that are already under way.

These are the reasons why it remains very much in the self-interest of black America to treat these acts of senselessly violent black-on-non-black conduct as seriously as they would the reverse. Blacks have spent decades trying to fight the notion that young black males are inherently violent threats to innocent people. Phenomena like the knockout game threaten to roll back any progress made in that time, while giving more ammunition to those who wish to promote that regression.

Excuses will not suffice because, frankly, there are no good excuses for this kind of behavior. No amount of discussion about poverty, slavery and other instances of historic black disenfranchisement in the USA will illicit sympathy for those who threaten the lives of innocent people just for fun. The families of Steve Utash and Colton Gleason (along with the tens of millions of ordinary Americans who look like them and/or have friends and relatives like them) are not going to be moved to “understanding” by these excuses. In fact, I think it could be reasonably expected that such individuals would only be further angered by such discussions, which seek to treat the violence inflicted upon them and their loved ones as just punishment for historical crimes they’ve not been involved in. They may try to be politically correct and bite their tongues in public, but the seeds of truly disruptive discontent and interracial distrust will have already been firmly planted. The maturation of these seedlings is something the black American community should be very interested in preventing.

If there is to be any chance of killing those seeds and getting non-blacks to take the fight against anti-black discrimination seriously (i.e. supporting initiatives designed to combat it), then the condemnation of such violent acts from within the black community must be vocal and forceful. There is no other way.

Read Next: How Black America Was Created

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

Clash Of Steel And Wills: The Story Of The Battle Of Lepanto

June 30, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The climax of European military effort in the Mediterranean, and one of the most awe-inspiring naval engagements ever fought, was the Battle of Lepanto in 1571. A rickety, unlikely alliance of Christian states, cobbled together by Pope Pius V and held fast by the leadership of Don Juan of Austria, somehow managed to devastate the fleet, and humble the pride, of the invincible Ottoman Turks. Sadly, the story has faded into obscurity. It will be my purpose here to restore the tale to its proper rank in the annals of naval heroism and inspired genius. To place the battle in its proper perspective, we will first review the antecedent background.

Background

The Ottoman Empire in the 16th century was a superpower in every sense of the word. The fall of Constantinople in 1453 had sent shock waves through the Christian West that made thrones and popes tremble. But Western Europe, relatively weak and disorganized, could mount little effective resistance. The Turks rolled right through the Balkans and North Africa, and began to wrest control of eastern Mediterranean shipping from the control of Venice, which had long enjoyed a monopoly on maritime trade in the region. The Ottoman sultans had made no secret of their desire to bring all of Christian Europe under the banner of Islam; and to see the crescent banner fly from the spires of the Vatican was not only hinted at, but announced as inevitable.

The extent of the Ottoman Empire in the sixteenth century

The Turks could back up such bellicose aspirations. Their military was powerful and organized: the feared Janissaries alone numbered over fifty thousand men, all of them disciplined professionals. To this number the sultans could draw on their vast empire for additional conscripts, slaves, and volunteers. By comparison, Europe after 1520 found itself ensnared in the turbulence and fratricide of the Protestant Reformation, too distracted and disunited to mount an effective challenge to Ottoman might.

The eastern Mediterranean, especially the island of Cyprus, harbored many trading and naval outposts of Venice, which had been an integral part of her maritime and commercial power since the Middle Ages. But Venice was tired and in decline; her ports on the Ottoman doorstep were weak and undefended; and the Turks were confident and strong. The sultans' conclusions were obvious. In 1570 the Turks sent a force of over sixty thousand men to assault Cyprus. The Venetian colony of Nicosia fell in 1570 after a siege of forty five days; twenty thousand inhabitants were slain by the Turks in the aftermath. Famagusta was attacked in 1571. The city resisted heroically for over a year, but in the end it surrendered after receiving assurances from the Turks that the defenders would be given safe passage home.

The irate Turkish commander, Lala Mustafa, broke his word. He had the Venetian captives reduced to slavery or imprisonment. Marcantonio Bragadino, the city's head defender, was flayed alive in a gruesome act of revenge for the city's protracted resistance, which had cost the sultan about 50,000 men. Bragadino's preserved skin, stuffed with straw, was sent to Constantinople for the amusement of the sultan. Venice, roused to fury by this and other atrocities, sent frantic appeals to Pope Pius V and to the other powerful states of Europe for help.

The Diplomatic Situation

We should take note here of the posture and intentions of the major powers. Philip II of Spain led the most powerful state in Latin Christendom. He was engaged in his own intermittent wars against the Moslems of North Africa, who had appealed to the Ottoman sultan for help. By general consent, the Spanish had the most disciplined, experienced, and best-led army in Europe. They were also zealous defenders of Catholicism, and their character—a passionate type, bearing much similarity to that of the Arabs, who had occupied Spain for six centuries and stamped their imprint on the Spanish bloodline and culture—was stoked with religious fervor and martial zeal. This was the era of Spanish glory and power. Having conquered the New World for the banner of Christ, and having expelled the last of the Moslem infidels from Spain in 1492, they had the ability and resources to confront the might of the Turks.

The French and English, fearful of Spanish influence, were wary of participating in any enterprise that might enhance Spanish prestige. France even sought the friendship of the Ottoman sultan as an insurance policy against Spain. Even Venice, although she desperately needed aid, was fearful of bringing Spanish power into the eastern Mediterranean. The diplomatic abilities and deep pockets of Pope Pius V overcame all these difficulties, however, and managed to keep a delicate balance of trust between the allies. In 1571, he formed what came to be called the “Holy League”, a coalition between Spain, the Papal States, Venice and Genoa, and the Knights of Malta.

Location and order of battle at Lepanto

The squabbling Italian city states were finally roused to unity to confront the Turkish threat. Aware that a Turkish fleet in 1566 had threatened the papal fortress of Ancona on the Adriatic Sea, a number of Italian principalities (Genoa, Savoy, Florence, Parma, Lucca, Ferrara, and Urbino) contributed to the effort of raising a fleet. The Spanish crown contributed the most men, money, and ships. A papal legate appointed Don Juan of Austria commander at a ceremony in Naples. Capuchin monks and Jesuit priests were also attached to the expedition. It was a different age from our own. In those days, even clerics took up the sword, and fought and died alongside soldiers in battle, with an ardor befitting their station.

Soldiers and sailors received the Eucharist on September 16, 1571, and the fleet sailed from Messina, heading for the island of Corfu in the Ionian Sea. The expedition was imbued with a passionate desire for revenge against the Turks for the deliberate cruelties that had accompanied the fall of Cyprus, and this militancy helped to overcome the national differences among the Holy League members.

As the Christian armada moved into the Gulf of Corinth, the Ottoman fleet was sighted, and Don Juan gave the order for his fleet to form in a battle line. The Turkish commander had received orders from the sultan to engage the enemy, and so prepared his forces for combat. The composition of the belligerents was as follows: on the Turkish side, there were 222 galleys, 60 smaller ships, about 750 cannon, 34,000 soldiers, 13,000 sailors, and 41,000 oarsmen (almost all of them Christian slaves or convicts). On the Holy League side, there were 207 galleys, 6 Venetian galleasses (a Venetian invention which was a heavily-armed merchant galley converted for military use), 30 smaller ships, 1,800 cannon, 30,000 soldiers, 12,900 sailors, and 43,000 oarsmen. Besides their aggressive spirit, the Christian side possessed several advantages: (1) the Spanish infantrymen who composed the bulk of the Holy League forces were probably the best in Europe, and (2) the cannon and gunnery of Don Juan's fleet was superior to what the Turks could bring to bear in the engagement.

All out combat at Lepanto

The two massive fleets, one bearing the standard of the crucified Christ, and the other bearing the name of Allah embroidered in gold, made initial contact. All along the line of battle, cries arose from the Holy League forces of "Vittoria! Vittoria! Viva Christo!" The left wing of the battle line, under the Venetians, advanced steadily, and the superior gunnery and ammunition of the Spanish and Italians made steady progress in reducing some of the sultan's ships to charred splinters. And it was at this point that an act of singular courage and daring helped to tip the scales for a Christian victory.

Don Juan ordered his flagship to steer directly toward the Ottoman flagship, commanded by Muezzinzade Ali Pasha. His plan was to decapitate the Ottoman force by killing or capturing its leader. Naval combat in those days required opposing ships to throw out grappling hooks, and for one side to board the other, after which hand-to-hand combat would follow with cutlass, dagger, and pistol. And this is what happened when Don Juan's flagship collided in the blood-churned sea with the Turkish admiral's galleon.

An artist's rendering of the fleets before the engagement

Amid the smoke, confusion, and fury of battle, Don Juan gave the order to board Ali Pasha's vessel, named the Sultana. Three hundred Spanish veterans leapt aboard the enemy ship, their way led by a fearless Capuchin monk bearing nothing but a tunic and a crucifix; and the Sultana's deck ran red with blood and gore as the steel of battle-axes and cutlasses bit into the flesh of the combatants. The crash of metal upon metal reached a crescendo as the fighting see-sawed from one end of the ship to the other; and all around, as the galleons in the battle-line rolled and rocked, the screams of the fallen mixed with the acrid stench of gunpowder to add fear and confusion to the desperate fight.

Ottoman Janissaries, the cream of the sultan's army, fought hand-to-hand with the Spanish tercios. The Spanish were repulsed several times, but kept coming back. It was an incredible sight, transcendent in its awesome carnage and merciless fury. This was the spirit that won the New World for Spain. Miguel de Cervantes (who would later achieve immortality for his authorship of the novel Don Quixote) was a participant in the battle, and was wounded during it. He later described it as "the most memorable occasion that either past or present ages have beheld, and which perhaps the future will never parallel."

The Ottoman flagship was overwhelmed by the fury of the Spaniards. Admiral Pasha Ali was slain and decapitated by a Spanish soldier, and his head raised aloft on his own flagstaff. At this sight, the morale of the Turks cracked, and their ships began to fall back under the steady pounding by Don Juan's gunners all along the line. When the smoke finally cleared hours later, over 10,000 Turks were taken prisoner and 8,000 slain; 117 ships were captured and 50 destroyed. On the Holy League side, 7,500 men were killed, 12 galleys were sunk, and about 12,000 Christian slaves (acting as Ottoman oarsmen) were freed.

It was a devastating victory, a supreme achievement of Italian and Spanish arms, never to be equaled since.

The Spanish in action: this was their moment of glory

As with many decisive military victories, the victors were too exhausted or shocked to follow up their triumph with a pursuit of the enemy. It seems likely that, with the bulk of the Turkish fleet destroyed, a punitive expedition to Constantinople might have met with some success. But it was not to be. The victorious powers divided up the spoils of battle in proportion to their contribution to the expedition, and sailed home to universal acclaim in Europe.

In Venice and the rest of Catholic Europe, the celebrations were ecstatic. Church bells rang all over Catholic Europe. Men embraced each other in the street; artists immortalized the battle by painting picture after picture; and the Venetian doge was hailed as a hero. Rome was convulsed in joy, and Pius V nearly canonized Don Juan for his feats as admiral. He implored European leaders to assemble a military force for further attacks on the Ottomans, and tried to goad Persian and Arab leaders to launch their own strikes on the Turks. Nothing came of these efforts. Philip II of Spain was embroiled in his own struggles in the New World and in the Netherlands, France was secretly allied with the Turks in order to check Spanish power, and Venice had few friends outside of Italy. Pius V was praised and respected, but ignored. When he died in 1572, the concept of a second Holy League coalition was shelved.

Results

It can be argued that Lepanto changed little in the equations of power in Europe. The Ottoman grand vizier, Mehmed Sokullu, remarked to a Venetian diplomat that Lepanto had done no permanent damage to Turkish power. Within six months after its defeat, the Ottoman Empire, showing great determination and skill, had rebuilt its fleet along Venetian models, incorporating lessons in tactics and gunnery learned at Lepanto. Venice continued to decline. The Ottomans raided Sicily and southern Italy soon after. By 1683 the Turks were in the heart of Europe, laying siege to Vienna.

But these facts ignore the central importance of Lepanto in destroying the myth of Ottoman invincibility. It was a psychological triumph of the first order. Once and for all, it was proven that the Turks did not have a monopoly on bravery and military skill. Although Turkish power continued to expand (of its own inertia) for a time after Lepanto, it is now clear that the battle provided a critical morale boost to harassed European Christendom. As the Europeans continued to innovate in military tactics, technology, and artistry, the Turks grew complacent and torpid. After 1580, the Ottoman fleet was allowed to deteriorate through neglect and ineptitude; from that point, the Ottomans were a decisive force on land only.

Few feats in naval history can compare with Don Juan's bold gamble in launching a direct assault on the Ottoman flagship and killing his rival commander. In war, as in the struggle of life itself, boldness and decision count for more than a hundred debates and discussions. This was an inspired move that took audacity and consummate skill, and it was the turning point in the Battle of Lepanto.

Pre-battle plans and stratagems are always easy to come by. Every commander has a plan; every historian has an explanation; and every losing general has an excuse. But in war, as in life, the plan goes out the window once the first shot is fired. In the end, discipline, brute strength, endurance, and tenacity matter more than delicate artistry. As the outcome of Lepanto hung in the balance, on the blood-stained deck of the Sultana, the Spanish infantry came face-to-face with the Janissaries. And the issue was decided—as all such military clashes are decided–only by brute force, courage, steel, and fury.

Read More: The Humiliation Of A Great Empire

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How The Love Of My Life Led To Me To The Red Pill

June 30, 2014 | by RedPillZen | Link | Original Link

When I was 25 years old and nearing the end of my first year of law school, I told my girlfriend at the time that even though I would be around to hang out with, I would no longer give her any part of my emotional self. Essentially, I broke up with her. I did this because she had decided to study abroad that summer, a decision she seemingly made without an ounce of deliberation.

After about a month of staying physical, but emotionally distant, I changed my mind and wanted her again, letting her know how I felt. But she was preparing for her trip, and wanted nothing to do with me. I was a human dildo.

During this stage of our “relationship,” many hidden truths came out. Sometimes this happened out of anger and spite for our failed relationship, and sometimes just from detached honesty to satisfy one another’s curiosity.

There was one particularly honest exchange that changed my life, but not in the manner anticipated at the time. She told me that she had always been attracted to large men, that at six feet one inch tall and one hundred sixty five pounds, I was by far the smallest guy she had ever seriously dated. She went on to tell me that if I were to gain twenty pounds that summer, she would be interested in dating me again.

I was inexperienced in life and with women. She was my first true girlfriend, and at the time, I thought the love of my life. We had on many occasions discussed marriage, children and the future. I felt abandoned when she decided to plan her trip to Europe, and to say I was hurt that summer would be the understatement of the year.

However, with her honesty about my size and her lack of attraction, she unknowingly unleashed a chain of events that would forever change my life profoundly.

Summer

When she moved out of her apartment which was ten feet away from mine and left for Europe, my life was more empty than it had ever been. I had no real friends and was alone in the city I had moved to for law school one year prior. She had been my life, and I had no confidence that I would ever find a girl as attractive, smart and cool as her ever again in life.

So that summer, I poured my heart and soul into gaining those twenty pounds of muscle she had dangled in front of me as the price for her heart and loyalty when she returned. Outside of work and classes, I did nothing but eat, train and rest. My entire summer outside of my obligations consisted of cooking food, eating food, lifting, and watching Game of Thrones with my new roommates for the summer.

I had been a serious athlete for years, but I had never had the objective to gain massive amounts of muscle. Performance and aerobic endurance had been my top priorities. I was ripped, and liked to stay that way.

But that summer, I had a goal to achieve, and I applied all my nutrition and kinesthetic knowledge into strength training, and continuously taught myself more. I even taught myself to eat more than I ever thought possible.

By the summer's end, I had achieved my goal. By drinking a gallon of milk every two days, eating massive meals, and training with the intensity and passion of a crazy person, I did it. I put every ounce of frustration and anger I could manage into the weight room. I had lifted for years, but that summer I took everything two orders of magnitude higher.

Solely through my dedication and strength of mind, I achieved what I thought would be impossible, and I was the strongest man around almost everywhere I went.

Her Return

When she returned from Europe, I picked her up and we went out for tacos. We walked around downtown, and suddenly I felt her place her hand in my hand. We walked around for a while, and once we were in a quiet area, we sat and talked on a bench.

Before we knew it, we were making out and it was on. A few days later, after helping her move in, our physical relationship returned. I thought I had succeeded, that all my hard work had paid off. That she could not help herself, that she was mine again.

I was wrong.

Although I had suddenly gained massive amounts of muscle, and was the strongest man around, I was mentally weak still. I had gained the weight, the muscle, the strength all for her. She must have instinctively known this, and was turned off.

The morning that I left her new bedroom after moving her in, she walked me to the door, with a genuine smile on her face and without any clothes on, wished me a good day on that first day of classes for our second year of law school. I did not know it at the time, but that was the last time we would ever be nice, open and kind to each other.

Over the course of that semester I was a beautiful wreck. Although she had only been the third girl I had slept with in my life, I slept with six new girls that semester.

I finally had to face the pain of rejection on the most fundamental and real level a human can experience. I had shown her every aspect of my physical, mental and emotional self the year prior. And she wanted none of it. In her mind, I was a loser. If I was not, I would not have spent my entire summer doing something for her.

Action And Reaction

During the course of that semester, I never consciously realized how easily I was finding attractive, sexy girls who wanted to sleep with me.

I was too focused on my pain my ex-girlfriend had left me with, but the reality was that I was now finding it easy to have casual sex, or even form relationships with other girls—girls of high quality who had many guys chasing them.

That semester, I stopped caring about chasing women. Nothing mattered to me if I could not have my ex. And that is how I swallowed the red pill.

Looking back, I can see how much I got my shit together that semester. I did it because I knew instinctively what I needed to do to be successful. I did it because nothing I did mattered to me, so I figured out I might as well do the rational thing while I wallowed in pain. I had no hope for fixing anything like I had during the summer.

I spent the semester accepting reality, accepting my own shortcomings. It was real. Everything was suddenly very real. I saw everything from a cold, detached, and clinical perspective. I saw cause and effect. Action and reaction. That summer had taught me that. My ex-girlfriend made me force the reality of my rejection. There were no lies I could tell myself.

From my new perspective, emotions were nothing but the ripples that emanate from the gap between expectation and reality. I learned that the immense pain I was experiencing was me adjusting to the laws of cause of effect. I learned that if I had understood how people, society, and the world worked exactly, then my actions would produce exactly what I wanted.

All I could do was improve myself, or let myself decay.

In my mind I accepted that I would never experience those feelings I had felt with her ever again. So, I set about like a machine, constructing an even more powerful mind and body, and making plans for the future. Not for any particular reason any longer, or with any motivation. I did it because sitting around decaying was boring and not very interesting. I had done that after graduating from Arizona State University, and I knew the only place that path would lead to was homelessness and eventually, a premature death.

Women were not even a small priority to me. They were playthings I interacted with when I was not working. I realized all I had to do was continue not to care, to dress well, and to carry myself confidently, and women would flock to me. My appearance and inner reality were contradictory, and that is what seemed to make all the difference. I became a mystery to people, a puzzle to solve.

People only judged my appearance though, and treated me based solely on the image I presented. Nobody knew or cared about my feelings, only my appearance and demeanor. After gaining twenty pounds of muscle, and learning to dress well, grown men of all stations of life gave me respectful eye contact and nods everywhere I went. Women wanted to spend time in private with me.

Nobody knew the real reason I had gained the size, and nobody would have even cared. I was a man without a care to the outcome of my actions, but a man who on the surface took all the actions necessary to achieve success in all aspects of life.

Masculinity

The truth is that people judge a man by his looks, style, size and strength. It is all we have to gain an idea to the interior, to gain a glimpse of a person's mindset and emotional state. My ex-girlfriend unknowingly gave me the ultimate gift. She rejected me mind, body and soul. I was forced to take the red pill and become a man.

To this day I don't care about anyone's opinion about me. Being rejected so completely forced me to either move on with or drop out of life. I could have gone either way, but I chose to dress well and execute behaviors that would give me rewards, which in turn made me carry myself with confidence.

I know pain, failure and rejection. And I know life goes on regardless of success or failure. When I say I don't care, I know it is true because I am as zen about successful outcomes as I am failures. Taking the red pill is about feeling something and then letting that feeling go.

It is about letting pleasure wash over you, and it is about letting pain wash over you. But never remaining attached to either.

Emptiness

Zen is the middle ground of stability, of not needing anything.

Red Pill Zen is knowing that experiencing pain and pleasure are equally the meaning of life and therefore life is all one truly needs.

Red Pill Zen is understanding that all purposeful action leads to growth while inaction leads to decay.

Red Pill Zen is taking the path of growth for no real reason other than an intellectual curiosity to align with the laws of the universe through trial and error. To learn the laws of action and reaction. Because lifting the veil over your eyes to see the truth, to see beyond the matrix of appearances which guide everyone else is power. That power of experience is the essence of masculinity, and if it does not resonate with you, try resonating with femininity instead.

Read More: Does Building Muscle Get You Women

RedPillZen

RedPillZen is a retired water polo player from Southern California who finds peace in contemplating his mortality while studying law in the San Francisco Bay Area. You can visit his blog at RedPillZen

Is Climate Change Bullshit?

June 30, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

It is known from the geological record that the earth has experienced at least five major ice ages. It is also known that the current ice age began about 2.5 million years ago. Note the word current, as in—we are still in it!

Science doesn't have the full answers as to why ice ages occur, nor does it understand the interglacial periods within the ice ages, where icecaps retreat and the planet experiences warmer climates. We are currently in an interglacial period that started about 10,000 years ago; prior to that the ice sheets came down as far as London and Boston.

The world has been at times a hell of a lot colder. It is even thought that ice sheets spread over the entire planet at one point. It has also been a great deal warmer, with crocodiles and tropical vegetation as far north as Scotland, Canada and Sweden. During an ice age, ice sheets advance and retreat on 40,000 -100,000 year intervals. As you can see from this diagram, Co2 levels and temperatures have fluctuated wildly and unless woolly mammoths drove Escalades and Sabre Tooth Tigers drilled for oil, there are obviously other causes in play.

Now we have the planet's climate change in context, un-obscured by politics, leftist environmental emotions, and learned ignoramuses mistakenly called scientists who are being kept in a job to push whatever agenda suits the urge of the day. We can see the bigger picture which makes it impossible to ascertain if humans and fossil fuels are making any kind of difference to the planet's climate. It may sound logical, but so did a flat earth to the medieval kings.

If northern regions were once so warm that tropical species thrived, if ice ages come and go and temperatures fluctuate wildly even during ice ages, how the can you expect me to believe that burning up a few hydro-carbons is making any kind of a difference.

Even if global warming is real and the ice caps are all going to melt, and that is caused by human activity, it really is of no concern in terms of planetary survival, since similar climate changes have occurred on numerous occasions throughout the earths multibillion year existence. Move to the mountains and get on with life.

Sure it will be a huge hassle if the earth's cities that sit at sea level end up being inundated, and a little ironic if humans caused that climate change, but it seems pretty clear that climate change was going to occur anyway. Probably better if it happens sooner, so NYC can be relocated to Iowa, than when its population is 10 times the size in 500 years' time.

Mass Hysteria

The rest is just a load of mass hysteria, gas lighting and a good excuse for bankrupt politicians to install new taxes. These things are the new religion. What's more hilarious is that just 40 years ago, the same scientific institutions were telling us to prepare for a new ice age. Today we need to cut back on light bulbs and walk to work (like that's going to make any fucking difference while the military gobbles fuel to power jet fighters and commercial aviation has no signs of abating). The ice age scares, which I actually recall in the media as a young child, were used to back big oil and squash ideas for solar, by promising declining temperatures and weaker sunlight. Obviously fossil fuels could be an important staple to survive a colder global climate.

Very convenient, now where have we heard that before?

Global warming is just the flip side of the same argument. The carbon cap emissions trading program was launched by the government so that large 'polluters' could pay for and trade their emissions quotas. What this amounted to was a massive covert tax on energy users (everyman and his dog), under written by the likes of Goldman Sachs and JP Morgan, who made most of the profits on it, by acting as market markers. Very little if any of the money goes into 'environmental' issues or fossil fuel alternatives and probably a fair amount of it pays for gas gobbling limos and private jets. Nice work if you can get it boys.

We now have a market place for a questionable if not completely bogus product, traded on the world's financial exchanges that the large investment banks profit from tremendously, whilst little is done about real environmental issues. Personally I don't blame these banks, if people are so cretinously stupid to allow those in charge to rob them blind.

Meanwhile, the forests in Brazil are still being chopped and burned to provide terrible quality farmland that becomes sterile after a few years. The pacific ocean is awash with garbage, but hey, no one goes swimming that far out so who gives a shit. The Atlantic stock of cod, a wonderful and tasty fish, that was a staple for our parents and grandparents is gone. Fished practically to extinction.

These are just a few, very real and pressing issues that sit in plain sight, while the media grinds its organ about climate change, like a 12 year old boy that discovered his first porno clip. Climate change doesn't matter all that much, but what does matter is how we treat the planet and our own bodies.

Cancer

While the media frenzy and banning of tobacco smoking swept the world by storm, all plastic bottles (coke, mineral water etc.) contain a cancerous chemical called Bisphenol A. Despite the fact that the smoking population has declined from some 60% to less than 25%, cancer rates are through the roof—I wonder why?

Here's one possibility: anti-perspirant deodorant contains aluminum derivates, that have been shown to collect in breast tissue, (almost all women even in third world countries use these products, they are probably more widely used than tobacco ever was). Breast cancer rates have soared, such that it's now 'perfectly normal' for a 30 something year old woman to have breast cancer, a disease our grandparents barely heard of. Light another Marlboro Red and put that speed stick away, because breast cancer rates in men are on the rise too. That's right, the lymph nodes in your underarms and chest can fire up with cancer, just like a girl's can, especially when you slather them with toxic petro-chemicals several times a day.

Snake Oil Salesmen

In Victorian England there were frequent scares started by the eminent scientists of the day, declaring that coal would soon be in short supply and within a few decades would run out. Prior to that firewood was in short supply and there were going to be no trees left. Cue a run on the price. I see plenty of trees and the world has an abundance of coal. It costs only $78/ton. I expect that oil will end up costing $1 a barrel long before it runs out, that's if anyone bothers to keep the wells open.

Throughout history, humanity has been rife with snake oil salesmen, tricky marketing ploys and most of all with politicians angling for advantage by creating some common enemy or threat to our very existence. Climate change is no different. I will agree with you that there are better ways to generate electricity than burning coal and I am sure the internal combustion engine is a ridiculous contraption, an offshoot from the steam engine that never should have been invented. The electric motor is 80% efficient against the petrol engine which is only 25% efficient.

In 1880 Tesla seemed to have some answer to wireless electricity for electrical cars. Why has this technology been off the table for 100+ years? That is the subject for another article entirely. Even if batteries are needed, the will to develop them has never been there in the first place and thus we've had to tolerate smog and fumes and general inner city filth. Does the concept of a taxi cab or delivery van, running short journeys in a major city, using hot swappable batteries, available at all service stations, seem so difficult to implement, that we still have to tolerate diesel and petrol fumes? Instead of fixing the problem at source, we've plundered the world's supply of two very rare and precious metals, platinum and palladium, to make catalytic converters.

I agree that it would be sad to see some of the world's great cities sink under the sea, although from my point of view, the loss of fresh powder snow for skiing and the disappearance of penguins and polar bears would be more tragic. However, the real issues are never discussed while remaining in plain sight. They lack a convenient tag line, politically correct agenda or profit motive. Cleaning up the pacific garbage patch, or getting toxic chemicals out of household products, doesn't get any panties wet or fire up voters.

You can't have an opinion about them like you can in regards to banning smoking or stopping global warming. The real issues are just a bloody mess that selfish baby boomers made with their lazy and greedy use of technology. No one is going to be admiring anyone born from 1944-1964. They will be pissing on their graves, if they haven't tarmacked them over. There are dozens of other examples that make me want to fire up an Abrams Tank and start blasting at things, but I'll leave that for another day. The take home message is to swallow a red pill, do your own research, and not believe everything you are told.

Read Next: 5 Reasons To Date A Man With Cancer

The Ugly Reality Of Dating Japanese Women

July 1, 2014 | by Reinhardt | Link | Original Link

I've been on Return of Kings for quite a while, reading and enjoying my fair share of wisdom, sardonic humor, and women bashing. Lots of women bashing. Now I won't condemn this because I do it too and I understand the frustration. However, I've seen way too many men criticize women as a whole but then start praising Eastern Asian women. Some of these countries include Thailand, Singapore, Philippines, etc.

For this article, I will speak only about Japan; having been there myself. Men on this site preach the red pill but forget that it applies to all women, not just women in certain countries. So with that said, it is time I debunk some of these myths and bring you the reality. What I've experienced comes from dating Japanese women myself and speaking with foreign men that lives there. I've also had conversations with Japanese men as well that were married or dating.

In Japan, there is a huge emphasis on avoiding shame. As a whole, Japanese society stresses the image of something as of utmost importance. This means that the avoidance of responsibility and duplicity could be more prevalent depending on the situation.

On the bright side most of what I will mention below could be fixed by simply making it clear from the beginning what you will and will not tolerate. There are cultural differences here to consider and you need to try extra hard to get the point across. For some men unfortunately, you will encounter the following problems.

1. Docile and submissive? Lol no

Many men are under the assumption that Japanese women are nice, submissive, and obedient. There was a time in Japan where women were expected to behave this way but it is not like that anymore. Japanese women tend to act this way when you are simply dating them. They will cook for you. They will stop by your house to drop off a gift that was bought for you. All will seem nice and well until you put that ring on. When that happens, the act will disappear.

If she seems just like the misguided stereotype that you've read about then trust me when I say that she is deceiving you! Trust me on this. You are being lured into a trap and it will come in the form of an "accidental" pregnancy, stalking, and just everything seeming like it's too good to be true. Do not be deceived. You should be even more alert if she knows that you are wealthy or of high status.

2. No control over finances

In Japan, women tend to manage the money. The husband works many hours a week, gets his paycheck, and comes home only to give all of the money to the wife. This happens even if the wife is not working, which is also common as Japan still has a large portion of married women who are homemakers. When it comes to making financial decisions, is also common for the wife to have the final say. I'm talking about furniture, vacations, transportation, and more. The wife typically makes all of these decisions.

I don't know about you guys but I have a problem with this. I ran into this problem with an ex of mine. She wanted access to my checking account and began telling me what I should buy with my own money. I told her that I will do what I want with my money and that she has no business asking me about my financial assets. Of course this was a problem so I broke up with her.

3. Extreme passive aggressiveness

Here is a conversation I had with a woman I was dating. I was staying at her house and this was late at night; not too long after we had sex.

> Her: I'm hungry. Go to the store and grab me something to eat.
>
> Me: What?
>
> Her: Go to the store and grab me something to eat.
>
> Me: Get something out of the refrigerator. It's too late and I don't feel like leaving now.
>
> Her: Fine then. I had a taste for Onigiri [steamed rice balls] which I don't have here but that is okay. I will just not eat though I am hungry.

I left out the house and never came back. Of course she called multiple times over the next several weeks wondering what happened to me, but I was gone for good. I just cannot stand such blatant and poor attempts to manipulate me. This is all too common in Japan. The people there do their best to avoid conflict. There is a huge emphasis on this and a strong aversion to complaining, even to your loved ones in private. Being seen as a complainer is one of the worse things possible in Japan. No matter how bad things are going for you, suck it up.

A direct consequence of this is the inability to really speak directly and candidly. In Japan, it is nearly impossible to get someone to be forthright about something. You can ask someone something and they will smile and say “maybe” but what they really mean is a big fat NO. This will include your personal relationships when dating so be prepared for a barrage of passive aggressiveness. You thought American women and their shit tests were bad? Ha! You haven’t seen anything yet.

4. Mental health

Something that really needs to be mentioned is that Japan doesn’t really have a mental healthcare industry. Many women are running around there with some serious unchecked mental issues and you would not have the faintest idea at first. Problems such as abuse can be seen as normal and that behavior will be projected towards you. There is also the chance of her pulling off a disappearing act, leaving you wondering what the hell happened.

5. Your children will be taken away from you

This is simple. You marry a Japanese women and then that day comes when you finally go through divorce. Guess what? She will take away the children. You think it’s bad in the USA when women try to get full custody? In Japan, the wife will take them away from you and disappear. In the United States at least some courts treat some men fairly. Unlike Japan in which the court system won’t even try to help you.

6. Sex will be withheld from you

Another simple thing that needs to be mentioned is that all too often many men get married in Japan and have their first child. Only to see that his wife has stopped having sex with him. Many men on ROK have said this is a deal breaker so nothing more needs to be said on the subject. There is also infidelity to consider. It doesn’t happen as often as countries like Russia, the USA, or the UK, but it still happens more than you think. Many husbands and wives in Japan have their own mistresses and both are aware of it and don’t care. I don’t think I need to explain why. A belief that isn’t totally uncommon in Japan is that paying for sex isn’t considered cheating.

In conclusion

Does any of what I mentioned sound familiar? I hope so because these are exactly the same complaints men on ROK typically have regarding women out here in the West. What needs to be said is that all women behave the same way generally speaking unless the culture checks that behavior. That is it. I ask that you be very careful when dating, no matter where the woman is from.

Read Next: Introduction To Japanese Girls

Reinhardt
Reinhardt is an old soul looking to make his impact on the world. His interest include business, robotics, engineering, fitness, swimming, and more.

2 Ways Quality Men Get Locked Into A Relationship

July 1, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Often you will hear a woman, well-meaning or otherwise, ask how to get a man to commit to her. In the various incarnations of Beige Phillip and Black Phillip that I have written on before, Both Dante Nero and Patrice Have talked about their Jellybean Theory, which gives girls a blueprint for getting commitment from a man. You can listen to the entire description here:

The short version of it is this: every girl is represented by a jellybean jar. Every time she does something positive, she puts a jellybean into the jar. Every time she nags, flakes, denies sex, throws a tantrum, or other misbehavior, she is taking multiple jellybeans out of the jar. Most women will add and subtract so that it roughly evens out over time. The best move, however, is to add so many jellybeans that when she takes it away by withdrawing from the relationship, the man has no choice but to consider commitment because of the value she has brought to his life.

Every red pill aware man I've known who has gotten married or into a serious relationship entered one that followed one of these two paths. This isn't a basement neckbeard who gets his first girlfriend off the internet — I've seen it apply to Red Pill-aware men who have had lots of options, know the game a bit, and still choose to settle down:

1. Consistently add to the jar

Consistent-adders may not dazzle you at first, but they are the girls who continue to add value as the relationship progresses. They take care of you when you are sick, keep nagging to a minimum, and are generally just very pleasant to be around. While the sex may not be mind-blowing, it is good, on-demand and the girls keep in shape. These girls often have other intellectual pursuits and practical skills such as cooking, and a more even-keel outlook on life. The way to describe this type of relationships is “easy”, because it does not add any further headache to your life.

Most well-adjusted red pill relationships follow this blueprint. Women will be women, but the disruptions (and thus subtractions from the jar) are at an absolute minimum. We tend to make dating, relationships, and the game into an adversarial interaction, but sometimes we forget that with the right maintenance and choice of woman, it can be a value-adding experience. If you believe in marriage, you would consider making a long-term investment only to women who fall into this category.

2. Add and subtract from the jar in wild, unpredictable swings

These girls may drop an entire bag of jellybeans in the jar at once but might then steal the jar, smash it on the ground, and fuck your best friend. The highs are extremely high, with incredible sex in the most spontaneous of situations, proclamations and of undying love, and other tokens that make you feel at the pinnacle of your masculinity.

Unfortunately, the dark side of these women is that they tend to be duplicitous, self-serving, and destructive. They crave drama, and will do everything up to and including ruining your life to achieve it. One reason that men get so sucked into dating girls with Borderline Personality Disorder is women with that affliction are so extreme in their loving and hating that men are unfamiliar with the level of emotion they inspire. “A girl has never loved me this much before,” they will say, before she cheats on him and slashes his tires. When they withdraw from the relationship, the men begin to miss the boom days while they forget the numerous bust periods that went along with them.

I’ve seen two types of men who are prone to fall into a relationship of this structure. Men of the first type understand that the situation is untenable, but they are so desensitized by their successes in the game that only these girls can fire off the dopamine in their brain and provide the same rush that they used to get from making out with the nerdy girl in the high school library. The other type of man who falls into this pattern is the natural who has psychological issues of his own and craves a rocky, codependent relationship (e.g. Mystery).

Keep in mind the two roads that women take to inspiring your commitment. My recommendation is that you search out and cherish the former, while avoiding the latter like the plague.

Read Next: 5 Ways To Land (And Keep) A Quality Boyfriend

Winston Smith

Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

10 Life Lessons From Louis XIV

July 1, 2014 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

Louis XIV was King of France and Navarre from 1643 to 1715. His reign was one of immense transformation. France emerged as the leading power in Europe, not just in military or political affairs, but in the arts and culture as well. Louis tamed the nobility, made immense territorial gains, and ended the traditional Spanish threat by placing his grandson on that country's throne.

Throughout his long life, Louis had an insatiable desire for glory. Unknown to most, Louis left a significant collection of memoirs. Below are some of the most relevant lessons Louis has to teach us:

1. Learn From History and Follow the Examples of Other Great Men

"Whoever is poorly informed cannot avoid poor thinking."

Louis knew that he needed to learn the lessons that other men could teach. Just as we are learning from him, he learned from others:

> "It is not sufficient for a prince who wishes to distinguish himself merely to know what is passing in his time, but he ought also to inform himself of every remarkable circumstance which took place at a more remote period. I considered that the knowledge of those great events which have taken place in different centuries, when meditated upon by a solid and active mind, tend to fortify reason in all important deliberations; that the example of those illustrious men which antiquity furnishes would supply useful hints for war or peace, and that an > enlightened mind, intent on the ideas of those glowing virtues, would ever find a stimulus to the practice of great actions."

2. Shut the Fuck Up

"One of the best experiences to practice is to listen oftener than to speak; for it is a difficult matter for persons who are fond of speaking to refrain from saying too much."

Madame de Calyus, writes of him:

> "He carefully examined the respective dispositions and thoughts of his hearers: he was extremely prudent: he knew how every word a monarch utters is canvassed over in public, and he often kept to himself those discoveries his penetration had enabled him to make. If important affairs were the subject in question, the most learned persons were astonished at the knowledge he displayed; they saw that he was more thoroughly conversant with the matter than they, and were charmed with the manner in which he expressed his thoughts."

3. Regulate Your Conduct Wisely

As Louis found it necessary to regulate his speech wisely, he says the same regarding one's conduct and moral character:

> "A bloody and ferocious temper is despicable in a man, and beneath the dignity of a king."
>
> […]

> “On every occasion declare yourself to be on the side of virtue and against vice.”
>
> […]
>
> “The greater the merit and virtue of the prince, the harder the envious will try to dim his brilliance. Some faults will be attributed to him which he is entirely innocent. A sovereign cannot live too wisely or too innocently. It is not enough to provide for general affairs, but you must regulate your own morals.”

4. Make Decisions with Conviction

What separates the successful from the unsuccessful is the ability to make good decisions and follow them through. On this matter, Louis writes:

> “There are often troublesome occasions which may cause you to hesitate in making a decision, but once you do, and think you have seen the best course, you must take it.”
>
> […]
>
> “Uncertainty will sometimes make a prince pass painful moments; but when a reasonable time has been bestowed on the examination of an affair, he must take a determination according to his best judgment, without protracting that state of suspense any longer.”

However, Louis warned not to make decisions too hastily:

> “Better to conclude our business late than to ruin it by precipitancy. Our impatience only tends to delay that which we eagerly wished forward.”

5. Get off Your Ass

Louis did not make France the leading power by engaging in idle hedonism. He devoted himself to his work so much that on the same day he had an operation for an anal fistula in 1686 (an extremely serious condition at the time), he still attended his council meeting. He notes:

> "You will always find in me the same perseverance in labor, the same firmness of resolution, the same love for my people, the same passion for the prosperity of my state, and the same ardor for true glory."

Louis decided to work twice daily with various people in addition to his other work:

> "I cannot tell you what fruits I immediately gathered from this decision. I could feel my spirits and courage rising. I discovered something new about myself and joyfully wondered how I could have ignored it for so long. That first shyness, which always comes with good sense and which was especially disturbing when I had to speak at some length in public, vanished in less than no time. I knew then that I was king and born for it."

The biggest impediment to glory is doing nothing. This is suicide by stasis, and I know this intimately because that's how I used to be. Louis warns:

> "Nothing is more taxing than prolonged idleness. You will be disenchanted first with affairs, next with pleasures, and third with idleness itself. You will seek everywhere in vain for what cannot be found. That is the problem with rest and leisure without some labor to precede it."

6. Have No Favorites

Louis, in consolidating power, made sure to elevate himself. He understood the danger of placing too much esteem even in his own family, as such attachments could prove dangerous:

> "Have no attachment ever to anyone."
>
> […]
>
> "In consequence of the friendship which I entertained for my brother, I could have wished never to deny him anything, but aware of the consequence this encroachment might be, I let him know, immediately, with all possible delicacy, that I could not grant his request; that I was willing to do everything to elevate him beyond my other subjects, but that such demands which seemed to interfere with my dignity, I thought it my duty to refuse."

7. Your True Friends Are Never Yes Men

> "Love all people attached to you, do not give preference to those who flatter you most, and hold in high esteem those who for a good cause venture to displease you. They are your real friends."
>
> […]
>
> "Praise is very delicate, and we should be careful how we are caught by its dazzling appearance, as it requires much to discern our flatterers from our real admirers.
>
> […]
>
> "Supposing that we conceive ourselves deserving of which is spoken in our favor, instead of contenting ourselves with the praises which we have received, they ought to serve us as a stronger stimulus to merit new encomiums; for this is one of those mediums whereby the elevated may be distinguished from those who never rise beyond mediocrity; to behold the latter charmed with the empty noise of applause which is incessantly flattering their ears, abandoning themselves to inactivity and indolence, eager to persuade themselves that they have done enough; while the former seem never fully satisfied."

8. Maintain The Frame of the Master

Louis was a firm believer in his divine right to rule. When it comes to maintaining this frame, Louis has much to say:

> "The mistakes I have made, and which have caused me infinite trouble, have > been caused by kindness, and by allowing myself to surrender too heedlessly to the advice of others."

>
> […]
>
> "Never allow yourself to be ruled. Have no favorites or prime minister. Listen to and consult with your council, but decide yourself."
>
> […]
>
> "Nothing is so dangerous as weakness, of whatever kind it be. To command others, one must raise oneself above them; and after having heard all sides one must decide on the judgment one may come to with an open mind, always keeping in view to order or do nothing unworthy of the character one bears."

Louis also understood the psychology and arrogance of the mob. In this day and age especially, his advice is sage:

> "In a popular assembly, the more you assent to, the more they grasp after: the more you caress them, the more they will despise you; and that which they are once put in possession of is retained by so many hands that you cannot deprive them of it but by extreme violence."
>
> […]
>
> "Of so many persons who compose those assemblies, the most ignorant are those who often take the greatest liberties; and if you pay any deference to their opinion on any occasion, they pretend to the right ever after to regulate your projects according to their own fancy."

9. Never Take Serious Advice From Women

Louis had many mistresses during his reign. This combined with his astute mastery of power meant he was speaking from extensive experience:

> “In the same manner as a fortified place is attacked, so is the heart of a prince. An artful woman first sets about removing all who are not in her own interests; she inspires us with suspicions against some and excites our displeasure against others, in order that she and her friends alone may be listened to; and unless we are well on our guard against these practices, we are exposed to the necessity of giving offense to every person in order to gratify her alone.
>
> […]
>
> “From the instant that you allow a woman the liberty of speaking to you on affairs of importance, it is impossible but what she must mislead you. This predilection we feel for her induces us to approve of arguments that are bad in themselves. She infallibly adopts ill-timed and pernicious resolutions.
>
> […]
>
> “We have no means left to escape than to forbid their speaking about any subjects, save those of pleasure and amusement, and make up our minds not to believe any of their suggestions concerning matters of business.
>
> […]
>
> “I will confess, however, that a prince whose heart is strongly possessed by love, being at the same time disposed to esteem her whom he loves, will find it hard to observe these precautions; but they are most indispensable and it is for want of their being attended to that we behold in history so many fatal instances of royal houses extinct, thrones destroyed, provinces laid waste, and empires overturned.”

10. You Alone Are Responsible For Your Fortune

Most people blame something else for the misfortunes suffer. This is a form of narcissism, because it holds the implicit belief that they are infallible. We’ve all fallen into this trap, and modern society only coddles this flaw. Louis admonishes this mindset:

> “The greater part of mankind are accustomed to regulate their conduct by their humor more than by their reason, and very often have nothing to guide them in their designs but their honor and their passions, that disposition of theirs, which always remains the same, always keeps them in the same route; so that in any disorders which they see in their affairs, or any misfortunes which happen to them, they have not the good sense to seek the cause in their conduct, but they impute every evil to the simple caprices of Fortune, and do not consider that if after they had felt her first blows they had adopted a new method of acting with her, they would most assuredly have secured themselves from greater evils; for it is certain that one of the safest remedies against the changes of Fortune is to know how to change with her, and you ought not to think my son, that the firmness of which I spoke to you at other times is at all opposed to the maxim which I have established for your guidance here, as that virtue does not consist > in always doing the same thing, but in doing the thing which tends to the same end.”

Read More: Lessons From The Life Of Casanova

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

Why Doesn’t Tinder Co-Founder Justin Mateen Use His Own App To Meet Women?

July 2, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Tinder co-founder and chief marketing officer Justin Mateen was sued by his subordinate, Whitney Wolfe, for sexual harassment after their stormy office relationship ended. As a result, he has been suspended from the company. The allegations against him strongly suggest that the co-founder of a popular dating app doesn’t even use it to meet women. Instead, according to court documents, he obsessed over Wolfe for an extended period of time, even calling her as a “slut” while she was still employed with the company.

Here’s Justin Mateen:

Here is Wolfe:

I'd bang her, as I'm sure most of you would, but would you jeopardize your career as co-founder of a mega popular app to do so? The only reason you'd say yes is if you were desperate and felt you couldn't get anything comparable. This would be understandable if Wolfe was a beauty queen or if the app you invented wasn't meant to meet other people. It's right there on the homepage!

And also the about page:

How Not To Text A Subordinate That You Were Sleeping With

The complaint that Wolfe filed in California has enough evidence against Mateen that it's unlikely he will ever return to Tinder. While I'd be the first to suggest a sexual harassment claim is bogus, due to a woman's innate ability to lie in order to gain a material advantage, Wolfe's case is not without merit. See for yourself:

Back 13 of 26

Stop justin. Were at work.

Ur heartless

Ul regret acting this way once my tenderness for you wears off from ur behavior

Ok Justin I'm sorry you're so upset. We are broken up and this is inappropriate.

So easy for you to move on. I'm shocked but at least I have my answer

Please stop threatening me and get back to work.

Back 18 of 26

Hagsgagahaha so pathetic I even imagined a life w u. I actually thought u would be a good mother and wife. I have horrible judgement. He can enjoy my left overs.

I was too just dealing w ur a use

Delivered

Yea fuck u

Ur abuse

Why Didn't Mateen Use His Own App To Meet Women?

Mateen put his job at stake to send angry text messages to a subordinate he was sexually involved with. He did this because he believed—either consciously or subconsciously—that she was the best he could do, in spite of the fact that his app, Tinder, is designed for single men like him to meet beautiful women, the likes of which are featured on the Tinder homepage. If his app was so useful in meeting women, why was he sending pathetic text messages to Wolfe? There are two explanations:

1. He used Tinder to meet women but failed. If you’re a man on Tinder, you already know that girls select the best looking men. Mateen is not ugly, but he may not be good looking enough to get enough matches that could lead to a new relationship. By failing on Tinder, he decided to stay in Wolfe’s orbit.

2. He doesn’t believe in using Tinder to meet new women. This is the more likely scenario. While he will market the app to American men, he chooses not to use it himself. While he degrades the mating process with an app that pushes women into selecting hot guys with six-pack abs, he chooses to not swipe at all. This is a clear case of a Silicon Valley nerd pimping technology as a great way to bring people together but in the end deciding that it’s best for him to abstain. He’ll encourage proletariat losers to use it, however, so the app’s “engagement” metrics are high when Tinder is sold for billions to Facebook or Google. He’ll laugh all the way to the bank while weeping over Whitney Wolfe, begging her to join him for a ride on his new yacht, paid for by the time and attention you put into his creation.

Every time you use Tinder, every time you maniacally swipe left or right, I want you to remind yourself that the app is not good enough for the founder to meet a good woman. While he aggressively pursued a relationship with someone he met face-to-face, he expects you to use an app that actually hurts most men by reducing the entirely of their value to a little photo on a device made with Asian slave labor.

Whenever the latest app from Silicon Valley is shoved down your gullet, just know that the people behind only care about getting paid, not about improving your life. Now get back to swiping you lowly end user, so the other Tinder execs can make their fortune.

Read Next: Tinder Is A Microcosm Of American Culture

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How To Get Laid In Ibiza

July 2, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Summer is here and all over Europe, Russia, Australia and America. Beautiful girls at the peak of their their own summers of sexual attractiveness are packing tiny bikinis, cut-off denim shorts, sun cream and condoms and heading for a small island in the Mediterranean Sea called Ibiza.

Situated 80 kilometers away from Valencia in eastern Spain and the third smallest of the Balearic Islands, Ibiza attracts around two million visitors each season and has been one of the most popular holiday destinations on the planet for at least twenty-five years. The reason? Because outside of Las Vegas, Ibiza boasts the most off-the-hook party scene in the world. It is a scene with historical precedent: clubbing as we know it today was born here. In 1987 DJs Paul Oakenfold and Nicky Holloway heard early Chicago house mixed together with the likes of Chris Rea and Genesis at Amnesia. They took the concept back to London where it promptly exploded.

With huge venues like Space, Pacha, Ushuaia and Privilege (the world's largest nightclub with a capacity of 10,000), fantastic sound systems, near constant sun, and top DJs ranging from EDM heroes Tiesto and Avicii to Loco Dice, Carl Cox and SvenVath, Eivissa (or 'the white island', so-called after the reserves of salt found there) remains an addictive draw. Music lovers, party-goers and the world's sexiest women flock there. Each year the place attracts more and more American visitors and with the recent EDM explosion in the US this will only continue, particularly as US artists like Steve Aoki—who has signed up for an eighteen-week residency at Pacha with his 'Aoki's Playhouse' party this year—continue to perform there. The season lasts into early October, so if you enjoy going out and meeting hot girls and you're based in Europe (or planning to come over) then you should definitely plan a trip.

A Paradise On the Med

After all, on the surface, what's not to like? Ibiza is without doubt a beautiful island. I have visited it more than ten times in the last decade and it remains one of the most enchanting places I have ever been. From the moment you step off the plane, smell the lush pine trees, grab a cool drink and survey the gorgeous coastline with its white sandy beaches, you will be hooked and you won't want to leave. Ibiza Town, the capital, is a World Heritage Site and is also exceptionally attractive with its winding streets and magical port. But more importantly than any of that, Ibiza has the greatest concentration of hot, scantily dressed women ready to engage in all forms of debauchery that I have ever witnessed anywhere.

All That Glitters is Not Gold

As usual, though, when something looks too good to be true then it probably is. With so many alcoholically-lubricated, feral girls on the prowl, their glistening pudenda concealed only by the briefest of thongs, their flexible bodies thrusting in overt imitation of coitus to pounding techno beats, one might assume that sexual nirvana was a foregone conclusion. Not so. In Ibiza, the dedicated pussy hound has several significant obstacles to overcome, in particular the parties themselves, logistics, and AMOGs. Here I break down how to overcome each of these. These tips will also carry weight in any other similar high-energy club environment.

Be The Next Bright Shiny Thing

Let's be real for a moment. Girls love sex, but they don't have the same imperative to get laid on a given night that men do. When the average guy goes out to a club and sees that dime piece in the hot pants shaking her ass on the podium, he feels a real, urgent desire to have sex with her right there and then, and will often suffer a blow to his ego if he she rejects him. In contrast, the girl may not be opposed to the idea of getting laid that night but she doesn't have to. After all, she is already being validated by the hundreds of thirsty dudes checking her out and trying to buy her drinks. She probably already has a fuck buddy, or a coterie of guys she can WhatsApp on her smartphone if she wants sex. So the urgency just isn't there (if she's at the peak of her sexual market value, anyway). As a consequence, most girls are magpies with short attention spans, interested only in the next bright shiny thing.

In Ibiza, this problem is compounded by the fact that, by definition, the girls you meet there love to party. It is extremely difficult for the average, non-celebrity guy to compete with the lasers and ice cannons of Amnesia, loud EDM, and some of the world's most famous DJs. The average British, Spanish or Italian girl will have spent most of the year saving up and looking forward to her annual holiday, and believe me, Ibiza is expensive. She has probably just paid eighty Euros to get into the club to hear David Guetta and paid another twenty for a drink, unless some thirsty guy has bought it for her. The chances of her leaving early with you to fuck after you've spat a few lines of tight game are negligible. You could try pulling her into the restroom if that is your thing, but in most clubs these are staffed by attendants, and good luck if the ruthlessly efficient bouncers catch you.

So how do you overcome this? First, do everything you can to be the next bright shiny thing yourself. In practice this means you should look as good as you can, approach plentifully, and be as direct and dominant as possible.

The old game concept of peacocking (i.e. wearing outrageous clothes for effect) is now as quaintly old fashioned as MySpace and assuming fidelity from American girls. But in Ibiza there is something to be said for choosing bright, stylish clothes that make you stand out. You have to strike a balance between keeping cool (the average temperature in August is 80 F) and looking good. Make no mistake, Ibiza by night is not a casual, beachwear place. You are competing with very well-groomed guys from Italy and Spain who aren't afraid to go the extra mile, so dress accordingly. It's too hot for the jacket, shirt and pocket square look, but at least go for shirts and t-shirts with interesting details or patterns. For example, animal prints were very popular last year. I wore a pair of leopard print loafers to Space which got me a lot of attention and led to me pulling a very cute Swiss model.

It goes without saying, but make sure you're in shape. A lot of the guys in Ibiza are jacked. While it's not necessary to be Arnie to get some action, you should at least do as much as you can to cut fat and build upper body definition before you go. Your aim in every element of your presentation should be to make the biggest impact possible. If you wear your hair in a pompadour, make that thing huge. If you walk with a swagger, exaggerate it. Read my article on developing insane self love. The clubs in Ibiza are big, brash and loud and you need to be the same if you want girls to pay attention to you.

Once you hit the club, approach as many girls as you can and be very direct. This is no place for subtlety. Leave the subtleties in the short stories of Gogol at home. Go in, grab her, twirl her around and start dancing with her. A simple “Hey, I saw you dancing and I had to come over—you’re fucking hot” will suffice for an opener. Girls are creatures of sensation—you need to provide her with a sensation that equals or surpasses that of her surroundings: that is, a dose of supremely confident, high value male attention. Only then do you have a a chance of cutting through all the noise and having her register your existence at all, let alone consider sleeping with you.

Logistics

In spite of the plethora of hot girls everywhere, logistics in Ibiza are among the worst I’ve experienced anywhere in the world. I’ve already covered the main reasons for this. Girls have paid a lot of money to get into the main clubs to see top DJs and they’re not leaving anytime soon. For this reason a lot of their nights will be booked up in advance: “I can’t meet you tonight. Tiga is playing Amnesia.” Add their cock-blocking friends and AMOGs into the mix and you have a pretty difficult scene to crack. It can be done, though—you just need to adopt the following strategy: open all the time and be ready to close all the time.

Don’t wait until you’re in Space, Carl Cox is spinning and she’s off her head. Instead, open her as she walks back from the grocery store to her hotel (Ibiza is great for daygame). Try to take her on an instant date then bring her back to your apartment for an hour before she goes out. If this isn’t possible, take her phone number, along with those of as many other girls as possible, and send out a mass text later, following up with whoever bites. While this advice holds good anywhere, in Ibiza it is particularly important as you have finite time (if you’re on vacation) and a lot of variables to overcome to make things happen.

Outside the clubs, the beaches and beach bars are great places to meet women. Spots like Bora Bora and the Tahiti & Tiare Beach Bar in Playa D'en Bossa are goldmines. You should also go to Salinas and check out Sa Trinxa and the Jockey Club, as well as newer upscale venues like Blue Marlin. Hit these places up in the afternoon and talk to as many girls as you can. Bring your smartphone to take numbers. If there is a glimmer of interest then escalate or get the digits. If not then quickly move on. One thing guys have on their side in Ibiza is abundance—the sheer number of girls there makes getting rejected meaningless. There's always another chick to hit on.

Bear in mind that the optimal times for getting laid are either late afternoon (post-beach and pre-going out) or the very early morning after the club (6am – 8am). Plan accordingly. Ensure that you are staying somewhere easily accessible that you can take girls back to quickly, Preferably you should have your own room, rather than be sharing with a friend. Check out Airbnb for apartments or the holiday aggregator sites for cheap hotel deals.

Unless you book a car, you should aim to stay close to either Ibiza Town, Playa D'en Bossa or at San Antonio. The first two are near all the main parties and clubs. San Antonio is also a great party place with a lot of girls (and romantic views of the sunset for dates) but the strip there is a little downmarket and full of drunken Brits on the rampage. Worth avoiding unless you're down on your luck and after a particularly seedy pump and dump.

Jet Apartments in Playa D’en Bossa is a good, cost-effective accommodation option. If you’re on a bigger budget then try the Ushuaia Beach Hotel, which has its own Vegas-style pool parties with fantastic international DJ line-ups. The point is, you need to be near the action so you can extract and escalate quickly. Remember, you have to be ready to pull the trigger at any time.

If you’re at one of the clubs and you meet a girl who seems interested then after about 3am you should do everything you can to hang in with her until the end of the night. You can’t go home early with her—sex happens very late in Ibiza.

You should also try to get invited to villa parties. These happen frequently and sometimes feature top DJs who are off-duty, but they’re private events and not advertised. Make sure your conversational skills are up to scratch and get talking to guys as well as girls. If you seem cool then the chances are you’ll get invited to a secret gathering somewhere up in the hills. Here the girls are much more relaxed and your social pre-selection means you’ll be screened much less.

AMOGS

Understand this: the sexual market place in Ibiza is highly competitive. You are surrounded by some of the world's most beautiful women—fashion models, actresses and pop stars go every year—and they are surrounded by some of the world's most thirsty men. That many of these men are also rich (there are plenty of Russian yacht-owners around) and good-looking with great physiques. This can mean that the newbie player might on occasions feel out of his depth. Keep two things in mind, though: first, female-male ratios in Ibiza are pretty good, and possibly even favor men. Second, a great many of the men there have very little game.

Last year I witnessed a short, out of shape Australian guy pull a hot Brazilian chick in front of a bunch of gawping Abercrombie wannabes at Bora Bora beach bar. I myself pulled a sexy French stripper in front of a disbelieving, musclebound crowd in Space. The bottom line is that game works, regardless of the environment and the competition. If you can project a fun, friendly vibe, talk for a long time and physically escalate then you are ahead of 95% of the crowd and you'll blow other guys out of the water. Read ROK, read McQueen, read my stuff and you'll be golden.

Bottom line is if you're in Europe this summer then get yourself over to Ibiza. The season lasts until October so you have plenty of time. Check out the various party calenders available online to find out about club nights and book tickets in advance to save cash. You'll have a blast, meet and sex some beautiful women, and learn a lot about game in high pressure environments at the same time.

Want to find out more about how to develop confidence and attract beautiful girls anywhere? Then check out my book here.

Read More: 6 Tips On How To Get Laid In Las Vegas

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How Long Will It Take For Everything To Be A “Trigger Warning”?

July 2, 2014 | by Hawk Writes | Link | Original Link

The above image has more to do with triggering than anything I can possibly explain. If you’re like me it’s hard to look at because it evokes an emotional response. A Marine burying his head in his friend’s shoulder sends chills up your spine when you think of the possibilities surrounding what he could have seen and what made him break down in such a way.

The Watering-Down of “Trigger Warning”

One of the most recent transgressions against the vein of human decency has come in the form of the bastardization of the phrase “trigger warning.” Originally, this phrase was primarily attributed to the actions or phrases that set off people who were unfortunately afflicted with PTSD (for you older folks: “shell shock”). In modern times, however, feminism has seen fit to retrofit anything and everything to be a “trigger.” The phrase has essentially lost all meaning and the feminists that use it have killed the legitimacy for those who truly suffer from the effects of waking up in a cold sweat regarding seeing absolutely unimaginable shit in live-or-die combat situations.

I come from a military family where the hardships are real. Taking another person’s life in combat can’t be easy and I don’t claim to understand how it feels. I can’t begin to identify with it on any level and frankly I hope I never do. It pisses me off that something associated with a life-or-death situation can be watered-down so much as to apply to anything now (just like how everything is “misogyny” in the feminist echo chamber).

The watered-down trigger warnings have even found its way into classrooms (no surprises there) and students are actively “warned” in certain universities that lecture slides may contain triggering material. Why have we allowed such a legitimate problem to be bastardized by those who see fit to re-define it as anything but a completely serious and sometimes fatal condition?

Everything Is A Trigger Now

Take one look at something like /r/creepypms over on Reddit. Seriously, take a look. I do it at least once a day just for giggles and it will absolutely illustrate my point. Notice how at least one post in the first 25 has the acronym “TW” in it? Yeah, that stands for “trigger warning.” Apparently non-PTSD folks can be “triggered” by reading words on a screen. How low do you have to sink in your life in order to buy into such a victim complex willingly? These are the kinds of people we would label perpetual victims and rightfully so.

The problem gets even worse over at /r/fatlogic. That subreddit details all of the “body-positivity” and “Healthy at Every Size” (HAES) campaigns and is generally just laughable from any perspective in medical science. I’m a big fan of Reddit since it provides a never-ending source of entertainment and amusement for me. Unfortunately, though, it continues to prove the points both of myself and any other red pill reader who has his shit together.

It Gets Worse

The media feeding into the “rape frenzy” and the utterly absurd diatribe of “rape culture” just makes things worse for us as a society. Everything is “rape” now just as everything contains a “trigger warning.” By using these phrases willy-nilly the idiots (that’s what they are—there’s no getting around it) dilute the true affliction of the actual victims. Hermann Goering said the following when he was interviewed during the Nuremberg Trials (source):

> “It’s easy, really. If you want to control people, all you have to do is make them believe they are under attack from someone or something. Then you can do whatever you want.”

Women under attack from men? Check. Do whatever you want with no understanding of the consequences? Check. I’ve just described the effects of modern feminism in a nutshell.

The feminists focus on every instance and every micro-aggression and attempt to bend it to their cause in the guise of the “Wow, just wow” position. They’re perpetual victims and strive to be nothing but that. It ultimately undermines their position but they’re too stupid to realize that fact. Their feelings get in the way every single time and serve as a barrier to any logical discussion based on reality and facts.

Conclusion

Men, do you get “triggered” by seeing words on your screen related to anything that you hold dear? Yeah, I didn’t think so. Men are logical creatures by nature and we have to be in order to survive. We analyze the entire situation with facts and formulate our arguments based on rationality and the way the world truly works. If there was ever any doubt that you can have logical discussion with a frenzied woman, this should have completely shattered that pretty but ultimately useless illusion.

Read More: How “Trigger Warnings” Silence Dissent And Protect Fragile Egos

Hawk Writes
HW is a badass software engineer with an old soul. He hates the entitlement mentality and victim complex so readily displayed without conflict in our current state of affairs as well as the feminized approach to education, the workforce, and society. You can view his articles at Hawk Writes and follow/harass him at @HawkWritesStuff on Twitter.

11 Ways To Cockblock Yourself

July 2, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

In your quest for becoming a better man, building your lifestyle and becoming a Casanova with women, it's wise to learn what to do, but knowing what not to do, is just as important. Thus, this list of 11 Ways To Cockblock Yourself, is your new guide to help you identify exactly what will cockblock you and learning to avoid these mistakes will help your game tremendously.

11. Get Oneitis

Nothing will stop you in your tracks quicker then getting fixated on one girl. The moment you put her on a pedestal and decide that she's The One and no other girl can compare, is the moment your game will take a dive into the dirt. Her pussy will dry up due to your needy behavior and you will lose self-respect deep down due to your beta bitch boy actions. If you're having trouble getting over a girl, then listen to this advice and listen good young buck:

Go out and fuck 10 new girls. Yes, it may take you over a year, or maybe 6 months, or maybe only 3 months, but regardless, the process of meeting new girls and dipping your dick will help you realize your precious snowflake really isn't as unique as you had imagined.

10. Have A Bad Attitude

A bad attitude will cockblock you worse then a 'mother-hen' in the club and will prevent you from maximizing your potential. Learn to have a good attitude. Your attitude creates your vibe and your vibe is the energy you put out when in public. Do you really think you can have a terrible attitude and approach that cute girl at the Gap and she won't notice? If you have a negative, depressed attitude then work on flipping it 180 degrees to positive and uplifting. You'll see a major difference.

9. Ignore Tried And True Game Advice

Reading ROK, other great blogs and game books won't help you at all if you ignore the advice. Myself and others have experienced years of trial and error to see exactly what works and what doesn't. If you ignore it, then don't be surprised if you don't have as much success then if you actually put it to use. Reading + Learning + Application = Positive Results.

8. Don't Approach

Nothing will prevent you from getting laid more, then not approaching girls. You have to put in the effort of approaching in order to reap the rewards of sex. Even if you're big into online dating, you still have to do virtual approaches by messaging girls or swiping to the right (Tinder). Turn it into a game and don't be so hard on yourself and you'll do just fine.

7. Hang Out With A Bad Wingman

Rolling with a bad wingman can cockblock you worse then anything else. There's nothing better then a great wingman and nothing worse then a bad wingman. If you don't have a great one to roll out and game with, then roll solo. Why make it harder then it has to be?

6. Neglect Your Style, Grooming And Fitness

If you expect to roll out of bed, throw on a dirty jersey, some old New Balances and neglect to shower, don't be surprised if girls are repelled by your presence. Put in the effort you'd like to see a girl put in. Does a girl with soiled sweat pants, Ugg boots, a big baggy sweatshirt and a greasy hair bun turn you on? Didn't think so. So expect the same level of care in your grooming, style and fitness for yourself: Excellence.

5. Get Angry When Rejected By A Girl

Anger can literally ruin your night or day while out gaming. You make an approach, get blown out and then become angry. Guess how you're going to do approaching the rest of the day or night? Terrible. Laugh off a rejection and keep it moving. There's far too many fish in the sea to get angry over a girl you don't even know. Let it go. Keep approaching.

4. Kiss Ass On A Date

You arrange to meet that cute chick from the Gap for drinks. Problem is you kiss her ass and act like a beta bitch boy the entire date. Shockingly, she decides to turn her head when you go for the kiss and ejects from the date early because "she has to get up early".

3. Text Her Back Immediately In Long Paragraphs

If your text game isn't on point, then besides reading this article, you should always avoid getting stuck in long texting conversations that lead to nowhere. Keep it short, with a hint of flirting and heavy on the logistics. It's much easier to build attraction in-person, then through text, so keep it short and get the in person meetup.

2. Be Afraid To Fail

If you're afraid of rejection, failing and getting ignored by girls, then game isn't for you. You must develop thick skin and learn….ready for it? To Not Give A Flying Fuck. If you have to repeat that over and over everyday that you don't give a fuck, until it's drilled into your brain and changes your behavior, then do so. Don't worry about the outcome, just put in the effort and keep moving. The results will show when you let go of being dependent on the outcome.

1. Believe You're Not Good Enough

Nothing will stand in your way quicker with being successful with women, then to think you're not good enough. You must develop your self-worth and self-respect.

You cannot expect to be respected, if you don't respect yourself.

You cannot expect to be the life of a house party, if you don't show yourself friendly.

You cannot expect girls to approach you, if you don't start approaching.

You cannot expect to get laid, if you do not put in the effort to make it happen.

Believe in yourself, put in the effort and watch your days of jerking off diminish and your nights with sexy girls increase.

Read Next: 5 Ways To Deal With The Ultimate Cockblock: Smartphones

Why Americans Should Reconsider Their Contempt for Today's Police

July 3, 2014 | by Henry Calgues | Link | Original Link

As a big fan of Return of Kings and a police officer for over ten years in a big city within America's midwest, I want to thank The Quiet Rebel for his article entitled, "How Should Men Deal With Today's American Police?" Not only was it well written, but it was very fair and lacked the usual rhetoric that internet coverage of law enforcement presents so often.

I appreciate it when an article begins the conversation of modern policing because it presents law enforcement, which is one of the most misunderstood professions in the world, an opportunity to defend itself. Unfortunately, since law enforcement has no voice and is a collective without a human face, it never does. Perhaps I can help.

When I began writing this article, I changed topics so many times because I have so much to say. It is simply impossible to get every point across that I would like so this has been narrowed down to an introductory defense of law enforcement. Since I cannot cover everything, I would like to offer a couple disclaimers. First, I am not a boy scout cop that is blinded by the pageantry of law enforcement. In fact, my favorite piece of literature is, "On the Duty of Civil Disobedience" by Henry David Thoreau. Second, I can be very critical of the police. I get in many arguments with fellow officers over our enforcement of stupid laws, our inability to control crime, and especially the police unions.

A fellow officer and I often discuss how we can foster change from within the system. We have come to the conclusion that mass change is unlikely, but we can step in occasionally on a case by case basis to interfere with the system when necessary. As supporters of gun rights, together we have saved quite a few men from being charged with gun crimes or violent crimes when they are acting in self-defense.

For example, I recall an incident when a large group of inner city black youth attacked a white man who was just walking down the street. During the attack, the white man pulled out a knife and cut one of the attackers pretty bad, sending him to the hospital. A sergeant at the time felt compelled to charge the white guy because of the nature of the injuries to the assailant and the use of a weapon. To make a long story short, I persuaded him not to charge him and he was released.

This may seem like common sense to most, but in the police world, liability and politics often force officers to make the simplest decisions that will require no defense on their part, often at the peril of innocent people's freedom. For example, the sergeant most likely felt it would be hard to explain to the attackers angry family why the victim was not charged since their child suffered the most severe injury, and especially since the victim was white. I have never minded explaining why I did the right thing.

On training

One point in the article that I'd like to address is the claim that law enforcement is trained to be antagonistic toward the public. Although I will never defend the bully cops or deny that they exist, you'll never get rid of them. There are almost one million officers in America. That means one million unique human beings with personalities from every spectrum. But I assure you, no officer is directly trained to be a bully. In fact, we spend hundreds of hours of training over our careers in customer service, diversity, community policing, problem solving, etc. They directly train us to be soft and accommodating. I've had to take classes in dealing with every type of human from a deaf person to a transgender. But there is one piece of training that indirectly trains us to be a bit more antagonistic and "trigger happy": watching video of police officers killed on duty.

Although this training is essential and its intentions are to improve officer safety, it certainly indirectly affects an officer's disposition toward citizens during various encounters. Training videos showing real footage of officers being murdered are often used to help officers learn from the mistakes of the fallen officer. As the proliferation of cameras continue, there is not much an officer does on his shift that is not recorded on video. Many departments even have lapel cameras now that are always recording. As a result, the more cameras there are, the more police murders are recorded, which causes officers to be inundated in training with video after video of officers being violently killed.

Some of these training videos are obtained through a network of classified footage used exclusively for training purposes and shared by law enforcement only. They are uncut, unedited, and brutal. I remember one cruiser cam video showing an officer who was gunned down by a guy with a rifle during a traffic stop. As the bad guy drove off, all that could be heard on the officer's microphone was his morbid gurgling and agonal breathing as he laid dying in the street all alone. At the time, all I could think was that somewhere his children were playing on a playground or reading in school while he died on the pavement. It was incredibly sad.

But then I replayed the video in my head and I heard the officer warn the guy six or seven times to put down the rifle before firing his first shot. I thought, "Why did he even warn him at all? That crazy bastard was loading his rifle right in front of you, what did you think he was going to do with it?! If he just would have shot him the moment he saw the gun, he would still be alive and his children would be with their father." My instructors agreed. That was the lesson we learned. Some will say that we learned to be a little more "trigger happy" and others will say that we learned to survive. Who is right?

I kiss my daughter and my son every night before I go to work. I'm terrified of being that officer. When I make a traffic stop and the guy gets out of his car against my wishes and reaches back into his car, it scares the living shit out of me. I think of that officer and I pull out my gun and yell at the guy to get back in his car. He looks back at me like I'm crazy and says he was only looking for his phone.

But what if I knew that guy had a warrant for armed robbery, and he was jumping out of his car to get away, but decided to grab his phone suddenly before running? As he climbs back out of the car, I see something silver in his hand and shoot him. I just shot an unarmed man. Some people think I should go to prison or at least be fired. Anton McDowell requested an explanation of why officers are not held accountable for their actions and felt like cops just protect each other.

The thin legal line

Police officers are often protected by law when they do stupid things, even if they accidentally kill someone. Consideration is made if they acted in "good faith" or "reasonably," and the "totality of the circumstances" are weighed. Police kick in the wrong door? Stupid mistake, but it wasn't malicious. Their paperwork was wrong and they thought they had the right address. Police shoot an unarmed man? Hell, if any person shoots an unarmed man but can reasonably explain why it happened and there is no evidence that it was malicious, then no charges will be filed.

In short, police officers are legally protected if they make most types of mistakes, including serious life ending mistakes. Why? Because who the hell would want this job if you couldn't make a mistake? I could hear this in a job interview: "You want me available to handle unpredictable, violent, life threatening situations over the course of a few decades, but I can't make a mistake? Fuck you!"

Fuck the police

If a few cops appear to be immune to justice when they misbehave, then why not harass, videotape, and embarrass all cops on the street and upload the videos to YouTube? Justice, right? Good news? Finally, law enforcement will be held accountable in the court of public opinion, correct? Shaming, embarrassing, and challenging law enforcement has been a recent trend on the internet. Some of it is genuine and raises necessary questions, but much of it is for attention, or worse to destroy the credibility of law and order as a whole in the spirit of anarchy or other leftist ideology that requires a breaking down of society and culture.

Ever wonder why mobs of juveniles are running rampant lately? Or why brazen criminals seem to be committing crime in broad daylight? Most cops are not that aggressive anymore. Here are some thoughts of a conscientious, modern American police officer who senses the change in public opinion toward him when he goes to work: “If life and death situations could land me in a coffin or prison, I will avoid life and death situations. If that mob of teens harassing people are just going to take video of me telling them to disperse while they laugh at me and post it on YouTube so anti-police fan boys can call me a pig, then I’ll just drive by.” This is happening. No cop admits it, but it is happening.

We used to enjoy the support of the educated, hard-working people of the community, but not so much anymore. The bad guys used to know that the cops were the extension of the values of the community and if you violated those values, you were on your own—and good luck with that. But those communities that upheld the values of the Ten Commandments for everyone now seem to only uphold the values of the Ten Amendments, and only selectively when it protects them or their group’s politics.

The bad guys know we are running scared from the court of public opinion. They know the public won’t back us. Now we chase after a burglary suspect through a nicer neighborhood in the city, protecting the property of that very neighborhood and residents come out and tell us that we are not allowed in their yard without a warrant. Do you know how hard it is to tell that guy to just go inside and not tell him to “Fuck off?”

Exodus

As violence increases and public support decreases, cops like me are on our way out. Years ago, cops didn’t know how early retirement worked or how much your pension was reduced if you left early because the job was great. Now, many cops sit around with calculators and cut their budgets to plan for a new career late in life.

Right now, you have the most honest and well-educated police departments that have ever existed whether you want to believe it or not. I work with former airline pilots, former accountants, former business owners, former counselors, former engineers, etc. Without your support and with the rise of anti-police sentiment, we are moving on. The ranks will be left with the cops who are either too old and too close to retirement or too dumb to find better work.

I myself have a plan in motion to resign, or as Thoreau puts it, “…leave that office to his dust at least.” Fuck this job. Do you think they are not going to fill our ranks when we all leave? And who will replace us? Do you think the system will right itself in our absence? Smart people are too smart to sign up today. I hear some people south of the border will need some jobs soon. They have probably been “dreaming” of the opportunity to serve and protect you.

Read Next: How Should Men Deal With Today's American Police?

Henry Calgues

AC is a cop on the brink of resignation. To find out why, check out his new blog at anonymouscop.com or like Anonymous Cop on Facebook Click here to view my Facebook page

3 Beta Habits That Some ROK Readers Need To Get Rid Of

July 3, 2014 | by Samson Lamont | Link | Original Link

I've noticed a disturbing trend here at ROK. A collection of individuals have emerged who enjoy espousing commonly known alpha concepts, yet simultaneously exhibit remarkably beta tendencies. I refer to them as purple pill. Not fully blue, but certainly not fully red either.

I try to take their nonsense with a grain of salt, mainly because most of them are obvious trolls. For the ones who are sincere, they are trying to undo a minimum of 20+ years of feminist brainwashing, which does not happen overnight. Once we've had our eyes opened to the truth of masculinity, we crap out all that blue beta poison. Unfortunately, as with most excretions of this size, some remnants remain.

This transition process is critical because it is when a newly made man is most likely to fall back into old habits. Like any addiction, relapses are common, and beta traits that are not befitting a man still rear their ugly heads from time to time. I feel it's important to recognize these bad habits to prevent them from hindering our self-improvement and growth as men. Here are three bad habits we need to lose:

1. Arguing

Arguing is a waste of time. A man does not argue with anyone. Using good old-fashioned plain speaking, he succinctly makes his point and doesn't belabor it. If you agree with him, great; if not, he doesn't really give a shit. If you're obviously on opposite sides of the fence, his time is too valuable to waste trying to get you to see his point, and he has no interest in seeing yours.

Don't be fooled by people who say they just want to engage in "debate". Debate is just a fancy word for an argument and should be left to politicians, talking heads, and insecure people in love with the sound of their own voice (typically intellectuals), who all have a pathetic need to convince themselves and others that they're as smart as they like to think they are.

As arguing is an inherently feminine trait, it usually devolves into childish ad hominem attacks, loss of composure, and irrational hysterics over trivial matters, none of which any man should partake in. It's also why most of the kids on your high school debate team were girls, their beta orbiters, or closeted homos.

I've seen people on this site go back and forth over the course of an hour, and I can't help but think two things:

1. How much self-improvement could you have engaged in during this time?

and

2. What are you doing with your life that you have this much free time to argue with a stranger on the internet?

Men who are seizing life by the balls don't have excess time to argue with strangers on the internet because they are too busy being winners by building a business, improving their minds and bodies, and approaching women. Minimize your time on the computer and join the club.

In a perfect world, people who like to engage in pointless arguments would get Conneried with extreme prejudice.

2. Ad Hominem Attacks

An argument should not be confused with a discussion, where two men engage in a sharing of ideas or opinions in a mature and civilized manner, and can respectfully disagree without engaging in ad hominem attacks, which is the last resort of a person who either likes to argue but has no argument, or who lacks the discipline to control their emotions. Women are not the only ones with rationalization hamsters, and attacking someone with juvenile name-calling allows a weak-minded beta male to feel strong and rationalize his lack of a counterpoint by "telling someone off".

The weakness of the person is especially telling if they resort to this tactic right out of the gate with absolutely no provocation. I can only assume that most of ROK's readers are millennials who grew up engaging in this form of communication, whereby your ability to "diss" someone is more impressive than presenting cogent points. Typically the more excessive the name-calling, the weaker the argument is.

This is also a great indicator of troll methodology, using personal attacks to incite an emotional response to divert attention from the rational discussion at hand, eventually devolving it into Yo' Mama jokes (I've actually seen this happen). Since ROK is a website devoted to masculinity, our trolls are feminists, manginas, and white knights. All three groups share the same basic feminist mindset and we know that feminists like cursing excessively to feel manlier, so when you see this tactic, recognize that you're dealing with either a feminist troll or a weak-minded beta and ignore them as they're not worth your time.

3. Seeking Approval

A very common phrase I've seen passed around recently is "this is going to ruin our credibility".

We are a traditional masculinity website in 2014 America. We live in a society completely dominated by radical feminist ideology that has been conditioned for the last 45 years to consider our brand of masculinity toxic and hateful. We publish articles stating that women who cut off their hair are damaged, when every female celebrity idolized by women is doing just that. We reserve entire weeks to shame sluts and fatties, while the society you're worried about appeasing believes garbage like this. News flash, gentlemen: we have no credibility to ruin.

Approval is for betas, women, children, and dogs. Men neither seek nor need it. What we do need is to stop whining and crying about how we're going to be perceived by society. Unless all of our articles from now on are titled "I've Seen the Light: The Patriarchy is Real" or "How I Learned To Stop Being A Misogynist and Acknowledge Women As Men's Equals", the feminist-dominated mainstream media in the West will never give us any credibility. To society, we are the outcasts. The creeps. The assholes. The losers.

If you truly believe that the feminist horde will just wake up one day and say they were wrong, ROK is right, and they're ready to be chaste girls then I have a bridge in Brooklyn to sell you. Evidence, facts, and reality cannot penetrate the shield of cognitive dissonance they've erected in their minds. This site is not about convincing women to see our point of view, but rather helping males become men. Where strong men lead, women follow, regardless of how feminist they are.

At the time of this article, Jizzabel's Fakebook page has 488,316 likes. Femifisting has 124,976. ROK has 9,111. That should put into perspective where we stand. I check out these sites periodically because I like to know my enemy, and the one thing that stands out in stark contrast to our site is this: unity. Their comments section is virtually devoid of the petty squabbling that you see here. While their thought processes are clearly out of touch with reality, at least they are in agreement within their delusion.

Meanwhile, we're busy calling someone a faggot because they had the audacity to learn a system of martial arts we don't approve of, instead of applauding the fact they're learning to defend themselves instead of sitting at home playing Warcraft or masturbating to anime porn.

We need to grow up and recognize that we're vastly outnumbered and falling victim to feminist trolling and infighting is only going to further fracture and divide what is already a small collective. This site is meant to be a safe haven where men can be men, a place where we don’t engage in the same crap as the society we left behind. Let’s not turn ROK into the Fakebook of the manosphere.

Read Next: 5 Pieces Of Advice For Men Who Are Tired Of Being Beta

Samson Lamont

What Does The 4th Of July Mean In Modern Times?

July 4, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

A History Lesson

On the 4th of July, 1776, the original thirteen American colonies declared their independence from the British Empire in the form of the Declaration Of Independence. After 86 revisions of Thomas Jefferson's original draft, the Continental Congress approved it, officially marking America has an independent nation. Since that faithful day of 1776 (or, at least when the American Revolution ended), the 4th of July has always been a national day of celebration; where people cherish everything that America stands for.

America has always been the land of the free, and the home of the brave. The lands where people have rights to pursue the American dream of a white picketed house in the suburbs, fatherhood, and a successful career, among other goals. I don't need to go into more detail on these topics as they have already been covered in great detail in the ROK archives.

But the fact that these original American goals, dreams, and ways of life have become such a black hole means that the meaning of the 4th of July has changed over time. So what does the 4th of July mean in our modern era?

The 4th of July has become nothing more than another commercial holiday: another excuse to get drunk, eat junk food, and escape the grind of the workforce for one measly day. While people might dress up in red, white, and blue, it's hard to imagine that true American spirit still holds the same meaning as it did when our founding fathers signed their names on the Declaration Of Independence. How can it, when the true American dream has been utterly ripped apart and stomped on by poor government spending, a welfare system that greatly promotes the scum of society mooching off of the hard workers, and work environments so toxic that a large portion of the population resembles roly polys from sitting at their desks all day?

Our founding fathers are rolling over in their graves.

This is not what they envisioned, I'm sure. Yet, every year as summer rolls around, we bring out the beer coolers, march like robots in cheesy parades, and light off fireworks (if you're lucky enough to live in an area you can actually buy them yourself) to celebrate the American dream that is now buried with Thomas Jefferson and the rest of the Continental Congress. I mean, a contest where we watch people shove dozens of hot dog down their throats in a matter of minutes is one of the most popular 4th of July events.

Hypocritical disclaimer: I am spending my 4th of July drinking and participating in a giant marshmallow fight on the beach. It seems patriotic, right?

Modern Day 4th Of July

Despite the problems I've posed above, there is a light to be gleaned from this.

This community at ROK is still free. While societal odds might be stacked against us, we know how to push forward as men and continue to achieve our goals and dreams; despite the fact that those goals may not flow with the old-fashioned American dream.

But screw that, because now we have the whole world at our fingertips. Rather than your suburbia neighborhood, you are free to explore the beaches of South America or the beautiful architecture of Europe. Rather than grinding out your own career, you can make a living off of the Internet. Rather than put up with the American dating scene, you can use it to score all of the free, easy sex you want.

Maybe it's time to put a new spin on the 4th of July. Rather than speaking in misery of what America used to be, and what it has become, think of the 4th of July as your time to sit back, reflect, and realize how lucky we all are to have taken the red pill – American dream be damned.

Have a safe and happy 4th of July.

Read More: The Holidays: Amateur Nights on Steroids

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Black Propaganda In Feminism: Part III

July 4, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

While watching the blow up of the #endfathersday hash tag on twitter, I noticed one twitter user referenced on the news was one I was familiar with.

"Naynay" is a sock puppet used by "Bavarian" in his various black propaganda campaigns against online feminists. I have written about some of them previously here and here. After reading other articles about him and his operation, I decided to go straight to the source. I interviewed him on Skype. Here it is:

Douglas: What are the motivations and goals of your group?

Bavarian: (1) We wanted the world to wake up to what deception is and how it's used to control us; and (2) we wanted to humiliate the most bigoted, hateful, sexist, racists on the planet.My personal motivation is the forced resignation of Lawrence Summers. Are you familiar with that?

Douglas: Not quite

Bavarian: I should clarify: I was upset about his forced resignation.

Douglas: Lawrence Summers, the former president of Harvard University?

Bavarian: Yes.He was forced to resign for proposing a theory about why women weren't represented in certain fields. I saw this as an attack on free speech, and at Harvard of all places.

Douglas: Why did you choose to utilize such a subversive method?

Bavarian: Because it works.

Douglas: How effective was it with #endfathersday?

Bavarian: Everything happened according to plan. We agitated them until they finally caught on, then our deep sleepers led the purge.

Douglas: Led the purge?

Bavarian: Our deep sleepers were waiting for us to get caught to start accusing real accounts of being Lollipop Operatives.

Douglas: So you are literally involved with ferreting out feminist sock puppets?

Bavarian: Not me, specifically. Our operatives are though.

Douglas: I noticed in some of the articles about "Operation Lollipop" that you are identified as an MRA (men's rights activist) or PUA (pick up artist), are you either of those?

Bavarian: Absolutely not.

Douglas: Why would people try to label you as either then?

Bavarian: I don't know. I want to save free speech, especially at institutions of higher learning. They can call me whatever they want. I learned in grade school to just ignore name calling.

Douglas: You seem like a very interesting man. Care to tell me anything about yourself?

Bavarian: What would you like to know?

Douglas: Who you are, your history and what you are about if you don't mind.

Bavarian: Okay. I grew up in West Germany during the Cold War. From there I moved from place-to-place. I was always the new kid. I graduated college, then served 14 months in Iraq as a convoy escort. I saw children living in mud houses who were actually happy with their lot in life. Then I came back to America where I saw fat spoiled adults complaining about the slightest inconvenience. I desperately wanted to make a change. That's all I'm comfortable giving out.

Douglas: Have you learned anything new or interesting from your various twitter operations?

Bavarian: I honestly believe that historians will look at what we did and conclude that we lived in an Orwellian society.

Douglas: Was the response from feminists and various media outlets expected or was there anything unexpected?

Bavarian: The worst they can do is name calling. We expected that. Kids used to say I had cooties back when I was in grade school. It really got to me back then. Now I just laugh at it.

Douglas: Do you plan on conducting similar operations in the future?

Bavarian: Several operations are ongoing. But I want people to wake up and realize that this sort of thing happens to them all the time.

Douglas: Do you think your opponents will be able to effectively counter your methods?

Bavarian: I'm not sure. The only reason this operation was so successful is because white women who claim to be feminists are legitimately racist. They only care about advancing their own careers. They couldn't care less about women in other countries.

Douglas: Is there anyone you would like to give a shout out or thanks to?

Bavarian: History is full of men and women who were tortured and killed for merely proposing a scientific theory that turned out to be true. I'd like to thank them. And like I said, what happened to Lawrence Sumers gave me the motivation to strike back. I love Harvard and I would like to see it return to the bastion of free speech that it once was.

Douglas: Any final thoughts?

Bavarian: George Orwell and Aldous Huxley warned us of what would happen to society. We've come to the point where we are attacked for our gender by being called sexist, and we are attacked for our race by being called racist. The irony is too much. I encourage everyone to speak the truth, especially tenured academics.

Douglas: Thank You for your time Bavarian, I look forward to your future projects.

Bavarian: Sure thing.

This concept of subversion done outside of a state actor is quite interesting. I look forward to seeing where it pops up next.

Read Next: Black Propaganda in Feminism

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

5 Quick Tips That Helped Me Get Laid More

July 4, 2014 | by darkjohanson | Link | Original Link

Despite many years of approaching girls in bars (on and off, with the occasional seasonal break in LTRs), I ultimately grew unsatisfied with the volume of results I have gotten. Don't get me wrong, it got me more than I would have ever gotten without game, but I felt I could do better. Here's what worked for me:

1. Don't apologize

This one is pretty self-explanatory, but I will give you an example. Recently, I picked up a girl and brought her back to my place. For whatever reason, I was wearing a half-boner and after two bare thrusts inside her, I came. We are talking breaking-a-personal-record type of quick. Instead of apologizing I just laid on the side of the bed and kept my cool. The girl did not call me out or reproach me at any point. Obviously she was still horny as fuck, but besides making out heavily, no negative vibes.

I called for a 15-minute break to recover and after that I got my boner in full force this time. We started fucking and after a while, as if by divine retribution I was struggling to come and could see her pussy was hurting at this point. She tried to let me continue three times, until I just brushed the issue aside and stopped. How did she react? She looked embarrassed and said: I hope you don't hate me now. Despite having come as fast as lightning immediately before, on the opposite situation (having her come before me) she felt guilty. Magic? No, just stop apologizing.

2. Everything you say is golden

You know that time when you run out of things to say to a girl? Well, ramble on, because it doesn't matter. If she's feeling you, she's gonna sit through all that talk to stroke your ego. Say whatever you want with a face that hints at you believing your bullshit and standing 100% behind it. This gave me an incredible confidence boost that helped me get over the bump I would reach early on in approaches. What used to kill me is not the fact that I did not know what to say (I tend to have a way with bullshit)—it was the insecurity that would take over me and ultimately fizzle out the conversation as a result.

3. Kill the interaction instead of letting it die out

Don’t let the excitement of the interaction disappear. How? By escalating constantly, even if you are sure it won’t work. Ask her to come with you somewhere, for a date next week or (better) to dance right then and there. If it doesn’t fly, you found out she wasn’t feeling you and saved your time. Get out of there, onto the next one.

Having the willingness to leave at any time, creates a feeling of loss that prompts her to ‘go for it’ if she’s interested. Case in point: a few Saturdays ago, upon approaching a girl that was leaving with her friends and chatting her up a bit, I asked her to dance. She said no and as I was about to leave, she asked me for a date the following week. We met and banged that same evening.

4. Bring your expectations to zero

It doesn’t matter what step of the pickup you find yourself in: this broad doesn’t owe you shit. It doesn’t matter if you just met her, you are making out or she’s laying on your bed with her legs spread. Always have a notion in the back of your head that something can and probably will go wrong. Be prepared. There’s no done deal until she lets your dick thrust through her vagina.

The same applies with setting crazy expectations for yourself. Regardless of your level of game, do everything one step at a time. Don’t look at other runners in the race or the road itself: you are just focusing on where you are and your immediate next step. What I mean by this is to avoid falling into the downward spiral of trying to psych yourself with your buddies before going out that you all are getting laid tonight. No. Don't set yourself up for disappointment. Instead, think that you are just going to hang out in a bar and see where the night takes you. You know that if you see a beautiful girl you will approach her, but don't set impossible standards on yourself that may deter you from your goals. How do I do this?

Setting simple and attainable objectives relative to your progress with a girl. First, your goal is to talk to her. If she engages in the interaction (i.e. replies when you talk to her, asks you questions, smiles, etc), your goal can be to isolate her from her friends if she's in a group or go for the kiss or number. Once you have that down, my next objective would be to bang her or take her out on a date. You see where this is going: Whatever it is you want, always figure out the next immediate step. The rest may not even happen, so no need to burn the fuse thinking about it.

5. Work on your weaknesses

Figure out what your strengths are and then go for the opposite. My case: I had been focusing on indirect approach in bars for years. Basically 'talking her up' until I could isolate her to the dancefloor or a terrace. Although it worked on occasion, it proved to be filled with more cockblocking than I thought possible. I had always ignored the dancefloor as a viable option for approaching since it was more physical and aggressive than I was comfortable with at the time. I considered chatting up people one of my strong points, so why not focus on that? You want to know what happened when I started trying approaches on the dancefloor?

I blew up. I couldn't recognize myself. I always wondered: what do these guys say to girls? And the answer, as some of you might be suspecting is: it doesn't even fucking matter. If the chick is not into you she won't even give you the time of day. Some would throw a very distinct look as if asking you non-verbally, "Who do you think you are to fathom the idea of interacting with such a fine specimen such as myself?" Other girls will politely excuse themselves or attempt to give you some baseless reasoning. Don't even fight it, just ignore them and move on. Whatever you are selling, they are not buying. Find the ones who do.

For example: you are on the dancefloor and see a girl you like. Approach her, touch her on the shoulder, and ask a question. Anything. Bonus points if you ask something that showcases situational awareness such as:

- "What was that fight about?"
- "Why are you wearing that silly hat, is it your birthday?"
- "How tall are you?" (this has worked wonders for me, it gets out her insecurities if your vibe is right)
- "How's your night going?"
- "How are you tonight?"

Follow up a few very simple questions, make a few comments, ask her for her name and when she shakes your hand, turn her around and start dancing (alternatively, if you want to be more boring, ask her to dance). One way or another, either she lets you continue or stops you. If you got the green light, go ahead, you should be clear for at least a makeout or some grinding. Dancefloor approaches are great to cut to the chase. They save you time and allow you to get physical really fast.

Final notes

In short, what worked for me is to never apologize, ramble on with confidence, and kill interactions by pushing the envelope as far as it goes. Setting your expectations close to zero sets you up for success—nothing can go wrong if you do your best without unrealistic goals adding up insecurity (this obviously doesn't give you a free pass at not doing shit for the whole night and justifying it on low expectations).

Finally, switching gears and practicing a modality I haven't been too keen on in the past (bar approaches vs. dancefloor approaches) increased the output of my game. For you it can be transitioning from night game to day game, going from indirect to direct approaches—it's up to you to figure it out. Hopefully these tips will help you grow as much as they did me.

Read More: How To Increase Your Sexual Prospects Before Even Using Game

---

darkjohanson

Darkjohanson is a man destined to learn the fine art of pulling girls sober in an alcoholic country. Detractor of 'smart' phones, social media and porn.

Why Women Are Like Cats And Men Are Like Dogs

July 5, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

Let’s revisit this ‘classic’ analogy again.

Even if you feel like it’s…

DEJA POO:

The feeling that you’ve heard this crap before.

CATS:

Cats are beautiful creatures. So are women. Especially when it comes to their faces, and more so their eyes. Staring in a cat's eyes for long, can mesmerize you. So can a woman's.

Cats are manipulative, prodigal creatures that only want you when they want you. Try picking up a cat at any time, and see how it will scratch you. A cat's affection for you is essentially an act of investment on it's end. There is nothing more fake than the dishonest affection of a cat, irrespective of its type. Cats only need affection on their own terms.

Cats know how to insinuate themselves into your affection, even if they are useless creatures. "Aw, look at the poor cute little thing!" A cat is a master at turning its weakness into its advantage. It would meekly rub its soft fur against you to garner attention. It would purr softly and sensually as you stroke it. It snuggles softly into your body, making you believe that it needs and 'loves' you, but what it actually needs is the warmth of your body.

Cats are opportunistic. Cats live on opportunity. They stalk their prey. Women are the same, for they are hypergamous.

Cats are practically useless creatures. On an average, Cats spent 16 hours sleeping and the rest eating and lazing around. Cats can't defend your home. A cat will only fight to defend itself, but never you. A cat's life is engrossed with itself, and trying to exploit the resources of its master, without being of use in return. Cats are basically domesticated parasites.

Cats enslave you. A cat's often 'purpose' in your home is to act cute. As mentioned above, they're practically useless animals. Any home having a cat will be forced to acquiesce itself to its feline member. Essentially humans are the pets of cats, and not the other way around.

Cats are cruel and merciless creatures. Observe a cat with its prey (e.g. with a rat or an insect). A cat will play around with its prey's half dead body before devouring it, much like a psychopath. Women more or less exhibit the same tendencies.

Cats can fuck up your home. Cats are worst when it comes to your furniture. A cat will happily allow itself to sharpen its claws on your furniture and ruin it.

Cats are insensitive and selfish creatures. Cats don't think of anything, except themselves. Cats are essentially selfish creatures, except when it comes to their offspring. But a female cat is again never so protective of its young as a bitch is.

Cats are thieving parasites. A cat's habit of stealing is legendary. The stealth predator that they are, cats will not hesitate to help itself to your stuff without permission. It's a cat's entitled nature to your stuff, as you've honored yourself by adopting it.

Cats are narcissistic creatures. A cat spends most of its time eating, exploring (to hunt or steal), sleeping, lazing around and preening itself.

Cats have seductive and feminine allure. Look at the graceful movements of a cat. Observe the lazy seductive stretches of its body. Cats are the natural exhibitors of female sex appeal. Any woman wanting to learn seductive female body language could learn well from observing a cat, and carry herself in a similar fashion. Humans have always been seduced by this appeal of these creatures from history.

Cats make valuable pets — to feminists.

Cats are disloyal creatures. As explained above, cats are only loyal to themselves, not to their masters. Cats are essentially mercenaries.

DOGS:

Dogs are honorable and loyal creatures, exhibiting essentially masculine virtues. A dog's greatest quality is in its loyalty and honor when it comes to their masters. Dogs will always stick with you watch your back.

Dogs are intelligent, versatile and useful creatures. From guarding your home, giving you company and giving hope to humans in a modern world where the word loyalty has just become a tattoo, dogs are versatile pets. You can train a dog like no other animal.

Dogs are brave creatures. A dog's bravery is legendary. So much that they were employed in war and domesticated to guard homes and livestock .

Dogs are self sacrificing creatures. A dog may run away when it comes to personal safety, but rarely backs down from danger especially when it comes to the safety of its master. A dog will fight for you and can even die for you. A dog's spirit is essentially that of self sacrifice.

Dogs love doggy style. And so do men. No brainer there.

Dogs are often ignored, in lieu of cats. This happens usually in households where both the creatures are adopted. The dog's loyalty and value is often ignored for the parasitical, undeserving and useless cat's seductive appeal. Dispensable beauty often beats indispensable efficiency. This is just like how men—the indispensable gender necessary for the building of civilization—have become dispensable in modern societies.

A master can fool a dog, but not a cat. Dogs are trusting animals when it comes to their masters. Men are the same when it comes to their women. On the other hand, cats don't trust you, even if you've raised them for long. One act of admonishment is enough for a cat to act as if it's not your pet. Dogs can be fooled, because they're essentially forgiving animals. Cats rarely forgive, but expect to be forgiven.

Dogs are sensitive creatures. Especially to a lack of love from their masters.

Dogs are direct and honest animals. A dog's efforts to gain your attention are direct, not a subtle gauged seduction of you like a cat. But the problem with dogs is that they can't act feminine and cute like cats to gain your attention. Dogs will lick you, bark at you and act funny so that you notice them. That's how men are. A man's sex drive and affections are the same – honest and direct. There is nothing deceptive about his interest in a woman than an erection when he sees her.

Dogs bear responsibility and adversity with fortitude. Dogs were domesticated to guard homes. The role of a guardian is a life of responsibility and peril. Dogs are masters at handling both eventualities with fortitude.

Dogs need freedom. One of the worst things people do to their pet dogs is to tie them up. A dog needs to explore and see the world, or it howls and becomes very aggressive. Dogs live for freedom.

Dogs are patient creatures. Until pushed too far. Cats are essentially impatient, and don't tolerate unwanted attention at all.

Dogs can be easily assuaged. Your dog's howling for some fresh air and freedom? Give it some food. Rub it. Dogs can be easily assuaged, and usually settle for little from their masters. A cat will move over to your neighbor's home to find what it's not getting from you. Dogs are essentially slave-like, while cats are mercenaries.

Dogs need love, and are receptive to affection. Dogs are happy with little, and need your company all the time. A dog without a master is indeed a sad dog.

Dogs are a man's best friend. Period. A dog will never leave you, even in adverse situations. Men are the same. A man will take a bullet for his loved ones, his country, his tribe or a fellow man.

The biggest analogy? Just like how dogs do all their life, men chase cats, i.e. women. Even with the reversal of gender roles and tastes in the modern world.

Being called a dog and being called a son of a bitch are two different things. While the latter is essentially offensive and derogatory, being called a dog is essentially honorable if you consider the above points. The Mongols honored dogs in their culture. Genghis Khan famously called his commander Subudei "one of his dogs of war" – not in a derogatory sense, but to compliment Subudei on his loyalty, bravery and honor. Calling someone a cat is derogatory when taking a cat's parasitical personality into consideration. A dog is an honorable and loyal creature, very much displaying the essence of true masculinity. But like men, it ironically gets the flak despite all its usefulness, so much that it's name itself becomes a curse word.

Beta programming of modern men has often made them to behave in feminine ways like cats, and feminist modern women are behaving like masculinized bitches. Considering that, this analogy could rather be modified as "Why women were like cats, and men were like dogs."

Read More: Treat Women Like Pets If You Want Them To Stay Attracted To You

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Can Female Circumcision Prevent Throat Cancer In Men?

July 5, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Recently, Forbes ran an article alleging that thousands of men including JP Morgan CEO Jamie Dimon have been getting throat cancer in epidemic proportions due to HPV.

> But it's very possible that Dimon has been swept up, along with thousands of other men, by an increasingly common disease: throat cancer caused by infection with the human papilloma virus, or HPV.
>
> "It wouldn't be unusual," says Eric Genden, chief of head and neck oncology at the Mount Sinai Hospital in New York. "This is an epidemic."
>
> …

> How do you get HPV cancer? HPV is sexually transmitted. It's mainly known as a cause of cervical cancer, which is what happens when it infects women. But men can get it by performing cunnilingus. It's also possible, though less likely, that it can be transmitted by kissing. Eighty percent of sexually active people between the ages of 14 and 44 have had oral sex with an opposite sex partner. Researchers estimate that HPV throat cancer in men will be more common than cervical cancer in women in the U.S.

Jamie Dimon wouldn't be the first to get throat cancer through oral sex. Last year, actor Michael Douglas said his throat cancer was also caused by HPV.

> Asked whether he now regretted his years of smoking and drinking, usually thought to be the cause of the disease, Douglas replied: “No. Because without wanting to get too specific, this particular cancer is caused by HPV [human papillomavirus], which actually comes about from cunnilingus.”

Thousands of men are dying each year from infected female genitals. And not just any men—Forbes describes these men as “men at the peak of their lives and professional power”—or as we like to call them, alpha males. These aren’t just men who are sexually attractive to large numbers of women, but the ones most attentive to the sexual pleasure of their female partners. Truly our best and brightest. How can we stop this “epidemic” from claiming their lives?

I offer a modest proposal: female circumcision.

Female circumcision would remove all the the genital tissue associated with STD transmission when oral sex is performed on a woman, creating a smooth keratinized surface free from cancer spreading bodily fluids. While it may seem like an extreme measure, here are a few reasons we need to begin circumcising women in America:

We Already Cut One Gender To Protect Another

There is historical precedent for cutting the genitals of one gender to protect another from STD transmissions, and specifically HPV transmission. In 1954, researcher Ernest Wynder suggested that smegma found in men’s foreskins was causing cervical cancer in their partners. (It was later discovered his research subjects were not sexually educated enough to know if they or their partners were circumcised.) Though there is a link between cervical cancer and HPV, the link between circumcision and cervical cancer was later disproved, but not before becoming such a strong cultural meme that many doctors still use this myth to justify cutting men's genitals.

Smegma was thought to be behind STD transmission in intact men. Smegma is of course a naturally occurring lubricant secreted by the genitals of both men and women, thought to have bacteria killing functions. The word smegma comes from the Greek word for soap. When a woman gets wet, her body is producing smegma. Women naturally produce more smegma than men, and any man who performs oral sex on a woman probably swallows some of her smegma. If smegma spreads STDs —and in particular HPV—and women have more smegma than men, then it is imperative we begin circumcising women as quickly as possible to protect men from this public health threat.

The AAP Has Already Supported Female Circumcision

In 2010, the American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) released a policy statement which stated that pediatricians should be allowed to perform a "ritual nick" on girls genitals for immigrant parents who come from cultures that circumcise women. The policy statement said that since pediatricians already perform the significantly more invasive procedure of male circumcision, they should be allowed to draw blood from the genitals of little girls to satisfy the demands of parents.

> However, the ritual nick suggested by some pediatricians is not physically harmful and is much less extensive than routine newborn male genital cutting. There is reason to believe that offering such a compromise may build trust between hospitals and immigrant communities, save some girls from undergoing disfiguring and life-threatening procedures in their native countries, and play a role in the eventual eradication of FGC.

The AAP policy quickly retracted their policy due to outcry from anti-FGC (Female Genital Cutting) groups and Intact America, but if "because parents want it" is sufficient reason for a national American medical organization to pull down a little girls pants and driving a sharp object into her clitoris, saving the lives of our best and brightest cunnilinguists is a good enough reason to reopen the debate.

We Used To Practice Female Circumcision In America

Female circumcision wasn't outlawed until 1996. As Patricia Robinett, a woman circumcised by the American medical system, details in her book The Rape of Innocence: Female Genital Mutiliation & Circumcision in the USA female circumcision used to common enough in the United States to be covered by Blue Cross Shield and other medical insurance companies. Playgirl actually ran an article in the 1970s suggesting female circumcision might increase female sexual pleasure.

It Would Bring Greater Gender Equality

The United States is spending millions of dollars in grant money to circumcise Africans to prevent HIV, based on research that has been called both ethically and scientifically questionable. Shouldn't women get some of that grant money too? Men get 100% of the genital cutting in America, and women get none. It's time to change that. Female circumcision shouldn't just be legal, it should be federally subsidized like birth control. Women should be in the streets protesting religious groups that refuse to pay for their employees female circumcision. It is our duty to support women in whatever they need to express their sexuality, including removing parts of their sex to make the sex they have safe sex.

Activists against male genital cutting say that condoms already prevent HIV transmission better than any surgery. While that may be true of the penis, who uses a dental dam when going down on a woman? Anyone? As comedian Patrice O'Neal humorously notes most women shame men who try to use protection when going down on a woman. Men are so thirsty, they will literally drink cancer before risk offending their female partners.

It's time to make sex safe again. It's time for equality. It's time for female circumcision.

Read More: Negative HIV Tests For Sale

Eric Crowley

Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

The Myth Of Male Power

July 6, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

One of the greatest—if not the greatest—blind spots of feminism is its inability to understand the reality of being a man. Feminists assume that men have privilege at the expense of women, since men typically hold the positions in life they desire: the politicians, the CEO's and the professions with power. What they ignore is the men who don't have power in society: the garbagemen, the pizza delivery drivers and other jobs with little or no power. The notion that men have hoarded all this social power and refuse to share it with women isn't that laughable since it has poisoned the well of heterosexual relations. This critical lack of insight into the reality of men in society is the damning indictment of feminism.

Warren Farrell came to this conclusion, but only after many years as a feminist. In the 1970's, Dr. Farrell gave many rousing speeches to the roaring approval of women, in which he roasted men for their sexism, laziness and their generalized inability to live up to women's standards. He noted that the vast majority of the attendees at his speeches were women, he noted that he was drawn in to the approval he got from women. He eventually realized that most any criticism that women made of men he called "insight" and that any criticism of women by men was deemed "sexism." Once he realized that he was by and large only listening to women, he found out that he was ignoring the pain and anguish of men.

Dr. Warren Farrell

Throughout the ’80’s, his views on feminism and male/female relations underwent significant changes. He published Why Men Are The Way They Are in 1988, hoping that his book targeted at helping women understand men would also strike men as being truthful. The next few years lead him to research issues affecting men and this resulted in his book, The Myth Of Male Power.

In the book, he notes that his book isn’t the opposite of feminism—that society is matriarchal and female-dominated—but takes a Clintonian approach of triangulating what feminists got right and merging it with the reality of men in society. His aim wasn’t just to shed light on what what society misunderstands about the male experience, but framing in such a way that allows men and women to repair the broken institution of marriage and light it anew with understanding, compassion and love. In order to do this, he argued that we have to correct feminist narratives of male privilege.

At the outset, he makes the amusing observation that feminists are quick to say that God might actually be a woman, but never make the argument that the Devil is a woman. Feminism has spent all of its energies of edifying women and demonizing men. It has refused to recognize the real and substantive value men have brought to society and covered up misbehavior by women. In sum, he notes that feminism has ignored so much of the reality about men and women that somebody needs to clear the muddied waters. And he does.

Just in the first chapter, he makes many compelling observations. For example, he observes that in 1992, Japan underwent serious economic contraction and it was revealed that Japanese women had invested billions of dollars that their husbands knew nothing of. Traditional narratives of men recklessly destroying their family finances and women who were subject to their husband's control of the purse were blown wide open as it was revealed that women were directing incredible amounts of money without their husband's knowledge.

Further he cites specific examples debunking male privilege. He notes that black women outlive white men, female-headed households have 141% of the net worth as male-head households and men kill themselves at much higher rates – suicide for men over 85 years old is 1,350% higher than women over 85 years old. He discusses the power women have over young children and how marketing caters to women. In sum, he notes that women, as a class, exert great amounts of power over the world around them that we refuse to acknowledge.

He goes on in subsequent chapters to discuss issues related to divorce, media representation and other issues that society misjudges about men and women. Considering the weight of "evidence" against his claims, he spends quite a bit of time bolstering his observations with litanies of studies to justify his assertions. His claims are rational, impassioned and calculated to consider the women who would read the book. Until the final chapters of the book, the book is a fine and balanced read.

At the conclusion of the book, he builds more on his views of relationships between men and women and how to better them. He falsely relies on the feminist assertion that marriages pre-feminism were based purely on need and convenience. He goes on to talk about different modes of marriage and how to achieve more loving relations between men and women. This part of the book falls completely flat, as he has the progression in reverse: marriages used to be about love and, nowadays, are about appearances, economics and sheer convenience. His intentions here are noble, but his solutions are not workable.

He published the book in 1993, during a period of time not receptive to his message in the slightest. Anita Hill and Lorena Bobbitt were prominent figures in media, as media outlets wanted to push narratives of women as victims at the hands of sexist men. His book was condemned roundly by most progressive types—and most likely prompted Susan Faludi to write Stiffed a handful of years later—but also had quite a bit of support from prominent people like David Horowitz and Camille Paglia. His book caused many feminists to swoon from the realization that men don't have this all-powerful staff of male privilege; it caused others to see the book as a talisman to lead them out of the quagmire of feminist gender theory.

That being said, he has inadvertently helped give birth to the Men's Rights Movement. Issues around feminist ignorance on the reality of being a man are most assuredly deserving of understanding, but he has unintentionally aided a class of men who refuse to help themselves. The reason feminists hate MRA's with such a violent passion is that they are a reflection of feminists, a class of people who refuse to better themselves and refuse to understand that society doesn't oppress people, but teaches them to lie to themselves.

For all the good The Myth Of Male Power has done with its penetrating insight into the reality of male/female relations in society, it didn't provide any workable solutions to repair male/female relations and has given men a tool to masquerade as victims in society. It forcefully debunked many feminist misinterpretations of society, but it also has provided a political avenue for men to pretend that society hates them or discriminates against them simply because they are men.

Society hurts men in many ways, but to conclude that society hates men is same mistake that many women and feminists make. Just because society burdens you in ways that you think are unfair, it does not mean society is targeting you directly. Any civilization is a delicate balance and most traditions or changes to tradition are ways of maintaining a sense of equilibrium. For example, child custody orders that favor women don't happen because society discriminates against men or hates men, but because said approach maintains the peace as best it can be maintained.

In sum, The Myth Of Male Power is an incredibly important contribution to American letters, as it rectifies the inadequacy of feminist narratives on gender relations. Noted problems with the book does not detract from the supreme importance of challenging and refuting feminist nonsense on relations between men and women. In order to heal the grievous wounds to heterosexual relations, we must first start with reality, not just for women, but also for men. Farrell's trailblazing book is just one step forward in the needed conversation about the myth of male privilege.

Read Next: The Myth Of Male Privilege

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

A Simple Paradigm Shift To Boost Your Gaming Success

July 6, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

I currently operate as a personal trainer on the side. In the training world it's said that maintaining your business is harder than building it. And this seems backwards to most new trainers. Doesn't acquiring new clients seems a lot harder than holding onto a group of existing clients?

This seemingly paradoxical statement is true because of the mindset that someone takes on once he's established his business and reached his target number of clients per week. The natural tendency is to altogether stop approaching new prospects and pursuing potential leads. The result of this tendency is a complete cutoff in the new clientele pipeline.

When you combine this cutoff with the natural decline in your current clientele – people move, decide to stop training, etc. all the time – you're left with a business that is bound to enter a steady decline. The business is destined to fail if the trainer isn't pursuing a small amount of new leads as he conducts his daily business.

How to maintain a steady flow of clients indefinitely

Therefore, what separates a successful trainer from a poor one is his prospecting process. Rather than neglecting it completely when things are going well, he never fully takes his foot off the pedal. Sure, if his schedule is completely packed with clients, he won't be spending significant amounts of time pursuing new leads, but he will do so here and there, just so he has someone ready to jump into a new slot the moment one of his regulars ditches him.

The X factor that makes this strategy necessary is the fact that when a trainer gets out of the swing of things – he stops his prospecting process completely – he will surely struggle to pick up new clients efficiently when the shit hits the fan and he needs to. By taking a break from the practice of generating inbound traffic, he essentially loses his game.

Dealing with women is no different

This reality struck me one day when a fellow trainer was bitching about, well, bitches. Attempting to offer instruction, I instinctively told him to treat the dating market like he treats his training business. Girls he finds attractive and wants to date are prospects, and girls he's dating already are clients.

This trainer happened to be the top trainer at the gym. By far. He dominates his training business like no other. Of course, this analogy brought a smile to his face as he realized he could apply his successful training model to women.

The obvious lesson here is to never stop approaching. If you have a three girls rotation that you're completely satisfied with, realize that one of these girls is going to fall off. She might push for commitment and bounce, she might meet another dude and lose interest, she might move, etc. By continuing to approach cute girls you notice, you'll keep your pipeline full so that when one, or all, of your current clients dry up, you can move quickly to replace them.

One objection to this model is when you have a girlfriend. And this is a legitimate concern. Surely you shouldn't prospect while in a monogamous relationship, right? In truth, it's up to you. Just realize the dangers of ceasing to approach: when the relationship ends, you'll likely have lost a lot of your game. I'm sure most of you can already attest to this.

Seeing game as a sales process also removes unwanted emotions

At the same time that this model reminds you of the importance of prospecting, this realization brought a further increase in success to my personal dating life. By thinking of dating as a sales job, I truly was able to realize that dating is a numbers game. This effectively removed most of the unwanted emotions I normally felt when a girl I really liked fell through the cracks.

When you view game as sales, you recognize that most prospects aren't going to pan out. However, you don't use this as ammo to be a bitch and cry yourself to sleep, but rather as ammo to get out there and approach even more women. After all, a solid prospecting process is the mark of a successful salesman.

Like this? Check out my new book Dominate.

Read More: Don't Let Women Rule Your Life

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Therapy For Men Over Skype

July 6, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Our July sponsor is Therapy By Skype. It's a service for men seeking clinical psychotherapy by a licensed practitioner who has a red pill outlook. In his own words:

> There's dating coaching, "feel-good" pep talks, and "red pill" ideologies, all sorts of things people sell you which may be quite useful. But the only thing that completely customized to your needs, in near-real time as you progress is psychotherapy, life coaching, counseling—whatever the term of your era. The principles are the same across time and cultures. Only the label changes.
>
> I'm a licensed (California) and experienced clinical psychologist in my 50's from New York now living in California and Asia who's been to Eastern Europe, Asia, Western Europe.
>
> I've had good, bad, and great experience with women in all the above places. I've brought a woman to the US on a fiancé visa, and watched it fall apart. I've made the mistakes for you, so you can understand and get what you want faster.
>
> I'm not from an ivory tower. I've worked in corporate as a database programmer, as a professional musician and songwriter before I switched to psychology. I wrote databases tracking defects in pacemakers for Eli Lilly, as well as programming for Hertz and 3M. I've worked in the highest security prisons in California, and seen how masculinity can go horribly wrong. I've played with rock stars and seen how it can go transcendentally right. I've worked as a garbageman, janitor, and in a yogurt stand. I've published research on psychological testing in journals and can offer that if you wish.
>
> I want to be of assistance to gifted men from First World nations who to some degree have had their masculine nature thwarted by the particular and peculiar emergence of radical feminism over the last fifty years.
>
> I want to help you understand what you want in women and life and help you as > you work to get it. Although I am a “legit” (doctorate in clinical psychology) psychotherapist I offer what I call life coaching over Skype, with a free 15 minute consultation to see if you feel I can help you. “Red Pill’ means just giving up some distorted beliefs—there’s a lot more that goes into building your life than bringing something bad down.

>
> I always hate when people hide prices, so I am offering the first fifty teleconferencing hours scheduled for $50 per hour with a minimum of two hours. I reserve the right to refuse service to people with a bad attitude. Testing costs more than that but can really help pin things down faster.

Visit Therapy By Skype see how you can be helped.

If you are interested in becoming an ROK sponsor, visit our sponsorship page. You can also drop a couple bucks in our tip jar.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Reasons Why Americans Will Never Fully Embrace Soccer

July 7, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The World Cup continues, but the USA's run in the tournament is over. After escaping the group stages with a thrilling win over Ghana and a heartbreaking draw with Porugal (followed by a less than thrilling loss to Germany), the US Men's National Team was dispatched by Belgium after an entertaining contest that saw the American goalkeeper Tim Howard put in a remarkable performance.

The World Cup has drawn plenty of attention to American soccer. While this uptick in interest during the tournament is not unprecedented, there has been some legitimate cause for increased optimism within the American soccer fanbase. EA Sports' FIFA video game franchise has grown a sizable following in the states, leading many to show more interest in the sport. The generation of young people who play this game most often are growing up with the sport playing a larger part in their lives (i.e. more extensive participation in youth soccer) than it did in previous generations, a fact that could lead to more sustained interest in the game down the road.

Meanwhile, Major League Soccer (MLS), the USA's top domestic professional league, has taken several major steps forward during the last decade, increasing the quality of its play, expanding into new markets (including several in Canada) and obtaining a level of financial stability hitherto unheard of in the world of American professional soccer. Whereas multiple prior professional American soccer leagues fell victim to financial catastrophe prior to their 20th birthday, MLS is going on year 21 with a very strong financial foundation and an optimistic outlook for the future.

That being said, this optimism has a limit. Soccer has come a long way in the USA, but there is still cause to believe that it may never go quite as far as it has in other parts of the world. Here are some of the reasons why.

1. Americans Are Not The Best At It

Americans aren't used to playing role of underdog. American culture has always had a perspective that seems larger than life: it is the biggest, it is the baddest, and it is the best. That has historically been (for better or worse) the way Americans view themselves. Americans do not play catch up – they lead the way, and everyone else follows.

In soccer, Americans are on the other end of the spectrum: they are the underdogs who have been vigorously playing “catch up” with the rest of the world for decades and will continue to do so for the foreseeable future.

To USA Soccer’s credit, decent attempts have been made to turn this “underdog” angle into a positive one, tying into deeper American cultural memes that idolize the challenge of “climbing the ladder”, so to speak, and emphasize the value of perseverance in the face of long odds and the struggles associated with that process.

I fear that even with this reasoning, however, Americans will still maintain only a limited ability to warm to the game of soccer and their nation’s position within that game. Basketball, American football and baseball may not have the global following that soccer has, but Americans can say unequivocally that they are the best in the world at each of those games. Like it or not, the ability to make such a statement and feel comfortable about its validity matters a lot to Americans and probably always will.

That brings me to my next point…

2. Soccer Isn’t American

Baseball, American football and basketball are as American as apple pie. They were not only invented and largely developed within the USA, but they have also grown with the nation for more than a century and woven themselves firmly into the historical and cultural fabric of this society during that time. The American story is, in many ways, tied to each of these sports. They aren’t just games – they are America’s games.

While soccer has this kind of historical legitimacy in many other parts of the world (where it has been interwoven into the cultural fabric for over a century and become a fundamental part of other nations' historical and cultural narratives), it does not possess that kind of legitimacy here. The game is, for the most part, foreign to Americans and its nuances entirely new to most of them. Granted, familiarity can grow over time but the existence of several other sports (all of which have more than a century's worth of head start with regard to the manufacturing of that legitimacy) will limit the degree to which soccer can grow to really be considered a game that belongs to Americans and is more than just a distant European import.

3. Competition

Americans are unusual in the sheer number of sports they follow. In the UK, for example, the team sports landscape is quite simple. Soccer is the undisputed king of the hill, while sports like rugby establish a reasonably lucrative financial and cultural niche for themselves well below that level and every other team sport pretty much competes for the leftovers. English soccer has no true equal or peer in the UK sporting scene; it is in a league of its own at the very top of the pyramid.

In the USA, things are far more complicated. The NFL is generally considered to be the current king of the American sports hill, but it is rivaled by both the MLB and the NBA (in the addition to the NHL which, though smaller than the others, gets its fair share of attention and financial support). This means that, while nations like the UK really only have one team sport whose profile can be considered truly “major” and is generally unrivalled in stature by any other team game, the USA has several major team sports that could all be considered peers of one another.

This leads to a relatively crowded sporting landscape, one in which competition for viewers and broadcasting dollars is fierce year round. This is where things get tough for soccer: the game is arriving late to this party as a clear foreign outsider, and being forced to compete with not just a single league or game that is established already, but several major power players, all with much longer histories in the USA, more financial clout and a greater degree of resonance to the culture that the American public pledges allegiance to.

4. Lack Of Physicality And The Tolerance Of Weakness

Americans love physical games. The most popular professional sporting competitions in the USA involve the games of American football, ice hockey, baseball and basketball. All of these are sports that put a great emphasis on raw physical talent (height, weight, speed, strength), and that isn’t a coincidence: Americans like to see athletic heroes that are bigger, strong, and faster than everyone else, physical specimens that can be looked up to and admired. Games like American football take this to an extreme at which one pretty much must be a physical freak in order to compete at a high level.

Soccer, on the other hand, puts a much greater emphasis on technical ability, intelligence, stamina and mental fortitude than most major American team sports, while simultaneously de-emphasizing raw, god-given physical talent. You simply do not need to be a particularly gifted natural athlete to excel on a soccer pitch—many of the world's elite players are not very big, not very strong, and not capable of setting the world on fire with their 100 meter dash times. They dominate anyway because of their incredible technical ability, IQ, and conditioning (both mental and physical).

It isn't that Americans cannot appreciate such an athlete; it is just that they tend to appreciate such non-physical gifts much less than most of the rest of the world does, while simultaneously appreciating natural athleticim more than the rest of the world does. Soccer's ability to give a platform to athletes like Lionel Messi or Diego Maradona (men who are technically gifted but quite small, not very strong, and not remarkably fast or otherwise impressive athletically) simply isn't going to resonate quite as well in a society dedicated to the worship of unusually big, strong and quick physical specimens.

The prevalence of flopping and diving in the game of soccer only exacerbates this problem. While diving/flopping/injury faking occurs in American sports (basketball most prominently, less commonly in others), none approach soccer's level of play acting. Players frequently fall to the ground after receiving only slight touches, a practice that is often necessitated by the fact that referees award them for doing so by calling fouls, handing out cards and giving penalties to the "offenders" seen to have cause the "injury".

Americans love tough guys as much as they love their physical specimens. The popularity of American football is not coincidental: Americans identify very strongly with the physicality that the game represents. American football's emphasis on the infliction of pain, the tolerance of pain, and perseverance through pain all resonate extraordinarily well with the American psyche. Americans love to see others struggle with pain and learn to overcome it, especially when they can do so as a group. In much of the country, the violent, aggressive, hard nosed, tough-as-nails, take-no-prisoners attitude so readily cultivated and displayed in American football is the most fundamental part of community identity. It can be credibly argued that there simply isn't a narrative that the average working American identifies more closely with than that articulated in the game of American football.

It is this reality that will make soccer intolerable to many Americans, as it is a game where players too often act out precisely the opposite narrative. Soccer players do not inflict pain very often, appear to have a lower tolerance for its infliction via violent physical contact (as evidence by their frequent flops) and simply don't often display the violent, aggressive, "tough guy" attitude Americans have grown so fond of over the course of well over a century.

The fact that they are rewarded for their lack of physical perseverance in the face of physical contact is simply intolerable to most Americans. Europeans look at a soccer player who falls down easily after receiving some physical contract (instead of staying on his feet and fighting through it in order to continue playing) and see an intelligent—if cynical and somewhat cheesy—strategic play designed to draw foul calls and put the other team in a more difficult tactical position. Americans look at that and simply see weakness and the promotion of weakness, and there are few things they hate more than that. The unfortunate reality is that this relative lack of physicality (and reward/tolerance of it) is a fundamental part of soccer, and it isn't something Americans are ever going to warm to.

None of this is to say that soccer lacks great growth potential in the USA. MLS is expanding in earnest, and statistics relating to the game's finances and popularity in the country have been trending upward for some time and look set to continue doing so. The biggest challenge that the game faces in the USA relates to its bid to win the hearts and minds of the American populace. That, I'm afraid, will likely prove to be an uphill battle. It will be very interesting to see how far the game can go in this country in spite of that reality.

Read Next: How American Football Became A Racket

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

A Man Unique: The Lyrical Fire And Fury Of Ernst Juenger

July 7, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

An expert in classical Chinese once wrote that ancient texts occasionally feature characters that appear once, and only once, in the existing literature. The linguistic term for such words or characters is hapax legomenon. Because of this uniqueness, we are told, it is not possible to know precisely the meaning of a hapax character. A scholar, for example, might be confronted by a sentence that reads, "The chariot moved across the battlefield with the furious speed of an X." One translator, using his best informed guess, might render X as meaning such-and-such; and another translator might render X as something else. But the truth is that we can never know precisely what the meaning of the character X is. It is unique. As a hapax legomenon, it will remain forever cloaked in mystery.

Men can also be hapax figures. They disturb the convenience of our lazy taxonomies by refusing to be pidgeon-holed as one thing or another. Such men defy easy categorization; they can never precisely be pinned down to our butterfly-board. Just such a character brimming with contradictions was German writer Ernst Jünger. Impassioned warrior, biologist, writer, philosopher, mystic, nationalist, and believer in psychedelic drugs, Jünger stands alone among twentieth century writers, laughing at our attempts to fit him into any one box.

He was born in Heidelberg in 1895 and had a reasonably comfortable middle-class upbringing. Running away from home in 1913 to join the French Foreign Legion, he served briefly in North Africa, after which his father brought him home. Still lusting for combat, he volunteered for the Kaiser's army in 1914 and served with great distinction on the western front as an infantry officer and storm trooper. He received the Iron Cross First Class in 1917, and finally Imperial Germany's highest military decoration, the fabled "Blue Max" (the Pour le Merite) at the age of 23 in 1918. Wounded many times during night patrols and trench raids, Jünger found the war to be a supremely transcendent experience, a distillation of the struggle of life, and the core of masculine identity.

Trench raider: Jünger was intimately acquainted with scenes such as this

Throughout the war, Jünger kept a private diary of his experiences, and these scattered thoughts formed the nucleus of a book which he self-published in 1920 under the title In Stahlgewittern. Appearing in English under the martial title Storm of Steel, the memoir catapulted Jünger to prominence. There is nothing like it in all war literature. It deserves close examination on our part. As a hospital orderly once told Jünger philosophically while dressing one of his wounds: habent sua fata libelli et balli ("books and bullets have their own destinies.")

The first thing that strikes us in Storm of Steel is the tone: here there is no morose hand-wringing as one might find in the weepy writings of Erich Maria Remarque, Siegfried Sassoon, or Robert Graves; none of the clinical detachment of Adolf Von Schell's dry and lifeless Battle Leadership; and none of the pacifist sniveling that mars some of the work of Ernest Hemingway. Instead, we are thrown right into the thick of the action, swept up with Jünger in the exhilaration of proximity to instant death, as bombs burst all around us and a determined enemy is waiting beyond the lip of our trench to cut our throats.

Jünger with the coveted "Blue Max" decoration, which he received in 1918

The Greek philosopher Heracleitus believed that Fire was the essential force that moved the world; and under the spell of Jünger's prose, we actually come to believe this to be so. We are stupefied by the lyric poetry of flame, fist, and iron, as the earth trembles beneath our feet during artillery bombardments; and we huddle with Jünger in soggy, putrid shell holes, waiting for the opportunity to plunge a dagger into a British Tommy's gut. Jünger takes it all in with the wry humor and determination of a true combat soldier, never boring us with mealy-mouthed questions about the war's origins and purpose; for him, the war is a mystical experience, bringing an elevated awareness of the agonies and joys of life. Combat and pain are the quintessence of life. There is only survival in the present moment, and the supreme experience of hunting down and killing the enemy. Among countless memorable passages, the following will give a flavor of the whole:

> The trench was appalling, choked with seriously wounded and dying men. A figure stripped to the waist, with ripped-open back, leaned against the parapet. Another, with a triangular flap hanging off the back of his skull, emitted short, high-pitched screams. This was the home of the great god Pain, and for the first time I looked through a devilish chink into the depths of his realm. And the fresh shells came down all the time.

Jünger's prose approaches the beauty of Virgilian hexameters with this sentence, describing the German response to an attack by French aircraft:

> The anti-aircraft guns threaded long fleecy lines through the air, and whistling splinters pinged into the tilth.

About the thrill of marauding by night into enemy lines, Jünger has this to say:

> These moments of nocturnal prowling leave an indelible impression. Eyes and ears are tensed to the maximum, the rustling approach of strange feet in the tall grass is an unutterably menacing thing. Your breath comes in shallow bursts; you have to force yourself to stifle any panting or wheezing. There is a little mechanical click as the safety-catch of your pistol is taken off; the sound cuts straight through your nerves. Your teeth are grinding on the fuse-pin of the hand-grenade. The encounter will be short and murderous. You tremble with two contradictory impulses: the heightened awareness of the huntsman, and the terror of the quarry. You are a world to yourself, saturated with the appalling aura of the savage landscape.

Describing the ghastly contradictions of combat, he notes ironically:

> We started to dig trenches right across the village, and erected new walls near the most dangerous places. In the neglected gardens, the berries were ripe, and tasted all the sweeter because of the bullets flying around us as we ate them.

And here, Jünger dispatches an enemy soldier with emotionless precision:

> I spotted a British soldier breaking cover behind the third enemy line, the khaki uniform clearly visible against the sky. I grabbed the nearest sentry's rifle, set the sights to six hundred, aimed quickly, just in front of the man's head, and fired. He took another three steps, then collapsed onto his back, as though his legs had been taken away from him, flapped his arms once or twice, and then rolled into a shell-crater, where though the binoculars we could see his brown sleeves shining for a long time yet.

Jünger in his later years: despite the suit, every inch a fighter

After the war, Jünger remade himself as a biologist and entomologist, although insects were never quite as appealing as combat. By his own admission, he “hated democracy” and parliamentarianism, and was a conservative nationalist; yet to his credit, he also despised fascism and National Socialism. He refused a seat in Hitler’s Reichstag in 1933, forbade his writings to appear in Nazi publications, and was careful to distance himself from any endorsement of Hitler. He was mobilized for military service in the Second World War, but spent the war years mostly in occupation duty in Paris.

Jünger remained a committed individualist, never wanting to be beholden to anyone. After 1945, he was briefly banned from publishing for his refusal to kow-tow to the Allied occupation authorities. He continued to write, however, eventually turning out more than fifty titles. In the postwar years, his uniqueness shone forth in all its intensity. In his treatise On Pain, he argued that the experience of pain, and man’s capacity to deal with it, was the central question of the human condition in the modern era. More bizarre was his enthusiasm for hallucinatory drugs: his later writings (e.g., Approaches, appearing in 1970) chronicle his dalliances with cocaine, hashish, and LSD. He was also an adherent of the “magical realism” movement, a literary school which held that magical or fantastic qualities permeate the experience of ordinary life. We cannot be sure he was wrong.

Actually, Jünger led a charmed life, outlasting nearly everyone. Gradually his literary star rose to prominence; by the 1960s and 1970s, he was one of Germany’s most respected writers. In 1984, he, along with the presidents of France and Germany, dedicated a battlefield memorial at Verdun and publicly condemned militarism. Yet he never regretted or apologized for anything he ever wrote, proudly proclaiming his belief in the power of the individual over that of the mechanized state. He died in 1998 at the age of 102.

German Idealism, which had begun with Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, had seemed almost a spent force until the advent of Ernst Jünger's Storm of Steel. In many ways, he was the final, explosive culmination of the stubborn Idealist strain in German thought, a thread that thankfully has not quite yet died out. But Jünger is stranger still; his body of work synthesizes so many disparate strands that he really is in a class by himself.

As a lyric poet of total war, and as an apostle of the cathartic power of combat, he remains unsurpassed. He is a Teutonic hapax legomenon, a character standing alone, whose true meaning we can only guess at.

Read More: The Renaissance Of Modern Man

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Is Civilization Just Another Name For Slavery?

July 7, 2014 | by Giovanni Dannato | Link | Original Link

You may marvel at the skyscrapers and spacecraft society has built, yet that same social order fails to tell ordinary people what is good to eat, how to find mates, or how to have babies. The same state that sends rockets to the moon fails miserably in every realm of knowledge a primitive society takes for granted. Surely the basic things that concern everyone ought to be resolved long before anyone is worried about space.

Civilization has always been unjust with little care for the needs of most people. Since the first cities, mass society has been a tool to serve the interests of a few who control the land and its resources. The people who showed up to work for shares of surplus grain became cogs in a machine that made someone else's dreams come true. Not too much changes without there being something in it for those on top of the pyramid. It explains why modern societies can invent intercontinental missiles yet can't figure out how to prevent fat from going straight to your ass.

The big problem that has always plagued rulers is there's competitors out there armed with their own social machines. For thousands of years, they've been locked in a race, pressured to find a competitive edge. The same old pattern has continued to the present age; even the glorified space race between the US and the Soviets was just a pissing match between rival landlords.

Today, tall buildings stand as monuments of intimidation and legitimacy like the pyramids of old, each looking skyward in awe made to feel like a puny subject. We take these skyscrapers as proof of the natural superiority of the hive and subordinate ourselves to its narrative. In the name of skyscrapers we don't own, modern medicine we can't pay for, and spaceships we'll never fly in, we willingly throw away our lives on the job and on the battlefield. We forget we're descendants of the first people who traded away their own story to be an extra in a movie about someone else. Generation after generation has ground out with most everyone serving as lesser cells in a body with a mind of its own.

The truth that we're born-and-bred slave dogs is an unpleasant one. Thankfully, we're indoctrinated from birth to identify with a concept of civilization that supposedly brings us light and progress. We look up to and cheer for a nation, a culture, a civilization just as a hapless laborer with no struggle of his own finds solace in cheering for a sports team. We follow the news like the sports fan watches a game to gain a false sense of control over the world around us. We may keep score and develop an opinion about big events, but no one asked us what we thought—not the boss, not the woman, especially not the people who make real decisions. No one cares. The news is just a respectable tabloid. We delude ourselves that we're participants in "something larger." We're not. We're just being dragged along for the ride. Our knowledge or ignorance, consent or lack of consent makes no difference.

At the end of the day it doesn't matter if some billionaires and government officials sent spaceships to Mars. At least not until you're in a position where it makes sense to care. If like most people you're struggling with having enough money to live and enough sex to be content, why do you care? Caring about spaceships and tall buildings is a surplus pursuit fit for the dukes and barons. It's not for you.
It's something to think about next time someone waxes sentimental about the "achievements of civilization"™

If you're really honest with yourself, you'll realize you're just a subsistence level peasant. The buildings and technologies aren't yours, nor do they belong to a gigantic abstract "we." They're just properties you'll be working to rent out until you're dead. In truth, you're just a barbarian visitor to this place that other people already built. Your stake in this is imaginary, your sense of participation and self-importance delusional.

Would we be better off just plundering everything the rulers have built? Skyscrapers, moon landings, electricity, vaccines, and cars are impressive monuments that convince us to passively accept that civilization is beneficial, or at least more beneficial than any alternative. But are even hot showers worth a lifetime of humiliating labor? Does a microwave oven justify spending 40 years on a career that helped make someone else rich? Does it really even matter if we're able to live a few decades longer? We currently spend the first 30 years of life trapped in school, getting more school and simply waiting for older people to die off. Isn't it actually a better deal to be all worn out by age 50 after living for real from our early teens?

Since the beginning, the trinkets produced by civilization have confused our ability to distinguish between needs and conveniences. We'd never consider joining a society that offered us blu-ray movies but no bread, so why do we stay loyal like hand-licking dogs when we're offered washing machines and computers but no sex—and with the added ball and chain of a job just to keep us off the streets and out of jail?

Facing reality is tough, but understanding the situation on the ground is the first step to cease being a pawn and look after your own interests, not those of some intangible state or civilization that isn't even capable of caring you exist—but will gladly drain you dry if you let it. Ironically a detached attitude does more to “make the world a better place” than any amount of well-intentioned idealism. Whether through governments, rents, or wages, we always get offered the worst deal most people are willing to accept.

A populace that understands reality does a better job of looking out for itself to the betterment of everyone. We can be assets to each other rather than competitors. The conveniences of civilization can be worthwhile additions to life but food, shelter, sex, friends, family, leisure, autonomy come first. Whenever we find ourselves filling a black hole with modern distractions we need to make a list of our basic needs and see if they’re being met. Every day, we ought to look past distractions like politics and “entertainment” to ask ourselves: is it really a better deal than we’d get in a grass hut?

Read More: What Society Values

Giovanni Dannato
GD is a longtime wanderer who always carries a book. He's never burdened down by much but enjoys consumable creature comforts like cigars and a nice scotch. He keeps fit with both weights and cardio. He also writes at Colony of Commodus.

14 Considerations For Men Who Want To Have A Family

July 7, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

I was reading an interview with hedge fund manager Paul Tudor Jones recently. At 60, his networth is more than $4 billion. He's a self-made man in every sense of the world.

Paul started out as a runner for a brokerage house, learned the ropes of the financial markets and began trading his own money. He got rich, bored and lonely, so applied and was accepted into Harvard Business School. Then at the last minute he decided not to bother. He hired a couple of people and started a hedge fund. By the mid 80s he had some millions under management and caught the 1987 crash, banking a mint for himself and his investors. The rest is history.

Paul also established the Robin Hood Foundation that gives out hundreds of millions of dollars to help under-privileged children (his last fundraiser banked $60M). Yet he cites his wife and kids as his greatest achievement. Matthew McConaughey pictured above is another family man, who even credits the family support for a part of his success.

A man who says something like this is either lying to cover up his other failures, is pussy whipped, or is genuinely accomplished and thus feels the warm glow of success is best represented not by money or fame, but by his own family unit; an admirable if somewhat secondary goal. An Oscar winning actor and an aggressive futures trader who can be seen in the 80s documentary 'Trader' screaming orders into the phone and losing a quick $6M in day (whilst wearing his lucky Bruce Willis sneakers) falls into the latter category and it's interesting to hear men who have accomplished so much qualify themselves by family.

Most certainly a man would not be able to say that had he married some awful whore who divorce raped him. Tudor Jones mentions that he'll pull money from his sub-managers that are having relationship problems because they perform poorly. He seems to have quite an old school 'red pill' attitude.

Having been on both sides of the equation, both single and attached, I'll give you a few pointers I've learned both through my own successes and failures. Whilst the crop of women in their teens and twenties might be more damaged than previous generations, I'm sure it's still possible to pick a keeper.

Focus on your professional life and building wealth.

Family is a useless burden if you are living paycheck to paycheck. You don't need $4 billion, but you do need $10k a month to support a wife and a couple of kids. Unless you plan living like the cast of Shameless, you also need a little real estate and back up asset. You really need abundance flowing to hold a family together. If you have to rely on her income, she's going to be wearing the trousers.

Focus on your professional life and building wealth.

It can't be stated enough. Unless you feel valued and successful as a man, and have something to show for yourself, how can you expect her to feel good about you? Imagine if all your paycheck goes on rent, diapers and school fees. Family is an accessory, an expense account that should be 'pocket money' to you.

Get 'some' experience with women.

But not so much you're a jaded old player. Learning to be alone is just as important. An ideal time for a man to start thinking more long term is 35-40. She should be about 10+ years younger.

Sweep her off her feet

Soul Mates, Friends, I Love You – that's for women. Let her think all that stuff. You don't have a moment to lose. From day one you draw her into your world and her single life ends. Then you can decide if she's a keeper or not. Just bear in mind that women are sometimes even more difficult to get rid of than they are to hook up with. Try not to leave a trail of wreckage in your wake.

Make sure she's not hung up on sex.

It's a sexual relationship so make sure she's going to put out for you. Train her quickly in all your 'marital' requirements. Women are like puppy dogs—if you don't house train them from day one, you'll be in for a rough run. There's no 'payment' for sex—it's an obligation and it's 'good for her'. Oral and anal are a must because it teaches her to enjoy sex as a giver of pleasure, rather than because she feels horny.

Beware of hardened whores

The point of game is to consciously realize through practical experience, that women are not that important and are 'two-a-penny'. You have to be like a surfer. Hop on the wave, but if you see the reef approaching, hop right off. If you break it off and she is chasing you, this is when you can really judge her and break her in (if she's worth it). Women often pine after 'exes'. To any man who's in an LTR without kids and is not completely happy, or made a start based on 'equality,' cool it right off—today—just do it. You can thank me later.

Embrace her inner prostitute

All women enjoy being prostitutes, provided it's done in the right way. By that I mean a woman who gives sex on demand even though she's not immediately turned on. Inside an LTR there will be times when she 'doesn't feel like it'. Show her how to overcome that 'frigid' mood. It takes a virile man to get it on with a woman that's rejecting his advances, especially when she's his bitchy wife (all wives get bitchy). In my experience if you have trained her to perform, she will get surprisingly turned on, even though she started out cold. Don't be fooled by the 'honeymoon' year. You have to use that time to train her so when sex starts going sideways, you don't take no for an answer

Knock her up

An LTR = children. There are other advantages but kids are the primary feature. Think of her as your farm animal for breeding. You need to keep her productive one way or another. 'The devil makes work for idle hands.' If you can raise the budget for some home help or have parents on side, this will be vital when you have kids. If not, you will end up as the 'herb' maid by default. Family needs family. If you don't have one you'll have to manufacture one.

Keep your world private

Women will attempt to get under your skin and once they do they will invade. Don't key her in on your financial matters, professional life, or personal friendships. Beware of divulging too much during pillow talk. Idle gossip seems harmless but it can be toxic. She's trying to get you on lock down so you can't come and go without excusing yourself. Fuck that. You have to get her used to your absences. Good women are 'faithful' (ie. they have faith in you). Good men are loyal. She has to have faith in your loyalty. She'll get accustomed to you doing your own thing and returning to the fold.

Never cry on her shoulder

Find a male colleague, therapist, or lawyer to open up to, but never to a woman, least of all a wife. "I'm about to be made bankrupt and put in jail for 10 years on fraud charges" = "Had a bit of a rough day at the office, we'll be fine." The reason the wife waits 10 years for the jailbird husband is because she has faith in him. Her faith is misplaced, but it suits him just fine.

Let her cry on your shoulder all she wants

Make sure it always ends with her taking the dick, moaning like a banshee, and 'feeling much better'. Never underestimate the power of frame followed by insertion of your 'female adjustment tool.' At the same time create boundaries so she has to behave.

Beware of friends

The walls have ears. As soon as a female is involved there's a game of whispers. Be very wary about talking to your buddies, especially if his girl is likely to come in contact with yours. You have no control over what he says to her about you. This is why women often try to match-make your friends. They are trying to install spies in your camp. Always flirt and be appealing to her friends—you never know when you might need their intel. When you are married, game starts to extend into everything. Perhaps that's why long term married couples are wealthier.

Plausible deniability

Even if she produces a 1080HD clip of you balls deep in a shemale, DENY IT. Brushing off all manner of gossip and shit tests is a vital skill that so many men lack. Don't engage. Her approaches are not rational. The only time you cannot deny it is when she walks in on you in the flesh. Also remember that she might 'feel it', even if she is unaware. This can cause you a certain amount of turbulence. I've had an LTR tell me that she dreamed of me with another woman the morning I got home from a ONS. Women have a 6th sense and you better believe it.

Who lives by the sword dies by the sword.

Extramarital sex is generally best avoided. I have kept a woman on the side with positive results, but it's like a coke habit—it can quickly get addictive, expensive, and destructive. There is a fine balance between being spineless husband and alpha asshole.

Is Family Worth It?

- Children can be super cool, provided you have the spare time and cash.
- The LTR woman has to be controlled, led, tolerated and taken care of. This is a heavy responsibility.
- You can never show your weaknesses. You will only get small doses of her feminine support. Making an overdraft on those can be fatal.
- There are other and possibly better ways to validate yourself, but as a man gets older he is what he can share with the world, not the sum of his selfish accumulations. A self-made ultra-alpha with $4 billion validates himself by family. He must know something.
- Co-habitation has little advantage beyond having a maid. Peace and quiet is one of the most important and underrated commodities.
- Family life can get real tedious and filled with boring and expensive 'family' obligations.
- Having a woman under your roof is a great way to have instant access to sex, but it's also a great way to have instant access to no sex.
- Family is like a loaded revolver in a monkey enclosure—someone will eventually get wounded. If she is the one that takes the hit, you have to carry that off in a very controlled and polite manner.

Understand that a woman needs a man's affection and attention. Unless you fancy another man balls deep in your baby momma, you will have to police her and take care of her for the rest of your life. That can be stressful and demanding. The upside of pulling it off is you have your own entourage, giving life a little meaning outside of chasing dollars and skirt. Keeping a woman in your orbit long term involves more focus, training and precision than a Bruce Lee movie, but it has its benefits.

The biggest mistake is probably made before you even start—getting into something you are ill prepared for is a sure fired way to fail. A bad family can be the loneliest, most soul destroying place on earth if you don’t approach it correctly.

Read Next: Woman Abandons Her Family, Gets Paid $85,000

What Humans Can Learn From The Mice Utopia Experiment

July 8, 2014 | by Mark | Link | Original Link

In 1950, an American ethologist named John Calhoun created a series of experiments to test the effects of overpopulation on the behaviour of social animals. The animals which Calhoun chose for his experiments where mice (and later on rats). He chose rodents as these reproduce rapidly thus allowing him to observe the development of several generations of mice in a relatively short space of time.

Calhoun and his researchers found that in a space-limited/resource unlimited environment, the population of mice would explode; peak-out and then collapse to extinction. This test was replicated several times and it was found that these led to the same outcome each time. The reason for this phenomenon was found to derived from social decay which worsened with each generation. The social decay led to unrest in the environment, which in turn led to sub replacement fertility. It was concluded that nature has a limit in which social animals can interact.

John Calhoun's experiments gained world-wide recognition and his expertise was sought after by government bodies such as NASA. They present a useful yet grim insight into what could be our own future, for no matter how many times Calhoun repeated the experiment, the results led to the same inevitable conclusion: extinction.

The Experiment

His team created a comfortable environment ideal for the mice. This was achieved by fitting a pen (box-shaped enclosure) with unlimited food and water. The room had space for up to 3000 mice. The room was closed off so that neither the mice could get out nor predators get in. By removing the risk of predation, the mice could grow in an environment free from external stress. The room was then compartmentalised into different units, this allowed Calhoun to identify how different social groupings formed.

Four pairs of mice were screened for diseases (four male and four female). Upon verifying that they were healthy they were introduced into the enclosure.

Calhoun observed the mice population over the course of the experiment. He noted down behavioural changes and population numbers. He found that there were four distinct phases of population change observed during the experiment. The first stage, named “Strive”, was a phase in which the mice explored and adjusted to their new habitat, set territories and created nests.

The second stage was named the ”exploit period”. During this stage the mice population exploded. Calhoun observed that some compartments became more populated than others, and therefore some units used more resources. It was also observed that some units started to become crowded.

The third phase was named the ”equilibrium phase”. During this phase, the mice population peaked at 2200 individuals, although there was space for 3000. During the third phase Calhoun observed the collapse of the mice civilisation. He noted that the new generations were inhibited since most space was already socially defined.

The mice showed different types of social dysfunctions. Some mice became violent. Males fought each other for acceptance, those that where defeated withdrew. Some males became repeated targets of attacks.

Calhoun had noted during his experiments:

> “Many [female mice] were unable to carry pregnancy to full term, or to survive > delivery of their litters if they did. An even greater number, after successfully giving birth, fell short in their maternal functions. Amongst the males the behaviour disturbances ranged from sexual deviation to cannibalism and from frenetic over-activity to a pathological withdrawal from which individuals would emerge to eat, drink and move about only when other members of the community were asleep. The social organisation of the animals showed equal disruption…"

>
> […]
>
> "The common source of these disturbances became most dramatically apparent in the populations of our first series of three experiments, in which we observed the development of what we called a behavioural sink. The animals would crowd together in greatest number in one of the four interconnecting pens in which the colony was maintained. As many as 60 of the 80 mice in each experimental population would assemble in one pen during periods of feeding. Individual mice would rarely eat except in the company of other mice. As a result extreme population densities developed in the pen adopted for eating, leaving the others with sparse populations."
>
> […]
>
> "…In the experiments in which the behavioural sink developed, infant mortality ran as high as 96 percent among the most disoriented groups in the population." – John Calhoun

Newer generations born in the now dysfunctional mouse utopia became withdrawn, spending their days grooming obsessively and dedicating their time solely to eating , drinking and sleeping. This generation, for all the emphasis they placed on grooming, would not reproduce. Moreover, these mice were noted to be unintelligent compared to previous generations.

> "…the limit Calhoun imposed on his population [of mice] was space — and as the population grew, this became increasingly problematic. As the pens heaved with animals, one of his assistants described the rodent utopia as having become hell."

The fourth phase was the decline. In this phase the population plummeted. The last mouse died 600 days after the experiment began.

What Can Humans Learn From Mice?

The limiting factor of Calhoun's experiment's was space. As time transpired, the mice passed on the negative behavioural attitudes to the next generation, and these, subsequently passed them on to the next generation, with the addition of new unsocial attitudes. What is it that makes space, and lack there off, such a decisive factor in the development of social animals? And what are the consequences for population condensation?

Notice how the evolution of the behaviours displayed by the mice, parallel those of the people of Easter Island, as explored by Quintus Curtius in his ROK article The Power Of Choice. The people of Easter Island are a historical example of a human version of the mice utopia experiment:

"When humans first arrived there about A.D 900, it [Easter Island] was densely forested, and was capable of sustaining numerous tribes and a relatively high population."

The conditions of the islanders were similar to that of Calhoun's mice. On an isolated island, with a lush environment, a group of humans settlers arrived on boats to Easter Island. The settlers could thrive with almost endless resources without natural predators nor external factors of stress.

With time, the island became over populated. Quintus explains what befell the Islanders:

"The islanders then began to compete with each other more and more fiercely for an ever-declining volume of natural resources; vendettas multiplied, intertribal warfare flared, and a pall of hostility and fear descended on the island. As the trees vanished, the islanders were unable to build boats to escape to other islands: they became trapped in their own hell, doomed to fight each other in perpetuity for the last crumbs that the barren land could offer. Eventually the islanders began to starve, and feed—literally—off each other. As wild meats became unavailable, and escape off the island became impossible, the natural consequences followed. Cannibalism stalked the island, animating its folklore and infecting its archaeological sites. Perhaps the islanders compensated for their misery by focusing more and more on the empty ritual of building and raising statutes, as their means of sustenance melted away."

This is reminiscent of the "behavioural sink" observed in the mouse utopia. It also resembles the abhorrent behaviours observed in Calhoun's experiments resemble several shocking stories from recent times. Is it be possible that it's social decay rather than a shortage of food that led the people of Easter Island to near extinction?

There are natural limitations on the degrees of social interaction we can manage on a daily basis, just like with the mice. In humans this is referred to as "Dunbar's number", and it has been observed to be true in social media sites.

Whilst it could be argued that this could not happen to humans; as we have large swathes of unpopulated land, it has to be noted that at the peak population, only half the colony space was being used. The mice had a tendency to congregate and overpopulate certain sectors of space, something reminiscent of modern day cities.

Modern Cases Of Behavioural Sinks In Humans

It is hard to compare the mouse utopia to the human world because, for obvious reasons, there is no human version of the mouse utopia experiment. Experiments are carried under controlled conditions to mitigate sources of error. However we can compare modern adverse trends in human society to the behavioural sink observed in the mouse utopia experiment. Below are some examples of behavioural sinks in Humans compared to those of the mice utopia.

Population Condensation

Case Study: Germany (Also applicable to: Spain, Japan.)

The first sign of trouble in the mice pen was the crowding observed in some of the units.

In Germany, the Spiegel reports of a growing problem of population condensation in it's large cities and of ghost towns in rural areas. Rents are soaring in Munich and Hamburg while in other cities apartments stand abandoned.

Whilst this example is not a perfect representation of the mouse utopia, we can make some comparisons. The mice pen was compartmentalised. Similarly, Germany is divided into several regions all with ample resources. In Germany, some regions are becoming more crowded, this is driven by labour demand in some regions and lack of labour demand in others.

Prediction: I predict that as cities become crowded, some of the behaviours observed by Calhoun will become apparent. These will include social unrest and lower fertility rates.

Population condensation was a major cause of social unrest in the mouse utopia. Time will tell if this will be the case in Germany.

Depopulation (failure to achieve replacement fertility)

World wide phenomenon.

Case Study: Republic of Korea [South Korea], Japan

The main correlation between the mouse utopia experiment and our times is depopulation.

Depopulation led to the extinction of the mice. It is fascinating yet terrifying to think that without the hardships of life, a species cannot survive. If we think about this from a human perspective, we see that our struggle for survival unites us as a species. Without hardship our life's become pointless and shallow.

If we look at South Korea's fertility rate per woman, which stands at 1.24, we can predict that this nation of 50 million will peak out by 2017. From there the population is expected to decrease to decrease to 42 Million by 2050.

The source of this decline is lack of jobs and thus lack of income needed to rear children. Like in many other nations, the job ladder is stuck as older people retire later in life. South Korea, like Japan, had a booming job's market which guaranteed lifetime employment. Sadly, this is no longer the case. The job's from the cities attracted many away from the country side and created a population concentration in cities such as Seoul.

Depopulation presents our species with an ever-growing problem since sub replacement fertility is becoming more prevalent in the developed world.

If we look at Japan, we see that Japan now faces a precipitous depopulation. Depopulation is estimated to drive Japan's population to 87 million, down from 127 million by 2050. In economic terms it would be catastrophic as Japan's has an advance welfare state like that of the United Kingdom and depends on having a larger tax base than a retiree base. The problem is getting so out of hand in Japan that the Japanese government is even considering immigration (a big no-no over there).

Sub replacement fertility is also being noted in the Republic of Korea, Spain, Germany, China, Russia, US, UK, Denmark, Sweden and Norway.

Depopulation is likely to be an effect of the social breakdown and not a cause.

Senseless Aggression

Word wide phenomenon.

Case Study: Easter Island.

Aggression is an obvious aspect in both the mice utopia and the East Island case. It is also easily comparable to our society in present day. Whilst violence has always existed amongst our species, this had always been attributed to a range of factors such as poverty or inter-tribal warfare (aggression due to lack or resources) and not as a factor of population condensation (aggression despite of abundant resources).

The first signs of trouble in the mice utopia were male mice fighting for acceptance. This appears to have led a spiral of other societal problems.

"…there where three times as young mice aspiring to enter social groups as there were vacancies in socially established groups…"

Aggression is the cause of the societal breakdown. What was the cause of the aggression? As observed, a lack of space, both physically and socially, which sets into motion a series of events that led to the outcome of extinction.

Breakdown Of Gender Roles

Developed world phenomenon.

Case Study: USA, Japan

At ROK, we place a large importance on gender roles. Looking at this subject from a perspective of another species may give us some further insight on the topic. We have observed that depopulation is an effect, so what is the cause? Perhaps there is more than one cause. The behavioural sink observed in the mouse utopia showed several abnormal social behaviours.

In the male mice, a limited space and a boom in population caused the males to fight more to be accepted. Since not all mice can be alpha males, the losers withdrew. With excess males fighting for dominance, older males gave up, leaving the females to fend for the family. These would then become increasingly aggressive and some even began attacking their own offspring.

Calhoun noted that as time progressed "…mothers fell short of maternal expectations". In recent years there have been an increasing amount of cases [1], [2], [3], [4] of child neglect and abuse by human mothers that have made it to national headlines. It is not hard to speculate that there are many more we have not heard. In Australia, police have released data that attribute half of the nation's infanticides to their mothers.

Since these are the more notorious cases which the media publishes, the less extreme cases go unnoticed, under reported or unreported in the media (in the last few decades there have been a string of stories in the media, which when examined as a whole tells us that women are starting to lose their natural instincts for nurture). We know that women in developed nations are suppressing maternal instincts, either intrinsically or extrinsically. It is also becoming more common for women to seek a sex-fueled lifestyle, something that was also observed in the mouse utopia.

"…the mice became more promiscuous…mice would roam around attacking others or mounting them irrespective of gender…"

"…phase C, the incidence of conception in females declined and the resorption in foetuses increased. Maternal behaviour was disrupted. Some mothers in desperate searches for quieter areas abandoned young that fell on the way…" – Tragedy in Mouse Utopia, Dr.J.R Vallentine

As the behaviour in the pen deteriorated, females would abandon their offspring leaving them to fend for themselves. With no parents around to teach them how to be well adjusted mice,

"…prematurely rejected, first by their fathers, then by their mothers, and then by established groups in the community, the young grew up without knowing how to behave, personally or socially as mice…" – Tragedy in Mouse Utopia, Dr.J.R Vallentine

Gender roles are vital in a social species, without that the break down of these lead to sub replacement fertility, depopulation, and finally, extinction.

Withdrawal

Case Study: Japan

"Individuals would only emerge to eat and sleep when the rest were asleep." When I read this, the first thing that came to my mind was the Hikikomori. It's a term used to refer to a reclusive adolescent who is too introverted to function in society. These youth are so socially inept that they shut themselves indoors and only venture out at night to stock up on groceries. This is a phenomenon that has been occurring for 20 years but that is only recently coming to light in Japan.

The Hikikomori are estimated to number a million. Something that has alarmed the Japanese government who have been unable to tackle an issue they do not fully understand. In Japan, an entire generation of young Japanese have been born into a society in where all space is already socially defined just like in the mice utopia were "the new generations were inhibited since most space was socially defined".

However this trend is not exclusive to Japan. Japan is however a very close approximation to a mice utopia experiment for humans just like Easter island. Under stress, these boys (and men) have been impaired by a stressed and dysfunctional society. Withdrawal is a cause for depopulation and the effect of an over stressed society which is in turn caused by the behavioural sink.

The Beautiful Ones

Case Study: Japan

There is another social ill in Japan that is comparable to Calhoun's mice. These are the grass eaters (Soshoku kei Danshi) of Japan. The term, "grass eater", refers to males who have no interests in seeking relationships with the opposite sex. The media and the manosphere has confused these guys with whatever pre-conceptions they may have had. For example, the BBC documentary "No Sex please, we are Japanese", explores the phenomenon with bias and poor journalism. So to ensure we don't fall for the same pre-conceptions allow me to reiterate that the grass eaters are men who have no interest in pursuing relationships with the opposite sex. They are not homosexuals, asexual's, otaku nor Hikikomori.

The difference between grass eaters and the Hikikomori is that the Soshoku kei Danshi are withdrawing from relationships and the Hikikomori are withdrawing from society all together. Grass eaters are not asexual, the prefer the vast array of porn available to them. Many grass eaters, although not all, are metro-sexual. These are guys who spend a lot of time and money into personal grooming. Once again this is not applicable to all grass eaters.

Some grass eaters show resemblance to the "Beautiful ones", spending their time "…[obsessively] grooming, eating and sleeping….[and]…not reproducing". The correlation appears to be that individuals are not conforming to a stressed societal model and are opting out of relationships and a male gender role. The grass eaters have become so numerous that is has pushed some Japanese girls to initiate the courtship. This phenomenon is most pronounced in Japan but is applicable to other developed nations.

In the Republic of Korea, 10% of men wear make up. In other developed nations, the "beautiful ones" are the vapid and shallow celebrity and beautify obsessed youth. It is possible that grass eaters could become a cause of depopulation and that is caused by the behavioural sink.

Conclusion

The mice utopia experiment presents us with a stark vision of our present and our future. As time progresses we will see more evidence that we are heading for a decline in population which is largely driven by social decay.

Through history we have developed an anthropocentric world view. This is folly. Humans are animals—highly advanced animals, yet animals nonetheless. Regardless of what we may think of ourselves, or how we may try to dissociate ourselves from the rest of the animal kingdom, the rules of nature that apply to mice often apply to us. Not learning or accepting the results of these experiments can only be detrimental for us as a species.

Social animals appear to be regulated by intrinsic behavioural factors. The question is if there is a nature kill switch for a species that has no predators. Calhoun concluded that the stress from social interaction caused the disturbances in behaviour seen in his experiments. If we truly stand apart from the rest of the animal kingdom, we ought to be able to avoid the same pitfalls. What is certain is that unless humans collectively apply some soul-searching, we will fall for the mouse trap.

Read More: The Power Of Choice

Mark
Mark is a seasoned traveller and philander who enjoys a smoke and glass of bourbon. He is an avid reader and a Political History enthusiast. Occasionally enjoys shit posting on the Guardian or the Telegraph. You can read his other ROK articles, and follow him on twatter and Google+1. His articles are proofread by InfoShinobi.

Empowered Woman Uses 98 Men For Meals, Validation, and Blog Fodder

July 8, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

The dating geniuses at Huffington Post are at it again, this time with a single 40-something "dating and relationship expert" bemoaning the state of modern dating while extracting the usual cash and prizes from men who make the mistake of courting her traditionally. Look upon time's ravages, ye mighty, and despair:

> Dating is the required presentational stage for a possible future interlude. For this very reason, I chafe at having to be "on point." I rail at the notion of being appealing, engaging and alluring.

It’s an indictment of our society that even a modicum of desirability is difficult to muster up for a woman who calls herself a “relationship expert.” Clearly it is a tremendous chore to feign being presentable to a fellow human being for an hour while availing oneself of free food and drink.

> There’s a great myth that’s been hoisted upon all women that “dating” is fun, and as women we should like it. I’m convinced it’s a conspiracy crafted to guarantee an ongoing form of economic revenue, women are forced to buy new clothes and makeup while men are lured into exorbitant restaurants to prove their merit.

Dating does promote senseless deficit spending, but the burden falls almost entirely on men. The author even admits it later in the piece.

> I’d long been criticized for never having “officially dated.” In an attempt to put this argument to rest, I decided to say “yes” to any agreeable man who asked me out. I had 98 dates in nine months.

Sounds like the author made full use of her round-the-world carousel ticket, against the advice of her friends and family. The death throes of any woman’s sexual marketplace value are often a dumpster fire to behold, with the last coughs often resulting in absurd experiments of “self-empowerment,” such as saying yes to every man who asks to date you despite having no sexual interest in them.

> “I ate my way through every restaurant in Manhattan and spent far more time in Starbucks than any human who has their own WiFi. No less than three times a week I’d put on the same outfit (perhaps a little half-hearted on my part) and > meet a new man for dinner or coffee. I sat. I listened. I ate. I drank."

Though she complains about the necessity of buying new dresses for dates (because we all know women hate shopping for new clothing), our fearless attraction scientist couldn't even be bothered to change the potato sack she was donning for men who were spending their time and money on her. The reader is supposed to feel pity that she was forced to bask in the attention (and financial support) of nearly a hundred simps she herself agreed to date.

> At the end of my social experiment, here's what I learned. Men parade their toys while women serve as the cows, pigs and horses parading for our Blue Ribbon of acceptance. Men name-drop their friendships with celebrities and clarify their numerous positions of power and influence. They rattle off their trips in foreign cities, identify their cars by the manufacturer's name and list their homes by prestigious locations. They dangle their toys in front our eyes in the hopes that we'll bite the bait. Oddly, they're not the bait.

She makes a good point — too many men think that their possessions, and not themselves, are the road to attracting women. That said, the author brought it upon herself by dating men who agreed to take her to exorbitant restaurants on first dates, virtually guaranteeing a selection bias for men who 1) Have no idea how to attract a woman and 2) Are apt to use their buying power as a pathetic attempt to impress a first date, the very phenomenon that she later bemoans. By dipping into the turgid pool of "Gameless 30-something schlubs with tons of money in New York City," she virtually assured her conclusion before undertaking the experiment.

> Is it possible to create a meaningful connection without the dog and pony show? Do we really need to sell ourselves on the auction block in order to gain affection? Can't one leapfrog past all this nonsense and move straight into partnership?

The clichéd irony of these pieces is that their authors conveniently omit the years that they spent eschewing a meaningful connection and chasing the dog and pony show of male attractiveness, power, fame, etc. Only when they begin to sense their value has cratered do they bemoan the meritocracy of the sexual marketplace and yearn to slide "straight into partnership."

> So, while I've satisfied my friends and family with giving dating a fair shot, I still prefer the old-school method of connection where I'm just doing my thing and happen to meet someone special. Whether walking my dog or at the gym, I'm where I want to be while living the life I love. And we meet. Naturally. Organically. The spark we find serves as our connection. We merge.

Ah yes, the "old school" method of connection where people go on dates—the one that the author expressed her disgust for in the preceding 300 words. Even with her vast experience at an advanced age, the author does not understand this immutable truth of humanity: Nothing happens organically. Every action takes place because one person (usually a man) wills himself to put himself out there because it serves a selfish need.

In the arena of romance, the vast majority of dating interactions occur between people who were forced to spend a great deal of time together, most often in a work setting, school situation, or with mutual friends. In the vanishing minority of relationships, marriages, hookup situations etc. that do not fit this formula, they occur because a man made it happen.

For the author, "organic" means "Without any agency on my part, and only with a man that I find desirable." Unfortunately, the time for her to meet men at this level of "organicness" has passed. The men who she will be attracted to are talking to the 25 year old in the produce aisle, or interrupting a 22-year old's Instagram whoring at Starbucks to ask if she likes the computer she's using. They certainly won't be knocking on the door of a 40-something unmarried "relationship expert" who has never dated traditionally and mocks men who try (however clumsily) to establish a connection with her.

Read More: A Typical Empowered Woman's Conversation In Any City USA

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

How Feminism Is Ruining “Game of Thrones”

July 8, 2014 | by Knight Rider | Link | Original Link

It’s cliché to complain about how a movie or television show is ruining the source material by departing from the books. There’s nothing new about bitching that HBO is sabotaging A Song of Ice and Fire, the literary source for its program Game of Thrones, but what’s not being pointed out is why they are doing it.

The answer is feminism. Television needs to constantly reinforce the egalitarian narrative. The point of feminism is to absolve women from all responsibility for their actions. The show does this by creating simplistic explanations for the female characters’ actions and promoting Mary Sue style “strong women.”

Women in the books have complicated rationalizations for their actions, often deriving from deep seated insecurities and fears. Like real life women, they rationalize things to themselves based on deluded self-images, rather than reality. The show does its best to strip these away, the easier to blame everything on men.

1. Shae

For example, the character of Shae in the television series is a variation on the theme of a “whore with a heart of gold,” with a “strong woman” twist. She heroically tries to defend Sansa when she is assigned as her handmaiden. She bickers with Tyrion only over what she sees as threats to her dignity, not money or possessions. And she actually loves Tyrion, turning against him because of his comment (designed to get her to flee the city) that she is a “whore.” Needless to say, this is quite a departure from the manipulative, materialistic, and Machiavellian Shae of the books.

Whores are the real heroes

2. Daenerys

Or take Daenerys. The show turns her into a liberal fantasy figure—at the end of Season 3, literally a blonde savior exalted by a worshipful circle of helpless brown people. She kills people, but only "bad" people like slavers. Occasionally she makes bad political decisions, but this just shows the world isn't moral enough for her.

Her translator Missandei, a child in the books, is of an age with Daenerys so they can share grrl power lines like "All men must die, but we are not men." Apparently, you now have to believe that women are not only better than men, but so independent and strong they can overcome death itself.

Her affair with a sellsword is "empowering," not an emotional decision that could have dire consequences. The complex motivations behind her willingness to kill to secure power is transformed into egalitarian pabulum, enabled by her royal birth and "magic" power as the "mother of dragons."

Talk about pedestaling.

3. Talisa

The show fundamentally changed the character of Robb Stark's queen, creating one "Talisa Maegyr." In the books, Robb's queen is a minor Westerosi noble whom he feels he must be loyal to in order to preserve her honor. However misguided, he is chivalrous.

The show gives us a more PC, exotic woman who renounced her noble birth because of her disgust over slavery. She spends her days tending to the wounded created by the battles of men. Robb falls in love with her because she is the modern ideal of an independent woman who has renounced her family and background in support of egalitarian ideals—while of course, retaining high social status.

"Man up" Robb Stark. What could go wrong?

4. Brienne

In the books, Brienne of Tarth is supposed to be ugly (except for her eyes) and huge. Catelyn Stark views her with pity and understands that her dedication to King Renly Baratheon comes from her unrequited love for him. After he dies, she psychologically needs someone else to protect and serve. Jamie Lannister admires her but doesn't think of her as objectively attractive. He also fights her to a standstill even while handcuffed and out of practice. While she's still an admirable and brave character, Brienne's strength derives from a deep insecurity.

The show removes this complexity. She is portrayed by Gwendoline Christie, who is of unconventional appearance for an actress but not ugly. She defeats her challengers in combat, including Jamie. She even beats Sandor Clegane in a matchup that never takes place in the books. Instead of being a complex character, she's just another fictional female superwarrior.

Invincible female warrior on TV? Boy, that's original.

5. Cercei

Even Cercei gets sympathetic treatment. In the book, Cercei Lannister is plagued by a mix of insecurity and self-delusion—Tyrion notes that his sister thinks she is "Tywin Lannister with teats." Indeed, she looks up to her father partially because it enhances her own self-image as his equal. She also uses her sexuality as a weapon, betraying her brother (and lover) Jamie, who remains loyal.

The show's Cercei is portrayed as reacting to her oppressed status as a woman forced to marry men she doesn't love. She openly confesses her sexual sins to her own father and roars defiance, defending her independence. Oh, and a consensual love scene is transformed into a rape. She's a survivor now and however brutal her actions, the audience is invited to sympathize with her.

“Strong woman”

Conclusion

George R.R. Martin is a traditional liberal, but his fiction contains characters with complicated rationalizations for their selfish actions. The television show gives us a morality play filled with characters whose motivations and actions make no sense in the context of Westeros, but make perfect sense in the 21st century liberal imagination. Even when a female character does something wrong, there is the kind of reason behind it that Tumblr users can understand.

The irony is that the “strong women” characters of Game of Thrones are being turned into cartoons. They are simply assimilated into the same narrative behind every other television show and movie—patriarchy and tradition are always to blame, and we must sympathize with everything a woman does to fight against her oppression.

It actually dehumanizes the women characters of the show. After all, they don’t actually make decisions—they simply react to what men do. But television isn’t about good stories—it’s about propaganda.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Who Is The Biggest Alpha Male On Game Of Thrones?

Knight Rider
KR is a man who does not exist working in the DC political scene. His work is a shadowy flight into the dangerous world of a political class pushing the blue pill.

Men Fought The Nazis, Women Slept With Them

July 9, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

I grew up listening to my family's tales about their service in World War 2. A grand total of four of my forebears served in the Canadian Army during WW2—one in the air force, as part of a bomber crew, one as a tanker (he died just after the new year in 1945, when his tank was destroyed), and two others as regular old infantry men.

My infantry-serving great uncle was the best story teller, and…no offense to the others…his stories were the most interesting since he served in combat the longest (arriving in Normandy a week after the landings, whereas my other uncle arrived in Italy during 1945 and saw minor action, while the third was killed and the fourth in the air force had a pretty boring routine occasionally interrupted by flak and Messerschmidt's). He saw the most of the war, grinding his way across France and Holland and Germany while personally experiencing some of the epic events that are now ingrained forever in history. He survived run-ins with Tiger tanks, fought against elite Waffen SS divisions and saw a concentration camp (Bergen-Belsen) firsthand.

The most harrowing event of his service happened during the drawn out battle for the Carpiquet Airfield, located close to the Normandy coastline. At the time the Germans believed that the British and Canadian armies were the biggest threats, and concentrated the majority of their elite panzer and SS divisions against them, making the battle bloody and protracted.

One day my great uncle's platoon was tasked with a reconnoitre patrol, a fancy term for what was essentially sending a few dozen men toward the German front line to see what sort of and how much weaponry would be fired at them. My great uncle's platoon had barely gotten a hundred and some yards away from their line when two well-sighted MG42 machine guns caught the platoon in a crossfire in a very exposed position. Unfortunately my great uncle was near the front of the column. He was one of the few up there not to be killed or wounded immediately. He hit the deck, crawling into what little shelter there was around alongside the few members of his platoon who hadn't been wounded too heavily to move. The machine guns kept their fire up for several minutes until finally, all at once, they stopped. No shots rang out from my great uncle or the men who were huddling around him. They were armed with bolt action Lee Enfield rifles, with ten round clips. Considering the MG42 machine gun is capable of firing 1200 rounds a minute and there were usually in excess of 1,000 rounds for it on hand in a typical German position, it wasn't exactly an unreasonable idea for him to keep huddled down and quiet.

It didn't take long for the few suppressed squaddies to realize that the rest of the platoon had either been incapacitated or pulled back. The way back to the Canadian lines (so damn close but so damn far) was across a relatively flat field with only waist high grass and the occasional bush for cover. Anyone crawling through it would be seen immediately, and the Germans were well aware that there were some Canadian troops out there cowering.

At various times in the day, those in Canadian lines tried to lay down covering fire (they, like the Germans, knew there were pinned down survivors in No Man's Land). During a heavy barrage of artillery and machine gun fire on the German's positions, my great uncle and the men with him started to pull out. An MG42 opened up immediately and scythed down the two men who had gotten up just moments before my great uncle. One went down instantly, dead, and the other had his head blown in half by the same burst. The man with the exploded head actually managed to stumble a few more steps and went down only when hit with a secondary burst of machine gun fire. The now fewer remaining survivors hunkered down and waited for darkness. When it came the survivors pulled out…just minutes before a German patrol swept over their former position in a fierce local counter attack.

Hundreds of thousands of men from many western countries faced similar horrors day after day after day during World War 2. Unlike the popular myth of eager Johnny signing up in droves, many of them were drafted (conscripted) into service. We in Canada actually had a crisis because we were running out of bodies willing to voluntarily sign up to go over there. Regardless, the war against Nazi German was arguably one of the few truly just wars throughout history. Nazi Germany was a genocidal, tyrannical regime which invaded numerous democracies and, if left unchecked, would have undoubtedly continued their military conquests. There was little doubt in the public mind of the west that Nazi Germany was an evil country and one that needed to be defeated to ensure a measure of peace for western democracies.

Upon returning home, my great grandpa and uncles discovered a bit of a scandal had happened in their town. Nearby there was a small prisoner of war camp, a real slipshod operation which consisted of about a hundred Germans living in tar shacks out by some potato farms. Security at the camp consisted of some men too fat (yes, there were lots of fat people back then too) or old to serve in combat roles who spent their days sleeping in trucks with loaded shotguns across their laps, and a single roll of barb wire topping a chest high cow fence. German prisoners were essentially left to their own devices and if they had been so inclined they could have very easily escaped. However, since it was obvious to most of them that their war was a lost cause and crossing the Atlantic back to Germany was an impossible task, most were happy to spend the rest of the war sun tanning and picking potatoes while their countrymen fought mine in bloody battles.

The scandal was that during the war, several of the local Canadian women had been driving or biking out to fraternize with German prisoners of war in the shacks. Fraternize is a polite, politically correct term: in actuality, these Canadian women were driving or walking out to the tar shacks to screw the brains out of these German prisoners of war. These women ranged in age, some teenagers, others nearly in their 40s, but at least a few dozen were known to be regulars out there (from a town of about 1500 people) and it's likely that the real numbers of local woman fucking Nazis was higher. Some were repeats, most were undoubtedly just curious one night stands. Still, while people like my great grandpa and uncles were experiencing the horror of the European theatres, the women back home in their countries—the ones whom propaganda often told them they were supposed to be fighting for—were sucking the dicks of the men who had been massacring them before they stuck up a white flag.

Western women sleeping with Nazis happened in every single country, though obviously occupied ones like France had much higher rates of women spreading their legs for the Ubermensch than ones like America and Canada, although we had our fair share as well. While French men were being tortured, executed by being tied up and shot, and living miserable lives in the woods while risking their lives to sabotage Germany's war effort in order to free their country, their women were willingly allowing themselves to be spitroasted by SS officers in Parisian hotels.

"Women have always been the primary victims of war."
– Hillary Clinton, American President 2016-2024

Pictured: Typical Female Victim

While British men were machine gunned in hill and thicket, being beheaded for trying to rescue downed pilots, and executed for trying to escape their POW camp to get back into the war, British women were having Nazi babies and getting ready to marry them. But that's okay, I guess. After all, British women were screwing around with Nazis before the war even began, admiring the 'culture' of all those bronzed, blonde haired supermen who were in the midst of herding several million people into concentration camps. There probably wasn't any public expectation that all the young Marys wouldn't be screwing around with Fritz while their Tommy's were being blown apart by 88's a few dozen miles to the south-east.

You as well as I know that at least half of those SS officers got into them.

And do you think American were the exception?

Well, they weren't.

> "While in most reports the men were described as "well-behaved" at least two escape attempts were reported in the local newspaper. The first in July 1944 involved two girls, Kitty Case and Shirley Druce, 20 and 18 respectively, helped two men escape from the W. R. Roach Canning Company where they worked.
>
> Both girls admitted making arrangements to meet the two men, Gottfried Hobel and Eric Classen (both 20), and Case testified that she was in love with one of the men. A month after the conviction, they were sentenced. Case received one year and three months while Druce was sentenced to one year and a day."

While Tom Hanks was telling Matt Damon to live a good life…

> "Although fraternization with the prisoners was strictly illegal, the POW literature and my own interviews suggest that fraternization was widespread."
>
> "It was not unusual for Americans to initiate contact with prisoners working amongst them…"
>
> "…the "biggest problem is not to keep prisoners from making advances to people. The problem is to keep the people from fraternizing with prisoners…"
>
> "…there seems to be an uncontrollable desire [among Americans] to watch them and try to communicate with them."
>
> "Particularly concerned about fraternization between American women and German prisoners, the army made special efforts to reduce their potential contact with the enemy. Such efforts, however, did not prove very effect. For example, an intelligence report from Camp Fort Hays, Kansas, in October 1943 > notes with some consternation that “the girl students at Fort Hays Teachers College made every effort [bold emphasis added by Billy] to get close [spread their legs – Billy] and fraternize [fuck – Billy] with the prisoners; in many cases they have been successful. While rumours that some POWs had married American women were unsubstantiated, there are several accounts of romantic relationships between German prisoners of war and American women.”

In other words, Nazi Fux, American veteran bux.

> “The army’s main concern about the work program was fraternization between POWs and female civilians, and with good reason. Illicit romances—or rumors of them—were common at factories, where German prisoners and American women often worked side by side. At Camp Cooke, California, one German took advantage of his bus driving assignment by parking in a remote area to canoodle with a fellow employee. Perhaps the most extreme instance was a Wisconsin branch camp where local teenage girls slipped past lax security to cavort with the prisoners.”

There’s nothing better after a hard doing of being a Nazi prisoner of war than an orgy with a bunch of under age American sluts amirite?

While the men of World War 2 were being exposed to sights like this everyday:

their women back home were getting their nipples sucked on by suave gentlemen like this:

Women have always been sluts. The ‘Greatest Generation’ is no exception. It is, however, important to note the fact that women of all ages, in all the Allied countries (occupied or not) not only willingly slept with the soldiers and proponents of one of the most evil empires to have ever existed; they actively sought out Nazi’s to screw. Nazi Germany was a nation of cruelty not seen since the Medieval ages, and whose terror is topped in modernity by the Soviet Union. If we need any more evidence (which we most certainly do not) as to how immoral and low women as a species can go, we need only acknowledge this fact; while our grandfathers and great grandfathers were off fighting and dying to stop genocide and maintain a free world, their women were fucking the same people who were committing these horrific crimes.

So gentlemen, next time you’re making the mistake of trying to have a debate with a woman and she inevitably breaks Godwin’s law by dropping the Nazi card on you, feel free to drop this incendiary logic bomb on her Dresden: if you really were a Nazi, then why isn’t she desperately trying to have sex with you?

Because men fought the Nazis. Women slept with them.

Read More: Homage To Catalonia

Billy Chubbs
Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

The Most Important Trait That Leads To Male Success

July 9, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Whether your aim is to get laid, get fit or start your own business, the single most important trait you should strive to develop is consistency. Not only is consistency the key to success in every area of your life, but it is also one of the core elements of masculinity.

First, let me set out precisely what I mean by consistency and what I don't. The dictionary definition the word the way I'm using it is as follows:

> A steadfast adherence to the same principles, course, form.

'Principles, course, form'—results, you notice, are not mentioned. This is absolutely key. You need to be consistent in your actions. Results will follow, but in their own time. You can't force them. Your focus should always be solely on putting in right action every day—that is, consistently carrying out the same actions in pursuit of a clearly defined end goal. What you shouldn't do is try to jump straight to the goal itself. This is counterproductive, and any success you do happen to achieve will be short term and illusory, built on flimsy foundations.

When men come to ROK and other manosphere sites, it is often because they are unhappy with some element of their lives, frequently their success with women. Here they discover a community of guys who are interested in self-development and are actively working to improve themselves. Excited and inspired, the less consistent will join expensive gyms and hit them up for a month or so, or they go out and approach three or four women before giving up and returning to the comfort zone of their bedrooms. There, despondent, they will rationalize that game doesn't work, or self-development doesn't work or isn't for them, before sinking into a depression even lower than before. This, of course, is fundamentally the wrong way to approach anything.

In part, this pattern is undoubtedly due to cultural influences. We are now inundated with articles on how the internet has an adverse effect on our concentration spans. Whether or not you buy this is up to you (I'm personally ambivalent), but coupled with an emphasis on quick and easy fame and 'success' through reality TV and cheap celebrity, it is undeniable that the message being sent out is that you don't have to work hard or consistently to achieve your goals. This, of course, is entirely false. In fact, the formula for success in any endeavor is as follows:

Consistency + momentum = success

And the good news? Consistency itself creates momentum. But you need to put the work in.

Let's take meeting women as an example. If your aim is to improve your sex life—perhaps to meet multiple women or to find a girlfriend—then take a minute to work out how many women you have approached this week. Many, some, or none? Perhaps you alternate between a high number of approaches on the weekend, and none during the week. Or perhaps you steeled yourself to make that one big daygame approach and it went badly, so then you retreated into yourself, afraid to try again.

If you want to get really good with women, and achieve a lasting skill set, then you should make your habits here consistent. Decide on a realistic number of girls you can hit on per day—Roosh has a great post here about making one approach a day—and sticking to it. Start a spreadsheet recording each girl's name, the date of the approach, her contact details (if you get them), a description of her and a brief note on how the encounter went. Not only will this help you keep track of your various prospects, but it will also spur you on. Because every time you approach, regardless of how it goes, you know that you can fill in another row on your spreadsheet. Make that the goal, rather than pulling the girl. Why? Because the best way to achieve consistency is to learn to love the process and to let go of the result.

When you operate with this mindset you will find that slowly, over time, you will make incremental gains. Some of your approaches may be horrible—you might say something stupid, or not open strongly enough and have the girl ignore you. It doesn't matter—log it on your spreadsheet anyway, and go on to the next one. You will start to feel great satisfaction in watching the sheet fill up and knowing that you are working hard to better yourself, regardless of your results. This will strengthen your habit of consistency. Over time you will see your interactions improve exponentially. And time in the trenches is very important. Andrew Robinson, author of Sudden Genius? The Gradual Path to Creative Breakthroughs writes:

> Psychologist John Hayes in 1989 [discovered a rule] soon endorsed by other psychologists . . . that a person must persevere with learning and practicing a craft or discipline for about 10 years before he or she can make a breakthrough. Remarkably few breakthroughs have been achieved in less than this time.

Einstein's first insights into relativity were in 1895, ten years before his Theory was published in 1905. Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring was written in 1912, a decade after his apprenticeship to Rimsky-Korsakov in 1902. Picasso's Les Demoiselles d'Avignon appeared in 1907, ten years after he began training as an artist in Barcelona. This is not to suggest that it will take you ten years to get laid with a cute girl — far from it. But genuine mastery in any discipline takes real time, effort and application.

For a contemporary sporting example, look at the way Kobe Bryant trains. Kobe has won 5 NBA championships, 2 Olympic Gold Medals and he has a net worth of over $200 million. How did he attain this impressive level of success? Through consistent, focused practice. According to one trainer, he would begin conditioning work at 4:30am, run and sprint until 6am, lift weights from 6am – 7am and then make 800 jumps shots between 7am and 11am—all before official Team USA practice!

If this sound intimidating then that is entirely understandable, but realize at the same time that it is Kobe's near-crazy work ethic and consistency that has put him where he is today. Don't let stories about hard work put you off—if anything they should inspire you. Why? Because you can work hard too. Mark Cuban, billionaire owner of the Dallas Mavericks has this to say:

> In sports, the only thing a player can truly control is effort. The same applies to business. The only thing any entrepreneur, salesperson or anyone in any position can control is their effort.

The same goes for meeting women, getting jacked in the gym, becoming a better writer or any other endeavor you can think of. And the way to maximize the effort you make is to consistently put in the right action on a daily basis.

Last year I wrote a novel. Every morning I would get up at 5am before work and write for 90 minutes before showering, putting on my suit and heading off to into the corporate wasteland. I would also write in the evening and at weekends. Some writing sessions were terrible. My prose would sound cliched, stilted and lifeless. No matter—I just kept tapping away at the keyboard, filling up pages with words. My only aim was to get to the end. Finally I finished. I read it back—I had a novel that contained some terrible passages, some okay passages and a few that I as very happy with. A long period of editing and rewriting fixed the flaws and, while it's still work in progress, I now have a book that I'm proud of. But it didn't happen overnight—it was born out daily work which created incremental improvements over a long period of time.

Visualize whatever it is you want to achieve then work out how you're going to get there. Break the process down into small chunks and then do something every day that will get you a little closer to your goal. Don't think too much about the endgame—simply congratulate yourself on taking action today. After a while you will find that you are building up momentum and that you are enjoying the process.

If you have a bad day—say you get rejected by everyone in the club — then so what? Don't sweat it. You're doing this every day. There will be natural peaks and troughs. Tomorrow may be better. Keep going no matter what. In time you will see your technique improve. Perhaps your conversations with girls will last longer or you will start getting make-outs, phone numbers or the occasional bang. These successes will spur you on and encourage you to take more action. You will enter a virtuous cycle. Most importantly, you will start to feel that true inner contentment and happiness that comes from working on getting good at something that is important to you, rather than the shallow, illusory happiness that is offered to us by modern culture.

Y*ou can find out more about how consistency will help you to attract beautiful women by clicking here.*

Read More: The Importance Of Cultivating A Killer Instinct

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Don’t Stop Running Game In Long-Term Relationships

July 9, 2014 | by Charles Martel | Link | Original Link

A great many players will tell you that game did not come to them naturally. They had to work on it. They saw what they wanted, developed strategy and tactics and worked hard on it until success was achieved. In some cases it took years of painful and slow development to see any kind of success. But with tight game achieved, can it then be lost?

I am here to assure you that it can, indeed.

Getting Game

I got laid exactly twice in high school. In both instances, the girl made the first, second, and third moves, before I finally caught on to what she wanted. To say that I was shy around women is… well, understatement doesn’t even begin to cover it. I was deathly afraid of them. Lord knows, I wanted them, but had not a clue how to go about it. More importantly, I lacked the absolute most critical component of all players—confidence. Looking back, it is ridiculous to think of the missed opportunities that I had. What a dweeb!

And so, I joined the U.S. Marine Corps. Much of Marine Corps training is designed to build exactly what I was lacking. They even have an entire circuit entitled “Confidence Course.” Often mistaken for an obstacle course, it is designed to make you face your fears and physical limits, most notably a fear of heights. Some of these can be seen in the boot camp parts of the movie, Full Metal Jacket. I graduated boot camp at the tender age of 17, my confidence only starting to fill up. I didn’t realize at the time that it had a long way to go yet.

The next year and a half were the most hectic of my life. After boot camp came four more months of training (0311 or Rifleman was my chosen specialty), followed by posting to the 'Fleet'. Deployment quickly followed, first to the Mediterranean as the Marine contingent of the 6th Fleet and then immediately to the Gulf for what turned out to be round one. These first two years in the Corps did not allow a lot of time for the ladies. The ladies I did encounter were either prostitutes or had multiple shields up that surpassed the simple slut type (more on that later). The reason I outline this is to show how and why my confidence kept increasing. I was achieving. I had graduated boot camp, completed infantry training, successfully integrated with my permanent unit (no small feat) and had been deployed twice, both times involving shots fired. I had already done things that most men will never do. After two short years, I was a "salt" and had the chest salad to prove it. I wasn't just cocky—I was arrogant. All fear of women was gone.

In this time, while in Naples, Italy for only four days, I had my very first success with "game." It should be noted that this was before the Internet, much less sites like ROK and others to give you tips and tricks. I am certain there were books at the time on how to approach women, but I wasn't reading any. Anyway, Jenny was a waitress at a bar I happened in to and she was as gorgeous as her mixed Italian/Japanese ancestry would indicate. I honed in on her like a laser and banged her right there in the bar two days later. It was the first time in my life, that I had met a girl and successfully pursued her. Back on the ship that night, the guys gave me a hero's welcome. Ego boosted.

Through my twenties, I improved and expanded my game, a term unknown to me at the time. I simply had that arrogant cockiness and observed what worked and what didn't. I continually had at least two or three women in orbit around me, more or less waiting their turn. Some hotter than others, some more eager than others. I had a serious case of I-don't-give-a-fuck that I wore on my sleeve and, in retrospect, I think that was the real clincher with most of these women. Fun though it was, it was not destined to last.

As I approached my thirties, I began to question my life and really began to want more out of it. So I got married. Almost as soon as I did, I lost all my game. What did I need game for? I was now off the market, right? I will now be married forever, right? Wrong.

Disaster

Losing my game happened just months into married life. It started with, you guessed it… finances. My wife had control of the checkbook and I tried arguing with her that I needed at least a share of that responsibility (talk about blue pill!). Basically, she just ignored me and I gave up after a while, since it was easier to not argue. I literally, handed her my paychecks, with her often forging my signature, since I had become that lazy. I should've just cut my balls off, since it was the same thing and with the same result. Needless to say, that was just the first domino in a long line of disrespect, culminating in the worst—infidelity. It was followed by divorce. In a heart-beat, I lost everything, my family, my house and my job. Wiped out. Bankrupt and alone. Everything that I had worked so very hard for, eviscerated.

What followed was years of depression. I went through life listlessly. I wasn't even trying. Jobs came and went. I didn't care. I even walked out on the best paying job I ever had. Life had no flavor and no purpose. Through my now ex wife, I was angry at all women and rarely even attempted any kind of relationship with them. The few women that I did approach could sense this depression and desperation and it acted exactly as the pussy repellant that it is.

Learn from my mistakes, not your own

I did recover. This article is proof of that. There was a time when I could not speak about these events at all and forget posting it on the interwebs for all the world to see. The recovery is for another time though, for now it is enough to finish with the moral of the story.

Never give up your game. Ever. For exactly zero reason. It is only years later that I realize that my marriage failure was entirely my own fault. I owned a nice home in the 'burbs and had two new cars but I lost my children and everything else because I handed control over to my wife and she proceeded to do what women always do—destroy. Being married and building a family is all about stability and planning for the future; I can not think of anything that women are worse at than that. They act, react and "think" emotionally and this leads to precisely the opposite effect—instability and acting on whims. Nothing destroys more families than that.

So, if you are married or contemplating marriage, learn from my mistakes, not your own. Keep your game sharp and constant at all times. You will need it.

Read more: What The Hell Is A Clitoris?

Charles Martel
Charles is a hack writer and all around shiftless individual. He has spent his time traveling and in a wide variety of occupations. If it can be said that he has any goals in life at all, it is to impart just a small bit of his hard earned wisdom. He can be followed on twitter here Follow @CharlesMartel19

3 Tips For How To Be Charismatic

July 9, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Charisma! That quality that some men seem to possess effortlessly, but you've always wanted to have it too. Without a doubt, charisma is a quality that you can develop and that will help you more in business and getting women than any other attribute. But how does one become charismatic? Do you have to be born that way, or are there fundamental tactics a man can develop to be charismatic?

When I was a young lad, around 12 years old, I was obsessed with studying great men's biographies, and any film footage I could find of them. I spent years, including high school and college, continuing my study of great men to see what made them tick and how they did it.

The one common denominator that I found was that they were all predominately charismatic.

After extensive study and application of the techniques I observed, I achieved my goal of having real charisma. The #1 trait that people have pointed out after meeting me is that I'm very charismatic. While I'm pleased I achieved my goal and am always continually working on improving, it's time for me to share some secrets that I've used for years now to help you. You ready? Let's get you started.

3. Treat Every Person You Meet As Your Best Friend

People want to connect with other people. They may have their head buried in their smart phone, they might be shy, they might be nervous, but make no mistake, people are dying to make a connection with someone. It's not natural for humans to be alone and who the hell likes to be lonely?

One technique that I've observed from not only studying great men, but having met some of the most famous men in the world, is how they instantly 'connect' with you. The most striking memory I have of this is when I met Ryan Gosling (the actor) at a President Obama fundraiser. While I wasn't there to write a check for Barry, I was in attendance due to a friend who is a minor celebrity.

Ryan and I started chatting about something mundane; I believe it was the food or something retarded, and then I mentioned an obscure film he had done before he became a bonafide star. His eyes lit up and for the next 20 minutes this A-list star gave me his undivided attention. Now here's the real kicker: it's Hollywood right? The room is full of stars, his back is to the wall and his eyes never left mine the entire time. If I wasn't aware of charisma, I would have thought I was his new best friend. He made me, a young buck brand new to Los Angeles, feel on top of the world. It gets even better…

President Obama, then a Senator, was approaching the stage to speak and Ryan's manager came running up to alert him. Ryan without missing a beat, stuck his hand out at her in a stop motion and said, "Hold on. I'm talking with my friend Christian here, I'll be there in a bit". My head exploded. Here Ryan Gosling was putting his manager and in a way the future president on hold, to finish our conversation. It's no doubt that he's the major film star he is.

When you meet someone treat them like your best friend, not fake, but with warmth and giving them your undivided attention. Trust me when I say that they will be drawn to you like a moth to a flame and this is an essential aspect of charisma.

2. Act With Conviction

An essential aspect of charisma is acting with conviction, speaking with certainty and having confident body language. You must truly believe that what you're saying is absolutely the best way to operate. Whether in a business meeting, or on a date with a sexy girl, the more matter of fact that you act in your speech and physical actions, the more likely others will 'fold' to you. Do not confuse this with being a loudmouth brute who cannot accept when he is wrong, but instead use prudence, but act with conviction.

When I walk through a club, a fundraiser, or a mall, or any public space, I walk as though I own the place. This is partly confidence and mostly that in my own mind I do 'own' the place. While my name isn't on the deed, I own the space in the sense of my presence.

When I speak to a group whether in a business meeting, or 1-on-1 with a sexy girl on a date, I do so as though every single thing that comes out of my mouth is with conviction. Have you ever wondered why Caveman Game works? Because the drunk frat boy roaming the bar grabbing girls asses and spouting off retarded shit is doing so with conviction. People who act confidently and with conviction are respected and followed. While obviously his ideals were whack as fuck, Hitler was known for being charismatic as well. Never underestimate the power of speaking with conviction: most people are sheep and are looking to follow the most dominate voice in the room.

A perfect example of full blown charisma is Denzel Washington in almost every role he has done and even more importantly in real life. He walks, talks and behaves as though he is the motherfuckin' man. Even in roles where he plays a 'bad' character, such as Training Day, he does it with such conviction that as the viewer you start to believe that maybe he is right when he crosses the line continually. He even operates with such conviction that Ethan Hawke's character folds to the 'pressure' and behaves accordingly for a period of time. Charisma is very powerful when executed properly.

1. Do Not Seek The Approval Of Others

To put it in layman terms, the acronym IDGAF (I don't give a fuck) attitude comes into play here. While you're acting with conviction, treating everyone with warmth and giving them attention, you cannot give two fucks what they think of you. A leader can never truly be effective if he's worried about pleasing everyone and getting everyone's approval before acting. It's impossible.

Give people real undivided attention, treat them as your best friend, act and speak with conviction and divorce yourself from the outcome and you will be on your way to developing charisma.

Go here, because who wants to fuck 5´s and live an average life?

Read More: 4 Steps That Help Build Your Confidence

‘Kirill Was Here’ Exposes The Hypocrisy Of Feminism

July 10, 2014 | by Kilmister | Link | Original Link

Kirill Was Here. That is the calling card for the professional party photographer based in New York City. If you visit the Twitter feed or Facebook page by the same name and you will be immediately bombarded with photographs of half-naked and naked women at clubs and parties eagerly and voluntarily in a number of hyper sexualized situations. The “Champagne Facial” is a classic and a staple.

Basically the scantily clad or partially naked young woman willingly takes champagne to the face in a manner similar to getting cummed on, mouth agape, eagerly awaiting Kirill to pour it all over her face and tits while fellow party goes cheer her on. She knows what this is suggestive of, there is no mystery, and she loves the attention it gets her. The attention in the club as well as the attention it will later get online.

Kirill also goes by the moniker “The Slut Whisperer.” He is affectionately referred to as this by men and women alike. If you follow his Twitter feed, he routinely refers to women as sluts and posts his photographs of enthusiastic and excited women participating in any number of sexually provocative and suggestive acts. Pulling out their tits to have champagne, or even milk dumped all over them, lifting their dress and bending over to show the world their ass, sometimes as Krill or other party goes enjoy a cold beverage poured off it into their own mouth. All this publically in clubs or parties full of hundreds, maybe thousands of people. Not only are they cheered on by horned-up young men, but other women as well. Nobody seems put-off or disgusted in any way.

Kirill makes no bones about calling-out these same women for their slutty behaviors, then having the nerve to think they might deserve respect or good men by their sides. As a matter of fact, women almost seem to line up to be called sluts and strip down and perform for the camera. It is attention after all, and it seems to make absolutely no difference that it would be considered blatantly trashy attention whoring to anyone observing it. They know exactly what they are doing and why they are doing it.

Their behavior doesn't take much prodding. Maybe they get a sticker as reward, not even a t-shirt. They know their fathers would be revolted by what 'daddy's little girl' is up to tonight, and their mothers mortified that this is the same girl that kisses grandma on the cheek at Christmas dinner. Grandma, for that matter, would drop dead on the spot if she saw these photos. The women don't care, they got five minutes of attention out of it. Five minutes of hooting and hollering from strangers for a potential lifetime of regret. But it is mens fault, right?

[image]

The concept is not new, of course. We all remember Girls Gone Wild and its creator, Joe Francis, who bought himself his own private island off revenue generated from desperate attention whoring females. Show your tits on film, sign this release, get a t-shirt. Hell, who wouldn't jump at that!? He also seems to never have a problem having a bevy of beautiful women on his arm, despite being such a 'monster.' What do the feminists say about those women? Nothing.

Is all this sexual objectification? Absolutely. Is it right? Depends who you ask. But where it gets particularly shameful is the downright inability for so many women to accept the fact it is every bit their own fault as anyone holding the camera. As a matter of fact, it is the opinion of your author it is in fact predominantly their own fault.

[image]

That brings us to the article, 'Is Kirill the Next Dov Charney or Terry Richardson?' by a feminist named Shira Albagli. Charney, the founder and CEO of American Apparel, and fashion photographer Terry Richardson are known for their more risqué and suggestive images of women, and both were later accused of sexual assault. In her blog post she writes

> "Kirill profits off of perpetuating rape culture (in which sexual assault is normalized, trivialized, and eroticized), as he jokes about drugging his friends. He profits off of exploiting and demeaning women, as he mocks their bodies. And he profits off of putting women in positions of powerlessness and vulnerability."

Feminism was a once honorable cause that has since been corrupted and turned into a tool by women to facilitate their own selfish needs, and to brandish whenever they are exposed as the hypocrites they tend to be. They want the complete freedom and opportunity it provided, all while cherry picking the parts of 'chivalry' they seem to think they deserve. Use the recent example of feminists and their 'Free the Nipple' campaign. Chicago-based feminists Robyn Graves and Michelle Lytle ask,

> "If you really think about it, what's the difference between a man's nipples and a > woman's? Is it really just the extra breast tissue? Is it the fact that women's nipples are paired with a vagina? What is it that is so horrible that caused SUCH hysteria?"

So, let's get this straight, when women willingly expose their breasts in men's magazines or at one of Kirills events, it is slut-shaming and victimization. But when feminists want to expose them in public, say at the beach, in front of children and families, perfectly fine. It all just depends what agenda they are preaching that month, 'gender inequality' or 'rape culture.'

[image]

Feminists will tell you that it is all about empowering women, and they are as strong and capable to make their own decisions without male influence to create their own destiny as any man. Want to sleep around? Go for it. That is until it comes back to embarrass them, and now they were 'taken advantage of'. Suddenly when women are clamoring to get a 'Champagne Facial' or willingly show-off their naked breasts, we are supposed to believe they went from strong and empowered, to weak and over-sexualized victims by no fault of their own. They were just hapless targets of mens 'slut shaming'. It is never just the fact they are weak-minded attention whores. Dress and behave as slutty and provocative as you want, but don't you men dare sexualize us! Again incapable of accepting responsibility for their own behaviors.

In no way is Kirill, or this article for that matter, perpetuating 'rape culture.' Women do in fact have the ability to make their own decisions, and they are in fact capable of determining their own destiny without male influence just as feminists preach about. That is until that destiny is jeopardized by their own behaviors. Then it is the fault of men and their evil 'slut shaming' tactics. Nobody is saying that there are no evil men in this world, capable of unspeakable acts against women. Those men are monsters and should be castrated and have their balls thrown in the fire while they watch. However, many women willingly and openly expose and over-sexualize themselves, 'slut-shame' themselves. It is time they start accepting responsibility, and stop blaming wicked men when their own actions come back to bite them in their exposed ass. Kirill is only there to take the photographs, and the women love every second of it.

Read More: This Is What A Feminist Looks Like

Kilmister
Host of the 100 Proof Truth Podcast, spreading truth in the dynamics of relationships between men and women, in particular exposing the hypocrisy and entitlement of the modern American women. Follow him on Twitter and Facebook

Did Jezebel Pick Emma Carmichael For Editor Over A Black Woman Because Of Her Looks?

July 10, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

The Gawker-owned feminist website Jezebel recently landed in controversy when they passed over their black deputy editor Dodai Stewart for twenty five year old white editor Emma Carmichael.

> The announcement two weeks ago that Emma Carmichael, editor of The Hairpin, will succeed Jessica Coen as editor-in-chief of Jezebel left some Jezebel staffers feeling conflicted—both happy for Carmichael and disappointed that management passed over deputy editor Dodai Stewart for the top job.

Dodai Stewart has been with the site since a month after its founding. In May 2014, both Gawker editorial director Joel Johnson and Jezebel founding editor Anna Holmes told Capital Media that Dodai was a strong candidate. The choice of a twenty five year old white girl over the second highest editor who has been with Jezebel since its founding has lead many to accuse Jezebel of racism.

> But the decision to hand the site to a young white woman instead of Stewart—a black woman who has been working at the site since Carmichael was still in college—rubs some current and former staffers the wrong way, especially since the site has been criticized in the past for its handling of race issues.
>
> "I would not say that I think it is like a racist action, but it is kind of a missed opportunity," one staffer said. "The race thing would have been a really wonderful—just like to have a really well-established Black woman who is so good at her job running the site would have been great."

If Jezebel staffers were speaking about another organization with a history of race issues, they would not restrain themselves to the phrase “missed opportunity.” Jezebel has actually called the schools of kids making racist tweets, reported them to administrators, and gleefully reported the results. If this were another media organization, Jezebel would be publish the home phone number and address of everyone involved, and unleash a twitter swarm under the hashtags #CancelJezebel, and #solidarityisforwhitewomen.

Dodai Stewart has been writing for Jezebel for seven years, published in the New York Times, and represented Jezebel on television. Though Emma Carmichael has been managing editor of other Gawker sites (Gawker, Deadspin) she is has never even written for Jezebel. The two most recent articles listed on her website are How Pat Summitt Ruined The Best Thing About Women’s Basketball and Dropping In On The Demented Utopia Of The Gathering Of The Juggalos. Ironically, her degree is in Urban Studies.

Emma Carmichael wears Juggalo makeup for an article.

Stewart is universally agreed to be a more qualified candidate than Carmichael. The question is why was Dodai rejected in favor of a white woman? Was it mere cronyism, an indication of racism, or even fat shaming? While it’s no secret that Jezebel represents everything Return of Kings abhors, this controversy reveals the what really drives Jezebel. Behind all the feminist rhetoric lie darker truths about looks, money, and media. Even on the most vocal feminist website on the internet, sexual market value still rules.

Does Jezebel Have A Problem With Race?

Racism is the preferred theory hinted at by anonymous Jezebel staffers. Emma Carmichael represents the same demographic that makes up the majority of the Jezebel writing staff—young privileged twenty-something white girls. Many have already pointed to Dodai's race as the reason Jezebel passed over her for a white girl:

> It's difficult not to feel the racial undertones to this because it does reek of just another day and another example of discrimination. It leaves a sour taste in my mouth that the glass ceiling still exists, even in spaces that are supposedly progressive.

Whether or not this is the only motive, Jezebel has clearly committed a racist action by passing over a more qualified black woman for a less qualified white candidate who looks more like the other women she will be working with.

Did Jezebel Pass Over Dodai Stewart Because Of Fat Shaming?

Part of the job of editor in chief is to be the public face of the company. Previous editor Anna Holmes was a camera friendly white girl, while Dodai Stewart is an overweight black woman. Did Jezebel not want to be publicly represented by a fat person?

Jezebel has received heavy criticism in the past for overweight writer Lindy West who plays into every negative stereotype of a fat feminist. Perhaps West's poor media performance has made Gawker hesitant to allow another fat woman to represent Jezebel. Would Stewart have gotten the job if she'd lost forty pounds? We'll never know, but Jezebel clearly passed over a more qualified fat candidate for one with greater "thin privilege."

Is Jezebel Trying To Hide Where Feminism Leads?

Dodai Stewart is an unmarried unattractive overweight black woman approaching forty with few quality romantic prospects. While ROK readers see this as the natural outcome of feminist living, Jezebel readers may not realize this is where their philosophy leads. No young feminist would want Stewart's life. She is not an aspirational image. Carmichael is still young, so her actions have not revealed their consequences yet.

Did Jezebel Want To Avoid Paying Its Editor Well?

A comment on the original Buzzfeed announcement reads:

An inexperienced twenty five year old girl is a cheaper hire then the salary bump a deputy editor with seven years experience might demand. Could it be Jezebel just cares more about the bottom line then they do about race, women's bodies, or loyalty?

Was Emma Carmichael Chosen To Sell To White Readers?

Gawker owner Nick Denton makes the final decision on who sits at the head of the media companies he controls. Gawker has moved to a model known as commerce journalism, where writers create sponsored content full of affiliate links disguised as news. In a leaked memo, Gawker founder Nick Denton told his staff, "your beat is helping readers buy things." Commerce journalism turns reporters into advertisers and is unethical by most traditional standards.

If Denton's goal is to push products, a twenty something white girl is the superior choice. Emma Carmichael will have an easier time selling to her own demographic and less moral scruples about doing it than a devout ideologue like Stewart. Because Carmichael isn't qualified, and owes Denton the job, she won't be able to say no if he asks her to use even more unethical journalism practices to monetize the site under the guise of feminism.

Emma Carmichael Was Chosen For Her Looks

Every possible theory to explain why Jezebel would chose a less experienced thin young white editor over a more experienced overweight older black editor points to one conclusion: Emma Carmichael was chosen over Dodai Stewart for her attractive white appearance. Regardless of what Jezebel says, their actions reveal what they truly believe. While Jezebel tells men to embrace body positivity, diversity, and feminism, they do not practice those values in their own office. Jezebel's new choice of editor confirms what Gawker is really about: money. And they're willing to sell out every value they have for it.

Read More: Fat Feminist Lindy West Goes Berserk Because She No Longer Fits In Airplane Seats

Eric Crowley
Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

The Republican Party Needs To Go Away: Part II

July 11, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Since my last article on the subject, I have noticed a few things. I have noticed that Ted Cruz renounced his Canadian citizenship. I noticed some conservatives take more than a passing glance at my Return of Kings Articles. I have also noticed people do not understand the concept of breaking up a two-party system by targeting the weaker party. The two parties are quite similar in that they utilize their positions to transfer the wealth of the people the United States from the U.S. Treasury to their selected confederates. The illusion of choice keeps this political system going while the economic one is unsustainable.

Thad Cochran's "strategy" in the Mississippi Republican Senate primary is the most recent example of how far the current courtesans of Washington DC will go to keep their grip on power. Utilizing such divisive techniques such as a wedge issues, politicians are quite successful in keeping people voting for them even if they do not do anything on the principles they say they espouse. If people keep giving free votes merely based on party affiliation, no one will work to earn those votes. That is the truth of the matter. A good example of politicians on both sides the aisle not actually giving a shit what the people think is the Troubled Asset Relief Program. The vast majority of Americans did not want this bill passed. They even protested against it back in 2008. However, the solons in Washington decide to keep voting on it until it finally passed.

Mark Fox · a month ago

The Republican leadership is basically controlled opposition. If you need any further proof of this, then you need to look at the four years when Republicans controlled both houses and the Presidency. Did anything get fixed? Did the budget get balanced? Did the welfare state deflate? Did the housing bubble deflate?

The fact is that the Republicans are the real do nothing party. They don't do a damn thing. In those four years I mentioned, they couldn't even be bothered to remove Planned Parenthood subsidies from the Federal budget even though Planned Parenthood, a non-profit organization, made record profits in those years.

Republicans will not fix issues like abortion because it gets them votes. You want social issues resolved, you fix society starting with yourself and then branching out. Abortion can be done away with simply by not doing business with abortion clinics (they need water, power, and regular maintenance) and by not associating with women who get abortions.

Unless you have a candidate with whom you agree with at least 85% of the time, then you should write your own name in on the ballot. Because you know how to run your life and you are the one who can fix the problems in your life. Not some asshole in a suit.

5 ^ | v · Reply · Share ›

Why are Republicans the weaker party? They do not do anything to further their cause when they do have power. Recently when Democrats took power, they were quick to pass the Affordable Care Act. They struck when the iron was hot. Republicans do not seem to take any action unless it has been hyped in conservative media first or certain CEOs of defense companies need a war to boost profits. Their lack of initiative always seems to put them on the defensive, which makes them the weaker party. Remember the Republicans had the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the Presidency from 2003 to 2007. They did not really accomplish much aside from making Halliburton quite wealthy and making John Roberts a Supreme Court justice.

The current immigration “crisis” is a good example of Republicans not doing anything with the power they have. Last time I checked the Constitution, it said that all spending bills would originate in the House of Representatives. Also last time I checked, the Republicans controlled the House of Representatives. Therefore, instead of not passing spending bills to force the president’s hand, American people are entertained with political drama on a Kafka-like scale with IRS hearings, NSA spying, and Internet fight videos.

If one party should fall, there will be a power vacuum that would actually upend the current political system. If politicians had to fight for votes, they might actually do something for their constituents aside from scraps of bread and circus. It would force them to confront issues that are not politically popular instead of kicking the can down the street in regards to unsustainable spending.

Mr.Correcto → Fisherking · a month ago

This is what I insinuated in an earlier reply. If Americans still have balls, after the dems have taken complete control, we would rise up and start a new political party and have a revolution.

3 ^ | v · Reply · Share ›

Someone brought up in the comment section of the last article the dark possibility: the idea that the Democratic Party would destroy the nation. Well if that is their plan, it does not seem likely that the Republicans would do anything to stop it anyway. Again, this is deciding which of the two is the weaker party, not, which one is more deserving of the other being kicked into the trashcan of history. If the fall of the Republicans causes the demise of the current socioeconomic environment, so be it. A quick death is always better than a slow one. Also the faster something is destroyed, the faster it can be rebuilt.

Read More:The Republican Party Needs To Go Away

Douglas Heppner

Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

The Deadly Consequences Of Feminist Propaganda In The US Navy

July 11, 2014 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

Back in 1993, Congress lifted the ban restricting women from flying in combat and serving on various Navy vessels. If you're saying to yourself, "That sounds convenient," in light of the fact that the Soviet Union collapsed in late 1991, you're probably a pretty smart guy. Given the United States was now the stand-alone superpower, and with no nations that could even come close to competing with our military superiority, it was decided that women could serve a more active role in fighting our enemies.

One of the first women to get on board with this new program was a woman named Kara Spears Hultgreen. Hultgreen stood at an imposing 5'10 and had the ability to bench press 200 pounds—impressive for a man, let alone a woman. Kara joined the Navy in 1987 after graduating from the University of Texas with a bachelor's degree in Aerospace Engineering. She earned her commission through the Aviation Officer Candidate School in Pensacola and went on to fly several trainers and jets. Kara ultimately achieved the rank of lieutenant with the Navy.

Lt. Hultgreen was destined to make history and become the first female F-14 Tomcat pilot. Given her physical strength, and high level of intelligence, she seemed to be the perfect candidate for a female fighter pilot.

Shepherding The Weak

Training on the F-14 proved to be a little more difficult than expected for the 29 year old lieutenant. Male naval aviators were held to the normal “three strikes and you’re out” policy regarding checkride or training failures (called “downs” in the Navy). If these failures were severe enough, a man could be expelled with as little as one or two failures. Standards were high, as you would expect with men responsible for commanding multi-million dollar aircraft that carry deadly weapons. However, these same standards didn’t apply to Lt. Hultgreen–she had accumulated four downs, yet was still allowed to continue flying.

Commanding Officers had their hands tied. This was the ushering in of a new era. Peter Jennings, of ABC News, said at the time, “There is a vicious campaign against allowing women to serve in combat.” The Clinton administration was now running the show, and they wanted results. Anything less than having women in these combat roles would be seen as sexist or misogynistic, but is that really the case? Are we to believe that Lt. Hultgreen’s four downs were the result of indignant, or worse yet, neglectful actions of those male officers that were running the Navy’s F-14 training program?

Were Kara’s failures a result of spite, or would time prove that perhaps, just maybe, her commanding officers were looking out for her best interests and the best interests of the U.S. Navy? We’re talking about lieutenant commanders and commanders. Naval aviators that had seen some shit in their day and were the best of the best at what they do: flying airplanes and teaching young officers how to fly airplanes.

These were top-notch instructors who had their own careers and reputations to uphold.

They were professional men who had dedicated their lives to their trade—they were not a bunch of fuck-ups who would just shit all over a female aviator for just for kicks. The very real possibility existed that she was a danger to herself and to those tasked with working with her. Fear of having one's career stricken from them, fear of not being able to feed one's family, or fear of separating service from the military with a less than honorable discharge were what kept Lt. Hultgreen in the cockpit.

Ideology Collides With Reality

On October 25, 1994, Lt. Hultgreen was flying a training mission off the USS Abraham Lincoln aircraft carrier—positioned near the coast of California at the time. Sitting behind her was Lieutenant Matthew Klemish, acting as the Radar Intercept Officer (ROI). Kara began her final approach to the USS Abraham Lincoln by ignoring repeated waveoff signals by the landing officer. Lt. Hultgreen found herself overshooting the centerline of the landing area and attempted to compensate for the botched approach by applying additional left rudder—a lot of left rudder. Her overzealous rudder inputs caused a compressor stall of the left hand engine.

Following the compressor stall, Lt. Hultgreen applied full power and full afterburner to the remaining right hand engine and established the aircraft in a nose high attitude—attempting to abort the approach and go around. The increase in power on the right hand engine caused the aircraft to yaw even harder to the left. Asymmetrical thrust coupled with the high angle of attack of her climb out attitude was more than the aircraft could handle. Ultimately, the entire left wing stalled, and the aircraft dropped hard to the left.

Lt. Klemish in the back, undoubtedly experiencing a severe case of 'fuck this shit', initiated the ejection process for both himself, and Lt. Hultgreen. Lt. Klemish's seat was the first to eject in the sequence, and he narrowly escaped with his life. Lt. Hultgreen's seat ejected only half of a second after Klemish's, but it was too late. The aircraft had rolled over to the point that Lt. Hultgreen was ejected directly into the Pacific Ocean. She was killed immediately upon impact. The 38 million dollar F-14 she was flying was reduced to a waterlogged piece of very expensive wreckage.

Nineteen days following the crash, her body was recovered. She was buried on November 21st at Arlington National Cemetery and received full honors.

The Cover-Up

The Navy's JAG was assigned with the investigation of the crash and to arrange a report of their findings. The JAG concluded the accident was caused by a mechanical failure of the left engine. The JAG's "report" rejected the notion that there were widespread accusations that Lt. Hultgreen was not qualified to be a fighter pilot. The report claimed that the F-14 had a history of accidents and that the aircraft's two Pratt & Whitney TF30 turbofan engines were underpowered for the airframe.

Top brass in the Navy vehemently stated that Lt. Hultgreen's death was nothing more than a very unfortunate and devastating event. It was not because she was a woman. It wasn't because of pressure from progressives and feminists. High ranking Navy officials flat-out said it wasn't her fault. This was their story and they were sticking to it.

That's exactly what they did—they stuck to their story. According to the Navy, Lt. Kara Hultgreen was a hero that died unnecessarily in a tragic accident. The JAG's report was officially released to the newspapers and TV news outlets. The press spread the report far and wide to the American public.

The Navy even held a simulator demonstration with 13 male F-14 pilots to demonstrate that the accident was completely unpreventable. Only one of those pilots—the commanding officer—was able to “survive” the conditions replicated in the simulator. This was widely reported in the media as well and served to further hammer home the point that all of the events leading up to the crash were completely unavoidable, and not survivable.

The Truth

The Navy Safety Center was also involved with examining the crash. It was their responsibility to conduct a Mishap Investigation. Their findings were much different than those of the JAG. They cited pilot error as the cause of the accident, and concluded that Lt. Hultgreen was completely at fault. The Mishap investigation concluded that Lt. Hultgreen made four major errors that contributed to the crash. They were the following:

1. Excessive rudder use contributing to compressor stall. The Naval Air Training and Procedures Standardization manual for the F-14 specifically states that excessive rudder inputs can result in a compressor stall.

2. Failure to execute proper waveoff procedures.

3. Failure to inform Lt. Klemish in the backseat that there was an emergency.

4. Failure to make a decision to eject.

Interestingly enough, this report didn’t make its way to NBC, ABC, or the New York Times. It was, in fact, intended to be kept completely under wraps and never disclosed to the public. It’s the Navy’s privilege to keep the report classified—they were under no obligation to release its findings to the media. The question remains though: why didn’t the JAG’s report mirror the findings of the NSC’s Mishap Investigation?

A junior officer, either an ensign or a lieutenant (junior grade), with a moral compass and access to the Mishap Investigation Report wondered the same exact thing. He leaked the official report and allowed the truth to come out.

It also turned out the simulator session with 12 of 13 pilots crashing the aircraft was staged by the Navy. The pilots were forbidden to respond properly to the emergency they were presented.

The F-14 Tomcat was used by the Navy from 1974 to 2006. No pilot, other than Lt. Hultgreen, has ever compressor stalled one of the aircraft's engines due to excessive yaw/rudder application. F-14 pilots are specifically trained on the aircraft's propensity to compressor stall and do not perform maneuvers that can cause it. Lt. Hultrgreen was instructed on the dangers of excessive rudder use, but either ignored her training or forgot about it in the heat of the moment.

Kara Hultgreen was a big, strong, and highly intelligent woman. She had successfully flown the A-6 prior to training on the F-14. She was under a great deal of pressure to become the first combat pilot in the Navy. She was being rushed and pushed beyond her personal limits. The powers that be wanted women in these combat roles, and God dammit, they wanted them there right now. This pressure was not only extended to Lt. Hultgreen, but to her commanding officers and anyone else involved with her training.

The top brass of the Navy were watching all of them like hawks. Anything to upset the feminists and progressives would be seen as oppressive double standards—she wasn't allowed to fail, and none of her male superiors were allowed to fail her. She was out of her depth and everyone around her knew it. Given her intelligence, I'm 99 percent sure that she knew it too, but she pressed on at her own peril, and very likely, to satisfy her own ego. Luckily, Lt. Klemish was able to escape with his life and none of the carrier crew were killed in this tragedy.

In Closing

This event took place 20 years ago—it's old news. However, one must ask themselves, what was the point of Lt. Hultgreen's death? What was the purpose of throwing 38 million dollars into the Pacific Ocean? Sadly, only the Soviet Union collapsed in December of 1991—its Marxist principles that were idealized and idolized as its foundation did not collapse along with it. It's an interesting yet sordid tale. With the collapse of a communist empire such as the U.S.S.R., it would seem sagacious to extract every valuable lesson learned from its failure and vow to never—under any circumstances—repeat or implement the same systems and policies that resulted in its demise.

The U.S. took away no such lessons. In less than two years following the dismantling of the Soviet Union, the U.S. was lifting bans and effectuating policies that would have gotten the nod of approval from the likes of Lenin, Trostsky, and the whole of the Soviet politburo. What was the point of the Cold War if the end result was to slowly become a mirror's reflection of the very system we spent decades trying to undermine?

Lt. Hultgreen's coffin may have been draped with an American flag, but she died for its gynocentric right hand crony feminism. In the 20 years following Lt. Hultgreen's death, what has improved? What has feminism given us, exactly? Feminism has proven to do nothing more than perpetually drive home the point that not good enough, is in fact, the new good enough. To say anything to the contrary of the politically correct feminist narrative will quickly have you labeled as a scumbag women hating misogynist—there's no room for honesty in feminism.

That is what feminism gives us. It gives us silence in the face of inadequacy, even if that inadequacy can result in the loss of life. It ties the hands and gags the mouths of the reasonably minded and the responsible. It gives us cover-ups and subterfuge in lieu of the fervent thoroughgoing truth. It erodes the morale of the profoundly talented, while giving the deficient a place and a voice that they do not deserve, and did not earn. Feminism is a systematically imposed mechanism that saddles men with the responsibility of compensating for the frailty and biologically imposed limitations bestowed upon women—just so they can arrogantly, yet fallaciously say, "See assholes? We can too!" It gives us special interests, but not our best interests.

The world works in one of two ways. The first is to shovel the necessary shit, pay your dues, and work tirelessly to achieve your goals to the highest level. You will have fought tooth and nail to earn your stripes and you will never be given any reason to doubt why you have a place at the table; you're there because you deserve it. Most importantly, the strife you endured and the hardships you overcame will give you immeasurable pride. You will have persevered and built a strength of character that extends down to the core of your soul, and no one can ever take that away from you—it's yours. As a result of all of your hard work and dedication, you will be respected.

The alternative is that you can have special treatment, privileges, and coddling. You can use excuses and cries of victimhood to justify your own shortcomings. You can bully your way into a place at the table via legislation and lawsuits. Indeed, you will have your place. You will find yourself amongst the best and the brightest. Insincere smiles, phony congratulations, and unearned accolades will all be there for your taking. The politically correct line will be towed for you and for the benefit of people like you. However, rest assured, everyone knows how and why you got there.

Which begs the question. Will you be on the receiving end of the respect and sincere admiration of your peers? Will you be viewed with reverence and held in high esteem? Will you be… equal?

Never.

"The truth is incontrovertible, malice may attack it, ignorance may deride it, but in the end, there it is."
-Winston Churchill

Read More: Brilliant Takedown Of Feminism From An Old Man

A.V. Yader

A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

Our Culture’s Liberal Use Of The Word ‘Bravery’

July 11, 2014 | by Luke Bauer | Link | Original Link

Bravery.

Let’s start with the definition. The Merriam-Webster online dictionary defines bravery as “the quality that allows someone to do things that are dangerous or frightening : the quality or state of being brave”.

That’s simple enough. Actions that are dangerous or frightening require bravery; going to war, defending one’s family, rescuing octogenarians from house fires, and so on. What’s the first result on Google, as of the writing of this article, for news articles featuring the word “brave”?

A soldier dying to defend his country?

A man defending his home against armed intruders?

A fireman heroically rescuing a little old lady (and all of her many cats) from a house fire?

No.

“Selena Gomez Posts ‘Brave’ Bikini Selfie! But Is She Trying Too Hard To Be Sexy?”

How unsurprisingly disappointing.

Now, technically, if Selena Gomez happens to be utterly terrified of posting selfies, then her action could arguably be considered brave under the above definition. Even if technically accurate, however, anyone with half a mind should immediately be able to see the utter ludicrousness of labeling a selfie “brave”. The headline is a perfect example of the gratingly excessive overuse of the word “brave” in our present culture.

I believe that the liberal use of such words, brave, heroic, courageous, etc., is the inevitable result of the watering down of language to the point where its meaning has become entirely relative. What have traditionally been considered virtues have been entirely eliminated from public discourse and are now relegated to “qualities”.

Look at the definition again. Bravery is described as a quality, not a virtue, and this holds true of both formal definitions and the general use of the term today. This is an important distinction, because while a quality is merely an amoral characteristic, a virtue is a characteristic that is morally good. Qualities can be anything, but virtues are restrictive.

If bravery is nothing more than a quality, then posting a selfie, wearing garish clothing, or nattering on about various personal issues that should really be kept to oneself, can all be labeled “brave”, so long as they meet the criteria of “dangerous or frightening”. As what one finds “dangerous or frightening” is entirely relative to the individual, one can be “brave” for absolutely anything.

However, if bravery is instead a virtue, then what is brave is restricted to actions that are morally good. Is posting a selfie morally good? No, at best it is amoral, possessing no moral value whatsoever, and therefore cannot be brave. The perspective of bravery as a virtue, rather than as a quality, would immediately eliminate most, if not all, such liberal uses of the word brave.

This brings us to the question of why have the words traditionally used to describe virtuous actions become watered down?

The answer is simple. The liberal use of words like “brave”, words that used to actually mean something, is a symptom of the lazy, decadent, and superficial culture we have had the great misfortune of being born into.

Everyone wants to be brave, but being brave is hard (mild understatement). We live in a culture of ease, people don’t like “hard”. Look around you, everyone wants the payoff without putting in the effort. They want to get rich quick, lose all their excess weight in two days, and become internationally famous, all without moving from the couch.

Which is easier, risking your life to save others, or increasingly misusing words so that they become redefined, and one can be “brave” without having done anything at all?

This is the situation we find ourselves in. Being labeled “brave” still carries much of the emotional payoff that it always has, but requires next to no effort. It’s like when schools hand out medals for “participation”. Winning becomes meaningless, but at least everyone “feels good about themselves”.

Language matters. The only way to bring meaning back to words like brave, heroic, or courageous, is the same way they became meaningless to begin with, through their use. When you use these words, use them appropriately, and when others misuse them, call them out on their bullshit.

Read More: Rotten Apple (Inc.) Poisons Cultures

Luke Bauer
Luke Bauer is a law student searching for what it means to be a man in an increasingly emasculated world. He spends his time attending class, pondering the decline of western civilization, and eviscerating his peers when they spew leftist nonsense.

On The Importance Of Family

July 12, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

It's often said that you can't choose whom to, with whom and what you're born as, but you can choose whom to relate to. That is the 'real' family you'll build in your tenure on this planet. Don't misunderstand me; most of us are already born within our 'real' families. While some aren't, even if they have a nominal family – and they have to find and create theirs.

The unit of the 'family' provides us with a sense of being rooted, loved and supported in this world, a great blessing for any man to have. The most important trait of a good family, or that of its family members, is of unconditional love and support. Ideally, the man who lacks any of these family members must at least have substitute figures to represent these missing familial archetypes right from his childhood. If not, he will have to fend for himself.

Some men are born with an entire 'family', but the family fails in fulfilling its roles, thus resulting in a dysfunctional family. So these men are no better than the men who were born abandoned at birth or childhood, or those who lacked one or more pivotal family member influence while growing up.

To elaborate, let us look closely at the roles of each family member that one is born with. or rather, the dysfunctional versions of them.

"Mama"

An ideal mother is the mother who loves, guides, nurtures and protects her child unconditionally. But a dysfunctional mother can damage her child more than what she can possibly imagine, because she often represents the first individual a child attaches to. And her memory, if she is around in his childhood, will always stay with him throughout his life. Her personal lifestyle, attitudes and character will often indelibly influence his psyche, as most individuals tend to inherit most of their character traits from their mothers. Thus the responsibilities of a mother towards her child are towering.

An emotionally distant mother, abusive mother, reckless mother, manipulative mother, controlling mother, hypocritical mother, slutty mother—all these dysfunctional mother archetypes will often psychologically scar a child. More so, if the child is male, because the relationship he will form with his mother will inevitably influence his relationships with the women later in his life. Solipsistic mother-sister combos are a double whammy situation which can further corrupt his perception of women.

An overly possessive mother will create an emotionally dependent man who can't disconnect from her. Her emotional manipulation and shallow displays of love are nothing but a ruse to maintain her control over her child, thus stunting his growth as an individual. Having a dysfunctional or emotionally unavailable mother will result in lack of female nurturing within his life, and as an adult he will often unconsciously seek to either get it from other women through 'neediness' (opening himself up to manipulation from women), or he will develop indifference and contempt for the female sex. However, the often seen ironical hypocrisy is that modern feminist society inexplicably demeans and blames such men for having 'mommy issues', without blaming the mommies who created them.

If the mother is not present during the child's childhood, then the mother figure who substitutes her should have the qualities of an ideal mother to bear the responsibilities. If she fails to, the child will continue his unconscious attempts through his life to find his 'mother' through the opposite sex, or worse, end up no better as being born with a dysfunctional mother.

"Cronus"

The Greek mythological figure of Cronus represents the controlling father who swallowed up all his children in the fear that one day one of them would overthrow him.

A Cronian father archetype becomes even worse if this father is blue pill. Not only will he frustrate your attempts to reason with him, but he will also try to prevent you from asserting your independence by constantly trying to limit and belittle you, to eventually devour your freedom, growth, happiness and eventual existence. Fathers indeed need to impose limits on their families to maintain discipline, but the Cronian father's limits are often nothing but enslaving shackles. He will forcibly try to beta-size you to keep you plugged within the Matrix he has visualized for you and micromanage your life, to maintain his stranglehold over you . The problems with this type of father is that he cannot 'let go', and neither can he accept or see the outdatedness and error of his ways, as he considers himself to be infallible, thus taking no responsibility for being a bad parent.

Life is a never ending relay race, in which one generation completes its lap of life, and then passes the baton for the next lap to the succeeding generation. The Cronian father insists on running your lap as well while refusing to pass the baton to you, out of fear of losing control. The result is that you would be lagging behind your peers in the race of life, because of the limiting influence of your Cronian father's power games, which would instead occupy your precious time to free yourself from it.

Another trait is that he often exhibits emotional manipulation when his direct attempts to subdue you fail. He keeps restricting you in the name of love and concern, justifying himself as omniscient being who knows what's best for you without producing a scrap of reason or logic to back up his claim. He wants to have a say in what you do, where you go, whom you hang out, and even the vaginas you must fuck (your choice of women).

The Cronian father thus is the Oak tree who protects the baby plant growing in its shade, yet prevents its complete growth by restricting it from the nurturing sunlight.

Cain and Medea

The first human murder on this planet, according to Abrahamic scriptures, was a fratricide committed out of sibling rivalry. Though born from the same parents, Cain killed Abel out of jealousy. Similarly, the Greek mythological figure of Medea represents a woman who first killed her brother out of love for her lover Jason, and later on kills her own children she sires with him. Both Cain and Medea represent dysfunctional sibling archetypes. Sibling rivalry is often the first dose of rivalry that a man experiences in the world as a child, but it can be healthy only as long it is within limits. Else, it creates a dysfunctional paradigm within the framework of a family.

Men growing up with dysfunctional sisters often have a problem respecting or trusting women in general, while those growing up with parasitical brothers will have a problem believing in male solidarity or brotherhood. As with dysfunctional parents, growing up with dysfunctional siblings can contribute to dysfunctional men.

Surviving a dysfunctional family

Dysfunctional families are a curse, and often produce emotionally damaged men. The lack of nurturing that these men received from their families can manifest itself into misanthropy, loneliness, or emotionally needy behavior which seeks to substitute familial love through external relationships. This could result in reaching out to cunning older individuals, friends or women who could exploit these men even more.

Not all mother figures or father figures might have the best interests at heart for these men, as the adage “Old age and treachery will overcome youth and skill” often holds true in today’s often hypocritical world. The man, who has never received proper female nurturing within his family while growing up, will then seek to substitute it through the love of an ’emotionally nurturing’ woman. However, he is then at risk to become over-attached to women, and can get often henpecked if he falls in love with a manipulative woman, who would sense his desperate need for emotional nurturing, and possibly exploit it to her own benefit. Similarly, manipulative friends can exploit a man who has a need for fraternal love which he didn’t receive within his family.

The solution to a dysfunctional family is thus tricky, but fairly simple. It can be solved by:

- Moving away from your dysfunctional family
- Finding the correct substitute individuals who can fulfill those roles, beginning first with your extended family of relatives (both near and distant), and then your social circle of friends. For married individuals, your spouse’s family could possibly provide effective substitutes too. Build your own tribe from them.
- If everything else fails, get professional counseling to build a support base.

Moving away will provide you the necessary freedom to break out from the debilitating influence of a dysfunctional family, and help you to focus on self reliance and create new relationships. A dysfunctional family often causes emotional isolation and suffocation in an individual, thus moving away is the first step in breaking its psychological stranglehold which limits your freedom and growth as an individual. You don't need to martyr yourself for being born in a family which doesn't love or support you.

The second step is indeed the tricky part. It will often entail a lot of trial and error, but exercising rational and correct judgment to select your substitute family figures can solve this easily. It's easier to start with your extended family first. Your aunts and uncles could possibly fill the roles of parent figures, while your cousins and friends could fulfill that of siblings. A lot of great successful individuals who were either born in dysfunctional families, or had no proper familial upbringing, built their own tribe or family by choosing their own family members from their friend or social circle. A mentor can be a great father figure, while a great friend can be the brother you wanted badly at home but couldn't have. If you're lucky to find one, a good woman could simultaneously fulfill the nurturing role of a mother, the intimate role of a lover and the supportive role of a sister, but it will take proper judgment from your end to identify and select her.

The good part is that in this planet of 7 billion people, we can all choose and build our own tribe from people who'll love us unconditionally, even if we didn't receive it in the family we're born into. Those people we choose, can be our real family – to restore balance to our lives.

Read More: How To Forgive Your Family

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

The Age Of Pioneers

July 12, 2014 | by Mark | Link | Original Link

Foreword

The "Fate Of Empires and Search For Survival", is an essay written by Sir John Glubb and published in 1977. Unfortunately the Fate Of Empires is no longer in publication, there are however, second hand copies on eBay and a free pdf version on line which can be found with a simple google search. This is a strongly recommended read for the red pill community as it touches on several subjects which are of interest her on the ROK.

Life

Sir John Glubb, also known as Glubb Pasha, was a distinguished lieutenant general who served in the great war and commanded the Transjordanian Arab legion. His life experience compelled him to author the fate of empires to warn those who would listen about the pitfalls of a civilisation with endless resources and power.

Sir John was an avid historian, his travels may have stoked his interest in empires at an early age. His essay is the result of a culmination of his military career and historical research. The essay delves into the reasons for the rise and fall of empires and concludes that all empires will suffer the same fate should the lessons from history go unlearnt. Sir John was a harsh critic of the history education curriculum. In his view, history ought to be examined as a whole, and not as separate collection of events in time.

"The experiences of the human race have been recorded, in more or less detail, for some four thousand years. If we attempt to study such a period of time in as many countries as possible, we seem to discover the same patterns constantly repeated under widely differing conditions of climate, culture and religion. Surely, we ask ourselves, if we studied calmly and impartially the history of human institutions and development over these four thousand years, should we not reach conclusions which would assist to solve our problems today? For everything that is occurring around us has happened again and again before…no such conception ever appears to have entered the minds of historians. In general, historical teaching in schools is limited to this small island [UK]. We endlessly mull over Tudors and Stewarts, the Battle of Crecy, and Guy Fawkes. " – Sir John Glubb

After retirement, he authored seventeen books, majoritarily focusing on the Middle East where he lived and served for some thirty-six years.

The Fate Of Empires

It is important to note that what Sir John referred to as an empire, is what we now call a superpower. Sir John stated in his essay that the rules of empires were also applicable to the United States and the Soviet Union.

Sir John made some observations regarding the lifetime of empires.

> "Empires do not usually begin or end on a certain date. There is a gradual period of expansion and then a period of decline. Human affairs are subject to many chances, and it is not to be expected that they could be calculated with mathematical accuracy."
>
> "Nevertheless, it is suggested that there is sufficient resemblance between empires to justify further study."
>
> "Not all Empires endured their full lifespan."
>
> "An interesting deduction from the figures seems to be that the duration of empires does not depend on the speed of travel or the nature of the weapons. The Assyrians marched on foot and fought with spears, bows and arrows. The British used artillery, railways and ocean-going ships. Yet the two empires lasted approximately the same periods."
>
> "Empires last an approximate 250 years"

In "The Fate of Empires", Rome is divided into two periods. The Roman Republic and the Roman Empire, a notion many here will oppose. From this, he made the following conclusions.

> "…the periods of duration of different empires at varied epochs show a remarkable similarity."
>
> "Immense changes in the technology of transport and warfare do not seem to affect the life-expectation of an empire."
>
> "The changes in technology of transport, however, affected the shape of empires."
>
> "One of the very few units of measurement which have not seriously changed > since the Assyrians is the human ‘generation’, a period of about 25 years.”

>
> “The period of an Empire, 250 years, represents about ten generations of people.”

By looking at the differences in people across generations, Sir John concluded that empires are built and destroyed by their own people due to these very differences. As time progresses in the life of an empire, the citizens priorities shift across the ages and these priorities in turn transform the empire.

The different ages in which empires change is remarkably similar. These are characterised by a series of interlinking events which lead from one age to another. The ages in empires are the age of pioneers, the age of conquest, the age of commerce, the age of affluence, the age of intellect and the age of decadence. These ages come in the sequence denoted and often interlap with one another as time progresses.

The Age of Pioneers – Outburst

There is little information about empires before their outburst. The most of what we know, is that these were not deemed as powerful or even civilised nations. However, we do know that the people of these nations had a drive for conquest, most likely driven by seeing the wealth and power of their neighbour nations. The people of these nations would burst with energy and courage from their primitive setting, taking large swathes of land. Their motivations were part religious, part code of honour.

> “Again and again we find a small nation, treated as insignificant by its contemporaries, suddenly emerging from its homeland and overrunning large areas of the world. Prior to Phillip (359-338 B.C)”, Macedon had been an > insignificant state to the north of Greece. Persia was the great power of the time, completely dominated the area from Eastern Europe to India. Yet by 323 B.C, thirty six years after the accession of Philip, the Persian Empire had ceased to exist, and the Macedonian Empire extended from the Danube to India, including Egypt"

>
> "In the year A.D 600, the world was divided between two superpower groups….the two powers were the eastern Roman Empire and the Persian Empire. The Arabs were then the despise and backward inhabitants of the Arabian Peninsula. They consisted chiefly of wandering tribes, and had no government, no constitution and no army. In 1633, the Arabs burst out of their desert peninsula, and simultaneously attacked the two superpowers. Within twenty years, the Persian Empire had ceased to exist."
>
> "At the beginning of the thirteenth century, the Mongols were a group of savage tribes in the steppes of Mongolia. In 1211, Genghis Khan invaded China. By 1253, the Mongols had established an empire extending from Asian minor to the China sea"
>
> "The Arabs ruled the greater part of Spain for 780 years, from 712 A.D, to 1492. During these eight centuries, there had been no Spanish nation, the petty kings of Aragon and Castile alone holding on in the mountains. The agreement between Ferdinand and Isabella and Christopher Columbus was signed immediately after the fall of Granada, the last Arab enclave in Spain, in 1492. Within fifty years, Cortez had conquered Mexico, and Spain was the worlds greatest empire."

In each example, the conquerors were poor, hard working and enterprising. Taking large risks and demonstrating aggression against defending empires. Perhaps, having nothing to lose makes men immune to the fear of death.

> "The decaying empires which they overthrow are wealthy and defensively minded. In the time of the Roman greatness, the legions used to dig a ditch round their camps at night to avoid surprise. But the ditches were meere earthworks, and between them there were wide spaces left through which the Romans could counterattack. But as Rome grew older, the earthworks became high walls, through which access was given only by narrow gates. Counterattacks were no longer possible. The legions were now passive defenders."

If we look at the last excerpt and we apply it to todays world, we can see it holds true. In the past, nations like the Britain and America fought other nations (and each other) against the odds with bravery and courage. In todays age, citizens of both of these nations fear the consequences of terrorism, despite the relatively limited amount of damage these can inflict on them, when compared to the wars of the past.

Contemporary America is gripped with the fear of adversity, but it was not always so. In the beginning of the new nation, American rebels had successfully repelled the greatest empire of the time. Once freed from their former king, the citizens of the new nation expanded across a vast and unfamiliar continent until they reached the Pacific ocean. Once they reached the Pacific they did not stop there, they continued on until the Island of Hawaii. Whole families relocated inland by cart, enduring harsh winters and bad harvests. Against the odds, they prevailed. How many present day Americans would venture into unfamiliar land with their families to set up a farm? Not many.

Why were the ancestors of Americans willing to go through so much for freedom? And why are the present day Americans giving that which their ancestors fought for away, when they have everything?

> "But the new nation is not only distinguished by victory in battle, but by unresting enterprise in every field. Men hack their way through jungles, climb mountains, or brave through the seas. The Arabs crossed the straits of Gibraltar in A.D 711 with 12,000 men, defeated a Gothic army of more than twice their strength, marched straight over 250 miles of unknown territory and seized the Gothic capital of Toledo."
>
> "Uninhibited by text books or book learning, action is their solution to every problem. Poor , hardy, often half-starved and ill-clad they abound in courage, energy and initiative, overcome every obstacle and always seem to be in control of the situation."

It is this ethos that drives an impoverished people to conquer, and thereby empires are formed, but as Sir John noted before, "not all empires endured their full lifespan". If we look at two historically-recent failed empires, the Third Reich and Imperial Japan, we see that the people of post war Japan and Germany worked hard to rebuild their nations from the rubble. Whilst their military expansionism was crushed, their drive to work themselves out of poverty was not.

If either Japan or Germany had not been defeated during the second world war, and instead had gone through the full lifecycle of empire until the age of decadence, it would be very likely that these would have been unable to rebuild their nations should they have faced a future collapse. During the age of decadence (more on that in a future post), the people become cynical and frivolous, and they no longer make an effort to save themselves because they are not convinced anything is worth saving. However during the age of pioneers the people are immune to such thinking and instead go about life with a can-do attitude.

Conclusion

We have become accustomed to material wealth which we are unwilling to sacrifice. Our comfort has been placed above our values and liberties. As history shows us, this is a dangerous path to walk. Throughout history, nations that have been on the downslide are engulfed by nations been on the uprise. These nations are characterised by the backwardness of their peoples but whose members are determined to carve their place on the world.

Read More: How To Harness The Power Of Fear

Mark
Mark is a seasoned traveller and philander who enjoys a smoke and glass of bourbon. He is an avid reader and a Political History enthusiast. Occasionally enjoys shit posting on the Guardian or the Telegraph. You can read his other ROK articles, and follow him on twatter and Google+1. His articles are proofread by InfoShinobi.

Meet The Man Who Apologized After Being Falsely Accused Of Rape

July 13, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Every now and then the culture offers us an important moment which suggests that the current generation is beyond lost, and the best thing we can do as aware men is to leave a record of the carnage for future generations so they can avoid our mistakes and make society a better place for both sexes. I think we have such a moment in the case of Max Temkin, a designer from Chicago who has consulted for Obama and created a successful party game for nerds called Cards Against Humanity, which has been featured in many news outlets.

Recently, Temkin was falsely accused of rape on Facebook by an old college flame. Instead of vigorously defending his reputation and attacking the accuser for her libel, he has decided the best response is to crouch into a foetus and whine that rape culture is a problem. You read that right: he is using his own false rape accusation to defend feminist talking points.

The type of guy who gets falsely accused of rape

Apparently he never even slept with his accuser:

> I had a really brief relationship with this girl in college; her dorm room was next to mine, and after a few evenings staying up talking all night, we made out. We spent a few nights in each others' rooms, but we never had sex and neither of us pressured the other into doing anything we weren't comfortable with. After a few nights, I broke things off in the cowardly way that 19-year-old guys do, and I just stopped returning her calls and texts. I can imagine she was hurt by this, I know that I would be hurt if someone broke up with me that way.

Poor girl. She got "dumped" by a guy who didn't even fuck her, and who must now e-mote to all that this may have been the biggest mistake in his life. All supremely gentlemanly ROK readers know that a young girl would never go ghost on on a man or stop returning his texts. All women are not like that. They are not attention whores who are rude and flakey and who reconstruct past events in order to incarcerate innocent men or abscond with cash and prizes in a frivorce settlement. We must treat all women with respect in order to have fulfilling everlasting relationships with them.

The accusation from this girl came ten years after the fact. Here is what she wrote on Facebook:

> Several people that I went to school with have posted a Baltimore Sun article from 2012 about the success of Cards Against Humanity, a popular indie party game created by a Goucher alum.
> That is my rapist.
> Having his face pop up on my news feed unexpectedly in any context > has the capacity to ruin my day. Seeing him praised in the press is giving me a panic attack.

> He should not be held as a good example of the excellence that Goucher grads have, can and will continue to achieve.

The bolded statement clues us in that her accusation is bullshit. A girl who has been raped doesn't speak like a lawyer and suggest her rapist "has the capacity" to ruin her day. News flash: real rape has the capacity to ruin a girl's life, not just one 24 hour day cycle. Does our white knight hero Max respond like Michael Arrington, founder of Tech Crunch, who was falsely accused of rape and smacked down the accusation using the court system whereby his accuser had to retract her statements? Nope. He dives into a monologue about rape culture and apologizes to his accuser:

> Part of rape culture that hurts everyone is that it makes it difficult to talk about what is and is not consent, and makes it incredibly scary for people to speak up when their boundaries are crossed. It is entirely possible she read something completely different than I did into an awkward college hookup. If any part of that was traumatic for her, I am sincerely sorry, and I wish we would have had a chance to address it privately. I've sent her an email and a Facebook message and given her my contact information, but so far I haven't heard back (but she did edit her post to remove my name).

Only a sniveling, pathetic excuse of a man would apologize to someone who intends to ruin his life based on a falsehood that carries a sentence of several years in prison. Is this the type of gelatinous boobed man that we are supposed to be proud of creating after decades of feminist brainwashing that men must be sensitive, emotional, deferential, and non-masculine? We now have a society of men can't even defend themselves when they were falsely accused, who sides with the false accuser and her political beliefs. Max even puts on his Social Justice Warrior uniform to white knight for all women who will falsely accuse their ex-boyfriends or hookups:

> I spoke with my lawyer, and she thinks I have a clear case to sue this woman for libel and get a restraining order, but I have no desire to bully or harm her. Additionally, I'm not wild about the precedent that sets for other women to come forward in cases of actual sexual assault.

If you didn't think this man could grovel any worse, behold:

> I will continue to be a feminist and an advocate for women's rights to the best of my capacity.
>
> […]
>
> You will not harass or threaten the woman making these claims. I am not looking for a mob of people carrying pitchforks on my behalf. If you harass her or go after her in any way, you are not a friend of mine, and you are not a friend of Cards Against Humanity.

> […]
> If you see me this weekend at GaymerX, I could use a hug.

Being falsely accused of rape is one of the worst things that can happen to a Western man, especially in a society that presumes him guilty. That isn't helped when men void of testosterone like Max Temkin enable lying women to destroy their lives without suffering any repercussions. Instead of groveling, he must fight. At the minimum he must vigorously defend his reputation while shaming the lying accuser. If a man is not willing to defend himself, he doesn't deserve help from others.

Max is the expected result of a feminist society that teaches everyone women can do no wrong and must be protected at all times. He has been afflicted by a sort of Stockholm syndrome whereby he refuses to get angry at the force that wants to see him destitute. I imagine if he was an African slave in America's south before the Civil War, he would argue that his massa is actually a good owner, cares about his well-being, and is hoping that slavery will be gradually phased out within the next five hundred years.

I hope cases like Max's become more publicized, because they will serve as an alarm for men without boobs to begin understanding that our culture is broken, and the power given to women to destroy men's lives must finally be checked.

Read Next: Game Can Protect You From False Rape Accusations

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Should Women Get To Decide What Men Find Attractive?

July 13, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Recently, Tom Junod penned a brief article in Esquire, declaring 42 year-old women to be the most attractive age for a woman. Predictably, he got slammed in the comments, with women quickly showing why they hated the piece (the unasked question: why they were reading it in the first place?). This lead a writer named Anne Brenoff at Huffington Post to write a rebuttal.

Tom Junod

Anne Brenoff

Brenoff's position—shared by many women—is that men, as a class, oppress women. They believe that this male oppression has led to men ignoring all of women's positive qualities. Instead of being seen by men as beautiful, talented, intelligent and just about any positive superlative, women are often seen as ugly, mean-spirited and catty. Further, they believe that all this sexism leads men to only judge women by skin-deep beauty standards. Denying woman's humanity and souls are the bread and butter of the male mindset; this terrible mismeasure of women by men is a fiction invented by the patriarchy.

She goes on to do what women are often wont to do: owning other women's lives. She mentions three female relatives of hers who apparently transcended the backwards muck of sexism and lived lives on their own terms, undefined by social convention and only concerned with their own well-being and happiness. She glowingly recounts single motherhood, serial monogamy and the elevation of careerism and materialism over all else. Brenoff is offended that man-children like Junod are just now admitting they find older women attractive, as women have been keenly aware how hot and sexy women of every age are. I am assuming this realization pre-dates the patriarchy.

It is obvious how primitive and immature this sort of mindset is. Women feel incredible amounts of shame over their bodies, so instead of learning to grow up and deal with it, they simply pretend that they fit the standard: I'm sexy and you can't tell me different! while also attacking the standard: GRRR! Those goddamn sexist beauty standards!!! Further, Junod erred because women also feel intense amounts of shame about their age and its relation with sexual attractiveness. Here, it is obvious they ignore the inalienable truth that we will all grow old and, yes, youthful sexual attractiveness will fade.

Brenoff is 64. Any woman in her '60's who would still write a piece such as this is immature. Instead of claiming the mantle of aged womanhood and ushering young women into healthy adulthood, she is still on the outside, looking in on adulthood. She is still pretending she is some sort of cultural rebel, some elderly vixen who is chipping away at that glass ceiling erected by men to hold women down.

Women like Brenoff brand themselves as sexy, intelligent and "fierce" and get supremely offended when somebody ruptures that mindset. Brenoff's reaction to Junod reflects this. She drops a link to the Jezebel reaction to his piece—surprise! It's hysterical and nonsensical—in the first paragraph and says she won't call him out, but "help him out." She then spends the rest of the article with an air of smug indignation about awesome women are and real men appreciate that. Real men will find a woman in her 80's sexual attractive, if they can only stop thinking with their wayward penises and follow their heart. I wonder if she would swap the sexes in this scenario.

Regardless, the women who agree with Brenoff see themselves as diamonds in the rough, caged birds that whose songs are incredibly beautiful, but those infantile, privileged men refuse to recognize them as such. But all the other birds believe our songs are beautiful!

Sorry, but singers don't get to decide what their listeners will find pleasing to hear. A person simply cannot decide what others desire in their lives. It is puerile to demand other people prop up the delusions you have about your life.

Women like Brenoff can't see this. Since they have been spending their entire lives weaving a dense web of lies about who they are, it is to be expected they won't understand why somebody else will not see them as a sexy rockstar of a human. They challenge men to rise above their immaturity and value women for who they really are: people who know more about their positive qualities more than any man ever could. As if masculinity and maturity depends on massaging the egos of women.

I have no doubt there are many intelligent, accomplished women in this world. The healthy ones don't write narcissistic screeds for HuffPo. Her piece is little more than chest-beating about her life and other women's lives. Oops, Brenoff didn't list any accomplishments in her life, so I can safely assume she has no accomplishments, unlike her trio of aunts.

So, what can we take away from this piece by Anne Brenoff? She's awesome, intelligent and sexually attractive, just like all other women since time immemorial. She thinks Tom Junod is immature, sexist and can't appreciate the true value of women, which apparently only women themselves have the ability to discern. Real men suck it up and live their lives at the whims of women. If they want to keep a man around, they do. If a woman thinks he is a "jerk-husband" then he is out the door, the man just washed right out of their hair.

I suppose when you spend all your time obsessing over how awesome you are, it can be tough to see that the world does not revolve around you.

Read More: Men Need A Return Of The Male Only Gentleman's Club

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

Not Every Man Can Handle A Beautiful Woman

July 14, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Most men, when questioned, would welcome the opportunity to date and marry an extremely beautiful woman. In fact, most men dream of precisely such a scenario – this is why the “trophy wife” phenomenon exists.

That being said, there is one question associated with this reality that we too rarely seem to ponder: how many men are really capable of handling a full-time, committed relationship with a physically elite woman? Of all the men who dream of dating the models and beauty queens of the world, how many are truly capable of maintaining a healthy, long-term relationship with them?

Recently, Andrew Stern showed us what the darker side of the relationship with the physically elite woman might look like:

This picture reveals Andrew Stern, the estranged husband of model Katie Cleary, out partying with friends in Beverly Hills just hours before he went to a gun range and killed himself.

Friends say he was in ‘good spirits’ at the dinner at trendy DOMA Italian restaurant with about 15 friends, celebrating the birthday of one of them. The group went on to a club in Hollywood where a new DJ was spinning. A friend says Andrew wasn’t drinking or doing any drugs.

Andrew even posted a photo of him and some pals at the party on Saturday night on his facebook page. It was the last picture of the heartbroken husband.

Just hours later at around midday on Sunday he turned a gun on himself at a shooting range in Van Nuys, 15 miles from the upmarket eatery.

So, why did Stern off himself? What drove this affluent, good-looking man to the edge (and, eventually, off the edge)?

Speaking about his break-up with his wife, the source added Andrew was ‘heartbroken’:

‘They have been separated for a few months. I don’t know what happened. She was the one that wanted the divorce.
‘I just knew her through Andrew. It’s hard to tell when you’re on the outside when they were last happy.

‘I think he really was heartbroken, I don’t know why she left him but I think he wanted to try to figure out how to make it work. He was so upset over it, he just could not get over it, he could not mentally move on.’

The source said the photos of Katie with Leonardo DiCaprio and Entourage star Adrian Grenier didn’t help.

© XPOSUREPHOTOS.COM

Another friend told MailOnline that he was already on a dark descent when he realized he couldn't hold on to his 'dream girl'.

'Andrew changed at the beginning of the year,' the source told MailOnline. 'He worked more and socialized less. He began investing even more money and more time into his charity and fundraising work… He got sad. Sadder.'

The friend explained that something was 'broken' in him and no matter how he tried to fight it – with eating well, exercise or counseling sessions – he couldn't > shake it.

>
> His struggling marriage to Cleary was not to blame for his suicide but just added to his pain because of the fantasy he had about their life together, the friend said.
>
> ‘But the marriage wasn’t based on pure, unadulterated, love. Wasn’t solely based on the forever do us part love,’ the source said. ‘He knew what he was getting into when he started even dating Katie. She’s too pretty. She’s just too pretty. And she’s just too charismatic and affable and kind that Andrew knew he couldn’t keep her to himself.
>
> ‘I’m not saying Katie did anything. If she did, I didn’t know about it. But he couldn’t really have her like he wanted her. Like his fantasy of her. He would talk about her in ideal terms. He idolized her and wanted her to himself, maybe a little too much. He wouldn’t show it. He gave her all the freedom she wanted for her career. But he realized he wasn’t the only one with eyes for her and wanting her and it deepened his pain.’

Stern had a few issues, and his involvement with Katie Cleary was certainly one of them. It is difficult to overstate how challenging it can be to get involved with a physically attractive woman like this who is also an extroverted, highly flirtatious and aggressive attention seeker. Women of this type have become substantially more common in the modern age, as narcissistic millenials grow up with the presence of social media and the smart phone, along with an increasingly less traditional culture more concerned with clubbing and what Justin Bieber ate for lunch than family formation. This is the beautiful woman who is so insecure about her beauty that she requires constant validation of it in the form of blatant attention from other men, and she will often directly seek out such attention herself. To some degree, this kind of woman will always value the attention of other random individuals more than she values the attention you give her.

This is what makes her hard to be with, because she will constantly and aggressively solicit that attention/validation from other men and stoke your own insecurity in order to satiate her own. You will want her for yourself and you'll have a vision of her in which she is ideally focused on building something with you, but she will eternally push back against that vision. If at any time you appear to be getting too close to that ideal you want (you two are starting to look like a set pair and she is starting to look like she is truly off the market and in your orbit entirely), she will adjust by deliberately seeking attention from other men in order to balance things out.

She does this because she understands the risk associated with investing in you and allowing herself to become entirely yours: she needs the constant attention and validation of other men in order to deal with her insecurity, and this attention is less likely to come when she is seen to clearly belong to another male in a marriage/relationship. The more available she makes herself appear to be, the easier it is for her to satisfy her insecurity, and the harder it is for you as a man to deal with her.

> Andrew Stern was 'constantly ridiculed' and driven to distraction by his 'flirtatious', 'social climbing' wife Katie Cleary prior to his tragic suicide, a former friend has claimed.
>
> Now his former friend and housemate David Pachkofsky has told how Katie made Andrew's life a living hell as she tried to change the down-to-earth Midwesterner, 40, into a 'Hollywood type', using him to climb the social ladder and boost her career.
>
> 'Like going to a wrap party and not coming home,' said Pachkofsky.

> ‘She was taking him to a place he didn’t want to go. The part of Hollywood life that she liked but is very superficial.
>
> ‘He had to struggle to keep up with the Joneses. She would constantly ridicule him for the way he looked and acted and always let him know that he wasn’t in good enough shape.
>
> ‘He was never a really good dresser, and she made him dress perfectly for her. That was her doing. Drew’s always been comfortable in a T-shirt and really not caring. She was just so hard on him.
>
> She kept trying to create this image for him as handsome and virile to help uphold her image,’ Pachkofsky told MailOnline.
>
> ‘She had a negative effect on him. He always felt like he was about to lose her and was always chasing her. She always flirted with men all the time in front of him and this hurt him….
>
> ‘The more she pushed him away, the more he’d come on. This was always the case with her and every woman. Just much worse with her because she was his wife and he’d have to tolerate the pain on a whole other level…. She’s a very flirtatious girl and it killed him.
>
> ‘…Hollywood dragged him down. Hollywood women did him in. And Katie was the worst of them. Very self-motivated, a real climber, climbing up Drew to get to bigger stars. ‘

Men have only one real option when it comes to dealing with physically attractive women who must aggressively seek attention like this: limit emotional investment.

These women (physically attractive women who are aggressive attention seekers) inflict the most damage on men who have made deep emotional investments in them and are seeking some sort of romantic reciprocity. The physically attractive woman who isn't an aggressive attention-seeker (yes, they do exist, even today) will not punish you for this, but her more attention-hungry counterpart will. When he's invested and she responds by seeking the attention of other men and intentionally failing to reciprocate, it can be devastating for the male involved. He will want her, and he will love her, but she'll never allow him to have her, and that will hurt. The notion that she is instead possibly allowing other men to have her (implied by her direct efforts to seek and welcome their attention even as she pulls away from him) will simply crush his soul. He will be left with a very empty, dark feeling, and arrive at one of the most hopeless emotional states you can ever hope to reach as a man.

When you avoid investing emotionally in these women, you essentially cut this dynamic off at the knees. Her persistent attention seeking will bother you less because you've not invested too much emotionally in her, and can thus feel little envy or jealousy. The fact that she is less willing to respond to a man's expressed love and romantic investment with reciprocation is irrelevant to you, because you're not offering too much romantic investment. At the end of the day, the physically attractive woman who aggressively seeks attention exercises great control over the emotional, physical and psychological well-being of the men that invest too much emotionally in her (investment which, I must note, she depends on to some degree in order to feed her validation). She cannot control those men who do not make this investment.

If you want to deal with these women and give yourself the best chance to remain sane, you limit that emotional investment. Granted, this is easier said than done as such women are very good at drawing that emotional investment from the men they associate with (they need to be because, as I said earlier, they depend on that investment for validation).

Men like Andrew Stern are simply not equipped to handle this kind of situation. Stern's emotional fragility likely made him prone to intense early emotional investment – Cleary was his "dream girl", and had total control over him from the word "go" as a result. As a physically elite woman with an aggressive attention-seeking streak, Cleary was going to get a lot of looks from a lot of men. If you're seeking to get with such a woman, you must be confident and secure enough to deal with the fact that a lot of other men have eyes for her and keep that reality from impacting you (read: making you anxious, nervous, depressed, scared to lose her, etc). The type of man that can handle Cleary is one who is not only very confident and secure in himself, but not overly emotionally invested in her either (to a point at which she cannot easily control him). Such a man is, essentially, the oak I referenced in this article.

Andrew Stern was not that oak. He was, as his close friend described him…

> Drew was a good-looking guy. No problem getting girls but he had a problem keeping them. He likes to keep to himself. Very quiet and kind of a nerdy guy with a big heart and super nice.

…precisely the kind of man that a woman like Cleary would not struggle to control. Her attention-seeking personality combined with her beauty and his decent but very quiet, introverted nature (and likely propensity to put a lot of emotional investment in fairly early, as most "nice", introverted guys do) made for a very unhealthy combination. As a man who once perfectly fit the description of Stern above, and probably still does to some extent, I speak from experience when I say that this relationship was bound to implode before long and that Stern was certain to get the worst of it.

Quintus Curtius described his situation well in a forum thread discussing Stern's story:

> Overall, I think the overriding problem here was this guy himself. I don't really see this woman as being any more or less conniving or devious than any other beautiful woman. Her selfish, domineering, and entitled behavior is about what you would expect. He should have known what he was getting.
>
> Of course, a more nurturing, caring type would have been just the ticket for this poor soul. He was so wound up with "performing" like a organ-grinder monkey for everyone: in his work, job, home, office, whatever. He had no identity of his own. He was a slave to what others thought of him.
>
> He was empty inside because his entire life was focused on false status, on collecting trophies, and on impressing everyone around him. Everyone but himself.
>
> Because he could fool everyone but himself. At the end of the day, he had to look at himself in the mirror. And all he saw was a scared rat.
>
> From looking at his eyes, his demeanor, and overall presentation, it's clear that he has some psychological problems. He is a deeply insecure, flawed person. Others have noted here that he likely was medicated. Or heavily medicated.
>
> This should be another cautionary tale to us to remember that material things (women, money, cars, businesses, etc) can't fill the inner void that a man feels. Men are not mechanical contrivances.
>
> We can't just be wound up and sent on our way like Energizer bunnies. To sustain us, we need something deeper, more profound, something that comes from within.
>
> And this person never cultivated his own identity. His entire "identity" was built around his material possessions: his toys, his money, his useless trophy wife.
>
> He who doesn't spend his time to develop his identity and inner strengths, but instead wastes his energy chasing Rolex watches, trophy wives, expensive cars, and other meaningless things, can expect nothing but pain and self-destruction.
>
> And once his biggest trophy (his "wife") was pulled out from under him, he had no further reason to live. There are many men like this today, floating around, their chests puffed up with false arrogance, that one pinprick of hardship will deflate.

Stern may have been best served avoiding women like Cleary altogether – he couldn't handle her without making some serious improvements on a personal level, and he was merely a means to an end for her (a good-looking, easily manipulated ticket to a lifestyle she simply couldn't afford otherwise).

As Scorpion noted on the forum:

> The girl is a hard 9 (touching 9.5 or even 10 depending on individual taste) with a > strong personality and a desire to climb the social ladder. Women like that should come with a extreme bodily harm warning label, because they will fuck you up bad if you aren't careful. She is the equivalent of handing a 16 year old kid a bottle of Everclear and a Ferrari.

>
> This guy was just in way over his head. He managed to get his hands on way more woman than he was capable of handling. And just like in any other area of life, when you get in over your head bad things usually happen.

Stern's story carries important lessons for any young male concerned with romantic self-improvement. It is one thing to seek relationships with very beautiful women, but it is another thing entirely to do so absent any consideration of what you bring to the table. If you want to have beautiful women in your life, you had best make sure that you are the kind of man capable not only of attracting them, but keeping them around.

If you take the time to ensure that you have made and maintained these necessary improvements, these women could bring a lot of value to your life. You'll have the chance to meet you "dream girl" and actually build a healthy long-term relationship with her.

If you fail to ensure that these improvements have been made, your pursuit of your “dream girl” will destroy you emotionally (just as it destroyed Stern and many others), and any significant association you have with said “dream girl”—and probably most other girls—will become a nightmare sooner or later. Don’t put yourself in that position.

Read Next: A Woman’s Most Potent Weapon Is Emotional Manipulation

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

Painful Lessons Brazil Learned In The 2014 World Cup

July 14, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The 2014 World Cup will not go down favorably in Brazilian collective memory. First there were the grumblings about the excessive money being spent to host the event, and how those monies could have been put to better use for infrastructure and education. Then there was the shattering 7-1 loss to Germany at the Mineirao stadium in Belo Horizonte in the semi-finals on July 8, which triggered something that looked very much like a national trauma. When the Netherlands defeated Brazil in a 3-0 drubbing yesterday, it seemed like the time had come for some national soul-searching. It was the first time since 1940 that Brazil had been defeated in consecutive home games. What rankled even more was the fact that arch-rival Argentina made it to the finals with a respectable showing in all of her matches. Something had gone seriously wrong.

The statistics mask the scale of the calamity in the Brazilian psyche. The last time Brazil hosted the World Cup (in 1950), it lost the final to Uruguay by a score of 2-1, with Uruguay scoring its two goals in the last 13 minutes. That defeat caused Brazilian playwright and journalist Nelson Rodrigues to describe the event as "a national catastrophe… our Hiroshima." The analogy is not as hyperbolic as it sounds. Brazil has long defined itself on its virtuosity on the football field; there was a sense that, despite all of her underachievement in other areas of endeavor, there was at least something that Brazil was the best at. The sport provided a national narrative, a somewhat effective social glue, and a sense of pride. According to anthropologist Roberto DaMatta, football gave Brazil "a confidence in ourselves that no other institution has given Brazil to the same extent." Seen against this backdrop, the psychological effect of Brazil's showing in the 2014 World Cup games has been nothing less than devastating.

Brazil's glory days in football: there can be danger in living in the past

To be sure, there is a danger in reading too much into the outcomes of sporting events. We must not make the mistake of projecting a whole host of wider "societal lessons" onto a misfortune on the field of play. No sporting team can win all the time, and slumps are natural parts of the competitive cycle. The July 12 print issue of The Economist contains an editorial by a writer named "Bello" which sees Brazil's defeat as a symptom of a "wider malaise" in Brazil's economic and political fabric. Bello claims that the World Cup disaster is likely to rob President Rousseff of a "boost in an election in October" and that "Brazilian football is no longer a source of national confidence." Such statements go too far, I believe. The World Cup soccer field is not a distillation of the Brazilian national experience.

But there is something to be learned here, and something to take away. This is an opportunity to reflect on the virtues of perseverance, resilience, and willpower. We can use Brazil's crushing defeats to make wider points about recovering from major setbacks. No one can coast through life without experiencing traumas, setbacks, and disasters. Defeats can come in personal, financial, or emotional forms. The great god Pain–to use an expression from German writer Ernst Juenger–will place his hand on our heads many times during our lives. How we deal with the effects of his touch will provide some indication of our worth.

Competition is the essence of life itself. It is a biological imperative. Nations and empires are much like individuals, in that they have their own characters and traits. Some have the capacity to adapt and learn from their defeats, and thereby emerge stronger from calamity; and some are unable to change their ways, eventually becoming buried by the winds and dusts of historical events. Nations, like individuals, make their own choices whether to learn from their catastrophic defeats. In my own experience, I have seen some men laid low by defeat, never to recover. Others have learned from their experiences and gone on to greater achievement, fortified by the gauntlet of hardships. Defeat is a stimulus for reform for some, and a death-knell for others.

Historical examples abound. Assyria was one of the most extensive and feared empires of the ancient Near East. It set a benchmark for military prowess and ruthless cruelty that few predecessors could match. From Egypt to Babylon, it controlled a domain held together by military force and fear. One of its great kings, Ashurbanipal, died in 626 B.C.; fourteen years later, a coalition of Scythians, Babylonians, and Medes swept into Nineveh, the Assyrian capital, and sacked it. From this one great blow, Assyria never recovered. It essentially disappeared from history, never to rise again. Its society had failed to establish the rehabilitative institutions, and the cultural depth, that might provide some relief from a major calamity. Hundreds of years later, when the Greek general Xenophon led his army over the broken ruins of Nineveh, he had no idea that it was once the seat of a great and prosperous empire.

Assyria never recovered from its military defeat

Rome in the Second Punic War provides an illustration of a different result. At the Battle of Cannae in 216 B.C., Rome faced a military disaster of the greatest magnitude. Some 50,000 of its men—more than half her army—were slaughtered by Hannibal's battlefield brilliance. In one day, the cream of the Roman army was ground into the bloody soil of Apulia, among them many senators and members of Rome's most notable families. The scope of the calamity is difficult for us to comprehend today, but it registered in Rome as something like a Hiroshima event. The city lay open, and the public went into a general panic. For the first time, Rome knew the taste of fear.

But this is where Rome showed that it was not Assyria. Rome adjusted her tactics, replaced her leaders, and dug in for a long and protracted fight. With grim determination and tenacity, it adopted Fabius Maximus's policy of outlasting Hannibal. Deprived of decisive military engagements, Hannibal floundered around Italy for years, losing strength, vainly trying to build a coalition of allies to confront Rome. Rome meanwhile went on the offensive elsewhere, sending Scipio Africanus to attack Carthaginian strongholds in Hannibal's rear in Spain. Slowly but surely, Roman tenacity ground down Carthaginian panache and brilliance. It was a war of attrition, a battle of willpower to see who could outlast the other. Hannibal was finally forced to return home, and at Zama he was decisively defeated by Scipio.

It will be illuminating to see how Brazil responds to its soccer-field Cannae. Will it use this defeat as an impetus to improve and come back stronger? Or will it collapse as did Assyria? Those who know Brazil already know the answer to this question. I am confident that Brazil will emerge stronger, better, and more humble from this experience. In retrospect, it seems that Brazilians approached the games with too much arrogance, too much hubris, and too much laxity.

It is still too early to know the full story, but I suspect that the Germans made a detailed study of their opponents' style of play and weaknesses, and planned patiently for their match with Brazil. This type of meticulous preparation is a hallmark of the German way of doing things. One is reminded of German boxer Max Schmeling's 1936 bout with universal favorite Joe Louis. While everyone predicted Louis would quickly dispose of the upstart German, Schmeling patiently and quietly studied films of Louis's technique in order to dissect his opponent's weaknesses. He found a hole in Louis's defenses, and exploited it. I am sure the German World Cup team here did precisely the same thing against their Brazilian opponents.

No one can shield himself from defeat. It will come whether we want it or not. How we respond to our defeats is the determinative issue. For the laurels go not to the man who begins the race, but to the man who finishes it.

Read More: Let Hard Experience Be Your Teacher

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Why Is The Huffington Post's Robin Korth Shaming Natural Male Desire?

July 14, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Self-professed 'renegade, outlaw . . . [and] international speaker, writer and businesswoman' Robin Korth has written a blog for the Huffington Post called My 'Naked' Truth (12th July). The piece recounts the unfortunate consequences—for Korth—of dating a man she met on the internet who turned out not to be physically attracted to her. In doing so it attempts to shame men by invalidating and ridiculing their natural sexual impulses.

Korth describes herself like this:

> I am a 59-year-old woman in great health and in good physical shape. I stand five-feet, nine-inches tall and weigh 135 pounds. I wear a size six in both jeans and panties, and my breasts are nowhere near my navel. In fact, they still struggle to make it full-up in a B-cup bra. My thighs are no longer velvet and my buttocks have dimples. My upper arms wobble a bit and my skin shows the marks of the sun. There is a softness around my waist that is no longer perfectly taut, and the pout of my abdomen attests to a c-section that took its bikini flatness — but gave me a son.

Divorced Korth met Dave, 55, through a dating website. At first, he seemed like a good catch:

> Dave was interesting, gentlemanly and bright. He held my hand and toured with > me on long bicycle rides. He drove many miles to come to my door. He made meals for us both and ruffled my dog's happy head.

A decent guy, then, and one who apparently set Korth a tingle, as she states by way of this curiously Victorian construction:

> I was enticed and longed for the full knowing of this man.

So far, so good. But:

> We planned a weekend together. That's when things got confusing, unspoken and just-not-quite there. We went to bed in a couple's way — unclothed and touching — all parts near. Kisses were shared and sleep came in hugs. I attempted more intimacy throughout the weekend and was deterred each time.

Something wasn't right. When Korth quizzed her would-be lover, his response shocked her:

> "Your body is too wrinkly," he said without a pause. "I have spoiled myself over the years with young woman. I just can't get excited with you. I love your energy and your laughter. I like your head and your heart. But, I just can't deal with your body."

> I was stunned. The hurt would come later. I asked him slowly and carefully if he found my body hard to look at. He said yes. "So, this means seeing me naked was troublesome to you?" I asked. He told me he had just looked away. And when the lights were out, he pretended my body was younger — that I was younger. My breath came deep and full as I processed this information. My face blazed as I felt embarrassed and shamed by memories of my easy nakedness with him in days just passed.
>
> We talked for some time more, my head reeling at the content of the conversation. He spoke of special stockings and clothing that would "hide" my years. He blithely told me he loved "little black dresses" and strappy shoes. He said my hair was not long and flowing as he preferred, but that was okay because it was "cool looking."

In this wonderfully Houellebecqian scene, Dave—presumably an unwitting red-pill man—manages to entirely destroy the no-doubt careful self-image that Korth has constructed for herself in the years since she lost whatever youthful beauty she was blessed with in the first place. This leads her to a near-existential crisis of self-realization.

> I am not a young woman anymore.

Followed by self-justification:

> As I looked in the mirror — clear-eyed and brave — I claimed every inch of my body with love, honor and deep care. This body is me. She has held my soul and carried my heart for all of my days. Each wrinkle and imperfection is a badge of my living and of my giving of life. With tears in my eyes, I hugged myself close. I said thank you to God for the gift of my body and my life. And I said thank you to a sad man named Dave for reminding me of how precious it all is.

In this passage Korth aligns the depreciation of her body with the trials and tribulations she has suffered, as well as with her achievements—most notably the birth of her children. Fair enough. Every human being's body is in part a record of the life that they have led.

That doesn't mean all bodies are sexually attractive, though.

Korth, hurt by Dave's sexual rejection, in effect argues that he should find her attractive, because her body is that of a real woman who has lived a life filled with experience. The fact that he doesn't makes him a 'sad man', deserving of pity or censure (and pillorying on social media, albeit anonymously, via a Huff-Po article).

But in a way, Korth's logic is akin to that of the man who thinks that a woman should be attracted to him because he is nice and kind, helps her with stuff and has an interest in the metaphysical poets.

Unfortunately though biology is a cruel mistress — in the real world nice, intelligent men frequently get rejected by hot young women in favour of jerks because these qualities, while laudable, are not in themselves sexually attractive. In the same way, a 59 year old woman may well be incredibly accomplished, but—sorry—she sure as hell isn't sexy.

Let's take a leaf out of Dave's book and be brutally honest for a moment. Men are programmed to desire sex with fertile, healthy young women, because the biological purpose of sex is reproduction. That is the truth of the matter and everyone knows it. No amount of window dressing or pretty lies can get round it.

Now, I haven't met Robin Korth so I'm not in a position to comment on her attractiveness, but judging by her pictures she looks like a well-maintained, relatively handsome woman. I'm sure that she has for the most part kept her figure. I am certain too that she is intelligent and a savvy businesswoman. But these latter factors are irrelevant to a man's sexual desire.

Korth is 59. Women are most attractive to men between the ages of 18-28. That mean's her glory days were over thirty years ago!

Dave's pronouncements on her looks — while undeniably harsh — reflect what every other normal heterosexual man would have been thinking. Any guy who claims otherwise is either lying, has given up on the chance of intercourse with anyone below the age of thirty, or is seeking to justify his own poor life decisions — say, marrying an older woman — to himself.

The most sexually compelling proposition for any man — regardless of his age — is a young woman at the height of her reproductive prime.

The Wall

Many manosphere sites refer to a phenomenon called The Wall—that point in a woman's maturing where the last vestiges of her girlish appeal are lost forever. If you have any doubt that it exists, simply refer to the two pictures of Brigitte Bardot below:

One inspires sexual desire in the average heterosexual male. The other… not so much. I don't care how much work Bardot has done for animal charities in the last few years—I still wouldn't want to have sex with her as she looks now.

Physical Desire Cannot Be Negotiated

Korth has forgotten the simple truth that real physical desire cannot be negotiated, for it is a biomechanical response to non-cerebral, sensory stimuli. In men, female beauty is predominant among these. This is just a simple fact.

While I have some sympathy for Korth's plight, what is inexcusable about her article is that it attempts to shame men by castigating Dave for his very real, very natural desires.

If a man posted an article saying that he believed he was entitled to sex because he was rich, then he would likely be rounded on by feminists across the globe and find himself the subject of a virulent and hateful Twitter campaign.

That Korth is able to make an equivalent pronouncement in her Huffington Post piece is at best wrong, and at worst a not-so subtle attempt to promote feminist ends by ridiculing and undermining men's natural sexual responses.

Troy Francis is the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction.

Read More: The Most Important Trait That Leads to Male Success

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Gulf War III? Just Say No

July 14, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

The Islamic State seems to be the grain of sand irritating the oyster of world order designed by ruling western elites. From the grand theft auto styled drive-by shootings on main supply route Tampa (highway 8) to the slick media campaign on Twitter and YouTube, the Islamic State seems to be a force that utterly confounds those who seek to have different plans for the region. Every day I read some new article about the brutality, primitiveness, and backwardness of the supposed pseudo-sharia caliphate. Just yesterday I read another article about the problems in Iraq and the implied solution of Western intervention. I guess the New York Times has not learned their lesson from Judith Miller. It seems a lot of people want to re-fight the Iraq war. I do not mind if they do, I just wish they do it with their own blood and treasure.

The Islamic State was formally known as Islamic state of Iraq and al Sham (ISIS). It is a group of Sunni militants who had its genesis in the Iraq war and the Syrian Civil War. When they fought against President Assad in Syria, they were actually in line with Western interests. When they decided to focus their forces in a different direction, they became an enemy of the West. An enemy so great that American politicians actually contemplated cooperation with Iran in operations against them. This change of perception highlights the lack of sincerity in Western foreign policy. It also shows the shortsighted thinking of giving weapons out like candy. What's even more enlightening to even the dumbest of war hawks within America is that most of the solutions proffered to counter the Islamic State "problem" is more aid and weapons.

Some people say the Islamic State is brutal and follows a backward interpretation of the religion of Mohammed. Let me inform you that in that neighborhood of the world there are far more brutal players than the Islamic state. While it has been confirmed that the Islamic State executes people for being on the wrong side of the fence, that is almost the norm for that area. Until I see bodies that have fingers sawzalled off and cordless drill holes in the knees, elbows, and shoulders from electric power drills like the ones in Baghdad in 2007 and 2008, I don't believe the Islamic state is the most brutal player in that game. Why is this theme of their brutality repeated? It is almost like this news coverage is a form of emotional manipulation to get people to support some type of intervention that most likely will benefit those pull the strings.

Iraq's Sunni sheiks join Americans to fight insurgency

SAVE THIS EMAIL THIS PRINT THIS MOST POPULAR

By Todd Pitman
ASSOCIATED PRESS

12:37 p.m. March 25, 2007

RAMADI, Iraq – Not long ago it would have been unthinkable: a Sunni sheik allying himself publicly with American forces in a xenophobic city at the epicenter of Iraq's Sunni insurgency.

Today, there is no mistaking whose side Sheik Abdul Sattar al-Rishawi is on. Outside his walled home, a U.S. tank is on permanent guard beside a clutch of towering date palms and a protective dirt berm.

The 36-year-old sheik is leading a growing movement of Sunni tribesmen who have turned against al-Qaeda-linked insurgents in Anbar province. The dramatic shift in alliances may have done more in a few months to ease daily street battles and undercut the insurgency here than American forces have achieved in years with arms.

If reason cannot prevail, emotional appeal is the next best thing to get people on board for an intervention. What are some of the reasons people say we should stop the Islamic state? Some people attribute a quote to the Caliph Ibrahim that he intends to conduct terrorist operations outside the nation of Iraq against Americans. While this claim is not very credible it is still believable to a sizable population. It is even reported that the Islamic State is destroying old tombs and historical sites during their conquest of northwestern Iraq. Their various atrocities against certain ethnic minorities are also highlighted. What is very interesting is that they were doing the same thing while they were fighting the regime of President Assad in Syria and no one in the West seemed to care about it then. An better counterexample to intervention would be the nation of Pakistan. That nation has nuclear weapons, harbored Osama Bin Laden, and never really has a stable government but no one advocates for intervention there.

The world in 2015 is heading back to the world of 1999. Odds are that the Taliban will be back in power in Afghanistan and some type of Sunni dictator will be running things in Iraq. The only difference is that trillions of dollars have been appropriated out of the federal treasury and funneled to certain companies and corporations that profit from war.

I get a morbid giggle when I see the ghosts of 2003 pop up in the news cycle trying to justify their actions in the past. Some of them even invoke the honor of veterans who fought in Iraq as an excuse to justify another intervention in Iraq so their “sacrifices were not in vain”. Sorry Dick Cheney, but a fourth, fifth, sixth, or seventh battle of Falluja will not make things right.

So what would happen if Caliph Ibrahim and his Islamic State are allowed to continue to fight in Iraq without western intervention? I’m guessing the Shia dominated sectarian government in Baghdad will be on the receiving end of some serious payback for events that happened in 2007 and2008. Contrary to the popular historical narrative that the General Petraeus “Surge” of United States personnel brought peace to Iraq during that time, the green light to Shia militias to ethnically cleanse and dominate Baghdad caused the Sunnis to recede from the conflict. How would they do now? Judging from the empirical evidence of the failed Shia uprising of 1991, the Shia dominated government in Baghdad cannot succeed without somebody to hold their hand.

Looking at this situation with reason instead of emotion, one can see that the Islamic State has upset the order of things quite immensely. After hearing that US reconnaissance flights over northwestern Iraq were conducted by F-18s launched off of aircraft carriers in the Persian Gulf, I can assume that the governments of Saudi Arabia Kuwait and Qatar will not allow US flights from their territory. This might mean that the Sunni world is gearing up for a wider conflict with the Shia world.

With the Islamic State’s seizure of oil cash and gold in northwestern Iraq, they have become self-funding . This along with the romance of the “Islamic conquest” similar to Mohammed in his time makes quite a few Imans and royals in Saudi Arabia nervous. Aside from oil prices, there is no real need for western intervention. For the most part, no one in the West has a horse in this race except for those scheming merchants of death who want to cash in like it’s 2003 all over again. So let them do it if they wish but on their own dime and on their own time.

Read Next: Let The World Be The World

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

Male Homosexuals Have Become A Public Health Threat

July 15, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The World Health Organization (WHO) has come out with new guidelines that advise all homosexual men without HIV to take anti-HIV drugs to prevent themselves from becoming infected. This policy has presumably come about because HIV prevention education has not gotten through to homosexual men who continue to practice unsafe anal sex with dozens of new partners a year. This has hastened the global spread of the virus.

> The World Health Organization has suggested for the first time that all men who have sex with men should take antiretroviral medicine, warning that HIV infection rates among gay men are exploding around the world.
>
> In guidelines published Friday, it said that it "strongly recommends men who have sex with men consider taking antiretroviral medicines as an additional method of preventing HIV infection." Similar guidelines were issued by the U.S. in May.

While the media has done a great job portraying homosexuals as "just like" heterosexuals (deserving of marriage benefits and infinite compassion), it's clear that the similarities are few. Homosexual men engage in extreme high-risk and extreme promiscuous activity and, as the article linked above states, are "19 times more likely than the general population to be infected by HIV." Bisexual men have become the perfect vessel to transmit the HIV virus to the heterosexual population, especially to women, who are more likely than men to become infected by HIV during patriarchal male-female sex.

Last year, the NBC made a stink about gay men not being able to donate blood, and even now there is a growing political movement to allow gay men to donate. Thankfully for my relatives in the US who I hope never needs donated blood, the ban on gay men from donating still stands, because health organizations (WHO, FDA) fully understand the danger that homosexual men pose to society due to their degenerate lifestyle.

This news is obviously important from a health standpoint, especially since it involves a disease that kills people. That means the American media has reported it fully, right? Wrong. Let's compare the reportage of the new WHO guideline with the CIA's jokey Twitter feed:

The American media has become so infected with the politically correct virus that it is silent when it comes to informing the public of a real virus, all because it contradicts their heterophobia party line that aims to paint gay couples as wonderful and loving.

Male homosexuality is not monogomy, hand-holding, and baking—it's ass fucking an insane amount of strange men, often without protection and without any care of not spreading HIV. Here's what one heterosexual man learned about this lifestyle:

> From hearing them talk, I know there are (public) places in town where they can go and get fucked by multiple dudes during a fucking lunch break if they want, without having to pre-organise anything first. They said you go there, make eye contact, and fuck. One bragged about 10 guys going up him, one after the other, and another said "That's pretty good for this time of day!" This, in a public fucking place where anyone could walk in!
>
> I disputed the ease and numbers once, and said they were bullshitting and big noting themselves. One of the fucking nurses knew my private email and put my stats on a mailing list without me knowing just to prove his point, and I woke up one morning to 150+ messages in my inbox offering to suck or ride my cock, > without even knowing what I looked like. In just under six hours! I wasn't fucking impressed, but what was I going to do, file a sexual harassment suit like a pussy? I mass deleted, but I guarantee you one of those would have been from him.

>
> This in a country town 1/10th the size of San Fran, in a supposedly-homophobic country, pre-Grinder. …self-reported statistics are prone to people underplaying their sexual experience for not wanting to appear too promiscuous.
>
> Gay acceptance is built on the false myth that they're 'just like you an me' and that 'love is love'. To win societal acceptance, they need to obsessively pretend they're family-focused, because they seem to operate on two driving desires: sex and approval, and children offer neither, though I suppose being seen to be good parents could offer narcissistic supply.
>
> I was tolerant when I was younger. My views about homosexuality changed due to my day-to-day experience working with gay men, right from the horse's mouth. They function like children. I don't hate them, but I don't see why society has to excessively-champion them just because they have such a voracious need for approval.

A common argument for homo acceptance is the following: "Why do you care how two gays live or whether they want to get married?" Because their lifestyle is spreading a virus that can kill people who aren't gay. Society should rightfully accept that homosexual men are the bringers of death, a sort of grim reaper wrapped up in fuzzy progressive packaging. Even the FDA is vigorously fighting attempts to allow them to donate blood for the general population. We should be thankful they are on the side of those who don't have HIV or engage in activities which easily spread it.

Whenever someone waves a rainbow flag in your face and insists that you get with the times, tell them that maybe they can start a beef instead with the World Health Organization. They are so alarmed at what gay men are doing that they are pushing a desperate and expensive policy to prevent an epidemic that is not being controlled in spite of everything we know about preventing HIV with condom use. The least we can do is keep this virus contained within the homosexual population, and it may soon be prudent to even consider legislation that prevents homosexuals from sleeping with non-homosexuals.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: The Truth About AIDS & Heterosexual Transmission

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Hypocritical Jezebel Feminist Erin Gloria Ryan Thinks Women Are Weak

July 15, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Erin Gloria Ryan, 'ferocious' (lol) feminist writer and middle name flaunting douchette extraordinaire, has released yet another anti-feminism article on Jezebel, that bastion of privileged white women who hate themselves and other females. Seriously, like, check out this other recent article from Erinzo which is dripping with awesome sauce smugness over how a cuter privileged white girl named Axelle Despieglaere was offered a modelling contract but lost it because she took a picture of a hunting trip she went on once. WAY TO GO AXELLE DESPIEG (more like PIG amirite) LAERE! Maybe in the future you'll learn not to give all the white girls jealous of your looks and joyful nature any ammunition to shoot you with. Isn't it so feminist when women tear each other apart? Seriously, screw Axelle for ~~daring to be prettier than Erin~~ shooting a moose or w/e she did.

WORSE THAN HITLER! AMIRITE?!

At this point most people of rational thought, regardless of their thoughts on or stance in the sex wars, can agree that the writers of Jezebel are anti-feminist. At the least, they are not the proponents of a feminism which aims to create strong, independent woman. Take for example Erin Ryan's article about the harassment women receive on Youtube. As EGR so stridently warns her fellow femmes:

> Woman-types: ever wondered what it would feel like to be catcalled by men who probably lack the upper body strength to work construction? Then you should start a YouTube series!
>
> Despite the fact that the video hosting giant has featured three popular female vloggers in its recent ad campaign, being a woman who dares show her face on YouTube is a risky move indeed, unless you've got skin thicker than that fake dinosaur idiots thought Steven Spielberg murdered.

So what got under Erin's skin so much? Was some precocious thirteen year old girl's video on her drawing methods torn apart by paedophiles demanding her to get naked? Was a brave woman's video of her wearing unflattering clothes in public mocked heartlessly by the patriarchal fashion police? No. She's angry that beauticians aren't getting the same reverence and respect as people who post videos about how to change your transmission or how particle physics work.

> No matter what women do on YouTube, they can't really win. Beauty vloggers have bigger audiences, more lucrative endorsement deals, and are somewhat insulated from the sort of ire flung at comedians and commentators and other How-To'ers. But because their main focus is on hair and makeup, they're sometimes viewed as somehow intellectually inferior to their non-beauty vlog counterparts (according to The Daily Dot, beauty vloggers were excluded from a Women of YouTube panel at this weekend's VidCon, an event where YouTube's most watched and subscribed talk about the highs and lows of vlogging).
>
> But no matter the focus of their content, female vloggers who spoke out at VidCon expressed frustration with the nature of abuse that focuses on their physical appearance rather than on the actual content of their videos. If they're physically attractive, they're bombarded with creepy requests to do things like slowly put on silk stockings and post the video (ostensibly so some weirdo can fap to it). If they're not conventionally attractive, male commenters jump on every opportunity to let the woman in question know that she makes their particular boner unhappy and she should go away forever. If she's of average attractiveness, commenters use the commenting space to have debates about her fuckability.

So commentator's on women's videos talk about the woman's appearance and sexual attractiveness, or conversely they point out their flaws or lack of looks. Even if we ignore the fact that it's human nature for people to judge one another's looks (how many games of Kill Fuck Marry has Erin played, I wonder), female content creators do not have a monopoly on rude and hateful comments on Youtube.

A user by the name of Scott Herman has a channel about fitness, and has helped plenty of people (including myself) with their fitness goals. He also has a slightly light sounding voice and prefers to exercise without a shirt on. On almost anyone of his videos you'll find people calling him gay, calling him a faggot, and telling him to put a shirt on. Almost no user with any amount of video views on Youtube is a stranger to rude comments. In fact, almost anyone who has spent more than a day on the internet has undoubtedly been the subject of hateful comments directed personally at them. It's just what the internet is. To fight that is to fight human nature. Good luck winning that war.

Erin continues:

> Science vlogger Emily Grasslie of The Brain Scoop weighed in after famously smacking down her looks-obsessed male critics in recent months, telling VidCon attendees that she mostly just ignores the trolly mctrolls to avoid risking undermining her credibility.

> "I feel like I can't take [sic] about my image on channel without compromising the value of my educational message," she explained, going on to detail how people ask her every day about her hairstyle or clothing featured on YouTube instead of the content of her videos. "I have made a conscious decision to never answer those publicly. I'm so afraid that once I start letting in that side of my personality that people will no longer care about the educational message. I think that insecurity is totally a product of the society I grew up in."

> But the fact that women deal with this — still! In 2014! — is an incredible bummer. No matter where we go and what we do and what we say, there's some guy standing by to shout about whether or not they want to see us naked.

Men deal with it too, but this is Jezebel we're talking about. They could care less about men, but not that they really care about women either—they only show concern about those women they don't feel threatened by or whose story fits their self centered narrative. Again, why is Axelle worthy of Erin's scorn and Emily Gras*lie* is not? Hmm…let's compare them and try and find out.

Gee, I wonder why Erin likes Emily over Axelle. If the looks of the two were reversed, would Erin still be glad Axelle lost her job opportunity? Going through her article history, it's obvious Erin's motto is: 'I'm a feminist … as long as she's not prettier than me'. If it was Emily losing the modelling contract because she posed with a dead Gazelle, Erin would be writing an article defending her and probably rant about how it's so patriarchal to punish women for doing manly things like hunting, and that all those MEN at L'oreal were just threatened by a strong woman.

[On a side note, Emily is pretty passable. If she took those glasses off I'd sure like to lie her down in the grass! MISOGYNY FTW!!!]

In the last of Erin's short article of outrage, she says:

> One of the more irritating aspects of that sort of comment is that the people making them are 100% convinced that the worst thing a man can say to a woman is that he doesn't want to have sex with her, that the most important thing to a woman is how their weens feel about her. Why else would they wear makeup? Heels? Why would they slather on sunscreen every morning?
>
> Guys, guys, guys. It's not for you. More often then not, women do it for each other. No one gives a shit about your boner.
>
> I'd imagine that idea, expanded into 4 minute YouTube video form, would likely garner more than its share of rape threats.

Uh huh. Women wear make up, heels and great clothes for each other. That makes 100% sense. Actually, in a way Erin is right about that: women do try and look best because of other women. They do it because they want to make other women feel jealous when they attract a good looking guy by looking like a bangable human being. There's nothing better for many woman out there than making her 'sisters' jealous of the men she gets. Erin is one of them.

For Erin, it doesn't matter that men get just as and often much worse forms of abuse, or that men often outright lose their jobs for daring to post their opinions (even if it was just retelling a joke from a popular cartoon; in this case South Park) on the internet. Hell, men lose their jobs for having private conversations between each other face to face. Of course Jezebel came out and defended Adria Richards, the woman who helped a man fired because she listened into his private conversation. Which is hilarious in hindsight since the same woman was fired for making sexual comments of her own to a hell of a lot more people. But only women who suffer from other's hateful remarks matter in Jezebel's world and, of course, only if the writer perceives them to be uglier than her.

Yet that's not the main point of this article. What really cheeses me off about Erin Ryan (besides her juvenile attack on a fellow female simply because she's prettier) is that Erin seems to think women, all women, are fragile little creatures who need to be protected from words. Erin obviously judges others by herself, and Erin is a vindictive thinned skinned hypocrite. Just because Erin, and the other spoiled privileged white women like her, cannot handle criticism doesn't mean that every other woman cannot. It's incredibly belittling to other women to say that female content creators on Youtube, and other parts of the web, need to be protected from naughty words. Erin is insinuating that all women are so weak that a half coherent textual message written by a person they'll never meet left on an internet video created by said woman is enough to harm her.

Is it? Are all women so weak that they need a completely totalitarian system enacted to squash the free speech of others just so they can make a video about applying eye-liner without reading someone basically saying 'I would have sex with you'? Of course not. Women by and large are not that weak. A good example of a woman who knows just what the internet is all about is internet comedian Jenna Marbles, one of the most subscribed to content creators on Youtube (so much for women being unable to 'make it' on Youtube). The amount of vitriol, sexual commentary and general hatred she gets is massive (a fair amount of it from women), and yet somehow she's still around. Which is great because Jenna loves tearing apart hypocritical feminism like that espoused by Jezebel writers. Jenna is also pretty sexy, so I'm surprised Erin hasn't tried to rip her apart either.

Female comedy at it's finest.

Feminists like Erin Ryan are the reason most people don't take women's issues seriously, even the few of actual concern. Women are not so weak that some insults on the internet create genuine emotional trauma for them. There are real problems afflicting women, and if it intends to survive as something more than a movement of narcissistic clowns, feminism needs to jettison the privileged white women like Erin Ryan who are running it and get around to solving the real problems.

Women of strength and character are rejecting feminism almost out of hand at this point and it's not hard to see why when Stopping Bad Men On The Internet Saying Bad Things constitutes a genuine cause for it's adherents. Most people find it pretty hard to take a movement whose purported aim is to create STRONG INDEPENDENT WOMEN seriously when those who speak for it are driven to near tears because Xx420billynubs69xX said 'id fuk her holes red' in a comments section. If feminists are adults, they need to start acting like it.

Read More: Did Jezebel Pick Emma Carmichael For Editor Over A Black Woman Because Of Her Looks?

Billy Chubbs

Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

In With The New: Amazon Forcing Out Antiquated Publishing Giants

July 15, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

The New York times recently published an article examining Amazon's rise to the top of the publishing circles and its efforts to stamp out competition in the industry. The author attempts to take a balanced view, interviewing both people who have benefitted from Amazon's ascent from online retailer to publishing giant, as well as those who have been hurt by Amazon's increasingly dominant market share:

> "All of this angst and arguing is pushing forward a question: Is the resistance to Amazon a last-ditch bid to keep the future of American literary culture out of the hands of a rapacious corporation that calls books "demand-weighted units," or an effort by a bunch of dead-enders and snobs to forestall a future that will be much better for most readers and writers?"

Amazon survived the dot com bust by diversifying their products, focusing on slower business growth, and reading the desires of the market. One of these needs was a more merit-based system of publishing, which has since become a great boon to writers by providing a larger platform for distributing their work while requiring a significantly smaller rake of their profits.

In the previous model, large publishing houses would give minuscule contracts and advances to authors, and reap as much as 85% of the profit in exchange. Authors are now more certain than ever that the strength of their content, and not their connections within a small, insular industry, would carry their sales.

The author also talks about the practices that Amazon has revolutionized, beginning with their ranking algorithm. Prior to Amazon entering the publishing game, they would simply distribute the books from publishers and keep a ranking for how well the books were doing relative to each other — a small innovation, but one that ultimately proved to direct their business:

> "A lot of [publishing houses] had been in business for 30 years," he said. "They said [to Amazon]: This is what we're going to publish, this is the price, you have no leverage, we control the content.
>
> …
>
> An author would see his ranking drop from 98 to 798, and the first thing he'd do is call his agent or publisher and say, 'What happened?' " he said. "He held the publisher responsible and expected it to straighten this out."

Amazon was once pushed around by these larger companies, who would withhold book supplies and prevent Amazon from selling their product. Ironically, it was their algorithm, (and not their publishing) that got them into the conversation. Nowadays, Amazon is attempting to use their considerable industry muscle to pressure publishing companies into giving them a higher kickback for promoting and distributing their products. With brick-and-mortar bookstores all but dead, the major publishers are forced to acquiesce:

> "He noted that Amazon was also trying to squeeze a large publishing group in Germany,Bonnier, for better terms. And Germany has fixed-price laws for books. That, Mr. Pietsch said, 'is evidence that Amazon's margins, not lower prices for consumers, are the crux here.'"

One major business is accusing another major business of acting in the interests of higher profits. The author also speaks to representatives of Rutgers University Press to get a sense of how Amazon's practices are impacting their business:

> "We still pride ourselves on what we are doing — producing books that educate and create a public good," Ms. Wasserman said. "To see that migrate into the hands of people who might not share our mission, or might not even be people, doesn't say much for the future of American culture."

Forgive me if I don't shed a tear for university presses, who typically sell poor-quality textbooks for hundreds of dollars and subsequently eradicate their resale value by releasing new editions every other year. Note that these organizations are unable to advance any logical justification for their existence in the age of digital publishing. Their argument against a competitor devolves into a pseudo-intellectual soup of nebulous buzzwords such as "public good", "sharing their mission" and their importance to "American culture." As someone who spent hundreds of dollars a year on worthless textbooks in college, I will take the most pleasure when these dinosaurs are finished for good.

> "American publishers and booksellers are looking longingly at France, where different rules apply. In late June, the French Senate unanimously passed a law forbidding free shipping on books bought online. It was called the Anti-Amazon > Law.”

This sounds suspiciously like something out of an Ayn Rand novel — a government imposing sanctions on a profitable big business in order to artificially help a more entrenched but decaying industry. This is cronyism of the highest order, the kind that we have thankfully not (yet) seen applied to Amazon in the U.S.. The author closes with a hollow caution that Amazon may revert to the same profit-maximizing practices once they have stamped out the competition:

> “Amazon looks so good because it has the rest of publishing to compete against. But if those publishers wither, maybe that would not be true.”

All in all, though the article attempts to present a neutral view of the situation in the publishing industry, it is clear that Amazon has been a boon for all but the most entrenched of authors. Is this a move of retribution by an industry giant against its formerly strong competitors? Perhaps. But if Amazon delivers more value to both authors and consumers, it’s difficult to argue that their ascension to the top of the industry is anything but a net positive. Amazon’s practices have helped to turn publishing and information dissemination into a merit-based, rather than infrastructure and credentialism-based, practice.

This article makes it clear that large publishing houses have ruled over their kingdoms with an iron first, rarely thinking about the future of the industry and instead clinging to an outdated business model as they chiseled authors for as much money as possible. That was their right because they were the only business in town, but times have changed. What we’re seeing now strikes me as the last gasps of an antiquated industry, one that is being rendered obsolete by a more consumer-driven and artist-driven model. Good riddance.

Read More: Get The Equivalent Of An MBA From Reading One Book

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

New Birth Control Ads Show Women's Fucked Up Priorities

July 16, 2014 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Every time I see a semi-attractive girl in line at the pharmacy I assume she's picking up birth control. More times than not, her body language and outfit remove all doubt. I'm shocked at the club attire that chicks have the temerity to wear to pick up their Nuvaring. It's as if they intend to use it inside the very Walgreens the moment they get it.

In a general sense, I don't object to birth control. It's given me, and men like me, unprecedented access to the naughty bits of a variegated and replenishing bin of 20-somethings. In theory, at least, it keeps women from having a bunch of unnecessary kids from performing the task of emptying their husbands' balls every couple of days. And, truth be told, that's how birth control was marketed for a long time. Women could control how many children they could have inside of their committed relationships.

Things have changed.

In just the past couple of years, I've seen a drastic shift in the tone of marketing campaigns for women's birth control. Gone are the wives and fathers of previous pitches. Enter the floozies. Today's woman, the new ads inform us, is busy. So busy and distracted, in fact, that taking a pill every day is too much of a burden. Ron Popeil's famous set-it-and-forget model has reached the American pussy in the shape of rings and wishbones and an array of other suppositories. You crush the thing into the love canal and don't have to worry about "forgetting" to take your pill.

A recent campaign is even more eyebrow-raising. An off-brand IUD (intrauterine device) product that goes by the name "Skyla" recently put out a series of banner ads not just trumpeting the just-how-busy girls are these days, but just how much their hobbies and extravagant dreams are stand-ins for motherhood. Musical instruments and introductory textbooks, we learn, are the same as fulfilling your biological imperative of producing healthy offspring during your prime years. Having children is mutually exclusive with a rewarding life.

These ads naturally inspired excoriating lampoons at the RVF. Because let's face it: the overwhelming majority of 20-somethings aren't postponing children to become cello virtuosos or movie makers. They're putting off motherhood for such frivolities as riding the cock carousel, accumulating pets to serve as child proxies, and pissing away their days—one swipe at a time—on their precious iPhones.

THIS IS MY BABY
RIGHT NOW
Skyla. Up to 3 years of continuous birth control.
Plans prioritized.

THIS IS HER BABY
RIGHT NOW
With 3-year Skyla, your nulliparous or parous patient can have continuous pregnancy prevention and time to focus on her plans
Plans prioritized.

THIS IS MY BABY
RIGHT NOW
Skyla. Up to 3 years of continuous birth control.
Plans prioritized.

I've always said you can tell more about a society by its advertisements than by its politicians. Skyla's new ad campaign only seems to reinforce that belief.

Read More: The Anti-Male Commercial

Tuthmosis Sonofra
Tuthmosis is a Columnist-at-Large at Return of Kings. His work has been covered by major media outlets such as The Huffington Post, Cosmopolitan, Vice Magazine, The Daily Mail, and Yahoo Shine. He's also been profiled by BuzzFeed and The New Statesman. You can follow him on Twitter.

Was Instagram Wrong In Deleting The Fat Teen Girl Samm Newman’s Account?

July 16, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

> Samm Newman knows what she is.
>
> “I’m a big girl,” Newman said. “I’m proud, and I post lots of body love.”

Take a look for yourself. And I apologize in advance for embedding this photograph, but I want you to have the same reaction everyone else did on Instagram when this was first posted.

Part 1 – An OBESE Girl Posts On Instagram

Rather than rehash the facts, I'll just let our trusted news sources do it:

> Newman took part in a body positivity movement on Instagram. Four months ago, she met a group of ladies using hash tags like #bodylove and #pizzasister4lyfe. They followed each other, posted pictures and compliments.
>
> "My Instagram, it was my safe place because when I was there, I could share anything," Newman said.

"Body Positivity Movement" is code for obese people encouraging each other that, rather than attempting to do the hard thing and diet or exercise (or god forbid both), they will do what got them so obese in the first place. Sit around, be sedentary and yell at society through a computer. They do this because is the easy way out. After all why work at yourself when you can just seemingly validate your unhealthy and frankly grotesque lifestyle from the comfort of your couch?

Next, Newman discusses how she could post anything on Instagram because it was her "safe place." Sounding like the teen that she is, and furthermore the America she lives in, Newman epitomizes the entitlement complex that we know all too well in America. Instagram is her safe place.

Part 2 – Instagram Removes Fat Photo For Violating Its Community Standards

Instagram removed the photograph and deleted this girl's account. From the news stories I have read, they all quote the same reason from Instagram: the picture was removed for "violating community standards." However I have yet to see a single direct quote from Instagram as to which community standard they are referring to.

Yet amazingly according to this source, this one, this lovely one, this major network, and this favorite, and probably countless others – Newman's photo violated the Instagram nudity restrictions. This is despite as indicated above, the only words from Instagram itself do not specify such a thing.

So either these media outlets have some inside information from Instagram regarding which guideline it was and suspiciously enough refuse to disclose it, or more likely make an assumption as to which community standard was violated. I'll go ahead and join the party now by making an assumption too, that it was the latter. As one source writes:

> 19-year-old Ohio student Samm Newman's Instagram account was removed for violating the social media's community guidelines against sharing photos with nudity. But Newman was clothed in a bra and boy shorts in her photo. "I didn't find them or the bra at all inappropriate," Newman told MS News Now. "They covered me entirely, and I've seen pictures like that all over Instagram."

First, there is the aforementioned assumption regarding the guideline in question. With that out of the way we can focus on how so far removed from reality Newman actually is.

I actually agree with her first statement here. The bra and boy shorts are not the problem or inappropriate. Rather, it is her body. What most girls these days fail to understand in Western society is that people can be different. I would look like an idiot in cowboy boots and suspenders, but should I sport them anyway and walk out into society and demand people think I look good in them? If I shaved my head I most definitely would have an odd-shaped dome and it would not look good.

Yet in today's reality that is America, everyone has the perceived right to be the same as everyone else. And that takes me to the second part of her statement. Putting aside the absurdity the part that the outfit covered her "entirely" is that she has seen "pictures like that all over Instagram."

Again the self-delusion pushes through. In Newman's mind, her obese self looks the same in a bikini as a model wearing a bikini. Pictures "like that" to Newman mean generally a girl in underwear. What she fails to realize is she cannot separate her morbid obesity from the outfit (perhaps literally given her fat folds overextending to trap the fabric).

A person does not see her picture and think to themselves "oh, what a lovely outfit." A person sees this picture and thinks "this girl is disgustingly obese."

Part 3 – The Media Cries Fat Discrimination And Instagram Cowers

Remember, Instagram was her place. So what happens when someone, dare say the owner of the medium, takes away that safe place?

The girl flips out and cries discrimination. Often times I wonder who really is at fault and to be honest, most of the time I can't really blame girls like this. They have been brainwashed from an early age. Reality TV, exposure to stories like this, online "body positive movements," friends who feed their spiral of unhealthy living to one another, or are just bitches who lie about how "cute" short hair looks on a girl, and so on. The list is neverending.

Take MyDaily's account of the events at hand:

> This latest news has us wondering who it is, sitting in their ivory tower, that gets to decide which pictures do and which pictures don't violate their code of conduct. A picture of Cara Delevingne totally naked with just a road sign to cover her modesty isn't nudity, but apparently Samm's mirror shot is.

They then post this Instagram photo of the girl they mention:

This is followed by the requisite "wow, just wow" comment by the My Daily author Ellen Stewart, the variation being this time "The mind, it boggles." Apparently Ms. Stewart also doesn't understand that 1) no nudity was ever cited by Instagram, and 2) the difference between the picture immediately above and what Newman actually looks like.

Here's another Instagram post of Newman (warning – click at your own risk). Does this help show the difference between her and the model above? How about Newman's 44 likes to nearly 380k for the model? Even accounting for fame I'm pretty sure 380k people are not wrong in liking one over the other.

But according to Newmann and Stewart here, these pictures are all one in the same. I guess we couldn't expect much more from an author with a bio that states she dresses like a teenage boy.

Eventually after getting heat from the media, Instagram succumbed and reinstated the photo and Newman's account. Presumably to save face, Instagram made the following comment to some news sources:

> When our team processes reports from other members of the Instagram community, we occasionally make a mistake. In this case, we wrongly removed content and worked to rectify the error as soon as we were notified. We apologize for any inconvenience.

Part 4 – Analysis: Did The Photograph Violate Instagram's Community Guidelines?

Yes.

If I were Instagram's lawyer and we lived in a society that was not so twisted, I would have vehemently stood my ground. Instagram has a set of "Community Guidelines" it asks its users to follow (regarding both what to and what to not do). First, the provision that all the media outlets and Newman cited to as purportedly being violated was this one:

> 2. Do share photos and videos that are safe for people of all ages.
>
> Remember that our community is a diverse one, and that your posts are visible > to people as young as 13 years old. While we respect the artistic integrity of photos and videos, we have to keep our product and the content within it in line with our App Store's rating for nudity and mature content. In other words, please do not post nudity or mature content of any kind.

Again, the nudity portion was simply assumed or perhaps used as a scapegoat. But let's focus our attention on the first sentence for a second. Even if we accept the fact that there is a mythical barrier for girls under 13 to access the internet, then we still are left with girls in their early teens and older – arguably the most impressionable time of their lives – seeing photos like the one above and directly being told that these bodies, that this type of morbid obesity, is not only acceptable but promoted.

As I mentioned below, there is a litany of science and studies out there detailing the horrific effects of obesity. Personally I do not think this is safe for young impressionable eyes.

Verdict – Violation.

Instagram goes on to state:

> 3. Do treat others as you would like to be treated.
>
> People from around the world with different backgrounds come together to share moments on Instagram, which is great, but it also means that not everyone will agree with what you think or believe. We ask that all users be polite and respectful in their interactions with other members.

Anyone who says Newman's picture is something that should be shown to the public at large is either lying or brainwashed to the point of no recovery. Yet for those of us that have not lost our sanity and are not afraid to present the truth, Instagram allows us to complain if something is bothers us. For example, if we don't agree with promoting morbid obesity. Exactly like how people did when they reported the Newman photo.

Of course, Newman doesn't see it that way. She states that "fat is not a bad word" and "how confident can you be if you keep censoring yourself because people don't want to look at you?" Again, completely self-centered as the only thing that matters in her world is herself.

Verdict – Violation (though admittedly not as clear cut as above).

Next up we have probably the most relevant guideline to the discussion at hand:

> 6. Don't promote or glorify self-harm.
>
> While Instagram is a place where people can share their lives with others through photographs and videos, any account found encouraging or urging users to embrace anorexia, bulimia, or other eating disorders; or to cut, harm themselves, or commit suicide will result in a disabled account without warning. We believe that communication regarding these behaviors in order to create awareness, come together for support and to facilitate recovery is important, but that Instagram is not the place for active promotion or > glorification of self-harm.

Emphasis added. May I ask Ellen Stewart or the countless other media writers how they missed this glaring provision in the Instagram guidelines? We can go on for hours and into excruciating detail as to how obesity is absolutely horrible for one's health, or how overeating is an eating disorder. But we all know this already, whether we ignore it (media) or not (us).

So knowing this, how can one argue that placing such a photo of herself, promoting this terrible health and lifestyle, does not violate this provision? Simply put, they cannot. Such an argument would be completely without merit. Samm Newman was promoting and glorifying self-harm in the form of obesity.

It is hard to say if anyone at Instagram actually reconciled the photo with their actual guidelines and deleted the account, or was just so disgusted by the photo itself and deleted it as a reflexive action. Either way after getting hit by media for deleting Newman's account, Instagram could have easily pointed to this guideline, pointed to the abundance of evidence supporting the harm obesity causes, and stood its ground.

Verdict – Clear Violation.

Part 5 – The End Result

But this is America, and Instagram at the risk of offending all these women backed down. Instead we got this nugget of joy:

> "I'm going to make a difference in the world," Newman said.

The sad truth is many before her already have. I mentioned that this weekend I saw a chubby ten year old girl walking around in a tight shirt that just said #SELFIE on it. She was with her older, equally chubby sister and her dad who obviously has failed to do anything about it.

In a few years she will be the next Samm Newman, posting her obese self on whatever the latest social media craze is that year. That company will be too afraid to do anything about it, and the cycle will continue.

This story is only a minor spec in the world that we are living in. Tactics like #fatshamingweek are really the only tools we have left these days and even those pale in comparison to the reach of Western media. But at least we are trying.

Read Next: Open Letter To Fat Girls

L.D. Hume
L.D. Hume, formerly known as Law Dogger, is an attorney and the litigation partner of his law firm. A traditionalist at heart, he travels often in an attempt to expose himself to as many cultures across the globe as possible. His column runs every so often and he can be found on Twitter as well.

Entitled Journalist Writes Article Criticizing Men For Their 'Top 10 Dating Mistakes'

July 16, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

It seems that not a week goes by without another 'empowered' feminist writing an article for a mainstream media outlet describing a marathon series of dates she's been on in the name of self-discovery or journalistic research.

Only last week ROK readers were treated to an account of a Huffington Post blogger milking a parade of ninety-eight beta-trons for drinks, dinner and validation over nine months.

Now it is the turn of Natasha Devon, a UK journalist, who has written a article for the Daily Telegraph about going on sixty dates in a mere six weeks—thus beating her US counterpart's three dates per week with a stellar ten. The Americans may have outperformed us Brits in the World cup, but at least we can hold our own some areas.

Devon states her reasons for the exercise here:

> Eighteen months ago, I was a long-term singleton. I'd decided that my taste in men had become a little too stringent and restrictive (i.e. I always dated the same sort of guy and was left feeling bemused when they kept showing themselves to be scoundrels). So, I was set a challenge by my friends, in hope of changing the status quo – I was to join a dating site and I HAD TO accept every date I was asked on over the next six weeks.

I was unaware of Devon before reading her article, but a quick search of Google images reveals her to be pretty enough but hardly a supermodel. It therefore speaks to the thirstiness of British men (and the paucity of attractive British women) that so many of them wanted to date her in such a short period of time.

With the sixty dates completed, and only one second date arranged (presumably the fifty-nine other hopeful applicants didn't meet Devon's rigorous standards), the author wrote up a checklist of Ten Dating Mistakes that Men Always Make for The Telegraph. Perhaps this was a caring act inspired by a deep desire to assist British men in their quests to attain a dime piece similar to herself. Regardless, Devon announced the publication of her article with this somewhat smug Tweet:

The tone of Devon's piece may be humorous, but it is also offensive to men, casting them as piggish buffoons in need of patronizing female advice. An article of this kind written by a man about women would warrant public outrage—Devon's was published by a serious British newspaper and praised on Twitter.

So, what are the ten mistakes that Devon has identified through her tireless 'research', and is her advice any good? Here is the list, specially annotated by your correspondent for ROK readers. I would never normally recommend taking a woman's advice on dating, but sometimes it's worth looking up over the parapet to see what they are thinking. Also, perhaps surprisingly, many of Devon's points unwittingly endorse red pill thinking. But they hold good for reasons other than those she posits, skewed as her thinking is by her Titanic sense of entitlement.

1. Not Having a Plan

> It doesn't matter how feminist and independent you believe your date to be, we love a man who is good at decision making. Please do not arrange to meet us at the Tube station and then say, "so, where do you fancy going?"

To be fair, this is bang on. You must be decisive at all stages in your interaction with a woman, whether on the approach or three months in. Remember—women experience 'gina tingles over strong, dominant men, not weak milksops who seek their approval.

Devon recommends saying this:

> "I was thinking about going here as I've heard it's great, unless you had somewhere in mind you'd prefer?" This shows you are decisive AND flatters our feminist sensibilities. We will swoon.

She won't swoon. Don't do this. Tell her where you are going, then take her by the hand and lead her there. No permission-seeking.

Remember: by her own admission, Devon previously dated (and is therefore attracted to) scoundrels. Always look at a woman's actions rather than what she says. Be the cad if you want to share her bed.

2. Saying "so why is a beautiful girl like you single?"

Again, this is bang on, but not for the reason that Devon suggests:

> It makes us think you're the sort of bloke who believes the dating game is just one long queue of girls, all of whom are DESPERATE for a boyfriend and are standing in order of physical attractiveness, waiting for the next man to walk past.

In fact, it is a bad thing to say because you are massively putting the girl on a pedestal, which will de-lube her lady-zone quicker than a heatwave in the Sahara. Don't tell a girl she's beautiful at all until after you've banged her. Period.

3. Admitting you're nervous.

Devon says this is fine to admit later on, but not on the date itself, as it feels 'a bit weird.'

This supports manosphere thinking. You are an alpha male—you do not get nervous in the presence of a woman. Chumps take note: women are freaked out by expressions of beta man-boobery. Make sure you are on your A game at all times.

4. Acting like you don’t care.

This is only partly right. Devon says:

> Behaving as though we are utterly disposable and as though this is the sort of thing you do every night isn’t very attractive either. Even if you DO go on dates with different women every night, making us feel special, unique and cherished is the cornerstone of every healthy relationship and also, more short term, the non-negotiable key to getting into our knickers

Here Devon conflates women’s dual sexual strategies—alpha fux and beta bux—and erroneously suggests that the same male approach will work in either category. This is not true.

You do of course need to display some basic level of empathy with the woman you are hoping to sleep with, BUT you should massively dial this down if you are after a quick pump-and-dump rather than a ‘healthy relationship’ (an oxymoron if ever there was one).

Here, Devon encourages men to play the provider role. Those who buy into this frame will unwittingly present themselves to the women they date as beta, thus not accessing the quick sex easily afforded to his alpha counterparts. Follow this advice at your peril.

5. Playing with your phone

On the contrary, you should always play with your phone. Reply to texts while you’re with her. Doing so will enshroud you with an aura of disinterest and inaccessibility that will only enhance your attractiveness.

6. Asking a question then looking really disinterested as soon as the answer comes.

This advice is almost the total opposite of what you should do.

Devon says:

> Do not ask us something, then glance lazily around (especially not at other girls in the vicinity) as soon as we open our mouths to respond. This is not how a conversation is supposed to go.

Note the somewhat dictatorial tone of that last sentence. Here is a woman determined to to control the frame. Don’t let her. By all means glance around the room while she speaks. Don’t place too much importance on what she says—you’re not a lap dog. The conversation should go precisely how you want it to—not her.

7. Saying ‘tell me something about you no one else knows’.

Fair enough. This is the lame resort of the conversationally-bereft. Read a book, do an improv course, practice making observations and telling stories. Do anything rather than ask such a ballbag-excised women’s magazine excuse for a question.

8. Doing the ‘mid-point date assessment’.

Devon says:

> If there is one sentence guaranteed to kill any sort of spark it’s “so, how do you think it’s going?”

No man would ask such a question. You already know the answer—it’s going damn well, because she has the good fortune to be sitting next to you, with your almost undivided attention (aside from your looking around the room and answering texts, that is.).

9. Bad-mouthing other dates you have been on.

Agreed—don’t do this. Not because ‘we’ll then immediately be on our guard, wondering if this date is a future anecdote for another date you might go on.’ Instead, don’t do it because, depending on the anecdote, you are liable to come across as butthurt and not good with women if you talk about a failed former liason.

10. Talking about your ex/Asking about her ex

See above.

Devon finishes up with a list of things you should do for happy, sexually-successful dating:

> – SMILE! – It doesn’t cost anything and it makes you look sexy.
>
> – Insist on paying – A controversial one, this. We’re always happy to go halves or even to pay for the whole thing BUT if you absolutely insist we’ll assume you’re having deeply loving feelings towards us.
>
> – Walk us to the station/put us in a cab/in some way show that you are bothered about what might befall us during our journey home.
>
> – Text immediately you get in to say what a lovely night you had – Even if it’s a lie. It’s just British good manners.

Don’t do any of these things—except maybe smiling (sparingly). Sadly, with gender-relations being what they are today, paying for dates and otherwise being gentlemanly will put you solidly in the ‘provider’ camp, and you will become the guy she jokes about just prior to going down on her penniless, alpha jerk boyfriend.

Conclusion

Devon’s list is interesting because in places it demonstrates that red pill thinking is correct, and that qualities like dominance, confidence and charisma are the keys to a woman’s intimacy. Nevertheless, the article is offensive in tone as it serves to re-enforce the cultural meme that men are clueless, bumbling simpletons who need to be taught the ways of the world by more emotionally intuitive women.

Flip the script for a moment. Suppose a man wrote an article on the ten most common mistakes women make on dates—being late, texting, dressing poorly, not wearing enough make-up etc. I can’t imagine any mainstream media outlet in the US or the UK publishing such a piece, and even if they did, the feminist backlash across social media would be explosive, with cries of sexism from all quarters.

That the same isn’t true of an article implicitly criticizing men like Devon’s does is a reminder of just how entrenched female superiority is within the Western cultural narrative.

Find out tried and tested strategies for meeting and attracting beautiful women by clicking here.

Read More: 5 Dating Conventions That Women Killed

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Rapper Cuts Off His Cock: A Tragedy That Serves As A Warning For Us All

July 16, 2014 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Rapper Andre Johnson, no not Andre 3000, but an obscure rapper with loose-knit ties to the Wu Tang Clan, cut off his cock and jumped off a building in the city of Lost Angels after a night of consuming drugs.

> The rapper who mutilated himself and then jumped from a Los Angeles building has broken his silence about what happened.
>
> Andre Johnson was severely injured in April after he severed his penis and leaped from the second level of a building in North Hollywood. He told E! that he was under the influence of drugs at the time but insisted that he knew what he was doing.
>
> "Yes, I was using drugs that night, but I was in complete control," he said. "I cut it off because that was the root of all my problems. My solution to the problem was the realization that sex is for mortals, and I am a god. …Those kinds of activities got me into trouble, and I came here to be a god."
>
> Johnson performs under the name Christ Bearer and his group Northstar was affiliated with the Wu-Tang Clan. Johnson said he hadn't spoken out on the incident before because "People perceived me as crazy, so I never wanted to speak wholeheartedly on the matter."
>
> Doctors weren't able to reattach the penis, he told E!.
>
> He said he had been seeing a psychologist after he was discharged but that he has been deemed okay. He said he was thankful to God when he awoke in the hospital still alive.
>
> "I didn't want to kill myself," Johnson said. "That was just my response to the demons. They were doing their best to get to me, but being alive solidified my thoughts. …I'm alive, penis or no penis."

Now let's break this down for a minute: what the fuck is going on with this dude? At what point does one think it's a fine idea to sever his cock and take a jump? Obviously, he was under the influence of drugs, but it's his attitude after the fact that's the most disturbing. He clearly believes that 'demons' were forcing him to use his cock in an unhealthy manner, so the 'solution' was to chop it off.

I feel bad for the dude. If he had only stumbled upon this site, and done some soul searching, perhaps he would have gotten his life together and not committed such a retarded act. At this point, let's keep it real, his life is fucked. Can you imagine trying to meet girls with no cock?

"Hey sweetheart let's grab drinks tomorrow night".

They have drinks, she gets flirty and gropes his crotch.

“Ummm where is it Andre?”

“Well, you see…I don’t have a penis”

“You don’t!?”

“I don’t. I cut it off after this crazy party.”

Curtain Closes. The End.

In light of this ridiculous story, I’ll be serious for a moment: if you’re struggling with a deep depression and you’ve been having some thoughts about harming yourself etc, then stop. Get some professional help if need be. Talk to someone you can trust and tell them that you need some help.

There’s nothing wrong with reaching out to someone who can help you, having humility and admitting that you need some guidance. Andre is a tragic lesson: get help before it’s too late, it might just save your life, or even your cock.

Go here because who dreams of fucking 5´s and being average?

Read More: Was Instagram Wrong In Deleting The Fat Teen Girl Sam Newman’s Account?

Attention Whoring Is More Important To This 40-Year-Old Than Being A Mom

July 17, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Kriste Lewis has been making a lot of headlines for recently making the New Orleans Saints "Saintsation" cheerleading squad. While this would not normally be Good Morning America worthy, this is an exception. Why?

Because Kriste is 40 years old and the mother of two children.

Of course, her making the team has caused plenty of discussion: what it was like competing with so many younger girls vying for the Saintsation position, as well as her battle with kidney disease:

> Though Lewis said it was her lifelong dream, the biggest inspiration that motivated her to try out was a health condition she has battled daily for more than a decade.
>
> “Fourteen years ago I was diagnosed with polysistic kidney disease. Eventually my kidneys will shut down [and] I will be in need of dialysis and in need of a transplant,” she said.
>
> “That had a lot to do with me auditioning as well. I didn’t want to waste a day.”

While Lewis’ ability to make the squad over her younger peers, and her overall conditioning, is admirable for someone who has lived forty years on the planet, what is being lost in the hoopla is the impact it might potentially have on her husband and young children. Of course they say she has their full support, but I bet the husband will think differently when he sits down at the dinner table to a frozen pizza meal for the third time in a week.

The question that no one is asking is this: why is this mother of two more concerned about restoring her former glory days with Photoshopped airbrushing, short skirts and drunk men drooling all over her fading beauty?

“Her Lifelong Dream”

Lewis has raved about how excited she is for the opportunity:

> “I can’t even fathom what it’s going to be like to walk out on that field in the Superdome with all those Saints fans,” she said. “I hope I don’t pass out. … If I died tomorrow, I’m good. I’m a happy girl. It’s been a blast.”

She fails to mention anything about how where this lifelong dream fits in with what I would assume was also a lifetime dream of having a family, which she has already been blessed with. Contrary to what she is saying, her lifelong dream is not to be an NFL cheerleader—it’s to have attention on her and to be famous.

If her sole dream was to be a cheerleader for an NFL squad, then she would have made the team and just shut up about it, rather than doing features with her family watching her dance by herself on a Good Morning America feature.

The Cheerleader Cost

I dated a dance team girl in college, and let me tell you—the schedule is no joke. Games, practices, photo shoots, and “fan appearances” (i.e. beta male orbiting) all take a up a significant amount of time.

You can read this article about the Raiders cheerleader who filed suit against the Raiders for her low pay and wages:

> Long before Lacy’s boots ever hit the gridiron grass, “I was just hustling,” she > says. “Very early on, I was spending money like crazy.” The salon visits, the makeup, the eyelashes, the tights were almost exclusively paid out of her own pocket. The finishing touch of the Raiderettes’ onboarding process was a contract requiring Lacy to attend thrice-weekly practices, dozens of public appearances, photo shoots, fittings and nine-hour shifts at Raiders home games, all in return for a lump sum of $1,250 at the conclusion of the season.

While hopefully the Saints have a better environment for their cheerleaders than the Raiders, Kriste Lewis is kidding herself if she thinks that this could somehow benefit her family with some “extra pay”.

It simply will not happen.

In all likeliness, it will add more stress to her husband. He will have to finance her upfront costs out of his own pocket (none of the articles have made mention of how much she previously made, if she worked at all), and will have to deal with either additional childcare costs in the form of daycare, or putting in those hours himself.

Meanwhile, mommy will be too busy dancing half naked in front of leering men, posing in her bathing suit for a cameraman, and participating in what will likely be mandatory “team bonding” sleepovers, much like the Raider cheerleader had to.

> Before the 2013 season kicked off, the women were also required to drive up to Napa to participate in a Raiderettes minicamp, and during the season, the squad went away for its annual swimsuit calendar shoot. Lacy drove up to Napa, posed all day in a royal-blue bikini at a cold winery and was forced to stick around for a sleepover.

Though Lewis has been continuously praised in the media for her courage to tryout with her younger peers and for her battle with kidney disease, she should be shamed for terrible priorities. She should be keeping fit and exercising consistently for her health and family, but she can do that without being nearly naked, holding pom-poms, and shaking her ass in front of the Superdome crowd.

Read More: Has Female Attention Whoring Finally Reached Its Peak?

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Have We Reached Peak Narcissism With The “Selfie Stick”?

July 17, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Get ready for the next level of attention whoring; the selfie stick.

Yup, it’s what you think it is. A giant stick so you can take selfies without talking to a stranger. ROK founder RooshV explains:

> You may be wondering “Why don’t they just ask someone to take a picture of them?” Two reasons why:
>
> 1. That would require communication with a stranger. The situation could get creepy/awkward/weird/uncomfortable.
>
> 2. The stranger would only take one picture. A selfie stick allows you to take an infinite amount so you can pick the best photo for your facebook/tinder that actually looks very little like you on a normal day.

American social skills have devolved so much asking a stranger to take your picture is awkward.

The selfie stick reveals how social values have changed. Taking pictures used to be a social occasion. You took pictures because you wanted to commemorate a great time you had with friends—a wedding, a family reunion, a great party, a stunning vacation, etc. Now pictures are something you use to get friends by projecting an interesting life through social media.

This is how social media isolates us. While a timeline full of perfectly framed selfies might look better than the candid photo your buddy snaps, it isn't the same social experience. Asking your friends to take a picture means having a shared experience, whereas taking a selfie requires self-conscious focus. Instead of enjoying the moment, you're thinking "will this look good on Instagram?"

The selfie stick is a new level in shameless attention whoring, and it's already creating backlash against it. Forbes reports:

> The selfie-stick-takers on the other hand cannot be surreptitious. Their stick is a loud (and proud) declaration of self-portraiture. No covert selfies for them. Putting a smartphone on the end of a stick says, “I’m not ashamed that I want this photo of myself.” Those taking photos of the person holding the stick are saying, “Well, you should be.”

Public attention whoring should be shamed, or even better, ignored. If you see someone using a selfie stick in public ask them, “Don’t you have any friends? Why don’t you ask someone to take your picture?” Don’t like, repost, or share others attempts at attention whoring. If someone isn’t adding value beyond “hey, look at me” they don’t deserve an audience.

The selfie stick could be a fad, but it could also become so common no one comments when someone pulls one out. The selfie stick is already popular all over Asia, where social degeneration is a couple years ahead of America. Vendors in the United States report selling out of selfie sticks, and the GoPro-Edition telescopic monopod is currently the 49th most popular item in the Amazon camera store.

The selfie stick represents the beginning of peak narcissism, because is shows that Americans are willing to look absurd in real life and ruin actual experiences to look better in the digital world. The only way Americans could look more absurd is if they put motion capture dots on their face, so they could digitally replace themselves in videos with a more attractive digital stunt double.

Rather than actually having friends who will take a good photo, the users of the selfie stick have surrendered reality to a false image where it looks like they have friends who will take a good photo. Advertising for the selfie stick reveals how Americans have become divorced from their real needs. Since when is attention whoring an evolutionary goal?

Before the ubiquity of cell phones, a technically skilled member of most social groups would naturally take on the role of photographer. He or she would snap pictures, direct friends, and document events so everyone else could just enjoy themselves and be present in the moment.

If you're ambitious, learn photography. Camera game has been a popular topic on the RVF forum. Asking a girl to take her picture can be a great opener. You don't even have to be a pro—just tell her you're studying photography, or starting a photoblog, and thought she'd make a good subject. Many attractive women have multiple social media accounts and maybe even a model mayhem profile she'd love good photos for. Direct her a bit, and exchange info so you can send her the pics or meetup later.

Instead of buying into the culture of attention whoring, remember that photography can be a social experience rather than an isolating one. If you really want a photo of yourself, try talking to another human being and asking them to help you. Or even better, do something interesting enough that someone other than you would want to photograph it.

Read More: Women Fight For Attention On Facebook Like They're In A War

Eric Crowley

Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

Top 10 Pictures From The Growing “Women Against Feminism” Movement

July 18, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Anger at feminism has reached an important stage: women are now gathering and sharing photos about their disgust against the feminist movement. While their cause is still in the primodial stage, this is nothing short of a severe slap in the face of feminism since their “default” victims are human beings with a vagina. Finally, girls are waking up and realizing that feminism is not making them happier. They are now seeking out more traditional ways of life where their feminine side is nurtured instead of obliterated. I took some time to go through the Women Against Feminist blog (and Facebook page) to highlight their ten best contributions.

1. Girls want to be girls

2. Girls want to cook for their man

3. Girls don’t like a judgemental movement

4. Girls like Mr. Snuffleupagus

5. Girls know feminism is not what it’s claimed to be

6. Girls don't want to feel superior to men

7. Girls believe in sex roles

8. Girls like having long hair

9. Girls don’t want to be victims

10. Girls from Poland are pretty

While it’s safe to be skeptical of this new movement since it will undoubtedly benefit women first under the “equality” banner, it’s important to note that mainstream feminism, for all its gains, has failed to win the hearts and minds of its primary target. Considering such female protest didn’t even exist a couple years ago, I see it as a great step forward to educating the public that feminism is not the answer. Irrelevancy appears to be its next stop, hopefully within our lifetimes.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: The Equality Movement Is Allowing Women To Tyrannize Men

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

European Union Has Declared That Fat People Can Be Considered “Disabled”

July 18, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Apparently being extremely fat may now qualify you as disabled. This notion arose after a series of recent events surrounding Karsten Kaltoft. Kaltoft, a Danish child-minder, was fired from his job on a local city council. He’s arguing that his immense size was part of the reason that he was let go, and he thinks that this represents some type of unfair discrimination.

He believes that because his extreme obesity prevented him from efficiently performing his work duties, he qualifies as disabled. And following this logic, it was illegal to fire him, because a European Union law exists that prevents employers from discriminating against employees based on any disabilities that they may have.

Following up on his claims, the Court of Justice of the European Union was asked to make a ruling on the matter.

> But Niilo Jaaskinen, the advocate general, did conclude that extreme obesity, classified as having a body mass index (BMI) of more than 40, could be considered a disability:
>
> “If obesity has reached such a degree that it plainly hinders participation in professional life, then this can be a disability,” Jaaskinen said.

While no official ruling has been made, the EU effectively just told employers they have to give special treatment to their fat employees, the same they would go to someone with autism, cancer, dementia, or blindness. If this seems wrong or backwards to you, that's because it is. But rather than getting into fat shaming and going on a health rant, I'm going to break down the two larger issues that I think are at stake–two trends of modern society that are promoting weakness and depression.

1. Not taking responsibility

Aside from the rare case of severe metabolic illnesses, people get fat because they eat too much food. They consume far more energy than their body needs, and they start to pack on the pounds.

Unless someone force feeds you through a tube, you're the only one to blame. And now you want special treatment because you ate yourself so fat that you can't move around the office without tripping on the printer cable? How about focusing on eating less and exercising a little bit so you can enjoy life and live longer?

But no, people flee from taking responsibility like it's a tsunami coming to destroy their home. Whether it's being fat, being late, making a mistake, or just being an asshole people tend to do everything they can to make sure someone else takes the fall. People are so insecure that the thought of stepping up and admitting that they've done something negative scares the shit out of them. They'd rather point the finger, pass the blame, and hide.

2. Lacking self discipline

Taking the blame for eating all of the McDonald's you ate to get you to 300 pounds is one thing. Having the self discipline to eat less, now or in the first place, is a different story, but still one that's demonstrative of our lazy, pleasure seeking society as a whole.

Yes, Ben & Jerry's is fucking delicious. And yes, it feels good to wank one out to some big titty pornstar. And yes, taking a nap sounds better than banging out a few hours of hard work. And yes, smoking a joint and hitting the sack is easier than heading out and approaching cute girls.

BUT WHAT'S MORE IMPORTANT FOR YOUR GROWTH AND WELL-BEING?

The answer to all of these questions is so obvious you'd have to be seriously disabled to miss the point. Doing what you know you should do, or abstaining from doing what you know you shouldn't do usually isn't the easy or most appealing option. But it is the option that, when chosen consistently, will lead you to greatness.

So yes, it's stupid that the EU Court may rule that being severely obese is a disability that grants you immunity it the workplace, but it's even more frightening that a governing body is encouraging the backwards ideals of not taking responsibility and not possessing an ounce of self discipline.

Read More: The Biggest Mistake A Man Can Make

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

The Flood Of Female Hypocrisy Following The Magaluf 24-Man Blowjob Incident

July 19, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

Earlier this month, footage of an Irish girl performing sex acts on 24 men in quick succession on holiday in Magaluf, Spain shocked and rocked the UK – for about 24 hours. The nsfw video sparked a comical, hypocritical-at-times debate and mud-slinging match as to what was responsible for the 'depravity'.

Background

Magaluf is a purpose built resort in Majorca popular with Britons as a stag-weekend or package-holiday destination for visitors looking for sun, sea and sex (although not necessarily in that order).

Initially thought to be an act performed in return for a free drink, the girl in question, reportedly from a strict religious family in Northern Ireland, was filmed performing oral sex on 24 men in a nightclub in return for winning a 'holiday' – which turned out to be the name of a £3 (or a £4) cocktail instead. The video footage, which lasts about two and half minutes, shows the girl moving from one man to another as music blares in the background. She encourages the men to pull their trousers down as a crowd of drunken revelers cheer her on. The disturbing footage was taken following a 12-hour drinking session organized by Carnage Magaluf. According to some witnesses, the girl returned to repeat her antics later, while the video went viral on Twitter and Facebook after being widely shared by the huge number of British tourists on holiday in Spain this summer. At the time of writing this, investigations were still going on about the incident.

The comical fallout: "Disinfect your mouth", and "Why does it matter?"

Nevertheless, the video sparked outrage in both Spain and the UK as soon as it became viral – which has made the girl presently go underground.

The public opinion was polarized about the incident–especially among women–which often sounded at times more like the pot calling the kettle black. Notable opinions came from Nicole Scherzinger, who even asked the girl 'to disinfect her mouth':

> "Child, you better get on your knees and pray – after you disinfect your mouth.
>
> "You better find God and ask for forgiveness. I'll give her a drink, a smack in the head. You're talking to a girl who grew up in a Catholic family, my grandfather is a priest, my mum taught me strong morals."
>
> "I think it's degrading, it's sad, it's disgusting and it's why guys be talking about 'bitches and hoes' and all these things. I cannot stand any of that."

Raises an eyebrow

Whereas Apprentice Star Luisa Zissman came to the defense of the teenage girl, and said that the video was "just the unlucky one that went viral". And so did feminists.

Her opinion:

> "So what if she goes around crawling on her knees offering it to everyone and anyone that wants it, why does it matter?"
>
> "Don't get me wrong, I'm not saying I agree with what the girl did, but I do think we need to cut her some slack.
>
> "You can look at it two ways; she's young, dumb, drunk and made mistakes, or she's an 18-year-old WOMAN who has every right to do what she wants with her body."

She also added that the girl was no "slag" or "slut", adding: "I'm sure she'll never give anyone oral sex ever again, so her numbers will average out eventually, but why do we all care that much?"

At the same time asking why the men who took part in the 'debauchery', weren't put to shame the way the girl was. (Of course. Men, the perennial culprits.)

Zissman's comments however drew outrage from women who called her out for her 'bad mothering'.

At the same time, the usual white-knighting debates about sexploitative games in return of free drinks (reportedly called 'mamading') of 'innocent' but drunken women tourists on vacations to Magaluf, and whether clubs there should be closed down where such activities supposedly occur, ensued. Who's forcing these women to visit Magaluf , or why are women indulging in mamading in the first place? Is Magaluf as a place, responsible for this depravity? Don't such incidents, or even worse, occur elsewhere in modern societies – sometimes daily? For example, what happens in drunken college sex parties in the West?

Meanwhile, the boss of Carnage Magaluf defiantly refused to apologize, and said that the girl was not forced to indulge in this act of debauchery.

> "I wasn't the one who forced her to get to the floor. I'm not going to apologise to her family, I'm sorry. I've no moral responsibility for this. I wasn't even fully aware of it at the time.

Debate also arose about the questionable behavior of Magaluf tourists. Someone or something had to be blamed for the girl's 'sluttiness' in this incident, as none accepted accountability for the incident. The fallout raised questions about modern female accountability for personal behavior – while exposing hypocritical paradigms about sluttiness, selective slut shaming and slut acceptance, and societal exoneration of such behavior to push the blame onto other factors.

"Slutty" – a female influenced ambiguous definition

According to this definition:

> Slutty (adjective): having loose sexual morals
>
> Examples:
>
> – you might be taken more seriously if you didn't wear that slutty outfit
>
> -a TV reality show that appears to be nothing more than an endless celebration of a household of slutty alcoholics>
>
> Synonyms: skanky [slang], slatternly, sluttish, slutty, trampy
>
> Related Words: whorish; indecent, lascivious, lewd, wanton; indecorous, unbecoming; corrupt, debased, debauched, degenerate, depraved, dissolute, libertine, perverted, reprobate

However, I find it amusing to note how modern women define the terms 'slutty' and 'sexy'. More often than not, the thin line between the two is played around by modern women, depending on theirs as well as modern societies' arbitrary interpretations and selective application of these two adjectives.

Are these, 'slutty' or 'sexy' gestures and outfits? What would you call the below?

Sexy, or slutty?

I guess the pic below is 'non slutty' – even if it may appear to be Scherzinger herself was convinced last year that she was too "classy" to compete for a Grammy or an Oscar, and she believed her 'good' girl image prevented her from reaching a high level of success.

According to this article, she said:

> "I come from the most religious family. My grandfather is a priest.
>
> "And if they support me in all this, and they do, then I'm OK. I'm being sassy and classy, I'm having fun.
>
> "I'm not coming from a dark place. To be honest with you, I sometimes wish I were more slutty. I'd probably be more successful if I were.
>
> "This is such a tough industry. To make it, you have to sell your soul to the devil. That's probably why I haven't quite reached the top of my mountain.
>
> "I mean, where's my Tony Award, my Grammy, my Oscar? Why don't I have any of those things yet?"

I wonder: how can a 'good' girl, be 'more slutty' – without being slutty at first? And if she becomes slutty, does she remain 'good'? And what must one do to become 'more slutty'?

Confused

From what I understood, cockteasing in modern societies, either through seductive gesture or slutty attire, is still not slutty, as long as it does not involve sexual contact . A 'religious' girl could indulge in relentless cockteasing behavior and still be a 'good' girl as long as if she's probably a virgin or she simply doesn't put out for sex. Modern women can exhibit all these traits to be safely called as 'sexy', instead of the derogatory 'slutty'. Modern men will have gradually accepted and adapted to that—we've known, seen, and are seeing this all along. The question remains: how more will modern women continue to play around with or push those boundaries?

This sounds similar to the description of the male-baiting termagant feminist, what Chinweizu mentions in the Anatomy of Female Power, which I highlighted in an earlier article. She dresses 'sexy' (or slutty) but expects men not to perceive her sexually. In this context of 'slutty', you could also interpret her as a 'good' girl who may dress 'slutty' , bait you with sexually suggestive gestures but expects you not to call her a slut, as she doesn't put out.

More hypocrisy: a parody of the term 'religious'

This stirs up another question: who or what is a 'religious' girl?

The girl in the incident came from a strict 'religious' background, which however didn't stop her from indulging in 'sin' – whether out of own failure to deal with sexual frustration (or repression), weak faith, or the twisted modern interpretation of female virginity which could've possibly influenced her behavior. A number of 'religious' women and young girls today indulge in copious premarital anal or oral sex to safeguard their 'technical' virginities, because of wanting to 'save' themselves for marriage, yet seek these alternative ways for release from sexual frustration.

Even pornstars could be or are 'religious'. Read "I'm a Porn Star, and I Believe in God", or "Porn Stars More Religious, Have Higher Self-Esteem Than Other Women".

Flummoxing. "Who's a 'good girl'? Who's a slutty girl? Who's a 'sexy' girl? Who's a 'religious' girl?"

The lines between them are getting blurred as ever, especially when modern women and societies start defining them.

Call it anything, BUT SLUTTY

So what is to blame?

All said and done, other questions also arise after the comical fallout of this story:

- Why did the girl originally travel to Magaluf, a supposedly well known 'sex' destination, in spite of her 'strictly religious' background?
- Why did she go to a pub that is famous for being a place where women were being 'bullied' into sex acts?
- Why did she indulge in the sex acts voluntarily?
- If she did them willingly, why are her parents being blamed for her actions?
- Why did she return next day to the club to repeat her antics, as per witnesses?
- Is she a solitary exception, or are there women from her culture behaving much worse at this very moment elsewhere, or in Magaluf presently?
- Why the fuck are non-locals debating about what should happen or not in Magaluf?
- Mamading: why do 'innocent' female tourists there whore themselves (or their mouths) for free drinks, even if supposedly being 'encouraged' by others? Are these women child-like (easily led or influenced with no mind of their own), or do they have self control or self esteem issues?
- Do regular Magaluf visitors behave better when they travel elsewhere to other party hotspots, e.g. Ibiza, Thailand, Latin America, Caribbean, etc?
- Will shaming the girl discourage women from behaving like her in the future, or instead negatively encourage more narcissistic women to follow suit, in a world where sex selfies and self made amateur porn are increasingly becoming popular?
- How would this story affect the girl's future, and girls who'd behave like her?

- Despite all the present public shaming, would this girl still not get a man someday?
- How long will this story remain in public memory, and affect female behavior? Do we really fucking care, when our societies itself promote female whoredom, sluttiness and slut acceptance in the name of modernism?

Luisa Zissman's statement, about how this girl's numbers would average out eventually, sounds distasteful to accept, but does bear some truth. Zissman correctly estimates that with time, this incident would indeed be erased from public memory of the callous societies we live in today. This girl, presently underground, would then be accepted back in the hypocritical world which is shaming her now, and she might even then become a mini-celebrity among the breed of slutty women rapidly being produced today by that very world. Who knows she might even be offered a shot at porn someday. And still have some guy wanting to wife her up then, in spite of this 'inglorious' incident.

'Proud to be a Slut'

Our complacent modern societies are where women titillate, or could even urinate, defecate, and fornicate in public. Women could take sex selfies , make amateur porn and broadcast it on social networks, waiting for likes from anonymous viewers to ego-stroke their never-ending female narcissism. Our societies are where female pornstars claim to love God and some even wear crosses dangling down their bodies while getting sexually spit-roasted on screen, whereas in real life whores and used up sluts are wifed up by modern thirsty men. Women are encouraged to be as slutty or 'sexy' as possible, female virginity is both shamed and practiced with a twisted definition, whereas sluttiness is celebrated in semi-nude slutwalks.

TABA
SLUTWALK
AMSTERDAM

IT'S A DRESS NOT A YES
#JUSTICE
STOP ALL HATE CRIMES
SLUTWALK
LONDON
BECAUSE WE'VE HAD ENOUGH!

And a number of men don't care (not that they could do something about it). Hell, some even encourage it.

Cock-teasing men and male baiting is considered sexy and acceptable, while dressing 'slutty' is not slutty, often due to feminist influenced modern social opinion.

Welcome to the mind-boggling hypocrisies of 21st century modern feminist women and societies.

Considering these paradigms, so what if this one anonymous girl's a 'slut', when our dysfunctional societies actually promote and produce millions of similar, if not worse sluts today with these very dysfunctional social paradigms? Don't misunderstand me: I'm not defending her at all—she isn't a victim as she returned the next day to resume her antics as per witnesses, but I'm amused at holier-than-thou women criticizing her for her sluttiness, for some of them could very well be exhibiting slut-like behavior themselves while overlooking the dysfunctional social paradigm which breeds such behavior. Modern women would rather do away with, shame or even defend one anonymous slut, but never tackle the social system which produces hundreds of her kind. As long as that slut producing system isn't tackled, you'd find such incidents in the future again.

Hypocrisy breeds degeneration

Zissman's statement about the girl being 'unlucky' for the video going viral is indeed the callous but damnable truth about the hypocritical nature of modern societies today. She's right in her estimation again because she knows (as all know) that people are indeed making a mountain out of a molehill with their 'outrage', only because the video went viral. Had the girl not been filmed, the incident would've been shrugged off and forgotten from the memories of the onlookers, and been unknown to the world. Despite the outrage, people will indeed forget this incident with time, and women will continue to emulate this girl elsewhere, both in public or private considering the permissive and slut-accepting times we live in.

Considering the present internet rage of sex selfies, I wonder what would've been the public or social reaction had she tweeted pics of herself blowing those men. Instead of the ridicule she's facing now, she would've probably received acceptance and likes. Her 'blunder' could've been that she was inebriated to get caught on video, whereas there could be possibly women slutting it out in Magaluf, even worse than her, at this very moment that you're reading this article. Such is the hypocrisy we see today in our modern societies.

And realistically speaking, the hypocritical publicized outrage about this incident won't change existing social mores about modern female sluttiness, but possibly even promote more travel to Magaluf for more narcissistic and slutty modern women would instead be intrigued by this incident to try out their chances at slut fame there. If the video was tweeted to make it viral to shame her as an individual, it's achieved its purpose, at least for now. To shame sluthood wholly, there'd have to be hundreds of individual viral videos flying all around, as well an existing degree of some personal shame within those 'sluts' to actually feel ashamed for their sluttiness. With this girl there was; that's why she's probably underground. But with hardcore seasoned sluts, you might as well forget about that. Shaming them would achieve the opposite.

This incident, and many more unreported incidents like these, are the result of a dysfunctional social paradigm which has taken decades to mature and bear its rotten fruit today, and which must be dismantled instead. There could be, and are hundreds like this girl who emulate her daily in seedy clubs, public places, back alleys, university corridors, sororities, frat parties, offices, cars or behind closed doors at the very moment you're reading this article, yet those women wouldn't come in to the limelight simply because they're not being filmed to go viral. And even if these women were, the worst possibility is that they'd become mini-celebrities eventually on account of that exposure, in the slut-celebrating modern societies today.

The hypocrisy of modern societies is that they always need someone or something to blame, so as to exonerate modern female behavior—either a tourist spot, career, religion, nationality, money, fame, age group, family, or the usual and perennial scapegoat of them all—men. There must be a scapegoat to pin the blame on for modern women to escape responsibility and the consequences for their actions. Modern women thus face negligible to no consequences for their actions, even if the 'outrage' is temporary. The actual culprit is the dysfunctional social paradigm which promotes this to create such women. A single slut is just the tip of the iceberg, there are hundreds of sluts being spawned and bred in such societies, and it is the dysfunctional societal paradigms there which must be shamed.

We say that consistency is masculine, because consistency is against indiscipline and complacency. But the only thing consistent about slut condoning and producing modern feminist societies are their 'consistency' to be complacent yet hypocritical about modern female 'sluttiness', by actually producing more of them, while superficially shaming them, as seen in this girl's case or more.

The state of modern societies and culture?

Disgust is the only emotion which one can feel for the girl's actions, but also to the superficial 'prudish' hypocrisy of the same societies which are shaming her presently and are ironically producing and promoting more clones of her globally every day. Instead of asking this girl to 'disinfect' her mouth (which would do nothing to disinfect her character – and probably worsen it out of the negative publicity), it's time modern societies looked within and disinfect themselves from their own self created dysfunctional scourges of female hypocrisy, sluttiness and superficial shaming. The wall is softer than we think for women—even sluts—in our hypocritical societies today.

Read More: ‘Kirill Was Here’ Exposes The Hypocrisy Of Feminism

Oscar Zach

Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Cheryl Cole’s Whirlwind Marriage Proves A Man’s Game Beats Money And Looks

July 19, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

The British media has this week been buzzing with speculation over the recent and unexpected wedding in Mustique between pop star and X-Factor judge Cheryl Cole and French playboy Jean-Bernard Fernandez-Versini.

In case you don’t know, Cheryl was the hot(est) member of Girls Aloud, who first came to prominence in 2002. Here’s a picture of the band—Cheryl is in the center at the front.

Cheryl has been a major sex symbol in the UK since she first rose to fame. Here’s another shot of her from back in the day:

Cheryl’s personal life has not been without its traumas. In 2006 she married England footballer Ashley Cole (changing her name to his from Tweedy), but they divorced four years later amid allegations of his infidelity. Her solo career, never reaching the stellar heights of Girls Aloud, has faltered. She was also unceremoniously dropped from the judging panel of US X-Factor by Simon Cowell in 2011 after having been a judge on the UK version for several years. She then got this somewhat flamboyant tattoo on her ass:

And now her wedding to Fernandez-Versini after a mere six months of dating. Here's a picture of Cole with her new husband:

Who is Jean-Bernard Fernandez-Versini?

The information available online on Fernandez-Versini is relatively sparse. He doesn't even have a Twitter account, but reports on his are consistent in their use of the word 'playboy'. Certainly, he is not thought to be rich. The Daily Record says:

> He previously preferred a "playboy, jet-set lifestyle", living in New York one month, then Los Angeles and Cannes the next.
>
> One waitress [he worked with at the pop-up Cosy Bar in Cannes] says: "He loves acting the millionaire playboy. But he's not a millionaire. He just loves the lifestyle, hanging out with actors and beautiful people, drinking champagne and good wine.

> “He’s constantly on holiday and goes quite a lot to St Barts in the Caribbean. I’ve heard he has some relatives on the island.”
>
> Speaking of his friend’s background, Franck explains: “His family home is in the countryside, in Aix-en-Provence. His family are not super-rich but they have some money. I wouldn’t say they’re multi-millionaires like Cheryl. Nothing like that.
>
> “His father works in the construction industry.”
>
> And unlike his father, who did not attend the wedding, it appears that socialite Jean-Bernard has never held down a steady job.
>
> Franck says: “In all the time I’ve known him, the only job I’ve ever known him having is at Cosy Box for two weeks a year. He is now going to live with Cheryl in London for a while. I’ve spoken to him in the past about expanding the bar to London and New York, into a chain.”
>
> The on-off state of Jean-Bernard’s employment raises questions over who paid for Cheryl’s £300,000 engagement ring and wedding band.

Elsewhere the report mentions Fernandez-Versini hanging out with the likes of the Rolling Stones, Ryan Gosling and Benicio Del Toro. It would appear that he is a man with significant social cachet (translation: game), then, perhaps only lacking the cash to back it up.

But money will no longer be a problem for him. Reports suggest that Cheryl doesn’t want him to work and that her £16m fortune will ensure that he doesn’t have to. Furthermore, so besotted is she with him that she has apparently agreed to forego signing a pre-nup (although she didn’t sign one with Ashley Cole either).

Provisioning Game Is Dead

I believe that Cheryl’s marriage proves something that the manosphere has been saying for a while: that provisioning game is now dead, or at least in its death throes.

It would be churlish to suggest that Cheryl is coming close to the wall: clearly she is still an extremely attractive woman:

Nevertheless, at 31 years old, she is aware that her days are becoming numbered as far as settling down are concerned. With her beauty and her wealth she could no doubt obtain the affections of pretty much any man she wanted—a billionaire mogul or international financier for example. Instead, she has chosen to tether herself to a man who appears, outwardly at least, to be a rather feckless dilettante.

So is it Fernandez-Versini’s looks?

No doubt he cuts an elegant enough figure on the French Riviera, and he is certainly tall, but I'm not sure it would be accurate to describe Fernandez-Versini as conventionally handsome—certainly not in a Ryan Gosling, Brad Pitt way, anyway.

So what is it about him that has enabled him to hit the jackpot: winning not only the love of a beautiful woman coveted by millions, but also a share in her considerable fortune? And what relevance does that have for the rest of us?

Simply this: Fernandez-Versini is a man with game. Sufficient game to befriend A-list stars and spend most of his time partying and not bothering with boring beta-tudes like a sensible job with a pension plan. Cheryl's marriage demonstrates that, given total free will, this—above all else—is what women want from men in 2014.

Granted, most women are not in the fortunate position in which Cheryl finds herself. But increasingly, through their remuneration in the corporate world, cash-and-prizes divorce, alimony payments and other advantages, they are not reliant on men for their livelihoods. Strip away this reliance, and their desire for a man able to support them financially diminishes considerably.

Looks too, would appear to be secondary—after all, it wouldn't have been hard for Cheryl to have snared a male-model type had she so desired.

Want to find out how to up your game and attract beautiful women? Click here.

Read More: The Synergy Of Game And Money

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Should Michael Sam Be Celebrated For Being Gay?

July 20, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Michael Sam and boyfriend Vito Cammisano at the ESPYs. - Jayne Kamin-Oncea-USA TODAY Sports

At the 2014 ESPY's, Michael Sam received the Arthur Ashe Courage Award. What did Michael Sam do to earn this prestigious award? Did he overcome shredding the ACL's in both his knees and go on to compete at Wimbledon? Did he overcome stomach cancer and return to the Yankees? Did he escape poverty in a rural Madagascar and become the starting quarterback for the Jacksonville Jaguars? No, he did none of those things. He received the award simply for being gay.

He gave a tearful acceptance speech, in which he spoke highly of his own bravery. The bravery of a being gay man in a homophobic society. He cited how much love and support has come his way since he decided to out himself in the lead-up to the NFL Combine. He invoked the banal quote of Arthur Ashe, "Start where you are, use what you have and do what you can," to explain his internal struggle over his desire for his own flesh.

It is beyond apparent that with the Richie Incognito debacle and now with Michael Sam, these stories are given the light of day to pierce the veil of male locker rooms. Female reporters have been pushing for decades to enter the place where men shower and dress and the fawning over Michael Sam is part of this drive. The preoccupation with his gayness and his teammates acceptance of that is a way of claiming control over male-only spaces. Female empowerment, stopping bullying and gay acceptance are all part of the same push to eradicate privacy and gave media even more control over the sporting world.

Those considerations aside, more troublesome is that hasn't caught any hate or intolerance for being gay and ESPN passed on a more deserving man. Michael Sam said that his teammates accepted him, his coaches accepted him and he wasn't subjected to verbal or physical assault. Most importantly, his parents accepted him and said they love him regardless. The story seems to be how much everybody loves Michael Sam. No one called him a fag and kicked him in the ballsack. He has suffered nothing for slashing swords with other dudes and, yet, I'm supposed to see him as this oppressed and brave man?

If anything, he has gained immensely from being gay. He is easily the most famous 7th-round draft ever who has never stepped onto the playing field. He most likely will get a book deal, will get numerous endorsement deals if he makes the Rams and will always be able to count on a team picking him up for politically correct reasons for the next couple years. Just by being born gay, he has already gained so much. He said himself he is surrounded by love and acceptance and given all the unearned privileges he has gotten from being gay, this man is not brave at all. He most likely has the inner steel of an insecure preschooler.

Yet, that isn't the most offensive aspect of this public spectacle. ESPN anchor, Stuart Scott, has been battling cancer since 2007. Despite this, he has continued to work hard and has proven to be one of the best anchors on ESPN. He has made no excuses for himself and has comported himself like a true man: battling on despite the odds. In fact, Scott was unsure of his ability to attend this year's ESPY's because of the surgeries had earlier in the week.

Despite his clear acts of bravery, ESPN chose to hand the award to a mollycoddled homosexual 7th round draft pick. While ESPN did recognize Scott with an award, the ESPY's clearly revolved around Sam and his power bottom boyfriend. Onlookers were supposed to awed with a gay man "bravely" coming out in 2014, when he knew everybody in his life approved and he had to know that he would valorized and praised in major media outlets for sucking dick. They passed on giving the bravery award to a man who has battled cancer for over half a decade and has done nothing but accept it and continue to work hard has a father, a husband and a working man.

Read Next: Why Michael Sam Will Get What He Deserves

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

The Reason Most Men Are Impotent And Depressed

July 20, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

How many guys do you know that read pickup or game related material yet don't do a single approach? How many people do you know that want to be entrepreneurs yet work a regular 9-5 and haven't even tried to start a side venture? Better yet, how many people do you know who want to lose weight yet still eat Big Macs and Ben & Jerry's every day?

The one thing that all these people share in common is that they're living incongruent lives. They aren't living lives that reflect their values. They aren't actually doing the thing that they've shown clear interest and intent on achieving.

Continuing like this will obviously prevent them from realizing their goals. Worse yet, it will tear them apart inside and lead to further decline across their life. When you decide you'd really like to do something but never even try, this incongruency will eat away at your emotions, will power, and general well being. This happens because you're being a bitch… and you know it.

I. What do you value?

The first step to living a fulfilling life is identifying your values. This doesn't mean extremely specific goals like "in 2 years I will have slept with 100 women" or "in 6 months I will have lost 25 pounds". No, this means picking general overarching themes that will guide your specific actions.

For me this means things like expanding my comfort zone, learning, building a strong and healthy body, creating new things, and enjoying regular sex.

Without identifying themes that you value, how will you ever know what you should spend your time doing?

II. What are you doing about it?

The next logical step is to put your values into practice. There are millions of ways to do this, and all that matters is that you choose a couple. I'll use my values as an example.

1. Expanding my comfort zone

Aside from taking every new opportunity that presents itself to me, I incorporate this value into my life by simply approaching a few cute girls a day. If I see a girl who strikes me as particularly attractive, I go over and tell her so, and then try and set up a date.

2. Learning

I read books.

3. Building a strong body

Every day I lift weights, ride my bike, or play some basketball.

4. Creating new things

Regardless of what my "real job" happens to be, I should always be pursuing a new mission, whether that's writing a book, a blog post, or creating a new product.

5. Enjoying regular sex

Luckily step 1 feeds directly into this. I incorporate this value by following up with all my leads from step 1.

III. Now do it every single fucking day

Fuck a todo list. If at the end of the day you can look yourself in the mirror and honestly say that you did X, Y, and Z and that those things are in line with the values you've chosen to live by, then you're golden. You know that you're being congruent in your beliefs, thoughts, and actions, all of which are moving you in the right direction. Fail to actually do things that reflect your values and you're just another one of the blind sheep who's destined to end up miserable.

If you enjoyed this article, you may be interested my new online bootcamp 28 Days To Alpha. Click here for more info.

Read More: How To Grow In Times Of Pain

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

The Marriage Paradigm

July 20, 2014 | by YeahJeets | Link | Original Link

Meet Mark: A tall, dark haired 32 year old accountant working for a small firm in rural New York. His sharp nose and dark complexion reveal his Sicilian lineage, and an onlooker would consider him to be an attractive high status male. His day comprises of tax audits, caffeine, and making serious faces at his computer screen when his boss walks by. He is a book-smart guy, and had always succeeded in math throughout high school and college. His GPA floated around the meaty part of the bell curve, mainly due to his natural understanding and performance with numbers. He is an accountant by trade, as was his father, and his father before that. His career choice was inevitable; as it was forced upon him at an early age. Any remnants of physically appealing physique are courtesy of his old college lacrosse days. Mark's body is nowhere what it used to be, as he hasn't needed to impress any other females in years. He plans on working out again, but he values his time spent at home more than time spent at the gym.

As he pokes his ahead above his computer monitor, pre-maturely dark skies and streetlights began to fill the horizon. Much to his enlightenment, 5 o'clock came early today. With a sigh of relief, he finishes his coffee, and shuts down his computer. He smiles as he packs up his stuff, as the thought of playing with his two children always fills him with a joyful warmth.

Mark swings his suit-jacket over his shoulders, and walks out the door to his sedan. He starts the car, defogs the windows, and drives through the winter weather. A small crucifix dangles from the mirror in hypnotic fashion.

A hot new intern enrolled with his firm today. She was a 21 year old blonde southern belle from Texas A&M that had just recently earned her undergrad diploma. She is strikingly gorgeous with long tanned legs and blue eyes. Mark had chatted with her at lunch time about the size of her old school and her future goals. He recollects her gazing down to his left hand and noticing a gold marriage band, and then regaining eye contact without haste. Her eyes subconsciously revealed a look of disappointment; it is a look that he has seen in many women throughout his married years.

Mark does his best to push her southern charm from his mind.

He arrives home, and puts the car in park. He is no longer moving, yet still has both hands on the wheel. He pauses, and exhales deeply before entering his suburban home. As soon as he enters, he is quickly greeted by hugs from his 4 year old son and 6 year old daughter.

"Daddy!" the kids yell.

He kneels down and smiles as he ruffles their hair. The smell of gravy and mashed potatoes fill the warm air.

"Honey you're home!" His wife calls out to him, as she walks over to give him a kiss.

Mark had met his wife Lisa after graduation at a friend's New Year's party. Unbeknownst to him, she was on his university's dance team for all four years, and they had never crossed paths.

Mark was 25, and in his physical prime. His career was on the rise, and his love life was never dull. He had been with 29 women before wedlock, and all of them were high quality. He didn't need to settle. But her tight body, strong family values and caring nature drove him into monogamy.

The heat of her oven mitts greets his lower back. Mark is instantly filled with joy as he hugs his wife; and gives her a little pat on the butt.

He drops his briefcase, rests his coat and scarf on the staircase and takes a seat on the couch. The Giants game has already been turned on.

"Ah hell" he yells as he stretches out and cracks his toes.

"We're getting spanked by the Bears."

"Daaaaa Bears," his little boy echoes.

His wife walks over to him with a freshly cracked beer, and mentions how dumb Eli Manning looks all the time. Mark grins and nods in agreement, and notices that his wife is starting to get a little thick in the thighs and waist. He tries not to think about it. He focuses his attention back on the TV quickly to be interrupted by both children scurrying across his view. His son is pushing his red Tonka truck around the hardwood floor with both hands. And his daughter is doing her best to catch her brother, but the feet of her pajamas have very little grip, so she continuously slips on the hardwood floor.

As halftime arrives, Mark rounds up the kids, and puts them to bed to the best of his ability.

“Tell us a story first Daddy!” the kids yell in harmony. He knew this was coming, as his daily routine did not often vary.

“A story and a treat!” His little girl Anna says.

“No. It’s bed time” He says harshly. “But Daddy!” she replies, visibly upset.

“Do you remember the big girl we saw at the store the other day?”

Anna slowly nods in agreement, with her arms crossed, and tiny chin greeting her chest.

“Her daddy gave her treats all the time, so many treats that her belly got so big that she can’t even see her own feet! Do you want to look like that girl?”

“Noooooooo!” she says facetiously

“Then no treats for you. But I promise this Sunday we will go to Dairy Queen and get a cone bigger than your head.”

“But daddy I can’t eat that much!” She says giggling

“You and your brother can share, now come upstairs and I’ll read you a story.”

Mark does what he always does, and reaches into the drawer to grab the usual, Mortimer by Robert Munsch. The story is just long enough that they fall asleep before the ending.

He slowly closes the book, tucks in the kids, and turns off the light. The hardwood creaks as Mark walks into the master bedroom, unbuttoning his dress shirt, only to be greeted by the bulge of his stomach. He looks down and smacks it with his right hand.

Mark turns his gaze onto his wife, both hands on his hips, shirt unbuttoned, and gut slightly drooping over his waistline.

He flexes each peck in harmony,

“I’m kinda in the mood tonight babe, are you?” His wife asks in curiosity. “We haven’t been intimate since your work party two weeks ago,” she added.

Mark, surprised at her comment, is exhausted, and his testosterone is nowhere what is used to be, but he agrees to go a couple rounds. He turns off the light switch and climbs in bed with his wife. They go for the usual: missionary, cowgirl, and then doggy style to finish it off. The hot intern creeps into his mind, this time he doesn’t fight the mental image. He finishes, and rolls over onto his side of the bed.

His wife rests her head on his shoulder, and grazes her fingers across his chest.

She exhales deeply and whispers goodnight. Mark lies awake. The ceiling fan and glare of the alarm clock keeps him up. He listens to the hypnotic beat of the rainfall against the roof, and watches the water roll down the window. An uneasy feeling encapsulates him as he is reminded that his tomorrow will be identical to his today. He will snack on the same stale office muffins, and have mindless chatter with his uninteresting co-workers. He will come home to a woman who hasn't renewed her gym membership in two years, and then pretend to enjoy the same meals that were put in front of him thousands of times: shake and bake chicken, frozen crinkle cut fries, spaghetti with tomato sauce, and store bought pies.

He will see that same look in the eyes of the people in his office. It's a sad look, and it screams help without any noise. It's a look of helplessness, as all of his peers are confined and imprisoned by their bosses, their spouse, and their kids. They don't like their 9-5, but the thought of quitting and starting over never even crosses their feeble minds. He shudders at their lack of autonomy, but realizes he is no different than any of them.

Mark readjusts himself in the bed and turns his back to his wife, with the covers over his shoulders. He begins to fantasize what life would have been like if he never met her.

If his only financial responsibility priority was himself, he knows that his current income could support a lavish lifestyle for a bachelor living in the city. He pictures the skyline from a rooftop condominium, while the clink of wine glasses with the new intern plays as a background noise to his fairy-tale fantasy.

He remembers having the most recent wedding day out of all of his brothers, and the unnecessary guilt that he felt from family for being the oldest, and the last to wed.

Was I pressured into this? Did I choose this life or was it chosen for me? He thought.

Thoughts of escape began to fill his mind. He imagines driving 120 km/h into the warm ocean air of Canberra on a speed-bike, and smoking cigars on rooftop patios in Panama City. Mark exhales deeply through his nose. The silhouette of his wife's unconscious body painted the walls of his bedroom.

How will her body look in 10 years? Or 20? She will never be that firm 22 year old that he married. Will I still be physically attracted to her throughout her older years? He pondered. The thought of his wife's mother's body and tethered face deepened his anxiety. He wondered how much longer until his love and affection deteriorates into acceptance and appreciation.

The thought of financial and logistical freedom excited him, but he knew it would come at a heavy price. A damaged psyche to his offspring, and half of his net worth gone to a resentful ex-wife.

The reminder of his two wonderful kid's faces put his anxiety at ease, slightly. His mental activity begins to slow, and he drifts off to sleep.

Meet Dan: A 30 year old energetic bartender; still in good shape thanks to his old football body that he had built in his early 20s. Dan's sandy brown hair and square jaw reveal his Irish heritage, and his quick witted humour and sharp tongue convey that he was raised a salesmen. Dan works at a popular bar in Manhattan and serves drinks to some of the city's most gorgeous women. He rents a one bedroom condo just down the street. His income covers both the necessities and some luxuries, as he doesn't have to provide for anyone else but himself. Dan is living fast, and wild. He is completely living in the moment, with little of his paycheques arriving in his savings account. He had been in a long relationship in his twenties, but it fell through right before engagement plans.

It's 11 o'clock, and just as Dan's shift is over, the bar he works at starts to fill up. He rinses the last glass, collects his tip, throws on his coat and scarf, and walks out the door.

Light snowfall and Christmas lighting greets him on the way out, as he walks about two blocks down the street to his place. He has a little strut in his step, as he's meeting a hot brunette named Bridgette in an hour for a drink. As he's walking up the stairs to his apartment, his phone vibrates to a text that reads, "See you soon. J"

Dan opens the door, throws off his leather jacket and cracks a beer. He knows he should be rushing, but he feels that being a little late to his date will put him in a position of power.

He opens his blinds to a beautiful view of Manhattan at night, he turns on a David Gray vinyl, and slowly begins to freshen himself up for his date. Dan cleans up well; he's looking to make a good first impression on this girl that he met during one of his shifts last week. He goes for a formal look of black pants, white button up, metallic watch, and a spray of Lacoste cologne.

As midnight approaches, Dan works some gel into his hair and flows it back;

"I'd do me." he says to himself in the mirror.

Dan swigs back the last of his beer and heads on out the door to the Ale House where a local band is playing.

As he arrives to the scene, he notices the band is in full force. He may be the most sober guy in the building. He locks eyes with the girl he is meeting; she is sitting at a round table at the corner of the bar, legs crossed, in a short black dress, with just a little bit of cleavage. She appears to have a little Espanola in her blood, curvy, and with a distinct dark freckle over lip.

Dan acknowledges her, smiles, and approaches the table. "Thank god I didn't hold my breath," she says with a grin.

"Well aren't you a funny one," he replies as he adjusts his cufflink.

As Dan slides into the table, they are pleasantly greeted by his old college friend Alyssa who is serving tonight.

"Rickard's White for you Dan?" she asks.

"Always trying to plump me up, aren't yah," he says sheepishly.

"You know me too well," she replies, pleased with the flirting,

Dan takes a mental note that he would totally do Alyssa.

"And for you?" she asks Bridgette. "Just a vodka cran," she says quietly as she stuffs her purse into the corner of the booth

The bar is buzzing, but they are sitting far from the band, so they can hear each other without any trouble. Luckily Dan is seated with his back to the wall, so her attention is focused on him and only him. He picked up this little trick in college. Dan does his usual playful banter, discusses his travels, and pokes fun at her, all while keeping his legs in touch with hers. He makes her laugh with ease, and every time she giggles, she grabs onto his forearm.

As time passes, they have reached a happy medium between buzzed and drunk; the two begin to discuss what they're really passionate about. Bridget notes how she loves dancing and hot yoga. Dan reveals his love of adventure, and how he enjoys writing and meeting new people. As more drinks are served, they begin to feel more and more connected.

Bridget's constant hair tosses and glow in her eyes revealed her desire for further intimacy. Dan likes where this is going, as he can already picture her sprawled out on his bed.

Bridget's eyes become a little glossy so Dan decided to call it a night.

"I wanna show you the view from my balcony," he says as he scribbles down his signature on the receipt.

"Only if you have me home before bedtime!" she replies jokingly.

Dan knows he has this in the bag. He quickly visualizes how it's going to play out when they get home; he waves down an incoming cab.

"12c Water street!"

Bridget is now resting her head on his chest, as the two speed through the chilly Manhattan night. The street lights wrapped with Christmas ornaments and reefs brings a genuine smile to his lips, as it reminded him of being a child in the backseat of his parent's car; without a care in the world. Dan could see the cab driver nodding in acceptance as the two pulled up to his place. The two scurried upstairs. They couldn't resist the sexual tension, within seconds Bridget's panties were dropped.

They went at it three times that night; and had spurts of passion near the end. He never banged a Hispanic girl. She had been unusually hard to orgasm, he thought, but he powered through.

After the sex, they both rolled over on his bed with a euphoric yawn. Bridget inched closer to him and tried to cuddle; it felt forced. Dan could not see a future with this girl, as she gave it up way too easy. He kind of wanted her to leave.

As his buzz began to wear off, and the thrill of the chase subsided, he began to ponder if he will ever find the right one. As Bridget's breathing became heavier, she had now entered a deep sleep.

As Dan lay, he felt a bit of shame cast over him. He gazed up at his ceiling and thought, will I ever have a family? Who will I pass my knowledge and wisdom down onto? My parents are expecting grandchildren. He did not want to disappoint them, he thought that society expected him to have kids. He wondered if being a parent offered a sense of fulfillment in life that being a seasoned bachelor could not.

He knew that refraining from marriage and kids gave him freedom and luxuries that wouldn't otherwise be readily available; and being able to fly to Atlantic City with his buddies on demand pleased him, but the thought of dying alone scared him. The fact that he is entering his 30's scared him. And the fact that he is scheduled to attend his best friend's wedding in August scared him even more.

He knew kids were expensive, but he wondered if being a father would make his life feel complete. He pondered whether the dopamine rush of reward from being with a new girl would always trump the oxytocin high of being with a loved one.

As the voices in his head began to seize, Dan turned his back to Bridgette and drifted off to sleep.

Read More: Marriage Is Just Plain Tedious

YeahJeets
YeahJeets Is a young writer who can often be seen growing his beard and making love to exotic women. You can follow him on twitter @CCurr_

How To Build A Dynasty

July 21, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Dynasties have long captivated the American imagination. From Roosevelts to Bushes and Romneys, Americans have never let their anti-monarchial roots prevent them from expressing their fascination with families whose intergenerational wealth and persistent prominence seem akin to that of royalty. But how are such legacies manufactured and sustained? I thought it prudent to answer that question today using the example of arguably the most prominent of all American dynasties: the Kennedys.

Step 1: Build a fortune.

PJ Kennedy (born 1858, great-great grandfather to the current youngest generation of Kennedies) established the Kennedy fortune via business acumen (bars, some liquor importing, mining interests, etc). His son, Joe Kennedy Sr., expanded on this and made the Kennedy fortune truly massive (again, lots of liquor involved as well as finance/real estate).

This likely wouldn't have been possible without his father, PJ, breaking the mold of the poor Irish Catholic immigrant and establishing the small fortune he had for his own kids to build on (his parents were straight out of Ireland and he was the first Kennedy to get a formal education). Joe went on to build enough to last the entire family for generations, and he set up an extremely elaborate network of trusts to ensure that it would last—there is likely still plenty remaining for the current generation.

Money also allows the family to benefit top universities, ensuring their descendants' attendance for decades to come. You need a solid foundation of wealth before you can move forward and establish any dynasty. This is the first (and arguably the most crucial) step.

Oh, and don't be too concerned about how you get this money. As many have noted, there was a shady element to the way Joe Kennedy built his fortune, and I wouldn't be surprised if his father dealt in a few shadows as well (that was typical of the day, especially when it came to liquor). If it makes you wealthy and you can finagle your way out of any culpability for it, it'll do. That's the rule they followed, and you may need to follow it to if you'd like to achieve that level of success.

Step 2: Marry well.

PJ married into the Hickey family. You probably won't know them, but they were established, prosperous Bostonites at the time. PJ's wife was the daughter of one of the city's more prosperous businessmen. Their only son, Joe, married a Fitzgerald, daughter of one of the most powerful Irish politicians in the country at the time, John Fitzgerald.

This does two things:

A). It makes Step 1 much easier—you can build a larger fortune with the wealth of two families better than you can build with just one. Some of her father's wealth was bolted onto his own.

B). It gives your kids a leg up. They descend from two successful lines as opposed to one, and can benefit from the wealth and connections of both. Their pedigree is much stronger.

Also…

Step 2B: Marry your daughters very well.

Feminist talking points notwithstanding, the bottomline is that the men are going to be the heavy-lifters when it comes to carrying the pedigree of the name forward. If they can have some political success in their own right, that's fine, but they do not need to do much so long as the men they marry come from a solid pedigree. Their children will still count towards your legacy, even if they're not carrying your name. Marrying well will keep their pedigrees and financial status strong.

Step 3: Get into politics.

The first two steps make this much easier to do. This is where the real power is, and once you've got the money and the pedigree you can make a real go for it (those are the things that really win elections).

PJ Kennedy started off by converting his popularity in his Boston neighborhood to a long stint in the Massachusetts State Legislature. Soon, he was hanging out with the state's democratic elite and holding a number of influential appointed positions at the state level.

This is what helped to get the Kennedy name into the realm of the power elite. His son, Joseph, used that political cache (along with the wealth and pedigree inherited from his father and mother) to launch his own career, becoming chairman of the SEC and Ambassador to the UK.

Joe, having taken the next step up from his father (remember PJ held state power, Joe moved up and held some Federal power), then proceeded to groom his sons to take the final step-national high office, targeting the Senate and, ultimately, the Presidency. He was successful. John became president, Robert and Ted both Senators (his first son and namesake was supposed to take the lead for the presidency, but died in WW2). His daughters also generally married well (Eunice to highly accomplished Sargeant Shriver of the establishment Shriver clan, Patricia to an accomplished actor, and Jean married a financier but actually had a decent political career in her own right).

At this point, the dynasty was largely set. It took about three generations to get running, but Joe's sons cemented it firmly into the foundation of the American elite, as did his money. They're cruising now—no more climbing left for them to do at the top of the American pyramid.

Aside from these three steps, some careful image cultivation aided things: JFK just happened to be very charismatic and thus garnered a sort of celebrity status, as did his wife. This added a large measure of fame to the already phenomenal pedigree the Kennedys had built, and created the whole “Camelot”/American royalty idea. Some of the marriages to celebrities enhanced this (I already mentioned Patricia, but Eunice’s daughter’s marriage to Schwarzenegger is another example). This gave the Kennedy name some popular cache that some other very well established families (ex: Taft, Forbes, Udall, Weld, Bush, etc) do not have. The Roosevelts probably come the closest, along with the Vanderbilts.

How can you do this?

Tough call. If you didn’t get in on the ground floor or lack ancestors who did so, it is tough to replicate this in the modern USA. Things aren’t quite as fluid as they’ve been in the past—the established elite have just been getting richer and established tighter controls, making it harder to replicate what they did before and easier for them to stay on top absent competition from upstarts.

Marrying into it would be the most effective way, but not any old Joe can do that. If you’re not white, not affluent or famous, and not a graduate of an elite university, this will be tough. These folks generally congregate within certain socials circles and prefer to get with their own.

LIVE
8:38 am PT
KILEY KENNEDY
Granddaughter of Sen. Edward Kennedy
C-SPAN

HBO
contactmusic.com

You may have a better chance of pulling this off in another society. This could be done by marrying into another nation's elite, and becoming a part of it yourself (this would require some serious legwork on your part), or by establishing yourself in another country, building some sizable wealth (enough to make you a one percenter there) and then following the model listed above from step one, starting from scratch and hoping that your children/grandchildren will cement your dynasty the way Joe, JFK, Robert and Ted did for PJ. This way, your descendants can occupy a role similar to that of the Kennedys here in a smaller pond, wielding similar power within their playing field. For the young red pill male who is adventurous enough to see opportunities across the globe and take advantage of them, great rewards can be obtained.

Read Next: How To Build Social Influence Like A Cult Leader

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

The Art Of Speaking And Writing Well

July 21, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

When Rome conquered Greece, it adopted many of her techniques of education. One of these was the emphasis on rhetoric (the art of speaking and writing well) as an independent field of study. Rhetoric became a sophisticated subject, and rhetorical training was in great demand in imperial Rome for anyone aspiring to a career in government or politics. Rome had no formal "state prosecutor" system as we do today; individuals needed to bring their own criminal or civil cases before a tribunal (iudices) and hire lawyers to argue on their behalf. Historians also were usually trained rhetoricians; the works of Livy, Tacitus, Sallust, Ammianus Marcellinus, and others are filled with robust speeches and artful epigrams that demonstrate the influence of rhetorical schooling. But training in rhetoric was about more than improving one's speaking and writing; properly understood, a program in rhetoric was only part of a larger focus on character development.

This article will give an overview of some the best rhetorical writings that have survived from this period. The techniques that these old masters described are still valid today. Who among us does not wish to improve his speaking or writing? Who among us does not wish to improve his character? A close study of Cicero, Seneca the Elder, and Quintilian show just how developed classic rhetorical techniques were. I will treat each of these writers individually.

Cicero

Cicero, of course, needs no introduction. The only Roman who surpassed the Greek orators in eloquence and verbal dexterity, his speeches remain masterpieces of invective, persuasive power, and philosophical subtlety. Space here prevents a detailed review of his career and works, but it is sufficient to say that the Catilinian orations, the Verrine orations, and his so-called Phillipics still stand today as exemplars of the rhetorical art. Less well known, however, is his short treatise On the Classification of Rhetoric (De Partitione Oratoria). Although a technical treatise, it contains much of value to the serious student of oratory.

According to Cicero, the functions of an orator were: (1) inventio, the discovery of arguments meant to influence an audience; (2) collocatio, the proper arrangement of arguments in a form suitable to maximize effect; (3) elocutio, the differing varieties of speaking styles; (4) actio, techniques of delivery; and (4) memoria, the cultivation of the memory.

A speech can be divided into these constituent parts: (1) exordium, the introduction, designed to win favor with the audience; (2) narratio, the "statement of the case", which should be direct, clear, and uncluttered; (3) confirmatio, a laying out of "proofs" by reciting facts or valid precedent; (4) reprehensio, a refutation of the opponent's points; and (5) peroratio, the all-important summation, in which everything is brought together. Cicero goes into great detail with each of these components of a speech, and the reader senses the hand of a master on every page of the treatise.

Theodore Roosevelt's emphasis on character and oratorical skill places him squarely in the classical tradition

Seneca the Elder

Not to be confused with his more well-known son Seneca the philosopher, Seneca the Elder was a Spanish rhetorician who, late in his life, collected his lessons from a lifetime of teaching into a comprehensive handbook. Seneca was concerned with two types of speeches: the arguing of legal controversies (controversiae) and the presentation of suasoriae, which were speeches on deliberative topics. Students improved their speaking and writing by means of "declamations" (declamationes), defined as the giving of imaginary speeches. Seneca had an incredibly detailed memory, cultivated by years of practice in speech-giving. The two volumes of his book contain his recollections of the sayings, advice, and sample exercises of other master rhetoricians. Most of it appears to have been written directly from his prodigious memory.

How did these "declamations" work in practice? The instructor would offer a proposition or legal issue, such as the following:

> A man disinherited his son. The disinherited son went to a prostitute and had a son by her. He then fell ill and sent for his father. When his father came, he entrusted his son to his father, and then died. After his death, the father adopted the boy. The man's other son accuses the father of defective judgment (dementia). [Controv. II.4].

Students would then have to argue the merits and issues of each side, within strict time limits. Their techniques and logic would be critiqued by the instructor, and they would then have to argue the opposite side.

Seneca's book is filled with interesting bits and pieces of rhetorical wisdom and amusing anecdotes accumulated from a lifetime in the oratorical trenches. It is surprising that he is so obscure today; perhaps declamations and spoken artistry appeal only to lawyers.

Quintilian

The most complete study of the rhetorical art is to be found in Quintilian's Institutio Oratoria (The Orator's Education). This work, written in a clear and vigorous Latin, and filling five volumes in the Loeb Library series, is a virtual encyclopedia on proper speaking. Quintilian was the rector of a school of rhetoric, and wrote his masterwork in old age for the intended use of his son; but tragedy overtook his family, and both his sons died at young ages. He poured all his experience, his wisdom, and his repressed anguish into his work. Perhaps we, his readers, should consider ourselves his sons; for on every page we feel the magnetism and rectitude of a strong character backed by an unwavering moral compass.

For Quintilian, a man cannot be a good speaker without having a sound moral character:

> Noting is so preoccupied, so many-faceted, so mauled and torn apart by so many different emotions, as an evil mind. When it is plotting something, it is tormented with hope, cares, and labor. Even when it has attained its ends, it is racked by anxiety and remorse, and the expectation of punishment. What room is there amid all this for literature and cultural life? No more, to be sure, than there is room for a good crop where the land is given over to thorns and brambles. [Q. XII.1].

He believed that the aspiring orator should study music and dance to give himself balance and rhythm; athletics, to cultivate his physique; literature and philosophy, to mold his character and reasoning; and science, to sensitize himself to physical reality. Here is a prescription not just to be a good speaker, but to be a good man. He recognizes that his training program is arduous, and has no illusions that most will be up to the task. Regarding the actual mechanics of giving a speech, Quintilian offers mountains of practical advice. Among the best bits of wisdom are:

1. Do not write your speech down unless you intend to deliver it verbatim, which will rarely happen. It will interfere with the spontaneity of the delivery. Instead, outline it, and know those topics thoroughly.

2. Clarity is the most important virtue of all. A written composition must be set aside for a time, then patiently revised again. A piece of writing that is laid aside, and then approached again, will appear to be almost the writing of another hand. Be ruthless with your pruning, and remember that your listeners will have little patience with verbosity.

3. Avoid wild gesticulations when speaking, but seek the mastery of effective hand movements. Quintilian has an entire section in his treatise on the proper types and employment of hand movements as an aid to communication.

4. Seek a balance between traditional and modern styles of writing. Between two extremes, the best course is often somewhere in the middle.

Tacitus and Pliny the Younger are counted among Quintilian's pupils, and they represent some of the best in Latin literature. He was a great influence on St. Augustine and many early Church fathers who received a rhetorical instruction in the later imperial period. Nearly forgotten in the Middle Ages, interest in him was revived during the Renaissance when a complete manuscript of the Institutes was discovered by Poggio Bracciolini in a monastery in 1416.

Marcus Fabius Quintilianus (c. A.D. 35-100). For him, character was the sine qua non of good oratory.

All in all, Quintilian embodies the best that classical rhetoric can offer. We feel the immediacy of his message that the training of character is just as important as the importation of knowledge; and his pages resonate with the dignity, humanity, and wit of an experienced schoolmaster. Modern education has done young men a disservice by neglecting the development of virtue and character. One gets the sense, from reading the works of the ancients, that modern methods of instruction have pushed the acquisition of huge volumes of technical information at the expense of the development of character. We are now paying dearly for this deficiency.

Perhaps the secret of Rome's longevity lies in the fact that its educated elite emphasized good character as much as wisdom. Its best and wisest men knew that, without character, a man was doomed. Eloquence, for all its lustre, eventually loses its shine without a strong foundation in worldly virtue. In words that our millennial generation would do well to remember, he cautions us:

> The young should not be held back in an imaginary world, or accustom themselves to empty shadows to the point where they find it hard to abandon them. The danger is that, coming out of the shady retreats in which they have almost grown old, they may shrink from the bright sunlight of real conflict. [Q.X.5].

The best teachers, to be sure, are not only transmitters of knowledge, but are also stimuli for our moral renovation. We have never needed such teachers more than we do now.

Read More: This May Be The Fastest Way To Learn A Language

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The Age Of Conquests

July 21, 2014 | by Mark | Link | Original Link

Foreword

The "Fate Of Empires and Search For Survival" is an essay written by Sir John Glubb and published in 1977. Sadly, The Fate Of Empires is no longer in publication, but there are second hand copies on eBay and a free pdf version online.

The Fate Of Empires

It is important to note that what Sir John referred to as an empire is what we now call a superpower. Sir John stated in his essay that the rules of empires were also applicable to the United States and the Soviet Union.

Sir John made some observations regarding the lifetime of empires.

> "Empires do not usually begin or end on a certain date. There is a gradual period of expansion and then a period of decline. Human affairs are subject to many chances, and it is not to be expected that they could be calculated with mathematical accuracy."
>
> "Nevertheless, it is suggested that there is sufficient resemblance between empires to justify further study."
>
> "Not all Empires endured their full lifespan."
>
> "An interesting deduction from the figures seems to be that the duration of empires does not depend on the speed of travel or the nature of the weapons. The Assyrians marched on foot and fought with spears, bows and arrows. The British used artillery, railways and ocean-going ships. Yet the two empires lasted approximately the same periods."
>
> "Empires last an approximate 250 years"

In "The Fate of Empires", Rome is divided into two periods. The Roman Republic and the Roman Empire, a notion many here will oppose. From this, he made the following conclusions.

> "…the periods of duration of different empires at varied epochs show a remarkable similarity."
>
> "Immense changes in the technology of transport and warfare do not seem to affect the life-expectation of an empire."
>
> "The changes in technology of transport have, however, affected the shape of empires."
>
> "One of the very few units of measurement which have not seriously changed since the Assyrians is the human 'generation', a period of about 25 years."
>
> "The period of an Empire, 250 years, represents about ten generations of people."

By looking at the differences in people across generations, Sir John concluded that empires are built and destroyed by their own people due to these very differences. As time progresses in the life of an empire, the citizens priorities shift across the ages and these priorities in turn transform the empire.

The different ages in which empires change is remarkably similar. These are characterised by a series of interlinking events which led from one age to another. The ages in empires are the age of pioneers, the age of conquest, the age of commerce, the age of affluence, the age of intellect and the age of decadence. These ages come in the sequence denoted and often overlap with one another as time progresses.

The Age of Conquests

In the article "The Age of Pioneers", based on "The Fate of Empires" essay, we looked at the kind of people who pioneer empires. These people, strive to make a mark on the world. The people are hardy and enterprising, they take large risks and often come from societies dismissed as backwards by the contemporaries of the time. Of all the empires of human history, there were none more backwards than the Mongol people.

The story of Genghis Khan begins with the assassination of his father at the age of nine. Genghis Khan had seen the hardship of life at an early age, something that marked him for life.

> "The first stage of the life of a great nation, therefore, after outburst, is a period of amazing initiative, and almost incredible enterprise, courage and hardihood. These qualities, often in a very short time, produce a new and formidable nation. These early victories, however, are won by reckless bravery and daring initiative. The ancient civilisation thus attacked, will defend itself by its sophisticated weapons, and by its military organisation and discipline.
>
> The barbarians quickly appreciate the advantages of these military methods and adopt them. As a result, the second stage of expansion of the new empire consist > of more organised, disciplined and professional campaigns. In other fields, the daring initiative of the original conquerors is maintained in geographical exploration, for example: pioneering new countries, penetrating new forests,climbing unexplored mountains, and sailing uncharted seas.

>
> The new nation is confident, optimistic and perhaps contentious of the 'decadent' races which it has subjugated. The methods employed tend to be practical and experimental, both in government and in warfare, for they are not tied by centuries of tradition, as it happens in ancient empires. Moreover,the leaders are free to use their own improvisations, not having studied political tactics in schools or textbooks."

Genghis Khan defeated his enemies with cunning and then proceeded to unite the clans of the steppe into a single nation.

Khan understood that neighbouring China would see this as a threat and proceeded to take the offensive. Based Khan fought and fucked his way through China, making a mockery of the defensive wall that the Chinese constructed to keep out the Mongols.

The Chinese had fallen for the defence trap that Sir John recognised early on the fate of empires.

> "In the times of the Roman greatness, the legions used to dig a ditch round their camps at night to avoid surprise. But the ditches were mere earthworks, and between them wide spaces were left through which the Romans could counterattack. But as Rome grew older, the earthworks became high walls, through which access was given only by narrow gates. Counterattacks were no longer possible. The legions were now passive defenders."

Being permanently on the defensive will only tell your enemies that you are weak. As Tsun Tzu said "h*e who cannot conquer takes the defensive*". When facing a determined invader, the Chinese barred themselves inside the city walls. What ensued is a classic siege warfare. The Mongols camped and waited. They feasted on the supplies they captured whilst the Chinese starved themselves within the walls. Disease spread and the Chinese resorted to cannibalism in desperation.

Following the initial outburst, a tribe or nation will capitalise on the momentum gained, regroup and proceed to eliminate their enemies.

Genghis Khan, when faced with the walls of the Chinese city, employed Chinese architects that had defected out of starvation, and had them build siege weapons. (5:35)

After defeating the Chinese, Genghis Khan established a law system and pushed for teaching reforms for his people. He sent ambassadors, far and wide. One of those ambassadors was sent to Persia, where the Sultan, bemused by the demands that the strange man from an unknown land was making. The Sultan had him killed and his head sent back to Mongolia. This was a serious misjudgement. What ensued was the Mongol invasion of the Arab world. Baghdad was plundered and its 800,000 citizens killed. The Mongols did what the Crusaders could not.

Not all age of conquests are taken against old empires.

> "In other fields, the daring initiative of the original conquerors is maintained in geographical exploration, for example: pioneering new countries, penetrating new forests, climbing unexplored mountains, and sailing uncharted seas. The new nation is confident, optimistic and perhaps contemptuous of the 'decadent' races which it has subjugated."

For example, after the pioneers of America expelled the British from the colonies, the Americans proceeded to conquer the rest of what is now known as the United States of America. There were conquests against people; the native Americans, but they were not an empire.

Recently, I wrote a blog post about this subject. The post explain how the era of the Shogun ended. In short, when the Americans forced Japan to open her ports for trade by force, the Japanese were held back by their traditions, and were unable to modernise quickly enough to face the new threats of the modern world. Their politics were equally inflexible, hampering efforts from reformists who wanted to modernise Japan to fight the growing threat of the new western empires at its doorstep.

Infighting in an existing empire leads to the weakening of the nation. This is capitalised by the Pioneer nation which gains land and resources from the empire at first, and then uses the new technology and momentum to conquer it whole.

Such was the case of the Spanish:

> "The vast Arab Empire broke up into many fragments, of which one former colony, Moslem Spain, ran its own 250 year course as an independent empire. [Actually, towards the end of the Al Andalus Empire, the many leaders of the provinces began in fighting against other Muslim regions in Al Andalus. Sometimes joining forces with the Christians out of their spite and vendetta for the other Muslim leaders]."

What follows after the Age of Pioneers is a vast push for conquest, hence the name The Age of Conquests.

> "The Arabs ruled over the greater part of Spain for 780 years, from 712 A.D tom 1492 A.D. During these eight centuries, there had been no Spanish nation, the petty kings of Aragon and Castile alone holding out in the mountains. The agreement between Ferdinand and Isabella and Christopher Columbus was signed immediately after the fall of Granada, the last Arab Kingdom in Spain, in 1492. Within fifty years, Cortez had conquered Mexico…. "

What do you think happened to the two Natives in the video after the Spanish landed?

Conclusion

After a tribe or nation bursts out, they will capitalise on their success, regroup and push on to conquer vast lands or overseas domains. In this way, that Age of Pioneers morphs into the Age of Conquest. The conquerors can take on a large empire or an unexplored continent to the same effect.

Any nation that is divided or defensive in nature can easily fall prey to the new conqueror race. In-fighting at a time of need marks the deathknell of an already faltering nation. Traditions are created as a means of preserving peoples and nations, and giving these a sense of unity. However when traditions, politics or culture impede necessary reform, these become a burden and often lead to defeat by incompetence.

Read More: The Age of Pioneers

Mark
Mark is a seasoned traveller and philander who enjoys a smoke and glass of bourbon. He is an avid reader and a Political History enthusiast. Occasionally enjoys shit posting on the Guardian or the Telegraph. You can read his other ROK articles, and follow him on twatter and Google+1. His articles are proofread by InfoShinobi.

The Three Words That Will Help Turn The Tide Against The Masculinization Of Women

July 21, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

We will never win an all-out battle against feminist mindsets because it is not a rational ethos. It is driven by emotion and childish entitlement. It has a strangle hold across media, television, music, popular culture, politics, universities, the work place and even religion. There are however ways for the small and gallant David to beat Goliath. This excellent article in The New Yorker got me thinking into how to defeat the beast. The winning strategy of David: refuse to fight on the giant's terms. Most warriors, however, would slowly approach the champion, with fear and trepidation, looking for his weak spot. In a conventional sense there was none and thus they simply laid themselves open to attack.

David takes a different strategy by making the giant freeze up to see what this 'harmless' upstart is doing. In that moment when the giant is a stationary target, one quick shot of the sling and the fight is won.

Positive Beats Negative

There are many articles outlining negative traits of feminism, providing all manner of rational thought, but these are for red pill men. Anyone heavily invested in the politically correct feminist agenda will simply find arguments against them. I can take a person to Death Valley in the middle of summer at 120° and show them how dry it is, but they will retort: "It must rain here sometimes." They will die of thirst in the desert before they admit it is a dry place because they are interested only in counter arguments. Let them sit for an hour or two, until their lips are parched, then my bottle of water will soon prove the point. Their weakness is within their own negativity. This ridiculous relationship interview with Ana Kasparian shows exactly how women are led off track and onto the cock carousel, yet refuse to acknowledge their folly.

In the same way that the nasty Goliath is built on the negative, so too politically correct feminist culture is built on the negative. It begins with women complaining they want equal rights, voting, education, careers whilst pointing the finger at men for holding women back. No man ever held a woman back from being feminine. He simply put rightful barriers in place to keep her safe from a more brutal male sphere. In essence he wanted to preserve her femininity.

Admittedly, some of those attitudes are rather old fashioned and did limit women in many ways. With today's 'safer' and more technologically driven world, times have changed. We cannot revert to crusty old religious morals or try to re-impose what once was. Women got a jump start on men but have in reality done a pretty piss poor job of preserving their femininity.

Encouraging Women To Embrace The Feminine

Rather than try to engage negatives of feminism directly or use double negative MRA philosophy, bleating for the same things feminism does with a male spin, we simply need to encourage women to be feminine. When you look at the abundance of feminine role models, feminine content in media, marketing, products and so forth, it's not a very difficult goal. The feminine is magnetic and attractive.

Perhaps one of the reasons why there are so many gay and trans men these days is because women are more butch. Lacking a true feminine element in their lives men simply start embracing the feminine themselves.

We know women are trend followers. Thus, an underground movement of masculine gentlemen, politely encouraging women to be feminine is our nuclear weapon. One of the criticisms of PUA and red pill is that it tends to take an aggressive or defensive stance. 'Bang Bitches', 'Fuck Feminism', 'Fat Shaming' etc. This attitude is largely an internal one that is good for a man's mindset, but bad for our public cause.

An aggressive attitude on the outside hides insecurity within (no one likes a bully). We are right to be insecure when the domain of the masculine male is being eaten away. However, we cannot let insecurity show. If David went out a quivering mess or shouting insults at Goliath, his fear would have shown and he would have been beaten. This is the negative that the enemy wants to draw out. It diverts attention away from the enemy, weakens little David, and allows the enemy to point the finger.

"Not Very Feminine"

The girl looked pretty in her photos on tinder, but when you met at Starbucks for a date, she's chubby. "You looked more feminine in your photo." You cannot fault this line, it's not offensive, but suddenly she's thinking about it, talking to her friends about it. You can use it everywhere. A girl shows up to a date in sweatpants. Tell her she doesn't look feminine. A girl shaves half her head—not very feminine. A girl is a slut—not very feminine. Off to a demanding MBA course—not very feminine. And so on. Everything about feminism is "not very feminine" and at the same time this is the most polite, cutting, critical and aggressive three words you can say to a woman. This is the sling shot straight to the head.

What Is Feminine?

Everything us red blooded men love about women AND it's what women love about themselves. Telling a woman that she is 'not very feminine' or saying she looks butch, undermines and questions her biological platform, psychological mindset, ethics, moral compass, and social skills. Tell a girl she looks butch and watch her lose the plot.

Beautiful flowers, fine food, pleasant surroundings, attention to detail, crisp cool water, fields full of crops, coral reefs, sandy beaches, pleasant girls, full breasts, well looked after babies—these are all very 'feminine'.

All of the flaws of feminism are framed into a context that exposes how ‘not very feminine’ the behavior is. Scout Wills (daughter of Bruce) can walk around town with her tits out in protest, but this is ‘not very feminine’. Feminine is graceful and reserved. We play on female insecurities. The only retort is for her to say she is not interested in being feminine, which of course causes a massive cognitive dissonance to any female, since even the most hardened feminist is extremely interested in being feminine. The problem is she has been sold on a false and corrupted concept of what ‘the feminine’ truly is.

A woman having a baby and rushing back to work, breast pumping milk at her desk while fielding sales calls, is ‘not very feminine’. The infant might have all that money can buy, but that is a masculine energy. A woman strutting about in a pant suit and running for president is ‘not very feminine’. Feminine is soft, gentle and graceful. In many ways it is more powerful than masculine. Adriana in her finest bikini is more likely to get attention than Hillary on her soapbox.

The World Needs More Feminine

The hardworking man is drawn to a pint of beer after work, precisely because it has a ‘feminine’ or nurturing energy. Feminine is magnetic—it draws you in. Sweaty mechanics in a car workshop hang pictures of topless women on the wall because it offsets the hard masculine, dirty, greasy environment. Soldiers in battle have a sweetheart because feminine energy offsets the harsh masculine. A man wants a home and a lover to return to because that is the feminine.

Girls wear pretty dresses, put on makeup, preen their long flowing hair, wear fancy shoes and sweet perfume, because that embraces the feminine. Men and women love the feminine. The feminine makes life worth living. The abundant planet with all its variety of animals, fruits and flowers is very feminine. The harsh burning sun is very masculine. Without an abundant fruitful planet in its orbit a star is just a big bright ball of fire. Without a feminine abundance a planet is just a ball of rock and dust. A proton has mass and velocity, but without a ‘feminine’ electron in its orbit it’s just a nasty free radical blasting through space. No one but a lost cause can argue with the feminine.

“A woman who wants to compete with a man, has very little ambition.” – Marilyn

Thus we see without a doubt that the counter to feminism is not ‘manism’, aggressive game, or a lot of debate about the negative. Rather it lies in a positive appreciation of what feminine truly is. The danger of course is the white knight who puts a woman on a pedestal and begins to worship that ‘feminine’ element that all women have. Perhaps one of the reasons it’s worshiped is because it’s a scare commodity today, but left unchecked the feminine element is destructive. Hurricanes, tidal waves, tornadoes are the feminine element out of control. We’ve all experienced how dark a girl’s bad mood can be.

The protection is to simply demand higher and higher standards of graceful creative feminine. Original PUAs suggested ‘neg-ing’ a girl to avoid pedestalization, this is just one application of demanding more feminine. Perhaps one of the reasons why feminists rail so aggressively against what they call the ‘objectification’ of women is because in order for their ruse to work effectively, it is necessary to destroy the essence of feminine. All masculine men need to do is politely expect females to embrace the feminine they embody and soon we will have a happier and more balanced world around us. Even fuller women can be feminine.

In some ways men win the lottery with their body type, but in other more beautiful ways women have advantages. No one is saying that women should be locked up at home having babies. No one is saying that a girl cannot have a rip roaring sex life, enjoying all manner of kinks with her lover (note the singular), or a lively and productive professional life.

It’s historically true that women were sexually restrained due to pregnancy issues and largely for their own safety couldn’t march into the work place en masse. Times have changed but that doesn’t mean that men or women should disregard what it means to be feminine. In truth, the entire human realm and the planet itself is extremely feminine, or as James Brown sang :

“It’s a man’s world, but it ain’t nothing without a woman.”

Read Next: Why Western Men Prefer Foreign Women Over Their Own

The Apology That Will Never Be Delivered

July 22, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

I'm going to kick a dead horse and pound my chest a bit here. Elliot Rodger. If you're sick from hearing about that guy I won't blame you for clicking out of here, but this article isn't going to be about the sexually frustrated man who went on a shooting spree. It's going to be about me.

Back in December 2013, a young man named Karl Halverson went to his school and shot a very pretty young woman named Claire Davis before he committed. I wrote a controversial article (read here) about what I theorized was the reason for Karl's murder. Essentially I wrote, and still believe, that Karl killed Claire because he was sexually frustrated; mostly as a result of selfish women who (based on their looks and personality) have their standards set unrealistically high, denying mid-tier men like Karl sex and relationships while they become debased genetic toilets for higher tier men. A lot of people on the internet hated me for saying that. My e-mail was flooded with anger and malware, numerous sites fisked my article and proclaimed me the worst thing ever.

Five months later, what happens? My theory that sexless men go crazy is proven beyond a doubt by Elliot Rodger (read here), who left numerous videos and a manifesto detailing how sexual frustration drove him over the edge. Undoubtedly violence by men against women, fuelled by male sexual frustration, happens on a larger scale than we believe. Most of the time, however, there is little evidence to prove so. Men just seem to go crazy one day and rape, hurt or kill women (often committing suicide afterward) for 'no apparent reason', despite the fact that it's readily apparently many of these murders happened because men with no clue how to get it (or those who erroneously still believe being a nice guy and solid provider are still sexually attractive) were not receiving female attention. Some men are so deprived of a woman's touch that just a hug is enough to have them smiling for weeks; blogger Heartiste provides us with this brief insight into the power a woman's innocent touch had on Elliot Rodger:

> Most unenlightened men who come to the Chateau to learn the ways of the crimson arts are first introduced to a steady diet of knowledge about psychosocial sex differences before the juicy game strategies are revealed.
>
> "One time there was a gathering at his parents' place and Elliot was his usual uncomfortable self.
>
> I asked Peter if Elliot was ticklish. Peter said he was, so I encouraged a couple of women to tickle him and you know, that was the only time I saw Elliot express any kind of joy. It seemed that, at least for those moments, he was a normal kid."
>
> A woman's touch is water to a parched man. Sad, sad Elliot. Game can save lives. But only for those willing to see.

Just being tickled by a girl was enough to make this murderous individual happy.

Lack of female interaction drives men crazy. I said this many months ago and received a storm of flak for it. But as is often the case here at Return Of Kings, we tell the harsh truth, we get lambasted for it, we're proven right beyond a shadow of a guilt, and our critics refuse to acknowledge it. They do not even do something as simple as offering a grudging apology. Hell, I'd even take a sarcastic one!

I know I won't get an apology. There's no room for polite discourse when it comes to telling the Truth versus spreading the Lies. We at Return of Kings tell the truth and get crapped on for it. When we're eventually proven right (not that we need to be) we still receive nothing for it. This says a lot about our critics. They are so classless, their platforms so razor thin and shaky, that they cannot even fire me an e-mail and say 'Okay Billy, maybe you're onto something… though you're still mostly wrong and I still hate you you piece of crap'. No, they know once they acknowledge the truth it's over. The veil is pulled back, the selfish ugliness of their agendas are revealed and they're forced to face the fool staring back at them in the mirror.

I try to reply to every e-mail I receive, no matter how angry or crazy it may be. I do so with class and respect; these people, even if they are a critic, took their time to send me some correspondence. It's only courteous to reply and acknowledge I've read their words, since they've read mine. Every so often I get some that are very personal. A few women with obvious problems and misplaced anger riled and raged at me, I answered, they answered, and six or seven e-mails later we're friends. She may not necessarily accept my viewpoint, but she recognizes that all my vitriol and cruel language here on Return Of Kings is serving a higher purpose. A couple have even admitted that our correspondence helped them. And I will never use these e-mails as an article basis, even though I could easily be childish and truck them out and wave them at our critics faces, asking how many people they've helped live better lives. I keep my correspondence private because I respect my critics. I respect their right to their opinion (even though they're wrong) and I have enough class not to have a laugh at their expense afterwards. I don't need to be that petty.

I, and my fellow contributors, are trying to make the world a better place. We try to help men become better so they don't have to suffer a miserable existence; which, by consequence, helps women have better lives as well. We try to entertain men who are already being who they desire to be. In a way we are a therapist's couch, a place for men who have no other safe outlet for their thoughts to blow off some steam and acknowledge that no, they aren't crazy, stuff is very wrong with the world and we give them tangible reasons as to why that is.

And we are right. We deal in truths, no matter how uncomfortable they may be. We are called misogynists but it just so happens to be a sad fact that the attitudes and actions of the modern western woman are fuelling a lot of male misery. We can't help that. Were that not the case than we would simply be talking more about the other reasons why the world is such a messed up place for the modern man.

So I say to you, our treasured enemies: you don't have to like us, but you should be classy and at least admit it when we're right. So how about firing off that apology you owe me now? Show you're the bigger person and grovel for forgiveness at my feet.

Read More: 10 Reasons Why You Should Live Without Apology

Billy Chubbs

Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

4 More Lies Men Are Being Told About Women

July 22, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Before writing the prequel to this article a couple months back I had a list of close to a dozen lies that Western men are raised to believe about women. The breakdown and explanation necessary to debunk every myth at their core prevented me from putting them all into one article so I whittled my list down to eight, then wrote about the four most Anglo-prevalent. They seemed to be received well so I've decided add another installment. That said, here are the next four in line.

"Behind every great man is a great woman"

The definition of a great woman in the 'sphere differs greatly from the definition of those who coined this falsehood. One of the most glaring examples of this is when women like Michelle Obama and Hillary Clinton are given any measure of credit for the successes of their husbands as Presidents of the United States. It's amusing how the fem-centric media paints these women as powerful, influential figures in the lives of their husbands as though they are the ones pulling the strings on important decisions regarding foreign policy and military action behind the scenes.

Now don't get me wrong, Michelle and Hillary do (did) add value to their Head of State husbands but not in the way those who dreamt up this fallacy would lead you to believe. A man who acquires the title and responsibility of leader of the free world (or any other title or accomplishment for that matter) already had what it took to get there whether the public acknowledges this or not. He didn't need a woman's influence or guidance to get him there. What he needed was a supportive, quality woman who understood the role of a First Lady and conducted herself as such.

Both Barack and Bill publically benefited from having wives that represented what a woman should be to their powerful husbands because society responds favorably when traditional sex roles (the man leads, the woman follows) and values are evident in our leaders no matter what politically correct notions come out of their mouths. This explains why there hasn't been a bachelor in the Oval Office in over 150 years.

The traditional family always wins out in politics

Anyone who doubts society's biological desire for the conventional presentation of a traditional family in public service need only remember the evisceration that Sarah Palin suffered at the hands of the media in 2008. Most Americans will never forget the full throttle character assault that was ramped up as soon as McCain named her as his running mate. Ironically, and not surprisingly, the vast majority of Palin's stone throwers were women. Hell, some of those female pundits continue to stoke those flames even today and Sarah's been all but irrelevant on the political landscape since Obama took office in '09.

Whether or not her husband Todd was the true leader of that family is anybody's guess but Sarah was perceived to be the head of household because she was the Vice Presidential Candidate, not her husband. Perception is indeed reality and outside of Alaska, Palin continues to be the butt of political satire nationwide simply because of biology.

A year after the election they still couldn't leave her alone

Men can accomplish great things with or without women. Could the presence of a feminine, supportive woman make his journey more enjoyable and a maybe little more fulfilling? Sure. Julius Caesar and Genghis Khan enjoyed hoards of women while conquering their respective worlds and I'm willing to bet it gave both of an elevated measure of satisfaction knowing they had pussy at the ready at all times. But I doubt either one of them consulted with their harems when faced with a particularly tough decision. So if a woman happens to be along for the ride during a man's conquests the only greatness he needs from her is her compliance and her body—not her guidance and influence.

"Never ask a woman her age"

Testing a man's sexual fitness is in a woman's DNA. There's no getting around this fact just as there's no getting around the fact that beautiful, fit women give us boners (the boner test being a man's way of testing a woman's sexual fitness). Neither sex can fight its natural instincts as it's how we are hardwired as men and women.

Females in the Western hemisphere literally run on autopilot with these congruence tests to determine sexual fitness—especially the attractive ones. Playing with her phone on a date, demanding that you buy her a drink, and asking you if you're gay are just a few things she does on a regular basis without even thinking about why she's doing them. These, of course, are examples of what are more commonly known as shit tests—a woman's way of sorting out which men she will use strictly for validation and provisions with zero sex, and those she'll gladly engage in hair pulling, headboard rattling sex with at the drop of a hat (ahh…the double edged sword of a woman's duplicitous hypergamy).

Men on the other hand have one way of determining the degree of a woman's sexual fitness…

Physical beauty.

Good looking girls from 18 to 25 years are the most desirable, thus, the most sexually fit. Granted, there are plenty of women who look great well into their thirties but the dwindling attention from the men they want between their legs is a grim reminder that end of the carousel ride draws nigh.

So why must you "never ask a woman her age?"

Because asking a woman's age is shit testing her. A woman's fragile ego can't handle rejection much less having the tables turned and having to prove her sexual worthiness to a male. And because females are the masters of deception and are capable of easily shaving a few years off of their outward appearances thanks to today's advances in makeup and fraudulent clothing, this forbidden query pulls back the curtain of their carefully crafted attempted to mimic a fertile 22 year old.

[image]

Realizing the wall is approaching

The older American female is keenly aware that men with options prefer younger, hotter women. She knows that once a man learns she's well past her prime age wise, his attraction to her will be substantially diminished. So in order to avoid having to pass the one shit test that men can effectively dismiss them (for potential LTR status) with, they chose to create this imaginary faux pas forbidding men to ask a woman how old she is.

Women can simulate youth and beauty to some extent but deep down they all know that no amount of cleavage, highlights, or ass lifting jeans can reduce the number of rings she conceals within her tree stump. Kick this myth to the curb and ask away gents. Watching her squirm in disbelief that you had the audacity to violate this "rule" is half the fun.

"If She's a Sports Fan She's a Keeper"

So we're back at the bar with our buddies a few days after stupidly toasting the ridiculous Happy Wife, Happy Life maxim when one of our friends starts talking about the "amazing girl" he just met. We all hit him with the usual vetting procedure asking him questions like "Is she hot" "Does she swallow" "What's her mom look like" and so forth. We've all been on both sides of these Q&A sessions. We've also heard, at some point, our buddy say something to this effect:

"…and she's a diehard Giants fan. I think I'm in love!"

The glorification of masculine traits in women continues to destroy femininity at an alarming rate. This line of thinking is so mainstream, dudes actually think that dating a girl who loves sports as much as he does is a bonus. But in an honest moment he'll admit that seeing her scream at the television because the ref called a penalty on her beloved Giants makes her very unattractive.

This woman is not attractive

Men want women who are women. Girly girls. Being with a chick who can go shot for shot with you on tequila night, brags about her kill streak on Call Of Duty, or can name every pitcher on the '93 Padres is grossly overrated.

On the other hand, it is pretty cool when you're out on a date with a sexy girl and she asks you something about your team in an attempt to connect with you. It shows that she is trying to impress you by taking interest in something important to you. This is a good thing. It's also perfectly okay if your woman occasionally follows her hometown team and talks about it from time to time. But when she bolts ahead of you at Applebees to grab that seat facing the television so she doesn't miss the 2nd half of the Manchester United match, game over.

"I wanna marry my bestie"

This is another sad example of Western culture glamorizing trends that go against the very genetic desires of females. So what girls say they want and what they actually need (and want) are two very different things. No surprise there. Case in point: "I want to marry my best friend!"

This maxim, at best, is complete and utter bullshit. I get consistent verification of this when I hold court with my female friends because at some point the conversation always comes to relationships. When this happens I stay silent for the most part (as spitting red pill truth gets you nowhere with either sex) but I'll drop in a zinger or two to stir the pot when the conversation gets dull or predictable. Listening to those squeaky hamster wheels whir away is always a good time because eventually the word "friend zone" comes up. And when it does, the speaker's face is almost always etched with disgust, cementing this slogan as a falsity.

A woman doesn't need a man who consoles her, talks about his feelings, and curls up on the couch with her for a chick flick-a-thon. That's what her girlfriends are for. What they need is a lover and protector who keeps her grounded by not feeding into her emotional shenanigans, holds frame, and shows as little vulnerability as possible. Girls need to be able to rely on their men to be the immovable object in their lives—their rock. It is impossible to be these things as her best friend. This becomes evident as the marriage progresses as there will be less sex and more arguments which ultimately leads to you being friend zoned (cuckolded) effectively ending the relationship.

Another relationship close to the end because of feeeeeelings

While it's trendy and chic to proclaim their newly dubbed fiancées as their best friends (or worse, soulmates), unbeknownst to our brothers, those relationships are not long for this world. With each passing tearful conversation over hot chocolate about how she's suffering "harassment" or "discrimination" at the office, she grows less attracted to him. He would do well to remember that the root word in friend zone is friend and adjust his behavior accordingly with the next girl by not abiding by this misnomer.

In closing…

Disney movies and mainstream media are among the major purveyors of the widespread distribution of the above fables. Understanding what they are and why they exist will go a long way in helping men to rid their minds of these untruths. Learning Game will change a man's life for the better but scrubbing our minds of the bogus narrative we've been fed our whole lives regarding the opposite sex is step number one.

Read Next: 4 Lies Men Are Being Told About Women

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

5 Reasons I'm Not "Friends" With Girls

July 22, 2014 | by Café Mocha | Link | Original Link

1. I Want to Fuck Them

I absolutely love having sex with multiple women and simply put, girls do not fuck their friends. If you didn't know that already or if that is a confusing concept, let me make it clearer for you. GIRLS DO NOT FUCK THEIR FRIENDS. I deplore the friendzone, it's a cold and desolate place, full of unsolicited invites to help organize events for people you'll never care about, frustrated nights of platonic cuddling while watching Grey's Anatomy. This is followed by a long depressing masturbation session to ~~facebook pics~~ pornhub videos. But let's not get into that.

My solution: I'm always sexual with girls, I escalate verbally, physically and most important, early. This leaves her with two options. To fuck me or not to fuck me, I negate the friendzone completely with my actions, I do not let her decide for me.

2. I Crave Intelligent Conversation

I'm almost three years into this thing we like to call game, into the manosphere, into "The Red Pill" if you will. That means I'm over that initial psychological barrier of doing whatever it takes get laid. Right now, I do and say what I want and whether that means a lady doesn't spread her legs for me, then so be it. Ironically, more often than not she does anyway. That means if you're stupid and/or boring, I'm going to tell you that you're stupid and/or boring.

Recently, I was out with some friends at a lounge and I start chatting up a lovely young lady from New York City. The conversation was directed towards the New York social life, more specifically socialites. I made a comment about the socialite lifestyle being superficial. Despite not being a socialite herself, she threw a fit about me not knowing what I was talking about and how socialites have a really tough existence. I calm her down and tell her there's no need to turn a debate into an argument. She had presented her points, my rebuttal.

Me: Just to clarify, we're talking socialites as in millionaire heirs and heiresses, that never had to work for anything in their lives, right?

Her: Yes, they have rough lives, I'm friends with them.

Me: So let's say you have a socialite in NYC and you have a man in Zimbabwe, Africa with a wife and 3 kids making $100 a month, barely able to afford meat for dinner once a week. Who has a tougher existence?

Her: (Without missing a beat) The socialite…

Me: (Sarcastically) It was nice meeting you, have a goodnight (I walk away).

The King Kong sized balls on this girl—really she's a hero for holding her frame so strongly. I could learn a thing or two from her. My point isn't that all girls lack intelligence and that men are all geniuses but in my experience, I'm more likely to come across men I can have insightful stimulating conversations with. Why? One, of reasons has to do with the roles we are given growing up but I'll expand my thinking behind that in a future post. My point is that more often than not, girls be stupid and boring.

3. I'm Emotionally Stable

It's traditionally known, that men tend to play the more stoic, emotionally solid role in relationships while women deal with the more emotionally expressive aspects. Without fail every time I go a date, the range of emotions I can see my au pair experiencing is quite amusing and astonishing at the same time. From nervousness to joy, excitement, anger, defiance, curiosity, arousal, hesitance, and finally ecstasy and subservience. I'm exhausted just typing that shit out!

My emotions rarely fluctuate, I do have highs and I have lows every now and again but on a scale of 1–10 with 1 being suicidal, 5 being passively existing and 10 being first man on the moon high. I consistently stay at 7; happy, motivated but grounded. The only people I see going from 0–10 in 60 seconds and vice versa are girls, emotionally unstable men and blue pill men who have succumbed to the will of an emotional vampire (girl).

4. I Do Not Like Texting

Aah, our instagram, twitter #generation. Call me old school, but I prefer to pick up my phone and call people or even more radically actually converse with them in person. In my opinion, the reasons why people tend to gravitate to these 140 characters of data are because they are either intimidated to chat over the phone or feel they do not have much to contribute in the way of conversation. The frequency at which I've seen girls engaged in a thumb war with their smartphones when they are surrounded by actual humans is actually quite distressing. If you agree to meet people for a social interaction quite frankly, shit or get off the pot. Now if you want to talk about my selfie game, that's another story.

5. I Actually Read

I'm not a snob but let's face it—those future pieces of recycled toilet paper rolls girls call novels are nothing more than white noise between the next episodes of True Blood and Pretty Little Liars. Yes, I'm talking about you Twilight, The Hunger Games and Fifty Shades of Grey sheeple. OK, I'm a bit of a snob but I have nothing against fictional novels low and high brow, some of my favorite reads have ranged from Batman Year One by the almighty Frank Miller, to South of the Border, West of the Sun (Haruki Marukami) to the classic Green Eggs and Ham (Dr. Seuss). All you have to do to balance out the mush, is throw in a few gems like, The 4-Hour Workweek (Tim Ferriss), Predictably Irrational (Dan Ariely), or 48 Laws of Power (Robert Greene) ever so often.

The next time you find yourself entering a platonic relationship with a girl, that you find attractive, ask yourself what value she's actually bringing to your life. Is she actually "hilarious?" Are your conversations really that "deep?" Or are your hormones playing you for a fool? Are you subconsciously living out that age-old blue pill romantic comedy fantasy?

Read More: It's Impossible For Women And Men To Be Friends

Café Mocha

Café Mocha is a 22 year old entrepreneur, co-host & co-author of The Red Pill Generation podcast/blog. Currently, embarking on a business venture and journey of self-development in China. He enjoys the finer things in life, self development, fitness, the pursuit of knowledge, friendships and women. He believes in the freedom of choice, the choice of which girl he wants to sleep with on each day of the week. Listen to The Red Pill Generation podcast and follow Café Mocha on Twitter.

The Woman Who Posted Her Husband's 'Sex Spreadsheet' Online Did Men Everywhere A Favour

July 23, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A woman has posted a spreadsheet on Reddit sent to her by her husband detailing her excuses for rejecting him for sex.

	A	B	C
1
2	DATE	SEX?	EXCUSE
3	2014-06-03	No	"I'm watching the show" (Friends re-run)
4	2014-06-04	No	"I feel sweaty and gross. I need a shower" (didn't shower until next morning)
5	2014-06-06	No	(non-verbal)
6	2014-06-09	No	"I'm exhausted"
7	2014-06-10	Yes
8	2014-06-11	No	"I'm still a bit tender from yesterday"
9	2014-06-12	No	(non-verbal)
10	2014-06-13	No	"I'm trying to watch the movie" (fell asleep 15min later)
11	2014-06-16	No	"I'm too drunk and I ate too much"
12	2014-06-18	No	"I won't have time to get showered and ready for dinner" (we were 20min early)
13	2014-06-19	No	"I just came back from the gym, I feel gross" (didn't shower until next morning)
14	2014-06-20	No	(non-verbal)
15	2014-06-21	No	"I have to be up early"
16	2014-06-22	No	(non-verbal)
17	2014-06-27	Yes
18	2014-06-29	No	"You're too drunk"
19	2014-06-30	No	"I feel gross"
20	2014-07-01	No	"I'm not feeling good, I ate too much"
21	2014-07-03	No	"I'm sweaty and gross, and I'm tired"
22	2014-07-04	No	(non-verbal)
23	2014-07-05	No	"I might be getting sick"
24	2014-07-08	No	"I still don't feel 100%"
25	2014-07-10	No	"I need a shower, I feel gross"
26	2014-07-11	No	"I'm too tired"
27	2014-07-12	Yes
28	2014-07-13	No	"No"
29	2014-07-14	No	(non-verbal)
30	2014-07-16	No	"I'm watching my show, I don't want to miss anything"
31
32 33 34
35

Compiled over a month, the excuses range from her prioritizing a Friends re-run over marital intimacy, to consistent references to her feeling too "gross" "sweaty" and "drunk" to make love.

Sounds like a real catch.

The email was sent as the husband set off on a ten-day business trip. He then cut contact with her, causing her to grow incensed and post these most intimate details of their (lack of) a sex life online.

Horrifyingly, both the husband and wife are only 26 years old. They have been together for five years and married for two, with no kids. They own a house together.

The post garnered over 700 comments on Reddit, and the story has been picked up by mainstream media outlets from The Huffington Post to Mail Online.

The wife attempted to justify her emotional betrayal of her partner like this:

> Our lives have been crazy busy. We spent all spring renovating our new house. At my job I was given nearly double my usual workload after some of my colleagues were laid off. I gained some weight in the winter and have been busting my a at the gym to get rid of it.
>
> Yesterday morning, while in a taxi on the way to the airport, husband sends a message to my work email which is connected to my phone.
> He's never done this, we always communicate in person or by text. I open it up, and it's a sarcastic diatribe basically saying he won't miss me for the 10 days I'm gone.
>
> Attached is a SPREADSHEET of all the times he has tried to initiate sex since June 1, with a column for my "excuses", using verbatim quotes of why I didn't feel like having sex at that very moment.

Without a doubt, tiredness and being busy can occasionally have a detrimental effect on the poon party, but three instances of coitus out of twenty-eight attempts is a sexual desert.
I guess the mainstream response to the story has been predictable enough, but it is depressing to observe the degree to which most commentators have taken the wife's side and criticized the husband, calling him cruel and harsh. As always, is is the man who is in the wrong. One (female) commentator on Mail Online wrote:

> Perhaps she has taken five years of this guy only treating her "special" when he wants sex..? Some men seem to not realize what a turnoff this is. You can't treat a girl like crap all day long and expect her to want intimacy at day's end. There is simply no way to satisfy a woman sexually if she is unsatisfied with the rest of the relationship. She may love you enough to put up with it for a while…but she will eventually not be able to fake it anymore.

See how the hamster runs. Without any knowledge of the back story, this writer assumes that the wife has withheld sex as a response to errant behaviour. Sadly, those of us who live on planet earth and interact with women know that sex is far more likely to wither and die in the face of beta supplication than jerkboy aloofness. Do the chores and she won't drop her drawers.

The most common response—even from commentators on the Roosh V forum—has been to describe the guy's strategy as passive aggressive and immature. In my view, words like these are simply shaming tools. Sure, the guy could have "manned up" and spoken to her about the issue—but my bet is that he already had. The spreadsheet feels very much like a last resort, and not one designed, as some have mistakenly deduced, to try to reignite the spark:

> If someone had constructed a spreadsheet of reasons why I wouldn't have sex with them, it would make me instantly want to pounce on their cock and worship them like the god of sex they clearly are. No wait – it would make me feel nauseous and like I didn't want them anywhere near me. That's beyond pathetic.

No. My belief is that he judged a spreadsheet to be the clearest and most logical way to delineate his wife's errant behavior. I don't suppose for a moment he expected it to cause her to run back to him and begin fellating him. Whether it was a beta move or not is still being debated, but there is something quite compelling, almost Bret Easton Ellis dark triad, in sending a formal analysis of one's sex life then going incommunicado on a business trip.

Rather than round in on the husband's supposed immaturity and passive-aggressiveness, people should instead consider the wife's immaturity, the wife's passive-aggressiveness. Not only has she willingly and of her own accord made a legal and ethical commitment which her subsequent lack of sexual interest suggests she shouldn't have made, but she has also chosen to share a private document on the internet. For this she has—bewilderingly—been cheered on by women and manboobs everywhere.

Still, in a way this story has done men a favor. The best creative agency in the world would have been hard-pressed to come up with a more effective advertisement against marriage. Rollo points out that getting hitched is no insulation from the sexual marketplace, and it is a common trope that men need to game their wives. But that's a hell of a lot of work, and with the sexual rewards potentially so low, and with women being a depreciating asset over time, many guys could be forgiven for choosing not to bother and to remain single, learn game and spin plates instead.

Want to learn how to spin plates and enjoy an abundant sex life? Then click here

Read More: 7 Tips for Building A Harem

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

3 Things I Learned After Discovering Red Pill Truths Late In Life

July 23, 2014 | by Dr. Me | Link | Original Link

I'm 39 years old. I first had sex at 17, in the midst of a Seinfeld-like competition with my buddies to see who would be the last to "lose it" and have to wear a yellow shirt with a V for virginity emblazoned on the front of it like a sexless Superman to high school. I didn't lose, but I didn't win either considering the physical attributes of the girl I fucked.

I was born with a very mild case of Cerebral Palsy. Think Walter Jr. from Breaking Bad, just to a lesser degree. I have some loss of fine motor skills, poor balance (friends who have tried to playfully tackle me have knocked me over unintentionally) and a blown-out lower lumbar region that required surgery last year to repair. Other than that I look good with my shirt off (gym 4x per week, now with core strengthening exercises), I'm intelligent enough to write an article for ROK, and am successful on my own terms.

It's not that I wasn't getting laid. I had a strange feeling that I was blowing good opportunities. When I don't understand something or want to learn more, I read. I know nothing about plumbing. The men in my family aren't particularly handy, preferring to "pay the experts" in most cases. I approached my sex life at middle age the same way I approached my toilet when my filler and flusher valves broke at the same time (I now know what these are)—I started reading.

The feeling I got after finding Roosh, ROK and the Rational Male can best be described as having my entire adult sexual life pass before my eyes with all the gory details intact. The one-itis. The credit card bills and ATM receipts that showcased my ability to indulge a woman's every whim. The sore balls encountered during expensive weekends at the beach. The relationships that ended months after they should have, without me knowing. The cheaters that attempted to reconcile with me.

I work in sales and I'm good at it. I enjoy following a process while seeking to understand the real drivers and motivations of my prospects. I firmly believe that everything in life is a sales transaction, including sex and dating. Your wife (I'm not married) wants sushi for dinner and you don't? Better start selling. Your kid gives you an ugly tie for Christmas? Think about how you would respond. The girl next to you at the bar was giving you IOIs but is now looking over your shoulder for her friends? Were you really driving the interaction, or participating in it?

I think this is why I found some common red pill truths so easy to execute in such a short period of time.

1. Go for no!

Several sales books have been written on this subject (see Jim Camp or David Sandler). This was the easiest way for me to learn to maintain my frame, because I was already doing it at work. Simply put, I lead the interaction, and either party can walk away at any time. It's a test of interest level that cuts through the clutter and shows me if I have a live one on the hook. When she wants dinner at an expensive steak house over the weekend (unless I want steak), I'll say I just ate steak and I'm not interested but I'm making chicken enchiladas and she's welcome to come by with a bottle of wine or a six pack if she's hungry. I've honestly never been told no since I started doing this.

A cool new popular bar opened right next to my condo—literally right outside my back door. Former beta me would have worried about the right "time" to bring the girl there. New, "non-natural alpha but learning the science of being more alpha" me requests that every first date drive to that bar to meet me.

Her: Let's go to new hot night spot and blow hundreds of dollars of your money while I rub on you so you get a feel of what I might do after four more dates.

Me: Let's go to new bar right by my house. After we're done drinking, I can take you home and show you my sock collection. I have some very old pairs.

I've used this line word for word and have had the girl laugh and do just what I asked, and gotten laid. I said no to her. I gave her the chance to opt out. She opted in. End of story, deal closed.

2. Always escalate.

I learned that a girl will never punish me for trying to fuck, but very well might punish me for NOT trying. I can't count how many times I took a willing girl home to watch a movie – and watched the movie. I did a great job presenting myself as a boring, cookie cutter guy who was more that capable of killing any sexual desire the girl might have had while her buzz wears off. I was told by several girls over the years that I "wasn't aggressive enough" and I may not be. I don't enjoy dominating women. The ones that ask to be choked out early on I usually won't call back. But there's no sense missing an easy lay-up with a girl I enjoyed being with because I didn't seize the opportunity when it was there.

Now, I go home after dates in the middle of the day, take the girl by the hand and lead her to my room. We can always watch a movie after, and she can always say no.I fucked the last girl I did this with. I made my intentions clear and asked for the sale. I didn't give her a chance to rationalize or think things over.

3. Stop providing so much detail.

This was a big one for me, but also an easy bad habit to un-learn. Because I have a disability I often felt like I had to qualify myself to women in this regard. If a woman (who was probably asking because she was considering taking my seed in one way or another) asked me if “she could ask me something personal” (the usual lead in), or why I looked so stiff, I would launch into a detailed description of cerebral palsy and why I was predisposed to it (premature birth).

Even if a woman did put me on the “fucks” side of the alpha/beta equation, I was causing her to realize very quickly that I wasn’t likely to be the guy with the right genetics to give her kids who would be playing division one college football. Now I simply say, “my back is bad” and shut up. Since everyone on the planet knows someone who has had lower back issues if they don’t have them themselves, this simple statement accounts for my disability while giving it a kind of “social camouflage.” Could have been a sports injury… maybe I did it while skydiving. I went from kisses on the cheek to getting massage offers from girls who were very happy to pass on the jet skiing, which I can’t do anymore. Doctor’s orders.

This goes for work as well. Guess what? No girl I’m trying to fuck really cares what I do for a living. I learned this one because I worked for several start up software companies that never started up and ended up unemployed here and there over the last few years. I got more ass during this time because I had less to talk about. By explaining my complicated career to a girl in detail, I’m really qualifying myself to her in terms she can’t understand anyway. Nothing causes (in my experience) the moisture to dry up faster, although I didn’t know what I was doing at the time. I thought I was just making conversation. “I’m an IT consultant” is plenty, or even “I consult for businesses in the IT field” is good. She gets to tick her “he has a job that doesn’t involve shoveling dirt” box, and if she wants a dirt shoveler, I’m out anyway with little time invested.

The greatest thing I learned was really something I already knew—the truths of human psychology never change and can be easily exploited. I’m guessing that there are probably a lot of guys in my boat—they had the tools all along they just had no idea how to use them in a concise way. The best part has been the learning process itself, and my simply practicing it, I know I’m putting myself ahead of most of the “non-educated” guys out there.

Read More: Go For No

Dr. Me

Dr. Me is a former game denialist who knows that the process of self improvement never stops. He does not have a Facebook page for fear that it will make him a boring one dimensional person who is incapable of bonding with or interacting with people on a personal level.

Game Of Thrones Reminds Us How Monogamy Can Harm Your Masculinity

July 23, 2014 | by Andrian Red | Link | Original Link

Game of Thrones (GoT). The ultimate blockbuster of the present decade. During its episodes we laughed, we cried, we felt excitement, jealousy, arousal and joy. We experienced all these feelings that make a TV show addictive and creates the love-hate connection every aspiring Golden Globe Director wants to achieve.

But most of all, as men we identified ourselves with specific characters. In their faces we found idols, mentors and heroes. Their behaviors and choices made us realize what type of men we are closely related to and how these choices and behaviors can bring you from the bottom to the top and vice versa.

This article is about my desire to analyze three of the most influential GoT male characters and unravel the mystery behind their seductive personas. Behind each character hides a powerful person that tries unapologetically to balance between his dark side and his will for apollonian mastery. These two sides of the same coin are explicitly related to each other and are constantly trying to win the battle over the character's consciousness.

Sometimes this battle works in the character's favor and helps him find his way towards glory and immortality, but some times it can have devastating results for him and his surroundings.

Robb Stark

The King of the North. The predecessor of a dynasty. The only true hope that is left in Westeros. Robb Stark is exactly like his father. Proud, stubborn and with wrong judgment. Despite his intellect and great strategic skills, he lacks social intelligence and the ability to make the right alliances. He thinks that because he is the King of the North and he has a single uncle, he can exchange that for House Frey's help. Wrong!

What distinguishes a great man from a Quintessential Man is his ability to make right choices during chaotic times. He needs to be antifragile. Unfortunately, Robb Stark was blinded by his desire for vengeance and didn't make the right decisions. Decisions that will most probably lead to the end of a dynasty.

Moreover, Robb, despite being young, good-looking and a King, decides to fall in love with a nurse. Most probably because she is the only woman that can match his emotional character.

I have nothing against falling in love because of emotional reasons but let's be serious for a moment. You are in the middle of the most important war of your life. You give your word to a stupid old man that you will marry his daughter because you need his help. And you just break your word because you fell in love? Fail.

Robb Stark wasn't born in the right time. He would have been a great King if he were born in a Lord-of-the-rings-type-elvish-Kingdom, where everything is predictable and no one annoys the elves. In Westeros unfortunately, things are way crueler.

Tyrion Lannister

Tyrion makes great use of his intelligence as a tradeoff for his ugly looks. He has extremely high levels of social intelligence and he uses his language in an exceptional way. He is a good-hearted libertine who constantly challenges the status quo and desperately tries to find the reasoning behind humanity's brutal nature.

His purpose is to find a role in King's Landing and successfully does so by being assigned the role of the Hand of the King. Despite his constant controversy with his nephew and the never-ending insults by the luminaries surrounding him, his charming persona attracts the right allies.

He finds an ally in the face of two of the most heroic characters in the series—His brother Jamie and Prince Oberyl Martell. In the end, unfortunately for him, he cannot stand the insults anymore and loses his temper, thus resulting to him being accused of his nephew's murder.

Tyrion is a womanizer like most of GoT male characters, but for some reason he has a huge weakness for whores. One of them, Shae, becomes obsessed over him and wants to force him into a monogamous relationship. She finds it difficult to understand the implications of such an event and despite Tyrion's thoughtful attempts to save her, she refuses to compromise. This results to her being blinded by jealousy and vengefully tries to accuse him of rape and mistreatment. Apart from that, she goes a step further and finds a new lover/protector in the face of his father Tywin. We all know how that ends.

Tyrion is one of my favorite dramatic characters in the series because he represents the typical guy who despite his intelligence, is so self-conscious about his looks that he falls into the trap of falling in love with the first woman that shows real interest in him.

Khal Drogo

The ultimate Warrior. The Quintessential Alpha Male. The embodiment of testosterone. He is strong, cunning, intelligent and ruthless. Everyone respects him and everyone fears him. He has no fear of death and his every action is accompanied by a brutal ending.

His only weakness? Love.

It is very difficult not to fall in love with the mother of dragons. This amazingly beautiful creature that balances sexuality and cuteness in an exceptional way. But come on, when you are the leader of a bloodthirsting tribe of warriors, love is a word that does not exist in your vocabulary.

As we all know, love can make you blind and dictate some of your most thoughtless actions. This is exactly what happened to Khal Drogo. He decided to take a break from his brutal reality and step down and enjoy the fruit of monogamy. This comes with a price. The moment you decide to commit yourself to a monogamous relationship, “me” becomes “we” and strength usually becomes a weakness.

Khal Drogo’s brutal strategy served him well until he decided to let Danaerys influence him. He made decisions based on emotion and not on logic (his logic at least). His decision to save some slaves instead of killing them, simply to please his wife, leads to unintended consequences. By breaking the bro code, he pisses off one of his most skillful warriors, who challenges him to a battle. Obviously Khal destroys him but one of the hits wounds him heavily. Danearys asks him to accept help from a witch she trusts and in return she vengefully infects him and he soon worsens to the point of death.

Despite his brutal nature, Drogo represented everything we want to see in an alpha male. He changed his way just to please his wife. He paid the consequences.

Read More: Who Is The Biggest Alpha Male On Game Of Thrones?

Andrian Red

Andrian is a lifelong learner, devoted skeptic and ethical hedonist. He is the founder of www.thequintessentialman.com, the only online community that offers a holistic approach to masculine self-growth. He is also the creator of "30 Challenges-30 Days-Zero Excuses", a challenging project aimed to help men take back control of their life.

Do Not Work In A Job That Employs Women

July 24, 2014 | by Mjolnir | Link | Original Link

Division of labor according to sex has been a feature of human societies since the beginning. There are even theories by some anthropologists that this division was what allowed Homo Sapiens to decisively pull ahead of their competitors. World War II and the ensuing scourge of feminism changed all of that in America and Europe. In part, this was a reflection of how industries were changing. Where farms and factories once employed most of the population, the country workforce shifted towards clerical and service work. Fortunately, there are still plenty of occupations that are dominated by men where you can escape the tyranny that is the modern feminist dominated work place. Given that so many jobs including women are legal minefields, as well as unpleasant and inhospitable to the masculine man, there are many reasons you should consider a change to a job where you can work in an all male environment.

Escape The Tyranny Of Political Correctness

In the unisex working environment of hypersensitive America, a man must constantly watch what he says for fear of blaspheming against the pantheon of political correctness. Even the most innocuous statement can be twisted to make your work life a hell. An honest critique of a female's performance can damage your career permanently. Contrast this with the all-men work place, where honest criticism is given without any sugar coating, where jokes can be told without a glance over the shoulder, and where bonding by constantly giving each other shit in good fun is the norm. I don't think it is hyperbole to conclude that American work culture is taking on shades of the Soviet Union, where one verbal misstep could get you up Shit Creek without a paddle. The things men do and say to each other can be silly, juvenile, or even downright cruel, but this behavior is absolutely necessary for men to become men, and there is no doubt we are atrophying as a society as it is suppressed.

Learn The True Meaning Of Teamwork

Are men or women better at working in teams? Although men are more individualistic, assertive, and aggressive, it is these very qualities that make them better at working in groups. Of course, it is a tired feminist talking point that "women value cooperation more than men do." The truth is that women avoid overt conflict, but they love to keep drama bubbling under the surface. This translates to an atmosphere of mistrust in many teams that include women, even if females are experts at maintaining saccharine appearances.

Working with men only, one will find that conflicts are taken care of on the spot, preventing interpersonal problems from compounding; the assertiveness and aggression of men strengthens the group rather than weakens it. Working without the tensions that women cultivate, men are able to coalesce into ruthlessly efficient teams accomplishing feats from the heroic to the mundane that we take for granted (here, here, and here). Cooperative behavior releases dopamine to the brain in humans, which explains the immense pride that comes when you're part of a group of men able to fight and work almost as one man, sometimes without even speaking. Camaraderie has been the drug of choice for men for time immemorial, and women's preference for conflict destroys this.

Rediscover A Healthy Sense Of Mystery Around The Opposite Sex

In the past, men and women led lives that were parallel and interdependent but usually very separate. Men and women mingled together only at certain times of the day, or sometimes only certain times of the week or even year in the case of people who lived in rural areas. Every man enjoys the company of women, but most men become fatigued with too much. When men and women work separately, it cultivates a natural mystery and respect, so that time that men and women spend together is more appreciated. Presently, the sexes know each other too intimately, and familiarity leads to contempt. As any man who knows the ins and outs of the female mind will attest, the better you get to know women, the more you dislike them. Working a long day in the world of the masculine workplace, with its attendant cursing, laughing, and rough masculinity, one appreciates the contrasting feminine much more when he goes back to his woman (or women). Compare this with the modern workplace, where many men are so tired of feminine pettiness and drama by the end of the day that the prospect of being around women in the evening is exhausting.

Enjoy A New Pride Doing A Man's Work

Men take immense pride in doing "a man's work." Men always have and always will dominate the occupations that involve risk taking, danger, quick thinking under pressure, strength, and small margins for error. Firefighters, pilots, trial lawyers, elite military forces, oilfield workers, and engineers are still mostly “boys only clubs” and for good reason. In fact, you can tell a lot about how important a particular job is by the degree to which it excludes women. A formerly masculine profession is surely stagnating when it starts to include women, as is the case with Silicon Valley. Men who work in these “boys only clubs” are always more full of life and pride because they sense, either consciously or unconsciously, that they are doing something important. The mixed sex work place goes a long ways towards explaining the nihilism and listlessness of the modern man; doing busy work that can be done just as easily by an empowered woman, he instinctively knows that his masculine identity is null.

Ditch The Corrosiveness That Women Bring To All Male Groups

In naval tradition, it was considered bad luck to have a woman on a ship, and this was more than a mere superstion ion. The introduction of a woman to an all male environment changes an atmosphere instantly. Obviously, there is the distraction, as focus that should be used to get work done is funneled into thoughts of fucking. But the really corrosive effect of women in all male workplaces is how it affects the way men treat each other. No longer are other men comrades and friends; they are competitors. This happens subconsciously, as men start to be suspicious of others and subtle posturing and power plays start. Once again, we see that the wisdom of our forefathers is usually superior to modern philosophies.

Conclusion

If you don’t already work in an all male occupation, you should explore ways to move into one. There are many fewer female free jobs than formerly, but they can be found with a little bit of digging. Perhaps I will write a post soon exploring the options available to young men starting their lives and older men looking to restart their lives (as an aside, one direction that I will specifically recommend against is the military; it has been thoroughly corrupted by feminism). If you’re ready to do embark on a path that will give you new respect for yourself and other men, start moving towards an all male job immediately. Your soul and your sanity will thank you for it.

Read Next: 8 Tips For Getting Laid At Work

Mjolnir
Mjolnir is a former military officer who works in the oil fields of North Dakota and Montana. He spends his free time reading, writing, shooting, and improving his remote forest homestead in the North Woods of Minnesota. He also travels to climb, hike, sea kayak and enjoy women. Mjolnir despises multiculturalism, feminism, and their associated cancers.

How To Remove Genital Warts On Your Penis Using Apple Cider Vinegar

July 24, 2014 | by Dr. Nick | Link | Original Link

I've had two bouts of genital warts during my life. Before you get judgmental and say I should have wrapped it up, one of the bouts occurred in the area outside of the condom. Each episode came with roughly 5-15 warts during a several month time span. The eruptions stopped presumably after my body got a handle on the infection.

Genital warts on your penor tend to be quite small (the pictures you see on the internet are horrific worst case scenarios). You probably won't notice them unless you closely inspect your penis or feel a bump when masturbating. They tend to be flesh colored or darker than your skin tone and circular in shape. If you can't scrap it off with your nail, there's a good chance it's a wart.

Before I tell you how I removed my warts, I strongly recommend you see a dermatologist for treatment (full disclosure: I'm not a doctor). It's possible you may have molluscum or some type of rash. If they're warts, the dermatologist will likely use liquid nitrogen to freeze them off, a great zap-it-and-forget-it solution that is less cumbersome than what I'm about to show you. Home treatment is more for those who are low on funds, can't get a fast appointment to the dermatologist, or know 100% that they have a wart and don't feel like going to the doctor.

I learned about apple cider vinegar from the Earth Clinic forum. There you can read dozens of stories of how people used ACV to remove their genital warts, which works because the acetic acid in the ACV causes a localized skin response that kills the wart.

Here are the things you'll need:

- apple cider vinegar from the supermarket (any brand, with or without 'the mother')
- toilet paper
- bandaids
- tweezers (optional)

Here are the steps to remove your wart:

1. Tear off a little piece of toilet paper

2. Fold the toilet paper into a small square

3. Soak the toilet paper in ACV

4. Place the toilet paper directly on the wart with tweezers and cover with a bandaid

5. In 4-6 hours, remove the toilet paper square and repeat steps 1-4

Do a fresh application before you go to sleep. Keep treatments going round-the-clock for approximately 36-60 hours until your skin starts to scab up or turn dark red. Before then you will notice the wart changing color to black then to translucent white with a black dot center, though it may be different for you. When you see scabbing, your skin is essentially saying “enough” and forming a barrier to prevent further damage by the acid. Your treatment round is over.

Once you stop the treatment, your scab will further darken and then heal within one week. The scab will shed on its own and fresh pink skin will be underneath. The wart you had will either disappear entirely or be significantly smaller. Give your skin at least a one week break before applying another round if needed. It’s important to state that ACV really works—I’ve never been unable to remove a wart using it. Most warts only take one treatment round.

Helpful notes:

—When you first start the treatment, you won’t feel any pain when applying the ACV, but after the first day or so, it will begin to burn like hell. This is good—burning is the wart leaving the body. If you’re not feeling a burn that lasts for several minutes, the wart is not being hurt. Don’t be scared that your skin is turning raw. No pain, no gain.

—You may want to tell any girl you’re raw dogging about your ongoing treatment. I have found that girls are surprisingly understanding about this. I’ve read that warts are most infectious when they are visible, so definitely use a condom until the warts are completely gone.

—It may take you some time to master the applications. I used to apply pieces of cotton from cotton balls but found them to be inferior to toilet paper, which retains the ACV moisture for much longer. I also discovered that bandaids are better than adhesive tape in staying attached to your penis without causing irritation. You may have to experiment with your materials.

Warts are annoying but thankfully they are temporary in that you get an eruption wave upon infection and then a tapering down period. With ACV, you can quickly and easily treat them at home without any major interruption to your bachelor lifestyle. It also works on warts found anywhere else on your body.

Read Next: 5 Surprising Uses For Baking Soda

Dr. Nick

Dr. Nick is not a doctor, but appreciates home remedies that work.

Top 5 Best Bars In Washington DC To Meet Women In 2014

July 24, 2014 | by Virgle Kent | Link | Original Link

DC can be a tricky place to go out in. You can read plenty of statistics and see that there is about a three to one girl to guy ratio. It should be a single man's paradise on paper, but what those study don't tell you or doesn't take into account is the DC female population's average look, so bring that number down to 2 to 1 true girl to guy ratio. Now take into account the average weight of a typical DC girl now the ratio is about 1 to 1 of eligible guys and the real number of datable/bangable DC women. Now take into account the remaining attractive women will be constantly bombarded by the most powerful alphas with political connections and money then you can see in reality DC is one of the hardest cities for single guys to date in.

From going out in DC for over ten years and since I've started teaching my wingman workshop I have found that the great equalizer is knowing where to go out to meet the top one on one female to guy ratio and also encounter the least competition. How many pictures has Roosh put up of an average DC night spot showing three to five pink dots for females and twenty blue dots for males? At the same time I've been in some establishments where my friends and I were outnumbered by attractive females 3 to 1. This heavenly scenario happened for maybe two to three hours but I found if I return during the same night and time period I had a similar ratio.

The top five best places to go out in DC all depend on the night of the, maybe specific hours during that time period and what that establishment is known for. The scene can get a little bit more complicated depending on the type of girls you like and where they like to hang out at. Without further ado the top five best places in DC to go out with wingmen.

1. Barcelona on U street (the get-the-night-started spot)

- Best time to go HH to about 10:30pm Tuesday through Saturday
- Type of women mid-twenties to cougar all different nationalities, career women, preppy
- Male competition is nonexistent mostly gay men during these time period.

Barcelona is a swanky upscale Spanish wine and tapas restaurant on the lower part of U street right above Logan Circle. This is where the upper echelon of the DC working girls and socialites all meet to get wine and share different small plates of food. If you ever enter this location on a busy night then you'll quickly notice that there's approachable groups of girls and a large number of gay men. A lot of straight men in DC are busy pregaming at home or drinking at a sports bar and quickly over look this location because of the price, but if you designate Barcelona as your primary meet up spot to start the night then you'll discover that you will be showered by plenty of female attention.

The girls meet around 5:30 or 6 in the bar area and will have been sipping white wine and gossiping for a few hours. Once you and your wingman show up they're more than ready to be approached and talk with attractive straight men who have game. If you're looking for an easy way to get the juices flowing and your confidence up with approaching women Barcelona is the location to start your night.

2. Lost Society on U street (Best Thursday night rooftop international spot)

- Best time to go Thursday nights: 11pm to 2am summertime rooftop
- Type of women: International. You'll fine Europeans, Eastern European, South American, Asian
- Male competition: few single guys usually foreign guys that come with groups of their girls already. Easy to jump between groups.

There are plenty of rooftops all over U Street and on any given night they're all good. But on Thursday nights for some reason Lost Society located on 14th and U street is probably the best. It gets crowded but expect to find plenty of Russian women or turn around and talk to a German au pair. The international vibe of the place is open and friendly and not one that's stuck up or hostile like some other international lounges in DC. Girls go there to talk to guys so if you and your wingman are trying to talk to foreign friendly girls maybe here for the summer this is the place to go out on a school night. The DJ's they usually have play incredible house music as well.

3. Mari Vanna on Dupont Circle (best Russian lounge… period)

- Best time to go: Wednesday night Karaoke, Friday and Saturday nights starting at 11pm

- Type of women: Russians
- Male Competition: Russian men who come with their girls or in groups but besides that not much non-Russian men to go against Mari Vanna is three level Russian restaurant that turns the top level into a lounge/ club after 10 pm. If you love fresh off the boat Russian women then this is the place you need to be at without a doubt. Not only Russian but Ukrainians, Romanians, Uzbekistan—all over the former Soviet Union. The place is easy to miss and usually the door is closed so from the outside it just looks like a busy restaurant but once you get to the top floor you'll be transported to another dimension you didn't know existed.

This is where you'll find the best concentration of 8s to 10s in DC hands down. Of course if you don't speak a little Russian then you're starting from a very steep hill. Knowing just a little bet can get your foot in the door and is enough to win the bartenders over and remember you for service. The music is international and Russian disco. The Russian men aren't a threat because they usually came with their women or don't see you as a threat to take their women from them. Put it this way they're there to drink and catch up not pick up more Russian women.

4. Town Hall Georgetown Glover Park via North of Georgetown (best spot for preppy girls)

- Best time to go: Saturday nights when it gets dark
- Type of women: slightly older (but under 30) preppy girl
- Male competition: tons but the thing is this place is still a 1 to 1 ratio of attractive girls to guys

The thing about Town Hall is that it's a fun place to hang out with your wingman. Plenty of attractive high class older preppy girls who's mom and dad still help them out with their rent three years after graduating Georgetown. At first the small down side is that it's an extremely preppy Georgetown type. You know what I'm talking about—J. Crew, Ralph Lauren, Tommy Hilfiger madra shorts wearing crowd. Your natural instinct maybe to try and conform to this environment but if you know game then you'll already know that the more you stand out the better your chances of getting noticed and attention.

Usually having more of a bad boy style, showing off tattoos, and being a little rough around the edges helps you to carry on conversations longer. The girls are still in their sorority drunk stage so wait a few hours and you'll be surprised how hard it is to get them to shut up. If you know how to carry a conversation and have a good wingman you'll have a great opportunity to open up tons of preppy sets at this location. All you have to do is remember the typical preppy guys these girls are used to talking to and be the exact opposite.

5. El Centro DF U street (best Latin club/lounge)

- Best time to go: Thursday (11:30) Friday and Saturday HH and all night
- Type of women: Latin and all types of women who love Latin music
- Male competition: men who know how to dance to Latin music.

I've been in DC and have seen plenty of Latin and Salsa clubs come and go but by far hands down the best is El Centro on 14 and U street area. It's one of the few Latin spots where actual Latin people actually enjoy going to. In the dark, grimy basement you will find tons of girls lined up by the bar and dance floor looking to be twirled around by men who know how to salsa or bachata or whatever is the new cool Latin dance craze. Here's the thing… I hate El Centro because I can't dance any of those dances. But I still go because I've been able to offset the lack of having Latin moves with a few power game moves.

For instance, I find a cute girl who's friend or friends are busy dancing and she's chilling on the side solo and then I chat her up. At this point if a girl isn't getting any male interaction but her friends are having fun you'll be surprised to how open they are for conversation. Another scenario is to admit you don't know what you're doing but to give it a try anyways. Luckily I do have enough rhythm to fake it and as long as you're willing to give it a shot you don't have to be the best dancer in the world.

Find a girl who doesn't know how to dance to the Latin music and dance or with her regularly. Along with a nice dark basement there's a rooftop patio that are filled with girls there for the fresh air and strong margaritas. On some nights this is a better alternative than going downstairs into a sweaty basement. On weekends between 10 and 12 the rooftop is alive with large groups of girls also there to meet men. If you start here with your wingman and get a girl or two to come with you to dance then the battle is halfway done.

There you have it. Going out in DC in a favorable environment comes down to strategy and timing. A favorable location can become unfavorable within hours of arriving as if the attractive women all migrate to another location knowing the next location is just as vital as well. Remember these top five best places in DC if you ever find yourself in a bar or lounge and you wonder where all the attractive girls in DC are. While running my wingman workshops I've been able to find smaller less crowded bars that triangulate off of some of these locations where you can find smaller groups of girls not looking for a crowded scene to go out in.

Also as a side note I purposefully left off all the big name K street clubs in DC. Sure this would be the place to find the top 1% of attractive females in any race or nationality but by now everyone knows the amount of energy, finance, and level of bullshit you'd have to put up with is not worth even recommending for a proper night out with your wingman.

If you're interested in learning about more of DC's hidden gems and going out with a with a wingman that can back you up with the skills needed to pick up, contact me directly at or read more about how I can help you.

Read Next: How To Run Game In 2014

Virgle Kent
VK is just a man. Your favorite blogger's favorite blogger.

What’s An Athlete To Do When It Comes To Rings Vs. Money?

July 25, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Recently, NBA player Lebron James “shocked” the sports world by signing a new contract with his hometown, and nearly always mediocre, Cleveland Cavaliers. To do so, he ditched the Miami Heat, whom he had gone to the NBA Finals with the last four years – winning his first two NBA Finals of his professional career. While I won’t go into the absurdity that was ESPN’s LeBron free agency circus, to say that LeBron held the entire NBA in a waiting game would be an understatement.

While there is little to no doubt that LeBron’s focus is his legacy, he is also in the unique position of being a big enough celebrity that he will have endorsement, movie offers, and other revenue streams available him until the day he dies. He can make the “right” move of chasing championships and building his legacy.

However, guys like Chris Bosh and Carmelo Anthony aren’t in the same position.

Bosh and Anthony, like LeBron, were both in the positions of being unrestricted NBA free agents this summer. Any team that offered them a contract, they could have signed with – assuming of course, that cap space and contract negotiations all fell in to place. However, their home teams, Anthony's New York Knicks and Bosh's Miami Heat, both had an advantage over other teams in that they could offer a larger monetary contract. Anthony re-signed with New York for $122 million over five years, while Bosh re-upped for $118 million over five years in Miami.

However, both of those teams are, at best, mediocre. There is a good chance Bosh will never win another NBA championship, and unless Anthony gets a lot of help from the newly-hired Phil Jackson in New York, he very well might retire ring-less. Bosh passed up $88 million over four years with the Houston Rockets, which would have been a championship caliber team, and Anthony passed up an opportunity to sign for probably about $60 million over four years with the Chicago Bulls.

Which brings us to the question:

Rings Or Money?

What is the real alpha play in this situation?

It's important to realize that both Anthony and Bosh are a step (or two) below LeBron's level. They will never have the "global icon" and branding that he does. When their career is done, they will never again come close to the current level of income stream that they make playing professional basketball.

Frankly, I don't blame them for taking the money. They both would have left a lot of money on the table had they signed with a new team.

Money Mismanagement

Don't get me wrong, both of these guys should be in a position to live comfortably the rest of their lives. If I was handed a check for the extra $30 million Bosh got by re-signing with the Heat, I'd be retiring at the ripe age of 23 and never working another day in my life. The money shouldn't matter to these basketball players, but it does.

It's only natural that, when your income goes up, your lifestyle and amount of spending rises in conjunction. So sure, these players are raking in millions every year to play basketball, but their lifestyles are so extravagant, their wives so spoiled (looking at you, Melo), and expectations so high – they have no choice but to take the money.

Basketball Players Vs. Worker Bees

If you think about it, basketball players are not that much different than men who are stuck in their dreadful office job. They are slaves to their income stream. While they do differ in that worker bees report every day to make a few thousand dollars a paycheck, while players often make the average annual salary in a single game – the basketball players are forced to take the higher income contract because they need that income stream.

So while you might envy the ball players for their millions of dollars, lavish parties, and athletic abilities – you should realize that they are not that different. This shows in the attitudes and actions of players such as Chris Bosh and Carmelo Anthony.

They are just slaves to money, giving up their opportunities of hoisting championship banners just to make a few extra million. They fear the risk, they fear the failure. They are no different from the man stuck in the cubicle, wasting away – afraid to break the shackles and become a free man.

Maybe there isn't so much to be envious of after all.

Read More: Learn To Be An Alpha From Athletes

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

10 Tips For Finding A Quality Filipina Online

July 25, 2014 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

A few months ago I was on a mission. It had been a couple of years since my last real vacation outside the United States (in excess of 48 hours, anyway). Being fed up with American women, and all of their annoying horse shit, began to wear me down a bit. I needed to feel invigorated by women again. I was tired of hearing stories about tattoos, and even more tired of looking at them. I was sick of hearing about careers and reality TV. I was sick of how blatantly fake they were. I was even sick of fucking them. A genuine man that's true to himself doesn't suffer American women well; I was completely burnt out. Having a casual arrangement with a somewhat Americanized Asian woman, while more fulfilling than your typical American chick, still wasn't hitting the sweet spot. It was time to mix things up a bit and venture far from home for a little while.

I decided on the Philippines. I've been all around this God forsaken planet, seen a ton of cool shit, and slept with some beautiful women. However, I have a soft spot for the Philippines. Why? I don't know. There are Asian countries with better looking women and better living conditions, but I always have a great time there. This was going to be my third trip. On my first two trips, the focus was on getting laid—a lot. So, that's what I did—a lot. This time my priorities had shifted. I met and talked with a lot of different Filipina's on my first two trips, and there are some high quality women there. I wanted to find one of these high quality women for myself and see how things went.

I did an eight week pre-trip seek and destroy mission on a few dating sites. My goal was to find an attractive, respectable, and feminine Filipina between 20-24 years old. It took me eight days of searching to find what I was looking for. She only had one boyfriend in the past and they were together for four years—she had been single for nearly a year and a half when we first began contact with no casual flings or one-night stands during that time period. She spoke excellent English, had a good job, and was well educated. She knew how to cook and liked to clean (yes, she actually enjoyed cleaning). Clearly, this girl would be considered a unicorn if she lived in the U.S.

This article will offer some general guidelines to follow if you decide to go unicorn hunting for yourself in the Philippines. More importantly, it will show you how to avoid the ones that have an empty toilet paper roll duct taped to their foreheads masquerading as unicorns.

1. Look Off The Beaten Path

It's very easy to go with what you know. When you think of the Philippines, you probably think of Manila, Cebu City, or Davao. When a foreigner thinks of America, they generally think of New York City, Washington DC, or Los Angeles. Now, who here reading this thinks of NYC, DC, or LA when it comes to relationship material women? No one. Those cities are for getting laid (LA and NYC anyway), not finding a prospective long-term partner. Think the same way with the Philippines.

Granted, there are good women in the large popular cities—it's just a product of the culture there. However, in the more provincial cities or towns, the women will be less exposed to the typical trappings of big city life. In addition, you'll seem more exotic and unique due to the lack of foreigners visiting the more obscure areas.

2. Pay Attention To Their Profile Pictures

Not just how good they look or their fashion sense. I'm talking about surroundings. The Philippines is a poor country. If a girl's profile says that she works part-time in a laundry shop, yet her pictures show her sunbathing near opulent swimming pools, posing on beds in five star hotel rooms, or dining in super classy/expensive looking restaurants—then there's something going on. Who do you think is taking those pictures of her in that bikini at an expensive resort? It ain't her fucking grand pappy, I can just about promise you that. Someone is paying for all of that shit, and it isn't her. She could be running around with numerous dudes both foreign and domestic. She may be a prostitute. Hell, swindling foreign men out of money could be her full-time job. This is all a possibility.

There is a chance that the pictures are from a family trip, wedding, or other special occasion. If you really like a particular woman despite her shady photographs, then initiate contact with her. Move quickly and start asking questions about where the pictures were taken and how long ago. Ask about how she traveled there if the pictures weren't taken in her hometown. Ask if she went with friends, colleagues, or classmates. Interrogate the fuck out of her discretely through the guise of genuine curiosity about the Philippines and the places she visited. If the smell of shit begins to hit your olfactory receptors—then it's coming from her. If things pass the sniff test initially, bring it up again in the future to make sure details haven't changed. There are a ton of girls on these sites and there's no reason to get wrapped up with one that seems sketchy. Think of these pictures in the same way you would a photo of an American girl with duckface holding a cocktail at the club—don't trust, and damn sure verify.

3. Be Her First Foreigner

Don't follow up behind other Americans or westerners. If she's had other western men visit her in the past—even just one—then those men have set the standards in her mind for how foreign men behave, or should behave. Most guys that go to the Philippines to meet a woman are weak and beta. As a means of compensating for their lack of knowledge when dealing with women, they will shower them with gifts, luxuries, and undue praise. Western men do this while allowing these women to get away with shit they would never dream of attempting with Filipino men. Fuck those guys. They're doing it wrong.

Back in the day, when I was earning my flight instructor's certificates, we had to learn Thorndike's Laws of Learning. One of the laws of learning is that of primacy. The law of primacy states the following:

> Primacy, the state of being first, often creates a strong, almost unshakable, impression. Things learned first create a strong impression in the mind that is difficult to erase. For the instructor, this means that what is taught must be right the first time. For the student, it means that learning must be right. "Unteaching" wrong first impressions is harder than teaching them right the first time. If, for example, a student learns a faulty technique, the instructor will have a difficult task correcting bad habits and "reteaching" correct ones.

This applies to female behavior just as much as it does to student pilots learning to fly airplanes. Don't throw on a hardhat and play construction worker in an attempt to rebuild a faulty foundation laid by some other guy. Be the man that sets the standards, not the one that is saddled with the task of rectifying a poorly set precedence. If you find a virgin, which aren't terribly uncommon, all the better.

4. Beware Of Sob Stories

The average person doesn't have much money or very many creature comforts in the Philippines. Things we take for granted like central heating and air conditioning, insect-free housing, and even 24 hours a day of electricity aren't there for many Filipina's. A good girl isn't going to cry a river about these things—she's used to them. She's used to hardship and struggle. It's just a part of life for the majority of people living there. If you're interacting with a Filipina and she starts going on about how she doesn't have this or she doesn't have that, then it's only a matter of time before she starts asking for money.

To put it bluntly: you're not running a fucking soup kitchen. You're running a life—your life. That may sound cruel or calloused, but that's just the way shit goes. If you're the type of guy that feels the need to be a savior all the time, then you're going to get taken for one hell of a ride in the Philippines. Friends, family, and the girl in question may attempt to suck you dry, and I'm not talking about your dick either. If a girl asks for money, or if it looks like the discourse between the two of you may head in that direction, cut it off then and there.

I've personally never had a woman ask me for money. This is in both online and real life interactions. I set the tone early on that I'm not an ATM machine and the women have always respected that. I suggest you do the same.

Also, this will be speculative on my part, but it's important to say even if it might offend the delicate sensibilities of some readers: the greater your age difference, the more likely you'll be asked for money. If you're a sloppy out of shape 45 year old dude and you're pursuing hot 18-25 year olds, then don't be surprised if they don't "like you for who you are". Be reasonable with your expectations.

I've met a few westerners during my travels in the Philippines who were down and out because the girl they were pursuing was just using them. That's no way to spend a vacation. Don't be a fucking dumbass that thinks women will be genuine with their intentions just because you're white or have a blue passport. It's completely naïve to think that way, and being naïve in an impoverished third world country is no way to be.

All of this will also tie in with number nine quite nicely.

5. Education Is Not Necessarily A Bad Thing

There are hints of cultural feminism in the Philippines. It's not intrusive like it is here in the States, but it does exist in small doses. If you do encounter cultural feminism, you can thank American influence through movies, music, and other forms of media. However, feminism in the employment or education spheres is basically nonexistent. There are no enrollment quotas on the basis of being male or female like there are in America. This means girls in the Philippines that go to college or university are actually pretty smart in most cases.

Femininity, humility, and intelligence are pretty damn sexy when intermingled with one another. The quality of spoken English tends to be far superior with an educated woman than with an average girl as well. If you're the type of guy that gets turned off by educated women in the States (like me), then you can lighten up when dealing with Filipina's. Even if they're educated they tend to be very friendly, polite, and ego free.

Bear in mind, education does not necessarily mean significantly better pay. Just because a girl has a degree and a good job doesn't mean she's making bank. A girl working at SM Mall makes about 6,000-8,000 pesos a month. A teacher, nurse, or government employee with a degree makes about 10,000-15,000. It's better for them, of course, but it's only about an extra 100-200 bucks a month in reality—not life changing money by any means. As a result, you won't have to deal with any kind of money snobbery.

6. Utilize Technology

Skype, Viber, Snapchat, Yahoo Messenger etc. These are all very important to have at your disposal and they're all free. This is where you get down to business and really learn about the girl you're talking to. During the seven weeks I talked to my girl prior to visiting, I had seen, talked to, and knew the names of her entire family, co-workers, roommate, and neighbors. I saw her apartment and the farm she grew up on. I even saw the damn Caribou her father uses to plow his crops.

Skype did that for me. I felt like I pretty much had full disclosure on this girl before we met. Most importantly, I didn't have to pry and work for any of this. She did it on her own volition. A woman that likes you will want you to know her people and, if she comes from a good family, they will want to know you too. It raises red flags if she's hiding either people, places, or things from you. This includes wanting to meet you in a city other than where she lives.

7. Test Early And Often

If you think shit-testing is just for women, then you're dead wrong. Call it "good girl testing" or "true intentions testing"—I don't care what you call it, but don't be reticent when it comes to asking about things you want to know or having her do things you want done. I gave the girl I visited a huge shit-test. I told her that I was going to spend three days in Manila before I went to her city, and I didn't tell her why. She assumed it was because I was going to see other women and fuck them. Well, yeah, if she failed the test that's exactly what I would have done.

The reason for this shit-test was because at one point in our early conversations, she told me she had some money saved up. So, I wanted to see if she would spend some of that money to meet me in Manila. I told her if she bought her own plane ticket to Manila that she wouldn't regret the decision. She passed—she bought her own round trip ticket and was waiting for me when my flight arrived.

Understandably, many women aren't going to have the resources to make that kind of thing happen. Just keep your eyes peeled for opportunities to test, and do so as often as possible. It can be something as simple as having her take several pictures of a hotel, apartment, or pension house you're thinking of staying at. Put her in motion on your behalf with whatever you see fit. If she's lazy, complains, or flat-out says no—send her on a long walk down FuckOff Boulevard.

8. Don’t Be Too Much Of An Asshole

I know, you’re probably thinking, “What the fuck AV8R? You made some poor third world girl splurge her savings to buy a plane ticket, and now you’re going to talk about how not to be an asshole?” Correct, that’s exactly what I’m going to do. The reason for not being an asshole is simple: you don’t need to be. Do you need to be masculine, firm, and confident? Yes. Do you need to be the same asshole that American women require you to be? No. You will certainly need to demonstrate leadership qualities and command the relationship. This shouldn’t be difficult because you’re a man and that’s what you’re supposed to do anyway. It’s a common theme around here: feminine women like masculine men. Be masculine in a traditional sense and you can’t lose.

9. Have Experience With Women Before You Go

If you don’t have any experience with women in your own stomping grounds—you’re in a pretty unenviable position. It’s very easy to swear off American women altogether and just say, “Fuck it, I’m done dealing with these hoes”, but you’re doing yourself a major disservice by cutting them off. Look, I’m fully aware of how much the women here suck. Understandably, it’s very easy to view foreign women as your salvation when all you have for comparison are the turds floating around the United States.

The thing is, though, you need a good bullshit detector with all women, and this is no different with women outside American borders. Your bullshit detector is fine-tuned and honed through experience and exposure. There’s no other way to do it. If you live in America, then the only way to really do it is with American women. And Lord knows, American women are more than willing to give you a plate stacked with extra shitty bullshit served with your choice of two sides of bullshit.

Maybe you’re a virgin, recently divorced after a long marriage, or relatively inexperienced in general. If that’s the case, I fear you may be a decent blowjob away from falling in love with some predator that may be looking to take you for all your worth. This can be exacerbated when you’re in a foreign land and everything is new and very interesting to you. You’ll be in full-fledged honeymoon mode with your girl and your surroundings. The conditions in America will seem much worse to you when you’re in the midst of a great vacation and getting sex around the clock with a girl you’re really attracted to. That’s where previous experience comes into play. It will keep you grounded throughout your trip and keep the rose tinted glasses from blocking reality. Logic is your friend, don’t fuck-over your friends.

Look at it this way. You can read about flying airplanes all day long and even consume enough knowledge to talk about it like you know your shit, but I sure as hell wouldn’t want to watch you attempt a landing if you’ve only learned about it through books, websites, and Youtube videos. You need to actually fly to be good at it—no matter how much of a natural you are. The same thing applies to your relationships with women. You can read articles on ROK all damn day, but it doesn’t mean jack shit if it’s all theory and zero implementation.

This is probably the most important item on this list. Take it for what it’s worth.

10. Have A Backup Plan

I definitely had my sights on the girl I visited, but don’t think for a second I didn’t have two other women in both the city she lived in and back in Manila to fall back on if needed. My girl worked half-days when I was there. While she was working, I was in the malls talking and flirting with women. If she slipped up, she would’ve been replaced quicker than a set dead batteries in Lindy West’s vibrator.

Have a plan B (and C) in place before you arrive in the Philippines. That way you won’t waste too much of your valuable time trying to figure something out if things don’t go as planned.

In Closing

I had a great time during my recent trip. I made a solid decision with the woman I chose to spend my time with and have no regrets. Sex was daily and she proved herself in every way imaginable. I’m not easy to please, and she was probably the most top notch woman I’ve met in my life—seriously. We still communicate every day and I plan on making another trip before the end of the year for round two. Naturally, she was on her absolute best behavior and only time will tell what kind of girl I actually have on my hands. We'll see how things go, but I'm fairly confident I have a winner. I'm certainly in no rush and marriage is out of the question, but if she lived in the U.S. I could definitely see myself pursuing a committed relationship with her.

Bear in mind, this article is about actually finding a relationship material woman—not about getting laid. If you can fog a mirror, you can get laid in the Philippines. It's also my opinion that these guidelines can apply for meeting women online in any foreign country, not just the Philippines. Following these guidelines produced very good results for me and I'm convinced they can do the same for you. Stay on your toes, but don't forget to have a great time too. All of this is intended to make you well-informed, not paranoid.

Read Next: 7 Things You Need To Know About Filipina Girls

A.V. Yader

A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

The Manosphere is the Modern Samizdat

July 25, 2014 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

Samizdat simply means self-publishing. The term sounds innocent enough. But the term has a dark historical context, one that in modern times increasingly applies to the dissidents who are gathering in ever-larger numbers around the modern-day manosphere.

In Soviet times, it referred to an era in which government-suppressed literature was "clandestinely printed and distributed." Samizdat originated within the Russian Intelligentsia, a group which could include anyone from artists to teachers, who were engaged in disseminating ideas which ran counter to the leftist ideology of Communism.

In parallel to much of the self-publishing of today, most of the texts were personal statements, protests, or opinions which differed from the mainstream. Many suggested alternative ways of handling social problems. Others included news suppressed by the "official media" of the time.

The publishers of samizdat were subjected to harassment and surveillance of the type we are just beginning to witness in America. In 1973, in an effort to intimidate and silence its political opponents, the KGB concocted a show trial involving one of the most prominent publishers of samizdat, Victor Krasin.

Krasin Goes Up Against the State Apparatus

Krasin was an economist who had long been a critic of Marxism-Leninism, and was arrested for his opinions as early as 1949. He was sent to Ozerlag to do hard labor as a political prisoner. Krasin spent the next five years of his life in different labor camps as a political prisoner until Stalin's death in 1954, when he was released after being "rehabilitated" by the State. He then went on to become a professor at the Central Economics and Mathematics Institute, where he continued to self-publish until he was fired for it, only to be arrested again years later for "anti-Soviet propaganda." That arrest led to the aforementioned show trial.

In irony, as compared to today's status quo and shifting political winds, only two weeks after Krasin's conviction in the KGB's show trial, the United States House and Senate adopted resolutions stating Krasin had "demonstrated enormous courage and intellectual honesty in advocating and defending the importance of fundamental civil and political liberty," and that he had "served to illuminate the plight of hundreds of thousands of Soviet citizens." Krasin later emigrated to the United States and became a citizen in 1981. Reading the history of Krasin, one wonders how far away from such arrests and persecutions we are in America for the crime of "illuminating" men.

Bukovsky Fights the System

Vladimir Bukovsky was another member of the samizdat. A neurophysiologist and dissident of the Marxist-Leninist movement, he started self-publishing shortly after entering Moscow University in 1960. One of his first pieces as portrayed the Soviet Union as an immoral society that no longer had moral and spiritual authority over its citizens.

For this "crime" of questioning authority and self-publishing, he was placed under investigation, and by 1961 was expelled from Moscow University. Unfazed, he continued his writing and self-publishing. By 1963, he was arrested by the KGB and convicted of anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda. Bukovsky would spend a total of 12 years in and out of Soviet prison and labor camps, and forced-treatment psychiatric hospitals. Speaking of this experience, he would later say, “I myself create it, edit it, censor it, publish it, distribute it, and get imprisoned for it.”

One of the ways Soviet psychiatric hospitals treated political opponents like Bukovsky was by diagnosing them with “sluggish schizophrenia.” After all, why would anyone oppose the greatest sociopolitical system in the world, Communism? Self-publishers like Bukovsky who didn’t agree with the party line were diagnosed as being unable to grasp reality. The Soviet psychiatrists were also told to look for traits such as “reform delusions” or “struggles for truth and justice” and refusal to submit to authority so that those disorders could also be treated.

The treatments usually involved locking political opponents up in a Special Psychiatric Hospital, and drugging them with high doses of psychiatric drugs.

Because of this spurious definition of schizophrenia, the Soviet Union had at least three times the number of schizophrenics as other nations. Bukovsky’s later appeals to Western psychiatrists helped expose the political abuse of psychiatry in the Soviet Union. (But what better way for an authoritarian state to deal with political dissidents than diagnosing them as mentally unstable.) These appeals led to reforms, including glasnost, which called for increased openness and transparency in government activities.

Once again, showing how political winds can shift dramatically from one generation to the next, the USA helped negotiate Bukovsky’s emigration from the Soviet Union. Bukovsky would end up in the UK.

America Heads Down the Primrose Path of Politically Correct Censorship

Even though today there are no official edicts as of yet damning the authors and commenters on self-publishing sites like Return of Kings, we live in an environment of feminism and political correctness that is becoming increasingly inhospitable to tradition and masculinity.

Samizdat "self-publishing" blows a huge hole in the what the media and government in the USA previously took for granted: Control of the dialogue. The gatekeepers were able to select which topics were "appropriate" to discuss, decide what emphasis to place on each topic, then frame those topics in a way that's appropriate for their interests, and limit debate to certain prescribed limits, also suited to their interests. It's not so easy for them to hide dissent and alternative points of view anymore. We are just beginning to see the ways in which the Internet has changed the way the world communicates ideas.

One thing is for sure, self-publishing is easier, faster, and more prevalent now than it ever could have been back in the days of the Soviet Union. Men are self-publishing politically unpopular, unapproved, rational ideas that are important to their own self-interest in increasingly large numbers and with an increasingly louder voice. What remains to be seen is how those in power will respond. Will we see arrests for the newly invented PC term "hate speech" soon? Will the government resort to outright censorship in the name of "national security?" Will Google and other web companies impose restrictions on content? I'm not sure. In any case, storm clouds are gathering on the horizon.

Read more: 21 Tips For Starting A Manosphere Blog

Relampago Furioso

Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Why Sex Selfies Signal The Decline Of Western Civilization

July 26, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

(Warning: Most of the links and images in this article are NSFW, so exercise caution)

The effect of female narcissism and attention whoring in modern societies has been explored a lot here before. But the nadir of modern day narcissism is the rise of "sex selfies" (NSFW: 1, 2, 3, 4 to showcase just a few), which is far worse than those hideous pregnancy portraits. Hell, you've now even got a full subreddit showcasing sex selfies (NSFW). Some have even called the phenomenon of sex selfies as the worst thing on the internet. Type 'sex selfies', 'having sex selfies', 'after sex selfies' in any web search engine and see the level of modern narcissism for yourself. See anyone who is familiar or whom you know in your social circle in the image results?

An irony is that earlier this year, we got suspended on Facebook for a supposedly 'obscene' image of a plastic dildo. However with the acceptance of the sex selfie culture, it seems the more hardcore you get, the lesser the chances you'll get reprimanded on the same social network, which even has pages on it. As women become increasingly masculinized and men become feminized, it's no surprise that softcore becomes hardcore, and hardcore becomes softcore. The hypocritical paradigm of gender role interchangeability seen in modern societies today now extends to every paradigm of modern life. Shit is gold, and gold is shit.

As seen below, the rising trends of female sexual narcissism and attention whoring throughout the world (the UK so far leads the world in sex selfies) are validating what we've been telling all along: female attention whoring is approaching a tipping point in the modern world.

Were you ever video taped while having sex? (see comparison)

	Total	Male	Female
Yes I have	30.3%	31.4%	27.9%
No I havent, it doesn't interest me	28.9%	24.2%	39.1%
No I haven't, but I'd like to	18.7%	21.5%	12.4%
Did not Answer	22.1%	22.9%	20.6%

Have you ever sent anyone naked photos of yourself via your mobile? (see comparison)

	Total	Male	Female
Yes	47.1%	44.8%	52.2%
No	34.1%	35.6%	31.0%
Did not Answer	18.8%	19.6%	16.8%

© The Great Australian Sex Census

52% women sharing nude pictures. Thankfully, modern female honesty at least exists when it comes to polls regarding sexual narcissism, even if not for sexual morality. It's increasingly becoming acceptable for modern women to be seen as attention whores, but not as real whores – even though many do that as well. Not that we're complaining, even if we know yet pretend to ignore it.

Narcissism, sex selfies and the age of exhibitionism

We're living in probably in an age where the modern human is the most narcissistic common man ever in human history. You see it everywhere. Selfies, to the latest craze of bizarre modern underwear. Attention whoring at its finest.

Tribal Men, and their clothing gear….

…whereas modern men and women, and the latest underwear in 2014 : attention whoring, or a return to our primitive, tribal roots???

At the same time, sex selfies just represent the exhibitionist trends of today's times, as well as people having sex in public – a product of the oversexualization of modern societies, which has resulted in the next level of moral degradation in the name of 'sexual liberation'.

Not that men in general should care, because women themselves don't care doing and allowing it in public in the first place – as women are the gatekeepers of sex. Read the female comments in the comments section in the above link about public sex. The indifference in the female commenters to sex in public makes you wonder as how many of these women would themselves love to get screwed in the open, even it might be in front of their children.

So, if you see a couple fucking their brains behind the dumpster in the airport's parking lot, don't care. If you see a handjob in progress in public, simply don't care. If you see a couple having sex next to an ATM machine, don't care too, and just assume that the guy is swiping the nature-given, bodily tubular ATM card between his legs inside the woman's nature-given, bodily ATM slot, till he finishes his transaction (orgasms). Shouldn't we then legalize nudism and public sex too, considering we are living in a 'sexually repressed' (LOL) culture? Maybe we could compete with tribal societies who practice ritual exhibitionist sex.

The truth behind modern female exhibitionism and how you can use it

Most of these sites promoting sex selfies actually exploit the growing exhibitionist narcissism in modern women (and their obliging men who like to tag along in "the exhibitionist thrill of it" , while even calling it 'noble'). The two most popular subjects on the internet, sex and selfies, combine to satiate the next level of modern female narcissism. Sex selfies are actually a chance for modern narcissistic women to act out their fantasies, to star in amateur porn photo shoots with their partners. It's similarly indicative of a rising trend that also been debated—that pretty women usually take to porn because of the sex and 'power' (translate: narcissism out of low self esteem) associated with it.

However, you could still use sex selfies you've taken with a girl for your benefit (pun intended). Women always lose out if they agree when they agree to sex selfies, even if they agree to it out of narcissism. Here's how:

1. Memorabilia for you and your family (only the one you start with her)

This goes out only to our beta haters and manginas (pun intended). Take a sex selfie when you're banging, or tonguing (NSFW) a chick to use it for your own scrapbook. Understand that you absolutely don't have to bear any responsibility as she's agreed to allow herself be snapped or videotaped during and after the act. If you knock her up and choose to keep her, you can tell your kids about the 'romantic' encounter which conceived them with photographic evidence. Even if the paternity test says otherwise. Also remember you're fulfilling your girl's need to be a porn star, even if your camerawork is amateurish using a smartphone. The epic-bonding and romantic 'after sex selfie', will however occupy an invaluable place in your future family album.

2. Memorabilia for her and her family (someday) – pun intended

This goes out to all men. It doesn't matter that you break up later with her, and she ends up marrying some beta loser to pop out kids with him. The sex selfies you've taken could help you. If you ever happen to see her with her kids some day, remind her of the pics you took together during your earlier romps which you still fondly remember. Or you can show her kids that their mommy's face and ass was tighter before their birth with photographic proof – especially the hardcore sex selfie pics when you're penetrating her. That's enough motivation for a young girl to ape her mother skills some day, and to let them know that their Daddy crossed the finishing line later in banging their mommy, after you.

Don't stay around for long though after stirring up the hornet's nest. Maybe she'll ask you to fuck her, just to keep quiet if you haven't shown the sex selfies yet- even then don't fall for her offer unless 100% sure that it doesn't entail a trap. If she's a shameless slut, she wouldn't care if you'd show it to her family, but wouldn't still mind to get the pictures from you for her own personal album.

3. Photographic evidence in case she accuses you of rape, and to keep her in line

Make sure to tweet pics of yourself doing the act and after the act to your friends (of course with her consent), if you know she's a crazy temperamental slut or you're unsure of the consequences yet you want to bang her. Snap the shutter when her poses and expressions are that of lusty pleasure, willing exhibitionism, and post sex comfort, in fact encourage her to act out the budding and latent porn actress in her. This will help to debunk any unexpected fake rape accusation later on you from her, as her willing compliance in the pictures could help you to prove that the sex was consensual.

Secondly, sex selfies taken during a night of drunken revelry with a difficult bitch can help you to tame her, especially if she's acts like a hypocritical prudish and uptight feminist bitch in public who likes to bust men's balls. You'll always be one up on her, because you've got her dirty secrets (photographic evidence, if you haven't tweeted them yet) in your hands which could ruin her 'reputation'.

Scientists have linked selfies to mental illness of narcissism and low self-esteem. What would they have to say about those taking 'sex selfies'? It just highlights the increasing retardedness of an animal-like narcissistic generation of depraved mentally ill degenerates who have lower self-esteem, plus lower mental and emotional health than their predecessors and saner contemporaries, and are increasingly being produced by a culturally and morally fast declining dysfunctional civilization. You begin to wonder how these women think, and what kind of generation they would spawn and raise. The blame lies primarily on these women, as they are the gatekeepers of sex.

The exhibitionist slut bomb has now exploded into social media. What's next? A reality based TV sex channel showcasing live feed where amateurs can post pictures while getting fucked and get paid for it, and viewers can vote for the winner who'd get paid for the hottest sex selfie? Attention whoring would then get paid in money – not that these attention whoring modern women would object, for they'd become instantaneous celebrities on that regard.

The fact remains that the trends will continue to worsen in the future. It shouldn't be a surprise that 20 years from now, people would be casually having sex in public, in front of children and seniors, as 'sexual liberation' increasingly becomes the slogan for the present and future generations of women. With narcissistic modern women taking the lead in promoting these trends as women are the gatekeepers of sex, and men following it, exhibitionism is the penultimate nail in the attention whoring coffin of a declining civilization. It's said that you cannot turn a whore into a housewife. I'd add to that: you can't turn even an attention whore into a housewife. Actual whoring and attention whoring are both found in whorish women.

So: "18+_Getting fucked? Fucking someone? Take a selfie — Email @. for ad info and to send in submissions."

Why not? Sure!!!

Even if it's next to a rotting body.

Read More: Women Fight For Attention On Facebook Like They're In A War

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

A Layman’s Guide To Einstein’s Theory Of Relativity

July 26, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The first book I encountered after deciding I wanted to learn Einstein’s theory of relativity was Bertrand Russell’s ABC of Relativity, a supposedly layman introduction to the concept. I must be stupider than the layman because I had severe trouble grasping the concepts Russell was trying to explain. It didn’t help that he was layering explanations on top of each other, so that if you didn’t understand just a paragraph of what he was describing, you could be lost for the rest of the book. A third of the way through I had no choice but to give up and find another resource.

I’m still not sure if the above book is intended for the true layman, but it was much easier to understand. It begins by explaining how motion is relative:

> There is no apparent way to chart the absolute motion of anything; that is to say, there is no fixed, final frame of reference by which all motions can be measured. Motion and rest, like large and small, slow and fast, up and down, left and right, > seem to be completely relative. There is no way to measure the motion of one object except by comparing it with the motion of some other object.

>
> […]
>
> …the greater the distance between two events, the greater the difficulty of deciding about simultaneity. It is important to understand that this is not just a question of being unable to learn the truth of the matter. There is no actual truth of the matter. There is no absolute time throughout the universe by which absolute simultaneity can be measured. Absolute simultaneity of distant events is a meaningless concept.
>
> […]
>
> The instant "now" has meaning only for the spot you occupy. You cannot assume that a "now" exists simultaneously fir all spots of the universe.

I learned that the reason we can't travel at the speed of light is because inertial mass increases with speed. At the speed of light you would need an infinite amount of energy to push the now infinite mass, which cannot happen. So the speed of light (c = 300,000 km/sec) is the speed limit for our universe.

> Electrons can now be accelerated to 0.999999999+ the speed of light. This gives to each electron a mass (relative to the earth's inertial frame) that is about forty thousand times its mass at rest! Relativistic changes of time are also observable.

It also gave a great explanation of time dilation, whereby a space traveler ages slower than his counterpart remaining on Earth.

Back in Einstein's time, scientists didn't have the technology to prove their theories in the lab, so they ran "thought experiments." Particle accelerators and colliders which have been developed since then have validated many of their thought experiments. However…

> There is no experiment of any sort, the general theory says, by which an observer in any sort of motion, uniform or nonuniform, can prove whether he is moving or at rest.
>
> […]
>
> This means that regardless of how an observer is moving, he can describe all the laws of nature (as he sees them) by the same mathematical equations. He may be a scientist working in a laboratory on the earth, or on the moon, or inside a giant spaceship that is slowly accelerating on its way to a distant star. The general theory of relativity provides him with a set of equations by which he can describe all the natural laws involved in any experiment he can perform. These equations will be exactly the same regardless of whether he is at rest, moving uniformly, or moving with acceleration with respect to any other object.
>
> […]
>
> …suppose a boy comes along and kicks it with his bare foot. He shouts in pain because the kick hurts his toes. A Newtonian would say that the apple's inertia > resisted his kick. An Einsteinian can say the same thing, but he can also say, if he prefers, that the boy's toes caused the entire cosmos (including the toes) to accelerate backward, setting up a gravitational field that pulled the apple with great force against his toes. It is all a matter of words.

Einstein's relativity theory (technically there are two theories: the general theory and the special theory) also introduces a fourth dimension that we are unable to perceive. This is why regular people have such a hard time using their 3D oriented brain to understand Einstein's theories. How can you understand something your brain was not naturally designed to understand? Answer: lots of thinking.

> There are three space dimensions and one time dimension, united in a way that is specified by the equations of relativity. This structure is such that a geodesic, although still the straightest possible path in spacetime, is the longest instead of the shortest distance. This concept is impossible to explain without going into complicated mathematics…

Some additional passages I enjoyed:

> Experiments using the Mossbauer effect have shown that time near the bottom of a building (where gravity is stronger) is a bit slower than time near the top of the same building. "A typist working on the first floor of the Empire State Building," Gamow observed, "will age slower than her twin sister working on the top floor." The difference in aging is, of course, infinitesimal; nevertheless, it is real and can be measured.
>
> […]
>
> Galileo and Newton made experiments, but the extraordinary thing about Einstein is that he made no experiments. Moreover, he was often unaware of significant tests that had strong bearings on his speculations. He just sat alone, thinking deeply about the secrets of the Old One, as he liked to call the universe. Newton was a devout Anglican who spent half his life struggling to unravel the mysteries of biblical prophecy. Einstein had no interest in any religion except in the sense that Spinoza, whose secular pantheism he admired, was religious. Yet he and Newton, in addition to their giant intellects and creative intuitions, shared a strong sense of wonder toward the Old One and of humility before the unanswerable riddle of existence. Both were Platonists in their conviction that what science knows is an infinitesimal portion of what it does not know.

Tons of diagrams and artwork are provided to help explain and conceptualize the topics. You will still need to re-read many portions for full understanding, but unlike with Russell's book, you won't become lost for good if you happen not to understand a paragraph or page.

Einstein's theories are the most important scientific developments since Darwin's theory of evolution, but most people can't describe it. Why is this? Because it's a very hard concept. It does take time and deep concentration to even begin to imagine the fourth dimension that is necessary for understanding space-time, and basic physics knowledge is essential. In spite of this difficulty, relativity was a massive leap forward in the history of science, and I believe all men curious of his place in the universe should take a couple hours to understanding this important concept.

Read More: "Relativity Simply Explained" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Parts Of The Matrix You Must Unplug From

July 27, 2014 | by D. Lorean | Link | Original Link

Instead of listing the traits, habits and behaviors that successful people have and how to apply them to your life, my objective for this article is to tell you the three divisions of the Matrix you must unplug from to give yourself a better chance for success, happiness, and overall a more fulfilling life. I've purposely ordered the divisions in what I feel would be the easiest sequence to unplug from, though you may find your personal order to be different. Let's begin with the first…

Companionship

Companionship, also known as a serious relationship, is by far the most deceitful division of the Matrix (which is also why this section will be the most comprehensive), because while you're enjoying the euphoric highs and dealing with the typical lows you don't quite realize what you lost until the ride is over. Understand that it is not my intent to denigrate long-term relationships or marriage. I feel that these two forms of companionship can be very rewarding later on in a man's life when he is accomplished and mentally ready for either endeavor.

However, you must understand that every man has three banks that he must protect at all cost: The Time Bank, The Money Bank, and The Energy/Desire Bank. In order to be truly successful and achieve greatness at whatever you strive to accomplish you will more than likely need to devote a significant amount of your time, money, and energy. The problem is that by being involved in a serious relationship or marriage you have (whether intentionally or not) communicated to your woman that she is numero uno in the hierarchy of important things in your life (otherwise you would have never committed to her exclusively right?).

This is where conflict arises. So you want to create the next social media site to knock Facebook on its ass? Good luck telling your girlfriend/wife you can't take her to the movies because you have various manuals to read on source coding. So you have expensive computer hardware and software to buy in order to launch you business? Good luck telling her you won't be financially able to take her on that big trip to Aruba for her birthday like you promised her last year.

Which brings me to the Energy/Desire Bank; do you honestly think that after getting off from your 9-5 and jumping head first into building your side business or pursuing your hobbies that you will have the energy or desire to put up with what will be the constant nagging of your woman? You're relationship will resemble the movie Groundhog Day with repeated naggings of "We barely spend time together anymore" and "You haven't taken me anywhere nice since you've been spending all your money on that stupid project" and my favorite "It's like your mind is always somewhere else when we hangout, you're not the same guy I fell in love with". And guess what gentleman; she's right. Women aren't designed or conditioned to play second fiddle to anything let alone the business idea that you've been spending so much of your time, money, and energy on to get off the ground. Women just don't understand sacrifice and will rarely if ever see the big picture.

Understand we are not talking about Lebron's high school sweetheart that stuck it out with him until his NBA dreams came to fruition. We are talking about regular ole you with ambitions to be the first multi-millionaire in your family. Girlfriends/wives have a hard time picturing "regular ole you" achieving the types of things that only a small percentage of people ever will. Does this mean she doesn't love you? Of course not. Does this mean she doesn't believe you have the drive or intelligence to pull it off? Sometimes. But more than anything your girlfriend or wife has been programmed from birth to believe she's the most important thing on earth and that any man who would put her at number two for "some silly business idea" doesn't deserve her.

So what happens next? Once she doesn't "feel the flame anymore," she will more than likely cheat on you until she figures out that she doesn't even have to be sneaky about it because you're so preoccupied with getting your dream off the ground. Soon to follow will be the break up or divorce. Of course you will be devastated, heartbroken, and completely caught off guard. After all, you were working all those sleepless nights and investing your hard earned money not only for yourself but for the manifestation of your dreams that she would also benefit from.

Wouldn’t it just be easier to stay single, sleep around freely, and pursue your dreams without worrying about who you may be neglecting? Many men have found out the hard way that it’s extremely difficult to achieve major accomplishments while carrying the burden of companionship. If you have lofty goals of entrepreneurship, adventure, travel, etc make sure you stay single until you can look yourself in the mirror and feel satisfied with your life accomplishments. Think of it like sports, you shouldn’t retire until you’ve got some championship rings on your fingers. Ultimately I feel worse for guys that never attempted to follow their dreams and let them dissolve in favor of Companionship.

Consumerism

The second division of the Matrix we must unplug from is consumerism. The dictionary definition of consumerism is a social and economic order and ideology that encourages the acquisition of goods and services in ever-greater amounts. I will expand on that definition with two different forms of consumerism the American man are often victims of.

Goods/Services

As men we are constantly bombarded with advertisements for body washes and shampoos that will make women want to rape us, cars that will instantly make even the lowliest of nerds as cool as Steve McQueen, expensive clothes that will make us resemble models regardless of our beer guts, and expensive bottle service at the hottest club in town that will get the most gorgeous women to flock to us. All of these things are a mere attempt to exploit our inner desire for hot women.

The problem with all these products is that they aim to bypass genuine self improvement in favor of a shortcut. Who doesn’t love a good shortcut right? The issue here is that shortcuts more times than not persuade us to spend money we don't really have to look like something we're really not. Ask yourself, who's really winning here in the transaction? The guy who's going to have to eat Ramen noodles for the next 2 weeks because he spent half his check on bottle service, or the old grey hair out of shape fart leaving the club in a Benz with three hot 24 year olds? It would've been much cheaper and rewarding to just buy Roosh's game guides and develop a strict workout regime. In due time we will be able to drop a couple grand on bottle service and purchase sports cars without looking at the price tag, but we have to delay gratification long enough to achieve our dreams and ambitions first.

The American society also gets in on the action as well. They call it "The American Dream." I can't tell you how many of my buddies successfully unplug from the Companionship Matrix only to fall victim to the Consumerism Matrix and buy some big ass expensive house they didn't need because society said it was "smarter than renting". Now they've unnecessarily anchored themselves to a city that might not present the best options for their success, along with owning a home that no longer is worth the value they paid for it. What happens next? Since they "feel so lonely" in that big ass house they take ten steps back and voluntarily plug into the Companionship Matrix. They find a spend-happy wife, have kids they aren't really ready for because "her biological clock was ticking", and now their flight to success and happiness is permanently grounded.

The reason you can't let this type of consumerism take control of you is because the money that consumerism coerces you into spending on "meaningless things" is the same capital that you could be using to fuel your dreams and ambitions. Essentially consumerism is a veiled thief, slowly stealing your dreams by giving you a quick dopamine rush.

TV/Media

The things we tend to consume from the media whether it's online, in a magazine, or on television play a pivotal role in keeping us plugged into the matrix and shaping our ideologies (politics included). Let me preface this by saying that I watch cable television. I have specific shows I tune into every week, and I am a huge lover of sports. The problem I find with most of my colleagues at work is that the majority of their conversations (95%) revolve around “what went down on last night’s episode” of XYZ TV show along with debates about sports teams that get so intense you would think they had a family member that played on the team. I never hear guys talk about what they like to do off the clock, or what projects and hobbies they’re working on. It appears to me that they’ve traded in what dreams they may have had in order to live vicariously through their favorite actors and athletes.

Though I try to stick to watching shows that have some type of redeeming value in my life; I have my fair share of useless entertainment I consume like everyone else. We must keep this to a minimum. While we may be entertained sitting on our couches staring at the big screen while sipping on a good brew, we are essentially watching people who are being paid to live out their dreams right before our eyes. Do you really want to spend your precious time watching other people being paid to live their dreams, or do you want to go out and get your dreams off the ground?

The Media Matrix (via ET, Access Hollywood, TMZ, etc) has tried to mind-fuck us into believing only athletes and celebrities deserve to live the playboy jet setter lifestyle. This is false. Athletes and celebrities are a drop in the bucket in comparison to the amount of hard working no names living life on their own terms with no limits. We have no limits but the ones we place on ourselves. This division of the Matrix aims to siphon your time by keeping you distracted and unconsciously celebrating the successes of other people as if they were your own.

Corporate America

The third division of Matrix we must unplug from to be truly successful is Corporate America. This topic has been beaten to death to the point that we all should understand the importance of unplugging from the Corporate America Matrix. Most of us will need Corporate America at some point in our lives because we have bills to pay but to be frank, you company doesn’t give a fuck about you. They don’t care about your dreams, your bills, your pregnant wife, or the new house you just bought. Corporations exist solely to make the owner(s) and shareholders filthy rich and nothing else. Your company revenue could increase by 1 billion dollars in a year and all they would tell you is “great job guys, but I think if we dig a little deeper this year we can surpass last year’s revenues”. You think they’re going to give you a cut of that big pie you help bake? You think a 3% raise is going to change your life with inflation at 2%?

Your “REAL JOB” is to fuck your company for the most money you can and leave to pursue you dreams. Treat your job like a slut that you would discard when she’s no longer bringing you the same pleasure she once did. What about all the great friends I made at my job? Fuck them. I mean that in the most respectful way possible. If your colleagues want to drink the corporate Kool-Aid and build their lives on a shaky foundation, let them. It’s not your job to save the world, save yourself first and they will see the light if they want to.

By no means is everything in this article an absolute for everyone reading it. If you are the exception consider yourself lucky instead of calling me a dick for not considering the outliers. For the rest of us, it should be in our plans to unplug from all three divisions of the Matrix to give ourselves the best shot at a happy and successful life. I understand not everyone reading this article will be in the position to unplug completely, but it is better to unplug from one or two of the three divisions than none at all. You will be happier and most likely more successful than 95% of your male counterparts who are hopelessly plugged it.

Read More: Life Happens Once You Unplug

D. Lorean

D. Lorean Is a recovered blue pillaholic who's been clean for 3 years now. Everyday I take a step forward toward becoming a better man by putting all of my time, money, and energy into my ambitions. I'm currently perfecting the art of the gentlemen pump and dump in my spare time. Destined to end up living in either a penthouse or under a turn pass. There is no in between for me...

The Top 5 Benefits Of Meditation For Men

July 27, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Meditation is quite possibly the biggest quick fix for your life that you're neglecting. The actual time and self discipline required to mediate is miniscule in comparison to other important activities like working, exercising, approaching women, sleeping, or simply reading a book. However, it offers just as many, if not more benefits than any of them. You're effectively shooting yourself in the foot if you skip out on meditation.

My experience with meditation is admittedly limited. I've been meditating pretty consistently for two years, and the mediation that I practice is very basic. All I do is lay on my back, with my arms and legs spread out slightly to my sides, and focus on my breathing for about ten minutes. I inhale through my nose and breathe in deep into my belly, and then I breathe out fully, again exhaling through my nose. Here are the six top benefits I've experienced from doing this almost every day:

1. It allows you to better analyze situations you've gotten too close to

We all let bullshit get to our head. Whether it’s the raise you’re about to ask for, the girlfriend who’s trying to pick a fight with you, the roommate who’s not paying his dues, or something else. There tends to be one or two unsettling things on our minds at any point in time. And it’s common for small things to grow into a big deal in our minds when our lives are relatively tranquil.

When this happens, we start to let the situation cloud our mental clarity. It gradually takes over our conscious mind until we’re having compulsive thoughts about it every few minutes. And these thoughts tend to repetitive – they aren’t solving anything or making it any better. Furthermore, they ruin our mood and whatever else we happen to be doing.

Meditation serves to distance you from these issues. By taking a break from thinking about them for a few minutes, you’ll return with a grounded perspective. It’s common for me to forget about these things completely or immediately think of a quick course of action to address them upon finishing a meditation.

2. It resets you to a calm, collected demeanor

When we allow the compulsive thoughts mentioned above to crowd our mind, it makes us agitated and angry. Or sad and lethargic. Meditation allows you to take a step back and view your life for what it really is. And that fresh perspective not only allows you to better address the problems at hand, but it also serves to put your body and mind at ease. Once you've gained a clearer insight, you can proceed with the weight of the bullshit lifted off your shoulders.

3. It prepares you to move forward with renewed energy and creativity

By clearing your mind of the problems and the fog, meditation gives you a blank slate. I commonly experience my most productive period of the day just after meditating. I believe this is because I'm able to remove the thoughts of girls, desires, worries, and irrelevant goals from my mind for a brief time. During this time I'm able to fully engage my mind in the task at hand, and I crush it as a result.

4. It physiologically improves the state of your body

This means that meditating literally changes how your body is functioning. Among the many positive changes it's been show to lower oxygen consumption, decrease respiratory rate, increase blood flow, and slow the heart rate. Like the other benefits, these changes are acute and immediate.

5. It improves your regular breathing

When performing the mediation I recommend above, you're consciously focusing on breathing fully and deeply the entire time. In the moment this serves to grant you all of the above benefits. What it also does is translate to your breathing when not meditating. By breathing like this while going about your day to day activities it will keep you "out of your head", and instead focused and in touch with your body. Whenever I catch myself getting worked up or anxious about something, a little focused breathing usually offers immediate relief.

All of these benefits combine to enhance the life of any man. Take ten minutes out of your day and meditate. It will pay you back tenfold. Whether it's by decreasing your stress level, increasing your focus and energy, or simply requiring you to be disciplined and sit there for ten minutes, it will change you for the better.

Tired of living a life confined by your fears and insecurities? Click here for my approach for breaking free and dominating.

Read More: The Only Thing That Matters In The Gym

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

How Social Justice Warriors Miss The Mark

July 28, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

There is a place for social activism in any society. Problems naturally occur in any civilization and not all of them are given the attention they deserve; those who point them out and attempt to encourage the address of these concerns can do a great service to their society.

There is a limit, however, to the utility of such activism, as there are indeed times when it simply is not needed. Many in our modern society have lost touch with this indisputable reality and, in doing so, venture into the realm of useless, unjustified whining.

Tumblr is rife with examples of such whining, one of the more interesting of which is "Operation Catsuit". Here is a description of the "operation":

> Operation Catsuit is a performance series in which installation artist/handbag designer Ayana Evans wears a neon zebra print body stocking to various art events across New York City. At each event friends of the artist secretly video tape the reaction of patrons in the galleries and around the surrounding neighborhoods. Those with the strongest responses are interviewed after the artist has left the area. A handful of those who have absolutely no response at all are interviewed as well.

And here is the operation in action:

What we essentially see is this: an attractive black woman (attractive enough to get a decent amount of attention in public without much effort at all) puts on the most revealing, attention-grabbing attire she can find and walks around in environments where such attire is wholly unexpected (ex: The Museum of Modern Art) documenting reactions.

Here were some of the responses on Youtube to this experiment:

> Aalinh Orberst
>
> Britney, Jessica Szohr, ScarJo and umpteen other celebrity and "regular" women with acceptable bodies wear tight catsuits everyday. Where are the people > talking behind their backs and taking their picture? As soon as it's a woman with a big behind and more pronounced curves she's showing the whole world every nook and cranny of her body. How is that right?

We begin to see some of the online social justice warrior insanity/victim-complex leak out here. Aalinh Orberst attempts to turn this experiment into evidence of racism because, apparently, it is common for certain non-black women with "acceptable" bodies to wear tight bodystockings every day.

This is an interesting argument because I cannot recall ever seeing the likes of Scarlett Johansson wearing a skin-tight bodystocking with bright colors and zebra patterns in a public place on even one occasion, much less "every day". If Scarlett or any celebrity like her were to do so, it would make major headlines, but it isn't terribly common. The only non-black celebrities that I can recall seeing push boundaries with their clothing in public (or even on stage) have been criticized quite extensively for it – Miley Cyrus comes immediately to mind.

With all that said, what is Aalinh Orberst complaining about?

> Aalinh Orberst
>
> This made me me cry. I am so insecure about wearing certain clothes because I fear this everyday. You people in the comments know they weren't taking pictures of her because her outfit was bangin'. They were taking pictures because even though she is completely covered up, she is a black woman with a voluptuous black woman body (you can't deny that natural-no exercise required big butts come from our African ancestry) daring to wear stretch a catsuit over > her fat behind. There was no love or praise in that. This is the kind of body shaming that is forced onto black women everyday. I dare someone with the technology to image search her catsuit and see all of the nasty comments people made. But this is the age of positive body imagery…..just not positive black body imagery.

I'm fairly certain that pictures were taken of this woman because of her outfit. It is not every day that one heads to a museum and sees a woman of any kind in a bright yellow, zebra-print, skin-tight bodystocking. Had she been more conservative (e.g., jeans and a blouse), I'm fairly certain that most of those who reacted in the video would have had little or nothing to say or do about her.

But what non-sense am I promoting here? The idea that a woman who goes out in tight, bright, unusual attention-getting attire will stand out like a sore thumb and get a lot of attention, not all of it positive? Madness.

Clearly the world just hates thick black women.

> Arria
>
> Don't take pictures of people in public no matter what they look like unless they're a performer or something. I just think that's so disrespectful and an invasion of privacy

This comment is particularly fascinating: Arria is not actually capable of grasping the contradiction she creates when she implies that people have a fundamental right to total privacy in public spaces. Her argument essentially implies that every space must be regarded as a private space, unless someone is a performer (in which case no right to privacy exists).

Also, take a second to note the truly grand irony in Arria's comment: she implies that pictures should not be taken of people in public no matter what, as such an action is "disrespectful and an invasion of privacy".

She says this while commenting on a video in which dozens of people (the folks walking around in the museum as Ms. Bodystocking makes her way through) are recorded in a public space without their permission.

Is this the goal of the online Social Justice Warrior? To redefine basic societal rules and expectations with contradictory, nonsensical amendments? To imply the existence of fundamental rights, and then deny those rights to legions of people simply because they can't empathize with them?

The social justice rage continues on Tumblr:

> …This is the reality of being a black woman, a black femme, and a black perceived-woman. If you do anything, anything, you are not a person. You are a side show and people have the right to be entertained! They will apologize to the white folk they knocked out of the way to get their picture rather than acknowledge a word of personhood to your face! You don't HAVE a face! You're just ass. White supremacy has a history dating into the early-mid 1900s of having black people in fucking zoos for their entertainment. This isn't new! This isn't new! This is a legacy. This is the legacy of whiteness and no white person is exempt.
>
> Not white women, who are the initiators and main perpetrators of this because (as my friend said) they see her as a threat; not white men, who are indeed just as guilty; not white non-binaries, not white queers (your other axis of oppression do not and will not ever negate your whiteness). No one is exempt from the legacy that made this possible, that allows this to go on unchecked, that is still actively held up by the people who would fancy themselves passive, or "good people."
>
> It doesn't matter how you dress. This isn't just about being fat, this isn't just about being skinny- this is about not being white, this is about existing in blackness.
>
> You see white people of all shapes and sizes in this video. NONE of them are side shows, NONE of them are experiencing the sheer white gaze of antiblackness and antiblack misogyny. And this is about blackness. This is about being perceived in such a manner that other people only feel the need an "excuse" to dehumanize you: something they do already in the comfort of their homes, in their minds. You > know this because not a single white person reprimanded another white person for their picture taking. Not one alerted her after said non-existent reprimand.This is what I worry about when I go out. I don't even know if people are taking pics, and I pray they are not.

Well, I dunno. Are you going to museums in the heart of midtown Manhattan while wearing a bright yellow, skin-tight bodystocking? Because if you are, I think it safe to say that people are taking photos.

I don't think that there is anything "anti-black" about giving attention to an individual who clearly intended to attract such attention. I don't consider the fact that people will gaze at a thick black woman running around in Manhattan in a bright yellow, zebra-print bodystocking to be a sign of white supremacy. I think that's just… normal. If you'd like not to be gawked at and photographed, don't go out of your way to stand out as much as you possibly can.

That just seems like the logical conclusion to me, but what do I know? Why not just whine and complain about imaginary "misogyny" and "antiblackness" instead? I'm sure that will solve the problem.

Meanwhile, back on tumblr…

> This video shows exactly why our work is never done. How our bodies are never truly our own because of the gaze of others. Notice how the majority of people taking pictures of her (WITHOUT HER EXPRESS PERMISSION) were female and WHITE? Can I pull a perpetuation of patriarchy card? Like a Sarah Baartman and other images, her body was as much a part of the exhibition as the paintings on the wall. And it makes me wonder….would a white girl in the same outfit, get the same reactions? Who would take the pictures then? THIS.IS.EVERYTHING and why my feminism can't be written in the annals of Simone de Beauvoir and her likes and why White Feminism continues to undermine its own rhetoric.
>
> -All this to say, this is some BULLSHIT!

This one is concerned about the fact that pictures were taken of Ms. Bodystocking "WITHOUT HER EXPRESS PERMISSION" but, ironically, fails to note the fact that dozens of people had their pictures taken (and appear in this video) without having given their express permission.

Odd, that…

> This is the most disgusting thing I have ever seen. These (mostly white) people are taking pictures of her like a zoo animal. Staring, shooting, then judging. This is a rendering of the modern Hottentot Venus experience.
>
> It shows how Black women's bodies are still commidified, envied, then rated inferior to historically traditional, feminine, "right" white women's bodies. And how Black women's natural expression and respect for their beauty is seen as putting themselves on a platter of some sorts, for other people's ridicule or > consumption.

>
> Because notice what happens here: Most white men stare and take pictures (for their own use later). White women stare, take pictures (for their own judgement later), and literally every one of them turns away with that same look: arms crossed, lips pursed, trying to be incognito. It’s a jealously tinged with, no, based on hate.
>
> Just because racist history looks different doesn’t mean it has changed.

The unique ability of the social justice warrior to simply invent things to offend him/her is quite remarkable. Here, this tumblr user suggests that this video shows how black female bodies are “rated inferior to historically tradition, feminine, “right” white women’s bodies”. I’m not sure where this “inferiority” is implied and perpetuated in this video – people seem shocked because they are in the heart of Manhattan witnessing a woman in a bright zebra-print bodystocking strolling around casually, not because they saw a black woman. Most have probably never seen such a thing before, and I’m sure some think that such dress isn’t appropriate. Isn’t that normal?

Probably not. Let’s get angry about racism instead, because that makes more sense. Only racists would do a double-take at a skin-tight zebra-print bodystocking in Manhattan, because most people are perfectly accustomed to seeing such a thing on a regular basis.

Activism is necessary to bring attention to and actually engage with many real problems that persist in our world, but one does nobody any favors when they become indignant about things unworthy of any serious concern. By failing to understand this reality and getting enraged at the most mundane and inoffensive of things, the social justice warrior not only fails to make any positive progress for his or her self, but also undermines other bids to call attention to real issues using the same mediums that these social justice warriors (tumblr, youtube, etc.) frequent by making such bids appear to be the calling card of the irrational and the insane.

The more these people complain about things that do not matter, the less we are likely to see done about things that do.

Read Next: How "Trigger Warnings" Silence Dissent And Protect Fragile Egos

Athlone McGinnis

Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

How To Write In A Foreign Language

July 28, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Previous articles in these pages have discussed techniques for improving one's speaking, reading, and listening abilities in a foreign language. This focus is understandable, as most language students will have as their primary goal the speedy acquisition of conversational proficiency. Until now, however, little attention has been paid to the area of written proficiency: that is, how to improve one's abilities to write compositions in a foreign language. It is a neglected topic that merits discussion. Writing proficiency is, after all, the capstone of language mastery; and the ambitious student will not shy away from accepting this challenge. Sooner or later, there will be occasions when we will need to write, in our target language, a letter, email, resume, a short essay, or some other extended composition.

The arts of composition and translation involve a different set of skills than those required for speaking and listening. Prose composition sharpens the linguistic abilities, focuses our artistic impulses, and drives us to discipline our wayward grammar. We will discuss some general principles that will provide a foundation for future study.

Composition is the art of rendering a passage from one's native language (for most readers here, English) into the target language. From the start, the student must be guided by attention to the following three things: (1) precision of expression; (2) grammatical accuracy; and (3) grace of style. Precision of expression is the ability to write passages that accurately convey the meaning and spirit of the original. Grammatical accuracy is fidelity to all the nuances and minutiae of our target language's rules, syntax, and orthography. Grace of style is the ability to write a passage that is more than just a clumsy, wooden reproduction of the original English. Stylistic elegance is an art attained only by constant practice and exposure to good writings in our target language.

Ideally, our goal should be to produce a composition that a native speaker might recognize as something linguistically honorable and worthy of his own pen. How to achieve these three elements of good composition? We will discuss each of them in greater detail.

Precision Of Expression

Precision of expression is essentially the efficient use of words, phrases, clauses, and sentences to convey the meaning of the original English into the target language. One must develop an instinct of what is correct or preferred usage, and what is not. A helpful technique here is the concept of the exemplar: we must seek out paragons of written style in our target language, and strive to write like them. Precise expression first begins with imitation. A writer works with his target language in the same way that a pizza-maker rolls and stretches his dough: handling skills must first come from imitation of a master, combined with constant practice.

Every language has writers or sources that are generally considered paragons of good style. Our task is to seek out such exemplars of style, and imitate them, in order to acquire a feel for what is good. We cannot produce good words if we are not reading good words. I would suggest here that students seek out the most respected news and current affairs websites in their target language, and constantly read the short articles or essays found there. The language of the modern media is vital to master. In the modern media will be found the most current words, expressions, cultural references, idioms, metaphors, and concepts of the day. This can be supplemented by reading one or more excellent modern literary authors in the target language. Short stories or books of children's fables are well suited for this purpose.

The student of Brazilian Portuguese, for example, might study and imitate the written styles found in the articles of the website for O Globo; the student of Arabic, Al Jazeera; the student of Latin, the writings of Caesar, Livy, Celsus, Quintilian, or Augustine, as well as the excellent Nuntii Latini website. Every language has such recognized media sites or respected stylistic masters. When reading these articles or passages, we should take particular note of cultural references, common constructions, and idiomatic expressions that cannot be found in textbooks. A good exemplar should produce writing that is lucid, relatively simple, and vigorous.

Prose is preferred to poetry. The language of poetry does not make for good style, and should be avoided. Poets write for aesthetic effect, and their constructions (often employing archaisms and unusual words or word order) do not conform to standard usage. We should also avoid using excessively colloquial usages, as well as very antiquated language. Such things are fine for quotations, but not as models of proper written style. In general, older writers have a more solid, consistent masculine force, in contrast to much of the rather insipid and undisciplined writing encountered today.

Grammatical Accuracy

Grammatical accuracy is a function of two quantities: syntax (the arrangement of words and phrases in proper order), and orthography (correct spelling). Here again, correct grammar can only be acquired by constant exposure to our good exemplars, as noted above. In the beginning stages of composition, it will be necessary to follow (slavishly if necessary) our exemplars in all they do. Once a firm footing has been achieved, we can bring our own “personality” to bear on our compositions. Grammar and construction drills done in language textbooks are a good start here, but they must be followed up by actual exposure to passages from good exemplars.

Grace Of Style

Grace of style is perhaps the area in which talent or innate ability has the most leeway. To compose or translate well, one must himself be a good stylist. A good translation stands as a work of art unto itself; and even a mediocre piece of writing may be elevated by a spirited rendition in another language. The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, for example, was little known in the West until Edward Fitzgerald’s masterful translation of the original Persian brought it to life.

In general, the following common stylistic pitfalls are to be avoided: (1) a monotonous series of short, staccato sentences; (2) repetitious use of the same constructions or words; (3) clumsy arrangement of words that might not be pleasing to a native speaker; (4) improperly balanced sentences where one or more subordinate clauses do not properly connect to the main idea of the sentence. A good test of stylistic grace is to read your composition aloud to a native speaker. If he or she winces during your delivery, you will know what needs to be corrected. There are foreign language listservs, chatrooms, and interactive websites where students can find immediate (and brutal) feedback on their writing efforts.

From my own experience, the following points also should be kept in mind:

1. Beware irregular verbs, metaphors, and idiomatic expressions. Every language has its own vexatious irregular verbs. Unfortunately for us, the most difficult irregular verbs are also the most commonly used ones (e.g., verbs of saying, thinking, being, giving, having, going, being able to, wanting, putting, coming, bringing, etc). We must be especially sensitive to such verbs and to their correct employment. Proper use comes only with practice, cultural exposure, and attention to detail.

2. Do not be afraid of the language. Use a wide variety of constructions: passive voice, indirect statements, subjunctive mood, and others. Some commenters offer artificial "rules" that say you should or should not use certain types of stylistic flourishes (e.g., "avoid the passive voice"). This view is unreasonably narrow-minded, and restricts the expressive beauty of the target language. My personal advice, which I will enjoin, is to dive in, roll around in your language's words and phrases, bathe yourself in them, and use whatever you will. Nearly anything is fair game, as long as it is pleasing to the palate. As Virgil says (Aeneid. III.436) we must "repeat, and urge, and repeat again."

3. Translate thoughts, not exact words. Any written passage can be seen as both a construct of words, and as a construct of ideas. We must be mindful of the whole, while showing deference to the constituent parts. Before translating a passage, read it through completely to get a sense of its full meaning. Do not try to aim constantly for a literal translation. Our goal should be a translation that is faithful to the original wording, but not just a pale imitation of it. Different languages have quite different ways of expressing the same idea, and we must not try to force our target language into accepting the same constructions of our mother tongue.

4. Beware the computer. Online translation services like Google Translate, and commercially available software translation services, are limited. I have nothing against these services per se—I use them myself—but we should be mindful of their limitations. Google Translate simply cannot produce a product that is both grammatically correct and stylistically pleasing. They may be fine for short, simple sentences, but you cannot rely on these computer crutches. I was recently reminded of the severe limitations of the computer when I bought a software dictation package (which I will not name here). It supposedly could render one's spoken words into coherent written text. In practice, it was nearly useless, turning out only streams of gibberish.

On the other hand, the internet has opened up opportunities for Skype-related interactions and tutoring with native speakers. I have no personal experiences with such services, but anecdotal accounts related to me thus far have been positive.

5. Free yourself from your resources. Too much reference to your dictionary or grammar books will only deflect your progress. Cut loose from your moorings, and sail freely in these rough waters. No dictionary or grammar book can give you a precise knowledge of what word or phrase to use in a particular circumstance. The best preparation for composition is, as I have already said, the reading of vast amounts of text in your target language. You will never be able to ride your composition bicycle until you remove your training wheels. It is not a legitimate excuse to plead that one does not have the time to master these arts. It is only a matter of will and priorities. Effective study takes far less time than is generally believed, and the rewards far exceed anything that can be generated by idle leisure.

I will say one final word on these matters. We should be mindful of Quintilian's admonition (Inst. Orat. XII.3) on the importance of good character in speaking and writing well. He sagely counsels us that

> No one can be a proper orator unless he speaks with honor, knows honor, and hears honor.

Nothing good, in other words, will flow from our mouth or pen unless we ourselves are good and decent men. This should be our ultimate object. For our writing, as well as our speaking, is a mirror of our soul and of its mortal health.

Read More: Learning A Language Is The Ultimate Act Of Self-Improvement

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

The Benefits Of Being A Late Bloomer

July 28, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Every one of us came to discover the red pill through different experiences or circumstances. Heartbreak and sexual frustration seem to be the two leading reasons for men Googling “How to get my ex girlfriend back” or “How to get laid.” Eventually we all come across that one article that catches our eye and jives with every last circuit of our masculine hard drive. One article leads to another and before we know it we’re hooked.

I Was The Blue Pill King

My journey to TRP is not unlike most men here but the event that finally woke me up isn’t what I’d categorize as the typical ah ha moment that leads the majority of us to sites like ROK. Was it my failed marriage to a woman who, before she met me, had been married twice, lost custody of her daughter (who doesn’t know her dad isn’t her biological father—neither does dad), then proceeded to cuckold me for “religious reasons”? Nope. Was it the single mother I foolishly tried to rescue by renting her a house, paying the rent and utilities, only to find out she had another man there while I was in jail for a week? Afraid not.

But surely the slutty 9 I felt lucky to have snagged, whose father was in and out of prison the majority of her childhood, and cheated on me so many times I had to get tested for STDs to make sure my dick wasn't falling off would be enough for me to, at the very least, begin to reevaluate what I'd been taught about women my whole life right? Wish I could say she did.

ONS turned relationship

Interestingly enough what made me see the light was a seemingly insignificant three week relationship with a semi-attractive (6 at best) Latina who was one of the worst quality significant others I've ever had in my life. I wasn't with her long enough to develop anything remotely close to real feelings so there wasn't any pain involved but it was an interesting few weeks nonetheless.

The long and the short of it is we got sloshed at the club with friends, stumbled back to her place, had wild drunken sex which apparently consummated our relationship. Like an idiot I took the bait. The first few days were cool (as is always the case with fresh poonani) but it took me all of a week to figure out she was an abnormally low quality woman who was severely damaged. Her laziness, lack of domestic skills, and consistent victim mentality were just the opening act. With each passing day she displayed multiple red flags and after a while I just couldn't sweep them under the rug anymore. I stuck around a couple weeks longer than I should have on a count of her expertise at lightening my testicular loads but I knew that her issues would eventually outweigh her bedroom skills.

Blow To My Ego

But my moment of clarity didn't come until I dumped her (face to face). I prepared for the worst because this chick was really into me—or so I thought. When I broke the news to her she didn't seem the least bit upset or hurt. Complete indifference. Later that evening a mutual friend of ours told me she was already out on a date. Admittedly I was a little bummed because my ego took a body blow but I ended it with her for many reasons. She was someone else's problem now and I was more than good with that. What I couldn't understand was how she could just hop from one cock to another just a few hours after being kicked to the curb by someone she seemed to be head over heels for.

That sequence lead me to the manosphere and the rest is history. I'm in the best shape of my life, I spend the majority of my time occupied with hobbies and self improvement, and my goal of living abroad will become a reality around this time next year. But like many men who have unplugged from the matrix, I often think the thought that has crossed many a Red Pill mind: If I knew then what I know now.

When I think of all the potential lays I missed over the years or all the money I threw away trying to win girls over or how ridiculously ignorant I was when dealing with women that's the age old slogan that used to dominate my thoughts. But no matter how many times I relive those scenarios in my mind and think about what I would have done differently, the more I realize that it's pointless to do so. What's done is done.

Yes, it's good to reflect on past mistakes every so often in order to stay vigilant of avoiding beta behavior but the truth is I have no idea what my life would be like had I been armed with the knowledge I have today—none of us do. What I do know is that being a late bloomer is much more of an advantage than I ever realized and is without question the single biggest reason I'm able to fully enjoy each and every one of the benefits the crimson capsule lifestyle has to offer.

"So what are the benefits of being a late bloomer, SharpShooter?" Thought you'd never ask.

No Kids

There are few nights we go out to the bar or club and don't see a man gaming 9s and 10s and making it look like child's play. You know who he is. He's the dude with swagger, great style, and supreme confidence. He's sipping his whiskey and smoking his cigarette while effortlessly generating tingles with the huge breasted mini skirt wearing blonde in the 6" fuck me heels while her hot friend competes with her for his attention hoping he'll playfully joke about having a threesome. Oh to be in his shoes, right?

Well maybe, but not so fast. An alpha like this may very well be a late bloomer and if he is, good for him. However, a lot of men who are in their prime (mid to late 30s) and ultra smooth with high value women often had game at a very young age. And men who have game at a young age get a lot of pussy during that time which leads to an unexpected rug rat or two.

Children greatly limit a man's options to do what he wants, when he wants, and how he wants to do it. Discretionary income is substantially reduced, the ability to unilaterally decide to relocate is almost completely eliminated, and of course there's always the dreaded baby mama drama.

[image]

For men like myself who didn't know what vagina even smelled like until their early 20s should thank our lucky stars we weren't lady killers in our youth. Believe me when I tell you that I know it was frustrating as fuck watching the cool kids and jocks get all the ass while you were relegated to jerking off to subpar nudie magazines. I lived it. I get. And while it would have rocked to get laid in our teens, the unexpected bundles of joy and the carriers of the wombs they came out of would still have significant impacts our lives now and for the foreseeable future.

Whenever I think about what an average frustrated chump I used to be I'll pull up any number of texts from one of my buddies telling me he's gotta bail on a weekend mountain biking trip because the mother of his kids is pulling some sort of bullshit. With a smirk on my face I shake my head and say aloud: "Thank God I was a fuckin' loser."

Great Looks + Wisdom

One of the many advantages of being a man is that our physical aging sequence is the opposite of women. Females are most attractive from their late teens to mid twenties while our attractiveness sky rockets as soon as we hit thirty and continues to smolder well into our forties and sometimes even longer depending on genes and habits.

As teenagers we look gangly, scrawny, and flat out adolescent. Outside of a little peach fuzz there's no facial hair to speak of. Our raging hormones don't do our complexions any favors either. We look a little better in our twenties having filled out a bit (provided we're lifting and eating right) and have a more mature look to us. Our facial hair has slowly started to grow in but it's still a ways off from giving us that rugged masculine look that drives women mad. We're getting a little more attention from the opposite sex but the real fun begins when we hit the big 3-0. And if you've taken the red pill after 30 you'll find yourself smack dab in the middle of your sexual prime with the knowledge and wisdom to not only maximize it, but keep your sanity, lifestyle, and independence.

Being a good looking guy is great but if you don't have red pill wisdom or game to go along with it your life can be still be made a living hell by a woman. Athlone McGinnis's article on Andrew Stern is the quintessential example of a man who was blessed by the genetic gods but his lack of game lead to his tragic undoing.

Late bloomers have the distinct advantage of having better looks due to aging combined with wisdom from having experienced more in life. These traits certainly have value by themselves but when they are united they're greater than the sum of their parts. For example, I'm a month away from turning 37 and I've never looked better. My older appearance these days gives me more opportunities with women than I ever did in my twenties. Putting that together with my new found knowledge of game and the true nature of women and how to handle them has helped me achieve a level of personal satisfaction I've never approached in the past.

I Know I Have Been Very Fortunate

Over the past few years I've had the benefit of spending a lot of time with like minded men and one thing that remains clear is that we all still bare scars from our blue pill pasts. But few of us are lucky enough to say that there's nothing tangible linking us back to our beta days. My ex wife and I didn't have any money or kids so our divorce was uncomplicated. As a result I came out of that situation unscathed. The woman I tried to save ended up with the white knight she had the week long slumber party with, thus, giving me a stay of financial execution. And last but not least, all of my STD tests were negative.

One thing I have never taken for granted is how fortunate I've been when it comes to missteps with women. If the pendulum had swung in the other direction in any one of those situations my life would have gone sideways in a hurry.

But it didn't.

Which leads to the last and most important benefit of being a late bloomer:

Appreciation.

Read Next: Why Russell Wilson Is On The Right Track

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

How We Can Win Through Language

July 28, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

With the summer coming and social life kicking up a notch, I thought it was a good moment for a little social engineering we can all experiment with. As people have mentioned it's not much use if manosphere is just a bunch of blogs blowing off steam. We need to come together and start making an impression on the world.

First of all we must understand exactly what 'going viral' means. We know what it is, but today it's an overused word; companies try to market their products virally and so the real concept is distorted. Viral is essentially something that spreads like wild fire, largely through word of mouth, without trying to 'push' a product in a traditional way (it shares overlap with the word 'meme'). In many cases there may be no actual commercial venture or deliberate effort behind the viral spread—it could be a funny video on Youtube or some faux pas. What viral most definitely is: the spread of some new social attitude.

Prior to the internet there are plenty of cases of things 'going viral'. An example might be the use of the word 'cool' or 'dude' or 'rad' or back to the 1960s hippies 'hey man'. One of the most effective ways to spread a message virally is by colloquial phrases. I have experimented with installing phrases into people's mindset all my life. It's a game I like to play at school, in college, at work and generally in the community around me—I would see if unusual words and phrases would come back to me. Living in a foreign country I'd deliberately say hello to local barmen or shopkeepers in English or use the Italian 'ciao' and they'd soon start responding to me.

One word I used a lot is 'clown'. Any time someone was being flakey or messing me about, I would refer to them as a 'clown'. Few if any of my peers were using this word. It's hardly an original phrase, but it wasn't something in use. Slowly I began to notice the word coming back to me, and then I began to see it online in articles and it's becoming more widely used. I am not trying to take credit for it since it's not original enough, but I've certainly witnessed people who never used it before, parroting this phrase back to me.

Another example would be the spread of the word terrorist. The media and GW were extremely successful in installing that phase into the public's mindset. Prior to 2001, 'terrorist' was a few fringe lunatic gangs in Europe like the IRA or Red Brigade who occasionally let off bombs by way of sending a political message. Today practically anyone that disagrees with you is a terrorist—the meaning of the word has changed.

Feminism started as a viral campaign. The word 'gay' is a viral campaign, since its meaning and usage pre 1960s was completely different.

Tribal Lingo

The reason that phrases spread so quickly is because at a tribal level we want to 'click' with each other and a way of doing this is by using the same terminology, but more importantly applying the same emotional spin. Terrorist was a dry definitive term pre-2001, today it carries emotional weight. One man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter. They used to be called rebels, but that is a neutral word that doesn't give their opposition the same weight to attack them with.

Changing the terminology in daily language and changing the emotional spin on the word changes people's attitudes. I believe we can do the same with red pill, and most importantly we can do it without attaching any labels, trying to deliberately push a message, or expecting to receive thanks and credit. Just as the surfers spread the word 'rad' or 'dude', we can begin filtering manosphere phrases into the mainstream. One of the reasons why virality becomes so prolific and successful is because there is nothing to push back against. It's not Coca-Cola shoving their sugary crap in your face, or some feminist forcing the agenda of the day.

Smartphones is a good place to start. Cease tolerating 'clowns' using cell phones when you are in a social setting. People are becoming increasingly fed up with smart phones—who better to change the world than the red blooded males amongst us? Here are some things you can say to a girl who pulls out her phone:

"Can you put that out please"

Just like a smoker is told to put his cigarette out. It's perfectly socially acceptable. Pre 1980s if you asked someone in a bar to put a cigarette out, they'd probably head butt you. Today you'll comply. Simply use the same term for a phone.

"We're having a threesome?"

I tried this one when a girlfriend reached for her buzzing phone while I was still inside her. A cryptic variation of it – "If we're having a threesome, they need to be in the room".

"Are you earning webcam tips?"

A perfect cryptic phrase when her phone buzzes during sex.

"Airplane mode please"

I am sure we can spread this one like wild fire, and it will be amusing to see it come back at us in a few months. Thanks to Roosh and the boys at ROK, the world's attitude changes, one phone call at a time.

Beyond The Phone

"Princess"

Immediately implies an annoying and high maintenance woman. Use it for your ex, a girl that friend zoned you, or for any entitled bitch. Because it's not rude, much like 'gay', no one can complain. "Hurry up princess".

"Baby Momma"

Is already around, but its use can be amped up a great deal. Perfect for an ex, and can be used humorously even with a girl you just met an hour ago. It doesn't have to imply you have a kid with her, it simply puts women in their place as baby mommas.

"Are You PMS'ing?"

We can pinch this one from a Katy Perry song. Any time a girl is in a bad mood just ask her this question. It immediately calls her to attention (and you will be biologically correct much of the time anyway). Sexual liberation lets us use phrases like this right out in the open. Use the 'enemies' weapons against her. Make a point of using it not only with girls you are intimate with, but to strangers like the bitchy bank clerk or airline check-in girl. Use confidence and put a smile on your face. Empathize with her. The feminist is instantly deflated and put in check by her biological reality. This is the kind of thing that gay men have been getting away with for years and why women love them so much.

"No One Is Going To Bite You"

Particularly poignant after the World Cup Luis Suarez controversy. It implies a person is insecure and over reacting to whatever situation. Perfect her her hissy fits.

All In The Attitude

Stop dancing around women like you owe them something. Stop taking no for an answer and doing what you are told. Switch on a smile and beat the drab and boring world around you with smarts. Game is not just about getting pussy—it's about being a smarter, better, brighter more interesting man. This should immediately be reflected not only in female interest, but in social acceptance, professional recognition and financial success. Female interest is probably the easiest and least important of the results you can obtain from having game. I'll take a billion, a private jet, and a 200 foot yacht over pussy any day.

Focus the anger you feel into something productive. Anger tells you something is wrong, but unfortunately it's such a lizard brained response, you just feel like going for the kill. For the last 150 years or so, that has not produced the correct result. Killers no longer win, especially if they are just manboys huffing and puffing. Focusing that raw, primal urge to kill is difficult I admit, but it can produce amazing results. The language you use is an important part of that.

I am sure there are other phrases we can adopt. It only takes a few people out there to start hammering home the message in happy, casual, daily conversation and the fire will spread faster than a smoldering cigarette butt in the Californian scrub.

Read Next: Is The Manosphere Having An Effect Upon Modern Society?

Confused Beta Male Laments Realities Of Online Dating

July 29, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

As readers might be able to tell from my articles, I find online dating to be interesting both for its methodology and how it has transformed our culture. This recent article in the Observer serves as what amounts to the beta male counterpoint to my earlier article about the 40-something woman who used 98 men for first dates. The author laments his inability to find a relationship via online dating, which he asserts cheapens the entire romantic interaction.

It is immediately clear that the author operates from a low-SMV mindset—he talks about being scared around girls, having a "relatively barren" dating history, and repeatedly proclaims that he prefers a long-term serious relationship. Anyone who's dated online and knows the pitfalls and idiosyncrasies of that process know what this guy is in for with that combination of traits:

> "I realized my lifetime date count had, like a strain of mutant amoebae, multiplied by more than sevenfold. But only one date—and I went on close to 50 via online services—made it past the first encounter. That one petered out almost as quickly as the rest."

Too often men who are socially uncalibrated take to the field of online dating because it feels easier to get dates. This is the devil's bargain of online dating — any schlub can scroll through pages of girls and even exchange messages with them, but few realize that it does nothing to change the traits that women find attractive. If you haven't developed the real-life attributes that girls find attractive, you're going to end up spending lots of cash feeding female egos with nothing (relationship or otherwise) to show for it.

> "I am, as the Jerome Kern tune goes, old-fashioned, even though I'm 26, and I like old-fashioned girls. If I could bend the world into another reality, I would mold it after Woody Allen's great musical comedy Everyone Says I Love You, in which attractive couples dance about the sidewalks singing old jazz standards."

In a move common to social castaways of the sexual marketplace both male and female, the author would rather dwell on his idealizations of what the world "should" be like, rather than face the realities and adapt to achieve what he is looking for. He does at least make what he figures, to be an honest college try:

> "When I'd completed my new online profile, I sent it over to a female friend for vetting. Add an inch to your height, she said, and put a few female writers in your list of favorite authors. I took her advice, making myself 5-foot-11 while adding Nora Ephron, Katie Roiphe and Gail Collins to a list that included E.B. White, Dwight Garner and Tobias Wolff. "

List some female authors? This is why you should never listen to a woman's dating advice. We can also see the author's lack of understanding of sexual market value in the way that he writes about casual sexual relationships:

> "While any slut can game the system if he or she [emphasis mine] so pleases, bedding the city via Tinder or any number of online dating apps, what's less often acknowledged is that regular people are going on an inordinate number of dates and getting very little—sexual or otherwise—in the process.
>
> …
>
> The trouble is, I'm not that kind of guy. Oh, how I wish I could be a slut, if only for a little while! But I'm shy and insufficiently assertive and quite anxious and have trouble reading women."

The author uses the term "slut" to describe men, which immediately invalidates any of his theories on the sexual marketplace. This is because he fails to realize the abilities necessary to attract women for casual relationships are identical to those required to attract them for the eventual long-term commitment that "normal people" (his words) desire. He also does not understand that in this climate, the men who are looking online for serious relationships are no longer the "normal people." The futility of his approach is made painfully clear throughout his other dating anecdotes:

> "Like the cute 22-year-old paralegal from Florida who told me, on our first date in the Flatiron District this past winter, that I was a "diamond in the rough." Alas, maybe a little too rough. "You're great," she said in a text the next day, when I'd asked her out again. "But I honestly don't think I could see myself being romantically involved with you."

The problem here for our protagonist is multilevel. First of all, the kind of man who has no success with women cannot magically change his ability to attract them by altering the medium in which he meets them. Dating and attraction is a Markov Process: once you're on the date, future results don't hinge upon how you got to that point. Online dating is not his problem. The man simply fails at being attractive.

The second problem with the author is that he's seeking a relationship and is likely telegraphing this desperation to all of his prospects. New York City is a well-known dating minefield, where random hookups and multiple-partner harems are the norm for both sexes, likely created by the abundance of choice and the pressure to forsake human relationships in favor of building up other aspects of one's life. The vast majority of New York girls who sense a man is looking to jump into anything serious will run in the opposite direction.

In a culture that punishes men for taking relationships serious, men who are looking for relationships have only two options. The first? Follow the myriad game advice for making himself the kind of man that girls would want to have a relationship with. The second? Settle for dating girls who can't do any better than you. One of these paths is hard but worth it. The other, well… good luck.

We have easily diagnosed the problems of our hapless narrator, but what about the assertion that the online dating itself has warped our sexual marketplace? Anyone who has spent time in the online trenches can attest that it has created even more of a steep pareto distribution—that is, despite the increased exposure for everyone, the vast majority of the success filters to those at the top of the hierarchy. The rich, in essence, get richer.

Making matters worse, the so-called "paradox of choice" affects online daters at all levels of sexual market value. This makes some sense, since the presence of large numbers of choices devalues any particular one of the selections. Why should a girl respond to my message, or why should I put up with crap from a girl, when they are basically just colored pixels on a screen that could be just as easily replaced with other colored pixels? The complaints with online dating can be boiled down into these groups:

> Desirable man: "I can date and get laid, but have to put up with lots of flaking, annoyance, attention seeking, etc. Why should I put energy into any specific girl?"
>
> Undesirable man: "I go on a bunch of first dates but can't get girls to call me back no matter how nice I am".
>
> Desirable girl: "I go on a bunch of first dates and none of these guys are up to my standards. Where are all the good men?"
>
> Undesirable girl: "I rarely get messages and guys only want me for sex."

It's obviously better to be in the "desirable" situation for either sex, but online dating is only a panacea for those who are already high in sexual market value. At the risk of sounding like a broken record, the best course of action is again to work on other areas of your life so that when you're ready for a relationship, you'll be able to attract the kind of girl that you're looking for. It's both a simple solution and a hard one, and one that will continue to elude the author of the Observer piece and many other men who refuse to accept the realities of dating in the information age.

Read Next: 6 Reasons Why Online Dating Can Never Be As Good As Real Life

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

The Age of Commerce

July 29, 2014 | by Mark | Link | Original Link

Foreword

The "Fate Of Empires and Search For Survival" is an essay written by Sir John Glubb and published in 1977. Sadly, The Fate Of Empires is no longer in publication, but there are second hand copies on eBay and a free pdf version online.

The different ages in which empires change is remarkably similar. These are characterised by a series of interlinking events which led from one age to another. The ages in empires are the age of pioneers, the age of conquest, the age of commerce, the age of affluence, the age of intellect and the age of decadence. These ages come in the sequence denoted and often interlap with one another as time progresses.

The Age Of Commerce

> "Let us now, however, return to the life-story of our typical empire. We have already considered the age of outburst, when a little regarded people suddenly outbursts on to the world stage with a wild courage and energy. Let us call it the Age of Pioneers.
>
> Then we saw that these new conquerors acquired the sophisticated weapons of old empires, and adopted their regular systems of military organisation and training. A great period of military expansion ensued, which we may call the Age of Conquests. The conquests resulted in the acquisition of vast territories under one government, thereby automatically giving rise to commercial prosperity. We > may call this the Age of Commerce."

With the conquest of vast areas of land or overseas domains, an emerging empire now has access to goods it did not have before.

> "The conquest of vast areas of land and their subjection to one government automatically acts as a stimulant to commerce. Both merchants and goods can be exchanged over considerable distances. Moreover, if the empire be an extensive one, it will include a great variety of climates, producing extremely varied products, which the different areas will wish to exchange with one another."

By means of trade and commerce, the conqueror people now accumulate wealth by the goods flowing through its borders.

> "Even the savage and militaristic empires promoted commerce, whether or not they intended to do so. The Mongols were some of the most brutal military conquerors in history, massacring the entire populations of cities. Yet, in the thirteenth century, when their empire extended from Peking to Hungary, the caravan trade between China and Europe achieved a remarkable degree of prosperity – the whole journey was in the territory of one government."

In the article "The Age of Conquests", we saw how Genghis Khan united the tribes of the steppe; took on the mighty empire of China, and defeated them. For all the barbarism under his leadership, Khan wanted his people to benefit from his newly created empire. Thus Genghis Khan established trading and commerce.

The conquest of vast areas of land, or overseas territories, to one government automatically acts as a stimulant to commerce. Both merchants and goods can be exchanged over considerable distances. Moreover, if the empire is an extensive one, it will include a great variety of climates, producing extremely varied products, which the different areas will wish to exchange with one another.

During the time of Marcus Aurelius, Rome was importing and exporting goods from China (then under the Han Dynasty). The Weilue, by Yu Huan, is a Chinese account, detailing several aspects of Han China , including the trades between China and the Da Quin, which we know as the Romans.

However, commerce creates a problem.

> "The Age of Conquests, of course, overlaps the Age of Commerce. The proud military traditions still hold sway and the great armies guard the frontiers, but gradually the desire to make money seem to gain hold of the public. During the military period, glory and honour were principal objects of ambition. To the merchant, such ideas are but empty words, which add nothing to the bank balance."

It is at this stage that the great empire begins its decline by planting the seeds of its own destruction.

> "The first half of the Age of Commerce appears to be particularly splendid. The ancient virtues of courage, patriotism and devotion to duty are still in evidence, The nation is proud, united and full of self-confidence. Boys are still required, first of all, to be manly, to ride, shoot straight and to tell the truth."

In the Roman empire, senators and their sons were forbidden from engaging in trade, and instructed instead to dedicate themselves in military training. When profit comes before the values of the empire, the people shift their priorities from the nation to themselves. Profit, and not honour become the aspiration of the new generation.

> "There does not appear to be any doubt that money is the agent which causes the decline of this strong, brave and self-confident people. The decline of courage, enterprise and a sense of duty is, however, gradual."

This self centered attitude marks the beginning of the end.

> "The first direction in which wealth injures the nation is a moral one. Money > replaces honour and adventure as the objective of the best young men. Moreover, men do not normally seek to make money for their country or their community, but for themselves…Education undergoes the same gradual transformation. No longer do schools aim at producing brave patriots ready to serve their country. Parents and students alike seek the educational qualifications which will command the highest salaries. The Arab moralist, Ghazali (1058-1111), complains in these very same words of the lowering of objectives in the decaying Arab world of his time. Students, he says, no longer attend college to acquire learning and virtue, but to obtain those qualifications which will enable them to grow rich. The same situation is everywhere evident amongst us in the West today."

Conclusion

The Age of Commerce occurs as a result of the vast empire that the Age of Conquest brings to the conquerors. In an empire, commerce becomes unbound by passports, permits, customs, boycotts and political interference. Large empires can produce an assortment of goods.

The Age of Commerce brings unforetold wealth to the conquerors. However, wealth corrodes the spirit of men, and slowly eats away at the honour and courage of the people.

Read More: The Age Of Conquests

Mark
Mark is a seasoned traveller and philander who enjoys a smoke and glass of bourbon. He is an avid reader and a Political History enthusiast. Occasionally enjoys shit posting on the Guardian or the Telegraph. You can read his other ROK articles, and follow him on twatter and Google+1. His articles are proofread by InfoShinobi.

How My School’s Annual Baseball Game Was Destroyed

July 29, 2014 | by Lain Rob | Link | Original Link

Our School’s Tradition

I remember when I was a kid, my school used to host an annual intramural baseball game. It was a huge event, which we the students all called the “Annual Baseball Game,” or simply, the Game. Every year, the best players from the year before picked the teams, and of course, the team captains always went on to pick the next best kids in line, because they wanted to win.

It was always a killer game. Like clockwork, every year the entire student body would make their way out past the black top to the baseball diamond, lunch boxes and Capri Suns in hand, anxious parents trailing a few yards behind.

Even kids from the other school across town, who were our rivals, used to sneak over the school’s fence to watch, and you could see the look of trepidation on their faces, since those kids on the field slamming homers and working like a precise, well-oiled machine to get out after out after out were exactly the ones they’d be playing in the upcoming city-wide All Star Game later in the year.

Even though I was never good enough to get picked for the team, I felt a tremendous sense of pride just watching the other kids play. It made me happy. That was my school. Every kid playing on that field, whether offense or defense, deserved to be there because they were the best.

We were the best.

The New Rules

Then one day, a few of the students who never got picked to play in the Annual Baseball Game complained that they felt left out. Their feelings were hurt, they said; they wanted to play, too; it wasn't fair, why should only the athletic kids get to play?

So the yard narcs made a new rule that any student who wanted to play was guaranteed a spot on the team. Suddenly, the overwhelming flood of new players made picking teams impossible. The team captains threatened to quit.

The principal herself was called to settle the issue. The principal's solution was to institute a lottery system, drawing the names of any student who wanted to play in the game from a hat to make sure the choosing was random, and therefore, fair. The choosing process was taken completely out of the team captains' hands.

The game that year was a mess. Balls were dropped. Balls flew down centerfield without being caught by the right mitt. It didn't look anything remotely like what a baseball game should. The team captains spent the whole hour screaming their heads off for their teams to get it right, but the new players—the ones who had demanded so vociferously that they be allowed to play—simply didn't know what to do.

Where I had always felt a great sense of pride watching my school's best and brightest kick ass, or get their asses kicked honorably in the name of Us, I suddenly felt something else. I felt ashamed. And I knew the rest of the audience did, too, because by the halfway point, most of the crowd had sauntered away from the bleachers, back to the other parts of the playground or indoors to play POGs or Magic cards. The only people left watching to the very end were the parents of the kids playing.

Meanwhile, our rivals from across town smirked and whispered amongst themselves, where they watched far away smoking cigarettes and leaning against the back fence of the school, their gleeful faces bright and confident that they would have this year's All Star Game in the bag.

And they did. We got crushed that year. And the parents of the athletic kids, only a handful of whom had actually gotten to play in the intramural game thanks to the new lottery system, were livid. Our school spirit had suffered a critical blow, and the resulting defeat at the hands of our rivals was absolutely brutal, made even worse by the fact that it was our first loss since my parents had been students at the school, breaking a twenty-four year winning streak.

So, when the next year's intramural game was being planned, the athletic kids' parents got together and put out a flier urging the school authorities to return the Annual Baseball Game to its original rule set, letting the team captains choose their own teams without interference from above, and also that the lottery system be abolished.

But the non-athletic kids who weren't good at playing ball were not about to give up their hard-won time in that glorious once-per-year spotlight in front of our entire community. Their parents, too, buckled down for a fight.

The Parent/Teacher Meeting

There was an emergency parent/teacher meeting called to determine the fate of the annual intramural ball game. The principal herself presided. Things got ugly. The room was divided into two sides: the athletic kids and their parents on one side, and the non-athletic kids and their parents on the other.

There was a lot of yelling. Any rational argument presented by either side was instantly drowned out by shout-downs of “That’s bullshit!” or “You just want YOUR kid to play!”

Eventually, one parent stood up and proposed the whole room take a vote. The audience sat down and those in favor of the new rules raised their hands, then everyone in favor of the old.

The majority of the room, by a fair margin, actually wanted to keep the old rules and let the team captains pick their teams. The principal wasn’t happy about this, but she respected the democratic decision of the parent/teacher meeting and made the call: the team captains could again pick their teams, and the lottery system was to be officially abolished.

Well, that would’ve been nice, but it didn’t last long.

The Protest

The non-athletic kids' parents were so disgruntled that a few of them stormed out of the conference room, and the next day there was a protest in the staff parking lot of our school. A bunch of the non-athletic kids' parents stood in the parking lot blocking the teachers' parking spaces and holding signs with slogans like "No discrimination in our schools!" And "ALL children are special!" And "My child can play ball, too!" Some of the signs even had pictures of the principal with her face crossed out.

The story made the local news. I got interviewed and was on TV for all of ten seconds, saying I thought the whole thing was pretty dumb, and I just wanted to watch a good game. I was disappointed when the clip aired, because I got cut off, and when the segment shifted back to the anchors, they seemed to laugh at my opinion, going so far as to call the protesting parents "heroic" and the non-athletic kids "brave".

To be honest, a lot of those kids looked like their parents were embarrassing them and they just wanted to go home. But, long story short, the principal caved. We all received a school email the following day after the news program aired, informing us that the old rules were being thrown out again, and the lottery was being reinstated. Also, there was one additional rule: no more team captains would be grandfathered in from the previous year's games, and instead from now on the yard narcs would be the team captains.

The note ended with a somber mention that the Annual Baseball Game, our school's great tradition, should include everyone of every ability, and that we all had different strengths and personalities that made us unique.

I remember thinking to myself: okay, but what the hell does that have to do with baseball?

A Game In Free Fall

We got crushed again at the All-Star Game that year, and the year after. By my second to last year, I stopped going to the annual intramural game all together, and only showed up at the city's All-Star Game to see the girl I liked and to hang out with my friends.

I sure as hell didn't care about our team. The really athletic kids who were good at baseball had all long since joined the county's private youth league, since the Annual Baseball Game was a joke, and none of them had time to practice for or play in the All-Star Game, so only the mediocre kids played. Against our cross-town rivals, who practiced day-in and day-out to beat us, we were nothing. Hell, little old non-athletic, can't-catch-a-fly-ball-for-nothin me could have made the team at that point with flying colors, but I didn't want to. Our school was an embarrassment.

That night some of the kids from across town picked a fight with my friends and me. I didn't know if it was because we were outnumbered, or because we just didn't have enough school pride to really fight them with heart, but I distinctly remember it was the first time I ever got my ass handed to me in a fistfight. I went home with two black eyes, a fat lip, a chipped front tooth, and two broken ribs.

I wanted to kill those motherfuckers, but part of me also knew that if I had been them, I would have kicked our asses, too. The crushing defeat our school had suffered on the baseball diamond was their way of telling us this was their town. The beating was simply the boilerplate on the message.

Getting my ass kicked wasn't the worst thing that ever happened to me. In fact, it may have been one of the best, because it forced me to confront my weaknesses in ways I hadn't had a reason to before. It's hard to ignore that your heart's not in the fight when a bigger guy's boot is kicking in your cheeks and teeth and ribs and you're feeling every crunch like it's a steel bat, just like you can't ignore that your All-Star team is untrained and unprepared for the big game, shouldn't even be a team at all, when you finally have to watch them getting hopelessly demolished from the bleachers.

Victory may be the greatest thing there is, but defeat isn't the worst. The worst is a victory you're given, but that you haven't earned.

The New New Rules

I was in my last year of grade school when they stopped using hard bats and balls at the intramural Game. The principal had decided it was better to use wiffle balls instead, after some parents complained their kids were getting hurt at practice. Some girl didn't catch the ball, and it hit her in the face. Her parents threatened to sue the school, then a bunch of other parents jumped on the bandwagon to say their child had been hurt too, and how could the principal let this happen, and didn't she know this was an outrage, and that her job was at stake, and by God if she didn't do something about this soon they would, and so on.

In all of one day, our school's Annual Baseball Game turned into the Annual Wiffle Ball Game.

I didn't really give a shit about any of it at that point. I remembered loving the Annual Baseball Game when I was a little kid, but that feeling was long gone. Me and a few of my friends showed up just to see what a joke it was, and what we thought would be a ridiculous spectacle turned out to be a completely depressing one instead.

The field was full of non-athletic kids. And I mean, really non-athletic. It was bad. I didn't know who most of them were. I remember thinking: did they all come out of the Magic card room? Was this the first time they'd been outside all year? Not one of the pale, flabby bodies on that field looked like they could run a lap without stopping to catch their breath. I was embarrassed I had ever felt pride over such a farce.

A single cheering voice echoed from the bleachers. It was the mom of the kid currently batting. The other parents looked overheated, and bored. As her fat, red-faced Huffington rounded first base, Wiffle Ball Mom cupped both hands to her mouth and shouted: "Go on, honey! You can do it! Just do your best!"

Out of the corner of my eye, I saw the kid playing left field scoop up the ball on his fourth try, and cock his arm to throw it at second base. Then he paused and stayed there, not doing anything. I remembered a new rule the principal had instated, that any kid who hit the ball was to be allowed three bases before the opposing team could try to get them out.

The next year, after I graduated, the principal banned the concept of “outs” from the game entirely.

A few years later, my school pulled out of the All-Star Game too, the reason cited being a lack of financial support from the parents of the student body. But I think poor performance and lack of interest were bigger reasons. We hadn’t won the city’s All-Star Game in years. Forget that we’d been the champions for two decades. What point was there in showing up if no one cared?

Why Nothing Gold Can Stay

By the time my kids were enrolled at the school, the city's school board had decided not to have an All-Star Game at all, claiming it bred the wrong kind of competition between the town's two biggest elementary schools, and this rivalry could possibly lead to violence. I sure as hell never ratted out those guys who beat me up back in the day, and I'm sure me and my friends weren't the only ones. But the school board pushed hard for friendly competition between the two districts on the opposite sides of our town, rather than rivalry. They even dumped a lot of money in advertising dollars, a large portion of their total yearly budget, into raising awareness for the campaign.

Instead of a citywide All-Star Baseball Game, we now have a citywide Wiffle Ball Game. Any kid from the age of 6-18 is allowed to join, regardless of ability and with no prerequisites, physical, mental, or otherwise. I checked it out one year not too long ago out of morbid curiosity, but I was the only person on the diamond other than the umpire, who the taxpayers were compensating either way, regardless of whether or not anyone else showed.

No one did.

Read more: What's An Athlete To Do When It Comes To Rings Vs. Money?

Lain Rob

Lain Rob is a sensitive male feminist and self-professed expert on cool bands, craft beer, and waxed facial hair. When he is not online fighting the evils of patriarchy, rape culture, and mean-spirited YouTube comments, he is categorically deferring to the dominating, masculine women in his life whom he desperately hopes will one day have sex with him.

This Man Wrote An Article For Vice Hating On Pickup Even Though It Got Him a Girlfriend

July 30, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Nathan Thompson has written an article for Vice Magazine called 'Confessions Of An Ex-Pickup Artist' (July 28th 2014) where he describes attending a pickup "bootcamp" run by Gambler (Richard La Ruina) of PUA Training. While he concedes that pickup can yield positives such a confidence boost for those who are shy or socially-inept, and that a direct opener on cold approach actually won him a girlfriend, much of the piece denigrates the practice of pickup and draws into question many of its techniques and "psychological tricks." Predictably, the article has generated a storm of social media comments both from feminists and manboobs who are naturally opposed to the notion of pickup, but also from members of the Roosh V Forum, who might—in theory at least—be more sympathetic to it.

Thomson reads The Game by Neil Strauss (a way in for many of us) before attending the bootcamp. His fellow students are "professional, normal-looking guys," (i.e. not the creeps and weirdos that many of the commentators imagine). They are taught how to "set break"—infiltrate a group and began a conversation—and the "three second rule"—that is, to take action within three seconds of seeing an attractive female. They go to popular pickup hangout Tiger Tiger in in Piccadilly Circus to practice. Thomson notes that:

> I felt liberated, as if I had been given permission to follow my instinct a bit more and approach the women I liked. I returned with two numbers (one of which > wasn't fake).

The class then tries some street approaches. Thomson states:

> The PUA practice of approaching women in the street is sometimes confused with harassment. In my experience, most PUAs place great emphasis on politeness and consideration when making a cold approach—after all, they are trying to get laid so being aggressive wouldn't be helpful. We were taught that if a woman is not interested we should always smile and be polite, even if she is rude—especially if she is rude because this trains us to be non-reactive.

But it turns out that the girls around "Pester Square" (Leicester Square) have been over-gamed. "God! You're the third creepy guy who's come up to me today saying that you 'like my energy.' Fuck off!" one tells Thomson.

It is at this point that Thomson launches a curious rejection of pickup that jars with what has gone before:

> In my experience, PUA tactics don't work. They don't produce Bond-esque rogues but grotesque social robots whose jabbering mouths spout programming written by borderline sociopaths. It's insulting to a woman's intelligence to think that a sartorial spruce up and reciting some lines will win her affection.

Odd that these grotesque social robots were previously described as normal, professional-looking guys. Does talking to a few girls really effect such a fundamental personality change? Odd that 'PUA tactics' don't work, given that the author has just obtained an attractive girl's phone number through them.

Thomson goes on to say:

> While self-styled "Pickup Gurus" like Strauss seem to have created one slick personality, the majority of PUAs appear hopelessly inauthentic. Bona fide seducers like Russell Brand are a rare breed whereas PUAs are like hoverflies; they wear the wasp's colours but have no sting.

This I think we can all agree with. Doubtless, there are many less-than proficient dweebs out gaming in London, New York and L.A. right now. But such newbies may well improve and get better over time. Should we deny them the chance? Russell Brand himself reports being very shy as a boy. And anyway, there are plenty of bad golfers out there: no one questions the soundness of the practice of golf itself as a result.

Thomson then brings the ethics of game into question:

> Add to that the fact their techniques are unethical. Manipulating people for your own selfish ends is enshrined in PUA culture—a "pivot" is a girl you use to raise your social status, "AMOGing" is a technique used to bully rivals away from girls you like and "boyfriend destroyers" are designed to lay a girl already in a relationship.

I would disagree that having an attractive female friend with you is unethical and I'm on the fence about AMOG-ing. Whether or not you attempt to lay a girl in a relationship is up to the individual. Personally I'd steer away from it. But it's worth pointing out that here Thomson is attempting to apply an ethical standard to a milieu that is itself without ethics, driven as it is by biomechanics. Believe me, the girls of Tiger Tiger do not often display a high degree of ethical integrity either.

Thomson then touches on themes familiar to those who read manosphere sites like this one:

> PUAs [have] a muddled appeal to evolutionary psychology, particularly the idea of "alpha" and "beta" males. Beta males are men who want to be with one woman and alphas are those with access to many. So the gold standard of success in the PUA community is the "MLTR" or "Multiple Long Term Relationship," where a PUA has sexual relationships with multiple women at the same time.
>
> Things get darker when you get to "relationship game." Based on more evolutionary psychology, some PUAs believe that all women are subconsciously trying to entrap them in long-term relationships, a process they call "betaisation." Tactics to avoid betaisation involve refusing intimacy (which basically means you can only do "hard fucking" only) and freezing-out partners while you focus on seducing other women (called "nexting"). This is the sad heart of the culture—where insecure men form relationships with women, who allow themselves to be mistreated.

This takes the discussion into a whole other area which Thomson does not develop in his article (to be fair, he probably doesn't have space to). Sure, this view of relationships is dark—but no-one said life was one long party. The value of men discussing these issues and passing on their experiences is that it enables them to make more informed decisions. No-one is forcing anyone to 'next' a girl they really like, or to mistreat anyone. Armed with greater clarity, each man must make his own choices on how to proceed.

Thomson finishes up more positively:

> For me, it wasn't all bad. I still get mileage from a tactic known as "the direct approach." The verbal formula goes something like this: "Hi excuse me, I don't usually do this but I think you are really hot and I would be kicking myself if I didn't come up and introduce myself." In fact, I met my last girlfriend this way. But I'm sure it had little to do with the words and more to do with the authenticity that comes with maturity and the fact she digs writers.

Fine—but authenticity, or being your best self, and concentrating on developing your passions (writing, in Thomson's case) is what most modern pickup resources teach men to do. It seems disingenuous—and somewhat ungrateful—for Thomson to write a click-bait article denigrating a practice that not only worked, but actually got him a girlfriend.

Pick-up – or meeting women from cold-approach – is a form of behavior guaranteed to get a lot of people's backs up. For feminists and those men who seek to appease them, there is something "creepy" or even "rapey" about the idea of systematically approaching women in large numbers with the express intention of having sex with them. As one male commentator on the Vice story eloquently put it: "Rapey cunts." But this is disingenuous for the simple reason that any man hating on pickup artists would, in common with them, also like to have sex with a high number of young attractive women, but lacks the inclination to put in the necessary work or face the inevitable high-level of rejection involved. Similarly, I suspect that most girls who criticise pickup would love it if a guy to her taste walked up and told her he would love to meet her on the morning commute, but only if it 'just happened.'

It is the systematic aspect of pickup that sets people's teeth on edge. Of course, as any player will attest, it very rarely "just happens." As women are for the most part the gatekeepers of sex, men without fame or exceptional good looks who wish to sleep with a lot of them must mass approach in order to sharpen their charisma and technique, and in order to find those few who are most receptive to their approach. Women, who seek to optimise their hypergamy by screening for the highest quality males, are naturally suspicious of any method that seeks to short circuit what they believe should be the natural way of things. That is, that men should audition passively like puppies at a dog show, with the women in control as judges bestowing ribbons only on those they find most appealing.

Many people of both sexes also have an issue with men having to pay to get good with women. One male commentator on the Vice story recounts how a "geek" he used to know paid over $1000 for pick-up training. Actually, bootcamp fees of over $3000 are not unusual these days. I have never met Richard la Ruina, nor have I taken one of his courses, so I can't comment on his company's services. I have however seen a few of his videos, which seem to offer value, and I have it on good authority from a friend that he is solid. But this is somewhat beside the point. The accepted narrative socially is that men should just get it. Anyone who has to pay to learn to get good with women is a geek, a weirdo, a creep, and probably a rapist as well. But this is patently ridiculous. If you want to get good at coding, you go and take a coding course. Women, who don't have to approach or initiate relationships, and who also don't have to deal with the vacillations and evasions of their own gender, will never fully understand the difficulties the average man has in successfully attracting them and dealing with them. All men are aware of this on some level, but those who seek to protect their own egos and "good with women" self-image, or those who are simply naturals will also hate on pickup courses to appease girls and to try to fit in with the the predominant PC culture.

There was suspicion too on the Roosh V forum this week, where users are clearly more naturally inclined towards game. This largely centered on the use of the term "PUA," which some considered outdated. "Deluge" stated:

> I'm surprised these Mystery Method era "PUA" coaches still exist. If my only exposure to game was through one of these guys, I'd hate on it too.

My personal feeling is that there is undue suspicion from the manosphere on more commercial game organizations, and that basically we are all on the same side. I'm not personally aware of any company in 2014 that advocates negging, wearing eyeliner and feather boas and doing card tricks to pull girls. The message across the board is about understanding female psychology and becoming the best man you can be. Watch some of Tyler from RSD's recent videos and you'll see that they are extremely red pill in nature, and all advocate self-development. For me, the manosphere diagnoses the problem and game provides the solution (or the best available solution, anyway). Whether or not you choose to drop a load of cash on a bootcamp is up to you, but bear in mind that personal tuition has helped many thousands of guys get over their insecurities and get better with women. Rather than in-fighting, I think men should be glad that we have access to so many diverse resources today, commercial or otherwise.

Want to learn more about game and how to attract beautiful women for the fraction of the price of a bootcamp? Then click here.

Read more: Six Tips For Getting Laid in London

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Good Men Project Wants Men To Be Blubbering Manginas Or Outright Homosexuals

July 30, 2014 | by Steve McMahon | Link | Original Link

"Why oh why didn't I take the BLUE pill?" – Cypher (The Matrix, 1999)

Mangina [man-jahy-nuh]

noun

1. A man totally controlled by a woman
2. A weak willed man
3. The Good Men Project

Most blue pill guys are like that because they just don't know any better. Raised in a culture that lies to them at every turn, from sissified schools to sensitised workplaces to the Electronic Feminist that is television, beta has become the default setting for modern men.

It takes strength to admit to yourself that you've been swindled. Often this realisation only comes after a painful experience, such as divorce. The manosphere is a valuable resource for teaching life lessons to men, hopefully before they have to learn the hard way.

But what if I told you there's an anti-manosphere? I don't mean the feminists, bless their confused little hearts and permanently twisted panties. I mean a corner of the web where men who should know better actively push blue pill bromides like they're the Walter White of pussification.

Welcome to the wacky world of The Good Men Project, or as I call it, The Manginasphere.

Remember those old Star Trek episodes set in an evil alternate universe where everybody was an evil version of the regular Star Trek characters? Think of the manginasphere as being the Evil Goateed Spock version of the manosphere.

If Evil Goateed Spock was a pussy

The first clue that you're not in for a fun time on the manginasphere appears on their About page, which grandly informs the hapless reader that they intend to "break down the oppressive gender binary." Uh huh. Because "gender binary," otherwise known as "biology" is "oppressive" to obsequious, orchidectomised "good men."

The next clue is that it's a "men's website" run by women. Their CEO and Publisher, two of their Executive Editors and three of their Senior Editors are literally as dickless as their male colleagues are figuratively so. What kind of a man needs women to tell him how to be a man? A mangina does.

The rest of their site is crammed full of every weird and miserable social justice warrior talking point you could possibly imagine, from crying about "white privilege," to crying about how videogames are too masculine, to crying about "shaming" and gun control and men who don't like fatties and yadda yadda yadda. You get the point. There's a lot of crying in the manginasphere. Often real, actual, crying, such as in:

- "Real Men Do Cry" — There's nothing more manly than your mascara running.
- "Crying Makes a Man Feel Whole" — Which is ironic, because he won't be getting any hole.
- "Man Crying: 10 Ways to Justify Your Leaky Eyeholes" — Tell her you're on your man period, she'll understand.
- "Big Boys Do Cry" — Especially the fat ones.
- "Watching Pharrell Cry Made Me Cry" — I liked the Blurred Lines video too, but come on!

When they're not crying, they're offering hilariously bad advice. Here's what manginas think you should do to get laid:

Be Non-Judgmental because you shouldn't worry if she walks like John Wayne due to riding the cock carousel for so long, lower your standards and you might get to put your penis where any number of men have been before!

Fight Back Against Rape Culture because in manginaland, #rapeculture is a real thing! And women get the tingles when white knights tell them how much they disapprove of rape. You know—as opposed to all those other men who love rape.

Being a feminist ally will help you get laid because in manginaland, grovelling to feminists for long enough that you eventually get some sweet pity sex is totally worth it, you guys! Why, after only a few years of apologising for having a penis you could be banging some ravishing radfem like this plus-sized princess:

Until she accuses you of rape and/or eats you.

If you think that's guaranteed to dry up a woman's vagina faster than a hairdryer pointed at the crotch, wait till you hear their advice about what men should say to their girlfriends:

"I respect you," "I just love kissing you," "I accept your drama," and "I love that you tell me off sometimes"—these are just some of the things Good Men will be saying before they come home early one day to find their girlfriend being ridden like Seabiscuit by a more masculine man.

And here's Tom Matlack, founder of The Good Men Project and honorary Prince of the Manginas, complaining about men who admire attractive women, like the lovely Christina Hendricks or the winsome Katy Perry:

> I click on bustier-clad Katy Perry and skip down to the interview, trying to ignore Ms. Perry in full black lingerie, complete with garter belt. After all, this is about man at his best; there must be something serious here that we all love so much.
>
> Ah, here it is: "I always wanted to suspend from the ceiling in a twirling banana," Katy tells Esquire. I'm done.
>
> I close the browser window and stare out the window.

"2/10, would not bang" – The Good Men Project

So what sort of women does His Manginaness think we should be interested in?

Gwyneth Paltrow – That derpy-looking airhead who's always going on about organic enemas or something.

Patti Stanger – The orange-skinned oompa loompa / harpie from Millionaire Matchmaker.

Steffi Graf – The Barry Manilow of tennis.

Lady Gaga – Yes. Lady. Fucking. Gaga.

Michelle Obama – Seriously.

Portia de Rossi – A lesbian.

Let that be a lesson to you, boys. This is what happens when you double down on the sweet, sickly blue pill; you end up a pathetic husk of a man, going full social justice retard on the internet and fantasizing about Michelle Obama and her massive chin.

Should we pity the manginas, then? Not even for a split second. It's bad enough that these "men" renounced their own masculinity and embraced male feminist manboobitude, but what really inspires me to hoist the black flag and set about them is the damage they are doing to their sons.

Here's a telling snippet from a godawful piece of poetry they published recently, which boasts about raising a fourteen year old boy to become a censorious little social justice snitch:

> here, between childhood and adulthood, let me tell you again
>
> what being a man is — it is
> […]
> reporting the players who say "faggot" > during League of Legends

Here's a celebration of raising boys to be feminised girly-men:

7. And One Day Soon, We Will Be Using the Expression "Boys Will Be Boys" To Describe This:

And note this unintentionally hilarious cartoon, complaining about the "sexism" that makes normal people try to raise their sons to be masculine:

The dragon punch: an invaluable tool for the modern parent

But what happens when you follow the Good Men's advice and raise your son to believe that girly interests are acceptable? This happens:

Note the role of the parents in this: they send him to ballet dancing lessons. You'll never guess what happened next:

> Two of Morgan's favorite male dancers, Derek and Justin, performed a duet that apparently changed Morgan's life. It was a love story set in the 1940′s between two men. One of the most intimate, elegant and authentic love stories I've seen through dance. Justin and Derek were stellar. Halfway through the piece Morgan laid his head on my shoulder, and I cried. I felt a deep sense of gratitude to the > dancers. During the drive home I asked him what he thought of their performance. Still awestruck he replied, “It was powerful and amazing!”

And, just like that, he’s gay.

Instead of reassuring the boy that he’s only nine years old and has a lot of growing up to do before he needs to worry about sexuality, instead of taking him out of ballet dancing lessons and away from the adult gay men who are giving him funny ideas, instead of giving their child a healthy masculine environment or a chance to work out his confused feelings in private; these “progressives”—these “Good Men”—decided to agree with a small child that he is “gay” and tell fucking everyone. What chance does the boy stand now? Even if he later decides he isn’t gay, this will haunt him throughout high school and possibly the rest of his life.

That, gentlemen, is why manginas deserve to be ridiculed and shamed at every opportunity. No quarter, no mercy.

Read More: 7 Traits of the Male Feminist

Steve McMahon
Steve is a thirtysomething British man who is both incredibly brilliant and uncannily dapper. He lives in the beautiful English countryside with his two boys, his wife, and his cat.

Dating American and Non-American Women: A Comparison

July 30, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

I could write an entire book about the superiority of non-American women to American women, so in this article I intend only to scratch the surface of this vast subject by sharing some of the insights gained from my experiences with these two startlingly different types of the Second Sex.

The greatest difference, to begin with, is that when you deal with non-American women, you don't have to worry about doing virtually everything right. Even if you are an average looking man, so long as you pay your bills, can carry on an interesting conversation, treat the woman well, and not bore her right from the beginning, you will generally be given a fair chance. When you date American women, on the other hand, you have to run the sharpest game you can. If you show feeling before they do, or more feeling than they do; if you lose your cool; if you make a playful joke that offends their touchy nature; if you respond to their texts in much less time than they respond to yours—if you do any of these things (not to mention countless other slips in game, most of them quite stupid and unnatural to have to guard against), then, chances are, the woman will just turn to the next guy in her phone—one of many!—or her next Tinder match, or whatever. For she has endless sexual options, as you do not, and as many non-American women do not want.

In a time when traditional courtship is even more obsolete than the middle-class way of life, many American women are still after Hollywood-style "butterflies," even though these incomparably selfish women have no clue about the compromise and sacrifice for another person required by any truly loving and lasting romantic relationship. Non-

American women, not being raised in a culture of fantasy and entitlement, tend to require only that you be moderately attractive, fairly decent and kind, with a bit of money in the bank and game to go with it—it's always necessary, you see, to be keep women turned on and not bored.

Non-American women are also enjoyable to be around, good for more than sex: you can relax and enjoy their company without having to worry about calculating your every move, lest you slip up and prompt them "not to settle." And they will respect you from the beginning, as well as be grateful and gracious to you for treating them well. By contrast, my friend and I recently met two American women for drinks and within the first ten minutes one pulled out her phone and started texting. That in itself was disrespectful, of course, but hear what she answered when her friend asked who she was texting: "That guy from last night." Utterly shameless! And yet not at all uncommon today.

You can treat an American woman well, but still she will complain. I bought one a shot of Fireball the other weekend; when I brought it to her she griped, "I only drink clear liquor." Non-American women come from backgrounds that do not make them so entitled, so that it is actually worth your time and trouble to spend money on them.

If you approach an American woman in a bar or club, she may ask you to buy her a drink, even though she does not even know you, and as if you owed her something just because she has her tits and ass on narcissistic display! This experience is much less common with non-American women.

American women are generally filthy sluts who, in order to put out, need only a rationale for not feeling like sluts (providing that is a very important element of game, by the way). Non-American women will make you wait to sleep with them, and they are often worth it. Again, an American woman will choke on your cock after meeting you only two hours before at the bar, or simply show up at your house to do the same, having only "met" you via the internet. A non-American woman will make you put in some work, and unlike most American women, she may be worth it.

Being fundamentally unreasonable, an American woman may take offense at just about any remark. I recently had a date with a tatted-up Americunt. I don't like tattoos on women, but I was a bit thirsty, and she was hot anyway, so I gave it a go. When I asked her whether she partied, she responded with an attitude: "What, you think I'm a stoner just because I have tats?" She proceeded to rant about how many "straight edge" people also have tats, and how she didn't like it that I had "judged her." I responded calmly and with a smile: "Relax. I've just never met a tatted-up person who didn't party at least sometimes, so I was only making an inference based on past experiences. Saying I'm judging you makes you seem touchy and insecure. Take it easy, eh." She then said she felt "uncomfortable" and "didn't like my vibe" (read: I wasn't taking her shit) and got up to leave. By that point I was disgusted, so my parting words were: "That's cool. You have a shitty attitude anyway, so get to steppin'—maybe you can get some more tats on your way home!" I suppose I should have been more of a "gentleman"—that is, in 2014, a chump who lets a woman walk all over him in order to possibly get laid!

A little while back I took out a 19 year old French woman who, though basically a child, had more intelligence and sophistication, more charm, dignity and grace than almost every American woman I have ever met, and I say this as a man who has dated and hooked up with far more American women than I can remember. I have met many even in their late 20s and 30s who, though they have professional jobs as lawyers and accountants, still act like stupid 18 year olds when they are out at the bar on Saturday night, taking duck face photos all night long, cursing frequently, and speaking in an obnoxious manner generally (the very tone of American women is often annoying and offensive), and incapable of having an adult conversation with an intelligent man. Even if she does not have a university education, a non-American woman will generally be a much better conversationalist—far more interesting and, most of all, POLITE—than many an American stunner with an Ivy League degree. If feminists were really serious about progress and the common good, they might design a muzzle specifically for American women.

The surest way to keep up a relationship or FWB situation with American women is through a combination of emotional deprivation and rough sex. You have to keep them longing for you emotionally and overwhelm them in bed. The former is tiresome for me: I find it unnatural to suppress my emotions just so that a woman doesn't find me "needy" or "clingy," no longer a source of novelty and excitement, no longer a kind of elusive emotional rock to try to break through.

This inhuman game is hardly necessary with non-American women, because they are not fundamentally corrupt. I can be my true self: spontaneous, sincere and chivalrous. For these women are much less entitled, much less fake, and much less inclined to vanish on a man the moment he fails to live up to some set of deluded expectations. Again, with American women, you always have to be thinking several steps ahead of them and maintain a certain measure of prudent distrust. Now this is very difficult to do since virtually all women are preternatural masters of dissimulation, very difficult to completely read and just as difficult to fool.

If you are used to dating American women, you will be astonished to see how emotionally expressive and vulnerable non-American women allow themselves to be. They give in to their spontaneous impulses. They take chances and don't hold back. They are natural. American women are mostly cold-hearted players, and it's unwise not to constrain your feelings in your relations with them: if you don't, they are likely to burn you, or find you weak, needy, clingy, too eager, etc., etc.

American women are absurdly fickle, much more so than women in general. You simply never know what is in store for you. You can be treating an American woman well, and things can seem to be going well. Still, she can get bored or lose interest at any moment, and when that happens she will often just go silent on you: having no sense of propriety—or, in other words, not being a lady, even though she expects you to be a gentleman—she cannot be bothered to give you the basic respect of a "hey, sorry, but I don't think this is working. Take care." Such whimsical selfishness—unchecked by any sense of honor or desire to do the right thing—is much less common among non-

American women, who are far more likely to stay with you, just as they are to let you know where you stand.

What makes the response rates so low on dating websites is the fact that, until they hit the wall of their 30s, American women have a kind of penis attention deficit disorder; they are simply "not going to settle" for anything less than the latest novel suitor putting in his attempt. A non-American woman is much more likely to "settle" for just one—imagine that!—quality guy.

If you go on a date with a non-American woman, she will probably show up looking like a woman, wearing a dress or skirt. With American women, I have to take care not to dress too sharp or we will look silly together.

If you compliment a non-American woman, she will probably be appreciative and gracious in response. An American woman will likely be bored or even feel outright disdain for you.

A non-American woman not only knows how to cook; she may even be happy to cook for you. An American woman doesn't learn to cook until she is married with children, an affair in which she is usually worthless. For, in short, an American woman wants you to do things for her, but she will rarely do anything for you besides put out, and how is that doing anything for you really? It takes two to tango, as the saying goes.

If you call a non-American woman on her shit, she may take the point and even respect you for it. An American woman will usually just rationalize her behavior, then lament the lack of "gentlemen" around today, all while her similarly clueless girlfriends support her hamster's irrational spinning and trash you behind your back. (And yet, even that doesn't mean you can't bang them some drunken night. After all, they are American women.)

If you ask a non-American woman whether she needs a man or men in life, chances are she will say yes. An American woman is likely to say no, even though, if she is single, her phone is probably full of men hitting her up day and night. Not to mention the fact that American women—like women everywhere—rely largely on men in times of emergency, whether these are police, firemen or whoever. For every nation is not only largely the work of men in its most important respects, but is mostly dependent on us to protect it and keep it safe. This is the natural and permanent order of the world, notwithstanding feminist and liberal delusions of "equality."

If you have any doubts about the truth of what I have been saying concerning American women, know that you don't even have to judge them by their words or actions: just look at their body language, as seen at the bar or club, or on Facebook or Instagram, on OKC or POF: unless you are blind, their smugness and haughtiness, their shameless narcissism and entitlement, should be plain.

I have known several non-American women who, even after living here in the States for years, have still not made a single American girlfriend. The reason isn't the usual female competitiveness with each other; it's the fact that because they have intelligence and class, non-American women tend to find their American counterparts intolerable, as do most American men who are not blind chumps.

Conclusion

I stopped taking American women out to dinner years ago, the very rare American woman who is worth it excepted. I am now at the point where I don't even want to meet American women for drinks, as it too has come to seem a waste of time: the games and flaking, the disrespect and bad attitudes, are unavoidable. There are, to be sure, some American women who deserve to be taken seriously, but they are so rare that I have to do approach after approach, or go on date after date, just to find one. As a result, American women as a whole no longer seem worth the trouble; my time is too valuable. With very few exceptions—that is, quality women whom I happen to meet by chance—all I will do is take them home after having met them for the first time that night out at the bar or club, or invite them directly to my house, regardless of how we met.

Meanwhile, pretty much nothing makes me more excited these days than finding an attractive non-American woman to pursue. It's crucial, though, that she has not been in this country for more than a few years. A little while back I was dating a 22 year old Ukrainian woman who, though very sweet at first, turned out to be as cuntish as any American brat I have known. She had been in the U.S. for about 10 years—long enough to make her true nature more of the familiar female bad news.

There is nowhere in the world where women have nearly as much freedom and power as they do here in the U.S. But the great irony here is that, in order to discharge this excess of freedom, American women tend to be extremely submissive in bed, far more than women anywhere else. I have encountered many very successful professional American women—high powered, in charge, and with too much independence in their day to day lives for them to handle—who, once in the sack, want me to basically beat them the fuck up. If you start chatting up a typically cuntish female lawyer or Wall Street executive at the bar, rest assured that her fierce, masculine energy is not entirely real, but after a point something of an act: deep down, she wants to be dominated, as she is fundamentally askew, having more freedom and independence than she can really handle; and she may ask you to do things in bed that will make you shudder. This is yet another proof that feminism is in essence nothing more than a kind of slave revolt and rosy confusion.

Read more: The Equality Movement Is Allowing Women To Tyrannize Men

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

Top 25 Pictures From The “American Girls Be Like” Meme

July 31, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Tuthmosis started an amusing meme on the forum that highlights to faults and hypocrisy of American women. Here are my favorites:

1.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
I JUST WANT TO FIND A NICE GUY WITH A GOOD SENSE OF HUMOR

2.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE "I WAS RAPED"
imgflip.com

3.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE..
WE UNDERPAID
imgflip.com

4.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE:
BEAUTY COMES IN ALL SHAPES AND SIZES
imgflip.com

5.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
"...AND THEN I TOLD HIM I'D BEEN WITH ONLY 2 GUYS BEFORE HIM"
imgflip.com

6.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
I CAN NEVER STOP WORRYING ABOUT ALL THE MEN WHO WANT TO RAPE ME

7.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
YOU PIG, YOU LEFT THE TOILET SEAT UP AGAIN!
imgflip.com

8.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
I MISS THE DAYS WHEN I WAS HARASSED ON THE STREET
imgflip.com

9.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
WE ARE HITTING OUR SEXUAL PEAK RIGHT NOW
imgflip.com

10.

American Girls Be Like
"I'm A Feminist"

11.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
Fifty Shades Darker
Fifty Shades of Grey
WE DETEST RAPE CULTURE
imgflip.com

12.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
TW: @TUTHMOS
"I'M ENGAGED"

13.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE @TUTHMOS
"I'M A FOODIE"

14.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE FAMILY IS SUPER IMPORTANT TO ME weknowmemes

15.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
"I AM AT AUSCHWITZ, LOL!"
made on imgur

16.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
Twitter: @tuthmos
"I'M A GOOD DANCER"

17.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
"WE'RE HANGING OUT"
TWITTER: @TUTHMOS

18.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
I'M NOT READY TO SETTLE DOWN

19.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE Patriarchy
STOP OPPRESSING ME

20.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
twitter: @tuthmos
"I'M TIRED OF MEN OBJECTIFYING ME"

21.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
"I'M NOT LIKE OTHER GIRLS"
TW: @tuthmos

22.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
Twitter: @tuthmos
"I'M READY TO SETTLE DOWN."

23.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
I LIKE HIM, HE MAKES ME SMILE

24.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
"I'M STRONG AND INDEPENDENT"
made on imgur

25.

AMERICAN GIRLS BE LIKE
"I DON'T NEED A MAN!"

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

For more images, visit the thread where it all started or check out the Twitter hashtag #AmericanGirlsBeLike.

Read Next: 40 Pictures That Show The Decline Of American Women

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

23 Things I Learned From The Book “Rules For Radicals”

July 31, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Written after the Vietnam War during peak rage against the establishment, Rules For Radicals has served as one of the manuals for liberals in achieving power, culminating in Obama’s presidency. Surprisingly, it is light on actionable steps. Instead of telling you exactly how to start a DIY revolution, it creates an activist “mood” where you can initiate your own creative steps to affect change.

> The Prince was written by Machiavelli for the Haves on how to hold power. Rules for Radicals is written for the Have-Nots on how to take it away. In this book we are concerned with how to create mass organizations to seize power and give it to the people; to realize the democratic dream of equality, justice, peace, cooperation, equal and full opportunities for education, full and useful employment, health, and the creation of those circumstances in which man can have the chance to live by values that give meaning to life. We are talking about > a mass power organization which will change the world into a place where all men and women walk erect, in the spirit of that credo of the Spanish Civil War, 'Better to die on your feet than to live on your knees.' This means revolution.

I was concerned I bought a socialist manifesto, but beyond the above introduction, the politics in it were quite light. He did intend for budding socialists to implement its strategies, but it can used by anyone. Here's what I learned from the book:

1. Keep your mob busy as you go from one issue to the next

> Remember: once you organize people around something as commonly agreed upon as pollution, then an organized people is on the move. From there it's a short and natural step to political pollution, to Pentagon pollution.

2. Activism will not work without individual sacrifice

> People cannot be free unless they are willing to sacrifice some of their interests to guarantee the freedom of others. The price of democracy is the ongoing pursuit of the common good by all of the people.
>
> […]
>
> Self-respect arises only out of people who play an active role in solving their own crises and who are not helpless, passive, puppet-like recipients of private or public services. To give people help, while denying them a significant part in the action, contributes nothing to the development of the individual. In the deepest sense it is not giving but taking— taking their dignity. Denial of the opportunity for participation is the denial of human dignity and democracy. It will not work.

3. You're not a have-not if you're supported by the status quo

> From the Haves, on the other hand, there has come an unceasing flood of literature justifying the status quo. Religious, economic, social, political, and legal tracts endlessly attack all revolutionary ideas and action for change as immoral, fallacious and against God, country, and mother. These literary sedations by the status quo include the threat that, since all such movements are unpatriotic, subversive, spawned in hell and reptilian in their creeping insidiousness, dire punishments will be meted out to their supporters.

4. There is a cycle to revolution (see Polybius cycle)

> History is a relay of revolutions; the torch of idealism is carried by the revolutionary group until this group becomes an establishment, and then quietly the torch is put down to wait until a new revolutionary group picks it up for the next leg of the run. Thus the revolutionary cycle goes on.

5. History is written by the victors

> There can be no such thing as a successful traitor, for if one succeeds he becomes a founding father.

6. Cover your activism with a veneer of morality

> All great leaders, including Churchill, Gandhi, Lincoln, and Jefferson, always invoked “moral principles” to cover naked self-interest in the clothing of “freedom” “equality of mankind,” “a law higher than man-made law,” and so on. This even held under circumstances of national crises when it was universally assumed that the end justified any means. All effective actions require the passport of morality.

7. Confidence is half the battle

> Anyone who is working against the Haves is always facing odds, and in many cases heavy odds. If he or she does not have that complete self-confidence (or call it ego) that he can win, then the battle is lost before it is even begun. I have seen so-called trained organizers go out to another city with an assignment of organizing a community of approximately 100,000 people, take one look and promptly wire in a resignation. To be able to look at a community of people and say to yourself, “I will organize them in so many weeks,” “I will take on the corporations, the press and anything else,” is to be a real organizer.

8. Agitate for multiple issues simultaneously

> Not only does a single- or even a dual-issue organization condemn you to a small organization, it is axiomatic that a single-issue organization won’t last. An organization needs action as an individual needs oxygen. With only one or two issues there will certainly be a lapse of action, and then comes death. Multiple issues mean constant action and life.

9. An effective way to jump start your movement is to be declared an enemy by the establishment

> The job of the organizer is to maneuver and bait the establishment so that it will publicly attack him as a “dangerous enemy.” The word “enemy” is sufficient to put the organizer on the side of the people, to identify him with the Have-Nots, but it is not enough to endow him with the special qualities that induce fear and thus give him the means to establish his own power against the establishment. Here again we find that it is power and fear that are essential to the development of faith. This need is met by the establishment’s use of the brand “dangerous,” for in that one word the establishment reveals its fear of the organizer, its fear that he represents a threat to its omnipotence. Now the organizer has his “birth certificate” and can begin.

> […]
> Today my notoriety and the hysterical instant reaction of the establishment not only validate my credentials of competency but also ensure automatic popular invitation.

10. Make your followers believe that you are the agent of change

> The organizer's job is to inseminate an invitation for himself, to agitate, introduce ideas, get people pregnant with hope and a desire for change and to identify you as the person most qualified for this purpose.

11. Poor people don't understand democracy

> Many times, contact with low-income groups does not fire one with enthusiasm for the political gospel of democracy. This disillusionment comes partly because we romanticize the poor in a way we romanticize other sectors of society, and partly because when you talk with any people you find yourselves confronted with clichés, a variety of superficial, stereotyped responses, and a general lack of information.

12. Solving one problem begets another, but don't tell your followers that > Something else that comes with experience is the knowledge that the resolution of a particular problem will bring on another problem. The organizer may know this, but he doesn't mention it; if he did he would invite, and encounter, a feeling of futility on the part of the others. "Why bother doing this if it means another problem? We fight and win and what have we won? So let's forget it."

13. Show people, in the most visceral terms, how they are being screwed

14. Stoke citizen anger and then point out a logical solution that has worked in the past to solve the problem they are facing

> Through action, persuasion, and communication the organizer makes it clear that organization will give them the power, the ability, the strength, the force to be able to do something about these particular problems.
> […]
> The lesson here is that a major job of the organizer is to instantly develop the rationale for actions which have taken place by accident or impulsive anger.

15. You can not force a negotiation with the establishment without power

16. Those with power will not cede to your demands based on goodwill alone—they must feel threatened

17. Bluff

> Power is not only what you have but what the enemy thinks you have.
>
> […]
>
> The threat is usually more terrifying than the thing itself.
>
> […]
>
> Remember the rule— the threat is often more effective than the tactic itself, but only if you are so organized that the establishment knows not only that you have the power to execute the tactic but that you definitely will. You can't do much bluffing in this game; if you're ever caught bluffing, forget about ever using threats in the future.

18. Make fun of your opponent

> Ridicule is man's most potent weapon. It is almost impossible to counterattack ridicule. Also it infuriates the opposition, who then react to your advantage.

19. Move fast without getting bogged down

> A tactic that drags on too long becomes a drag. Man can sustain militant interest in any issue for only a limited time, after which it becomes a ritualistic commitment, like going to church on Sunday mornings. New issues and crises are always developing, and one's reaction becomes, "Well, my heart bleeds for those people and I'm all for the boycott, but after all there are other important things in life"— and there it goes.

20. Have a plan for when your opponent relents

> The price of a successful attack is a constructive alternative. You cannot risk being trapped by the enemy in his sudden agreement with your demand and saying "You're right— we don't know what to do about this issue. Now you tell us."

21. Focus your attack a human or corporation, not an idea

> The other important point in the choosing of a target is that it must be a personification, not something general and abstract such as a community's segregated practices or a major corporation or City Hall. It is not possible to develop the necessary hostility against, say, City Hall, which after all is a concrete, physical, inanimate structure, or against a corporation, which has no soul or identity, or a public school administration, which again is an inanimate system.

22. Don’t be rigid

> There can be no prescriptions for particular situations because the same situation rarely recurs, any more than history repeats itself. People, pressures, and patterns of power are variables, and a particular combination exists only in a particular time—even then the variables are constantly in a state of flux.

23. Power is in constant flux

> Power is not static; it cannot be frozen and preserved like food; it must grow or die. Therefore, in order to keep power the status quo must get more. But from whom? There is just so much more than can be squeezed out of the Have-Nots—so the Haves must take it from each other.

When your fight is against a culture, it becomes difficult to identify an activist action you can take, but if Alinksy was alive, he’d recommend finding specific individuals who are engaged in the behavior that you believe is harmful. The individual is weak—attack them one at a time.

Another interesting point that Alinksy brings up is to announce your intentions beforehand, something that is the opposite of what you find in war strategy. Tell your enemy what you will do if they don’t stop and watch them plead for negotiation. As long as you can back up your threat, you may be able to affect change without even doing anything.

Even if you disagree with Alinksy’s politics, you must concede he had a powerful grasp on how to chip away at power bases. What’s incredible is that within only one generation, the status quo has been replaced by the politicians who represent those that Alinksy advocated for. They even used many of his techniques. His side won, but if his own writing is any indication, it’s not hard to remove them from the top.

Read More: “Rules For Radicals” on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Economic Warfare And You

August 1, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

I was blasting some paper at the range one day, to practice to keep my pimp hand strong, when a man struck up a conversation with me. Usually the discussions at the pistol range coalesce around politics and what weapons to buy. Well into this gentleman's rant about the Second Amendment, current denizens of Washington DC and policies of "blue" states, I noticed something. He was shooting a Kimber 45 caliber pistol. I interrupted his tirade and asked him that if he does not support the various policies of the states of New Jersey and New York, why did he purchase a product from those states. He stood there for a minute and contemplated the realization that his beliefs were inconsistent with his actions.

Economic warfare is a powerful tool. Depriving your opponents of the economic activity and money hurts them a whole lot more than strong words and stern looks. History is full of successful boycotts and informal cartels.

Some could say conducting economic warfare at the individual level is pointless. I know I get a grin every time I get the postcard in the mail from Valvoline Instant Oil change to come back to them. If exercising power through monetary means can be used at the world level to divide the globe on a regional conflict in the Ukraine, it can be definitely used at the neighborhood level. The scope and manner that these are conducted needs to be sophisticated though.

One has to research to make sure he stays within the law when conducting economic warfare. Certain election rules and organized labor laws can hinder you depending on your place and position in society. In addition, the United States federal government has made certain boycotts illegal in and of themselves. Therefore, if you are not smart enough to be able to read statutes, ordinances, and laws, you should get an attorney. It is always a good idea to stay legal.

How can you, as an individual, conduct economic warfare?

1. Don't shop at places where you don't like the people that run it
2. Don't buy products from companies that advertise with organizations that you don't like
3. Don't let anyone guilt you into buying anything
4. Spend that extra dollar that competing businesses against the opponent
5. Get your circle to do the same as you

It seems simple but many people do not put any thought into where their money goes. Then again, I have seen people keep 20 grand in a bank account and still pay off an eight percent car loan in monthly installments. Do not be one of those people. I have seen people that always complain about McDonald's screwing up their drive through order.Every time I see them, they have another story about it. The thought of going somewhere else was never crossed their mind. I assume people like these are just prey for those who are economic predators. Sometimes when I see people like this, I almost want to prey upon them myself.

There are many ways to go about the openness of economic warfare. Sometimes discretion is ideal. I noticed that when the LGBTXYZ community targeting the Chick-fil-A chain for political protest, it actually helps that chain's bottom line when the counter protests filled their restaurants with customers.

I am not advocating for it, but you could also go full Bavarian in your economic warfare. Got a real problem with the local business? You could start posting poor reviews on Google and Yelp. You could tell the health department you got sick from eating there. With the rise of YouTube, the individual has an actual forum to strike back against poor customer service. You can utilize that as well.

In conclusion, most powerful thing you have to influence people is money for the most part. You can either give it a way freely, or with proper planning make sure it has expenditure is in your best interest.

Don't Miss: Sterile Warfare Is Not As Sterile As You Think

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

Poosy Paradise Is Waiting For You

August 1, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The book, that is. Today I'm excited to release my newest book, Poosy Paradise, a memoir that details my time in Romania. (I'm posting this for people who didn't catch my blog announcement earlier.)

The Cover

(click here for big size)

The Official Book Description

> My search for poosy paradise led me to a grisly city in Eastern Romania that had a plentiful supply of beautiful girls. It's a place that no sane man would voluntarily live in had it not contained the best fruit of what the human female species can offer.
>
> After blanketing Romanian television and newspapers as the "famous American sex writer" and a "world Don Juan," I was determined to leverage the temporary fame with my existing game to experience nonstop fornication with the world's most beautiful women. The result was not exactly what I expected.
>
> In this book you'll find:
>
> - Dozens of first-hand accounts of what it's like to pursue girls in Romania
> - My latest moves and techniques for getting laid
> - Commentary on how big of a role finding poosy paradise is for the lives of modern Western men
>
> Poosy Paradise is the true story of my two month adventure in Eastern Romania, a place where I believed all my sexual dreams would come true.

The Early Reader Review

> "L'Etranger" of our times. That's what the inescapable conclusion is after reading "Poosy Paradise", a book that details Roosh's foray into Romania and his struggles with fame. Roosh takes us on a wild ride through the truths often left-unsaid, sparing neither the lively characters he encounters nor his own playboy persona during his adventures in the deliberately-unnamed Romanian city.
>
> Depending on their experiences in life, I feel that people will be either in awe or disgusted upon reading through the tremendous analytic process that deals with Roosh's skill at game, his overall strategy in selecting cities and countries, and of course his overall evaluation of the spoils he reaps there. Yet to get either all teary-eyed or angry at this book is to miss the point. The point of the book is honesty – no more, no less. Its utterly sincere core is what makes the book so interesting to read, as well as and so unusual in today's world.
>
> Dialogues might be the best part of the book simply because of the hilarious consequences that Roosh's honesty produces. When he stopped to ask a woman who was trying to give him dating advice "How many women have you had sex with?", I nearly spit out my drink. There are dozens of such entertaining conversations, both with men and women. The writing style always kept me in suspense, even when it was obvious what would happen.
>
> The book is strewn with little bits of insight that the observant reader will find > helpful, no matter his level of game. From techniques at maneuvering girls into his apartment to making “sex potions”, they are universally refreshing. I particularly enjoyed the observations about fame and how smartphones affect the nature of texting.

>
> The same honesty that makes Poosy Paradise so intriguing is also what gives the book an ultimately depressing undertone. He describes how men are struggling more and more, enduring increasing disrespect and flaking despite achieving ever higher levels of attractiveness. I was especially struck by the scene in which he reconnects with an old prospect who blatantly ignores her own date. Poor guy.
>
> Roosh’s struggle with long-lasting happiness permeates the book. When things are not going well, he is unhappy over the tiniest details. When things are going well, it’s the same. While it drives him to success, this tormented existence also seems to snuff out joy and pride.
>
> This painful combination is what ultimately makes Poosy Paradise so special – a philosophical book rather than a travel guide, game guide or memoir. Such honesty and insight about the world might be depressing (for me at least), but they are hard to find nowadays.
>
> An excellent read.

The Six Bonuses

If you purchase the ebook edition of Poosy Paradise before Sunday at midnight, you get the following six bonuses:

20 Tips To Help You Get Laid While Traveling (pdf)

It will be hard for you to fail on your trip if you follow the advice in this document. I share all the tips (some old, some new) that will help ensure your visit to any international city is sexually successful. You’ll learn…

- how long to stay in a city and which days are best for a bang mission
- whether you should focus on night game or day game
- easy openers that work in any country
- a simple routine that speeds up the sex process on girls who aren’t as slutty as American girls
- an easy move to weed out girls who aren’t serious about getting banged by you

We’re almost at the point of love tourism where if you fail to get laid within a two week period, it’s due to poor effort on your part than a lack of information or knowledge.

My Thoughts On 78 International Cities (pdf)

This 13-page document is a trip down memory lane that spans the past nine years, starting in 2005 with my trip to Venezuela and ending in 2014 with my stay in Russia. I share brief remarks on every city I've been to in 26 countries (except Spain and Italy, which were more like sightseeing trips). I hope to leave you with the least amount of doubt possible on whether the cities reviewed are worth it for you to visit or not. If you're planning any serious travel to South America or Eastern Europe, this guide will help narrow it down for you so you don't waste time with inferior cities.

A Friendly Guide To Becoming Conversational In The Russian Language (pdf)

I've been studying Russian on and off for the past couple years, but intensively for the past 7 months. I'm at the cusp of being conversational (my Russian teacher says I'm at level B1). This is a decent accomplishment considering how hard the language is. In this document, I share the best resources and tips to get you up to speed so that you can meet women using the Russian language. I also include the order at which you should begin to tackle the language so you don't frustrate yourself and quit prematurely.

5 Things You Should Know About Russia

In this 9-minute private Youtube video, I give you a no-bullshit summary of my recent two-month adventure in Russia. You'll learn…

- the primary aesthetic and personality differences between Russian girls and Ukrainian girl (and how that will affect your game)
- the biggest obstacle to staying in Russia long term
- how you must prepare yourself for "face control"
- additional tips on how to make your Russia trip successful

I'll probably share some of this information on the blog eventually, but you get to take advantage of my analysis before everyone else.

10 City Datasheet Package

Late last year I sold a package of ten datasheets on the following cities:

- Montreal
- Toronto
- Chisinau (Moldova)
- Lublin (Poland)
- Warsaw
- Bucharest (Romania)
- Cluj (Romania)
- Iasi (Romania)
- Kiev
- Odessa (Ukraine)

Each datasheet contains…

- summaries on how to run game in each city along with descriptions on the appearance and vibe of the local talent
- 107 total reviews for day and night venues that give you the best advice for meeting women
- official web links for most day and night venues so you can check out a spot beforehand by viewing photos and schedules
- straight talk on if the city will be worth it for you or not
- 34 total pages (14,736 words) of analysis

Though I published these PDFs last year, the package still contains tons of fresh tips and venue advice.

28% discount off the regular price

You get all of the above—232 total pages of travel stories, advice, data, and strategy for… $5. After Sunday, the bonuses will disappear forever and the price of the book alone will rise to $6.99. These specials are only available this weekend, no exceptions!

Get Poosy Paradise + Bonuses

Click one of the following links to continue:

- Learn more details about what's inside the book
- Order paperback or Kindle copy from Amazon
- Order your ebook copy (pdf, mobi, and epub) for instant download

If you buy Poosy Paradise from Amazon, forward your receipt to to get your bonuses. Receipt must be dated before Monday, August 4.

Poosy Paradise is my fourth memoir. You can clearly see my development but also the changing struggles from my first memoir, A Dead Bat In Paraguay. If you're new to my work, I recommend reading all my memoirs in the order I published them by grabbing the below package for $14.97. The download package contains pdf, mobi, and epub formats for each book, along with the bonuses.

Click here to order the Quadruple Memoir Combo

I started writing my first book, Bang, back in 2006. In the past eight years, I've written 17 books that contain 1,868 pages and 680,149 words. I've also produced both the Bang and Day Bang audiobooks with the help of professional voice actors. In this godzilla combo special, get all 17 books, the two audiobooks in mp3 format (11 hours and 45 minutes total length), and the Poosy Paradise bonuses for only $35. The price will go up after Sunday.

Click here to order the My Life's Work Combo (555 megabyte download)

I'll be online all weekend so email me if you have a question or a problem with downloading.

Like always, I thank you for your support, and I hope that my work continues to give you value. I will keep documenting my life's journey for you, both the good and the bad.

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

35 Signs The Girl You're Dating Is A Whore

August 2, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> "As blushing will sometimes make a whore pass for a virtuous woman, so modesty may make a fool seem a man of sense."
>
> -Jonathan Swift (1667-1745)

Most men seek to escape the Matrix of the Anglosphere to find a 'good' woman. Let's assume you travel to a foreign country full of beautiful women, and you do happen to find your 'unicorn'. There is still the danger of being conned by your beautiful foreign girlfriend who could be a social prostitute (part-time prostitute) or have a history of indulging in it. There are certain signs that must be kept in mind to identify such women.

Most social prostitutes are casual about prostitution, but what must be understood is that a woman who can separate sex from love and commitment isn't really the type you'd be looking for, especially when it comes to seeking loyalty within a relationship. Her loyalties are basically reserved for the highest bidder; and if you fail to bid consistently, you'll lose her in the end.

Even women who haven't prostituted themselves can exhibit these traits below. Technically they may not be prostitutes, but they still have a prostitute's mindset. Essentially, they prostitute themselves to their husbands, boyfriends or lovers for a period of time, as long as these men can afford them. This has led to the coinage of the term 'legalized prostitution' to such relationships where men are essentially indirectly paying for sex.

Most of the time, women indulge in prostitution out of a need for financial resources, but in today's world, a love of authority and fame, or even the simple need to be maintained by men in return for sex, often propels women into this path voluntarily. So here are the signs you must observe for:

1. She's obsessed about money and excessively materialistic.

The classic whore's mindset: she talks money, thinks money, eats money, sleeps money. This woman can easily be seduced with offers of money, and sometimes even asks for it. She never refuses offers of cash gifts. Money will open her legs and give her gina tingles faster than game.

2. She rates men on their income, social status and influence (disregarding character), and has guy friends who are all above her in status. She often compares her friends' "successful" boyfriends to you.

The guy 'friends' might as well be her customers. If she idolizes rich and 'successful' men of questionable character, it shows where her priorities lie. A little attention from such men is enough for her to pull down her panties for them.

3. She berates and criticizes women who date men below them in social and economic status.

She thinks: Stupid and foolish bitches, who fall in love and date cheap customers. Couldn't they get snag richer clients?

4. She immediately warms up to you and emits coy sexual vibes, once she learns of your well-to-do background. Sometimes, she downright pursues you.

Whores are the epitome of female financial hypergamy.

5. She constantly reminds you of the things that she's done for you.

Especially of the sex she provided for you. What else can she do for you except provide her 'special' orifices for you on demand? You should be grateful for the skilled services she provided for you, she's saying, since she's done a better job than what her competitors would've given you.

6. Her affection gradually or suddenly changes for you when you're having financial or social difficulties, or after learning of your humble financial health.

Why would she want to waste time with a 'financial loser' who can't support her?

> "Whores don't live in company of poor men, citizens never support a weak company and birds don't build nests on a tree that doesn't bear fruits."
>
> – Kautilya , 370 BC-283 BC

7. She has a poor or average income, but she manages to afford a comparatively affluent lifestyle without family support.

Who pays for it? Is she surviving on a financial loan?

8. She has (or had) a debt problem, but she's paying (or paid) it off remarkably fast.

This applies especially student loans or expensive degrees. Same question: Who pays for it, and how?

9. She feels uncomfortable displaying affection in public, even though she gives out a modern woman vibe.

Unless she comes from a culture which is religious, sexually conservative, or repressed, most modern woman in relationships usually have no problem with light petting or affection from their men in public. If she's already been intimate with you before, she ironically dresses sexily or she comes from a sexualized cultural background, this post-sex public self-consciousness becomes an even greater red flag. If she dislikes your hand on her thigh or a casual brush on her ass when in public, it is a sign of emotional disconnection from you. Or it could be a sign that you're below her, and just a customer she'd only like to be intimate with in private.

10. You happen to find stuff like condoms, vaginal douche, BDSM gear and sex toys in her handbag which she carries in public. Or if you move in with her, you happen to find stuff like wigs and whore outfits in her wardrobe.

Who carries or keeps stuff like that? Only experienced professionals. Wigs are to camouflage her identity on her 'calls'.

11. She is known by multiple names among people. Her guy friends call her with different names, or she asks you to address her by a name which is not her real name. Also: she has multiple cell numbers.

This is a big red flag. If your Monika is called as Marina by some other guy, it means that's one of those names is her whore alias. She doesn't want to be known by her real name to protect her identity. Multiple cell numbers are obvious: one is for personal or casual use, the other one is for official or 'work' (prostitution) use.

12. She tends to have jobs working late nights.

Such jobs are often 'whore-creating' jobs. More so if these jobs are in environments when around men who are often willing to spend money at nights to get easy sex. Most women (especially poor girls) find it an easy way to make side money.

13. She's worked in the bar, stripper, promotions, glamor and entertainment, PR, HR, PA, hospitality, airline and modeling industry. Or she has visited or hails from the sex industry hotspots of the world.

Though not all women (NAWALT, lol) who work in these industries are like that, the casting couch exists a lot in these industries. Stereotypes are often derived from some reality. Women in these industries and areas have more access to rich and influential men who'd be willing to pay for booty. Don't exonerate her easily before doing a thorough background check on her work.

14. She usually doesn't answer your messages or calls if you message or call her at nights even though she is an night owl or has an active nightlife.

She tells you later that she was either 'working' or 'busy', or she messages you a text reply without answering your call. If she says she was deep asleep at say 10 or 11 pm when she usually hangs out late, you're probably being bullshitted.

15. She tends to be usually 'busy' within the week without explaining what 'busy' is.

'Busy' is the code word for booked or reserved, a term commonly used by prostitutes. A normal girl will rather tell you directly what she's doing to postpone plans, instead of using the ambiguous, business-like 'busy'.

16. She tends to "schedule" sex once you've become intimate.

A typical trait of prostitutes. You'll get sex at 'so and so' time ideally for 'so and so' duration with 'so and so' service at 'so and so' place.

17. She boasts and prides herself of her sexual skills and how men are attracted to her, but she's thin-skinned at personal criticism and jealous of beautiful women.

The whore's attention whoring. What else is she good at, except sex and attracting customers? Whores are also thin-skinned at criticism because of low self esteem, not to mention of envy against younger and more beautiful women whom they'd try to demean.

18. She speaks out in favor of prostitution and admires famous prostitutes of lore.

Her role models and her sympathies often lie with the ideology and lifestyle she's affiliated with. She doesn't look down on her prostitutes or women who indulge in it.

19. She has very 'successful' friends who are quite old for her age group.

These could be her sponsors (often sexual clients.)

20. She's had a surprisingly quick promotion and salary hike in a short period, or her new boss is someone she met in her previous workplace.

She's being (or been) the boss's bitch.

21. Her social circle includes women who are actual whores.

Birds of the same feather flock together. And if the alpha girl in her clique is a whore, you can safely deduce that your girl has also dabbled in that as well.

22. She avoids contacting her family, especially the males. The men in her family disrespect her.

This is a sign her parents know and disapprove of her whoring, and have disowned her.

23. She's traveled to short vacations with some of her guy 'friends' even though she couldn't afford it.

She was basically an out call escort for the duration of the trips or in more dignified terms, 'a travel companion'.

24. She frequently uses the word bitch, slut and whore to describe her friends or women she doesn't like.

What she does in her life relives in her mind. She's simply projecting onto others what she's done and been called before by others.

25. She lets you act out all your wildest sexual fantasies with her during your first few sexual encounters with her (screwing her ass and shooting your load in her mouth, golden showers, etc).

She does this to impress and reserve you as a long term customer. The first impressions (sexual experiences) are the lasting impressions. Sex then goes rapidly downhill, unless you 'give her' something in return to reenact those first encounters. No matter how lousy the sex will get later, she knows you'll always reminisce those exhilarating first times with her, and keep going back to her to relive those 'memorable' encounters.

26. Sex, frequent at first, gradually becomes a reluctant transactional chore she performs for you after much cajoling from you, or after only you've done something for her first (usually something of monetary value).

She rarely initiates sex, and rewards you with great sex (anal and all kinky acts – either voluntarily or by your request) only after you've gifted or done something 'exceptional' for her.

Pay for pleasure please! The sex is your transaction reward. (in her mind)

27. Her sarcasm includes dick size and ejaculation time, which she uses to pick on men.

It's typical, uncouth prostitute or slut communication jargon to shame men.

28. She has dated way older "successful" men than her in the past—mostly from social networking sites or workplace.

“Successful” translates into rich here. These men are often her past clients. Social networking sites, being used for prostitution, is an old story.

29. She spends a lot on trying to look younger than her age, and has a morbid fear of growing old.

> “Old age is a woman’s hell”
>
> – Ninon de Lenclos (1620-1705)

Their appearance is their greatest (and often only) ‘virtue’, apart from sexual skills.

30. She has a materialistic, divorced or promiscuous mother who has male issues, to whom she’s very close. Whores raise whores.

Women always resemble their mothers in the end, especially when it comes to character. And a whore mother or a mother who shares a gold digging mindset will propel and exonerate her daughter’s path into whoredom. Her exoneration will be enough justification for her daughter to whore herself with impunity. A separated woman who hates men will also use her daughter to financially exploit men to exact revenge on the male gender.

31. She has a problem trusting you, even if you have proven yourself over and over again to her. She has emotional problems while forming attachments.

This usually happens if she’s beginning to have feelings for you, or also could be how her mother has indoctrinated her against men. Her trust issues are a projection of her revulsion for men cheating on their women who’ve paid to fuck her. She fears that you’d do the same to her with another woman. She wants to attach to you, but memories of her customers prevent her. Or her trust issues are simply a projection of her guilt or low self-esteem issues onto you. A cunning experienced prostitute will however pretend to have trust issues so that you do more for her, to simply indulge her attention whoring.

32. She’s a single mother, she comes from a broken family, she’s an orphan, she’s the eldest or only child in her family , or she’s the only one among her siblings working to support her large family and her siblings’ education.

More so if she’s not from the Anglo sphere. Highly likely as she needs money to support herself and her family. Desperate circumstances call for desperate measures (prostitution).

33. She talks highly of a particular country and has a lot of information about it without actually living there.

This is more accurate if she’s poor. Her knowledge comes from the knowledge imparted to her from her customer who’s been there, or hails from there.

34. She constantly brings up requests for things, so as to prove your ‘love’ for her.

Most of the time, these requests are aptly timed by her: after she’s provided mind-blowing sex for you and you’re lying in bed with her, or you’re feeling horny and in romantic mood wanting to plough her. At both times, you’re often at your logical weakest.

35. She despises poverty, and more so of men who have low paying jobs.

What a loser! He can't afford me! (in her mind)

Her hatred of poverty reminds her of her own desperate circumstances at one time. Even though women are hypergamous are nature, most women don't despise poor men as long as he is working to earn something. Prostitutes however see no 'customer' potential in such men.

Conclusion

Your girl may not be a prostitute by deed, but she could still be a prostitute by mind. If you aren't married yet, these signs can help you determine if your current squeeze had a prostitute's history, or has a prostitute's mind, which could be expensive for you if you choose to commit to her. You can't turn a whore into a housewife.

Read More: 24 Signs She's A Slut

Oscar Zach

Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Children Are Being Brainwashed Into Accepting Fat Acceptance

August 2, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

We at Return Of Kings do not like fatties. That much is clear. However, America has continued to evolved into a place where being an obese land whale is more and more normal, and more and more socially unacceptable to not be attracted to obesity.

Even if children are not of age to realize the disgust of obesity, women now use their children as hamster fuel to justify their poor health habits.

> Flipping through the pictures on my phone, I see it.
>
> My first reaction is shock.
>
>
>
> Who took this hideous picture of me?!

> Self-loathing and disgust swell up and threaten to bring me to tears.
>
> Just as I am about to hit delete, my boy walks in the room.
>
> “Do you know anything about this picture?” I ask him.
>
> I turn the screen so he can see it. He smiles huge.
>
> “I took that of you in Tahoe,” he says. “You looked so beautiful laying there. I couldn’t help it, mom.”

For further proof of the hamster fuel, you need look no further than her author bio:

> Bridgette White is a stay-at-home mother of two who lives in Sacramento with her husband and two guinea pigs. She is the author of BridgetteTales.com, a blog about depression, self-discovery and parenting. Bridgette worked at the Sacramento Bee for 7 years and was featured as part of the inaugural Sacramento cast of Listen To Your Mother.

Even this delusional woman is aware of her lack of attractive features, and that her sexual marketplace value is low. Despite her hamster-ific rantings, it is clear that she feels unattractive. As much as this article goes on to tell how her kids changed her self-image, we here are all “aware enough” to realize that she is full of shit:

> Right now I’m the heaviest I’ve been in 10 years. Yet…
>
> I have not let my weight stop me this time. I am wearing tank tops, sundresses and bathing suits in public. I’m running around playing with my kids this summer and I sometimes even feel attractive.
>
> Yes. You heard me.
>
> “I feel pretty. Oh so pretty. I feel pretty, and witty and bright.”

People whom are happy generally don’t feel the need to write articles about how happy they are. Neither do rich men need to tell you they are rich.

> Well… not exactly. But something like that.
>
> Is it because I’m getting older? Is it that I have more to worry about than just how I look? Or maybe it’s because my kids look at me with such adoring eyes.
>
> Really, it doesn’t matter.
>
> I don’t hate my body anymore.

Which is why she wrote an entire article about how she doesn’t hate it.

> That’s huge for me to admit and hard to even wrap my mind around.
>
> I’m not giving up on exercising and getting healthy. Those are things I will continue to strive for because I want to be around awhile.

It’s just on hold for now, because it’s far more important to write articles about fat acceptance than to prioritize your health and get to the gym.

> Right now though, I just want to love my body where it is. I want it to be OK to see myself the way my kids do.
>
> Thank you, kids.

But, putting this all aside, there is a much bigger issue to take from this article.

Kids Have Been Brainwashed

Now, I love my mother dearly, and always will. If she was an obese land whale, I wouldn't go and say that flat to her face. Especially if I was a young child (and it's fair to assume her children are reasonably young based off of the article context).

However, the way her children phrased this sends a signal loud and clear – fat, obese, and with flappy arms is the new normal, even considered "beautiful". This is in the minds that are the least polluted of anyone – young children. Even they have been brainwashed with the message of fat acceptance, whether it be plus-sized models on television or being shamed for being repulsed by obesity.

Where To From Here?

There has to be an end somewhere in sight, right? Much how like the stock market crashes and eventually recovers, you would think that eventually, American society would hit rock bottom in regards to obesity. Considering the current crop of attractive women (and men) in this country, it would be logical to assume that rock bottom point is reasonably near.

Yet, I don't think we have reached that point.

With kids becoming more fat accepting, will it suddenly become acceptable for kids themselves to be fat? When I was 14, I stood 5'8″ and weighed about 220 pounds. Kids made fun of me – a lot. It was what drove me to drop over 80 pounds in ten months. While I certainly was bullied, I realize now that I was shamed.

That shame did me a lot of good, otherwise I'd still be playing Warcraft, munching on Doritos and sucking down cans of Mountain Dew Code Red. The shaming convinced me to not continue down the path of being a disgusting pig.

Kids who tell their mothers that they are gorgeous while overweight will tell other kids that, too. Fat will become the new normal (though perhaps it already is). Even virginal minds of children, biologically programmed to be repulsed by cellulite and a lack of a gap between the thighs, are beginning to cherish fat acceptance. If rock bottom ever comes, it will be when all children encourage each other in their fat ways, rather than shaming as they are (currently) naturally inclined to do.

By the way, someone should call the Tahoe Police Department.

There is a whale who washed up on the beach.

Read More: The Horrifying Merger Of Feminism And Fat Acceptance

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

The 15 Best Countries To Teach English

August 3, 2014 | by jim soler | Link | Original Link

Teaching English abroad continues to remain a viable option for native English speakers who want to see the world and get paid to do so. With an ever changing global economy, there are plenty countries where one can teach. While it may be possible to teach English in rural areas without a degree, at least a bachelor's degree in any subject and being a native English speaker are the requirements to teach English abroad, though many positions now require at TESOL, TEFL or CELTA certificate.

A quick google search will reveal several programs that offer certificates in any three of these. Be wary of strictly online certification courses. A typical course in TESOL, TEFL or CELTA takes between two to four months to complete and expect to pay between $1000 to $2500. There are heaps of ESL (English as a second language) job boards with job listings throughout the world, which will specify the exact requirements. While it may not be absolutely necessary to have a certificate in some countries, it may be useful to get one anyway if you have zero teaching experience.

People often ask me where the best places are to teach English. This is a difficult question to answer because it depends on how you define 'the best place' and who you ask. Based on my several years of teaching experience and traveling, I made a list of the best 15 places to teach. Although my choices are subjective, I have used four qualitative measures to come up with this list: SALARY + ADVENTURE + SECURITY + AVAILABILITY.

By availability, I mean the amount of jobs available to teach English in a particular country. I am sure a lot of Americans would love to teach in places, such as France but it is quite difficult to find a job teaching ESL in Western Europe. So if your idea of traveling and adventure is limited to the security of Western Europe, you probably are not the right candidate to teach English abroad. By adventure, I mean how fun it would be to teach in a particular country. Salary and security is self-explanatory.

1. Japan

This is probably a biased pick on my part since I lived in Japan for four years. However, this place is awesome in so many ways. In fact, I cannot recall meeting one person who either lived or visited Japan that had anything bad to say about it. Unfortunately, jobs are not as abundant like they once were, but there still are jobs, opportunities and endless adventure in this majestic land that remains somewhat sheltered from the rest of the world. I taught in both Sapporo in the far north and in Okinawa, which is in the far south.

2. South Korea

South Korea is where Japan was 15 years ago, which means there are plenty of well paying jobs teaching English in a strong economy. South Korea is booming in all ways at the moment and there are a great number of English teaching jobs to be had. Most of which offer free housing, paid airfare and the chance to save between $10,000 to$25,000 thousand in one year. There have been reports of the top teachers in South Korea making 5 or 6 thousand dollars a month. Like Japan, South Korea is also an exotic land where one can sing karaoke into the wee hours of the night and walk home with little threat of danger.

3. Colombia

Unfortunately, stereotypes of Colombia still persists. However, the reality is that Colombia has a burgeoning economy and the days of Pablo Escobar are long over. While it certainly isn't safe like Japan or South Korea, a little common sense should keep the foreigner out of harm's way. I've spent four months in South America and everyone I met from Colombia was warm, friendly and eager to invite me to their country. If you are looking for adventure and nightlife, this is sure to be a great place. There are plenty of teaching jobs throughout the country and some that pay decent for South American standards.

4. China

China could easily be number one for several reasons. Most importantly, this is not only a land with an endless amount of English teaching jobs, but one of economic opportunity. Anyone that is interested in using teaching English as a second language as a springboard to invest in foreign countries should consider China. The downsides to China are country size, pollution, and the lack of democracy. However, I have talked to several teachers and all of them reported that teaching English in China was a great experience.

5. Taiwan

This is a small country that is often overlooked for teaching English. Like Japan, Taiwan has been a great place to teach for many years. I have spoken with several instructors who taught there and they all said great things about teaching English in Taiwan. The people are super friendly, food is inexpensive, rent is cheap and English teaching salaries are just below Japan and South Korea. Because its a small island, one can easily escape the chaos of Taipei and relax on the tropical beaches in the south.

6. Vietnam

Vietnam could arguably be in the top three. This place has all the factors to make it a great destination for teaching English. Geographically speaking, Thailand and Cambodia are just a stone's throw away. The real draw for Vietnam is the cost of living. A dollar can still get you a beer or a cheap plate of food. Teachers are reportedly making $1200 to $2800 a month. You are not going to save money in Vietnam like you could in South Korea, but you can definitely save money, live super cheap and have all the adventures that Southeast Asia can offer. I've talked to several teachers who were in Vietnam and each report indicates that plenty of English teaching jobs and other opportunities exist there.

7. Chile

I once spent two weeks traveling through this geographically elongated and beautiful country. I decided at the time that if I ever need to hide out the rest of my life, I am going straight to Chile. From talking to English teachers while I was there, I got the impression that Chile is a great place for teaching English. There are a fair amount of jobs, a stable economy and the pay is good for South American standards. As an added plus, the people are wonderful and the Andes are nothing less than the work of god. Chile is also the safest country in South America after Uruguay.

8. United Arab Emirates

The UAE makes the top ten simply because the pay is so good. I have heard reports of people making upwards of $60,000 a year teaching English in Dubai. Of course, this is in the right situation. It is also an ultra-modern place and there are plenty of interesting places to travel close by. Most of the teachers I've spoken with have said good things about the UAE, particularly the money aspect.

9. Saudi Arabia

Like Dubai, the money factor is the main reason for teaching English in Saudi Arabia. Teachers in the Kingdom can expect to make between $40,000 to $100,000 dollars per year. Of course, there is the whole prohibition of alcohol and eating pork factor. This can also be a tough place to live if you are a Western woman. Sorry, feminism hasn't hit the Saudi mainstream yet. However, most people teaching in Saudi Arabia just hop across the border on the weekend to a magical land called 'Bahrain', which is kind of the Las Vegas and Thailand of the Middle East. Despite the image of Saudi Arabia in the minds of most, Saudis are extremely friendly people, kind and hospitable.

10. Ecuador

I recently spent a month in Ecuador and I cannot say enough good things about this country. The people are wonderful, the food is cheap and delicious and the abundant nature is breathtaking. I had tears in my eyes when I departed from the airport. Oh and there are quite a few teaching jobs throughout the country. The pay is not great, but its enough to save a few hundred dollars a month since the cost of living is cheap.

11. Thailand

I spent a month in Thailand a few years ago and this place is f##king awesome. Pardon my vulgar language, but I don't know how else to describe it. In fact, Thailand is such a cool place that it actually ranks lower in my book since I would be dead within three years of constant partying and life-threatening trips through the jungles of the north. With that being said, there remains plenty of jobs for teaching English in Thailand and one can land a great apartment for about 200 dollars a month. Don't forget about the mouth watering, yet dirt-cheap food and wonderful people that populate the happiest place on earth.

12. Brazil

In an ideal world, Brazil would be in the top three. There are plenty of opportunities for teaching English in Brazil and lets not forget about its booming economy, which is the largest in South America. However, all the reports I've heard is that it can be quite difficult to obtain a working visa. For some reason, the Brazilian government is fixated on the idea that actual Brazilians should be teaching other Brazilians English. When this changes, expect Brazil to become a hotspot for teaching English. Lets not forget about the ultra-friendly people, great food and wonderful beaches.

13. Turkey

Turkey has become somewhat of a hotspot for teaching English in recent years. A growing economy and commitment to befriend the West has resulted in plenty of jobs teaching English. From reports I have heard, the pay for teaching English in Turkey is decent and the cost of living is relatively inexpensive. This also has to be a great place for culture and history. Please note that due to recent changes in immigration policy, teachers now have to secure a teaching contract while in their home country. It used to be much easier to fly in on a tourist visa and change the status to a work visa.

14. Costa Rica

Who wouldn't want to teach in a tropical paradise? If you love the beach, surfing and breathtaking nature,then Costa Rica is probably a worthy destination. Since the economy was opened up some years ago, Costa Ricans have been eager to learn English in the the hopes of securing a well-paying job. While many dream of flying into Costa Rica and finding a job in a town near the beach, this unfortunately is not the reality of teaching there. Most jobs teaching English in Costa Rica are located in San Jose. Fortunately, it is a small enough country that one could easily escape the hustle and bustle of San Jose for a weekend chilling out on the beach.

15. Argentina

This is a bit of a biased pick on my part since I will always 'cry a little bit for Argentina' after once spending three months there. Although there are a good amount of English teaching Jobs in Argentina, the pay and hours kind of suck. However, teaching English in Argentina is about the adventure. This place might have a sluggish and dysfunctional economy, but the people are never short on passion, creativity and will protest anything at the drop of a hat.

You can click on any of the links above to get more information about teaching in each individual country. I am sure that I left some deserving destinations off of my list. If you feel so, please do not hesitate to comment and add any great places for teaching English abroad.

This post was originally published on Jimmy ESL.

Read More: How Teaching English In China Can Improve Your Game

---

jim soler
Jim is a traveler and freelance writer that has lived in many countries and currently is traveling the world. He enjoys interacting with different cultures and stirring up interesting conversations.

Words Are Empty And Irrelevant

August 3, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

“It’s all good,” says your friend, looking down and gritting his teeth.

“I don’t do THAT on the first date,” says the cute blonde holding your hand, smiling, and following your every lead.

“We really enjoy having you here as an employee,” mutters your boss, as he completes the next round of layoffs.

Actions speak louder than words. It’s a saying that we’re all familiar with, yet we constantly struggle to internalize. Take the above examples, for instance. Your friend is clearly not over whatever beef you started, but you’ll likely treat him like it’s all good, because he said it was. Then you’ll be confused when he remains cold towards you for the next few weeks. “I thought we were good?”

Or your date. She’s clearly into you and down for whatever, yet you heed her warning that she doesn’t usually kiss, go home with, or whatever else on the first date. So you wish her goodnight. Now when you hit her up for a second date, you’re perplexed that she doesn’t respond. She wanted more, but you listened to her words and not her actions like a beta bitch, and now the sexual tension has dispersed.

Or the last frame, for example. Your boss has been giving your warm greetings for the past month. Yet he’s laying people off left and right. And your workload has decreased to nothing. But your still shocked when he fires you. Again, actions speak louder than words.

And you do it, too. I know I do. I catch myself lying through my teeth more often than I’d like to admit. Whether it's simply stating that I'm doing "great" when my day is shit or telling someone that not to worry about something that's actually really bothering me. It's natural. We project random thoughts, ideas, and questions out of our mouth that have no real bearing on how we're actually feeling about something. Some of us more than others

The typical example of this phenomenon is the politician who gets elected based on a myriad of views and promises that, as soon as he enters office, moves forward with legislation in direct opposition to what he vocalized beforehand. His actions didn't match his words. This is on a bigger scale than your friend, the girl, or your boss, sure, but it's the same principle.

The Implications

The implications of this principle are twofold. First, base your perception of others on how they act non-verbally. How do they carry themselves? What behaviors do they often engage in? Try and listen to their actions primarily, and their words only as a secondary measure. The challenge is of course when dealing with people on via the phone and texting. In this case you must be even more perceptive, and act on whatever information you do have.

The second implication strikes closer to home. Because of our human tendency to inaccurately verbalize, we must be careful with how we express ourselves… to ourselves. What I mean by this is that we often "overthink" things. Rather than trusting our gut, we engage in a lengthy inner dialogue in attempt to reach a "deeper" or "truer" conclusion. It could also be when reflecting on a series of events. It could be when planning something. I think it most often afflicts us, however, when facing a decision. Rather than trying to "talk" our way to a conclusion with words, it tends to be better to trust our gut feeling, our initial instinct.

This is a very shallow exploration of a deep issue that could be analyzed in a far more lengthy manner. But that would take more "words". For now, just use this as a reminder to judge people based on their actions, and also to trust your gut.

Like this post? Check out my new book Dominate for a strategy to live a fearless life and create rapid momentum towards your goals.

Read More: The Reason Most Men Are Impotent And Depressed

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Did You Get Poosy Yet?

August 3, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I know you're getting tired of Poosy Paradise promotions, so this will be the last post about it. I just want to remind you that you have until midnight tonight to grab the poosy package before the bonuses disappear. If you buy after midnight, I can't help you in getting the juicy bonus offerings.

If you order today, you receive the following for $5:

- Poosy Paradise, my new memoir
- 20 Tips To Help You Get Laid While Traveling (pdf)
- My Thoughts On 78 International Cities (pdf)
- A Friendly Guide To Becoming Conversational In The Russian Language (pdf)
- 5 Things You Should Know About Russia (private video)
- 10 City Datasheet Package (pdfs)
- 28% discount off the regular price

Choose one of the following options to continue:

- Learn more details about what's inside the book
- Order paperback or Kindle copy from Amazon
- Order your ebook copy (pdf, mobi, and epub) for instant download

If you buy Poosy Paradise from Amazon, forward your receipt to to get your bonuses. Receipt must be dated before Monday, August 4.

I'm also doing two combo specials this weekend that include the bonuses. The first one is a collection of all my memoirs for $14.97…

Click here to order the Quadruple Memoir Combo

The next combo includes literally everything: all 17 books of my books, the Bang and Day Bang audiobooks in mp3 format (11 hours and 45 minutes total length), and the Poosy Paradise bonuses. This combo is priced at $35. The price will go up after Sunday.

Click here to order the My Life's Work Combo (555 megabyte download)

Email me if you need support.

So that wraps up this book launch. If you've started reading Poosy Paradise, send me your comments and let me know what you think. Thanks to everyone who bought my book.

A version of this post was posted earlier on my personal blog.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Hypocrisy Prevents True Gender Equality

August 4, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The concept of "gender equality" is quite well regarded in our society today. The idea that men and women are fundamentally equal in capability and, therefore, deserving of equal treatment is mainstream, and essentially taken for granted in our culture. To go against this idea is to wade into the realm of the politically incorrect and invite severe consequences in the process.

Sports pundit Stephen A. Smith, a long time fixture at ESPN, has recently come face to face with this reality. Ray Rice, an American football running back currently contracted to the Baltimore Ravens of the National Football League, recently received a two game suspension from the league. Why?

> Ray Rice stepped up to the microphone at a Ravens press conference Thursday morning. He talked about his two-game suspension– and publicly apologized to his wife.
>
> "My actions were inexcusable. My actions are something I have to live with the rest of my life," he said.
>
> Suspended by the NFL for the first two games of the season, the running back has been quiet during camp. But his critics nationwide have been quite vocal about what many feel was a lenient punishment after he was indicted for physically assaulting his then fiancee.
>
> Infamous TMZ Sports video shows Rice dragging his now-wife, Janay Palmer, from an elevator at a casino in Atlantic City in February after prosecutors say he > punched her.

>
> A judge put Rice in a first-time offender program, meaning no jail time and a clean record. But NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell, who met with Rice and his wife, says the assault warranted suspension.
>
> “We simply cannot tolerate conduct that endangers others… This is particularly true with respect to domestic violence and other forms of violence against women,” said Goodell in a letter to Rice.
>
> Rice’s conduct will cost him a two-game suspension and half a million dollars.

That Ray Rice assaulted his girlfriend is not really in question. What is notable, however, is the action that preceded the assault: Rice’s girlfriend actually was the first to initiate physical contact, assaulting Rice and provoking a response. Both were initially charged with assault; though Rice dropped the charges against his girlfriend and she will face no sanction, Rice will be punished for his response.

> On Feb. 15, at around 2:50 a.m., Rice and Palmer got into a fight in an elevator in Atlantic City’s Revel Casino. Security called police, who rolled back the surveillance tape and saw that the couple had “struck each other with their hands.” Shortly thereafter, both were arrested and charged with simple assault, suggesting that the cops believed them to be equally responsible. The two refused medical attention, according to the Baltimore Sun, and neither reported any injuries. The Sun also spoke with Rice’s attorney, Andrew Alperstein, who said the fight was a “very minor physical altercation” and “little more than a misunderstanding.” Early word around the Revel indicated otherwise, though at this point no one in any official capacity was reporting that Palmer had been > knocked unconscious. The two were released and allowed to leave together, according to the Ravens' vice president of public and community relations, Kevin Byrne.

Stephen A. Smith had something to say about this:

This quickly landed Smith in politically incorrect no-man's land, forcing him to make an almost immediate apology.

Is it not prudent, however, to consider the implications of the fact that an apology has been deemed necessary in the first place?

If the concept of gender equality is to be taken at face value, then the actions Rice took in this case do not seem to warrant the consequences he now faces. He was faced with a physical assault and he responded in kind, producing a physical assault on his attacker. If the two are deemed to actually be equal, then it must be accepted that Rice does not deserve harsher sanction for his actions than his girlfriend in this case. They are equal, and equal actions warrant equal responses.

Many will respond to the above by claiming that there is a fundamental inequality here: Rice is a man, and a very strong one at that. Because of the size and strength differential between men and women, some will argue that a response in kind by a man to an instance of physical assault by a woman is not actually equal or justified. Comments trying to emphasize this point usually read something like this:

> Men can seriously hurt women. It doesn't matter if she deserved it. Most women cannot hurt a man but a man can seriously hurt most women.

This line of reasoning essentially privileges the physical differences between men and women above all else, and claims that said differences warrant a double standard here: larger, stronger men should not be able to hit women even when assaulted, since smaller women are physically less capable than they are. It is more wrong for a man to assault a woman than vice-versa.

Such an argument doesn't seem entirely irrational at first glance. It is true that men are generally much stronger than women, and it is true that in most instances they are capable of physically hurting her more than she can hurt him. The argument begins to fall apart when you start considering its implications: should a larger and/or stronger male be prohibited from physically retaliating against a weaker and/or smaller male attacker? Those who use this logic to defend women like Rice's girlfriend in this case do risk the potential for a slippery slope.

If we are to accept the use of fundamental differences in the physical capabilities and composition of male and female bodies in the creation of one double standard (in this case, the double standard relating to a man's ability to defend himself from the an assault by a woman), then we necessarily open the door to the use of said distinctions in the creation of other double standards. If it is alright to assume that obvious physical distinctions between men and women allow for women to be given more leeway in one regard (assault), what is to stop us from also assuming that said distinctions allow for men to be given privileges in other regards (e.g., vast over-representation in certain high-paying fields that privilege their physical advantages and exacerbate the persistence of the gender pay gap)?

Is the fact that male sports consistently outdraw their female counterparts by a vast degree to be accepted on the basis of the fact that men are simply more naturally athletic? Should we just accept that, no matter how hard we attempt to promote them and no matter how committed we are to the idea that they are worth as much as their male counterparts, female athletes will never draw the attention and financing of their male counterparts? Should we allow such knowledge to limit enforcement of initiatives like Title IX and the promotion of women's athletics? Physical differences can be used to justify this double standard, just as they have been in the case of Ray Rice and many others.

And what of Science, Technology, Engineering and Math (STEM)? Credible studies exist that indicate a natural male advantage with regard to hard technical/mathematical study. Should we allow such studies to limit our enthusiasm for promoting gender equality in STEM fields?

If we let the use of physical distinctions between the sexes inform and justify double standards privileging one sex over the other in this instance, then we necessarily condone the use of said distinctions to justify double standards in many other instances. Are those who stand for "gender equality" and the defense of Rice's girlfriend despite her own clear guilt in this instance (she also assaulted him) willing to accept this reality?

Hopefully they are, because there is not much of a compromise that I can see here. If we are truly committed to the notion of gender equality and the idea that natural distinctions between the sexes should not be used to privilege one or the other in any way, then we must apply it in all respects: equal actions must invite equal consequences. We would need to take the fact that Ray Rice's girlfriend physically assaulted him just as seriously (no more, no less) as we are currently taking the fact that Ray Rice responded in kind. Neither would be considered more severe than the other, and both genders would have equal responsibilities to go along with equal consequences for neglecting them.

If we are to accept that physical distinctions between the sexes can alter the application of said equality (thus justifying the treatment of Rice's offense as the more severe), then we must apply that conclusion in all respects, and accept that one gender may be privileged over the other in some regards and not others. Consistency is essential if we are to maintain any degree of intellectual honestly with regard to this topic. The sexes are either equal or they are not — there is no middle ground.

Read Next: Women Are Lying When They Say They Want "Equality"

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

Red Eminence: The Iron Will Of Cardinal Richelieu

August 4, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Of the many leadership traits, willpower has special significance. Difficult to describe, it is best illustrated by historical example, rather than by general discussion. That sustained application of effort over a long period of time, and that concentrated focus on ends in the face of myriad obstacles, are manifested in the life of Armand Jean du Plessis de Richelieu (1585-1642). Cardinal Richelieu was France's most subtle, iron-willed, and ruthless statesman. He was will incarnate, and arguably more than any other, he was the maker of modern France.

From an early age he showed an ability to grasp the essentials of a complicated situation and mold them to his advantage. His maternal grandfather had been a Parisian political figure, and his father, the Seigneur de Richelieu, had been Grand Provost of the Royal Household under Henry IV. In an age when the titles of nobility meant far more than they do today, he made the most of his connections. His family had him nominated for the position of a bishopric in 1606, but he was only twenty one. The young lad then traveled to Rome and made a direct appeal to Pope Paul V; he charmed the pope by first lying about his age, and then by asking for forgiveness for his lie. Paul, not knowing whether to be angry or pleased, was won over by the audacity and keenness of the French youngster. He here demonstrated that remarkable ability to influence men of power, a skill he was to use to great effect throughout his long career.

He discharged his duties as bishop with patient application and a probing intelligence that few of his contemporaries possessed. While others focused on enriching themselves with the spoils of office, Richelieu was more interested in advancement. He was nominated by his peers in 1614 to serve as delegate to the States-General; and from there it was but a short jump to be made secretary of state two years later with the help of Marie de Medicis (queen consort of Henry IV, and regent for her son Louis XIII). He knew how to make himself indispensable to those holding the reins of power. But he was no mere court sycophant. His intellect and memory were second to none, and he had an quiet tenacity of purpose that preserved the ends, while permitting a remarkable flexibility of means. Frequently underestimated, he frustrated all who crossed swords with him.

His fortunes temporarily fell when one of his allies in court was killed. The Queen Mother was banished along with Richelieu, and she soon joined an opposition faction. Richelieu, at the request of the new powers in court, managed to mediate the dispute between the parties and get her back into the king's favor. Louis awarded him the position of cardinal, and from there he became prime minister in 1624 at the age of thirty nine.

The working relationship of King Louis and Richelieu was so successful because each was aware of, and complemented, the qualities of the other. Too many kings err, Richelieu felt, in not letting themselves be served by their ministers. Although the king was always jealous of Richelieu's abilities, he recognized that he could not do without him. No one else had the will and means to keep the Huguenots in check, the French nobles in their place, and ambitious Spain at bay. Richelieu cared little about theology; his purpose was to make France a powerful, centralized state, and to this end, any means was permitted. He would confound many of his clerical colleagues in Rome by his ability to make alliances equally with Protestant as well as Catholic powers. But for him, the interests of France came first.

The Cardinal at war: Richelieu at La Rochelle

The siege of the city of La Rochelle shows Richelieu at his most tenacious. This Huguenot stronghold had become nearly an independent city, a situation no sovereign in Paris could tolerate. Richelieu assumed the role of military commander and, acting on behalf of the king, ordered a relentless blockade of the recalcitrant city. Showing an amazing grasp of siege warfare and engineering problems, he had the harbor sealed, and closed all land approaches to the city. The starving city surrendered after thirteen months of misery, and Richelieu entered in triumph on horseback. Yet his peace terms to the Huguenots thereafter were lenient and just. He later explained that "differences in religion never prevented me from rendering to the Huguenots all sorts of good offices." In an age of religious intolerance, it was a revolutionary view.

He also put France's arrogant nobility in its place. France at the time was still very feudal in character; the nobles in the provinces still maintained private armed forces, castles bristling with weapons, and courts of law. These semi-independent potentates could on a whim undermine the central authority in Paris. It was a situation that was impeding France's national development, and Richelieu, with the tacit approval of the king, was determined to bring the aristocracy to heel. In 1626 he issued an order mandating the disarming of all private castles and fortresses, and outlawed the aristocratic diversion of dueling. When two barons defied the ban, Richelieu had them executed. "It is a question of breaking the neck of duels or of your Majesty's edicts", he explained to the king.

Frances's nobles were furious, and plotted his downfall. But he was far more adroit then they. The Queen Mother, who had originally promoted Richelieu, made no secret of the fact that she had come to despise his special confidence with the king. She had underestimated her one-time protege, and woken up to find him running France. She demanded that Louis get rid of the subtle cardinal, who had now become informally known as "his red eminence" (L'Eminence Rouge). Richelieu, surprising the Queen Mother by entering her private chamber from a secret passage, confronted her. What precisely he said (or did) to her is not known. There followed a palace drama that was as startling as it was revealing.

Red Eminence: a paragon of willpower

The king, not temperamentally suited to showdowns, wavered, and left the palace in distress. Richelieu, in a private audience with Louis, persuaded him of his indispensability. He was so successful in this that Louis ordered his own mother banished, had several rebellious nobles executed, and had Richelieu confirmed once again in power. It was a counter-coup of stunning brilliance.

Richelieu then went on ruthlessly to clip the wings of France's provincial governors and the local parlements. "Nothing so upholds the laws," he said when meting out punishments to the nobles, "as the punishment of persons whose rank is as great as their crime." He had made France an authoritarian state, but this was seen by most at the time as an improvement over the feudal oppression and chaos that had haunted France for centuries.

He was a man of austere and pale expression, whose delicate features masked a ferocious willpower and tenacity of purpose. In the practice of statecraft and political maneuvering, he was without peer. The famous portrait of him by Philippe de Champaigne (now in the Louvre) shows an almost ascetic figure, a man weary with the exercise of authority. He understood the nature of man, and knew that a sovereign could not rule with pleas to moral virtue. Severity was mostly a virtue in a ruler, he believed, and without it a king would not be on the throne for long. Like all of us, he had his faults. He paid too little attention to France's domestic affairs, he taxed the peasantry to the point of destitution, and he set a precedent for absolutism that would be inherited and abused by those who followed him (most notably Louis XIV).

But above all, his willpower was supreme. Frequently ill, he accomplished nearly all of the king's (or his own) purposes that he set out to do, and left France better than he had found it. He knew of the loneliness of power, and accepted the price paid by those who would wield it. "Great men", he once said, "who are appointed to govern states are like those condemned to torture, with only this difference, that the latter receive the punishment of their crimes, the former of their merits.”

It is a judgment that we would be hard pressed to dispute.

Read More: Nothing Is Permanent

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Prohibition In America: The Intersection Of Women And Capitalists

August 4, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Prohibition in the US was a curious period of time in American history, coinciding with the Roaring Twenties and was repealed a few years into the Great Depression. It is fascinating display of increasing female power in social policy, the emerging federal bureaucratic state and the failure of law to cure social ills.

Overview Of The Social Forces Leading Up To Prohibition

From 1920 to 1933, federal law prohibited any production of any intoxicating liquor with an alcohol content of greater than 0.05%. For you nondrinkers out there, this is less concentration than Boone's Farm, one of the weakest drinks out there. What this did, effectively, was put the kibosh on alcohol sales in the country, but did nothing to reduce drinking. In fact, drinking actually increased in the wake of the ban on production.

Anti-drinking sentiments always existed since the colonization of the country. Early puritans had placed bans on hard liquors – the high court in Massachusetts banned such liquors in 1657. However, the bans came and went. While there were always anti-drinking impulses—usually referred to as temperance movements—there were also strong pro-alcohol lobbies. Many Americans drank a lot of alcohol – in 1830 the average American household consumed 1.7 bottles of hard liquor weekly and that does not include beer consumption.

The movement continued to grow in the 1800's and was often part and parcel of the female suffrage movement. The Civil War disrupted the movement but quickly gained steam during the Reconstruction period. The movement was about as diverse as you could get: Christians, primitive feminists, Klansmen, doctors and many business leaders were in the movement. They movement reached a critical mass when women got the right to vote and it was all but certain that an Amendment would get passed. While the 19th Amendment was not passed until after the 18th (Prohibition), most states allowed levels of suffrage for women. Some states, like California, already had full suffrage for women.

THE AMERICAN ISSUE

A Saloonless Nation and a Stainless Flag

Volume XXVI WESTERVILLE, OHIO, JANUARY 25, 1919 Number 4

U.S. IS VOTED DRY

36th STATE RATIFIES DRY AMENDMENT JAN. 16

Nebraska Noses Out Missouri for Honor of Completing Job of Writing Dry Act Into the Constitution; Wyoming, Wisconsin andMinnesota Right on Their Heels

JANUARY 16, 1919, MOMENTOUS DAY IN WORLD'S HISTORY

The Prohibition Era

The 18th Amendment did get ratified by the requisite number of states and became federal law in 1920. While this was a fascinating era of American history, I will gloss over it for brevity's sake. Women's group were boastful of the new muscle American women were exerting over society and men. However, as usual, women didn't understand the body politic nor men. Prohibition did nothing to curb drinking – it actually made drinking problems worse. It destroyed the industry, disintegrated communities and left families starving. Crime increased quickly, as booze running and production became serious money-makers. Organized crime rose to the occasion and many famous mobsters emerged in this era. Violence increased and social discontent increased. It spawned a good amount of jurisprudence – there still is a section in the Federal Code for prohibition law and the related cases.

Also, Prohibition helped increase the policing power of the Federal Government. Women demanded enforcement and that resulted in more police and state control over personal lives. The FBI became much more important during this era under J. Edgar Hoover. A special bureau was created to enforce the law. Constitutional law was very conflicted at this juncture of American history as the "Silver Platter Doctrine" existed. This meant state law enforcement could seize evidence in contravention with the Constitution and deliver it to Federal agents; this evidence would be admissible in federal courts. This doctrine resulted in many abuses of power by state law enforcement.

Also consider the constellation of laws that were passed before and in reaction to Prohibition. Dry counties, limits on what alcohol can be served out of, limits on when you can purchase alcohol, etc. – most of those laws came from this era. Look up the liquor laws in your state or county and check the date. It should not be surprising the law was passed in 1907 or 1921.

Briefly consider the flapper. The flapper was considered scandalous and empowered. They were often seen at speakeasies, drinking and flirting with men. The cheap credit afforded by the newly created Federal Reserve, combined with increased urbanization and loosened sexual mores created this perfect storm for young women. Of course, the Great Depression forced them to do right and become wives and mothers, but for a period of time women were afforded a level of liberty they had never enjoyed in American history.

Prohibition was ended in 1933 with another Constitutional Amendment. The lead-up to this Amendment is the passage of the Cullen-Harrison Act, which legalized beer and wine at 3.2% alcohol content by volume. A few days later, Anheuser-Busch famously sent a team of Clydesdale horses to deliver a case of Budweiser to the White House. The legalization of alcohol sorely helped the economy by providing those factory jobs again to men. Crime lessened in the passage of the act, as gangsters could not profit from dealing booze on the black market.

The Ford English Language School

The Pageant of the Ford Melting Pot

Analysis Of The Prohibition Movement

Prohibition represented the emerging discontent between men and women in America. Women were slowly becoming more and more upset with men. Women were being taught to expect more from marriage: more togetherness, more love and more of anything positive generally. This discontent flowing from women towards men fed the desire to ban alcohol.

Alcohol consumption by men represented a facet of society shut off to women. Women did not go bars at this time in American history. A man going with his friends after work was a way of coping with the drudgery of low-class factory work, but to women it represented men's abdicating from his duties at home. A man coming home drunk isn't just offensive to women about a man's duties in the home, but it is also offensive to a woman's concept of self. Coming home sloppy drunk in many is an affront because it suggests that his home is the place he wants to come and relax after work. It could be construed as offensive because it means he sees his wife and his family as a source of conflict, not love and acceptance.

However, what is most striking is the class issues presented in the Prohibition movement. The only lower-class women that agitated for Prohibition were jilted wives and bitter divorcee's or widows. The primary push for Prohibition came from middle and upper-class people. During these years in America, progressives were extremely skeptical of the lower classes and wished to forcibly transform their lives. Children running through city streets inhibited movement of goods in a city; lower-class pursuits like playing baseball or boxing also cluttered city streets and not only prevented free flow of traffic, but lead directly to drunkenness and violence. All of this behavior was intolerable to upper-classes, as it prevented the lower classes from achieving their maximum productive capacity.

The drive to ban alcohol was most certainly influenced by women and proto-feminist groups, but their anger was co-opted by capitalists and progressives, who were both looking to maximize the potential of the lower classes, either for pecuniary gain or perceived social gain. Capitalists benefited from men not drinking, as they would not just be more productive not hungover, but would also spend their earnings on products produced by corporations. Progressives gained because they got to believe they were transforming the lower classes from their backwards ignorance and bigotry and into better people and citizens. The push for more public education coincided with progressive belief in social progress with capitalist's desire for better workers.

Prohibition, in sum, was an aborted attempt by progressives—and some conservatives, to be sure—to radically transform society. While many Christians and traditionalists did support the movement, the most vocal and passionate voices were all manner of progressive social reformer. Capitalists, for their part, did support Prohibition, but that stemmed from economic harm incurred by them because of the drinking of the lower classes that worked for them. Early feminists fought for Prohibition because they thought the drinking culture of men afforded men more power than they should have. Other progressives types had better intentions of helping the lower classes, but as was seen, it backfired badly.

Most progressive movements to help society usually end up blowing up badly in the faces of liberals. You can conceive of progressives as high school kids who know just enough about science to blow up their chemistry lab. The deleterious effects of a pervasive drinking culture are obvious, but the outright banning of alcohol is just as facetious as it is ridiculous. It did nothing to actually cure the social ills of drinking and only helped criminals and strengthened the control of the government over its citizens. Always beware of people who think that criminalization of behavior cures social ills. It rarely does.

Read Next: The Gibson Girls Of The Gilded Age

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

Did OKCupid’s Experiments Increase The Likelihood Of Rape?

August 4, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Imagine you go on a date with a girl from OKCupid only to discover on first meeting that she is a short-haired feminist. Your face contorts into disgust, and you ask why she didn’t have a single short-haired picture on her profile, or mention her aggressive political views. “What are you talking about?!” she replies. “I’ve got two pictures with short hair, and a link to my tumblr. You’re the one who didn’t say anything about your height or how obsessed you are with weight lifting.”

“My heights listed and there’s a whole paragraph on how much I love my gym,” you reply. You each pull out your phones and load your profiles, only to discover that the profile you built and the profile your potential match was shown are radically different.

This is precisely the situation many OKCupid users might have found themselves during the online dating websites recent experiments:

> The company removed text from users’ profiles, hid people’s photos, and even told some users they were exceptionally good for each other when in fact they were in fact an awful match.

Why did OKCupid deliberately lie to it’s users about their matches?

> The company admittedly performed these experiments just to see what would happen.

Just to see what would happen.

Feminist critics have often said that consent is not possible if one party withholds important information and wildly misrepresents themselves. In this case, both the man and woman might represent themselves honestly on their profiles and OKCupid withhold, hide, or change the information the other person actually received. If OKCupid withholds information, and tells "some users they were exceptionally good for each other when in fact they were in fact an awful match" has OKCupid muddled consent and caused rape?

This isn't an empty accusation. Imagine if I did what OKCupid did on an individual level. Imagine if I made made up a false identity, told my date I agreed with her on questions she considered important in a match when I really didn't, and somehow masked my appearance. She might think we are perfect for each other and give her consent on a false basis. Then, right as my penis was gliding into her vagina, I tear off my mask and say "Actually, I don't agree with any of those questions, and this isn't even what I actually look like." Her eyes go wide and she asks me why I lied. I shrug. "Just to see what would happen." Do you think she'd withdraw her consent or accuse me of rape?

OKCupid did that on a mass scale.

Did OKCupid Put Unsuspecting Users On Dates With Rapists?

OKCupid has tried to minimize the damage of their experiments by saying that "the worst thing could have happened is people send a few more messages, and maybe you went on a date you didn't like." However, as one critics notes, "going on 'a date you didn't like' isn't a frivolous thing." It involves real world travel, expenses, an hour or so of time, and a significant emotional impact.

When I read an user's OKCupid profile, I scan for red flags. One in four women take medication for a diagnosed mental illness. I would not consent to a date with a girl who showed signs of mental illness. If you replace "maybe you went on date you didn't like" with "maybe you went on date with someone with a diagnosed mental illness" the situation becomes more grave.

Plus, if you add to that rape statistics and sexual assault as a potential outcome, OKCupid's experiment becomes even more dangerous. One of OKCupid's match questions is "Does no always mean no?" Most women I know rate this question fairly high, because they don't want to wind up on a date with someone who will rape them. If OKCupid changed users answers to the question "does no always mean no?" and put unsuspecting women on dates with men who might rape them, is OKCupid an accomplice to rape?

Terms of Service Is Not An Excuse For Rape

OKCupid will probably respond that their terms of service allow them to do whatever they want. First, most terms of service are already ethically and legally questionable. Second, terms of service do not apply to sexual consent. Sexual consent must be explicit and can be withdrawn at any point. If sexual consent worked like terms of service, I could put some text on the door of my house that said, “by entering these premises, you agree to butt-stuff” and then force anal on anyone who entered my home.

OKCupid is the middleman in men and women’s sexual relationships. If I put on my profile that I’m married, or have an STD, or don’t believe “no means no,” OKCupid hides that information, and a woman has sex with me under false pretenses, who is liable in that situation? To the best of my knowledge, I disclosed that information. Could the woman hold OKCupid legally responsible? This is new legal territory created by the internet.

OKCupid prides itself on being a liberal company. They previously changed their homepage to attack Modzilla CEO Brendan Eich’s stance on gay marriage. You’d think they would understand the basics of consent. However, like many tech companies they love data more than consent. I don’t know if anyone who went on an OKCupid date based on false information given during the companies experiments could have lawsuit against them, but someone should at least try. You know, just to see what would happen.

Read More: How Women Train Men To Rape

Eric Crowley
Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

How I Delivered My Daughter Through Natural Childbirth

August 4, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

So many men get a girl pregnant, either by accident or design and then end up in no man's land. While she is cooing like a dove in the nest, glowing with all those hormones, embodying the pinnacle of her femininity, the poor baby dad is left with his hands in his pockets, fiddling with his nut sack and wondering just what the hell is about to hit him and if/when he's ever going to get laid again.

This goes on for months while the baby is growing inside her. Family, friends and even strangers offer weird advice and warble out of place, emotionally charged congratulations that just leave the poor dad-to-be feeling lost. It took all my strength to stop myself shouting "fuck off" at people who'd say congratulations.

The problem is often exaggerated these days as most childless men don't socialize with couples that have kids. The movies are full of bluepill garbage with some lame white knight panicking, crashing the car outside the hospital, fainting, etc. There is nowhere for a red blooded male to get advice.

Our midwife saved me. She promptly advocated fist fucking to open up the baby momma and make her ready. She also advised that daily creampies were essential since the sperm softens up the vagina. Anal is good too—the anal sphincter is an obstacle to the birth canal. Finger a girl in the pussy, palm to her asshole and you will see what I mean. We had more no-holes-barred sex when she was pregnant than before. It's actually a great time to build the male-female dynamic and I think it was Liam Gallagher who said: "they go all mellow when they are pregnant."

Wise Up

I did a bit of googling when my girl got pregnant. It wasn't planned but I figured it would be an adventure and I like putting myself in strange situations and seeing what happens. I was making quite a bit of money at the time, so the first option that sprang to mind was an elective caesarian. Pack her off to a five star facility and let someone else do the dirty work. "Too posh to push."

While looking into this option, I came across research that showed only 5-10% of births medically need a caesarian while stats sit at around 50-55%. The rest of the time the mother (or more often the doctor) is too lazy to wait and/or it's more convenient to simply book a nice time like 11am on a Wednesday and get back to the golf course. It's also more lucrative since Dr. Chop can bang out 5-10 babies a day, at 10 times the price in surgery, whereas all that 'un-billable' pushing and moaning can go on for 24-72 hours.

Science is starting to show that children born by C-section, often suffer from more ailments later in life and may be prone to more anti-social behavior. With violent countries like South Africa and Brazil topping C-section stats at 75-85% of all births, I decided to look at other alternatives. Feminists have been too busy pushing women into middle management careers to look at the real feminine issues, so I had to figure it out for myself.

That led me into natural birthing and it was about the same time that a number of stars including Jessica Alba were bleating about the benefits of natural birth in the media. I always fancied myself as a bit of a farmer/doctor and I figured it would be a one-of-a-kind experience to birth my own kid, with only basic assistance on hand. A buddy of mine worked on a farm and I'd birthed a calf with him. I figured the baby momma wouldn't be much different. In Holland, more than 50% of all births are done at home. The UK is following suit because it's so much easier and cheaper. Good luck tangling with the military industrial complex in the US, but it can be done.

My first prenatal encounter with medical professionals was a class for pregnant mothers and their husbands in the natural birth clinic. A large black nurse stood up and put the fear of god into 20+ couples (think Eddie Murphy in The Klumps), as she went through the A-Z of every possible disaster that could occur during pregnancy and birth, complete with a graphic slide show that would have made Tarantino envious. I looked around the room as people nervously clutched their chairs and held each other's hands with white knuckles, whereupon I stood up and in the politest queen's English, told her to shut the fuck up.

I'd done my reading (Mary Mongan has a lot of great information on natural birthing) and I was well versed by this stage in how to guide a ~~sow~~ woman through birth. I think it's an important thing to be able to deal with in life. You never know when you might get stranded – a little background goes a long way, not least when it's your own child.

This is where the boys walk and the real men can stay in the room

The bitter and jaded red pillers out there, will laugh at me and call me a variety of names, but this was a life experience and a pretty fucking cool one at that. Sure a part of what I was doing should have been taken care of by women, but thanks to feminism, modern women have lost the plot. Yeah I could have been partying all summer in clubs and banging chicks, but this was just as, if not more exciting, AND it was real life.

From the time she started pre-labor contractions until the baby was born, we were awake for 72 hours with barely any sleep. It was a riot for me, since I am prone to work or partying all night but still I was pushed to my limits and I can only imagine how literally and metaphorically fucked the poor bitch must have felt.

Natural birthing is a little hippyish, but it makes a lot of sense. The idea is to keep the mother relaxed. Dim lights, no stainless steel equipment, glaring overheads, bevy of doctors and noisy medical electronics. Just keep the girl relaxed and let nature do its work. Easy in theory, near impossible in practice—not least since feminists have been so busy turning women into men with 3mm penises, that most girls these days are clueless about birthing and babies. If you think into it logically, it's the only time anyone who is perfectly healthy and experiencing a natural bodily function is rushed to hospital. Sure there is a risk. Yes women do die in labor, but many also squeeze out their puppies pretty quickly and easily. If it was that life threatening, the human race would have long since died out.

I was in charge the whole time. It was my kid. No medical professional, mother in law, bitchy sister, feminist nurses, faggot doctors or her BFFs got in the way. I took the bull by the horns, made it happen and reaped the benefits, not least because she feels forever in debt to me for taking such good care of her, and allowing her to experience the birth as a sexually charged process, instead of a clinical medical procedure.

In my opinion a lot of first time mothers end up feeling unlimited amounts of resentment because the birth was so damn awful. 99% of that is directed at fathers. On the flip side there is the beta male 'herb', seen bottle feeding the new born and pushing a stroller—FUCK THAT. After the baby came out my job was done. I never changed a nappy or had much to do with childcare, because a) I'm the bread winner and b) I want the fun of having a kid, not the hassle, which is for the mother to deal with. I'd hire a maid or nanny before I had anything to do with baby poop.

Conclusion

Guard her (and drill her) while she's pregnant and get her through the birth—it's actually quite an intimate, sexual experience if you can get past your one dimensional idea of sperm release. Finally make it damn clear that she's the momma. If you are going to have a kid, this is how you do it as a man (unless you're an OBGYN, in which case you just chop it out and head for the golf course). In an ideal world men would not be involve at all, but in reality women need a man to figure things out and guide them, even when it comes to their own bodily functions. If feminism had the slightest bit of integrity their first job would have been in the birthing area, not voting and employment.

My final piece of advice is to maintain an active life outside the home. Although we still had a rip roaring sex life during and after the pregnancy (no the pussy does not get stretched, especially if you do it naturally), mommy is pretty boring and stressful to hang out with the first 6-12 months after birth. Trying to have an evening drink and unwind is hard when she's on call 24/7 like a fireman; either that or she's so tired she falls asleep at 9pm and you feel like you're visiting grandma.

The first 2-3 years of having a kid are pretty dull and lame, and best avoided. A couple of hours a week of fatherhood was enough baby joy for me. After they can walk and talk and wipe their own ass, it becomes quite fun and dare I say it's rather empowering. You're certainly the boss when you have a child of your own—children reflect on you, so you have to man up and take the reins.

As far as the natural birth thing goes, the gentle entrance my daughter had into the world created a vivacious, confident and lively kid who is intelligent and well behaved, rather than a panicky, nasty, messy womb turd. Once you have a child, the relationship you build with your children is what keeps the mother in play, since the kids easily love their 'cool' father than is not involved with all the daily kerfuffle. Thus the mother cannot leave without breaking the kids hearts. Her first strategy in breaking the relationship is to cut you off from the kids and that is easily avoided if they love you.

Read Next: Fat Single Mothers Are Child Abusers

My Beta Daydreaming

August 5, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

I've been at a low point for the last few months. At the beginning of May I learned that my dad has lung cancer. So far as I know, he never smoked a day in his life. It was one of those way out of left field sicknesses that seem to be so tragically common to our fragile species.

So far the treatments have been working, and since they caught it rather early in its development there's a good chance my dad will pull through. Still; as a barely twenty-something, I'm not quite prepared for the inevitable deaths of my parents. I'm also in a panic about my own fate: am I destined to get cancer too? My dad is fairly young (in his mid 40s) and lived a relatively healthy life. Is it genetic? If I have kids, will they also inherent that curse? Was the cancer caused by all the electronic junk and heavily processed food we consume nowadays? If it was, am I going to get it even sooner than my dad did?

Needless to say, I signed up for every test to check myself out. I had my first experience of a doctor's wiggling finger up my ass (Pro: it was a woman … Con: it was a fat, unattractive one). Although I've checked clear for everything I was tested for, the paranoia remains. I took a few weeks off work when I heard the news, and went back home to visit my folks. Still, the rat race stops for none of us schmucks, and after nearly a month home I had to make my way back out into the Canadian west to continue the drudgery of my blue collar job.

After a nearly fourteen hour workday of tiny spaces, sweat, dirt and electrical zaps from dumb shits forgetting to flip a switch off before I stripped a wire, me and my partner of the day packed up our work truck and headed back to the mid-sized city I currently call home. It has a nice view of the mountains and that's about it, though there's a mid-tier university there so there's at least a large pool of young, bangable girls to make it semi-bearable.

Near the city limits, a black Ford 4×4 pulled out from a gravel road onto the highway ahead of us. Since we were going roughly the same speed, I got a good view of the people in the truck. Inside, I could see a girl was sitting in the middle of the seat, her head tipped onto the shoulder of the driver. His arm was around her, and as if to accentuate the whole lovey dovey scene, the sun was setting perfectly against the mountains, silhouetting the couple.

As I drove the last few kilometres into the city behind the truck, staring at the two of them, I felt an intense whirlwind of depressing emotions welling up inside me: jealousy, anger, despair. There I was, filthy and exhausted, driving a shitty old work truck that perpetually smelled like coffee, dust, cigarettes and fast food farts, while listening to a fifty-year-old high school drop out with a beer gut and a bright red nose of burst capillaries bitch and moan about having to pay alimony to his two ex-wives. All I had to look forward to at home (a rented house shared with two roommates) was a quick shower, a quicker (and non-filling) supper of a Salmon Fillet, some marble cheese and an apple, and then two hours of grunting at the gym, putting further stress on my already aching joints in order to build and keep the muscles which enable me to attract women who aren't morbidly obese or shovel faces.

And as for my romantic options for after the gym? At that moment I had two women on the go: a university student who asked me to finger her in the taxi cab to the university dorms four hours after I first met her; and a suicide girl type whom I had hit up after a buddy of mine had finished his fling with her. I was (and still am) disgusted that I was sleeping with a girl who took the jizz of a man whom I personally know, but I console myself with the fact that the majority of women in my millenial generation are whores anyways, and whether I know who railed her before me is irrelevant in the big picture. There's little point about fretting over her sexual past. It's not like I'm going to marry her.

Most of the time this reasoning works. Sometimes, like that night, I hate myself for giving them even the slightest bit of pleasure at the expense of both my dignity and my romantic soul.

Essentially, I had nothing to look forward to. Even as I write this, I am still going through the same routine; killing myself with long, hard work days to accumulate a bunch of money that does not even matter to me… I am not a consumer, there's no toys I want to buy and I am too much of a nomad to purchase a house (not that I could find a decent woman to share it with in the first place), all while giving 38% of my pay-cheque over to taxes. Depending on the day of the week, after work I'm either sprinting with a weighted vest or lifting heavy shit and putting it back down, just to add a barely noticeable extra bit of mass to my muscles in order to attract slightly prettier whores than the ones I fool around with now. Then I have to basically beg said whores (who secretly disgust me) through texts to come over and give me some fleeting physical pleasure. Add to that my current fatalism due to my dad getting cancer and it's not hard to see why I am in a low spot.

I couldn't get these facts out of my head as I drove behind that truck. I just stared at that girl's head on that guy's shoulder, his arm around her. I wondered what their lives were like. Was the guy blue collar like me? His truck was fairly new, with an auxiliary fuel tank visible in the back, so it was a fair guess that he was either in construction or a farmer. What did she do? Were they married? Just dating? Was she the girl next door? Had they fallen in love in high school or only just recently? Did they have a house? Did she do the chores, waiting anxiously for him to pull up in his truck? Did she smile when he did? Did he smile when he saw her?

I began to daydream about a life like that. I imagined how much better everything could be, if only I could meet a decent woman. I managed to push away those nagging red pill thoughts that there are very few women in the whole world who met the four basic qualities I seek (sexually attractive to me, not a bitch, not promiscuous, loyal) and that the odds of me finding one are up there with winning the lottery. How much more tolerable would all the shit I go through be if only I could have what those two in the truck in front of me surely had?

Like most men, I have a lot of acquaintances, a few friends, and no truly good friend: therefore, I have no one with whom I can talk frankly with about the bad stuff in my life. I imagined just lying in bed with a loving woman, the crickets chirping in the night time lawn outside our big country house, and just being able to talk freely without having to worry that I'm creeping her out or scaring her off because my human vulnerable made her see me as weak. I fantasized about coming home, filthy and exhausted, and finding dinner already set out for me… not because it was her wifely duty, but because she loves me and appreciates me and just wants to show she cares. There would be kids, finally something I could spend all my money on. There would be a lot of love, and of course there would be some bad times and some fights. But at the end, looking back with my woman on our lives when we were old and wrinkled, I could smile knowing we made it. She'd put her head on my shoulder, I, my arm around her, and we'd just sit there on our porch, watching the sunset.

"Stop at Timmies bud," my partner said, snapping me out of my Beta Daydream.

We had entered city limits, and the truck with the couple was still in front of us. Every Canadian blue collar worker knows where every Tim Hortons coffee shop within a five hundred kilometre radius is, and I automatically drove to the closest one without thinking about it. Surprisingly, the truck with the couple led the way. It seemed that they were going on a little coffee date, or maybe they were just getting some doughnuts. They pulled into a parking space just beside the front door of the coffee shop, and since the guy I was with is a fat, lazy bastard who would bitch like the world was ending if I made him walk more than fifteen feet, I jammed the work truck into the small open space beside the Ford on its passenger side.

I wanted to see the couple. In the twenty minutes I had ridden behind them, I had become obsessed with how I envisioned their life to be. I wanted to look left and see two pretty young things who had bucked the majority trend of my generation and actually created a worthwhile relationship. I wanted some positive affirmation. Using my skillful creep vision, I turned my head ever so slightly, staring at them out of the corner of my eyes.

When I saw her, I snapped my head away before she could see me.

"You want something?" my partner asked. I um'd and ah'd until I saw the couple had entered the store, then told him nothing. He went inside and took his place in line just behind the couple, who got some drinks to go. When they came back out I pretended to be engrossed with something on the seat beside me. I'm not sure if the girl saw me, but she hasn't texted me since then so I assume she never did.

The plot twists that real life drops on us are often so contrived and implausible that we would roll our eyes and boo if it was in a movie. This was one of those twists, and even looking back at it right now I can’t help but laugh and imagine how many of you reading this are unbelievably shaking your heads and rolling your eyes at such an obvious and surely fabricated outcome. If I had not been so depressed when I saw her, I know I would have burst out laughing.

We had been fuck buddies back in February. She was a university student who I had met through another FB of mine. I had spent nearly three weeks frosting her face like a Toaster Strudel before I grew tired of her vapid bitchiness and ghosted her with a complete communications blackout. Plus, toward the end of our brief winter romance, there had been a lot of evidence that she had been taking on another guy on the side so I wanted to be the one to end it. I doubt the third wheel who had joined our temporary trist back then was the same man who was now laughing at something she had said in the truck beside me.

The truck and the couple pulled away. I didn’t look to see if they were smiling, or if he had thrown his arm back around her shoulder. My partner came out and crawled back into the work truck, I drove us back to the shop. Then I went home and scarfed my bachelor chow down. I went to the gym, nearly hurt my legs with some bad form during a 345 squat, texted my current skanks and got no reply, so my night ended with thirty seconds of masturbation and a hefty deposit of my potential children into a sweaty gym sock.

I woke up at 5:30 am the next day to do it all over again. I also called my dad and asked how his chemo a few days before had gone.

Read More: An American Beta Male Story

Billy Chubbs
Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

10 Things You Should Know About Lima, Peru

August 5, 2014 | by Colin Post | Link | Original Link

This article is dedicated to all the men out there who enjoy taking short trips or extended stays in exotic locations with plans to date and play with the local women. Most of you who touch ground in Latin America go to the same countries: Brazil, Colombia, and Argentina. It's no surprise given those countries' populations resemble the more accepted international standards of beauty, which is to say European or white.

I won't argue with your preferences in beauty. I'm going to argue that choosing your destination based on the entire population's average beauty is flawed logic. You aren't going to lay the whole country, and you can find beautiful girls anywhere. That's why a shrewd traveler will base his decision on other criteria, and the wisest will choose Lima.

1. Peruvian food is the best in Latin America

Choosing your destination country based on the beauty of the women, in my opinion, is folly. You will end up with Brazil or Colombia. And in those countries, how many women are you going to be intimate with? If you're not resorting to working girls, chances are no more than a handful, if not just one.

But what you will do every day is EAT. You'll eat a a few times every day and cover a wide variety of the national cuisine. So if anything in a country should be judged by quality and variety, it's food.

Peruvian cuisine is the new rage in American restaurant trends. Peru won the 2012 and 2013 World Travel Awards for best culinary destination. Read more about ceviche, causa, ají de gallina, lomo saltado, and more in Peruvian Food: The Best in Latin America.

Ignore the importance of food at your own peril. Take it from me, I lived in Colombia for three years (see Colombian Food: Worst of the Worst).

2. It never rains in Lima

It never rains, but there is 'garúa', Limeños' nickname for the clouds that blanket the city for eight months every year. Another nickname for Lima is 'La Gris', or The Gray One.

But no umbrella. No worrying about getting caught in the rain on your bike or on a long walk. It never rains.

3. There is surfing in Lima

The best surfing in Peru is found in the northern beaches, but there is a vibrant surfing scene along the coast of Lima. There are surfing schools, board rentals, and surfers catching waves every day. If you're a seasoned veteran or a wannabe who harbors dreams of learning, the Pacific Ocean waves crashing against the Lima coast are big enough to surf.

4. Lima is a capital city of 8 million

Lima’s economic and career opportunities rival those of Bogota, Santiago, Rio de Janeiro, and Buenos Aires. The Economist and IMF have called Peru the best economic performer of the region, largely due to business-friendly government policies which aren’t adhered to everywhere in Latin America (Venezuela and Argentina).

There are enough executive professionals in Lima to make a living teaching English. Or if that idea repulses you, Lima’s job market and business environment are large enough to ply your professional trade.

5. Its original name was ‘Ciudad de los Reyes’ (City of Kings)

When the Americas were originally colonized, Lima ruled over all of Spanish South America while Mexico City governed Mexico, Central America, and the Caribbean. From what is now Potosi, Bolivia, the richest silver mine in the history of the world sent every ton of silver to Spain through Lima. Lima was the richest city in the Western Hemisphere before the Pilgrims ever set sail for Massachusetts.

The 18th century and beyond weren't so generous to Peru, but the legacy of grandiosity remains in the city center. Downtown Lima has, by far, the most impressive sights of any Latin American capital I've visited (though I've never been to Mexico City).

6. Lima is one of Latin America's safest cities

Photo credit: The Economist

Peru is one of the safest countries in Latin America. The above graph illustrates murder rates by country.

See the most violent cities in 2013. On that list, 41 of the 50 most dangerous cities are in Latin America (and five in the United States). Of the 41, there are 15 Brazilian cities, nine Mexican cities, and six Colombian cities. Neither Lima nor any other Peruvian city made the list.

7. Peru has the region's best tourism

On an extended stay in a foreign city, you will surely see other parts of the country for short, in-country trips. Peru offers the most interesting and varied tourism outside Lima.

Machu Picchu is the most amazing tourist site I've visited anywhere, beating out Christ the Redeemer in Rio and Summer Palace in Beijing. Arequipa, where I was married, has the natural beauty of Colca Canyon. But even better is the city's own local gastronomy, which can singlehandedly beat most of South America's national cuisines. Trujillo and the northern beaches offer more surfing and all the bells and whistles you'd want from beach towns.

Huaraz and the Cordillera Blanca mountain range draw the most competitive mountain climbers in the world. There are easier climbs and simpler hikes with magnificent views, and even skiing. Puno and Lake Titicaca give the most accurate look at the lives of indigenous Americans before the Europeans arrived. Iquitos is arguably the ecotourism capital of the Amazon rainforest, rivaling if not beating any Ecuadoran, Colombian, or Brazilian city. They weren't drawn by aliens, but the Nazca lines in Ica are a UNESCO World Heritage Site that receive viewing tours by air every day. Sandboarding is also popular in the area.

While you can find great beaches and ecotourism in Colombia or Brazil, skiing and security in Chile, or great food, historic grandiosity, and Indian ruins in Mexico, only Peru offers all of the above.

8. Low cost of living

Your dollars or euros will go far for rent, meals, partying, and tourism in Lima than any other Latin American capital or business hub. Your money will go farther in greater Peru than in the smaller cities of most other South American countries (except maybe Bolivia or Paraguay).

9. Peru is not saturated with gringos

Gringo: any man from the United States, Canada, Europe (minus Spain, Portugal, and Italy), Australia, or New Zealand (gringa = woman from those countries).

The Amerindian stereotype of Peruvian women is why Peru is largely passed over by love tourists and sex tourists who choose their destination countries based on the more conformist beauty standard. If you want European-looking women, keep in mind how late you are to the party in Brazil, Argentina, and Colombia. Every city has been thoroughly conquered. The gringo seed is familiar. Ten years ago was a different story (I hear), but in 2014 you are too late.

Those markets are not as friendly. There are many competitors (other gringos) and the customer base is skeptical, no longer impressed by your accent. In Peru, on the other hand, a gringo is still a novelty.

10. Gringos in Colombia and Brazil have reputations

Colombia and Brazil are saturated with gringos looking to learn Spanish/Portuguese, drink beer, and meet girls. Before you get off the plane, you already have that reputation. In Medellin and Cartagena, the taxi drivers will ask if you want a girl. Everybody has the same assumption about why you're there, including the women. It doesn't matter if that's not why you're there. It's assumed.

A gringo in Peru, on the other hand, is presumed to be one of two things: (1) a tourist doing the Peruvian circuit outlined above, or (2) a volunteer. They will not presume you to be a sex tourist, a love tourist, or a drug tourist because those gringos don't go to Peru. Backpackers and do-gooders who want to save the world go to Peru. The competitive environment of Lima is friendlier.

Lima Travel Guide: Insider Advice from Expats in Peru

If you're convinced Lima is your best bet, don't go in blind. Get my Lima Travel Guide. Buy the Kindle version on Amazon. Or for the PDF with all the high-resolution pictures, visit LimaTravelGuide.com. Email to get a 50% discount on the PDF by mentioning ROK. Also check out my Kickstarter campaign to fund This Mick's Life: Addiction and Underworld from Ireland to Colombia:

Read Next: 3 American Cities Men Must Avoid At All Costs

Colin Post

Colin Post publishes the Expat Chronicles blog. He recently authored Mad Outta Me Head: Addiction and Underworld from Ireland to Colombia and Lima Travel Guide.

The Masculinity And Art Of Jackson Pollock

August 5, 2014 | by Thomas More | Link | Original Link

Jackson Pollock. Maybe you've heard the name, but are unfamiliar who he was.

Born on January 28, 1912, Paul Jackson Pollock was a well known American painter and a major figure in the abstract expressionist genre. He was famous for his unique style of drip painting. Pollock was born in Cody, Wyoming, in 1912, the youngest of five sons, and grew up in Arizona and Chico, California. While living in Echo Park, California, he enrolled at Los Angeles' Manual Arts High School, from which he was expelled. He already had been expelled in 1928 from another high school. Pollocks father was a surveyor, and early on in his life while on surveying trips together, Jackson explored Native American culture .

In 1930, following his older brother Charles Pollock, he moved to New York City where Jackson studied at The Art Students League in New York, under Thomas Hart Benton. Although Benton's rural landscape subject matter had little influence on Jackson's art work, Pollock often said that Benton's traditional teachings gave him something to rebel against. Jackson had been more intrigued by the artistic style of the ethnic indian of the American southwest. This stands to reason if one watches the way American Indians produce their sand paintings and the way Pollock manipulates his paint drips, both of their methodologies are very similar.

Pollock enjoyed considerable fame and notoriety as a major artist of his generation, though he sold very little of his art work during his lifetime. The über high prices that his paintings are fetching today came about several years after his death in 1956. Regarded as reclusive, he was a loose cannon mentally, and struggled with alcoholism for most of his life.

Pictured above: Jackson Pollock's "One: Number 31, 1950″on display at The Museum of Modern Art, New York.

Jackson was all about his painting. His priority was his art, and his wife took second place. Pollock's work also helped make the United States take center stage of the international contemporary art scene at that time. Being among the abstract expressionists group, Jackson and many other artists lived somewhat of a Hemingway existence where they hung out together and drank heavily, and had no "wifey" chaperones in attendance.

The abstracts expressionists were described as being "…strong, ugly men….they weren't cutie pies at all." In other words, they were real men, hetero and alpha. This was also during a time just post WWII where men were expected to saddle up and start having families, because unlike today, back then having families was a good thing. Most certainly during this era artists were considered outsiders, perhaps one might argue they were among the very first MGTOWers of their day.

"Blue Poles, 1952"

"Number 14: Gray"

The Youtube documentary mentions that "Jackson looked to women for support" which is typical feminist-bent journalism. Indeed he had women in his life, but he always had them on his terms. He cheated on his wife literally right in front of her. He'd make out with his mistress in his wife's presence in their house. He drank a LOT, and I think his ultimate mistress was the sauce. Sadly, Jackson Pollock died on August 11, 1956, at age 44, in a car accident while driving heavily intoxicated.

For many, the paintings of Jackson Pollock are the emperor's new clothes when one considers the prices that his works are commanding at the auction houses today. Jackson is among the big ticket names in art and his paintings are selling in the tens of millions. As time progresses for me, I at least can respect the evolution of his artistic style that he took during his life. One has to follow the proceeding history to understand where he is coming from, and this is best portrayed in a scene in the movie "Pollock" where he is drinking with his artists cohorts, and states "We gotta break through this shit!"

Read Next: A Word On Masculinity From A 13th Century Poet

Thomas More

Thomas More is an American expat who has taken the road less traveled, and to quote the poet Robert Frost, "that has made all the difference". He shares his impressions and thoughts of interest with other men making their way through the Western world.

The Biggest Hindrance To Success With Women Is Ego

August 6, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

What is the main thing that stops most men from going out, meeting a cute girl and taking her home on the same night for sex?

Let me give you a few clues:

- It's not that they're not good-looking good-looking enough
- It's not that they don't have enough money
- It's not that they're not jacked
- It's not that they're not funny enough

The main thing that stops men from getting laid with greater ease and efficiency is themselves. Yes, you read right. Guys who are otherwise eminently attractive to women and who should be pulling all the time trip themselves up in the field constantly. How?

They let their egos get in the way.

I want to let you in on a secret that has been the cornerstone of my game for nearly a decade. If you were to apply this perfectly (and trust me, no one can) then I guarantee you would see you results with women increase exponentially:

The more you kill your ego, the more sex you will get.

Sounds pretty simply on the surface, right? But actually it needs a little unpacking. After all, aren't we always told that self-improvement is the key to game? That getting your style sorted and your finances in good shape, and getting jacked at the gym and developing high self-esteem and being "high value" are all an essential part of being attractive to women? And that arrogance and other so-called "dark triad" traits are key to stimulating vaginal tingles in young ladies?

Yep. all true. Therefore, to be truly successful with women you need to cultivate a duel operating system of high self esteem and rock-bottom ego.

There's a Difference Between Self-Esteem and Ego

Self-esteem is about acknowledging and being proud of your accomplishments as a man, and of the accomplishments you are working hard to achieve. Ego, on the other hand, is that kind of hollow, baseless pride that people puff themselves up with—think, for example of a hot girl who dropped out of college but who has 100k Instagram followers. The first is healthy. The second will get you into trouble.

Your Ego is Killing Your Chances of Sex

What do I mean by this? Let me give you an example. Say you're walking down the street, and a beautiful, tall, slender girl with long, luscious hair and a short skirt comes towards you. She is sexy as hell, exactly your type. What do you do?

If you are a newbie, then you probably do nothing—after all, she's hot as hell so you're afraid to approach for fear that if she rejects you, you'll be crushed.

If you are an experienced guy with a number of high-quality notches under your belt then you may also do nothing. Why? because you're afraid that if you approach and she knocks you back, your status as a 'player' will be compromised—in your own head at least.

In this way, inexperienced and experienced guys both lose out. New guys don't have sufficient experiences of success to arm them with the confidence to act. They feel—understandably—that if they approach a woman she is likely to to react badly, and that it will hurt. In practice they might well be right—but really, what do they have to lose?

At root, their real reason for not approaching is protecting their egos. After all, it's far, far, easier to make excuses, not do something and then fantasize about how you could have succeeded than to put yourself on the damn line and risk failure.

It's almost worse in the case of experienced guys. If you're new around this may be hard to grasp, but stick with me. Men who have learned game, particularly those who are involved with the manosphere or PUA communities in some way—perhaps through commenting on forums or websites such as this, or writing blogs or even books on pick-up—tend to become strongly personally invested in the idea of being what used to be called MPUAs—master pick-up artists. Think about it for a second. If your whole schtick, your whole swagger, is based on the belief that you are "good with girls," then in time you will do anything you can to maintain that belief, because if you fail to then you will inevitably have to rethink your whole persona.

In both cases, the bottom line is that men are sabotaging themselves. Why? Because the more women you approach, the more likely you are to wind up having sex. I'm not saying it's entirely a numbers game—there are things you can do to improve the quality of your approaches—but in the end, you have to rack up the numbers. There are no short cuts. That's why the truly successful man approaches all the time.

Kill James Bond

Look, all of us need to do one thing right now: extinguish for good the fantasy of the smooth player that exists in our minds smirking at our fumbled approaches, our poor eye contact, those awkward conversations that we occur while we are tired and out of state. Because the truth is that shit happens to everyone.

One of the difficulties with learning game is that i those who teach it to us don't talk very frequently about rejection, or if they do, it is as a postscript to far longer tales of one-night stands and threesomes pulled straight out of the club. Hell, I'm as guilty of this as anyone else. Successful pulls—the more impressive the better—are the meat and drink of internet forums and YouTube pick-up videos.

Understand this though: no one is successful on every approach. Not Krauser, not Tyler Durden, not the London Daygame guys, nor anyone else you'd care to mention. The reason that guys like these are more consistently successful than average is this: they all have a system that compliments their personality, and they all approach a hell of a lot of women.

Forget perfectly executed picks-ups, forget witty, note-perfect conversations, forget seamless escalations. Forget all of that stuff you read on the internet and are scared to emulate in case you fall short. Understand this: pick up is messy and unpredictable for one simple reason—it is interacting with random strangers who you know nothing about. To say nothing of the myriad variables created by your own constantly changing state. It's like this for everybody: no one is perfect, so kill the specter of James Bond that sits on your shoulder and judges you every time you speak to a girl right now.

Lower the Damn Bar

Whether experienced or not, guys need to go easier on themselves. Realize this: in the end, game is simply initiating contact and then pushing forward through a predetermined sequence to sex—escalating, in other words.

Leaving escalation to one side—that's for another article—let's concentrate on the first stage. Your job as a man is simply to initiate contact with the woman. Ideally, to be successful, you need to do this with as many women as possible. There's a dirty secret in pick-up: the men who get the most sex are also the men who are rejected the most. But rejection isn't a catastrophe. In fact, if you are opening women all the time, every day, then in time you will barely notice it. Remember, all you need do is initiate contact. This could be as straightforward as simply saying hello in a coffee shop. Wait, see how she reacts. If she blanks you, then fine – move on. Nothing lost and there are thousands of other chicks out there. If she is warm and friendly then great—chat with her and try to escalate, either by taking her on an instant date or by getting her number and then gaming her via text for a subsequent meeting.

It really is that simple. Never feel like you have to do anything flashy to get women: believe me, you don't. If you put yourself in enough social situations then you will see in time that you can succeed even with the lamest "game."

Six Practical Steps for Killing James Bond and Approaching More Girls

1. Have a very clear idea of what is fantastic about you.

Wherever you are in your life, there will be things about you that are amazing. You need to remind yourself of them on a daily basis. For example, perhaps you run 10k every day. Perhaps you work for an hour on your online business every morning. Perhaps you meditate or designate a certain amount of time for challenging reading. Perhaps you are losing weight and shifting a couple of pounds a week. Write down a list of great things about you, pin them up somewhere where you can see them and read them out loud every morning before you go out. Begin each one with “I am fantastic because… ”

2. Put a smile on your face

It’s an old self-help trick, but trust me, it works damn well. However you are feeling, when you step out the house fix a big smile on your face. Do it so your cheeks hurt. For the first few minutes it will feel odd, but after a while you’ll feel yourself relaxing into it, and the smile will become genuine. Also, you will notice people around you responding more positively to you, and as you feel more positive in turn, those who don’t won’t phase you.

3. Approach all the time

Guys, girls, old or young—it doesn’t matter. Talk to everyone! Have mini-conversations with shopkeepers, people on the street, cops, cleaners, whoever. Become that guy who is social with all. Not only will this get you warmed up and used to social interactions, it will also mean that when you come to talk to a hot girl it won’t be such a big deal. Your sense of abundance will grow exponentially when you realise just how many friendly people there are out there. Some of the most successful guys I know do this every day—you should too.

4. Turn the Dial Down on Your Expectations

When you approach a cute woman, don't expect too much. You have reframed. You are no longer a super-cool, master PUA. You are not James Bond. You are simply a social guy who loves to talk to people. If she's not down for that then fine—there'll be another one waiting for you just around the corner. If she is, then great. Try to escalate and see where it goes. Just don't feel you need to live up to a self-imposed standard that has no basis in reality.

5. Congratulate Yourself on Small Achievements

Say you go up to the hottest girl in the nightclub and say hi, and she tells you to fuck off. Great! Congratulate yourself — you have just done something that the vast majority of other men would never, ever have the balls to do. OK, so it went badly. Perhaps there is something you can learn, some adjustments that can be made to your approach. But overall, you must think well of yourself as you are taking action and working towards a goal. Smile, pat yourself on the back and move on to the next girl.

6. Realize You Have Nothing to Lose by Approaching

In the vast majority of cases, an interaction that isn't going to go anywhere is over very quickly—perhaps you approach a girl and she tells you she has a boyfriend, or that she's not interested. Fine. Now you can move on. You have lost nothing except for a few seconds of your time.

But realise that the opportunity cost of not approaching can be huge. I have approached girls who haven't so much as looked at me, let alone given me positive signals, and ended up having sex or relationships with them. So next time you're out and you're afraid to approach for fear of denting your ego, remember, you simply never know what's going to happen when you walk up—and believe me when I tell you that the rewards can be great.

Want to develop confidence and attract beautiful girls anywhere? To learn more, click here.

Read More: 5 Tips That Helped Me Get Laid More

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The One Problem With Wisdom

August 6, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

The whole concept of wisdom is a simple one:

Tell younger generations about your experiences and mistakes so that you may save them decades of lost effort, not only drastically improving their lives, but also allowing them to discover whole new mistakes themselves that they may in turn warn future generations about, resulting in a beneficial perpetual cycle that will advance humanity into infinity.

In theory, it's a great idea and if implemented "perfectly" in a "perfect world" it would solve most of society's problems in a matter of a few generations. However, of the many inherent problems with wisdom, there is one in particular that blunts this cycle—wisdom is really hard to take.

For example, if I, now nearing the age of 40, were to tell a young 18 year old man,

> "Dude, don't bother with the nightclubs. They're loud, they're temples of attention-whoring women, it isn't worth the money, and for a fraction of the cost you can simply purchase a monthly prostitute."

would the young man heed my advice?

Chances are he would not.

Not necessarily out of disrespect or because he believes I'm lying, but rather because there are so many sociological and psychological factors that have affected him throughout his upbringing, that he believes I'm simply misinformed, out of touch, or don't know what I'm talking about.

For example society has nearly every 18-year-old man convinced that nightclubs aren't just cool, but that they are their destiny. Through TV, reality shows, stories from their friends, advertisements, the Vegas DJ scene, and music videos, they just can't wait to get into the nightclubs. They can't even think of anything more glamorous or desirable—just try recommending a jazz club to your average 19 year old male and see how many takers you get.

Another example is overconfidence. Movies play a huge role in predisposing Americans to think their chances of success are greater than they actually are. They're used to always winning. The Guns of Navarone. Kelly's Heroes. Die Hard. But how many of them have watched A Bridge Too Far? Ergo, a young man could fully believe what I'm telling him, but prefer to take his chances anyway because he thinks he'll beat the odds.

And then there's the "I'll just work harder" or "be more clever" thought. Ha! That 40 year old fool. Yes, he may have tried, but I'll try harder and be twice as cunning about it!

But sociological pre-conditioning and overconfidence aside, the biggest reason younger folk have a hard time taking wisdom, the one that trumps them all is; not finding out for yourself.

At first this may not seem all that convincing. What does somebody care if they don't find out about it themselves? Why don't they just listen to their elders? But the reason this is such a deterrent to accepting and digesting wisdom is because if they don't try it themselves then they will never know if they personally would have succeeded.

If they WOULD have been that statistical anomaly.

If they WOULD have been able to work harder and beat the odds.

This in turn causes (or at least threatens) something arguably much worse than trying and failing—life long regret. It is here I must change from my traditional stance where I normally suggest a course of action toward having no regrets in life.

Yes, take the chance and ask the girl out.

Yes, take the shot and apply for that job.

Unfortunately, not all life's decisions are costless as merely asking a girl out and firing off a resume. Some are life-debilitating, if not life-destroying and it is here we must find a way to get the younger generations to overcome their psychological conditioning and listen to their elders.

Sadly, all of us "older, wiser men" have to admit we have no way to "force" you to accept and incorporate our wisdom. We cannot guarantee that had you pursued that career in music therapy you would NOT have become successful. We cannot guarantee that had you tried to get into investment banking you would NOT have become a millionaire. And we cannot guarantee that had you tried to become a basketball star you would not have become the next LeBron James. But if we were to switch it, focusing instead of the risks and consequences of you FAILING, rather than what idealistically "may have been," perhaps these severe costs will make you heed our words.

At first, this may seem intimidating. A "scare tactic" trying to deter you from pursuing your dreams and desires. And given how American society has made you think your dreams and desires are entitlements, you may even get violent when somebody dares to question their feasibility (1:15 mark). But if you can open your mind, take off the horse blinders society has put on you, step back and look around and see what is happening to your peers, or even people just a few years older than you, perhaps you can both see the true life costs associated with making bad decisions (divorce, student debt, worthless degrees, damaged women,etc.) and be able to assuage yourself of any potential “regret” that you heeded any wisdom from us old farts.

The point is wisdom is not meant to rain on your parade or bring you down. Nor is it to destroy your dreams or condemn you to a life of “what if’s” and regrets. It is meant as a warning from more experienced, older men who have been down that path before and genuinely want to see you have a better life than we did. This doesn’t mean you need to implement every word of wisdom handed to you by your elders, but it does mean you should at least listen to it, heed it, and thoroughly think through the consequences of ignoring it. And if every young man did that, the generational cycle of dramatic improvement into infinity would not be so theoretical.

Read Next: 14 Things That Happen As You Grow In Worldly Wisdom

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

Tattoos Are Not Artistic, Unique, Or Rebellious

August 6, 2014 | by Seth Rose | Link | Original Link

Everywhere you look these days there is someone who has undergone some sort of body modification. Whether it be dying their hair green, getting a septum piercing, or a tattoo on their arm; they're not difficult to spot.

I have to admit, a lot of these things are pretty cool. I think some tattoo sleeves on guys look badass, and certain piercings on chicks are hot (you know which ones). However, I find it difficult to fully grasp why so many people, especially Millennials like myself are undergoing body modifications considered deviant by society.

Of course, young people have always rebelled against their parents and society by going against societal norms. Yet, this trend differs from past ones like bellbottom jeans and leather jackets. Unlike hippies of the 60's who could ditch their ragged clothing for white-collared shirts a few years later, many Millennials have made permanent alterations to their bodies; this is where the trend needs to be observed more closely.

Before we get into it, I want to make note that I am not accusing everyone who has a small piercing or bleaches their hair of having major issues, but many younger people these days do, and we should figure out what they are and what's causing it.

To start, we must define what this trend consists of. From what I can see, there are three major categories of body modification that today's teens and twentysomethings are partaking in: Tattoos, piercings, and hair alterations (Hair dye, as well as short hair). We must ask: why?

Does it make them more attractive? For the most part, no.

Does it give them higher social status? No, in fact in the eyes of many it lowers their status.

So two of the main reasons primitive cultures underwent body modification can be ruled out.

One main reason people take part in the growing trend is that because it is human nature to desire to conform and be a part of something greater than ourselves. Those with multiple body modifications usually socialize with one another and partake in that subculture. These modifications serve as a means of an individual saying, “Hey! I’m one of you.”

While body modification is still considered deviant behavior, it has become much more mainstream. The trendsetters who decades ago were getting tatted up, have now paved the way for those who want to “rebel” against the society that has suppressed them so severely with their internet, fast food, and air conditioning.

What Happened To Real Art?

With body modification, namely tattoos, the body serves as the canvas and the tattoo as the art. Both the tattoo artist and the customer have collaborated to come up with the artwork, and their body will serve as the canvas. While this is an interesting way of presenting art to the world, to me it is more troubling than creative.

Most people’s tattoos are supposed to have meaning, so by getting something inscribed in one’s body it negates their ability to effectively communicate that meaning to the world, and instead they let the tattoo speak for itself. Take the death of a loved one, a popular tattoo to get. Instead of being able to tell the world how the loss of this person felt and still feels, they have forgone traditional mourning in favor of a permanent body modification. To me, this screams emotional repression and ineffective communication.

Also, instead of putting artwork on a real canvas and framing it in one’s home or a museum, one permanently etches it on the body. Does this imply that the great artists in history have been erroneous in their masterpieces? Should Michelangelo have tattooed his masterpiece of the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel on the Pope’s back? Of course not, and this brings up an important point. Centuries ago, even decades ago, artists devoted their work to God, loved ones, their country or anyone who could appreciate art whereas now artwork is devoted to the individual.

This epitomizes the growing trend of narcissism and the self-absorbed nature of today’s youth which can also be seen with developments like the creation of the selfie stick and sex selfies. Is it a coincidence both of those trends have “selfies” in their name? No. Tattoos, piercings and hair dye are forms of selfies too. Perhaps people will start calling them “art selfies.” While narcissism has its place for a select few, according to psychoanalyst Erich Fromm:

> “…it seems that [while narcissists] are very much in love with themselves… they actually are not fond of themselves, and their narcissism—like selfishness—is an overcompensation for the basic lack of self-love.”

While the people who undergo body modifications would be the first to preach love, they are the ones who lack it most. Many of them lack self-esteem, so they undergo body modifications in hope that these exogenous altercations will compensate for the self-love they are bereft of.

Often these people also lack accomplishments to take pride in. Most people with tattoos haven't started their own business or created a ground breaking medical technique, or even something as banal as having a child. For most teens and young adults, getting a tattoo or piercing for them is a milestone, because most don't have any other milestones in their life to take pride in.

They're Not Special

So they get a tattoo, or a piercing, or dye their hair blue.

Now they are "unique."

Now they are "special."

Now they have something in life that brings them excitement and change.

Another aspect of body modification that can't be ignored is the self-destructive behavior. At first, even I found it hard to consider getting a piercing or tattoo to be self-destructive behavior, but if we look at the definition of it we can see that it does fit the bill:

> "Any behaviors that negatively impact our mind or body by the life choices we make. Most people are unaware of their self-destructive habits. Usually there is some problem with handling or expressing feelings. Self harm/mutilation is a pattern of intentional self injury not death. (http://www.state.sc.us/dmh/telepsychiatry/selfdestructive.pdf)

Not all body modification is considered self-destructive behavior, but getting multiple piercings and tattoos are classified as forms of this type of behavior. To quote Mr. Fromm again on what causes this behavior:

"…the drive for life and the drive for destruction are not mutually independent factors but are in a reversed interdependence. The more the drive toward life is thwarted, the stronger is the drive toward destruction; the more life is realized, the less is the strength of destructiveness. Destructiveness is the outcome of an unlived life."

A Solution To The Trend

I don't write this article to lambaste or poke fun at those who hold this topic dear. No, I write this article so that those with multiple body modifications, those considering them, or those with family or friends considering them ask: Why? If that question can't be answered effectively, then one needs to attack the root of the problem and find an alternative way to fill that void that a body modification is supposed to provide.

We see that self-destructive behavior is the product of an unlived life, so to fill that void one must simply live life to the fullest. It's easy for Millennials to confuse living life with "YOLO," but the latter is actually not about living life, but rather pursuing selfish, hedonistic endeavors to fill a temporary void of boredom and unhappiness.

Decades ago people expressed their desire to be unique by cultivating artistic talents, or taking up intellectual or entrepreneurial pursuits. In the age of the smartphone, despite technology being at its current apex somehow all these things have tragically been pushed aside. It would behoove anyone considering a body modification to take up one of these constructive pursuits before making a lifelong commitment to deviance and mediocrity.

Read More: 6 Types Of Stupid Tattoos That Girls Get

Seth Rose
Seth Rose is a modern day Renaissance Man who has an insatiable appetite for adventure, knowledge and women. You can check out his sites Seth Rose Life and Masculine Books, and follow him on Twitter.

How Much Is Your Cost Per Orgasm (CPO)?

August 7, 2014 | by Dawson Stone | Link | Original Link

There was a scene in the movie Risky Business where Tom Cruise's character is trying to recruit a classmate to his "brothel." Please keep in mind it's an old movie so the dollar amounts are low, but you get the idea. His pitch was as follows:

> So, you took her out to dinner twice.
> What did that cost you?
> About $30.
> With tip?
> Okay, maybe $35.
> Any movies?
> Three movies.
> $20.
> Parking?
> I park on the street.
> Gas?
> Maybe $6.
> All right, Stan, you're in for roughly $60 odd dollars.
> What happened?
> She slept with Jacobsen.

One night a buddy of mine was complaining to me about the exorbitant cost and unfairness of divorce. Jokingly, I suggested that the fairest way to calculate a divorce settlement would be to pay a woman for every time she had sex with you while married.

What Is Sex Costing You?

The thought stuck with me, and I couldn't help but wonder what sex was costing me in purely economic terms. Applying microeconomic principles in a way that my business school professors never expected, the CPO concept was born. Here is how it works. You tally up 100% of the money you spend on a woman during the course of "dating" her and divide that amount by the number of times you have sex with her.

By way of example, if you are a traditional beta male, you buy a woman three expensive dinners at ~$200 each, and try to close her on the third date. If you were successful and had sex twice, your CPO would be $300 ($200 * 3 / 2). As a beta, there is a decent chance you don't even close. You could argue that you should only use the money spent on her (divide the numbers in 1/2) and your CPO is still $150. I would argue you wouldn't usually spend $100 to have dinner by yourself but calculate it however you want. The key is consistency.

I have diligently tracked my CPO for the last 4 months. It was $44.15, $20.82, $36.75 and $37.20. I recommend that every guy track it for at least a few months to see what sex is really costing you.

My CPO might seem a bit high, but in my defense, I always have 1-2 women in my monthly rotation that are out-of-towners. In fact, in my most recent 4-month period I had an unusually high number of women (eleven) that were out-of-towners. Most of them are struggling college students, so I do buy their plane ticket. But I plan in advance and can usually get a ticket for between $200-$250. If it wasn't for this variable, my average CPO would be closer to $10-$12.

On average, in one month I spend a total of $1,750 on all dating activities, close 4-5 new girls for the first time, and have 6-9 different girls. I average around 50 orgasms a month (I admit to having a very high sex drive). I would argue that having sex with 50+ new young, beautiful women a year (none below a 7) and having sex over 600 times a year is well worth ~$20,000. Money damn well spent. If I removed my costs for out-of-town women my annual spend would be closer to $8,000.

Compare this to your average beta that is dating or has a girlfriend. Imagine a 30-something guy who takes his girlfriend out to one nice dinner once a week, one vacation a year (her portion), one weekend trip a year, plus her birthday, Valentine's Day, Christmas, costs for 2-3 weddings (you are her date and likely pay even though it is her friend getting married) and he could EASILY spend more than $15,000 a year. And what value does he get for his money? He gets to have occasional, uneventful sex with ONE woman.

What Is A Married Guy's CPO?

I could do the same math for a married guy but I won't bother since the numbers are ridiculous. My one friend when calculating his CPO actually got angry. "God damn it, my CPO is infinity!" And the worse part is for most of my married friends, they close their eyes and imagine either A) their wife is the younger, tighter version of themselves or B) Scarlett Johansson (or insert celebrity crush here).

Think about Kobe Bryant having to buy his wife a $4 million ring to "compensate" her for him cheating on her. Or Tiger Woods paying his nanny ex-wife $250 million in his divorce settlement. Even if Tiger slept with 100 women and came 5 times with each of them, his CPO was $500,000. And let's be honest, some of the women he cheated with weren't even that cute. That's what happens when you marry a nanny when you are 25 years old and are worth a billion dollars.

I don't know why these otherwise smart men do such stupid things. They buy the cow for an obscene sum of money when they could easily have the milk inexpensively or even free. Probably 80% of women Tiger Woods slept with would kill to be able to say they had sex with him. It is part of the reason why I admire Derek Jeter so much. He is the only high-profile athlete I can think of that has stayed single, kept all his money and slept with ½ of the Maxim 100 Hottest Women.

Now, let's imagine the CPO for a married guy getting a divorce. Let's say he is married for 15 years and has sex four times a month for the entire time he is married (which according to my married friends would be nothing short of a miracle). That's about 720 times he would have had sex during a 15-year marriage. What was his CPO?

For simplicity sake, I will assume the wife is a stay-at-home mom and that she costs no more than a nanny/maid/cook would cost. If they buy a house and save for retirement she will get half of what is saved/invested and alimony for at least 8 years. Let's assume only $30,000 a year in alimony for the 8 years. I will assume their house is worth $400,000 (in equity) when they get divorced. Investments and retirement accounts are worth $200,000. I will ignore any child support. These are all conservative numbers for a middle class family. That works out to $540,000. The married guy's CPO works out to be $750 to have sex with the same woman who gets less attractive year after year and is probably at least 30-40 lbs heavier than when he first married her. My CPO to have sex with beautiful 18-24 year olds averages about $35 even when I factor in transportation costs for out-of-town women.

Sex Always Comes Down To Money

I can hear the rants from feminists and even guys about distilling sex down to money. "You are paying for sex!" "You might as well go to a prostitute!" Sex is about money! If sex wasn't about money there wouldn't be alimony, child support, pre-nups, palimony, engagement rings, and weddings that cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. I could go on forever.

I will make one exception here. In 1 in 4 married households the woman makes more money then the husband. But this ends up being both good news and bad news. Good news because the man is much less likely to get screwed in a divorce. But actually awful news for the woman. A man who earns less that his wife is significantly more likely to cheat on her. In fact, if he is totally dependent on her income (stay-at-home-dad) he is 500% more likely to be unfaithful. Don't believe me? See reference here.

Clearly all women and all sex isn't equal. So let me be clear. I don't have sex with a woman unless I like her and truly enjoy her company. If a woman seems like drama, difficult, or has a sense of entitlement, I don't waste my time. Life is too short. I don't live and die by CPO, but it is a concept that keeps me sharp and helps ensure that I don't let any woman get me to do anything I don't absolutely want to do.

Read More: Average Never Got Anyone Anywhere

Dawson Stone
Dawson is an expert in online dating with well over 1,000 first online dates and specifically sugar daddy dating. I am my late 40s and happily divorced and I date almost exclusively women 18-24. I primarily coach men that are contemplating divorce, getting divorced or are recently divorced and looking to get their lives back on track.

5 Fascinating Facts About Sir Renaulph Fiennes

August 7, 2014 | by The First Auarian | Link | Original Link

There are very few men in the limelight of the world today who epitomize masculine virtue. One of them is Sir Renaulph Fiennes.

Fiennes served in the British Army for eight years, including a period on counter-insurgency service while attached to the army of the Sultanate of Oman. He later undertook numerous expeditions and was the first person to visit both the North and South Poles by surface means, and the first to completely cross Antarctica on foot. In May 2009, at the age of 65, he climbed to the summit of Mount Everest. According to the Guiness Book of World Records, he is the world's greatest living explorer. Fiennes has written numerous books about his army service and his expeditions, as well as a book defending Robert Falcon Scott (a masculine Naval officer and adventurer) from modern revisionists.

A few highlights of his life include.

1. Getting kicked out of the SAS for defending his country's honor and being a rascal

Fiennes served eight years in the British Army—in his father's regiment, the Royal Scots Greys—and was later seconded to the Special Air Service, where he specialized in demolitions of all things.

His service life was enlivened by various scrapes and escapades, including an occasion when Fiennes and another officer procured a very lively, squirming piglet, covered it with tank grease and slipped it into the crowded ballroom of the army's Staff College (where officers are trained). On another occasion, offended by the construction of an ugly concrete dam built by 20th Century Fox for the production of the film Doctor Dolittle in the village of Castle Combe, Fiennes planned to demolish the dam. He used explosives which he later claimed to have accumulated from leftovers on training exercises.

Using skills from a recently completed training course on evading search dogs by night, he escaped capture, but he and a guilty colleague were both subsequently traced. After a court case, Fiennes had to pay a large fine and he and his co-conspirator were discharged from the SAS. Fiennes was initially posted to another cavalry regiment but was then allowed to return to his regiment.

2. Walking across both poles unsupported by oxygen and chopping his own fingers off in a tool shed to speed up recovery from injuries

The expedition failed when his sleds fell through weak ice and Fiennes was forced to pull them out by hand. He sustained severe frostbite to the tips of all the fingers on his left hand, forcing him to abandon the attempt. On returning home, his surgeon insisted the dead fingertips be retained for several months before amputation, to allow regrowth of the remaining healthy tissue. Impatient at the pain the dying fingertips caused, Fiennes cut them off himself with a fretsaw above where the blood and the soreness was. Some of his other achievements include:

- Discovered the lost city of Ubar in Oman
- North Polar Unsupported Expedition (furthest north unsupported record)
- Pentland South Polar Expedition (first unsupported of the Antarctic continent and the longest unsupported polar expedition in history)
- Climbed the Eiger by its much-feared North Face

3. His political affiliations are manly and conservative

Fiennes is an official patron of the UK Independence Party (one of the most conservative and anti-liberal parties in UK). He is also a member of the group “The Freedom Association” which is, unsurprisingly to any red pill man, libertarian.

4. In 2003 he ran seven marathons on seven continents in seven days, four months after a heart attack and bypass.

Race 1: Patagonia – South America
Race 2: Falkland Islands – “Antarctica”
Race 3: Sydney – Australia
Race 4: Singapore – Asia
Race 5: London – Europe
Race 6: Cairo – Africa
Race 7: New York – North America

5. He was almost James Bond

Fiennes married his high school sweetheart, who passed away while they were married. He was also considered for the role of James Bond during the casting process, making it to the final six contenders, but was rejected by Albert Broccolli for having “hands too big and a face like a farmer.” Roger Moore was eventually chosen.

He has also written over 27 books detailing his journeys, his struggles (he climbed Mount Everest while having a fear of heights and suffering from vertigo and heart problems). Some of his books are titled; A Talent for Trouble, Where Soldiers Fear to Tread, Hell on Ice, To the Ends of the Earth (written with his wife Virginia), and his autobiography, Living Dangerously and Mind Over Matter: The Epic Crossing of the Antarctic Continent. His number one bestseller, The Feather Men, is also published in Signet.

I would elucidate more, but the interview below puts it better than any words could. And through it all, he maintains a dignified composure, a calm way of talking and a confidence without arrogance.

Read Next: Ascent Into Eternity: The Unconquerable Will Of George Mallory

The First Auarian
Considering the fact that before he was 20, The First Auarian had lived in Europe, Africa, Asia, Scandinavia, UK, South America and the US; while banging his way from Tokyo to timbuktoo, his perspective comes from actual balls-on-the-ground-in-pussy rather than some hypothetical armchair Master-bator conjecture. More of them can be found at his site Auaria.com

Rammstein Is Germany’s First Red Pill Band

August 7, 2014 | by Relampago Furioso | Link | Original Link

If you have grown sick to death of the whiny chick music with femcentric themes that permeate Top 40 radio in America, you may be interested to know there is a an alternative if you like rock music with masculine themes. Rammstein is a popular Neue Deutsche Härte industrial rock band from Germany. Formed in 1994, they have sold 35 million records worldwide. Their award-winning concerts are renowned for their use of live pyrotechnics.

More importantly, they created a spark for red pill knowledge and promoted men's self-interest before the film The Matrix was even released. These are some of the music videos and lyrics that echo popular sentiments in the manosphere. Their first big hit was Du Hast, released in 1997. The lyrics of the song are clearly about avoiding marriage:

> You
> you have > you have me
> you have asked me
> you have asked me and I have said nothing
>
> Do you want, until death separates you, > to be faithful to her for all days
>
> No!!
>
> Do you want, until death, which would separate, > to love her, even in bad days
>
> No!!

Watch the video:

The video has a dual meaning. Adding to the song's theme of avoiding marriage for a life of freedom and dignity, we see a woman in a red dress speeding to a warehouse with her lover in tow. Bear in mind a woman in a red dress is often used in art to symbolize socialism, and feminism/male oppression has been packaged with socialism in the West. Her lover pulls a gun out of her handbag, ready to do her bidding. As her lover prepares to enter the warehouse, we next see men in masks, representing the elite fat cats he would be enslaved to in order to provide for this woman upon marrying her.

Once entering, the man driving the car realizes his friends are wearing the mask as a ruse, perhaps as a warning of the type of life he'll have upon taking the vows. The men in the warehouse are screaming in the face of an unseen person, who is a symbol the of the state apparatus who subjugates men once they submit to a female and get married. After taking the masks off, the men all have one last hurrah together.

The woman, all the while, is nervous that she will not be able to subjugate him, and paces nervously outside, hoping he doesn't uncover the ruse. The men then burn the symbolic state apparatus in the warehouse, and decide that freedom and male brotherhood is more important than becoming an indentured servant then exit the warehouse. Upon realizing that the lady in the red dress (symbolizing socialism/feminism and a wife/slaveholder) was only using him to do her bidding, he returns, friends in tow, and the car explodes, taking the woman with it, a powerful expression of a man refusing to submit to either socialism or feminist orthodoxy.

Next song is Sonne.

The theme of this video is based on the German fairy tale Snow White and her seven dwarfs. This is of course symbolic of the typical Western woman and her supplicating beta orbiters. The dwarfs are all slaving away in the diamond mine trying to find a gem that will satisfy her. We see early in the video that she readily accepts one of the dwarf's offerings to her, but quickly slaps him down, symbolizing how women treat beta providers. All the while, she has a sadistic side, enjoying the mistreatment of her dwarfs/beta orbiters.

In this video, Snow White really takes on the princess role, and we all know most Western women see themselves as just that. Midway through, Snow White snorts some golden powder, retires to a bath, and later dies. Her death can be seen two different ways: either she dies from overindulgence in the "golden powder" made possible by her beta male slaves, or one of the dwarfs gets sick of her bullshit and poisons her. In any case, she is taken to the top of a mountain and laid to rest, only to have an apple fall into her hand at the last minute. This has the effect of giving her a second chance to the delight of her beta dwarfs, and possibly to the chagrin of the dwarf who wanted to get rid of her. Back to the diamond mine, boys.

Another video that shows how manipulative females can be is Rosenrot.

These selected lyrics tell the story:

> A girl saw a little rose
> It bloomed there in bright heights
> She asked her sweetheart
> if he could fetch it for her
>
> She wants it and that's fine
> So it was and so it will always be
> She wants it and that's the custom
> Whatever she wants she gets

> At his boots, a stone breaks
> He doesn't want to be on the cliff anymore
> And a scream lets everyone know
> Both are falling to the ground

It's really easy to see the theme of this video just by watching it. A girl manipulates a priest into killing for her, then she's first in line to burn him at the stake. The lyrics to the song serve as a dire warning to men who supplicate to female desire.

Another song and video that has manosphere themes is Amerika. It's about America pushing its empty, materialistic culture through mass media, brainwashing other cultures of the world, and turning them into mindless consumers. As the lyrics tell, "freedom" is the product that's being marketed, but what's really being sold to people is chains.

This is the video with English subtitles:

I hope you enjoyed this quick introduction to Rammstein. Their music is a great way to practice German, one of the major languages in the world. While Rammstein illustrates one aspect of the German language (the harsh-sounding, rough side), if you delve deeper into the language and music it can also be one of the most tender, emotive languages you've ever heard. It's also enjoyable to realize that men actually have an ally amongst the world's popular musicians.

Read more: The Most Masculine Oldies Music

Relampago Furioso
Relampago Furioso is the creator of The New Modern Man. He is a former member of the mainstream media turned dissident, with professional experience in both science and journalism. He enjoys striking at the Establishment using politically incorrect truths and electrifying SJWs with logic. He is now living part time in the Caribbean while traveling the world. New for 2017, Rel has published a Quick and Dirty Guide to Women and a Quick and Dirty Guide to Money and Minimalism. Rel is also a Red Pill Life Coach, helping other men realize the dream of getting laid on the regular, getting out of debt, and traveling the world. Facebook|Twitter

Ebola Volunteers Nancy Writebol And Ken Brantly Are Cowards

August 8, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

If you haven't been living under a rock lately, you've probably heard about the deadly Ebola virus being brought (willingly) on to American soil; so maybe it's time to start living under a rock and freak out like everybody else in the country.

Sarcasm aside, the deadly strain has made it on to American soil for the first time – at least knowingly. Two doctors who were helping to fight the spread of the disease in Africa were both stricken with it, and over the past week have been transported by a special quarantine jet to Atlanta – a city with a population of nearly 500,000 people.

First, What Is Ebola?

> Ebola virus disease (EVD) or Ebola hemorrhagic fever (EHF) is the human disease caused by the Ebola virus. Symptoms typically start two days to three weeks after contracting the virus, with a fever, sore throat, muscle pains, and headaches. Typically nausea, vomiting, and diarrhea follow, along with decreased functioning of the liver and kidneys. At this point, some people begin to have bleeding problems.
>
> Signs and symptoms of Ebola usually begin suddenly with a flu-like stage characterized by fatigue, fever, headaches, and joint, muscle, and abdominal pain. Vomiting, diarrhea and loss of appetite are also common. Less common symptoms include the following: sore throat, chest pain, hiccups, shortness of breath and trouble swallowing. The average time between contracting the infection and the start of symptoms is 8 to 10 days, but it can vary between 2 and 21 days. Skin manifestations may include a maculopapular rash (in about 50% of cases).Early symptoms of EVD may be similar to those of malaria, dengue fever, or other tropical fevers, before the disease progresses to the bleeding phase.
>
> ### Bleeding
>
> In the bleeding phase, internal and subcutaneous bleeding may present itself through reddening of the eyes and bloody vomit. Bleeding into the skin may create petechiae, purpura, ecchymoses, and hematomas (especially around needle injection sites).
>
> All people infected show some symptoms of circulatory system involvement, including impaired blood clotting.Bleeding from puncture sites and mucous membranes (e.g. gastrointestinal tract, nose, vagina and gums) is reported in 40–50% of cases. Types of bleeding known to occur with Ebola virus disease include vomiting blood, coughing it up or blood in the stool. Heavy bleeding is rare and is usually confined to the gastrointestinal tract. In general, the development of bleeding symptoms often indicates a worse prognosis and this blood loss can result in death.

Okay, so obviously it’s not a pretty thing. The The Hot Zone is an excellent read about the virus, albeit it is exaggerated a bit for cinematic effect.

The debate across America is whether this is safe or not. The two doctors will either live or die, hopefully Emory and the CDC learn valuable information about Ebola, and that will be it. Our sanitation and health care abilities are light years ahead of the countries Ebola is currently rampaging through.

Truthfully, everything will probably be fine.

Morals Of The Doctors

The two doctors, Nancy Writebol and Kent Brantly, made the decision to risk their lives in hopes of saving people in Africa. While it seems a reasonable question why we continue to help countries that are routinely a money sink and provide no value in return – there are people whom are far more giving, caring, and brave than I am.

Supposedly, Writebol and Brantly were among this crowd. In reality, they're cowards.

When a soldier enlists in the military, and enters an active warzone – can he turn his back on his fellow men and run back to American soil on the first available plane?

Absolutely not.

Writebol and Brantley, as medical professionals, certainly knew the risks associated with their decision to combat Ebola head-on. They knew they were going to countries with less-than-stellar medical care, and hot conditions that make wearing the necessary Ebola-protected spaceman suit extremely difficult to cope with. They knew they would have a chance to be infected by Ebola.

Finally, they knew that they had a relatively low chance of survival should they contract it (various sources place it somewhere between 60-90%).

Where Are The Medical Ethics?

I will say this again – this will probably end, good or bad, in the Atlanta hospital with Writebol and Brantley. These are the best professionals in the world, and America has kept Ebola in vials for years in America – and people aren't kneeling over and hemorrhaging blood.

But even the slightest chance of spreading the disease should have been enough for their moral red flags to fly. As a doctor, their job is to save people, not potentially put thousands at risk. Despite the chance to study Ebola closer, and perhaps develop a cure, it is not worth the slight risk to America.

They made their choice, and their bed.

From an ethical standpoint – Nancy Writebol and Kent Brantly should have been left in Africa to bleed in it.

Read More: Male Homosexuals Have Become A Public Health Threat

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Life Advice For Young Men and Women

August 8, 2014 | by Fisto | Link | Original Link

If I may I would like to offer some life advice for young men and women…

Men

Whatever you do, do not get married. Do not even consider it. It is a terrible business decision and you will always regret it but by the time you do, you will be institutionalized to the point where you cannot function outside of the structure of having your wife tell you what to do and what to think and when to take a piss.

Then, because you are such a pushover and not man enough to do what you think is best, or because you are constantly saying wimpy things like “whatever you want honey” to avoid confrontation, she will be turned off (not knowing exactly why) and will start looking around her and mistaking the passing sexual attention of some nearby single “bad boy” and think it’s long term dating interest.

She will start thinking she is wasting her prime years with you. The loyal schlub that pays all her bills. She will start consulting her friends (who are probably already divorced and miserable) and they will seek to validate their own stupid decisions by telling her “you deserve to be happy” (when really they want her to be miserable, let’s face it, women hate each other).

Then one day just before she hits the wall (because you weren’t smart enough to marry a girl 10 years younger than you) she’s going to screw around with some guy and say “it just happened” (even though it never just happens) or she’s going to flat out leave you. Then you get divorce raped, then you are back out in the wild with your game skills so atrophied you don’t even know how to talk to a girl. You will spend years in misery recovering from this.

The only way to avoid this kind of shitty outcome with your wife is to be a man that makes HIS mission, (not his wife) his priority. She will respect you then, and while she will constantly try and test your resolve with dramatic meltdowns and childish fits, every time you don't give in, she will love you more (as opposed to her losing respect for you and loving you less).

As it ought to be

Women want to align themselves with a stronger masculine presence, it makes them feel feminine, special, and safe. They want a man with unshakable confidence, who believes in himself and who knows how to take charge of a situation.

The only way to become this kind of man is by living a full life, filled with adversity, defeat (and victory), setbacks overcome, and the type of life experience that evokes personal growth. You simply cannot achieve this by the time you are 25. It just won't happen, and marrying early will surely put a halt on completing yourself as a man.

Take your single bachelorhood, and travel as much as you can. See the world around you. Meet beautiful women from all walks of life.

Be honest with yourself about what you want out of life, do not bend to societies expectations of you. Society does not care about the individual, only you will ultimately be on your side.

Stay fit, healthy and strong. Keep learning, study a second language, write about your life, study a martial art of some kind, learn to grill out like a champion (get a "kiss the cook" apron, trust me) and be like the shark that has to swim or die, only do it with self-improvement.

Do not become a fat bastard that puts Doritos on his sandwich. Be better than that.

Memorize this poem:

If— by Rudyard Kipling

> ('Brother Square-Toes'—Rewards and Fairies)
>
> If you can keep your head when all about you
> Are losing theirs and blaming it on you,
>
> If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you,

> But make allowance for their doubting too;
>
> If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
> Or being lied about, don't deal in lies,
>
> Or being hated, don't give way to hating,
> And yet don't look too good, nor talk too wise:
>
> If you can dream—and not make dreams your master;
> If you can think—and not make thoughts your aim;
>
> If you can meet with Triumph and Disaster
> And treat those two impostors just the same;
>
> If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
> Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
>
> Or watch the things you gave your life to, broken,
> And stoop and build 'em up with worn-out tools:
>
> If you can make one heap of all your winnings
> And risk it on one turn of pitch-and-toss,
>
> And lose, and start again at your beginnings
> And never breathe a word about your loss;
>
> If you can force your heart and nerve and sinew
> To serve your turn long after they are gone,
>
> And so hold on when there is nothing in you > Except the Will which says to them: 'Hold on!'
>
> If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
> Or walk with Kings—nor lose the common touch,
>
> If neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you,
> If all men count with you, but none too much;
>
> If you can fill the unforgiving minute
> With sixty seconds' worth of distance run,
>
> Yours is the Earth and everything that's in it,
> And—which is more—you'll be a Man, my son!

Men – if you are one of these wimps that has to have someone because you are needy and lonely (it's going to fail because you are needy and lonely), or perhaps you have seen the world, completed yourself as a man, and are ready for a family, marry a younger girl.

Women don't age well, and keeping attraction is vitally important. If she is your age and you are both in your 30s, she is going to look 40 while you still look good.

DON'T get married in the US, and preferably not to an American girl. Their manners are atrocious, they are narcissists addicted to getting "likes" on Facebook in order to give them a sense of self-worth.

Now for the women…

They need to learn to get their sense of self-worth by accomplishing things of merit.

Girls like to feel feminine and special, but because most are spoiled brats (who don't even realize they had things handed to them their whole lives), they take the easy way out and throw on a slutty dress to get the quick fix of validation and post a "sexy" photo in order to get male attention.

It's something I pity women for because it becomes a horrible cycle of need, where you only feel good when someone is giving you attention. It causes you to spend more time in front of the mirror instead of spending that time doing something noble, and of good character.

It ruins you, because you are addicted to a fleeting short-term fix of cheap self-worth, of which there will never be enough.

Women who sleep around don't realize it, but they are screwing up their ability to be emotionally loyal. They become addicted to the high of a new relationship, the chemicals and hormones that are released when they are intimate with a man (even with a one night stand), and so they are forever chasing that high as well, often confusing it with "being in love". The trouble of course happening when a relationship takes its natural course and that "newness" being over, they think they are no longer in love, and seek out another man. The emotional and psychological costs of living this type of lifestyle is just not worth it.

Do not fall into the trap of trying to "enjoy your younger years" by dating around (also known as being a slut) just so you can later on decide when you are approaching 30 that you're ready to settle down.

While I advise men, especially in the US, to stay single I'm advising you to lock down a good man as soon as possible.

Men need to be tempered like steel through all the trials I described above.

Women need to be sculpted and molded like a piece of art, and that can be done when they marry early to a man of substance who becomes a mentor of sorts.

Women need to be lead the same as when they do a ballroom dance.

Men of substance and means don't want a 30 year old girl who's about to hit the wall. The type of men you want value youthfulness and attractiveness and more than anything, they value a girl they can trust.

A girl who has spent most of her adult life partying and texting 15 different guys at once riding the cock carousel is not a girl who will ever be trustworthy. She is ruined, damaged goods, and not worth the trouble or risk.

She has lived a life of deceit and manipulation, and no amount of wanting to change will turn her into a suitable lifelong companion. She simply cannot recover from that kind of social conditioning.

I know what you're thinking, it's "I don't need a man to be happy! I have my career! I have my looks! I have my friends!" Ladies, I'm here to tell you, you have been fed a feminist lie. Just as men feel masculine when they fix things around the house for their wife or protect her from spiders, women feel feminine (and special) when they take care of their man and their family. The feminist lie that the only difference between men and women is their "parts" is an intellectual, bullshit, myth and if you don't shape up soon, you will later find out the hard way.

Men and women are very different, and feminism is causing our poor women to create a disconnect between their feminine nature, and how they live their lives by being more masculine. They are taught to view all men as "potential rapists" instead of their protectors as they historically were (and still are). The result is a horrible one, as they go from failed relationship to failed relationship (driving good men away with crazy demands and a sense of entitlement), with the caliber of man declining each time as they get older and more worn down until their cat is their only companion.

Look at any older feminist and despite what she claims, she is a sad and lonely spinster, bitter at the world and unable to let go of the dogma she's bought into because she has self identified with it so much, to reject it now would destroy her sense of self.

Men of stature DO NOT CARE if you have a college degree, those things are a dime a dozen, they want a woman who has her shit together.

She works in human resources…but who cares?

Don't think because you have a degree that means you are special. EVERY girl has some bullshit degree (probably in HR or women's studies) and men of stature DO NOT CARE about that.

A needy, high maintenance, whiny, girl who is hot, has about 72 hours until her attractiveness wears off. Don't be some vapid and vacuous party girl that's good for one thing.

Learn to make decisions about what to do, and what you think about something on your own and without consulting your friends. Nothing is more unattractive than having to deal with a woman who is the type of person that follows the advice of the last person they spoke to.

Become a feminine, trustworthy, SOLID, and well-balanced human being.

And if you really want to stand out, learn to cook well. Most women actually gain a lot of satisfaction from cooking the interest of their affection a nice meal.

Oh and for God's sake, stay in shape and stay out of the tanning bed.

Don't try and pretend to be this type of girl, BE this type of girl.

Find a man who is worthy of that type of woman and become devoted to him.

Women, look for a man who is willing to tell you "no." Look for a man who will make decisions and not say "Whatever you want". Look for a man who is driven towards his own mission. Look for a man who tells you that you're cute when you get angry. Look for a man who other men want to be. This is the type of man you will stay attracted to, and this is the type of man that will value a girl that makes a trustworthy companion.

Lock this man down, because this man is going to have his pick of women and if he is wise, he will choose the one that's described above when he is ready for a family.

Read More: Life Advice From The Doctor

Fisto

I'm Fisto, I like to think of myself as a modern day adventurer. I have a roving foot, a desire to write, and a bit of a drinking problem, so having a blog seemed like a natural progression. Find more of my writings on SwoopTheWorld. Cheers.

Is Pornography Really That Different From Prostitution?

August 9, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

Would you marry a porn star? Or a slut or whore perhaps, who simply fucks on screen?

I don't mean to imply that men here would or should. But on the internet, it's surprising to note the rising levels of men who are OK with it (61% as per this nsfw link).

> "I don't look at it as sex, I look at it as a guy with his dick in my wife, but they're working and it's not emotional. She never orgasms in porn. That's for us. If it happened on the set, it would be a little weird."—What If Your Wife Were A Porn Star?

What you see in the above statement is modern male beta hamsterization at its worst. We've already explored here why you can't turn a whore into a housewife. We've seen how ex-pornstars have become a source of harm for their children. Now let's see how prostitution and pornography are essentially the same thing.

What ex porn stars have to say about the nature of the 'work'

Customer and a prostitute illustrated on an ancient Greek wine cup

Some ex-pornstars have compared working in porn as being a prostitute. Chloe Nicole, a popular porn actress of yesteryears, has said:

> "We're prostitutes . . . There are differences. You can choose your partners, and > they're tested for Aids – you won't get your john to do that. But we're prostitutes: we exchange sex for money."

This came in an article highlighting the realities of the porn industry. There have been debates on the legal line between prostitution and pornography and other questions have been raised:

> "Do you want your daughter to grow up to be someone who is compensated financially for the consensual act of sexual intercourse? No tricks here. This is an honest question. In this hypothetical, no one is underaged, on drugs, being exploited or coerced. It's just a commercial transaction — money for sex acts. Is this what you'd want for your daughter?"

In short, the bottom line is: pornography is cinematic prostitution.

This raises a valid counter question: "Why is prostitution illegal, but pornography is not?"

How big is porn? America has one of the largest pornography industries in the world, but prostitution is legal in only certain states. Porn rules the world in more ways than you can imagine.

Pornography laws across the world:

Green indicates where pornography is legal, yellow indicates where pornography is legal with some restrictions, brown indicates where pornography is illegal, while gray indicates lack of data.

Prostitution laws across the world:

The legality of prostitution and brothels around the world: The green areas are places where prostitution is legal and regulated; the blue areas are regions where prostitution is legal but organized activities such as brothels are illegal; the red countries are places where prostitution is illegal. Gray areas signify lack of data.

The laws on prostitution and pornography thus vary considerably around the world. So the hypocritical demarcation between prostitution and pornography is glaringly obvious especially in countries allowing one and restricting the other, as essentially women engaging in both industries are basically being paid to have sex.

In other words, if you want to be a prostitute to be paid for sex (especially in North America) , it's rather convenient to become a porn star instead. You'd make money yourself, become a sex celebrity instead of a 'cheap common prostitute' and you'd contribute at the same time to the huge porn industry's income. Pornography is in fact a way of glorifying prostitution and prostitutes – minus the stigma attached to it. You become an 'adult actress', a respectable upgrade over the ordinary common prostitute.

At ROK, we've spoken about the dangers of porn and how it affects men. We've even promoted the use of condoms and safe sex. Ex-pornstars also have spoken about sex addiction, and other horrors within an industry, an industry which has recently spoken out against a mandatory condom use bill recently imposed on porn.

But, shouldn't safe sex be promoted by an industry whose output is consumed in huge amounts in a country where more than 75% of people will have a HPV infection at some point in their lives?

So why is the bill actually being challenged? Because condom porn 'doesn't sell'.

As seen from this article:

> "The industry says condom porn doesn't sell and that requiring prophylactics will only force production underground, where things would be more dangerous for sex workers.
>
> Porn leaders say a twice-a-month testing system for performers works. The business has threatened to take production out of state, although it's not really clear if that's happening even as mandatory condom rules cover most of L.A."

The second argument about testing twice a month doesn't make sense. A lot of porn stars have lied about their STD status and continued to work in porn, resulting in a lot of deaths of performers. Some recent examples are Mr. Marcus, who doctored his STDs results to continue working, resulting in a syphilis outbreak in the industry in 2012, plus a few others . Some have even tried to book more shoots while hiding their true STD status. Thus, condoms would actually protect performers from such cases where tests are altered. It's better to be safe than sorry.

Some ex-pornstars have recounted horror stories while working in porn, which has resulted in tortures as well as STDs. Prominent among them is ex-pornographic actress Shelly Lubben, who now campaigns against the porn industry herself. The fact remains that everyone in the porn industry has had some kind of STD at some point in their lives, even with the big names. More reasons why condoms are necessary for the porn industry.

The real reason why the bill is being challenged is the first and only reason: the prospective damage to future sales and consumership of the porn industry due to 'condom porn'. Porn is all about fulfilling sexual fantasies virtually – right down to the most depraved fantasies you see onscreen. You get the porn of your fetish, unlike in the real world where women who'd fulfill your sexual fantasies could much harder to be found. Not to mention the couples who watch it simply for the appeal of it.

Porn has thus gradually become the source of sexual release for most people throughout the world, thus leading to its consumership as both men and women who masturbate to it, or even learn about sex from it to eventually emulate it in their real lives. The rise of gonzo and POV porn thus seeks to substitute a real but at the same time virtual woman in the front of the viewer.Virtual sex appears as more real than ever. But condoms take away the 'raw' real appeal of porn.

So, the POV anal scene where the male performer buttfucks the female with a condom supposedly loses visual (and masturbatory) appeal for the viewer, as to the one which features no protection. The porn makers understand the fantasies of their audience very well, and thus don't want to lose their consumers due to the 'plastic' appeal of condom porn.

How much would this scene sell with condoms? Not much perhaps, according to porn industry estimates…

Not to mention the promotion of unsafe unprotected sex to all those watching it. What about the scene where the guy picks up the chick on the street, takes her to her apartment, and goes straight to raw anal? The immature viewer would then go and fuck around without protection and land up with a STD and eventual hospital bills. Porn thus influences people to become real-life pornstars who could face consequences – social, emotional and physical – out of emulating the risqué porn scenes you see on screen. The fact is that porn has a script and rehearsals; while real life doesn't. If you fuck up in real life, you will bear the responsibility – sometimes for life ; not the porn which influenced you.

Is porn thus indirectly contributing to the income of the gynecological healthcare industry with increase in STD patients, by influencing people towards unsafe sex? It may be a crazy far-fetched assumption, but the thought then does cross the mind.

Comparatively, prostitution is more responsible when it comes to the promotion of safe sex as compared to pornography.

Feminism's ambiguous stance on pornography

"Well, I'm a consenting adult and Charley here is a consenting adult - that makes two out of three"

It's logical to assume that every man would think feminists would oppose pornography, considering it would 'demean' women. But surprisingly, some of them have even spoken out in defense of it, notable being 'individual feminists' like Wendy McElroy, thus splitting feminism's views on the subject. However, sex positive feminism has been trashed by some of the cultural Marxists themselves. Feminists can't make up their minds after all even when it comes to defending the female gender.

The irony again is the same: why is pornography being overlooked, while prostitution is being demeaned by feminists – who claim to be fighting for women's dignity and rights? The hypocrisy is so blatant. The prostitute is the culprit, but the porn star isn't – when essentially both are offering the same service in exchange for money.

The stooping levels of modern male discretion when choosing mates is appalling

With men choosing to wife up whores, sluts and porn stars, the end of men, a fairy tale prophesied by feminists seems even truer. Men are contributing to their own end and destruction of their self respect in the eyes of women by making faulty choices when choosing mates. The levels of sexual thirst among modern men propelled by permissiveness in modern societies, blinds men on how to distinguish between a good woman and a slut. Unless men develop more taste and standards when it comes to choosing the women they want to mate with, the self degradation by women through slutty personal behavior will continue even more, who'd still know there'd be someone to wife them up.

We should keep in mind that the wall is softer than we think for modern women; we're living in times when there are no consequences for women for their behavior, while men have to face the consequences for both genders. And who is responsible for this paradigm? Complacent, spineless, indulging and thirsty men: who allowed and are allowing the continuation of such paradigms in modern society.

Read More: Is Modern Man Becoming A Sexual Scavenger?

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Self-Defense Is An Essential Part Of Being A Man

August 9, 2014 | by Samson Lamont | Link | Original Link

One of the primary messages from contributors to RoK is the need for self-improvement among men in the 21st century. Knowledge, fitness, game, and wealth-building are all critical pieces of the puzzle that is masculinity. Self-defense is a piece that has been touched on many times here, but I'd like to cover some aspects of it that don't get as much play as which style to learn does.

Being able to effectively defend yourself is a fundamental part of being a man. Sure the police and various security personnel in public places can come save the day, but they take time to respond and might not get there in time. In addition, a wildly out-of-control civil lawsuit system combined with a society increasingly emasculated to the point that any kind of masculine aggression or violence is frowned upon, even in self-defense, can leave a man on the wrong side of the fence should he not cover his ass in a confrontation.

Let me start by saying that the primary purpose of this article is not to emphasize or promote any particular style. Instead, I intend to focus more on how to begin your training, some tips for what to do when conflict is unavoidable, and what I call the intangibles, which are the aspects of self-defense that are supplemental to the application of techniques, but just as important. While the techniques are obviously the foundation of self-defense, it's the intangibles that will usually dictate whether or not they'll need to be used in the first place. I'll also cover what your options are if martial arts just isn't your thing.

1. Choose Your Art

Now that you've decided to train, you'll need to pick an art that appeals to you. My advice is to do your research thoroughly and choose one that is practical and based on application in real-world situations, which is commonly known as street defense. If you can afford it, I would also recommend private instruction as opposed to groups for more individualized attention. You'll definitely progress faster this way, but you'll lose the value of sparring with others in a class setting.

However, if your instructor's legit, he'll be able to connect you with others so you can spar. Remember, there is no substitute for sparring with a living, breathing human being. Hitting a punching bag, a wooden dummy, or other inanimate objects will help ingrain techniques into your muscle memory, but in the immortal words of Bruce Lee,

Make sure to research your instructor's pedigree. Most instructors worth their salt will willingly and openly say how many years they have in the art, and who they trained under. Trace that lineage and make sure they're bona fide.

As I stated, I'm not going to get into this style versus that style because arguing about which style is best is a complete waste of time. The fact is that there is no supreme style. Everyone thinks their style is best and the only way to definitively prove it is to actually fight and not sit around talking about fighting. Unfortunately, even that will prove nothing, since you could have someone with 20 years in one art facing someone with 10 years in another and have any number of physical advantages (or disadvantages) that could affect the outcome.

That being said, there is such a thing as the worst style in the world. Choose wisely.

“They chose…..poorly.”

2. Intangibles

So you’ve chosen an art and you’re progressing, but obviously the point of learning is so you’ll be ready to use these skills in a real-world situation. This is where the intangibles come in, and they can mean the difference between going home and going to the ICU.

Judging Books By Their Covers

An essential habit to learn is situational awareness. This means always being aware of your surroundings, specifically the people around you, even in a seemingly non-threatening situation. Most people who are ready to do some dirt will give you plenty of signals to watch out for, if you’re actually paying attention and not wandering around like an iPhone zombie.

Let’s say you’re at the club/bar. Everyone seems to be having a good time, and thanks to the teachings of RoK you’ve pulled a legitimate 9 with a body that just won’t quit. Your game’s got her moist, and she’s eager to pull you on the dance floor so she can rhythmically grind her money-maker on your crotch, no doubt a prelude to the naked version you’ll be receiving later. By all accounts a great night, so you have nothing to worry about, right? Wrong.

Your inability to tear your gaze from your new friend’s phenomenal assets along with a sense of protection provided by many bouncers has caused you to stop paying attention to your surroundings. Due to that lapse, you haven’t noticed the guy holding up the wall that’s drinking heavily and continuously glaring in your direction. (Depending on how hot your girl is there will likely be more than one.)

This is a man thinking two things: I want to fuck her and you're in the way. He won't acknowledge that his game plan of standing in one spot with a sour look on his face and expecting broads to flock to him is a recipe for rejection. In the fantasy he's built in his mind, she should be with him and his hamster will come up with any number of ways to blame you for the fact she's not.

Never underestimate the power that jealousy, loneliness, and a lack of game combined with copious amounts of alcohol and other drugs can have on a man's regard for the consequences of assault. Now I'm not saying that you need to be paranoid and constantly looking over your shoulder the entire night to the point where you can't enjoy yourself, but scan the room periodically and if you repeatedly notice a suspicious character giving you the mean mug, keep an eye out for the duration of your stay for any advances towards you.

This goes double when the place is closing and you're outside, as this is when these cowards like to strike. Don't count on security to protect you, because when the other patrons are leaving at their most inebriated there's usually chaos and pandemonium. If there's another altercation that they're attending to, your hater could use that opportunity to go for the sucker punch.

Another perfect example of situational awareness was during the Donald Sterling witch hunt, when Dallas Mavericks owner Mark Cuban got into hot water for making some comments which, while true, didn't jive with the PC agenda.

> "If I see a black kid in a hoodie and it's late at night, I'm walking to the other side of the street. And if on that side of the street, there's a guy that has tattoos all over his face — white guy, bald head, tattoos everywhere — I'm walking back to the other side of the street. And the list goes on of stereotypes that we all live > up to and are fearful of."

Judging books by their covers is how humans stay alive. Unfortunately, we've been conditioned to think it's wrong to judge the shady character(s) advancing towards us on the street until it's too late. I'd rather risk "offending" someone than have them get the jump on me. If they're so offended they ignorantly want to start a fight about it, then your training will come in handy anyway.

Political correctness doesn't stop a knife to the spleen.

Avoiding Conflict

I know this sounds odd when I'm talking about self-defense, but during an argument you should avoid conflict when you can. If you live in a major coastal city, which a lot of us do, the law is not on your side when it comes to any kind of violence, including defending yourself. The days of eye-for-an-eye are long gone as far as the law's concerned. Now you're supposed to "be an adult and take the high road", which means debasing yourself or getting your ass kicked while waiting for the cops to show up and then counting on the legal system to track down the random asshole who did it instead of just handling it yourself.

On that note, when training in self-defense, it's a great idea to know the self-defense laws in your city or state. As far as I know, all states use an equal force stipulation when it comes to defending yourself. For instance, let's say someone pushes you in the chest. Although technically assault, this is not a serious threat of injury. You escalate by punching them in the face, knocking them out. They fall, crack open their skull on the pavement, and die. You can now possibly be charged with manslaughter.

Possessing martial arts training can (and probably will) be used against you if you live in an emasculated area that abhors any kind of masculine aggression. Some states even have a “duty to retreat” law, whereby you can fight back only if there is no avenue of escape left to you or if retreating poses a danger to you. In other words, you should always run away first.

What To Do When Conflict’s Unavoidable

So what is a trained man to do when he’s confronted by a person who wants to engage in fisticuffs and conflict appears to be unavoidable? Make sure your actions can’t be perceived as anything other than self-defense.

First, try to reason with them in a mature, civilized manner using a calm tone of voice. If that doesn’t work and they continue to get belligerent and start to invade your three feet of personal space, subtly step back with whatever foot is your rear foot in your fighting stance and be very vocal about the fact that you don’t want any trouble or tell them to leave you alone. The more witnesses present, the better. As you step back, put your hands up to shoulder height with the palms out in the universal symbol of surrender. Hands out in front of you will work too.

This serves three purposes. The first is that this movement is for the benefit of any CCTV cameras in the vicinity. Most of these places are loud, so there won’t be any usable audio. Should the issue go to court, the video will show your body language as clearly non-threatening. Second, it puts your hands up in a way disguised as passive, but can quickly be converted to an on-guard position that protects your face. No sucker punches for you. Third, by slightly putting your rear foot back, you’re turning your hips so that your groin is angled away from them and you’re not squared up if they like to kick. You’re also now halfway into a fighting stance, which will save you time should some shit go down.

If you’ve done everything you can to avoid conflict, short of running away like a bitch, and it’s apparent that violence is still imminent, DO NOT look your opponent in the eyes. This will be extremely hard to do, since our natural masculine instinct is to lock eyes and to look away is considered weakness. He will take it as such, but it is not. In fact, it is actually a heightened sense of awareness, because by dropping your eyes on the center of his chest, it allows you to see all four limbs instead of just the upper two.

This is important, because most guys on the street are what we call “sloppy boxers”. They’ll have a rudimentary understanding of how to throw some basic punches and will probably be amped up on some combo of drugs, alcohol, and adrenaline, which makes them dangerous, but it doesn’t mean they know how to fight. However, when defending yourself, you must never assume your opponent is a one-dimensional fighter who can only punch. Always bring your “A” game and assume they’re as good as you are and know how to kick, wrestle, grapple, etc.

When you lock eyes, you get trapped in the “tractor beam” and now you can’t see what his hands and feet are doing, which puts you at a disadvantage. By focusing on their center, you’ll be ready for any of these eventualities. Let your opponent think you’re weak. He’ll take the first swing, and you’ll be the one going home to bang that 9 you pulled while he’s curled up in the fetal or unconscious.

Just as a side note, if you’re really a badass and IF you can pull it off, you can use the Richie Aprile “Manson Lamps” Technique to unnerve your opponent and convince him that he should seek to retire forthwith, thus avoiding conflict.

3. Personal Firearms and Knives

So maybe martial arts isn’t your thing. Maybe you’re too busy with business and other interests to find time to properly train. Maybe you’re impatient and don’t want to train for years to become proficient. In that case, I recommend the lifehack of self-defense, the personal firearm: all the “fuck off” in a fraction of the time.

Now any time I bring up the benefits of martial arts, there’s always some smartass who likes to mention how “martial arts can’t stop a bullet”, or “I’ll bring my 9mm, you bring your fists, and let’s see who wins”.

While both of those points have some validity, if these guys took the time to pull their heads out of their asses, they'd realize that it does you absolutely no good being the best marksman in the world and not having a gun on you. Even the armed forces, whose members carry assault rifles everywhere, emphasize hand-to-hand combat, or what they typically call combatives. This is because they realize there are many instances where a firearm isn't available or of use to you and you're going to have to fight solely with what you were born with.

In civilian life, this is much more relevant. Tighter gun restrictions are making it difficult, and in many places impossible, to legally carry a gun in public, which makes this option useless to law-abiding citizens for anything other than home defense. Another drawback is that you're pretty much skipping over the non-lethal aspect of the equal force stipulation and going straight to lethal force. Depending on where you live, unless someone is trying to harm or kill you with a deadly weapon, shooting them can land you in some seriously hot water.

Despite what people have been led to believe, most people who carry guns aren't looking to shoot someone. It's more of a "rather have it and not need it then need it and not have it" type of thought process. If you go this route, make sure to thoroughly research and keep up on the gun laws in your state.

Next to a gun, a folding knife is the next best thing. They're legal to carry almost everywhere, as long as they conform to the legal limitations on blade length, assisted opening, etc. As always, know the law when it comes to these issues. Just as with guns, reasonable and equal force applies here as well. If you get into a fist fight and escalate by pulling out a knife, even just to brandish, that could be construed as assault with a deadly weapon. These should be used more for an armed robbery or carjacking situation.

One very important thing to note here about weapons. You should never let your progression in self-defense lull you into a false sense of security. Movies and television are not reality. Unless you're highly proficient in your art and spend hours every day training specifically in how to disarm people with guns and knives until it's as easy as breathing, it's better to just give an armed thief what he wants. Material possessions are replaceable, your life is not.

Better Safe Than Sorry

In conclusion, we here know that western civilization is on the decline and that lawlessness is going to get worse before it gets better. There are some who would have you believe that we are "progressing" towards some Great Egalitarian Socialist Utopia where everyone gets along and we're all equal. These people are useful idiots and delusional fools.

There will always be class divisions that separate the haves from the have-nots, creating those who resent the successful who worked hard for what they have and look to take it from them. There will always be a drug trade that breeds extreme violence and produces desperate addicts looking to find money for their next fix. There will always be those who believe that "might makes right" and will look to take simply because they are stronger.

These same fools would also have you believe that you should "use your words" and other pussified notions when confronted with people who would use such violence. Words are a quaint idea, and should be the first course of action in most situations simply to avoid conflict, but are useless without action to back them up.

FDR and Winston Churchill made many grand speeches during WWII, yet they weren't walking (or rolling) onto the beaches of Normandy using their eloquent words to convince the Germans to lay down their arms. Instead, it was the RAF and soldiers with M1 Garands shooting Nazis in the face that produced victory. Being able to defend yourself, your loved ones, and your property is essential to being a man. Don't fall into the emasculating trap of depending on others to come to your rescue.

Read More: How To Spot And Avoid A McDojo/Belt Factory

Samson Lamont

Why Gender Equality Is So Bothersome

August 10, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Back in the late ’90’s, a local man in my town had garnered some attention for what happened to his daughter. His daughter had fallen off her rope swing in her backyard and shattered her arm. Instead of rushing her to the local emergency room, he had decided he and his family would turn to prayer and beseech the Lord to heal their daughther.

He and his family were Christian Scientists. Christian Scientists believe that illness and disease are fictions and can be cured by divine intervention summoned by prayer. Pursuant to these beliefs, the family prayed for weeks to heal her arm. After many weeks, the man proclaimed his daughter’s arm to fully healed. He, his wife and the members of his church vigorously agreed.

It had not been healed. In the picture taken on the steps of the local denomination—with his family beaming at the flashing cameras—his daughter looked incredibly uncomfortable. She held her right arm with her left hand, partially masking the lies of her father. Her right arm was bent downward about 30 or so degrees, the skin was a garish pink-red and clearly left her in pain. It looked like she broke one of her fingers, as ring finger bent sharply to the left towards her pinky finger, leaving her right hand in some sort of twisted V shape.

While I felt a great deal of sympathy towards the poor young girl, what was most surprising—and unsettling—was the fact these people have completely convinced themselves they healed their daughter. She standing right in front of them, her face slightly contorted from the pain emanating from her distorted arm, and they were completely oblivious.They wanted to believe so badly that God himself swept into their house, set their daughter's arm and nursed it to health. They were being lied to, by themselves.

Running from reality and seeking refuge in ideas that lead to from the disquieting reality of life is quite common. This man and his family's preposterous belief system that rendered their daughter's arm lame simply doubled down on the beliefs that lead to the harm in the first instance. This man and his family subconsciously decided that it would be best to ignore all the signs that their prayerful intervention did not work. To admit reality is to admit their beliefs resulted in the permanent crippling of a family member. This doubling down is common and is what fuels such anger towards "gender equality."

Feminists—and progressives—love to hold up and publically cherish the growing "equality" between men and women in America. They babble incessantly about all the progress being made towards the day when men and women are perfectly equal. They talk about all the invidious evils that gender inequality creates (ever notice it seems to be everything they perceive as hurting women?), and that we just need more feminism and more equality so that all inequity in the world will dissipate in puff of post-patriarchal smoke.

Yet, that isn't the reality of the situation. Men and women are more miserable than they have ever been in American history. Divorce rates still hover at absurdly high levels, boys and girls have to play the role of parent to their own parents more than ever and social media reflects this sex-based resentment that men and women feel towards one another. Progressive feminists who believed they would be leading men and women to the shining city on the hill of gender equality should find themselves lost and bewildered in the dark woods of gender-based recrimination between men and women.

Instead of realizing that it was the substance of their social policies that has lead to so much degradation, sloth and resentment, they pretend it is an issue of image for "gender equality.” No, it’s not that the heart of feminism isn’t rotten and laden with foul maggots and worms, it’s that people don’t perceive feminism in ways that they should. If only people would listen to how feminists see themselves, then people would understand that they are the gender revolutionaries, star-crossed warriors whose sole purpose to save the world from itself. The anxious fretting over people needing to accept feminism and the cathartic effects of hate-reading sites like ROK all signal that the doubling down on feminism and feminist theory is a defense against realizing the ugly, disgusting truth about “gender equality:” it has done nothing but torment the souls of men and women.

While equality between men and women may be nothing more than a social justice smokescreen so that government and corporations can grind us down into cheaper, replaceable worker cogs, it has serious implications outside the workplace. The hyper-focus on capitalism and consumerism has let the family fester and waste away in the wake of producing the perfect producer and consumer—which is a single mother, by the way. Don’t be fooled; discussions of gender roles in the home aren’t about family life, but about increasing women’s productive capacity at work so she can, in turn, use that money to buy more products branded by capitalism. Society is obsessed with women and their career decisions precisely because they are the perfect consumers. Being a wife and a mother gets in the way of their ability to exist to be a pure capitalist as a consumer.

In their push for “equality,” feminists fought tooth and nail for what has lead directly to the restless depression that clouds heterosexuality in America. The family, which once existed as a haven in a heartless world, now exists as a distraction, a meddling group of individuals we work at loving. Instead of being able to turn to each other as spouses, siblings and parents and children, we all have to spend so much of our time lying to ourselves about reality just to exist. Life has not become a pleasure to enjoy, but an incessant battle to hold the fraying strings together. We haven’t been lead into a shining city on a hill, but in to a cruel social dungeon of desperate anxiety and self-doubt.

Just like the Christian Scientist man who lied to himself about the reality of his daughter's injury, feminists have lied to themselves about the "equality" they have wrought. In both instances, to admit reality is to admit the decisions they have made in life have lead directly to pain and anguish.

Unable to admit this to themselves, they furiously double-down on the beliefs that lead to the problematic actions. The aforementioned man said his daughter's healing lead him to a "renewed commitment to God and his faith;" when faced with the consequences of a sexual revolution and "independent women," feminists double down on feminism to heal the harm. You don't cure an alcoholic with a case of Schlitz beer. You don't set a broken arm by faith, nor do you preserve the balance between men and women by saying "women need men like a fish needs a bicycle."

"Gender equality" is so bothersome precisely because it is so plainly hypocritical. It causes so much rage because those who have anointed themselves saviors of relations between men and women are the same people who have presided over the devolution of said relations. Who else has had serious pull in the gender arena since JFK was President? Feminists have been presiding over a multi-generational erosion of male/female goodwill and they wonder why they catch so much hate? You don't get decades of social influence and get to walk away when your approaches and theories have proven to be detrimental and have led to anguish and unhappiness.

But, just like that girl with a lame arm, the wages of "gender equality" will not be addressed by those who invested in the false consciousness. Instead of understanding how they failed men and women, feminists just double down on the failed approaches to life that lead to such pervasive sexual discontent.

Unable to admit the role they have played in the harm dealt to heterosexual relations, they pretend its all the fault of other people (Republicans, the patriarchy, and white men in general) instead of looking in the mirror and beginning the long and painful process of admitting their role in the psychological regression of American men and women.

Read More: American Masculinity Is Based On Female Approval

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

One Surprising Benefit Of Dating A Foreign Girl

August 10, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Last night I went on a date with a short, slim, busty Turkish girl I met during the day last week.

Immediately it became clear that the verbal communication throughout the night would be limited, due to her poor English. At first, I was a bit frustrated—it's been awhile since I've dealt with this high of a language barrier. Then, something interested began to happen.

I slowly began to pay less and less attention to the words that were being exchanged. It was basic small talk about cultural differences that required little to no effort; witty teasing would only confuse my date at this point. Slowly I began to focus solely on the non verbal communication of the encounter.

Yes, this is a big part of any encounter for sure. Even when you're dealing with a girl you can communicate perfectly clearly with, non verbal communication plays a crucial role. But, even so, I tend to focus most of my energy on creating a fun verbal experience, with light touching here and there. In this case, however, I was dedicating nearly one hundred percent of my active attention to the non verbal aspects of the conversation. Things that flow in and out of my conscious mind in a normal conversation began to dominate my thoughts.

Eye contact, body posture, and voice tonality

At the first bar we went to, I was forced to be seated at a lounge type table facing her directly, because the bar was full. This made physical touching almost impossible. However, it brought these three non verbal factors to the forefront of the interaction.

The normal advice is strong eye contact, laid back posture, and deep slow voice tonality. And all of these things are correct to a certain extent, but you must be perceptive to your partner's state and vary these things accordingly. Simply leaning back, talking slowly, and holding eye contact all night long will most likely come off as very boring, if not altogether weird. I believe the key is to start by matching your partners energy level and then lead the way to the slow, seductive state mentioned above.

Dates will inevitably start with a bit of energy. Girls are almost always nervous, and guys tend to be, too. You're normally meeting someone you don't really know, but have some sexual interest in. This naturally brings jitters to the surface. You'll likely notice your date struggling to maintain eye contact, fidgeting around, and talking quite quickly at first. Rather than coming in and forcing yourself into a ultra suppressed state that's sure to conflict with your partner's current state, you should embrace the early jitters.

This doesn't mean being a nervous bitch, but rather starting the night with some energy. After you settle into a particular location and the initial small talk slows down, you should naturally transition your eye contact, body language, voice tonality, and energy to a more calm, seductive demeanor. Realize that the actual words being exchanged at this point are secondary to what you're communicating non verbally. It's far easier to show intent and create attraction through your body language than forcing weird sexual jokes or innuendos. It also won't risk breaking rapport or coming off as super "creepy".

I'll end by adding a couple of additional considerations. First, once the laid back vibe has been established you should add in some touching. Commenting on her fingernails, bracelets, or clothing is an easy way to naturally incorporate some touching. Also, you should still vary these non verbal factors as the night goes on. Intermittently injecting more energy into the interaction with an exciting story or just by changing your demeanor will keep your girl on her toes and keep the conversation fresh and fun.

Check out my Amazon bestseller The Book of Alpha for 30 rules that will change your life.

Read More: The Top 3 Muscle Building Mistakes Men Make

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Bang More Women From Match, eHarmony, OK Cupid, and POF

August 10, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

[image]

ROK's August sponsor is eDating Doc, a resource to help you get the most out of online dating sites like Match.com, eHarmony, OK Cupid & POF.

> If you're recently divorced or just got out of a long relationship and you're getting back into the game…
>
> Or maybe you're shy or just not into the bar scene…
>
> If you've tried online dating before but were not getting responses from the kind of women that you know you can handle if you can get her on the date…
>
> I can help.
>
> Here is a quick video about eDatingDoc.com:
>
> I can guide you through understanding the complete process you need to succeed at online dating and meet some great women on sites like Match.com, eHarmony, okCupid & POF.
>
> A sample of articles you'll find on the site:
>
> - My eHarmony date with this Ukranian Model (photo)
> - My 150 Date Challenge Reports
> - The Top 10 Dating Profile Examples for Men
>
> I was recently awarded "World's Best Online Dating Coach" at the PUA World Summit in San Francisco and was on the Katie Couric TV Show as their online dating expert. (I seriously thought I was gonna be ambushed on the Katie Show because of my 150 Date Challenge so I prepared but it turned out to be a cool experience.)

I'd like to thank eDatingDoc for his second sponsorship. If you are interested in becoming an ROK sponsor, visit our sponsorship page. You can also drop a couple bucks in our tip jar.

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why The American Economy Needs The Beta Male

August 11, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Our understanding of the beta male's status as an underappreciated, and downright derided figure in modern American society is reasonably well developed, but what is his true utility? While an answer to this question has been touched on before, I posit that an even clearer resolution can be found through an examination of the modern American system's consumerist imperative.

Our society starts adhering to this consumerist imperative by promoting the growth of rampant materialism amongst Americans from an early age, with the media as a main tool. Young Americans learn early on that "bigger is better," regardless of whether it actually is. A celebrity-centric, materialist culture heavily focused on spending and the trappings of it (as well as how to look like you have it) is the result. Add American culture's uniquely competitive and adversarial nature to this and you've got an even bigger phenomenon, with Americans all striving to outdo one another in this materialistic effort ("Keeping up with the Jones," or Kardashians) and spending money they don't have in the process.

Then the society uses a host of clichéd but heavily romanticized tropes about the "American experience" that are designed to reinforce all of this.

The first important trope is "The American Dream" (sizable suburban home, some land, fence, two $30,000+ cars, etc.), which is romanticized to an extent that many Americans can't be satisfied with anything less as a long term goal. That, combined with the promotion of the rabid materialism mentioned earlier, makes them susceptible to overspending in order to reach that goal, ensuring that they never have much to save. Of course, thanks to the promotion of the trope, most Americans still feel it is all worth it even if they can't afford it and go into debt.

Then you have another important trope involving work ethic. This stems from America's puritanical roots, and is a key reason why Americans work more and vacation less than almost anyone else in the developed world. This is the type of trope that keeps the average American worker bee laboring almost constantly.

All of these things, combined, help to ensure that the average American is always spending, never saving, and constantly producing with relatively less leisure. The wage slave, the majority of the USA's populace, can't save and thus can't stop working. The average American is, in essence, a slave to consumerism.

The tropes noted are particularly important, since they essentially cover the bases even for most of the minority of Americans who earn more (upper middle class or above) and could in theory end up saving more. Because materialism and consumerism are so heavily promoted and "bigger is always better," those who make more rarely use the surplus to save or build any real wealth—they just spend more.

Thus, you have a game in which nobody really wins. Even when you do “win” (read: succeed as a capitalist and gain a high income), you end up losing because you spend it all trying to outdo everyone else and live up to the materialistic ideals that have most likely been drilled into you (and if the consumerist impulse doesn’t get them, then absurdly high school debts will). In the end, even a good number of these high-earning individuals have nothing more to show for it than those below their income level (unless, of course, they’re aware of these tropes, which most Americans aren’t).

This is actually kind of an intricately brilliant formula, and would probably do wonders for anybody at the top of society looking to maintain hegemony. Such individuals may maintain an ethos of inter-generational wealth (read: controlled spending, prudent wealth-building investment, etc.) that preserves their status and allows them to maintain control of America’s financial and industrial life.

This entire system counts on one crucial piece, however, without which things would likely grind to a halt.

The Indispensable Beta Male

Seeing through the rigged nature of the sexual marketplace is as hard as seeing through the larger economic game. In fact, I think a lot of the tropes associated with our modern sexual marketplace are intimately related with the consumerist and materialist tropes we’ve been talking about. Yes, it is true that the vast majority of the grunt work that keeps the foundations of our society sound (e.g. infrastructure maintenance, defense, law enforcement, etc) is carried out by beta males. I’ve written about that before, but the beta’s usefulness to the economic system goes well beyond that.

Married men make for vastly superior wage slaves, and the beta male is the most common and most useful of all married men—they form the backbone of this entire system. Their instilled “duty” to their wives and family is easily co-opted and exploited to fit the rigged materialist game. Now it is not just about competing with other individuals, but rather outdoing other families (bigger houses, two or three nicer cars in driveway, bigger vacations, better and more expensive private schools, etc.). The element of family just makes the stakes a lot higher, and it is the beta’s support that makes such an increase possible: his labor and devotion facilitate vastly greater sums of expenditure (he’s got a lot more to pay for), while subsequently freeing those he supports (wife and children) to focus almost entirely on consumption. He’s doing all of the producing, ensuring that they are free to lay back and take more than they give without much thought.

The ability of a betatized and married man to see through the game and avoid its pitfalls is much lower than that of a disconnected single guy, especially when said single guy is anything like Roosh, Heartiste, or any other number of manosphere men. Because he is a devoted beta, he'll see few other options aside from slaving away into eternity and going into debt to provide the American Dream for those he loves, who are free to benefit immensely from said labor and consume absent much thought to how much of a contribution they themselves will make.

The game knows that the consumerist ethos it promotes is especially effective on women, who shop and consume more often and more leisurely than men do and are much more wary of their social status relative to one another (which means they'll want to compete more with other women, spending more in order to do so). Modern marriage serves to link the beta male to these women. Result? He is likely to face a lot more pressure from his wife to push further and further (bigger house, money for shopping, bigger cars), pressure he'd be less compelled to give in to as a carefree bachelor. Women are often a little less willing than the average guy to drop out of the consumer culture and generally more willing to invest deeply in it. By linking these women with devoted betas who are willing to provide at all costs, the game helps to keep men in the fold more firmly. If those men were on their own, they'd be far less likely to play.

The presence of a wife will also make it more likely that more of his income goes into consumer purchases than it would on his own. Women do much of the shopping in these families, and thus control how much of total household income is spent. All of this is key to keeping the worker bee in line, and also ensuring that there will be more future worker bees (kids = much more money spent come Christmas time and many other occasions = even more indebted and dependent worker bees = profit).

In the case of divorce? The game has a simple solution: shift laws in women's favor so as to guarantee that, more often than not, they will garner a larger sum of the male's income (alimony, punitive child support, etc.). The game realizes that women are more prone on average to their message of consumerism, so it seeks to ensure that a decent sum of money still remains in their hands in all scenarios.

Thus, the sexual marketplace is geared to create more married, beta males and, in doing so, shift a larger portion of the nation's money supply into the direct or indirect control of those more likely to spend it (women). The game needs devoted, married betas in order to work, and they're the main force holding it all together. If too many men start going their own way and forgoing marriage (and the expensive duties now intimately linked to the institution), the game might lack for players.

Will enough of the male population remain invested in order to keep everything going? This remains to be seen.

Read More: Why Money Can No Longer Save The Beta Male

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

The Visionary War Photography Of Alexander Gardner

August 11, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

In 1856, a thirty-five-year-old Scotsman named Alexander Gardner arrived in New York City to begin employment as a photographer for Matthew Brady's celebrated portrait studio. Gardner had worked hard all his life in Scotland, having been variously occupied as a jeweler, a journalist, and finally as a newspaper editor. But his hobby and passion was science, and in the evenings, he taught himself the rudiments of optics, chemistry, and mathematics. When the new art of photography came into its own in the 1840s and 1850s, it was only natural that Gardner would be drawn to the field, and he soon became as expert as any man could be in its techniques.

Matthew Brady was the closest thing America had to an official "court" photographer. He owned galleries in New York and Washington, had won recognition in international exhibitions, and was sought out by the rich and powerful in both America and Europe. Anyone who was anyone in the 1850s wanted to sit for a photograph in one of Brady's studios. One year after Gardner's arrival in America, Brady asked him to manage his studio in Washington, D.C. The fact that Brady had paid for his passage to New York, and had appointed him to such a position of responsibility so quickly, makes it likely that Brady had discovered him during one of his European trips and had been impressed by the Scotsman's intensity and self-taught knowledge.

Intense and visionary: Alexander Gardner in 1860

When the Civil War broke out in 1861, Brady was able to tap his government connections in Washington to get permission to accompany the Union armies in the field. Bored with the drudgery of static portrait photography, he was excited by the idea of using the new art form to record the events of history as they actually happened. Brady got what he asked for, but there was one unwelcome catch: he would have to finance his pet project himself. No government appropriation yet existed for such an untested enterprise. He was on his own.

War photography was not invented in the American Civil War. Battlefields of the Crimean War (1853-1856) had been photographed, but these were primitive and lifeless products, reflecting the experimental state of the art at the time. But improvements came quickly once Brady and Gardner applied themselves to solving the many technical difficulties presented by taking and developing photographs in the field. They invented a truly mobile photographic laboratory and darkroom, a horse-drawn wagon within which was contained all of the apparatus, chemicals, and equipment of the photographer's art. One wonders what the soldiers of the Army of the Potomac must have made of this strange new contraption which needed to be kept scrupulously light-proof at all times.

Gardner's images were exposed using the "wet-plate" method. Under yellow light, he or an assistant would coat a piece of clean glass with a mixture of chemicals called collodion (guncotton dissolved in alcohol and sulfuric ether, to which was added bromide and potassium iodide). The plate would be dried to exactly the right point, and then immersed in silver nitrate. It would then be quickly inserted into a sealed container and rushed to the camera outside the wagon, which had already been positioned on a tripod for the desired shot.

Any speck of dust, any particle of dirt, or any slight change in humidity could ruin a plate and void all the labor expended. It was a delicate, unforgiving process, requiring a deft hand and a sustained concentration. Exposure times were normally about ten seconds. The plate then had to be rushed back into the wagon immediately for developing. If the entire process took longer than ten or twenty minutes, the image could be ruined. As Brady and Gardner were spending their own money, they learned to work efficiently.

Bootless dead at Gettysburg

Gardner photographed many of the Eastern battlefields of the war, but parted with Matthew Brady in 1863. Setting up his own gallery in Washington, D.C., he recorded the dramatic events in the immediate aftermath of the war: Lincoln's funeral, the trials of the Lincoln conspirators, and the trial of the infamous Henry Wirz, the commandant of Andersonville Prison, who was executed in 1865 for his brutal treatment of Union prisoners. Gardner left Washington in 1867 to head for the western frontier, and took many memorable photographs there for the Union Pacific Railroad before his untimely death in 1882.

Confederate sharpshooter at Gettysburg

Gardner's unique contribution to the history of war photography appeared in 1866 with the publication of his two-volume Photographic Sketch Book of the War. No one had ever seen anything like it before. Each volume contained fifty full-page war photographs that had been taken by Gardner or his assistants; on facing pages were descriptions of the pictures' context and relevance. Properly speaking, these were not "combat photographs" in the sense of having been taken during the actual fighting; they were post-combat pictures intended to show the devastation that resulted from modern war.

In Gardner's day, there did not yet exist reliable techniques of mass producing photographic negatives for book publishing. What printers usually did was to hire an illustrator to make a lithograph, drawing, or engraving from an original photo, and then set this copy into a newspaper, magazine, or book. Gardner, ever the photographic purist, felt that this technique would diminish the visual impact of his war photos. So he made a remarkably bold decision: he would make his Sketch Book a collection of actual photographic positives, each individual photograph pasted carefully into its proper page.

Gardner's masterpiece, which appeared in 1866

The idea was audacious, expensive, and a commercial failure. Because of the unique way the Sketch Book was prepared, the two volume set sold for a price of $150, which was a huge sum for a book in the 1860s. Sales were poor. The prohibitive price, and a general feeling of war fatigue in the public, meant that Gardner's revolutionary book received little attention. It is estimated that only two hundred sets were printed, and for this reason it is today extremely rare. Doubtless it would today command a huge sum at auction. Inexpensive reprints began to appear in the 1950s, and these brought Gardner's groundbreaking work to greater appreciation after decades of undeserved obscurity.

Grim harvest: burial of the dead at Cold Harbor

What are we to make of these photographs? In Gardner's blasted buildings, shattered bridges, and open-mouthed corpses twisted in the agonies of death, we are immediately made aware of war's reality. There is something disturbing in seeing a bullet-ridden farmhouse set against a scene of forests and pastures, and Gardner had a talent for such juxtapositions. Siege works, mortars, and field guns are lovingly studied by his camera, only to be followed by stark images of the effects of these weapons of war. Gardner may not have invented war photography, but under his hand the art form reached a depth and maturity that has rarely, if ever, been equaled.

Among many haunting passages, the following particularly resonate. Opposite a picture of skeletons excavated at the battlefield of Cold Harbor, he writes:

> Among the unburied on the Bull Run field, a singular discovery was made, which might have led to the identification of the remains of a soldier. An orderly turning over a skull upon the ground, heard something within it rattle, and reaching for the supposed bullet, found a glass eye.

Opposite a photo of bloated and bootless Gettysburg dead, Gardner writes:

> Some lay stretched on their backs, as if friendly hands had prepared them for burial. Some were still resting on one knee, their hands grasping their muskets. In some instances the cartridge remained between the teeth, or the musket was held in one hand, and the other was uplifted as though to ward a blow, or appealing to heaven. The faces of all were pale, as though cut in marble, and as the wind swept across the battle-field it waved the hair, and gave the bodies such an appearance of life that a spectator could hardly help thinking they were about to rise to continue the fight.

Twentieth century combat photography has perhaps dulled our appreciation of Gardner's meditative and somber style. We now expect to be in the thick of the action as it happens. While this "real-time" technique has its undeniable merits, there is something to be said for a photograph taken immediately after a military engagement. Carnage is best expressed with a measure of reflection. Unlike real-time combat photography, Gardner's photos are artistic compositions, planned out in minute detail.

There is a quiet, haunting power in these photos, in these panoramas of ruin, these abandoned earthworks, and in these bearded men with melancholy faces leaning up against blasted buildings. They impart a stillness, an awe in the soul, that is not easily forgotten. Gardner's work was so far ahead of its time that his contemporaries lost sight of him. He stands as America's prophet of total war, a harbinger of the earth-shaking violence that would convulse the world in the century to come.

Read More: The Shortness Of Life

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Tell If A Woman Has Weird Tits (Without Seeing Them Nude)

August 11, 2014 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

I'm a boob guy. I love me some titties—always have and always will. Given that I also really like Asian women, I've had some pretty depressing times, as you can imagine. Asian flat-chestedness keeps bringing me back to white women time and time again. God damn you white women—I can't quit you. However, there have been a few occasions where both Asian and white women have severely punished me for my love of the jugs. I remember this one girl in particular from a few years ago…

She was just my type—only about 5'2 and 105 lbs—and had the most incredible set of "DD" tits that I have ever seen. The contrast between her huge rack and slim waist was completely boner-inducing. I was determined to get this chick and would do whatever it took to get her in bed. There's just something about petite women with big racks that I like. I have no explanation for it.

So, I get this girl to go out with me and it turns out she was pretty conservative. I think she had only fucked about 11 guys by the time I got to her (she was in her mid 20's). We had a great first date that ended with some messing around, but she kept stopping me whenever I tried to gain access to her titties. She was playing goalie with her bra strap and I was trying to pull some David Beckham shit to get around her impenetrable defense. I assume it's because we were sitting in her car in a busy parking lot that she became a little shy. I got a few good gropes from underneath her shirt, but alas, no real action. Ultimately, she declined the offer to come to my place and finish off the night because she had to work early the next day (she was taking the "I don't want you to think I'm a slut" thing seriously).

Undeterred, I stepped up the sexual innuendo in texting and continued the pursuit. I invited her over to my place for a movie night and she accepts. All goes well, I'm my usual charming self and she's eating it up. She's feeling a lot more relaxed than she was the first night and I'm closing in on the sex that I've been looking forward to so much.

Things started to get heated. I picked her up by her petite ass and she wrapped her legs around me as I carried her off to the bedroom. I fell backwards onto my bed while carrying her so she would end up on top. Now that I had her on top of me, I continued kissing her passionately and then aggressively took off her shirt. I got my first look at those titties in the bra—a somewhat grandma-ish looking bra, but really busty girls tend to have less selection when it comes to the more stylish types. I thought nothing of it and pressed forward. They still looked quite inviting and I wasn't going to let a bra slow me down. I was rock hard at this point and was going in for the kill.

Next, I reached around her back and unclipped her bra. Something odd happened after I unclipped the bra, though. It was sort of like a dam collapsing due to extreme water pressure from a raging river. I noticed that her tits weren't looking so good now that the bra strap wasn't holding everything together. Nevertheless, I proceeded and got her bra completely off. Finally, I was going to reap the benefits of my hard work. With her bra now off, I got my first good look at the titties I've been desiring so much…

She had what I unaffectionately call "forward-mounted armpit titties"—with stretch marks…

God dammit, I was so disappointed. It was like opening a Christmas present expecting a new Rolex and getting a lukewarm sack of reindeer shit instead.

I went ahead and fucked her anyway. But man… that shit was such a bummer. I tried not to touch them because they were so weird looking, but due to their size and awkwardness, they would bump into me all of the time. Not to mention, quickly after the bra came off, she squeezed them together and buried them in my face—I felt like I was being waterboarded. Things started off with her on top and her titties were wildly flopping around like a salmon caught in the mouth of a hungry grizzly bear. I closed my eyes and pretended to be really enjoying myself, but I could feel her damn nipples—which were roughly the size of of dice—grazing my chest as she was riding me. Distraught by this, I flipped her onto her back and went at it missionary for a bit, but her titties were sliding to the sides of her body and were now up against each of my arms. With each thrust I gave, her titties would collide with my arms, which were performing the integral task of supporting the rest of my upper body. My resolve was weakening at this point, so I flipped her over and finished off this fucking circus act with doggy style—finally achieving an out of sight, out of mind situation.

At this point, you're probably wondering what forward-mounted armpit titties are. Forward-mounted armpit titties (FMATs for short) are elongated saggy titties with nipples that point due south. What happens is, what were once normal titties, make the unfortunate transition into a pair of useless, unusable arms mounted to the front of a woman's chest. They become so droopy, that I speculate when a woman has them and goes without a bra for an extended period of time, she must lift the titties up and apply a generous layer of underarm deodorant onto what is known as the titty-pit crevice fold. This is to prevent copious amounts of sweat and body odor.

For the purposes of this article, I looked this girl up on social media to see what she looks like nowadays. She's gained quite a bit of weight, and also gained herself a fiancé. The guy looks happy, which is quite perplexing to me. I can just imagine all of his buddies giving him high-fives because he's marrying a chick with such big knockers. "Man, dude, she's got a great rack! Lucky bastard!" Ha! If they only fucking knew. Just wait until she pops out a kid in the next couple years. I could be Stevie Wonder lost in the woods on a moonless night and still see how terrifying those things are going to be after kids come into the picture.

After this incident, and haunted by other events similar to this one, I've started to become more cognizant of what a woman's chest looks like when clothed. I've developed a pretty good eye when it comes to recognizing oddball titties and have cut my Unfortunate Titty Encounter (UTE) rate down by about 65 percent when using my present system. The approximate 35 percent failure rate I still suffer from is mostly due to optimism. I will often think to myself, "They're probably really nice in reality, just give it a chance"—I'm a fucking fool.

Anyway, the rest of this article will focus on the different types of weird titties you may be exposed to, and how to recognize them before you find yourself caught in a booby trap like in the above situation.

Spotting The Dreaded Forward-Mounted Armpit Titties

FMAT’s are most common on women that have kids, have lost a bunch of weight, or just have bad titty genetics. I’m guessing the girl in the previously mentioned story just had bad genetics, or they developed very fast when she was in her teens. I don’t believe she had any sort of massive weight loss in her past. I’ve sort of developed the habit of not listening to women when they talk to me, so maybe I missed something. Age is certainly a factor as well, but I don’t fuck old women so we won’t be discussing them. If a woman is over 30, just assume her tits are terrible.

The above story took place in the winter months, so I never had a good shot of cleavage—only sweaters and turtlenecks—but the signs were still there. A key sign of FMAT’s is when a woman’s bra straps dig into her skin—especially on her back. You can see this when a busty girl wears a tight shirt. Her bra is working overtime to keep that sloppy mess all held together. Signs of stretch marks when cleavage is exposed is a damn good sign too. FMAT’s also tend to just “sit lower” when in a bra.

Observe the following four women:

Girl number one is just another one of the millions of classy young ladies we have in this great country. She has an Unfortunate Titty Encounter ratio of 4/10. They do not appear to be fake, and they fill the bra quite well. They will definitely droop a bit once unveiled, but it should be an overall pleasant experience. The problem is you would have to listen to her talk in order to get to them. No fucking thank you.

Number two has an overall classy appearance in this photo, but judging by her tits you're running about UTE ratio of 5/10. It can go either way with her. They appear to sit quite low and her titties seems to fill the bra, as opposed to the bra supporting the titties.

Number three has a UTE ratio of 7/10. Her body is a little strange-looking overall, but more than anything else, there appears to be significant titty separation. You're running a fairly high risk with this one. Once the bra is unsnapped, her titties will most likely dump off to the sides.

Number four… Jesus Christ, lady. Her titties are much like the arms of a Tyrannosaurus Rex: fucked up looking, serve no purpose, and attached to a very large carnivore. These are the kind of titties that will make dogs growl, babies cry, and die-hard Christians question their faith in God . She's obviously an old bat and—due to the fact that she somehow thought it was a good idea to wear that shit—most likely an alcoholic with a penchant for prescription drug abuse. The only reason I put this trashy broad on here is so you can see exactly what number one will look like in 20 years.

Another very strong warning sign is excessive jiggling. All natural titties jiggle, but some more than others.

There’s a normal amount of jiggle:

Then there’s FMAT jiggle:

Pay close attention to these signs, and your UTE risk will be greatly diminished with regards to FMAT’s.

Party Hat Titties

Party hat titties, as you can see from the above picture, are cone-shaped titties. These can be hit or miss. Truthfully, some can actually be pretty nice, but I've noticed that size plays a big part in how good they can look. Generally the smaller, the better. "B" cups seem to be the sweet spot with party hat titties. If they're on the larger side of a "C" cup, they can have really big areolas. This coupled with their pointy shape makes for some weird-ass looking titties.

Looking at the above pictures, the Asian girl is a 70/30 split—70 percent they will be nice, and 30 percent they will fall to the sides and poke one of your eyes out once her bra is off. I would definitely go for it since they appear to be a small "B" cup, and she's otherwise attractive.

UTE risk is fairly low at 3/10.The white girl has a 60/40 split in the opposite direction. Given that we're looking at, what is in my estimation, a "C" cup. The chances for droopy party hat titties are a bit on the high side. And while she isn't fat, she is a bit husky (judging by the waistline). She has the average American girl body (going by a realistic—not obese—definition of average). This was the only picture I could find of her, so it's hard to gauge one way or the other for sure. Based on this one pic though, I would probably wouldn't take the chance. With a UTE risk ratio of 6/10, it's getting a bit risky.

Tubular breasts would fall under this category as well. Google pics of those when you're not eating. All tubular breasts are 10/10 on the UTE scale.

Tupperware Titties

I'm not a fan of fake tits at all. I thought I was, they look okay, but my opinion changed after the first time I got my hands on a pair. Women's personalities are phony enough as it is, I don't want to play with phony body parts too. Not to mention, women that have fake tits are usually complete trash, fucked in the head, and dreadfully insecure.

If you're in a relationship with a woman under 35 years old and she gets Tupperware titties—she will be dumping you or cheating on you within six months. She doesn't care that you like her the way she is now, because she doesn't "feel" comfortable with her body and she's not "happy." What she's really trying to say is, "Not enough guys are giving me attention or trying to fuck me." Once she gets her bolt-ons, and the thirsty hordes of dudes start giving her more attention… God fucking help you, son. I hope you didn't pay for them either because some other guy is going to be motorboatin' all over your money.

If a woman is single and gets Tupperware titties, you can take her sexual partner count from the two years prior to getting implants, and multiply it by six to find out how many guys she will fuck in the two years after she has them. So, if a woman has only slept with three guys in the two years before getting implants, that number will be a minimum of 18 in the two years after. Her small or misshapen titties are the only thing that's holding her back from being the slut she's always wanted to be. Once that is rectified, gasoline won't get pumped as much as her vagina will.

Spotting Tupperware titties isn't terribly difficult. Lack of mobility is the number one sign that they're fake. Normal titties jiggle, fake titties don't. If cleavage is showing, take a good look at the right hand titty at approximately the 1:00 o'clock position. If it looks full, perfectly round, or somewhat hardened—then you know that they're fake. See the four women below.

Not only does super slut number one look like she would steal your American Express card while you are sleeping, she also has Tupperware titties. By observing the fullness and rock hard look shown at the 1:00 o'clock position, it becomes perfectly clear that she has had some 'work done'. It also appears that her plastic surgeon accidentally installed a worm on the left titty.

Number two is the same. Perfectly round with no separation and a hardened look.

Number three's are real. The bikini strap is wrapped around her neck as opposed to over her shoulders. This is giving her titties an almost fake look due to the amount of support they are receiving.

Number four the whore has real tits as well. Looking at the 1:00 o'clock position, the area seems somewhat collapsed. This is a clear indicator of natural boobs. She looks like she would suck a mean dick too.

Another sign a woman has Tupperware titties is that she will ask you if you want to see them. Whores, especially of the attention variety, are more than happy to show off their fake tits to anyone that will look. This includes showing them to both men and women.

In Closing

I should probably feel bad for writing this article, but I don't. Women tend to be outspoken and quite harsh about making fun of things men can't control. Things such as height, baldness, hard times with employment, and—as the occasional female commenter here on ROK reminds us—small dicks. I tend to take the high road on these matters, personally. Making fun of women for things out of their control is, well, a womanly thing to do. We're given what we're given, and we have to do our best to maximize our potential with what we have.

However, sometimes you just gotta say "screw the high road" and tell it like it is. Men like weird titties about as much as women like balding part-time minimum wage bag boys at the grocery store. The difference is that bag boys wear uniforms and can clearly be seen doing what they do. Spotting bad boobs is an art form, and it's an art form that all men should know how to do well.

Read More: This Weird Metaphor Brainwashes Men Into Becoming White Knights With Low Standards

A.V. Yader
A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

Jezebel Staff Revolts Against Greedy Boss Nick Denton Because Of Animated GIF Trolling

August 11, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Jezebel staff members are so angry at their homosexual boss, Nick Denton, that they have launched an open revolt against him and Gawker management.

The problem started with 4chan'ers who have been recently trolling Jezebel's comments section with gory and pornographic animated GIFs. The management gave some promises to fix the problem, but months later it remains. This has created an unsafe work environment for Jezebel staff (yes, that's the angle they are going with). The girls felt that the only way to solve this problem is to band together and revolt against their boss with a public letter. Here are some excerpts:

> [Animated gif trolling] is profoundly upsetting to our commenters who have the misfortune of starting their day with some excessively violent images, to casual readers who drop by to skim Jezebel with their morning coffee only to see hard core pornography at the bottom of a post about Michelle Obama, and especially to the staff, who are the only ones capable of removing the comments and are thus, by default, now required to view and interact with violent pornography and gore as part of our jobs.
>
> […]
>
> We receive multiple distressed emails from readers every time this happens, and have been forwarding them to the architects of Kinja and to higher ups on Gawker's editorial side for months. Nothing has changed. During the last staff meeting, when the subject was broached, we were told that there were no plans to enable the blocking of IP addresses, no plans to record IP addresses of burner accounts.

> […]
> In refusing to address the problem, Gawker's leadership is prioritizing theoretical anonymous tipsters over a very real and immediate threat to the mental health of Jezebel's staff and readers.

I'm going to do a solid for the Jezebel staff in announcing the following: Nick Denton doesn't give a damn about you, your cause, feminism, equality, or the sexism boogeyman. The reason he's not making any changes to reduce the trolling is because it would also reduce the number of page views that the Gawker empire receives. As you know, page views are critically important for blogs to make money, which is why the internet is swarmed with Buzzfeed, Upworthy, and Gawker clones whose only goal for existence is to get you to click while flushing any notion of an enlightened or rational culture down the drain.

Is Nick Denton the greediest homosexual in America?

Last month we reported how Jezebel picked a pretty white girl to become editor instead of a more qualified black candidate that was less pleasing on the eyes and less advertiser friendly. How many data points does Jezebel staff and readers need to encounter before understanding that Denton only cares about making enough money so that him and his fiance can live in luxury and travel to exotic locations around the world?

Black hole of hypocrisy

Jezebel is one of the most vehement anti-male sites on the internet. They have been quick to publish mythical notions of patriarchy, street harassment, and "racial micro-aggressions." Yet who are they hoping will save them from the horrible 4chan trolls and their animated gifs? Men. Read this excerpt from their letter again:

> We receive multiple distressed emails from readers every time this happens, and have been forwarding them to the architects of Kinja and to higher ups on Gawker's editorial side for months. Nothing has changed. During the last staff meeting, when the subject was broached, we were told that there were no plans to enable the blocking of IP addresses, no plans to record IP addresses of burner accounts. Moderation tools are supposedly in development, but change is not coming fast enough.

As a member on RVF pointed out, their saviors are the very same "brogrammers" who they mock. Not even two weeks ago they made a broad attack on men in tech for saying "sexist bullshit." But when their little dollhouse is attacked, it's those same men they hope will help them. Men are the horrible enemy until they are needed to fix the clogged toilet.

Mike from Danger & Play points out yet another hypocritical point concerning the Jezebel staff:

It took the cowards at @Jezebel months to call out a misogynistic boss who has created a hostile working environment: jezebel.com/we-have-a-rape...

For a group of gals who are hyper vigilant about misogyny and sexism, they sure did seem to give their homosexual boss a pass for a long time before they spoke up about something that so affected their ability to work. Did fellow Gawker writer Nitasha Tiku give the same pass for Pax Dickinson when they launched a witch hunt to get him fired from Business Insider? Nope.

Under Denton's watch, they severely damaged Pax's career, but it's okay for Denton to allow posting of pornographic imagery that have so macro-aggressed and triggered his sensitive female staff and readers in the name of making money. Nitasha was quick and ruthless to launch her dubious crusade against Pax, but it took several months of looking at hardcore porn and gore for the Jezebel gals to say something about their own treatment. This tells you how serious they are about their cause when a needed salary is involved to upgrade their Apple laptop and iPhone.

If you're wondering how Denton will respond to this problem as his flagship feminist site, just ask yourself the following question: what will put more money in his pocket? Only if the entire Jezebel site is threatened with a mass staff or reader exodus will he make any changes that completely stop the animated gif trolling. Until then, he has made it very clear how much he cares about women and the feminist cause. While a few misfits are trolling Jezebel, Nick Denton continues to troll America with web sites that are nothing more than a means to enrich himself and his young homosexual lover. Time will tell if Gawker fans realize the same.

Read Next: Jezebel Writer Lindy West Goes Berserk Because She No Longer Fits In Airplane Seats

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

13 Things I Learned From The Wolf Of Wall Street

August 11, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

I am sure by now you have all watched the movie “The Wolf of Wall Street.” If you haven’t seen it, it’s one of the funniest true stories ever told—an amazing and eye-opening testament to the accomplishments and failures of one man, Jordan Belfort. Most films can’t hold my attention on the first run through, and never merit another glance, but in this case, many more subtle aspects of the story struck me on a second viewing.

Most people would write off Mr. Belfort as a mindless, greedy, drug- and sex-addicted con artist with borderline personality disorder that deserved every day he spent in jail. However, taking the red pill opens the mind to multiple alternatives. In addition, having watched the most excellent Straight Line Persuasion seminars that Jordan has released subsequent to his jail term (they retail for $2000 but I am sure you can purloin a copy if you are smart), I see his adventures in a whole new light.

The Incredible Power Of Game

Jordan used game for selling purposes rather than sex, but the same rules apply. There is nothing new about game and most of the PUA techniques were developed by salesmen, businessmen, politicians, and diplomats centuries ago.

Anyone Can Develop Game

Jordan takes low life street kids and turns them into hotshot stock brokers earning $1M a year. With game in either a sexual or commercial context, you are appealing to both a person’s emotion and logic, thus aligning yourself with their belief system, so that they simply have to act on your suggestions. You have so thoroughly disarmed them that it would be unnatural for them to not follow your wishes.

It Is Quick And Easy To Learn

The Straight Line Persuasion techniques that Jordan gives over 10 x 40 minute seminars are an incredible tool. With a little practice in a matter of weeks, anyone can improve in leaps and bounds. I’d say it’s worth every penny, although I was lucky enough to watch a friend’s copy. Like anything though, it requires dedication and practice.

You Must Be Ethical

From listening to his personal explanations in the seminars and also watching the movie, I get the impression that much of what he did was not exactly intentional. Sure he was selling investment garbage, engaging in insider trading, and evading taxes, but much of this is good business sense, rather than a deliberate intention to actively con people out of their money.

There is however a fine line and if what you are selling is garbage, you may well find yourself in hot water down the track. In Jordan's case he freely admits that he should have put more staff into real investment roles and less into sales and seems to show real remorse for the losses he caused people. He was young and stupid and discovered an incredible sales technique. Had he used those skills in a more honest way, in finance, technology, government, or industry, he could have been a tremendous force for good.

The same rules obviously apply to sexual interactions also. If you are that good at game, why bang married women, single mothers, and virgins (unless you intend to go LTR)? If you are not that good at game, then get good at it.

You Can Bounce Back

After two years in jail he lost all his money, had his hot model wife divorce him, and still carried an indictment to repay some $100M to "defrauded" investors, Jordan managed to bounce back. I've been through some rough patches myself and as the famous saying goes: "If you are going through hell, keep going." I found myself the last few weeks doing things by remote control, quite depressed about the outcome of a recent business situation, and in a week, when all looked hopeless I've banked $10k and quite a part of that recovery is down to watching his seminars.

The Abundance Mentality

I've gone from rags to riches and back again. Slept in my car, run up crazy credit card debts, cleared them all and banked seven figures in a year – AND YET – I never managed to fully harness the abundance mentality. Jordan explains the 3 ways that people do things:

1. In ignorance of fear. This person is your typical minimum wage grunt. They are too scared to move beyond their comfort zone and thus they won't even consider anything. They are unaware that they are afraid. Successful people that fail can often slip into this group later in life, as they just can't face another failure.

2. In fear but do it anyway. This applies to a lot of rich people who wind up miserable. They know they are scared but they push against it, and thus they create dramatic situations, even though their material needs are met.

3. By consciously understanding that fear comes from childhood ideals. In school if we are "good enough" we make the football team or play the lead role in the school play and thus we are "popular." If we are not good enough we don't get those cherished roles and thus we are not as popular. However in the real world, which involves more than a few hundred class mates, popularity is not defined by material success. Even in school there is the distinction between the underachieving fat kid that everyone teases, the one that is the bully and the happy-go-lucky kid that everyone likes for some mysterious reason, even though he is useless. What is going on here?

People will like you for who you are, for your charisma and "game," not for your material successes. In fact in the real world, success will tend bring attention from both haters and those that idolize you, neither of which creates the personal human interaction and validation we all need to some degree. Thus there is nothing to be afraid of. Hardly any ventures are life and death situations, and people will still like you personally, even if your projects fail.

No Means Yes

Jordan's sales techniques involve looking for a soft "NO" as an opening of the game yet to come. You are expecting no. When you hear it, you smile and engage. This aligns very nicely with PUA. If she says no sex tonight, you know her panties are already moist. With this kind of mindset prepared, then you simply start what he calls "looping," whereby you bring the interaction back to the straight line from A to B, on your journey to the close.

Looping essentially ignores the customer, date, or client who says no, by agreeing with them: "I hear what you are saying, now let me just add…"

Tonality

The tone of your voice is very important. We take for granted our tone of voice and yet we fail to learn simple techniques to keep an interaction upbeat and going along a straight line towards our goal.

Jordan explains this in clear simple terms. You can create scarcity (i.e. catch their attention) with a soft, deep whispered voice, this draws the person in—you have a secret they need to be in on. You can create sympathy and empathy by frowning and being downbeat. You can create confidence by being up beat and assertive, but without implying too much authority. In this age of social media and entitlement, no one wants to be bossed around, especially in a sales situation or on a date. Imposing authoritative tones of voice shows weakness and can scare the person off, as does bragging about yourself or trying to impress. You can disarm a person by being jovial and light hearted, sounding inquisitive and using a higher more frivolous tone of voice, like a child does, or a buddy at the bar does.

Each tone of voice used correctly, relaxes and brings the person into their own comfort zone and allows them to make decisions based on their own logic, emotion and belief system. You should greet everyone as if they are your long lost friend. Try it; it works incredibly because they sense that you are not only happy to see them, but relaxed and comfortable with yourself. Thus they relax.

People Are Scared

We are trained, almost brain washed, from a young age not to trust strangers, not to take quick decisions and so forth and yet in this day and age we are bombarded from all sides with offers and information. This makes people even more closed and guarded. It also means that when you have the skills to open them, the world is your oyster. When you open a person, they will relax and trust you and love that endorphin feeling they get from being at ease. You can then influence them to their benefit and also to your own.

You Must Close BUT Don’t Be A Con Man

I can see that once you practice and use these techniques they can be very powerful. Obviously there is far more to it than I can explain in a quick article, but you have the basics. This can be great in almost any setting. People are afraid to take risks, they don’t want the hassle, and they want to remain in their comfort zone. Through tonality, language, logic and empathy we can be a positive force and benefit to ourselves and those around us. The most rewarding thing is connecting with people.

“What’s the worst that can happen?” = your risks are covered.

“Give me a chance and your only regret will be we didn’t do this a year ago.” = I’m fantastic.

“Sounds fair enough?” = We’re both reasonable people.

“I pride myself in…” = You can trust me.

“Have you got a minute” = Listen to me (of course everyone has a minute, great opener for the phone).

Fun And Drugs In Moderation Are Okay

The prolific use of coke and pills seems to fuel the first half of the story, but later it winds into a degenerate mess. One thing you can say about his story is that he lived the life. That is what it is for, it should be enjoyable.

Quit While You’re Ahead

He had a good chance for an out, but didn’t take it, instead confronting the impending legalities head on.

Too Much Too Soon

As a final closing note, going back to the movie, I think if you watch carefully you can trace Jordan’s downfall to his second wife, a blonde Budweiser model, who was obviously in it for the riches. On the other hand his first wife (young love), seems to feed him ideas and direction, even though she’s only a 5-6.

What’s more, I’d say that the commotion of trying to setup a lavish family, hold down a wife and kids, with all the trappings of expensive weddings, a mansion, a yacht and so forth, most likely distracted Jordan from what otherwise might have been something akin to Goldman Sachs today. All he had to do was realize that his company needed to change up a gear by hiring real analysts, traders, money managers, etc. He was clearly not well educated or versed in anything other than the sales side of the financial industry and although he became wealthy through his excellent sales skills, he also became distracted by his blonde pussy, leaving his business to run full steam onto the rocks. This isn’t the only reason, but it’s definitely one of them.

Read Next: 5 Questions With Captain Capitalism

#WomenAgainstFeminism Is Typical Female Attention-Whoring

August 12, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

A curious yet inevitable trend has been circulating recently: women speaking out against feminism, centered around the hashtag #womenagainstfeminism.

And by speaking out, I mean of course that these women have resorted to the tried and true tactic of useless activism by writing something on a piece of a paper, taking a picture of themselves holding said piece of paper, and then sticking it on the internet where people can fawn over their bravery and cute faces at the same time… all done within five minutes from the safe convenience of their bedroom.

Gee, I wonder why she's holding her sign awkwardly off to the side instead of comfortably in front of her?

Obviously, opinions on the matter differ: for some people, this represents the pendulum swinging away from the west's bizarre social experiments with the sexes and back toward normalcy, with women finally accepting that they are, limitations and all, simply women. For others, this is just a cynical and hollow plea for attention. I'm firmly in the latter camp, for three main reasons.

1. Writing on a piece of paper doesn't do or mean anything

This stupid, narcissistic, useless trend of writing on paper and taking a picture of yourself holding it up is one of the most embarrassing fads of the moment. That being said, I understand its appeal to the insincere people who do it. In one fell swoop, they get to show off their humanity and worldliness by announcing their support for [INSERT] cause; and they get to show the world how handsome or cute or sexy they are. It's almost like a quickie dating profile: these gals get to show potential penises both their heart and their tits.

Writing on a piece of paper and taking a picture of yourself is one step above clicking a button on the internet. Remember the brief fad of #bringbackourgirls, a "campaign" of sign tweeters who were protesting a militia group in Africa kidnapping several young women and girls for slavery? The first lady of the United States even got in on that action.

Remember how, because of #bringbackourgirls, the world moved into Nigeria and saved all those young women and rainbows appeared over the house of every brave soul who wrote a hashtag sign? No, you don't remember it because that never happened. Boko Haram is still active (and kicking the Nigerian military's ass by the sounds of it) and all those girls are, as you read these very words, being raped and forced to take care of the militia fighters who stole them from their families… and it's likely that many (if not most) have been impregnated by their kidnappers. And just to rub some salt into the wound, Boko Haram even released a video mocking the hashtag.

The first lady of the president of one of the most powerful nations on the planet couldn't get anything done about an issue the public overwhelmingly condemned by writing on a sign and posting it on the internet. What are a bunch of random semi-cute-to-really-cute girls going to achieve with #womenagainstfeminism? Nothing. It's a hollow gesture, intended to make the chick posting the picture feel good.

2. It continues to give women all the power in the discourse

I don't like the Men's Rights Movement. That isn't a personal attack against anyone in the MRM, or those who support it (you can read my personal attack here though). I really would like to support the MRM. Yet I cannot take seriously a movement which purports to be concerned with men's issues when they not only give women a very prominent platform in it, but essentially allow women to control the narrative about the issues.

The most mainstream discussion of the crap men have to put up with in the modern culture has centred around a book written by a woman: Men On Strike, by Helen Smith. Mrs. Smith got to do a lot of interviews, she got a lot of press in a variety of mainstream sources (with varying degrees of vitriol), and the men her book was about were shunted off to the side as if they were kids who wouldn't understand what the "adults" were talking about. The message was made clear: men themselves are not allowed to talk about the problems society inflicts upon them. All problems concerning the sexes must be filtered through a woman's mouth.

#womenagaisntfeminism is creating that same dynamic. The movement receives a fair amount of press simply because that it's now women who are saying there's a problem. News sites are talking about them, and asking just why these women are against feminism. That's a huge amount of recognition when compared to the fact that Return Of Kings (and the many blogs and websites with content similar to ours) is under an unofficial blackout when it comes to mainstream sources talking about us. Once again: the problems created by feminism and similar doctrines can only be discussed in the setting of women talking to other women, the sex which is minimally affected by feminism. Every woman creating a #womenagaisntfeminism sign steals a bit of our thunder, further weakening our voice and legitimacy. Their hollow cheerleading is doing men far more harm than good.

Loading...

As evidenced by the complete and utter (and now, forgotten) failure of #bringbackourgirls, women don't care about results. That's not the point of their hashtag activism. They just want that five-minute feel-good endorphin rush and some back-patting attention (preferably from men). As a man, a good measure of my prosperity, and the prosperity of my potential sons, depends upon pushing back against feminism. We men actually have skin in the game, and we have a lot to lose… to say nothing of how much men have already lost to the insanity of feminism. The #womenagainstfeminism have no investment in the debate, and for them it doesn't actually matter if feminism continues or not. They will prosper either way, as women always have.

3. They are not actually against feminism

Feminism is a tricky word. It has a hundred different definitions, mostly because very few people besides its critics want to admit what feminism really is at its core.

Feminism is simply, and completely, about maximizing the transfer of resources from men to women.

Said resources encompass several things, both tangible and intangible: money, job opportunities, respect, power, love, etc. Feminism is about giving women as much as possible at the expense of men. That's it, the nitty gritty so to speak. Some of the #womenagainstfeminism mention equality on their signs, but what does equality mean? It means a level playing field, with no inherent biases or advantages to either sex.

And on a level playing field men would dominate. That's not theoretical either, just simple fact. There's a reason why, since the dawn of the species, men have been the builders, hunters, workers, and creators, and women were the ones who kept the home clean and raised the kids. Men dominate women in every category. If we were truly to eliminate feminism, the vast majority of women would have to revert to being submissive housewives referring to their husbands authority… or face destitute spinsterhood.

Gone would be the university admittance favouritism for women, and the easy humanities courses which enable them to actually get a degree in the first place. Gone, the lowered entry standards for jobs and careers—a woman who wanted to be a soldier would actually have to keep up with the men in her platoon, instead of being coddled through training (and in an truly equal society, women would be conscripted for the military: though realistically we men wouldn't allow that for a variety of reasons). Even if a woman wanted to do something simple, like work in a business, she'd have to put in the same hours and dedication a man does or risk being fired; no more clocking out at 4 pm sharp if there's still work to do, no more constantly-tolerated sick days because her menses are crippling her (or for the more likely reason, that she went out last night and got, like, toootally wasted).

I'm fairly amused that this anti-feminist is apparently not wearing a bra

There would be no more holding their marriage hostage just because women today know they will financially rape a man in court if he has the nuts to divorce her. If she becomes fat, or lazy, or no longer has sex with her husband, then he would have the right to divorce her and get back all the finances he put into the marriage… and likely any children created during the union, since the child would go to the most capable parent and it's long been proven that single mothers are much worse at raising their children than single fathers.

There would be no more partying away her twenties. No more hookup culture, no more spring break trips with the gurrrls to Mexico or Italy; in an equal society, those types of women would be shunned and would wind up marrying only the most pathetic of men (though a very few might luck out and find a rich dude with a cuckold fetish). Men would no longer feel compelled to marry sluts, and all the safety nets of being a slut would be gone.

How many of these women would actually be all for that? Because that's what a world without enforced feminism would look like; not because of the evil patriarchy, but simply because men are better than women at most things. These chicks say they're against feminism, but they and their proud feminist sisters are still enjoying the exact same benefits that feminism has bestowed upon them, all the while avoiding the responsibilities those benefits would entail if they happened to be men. If it came right down to it, would #womenagainstfeminism actually put her money where her mouth was? Of course she wouldn't.

Remember the golden rule about women: Judge them only by what they do, not what they say. Stupid signs posted on the internet included.

#womenagainstfeminism, no matter their reasoning for it, will only cause more problems for the men who are trying to fix our broken cultures. Cheerlead for us all you like ladies, but stop trying to put yourself at the front of this debate. Only men can fix what's wrong between the sexes, and by hijacking the spotlight for themselves these women who are supposedly "on men's side" only ensure that the discourse will remain solely between women, and that men's opinions on all these matters which grievously affect him will continue to be ignored and belittled. Women who continue to side with men simply for the attention only ensure that there will be no healing, and one day men will simply stop attempting to find a peaceful and fair resolution, and start exploring darker avenues to getting what they want. We should all fear that day.

Read More: Top 10 Pictures From The Growing "Women Against Feminism" Movement

Billy Chubbs
Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

The Aftermath Of My Girlfriend Getting Raped

August 12, 2014 | by Reinhardt | Link | Original Link

In society, one of the most controversial subjects we have to deal with is false rape accusations. That's when a woman deliberately accuses a man of raping her when he has done no such thing. This can occur for a multitude of reasons. Perhaps she wants to defame the character of the man because of his social status (CEOs, professional athletes, high ranking military officers, etc.). Perhaps a failed relationship aroused feelings of scorn. Perhaps it's because she feels guilty of spreading her legs too fast to a guy she just met and immediately regrets it. This is arguably the most common.

Regardless, this has happened often enough to the point where debates rage on discussing whether or not rape actually occurred. Was there really consent? Is this girl just attention whoring? I personally ask these questions now whenever I hear about sexual assault in the workplace. In addition to an innocent man getting sent to prison; the worse thing about false rape accusations is that the real victims suffer. And that is what I want to talk about. I had to deal with this with a girlfriend of mine.

Quick Background

Immediately following high school, I met a girl through a mutual acquaintance. We ended up dating and getting serious after a while. A little over a year into the relationship it happened. She was walking home from work (she was a waitress) and was attacked at knife point. There was no alcohol involved on her part. She was dragged into the nearby woods. I do not want to go into too many details on how bad it was, but to this day the scars are still visible.

Mental anguish

When someone gets raped, there are a barrage of emotions that goes through the head. My girlfriend had felt intense anger, and fear. There were fantasies about killing the man who attacked her and random bouts of anger thrown at me every now and then. She also felt utter humiliation. The act of someone beating you and forcing their privates inside of you garners feelings of helplessness.

The worse part was the fear. When I first saw her that night she was frantic about everything. It made me feel weak and emasculated that I wasn't there to protect her, despite not even within walking distance of her. Her attacker has not been caught yet, meaning there is the persistent fear of wondering whether this guy know where she is and if he is still watching her. She no longer works at the restaurant as a waitress.

My girlfriend had felt tarnished and filthy. She never got pregnant but did come down with an STD. It should be noted that I was the first guy she had sex with. This means her thoughts and feelings of "spoiled goods" were only enhanced. There are feelings of shame as well. Aside from me, two friends, some family members, and police authorities, no one else knows what happened to her. She thinks no one will take her seriously. "Rape happens a lot anyway right? I'm not anything new nor special. They probably won't believe me anyway." These were her words. She prolonged therapy for several months because she kept questioning the integrity of therapist. Suppressing these feelings enhances the mental anguish even more. It also makes the triggers worse.

Intimacy, Sex, and Triggers

When rape occurs, there are primarily two paths that the victim tends to follow in regards to sex. The first is that they become more sexual. Promiscuity and cheating for example can run rampant in some sexual assault victims. I believed some of this to be about the need to regain control and the loss of trust and respect for the opposite sex. These assertions were confirmed by some of the trauma therapist I spoke to. This really sucks for the sexual assault victims and the people they end up in a relationship with but there is absolutely nothing you can do about it.

The second path is the complete opposite, meaning the loss of interest in intimacy or sex. This is what happened with my girlfriend. I of course understood the loss in sexual desire and this did not bother me. What did hurt was the loss of intimacy. I remember one night when I tried to do the nose rubbing and kissing thing she loved while rubbing her hair softly. She responded by batting me away like a fly. I unintentionally activated triggers. The memory of the attacker forcing her head to the ground.

Triggers are an interesting thing. It's one thing to try to control what people say out of fear of offending them a la today's overly politically correct environment. It's another to go through something extremely traumatic and have to shut down emotionally so that you can avoid having to experience that pain again.

What can you do?

There are things you can do to help the situation if you are dating or marrying a girl that has been raped or gets raped during your relationship. This excludes your girl coming home and telling you she "made a mistake because she was drunk."

1. While she doesn't need to go to therapy right away, and you shouldn't force her, you need to make sure she does at some point. If not then she will begin dissociating and the fallback from triggers will be tremendous.

2. There is nothing wrong with feeling angry or melancholic. There is even nothing wrong with tears. In fact, you could be making your girlfriend or wife more comfortable talking to you about it. Speaking of that, make sure you let her know that she can talk about it, but only when she is ready and on her terms.

3. Men are protectors so yes, feelings of shame, anger, emasculation, etc. are all normal too. You may possibly need some people to talk to as well. If you have any hobbies you like to engage in then make some time for that as well.

4. Don't take it personally if she flips out on you or cries at random times. This is more of a good thing because pain is being let out.

In regards to the rapist, don't worry about hunting the guy down yourself. This does nothing but indulge your ego. It will not make anyone feel better. Just see to it that the authorities punish him.

It is unfortunate to say but in spite of this, your relationship may not survive. Mine deteriorated after six months. We still talk sometimes, but the sunny disposition is no longer there. She will never be the same person again.

Read Next: What Real Rape Culture Looks Like

Reinhardt
Reinhardt is an old soul looking to make his impact on the world. His interest include business, robotics, engineering, fitness, swimming, and more.

8 Essential Steps For When You Get Dumped

August 12, 2014 | by darkjohanson | Link | Original Link

If you are neither seeing anyone on the side nor have a pipeline of prospects, getting dumped can leave you in a big rut: your ego takes a hit and negativity leaks all around you. Here are some of the hard truths I push myself to see when that happens. Hopefully this can help you get back on track in times of need.

1. Realize that she does not give a shit about you

I don't care how heartfelt the breakup's delivery was or how long she cried, actions speak louder than words: she broke up with you. She just didn't think you were worth having in her life as a partner anymore. She left you sitting in the curb, and there is no resuming that road trip now.

If you struggle to believe this, remember how you feel when you dump someone: most of the time, you just can't give a shit anymore and want to get rid of them. In a few rare occasions you are genuinely sad it couldn't work out and feel sorry for her, but still plow forward regardless. Except for pity, she feels nothing for you, so get it into your head right this moment: She does not care about you and whoever tells you different is lying. Stop listening.

2. Detox emotionally

Remember the basics: you are the only one you can really rely on. At the end of the day, as long as you keep yourself alive, you are still standing. Promise yourself you will never give up and you will never stop working on improving yourself.

Look at the mirror and reflect on all you have been through. Will this finally stop you? Impossible. In the grand scheme of things this means nothing. Down the line, you will look back and laugh at how could you make such a big deal of someone so ugly—while looking at the blonde you have walking beside you.

3. Delete all her messages

And by all messages I mean everything: SMS, Whatsapps, emails, Facebook chats, letters… you name it. Here's the kicker: Don't read the contents of what you are about to delete. Otherwise, prepare to slump into feeling like shit and having impractical thoughts such as: "Wow, did she mean all of this stuff?" "She really cared about me," "Oh, she was so cute the first month"… NO. Don't. Do. This. Just delete everything. When food goes bad you don't taste a little and see if it's expired: the smell already tells. The content is no longer valid, all those words mean nothing.

4. Set up some roadblocks

De-friend her on social media, rename her phone number to "Don't answer" or put an X in front of her name (e.g. "x Maria") so that it won't show in regular scrolling of your contacts but you still know if she's calling not to pick up.

5. Fuck another girl ASAP

I don't know about you, but I have a one-slut memory slot. I always remember the last girl I slept with more than any other one before. It's not a silver bullet, but it's a damn good place to start. In general, sleeping with other girls helps alleviate loneliness and the insidious symptoms of oneitis.

This point might be difficult for the average man, sometimes doomed to the equivalent of the infamous "waiting for a miracle" relationship status. But if you are serious about self-improvement, you know what to do: approach everything until you can't anymore. And while struggling, remember that success is only one reward; knowing that you are the social guy who will eventually get the job done is just as valuable. It's just a matter of time.

6. Focus on the bad if you relapse

If you find yourself thinking about her more than you care to admit, focus on her negative aspects:

- That fetish of yours she didn't indulge you with
- Childish or immature behavior
- Physical imperfections
- General weaknesses

Above all, don't take her back no matter what. Trust has been broken, this is a demolished house you don't want to rebuild: the base is made of moving sands. Don't waste concrete pouring over it and instead reinstate the abundance mentality you once forgot about.

7. Remember that she is on the next one already

Much like monkeys, women never swing from a branch without holding onto another one. Just in case you needed encouragement to carry out #5.

8. Don’t ask for anyone’s advice

If a close relative dies, would you ask anyone on how to bring them back to life? Didn’t think so. This is the exact same thing. The interaction ceased to exist. Hell, for all intents and purposes, she is dead to you.

The bottom line

Take the experience for what it was: just another stint in your love life. Women come and go, but your self-respect and dignity are here to stay. Don’t embarrass yourself—be a man. If you ever hear a girl plowing the ground to dump you (meaning that you start to see it coming), cut that shit out immediately. “Want to break up?”. If she says yes, stand up and go away. Leave her sitting there, don’t give her the satisfaction to see you hurt or in pain. Go back to your hole and lick your wounds out of sight as long as you have to. Or better, go to the gym directly after and shout and grunt your way through the most intense deadlift session you have ever had, full of anger and loathing. Get that personal record you have been itching towards for weeks: let hatred be your fuel.

Read More: The Worst Thing You Can Do For Your Game

---

darkjohanson
Darkjohanson is a man destined to learn the fine art of pulling girls sober in an alcoholic country. Detractor of 'smart' phones, social media and porn.

5 Reasons Why You Shouldn’t Get Into A Serious Relationship With A Woman

August 13, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

For centuries, women have been thought the more mysterious sex. Poets, philosophers, and psychologists have all been driven to distraction trying to work out exactly what it is that makes them tick. Of course, the reason such eminent men put in all that effort in the first place is because, like the rest of us, they wanted to get laid. Here is the bind that unites all men—the frustrating and annoying work of unraveling women’s inscrutability, set against our very real and urgent need to bang the most attractive of them.

Fortunately, the internet has facilitated something that most people could never have foreseen: the ability for men to share their experiences of the “fairer” sex and to compare notes on a grand scale. This revolution in gender relations has been quietly—and not so quietly, in some cases—taking place on blogs and websites such as this one for over a decade. The cloak of relative anonymity offered by the ‘net has enabled it. Whereas previously shaming (itself arguably a product of a feminine-primary society) prevented men from talking openly about their experiences, even with close friends, now hundreds of thousands across the world can call out female behavior freely.

Striking and somewhat depressing is how similar and predictable a lot of their stories are. Before discovering the manosphere, I tended towards self-flagellation, beating myself up thinking that women treated me badly because of some fundamental flaw in my personality. How surprising, then, to read hundreds of tales that mirrored my own experiences exactly. Girls flaked on other guys, punished them for beta behavior with infidelity, and walked out on them at the drop of a hat when a better opportunity presented itself too. It wasn’t just me.

Slowly, over a period of a few months, I hardened up my working knowledge of female psychology and put strategies in place to help me better deal with it.

Of course, the manosphere conversation is ongoing and new consensuses are being reached all the time. Here, though, are five things about women I have discovered through my own experiences as well as through talking to other guys. They are all things you should keep in mind, especially if you are considering entering a serious relationship.

1. Girls will have sex quickly and easily with guys who give them tingles

All of us have at one stage or another bought into the "Madonna-Whore" notion that there are "bad girls" who will put out indiscriminately, and "good girls" who will hold out for the right guy. It's a meme inculcated into us by the culture. It's also bollocks.

Understand this: the Madonnas and the Whores are the same girls.

Some of you may be aware of an article written by Tyler Durden of RSD many years ago called The Secret Society. If not, you should check it out. It contains the kind of wisdom that makes a lot of sense on paper, but only becomes real when you go out and game and have sex with a lot of girls.

The basic gist of it is that if you are a guy who "gets it," and sub-communicates that he "gets it," then girls will have sex with you quickly, easily and without putting up all of the obstacles that betas have to contend with. Not only is it true, but it goes for all girls—not just the ones with tattoos and bleached hair and those transparent stripper heels, but also the nice girl in the library with the glasses and the cardigan too.

If you present yourself as 'r-selected' rather than k-selected—that is, as a badboy player rather than as a provider simp, then even the good girls will drop their knickers for you quickly.

I know this to be a fact. Last year, I hooked up with the most innocent-looking girl you can imagine. I took her out, and was careful to dial up my r-selected traits. Not only did she sleep with me on the first night, but she continued to do so, in secret, for months afterwards, even after she began seeing another guy.

This phenomenon does rather blow the lid off any fantasies of finding that one special girl to fall in love with and protect and honor through thick and skin, though women's sexuality does not make them bad people. It is something men can enjoy too, when they learn to play the game. But you do need to open your eyes to the reality of how things works.

2. She has an agenda

So, you met a cute girl, gamed her good and now you're having regular sex. Great—you're on easy street, no longer having to battle it out on the flesh rampage in busy clubs and bars, instead enjoying a regular serving of quality poosy, right?

Wrong.

However casual, free, and easy things may seem at the start, make no mistake, your girl has an agenda. If you pass her tests and she likes you enough to stay with you, then she will already be making moves to lock you down into a relationship. This will often involve measures such as keeping increasing tabs on you, trying to limit the time you spend with your friends and demanding more and more attention from you.

The endgame of all of this?

Babies.

I'm sorry, but it's true. While men are happy to coast along, enjoying the sex and the good times, women are at the mercy of a pitiless biological clock. Make no mistake, she's not there to "go with the flow" or "just have fun and see where it goes." She has a very real gameplan (consciously or not) that could end up costing you the best years of your life and a shitload of money.

I'm not saying that she will mention having a family, or that she even knows exactly what she is doing herself, but the only purpose of long-term male-female sexual relationships in a woman's eyes is reproduction. Not companionship, not "discovering each other," not growing old together.

If this isn't your bag, then you need to make a decision about how and when to cut and run.

3. But she will hate you if you facilitate it

Ironically, though, the more you accede to the demands of her biological imperative, the more she will despise you.

She fucked you in the first place because you demonstrated alpha qualities that made her attracted to you. The more you alter yourself to fit in with what she wants, becoming domesticated within her monogamous frame, the more beta you will appear and the less you will resemble that hot, untameable guy she originally fantasied you were. At this point, she is only a heartbeat away from having sex with the mail man.

This phenomenon is called the Betaization Process. Fear it, because it is real and it is inescapable unless you are thoroughly prepared and vigilant.

4. She is a depreciating asset

The problem is that, as guys, we are beset with a strange kind of logical failure that kicks in when we meet a cute girl. If a guy is seeing a twenty-three year old, and she is an eight, then there is a good chance he will want to try to cash in his chips, and depart from the table with his winnings by marrying her or otherwise locking her down in a relationship.

In many cases, this is a mistake.

Look, we all know damn well that the hot 23-year-old isn't going to be a hot 50-year-old. How many times have we seen the effects of the so-called "wall" (that point somewhere in a woman's thirties where the fresh bloom of her youthful beauty is extinguished, and she becomes less pleasing to the loins of a majority of men).

But we all still want to lock the 23-year-old down.

It doesn't make any sense.

Women's youthful beauty becomes a bait with which they reel in men to part with their resources for many, many years after it has declined beyond all recognition.

Perhaps you believe your special snowflake to be so special that you don't care about what she looks like in ten, twenty years time. Fine—if that's genuinely true (and I have my doubts—many men will make this kind of pronouncement from a position of scarcity). But at least be aware of this phenomenon of depreciation and think very carefully before putting a ring on it.

5. She doesn't really care about you

She has an agenda (see point 2). You, as the guy, are there to help her fulfill it (even though she will despise you for doing so.) Don't make the mistake of assuming that she cares about you personally, no matter what she says. The true romantics are men. Women are pragmatists, rather like the cash-hungry film producer who cares little about the cast list as long as the movie gets made on time.

I once had a girlfriend who told me that she would die for me. She was becoming too clingy, so we split up. After I told her I couldn't see her anymore, she sent me messages every day for a month telling me how upset she was, how special I was, how much she wanted me back. In the face of this barrage, I softened. Perhaps she really did love me as she said. Tentatively, I suggested a meeting. Maybe we could talk. After all, here was a girl displaying a characteristic I valued greatly – devotion. Perhaps I had been too hasty.

Her response?

"I can't see you. I'm with someone else now."

I had been replaced. Whatever "special" qualities I possessed had quickly and easily been located in another.

For the record, I abhor cynicism and I don't write this article to promote it. But I also believe that forewarned is forearmed, and that a realistic grasp of female psychology would help many men to lead happier lives. By all means go out and enjoy the game, but always be vigilant, and above all make sure that your needs are accounted for as well as hers.

Find out more about female psychology and how to effortlessly attract beautiful women by clicking here.

Read More: 7 Tips For Building A Harem

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

6 Ways Policemen Can Regain Credibility With The American Public

August 13, 2014 | by Henry Calgues | Link | Original Link

My previous article, "Why Americans Should Reconsider Their Contempt for Today's Police," was well-received in the law enforcement community, but not so much on Return of Kings. I only wished to begin a conversation, and perhaps it worked.

Ultimately, everyone would benefit from a better understanding between the police and the public, and neither side can afford to sacrifice the cooperation that is necessary to move forward. As some cops and some members of the public move toward the fringe, fueled by social media and their cozy echo-chambers, the relationship could deteriorate beyond repair. Then what? I think a cop who claims that all cops are heroes and that the solution is to make more arrests is as ridiculous as the anti-cop that claims that all cops are pigs and the answer is revolution.

With that being said, I would like to challenge law enforcement to look into the mirror and reflect on what we may be doing wrong. I know cops have many thoughts on this, even though it is not discussed at roll call or FOP meetings; primarily because our out-of-touch administrators are more worried about their bottom line and retirement and focus more on risk management than any sort of valuable reform. Many of you question the same things about our institution, but with no forum for it to be discussed, nothing is addressed and nothing gets changed.

Let's face it, we all know the government, especially the Federal Government, is out of control and working against the best interests of the people. The public is waking up and challenging the system that we are unfortunately a part of—and that is a good thing. Don't take it personally. We have to suck it up and realize that we are the tangible government, and therefore we are going to catch the initial heat from the public as their eyes continue to open.

Remember, this concept is still new to them. The public will eventually figure out that videotaping a cop that pulled them over because they were speeding is not going to bring Eric Holder up on contempt charges, or impeach Obama. Eventually they will also realize that it is their responsibility to change any law they see as unfair, and not expect the police to selectively enforce laws. And when the public truly seeks reform, they will direct their contempt at the politicians and "leaders" that actually run the show, yet have somehow remained exempt from the ridicule and harassment we often face. In the meantime, let us consider some changes and reminders to help come to an understanding with the public that we are simply local crime fighters acting on behalf of a common morality and not the government.

1. Study the Constitution and the Bill of Rights

You swore to protect it. That oath may have seemed ceremonious, but it was certainly the most important and practical directive you agreed upon. Study the Constitution and see what should separate us from the rest of the world. Understand that the inalienable rights mentioned in the Declaration of Independence are not privileges, and that the Bill of Rights does not just permit free speech, journalism, or the right to bear arms; it encourages them—and for good reason.

The Constitution was written by men who wanted to ensure that a wayward government fears the power of the people. Remember this when you are watching the news and shaking your head in disgust like everyone else, and when you get to work, be mindful of your position and how you can collaborate with the will of free people who only wish to remain free.

2. Do not let the media exacerbate the nanny state

Most citizens don't need you. There is a large population of people who can take care of themselves. I'm not saying that they take matters into their own hands necessarily; only that they simply take care of their own problems and are smart and skillful enough to get through a day without the protection or advice of the police.

I cringe when I see a cop on the local news giving viewers tips on driving in the snow, firework safety, or other general common sense advice. We are not parents to a childlike public. Any self-reliant person undoubtedly rolls their eyes when Officer Friendly reminds them to "reduce your speed when the roads are icy." To be fair to cops, it is the media that requests these interviews. The media usually wants a soundbite to fill some programming gap while appearing helpful and providing a service to their viewers. Cops hate to do these interviews, so I recommend declining them.

3. Realize that you cannot control crime

The term “first responder” says it all; we respond to problems. We are not “crime stoppers.” We can’t be. When departments do act as “crime stoppers,” they need to station police en masse like they do at special events or areas of repeat violent crime, and they can’t merely respond; they need to already be there. Although a heavy police presence at special events like the Super Bowl is sometimes understandable and viable, it is certainly not possible or wanted everywhere all the time.

But if crime is not the burden of the police, then who carries it? The community. Public safety is contingent on the conscience and values of a community, not the power of law enforcement. Unfortunately, when crime is high in a community, half of the community begs for a police state while the other half condemns it, and we are always viewed simultaneously as too aggressive or too passive. How can we ever win?

So when your over-reactive police administrators demand crackdowns and heavy police presence after a rash of gang related shootings, take it with a grain of salt. Don’t blame yourself when a few drug dealers robbed the wrong guys and end up dead or shot. You don’t need to frisk every guy that walks down that street and start taking people to jail for trespassing because they are standing outside of a building that some slum lord gave up on years ago.

We need to stop making ourselves 100% accountable for weak, state funded communities. If anything, it is the Feds that are responsible for these communities. The Feds are funding the crime and irresponsible cultures that plague crime ridden communities—and with our tax dollars! It is rather absurd that the states and cities have to tame the beast that the Federal Government feeds, strengthens, and at times, incites.

4. Dethrone the “drug cop”

When it comes to patrol officers, the type of cop that gets the most credit for being “active” and doing “real police work” is the “drug cop.” He or she is the cop that chases down the drug dealers, recovers their stolen firearms, seizes their money and cars, etc. Most young cops look up to the “drug cop” and mirror them. The allure is understandable; drug investigations are the fastest and easiest way to get into some action as most dealers usually run from police who then give chase.

It is easy to measure the productivity of a drug cop. How many grams of heroin? How many thousands of dollars? These are all numbers they yell to each other when finishing up their paperwork at the station so that everyone can hear how awesome they are. But if these drug cops just stopped and looked around one day, they would see that all their hard work and close calls didn‘t really change anything. The drugs keep pouring in, and the buyers keep pulling up. However, drug enforcement does have its place since the only people who have ever thanked me for saving their lives were addicts that I arrested, but leave that to your vice unit. Let them do the drug investigations and monitor the violence surrounding it.

Instead, keep your eye out for real victims. Get out there and break up a burglary ring, protect property, figure out who is breaking into all those cars, identify that guy robbing people downtown, try to get someone's stolen car back to them, ask around about that unsolved homicide from four years ago. Whatever you do, let the public benefit from it. Drug work is a quick game where you want to catch the mouse and the public doesn't pay you to play games.

Drug abuse is a cultural problem. There is nothing the police can do to address the insatiable American appetite for illicit drugs. Local police agencies need to stop pretending that this is a problem they can solve. Perhaps when the police step back, communities and their churches, businesses, medical facilities, etc. will strike that critical balance between charity and capital to address the drug problems of their own sons and daughters.

5. Take off the sunglasses

I know this is not 100% fair, but everyone hates a cop in sunglasses. It's just the way it is. Although sunglasses are practical, when you wear them at work and in uniform, they evoke mistrust and suspicion. I brought a pair to work several years ago when I began working second shift and I felt like Agent Smith from "The Matrix" when I talked to people and I probably came across that way too. I never wore them again. Nothing is more effective than good eye contact where a citizen can see how genuine you are and a bad guy can see how serious you are. And while you're at it, tell your buddies to leave the tactical gloves and bluetooth earpieces at home as well.

6. Live within your means and stop burning yourself out

A police officer is still a blue-collar job. Yet for some reason, many cops want to live the life of a Google executive. They are building $300,000 homes and buying $40,000 trucks on a base pay that tops out around $55,000 annually. They make ends meet by working tons of overtime and outside employment details. The money is well-earned, as they work very hard for it, but the cost makes it way down to the public when they get burned out and the exhaustion makes for a bad attitude.

Cities are only making the problem worse. Hiring freezes have emerged throughout the country in the last few years while at the same time, tons of cops are retiring. This of course means fewer cops on the payroll. The city's solution is not to hire more cops, but instead to provide overtime to already exhausted, burned out cops.

Cops are not immune to the failure of Americans to know their place in society. Many of the rugged crime fighters of yesterday that traded shots of liquor in the local hole in the wall are being replaced by softer babbitts sipping wine poolside at their oversized home. Loaded with debt, many cops are enslaved to the job. They will find it hard to step out of line or challenge injustice when they cannot afford to.

So live within your means. Don't back yourselves into a corner, and by the way, look a little closer at your pension system. There is a lot more money going out than coming in. Do you see that carrot dangling before you? It is rotting.

United we stand

It’s understood by now that the system’s primary tactic to control its people is to divide and conquer. The more they can get groups to clash and fringes to spread, the more the system can step in to take control. If the public and the system’s law enforcers can both make concessions and come to some middle ground, the system’s orchestrators will begin to lose control and perhaps the organic human relationship that the nation once knew will emerge again. Everything is to be gained from mutual cooperation; be very suspicious of those on either end that work to ensure a divide is drawn.

Read More: Why Americans Should Reconsider Their Contempt for Today’s Police

Henry Calgues
AC is a cop on the brink of resignation. To find out why, check out his new blog at anonymouscop.com or like Anonymous Cop on Facebook Click here to view my Facebook page

The Supreme Value Of Day Game

August 13, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

Take the typical American woman in the 7-and-up range, age range of about 18-32. At night in a bar, she may put up a bitch shield or be maddeningly sullen—not to mention the invariable cockblocking of her cuntish friends, who will ignorantly get in your way even if you are a high-value man who has been wholly respectful. On Tinder, she may say shockingly sexual things just a few messages into the conversation—but for all that, still flake. Yet during the day, if you do things right, you may actually have a chance to build a quality relationship with her, or at least a hot FWB situation, with as little games and flakiness as possible. For day game—which seems to occur spontaneously in the course of her life (I say seems because I spotted her 30 feet away and much of my conversation is calculated)—catches a woman off guard (which is not to say she will be defensive—in fact, the opposite is true, if you know what you're doing), and yet doesn't make her as inclined to games and flakiness as other dating contexts do. The reason is that, unlike with night game and internet game, she doesn't already know from the very nature of the context that you are out to bang her.

My current favorite day game opener is, "Hey, you look pretty active; do you know of a good gym around here?" Most women, unless they are really busy, or you look like a creep, will take a few moments to answer. Whatever they say, I respond with more questions, and all the while I am smiling, making eye contact, and speaking in a very friendly tone: "Oh, that gym? I think I've heard of it…but I'm looking for more of an old-school place; you know: hot, dirty, 80s Metallica blasting. Know anywhere like that?" Of course the cutie doesn't—such gyms hardly exist today—but she may laugh. And depending on her age, tone and body language, I may work in some teasing: “But I don’t want to get all muscular and scary-looking like you.” Ironically, I am already very muscular.

I transition to small talk: “Yeah, I really need to find the right gym—I work from home, so I have to get out and exercise every day to stay sane.” If she thinks I’m cute, and happens to be in the mood to get to know a cute guy, she may take the bait: “What do you do? Oh, you’re a writer? That’s so interesting!” If, like most men, you don’t have an interesting job, then mention some interesting activity that takes up a lot of your time, and from which you turn to exercise for relief.

I try to prolong the small talk, so that she will become comfortable with me and so that I can get a feel for the logistics of a possible date: “So how’s your day going? Are you from the city?” Finally, I close with something like: “Well hey, you’ve been really helpful and seem cool; as long as you aren’t crazy [charming smile or wink] maybe I could get you a coffee sometime.” In the last three weeks alone I’ve collected seven numbers doing this, from hot young women who’d surely be hell to game at night in a bar.

I live in a university neighborhood in Philadelphia. I am therefore able to collect lots of numbers simply while walking my dog. “Can I pet your dog?” many a cutie asks, and I often respond with humor: “Go for it, but I warn you, he doesn’t like women—I think he’s gay, and not much of a shopper, either!” Or: “OK, but promise not to sue me when this monster bites you.” And so on.

Or let’s say I’m in another part of the city, where, lo, I spot a pretty woman with her own dog. Funny how my neighbor has one just like that! Can I pet it? Will it attack me and send me to the hospital, like Bruno did? I transition to small talk, as usual, and close with my usual friendly, low-pressure line.

The coffee date is a great low pressure one, and if done well, an easy transition to drinks for date two, which is a probable bang if you have tight game. The value of a low pressure date is very high these days, when most attractive women under 27 are too socially retarded to make and stick to plans like a mature adult. What “pressure” there is in keeping one’s word and in what used to be called common courtesy! And funny how often 7s and up get “busy.”

Day game, to be sure, is very difficult—newbies and intermediates are bound to struggle—but it has the supreme value of training you to think quickly on the spot (which really is game itself), more than any other context does: her friends are not there; yours aren’t either; there’s no loud music or other distractions: it’s just you two, or rather, your game versus her natural resistance to a strange man.

And as a result, a player may over time become a very smooth and assured actor. There is also something, as I’ve already remarked, about the nature of meeting women during the day—as opposed to at the bar or club at night, or via the internet—that seems to cut down on the standard flaking of our smart phone and social media era.

Day game, you should understand, is no reason not to look your best. I may have spent the day sitting on my ass. No matter. I will be downtown during rush hour, when the City of Brotherly Love is teeming with hot tail, dressed sharp, maybe even suited up since, after all, “I just finished meeting with a client.”

If, like me, you are a large, muscular guy, you may have good results by using the gym opener—assuming, of course, you don’t slip up after it. But in order to become highly skilled at day game, you should spend some time thinking up your own openers and humorous banter with which to follow. Like being well-prepared for a job interview, this will make you feel more confident going into your interactions. It may also help you to become a more inventive and interesting conversationalist, for game, after all, is a mental activity, and as with sports, the best players are the quickest thinking.

If you read this article closely, you should have noticed that my day game is indirect. That is how day game should be. You may be tall, in great shape, handsome, charismatic, charming, funny, successful, full of interesting stories, etc., etc. Still, going direct during the day is usually unwise: you will scare off a woman whom you might have bagged if you had not made her uncomfortable. Direct game is best reserved for night game, and even then you had better be a pretty good looking guy, with reason to believe she is sold on you or nearly.

Never compliment a woman while running day game; it will often lead her to suspect that you weren’t really looking for a gym, or whatever BS reason you used to open, but are just out to get laid. Indeed, women have asked me both during the initial conversation and our first date whether I was really looking for a gym, because even if you are highly convincing, women may still see through you or at least be suspicious. The reason is that most women are themselves fake through and through, and as such, they are very good at sniffing out a man’s BS. Fakeness naturally recognizes itself in another.

Day game is like learning any other skill: you will get better as you do it more and more. The other day I struck out on my first five attempts. Then I got one number, and all of a sudden I was in rhythm, and before long on fire: I departed from my usual openers and began thinking of apt ones on the spot. I got one number, for instance, by opening with a question about a woman’s hat; my cousin loves hats just like it, and she has a birthday coming up, blah blah blah. I had agreeable BS and playful jokes coming out of my ears, and was able to get three numbers in a row, all from 7s and up, and women who are about ten years younger than me. Now that, of course, is a very high success rate, and short of looking like a model and being famous to boot, you need to put in those many initial approaches, with their inevitable rejections, in order to be nearly so lucky.

Before smart phones and social media—in other words, before all attractive women were offered a surfeit of cock on a daily basis—I could kick it in bars and clubs, collecting numbers and pulling same night takedowns with relative ease. But that golden age is gone forever. Despite entering my physical and financial peak, the repeated flakes of night game have made it a rather fruitless endeavor. At 33, and with a dozen years in the game, I see day game as my best option by far.

Here, of course, is where many readers—and especially those under 30, who tend not to have the highly nuanced understanding of a veteran player, nor his historical sense of how much game has changed since smart phones and social media—will think I am not gaming women well enough. “If you were really demonstrating high value,” it will be said, “you wouldn’t get flaked on, stuck in text message hell, blah blah blah.” Bullshit. The typical 7 or up from 18 up to about 35 now has a phone full of attractive men, many of whom have tight game, high status, and so on. Night game will continue to become more inefficient for this reason, as the smart phone and social media era gives most attractive women PADD: penis attention deficit disorder.

Meanwhile, many men are relying exclusively on the internet to meet women. Now, virtual reality will do nothing for your game in person, and though it used to be effective if you had good pictures and were at least half-literate, internet game, too, is now a tedious time suck: the attractive women are flooded by messages; I am easily lost in the mix; and why should I wait around to hear back from women I have not even met in real life? How stupid to spend many precious hours of my life messaging women on OKC or whatever; the act of sticking my dick in a woman requires one in the flesh, and for that to happen, I must first game her in the flesh.

Consider this contrast: when you meet a woman via night game, you have to try to set up a date while acting as if you aren’t interested. This is unnatural, stupid, and wearisome, especially as you get older. With day game, on the other hand, you have some latitude when it comes to expressing natural feelings and intentions: a woman won’t necessarily punish you for—God forbid—being interested in her. You may actually meet that exceedingly rare sort of woman who doesn’t live to YOLO at the bar with her flock of Instagram attention whores, or to check her OKC account eight times a day. Moreover, in night game you can have a superb interaction but still be forgotten; the girl was drunk off her ass when you met, so when you hit her up a few days later, she barely remembers you, or can’t distinguish you from the other men to whom she gave her number. When you approach a woman during the day, you stand out.

Finally, thanks to day game, you get in the habit of talking to attractive women wherever you find them, and they are everywhere. Having this frame of mind, you have only to look and talk your best. I consider myself and think: Do I have a lot of money? No. But unlike most men who do, I have game.

Read More: How To Run Game In 2014

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

How Cultural Marxists Distort Language To Achieve Their Goals

August 14, 2014 | by Samson Lamont | Link | Original Link

There can be no doubt that cultural Marxism is the ideology du jour in the western world. To achieve its insidious agenda, it uses many weapons of psychological manipulation: mass media, the internet, and social engineering just to name a few. The one thing linking these weapons is language. Whether written or spoken, language is the primary delivery system for the subversive payload of this movement, and without it the agenda would obviously fail.

As the saying goes, "If you repeat a lie often enough, people will eventually come to believe it." Over the last forty-five years, we here in the West have been told the same lies over and over until they have now become accepted truth. As masculine men in an emasculated culture, we're constantly encountering people who will label us using these lies, trying to shame, ostracize, and silence us for what we are. I say fuck them.

"You're Homophobic!"

Homo: Greek root meaning "same."

Phobic: Derived from the Greek phobos, meaning "fear."

The literal translation of homophobic is "fear of the same". In this case same refers to gays, so when someone labels you as homophobic, they are literally accusing you of being scared of gays. However, that's not how it's perceived in our society, is it? No, in our society homophobic implies that you are hateful and even violent towards gays. You're a bigot, and your very existence is a hate crime that should be punished.

Of course the notion of fearing the least-threatening people on the planet is laughable, but if the "you're just a scared little boy in a macho man's body" accusation seems familiar, that's because it's straight out of the radical feminist playbook. Feminist harpies love using emasculating imagery and language against masculine men, because it reinforces their delusions of power.

Always remember, misandry doesn't exist

They constantly shriek that men are scared of female strength. Yes, that's why we hate feminism so much: because we fear it.

This is the key reasoning behind the use of “phobic.” It’s not enough to call you “anti-gay” or even one of their hip little Hollyweird portmanteaus like “gaycist.” They must make sure to attack your masculinity at its core: by calling you a pussy. In essence, you don’t like pillow-biters because you’re obviously scared of your own latent homosexuality, which you’re actively suppressing to fit in with your knuckle-dragging Neanderthal buddies.

This word’s purpose is to shame you into accepting and condoning behavior you don’t agree with. Call them out on their bullshit and show them you’re not scared after all.

“You’re Intolerant!”

Tolerance is defined as the ability or willingness to tolerate something, in particular the existence of opinions or behavior that one does not necessarily agree with. The very definition tells us that we don’t like what we’re putting up with, which is the core tenet of the word.

- “Man, my new girl can cook, clean, and gives the best blowjob I’ve ever had, so I tolerate her,” said no man ever.
- “Man my new girl is getting on my last nerve, can’t cook for shit, and won’t shut the fuck up, but she could suck-start a leaf blower (or some variation thereof), so I tolerate her,” said every man at some point in his life.

By this logic, the Museum of Tolerance should be renamed The Museum of Things We Don’t Like Yet Put Up With Anyway. Yet in America, tolerance has been twisted to become synonymous with acceptance. To tolerate someone’s lifestyle now means to accept and support it as normal, good, or natural, where before you could find it unacceptable and didn’t have to worry about being crucified in the court of public opinion for it.

The men of the manosphere are called intolerant all the time, yet we’re actually some of the most tolerant people on the planet. We put up with an entire culture that we don’t like every single day, and what’s the worst that we do? We write some articles mocking fatties and sluts.

You know who’s intolerant? Fascists. Fascists don’t tolerate things they don’t like. They forcibly remove them, eroding freedoms as they go, by changing laws and brainwashing people to accept falsehoods about the true nature of the world. Since that’s what radfems do every day, it sounds to me like feminism should be synonymous with fascism.

If we here at ROK were truly intolerant of gays, we wouldn’t be putting up with them. We’d be out there beating them up or writing articles calling for such action, but we’re not. So the next time you’re labeled intolerant, give your accuser the true definition of the word, and remind them they should be thankful you're such a tolerant guy.

"You're A Misogynist!"

I saved the best for last. We men are certainly no strangers to this word. In fact, it's likely the most popular insult hurled at us. Women in the western world are being taught that they live in a patriarchy, a system in which men have complete power and women have no rights, so I thought I'd find another place that has a patriarchy and compare it to ours.

Welcome to sunny Afghanistan, where from 1996 until 2001 a group of sadists known as the Taliban ruled with an iron fist. They operated under a strict interpretation of sharia law, which placed severe restrictions on the freedoms of women that were enforced by religious police who were permitted to beat grown women in public with rods and whips. Let's take a look at some of those restrictions and compare them to the atrocities being committed against our women in the West.

Afghanistan: Women should not appear in the streets without a blood relative or without wearing a ninja costume burqa.

The West:

This is what patriarchy looks like

Afghanistan: Women should not wear high-heeled shoes, as no man should hear a woman's footsteps lest it excite him.

The West:

Rights = Trampled

Afghanistan: Women must not speak loudly in public as no stranger should hear a woman's voice.

The West:

Define "loudly"

Afghanistan: Photographs or films of women are banned as is displaying pictures of women in books, newspapers, shops, or the home.

The West:

Looks like it's time for a book burning.

However, this is just the tip of the iceberg, because the true measure of a patriarchy is how the women who break the rules are punished.

Afghanistan: If you marry someone other than who your dad tells you to, or have premarital sex, then he can commit an honor killing, which means he can murder you for "shaming the family."

The West: Go ahead and embrace your sexuality by riding the cock carousel (guys have casual sex all the time, why can't you?) and when you've had enough of penises filling your various orifices, rest assured there will be an emasculated beta chump of your choice on deck to cater to your every whim for the rest of your life, starting with a ridiculously overpriced wedding centered around you so you can fill your quota of attention whoring for the day.

"O. M. G. I cannot believe he fell for it!"

Afghanistan: Under sharia law, women over the age of 8 are no longer to receive an education. The ones who try (in secret of course) get acid thrown in their faces.

The West: 60% of college students are now female and entire "fields of study" have been created that are dedicated strictly to women. Women with useless degrees in nonsense such as women's studies are being put into leadership positions within the workforce that they are woefully unqualified to hold, and yet there hasn't been a single Harvey Dent incident yet.

They Don't Know How Good They've Got It

All joking aside, THIS is what a real patriarchy looks like, where women truly have no rights whatsoever and are treated like absolute garbage. Women in the West have all the same rights provided by the law as men do, and more freedom of choice than anywhere else on the planet, yet they have the audacity to complain about "women's rights." So the next time a feminist starts bitching at you about the pay gap myth, rape culture, or misogyny, hit her with these facts and challenge her to renounce her western citizenship and protection, go live in Afghanistan under sharia law for a month, and then report back. That is, if she's still alive and has the ability to speak.

Recognizing the way that cultural Marxists twist words to suit their purposes will give you the ammunition you need to shred their ideology to pieces. Their language relies heavily on shaming and ostracization, so stand your ground, refuse to be shamed, and accept the fact that your views are not going to be popular. Hopefully your logic will reach some of them and wake them up to the truth, but I wouldn't hold my breath.

Read More: The Man Who Created His Own Language

Samson Lamont

Driving Home The Truth About Men And Women

August 14, 2014 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

I remember a time when everyone was talking about a book. The title was Men are From Mars, Women are From Venus. Most men have probably heard of it, some men may have read it, somewhere there could even be a poor chap who took it seriously!

The prospect of that poor man struggling to put the advice into action gives me a cold shiver. What I need is a rival analogy. One which covers the red pill truths about the mating market. One which is about something men enjoy. I found one.

Women are like cars. Men are like drivers. The rest, like driving itself, flows pretty naturally once you get the idea.

Driving a good car is a satisfying, liberating experience. At the time it feels free, but when you add up the costs of acquiring, running and maintaining a car it is actually one of the most expensive things a driver does. A driver silly enough to take control of a car while drunk often finds that it looks a lot better before than after. Please take care at all times, if you crash you might end up broke, injured or even in jail. As for the smashed car, many drivers don't even want to look at them afterwards!

Unfortunately not all drivers can have a good car. Those drivers are often quite embarrassed. New cars purr contentedly when driven, but when owned and driven for too long they can make more alarming sounds. Sometimes they even screech. Often after a period of ownership the poor driver finds that the car refuses to drive at all and he is left with a useless husk hanging around that is of no value to anyone.

When considering purchasing a car it's always good to take your time. Careless selection can lead to big problems and can be far more expensive than you expect. Buyers usually start by examining the bodywork, age and miles driven. Some people buy cars without a test drive or even without seeing them. This is OK for a new one that's never been driven before. Otherwise you will regret it, I promise you.

Alterations to the bodywork, decorative baubles hanging off or pictures drawn on them can seem attractive at first glance, but are a clear go away sign for anyone considering ownership. As for cars that belch smoke, don't even think about it.

Driving a car off the lot is an exhilarating experience for sure. When first driving a really hot car there can be a moment of release which is truly a high point in a man's life. Often that moment of intense feeling is hard to describe or justify later. At the time though the burst of freedom and pleasure is not to be questioned or refused. Unfortunately without drastic—often painful—action, a newly acquired car is still around the next day and buyers remorse is common.

The rental vehicle service is mostly used by drivers who either can't afford a car, have a car which just won't drive, or are out of town and unable to use their regular vehicle. They can be picked up quickly and are available on a per use basis, but they can be expensive. A driver who uses a really cheap rental service will often find the car is dangerous or has obscure mechanical problems. Drivers often use them hard and in ways they wouldn't dream of with their own cars. No matter how much the rental company tries to clean them up it's always just a little bit disgusting to think about all the previous drivers that might have dirtied them. It's probably wiser to give them a good clean and wear gloves or something before use. They age and accumulate miles on the clock quicker than other cars and should never be purchased, even if they seem like a good deal.

Different countries produce very different cars. American cars are big, have low fuel economy and are not known for their high quality. European cars are expensive, but often stylish and much sought after. Drivers of European cars often like to show them off. The production share of American and European cars keeps falling year by year and you can see why. Asia is the largest producing region and is known for cheap, practical and reliable models. If you come across a car that was made in Africa think carefully, they are extremely dangerous to drive, even if you wear a seat belt.

Occasionally, other would-be drivers steal cars but that doesn't usually end well for the car. It often gets broken down for parts or taken for a joy ride and then dumped in a gutter somewhere. The original drivers usually don't want them back once this happens.

Most drivers only own one car, or none. If a driver owns a fleet of vehicles for his exclusive use then you could say he is seriously in business!

So next time you are thinking about women, just imagine they are cars. Good choices might seem a lot easier to make. Finally, never give in to the temptation to drive a truck instead—bigger is not better, and they are a bitch to park afterwards.

Read More: Women Belong At Home, Not At The Office

Hesse Kassel
Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

Sex Robots Are Becoming A Better Option Than Western Women

August 15, 2014 | by Jon Socrates | Link | Original Link

Check out Julie Beck's article, A (Straight, Male) History of Sex Dolls. It's an interesting survey of the history of sex dolls, followed up by a look into the phenomenon of RealDolls—a line of surprisingly sophisticated sex dolls with a dedicated and growing number of satisfied owners. Beck does a pretty good job of hiding her biases, but her clichéd feminism reveals itself when she inevitably casts the whole affair as yet another example of piggish men acting out their abusive attitudes toward women. She remarks that "plenty of men would like real women to be a little more like dolls," and that these sex dolls "are reminders of unequal gender power dynamics that play out in the real world." Sigh.

Should you take this seriously?

When I first read Beck's article, I thought these sex dolls must be for the sad, lonely, socially-inept loser with several thousand dollars to spend on taking his masturbation to the next level. But this analysis is a little too easy. While I was sure that some RealDoll owners fit the loser stereotype, I suspected that not all of them do. And they're not as far from the norm as I thought. It turns out that 20% of people surveyed said that they'd be willing to bang a robot. Would you?

If you build it, he will come.

After any initial shock at the thought of human-robot coupling, take a few minutes to consider what's really at stake, and why any man today would prefer a flesh and blood woman. Certainly there are a few decent women out there, but too many women today are selfish, emotionally fucked up money sponges with princess complexes who sometimes "forget" to take their birth-control pills. How about an alternative? I've never tried a plastic robo-pussy, and I can't imagine that it would feel nearly as good as the real thing, but for a gradually increasing number of men, the trade-off is worth it to avoid all the hassles that come with real women.

Already modern feminists have encouraged women to be just about anything except good wives and mothers, dramatically reducing their long-term utility to men. Increasingly, men are waking up to this, as evidenced by MGTOW, red pill culture, and the manosphere, and many men are either foregoing traditional marriage or seeking foreign women who still have their priorities straight. Soon, and maybe sooner than you might think, men will be assessing the short-term utility of women as well.

Where do we go from here?

Well, that depends. Twenty years ago, a sex-bot would have been little more than a Hustler magazine hot-glued to a shop vac. Twenty years from now, a sex-bot might be a walking, talking, house-cleaning companion with more brains and personality than your average ho-bag barfly. And is it so hard to believe that such a thing could achieve mainstream popularity? Given that mainstream culture has already embraced having fake friends (Facebook) and fake children, fake girlfriends and wives can't be far behind.

For years feminists have been able to indulge their most vicious, selfish, and immature impulses because they've still been able to use their pussies to get what they want. But the phenomenon of RealDolls serves as a sobering reminder of that old adage—be careful what you wish for. Feminists have also long advocated their independence from men, and pretty soon they might just get it. And after all, there is something egalitarian about it. Robots have put many hard working men out of a job, and soon they might take the jobs of all those women who pay their rent on their backs.

The good news is, not all is lost. Already some women are waking up to the realization that the logical conclusion of modern feminism is isolation, a lack of fulfillment, and a state of stunted emotional development in which they offer men sex in exchange for room and board and putting up with their bullshit. In opposing what they view as objectification, feminists have ultimately objectified themselves, and in the not-too-distant future they may find themselves competing with objects. True to form, many women will try to cope by denigrating the competition, shaming men, or playing victim. Eventually, though, some will realize that they've failed to cultivate those qualities necessary for a mature and healthy long-term relationship. Before it's too late, women wanting to avoid being rendered romantically obsolete will need to get their shit together. Fast.

Read More: Modern Woman In Wanting To Be For Herself, Has Destroyed Herself

Jon Socrates
Jon finds purpose in the cultivation of wisdom, strength, and manly virtue.

What Would You Do If The Girlfriend You Loved Sucked 12 Penises?

August 15, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Less than a month after an Irish girl sucked off 24 guys in a Spanish bar, we have another case of a BJ suckfest gone public, this time in America.

A young man in high school started to get harassed on Facebook that his lovely girlfriend had been with black men. Thinking it was a prank, he told them to fuck off.

That’s when they started sending him photo and video evidence of a lot of guys running a blowjob train on his girl.

You can see the “Fuck you” comment by ballnlife_jay at the bottom, who is the boyfriend in question. Here’s a more NSFW image that shows the oral fornication, and there is also an Instagram video clip where one member of the crew smiles and gives a fist pump while receiving head.

It’s hard not to feel sympathy for the boyfriend upon discovering a cheating girlfriend. I imagine he wants nothing more than to have a pretty girl as the love of his life, so it is not his fault that she turned out to be a promiscuous young lady who has no respect for herself or the commitment she made. This is where he cries it out for a day or two and then moves on with his life. Unfortunately, he decided the best course of action is to renew his commitment to the girl and broadcast to the world how everything is okay. He does this by sharing a kiss with her not long after she gave head to many men.

He doubles down on his commitment with her, but note the body language:

You can note in the comments to the above tweet and others that he's actually receiving good advice from men, but he's choosing to ignore it.

I bring your attention to this event not to shame the young guy or girl, but to give you yet another data point at what modern men are being reduced to when it comes to their relationships with women. Earlier this year we wrote about a used-up hardcore porn star who was able to easily settle down and have a family with her beta bux, and last week we remarked on it further:

> With men choosing to wife up whores, sluts and porn stars, the end of men, a fairy tale prophesied by feminists seems even truer. Men are contributing to their own end and destruction of their self respect in the eyes of women by making faulty choices when choosing mates. The levels of sexual thirst among modern men propelled by permissiveness in modern societies, blinds men on how to distinguish between a good woman and a slut. Unless men develop more taste and standards when it comes to choosing the women they want to mate with, the self degradation by women through slutty personal behavior will continue even more, who'd still know there'd be someone to wife them up.

I hope you are starting to see the dots connect. Thirst and desperation are so high among men that they are willing to tolerate the most humiliating behavior among their girlfriends or future wives. It's clear that this can only come from a culture that puts women high up on the pedestal, brainwashing men into believing that nothing a woman does is unforgivable.

It's too bad that men like ballnlife_jay have to put up with what amounts to relationship abuse, all because they were born in a country which has led them to believe that women are infallible snowflakes. We're seeing nothing less than the standardization and acceptance of cuckoldry among all men, not just the weirdos who frequent swingers events. You won't find one complaint about this trend from women, but many men will suffer for it emotionally and psychologically.

Stay tuned next month when we'll surely see a "reformed" 40-year-old porn star who took over 100 cocks in her anus pen an article for Huffington Post giving child-raising and husband tips to readers. This is definitely a trend, and it's not going away anytime soon.

Read Next: The Flood Of Female Hypocrisy Following The Magaluf 24-Man Blowjob Incident

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Elderly Feminist Is Preparing Young Adherents For A Life Of Little Sex

August 16, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

Earlier this year, “pro-sex” feminist Betty Dodson, “the godmother of masturbation,” stated that the recipe for a long life is: Masturbation, Pot and Raw Garlic.

Author of the 1973 book, Sex for One, she’s been relaunching her masturbation “masterclasses” in New York. Now 85, Dodson wants to help the post-Sex and the City, post-Girls generation of women that she believes are not nearly as liberated as they think they are. Her comeback has caused excitement among a new generation of American women, many of whom are seeking inspiration from the feminist thinkers of the 1970s in the face of supposed renewed attacks on women’s rights.

So in other words, according to her:

plus

plus

Where do these go?

Leads to in the end.

Nevertheless, the response by young feminists was favorable.

Masturbation workshops were organized to educate about and promote masturbation to feminists, to which young feminists flocked in large numbers. Which led to feminists…

And…

And of course…

…which ended for some of them in….

…considering some attending didn't even know how to masturbate and pleasure themselves, according to her.

> "They're usually too shy to attend the bodysex groups and opt for private sessions; she had a 25-year-old in yesterday for a lesson in self-love. "Poor girl had no idea. Never masturbated as a child."

Even if some feminists didn't end up like this at the end of the sessions.

Meanwhile, manginas—the perennial white knights of feminists—probably also didn't lag behind, so…

And..

Which probably led to...

And also…

for some.

In short, the future of such feminists' over-masturbated pussies would probably look… disfigured. Some examples of those can be found here, or more clearly in the NSFW real life versions here.

Not that we care. Jokes aside, a few points came to mind after reading the article:

> "She says the "best sex of my lifetime" was in her 70s when she was "training" a twenty-something called Eric. After 10 years she decided to let him go. "You have to let the young ones go. You don't want to be Hugh Hefner*."

Yawns. Seriously?

First: did she let him go, or did he leave all by himself?

Second: what's the difference between an old man fucking a 20-something woman, and an old woman "training" a 20-something man to fuck her?

Oh…we forgot. She was "training" him. That itself exonerates her having sex with a man younger than half her age, even when she's still having sex with him in her 70's.

Acceptable for feminists, as it constitutes training

Whereas Hugh Hefner is an example which shouldn't be followed, because he doesn't let young ones "go"—even if that the young ones might be with him out of their own motives and free will.

Is there an age limit for sex for men? What if an old man doesn't want to masturbate, and instead wants to fuck to get sexual release inside a consenting young woman's body, even if he might pay her for consent? Should he then too be ridiculed for the consent of the young woman?

This social hatred and exemplifying ridicule of senior men having sex with younger women is preposterous, and so is the absurd ridicule of consenting young women who choose to be with senior men. The fact remains: why the fuck should anyone care if a senior man wants, fucks, or even pays to fuck a young woman who's willingly accepted to sleep with him? Feminists are hypocritical on this point: even if she'd voluntarily accept to fuck with him even if may be for cash, she'd still be a victim because she'd be doing it for the money, or he'd be dating "out of his league."

Whereas if an old woman cavorts or fucks around with a young man, she's "training" him instead. Riighht. Sounds like modern feminist mature women are imagining themselves to be medieval courtesans 'training' young men. Marijuana or pot smoking can also contribute to and worsen such delusions among feminists especially if it's long term, and definitely not contribute at least to the 'longevity' of sanity.

'Training' in progress….

So, according to feminists: cougars are acceptable; "sugar daddies" are not. Sugar daddies need to let go and marry their hands when they're old, to become like invisible old feminist hags. This hatred and social ridicule of old men with young women is possibly also motivated by the fact that feminists know they can't be as fertile as men throughout their lives.

Was Eric "trained" to learn how to do this efficiently?

The modern culture of masturbation promotion

Masturbation is a common human activity, and even more in the modern world, and increasingly being promoted in modern oversexualized societies. Whether it may be through healthcare, porn, media, modern pop culture, or modern social conditioning, masturbation is gradually being increasingly accepted, with more men and women already indulging in it.

Female masturbation is increasingly promoted by modern pop music culture. Read more about it here.

Also, porn is increasingly taking over as the most common mode of sexual release in the modern world, and usually serves as the primary visual stimulus for masturbation, further complicating the situation—especially with rewiring human brains. The end result is that masturbation (worsened when coupled with porn) is gradually being preferred over actual sex in modernized societies (especially men), which could not only cause problems to the mind and body, but also to relationships and, most importantly, birth rates. Modern media also increasingly and casually promotes masturbation both for men and women. Public masturbation is also being accepted in some feminist societies.

which would give a lot of manginas and betas a lot of social condonance and relief…

The only benefits of masturbation are sexual or orgasmic release in: voluntary celibacy, absence of a partner or incelhood (involuntary celibacy), sexual reproductive problems for both genders where sex cannot be performed, and a possible protection against STDs in this age of promiscuity. Certain modern cults promote masturbation as a ritual, while other religions condemn it, or would condone it only if it serves to protect chastity and guard against sexual immorality. In these cases, where sex cannot be performed, masturbation can serve as an effective substitute solution for these individuals.

Health-wise, longevity from masturbation could result only because it may provide orgasm health benefits in case of lack of a partner, and could protect against life-threatening STDs from partners of unknown sexual health status (though mutual masturbation could still carry risks as much as sex could). But masturbation again cannot beat the health benefits of actual sex. For example, even oral sex, where ingestion of semen has been shown to have immense benefits for women. But again the benefits of sex are devalued with sex with STD stricken individuals, for both men and women.

But again sex holds more benefits than masturbation for men, especially older men when they have sex with younger women when it comes to longevity. Read more here. Similarly, polygamy has been found to have positive effects on male longevity, irrespective of age.

Thus men—and especially senior men above 50’s—need not have to let modern feminist social shaming condition them to act unnaturally by “letting go,” against what science and nature tells them to do. Sex with younger women, preferably in a polygamous model, has positive effects on male longevity as seen above. Men don’t need to be married to their hands in old age. Feminism's promotion of masturbation over natural sexual intercourse as the elixir of longevity seems too contrived, considering that regular sex beats masturbation in health benefits. In fact, long term masturbation without real intercourse could possibly affect both sexes negatively.

Is masturbation in fact the only "sex" feminist incels would actually get, and is thus being superficially promoted as a longevity cover?

While raw garlic may indeed have health benefits, the dangers of marijuana (and more here) are well known to affect both longevity and sanity. However, the real gist of her interview suggests that masturbation is often the only sex most feminists get—and more so after they're in their senior years. Maybe that's why masturbation is being possibly promoted for feminists as a recipe for longevity, while actually being a ploy to deflect social ridicule for their celibacy. Since masturbation is already being furiously shoved down the throats of people living in modern feminists societies today, the increasing acceptance of masturbation as a natural part of modern human sexuality would thus help to provide cover for aging feminists whose sexual market value has bottomed out.

While younger feminists will often waste away their eggs in their fertile years simply touching themselves or slutting around, traditional women in other parts of the world will have their eggs being fertilized by men in relationships to produce children. A generation of bisexual masturbating feminists and choosy post wall 30+ sluts looking to get wifed up are just a few examples of the dysfunctional breed of modern women feminism is producing to further contribute to lower birth rates and an eventual cultural collapse in modern societies. So most of these feminists would then be organizing more masturbation workshops for the next generation of women, to eventually share their own fate. Anyways, with these trends, feminism would likely die away by itself due to low reproduction rates and an obsession with self-love. But again, irrational feminism (worsened by pot smoking) would never accept that.

But we'd encourage feminists to masturbate. Considering that's the only sex they'd most likely to get.

Read More: Do Not Have Sex With Feminists

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

The Limits Of A Man’s Responsibility

August 16, 2014 | by Erik Hammer | Link | Original Link

“A man should take responsibility for his actions” is an often-heard maxim that rings true. It is a decree that a mature red pill man should live up to, though one that often comes up in difficult times of failure and hardship. If a man shies from his responsibility he can be considered a coward, and is often judged as one. But how far does our responsibility reach? What are the things in our life and the world we live in that we should be responsible for?

In our modern society legislation and tradition give us freedoms and responsibilities. There are never-ending lists of things that we do or have not done that we can be held responsible for. However, I am going to leave those to the lawyers and discuss the idea of responsibility by using the one thing we all want in our life, happiness, as a framework. And most importantly I’m going to discuss the limits of a man’s responsibility in terms of his own and other people’s happiness.

Let us consider these two sentences:

> “Egoistic, Selfish, Narcissistic and Self-centered are words used to describe a person who does not care about other people and only thinks of himself.”

> “Egoistic, Selfish, Narcissistic and Self-centered are words used to describe a person who puts his own happiness before other people.”

Notice the importance in the wording of the latter sentence: “A person who puts his own happiness before other people”

In truth, every red piller should put their own happiness before other people. The reason for this is that you yourself are the only person of whose happiness you are fully responsible for. If you take on the responsibility of other people's happiness, especially women's happiness, you will lead an unhappy life no matter how happy everyone else around you is. You might even have a successful career with a good income, a family, a house and kids. In other words, you might have the whole American dream but you yourself will be unhappy if your own happiness is not your prime priority. The Golden Rule does not apply in the real world. If you maximize and prioritize the happiness of others, they will never fully reciprocate.

Despite emphasizing the importance of focusing on one's own happiness, I believe that a life that gives the greatest fulfillment is one in which your life's mission benefits mankind. It is not simply a naïve quest, but a noble goal and one that should be pursued. A man should have a fulfilling mission, ideally one that benefits the cause he believes in and improves the quality of life and happiness of other people. Despite the nature of the noble cause, he must remember that he is not responsible for the happiness of others.

Think of what many of the writers in here are doing. Publishing books on self-development and masculinity is a noble cause, and many of them do it even without a product to sell. You do not need to be a cancer-fighting Ph.D to have a mission that is benefiting humanity. Still, no matter how noble his cause, if others accuse the man with a noble mission of not putting more effort in helping others, even if he has the means, he must not sacrifice his own plans for others if it does not increase his own fulfillment.

Therefore:

A man should lead a life that increases the quality of life and happiness of as many people as possible, but he can, and should, only be responsible for his own happiness

There is one exception to this rule. Offspring. Until their adulthood, a man as a father is responsible for the well-being and happiness of his children, and he is hopefully sharing the burden of responsibility with a loyal wife. But a time comes when this responsibility, too, ends. For children must eventually be responsible for their own lives.

When making decisions in life a man should aim for an increase in his own happiness and in the fulfillment of his own mission. Companions and advisers in these decision-making situations include your gut, your moral code, and your intellect. Listen to all three and ignore none. While you must prioritize yourself, remember that a never-ending indulgence of selfish desires usually leads to a purely hedonistic life devoid of true happiness.

Remember the quotation in the beginning. Take responsibility for your own life and actions, and remember that taking responsibility of yourself requires giving up responsibility on others. The ultimate form of narcissism is martyrdom in which a person sacrifices himself for everyone else and then complains why no one helps him. As the Greeks put it, "Gods help those, who help themselves." Live your life to yourself and focus on your mission. Then suddenly others will help you—because by helping you will they help themselves, as they too are living their lives for themselves.

Read More: The Limits Of American Feminism

Erik Hammer

Erik is a man from the North.

3 Habits That Every Man Should Practice

August 17, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Habits are activities that we engage in every day, often on a near-subconscious level. They are things that occupy a large percentage of the time we're awake. They define us.

Picture the man who gets off his 9-5 job, only to drive home, crack open a six pack, and watch sports recaps and television shows until passing out hammered. If these are things he tends to do on most days after work, they've become habits. And just from these two habits (drinking and watching television) you can construct a relatively accurate picture of this man's life: what he values, how he carries himself, and where he'll be in a few years time. What do you think?

I believe he probably values immediate satisfaction over long-term achievement. He most likely carries himself without much class or confidence. And he'll probably be working the same shitty job in a few years time. He also probably has a lackluster love life and struggles with depression and intense insecurity. Escapist habits like drinking and overconsumption of television tend to be coping mechanisms.

The good thing about habits is that once you become aware and conscious of their existence, they're not all that difficult to change. A strong initial push of willpower will usually instill a new habit into, or cut an unwanted existing habit out of, your regular behavior in a few weeks time. But which habits should you adopt?

I firmly believe the following three habits to be the best options available to men. They are all large habits, meaning that they're activities that take some time, not things like flossing your teeth or abstaining from masturbation. While I do think there's a lot of value in smaller habits as well, many of them tend to fall into place also automatically once larger positive habits have been established.

1. Resistance training

The benefits of following a proper exercise routine are numerous, starting with the discipline required to work out everyday and ending with the increased quality of life you'll experience as a result. And this doesn't even comment on the improved body composition, and the accompanying boost in confidence, you'll acquire along the way.

But, for me, the number one reason to train with resistance and lift weights is to cultivate physical strength. Physical strength is at the crux of what it means to be a man. Without physical strength, men aren't all that different than women. And while there are many other virtues of masculinity, like decisiveness and mental fortitude, most of them stem from the physical embodiment of strength.

Get on a proper weight lifting regimen ASAP and start realizing the aforementioned benefits.

2. Approaching women

The concept of “game” has many facets, but the act of approaching attractive women that you don’t know is undoubtedly is most important. This is because without actually approaching a girl, nothing else can come to fruition.

It’s also because the act of approaching a cute girl is a universal fear of men. And by making a habit of confronting a fear, you alter your reality. And this is where the real value of “game” comes into play.

Yes, enjoying a larger pool of women to interact with and attract is amazing, but the underlying process of training yourself to approach women in the face of internal resistance is what will change you. Suddenly tackling bigger obstacles in life, like quitting your job or pursuing a risky business venture, doesn’t seem like such a big deal.

Start approaching at least one girl per day to realize the benefits of this powerful practice.

3. Reading books

I was initially going to list meditation as the third habit. But truthfully, when you absorb yourself in the pages of a good book, you enter a meditative state. And you also can pull from the wisdom of great men that have came before you. So reading wins out.

I won't go into much more detail, because its benefits are clear. But realize that nearly every great man (since the invention of the printing press) has shared the habit of reading absurd amounts of literature.

So, if you don't already, start reading books, preferably ones in areas that you hope to improve upon.

Now imagine a man who lifts weights, approaches women and reads…

Chances are a man who practices these three habits is on his way to crushing life, if not already doing so. In stark contrast to the alcoholic television consumer we covered above, this man most likely values self improvement, carries himself with confidence, and will be making more money than he currently does in a couple years. He also probably has an amazing love life.

What do you do with your down time? What are your habits? What do they say about you?

If you enjoyed this article, you may be interested my new online bootcamp 28 Days To Alpha. Click here for more info.

Read More: The Reason Most Men Are Impotent And Depressed

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

The Lives and Opinions of Eminent Philosophers

August 17, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I bought this book to get an overview of the historical progression of Ancient Greek philosophy. It walked me through dozens of the more notable men who lived during that time by reviewing their biographies and main philosophy. For this review I'll share the ideas and statements I found most interesting.

Thales

Thales was one of the first astronomers who attempts to use science to explain natural phenomenon.

> He asserted water to be the principle of all things, and that the world had life, and was full of daemons: they say, too, that he was the original definer of the seasons of the year, and that it was he who divided the year into three hundred and sixty-five days.
>
> […]
>
> …he thanked fortune for three things: first of all, that he had been born a man and not a beast ; secondly, that he was a man and not a woman; and thirdly , that he was a Greek and not a barbarian.

> […]
>
> “God is the most ancient of all things, for he had no birth: the world is the most beautiful of things, for it is the work of God: place is the greatest of things, for it contains all things: intellect is the swiftest of things, for it runs through everything: necessity is the strongest of things , for it rules everything: time is the wisest of things, for it finds out everything.”
>
> […]
>
> When he was asked what was very difficult, he said, “To know one’s self.” And what was easy, “To advise another.”
>
> […]
>
> When asked how men might live most virtuously and most justly, he said, “If we never do ourselves what we blame in others.” To the question, “Who was happy?” he made answer. “He who is healthy in his body, easy in his circumstances, and well-instructed as to his mind.”

Solon

> …laws were like cobwebs— for that if any trifling or powerless thing fell into them, they held it fast; but if a thing of any size fell into them, it broke the meshes and escaped.
>
> […]
>
> …satiety was generated by wealth, and insolence by satiety.

Chilon

> What was difficult, he said, “To be silent about secrets; to make good use of one’s leisure, and to be able to submit to injustice.” And besides these three things he added further, “To rule one’s tongue, especially at a banquet, and not to speak ill of one’s neighbours; for if one does so one is sure to hear what one will not like.” He advised, moreover, “To threaten no one; for that is a womanly trick. To be more prompt to go to one’s friends in adversity than in prosperity. To make but a moderate display at one’s marriage. Not to speak evil of the dead. To honour old age.— To keep a watch upon one’s self.— To prefer punishment to disgraceful gain; for the one is painful but once, but the other for one’s whole life.— Not to laugh at a person in misfortune.— If one is strong to be also merciful, so that one’s neighbours may respect one rather than fear one.— To learn how to regulate one’s own house well.— Not to let one’s tongue outrun one’s sense.— To restrain anger.— Not to dislike divination.— Not to desire what is impossible.— Not to make too much haste on one’s road.— When speaking not to gesticulate with the hand; for that is like a madman.— To obey the laws.— To love quiet.”

Pittacus

> …he made a law that if a man committed a crime while drunk, he should have double punishment; in the hope of deterring men from getting drunk, as wine was very plentiful in the island.
>
> […]
>
> Being once asked what was best, he replied, “To do what one is doing at the moment well.”
>
> […]
>
> Once he was on a voyage with some impious men, and the vessel was overtaken by a storm; so they began to invoke the assistance of the Gods; on which he said, “Hold your tongues, lest they should find out that you are in this ship.”
>
> […]
>
> “Choose the course which you adopt with deliberation; but when you have adopted it, then persevere in it with firmness.— Do not speak fast, for that shows folly.— Love prudence.— Speak of the Gods as they are.— Do not praise an undeserving man because of his riches.— Accept of things, having procured them by persuasion, not by force .— Whatever good fortune befalls you, attribute it to the gods.— Cherish wisdom as a means of travelling from youth to old age, for it is more lasting than any other possession.”

Cleobulus

> …when a man goes out of his house , he should consider what he is going to do: and when he comes home again he should consider what he has done.
>
> […]
>
> — Be not haughty when prosperous.— Be not desponding when in difficulties.—Learn to bear the changes of fortune with magnanimity.

Periander

> Pleasures are transitory, but honour is immortal.— Be moderate when prosperous, but prudent when unfortunate. Be the same to your friends when they are prosperous, and when they are unfortunate.

Anacharsis

> He said that a vine bore three bunches of grapes. The first, the bunch of pleasure; the second, that of drunkenness; the third that of disgust. He also said that he marvelled that among the Greeks, those who were skilful in a thing contend together; but those who have no such skill act as judges of the contest. Being once asked how a person might be made not fond of drinking , he said, “If he always keeps in view the indecorous actions of drunken men.”

> […]
>
> When he was asked what there was among men which was both good and bad, he replied, “The tongue.” He used to say “That it was better to have one friend of great value, than many friends who were good for nothing.”

Socrates

> He, likewise, was the first person who conversed about human life; and was also the first philosopher who was condemned to death and executed.
>
> […]
>
> And very often, while arguing and discussing points that arose, he was treated with great violence and beaten, and pulled about, and laughed at and ridiculed by the multitude. But he bore all this with great equanimity. So that once, when he had been kicked and buffeted about, and had borne it all patiently , and some one expressed his surprise, he said, “Suppose an ass had kicked me would you have had me bring an action against him?”
>
> […]
>
> …in an argumentative spirit he used to dispute with all who would converse with him , not with the purpose of taking away their opinions from them, so much as of learning the truth, as far as he could do so…
>
> […]
>
> …he was a man able to look down upon any who mocked him. And he prided himself upon the simplicity of his way of life; and never exacted any pay from his pupils. And he used to say, that the man who ate with the greatest appetite, had the least need of delicacies; and that he who drank with the greatest appetite, was the least inclined to look for a draught which is not at hand.
>
> […]
>
> Once, when he was asked what was the virtue of a young man, he said, “To avoid excess in everything.”
>
> […]
>
> “That it is a good thing for a man to offer himself cheerfully to the attacks of the comic writers; for then, if they say anything worth hearing, one will be able to mend; and if they do not, then all they say is unimportant.”

Aristippus

> At another time he was asked what advantage philosophers had over other men; and he replied, “If all the laws should be abrogated, we should still live in the same manner as we do now.”
>
> […]
>
> “Those who eat most, and who take the most exercise, are not in better health > than they who eat just as much as is good for them; and in the same way it is not those who know a great many things, but they who know what is useful who are valuable men."

>
> […]
>
> Once when some one brought his son to introduce to him, he demanded five hundred drachmas; and when the father said, "Why, for such a price as that I can buy a slave." " Buy him then," he replied, "and you will have a pair."
>
> […]
>
> A man was boasting of being able to drink a great deal without being drunk; and he said, "A mule can do the very same thing ."
>
> […]
>
> "…the best thing is to possess pleasures without being their slave, not to be devoid of pleasures."
>
> […]
>
> On one occasion, when Simus, the steward of Dionysius, was showing him a magnificent house, paved with marble (but Simus was a Phrygian, and a great toper), he hawked up a quantity of saliva and spit in his face ; and when Simus was indignant at this , he said, "I could not find a more suitable place to spit in."
>
> […]
>
> He found fault with men, because when they are at sales, they examine the articles offered very carefully, but yet they approve of men's lives without any examination.

Theodorus

> He used also to say that it was reasonable for a good man not to expose himself to danger for the sake of his country, for that he ought not to discard his own prudence for the sake of benefiting those who had none.

Plato

> "Truth, my friend, is a beautiful and a durable thing; but it is not easy to persuade men of this fact."
>
> […]
>
> Of perfect virtue there are four species. One is prudence, one is justice, the third is manly gallantry, and the fourth is temperance . Of these, prudence is the cause of a man acting rightly in affairs; justice is the cause of his acting justly in partnerships and bargains; manly gallantry is the cause of a man's not being alarmed amid dangers and formidable circumstances, but standing firm; and temperance is the cause of his subduing his appetites, and being enslaved by no pleasure, but living decorously.

> […]
>
> Happiness is divided into five parts. For one part of it is wisdom in counsel; another is a healthy condition of the sensations and general health of body; a third is good fortune in one's affairs; a fourth kind is good reputation among men; a fifth is abundance of riches and of all those things which are useful in life. Now wisdom in counsel arises from good instruction, and from a person's having experience of many things. A healthy condition of the sensations depends on the limbs of the body; as, for instance, when one sees with one's eyes, and hears with one's ears, and smells with one's nose, and feels with one's body, just what one ought to see, and hear, and smell, and feel. Such a condition as this is a healthy condition . And good fortune is when a man does rightly and successfully what a good and energetic man ought to do. And good reputation is when a man is well spoken of. And abundance of riches is when a man has such a sufficiency of everything which relates to the uses of life, that he is able to benefit his friends, and to discharge all public obligations in a splendid and liberal manner.

Arcesilaus

> He once reminded a certain dialectician, a pupil of Aleximes, who was unable to explain correctly some saying of his master, of what had been done by Philoxenus to some brickmakers. For when they were singing some of his songs very badly he came upon them, and trampled their bricks under foot, saying, "As, you spoil my works so will I spoil yours."
>
> […]
>
> However , in all other respects he was so free from vanity, that he used to advise his pupils to become the disciples of other men; and once, when a young man from Chios was not satisfied with his school, but preferred that of Hieronymus, whom I have mentioned before, he himself took him and introduced him to that philosopher, recommending him to preserve his regularity of conduct. And there is a very witty saying of his recorded. For when some one asked him once, why people left other schools to go to the Epicureans , but no one left the Epicureans to join other sects, he replied, "People sometimes make eunuchs of men, but no one can ever make a man out of an eunuch."

Bion

> …he was asked who was the most miserable of men, and replied, "He who has set his heart on the greatest prosperity."
>
> […]
>
> Another saying of his was that it was a great evil not to be able to bear evil.
>
> […]
>
> He used to say that self-conceit was the enemy of progress. Of a rich man who > was mean and niggardly, he said, “That man does not possess his estate, but his estate possesses him.”

>
> […]
>
> Another of his sayings was, that young men ought to display courage, but that old men ought to be distinguished for prudence.
>
> […]
>
> He was once asked, what those who tell lies gain by it; “They gain this,” said he, “that when they speak truth they are not believed.”
>
> On one occasion he was asked how much educated men were superior to those uneducated; “As much,” said he, “as the living are to the dead.”
>
> […]
>
> It was a saying of his that education was an ornament in prosperity, and a refuge in adversity. And that those parents who gave their children a good education deserved more honour than those who merely beget them: for that the latter only enabled their children to live, but the former gave them the power of living well.
>
> […]
>
> …he said, that the wise man was not destitute of passions, but endowed with moderate passions.

Theophrastus

> They say that on one occasion, when dying, he was asked by his disciples whether he had any charge to give them; and he replied, that he had none but that they should “remember that life holds out many pleasing deceits to us by the vanity of glory; for that when we are beginning to live, then we are dying. There is, therefore, nothing more profitless than ambition.

Antisthenes

> When he was asked why he reproved his pupils with bitter language, he said, “Physicians too use severe remedies for their patients.”
>
> […]
>
> He used to say, as Hecaton tells us in his Apophthegms , “That it was better to fall among crows, than among flatterers; for that they only devour the dead, but the others devour the living.”
>
> […]
>
> When he was asked what advantage he had ever derived from philosophy, he replied, “The advantage of being able to converse with myself.”
>
> […]
>
> Some one was praising luxury in his hearing, and he said, “May the children of > my enemies be luxurious."

>
> […]
>
> And he used to say that the wise man would regulate his conduct as a citizen, not according to the established laws of the state, but according to the law of virtue.
>
> […]
>
> One should attend to one's enemies, for they are the first persons to detect one's errors.

Diogenes

> He used to say, that he wondered at men always ringing a dish or jar before buying it, but being content to judge of a man by his look alone.
>
> […]
>
> A profligate eunuch had written on his house, "Let no evil thing enter in." "Where," said Diogenes, "is the master of the house going?"
>
> […]
>
> A man once asked him what was the proper time for supper , and he made answer, "If you are a rich man, whenever you please; and if you are a poor man, whenever you can."
>
> […]
>
> He said that a rich but ignorant man, was like a sheep with a golden fleece.
>
> […]
>
> When he was asked how Dionysius treats his friends, he said, "Like bags; those which are full he hangs up, and those which are empty he throws away."
>
> […]
>
> When he was asked what advantage he had derived from philosophy, he replied, "If no other, at least this, that I am prepared for every kind of fortune."
>
> […]
>
> Once when he saw a young man putting on effeminate airs, he said to him, "Are you not ashamed to have worse plans for yourself than nature had for you? for she has made you a man, but you are trying to force yourself to be a woman."
>
> […]
>
> One day he saw an unskilful archer shooting; so he went and sat down by the target , saying, "Now I shall be out of harm's way."
>
> […]
>
> He used to say, that education was, for the young sobriety, for the old comfort, for the poor riches, and for the rich an ornament."
>
> […]
>
> "If you are accustomed to pleasure, you may begin to gain pleasure in > displeasure." (paraphrased)

Chrysippus

> He was once reproached by some one for not attending the lectures of Ariston, who was drawing a great crowd after him at the time; and he replied, "If I had attended to the multitude I should not have been a philosopher."
>
> […]
>
> "…the methods of providing one's self with means are ridiculous; for instance, some derive them from a king; and then it will be necessary to humour him. Some from friendship; and then friendship will become a thing to be bought with a price. Some from wisdom; and then wisdom will become mercenary; and these are the accusations which he brings."
>
> […]
>
> He calls drunkenness an expression identical with ruin, and rejects all superfluity, saying, "That no one ought to exceed the proper quantity of meat and drink."
>
> […]
>
> …when he was asked when a man might indulge in the pleasures of love, he replied, "Whenever you wish to be weaker than yourself."
>
> […]
>
> It is said that he used to admonish his disciples to repeat these lines to themselves whenever they returned home to their houses: In what have I transgress'd? What have I done? What that I should have done have I omitted?

Philolaus

> I say that all men ought above all things To guard against suspicion. For, though innocent, Still if you are suspected, you're unfortunate.

Heraclitus

> "All the men that exist in the world, are far removed from truth and just dealings; but they are full of evil foolishness, which leads them to insatiable covetousness and vain-glorious ambition.

Pyrrho

> …the same pursuits are good for one man, and injurious to another;
>
> […]
>
> …it is impossible for a man ever, in his researches, to arrive at undeniable truth; since one truth is only to be established by another truth; and so on, ad infinitum.
>
> […]
>
> The mode which is derived from relation rests on the doctrine that no object is > ever perceived independently and entirely by itself, but always in its relation to something else; so that it is impossible to know its nature correctly.

Epicurus

> Not every bodily constitution nor every nationality makes it possible for one to become wise.
>
> […]
>
> Even when put to torture, the wise man is happy.
>
> […]
>
> Whether he is well-off or not will be matter of indifference to him.
>
> […]
>
> Death is no concern to us. All things good and bad are experienced through sensation, but sensation ceases at death. So death is nothing to us, and to know this makes a mortal life happy. Life is not improved by adding infinite time; removing the desire for immortality is what's required. There is no reason why one who is convinced that there is nothing to fear at death should fear anything about it during life.
>
> […]
>
> …death, the most dreaded of evils, is nothing to us, because when we exist, death is not present, and when death is present, we do not exist. It neither concerns the living nor the dead, since death does not exist for the living, and the dead no longer exist.
>
> […]
>
> Everything we do is for the sake of freedom from pain and anxiety. Once this is achieved, the storms in the soul are stilled. Nothing else and nothing more are needed to perfect the well-being of the body and soul. It is when we feel pain that we must seek relief, which is pleasure. And when we no longer feel pain, we have all the pleasure we need.
>
> […]
>
> Although pleasure is the greatest good, not every pleasure is worth choosing. We may instead avoid certain pleasures when, by doing so, we avoid greater pains. We may also choose to accept pain if, by doing so, it results in greater pleasure.

Above I have shared the best parts of the book, but it comprises less than 1% of the total length, meaning you will have to to spend a lot of time finding the few nuggets of gold. The book contains mostly fluff with endless lists of names, places, and book titles, and the biographies of the lesser known philosophers were quite unsatisfying because their main philosophies are not clearly explained.

For you to attempt this book, you should be extremely patient with a strong interest in ancient philosophy. I don't think most men would be rewarded from reading it.

Read More: "The Lives And Opinions Of Eminent Philosophers" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Are Educated Women More Likely To Be Single?

August 18, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

There has been much discussion online with regard to the educated woman and her relative lack of romantic success. Much of this dialogue has been intended to explain this state of affairs and clarify both the source and resolution of the educated woman's sexual conundrum. In a recent piece at EliteDaily.com, Lauren "LMoney" Martin offers her own take on the subject and, in the process, brings us much closer to the clarification that prior discourse has sought.

> But why is this? Why don't men want women with whom they can converse and who challenge them? When did the aversion to strong and intelligent women become a code orange? When did everyone just want to go to the Bahamas and lie around?

This quote from LMoney puts a spotlight on one of the primary sources of the romantic malaise plaguing so many highly educated women: arrogance.

Women like LMoney are often very quick to point to male arrogance as an explanation for romantic disconnects, but they too often neglect to acknowledge their equal failing in that regard. In describing the alleged male aversion to female intelligence in the quote above, LMoney asks why "men don't want women with whom they can converse and who challenge them." The fundamental implication here is as follows: only educated women like LMoney are capable of conversing with men. Only educated women like LMoney are capable of challenging men. Women who didn't attend prestigous universities and lack high GPAs are not capable of conversing with men.

The reality, of course, is quite contrary to this. Not every woman who went to a great school and graduated with a high GPA is particularly skilled in conversation with the opposite sex. Just as a significant number of extremely intelligent men find their interpersonal communication skills wanting (especially when applied to the opposite sex), so do intelligent women sometimes struggle to connect with men they find interesting. Many of the women most skilled at conversing with the opposite sex do not have the greatest academic credentials.

To presume the conversational inferiority of another individual simply because they don't have your degree is, at worst, extraordinarily arrogant and, at best, simply misinformed. Your ability to converse with the opposite sex is not determined by your GPA or the quality of your school. You don't need a PhD to communicate with or "challenge" a man.

This is a fundamental issue. LMoney and many women like her are quite confident in their possession of an advantage that they do not actually have over other people, and go as far as to use this confidence to justify looking down on others who they falsely believe unable to do what they do. If you make a habit of running around with an unearned air of superiority such as this, it may be the case that you find your opportunities for interpersonal romantic fulfillment lacking.

> In an article by “The Wire,” financial reporter, John Carney, gives one explanation for this phenomenon, deducing, “successful men date less successful women not because they want ‘women to be dumb’ but rather because they want ‘someone who prioritizes their life in a way that’s compatible with how you prioritize yours.’”
> Basically, they want someone who isn’t ever going to let her career come before making dinner and pleasing them first.
>
> They want a woman who is dumb enough to make them a priority and, unfortunately, for all those sane, rational and intelligent women out there, there’s a hefty number of these women out there.

Here we find more of the fundamental arrogance described above. The implications above are as follows:

1. Women who make their men (and families) a priority are dumb.

2. Women like LMoney who prioritize their careers and do not make men and families a priority are the only women who are “sane, rational and intelligent.”

In short, LMoney is making the following argument: “Those who do not hold the same perspective on the intersection of romantic and professional life that I hold are insane, unreasonable, and unintelligent.” This argument is continued here:

> Those women who teach you, show you and help you grow are being picked over, combed through and dumped for girls with shirts that show a little too much skin and platform heels.

The assumptions in this sentence are as follows:

1. That girls who wear platform heels and relatively revealing tops cannot teach a man or help him grow

2. That women who can teach a man and help him grow never wear revealing tops and platform heels

Again, these are ignorant statements at best. At worst, they display a startling level of arrogance that would be difficult to find attractive in any human being.

The true extent of the arrogance displayed above is only magnified by passages such as these:

> A study conducted with 121 British participants reported findings that females with high intelligence in male/female relationships were seen as problematic.

LMoney claims to speak for “intelligent” women, and yet consistently publishes decidedly unintelligent statements online. The sentence above, for example, is perhaps best worded as follows:

> A British study involving 121 participants found that females with high intelligence were considered problematic in heterosexual relationships.

Granted, everyone makes mistakes—nobody is perfect, in writing or otherwise. If you intend to go on and on about your own intellectual superiority, however, it may be prudent to ensure that the quality of your writing is up to a high standard, lest you be mistaken for one of the “dumb” individuals whose perspectives you seem so intent on shaming and dismissing.

Again, I find this to be the fundamental problem with too many women like LMoney: they think they bring far more to the table than they actually do, and are so confident in this belief that they base a tremendous portion of their self-worth and identity on it. Since this belief implies that they are already in possession of everything a member of the opposite sex could want, they don’t spend much time actually examining what the opposite sex wants and correcting any potential deficiencies they may have. As they age and begin to perceive a disconnect between their belief in their own superiority and the reality they live in, they end up in a difficult position. Because they’ve been so convinced of their superiority for so long, they’re entirely unprepared to deal with a reality in which they are not ideal and may actually have to make some personal improvements in order to get what they want or (GASP) settle for something else.

They also spend so much energy embodying the ideal of the independent woman (loudly, proudly, and consistently proclaiming that they do not prioritize men and don't really need them for anything) that they compromise their ability to find the romantic gratification they subconsciously crave. Good relationships involve a degree of mutual dependence, with each partner recognizing the value of the other and treating them accordingly. In a good relationship, it is typical for both partners to develop an actual need for one another — their presence becomes crucial to the wellbeing of the other. They become a priority to one another because of how much they matter to one another.

One can imagine it being substantially more difficult to begin and maintain such a relationship when you have spent so much energy investing in the idea that individuals of the opposite sex are totally unnecessary and fundamentally unworthy of the serious effort needed to bring and keep them in your life. How difficult must it be to maintain a serious relationship when you've spent the bulk of your life marking the individual you seek to enter a relationship with as a disposable and unessential accessory (at best) and an unnecessary nuisance (at worst)?

Perhaps LMoney and others like her should consider such questions in their bid to discover the source of their romantic malaise. They may find the answers quite illuminating.

Read More: Single Women Want Your Money

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

The Inevitable Gap Between Theory And Practice

August 18, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

There is a gulf between theory and practice. It can be a simple matter to know how to do something in the abstract, but actually implementing the ideal is quite different. We try to adjust ourselves to this tension as best we can, and trudge forward. There will always be some degree of difference between what we say, and what we do. The matter is one of degree.

When the gap becomes too wide, we fall into the yawning sinkhole of hypocrisy. But at what point does the gap between theory and practice become unbridgeable? At what point does the label “hypocrite” attach? It is an interesting moral question. The life and career of the philosopher Lucius Annaeus Seneca may provide us with some answers.

Seneca remains a controversial figure. He hailed the virtues of a simple life, yet collected mansions and mountains of money. He advised the quiet of country living, yet craved the intrigue of the palace. He advised sexual restraint, yet took full advantage of his position for his extramarital gratification. He praised honesty and sincerity, yet flattered the emperor Nero and his cronies as often as he could. To this balance sheet we must add his many positive traits: he did his best to mitigate Nero’s worst excesses, he was generous with his friends, he had the courage eventually to resist his tyrant employer, and he had a first-rate mind. The best way of exposing the contradictions in his character is to present his best qualities first, and then describe his less savory ones. We may then venture some conclusions.

Seneca owned many estates in the Italian countryside

Seneca The Man Of Virtue

He was born at Corduba (modern Cordova, Spain) around 4 B.C. His father, a noted rhetor, saw to it that the boy received the finest education possible. He practiced law in Rome, and served in a minor office as quaestor around 33 B.C. A timely inheritance from his father enabled him to pursue writing and palace politics in Rome. He tutored the young regent Nero for five years, and turned out moral essays (On Anger, On the Brevity of Life, On Benefits, etc.) that are beautiful exemplars of Stoic thought. But being in proximity to a tyrant was ultimately an impossible position. Slowly he became a prisoner of the palace, unable to do much good, and yet unable to leave. He begged Nero to let him resign, but the tyrant would not permit it.

Seneca was able to do some good. He donated a significant percentage of his fortune to the imperial treasury to help rebuild Rome after the great fire of 64 A.D. Yet he could not escape the paranoia of the mad sovereign. Nero accused him of complicity in a plot to dethrone him, and ordered him to take his own life. This he did with quiet dignity. His beloved wife Paulina tried to follow him, but Nero forcibly prevented her suicide.

His essays and letters are masterpieces of the Stoic creed's admonition to live a virtuous life. Wisdom should be the art of living, a skill to be practiced daily. He points out the ideal road, but does not demand it; he is too practical to advocate perfection. There is more wisdom in a few of his pages than in the reams of nonsense penned by most modern writers.

Seneca The Hypocrite

Yet the picture is not quite complete. Even sages have dark sides, and Seneca was no exception. He was exiled to Corsica early in his life for scandalous relations with the daughter of a powerful Roman general named Germanicus. He was lucky to escape from that indiscretion with his neck. His writings from exile, like those of the poet Ovid from his own exile near the Black Sea, do not show him at his Stoic best.

He took full advantage of his official position to enrich himself. He lent money at crushing rates of interest, and counted his fortune at about three hundred million sesterces (at least five hundred million modern US dollars). He had numerous country estates, while at the same time never tiring of denouncing luxury. He posed to scorn imperial courtiers, while occupying a key position as premier. Accusations of sexual impropriety seemed to follow him wherever he went, leaving us to wonder if there must be more than a bit of truth to them. All in all, it is hard to square the beauty of his writings with the realities of how he lived his life. What are to think of a man who could write the following, while at the same time maintaining himself in opulence:

> An atrium full of antique marble busts does not indicate nobility. No one in the past has lived for our glory. And neither does what preceded us belong to us. Only the soul makes for nobility, which may rise from whatever condition above Fortune. [Epistulae 44.5].

Conclusion

All men are figures of contradiction. It is only a matter of degree. Those who seek and serve power inevitably find themselves forced to make daily compromises that erode their ideals. Undoubtedly, Seneca falls short of his professed doctrines. Yet which of us can claim to be any better? Is there anything wrong with seeking and enjoying material success, while at the same time appreciating the ideals of Stoic virtue?

Serving a tyrant is an impossible position, and he probably sensed he was a marked man no matter what he did. Seneca never claimed to be perfect; he only points for us the road to virtue. Despite his flaws, there is something endearing about this sly old teacher. We recognize ourselves in him, and forgive him his faults. His death and his writings redeemed him for posterity, and washed away the memory of his avarice and pride.

A nearly impossible job: trying to please Nero

One gets the sense that Seneca was acutely aware of the divergence between what he wrote and how he lived. I imagine that all men who occupy positions of power feel some sort of inner conflict. To translate high ideals into practice: is this not the most difficult thing in history? How many leaders have been able to do this? More than anything else, he is a tragic figure. He was caught between two tensions: the desire for power and wealth, and the desire to live an uncorrupted, virtuous life. He was tormented by his inability to reconcile these two conflicting impulses.

Perhaps this is why he, despite his paganism, was such a revered figure to early Christian writers. Tertullian and St. Augustine practically considered him one of their own, calling him “our Seneca.” His writings (if not his example) molded some of the greatest statesman and minds of later centuries.

Life is not black and white. We will fall short of our ideals more often than we will attain them. What matters is a consistent, sincere effort. The gap between theory and practice is only bearable by our honest attempts to bridge the intervening space. To ask for more would be to set ourselves up for failure. If we accept man as he is, and not as he ought to be, then we must love Seneca.

Read More: How To Forgive Your Family

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

A Good Wife Versus A Bad Wife

August 18, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

My husband is my sexual partner and the center of my universe. He makes me special. I'll take care of him as my top priority. It costs me nothing to gratify him sexually, and even though I am not experienced in bed, I will learn both what he likes and seek to improve my skills and increase the variety of sexual experiences he can have with me.

He'll have the best blowjobs, handjobs, footjobs, anal, deepthroat and anything else I can imagine or learn about. I'll never turn him down but make it so he has to work just a little bit. Sometimes I will initiate but not so often that he feels like I am shoving my cunt in his face. If he turns me down I know it's only because he's tired and I've already swallowed his load twice today, so that's okay. I might even consider bringing one of my single friends over for a threesome soon, as I want my man to be king of the castle. Those bitches need a good shafting and seeing them getting pounded by my man will make me Queen Bee. They can never really have him like I do. I want to treat him right and show them that he's all mine no matter how much pussy is on offer.

I will keep myself in good shape and dress nicely, especially in the bedroom. My wardrobe will be well-stocked with lingerie and I will keep our bedroom like a courtesan's boudoir. I want him to be relaxed, as I know he has a busy and demanding life out there in the big wide world.

Making something of himself is important to him and also to me. I know that unless he goes out calm, confident, and relaxed from his wonderful fulfilling home life, he might just go and set up home somewhere else. At the very least neither of us will be happy unless his professional life is going smoothly and he can rely on his support system at home. I will eat a sensible diet, avoid all the fads, and work out moderately to stay in shape, but not so much that I get exhausted and can't spend time with my man.

I will take good care of the rest of the house, keeping it tidy and well-stocked with his favorite food and drink. I know that his focus is on work outside the home so I want him to have a nice place to come back to, but not a show home that is stiff and uncomfortable. I won't nag him about unnecessary things, and when it comes to finances and domestic arrangements, I will have quiet, relaxing, engaging conversations. I will be conscientious enough to pick the best moment when he is not stressed from work or about to leave for an important meeting.

I want him to be the best he can be, because otherwise who did I marry? I never want to drag him down, belittle him or spoil his mood. He may be distant sometimes, but I will give him the space he needs. He is my other half, so how can I be anything unless he is 100%?

I will work with him to guide and educate our children so they grow up to be useful, generous, well-balanced individuals that might actually stick around past their 16th birthday and give us some extended family in our old age.

How A Wife Actually Acts

My career is my priority. Although I haven't worked in nearly a decade because I've been busy having kids, I constantly yap on about how much I enjoy my professional life and how I will excel when I go back to work, although I do almost nothing to find serious employment. I love being a stay-at-home mom, but for some reason I'm still not fully happy with it so I complain about it endlessly. Nothing is ever good enough for me and I am always "exhausted" although I do little during the day. When I do finally get a job it won't be about the money or supporting my family, it will just be about ME. After clothing, makeup, travel expenses, and poor pay because I only work part-time, my job will be cost negative, but it's okay because my husband pays the bills and I will insist on working anyway, because it's soooo important to me.

I must get on a diet and go to the gym. I talk about it like a broken record but never actually go, even though I am motoring through several hundred dollars a month on memberships to multiple establishments and frequently purchase expensive brand name gym clothes I only use to pick up the kids from school. I must go and buy all the latest diet fads and hop from one to the next until my poor metabolism is so confused I have more blubber than a Minke whale and our monthly grocery bill is through the roof on useless health foods. I only consume one glass of fat free milk, a bowl of salad, and 15 donuts a day. Why I am I so fat? I should become vegan. I need $50,000 of plastic surgery. There is a sale at Louis Vuitton soon. I must go to Ikea and buy a new truckload of horrid uncomfortable furniture, the living room is so cluttered and we don't have nearly enough throw cushions on the bed. You can almost lie down on it without doing 20 minutes of rearranging. Hang on, before I leave let just me make the bathroom look like a tornado hit a cosmetics factory. I do love the smell of stale sanitary towels in the garbage can, don't you?

My husband is nothing but a nuisance. When he is around I treat him like an emotional punching bag. He doesn't deserve any respect. With my shrill voice and my annoying emotional tones I constantly keep him on edge by shouting his name until he has to come running. Although I'm practically old enough to be a grandma, I always make him aware that I have other men in the pipeline. Poor schmuck. Even though his job sounds sooo dull, he seems happy when he heads off to work and I don't understand why. At least I can add some misery to his life while he is at home. I never have time for him anyway, what with the children and all the BFFs I need to keep up with. He missed his promotion last year, but I'm not surprised as he's such a lifeless chump.

He eats in the drive-through on the way home from work and fetches the groceries and cleans the house on the weekend as he has nothing better to do, especially now that I've sold his golf clubs and guitar on eBay. I have no idea why he wanted to buy a small boat—I spent that money taking the kids to Disneyland instead. Perhaps I should sell the computer too, he stays up late at night on it for some reason.

My life is so scattered, stressed, and miserable. We never have sex so I have to masturbate in the shower on my own. I bought a dildo when I went to the sex shop with my BFF, it’s hidden in the bottom draw. I keep buying things all the time but they never seem to be of much use. I wish we had more money and I wish I could lose weight. I can’t understand why my children are so spoiled and badly behaved. My daughter lost her virginity at 13 last year, and now she’s started smoking pot. Should I be a proud mom? These modern times are so confusing. Cosmo says I should have an affair and then get a divorce. The article said you have to have an affair first to make sure it’s really over.

Read Next: The Most Abominable Christian Wife On The Internet

5 Tips For Getting A Quality Foreign Woman

August 19, 2014 | by jim soler | Link | Original Link

I've been in the international game for over twelve years. I even have a master's degree in international relations. From Asia to South America, I've met my fair share of foreign women of different colors, ages, shapes and mindsets. I've been with intellectual women to those that are young and native, but beautiful. Now 33, I am with the right woman after years of shuffling through the deck. She is foreign, beautiful, sweet, feminine and caring—exactly the characteristics that so many American men yearn for. It's no wonder that friends, co-workers, and random guys are always asking me how I did it.

It amuses me how dudes assume I have some hidden secret. I've been a teacher most of my life, so it isn't my money or my looks—my love of beer definitely has me nowhere close to having a toned body. In fact, many foreign women are forgiving when it comes to financial success or looks. In reality, I don't have any secret. I just do what I do and I haven't met many guys that can keep up. I often see Western guys desperate to get an Asian or Latina honey, but awkwardly striking out. Many of these boneheads are even good-looking and have money, but no game to match. That is sad, but I am offering my advice because I'm tired of watching you fellows struggle. Before you make judgments about me, put your ego aside and check out my five tips for finding a quality foreign woman.

1. Behave like a man

Whether in the US or abroad, I see a lot of American men who start behaving like they were in middle school the minute they start talking to a foreign woman. I've witnessed this in both Asia and in Latin America. If you can't get away with acting like a dumbass with American girls, then don't do it with that cute Japanese or Colombian girl sitting next to you. Remember, foreign women are often attracted to American men because of our reputation for being gentlemen.

While our own American women can't appreciate this, a foreign women certainly will. If you are in a bar, don't put your arm around a foreign girl you don't know or pull her hat off of her head as a joke. They get enough of this childish play from their own men, which is the reason why a lot of foreign women entertain the idea of being with an American guy in the first place. It's good to be funny and charming, but don't be an ass. Foreign women are beautiful, intelligent, and kind, so give them respect—more of them actually deserve it.

2. Stop playing the race card

It's 2014, fellows. Everyone has the internet and watches American movies and shows depicting the diversity and dynamics of American culture. On average, women are generally more accepting of other races and cultures. If you are a white guy, stop playing the "angry white guy" routine. It's a huge turn off for women. The world is changing at warp speed, so get over it or die in bitterness. A good foreign woman will appreciate an American man that is open-minded, mature, and intelligent.

The idea that Asian girls are only attracted to white guys and you need just to show up and be a "white dude" is dying hard. That might have been the case twenty years ago, but not anymore. The new global generation thinks differently and what matters now is who you are as an individual. On the other hand, if you are a brother or Latino, that whole act of hanging out in the club and being cool is getting old as well. Sure, you may be able to pull some club rats back to your crib on the weekend, but I am talking about finding a quality foreign woman that will love you like you have never been loved before. A nice foreign lady in 2014 wants to know what is inside your brain regardless of what race or ethnic background you are.

3. Learn her language

I am not saying that you need to become completely fluent in her language, or even reach the conversational level at first. However, at least make an effort. Again, a beautiful foreign woman wants an American man who is intelligent, not a walking stereotype of the typical ignorant American. She wants to be proud to introduce you to her friends and family. Whether you start dating a Latina honey or Chinese girl, make an effort to learn even the basics of her language. Even if you only know ten or twenty words, she will appreciate the effort.

Unlike American women, foreign women often appreciate men that try. When you start learning her language, pay particular attention to the correct pronunciation. Don't make fun of her language or culture and definitely do not mock her English. However, if she doesn't want you speaking her language, move on to the next girl—she's probably only using you to learn English.

4. Learn to love her food

This is one that still boggles my mind. I meet a lot of American men so desperate for an exotic foreign lady, but extremely picky about food. This one is tied in with language and culture, since food is such an essential part of someone's background. Unfortunately, we don't value food in America like other cultures do. You need to realize that the nice Mexican girl or Japanese cutie you just starting dating needs her man to love her food. Not only does she want you to eat her cooking, but she also wants to be able to eat out sometimes at restaurants of her taste. A good foreign woman wants a masculine, worldy man, and not a whiny, uncultured goon. You don't have to enjoy each item on the menu, but make some kind of effort. Trust me, you will be rewarded in the bedroom.

5. Make her laugh

This is an obvious one, since it is the secret to attracting all women. Unfortunately, Western women don't seem to appreciate good humor like they used to. More often then not, they'd prefer to use the opportunity to put you down even when you employ quality humor. However, foreign women on average are more playful and love a man who can make them laugh. This is particularly true in parts of Asia and especially in Latin America. A nice foreign woman also likes to see you make others laugh. She wants to see that you are sociable and the kind of guy who can joke around with people and not get easily offended by what others say. Remember, people are not so PC in other parts of the world as they are in the United States.

Please feel free to comment and add any tips you think may be useful. You may not agree with what I have to say, but I am only speaking from experience. I have seen it and done it all, and I can tell you that it is a beautiful world out there. Follow my lead and you will increase your chances of attracting a quality foreign woman.

Read More: 10 Reasons Why Foreign Women Are Better Than American Women

---

jim soler
Jim is a traveler and freelance writer that has lived in many countries and currently is traveling the world. He enjoys interacting with different cultures and stirring up interesting conversations.

The Simplest Way To Approach Hot Girls For Newbies

August 20, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

In life, it is often easy to overcomplicate things. After all, complicated can sometimes feel like it should be better than simple.

I have spent a long time trying to develop my skills as a fiction writer. I love literature from all periods, but I have a special fondness for tricksy, postmodern writers like David Foster Wallace, Thomas Pynchon, and William Gaddis. This means that I spent a lot of time trying to emulate their work, writing long, self-referential "meta" narratives that no one in their right mind would want to read.

Then I picked up Bukowski. If you haven't read him then you should. Dude is red pill as fuck. But the point is, his work is incredibly simple. Women, his 1978 bestseller, recounts his experiences getting drunk and banging a bunch of girls. That's it. The language he uses is plain and unadorned:

> I was 50 years old and I hadn't been to bed with a woman for four years. I had no women friends, I looked at them as I passed them on the streets or wherever I saw them, but I looked at them without yearning and with a sense of futility. I masturbated regularly, but the idea of having a relationship with a woman—even on no-sexual terms—was beyond my imagination.

Incredibly simple, but it brings to life his loneliness with elegance and economy. A lesser writer might have spent several paragraphs trying to say the same thing.

See The Beauty in Simplicity

I have an analytical mind. I enjoy sophisticated, complex ideas and I get a buzz out of feeling I figured them out. It was like this when I got into the game. I read Neil Strauss, and many other pick-up books. I read Sperm Wars. I read a lot of online forums. Here was a brave new world. Incredible, these new insights into social dynamics and female psychology. Even more incredible when I went out into the field, put them into practice and it worked!

But too much theory, and too much intellectualizing, can over-complicate what is actually a very simple thing. After all, men and women were meeting and having sex long before the internet as invented and game was promulgated through it.

As with writing, the best game is generally the simplest. But sometimes when we read game gurus, or watch their You Tube videos, it is easy to feel we have to live up to some artificial, external standard.

What is Game?

At base, game is incredibly simple:

Opportunity + escalation → Sex

For all the millions of words that have been written on the subject, this simple equation is what it comes down to. You create an opportunity with a woman, you escalate and then you have sex with her.

The only problem is that not every woman will be receptive to your approach, or some obstacle will come up that will derail your attempt. For that reason, you need to create as many opportunities as possible.

The Direct Approach

For a long time, I have used direct game. Shock and awe, if you will. “Hey, you—come here. You’re fucking hot.” There are many variants, but you get the basic idea.

Now granted, that doesn’t sound especially complicated. But the nest of theories about alpha dominance and the display of “dark triad” traits underlying it is. It is a self-consciously “gamey” approach.

Direct works, and it works very well. It works especially well when the girl is already attracted, true. But—and people often fail to realize this—if your approach is strong enough, it can also create attraction in itself. Simply having the balls to approach a woman sober and convey your sexual attraction to her unashamedly and without fear of rejection automatically puts you in the top percentile of men she will encounter. I have got laid through doing just this many, many times. Of course, it helps if you are well-presented and project yourself as a high-value man, but this is within everyone's reach.

That said, the blow out rate for direct approaches is very high. Why? Because when you put your desire for her out there up front, there really is nowhere else to go in the interaction. It's a bit like asking a closed question while trying to make a sale. "Do you want to buy this bread or not?" Since you haven't warmed up the buyer by describing the bread's features and benefits, they can only make a knee-jerk decision about it—and that decision is not often the one you would like.

The Awesome Power of Indirect

Ask yourself this? Throughout history, men have gotten laid as well as players. How have they managed it?

By starting random, seemingly innocuous conversations with women they're attracted to.

Recently I have been running a lot of indirect game. The results have been remarkable.

After a period away from hardcore gaming due to work commitments, I decided to get myself back into the swing of talking to random people by asking for directions. I spent an hour asking girls in central London where the Apple store is. This had several effects:

- I saw that some girls would reject the question even though it as entirely innocuous.

This made me feel less bad about the times a more obviously sexual approach had been rejected in a similar way in the past.
- It got me into a state of momentum and a great mood very quickly
- I saw that at least a few of the girls I approached were interested in continuing the conversation.

I suppose I had previously been a little snobbish about indirect (even though I've used it plenty of times) because I felt that the ballsy "alpha" guy would not hide his intent. However, this brief experiment revealed the awesome power of the indirect opener:

- Going indirect makes you less easy to reject from the beginning, as your request for directions or advice might well be legitimate. Politeness dictates that your target must at least listen and make some kind of response. Because she is unsure of your sexual interest in her, she can't risk blowing you out harshly.
- An indirect opener give you a couple of seconds more to convey your personality.
- It will get her hamster running on overdrive—"does this guy like me or not?"
- At the same time, strong eye contact will lend the interaction an undercurrent of sexuality.

How to Make Indirect Work for You

- Spot your target. Approach. Put all thoughts of pulling her out of your mind at this point—you are simply going to ask her for information.
- Approach confidently—after all, there's no reason for you not to (see above).
- Deliver your question. It doesn't matter what it is. Directions are great. Ask where a certain street is, or store.
- Maintain strong eye contact. This is key. While you shouldn't look overtly flirtatious, there should be at least a degree of ambiguity in the interaction.
- When she gives her answer, you can fluff talk for a second, keeping up the eye contact ("Ah, I thought it was on Regent Street…") The purpose of this is to get her to talk a little more so that you can then move into your transition.
- If she seems distracted or keen to move on the walk away. Nothing lost. But if she lingers at all, even barely perceptibly, then move on to the next stage.

Transitioning

- Transition—this is advancing the conversation on from the initial topic. Make a statement about her. It can be anything, for instance, about something she's wearing. I often comment on her accent. "You sound Portuguese." It doesn't matter if you are right or not. In fact, the more wrong you are the better. That way she will likely laugh, and you can bust her on what she comes back with.
- Fluff talk. This is where you need to come across as a relatively normal, well-adjusted human being. "Oh yeah, I went to Portugal once—lovely beaches etc." Again, simplicity is key. Don't feel like you need to do anything to clever or gamey. Just have a regular conversation, maintaining strong eye contact all the while.

- Tell a story based on what she says. Recently a girl told me she worked in a maternity clinic. I told her about how when I was a little kid my dad greeted a woman in the park, and told me after she'd passed that she had been my midwife, but that I'd misunderstood and thought he had meant that this woman would one day become my wife. A bullshit story, but mildly amusing if told correctly, with the benefit of a cute kid angle.
- You've now been chatting for a few minutes. Hopefully she has been smiling and laughing. Now you should get her contact details. Simply say "Hey, it's been great chatting. We should hang out sometime—put your number in here," then hand her your phone.

From an entirely innocuous start, you now have the phone number of a new woman, who you can game via text as normal. Now arrange a date and escalate.

All sounds simple? That's because it is. Remember, when you strip away all of the PUA bullshit, men and women meeting is the most straightforward thing in the world. Repeat the above formula enough times and I guarantee you will get laid without having to resort to clever tricks and techniques.

Indirect takes the pressure off both you and the girl—you're not required to act like a sick pimp player, and there is less of a risk of rejection as if you sense she is not interested you can simply move on without losing face (although you should always try to push each interaction as far as you can before throwing in the towel). She isn't put on the spot so much, and is given the opportunity to meet you and experience your personality in a way that feels natural and straightforward. Everyone wins.

Remember, though—the essence of approaching, particularly in the daytime, is being normal. Nothing is worse than watching some badly-calibrated, super-gamey buffoon attempt to pull. Ask a good friend to be honest with you and tell you how you come across to other people. If any negatives come up then you should take steps to fix these. By all means practice your game at the same time, but realize that being good socially is half the battle.

After that, realize that game can be simpler than you think, and you don't have to pimp it like a rock star to get laid with hot girls.

For more on how to achieve an abundant sex life with beautiful women click here

Read More*: Why It's Important To Develop An Insane Degree Of Self-Love*

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The Ferguson Riots Show Why Good Cops Will Quit

August 20, 2014 | by Henry Calgues | Link | Original Link

Cops have been risking their lives for many years now with little appreciation from the communities they serve. Being underappreciated has always been acceptable and has never stopped any of us from going to work every day. But as explained in my previous article, "Why Americans Should Reconsider Their Contempt for Today's Police," lack of appreciation is turning into contempt and condemnation. Unreasonable contempt and condemnation from the community an officer serves will cause him to turn in his uniform. I think Ferguson will be a test to see how cops react, and could prove to be the beginning of the end for good cops.

Mike Brown was branded an "unarmed black teenager" from the very beginning. As the media covered the story, the naive American public had little choice but to imagine poor little Mike walking home from school, thrilled to get home and tell his mother that he got an "A" in science. And then again to tell his father when he got home from work.

When such an angel is imagined dead in the street, one cannot help but to picture the grotesque monster that gunned him down. The nameless, faceless officer was drawn up in every psychotic mind within this newly divided America. Every fringe painted their own specific and frightening image of the evil cop. The leftists and black supremacists only needed to draw the policeman as white, while the new right wing drew him as a militarized robot. With that, a conceptual, inhuman monster emerged as a common enemy to opposing sides; all before any real information was known.

For days, nobody knew why the altercation even started between Mike Brown and the police. We still don't even know all the facts surrounding the actual shooting other than initial reports that Mike Brown was inside the police car fighting with the officer in a struggle over the officer's gun.

Then recently we learned that Mike Brown committed a strong-arm robbery at a local store before being stopped by police. An officer happened to stop Mike shortly after for walking in the middle of the street (A side note: You might consider a cop addressing jaywalking as harassment, but it is common for inner city youth to walk in the street to disrupt traffic and look for a fight with people who challenge them). It is apparent from the store footage that Mike Brown doesn't mind a fight, and I'm sure he thought he was being stopped for robbing that store just minutes prior, and was already preparing for another fight in order to avoid going to jail.

Mike Brown thought he could just take things that were not his, and use violence against property owners that tried to stop him. When stopped by the police, he decided to attack the officer and to try to take his gun. As a result, Mike ended up dead, but thankfully the officer that was doing his job is ok, right? Thank God we have guys like him to maintain law and order, correct? Instead, Ferguson burns while some people exclaim racism and cry that they are subject to a police state.

Reaction

The fringes went into full gear to exploit the incident to further their agendas. Black supremacists marched behind the mask of justice, while the confused new right wing offered indirect social media support. Freedom loving, second amendment preservers with CCW permits who would have shot Mike Brown in the same situation might have even joined the rioters if they could—just for that chance to hurt a cop and symbolically get revenge against a system that has forsaken them.

If you are a critical thinker, consider if your contempt for the police is instrumented by leftists after all. You're compelled to sit idly by while cops that represent law and order are run over in the streets, ultimately standing down in the end, leaving the amount of property damage and carnage up to the emotion and will of unjust rioters and racial supremacists. Ferguson will ripple from city to city, if only as a reminder to certain groups of what they can get away with. You feel some sort of victory as you mistake your friends as enemies and your enemies as friends.

In "The Death of a Nation," a book written in 1968 by John A. Stormer about communist infiltration in America and how to fight it, a few suggestions are offered:

> "Support your local police. Determine whether they have authority to put down trouble when it starts. Have they been hamstrung by political restrictions as police in Detroit, Newark, and other cities have been? Expose communist efforts to undermine confidence in local police forces."

Is there even a single city left that isn't "hamstrung by political restrictions?"

He goes on to quote J. Edgar Hoover:

> "...for years it has been communist policy to charge 'police brutality' in a > calculated campaign to discredit law enforcement and to accentuate racial issues. The riots and disorders of the past three years clearly highlight the success of this communist smear campaign in popularizing the cry of 'police brutality' to a point where it has been accepted by many individuals having no affiliation with or sympathy for the communist movement."

Inadvertently supporting radical leftists by condemning law enforcement, which is the immune system that is tasked with fighting their disease, is suicide. It is fantasy to imagine the criminal rioters in Ferguson as freedom-loving Americans that have been wronged, and supporting them is taking on the role of the left's "useful idiot." I know that officer did not execute Mike Brown like they contend. In the end, we may see some issues of poor tactics or bad decisions, but we all know that Mike Brown was not just walking home from school, and he was not the "gentle giant" that the media needed to convince the public he was in the beginning to get emotions flared up.

Militarized or modern?

The new right wing wrongly concludes that leftists want strong local police forces to enforce <insert leftist agenda here>, but they actually don't. Not yet. The left probably will not support strong police agencies until they are centralized by disbanding local agencies into large metropolitan ones, which is slowly happening under the guise of budget deficits. Actually, the left often uses political correctness and activism to weaken local police departments that have decent control over their criminal elements.

I've been trying to convey in my previous articles that local cops are still very local. Even if they don't live in the ghetto that they patrol, there's a good chance they grew up there or nearby and still have roots within. There is room for improvement via self-evaluation necessary from cops as noted in my last article, but they still have their hearts in the right place; they can be swayed and won over with your support, or at least with a lack of your condemnation. Leftists and racial supremacists cannot be won over.

Does the fact that the mainstream media condemns the "militarized police" say anything? Rand Paul recently used Ferguson as an opportunity to take measures to "de-militarize the police." What exactly is a militarized cop anyway? Weapons and tactics have always evolved. Were the police militarized when they transitioned from revolvers to semi-automatic pistols? Or when they began wearing bulletproof vests? I wonder if some old-timer once condemned those dastardly constables and their unnecessary automobiles that they were always zooming around in while fondly thinking of the simpler times when lawmen rode horses. Even before that, someone probably condemned the "military-style horses" of the deputies. The only difference is that they did not have social media and a bunch of mindless followers parroting their fear in a deafening echo-chamber.

Cops don't offer a fair fight. We always want the advantage while learning and reacting to every mistake. Sometimes the lesson learned is that we need more firepower, as in the case of the Hollywood shootout in 1997 with armored and suicidal rifle-firing bank robbers. An armored vehicle would have also come in handy. We're not going to apologize for wanting to be safe. Open your eyes and see how dissociated people are from each other and how the violence that occurs is more brutal than ever. Common fistfights of the past have become brutal beat-downs that often end in murder.

So why should the Federal Government and military be the only ones to have heavy fire power? How do the fantasies of state secessions, revolution, and civil war play out when local communities are reduced to small arms? If a revolution erupted, do you really think that your neighbor, blue collared Officer Smith, would zig zag his way down to the local police station to gear up and join a tyrannical government army? No, he'll be fighting next to you because his interests are in his community and his family.

Tick-Tock

I'm not sure if the events in Ferguson will change anything in the long run, but it certainly exposed the ever-growing confusion in America. Cops in America have a watchful eye on Ferguson as black supremacists along with the local community unjustly rally against their brothers. As they watch city and police leaders cave to political pressure, while the rest of America condemns the camouflage uniforms officers wore while combating violent unrest, it should be no surprise when good cops quit. Wouldn't you?

If things continue as they have, it won't be the revolution you fantasize about. It won't be freedom-loving patriots rising up against a tyrant. It will be giant, collective special interest groups rising up against you. Their armies will be massive and violent because the immune system designed to control them will have withered away after years of your deconstruction and condemnation. And you will have thought you were sticking it to the man.

Read More: Why Americans Should Reconsider Their Contempt for Today's Police

Henry Calgues
AC is a cop on the brink of resignation. To find out why, check out his new blog at anonymouscop.com or like Anonymous Cop on Facebook Click here to view my Facebook page

Aristotle’s The Nicomachean Ethics

August 20, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I recently attempted to tackle The Nicomachean Ethics, one of Aristotle’s most important works. In tough language it describes happiness, virtue, justice, reasoning, and living.

The beginning of the book starts off with happiness, which Aristotle describes as a finite point where you are self-sufficient and lacking in nothing (accumulation beyond that point would be excess). This can only come from living with virtue, something you gain through learning and training. The virtuous man will always be happy because “he will do and contemplate what is excellent, and he will bear the chances of life most nobly and altogether decorously, if he is ‘truly good’ and ‘foursquare beyond reproach’.”

> If activities are, as we said, what determines the character of life, no blessed man can become miserable; for he will never do the acts that are hateful and mean. For the man who is truly good and wise, we think , bears all the chances of life becomingly and always makes the best of circumstances, as a good general makes the best military use of the army at his command, and a good shoemaker makes the best shoes out of the hides that are given him; and so with all other craftsmen. And if this is the case, the happy man can never become miserable—though he will not reach blessedness, if he meet with fortunes like those of > Priam.

>
> […]
>
> …none of the moral virtues arises in us by nature; for nothing that exists by nature can form a habit contrary to its nature. For instance the stone which by nature moves downwards cannot be habituated to move upwards, not even if one tries to train it by throwing it up ten thousand times;
>
> […]
>
> …the things we have to learn before we can do them, we learn by doing them, e.g. men become builders by building and lyre-players by playing the lyre; so too we become just by doing just acts, temperate by doing temperate acts, brave by doing brave acts.
>
> […]
>
> …temperance and courage, then, are destroyed by excess and defect, and preserved by the mean.

A virtuous man derives pleasure or happiness from doing virtuous acts, such as exhibiting bravery or temperance. In fact, you know you have virtue when you don't get happiness from doing unvirtuous acts. You only feel good for doing the right thing. One sign that your virtue is growing is when you feel guilt of shame for unvirtuous things which gave you pleasure in the past.

It's clear that Aristotle did not agree with the progressive view that we are all equal since virtue takes training to implement. Those who have not done this training are thus not virtuous and should not be praised.

It's important to note that Aristotle doesn't say not to experience pleasure, but to be temperate and seek a mean, since self-indulgence is not virtuous. He describes the mean for some length:

> …every art does its work well—by looking to the intermediate and judging its works by this standard (so that we often say of good works of art that it is not possible either to take away or to add anything, implying that excess and defect destroy the goodness of works of art, while the mean preserves it; and good artists, as we say, look to this in their work), and if, further, virtue is more exact and better than any art, as nature also is, then virtue must have the quality of aiming at the intermediate.
>
> […]
>
> …both fear and confidence and appetite and anger and pity and in general pleasure and pain may be felt both too much and too little, and in both cases not well; but to feel them at the right times, with reference to the right objects, towards the right people , with the right motive, and in the right way, is what is both intermediate and best, and this is characteristic of virtue.
>
> […]

With regard to honour and dishonour the mean is proper pride, the excess is known as a sort of ‘empty vanity’, and the deficiency is undue humility;

[…]

For the brave man appears rash relatively to the coward, and cowardly relatively to the rash man; and similarly the temperate man appears self-indulgent relatively to the insensible man, insensible relatively to the self-indulgent , and the liberal man prodigal relatively to the mean man, mean relatively to the prodigal. Hence also the people at the extremes push the intermediate man each over to the other, and the brave man is called rash by the coward, cowardly by the rash man, and correspondingly in the other cases.

[…]

…anyone can get angry—that is easy—or give or spend money; but to do this to the right person, to the right extent, at the right time, with the right motive, and in the right way, that is not for everyone, nor is it easy; wherefore goodness is both rare and laudable and noble.

[…]

…the intermediate state is in all things to be praised, but that we must incline sometimes towards the excess, sometimes towards the deficiency; for so shall we most easily hit the intermediate and what is right.

[…]

Men, then, as well as beasts, suffer pain when they are angry, and are pleased when they exact their revenge; those who fight for these reasons, however, are pugnacious but not brave; for they do not act for the sake of the noble nor as reason directs, but from strength of feeling;

[…]

…the self-indulgent man is so called because he is pained more than he ought at not getting pleasant things (even his pain being caused by pleasure), and the temperate man is so called because he is not pained at the absence of what is pleasant and at his abstinence from it.

[…]

The temperate man occupies a middle position with regard to these objects. For he neither enjoys the things that the self-indulgent man enjoys most— but rather dislikes them—nor in general the things that he should not, nor anything of this sort to excess, nor does he feel pain or craving when they are absent, or does so only to a moderate degree, and not more than he should, nor when he should not, and so on;

[…]

…the proud man is concerned with honours; yet he will also bear himself with moderation towards wealth and power and all good or evil fortune, whatever may > befall him, and will be neither overjoyed by good fortune nor over-pained by evil.

>
> […]
>
> We call bad-tempered those who are angry at the wrong things, more than is right, and longer, and cannot be appeased until they inflict vengeance or punishment.

Some thoughts on actions and fear:

> For the man who has done something by reason of ignorance, and feels not the least vexation at his action, has not acted voluntarily, since he did not know what he was doing, nor yet involuntarily, since he is not pained.
>
> […]
>
> …the incontinent man acts with appetite, but not with choice; while the continent man on the contrary acts with choice, but not with appetite.
>
> […]
>
> …everyone does evil acts through ignorance of the end, thinking that by these he will get what is best,
>
> […]
>
> Now we fear all evils, e.g. disgrace, poverty, disease, friendlessness, death, but the brave man is not thought to be concerned with all; for to fear some things is even right and noble , and it is base not to fear them— e.g. disgrace; he who fears this is good and modest, and he who does not is shameless.
>
> […]
>
> Poverty and disease we perhaps ought not to fear, nor in general the things that do not proceed from vice and are not due to a man himself.

Two more excerpts I found interesting:

> For to such persons, as to the incontinent, knowledge brings no profit; but to those who desire and act in accordance with reason, knowledge about such matters will be of great benefit.
>
> […]
>
> The life of money-making is one undertaken under compulsion, and wealth is evidently not the good we are seeking; for it is merely useful and for the sake of something else. And so one might rather take the aforenamed objects to be ends; for they are loved for themselves.

This book is by no means easy to read. Here’s a sample passage that may take you some time to decode:

> Now we call that which is in itself worthy of pursuit more final than that which is worthy of pursuit for the sake of something else, and that which is never desirable for the sake of something else more final than the things that are > desirable both in themselves and for the sake of that other thing, and therefore we call final without qualification that which is always desirable in itself and never for the sake of something else.

You can't just read through this like any other book. It's meant to be studied and re-read carefully. I wasn't prepared to make such a commitment so I stopped halfway through. You won't get much value reading this book in isolation without the accompanying context from preceding works. It should be one of many books you read as part of a classical study program, instead of one in which you randomly pluck out from the bookstore while browsing, or else your level of comprehension will be low. In effect, you need some prior training to get the most out of this text. For that reason, I don't think it will be useful to most men.

Check out my latest video on Youtube: The Men's Rights Movement Is Making A Huge Mistake

Read More: "The Nicomachean Ethics" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Zoe Quinn Screwed Her Way Through The Video Game Industry

August 21, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Before I begin in earnest, I would just like to give a deep, heartfelt thank you to TheInternetAristocrat, whose excellent video about Zoe Quinn is what exposed me to this typical example of a Feminist in the first place. Show him some love and visit his Youtube channel for more videos exposing the hypocrites our modern culture has turned into "heroes."

I highly suggest you watch InternetAristocrat's video first. I'll post here, but in case it is removed by the time you read this you can likely find a mirror by Googling: Quinnspiracy Theory: The Five Guys Saga. If you open the video and see Jesse Ventura rambling at you, you've found the right one.

A Tale As Old As Time

Recently, a simpish man named Eron Gjoni was dumped by his girlfriend Zoe Quinn. The reason? Eron found out Zoe was cheating on him. As Eron explains it in his very long, very detailed diary entry about the whole affair:

> We kinda broke up, but kinda not. She'd often message me to say she loved me and wanted to be with me again someday. She had eyes only for me, she said, and wanted me to say the same for her.
>
> A few months later, around the end of June, we get back together (though this time she was worried about a mole among her facebook friend's list, and so she didn't make it facebook official until two weeks into the relationship, for a carefully vetted group of, by her estimate, roughly 200 friends or so). Before you > know it we're hitting on each other over tumblr again and sending cutesy couples photos whenever we missed each other.

>
> […]
>
> This was for the most part a good time –
>
> Until I found out she'd been cheating on me with her boss (Joshua Boggs).

Who is Joshua Boggs? A video game developer, whose most notable project so far is the game FRAMED, "AN AWARD WINNING NARRATIVE-PUZZLE GAME SET IN A NOIR COMIC BOOK WORLD" as its own site loudly proclaims. So a female employee cheats on her boyfriend with her married boss. Just another day in Beta paradise, right? Well Eron, paragon of truth, justice and the American way that he is, decided he wanted to tell Boggs's wife about the man's affair. I think most people would not have a problem with that. Yet for some very bizarre reason, he asked Zoe to help him get in contact with Boggs's wife. Eron's naivety of the female nature would be cute if he weren't a grown man who should know better, but fortunately he saved the conversation and put it up on his site:

> Shit, man, what happened?

Eron asks us, and continues:

> I mean, obviously she cheated on me (a lot actually), but why would someone violate their own beliefs on something as important to them as sexual consent? And what's with all this fear of someone going public? What happened to her strong principled stance of unflinching honesty? Or of owning up to mistakes? What happened to the paragon of virtue I fell in love and set out to help fix the > world with?

Most of us could easily answer Eron's questions.

- Zoe obviously never believed in sexual monogamy.
- Zoe is afraid of it going public because she doesn't want to lose her job or otherwise face consequences for her actions.
- Zoe never had strong principles—she just told her boyfriend Eron that she did.
- Sex is never a mistake. A mistake is using salt instead of sugar while baking. Screwing her boss was Zoe's (now regretted) choice.
- The social justice paragon Zoe which Eron fell in love with never existed in the first place.

So we could just leave it right there, just another cautionary tale of 21st century relationships. After all; at its core this is just another sad story of cuckoldry involving the modern western male.

Yet something far more insidious came about because of this scandal. And to talk about it, we're going to have to talk about just who Zoe Quinn is, and how far down the rabbit hole that is her vagina goes.

Who Is Zoe Quinn?

Zoe Quinn is a young(ish) white American woman living in the greater Boston area. Zoe is a social justice warrior and feminist video game developer with (as of this writing) exactly one game to her name: Depression Quest, a pay what you want to download game available on the Steam Client. Depression Quest is a rip-roaring ride of escapism that leaves one clinging to the edge of their seat and is not at all a boring, pretentious, and childish text based game about what it's like to live with depression.

[A brief aside: I downloaded and played some of the game. Since I wasn't mugged for my lunch money within fifteen minutes of playtime I concluded that Zoe's depression privilege was no where near the level of mine. I declared her privileged shitlord scum and immediately ceased playing.]

As of late, Zoe has been busy "soliciting" money for some new (and very vaguely described) projects: when she's not screwing the male heads of those projects, that is (we'll get to that). Zoe, like most feminist game developers, enjoys talking about how the video games she isn't busting her ass to make need more women in them, tweeting about how brave she is simply for being a woman experiencing some childish internet harassment, and mutilating her body with fringe fads so she can be hip and edgy.

Oh! And Zoe also proclaims herself as being gay. During a short review on her blog about a game featuring two lesbian teenagers, Zoe writes [Emphasis Billy's]:

> I'm so thankful that the story didn't focus on the difficult parts of being a gay kid
> .
> […]
> I'm just so happy that the game really just let these two girls be themselves first, be messy and awkward and teenagers together, and that they also just happened to be gay. Because what I try to remember best, and what really matters to me personally, is the nights she fell asleep on my chest, not the times people defaced my things with the word "dyke".
> […]
> I know it can be considered problematic or unrealistic, but after so much real world suffering [Zoey is referring to her gay kid suffering, not anyone else's, here – Billy] this small private story feels like an oasis in a desert.

Yes, Zoe has gone through sooo much real world suffering, being a loud and proud dyke and all. That's why she screws men, and all this controversy surrounding her came about because she cheated on her boyfriend with other men…wait a second. A boyfriend? Screwing men! I thought Zoe was gay! She said so in her own words! Or perhaps she just meant she was bisexual. Well, a quick Google Search of her ohdeargodbees blog looking for the word bisexual seems to return no posts where she refers to herself with the word bisexual (perhaps Google failed me on this one), yet Zoe clearly loves the dick. Proof?

There’s Zoe, eagerly canoodling with a man (who has a beard, so no pretending Zoe’s kissing a chick with her eyes closed). And what does she say when her boyfriend says “I love you”? Does Zoe say FUCK OFF PENIS CARRIER? Nope, she says “I love you too.” Zoe obviously isn’t gay. So why would she write a loving story about being a gay kid in a small town? Zoe can clearly flip a switch and instantly love men. That doesn’t sound like at all like a gay female to me. But think about it: what sounds more oppressed? Having had to grow up as a gay kid or a queer kid, or having grown up as a bisexual kid? If anything (and her actions haven’t proved she likes girls), Zoe is a bisexual: and let’s be honest, in this day and age who cares if a girl is bisexual? What American girl hasn’t been with another girl? Yet she consistently calls herself queer, a word dripping with hate speech connotations, to label herself as a victim.

Yes, queer teen solidarity indeed [that was taken from the comments on her gay kid blog post]. Kinda nice how Zoe-kins gets to have had an oppressed childhood as gaybo in a repressive redneck town, with all the LOUD PROUD LGBT street cred that comes with that, but now as a grown up she gets to fit in quite nicely with the normies by dating men and sleeping with men. Remember Eron Gjoni, the boyfriend who started this whole hurricane of hilarity in the first place? He and Zoe met on OKcupid, where Zoey was a WOMAN seeking a MAN. They had a 98% match rate. Zoe is totally queer.

Why did I just focus on that "I'm gay but only for the attention" aspect of Zoe? Because it perfectly shows that Zoe is a play pretend victim. She lies about what she is and what she has gone through, carefully manipulating wording where applicable, in order to get sympathy from people. She wants everyone to think she's some poor, suffering woman beset upon in a cruel world, when in actuality she's a callous pretender, a human with a black pit of a soul who will say any and everything in order to get people to feel sorry for her regardless of those who have actually suffered and actually need pity and understanding. And she sure isn't afraid to tell it to people. What did Zoe talk about with Eron during their first date?

> She seemed pretty cool; I didn't talk much at first, and mostly listened as she related tales of adversities she'd overcome and how they'd shaped her as a person and fueled her determination to improve the world.

Lying for attention and pity is the strongest trait in Zoe Quinn's character. Need further proof of her devious nature?

Zoe Quinn and internet misogyny

The Steam company has a kind of contest like system for video game developers.

Developers create a game, upload it to Steam's Greenlight project, and users vote on games they think are well made, fun, and worthy of being officially distributed.

While Zoe was developing her abysmal game Depression Quest, in order to get it onto Greenlight she alleged that she was receiving harassment from those magical folks over at Wizardchan, a website founded by a collective of men who thought the users of the infamous 4chan site were too normal for them (you can learn more about Wizardchan here). Wizardchan is a site exclusive for male virgins, so said harassment of Zoe took the form of good old misogyny.

Zoe lit the beacons, calling for aid and sharing far and wide the horrible misogyny she was suffering from simply for daring to be a female video game developer.

And the internet video game culture responded with a furious counterattack. Zoe's woes were re-tweeted, re-blogged, re-everything else. Prominent feminists in the industry (including fellow feminist video game developer Anita Sarkeesian) called on gamers to fight misogyny by voting to Greenlight Depression Quest and bank rolling Zoe through various means. The biggest gaming news sites published articles talking about the death threats and harassment Zoe was receiving. The end result of Wizardchan's campaigns of harassment (commonly nicknamed Raids for short in the trolling community) against her was that Zoe got a lot of press and financial support from a wide variety of sources which might have otherwise ignored her. Depression Quest was Greenlit to mass applause… by people who don't play video games.

The only thing is, you know all that trolling and harassing? That misogynistic Wizardchan raid that so oppressed Zoe that she had to call the internet to arms? It didn't happen. At least, not on a scale approaching anything close to what Zoe claimed. The users of Wizardchan put together an album challenging Zoe's version of events, showing they had not organized any sort of raid and explaining that nobody on their board had created any sort of coordinated attacks against Zoe. You can go see proof of this by going through the album here. What Zoe experienced was some low level attacks by a very few individuals (who likely had nothing to do with the socially anxious wizards over at Wizardchan), which she seized upon to lie about and create sympathy and attention for herself, turning a few errant pot shots taken at her into something akin to the 1944 invasion of Normandy.

And it worked. Despite the fact that Depression Quest was widely reviled by gamers, many of whom questioned why Steam would Greenlight it on the games own page, Zoe's game was released and widely praised by video game journalists and video game developers. The elites of video game culture, those who control what games get distributed and what is said about them through their mouth pieces in video game journalism, completely went against the opinions of the little people, the gamers, their customer base, the very people who are spending all their time buying and playing video games and maintaining the industry in the first place. By doing so, they [the video game industry] have effectively said: "The Feminist Imperative overrules the opinions of our customers."

via Metacritic

And now for the screwing

Care of DeviantNation.com

As a result of her falsified misogyny crisis and the unwelcome release of Depression Quest, Zoe Quinn made several professional contacts in the video game industry, and began working with other developers: including Joshua Boggs. It was also around this time that Zoe met and began dating Eron Gjoni. It's a good thing Eron found such a loving woman to date. Read some of Zoe's own words about love and the human condition.

Here's Zoe telling us about her philosophy on bad people:

> I honestly believe in people. I feel like when people act shitty there's always a series of reasons that led them to act that way and I will always have sympathy for the devil.
>
> […]
>
> I really truly believe that anyone can be redeemed if we just figure out how. I feel like people are bad to each other because they're hurting or ignorant or some other nasty thing that's inside them, and I want to help figure out how to heal that or prevent it from happening to others while trying to take care of and support those who are hurt by other people's shittiness.

Zoe Quinn screwed Joshua Boggs; video game developer, her boss and a married man, while she was dating Eron. She did not want to tell Boggs's wife about her husbands affair.

Listen to her comfort a wannabe game developer:

> Don't let assholes stop you from doing what you love, if at all possible. Being weird is one more reason we need you here if you're feeling up to it. Everyone is > weird, come be weird with those of us who won't treat you like shit for it.

>
> […]
>
> Don't feel the need to change yourself. Don't be scared away outright. Don't stop being you because some asshole can't handle how rad you are. Don't even heed any of this if it's not good advice for you in particular. But if you do decide to walk this path, it doesn't have to be alone, and it doesn't have to be while bending to anyone's will.
>
> If you feel like joining us, we can do this together. No one has to be alone.

So was Eron an asshole who couldn't handle Zoe's rad self? Is that why Zoe screwed a video game journalist named Nathan Grayson, writer over at Kotaku, in order to get positive press for herself and her projects, thereby making more money for herself? She sure as hell bent to Nathan's will. She sure as hell treated Eron like shit, despite claiming she wasn't someone who did that.

Zoe screwed other video game developers and journalists as well, receiving in the process: job opportunities, press for her projects (and therefore making more money) and exposure for herself. Zoe Quinn, strong and empowered feminist video game developer, broke into the industry of her choosing not through hard work, but through the manipulation of the public's sympathy and by granting private sexual favors for men in the video game industry.

This scandal has exposed several important things about the video game industry which relate to our pitiful society in general:

1. There Is No Honest Journalism In The Industry

The Zoe Quinn sex scandal simply shows that there is no industry where journalism can be trusted. Zoe had sex with video game journalists, who in turn wrote favourably about her and her projects, creating an extraordinary bias—not to mention increasing Zoe's wealth by exposing her games to a wider audience. Even in an industry where the news is frivolous, relatively straight forward and unimportant to anything of serious consequence (reports on the new Mario game, interviews with developers, convention coverage, etc.), journalists have consistently proven they have no respect for their audience, nor the truth. There is no journalistic integrity left in the video game industry, and every single article written about women developers in the future must be considered corrupted by default until such a time that they can disprove their bias and show their integrity.

When women can buy a favourable image with their vaginas, public trust in journalism is officially an outdated concept.

2. The Feminist Imperative Overrules Everything

You wouldn't be reading about Zoe Quinn right now if she had not have cried the M word while her lackluster game was under development. If Depression Quest had have been created by a man, it would be rotting in some dusty corner of the internet, unplayed and unknown, and it's developer would likely be working in an industry other than the gaming one. But because Zoe was a woman, who claimed misogynistic harassment for being a female game developer, she was coddled and carried NOT by her achievements, but by the fact that she has a vagina.

Steam approved her game against the overwhelming opinion of their customer base in order to prove that they support Team Women, no matter what the cost. It does not matter that this has blown up in their face, and that the team behind Steam Greenlight have shown they have no respect for the opinion of their consumer base. Following the feminist narrative overruled everything. Profits, consumer trust, respect for their clients: Steam threw this all away to follow the mainstream political narrative. It is certainly not the only company to have done so.

3. Women's Success Must Always Be Scrutinized

Feminists continue to set back the feminism movement. It's a common grumbling amongst both the sexes in the lower ranks that, when they see a woman in a position of power, they assume she only got there because she's screwing the right someone. Although this is not always the case, as Zoe Quinn proves it certainly can be.

The methods of moving up the ladder in a company or organization are vastly different for men and women, and if she is even passingly sexually attractive, the option for a woman to sleep her way up is a very real one. Again: how can one have trust in a company or organization that has women in positions of power when we live in a culture where she likely screwed and complained her way up the ladder? How can a team function properly with drive and efficiency when they strongly suspect that their female boss is a whore who got to where she is because she spread her legs?

Zoe Quinn's antics, and the exposure of her sex scandal, has single handedly destroyed the credibility of every female in the video game industry (to say nothing of Zoe's more direct attempts at sabotaging women game developers). In the larger picture, how long can women continue to support feminism when its most vocal adherents are consistently exposed as frauds, deviants and con-artists who step over their fellow 'sisters'?

In The End…

Zoe Quinn is a hypocrite, a manipulator, and a homewrecker. She decries how sexist and callow men are then sleeps with them in order to advance herself financially and socially. In the process she cheated on a man who was exclusively monogamous to her, lying to him until he found irrefutable evidence of her misdeeds. She has hurt the wife of Joshua Boggs, and the wives and girlfriends of all the other men in the video game industry she has slept with.

All in all, Zoe is simply a standard feminist. She wants to portray herself as being a victim, all the while victimizing others (including other women) with no care about anyone's feelings other than her own. She wants to portray herself as smart and highly motivated woman who doesn't need any help to succeed, but she then screws men in positions of power in order propel herself upward, instead of just working hard and succeeding through her own achievements.

That is the core of feminism: diverting as many resources from men to women as possible, while elevating the winner of the woman against woman free-for-all into positions of power, regardless of the woman's merits or talent.

Normally I would end here, but there is one last thing which to be the most disturbing result of this entire scandal. What really spooks me about the Zoe Quinn sex scandal is the totalitarian overtures that arose in response to it.

The Attempted Blackout

Eron Gjoni posted his expose of Zoe Quinn on August 16, which was a few days ago. Considering the sheer scope and level of corruption this exposes, this story should not only have already been all over the internet but it should have been featured heavily in the mainstream media as well. Make no mistake—this is a major scandal in a billion dollar industry. And not only is it a good rage-inducing story on an ethical level, which interests men, but it also has the deviant sexuality and relationship cuckoldry which drives all good gossip for women. Zoe Quinn's scandal has it all.

So why haven't most people already heard about it? Because the social justice warriors, the feminists, the white knights—all the usual suspects, in other words—have been doing their damnedest to keep it completely under wraps in a mind-boggling display of overt totalitarianism. The launch pad for this story, the popular image board Reddit, has been subject to an intensive black out on all things Zoe Quinn. Sub-reddits have been shut down, comments have been deleted en masse, bans have been issued indiscriminatingly: all in an attempt to stop this story for erupting.

Why? Because Zoe Quinn is one of their own. Although the user base for Reddit (and sites similar to it) varies, by and large at the moderator and management levels there is a pervasive amount of so called “leftist” ideology. These people cheer on feminism and equalism and social justice and all those other corrupted ideologies, thinking that their cheerleading for politically correct causes which have long ceased being ethical or moral makes them heroes. When this bomb dropped, and Redditors began to circulate the story and talk amongst themselves about it, the moderators and higher ups immediately recognized that this scandal could explode. And thus they began to shut down the conversation.

Other sites started up their spin teams, trying to distort the narrative. Instead of focusing on Zoe Quinn’s hypocritical sexual deviancy and coercion, popular sites like Vice have tried to turn this scandal into a misogyny-fueled attack on Zoe. Thankfully most of their readers aren’t buying it, but that hasn’t stopped others from trying to silence the story.

Not even the 4chan party van was spared from the ban. And when the muzzle clamps down around the vicious mouth of 4chan, you know it's time to get really worried about internet censorship.

Zoe Quinn's sex scandal has delivered a heavy blow to the credibility of feminism and of allowing women to be a part of creative enterprise, and the attempted black out and spin doctoring of the scandal by them has utterly destroyed all credibility of social justice warriors, white knights, equalists and the other elements of the politically correct left. It is one thing to argue for Zoe Quinn, but to try and silence all discussion about her because it harms your narrative? That's a frightening insight into the minds of these people, and unfortunately for the rest of us, it's these types which are the gatekeepers in our society. They don't want you to have thoughts and opinions unless they are their thoughts and opinions. They will never accept debate or discourse. If we do not tow their line then they will attempt to cut you out completely.

These PC demagogues have shown themselves to be enemies of free thought and free expression. It is time to stop tolerating them and their politically correct ideologies, because for all their bluster about tolerance and caring, they sure as hell do not want to tolerate you.

Funny how all it took to reveal their true tyrannical side was a slut sucking some nerd dick.

Read More: 3 Ways Women Have Ruined Video Games

Billy Chubbs

Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

Considering Open Contempt For The American Police

August 21, 2014 | by Arminius Hermann | Link | Original Link

Note 1: This post is in response to the article "Why Americans Should Reconsider Their Contempt for Today's Police", previously published at Return of Kings on July 3d, 2014.*

Note 2: The image above was taken by Jeff Robertson in Ferguson, Missouri, site of several days of rioting and protests over a fatal shooting of an unarmed black man by a white police officer on August 9, 2014.*

Recently, guest poster "Anonymous Cop" opined that Americans should reconsider their contempt for the police, arguing that

(1) LEOs aren't trained to be bullies, that most are good guys doing a difficult job, bad apples give the profession a bad name and, besides, citizens just don't understand what it's like to be on the other end of a citizen-LEO encounter,

(2) Shielding from liability for mistakes, such as kicking in the wrong door or shooting an unarmed man reaching for a cell phone, is necessary to get anyone to sign up to be LEOs in the first place,

(3) The recent trend of shaming, challenging, or embarrassing LEOs and posting the videos on the internet only serves to make LEOs more cautious, less aggressive, and less likely to intervene in gray-area situations. The author cites another LEO third-hand, who reportedly said: "If life and death situations could land me in a coffin or prison, I will avoid life and death situations." The result is more crime, not less,

(4) Higher-quality LEOs are leaving the force due to the rise in street violence and lack of public support for LEOs, leaving lower-quality officers behind. Moreover, the aforementioned working conditions will likely attract a different sort of LEO candidate, one better adapted to higher levels of violence and less concerned with the lack of public rapport, support, or appreciation for their work.

Not a bad start as an apologia for the police, as apologias go. I can empathize with the author's sense of bewilderment as he observes a low level of support for law enforcement amongst the citizenry:

> We used to enjoy the support of the educated, hard-working people of the community, but not so much anymore. The bad guys used to know that the cops were the extension of the values of the community and if you violated those values, you were on your own—and good luck with that. But those communities that upheld the values of the Ten Commandments for everyone now seem to only uphold the values of the Ten Amendments, and only selectively when it protects them or their group's politics.

I myself wrestle with the tension created by my own natural empathies for police officers and my discomfort with media reports of LEO misbehavior and my own (mixed, some good, some bad) observations of LEOs in action. Thus, while I have been at times been both critical and supportive of police over the last few years, I do so out of a sense of love of country, of patriotism, and a hope that the citizenry will help the system right itself. As I wrote a couple of years ago, the American justice system

> …has gradually morphed over time from one that protected liberty to one that erodes it. Indeed, as individual LEOs became "professionalized", American law enforcement ceased being a system in which citizens secured justice for themselves, on a level playing field, facilitated by law enforcement and the courts, to a literal "us" versus "them" arrangement on a steeply tilted playing field where the massive resources of government are brought to bear against presumably innocent individual citizens. In other words, ownership of the laws and the law enforcement process shifted from individual citizens to an amorphous "the people", thus divesting individual citizens from the justice process except as a collective (when enforcing the law), or as an isolated defendant (when targeted by law enforcement). This divestiture is so complete that jury nullification, that foundational right whose pedigree extends back as far as the Magna Carta, is viewed with contempt and hostility by those in the justice system and those who publicly profess this right are persecuted, pilloried, and/or proscribed from jury service. It is in this context which LEOs, people just like any of us, find themselves at odds with the interests of their neighbors while simultaneously being exposed to the worst pathologies of their neighbors.

Clearly, few are happy with the present system, except perhaps the criminal class which happily exploits the widening gulf between police and the citizenry to its advantage. With that in mind, the remainder of this post will explore some proposals intended to restore some of the lost liberties of the American people, narrow the gap between the interests of the LEO with the citizen, and maybe do away with some of that contempt for police that Anonymous Cop complains about.

Image source: New York Times

Decriminalization / Re-Legalization

First up: Far too many things are illegal, making full compliance with the law difficult or impossible. Mayhaps this is by design. Ayn Rand once wrote:

> The only power any government has is the power to crack down on criminals. Well, when there aren't enough criminals, one makes them. One declares so many things to be a crime that it becomes impossible for men to live without breaking laws.

While liberty is secured by a little bit of law, too much law threatens liberty. Of course, those who fancy themselves our masters, those who seek to grow government (and thus erode liberty), know this and write laws with the express purpose of controlling the lives of others (for example, Federal crimes are up nearly 1,500% since our nation's founding) and increasing their power and influence. If one is successful at reducing the quantity of laws, at making fewer things illegal, it follows that not only will there be more freedom and more responsibility but there will also be fewer criminals…and fewer opportunities for adverse interactions between LEOs and citizens.

Broaden The LEO Base

Second, we should reduce the number of full-time LEOs, particularly at the local level where the bulk of law enforcement activities occur, and increase the quantities of part-timers, reserve deputies, and volunteers. The aim here is to shorten the psychological distance between citizen and LEO in a way analogous to the "citizen soldier" model of the National Guard, with an eye toward stemming a budding "us vs. them" culture and mindset by making "them" more like "us."

Less Diversity Is More

Similarly, police should be hired from, and serve in, the communities in which they live. This may better invest the citizenry in the security of their neighborhoods, and transform their views of law enforcement away from alienated enforcers to neighbors assisting in maintaining law and order. Additionally, this would have the added benefit of reducing inter-cultural conflict (of the sort that the liberalist Left thrives upon and uses as a pretext to enact more "helpful" laws) and therefore increases the sort of interpersonal trust needed to effectively enforce laws.

Re-assert the Right of the People to Judge for Themselves

Fourth, jury nullification needs to be re-legitimized as a check on government power and the arbitrary application of law by LEOs and attorneys general. It is right and proper for the citizens of the community to decide for themselves whether or not a particular law should apply to an accused offender, or even if a law is valid at all—not a judge or LEO or any other officer of the Court. Assuming a citizen is literate, they can judge the law for themselves, as well they should: After all, it is they who suffer the depredations of offenders, and not well-paid government officials safely ensconced in gated communities.

Defenestrate the Warrior Cop Mindset

Fifth, the police need to resist the temptation toward militarization. They are not "blue infantry," they are not in a combat zone. They should be discouraged from thinking that they are in a combat zone, should not dress as if they were in a combat zone, need not possess equipment meant for a combat zone, and should not frequently employ small-unit tactics as if they were in a combat zone. They are not, and more importantly should not think themselves as, to use Radley Balko's characterization, warrior cops. Moreover, the Founders considered a large standing army to be hazardous to liberty; I submit that LEAs would do well to avoid becoming what our Founders feared, if for no other reason than self-interest: Not only was Tsarnayev, the Boston Bomber, located by a citizen and not LEOs after the city-wide security lockdown was lifted, but life is very dangerous indeed for government forces of dubious legitimacy working in and around a disaffected populace. Just ask the US military about their experiences in Afghanistan, Vietnam, etc.

These are but a few modest proposals. Perhaps it is too late to reverse the decades-long trend of alienation between the citizen and LEO. It is possible forced diversity and cultural Marxism has degraded the culture so much that rebuilding the trust necessary for citizenry-based policing will be impossible. Maybe Americans have become so infantilized, so comfortable in the outsourcing of law enforcement to paid professionals, that taking ownership for the enforcement of their own laws is fantasy. I hope not.

Read More: Why Americans Should Reconsider Their Contempt for Today's Police

Arminius Hermann
Arminius Hermann, elsewhere known by the nom-de-cyber Elusive Wapiti, is a father to four and husband to one. His interests outside of having too many opinions are hunting, motorcycling, and flying.

The Special Value Of Humor Game

August 21, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

If a girl is fairly attractive, most straight men will be DTF—the male sex drive really is that simple. Personality, intelligence, conversational ability, character, interests, status—these things and others, however significant, usually won't be a deal breaker if a girl is sufficiently sexy. For though you might not make a girlfriend or wife out of a hottie with a lousy attitude, there's little doubt you'd pound her silly, right?

It is otherwise with women. Let's say you are a handsome guy with a good job. Of course, these two things are considerable since the answer to the old question, what do women want, is your money and your dick. Still, a man who wants to do as well as possible with the Second Sex must offer more. The reason is that women need strong contextual attractiveness. They need, in the first place, to feel comfortable with you—to feel that you aren't a retard or a creep. For just consider what an extraordinary thing it must be to open your legs for a man! It is quite a vulnerable act, and by definition always at least somewhat submissive, the woman receiving as the man penetrates. Too, besides making women comfortable, you must create an interesting and enjoyable atmosphere, like taking a child to the playground. In other words, you need to charm or game women—to be a good clown, as Roosh puts it.

To this end humor can serve a special function. Imagine: You're kicking it at the bar on Saturday night and—what else is new in America?—you notice a hottie engrossed in her iPhone; she received 47 likes on Facebook in the last 4 hours, 13 more, happily, than Jenna, that new bitch at work who thinks she's so cute. Do you approach like Bob Beta Bitch Boy and say: "Hello, how are you tonight? Can I buy you a drink?" No! C. Contrary and ROK have taught you better. Instead you walk over and, covering the screen with your hand, say: “I’m sorry, but there’s a no social media and no texting policy here, and as an undercover bouncer it’s my job to enforce this.” Now she looks at you, at first bewildered, then intrigued and already a little charmed. You give her a wink and a smile, then deadpan: “No, really, I just saw you and wanted to come say what’s up. But don’t worry: I’m gay and just looking for a shopping partner.”

This is bold, funny and interesting. From the start, it is something unusual and different. It makes you stand out. You are unlike the beta male whose conversation is so generic and so often a kind of job interview! That poor bastard. His conversation consists of little more than (predictable) compliments and questions, and he soon runs out of gas before he can charm the pussy, even though he may be an attractive man with his life together. Having had a good interaction from the beginning, the number close—or same night take down, if she happens to be up for it on that particular night—is now a matter of small talk and logistics: Does she live around here? What does she do to keep life interesting? You two should do this or that in a few days (make the interaction substantive; plan the date on the spot), and so on.

Humor game is a very powerful weapon today when night game has never been so competitive and unrewarding. Now we know that in the smart phone and social media era, women get to the bar or club already sated on male attention. Hence, night game is hardly worth it if you aren’t at least an 8 on the looks scale: the returns won’t be worth your time investment; you will try to push through bitch shields and cockblocks, in most cases only to meet with no interest or to get flaked on. Even if you are an attractive guy, night game, as I explain in my last article, remains an inefficient source of pussy. You are better off with day game.

Still, whether you are a tall, jacked stud or of average looks, humor game can set you apart, so that the vag’s picky hamster will bang its narcissistic gavel, justified in its belief that you—special fellow—are worthy of an opening of the entitled legs. Now, conversation may be understood as the test of game: if it’s not sharp, your game isn’t—simple as that. And humor is grade A conversation. There are many women who find humor to be the single most desirable trait in a man.

I have a friend who, though his looks are only above average, still does exceptionally well with women at night, because he approaches them with humor and is able to crack them up throughout the conversation. This is something that most men who are far more attractive than he is cannot do. Thanks to his wit and the fun and interesting vibe he can thereby create, he regularly bags women women are higher than he is on the looks scale. What a superb testament to the value of game! Really, how many men are there in the 6 range who bang many 8s and up, without paying for that high sexual market value pussy?

Another great function of humor game is that it disarms bitch shields. Look at that 9 over there; all haughtiness and self-satisfaction, her very body language makes you not even want to approach. Still, you go up to that whiny white bitch and use whatever standard opener comes to mine: “Hey, how’s your night?” Of course, right off the bat she is sullen and disdainful; she acts like she’s doing you a fucking favor by responding. Your next line: “You know, you look familiar; didn’t I see you on TV, in the advertisement for that new charm school?” To be sure, this may send her further into cunt mode, but if it does, then you weren’t going to bang her anyway (she really is that difficult—next); and if it doesn’t, then it may be that you can provide her with just the right amount of asshole game and vicious sadism that her twisted hamster—daily flooded by male attention and thus fundamentally backward—craves with all the ardor of a Jezebel feminist lusting after a bon bon. Don’t forget to provide the requisite post-bang emotional deprivation—assuming you see her after that first night of slapping and choking, or rather, sex.

Humor is very effective in day game as well, though it has to be more toned-down than in night game. After the girl has given you the info you pretended to need, you are at the “sticking point,” as in a bench press: How do you both keep the conversation going and transition to small talk whereby you can convey value? Humor, my dear player, humor! So, for example, whenever I use my-looking-for-a-gym opener, I have on hand a number of jokes and playful remarks I am ready to work in: “Oh, they won’t let me in that gym—I’m in the habit of banging weights and scaring innocent women and children.” “Oh, you don’t work out, huh? One of those evil people who can eat whatever they want? I can’t be friends with you [wink].” And so on. Now that I have created a playful and enjoyable atmosphere, the woman is more likely to be receptive to my questions about whether she is from the city, how her day is going, etc., etc. Game, remember, is always a mental activity, a matter of calculation and being several steps ahead of the object of your pursuit.

Humor is also effective when it comes to reengaging flakes and winning over those many hoes who are on the fence about you. Let’s say you have put in steady work, but still at least a third of your 27 phone numbers are flakes and wafflers. How do you get that pussy more interested in you, and less interested in Tom, Dick, and Harry (not to mention in Mike, Dave, Steve, Paul, Greg, Eric, Dave’s brother, Steve’s best friend, her boss, her ex, her professor, her personal trainer, etc.)? Humor combined with asshole game.

See, if you call out a woman for flaking, then, unless she actually likes you (in which case she may be turned on), you probably will never bang her, because her annoyance will preclude the bang. It’s more effective to imply the calling out by wittily insulting her. Indeed, the deep perversity and essential masochism of women makes the insult very effective, provided it’s done with a careful touch. I have had decent results by sending flakes a link to the urban dictionary definition of flake, as well as one to the definition of soporific from a standard dictionary, implying that the dull cunt puts me to sleep. This makes me interestingly different since most men will either call out cunts or continue to chase them.

Conclusion

In sum, humor game is immensely valuable. Like being rich or famous, it enables you to compensate for and transcend what you lack in other areas. It is frequently difficult to have a lively and interesting conversation with women, given how incorrigibly boring and incurably stupid most of them are. And yet, without such a conversation, you probably will not get the bang, even if the hotty finds you attractive and digs you in other ways. So, make that bitch laugh—then you'll be more likely to bend her over and show her who the boss is!

Read More: The Supreme Value Of Day Game

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

The Relationship Whore

August 22, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Lindsey

Lindsey is a 24-year-old girl. Most would rate her as a 7.5, maybe an 8. She lost her virginity at the age of 17, to a serious boyfriend. Since that time, she has had four more "serious" boyfriends spanning various relationship lengths, from a few months to a couple of years. So, in seven years she has had a total of five serious boyfriends. In addition to that, she slept with three other guys as rebounds, and had two one night stands when she was drunk. She also blew a "couple" of guys when she was in Cabo on spring break in college, but she doesn't really count that.

This puts the total number of guys she has slept with at ten.

Lindsey goes on a lot of dates, almost as if it's a sport to her. She is hooked on OKCupid, Tinder, POF, and any other site that gives her the opportunity to meet friends. She is always eager to talk about her past relationships, whilst making it very clear to the "lucky" man sitting next to her at the bar that she "isn't like other girls"; i.e. she doesn't sleep around very much. She makes it clear, up front, that she is looking and ready to start a new relationship, despite her last "serious" relationship ending just months ago. She tends to get her hopes up on every date, only to be dropped off disappointed at the end of the night—disappointed that her Prince Charming was not buying her $15 Cosmo drink. He just didn't "have it" for her, but she'll find the right one, she rationalizes to herself.

Lindsey thinks she is a good girl, because she mostly just has sex with men whom she is in relationships with. Anytime she is alone, she feels inadequate, as if she needs someone to complete her. She very much dislikes it and longs for the compassion and comfort of a relationship.

While Lindsey does get in a lot of relationships, she is never quite sure why they end. They seem to just lose the fire and peter out; sometimes she dumps the guy, and sometimes she gets dumped. Either way, the breakups are often relatively amicable while the two partners go their separate ways.

The next week, she is out with a man from Tinder, telling him how she can't wait to find the one.

Sarah

Sarah is also a 24-year-old girl. Most would rate her as a 7.5, maybe an 8. She lost her virginity at the age of 16, to a short-term boyfriend. Since that time, she has had two more "serious boyfriends," both of which lasted for two years, respectively. So, in eight years she has had a total of two serious boyfriends. In between, she had seven flings/FWB situations (mostly lasting 3-6 months, and sometimes two at the same time), and three one night stands. She also blew a "couple" of guys when she was in Costa Rica on spring break in college, but she doesn't really count that.

This puts the total number of guys she has slept with at thirteen.

Sarah rarely goes on dates, preferring to spend time with her female friends during the week and participating in her own hobbies. She had a Tinder account, but got tired of it after a few days; preferring to meet men through her social circle. When she actually does go on dates, she doesn't go on it with any expectations. She is open about her sexual past and general sexuality, and makes it clear that she tries not to sleep around but sometimes it "just happens." Her low expectations lead to her feeling very neutral about many dates at the end of the night—perhaps slightly excited if she liked him, but if it went poorly, she generally moves past it.

Sarah realizes that she is not a perfect angel because of her previous promiscuity. When she is alone, she feels okay about herself. She would like to meet someone whom she really clicks with, but is okay spending nights at home by herself.

While Sarah does not get in relationships often, the two she had were both passionate. Both times, there were clear differences as to why the relationships could not move further forward. Out of her two serious boyfriends, she dumped one and the other dumped her.

The next week, she is out and has a one night stand and regrets it greatly.

Who would you pick – Sarah or Lindsey?

Read More: 5 Ways To Eject From A Relationship

Kyle Trouble

Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Could The Islamic State Reorder The Middle East?

August 22, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

The Islamic State

As you have likely heard by now, the Islamic State is a de-facto nation on the Syrian-Iraq border. The brutality and inhumanity of their tactics are well known, ranging from executions to what some have construed as an attempt at genocide of the Yazedi people. Important people in Washington D.C . have recently called them Al Qaeda's junior varsity, but nobody is saying that anymore. What is still true, however, is that the rise of the Islamic state makes strange bedfellows and could possibly reorder politics and Middle East in ways not seen since the fall of the Ottoman Empire.

Suuni Shia Split Politics

Of the various conflicts between Sunni and Shia Muslims have ongoing, especially in Iraq, the Islamic State's actions are open and without any political cover story for their operations against non-Sunni Muslims, whether they are Shia or Christians. This is unheard of the last century. It could be argued that the regime of Saddam Hussein and the war against Iran was an open Sunni-Shia conflict, but it was nation against nation where both nations were majority Shia. Also the Saudi Arabian intervention in Bahrain was merely to keep a friendly monarch in power, even though they did suppress a majority Shia uprising. It appears in the Islamic state is on a mission of eradication which no modern Middle Eastern nation has advocated for outside of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

What Is Interesting

The first curious thing I noticed about operations against the Islamic state is that all the American air power used against them seems to have been launched from aircraft carriers in the Persian Gulf. I wonder why the F-15s and F-16s stationed throughout the Middle East in places such as Saudi Arabia Kuwait and Qatar are not participating? Could it be that the U.S. does not want foreign policy issues of launching airstrikes from Sunni nations against the Islamic state? Or could it be that the Sunni nations will not allow the United States to launch airstrikes from their territory? Remember this idea.

Another thing I noticed is that the nations that are openly against the Islamic state are traditional U.S .enemies, such as Syria and Iran. The ongoing Syrian Civil War has pitted the Assad regime against a coterie of Sunni militants such as the Al-Nusra front, the FSA, and the Islamic state. Iran has openly contributed Sukhoi 25 ground attack fighters and pilots of the Revolutionary Guard Corps conducting airstrikes against the Islamic State from bases in Iraq. It's also interesting that the ranks of the Islamic state seems to be populated somewhat by Westerners, Saudis,and other citizens of traditional U.S. allies. This totality of circumstances presents an opportunity to reorder the alliances of the Middle East.

How This Could Change The Middle East

The Islamic state is interesting in the fact that it is a terrorist organization that has actually started to conduct offensive combat operations, utilizing firepower and maneuvers like a modern army. They have become largely self-funding with black-market fuel and energy sales, along with the loot from the capture of Mosul. They have a very slick propaganda campaign that has been successful in recruiting people to their cause. Unlike most terrorist groups, they actually stand their ground and hold key terrain until they are dislodged through combat operations. This staying power allows them to become a center of gravity to change politics in the Middle East.

As I said earlier, with traditional U.S. allies being quiet about and possibly supporting it behind the scenes, and traditional U.S. enemies actually fighting against them, this could cause the United States to make new allies in the region. If the Islamic state is successful in exploding a Sunni-Shia conflict to something larger than just Syria and Iraq, there might be a Middle Eastern war not caused by the West or fought by Western soldiers. For example, if Saudi Arabia ceases to be allies of the United States, the royal family are in a very serious position.

Kuwait would look like a very inviting target for Iran if they no longer have the protection of United States. The Iranian nuclear program and any action against it could be shelved if the U.S. decides to cooperate with the Ayatollah against the Islamic State. The Syrian Civil War could come to a total victory for President Assad if powerful people decide the Islamic state is a more important target. A wise man would observe the situation and invest in Lockheed Martin stock.

Read More: The Leadership Secrets Of Ayatollah Khomeini

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

How To Obtain And Use Testosterone For Male Birth Control

August 22, 2014 | by Overtaxed | Link | Original Link

[Editor's Note: This is not medical advice, but rather the experience of the author. See a health professional if you want to supplement with testosterone.]

The female birth control pill has been around for over 50 years and yet, to date, there's still no "male equivalent" available in the market. Is this such a significant problem that researchers cannot work around the intricacies of the male body to produce a similar result in men as in women? The simple answer is "No," male hormonal birth control is not difficult at all, and it's also not all that different from female birth control pills. Estrogen is the primary female hormone—if you take pills laced with estrogen, suddenly you become infertile.

Testosterone is the primary male hormone, and, yes, if you take testosterone, just like women taking their primary hormone, you will also become infertile. This knowledge is not widely public mostly, of course, because testosterone is "bad" and estrogen is "good"; however, I'm going to do my best in this article to explain the mechanics of how to use testosterone as male birth control.

First, some sources for those of your who are skeptical of what I'm telling you:

http://www.webmd.com/sex/birth-control/news/20090506/testosterone-tested-as-male-contraceptive http://www.medscape.com/viewarticle/722423_5

http://www.sciencedaily.com/releases/2009/05/090504094256.htm

Drug Protocol

On to the nuts and bolts; “OK, this is great, but how do I get testosterone without going to my local gym rat and injecting some shit from made in a Mexican bathtub?” Great question; and we’ll get to that. Before that though, for those of limited attention span, I’m going to lay out the protocol that I follow to suppress my fertility:

Monday and Thursday – .6ML of testosterone enanthate, 200mg/ml, injected IM in the glute

Monday, Wednesday, and Friday – .5mg Arimidex (start 2 weeks after your first shot, continue the entire time you’re on testosterone)

That gives me a total of 240mgs of testosterone a week and 1.5mgs of Arimidex. That’s all it takes, no crazy cycles, no list of 15 different drugs. Take those 2 drugs, wait about 3-5 weeks, and you’re very likely be sterile. But how do you make sure? Well, keep reading.

Obtaining Testosterone

Let’s move on to the next step, how do I get testosterone? Frankly, this is the hardest part of the entire protocol because, unless you have a really cool doctor, none of them are going to write you a script for test to control your fertility. Notice, of course, how they will happily hand out estrogen like tic-tacs, but we all know the reason for that; can’t ride the carousel without some high potency drugs on board. The hypocrisy makes my head hurt, but, don’t let that discourage you. We just need to get more creative.

There are 2 primary ways to go about getting a script for testosterone. The easy but expensive way is to seek out a hormone replacement clinic. These places are mostly just “steroid doctor” front organizations. I’m not going to link any specifics, but Google for “trt Houston” (and replace Houston with your city, of course) and you should get a list of clinics. Call up a few of them and make sure they will treat younger patients that show a testosterone deficiency (some of them won’t) and talk to them about the prices for their program. Tell them that you’re currently using another clinic but that you’d like to change, or that you just moved to the area and give them the name of a clinic in another area (far away).

Be sure to ask them about their costs; they are going to vary widely! Tell them you take 240mg/s of testosterone enanthate a week and ask them how much they charge per 10ML vial. Then do some price comparisons; a great price is 110/10ML, a terrible price is 300/10ML. You’re going to go through one vial every 8 weeks or so; it’s important to find a place that has the best prices. You should not pay a lot for the initial visit and bloodwork (200 dollars or so), since these places make their money on the drugs and not on the visits—you might never see the doctor again after the first visit. Finally, ask them if they have a cutoff for treatment levels; what is the highest testosterone dose they typically prescribe and what level of free and total testosterone do you need to get “on the program.” Most of the clinics really don’t care what your levels come back at, they will write for you anyway; but some do, make sure you ask.

What do I do if I can only find a clinic that “cares” about my testosterone level (wants to see a testosterone deficiency)? Well, 2 options here. The easiest is to tell them you’re already on TRT (testosterone replacement treatment), make up another clinic name and tell them you just moved to the location (they aren’t going to check). Tell them you are currently taking 240mgs per week of testosterone enanthate (pronounced “e-nan-thate”), injecting .6MLs twice a week into your glutes. If they ask, tell them you use a 1” 18-gauge needle to pull and a 1.5” 23-gauge needle to inject (don’t say SHOOT or PIN). Also tell them that you are using .5mgs (milligrams) of Arimidex (ahh-rim-a-dex) 3 times a week to control estrogen. Mention that you are almost out of your testosterone, which is why you’re looking for a new clinic, but that you still have plenty of Arimidex.

Memorize this until it’s like second nature. Make yourself believe that this is the truth and say it with authority. This is very important if you want to do this without having to manipulate your levels! If you don’t do this, or don’t do it convincingly, you’re going to have to go down a harder route that takes longer and will suck for a week or so. The idea here is to make the doctor believe you’re already on TRT so that you can give them a “normal” blood test back and still have them write for you. The 2nd option will be another article because it’s more complicated to show low-T results. Finally, make sure you tell your doctor that you took your last shot 4 days ago, and don’t get the blood work for a few days after he orders it. That way, when you come back normal or low (which most men over 30 are) the doc will think you have already used all the testosterone in your last shot.

So, now what happens? Well, the doctor will order blood work (will take a few days to come back) and you’ll get your script for testosterone. If you’re at a clinic, they will typically dispense it right there or have a captive pharmacy. They don’t take insurance of any type. If you’re at a regular doctor, they will just give you a script and you’ll go over to the drug store to pick it up.

This is MUCH HARDER at a regular doctor. Some won’t write test at all. Most won’t write in the level you need to get consistent birth control. Most want to put you on the cream first (which sucks for a multitude of reasons, tell them it makes you break out badly and that you’ve tried all the areas for application, or that you have small kids at home and are concerned about transfer). If this is your first venture, I recommend using a clinic. It costs more, but your “game” doesn’t have to be as perfect and you’re going to get higher doses. As you become more familiar with the terms and protocol, you can try to get your regular doc to write for you, which is great because it’s much cheaper.

Giving Yourself The First Shot

I’ve got my testosterone and I’m back home. But I’ve never given myself a shot before! How do I do it? Here’s a good place to start: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=azF1FoepHuo A few things to remember: It’s not hard. It doesn’t hurt that much. And you’re not going to hurt yourself that badly even if you royally fuck it up. You'll get better at it through time and it will become totally second nature.

You'll get needles from the test provider. They should give you one needle to "pull" (stick into the vial of testosterone and load) and one need to inject (remove the pulling needle and put on the injecting needle). Make sure you get all the air out of the needle, and make sure you use sterile techniques (get alcohol prep pads and swab your injection site and the top of the bottle every time). When you inject, you'll feel exactly nothing. Test takes time to get into the system, so in a week or so you'll start feeling the effects. However, just because you feel the effects does NOT mean that you're sterile.

Ensuring Sterility

This is much easier that the above steps, and, you get to beat off, so it's actually kind of fun. You'll need a couple items for this, a microscope, slides and covers. I'd get these before you start TRT so you can see a before and after comparison. Set up your microscope. Have an orgasm. Take some semen (bonus point if it's dribbling out of a girls mouth), place it on a slide (about a drop is all you need) and put a cover slip over it. Look at it through the microscope on the 2 middle powers (100X and 400X). This is what it should look like if you're fertile:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=1Ar1G98SPz0

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Evc3I4eiX6k

Adjust the light coming through the scope until you can see the sperm moving. There should be so many you can't count them all, they should be everywhere and the entire field of view should appear to "move."

After you start TRT, continue taking samples and looking at them through the scope. You should, in 2-3 weeks, see the number start to drop significantly. But 4-5 weeks, you should see very few in view in the scope. Note that, if you look hard enough, you can almost always find 1-2 in there. This isn't cause for concern, a "few" sperm have no chance of fertilizing anything. You need a million per ML to have even the slightest chance at fertilizing someone, if you can find a "few" after looking over most of your sample, you're fine.

Anti-estrogens

Last thing, where do I get Arimidex and why not just get it from my Doctor? The last question is easy—it's very expensive to get Arimidex from a doctor. The first question is also easy. I won't directly link it, but there are tons of sites out there that sell "research chemicals" which is basically just a loophole in the law that allows companies to sell unscheduled but prescription-only drugs (like Arimidex, and, incidentally, Viagra) over the Internet. Do a search for "RUI Arimidex." But there are tons of these sites out there, just check on the bodybuilding boards if you choose to go with another vendor. Most of them are legit businesses, not "steroids over the Internet."

Estrogen (E2 to be more exact) is the part of this that's the hardest, you have to do some of this by “feel.” If your estrogen gets too low, your joints will hurt and you won’t be able to get an erection to save your life. You’ll also be very easily aggravated and you’ll lose quite a bit of water weight. If your estrogen gets too high, you’ll feel bloated, your nipples might hurt and you’ll also have trouble getting an erection. You can get E2 tests from online labs, they cost about 50 bucks a shot, but the test really isn’t accurate enough to help you dial in all the way. Just start with .5mgs of Arimidex and see how you feel. If you go too low, it will take a few days to make more estrogen; if you’re too high, it will take a few days to get estrogen back under control. Don’t worry, once you get it right and get used what works for you, you’ll have no trouble maintaining it.

It’s sad that it’s come to this for men to get birth control. I hope this information helps many men out there prevent a cuckold or unwanted child, as it has helped me! Oh, and for those who are wondering, yes, this is a supra-physiological dose of testosterone. This will take your total test up to 2000 or so, and your free test over range as well. That means, more aggression, better erections, more sex drive, more muscle growth, more red blood cells and, unfortunately, more hair loss potential (Rogaine anyone?). It’s not a “bodybuilder” dose, but, for 90% of men, you’re going to grow on this much testosterone, lose some fat, and have a better sense of well-being and feel more “alpha.”

Read More: The Movie That Understands The Ongoing Attack Against Testosterone

Overtaxed
Overtaxed is an IT engineer and former bodybuilding junkie. In a relationship for a long time with one of the "good ones" spent years before that learning game the hard way; lots of trial and error. Many years working and competing in the bodybuilding world helping guys "dial in" their cycles and learn how steroids and other drugs can help change a man's body, outlook on life and the way women view them. Currently spends about 45% of his work day making money to pay the taxes on what he gets paid during the other 55%.

Is Bastardy The New Face Of Modernism?

August 23, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

Modern men today, especially those who are in demand, often choose to postpone marriage to play the field. As we all know, a man's value tends to increase with time (especially SMV), provided he takes steps to maintain himself physically, materially and emotionally. Men in the modern world today have more options and sexual freedom than their forefathers, especially if they pursue self-improvement.

However, one thing which can directly affect a bachelor's freedom is when his sexual partner gets unexpectedly knocked up. The resulting emotional turmoil and guilt trips can wear down soft-hearted men into possible marriage, especially out of consideration for the welfare of their future offspring, but men who have strong frame control are wise enough to resist it. No wonder marriage is called wedlock, because more often than not, it locks a man's freedom. In the long run, it must only be considered—if ever—after deep thought.

It can affect any man – when he least expects it

Earlier last month, “heartthrob” actor Ryan Gosling’s impending fatherhood in the wake of the surprising pregnancy of his actress girlfriend, Eva Mendes, made “shocking and devastating” news (to women) in the tabloids and press. The story took many contrasting and contradictory twists and turns in the press since it first made the headlines. According to some, it was learned that Mendes’s pregnancy was totally unplanned, and blindsided the 33-year-old Gosling because their relationship had hit a rough patch just before Mendes, six years Gosling’s senior, shared the news of the pregnancy.

Some reported that tensions had risen between the two, because their disagreements always came back to a central issue: "Eva wants to marry Ryan, but so far, he has resisted. "Whereas other stories reported that it was Gosling who changed Mendes's mind to agree for marriage, as she considered it "a very old fashioned archaic kind of thing." However, after all this media-reported drama, recent reports state that all is fine between the couple, and both are elated with the news, and are supposedly set to marry after the birth of the child.

Unexpected premarital pregnancy: marry or not?

Many men today could find themselves in a similar situation. Whether from a LTR "girlfriend," a lusty ONS, or even a fuckbuddy, the news of unexpected impending fatherhood can unexpectedly jolt a bachelor's life. Things become more complicated in case the woman demands to be wifed-up because she's carrying your seed. What do you do? Maintain frame control to stand your ground.

The logical answer would and should be TO REFUSE (or at least hold off) marriage, especially if you've moved on from her. No man needs to guilt trip himself into marriage simply for becoming a daddy when he didn't want to be one. You could feel guilty for not practicing safe sex, but do remember the sex was consensual. If she's willing to get raw dogged, and that too with completion, then pregnancy (or STDs) is what she's potentially asking for—not only from you, but from anyone who would raw dog her. Using contraceptives is not only your responsibility but hers as well.

The questionable lineage of future mankind

In earlier times, people (or women specifically) used to wait until marriage to have children. In today's world, people would rather have children first to possibly get married later—or sometimes not get married at all. The main reason for this is the lack of incentives for modern men to choose marriage, mostly due to the spread of feminist values of gender equality, materialistic marriages of shallow love, the stooping quality of modern women's chastities in permissive hookup cultures, and lopsided divorce courts. These all enslave men further, should a man choose to put the noose of marriage around his neck. Thus sex without marriage, or even children without marriage, seems safer than marriage itself – either through adoption, surrogacy or premarital sex. This alarming trend has begun to affect the nature of traditional societies too, as seen below from sample trends from contemporary 'traditional' societies:

In today's age of female promiscuity, conservative women moving from more traditional societies to modern feminist societies also tend to become more promiscuous, which corrupts them even further. Two years ago, a research found that more than half of births to American women younger than 30 are outside marriage.

Compared to the 1990s when a third of Americans were born out of wedlock, now 41 percent of babies do not have married parents. There are racial divides:

- 73 percent of black babies are born outside marriage
- 53 percent of Latino babies are born outside marriage
- 29 percent of white babies are born outside marriage

And educational divides:

- 92 percent of college-educated women are married when they have a child
- 62 percent of those with post-secondary schooling are married when they give birth
- 43 percent of women with a high school diploma are married when they give birth

But another disturbing factor is that promiscuity is rising among college-educated women. Who marries these women later on?

Elsewhere, in the world today, births outside marriage represent a majority in a growing number of European and most Latin American countries, but remain rare in Asia:

> "In 2011, 39.5% of all births in the 27 EU countries were extramarital. The majority of births occur outside of marriage (figures as of 2012, except where otherwise stipulated) in the following European countries: Iceland (66.9%), Estonia (58.4%), Slovenia (58% – in 2013), Bulgaria (57.4%), France (57.1% in 2013), Norway (54.9%), Sweden (54.5%), Belgium (52.3%), and Denmark (50.6%).

The proportion of extramarital births is also approaching half in Portugal (47,6%) as of 2013,the United Kingdom (47.6%), the Netherlands (46.6%) Latvia (45%) all 2012 numbersand Czech Republic (45% in 2013).Other European countries with a high rate of extramarital births for the year 2012 are Hungary (44.5%), Finland (41.5%), Austria (41.5%), Luxembourg (37.1%), Slovakia (35.4%), Germany (34.5%).The lowest proportion of births outside marriage were found in Greece (7.6%), Croatia (15.4%), and Cyprus (18.6%).

In the EU, the average percentage of extramarital births has risen steadily in recent years, from 27.4% in 2000 to 39.5% in 2011.

It is notable that traditionally-conservative Catholic countries in the EU now also have substantial proportions of extramarital births: Portugal, 47,6% (as of 2013); Spain, 35.5% ; Ireland, 35.1%; Italy, 28.0%, all numbers for the year 2012.

To a certain degree, religion correlates with the proportion of extramarital births (e.g., Greece, Cyprus, Croatia have a low percentage of births outside marriage), but this is not always the case: Portugal (47.6%) and Romania (31%) are among the most religious countries in Europe.

The percentage of first-born children born out of wedlock is considerably higher (by roughly 10%, for the EU), as marriage often takes place after the first baby has arrived. For example for the Czech Republic, whereas the total extramarital births are less than half (45%), the percentage of first-born outside marriage is more than half (55.7%)

Latin America has the highest rates of non-marital childbearing in the world (55–74% of all children in this region are born to unmarried parents).In most countries in this traditionally Catholic region, children born outside marriage are now the norm. Recent figures from Latin America show non-marital births to be 74% in Colombia, 70% in Paraguay, 69% in Peru, 63% in the Dominican Republic, 58% in Argentina, 55% in Mexico.In Brazil, non-marital births increased to 65.8% in 2009, up from 56.2% in 2000. In Chile, non-marital births increased to 69.7% in 2012, up from 48.3% in 2000.

Even in the early 1990s, the phenomenon was very common in Latin America. For example, in 1993, out-of-wedlock births in Mexico were 41.5%, in Chile 43.6%, in Puerto Rico 45.8%, in Costa Rica 48.2%, in Argentina 52.7%, in Belize 58.1%, in El Salvador 73%, in Suriname 66% and in Panama 80%.

Out-of-wedlock births are less common in Asia: in 1993 the rate in Japan was 1.4%; in Israel, 3.1%; in China, 5.6%; in Uzbekistan, 6.4%; in Kazakhstan, 21%; in Kyrgyzstan, 24%. However, in the catholic Philippines, the out-of-the-wedlock birth rate was 37% in 2008-2009.”

These trends reveal certain patterns:

- Religious or traditionally conservative modern societies are now having more unwed births
- Marriage often takes place after the first born baby arrives (which is usually out of wedlock) which serves as the usual precursor (or trigger) to subsequent marital commitment
- Bastardy (illegitimacy) is lower in eastern cultures, or less economically-developed eastern societies

Thus, even "religion" or "traditional conservatism" cannot prevent bastardy much in modern societies, as these trends show. Rather, these trends could also highlight the hypocritical application of these systems in modern societies, where they cannot prevent women from opening their wombs to fertilization without marriages. You can't blame religion for promoting these trends; rather, a lack of sincere belief in religion itself could also be the reason for the laxity in morals.

It's an ominous paradoxical paradigm for modern societies: already plummeting birth rates in permissive cultures, but when people there do decide to reproduce, they often reproduce without marriage. Modernism, progressivism, liberalism, all come with a heavy price for the formation of a traditional family.

And these trends look likely to continue to rise in the near future, as promiscuity rises and incentives to stay or get married for men continue to further drop in modern feminist societies. The future generations could technically be branded as the generation of bastards, as most of them would indeed be born to unmarried parents. Civilizations of bastards, whores and sluts, yes those are the ominous trends for the future.

Demonizing unwilling fathers in modern societies

In modern times, unwilling fathers are often demonized as irresponsible drifters in modern feminist societies. This has led to cases which have sparked debates about men's constitutional rights to avoid procreation. The question looms large: what incentives do men often have to get married in such societies? Almost nil. Sluthood is celebrated in the name of feminism, entitled women waste away their prime on the cock carousel and often acknowledge preferring "nice guys" only for marriage, but not dating. So in this paradigm, does a man who gets access to premarital sex from a woman need to "man up" to take responsibility for impregnating her, by marriage? Logically speaking, no.

You'd probably think I'm being ironic or even hypocritical because I'm critiquing the rising trends of bastardy in the world, whereas on the other side I'm suggesting that men shouldn't wife up women who get knocked up by them out of wedlock.

Understand this oft-repeated truth: women are the gatekeepers of sex, and control the access to the womb. If they choose to fuck, or even get knocked up, no one can stop them—especially in today's permissive fem-centric societies. The rising trends in bastardy, as seen above, are thus often the result of irresponsible sexual choices by women, not men. Whether the pregnancy resulted out of an act propelled by a fear regarding her ticking biological clock, or it was her irresponsible and passionate act of immaturity, men don't need to bear accountability for a woman's sexual choice of premarital unsafe sex.

Why should men have to bear responsibility for a woman's consensual irresponsible sexual choices, when women today say they have the right to do whatever with their bodies? Why are more women openly choosing the path of unwed motherhood by choosing unsafe sex and promiscuity? If she wants or agrees to get raw-dogged, is it the man's fault if she gets knocked up? Is social welfare for unwed motherhood to blame too? There are already polarized debates whether unwed mothers deserve social welfare. Modern women often don't want consequences or responsibilities for their choices, but want to blame or even ensnare men for them.

If men are not entitled to sex—as how modern gender egalitarian societies propose—then it's fine, but women then too shouldn't entitle themselves by expecting men to to bear responsibility for an unexpected pregnancy with compensation in the form of a marriage. Sexual freedom comes with unspoken responsibilities, moreso for women; and women should bear, and be made to bear these responsibilities for the sexual freedom they enjoy today, and the choices they make. Modern feminist societies are increasingly taking away these responsibilities from women. Men should not exonerate these already socially-empowered women further in such situations by wifing them up for irresponsible sexual decisions.

Indeed, there are some men who want to be fathers, and some who want to get married—someday. The logical, responsible, and traditional way to have children is to wait to have them within a marriage. But, to each his own. Either way, don't ever let a woman emotionally manipulate you in wifing her up simply because you knocked her up.

Read More: 2 Ways Quality Men Get Locked Into A Relationship

Oscar Zach

Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

How Job Hunting Is Like Picking Up Women (And How It Isn't)

August 23, 2014 | by Oswaldo Guimaraens | Link | Original Link

At the most basic level, trying to score pussy is similar to trying to get a job: you are selling yourself. You need to stand out among the crowd, demonstrate high value, understand the other side's needs, and cajole your sparring partner into choosing you based on imperfect information, all while maintaining an outwardly positive attitude. This article refers to professional, white-collar jobs, in cases where the employer has most of the leverage, i.e., a position at which the majority of ROK readers will find themselves at some point in their lives.

There's no doubt that effective game techniques will help you in your job search. The professional job applicant needs to be an alpha male, sharply focused yet coming off as a bit aloof. He has confidence that there are many employers who would value his talents, yet he knows that he has to prove himself. The job seeker has to conduct himself a bit more conservatively than when approaching girls. The need to balance humility with self-confidence prevails in both markets, but the dynamic is more complex in the employment realm.

How the job search is like game

1. The job seeker should broaden his horizons and adopt an abundance mentality

He will be rejected plenty. One-itis is as devastating in looking for a job as it is in considering a woman. It will be tedious and unpleasant at times, but the man needs to glean some gratification from the process: just as he finds it fun to demonstrate his masculine worth to women, he should enjoy conveying his professional value to prospective colleagues. Though it may not always feel like it in the West these days, the qualified professional has to approach the job search confident that he brings to the table knowledge, skills, and personality that are right for many prospective employers.

2. Technology has changed the dynamic.

Prospective employers will judge a job seeker from his profiles on places like LinkedIn (and maybe even Facebook). The environment is brutal and the technology has increased the volume of rejections or downright indifference that he will encounter, no matter his pedigree. Recruiters and hiring managers get so many inquiries, both unsolicited and in response to postings, that ignoring them is about the same as swiping left on Tinder.

He will be "cockblocked" by the entry-level HR cunt receiving resumes online whose raison d'être is to look for a reason to screen him out. However, this is merely the flip-side of the abundance principle. Today's professionals have so much more information at their disposal than those even one generation ago; the advantages of this paradigm outweigh the disadvantages.

3. Choosing an employee is an emotional task.

We would like to think that the rational business person's decision-making process is wholly different from that of the half-drunk hamster, but the typical interview gauntlet is more served to drawing out interpersonal sensitivities than to assessing objective professional attributes. It may sound obvious, but many job seekers fail to internalize the mandate to convince the interviewer why it is in the latter's interest to hire him. Analogously, even though the only reason why a man seeks a woman's company is often for his own carnal recreation, communicating that objective to a pick-up target directly will not work.

The successful player gets the woman to perceive that bending over naked and burying her face in the bedspread while he pounds her from behind is in her interests, because he comprehends what she perceives her interest to be. Getting a foot in the door represents the biggest hurdle, and the successful applicant needs to learn how to push the right buttons to seal the deal from that point. The hiring manager will likely form his ultimate impression within minutes, so the applicant's alpha banter needs to ably address this crucial juncture.

How the job search is not like game

1. The "IOI" and initial response take different forms

A woman on the street might be caught off-guard by a strong approach, but that is less likely to happen when approaching someone for a job. The cover letter or other initial inquiry is the hook, but there is little resonance in a witty opener or fast-paced retort. The caveman aggressive approach won't work. Nor will cocky asshole game. This is because a recruiter has to commit to the interaction before the applicant has the opportunity to state his case.

Although there are parallels in the techniques needed to close when one has one's target isolated, it is harder to get to that point in job searching. These dynamics illustrate the most important elemental difference between looking to score a woman versus looking to get a job: the decision-maker on the other side of the table is a man—I won't apply to a job if I know the recruiter or hiring manager to be a woman. Leveraging social proof—such as seeking a job through a contact—will get him in the door but rarely close the sale. Because the hiring manager is also at least a reasonably high-status male, status alone isn't enough.

2. Most professional men will, at some point, find themselves on the other side of the transaction

This leads to another important difference in the two types of transactions: the application of ethics and integrity. Most alphas believe that "all's fair in love and war," whereas in the employment realm, the "golden rule"—treat others as you would like to be treated—should govern. Women are genetically incapable of living by this maxim, of course, and by definition it doesn't apply in the pursuit of poon because of the different mentalities of the two sides. A woman and man can never treat one another as they would like to be treated, because women and men have different preferences and motivation.

Moreover, women are not capable of grasping such an abstract concept, nor of envisioning the future or contemplating the consequences of their actions. While the alpha may not mind misrepresenting himself to score a notch, the job seeker should not lie on his resume or in an interview, both because it can harm him later if he gets the job and because of the ethics that the true man should embody in professional life. Whereas the lines between "truth," "spin," and "lie" can be blurry in the pickup game, in a business environment they really are not. Most people in the Western (especially Anglo-Saxon) business world abide by honesty and fair dealing. A manager interviewing a job candidate should count on these shared values. But applying this type of morality to picking up women will only lead to righteous failure.

3. The consummation of the interaction—hiring—carries greater risk for both the buyer and the seller than does the bang in the janitor closet.

A hiring manager is less likely to be punished for employing a low-risk candidate who doesn't work out than for choosing one with an out-of-the-box profile if the new hire ultimately fails. Similarly, a short or otherwise unsuccessful tenure at a company can set one's career, not to mention one's self-confidence, back significantly. For this reason, even with an abundance mentality, the job seeker has to approach each transaction with a bit more circumspection than when trying to score women, and he can expect the hiring manager to do the same. A successful job interview is one in which the conversation becomes more future-oriented as it progresses—how can I contribute to the success of your business unit and the organization as a whole in the future? The analogous long-term beta fantasizing in a pick-up scenario is pointless, counter-productive, or utterly disastrous.

So, how to succeed?

1. Control the frame.

The alpha man should be half a step ahead of his environment. A home-run job interview is one in which the candidate sets the agenda and steers the conversation, one in which the lines of inquiry are aligned to the applicant's strengths in the context of what the employer needs. The dialogue manifests a collegiality between the parties more than simply a walk-through of the candidate's knowledge. To maximize the likelihood of such a trajectory, it is crucial that the job seeker research the company and the individual hiring manager to perfect his tailored elevator pitch.

The applicant can also steer the dialogue in this direction by picking up subtle cues and turning questions around on the interviewer. He needs to act with conviction: although he can't presume to have solutions to all of the company's problems, he indicates that he is the right person to take on the challenge. It can be tricky to convey such conviction without coming across as arrogant, but achieving this balance is perhaps the single most crucial element of a successful interview.

The candidate's questions have to demonstrate knowledge of the organization and synthesis of the interviewer's previous statements: he candidate should frame the interview as if he were a consultant, having his first meeting with the company gathering information after it has already engaged him, not as a cheap salesman who had no prior knowledge of the organization. The same behavioral techniques work in both interviewing and picking up women: dressing the part, speaking concisely, not rambling, maintaining strong posture and eye contact, leading the conversation but not crowding the other party out, and always moving toward the close.

2. Improve oneself

Just as the alpha man, even if he is good-looking and well-paid, cannot assume that he can walk into a club and have multiple women lifting their skirts for him, the working man needs to constantly improve himself. He needs to read and post on professional forums, gather knowledge in his industry, expand his generalist intellectual horizons (e.g., via reading books and pursuing mind-stimulating hobbies), and hone his social skills. For almost all men, just going through the motions—putting on a suit and sitting at the bar—won't be enough in trying to meet women, nor will he succeed by hiring a professional resume writer, uploading to a hundred postings, and sitting back waiting for a job offer.

3. Tailor the approach and reflect on failures

The successful job seeker understands that different resumes and cover letters, methods of approaching prospects, and anecdotes shared in interviews are necessary to increase the likelihood of success depending on the circumstances. He should not only tailor his approach to the job he is pursuing and the individual on the other end, but also try different techniques as sort of a controlled experiment. Some failures will seem inexplicable, but all that the job seeker can do is try to pick out the positive and negative aspects of the interaction and apply it to his next approach.

Conclusion

Most of us will have to convince someone to hire us at some point. The definition of game—projecting well-founded charisma, self-awareness, and confidence—is equally applicable to the job search and to the hunt for sex. The man's objective in learning and testing game techniques should be not just to pull a fast one on either a girl or an interviewer, but to internalize his appeal to be naturally deployed, whether at the bar or in the office.

Read More: 5 Honest Hiring Tips From Someone Who Hires

Oswaldo Guimaraens
Oswaldo is a corporate executive, world traveler, misogynist, and misanthrope. Turn-ons: smoke stacks, skyscrapers, firearms, and other expressions of human achievement. Turn-offs: collectivism, superstition, sentimentality, and other forces that undermine that achievement.

Why Nice Guys Exist In America

August 24, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Women—and feminists, in particular—love to make social hay over a class of men dubbed "Nice Guys" (hereafter, referred to as NG's). When the term is used positively, NG's are perceived as non-confrontational, cooperative, and sensitive to other's emotional needs. NG's, here, are praised for their enlightened masculinity. When used pejoratively, it is used to describe a class of men who fake being nice in order to manipulate others into doing what NG's want. Here, NG's are perceived as sexist, manipulative, and full of repressed rage.

Truthfully, nice guys are not so nice.

Dr. Robert Glover observed as such in his seminal work No More Mister Nice Guy. In his practice as a psychotherapist, Glover noticed many of his male clients shared a disturbing number of unhealthy thought patterns. He also noted that women shared similar complaints about their husbands who seemed nice most of the time, but occasionally had meltdowns about their sex lives, threw temper tantrums over seemingly insignificant issues, and randomly displayed a level of outright hostility towards their wives.

After noticing this, Glover began to piece together his theory about what NG's are and what makes them tick. He noted that all NG's have a core belief that who they are is not enough to get their wants and needs met—Glover refers to this as "toxic shame." This toxic shame refers to NG's belief that they need to prove to others constantly why they deserve love, affection, and sex. They don't understand that friends and lovers care about one another by definition and that one doesn't need to constantly prove why you are worthy of love and attention.

In order to fully grasp why NG's are the way they are, one must consider the state of children existing as children. Children are born completely helpless and 100% reliant on their parents. As such, a child's greatest fear is abandonment. The omnipotence that fetuses think they have leads to children having an ego-centered mindset that causes them to think what happens to them and around them is caused by them or is their fault. When parenting goes wrong, the child blames themselves. NG's, in response to this, develop similar patterns of thought and actions that allow them to cope.

Nice Guys have many similar characteristics: shame-based hiding of perceived flaws, the relentless pursuit of other's approval and distancing themselves from other men and masculinity. They put other's needs and wants before their own and expect others to reciprocate their generosity. They purposefully sacrifice personal power and autonomy in order they pretend they are a grand victim of society.

These sorts of behaviors lead to what we refer to as "Nice Guys." Since they couldn't get their needs met in a timely fashion as a child, they had to develop strategies to get those wants and needs met. As an adult, this leads to seemingly pleasant and thoughtful men who reveal themselves to be duplicitous individuals who believe they must manipulate other people in order to be happy. They refuse to live up their potential so they can maintain their childish view that they are the world's biggest victims.

Dr. Glover notes that these sorts of thoughts and behaviors are entirely socially created. He notes four major social changes that have forced boys to take on NG behavior: the loss of fathers in families, an educational system dominated by women, the Vietnam War, and second-wave feminism.

He noted that the twin forces of urbanization and single motherhood presented boys with either a father working outside the home or not around at all. He noted that second-wave feminists incessantly proclaimed that men were not relevant to a woman's life and that all men had to prove they were more than a stereotypical misogynistic pig.

The backlash against the Vietnam War had created a class of males who based their masculinity an non-assertiveness, empathy, and avoiding conflict. Finally, the female-dominated educational system—coupled with single motherhood—created men that only understood women as authority figures. Instead of being people whom men could expect love and kindness, women became tyrants who had to be pleased at all costs.

Over the next seven chapters, Dr. Glover presents several strategies aimed at helping NG's reclaim personal power and autonomy. He outlines how a NG can prioritize his needs in a psychologically healthy fashion. He has chapters on how a NG can transform their sex lives for the better and how they can achieve more contentment and success in their profession. His suggested activities to change harmful thought patterns are thoughtful and useful if a NG follows through with them.

In the epilogue, he seems to say that a man can be happy if he simply chooses to be happy. Once a man can realize the unhealthy thought patterns that plague their minds—and the attendant unhealthy behaviors—then that man can start to slowly cobble together more healthy thought patterns that will lead to personal happiness and contentment. The freedom that comes from learning how to overcome personal issues might seem fearsome at first, but once a man realizes the happiness that flow from said personal betterment, then he can leave the fear of the unknown behind.

No More Mister Nice Guy is a very good read and he provides many, many tips for men who are depressed, feel they are frauds, or who feel they have no stable sense of self. He doesn't present any politically correct nonsense about male privilege or sexism—he simply calls American society as he sees it and provides the necessary advice for men to overcome their Nice Guy-ish ways.

Don't Miss: The 5 Stages Of Nice Guy Grief

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

4 Strategies For Teaching Game To Autistic Men

August 24, 2014 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

Many newcomers to the art of the game assume that only skinny beta males and obese agoraphobic nerds suffer the consequences of taking the blue pill, but these are merely the most obvious and easily-ridiculed of the emasculated. Thanks to postmodern indoctrination, you can find men in serious need of the red pill from the corporate executive's office to the janitor's closet in the same building.

Recently, I took a sabbatical from writing articles and decided to apply the knowledge and themes of my work by volunteering in my local community. The young people who needed my help the most weren't the psychologically normal kids of wealthy professionals who can afford to fritter cash on self-help scams or pass their hellion on to a boot camp for reform. There are some seriously under-appreciated kids on the fringes of the manosphere who get lumped in with Adam Lanza, Elliot Rodgers, and others of that nature. A large part of this demographic's failures to launch and grow stems from no mentor taking the time even try and pill them.

I don't mean to imply for a second that a little game and some incisive reactionary talking points would end shooting sprees by the neurologically atypical, yet we see plenty of their less extreme cousins waddling to the checkout counter at Wal-Mart with armfuls of My Little Pony merchandise. The more extreme of those are probably the urban transsexuals. Most of these autistic male-to-female transsexuals are self-diagnosed in the manner of betas with internet Asperger's Syndrome and, instead of gender dysphoria, have just had overbearing mothers and imitate that gender role.

These individuals recognize that being a woman is less socially and culturally demanding than being a man.Their effeminate qualities become amplified by the female domination of virtually all careers in services used to help the autistic cope with ordinary society (speech therapists, special education teachers, etc.). The estrogen saturation of these fields means that even autistics without the transsexual delusion have no idea how most women behave or what they expect of a man.

Searching for a behavioral code, male kids with autism soak up the pleasant, idealized utopian principles of modernist chivalry that would only work (partially) in America before the late 1950s. Consider how many young autistic guys try to emulate the dated fashion of the Hollywood Golden Age by wearing trench coats and fedoras with tweed slacks. It's a sadly earnest effort borne of a desire to emulate a type of classy masculinity in the mode of Humphrey Bogart that a shrinking minority of women claim represents the "real" man.

Unfortunately the feminist institutions have neutered us neurotypicals (neologism for people without autism), but these guys are even worse off. If we're hobbled, then they're amputees. In this article, I outline the four things that autistic young men need to do if they want to implant those prosthetic blades and run in the marathon.

Mother Complex

I arrived on-site for the first day of volunteering with high-functioning autistic teenagers with one of my side pieces. The young chirpy women who coordinated the volunteers gave me a clear look saying that I didn't belong. The kids stared at me like I was living their dreams, and you wouldn't be able to tell these kids had disabilities until engaging in conversation. I arrived 10 minutes earlier than planned, so I told my sidepiece that she could leave while I chatted up the teens.

I broke the ice with one of the bigger teenagers glued to his laptop. No sooner than I'd uttered "Hello," did an older woman pop into view and start talking in his place. She introduces herself as the boy's,—who I'll refer to as "X"—mother and speaks for her son over a full 5-minute discussion about the program. X wouldn't come out of his shell until I opened it with a little applied game, since techniques we use to try to bang chicks can easily be adapted to for male-to-male conversation.

X badgered me for easy answers to questions about dating, life as an independent, and what I thought about “bronies.” I switched the topic straight to the chase: Telling the kid that momma has his best interests at heart, but she cannot be his spokesperson. This is the first and maybe most crippling mistake of autistic youths. They and their mothers form a codependent relationship, wherein mommy keeps running their lives well into early adulthood in return for never going through Empty Nest Syndrome. Autistic guys must realize that women are not attracted to a dependent man who can’t take lead them, and that goes double for men ruled by their mothers.

Nurturing Woman Complex

After a few days I settled into the routines of the program, and had my epiphany that the majority of people who work with special needs clients are women. Everything from remedial social skills therapy to the speech pathology is dispensed by college-indoctrinated younger women. It’s as if when these autistic boys are born they’re discharged right into a birthing pool saturated with blue pill solute. They are obliviously spoon-fed media and education (indoctrination) system propaganda for their developmental years, and from an early age expect that these educators will be their emotional tampon.

Even worse, their hyper-focused education pathway conditions them to think of the perfect woman as a surrogate mama, and these allegedly trained specialist ladies truly were kindly, maternal figures. The type of female that would spend years in college to teach in the hardest and least-appreciated field is definitely not representative of the average American woman, providing a poor template on which to base their future expectations of females in the wild.

For example, I slept with the “meanest” speech pathologist in the whole program and she made me breakfast in the morning. Contrary to that nurturing, reciprocating behavior, autistic men need to understand that a typical woman is emotionally extractive. A woman generally expels all her anxiety and delusion to the outer world; she doesn't take it inside.That brings me to point #3.

Implanted Ideas/Patterns

Within a few weeks, chubby man "X" lost weight under my advice. While his parents and educators fed him loads of low-fat dessert foods hoping for miracles, I suggested that X make those sweets a weekly treat instead of a daily decadence. Normal people have a hard enough time avoiding these traps, and routinely accept ideas implanted by conventional wisdom and the popular media as incontrovertible.

Autism can make critical thinking about social trends about 200 times harder. Simple things like casual fashion perpetually block autistic men from easy pussy—imagine a guy who looks at things like fedoras, long coats, fingerless gloves, camouflage patterns, and other "cool" articles of clothing separately and assumes that mashing all of those things together will make an "ultra cool" outfit.

Many of those pictures floating around the internet making you cringe with secondhand embarrassment are of autistic subjects. The other problem exacerbating the autistic man's quest for a lay is his dependency of routine and patterns. While autistic dudes never get tired of the predictable, and often fall back on tropes and archetypes apparent in fictional relationships, women frequently resent and outwardly disdain predictability in men. A lot of the guys in the program told me about waiting until the 3rd date to proposition a girl for sex, since she'd obviously feel obliged at that point.

This advice might have been applicable long ago, but awkwardly going through the motions of two dates to reach that mystified 3rd date instead of trying to bed the bitch on the 1st will cause her to label you a closeted gay shopping for a beard. Autistic guys need to learn basic flexibility and get comfortable questioning conventions and long-term habits. It's axiomatic stuff you've likely heard a billion times before, but where has ignoring it gotten you?

Feminine Mannerisms

Like · Share 14 Shares

Christian Weston Chandler and 45 others like this.

Christian Weston Chandler I just sorted it out how to best nutshell the details: I hardly get along with Males at all (not counting being civil); I get along better with Females TOTALLY; I hardly identify myself with the Barbarian and Stereotypical Males at all; I identify BEST with the feminine ways, emotions, Empathy and about Everything Else; I GET DISGUSTED WITH THE DAMN DICKS INCLUDING MY OWN; I WANT TO SHOVE MY FACE INTO THE BIG HOLE BELOW THE URETHRA KNOWN AS THE BEAUTIFUL VAGINA VERY MUCH; I am Feminine on the inside, Male on the outside; my Feminine Soul is most attracted and aroused by women and their Superior Beauty; Male Bodies are horrendous and most offensive to me, talk about going from the middle to HELL's Deep on the Beauty/Ugly thermometer. Female and Male on Female and Female equals Lesbian Identified Man!

No More Questions!!!

2 hours ago · Like · 13

My previous two points touched on this, but it's vital enough to warrant its own segment. The autistic guys I was working with, bluntly stated, had bitch tendencies. They cried over OKcupid rejections and posted logorrhea rants on Reddit about how women don't return their affections. There's still a misconception out there that autistic people have muted or deadened emotions like sociopaths, but the reality is that they're usually just poor at communicating them. Give them internet access, though, and watch the melodrama and hysterics pour out.

This was the hardest thing to impress on my group because there aren't many options for a red pill role model. Their fathers, if they were around, were probably crippled by beta male characteristics. I decided to look into the escapist media hobbies that many were so fond of, and picked out some of the anime I watched as a teen for fun. I tried likening certain red pill lessons to the stuff in Dragonball or Dragonball Z.

At this point in the article, you're either dismissing me as an elaborate troll, or retracting whatever credibility you extended, but if you were around these teens then you'd understand that I simply couldn't throw these boys into the deep end with RooshV and Frost right at the start.

A running theme in the anime marketed to boys (and popular with young men abroad) is that the heroes are altruistically-minded characters who work hard for their rewards. They embrace that lofty alpha male notion of meritorious achievement and being a provider. The heroes don't bitch when they can't beat the villain of the week, but rather train until they're strong enough to win fairly. That's a boiled-down version of what ROK wants to bring back to Western masculinity.

Teaching my program teens these essential skills has improved their prospects visibly. X, the fat kid on the laptop, lost 40 pounds in only 6 months. Afterwards I persuaded him to make a Tinder account for dating and less serious fun. Sure, he hasn't been an alpha male Casanova, but for a kid to develop this much makes me proud and further validates the principles we adhere to at ROK.

It doesn't hurt that I now have the plates of special education personal, which I'll file under recompense. I decided to be a flexible human being and it paid off. Giving those amputees the prosthetic leg rejuvenated my outlook on life.

Read More: How Teaching English In China Can Improve Your Game

---

redpiller1985

Redpiller1985 is a dude who has been taught the red pill thanks to the greats like Roosh, El mech, and many countless other RVF contributors. Here is his twitter, if you have any questions or comments to send to him. Send a Twitter direct message if you want to talk about using my services to promote redpill ideas.

The Next Fifty Years Of Race And Culture In America

August 25, 2014 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Humanity has come a long way in a very short time. When one takes a moment to consider just how much has changed in our world within the last 50 years alone (a very small amount of time in the grand scheme of things), it isn't difficult to be impressed by the sheer degree of change that has taken place.

In 1964, for example, the age of legal, state-sanctioned racial segregation in the USA was only just being brought to an end. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was still a global superpower. The last baby boomers were still being born. Human spaceflight was merely 3 years old.

Fast forward to the present day. The USSR is dead, baby boomers are beginning to retire en masse, we have semi-permanent research platforms in orbit, and the American president is black.

What will the USA and the rest of our world look like in another 50 years? I have a few predictions.

1. Enhanced Racial Tensions in the USA

The age of the minority-majority is coming very soon. The USA has always been a predominantly white nation. Demographers estimate that this will change during the early 2040's thanks to low white fertility rates and extensive immigration. By 2064, this nation will have possibly been majority non-white for almost a generation. Most of these non-whites will be hispanic, though the black and Asian populations will grow significantly as well. That in and of itself is going to bring a big difference in perspective within this society.

Many whites do not feel entirely comfortable with the fact that they may soon be outnumbered in a land that was once undoubtedly their own, and they're not going to ride quietly into the sunset as the social and political consequences of this demographic shift make themselves apparent. You will see the pushback in politics as demographic shifts begin to frame policy debates and party lines become increasingly racially defined, and with regard to population dynamics as white flight accelerates and the level of segregation increases (fortifying a dwindling number of white communities and increasing the number of minority-dominated areas).

Many observers assumed that the rise of Obama signaled a positive shift in the nature of America's race relations and the beginning of a truly "post-racial America." If America could finally tolerate a black man in its highest office, they reasoned, surely they would follow through with more positive views of and harmonious relations with their fellow Americans of all backgrounds.

Available evidence suggests that this view was optimistic, as Mark Potok noted in the New York Times just under a year ago:

> Have race relations worsened since Obama was elected? The best data, two polls commissioned by The Associated Press, suggest the answer is yes. The number of Americans with "explicit anti-black attitudes" rose from 48 percent in 2008 to 51 percent in 2012, while implicit racist attitudes went from 49 percent to 56 percent. Another set of A.P. polls showed anti-Latino attitudes had climbed between 2011 and 2012.
>
> Other evidence supports the A.P. findings. According to counts by the Southern Poverty Law Center, the number of hate groups in America rose from 926 in 2008 to 1,007 in 2012, while other types of radical-right groups rose much faster.

Potok goes on to argue that there is still potential for improvement, but I'm simply not seeing much room for optimism. The melting pot is not coming, and recent data is only adding further confirmation of this:

> Public attitudes about race relations have plummeted since the historic election of President Barack Obama, according to a new poll from NBC News and the Wall Street Journal.
>
> Only 52 percent of whites and 38 percent of blacks have a favorable opinion of race relations in the country, according to the poll, which has tracked race relations since 1994 and was conducted in mid-July by Hart Research Associations and Public Opinion Strategies.
>
> That's a sharp drop from the beginning of Obama's first term, when 79 percent of > whites and 63 percent of blacks held a favorable view of American race relations.

And just this month:

> Nearly 9 in 10 people say race relations in the United States have not improved under President Obama, according to a new poll.

Obama did not bring “the melting pot” together; on the contrary, Americans of different ethnicities are only growing further apart, and there is little reason to suspect that this trend will not continue.

2. Increased Religiosity and Conservatism

Expect more religiosity and conservatism overall. This is a function of demography. Among whites, conservatives are rapidly outbreeding their more secular counterparts, and the outflow from these ideologies to more secular trains of thought is simply not keeping up (apples are not falling far from their trees). The majority of white children being born today are being born in conservative households and often are raised with religious values.

Those chickens are going to come home to roost within the coming 20, 30, and 40 years as liberal whites continue to decline as a percentage of their population. Combine this phenomenon with a non-white majority (non-whites being generally more religious and socially conservative than whites), and you're going to see a significantly more conservative America during this century. Demographic weight is going to tip the balance in the culture wars to the more conservative side, and hot-button issues like abortion are going to be in the cross fire.

Some of the more progressive victories won during these recent culture wars (I include the gender wars among these) may be seriously challenged. Those on the left already lament the rollback of many progressive victories in recent years (ex: growing legislative war on birth control at the state level), but demographic realities will ensure that the assault is far from over.

3. The Recovery of American Industry

This prediction is more tenuous, but I foresee a positive outlook for American industry as labor costs in traditional destinations for outsourcing (e.g. China) begin to rise and erode the advantage they once enjoyed. Europe's demographic issues will also benefit us by raising labor costs, and incentivizing some corporations (e.g. Mercedes) to move operations to the United States, a massive market that will maintain a much younger and cheaper (yet still highly capable) workforce.

America's demographic strength will help it remain economically powerful well into the current century. Many of its competitors on the international economic stage are staring demographic crises directly in the face—they have very low birth rates and rapidly aging populations. The USA will be in a much better position to weather the entitlement storm brought on by the baby-boomers than Europe and even China, thanks to its higher fertility rates, younger population, and strong ability to attract young and talented immigrants from across the planet.

We may never see 1950's-style prosperity here again, but I still think that there will be better times in America's future. The current state of affairs is not, in my estimation, a permanent one.

4. The Marginalization of Fat Acceptance

Americans will get thinner. Awareness of the negative consequences brought by obesity is spreading rapidly, and has gone far enough already to constitute common knowledge. The discussion and promotion of anti-obesity measures has remained outside the realm of political incorrectness, and I predict that increasing awareness of the dangers associated with obesity will only enhance this reality. Add to this the possible arrival of several medical procedures capable of rapidly limiting obesity by the middle of the century, and I expect the anti-obesity campaign to ramp up significantly.

I see some parallels between our current cultural tangle with obesity and the one our parents dealt with when it came to smoking. Like smoking, obesity is going to become increasingly less of a tolerable social norm. The fat-acceptance movement, in my estimation, has no hope in the long term.

5. A Stagnant China

China will not be a superpower by 2064. Instead, it will be an aging nation with a stagnant (or even negative) economic growth rate, similar to its European counterparts today. It will remain a great power, but it will not occupy the role that the USA currently fills. Demographics will ensure this—low fertility rates will accelerate population aging and decline (along with the skills shortages and high labor costs that will accompany it), and imbalanced gender ratios will create legions of young, troublesome men with nothing to lose. China will get old before it gets rich.

What are your perspective on the next half century ahead of us?

Read More: The 15 Magical Years Of Womanhood

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

A Glimpse At The Future Of Condom Technology

August 25, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

If biomedical researchers are successful, today's condoms may become quaint relics of the past. The Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation has awarded a bundle of grants (beginning at $100,000 and increasing to $1,000,000) to a variety of different research teams. The purpose of the research is to look for ways to bring condoms into line with 21st century technology, and enlist them in the fight against disease and overpopulation.

Gates: condoms are on his mind

The venerable condom, which has been around in one form or another for over 400 years, is long overdue for an overhaul. For centuries, animal skins were the preferred condom material. With the adoption of latex in the mid-20th century, standards became more or less frozen for decades. New ideas are desperately needed.

Some of the more cutting-edge proposals have a good chance of general acceptance, as they hold out the possibility of enhancing the sexual experience while sacrificing nothing in the way of safety. Surveys have consistently shown that men want a condom that is (1) easy to put on, and (2) is as close to unprotected sex as possible. The Gates Foundation rightly recognized that the biggest roadblock to condom use is the decrease in pleasure felt by both men and women. After much study, trial, and experimentation, the 11 different research teams have advanced the following ideas.

1. Female condoms that use air pressure as an aid to insertion, or that have advanced "ribbing" in the interior for increased stimulation.

2. Replacing the classic latex condom with a condom made from "hydrogel." Hydrogel is a synthetic material that is supposed to feel more like flesh than latex. Hydrogel can also be permeated with lubricants, stimulants, and anti-disease chemicals for added effectiveness. One type of hydrogel condom has even been developed that has an antioxidant that enhances male sexual pleasure.

Hydrogel materials may revolutionize condom design

3. Super-thin condoms that will be vastly thinner than the standard latex condom. The super-thin condoms would also be stronger and more flexible than the current latex types.

Condom warriors: but who gets to field test?

4. Human-skin mimicry. Modern technology will be used to engineer condoms that have the same properties as highly-textured human skin. These condoms will also be infused with nitric oxide, a chemical supposedly able to stimulate arousal in both men and women. Nitric oxide supposedly could assist in promoting erectile function.

5. A “unisex” internal condom that could be used by both men and women. It could also be used for both vaginal and anal intercourse. Until now, the traditional condom has never technically been “approved” for safety during anal sex.

The unisex condom: looks like an accordion, feels like one too

6. One group has focused on devising faster and easier ways of putting on a condom. The best idea here seems to be a condom that would be put on much like a “Band-Aid” strip. One prototype can be put on using only one hand, and in less than two seconds (the “Zeus Ultra-Sensitive Instant-On”).

7. One team in India has focused on developing an “eco-friendly” condom that would be less harmful to the environment. This “green” condom, because of its biodegradable qualities, would supposedly get wider distribution in urban areas.

Readers will have to decide for themselves as to which of the proposals above has the best chance of wide adoption. My personal opinion is that the focus should be on: (1) the super-thin types of condoms, combined with a faster and improved method of putting it on; and (2) the “hydrogel” type of condom that mimics human skin and can be permeated with liquids or other substances. I don’t see any future in a “green” condom; the last thing that men will be thinking about in the heat of the moment is whether something is environmentally friendly.

Looking at the proposals above, one can see the increased level of attention being paid to the female condom. Invented in 1987 by Danish doctor Lasse Hessel, it was long the red-headed stepchild of the prophylactic world. It first made its appearance in the US in 1993 to decidedly mixed reaction. The first prototype was a long polyurethane pouch, with flexible rings on either end as an aid to stability once inserted into the vaginal canal.

For years, the female condom went nowhere. Women hated the idea of it, and most men never knew it existed. ven today, one would be hard-pressed to find anyone who has even seen a female condom.

The female condom: facing an uphill battle

There were good reasons for the female condom’s unpopularity. Critics have cited the high cost of the condom (about five times as much as the standard condom), and the excessive regulatory hurdles that had to be overcome with such a unique product. But cultural reasons played a role as well. The female condom depended on women taking the initiative in safe sex, and this was a role that most (Western) women were unwilling to assume.

The device did enjoy some success in sub-Saharan Africa and South Asia. From 2007 to 2010, the number of female condoms distributed globally rose from 25 million to 50 million. For all its faults, the female condom has found a niche.

Why was the female condom more popular in the Third World than in the West? The likely reason is that in many traditional societies, men simply refuse to use condoms. In some places in sub-Saharan Africa, a female's insistence that a male wear a condom can lead to domestic violence. With these realities, there is an obvious incentive for women in poorer countries to take their own initiatives in matters of sexual hygiene.

But as discussed above, some of the current research being done is focusing on ways to enhance the appeal of the female condom. My personal opinion is that such efforts will not amount to much in the West. The increased cost of the female condom, their requirement for female initiative in their use, and their lack of availability will ensure their marginalization for the foreseeable future.

Research efforts are better expended on improving the standard male condom, which, for better or for worse, is likely to be with us for another 400 years. The sexual urge is probably the strongest of all human urges, and any attempt to improve condom engineering must take this truth into account. Social truths also need to be taken into account. Western women have (at this point) rejected the female condom, preferring to leave prophylactic initiatives in the hands of men. It is unlikely that any amount of marketing will change this.

Read More: The Millennial Generation Are Rank Narcissists

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Keep Your Baby Momma On Lockdown

August 25, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

They say a girl becomes a woman when she finds out she's pregnant. Until then, married or single, prude or whore, it's all fun and games for her. Whether she admits it or not, nothing in her life is more intimate or more important than having a child. Even if she's never thought about it (which is unlikely), her world now appears through a new lens tinted by the colors of maternity.

If we look in nature it's well known that the pregnant female or mother guarding her young can be the most ferocious and dangerous animal to confront. The difference between a girl and a woman is not discussed too much in the manosphere, but it's an important consideration to take into account, especially if you plan on going the distance with a girl. Once she has a baby, a large part of the lovely, lively, sexy, free-thinking female is gone. Enter the serious, agitated, single minded, defensive mother.

Add to that all manner of body issues that spring up after squeezing out an 8-pound spawn, combined with hormonal swings, weight gain, sleepless nights feeding the little one, a lower sex drive (making it harder for you to tame her with your magic wand), doctors and nurses spreading her cunt wide open, more ~~invasions~~ interaction from family who want to see their grandchild, plus a bunch of new ~~feminist influences~~ mommy friends outside her usual social circle.

The list of pitfalls is endless and assumes that you are top of your game, financially and mentally sound, have zero anger management issues, no health problems of your own, enjoy your profession, and have previously enjoyed a stable relationship with her before planning to have a child. I expect you are already laughing and I'd agree. Because no situation is ever this perfect, you need to go into it expecting to take a few punches. Muhammad Ali used to allow his opponent to knock him around at the beginning of the bout. Unless you are thinking with that attitude—good luck.

This is no easy endeavor. It's also quite solitary. While she's pregnant you share some great time together, she's all mellow and glowing, and provided there are no medical issues, she's usually pretty horny. Then the baby arrives and your pole position is lost. You're bumped to #2 on her priority list forever, and if there is a mother in-law, sister, etc., you will soon find yourself further down the list. Feeling like the hired help in your own home is no fun. It all sounds like a nightmare, but there are however some excellent experiences to be had from all this. It's all in the attitude. The wimps can huff and puff at my above list of pitfalls, but there are solutions.

1. Beat A Hasty Retreat

I love working from home. I'll have breakfast at 11 and lunch at 4pm. Work until 3-4am. I don't live a buttoned-down schedule which makes a standard family home a living hell for me. Even if you are a morning person, though, coming home to baby Armageddon can really take its toll. If your work is demanding, the weekend is an important time to recharge, so at the very least you'll have to feign some nights away "on business." Check into a hotel and get some extra sleep for starters. Go on a long weekend trip with a buddy. Sign up for a training course at nights or weekends. Better yet, keep your family budget tight, reign her in on expensive baby crap, and use the spare cash to rent a small place of your own on the other side of town.

Basically if you don't cut out your own niche, she will lean on you, fail to provide you with much of a support system, and clip your wings as a real man. What's more is that a breastfeeding mother with an infant to take care of is highly unlikely to cheat, so this is really the time when you can spread your wings with little risk. Once there is a wife and kids in the home it's not really your pad, especially if it's a relatively small apartment.

At the same time she's going to need some help with the baby, and this is where you smile like a Clooney and open your door to her sister, mother, your mother, your sister or pretty much any other bitch you can rope into baby duties. Pay them if you have to. You value yourself as a man and you value your professional time (and the relaxation that allows you to function). Paying minimum wage for someone to clean up baby poop is absolutely vital.

2. Be A Hands-On Motherfucker

Now that you have your control center established, you have to start thinking like a guerrilla commando. Every trip to the baby momma's place is a hit and run affair. Excuses to leave need to be well prepared and stated in advance, your demeanor must be excellent, and you have a clear agenda on arrival: present yourself as the perfect loving father and husband, show clearly and absolutely that it's YOUR home and she is still there as your guest, throw a little spare cash around if you can afford it, and then leave. You might stay the night, but be warned especially in the first 6-12 months, babies (much like myself) are not fond of sleeping at night, and (unlike myself) cockblock better than 10 chubby lesbians at the gay mardi gras. If you have a demanding work schedule, get the fuck out of there.

The point here is to get the best of being an absentee father, whilst also being present. You are providing financial and emotional support and hopefully a good hard cock to unwind the stressed mommy, but not getting involved in baby logistics. There is nothing in this world that will ruin a relationship faster than a grumpy, bad mood at 4am when the baby has just barfed all over the bed and you have a 9am monthly sales meeting. You are not a male penguin and you do not have to freeze your bollocks off guarding a fucking egg.

In days gone by, men didn't get involved with children until kids were old enough to wipe their own ass. You think gender equality is bad in the work place, just wait until you walk in the front door of your own home two months after she's given birth. The only way around it is to establish impregnable, military-style boundaries. If you have the most comfortable, mellow job, two blocks from your own home, or like me you work half the night AT home, you will have to make shit up.

3. Plan Some Treats

It’s your kid and your baby momma. THEY CAN NEVER BE REPLACED and neither can those precious years when the kid is so cute and fun and she’s all in love with you. Soon her tits will be touching her knees and your lovely child will be calling you an old fart. The temptation is to hide out, especially with her constant needy, panicky phone calls and demanding, cross examining attitudes. You have to reassure her you are there for her while putting her in her place. It’s a lot easier said than done. Remember she is a mother now, this is not the innocent girl you used to know. For the first 10-12 years of your life you were programmed to obey the mother figure.

As you get used to the new dynamics you can increase your guerilla attacks. The hit-and-run can last the entire weekend when you are mentally prepared to survive a little baby and mommy stress. You have to discipline yourself to do this, or you let it drift away until you are separated. You can’t have it both ways. Time investment is needed and it can be very fulfilling, but only when correctly engineered.

The final hint to getting out of baby duties (which frankly is best for both you and her) is to be that inept buffoon that doesn’t know what he’s doing. Nothing brings the baby momma running faster than some clumsy oaf of a father. No shame in playing that role when it suits. She will soon give up even asking. “Men are useless”—use the enemy’s ideology to your advantage.

4. Give It Time

As she settles down and the children grow this is when you MUST be around more to bond with them. From about 18 months, they start to identify with their father. The next couple of years are vital. By the time they are 4-5, if you have done a good job, it will be impossible for her to leave you because they will make it clear to her on a daily basis that they absolutely adore you. They associate her with discipline, mini panics, hamster mind, and daily grind, whereas you are the cool mysterious dad, the door to the unknown world that lies beyond home. In time they will need you more than they need her, and thus your children are now your best tool in keeping her in line.

Read Next: 4 Reasons Having Kids Make Men More Masculine

Why Is The Zoe Quinn Scandal Blacked Out Across The Internet?

August 26, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Our own Billy Chubbs recently penned a masterpiece on the Zoe Quinn scandal—if you haven't read it, do so. It laid out the details of the ordeal in painstaking detail, and provided a much-needed commentary on this hotbutton issue in the gaming community. Just on a lark, I wanted to do a Google search on Saturday for how high the page was ranking, and…

Nothing.

Any trace of this stuff appears to have been scrubbed off the internet. You may remember past pieces where Return Of Kings has called out examples of hypocrisy in similar scandals, and all of these are quite available with a cursory search. However, up until Sunday, you couldn't even find our post on Google, even though it was published nearly a week prior. Why is this? It now appears, but you'll be hard-pressed to read any information about it anywhere besides manosphere sources.

The Gag Order

> "To learn who rules over you, simply find out who you are not allowed to criticize" – Voltaire

Keoni Galt mentioned in a post on the RooshV Forum that 4chan's servers were taken over by the Department of Justice a couple of years ago under the auspices of using their /b/ board as a sting operation against purported child pornographers. While this action may have its merits (I'll leave it to you to decide), this hush-hushed control of a corner of the internet has wide-reaching implications. As Edward Snowden showed us, when government takes power, they are not going to voluntarily abridge their use of it to maintain rights of individuals, but rather use it to further their own ends.

The deeper you dig, the farther it seems to go. It's more than some nerd scrubbing search results because he's got a crush on Quinn, or a slight anti-smear campaign that we are used to seeing from social justice warriors whenever a woman does something objectionable. What we are observing amounts to a concerted gag order across the internet.

Reddit users have been shadow banned for even mentioning her name or starting threads on the subject. Traces of the scandal were proactively deleted from 4chan. Considering this wide-scale blackout on a seemingly minor issue, we are obviously forced to ask about the motivations of those who control the discourse.

Maintaining the status quo

> "If there was hope, it must lie in the proles" – Winston Smith in George Orwell's 1984

Why would anybody with any sort of social, governmental, or technological power care whether a used-up looking female game designer slept with a few guys to further her career? After all, these sorts of transactional exchanges happens every day in the corporate world, don't they?

The difference in this situation is the visibility and the population that is being affected. We here at ROK spread what we see as universal truths about sex differences, game, economics, politics, and culture, but we only a small minority of men will ever entertain even part of this message. Any sort of true cultural change can only happen when ideas reaches the masses.

Male video gamers make up an enormous segment of the population, and with the growing chasm between the haves and the have-nots in the sexual marketplace and the de-emphasizing of traditional masculinity, their ranks are growing every day. Many of the game-playing herbivores are largely, as this scandal shows, starved for female attention. Many in the scene checked out of the sexual marketplace long ago to embrace the gaming counterculture, and their understanding of sexual and social dynamics befits that lack of experience.

This precisely is why Zoe Quinn's actions are so damaging—she would be the perfect useful idiot for anyone desiring to make legions of low-testosterone males question everything they are fed from birth about the nature of women and humanity in general. Her well-documented actions (at least prior to the gag order) show that women are no exception to the idea that all humans can be vile, opportunistic, and self-serving given the right motivations. That women are not the helpless damsels-in-distress snowflakes that need white knighting, special treatment, and "protected group" status. And that social justice warriors, for all of their self-righteous bluster, are perhaps even more full-of-shit than the rest of us when their actions go under the microscope.

If the ideas about women of a massive segment of the tax-paying, law-abiding, food-pyramid-believing male population are all influenced by the media-driven narrative, what happens when that narrative breaks down? If that group were to question the social order and their role in the machine, it would be very, very dangerous to whatever powers that be. If these men “Go Galt,” who will be left to pay taxes supporting make-work jobs and ever-creeping governmental initiatives, marry aging feminists, and turn the cranks of society for little reward other than sitting down to their gaming console for a couple hours a night?

Voltaire’s quotation above is so applicable because it provides a framework to assess any power structure. Of course, it’s not the Social Justice Warriors who are the ultimate rulers of our society, but they are the proximate enforcers of orthodoxy, the pigs in the Orwellian scheme. Just as the Thought Police made any dissension illegal, no matter how minor, the SJW types have been empowered to ruin people’s livelihood and stamp out any crimethink in the name of “protection” of their false victim class.

One of the first steps in any good totalitarian regime is to change laws so that nearly anything is a crime. We are thus far supposedly absent significant governmental intervention to this end, but SJW propaganda has essentially reduced simply being a straight, “cis-gendered” male to a crime. It is no coincidence that this is precisely the group most likely to hold conservative beliefs, raise rational discourse about the direction of society, and eventually opt out of a society that no longer fills their needs. In this way, social justice warriors do the bidding of the existing power structure.

If the eyes of enough men are opened to this hypocrisy, they will no longer be complicit in the pyramid scheme. Remove their incentive, and there will be hell to pay. The forces that shape our society know this, and thus no such realization will be allowed to reach the critical mass needed for a paradigm shift.

At ROK, we will continue to dispense truth amidst the pretty lies that inevitably serve whoever is maintaining the status quo. If this is “tin foil hat”-y, then so be it. We can only look on as these curious “coincidences” that happen around us under the guise of “protection” and comment when we see fit. Just don’t necessarily expect to find it on a Google Search.

Read More: How Zoe Quinn Screwed Her Way Through The Video Game Industry

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

The Difference Between A Woman's Behavior And Her Intent

August 27, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

In any discussion of power structures, the most important thing to consider is not the intent of the person or body involved, but rather the impact that their actions have on you or your peer group.

The manosphere presents a number of arguments critical of female behavior. That it is able to do so is in a large part due to the unique position in which we find ourselves vis a vis technology. The internet has made it possible, for the first time ever, for men to compare notes and to record their common experiences with the opposite sex from a position of relative anonymity. This meta-discussion is ongoing, its still-tentative conclusions spread across many, many fine (and not so fine) blog posts, analyses and books. But I think it fair to say that a central tenet of so-called "red pill" thinking is what many commentators refer to as women's "alpha-fux, beta bux" mating strategy.

This term refers to women's tendency to select men who demonstrate attractive "alpha" characteristics for quick, short term sex (and impregnation); and "beta" types for long-term provisioning and child-rearing (often, unknowingly, of the alpha's kid). This, coupled with Rollo's excellent analysis of women's first stellar and then declining sexual market value as they pass through their party years (18-23) to the wall and beyond, and the personas that they frequently adopt within each phase (i.e cock carousel rider, marriage-and-kids enthusiast, adulteress, crazy cat woman etc.) seems to me to be at the heart of men's shared observations.

It's depressing stuff, and I suspect that a great many men (myself included) would rather not believe it, or would rather cling to the notion that NAWALT (not all women are like that). Unfortunately, the reason that manosphere sites have gained traction in the last few years is that they enable men to see how closely their own experiences align with those of others, leading them to conclude that, regrettably, most women are indeed "like that"—or at least have the propensity to be so.

I recently read a critique of the manosphere on a feminist blog that took issue with this model of female behaviour. The writer's argument went something like this:

> What world are these people living in? Everyone makes mistakes when they are young and still learning. I don't know any woman who sets out to fuck sexy alphas when she's in her twenties, then snag a boring guy for marriage, have kids with him, and milk him for alimony and child support after she's cuckolded him. We all muddle through life, making mistakes as we learn and grow. The manosphere is a paranoid conspiracy theory.

Funnily enough, I don't entirely disagree with this. In my non-manosphere existence, I am a brother to three sisters, and I am friendly with many women at work and through my social circle. I also don't personally know any women who set out to ruin men's lives by acting as described above (although I am aware that such callous gold-diggers do indeed exist). The women that I know are in the main pleasant people who, if questioned, would express their admiration for male "beta" traits such as kindness, generosity, respect, and ability to provide for a family.

It doesn't mean they behave in accordance with this, though.

Some commentators on manosphere sites believe that feminism is a power structure constructed with the specific intention of subjugating men and ruining their lives by extracting resources from them through unfair divorce and childcare laws. Personally, I don't buy that. I think feminism has evolved due to any number of complex political and societal shifts over the last hundred years or so, and to ascribe the current situation to a conspiracy against men is an oversimplification and wrongheaded. But in the end, does it really matter?

This is where the difference between intent and impact comes in. Whatever the meta intent of those behind feminism may or may not be, the impact of it on me remains the same: if I display beta characteristics and get married, then there's a good chance I'll get screwed over down the line. Alternatively, if I act like a jerk in a Vegas nightclub, then there's a good chance I'll get laid.

I can think of two women I know right now, both in their late twenties or early thirties. One has just married her long-term boyfriend; the other will marry hers in a few weeks time. Both are, on the surface, intelligent, pleasant enough, caring women. Both have also cheated on their partners several times on drunken nights out with colleagues. They are following the manospheric model outlined above precisely—i.e. marrying a provider-type just as their SMV passes its peak and the wall beckons. Both have had no compunction in cuckolding their fiancées with fun, alpha-type guys, and I would say it is not unlikely that this will continue even after a ring has been put on it.

The funny thing is, though, if you asked either of these women for their thoughts on red pill thinking, I have no doubt that they would vehemently refute it. There are two reasons for this: first, women are generally solipsistic and unable (or unwilling) to admit the similarity between the manosphere model and their own bad behaviour. And second, I don't believe that either woman went into her relationship intending to cheat on her partner: their intentions, I'm sure, were good. But the 'gina tingles proved too much and they did it anyway. The impact on their partners (were they to find out the truth) would be the same as if they had planned it, though.

Just before I finally downed the red pill, I was seeing a girl who also had a boyfriend. I had really lost it over this girl: I wanted her to leave the boyfriend for me. But she wouldn't. We'd meet for sex in the afternoon and then she'd go back to him. It sounds like an ideal arrangement now—back then, it wasn't enough.

Things came to a head and I told her how much she was hurting me. But there was reason after reason as to why she couldn't leave him—they kept coming. "I don't mean to hurt you," she said. "I'm a good person. It's just the way things are at the moment." It was at that point I realized the importance of impact over intent. I wanted to believe her—I wanted to believe that she didn't intend to hurt me. But whether she did or not, it didn't matter—the impact of her behavior was damaging to me. As soon this became clear to me, I walked. I never spoke to her again.

I am no great believer in conspiracy theories—about feminism or anything else. I'm not saying all of them are false—some certainly seem more plausible than others—but in the main I feel that human beings are just too disorganized, selfish and solipsistic to effectively (and secretly!) run the sorts of complex structures that some theorists describe. This is just a personal view and many will disagree with me. But regardless, as individuals there is very little we can do about meta power structures anyway.

I'm not saying you should bury your head in the sand—just ask yourself honestly what you can influence and what you can't. If a girl cheats on you, then the chances are she is not acting as an agent of a feminist conspiracy to destabilize men—she is just acting in accord with her 'gina tingles. She may not intend to hurt you through her behavior, but the impact of it is the same as if she did, so treat her accordingly. Delete her number and cut her out of your life.

Men can rail against feminism and smartphones and hook-up culture all day long on internet message boards, but the genie ain't going back in the bottle. The modern world is what it is and you should put your own interests first. Don't waste time thinking about the intentions of those whose actions affect you—e.g. women, employers, governments; they are largely irrelevant. Instead, think about how these actions impact you and what you can do about it.

If you're unhappy with your girlfriend, then dump her, learn game and find another one. If you don't like the way your company has been restructured then start your own business and leave. If you don't like the state of the nation then emigrate to a foreign country where there is a better way of life. The fantastic thing about the manosphere is that it is filled with positive, actionable advice to do all of these things. You are better off concentrating on those things you can control, rather than those things you can't.

Read More: Learn How To Think Instead Of Believing Lies And Conspiracy Theories

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Why Married Women Are Pretending To Be Single On Facebook

August 27, 2014 | by Brian Logan | Link | Original Link

Several months ago, I wrote about Facebook's change to the "relationship status" option. I pointed out that many single women, the "strong and independent" types, were no longer advertising that they were single. Instead, they were choosing a mysterious "ask" button. These girls went from "I'm strong and independent" to "It's none of your business" overnight.

Well, not to be outdone, married women are now getting in on the action. They're starting to hide their relationship status as well. Some are using the "ask" option. Others are providing no information at all. Either way, you no longer see the "married" status on many of their profile pages.

Don't believe me? Check for yourself. I've counted at least five married women I know who did this. In some cases, the women were only recently married. I bet my readers can find a few as well.

So why does a married woman hide her relationship status? A rhetorical question, I know. And the red pill readers already have an answer, but let me spill the beans for the men who are still living in a blue pill fantasyland.

Your wife is shopping for alpha cock. She's planting the seeds for a future divorce or infidelity—and she's using Facebook to find her partner in crime.

My observation here is ironclad. You might as well take it to the bank and cash the check—the money is good. If you're a married man, and this is happening to you, then let me speak to you for a moment. I'm here to help. Let me predict what your wife is saying, or planning to say, about her relationship status on Facebook.

1. I'm worried about privacy issues

She tells you that she's concerned about privacy issues. Consider this a pre-emptive strike on her part. It's a clever move, because you're forced to agree. After all, she has a point! There are privacy issues on Facebook!

But if she's worried about privacy, then why is she still posting pictures of her dog Skippy? And why does she still have two photos of her new Jeep? And why does she display what city she lives in, and what high school she went to?

It's simple. She's keeping the information hidden so that she can find a replacement. Remember, she was able to find the "in a relationship" button when you first started dating. If she found that, she can find the "married" button.

If you're recently married, and she's already hiding her status, then it's a bad sign. She's organizing the troops for the upcoming invasion. When she makes her final move, she'll have your child, half your paycheck, and a boyfriend in waiting. She already took Poland. Next, she marches on Russia.

2. I'm tired of all the Facebook drama

She tells you that she is tired of the drama on Facebook. Another pre-emptive strike. Again, you have no other choice but to agree. There is a lot of pointless drama on Facebook! You're so glad that she noticed.

By criticizing the drama, she's casting herself as a serious woman. She doesn't have time to deal with trifling affairs. She doesn't have time to upload dinner photos or feel-good memes! She's too busy working on serious matters, like a Gaza peace treaty or an Ebola vaccine.

Actually, she loves the drama—the drama that comes from another man's sausage in her love canal. If anything, your safe and protective arms are not providing her with enough drama. She'll be getting that later from Ed the biker, who likes to spank her ass and pull her hair in the back of his El Camino while you're busy working a double shift.

3. I'm an independent woman and I need my own identity

She tells you that she's an independent woman who needs her own identity. Be ready for this one. It's the "women's freedom" excuse. This works if you've been indoctrinated in the lingo of second wave feminism.

This alibi is wrought with accusations. You wouldn't want to impose on her freedom, would you? Are you one of those brutish apes, like the knuckle-dragging Ward Cleaver? What kind of patriarchal Mussolini would force his presence onto her personal page? Are you a member of the Taliban or something?

Some guys will seek a retaliation at this point. They'll remove their "married" status as well. That ought to show her! Fight fire with fire!

Here's the problem—she doesn't care if you hide your relationship status. You're a beta male to her, a provider. She doesn't believe that you're alpha enough to pull something better. So go ahead and change your status—she doesn't care. As long as she gets a list of men to replace you, then it's mission accomplished.

Summary

Facebook has a lot of critics. Yet for all its flaws, it's still the favored place for attention-whoring women. It's still the best place to amass a stable of beta orbiters and potential alpha suitors.

I'm sorry if this describes your life. You put your foot in a bucket of shit. Don't worry though—everybody makes mistakes. If you haven't impregnated her, there is still hope. You might be able to cut your losses.

Either way, I suggest that you call her out immediately. Let her know about everything I just wrote. See how she reacts. It probably won't save things, but it's an opportunity to establish your alpha frame—to show that you won't be her disposable dish rag. If it doesn't work, well then count your losses and hope that the final blow isn't an extreme one.

Remember this: If she's unwilling to let the world know that she's married to you, then you married the wrong woman.

Read More: Facebook's Newest Change Shows That Older Women Are Getting Desperate

Brian Logan

Brian Logan is a writer that spends more than half of the year traveling abroad. He believes in self-improvement via hard work, reason, and creativity. And oh yeah, he has a thing for hot Latinas that know how to cook.

A Prenuptial Agreement Is No Option For Red Pill Men

August 28, 2014 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

Urban Dictionary: "Prenup"

> A legal document signed before marriage to level the playing so that the dominant bread winner (preferably the male) will not have to worry about his wife strangling him by the balls during a messy divorce.
>
> It assures that at the most, she'll retain the kids, but will not gain any financial liability in the assets of the man that was made either before or during the marriage.
>
> Since 50% of all women have a hidden agenda of gaining financial stability and a sexual dynamo in a spouse…it regulates that YOU DON'T GET SHIT if we split!!!!!!

As an enlightened and intelligent red pill man, you accept the fact that relationships fall apart all the time in the 21st century. People just can't seem to make marriages last much longer than half a decade, if even for that long. Our "forever girl" loves us one week, and suddenly decides she doesn't the next. She then takes half of everything you've worked so hard for along with her. Such is the selfish and hypergamic cruelty of women.

This article will address why you should always be prepared for the worst, and never contemplate marriage without a prenuptial agreement. It will also address why you should consider some alternatives to marriage in general, so just keep on reading.

Mastering Your Prenup Ordeal

Take the "Help!" prenup guidelines for females and flip them in your favor

The following video is almost unbearable to sit through from beginning to end, even though it can be inadvertently hilarious at times. It's a promo video for an actual book which was first published in 2007, by Dr. Lona Smith.

Nearly universally despised on Youtube (check the like-dislike ratio!), the airhead psychologist is trying to help women gain the upper hand in prenuptial agreements. You know it's funny, she likes to talk about the "relationship" side of things, but all we're hearing is "me me me."

So take this male-shanking advice and do a full 180!

1.Fight Fair: Make sure your spouse gets as little of your family inheritance and personal wealth as possible in the event of a no-fault divorce. Preferably none. Give yourself a high five if she signs away the fact she won't get a dime.

2. Negotiate Terms That Make Sense For You: EVERYTHING. You're the man. You're in charge. You know what you want, and you should make damn sure you can get it.

3. "Deal With All Your Emotions While Completing Your Prenup": Hahahahaha! C'mon, you're men. This shouldn't be a problem for you in the slightest.

4. Develop a deeper, stronger, and more secure relationship: Yeah, more secure for yourself.

Before long, she will be exchanging those two magical words with you. "I DO" (realize that if I divorce this man for petty and selfish reasons like "we're growing apart" or because I'm "unhaaaapy," I'm either getting nothing or I'm totally screwed. I must actually try and abide by the sacred vows of loving and caring for my husband, in sickness and in health, till death do us part. If the vast majority of women over the course of history have been able to accept this fact, before this "feminism" scourge came along 50 years ago and started destroying families all over the western world, then maybe I can too).

Her Inevitable Shit Test Questions – Recognize And Neutralize

Your bride-to-be will try to guilt trip you into calling off the prenuptial agreement by using one of these tried-and-true emotional blackmail tactics. Pull up your big boy pants and ignore, ignore, ignore. She's gonna sign it, or you're gonna dump her. That's all there is to it.

- If I divorce you? But honey, why would I ever do such a thing?
- Oh honey you know I love you. Why would I do that?
- That's preposterous honey! You know we agree "til death do us part"?

My Two Cents

> Most of us, at one time or another, have contemplated getting married. The wisest amongst us have declined to do so for good reason. That's the topic of this video. Why marriage is bad for men.
>
> First let's get down to basics. Why does marriage even exist? It exists as a social convention to take advantage of an important biological quirk of manhood. That > biological quirk is deep sexual attraction or infatuation with a particular female.

>
> It goes like this. When men are deeply attracted to a woman, our primal instincts prompt us to want to possess this object of our affections. The trouble arises when this attraction, which is nothing more than a biochemical reaction in our brains, clouds our better judgment and moves us to make a lifelong, or long-term decision, based on this short-term attraction."
>
> – Contrarian Expatriate

That is absolutely timeless wisdom which came from the preceding video. Quite frankly my manosphere amigos, the best piece of advice I can give you is to simply not get married at all. Marriage in this day and age is a completely raw deal for men.

We benefit in absolutely no way, shape, or form from this institution. All of the benefits that marriage has been said to provide a man, have been found out to be obtainable without formal recognition from the state, the courts, or any other societal ritual which is supposed to make your relationship "legitimized" in the eyes of others.

Just living together with your partner, in an honest and fully-committed relationship, is damn near the same thing as marriage. It's all the sex-on-tap (in theory), emotional support, companionship, and (hopefully) equal splitting of household expenditures that a formalized marriage provides.

Most importantly, if your partner wants to call it quits, she doesn't get the pleasure of squandering half of your hard-earned financial assets through the female-friendly divorce court system. You know, just because she decided that "things aren't working out" or that she's suddenly become "unhaaaappy" over the past few months. Oh, and you don't have to go through the stigma and embarrassment of being a divorcee, and all the gut-wrenching paperwork that has to go with it.

The only major exception I can think of where marriage does have a distinct advantage over a de-facto relationship is for a spousal visa. I don't blame you for a second if you prefer having an attractive and feminine Brazilian, Colombian, Russian, or Ukrainian wife over a feminist landwhale from the core English-speaking countries. Still, make sure she signs those papers!!

Conclusion

At the end of the day, it's your life and I'm not your papa. Marriage may or may not be right for you depending on your cultural upbringing, personal preferences, or the nationality of your significant other. But please, whatever relationship path you choose to follow, I beseech that you don't allow your women any viable option to walk out on you like bandits. That means not ever …ever… allowing them to have a conversation like this one after the relationship has been terminated.

Prenups. They are not just a good idea, they should be part of red pill law.

Read More: Rammstein Is Germany's First Red Pill Band

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

Why Men’s Fiction Is Suffering From A Great Decline

August 28, 2014 | by Bryan Paul Rouleau | Link | Original Link

It is estimated that men account for only 20% of the fiction-reading market. In other words, women almost completely dominate the fiction-reading market. They buy and read the most books by a large majority. If it were a presidential election, it would be called a landslide.

In the article linked above, the British author Ian McEwan conducted an experiment where he opted to give away free books to lunchtime crowds in a London park. He gave away thirty books, the vast majority of which were claimed by women. The men reacted to his offer negatively, often frowning, “in suspicion, or distaste.”

Look at this list of Barnes and Noble 2014 Best Sellers. On the first page, 16 of the 20 top books, judging simply by cover design, appear to be targeting a female audience. The books that are clearly targeting males? Game of Thrones and the new Stephen King book; both of which have such a popularity as to attract both male and female attention equally. Setting those two aside, men are given a book about the New York Yankees closer Mariano Rivera and a Rush Limbaugh book about Paul Revere. That is, two non-fiction books.

Dare to venture to page two of the list and you will find a third non-fiction book geared toward men called Capital. I haven’t read it, but the description makes it sounds like a work of Marxist apologia. These are a man’s choices: he can read a history book written by a conservative radio entertainer, a treatise on neo-Marxist philosophy, or a book about a baseball pitcher. Or, he can check out some old classics of fiction that were “red pill” before “red pill” needed to exist.

The last time I saw fiction discussed on ROK, one of the highest-rated comments was disparaging toward the prospect of men reading fiction. The comment claimed, essentially, that it is not worth a man’s time to read fake stories while he is being lied to daily by the media. The funny thing about fiction, though, is that it is often more reflective of reality and more revealing than the modernist re-workings of so-called non-fiction that men seem to find more valuable.

Here are three books I've read within the last year that could not be published today—or at least not without considerable backlash and cries of misogyny and so forth:

1. The Sun Also Rises by Ernest Hemingway (1926)

The Sun Also Rises by Ernest Hemingway is a story about an American expat living and writing in Paris. He spends his days roving through its restaurants and cafes, meeting up with his circle of male friends, and entertaining a flaky but attractive divorcée named Brett Ashley who inevitably becomes the center of male attention. To varying degrees of desperation, the men try to seduce Brett Ashley. They take her on trips into the mountains. They flatter her with wine and trip over each other catering to her wishes. For a while we are convinced that these men are not jealous of each other's aspirations with Brett Ashley because they hide it so well.

By the end of the novel, after friendships are destroyed and blood has been spilled over her, we come to grips with an immutable reality; a woman can sow seeds jealousy and anger among the men who have fallen into her orbit, and the man who finally wins Brett Ashley's admiration was a man full of quiet ambition, who was focused on himself and his own aspirations, and who never paid much attention to the woman's whims.

> Dancing, I looked over Brett's shoulder and saw Cohn, standing at the bar, still watching her.
>
> "You've made a new one there," I said to her.

> “Don’t talk about it. Poor chap. I never knew it till just now.”
>
> “Oh, well,” I said. “I suppose you like to add them up.”
>
> “Don’t talk like a fool.”
>
> “You do.”

2. The Big Sleep by Raymond Chandler (1939)

The Big Sleep is the 1939 debut mystery novel by Raymond Chandler, who would come to be hailed as the father of American noir fiction. The story follows Philip Marlowe, a private investigator who has been hired by an old and dying oil tycoon to keep an eye on his two wild and alluring daughters. Marlowe works long hours, gets little sleep, and runs afoul of some shady characters.

The mystery story is not perfectly contrived, but Philip Marlowe is; he is an ideal. His attitude, demeanor, sense of honor, and self-control allow him to manipulate just about every situation in which he finds himself. What would the average man do if he found the beautiful daughter of his client in his bed, naked, uninvited?

> “I bet you can’t even guess how I got in.”
>
> I dug a cigarette out and looked at her with bleak eyes. “I bet I can. You came through the keyhole, just like Peter Pan.”
>
> “Who’s he?”
>
> “Oh, a fellow I used to know around the poolroom.”
>
> She giggled. “You’re cute, aren’t you?” she said.
>
> …

> I looked at her again. She lay still now, her face pale against the pillow, her eyes large and dark and empty as rain barrels in drought. One of her small five-fingered thumbless hands picked at the cover restlessly. There was a vague glimmer of doubt starting to get born in her somewhere. She didn't know about it yet. It's so hard for women – even nice women – to realize that their bodies are not irresistible.

3. Ham on Rye by Charles Bukowski (1982)

Ham on Rye by Charles Bukowski tells the story of a boy coming of age in depression-era Los Angeles. The book was one of Bukowski's later novels, but chronologically comes first in his "Henry Chinaski" series, and is followed by Factotum, Post Office, Women, and Hollywood. Chinaski, the main character and narrator, tells a story that couldn't be told in hyper-sensitive company today. He talks about the girls he wanted to sleep with (all of them), the fist fights he won (a couple), the fights he lost (many more), the jobs he tried to hold, the friends he tried to lose, the aimlessness and the lack of purpose in his life.

He talks about race. He talks about the arrogance of literature. He sympathizes with Nazis because his teachers are all communists. All of it is performed in the simple and hilarious tone of a shiftless misanthrope:

> My father liked the slogan, "Early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy and wise."
>
> But it hadn't done any of that for him. I decided that I might try to reverse the process.
>
> I couldn't sleep.
>
> Maybe if I masturbated to Miss Meadows?
>
> Too cheap.
>
> I wallowed there in the dark, waiting for something.

With the general acquiescence of men in most spheres of influence, the fiction market has been conquered by women to such an extent that it, in the minds of men, is synonymous with “feminist-friendly-fantasy-story.” All the ass-kicking heroes are women (Katniss, Tris, Clary). They have men by their sides as accessories, but little more.All the empathy is reserved for female characters (Hazel, Hetty and Sarah). Men are there to either oppress them, or at best marginally assist them the way a booster chair helps a baby eat, but never to outshine or outstrip them in any way.

Men, if they wanted to read fiction today, would be relegated to the Science Fiction aisle, but even that is increasingly shoddy and subject to confused modernist thought. So we stick to simple books about retired baseball pitchers.

Who is to blame? We are. Not only did our male ancestors read more fiction, but they wrote more fiction, too. Take a look at Modern Library’s top 100 novels and tell me what you notice about the top 14 authors on that list.

Fiction has the power to illuminate truths in ways that even non-fiction cannot. We identify fiction as great when we recognize that it is in alignment with human nature. When characters in stories do not behave the way we would expect them to behave in real life, we (men) become suspicious. The book may still sell, and it may even entertain us in some superficial ways, but it won’t be a classic. It won’t make you nod along the way you do when someone else identifies something you thought was your own exclusive truth. It won’t leave you remembering it and looking forward to re-reading it.

It is time for men to start appreciating fiction. Once men can appreciate great fiction, they can again begin to produce it. It is up to us to remove the toilet paper that is stocked on most Barnes and Noble shelves and replace one more jewel in the broken and tarnished crown that is modern masculinity.

Read More: On The Importance Of Fiction Writing

Bryan Paul Rouleau
Bryan is a fiction writer from New England. He can be found at bryanpaulrouleau.com or on Twitter

11 Reasons Men Should Use Bitcoin

August 29, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Though the internet has allowed artists to connect directly to their audience in ways never before seen, its freedom is under attack. Censorship is common, and the media routinely blacks out important stories or blatantly lies about others. Men's sites in particular are the target of defamation, and are routinely harassed under accusations of misogyny and hate speech. Since financial independence is one of the greatest enablers for dissenting voices, and many men make their living online, it's worth asking—is our money safe?

Social justice warriors routinely harass men's writers by having their Facebook pages pulled, reporting their Twitter accounts, getting their books pulled from amazon, getting their kickstarters removed, threatening to take down their patron pages, doxxing male writers, threatening to take down their WordPress sites, branding men's sites as hate groups, and threatening physical and sexual violence.

Paypal, the most common payment system used online, has refused to take donations for Wikileaks, an independent journalist organization that has published more government documents than the New York Times has in the last fifty years. How long will it be before social justice warriors and other online bullies infiltrate financial institutions and threaten to freeze men's bank accounts through false accusations? What can men do to ensure their livelihoods are not threatened?

Enter bitcoin

You've probably read a great deal about Bitcoin as an investment, and while Bitcoin has been massively profitable over the past couple years as a financial investment, that isn't going to be the focus of my article. Rather, I'm looking at bitcoin as a payment mechanism, that allows content creators to receive money from their audience directly, and safeguard that money without intermediaries or banks.

Here are a 11 reasons for men to start using Bitcoin:

1. No middle man. Bitcoin removes the middle men of banks and Paypal. The same way the internet has allowed artists to connect with their audience directly, Bitcoin allows artists to get paid by their audience directly. It is the last step in liberating media from mainstream powerholders.

2. No transaction fees. With no middle man comes no bank fees, no cut for Amazon or iTunes, and no 3rd parties taking your profits and hard-earned money.

3. Micro-payments are easy. Want to charge 23 cents for a blog post? With Bitcoin you can. Since there are no transaction fees, Bitcoins make micro-payments easy, allowing you to monetize content you'd previously have to give away for free, overcharge for, or wait till you had more to sell. Now that short film, 20-page ebook, or short comic you've put together can be sold at a price that makes economic sense.

4. No bank corruption. The financial crash has shown that the American financial system is not worthy of men's trust. Using Bitcoin allows you to opt out of that corrupt system and "go your own way," the same way men have opted out of other corrupt institutions. Vote with your wallet. Using Bitcoin doesn't just withdraw your support from the banks, but from the federal reserve and the entire corrupt American financial enterprise.

5. It's antifragile. If your assets are entirely in USD or American banks, you run the risk that American politics or currency devaluation will destroy your portfolio. Bitcoin allows you to diversify your currency and ensure that even if the American government destroys its economy, you still have another account of value.

6. It's easy to use. Bitcoin is incredibly easy to use. I've put together a short guide to the basics on my site, and there are tons of other good resources across the web. If you've got an online store, services like bitpay will allow your customers to pay Bitcoin very easily.

7. It's international. Bitcoin has no currency or border restrictions. You can send and receive payments from anywhere in the world, and access your wallet from any country you travel to.

8. You can buy anything. Bitcoin has made the news for services using it to sell illegal drugs. It's no secret that there are online Bitcoin sellers distributing products that would normally require a prescription, like modafinil and TRT. While Bitcoin is not an excuse to break the law, and I would caution all readers not to do anything illegal, it does allow you to send payments to merchants who might not have a regular storefront that takes Mastercard and Visa.

9. It's growing. Bitcoin is rapidly becoming a mainstream payment method. Already, major companies like Amazon, Target, WordPress, CVS, Victoria's Secret, and OKCupid accept Bitcoin as payment. It is possible that in several years that Bitcoin will be so common that not accepting Bitcoin as payment will be like only offering a print version of your book.

10. It's close to anonymous. While not entirely anonymous, Bitcoin allows sellers to accept payments under a pseudonym or wallet address, without using their real name. For writers who wish to preserve their anonymity, or maintain a private life, Bitcoin is a godsend.

11. It's yours. Your Facebook, your Twitter, your Paypal, your Amazon account, and most of the online services we use can be shut down if the company hosting them decides that your content is objectionable or undesirable for their users. Bitcoin is yours. Even the fed is still trying to figure out how to handle or regulate bitcoin, and advocates for online freedom are constantly devising new ways to preserve the independence of the currency.

Here are three actions steps you can take if you'd like to get started with Bitcoin.

1. Set up a wallet. Here's how.

2. If you take donations, post your wallet address on your site so your readers can donate Bitcoins. Mine is here.

3. If you sell books or other content online, consider offering Bitcoin as a payment option.

I hope to see all my favorite writers continuing to publish for a long time, and that will require adopting new technologies and ways to make money as they become available. As Roosh said, nerds will rule the world.

Read More: Bitcoin Is Creating A New Class Of Millionaires

Eric Crowley
Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

Did Anita Sarkeesian Fake Death Threats Against Herself?

August 29, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

On Wednsday, August 27, 2014, feminist game critic Anita Sarkessian made the following tweet:

With this screencap attached:

Anita claimed that the above user had tweeted her real home address (blacked out above) with public death threats.

Immediately the gaming press community rallied to her defense, publishing article after article discussing harassment and misogyny in the gaming community. The only problem? The death threats against Anita Sarkeesian are cleary fake, and most likely made by Anita herself.

The Evidence

Let’s look at the screen-cap Anita posted:

This screen-cap was taken 12 seconds after the last of three minutes of tweeting, by a user who was not logged in. There is nothing in the search bar, clearly showing no search was done. Whoever took this had to know this user was making threatening tweets, and enter the exact url of their account at within three minutes of the users first post…

…or make the tweets themselves and then log out and take a screen-cap.

Also, notice anything else odd about these tweets?

Yes, that's right – perfect spelling and punctuation. Does that sound like any angry gamer you know? Plus, these tweets fit exactly under the 140 twitter character limit. Whoever made these planned and typed them out ahead of time. While this still could be the work of a very obsessive stalker, it shows that these tweets were not the work of a rage troll or someone spontaneously going off. This person created a new account just for these tweets rather than ranting from a previous account.

If someone was going to create a false attack on themselves, creating a dummy account would be the obvious way to go. Creating a full online persona would take a long time, and if Anita wanted to ride the publicity of the recent Zoe Quinn story in gaming, and synchronize death threat with the release her latest video release, she wouldn't have time to create fully developed hater.

Anita wants us to believe she just happened to find this account, despite the fact it would be highly unlikely, if not impossible for Anita to have seen these tweets and taken the screencap she took had she not been logged into the account making them only a moment before. The more likely explanation is that Anita made these tweets herself, logged out, and took a screen-cap.

All of the above evidence is based solely on the public information Anita posted. But here at ROK, we have another level of insight – an insight into the psychology of the feminine mind.

Anita's Fake Tweets Reveal Her Twisted Fantasies

Look at the actual content of the threats:

Does this sound like any male hater you know?

Neck biting and blood drinking is a feminine vampire fantasy. This isn't an angry gamer saying "I hate you, you're destroying games." This is a man who wants to overpower her and possess her sexually because he finds her so attractive. Where have I seen this kind of writing before?

In Anita's fantasy, her stalkers are men overpowered by her beauty, who want to dispose of her beta provider and fulfill her darkest rape fantasies. Her stalker vacillates between wanting to "caress and taste" her and threatening to kill her loved ones so he can possess her. This is exactly the kind of bad writing found in the female dominated genre of romance novels, where a dangerous and powerful man can't help but be driven to extreme acts by the intoxicating presence of the heroine.

Anita drops a few threats of actual physical violence to establish the danger of the fantasy she is creating, but quickly goes back to 50 Shades of Grey style sex with tweets like this:

This is classic psychological projection. Anita is sexually attracted to men who are the opposite of what constitutes a good male feminist, so she assumes her haters must feel the same way about her. “They hate me because I’m pretty. These guys are obviously all just mad because they’re not good enough for me.”

Why Would Anita Make A Death Threat Against Herself?

As documentary filmmakers Davis Aurini and Jordan Owen are attempting to expose in their new film The Sarkessian Effect, victimhood is the business model of social justice warriors. By receiving public threats, Anita gets news outlets to write about her, give her free publicity, and help her raise money.

Sarkeesian was previously able to raise over $150,000 for her kickstarter campaign, using publicity generated by harassment. Her wikipedia entry on the kickstarter and harassment states:

> The events [of her harassment] also led to speaking engagements on related topics. In June 2012, video game developer Bungie invited Sarkeesian to its offices to present on the creation of female characters in games.[26] In December 2012, Sarkeesian was a speaker at the TEDxWomen conference, discussing online sexual harassment and the nature of online communities.[27] She has also spoken at Lincoln Land Community College,[28]Western Kentucky University,[29] and Northeastern University.[30][31]

You can bet those speaking engagements weren’t free. That’s that social justice business model: troll a community, claim harassment when they criticize your actions, and turn the publicity into funding and speaking engagements. It worked for Suey Park, whose hashtag campaign against Colbert resulted paid speaking engagements, and Zoe Quinn who turned criticisms of her game Depression Quest into a story about harassment against female developers and got additional publicity for her work. This isn’t a lone con, but a pattern in social justice work.

The Media Doesn’t Report Death Threats Against Men

Compare the way the media handled a single threat against Anita to the way it handles the regular death threats made against ROK and other men’s writers. To my knowledge, no media outlet has ever done a single story on the violent threats made against Return of Kings, whereas a quick google search for “anita sarkeesian death threats” returns 43,300 results.

I believe the mainstream press has not covered the death threats made against men's writers because on some level they believes we deserve death threats, because of the beliefs we hold. Read that again. The mainstream media believes we deserve to have people threaten to kill us, mutilate our genitals, and hurt our families, because we hold different perspectives. This isn't the belief of fringe haters. This is the mainstream media. Keep that in mind the next time you read the news.

Law Enforcement Should Pursue Whoever Made Those Tweets

Personally, I believe no human being deserves to suffer from physical violence or the threat of it. If someone has made a genuine threat against Anita or any public figure, they deserve to suffer the full punishment of the law. That is why I am calling on twitter to release the IP address those tweets were made from and work with law enforcement to arrest whoever is responsible for them.

The statements made in those tweets clearly qualify as a threat of physical violence. If Anita did not make these tweets herself, then it is her duty as a feminist to ensure that whoever did is brought to justice, before he threatens other women or commits and act of physical violence. Police have raided people's houses for more ambiguous statements made on social media.

Of course, if Anita made those tweets herself, the police would raid her. Maybe that's why all she's done is use them for publicity.

Read More: Why Is The Zoe Quinn Scandal Blacked Out Across The Internet?

Eric Crowley
Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

The HPV Vaccination Is Necessary Because Of Promiscuous Women

August 30, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

The Human papillomavirus (HPV) is a DNA virus from the papillomavirus family that is capable of infecting humans, and has the dubious distinction of producing the most common STD that a person could possibly be infected with, worldwide. More than 80% of American women will have contracted at least one strain of HPV by age fifty.

Most HPV infections are sub-clinical (asymptomatic), however, in some people these infections will become clinical and may cause benign papillomas (such as warts or squamous cell papilloma), or cancers of the anogenital region and oropharynx, genital warts, an increased risk of cardiovascular disease, and a unique type of oropharyngeal (throat) cancer caused by HPV 16 and 18 infections. Typically, 70% of clinical HPV infections, in young men and women, may regress to asymptomatic in one year and ninety percent in two years. However, when the sub-clinical infection persists, there is a risk of precancerous conditions which could lead to worse outcomes.

In recent times, actor Michael Douglas had a successful battle against throat cancer (later revealed to be tongue cancer), but the presence of HPV came into the public view even more than before. So did the case of Farah Fawcett. Since HPV is the most common STD infection, HPV vaccination has gradually been introduced to combat it.

The HPV vaccine prevents infection with certain strain associated with the development of cervical cancer, genital warts, and other cancers. Two HPV vaccines are currently on the market: Gardasil and Cervarix. They however, do not protect against neoplasia or cancer in individuals who are already infected with HPV.

HPV Vaccination in the modern world

Gardasil has been shown to prevent potential precursors to anal, vulvar, vaginal, and penile cancers. Though it does not treat existing infection, vaccination is still recommended for HPV positive individuals, as it may protect against one or more different strains of the disease. The HPV strains that Gardasil protects against are sexually transmitted.

Gardasil is given in three injections over six months. The second injection is two months after the first, and the third injection is six months after the first shot was administered. Gardasil is also effective in males, providing protection against genital warts, anal cancer, and some potentially precancerous lesions. Ongoing studies have demonstrated the efficacy of Gardasil in males who did not have HPV infection prior to vaccination. The vaccination is expected to protect against penile cancer and anal cancer caused by included HPV types, and research in this area is ongoing.

As of now, administration of the vaccine is approved to males between ages 9 and 26 in the US, and in the UK, licensed for males aged 9 to 15 and for females aged 9 to 26. However, there has been some debate on the push of the vaccine by the healthcare industry as well as horrific real life cases from the adverse effects of the vaccination itself.

The twisted question of HPV vaccination

The questions which come to mind are:

- Whom should get it?
- When should one get it?
- Why should one get it? (considering the risks of both not taking it, or even taking it)
- Most important of all (but rarely addressed), why did we need it? Why is HPV infection an epidemic today?

HPV vaccination is targeted more toward women to protect them from the effects of HPV, the rates of which are rising each year. Recently, the age limit for the vaccination for females was raised to 45 in certain parts of North America. The possible reasons could be that because comparatively to women, the population figures of HPV induced cancers for men is lower in number—thus making it less cost-effective for men—and also to protect late starters among females when it comes to sex. Are the population figures of HPV-induced cancers an indication that western women are more promiscuous than men today?

HPV is responsible for about 800 (about 40%) of 1,570 cases of penile cancer diagnosed annually in the United States. About half of men with penile cancer also have genital warts, which are caused by HPV. Its risk factor increases with age, and most after 50 and older. Cancer itself is a horrifying disease, but cancer of the genitalia is one of the worst nightmares a man could have, not only afflicting his life, but also his sexual worth and respect as an individual.

In today's promiscuous times of slutty women (as women control sexual access), HPV vaccination becomes even more debatable for men—for non-promiscuous men who'd have promiscuous partners, the non-promiscuous men who intend to become promiscuous, and both the promiscuous and non-promiscuous men younger than 26 who haven't been yet exposed to HPV.

To illustrate that point, a few excerpts from this article raise valid questions about who should get the vaccine:

> "After a certain age, 26 in the United States, it is assumed most people have had enough sexual partners that they have been exposed to HPV and their bodies have produced the antibodies necessary to defeat it on their own. In the case of women who have been exposed and developed an infection, it is thought that cervical abnormalities will have been detected and dealt with. Vaccinating people after a long sexual history simply isn't worth the cost, from a public health perspective.

> "The vaccine is most useful for young people who are least likely to have been exposed. But by this measure, America is failing. Due to our long history of anti-vaccine hysteria, and some conservative politicians' perennial efforts to politicize anything remotely related to sex, HPV vaccination rates in the United States are terribly low. Only 32 percent of girls ages 13 to 17 have received the full three-shot regimen, which is significantly less than in Canada, Great Britain, and some regions of Mexico (although much of the European Union has similarly dismal rates). Like most health issues in the United States, HPV's worst consequences are unequally distributed, with cervical, anal, and penile cancer rates all higher among lower-income populations who tend to be poorly covered by insurance programs and have less access to health care.
>
> For those who are under 26, getting vaccinated will likely be free. Since it is impossible to know how effective the vaccine may be in your case, it's worth getting—it won't hurt you or your wallet. For those over 26, vaccination can be an expensive decision, but it may well be worth it, particularly if you haven't had many sexual partners or are expecting new ones. But to get > the most bang for our public health buck, America needs to muster the political will to establish HPV vaccination programs for schoolchildren, both boys and girls. We already require vaccination of children against another sexually transmitted infection before they enter school: hepatitis B. HPV vaccination is an easy and safe way to spare kids a lot of pain and fear later in life. "

The points raised here could very well apply to men who could be entering the dating world later in their lives. A virgin in his late 20s, or a 30+ divorced man who's coming from a marriage with one or two partners before (assuming that his wife also had a lower partner count before marriage) has a negligible exposure to HPV, so a HPV vaccination could be protect him for at least 10 years or so.

Assuming that every person has a naturally-developed resistance to HPV at 26 by taking into a hypothetical estimation of average promiscuity according to age (possibly utilizing the permissive modern social values) is itself an ambiguity, because possibly not every man could be promiscuous in his early to even late youth, due to unchained modern female hypergamy when it comes to sex partner selection.

The same could be said of a male late starter when it comes to sex, who moves abroad to have sex with women who haven't gotten HPV vaccination. For men who've already been exposed to sex earlier in their lives, HPV vaccination doesn't possibly make much sense, except possibly to protect them from new strains of infection, or if they've never been infected itself earlier.

It's sad to note that speculative estimations about average partner count according to age are being used to determine the administration of a vaccine which could "potentially protect" thousands of lives. In an age where women too could indulge in criminal transmission of STDs to men even like HIV, an unsuspecting man could get a HPV infection which could damage his body later from his promiscuous partner, as most HPV infections are asymptomatic. HPV vaccination, though in its initial stages and twisted as it may seem, could be more important than actually thought to save and protect lives for the future, considering today's promiscuous sexual mores.

A twisted "cure" for the fallout of a permissive paradigm?

The real questions remain: why did we need HPV vaccination in the first place? What propelled the need for this vaccine to be developed? Rampant (female) promiscuity, and its fallout. Women are the gatekeepers of sex.

Considering the risk factors of the vaccination itself, which could cause casualties, is it really worth it? How many more such vaccines would mankind develop in the future to combat diseases associated with the fallout of (female) promiscuity? Would this vaccine discourage promiscuity, or instead encourage it even more as a medical indulgence?

The more you look at this twisted picture, the more you realize that these are the results of what hookup cultures, promiscuity, and oversexualization have brought upon civilization. We're just developing (or developed) more vaccines to combat the fallout on one hand, while unchaining female sluttiness and hypergamy , and over-sexualizing culture and young women through media on the other.

Female promiscuity has made us reach a stage in history where fucking itself could possibly entail a STD for a man, because one in every four western women has a HPV infection.

What options do men have in such a scenario where sex itself could possibly mean sticking your cock in a disease infested orifice, considering the epidemic proportions of HPV infection among women today? You can't determine a HPV carrier by face alone. The problem is not the vaccine; the real problem is hypocritical societal decadence.

All modern cultures are doing is seeking to cure by putting more bandages on the illnesses of society, without addressing the real cause of such diseases. This says nothing of the innocent deaths of those lost to the side-effects of the vaccine, who unfairly paid the price as collateral damage for a vaccine developed to damage control the pathological fallout of a slutty modern social and cultural paradigm. Is there a vaccine instead against decadence?

Read More: Should Eating Pussy Be The Most Important Thing You Do In Bed?

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

How A Computer Simulation Showed Me The Cost Of Female Sexual Freedom

August 30, 2014 | by Don Selonius | Link | Original Link

It is August 13, the temperature is 28 degrees Celsius, there is not a cloud in the sky. About 10 meteres beneath me, beautiful, half-naked Croatian girls immerse themselves in the shadow of my beach house. My brothers and I are pretty much royalty here. As I sit here relaxing, Johnny Cola in hand, cigar blowing gently in the breeze, I wonder: how is it that despite the exceptional gamut of beautiful women in my city, there is still a clear difference in quality between the women who bathe on this side of Biograd, and those who chat up the tourists on the riva?

As a Canadian ex-pat, this wasn't obvious to me until well after several months into my stay. My neighbors and I enjoy a constant stream of 9s and 10s, yet even the very comparable 8.9s just never make it through our gates. More interestingly, of all the 8.0-8.9s that we know are clamoring to get near us, few if any of them are fucking the guys on the other side of town, and would rather camp on the beach in front of our house. Their beta orbiters remain unfucked and despondent. Much as the men of Romania in Roosh's "Poosy Paradise," my poorer compatriots can't help but complain that all women really want are rich and handsome men.

I knew this kind of thing couldn't be understood with simple linear mathematics. So I decided to construct a computer simulation to uncover the secrets of this inherently strange phenomenon. I set out to devise an agent-based model, which is a simple computer simulation comprised of programmable "objects," and then change things such as the wealth distribution and ecological state of the "environment" in the simulation. My hypothesis? Simple: as I adjusted the freedom of women to choose their mating partners, they would rapidly and aggressively seek out the men with the greatest social status. I also hypothesized that this would come at the expense of long-run social utility.

The interesting thing about agent-based models is that all you do is start with a few simple rules, hit "Go," and watch as the objects collide and interact. They're very easy to learn. Unlike regular mathematical models, these simulations generate outcomes which are highly unanticipated, where small differences in initial configurations can lead to dramatically divergent global properties. The only way to test your hypothesis is to press play and watch your simulated reality unfold. So I endowed my "agents" with a few simple albeit realistic rules, and I watched as hell broke loose:

Dominant Rule: If female (pink), seek out highest-value male (blue) in vicinity, attempt to initiate relationship. If rejected, move to next available space, rinse and repeat. Only stop when every other agent is currently in a relationship.

Dominant Parameter: “Hypergamy,” or the extent to which a female agent’s vicinity is defined. As the hypergamy scale increases, her ability to jump from patch to patch in order to seek relatively higher males expands. This is to say that a higher value of hypergamy, due perhaps to technologies, such as internet dating and mobile phones, or political freedoms such as divorce without legal recourse, leads to a better “search” algorithm, so that the female is no longer trapped to males in her vicinity. At the highest levels of this parameter, she is essentially limitless in her options.

The result? In a world where hypergamy is high (right screen), the society’s resources are almost completely annihilated, as men allocate most of their assets to consumption in a sad attempt to satisfy choosy women (resulting also in overpopulation). In a world where hypergamy is low (left screen), the society’s resources are more equally distributed, vast reserves of wealth (savings) pocket the landscape, and population growth hovers at a sustainable level.

Why is this all happening? Well, to be blunt, women, when given too much freedom, cause society to become volatile and thus unsustainable. This is why many cultures, and especially those living in marginal desert communities (where a single fuck-up can spell the doom of an entire tribe), practice things like clitoral circumcision, concealment of the body, betrothal, and a whole host of other customs which prevent poor behaviors.

In my own attempt at affecting positive change, I have begun to bring less attractive girls to my beach and fucking them (occasionally), and allowing them to smoke cigarettes from my third floor balcony for all to see, so that the hotter girls get the picture that they are absolutely unimportant in my eyes. I have lots of money and land, so what do I care; if they can't cook and look after kids, they're all the same to me. Either way, as the simulation showed, the hot ones will always be clawing at our gate, eagerly awaiting their time in the sun.

My native Croatian neighbors, not yet satisfied by the luxury that is cheap North American tourist whores (and the increasingly Westernized Croatian women that follow), scoff at me, but they don't see how they are pandering to a culture which validates women's feeble social preferences over more stable and fulfilling qualities like connection, family, and integrity. Even my computer can see that as long as this behavior is encouraged, society will grow technologically, materially, and spiritually stagnant.

Read More: Hypergamy Unchained

Don Selonius

How To Avoid The 3 Worst Qualities Of The Beta Male

August 31, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

When you think of the average modern man, what do you picture?

Is it an “alpha male” marked by confidence, courage, and determination? Or is it something different?

Unfortunately I must argue that it’s something vastly different. Rather than the strong qualities mentioned above, the average man has grown to more closely represent insecurity, fear, stagnation, and all-around softness.

Insecurity

Insecurity can surface from a number of different causes. For one, people are identifying more and more with material objects like cars and clothes, and external associations like where they work, where they went to school, and their social media presence. And a consequence of over-identifying with these surface-level associations is depending on them for validation.

If the rich kid isn’t sitting in his BMW, he feels naked and worthless. If the Ivy League school graduate can’t brag about where he went to school, he feels inadequate. If the cute college chick doesn’t get twenty likes on her latest status update, she feels lonely and depressed. In other words, people often depend on things outside of their control for validation and happiness.

The “alpha male” instead focuses on his own actions and experiences. He draws validation and happiness from within and reflects a genuine confidence to the world as a result. He might not be sitting in a BMW, but he's done hard work, earned money, and could care less about what car he drives. He also might have a BMW that he really enjoys driving, but it's not something he identifies with to the point of needing people to know he drives it wherever he goes.

He might not have a model on his arm, but he's attracted a number of hot women in the past and isn't afraid to approach one and strike up a conversation at a moment's notice. He also might be dating a beautiful woman, but he exudes the same masculine confidence whether she's with him or not.

Solution: Decide what you want for yourself, set goals, and shift your focus internally—to your own progress.

Fear

Fear is a similar illness that plagues the modern man, and this is largely a consequence of humanity's epic progress. In the prehistoric times man had to fear wild animals killing him in his sleep. After man progressed enough to build structures to keep the wilderness at bay, he then had to fear attacks from neighboring tribesmen. In the medieval times when the average man was largely unaffected by combat and wars, he still had to fear the abundance of diseases that existed with no known cure or vaccine.

Today? We live in a time of peace, where war and disease are, for the most part, irrelevant. So what do we fear? We fear things that would seem silly to our ancestors. We've evolved to fear being confronted by our friends, losing our job, or being rejected by a cute girl… what a fucking pity.

The "alpha male" suffers from the same unfortunate social conditioning as his weaker counterparts. These trivial fears have been hardwired into our emotional brains over long periods of time. However, the difference is that he's able to logically make the distinction between what actually represents a danger to his livelihood. This allows him to face his fears, despite experiencing the same natural hesitation anyone else would. He recognizes that quitting his job will lead to an uncertain future and this scares the shit out of him. But he proceeds anyway. He feels the same knot in his stomach when a cute girl strolls by, but he pushes through and stops her anyway.

Solution: Accept the fact that your fears are present and real, then confront them anyway. They will only diminish through repeated exposure.

Stagnation

Stagnation is largely the culmination of insecurity and fear. Stagnation is when a man yields to the environment around him and stops growing. It is the reason there are so many children masquerading around in the bodies of men—children who are more concerned with immediate acts of pleasure and proving themselves through cheap shows of aggression than learning, experiencing new things, or working towards building something of their own.

The “alpha male” progresses and grows constantly. He often foregoes pleasure in the short term in order to build the strength, courage, and intelligence necessary to prosper in the long term. He foregoes the cold beer for an evening of dedicated and focused work. He leaves his comfortable, well-paying job to try something new. He breaks up with his girlfriend and moves on in order to strike into new territory.

All of these things lead to pain and suffering in the short term, yes. And that’s why the average man avoids them. But the “alpha male” keeps his eye on long term development, and then he makes the difficult choice. He makes the choice to keep growing. Everything he exudes, from his confidence and charisma to his strength and decisiveness are directly manifested as a result of this continual growth.

Solution: Recognize when short-term comfort is stopping you from pursuing a new direction in your life, and then make the difficult choice to change.

*Discover The Easy To Follow System I Developed That Took Me From An Insecure, Lonely “Beta Male” To A Fearless, Dominant Man: Click Here To Check Out My New Online Course 28 Days To Alpha.

Read More: Don’t Let Women Rule Your Life

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

“A Passage For Trumpet” Shows The Elusive Nature Of Happiness

August 31, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

“A Passage For Trumpet” is a Twilight Zone episode that originally aired on May 20th, 1960. It involves a depressed alcoholic who commits suicide and is given a second chance at life.

At the beginning, a depressed trumpeter name Joey Crown is attempting to get a job back at a his old club. He confronts his old boss in the back and begs him to take him back. He tells him that he has been on the wagon for six or seven months. They move to where Joey had set down his trumpet case. His boss sits on the ledge and Joey grabs his case; it swings open and a small bottle of alcohol shatters on the ground. His boss looks him with a mix of disdain and strained sympathy, stuffs some money into Joey’s coat pocket and reminiscences briefly on what once was.

Joey used to be a great trumpeter, a man who drew patrons to the club to hear the dulcet tones of his prized trumpet. Yet, despite the joy that his craft brought to himself and others, he fell into the dark recesses of the bottle. He lost the joie de vivre that fired his life, turned to alcohol, and was now relegated to begging for table scraps from his old boss.

Desperate for money, he goes to a local pawn shop to hawk his once-prized possession—his trumpet—for a lousy $8.50. He morosely regards his old instrument before handing it to the proprietor and heading over the watering hole next door. He gets sloppy drunk at the bar and drunkenly stumbles to the pawn shop, just as the shop keeper is placing the trumpet on display—selling his beloved instrument for $25.00.

He leans on the glass, his rheumy eyes begging for something the shopkeeper can’t give him. The shopkeeper says this before dismissing him with a curt hand-wave:

Look, I got overhead! Guys like you don't understand that. What kind of responsibilities do you have? Nothing! Nothing at all!

Joey takes this to heart, thinking he has nothing and is nothing in life. Joey repeats "Nothing at all" to himself before he decides to fling himself in front a truck speeding by.

He comes to some time later. He approaches what he thinks is a local police officer he knows to talk about the "accident;" but it turns out to be an officer he doesn't know. Also, the officer is curiously refusing to speak to him.

He wanders a block down to the local movie theater. He tries to engage the woman at the ticket booth, but he finds—once again—the woman is unfamiliar to him and she doesn't respond to him at all. Becoming increasingly irritated, he approaches a couple men walking out of the theater, asking them for a light.

Joey is anxious that nobody seems to be recognizing his existence until he notices a large mirror on the side of the theater. He is shocked to find that he has no reflection. He—slowly—realizes that he is dead.

Stunned, he stumbles into the watering hole he drank at before. He finds a seat at the bar, all by his lonesome; just Joey and the bottle. He muses aloud about his condition and the gnawing sense of irrelevance that it portends.

He goes to the record player, sidling up against it intimately, knowing it holds the recordings of his best trumpet monologues. He caresses it, realizing that he did have something to live for. He had plenty to live for.

Depressed, Joey heads back to the club he used to work at. He is walking through the back of the club when he hears the familiar tones of a trumpet. He finds a talented man playing a pleasing tune on his trumpet. Instinctively, Joey compliments the man and the man responds, "Thanks!"

Bewildered somebody finally recognized him, he engages the man. Joey finds out that he isn't dead, but rather that the other people in this world are dead. It is the afterlife's way of giving the deceased space to come to terms with their own death.

The two engage in a brief back-and-forth in which they talk about Joey's life. Joey rediscovers his love for the horn; he recounts the love he has for the people in his life. He realizes that at some point he crowded all that out—it isn't stated explicitly, but he is referencing alcohol here.

Then this exchange occurs:

The Man: You've got a choice, you know?

Joey: A choice?

The Man: There's still time.

Joey: Well, if I got a choice…I mean, if got a choice, then I'm going back!

With Joey resolute to live amongst the living again, the man decides to depart; but Joey chases him down, asking for his name. The angel responds, "Gabriel."

Joey does indeed go back. He comes to on the sidewalk where he once jumped to his apparent death. The truck driver approaches him anxiously and whispers to him to never mention this incident to anybody so he can keep his clean driving record. He stuffs some money into Joey's hand. Joey finds out this is enough to repurchase his cherished horn.

Later that night, he is on top of a roof, with the melodies from his trumpet floating into the hazy air of the city. A woman timidly approaches him, saying she is entranced by the ariose tones of his instrument. He sheepishly engages her at first. She discloses that she is new to town and wants him to show her around. He begins to justify her decision to move to his city, quickly realizing he is justifying his decision to live in this city and—subconsciously—his decision to live once again.

He eagerly begins to describe to her the appeal and beauty of his city while the story fades out while Serling narrates:

Joey Crown, who makes music, and who discovered something about life; that it can be rich and rewarding and full of beauty, just like the music he played, if a person would only pause to look and to listen. Joey Crown, who got his clue in the Twilight Zone.

There is a quote by Abraham Lincoln that resonates here: Most folks are about as happy as they make up their minds to be.

There is no significant backstory to Joey in this Twilight Zone episode, but one can surmise there must have been intense personal demons that pushed him towards embracing the Devil's spit. Unable or unwilling to draw on others or his accomplishments, he sought out solace in a drink cup that will never, ever feel full enough.

Happiness is nothing more than a man finding stability in his mind, tranquility in his soul, and his place in life. It is the easiest ideal in the world: if only a man truly wants it.

That being right and said, happiness is an elusive emotion. The fleeting happiness we get from career achievements or significant purchases, from new sexual relations and from general unique situations can stoke one's fires, but only for so long. It is all too easy to fall through the cracks and find yourself on the outside looking in on those who enjoy their life. On those who don't need a passage to happiness.

Why would one need a passage to happiness? That's because they can neither accept the beauty in their life nor transcend the muck of their life. Like Joey, they can't appraise their life in a positive way. They might be depressed alcoholics like Joey; they might be an overworked corporate drone. Regardless of their social posture, they all are incapable of appreciating what beauty they have in their lives.

Most men don't fall into the heedless arms of suicide, but most men don't often get a second chance to reappraise their lives. Joey got a second chance to be honest about his life and his role in it. How many men fling their bodies in front of a moving truck and walk away with a new lease on life?

Life is a long and often boring journey, but one that we make with people and memories that carry us through the low bogs of the mundane and the depressing. Joey learned that he has to fit the nice dressing next to the sour as it goes down hard. Life isn't perfect, but it can be beautiful enough if you learn to understand your place in it.

A man has to decide to be happy. He has to evaluate his life and what it means to him and that those that matter to him. A man has to weather the storms that will inevitably find their way towards him. He has to find his footing when he finally achieves his dreams.

Happiness, then, isn't so much a goal in and of itself, but a state of equilibrium. Happiness exists as a ward against the depression of the soul and the ego of the mind. It is a decision that reflects the maturity that age can bring.

In other words: A man could be happy if he weren't so focused on being unhappy.

Read More: A Stop At Disenchantment: The Social Retreating Of Men

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

Great Fiction Has Never Been For The Masses

September 1, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I recently read with great interest B.P. Rouleau's Why Men's Fiction Is Suffering A Great Decline. Rouleau's perspective as a fiction writer is invaluable, and without doubt he accurately diagnoses the malaise that surrounds much of American fiction today. Yet, more than once I found myself sitting up in my chair as I read, begging to differ with him on one or two points. I intend to elaborate on those here.

Was there ever a "golden age" for the consumption of fiction in America? I am not so sure. Much of the best fiction, as I see it, was surrounded by obscurity and lack of appreciation from the moment of its initial appearance. The literati here comprised an islanded class, aristocratic in its presumptions and preferences. Was there ever a time when men "appreciated" fiction? Here again, I am not so certain of the answer. Like all great things, great fiction has always been an elite pursuit; it has never been for the masses.

There is some correlation between female taste and sales of fiction titles. I suspect that in every age, perhaps since Petronius's Satyricon and Apuleius's The Golden Ass first appeared on the Roman scene two thousand years ago, women have been greater consumers of fiction than have men. Let us give women their due. In feudal Japan, women practically invented fiction. Noblewoman and ladies-in-waiting like Murasaki Shikibu constructed elaborate mythological tales (e.g., Tale of Genji) for the amusement of their lords, and thereby created a genre. Only half jokingly, we might say that men write the great fiction books, male critics praise them, and women read them.

Fiction in feudal Japan: an elite pursuit created by women

But I digress here. Is great fiction suffering from a decline? Yes and no. Great fiction has always been suffering from a decline in the sense that its appeal was limited to the educated elites. It was born into decline, in fact. Only rarely has great fiction appeared to universal acclaim and widespread appreciation in a writer's lifetime. Yes, publishers are unwilling to take financial risks for uncertain literary products, and this hesitancy would doubtless condemn many old classics to oblivion today if their authors were knocking on doors, searching hungrily for a publisher. Necessity drives content.

But was there ever a time when this was not so? And has this trend not now been counterbalanced by the revolution in self-publishing and small publishing, where even the faintest printed voice can now be heard? Perhaps we are at the dawn of a new golden age of fiction, where previously unheard authors can now find a place in the chorus. In the ancient world, anyone could publish a book as long as he could hire a scribe to make enough copies; initial "printings" usually consisted of one thousand copies. The author needed only to sell them through dealers. Perhaps we are re-entering a period much like this.

Yet Rouleau's article forced me to consider what works of American fiction I believe to be the most important, and why. Great fiction will always be relevant, and there is no better well to draw from than the classics. What better wellspring can we hope to find, unless it be the old Russian masters? Contemporary fiction be damned. I found myself continually drawn to the classics of American fiction, rather than the more modern material.

If we want to spend our time with fiction, why not choose the best? Out of countless exemplars, I decided to go with two old-school American masters. If you think these two writers are out of date, think again. For pure visionary power, maturity of symbolism, and mystical intensity of language, these American masters have never been surpassed.

Edgar Allan Poe

It is easy to forget what a towering genius Poe was. The older I get, the more I appreciate his incredible ability to evoke a mood, create a sensation, or analyze the decomposition of the human psyche. He is a consummate psychologist who was successful in many literary genres: he invented the detective story (The Purloined Letter), he was a great literary critic, he was an unrivaled poet, and he brought the horror tale to a height of maturity that has never been equaled.

Poe's genius has no parallel in American letters

If you want to see what perfect writing looks like, read (or re-read) The Tell-Tale Heart. This short story is just about the most expertly constructed bit of writing that has yet appeared of comparable length. Poe's special power was to dissect the breakdown of the human psyche, and he did this with unerring success in The Black Cat, The Cask of Amontillado, and in his gothic tales like Ligeia and The Fall of the House of Usher. What concerns Poe is the destructive power of human passions like love, rage, and hatred, and his stories reveal with uncompromising clarity the irrational forces that inhabit our souls.

Herman Melville

Now this is a novelist. He led a life that was exciting, rebellious, and full of angst and pain. In other words, he was made for writing. Typee chronicles his youthful experiences among the South Sea cannibals, and is a good warm-up to some of his more serious writing. Typee established Melville as the bad-boy of American fiction. Having lived among the South Sea natives, he could never quite adapt himself to polite society again. He tried and he tried, but it was no good. He had seen and experienced too much, and it had forever changed him. His later writings show his obsession with philosophical and moral problems, with which he was unable to untangle himself.

Which brings us to his greatest book of all. About Moby-Dick, what can one say about this strange and wonderful book that has not already been said? Perhaps one who is a native of southeastern Massachusetts, who has walked countless times the streets of New Bedford, and has visited the Seaman's Bethel many times, cannot write neutrally about this difficult and brilliant book. But let us try.

It begins almost like a conventional sea-story, with picturesque scenes of Ishmael and Queequeg sharing a pipe and a fraternal bed together in New Bedford, and signing up for what appears to be a routine whaling voyage.

A dead whale, or a stove boat

And then things get progressively stranger, and stranger still. We are drawn into a surreal world where the characters speak like Shakespearean actors and behave like fanatics. Mystical undertones begin to rise overtly to the surface. We have a whaleboat filled with a multinational crew, headed by a rage-soaked lunatic, on a quest that ends in complete destruction. Among countless great chapters, read and imbibe the beauty of “The Grand Armada”; chew on the marvelous soliloquy by Ahab in Chapter 70 (“The Sphinx”); and experience the grandeur and desolation of the final chapter. This book deserves every bit of its reputation as the greatest, profoundest, and most difficult of all American novels. It doesn’t yield up its secrets easily, but when it does, they come in torrents.

And so we return to our original question: is American fiction dead? No. Genius, like weeds and ivy, will always find a way to persist and regenerate. It has a way of cropping up in the unlikeliest of places. We may not find the great treasures we seek in mainstream publishing, but on blogs, in self-published tomes, and in niche markets, there is a tremendous amount of creative vitality.

We have only to keep an open mind, and cast a wide net on the open sea.

Read More: On The Importance Of Family

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

What It’s Like To Date A Strong And Independent Woman

September 1, 2014 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

I consider myself a pretty lucky man. I’ve been blessed with the good fortune of having a great father that taught me a lot about life. I also have a great mother who has stood by his side for over three decades. I had the privilege growing up in a household where respect was of paramount importance and traditional gender roles were on active display, giving me a red pill mindset from a young age.

Unfortunately, one belief that made its way into my head and stayed there for many years is that an independent, well educated, and high earning woman is a good catch. It’s difficult to make that confession, but it actually makes sense on the surface—the joint incomes would be great and, in the event of divorce, the chances of making a relatively easy financial escape would be greatly increased.

Well, a couple of years ago I met a woman that had great potential. We were in an unofficial relationship for a little over six months—the longest I’ve seen a particular woman in over six years of being single. We’ll call her Princess for this story. Princess was pretty crazy about me and, after about three and a half months of casual dating, she started hitting me up pretty hard for commitment.

She was a reasonably attractive and intelligent doctor that had recently completed her residency. I was a tall and charismatic pilot. On paper, we seemed like a great match: the highly intelligent independent woman and the high flying ambitious man—both the same age too. A small-scale “power couple” in the making. If I had committed and eventually married this woman, by the time we were in our late thirties, it wouldn’t have been unreasonable to expect a joint income somewhere between $300,000-$375,000 per year.

A large home furnished with whatever we wanted was pretty much guaranteed. Most high-end cars, boats, and other toys would have been within our price range. There would have been five star vacations anywhere in the world, and our children would have received top notch private schooling. We could have easily raised a couple of kids and both retired multi-millionaires in our 50s.

All of this sounds really good, ideal even, but there was a problem. You see, if I eventually married this woman, I would've been stuck listening to her fucking mouth. Listening to a "strong and independent" woman's blather is like a Navy SEAL drawing his Sig Sauer 9mm and delivering a double tap to your cock. Nothing kills a boner quicker than the prattling hole that comes standard on every "strong and independent" woman's face.

Everywhere I went with with this broad—and I mean everywhere—she made it a point to let everyone know that she was a doctor. Do you know how embarrassing that shit was? She couldn't just be Princess, she had to be motherfuckin' Dr. Princess. Apparently, she ascended above the ranks of a normal person and was anointed by the Lord Jesus Christ himself for earning that MD. The ego on this woman was absolutely astonishing, and this is coming from a pilot for God's sake.

Every waiter, cashier, and grocery bagger in the city knows this woman is a doctor. How do they know? Because she fucking told them, that's how. Not to mention, she was terribly rude to these people most of the time. She felt it as if it was beneath her to associate with the peasantry, or as I like to call them, average people. This is something I absolutely cannot stand. Here are some examples.

Example 1

> Cashier: Will that be all ma'am?
>
> Her: Yes, just the Altoids, I like to chew on mints when I'm with my patients—I'm > a doctor.

>
> Cashier: I see, well, have a nice day then. (Clerk + Fucks Given = Zero)

Example 2

> Waitress: Would you like me to get you a to-go box for your leftovers, ma'am?
>
> Her: Uhhhhh, well, yes of course, I'll have it for lunch tomorrow at the clinic… if I have time. It's so difficult to get a lunch break when you're a busy new doctor.
>
> Waitress: Okay, I'll bring you a box.

Example 3

> Grocery Bagger: Good afternoon ma'am, how are you? Are plastic bags okay?
>
> Her: My feet are killing me, I had such a high patient load at work. They are just working us doctors to death lately.
>
> Grocery Bagger: Okay, plastic it is then.

She couldn't seem to grasp the fact that no one gave a single shred of a half-mast fuck about her medical degree. She would tell this to people, I'm assuming, so they would say, "Wow, a doctor! Oh my God, you're so awesome, can you please turn around so I can kiss your ass? I, of course, would taunt her about this mercilessly. One time that sticks out quite well…

> Me: Hey, I just spotted some human beings off in the distance, if you run you might be able to catch them before they make it to their car.
>
> Her: Huh, why would I do that?
>
> Me: Well, I'm pretty sure they don't know that you're a doctor, and I wouldn't want them to miss out on that very exciting and life altering news. Don't let them get away. Better hurry up or you'll blow your chance.
>
> Her: You're such a prick.

But Wait, There’s More

As annoying as all of this was, it’s not the worst part. The worst is that she was completely incapable of anything that involved common sense. It wouldn’t have surprised me if she had a Post-it note attached to her toilet seat that said, “Reminder: wipe ass after taking shit!” She was hopeless with just about anything that didn’t involve the one thing she knew—medicine.

Now, even that wouldn’t have been such a bad thing if she had the ability to acknowledge that she was pretty much completely helpless. However, the fact that she went to medical school somehow superseded everyone else’s expertise or knowledge about anything. She knew it all, and to say it was somewhat difficult to get her to shut up and listen would be like saying it’s somewhat difficult to hit a fart with a bow and arrow. During the course of our relationship, I managed to mock her and talk enough shit that she relented on some of these bad habits, but it wasn’t nearly enough.

The Endgame

We had made plans to go out with my buddy and his wife on their boat. I went to pick up Dr. Princess and we decided to take her car. I was driving her car for the first time in well over two months since we always took my car everywhere. I’m driving along and notice that her car—a $45,000 BMW—is pulling pretty hard to the left. I decide to have a chat with her about this…

> Me: You know this car needs a front end alignment, right? It’s pulling to the left quite a bit.
>
> Her: Yeah, I know [she didn’t fucking know], I did a U-turn over a median and I > think I screwed it up.

>
> Me: What? Why did you do that? How long ago did that happen?
>
> Her: About a month or so, I was on my way to the clinic and was running late.
>
> Me: You've been driving it like this for a month?
>
> Her: Yeah, so? It's not that big of a deal.

Telling her why it was, in fact, a pretty big fucking deal would have been about as useful as telling Helen Keller how to use a telescope—I just dropped the subject. I did decide that I would stop by a gas station and try to borrow a tire pressure gauge, just so we could see if the pulling was the result of low air pressure on the left front tire. If so, we could just service it up and be on our way—a free and easy fix.

While we were waiting at a traffic light, I noticed a dealer sticker on the windshield that said when her next oil change was due. I checked the odometer and saw it was due over 1,700 miles ago. We have another conversation…

> Me: When was the last time you had the oil changed?
>
> Her: It's been a while, I'm not sure, why?
>
> Me: See this sticker? It was due 1,700 miles ago, you're going to turn a $45,000 BMW into a rolling hunk of shit if you don't start taking better care of it—the warranty doesn't cover negligence. You really need to take it to the shop tomorrow and get all of this straightened out.
>
> Her: It's not your fucking car! Don't concern yourself with things that are none of your damn business! If it breaks, I'll get it fixed! I don't need you telling me what to do!

She was completely right, it wasn't my car. So, I decided to give her BMW the kind of treatment it was accustomed to. Once the traffic light turned green, I did a U-turn over the fucking median and headed straight back to her condo. To maximize potential embarrassment, I dumped her ass by calling her a loser loud enough to ensure the neighbors heard it. I didn't live there and wouldn't be coming back, so it's not like I gave a shit.

Plus, nothing drops the jaw of a snobby doctor broad like being called a loser while simultaneously getting dumped. I then got into my perfectly functioning automobile and drove to my buddy's house. It was beautiful and incredibly efficient. I was proud.

Artist reconstruction of my U-turn.

Throughout the course of the day—which was spent having a blast on my buddy's boat and lining up a different chick to spend my evening with—I received about 40 text messages and a dozen calls from Dr. Princess. They went unanswered. According to my neighbors, she came by my house looking for me while I was off working about a week later. Luckily she didn't vandalize anything. She was so strong and independent that she continued texting me for nearly three weeks after I ended things, begging for another chance…

In Closing

So, where have all the good men gone? Perhaps a better question would be: where have all the women that know how to shut the fuck up gone? It's safe to say that more and more decent men will be riding off into the sunset with their middle fingers held high in the air. A very large portion of these men aren't exactly basement dwelling retards, either. There are millions upon millions of cumulative dollars being earned by tons of men, and these men will not be sharing that money with a bunch of yippy yappy babbling female assholes. This trend will not be slowing down as time passes by, that's a guarantee.

The fact of the matter is real men are sick of this shit. They're sick of the arrogance, the snark, and the ridiculous superiority complexes the women in this country constantly exhibit. This goes for all men: blue collar, white collar, and everything in between. It's the flat-out repulsive behavior like I described in the above story that has us to the end of our wits—it's unbearable. There were only three reasons why the relationship with Dr. Princess lasted as long as it did: she used to buy me stuff, we didn't see each other very often due to our schedules, and I was seeing other women. That's it.

One would like to think that earning an education would open a person's mind and give them some perspective on life. This doesn't happen with the majority of women, though. In fact, possessing a degree has become a reason to discard all humility and common courtesy. Where has the highly desirable and respectable female trait of modesty absconded to? Perhaps, most importantly, where has the respect for honest people trying to make an honest living gone?

Do you know what I call the guy that picks up my garbage? What about the person that works at the convenience store, or the construction worker that's fixing pot holes on my street? I call them "sir" or "ma'am", and why do I call them that? Because I'm grateful that they exist. I'm glad there are men willing to bust their asses for 8-12 hours a day in 95-degree heat or 30-degree cold to build, fix, and create things for the betterment of my existence. Far too many women in this country can't see it because they're too busy looking down their stuck-the-fuck-up noses at everyone around them. This just in ladies—you ain't shit.

The women that say they are "strong and independent" are the most insolent, intolerable, and incapable vagina-possessing human beings you will ever meet. People that are strong and independent don't go around trying to convince everyone in their vicinity of how strong and independent they are—it's on display for all to see. Their actions and abilities will showcase their true potential. A running mouth isn't compulsory to getting the point across.

The "strong and independent" woman is nothing more than a talker—a blabbering mouth that moves at a thousand miles an hour and only stops when there's a dick nearby that needs to be sucked. It would be nice to see some talents other than fellatio come along to keep that mouth company, but I won't be holding my breath. And I know, for certain, I'm not alone.

Read More: The Strong & Independent Woman Translator

A.V. Yader
A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

The Power Of Embracing Your Inner Demons

September 1, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

I've been looking for something the last few years. I couldn't quite describe what it was, but I knew I could find it. Finally, I found the solution in the most unlikely of places. I kept watching a lot of TV shows. Breaking Bad was a dark one, but it didn't quite hit the spot—I'd plough through the seasons like a researcher looking for something, leaving episode after episode running on the computer in the background while I did other things. I got through dozens of shows. It became like putting on some music in the background.

Now, I'm not the type of man to glue myself to the TV, smoking bongs and eating Cheetos. I often read a book or the internet at the same time as watching a movie. But at the same time, when I get a whim like this I can't always consciously rationalize why I am doing it. It's a hedonistic and decadent approach to life, but as you grow older you learn to yield and turn your weaknesses into strengths.

Why does a player like Roosh travel the world on an ever-increasing mission to up his notch count? Why does a wimp get married and "settle down"? Why does a guy go to the gym and bulk up? Why does anyone do much of anything? The answer is to feel alive. It's only when you feel alive that life is worth living. The surfers and extreme skiers take incredible risks, one wrong move can kill them, but they still do it – To feel alive.

Inspirational – now how to do that in a more mundane setting?

Unfortunately the human condition is buried underneath a mountain of so many social complexes, bad childhood experiences provided by inept adults with all manner of psychological problems themselves. We're supposed to control ourselves and conform to the way our parents, friends, teachers, lovers and society in general expects us to be. But what does that expectation constitute?

If a 10-year-old boy told his parents he wanted to sleep all day so he could stay up all night partying and playing CDs, his parents would probably freak and lock him into a 9-5 regime. Yet there are plenty of superstar DJs that people love and admire, making a fortune doing just this. Why the hell not? You can do just about anything you want and the chances are that people will love and enjoy what you do, because doing what you love makes you feel alive. When you feel alive, other people who are less "awake" than you are will flock to the spectacle. This is one of the reasons that watching sportsmen in action, even with relatively boring games like tennis and football, is absolutely fascinating.

We spend half our time day dreaming and planning a future that will never happen, and the rest of it doing mundane and tedious chores that make us fall asleep. The point of the movie Flight Club is to live and not to give a fuck. Live in a total shithole of a house, who cares. Punch yourself real hard in the face. I've tried it quite a few times. Hit yourself square on the jaw until you see stars and leave a swelling. I tell you, you'll feel more alive in that moment than you have in the last couple of decades.

Why does the suicidal person put a gun to his head? Precisely because in that moment he feels absolutely alive. In the pits of depression, feeling that his life is a miserable waste of time, putting a gun to his head and gently squeezing the trigger brings him back to life. The tragedy is that he goes through with it and doesn't see the answer he was looking for is not in death itself, but in simply feeling alive. Punch yourself in the face and you will see what I mean.

I am not recommending self-harm as a permanent therapy to the situation, but it works as a temporary pep. Now, how to feel like that all the time? How to feel one breath away from death, and thus be more alive than I've ever been? Here is a thought: 100 people die in the US every day, mashed in horrible car accidents. Now tell me that God, the universe or whatever, really gives a fuck. Your life is a meaningless waste of time. You can be crushed out of existence by a UPS driver who relapsed and hit the crack pipe this morning.

That's the point of the scene in Fight Club where Edward Norton is just begging for a midair collision. That's why the movie is offset against his job as an insurance evaluator, all those grizzly dead bodies and tragic accidents—Even Einstein, Edison, Washington, Churchill, all of them a waste of time, mere worms crawling about in the mud.

I've had a few dramatic successes in my life, but I've also had more than my fair share of fuck-ups. Half the time I feel like I am going through the motions and fucking things up on purpose. Why is this? What I am getting out of failure? Al Pacino explains it well in "Two for the Money" :

> You're a lemon. Like a bad car. There is something… there is something inherently defective in you, and you, and you, and me, and all of us. We're all lemons. We look like everyone else, but what makes us different is our defect. See, most gamblers, when they go to gamble, they go to win. When we go to gamble, we go to lose. Subconsciously. Me, I never feel better than when they're raking the chips away; not bringing them in. And everyone here knows what I'm talking about. Hell, even when we win it's just a matter of time before we give it all back. But when we lose, that's another story. When we lose, and I'm talking about the kind of loss that makes your asshole pucker to the size of a decimal point – you know what I mean – You've just recreated the worst possible nightmare this side of malignant cancer, for the twentieth goddamn time; and you're standing there and you suddenly realize, Hey, I'm still… here. I'm still breathing. I'm still alive. Us lemons, we f up all the time on purpose. Because we constantly need to remind ourselves we're alive. Gambling's not your problem. It's this f*d up need to feel something. To convince yourself you exist. That's the problem.

Bring Yourself To Life

So where did I find my answers? In the TV show Hannibal. Season one is a bit of a rambling affair, but season two really kicks in. Why do we love that character so much?

He makes such a spectacle of the most brutal and disgusting killings, not only by preparing delicacies from his victims, but also leaving the bodies as a spectacular tribute. Hannibal is incredible because he has embraced life. He is absolutely comfortable with who and what he is and he carries out his “work” with the most brilliant, calculated, and conscious precision. He is alive and he allows nothing and no one to hold him back.

Society and especially the raising of children is all built around restraint. In order to function as a unified body of people we all need to think in a similar way. If it becomes normal to chop people up, display their bodies as tributes and serve their liver on a bed of saffron rice, what will become of your average city? The same holds true for sex as well as murder. If men and women embrace their lustful tendencies and plunge into wanton fornication what will become of society?

Fight Club challenges social norms. Why shouldn’t we have an underground club where we beat the shit out of each other and embrace our inner demons? We are trained to consider these kinds of urges as distasteful at best and at worst horrific—but are they really horrific or is that just the way we’ve been programmed? Hannibal seems to take a contradictory approach in that he nurtures and embraces his inner demons and encourages others to do the same.

Hannibal has obviously gone over the edge to retrieve his soul. He’s alive but he is also a damaged unit. AND YET: In his conscious and fully-embodied state he has something we all want. He feels alive. Thus, he looks down on those around him as pathetic sleepwalkers. Hannibal has no fear, either of himself or those around him, or of the grotesque acts he performs. He might end up in a struggle either physically or psychologically or both, but he performs with such clarity because his sense of living ensures victory is more or less assured.

Much as the Navy Seals go into battle “already dead’” so they can overcome the fear of dying, we must go into life already dead, so that we can feel awake. It sounds like a paradox but it’s not. Of course we don’t have to chop people up or go crazy with violence or fornication. That can most certainly assist a person to wake up, but much like a drug it makes you fall into the pits of your own soul. What you must do instead is stare those dark aspects in the face. Embrace them, without allowing them to pull you right in—easier said than done. Mostly we hide from our true selves, because our true self is absolutely frightening.

Society says that our true selves are unacceptable, but it’s only a moral code. Those codes have been broken many times. How alive would you feel in such a moment ? How many people would kill themselves, just to feel a little more alive? I wanted to do just that at times and I have a 9mm and 1000 rounds of ammo in the cupboard, but just embracing the concept makes me feel so alive as to assuage the urge. You can go right to the edge and look off the cliff without jumping, and get pretty much the same result.

The point I found from Hannibal is that I don’t have to go over the edge to feel alive. Like a surfer in a barrel, I simply have to embrace all the facets of myself and ride the wave of inner demons. I learned to feel alive doing the most mundane bullshit and of course as I do this, I progress into far more interesting and fascinating pursuits. In order to do this I had to look deep within myself, and as Hannibal does confront the very depths of my own demonic existence. The question is whether its possible do that without becoming a monster. So far, so good.

Read More: Why Abortion Shouldn't Be Taken Lightly

Jennifer Lawrence Is A Terrible Role Model

September 2, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Edit: All photos were removed due to DMCA request.

Welcome back to another edition of "You Hypocritical Slut!" This week we feature a critically-lauded media darling straight out of Hollywood, California! Jennifer Lawrence, come on down!

Who Is Jennifer Lawrence?

For those of you who don't know her, Jennifer Lawrence is a young American A-list actress most notable for being the lead in The Hunger Games series of movies, and for winning an Oscar for Best Actress for Silver Linings Playbook. J-Law is also a media and public darling, widely hailed as a role model for young girls in this vilely Patriarchal world of ours. Just listen to some of the love that gets thrown her way:

> Jennifer understands that its not easy out there for teenage girls and actively wants to be a good role model. Speaking about getting in shape for her 'Hunger Games' role, Jennifer said, 'I'm never going to starve myself for a part, I don't want little girls to be like, 'Oh, I want to look like Katniss, so I'm going to skip dinner.'

Amusingly, this same article also lauds over how one of Jennifer Lawrence's maids found a butt-plug. Pride in the body god gave her, then slavery and sluttery! What a great role model. It is amusing that J-Law's maid found the butt-plug though, since as Marie Claire tells us:

> As the cover star of the latest issue of French magazine Madame Figaro, the 23-year old actress, who is currently starring in the second installment of The Hunger Games franchise, revealed why she doesn't want that celebrity essential: a personal assistant. [emphasis Billy's] 'I want my life is as normal as possible.' Jennifer told the magazine. 'One of the dangers in the film industry is that things are too fast. I do not want to burn the stages of my life. I want to keep it simple, I do not have an assistant.'

> Instead, Jennifer says that the '[the person] that helps me is my best friend' and that the two have known each other for 22 years. 'At the end of a day of shooting, I can go home and hang out with her, and not share time with someone who works for me.' Despite wanting to lead as normal a life as possible, Jennifer realises that she has become a role model for young women, especially since taking on the role of Katniss in The Hunger Games. '[It] would be hypocritical [of me] to deny that girls take me as an example, and say that I don't have responsibility to them. Because clearly, I have. I know the influence of celebrities on young people. I was a teenager, and I want to send a positive message.'

Hypocritical you say, Jenny? Like how it would be hypocritical for someone to not want to hire one person to answer their phone and schedule their meetings, but then on the other hand hire someone else to clean up their house? Or perhaps Jennifer Lawrence just doesn't realize that most early 20-something women don't have maids. Maybe J-Law is just out of touch.

After all, she says she wants to send positive messages to young girls—then tells stories about butt-plugs. I guess we'll leave it to the young girls to sifter through the messages J-Law's trying to send. It's not like a young girl going through the hormonal tempest of puberty in a culture which is trying to turn her into a slut (and then laugh at her for said sluttery at the same time) has anything more important on her mind than trying to figure out what the hell her idol is trying to say.

> There's just no imagination in Hollywood. I wanted to show people "Winter's Bone" for the performance, but it ended up having the opposite effect. People were like, no, she's not feminine, she's not sexual.

Jennifer Lawrence, Self Proclaimed Role Model For Young Women

Regardless of her flip-flopping nature, it's still a good thing that Jennifer Lawrence can be a role model to young girls. As she says about Katniss, the strong empowered female hero of the The Hunger Games franchise:

> Speaking on the eve of the world premiere of The Hunger Games: Catching Fire, in which she stars as heroine Katniss, the actress said: "Growing up I didn't have a female hero the way that Katniss is. I think she's a wonderful role model for young girls. I'm happy that they have a character like that." Admitting that she has said no to directors that have asked her to lose weight, she insists on > managing unrealistic expectations and said it is more important to look strong and healthy. “We have the ability to control this image that young girls are going to be seeing,” she told Newsnight.

Jennifer Lawrence was born in 1990. I guess she made a concerted effort not to read or watch a single movie, book or television show growing up in the 1990’s, since I can name several shows off the top of my head featuring strong female leads from after 1990: [Daria 1997-2002, Buffy The Vampire Slayer 1997 – 2003, Xena: Warrior Princess 1995 – 2001, Sailor Moon 1995 – 2000, Sabrina The Teenage Witch 1996 – 2003, The Babysitter’s Club 1986 – 2000, Sweet Valley High 1983 – 2003, Kim Possible 2002 – 2007] And that woefully short list excludes the numerous shows, books, and movies where strong women are simply a part of a team instead of the leaders (e.g. Power Rangers, Digimon, Harry Potter, Animorphs).

I was born in 1991 and I grew up with older and younger sisters. Believe me, there were more than enough strong, empowered female role models in the media. At this point I’m tempted to say Jennifer Lawrence is talking out her ass, but that’s very unlikely since, as she has blunted stated in the past, she likes putting a plug in there.

So why is there so much love for the obviously hypocritical Jennifer Lawrence? Good PR. J-Law constantly talks about how much of a down to earth person she is, and around the time of the first Hunger Games movie, Jennifer made a big deal about being a “fat” actress in Hollywood. Since we live among the fattest generation of humans ever to have existed in history, the public ate this up. Finally! Here was an actress who didn’t starve herself! She’s just like us!

In fact, I freely admit that, when I first saw Jennifer Lawrence and ~~Gabhorhey Cidoobey~~ Precious, I could not tell who was who. Though both of these incredibly talented actresses are merely curvy by modern standards of fat measurement, can you tell which of these good female role models is “I’m totes fatzone” Jennifer Lawrence?

“In Hollywood, I’m obese. I’m considered a fat actress, I’m Val Kilmer in that one picture on the beach.” (Source)

Maybe there is something to that, though. Perhaps, under those form fitting clothes of her, Jennifer Lawrence is fat. Well, unless J-Law is an attention seeking whore who takes and has had naked pictures taken of her, we’ll never know will we?

Jennifer Lawrence Is Either A Liar Or Idiotic

Look at all those jelly rolls! Sarcasm aside, Jennifer Lawrence is not fat. Clearly she has never been fat, judging by her perfect non-photoshopped skin marred by not a single serious stretch mark. Oh yeah, a bunch of nude selfies and pictures taken by others have emerged after Jennifer Lawrence’s phone was hacked. Jenny-kins, whom has proclaimed herself (and been proclaimed by others) as a role model for girls and young women has taken numerous naked selfies with the numerous men she has slept with. Remember girls! You can be whoever you want to be! But if a hot guy tells you to take your clothes off so he can degrade you by taking naked pictures of you THEN YOU DO IT!

I'm excited to be seen as sexy. But not slutty.

Nothing screams sexy like a girl bending over as if she's about to blast out two pounds of chicken wings. Men, is the above what you hope your daughters will one day be? Because in a world where Jennifer Lawrence is honestly considered a role model…

"There are actresses who build themselves, and then there are actresses who are built by others. I want to build myself."

From the look of all her leaked nudes, J-Law's first focus should be building a top for herself. It's not enough. All the money, the fame, the attention she gets; Jennifer still feels the compulsion to strip down and take a naked selfie of herself in order to assuage her ego. Every modern woman is the religion of herself, and she is always in worship. Also, take note of the 'le artiste' smugness of that last quote. Jennifer is a serious woman doing serious things!

"Where are the Robert Redfords and Paul Newmans of my age group? I love James Franco, but where's the next James Franco? Where are the hunks who can act?"

Where are all the real men? she cries, like every other worthless woman out there. Well J-Law; they're busy doing important things, not standing around taking narcissistic selfies of themselves all day in the latest fashions after their shopping trip. Jennifer considers herself in the same league as Robert Redford and Paul Newman. Yes, that really sounds like a girl who has self esteem issues. Oh, I forgot to mention—in addition to being a proud fatty, Jennifer Lawrence has also been a victim of a bad childhood! So there's even more reason for awkward girls and young women to love J-Law! Like they didn't have enough already amirite?! Jesus Christ…

> The Oscar-winning actress also shared details of her childhood, and how she was prescribed medication to help with anxiety issues.
>
> 'My nickname was "Nitro" as in nitroglycerin. I was hyperactive, curious about everything,' Jennifer said.
>
> 'When my mother told me about my childhood, she always told me there was like a light in me, a spark that inspired me constantly. When I entered school, the light went out. We never knew what it was, a kind of social anxiety. But I had friends.'

But wait, Jenny has also said:

> I like when things are hard; I'm very competitive. If something seems difficult or impossible, it interests me.

That hardly sounds like how someone with social anxiety would act…

> I always felt dumber than everybody else. I hated it. I hated being inside. I hated being behind a desk. School just kind of killed me.

Hate arises from something we dislike, things that we find difficult to deal with. In Jennifer's own words, she loves difficulty. It interests her. So what the hell is it Jennifer? Who are you really?

> I'm from Kentucky. I used to be very personable and make eye contact and smile at people, and now all I do is look down. When I'm at dinner and one person after another keeps interrupting to take pictures, it's like, 'I can't live like this.'

So she used to be personable, except she was dead inside and anxious, but that was difficult so she loved doing it, but…but… But speaking of butts! Here's J-Law flaunting hers for someone else like a well trained dog. Note the direction she's looking. It most certainly is not "down."

I'd also like to note here that Jennifer Lawrence, for all her bluster (and others') about her being a great actress, was discovered not through talent, but because someone saw her on the street.

> According to HollyScoop, Lawrence was first discovered at the age of 14 in New York by a, "passer buyer," and made her first on-screen appearance in Devil You Know.

What is more likely? A talent agent walking around New York saw a dour, chubby girl with her face to the ground, her hands probably wrapped tightly around her backpack straps, trudging along the side walk with a defeated look and thought, "Now there's a star!" Or did this person (with a well honed "talent agent's" predatory sense) see a pretty girl in good shape, all smiles and radiance, and think, "She's hot, and in a few years she'll be legally bangable. I bet I could make her an actress for cheap."

For all the hate he receives, at least Justin Beiber was discovered because he could sing. Jennifer Lawrence. What a great model for young girls. Be hot, lie about who you are as a person and walk around hoping that someone will discover you. The modern American dream.

In Conclusion

Jennifer Lawrence is either an idiot or a liar. Regardless of which, she most certainly is not a role model for any women of any age. At least she shouldn't be: unfortunately in our culture of talentless whores being propelled on the broken backs of men, I have to conclude that perhaps J-Law is a role model for the modern western woman. Selfish, narcissistic, slutty, a rampant liar. Jenny will tell people whatever she thinks they want to hear to make them like her. She buys credence with women using her mouth ("I'm like, totally just like you fat, socially awkward rejects lol!") and she buys credence with men by using her body.

I am just a normal girl…

At this point, Jennifer Lawrence may very well be. What a sad commentary that is for modern women.

Read More: Helen Mees Is A Feminist Role Model

Billy Chubbs

Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

4 Observations On The Las Vegas Hookup Culture

September 3, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

I recently spent a week in Las Vegas. As a Brit abroad it was an interesting experience for many reasons, a few of which that pertain to hookup culture I discuss here.

Of course, Las Vegas (or the strip, anyway) exists only as a site of hedonism, and as such is distinct from other US cities. I know from personal experience that pickup in New York, for example, is a very different proposition. Nevertheless, since Vegas is a place of extremes—-extreme decadence, extreme sexual licentiousness, extreme lavishness, extreme wealth—and it is a kind of mecca for dissolute party-goers, it extrapolates some of the worst (or best, depending on your view) aspects of Western culture and gives them a setting where they can flourish on a grand scale.

Put another way, given that people can do pretty much whatever the hell they like in Vegas and get away with it ("what happens in Vegas stays in Vegas"), it functions in a similar way to the island in The Lord of the Flies: this is what human behavior looks like when you lift the normal societal restraints on it, and it's not pretty.

1. Girls Will Extract Money From Unwary Men Mercilessly

Some girls will be out for free drinks, VIP tables, and whatever else they can get in nightclubs the world over, of course, but this is much more overt in Vegas. Perhaps this isn't surprising. After all, Vegas is a wet dream of consumerism, capitalism's logical endgame. This is a town where the hugest suites with panoramic views and gold baths are available only to those who have hustled hard. Unsurprisingly, something in the air brings out the hustling instinct in the women too.

Standing by the bar at the Encore Beach Club observing nubile, bikini-clad bodies dancing to Will.i.am's flaccid EDM DJ set, I observed a man approach a group of four girls. He opened well and his target, the most attractive of the girls, responded well and appeared interested. After several minutes of conversation which included light touching, laughter and some push-pull banter, the man led the girls to the bar where he bought shots for all of them.

They said cheers, with the oblivious, entitled friends hardly even bothering to chink the man's glass. As soon as this ritual was completed the man's target seemed to grow cold and shifted away from him, excluding him from the group while he stood there slowly gathering chode dust. It was only a matter of time now. Shortly, the target turned to the man and gave him the classic valedictory speech.

'Well, it was so nice to meet you. Thanks so much for the shawts!'

The girls walked off, leaving the man standing by the bar, a crestfallen buffoon eighty dollars poorer.

Here's the thing: the girls looked educated and pleasant enough, and certainly not like classic club skanks. On some level, they must have been aware that what they had done was completely unacceptable by any normal measure, a con trick worthy of an old Times Square huckster, somewhere between theft and prostitution. But what recourse did the man have? Had he argued with the girls he'd have been deemed socially awkward or "creepy." If he'd got angry he'd most likely have been thrown out by security.

Some time later, a girl with a sexy body and pretty, molly-eyes passed me. We smiled.

"Hey, you know if me and my friend had drinks I would totally cheers with you but we don't have drinks," she said.

"So are you gonna buy me one?" I responded.

The girl snarled, vampiric.

"Fuck you," she said.

I would probably have had this chick down as a nice girl-next door type had I seen her in my local supermarket. But then Vegas is a space where bad female (and male) behaviour is allowed to flourish unchecked, where we see clearly that the "good" girls are really just bad girls in disguise.

2. Mate Guarding Is Excessive

With little or no restraint on female hypergamous behaviour, Vegas, more than anywhere, is a place where women are able to reject men at will until they find the highest value one possible to have sex with. As a consequence, mate guarding is way over the top. I found myself wondering idly whether the trend for men to work out until they are huge, which is slightly more prevalent in America than in Europe, is a subconscious response to the problem of women's unbridled tendency to cheat.

At another day party I went to buy a drink. By the bar, two fairly unattractive Asian girls in bikinis were grinding their asses up against the crotches of two gaudily tattooed men in coloured snapbacks. One of the men noticed me and signaled for me not to come closer.

“You’re cool there brah. That’s cool – right there.”

“I’m buying a drink,” I said. Of course, I had had no intention of trying to break into the set and steal his girl. She was probably a six at best.

“That’s cool man. Nice pompadour by the way. I used to have my hair like that.”

“Thanks.”

He was trying to warn me off, but there was no need—his girl wasn’t attractive enough to bother hitting on. But when men are reduced to mate-guarding mediocre women, it is a clear signal that female hypergamy is out of control. If Vegas is the logical endpoint of the desires sublimated in everyday Western society, then expect to see more of this in normal life soon.

3. Contemporary Hip Hop Lyrics Reflect Precisely The Reality Of Female Behavior

Rather like dreams, the movies, TV shows, books and music of our culture operate as a kind of societal subconscious, revealing our innermost desires. This thought struck me at Surrender Nightclub, as I stood by the bar fending off hookers and listening to DJ Mustard bumping contemporary hip hop joints.

It’s no secret that mainstream rap has, for the most part, become significantly less intelligent in the last fifteen years or so. If you compare something like the arrest segment in Jay Z’s 99 Problems, with its clever wordplay and sharp social commentary to, say, Loyal by Chris Brown then you’ll get the point (although Loyal is actually imbued with red-pill truth). But what rap does do is celebrate the actual (sometimes secret) desires of its audience. Take these lines from DJ Mustard's Down on Me:

> Yea, my bitch drop it down for me
> Take it to the room she go down on it
> And she said she got a friend for me
> And she ain't afraid to spin on me
> Told that ho bring more E, smoke joints to the face
> My bitch so bad I fuck without a condom
> Put it all in and I got her running
> Hit it good got her walking funny
> And she said it ain't about the money

You can bemoan the fact that the art of lyric writing is dead and that these verses are about as subtle as a bottle of Dom Perignon in the face, but the point is that girls love this stuff. I saw more women twerking to these "misogynist" lyrics than there were guys there. Why? Because contrary to what feminists would have us believe, women secretly love being characterised as bad girls who will do E, have threesomes and fuck hot alpha rappers without a condom because that is the reality of female nature.

In a room full of girls dancing to tracks like this, the message is the message, hidden in plain sight—women are sexual beings who are happy to act slutty with exciting alpha men, while simultaneously denying their sluttiness to beta rubes.

4. Vegas Is A Great Place to Get Laid

For this reason, Vegas is a great place to get laid. There are thousands of hot girls there with more arriving every day during peak times—a constantly renewable resource. They are willingly entering an environment where whatever paltry constraints are normally on their behavior are lifted, and they are able to act like the ho in DJ Mustard's song.

Realize that Vegas is a place where the very worst excesses of Western culture are magnified and celebrated, and that knowing this you can benefit and relax. Let someone else worry about the decline for a while. Stick on a suit (I got opened loads in XS wearing a light grey jacket, white button-down shirt and a colorful pocket square) man up, approach like a machine, and you really can't fail to get laid. Western culture may be in flames around us, but we might as well enjoy the party.

Want to learn how attract and seduce beautiful women in any environment? Then click here.

Read More: The Simplest Way To Approach Hot Girls For Newbies

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

An Insider’s Guide To The Masculine Profession Of Software Development

September 3, 2014 | by Hawk Writes | Link | Original Link

It’s no secret that people in the IT and software engineering fields are in high demand. We’re willing to take a nebulous idea and transform it into something concrete, as well as interface with our client to add new features. It’s no easy task, but we must be incredibly skilled in order to ensure that the general ideas of our clients become specific features in our applications.

As a beginning developer, the most powerful languages you can learn are C, C++, PHP, Java, and VB.NET (I know this one is a pain-in-the-ass but it ties into ASP.NET nicely for web applications). If you can get yourself squared-away with IIS (Internet Information Services by Microsoft) or Apache Web Server you’re pretty much all set when it comes to web technologies. In addition, PHP can pair nicely with Apache and VB.NET/ASP.NET can pair nicely with IIS.

As a developer myself I know the technologies enough to realize when someone has a decent skillset outside of what they specify on their resume. As both a hiring individual and one who performs the work myself, I have a unique perspective on the kinds of abilities that are required in order to succeed.

What’s the best route to go for web developers?

When I’m hiring for web developers I tend to look for people who are familiar with four components of the LAMP stack. The break-down is as follows:

- L: Linux
- A: Apache Web Server (httpd)
- M: MySQL
- P: PHP or Perl (preferably PHP, though)

I generally tell the new developers to learn PHP and how it can interface with MySQL as a beginning step. This kind of relationship comprises the majority of the web applications that a programmer will write and it's a good idea to learn how these things interact at the database-connector interface level. You'll probably never use it at that point but you'll understand why things work the way they do.

I generally give bonus points for knowing PHP frameworks such as Laravel, CakePHP, or CodeIgniter since it shows experience with industry standards.

What's the best route to go for application developers?

When I'm hiring for application developers I tend to look for a proven skillset with desktop and server-side applications. These can usually be broken down into the following:

- C, C++, or Java (some kind of application-specific language)
- Ability to tie-in to a database connection (JDBC through Java, for example)
- Understanding of how client-server applications communicate through a socket interface
- Creation of user interfaces
- Existing framework knowledge (possibly wxWidgets for C and C++, Spring Framework for Java)
- If you're into building games you can get into the LWJGL (Lightweight Java Game Library) for Java

I'm a bit harder on desktop application developers than I am on web developers since there are more things they need to take into account to be sure they don't completely destroy the end-user's system. With Java this isn't such a problem, but C and C++ will allow you to write to any memory address you specify, so you have to take special care to ensure you don't screw-up something unintentionally.

My proof here is anecdotal. Many years ago I was working on a C++ program and I accidentally wrote to the wrong memory address in my application. Oddly, that address corresponded to something my video card had reserved for its usage. My computer tower began to emit smoke and my monitor blacked-out. C and C++ offer zero memory protection, whereas Java will attempt to prevent you from doing something that boneheaded. Make sure you learn Java first to get the mechanics and style of the language before moving on to languages that can actually damage your system if you make a critical mistake.

Experience over Education

The single thing that completely blows my boss's mind and generally gets me into some degree of trouble with Human Resources regarding job candidates is my strict adherence to the notion of “A college degree is meaningless.”

In the eyes of most hiring committees, a degree is the equivalent of feasting on ambrosia and sitting next to Zeus on Mount Olympus. In tech and especially software development we take a significantly different stance: proven experience doing what we need is much better than merely knowing about it or practicing it at an academic level. This isn’t the case for all committees, mind you, but anyone worth their salt who hires developers will take the same approach. Why? We want to make sure the work can be performed; merely sitting in a classroom for four or five years listening to some professor drone on about systems that haven’t been relevant for the last twenty years doesn’t tell us anything about your ability.

I’d gladly hire someone with only a high school education who has years of development experience related to what I need over a recent graduate from Harvard or MIT whose only work shown on his resume is some bullshit internship or a minimum-wage job at Starbucks. I was actually working as a developer while I was going to college and had already amassed years of experience even before then because I took initiative and wanted to learn.

Admittedly, though, some places require that Bachelor’s of Science piece of paper that doesn’t say anything about your qualifications. If you find yourself wanting to get both a theoretical and practical knowledge about software engineering at the same time, your best bet is to find a college that offers a Bachelor’s of Science in either Informatics or Software Engineering. Learn on your own and expand outside of your classes too, since what you’ll learn in class barely scratches the surface of what you’ll be asked to make in the “real world” of programming.

You’ll want to stay away from a Computer Science degree, oddly enough, since it strays too far from the coding side and goes very in-depth on the hardware, operating system mechanics, and generally how a computer works. I know I don’t care about logic gates or the op-codes for an IA-32 chipset and neither should you. You shouldn’t have to worry about any of that since it won’t matter to you (or your boss) when you’re coding.

Visiting a place like Fry’s Electronics a few times a month is a good way to find new books and stay current with your development skills. Technology is an ever-changing field and you’ll want to stay as close to the curve as possible. The best place to keep up-to-date is in the books section at Fry’s; go through their books (especially the “Black Book,” “Bible,” or “For Dummies” series) and see what interests you. It’s considerably easier to figure out what catches your eye here than it is when you’re struggling to think of search terms on Google. If you don’t feel like buying a book and having a hard copy, then just note what the subject matter is and go find it on the Internet later.

Getting Hired

This is of course the most difficult part of breaking into this field. When you’re just starting-out you’ll need to focus on cultivating your skills and creating small applications that demonstrate basic knowledge of your chosen language. Once you're confident in creating small applications you can move on to intermediate applications like basic games. Finally, you can move on to advanced and large-scale applications that may utilize databases, client-server communications, web services, and the like.

Once you hit the end of your intermediate level and possibly the beginning of your advanced level you can choose to start looking for freelance work, since your skills may not yet be good enough for full-time employment utilizing that technology. Freelance work is the next-best thing to full-time employment based on how it pays; you can also usually get away with a lot of screw-ups too. In addition, you can place these projects on your resume to demonstrate proven experience with what you know.

Finally, the best part is that you are more than welcome to drop a project and pursue other clients if you are having too much trouble or your client has been getting on your last nerve regularly; you can't generally do that with a full-time job since it would reflect negatively on an entire company. With freelance development it happens all the time; just make sure you part ways professionally and move on to the next project.

If you decide to go the full-time employment route one of the best things you can tell a hiring committee is that you're a quick learner. The next-best thing you can tell such a committee is that you can read formal documentation and API specifications. Of course, you shouldn't say either of these things if they aren't true (we can figure this out very quickly on-the-job) but these two abilities are highly sought-after in a budding developer.

The third-best skill in your repertoire should be your ability to talk to a client directly and figure out how to translate what he says into a formal specification for a system. The reason I mentioned Informatics and Software Engineering as desired degrees (if you choose to go that route) is that you gain an ability to do so implicitly during your time in the programs.

Taken in conjunction with your abilities as a programmer, the three aforementioned skills will absolutely set you ahead of most other candidates. The stereotype of the programmer with no personality is absolutely true; instead, be the guy I feel like I can go have a beer with after work.

Hawk's Typical Day

After grabbing my morning coffee and flirting with the manager at the coffee place near my office I'm up at my desk checking my email. The other developer and I shoot the shit for a little bit as we settle in for our day. I answer a few emails from my clients and my boss, and then I'm off working on my latest project through my development environment.

I can't stress this enough: don't be the guy without a personality. Nobody likes having to put up with you during the day and you'll be seen as the kind of person who can't talk to anyone because "he's just a programmer." You have to make sure you jell with the rest of the team; once you're in the team environment your personality is almost as important as your skills. You don't have to be the clown of the office but at least make sure you can carry on a conversation while making eye-contact.

Throughout the day I meet with my clients, tell a few jokes with them (this helps inspire confidence and lets them see me as a regular guy instead of “that boring programmer”), and get their new specifications as the project gains momentum. Most of my day is spent writing code, but I’ve also made a group of non-technical friends at the office. We often have lunch together in order to relax for an hour and see each other as regular people.

Conclusion

The IT field centered around Software Engineering will always need people to fill the demands of its clients. The reward of being in such a field involves the satisfaction of knowing you took a difficult project from start to completion. In addition, you’re looking at a potentially large paycheck since writing code isn’t an easy thing to do; once you learn it, your potential to be in-demand by major companies skyrockets.

Read More: Now You Need Game To Get A Job

Hawk Writes
HW is a badass software engineer with an old soul. He hates the entitlement mentality and victim complex so readily displayed without conflict in our current state of affairs as well as the feminized approach to education, the workforce, and society. You can view his articles at Hawk Writes and follow/harass him at @HawkWritesStuff on Twitter.

The Delusional Nature of Women

September 4, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

A woman's mind and character, like her sense of purpose and self-worth, is determined and governed largely by her sexual market value. A stunner who is flooded by male attention has no need to be fair or logical in her relations with us: her power derives from the fact that we, wanting to fuck her, line up to give her attention and to do things for her, inflating and distorting her vile ego in consequence.

This is, essentially, an irrational affair, and until she approaches middle age, men will continue to give her that extreme power, no matter how she conducts herself. In contrast, the relations of men in civil society have historically been rather duty-bound and abstract: reason has been necessary to order that things should be thus and so, so that the overwhelming self-interest that drives every individual would not be too much for the whole, and thus destroy the social unit, whatever the form it took.

But sexual desire is not a matter of reason, or order, or obligation. Once his needs for food, drink and shelter have been met, the chief interest of the straight man is women, objects of desire through and through. Yet neither sexual pursuit nor its reception is inherently logical. Both genders act mainly on impulse, their motives frequently unconscious. But while a man historically had to deal mostly with other men in order to meet common material needs (easily a cause of war and strife), so that he often had to be at least somewhat fair-minded in his relations, a woman had only to be fairly attractive in order to get her needs met, and in some cases, to get away with virtually whatever she wanted. And hence, then, that universal truth about stunners, whether here in the States or abroad: the more attractive, the more cuntish—almost no exceptions.

Since, then, the mind and character of woman is a result not of reason, but of an irrational force—her sexual market value—it follows that in her relations with men, her behavior will be determined mostly by feeling, impulse and caprice; or, if she's hot enough to get away with it, by her essential cuntishness. And so we men should not expect women to take personal responsibility for their actions, for where a man feels a sense of justice—abstract and rational—a woman's mind rather follows its whims and delusions. She is, to borrow a fine aphorism from Nietzsche, "foam tossed to and fro on shallow water."

Again, being driven by an irrational force—her sexual market value—a woman has, as a general rule, no sense of honor or loyalty or obligation. Inherently abstract, and requiring a steady will to carry them out (which women, with their inconstant nature, also lack), these things are fundamentally masculine in character. It's often been noticed, for example, that keeping their word generally means little to women; they prefer to avoid such discomfort, in just the same way that they are not inclined to assert themselves.

When faced with a compelling argument or even empirical evidence which shows her to be wrong beyond dispute, a woman will usually just devise some rationalization or other, happily supported in this bizarre endeavor by every other stupid bitch in her phone, from mom to BFF. This "girl power" is, in fact, a great herd passion of women, comparable in significance to their profound interest in Kim Kardashian and whoever is fucking whom in Hollywood.

Again, doing the right thing, for women, is a matter not so much of reason as of instinct and feeling. Hence "unconditional love" is a distinctly motherly thing. And hence it is that the moral judgments of women are frequently dubious, just as their characters are by nature fickle and unreliable.

In the age of smartphones and social media, women receive such a massive amount of male attention that is quite rare for a 7 and up not to be a cunt, for the simple reason that she can be. So what that she pisses you off? You are just one among an endless number of suitors. And as we see from children and women alike, human nature, as a general rule, will incline to do whatever it can, so long as there are no apparent consequences.

Today women are surrounded by so many white knights and beta orbiters that the rare man who not only doesn't take their shit, but even "presumes" to call them on it, is likely to be deemed abusive, or a creep, or who knows what. There is a collision here between entitled expectations and non-beta male behavior: here the hamster will only point touchy fingers; it will not itself be accountable, for its only pressing interest lies in looking pretty and being seen.

An Example

Let's say, for example, that you and your sweetheart are having difficult times, her cuntish behavior becoming too much for you to take. You can present her with an eminently reasonable explanation of how she is fucked up and needs to change. Yet even if you do so with tremendous tact and patience, she probably will distort your views anyway, employing her powerful sense of her sexual market value in order to do so. It's not that she's been a bitch or a brat or whatever. You're the problem, and she is "not going to settle."

A woman will rarely demonstrate any understanding of how her own poor behavior caused or influenced you to respond in kind. Simple cause and effect, as it concerns moral agency, is far beyond her. All she knows is that she doesn't like how you made her feel, so you're a bad guy. Besides, "everything happens for a reason," or "it wasn't meant to be," or "you weren't the right one after all," and so on, for her mind is little more than a bundle of rosy delusions and clichés. She is a kind of media way station for the cherished nonsense of our ongoing Western decline.

A Woman's Word Is Meaningless

Having been a bouncer on and off for about a decade, I have had countless women ask me to throw men out. A man goes up to a woman and, because she is pretty, tries to chat her up and offers to buy her a drink. He is, however, a little goofy or awkward, and perhaps stares a millisecond to0 long at those tits carefully bursting from her too-tight blouse. Ergo, he is a creep—get him, bouncers!

It's a good thing for the men at the bars and clubs where I work that a woman's word is generally meaningless to me. If I don't see the "incident" happen, and if the man's body language and tone (both of which I can read well, like a seasoned cop or lawyer) don't suggest culpability, then I am not taking that whiny white bitch's word for it, since I know that, as a general rule, there is nothing in life less credible than an angry woman's word.

If a woman is not essentially delusional in her relations with you, but is actually just and responsible, then it is likely that you have some leverage against her: you are a 9 on the looks scale, while she is only a 7, or you're well-off, while her broke ass depends on you. Feminists—who are never attractive—may say women want equality, but the truth is that, deep down, women, insofar as they are attractive, want the freedom to get away with whatever they can, all while shirking the consequences of their actions. Their sexual market value (which is a matter of superiority) is what allows them to do so.

Of course, the delusional nature of women applies in their relations with each other as well. Female-dominated professions—nursing and teaching, for example—are commonly marked by a distinctly female sort of politics, endlessly catty and petty. Women, whether they are stunners or corpulent slobs, need a reason to hate other women, and though it's claimed that the new girl isn't a "team player," the real problem is that she is prettier than this or that Americunt who isn't receiving a comparable amount of male attention, and hence validation.

How To Deal With This Delusional Nature

As a man used to dealing with your fellow man, you find yourself miserably perplexed by that hottie's clearly fucked-up behavior. You've been so good to her: How can she be so bitchy in response? Or so ungrateful? Or so flaky? And so on.

This is where game, and game only, to be sure, can set you on the right path. Analytical reason is not your best ally here. Alpha reason is. For that stupid bitch doesn't know what the fuck she's doing any more than her behavior makes sense to you (or her). In response to the characteristically unjust and dishonorable behavior of women, an alpha must, as every student of the manosphere knows, not care much about them; he must steel himself against their invariable cuntishness.

Don't try to reason with crazy. Instead, mock it:

- "Is that attitude how you graduated at the top of your class in charm school?"
- "Damn, Babe, are you that eager to be spanked tonight?"
- "Still talking? I would have thought you'd make some sense by now."

Or, say nothing at all. Just look at that whiny white bitch with bemusement, then declare, "Gotta go, Doll," [self-satisfied smile or wink]. Unshakably composed, you just don't give a fuck, and there's nothing that delights her deep masochism more than that. Being that rare man who doesn't need them: this is a kind of superb opposite game to play with women period, and with beautiful attention whores in particular.

In not giving a fuck, it helps tremendously to do two things: never stop approaching—I always have another hoe in my phone—and never lose sight of the fact that, if you are a real man—physically and mentally strong, and therefore self-assured—then there's not a woman on the planet who is your equal.

Why should I care about being flaked on by some 23 year old Americunt who barely knows whether she is coming or going? I have the great writers and philosophers by memory, but when I check out this little brat's trifling Facebook or Twitter, I feel disgusted by my desire to have sex with her, so unattractive are the contents of her mind. Why should I chase, or care about, or assign great value to that which is so obviously inferior to me?

Read More: Women Have No Sense Of Justice

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

How To Get A Good Education Without Going To College

September 4, 2014 | by Reinhardt | Link | Original Link

Is college worth the price? Will college be a waste of time? These are questions that people today ask themselves starting in high school, perhaps more than at any point in the last 30 years. It continues after high school, where one still contemplates whether the risk is worth the possible rewards. I pondered them myself after graduating in 2011 and, after having a brief stint in community college, I made the decision not to bother at all with college. There were too many reasons to be skeptical; as one should be.

College tuition continues to increase along with student debt. If you get some sort of scholarship or grant then you don't have to worry about this. But for the rest of us, some or much of this money comes out of our own pockets. Is it really worth paying off debt well into your 30's or even 40's? Shockingly, some people have reached mid-life and still have student debt. Even more shocking, the growth rate of college tuition has outpaced medical care, housing prices, and even family incomes by a wide margin.

Education has also been significantly dumbed-down over the past several decades, where colleges have opted for student (customer) retention rather than true education. These students will suffer more when they enter the work force. It goes without saying that there are many degrees today that are useless, such as liberal arts and gender studies. Not as much emphasis is placed on the useful subjects that can benefit everyone, such as physics, math, chemistry, foreign languages, etc. In fact, if you look at the worldwide rankings you will see that the United States (despite spending among the most on education) isn't even ranked in the top 10 in math, reading, or science.

We're below average in every fucking category. Isn't that sad? People here in the United States like to boast about being the world's superpower, but the only thing keeping us in that position is military power. It's certainly not our education system. This doesn't bode well for the young millennials like me, not to mention the forthcoming generations.

Some people like to go to college to "find themselves." This never made any sense to me. Why waste 4 to 6 years and thousands of dollars discovering who you are? All it should take is a bit of introspection and confidence before putting things into action. Besides, some people tend to figure these kinds of things out faster than others. Not all of us want to waste our 20s dicking around.

Some guys choose the military route while others go to a trade school or go on the entrepreneurial route. But there are some guys out there that are still interested in obtaining a form of education before they do these things. For those men, there is some good news: knowledge is now more decentralized than it has ever been in human history. It is extremely easy to access the kind of information you want, and I have included a few recommendations:

Coursera.org is full of online courses from colleges around the world. Classes range from calculus and engineering to science and computer science; you are likely to find something worth your time. Once registered, you can start the class any time you want on your own schedule. When you are finished with a course, you get a certificate of recognition. Some courses may require you to have an understanding of a different subject before jumping in. You can't be poor in math but jump into engineering.

Udacity.com is similar to Coursera; but focuses more on tech-minded subjects such as software engineering, artificial intelligence, and programming. Codecademy teaches how to code interactively. Like Coursera, you may have to go through a different course if you are rusty. For example, some understanding of statistics 101 are required for the introduction to artificial intelligence.

Duolingo, busuu, and yesjapan are for those interested in learning foreign languages. The first link doesn't have every language, but is good for those wanting to start Spanish, German, French, Italian, etc. If you live in the United States I would consider learning some Spanish for the sake of practicality, since it's becoming more important in our daily lives. The second link, Bsuu.com, has certain languages such as Chinese, Japanese, and Arabic which aren't available on Duolingo. The third link (YesJapan) is focused solely on Japanese.

If you live near a library, you can also avail yourself of the books and other possible learning tools there. Lastly, youtube and other sites allow us to take advantage of free lectures. The best part about all these websites is that they are organized, helpful, and free. By simply applying yourself and spending time on self-directed learning, you will find yourself with an education that far surpasses those who opt to spend tens of thousands of dollars at a degree mill.

Read More: Take College Courses Online For Free

Reinhardt
Reinhardt is an old soul looking to make his impact on the world. His interest include business, robotics, engineering, fitness, swimming, and more.

Need Advice? Ask The Men Behind Return Of Kings

September 4, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

ROK has grown significantly over the last two years, to the point where its writers and commenters represent a distinct think tank of red pill wisdom and masculinity. We've touched on many areas and have received various questions from the readership as our topic base has broadened.

With that in mind, we've decided to begin a weekly reader mailbag feature. If you are curious about or need advice on any topic you've seen written on at ROK, it's fair game. This includes game, girls, sex, money, literature, travel, life advice, and many more. You are likely familiar with Roosh's background, but there are also other men on staff who own their own business, hold professional degrees, have traveled to many countries, and have significant life experience to draw upon.

Ever wondered how Quintus Curtius managed to read every Greek philosophy text, or what 2Wycked sees as the three most influential television shows in modern society? This is your chance to get advice from some of the best writers and minds in the manosphere on a variety of subjects. Email with your questions or comments. You can also use this anonymous form.

We can't promise that a specific author will answer your question, but if yours is selected then someone on ROK's writing staff will respond to you in the weekly post. Questions that are intelligibly written and applicable to many men will receive the highest priority, as well as readers who drop a donation in our donation box (mention this in your email). We look forward to hearing how we can help.

Read More: The Worst Advice Ever For Strong Men

Winston Smith

Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

Men Do Not Get A Choice In Having A Child

September 5, 2014 | by Kyle Trouble | Link | Original Link

Do you prefer raw dog sex to using a condom? I see everybody's hand up.

Are you absolutely terrified of getting some random one night stand pregnant, then being stuck with a shitty mother for your children? I see the hands again.

Is a decent chunk of the reason you commit to a girl so that you can ditch the condoms? Yup, hands in the air again.

Can you trust your girlfriend, wife, or committed partner to not try to get pregnant without your knowledge?

Absolutely not.

Here's why.

Friend #1

Him: 33

Wife: 37

This is one of my best friends whom I've known forever. They've been married for about a year and a half now, dated for a year and a half prior to that (give or take). Last September, they had their first child. Then, in February, they were pregnant again. Their children will be just over a year apart.

It was, by all means, an "accident."

And by accident, I mean on his end. Apparently when a woman is breast feeding, doctors give them a lower dosage of birth control and warn the women that they should use other forms of contraception as it is a *ve*ry low dose. My friend's wife neglected to tell him this, and here he is with child #2 right around the corner. There is no doubt in my mind that this was a manipulatively planned scenario by my friend's wife. Granted I'm not too fond of her to begin with, but she's 37 and the clock was ticking on the first child, and now it's up to hyper speed with this second one.

This friend makes over six figures and still has to work overtime to make the bills.

Friend #2

Him: 38

Her: 31

This guys sits next to me at work. They had their first child a little over a year and a half ago. He just told me this week that his wife decided to go to the doctor and take out her IUD—and didn't bother to tell him for two months.

When he found out, he was understandably pissed—which set her off. Now he's pulling out.

Every. Damn. Time.

Obviously, this makes no sense, but apparently she screamed obscenities at him and said, "I want another child! You are depriving me of the ability to have another child! You are horrible!", etc., etc. They are having all sorts of issues about this now in their marriage.

Notice how all of her statements involve the words "I" and "Me." Not once does she think about her husband, their current (stable, but not comfortable) financial situation, and hell—THE OTHER CHILD THEY HAVE.

Clearly, their oldest has grown out of his "trophy baby" stage, and this woman needs another baby to show off and have people go goo-goo-ga-ga at.

This friend and his wife have a combined household income of over $120k+ but still are renting an apartment and not saving any money.

Friend #3

We're 2-for-2 so far, which you could call a coincidence. But 3-for-3? No way.

Another work friend. Their first child is also about a year and a half old. His situation is much like Friend #1. After the birth of their first child, his wife went on a low dosage of birth control. Another disclaimer about this birth control at low doses is that you must breast feed in order for it to be remotely effective. Well, their son is inconsistent with that—but she never told him that little caveat about the birth control.

In addition, she also switched birth control brands and stopped taking the pill for a few weeks—again, never mentioned it to him.

Now, he got lucky and she's not pregnant. But they did have a scare or two. Supposedly, she has not flat-out said anything about wanting another child, and seems to be more sane than the other two.

This friend works and makes about $70k. His wife does not work.

The Takeaway

Let my friends serve as a lesson for you gentlemen out there dating girls who want kids. Be careful. I realize condoms suck, but it doesn't seem like a bad option, to be honest, considering the alternative. At least keep an eye on her birth control supply, and make sure her IUD is secure when you're fucking raw.

Unfortunately, there is no other option. Sure, you can try one of the male birth control pills cooked up in a lab in India, get invasive surgery on your balls in the form of a vasectomy, or you're simply at the mercy of a woman who will be hormonal and lack any good sense of judgment. On top of that, you can almost guarantee she'll have her own selfish agenda, with no regard whatsoever for you or any current children she may have.

Perhaps, someday, things will change.

Read More: The Price I Paid For Helping A Single Mom's Child

Kyle Trouble
Kyle is an entrepreneur and nomad who has been living abroad since 2016. He blogs at This Is Trouble. Follow him on Facebook.

Nikola Tesla Explains Why He Never Married

September 5, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I stumbled upon an old article in the Galveston Daily News that interviewed Tesla for his views on women. Even though he was alive over 100 years ago, the observations he made on the deteriorating nature of women seem to have gone its full course, meaning that the article certainly would not be published today. We are the unfortunate men who are forced to deal with Tesla's disturbingly accurate predictions. Here is the article in full:

—

WHEN a man who has made a name for himself deliberately chooses to remain a bachelor the world is naturally curious to know what the reasons were that impelled him to this choice.

Marriage has come to be considered the natural thing for every normal man, and when some pre-eminent man shows a firm determination to sidestep it everybody wonders whether his superior intelligence has revealed to him some fatal defects in the institution of matrimony which are not apparent to the average person.

But the public's curiosity in this respect is seldom gratified. Most of the distinguished bachelors try to pass off their bachelorhood as a joke, saying that it is not a matter of choice, but because they have never been able to find a woman who would marry them. As a rule, they are singularly averse to giving any serious reasons for their failure to become husbands.

Nikola Tesla, the great scientist and inventor, is a striking exception to this rule. In a recent interview with a representative of this newspaper he frankly explains why he has never married and why he probably never will marry.

And in connection with his explanation he presents some ideas about woman's freedom and what he thinks it is sure to lead to that will be read with interest by those who agree with him as well as by the many who will not.

In the past the reason why Mr. Tesla never married was because his estimation of woman placed her on such a lofty pedestal that he could never bring himself to feel worthy of her. Now that she has, as he feels, stepped down from her pedestal and bartered all her noblest qualities for what is called her “freedom,” he is even more disinclined to matrimony than he was before.

Although of course Mr. Tesla is too gallant a gentleman to say it in so many words, his comments let it be inferred that he thinks the new woman almost as far beneath him as the one of other days was above him. According to his views, the sex has rushed from one extreme to another of quite a different kind, and in the plunge it has left for Mr. Tesla and other bachelors who think as he does no “happy medium” such as Josiah Allen’s wife used to declare one of the essentials to happiness.

“I had always thought of woman,” says Mr. Tesla, “as possessing those delicate qualities of mind and soul that made her in these respects far superior to man. I had put her on a lofty pedestal, figuratively speaking, and ranked her in certain important attributes considerably higher than man. I worshiped at the feet of the creature I had raised to this height, and, like every true worshiper, I felt myself unworthy of the object of my worship.

“But all this was in the past. Now the soft-voiced gentle woman of my reverent worship has all but vanished. In her place has come the woman who thinks that her chief success in life lies in making herself as much as possible like man–in dress, voice and actions, in sports and achievements of every kind.”

In those words the great electrical genius sums up the reasons for his bachelorhood.

Some who read them will urge that his view of womankind is distorted by the years he has spent in the laboratory, dealing with inanimate things and developing perhaps an abnormal shyness which acts as an insuperable barrier to marriage. Others will say that the very fact of his detachment from the ordinary routine of life makes him all the better qualified to point out its defects and to criticize the change for the worse which he believes new conditions have brought to womankind.

“Women,” says Mr. Tesla, “are becoming stronger than men, both physically and mentally.

“The world has experienced many tragedies, but to my mind the greatest tragedy of all is the present economic condition wherein women strive against men, and in many cases actually succeed in usurping their places in the professions and in industry. This growing tendency of women to overshadow the masculine is a sign of a deteriorating civilization.

“Woman’s determined competition with man in the business world is breaking down some of the best traditions–things which have proved the moving factors in the world’s slow but substantial progress.

“Practically all the great achievements of man until now have been inspired by his love and devotion to woman. Man has aspired to great things because some woman believed in him, because he wished to command her admiration and respect. For these reasons he has fought for her and risked his life and his all for her time and time again.

“Perhaps the male in human society is useless. I am frank to admit that I don’t know. If women are beginning to feel this way about it–and there is striking evidence at hand that they do–then we are entering upon the cruelest period of the world’s history.

“Our civilization will sink to a state like that which is found among the bees, ants and other insects–a state wherein the male is ruthlessly killed off. In this matriarchal empire which will be established the female rules. As the female predominates, the males are at her mercy. The male is considered important only as a factor in the general scheme of the continuity of life.

“The tendency of women to push aside man, supplanting the old spirit of cooperation with him in all the affairs of life, is very disappointing to me.

“Woman’s independence and her cleverness in obtaining what she wants in the business world is breaking down man’s spirit of independence. The old fire he once experienced at being able to achieve something that would compel and hold a woman’s devotion is turning to ashes.

“Women don’t seem to want that sort of thing to-day. They appear to want to control and govern. They want man to look up to them, instead of their looking up to him.”

Mr. Tesla is not given to making statements that he cannot prove. His life’s work has been based on logic, not on guesses.

In voicing his gloomy views of modern life Mr. Tesla says his observations are not confined to the women of this country. Conditions abroad, he says, suggest that the same tendency is world-wide. Having always regarded woman as a super-being, he expresses great sadness over the change he thinks the last few years have brought in her.

“I am considering this question not merely from the standpoint of a man,” he points out. “I am thinking of the woman’s side of it.

“As we contemplate any change, we naturally take into consideration the results that may follow such an innovation. One of the results to my mind is quite a pathetic one. Woman, herself, is really the victim instead of, as she thinks, the victor. Contentment is absent from her life. She is ambitious, often far beyond her natural equipment, to attain the thing she wants. She too frequently forgets that all women cannot be prima donnas and motion picture stars.

“Woman’s discontent makes the life of the present day still more overstressed. The high pitch given to existence by people who are restless and dissatisfied because they fail to achieve things wholly out of proportion to the health and talent with which Nature has endowed them is a bad thing for the world.

“It seems to me that women are not particularly happy in this newly found freedom, in this new competition which they are waging so persistently against men in business and the professions and even in sport. The question that naturally arises is, whether the women themselves are the gainers or the losers.

“Discontent makes for cranks and unnatural people. There seems to be an uncommon number of them about to-day. This is one of the reasons I remain apart from the crowds.

The public, or semi-public, character is the target for all sorts of attacks and unpleasant communications.

“For example, I used to receive all sorts of strange notes, many of them letters from cranks threatening my life, because they had read about my experiments in manufacturing lightning bolts. They wrote that they believed I was using these lightning flashes to kill them!

“It seems to me that anything which adds to the great discontent which we observe on every side to-day must be a bad influence on our life. Women who keep themselves agitated by their tremendous ambition to beat man at his game are losing at the same time something that counts for more in the end, it seems to me, than the empty honors that success in business or one of the professions can ever give.

“The power of the true woman is so great that I believe if a beautiful woman–that is to say, one beautiful in spirit, in manner and in thought, in fact, beautiful in every respect, a sort of goddess–were to appear suddenly on earth, she could command the whole world. Her leadership, I believe, would be universally recognized.

“History has given us many examples of the wonderful influence exerted by unusual women. Among these have been the mothers of great men. But their influence lay not in their determination to outdo man, or even to compete with him.

“Perhaps because woman is a finer and more highly sensitized instrument she knows by instinct her power and understands that the extent of it lies in the high position she takes for herself. But the superior never descends to the level of the commonplace.”

These views of Nikola Tesla will be received with great interest, whether one agrees or not with his idea that woman in her new role is a sinister force that is going to pull down to ruin our whole social structure. He is generally recognized as one of the greatest mentalities of the present day.

Twenty years ago Tesla astonished the world by flashing a wireless message clear around the globe. His experimental work paved the way for the radio age in which we are now living. Many scientists think it quite possible that one of his highly sensitized machines actually caught signals from Mars.

For several years past he has been living in comparative seclusion in the Colorado Rockies, devoting himself to the perfection of two or three inventions which he expects will revolutionize methods of transportation and communication. He is almost ready to explain to the world a way of transmitting electrical energy without the use of wires.

This will enable the energy from some great source of power like Niagara Falls to be quickly and economically transmitted to any desired part of the earth–and, perhaps, some day to Mars and other planets.

Some philosopher has said that it is as perilous for a man to say he will never marry as for a physician to try to predict the exact hour of a person’s death. Mr. Tesla is not an old man. Perhaps he will live long enough to find some woman who will be able to convince him that she has attained her new freedom without sacrificing any of the womanly qualities which he so greatly admires.

-end-

—

The irony is that Tesla is a favorite of modern day millennials who “love” science and underdogs, yet I wonder what they would think of him when he has so disparaged the poor victimized female that they believe are being held down by the all-powerful patriarchy.

Read Next: The Lives Of Great Men As Moral Instruction

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

I Hope Tool Releases An Album This Year

September 5, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Background

All this talk about the Islamic State has got me reminiscing about my second favorite country in the world, Iraq. This nostalgia also reminds me about something that seems like a lifetime ago, the last time the band Tool came out with an album. One day after a long afternoon of sightseeing in and around the city of Tikrit, I returned to my residence as the sun was setting. As I slid the barrel to my .50 caliber machine gun under my bed and then placed the receiver group next to it, I heard something very familiar yet very new to me play through the plywood wall.

As I heard the song (unknown to me at that time, called "Vicarious"), I asked my neighbor what he was listening to. He informed me that Tool had a new CD and there were five of them left at the PX by the by the Victory Inn DFAC. I decided cleaning the machine gun could wait, and hurried to pick up a copy. I fondly remember utilizing the built-in bifocal lenses of the cover to stare at many things. It was the year 2006.

What Is Tool?

Tool is a band fronted by a man who goes by the name Maynard James Keenan. The other members are Danny Carey, Adam Jones, and Justin Chancellor. The band has a larger than cult following due to their clever musical layouts, lyrics, and style. This band is quite popular considering its music is not available for sale on iTunes. The band's discography starts with with the EP "Opiate" in 1992 and continues to the album "10,000 Days" in 2006. With their independent thought, total creative control, and oddly-metered songs, Tool is unique in the music industry. Their lyrics are rather ingenious and inspire deep thought for the listener. Such creativity is not apparent to me with the current mainstream music on the radio.

Why I Like Tool

Aside from song titles as “Prison Sex” and “Sober,” the actual meter of the music caught my attention. Having studied music before, playing anything other than four beats a measure is much harder to play. When I heard “Guitar Hero: World Tour” and some Tool song on it, I purchased it immediately and had many purchases of extra guitars over the course of the year due to my frustrations playing “Vicarious.”

Sometimes when I go to the grocery store or to the coffee shop after of the gym, other men compliment me on my Tool t-shirts. It’s almost like a secret handshake of sorts because I live in the Bible Belt. These shirts are starting to get “well-worn” due to soaking up sweat and disinfectant spray at the gym and being bleached by the sun when running outside. This is another reason I hope Tool releases a new album this year, so I can score some new threads to look good in while working out.

Hope For The Future

It is well known that Tool’s front man has many other projects. Maynard James Keenan is also the front man of the band “A Perfect Circle.” He has another project called “Puscifer.” This along with other band members’ side projects could have led to a delay, but I do not know. I do know I was cool with the supposed it five-year plan implied by the scheduled releases starting with “Aenima” in 1996, to “Lateralus” in 2001, and “10,000 Days” in 2006.

Aside from the non-mainstream EBM groups out of Europe, there has been no music really worth buying in the last seven years. Where I live all the radio stations merely play manufactured top-40 music. One cannot make it through an hour scanning the radio without hearing the band “Nickelback.” One can only hope that there is a new Tool album to fill this void in the coming year’s time.

Read Next: I Hope They Serve Beer In The Cloud

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

War Machine's Cuckoldry Shows That Men Are Not Allowed To Feel Jealousy

September 6, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

Human history has been replete with instances of crimes of passion borne out of mate jealousy and sometimes-retroactive jealousy too, since antiquity. Religion has laid down specific laws dealing with infidelity or adultery. Human genitalia itself has also undergone years of evolution to deal with rival competition for the partner. In spite of the accepted permissiveness of modern culture, men as well as women continue to deal with jealousy in relationships, and sometimes commit crimes due to it.

After promiscuous pasts, retrograde jealousy comes to hound and destroy stable relationships—even in cases when both partners knew about each other's "colorful" pasts. For example, modern fem-centric permissive societies look at retrograde jealousy as an "illness" while stating that "people should get over each other's pasts in relationships."

> "Say you're interested in anal sex – not because you're all porno'd up on ass play, but because it's something you've never tried before and would like to see if you like it – but she's not interested because she's already done anal enough times with her previous lovers to know that it's not really her thing.
>
> Chivalrous reason obviously dictates that you don't pressure her into it. You suck it up and accept that you're not going to have that in your sex life. But is that fair?" – Thoughts about retroactive jealousy

The case gets worse in the case of actual cheating, or assumed infidelity, when it could lead to crimes of passion.

When modern civilizational liberalism clashes with inherent territorial instincts

A recent story making the headlines was the brutal beating of pornstar Christy Mack by her MMA fighter boyfriend, WarMachine. WarMachine, who has a history of violence in real life and not just in the ring, supposedly broke into Mack's house and found her with another man. He then proceeded to beat her visitor, and then turned onto her. Mack ran away from him naked, asking for help from neighbors before she was hospitalized with severe injuries. WarMachine was arrested a few days later, while Mack has been offered free facial reconstruction and plans to return to porn after full recovery.

Twitter

WarMachine had joked about raping Mack a year ago, possibly because he couldn't get laid enough within the relationship. He had even joked about 'killing' her in an interview last year. One could not stop wondering about her sanity and self-esteem when he said this next to her in interview. Why did she stay with him, break up later because he beat her and later hook up with him again? Didn't she realize what could be possibly coming if she pushed his wrong buttons?

Is this just another example of the average western women's mind and choice of men to date from? And we have to ask, would she go back to him in the future like she did before?

Predictably, the story was white-knighted and sensationalized by some to highlight supposed "societal desensitization to domestic violence and sexual abuse'"—of women only, of course—in recent years. Chuck Zito, one of the stars on Sons of Anarchy, recently backtracked to rescind the comments he made earlier about this story. In the original interview with TMZ, Zito said that what happened between Mack and WarMachine was none of his business, but if he caught his girlfriend cheating on him, he would have done the same thing War Machine allegedly did—that is, violently attack her. His comment met with a backlash, and his "apology" too was not accepted easily.

Why did WarMachine beat her? Out of lack of sex, or out of sheer suppressed jealous frustration? But if the second case is true, then should he?

In an earlier article, I have already explained that prostitution is no different from pornography. The men who choose to be romantically involved with women in either of those or other such professions must adopt a twisted concept of partner loyalty.

> "I don't look at it as sex, I look at it as a guy with his dick in my wife, but they're working and it's not emotional. She never orgasms in porn. That's for us. If it happened on the set, it would be a little weird."—What If Your Wife Were A Porn Star?

A lot of porn stars have their families (and mothers) who condone them, and sometimes even their boyfriends "encourage" them into the profession.

> "My mom couldn't give two fucks less…"
>
> – Mack, when asked about the reaction back home to her work in adult entertainment.

As from this nsfw interview and many such more there:

> Q: So how does your boyfriend handle it?
>
> A: "He's ok with it. He's the one who really motivated me. He said, if it makes me happy, I'm good and I can do it!"
>
> Q: Since you have a boyfriend, how often do you have sex off camera?
>
> A: Every day. (laughs). When I come home from shooting, I'm tired and the maximum he can get is a blowjob. (laughs)

Acceptance of such women into "relationships" only works for a man when he has actually killed off all remnants of the male jealousy and territorial instincts which Nature has programmed into his animal brain. Logically, he shouldn't expect sexual loyalty from such women whose lifestyle he already knows about, and neither should he exhibit instinctual territorial jealousy or anger.

Such a man would see his woman thirstily swallowing cum from random men, getting sexually spit-roasted by a train of men who'd spit and urinate on, slap and spank her while she squeals or trash talks in pleasure. He would see her anus get distended hideously at the end of an anal creampie with cum dripping out of it, which she licks off the floor on-screen. Yet he would accept her because of "love."

Is loyalty today just an attention-whoring tattoo?

I always wondered: how would such a man's male honor and integrity be when he meets her "work colleagues" who ravaged her on-screen? How would he feel when his friends or random people mockingly ask him for a chance to bang his girlfriend's anus—even if it may be for money? In short, he has to pimp not only his woman, but his honor even more, day in, day out wherever he goes. Even pimps don't fall in love with their bitches because of this very reason. The green monster of instinctual territorial jealousy ingrained in male nature would raise its head sooner or later.

But the glaring and comical ironies of this story were the accusations of infidelities thrown out around from both sides. If this attack was motivated out of her infidelity, I couldn't understand how a man could bother when he willingly chose to get involved with a woman who actually fucks with countless men on screen in the name of work. What difference does it make if she fucks around in real life too, when she's already "cheating" on him with men on screen? What is the value of such a woman's love minus her physical loyalty?

And I couldn't understand how a woman who has all her holes and body ravaged by different men on screen should even bother about her partner's loyalty. Isn't this entitled female hypocrisy—commonly seen in some sluts and whores, who still want their men to be loyal to them?

Biologically, men and women are created differently, and female virtue and chastity have traditionally (and naturally) been valued in mate selection, even if not so much in today's times of sexual liberation. Thus there will always be a sexual double standard when it comes to loyalty of the genders.

Do such individuals even deserve mention in an article? There are however many such cases in the modern world. This might as well as apply to boyfriends of sluts or whores too, for such cases are the result of a decadent civilization which produces such individuals.

The death of female shame and male honor

The reasons why this problem gets compounded is because of the convoluted modern concepts of personal shame and honor. In an earlier article, I mentioned:

> "The fact remains that the trends will continue to worsen in the future. It shouldn't be a surprise that 20 years from now, people would be casually having sex in public, in front of children and seniors, as 'sexual liberation' increasingly becomes the slogan for the present and future generations of women."

I was wrong in my estimation, for it didn't take 20 years. Less than 20 days after the 24-man blowjob incident, another video came up again, in Magaluf again. The explicit nsfw graphic video shows the eager woman being plowed between two cars as cars pass by during rush hour traffic. And just like sex selfie Twitter accounts, there is now a NSFW twitter account dealing with crazy Magaluf videos which contributors can submit depravity to.

The irony is that, these individuals are mature and supposedly sober, unlike the drunk teen who blew 24 men. And just a few days back, there was another case of a 40-minute romp of passionate exhibitionist sex by a couple again, this time in front of horrified families and children on a crowded beach in broad daylight.

I'm not being prudish here. I wonder why we don't encourage public nudity if in the end we want to fuck like animals in public? Why do we have spend on expensive clothing and fashion to cover ourselves, when we'd have public sex? Let's do away with the last barrier to personal modesty and shame. Why do we consider ourselves to be humans, the supposed progeny of Adam and Eve who supposedly even sew for themselves covering out of leaves to hide their genitals in the Garden of Eden, out of shame?

As you see, people (or women specifically) have lost their shame.It wouldn't be long when such behavior will be increasingly seen in public, in daylight. And in this scenario, do concepts like male honor, pride and territorial jealousy hold value? What ego does the man have when he exposes his partner's genitalia when he's banging her in front of them? He has already exposed his partner's nakedness to public, forget about his own. His pride comes from the fact that he banged his hot partner in public, and her presentability and worth as a partner in his eyes is not in her virtue, but rather her sex appeal to society and sexual ability. Welcome to the shallowness of the 21st century.

Yet the same man would experience jealousy if his exhibitionist partner would fuck with someone else. How convoluted have the concepts of male territorial jealousy and pride become in today's times. Liberalism may provide a release for the animal sexual lust in mankind by promoting debauchery and licentiousness, but it can never provide a satisfactory answer in this same permissive paradigm for the inherent territorial jealous instinct inherent in the animal nature of mankind. In the end, man is a social animal with territorial instincts.

A modern social paradigm of cuckolded beasts

Modernism and feminism today preach the code of demarcation of a woman's sexual loyalty from her emotional loyalty within relationships—and expects modern men to accept that while dating modern women. A woman can fuck with as many men as she wants without emotional investment, yet supposedly still retain the ability to love a man (sometimes even while withholding sex from him). So if she loves you, you should still forget her past and be a real man to accept her.

The attitude of women today is "I'll fuck with whoever I want, however I want because it's my 'job' (especially in case she's in whoring or porn), whereas you will only fuck with me and how I want, because I love you." How sincere or valuable is that love?

In short, we live in dysfunctional fem-centric societies today where cuckoldry is increasingly glorified subtly for men. Men are shamed to man up to date or marry whores or sluts, while ironically nice guys who white knight women are treated as wimps by the same society. The path of masculinity today is a confusing minefield for modern men. If you think about it deeply, modern women actually don't need real men who have real honor or real territorial instincts. What they want are ripped, rich, martially trained beasts that can defend, fuck and possibly provide for them at will—but only on their terms.

A modern man is expected to act territorial only when his woman is in danger or needs protection, but supposed to forfeit his territorial jealousy if she flirts or fucks around, because in that case it's her body over which he has limited to no right.

That's what men are today for women—just tools. What women forget is that, in the end, a beast is always a beast. And Man, in spite of all his civilized intelligence, cannot deny the instinctual territorial beast in him, which will come to life when threatened. The man who has unnaturally denied that reality has already forfeited his masculinity.

Read Next: What Would You Do If The Girlfriend You Loved Sucked 12 Penises?

Oscar Zach

Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Female University Student Carries Around Mattress She Was “Raped” On

September 6, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Columbia University student Emma Sulkowicz has decided to publicly broadcast her “rape” experience by carrying around a mattress on campus at all times—purportedly the mattress she was raped on—as part of her senior thesis in visual arts. She claims to have been anally raped by a man with whom she twice beforehand had consensual sex.

Emma was so frustrated at the lack of serious response by the campus and police authorities that she is using the mattress to not only make a statement against rape but also to complete her requirements for graduation. She states that she will not stop carrying the mattress until her rapist is kicked out of school, yet reluctantly admits that she may have to carry it until she graduates.

Watch Emma describe what the mattress means to her:

The story of her rape sounds extremely suspicious, and by extremely suspicious, I mean complete bullshit. The fact that she had to convince herself that she was raped several months after the fact and was hesitant to provide details to police should convince even a male feminist that her story is twisted.

> ES: My attacker was one of my closest friends at the time, and we'd had consensual sex twice in the past. There was a party and we left together. I invited him to my room because we'd had sex before, and we were having consensual vaginal intercourse. Soon though, he hit me across the face and started choking me and pinned my arms behind my head and pushed my legs up against my chest. He began to anally penetrate me. It was really painful and I was saying no, I was telling him to stop but he didn't. Then finally he did, he got off and laid down next to me for a second. I was just frozen solid. I was petrified. And then he ran out.
>
> I spent months in denial. I wasn't really ready to believe that I'd been raped because realizing that you've been raped is realizing that people can take control of you and objectify you. In that moment, I wasn't a human to him. I was just a thing. And that's pretty fucking scary. Once I finally did admit to myself that it had happened, I was really unhappy. And I think a lot of what I've been dealing with since then is trying to find ways to believe that I am human.

She found it offensive that authorities didn't just take her word for it and arrest the rapist immediately. How dare they ask her specific information about the incident in order to determine if a crime had occurred?

> Already anxious and queasy, Ms. Sulkowicz, a junior at Columbia University, said she felt her body freeze up and her heart race as she tried to answer questions that seemed to her to reveal not just skepticism about her story, but also disturbing ignorance in someone who had supposedly been trained for this role.
>
> "The fact that I had to tell an embarrassing story and then teach them an embarrassing subject on top of that felt really gross," she recalled in an interview. Worse still, for her, was the outcome: The panel dismissed her accusation — the same result, she said, from sexual assault complaints against the same man that year by two other students.

Her rape accusation was so frivolous that not even the friend who she took to the police station with her for emotional support believed her story.

> According to Spec, Sulkowicz went to the police after finishing her finals on the 13th. She filed a complaint with the NYPD after being dissatisfied with Columbia's internal handling of the case.
>
> Sulkowicz's experience with the NYPD was harrowing, to say the least. She describes the police as "dismissive," as they emphasized the fact that she had engaged in earlier consensual sex with Nungesser and that she could not remember specific details of the attack, like what shoes Nungesser was wearing. They demanded graphic details, and one officer also allegedly told friends Sulkowicz brought for emotional support that he "didn't believe [her] for a > second."

Once she discovered that police need actual facts, she decided that is was just too laborious for her. In a farcical interview with NY Mag, she attempts to give her reasoning for not pursuing charges against the rapist who so destroyed her life:

> The last time we spoke you said you had filed a report with the NYPD and they were starting to investigate. What is the status of that?
>
> It got transferred to the district attorney's office, and I decided I didn't want to pursue it any further because they told it me it would take nine months to a year to actually go to court, which would be after I graduated and probably wanting to erase all of my memories of Columbia from my brain anyway, so I decided not to pursue it.
>
> You were also hoping to file a complaint with the police regarding how you were treated. What happened with that?
>
> I was contacted by an investigator who was really, really annoying to work with. He would call me randomly, and make me repeat everything that happened. He kept telling me I had to come into the station, and obviously I don't want to deal with the police any more right now. It's so disorganized, and it's really upsetting to work with them at all.

Roosh
@rooshv

If a girl puts more time into publicizing being victimized than reporting it to police, she's a liar. Case closed.

Neither campus authorities nor police believed her. Combined with the fact that she is broadcasting her "rape" to the media, granting interviews to anyone who will ask (here's a video interview with Time), and using it to get an easy A grade on her thesis, it's safe to conclude that we are looking at a false rape accusation by a mentally unstable woman. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind that this girl was not truly raped, and instead was sour about being pumped and dumped after giving up her anus to a guy she had the tingles for.

The icing on the cake is that she's too lazy to even fulfill her victimhood project:

> One girl seems to be organizing some sort of website that will allow students to organize and figure out how to help me carry [the mattress] to all my classes.
>
> Are you prepared to carry the mattress until graduation?
>
> Yeah. I would prefer not to obviously — it is really painful and tiring — but I don't think it is a protest. It's an art piece.

Atlantic

Wingman

Posts: 995
Joined: Feb 2012
Reputation: 52
Warning Level: 0%

RE: College girl carries mattress she was "raped" on throughout campus Post: #16 |

Id offer to carry it and then run off with it. Then send her pics of me with different girls on the mattress and also pics of it at house parties and raves. It would become a famous party mattress.
Id call it 'the mattress who moved on'.

IP Address: Logged

Images made by Atlantic

Hearing about false rape accusations is not uncommon in these parts, but for many Americans it's a new frontier in a culture which teaches them to always take a girl's word for it. It's becoming obvious to the everyman that rape accusations are being used as a weapon by women to gain attention, settle scores with men, and inject drama into their lives, giving them a perverse sort of life meaning that is not provided by an iPhone, psychology degree, and cock carousel.

While it would be easy for us to attack Emma for her unexcusable behavior, we should thank her instead. Emma is doing more than we can to show exactly how absurd "rape culture" has become and how meaningless a rape accusation is becoming. For the longest time, feminists have been complaining that crimes against them are not being taken seriously, but due to their own abuse of yelling rape, I believe that such as accusation will be brushed off much more easily than in the past. Girls are crying wolf a bit too much, and soon no one will believe them when they are ravaged by a real one.

Read Next: Help Raise Awareness About Rape Tourette's

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

3 Steps To Breaking Out Of A Slump

September 7, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

We all alternate between periods of happiness and periods of depression—periods of energy and periods of lethargy, periods of reaping and periods of sowing. Thus is the cyclical nature of life.

The question is: do you respond appropriately? Do you take advantage of the energy when it comes and use it productively to crush life? If you don't, and you instead opt to enjoy the emotional highs without really applying yourself to anything, you set yourself up for a big fall. When the energy leaves you and you haven't grown in any way, your off cycle that would've been used for rest and recovery now feels more like a depression.

And when you enter such a cycle of depression, it oftens seems like a never-ending period. You don't have the recent positive reference experience to confidently bounce back and get after it. So you sit there and sulk in your own misery, unsure of how to proceed.

This happens to all of us. Eventually something happens and you take action, exiting the depressionary cycle in the process. Here are some tips if you feel like you've been stuck in an off cycle for too long—some tips to get you going again. These things always help me.

1. Narrow your focus to one actionable thing

When we are inactive, our minds tend to wander. We think about one thing we need to do, then another that we should do, and then a third that we'd like to do. The result is when you're lying on your back, looking at the ceiling, and feeling paralyzed—like you literally can't take action on anything.

Rather than allowing thoughts to bombard your brain from 1,000 different angles, choose one actionable thing to focus on. For example, one target area for your business (e.g. inbound marketing, content creation, networking, roadmap planning) or one aspect of your game (e.g. approaching, first dates, physical escalation).

And then DO IT. Analysis paralysis is very real. It's possibly the number one cause of inaction. Stop THINKING about all your options and DO just one of them.

2. Don't forget the fundamentals

Everyday, although your focus will be on one particular item (as determined above), you still must take care of the basic tasks that will ensure you feel rested and energetic. For me this means exercising, reading, and meditating every day.

Pick three things that make sense for you, and then make sure you check them off your list every single day.

3. Replace the bad with the good

Next, list the things that you do that you know aren't helping you: your bad habits, if you will. This might mean playing video games, masturbating, drinking, smoking, or picking your fingernails. Pick things you tend to do that TAKE more than they GIVE, things that tend to have a component of instant gratification but no long-term benefits. Whenever you catch yourself doing one of these things, stop and instead do one of the things you determined in step 2 above.

This 3 step process in awfully simple, but it works for me. Not instantly, but far more quickly than if I just sit around and play the victim.

If this was helpful, you may be interested in my new online bootcamp 28 Days To Alpha. Click here for more info.

Read More: How To Avoid The 3 Worst Qualities Of The Beta Male

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Why Every Man Should Keep A Daily Journal

September 7, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The happiness of your life depends on your thoughts: therefore, guard accordingly and take care you entertain no notions unsuitable to virtue and reasonable nature

Marcus Aurelius

This past summer, I made the decision to resume maintaining a daily journal. I committed to updating it every day, if only to say that the old broad who lives down the street blew the stop sign again or that I was too hungover to flirt with the red-headed Kroger cashier who eye-balled me. I have tried to keep a journal off and on since high school, but I have never regularly updated one. For some reason, I found it tedious, boring, and was too paranoid about somebody finding it. Those are all poor reasons not to have a journal.

The benefits from regularly maintaining a journal are enormous. You have a blank slate before you, into which you can pour out whatever you think or feel. You have a reliable outlet that you can count on after a particularly rough or confusing day. It becomes an excellent way of codifying your thoughts and processing your feelings. Instead of thinking something through, only to forget all or most of what you realized, you have writings you can come back at a later date.

Most importantly, if you commit to maintaining one, it forces you to commit to bettering your life. When you regularly have to report to your personal log about what you have done the past day or week, it forces you to either reconsider your goals or forces you to get busy working on them. For example, let's say you scribble about your relations with your coworkers. You might note that you have certain behaviors or common reactions that either are not healthy, or cast yourself in a not-so-pleasant light. By detailing these interactions, you can evaluate what you are doing wrong and how to go about correcting said actions. You might leave a note to reread a certain chapter of How To Win Friends And Influence People; you might simply force yourself to think before you speak.

Further, a journal becomes a private confessional of sorts. It might be an inanimate object, but it becomes an extension of the self as you end up pouring what are the necessarily private contents of your mind. As such, it isn't a confessional in the purest sense of the word, but rather a kind-of tribunal in which you judge and evaluate yourself. At times, a blank page might look like an accusation, blindly staring back at you asking you, What are you waiting for? Judging yourself harshly is never good, but a healthy sense of distance from yourself is necessary to properly adduce your path forward.

Before I list a few benefits of journal-keeping, I highly recommend that you have at least one or two people you feel comfortable with discussing some what you write about in your journal. A key problem with the modern man is we all too often think that we have to be perfect, have it together all the time and never let our guard down.

Wearing your heart on your sleeve is a sucker's bet, but having one or two confidants—not your girlfriend or wife, please!—that you can be completely honest with is a great boon. You might have some great insight into yourself and that other person can let you know that you are running up the wrong flagpole or that you might be onto something substantive. If nothing else, it helps alleviate some of that toxic shame that many modern men feel about being a man.

Here are some benefits I've noticed from keeping a daily personal journal:

It Betters Your Writing And Speaking Skills

Just by forcing yourself to write every day, you become a better writer simply by having to compose prose pleasing to you. Even if you only pen 500 words a day, that is enough to slowly hone your writing chops. Since you are only writing for yourself, you are freed from writing for an audience. You can get a good read on your ability to narrate events or muse about life and love. This bleeds into your ability to converse, as you expand your vocabulary as your writing skills increase. While reading does help more in this aspect, writing helps you find your own voice, which can translate into your actual voice.

Another point to consider is this: one of the first things you notice once you have a few weeks under your belt is that re-reading old posts can be a bit taxing. Personally, I have terrible penmanship, so I cleaned that up quickly (as a side note, I don't trust a personal log on a computer, as I think we associate electronic writing with communicating with others, as all of us have hand-written letters or notes to ourselves). You notice certain tendencies you have writing. I have a two bad habits: dropping words and confusing verb tenses. Part of this is very mild dyslexia, but I committed to bettering my prose for myself.

This isn't a bad goal, but it defeats the primary purpose of journal-keeping. For a period of time, I was obsessed with what I would think of this entry a month later. Don't do that. It prevented the free-flowing of thoughts and feelings. Let it all out. If you drop words or confuse verbs, who cares? The only audience is yourself. Writing and keeping at writing will improve your writing, but that is a side-effect of journal keeping really does for a man.

It Builds Confidence

Journal keeping builds confidence because it forces you to work towards goals. I have a problem with over-thinking issues and while I might have good realizations or workable solutions, they are just thoughts. By writing them down, it gives them more substance, as instead of merely thinking of doing something, it has a physical representation on a page.

There is a reason the Roosh Program has a strong emphasis on keeping a player journal: the reflection it causes doesn't just help you sort out your thoughts, but it also gives you an outlet to reflect on and better yourself. Confidence—in my estimation—stems from having not just having a strong social network, but having both a reservoir of positive memories to draw on and the ability to honestly and accurately appraise yourself. A key component of true confidence to be able to appraise onesself in a neutral light–neither too harshly nor too lightly—but in a way that reflects an awareness of the self.

It Helps Build Social Awareness

In law school, Bill Clinton would keep note cards on all his fellow classmates and professors. It was his way of keeping all the information he learned about others straight in his mind. He was able to build his personal charisma because he was able to remember seemingly insignificant details about others. He wowed other people because of his ability to make you feel like you knew each other intimately, even if your interactions had only been fleeting and superficial.

As such, what has struck about keeping a log about your personal life, is that you will spend a great bit of time detailing your interactions with others. This is a good thing. Not only will you work through your problems and issues with others, but you will also learn to transcend the self-absorption of the mind and spend more time considering others' viewpoints and why they are the way they are.

It Keeps You On The Path Towards Your Goals

Some years back, I remember pulling off the interstate into a small town. Just inside the city limits was a billboard that read: If you are looking for a sign, this is it. No sponsored corporate or non-profit sign, just a no-name billboard that exhorted a person to get off their ass.

I recall thinking that was a pretty neat message, but like most messages in America, it is a fleeting message one most likely will not act on.

The problem for most people in America is that we love to talk about what we are going to do. Why do you think the gym fills with newbies the first two weeks after New Year's Eve and goes back to normal later that month? We Americans love to talk about what we are going to do—or at least pretend to try for a couple weeks.

The problem with achieving goals or dreams is that it is necessarily a long journey. Christ, Americans wanted to liberate Iraq but within a year they were whining about occupying a foreign country. No wonder fat acceptance is gaining mainstream approval: it's easier to demand other's accept your inadequacies than confront them head-on.

Regardless, putting one foot in front of the other towards a goal is a daily struggle. Whether that is to open at least one female a day or to commit to at least working out 30 minutes a day, it can be tough to push forward with your goals. A journal can help because you always know you have a repository for whatever you might think or feel about your goals.

With a journal, you have written documentation of your struggles towards your goals. Since it is personal, it is only you evaluating your progress. As such, you only have to worry about your own valuation. While a man can be his harshest critic, a man can also appreciate the nuances of his own experience that others can't.

When you push yourself to keep a daily journal, you force yourself to confront many things. You will learn to better your own writing, you will learn to better your social relations and use the confidence that flows from that. Yet, what is most important is that you have a literary log of where your life is going. Only a fool of a man will let himself write just about his failings; a healthy man will use his journal as a way to better himself and transcend the un-actualized aspects of his life.

Read More: America's Culture Of Narcissism

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

How To Quit Your Porn Addiction And Improve Your Game At The Same Time

September 7, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

ROK's September sponsor is Quit Porn Get Girls, a resource to help you quit a porn addiction within 30 days while simultaneously helping you improve your game.

> QuitPornGetGirls
> Because Real Men Do Real Women
>
> Today's society is filled with men who have lost their way. In the jumble of the internet, information overload from all media outlets, easy access to porn and the changing face of male-female relationships, men have somehow lost their compass.
>
> Two of the main areas where men are adrift are sexuality and relationships with women. If pornography is destroying your relationship, making it difficult for you to relate to women, or affecting your sexual life adversely, [Quit Porn Get Girls is] the right place.
>
> I'll teach you how you can reclaim your life by:
>
> -quitting porn
> -learning how to attract and relate with women
> -get laid
> -build an attractive lifestyle.

For more information, visit Quit Porn Get Girls.

If you are interested in becoming an ROK sponsor, visit our sponsorship page. You can also drop a couple bucks in our tip jar.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Life Advice That All Men Should Follow

September 8, 2014 | by Jesus Baetana | Link | Original Link

Improve yourself. Don't stop. Everyone is good at something. Don't wallow in excuses to justify being lazy. Work hard and rest properly, not half measures of both. Try everything until you find something you are good enough at. Monetize it to the maximum degree. Secure yourself. Buy property, invest, start a business, deal drugs. Do whatever it takes, to create something for yourself.

Find happiness in yourself, through doing something you enjoy, or something that gives you the means to enjoy the rest of your time you're not doing it. Find happiness in travel, eating new foods, having new experiences, and making great friends. Work hard when you are younger, so you can ease off a little when you are older. Buy a house, even if you don't live in it, so at least you have a roof over your head when you are older. Live without obligation, that will only ever be created in your own head through guilt anyway.

Above all else, don't place your own happiness in the idea of a relationship or a woman. They are masters of creating the illusion of higher worth than you, when in reality the majority of them are leeches with only a vagina to offer you. Increase your own worth through the above methods and let them prove to you why you should allow them into your world.

If you choose to let one in, keep yourself protected. Don't just joke about prenuptial agreements; draft them and get them legally documented. Keep your property in your name. You are already giving them enough by allowing them to live in it rent free. Don't fall for guilt-tripping; look after her to a normal standard and the occasional treat, providing she deserves it. Take responsibility for when you are wrong and let that be the end of it; remember making a decision is better than inaction, even if it ultimately proves to be the wrong one.

Just learn from it. Don't apologize for anything you are not responsible for, no matter how she turns it around; history is history and has no relevance on a current disagreement. Keep a separate and secret bank account as a backup. Give her regular goals. Even if she is raising children, she should be running a home business, day trading, learning a new skill, being proactive, overseeing your administration or doing your research at the very least – not just wandering around bored.

A bored mind is a dangerous mind; make sure she has tangible goals to fulfill and she is part of your plan, not anything else and, least of all, not just a sex doll. Make her aware that failure to comply with these objectives will put her at risk of you moving on. You are the prize she should be grateful for, not the other way around.

Don't be afraid to be confident. Take pride in yourself and don't be ashamed when you see someone with more money, bigger muscles, or better looks than you. If you're truly doing your best, that's enough; they're probably a one dimensional person. Everyone has a weakness if you're forced into conflict. Don't be afraid of doing anything, especially when it comes to women.

Do things only for yourself or those you truly hold dear, such as your close family or friends. Weigh your actions with a woman against those you make with others, who have always been there for you and who accept you as you are without trying to manipulate you. Remember who and what is important in life, and what makes you happy.

Finally, with any self-serving moral decision you have to make, just go for it—she probably would too.

Read Next: The Difference Between A Woman's Behavior And Her Intent

Jesus Baetana
Jesus Baetana is a man of Anglo-Italian descent, often found stood slack jawed in astonishment at the current state of gender politics today. He now resides in a small central European state, attempting to single-handedly wrest control of both it's wealth and women. Read more about his adventures at The Words Of A Man

Is It Enough To Make The Right Decisions, Or Must We Have The Right Reasons?

September 8, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The life of man is his struggle with moral and philosophical problems. The art of living involves a thousand daily compromises, decisions, and judgments; we stumble through the darkness as best we can, our way illuminated by a lantern which burns with the fire of our uncertain convictions. What to do, what not to do, and how to go about doing it: are these not the primary concerns for the man of action?

And yet our powers of decision often seem so woefully inadequate. They often feel prolonged in effort, and meager in result. So often dashed on the rocks of temptation and delusion, we can rely only on ourselves has helmsmen and pilots.

T.S. Eliot

Moments of great decision in our lives are attended by two related questions: (1) What is the correct course of action; and (2) what are the temptations that may deflect us from the right path. I now believe that there is a third, deeper question that follows from the preceding two: does the motivation behind the right decision matter? Stated another way: does it matter if the right thing is done for the wrong reason, or is it better that the right thing be done for the right reason?

This question is rarely asked. I never gave it much thought myself. But a recent reading of T.S. Eliot's play Murder in the Cathedral has made me view these matters in a different light. The motive behind a momentous decision does indeed matter.

Murder in the Cathedral uses a historical incident—the murder of Archbishop Thomas Becket in Canterbury in 1170 by knights of King Henry II—as a vehicle to explore the moral questions stated above. The political issues leading up to the assassination were complex, and need not detain us here; what matters in the play are ideas, not historical details. Were T.S. Eliot alive today, he could doubtless just as easily have chosen the murder of Archbishop Romero in a church in El Salvador in the early 1980s as his subject matter.

We are the sum total of the decisions we make in our lives

It is sufficient for our purposes to note that, before his murder, Thomas had been engaged in a protracted power struggle with Henry over the relative role of the Church and the crown in English affairs of state. In the figure of Thomas, then, we have an embodiment of the classic conflict between the secular and the spiritual authorities of a European nation; it is a drama that would be played out many times across the continent, and in England would not be resolved until Henry VIII firmly subordinated the Church in favor of royal prerogative.

But Eliot is not interested in historical details. What concerns him is the moral trial that a man must undergo in making a momentous decision. What temptations does he face? How does he overcome them? And how does he make peace with himself? The answers to these questions unfold in Eliot's unrivaled ability as a master of the poetic medium.

Thomas knows that he must die. He knows his life must be forfeit. He knows that his feud with Henry has brought him to the point where no further compromise could be reached. He must die, and yet he hesitates. And who would not hesitate? His internal conflict is dramatized by his interaction with four "tempters" in human form who seek to talk him out of doing what he knows to be right. These tempters follow him about, whispering sweet words in his ear, in an effort to seduce him or break his will. One tempter dissuades him by reminding him of the seeming futility of human actions; only "a fool, fixed in his folly" would stoop to die for a principle. Why bother fighting for anything, after all? And does anyone care about lofty ideals?

> Men learn little from others' experience.
> But in the life of one man, never
> The same time returns. Sever
> The cord, shed the scale. Only
> The fool, fixed in his folly, may think
> He can turn the wheel on which he turns.

In a powerful ode to nihilism and futility, the tempters together argue that nothing really matters in life (How often do we hear some version of this sentiment in these nihilistic, atheistic times!). Moral statements, moral judgments, and ethical "principles" alike dissolve into nothingness. In what may be the most powerful ode to despair ever penned, the tempters mock Thomas:

> Man's life is a cheat and a disappointment;
> All things are unreal,
> Unreal or disappointing:
> The Catherine wheel, the pantomime cat,
> The prizes given at the children's party,
> The prize awarded for the English Essay,
> The scholar's degree, the statesman's decoration.
> All things become less real, man passes
> From unreality to unreality.

Another tempter, taking a different approach, appeals to his rationality by suggesting that he, Thomas, would be throwing his life away by letting himself be slain by Henry's knights. He, Thomas, could do more good as a living political figure than as a dead cleric:

> The Chancellorship that you resigned
> When you were made Archbishop—that was a mistake
> On your part—still may be regained. Think, my Lord,

> Power obtained grows to glory,
> Life lasting, a permanent possession.
> A templed mob, monument of marble.
> Rule over men reckon no madness.

In the most powerful and insidious temptation, one of the tempters suggests that he should proceed with his planned martyrdom, because of the glory that it will bring his memory:

> Yes, Thomas, yes; you have thought of that too.
> What can compare with glory of Saints
> Dwelling forever in presence of God?
> What earthly glory, of king or emperor,
> What earthly pride, that is not poverty
> Compared with richness of heavenly grandeur?
> Seek the way of martyrdom, make yourself the lowest
> On earth, to be high in heaven.

This appeal to Thomas's vanity proves to be the most seductive temptation of all, because it played on his desire for glory and immortality as a martyr for a cause. But Thomas is able to shake off this temptation, and here delivers the key soliloquy of the play, in which he affirms his belief that our subjective intentions behind our actions really do matter:

> Now is my way clear, now is the meaning plain:
> Temptation shall not come in this kind again.
> The last temptation is the greatest treason:
> To do the right thing for the wrong reason.

Doing the right thing (dying as a martyr) is not enough: for his action to be sanctified by God, it must be done in a spirit of true humility and submission to God, without thought of any personal benefit of glory. And in this sentiment, the key message of the play is made clear: it is not enough simply to do what is right. What is more important—what is more transcendent—is to do the right thing for the right reason. Our reasons must spring from our innermost convictions, from our souls that have sincerely and honestly submitted to the authority of divine law. Only this sanctification gives our deeds any moral significance.

In a sermon later in the play, Thomas states his views of what constitutes a true martyr:

> A Christian martyr is never an accident, for Saints are not made by accident. Still less is a Christian martyrdom the effect of a man's will to become a Saint, as a man by willing and contriving may become a ruler of men…It [martyrdom] is > never the design of man; for the true martyr is he who has become the instrument of God, who has lost his will in the will of God, and who no longer desires anything for himself, not even the glory of being a martyr.

We are the sum total of the decisions we make in our lives. Our decisions, steadily accreting upon each other day after day, define us. Most of the time, it is clear to us what is the right thing to do. Yet why can it be do difficult to do what is so self-evidently necessary? It is difficult because we are hounded by tempters at every step in the road. They whisper inducements in our ears, beseeching us to relax, to slow down, or to go with the flow of the herd; they trouble us with sly appeals to the apparent futility of all actions; and they seek to distract us from the right path with appeals to our hunger for riches and seraglios of women.

And if we can overcome these enticements, we still must face our own reckonings with conscience: are we doing the right thing for the right reason, or for the wrong reason? This is the critical question, one that T.S. Eliot so masterfully has explored for us. To do the right thing is not enough. It must be done for the right reason.

Sincerity purifies purpose. Sincerity sanctifies purpose. A good deed, unless it springs from such inner sanctified motive, remains only an empty gesture, an action as arid and meaningless as “rats’ feet over broken glass” (to use another phrase from Eliot).

It is often said that no good deed goes unpunished. Until now, I never understood the true meaning of that saying.

Read More: The Golden Rule Works

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Genetics Guarantees That Feminism Will Lose

September 8, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

I know many, if not all, of the articles here on ROK are original pieces of work. However, I read this article and feel compelled to share it with you for there is an important lesson here that EVERY man (and woman) must know and understand. And that lesson is:

Feminism and feminists will lose in the end.

I say this not out of idealism, wishful thinking, hope or what I'd like to see happen. But rather a cold, clinical, unemotional statement of truth. Feminism and feminists WILL lose in the end. And the reason for this is that the entire movement is antithetical to their human and genetic programming.

Take this excerpt from the article that quotes what is arguably the epitome and most ardent type of feminist—the 1960/70's feminist:

> I've known women who fell for this creed in their youth who now, in their fifties and sixties, cry themselves to sleep decades of countless nights grieving for the children they'll never have and the ones they coldly murdered because they were protecting the empty loveless futures they now live with no way of going back. "Where are my children? Where are my grandchildren?" they cry to me.
>
> "Your sister's books destroyed my sister's life!" I've heard numerous times. "She was happily married with four kids and after she read those books, walked out on a bewildered man and didn't look back." The man fell into despairing rack and ruin. The children were stunted, set off their tracks, deeply harmed; the family profoundly dislocated and there was "no putting Humpty-Dumpty together again."

This is not a one off anecdote. This is the consequence of putting a childish and evil ideology, as well as your egotistical self, ahead and above all other people. Your career is more important than your children. Your PhD is more important than your husband. Your book is more important than your family. And your activism is more important than your friends. Sadly, all of those things cannot replace the most dynamic, intelligent, interesting, engaging and rewarding thing on this planet, and that is other human beings.

However, what is truly the juiciest morsel of revenge is that feminists and marxists do this to themselves. They have the same single shot on this planet as anyone else, which really is EVERYTHING a human has, and they piss it away on a religion that is nothing more than an excuse to be a narcissistic, self-absorbed psychopath.

Mocking them for dying alone with their cats really isn't a cliche or a lack of genuine criticism. It's 100% fact. And it's a fact they should be constantly reminded of as the rest of us enjoy our lives and the loving people therein.

Read More: Decreasing Marriage Rate Is Hurting Feminism

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

Women Are Allowed To Find Soulmates While Men Must Settle

September 9, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

For the last month or so, I've been running a bit of an experiment, with the purpose of putting together an article about the Millennial dating scene. I'm not sure if I will ever bother writing it or not. For one: it's very depressing. Two: it might be a little skewed. I'm not the best looking dude, but that's mitigated by how much I work out, and my fairly good grasp of the female mindset. I wanted to present the article as what a typical young guy of today has to go through when attempting to be romantic with his female peers, and I do not think I can do that since the typical Millennial man seems to be a downtrodden simp who's infinitely grateful when a woman who isn't an absolute troll deigns to talk to him and I…well, I act quite differently than that.

Part of this poorly executed experiment is going on dates with a variety of women: ones I ask on the street, at bars and nightclubs, online and through hook up apps like Tinder. I haven't dated a girl since high school (there's no point since I can usually get the best part of the relationship, sex, with absolutely minimal investment), so I have no first hand experience of the extreme bullshit most twenty-something men have to deal with just to reach the middle of the needs pyramid (that was a poorly implemented Maslow reference, by the way). I want to see the common tics and behaviors Millennial women display while dating and hopefully give some of the younger ROK readers an idea of what warning signs they should look out for when entering the minefield that is a modern relationship.

Here's an example of what I'm researching: During the first and subsequent dates, I keep track of how long it takes my date to pull her cell phone out once the date has started, and how often she checks it during. Quickest draw: 9 seconds [we said hi, sat down, her cellphone was out]. The longest any chick lasted before pulling it out was roughly 7 minutes. Record amount of checks [that I noticed]: 49 times over an hour period. Least amount of checks: 10 over an hour period.)

Mary Vecchio cries over the body of one of the Kent State University students who had just been shot by Ohio National Guard soldiers on May 4, 1970. Photograph by John Filo Anyhoo, one of my most recent dates was with a university gal just going into her second year whom I'll just call Gina. Gina is nineteen, with long blonde hair (which she dyed stupidly with a strip of blue and green on one side), a visible neck and wrist tattoo, a stud in her nose (though the occasional ring makes it's appearance), and on the ten scale is about a 6.5. I met her on Tinder, and judging by her pics I more or less expected her to show up to our first date (coffee house, which I intentionally chose since it's the most common and boring first date idea I can think of) dressed like a slutty mess.

Surprisingly enough she showed up looking like a human being, wearing a dress with a knee length skirt and a jacket over the top. She even left her nose stud at home (but not her cell phone: it was out within 3 minutes and was checked 16 times during the date. The fact that I know that really makes me feel like Patrick Bateman).

The first fifteen minutes were as dreary and boring as could be. I was intentionally acting as much as a Beta male cliché as I could without crossing the line into being a full blown parody, and her interest was visibly waning by the time our drinks arrived. On one of her many bored scans away from me and around the coffee shop, Gina smirked and said, "Look at those two."

I looked to where she was nodding. Across the store, at another table, a gay couple were kissing. The one closest to us was brown haired and dressed bizarrely, wearing some kind of dress shirt and a pair of suspenders.

At this point I need to explain that I am a closet nerd. And I don't mean that I know the difference between Star Trek and Star Wars. I mean I am a Nerd. Not only is Trek the better Star franchise, but I've watched all the Star Trek series and have ranked them from best to worst: DS9 [season 7 sucked], TNG [Season 3 and beyond], TOS, Voyager blows and Enterprise never happened. I have watched anime films and can coherently describe the plots of Ghost in the Shell, Akira, Jin-Roh: The Iron Wolf Brigade and even less mainstream anime films such as Royal Space Force: The Wings Of The Honneamise and Venus Wars. Many of you reading just had your eyes glaze over, and now you understand why I am a closet nerd.

Anyways, one such nerd show I like to watch is Torchwood, a spin off of the famous British Sci-Fi show Doctor Who. The lead character in the show is Captain Jack Harkness (played by John Barrowman of Shark Attack 3: Megalodon fame), a bisexual from the future who fights aliens. The gay guy at the other table also just happened to be dressed similarly to Harkness's signature style.

"Yeah, look at Captain Harkness go," I muttered more than said.

Gina's eyes seemed to actually light up at that comment, and the bored look on her face was gone instantly. "Was that a Torchwood reference?" she asked eagerly.

I was stunned that this above average looking girl knew what show I was referencing. Not needing to act Beta, I more or less stuttered out: "You watch Torchwood?"

Practically giddy now, Gina went on about her love for the show for the next few minutes. The conversation moved onto other shamefully nerdy passions of ours (Gina, unlike myself, is a gamer), what nerd shows we watch (a surprising amount, including the various Star Treks and a few of the animes I mentioned above). We have both played Dungeons and Dragons before.

In short, Gina and I discovered we had a lot of shared interests. As a teenager, I would have been in love right then and there: the only serious girlfriend I've ever had I dated because during a high school party (she was a Freshman, I was a Junior) she got really drunk and started calling me Dean Winchester all night (due to my ridiculous teenage fashion sense of wearing boots everywhere and my cousin's ratty old military jacket), a reference to the television show Supernatural (which I am also a fan of). The next time I talked to her sober we found out we liked a lot of the same stuff, and we dated until I graduated and left town.

But I'm an adult now, one with knowledge of the cold harsh truths of the world and the women that inhabit it. And the fact is that Gina is nineteen, well into the female lust phase (18-28) with one year of university residence living already under her belt. Being an educated idiot myself, I have seen—and freely dabbled in—the slut training academy that is college, so I know exactly what sort of environment Gina lives in. Plus the idiotic tattoos and nose piercing are universally recognizable signs of sluttery (for those curious, the neck tat was a rainbow swirl and the wrist were stars, so tres unique).

We met on Tinder, which is self explanatory. And although she has a great body at the moment, Gina admitted during our second date that she doesn't work out (but she reassured me that she's totally going to get into it when school starts up), so this will undoubtedly be the year of the Freshman fifteen. Oh, and we had sex within 72 hours of our first meeting, sooo yeah, there's that too.

Even though we shared numerous interests, if I chose to date Gina I would be dating a girl who has: marred her body with ugly and faddish mutilations, has likely slept with numerous men before me (she wasn't a virgin and Tinder sure ain't no Chaste Christian Singles app), and will likely be getting fatter sooner rather than later. I asked her if she's working, even part time, and Gina said no, so she's already dug into a pile of debt. Plus she's nineteen, and out of the hundreds of young woman I've met, I know of ten total who stayed, or currently still are, with the same man they met at that age. Heartless mathematical odds are in favor that any investment of time, money and love I make in her would be repaid by Gina with cuckoldry and crazy-bitching, as is the wont of the modern woman.

And who would she be dating? I generally try to be humble about myself, but if we dated Gina would get a twenty-three year old man who: has a university degree from a fairly prestigious school (although it's an English major, not that impressive); is debt free and owns his own vehicle (and I have enough savings that I could almost outright buy a house); who has electrician's certifications and will possibly be making six figures within the decade (or this year, if I opted to go to the oil sands); who shares a good amount of her interests; who busts his hump at the gym several nights a week to look good physically; who believes in monogamy in relationships (I may participate in the hook up culture but if I was dating I wouldn't stray); and who has a family that isn't a dysfunctional mess. I even have some sisters that she could bond with.

Am I perfect man? No, but compared to a lot of true Trekkies and other nerds I am a phenomenal human being. Gina is above average in looks and only exceptional in personality to me simply because she knows who Finn The Human is. I am likely amongst the top tier of genuinely nerdy men since it's not unfair to say that the average guy with in-depth knowledge about the Federation's war with the Dominion is likely to be out of shape, socially awkward, and poorly employed.

If I locked her down, Gina would be getting one of the best men possible who also shares her a good chunk of her interests and passions: she'd be getting the closest thing to a real soulmate there is. I would be getting a mediocre woman who would stop laughing at my Doctor McCoy impressions once the first baby came along.

And that dynamic plays out in many relationships, because a woman who is genuinely interested in something other than her mirror are comparative rarities. How many men out there have lowered their standards to date a woman simply because she shared some of his hobbies or interests, while that woman gets an absolute prize of man? I know of many.

Next spring a buddy of mine is getting married to a woman he dated because she loves going hunting; he makes six figures a year and almost got a four plate deadlift the last time we worked out together. She has a belly and when not hunting religiously she reads Cosmo and watches reality TV all day (she doesn't work). My roommate is a good looking gamer guy who often works out with me (making good progress with his Squat, Bench and Dead, having seriously started lifting around four months ago) and is dating a short haired chubster simply because she is a genuine gamer gal.

I've seen men become enthralled when a woman they're talking to not only says she likes punk music but can actually name bands beyond Blink 182; I don't know if they're still together today, but an old room mate of mine who was quite a womanizer dropped out of the university pump-and-dump game because he started to date a chick who was really into the Rockabilly scene like he was. He voluntarily gave up sleeping with in-their-prime women because he met a girl who liked The Cramps and wore polka dot dresses.

When it comes to rivalry between the sexes, many double standards are often brought up. The most common one is the "a woman who sleeps around is a slut but a man who does the same is not," but the most painful double standard is exactly the one I've been ranting about: the Soulmate double standard. So long as she doesn't foul it up by completely screwing away her twenties, most women have the option to find a man who will truly love her, share her interests and sacrifice everything he could and ever will be to give her a comfortable life because he truly believes she is his soul mate.

Even young women whose interests lie solely in themselves can still find men who will worship them, but a woman who is into Hot Rod cars and Tae Kwon Do and Radiohead has an almost infinitely better chance of finding a good man who shares her soul than if the sexes were reversed: and that man will love her with a fiery passion simply because of those shared passions.

Most men have to lower their standards in order to find a woman who has even a passing interest in what he is into, and far too many men must completely surrender their souls by dating and marrying women with whom they have nothing in common, who often simply tolerate a man's passion. Men are the interesting sex, while by and large women like sitting on the couch reading about and watching all the other women they wish they were.

I won't link it out of respect for the guy, but I recently watched a video where a fitness enthusiast was making cookies to help people get gains—and this guy is a shredded beast who knows what he's talking about—and at one point in the video his out of shape, average looking wife comes in and gives the guy a shoulder so cold I'm surprised their breath didn't start showing in the air. She was angry because he was participating in his passion, one which she clearly does not share.

Then, at the other end of the spectrum, in his autobiography "On Writing," Stephen King freely admits that if his wife had told him that his writing (before he made it big) was a waste of time, he would have lost heart and quite likely quit, probably winding up a drunken old teacher as opposed to a billionaire best-seller. Instead his wife, also a writer, encouraged him because she shared in his interests. That's how extreme a difference the love of a woman who shares a man's passion can influence his life.

It's too bad so few men will get the chance to find soulmates. Double standards aren't just for men.

Read More: 5 Dating Conventions That Women Killed

Billy Chubbs
Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

How White Knighting Is Killing The NFL

September 9, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Football season is officially upon us, and I'd be lying if I said I wasn't as excited as a kid on Christmas day. There are certain corners of the manosphere that more or less frown upon being a sports fan. While I disagree with this sentiment, I will readily admit that there is some truth to the adverse effects of being an extreme fanatic who lives and dies with his team. There are varying degrees of one's devotion to sports but I probably fall somewhere in the middle.

My discovery of the red pill triggered a lot of changes in my life. Not putting pussy on a pedestal, my ongoing quest to teach myself Spanish, and taking up outdoor hobbies are just a few things that have changed my life for the better. I've also made sacrifices, but sports fandom isn't one of them.

The past year, however, has me seriously considering drastically scaling back my consumption of the American sports buffet. All of us can attest to seeing things differently after digesting the red pill. For example, I have identified an exponential increase in pussification in sports with both the overall narrative and rule changes, most notably in the country's most popular and profitable league, the NFL. Here are a few shining examples of why sports is starting to leave a very bad taste in my mouth.

The Washington Redskins

One of the issues du jour on the professional sports landscape is the ongoing debate over the NFL's Washington Redskins team name and whether or not it's offensive to Native Americans. Before I get into this, let me go ahead and disclaim allegiances by saying this issue doesn't matter to me because I am not a Native American, nor am I a fan of the Washington Redskins.

This feud goes back a few years but has gained considerable steam, and is now at the forefront of many discussions in mainstream media. But what the public at large is grossly unaware of is that the debate isn't really about the team name. It's about political correctness and its advocates.

Not only have the social justice warriors jumped on the bandwagon demanding the name be changed, but sports pundits have taken up the cause as well. What's more is that once again, the media is pandering to the minority. This has always been the case with hot-button issues in the states, but seeing it seep into the sports landscape is troubling.

The fact is that of the 500+ Native American tribes only 1 seems to have a problem with the Redskins team name, according to research. If most of these tribes were offended by this name I could certainly understand the gripe. But Chris Cooley proved this is simply not the case when he visited actual Native American tribes. The tribes that have been questioned about the Redskins name were either unaware of the debate, didn't care at all, or said they were more concerned with health care and the education of their people. The video below is compelling in these regards. Watch the white knighting go full-throttle after thorough, anecdotal research is presented by Cooley—for it is a microcosm of how sports has become sickeningly beta:

Political Correctness is a parasite that has ravaged American Culture for decades. It is the calling card of these so-called freedom fighters. The truth is more than 99% of people squawking about how the offensive the name Redskins is aren't affected at all. They simply jump on whatever PC bandwagon they can to feel good about themselves for fighting against "The Man" (e.g. the ridiculous occupy Wall Street fad).

So now that self righteous zealots are once again making a mountain out of a molehill in the name of selfishness, let's take a look at another situation that got the oversized panties of feminists in a bunch and compelled white knights to predictably follow in their cankle-laden footsteps.

The NFL's overreaction to the public pressure over the Ray Rice situation

The Ray Rice domestic violence case has been well documented and covered in sports and mainstream media. To summarize, Ray Rice, running back for the Baltimore Ravens, knocked his then-fiancée unconscious in an elevator. The usual outrage ensued with feminists everywhere calling for him to be kicked out of NFL for life, castrated, hung in the village square, and the like. That outrage increased exponentially when NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell suspended him for the first 2 games of the 2014-2015 NFL season which, apparently, wasn't enough to appease the angry mob.

McGinnis's article has all the details, but now the plot thickens. Because of public pressure the NFL has a new policy regarding domestic violence situations: First offense is a 6-game suspension. Second offense and you're banned for life. And now that the video of Rice actually striking Palmer in the elevator has come to light, he's been released by the Ravens in the prime of his career and Roger Goodell has suspended him indefinitely.

Of course the blue pill sports pundits have hailed the decision and seem to be backing this draconian edict, as well as the Ravens' decision to terminate his contract, but they still want more blood, using phrases like "The NFL was late to the party on this" and "There should be more to come for Rice." They don't even want any other NFL team even giving him a shot. Never mind the fact that those same personalities joked and chuckled when Solange attacked Jay-Z in an elevator. They have also completely ignored the fact that Hope Solo, goal keeper for the women's U.S. National Soccer team, is back on the playing field after being in court to answer for domestic violence charges against her.

This overreaction is becoming commonplace in the world of sports, and it's sickening. Taking away something a man's livelihood simply to appease public outrage is ridiculous, especially for something that has as much gray area as domestic violence. Many think the NFL is trying not to alienate its female fan base with this announcement. I'm no economist, but if every woman in America stopped watching football I'm fairly confident the NFL wouldn't suffer any significant profit loss.

Don't misunderstand me—I'm certainly not advocating men beating their wives for no reason at all, but I'm not going to say it's okay for a man to take a beating from a woman without, at the very least, trying to defend or separate himself from her. This becoming increasingly difficult to do, as women will now often block a man's way out of a potentially volatile situation or attack him in a space where an exit is not readily available, such as a moving automobile or an elevator a la Solange. Trust me, this is no accident—females are keenly aware of their surroundings and won't hesitate to exploit them to their benefit.

The NFL has literally made it open season on its most valuable asset and surprise, surprise, two domestic violence accusations have already been made against 49ers Ray McDonald, and Jets receiver Quincy Enunwa less than a week after the new policy was put in place. You can bet your bottom dollar that more are on the way, and if you think for one second this is just a coincidence, think again.

It won't be long before the NBA, NHL, and MLB follow suit. Before we know it, there won't be any players on the field worth talking about.

Jonathan Martin

Last season former Miami Dolphins offensive lineman Jonathan Martin quit the team, citing emotional reasons. The reader's digest (and politically incorrect) version is that some of his teammates were busting his balls and he couldn't handle it. Period. When the details came to light there was a media firestorm vilifying the "poisonous locker room culture" throughout professional sports, namely football because it's the sport that exhibits the most machismo.

Ultimately the conversation veered into the realm of bullying, hazing, and "harassment" in sports. Sportscasters, radio talk show hosts, and TV personalities lined up to pile on Richie Incognito (below on the right), the main source of Martin's heckling. When the smoke finally cleared, the Dolphins released Incognito and Martin sat out the entire 2013 season. One of the most telling aspects of the fallout from this ordeal is that Martin has been picked up by the San Francisco 49ers, while Incognito has yet to be signed by another team.

Incognito's current exile is a direct result of the blue pill mindset that is now prevalent in today's NFL. The wall-to-wall coverage was hard enough to stomach, but the narrative stating that testosterone-fueled 25-year-olds need to be more cognizant of each other's feelings was outright laughable.

This entire "tragedy" could have been avoided had Martin, who stands 6'5" and weighs over 300 lbs, known how to assert his dominance, which shouldn't be hard for a guy his size. But because he was raised by a weak father in a blue pill household he had no idea how to do so. How do I know he had a weak father, you ask? Because he chose to tattle on Incognito by texting his parents about his bully, rather than just kicking his ass for talking shit about his sister and mother.

In the end the media and the NFL took Martin's side, but the overwhelming majority of the players did not. They understand that hazing and ball-busting is a part of life for men. It's a rite of passage of sorts. We give each other shit. It's what we do. It's good to see that most players see it that way, but the response from everyone else tells me that the lid is rapidly tightening on masculinity in the National Football League. When it finally snaps shut, who knows what the game will look like?

(Dis)honorable Mentions

The increase in feminine presence at sports desks and sport talk radio shows that this runaway train isn't slowing down anytime soon. Mixing the rationalization hamster-laden female opinion with the simple, straightforward male analysis of professional sports is nothing short of a headache (for the record, I am 100% in support of hot sideline reporters as all they have to do is report the facts and look good).

Another shiv in the ribs of masculinity is NFL teams wearing pink gear for the entire month of October to bring more awareness to breast cancer. Breast cancer sucks, no doubt about it, but trust me, we're aware. Everybody is aware. Pink ribbons covering everything in sight and the countless TV specials year-round have made sure of that.

But what about prostate cancer, a disease that affects men? September is National Prostate Cancer Awareness Month but do you see NFL teams and players sporting light blue gear during that month to bring awareness to something that could affect them directly? Negative. They're forced to wear a feminine color for four games because women are so damned valuable and should be treasured, even if it means ignoring a disease that kills thousands of men every year.

In Closing

There are few things I enjoy more than having my buddies over to watch a full slate of NFL games on fall Sunday afternoons. Drinking brews, talking about girls, and arguing about whose team has the best QB is male bonding at its best. But receivers wearing pink gloves while the commentators drone on about the growing epidemic of domestic violence and crimes against women during the game is beginning to wear very thin on me, and I'm willing to bet I'm not the only man who feels this way.

Watching and following sports is something I've taken refuge in since I was a kid. It used to be a welcome alternative to following sensationalized mediums like local news and politics. But the increasing PC overtones on issues like this is making my longtime passion nearly unrecognizable. The NFL's popularity and loyal following is growing by the second, but if the white knighting and female pandering continues at this alarming rate, it may soon have one fewer fan.

Read Next: How Hypocrisy Prevents True Gender Equality

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

How To Defeat Feminism (ROK Mailbag)

September 9, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Young love

Will writes:

> Hello
> I'm 18 from Norway and an active reader of ROK. There is a chick I've been on one date with. I was going to ask her out for a second but she turned it down because she was going at a dinner party that evening. Anyways I am home alone this coming week and would like for her to come to my place for a movie and eventually bang her. One thing she is 16 and has to be home at 12 o´clock. I feel like I've lost a little ground by asking her out and being turned down because she simply couldn't. So the question "how to ask a girl to hang in a way that she can't say no, a bullet proof way to ask her to hangout, without being rejected"?
> I would normally resolve these sort of minor challenges myself, but I am very curious of your opinion on this particular subject.
>
> Extra info:
>
> I've been playing aloof game for the most Maintaining pride during this one particular chase and not investing money or too much time in her. I kissed her after the first date. Yeah and most communication happens via message.

It seems from your description that she did not counter your offer with another date or time that she could meet up. Often times, this is a sign of disinterest and you are going to have an uphill battle. If she did want to see you again, she would have suggested another date when she was free. However this does not mean you should dismiss her, because you never know with women.

I would wait a minimum of a week to ask her out again. It may be the case a week has already passed since your second date invite. Your question of how to ask a girl out without her saying no is not a viable question because there is no such thing as a rejection-proof way to ask someone out. Sometimes when asking a girl out, I will not ask. I will mention what I'm doing and let them know they are welcome to join.

In your case, you can text her and say something along the lines of "Have some wine here and going to watch a movie, let me know if you want to join." Obviously tailored to both your style, situation (maybe she doesn't drink and smokes weed instead) and the way you have been communicating so far. If she wants to come, she will say ok. If she gives you an excuse and does NOT provide an alternate date, you can let it go. If she does give you an alternate date, then you can go from there.

Don't overthink it. If she doesn't work out just remember there is an endless supply of girls out there. And make sure to check your age of consent laws.

– Law Dogger

The college dilemma

ThePrince writes:

> ROK, I'm a senior in high school. I have the grades and test scores to potentially go to a few Universities with an excellent reputation, but I'm also applying to several State schools with good financial aid. My parents think the reputation of those private schools is worth the 20k+ difference in cost a year, but I'm not convinced that the more expensive choices are worth it in obtaining a STEM degree. I desperately need a masculine perspective on University. Does ROK think I should sacrifice reputation for cheap cost? I know that I need a STEM degree to make college worth it, but what kind of STEM degree do I need to become location-independent? Engineering? Computer Science?
>
> Any advice you can offer about University, college life, or applying to schools would be greatly appreciated. I really want to succeed, but I don't know how, or who to ask for advice. Thank you in advance!

Are your parents footing the full bill? If so, go to the best school possible. If they are not paying your way, disregard their opinions about reputations vs. value. Their experience with colleges comes from an era where basically any degree was enough to get a decent-paying job, so they're assuming you'll be able to pay off the increased debt you take on for slightly higher prestige. This is where most people get in trouble.

One thing I can tell you unequivocally is that if you have the grades and test scores to go to a truly elite university, you should do it. We're not talking a "nice liberal arts college"—Your diploma must have the name of Ivy League school, MIT, Stanford, or one of a select few others to get the benefits of shelling out the kind of money colleges are charging these days. Keep in mind that a STEM degree is not necessary for future success if you go to a top-tier school, since there are a lot of English or political science majors who go into finance, consulting, banking, etc. You'll meet more future elites in political science classes than in engineering classes at these schools.

If you're not able to go to a truly elite school, you should think about whether your chosen career path requires college at all. The author of 30 Days To X dropped out of college to pursue self-employment and location independence, and has a bunch of great advice about the pros and cons of that path. Captain Capitalism also has tons of practical advice for college-age men. If you're set on college despite not getting into a difference-making school, go to the best one possible that gives you enough financial aid so you will not have any debt when you graduate, and probably concentrate on a STEM degree.

For the second part of your question, the thing you need to become location independent is not a degree, but skills. A computer science degree, for example, will do nothing for you if you cannot write code or network computers. Very little of modern academia focuses on teaching you skills that someone will actually pay for. This is probably by design. You need to research potential career paths, find the skills behind them, and start learning them on your own regardless of what you decide about formal schooling.

– Black Knight

On becoming a better writer

Skoll writes:

> I'm building my own Manosphere website and would like to know how I can develop and improve my writing skills. I'm looking for a more specific advice other than the usual "read more" or "write more".
>
> I would also like to know more about style and the subject of catering to the audience and writing in a way that captivates the reader.
>
> And lastly, how does the writer know what the reader wants? How do you balance between giving into the demand and keeping a solid foundation for yourself?

Skoll—You asked for some techniques on how to be a better writer. You asked not to hear the advice of "read more" and "write more." Unfortunately, those two pieces of advice are the only pieces of advice that actually work. Everything else is just window-dressing. OK, well, maybe I would add one other tidbit: "Live more, fuck more, and get beaten up by life more." You're asking, in effect, how to become a better runner without practicing running.

Can't be done, there, chief-a-roni. Cannot.

Writing is hard work. It takes dedication, life experiences, a foundation of exposure to good writing, and a focused intensity. If you're not prepared for that, don't start a blog.

As for writing to "please your audience"…none of us write for that reason. Writers write to exorcise their demons, to satiate their passions, to get revenge on their ex-wives, to try to bang the girl next door, to repress their violence, to psych themselves up, to flaunt their scrotums: it's done for all these reasons. And more.

Your audience doesn't know what it wants until you put it in front of them. And you'd goddamn well better believe in what you're writing.

If it doesn't come from the heart, if it doesn't come from that dark place inside, it's going to be shit.

Write about that you know. Don't write about things you don't know. People can spot a phony a mile away. You're better off writing about marine life in the Great Barrier Reef (if that's your passion) than regurgitating some insipid bullshit just for page hits.

Follow your passion, hoss. And I'll follow you.

– Quintus Curtius

Fighting the good fight

A reader writes:

> How would you beat feminism?

1. Mockery. Make the person you want to persuade laugh. They'll lower their emotional guard to where they give you a chance at sharing your facts. Lindy West is a good example of this. We mocked her so hard for her outrageous body size that she is forever linked to being a whale instead of whatever talking points she was trying to disseminate.

2. Point out hypocrisy. People will tune out any ideology that is not consistent with their platform. If you're able to present incidents of feminist hypocrisy to the masses, they will eventually stop listening to their complaints. Gamer gate, which is a result from corruption and double standards in the gaming journalist industry, has awakened many guys to the damage that feminists and SJWs cause. It was too glaring to ignore.

3. Articles and video based on fact. While facts are hard to swallow for the hardcore feminist adherents, they represent a good way to draw in those who are already sympathetic to our cause. More work can be done in finding those men who are already on our side but don't yet know we exist. Such a collected mass can continue refining the message and eventually offer pushback on the nonsense that the other side tries to disseminate.

You can find more ideas here.

– Roosh

Baby rabies

Cristian writes:

> I'm 20 years old and have had the same girlfriend for almost a year(I should have cut it off a long time ago, I know). She is 27 years old and is barely entering her university major. We've been having mostly raw dog sex for this past year, and by some miracle, or as I call it, me pulling out and her not liking it, no pregnancy > has occurerd, though we have had a few scares. She always hates it when I try to use condoms and even refuses to do so on her fertile days. I'm getting pretty sick of this. She insists she can't have kids, despite the fact she's always crying that she wants kids in the future. I'm too young to be stuck with some old bat and a rugrat from someone I didn't want as a wife or a mother. What is your opinion on this?

You answered your own question. Run away. Run quickly.

That's all for this week. There were some great questions asked in the comments thread of the announcement post—if you would like those questions answered be sure to send them via email or the anonymous form.

Read More: Gaming In School Is Not Enough

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

Why Would A PUA Get Married? An Interview With Paul Janka

September 10, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

In 2005 Paul Janka published an ebook called Getting Laid in NYC. TV appearances on Dr. Phil and The Today Show and an Excel spreadsheet of his conquests upset Jezebel and Gawker, but inspired men to emulate his style of daygame. Having grown his pick-up business and moved to London, he recently revealed that he will be getting married to his English fiancée next year. So why does a red pill man give up the game? Troy Francis caught up with Janka to talk pickup, the pitfalls of the playboy lifestyle, the manosphere, and marriage.

You've been very successful disseminating a method for cutting through societal crap like prolonged dating and getting sex quickly, but there were some negative voices early on, particularly from Jezebel and Gawker. Was that tough to deal with?

Not really. I redoubled my resolve against those voices. But I guess there was a reputational cost when I tried to move into normal society, which I've had to manage.

A lot of the criticism was from feminized, blue pill sources.

True, but more simply it was from women. And they weren't our paying customers so in a way I didn't give a shit. The comments on the blog for The Today Show were fascinating. Guys championing me, and the women being critical. For all the Disney-fication of modern America and playing nice, the sexes are highly antagonistic still and really couldn't agree less.

It would be great to get some tips on game from you for readers who are just starting out or are looking to sharpen up. Your method is very simple: approach a high volume of women in the daytime, get their phone numbers quickly before ejecting, send out mass texts and then go for sex with those who are most responsive. But others recommend building rapport for longer after approaching by going on instant dates and so on.

My tactics emerged in a very pragmatic way. I would see a girl very quickly often in a transitory situation like a subway station but would have to be somewhere, so instant dates were never an option. If a guy steps out of his office for coffee, he doesn't have time to hang around. I don't think instant dates are an option for most gainfully employed men. So my game was about very quick conversations and bookmarking it for later by getting the phone number.

Also, in NYC you have very target-rich environments–thirty hot girls in Union Square, say. Because I had no idea which number would follow through, my goal was to get as many as possible. Every time you're talking to one girl you're not talking to the next one. There's nothing more annoying than an even sexier one walking right past you. If you keep it short you have a better chance of covering ground.

Your writing is very red pill, for example: At its core, the "game" is really this dance – getting the milk without buying the cow . . . It's plain that women have a much better system for getting what they want. They also have the support of a society that defends their agenda.

It's a script women are handed from an early age. It's not their fault. Although technology and modern dating culture has deteriorated that a bit. We live in a hook-up culture and now men have a sweet spot with technology. The smartphone is a savior—being able to access a lot of women on your terms with no cost is an incredible advantage. We've been able to scale our tomcatting, and women have few defenses as they don't know if you're sincere.

You have also written: The amount of fun sex you enjoy on your terms is directly proportional to your level of personal discipline. When I approach women and deal with them everyday, I engage them on my own terms. Of course, some don't like it. That's the discipline.

I was lucky because though somewhat inexperienced when I got into this, I had some female attention. A guy who comes into game with insecurities, the first time an attractive woman shows him attention and puts the bait out, he's a goner—he's like a dog. He'll bite down and hang onto that thing forever and she'll drag him through the mud. What I mean by personal discipline is being able to cut something that's tantalizing knowing that there'll be five more pieces behind it. Also to know that if she's jerking you left then that's not where it's going to end—she's also going to jerk you right. So you need to open your mouth and let the bait go. But guys operating from a place of insecurity won't do that so they get fucking smashed.

Abundance is key to successful game.

Yes. And ironically it's reinforcing. The less you care the more women will be attracted to you.

What would you say to the guy reading this who doesn't have abundance though?

Fake it to make it. And in a big city like London, New York, even LA there's so many women that if you work on your verbal rap and work through the embarrassment and failure in the beginning you'll eventually achieve a critical mass that'll teach you something. Then you'll develop discipline.

You advise building up an inventory of phone numbers – say forty – and then mass texting and seeing what comes back.

Many guys start out wanting to fuck five women a week but there's a lot of things that can go wrong. A good exercise is to realise that out of fifty numbers I might not fuck any of these girls, or only go on a couple of dates. Don't get attached. You're doing it to get into the vibe, and it might take six months. See them as throwaway numbers.

You're famous for the statistic that 11% of numbers you got ended in sex.

Yes, people love that! It's approximately one in nine. So if I get eighteen numbers in a day then that's two confirmed fucks.

Some think it's a high figure, others don't, but one in nine from phone numbers then that sounds good to me. It's interesting that Krauser's 2013 results were nearly identical – 27 lays from 250 numbers is 10.8%!

There you go baby! Isn't that crazy? The universal number. Let's get nine girls here now: "one of you will be fucked by the end of the evening!"

Kinda like an Agatha Christie novel, but with game.

Sure. And given that it's a verified statistic from several players, there's no benefit to paying undue attention to any of the nine, because one will fuck and the other eight won't no matter what I do.

It's encouraging – if a guy goes out and approaches enough he will get results. But you're tall, good-looking, well-educated and urbane. Also you operated in NYC, a great place for game. How would you counter guys who say that without your advantages they wouldn't see the same success?

That's fair thing. But I think the biggest advantage on that whole table is NYC—which is within reach of most guys if they make it a priority. I've coached men in small towns and told them to move to New York. If it's that important then make a life change. Anonymity within a big city is absolutely key. I grew up with guys who were equally good-looking – charismatic athletes, very popular, but all of them capped out at about 75 bangs and are now married. That's partly because the settling down age is younger, but also because LA is just not as accessible and daygame friendly or anonymous as NYC.

The biggest hindrance to guys trying to get laid is that women don't want to get judged by their friends. Read Joseph W. South, Practical Female Psychology for the Practical Man. She's not going to put her social standing in jeopardy. The anonymity of NYC allows women to take the shot and never make excuses. I've met girls on the subway, proper girls who would never want their friends to think they're slutty, I've taken their number discreetly and we've had two or three sessions. I'm sure they've never told their friends they shagged some guy they hardly knew. You can only do that in a large anonymous city. So of all those attributes, living in a big city is replicable and my biggest advantage. Yeah, of course looks play a part, but even a guy below average can improve his results.

And without meaning to denigrate him, Krauser is probably less classically good-looking than you, and yet his results come out the same. And the girls he hooks up with are beautiful.

There you go. And actually frame, masculinity and good rap—controlling the situation verbally—are more important than looks. A below-average guy with frame and very good control of language, and most importantly a plan, can crush it. Confidence is fundamentally built on having a game plan. The reason it falls away is the guy doesn't know what to do next, but if you have a system you've done a hundred times that's got you laid then no matter who the girl is you know exactly what to do next, and that's what turns her on.

Mojo, or state, is really important too. You write: 'There is something unique to the attitude and body language of a player – he's cocky, self-assured and unflappable. He can talk to women in a way that indirectly (or, if he chooses, directly) makes the interaction sexual. He takes liberties that others may find offensive, or at least objectionable. But, women take off their wet panties for him.' How can guys acquire this?

Internet porn, commingled with actual sexual exploits allowed me to see each curvaceous young woman as a totally sexual being and she could feel that energy. Also caffeine, and walking outdoors and the visual stimuli of New York helped—I think they were all intertwined. But the answer is to just practice—you'll find moments when you're inspired but also moments when you're flat.

And you have to become hardened to rejection—you say somewhere that the more a man is getting laid, the more rejections he will have had along the way.

For a lot of new guys that sounds paradoxical, but you're not getting laid a lot unless you're also getting a lot of women pissed off at you! Men have can have a false belief that women are these attractive, uniform beings but they're distinct like men are—some are bitches, some are poor communicators, some are hung up. There's a hundred reasons why she was a bitch on the street and a guy who sees a failed interaction as a direct reflection of him or his game is wrong. One day I would crush it and the next I'd be drawing blanks as the same guy.

Do you have a view on the so-called manosphere?

I think it's great that women have been taking gender studies for a long time and now men en masse are too under this guise. It's valuable knowledge. If there's any Achilles heel it's that men have to be aware of life stages, and how they're different. I think there's sometimes a sense of inevitability—all women are going to lead you down this path—and universalism—all men face this—that I don't agree with. I think there are a series of different outcomes and I don't think that's always allowed for enough.

On relationships you have said: The big ruse of monogamous relationships is that women have succeeded in convincing us to voluntarily enter into a situation in which we have no sexual alternatives. Think about that. The way the institution is set up, men willing agree to forgo all the other sexual options so that their woman is happy. If that's not evidence of a woman's agenda and her control of the situation, then I don't know what else is. Of course, given our biology, monogamy is a much easier concession (generally speaking) for women than for men, who are designed to spread their seed.

And unless you've experienced the opposite—a lot of different sexual partners—then you don't really know what you're giving up. So it's good to have that first so you can really quantify both sides.

But you recently announced your engagement.

Yes—in the face of all this evidence!

Many readers will wonder why – you had a honed method and a life of sexual abundance that could have continued.

Regarding the manosphere, while I commend everyone for grappling with these big questions, a lot of men want offspring. Aside from the mini-relationship, there hasn't really been a good alternative structure proposed. Chasing girls is fun when you have a core group of guys and continuity in your life. When you're looking at women as disposable sexual objects then there's so much churn and no one follows your life with any interest.

My parents will age and eventually die and most of our other male friends who follow the social script disappear into the suburbs and then take limited or circumscribed interest in us. So in my thirties all my running mates in NYC who provided support and had an interest in my narrative started to fall away. If we don't have a witness to our lives it's quite meaningless. You feel that really profoundly in NYC, where my pack of wolves became increasingly motley, as most "quality" guys got locked down into marriage.

As I started to make more money I realized I'd run the pattern of having sex with hot young women enough and I knew what it looked like. I wanted to travel, have unique experiences. If I take a wonderful trip with someone, I want to be able to reference that trip in five years with that same person. If you're going to invest in someone, it has to be someone with long-term potential, not just some booty call. Finally, I met a girl whose character was in many ways superior to mine and I said wow, I want to hitch my horse to this cart.

I don't think there's a party line on marriage per se in the manosphere. I think actually a lot of guys would love the happy ending we were all brought up to believe possible, if the prospects with Western women didn't appear so bleak. The issue is with hypergamy, divorce rate, alimony and child support and so on. And 70% of divorces are initiated by women.

Why would they voluntarily release themselves back into the sexual marketplace after their expiration date?

Well, now we have the mythology of the cougar. It's delusional thinking inculcated by the culture.

Game teaches men to screen for sluttiness in women to find girls who are going to give us a blowjob in the next 45 minutes, but you need another filter to screen for character for marriage and for the mother of your children. The screening techniques of game are antithetical for screening for a mate.

There are romantic notions of women in partnerships and pragmatic ones. It's very easy to get beguiled by a damaged or dangerous woman, and I think the manosphere is fixated on the idea that relationships are supposed to be passionate, but there's a whole other side. The idea of a pragmatic union of people who can bring certain skills to the table so together their skillbase is sufficient to provide a home and education for young children. Marriage was a practical union prior to the 1940s. Pickup and game sites deal with the front-end: I don't know if this other side has been considered sufficiently.

Many believe that sex with hot young women in their twenties is the only form of congress that should be of interest to men, and there are a lot of jokes about girls hitting the wall after a certain age.

Think about it this way: many of us have loving, affectionate relationships with our mothers, but our mothers are old and their tits are sagging. Should they be dragged off somewhere? No, their opinions are still important to us and we want their validation. And I think for a man to be successful at life he should recognise his youthful erotic nature, but as he ages he should transition into a more respectful relationship with a woman that perhaps resembles more what he has with his mother. Men who fail to do that might be cut off at the knees.

Finally, has having a fiancée affected your work, given the line of business you're in?

All my material on pick-up is timeless, but going forward I would like to transition the business. Our list of customers is also growing older, and they may be interested in more functional relationship material and so on.

To find out more about Paul click here.

Read More: The Difference Between A Woman's Behaviour And Her Intent

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Why Is Janay Rice Standing By Her Man?

September 10, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Boy meets girl. Boy and girl fall in love. Boy and girl get into argument, and boy punches girl out and drags her out of an elevator. Girl then marries boy.

Sound right? Of course not. But this is exactly what happened with Ray and Janay Rice. The outcry following this incident is what is quite interesting. As I'm writing this I switched to two news channels (visiting family, don't worry I didn't get a TV) and they are interviewing women on domestic violence. Hundreds of articles have been written with everyone and their mothers sharing their viewpoints on the situation, what the punishment should be, and the effects of domestic abuse on women. The media is having a field day with this incident.

To summarize, Janay gets punched the eff out and the day after her then fiance Ray was indicted on aggravated assault charges, she married him. She did not just refuse to break up with him, or stay by his side, but she actually made a vow for life by way of marrying the guy who knocked her unconscious and dragged her out of an elevator. Actions speak louder than words.

Then again words also speak. The day after the NFL suspended Rice indefinitely and the Ravens terminated his contract, Janay in addressing the media coverage again comes to his side, by posting this to her Instagram:

Note that she will continue to show the world what “real love” is. And that the media is taking something away from who she refers to as the “man I love.” Is this surprising? Not at all. What is interesting however is how little the media surrounding this event consider Janay’s own thoughts and desires. Instead, endless opinions on how Janay should have acted. And following her Instagram post and her decision to stay and pursue “real love” there are now twitter campaigns to raise “awareness” about domestic violence and rationalize her actions.

How The Ray Rice Incident Fits Into What We Know About Women

Women have thrown themselves at serial killers. We all know how girls always go for “bad boys.” Hell, a few years after OJ was acquitted for killing Nicole Brown Simpson and Ron Goldman I personally saw a young blond with OJ holding hands. Some women are so drawn to these types of men that no amount of logic or reason will stop it.

I will stop for a second and vehemently and blatantly state that I do not advocate or condone what Ray Rice did to his now wife. I won’t go so far as to say there is never a reason to hit a woman, because I can find plenty of reasons, but based on this video in a vacuum this was not one of those cases. Ray is an NFL running back putting him in the top one-tenth percent of strength and power in the world. If you’ve seen the video, that hook will send most men down much less a woman of her size. His actions were not justified (from what I can see from the video at least). Even after he knocks her out he shows no remorse or care and is almost treating like a UPS delivery box pushing her around with his feet.

There are a few basic tenets in game that are widely known, universally accepted and are considered almost hard facts when dealing with and trying to bed a woman. For example, you never ask permission to kiss a girl. Or perhaps that you don't show up with flowers on a first date. Avoiding the friendzone is part of these basics. Another that we have written about on ROK before is about how women like it rough. (See here and here as a few examples).

I have too much personal experience and evidence to ignore this. Speak with any of your buddies that have success with women and they will all say the same thing. Women love to be thrown around, choked, spanked, and overall completely dominated in the bedroom. I can inundate you with examples but let's save that for another time.

Now if you want to take this idea off the far extreme, and I'll leave that up to you, look no further than the instant Ray Rice saga. It can be example number 4,815 of just how far off the end one can go (note – not should go) in being rough with a woman and her still remaining right by your side. My pre-red pill remants and the inherent good guy in me doesn't want to believe this is true. The Jezebels of the world will die trying to make sure you don't believe it's true.

And this could be the case of course. Janay may have realized she just lost her meal ticket to a happy and rich life and is willing to do whatever it takes to try and salvage it. She did somehow convince Roger Goodell—the commissioner of the NFL who is beyond trigger-happy to suspend players over much less offenses—to initially agree to just a two game suspension after seeing the video (and all signs point to him having seen the true video back then too). Or she has a variation of Stockholm Syndrome, who knows. But a decent argument can be made that she just simply loves Ray, despite his abusive actions.

Read Next: How Hypocrisy Prevents True Gender Equality

L.D. Hume

L.D. Hume, formerly known as Law Dogger, is an attorney and the litigation partner of his law firm. A traditionalist at heart, he travels often in an attempt to expose himself to as many cultures across the globe as possible. His column runs every so often and he can be found on Twitter as well.

Here Is What You Should (And Shouldn't) Do When Buying A New Suit

September 10, 2014 | by KK. | Link | Original Link

As much as fashion is about following rules, it's also about breaking them. Still, it's always good to have a foundation. And it is with that in mind that we give you this list of some basic do's and don'ts when it comes to suits:

Don't buy a style that isn't right for your body type

No matter how stylish short jackets are right now, for example, they will simply never be flattering to certain body types. For the lowdown on how to buy a suit that fits you like a glove, have a look at this for more details.

Don't pass up tailoring

If a bespoke suit isn't in your budget, that doesn't mean you can't still look great. It's perfectly okay to buy a suit off the rack, making sure it's reasonably within your size range (that is, the shoulders fall where your shoulders are, and it's not too tight or short anywhere), and then take it for tailoring. A tailor will make any necessary adjustments for a reasonable price. Even if your budget is tighter than an ill-fitting suit, don't be afraid to at least ask how much they charge. You'll probably be pleasantly surprised…and soon you'll have a suit that fits you perfectly.

Don’t buy a suit with sagging shoulders

Even if you go to a tailor to fix the way the suit fits, there may not be not much they can do if the shoulders don’t fall where yours do. If there’s only one thing you check when you try on a jacket (and actually, there are a few more—again, feel free to check out our suit-buying guide for more info), make it the shoulders, for the love of all that is good and right in the world!

Do try to vary materials

If you can afford more than just the basics, why not change up the material your suit is made of? Tweeds and even certain stylish corduroys are great for winter, and a linen suit can be a godsend in the summer heat.

Do consider the gray suit

Although black is the most common color choice for suits today, consider dark gray, at least as the color of your second suit. Dark gray has a timeless feeL—think of how many men in classic movies and TV shows are decked out in it. It will make you stand out in a crowd of black-suited peers, and at the same time, you’ll show impeccable style.

Do accessorize

No matter how sharp you look in your suit, the right accessories can make you look even sharper. Pay attention to the color of the tie you choose, or why not add a pocket square? Colorful or patterned socks can also be a fun touch—Just make sure you don’t look ridiculous. Stick with geometric patterns, not motifs like cartoon characters or little hearts or such.

In fashion, some rules are made to be broken. But these should generally give you a good foundation that will help you look great any time you put on your suit!

And since I'm a hardcore pocket square lover…

I will not let you go before I share with you the two main tips when it comes to wearing a p*ochette*, as we like to call them here in France. So here we go:

Contrast when wearing a pocket square

There really are no rules when it comes to your personal style, but it is important not to match your look completely. You want to add a different element with your pocket square, so it is best to contrast this fabric with the rest of your look. This means that you should not choose a pocket square that is identical to your tie.

Try to have a little more adventure by matching a striped blue tie with a polka dot pocket square pattern in a contrasting color. It is also important to not pick a pocket square color that matches your suit. If you have a navy suit, you should opt for a bold pocket square like an emerald green. You can be subtle or over the top, but always remember that contrasting is your goal. Remember also not to over-accessorize: if you choose a tie pin, for example, you should probably forego the pocket square.

Be creative, my friend…Be CREATIVE!

The best part about wearing pocket squares is that you have the ability to be playful and try out different looks. You should not be afraid to wear bold colors or fun patterns. Silk pocket squares often are made of the highest quality and look the best in formal suits, but you can purchase pocket squares in a variety of fabrics. There are even fabric pocket squares that are designed for more casual wear. With so many different options to choose from there is no excuse not to join in on this reoccurring timeless trend.

Here’s to your success!

Read Next: 8 Ways To Look Great In A Suit

KK.

Kamal is a French Blogger, Stylist and Founder of Glamorous Pochette : Perfectly unique & exquisite pocket squares cut from superior Moroccan silk.

Thirty Seven: A Book About The Nature Of Masculine Identity

September 10, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A writer who can write about what he likes has the comfort of a sanguine conscience. Not for him are the nail-biting sessions of anxiety about what Tom, Dick, or Harry may think about this or that. He can applaud himself for saying what he believes, and giving counsel as he sees fit. “I would rather be flogged,” wrote D.H. Lawrence, “than be liked by most people.”

Holding nothing back is far more often a blessing than a curse: to be true to one’s nature may be one definition of happiness. When someone once asked Stephen King why he wrote stories, his answer began with the sentence, “You are assuming I have a choice in the matter.” What he meant, of course, was that he was driven by an inner compulsion to write. I found the same sentiment expressed in a piece of dialogue written by the Italian humanist Giovanni Pontano, in his work Charon. He puts the following exchange in the mouths of his protagonists:

> “Your wisdom shows itself from all sides. But, you pain in the ass, what are you trying to achieve with these things?”
>
> “What I actually did arrive at.”
>
> “Which was?”
>
> “That I am a fly, and am so seen by everyone.”

It would be hard to improve on this observation. Nothing has ever needed writing about more than what we write about in the manosphere today. There has been a growing feeling—for many years now—that something is fundamentally wrong with gender relations and society in the Anglosphere countries. A certain worldview has taken hold of our societies, somehow, in the preceding decades, that has had the net result of disenfranchising men and relegating masculinity to remote frozen wastes.

Men have been in an "Age of Turbulence" for many decades now

To meet this existential challenge, men have had to look backwards in time—to the ages before feminism, before political correctness, and before the ideology of nihilism took root in our societies. It has become necessary to restate and codify the ideology of masculinity: to examine its precepts, discover its richness, savor its subtlety, and reflect on its longevity.

We must range over the vast expanse of history, across the deserts and wastes, wade through the muck of moral ambiguity, and navigate the spider-webs of philosophical speculation. We have had to do this for ourselves. We can expect no help, no sympathy, and no support from others. I see my role in the manosphere as part of this effort, in some modest way.

I remember my own conversion. Looking back now, it seems almost inevitable. I somehow came across one of RooshV's old videos. There was just something about the delivery, the audacity, the deadpan wit, and the message that seized me by the throat. Imagine the audacity of this long-haired, whiskered young man, daring to say the things we all felt! Imagine, finally, someone who was not afraid to tell these commissars of culture what he really thought of them! Some long-smoldering fuse within me spluttered back to life.

I was led to his old website (remember the venerable blue-background?), and there found a trove of in-your-face articles that verbalized things I had long believed, but never fit into a comprehensive framework. “This,” I said to myself, “This is the man I’ve been looking for…now this is something I can do.” I would remain silent no longer. What an exhilarating feeling! From that moment, I resolved to take up the pen as my sword. I stepped forward, and have never looked back.

Last weekend I released my book Thirty Seven: Essays On Life, Wisdom, And Masculinity. It’s a collection of essays on a wide variety of subjects, with the unifying theme being the nature of masculine identity. Most of the essays are expanded and reworked versions of my best work here at Return of Kings. Some of the essays are entirely new, and appear in the book for the first time.

There are word and space limitations on what can be done in a blog article; the book format gave me the freedom to expand on important points, delve into greater detail, and add more colors to the canvas. My goal was to explore the nature of masculine virtue, in all its varied forms throughout history. Some of the articles include: “On Barbarism,” “How A Wise Man Should Reveal His Opinions,” “On Stoicism,” “I Am The Isthmus,” “The Fate of Boethius,” the fiction story “Rubber Ice,” and many more.

I will close here with an excerpt from the book’s Prologue. It gives a flavor of the whole, and it is actually part of a stand-alone story. If I had to give it a title, I’d call it “Rubber Ice.” It’s fiction, but loosely based on an incident that happened to me a long time ago.

> Rubber ice. That was what his brother Michael called it, those dark and mottled patches that dotted the sheet ice covering the pond near their house. It was an odd, counterintuitive phrase. He couldn’t quite understand the rubber part about it. Why rubber? Was it flexible? No, said Michael sternly, holding him by the cuffs of his pea-jacket and looking at him disapprovingly. It’s called that because it’s got no strength. It gives way. So don’t ever go on it, you understand me? He had nodded his head, as he always did when Michael gave him a lecture, knowing that his compliance with instruction would be decidedly situation-dependent. It wasn’t exactly that he didn’t believe his brother; it was just that he had to see, feel, and touch things for himself before he could calculate whether an admonition was worth following. It cannot be otherwise, when one is fifteen years old. It was like that when Michael had told him not to swim out past the barnacle-encrusted rock near the shoreline at the beach they went to every summer. What was the word he had used? Undertow, he remembered. That was it. But he had swum out past the rock anyway and never felt any undertow.

In the town's city hall, there had been an announcement that bags of coal were to be trucked in starting in late December. The deliveries would continue as demand required for the remainder of the winter. These great seventy-five pound bags were a dirty, clumsy load to handle; the job of handling them fell to those unfortunate enough to be unable to delegate the task themselves. So the chore of transporting several bags to his family's house near Revere Street fell on the capable shoulders of the boy, who relished the importance of his appointment for the job by his father. It was about two and a half miles in total from town hall to his house.

He brought with him a sturdy sled with wide steel runners, with a thin five-foot rope attached to the front. The boy had always been surprised at how much weight could be dragged with the sled, as long as the load was balanced and he had a secure grip on the rope. On this day, he had walked over to Town Hall from his house with the empty sled, loaded the bag of coal, and pondered the matter for a moment. He thought he would take a shortcut across the harbor ice on his way back home. It was not a decision he thought long about. It was late January, and Massachusetts winters then were colder than they are now.

Regular freezings of the harbor ice were not exactly frequent, but they did happen, and the boy had heard from a few of his friends that the ice was safe to walk on. His brother had disagreed. Hey. Rubber ice out there, you know that? This he had said meditatively to the boy, while chewing slowly on a morsel of salt pork during last Wednesday's supper. His eyes had locked for a moment on those of his younger brother, almost challenging him to contradict the statement. But the boy thought the better of it and had said nothing, remembering how such exchanges usually ended.

The boy pulled the coal-laden sled up to the edge of the shoreline and gazed across the surface of the ice. Dried cattails and mounds of crushed reeds poked here and there from the crusty shoreline. He paused for a moment, enjoying the stillness of this frigid expanse of flatness, watching the gentle swirlings of his chilled breath float away from his pursed lips to dissolve into the winter air. With the assistance of optical trickery and the foolishness of youth, to the boy it just did not seem far across the ice. Although some patches were covered unevenly with snow, from where he stood the ice appeared as sturdy and as permanent as a sheet of quarried marble.

On the horizon, the sunlight reflected off the white and grey outlines of distant houses and the occasional ship's rigging with incandescent steadiness, pulsing in waves of shimmering insistence. He tested the ice on the shoreline and was relieved to find it to be like walking on iron. His plan was to move quickly across the ice, pulling the sled behind him at a distance of about five feet; and on the ice its steel runners made it seem like no weight at all.

He had moved about five hundred feet from the shoreline when he began to be conscious of air pockets trapped beneath the surface ice; the pockets squeaked, squelched, and crackled as he moved over them, distributing itself with gaseous regularity in proportion to the weight he applied over it. And then he became aware, slowly, of a change in the quality of the harbor ice. It began to take on a darker hue, popping and crackling ominously as he moved himself and his coal sled over it. He paused before one dark patch as the crackling sounds gathered in an alarming crescendo, and he hastily tried to retrace his steps, when suddenly a gulf opened up in front of him and to his right.

It happened so quickly that he had no time for any preventive measure. Before he could unloop the sled's rope from his clenched mitten, and before he could raise his hands to steady himself or reach out for the ledge of ice in front of him, he dropped heavily into the slushy salt water. The sled crashed into the water behind him, going straight to the bottom and ripping off the mitten in his right hand. The sled's metal runner somehow glanced his exposed wrist and opened up an incision that the salt water instantly made him aware of. His chin slammed down on a large piece of ice has he plunged into the water, leaving another deep cut running from his jawline to his upper lip.

The book is available on Amazon. You can find it here. Readers wanting copies in other formats (PDF, .epub) should email me at .

Read More: When Galileo Pointed A Telescope To The Sky

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Everything Is All About Her

September 10, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Last weekend, after she'd had one vodka too many, I bent her over the bed from behind, head banging against the wall, pulling her hair and spanking her; then I slid gently into her ass. She moaned about how dirty she felt while grinding her clit, but started going quiet. When the pleasure had turned completely to pain I let her have it and rolled off her, onto my back. The trick is to make sure the heat of the moment doesn't cool off and turn into cold reality.

I was still hard after unloading into her rectum, which is unlike me because usually I'm a one-shot deal. I was smiling to myself, thinking I had "won"—Another mountain conquered—when she climbed on top of me and slid her pussy down onto me. Then came the words that made my hair stand on end:

> "I love to feel like I'm using you."

In that instant, the truth of the female was revealed in all it's ugliness.

One of the things that manosphere talks about is the fickle nature of women and how to get around it, but the ultimate point is never quite reached: it is always ALL ABOUT HER. It's fair enough for a person to look out for their own interests, but the duplicitous way in which the female goes about doing this must be fully exposed in a man's mind or he will fall into one or other of her traps (not to mention endless disappointment and heartbreak).

Relationships

She is not with you because she likes you, cares about you, or wants to build a future with you; she is with you because it suits HER purposes. Make no mistake in this regard; it doesn't matter whether it's short-term and you're the man about town who bangs like a champion, or she's thinking you'll make a half decent father: she's angling for benefits. If we extrapolate this it virtually neutralizes the terms alpha and beta. Both serve HER purpose.

Much of the female goals are instinctive. We could say that much of the male goals are also instinctive, but at least we are vaguely conscious of them. Why does that 19-year-old with the perky tits and perfect ass turn your head and leave you craving to bang her? Its nature's prerogative that you reproduce—that's all. In the case of the female, much of her prerogatives are almost entirely unconscious, making them so much more difficult to deal with.

She'll create drama and then offset it with mind blowing sex, say it's casual then get pregnant by accident. She'll try to make you jealous and then swear her undying love. None of it amounts to anything more than her chaotic, mismanaged drive to reproduce; something that most women need to fling themselves into like lemmings off a cliff, rather than constructing well thought out and complimentary partnerships with men. Nature laughs at the male, as the female constantly baits and switches him.

Sex

This thorny area has left many a man wanting to punch the walls in frustration. Sex with her is because IT SUITS HER. Sure there are all manners of techniques and approaches you can use to achieve having sex, but ultimately it happens because she wants it to happen.

She will give you a blow job, not because she wants to pleasure you and treat you well, but because it suits her purposes. Perhaps she doesn't want to have full sex with you, so this is a way of keeping your fire burning. You might have drunk too much and SHE wants sex, so this is a way to get you going. Perhaps she wants to impress you, try out a technique her BFF told her about or be able to gossip to her friends. There are many reasons and they all center around HER.

She will have sex with you because she wants to start or maintain a sexual relationship of some sort, because she feels horny, naughty, because she wants to get back at a boyfriend, because her BFF has a new boyfriend, because her mother told her it's high time she stopped being such a singleton, because she feels she owes you, or because she wants something from you. The list is almost endless, but there is always an agenda and none of it revolves around pleasing her man. She will cheat because it suits her or be loyal because it suits her.

Drama

Any kind of shit testing, attitude, cross examination, mindless banter (that she uses to gather intelligence), right through to all-out battle stations, has nothing to do with you. Even if she catches you pants down, balls-deep in her best friend, the ensuing fit is all about her. Men are not particularly great at dealing with emotional turmoil of any kind, least of all the low-level daily grind of minor blackmails. She knows this and it's a great weapon to make you feel weak.

A woman can create drama and turn on the taps when it suits her. It does her little real damage. I've known girls that are prone to bluesy, weepy states just because they have their period, and 10 minutes later they are shining like the Caribbean sun. To a man these kinds of emotions seem utterly tragic and quite draining. My month is ruined if I allow myself to fall into a state like that. Being around someone else that is dramatic, moody or turning the taps on and off, can be highly destructive to a man and THAT IS THE IDEA.

Using even the most subtle drama, complaints, huffy moods, criticisms, being needy and "in your way," getting worked up with her friends, gossiping, and so forth, will weaken you and make you less likely to stray. Most of it is not done consciously or on purpose and that's what makes it so difficult to pinpoint and avoid.

I've got to the point where I've trained my mind to filter most of it out. It's so painful to be around the female and all her irrational gibbering, that these days I have developed the smile, nod, look in the eye and “I hear what you are saying.” I hear it, but I don’t understand it, acknowledge it or even give it the slightest bit of credence in my mind. It’s a bit like traffic noise when I stand in the street.

Disorganization

It’s incredible to me how scatted the female can be. A woman who has an MBA and works a demanding career for a blue chip corporation, arranges product release schedules and marketing bulletins, cannot manage to keep a date, has a dozen excuses and is more slippery than a greasy pig. Her front of busy, scattered, and random has nothing to do with actually being like that—it simply suits her agenda. It’s nothing more than a smokescreen that allows her to play the field and make you work harder for pussy.

Women dream of being swept off their feet (and pounded senseless) by some dark handsome stranger. If they are not throwing up a never ending stream of disorganization, that will never happen. In actuality all it results in is a stressful and poorly-organized experience for the man in question. It’s all about her maintaining an appearance that she’s more valuable than she really is.

Make no mistake, though; when it suits her career, she decides to get pregnant, married, or undertake one of HER major life goals, she will be more organized than a platoon of Special Forces, and none of it will involve much co-operation with your good self. It’s all about her. In the meantime, expect random scatter, unpredictability, a drizzle of emotions, mindless conversation, time wasting, mood swings and more hopping and pecking than a cage full of canaries.

Conclusion

Above all, just don’t ever think you are getting something for nothing. As the saying goes, “pay peanuts, get monkeys”—and what do monkeys do ? They cheat, steal, bite, cackle, squeeze out babies willy nilly, fuck every alpha that comes along, throw stuff at you from their tree, and trash your belongings. Keep in mind that her agenda is always at the forefront of her actions, and you will be less likely to fall into her traps.

Read More: The Only Girl For Me

Why Hasn’t Feminist Emily Hopper Been Arrested For Assault?

September 11, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Two anti-circumcision protesters were assaulted this summer during a gay pride parade in San Francisco by a woman later identified as Emily Hopper. She was dressed as a fairy during the assault. You can watch it take place in the following video:

0:25: Emily is in view on the right side of the screen
0:30: She notices the protester’s sign and begins to have an emotional reaction
0:36: She mimics the finger-snap behavior of an urban female youth to show her intolerance of a dissenting opinion
0:41: She makes physical contact with the photographer, who has the legal right to film in a public space
0:43: Her hand was removed from the camera and she responds physically
0:58: White knight in green skirt attempts to come to her rescue
1:05: She continues her assault against protester signage
1:12: Another white knight comes in
1:18: She punches one of the protesters in the nose and then shoves him
1:31: She displays even more unbridled aggression

Here is photographic evidence that the woman in the video is indeed Emily Hopper:

Emily Hopper
August 2 near Lorus, GA, United States

Ive had to make mistakes to figure out who I am. Everyone has. But confidence is loving all the good and bad parts of you. And how you treat others reveals how secure you are with yourself. You will get no where in life hating yourself or others. This isn't directed towards anyone, just something I've had to learn, and wish I learned earlier in my life. Love yourself.

Some additional photos that are slightly NSFW can be found here.

A day after her identity was made public, she posted a response video on Youtube showing a healthy amount of cleavage while laying in bed wearing the same fairy costume. Predictably, she plays the damsel-in-distress angle that doesn't quite jive with we see in the above video. She also lies about being a teenager when she's actually in her mid 20's.

Would you bang?

Anti-circumcision is not a cause that ROK fights for, but nonetheless the protesters have legal protections granted by American law to protest and film in a public space without being physically assaulted. This isn't the first time that a feminist tried to silence a protester with violence. Earlier this year, UCSB feminist studies professor Mireille Miller-Young physically assaulted pro-life protesters after stealing their sign.

Miller-Young actually blamed slavery as the reason for her assault. I must remind you that slavery has not taken place on American soil within the past 149 years. She was rightfully arrested, charged, and given a sentence of 100 hours of community service. Emily also needs to be punished for her crime, because if a man attacked a feminist protester at a pro-choice jubilee, he would be arrested within an hour.

Why is Emily given a pass to break the law when such "privilege" to use violence is never given to men? If you believe that she should pay for her crime, contact the San Francisco District Attorney's Office with your concern that a violent member of the community is still loose on the streets.

The ROK staff disagrees on many issues with feminists, but we have never attempted to use violence to shut down opinions we don't like. America is a country founded upon the principle of free speech, even speech which has no basis in fact, logic, or reality. Unless we start severely punishing people like Emily Hopper and Mireille Miller-Young, we allow leftist activists to use intimidation, threats, and outright violence to erode our right to free speech.

As much as the left preaches tolerance and acceptance, their movement has shown to be dangerously intolerant. They've apparently gone mad with the gains they've made in the past ten years. By publicizing cases involving violent individuals like Emily Hopper, we hope that other leftists think twice about using their fists to show disagreement.

Read Next: Female University Student Carries Around Mattress She Was "Raped" On

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why I Quit Going To Your Church

September 11, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Every branch of American Christianity has a disproportionate percentage of women. This was an open secret when I used to go, and they tried everything to remedy it with men's prayer breakfasts, war-themed posters, and screamo music. Of course, I use the word "everything" loosely. Try as they might, there's something fundamental about 21st century American Christianity that is repelling men, and this is a big problem if you want your virgins to marry "a good Christian guy."

Caveat: The only exception to this sex disproportion is Eastern Orthodoxy, which is a collection of immigrant communities and socially malcontent converts. If you've ever met an Orthodox, especially a convert, you'll find they often have the same contempt for protestantism and Catholicism as the most virulent homoeroticist. So for the purposes of this article, I'm not considering them American Christians.

Here are my reasons why I quit going to your church:

1. Your music is saccharine

Christians assume that a distorted guitar is the definition of rock music. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Rock music is as much a philosophy as it is a sound. I heard time again growing up, "The only problem with secular music is the lyrics." This is nonsense because in every genre, music and lyrics are innately connected. Imagine "Something in the way" by Nirvana with Jesus lyrics. It just doesn't work.

But of course churches soften the "guitar and drums" element, and you'll never hear a guitar solo that has any integrity. Perhaps there was some merit to early Christian rock (perhaps), but songwriters now simplify the chords so that churches can play it. So you'll never find an A7 #9 in a church with "contemporary rock". Because, you know, those extra two notes in the chord are just too hard to pull off. You might even have to have an extra volunteer guitar player, and the mild dissonance could make people uncomfortable with their edgy new form of worship.

"But worship is about lyrics, not music!" cries the Christian who glossed over everything I just said. Your lyrics are also sacharine. If you look at Bob Dylan's "Slow Train Coming" (1979), you'll find that at least there were a variety of topics on display. Not every song was a praise song. Some were simply doctrinal teaching songs, like the old hymns. Today, your lyrics are so hollow that many musicians are rewriting (and ruining) old hymns on their Christian rock praise albums.

If nobody is capable of writing anything with substance, then maybe the secularists are right that all Christians are stupid. And no, the exception of David Crowder doesn't negate the broad-sweeping reality.

I don't want to go to church to be entertained, because I can experience that at home. The world can entertain me far better than your ragtag band of volunteers and non-profit workers. If I want to experience religion, I want something otherworldly. I want an escape. Religion is supposed to be an opiate after all, but playing shitty soft rock is a reminder that I'm stuck on earth instead of in the next life.

But music isn't the only source of entertainment…

2. Your sermons sound like a high school assembly

It seemed like every sermon was either about getting through hard times or being obedient to God. Most pastors I ran into knew fuck-all about the Bible and basic doctrine, which I guess is a product of giving a seminary degree to anyone with "a call from God."

And what's with the props? My childhood pastor brought a fishing boat on stage to illustrate being fishers of men or something. How insulting is that? I'm a grown adult, and I don't need constant visual stimulation to pay attention to a lecture that I'm already interested in. I woke up early, dressed nice, and drove here to listen to you prattle. You've already got my attention.

One year for Easter, we took the song "Celebrate Good Times" and gave it Jesus lyrics. We also had cheerleaders with streamers. It felt very reverent for the most sacred day on the calendar. But the pastors weren't aiming for reverence. They wanted people to think church was fun, and to their credit, they probably succeeded.

If you're a pastor reading this and you learn nothing else from this article, take note of this axiom: What you hook them with is what you'll have to keep them with. If you try to "get people saved" with funny stories and clever alliteration, then that's all they'll ever expect from you, and the actual teaching parts of your sermon will feel intrusive and unwanted.

3. Your buildings are ugly

I was in Charlotte, North Carolina. There is this massive evangelical church called Calvary. I mean, this is the kind of thing you see on TV, and not at 3am either. I went in one day to look around. They had this beautiful old organ several stories high, and they tacked two ugly screens on it so the people could read the lyrics. It completely upset the whole aesthetic of the room, but it was necessary since Jesus condemns the use of hymnals. After all, you wouldn't want to miss out on the latest, most innovative praise chorus, would you?

The Catholic Church is actually having a substantial number of converts from protestantism. The Eastern Orthodox are being jump-started back to life with converts, and the break-off Anglo-protestant groups are finding evangelical converts demanding Anglo-Catholic worship. Why is this? There are a variety of reasons, but part of it is because people enjoy looking at pretty things and listening to pretty music. Even the Catholic Church is finding its own people are tired of bluegrass masses and dadaist architecture. For all its lies and manipulation, consumerism is right that what you are surrounded by affects the way you feel about that place and about yourself.

If the people are the bride of God, and if the church building is the house of God, then why must God have an ugly house? What wife doesn't want to create a beautiful home for her family? And what husband would allow his wife to neglect their home? They call it the sanctuary, but it just looks like an auditorium.

4. Your Jesus is a pussy

The typical protestant Jesus is always calm and gentle and never emotional or assertive. Jesus has long, flowing hair that shimmers in the sun. He always has a neatly trimmed full beard. He wears brightly colored robes instead of pants. When he is hanging on the cross, his body is perfectly hairless. In short, the protestant Jesus is a woman.

The Catholic Jesus looks the same, except he's holding his heart in his hands to give children nightmares. Funny how that statue is always placed at the back of the church. The historical Jesus was a sexless vagrant, not a bureaucrat with an MBA. Is it possible that a functionally homeless Middle Easterner wasn't concerned about his body hair? You make Jesus look like a JC Penney model, and then you wonder why men hate going to church.

5. Everything is marketed towards women

I remember looking in the bulletin of a church I went to for a year. Every week, there were at least half a dozen activities for women advertised. At most, there would be two events for men in the distant future, and neither of them looked interesting. The only constant one was a prayer breakfast once a month at seven in the morning.

Look in a Christian bookstore. There are lovely pictures of flowers everywhere. Jesus on the cross is never very bloody (the exception being Mel Gibson's snuff film, which was literally God-awful). You'll never find an ugly person on the cover of a Christian book or CD. Lots of novels are written about 19th century debutantes. Even the music is acoustic rock that better appeals to women's softness.

American Christianity is a service industry for women. The men are just there orbiting because they don't know how else to get sex from their wives. Dalrock best explains how feminism has saturated Christianity, but he is fighting a losing battle. The reality is that pastors will always be afraid to speak on what the Bible says about women because they will lose their biggest clients. Pastors have to eat too, you know, and if public speaking is their own marketable skill, then they'll do whatever it takes to survive.

1 Peter 3 makes it clear that women are to handle marital difficulties by being quiet and submissive, and St. Peter even calls women "the weaker sex." Titus 2 says they are to be "home-workers" in the Greek. Beta Christians (i.e. almost all Christians) love to champion the Proverbs 31 woman who sells her surplus weaving, but they don't realize that's an occupation from the context of the home. It's a surplus of what she was already doing. And if you're open to the Apocrypha, Sirach 25 says that it is shameful for a woman to financially maintain her husband.

So I don't go to your church anymore because they have nothing to offer me as a man. Give me one practical benefit from going to your church beyond career networking. I can read an inspiring sermon at home, and I can even choose one instead of taking a crap shoot at your lecture hall. The same is true with worship. You may argue that fellowship is necessary, but precious few of your people are worth imitating.

A person is colored by the people he is surrounded by, and I don't want to be colored by the kind of people who go to church. The kind of people with an obsessive fear of Coors Lite or the word "damn." The kind of people who think Fireproof and Mel Gibson's Passion are high works of art defying the ethics and conventions of modern cinema. The kind of people who think women are the centerpiece of the household. The kind of who believe Chris Tomlin is as good a musician as Brian Wilson. You know, the kind of people who are American Christians.

Read More: Why Tolstoy Rejected The Church

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

The Western World Has An Addiction Problem

September 12, 2014 | by Anton Hagen | Link | Original Link

The generally accepted definition of addiction is the dependency on a substance. However, addiction manifests itself in many different ways which are not discussed as regularly as they should be. Addiction can be understood as the inability to abstain from any activity which releases neurotransmitters in the brain; most commonly serotonin, endocrines, or dopamine.

Pornography, sex, television and video-games can fall into this category and can become the downfall of many. The underlying reason for addiction is a lack of happiness and fulfillment, leading the addict to compensate for the brain's shortage of essential "feel-good" chemicals through unfulfilling, hedonistic activities.

Long-term happiness requires the stable foundations of strong relationships, a healthy body and a balanced mixture of work and leisure; addictive activities do not lead to long-term fulfillment. Short, excessive bursts of pleasure have the same effect on the brain as a short-circuit on an electrical current.

The presence of addiction seems to be increasing in the Western world. Modern society and, by extension, any civilization in decline begins to disregard long, fulfilling activities for shorter "hits" of chemical release through lazy, slovenly slurps of serotonin and dopamine. This is exacerbated by cultural collapse, neglecting the importance of family and the behavioral sink.

Lack of fulfilment leads people to seek easier and baser forms of pleasure. What was once achieved by long, arduous but rewarding victories, helped by strong family units, a proper economy and political system, has been sacrificed in favour of mindless indulgence.

Modern pleasure-seeking often lacks catharsis or insight and its addictive effects are exacerbated by broken families, stagnant economies, and a dystopian world drained of courage, virtue, or dignity. The result is increased rates of depression, which generally lead to more widespread addiction.

The only hope a modern man has is to ensure he does not fall into the same pitfalls as his idler, more miserable counterparts. He can also attempt the yet nobler goal of saving as many of his companions as he can through writing and teaching.

Addiction is more common that originally thought

Long-term addictions can lure the strong from the path to self-mastery to mediocrity, insignificance and worst of all, an ailing body and soul. Aside from the obvious examples, addictions that are less discussed such as pornography and idle activities like video-games can limit a man's potential.

The effects of substance abuse, such as social alienation and atrophy of the body and mind, are widely known and discussed. The effects of addictions less widely recognized are, however, more subversive and can produce a wide range of symptoms; they can affect anyone, even strong, red-pilled men of the manosphere. Their effects are sometimes invisible in the short-term, and therefore self-awareness is critical: recognizing that a harmless habit is quickly developing into a mini-obsession is vital for maintaining discipline.

