Excessive idleness is a leading contributing factor to developing addictions. This can be easily avoided by maintaining a rigorous routine and having goals. Neurotransmitters do not give a hard-working person a quick influx of hedonistic bliss like an idle pleasure will, but they will reward him every morning he wakes up to an active life, filled with fulfilling activities.

A strong man like this simply does not need excess indulgence. Hobbies and intellectual pursuits require effort and a great deal of time and investment. It is therefore unsurprising that the modern man tends to forego them for easier and more instantaneous forms of pleasure.

Effort is commonly what differentiates alphas from betas: alphas are stable, anti-fragile men who invest ample time and energy into long, difficult projects; whereas betas seek comfort through short, drip-like bursts of adrenaline and serotonin, becoming incapable of developing their own will and personality. The latter type is the ideal model for the corporate West: a soft, flabby child, hooked on superfluous products which cater to its self-gratifying, impulsive whims and infatuations, keeping the economy afloat (or just about).

The Solution

To overcome these addictions, the problem must be addressed at its roots: considerable time must be invested into long-term solutions such as strict regimes, discipline, exercise and intellectual pursuits.

Addictions stem from a desperate thirst in the brain for pleasure chemicals due to lack of fulfilment. A life that is well organized, varied and fulfilling is far less likely to be susceptible to such symptoms.

Addicts are not a marginalized sub-section of society; they make up today's unfulfilled, depressed majority. The human brain is not designed to remain unchallenged, in a docile state of carefree existence like that of a sheep or a snail. Its intricacy and complexity is designed for continual self-improvement and expansion.

Over-indulging the brain with idle activities, saccharine substances, or superficiality will make its neurons cry out for stimulation, slowly wilt, and eventually recede into detritus. Man must abstain from deteriorating his brain by overcoming addiction in all of its forms.

Read More: Sex Robots Are Becoming A Better Option Than Western Women

Anton Hagen
Anton Hagen is a multilingual writer from the UK whose joys and woes living in different parts of Europe inspired him to contribute philosophical pieces to the manosphere, with the odd caustic joke.

Did Anita Sarkeesian Commit Felony Wire Fraud? (UPDATE)

September 12, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Two independent journalists have confirmed with the San Francisco Police Department that Anita Sarkeesian, a video game social justice warrior, may have used false pretenses to raise money for her non-profit entity. The police have said that she has not contacted them as she claimed after receiving a Twitter death threat in August. Under Federal law, this may put her on the hook for felony wire fraud.

Two weeks ago we presented the case that Sarkeesian faked death threats against her in an effort to raise money and gain attention to her videos.

> Immediately the gaming press community rallied to her defense, publishing article after article discussing harassment and misogyny in the gaming community. The only problem? The death threats against Anita Sarkeesian are cleary fake, and most likely made by Anita herself.

She used the death threat against her to publish several tweets that simultaneously marketed her work while also raising money donations:

Only one hour of time separated her request for money from revealing the alleged death threat. It doesn't take a professional marketer to see that Sarkeesian timed the tweets to maximize the amount of donations she would receive. The legal problem for Sarkeesian is that fundraising through public deceit is against the law in America, as Mike from Danger & Play helpfully pointed out.

A New York woman was recently sentenced to eight months in jail for fundraising under false pretenses:

> A New York City woman was sentenced in US District Court on Tuesday, October 15, to serve eight months in prison, with two years of probation to follow, on convictions for wire fraud and for making false statements in connection with a scam fundraising scheme that she created on the Internet stemming from the Sandy Hook School shooting incident last December.

Sarkeesian's innocence rests upon the death threat she received being genuine, but two independent journalists have just uncovered additional information that puts a wide open hole through her allegation.

Sarkeesian did not contact the San Francisco authorities as she has claimed

Davis Aurini, while working on a documentary about social justice warriors and the damage that they are causing society, was able to get in touch with the San Francisco Police Department about the report that Sarkeesian filed. The problem: she never contacted them.

> Aurini: I'm calling about an incident which occurred in your district on August 26th to a Miss Anita Sarkeesian; she is a prominent cultural critic who received a number of death threats over Twitter, which wound up driving her out of her own home. This has been reported throughout the gaming media, as well as in other mainstream sources such as the LA Times, and The Telegraph-
>
> Esparza: I'm very familiar with the case… the incident. There's nothing, there's no record of any incident occurring on the 28th of August. I've been trying to reach her for the past two days. If you have a way to contact this person and ask them for a case number, we'd appreciate that. There's no record from our dispatch centre that I called and asked. There's no record of any report > being taken. So, when I saw her tweets it says “authorities”; Anita should make sure she reports to the San Fran police how she did this because there’s no record.

Milo Yiannopoulos, a journalist working out of the United Kingdom, was told the same information.

As Yiannopoulos points out, the police record contradicts the bulk of Sarkeesian’s story:

In the top right tweet she even makes up a dialogue she had with the police, which, according to them, could not have possibly occurred. She repeatedly references local police but they have no record of her call.

Thanks to the work of Aurini and Yiannopoulos, the main part of her story is confirmed to be suspect, turning the onus on Sarkeesian to provide evidence she was actually threatened. She won’t do this because we can reasonably assume the threat was created by her own hand. Authorities weren’t contacted because her life was never in danger. Unless the police parades a man before us as the horrible misogynist who wanted to kill Sarkeesian, the most logical conclusion is that she is lying to the public about the supposed threat she received.

This isn’t the first time that Sarkeesian was caught red-handed in a lie. Even though she pretends to be a girl gamer, she doesn't even like video games, and is simply using it as a platform to push her SJW agenda, as so many real gamers have long suspected:

Which mainstream journalists were complicit in Sarkeesians fundraising scam?

While dozens of blogs wrote about professional victim Sarkeesian being threatened (by herself), two publications of note had the largest reach is spreading what could be soon investigated as a Federal felony.

Soraya Nadia McDonald (@SorayaTWP) from the Washington Post swallowed her story without making a single call to verify it:

> But this week hit a new low: The attacks were so menacing and so personal, Sarkeesian was forced to call the police and leave her home. Someone let her know they'd tracked down her home address and the names and address of her parents. The individual threatened to kill them, too.

And Julie Bort (@Julie188), an editor from the Business Insider, did much of the same:

> And here's the most horrifying part. She also shared the specific list of threats being tweeted at her (warning: it's very graphic). They are so appalling that we won't run them on Business Insider. What we will say is that a person threatened to rape, mutilate, and "drink her blood."

Bort's parroting of Sarkeesian's now debunked story is even more galling considering that she is an editor. It's her job to prevent exactly this very type of sloppy reporting.

Important questions are raised when the mainstream media is complicit in reporting a false story that enriches the lying party. Are McDonald and Bort acting in a public relations capacity for Anita? Have they received money from her to report on a story that wasn't fact checked? Are they planning to publish a retraction to a story that is becoming more like Swiss cheese with ever passing day? Does McDonald and Bort have an existing bias or agenda that facilitated them taking Sarkeesian's word for it? Does their reporting put The Washington Post and Business Insider in legal danger by those who gave money to Sarkeesian under false pretenses?

The fact that the only outlet asking these questions is ROK, a site that has a goal of helping men get laid (among others), speaks volumes on the state of the American media today. They don't care that Sarkeesian lied and they don't care about fixing their mistake. As long as they got a story—any story—about "misogynist" men doing mean things to women, their news day was successful.

Conclusion

Many of you are probably wondering how Sarkeesian could get so careless in constructing a threat that can be torn apart with a basic screenshot and a couple phone calls. The reason is that she, along with her SJW gang, have the full backing of the gaming media and mainstream media establishment to believe whatever bullshit they come up with. It's amazing to me, a microbiology major and not a journalist major, that not one journalist or blogger inquired for the specifics on how the authorities were contacted.

It wouldn't have taken more than three or four questions to bring doubt to her story, saving possibly thousands of dollars in donations that were raised to Sarkeesian's business entity from people who believed her because they read it on a site like The Washington Post or Business Insider, outlets that—up to now—were assumed to do the most basic of fact checking.

In light of Gamer Gate, these new revelations concerning Sarkeesian show that no form of media is safe from the SJW and feminist agenda, and that we must do all the fact checking ourselves. The entire media establishment in the United States is potentially corrupt. Proceed accordingly.

UPDATE: The police have changed their story and now state that they were contacted.

Read Next: Did Anita Sarkeesian Fake Death Threats Against Herself?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Thanks To Progressivism, America Is No Country For Men

September 12, 2014 | by Oscar O'Reilly | Link | Original Link

America certainly has come a long way in the past fifty or sixty years.

Entitlement programs now soak up three quarters of the federal budget. Immigration policies have gone from restrictive to permissive—and even illegals now are so numerous that they could populate a medium-sized city in each of the 50 states. Civil rights expansions have allowed, among other things, women in combat units and same-sex marriage—developments that would have been scarcely imaginable a half-century ago.

How did all this happen?

“It was inevitable—it was progress,” is one possible answer. And in a narrow sense it’s true: The policy shifts listed above are typically called “progressive.”

But broadly speaking, progressive policies are just those that put compassion before cold logic. Logic tells you, for example, that over-generous welfare will, in the long run, discourage work and self-reliance, harm families, and ultimately hollow out society. Compassion tells you to focus on the short term and fill every begging hand that presents itself.

So why did America make such a decisive shift towards compassion over cold logic?

And why does this question never get asked by our mainstream media, let alone answered?

The ascendancy of women

Here's one big hint at a cause for this cultural shift: A greater preference for compassion over cold logic—sometimes described as empathetic vs. rule-based thinking—is one of the most prominent features of female psychology.

That's according to the age-old pop-psych view. But the scientific literature doesn't really contradict that view. Females seem to score higher than males on empathy tests, on average, and at the low end of the empathy spectrum, among the sociopaths and autistics, one finds hardly any females. The widespread, plausible assumption has been that women (on average compared to men) evolved a greater capacity for empathy and compassion because that is an adaptive trait for raising children. Probably most of us who have wives and kids are aware of that tension between what we want as fathers (toughen the kids up a little, prepare them for the real world) and what mothers want (protect, protect, protect).

Women aren't just more compassionate in a general sense. Studies over the past few decades have shown that they are more likely than men to favor specific, usually compassion-related progressive policies: looser immigration, tighter gun laws, more generous welfare programs, expanded civil rights, more lenient law enforcement, and less military intervention.

So why have these policy and cultural shifts, which seem so strikingly aligned with female thinking, occurred in just the past several decades?

Check out these charts. They show the female (pink) and male (blue) labor participation rates for the past sixty odd years.

[image]

In case it's not obvious from the charts, women, who had been trickling into the peacetime workforce since the early 1900s, suddenly moved there in a flood starting in the 1960s. By the year 2000 they had nearly doubled their 1950 participation rate.

Over that same period, men started leaving the workforce in large numbers, partly due to earlier retirement but also because welfare policies—including programs like Social Security disability compensation, which became a lot more generous—made it easier to live off the government.

But the more important trend here has to do with women. And they didn't just reach workforce participation levels close to men's. They also began to achieve parity or near-parity in professions of strong cultural influence that had been traditionally dominated by men—including journalism, law, academic research, publishing and politics.

In other words, they obtained the power to affect how all Americans tend to think and act—to a degree that has probably never been seen before in any large civilization on this planet.

At the same time, and also to an unprecedented extent, women loosened their ties to men. Sociologists have found evidence that the average woman is more likely to vote the way her man votes, the more she depends on him financially. Women as they moved into the workforce certainly lost much of their traditional financial dependency, and moreover started marrying later, or not at all. When they did marry they had a high—and again, I think unprecedented—chance of divorce.

Being less influenced by men, women thus may have felt more free to follow their own (progressive) policy preferences. A curious fact that is sometimes noted in the media these days—but of course never in a context like this one—is that single women, of all races, are overwhelmingly likely to identify themselves as politically liberal and to vote Democratic.

The social impact of women's new influence would have been huge anyway. But it presumably has been intensified by the Democratic party's deliberate alignment, since the 1960s, with women and their policy preferences. In recent years, the partisan "gender gap" has become so large that, if one excluded women's votes, Mitt Romney would have easily won the 2012 presidential election—and Hillary Clinton would not stand a chance in 2016. Frankly, were it not for women voters, the country probably would never have heard of Hillary Clinton, or Bill ("I feel your pain") Clinton, or anyone as liberal as Barack Obama.

Environmentalism and illiberalism

There are other traits besides empathy that women and men appear to have in different measures. Women seem to have a greater affinity for environmentalism, for example, and also for "natural" or "organic" foods and medicines. That "green" mindset became mainstream over just the past several decades, and is now often considered part of progressivism.

Could that green mindset also owe something to women's traditional roles as child-bearers and child-raisers? It may seem un-PC to suggest that, but in fact women often refer to their children's present and future health when they talk about green issues. Women during pregnancy also exhibit food aversion and nesting instincts—instincts apparently meant to minimize the risk of toxins and germs—and conceivably that innate sensitivity to the possibility of environmental harm persists to some extent outside pregnancy.

Of course there's nothing wrong with wanting a clean environment, and foods and medicines that are "natural." Who likes toxins? But if that preference springs from somewhere deep and irrational in the mind, it might often manifest in unscientific nonsense—such as Jenny McCarthy's anti-vaccine rants, Gwyneth Paltrow's "detox cleanse" regimens, or the histrionics of the anti-GMO movement. Not to mention the vast majority of the claims made by the alternative medicine industry—claims that their customers, most of them women, tend to swallow whole.

The spread of the political correctness mindset is another striking cultural trend of the past few decades. "PC" emerged in large part from campus feminism of the 1970s and early 80s, and this link to feminism, which certainly persists, begs the question: Does the PC impulse to silence speech and speakers that it doesn't like—even to suppress certain scientific research—also spring from some female psychological trait?

I don't know, and I doubt that any academic psychologist these days has the balls to address the question experimentally. But plainly there is something motherly and hyper-empathetic about the protectiveness of the PC mindset towards certain favored groups. And perhaps a natural motherly protectiveness is also one that brooks no debate.

More generally—just as a matter of naked reasoning here—if women tend to rely more on empathy and other emotions vs. cold logic, then one would expect them (on average compared to men) to tend to avoid situations of free and open debate, where their lesser reliance on logic might leave them at a disadvantage. After all, reason is just one way to win a point. Shouting down your opponent, or employing drama and spectacle, can work too.

Hush, children

This is meant to be just a quick sketch—a little "red pill" to help raise awareness of some things that seem largely overlooked. I think that, once prompted to look, we all can see how life in America, and indeed throughout Western societies, has become dominated particularly by themes of compassion, and related protectiveness towards special groups, and how cold logic has been devalued.

Indeed, cold logic now seems effectively forbidden in some cases. All that has to happen is for the new guardians of the culture to find it "offensive." A male New York Times reporter recently provoked those furies, drawing criticism even from his paper's own (female) Public Editor, for drawing the simple, emperor-has-no-clothes conclusion that Michael Brown, the late convenience store robber and arrest-resister from Ferguson, Mo., was "no angel." That male Times reporter might have been fired, except that, luckily for him, he is black.

But back to that other question I posed at the outset: Why do we hear nothing about women's influence—probably a decisive influence—in shaping the progressive culture that one finds in early 21st century America? The answer, I think, is that hardly anyone has an incentive to say anything about it.

Feminists hate almost any argument that has to do with innate sex-based psychological differences, especially if it sounds like “women are more emotional and less rational than men.” Feminists also don’t want to admit to their enormous cultural sway, having complained for decades that they don’t have enough.

The MSM won’t let on either: newsrooms now are full of, and often headed by, women—and men are swiftly punished when they fail to toe the PC line.

The Democratic party won’t tell you. They wouldn’t want you to think that their sacred “progress” might be attributable, in large part, to a mere demographic shift, let alone to a mindset that evolved for the raising of children. They also don’t want men to know that the Democratic Party now is essentially the party of women.

Won’t the Republican establishment speak up about this? Dream on. Tarred with the “war on women” brush, and facing a demographic calamity (from non-whites and single women expanding their electoral share), they are desperate to retain some women’s votes. They are now far more likely to pander to women—as the Tory government does in the UK—than they are to say something (on purpose) that might “offend.”

So how does all this end?

I don’t see how it would on its own. The women-and-minorities electoral bloc seems on its way to supremacy not just in the US but throughout Western societies.

Interestingly, though, the progressive, feminine mindset I’ve touched on here hasn’t stopped “at the water’s edge.” US foreign policy now includes the promotion of progressive themes such as women’s rights and LGBT rights in traditional, conservative societies. America’s military operations also seem increasingly consistent with what women want—i.e., they seem more about helping whomever is suffering during a given news cycle, and less about long-range calculations of the national interest.

Perhaps none of that will come back to haunt America. After all, many of the world’s strongest and most prosperous countries, including America’s closest allies and trading partners, have political cultures that are just as feminized and progressive.

But America does have a fairly long list of adversaries, from Al Qaeda and ISIL to Russia and China. All have a deep loathing of progressivism, and a corresponding lack of—even rejection of—female influence at the higher levels of culture and politics.

What wouldn’t they do, as America weakens, to keep its infection from spreading to them?

Read More: What Does It Feel Like To Be Betrayed By Your Own Country?

Oscar O'Reilly
Oscar is a novelist and essayist.

Modern Culture Mirrors Jezebel’s Poisonous Spirit

September 13, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

As the example of Gomer, the Biblical story of Jezebel and her husband Ahab often bears applicability to the cultural state of modern feminist societies. Her cultural symbolism throughout the ages has been with false prophets, fallen women, paganism, apostasy, deception, manipulation, seduction—and, in modern times, with feminist women.

The spirit of Jezebel and her crimes

According to the Hebrew Book of Kings, Jezebel (a name with disputable multiple meanings: 1.”Not exalted,” or 2. “Where is the Prince?”, an allegorical ritual cry from pagan worship ceremonies in honor of the pagan deity Baal during periods of the year when he was considered to be in the underworld)— was a Phoenician princess, the daughter of Ethbaal, who was the king of Tyre, and a priest of Baal. Jezebel incited her husband Ahab, the king of North Israel, to abandon the worship of God and encourage worship of the false deities Baal and Ashtart (also called Ishtar) instead.

She is notable for her rebellion against God via promotion of witchcraft and idolatry and ruthless persecution of the Biblical prophets of her time through her husband. She is also guilty of deception, as seen in the fabrications of false evidence of blasphemy against an innocent landowner called Naboth who refused to sell his property to King Ahab, causing the landowner to be put to death. For these transgressions and crimes against God and people of Israel, Jezebel met a gruesome death as prophesized by the prophet Elijah. She was thrown out of a window by members of her own court retinue, and the flesh of her corpse eaten by stray dogs.

The article "Jezebel, in our society" aptly describes the spirit of Jezebel. Here is an excerpt:

> "The Jezebel spirit is born of witchcraft and rebellion. This demon is one of the most common spirits in operation today, both in the church and in the world, and it is a powerful enemy of the body of Christ. She operates freely on sincere believers whose hearts are for God individually, and has also attained positions of power as powers and principalities within the Church. This spirit establishes its stronghold primarily in women; however, many men have been victimized by it as well, where it functions as a "controlling" spirit.
>
> The spirit of Jezebel is behind the daughter of Democracy, i. e. Feminism.
>
> The Spirit of Jezebel is basically a controlling spirit working through the lust of the > flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life. It has, in general, two aims:

>
> To gain identity, glory, recognition, power, and satisfy the need for the "praises of men". This is a consequence of the desire for love and self-worth focused on SELF.

> Secondly the Jezebel spirit is a men hater and seeks to emasculate all men, and divest them of their authority and power over others. It fosters a distrust and hatred of men in general. The "Jezebel spirit" is in a constant agitation, terribly aggressive, very determined, callous, controlling, selfish, power-hungry, manipulative, unrepentant, deceitful spirit, an overwhelmingly evil spirit, and those are mostly only it's good points! Indeed this spirit can be definitely named "Satan's woman".
>
> There are two main types of the Jezebel spirit:
>
> The high-profile type is generally gregarious, outspoken and highly visible. She is often seen as the "woman who wears the pants in the family".
>
> The low-profile type is soft-spoken, giving the illusion of being solicitous, motherly, protective, even appearing very submissive. The low-profile type may be the most dangerous, as she is the most difficult to discern. She relies heavily on manipulation for her power, in extremely subtle performances."

The notable point to be noted in her death was her ostentatious decoration of herself, akin to prostitutes of those times, just before she was thrown to her death by her servants–which Isaac Asimov describes as a deliberate symbolism of her arrogant determination to go out of this life as a "queen."

Jezebel's religious beliefs, glorification and "humanization" by modern society, and her modern day sisters

Jezebel promoted the ancient religion of the Canaanites which included Baal and Ashtart worship. Ashtart is a Semitic Goddess of Love and War and the Canaanite Great Goddess who is the cult partner of Ba'al ("the King"). Heterosexual orgies were associated with Ashtart whereas homosexual orgies were associated with Baal. The spring equinox (spring break) was associated with ritual sex orgies to honor Astart.

Drunken revelry and debauchery; modern day "pagan" spring equinox festivals of old?

Today, Jezebel is often glorified by apologetics (usually women) as an example of female power, domination, and strength who was victimized by the "misogynist" authors of the Bible, while often disregarding or underplaying the glaring crimes and atrocities she committed in her earthly life. Her refusal to submit even in her death (actually out of her pride), is apologetically portrayed in recent modern times, as feminist heroism and victimization by a patriarchal culture of those times.

Feminist apologetics even paint her humanely, as a "faithful" polytheist woman to her husband and her faith, while comparing Elijah as a villainous fundamentalist rabblerouser similar to a modern day religious extremist. They state that Jezebel's harlotry was spiritual, and not literal—since polytheism was often referred to as harlotry—but what must be noted that the Baal and Ashtart worship Jezebel promoted was related to ritual sex and sacred prostitution. Since there is no "factual" information on Jezebel, such apologetic acquittals of her using "historical imagination" are just as likely to be correct or incorrect as any other.

One fact is common: Jezebel was a ruthless Godless tyrannical woman who defied human dignity, weaved outrageous lies, shed innocent blood, spread corruption—all to satisfy her ego—and she deserves her bad reputation. Nevertheless, she remains a role model and heroine for feminists, with modern apologetic feminist versions of her story .

Feminists accuse that Jezebel's vilification in the Bible was because of the "victorious" who wrote (distorted) Biblical history. Feminists are actually rewriting modern history by embodying Jezebel's traits by deed due to the proliferation and dominance of feminism in modern societies, so it's the case of the pot calling the kettle black.

Thus, the name Jezebel (from the Biblical example of Jezebel herself) itself has become synonymous with a scheming woman. The 1938 hit "Jezebel" was one of the earliest adaptations of a headstrong scheming woman whose actions cost her the man she loves, but later schemes to win him back as for her "the end justifies the means"—and who is told by her aunt that she reminds her aunt of "Jezebel, a woman who did evil in the sight of the Lord".

Many men today deal with such scheming women in their day to day lives. Compare the Biblical Jezebel's traits with feminism-bred, modern women you'd commonly see around you, which are explored below:

- Rebelliousness – both moral and spiritual? Check.
- Controlling tendencies over men (more so in partnerships)? Check.
- Tyrannical , unfeminine behavior and cruelty over the weak? Check.
- Narcissism? Check.

- Hatred towards men (covert or open)? Check.
- Extravagance, hustling and materialistic greed? Check.
- Spiritual harlotry and skepticism or general disdain for patriarchal religion? Check.
- Witchcraft and occult Sympathies? Check.
- Deception, habitual lying and cunning manipulation? Check.
- No sense of justice? Check.
- Promotion of sexual profligacy to fellow women? Check.

- Hubris and capriciousness? Check.
- General refusal to accept mistakes, no conscience and shamelessness? Check.

The reason why Jezebelian traits are increasingly seen in modern feminist women is the same as what defined Jezebel herself: spiritual rebellion or disgust to patriarchal religion in modern feminist societies. With the rise of witchcraft (Jezebel's faith) in modern societies, more women turn away from patriarchal religion. And religious and spiritual corruption then sets the tone for eventual moral corruption, as godless women will obviously act in godless ways.

The rising skepticism towards religion itself in the modern world further complicates the problem. As mentioned above, the influx of the Jezebelian spirit into religious institutions further poisons the very framework which could possibly have exorcised the roots of the Jezebelian spirit in the modern world.

Modern day Ahabs: Manginas and White Knights

Ahab represents the powerful yet identity-less, henpecked monogamous posturing beta—totally controlled by his mate Jezebel. He even committed gross injustices and crimes on the innocent as on Naboth, at her behest. Henpecked men, white knights, and manginas are thus common modern day examples of Ahab. The pussy-whipped meek husband is the unassuming version of Ahab, for he allows his domineering wife to not only take the decisions and steer him into whichever direction that she wishes, but also because he doesn't take charge to either change her or himself to assume control.

Ahab's life represents that of a resourceful and powerful man who had no identity of his own, and often depended on his woman to define his identity by allowing her to lead him. He was a mere tool in her hands, for her to achieve her aims.

But in the modern world, isn't it common to see an educated, intelligent, successful man abandon his sane judgment, spiritual identity and dignity to be manipulated into unjust and godless behavior by the women he loves or desires—whether he may be married or single—very much like Ahab? And for what? Often simply for sake of sex and companionship with his partner.

Just like how Ahab killed Naboth at the behest of his wife, so do many modern men commonly commit crimes and injustices at the behest of their women. Throw into this picture greed, material success and sensual pleasure and the modern man will never detach himself from his Jezebelian mate. The addiction to earthly and material pleasures over spiritual and mental development is commonly seen in modern day Ahabs. In a modern world where materialism is the religion, modern day Ahabs will easily rationalize to themselves and to others the evil behavior instigated by their Jezebelian mates, as being 'pragmatic' and often 'necessary'.

Conclusion

The story of Jezebel and Ahab shows the seeds of corruption of a society: weak godless influential men coupled with controlling corruptedgodless women. "Behind every successful man is a woman": this is the lie propagated in modern feminist societies. But the real truth is that "behind every successful woman is a man"—as seen in Jezebel's story. Her weak husband's immense social power and influence, helped her to achieve her evil designs. She would've been nothing had she not married a powerful weakling like Ahab, to achieve her vile aims and promote her religious ideology. The same analogy can be applied to feminists and manginas. Without manginas and white knights, feminists (or for that matter feminism) would never have achieved prominence. Male complacency eventually leads to female tyranny.

Religious and spiritual decline are the first signs of the impending corruption of a society. The spiritual corruption commonly seen in modern feminist societies not only results in the moral decline of civilization, but will also eventually result in the proliferation of modern day Jezebels and Ahabs. It ‘s a serious problem, as every man (moreso red pill), irrespective of his religious beliefs, could or would suffer on account of these modern day Jezebels and Ahabs, like Naboth.

Feminism is the modern day religion which eventually produces and harbors them. And these signs look ominous for the future generations.

Read More: The Disturbing Relationship Between Feminism And The Occult

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

30 Lessons For Living

September 13, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After slogging through some old texts recently, I craved something more practical that focused on living well. This book did not disappoint, offering the wisdom of senior citizens who share what they have learned in their lives.

The beginning of the book deals with marriage, stating that the key to a happy marriage is having shared values and a friendship beneath the initial passion (many seniors suggested establishing a seed of friendship first). Once the passion fades—and it will—the friendship will help sustain the marriage into a lifelong partnership with someone you genuinely like being around and doing activities with. There is no mention of raw attraction and tingles in creating marriages that last into the decades.

Too bad that such advice doesn't help men today. It was almost depressing to read a woman saying that when she was 20 years old, in her prime, the key to winning her heart and hand in marriage was actually through friendship (in all likelihood such women were virgins). This tactic, still used by beta males today, no longer works except for when the girl is over 30 years old and saddled with massive monetary debt and a promiscuous past that makes her wearing a white dress on the wedding day nothing short of farce.

Another important note:

> What couples must avoid— if they wish to remain together as long as the experts— is keeping score regarding who is getting more and who is getting less . This kind of economic attitude is one we would use, say, with a vending machine: if I put in my dollar, I will get a candy bar of equal value. According to the experts, this approach does not work in marriage.

Maybe I speak from the perspective of having sowed my oats, but having a generous or giving mentality with Western women today, especially in the early stages of courtship, is the fastest way to not receive sex at all. The more carefully we dole out rewards, and the more methodical we are about only giving value when we are sure to receive it, is what men must now do just to engage in sex.

> But the sad part is, too many young people now are giving up too early, too soon. They'll say, "I don't need this. I'm going to get a divorce." We didn't do that. In our day we stuck with it. Divorce was not in our language. We tried. We kept at it and we tried. He lived for twenty more years, and the two of us— it was wonderful. It was a great life.

Goodhearted strategies that worked in the past in securing a faithful wife is not what women today seek. It should cause us to wonder if such relationships that we read about in this book are even possible anymore. The current generation can confirm beyond any doubt that the culture we find ourselves in is broken, possibly beyond repair.

There's also advice on how to approach career:

> …that most people who decide on a profession because of the material rewards at some point look back and gasp, "What have I done?" In their view, we all need a salary to live on. But the experts concur that it's vastly preferable to take home less in your paycheck and enjoy what you are doing rather than live for the weekends and your three weeks (if you get that much) vacation a year.
>
> […]
>
> …individuals who are motivated by goals that emphasize personal growth, contributing to the community, and meaningful relationships are typically much happier at work.
>
> […]
>
> There will always be many who are richer or more distinguished than I am, so if my purpose in working is to attain these extrinsic rewards, I will be disappointed, for I will always compare myself to those whose attainments are greater. But if I work principally for the pleasure or the fulfillment it gives me, my success is assured. There are few blessings greater than finding such work and keeping it.
>
> […]

> When the experts discuss their work lives, two themes go hand in hand: purpose (beyond earning a salary) and autonomy. Neither one can be found in every job, every time, but without them work can become a miserable burden.
>
> […]
>
> …you have to be a risk taker. Because if you don't take any risks, you don't get any sweetness out of life. And the truth of the matter is that the sweetness in life comes with the risk. It doesn't come with playing four aces in a poker hand.

Another interesting chapter is on health. The seniors described how a YOLO approach actually leads to more suffering instead of less. Many young people today, for example, may not care about not smoking or exercising because they don't want to live long. The problem is that such a bad habit will not cause you to drop dead with pain in your sleep—it will instead give you chronic illnesses like cancer and diabetes that you may have to deal with for decades, greatly limiting how you live the last phase of your life.

> One of the most poignant regrets comes from those who destroyed their health through smoking. The former smokers would do anything to wave a magic wand and change that one choice.
>
> […]
>
> The moral of the story: stop yourself when you explain poor lifestyle choices by saying something like "So what? You've got to die sometime." Because there's no guarantee of an easy way out after a life of overeating, inactivity , or smoking. The experts are telling you that you can't choose whether or not to die, but you can to some degree control whether you spend the last decades of your life in healthy productivity or in a downward spiral of physical misery.

Another piece of advice is to be honest in your dealings with people. Regret has a way of haunting you into old age:

> …our elders assured me that when you get to the eighth decade of life and beyond, you will look back and rue both your own acts of dishonesty and those that were done to you. The legacy of dishonesty, I learned, has a long reach.

Lastly, stop worrying:

> What possible difference did it make that I kept my mind on every little thing that might go wrong? When I realized that it made no difference at all, I experienced a freedom that's hard to describe. My life lesson is this: turn yourself from frittering away the day worrying about what comes next and let everything else that you love and enjoy move in.

This book offered the practical advice I sought. Much of it was review but it served as a good refresher that I'm on somewhat the right path in understanding how a life well-lived is the best reward there is. It will help you see the big picture instead of focusing on the day-to-day dramas or mini-outrages that we allow to distract us in modern times, while reminding us that opting out of marriage is a rational decision based on living in an environment that is very different from that of our grandparents.

Read More: “30 Lessons For Living” on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

A New Study Claims That Fat Shaming Doesn't Work

September 14, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

This week many news outlets reported on a study out of the University College London. Researchers there recently conducted an experiment to see if "fat shaming," or discrimination against obese people, is an effective method for facilitating weight loss. The results:

"Our results show that weight discrimination does not encourage weight loss, and suggest that it may even exacerbate weight gain," says lead author Dr. Sarah Jackson.

The Study

What they did in this study was poll over 3,000 adults aged 50 years or older. They asked them if they experienced "fat shaming" as defined below:

1. You are treated with less respect or courtesy
2. You receive poorer service than other people in restaurants and stores
3. People act as if they think you are not clever
4. You are threatened or harassed
5. You receive poorer service or treatment than other people from doctors or hospitals

Five percent of the participants replied "yes." Everyone's weight was then monitored over a four-year period. The people who said they were shamed reported gaining about 2 pounds (0.95 kg) on average. The people who didn't reported losing about 1.6 pounds (0.71 kg) on average.

It's important to note that the study was a survey and not a thorough experiment, so we can’t be sure that “fat shaming” actually caused the weight gain, or the extent to which these people were actually shamed. This is already an important consideration that casts doubt on the experimental design.

After collecting the data, the researchers ventured a guess as to why these people might have gained weight: “Previous studies have found that people who experience discrimination report comfort eating. Stress responses to discrimination can increase appetite, particularly for unhealthy, energy-dense food.”

My Take

Everyone responds differently to adversity, and “negative encouragement.”

From the moment I stepped on a football field or basketball court, some kids responded quite well when a coach got in their face and yelled “You fucked up son, get off the court and do it better next time!” They were motivated by this pressure and used it as fuel to tear shit up next time through. Other kids would lose all confidence when the coach got in their face. They would be so scared of screwing up again that they would play nervously and suck as a consequence.

I don’t think “fat shaming” is any different: some people are motivated by this negative encouragement, and take it as a challenge. They start skipping dessert instead of skipping workouts. Other people are put down by it, and actually retreat further into whatever vice or mistake they’re being called out on. They cancel their gym membership and order Papa John’s.

And, when it comes to “fat shaming,” you have to realize that we’re dealing with a particular segment of the population. Obese people are, on average, not going to be champions of life, with sky-high confidence and the propensity to take on any challenge you throw their way. Let’s be honest: most non-obese people don’t even possess those virtues. And for the obese, the poor eating and exercise habits that got them where they are are most likely a direct reflection of a poor inner self image.

Put simply: they’re probably not in a good place mentally if they’re sitting at 30+ percent body fat. For this reason, I have to agree with the sentiments conveyed in the study. “Fat shaming” will most likely not have a positive effect on your average fat person. However, I have to laugh at some of the behaviors they classified as “fat shaming.”For example: “people act as if they think you are not clever”—that’s not because of your belly.

So sure, “fat shaming” may work on some of your buddies who are strong at heart, but just let their diet and exercise slip because of an intense work schedule, but on average it’s probably better to inform and encourage.

Are you crushing life? Develop “alpha male” confidence and charisma in 28 days with my new online bootcamp. Click here for more info.

Read More: How To Avoid The 3 Worst Qualities Of The Beta Male

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Progressives Use Ray Rice Scandal To Paint All Male Interests As Inherently Misogynistic

September 14, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Over at the Guardian, future Nobel Prize winner Helen Lewis opines on the evolution of video games:

Evil women are coming to take away your computer games. At least, that's the message that a group of angry young men have been articulating on the internet in the past few weeks. According to them, these games – once a haven for socially awkward teenage boys – are being ruined by the monstrous regiment.

This is a curious lead-off observation on her part, since her article features a picture of pretty white women competing a in a video game. Her article rehashes the tired, old argument that boys are born hating women and have to learn to not hate women. This "misogyny" is not treated as a moral issue at its core, but a maturity issue.

She concludes with this gem:

Games are growing up, whether gamers like it or not, and testosterone-riddled male-power fantasies are bound to fall out of favour as a result. The nerds are going to have to grow up and learn to live with the invasion.

She clearly sees the migration of females into males enclaves as positive, as it will cause the boys to become men and stop their misogynistic ways and become good men. Hence, The Good Men Project. Men don't become good men until they are subject to female supervision, guidance and "equality." Men can aid in this shedding of maturity-based hatred, but it can only truly be healed at the hands of women, particularly feminist women.

Across the oceanic pond, a sports organization known as the National Football League has been under intense social fire for its “handling” of one of its players—named Ray Rice—violently assaulting his then-fiancée. For our part, Athlone McGinnis has detailed the facts of the situation and Law Dogger has opined on the nature of alpha male behavior which leads to women to stay with the men who would hurt them.

What hasn’t been addressed is just why domestic violence as dealt with by the NFL is an issue now. Football players have been violently assaulting one another on the field and have been beating and killing others–including their girlfriends and wives—outside the auspices of the field since the inception of the league. Why is this an issue now?

Often, in situations such as these, one must consider the difference between what should be done and why it appears something should be done. Consider this quote from The Culture Of Narcissism:

According to Paul Hoch, Jack Scott, Dave Meggyesy and other cultural radicals, sport is a “mirror reflection” of society that indoctrinates the youth with the dominant values. In America, organized athletics teach militarism, authoritarianism, racism and sexism, thereby perpetuating the “false consciousness” of the masses.

To cultural radicals (liberals or progressives), sports exist as an expression of the ignorance of the lesser classes. At their best, radicals express displeasure with sport because it encourages inordinate levels of competition at the expense of social cooperation and sport enjoyment prevents oppressed classes from actually addressing their oppression. At their worst—like David Futrelle at his blog We Hunted The Mammoth—radicals link traditional (psychologically healthy) values of love, family, and duty to so-called patriarchal values of violence against women.

Sport—at its best—afford spectators a distraction from reality that allows them to suspend disbelief, immerse themselves in the game and admire the prowess of the athletes. Sports offers dramatic commentary on reality while giving a spectator the space to appreciate its artificiality. The awe the true fan brings to the experience is necessarily devalued by political radicals who seek to turn sport into a manifestation of their ideology.

However, modern sports has collapsed into this paradox as described by Howard Cosell:

"[S]ports are not separate from and apart from life, a special 'Wonderland' where everything is pure and sacred and above criticism," but a business subject to the same standards and open to the same scrutiny as any other.

This has happened not just because progressives and radicals have linked sport and "patriarchy," but because they have, unwittingly, been a part of capitalistic reform. As I have stated before, one of the main opponents of sport were capitalists at the turn of the century who were upset at lower class people cluttering the streets with sporting games; it inhibited their ability to move capital or product and inhibited their ability to exploit their workers, as workers "wasted" time on cultural traditions which included sports.

As Cosell observed, sports in America isn't an endless field of fresh goldenrod and sweet roses—it is a business first. Enter Ray Rice.

As previously observed, the Ravens' starting running back Ray Rice knocked his fiancée out in an elevator and dragged her unconscious body out of said elevator. The response from radicals has been as predictable as it has been revealing.

First off, they assume wide swaths of the population (read: poor, conservative, Republican, Christian) are at least tolerant of male-on-female abuse, if not outright fans or supporters of domestic violence. The aforementioned David Futrelle article blames social conservatism and patriarchy instead of psychopathy, personality disorders, or any mental disorder that would cause any individual to use violence on intimate partners. Like the progressive reformers before them, they associate interest in sports as inherently uneducated, lower-class and indicative of a person who refuses to “progress socially.”

That being said, this espnW article written by pictured Jane McManus has the highest up-voted comment which encapsulates what is really going on:

caucasian faggot: the most surprising thing to me, is the lack of WOMEN on ESPN being given the platform. I’m seeing a lot of men talk about football, & domestic violence… Why Haven’t I seen or heard Jane McManus on TV vocalising this particular opinion? Hopefully, you’ve been on, & I have just missed it.

Like the push for female gamers and coders represented by the exhausting imbroglio’s of Anita Sarkeesian and Zoe Quinn, it’s not just about progressive beliefs on ignorance, sexism or traditional values, but that women are not given enough voice (power) in male spaces. To them, this represents ignorance, backwardness and indicates is in desperate need of remedy.

It appears something should be done not just because sports like the NFL represents traditional values, but that traditional values don’t involve enough females. As observed previously, women see themselves as the civilizing force for men. To them, women civilize men by forcing them to mature.

When considering sports, women feel they are smoothing over the rough patches of immaturity that sport encourages. Not only does converting tradition into the immediacy of now decreases the power of men as a class, sports can be devalued but then revalued by women as they force their way into the male spaces, crowding out the “obvious” recesses of misogyny, sexism, and prejudice.

This push is about branding—to the men and women who agree with radicals—that acts, institutions and beliefs that don’t benefit women are inherently misogynistic. Consider this article by Jezebel’s mental fleshlight, Erin Gloria Ryan:

Every October, the NFL festoons its players and stadiums in a cloying shade of pink and slaps its TV spots and billboards with an altruistic message: the NFL cares about breast cancer awareness, and by extension, cares about women.

Why should a man's thoughts on his team's passing offense inform his views on said league's views on domestic violence? Apparently, I've been under a heavy patriarchal rock for the past few decades, as I thought domestic violence was an issue with the courts, police and mental health professionals?

A commenter notes:

This may sound really cynical but football is notorious for being a super macho straight man's game.

Imagine that! A game that men have played since boys, commented on and regulated by men is…a man's game! Somebody call TMZ, I have the newest sexist offense! Get Obama on the quick, our black president needs to get one of those "beer summits" together over the "stupidity" of this situation. Wait, Erin Gloria Ryan responds:

46% of its fans are women.

Huh. Apparently, almost half of NFL fans are women. Like Anita Sarkeesian, Ryan isn't a fan of the institution she is critiquing. She must mean women are proxies of fans as they tolerate their husbands watching NFL games since the NFL dedicates October to "Breast Cancer Awareness?" Oh wait, Baker says if you still watch the NFL after Ray Rice knocked out his fiancee, you must hate women. A bunch of Einsteins in the comments try to parse Ryan's puritanical piece so as to avoid calling Ryan out, but this comment stands out:

tuxedocatherine: …While Goodell's new policy of domestic violence isn't particularly groundbreaking, it's a tiptoe in the right direction

Interesting, a second accusation of domestic violence against a woman (notice how nobody is talking about a gay athlete like Michael Sam stomping his life partner out) resulting in a perma-ban that could only be lifted by administrative decision is a tiptoe in the right direction. I can only surmise that any man who is accused of hurting a woman—necessarily excluding practicing homosexuals, as they are not a part of athletic culture to radicals—is permanently banned from any league is a better tiptoe. Maybe we can hang them at high noon upon accusation? Obviously, punishment of offenders matters more to radicals than anything else.

Like the newest information on Adrian Peterson. this is about fusing female moral superiority over males with radical sensibility on sports. To progressives and radicals, sports represents an indoctrination into the violent aspects of racism, sexism, and homophobia. Sports represents a refuge of the violent and necessarily socialized attributes of humanity that prevent humans from true equality.

It goes further than that, as the feminist commentary evinces the idea that institutions that primarily serve men are inherently anti-woman or misogynistic. This is a product of the modern American woman's inability to separate the self from others. Unable to understand or appreciate anything that doesn't benefit the self, American women react with disgust when presented with organizations like the NFL who don't exist to at least indirectly help women.

The desire for women to invade male spaces in order to better socialize men has a few causes, but with respects to the NFL, it represents female moral superiority over men. It is a modern representation of June Cleaver (women) parenting her son Theodore Beaver (men). The finger-wagging superiority is indicative of women who think it is up to them to drag the boy-men of Misogyny Lane into adulthood. The usage of radical politics is nothing new to attack sports, but is used now to further feminine interests in redirecting male's time and money.

This swirling mass of seemingly conflicting media—for media's sake—serves one, true purpose, regardless of sex: to redirect clicks, likes, and retweets on the web. Don't click on ESPN links, click on Jezebel ones! It certainly involves serious issues that predate those clicks or tweets, but it ultimately is about inflaming long-standing passions and fires that might change your mind. Oops, I mean your homepage.

Read More: 4 Reasons The "Ban Bossy" Campaign Is Mindless Narcissism

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

2 Steps To Understanding Women

September 15, 2014 | by Jesus Baetana | Link | Original Link

One of the things I hear most among men is the running joke that there's no point in trying to understand women because they're too complicated.

Grow the fuck up.

Women aren't difficult to understand. In exactly the same way certain behaviors become normalized when they're a part of mass media, the idea that women are complicated arose because it's a easy laugh. How many times have you seen (particularly in US shows) the bumbling idiot of a husband lumbering around from one situation to another, only for his patient wife to remark about his actions in a loving yet pitiful manner?

Many men are happy to subscribe to this idea as truth because it's easy. It's easier to play the game as a mindless idiot, because then you don't have to take responsibility for your actions. In real life, men like this will end up getting divorced, in a miserable duty-bound marriage, or blindly unaware of their wife banging some other guy on the side. This is because few humans truly tolerate an adult-sized child for long.

Reality

In reality, your goal as a man (although this is also applicable to any person) should be to further yourself in a way that makes you happy. The meaning of life is to create a meaning for yourself. More on that in another post.

Coming back to the original topic; there are two simple keys to understanding women.

1. Women use language differently from us.

2. Women are simply very practical in getting what they want.

The Difference Of Women's Language

Here is an example of women using different language: Old Unjaded (let's call him Jaded) is horny. He wants to get down and dirty. He messages a girl:

> Jaded: Hey Occasionally Fuck Buddy (OFB), how are you? What are you doing?
>
> OFB: Oh I'm just at home. How are you?
>
> Jaded: Yeah I'm good thanks. Feeling really horny today though. Can I come over?
>
> OFB: Sorry to hear that. I don't think it's a good idea blah blah blah…

Basically, a woman generally isn't going to respond to this unless she's really into you (which usually lasts a short time if you're only interested in fucking her) or she has low self esteem and not many options. This is rapidly becoming rare to find with proliferation of internet-based ego feeders. OFB's version would be as so:

> OFB: Hey, how are you?
>
> Unjaded: Hey OFB, I'm good thanks. Been busy. And you?
>
> OFB: I'm fine thank you. Went to XYZ last night. Would you like a coffee? Be good to see you.
>
> Unjaded: Yeah why not. See you at ABC in 30 mins?
>
> OFB: Great! See you soon.

So what's going on here? I could provide a whole bunch of analysis, but the key point is that she's using the word see instead of the word fuck. Simply transpose the word into the above conversation and that's what she's essentially saying. Meet somewhere within walking distance of your house. If she comes in, job done.

Why? Because women don't like to think in their own heads (or their peers) that they're sluts. Generally, they won't embrace language like men do because it's too direct, too real for them. So they need to delude themselves by going through certain motions or sequences, even if deep down they just like fucking you.

And frankly, there's nothing wrong with that. If they like fucking, then fair enough. Women have been painted recently as the harbingers of controlling the unrelenting, testosterone fueled inherent rapists we men all are deep down, and so they have to justify to themselves any sex they have.

This is, of course, bullshit. It's completely disgusting how the male heterosexual libido has been demonized to the point where men are ashamed to express it in even its tamest forms. But this is how the world is very often now, and as with anything, if you want to manipulate it you need to know how it works.

The Practicality Of Women

Onto the next point. Women are practical about what they want. If they want something or have the possibly of being subjected to pain, they will most often engineer a situation to facilitate or prevent it.

A common male fear is his girlfriend cheating on him when she is going on a girl's holiday. Why? Because he knows, the uncommon and the illicit are attractive to anyone. Pedro the Brazilian barman doesn't give a fuck, this is all the normal course for him.

If your girlfriend wants a little affair to break up the monotony of being with you, she'll facilitate this by going on holiday alone, or with some girlfriends. Similarly, if a girl wants to be shafted by a number of different nationalities, she'll become a "solo female traveler" (note another example of use of empowering language; a man doing the same will often get labelled as a "sex tourist").

If a girl likes rugby guys, she'll go to a sports bar. If she likes attention but not fucking, she'll go to clubs "just for dancing." If she's worried you'll finish with her, she'll start hanging around with men, who'll she'll tell you are "just friends." Break up and a week later said friend will be drilling your ex-woman.

If a girl accepts an invite to your place, she's expecting you to at least try to sleep with her.

So I'm sure you get the idea. Just think about the practical aspects of whatever situation she is trying to engineer or has engineered, and boom: it's right there in front of you. Nothing to understand, just don't overcomplicate it and don't lie to yourself. Men particularly have a habit of seeing what they want to see to justify their beliefs, rather than what is the actual truth.

Actions > Words

Remember, people prove themselves through their actions, not their words. If she's saying one thing but her actions don't seem to match what's coming out of her mouth, always take her actions as the decisive factor.

I mentioned a fault of men is the try to convince themselves of things but choosing what they see. The fault of women is often, they are not authentic. They justify their own actions through lies and self-denial. For example, if they do something which makes them feel like a whore, they will then create justifications (usually blamed on outside circumstances) so they feel better about it.

Not understanding this combination of these male and female faults can be lethal for a man. You have to be aware of these general characteristics in case you need to counter them. See people for what they do, not how they justify it to themselves.

Read Next: Why Is The Zoe Quinn Scandal Blacked Out Across The Internet?

Jesus Baetana

Jesus Baetana is a man of Anglo-Italian descent, often found stood slack jawed in astonishment at the current state of gender politics today. He now resides in a small central European state, attempting to single-handedly wrest control of both it's wealth and women. Read more about his adventures at The Words Of A Man

Cultivate Your Certainty In The Age Of Turbulence

September 15, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

We are oarsmen aboard galleys, straining our muscles to keep our ships on a certain azimuth, enduring our labors in foaming and swelling seas, while being buffeted by the storms and waves of Fortune. We hope for placid days, for the sight of a friendly shore, but of these things we have no guarantee. Not for us are the comforting certainties and predictabilities of our forefathers, who had some assurances of their environment's cultural and social stability, before the second half of the twentieth century cracked the foundations of Western societies' moral edifices. This is the Age of Turbulence.

It is tempting to envy the certainty of the medieval mind, for in that certainty lay relief from mental turbulence. In that age, Christians, Moslems, and Jews alike believed that they had already found in their respective theologies the ultimate truths of things; they felt no grasping compulsion to probe the mysteries of the natural world, to worship machines and technology, or to question the inherited beliefs of their ancestors. The truth had already been revealed, and it remained only to exalt these truths in art, poetry, architecture, and literature. The medieval mind would have valued the sublime beauty of the spires of Chartres, the buttresses of Notre Dame, the Bayeux tapestry, the arcane mysteries of the Mass, illuminated manuscripts, and heroic poetry, more than he would the clanking pulleys and levers of the engineers, or the obsessive tinkerings of the scientist.

For the medieval man, art and faith were more important than reason. We cannot be sure he was wrong in his choice. Perhaps he was wiser than we, who instead place our faith in iPhones, the internet, and Tinder matches. We have exchanged one God for a multiplicity of false epicurean gods. Whereas our ancestors had the strength of theological certainty, the modern man, following the star of his own avarice and caprice, is tormented by self-doubt and hesitation. Obviously, this certainty came at a certain price. Yet, we moderns multiply machines on top of machines, every generation more complex than the previous, with little apparent augmenting of wisdom or maturity.

Louis IX: He was fortified by his certainty

To see how starkly the differences between us and our ancestors emerge, consider Jean de Joinville's Life of Saint Louis, a famous monograph about France's King Louis IX written in 1309. Louis was France's most pious king, and was the only one of her monarchs to have been canonized. Joinville had known Louis personally, filled his account with stories of Louis's piety and sincerity.

Joinville relates the following anecdotes. On one occasion, the king sent for him to hold a philosophical discussion. The dialogue went as follows.[1]

> "Tell me, seneschal, which would you prefer: to be a leper or to have committed a mortal sin?" And I, who had never lied to him, replied that I would rather have committed thirty mortal sins than become a leper…The next day, he called me to him, making me sit at his feet and said to me: "Why did you say that to me yesterday?" I told him that I still say it. "You spoke without thinking, like a fool. You ought to know that there is no leprosy so foul as being in a state of mortal sin; for the soul in that condition is like the Devil; therefore no leprosy can be so vile…So I beg you…as earnestly as I can, for the love of God, and for love of me, to train your heart to prefer any evil that can happen to the body…rather than let mortal sin take possession of your soul."

On the king's certainty, Joinville says:

> In the conversations he had with me, this saintly king did everything in his power to give me a firm belief in the principles of Christianity as given us by God. He used to say that we ought to have such an unshakeable belief in all the articles of > faith that neither fear of death nor of any harm that might happen to our bodies should make us willing to go against them in word or deed.[2]

And in a crowning statement of the king's doctrinal certitude, we are told:

> "So I tell you," said the king, "that no one, unless he is an expert theologian, should venture to argue with these people [i.e., theologians]. But a layman, whenever he hears the Christian religion abused, should not attempt to defend its tenets, except with the sword, and that he should thrust into the scoundrel's belly, as far as it will enter."

We may not agree with this last sentiment, but the certainty with which it is expressed is a refreshing antidote to today's floundering morass of relativism. Our modern society, with its abundance of material comforts and unrelenting smugness, has exchanged masculine conviction and strength for a weak-kneed relativism, in which everything is so perfectly balanced out that we are left paralyzed with inaction. There is power in certainty; relativism paralyzes. By destroying our inherited patrimony and its attendant moral code, modern society exposes us naked to the stormy seas of Fortune. We could also say that our history and its cultural inheritance are like the trees growing on mountainsides, whose roots keep the soil firmly anchored in place; but when the trees are cut down, erosion, denudation, and landslides are the results.

Pascal: Imagination can produce certainty

What can the rational man do in this Age of Turbulence? What actions can be taken, until our vessel reaches calmer seas? One answer is the advice offered by the Italian humanist Paolo Giovio in his dialogue Notable Men and Women of Our Time:

> Let us endure these hardships of fortune with a strong mind, and let us pick trusted defenses that come from virtue and good studies, which will guard us perfectly from the vicissitudes of fortune. I think, actually, we should live in the way of clever and honest slaves who, with a humble and cunning intelligence, dissemble as they need to, so that they await their liberty in due course, with a calculated and patient submission.[3]

This is certainly one way of handling an impossible situation. But another, more inward-looking, answer to this question was suggested to me yesterday from a passage in Blaise Pascal's Pensees. Pascal gives us an interesting thought experiment to chew on.[4]

If we dreamed the same thing every night, he says, it would affect us as much as the things we see every day while awake. If an artisan, for example, dreamed for ten hours per night that he was a king, he would be about as happy as a king who dreamed for ten hours that he was an artisan. In the same way, if we dreamed every day of horrible things, we would dread going to sleep, and would fear these evil things as much as if we encountered them in real life. The traveler who is haunted at night by terrible visions would be afraid of waking up to such mishaps on the road of travel. Thus the world of dreams carries over into the world of the real. And over time, the two worlds begin to overlap. In this way, we can use our dreams to shape our reality. "For life is a dream," Pascal says, [but] a little less unstable."

Life is a dream. Find your dream, and dream your dream with intensity. Believe in it with an overwhelming passion. And over time, as Pascal says, that dream will become part of your reality. You evolve into your dream, and incorporate it into your guiding vision. The imagination can indeed shape your external world.

So I say this: behave in the manner of Giovo's "patient and honest slave" while you bide your time, and at the same time, dream with the fervent intensity of Blaise Pascal. This is the way for us to restore some degree of certainty to our minds, some fuel to our muscles, and face the swelling hostile seas of the Age of Turbulence.

Read More: The World Will Teach You

---

[1] See Shaw, M.R.B., Joinville and Villehardouin: Chronicles of the Crusades, New York: Penguin Books Ltd. 1983, p. 169.

[2] Id. at 173.

[3] Gouwens, Kenneth (ed.), Paolo Giovio, Notable Men and Women of Our Time, Cambridge: Harvard Univ. Press, 2013, p. 169. (translation mine).

[4] See Pascal, Blaise, Pensees, Indianapolis: Hackett Publishing Co., 2005, p. 198.

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

3 Types Of Women Who Refuse To Wear High Heels

September 15, 2014 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

Feminists have frequently touted that they shouldn't be held to societal standards in things like fashion, hygiene, and even attitude. They've started campaigns for not grooming there hirsute bodies, neglecting to shave their legs and under pits. However, normal decent women saw through their sour grapes ploy. Feminists decided that if they couldn't get women to stop grooming themselves, they would go to a new uncharted territory: They decided to make campaigns for women to stay obese and attack fashion. One of the main targets are high-heeled shoes.

Why is feminist America trying to make American women more like Lena Dunham than Audrey Hepburn? High-heeled shoes back in the day indicated a fashionable woman who tries to look as best she could. Now, they're saved for sex workers. Even women visiting the President of the USA back in 2008 didn't have the decency to dress in heels. They wore flip-flops.

This sign of female rebellion against looking good and being a proper female should be met with force. A force of not showing them any attention, or bestowing any chivalrous actions. A woman who won't wear high heels should be boycotted and shown no love. Here are the three types of women I've observed who don't wear high heels:

Feminists

The main group that would be propagating delusional hamsterisms about high-heels would be feminists. Every few months some irate feminist writes a blog post about how being presentable to the public is the patriarchy oppressing them. They would spew articles about things like makeup, shaving hairy body parts, or even being told to have a smile out in public, which grates the feminist. The reason most feminists out there despise high heels is because it relegates woman by themselves. Most women buy high heels that are designed and marketed by men. This fact shows the obvious life has a male bias, since it's mostly men designing and producing these shoes.

The high heel is a shortcut for improvement to happen, and we all know that self-improvement is the enemy of the feminist. It makes the legs of even an average girl look tall and slender like a supermodel. It bumps up the curves more than any Instagram filter could ever achieve. Don't show any women who can't even put on a pair of heels a modicum of attention. They're looking for attention for being a mentally ill contrarian. Shame them and then ignore them.

Lazy Women

Thankfully, most American women are not feminists. I know what you're thinking. "They believe in a lot of feminist screeds." That's true, but most American women don't buy it fully. A lot of them just use it as a justification for being lazy. The college girl who goes to class in her pajamas isn't making a political statement. This laziness is why the overwhelming majority of women in America have stopped wearing high heels. It takes work to learn how to walk in heels, and tires one's body when standing up for hours. That's why flip flop use has grown rampant in these past 10 years even for formal events. I'm talking about galas, graduations, and even weddings.

A woman who isn't willing to put in work to present herself in a decent manner is a terrible woman. You will hear these chicks talk about female empowerment by not wearing heels, but it doesn't make any sense. I've personally witnessed many foreign highly-educated women who are willing to put in the work to look good. These women don't have bullshit majors. Many are Slavic, Mediterranean, or Asian women with prestigious degrees. If these woman who put 40+ hours a week studying to be a pediatrician can put on a pair of heels when it matters, so can American sloths who spend the same amount of time on their iPhones.

Fat Women

The waistline of the average woman in western societies has ballooned. That has also increased their foot size and girth tremendously. Most high heels are designed for women who have the mental fortitude to make sure their feet aren't as wide as an iPad. Fat woman literally cannot wear heels because of the laws of physics. The amount of weight they put on that tiny little heel could break a bridge. Fat woman are like the guys who are so fat that they have to use mobility scooters in super markets. They block the aisle and disgust the normal shoppers. Shame fat women for disfiguring the beautiful female form. High heels are the least of their concerns.

Notice the correlation among all of these types. It shows that women who don't want to take care of themselves need to be shamed. Any time you see a woman in flip flops at a wedding, graduation, gala, or any formal event, make sure you call her out. Shame them in real life and through social media. Take pictures on Twitter of chicks wearing flip flops to a formal event and make up hashtags. If we want women to be truly feminine and pleasant creatures, we must show them the proper incentive to do so.

Read More: The History Of Flip Flops

---

redpiller1985

Redpiller1985 is a dude who has been taught the red pill thanks to the greats like Roosh,

El mech, and many countless other RVF contributors. Here is his twitter, if you have any questions or comments to send to him. Send a Twitter direct message if you want to talk about using my services to promote redpill ideas.

A Few Homegrown Truths About Game

September 15, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

I was dating a girl recently, and she seemed particularly fussy about my face being clean shaven. She'd always bug to me shave when I kissed her in the evening. Then she was showing me some photos in her iPhone and one shot included this guy who had a beard like a Navy Seal, just home from a tour of duty in the Helmand Province. With a couple more months the guy could've put Gandalf to shame. "Oh that's my ex," she exclaims.

So, in reality she's not at all bothered by my five o'clock shadow and is simply finding ways to beat on me. It's quite subtle, but what she's doing is asking me to do something that she doesn't give a damn about, to see if she can break me to her will. Then of course she will grow to manipulate me more and then later despise me for it. This fairly innocent-looking dynamic is what leads to her taking the reins in so many more ways, that if you bend to it, you might as well buy her a strap on during the first date.

"You Are Cheating On Me"

It may be true or it may not be true, but it should of course always be denied. Men get laid—women have relationships. I headed out for a drink the other weekend at my favorite bar where my buddy is the bar man. He'd lined up these two tourist chicks the previous night (cute 19-year-old Ukrainians from Texas), but missed out on finding a wing man. He suggested I hang out and take the heat for him, which I gladly did. She offered, and who was I to decline? There was nothing premeditated about it and it wasn't going to turn into a crazed affair. I was just entertaining myself of an evening.

A few weeks later a more longer-term girlfriend starts beating on me for "cheating" and I cannot understand where all this crap is coming from. Of course it would be too easy to say…. Well, yes there was this time last month. NO! It has nothing to do with that. At best she is shooting in the air, just as beard girl was. Just by accusing you of cheating and making you deny it, she has already won. She's got you on the back foot. It's another horrid little girl head game that has nothing to do with anything.

Beyond trying to get control, she's also in all likelihood thinking about sleeping around herself. Thieves often get worried about people stealing from them. Liars feel they can't trust anyone. Aggressive drug dealers carry guns and are ready to kill because they feel threatened. Whatever is in a person's head tends to get manifested in their attitudes. The girl that accuses you of cheating, while having no evidence, is not only angling for control and trying to get you on the defensive, but also has designs in that direction herself.

Passive Aggressive Can Be Very Subtle

What we are talking about here is the "beta" trait of being passive aggressive. Women are whole heartedly beta. She wants to cheat but she doesn't have the "balls" to go out and just do it. It's not a spontaneous thing for her. Most likely an ex has showed up on Facebook, or a guy at work has been hitting on her and she wants to go on a date, but can’t handle the guilt. So what she does, like the typical passive aggressive, is try to project her shit onto you.

If you admit to cheating, this of course gives her a get out of jail free card to ride half the neighborhood in a mad fit of orgasmic revenge. The girl that accuses you of cheating is not necessarily cheating already, what she’s doing is trying to paint you into the corner as the villain, so she can excuse her own devious behavior.

A girlfriend recently left her iPad on the table while she was out. I picked it up innocently enough to read the news and found myself logged into her Facebook account, with some old friend of hers from college sending over photos of some pretty decent looking mid-40s guy she was dating. I was about to close it, when I saw her profile photo, complete with two kids and a loving husband and I just had to investigate further.

She’s yapping on in her private messages about how hubby is cheating on her and now she’s going to go and date her ex, but honestly her husband looked like the loveliest, wealthiest, kindest, softest gentleman you can ever imagine; a perfect husband. Perhaps he has a kink and visits hookers, or pays the odd rent boy, but he obviously makes good money and looks like a typical accountant, engineer, or software developer. He ain’t cheating. But she has convinced herself he is, so she can satisfy her own lust, while satiating the guilt she feels. I mean for fuck’s sakes. Buy some kinky underwear make some effort and give the lovely husband the time of his life. Would it take that much?

The passive aggressive dynamic is also what causes weaker men to end up beating the shit out of their women. Believe it or not, as politically incorrect as it seems and although it would never stand up in a court of law, many times the passive aggressive shit testing woman is actually trying to draw out bad behavior so she can accuse him and play the victim.

Her Cry For Commitment

When a woman gets all needy and clingy, she can be hard to manage. The choice is to go all-in or ditch her. However, once you understand the depths of her psychology, it becomes much easier to handle the situation. What comes out of a woman’s mouth and what is going on in her head are two very different things. Her cry for commitment in your logical mind, makes you think she is very serious about her relationship with you, but in truth she hasn’t got a damn clue and is shaking at the thought of commitment. Often she wants to break up but doesn’t know how, so she’s forcing you to take the lead.

From this point you can not only allay her fears and calm her down, but also make her see that it’s her that should be more committed to you (provided of course you want her around–if you don’t this is a great moment to cool things off). Use a basic martial arts technique of turning the attacker’s force against them. She wants commitment, so make her commit. It’s not that different to the older brother holding the younger brother at arm’s length, while he flaps his too-short arms trying to punch back.

The needy, clingy girl can be flipped into the most loyal devoted girlfriend. On the other hand, untold numbers of immature women that have sucked men into full-blown, god-awful LTRs with the clingy “I want commitment” conversation, whilst actually being completely insecure and having no such designs on an LTR whatsoever. Is it any wonder the relationships go to hell in a hand basket?

“I Think We Should Break Up”

Greenlights in the sky like you’re in the Yukon. If a girl is both subtly whining for commitment but also trying to take play brinkmanship with the breakup routine, this girl wants to commit. You might have a keeper on your hands. She’s testing you to see where your loyalties lie, precisely because she doesn’t have the balls to tell you to your face how crazy she is about you. I cannot tell you how many potential unicorns have been lost because of this catch phrase. I lost a girl like this and after the big “breakup” she spent the next three years keeping in touch, even after she got married and had a kid.

When the girl at the bar flicks her hair, or shows you the back of her wrist, flutters her eyes, pushes her tits up, rearranges her shirt and all that…. You know that her on-board mating computer has just pegged you as a possible match. The catch phrase “I think we should break up”, or for the married couple, “I want a divorce” is exactly the same thing. She wants to know if you want to break up, or if you want a divorce so she doesn’t have to take full responsibility and having it fall flat. She’s trying to draw you into showing the commitment she wants to show. It’s a lose-lose situation in many ways and that is why your average male is utterly confounded.

Of course, this female game will fall flat on its face for her, because as soon as you start begging her not to leave you, she’ll start playing hard to get. The script will flip and you will find yourself having fallen into the twilight zone of beta boy. The solution is to wholeheartedly agree and then run game until you have her flat on her back howling with orgasms. Of course if you want to break up, that’s fantastic she’s just done all the hard work for you, but if not, it’s just a hop, skip, jump to have her fully online in your corner. After you’ve pounded her senseless you can tease her about the big breakup.

Your Own Passive Aggressive Garbage

Be wary of your own passive aggressive shit and projecting your own crap onto her. Many a marriage has died because the man is desperately unhappy but doesn’t have the balls to end it properly. If you want it over, start making a move. Set yourself up in a new apartment across town, slowly move a few things out, make whatever excuses you need to and be on your way. I don’t recommend the “I want a divorce” conversation until you’ve already cooled things down and have a separate place to live. She will make your life hell. There’s no worse place to be than trying to live with a woman that hates you. Men don’t break up; they just quietly go cold and find somewhere else to lay their hat and bury their bone.

Read More: Passive Game Vs. Active Game

Why Hasn’t Michael Moore Made An Obama Documentary?

September 16, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

I came of age during a time when a massive transition was taking place in how schools were run. I was six years old when the Columbine shooting first rocked the parents of the western world, and eight when 9/11 further eroded any sense of safety parents of the early 2000’s felt. I grew up in the dying age of “kids will be kids,” and experienced firsthand how school changed into a place of thought policing, politically correct indoctrination and mental suppression induced via drugs.

I’m not exactly sure what grade it started in (3 or 4), but every spring until I graduated high school an anti-bullying assembly would be called. The violence amongst children in school which had existed since the dawn of the public school system now suddenly had parents everywhere worried that little Timmy being hit with a snowball today meant bigger Timmy coming back with an Ar-15 tomorrow. Like most awareness attempts aimed at kids and teenagers, these assemblies were always roundly mocked by the actual students themselves.

I myself found them exceptionally repugnant, since I faced a lot of violence from immigrants before my family finally decided to move us to a new city at the end of my grade 9 year. I’ve touched on it lightly before, but I grew up in a city whose council decided to welcome a massive influx of third world immigrants (mostly PTSD Somalis), and within a summer my school went from a fairly safe, first world child dominated place to a racially-fueled war zone.

So I found it not so amusingly ironic that we were forced to sit in a gym and listen to the evils of bullying when me and my small Neo Nazi gang (yes, I Was A Teenaged Nazi) were constantly sporting bruises and cuts from our weekly fights with the Aboriginals and Somalis and Sikh kids. I originally fell in with the burgeoning youth Nazi scene because the adults refused to listen to me or my friends when we complained about being jumped after school or having to cluster into groups at recess for fear of being mugged by kids who looked different then us for our lunch money. And yes, I do mean mugged—this was no school yard bullying. If we didn't hand over our cash when confronted we were hit with weapons, bludgeoned with rocks, you name it.

One day on my way home from school some Aboriginal kids caught me alone while I was playing a Pokemon game on my Game Boy, and when I refused to hand it over I got my lip split open by a sawed off hockey stick. It's actually a lot funnier in hindsight. Of course, since the elephant in the room was a racial issue, it received no acknowledgement.

When we moved to our new and more peaceful city, I lost most of my white supremacy convictions. I had befriended the Neo Nazis in my school for the same reason a white inmate joins them in prison. During my three years at my new and gloriously safe high school, there were very few incidents that could be called bullying. Still, the anti-bullying seminars continued. My high school even ran them in the spring like they had back in my old school. The main difference was by the this time a very (in)famous documentary about Columbine had been released, and was used to augment the anti-bullying lecture by making us students all sit in the gym and watch it around the end of every April.

The documentary was called Bowling For Columbine [2002], an anti-gun film released by controversial American filmmaker Michael Moore.

I doubt there isn't a single reader over 24 who hasn't seen this documentary already, but if you haven't (or simply feel like watching it again), here is a Youtube link. There's no need to worry about Copyright yadda yadda, since Michael Moore has stated he doesn't care about people pirating or watching his movies for free.

The first time I saw the documentary I was more or less unfazed by it. I first saw it with my grade 10 history class, and due to my upbringing I didn't identify with the murdered teenagers at all. I didn't identify with the shooters, Eric and Dylan, either (though, through my experiences, I could see where they were coming from). To me, the duo were pussies with a low kill count who couldn't even man up and charge the police, instead taking the coward's way out by shooting themselves.

I did not have any choice in watching this documentary come every April. It was a prominent movie in my formative years, and I shudder to think how I might have been affected by it's skewed message of gun ownership and troubled teenagers had I been more sheltered in regards to both those issues. My dad is a proud gun owner, and I was shooting my own .22 by the time I was 12. And thanks to the violence I had suffered back in Junior High and Elementary school, I knew that kids didn't need guns to inflect copious amounts of pain on one another.

Yet I have been subliminally affected by Michael Moore's documentary. I recently heard a Marilyn Manson song I've never heard before, and during one part of it my mind suddenly lit up with 911 calls made by the Columbine students during the shooting back in 1999.

Especially around the 2:20 mark. I sat there, thinking about why I was remembering 911 calls and I suddenly realized that the song was from Moore's movie. I haven't watched Bowling For Columbine for six years, yet I immediately recalled entire scenes from it simply because of a guitar chord.

By complete coincidence, a few days later I stumbled upon this article. As a film buff I was reading about this year's Toronto International Film Festival and just happened to see that Michael Moore was talking about his first film, Roger And Me, a scathing documentary about General Motors pulling its factories out of Moore's home town of Flint, Michigan, and destroying the town's economy.

> Moore appeared Monday night before an appreciative audience at a showing of "Roger & Me," his 1989 landmark movie that used satire to explore the devastating economic implosion of Flint caused by General Motors cutting 30,000 jobs. The movie has been digitally restored and will be available next month on Blu-ray and DVD and through a limited theatrical release.
>
> Clips in "Roger & Me" of shuttered businesses and abandoned homes seem almost identical to the footage found in contemporary documentaries about Detroit's financial crisis. The portrayal of corporate downsizing greed still has a ripped-from-2014 headlines feeling as well.

Interesting, Michael Moore has also stirred some controversy amongst his biggest fans, the American left, by half heartedly denouncing the left's treasured president Obama.

> "I think Obama … he's done many, many good things," Moore soft-pedaled to Hollywood Reporter, before going off. "But he's also been a huge disappointment."
>
> Moore continued: "When the history is written of this era, this is how you'll be remembered. He was the first black president. OK, not a bad accomplishment. But that's it. That's it, Mr. Obama. A hundred years from now, (it'll be noted that) he was the first black American that got elected president. And that's it — eight years of your life and that's what people will remember."
>
> Obama has long touted his administration's bailout of the American auto business.
>
> But Michigan native Moore said Obama saved corporate executives — and not the working men and women on the assembly lines.
>
> "You saved GM, you saved Chrysler," Moore raged. "Detroit, at this point, would stand a better chance if they were an Iraqi or Syrian city in terms of some sort getting help."

Obama isn't the first President Moore has criticized. Moore's follow-up to Bowling For Columbine was a scathing portrait of George W. Bush and the 2003 Iraq War, Fahrenheit 9/11 [2004]. (Youtube link) Even if you're aware of Moore's manipulative editing and writing techniques, Fahrenheit 9/11 is a harrowing movie to watch and one of the absolute best examples I've ever seen of an attack piece. Many of the techniques Moore uses I am using right now, in order to criticize him: so I guess being indoctrinated by his documentaries as a teenager isn't a complete negative.

Moore has shown that, when something pisses him off, he can really hurt them. It wouldn't be outlandish to say that Moore's documentaries of the 2000's were highly influential in turning the American public against right wing and Republican politics. His documentaries received standing ovations at prestigious film festivals and were massive blockbusters in theaters. Fahrenheit 9/11 is (currently) the most financially successful documentary ever released, pulling in 119 million dollars. Jackass 3D (117 mil) is second.

Moore won a Best Documentary Oscar for the movie, and earned a lot of cachet amongst a lot of people with myriad beliefs. In fact, as a result of Bowling For Columbine Moore actually shamed the K-Mart mega store chain into publicly saying it will cease selling handgun ammunition. Moore has proven he has the talent and resources to absolutely tear apart those people and organizations he thinks are grievously harming the American people.

Does the current American, President Obama, not fall into that category? Moore certainly doesn't seem to think so, judging by his lack of outcry over Obama's numerous shortcomings, many of which have harmed (and continue to harm) the American people. Under Obama's Presidency there have been a myriad of scandals. Type in Obama Scandal into the Google search engine and see what comes up. The NSA spying scandal is one of the most disturbing and alarming conspiracies in the history of the United States, and Obama did not disband or limit the NSA in any way.

Edward Snowden, the whistle-blower who revealed the extent of how much the American Government is spying on its own people, is currently in exile, and his treatment by the Obama presidency is one of the most shameful episodes in the history of the United States. And for the last few years Obama has been trying his damndest to get America embroiled in another Middle Eastern war.

Were any of these scandals or policies revealed under President George W. Bush, would Moore have been as quiet about them as he has been with Obama? Why has Michael not made a single major documentary since his 2009's Capitalism: A Love Story? Interestingly enough, Moore provides one answer himself during an article he wrote about Obamacare when it was unveiled.

> TODAY marks the beginning of health care coverage under the Affordable Care Act's new insurance exchanges, for which two million Americans have signed up. Now that the individual mandate is officially here, let me begin with an admission: Obamacare is awful.
>
> That is the dirty little secret many liberals have avoided saying out loud for fear of aiding the president's enemies, at a time when the ideal of universal health care needed all the support it could get.

Moore has tried to portray himself not as rigidly left or right in political beliefs, but simply to show himself a man of the people. This had some credibility back in the 2000's, when he tackled issues he believed were destructive to the average American—guns, an badly handled war, a corrupt healthcare system (Sicko, 2007) and an even more corrupt financial system.

However, his complete silence on Obama's inept Presidency is showing where Moore's politics lie. Moore is, first and foremost, a leftist. That is where his loyalty is, and those are the types of people he prefers. After all, Moore backed Obama before the man had even shown what sort of president he would be (as he admits in a 2009 interview with Howard Stern).

[The discussion about Moore and Obama begins at the 3:55 mark]

Obviously, judging by his recent comments and articles, Moore thinks Obama is a failure as a president. Then why has he released no documentary judging Obama? Articles and opinion pieces do not hold the power a well-made, entertaining documentary would have in criticizing the Obama presidency. Why did the junior Bush deserve the most vitriol Moore could summon when Obama's actions are little different from what one of Moore's hated Republicans would do?

It's clear by now that the politicians of both the right and left are utterly corrupt, and both political parties are actively harming the American people. That makes Obama fair game for scathing commentary in my book. Why doesn't Moore feel the same way? There are five possible explanations for Moore's actions, the first of which has already been explained.

1. Michael Moore Is A Loyal Leftist

Moore's comparative silence on the shortcomings of the Democrat party are the result of Moore's party loyalty. Before anything else, Moore identifies with the left, the Democrats, the liberals: regardless of how much their actions stray from liberalism and how corrupt they are. Moore only sees his world through party labels, and safe guarding the icons of the left is more important to him than helping his fellow Americans see the truth. He has already said he is deeply disappointed with Obama, and Obama has done enough harm to the American people to warrant a Moore documentary. Why hasn't he made one then? Where does his loyalty lie? To the little guy, or to the party?

2. Michael Moore Doesn't Actually Care About The American People

Moore doesn't need to make another documentary. He lives very comfortably, and has more than enough money to spend the rest of his life in leisure and comfort, to say nothing of the fame and kudos he still enjoys from his fans. All his bluster about representing the little guy, the average American, is exactly that: bluster.

3. Michael Moore Is A Racist

Racism isn't just a negative thing, like calling a person of a different ethnicity a derogatory name. Treating someone different simply because they're physically different from you is a form of racism. Moore criticized white people for far less than Obama has done because Moore holds white people up to a higher standard than he does black people. For Moore, President Obama is as good an American President as any black man can possible be, and therefore he does not criticize Obama like he did Bush because Moore believes white people could and should deliver better Presidents than Bush.

4. Michael Moore Is A Coward

Moore's previous targets have all been easy cultural "bogeymen": gun control, republicans, corporations. Pop culture has been making fun of silly (or scary) god-fearing white rednecks for nigh on 40 years now, and at this point the public has been preprogrammed to approve any bashing of pro gun, pro capitalist or pro conservative peoples (especially white ones) without giving their platform or ideas even a cursory thought.

It's one thing to make a documentary about how bad guns or corporations are when you don't even need to win over the viewing public. It's a whole other to attack a beloved figure, one whom has been portrayed as such a good guy that simply challenging him means you're evil. Plus, in "post" racial America, any criticism of a black man automatically makes you a racist, so there's that fun cesspool to wade through as well.

Moore, in making a documentary critical of Obama's presidency, would be opening himself up to a flurry of attack from all directions. His traditional right-leaning enemies would come down on him, and his left-leaning allies would feel betrayed and also hang him out to dry: add in to that the race war profiteers proclaiming Moore to be this week's Racist Anti-Christ and Moore would be facing a very cold winter indeed.

5. Michael Moore Is Simply Lazy

This is the most likely explanation of Moore's silence on the Obama front. After all, look at how big the guy has let himself get before.

As I mentioned above, any documentary on Obama would require a far greater amount of effort and research to present a truly effective portray of how inept the president is. Moore won't be able to get cheap laughs by showing a redneck militia group patrolling depressing Michigan farmer's fields for Muslim invaders. The audience would be incredibly uncomfortable the whole time, and it would be up to Moore to win them over with his own wit.

Moore is nearly a senior citizen. He has never been in good shape his whole adult life, and his recent divorce has probably sapped what little mental energy he has left. It's likely that the man is completely burnt out.

Still: how hard is it to make a scathing documentary about the harm Obama has done the American people?

Not very. I have been writing for Return Of Kings for nearly a year now, and I have much experience with writing attack articles under pressure. My Zoe Quinn article, about the slut who compromised an entire industry's integrity? I wrote that in seven hours from scratch, start to finish, while I was half drunk in a sleazy hotel room after I had been up for 35 straight hours travelling across Canada.

My non-writing life consists of me working 8-14 hour days as an electrician, going to the gym and lifting heavy stuff every other day, and in between that semi-successfully weaning sex out of the most stuck up, hard to get, and egotistical generation of women that's ever existed. And yet I still pump out articles with (some) regularity.

Michael Moore hasn't had to worry about the bills for a long time. If he wanted to make a documentary about Obama's numerous shortcomings, and the Democrat's betrayal of the American public's trust, that's all he would have to focus on. He doesn't have kids, his wife is gone, and he obviously doesn't have any extraneous regimens he needs to stick to. The most time consuming part of the documentary would be travelling to get the token interviews and do the token stunts (trying to get into the White House unannounced for a one-on-one interview with Obama, for example), and the editing process. And since we no longer drive around in covered wagons, and film has become digital, both those activities have become ludicrously easy.

Within an hour I thought of a pretty effective and simple documentary. The theme of it? Obama (and the American Democrat party) is no different than Bush Jr. and the Republican party. Both no longer had the interests of the American people in mind—if they ever did. High concept summary? Meet the new boss, same as the old boss.

Moore has approached his documentaries from an entertainment standpoint, so instead of going essay style (intro, body, conclusion), Moore needs only to have a beginning, middle, and end. Obama's presidency automatically lends itself to this structure.

Beginning: Change and Hope, the 2008-2011 years, ending on the high point of Bin Laden's assassination.

Middle: Re-election and the scandals, 2012-2014. The push to more wars in the Middle East, the Snowden affair, the attempts to install a pro-west puppet in the Ukraine and the disastrous after effects.

End: Endgame, 2013-16. The more things change, the more they stay the same. Focus on Obama's complete failure to live up to his promises, and point out his numerous hypocrisies.

A good ending can make or break a movie, and here's one I thought up and wrote within a half hour which encapsulates the theme of "All these bastards are the same and are trying to screw you."

Set up video juxtaposition of George W. and Obama when they talk about the same topics. For example, take snippets from Obama's words uttered during his declaration of war on Syria, and George W's taken from his declaration of war on Iraq.

> Obama: 'My fellow Americans, for nearly seven decades, the United States has been the anchor of global security.'
>
> George W: 'My fellow citizens, at this hour American and coalition forces are in the early stages of military operations to disarm Iraq, to free its people and to defend the world from grave danger.'
>
> O: 'America is not the world's policeman. Terrible things happen across the globe, and it is beyond our means to right every wrong. But when, with modest effort and risk, we can stop children from being gassed to death, and thereby make our own children safer over the long run, I believe we should act.'
>
> GW: 'Our nation enters this conflict reluctantly, yet our purpose is sure. The people of the United States and our friends and allies will not live at the mercy of an outlaw regime that threatens the peace with weapons of mass murder.'
>
> O: 'Tonight, I give thanks again to our military and their families for their incredible strength and sacrifices.'
>
> GW: 'For your sacrifice, you have the gratitude and respect of the American people and you can know that our forces will be coming home as soon as their work is done.'
>
> O: 'Let me make something clear: The United States military doesn't do pinpricks.'
>
> GW: 'This will not be a campaign of half measures and we will accept no outcome but victory.'
>
> O: 'That's what makes America different. That's what makes us exceptional. With humility, but with resolve, let us never lose sight of that essential truth.'

> GW: ‘The dangers to our country and the world will be overcome. We will pass through this time of peril and carry on the work of peace. We will defend our freedom. We will bring freedom to others. And we will prevail. May God bless our country and all who defend her.’
>
> O: ‘God bless you. And God bless the United States of America.’

Then we put video of the Presidents out golfing side by side, taking swings in unison, and quick cut to thermal bombing footage from 2004 and 2014 as their golf balls fly majestically away. Play the YEAHHH scream from The Who’s “Won’t Get Fooled Again” as the explosions occur, and cut to credits as the song’s very relevant lyrics accentuate the point of the documentary:

The change, it had to come
We knew it all along
We were liberated from the fold, that’s all
And the world looks just the same
And history ain’t changed
‘Cause the banners, they are flown in the next war

I’ll tip my hat to the new constitution
Take a bow for the new revolution
Smile and grin at the change all around
Pick up my guitar and play
Just like yesterday
Then I’ll get on my knees and pray
We don’t get fooled again

Boom. Meet the new boss, same as the old boss. There’s Moore’s devastating Obama documentary.

Michael Moore’s documentaries have affected many people in a myriad of ways. I myself have likely been programmed to a degree by Moore’s beliefs, and it’s even more likely that many hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people who have viewed Moore’s documentaries have been similarly brainwashed to favor Moore’s prejudices.

Michael Moore is at a crossroads. He can prove himself a friend to the small guy, the average American, and release at least one more documentary completely tearing apart the Obama presidency and the American liberals. Or he can rest on his laurels and go down in history as a hypocritical leftist sock puppet who simply talked a good game when the going was easy. The ball is in your court Michael.

Read More: You've Already Seen One Of The Greatest Red Pill Movies Ever Made

Billy Chubbs
Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

Is A Big City Required For Day Game? (ROK Mailbag)

September 16, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

The Sound Of Silence

A reader asks:

> What music do you listen to while writing?

Nothing. You want your mind completely focused on writing instead of also processing musical notes, which only distracts you, creating an inferior product in the end. The only exception is if you're in a loud environment and you must put on ambient music (without vocals) to block out the sound. The less sensory input your brain has to process while writing, the more it can devote to the task.

– Roosh

I listen to either a pretentious playlist (think Mendelssohn, Prokofiev, Vivaldi) or a gay one (think Taylor Swift, Elliot Goulding, Fun). Which depends on if I'm trying to write smart or write angry.

– Billy Chubbs

International Love…During The Day

Iury writes:

> I'm from a small town in Brazil and I would like to know more about daygame in a small town situation, because it seems like every "tutorial" on daygame is aimed > towards these big cities environments, and i can't really spend money and time going to big cities to get a date. I don't drink, that's why I'm not a fan of traditional night game. So do you have any tips?

Run day game as explained in my article, even so. Though you don't have nearly as many women to pursue as I do here in Philly, still you should have some success if you do day game as I describe it. You should also read Roosh's book on day game.

The most important thing is to make yourself start talking to attractive women wherever you find them; this is the best way to get over approach anxiety and to become a good talker period. So much of game lies in the art of conversation. If you spend years approaching wherever you are, you may eventually reach the elite level of your boy C. Contrary, who just last week got the digits of an 18-year-old hottie at the DMV while mom (who looked to be about my own age) was away for a few minutes in the bathroom.

Know that all game comes down to two essential elements: looks and conversation. Concerning the first one, you cannot make yourself 6'3 with a highly symmetrical face, but you can hit the weights, jog and eat clean so that you fill out a shirt, with a manly V-taper that women love. Dressing well is also within your power. I myself like the clean, elegant look by brands like Calvin Klein and Kenneth Cole. Avoid the generic look of the trendy douchebag: graphic T, striped button down dress shirt that is never tucked in, jeans with a bunch of stupid shit going on on them, etc. As for the second element, you must have things to talk about—you must be a man who is interesting to talk to and thus enjoyable to be around: for, as I say in my article, women need contextual attractiveness. This isn't just about having a good sense of humor and some stories to tell. You must also be fairly well-educated, with good social skills. You must be able to think well on your feet, smart and confident, cool and assured.

If all this sounds daunting, it should help to recall that you, Sir, are a MAN, while she, whoever she is, belongs to the Second Sex. Why be intimidated by that which is not your equal, however lovely and haughty? And don't forget what Dr. Dre and Snoop Dog said, either: "Bitches ain't shit but hoes and tricks."

I've knocked off some Brazilian broads here in the States. I've generally found them to be pretty open and lively, warm and relatively easy to approach, and exceptionally appreciative of an intelligent man. If this is how Brazilian women are in general, then, with game on your side, you may end up a happier man than Joe Player in NYC, with his 326 notches, all but a dozen or so cunts.

– C. Contrary

Striving For Perfection

MegaRobotCaptain writes:

> I am 20 years old, in a relationship. I am very satisfied with her emotionally and physically, she gives me blowjobs 1-4 times a day, pretty much on demand. She is okay with me having sex with other women as long as it "isn't emotional", > although she prefers to be only with me. We're just about "officially" living together now, planning to go travelling together in the near future. I've already spent a year travelling by myself. Things are starting to feel pretty damn serious, even though I'm not planning on getting married anytime soon (or ever).

>
> My relationship satisfies me, and allows me sexual freedom to an extent. Beyond sex, what other freedoms are important for a man to hold onto? Even if the relationship is going perfectly well, what should I keep in mind before I'm 26 years old and still with the same girl? Would this stunt my growth as a man somehow? I enjoy being in a relationship, but I want to have the benefits of being and growing as a single man.

A setup where you have multiple blowjobs daily and the freedom to chase new girls sounds pretty good. You state that you are happy and satisfied, so roll with it. If you later find you are not happy, or that you are compromising in any way then you can reassess and decide how you want to go forward. Personally I enjoy a good relationship here and there, with the understanding that I can still go after other girls because that is important to me.

You ask what other freedoms are important besides sex, and that is really up to you. For example, I enjoy the freedom of my career path, where I essentially answer to myself. I wake up every morning with an agenda dictated to me by myself and not a superior.

As to your final points you present some valid concerns. A lot of men get stuck in a relationship because it starts out great, and slowly but surely erodes away. If you just keep that in mind, try to nip such straying in the bud when it happens. You may not be successful but at least you will be aware of its occurrence.

-Law Dogger

That's Why They Call Me The Working Man

Jason writes:

> My question revolves around working long 3rd shift hours between 12 a.m. and noon the next day. I used to be very physically fit but have lost that edge since the last decade or so my work hours have started running all through the night. I used to go to the gym every morning, lifted some free weight did my cardio and such but somewhere I lost the battle.
>
> I've read that the human metabolism is slower at night and it affects your weigh gain/loss, so I was wondering if you had any advice or tips as to setting up a system that would work for us guys that sleep through the day and work throughout the night.
>
> Also: Any tips on a diet system would work as well, I'm 6'3 and around 260 pounds, and really wanting to drop the weight and gain my health and confidence back. If it changes anything, I'm going on 28 and been working since I was 14, mostly factory work and such. Though the last few years I've been > planted in a forklift and left there.

I'll start by saying that I've never worked a 3rd shift job, but I have worked jobs where I was in the office for 70-80 hours a week and felt the same time crunch. Other considerations in your life are always going to feel rushed, so you have to do them as well as possible.

You need to optimize the sleep that you are able to get, even if the schedule itself is sub-optimal because it goes against your body's natural circadian rhythms. Sleep deprivation alone causes elevated levels of cortisol, which will both make you crave sugary and fatty foods, and make food you eat more likely to turn into harmful body fat. This is why sleep and diet together have a synergistic effect. Get blackout curtains, sleep in a completely dark and silent room, and make sure you budget at least 7 hours a night (preferably 8) for sleep. Do not deviate from this. Exercise is important, but get your sleep right first. This will give you more energy to return to the gym.

For a diet system, everyone's body reacts a bit differently, but if you are of caucasian descent I would start with a strict paleo diet and then tweak it depending on how you feel. This means eliminating sugar and grains, along with legumes and sometimes even dairy. The justification for reducing carb intake can be found in books such as Gary Taubes's Why We Get Fat, and there are paleo sites across the internet. Do a bit of research and give it a try for a few weeks—I suspect you will lose a decent amount of weight and feel much better.

If you want to take it a step even further, look into the ketogenic diet, which is a high-fat, very low carb diet that paradoxically stimulates your body to use ketone bodies (from fat) as its primary fuel source instead of liver glycogen. This diet is difficult to maintain (especially if you are exercising), but if you cannot get to the gym often it's a good option for reducing body fat fairly quickly. It's not for everyone, though, and I would try the less-restrictive paleo framework before advancing to this. Best of luck.

– Black Knight

Lawyer Up

Vandy writes:

> What, exactly, does "age of consent" mean? Is it ever safe/legal to bang someone younger than 18 if you're a man in his 30's?

We do not provide legal advice here at Return Of Kings. Please consult your local attorney for more information about laws in your jurisdiction. Just remember it's never right to bang a fatty.

– Law Dogger

That concludes things for this week. If you would like a question answered by the ROK staff, send it via email or the anonymous form.

Read More: Gaming In School Is Not Enough

Winston Smith

Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

The Most Important Quality All Successful Players Have

September 17, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

We were unhappy. Perhaps we were virgins, or we had enjoyed little in the way of sexual abundance. Perhaps we were in relationships but we weren't satisfied—we wanted something more, something better, but we felt trapped. Or maybe we had met that "one special girl" and married her, only to have been devastated by a terrible divorce.

Perhaps we tried confiding in our male friends but found they didn't really understand us, or only offered us clichés by way of consolation. Or maybe we asked our female friends for their take and were given advice that was less than useless.

In the end, inevitably, we turned to that great oracle of the twenty-first century, Google. We typed in a phrase that summed up, in a few words, our own personal psychic purgatory. Something like "How can I meet girls?" or "How can I get my girlfriend back?" We were presented with a plethora of options. Websites on pick-up, forums with long-standing members offering free advice about how to approach girls in the daytime and get their phone numbers.

We saw private Facebook groups where topics such as the best way to extract a girl from a nightclub for a one-night stand were discussed. Email lists where entrepreneurial seduction experts sent us weekly tips as well as offers to buy their advice products. Or perhaps we found the manosphere—a selection of websites dedicated to discussing game but also broader issues of gender relations, biomechanics, society, and politics.

At first we were amazed that such a world existed. That so many men of high intelligence dedicated so much time to an activity that should in theory be simple: meeting and becoming intimate with women. Perhaps, too, we experienced a certain initial feeling of ickiness when confronted with all of this material. After all, society told us that this should be easy. Surely no one but a loser and a reject would be require an ebook that explained something as simple as how to talk to a girl?

But we continued to read and absorb. Some of us went out and put what we had learned into practice. We received brutal blowouts, but we also found ourselves in amicable interactions with women, often for the first time in our lives. We sensed their attraction. We saw hope.

We Became Players

Soon we started collecting phone numbers and email addresses, then dates, then kisses, then blowjobs, and then lays. We were excited. Damn it if this stuff we had read on the internet wasn't actually working! So we carried on—we carried on approaching. We carried on collecting phone numbers and converting one night stands when we could. We continued dating. We continued putting up with the bullshit and sorting the wheat from the chaff by pushing for fast sex with those girls most into us and discarding those who didn't comply. We created soft harems. From having no girls, suddenly we had notch counts and were concerned with maintaining a level of quality in those we slept with. Suddenly we were in the game: we were players.

Now things started to get a little more complicated. Having satisfied the itch that got us here – having learned how to get girls more-or-less consistently, the problem of what to do next emerged. Should we continue on the Pump-and-Dump Merry-Go-Round (right next to the Cock Carousel at the 21st Century Hook-Up Theme Park) or should we find a girl we like and step off for a while? Bask in her adoration and enjoy the comforts of a relationship, albeit fleeting?

It is at this point that many men find themselves coming unstuck. Recently I read a post on the Roosh V Forum bemoaning the fact that at any point the community is largely filled with newbies. This is because those guys that come in and get good frequently end up getting into relationships early with their newfound skills. Something like this happened to me, although I'd been gaming for a couple of years before I got into an (ill-advised) LTR with a girl I met through a cold-approach at my gym.

Guys give up the game prematurely for several of reasons. First, pick-up is hard. Let's not sugarcoat this. If men as experienced as Paul Janka and Krauser are averaging an 11% conversion rate from phone numbers, then it's clear that meeting strangers in public spaces and having sex with them shortly afterwards is no walk in the park. Second, pick-up requires a high degree of emotional resilience that most guys simply do not have. It's tough out there on the streets, in the bars. The pick-up artist is perpetually putting himself on the line, perpetually putting himself in situations where he will be judged harshly by sexual marketplace.

Frequently—in a majority of cases, even— the pickup artist will present himself and the market will take one look at him, turn its nose up and say ewww. Of course, there are resources out there to help men get good and limit this, but still, an ability to handle rejection is required. And third, if a man meets a girl who is hot, pleasant to be around and the sex is good, and he spends enough time with her, then sooner or later he will become attached, making it hard for him to walk.

You should not necessarily seek the deceptive warmth of a monogamous relationship, particularly if you have not had a great deal of experience with women beforehand. For a start, the likelihood is that won't have the know-how required to handle your girlfriend for any length of time. Also, you probably haven't had enough experience to really know what you want. And finally there are distinct downsides to relationships, many of which I discuss here.

Clarity of Intent

One of the most important characteristics of the successful long-term player is clarity of intent. By this I mean that you should make a decision about exactly what you want from the game, and act accordingly in every situation that arises. Yes, you need to decide. Ideally you should have done this before you got into it, but it is never too late to sit down and write down (yes, write down) how you want your life to look.

If, like many men in this section of the internet, you are disillusioned with women and the prospects for long-term partnerships with them, and you want to be a serial player or develop a harem, then you must ensure that your behaviours are in alignment with your ambition. What this means in practice is that you must develop ice-cold discipline in your dealings with women. Do not see any girl more than once a week. Do not act like a boyfriend to her, by taking her out for dinners or cuddling up on the sofa in front of the TV with her. Communicate through your words and actions that this is strictly a sexual arrangement. Allow her to sense that you have other options. Be absolutely firm in setting out boundaries and don’t waver, even if you like her.

Frequently, a girl who is keen on you will soon throw in a subtle (or not so subtle) ultimatum, implying that if you two don’t get serious then she will walk. I’ll be very clear on this point: however sexy she is, however good the sex is, however much you secretly like her and find yourself at the mercy of beta fantasies involving roaring log fires and walks on the beach, you must resist. Remember: clarity of intent. Do not, under any circumstances, allow her to manipulate you. Once you fall into a regular relationship, you will find it increasingly difficult to get out, your confidence will falter, your game will get rusty and you will end up rationalising that you are better off with her, that maybe she is “the one’”after all.

If you want to be a player, then play, don’t stay. Remember: you must always be prepared to let a woman walk if she can’t accept your terms. Your design for your life has to be more important to you than what she wants. Of course, if you meet a women with whom you genuinely want to form a relationship, then that’s fine too. Just make sure you’re doing it from a position of strength rather than weakness, know what you’re giving up, be aware of the risks and make sure it’s on your own terms.

In this life, no one really cares about your happiness except you—remember that, decide what you want, act in a way that will bring it about, and then protect it with everything you’ve got. There really is no other way.

Want to learn more about what it takes to attract top-quality women? Then click here

Read More: The Simplest Way to Approach Hot Girls For Newbies

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

An Alternate Theory Of White Knights

September 17, 2014 | by Jeremy Jacobs | Link | Original Link

According to UrbanDictionary.com, a white knight is:

"… a male that treats woman as goddesses and does nothing but shower then in compliments on how wonderful and beautiful and special they are."

An alternate definition, also from Urban Dictionary, states:

"On an internet forum, a person who defends a member who is clearly wrong, usually with the hopes of gaining brownie points with said member."

Neither of these definitions on its own is perfect.

But combine the two and you get a pretty accurate picture of what "white knightery" has become in the modern social media landscape: a perverse form of internet chivalry wherein men seek to protect women from criticism by a man, even if the criticism is valid, while perhaps also praising the offended woman for her courage and other positive qualities.

A Common Conception

I'm not breaking any new ground here by providing a definition of what a white knight is. After all, "White knighting" is a pretty popular topic of discussion around this part of the internet. But I want to offer an alternate explanation for why white knights behave the way they do… One that's slightly different from the common theory (while still being related to it) and one which explains a broader range of behavior.

Let me start with some definitions. In any community of people (whether they be defined by race, nationality or gender) there seem to be basically three types of approaches to group interests:

1. Chauvanists: Those who, like uber-nationalists or racists, put their group's interests above all else. Think of your classic Stormfront denizen or radical feminist.

2. Diplomats: Those who have a basic level of self-respect and who accept the group they belong to, while still respecting the others outside the group

3."Uncle Toms": These are the infamous sellouts that everyone else in the group loves to hate… The ones who suck up and try to win the favor of a group they see as being more powerful than themselves.

I'd argue that these three types of people can be found in ANY demographic group, be it men, women, minorities, straights, gays, blacks, whites, or anything else

Power And The Three Types

According to liberal-progressive dogma, "POWER" is something fixed. Either you have it or you don't. You can tell they believe this when they say things like "Racism is a matter of power + privilege." and "Only whites can be racist." The unwritten assumption here is that power is a vertical relationship: one group has all power, the other group has no power. Their theory of power does not acknowledge the possibility that whites may have "power" in one domain while minorities may compensate for their lack of power in another domain, for instance.

According to actual reality, "power" is relative, contextual, and domain-specific. Somebody who is powerful in one context may be powerless in the next. A person who has some degree of power over another will not usually have absolute power over them, just a bit of an edge. And a person who has power over someone in one area may be powerless over them in another.

Imagine a young man who has a very cruel boss. The young man is charismatic, sexually active and good looking, while the boss is old, wrinkly and bitter. In the office, the boss will tell the young man what to do, he may even humiliate him in front of his colleagues. But imagine if the two of them met in a nightclub. The dynamic would be quite different.

The "Femocracy" Of Upper Middle Class White Society

My basic theory about white knights is that they AREN'T doing any of the following: trying to get laid, condescending to women, or trying to make themselves feel big and tough (at least not MOST of the time).

Instead, they are essentially behaving like male "Uncle Toms." They are sellouts who think feminists are an all-powerful force whose ass they must kiss in order to gain favor. On the surface this might seem a bit exaggerated. "Feminists? All powerful? You gotta be kidding me!!" To a Gordon Gecko-like Wall Street CEO or a professional athlete this may be the case.

But consider the background the average male feminist comes from. In most cases he is white, upper middle class, relatively young, and addicted to social media sites like Twitter and Tumblr. He may have been raised by a single mom

In his “world,” the neutered world of the privileged white upper middle class, feminists really are the ultimate authority, or at least something close to it. Most schoolteachers are feminist women. Social media like Twitter and Tumblr are feminist outposts. For the young white upper middle class SJW, the pussy is not merely on a PEDESTAL, it sits proudly upon a lofty throne, dictating his very beliefs and feelings to him like a monarch dictates the law.

Conclusion

In truth, the term “White Knight” is an entirely inappropriate description. A real “White Knight” is essentially a STRONG man who displays a gallant and chivalric approach to women. This type was exemplified by the Knights of Christian Europe, whose honor code placed women in very high esteem.

It was the duty of Knights to protect women, but in exchange for this protection, they were given one thing today’s white knights sorely lack: respect. Every fair relationship in the world is based on give and take. Today’s “white knights” who suck up to women and kiss their ass at every available opportunity give women the world while demanding nothing in return. That’s not a white knight, that’s a slave.

Read More: Why White Knights Voluntarily Enslave Themselves To Women

Jeremy Jacobs
Jeremy is a blogger and contrarian located in an anonymous Marxist-Leninist hellhole. He blogs regularly on his site, Mister Jacobs. In his spare time he enjoys writing articles and being an all-around patriarchal shitlord.

Is Digital Technology Destroying The Middle Class?

September 17, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Who Owns The Future is a book that describes how advancing computer technology is centralizing power and wealth into the hands of those who own a network that has the comparative information advantage of having millions of its users essentially work for free. Every time you use Facebook or Google, you provide the company with valuable information that helps it increase its revenues while you forgo payment in exchange for receiving validation, executing searches, or having a place to store your photos. The author explains this more clearly:

> In the past, power and influence were gained by controlling something that people needed, such as oil or transportation routes. Now to be powerful can mean having information superiority, as computed by the most effective computer on a network. In most cases, this means the biggest and most connected computer…
>
> […]
>
> The only way to sell a loss of freedom, so that people will accept it voluntarily, is > by making it look like a great bargain at first. Consumers were offered free stuff (such as web searches and social networking) in exchange for acquiescing to being spied upon. The only power a consumer has is to look for a better deal. The only way to say no to that deal is to transcend the role of consumer once in a while.

>
> To be free is to have a zone around you that is private, where you can be with your own thoughts, your own experiments, for a time, between confrontations with the larger world. When you are wearing sensors on your body all the time, such as the GPS and camera on your smartphone, and constantly piping data to a megacomputer owned by a corporation that is paid by "advertisers" to subtly manipulate you by tweaking the options immediately available to you, you gradually become less free.
>
> […]
>
> Instagram isn't worth a billion dollars just because those thirteen employees are extraordinary. Instead, its value comes from the millions of users who contribute to the network without being paid for it. Networks need a great number of people to participate in them to generate significant value. But when they have them, only a small number of people get paid. That has the net effect of centralizing wealth and limiting overall economic growth.

The author, Jaron Lanier, asserts that the digital economy is destroying the middle class, and that we may have passed the point where increasing technology increases our standard of living. Everyone has access to photography in their pocket, but now what a few dozen people can do while employed at Instagram has replaced over a hundred thousand middle class jobs at Kodak while cheap labor in Asian factories construct the camera sensors.

The winner-take-all distribution we see in the internet world occurs in dating too. Elite men can now broadcast their value to larger pools of women using dating sites and internet apps, giving them access to women who would have not been able to meet these men in the past. The men who are not elite, like a Kodak employee, will find himself with no options. The non-elite men who don't go through great pains to increase their value will simply not procreate, because today's woman has been trained to score the most valuable man she could possibly get through extended experimentation that may last well over a decade, now with the aid of technology.

> The fatal conundrum of a hyperefficient market optimized to yield star-system results is that it will not create enough of a middle class to support a real market dynamic. A market economy cannot thrive absent the well-being of average people, even in a gilded age. Gilding cannot float. It must reside on a substrate. Factories must have multitudes of customers. Banks must have multitudes of reliable borrowers.
>
> […]

> The peasant's dilemma is that there's no buffer. A musician who is sick or old, or who has a sick kid, cannot perform and cannot earn. A few musicians, a very tiny number indeed, will do well, but even the most successful real-time-only careers can fall apart suddenly because of a spate of bad luck. Real life cannot avoid those spates, so eventually almost everyone living a real-time economic life falls on hard times.

This winner-take-all phenomenon is beginning to dominate every facet of human life as digital technology breaks down the barriers and levees that sustained the middle class (e.g., unions, academic tenure, taxi medallions, business licenses, etc), however inefficient they were.

> If network technology is supposed to be so good for everyone, why has the developed world suffered so much just as the technology has become widespread? Why was there so much economic pain at once all over the developed world just as computer networking dug in to every aspect of human activity, in the early 21st century? Was it a coincidence?
>
> […]
>
> …the Siren Servers [Facebook, Google, Amazon, etc.] channel much of the productivity of ordinary people into an informal economy of barter and reputation, while concentrating the extracted old-fashioned wealth for themselves. All activity that takes place over digital networks becomes subject to arbitrage , in the sense that risk is routed to whoever suffers lesser computation resources.
>
> […]
>
> The primary business of digital networking has come to be the creation of ultrasecret mega-dossiers about what others are doing, and using this information to concentrate money and power. It doesn't matter whether the concentration is called a social network, an insurance company, a derivatives fund, a search engine, or an online store. It's all fundamentally the same. Whatever the intent might have been , the result is a wielding of digital technology against the future of the middle class.
>
> […]
>
> Great fortunes are being made on shrinking the economy instead of growing it. It's not a result of some evil scheme, but a side effect of an idiotic elevation of the fantasy that technology is getting smart and standing on its own, without people.
>
> […]
>
> It seems as though online services are bringing bargains to everyone, and yet wealth disparity is increasing while social mobility is decreasing. If everyone were getting better options, wouldn't everyone be doing better as well?

There is no such thing as a free lunch. Whatever benefit we get from technology now will have a cost, either upon ourselves or others:

> The initial benefits don't remotely balance the long-term degradations. Initially you made some money day trading or getting an insanely easy loan, or saved some money couch-surfing or by using coupons from an Internet site, but then came the pink slip, the eviction notice, and the halving of your savings when the market drooped. Or you loved getting music for free, but then realized that you couldn't pursue a music career yourself because there were hardly any middle-class, secure jobs left in what was once the music industry. Maybe you loved the supercheap prices at your favorite store, but then noticed that the factory you might have worked for closed up for good.
>
> […]
>
> In what sense is becoming dependent on private spy agencies crossed with ad agencies, which are licensed by us to spy on all of us all the time in order to accumulate billions of dollars by manipulating what's put in front of us over supposedly open and public networks, a way of defeating elites? And yet that is precisely what the "free" model has meant.
>
> […]
>
> The CEOs will gather at the golf resort and talk about a core financial problem: In the long term the economy will start to shrink if they keep on making it "efficient" only from the point of view of central servers. At the end of that line there will eventually be too little economy to support even CEOs. How about instead growing the economy?

Technological efficiencies slightly lower the cost for all but put a significant percentage out of jobs. In the past, new technology would create as many jobs as it destroyed while improving everyone's standard of living, but are we seeing that now with the internet? It's great that everyone can afford an iphone which contains a camera and internet access, but is that going to put food on the table and contribute to the economy? Silicon Valley is doing well, but how about everyone else?

> The wide adoption of transformative connecting technology should create a middle-class wealth boom, as happened when the Interstate Highway System gave rise to a world of new jobs in transportation and tourism, for instance , and generally widened commercial prospects. Instead we've seen recession, unemployment, and austerity.

There's also the privacy issue—our information is being used as currency by the technological elite.

> A related trend of our times is that troves of dossiers on the private lives and inner beings of ordinary people, collected over digital networks, are packaged into a new private form of elite money. The actual data in these troves need not > be valid. In fact, it might be better that it is not valid, for actual knowledge brings liabilities. But the pretense that we have a bundle of other people's secrets is functioning like fine modern art. It is a new kind of security that the rich trade in, and the value is naturally driven up. It becomes a giant-scale levee inaccessible to ordinary people.

>
> […]
>
> Big human data, that vase-shaped gap, is the arbiter of influence and power in our times. Finance is no longer about the case-by-case judgment of financiers, but about how good they are at locking in the best big-data scientists and technologists into exclusive contracts.

Inadvertently, this book tells you how to make money in the digital age: become a siren server. Construct a service people want to use for free, register users, collect their information, analyze their usage, and then provide them with ultra-targeted advertising.

Lanier's solution to this problem is for companies to pay its users if the information it gets from them is providing the company with revenue. Since Google makes money when you use its products, they should actually pay you every time you do a search. Facebook should pay you if liking several pages improves their algorithm that targets users with ads. Youtube's system is close to what Lanier proposes, since through their partner program you get paid for views on videos that you upload.

> In a humanistic information economy, as people age, they will collect royalties on value they brought into the world when they were younger.
>
> […]
>
> The proposal here is not redistributionist or socialist. Royalties based on creative contributions from a whole lifetime would always be flowing freshly. It would be wealth earned, not entitlement.

Thanks to this book I have finally realized what a "disruptive" technology is—it's simply a technology that destroys more jobs than it creates, concentrating wealth and power in a few hands, invariably located in Silicon Valley, under the guise of efficiency and ease.

This book has powerful ideas but loses gas after the first half and simply repeats concepts. It seemed like the first 100 pages was the book proposal and then the rest was an afterthought to fill up space. Nonetheless, the insights it provides is powerful and has changed how I see the technological "progress" that is being forced upon us all. It gets a recommendation from me.

Read More: "Who Owns The Future" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

6 Aphorisms On The Nature Of Women

September 18, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

Let me begin with a caveat. There will of course be exceptions to these general rules, but they will usually be women who are unattractive or masculine in manner, and many (if not most) of them are exceptions only because they have to be. In other words, their low sexual market value doesn't allow them to get away with the general cuntishness and masterly dissimulation that prevails among 7s and up all over the world, and here in the rotten U.S. in particular.

1. "Sorry" does not mean sorry.

You may have noticed that women have a tendency to apologize profusely when they have not done anything wrong. They say sorry simply because they have disappointed or failed to please someone, even though they were not obligated for reasons of justice to do so. For this is not a matter of justice or duty. It is a matter of weakness. It has to do with women being powerfully motivated by their desire to avoid any kind of social awkwardness or discomfort. This, not doing the right thing, is what is usually at work when women apologize. As soon as you leave the room, your apparently contrite sweetheart will be on the phone with her mom or BFF complaining about what a jerk you are and how she deserves better, even though you've been treating her like a queen.

By way of analogy, think of the waiter who, even after enduring a ten-hour shift serving the unbearable American public, is still all smiles and "thank you for coming": that inexhaustible phoniness recalls the fundamental nature of women, and indeed, it's no coincidence that women excel at jobs like serving, marketing and anything else that involves deceit with a pleasing smile (note, though, that they are simply too weak for most politics and the severest sort of business and finance).

When they are in fact guilty of doing something wrong in the abstract, rational sense, women will generally avoid taking (actual) responsibility for their behavior. Here understand that, deep down, women greatly fear men and the overwhelming conflict we can present, and though they are mostly devoid of any sense of justice due to their inconstant will and poor capacity for abstract thought, women will still tell you they are sorry—and quite convincingly—in order to both keep relations agreeable and to advance their underlying interests, which are often subtly material in nature; that is, about getting into your wallet, poor duped beta, however she may coo that you're "the one" and that "it's meant to be."

2. Her indecisiveness will reveal her inferiority

A little while back a freak accident landed me in the ER, getting a few stitches put in my head. While there, I was struck by the fact that, although I was surrounded by highly intelligent and high-functioning people of both genders, the men seemed as a matter of course to take control of the situation, while the women sensibly deferred to their assertiveness and the judgments that issued from it. Of course, feminists would claim that this was an effect of "patriarchal conditioning" or some other trendy academic cant. But the red pill reality is that, in many instances, human nature precedes cultural conditioning, the latter flowing from the former. "It's a man's world" has long been a universal truth, and universals by their very nature suggest a far deeper basis than mere cultural customs, conventions, mores, etc.

I recently started a new job that has three managers, all women. What an amusing and absurd spectacle it has been to watch them try to arrive at any kind of "group decision"! This is a kind of democracy even more inept than what we have seen in the last few decades in the U.S., with every half-literate entitled fool casting his vote for this and that smiling fraud. Right from the beginning the women enlisted the very necessary aid of my "subordinate" judgment and that of another Alpha Male. Thank God, for the sake of the business and the customers we serve.

3. Nice girls are no reason to relax your game

How many times have I made the mistake of meeting a nice girl and thinking it's unnecessary to remain cool and aloof. To be sure, game becomes exhausting, especially as you get older. Still, showing a woman much feeling early on—or indeed, in many cases, much feeling at any time—or more feeling than she has shown you, is usually unwise: for women are as fickle as they are fundamentally unjust, and once a woman—yes, even a nice one—has you emotionally, she often won't want you anymore.

Two notable exceptions: 1. You are higher than she is on the looks scale. 2. She is materially dependent on you. But for the most part, you need to keep the carrot of your emotions ever-dangling in front of her, like the vexed rabbit in the cartoon. You need to be maddeningly impenetrable and inscrutable. Women love this torture, thanks to their deep perversity. Add rough sex and you have as sure a recipe for success as is possible in our degenerate era.

It isn't until they reach 35 or so that women even begin to approximate the essential reasonableness of men (not that they are to be trusted then). By that time, their silly sense of entitlement and endless expectations are replaced by hard-won cynicism (read: huge baggage). They are happy if you come over once or twice a week to knock them off, asking no more of you. Of course, by then their sexual market value is generally quite low—next! (I hear that bitter hag—who just seven years ago was a typical flaky, entitled Americunt flooded by male attention—has a pretty niece who just turned 18…)

4. Her views and opinions, her interests and values are other people's

In themselves, most women are nothing besides a hole to stick your dick in. Their beliefs, their values, their interests—these things are not the result of an independent judgment which could not be more indifferent to what the emetic mass of mankind thinks. Rather, base conformity and herd imitation are as natural to and as much a part of women as narcissism and dissimulation. Even in this senseless year of 2014, if you go into a large bookstore in America chances are you will find at least one man who can tell you something about Plato, or Hume, or Burke. You will very likely not find such a woman, though you will find innumerable women who know every odious trifle about Kim Kardashian and about countless other American celebrity rabble.

Gossip is so characteristic of women because, their minds being utterly empty, they simply have nothing better to do than to go on and on about other people's frivolous affairs. You might, then, do your girl a favor: "Babe, go make me a sandwich." Let her at least be useful for something other than sex! I myself find that attractive women look even better with a broom in hand.

5. Where you are assertive and straightforward, she will be weak and therefore vindictive later

Being by nature weaker than men, both physically and mentally, women frequently suppress their inclination to say what they believe and how they feel. This is the source of their passive-aggressiveness, as well as their petty tendency to nurse all sorts of grievances and resentments, which, because they get buried for so long, gain in force over time, until they finally erupt in classic whiny white girl fashion. My last girlfriend used to gripe about stuff her ex had done to her five years ago. In contrast, men in the old sense—frank, hearty and beyond grudges—will tell you to go fuck yourself, then forget about it and buy you a beer later.

6. It is a sign of good character if her friends are mostly men

Whenever I have gotten to know a high quality woman, it has almost invariably been the case that her friends were mostly men. Being so unlike most women, a woman who is kind and decent has no interest in their endless pettiness, passive-aggressiveness, drama, jealousy (often under the guise of concerned friend), phoniness, etc. Of course, though, no man can be “just friends” with an attractive woman, so if your girl is hanging around other men, you should know that every one—every one—has either tried to bang her or would if had enough liquid courage. And if she is at least 25, then she probably knows this too, though she may pretend otherwise in order to continue to get free drinks, tire changes and whatever else from those laughable beta orbiters.

Read More: Women Have No Sense Of Justice

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

The Word “Heroic” Has Very Little Meaning In Modern Times

September 18, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

One of the major themes you’ll find in my writing is that words have lost their meaning. Words today have become both vague and specific, and we rely on connotation and equivocation instead of definition. In this vein, everything today is considered “heroic”: soldiers, politicians, activists, black men from urban areas who graduate college, cancer survivors, and unwed mothers. Everybody who is “good” can also be given the label “heroic.”

But what is a hero? For the purposes of this article, I’m not trying to define it in a strict definition as held by the ancient Greeks, since the word has evolved over time. It seems that in our society, the connotation of the word is “someone who does something good that is beyond what is expected of them.” By definition, there is nothing heroic about being average. That is not to say that being average is a bad thing, and truly, many of us want an “average,” boring life. But I can’t claim to be heroic for merely doing what’s required of me. Therefore, are these people heroic based on those two elements? We shall judge the above categories based on whether they are “good” and “beyond.”

Soldiers

Some soldiers go to battle because it’s their only employment opportunity. Others go because of social pressure. Some are drafted. I would imagine very few today go because of patriotism, but they still exist.

Regardless of why he signs up, once the soldier is there, he has no choice but to do what he is told. Perhaps he had a different expectation when he signed up, but once he is there, he takes orders and nothing else. There is a saying in the military “never volunteer for anything.”

Yet many soldiers do go above and beyond. You hear stories about soldiers who left safe cover to save another soldier or to kill an enemy with a strategic position, even when everyone else in their group stayed where they were. People talk about adrenaline and the rage of war, but risking your life for a great cause when nobody would blame you for staying put is above and beyond. Therefore, although some soldiers are average, many are heroic.

Politicians

People think a politician is heroic for standing up for what he believes in. Though I seriously doubt this in the modern day, in the spirit of generosity I’ll assume this is sometimes true. There are rare politicians who vote based on their beliefs, knowing that it will cause them to lose the next election. This is more of a character trait than an individual choice, and so these people are never elected president. So although a few politicians are heroic, [your favorite president in all of history] was not a hero, except for maybe George Washington. It was John Adams who invented the smear campaign, and that tradition has continued on to this day. Perhaps he and Jefferson started off as heroes, but all that waned once they tasted sweet political power and bent their morals to hold onto it.

Activists

Today activists write articles on a blog, but in the past, there were actually active activists. Consider the civil rights movement, when black people would march through the streets knowing they’d be assaulted by government officials. Even that Carrie Nation bitch who would destroy bars with a hatchet did so knowing the consequences. Today if a woman attacks someone, there is a good chance she will not be prosecuted. Even if a person bombs a building for a social or political cause, there’s something backdoor about it, and you can’t say that needlessly killing innocent people is good. Therefore, activists used to be heroes, but today they are not.

Note: I’m not advocating or condoning physical force of any kind, but neither am I necessarily condemning it.

Black Men From Urban Areas Who Graduate College

Just because opportunity is easily accessible doesn’t mean that it’s easy to accomplish something worthwhile. (Yes, I realize that sounded contradictory.) If everyone around you tells you that to read a book is to betray your own people or to act like the opposite sex, then it’s unrealistic to say that you have the same accessibility as someone like me whose whole family graduated from college.

Ostracizing yourself because you know it's in your best interest is a hugely difficult thing, and therefore black men from urban areas who graduate college are definitely heroic. This feat also involves relearning the way you talk. I had a crippling speech impediment as a child, so I can at least partly empathize with that. This heroism also applies to men and women from all bad socio-economic backgrounds, but for urban black men, I imagine there is the most social pressure to fail.

Cancer Survivors

There is nothing brave about doing what the doctor tells you to. Yes, it's painful to endure chemo, but it's a survival action in the same way that a rabbit chews off its leg when caught in a trap. You just plug in the cord and suffer. Furthermore, labeling cancer survivors heroic implicitly labels those who died as cowardly. My grandmother wouldn't have survived cancer no matter how hard she fought. Sometimes, life's a bitch, and you do the best you can.

For more information on the negative effects of cancer propaganda, watch the movie Pink Ribbons, Inc. It was on Netflix Instant last I checked.

Unwed Mothers

Commonly known as "single mothers," these are women who raise children but do not have a partner that lives with them. Obviously raising children can be a good thing, but do these women go above and beyond?

Because of their work schedule, they are unable to provide as much attention to their children as a stay-at-home mother would. This is a simple reality of time management. Not only do these women work, but they also do all the housework children are unable to do. School can only provide so many hours of free daycare, and summer provides none. Furthermore, the attention of one's live-in parents will always be more impactful than that of a paid caretaker.

Unwed mothers feed their children, give them a place to sleep, and interact with them when they have the time and energy, which is the most basic definition of "raising children." Perhaps there are some unwed mothers who go above and beyond, but having such time and energy restraints makes this virtually impossible. An unwed mother is only able to do the bare minimum. Therefore, there is nothing heroic about being an unwed mother.

A few divorces happen because the man was physically abusive, but they are a small minority. Let's consider all the others, since "hero" is applied to all unwed mothers. Do you know what's really heroic? Staying with a husband you hate because you know it's in the best interest of someone else (i.e. your children). Did your husband cheat on you with the secretary? I offer my condolences. He's a prick. But it's in your children's best interest to stay with him. If you want to be heroic, then stay with him until your children graduate high school. Do more than what's required, and you'll be a hero. People will shame you and say you're weak for staying with a terrible husband, but doing the right thing despite all social pressure is one of the most heroic things you can do.

Producing offspring is a biological function that is usually not even a direct choice. Providing your children with decent meals, telling them you love them, and having enough money for a good Christmas are the bare requirements for decent parenting. Perhaps someone has been arguing all along that a hero is someone you should emulate, but do you really want to be an unwed mother? Do you really want to have that kind of hardship? In no definition of the word is an unwed mother heroic by virtue of her difficulty.

Therefore, be wary of the word “heroic.” It no longer means anything. Raising children all alone is in no way equivalent to risking your life to save a friend. If a word denoting excess is applied to the masses, then it is no longer a word of excess. By calling all unwed mothers or all cancer survivors heroic, they have made it so none of them can truly be so.

Read More: Fat Single Mothers Are Child Abusers

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Why The U.S. Should Rethink Its Ebola Aid Policy In Africa

September 18, 2014 | by Oscar O'Reilly | Link | Original Link

A lot more Africans are going to die from infection with Ebola. At least tens of thousands, maybe even millions, before the virus burns through the most susceptible parts of the West African population.

Do you really care?

I didn't think so.

The do-gooders out there sense that lack of empathy. That's why the op-ed pages are filling up with their dramatic depictions of the oncoming disaster, and demands that we—we rich white people, maybe behind the fig-leaf of the UN or something—just do something about Ebola, right now, before it's too late…like this guy in the NYT the other day:

What is not getting said publicly, despite briefings and discussions in the inner circles of the world's public health agencies, is that we are in totally uncharted waters and that Mother Nature is the only force in charge of the crisis at this time . . . .

If we wait for vaccines and new drugs to arrive to end the Ebola epidemic, instead of taking major action now, we risk the disease's reaching from West Africa to our own backyards.

What—you didn't find that convincing?

I admit, though, that I paused to sort of ponder and admire the boldness of that stupid claim, "Mother Nature is the only force in charge of the crisis at this time." As if Africans were just passive savages—and as if their culture were irrelevant to all this.

What really is not getting said publicly, even though it is really true—because saying it would seem insensitive—is that the Ebola epidemic is preying upon the particular vulnerabilities of certain African populations. Those vulnerabilities include a relative lack of hygiene in burials and medical settings, overcrowding, superstitions that impede sensible policies, inability to manage quarantines, lack of strong civil infrastructure, and so on.

Obama to Visit CDC in Atlanta for Ebola Update
President Barack Obama will travel to Florida and Georgia next week to receive updates on two global crises: the outbreak of Ebola and the rise of the militant group Islamic State.

The Obama Administration, sagging in the polls, is leaning on the CDC to look like they're taking Ebola seriously—a big banner about it screams from the top of the agency's home page. But click onto the CDC's main info article and you read almost immediately that: "The outbreak does not pose a significant risk to the United States."

I agree that the virus might mutate significantly as it grows in all those human hosts. Conceivably strains could emerge that infect via respiratory droplets. But that jump in transmissibility is widely considered unlikely, and in any case, as the virus passes through more and more human hosts it is likely to become less virulent—because natural selection tends to favor strains that stay in their hosts and keep them ambulatory (i.e., not very sick) and infectious for longer. If African hospital and burial practices were not such strong enablers of transmission, the virus would have far less evolutionary "incentive" to sicken and kill its hosts.

Another thing that is not getting said publicly—and probably will never be said by anyone in the MSM—is that the vulnerabilities of Africans to epidemics like these owes something to the short-sighted "compassion" lavished upon them by the West over the past several decades.

There has been a huge amount of aid to Africa, including medical aid—remember those American hospital workers in Liberia that almost died of Ebola a month or so ago? And yet what has all that aid achieved, other than to stunt Africa's growth? Paul Theroux once wrote a great essay on that subject, among other things remarking of Malawi where he had been a teacher with the Peace Corps:

If Malawi is worse educated, more plagued by illness and bad services, poorer than it was when I lived and worked there in the early 60's, it is not for lack of outside help or donor money. Malawi has been the beneficiary of many thousands of foreign teachers, doctors and nurses, and large amounts of financial aid, and yet it has declined from a country with promise to a failed state.

How has aid hurt Africa rather than helped? Among other things it has probably given an artificial boost to the population without improving the culture that, in the long run, must sustain that population—thus making it vulnerable to shocks like the Ebola epidemic. But perhaps the worst impact of all the busy Western do-gooders has been on Africans' belief that they can grow and manage their societies on their own. "The patronizing attention of donors has done violence to Africa's belief in itself," Theroux wrote in his piece.

In this sense Ebola is the West's responsibility. But if the West were to learn its lesson, it wouldn't go charging in to try to save the day—it would stay away, now and for the foreseeable future, and let Africa develop on its own, or at least without continued Western meddling. It may be hard for people to think in this coldly logical way now, but—as was the case for the Black Plague in medieval Europe—Ebola could end up being a hugely important motivator for African self-improvement.

Read More: Ebola Volunteers Nancy Writebol And Ken Brantly Are Cowards.

Oscar O'Reilly
Oscar is a novelist and essayist.

Who Killed Adulthood In American Culture?

September 19, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

New York Times film critic A.O. Scott recently wrote an essay titled The Death of Adulthood in American Culture, lamenting that as the TV show Mad Men draws to a close, there are no more men like Don Draper in American culture, saying that "Tony (Soprano), Walter (White) and Don (Draper) are the last of the patriarchs."

> This slow unwinding has been the work of generations. For the most part, it has been understood — rightly in my view, and this is not really an argument I want to have right now — as a narrative of progress. A society that was exclusive and repressive is now freer and more open. But there may be other less unequivocally happy consequences. It seems that, in doing away with patriarchal authority, we have also, perhaps unwittingly, killed off all the grown-ups.

A.O. Scott is teetering on the brink of a red pill epiphany, and if he reads this article, it'll either send him over the edge or make him run screaming in the other direction. The disgust he reflexively feels at seeing a grown man wearing flip flops is not the problem, but rather a symptom of a larger cultural shift. Why are so many men and women drawn to the masculinity of a character like Don Draper, while simultaneously shaming the beliefs and cultural conditions that create men like him? Why doesn't anyone know what it means to be a grown-up anymore? Who killed adulthood?

What problem did adulthood solve?

When discussing the Breaking Bad spinoff Better Call Saul, creators Peter Gould and Vince Gilligan ask the question "what problem does becoming Saul solve?" The title character of Better Caul Saul is a decent man who slowly transforms into the sleazy crooked lawyer that meth dealer Walter White meets in Breaking Bad. “What problem does becoming this character solve?” is a great question, and one worth asking of other characters.

Why does Don Draper become Don Draper? What problem does becoming Don Draper solve? In fact, stepping back further, why would someone become an adult? What problem does becoming an adult solve?

Author and gender theorist Esther Vilar defines a man as someone who must work. In the past, women had the privilege of allowing their husbands to provide for them. While a woman might consider taking work, she would never assume she had to provide for her spouse. It was always him working, or both working, but never the woman as sole breadwinner.

Feminism has made us all metaphorical men. Even stable monogamous two parents families require two incomes. The modern economy caters to single women, gays, and incels. Traditional men and women who wish to create children face a hefty price to raise each child, and often cannot do so without both parents working.

In the past, becoming an adult solved the problem of family. Being an adult meant you could provide. You were a man, manhood being defined by man’s ability to care for women and children. Now, wanting to care for women makes you sexist, because you’re privileging women—or oppressing them, depending on who you asked. Becoming a patriarch was a solution to the problem of raising children. It was a division of labor. “I’ll take care of the office, baby. You stay home and watch the kids.”

Does adulthood solve any modern problem?

Now—what problem does the adulthood of Don Draper solve in modern times? I own a custom tailored suit, can mix a few good drinks, and know how to handle myself in a professional setting, but that’s never got me the job or the girl. The people I know making six figures in their twenties are tech geeks who wear hoodies and flip flops. Mark Zuckerberg is the model for young earners, not Don Draper. If you walk into a tech interview wearing any shirt with a collar, you’re out of job.

Likewise, if you want to attract a woman, model yourself after playboys like party photographer KrillWasHere or Instagram millionaire Dan Bilzerian. The model for men who want success with women is closer to clown school than traditional masculinity. I’ve seen men intentionally develop themselves as assholes and scumbags—the kind A.O. Scott might brand as misogynists—because becoming that person solved the very real problem of getting laid.

You wanna be like Don Draper? Don Draper isn’t like Don Draper. Fans of the show know that (spoilers) his name is actually Dick Whitman. He grew up in a whorehouse and assumed the identity of a fallen comrade during his military service, to take the opportunity to start a new life. Becoming Don Draper solved the very real problem of becoming a man who could have the suburban family and white picket fence. Now, it doesn’t. You want girls and money? Become a charmer, and get good with computers.

What do we become instead?

Before we degenerate to a mass of pickup artists and internet marketers (too late, I can hear some of you saying), lets look at another popular television character who A.O. Scott cites as epitomizing modern adulthood and masculinity: Walter White.

Vince Gilligan has said he created Walter White to show that anyone could become Scarface. Breaking Bad follows Walter’s journey from mild mannered middle school science teacher to meth kingpin. In the pilot episode, he is emasculated by his wife who harasses him over credit card bills and gives him a handjob with one hand while using her computer with the other. Over the course of the show, Walter transforms into a hardcore gangster and dealer, wins back the respect of his family, and becomes incredibly wealthy at great personal cost.

Walter White is not a traditional adult, like Don Draper. In fact, Walter began as a traditional adult. He held down two jobs, took care of his wife and disabled son, and spent his day serving his community by teaching children. Walter was a model citizen. Clearly, adulthood wasn’t working for him. Becoming the drug lord “Heisenberg” solved that problem. But who is Heisenberg as he is known in criminal circles?

Heisenberg, aka Walter White, is a gangster. He is ruthless. He does what it takes to get the job done and has no regard for the law, beyond not getting caught. Walter is a man of his word. He exhibits the characteristics of traditional masculinity outlined by Jack Donovan in his book The Way of Men—strength, courage, mastery, and, at times, honor. But he does not try to conform to social standards or the wishes of women. He forms a gang and begins to dominate the world outside the rules of society rather than through them.

Men will always become what they have to become in order to solve their problems. In the past, we rewarded men for becoming like Don Draper. Now, we don't. Traditional adulthood doesn't solve men's problems anymore. If you want to know where adulthood is going, look at Walter White, not Don Draper.

Read More: Moden Culture Mirrors Jezebel's Poisonous Spirit

Eric Crowley
Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

Why Western Men Travel To Asia For More Than Just Sex

September 19, 2014 | by Rocco Casa | Link | Original Link

Asian women are the most feminine in the world, both in terms of their beauty and family value. This encourages thousands of men to travel to Asia looking for qualities that have been lost in the west.

Have you ever wondered what it is that makes a man fall head over heels with a woman? Is it her sex appeal? Her heart-stopping body? Her explosive femininity? If you find one of these attributes in a woman, it is highly likely you will fall for her, even for a while. A woman with all three of them can guarantee long nights of passion with a girl that skyrockets your libido by just watching her unbutton her shirt.

This is, of course, intriguing to us. But, the thing is, you can find plenty of women to sleep around and spice up your bed. What happens when you want to end your life as a bachelor and get more serious with a woman? Can you imagine yourself living under the same roof with a western woman and sharing an entire house instead of just a bedroom?

You will probably need to go by her rules to be living “harmoniously.” Where does that leave you? Castrated. Even worse, a western woman will want to fool around much before she settles down, making her beloved feminist movement proud by being liberal and independent in her sexual choices. Plus, most western women smoke like a chimney, eat like a pig, drink alcohol like a sponge, and swear like truck drivers.

Would you marry such a woman? Hell no.

And, let’s suppose you have found your dream woman and married her. You can kiss her femininity goodbye as soon as she has kids. She will get fatter and fatter, stop paying attention to herself (and probably you) and you will see her become more mannish day in day out.

But there is still a place on earth that western travelers cross thousands of miles for erotic vacations, or simply to find the lost femininity of women: Asia. Here are nine killer attributes that Western men find in Asian women:

1. Feminine

Asian women have held close all the family values passed on from their mothers and grandmothers before them. Values that tell women to respect their man and be submissive to them. Being feminine is an ancestral cultural characteristic that most Asian women have, one that most western women wrongly interpret as slavery. Asian women have learned to talk softly to their husbands and be submissive to them; they actually HEAR what you have to say, not just pretend and then do what they want.

2. Traditional values

You can expect to eat a meal from the hands of your lovely Asian lady every single day, even if she also has a full-time job and works hard at it. Your house will be spotlessly clean and well-taken care of. Try asking a western woman to cook for you on a daily basis and you’ll probably end up with a bump on your head from the flying ashtray, or with a dreadful sex-starvation week!

3. They willingly play the “wife” role

Asian women are the pillars of the family, managing and organizing the household perfectly, but are smart enough to let you lead and have the reigns of the family. They take care of their children and love helping their husbands any way they can. They do the same for their partners, so even if you have an Asian woman as a girlfriend, you can still taste a slice of heaven in your everyday life. Generally speaking, an Asian woman has been taught she needs to make her husband happy and proud, with his relatives and friends, to have her as his wife, so she does her best to not let you down.

4. Sexy

Most Asian women are not only family-oriented and respectful towards others. They are also caring and love themselves, too. They will make sacrifices to have a good shape (and maintain it no matter what) and please their man with it. As for their beauty, it seems that western men are particularly attracted by their slender figures (as opposed to the overweight body shapes of the west), shiny black hair, and appealing eyes.

5. Financially responsible

They are usually great money handlers, which is a huge plus when looking for a woman to start a family with. Your Asian wife will ask you each and every time she wants to spend shared money on the house. Try asking an American or European woman to do the same—Her voice will rise to the stratosphere if you try to reign in her shopping.

6. They behave

Cheating is not an option for an Asian woman. Marriage is too sacred to them to dishonor it like that.

7. They never refuse to have sex

They never give the cold shoulder to their feeling-horny hubbies. They will still make love with you, even if they are not in the greatest mood for 1000+1 Arabian nights.

[image]

8. They adapt quickly

They can act like a Western lady in particular ways without losing their subservient nature.

9. They avoid direct confrontations

They avoid conflicts and arguments with their other half and pursue a harmonious relationship, first and foremost.

In Closing

Asian women have proven that being feminine does not make them weak or a slave, unlike what most women of the west tend to believe. The women's movement is not severely damaged by women that love their husbands and their families. Additionally, Asian women are smart and strong, while knowing what is means to care for their loved ones. Their beauty is definitely a sight for sore eyes and their behavior a balsam to the soul. Who can compete with that?

Read More: 7 Things You Need To Know About Filipina Girls

Rocco Casa
Rocco is a traveler focus on having amazing sex vacations around Asia. To get more tips on how to plan a sex vacation, have a look to the Asian travel guides

Beware The Girl Who Actually Likes You

September 19, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

Wisdom, unfortunately, is a lot like technology. You may have the pieces and necessary components to allow for a great technological achievement, but you don't know where they are, nor how to assemble them. You must postpone that achievement until you do. Just as we had the technology to land on the moon circa 1958, it was figuring out how to avail ourselves of said existing technology to do so, and wisdom is no different. You may have the facts and knowledge readily available, but that doesn't mean you'll piece it together and have an epiphany that will help you in life until much later. There is one such piece of wisdom I finally assembled a couple weeks ago, the elements of which have been available to me for the past 20 years. So save yourself 20 years of mental strife and please pay attention.

In 99.9% of cases the relationship of a man who is chasing after a girl can be described as one of cajoling, trickery, negotiation, and strategy. In other words, you can't just go up to a girl, ask her out, and then BOOM! She says yes and three days later you're banging at her apartment when her roommate is gone. In nearly 100% of the instances the girl does not want to go out with you and needs to be convinced, or even fooled, into doing so. This requires a fair amount of game and strategy, the topic of which has consumed a disproportionate amount of discussion on sites and forums such as ROK.

However, even after you "get" said girl, the game and strategics are not over. You constantly have to study and maneuver based on your girlfriend's behavior. You constantly have to be assessing your wife's behavior and employing the corresponding strategy. In short it's a never ending psy-ops battle that is constantly evolving and requires a fair amount of experience, commitment to waging it, and always viewing your partner as the “adversary” or at least “unwilling participant.”

But what if the girl actually, genuinely likes you?

On the face of it the question seems hilarious. Girls just don’t throw themselves at you. You can’t get most girls to go home with you on the first night unless they’re drunk or you run some incredibly charismatic game. And what girl ever liked you so much that you didn’t have to run game? You might as well be talking about unicorns.

But they do exist and, sadly, if you don’t identify them, they’re likely to be the cause of the most amount of regret, pain, and guilt in your life.

First, understand that, though incredibly rare, there are girls who will genuinely like you. They don’t require game. They don’t think themselves higher value than you. They don’t need convincing. There’s something about you that you did or said or believed in that went straight to their little heart and compelled them to like you. And I’m even holding back when I use the word “like” because if you hang out with them just a little bit it quickly turns into love. And that is precisely what happens—girl sees you, finds something about you compelling, falls in love, and now puts you in a very high position in her life.

Second, because 100% of all the other girls required teeth pulling to get them to go out with you, your brain never entertains the possibility a girl might actually like you for you. Therefore, if you run into one that does, you don’t think “she likes you,” you think she’s just “easy” or you ran some “amazing game.” That deep down inside this one girl really doesn’t have the capacity to love you, you just got lucky. Sadly, think about what that means and implies. In nearly every man’s mind (including my own until recently) you NEVER BELIEVED INTUITIVELY THAT IT WAS POSSIBLE FOR A GIRL TO ACTUALLY LIKE YOU.

It was always a game.

It was always a chore.

You had to be tricking her into going out with you. You were always fooling her into sleeping with you.

In short, girls don’t really like men.

And while this may be the case in 99.9% of women, it’s that rare .1% that actually likes you, cares about you, even loves you that your brain is pre-programmed to overlook and dismiss. And now you see the potential for risk, harm, regret, and guilt. In inaccurately diagnosing a girl’s interest in you, you run two major risks.

The first one is that you will lose the true love of your life or the “one that got away.” Yes you were a stupid young kid. Yes you were having a great time nailing other chicks running game. But as you get older and date more and more of these inane, pain in the asses posing as young women, that one girl who;

brought you lasagna while working the overnight shift put together a surprise birthday party for you showed up on time

would drop anything she was doing just to be with you starts to show just how rare and precious she was. Yes there were many women who willingly showed up on dates. Yes there were women who might have done something nice for you. But I guarantee that you could count the number of girls on one hand who put you above themselves in life and would do anything for you, and were not part of the cajoling-required 99.9%.

The second major risk you run is hurting an innocent human being. I've done a lot of bad things in my life. But the one that keeps me up at night is the one girl's life I utterly destroyed because I didn't identify, let alone believe, she actually liked me that much. That she really wasn't a human like me capable of emotion, care, compassion or love, but just a "silly stupid girl" that I was fooling real good. It's one thing if you hit another person's car or you accidentally run over a person's cat, but when you hurt somebody, no matter how carelessly, who genuinely loves you there's nothing you can do to undo that pain or make it better. And that is a specter that will haunt you for life.

Admittedly, ROK and this particular sphere is not one for forgiving women, feeling sorry for them, or having empathy for them. Nor is it about "looking for the one" or lamenting "the one that got away." However, if there is a token bit of wisdom I can pass on to help younger men enjoy a better life than I did, it would be to NOT let the 99.9% of standard American and western floozies brainwash you so much that you are blinded to the precious and few 0.1% that would make your lives better.

Read More: Beware Of Trojan Horses

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

Samson’s Tale Cautions Against Dark Triad Women

September 20, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

> “Find out each man’s thumbscrew. ‘Tis the art of setting their wills in action. It needs more skill than resolution. You must know where to get at anyone. Every volition has a special motive which varies according to taste. All men are idolaters, some of fame, others of selfinterest, most of pleasure. Skill consists in knowing these idols in order to bring them into play. – Baltasar Gracian (1601-1658)

“Discover every man’s thumbscrew” —Aphorism #26 from Baltasar Gracian’s The Art of Worldly Wisdom, and Law #33 from Robert Greene’s The 48 Laws of Power, showcases one of the most commonly-used strategies humans and animals have to establish dominance over fellow beings. Predators in the wild often seek to attack their prey from the weakest angle to ensure a quick kill. Right from antiquity, human history—whether it might be in politics, warfare, social, or domestic life—exhibits countless examples of the successful implementation of this approach.

> “So in war, the way is to avoid what is strong and to strike at what is weak.” – Sun Tzu, The Art of War

But the most common example of this is usually seen in male-female interactions, both in the human and animal world. Since courtship, pair-bonding, and sex essentially involve power transfer, men and women have often tried to ascertain each other’s weaknesses to subvert and “control” each other.

While men with game know how to push the right (weak) buttons of women for seduction, women—being the physically "weaker sex"—have evolved the skill of manipulation to control men. Unsuspecting gullible men or the complacent who let their guard down often bite the dust in interactions with women, with sometimes disastrous consequences, and become prey for predatory women. One of the classical religious examples to illustrate that is the Biblical story of Samson.

The story of Samson

According to biblical accounts, Samson was divinely blessed with supernatural strength to combat his enemies and perform heroic feats, such as killing a lion, slaying an entire army with only the jawbone of an ass, and destroying a pagan temple. He however had two vulnerabilities: his attraction to untrustworthy (or possibly unchaste) women and his hair, without which he was powerless—which ultimately proved fatal for him.

Samson's weakness for women eventually betaized him at the hands of Delilah, a beautiful Philistine woman from the Valley of Sorek (probably a successful courtesan or prostitute) whom he fell in love with. Delilah was approached by the Philistine leaders to find out the secret of Samson's enormous strength in return for a reward of silver shekels. Three times she asked him for the source of his strength, and each time he gave her a false answer, unto which Delilah finally used relentless emotional manipulation to pry out his secret from him:

> "Then she said to him, "How can you say, 'I love you,' when you won't confide in me? This is the third time you have made a fool of me and haven't told me the secret of your great strength." With such nagging she prodded him day after day until he was sick to death of it."
>
> – Judges 16:15-16, NIV

Samson finally revealed that his strength resided in his hair, which had never been cut. Delilah then arranged to cut or shave Samson's locks, leading to the loss of his strength and capture by the Philistines.

Samson had a protracted torture session following his capture (his eyes were gouged out and he was forced to work in the treadmill), while Delilah disappears from the story, but most likely the Philistines honored their promise of payment and Delilah enjoyed a comfortable retirement.

To be fair to Samson, a lot of (gullible) men face his fate in some way or the other, at some point of their lives. Modern men could often face Delilahs in the shape of women who seduce, emotionally manipulate, ensnare, cheat and sometimes even destroy the lives of many powerful men, by exploiting these men's thumbscrews (weaknesses+secrets) on discovery.

Napoleon Hill in the chapter "The Mystery of Sexual Transmutation" from his best seller "Think and Grow Rich" states that "So strong and impelling is the desire for sexual contact that men freely run the risk of life and reputation to indulge it." Thus, most of the time, this weakness is commonly revealed to the woman in the form of sex, or through emotional and psychological intimacy after sex—which could involve either voluntary or unintentional disclosure of personal secrets.

The betaization curve is real—especially in serious relationships—and in usual circumstances entails men trusting or psychologically bonding to regular women after repeated sex with time. Throw in the element of love, care and "support" (whether emotional or, in rare cases, material) from the women, then these men often open up more to their women. The problem that could ensue is that women then can eventually exploit this to their advantage later on, when these men least expect it.

The Dark Triad Woman

It's a scientific fact that women are attracted to men with the suite of personality traits known as "The Dark Triad". But on the flipside, imagine a man with no game dealing instead with a "Dark Triad Woman," aka "Lucifer's Daughter"—a coldblooded female exponent of those traits herself. A description can be read here, a few excerpts of which are below:

> "Never fuck a Lucifer's daughter, the fallout is not worth the hassle, you will not come out unscathed. Typically when a man fucks a woman the power exchange which takes place psychologically leaves the man feeling in control and the woman feeling exposed, not with a Lucifer's daughter, for a Lucifer's daughter the culmination of your coitus is leverage. A Lucifer's daughter does not feel "used up" or otherwise disposable for having sex with you, in fact quite the opposite – she feels empowered.
>
> If she can become a source of sex for you, you will become increasingly addicted to her presence, not only that, but should you choose to cut her off she has the tools to make herself a real nuisance by using the sex as leverage in blackmail targeted at other people (typically women – eg: telling your wife when she was your mistress) and this can allow her more maneuverability to destroy your reputation or otherwise extort you into doing her bidding because "she's got dirt on you." The Lucifer's daughter wants to know your secrets, even if that means she has to be a participant in the formation of the secret in order to control you with the resulting leverage. Her aim is to enslave you by any means possible and knowing you will be resistant to more traditional approaches she adopts a more insidious and seemingly innocuous approach."

Some of the qualities of the Dark Triad Woman:

- Emotionally violent, opportunistic, adversarial and unrelenting under a carefully feigned innocuous external appearance; could be found anywhere
- Calculated, immoral and coldblooded expert at playing men: knows what to say, how to act to outwit men to make them fall under her spell; master at love games to lure men
- Intuitive psychologist: adept at cold and mind reading men to size up their strengths and weaknesses through careful observation
- Usually promiscuous, but can hide past sexual history effectively; does not reveal or camouflages her personal history well to hoodwink men
- Social predator: usually targets powerful, influential or resourceful men, or men who can be of use to her
- Sadistic and unempathetic, but uses emotion to disarm men
- Uses (or trades) sex to: 1)neutralize male authority , 2) discover male secrets, and 3) manipulate the secrets and power of men to puppeteer them
- Sex empowers her and gives her leverage over men
- Peddles great sex freely to keep her prey addicted to her and enslaved in her web
- Once in her web, escape becomes extremely difficult, and usually carries disastrous consequences for the man. She rarely lets him escape unscathed

The article aptly ends with:

> "If you meet a Lucifer's daughter and aren't a dark triad personality yourself (so that's 99% of you reading this), run and don't turn back."

Delilah, Jezebel, etc are just a few Biblical examples of such women. Besides, women haven't changed much through history. Trust: a lottery in today's increasingly deceptive world of betrayals within "relationships," should rarely or never be invested—radical or unnatural as it may sound—sometimes even after sex. Samson, with all his might, was no match for Delilah's expert guile. Today, betas (with their gullibility) are sitting ducks for the predatory wiles of the Dark Triad Woman, especially today when men are increasingly being socially programmed by modern blue pill culture to invest in "emotional intimacy" during relationships with women.

In today's world of permissiveness, modern women usually attain some levels of the Dark Triad mindset over the psychologically and emotionally hardening years of casual sex on the cock carousel, while even "innocent" women may not be as innocent as they might seem—making the concept of emotional intimacy today itself farcical. Besides, women haven't changed much through history. It then becomes even more important for a man today to instead acquire game, emotional detachment or red pill knowledge, or learn about (or acquire) the Dark Triad mindset himself, to avoid the fate of Samson, who spilled his beans in a moment of emotional weakness, in face of Delilah's relentless manipulation.

How even a sexual fetish Samsonized some men I knew

A woman who understands that a man can be controlled through sex (or the type of sex) he wants, can easily exploit this weakness to control him by overwhelming him with a supply of his fetish, to psychologically as well as sexually stun and overpower him. I've known some men in my social circle who became Samsonized by something as inconspicuous such as an anal sex fetish. Some players I knew ended up marrying or committing to women who used anal to lure and ensnare them into commitment, while some men faced worse consequences like the case I'd narrate below.

The premise for this story is mentioned in points #5 and #6 in one of my previous articles, the "Delilah" is the woman I described there (Madame du HR)—a real life embodiment of the Dark Triad Woman herself. One of my ex-colleagues, let's call him Alexander, was a young, handsome, well off and highly educated man in his early 30s who had joined the firm a few months before I was to quit. In spite of all his positive qualities, and professional and educational strengths, Alexander had no game. He feared approaching women, letting them instead approach him—he had had only two prior girlfriends in his life.

He had some additional "vulnerabilities," such as addictions to porn and online whores (representing the bulk of his sexual encounters outside his prior romantic relationships), whom he used to hire regularly to satisfy another of his "weaknesses"—an anal sex fetish, possibly fueled by his porn addiction. He soon confided all this within our social group of office buddies over the the first few months when we used to hang out for drinks.

Madame du HR soon learnt about him from her spies and own observation of him, and made her move on him—first by pushing herself close to him in group discussions at work, while constantly eye-fucking him, and displaying coy ovulation behavior in his presence to gain his interest. She used her mangina slaves within the office to advertise about her sexual expertise to him, to pull him more towards her.

Her allure soon worked on him, and he fell for her, later confiding to us that he had started soliciting her sexual services on weekends, to satiate his anal sex fetish exclusively—which according to him she was generously skilled at. I realized she was ensnaring him (like the many others she had already done before at work) and initially thought of warning him about her personality before I quit; but refrained because just as helping friends who have no game is a bad idea, sometimes it's even worse to warn such who've already fallen hard for the bait.

Predictably, she was soon dominating him at work itself, even though he held a higher position than her, not to mention she was leeching off him financially too. He seemed to simply be unable of breaking loose of her stranglehold on him. Even though she was much older than him, and he could've probably attracted more beautiful and younger women had he learned some game, his weaknesses and mistakes were all exploited by her, to eventually Samsonize him.

After I left that gig, I later learned from ex-colleagues that Alexander was unceremoniously fired a few months later (with the revelation of his shenanigans with her to the boss—by her—after he cheated on her with another woman, presumably to break free of her stranglehold). But from what I was also told, he had still returned to see (solicit) her sexually out of remorse, even though he had gotten burnt by her and employed elsewhere later. Her psychological control over him was complete.

Such are the wiles, the pull and stranglehold of a Dark Triad Woman, for they blind and stun her prey to other options. Escape is often difficult from her web, unless if you're Dark Triad or have game knowledge yourself.

Conclusion

> "The only secrets are the secrets that keep themselves." – George Bernard Shaw

Whether it may be the lust for sex or money, a greed for fame and power, or a dark ignominious chapter of your life, no man should let his "thumbscrews" be revealed, and especially never to his women. And neither should men let on to women as to "what makes them tick."

Feminist societies today emphasize emotional intimacy within relationships to socially program men into further betaizing themselves by revealing secrets and weaknesses. This forces them to be subservient to their women in relationship, so that women can take advantage of them later.

Sometimes women don't even know or realize when they've actually discovered your secrets, so don't make it then evident to them by owning up. Instead deny or divert them from your thumbscrews. In the end, male-female interaction essentially was, is, and will always remain an amoral power game as seen in the wild. Women rarely forgive a man's weakness, and rarely hesitate to exploit his thumbscrews should their affections turn sour.

It's said that a woman cannot hurt a man with options. Men often disregard this truth when they reveal their thumbscrews to women, no matter how innocuous, adorable, or trustworthy their women might appear to be. It’s not their business; it’s your own. Never yield to a woman’s relentless emotional manipulation. Resist the urge to spill your beans about your weaknesses, neither reveal themselves to them by your deeds; or else run the risk of emulating Samson someday—a timeless story which continues to be emulated in the lives of unsuspecting men today.

Read More: Don’t Let Women Rule Your Life

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

25 Reasons Your Girlfriend Is Overrated

September 20, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

At some point in all of our lives we've been charged with the task of describing our newly-minted girlfriends to our friends and family in hopes of gaining some sort of approval or blessing. We do our level best to justify choosing her as a significant other by highlighting all of her qualities while conveniently leaving out her weaknesses. Who can blame us? We all know that relationships are much easier when the girl we've chosen gets the seal of approval from the people closest to us.

However, after digesting the crimson capsule I've come to realize that most, if not all, of what I hear from friends and loved ones about their women aren't really qualities at all. Especially when it comes to American women. Some of what I hear are myths, some qualities are exaggerated and grossly overrated and, believe it or not, some are even red flags. What they all have in common is that most of these so-called qualities are merely fool's gold—a delusional spin on negative traits as a coping mechanism to the reality that there is no such thing as a quality woman in this part of the world. The sad thing is that men actually believe these qualities make her a catch and that he's lucky to have her.

Below is my list of the 25 most prolific fake qualities I've heard when listening to men describe their unicorns. Chances are you or someone you know has either acknowledged or believed them. It's time to take the blinders off and see these endowments for what they really are.

1."She lets me be me"

…for now. But the moment an alpha gives her the tingles your cute little idiosyncrasies will turn into major annoyances.

2. “She’s an independent woman”

No need to elaborate too much on this one, as there is way too much documented evidence that so-called independent women make horrible mates, including this article.

3. “She believes in 50/50 relationships”

Feminist.

4. “We have sooo much in common”

No you don’t. She’s putting on an act to lock you down. As soon as that happens off-roading and weekend camping trips are out.

5. “She’s a good Christian woman”

Women who claim to “put God first” are among the most hypergamous females on the planet. AWALT, fellas…especially this particular breed.

6. “She’s one of the guys”

Run for the hills if she actually says this out loud as this is the calling card of a bona fide slut. This is a textbook attention grab and a strategy to increase the number of horses on her carousel ride.

7. “She has a great job”

Unless she’s a preschool teacher, nurse, or any profession that requires a nurturing personality, she sits at a desk from 9 to 5, updates her Facebook status every 15 minutes, and wants to fuck her boss (FYI: steer clear of high school teachers).

8. “She is so laid back”

Women are laid back so long as you are dominant and hold frame, as it relaxes them to know you’re in control. If you lose that quality she’ll be the bitchy, neurotic creature she’s designed to be.

9. “She’s such a strong woman”

Betas will often mistake a woman’s jaded disposition (a direct result of being pumped and dumped through her twenties) as strength.

10. “She doesn’t try to smother me”

If you’re holding frame, fucking her senseless, and running solid asshole game she’ll want to smother you. If she doesn’t, she’s thinking of smothering someone else if she isn’t already.

11. “She’s always the life of the party”

Attention whore (read: slut)

12. “She’s down to earth”

The perfect description of a female who doesn’t take pride in her personal appearance and is often seen in sweats and flip-flops. Betas gleefully refer to these women as “low maintenance.”

13. “She challenges me”

Bitching and nagging isn’t her challenging you. It’s her flat out telling you that you’ve lost frame. A woman in check rarely challenges her man.

14. “She’s great in bed”

Most girls are the same in bed, as they generally just need to be physically present to produce a favorable sexual experience for a man. Willingness, attractiveness, and blowjob skills do make a difference, but there’s largely no real skill in getting fucked.

15. “She’s fearless”

Another slut tell—especially if the word “fearless” comes out of her mouth. This means she’s impulsive. Her YOLO attitude is a dead giveaway that her holes have been plundered by countless cocks.

16. “We’re soulmates”

You’re kidding right?

17. “She’s genuine”

Beauty, as with genuineness, is only skin deep. She’s as genuine as her mission dictates.

18. “She speaks her mind”

Translation: she won’t shut the fuck up.

19.“She gets along famously with my family and friends”

Again, this is a strategy to lock you down. Getting ringing endorsements from the people who have your ear is the quickest way to accomplish this goal. Her true colors will eventually shine through, as she won’t hesitate to talk shit about your loved ones soon as you put a ring on it.

20. “She’s a good mother”

Click here.

21. “She doesn’t want kids”

…until she shows you the dreaded plus sign while swearing on grammy’s grave it was an accident. All women are biologically hardwired with a strong desire to reproduce. Not wanting kids is an illusion designed to lull you into a false sense of security so you will raw dog her and help fulfill her biological imperative.

22. “She’s my best friend”

There is a shred of truth to this, as she’s now your only friend after systematically eradicating your social circle one person at a time.

23. “She’s been through a lot so she’s wise for her age”

She’s fucked a ton of guys, been through a lot of drama, and has a lot of stories to tell. Enjoy the baggage.

24. “She’s open-minded”

She doesn’t have any steadfast beliefs or habits. Often referred to as a “free spirit,” which is code for a girl who changes views like she changes cocks. For the record, I’ve never met a slut who wasn’t open-minded.

25. “We have a connection”

She’s really hot, loves to fuck and begs to give you blowjobs. Trust me, I know this can make you feel like you have some sort of cosmic connection with her, but don’t kid yourself. Odds are you’re not the only dude who has that same “connection” with her.

So the next time you’re engrossed in a conversation with one of your buddies and he starts spouting off his girl’s faux positive qualities, do yourself a favor and take them with a grain of salt—especially if you live in the West.

Read Next: 5 Reasons Why You Shouldn’t Get Into A Serious Relationship With A Woman

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Why You Must Confront Your Own Coming Death (And How To Do It)

September 21, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Death plays a central role in Tibetan Buddhist traditions, where it's a frequent focus for their meditations. These meditations often occur at burial grounds or even in the presence of dead and decaying bodies. I don't know of another culture that's so acutely aware of the inevitability of death, and what it means for the living.

This contrasts starkly with modern western cultures that play the dangerous game of ignoring death. We talk about the dead as if they were still alive. We cultivate an environment where talking about death is seen in a negative light. We watch films like Indiana Jones and fantasize about elixirs of never-ending life. When one of our own dies, we dress them up in fancy clothes and make-up so that we can see them, and even talk to them as if they were still living.

Nearly everything we do surrounding death is based on the premise of trying to avoid a basic reality: everyone dies. The reason we do this is obvious: we like being alive and can't quite fathom the existence of an earth that no longer includes us at its center.

But we can't avoid it. No one has. Not even Jesus. Not even Mohammed. Not even Buddha. And that brings us back to Tibetan Buddhism, and their strong connection to death. This connection is so important to them because it reminds them that all things are impermanent, even our own existence.

Nowhere is this more obvious than in their Nine-Point Meditation on Death. Using this mediation, a practitioner contemplates the following set of truths:

Truth 1: Death is certain

1. We cannot escape death

2. Each moment we're alive brings us one step closer to death

3. Death comes in a single instant and is unexpected

Conclusion: Practice the Dharma (the Buddhist teachings)

Truth 2: The time of death is uncertain

4. The duration of our lives is unpredictable

5. There are more causes for death than causes for life

6. The human body is extremely fragile

Conclusion: Practice the Dharma now

Truth 3: The only thing that can help you at the time of death is your mental and spiritual development

7. Wealth we've accumulated can't help

8. Friends and family can't help

9. Our bodies can't help

Conclusion: Practice the Dharma purely

The Tibetan Buddhists remind themselves of these truths to encourage practice of the Dharma, and to make two important realizations:

1. Recognizing how short and precious life is—with this knowledge they're more likely to make it meaningful and live it fully.

2. Familiarizing themselves with the reality of death—with this knowledge they can remove their fears that stem from the prospect of dying.

Why you should acknowledge your coming death

Death is the most common fear. It's the one destiny that everyone on this planet shares. But in order to dominate life, you must accept the inevitability of death—the inevitability that one day you won't be here.

I'm going to die. You're going to die. Everyone we know is going to die, too.

But if you live in constant fear of death, you're unlikely to have a meaningful or impactful life. You'll spend all of your time worrying about it or shying away from new opportunities because you're afraid of it.

And maybe this cautious attitude will prolong your life by a fraction of a percentage, but at what cost? Reduced productivity, reduced achievement, reduced enjoyment of life, to name a few. Only when you fully accept your morbid fate can you fully embrace and dominate the little time that you do have.

It sounds cliché, but we're all born and we all die. The time in between those events is what defines us. What we do defines who we are. But if we're living in constant denial of the known end to our story, we won't proceed in an authentic way that keeps our best interests in mind.

The truth is that the average modern man exhibits this fear to such a large degree that it paralyzes him. It stops him from doing anything bold. He's so afraid of dying that he barely even lives. When you accept your fate, you separate yourself from the hordes of John Does who can't do the same. You begin to live life on a higher plane of existence.

You must rid yourself of any delusions that you have and accept your own coming death. Only then will you be able to take maximum control and dominate the little time that you do have.

How to confront death

The advantages of acknowledging your own coming death are numerous. In a broad sense, it will ground your life in reality, allowing you to approach everything from a more effective, more fearless mindset. The best way to condition yourself to accept this fact, and live like it, is through frequent reminder. And I don't know of a better reminder than The Nine-Point Meditation on Death.

Read the following truths one-by-one, think of any relatable experiences you've had (e.g. people you know who've died). Make it real. Think about your own coming death. This will light a fire under your belly to value what time you do have.

Note: I've altered the conclusions to apply more generally.

Truth 1: Death is certain

Conclusion: Practice things that facilitate personal growth and bring you happiness

Truth 2: The time of death is uncertain

Conclusion: Practice things that facilitate personal growth (do it now)

Truth 3: The only thing that can help you at the time of death is your mental and spiritual development

Conclusion: Practice things that facilitate personal growth without getting distracted by attachments to material objects or other people

This is an excerpt from my new book "Dominate". Read reviews and get it here.

Read More: 3 Habits That Every Man Should Practice

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

The Shallow Narcissism Of Female Youtube Entrepreneurs

September 21, 2014 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

A very basic definition of an entrepreneur is: "a person who sets up a business or businesses, taking on financial risks in the hope of profit."

I dare say that women who earn the bulk of their living through social media, primarily by just having a pretty face or looking good in a bikini, should hardly count as entrepreneurs. There are hardly any real financial risks in the endeavor (everybody has a computer and video capturing device), and the "hope of profit" is almost nearly a guarantee to varying degrees.

So much can be gained and so little will be lost, since there will always be a ready-and-waiting army of thirsty beta orbiters to act as subscription and click-bait.

This article (more like a video critique) will present a number of examples of how women use their bodies to exploit Youtube for financial gain, all while disseminating information and content which has almost zero intellectual value. And of course, all of these videos took very little time, effort, and expenditure to produce.

But first, watch this important scene which demonstrates the red pill truths about women and Youtube.

Dialogue after taking the "Red Pill Special" (1:10 – 1:53)

> "I like to wear slutty clothes for male attention. but act offended when I get that attention if it's from a guy I am not interested in. I enjoy the privileges my beauty > buys me. Men take me out to dinner, fight over me, give me a place to stay, and buy me drinks. I like knowing that if I start making Youtube videos, my beauty will earn me 100 times the subscribers as a man would have doing what I do.

>
> If I live-cast, or stream video games, pathetic men will donate thousands of dollars to me. I can earn more money playing video games on Twitch, and doing my makeup on camera on Youtube, than your average man will make until the age of 35. But rather than acknowledge this privilege, I would rather bitch about it and claim that men are objectifying me."

The Fitness Goddess

What's up everyone! It's summer, are you ready to be my beta orbiter today!?

That's pretty much all I'm hearing from a few videos which have been posted by this woman. She regurgitates health and fitness information which has (of course) been spoken, printed, and reviewed 10,000 times before throughout modern history, but markets it with her own brand. That is, by just being a fit and bubbly valley-girl type who looks good in a swimsuit. Check out the ending at 6:14. Selfie showoff…

This video of a Mexican fitness model doing steps inside a gym has obtained over 1,000,000 views since it was posted. Such incredible time, effort, and hard work to likely obtain over $1,000 in Adsense revenue…

Wanna snatch over 5,500,000 views and continuously earn the corresponding advertising revenue in the comfort of your sleep? Just look hot in a patriotic bikini and do abdominal crunches on the beach. 'Murica!!!

The Bikini Posing Model

Hey bikini lovers! Let's head on down to Bondi Beach with Natasha Oakley and Devin Brugman!

These two young women were among the first pioneers of using Instagram as a self-promotion and revenue gathering platform. What results is that their "A Bikini A Day" business model has been fantastically successful, and set these girls up with a fun-filled jet-setting lifestyle while doing, well… essentially nothing other than laying out on a beach or by the pool drinking cocktails.

It's so stupid it's brilliant. They take hundreds of photographs of themselves wearing alluring swimwear and… wait for it… post only one photograph per day on their Instagram and social media accounts.

This ensures a steady stream of repeat visitors (and thus page views and advertising revenue) from their army of beta orbiters, which are big enough to stage Napoleon's invasion of Russia (600,000+). It also means they can take extended breaks from "work" if they choose to do so, and head off to another exotic destination to "get away from it all."

Oddly enough, their ventures into Youtube have been somewhat less successful. Maybe it has something to do with the fact they are trying to promote a product (bikinis) that the vast majority of their single male fan base does not want to actually buy.

More than a few women actually video blog about their training sessions for regional bikini competitions, and this lady is no exception. She think's her boobs looks pretty damn cute in this bikini top, so you'd better "recognize" like ODB.

Conclusion

It doesn't seem fair does it? Men have to go to trade school, engineering school, or some other lengthy job training institution to ultimately make a fraction of the amount of money (for our time, effort, and sweat) compared to many of these women. This is all while we are creating things of tangible value which have a purposeful application to society. What these women create is nothing. The money they earn should be about as real as the money created out of thin air on a computer screen which is used for your home loan.

Now what you should do is direct yourself to RooshV or Captain Capitalism. They offer very practical and worthwhile advice for people like us, all while keeping their shirt on. Oh and be sure to subscribe to them instead of the women.

Read More: The Irony Of Female Empowerment

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

A Period Is No Excuse For A Woman To Be A Bitch

September 22, 2014 | by Anton McDowell | Link | Original Link

Throughout history women have used the fact that their bodies go through some pretty gross stuff to get away with stuff that men would not get away with. This is by telling men that they naturally go through horrible rigor as a natural part of being the sex that is able to bear children so men, the people who don't pay this price since they don't have child bearing organs, must pay a greater societal cost in recompense.

Any woman will tell you that having a period is the most horrible god-awful thing that can ever happen to a person and men should be understanding when a woman yells at a man, belittles a man, or hits a man while she is on her period because what she is going through is so very hard and men have no way of knowing what it is like.

So why again was Ray Rice banned from the NFL?

Is This True?

Is there no way for a man to have any idea what a woman's period is like? Is there no medical condition that a man can get that has similar symptoms?

Actually there is: Crohn's Disease, also known as ulcerative colitis. Which affects about 3.2 out of every 1000 people in North America and Europe, including myself. This disease (for those who don't know about it) is the "I have to take a shit every two hours and there is more blood in my stool than there is stool" disease. It is caused by an autoimmune disorder that makes the white blood cells in a person's body attack their own intestinal tract.

Are these symptoms similar enough to a woman's period? Lets go down the list.

1. Lots of blood coming out of a hole.

Check, I actually became so anemic that I (a former varsity high school X-Country runner) would be out of breath running up one flight of stairs.

2. Pain in your midsection.

Check, bleeding intestinal lesions are quite painful.

3. Hormonal irritability.

I can't check the hormone part, but having to wake up two or three times while sleeping means very little REM sleep (especially when you work the graveyard shift) so, Check.

Admittedly, I can't definitively say whether my condition was better, the same as, or worse than what a woman goes through during her period. However, I can say that if I were living in a tribe in 10,000 B. C. and had this condition I would have died. Women obviously survived those times so I would bet money on my condition being worse, and I had to deal with Crohn's Disease for four weeks of every month instead of one.

So how did this affect how I treated other people? In general I was nicer. I suspected that a punch to the gut in a fight would really, really hurt and might make me take a bloody shit in my pants, so I took a leave of absence from kung fu and was far more nice and beta to everyone around me. After I finally got treatment (see below) I told some people at work about it and few of them had any idea that anything was wrong.

In short, women are probably purposely exaggerating how bad a period is in order to shame men into feeling that they must put up with their bad behavior. Emotional manipulation is something women are born to do.

What About Childbirth?

This is the other big one that women use all the time to shame men into feeling that they have to give special treatment to women. There is no medical condition even remotely similar to pregnancy, so there truly is no way for a man to say whether or not women are exaggerating the difficulty of pregnancy and childbirth from firsthand experience.

However, men can use the timeless advice, "pay attention to what women do, and not what they say."

When the chainsaw was first invented did lumberjacks protest it? Did they refuse to use them because they preferred to cut trees down by hand with a regular saw? I highly doubt it. So what has been the reaction of women to artificial womb technology which has the potential to allow a woman to have a child without going through any of the problems of childbirth or pregnancy?

While a few feminists such as Shulamith Firestone have written that artificial womb technology would free women from the tyranny of their biology and bring about gender equality (and a blow to the nuclear family) most feminists are against it. Andrea Dworkin wrote that artificial womb technology would be "the coming genocide." Gena Corea wrote, "The new reproductive technologies represent an escalation of violence against women, a violence camouflaged behind medical terms." Janice Raymond used the terms "reproductive abuse" and "the spermatic economy of sex and breeding"—a "spermocracy."

The mainstream media, which is known to cater to the female collective, also wrote an article against artificial womb technology called: Fetuses in Artificial Wombs: Medical Marvel or Misogynist Malpractice?

She believes men having children without the risk of losing them in family court is the same as genocide.

There are undoubtedly going to be different opinions among ROK readers about artificial womb technology. However, it is safe to assume that most of us would agree that if pregnancy and childbirth was really as terrible as women have historically led men to believe, then there would be unanimous support of artificial womb technology by women.

So the next time a woman in your life tries to make you feel that the bad things society does to men are less than what nature has done to women, know that she is probably exaggerating.

Don’t Worry, I Got Treatment

I put off getting treatment for a while because of unemployment, uncertain future employment, and lack of health insurance. I have a family member who went to a doctor because of some mild knee pain and, due to gross medical incompetence, ended up with tens of thousands of dollars of medical bills and a much worse knee that eventually had to be replaced altogether. I personally don’t fully trust American doctors.

I did eventually get medication for my Crohn’s, but it had bad side effects. After much online research I decided to try a treatment in Mexico called Helminthic Therapy. This is a therapy that works for many different autoimmune diseases such as asthma, Crohn’s, Celiac Disease and others. It involves inoculating a person with a small therapeutic dose of benign hookworms, which release chemicals into the bloodstream to calm down the immune system. Your white blood cells won’t attack the hookworms, and after treatment won’t react to your own body either.

Although this may sound gross, I have had it for over a year now and can report they work perfectly with no side effects. This ordeal taught me that there are almost always solutions to our problems—-so, the next time a woman tries to use her period as an excuse for bad behavior, remember the worms and don’t let her get away with it.

Read Next: Why Hasn’t Feminist Emily Hopper Been Arrested For Assault

Anton McDowell
Anton is a corporate slave plotting his escape who wishes he had taken the pill nine years ago, but is ready to start his life anew and help others do the same. When he isn't working the graveyard shift he is beating himself up in kung fu or enjoying a nice beer at one of the bars in his college town. Send your hate/love to

Mutiny And The Ordeal Of Captain Bligh

September 22, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Fortune both grants favor and revokes it. Plutarch, wise in the ways of such things, puts this prescient little speech into the mouth of Aemilius Paullus, who was addressing a group of intemperate young men:

> Is it fitting for a mortal man to become bold when he enjoys success, or proud because he has conquered a nation or a city or a kingdom? Or should he instead contemplate this reversal of fortune, which provides for any man who wages war an instructive example of our common vulnerability and teaches us that nothing is stable and secure? What sort of moment is it for mortals to be confident, when their victory over other men obliges them to be most afraid of fortune, and when a happy man can be reduced to dejection by his knowledge that destiny follows a circular course, coming to different men at different times?…Can you then believe that our own affairs enjoy any lasting protection from the vicissitudes of fortune? Young men, will you not then abandon your hollow insolence and let go of your pride…and instead look towards the future with humility, always watchful of the moment when the divine will at last exacts from each of you retribution for your present prosperity?[1]

Falls from Fortune's grace can come with distressing speed. Captain William Bligh, a respected officer of the British Navy and merchant service, discovered for himself just how cruel such reversals can be. Awarded the captaincy of H.M.S. Bounty in 1787, he and his crew sailed for Tahiti on a mission to collect breadfruit trees for agricultural use in the Caribbean. After ten months at sea on a voyage that exceeded 27,000 miles, the Bounty finally reached the South Seas. Much has been written on the character of Bligh and his style of command; while not the tyrannical monster he has been made out to be, he certainly was a product of the British maritime service's severe disciplinary culture.

William Bligh: a complex and controversial figure

A competent and meticulous mariner, he nevertheless lacked a measure of joviality that might have softened his harsher edges. Deaf to the music of mildness, his coldness and detachment prevented him from extending to his crew those incidental touches of magnanimity that might have done much to relieve the tedium of a long sea voyage. Tensions multiplied, and Bligh's appointment with the laughing mistress Fortune was not long in coming. He later related how he was seized by the mutineers:

> Just before sun-rising, while I was yet asleep, Mr. [Fletcher] Christian…came into my cabin, and seizing me, tied my hands with a cord behind my back, threatening me with instant death if I spoke…I was hauled out of bed, and forced on deck in my shirt, suffering great pain from the tightness with which they had tied my hands.[2]

For Bligh and the crew members loyal to him, things were about to become much worse. He and eighteen other men were cast adrift in a leaky open boat only twenty-three feet in length, and which was so overloaded that it was in constant danger of being swamped. One errant wave of sufficient size might have spelled the end for them. For provisions, they were permitted only the barest of essentials: some salt pork, bread, wine, rum, water, and a few cutlasses.

Most significantly, they were given no charts or navigational equipment; the mutineers permitted them only a compass and an old quadrant. In the enormity of the Pacific Ocean, to try to navigate by such primitive reckonings was a colossal handicap, something within the capabilities of only the most talented navigator. But Bligh, who had served under Captain Cook, one of Britain's ablest explorers, was up to the task.

The plan was to head for the closest known friendly location: the island of Timor, which was a daunting 3,600 miles distant. Bligh's crew, exposed to the torments of wave, sun, and starvation, had hardly one chance in a hundred. Trying to locate an island three thousand miles away by dead reckoning on the open sea was like trying to find a needle in a haystack. To this difficulty was added the fact that the men could not make landfall for rest or provisions during the journey; the islands were populated by fierce cannibals, hostile to all outsiders, even other Polynesians. One of Bligh's crew was killed by natives as they tried to land on the island of Tofua.

Captain Bligh's South Pacific voyage

It is unlikely that Bligh, even had he possessed the philosophic temperament to reflect on the rapidity of his fall from power, would have had much opportunity to brood over the desperation of his situation. The day-to-day struggle for survival supplanted all other considerations. It is ironic—how strange and variable is Fate!—that the personal qualities that so disadvantaged him as captain of the Bounty now proved to be invaluable in preserving his and his men's lives. Survival in the boat now called for parsimony, iron discipline, seamanship, and the ability to block out the true desperation of the situation; these were qualities that Bligh possessed in abundance. So men's faults in one setting may be virtues in another.

He instituted a strict rationing policy from which he never deviated; he occupied his men's minds so as to prevent despair from taking hold of them; and he developed a creative method of ensuring fairness in the allotment of rations. In his published account of the ordeal, Bligh emerges as something of a mother hen to his men, apportioning out teaspoons of rum, bread, and raw bird flesh with soothing regularity. Under his tutelage, his men remained British seamen, rather than a starving collection of skeletons. Baked by the unrelenting sun, buffeted by waves and storms, and denied food and water, they maintained their cohesion and discipline in the face of the most miserable conditions imaginable.

"The sea flew over us with great force, and kept us bailing with horror and anxiety," he later wrote. Incredibly, Bligh even managed to record topographic data along the way regarding the islands, currents, depths, and wind conditions he encountered en route. And he lost not one single man. It was a feat of incredible resourcefulness and willpower, never equaled in the turbulent annals of maritime history. He and his men reached Timor, in a state of near collapse. Bligh comments on the event in his usual deadpan manner:

> Thus, through the assistance of Divine Providence, we surmounted the difficulties and distresses of a most perilous voyage, and arrived safe in a hospitable port, where every necessary and comfort were administered to us with a most liberal hand.[3]

One day, we may be a captain, controlling our destiny. The next day, we may find ourselves adrift on the open sea with scarcely a prayer. Plutarch reminds us of this truth:

> Perhaps…there exists a divinity whose role it is to diminish our prosperity, whenever it becomes exceedingly great, and add complexity to a mortal's life, so that it is not unmixed with evils or left altogether free from misfortune, so that instead, as Homer says, they seem to fare best whose fortunes tip the scales now in one direction, now in the other.[4]

I have come to accept the truth of this view. It is well for us to remain suspicious of Fortune and her wily ways. She never really bestows her blessings on us without some condition of future repayment in kind. The wise and prudent man will accept the blessings of life without undue exuberance or frivolity; for he remains keenly aware that what is certain today may dissolve into the swirling fog of memory tomorrow. He will, like Bligh, learn to bear these calamities with a grim determination that never permits the indulgence of self-pity. All that remain for us are the virtues that contribute to our endurance of these cruel vagaries.

---

[1] Scott-Kilvert, Ian et al., The Rise of Rome: Twelve Lives by Plutarch, London: The Penguin Group (2013), p. 571.

[2] Bligh, William, The Mutiny On Board H.M.S. Bounty, New York: Airmont Publishing Co. (1965), p. 117.

[3] Id., p. 172.

[4] Scott-Kilvert, supra, p. 578.

Read More: Every Man Has A Breaking Point

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

How To Pick The Perfect Pair Of Jeans

September 22, 2014 | by KK. | Link | Original Link

Losing a good pair of jeans is a disaster for even the toughest man. You've worn them everywhere, they've been with you through the trials and tribulations of life—and, most important of all, they've made you look elegant and "just right." Just because your legendary pair of denims has become a casualty of the washing machine wars, you shouldn't be afraid of searching out the next pair.

This guide on things to do and not to do in choosing jeans will put you on track for success without all the stresses of the stores' fitting rooms. Before you start…

Match your purchase to your purpose

This seems obvious, but think about your reason for buying the jeans. If you want dressy jeans for work ,they will be totally different from those you want for Friday night wear. Likewise, for summer you will opt for lighter styles as opposed to heavier denims that are meant for the winter cold.

Check your size

Be sure that you know your size. If you have a cupboard full of jeans, you'll have a better idea of your size than if you only wear jeans occasionally. It's useful to remember that jeans stretch over time, so don't be surprised if a brand new "size 32" seems smaller than your last pair.

Measuring for size

Inside leg:

All leg lengths for jeans are based on the inside leg measurement. Measure from between your legs to the ground.

Waist:

Measure around the narrowest part of your waist, above the hips and under the ribcage—and don't breathe in while you're doing it!

Gentlemen, know your shape!

It's generally true that a good pair of jeans depends on the choice of cut. And that choice depends on your shape. Don't choose a "legend of rock" cut if you are built like a rugby player. Consider these possibilities…

Straight or regular

Discreet and neither baggy nor slim, this cut is simple, classic, and tends to suit most people.

Good labels for the straight cut are: Armani Jeans, Levi, Diesel, Boss Orange and Paul Smith.

Flared

A good option for most body shapes, this cut balances the body, being straight and tight from the waist to the base of the calf and then flared to the ankle.

The flared style appears to lengthen the leg and goes well over boots and larger shoes.

Good labels for the flared cut are: Levi and Diesel.

Slim

Slim jeans are flattering, trendy and give the rock-star look. They fall straight from hip to ankle and therefore look better on more slender bodies. How do you look in slim jeans? Only you can answer that…or maybe one of your friends!

Good labels for the slim cut are: Levi and PRPS

Conical

Conical jeans are wider around the thighs, but tighter towards the middle to create a slimmer effect in the lower legs. It’s the best cut for smaller, slender bodies and cut to fit the thigh better than slim jeans, making it a more relaxed style.

Good labels for the conical cut are: Diesel, G-Star, and Goi-Goi.

Easy or relaxed fit

These are jeans with a generous fit from waist to hem and are flattering for most bodies because they don’t accentuate awful bumps and curves. Avoid these jeans if you are one of the lucky one with slim legs; you will look better in slim or straight cut.

Good labels for the relaxed cut are: Firetrap, Levi, G-Star and True Religion.

Take a plunge into the world of “washed” jeans:

The “wash” creates the style and character of the jeans, so be aware of the three main types …

Vintage wash

These are specially treated to create the worn look that you would get after several years of hard wear.

Stone wash

This traditional wash is achieved by adding stones to the denim during washing. The stones tenderize the fibers, making them appear soft and worn. A more modern method is to create the same effect using chemicals.

Dirty wash

A method used to make jeans look really worn, the dirty wash often adds touches of yellow or brown.

Advice:

Washed jeans are fine for casual wear, but every man should have in his wardrobe at least one pair of dark blue jeans to achieve a more stylish look for dressier occasions.

Find the right “waist height”

Nearly as important as shape is the waist height, or “rise”—that is, the distance between the crotch and the waistband of the jeans.

Low rise:

This is generally a comfortable cut that sits a few centimeters below the navel.

High rise:

A good option for hiding excess weight, but beware, it doesn’t give you an excuse not to exercise.

Medium rise:

Somewhere between the previous two, this cut is very popular. It neither hides your stomach nor lets it hang out.

Follow your instinct when you buy a pair of jeans; you’ll know, deep down, whether or not a particular style is for you.

And finally…

Keep your new “favorite” pair in good condition for as long as possible with these simple tips:

- Wash your jeans inside out with the zipper firmly closed
- Don’t wash them too often: every two weeks will do and will prevent discoloration and also reduce the impact on the environment
- Set the wash temperature at 30 degrees Celsius (86 F)—again, to slow down discoloration (and climate change)
- Avoid the clothes dryer; dry jeans in the open air
- Read the label inside the jeans for any special directions

Until next time.

Read Next: Here Is What You Should (And Shouldn’t) Do When Buying A New Suit

KK.
Kamal is a French Blogger, Stylist and Founder of Glamorous Pochette : Perfectly unique & exquisite pocket squares cut from superior Moroccan silk.

5 Reasons Not To Commit To Your Foreign Girlfriend

September 23, 2014 | by jim soler | Link | Original Link

It’s no secret that American men have become crazy about foreign women. Given our options, we have little choice but to look outside of our own culture. This is a growing trend and will continue for the forseeable future. Even the ones that haven’t crossed the picket line and ventured into the exotic definitely fantasize about being with a foreign women—I can see it in their eyes when I am out with my girl.

I can’t blame them. Foreign women are wonderful creatures and possess all of the characteristics that we yearn for in our American women. For the most part, women from Asia and Latin America are caring, intelligent, cultured, mature, and surprisingly much more independent than they are given credit for.

While I would argue that the international ladies are superior in so many ways to our own, that doesn’t imply that they are all nice girls deep down inside. On average, a foreign women is more likely to be the type of women that all of guys are looking for. However, at the end of the day, A WOMAN IS A WOMAN. You may have that pretty Asian or Latina girlfriend as you read this, and sure it’s ok to string her along and have fun in the sack, but take a step back before you commit.

Trust me, I’m just speaking from experience. I’ve been in the international game for over thirteen years. I’ve seen it all. I’ve been with nice ones, cute ones, and ones so hot they twist the necks of every man in the bar. You may think that your foreign honey is sweet and wonderful, but here are five signs that should stop you from committing:

1. She is ashamed of her culture and wants to be American

This one may be hard to believe, but these girls are out there and they definitely have a screw or two loose in their heads. If your girl is ashamed of her own culture and tries desperately to be like an American or Western girl, then you should be alarmed. The main advantage of being with a foreign woman is that she brings her own Japanese, Korean, Colombian, Chilean or whatever culture to the table. That is what makes her interesting, cultured, mature, and loyal. Girls that seem ashamed of their own culture or are slow to share cultural aspects such as food, customs, and traditions are hiding something. It's likely that they are social outcasts in their own cultures and are seeking to reinvent themselves in America. Screw that shit, playa. Trust me, you want a girl who is confident in who she is.

2. She is obsessed with English

This is related to the first one. Do you sometimes feel like you are teaching English? Does your girl constantly ask you questions about English, obsess with learning it and act as if it is the most important thing in the world? On top of that, is she hesitant about teaching you her own language and feels that it's not important for you to learn it? If so, you might want to start looking for another lady.

Don't get me wrong, it's vital that your girl learns English. This is even more true if you're going to settle down in America. However, you shouldn't feel like she is using you to learn English. I am not saying you have to become fluent in her langauge, but international relationships always work better when each person has at least some knowledge of the other's language. Remember, understanding her language is also understanding her culture. Besides, you don't want to be the dumbass American guy when it's time to meet her parents.

3. She has a lot of Western guy "friends"

Remember, a woman is a woman and it doesn't matter where she is from. All this "he is just my friend" bullshit is destroying or preventing relationships all over the globe. Don't get me wrong—being a jealous guy is the not the way to go either and it's perfectly understandable if your girl has male friends from her own country. That is expected. But if she is the kind of girl who is always going to "language exchanges" or if she has a bunch of other American guys posting on her Facebook, then something is wrong. She might have you believe that she is only being sociable, but she knows what she is doing.

4. She often posts sexy pics of herself on Facebook

I've seen a lot of American guys out there engaged to some hot Asian or Latina honey that loves all the attention on Facebook. I know because I see them posting all kinds of relationship-shattering pics on my own Facebook feed. Look, if your is lady is a confident and loyal woman, she's not going to be posting pictures of herself half-naked on Facebook so a bunch of perverted American swinging dicks can post comments and jerk off. Enough said.

5. She seems to have a secret past

If things don’t seem to add up about your girl or she is unclear about her past, then you definitely should start running. Of course this is a no-brainer, but remember that people sometimes attempt a new beginning when they come to America or when they hook up with someone from another country. Of course, everyone is entitled to a second chance in life. I’m currently on my third or fourth, but if she is just vague and reluctant to talk about the past, something is just off. There is some serious baggage that you don’t want to deal with and will eventually come out to wreak havoc after you marry the girl.

Now fellows, don’t let my advice deter you from pursuing a relationship with a foreign woman, because you will find no bigger fan of international ladies then myself. I am just reminding you to be careful and, as you would with any other woman, think with your mind rather than your dick.

Read More: 5 Tips For Getting A Quality Foreign Woman

---

jim soler
Jim is a traveler and freelance writer that has lived in many countries and currently is traveling the world. He enjoys interacting with different cultures and stirring up interesting conversations.

Lessons About Modern Culture From George Orwell

September 23, 2014 | by Jon Socrates | Link | Original Link

Russia has invaded Ukraine, racial tensions are flaring up here in the States, and the Middle East is even more violent and pissed off than usual. Some have even speculated that World War III is becoming likelier. As Lewis Black said of the 21st century, "This is the 20th century […] all over again, only this time it's in high-definition." At home and abroad, nationalist sentiments are intensifying. For better or worse, they threaten to destabilize the current world order. More importantly, nationalist sentiments play out in people's everyday lives, quietly affecting how they think and often subverting objectivity and reason.

In light of recent events, George Orwell's essay "Notes on Nationalism" merits review. I encourage you to read the whole thing. It's a relatively brief essay, and you can read it for free here.

What is Nationalism?

Orwell uses the term "nationalism" as the word that best describes a broader psychological phenomenon. He states that:

> "By 'nationalism' I mean […] the habit of identifying oneself with a single nation or other unit, placing it beyond good and evil and recognising no other duty than that of advancing its interests. Nationalism is not to be confused with patriotism. […] Patriotism is of its nature defensive, both militarily and culturally. Nationalism, on the other hand, is inseparable from the desire for power. The abiding purpose of every nationalist is to secure more power and more prestige, not for himself but for the nation or other unit in which he has chosen to sink his own individuality."

More succinctly, he defines nationalism as "power-hunger tempered by self-deception."

Characteristics of Nationalism

Orwell notes that nationalist thought is characterized by obsession, instability, and indifference to reality. Nationalists often can't tell the difference between assumptions and inferences. Nationalists are prone to confirmation bias, and sometimes even hold mutually contradictory beliefs. An example of this is the anti-Semite who accuses Jews of controlling Hollywood, the news media, and banks in order to accumulate vast amounts of power and wealth for themselves, while he also accuses them of promoting a communist agenda (which innately opposes large disparities of wealth).

Kinds of Nationalism

Orwell identifies three kinds of nationalism—Positive, Negative, and Transferred.

Positive nationalism is positive not because it is necessarily good, but because it's for something. An example of this is white nationalism—a set of feelings about the superiority of whites and a desire for their advancement over other races. The particularities of those other races are not so important to the white nationalist. Whether the other race is black, hispanic, or Martian, the white nationalist believes he and his race are superior and should be in charge.

Negative nationalism is the opposite of positive nationalism. It is not negative because it is necessarily bad, but because it's against something. An example of this is anti-Semitism. Anti-Semitism naturally aligns with white (or some other non-Semitic) nationalism, but it is essentially an attitude about Jews. For example, consider a man with a white father and a black mother. If he has healthy, loving relationships with both sides of his family, we would expect him to be neither a white nationalist nor a black nationalist. And yet, this man could also be an anti-Semite.

Lastly, transferred nationalism has traits of both positive and negative nationalism. Transferred nationalism is distinguished by the nationalist having a disdain for his own native culture or social authority, leading him to transfer positive nationalist sentiments to a foreign entity. Orwell's example of this is the English Russophiles, Englishmen who despised their English heritage and deified the Soviet Union, despite having never traveled there and despite the atrocities committed by Stalin's regime, which Russophiles ignored or denied.

A modern example of transferred nationalism is the cluster of sentiments espoused by Guilty White Liberals. Having a general distrust of authority and white American culture (perhaps due to estrangement from their fathers), GWLs become personally, emotionally invested in groups to which they do not belong, such as minority races, gays, and even animals. GWLs do not just oppose what they perceive to be injustice for the sake of justice itself. Instead, they feel personally involved with whatever struggle they attach themselves to. Whites are not innately insulted by the use of racial epithets against minorities, and yet GWLs will consider themselves personally offended when hearing them.

This is totally not about attention whoring or self-aggrandizement—because reasons.

GWLs also exhibit the instability of transferred nationalism as described by Orwell. The GWL flits from cause to cause, crusading against whatever "oppression" is currently trending in liberal discourse. Ultimately, though, most GWLs are hypocritical frauds. Just as the English Russophiles never actually moved to Russia, GWLs don't elect to live in ghettos. Many decry the plight of black youth, but relatively few volunteer to be mentors. Many bitch about the unfairness of capitalism, but freely embrace the excesses of materialism. As Orwell said, "Transferred nationalism, like the use of scapegoats, is a way of attaining salvation without altering one's conduct."

Nationalism in Culture

Nationalism is a powerful force in organizing people into groups because it makes members feel as if their personal interests and those of the group are congruent, even when this is objectively untrue. Here are some of the ways this is manifested in culture:

Sports Fandom

A mundane form of nationalism is the devotion some fans have to a particular sports team. It would be perfectly reasonable for a man to feel good when the Green Bay Packers win, so long as he stands to win money from a bet, or if his son is a member of the team. A lover of football could even appreciate the execution of complicated plays, or the drama of a game-determining struggle. However, to otherwise feel personally increased or decreased by a team's victory or defeat is irrational, the height of such nonsense being found in hooliganism.

Race and Justice

Unfortunately, nationalism can lead to controversies and conflicts, putting justice and peace at risk. The recent shooting of Michael Brown and the subsequent unrest illustrate how potent nationalist tendencies can be, precisely because nationalist sentiments exist before reason, leading people to select and interpret evidence that fits what they already believe to be true. As Anonymous Cop points out in his article, the media immediately branded Michael Brown as an "unarmed black teenager" shot by a white police officer, which fit nicely into a narrative about power and authority that some people already believe. Thus, the barest details of the incident immediately prompted not just suspicions, but conclusions. Accordingly, the following people believed the corresponding statements to be true:

> The white nationalist: The police officer was justified in shooting and killing Michael Brown.
>
> The GWL and the black nationalist: The police officer was not justified in shooting and killing Michael Brown.
>
> A reasonable, neutral person: A policeman shooting and killing an unarmed person is serious. We should investigate this and see what the facts say.

Nationalism involves feelings of superiority, and GWLs and black nationalists have convinced themselves that blacks are victims and are therefore morally superior to whites, the oppressors. This is why GWLs and black nationalists respond so angrily to anyone who asserts that whites are oppressed. Over the past few weeks the GWLs and black nationalists have invoked past allegations of racism as evidence that the death of Michael Brown is just one more murder in a pattern of racist police brutality. However, such a pattern, if it exists, would at most warrant suspicion of Officer Wilson's motivations. Ultimately, the sins of other officers do not prove that Officer Wilson acted similarly, and to believe so is to claim guilt by association. Citing past racism proves nothing, but for GWLs and black nationalists, it serves to justify what they already believe.

Modern Feminism

“Meine schadenfreude macht mich frei”

Modern feminism fits Orwell’s succinct definition of nationalism—“power-hunger tempered by self-deception.” These feminists have prioritized the interest of women over those of men, children, and society. More than that, they seek to control men, children, and society in order to advance those interests. These feminists obsessively view everything through their narrative of victimization, and many of their beliefs are hypocritical, changing whenever it suits them.

In their minds, men are essentially bad, women are essentially good, and when conflicts arise between a man and a woman, the modern feminist can only take pleasure from the woman winning some advantage over the man. Contrary to their rhetoric, feminists have sought to advance the interests of women not through genuine equality, but by any means necessary.

Final Thoughts

Toward the end of his essay, Orwell makes sure to point out that nationalism is not always or necessarily bad. However, nationalism is a very powerful and potentially dangerous force, and everyone is susceptible to it. The first danger of nationalism comes from its subtlety, the way it can lead to biases and irrational assumptions and cause people to dismiss or become indifferent to reality. The second danger of nationalism is that it compels people to act, and history attests to the results. For Orwell, struggling against nationalistic impulses is a moral effort. Understanding nationalism will help you better understand society and culture. More than that, understanding nationalism will help you free your mind and better know yourself.

Read More: The Playboy Interview With George Carlin

Jon Socrates

Jon finds purpose in the cultivation of wisdom, strength, and manly virtue.

The Manipulated Man: A Holy Bible Of Red Pill Wisdom

September 23, 2014 | by Thomas More | Link | Original Link

For anyone who is familiar with great literature from the Manosphere, the following book and author needs no introduction. Nonetheless, I am going to try:

Who is Esther Vilar?

Esther Vilar was born Esther Margareta Katzen on September 16, 1935 in Buenos Aires, Argentina. She trained and practised as a medical doctor before establishing herself as an author. In 1960 Vilar went to West Germany on scholarship to continue her studies in psychology and sociology. She worked as a doctor in a Bavarian hospital for a year, and had held previous jobs as a translator, saleswoman, assembly line worker in a thermometer factory, shoe model, and secretary.

In 1971 Vilar wrote the book The Manipulated Man, originally published in Germany under the title Der Dressierte Mann. The idea behind the book is that women are not oppressed by men, but rather men are controlled by women, an idea that has been bucking the politically correct ideologies of the West since the book's first publication. There have been brutally honest writings about females dating back as far as biblical times, but Vilar's book should be considered the earliest of sacred scrolls of 20th (and 21st) Century red pill wisdom. The author has managed to effectively anger all feminists worldwide, and she continues receiving death threats to this day.

The book asserts that women have a level of control of men that most men are not aware of, or most likely do not want to admit. The basic tactics outlined include:

• Duping men with sex
• Administering meaningless praise to control men
• Using emotional blackmail
• Propagating the myths of love and romance as a guise to mask her real intentions and motives

Her book is one bitter red pill to swallow, as it prompts a man to reconsider not only why the hell he should bother with marriage in the first place, but also his purpose in life and society. She also feels that man desires to be enslaved via getting hitched at the altar, which has more to do with influences from parental upbringing as well as the zeitgeist. To quote Vilar:

> “If a young man gets married, and starts a family and spends the rest of his life working at a soul-destroying job, he is held up as an example of virtue and responsibility. The other type of man, living only for himself, working only for himself, doing first one thing and then another simply because he enjoys it and because he has to keep only himself, sleeping where and when he wants, and facing woman when he meets her on equal terms and not as one of a million slaves, is rejected by society. The free, unshackled man has no place in its midst.”

Thug-loving is not mentioned in the book, due to such tendencies in women likely occurring infrequently in 1970’s Germany. However, things have continued in the above vein: women will publicly praise a married man in front of her friends and family while secretly she’ll give herself to a violent asshole who gives her the kind of mental and physical abuse she desires. Today’s women are broken, yet they are spreading their legs and shitting out the bastard kids of losers who do nothing for society. Decent men have the same effect on women that daylight has on Dracula.

One common question that gets asked: If men are being manipulated by women via sex, then what about women's sexuality? Vilar asserts:

> "A woman will certainly feel happy when she has an orgasm – but it is not the most intense pleasure she knows. A cocktail party, or buying a new pair of aubergine-colored patent-leather boots, rates far higher."

And therein lies the difference between men and women. It is no secret that in any arena that the guy with the gram of coke leaves with the hottest scag in the social gathering, while Mr. works-out-at-the-gym-and-knows-game observes this, scratches his head and wonders what is going on.

For quite some time just after the 1970's American feminazi wave, many men assumed the behaviors we experienced in our women were limited to the borders of the USA.

Today it is painfully obvious that is not the case, although Esther Vilar already knew that underneath it all, women were all the same:

> "The American woman is no worse than other women. She is only ahead of them all. Her unscrupulous tactics for exploitation would not be so dangerous if they were not constantly idealized by a powerful TV and film industry. As the latter creates the image of Western woman, her behavior is being copied, and as her standard of living is constantly raised, the fate of her husband automatically becomes the fate of men in other countries."

Enjoy her…fuck her….but don't let her play you for a sucker:

No man will ever be loved or cared about as a human being by a woman, ever. It was once said that women are not good nor bad, they just are. And for philosophical perspectives perhaps that is true. One cannot blame a wolf for being a wolf, it's simply nature; and it behooves us to be aware of the true nature of women. The flaw may very well lie in men as it would appear that we have been handed down a congenital defect in our brains, or perhaps this is all one big joke played on us by the cosmos or evolutionary biology; in that men desire something that does not care for us outside of tangible resources.

It is quite intriguing what she stated decades ago is very similar to this current state of affairs:

> "Only woman can break the vicious circle of man's manipulation and exploitation – but she will not do it. There is absolutely no compelling reason why she should. It is useless to appeal to her feelings, for she is callous and knows no pity. And so the world will go on, sinking deeper and deeper into this morass of kitsch, > barbarism, and inanity called femininity. And man, that wonderful dreamer, will never awaken from his dream.”

Now we are at third wave feminism, and the situation has gotten to such extremes that a man will kill his own brother for a mere whiff of a woman’s vagina. There’s no telling where it will all lead, but one prediction comes from the author of the Misandry Bubble, who is forecasting some kind of awareness or paradigm shift by 2020. We’ll have to wait and see if that prediction comes to fruition.

For those of you who are already unplugged, The Manipulated Man may not tell you anything new. That said, I would still recommend getting a copy for the same reason any man who is religious would have a copy of his doctrine. At the very least you will find it interesting just how many of Esther Vilar’s assertions and predictions ring true today. Get your copy now from amazon by clicking here.

Read More: Red Pill Wisdom From Patrice O’Neal

Thomas More

Thomas More is an American expat who has taken the road less traveled, and to quote the poet Robert Frost, "that has made all the difference". He shares his impressions and thoughts of interest with other men making their way through the Western world.

How To Tell If A Girl Is On The Pill

September 23, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

The hormonal pill works by tricking the female body into thinking it's pregnant and stopping the release of an egg each month. This produces certain subtle side effects that are probably all but invisible to a layman, but to the trained eye become increasingly obvious. I actually dislike the feel of a girl on the pill, because to me she seems fake. Such is the burden of knowledge, but better to be wise than live in ignorance.

The caveat here, is that obviously it's not going to be 100% effective in cases where she has been on the pill for some time and she's "forgotten" to take it just recently, or her doctor has told her to stop taking it and she's "forgotten" to tell you. For the purposes of this article we'll give the bitches the benefit of the doubt, as that is not the subject we are discussing.

Any man whose known the girl for some time, should be able to spot the side effects wearing off, and since pregnancy is far from a one shot deal every time, it might save the odd fella from being hoodwinked. At the very least you will be able to spot an outright lie, where she's not taken the pill in a significant amount of time, or has never taken it at all, and announces that she's "on the pill." It might also put pay to the odd career bitch who promises the father to be that she's ready for a kid, but carries on climbing the corporate ladder (and sleeping with the boss).

What To Look For

Fluid retention is a well-documented side effect of both the pill and pregnancy, but of course this blanket term gives us little to actually go on. She's not going to have swollen ankles like an 85-year-old grandma with jetlag—and the term itself is misleading, because the physiological effects don't appear exactly as you might expect. It's a question of careful observation and practice. Those of you who have trained in an analytical science will probably find it easier to hit the nail on the head right away, but anyone can do it.

The traits we want to pinpoint are a combination of three basic factors rolled into one, caused by the unnatural hormonal misbalance and the fluid retention. The fluid is largely held in the lymphatic system and causes a tension in the body's tissues. It's most easily spotted in larger and softer areas, such as the thighs, buttocks, breasts, and to a lesser extent in the arms. Certainly touching a girl on her bicep can give you a pretty good indication, especially if she is more prone to side effects, but generally once you clap your hands on her naked ass, and stroke her thighs, you will know right away if she is on the pill. With a little practice it's like spotting the difference between a dog and a cat.

In a nutshell the buttocks and thighs will feel more taught. A layman can easily glance over it as nothing, (especially as he's now hypnotized by the access to her pussy that is going to ensue shortly), but with a little experience of girls who are not on the pill, the difference becomes so obvious she might as well have a red hat on. The fluid retention also causes the skin to become drier and tighter. Thus her skin will feel more papery and tight, as opposed to naturally soft and supple. Think a Dove add, verses a paper bag blown up full of air.

The female lacks a couple of hard dry outer layers of skin that males have, and thus once on the pill, her soft supple skin will feel slightly more coarse due to dryness, and tightness caused by the fluid retention in the tissues below. As I mentioned, the thighs and buttocks are the most obvious areas and in the beginning you'll know it best by touch.

Later you'll glance across the pool and be able to see that hottie in a bikini ought to reconsider her birth control options, because her ass is tight like a balloon. In addition to a slightly drier, "pulled tight" and more raspy skin (all very subtle), her buttocks and thighs to touch will feel very full and tight. If you try to squeeze her ass for example, especially when you have her naked, it will be like squeezing a fake breast, as opposed to a real one. Her muscle tissues are retaining fluid and thus don't have that soft, loose, marshmallow-like texture to them. Think of an air cushion verses a foam cushion. The effect and look is similar, but the air cushion is far less forgiving to the touch due to being pressurized from within.

I hope this gives you something to work with. It's always good to be able to appraise your surroundings and observe to gather information. You glance around the room and, provided the skirts are short enough, you will be able to pick who is on the pill or not. Even on sites like Tinder, with practice (and the right photo), you should be able to see the pill-users verses the non-pill users. In a sense it's almost as if her ass and thighs have been airbrushed.

Since a large majority of young women in the developed world are on the pill, the best way to learn this skill is simply by finding girls that are not on the pill and asking to squeeze their naked ass—for the cheeky players amongst you, it might even make a good pickup routine. I slept with the very first and very last image, so I can be sure of my facts.

No Pill (Soft and Natural)

Smoother, oilier more supple skin, soft forgiving muscle tissue, heaven to touch.

With Pill (Taught and Papery)

1. Tighter Appearance
2. Papery to touch
3. Harder and "pressurized" feel to muscles beneath.

A bit fake, once you've tasted the real thing. It's a bit like comparing Kraft packet cheese to a hand made, artisanal product. The imperfections are more obvious, but the quality and texture is miles apart.

Read More: What I Learned From A Weekend Of Forgetting The Red Pill

You Will Always Face Criticism

September 24, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

One of the drawbacks of life is that wherever you go, and whatever you do, there is always someone who will be critical of you. It would appear that this is an immutable law of human existence. It applies from when we are very young, and are subject to unkind words or bullying in the school playground, to when we are adults and people are ready to take issue with our appearance, our personal choices, or our work. It is the measure of a man how well he is able to deal with these negative voices and to continue on his course anyway.

I recently attended a UK fiction writer's convention. There were a lot of industry professionals there—literary agents, publishing editors, and so on. The delegates were aspiring authors from all over the UK. As you might imagine, this self-selecting group included many who could politely be described as eccentric—a few cute girls, yes, but also a legion of post-wall human bomb-sites trying to peddle memoirs about their boring lives; and blank-eyed, clinically-insane men who bellowed inanities at no-one in particular through their spittle-flecked beards.

But I digress.

A dispiriting aspect of any kind of writing (and fiction writing in particular), is that it is a very subjective business. Every week, I get comments on my Return of Kings articles that are highly complementary, and comments that are critical of my point of view or choice of subject matter or whatever. Opinions, it has been said, are like assholes—everybody has one.

Most of the attendees at the convention had written novels and were looking for critical feedback with a view to getting a publishing deal. And let me tell you, there is nothing more depressing than sitting down with someone to discuss your 80,000 word manuscript for them to say that, in their opinion, you should have made someone else the main character, and therefore the whole thing will need to be re-written. “I think you should have done it like this,” and “You’ve still got a lot of work to do” are phrases guaranteed to strike grey gloom into the breast of anyone who’s spent two years or more working on a book.

But these are merely opinions. Publishers and the public alike are just human beings. Many of the delegates I spoke to at the conference were looking for a magic bullet, for a secret, for someone to tell them how to make their book perfect and sellable. But no such advice exists, because once you’ve acquired minimum entry-level talent, there is no definitive consensus among readers about what is good or bad. I have received wildly different feedback on the same manuscript from different readers. And there are published books that obviously went through an editing process that I think are terrible, while others think they are great. Who’s right? Maybe we both are.

What we should do, I found myself saying to people that weekend, is to consider any constructive criticism carefully, make our books as good as we possibly can to our own standards, and then send them out to one hundred agents and publishers each. Given that individual taste is unpredictable, by approaching a large number of people we would give ourselves the best possible chance of finding someone with whom our work resonated. After all, it’s been said that you only need one yes to make a career, and a few yeses to make a whole life.

I hope the wider relevance of this is becoming clear. There will always be someone who will be critical of you. I have been insulted by girls, sneered at, laughed at, given the cold shoulder—but I have also slept with a good many who were hotter. I have been criticized by malevolent employers, only to be praised to the heavens by others. I have been disliked and disparaged by some, and I’ve been thought good company and charismatic by others.

Criticism, when it is constructive, can be very valuable. But all too often it is a weapon used by those who are jealous of us or insecure in themselves to limit our potential by making us doubt ourselves. This is compounded by the fact that human beings seem programmed to most desire those options least open to us. So if a girl rejects a guy he wants her more. If a company won’t employ him, he beats himself up for losing out on his dream job. This is no good for anyone.

It’s a truism, but you can’t please everyone all the time. As you go through life you will receive negative feedback. You will encounter people who don’t like you or your work. This is normal. But rather than trying to court those people, why not make yourself and what you have to offer as good as you possibly can, then spread your net wider and seek out those who are more readily receptive? These are the people that will support you and make your life fulfilling and prosperous. Never be afraid they are not out there—remember, the world is a very big place indeed.

To find out how to live up to your potential and attract beautiful women at the same time click here.

Read More: Why Would A PUA Get Married? An Interview With Paul Janka

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Determining The Value Of Intangible Benefits

September 24, 2014 | by Erik Fomorian | Link | Original Link

How do smartphone manufacturers convince customers to buy their products instead of the identical products of their competitors? How do universities convince students to attend their classes when cheaper schools abound? How does the military retain troops when safer, better paying careers exist? The answer to all these questions is with the marketing of “intangible benefits.”

Intangible benefits are the things we cannot assign numerical value to. They are how Android and iPhone, Xbox and PlayStation, Coke and Pepsi prey on the brand loyalty born from your cognitive biases. They are what convince thousands of teenagers every year to begin their adult lives with student loans. They keep brave people risking their lives in the military of an untrustworthy government. They are the ideals for which we trick ourselves into sacrificing more than we believe to be worth.

These benefits cost nothing to offer, and gimmicky marketing will have you assigning excessive worth to them. Maybe some intangibles really do hold value, but you must learn how to assign appropriate value to them as an individual. I’ll share some personal examples of when intangible benefits were thrown in my face, and how I assigned value to them.

The Military

The U.S. military is paradoxical in their policies on retention, at least from what I have seen. Despite many initiatives to reduce manpower because of budget cuts, the personnel section of my base put on a dog and pony show to convince us troops within a year of separation that the military was the best decision we'd ever made and getting out was the dumbest thing we could ever do.

After the speakers fed us some suspicious facts about how awesome our salaries and benefits were, the presentation attempted to tug at our heart strings. Several slides were dedicated to "intangible benefits." From what I remember, the benefits were patriotism, being part of something larger than ourselves, camaraderie, and job stability. Although everyone will assign different value to different things based on what's important to them, the thought process in deciding how much value should be logical and without emotion.

First, there was patriotism. You would think military personnel would be brimming with this virtue, but you'd be wrong. In fact, many people join the military because they don't know what else to do with their lives. After their first contract is up, they decide to reenlist because it's the only thing they know, not because of patriotism. Then there are the people who joined mainly for the educational benefits. In most cases, three years of service grants the member full GI Bill benefits; enough to earn an undergraduate practically for free. To these people, patriotism means very little. Not that these men and women aren't patriotic, but the intangible benefit of continued service to their country is of little value to them and thus not enough to keep them in.

Then there was "being part of something bigger than yourself." I used to believe this one, but after my first year of service, I realized it was just as dog-eat-dog as anywhere else. This also goes with camaraderie. I don't doubt that these feelings exist in some units, but it was completely absent in mine, and many of my friends say the same about their units. To us, this intangible benefit was completely worthless. However, I have met many veterans who truly felt like the men in their units were their brothers. Many of these people reenlisted solely for that reason. To them, this intangible benefit was worth the sacrifice of their time and safety.

Finally, there was job stability. My career field was law enforcement, not the most in-demand skill, but finding a job in the civilian sector wouldn't have been too difficult. Furthermore, I wanted to completely separate from my career field and go into an unrelated industry. To me, this benefit was also worthless. Not only could I find an identical job for better pay on the outside, I didn't want to. There are, however, people that would put more stock into this intangible. Anything in the combat arms realm would be hard to find on the civilian side, so special-ops, infantrymen, artillerymen, and the like would find the intangible benefit of job stability to be worth more than I would.

For me, all these intangibles were just hoorah bullshit. Despite this, I watched many of my friends who shared the exact same feelings and goals as me get swept up in the patriotism, or scared off by the supposed lack of job stability on the outside. They assigned values to these benefits that were incongruent with their personal desires, subsequently promising another four years of their life to the military.

College

I'm into my first semester and I'm shocked at how much value my fellow students put into the intangible benefits colleges like to sell. Our first discussion in English class was a lively chat about how awesome these benefits are. According to one student, possessing a degree shows an employer you're teachable. Another student said that a liberal arts degree won't lock you into one industry, but allow you the freedom to work wherever you want. There was the obligatory mention of finding oneself. One girl even said that college teaches life skills; that algebra teaches one how to balance a checkbook, and English teaches one how to send professional emails. All while the professor nodded her head in agreement.

First of all, these ideas are clearly asinine. I've never had to factor square roots while balancing a check book, and I don't think NASA is ready to hire a humanities major to fill their engineering vacancies. Secondly, the topic of the academic and professional merits of college has been addressed succinctly here and is beyond the scope of this article. I'm using these examples to show how organizations use non quantifiable benefits to sell their products.

A common intangible boasted by universities is the prestige that goes with their name. Big-name schools normally have higher tuition rates than commuter schools and community colleges. Whether or not the quality of education is any better is debatable, but the reason people are willing to pay such a high amount is for the intangible benefit of the school's name on their diploma. Sure, there are probably some advantages to attending bigger name schools, but herein lies the point: Are these advantages worth the substantially greater sacrifices to you?

Conclusion

The most important thing to remember about intangible benefits is that they cost nothing to offer. The prices set on acquiring these benefits are usually set by the perceived value society awards them. Even though I wrote mostly about two specific areas of life (the ones I'm most familiar with), the concept can be applied to many different areas of life. A soul sucking relationship might seem worth sticking with because you've been conditioned to believe companionship is irreplaceable.

You might be tricked into being thankful for your dead end job because you've been conditioned to believe there's no work anywhere else. Expensive name brand products may seem worth the extra cash compared to identical generic products because you've been conditioned to believe brand names equal quality. The list goes on, and I'm not trying to tell you to only buy knock off brands and quit your job. I am trying to tell you, however, to ask yourself if the sacrifices you make are worth the benefits you receive, intangible or otherwise.

Read More: The Benefits Of Avoiding Fatherhood

Erik Fomorian
Erik is a disillusioned American veteran. Follow him on Twitter @eeDubbs.

Anatomy Of A Troll Job: The xoBang Gang And The Business Of Rage

September 25, 2014 | by Louie Grifon | Link | Original Link

Felicia Sullivan is a blogger, memoirist, and social media marketer. Though Felicia lives in New York, like me, and probably runs in the same techie-journo-bobo circles I do, I had never heard of her until one Wednesday last December, when she called me an ignorant, inbred troll.

That Wednesday was, on the surface, an unlikely day for Felicia to make my acquaintance. According to her Twitter account, she was on vacation in Australia. She seemed to be enjoying herself. At one point, she shared a set of pictures taken in Melbourne:

> ICYMI: I snapped a ton of photos of Melbourne, a city rich w/ great coffee, kind folks, graffiti art + amazing food: http://t.co/HAXXzqONps
>
> — Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 11, 2013

Later, she tweeted her plans to finance the purchase of a pony by selling internal organs of unspecified provenance:

> @that_lucie_girl @coreykindberg Need to get to work selling these organs to pay for my pony.
>
> — Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 11, 2013

At 10:25 PM EST, Felicia made a lighthearted crack about hypothermia:

> It suddenly occurs to me that I didn't leave New York with a winter jacket. I will probably die next week when I land at JFK.

> — Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 12, 2013

All was well; just another fab day in the life of a blogger-memoirist-marketing professional—until Trouble reared its 140-character head.

After joking about death by exposure, Felicia noticed some Twitter friends venting about a "sexist" article published recently on the internet, of all places. Though she identified herself as a feminist—in her Twitter bio, no less—Felicia had yet to view this particular instance of online sexism. Her curiosity was piqued.

Humdrum though it may seem, this was a pivotal moment for Felicia. She was in a foreign country, surrounded by people and places she might never see again. The sun was shining, the air was warm. Internet sexists weren't going anywhere; Felicia, however, was going back to New York in a few short days.

Felicia didn't need to look at the sexist article. Outside the narrow screens of her Apple devices, a wide world full of real people and real experiences beckoned. All she had to do was turn the power switch to "off."

Oh, but it's hard to say no:

> @Glambr @Medium Which piece? Can you send me a link. You know how I feel about sexism, or any -ism for that matter.
>
> — Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 12, 2013

With that tweet, Felicia departed on her journey across a sea of hurtful words. Of course, we already know how that story ends; you just had to wait for it…

…wait for it…

…wait f—

> WHAT IN THE FUCK IS THIS SEXIST NOISE? LIKE, IN THE FUCK. https://t.co/aq4m0ZDm1n
>
> — Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 12, 2013

The sexist article had so incensed Felicia that she couldn't help but send the tweet above: ALL CAPS, two "fuck"s, one allegation of sexism, and a hyperlink so that you can experience it too!

Think any of Felicia's four thousand nine hundred thirty six Twitter followers might've clicked that link?

Attention whores: take note.

"Would Bang" by Breadcrumb; originally published in "xoBang"

I've heard the hardest part of a creative venture is making anyone else care. But writing "xoBang: The Typists of xoJane, Ranked by Bangability"—the article that upset Felicia so—couldn't have been easier, and it sure made a lot of people care.

Frankly, when my friend "Breadcrumb" and I sat down to write the piece, we didn't have a plan, nor even a concept, and not much concern what the final product looked like. All we cared was that it would piss a lot of people off.

Now, anyone who's lived a day in his life knows the easiest people to piss off are women, and the surest way to piss them off is calling them "ugly." The only insult that approaches ugly is "slut," and that one has lately become a badge of honor.

As for our targets, we needed chicks with enough cachet to raise an e-lynch mob…but not so much cachet that they had better things to do than gnash and wail about us. So, girl bloggers.

Among girl blogs, xoJane's Selfie-In-Every-Post policy makes it uniquely convenient to judge the looks of the blog's writers. xoJane also has the virtue of being "surpassingly stupid," as we noted in xoBang, which lessened any pangs of conscience Breadcrumb and I experienced while criticizing the women responsible for it.

With targets acquired, it was only a matter of copy-pasting the photos of some recent xoJane contributors and writing down what we thought of their looks. As we went, we lumped the girls into three broad groups—"Would Bang," "Could Bang," and "Could Not Bang"—and arranged them within those groups in rough order of attractiveness. In our haste, some uggoes surely got classed among the hot chicks, and vice versa—making our ranking strictly accurate wasn't the point.

Sitting in Breadcrumb's living room, my fingers flew across the keyboard as he and I offered praise and shame for our subjects. More than once, we hearkened back to the vernacular of our high school hallways for just the right insult: ug-mug, f.u.p.a, fattitude. To expedite the writing process, we codified a few standard criticisms that applied to many xoJane contributors: slovenly attire; obsolescence (i.e., old age); willful disfigurement of self (i.e., pixie cuts, tattoos, fatness).

At the time, Breadcrumb was working on a series of drawings of obese women; he tossed a few of those together to create the art that accompanied the xoBang. Meanwhile, his girl fixed us a lasagna (scrumptious). Breadcrumb finished the drawings. We added them to the piece and hit publish. Not two hours after we began, our work was done.

For some initial traction, we tweeted the link to a few bloggers. Heartiste, arguably the most influential "Manosphere" blogger, retweeted it without comment.

Within an hour of publication, "xoBang: The Typists of xoJane, Ranked by Bangability," written by "Cornbread" (my pen name) and illustrated by "Breadcrumb," had 40 views. Not bad.

I thanked Breadcrumb and his girl for their hospitality and walked back to my apartment. It was the evening of Tuesday, December 10.

Throughout the day Wednesday, I watched the stats on our article creep up: 100 views, 200, then 400. Around 7 PM, we hit 800.

I texted Breadcrumb: "We're close."

"Any minute," he wrote back.

If 800 views in 24 hours doesn't sound like much, keep in mind that the author named "Cornbread" and the illustrator named "Breadcrumb" never existed before xoBang's publication. We invented those identities for this story. Before the article went live, no one ever heard of them. They had no platform from which to publicize their work. They had a strange little article calling a bunch of New York blogger chicks ugly, and literally nothing else to their names.

So what Cornbread and Breadcrumb needed was somebody to handle publicity for them. Heartiste's re-tweet helped. But to send their page views suborbital, they needed someone even bigger.

With the view counter holding steady around 800, I left for a dinner date. When we returned to my apartment, I checked Cornbread's email, which was synced to my own: three Twitter notifications. I read them one by one:

> @hicornbread that was pretty much the most revolting thing I've ever read. And I used to work for a vanity publisher.
>
> — Aly Walansky (@alywalansky) December 12, 2013

> @alywalansky @jessgoon Also, this guy's such a grade-A moron, he included Kristin Booker on the list twice. #proofread
>
> — Amber Katz (@Glambr) December 12, 2013

> Ironic that @hicornbread calls @xojanedotcom “surpassingly stupid,” when their “bang-ability” piece is clearly an excavation through trash.
>
> — Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 12, 2013

I texted Breadcrumb: “Look at the Twitter feed.”

“I guess they noticed,” he wrote back.

“You cool if we take the piece down?”

It took Breadcrumb a while to respond, and I knew what he was thinking. Although we had agreed to pull xoBang before it could really blow up, it would be interesting to see how far our little hit piece might go, if we didn’t un-publish. How many impassioned wowjustwow’s and what in the actual fuck’s could we inspire? I was certainly wondering that.

But, after a couple minutes, Breadcrumb agreed: “We got our proof of concept. Take it down.”

I went back to my computer, deleted the original text of “xoBang,” and pasted in our prepared retraction. Then I republished it, and went to bed.

(Those interested in reading “xoBang” can find the full text, minus identifying details of most typists, at NAPALM. The version posted on Medium will remain retracted.)

The aftermath

While I slept, Twitter seethed. Though the article was retracted, there remained much angry typing to be done.

> @alywalansky @jessgoon Listen, if he were remotely bangable, he’d never have the time nor the inclination to compile such a fakakta list.
>
> — Amber Katz (@Glambr) December 12, 2013

> @Glambr @jessgoon he probably lives in his parents’ basement and jerks off to anime while eating cold dominos pizza.
>
> — Aly Walansky (@alywalansky) December 12, 2013

> @alywalansky fuck that noise. I fucking hate this asshole.
>
> — marina (@makeuplovesme) December 12, 2013

> @alywalansky @Glambr @jessgoon link please?
>
> — Corey Kindberg (@coreykindberg) December 12, 2013

> @alywalansky @coreykindberg @jessgoon @makeuplovesme Dude, fuck that fat mess. He’s definitely sweating while drinking a soda. Eat it.
>
> — Amber Katz (@Glambr) December 12, 2013

> World’s most compelling argument against contributing to @xojanedotcom /via @medium (for shame, @ev) https://t.co/ZJ5aVlpT2U

— Dina Fierro (@eye4style) December 12, 2013

So, you guys remember when I said http://t.co/qNu5tim9Hb was my new favorite site? DISREGARD, it's awful. @Medium y'all are gross.

— Edotwoods (@edotwoods) December 12, 2013

This is why I'm perfectly happy dying alone, unless of course @Alia_Rajput realizes my marriage proposals are real: http://t.co/r6LOOzfKGr.

— Sarah Conley (@styleit) December 12, 2013

@LesleyFerree If this piece, which hurt many women I know, is not removed, I will never write a single piece for @Medium EVER.

— Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 12, 2013

Hey @ev Have you seen what's on @medium ? Im sure you would not approve. Please consider removing? https://t.co/k7QVypFqdQ cc @alywalansky

— Melanie Notkin (@SavvyAuntie) December 12, 2013

@eye4style Misogynistic loser guys rating women based on their "bangabilty". Super classy. Hope those guys parents are proud.

— Jules (@jules792000) December 12, 2013

@Medium the published piece about xoJane writers is incredibly offensive & not OK in the slightest.Thought you were a different kind of site

— afrobella (@afrobella) December 12, 2013

@alywalansky BABY. Fuck that troll and his/her ignorant, inbred noise. You are a beautiful, strong, wonderful writer.

— Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 12, 2013

Apologies for the expletive, but fuck every single person who makes someone else feel small because of their weight, looks, race, hair, etc.

— Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 12, 2013

@Glambr Absolutely appalling. I am deleting my account on @Medium if this isn't taken down.

— Mischaela (@MischaelaElkins) December 12, 2013

I have never read anything so repulsive

— Yesha (@YeshaCallahan) December 12, 2013

@YeshaCallahan Damn! It was retracted. Do you have the archived link?

— Karyn Polewaczyk (@KarynPolewaczyk) December 12, 2013

@tout_moi @felsull now they have retracted it?! Yeah, cause that's how the internet works.

> — Jane Flanagan (@seenandsaid) December 12, 2013

> Lest we forget, ladies! #TYPIST.
>
> — Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 12, 2013

> Yo @Medium & @readnapalm-retraction aside-ur article about banging @xojanedotcom typists is backwards sexist BS that limits women & bloggers
>
> — Sassy Dove (@sassydoveblog) December 12, 2013

> Disgusted by the misogynistic filth @Medium allowed to pollute their site http://t.co/1QPQ72JXUS … Retraction: https://t.co/Z7I3l6XQiY
>
> — Lindsey Tramuta (@LostNCheeseland) December 12, 2013

And elsewhere online:

There were a few approving comments for the pseudonymous “Cornbread”:

> I seriously love cornbread lol. My #soulmate http://t.co/z8YkUMu0pJ
>
> — ♋ Sarah Robinson .♡. (@StuckMami) December 12, 2013

> Cornbread so good have me singing gospel
>
> — Adrian Dilworth (@Dillpickle_21) December 12, 2013

…but they were outliers. Their encouragement couldn’t change the fact that the web had weighed our work, and found me and Breadcrumb wanting—not only journalistically, but also physically, emotionally, intellectually, professionally, and by virtue of our undersized dicks.

The disastrous effect of strangers’ opinions on my life

The next morning, after turning off my phone’s alarm, I lay in bed for a while scrolling through the full Twitter fiasco. I read every criticism and insult I could find. Even I was surprised by how much attention we stirred up.

Then I set my phone aside and spent a moment taking stock of my situation. Astoundingly, I found I was little changed from the night before.

Despite the Twitter mob's insistence to the contrary, I wasn't fat, and I wasn't sweating; if anything, my room has a chill on winter mornings. I hadn't eaten Cheetos or Domino's Pizza in years. I couldn't name a single anime cartoon. Had I realized you can jerk off to them, maybe I'd know a few.

Contra Aly Walansky, I wasn't in my parents' basement; I was in a sixth-floor apartment on the Upper West Side. Anna, a 23-year-old ballet dancer I was then seeing, was asleep beside me; otherwise the apartment was empty, as I'd expect, given that mine is the only name on the lease. I still wasn't inbred. My penis remained large enough to brag about, supposing I felt like it, which I do: Sumbitch girthy.

It was as though the criticisms of strangers on the internet—no matter how deeply personal they got—still had zero bearing on my reality or lived experiences.

Why then did these women give a shit what I wrote about them? And why did they bother with this ritualistic Twitter-rage about me and my article?

For very compelling reasons, I think. But before I get to that, let me explain why I give a shit about this.

The business of clickbait

"Could Bang" by Breadcrumb; originally published in "xoBang"

When I'm not busy ranking girls by their bangability, I work (among other places) at a Manhattan agency that creates print and online ads. Though we're small, odds are good you've seen our work. Two summers ago, a husband and wife who own a niche luxury brand asked us to design a campaign for their company. They had an excellent product with an interesting backstory, and were open to any angle we chose.

It was a dream account, but for one catch: Their advertising budget was almost nil. After paying us, they would have no money left to actually purchase ad space. Rather than turning down work, we proposed they try a “guerrilla” campaign: We’d design the ads and distribute them on the cheap, as fliers and online, in hopes that they would go viral.

We warned the couple that guerrilla marketing is high risk and high reward. There’s no guarantee your ads go viral, and if they don’t, you don’t get your money back. But if the ads do catch on, you can get more attention, more quickly than traditional advertising could ever deliver, and at a fraction of the cost.

Also, we told them that guerrilla marketing practically requires controversy. There are other ways to get lots of attention, but there’s nothing as reliable as being, as our Creative Director put it, “horrifically inflammatory.”

I’ll never forget the woman’s response:

“Then horrify us,” she said, without missing a beat.

Creating Horror

Because of our NDA, I can’t share the company’s name or the exact ads we created for them. Instead, I’ve mocked up several fake ads that approximate the tone and spirit of the originals.

The real client wasn’t a liquor company, and the jokes shown below aren’t the same ones we used in their ads, though they are similar. But for our purposes here, these are essentially the same as the fliers we designed:

Asking for it?
She's begging.
LOUIE'S TEQUILA

Give it to her raw.
LOUIE'S TEQUILA

We printed $200 worth of these on plain LaserJet paper and hired some guys to hand them out around two large cities. We probably should've given them hazard pay—two got slapped by women, and one of them almost got punched by a dude—but we didn't.

There was a lag of about 24 hours between the first flier hitting the streets, and the first outraged blog post hitting the web. Over the course of a week, dozens more posts appeared, and the ads were shared all over social media.

Early in the controversy, a blogger noticed that all of the posters were viewable on the company’s website. In her screed about the prevalence of misogyny and male-on-female violence in advertising, she included a link to the site. Other bloggers followed suit.

A petition calling for a boycott of the company circulated for a couple days. Outraged missives were sent and recieved. More than one tearful vlog was recorded in protest. Our unpaid intern catalogued all of this for the client’s monthly report.

By our rough estimates, the number of people who read blog posts about the company and its ads leveled off somewhere in the 1–1.5 million range. Before the controversy, the company’s website got 200 hits on a great day. During the controversy, it received 200,000 in two weeks.

Publicity like that can’t be purchased. It can only be given—and only by people like Felicia Sullivan.

That experience got me thinking about viral marketing, and specifically what it does for my company, my clients, the media, and the audience all three of us share. Those guerrilla ads earned my company, and by transference me, a nice payday. They were also fun to create: We expensed an eighth and a stack of pizzas to petty cash, got stoned to high heavens, then banged out the posters in a single night. No complaints there.

My client got enormous exposure. For every potential customer they alienated, there were ten more who became aware of them for the first time. The outraged bloggers, for their part, got pageviews and uniques and followers, which their bosses cashed out in the form of ad sales and impressions, and then some small portion of the ad revenue trickled back down to the typists—excuse me, writers.

The short end of the stick went to you, the audience. All you got was offended, annoyed, and sucked into another virtual pissing contest about sexism in the media.

(You also, perhaps, acquired brand awareness of my client—a company that wants your money in return for overpriced shit you don’t need.)

To recap: I won. My client won. The bloggers won. Everyone else got fucked. And though I never had any illusion of advertising being God’s work, I wasn’t comfortable with that. It seemed that viral advertising was the only advertising we designed to be a specifically negative experience for the audience. In our other work, we aimed for advertisements that were informative, if not outright entertaining. We wanted to engage and inspire. We wanted to be compelling, authentic, and honest.

Viral advertising takes the virtues of that approach and negates them. It asks “creative industry” workers like me to imagine something awful, and then do it.

I decided I didn’t want to do that anymore.

Rage and the fem-o-sphere

“Could Not Bang” by Breadcrumb; originally published in “xoBang”

But enough about me. Let’s discuss Felicia Sullivan & co.

The Twitter backlash to “xoBang” was nearly unanimous in its insistence that the piece be removed from Medium, the publishing platform we used. (In case you’ve forgotten, see here, here, and here for reminders.)

You might assume the ladies’ goal in calling for the removal of “xoBang” was to limit the exposure it received. Maybe if they caused an outcry, Medium would feel the heat, the piece would get pulled, and total pageviews would be drastically reduced.

Kinda makes sense, right?

Let me show you what actually happened.

Like I said above, total views of “xoBang” were hovering around 800 before Felicia Sullivan and her friends got hold of it. As soon as I noticed the ladies passing the link around Twitter, I checked the numbers again:

xoBang stats, ~20 minutes after going viral

Already it had racked up an additional 500 views. Around that time, Medium's stat counter froze—I don't know why—and didn't refresh until about 4 PM the next day.

At that point, the graph looked like this:

xoBang stats, 4 p.m. on December 12

Visitors had kept pouring in, even after the retraction. Before the week was out, total views topped 6,000.

We can't break down exactly who is responsible for each of those 6,000 views, but based on the timing of the traffic, I think it's fair to attribute about 1,000 of the views to Heartiste and others in the Manosphere, and lay the remaining 5,000 at the feet of the Twitter chicks linked earlier.

Which is to say, the angry ladies extended the reach of "xoBang" 500 percent. To put a finer point on it: Felicia Sullivan and Friends, who acted so anxious to get xoBang censored, and were ostensibly opposed to anybody seeing it, were themselves the primary vector through which the piece was spread.

But for the efforts of highly-visible women like Amber Katz (25,900 Twitter followers), Aly Walansky (25,500), Dina Fierro (23,700), Melanie Notkin (22,300), Grell Yursik (58,200), and of course Felicia Sullivan (4,900), xoBang would have continued in its obscurity. Nobody else would've known it was written. Nobody would've realized they should feel offended by it.

Had Felicia Sullivan kept her anger to herself, rather than sharing it with her 4,936 Twitter followers, it would have been as though xoBang were never published—which, again, is what she claimed to want.

So why the hell did Felicia share it?

The psychology of the hate-share

One last digression before we get to that.

I have a term for articles and videos like xoBang and like the liquor posters above: malignant viral content. The best way to explain what malignant viral content is, is by explaining what it isn't.

A video of a kitten snuggling with an adorable walrus that gets 10 million views overnight is viral, but not malignant. Same goes for stupid songs, Buzzfeed's compilations of 76 incredible GIFs, meme-y Tumblrs and Twitters, brief works of gourd humor, etc.

These things have the virtue of being harmlessly entertaining, and that alone justifies sharing them. There's value in content that makes us laugh and feel good, even if there's not deep meaning behind it. Of course, plenty of content goes viral without being entertaining. Some of it's quite upsetting—but still not malignant.

A prime example is the footage of the 2007 Baghdad airstrikes, in which a U.S. Army Apache helicopter attacks and kills unarmed Iraqis and two Reuters reporters. One copy of the video on YouTube has almost 15 million views. To watch it is stomach-churning, but your understanding of America's involvement in Iraq is incomplete until you've seen it and read the surrounding story.

Similarly, Gawker's 2010 story about Christine O'Donnell's drunken hookup with an almost-stranger was a revealing look at the character of a woman on the verge of becoming a U.S. senator. In 2011, the child sex scandal involving Penn State defensive coordinator Jerry Sandusky was sickening to read about. But to avert your eyes was to miss the truth about the corrupting influence of athletics in higher education.

Those stories angered those who read them—same as "xoBang" did—but the anger was caused by meaningful information that exposed real problems among America's leadership and governing institutions. The outrage was worth it. Those stories weren't malignant.

Compare that to xoBang.

What does xoBang tell us about society? About ourselves? What trends does it reveal? What flaws does it expose, or even hint at?

Before anyone thinks too hard about those questions, let me just tell you: xoBang tells us nothing. It reveals nothing. It is not indicative of anything except what two anonymous guys, acting by themselves, wrote in order to get a rise from a small group of Twitter entrepreneurs.

There is nothing about xoBang that merits protest, or consciousness raising, because it is a wholly anomalous and aberrational offense. There is no trend of men making lists of the ugliest female journalists. There's no reason to think that will catch on in wider society.

Put simply, there's nothing about xoBang to oppose, or to combat, because virtually everyone who reads it will recognize that it tramples all over society's well-established standards for how we treat other people. So once you finish reading xoBang, there's nothing about it that merits further attention—not from you, and certainly not from everybody who happens to see your enraged tweets.

The utter insignificance of xoBang was by design, and it's an important distinction between our piece and the things that Roosh and Tuthmosis write, or one of Ryan Holiday's publicity stunts. Those guys have platforms and connections to broader movements or organizations, and that gives journalists and activists a pretense for bitching when Roosh observes that some dog-looking feminist is ugly, or Tuth releases an exhaustive slut diagnostic. Amanda Hess or Katie J.M. Baker or the staff of the Southern Poverty Law Center can take something Roosh or Tuth writes and parlay it into a pageview bonanza, all while semi-plausibly claiming "social justice" as their motivation.

But Breadcrumb and I had a hypothesis that the "social justice" component of these Twitter tantrums in response to the SWPL outrage du jour is bullshit, basically; a convenient cover for less noble aims. xoBang, which is both irresistible to the social justice warriors and completely unworthy of their attention, was created to test that hypothesis.

The piece is so obviously out-of-bounds that no reasonable person would argue it requires a response in the name "social justice." That fact dampened the social justice crowd's enthusiasm for sharing it exactly as much as we expected: not at all. The girl bloggers and their assorted hangers-on were drawn to "xoBang" like lemmings to a precipice, and upon reading it, promptly took the bait and lost their shit.

And why? Well, for the most banal reason imaginable: Because they're paid to do so.

The viability of rage profiteering

Felicia Sullivan (shown in selfie above) tweeted about xoBang—a wholly inconsequential internet obscurity—17 times (1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17) because Felicia Sullivan is a rage profiteer.

The same goes for Amber Katz, Aly Walynsky, Grell "Afrobella" Yursik, and Melanie Notkin: rage profiteers, all. There are rage profiteers operating on every public platform, and catering to almost any special interest or demographic group you can imagine. You are probably no more familiar with Felicia Sullivan than I was, but it's virtually guaranteed that you follow other rage profiteers (as I do), and allow them to command an outsized share of your attention.

That's what rage profiteers do: They traffic in content that is so irresistibly inflammatory that it hijacks our attention and forces us into the rage profiteer's audience. Rage profiteering has surely existed, in one form or another, from time immemorial. But the diffuse lens of the internet and digital media created an extraordinary range of new niches for rage profiteering, and has thus caused a proliferation of rage profiteers such as society has never before seen.

Recall that Felicia's own bio describes her as a digital marketer and author: two professions in which visibility and success are synonymous. Felicia builds her business and lines her pockets by gaining your attention, and I know better than anyone that a great way to capture someone's attention is to piss 'em off.

Piss 'em off—as Felicia did with her tweets about "xoBang"—and they'll retweet you and respond to you. Your Twitter handle will appear in other people's Twitter feeds, where their followers will see it. You will gain new followers and, above all, increased prominence and recognition. The attention you receive will be positive and negative—but the negative hardly matters, as long as you keep pulling the people's strings. That is the bargain by which the rage profiteer lives.

I'm not saying that Felicia Sullivan's barking about xoBang made her micro-famous. It didn't. Rage profiteering, and content marketing in general, is a gradual, accretive process. Share enough malignant viral content, and slowly but surely, your Twitter following will grow.

I believe Felicia Sullivan when she calls herself a feminist. I don't doubt she's genuinely interested in what our society dubs "social justice."

As such, I suspect that if given the choice, she'd rather tweet about real injustices that might benefit from the antiseptic powers of press coverage and public attention. Who wouldn't prefer their life be meaningful and outward oriented, rather than hollow and self-serving?

But as a practicing rage profiteer, Felicia Sullivan will not hold her fire just because her target is something as inconsequential as "xoBang." She has 4,936 Twitter followers who represent the lifeblood of her personal brand, and they start forgetting about her the moment she stops providing them interesting and infuriating shit to gawk at.

Your attention (as distinct from your education, enrichment, or well-being) is Felicia's stock-in-trade. That is why her online persona has been meticulously calibrated to hijack your time, thoughts, and emotional state. Her goal is to make you look her way, then parlay you into new Twitter followers, bigger social marketing clients, better Amazon sales numbers, and—above all—more dollar bills in her purse.

What I'm submitting is that rage profiteers like Felicia Sullivan, and like me in times past, do not freely provide you with tweets and links to splenetic columns of wrath and bile. You re-pay the rage profiteers dearly, with your time and frustration. Your anger is their livelihood. When they alert you to the latest bit of "can't miss" hate reading, what they're telling you is, they cannot afford for you to miss it.

Your relationship with the rage profiteers is transactional, and you are getting hosed in the deal.

So when I ask, "Who benefited from the tweet below?"

> WHAT IN THE FUCK IS THIS SEXIST NOISE? LIKE, IN THE FUCK.
> https://t.co/aq4m0ZDm1n
>
> — Felicia C. Sullivan (@felsull) December 12, 2013

…the answer should be obvious: Felicia Sullivan, her rage profiteering colleagues, and absolutely nobody else.

Now one last question— who was the troll in this story?

Illustrations by Breadcrumb.

"xoBang" was originally published on Medium.com, a publishing platform similar to Tumblr or WordPress.com. Medium was uninvolved in the creation of "xoBang," and as with most pieces that appear on Medium.com, did not review "xoBang" prior to publication.

Read Next: Pax Dickinson And The Culture Of Tolerance

Louie Grifon
LG is a web designer living in New York City. He is co-editor of NAPALM, a blog of news and commentary.

The True Nature Of Female Hypergamy

September 25, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

If you want to understand the nature of women, you should understand that their well-known propensity to hypergamy concerns more than just their natural desire to gain (by way of men) in status, a desire that obviously has a very powerful biological and evolutionary value. Female hypergamy, ultimately and much more deeply, has to do with the very nature of their sexuality, with what they find attractive in men in a psychosexual sense. This is why, for example, a man who can demonstrate superiority and, even better, dominance over other men in whatever context can also drive women mad with desire, even if he is a broke ass bum.

To see the truth of this, consider the following examples. I'm kicking it with by buddy outside of a popular college bar in Philly. A typical sexy young American vampire walks by, exuding the usual cuntish attitude and haughty entitlement. I recognize her from my one of my old bouncer gigs. She's dressed like a slut since, like most attractive young American women in 2014, she lives to be on display. I reach into my player toolkit and pull out old faithful, asshole game: "Hey girl, looking classy as ever." It doesn't work, perhaps because it's 2:30 a.m. and she's already been approached—oh, I don't know, 57 times—and she says something bratty in response. I answer with one of my favorite asshole lines: "Still at the top of your class in charm school, I see."

Now her friend comes up to me, her beta boyfriend in tow: "Why would you talk to her like that? You're such an asshole!" I say: "Well, being a writer, I have this habit of saying the truth [wink]." We go back and forth for a minutes. Each time she says something, I respond with sarcasm or some kind of asshole line. Finally, the clincher: "Yeah well, when this guy you're with," I say looking right at him, "can do something about it, let me know." During this exchange, I could see that the girl was getting more turned on as I refused to break, but successfully held my asshole frame. When I said the last line she looked ready to tear my clothes off, and my buddy, himself a veteran player, thought he could perceive this too, so I don't think I am mistaken or being conceited here.

Now in this context, it should be understood, status had nothing to do with money or wealth. It had everything to do with my assertion that I could kick her boyfriend's ass, this boyfriend who should have checked his girl instead of allowing her to rant at another man. Did this assertion inspire any feeling of offense in her? Or loyalty to her boyfriend? Ah no. Of course not, and if you would expect otherwise, then you had better swallow the red pill immediately. The assertion was a huge turn on, because it tapped into her female lizard brain: for a man who can show dominance over other men, regardless of the context, is sure to get women all hot and bothered, no matter what he looks like or how much money he has in the bank.

Here is another example. I'm chilling with my buddy at another Philly night life spot. A hotty walks by. I reach out and touch her on the waist: "Hey, how's your night?" She gives me a half a smile, but keeps walking. I see her join her date or boyfriend, standing about 20 feet away (I hadn't seen him before). "Yo, she's with me," he yells over. I usually do not try to disrespect other men, but I didn't like his tone, so, after giving him a respectful nod, I say: "Gotcha, but watch how you talk to me, brother." He sizes me up, then thinks of better of saying more.

A few minutes later my buddy and I are hanging out in another part of the bar. Now the couple walks by; the girl smiles at me and waves—right in front of him. Very disrespectful! And again, where was her loyalty to her man? Nowhere, for as I have discussed throughout my articles here on ROK, because they are mostly devoid of any sense of justice, most women have no sense of loyalty, like honor and obligation, an abstract, masculine trait.

In this example, as in the first one, I displayed the sort of alpha dominance that women cannot resist. It is in the nature of women to desire the most powerful man and men in any context, and this desire is about much more than wealth or social rank in the ordinary sense. It is about psychosexual desire. The American public—unfailingly stupid, smug and self-righteous—is always outraged when a politician or other public figure gets caught cheating on his wife. In red pill reality, powerful men, given the nature of psychosexual desire, deserve a harem of bad bitches, who will always get in line to get bent over by that alpha cock anyway. Indeed, what better way for a woman to feel validated? That degree in Human Resources or Psychology is so boring, after all.

The true nature of female hypergamy certainly derives from the nature of heterosexual intercourse itself. Analysis shows that rough sex differs only in degree, not in kind, from ordinary vanilla sex. In both, it is the man that initiates, or asserts himself. It is the man that penetrates. He is in control. And the woman's satisfaction comes from and corresponds with what he does, the more overwhelmingly in charge the better. If you've ever dominated the shit out of a woman in bed, then probably you've heard one say something like: "Wow, most guys are afraid to do that." In all respects, an alpha is rare.

It is no wonder, then, that supreme confidence and dominance—over men and women alike—are universal aphrodisiacs for women. And here, understand, women are just like any other creature on this earth: they do not choose to be turned on by these traits. Indeed, it would be more accurate to say the traits choose them, sweeping them up in the alpha ride. In being turned on by an alpha, women act on instinct; they do not act by choice or reason. If my dog hears a noise outside, he will rush out there to investigate. Women are likewise reflexive in response to an alpha. In both cases, we see animals acting in accord with their nature, which is not for them to choose; they simply realize it as Nature itself runs its course.

So then, if you want to do as well as possible with women, view them as pimps do: understand that, deep down, they are slaves, whether they like it or not. Indeed, what is a feminist? A slave in revolt, who, had she only been more attractive, would have embarked on the standard path of attention whoring as a means to validation from about age 13 on.

Besides a man who exudes a sense of superiority or dominance over other men, women, as it’s well known in the manosphere, also cannot resist a man who gets a lot of other women. The reason for this is simple. For women, nothing in life matters more than their attractiveness. A woman’s sexual market value determines everything from her self-esteem to her sense of purpose. And women are naturally in brutal competition here. A man, therefore, who is known to have great success with women provides them with an unconscious feeling of validation: “He is good enough for her, so he is good enough for me.” Thus spins the little hamster, more commonly known as the female mind.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 6 Aphorisms On The Nature Of Women

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

We Are All Judged By Our Choices

September 25, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Growing up in middle-class white America, I was constantly told, “Don’t judge a book by its cover!” This wasn’t merely a feminist rallying cry; it was a lesson in how to view all sects of society—blacks, nerds, jocks, fat people, rednecks, thugs, et cetera. Of course, we all learned to parrot this doctrine without questioning it, even if we rarely actually followed it. It made sense to us—there’s so much more to a book than the three words written on its cover. To judge a book before reading it would be prejudice, and there is no worse sin for a middle-class white child than to judge another person before truly getting to know them and their circumstances.

Assuming blue pill dogma is true, this is at best a false analogy. Covers are designed to market a book. The title and pictures inform you what kind of book it is, and there will likely be a synopsis and genre label on the back. Publishing companies totally want you to judge the book by its cover, hence why they put so much effort into making it catch your eye. If I want to read some bondage erotica, I’m not going to pick a book with a spaceship on the front.

However, blue pill dogma is heresy. Ubiquitous and mandatory, but heresy nonetheless. Just as you can judge a book by its cover, so too can you judge people based on their physical appearance, because it is by physical appearance that we market ourselves to the world. You wouldn’t wear a t-shirt to a job interview any more than a children’s mystery novel would have a man smoking on it. That’s just not appropriate.

The Myth Of Ugly Women

At this point the casual reader will say, “But people can’t help how they look! It’s not fair!” This is a lie. Few women are naturally ugly. Usually if a woman is ugly, it is something that she’s done to her body such as bad make-up, aberrant piercings, or weight. The blue pill congregant will claim that some people can’t help being fat because of a medical condition, but that is a tiny minority. Most people can do something even though it may require self-discipline.

One of the most essential aspects of a woman’s beauty is her hair. A simple change of hair can radically alter a woman’s beauty. Hair is such a symbol of femininity and sexuality that many cultures have women wear headscarves in public or in religious buildings. Some places are considered to be important enough that women should not be beautiful, either to repel men or to show reverence for the structure’s purpose.

While it is true that some women are definitely more beautiful than others, most are close to average in their natural state. Maybe a girl is born with bug-eyes or freckles, but there are usually things she can do to offset it. Even if this is not the case, most men will understand that she made an effort in her presentation. That’s the key element—presentation. The way you present yourself to the world says something about the way you want to be judged. And yes, we all want people to judge us. Not a single one of us “just doesn’t care what anyone thinks.”

Being Judgmental

I was at a friend’s house a few months back and met her sister-in-law. The girl was in her late 20s, had very short hair, and was covered in tattoos. The worst tattoo by far was of a mustache on the side of her finger, like the kind of drunk frat joke you see on most girls’ Facebook profiles, though without the same permanence. Knowing nothing about this girl, I can tell everything I need to know about her. There is a difference between the woman a man wants to fuck and the woman a man wants to make love to. This girl is a fun person to be around, but is never someone a red pill man would consider committing to because her entire physical appearance screams instability.

The thing about weight is that it’s a sign of health. Women complain about how they’ll never be supermodel-skinny, but most men want to marry a woman whose ribcage they can see.* This is all unconscious animal instinct, and no amount of propaganda in either direction will ever change this reality. It’s also the exact reason women are attracted to strong men. I will probably never need to defend a woman with my fists, but having large muscles is a sign of health. Image-consciousness cuts both ways, and a weak man is equivalent to a fat woman.

Choices Have Consequences

Prejudice against physical appearance is totally fair. If you choose to have purple hair or a nose ring, know that you are greatly limiting yourself as a long-term relationship candidate. “Yes, but sometimes women may look good like that,” the blue pill congregant argues. No, if a woman looks good with aberrant hair, tattoos or piercings, it's always in spite of those aberrancies, not because of them.

Another thing to consider, and this is critical, is that men will want to show you off to their friends. If you assume that there exists men who never present women as a trophy wife, then at the least you will meet his family and friends eventually. Like it or not, society has a prejudice against people looking unnatural, even if tacitly. Will a man really want to be the guy with the weird girlfriend? He'll tell his friends, "Yeah, she's pretty independent, but…" and then what will he say? She's good in bed, she's nice, she likes the Decemberists? Notice there was a "but." The man likely said that without even thinking. He found your excessive independence repulsive without even realizing it. If you choose to be socially deviant, don't be surprised when society rejects you.

And that's the thing about a bug-eyed girl who attends to her physical appearance. Yes, her eyes are a negative feature, but the way she dresses and styles her hair says a lot about her approach to life. If I'm looking for someone to breed with, I'll take the girl who seems least likely to screw up my children. Dressing without showing as much skin as legally possible says something about the way you view yourself and those around you, and it says something about what you want out of life. Being fat says you have no self-restraint, and hence it communicates self-centeredness. Having short hair says, "I don't care what men think about me; I just want to be comfortable."

Demanding to not be judged based on your presentation is 20th century pampering at its most decadent.

Read More: You Should Judge Books By Their Covers

Update: This line is a typo but ultimately is irrelevant. I've explained it here.

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

How Beta Friends Can Knock You Off Your Game

September 25, 2014 | by Bronko Nagurski | Link | Original Link

---

Growing up, I was the typical average American kid. Though I was one of the better athletes in my area, I was pretty quiet and therefore had limited success with girls, and like many young men between the ages of 13-16, really had no idea how to talk to them. I did ok for myself my junior and senior years of high school after I got a car and began working out, but I was still waiting for girls to make the first move, which severely limited my prospects.

I elected to go to college out of state at a Big 10 school in the Midwest, since I wanted a change of scenery and was beginning to come into my own as a young man. Sticking around my hometown to attend a local state school and be surrounded by the same people sounded thoroughly awful, and because I had some financial support from my family, I could avoid it.

One main reason for wanting this change of scenery was the realization that no matter how much you improve yourself and make yourself over, people who already know you will naturally see you for who you used to be (The only way to overcome this is to go away for a while and come back "re-born." Visiting years later, girls from high school who weren't interested at all were now pretty open about wanting to sleep with me. These girls weren't hitting the wall either, as they were 24 years old).

Anyway, I started anew 1,000 miles away where nobody knew me. At first I was still fairly beta while talking to girls, but since I wasn't being seen as the former quiet 14-year-old kid anymore, and instead the physically fit 19-year-old, the quality of girls significantly increased from what I had been used to. As a result, with enough practice on attractive college females, I had finally developed game. Getting ready to go out at night, I knew that I would be doing the hunting, I would be meeting someone, and since I went to school with 15,000 girls, just about every night was a fresh experience. Sounds great, right? Well having beta friends by your side can become a huge hindrance on your game.

Some of the friends I made early on in college are still some of the best guys I know. However, many of them came to college as virgins, and some had significant struggles in trying to crack out of that shell. For better or worse, I didn't befriend them based on their levels of game, and perhaps because I was shy around girls growing up, their friendship felt pretty similar to the guys I hung out with in high school (birds of a feather…).

Going to parties and bars with these guys showed me very quickly how beta friends will try to knock you off your game. Bear in mind that while I was starting to have much more success with girls around this time, I was still a novice when it came to deciphering "friendly advice" and knowing when someone was full of shit because they couldn't do something themselves. I don' t know if it was based on jealousy, confusion, or a conflict of values, but at times it felt like some of these guys were doing everything they could do to discourage me from hooking up.

Examples

One of my former roommates was probably the worst offender. After I bedded a girl we were both interested in, he sat me down and gave me a “pep talk” the next day, which began with telling me how he couldn’t believe I talked to girls the way I do (you know, flirting), and that one of his friends who was with us the night before felt the same way. They were both from Chicago and were much more innocent and mild-mannered in the way they talked as compared to someone like myself, who grew up in a NYC suburb.

For whatever reason, hearing this coming from two people made me begin to question myself. “Do people now think I’m an asshole? The girl last night didn’t care, so what’s this guy’s problem?” I knew he was upset I went home with her (though I clearly had dibs), but I had never had one of my peers tell me to stop behaving a certain way, so it was a little puzzling. It took me about a year to realize this guy was just a lost cause (we’re no longer in touch). After sleeping with another girl he knew, he gave me another sit-down and told me to stop hooking up with ugly girls.

Now this girl was a 19-year-old blonde with huge cans and a great ass, but she was taller than him so I guess that’s why she was “ugly,” even though I saw him desperately trying to get with her later without success. He later came up to me and told me he was impressed I had slept with her the year before, and asked for any advice I had in getting with her. I almost wanted to strangle him for the amount of shit he gave me for hooking up with her.

Several other friends weren’t much better than this guy. One of them, who didn’t even have the luxury of kissing one girl in college, gave me the ever-supporting encouragement I needed by saying “I can’t believe girls like you.” Another time I was at a bar with a third buddy of mine, and we were chatting up two girls. After about ten minutes they left for the bathroom. No more than seconds after they left, he turned to me and said “You know they’re not coming back, right?” Well they were back five minutes later, the girl I was talking to had her tongue in my mouth, and his bailed.

No more than a week later we were at a different bar talking to another two girls, they left for the bathroom, and he again turned to me and said the same exact thing about them not coming back. Even after seeing me get with the first girl he said wasn’t coming back, he still was being negative about me pulling the second girl off. Why? Because it was his default setting. And she did come back…without the friend he had been talking to.

How to react

If you’re new to approaching women or just young like I was, you may question yourself after hearing things like I did from beta friends. Most guys, especially younger ones, have no idea how to talk to women or know what they want, and collectively they may try to discourage the ones having success. One thing worth mentioning is that beta friends can come in all forms. Even formerly popular guys in high school, like jocks, don’t always know what they’re doing when approaching women. They may be more experienced in being around women, but many of them got by on what girls were conditioned to be attracted to at that age, like the popular high school athlete. Many of these guys have no idea how to do work on their own with older women where they can't rely on preconceived ideas about their social status.

Another problem with befriending guys who act like this is that not only will they try to knock you off your game, but they will also encourage other forms of beta behavior. Most of these guys have little experience with women, and virtually none in regards to having actual relationships with them. Therefore, as I had experienced when I had a college girlfriend, they'll encourage things such as smothering, overly romantic outings for the littlest of occasions, and many other things that will ultimately turn girls off. It takes some time and experience to learn to tune these pieces of advice out, especially if it's coming from someone who is otherwise pretty good guy who you enjoy hanging out with and talking to about other things.

The problem with approaching with beta friends is that they're not wingman material to begin with. They don't know how to talk to girls, and they especially don't know how to play along in a flirting situation. If you're going out and approaching on a fairly consistent basis, there is going to naturally be some overlap in the kinds of lines you use, your attitude, approach, etc. These types of guys will naturally undermine that ("Again you're telling that story?", or "Yeah, Ok…"). They'll call you out on bullshit that was clearly just meant to be a joke right in front of the girl you're talking to. They also, for some reason, think they're entitled to every girl in the room.

Where to go from here

Trust me, if it wasn't for other aspects of our friendship, I probably wouldn't still be friends with these guys. But like I mentioned earlier, I don't befriend guys based on their level of game. And why is that? Because I no longer go out with other guys at my side on nights when I intend to hook up. When approaching alone, you don't have to deal with your friends and therefore don't have to deal with her friends (as much). You don't have to worry about your friend saying something that will either turn her friend or both of them off. You'll be more open, as beta friends won't be there to undercut what you're saying or try to steal the girl you're working.

And most importantly, if you fail with a girl, you're only dealing with one rejection. Friends who have no experience with women aren't aware that it is a numbers game, and will tease you for "striking out." The last thing a guy needs after being turned down is turning around to find his own personal audience laughing at him, though they haven't talked to one girl all night. The only positive thing I ever got from going out with them was realizing I shouldn't be. They essentially turned me into a lone wolf when it comes to women.

Since doing the solo thing, my success rate has skyrocketed. It may seem daunting at first for newer red-pillers, but there really isn't much to it. Start slow if you're a novice and pick your spots when trying to go out alone. As has been discussed on this site, many girls simply go out to just be with their friends and take pictures of themselves.

From my experience approaching alone, girls at bars are much more open to meeting guys on holidays than normal weekend nights. Though it may be difficult to actually close on a holiday, you already have something to talk about. Obviously don't limit yourself to four nights a year, but when testing the waters on how to approach alone, these are great times to practice.

Read More: Gaming In School Is Not Enough

With First World Problems Like Feminism, The West Doesn’t Need Enemies

September 26, 2014 | by Marcus Aurelius | Link | Original Link

“We have White People Problems, in America. That’s what we have. White People Problems. You know what that is? That’s where your life is amazing, so you just make shit up to be upset about.”
–Louis C.K.

Maslow’s Pyramid—the Maslow hierarchy of needs—is a roadmap for self-improvement. It demonstrates that our basic needs—food, water, shelter, security—are prerequisites to pursuing higher ambitions for creativity and achievement. Unless you have your shit sorted out at the lower levels, trying to satisfy your intellectual desires for creativity and spontaneity is invariably building on a shaky foundation.

However, I've realized the pyramid is also a pretty good indicator of whether or not your society is going to make it in the long term. If a society's priorities do not match Maslow's pyramid, that society is probably headed for the dustbin. If you can't provide the fundamentals of security—family, food supply, property, or resources—then by definition you won't provide sufficient foundations to support people's pursuit of achievement, creativity, or spontaneity. Basic needs being satisfied are prerequisites to that society supporting higher aspirations.

John Adams anticipated this ordering of priorities two hundred years ahead of Maslow:

> "I must study politics and war that my sons may have liberty to study mathematics and philosophy. My sons ought to study mathematics and philosophy, geography, natural history, naval architecture, navigation, commerce, and agriculture, in order to give their children a right to study painting, poetry, music, architecture, statuary, tapestry, and porcelain."

Adams knew that unless you first had an army and a functional government, you could not provide the security upon which an enlightened society rests.

Historically societies fail for any number of superficially unique reasons. Asking "Is America Rome?" is pointless, because the answer is no. New York is not situated on the Tiber, MMA tournaments do not end with execution of the loser, and North Dakota's not likely to be pillaged by Visigoths raiding out of Manitoba anytime soon.

But.

While history never repeats, it does echo. And common to every society's fall is the pyramid.

This remains so no matter how enlightened your civilization becomes. The pyramid's structure is non-negotiable. If as a society you try to push any of your higher ambitions down the pyramid—say, making creativity a more important priority than securing food—then the society must also fail, just as a pyramid collapses without a broad base. A pyramid is not complete without an apex, but you would never use the rock at the apex as the sole foundation for the structure. Where a society—be it tribe, town, kingdom, empire, republic, or nation—fails to secure or provide for its members one or more of Maslow's foundational needs, that society is doomed.

The sacking of Rome was a foregone conclusion because its legions had degraded: Rome could no longer supply—and thus satisfy the need for—security, and the Western Roman Empire collapsed shortly thereafter. All its artistic, philosophical, and inventive thought made not a bit of difference to the final outcome. Hellenistic Greece succumbed because its city-states could not stop warring among themselves (failure to provide security) and because its finances were flawed (failure to provide security of property).

In both cases, the failure was an attempt by a society to prioritize an ambition higher on the pyramid in preference to its foundational needs—to defy the pyramid.

[image]

Western societies as a whole have the distinction of successfully holding complete pyramids together since roughly 1700. This is rare and beautiful. Historically, the wasteland is the norm: the "high periods" of Roman and Greek culture lasted a couple of centuries combined, and were bracketed by chaos; from roughly 476 to 1450 AD western Europe was an intellectual and technological backwater.

Feminism is an existential threat to Western society because it, too, seeks to defy the pyramid. Modern feminism's aim is to make women's confidence and self-esteem more important—a higher priority—than society's basic requirements for security of family, health, morality, and resources. We are seeing feminism's effect on these four areas already.

Single mother households are apparently "families," and often by choice. This, despite the fact that single mothers have an appalling failure rate as parents, going by the backgrounds of most people in prison. Divorce, now weighted heavily in favor of women in its consequences, has provoked men to the rational economic response: conscious, childless, and permanent bachelorhood.

Health-wise, HPV is at epidemic levels such as to demand a vaccine—predominantly due to women's promiscuity. More obviously, obesity is at record levels—predominantly among women, so much that fat acceptance is actually a publicly discussed concept.

In terms of morals, society gives its full imprimatur to young women riding the cock carousel. This reinforces both delayed marriages and an increase in childlessness, since there is no societal judgment of a woman who sleeps around and devalues herself in traditional feminine terms. While this might eventually come back to bite feminists as a group, the collateral damage is done to Western society as a whole—just as with Hellenistic Greece, which also had declining birth rates. Societies that don't breed generally can't survive.

As for resources? Feminism demands their misallocation. Millions in medical resources alone are consumed every single year to indulge women's flights of fancy. How much money has been spent on women's "rights" to have children not when they're young and fit, but only when their clapped-out anatomy pleads "no more"? Or the resources allocated to ripping "mistakes" out of healthy wombs, often without the father's consent? Or the millions wasted on Botox and elective plastic surgery solely for women to wish to stay in denial about what's happening in their mirror?

[image]

These issues are all, by definition, First World Problems because they can exist as problems only here—because generations of Western men shed blood and sweat building systems efficient enough to create a situation where higher, optional aspirations could become "necessities." The poorest in Western society live like kings compared with the majority of human beings across recorded history. Angst about Internet speeds is possible only for people whose other basic needs have been comprehensively satisfied, for people whose privilege is so great their frame of reference can be twisted to think a latte prepared with too much milk is an existential crisis.

Modern feminism is attempting to subordinate Western society's basic needs to women's craving for esteem. It is attempting to turn the pyramid on its head, despite all the examples of history that tell us what happens when a society does so.

#FirstWorldProblems, believe it or not, is a very important concept in this fight. The meme is a canary in a coal mine. The person who uses it realizes, even unconsciously, that priorities in Western society are seriously out of whack because nobody concerns themselves with basic security of food, water, shelter, family. The meme slaps its recipient in the face with the message that they have lost track of what's fundamental to civilization if not life. It carries in a nutshell everything above.

It is the perfect weapon against feminism, because modern feminism is nothing but a first world problem—one that can't exist without basic needs satisfied, one that exists only at the sufferance of men.

Feminists hate the meme, of course. They shriek that it's "changing the subject," accusing its user of using Third World injustice to distract people from First World injustice.

But to point out #FirstWorldProblems is to reset the debate.

The real distraction is that which feminism conducts: straight-facedly saying that fat acceptance or single parenthood by choice are existential needs or human rights. #FirstWorldProblems slaps a person upside the head and lets them see Maslow's hierarchy clearly again. It is the hand that turns out the magician's sleeve, to expose what was really going on while you were looking the other way.

Read More: Decreasing Marriage Rate Is Hurting Feminism

Marcus Aurelius
Marcus is a newly-awakened red pill hidden inside the Matrix, seeking to bring down the system from within. In the meantime he has books to read, writing to do, medieval swordsmanship to practice, and does not charge by the hour.

Why You Shouldn’t Seek Emotional Fulfillment Through Women

September 27, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

What is the purpose of women in men’s lives? This is a question which has been contemplated throughout history—possibly even by the first man. Men’s opinions on this question vary from person to person.

Essentially, men are biologically driven to seek sexual congress with women, to spread their genes. While the act of sexual congress with women essentially provides physical pleasure (or fulfillment), the emotional aspects of sex too hold some value.

Sex and “relationships” with women can provide emotional happiness for some, albeit the reality is that the nature of that happiness remains fleeting and impermanent. The thrill of banging a hottie, or the novelty of a new sexual conquest do provide an emotional “high”—even if those highs may last just a few moments. And after that feeling has faded away, the whole process starts all over again.

Discontentment indeed is the lifeblood of the evolving man

> “Restlessness is discontent and discontent is the first necessity of progress. Show me a thoroughly satisfied man and I will show you a failure.” – Thomas A. Edison

Is there such a thing as a perfect woman? No. Not even if she was the most feminine, beautiful, caring and chaste woman who magically had the skills of the most skilled broad in bed. Even the best qualities of a woman become predictable, over a period of time, in the most successful of marriages, LTRs, or mini-relationships. Predictability sets in, and this eventually leads to boredom and discontent. This is especially true in “relationships” with modern women.

Men adapt individually to this in varied ways: some seek sexual novelty, some adjust themselves to settle in a "successful" relationship by rationalizing to themselves that the present woman in their life is a better proposition than the previous women they've experienced, and so on. In fact, most of the so-called "successful" relationships are based on this "calibration of mutual interests and expectations."

In fem-centric western societies, men commonly lower their standards to satiate sexual thirst and seek female companionship by adjusting to (commonly substandard) modern women. The so-called successful relationships they get into are usually those of staged togetherness—where either or both the partners are pretending to be happy while either secretly harboring unhappiness, resentment, or in the worst cases cuckoldry and adultery.

When it comes to "adjusting" in relationships today, a modern man often effectively rationalizes to himself either or some of the following reasons:

1. He couldn't find someone else better: Either through a real lack of options in societies where women are substandard, or through the bitter truth that all women are the same

> "Love is an ideal thing, marriage a real thing; a confusion of the real with the ideal never goes unpunished."
>
> – Goethe

2. He'd die alone , so he must find someone to take care of him in old age, which means it's wiser to lower his expectations to have a companion

> "Love is the word used to label the sexual excitement of the young, the habituation of the middle-aged, and the mutual dependence of the old." – John Ciardi

3. He must pass on his genes to continue his 'legacy'

4. He'd lose out on sexual access (moreso if he has no game knowledge or his sexual frustration blinds him to other options)

5. He's jaded of sex with different women, so he wants to "settle down"

> "It is not from reason and prudence that people marry, but from inclination." – Samuel Johnson

6. He's finally found a unicorn (without realizing that a Madonna and a whore can be the same woman)

> "Love is the illusion that one woman is different from the other" – H.L. Mecken

7. He's found someone who's socially or financially better than him: essentially he's "marrying up' "even it entails being treated like a dog or a bought slave by his partner.

8. He must be fair to his woman (and not subject her to his will and authority)

> "Marriage is one of the few institutions that allow a man to do as his wife pleases." – Milton Berle
>
> "A man who has never made a woman angry is a failure in life." – Christopher Morley

Or more. Either way, depending on the circumstances, some of these reasons might hold credibility and be valid ones to maintain a relationship in the eyes of society. But do they hold credibility for a man's long-term emotional fulfillment?

Happiness is a time-influenced (dependent) fleeting pleasure

Time—the most important thing in life—controls the happiness in our lives, whether accepted or not. Everything in life depends on the Time factor. Our lives are finite. We are of course the masters of our choices in our lives, but we cannot deny the regulating influence of Time on our lives and fate itself. Man's control over his choices in his life are limited, even if they might be great.

Time is also the greatest rationalizer in our lives, more than people's own hamsters. People rationalize their personal experiences and responses depending on the circumstances Time thrusts over phases in their lives. This, however, doesn't mean we shouldn't take charge to acquire control in our lives. The wise man understands this and masters himself to adapt to Time.

Happiness can be described as the feeling of contentment we derive from successfully achieving or doing the things we want—at the right time, that is. But the right thing done or gotten at the wrong time often becomes the wrong thing. The foodie will find no happiness with food at a time when he desperately wants to crap. The lover of women will find no happiness with women at a time when he is besieged with other problems. The worshipper of wealth will find no happiness in wealth at a time when he cannot spend that very wealth to obtain what he wants.

Thus, time is the (often cruel) master of our happiness, working secretly in the background. It can delay our personal successes, while prolonging periods of personal failure beyond our control and in spite of our best efforts. How we invest our time dictates the outcome of our happiness in our lives. Happiness is itself rarely instantaneously obtained at will.

Time also defines our relationships with women. ROIs with women often also depend on how quickly they'd put out. Our tastes in women undergo transformations throughout the phases of our lives, as do our relationships and interactions with them, as we age. The reality about women and relationships is that they all have a shelf life when it comes to providing long-term sustained emotional fulfillment in life for a man. There might be exceptions to this rule, but they are highly infrequent.

For some men, this shelf life of emotional fulfillment through women can be a few weeks, a few months, a few years, or a few decades—depending on his level of adjustment (or toleration), and the kind of woman he's dealing with. If he's a person who has low attention span, he'd feel frustrated as quickly as possible within the emotional drudgery of a relationship with a woman who has lost her novel physical appeal to him.

The solution is emotional detachment

Emotional detachment is one of the hallmarks of an alpha. Alpha itself is a mindset. If there is one thing I really admire about a fellow man, it is never his woman, his wealth, or anything else. It is his sense of emotional detachment to all these pleasures. Game is a great way to achieve this state of channelizing of the search of emotional fulfillment in life to other factors apart from women, while retaining physical fulfillment through sex with women. What could be these other factors which provide emotional fulfillment?

It could be a hobby, a life mission, a red pill tribe, spirituality, or a development of a skill or talent within you that provides inner fulfillment instead. I'd rather suggest looking internally than externally, for I believe every man on this planet has a talent or is gifted in some way or the other, but most of the time men themselves discover or develop their hidden talents. Instead, they seek external emotional fulfillment through interaction with women or relationships, while letting their personal gifts go to waste.

In short, the trick is to develop detachment to emotional fulfillment from sex, while instead seeking it through these internal factors that are in your own hands. No woman can hurt a man with options, so do you think a woman has even a minute chance to hurt a man who is emotionally detached?

The caveat of this is not to push emotional detachment to such a level so as to lose complete interest in women and become an ascetic. Aim for moderation to achieve liberation from emotional fulfillment through women. Sex is necessary, for if it weren't, nature would not have itself designed male and female bodies with reproductive organs to begin with.

The irony of relationships is that women often want men to attach to them on an emotional level. Sex, love, care, affection, or sometimes outright subservience are ways women can get men to become attached. This extends to all women, whether traditional or liberated, sexual or platonic. A man's emotional attachment is the prize which women seek. They all know a man's emotional attachment entails his emotional dependence and manipulation, and eventual subjugation.

The power balance shifts in a woman's favor once she realizes a man is dependent on her for his sexual and, more importantly, emotional fulfillment and gratification. You'd see this in real life cases where the "emotionally close" platonic female friend wields more power over a man than his sexually-gratifying bitchy girlfriend who is emotionally unavailable to him. The more a man emotionally attaches to a woman, the more she wields power over him—even if it may be subtle. This is one of the many reasons betas get sidetracked by women: they are often emotionally dependent on them, even when the women are not offering anything in return.

Awakened alphas understood this throughout history, and usually limited their interaction with women to sex and pleasure – with emotional detachment. Thus, they avoided slavery to their women.

> "Woman is the occupation of the idle mind, and the relaxation of the warrior."
>
> – Napoleon Bonaparte

One thing to note is that most of these emotionally detached men had interactions with many women in their lives, who actually assisted these men by providing counsel or support. Why did those women do that? Female agency? Nope. Because that's the natural flow of things, as I described above. In the end, the one who loves the least controls the relationship. Women know they are easily replaceable in the life of an emotionally detached man, who could walk away from them at will. The power balance is always in such a man's favor.

Emotional detachment creates power and authority in men—which women naturally gravitate to—with the possible additional creation of mate insecurity in women, who'd instead do more to keep or impress their men. This can be in the way of sex, love, care, affection, or even wise counsel—to gain a man's trust and, hopefully, his emotional attachment.

On the flip side, a woman often loses interest once she knows she's captured a man's attachment. Women often do more to get men to attach themselves, but then take men for granted after they've achieved that.

Conclusion

The more you think about it, the more you realize that emotionally detached men knew one thing: that apart from sex, the ability to rear children, and the ability to maintain a home, women don't hold (much) potential for investment for emotional fulfillment—especially in the long run they demand through love, emotional intimacy, and relationships.

The only real relationship a man actually has in his entire life is with his own self. In the end, women are at the best a garnish to the dish of life. Regulate their involvement and use in your life, or run the risk that they'd rule your life in the end. Women can gratify you temporarily, but they can never provide complete emotional fulfillment.

If you can succeed in liberating your emotional fulfillment from physical pleasure in relationships with women, then all power goes to you. You will feel more psychologically powerful, which can heighten your pleasure in all interactions with women, both sexual and platonic. In this case, your fulfillment will be be in your own hands, and not hers.

Read Next: You Must Space Out The Things That Make You Happy

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Feminist Laci Green Is Trying To Censor Youtube Without Consent

September 27, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Social justice warriors are at it again, this time on Youtube. With the pretext of a "sexual assault" video uploaded by Sam Pepper, they are attempting to purge the site from men they don't like by spreading denouncements, pressuring advertisers, calling white men racists, and disseminating rape accusations. It has reached a climax today whereby a woman has come out to accuse Pepper of raping her after a concert in Spring 2013. She eagerly spilled the beans of the rape to Buzzfeed in spite of the fact that she never called the police.

One of the ringleaders of this purge is Laci Green, a feminist who has sought professional help for mental disorder. Pepper's video network dropped him thanks to her efforts, and she—along with her SJW friends—just might be successful in removing him from Youtube entirely. They have named other male youtubers who are being targeted for their purge, all in the hopes of making Youtube free of men and ideas that they disagree with.

In the following video, I detail why Green is the absolute last person who should be censoring anything:

I'm sure that digging into the backgrounds of other SJW's would yield similar results.

Right on the heels of #GamerGate, it's clear that SJW's won't stop until they silence and censor all that they dislike. While our efforts to fight against them may seem futile, it's clear from the comments on my video that intelligent people in the middle can be swayed with rational arguments on how SJW's are immoral and unqualified to act as cultural censors. Some people may agree with the SJW cause, but they will be much more hesitant to go along with a purge like this if they realized that a small group of damaged individuals want to decide what content they are able to see.

Don’t Miss: How Social Justice Warriors Miss The Mark

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What The Salem Witch Trials Tell Us About Modern Feminism

September 28, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

In the wintry months of early 1692, two daughters of the local Salem pastor Reverend Parris began to have awful fits of bizarre behavior. The two, Abigail Williams (11) and Betty Parris (9), would scream and cry randomly, crawl around on all fours, destroy property and contort themselves in frightful ways. Parris was concerned and had the local doctor examine the young girls. The doctor found nothing medically wrong with them. A pastor of a nearby town suggested to Parris that the behavior was beyond natural and very well could be due to the machinations of Satan.

Salem was a small village situated in what is currently Massachusetts. After the Glorious Revolution in England, many strong Christian Calvinists, self-styled as Puritans, fled Europe and headed for the American colonies to escape religious persecution. Most settled in what is modern New England. They formed many self-governing villages and towns that were based exclusively on their interpretation of the Bible. Children were only taught the Bible and access to knowledge was controlled by pastors and powerful religious leaders.

Rules about social comportment were extensive and complicated. Deviations, however slight, were regarded with great suspicion. Salem, itself, was a particularly loathsome town, with incredible amounts of petty disputes and a very heated family feud between the Putnam and Porter families—most likely the impetus for the witch hunt.

The Wonders of the Invisible World:

Being an Account of the

TRYALS

OF

Several Witches,

Lately Executed in

NEW-ENGLAND:

By COTTON MATHER.

At this juncture of American history, Satan was widely believed to have a great and constant presence in the world. Witches were thought to be agents of Satan and sought to target people to advance Satan's agenda—often young girls. Cotton Mather, a prominent religious figure, disseminated a great number of pamphlets in the years leading up to the trials exhorting the real and palpable evil of witchcraft. He detailed the effects of witchcraft and who would engage in it.

After knowledge became public about the local pastor's daughter's fits, a town meeting was called as more young women became to emulate these two girls' behavior. At the meeting, the young girls would interrupt the proceedings multiple times, convulsing on the floor and screaming at the top of their lungs.

At the outset, three women were arrested—a homeless beggar, a black slave, and a prominent but poor and unpopular woman who was a member of the rival family. All three violated the codes of Puritan life and nobody bothered to defend them. In court, the three were subjected to intense interrogation for about a week, with the black woman, Tituba, confessing she signed a deal with Satan and was an agent of his bidding. This confession sparked an absolute maelstrom over the course of spring and summer in the village.

The two girls, plus a girl named Ann Putnam Jr., began to level accusations of witchcraft against over 50 people, and they all were summarily arrested and subjected to interrogation over the spring. People who questioned the proceedings were arrested. Any dissent from the process was looked at with extreme prejudice.

In order to prove the accusation, a contentious issue was the admissibility of "spectral evidence." Spectral evidence refers to testimony of the accuser that the accused came to them in the form of a specter or spirit. It was hypothesized that said power only could be granted by Satan himself. There was significant debate over the legitimacy and admissibility of said evidence. Cotton Mather remitted a treatise to the court in Salem that spectral evidence should be admissible, but cautioned that it is never sufficient for a conviction.

The court ignored Mather's contention and began to issue convictions based purely on spectral evidence. Accusations continued to pile up and eventually hangings took place on a what would infamously be known as "Gallows Hill." Bridget Bishop was the first person to be hanged as punishment. This caused the presiding judge to resign, as he grew disillusioned with the proceedings. It was rumored he became an alcoholic as a result of his participation in the trials.

Over the course of the summer in 1692, 19 people were hanged, with a slight majority of them being women. In September, a man who refused to enter a plea after being indicted was crushed to death after being subject to "peine forte et dure," a punishment during which he had heavy stones placed on his body until he either died or entered a plea.

At this point, Increase Mather (Cotton Mather's father and President of Harvard) become a strong critic of the proceedings and refused to acknowledge any legitimacy of spectral evidence. He had a famous quote, enshrined by Blackstone:

> It were better that Ten Suspected Witches should escape, than that one Innocent Person should be Condemned

The Governor of Massachusetts colony, after his wife was questioned about witchcraft, issued a stay on any more prosecutions and executions and formed his own court to try the remaining accusations. All but three people were released and not tried by this court because their indictments were based purely on spectral evidence.

In the aftermath, there was much consternation over the trials, as many convictions were overturned by the end of decade. Many leaders began to criticize the proceedings and their supporters. As it stands this day, all the convictions have been overturned, all deceased members allowed back into the church and the innocence of all formally recognized. Abigail Williams, the most notorious accuser, did publicly apologize for her behavior about a decade later.

The underlying psychology that lead to the zealous witch hunt in Salem never went away in America, it merely went into hiding. It has erupted from time to time as moral panics—as such McCarthyism and the McMartin Preschool debacle—but, generally, it has been repressed and expressed as America's famed Protestant work ethic. While this work ethic has been largely displaced by America's culture of narcissism, moral puritanism still exists in one key demographic: feminists.

First off, moral puritanism is clinically referred to as "Obsessive-Compulsive Personality Disorder." Personality disorders are recurrent unhealthy thought patterns that result in predictable routines or behavior. Obsessive-Compulsives are characterized by their love of work, their perfectionism, and their profound emotional and moral constriction. They do not only consider themselves to be moral superiors to any non-compulsive, but they also seek to convert the world to their unhealthy thought patterns.

Inside every Obsessive-Compulsive—which shall be referred to as a puritan going forward—is an anti-social desperate to claw its way to the surface. Unable to reconcile their bad thoughts with their good ones, they engage in a form of emotional constriction that causes them to become obsessed with control. In their own minds, they engage in incredible amounts of obsessing over work or moral judgmentalism of others to avoid dealing with their own superficially repressed anti-social behavior. They want to rebel and give into their adolescent anti-social desires, but their supreme desire for control means they never indulge those impulses, nor do they recognize that others sense those impulses in them.

Furthermore, puritans have one massive flaw in their thought patterns: the inability to distinguish between process and product. In his book Emotional Vampires, Dr. Albert J. Bernstein observes that the difference between product and process is that product is what a person or group is trying to do and process is how a person or group goes about it. These are distinct points that need to be separated to understand puritans as he states:

Obsessive-Compulsives habitually confuse process with product. To them, how something is done can become more important than whether it gets done at all…Obsessive-Compulsives tend to think that there is only one way to achieve any goal.

Since puritans are primarily interested in control, they bog others down in drowning amounts of details, needless critiques of slight deviations of what they think the process should be, and the general impulse to criticize over rectify. They don't want change, but rather desire a maintenance of the status quo so they can repress their own impulses. Giving them free reign over achieving a product allows them to purse what they really want: control over the process.

This week, over at Forbes, Bill Frezza got pitchforked by puritans over an article on the relation between fraternities and drunk women. Frezza—understandably worried about drunk women around men in our current cultural milieu—wrote a piece about how to limit a fraternity's liabilities in the face of widespread female drunkenness. He got burned at the stake quickly, with Forbes deleting the article and firing him immediately. National treasure Erin Gloria Ryan at Jezebel did a great job of fusing female hysteria with moral puritanism:

But I understand the need for constant vigilance [emphasis mine]. If Forbes didn't want a column like this in its house, it should have stopped Bill Frezza at the door rather than letting him in to shit up the joint. It only takes one drunk female or idiot blowhard to ruin things for everybody.

Ryan's response to Frezza's inartful, but correct, article is telling. Ryan lauds some of Frezza's recommendations—but always qualifies them, as she sees herself as superior to a dude-bro like Frezza—but she beats Frezza over the head with her delusional sense of moral superiority. She takes Frezza's article which is only partially about sexual assault and rape and makes it completely about sexual transgressions. Frezza cites the issue of women falling to their death off balconies when they are drunk, but puritans like Ryan don't care about that unless they are doing the pushing—excuse me, others are doing the pushing. Puritans like Ryan are only outwardly concerned with controlling the anti-social impulses of others.

Just like with the Salem Witch Trials, modern feminism is little more than a gang of puritans looking for their next score. Instead of doing this in real life, their hunting grounds are online. Their tribunals are not court rooms or places of worship, but the new places of worship in America: Twitter, the left-wing blogosphere, etc. Their accusers might not be girls but grown women with a political agenda.

Reconsider the concept of spectral evidence. The necessarily back-and-forth nature of sexual assault or rape accusations mirrors admissibility of spectral evidence. Since spectral evidence is wholly about the perception of the declarant, consider this caption of a YouTube comment about Sam Pepper (who did a sexual assault prank and posted it on YouTube):

This isn't about what Sam Pepper did, but about how women like Miriam see the world. Not only do they assume the worst in those around them, but they are looking for ways to control others' behavior in a negative way based on punishment. As. Dr. Bernstein observed:

[Puritans] try to make the world safe for truth, justice and love, using censorship, punishment and cruelty. They never realize that they're the primary instigators of the forces of evil that they labor so hard to combat.

A puritan's life—feminist, Christian, whatever—revolves around punishing those around them for thoughts they spend their entire lives repressing. This could result in the Salem Witch Trials: prosecuting people for giving into Satan. It could also result in attacking young men on college campuses for associating with men or #GamerGate.

For feminists, it is about controlling their own anti-social impulses. Just like in the Salem Witch Trials, they come across as bullies because they are bullies. Their supreme desire to control the impulses of others are nothing more than the extension of their own desire to suppress and control their own impulses.

Modern feminism, then, is little more than a repackaged version of the Salem Witch Trials. The feminine hysteria, the inability to consider real evidence, and the swarming nature of the phenomenon are all indicative of its puritanical nature.

Read More: Why Modern Feminism Is White Woman's Privilege

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

5 Reasons Writing Amazon Kindle eBooks Is An Effective Way To Make Money

September 28, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

About two years ago I published my first eBook on Amazon Kindle. I didn't do it for the money.

I did it simply because I wanted to publish a book. So I wrote about the basic science of bodybuilding, something I was obsessed with at the time.

To my amazement I made several hundred dollars a month from this book, without even marketing it or promoting it. Fast forward two years and I've published six books to date. For the most part each books sells better than the last. At this point I make over a thousand dollars each week via Amazon profits. And now that I'm finally starting to treat this process as a business, I fully expect this number to increase quickly.

I say this not to impress you, but to impress upon you the incredible monetary potential of writing and publishing kindle eBooks. Below are the top five reasons that almost anyone can take advantage of this opportunity.

1. We've all figured something out

When it comes to informational products, specifically non-fiction books, people buy them because they're searching for a solution. They're searching for an answer to some question, problem, or challenge that they're currently facing.

And the fact is that someone else has probably already figured this out. Someone else has already overcome this particular problem. It might be how to pick up girls. It might be how to use a particular application, like Evernote, more effectively. It might be how to travel the world with only a backpack. It might be how to gain weight with a particular dietary limitation.

The amazing thing is that almost all of us have figured something out. And if you can identify a specific problem that you've faced and overcome, then you can probably make money off of it by turning it into an easy-follow-system and then packaging it as a Kindle eBook.

2. Writing non-fiction is an easy-to-learn skill

If you can explain things coherently, and if you can take the time to organize your solution into a logical outline, then you can write non-fiction. The truth is that improving your writing, like any other skill, takes time and repetition. However, the following two tips made all the difference in my writing:

1. Write as if you're talking to a good friend. This is usually an appropriate tone that's not too formal, and also pleasant to read.

2. Proofread your shit. Not having spelling and grammar mistakes goes a long way in making your writing digestible and professional.

People will be buying your book because they want a solution to their problem, so being Mark Twain or George Orwell isn't a requirement, but writing an easy-to-follow and coherent book definitely is.

3. A baby could literally publish a book on Amazon

The Kindle publishing process is extremely straightforward. If you can format a Microsoft Word document and follow basic directions, it will only take a couple of hours to upload and publish your eBook to Amazon.com.

Because the barrier to entry is so low, the other side of this fact is that Amazon is littered with heaps of bullshit. You must make your book stand out by writing a good book, giving it a catchy title, creating an aesthetically pleasing cover image, and then receiving positive reviews.

4. Amazon will literally market and sell the book for you

This is probably the number one reason that there's money to be made with Kindle. Amazon is an enormous online marketplace. Countless people go to Amazon to buy a nearly unlimited scope of goods. And eBooks happen to be one of their bread-and-butter products.

On top of this Amazon does a first-class job of selling everything it offers. It knows what you're likely to buy based on your search and purchase history, and it bombards your screen with relevant, quality products as you go. The trick to selling a lot of copies of your eBook is getting Amazon to recognize it as a quality product. This is accomplished by doing just two things:

1. Selling lots of copies up front
2. Getting good reviews

This may seem daunting if you don't have a big network or email list to sell your book to. But the truth is that with the existence of so many niche online communities that it's not very hard… especially if you use this simple, but devastatingly effective strategy: release your book for 99 cents AND then get people to buy and review it. This will accomplish the two things discussed above, and then you can up the price, stop promoting the book on your own, and let Amazon keep the sales rolling in.

5. 70% royalty

The last reason you should publish on Amazon is this: you get 70% royalties. The fact that I only give 30% to Amazon is a giant gift considering that they provide probably 90% of my total sales.

If you're interested in actually writing a book on Kindle, you should check out my new book Write Book, Make Money*.*

Read More: 3 Habits That Every Man Should Practice

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

6 Things White Girls Can Learn From Filipinas

September 29, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Two months ago, I decided I was sick of rainy weather, stuck-up hipsters and high taxes and left New York for the Philippines. My friend Mark Zolo recommended the place as my first stop abroad because of Filipinos' near-universal English fluency and love of all things American. Having slept with more girls in the past two months then in the previous year, I can safely say that the Philippines is a country every American man should visit.

Filipinas are so beautiful and feminine that any white girl who sets foot in this country should be placed on suicide watch. Just the other day, I saw an Australian girl waddling around outside the immigration office. She was twenty pounds overweight, had buck teeth, and was seething with an aura of resentment and sexual frustration endemic to white girls in Southeast Asia. It's clear that wherever she came from, she was used to men kissing her ass just for being female, but in a land where girls are feminine and take care of themselves, she's been relegated to freak show status.

Nonetheless, in the spirit of constructive criticism, I have a few pointers to help my melanin-challenged sisters deal with the new Yellow Peril.

1. Lose some weight, fatty.

While American fast food franchises like McDonald's and KFC have made a disturbing amount of progress in the Philippines, the population as a whole is nowhere near Western levels of obesity. The average Filipina weighs about 95 pounds soaking wet and is so light I can scoop her up in my arms like a baby. If I tried doing that with your gwailo ass, I'd be looking at a trip to the emergency room.

Look, nobody likes fat girls, not even fat girls themselves. If you want men to treat you like a human being, you better maintain a human shape. Lay off the cronuts, go to the gym, and start skipping meals. The boner wants what it wants, and what it doesn't want is a duck-footed, buck-toothed Pillsbury Doughgirl.

2. Put down your iPhone.

Smartphones are ubiquitous in the Philippines, almost as bad as back in the U.S. Even poor people here have flip phones, and you can buy calling cards at street eateries alongside local delicacies like tuna panga. Yet Filipinas aren't obsessed with their phones the same way white girls are. You'll never see a Filipina hunched over her iPhone at a bar or the beach, obsessively checking her Instagram likes and taking selfies; she's too busy having fun with her family or friends.

White girls use their smartphones as a crutch to avoid social interaction. Every encounter they have with another human being has to be mediated by a screen, even sleazy hookups (see: Tinder). White girls are becoming so socially retarded due to iPhone addiction that they're starting to interpret innocuous remarks and cramped subways as misogynistic oppression. If you want men to find you attractive again, stop babbling about "rape culture," put down the phone and start talking to people.

3. Don't be a slut.

Like all Asian countries, the Philippines has its fair share of "yellow cabs," slutty girls who specifically seek out white guys for hookups. But there are also a lot of girls who stay virgins well into their twenties. Filipinas know that chastity is one of the most valuable traits a girl can have, so they don't just give themselves up to any guy who winks at them.

White girls will spend their youth sitting on a big bucket of dongs, then as their looks fade away, they whine about how there are "no good men left." If you don't want men to treat you like a cheap whore, don't act like one.

4. Be appreciative.

Every Filipina I've taken on a date so far has texted me afterwards thanking me for taking them out. My current girlfriend tells me "I love you" every time we get together. She knows that while I love her back, if we were to break up tomorrow, I would have my pick of beautiful young women just like her. She appreciates me because I'm a good man who cares about her, and because she feels honored that I chose her out of so many eligible bachelorettes.

White girls are completely self-centered when it comes to relationships. They think that the smelly hole between their legs entitles them to princess treatment and that men should be grateful to even be speaking to them. Then they wonder why the only men they can attract are losers and wusses. Real men don't put up with selfish little brats, so if you want a good man, you better be grateful for him when he comes along. Ask not what your man can do for you, but what you can do for your man.

5. Treat marriage and family seriously

White girls love to delude themselves about how women from poorer countries are "golddiggers" and "mail-order brides," but all the Filipinas I've dated so far are college-educated and middle class. In fact, my girlfriend is technically more educated than I am (she's studying to become a nurse). Yet Filipinas don't fetishize their college degrees and jobs the way white girls do. Ask a Filipina what she really wants, and they'll all say the same thing: a husband and children. Jobs are something they do to get money and nothing more.

Girls are designed to bear children from their late teens up to their late twenties. After thirty, female fertility starts to drop off, and menopause kills it entirely. If you want kids, forget about your "career" and start thinking about getting married now. If that sounds regressive, I'm sorry, but that's life. Your boring data entry or pumpkin spice latte-slinging job won't love you until death do you part, but a husband and a family will.

6. Find a higher cause.

Filipino culture is still largely dominated by the Catholic Church, which is why divorce, adultery, and abortion are all illegal here. While I'm not religious myself, there's something to be said for living in a society that is animated by a higher purpose. The average Filipina attends Mass weekly, believes in God, and tries her best to live up to His commandments, even if she doesn't always succeed. The moral framework provided by Catholicism is in part why the Philippines is far less dysfunctional then Thailand, Cambodia and other countries in the region.

God is dead in the West, and white girls have replaced Him with consumerism and celebrity worship. That's why they get more upset over a rich actress getting her phone hacked then by hundreds of girls getting raped by Pakistani immigrants. You don't have to become a devout Christian, but you should find some purpose in your life aside from mindless consumption. Instead of reading Buzzfeed, try picking up a good book. Instead of playing Candy Crush, play chess. Write a book, learn to paint, start a rock band, but do something real with your time.

While there are a number of other things that white girls can do to better compete with Filipinas, such as getting rid of the tattoos and aging gracefully, these six changes will make a world of difference. If white girls want quality men, they need to up their game and learn how to be feminine again. If they don't, there's a whole nation full of petite, wifely women who will give us what we want.

Read More: 7 Things You Need To Know About Filipina Girls

Matt Forney

Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Ice Odyssey: Douglas Mawson’s Race Against Death

September 29, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

At the beginning of the twentieth century, the Antarctic continent was still largely unexplored. Vast expanses of its terrain remained terra incognita. The task of turning the incognita to the cognita fell on the shoulders of intrepid men who were willing to assume the hardships and risks of the continent’s unforgiving landscape. Thirty-year-old Australian geologist Douglas Mawson was one such man. Already having some acquaintance with polar exploration by 1910, he organized what came to be called the Australasian Antarctic Expedition in that year. Its mission would be to explore and collect data on King George V Land and Adelie Land, two portions of Antarctica about which very little was then known.

Douglas Mawson as expedition commander. The face of a man who could not be broken.

The expedition landed in Antarctica in early 1912 and proceeded to set up its main base on Commonwealth Bay. Mawson's plan called for several different sledging parties—31 men in all—to explore different regions and collect data along the way. He himself was a meticulous and exhaustive planner, unwilling to leave even the slightest details to chance. With two companions, Xavier Mertz and Belgrave Ninnis, Mawson set out to penetrate the interior of King George V Land and conduct surveys there. The goal would be to collect as much data as possible about the geology, climate, glaciology, and magnetism of the vast 2,000-mile-long tract of unknown land.

The harshness of the environment in which the men found themselves can scarcely be exaggerated. Besides the subzero temperatures, winds regularly exceeded 200 miles per hour; it was later found to be the windiest place on earth. Even worse, the snow and ice over which they traversed concealed deep fissures covered by snow bridges. These crevasses were deathtraps which could elude even the most experienced eye. At any time, a man might find himself plunging through the snow to an icy death hundreds of feet below, swallowed up by an icy abyss. Sophisticated cold-weather and mountaineering equipment would not be invented for decades; the only protection was for the men was to tether their bodies to the sledges and hope that a crevasse fall would not pull everything down together with it.

While crossing the Ninnis Glacier about 500 kilometers from the main base, Mawson's party was stricken with calamity. Twenty-five-year-old Belgrave Ninnis and his sledge—carrying nearly all of the food, the tent, critical supplies, and the best sled dogs—hurtled into a crevasse. Peering into the depths of the fissure while lying on their stomachs, a horrified Mawson and Mertz could see two dogs, one dead and a second dying, on an ice shelf one hundred and fifty feet below; of Ninnis and his sledge there was not a trace. The full horror of the situation now descended on Mawson. They were nearly 310 miles from the main base, with almost no food and nothing substantial to use as shelter. They improvised a tent that night from a piece of canvas and two of Mertz's skis, laying their reindeer-hide sleeping bag directly on the snow.

Ninnis's fall into a crevasse set the stage for a battle for survival

There now ensued a grim battle for survival which has no equal in the annals of exploration. For navigation the men possessed only a battered theodolite. With no food for the dogs, and only a tiny amount of dried meat, biscuits, raisins, and cocoa, the plan was to eat the sled dogs as they went, feeding their bones and hides to the other dogs. It was a ghastly programme, but one imposed by necessity. Over huge snowdrifts, treacherous ice, and perilous crevasses, the two men hauled their sledge with steadily-ebbing strength. They threw away everything that was not absolutely necessary, including the precious camera and film that had documented the expedition. Only one of the dogs was strong enough to haul, and he was slowly wasting away from starvation and exposure. With every passing day, the race against Death grew more uncertain.

Mertz began to fail. Starvation, physical dysfunction, and despair had taken hold, and he was unable to maintain a steady pace. Slowly his mind began to crumble; a combination of polar depression and nutrient deficiency, exacerbated by hypothermia and overexertion, had broken his spirit. Mawson saw him actually bite off the top of one of his frostbitten fingers. Yet he refused to abandon his companion. He nursed Mertz the best he could, even helping him attend to his most intimate bodily functions and then cleaning him afterwards. That was the kind of man Mawson was. But he knew the end was fast approaching; one night Mertz began to succumb to fits of delirium in which Mawson had to physically restrain him. He died in agony soon after.

Without a miracle, Mawson would soon be joining him in death. The quantity of his food supply had dwindled to just a few miserable handfuls. His flesh was beginning to fall off his bones, a consequence of the extreme cold and starvation; his hands and face were frozen lumps. Most serious of all, the soles of his feet actually detached from his body, oozing puss and blood. He had to bind them up as best he could, and put on six pairs of socks to hold his flesh together. And there was still over one hundred miles left to go. But he refused to lie down and die. “I shall do my utmost to the last,” he scribbled in his diary.

He stripped the sledge and the wooden theodolite case with his knife, and fashioned crude crampons by forcing screws and nails through pieces of wood. These he lashed to his feet. Without such preparations, he would not be able to cross the ice formations that blocked his way to the hut. The sledge was sawn in half, a truncated instrument he dragged for the remainder of the journey.

Mawson’s handmade “crampons” which he pieced together

About 80 miles from the hut, he was now walking, stumbling, and crawling through the freezing crevasse-laced landscape. There were so many snow drifts and ice sheets that he could make little progress on some days. Mawson saved his life by the slenderest of threads one day when he broke through a snow bridge and plunged into a crevasse. The sledge he was tethered to held him fast, but he was dangling by a 14-foot rope in free space. Below him was an infinity of darkness. He hung there for a time in despair, wondering if he should slip himself out of his harness and fall into the abyss below.

But he slowly recovered himself. Luckily Mawson—ever the meticulous planner–had taken the precaution of knotting the rope at regular intervals for just such an eventuality. This fact now saved his life. Slowly, and despite his weakened condition, he pulled himself hand-over-hand out of the crevasse, assisted by the knots in the rope. But as he tried to haul himself completely out, the crevasse lip broke away and he fell back in again. This was the closest he ever came to utter despair. He barely had strength to pull himself up once. How could he do it again? But then, while twisting in the emptiness of the black void, some lines of poetry came to his mind. And this was what kept him out of the abyss. He repeated this refrain from his favorite poet, Robert Service:

> Just have one more try—it's dead easy to die
> It's the keeping-on-living that's hard.

His reading was his salvation. Summoning all his last reserves of strength, and willing power into his ravaged, emaciated frame, he pulled himself up, up and finally out of the abyss. Rolling away from the lip of the crevasse, he fainted. He awoke hours later, covered in snow. (David Roberts, author of Alone On The Ice, the definitive account of Dawson's ordeal, notes that in 2007 experienced polar explorer Tim Jarvis tried to duplicate Mawson's rope climb. He was unable to).

Mawson knew that the time for the final push had come. Death was closing in on him and he was beginning to lose control of his motor skills. He was by now long overdue at the hut. There was no way of knowing whether his other expedition teammates had given him up for lost, and left with the ship Aurora that was scheduled to carry them back to Australia. Mawson forced his broken body forward, one foot in front of the other, each step a symphony of agony. The winds were so strong that often he was lifted off his feet and tossed about in the snow and ice. Some of his progress was made on his hands and knees. When he was about 28 miles from the hut, he discovered a stash of food and a note left by his comrades, who had placed it there in case he returned. Mawson took ten days to cover that last 28 miles. He simply refused to die.

As he approached Commonwealth Bay, Mawson made out a black speck in the distance.

He approached it, walking, stumbling, and crawling, and he could eventually see that it was the hut. One of the remaining search party, a man named Frank Bickerton, chanced to see Mawson lurching about in the distance in the snow. He and several other men ran out to make contact with the desperate figure. They did not know who he was at first. The skin was falling off what remained of his flesh, most of his hair had fallen out, his hands and feet were barely functional, he was covered in frostbite and frozen sores, and he could hardly speak. Mawson collapsed in their arms, and his ordeal was over.

It was the greatest single feat in the history of polar exploration. He had had no assistance, little food and shelter, and only the most rudimentary equipment and navigational tools. His odyssey had covered 310 bitter miles. On his return to Australia in 1914, Mawson was knighted by King George V; never was the honor so well deserved. He wrote an engaging account of his experiences entitled The Home of the Blizzard, and occupied the remainder of his life in geologic study.

He had gone toe-to-toe with the Universe, and he had won.

Read More: Ascent Into Eternity: The Unconquerable Will Of George Mallory

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Women React To Not Being Your Priority

September 29, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Late one evening I was scheming with a friend at a rather trendy microbrew bar. We sat at a table in a far corner to avoid prying eyes and argued over some disagreement we had over business plans. I noticed a pair of women a few tables away eyeballing us for quite a while until one of them finally worked up the courage to walk over. I predicted she would say something snarky due to the way she was holding a wine glass, as well as her cackling laugh. Even before she got to the table, I was preparing to say something dismissive.

She asked us “Why you do guys look like you’re angry at the world?” I guess I must be getting old, because my friend beat me to the punch. He replied, “Because we are.” Oddly enough, admitting to being antisocial had the opposite effect of what was intended. She left for her table, immediately came back with her friend, and told us all about the school they were teachers at. However, before they returned, my friend and I agreed to see how far we could take the antisocial attitude with these two women. Little did we know we would stumble onto new ground for ourselves in gaming women.

Both ladies were in good shape and had steady employment as elementary school teachers. In addition, their politics were typical of any public school teacher, so trolling them on most social issues was relatively easy. My friend and I had a good time insulting their belief system, from criticizing their plebeian tastes in wine to laughing at the 2012 presidential election vote.

My friend actually got both of the numbers and promised to call them on Monday. While we’d had good time with over-the-top confrontations of irrational suburban women, we had priorities. We left to find somewhere more private to discuss more important matters. I noticed quite a few of the other woman at this bar watched us as we walked out.

Looking back at this and discussing this encounter with my friend, we realized the unintentional application of game in that situation was more effective than anything we had done consciously in the week prior. While it is hard to replicate the evening's specific circumstances, certain methods from that night can certainly be incorporated into our regular routines.

The Pinot Grigio-sipping educator who inquired about our physical appearance most likely was attempting to see if we were betas in disguise. Many men would fail the little test of asking why they looked angry. My friend's response was quick and unwavering. I guess she confused his arrogance and dismissiveness with confidence—I am sure she had never gotten a response like that before, and it must have intrigued her.

Her trip back to her table was a test to see if we would follow like little lapdogs. In that bar full of crunchy granola people, that is the default response. It was enough to get her friend interested in us more than her iPhone. At this point, they decided to pack up their caravan of smart phones, drinks, and expensive purses and move to our table. Their expensive accessories are actually what got me to question the depth of their beliefs in collectivist policies.

After 45 minutes of condescending banter, my friend and I wanted to return to our original business discussion. Surprisingly, the second woman was drinking something blue picked up on our lack of interest and put her hand on my friend's leg before passing him her number. Her friend saw this and decided to take her chances as well, writing her digits on a piece of receipt paper.

I think it might have been the first time in history that a man chose not to pursue a willing woman at that trendy bar. All the stylish black plastic-framed glasses of the women and some of the men in the bar seemed to have followed us out the door. I guess they never experienced much testosterone in that location.

This experience was entertaining for me because it highlighted many tenets of game by accident. First, we went to the bar to do something besides pick up women. They must have interpreted this is as indifference, which is exactly what it was. Second, the first woman’s inability to get us to jump through social validation hoops identified us as not the typical “m’ladies” that frequented that establishment. Third, the condescending conversation must have been interpreted as some form of dominance. Lastly, our premature exit most likely led them to believe we had something better of the female variety waiting in the wings.

I suggest you try going to a social establishment with some other purpose than to pick up women and see if they are drawn to you. You might be surprised at what happens.

Read More: Being A Misogynist Can Help You Get Laid

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

The Major Flaw In Today’s Perception Of Domestic Violence

September 30, 2014 | by B.M. West | Link | Original Link

A long time ago, there were men roaming the Earth in the same era as the Saber-toothed Tiger. Basically a tiger on steroids, man would want to avoid this beast at all costs. The tiger was larger, stronger, and better equipped at killing than man. Because of this power dynamic, man had a natural respect for the tiger. They coexisted in the same environment, often sharing similar food sources. Man would scavenge meat from leftover tiger kills. The tiger always had the right of way, and should a confrontation ensue, man was most often killed by the tiger. Man’s most basic instinct is that of self-preservation, and he would avoid confrontation with the tiger in order to preserve his life.

This same power dynamic exists between other animals. Lion > Hyena > Gazelle. Animals will always concede ground to their more powerful and dangerous counterparts in an effort to stay alive. They co-exist in the same areas, but an animal doesn’t dare provoke one higher than itself in the hierarchy. It’s one of the basic laws of nature.

The Human Dynamic

While the power dynamic is still very much present in humans, the relationship dynamic also carries equal weight. Humans can willingly repress their violent nature because they desire relationships with other humans. If you killed your best friend when you had a disagreement, you wouldn’t have any friends left. If you killed your sexual partner when they displeased you, you would have to go hunting for a new one. Your gut natural instinct may tell you to jump to violence, but our brains are incredibly powerful, and give us willpower—the ability to restrain our natural instincts in order to produce a more positive outcome. This is the driving characteristic that separates us from most of the animal kingdom.

Man vs. Man

Just like in the animal world, there is a natural power dynamic between men when it comes to physical violence and the ability to kill. In addition to our natural abilities, the evolution of weaponry has helped skew the natural order. Guy With Gun > NFL Linebacker > Gym Rat > Average Guy > Hipster > 8 Year Old Boy. As a general rule, it is not a good idea to provoke anyone higher than yourself in this hierarchy, as the potential for it to turn violent could conflict with your need for self-preservation. There are laws in place that try to minimize the confrontation between different levels, but we all know that humans don't always obey those laws.

This internal battle to abstain from violence is constantly in flux and, especially in men, the end result can come out anywhere on the spectrum. There are men in jail for murdering other men. There are men who are completely passive, and have never been in a fight in their lives. The more common scenario lies somewhere in the middle ground, where small amounts of violence are still used when men need to be reminded of the natural power dynamic.

Walk into any bar in the South, go up to a big redneck, and tell him his girl is an ugly cunt. I guarantee you'll be hit right in the face. A good old-fashioned fist fight is one of the ways men communicate. Up until recently it was perfectly acceptable to drag somebody outside and whip their ass because they "needed to be taught a lesson."

That "lesson" is simply a reminder of the natural power dynamic. The more powerful man is constantly suppressing his natural tendency for violence as a benefit to those around him. This requires a great deal of effort and patience. The moment the lesser man forgets this, he needs a reminder, and receives it in the form of a knuckle sandwich. Most of the time, the point is taken and the confrontation ends.

Man vs. Woman

Although I understand that Ronda Rousey could kick my ass, the natural power dynamic between men and women is hard to contest. The average man is more powerful and prone to violence than the average woman. It goes back to our early roles in human history—men fight the battles and kill for food; women give birth and nurture babies. For most of human history this was fully understood by both sexes. Since men appreciated women (for their sexual pleasure, for raising children, etc.), they desired a continuous relationship with women. Understanding that women were the weaker sex, men took extra care not to be violent with women, as it was beneficial to their mutual relationship.

This is where the old saying "real men don't hit women" originated. The key to this being true at the time was that in turn, women were respectful to men. They did not provoke men, as they knew they would be on the losing end of a physical confrontation. They appreciated men's ability to repress their violent nature in the name of a beneficial relationship between the two parties. They also understood the need for man's violent nature. It is this nature that provides safety and security. It's why "women and children first" was always the motto. It's why men fought the bad guys. Women understood the balance between having a man violent enough to provide security and not too violent as to cause her harm.

Enter Feminism

One of feminism's main goals has been to take the violent nature out of men. Even in young children, boys in school are reprimanded for even the smallest acts of violence—holding a toy like a gun, drawing a violent picture, or pushing other kids down on the playground. In grown men, acts like grabbing a woman's wrist in the heat of an argument became full-on physical assault. When we stopped touching them completely, they came up with "emotional abuse." They have tried to label any negative reaction a man has to a woman's behavior as abuse.

Simultaneously, they have lost all respect for men. Today's women feel that they can say and do anything to a man, yet he should not be able to respond. She can yell and scream all she wants, but if he raises his voice above hers, it is emotional abuse. If she slaps, punches, or bites him and he hits back, it is physical abuse. The problem with this concept is that the definition of abuse is dependent on the hierarchy of the power dynamic. It is only abuse because He is physically stronger than She. It's not abuse because She isn't really capable of physically hurting Him. Abuse can only go from higher to lower in the power dynamic.

Here lies the hypocritical flaw in today's perception of domestic violence: Women want the benefit of the natural power dynamic without any of the consequences. They want the men to protect them. They want to be able to cry abuse when they are subjected to violence. Yet they do not want to acknowledge the power dynamic and respect someone with greater physical strength. They want to be able to provoke a man to his breaking point, yet have the man restrain all natural physical reactions.

And you know what? They've got it. That is how the western world works today, for the most part. Most men don't hit women. Most men will deal with a woman screaming at them and simply do not react— they work to suppress the anger. It isn't because we respect women, or don't have the violent urges anymore. It's because we don't want to go to jail. But every now and then, Ray Rice hits back, and the world loses its mind.

Janay Rice wasn't sitting on the couch minding her own business when Ray walked up and punched her in the face. Rihanna wasn't making pancakes when Chris Brown walked in the kitchen and slapped the shit out of her. Violence is rarely unprovoked. It's a natural reaction to being pushed to your breaking point. I'm not condoning domestic violence or hitting women. In fact, in both the cases above, the man's violence was awful and incredibly disproportionate to the level of force or arguing that the women were using.

However, if you slap a tiger in the face, don’t be surprised when it eats you. That’s just common sense. Maybe you should learn to respect the Tiger a little more.

Read More: Violence Is A Means To An End, Not A Coming Of Age Ritual

B.M. West
B.M. West is a musician and army vet. Married, and disappointed that red pill information wasn't readily available in his single days, he uses it to better his marriage and open the eyes of the younger generation.

Inside The Mind Of The Social Justice Wanker

September 30, 2014 | by Mark | Link | Original Link

A social justice warrior, or SJW, is a person who has made it their mission to rid the world of perceived social injustice. Ironically their methods are often zealous, manipulative, and unjust. The range of “ills” that SJWs campaign against is endless. It could quite literally be anything like sexism, racism, inequality, animal testing, or meat consumption. SJW’s are always on the extreme fringes of the politically left.

The social justice warrior term is a misnomer, for the SJW does nothing more than pester and bully from behind a keyboard. They are actually cowards. It’s important to note that people who actually want to improve the world, however naive their beliefs may be, are going to third world countries and offering their time, knowledge, and manpower to improve the lives of others. These are not SJW’s, but aid workers, comprised of teachers and doctors who risk their lives as they combat disease, illiteracy, and famine. By comparison, the SJW is a couch potato whose level of contribution ranges from retweeting lies to ranting on Youtube about sexism in video games.

I henceforth propose that the term SJW should be changed from social justice warrior to social justice wanker. An SJW can be either male or female, however the latter is far more common and enjoys a significantly higher degree of influence, as there is always a ready stream of beta male orbiters available to do the female SJW’s bidding.

SJW’s confuse justice with spite, harassment, and vengeance. Take for instance the donglegate case. Adria Richards, a feminist SJW, released a picture over Twitter of two developers she overheard making a dongle joke during the PyCon software convention.

As a consequence the two men were fired, one of whom had three kids and wife to support. This latter triggered the notorious hacker, “for-chin”, to take over her website. Following the dongle gate case, her employer sacked her.

As mentioned earlier, the SJW’s do not care for real cases of racism or sexism which can be found in developing nations. As one blogger put it:

> “Modern feminists and Social Justice Warriors, having fixated on the flaws of the highly progressive and rights-sensitive culture of the West they are embedded in, have a tendency to see Western culture as soiled and unjust, while other cultures have greater authenticity and deserve respect. Thus it is when you discuss the genital mutilation practiced by some Muslims on girls or the pogroms against the Muslim Rohingya people of Burma by Buddhists, their outrage is muted by a desire to agitate only against the villains in their own parent culture. They take to Twitter to emotionalize the kidnapping of hundreds of young girls by Boko Haram while failing to exert their outrage on behalf of the hundreds of boys killed in similar incidents.”

SJWs display the traits of religious fanatics. Just like a cult, they indoctrinate those that are most socially vulnerable. They isolate them and extract resources from them.

> “The modern definition of a mind control cult is any group which employs mind control and deceptive recruiting techniques. In other words cults trick people into joining and coerce them into staying. This is the definition that most people would agree with. Except the cults themselves of course!”
> – http://www.cultwatch.com/howcultswork.html

Weak-willed people are specifically vulnerable to SJW ideology, as they have a pathological need for a sense of belonging. Once they are in, they are about exclusivity and not inclusivity. They spend time and energy making themselves stand out as the most oppressed of the group in order to gain standing. They do not wish to end the perceived ills they claim to fight for, because they thrive on it! It makes them feel relevant. The newly-indoctrinated SJW becomes belligerent with those around him, and will start to alienate friends and family.

An anonymous ex-SJW described his (?) experience:

> “I was pretty strong into the “social justice” crowd. Looking back, that whole thing seems like a cult. It lures in vulnerable people, especially young people. People who are going through puberty and trying to figure out their sexuality. People who might be dealing with disability or mental illness, or those whose family is breaking up.
>
> It sucks them in by spoon feeding the idea that they are special and worthy. It guilts them if they don’t treat everybody else as special and worthy too. It starts forcing you to see everybody as being in a hierarchy Then it gets you to alienate yourself from your friends. Your friends sometime makes racist/sexist > jokes? Cut her out of your life. Got any conservative friends? Cut them out of your life. Got any friends who are white straight men? Cut them out of your life. They are oppressors. Constantly berate people if they slip up, because everybody else must be held to the same standard that you are and no other ways of thinking are ”right”.

>
> Then it tells you to start criticising and trying to change your family. It tells you to “call out” any little thing they do “wrong”. It warps your perception until you are a victim and constantly on the defence. It breaks you off from everybody and makes you feel awful for things you cannot control, and then, if you disagree or start questioning, it cuts you off from the only support you have left, and you are attacked and viciously berated. Maybe if you grovel enough they’ll let you be redeemed and come back, but if you will never be allowed to forget the one mistake you made.
>
> Eventually I found anti-SJW blogs, where people were actively critiquing these concepts and the SJW culture. Originally I felt nothing but hatred for them, but then the words started to sink in. I started questioning whether this was really “right”. I saw how so many people leading the crowd were hugely hypocritical. I realised that I had been causing the problems in my life, not “oppression”. I apologised to my family for how I had been acting and I am lucky that they still supported me. I had lost a lot of friends, including some people I was very close to. It has taken me a long time to rebuild those relationships. It was a very bad period of my life, and one that took me a lot of effort to drag myself away from.” –Source

The SJW cult is socially driven by the collective, as there is no leader. In order to pull rank within their movement, SJWs accuse others of being less revolutionary than they are, and thus framing their own as heretics or anti-revolutionaries, just like in the French Reign Of Terror.

The SJW movement is a neo-inquisition, shielding itself from scrutiny by using the old card trick of accusing their critics of sexism, racism, and other -isms. These people are in no position to deal with justice. They are single minded, they do not accept rebuttals, and they respond to criticism by character assassination of their critics.

SJW’s are notoriously single-minded and cannot cope with criticism. When they are confronted on their ideology they resort to censorship.

Social justice wankers are characterized by their narcissistic personality disorder. They get mutual validation and reinforcement from other SJWs. They have a hive mind mentality enforced by sessions of groupthink.

> “The majority of these people show disturbing signs of narcissistic personality disorder- anything said is reinterpreted as accusation and attack on them, those accusations are instantly reflected back at the accuser, they are incapable of assuming responsibility for their own actions or their situation, they see > themselves as morally perfect, they constantly redefine and invent dismissive language and rhetoric to suit their agenda, and they always underline how they are being unjustly persecuted."

The next time you see someone making outlandish claims of victimhood in the name of "social justice," keep in mind their ulterior motives. Avoid the wanker's influence at all costs.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Feminist Laci Green Is Trying To Censor Youtube Without Consent

Mark

Mark is a seasoned traveller and philander who enjoys a smoke and glass of bourbon. He is an avid reader and a Political History enthusiast. Occasionally enjoys shit posting on the Guardian or the Telegraph. You can read his other ROK articles, and follow him on twatter and Google+1. His articles are proofread by InfoShinobi.

Unconditional Love From A Woman Is Impossible

September 30, 2014 | by Netanderthal Man | Link | Original Link

There's a feminist myth called "unconditional love" floating around our culture. You are EXPECTED to love your girl no matter what. To love her more than you love yourself. We all know on some level that this is bollocks poured on top of our heads by mind-washing feminist propaganda, but many of us continue to propagate it anyway. "The one" myth is a gangrene that will eat your soul if you buy into it.

I believe that a person can come close to unconditional love in three cases: your love for your parents, for your children, and perhaps for the first dog you raised from pup. They all are literally willing to walk into fire for you.

Loyalty and friendship are concepts no woman can ever fully understand. It's not deliberate, it's in their nature—it's evolution. A woman will unconditionally love her offspring only—if she is a good mother. Aside from this, women love conditionally and opportunistically. You can't change that. But once you know it, you can act accordingly.

Consider the stone age if you will: Men hunting during the dawn of humanity needed other men of the tribe to watch their backs during the hunt. That's why men are naturally inclined to build strong friendships where loyalty is a real value. One weakness that stems from it is that men take things at face value. Especially with women. Only through their own experiences (both successes and failures) men learn to take what women say and do with a pinch of salt.

Evolutionarily speaking, friendship and loyalty makes sense for men. For women, not so much. And this is why: a tribe's women, safely shielded by the cave walls, did not need that kind of protection. Their only real fear was each other's competition, roughly known as SMV. They fine-tuned themselves in the art of manipulating both men and women for obvious reasons.

I am convinced this is why female reasoning is based on emotions. By employing a flatulent burst of emotions, a woman most likely gets what she wants. This obvious manipulation is not necessarily a conscious decision, more likely it's embedded in her nature. It follows that women are incapable of loyalty and friendship towards men, just as men are incapable of giving birth.

The reason people accept the existence of unconditional love script is childhood. Your parents loved you with all their hearts and the template for what love is supposed to be was set during those early years. You loved them back in the same unconditional manner. And it was great. But your woman is not your mom. She is a fickle-minded person who's most likely looking out for a prettier branch to grab right now.

Make no mistake, even when a woman is deeply "in love" with you, her love is not unconditional.

Most likely she's madly in love with you because you are the man who rocks her world.

Keep being that man if she makes your life better, or discard her if she doesn't. So, she loves you because you're the best high-quality man she can get, but this sooner or later be subject to change. If at some point she feels she can get a man perceived as higher quality than you, her love for you will decrease exponentially. This is what we call conditional love—a woman's love. Don't worry about it, be aware that in a 5-mile radius there are at least 100 hotter girls more than willing to give it up for the smooth seducer that you are.

This is what feminists, betas, and manginas will never understand: in the vast majority of cases, it's just "the one" you're banging now, "the one" you'll be banging tomorrow, and "the one" you banged yesterday. If you're the most alpha a girl can get, you are "the one" for her (hypergamy at play here) even or should I say especially if you dump her.

Just like you have your own template for what love should be, her father is the childhood template for what a real man should be like. One method I found to be effective in seducing a girl is to emulate some of her father's traits—the good traits. Ask her about her father. The more she talks about him, the more ammo she's giving you on how to seduce her. This works mainly if she has a good relationship with her father.

Unconditional love is seamlessly entwined with "the one" chimera in our media and culture. Most men walk aimlessly through life searching for "the one." They can't find her and perceive themselves as failures. It's quite sad. But you will not be one of those men.

Read More: Thoughts On The Red Pill From A 21-Year-Old Student

Netanderthal Man
Netanderthal Man saw the light of day somewhere in Eastern Europe. He enjoys life as creative director and owner of a design studio. He is a big fan of Occam's razor, Pink Floyd, Roald Dahl and wet tight pussy, is politically incorrect and his favourite dish is roasted unicorn with rainbow gravy.

What “Public Enemies” Taught Me About Pack Mentality

October 1, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Michel Houellebecq is rightly considered by many to be the godfather of the manosphere. His novels Whatever (1994), Atomised (1998), Platform (2001), and The Possibility of an Island (2005) all deal, to a greater or lesser extent, with the impossibility of love in a world where sex has become commoditised. Initially a controversial figure who scandalised French literary society with his nihilistic writings and his habit of drunkenly hitting on female interviewers, he has been accused of racism, misogyny, and Islamophobia while his books have been dismissed as pornography and poorly-written polemic.

More recently, though, his reputation has fared better with his last novel The Map and The Territory, winning the prestigious Prix Goncourt in 2010. He is now the subject of a new film called The Kidnapping of Michel Houellebecq (2014). Here he is on the inequalities of the sexual marketplace:

> In societies like ours sex truly represents a second system of differentiation, completely independent of money; and as a system it functions just as mercilessly . . . Just like unrestrained economic liberalism. . . sexual liberalism produces phenomena of absolute pauperism. Some men make love every day; others make love five or six times in their life, or never. It’s what’s known as “the law of the market”. In a totally liberal sexual system certain people have a varied and exciting erotic life; others are reduced to masturbation and solitude…

I have read and loved all of Houellebecq’s novels (as well as his pictorial novella Lanzarote (2000)), but it wasn’t until fairly recently that I picked up a book called Public Enemies which he published in 2008 with French intellectual and author Bernard-Henri Levi. A series of letters between the two men where they discuss everything from literature to sex to politics, family and fame, it is a fascinating insight into Houellebecq’s philosophical views.

But I was particularly struck by a section written by Levi. Houellebecq had at the time been suffering a lot of negative press and public attention. The backlash against his international popularity was at its height, and worse, his estranged mother had just published a book publically denigrating him as an “evil, stupid little bastard . . . who alas came from my womb . . . a liar, an imposter and . . . a petite arriviste ready to do absolutely anything for money and fame.” The knives were out for Houellebecq, who confessed to Levi that he was feeling embattled and cornered. Levi’s advice on pack mentality and how to deal with it has, I believe, wider application, particularly for those who are vilified for holding views that run counter to the mainstream. Here are his four insights.

1. The Pack is Afraid

Levi writes that it is “easy to forget when you see [the pack] advance with such fury and ferocity, so hungry and driven” but that “it is much more afraid than we are.” They have an “all-encompassing fear of life, death . . . their inescapable mediocrity and their ruined ambitions.” Knowing this, “you yourself are less afraid and better armed to resist and fight.”

He recommends going on the offensive. Somewhat incredibly, he relates a personal story about threatening a journalist who was planning to write a negative story about him with violent repercussions. The journalist grumbles but backs down and doesn’t include the contentious details in his article.

Always stand up to bullies—they are scared and they will retreat in the face of resistance.

2. The Pack is Weak

Levi argues that the pack is weak not only because it is afraid, but also because:

> It’s driven . . . by fear, mockery, resentment, hatred, bitterness, spite, anger, cruelty, derision, scorn, all of which Spinoza called the negative emotions [which] . . . make you weak, not strong, are a sign of impotence, not power, which diminish the ego and reduce its capacity to act, indeed profoundly debilitate it, making it unworthy and unintelligently aggressive.

Spinoza, he says, notes that “with negative emotions you may succeed in the short term, but, by definition, in the long term you’ll lose.”

It is better to be busy and single-minded in the pursuit of worthwhile projects:

> Those who, not so much out of virtue as through their make-up, self-discipline or just because they have something better to do (e.g. a new book to write), manage to escape this merry-go-round of poisonous emotions . . . Joy makes [a person] intelligent and strong, whereas spite is a poison and sooner or later poison kills.

This mirrors a key tenet of manosphere thinking: that each man should have a mission he is passionate about.

3. The Pack is Stupid

The pack is “like a great lump of an animal that can’t see beyond the end of its nose.” You outsmart it by > Moving, just moving. When the pack attacks, the tendency is to curl up, bury yourself in a hole, to freeze. But you need to do the opposite. You need to spread yourself out . . . move as much as you can. Put the greatest possible distance between yourself and the pack. Increase your sidestepping, springing forward, strategic withdrawals, surprise attacks, pincer manoeuvres, counter-attacks or simply diversions and avoidance.

Levi notes that Baudelaire “proposed two new entries to the list of human rights: the right to contradict yourself and the right to leave.” Use them. By being nimble and supple, and by moving in unexpected directions, you will outsmart your enemies.

4. The Pack Is Never Entirely A Pack

In my book about meeting women, I argue that there is no such thing as consensus. Guys are naturally nervous about getting rejected publically. Say you approach a girl in a busy station and she rebuffs you. You will likely feel embarrassed because you imagine that everyone around thinks badly of you. But human beings are all different, and there is no uniform point of view. Some will think you are very brave for having approached. Others will be envious of your lack of inhibitions. Levi talks of the readers who have corresponded with him over the years and supported him through controversies and arguments, and the bloggers who similarly continued to support Houellebecq.

In those times when you are facing seemingly widespread public or social censure, it is helpful to keep in mind that this is never the full story. To some extent, the notion of the pack is a myth—people are individuals and all differ in their opinions, even if they claim otherwise to fit in. The best course of action is to remain true to yourself regardless of feedback and trust that there are others out there who think the same as you do.

To learn more about how to reject pack mentality and attract beautiful women click here

Read More: The Most Important Quality All Players Have

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Feminism Is On The Retreat

October 1, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

I'm going to boldly declare that feminism is finally ebbing away. It's amazing to see, since realistically many of us didn't expect to see it receding for at least another few years. But the change is here.

A campaign called It's On Us, an attempt to shame men into accommodating women, has been a disastrous failure, receiving (as Aaron Clarey aka Captain Capitalism points out) a massive backlash from people calling out their feminist talking points. Several of the It's On Us spokes'men' are high level celebrities, but unfortunately they found out the hard way that it's feminists who blindly worship celebrities, not normal people. The Youtube videos for proponents of the It's On Us campaign have been, to use the parlance of the interwebz, downvoted into oblivion: the people have spoken, and the response to the call for men to elevate women even higher has been a giant middle finger.

In one of the most shameful and embarrassing moments of my generation, Emma Watson recently went to the United Nations to give a speech about how evil men are, trying to kick-start a cringe worthy campaign called #HeForShe, asking men to further submit to women's whims. Although the media tried to hype this up, the people roundly rejected Emma's talking points. After all, Emma is a known hypocrite. Not only is she dating the very definition of a jerkish Alpha male:

but she has also complained about the soft spoken men her #HeForShe campaign is trying to create:

Emma Watson faces backlash after gender equality speech

By Lisa Rogers Franco, CNN

Emma says men don't have to be aggressive...

"If men don't have to be aggressive in order to be accepted, women won't feel compelled to be submissive," she said. "If men don't have to control, women won't have to be controlled. Both men and women should feel free to be sensitive. Both men and women should feel free to be strong. ... It is time that we all perceive gender on a spectrum, not as two opposing sets of ideals."

Opinion: Emma Watson gives feminism new life

'English guys are very restrained': Emma Watson doubts she will ever date a British man again

By Jennifer Ruby and Daniel Bates in New York

PUBLISHED: 00:00 EDT, 10 October 2013 | UPDATED: 10:40 EDT, 10 October 2013

...unless they want to be attractive.

But now Emma Watson has said she doubts she will date a British man ever again - because they are too shy.

The Harry Potter star said that even though men from the UK dress well and have good manners, they take two months just to ask her out.

Instead an American will come up to her straight away and suggest a date - a boldness she finds attractive.

#GamerGate is a scandal in the video game industry brought about by the revelation that a self-proclaimed feminist slept with influential men in the industry in order to get favors and press. After the revelation, feminists have been trying to say that this is a misogynistic attack on females, not fans (called Gamers) of video games railing against corruption in their favored industry. Gamers were having none of it, and even after the feminists in the video game industry and their enabling male lapdogs have done everything to undermine, coerce, and silence the opposition, the Gamers are still holding them responsible. The feminists even managed to get notorious website 4chan censored. The people responded by making 8chan.

Anti-feminist mode can be found in the most random and seemingly unrelated places. Here is a silly little video called YouTube Poop: Bobby Will Never Be MLG. At the :40 mark Bobby Hill enters a Femi-Nazi Class.

The (current) top comments on the video are lambasting feminism, or decrying that they hope the video creator didn't think all feminists were like that. All from a random YouTube video that briefly mentions feminism.

Speaking of which, “Not All Feminists Are Like That” has recently emerged as well, meaning that many people who identified as feminists are now separating themselves from the core of the movement. There was a comic on the image sharing site Imgur which exposes the division.

The comic derides Tumblr Feminists, a supposedly more irrational and angry group of feminists. The comments on the picture agree, lamenting that > “If your exposure to feminism has been mostly online, then you haven’t really been exposed to it. This holds true for feminists as well.”

That comment makes no sense (how is offline feminism different from online? It’s an idea…), but it had 1159 upvotes. These people clearly like the selfish perks feminism brings them, but they don’t like the fact that people outside of their belief system are now vocally saying the truth, that feminism is a movement of selfish, hypocritical scam artists and misandrists.

The public which has silently suffered feminism for so long is finally beginning to voice it’s opinion, which is not favorable to the movement all, and already feminists are eating themselves to distance themselves from one another even though they are, at their core, all the same evil people. There’s already a parallel movement called Equalism on the rise: it is the same thing as feminism (lower the standards for women, give undeserving women more cash and prices because she has a vagina, pretend this somehow makes the sexes on par with one another). Feminists can’t handle any real backlash against them—they are all paper tigers, so now the more prescient ones are attempting to relabel themselves as something else to avoid the public’s outcry.

There’s a very visible change happening in the public opinion against feminism. The tide has turned, and feminism is dead. It will take a long time to rot away, yes, and it’s already done so much damage that there may be little worth rebuilding, but it is done. Feminism is done.

The biggest challenge now is to stop it from rising under a new flag (Equalism or other silly -isms). We mustn’t let them change their banners and come back to continue their poison under a different name. They’ve ruined the lives of too many men and women to simply let these creatures go gently into that good night. We must continue to hammer on them, even as they fall apart and consume themselves. The victory over feminism must not be one of magnanimity and half measures. Theirs was a doctrine of genuine evil, and they gave no quarter to good people when they were in charge.

We, in turn, must not give these monsters any back.

Read More: Top 10 Pictures From The Growing “Women Against Feminism” Movement

Billy Chubbs
Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

What To Do When She Claims To Have Been Raped In The Past

October 1, 2014 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

"I was raped."

If you've been navigating your way across the American dating landscape for any period of time, chances are pretty solid that you've heard this at least once in your lifetime. These words can be chilling, especially if they're coming from a woman that you hold in high esteem, or possibly love.

The most common emotions for the majority of men would be vexation and despair. "I would kill that mother fucker if I had the chance," one man might say.

"Don't worry sweetheart, you're with me now, and I'll never let anyone ever hurt you again," is another possible line spoken by a sympathetic man.

No one can blame a guy for these responses, they are completely normal and noble reactions.I would say out of the many women I've dated in the past, I've heard this claim from roughly 30 percent of them—an incredibly high number. That's quite disconcerting, considering I make it a point not to date women that come from the bars or clubs where alcohol and drug use run rampant. However, many of these women had lived or were living the college life, and were actively engaged in the typical trappings associated with that environment. On the flip-side, however, I've never met a college educated man (or any man for that matter) that has been an abuser or a rapist—neither accused nor convicted. Something doesn't add up with this equation.

Due to my experiences with the opposite sex, and seeing the lengths women will go to for attention, I can't help but be somewhat skeptical of these claims. A man has an obligation to unearth the truth at all costs. It's in his best interests to do so—nobody will ever care about a man's best interests more than himself. But it's not enough to simply acquire the truth. The reasons for being faced with subterfuge in the first place must be examined as well. Why do I encounter so many women that claim to have been raped?

I speculate it's because I'm not a very sensitive person. When women are with a man who starves them of sympathy for things the majority of guys coddle them over—things like an asshole boss, a backstabbing friend, or a financial predicament—women have a propensity to look for bigger and bigger trigger points to tug at the man's heart strings. That's when they start throwing out the "Hail Mary"s in an attempt to get the attention they so desperately crave.

They don't just do it with rape or abuse, either. I've seen it a lot with hypochondria as well. Women will greatly exaggerate the extent of their medical problems. A mild headache that can easily be treated with a couple of Tylenol becomes, "I think I need to see a neuro-oncologist due to several malignant cerebellar astrocytomas destroying my motor skills," or a sore back from a sedentary work environment becomes, "I think I need spinal fusion surgery due to spondylolisthesis, it's really painful and it's affecting my mobility." I'm exaggerating for effect here… but not by much.

Real Eyes Realize Real Lies

Due to this constant stream of attention pandering from women, coupled with my somewhat incredulous nature, I have a go-to question that I immediately throw back at women whenever they start talking about being raped:

"The guy that did it is rotting away in prison, right?"

Not a single woman has ever answered "yes" to that question. Out of a very healthy sample size of women—not one fucking "yes."

That's alarming, to put it mildly. None of these women even pressed charges against their so-called attackers, either. After a little more interrogating, it was usually revealed that a previous boyfriend pressured them for sex, or they got drunk off their asses and didn't remember what happened. One girl in particular said she was raped by an ex-boyfriend at a party, and that her new boyfriend at the time broke up with her as a result. If I'm supposed to be compassionate towards a woman who was dumped because she got black-out drunk at a party with her ex-boyfriend and then ended up with him alone, in a bedroom, and in a sexual situation… Well, lets just say the compassion train won't be pulling into that fucking station anytime soon.

This same woman later told me that she called the cops on her neighbors for making too much noise one night. Interesting, isn't it? She wouldn't report being forced to have sex against her will, but if her neighbors started getting a little loud and rowdy at 1:00 AM on a Tuesday? Call in the fucking S.W.A.T. team. I'm sure that I'm not alone in thinking that behavior is a bit dubious.

Women are tattletales. That's just what they do—they're fucking narcs. They're like this from the time they're little girls. Almost every detention I ever received in school—and there were plenty—was due to some girl ratting me out for something. If a woman was truly the victim of a savage attack, she's not going to just let it roll off her back like nothing happened. When shit gets real, women always go for help.

Getting Down To Business

If Return Of Kings conducted a poll asking its readership about their most disappointing sexual experiences, what would the most common answer likely be? Aside from maybe a toothy blowjob here or a pussy that looked like the Predator without its mask on there, I assume the vast majority of us would say, "She just laid there." The proverbial dead fish: a woman that doesn't fuck back.

Men despise it when they're sexually engaged with a woman and she isn't responsive—we can't stand it. We want a woman that thoroughly enjoys being intimate with us. Very few dudes get off on the idea of fucking a sedated capsized turtle. We have a natural biological aversion to sticking our cocks in what is essentially one step above a dead body. Dead bodies don't make babies, therefore, they don't turn us on and we don't fuck them. In short: sloppy passed-out drunk broads don't get our dicks hard. Couple this with the fact that getting sloppy drunk as a man usually means "whiskey dick," and you've pretty much arrived at a situation that is not only unstimulating and undesirable, but also unfeasible.

Several years ago I also conducted an experiment with my ex, whom I was with for five years. I'm a big dude, well over 6′ and 200+ pounds. She was about 5'4 and 110 pounds. Bear in mind, this was a mutual endeavor—a test to see how well she could protect herself against an attacker.The goal was to get her jeans and underwear off. Basically, a simulated rape attack. She could do whatever she wanted to defend herself within reason—as in don't punch me in the face, gouge my eyes, kick me in the dick, etc.

After about four minutes of wrestling with her, I was able to get her jeans unbuttoned and her zipper down—that's it. That's all I could do in four minutes. To get this woman naked, somehow acquire and sustain an erection throughout all of the chaos, and then manage to penetrate her would have been fucking impossible. The only way it could have been done would have been to either beat the shit out of her, or threaten her with a weapon. There was no other way. If this was a real world situation, she would've screamed her head off while scratching, biting, kicking and clawing at anything she could. Help would've arrived within a couple of minutes—at most—if this was happening at a college party.

This brings us to another fact about men: we like beautiful healthy looking women. We don't want to have sex with a woman that has a beat-up face and bruising all over her body. And we certainly don't want to be the cause of any of that bodily harm, either. No man looks at the recent pictures of Christy Mack and says, "Damn, look at that fractured orbital bone, I gotta get me some of that shit." The men that are actually into that sort of stuff are a very extreme minority.

What’s A Man To Do?

All of this has made me adopt a very tough stance on women and their rape claims. The simple fact of the matter is whenever I hear the word “rape” come from a woman’s mouth—especially if she didn’t file a police report—it’s over. If a rape did or did not occur is of no concern to me—I’m bailing out whether it’s true or not. That probably seems stone-cold to some readers, but what’s the alternative?

Some might say, “If the rape was real, then how can you judge someone for something that was out of their control you victim blaming piece of shit!?”

Simple, I’m not judging them for what happened in their past—I’m judging them for who they will be for the rest of their lives. If a rape truly happened—that’s unfortunate and good luck with everything. If a woman was involved in a car wreck that wasn’t her fault and found herself paralyzed and confined to a wheelchair, I wouldn’t date her either. Why? Because I don’t date women in wheelchairs. It’s not their fault, and doesn’t make them bad people. They just have an affliction that extends beyond my comfort zone. Cards get shuffled and then they get dealt, not everyone will draw an ace.

As a man you have to assess how your life will be as a result of being with someone that experienced something as traumatic as rape—real or perceived. When someone goes through something exceedingly distressing, that person will never be the same again. These women tend to have triggers that keep them from being truly intimate with a man. No touching certain areas, don’t do this, don’t do that—it’s a lot of burden to shoulder for a guy that’s just trying to make his way through life with minimal complications.

“But but you need to be patient and understanding!”

No, I don’t.

There’s no shortage of men out there willing to grab their capes and play the role of a hero, I won’t be one of them. I’m not a therapist and I’m not running a human being overhaul facility. It’s out of the scope of my talents and capabilities to heal or fix a rape victim—I don’t even see the need to try. If you’re a man that values your sanity and well-being, I suggest you let one of the heros come along and attempt to save the day. If you’re involved with a woman and she has a questionable rape story—stop dealing with her. You don’t know if her next rape fable could contain you as the antagonist—you’d better fucking run, seriously.

In Closing

It strikes a nerve when you realize that many women have no qualms with throwing a man under the bus if it means a modicum of attention can be obtained as a result. When I was listening to these women make their sketchy rape claims, I would often think of the men they were accusing. I would think of how incensed they would be to know that women they were once intimate with (or possibly not) are now desecrating their characters in an attempt to procure a morsel of pity that they don’t deserve—all at his expense.

Chances are, if these same men were sitting there having a conversation with them instead of me, being told the same things I was hearing about them being raped in the past, they would probably say, “I would kill that mother fucker if I had the chance!” Almost no men are rapists, but almost all women will play Faust at the crossroads and sell off their dick-stained 10-cent souls in exchange for attention.

Women can no longer take a firm stand on the moral high ground because they don’t own any fucking property there. Their lies and cries for attention have eroded their credibility to the point that good people—and true victims—must suffer as a consequence of their actions. Men have their hands tied. They can’t say or do anything lest they be accused of victim blaming, misogyny, or whatever other string of bullshit buzzwords one can conjure up. And as for women? They refuse to police their own because at the end of the day the only thing that matters is that “Team Women” comes out on top. The shattered lives and reputations of innocent men left in their wakes are irrelevant.

As a man, the bottom line is that you must judge the people you allow into your world with inexorable and unwavering ferocity. This means both your close friendships with men and all of your relationships with women, but it’s especially true for your dealings with women. It is your responsibility to be completely ruthless in gauging the character of a woman that is angling to become even a diminutive part of your life—only the best players are allowed to join your team. Everyone else? They can go fuck themselves. And as for women that cry rape for attention? Well, as far as people that can go fuck themselves are concerned, they don’t have very much competition at the top of the list.

People are like dirt. They can either nourish you and help you grow as a person or they can stunt your growth and make you wilt and die. – Plato

Read More: Female University Student Carries Around Mattress She Was “Raped” On

A.V. Yader

A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

Since When Does Getting “Raped” Count As Art?

October 2, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

On my post about heroicism, a commenter posted a picture of the “rape victim” with her mattress, and the commenters of course cracked all sorts of jokes in true dehumanizing fashion. It was kind of beautiful. For those of you who haven’t heard, a college art major is carrying around the mattress she claims to have been raped on as her senior art thesis project. Her rape has been a great event to unite the community, and everyone in the photos looks like they’re having a gay old time. Being a rape victim looks like so much fun!

The word “art” is from the Latin “artis”, meaning “skill.” It referred more to weaving than to painting at the time. Still, what we think of as art within the last 500 years has generally involved skill. Now, though, anyone can be an artist with the right funding and media attention.

The Value of a Liberal Arts Education

In my state university aesthetics class, we spent a good deal of time making fun of Thomas Kinkade, and although I wouldn’t call him creative or original, at least what he did had a large amount of skill involved. I certainly couldn’t paint pictures like that.

The other thing we made fun of in that class was modern art. Our go-to term was “shit on the wall.” Never has a truer statement been uttered at a secular-liberal college. We discussed such fine works of American ingenuity as Tilted Arc, Elegy to the Spanish Republic, and Fountain, and finally we took a field trip to the school art museum. The work there was so lacking in substance that any painting that was vaguely traditional was championed by the students. The great centerpiece of the exhibit was a line of lipstick in various shades. In the front corner was a light shining on the wall with an “Ask” price-tag. American education at its finest, no doubt. Where should I send my tuition check?

The Ubiquity of the Decline

This lack of talent has affected all areas of contemporary art, not just visual art. Take, for example, all the hip-hop artists who are considered to be musical geniuses. Degradation in music is nothing new, comparatively speaking. Yes, cheap pop has been celebrated by the masses since man first crawled out of the mud, but I doubt it’s always been considered high art. Again, we see change with our fancy 20th century Eurocentric liberalism. Consider John Cage or Schoenberg. I’ll grant that “4:33” is a cool idea, but what did Cage do beyond that? Perhaps Cage and Schoenberg took a lot of effort in planning their compositions, but was any of it enjoyable? The great masters of dissonance—Stravinsky and Thelonius Monk—are widely influential because they are entertaining, but listening to Schoenberg is a chore. I’d rather hear my mother prattle on about the dangers of smoking than listen to his material.

Historically, most poets have been men, and good female writers have been few and far between. Yet today poetry is considered feminine, as is art in general. Men avoid poetry like they avoid Curves. Do you know why? It’s because in high school, they showed us the worst pedantic dribble they could find, or at least, if they showed us something worthwhile, they told us it can mean whatever we want it to, regardless of the artist’s intention.

I was told “Stopping by the Woods on a Snowy Evening” was about life choices, just like how we were about to make a choice about college. Obviously, I thought the poem was shit. Some time later, a friend made the argument that the poem was about suicide and could be about nothing else, and suddenly it became one of my favorites. A dopehead felon had taught me more about literature in a moment than a woman with a graduate degree in English did over a full year.

The Impact of the Decadence

So is carrying a mattress around campus art? There is such a thing as performance art, and silly as it may seem, it generally involves some kind of physical suffering or negative social consequences beyond sore muscles. Art, more than anything, involves creativity. This has been an ontological part of the word’s definition throughout its entire history. As fun as it looks, what’s creative about carrying around a mattress? Even if she really was raped, and even if she is going to bring major social change for the betterment of all mankind, is this really art? Keep in mind that this is her major. She went to college with the intention of learning how to carry a mattress. I wonder if she actually learned to paint during her time there.

I understand that words evolve over time, but at what point does it break so much from the original that it’s lost its essence? That is to say, the state of the arts today are a Theseus's Paradox. This is true not just for the high arts, but also for the low. Consider country music. Is Taylor Swift or Brad Paisley really country? Does overdubbing a subtle banjo make a song country? True, genres morph over time, but to quote Kris Kristofferson, "If it sounds country, that's what it is." I have much the same gripe with fusion being labelled as jazz, but at least fusion artists are truly creative and enjoyable.

Francis Schaeffer pointed out that art historically has reflected the worldview of the time. Art today is so fragmented and relative because society's philosophy is fragmented and relative. Western society is lost in an identity crisis, and so our mode of expression is broken. Compare this to the optimism of the Renaissance and the beauty they produced then. If art is the diary of humanity, then you can track the history and decline of a civilization based on its art more than anything else. We are no exception.

Read More: Did OKCupid's Experiments Increase The Likelihood Of Rape?

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

A New Hope: An Interview With The Founder Of 8chan

October 2, 2014 | by redpiller1985 | Link | Original Link

This past month or so has been crazy for people who are into the video game subculture. A woman who couldn't practice monogamy unearthed a cabal of game industry people working like the KGB to stop real freedom of opinion in gaming culture. We found the little hole and discovered the catacombs the size of Canada underneath our foundation.

Many sources ignored this web of nepotism and cronyism, but only one journalistic website covered the story properly. Return Of Kings published critical pieces of the broken mafia (a term that describes social justice warriors better). Here are some of the examples of the writing done so far. This one details the beginning of the scandal. This one details the game industry's silence about a game developer having sexual relationships with people who review and publish games. There are also 2 articles talking about Anita Sarkeesian's death threats and how the authors of those pieces don't believe her.

Even Chris “Moot” Poole, founder of 4chan, caved in to feminists and removed discussion of Gamergate. His website 4chan, for all the good and bad, was a literal bastion of free speech. You could have feminists and red pillers on the same website talking things out. However, the same guy who made a career talking about anonymity and free speech buckled down to feminism.

People were worried until a wheelchair-bound admin from New York decided to open up his small chan to the public to discuss this issue, a chan he founded to let the actual users have power. People are allowed to make sub forums about any topic on the website, as long as it’s legal in the USA. He allowed #GamerGate discussion on his forum when it wouldn’t have been advantageous for him. He increased his server hosting fees by 500% and the website is still growing.

I, redpiller1985, was able to get an interview with him. These are his unabridged words with no alterations. ROK is about journalistic integrity and respect. If you want to hear interviewers write fables lightly based on the interview, Gawker media would be more suitable for you.

Here is my interview with Frederick Brennan, the founder of 8chan.co. I made up 10 questions and sent it to him. Mr. Brennan is a busy man and this was one of the only ways to conduct the interview. He wrote the answers in one go.

—

Where do you come from and how was your early childhood?

I was born in Albany, upstate New York. My childhood was pretty unremarkable, it was full of a lot of videogames.

How was it like living with your disablity?

It's hard for me to answer this question because I don't know what it would be like to live without having a disability.

The feminist media implies that handicapped people are doomed forever to live on the dole and be lazy. What did you do to overcome that?

I learned a skill that is useful in the real world. Radical feminists normally are very averse to learning skills, which is why they have a hard time getting a job with their degrees. I would say that having a women's study degree and no useful skills is a fate worse than being a disabled person that knows how to computer program.

What websites and media influenced you to go ahead with 8chan?

4chan mostly. I also took the subreddit system from Reddit, but without any of the downvoting, user accounts, karma or other things that create identity there. I always thought that the way board creation was decided on 4chan was too authoritarian, so this was a natural fit for this kind of site.

What is the purpose of 8chan?

The purpose of 8chan is to become an imageboard where free speech is the highest priority. Its purpose is to take power away from people like moot and his moderation team and put it into the hands of the users. The users decide which boards will exist and with what rules, which threads will prosper and what to talk about.

I first created 8chan.co when I saw that people on 4chon.net's /meta/ board were constantly asking an uncaring admin to make them new boards. This is a lot like 4chan, except on 4chan we can't see these requests because the moderation there is so afraid of criticism they closed down the /q/ feedback board.

I wondered what it would be like if anyone who wanted their own imageboard could make one, and then founded 8chan.co. The results so far speak for themselves.

How are you dealing with the growth?

I have upgraded the server six times in the last week, and even more upgrades are being planned. I have also open sourced the code so that interested developers can help me write the features they most want to see on 8chan.co.

Why have you been one of the only few not to be beholden by the broken mafia (SJW)?

I am not sure, but I have some theories. So far, no SJWs have contacted me about 8chan.co – it could be because they believe that due to my disability it would be horribly ironic of them. They have attacked and doxed people who were much less active in #gamergate, so that could very well be it.

Any backlash from your local community over your views and website?

None yet. However, I would not let any backlash from freelance clients stop me from running 8chan.co.

What does the future hold for you?

I hope that, in partnership with 2channel, the largest discussion board in the world, I can make 8chan.co the best site for free discourse on the globe.

—

Frederick shows that men don't have to be casanovas or have a cult of personality to affect the world in a positive manner. I could write a dialogue about how inspiring he is or shift it to narcissist victim circlejerking. Instead, I just want to say that the content of Frederick's character is evident to see.

Read More: The Playboy Interview With George Carlin

---

redpiller1985

Redpiller1985 is a dude who has been taught the red pill thanks to the greats like Roosh, El mech, and many countless other RVF contributors. Here is his twitter, if you have any questions or comments to send to him. Send a Twitter direct message if you want to talk about using my services to promote redpill ideas.

Modern Workplaces Demand A High Price For Promotion

October 2, 2014 | by A "Nihilist" Frank | Link | Original Link

Promotion Not Pay Raise

For most men, there will come a time in their professional lives when they will have to ask themselves an important question: how much is advancement worth to them, and is it worth the price? Now this may seem like a very simple question at first, and an obvious no-brainer, but is it really? Sure, every man generally has a desire to be successful in their chosen field or occupation, but the concept of “successful” is subjective, and the terms “successful” and “advancement” are not necessarily synonymous.

Initially, most men will probably tend to associate the concept of “successful” with financial success. However, upon further introspection may also associate success with less tangible measures, such as professional or academic recognition, status, skill, contentment, happiness, stability, or even personal satisfaction. Now obviously most men would like to earn more money in their chosen occupations, and therefore seek financial advancement in the forms of pay raises or moving up the pay scale, but that is not the kind of advancement which I am referring to. For the purpose of this essay I am referring to advancement in the form of promotion, or “climbing the ladder” so to speak, which may or may not be tied to pay increases.

Playing The Game

Now, please do not misunderstand me: I am not at all saying that a man should not have drive and ambition to succeed and advance in his career. If you are a man lucky enough to be in an occupation or organization where promotional advancement is generally objective and merit-based, then by all means set the bar high for yourself and strive for excellence.

Sadly, this kind of objective merit-based promotional process is extremely rare in 21st century America. In today's professional environments, a man is contending with far more than just his own abilities versus those of his peers. He is also fighting an uphill battle against an ever-growing progressive system. Today, promotional consideration in most professional fields will encompass far more than just a candidate's merits and abilities, and will also include factors such as political correctness, quotas, affirmative action, protected classes, fairness, social justice, and feminization, just to name a few.

On top of all these "political" considerations, there are also the age-old factors of nepotism, networking, and the "good ole boys club" to contend with as well. The old saying "it's not what you know, it's who you know" is still alive and well today. Yet where once a man could essentially get ahead on his own merits, skills, knowledge, and perhaps a little "networking," advancement today in most professional settings requires not only those things, but also jumping over "political" hurdles and navigating the treacherous waters of political correctness as well. It requires a man to "play the game" more heavily and more skillfully than ever before.

So What Is The Price

Is "playing the game", and what you hope to accomplish by it, worth the cost and sacrifice to your own honor, dignity, values, integrity, self-respect, and character? Some men may have absolutely no issues whatsoever with becoming a "company man" and "playing the game," as long as it means future advancement and promotion for them. They see nothing wrong with kissing the right asses, sucking up, becoming a "yes man," conveniently being in the right places to be "noticed" by superiors, doing favors for the "right" people, making "friends," being politically correct when necessary, and basically doing whatever it takes to get ahead no matter what the cost. To these men, achieving their goals of advancement is worth the kind of self-degrading behavior necessary to reach them.

Yet sometimes the cost of advancement goes far beyond that of just being a spineless sycophantic kiss-ass, and falls into the realm of treachery. For some, "playing the game" also involves lying, cheating, deception, gossip, rumors, taking credit for others' work, throwing others "under the bus," stabbing peers in the back, or various other selfish methods of making yourself look good at the expense of others.

For some who may already have supervisory positions, yet who wish to advance themselves further, it may mean putting their own interests and well-being before those of their men. This could include things like not supporting their men in the face of superiors, not looking out for the best interests of their men, using the hard work of their subordinates only to make themselves look better, or even blaming their subordinates instead of taking accountability when things go wrong.

If by chance these types of managers do support their men, it is only because doing so aligns with their own self-interests and benefits them in some way. This kind of piss-poor leadership is personified in the fictional character of Colonel Cathcart in the classic Joseph Heller novel Catch-22. In the novel, Cathcart cares more about his own promotion and advancement than the well-being of the men under his command. His concern about pleasing his superiors in order to gain favor is at the direct expense and safety of the men under his command flying combat bomber missions in WWII.

In the novel, Cathcart would regularly volunteer his squadron for dangerous missions, while never flying any missions himself. This kind of behavior is illustrative of the classic distinction between a true leader, and merely a supervisor.

Whether it is “playing the game” by ass-kissing, treachery, or any combination of such, these men have either consciously decided that selling out their character is worth it, or for some, doing these things would not even constitute selling out at all because they have no character to speak of. If you are a man lacking character, or see nothing wrong with what I have discussed above…congratulations, you are part of the problem.

For Those Not Willing To Compromise

So now some may look at this essay as an excuse for defeatism, or for justifying a lack of ambition. That is far from my point. As I said before, if you are lucky enough to be in a field where advancement is objective, and merit based, then by all means set high goals for yourself.

So then, what is a man who refuses to sacrifice his character, principles, and dignity just to advance in his career to do? To begin with, he should always strive for excellence, proficiency, and professionalism in his chosen field, regardless of advancement opportunity, and should always work hard at performing his job to the absolute best of his abilities. He should pursue advanced training and education opportunities when available in areas of personal interest or direct job applicability, rather than those classes meant to simply "pad a resume."

He should also strive for self-education and self-improvement in his field, by reading, studying, and practicing. Improving one's proficiency or finding a personal niche or passion will help provide self-confidence and self-satisfaction, regardless of whether or not it helps you advance. He should also try to maintain a professional and respectful relationship with his peers and superiors, while avoiding anything that would compromise his dignity and constitute "ass-kissing."

A red pill man should also avoid office "drama" and gossip like the plague, and steer clear of those who perpetuate it. Most importantly, he should remain stalwart in the integrity, values, dignity, and principles which he refuses to compromise simply in the name of promotion. If perhaps one day the opportunity arises to be noticed and promoted based on merit, character, and achievement, then he can hold his head high knowing that his position was earned without sacrificing his character.

In Conclusion

Honestly though, the most important thing to remember for a man who refuses to compromise his character is that, in the end, it's only a fucking job. There is far more to life than just your career. As the saying goes, no man on his death bed ever wished that he had spent more time at the office.

Read More: The Price I Paid For Helping A Single Mom's Child

A "Nihilist" Frank
Frank is a nihilistic, misanthropic, politically-incorrect, cynical-asshole, intellectual, metal-head, weightlifter, conservative-Libertarian, Generation X'er. His observations and opinion of modern society and culture is far from flattering. His essays can be found at www.nihilisttemple.com

Why Are We So Hung Up On Sex?

October 2, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

If you separate out the functions of sex, you get a much clearer picture. The primary function is making babies, but since we now understand the mechanical and biological aspects and women highly fertile when compared to most other animals that can only reproduce once a year, this function is something we can set aside. Babies are a lot of trouble, expensive in the long run, and require careful consideration and planning.

So what other functions does sex serve?

We could say that in the human realm, sex is a low cost, easily accessible: entertainment, pastime, sport, exercise, and relaxation. Few people dislike sex entirely, and those that do usually have either health or religious issues. What's not to like about sex?

It's a perfect amount of exercise, especially if you take your sport seriously. For almost zero cost, you can while away a rainy winter's evening or the entire weekend, rubbing your genitals together with a partner (or three). It's invigorating, enjoyable, and science has shown distinct health and psychological benefits to both sexes who get their freak on more regularly. It's also a social activity, something we could do with a bit more of in the "modern" era where we are all glued to screens for most of the day.

Aside from the obvious disease issues, which by-and-large can be prevented, controlled, or mitigated entirely by having a regular sex partner (s), there really aren't any issues with the sex act itself. Birth control is relatively easily taken care of, so we ought to be enjoying far more erotic evenings than we are. Why does a housewife go to the gym and pedal a bike like a hamster, or contort herself in some sweaty yoga class, smelling the ass of the chick in front of her when she could be at home doing the splits with hubby?

Social Glue

This is where the evil and the nonsense creeps in. Because child-raising is a high-maintenance, costly, and long-term business that is nearly impossible for one parent alone, sex has always been seen as a social glue. In reality this is an absolute load of nonsense. I myself have had most excellent and satisfactory sex with complete strangers who didn't even speak my language. Much of the "social glue" aspect of sex harkens back to tribal and religious ideals that are completely out of date in the modern era

Even the concept of love is bullshit in my opinion, because I've experienced wonderful loving feelings with a one night stand I never saw again. It was true in that moment in time, and in all honestly it was better preserved without ever repeating it. What is a long-term relationship other than a moment in time? Who is to say how long that time should last? Love for one's family is healthy, where sex is just an obstacle that creates assumptions of "social glue" where none exist.

In the past, it was the practical aspects that got in the way. The last thing the tribe wanted was a single mother on its hands. A man who impregnated a woman and disappeared left the tribe with a mother and baby to take care of. It doesn't take a Ph.D

sociologist to figure out that too much of that behavior would put the tribe out of business. Thus sex was taboo, a sin reserved only for those bound in holy matrimony. Women were taught to withhold sex, men were taught to respect women and seek marriage. Society demanded these standards and blackmailed those who rejected them. Sex was the carrot, religion was the stick—mumbo jumbo used for very intelligent and necessary social engineering.

Today though, we have an obsolete social program. The truth is that a call girl can undress and get down to business without it requiring any communication skills whatsoever, never mind a genuine social bond. Many of us castigate the younger generation of women for being whores and find homosexuality "disgusting," and yet sex is a universal language that everyone speaks. What is it that we are all so hung up about?

The Secret Is Out

The manosphere has confirmed for the entire world that women are just as, if not more horny than, men. Women spend more time thinking about, preparing for, and looking for sexual partners than men do, albeit in a more subtle and random manner. Why do those four young girls go out to a bar together on a Saturday night, instead of giggling at home? Because there are no chances to run into handsome men at home. Why does the office chick show up with a half inch of war paint, smelling like a perfumery? In case Mr. Right comes into the office today.

Women love to put themselves on show. Women present themselves to the world to be sexualized, whereas men want to bang bitches. The process is the passive female versus the active male approach. We cannot ignore that women spend a vast amount of time and money on looking sexy and presenting themselves as sexual beasts. In many ways, the player does the girls a favor by releasing them from their passive search and providing exactly what they are looking for. A girl doesn't necessarily seek a life partner to have babies with.

The argument that a girl becomes broken and whorish from having too many partners is valid, but only to a point. It holds water, but only if she has fully subscribed to the old socio-religious model where sex is the social glue. It's certainly true that a woman is more likely to develop deeper feelings and be more loyal to her partner if her notch count is relatively low, but the reality of all the divorces and single mothers would suggest that "deep feelings" are generally paper-thin in the first place. As soon as there existed a mechanism for women to opt out of lifelong commitments, they most certainly did.

Couples today set themselves up for endless disappointments by making wild assumptions and life decisions based on an out-of-date model where sex was the social glue. Relationships were held in place by creating both a scarcity of sex and a moral taboo for those who tried to gain sex without the commitment. Only a couple of decades ago, the wife who ran off with the neighbor was a social outcast. Today it's not unusual to find her still friends with her ex-husband, happily sharing the kids and having a baby with the new fella. Swinger resorts are booked out into 2016 so couples can go and get nasty with other couples. It's an underground industry but clearly a very lucrative one.

In the past, couples who found they had a good chemistry got married and could expect to stay together for a lifetime. This is somewhat of an illusion though, because people died much younger and lived much tougher lives, so that when they did actually get to spend a little time together they valued each other's company. In the past there simply wasn't enough wealth, assets, social support, and technology for people to be able to split up, and the mechanics of finding a new partner were taboo.

Where once your lover was the goddess you wrote love letters, that lady of the light you lived and died for, now she's the pain in the ass bitch who treats your phone like it's some kind of digital leash or goes offline to bait you when you want to get hold of her. But the smart men (and women), know there is plenty more where that came from, so who cares? Next!

Come Out of the Closet

I don't pretend to have any answers. There probably is no silver bullet, but I think it's high time we got over the guilt laden ideas of "sin" and just enjoyed sex for the good cheap fun it is. Unfortunately, much of that side of the equation lies with the women, who will always hold the key to the door. With that said, men hold the key to partnership and provisioning, especially when children are involved. Even tasks like maintaining a well-organized home fall on the man more than it might appear. On a more short-term basis a man can easily hold the key to fun times and be the life and soul of the party.

Thus when it comes to co-habitation and babies, the solution is no longer provided by sex as the social glue, but by an intelligent long-term partnership and planning. If the gay boys have managed to come out of the closet, I think it's high time all the straight people did too. We love sex. We love fucking, and what's more we love fucking multiple people and it's got nothing to do with co-habitation arrangements, sharing assets, or having kids. Kill the old model and a new one will most certainly grow in its place.

The biggest question here is whether women will be able to handle their gooey emotional (and unstable) feelings. They claim to want education, careers, respect and so forth, so perhaps we can start with a new approach to sex. They claim to want long-term relationships and families, but that dynamic is tedious at best.

In fact, whenever I'm surrounded by boring adults, I find myself wondering why they don't all just get naked and have a fucking orgy. There's basically zero chance of anyone spreading diseases, and getting laid is something all of these people have missing in their lives. People will laugh and call me insane, but that's what happens to those who are ahead of their time.

Read More: Confused Beta Male Laments Realities Of Online Dating

4 Underrated Classic Video Games

October 3, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Given the turmoil video games have been subject to recently and the coming change that will neuter their ability to wow—the #GamerGate imbroglio and all that—it is high time to revisit some of the immortal classics the platform has spawned.

My purpose, here, is to highlight four games that have not been as heralded as other games and why they deserve positive attention.

The Quest For Glory Franchise

Sierra Online released the first game in this series—Quest For Glory: So You Want To Be Hero?—in the late ’80’s. The adventure-roleplaying series is known for its streamlined gameplay, its funny dialogue, and the ability to import your character—along with skills and gold—into subsequent games.

There are five games in the series. The first game is set in a Bavarian-type valley, the second in a Middle Eastern-style city, the third in an African-style savannah, the final two installments in European-type settings. The gameplay is pretty basic, but it’s very accessible and highly enjoyable. The games are fairly non-linear, with plenty of side quests that complement the major story arc. The development of skills is pretty straightforward and well-done. The open environment with respect to the gameplay was a bit off the beaten path at the time.

The games are known for their funny dialogues and—often—bad puns. Every game in the series has characters who pop up in all the games, and there are quite a few Easter eggs that help maintain series continuity. The first three games are pretty breezy and lighthearted, but the fourth game was much darker than the previous three. The fifth and final game wasn’t as dark as the fourth, and ended the series on a decent note.

Rating: 8 out of 10. Easy, breezy gameplay coupled with fun and engaging dialogue, characters, and story lines. You can find a modern remake of the second installment here.

EarthBound

Fuzzy pickles, anybody?

EarthBound was a Japanese SNES video game first released in America in 1995. It was met with poor reviews and was a cult classic until very recently.

The roleplaying game revolves around a young boy named Ness, who begins the game investigating a meteor crash in his hometown with his dog, Pokey. He discovers an alien force has invaded Earth and has spread hatred around the world, turning humans and animals in violent creatures. He scraps together a rag-tag force of three other people who wield slingshots and frying pans against malicious foes in order to save the world from this hateful alien force.

The game is whimsical in many ways. The save points are telephone calls to Ness's father; in the same vein, Ness's father wires money to his bank account after successful battles. The game has many funny quirks and quotes—like the aforementioned "fuzzy pickles" quote—and is generally a difficult game in the body of a lighthearted one.

It might be a simple game in the vein of collecting a finite number of X from dungeons to save the world from evil, but it does it in a way that is satisfying, challenging and—at times—odd and eccentric.

Rating: 9.5 out of 10. Top-shelf game.

Exile 3

Exile 3 was released at some point in the ’90’s by the now-defunct Spiderweb Software. The adventure-roleplaying game was based on people who are cast into the caves and recesses beneath a world’s surface. The first two installments revolve around these people mastering their environment; the third and final game is about a group of these outcasts returning to the surface to save the world from its imminent demise.

The upper-world is divided into roughly six kingdoms, each with a major city and a plague of monsters. The first two kingdoms are plagued by slimes and giant cockroaches, respectively. The game gets harder quickly, as giants and golems are the bane of the later-encountered kingdoms. The final—and walled off from the world—kingdom is a society completely destroyed by vicious alien beasts.

While the graphics and sound effects are rudimentary and very simplistic, the game is of high quality and extremely addictive. The main quest itself is very long and highly engaging, while the number and quality of side quests and endeavors rivals the main quest. The map is incredibly large and the number of random cities and landscapes to explore are countless.

Rating: 9 out of 10. If this game had Skyrim-esque graphics, sounds, and interactions between characters, it would be an easy 10/10.

Sid Meier’s Alpha Centauri

Alpha Centauri is a computer game created and developed by Sid Meier—of Civilization fame—which extrapolates past the end of his Civilization games.

The game is a turn-based strategy game where a group of humans leave Earth for a human-friendly desert planet. The colonization project goes awry after the rocket ship explodes, casting the seven distinct factions around the planet. Like Civilization, the ultimate goal is to conquer the other factions, either through conquest, diplomacy, economics, or technology (the Ascent to Transcendence).

The game is extremely engaging. It is much faster-paced than Civilization games, making it more playable. The factions are highly distinct and give rise to radically different techniques for playing as or interacting with them. The technology tree is imaginative and logical. City-development is straightforward and streamlined. Battles are quick and efficient.

The game, in a nutshell, is a perfect turn-based strategy game. With virtually infinite maps with radically-varied environments and faction personalities, the game is not only highly playable in its traditional map, but highly replayable. Unlike Civilization games, which might drag on for some time with slow CPU turns, the game progresses with a quickness unlike most Sid Meier games.

Rating: 10 out of 10. The perfect turn-based strategy game.

Read More: Why Do Women Suddenly Want To Become Video Gamers?

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

Never Fully Give A Woman Your Loyalty

October 4, 2014 | by Jesus Baetana | Link | Original Link

I'm fortunate in that women feel comfortable around me. I would think the roots of this lay in the results of typical indoctrination from our well-meaning mothers: to be polite and gentlemanly to all women. On some level, we are drawn to this because we subconsciously cast all women in the mould of our mothers, who we feel a biologically-based connection to.

The latitude of lifestyle choices now available to women, however, is diametrically opposed to the "correct" way for a man to live his life, and what is available to him. For many reasons, we must resist our temptation to treat women with deference and respect simply because of their sex.

The West

Men in typical Western reverse-discrimination societies need to grow up and take responsibility for their outcomes by gaming the system. Why? Because the vast majority of women are doing exactly that; playing this absurd game of life using every shortcut and advantage available to them.

I've met with a number of women who have shared with me their history of dating and sexual experiences, and what I've learned is nothing less than groundbreaking for an uneducated man who still frames women in the same way as his mother. Barring those who have a certain pathological desire for foolish and idealistic circumstances, the typical western mentality woman is simply…

…doing as she pleases.

You Meet A Girl

You think “she seems nice.” You exchange a few messages, arrange a time to meet. You think “she seems different.” Everything seems to be going well. You meet, chat, pay the bill, and go home with a warm fuzzy feeling. You repeat with minor variations, in order to demonstrate your value to her as a mating partner. You feel like you’re falling in love, but it’s probably just infatuation, as she tricks you in various subtle ways into thinking she’s high-value.

She meets you. She immediately sizes you up; an instant classification based on your demeanor but skewed by how she’s feeling today. She’s been on plenty of dates and had plenty of guys over the years, so whatever you say or do is going to slot you into another classification. She knows how this game works and that’s what your predecessors have jumped through all kinds of hoops to get her to open her golden gates. Because of them, she knows game better than you.

The Media’s Role

Because men want pussy, the majority of men are quick to accept mainly gay and feminist-driven, media enhanced ideas about what the “modern male” should be like, because they think this will get them some action. These cultural forces control the message because they are the most predominant demographics in the fashion industry, which in turn influences the entertainment and marketing industries, of which any media must embrace should it wish to be consumed by the popular masses. Popular culture produces offshoots of counter-culture, some of which goes beyond the niche and develops enough to be considered cool or trendy.

As an example, a popular story thread in romantic comedies these days is the put-upon woman who leaves her steady boyfriend and he has to win her back. He’ll jump through a number of hoops and eventually get the girl, whereupon we’re all meant to believe in the notions of “the good guy always wins in the end” and “love always prevails.”

But what about the other narrative running through this film? 99% of the time, we see very little insight into the girl’s experience of the situation; we are simply presented with her, followed by the “new man” poking his head around the door upon the “good guy’s” initial attempts to get his woman back. Who is he? Did she know him before? Was he a colleague? How long had this sexual tension been bubbling beneath the surface, and has she already been sleeping with him?

Is she a trustworthy person? If she jumps into bed with another guy at the first sign of problems in the relationship, is she relationship material? What’s the “good guy’s” mental state? Does he have such low self-esteem he pursues this type of woman, despite her flagrant and rapid indiscretions? Why aren’t these issues explored?

Because mankind (via popular media) likes to believe in the female’s role in the relationship essentially being rooted in the mother role—she is the nurturing, caring and beautiful provider of warmth, love, and acceptance that all men should desire to benefit from.

The Mother Figure

We grow up as men accustomed to this idea, as time and again it is impressed and reinforced in us, as in line with femininity. We are encouraged to walk into the world with honorable intentions as new men, looking for our partner. It may well be that you find someone also in the same mentality as you (but derived from female fairy tale romanticism) and become very happy. But it’s more likely they will be nothing like you’ve associated women to be in your mind. In my past life as Jaded, I would’ve been devastated upon realizing the angel I had built up in my head was nothing more than a generic imbecile. Now, I treat it as an eventuality.

Real Life Example

Once upon a time as Jaded, I was invited up to a lake for the day by a girl I'd been dating. She drove, so I was at her mercy. After making a fairly innocuous joke after she aggressively bit a cherry I fed her, I jokingly said I wouldn't be putting anything else near her lips any time soon. From nowhere, an outburst of emotional reasons why she just wanted to be friends commenced.

After a period of feeling angry with myself for being dragged up to the middle of nowhere to hear this, I proposed leaving as I wanted to get this episode over with. On the drive home I decided to probe a little more into her situation. It turns out she'd fucked her ex-boyfriend two weeks prior, and also had a regular fuckbuddy she'd been seeing since dating me (about a month).

Apparently, she stops seeing this fuckbuddy when something becomes "serious." I enquired further; what is the decisive factor of something becoming serious? Her answer was that either you have a conversation where you both agree it's serious, or the now-commonplace answer of "when she feels it's serious."

This is, of course, utter bullshit because it's completely subjective. In a moment of beta rage at not getting the girl, I proposed based on her logic it could be possible, even if things had worked out between us, she could be sleeping with her ex (who she clearly still had feelings for), the lover, and myself, if she felt like doing that. Barely concealing her satisfaction, she agreed.

The Overall Principle

And that principle right there my friends, is the simple reason why I will never change my mentality towards women. They compartmentalize men. They are capable of incredible deceit and self-delusion, an incredibly dangerous combination when a person believes their actions are just. What's the incentive to be the boyfriend, when you can get what you want as the fuckbuddy?

There are some exceptions, and these rarities are like gold to a prospector—exceptional to find. But the bottom line is; women have gone off the rails. Most of Western Europe is secular, their moral basis comes from peer pressure, itself derived from what media has normalized. As such, the further the boundaries are pushed, the more becomes accepted in the eyes of the many. We end up where people do as they wish, which is precisely what women are doing after twenty years of reverse discrimination and political correctness. The only remaining legitimate target is the heterosexual male.

My advice to you as a fellow man? Disregard everything you learned about how to conduct yourself in dating, and do as you wish. Disregard that you are dating someone else. Do as you please and with as many people as you wish, for an undefined amount of time. Don't disclose any information about your circumstance and, if pressed to do so, be brazen about it. Yes, you are still sleeping with other women. Yes, you will continue to do so. If they don't want to see you again because of this, then leave. Have an abundance mentality where pussy is available everywhere and is no longer a bargaining chip for any type of relationship.

Act as they, with no obligation or duty. Let them prove to you what they bring to your life.

Read Next: The Word "Heroic" Has Very Little Meaning In Modern Times

Jesus Baetana
Jesus Baetana is a man of Anglo-Italian descent, often found stood slack jawed in astonishment at the current state of gender politics today. He now resides in a small central European state, attempting to single-handedly wrest control of both it's wealth and women. Read more about his adventures at The Words Of A Man

Echopraxia: Not Just A Science Fiction Novel

October 4, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Is is very rare that a book can truly be thought-provoking these days, especially works of fiction in an age of consumerism, materialism, and pop culture. It's even rarer that I count down the days until the book is released. On August 26, 2014 Peter Watts released Echopraxia, the sequel to Blindsight. Not only did I purchase it as soon as possible, but also purchased the first edition hardcover instead of the Kindle version. It did not disappoint—I read all 384 pages in one day.

Echopraxia is a continuation of the story of humanity's reaction to an ambiguous but very direct contact on Earth from something outside the solar system. This book is about the second space mission that investigates this contact. This occurs after the results of the first one in Blindsight are unknown. It is set about 80 years in the future and includes a human population that pushes the upper and lower limits of development.

In this novel, things such as genetically modified humans that have a phenotype traits similar to vampires and zombie soldiers are presented in a convincing light. The allegory for designed obsolescence is further hammered in the book when upgrades of the body are contrasted to those who are unmodified "baselines." Don't worry, I won't spoil anything here.

The various interactions between these humanity "types" caused me to consider the social interactions of human beings today, and this is not the only consideration of the modern world this book has caused me to reevaluate. Concepts such as consciousness, levels of control and manipulation, and determinism are dwelt on in this book in ways not seen in general publishing since the Enlightenment. Allow me to highlight some choice excerpts:

> Long before art and science and philosophy arose consciousness had but one function: not to merely implement motor commands but to mediate between commands in opposition.

This passage really got me thinking about the nature of consciousness. The way it is framed actually had me questioning whether it really existed, and was not just a set of higher-level programming in an organic brain that is merely perceived as "conscious" due to increasing complexity.

> Hell rationality itself—the exalted human ability to reason—-hadn't evolved in the pursuit of truth but simply to win arguments, to gain control: to bend others, by means logical or sophistic, to your will.

This reminded me that your opponent in a debate might not actually care about the truth and is just peddling influence. It also give me a way to articulate my thoughts the next time someone is trying to push political influence on me when their goal is not the truth.

> Truth had never been a priority. If believing a lie kept the genes proliferating, the system would believe that lie with all its heart.

This reminds me of the current artificially constructed systems that have a lie at their core necessary for the continuation of that system (e.g. feminism).

> It's all window dressing. They think they're really sticking it to you but they're being herded into the service of agendas they'd never support in a thousand years, if only they knew. And they're dedicated, Daniel. They're ferocious. They fight your wars with a passion you could never buy and never coerce, because they're doing it out of pure ideology.

This quote is in reference to activists in the book and how they are doing the dirty deeds for the system they think they are fighting against. Applying this logic to current political and social activism, one should question who truly benefits from such activism, and consider that maybe those beneficiaries are the true hidden string-pullers.

Peter Watts covers quite a bit of philosophy and science in his book. All of it seems very well-based in actual modern ideas and concepts. He even has a bibliography at the end of his book highlighting where to look for information on these ideas. This allows the reader to look up scientific and philosophical ideas themselves and draw their own conclusions.

Overall, this book is a work beyond just science fiction. It is not the province of nerds alone. It is one of the few cases of literary open-mindedness today and is not wishy-washy propaganda. It is very sophisticated, and you might have to look up certain terms and concepts in order to understand them. I know I did. Nothing worth knowing in this world is easy, though. If you want to step it up from Tom Clancy or Twilight pulp fiction, this is the book for you.

Read More: Echopraxia, By Peter Watts

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

5 Bench Press Mistakes That Will Stall Your Progress

October 5, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

The bench press is probably your favorite lift. At the very least, if you lift weights consistently, I'm sure you perform it often enough.

Unfortunately I have to assume that you're doing it wrong. Every time I walk into a gym and glance over at the horde of men surrounding the bench press, I'm disappointed, if not completely abhorred. Their form tends to be horrible. And this is concerning for two reasons:

1. Bad bench press form combined with relatively heavy weights can lead to brutal injuries, like tearing a rotator cuff or pectoral muscle.

2. It doesn't properly engage your muscles—you won't experience increased strength or muscle mass if you're not recruiting your muscles in a functional pattern that complements their natural movement.

I've sufficiently fucked up my shoulder in the past by letting my ego get in my way, and lead me to putting more weight on the bar than I could properly lift. Putting an extra 50 pounds on the bar is not even close to worth the pain and suffering it can cause. Below I'll detail the most common bench press mistakes, and explain how to fix them. If you do this you'll both reduce the risk of injury, and also supercharge your progress in the process.

NOTE: Always use a spotter when pressing a weight that is even remotely difficult for you, neglecting to do so could be fatal.

1. Loose body when you setup

Your wrists should be tight, as seen on the right.

When you lay down on the bench, you want to get your whole body tight. This gives you a stable base to press from, and therefore increases how much weight you can lift in a controlled fashion.

If you're just laying on the bench like you're about to take a rest, this will put you in a terrible spot to begin the lift. You want to squeeze your shoulder blades together so that they're the main point of contact in between your body and the bench, tighten your midsection, squeeze your ass, plant your feet firmly against the floor, and then grasp the barbell with a tight grip.

And all of these things should remain tight throughout. Your feet shouldn't dance around, your grip shouldn't loosen, and neither should your ass or shoulder blades.

2. Poor un-racking of the bar

If you set up correctly but fuck up the un-racking of the bar, you immediately sacrifice the aforementioned benefits that a tight setup grants you.

You do NOT want to lift the bar straight up and then move it over your chest. This will cause your shoulder blades to loosen and separate. What you want to do, instead, is to pull the bar horizontally from the rack to over your chest, lifting it up vertically only enough to clear the rack. This will maintain that shoulder blade tightness that's so important from this point forward.

3. Flaring of the elbows

Your elbows should be in roughly the middle position shown above.

As you perform the lift, your elbows should NOT stick out directly sideways, forming a 90 degree angle with your torso. This puts you shoulders in an extremely compromised position. Instead they should tuck in slightly so that the bar touches roughly just below nipple level at the bottom of the lift.

4. Incomplete range of motion

The bar should make contact with the chest at the bottom of every repetition.

Once a little guy came up to me and asked me to spot him. He had 225 pounds on the bar, and told me that his goal was 8 reps. This seemed quite a lot for someone of his small stature, so I eagerly watched, curious to see if he possessed an unusual amount of strength. He didn't. Each time he lowered he bar it didn't even come within 3 or 4 inches of his chest. He was doing, at most, 66% of the repetition. And he only did 5 of them.

This is the most obvious mistake you see in the gym. You want each rep to continue all the way down until the bar touches your t-shirt. I say t-shirt because it should NOT rest on, or worse, bounce off of your chest. It should reach chest level, and then explode up until your arms are straight (but shoulder blades remain back).

5. Poor breathing

This is a mistake that can just as easily apply to squats, deadlifts, or any other lifts. But it will destroy your bench press just the same. You shouldn't hold your breath. And you shouldn't breath shallow breaths either. Poor breathing can lead to a loose body and also passing out (which could kill you if you're holding a heavy bar over your head).

You should breathe a deep breath that fills your abdomen at the top of each repetition. This breath should be held as the bar lowers, and even as it changes direction. Once you're on the way up, exhale as your exert yourself and finish the repetition.

For a complete approach to building muscle and cutting fat, check out my new program Shredded Beast.

Read Next: 3 Habits That Every Man Should Practice

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

American Cultural Trends And The Future

October 5, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

The following trends, palpable and pernicious, can be expected to get worse in subsequent generations, and it may be that the time is not far off when older and better ways of living, now still with us, are utterly vanished, preserved, if at all, only in history books, if they still exist. As technology continues to dumb us down, even as it erases cultural memory, the following phenomena seem likely to become even more widespread and harmful.

1. A nation of borderline personalities

As I describe in my article "The Touchiness Of Contemporary America," we have become a nation of borderline personalities. When we take the naturally corrupt self-interest of human nature, and add historically unprecedented comfort and convenience, we seem to get the following result: a mass of warped minds who, interpreting reality in self-interested extremes, believe that virtually anyone who fails to meet their silly (yet unwitting) expectations and entitlements is "unfair," "abusive," "sexist," "racist," and so on.

Many Americans, influenced by the media and the resentments of those who consider themselves the insulted and the injured, are now unable to distinguish between the problems and miseries that stem from the natural hardness of life and the injustices brought out by a minority of powerful persons. Human misery per se is thought to be some kind of conspiracy, the work of a bunch of unfair boogiemen, doubtless descended from Dead White European Males.

Likewise, simple frankness, without any kind of unmanly sugarcoating tacked on—the language of corporate America's "good team members," in other words—is now likely to be considered "hostile," "threatening," "intimidating," etc. Basically, if you aren't a happy little sycophant, endlessly timid and compliant, then the shrinks may be needed to deem that you have what they call "oppositional defiant disorder." You disagree with their "diagnosis"? So what? They have your words and image on record, and here the only practically important thing is the perception or interpretation of those who are in charge.

Human nature, on average, has very little aptitude for objective and analytical thought. On the other hand, forcefully simplifying and misinterpreting the contexts of things, and reading into them what is not there in order to advance one's interests, is as natural as eating and drinking, though rarely recognized. This ignorant rhetorical game, indeed, is what most people understand by "truth."

As the young more and more become conditioned not so much to think, but to simply respond to and engage with electronic stimuli, the more faceless and impersonal the better, we can expect more and more human interactions to become effectively blind and incoherent. Here, as always, whoever has the most power will be the one who is "right" or "wins."

2. The end of masculinity

Up until the PC assault that began in the 80s, what I will call "old school code" was the norm among men. In many instances, if you said or did the wrong thing—that is, what would have been an offense against honor in the old, high sense—a fellow man would give you to understand, by a look or language, that he'd kick your ass, or else he'd just do it; and the effect, though painful, may well have been good for you. It was not "traumatic," and besides, you learned the hard way, the only way you were going to, hardheaded irrational creature.

Now the many negative responses to my last article here on ROK suggest to me that today even most so-called red pill men do not know how to distinguish between this old school code and what blue-pill-types simplistically and inaccurately call "macho posturing," done out of "insecurity," perhaps because you were "abused as a child."

There's no perceived difference between the way men were raised to be in the 50s and "bullying." It's all the same, some sort of "tough guy act," and swallowing the red pill means nothing more than being aloof to women and not being sucked in by their games and manipulations. Asserting yourself in regard to other men will soon be the stuff of generations long past. After all, we have already come to a state of things in which the natural masculine aggression that has always been a vital part of sports causes tremendous "concern" for the media and non-athletes.

We men who grew up playing sports know that fights and tiffs, both on the court and field and in the locker room, are part of the very nature of the thing. They are rarely a big deal and can usually be shrugged off. Many liberals and non-athletes no longer seem to understand this, however. Kevin McHale (in)famously clotheslined Kurt Rambis in the 1984 NBA Finals. That sort of thing, back then, served to "set the tone." Today, McHale would be fined and suspended as people blather about his “anger management problem.” The difference of judgment signifies our present cultural weakness.

3. The genders shall be more indistinguishable and sex more perverse

Endless selfies, duck face photos, and other narcissistic vulgarities of social media are now quite common among men, not just among the Second Sex. I often see groups of the former out at night who seem like teenage girls: they never get tired of taking their picture; they really will do this all night long. Meanwhile, when I hear men speak, in person and on television, I often wonder whether they are gay based on their womanly voices alone, even though they may seem straight otherwise. MSNBC—home of whiny liberal outrage and self-satisfied snark—is especially disgusting here.

Going along with this cultural trend is the depressing reality that dating or hooking up with an American woman under 35 is now very much like dealing with a man. For instance, I recently took a twenty-one-year-old woman home from a bar. The next morning she told me that when she goes home with a guy, she usually just gets up and leaves the next morning, without saying goodbye or getting his number. She made an exception in my case, though, because she found me “really hot.” What’s more, digging my tall, muscular body, she said that when she got up in the morning, she thought to herself, “Yeah, I tapped that.” Just like a man!

I picked up her girlfriend that morning—she too had left with a man—and as I drove them home I listened to them speak in the most shameless and coarsest way. “Did you even get his number?” asked Donna laughing. And she went on: “Was he tall? Was his stroke game good?” The friend did get the number, which, she remarked with a manly laugh, was not her usual custom.

Now I have been hooking up with college-age American women since my late teens (the late 90s), and write this about a week from my thirty-fourth birthday. In only about 15 years I have observed a startling change in the sexual character of these women: when I was 24 many still acted like women, not entirely masculine or soulless. Now that I am almost 34, it’s become quite rare for me to date or hook up with an American woman in her 20s who passes for a woman for reasons other than having a pair of tits and a vagina.

4. The end of a sense of value

Observing both people younger and those older than me, I often sense that for many of them all activities possess more or less the same worth. They seem never to consider the value of anything. Though they do take care to “work hard and play hard,” they basically pass unthinkingly from one activity to another. Some are more fun than others. None have any deep significance. People are more and more reflexive in their behavior, slaves to mere habit where in ages past people stopped to rationally evaluate the significance of their actions and way of life.

Even when it comes to doing business, many people, although they could talk on the phone, now choose to drag things out by text. It does not occur to them to simply get to the point by phone and thus save themselves time, for they do not value time itself.

They work some job which probably is either just bearable or downright contemptible. And to justify and cope with that, they turn to intense indulgence of some kind: porn, ecstasy, or who knows what. Or perhaps they are on anti-depressants since the art of living well is no longer of interest in what is amusingly still called higher education, whose real functions are to rip you off while exposing you to an agenda of politically correct resentment. You are thus left with massive student loans but no Wisdom.

Conclusion

Ralph Waldo Emerson—by far the wisest of American writers—wrote that

> In history the great moment is, when the savage is just ceasing to be a savage, with all his hairy Pelasgic strength directed on his opening sense of beauty;—and you have Pericles and Phidias,—and not yet passed over into the Corinthian civility. Everything good in nature and in the world is in that moment of transition, when the swarthy juices still flow plentifully from nature, but their astrigency or acridity is got out by ethics and humanity.

In other words, human beings thrive when, having transitioned to civil society, they still retain the strength and hardihood that they had in the prior, more severe state. This is what gives rise to periods of superb art and high culture. It is also what makes other nations respect us, and think better of going after our resources or position on the world stage.

That time is now past in America. Creature comforts have made us soft and stupid. Another Great War, perhaps engendered by ecological disaster, may be needed to reduce human nature to its vital core, the source of both our vitality and our creativity.

Read More: The Touchiness Of Contemporary America

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

A Resource For Positive Male Self-Improvement

October 5, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

ROK's October sponsor is The Man Mindset, a site that focuses on positive self-improvement for men. Here is what the creator wanted to share…

—

The Man Mindset is a journey that celebrates the strength, wisdom, insight and purpose you carry throughout your life and throughout this world. Our purpose is to develop strong character and communication skills. We teach a secret system of power, hidden knowledge that will lead you through your own personal development and growth.

The Man Mindset assists you to look deeply within to see where you stand with leadership, success, relationships with women, marriage, fathering, personal goals, ultimately leading to a realization of your own purpose and mission in life. Learn how to reinvent yourself and to see the world with a new set of eyes without any self sabotage or excuses. Check as your attitudes about yourself and your life become more silver short, the people around you will begin perceiving and treating you in new ways. Sometimes you will be aware of the increased positive energy you are exhibiting while at other times you will simply notice people commenting on how you see more relaxed, happier, or more confident you are.

Perhaps the most important principle you will learn throughout this website and throughout our products is this:

What you practice you become

Most people spent their lives stopping themselves from going for what they want and then beating themselves up about doing such a great job of it. They have become experts at not taking action and then justifying their apparent failure by convincing themselves that there must be something wrong with them. Yet nothing could be further from the truth.

The reason people fail is not because there's something wrong with them, its because failure is part of the process of manhood and of success. To a man, failure doesn't mean it's time to give up—it means it's time to step back learn from what happened. Then recognize that you are now more prepared to succeed. But even though mistakes and failures are ever present steppingstones on your journey to manhood, they shouldn't prevent you from getting started.

The Man Mindset is filled with information to help you increase your self-awareness and shape your thoughts to accomplish what you want and every moment and live the life you intended. This site isn't about building a good disguise—it's about developing the courage to take off the disguise and become a real man. The purpose of this site is helping you discover you don't have to use tricks and gimmicks to get woman. All you have to be is a man. The key to success is to apply each principle to your own life situation.

This site covers dating advice, marriage advice, sex advice, understanding women, confidence, overcoming fear, manhood, talking to women, talking dirty, first date advice, how to approach women, money 101, and more.

NO PICK UP LINES, NO TRICKS, NO NLP, NOT MAGIC TRICKS

THIS SITE DOESN'T SEE COLOR ALL MEN ARE EQUAL HERE

—

Check out if The Man Mindset can help you achieve your goals by clicking here.

If you are interested in becoming an ROK sponsor, visit our sponsorship page. You can also drop a couple bucks in our tip jar.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

If You Can’t Get Laid In The West, You Won’t Get Laid Abroad

October 6, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

The most common refrain against men who travel abroad to meet girls is that they “can’t get laid in the United States.” The people who make this accusation are almost always girls, or sheltered little snowflakes who’ve never left their home country. Rather than play into their frame, I’ll illustrate my point with a story.

A few days ago, I was at a club in Malate talking to a couple of girls when I noticed a geeky white dude on the other side of the dance floor. He and I were the only white men in the club. He wasn’t bad-looking—he was dressed in a nice shirt and was in shape—but he didn’t approach a single girl while he was there. He got down on the dance floor, bought a beer every so often from the bar, and paced the back of the club nervously, but he didn’t talk to anyone, even I as spotted girls checking him out.

One of us went home alone that night. You’ve got three guesses as to which one, and the first two don’t count.

I have a newsflash for guys like him and for the haters: if you can’t get laid in the U.S. (or your home country), the only girls who will sleep with you abroad are prostitutes. The will to bang is not dependent on your location but rather who you are as a man, and if you don’t have what it takes, a change of scenery won’t magically earn you a blessing from the God of Poon.

The Real Reason You Aren't Getting Laid

The number one thing you need in order to seduce girls, whether you're in Manila, Moscow, or Manhattan, is confidence.

Can you approach a girl out of the blue? Can you entertain her with your charisma and life story? Are you an interesting guy with cool experiences and stories to share? If the answer to any (or all) of these questions is no, then you're going to be stuck masturbating every night no matter where you are.

Anyone who claims that "women are the same everywhere" is a virgin and a fool. However, the skillset you need to get girls doesn't change from country to country. At the bare minimum, all girls want a man with balls. If you don't have the balls to talk to girls from your own native land, you're going to be triply screwed when you go overseas, because you'll have to deal with cultural and linguistic barriers on top of your insecurity and inability to approach.

Now, there are countries in which it's easier to get laid than the U.S. The Philippines is one; Japan is another. But in order to reap the pussy whirlwind, you have to be able to take that first step of actually talking to girls. There is no country on Earth where you will be showered with marriage proposals and blowjobs the minute you get off the plane. If you want to get laid without paying for it (or getting fleeced by scammers), your journey begins at home.

Don’t Go Abroad to Get Girls, Go Abroad to Get Better Girls

I’m far from a player, as anyone who knows me will attest to. But I’ve also never had a problem getting laid, at least not since college. In fact—and it pains me to have to play into the unfalsifiable thesis of the “you can’t get laid in the United States” crowd—I hooked up with not one but two separate girls the weekend before I left for the Philippines. I came to Southeast Asia because I wanted to experience something different, a world in which men and women don’t hate each other, where human decency still thrives.

The kinds of men who succeed at picking up girls in the Philippines, Russia, Brazil or wherever also can pick up American (or Canadian or British or Australian) girls easily. They go abroad not because they want to get laid but because they want to lay better. They want girls who are tender and loving, who take care of their bodies, who see themselves as complimenting men rather than competing with them.

American girls and white knights can’t handle this. In the case of the girls, they hurl the “you can’t get laid in the U.S.” line as a defense mechanism. They know deep down that their obesity, bad attitudes, and lack of femininity are liabilities, but rather than accept reality, they double down on their failed you-go-grrlisms. Their egos are so important to them that they’d rather die unhappy than admit they were wrong.

As for white knights, they’re unhappy with the kinds of girls they’re expected to date: Skrillex-shaved, belligerent, overweight slobs. But rather than work to bang girls that are sweet and attractive, they try to shame any man who rejects the androgynous feminist creed of modern America. Like crabs in a bucket, they would rather tear down other men instead of building themselves up.

These people don’t upset me at all. On the contrary, I get a thrill knowing that every time I lay the pipe on a cute Filipina, I’m twisting the knife deeper into their hearts. Attempting to insult men who go to other countries to get laid is like trying to insult people who go to steakhouses instead of McDonald’s. “You can’t handle eating a Big Mac!” No, we just prefer a nice slab of Kobe beef over a frozen, artificially bleached heart attack in a bun. That’s the average American girl: ugly, fake, and bad for your health.

That being said, you can’t simply walk into the steakhouse without preparation. If you’re a man looking to taste the superior quality of foreign pussy, you need to have the fundamentals of game down before you get on the plane. If you can’t bang girls from your own country, all you’ll end up doing abroad is your own hand.

Read More: Top 5 Clubs In Zagreb To Get Laid

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Need For Submission

October 6, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A friend of mine was recently describing to me some details of his travels in Thailand. He mentioned that for some Thai young men, Buddhist monasteries served an important cultural function in molding and developing the positive traits of obedience, discipline, and humility. As he related his experiences in seeing novice, shave-headed monks begging for food as part of their initiation, I began to think of comparable traditions in the West (or, rather, what was left of them).

A close study of the religious orders in the Western monastic tradition has something to teach us about the virtues of obedience and humility. These virtues have been long out of fashion. It is time they received their proper due in the molding of character.

Novice monks in Thailand

Men respond well to hierarchical institutions which are focused on the serving of a higher power, on spiritual and moral development, and on the idealistic devotion to a cause; the full range of the masculine experience is neglected when we ignore such organizations. It is important that we thoroughly study the rules of religious orders and military orders. We will discuss here the order founded by St. Benedict and his Rule. It was the first, and perhaps the most famous, of the monastic orders in Western Christendom.

Benedict was born in Nursia in the region of Umbria around A.D. 480, and educated in Rome. The era in which he flourished was an age of chaos and violence; the last Western Roman emperor had been deposed in 476, signaling the final triumph of the barbarians. Generations of invasion, famine, and pestilence had completed the ruination Italy; and the depletion of the soil was matched by the exhaustion of human arms.

In one century, urban Rome had shrunk from a metropolis of 1.5 million to less than 300,000, and it was still falling. In this age of anarchy and ignorance, men looked to institutions that offered a refuge from the sea of destitution, and the irredeemable corruption, that surrounded them.

Benedict of Nursia

As a teenager Benedict had lived as an ascetic monk in Subiaco, near Rome. Despite (or perhaps because of) his severity, his sincerity gained him local notoriety, and he was asked by wealthy men to tutor their sons. A cluster of monastic houses had grown about his habitation by 520; and when these expanded still further, he moved his community to a large hill named Monte Cassino, which overlooked the town of Casinum from a height of 1700 feet.

Benedict revolutionized monastic practice by requiring written vows of all novitiates. Until that time, monkish practice had been disorganized and an individual affair. He felt that a trial period was necessary before a firm commitment should be taken. The so-called “Rule of St. Benedict” codified the regulations and practice that would impose order amid the chaos of the age.

The first thing that strikes one about the Benedictine Rule is its communal ethic. Benedict felt that men would perform better, and more predictably, in a structured group under the control of an abbot. Novices (of which there were many) would first learn what was expected of them before being permitted initiation; if they passed this test, then they would undertake permanent vows in writing. This written oath, executed before a witness, was lain on an altar, to impress its sanctity on the mind of the adherent.

Monks were required to work: Benedict tolerated no idlers, and he believed that temptations multiplied in indolence. The abbot was chosen by the monks, and was required to consult with them on major decisions. But his word was final, and the community was required to obey him. Monks could not leave Monte Cassino without permission; they must avoid arrogant, boisterous behavior; and they must always assume a deportment of humility. All possessions of the order were held in common.

The monastery at Monte Cassino was immense; one historian described it as larger than Buckingham Palace in London. The daily regimen of the Benedictine monks was rigorous and fruitful. Manual labor was required in the fields and shops on the grounds, or in copying manuscripts. It is to these laborious scribes, patiently hunched over tables in the scriptoria, that we owe the preservation of many significant works of classic literature.

We are relieved to note that alcohol was permitted, but not the flesh of any four-footed animal. During Lent, no food was permitted until sunset. The average monk rose at two a.m. and engaged himself in communal prayer in the chapel; more prayers, called "matins" or "lauds" would follow at dawn; and still more during the day based on a complicated division of the day into canonical "hours." Without question, the industry and activity of the monk left him little time to brood over the inequities and misfortunes of the secular world from which he had removed himself.

Benedict also provided his community with general ethical counsel, which remains unsurpassed in its simplicity and universality. Chapter II ("On What Kind of Man an Abbot Should Be") remains a succinct guide to practical leadership. Chapter IV of the Rule (called "The Instrument of Good Works") gives specific guidance on appropriate virtues. The ideal monk should take care:

> 14. To relieve the poor
> 15. To clothe the naked
> 16. To visit the sick
> 30. Not to do injuries, and to bear them with patience
> 31. To love one's enemies
> 53. Not to be fond of too much talking

> 62. Not to desire to be called a saint, but to be one > 72. After an argument, to make peace with someone before sundown
> 73. Never to despair of God’s mercy

All in all, it is healing counsel, and admirably practical. It goes without saying that the monastic life is not suitable for all; but to understand its attraction in the Dark Ages, we must remind ourselves that Benedict was operating at a time when secular institutions had largely collapsed. The moral and political authority of the Caesars had crumbled, and into its shell had stepped the ecclesiastical power of the nascent Church. It was an age of turbulence. During times of bankrupt moral codes and ineffective or nonexistent leadership from civil institutions, men will naturally turn to that which provides structure, rules, guidance, and hierarchy. It is a lesson we would do well to remember.

We may judge the worth of Benedict’s strict rule by the longevity of his creation. For 1500 years, it has provided continuous guidance and moral instruction. The monastery itself has been destroyed and rebuilt numerous times in its history: in 589, in 884, in 1349, in 1799, and most tragically in 1944. It has been rebuilt every time, and the monks have resumed their work. Few institutions created by man can boast of such a continuous record of quiet success. Benedict’s Rule teaches that if we seek to serve a higher calling, we must force ourselves to accept deprivation, want, and humility.

Submission is the gateway to higher things. Our constant striving and grasping for things beyond our reach creates tensions and stresses that cry out for relief. The monastic rule, whether in Thailand or in Italy, has something to teach us: nothing can be gained except through discipline, the imposition of rules, hard work, submission to authority, and self-denial. There are no shortcuts. There are no magic wands.

Across the centuries, and down the arches of the years, St. Benedict’s bearded visage calls out to us: my son, give up some of your freedom and your pride, and I can help give you your humanity.

Read More: 3 Habits Every Man Should Practice

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

5 Ways To Not End Up Homeless

October 6, 2014 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

In today's unstable economy it is a very real threat for many men that they could lose their job, lose their savings, and end up living on the streets. According to a CNN Money article published last year, 75 percent of Americans are living paycheck-to-paycheck. All it takes is for them to lose their job or to experience a medical emergency and they are screwed.

90 percent of homeless people in America are men. This makes sense because, after all, there is no shortage of thirsty beta males who would be willing to take a woman in and provide for her. Homelessness for women is a choice. For many men it is a very harsh reality that hits them suddenly if they lose their jobs and then can't afford to pay the rent.

Let's say that you are a man who just lost his job and you had used all your savings a few months prior to deal with a medical emergency, and now you face the very real threat of homelessness if you cannot get another job soon to pay your bills. What can you do?

There are actually a lot of alternatives to becoming homeless, especially if you are willing to become a little humble and lower your expectations and standard of living.

1. Teach English

If you have a four-year college degree you can easily get a job teaching English in China, Japan, South Korea, Thailand, Vietnam, or Taiwan. You won't be making huge bucks but you'll live a relatively well-off lifestyle compared to the average person in those countries. Five years ago I met a young American male in Seoul, South Korea, who was working as an English teacher and he told me he was making about 1000 dollars a month. Another benefit of working in Asia is that you are living in a pussy paradise.

2. Work on a farm

There are tens of thousands of organic farms you can work at worldwide, listed on websites like WWOOF.net. As long as you are willing to put in four to six hours of work daily they will provide you with a bed and three meals a day. Some places even pay you a small income, but most of the farms are for volunteer work. I've met people who have travelled all over the world doing just this. If you can cover the cost it takes to buy a ticket to get there, everything else is free. This is one way to travel the world and meet lots of very interesting people—Americans, Israelis, Europeans, Australians, South Americans, or people from any other country.

3. Couchsurf

You could live off of couchsurfing.org or other couchsurfing websites, which cater to people worldwide. I knew a guy who used couchsurfing in Asia and he got 3 bangs within his first 2 weeks of living there from different women he stayed with. You can travel worldwide and stay for free at people's places using couchsurfing websites, and it's a very easy way to meet women and immediately get into a new social circle.

4. Join a monastery

If you're into spirituality, you can kill two birds with one stone using this option, living for free and practicing meditation at the same time. The average arrangement for monasteries is that you agree to do four to six hours of volunteer work a day in the monastery, and in exchange they provide you with a room and three meals. The only downside is that you can't be openly sexual, as they will usually make you take a vow of celibacy.

Another benefit is that many monasteries allow you to enroll in some kind of trade school. During the day you can be learning a trade such as plumbing or electronics repair, so that eventually you'll be able to get a normal job and live on your own again. But who knows. You may enjoy the serenity and peacefulness so much that you may very well decide to remain as a monk for many years.

5. Become a naturalist

Build a cabin in a very rural area. Hunt and gather your own food. If you really want to put some hair on your chest this is a good option. Giving up all the comforts of modern living will turn you into a manly man and help you grow balls of steel. This is also a very peaceful way to live, as you are living in nature and there isn't constant noise pollution from cars and people.

Many great men in the past have done exactly this, such as Henry David Thoreau. He wrote a book that was published in 1854 called "Walden; or, Life in the Woods," in which he talks about the two years he spent living in the middle of the forest away from civilization. He was one of America's first great philosophers.

The most important thing is to not blame yourself. Millions of jobs have been outsourced to China and India, and millions of men are suddenly finding themselves unemployed through no fault of their own. In today's economy there are many things which we have no control over. What we do have control over is how we react to such hardships. Do we become absorbed in self pity and depression, or do we start looking for alternatives? I'm mentioned a few alternatives above and I hope it inspires a few men who are going through hard financial times. Don't lose hope.

Read More: Two Ways To Pursue Happiness

John Doe
John is the creator of the famous Boycott American Women blog. Check it out here: www.BoycottBitches.com

A Typical Day In The Patriarchy

October 7, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

Recently, one night I got a hankering for a Jones's brand cream soda. I put on my pants and got in my truck, driving toward the nearest Shoppers Drug Mart to buy myself some flavoured sugar water.

A few streets from my place, a large billboard overlooks a busy intersection. The advertisement on it lately has been for a technical college, showing a trio of pretty young women wearing a mechanics overalls, a nurses uniform and construction workers get up of a hardhat and bright orange vest. The slogan was so dippy sounding piece of garbage ("Choose you career, choose to excel"). Having worked various blue-collar jobs in my life, it was a little amusing to see the college was pandering to the female demographic, since every trade-centered workplace I've ever been has been a complete sausage fest.

More Canadian soldiers (the vast majority men) have died from suicide than from combat in Afghanistan. When one female officer was killed early in the war, major news outlets all over the country stumbled over themselves to memorialize her. A veteran buddy of mine who got a medal for bravery in a fire fight is currently drinking and drugging himself to death, and in all likelihood he will kill himself or die in an accident within the next five years. I doubt the CBC or the Prime Minister will give him any acknowledgement.

My route took me by the city's university. On the corner of another busy intersection, at the outskirts of the school's sports field, several large banners had been strung up to advertise goings-on at the university. One had another smattering of pretty young women, with a few token ethnic males thrown in, saying classes were still available for sign up. Another beside it advertised the Take Back The Night Walk, a female-focused event where a horde of women and their male mascots walk around the city after night to prove that it's safe for women to do so without getting raped, or something.

In the United States, men experience rape on a level comparable to women, to say nothing of the vast amounts of false rape accusations leveled at men, some of whom go to jail where they get to experience rape firsthand.

A few minutes later I pulled into the Shoppers Drug Mart parking lot, getting out and going to the entrance. On the door was a homemade poster, promoting a bake sale. All proceeds were going to go to the Woman's Resource Centre. Behind, taking up the upper half of the wall in the entrance area, was a large mural of three different pictures. On one was a grandmother, mother, and daughter frolicking in a field of flowers; on another, a woman stands in a billowing field holding a towel out behind her with a look of serenity on her face; on the last, a guy laughing, staring lovingly at his woman who is in turn staring toward the camera, a smug smile on her face.

The usual mean-nothing-feel-good words underscored several of the pictures: Family. Life. Love. In a way, it's almost like living in the great propaganda ages of the past, except instead of giant posters of lantern-jawed soldiers and immaculate war machines driving into the distance, underlined by the words VICTORY!! and SACRIFICE!!, I'm surrounded by images of smiling women, all ages and sizes, looking down on me.

Women overwhelmingly initiate divorce, and self destruct their families, with men suffering the financial ruin and government-mandated alimony and losing control of their children, regardless of how capably the mother can raise them.

I went inside the store, making my way toward the drink aisle. As I did so, the best of the 80's blaring through the intercom cut out, and a smoky-voiced woman reminded Shoppers Drug Mart customers that October is Breast Cancer Awareness month. She droned on about how many brave women would be subjected to the cancer in their lifetime, and how Shoppers Drug Mart supported these heroes, calling on us shitlord customers to do the same by donating to the cause and worshiping the women in our lives for living with the curse of having boobs that might one day sprout a tumor. When I reached the drink isle, finding my Jones cream soda, I saw that the drink company also supported Breast Cancer Awareness month by putting pink caps on their bottles.

Apparently September was Prostate Cancer Awareness month, but there weren't any brown ribbons on display, nor any advertisements for it even though 233,000 men are anticipated be diagnosed with it, and there are fewer women expected to be diagnosed with breast cancer (232,570). Even the NFL, whose majority fan base is men, have the players don pink while remaining comparatively silent on prostate cancer.

So I picked up my pink-topped cream soda and went to the checkout line. I looked at the various magazine covers while waiting to pay. No male faces stared back at me, even though there were economic and business and general interest magazines on the rack. Maclean's magazine was currently sporting a cover proclaiming REVENGE OF THE TEENAGE GIRL. Apparently the teenage femmes of today are going to finally knock down, once and for all, the insufferable patriarchy we all are chafing under. The teenage girls of today will grow up and single-handedly reverse the debaucherous hook up culture, completely equalize everything between the sexes and build a bridge across the bloody river so no one will ever again be kept out of Sto'Vo'Cor.

The two teenage girls in front of me were too busy on their iPhones to notice me leering at their bums, every supple contour of which was shown by their paper thin, body-clinging yoga pants. I could only assume they were too tuckered out from saving the world all day to take notice of their surroundings and had to leave their modesty pants at home.

The ongoing recession has been devastating only to men, who lost the majority of the jobs and have not managed to get them back. This is doubly destructive to men's psyches, since 3 out of 4 women will not date an unemployed man.

I paid the female cashier for the soda, left the store and got into my car, driving home and listening to several female pop stars croon about their broken hearts and reckless nights, pleading for the callous men they debauched themselves with to love her even as she grows old and has literally nothing left to offer.

Soldier suicides get a passing mention in the main stream media: women writing articles in prestigious newspapers about the lack of men who match their narcissistic needs go viral and stimulate a massive public debate, replete with talk show appearances and more women writing similar articles. Fat, lazy, borderline retarded women write articles about the lack of handsome, rich, and otherwise perfect men refusing to date them and they receive an outpouring of sympathy and well-wishing from both sexes. I write an article mentioning that I can't find an empathetic woman amongst the narcissistic, selfish creatures that constitute the female millennial and I receive emails wishing death upon me.

I got home, checked my texts. A girl I had been excited to see later that week blew me out, saying she doesn't want to hang out any more. It was obvious that others whom I had been waiting to hear back from for days had ghosted and faded on me. Having no immediate prospects on the horizon, I flipped through the Tinder app, prostrating myself to be judged solely on my looks in the hopes that I might be judged worthy to have some mediocre physical intimacy flung my way to stave off the depression that comes with sex deprivation.

If this truly is a patriarchy we're currently living in, all I can say is that I can't wait for today's teenage girls to grow up and guide us into a Matriarchal paradise. Judging by what I've seen of how a patriarchy works, under a matriarchy it will be men who are constantly celebrated and boasted up at the expense of the opposite sex. Because right now everywhere I turn and everything I see is all about women. Women being lauded in the news and magazines, women being celebrated on murals and in movies, women's problems dominating the public discourse.

I fervently await the matriarchy's coming. It'll be nice not to be hated, belittled and held back simply because I was born with the wrong set of genitals. It'll be nice to be able to have a public conversation about male concerns and worries without having to deal with a collective role of the eyes, and a snarky little mumble of: "Right, it's sooo shitty being a man."

It'll be interesting to see how it feels to be treated like a human being for once, instead of simply as a sex toy, an ATM, a taxi driver, a faceless laborer, mere cannon fodder or an otherwise disposable asset whose sole existence is to make women's lives even more comfortable. Being appreciated by the people and society you build and maintain… Wouldn't that be somethin'?

Read More: A Typical Empowered Woman's Conversation In Any City USA

Billy Chubbs
Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

Modern Social Justice Warriors Use The Same Subversion Strategies As The USSR

October 7, 2014 | by Mark | Link | Original Link

By employing the principles of divide-and-conquer, Communist Russia destabilized neighboring nations in order to subjugate them. These were incorporated as “Soviet Republics” into the USSR. Whilst one could argue that the Soviet Union was a collection of republics forming a power bloc, the truth is that all power was held in Moscow, and the leaders of the other Soviet Republics were puppets of the Kremlin.

The communists used two main methods to conquer the other nations. Firstly, these would destabilise the nation in question, then they would either conquer them, under the pretext of stopping a humanitarian crisis as in Afghanistan (failed attempt), or by placing a puppet leader trained in the Soviet Union in power such as in Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, and the three baltic states, Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia.

In order to destabilize a nation, the KGB would employ a tactic called subversion. Such importance was given to this tactic that the Soviet Union trained all officers of the army and students of the KGB in art of subversion.

So what is Subversion and how does it work?

In 1970, a KGB operative stationed in India defected to the United States and subsequently settled in Canada. After working numerous jobs, and almost losing his job in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation thanks to the fruitful efforts of the KGB to discredit him (a tactic referred to as “character assassination”), Bezmenov went public with the subversive strategies of the KGB. Whilst stationed in India, Bezmenov had developed split loyalty, as he increasingly became more enthralled with the Indian culture, and disillusioned with the Soviet one.

Thanks to Bezmenov’s desertion we can now learn the secrets of the notorious KGB.

There are two videos available by Bezmenov. The first is an interview, in which he tells his story of defection. The second video is a lecture in which he explains the subject of Subversion. We will explore the latter. Bezmenov begins by explaining what subversion is not. Subversion is not related to the classical perception of espionage. Subversion, by Soviet terminology, is defined as:

> A destructive/aggressive activity aimed to destroy the country, nation, or geographical area of [the] enemy.

This definition is very broad, this it tells us that any destructive activity that could be done to the KGB's enemy nation could be used. The Soviet subverter could be any Soviet, including exchange students, diplomats, actors or artists and event journalists going to the target nation. By Bezmenov's calculation, 85% of the KGB's efforts were put into subversion.

Bezmenov states that subversion can only be used on a nation that is open to subverters.

> Subversion is a two way traffic. You cannot subvert a nation that does not want to be subverted…subversion can only be successful when the Initiator has a responsive target…

Imagine how history may have changed if the United States had imposed a ban on all Soviet citizens from entering its borders. There would be no campus Marxists (like in the video where a student from Portland State University is almost booted out from a public meeting on campus), there would be no feminist movement (3rd wave at least), and there would be no political correctness. The Soviet Union had closed borders primarily to prevent their citizens from being subverted by the west.

There are a range of subversion strategies employed by the Soviet Union for different types of events in the target nation or geographical areas of interest. This slide is a translation of an original brought back by Bezmenov when he defected.

The video lecture explains the mechanism of subversion in detail. I will attempt to do it justice in a summary form.

1. The target nation is infiltrated by subverters. Subverters can be anybody, from students to ambassadors who have either been bought or subverted previously for the task. These blend in as model citizens in the target nation and join groups such as student bodies, academic bodies, trade unions, news organisations and so forth. They may not necessarily create organizations or movements themselves, but these will quickly become part of the leadership in those movements.

2.The subverters will target organizations (institutions as Gramsci called them) in order to manipulate them into self destruction from the inside. The main organizations according to Bezmenov are Religion, Education, Social Life, Power Structure, Labour Relations (trade unions) and Law and Order. The subverters will attempt to move people away from religious sanctity into sects, cults and random mumbo jumbo like the new age movement and pseudo religious science. They will then enter education, persuading people to move away from useful academic subjects like Medicine and Engineering and into Women's Studies or Social "Sciences."

They then move to social life, by replacing social institutions with fake organizations and thus taking initiative away from people with bureaucracy. The power structure is changed from an elected one into a non elected one. (Does this sound like the European commission?) The media is targeted, instead of reporting facts they now report narratives and opinions dressed as facts. Law and Order is changed so that the it no longer serves the people but acts against the people, the citizens in turn are conditioned to mistrust law officials, just like in Ferguson.

3. The scope of subversion is now narrowed down to Labor Relations, Law and Media.

Trade unions are radicalized so that industry comes to a halt. The trade union boss's job is not to bargain for better deals for the union members but to improve his own position. Trade union bosses were bought by the Soviet Union. The Media and Law are similarly radicalized. The media sells a narrative to the people and so do the courts and police. The nation is now destabilized and unrest grows. The subverters rise through the ranks and become politically active, they then turn groups to violence and riots.

4. The nation is now in turmoil. Several sleepers come forward as leaders preaching that they have the answer to the unrest. They may use force to take power.

5. Civil war ensues. The Soviet Union either places a puppet leader or invades under pretext.

Bezmenov first went to India to work on an aid project sponsored by the Soviet Union. At the time Bezmenov thought this was legitimate aid to India.

> My first assignment was as a translator with a Soviet economical aid group, building refinery complexes in [the state of] Bihar. At that time I was still naively idealistically believing that what I was doing contributes to the understanding and cooperation between the nations. It took me quite a number of years to realise that what we were bringing to India was a new type of colonialism, [a] thousand times more oppressive and exploitative than any type of imperialism in the history of mankind.

In the other video, Bezmenov does not explain what led him to believe that the aid project was not altruistic. However from the slide aforementioned, we can see that the KGB used aid projects as a means of subversion.

Why are leftists so single-minded?

It may be that communism taps into the subconscious primate inside. Just like a religion, it does not require evidence to support its ideological merits, it is taken on faith.

Communism does not teach, it indoctrinates.

NOTE THE EMPTINESS IN THE EYES OF THIS INDOCTRINATED ZOMBIE AS IT SHOUTS LEFTIST SLOGANS AND SPEWS BUZZWORDS IT DOES NOT UNDERSTAND.

Marxists thrive on college campuses in the United States and Europe. There are so many Marxists on campuses because students are most susceptible to indoctrination, as this is the time when young adults are forming their own political ideologies. Marxists were, at one point, sent from the Soviet Union to enroll in western academia, for the sole purpose of indoctrinating western students and get a foothold on the target nation(s). After all, academia was an area which Gramsci recognised as a pivotal point of influence over the people of a nation.

Present day campus Marxists (useful idiots) are keenly aware of how unpopular they are in the mainstream, and these are acutely aware that anything they say could expose them to the scrutiny of the public eye and opinion. Instead of advocating outright Marxism, they choose instead to censor, shame, and silence those with views different from their own. Despite the colossal failure of the collectivist experiments that were Stalin's Soviet Union, Mao's China and Kim Jong Sun's D.P.R.K, communists will still defend their ideals (plug their ears) and ignore the mounting evidence of the horrors of communism.

The reader of this article may think that this is all irrelevant, as communism was "defeated" after the fall of the Soviet Union and since China's embrace of capitalism. Alas, communism is like weed in a garden, you can never fully eradicate it. Communism is all too prevalent in western universities and campuses. The new face of cultural marxism is the social justice warrior (SJW).

Whilst the SJW will not identify itself as a Marxist, their ideology and modus operandi is an exact replica of the Marxist. The SJW has a narrow world view, totalitarian tendencies, is weak to criticism and is extremely paranoid. We should call them for what they are:

Communists, Marxists, and Leninists.

Another useful idiot subverted.

How is it that there are so many campus Marxists in nations that have historically been anti-communist? As it turns out, this was part of an extensive KGB operation undertaken during the time of the Soviet Union.

Why should we care?

Why should we care about some leftist here and there, and how much influence could these possibly have?

These forces work in the background, slowly but surely, often capitalizing on protests to further their agenda and viewpoints. Such examples include the Occupy Wall Street in NYC and the Indignados movement in Madrid. Whilst these movements began as a protest without political affiliation to the 2008 economic disaster, the leftist took over and turned them into an anti-capitalist movement. True to form, the neo-communists set up tents and wrecked the place, leaving vast amounts of rubbish for the councils to clean up at the tax payers expense.

The same can be said about the indie video game developers and video game journalism. Instead of reporting about games, journalists began selling users their Marxist narrative on equality. This unleashed the wrath of video game players, who took to Twitter and 4chan to call them out on their blatant conflict of interest and hypocrisy. This is what's known as #gamergate.

Faced with criticism, the Marxists began a campaign to silence and shame their critics with baseless accusations. The mainstream media, which has long been an Marxist cheerleader bought the narrative, did not do the due diligence of fact-finding about the other side of the story. How far does the rabbit hole truly go?

What can we do as individuals?

I will refer to the late orator and free thinker, Christopher Hitchens:

Criticize, criticize and criticize anyone who tries to sell you an ideology disguised as a movement. If you are accused falsely of some charge of misogyny or racism, retort by calling them out as a Marxist, a totalitarian, and a fraud. If you are online refer them to this article and to the video above.

Read More: Communists Are Successfully Destroying America

Mark

Mark is a seasoned traveller and philander who enjoys a smoke and glass of bourbon. He is an avid reader and a Political History enthusiast. Occasionally enjoys shit posting on the Guardian or the Telegraph. You can read his other ROK articles, and follow him on twatter and Google+1. His articles are proofread by InfoShinobi.

How To Get More Sex With Alpha Douchebag Club Game

October 8, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

A problem for many guys who come to manosphere and game sites to learn about getting good with women is that they are naturally nice, or at least they are conditioned by a feminized society to limit the expression of their masculinity, and instead to display a PG-rated, polite, caring, soft version of themselves. This, after all, is what we've been told works. Girls want to meet a man who is non-threatening, interested in the same things they are, and in touch with his emotions. But very quickly our illusions are shattered when the exact behaviors we thought were prescribed not only fail to work, but often attract harsh blow-outs and female ridicule.

I don't think we should denigrate men for this. I have a theory that the qualities that many of us naively thought women should like are in fact male values we projected onto them. Qualities I assumed would endear me to women, but which frequently had the opposite effect, are actually those that I value myself – being well-read; being willing to converse deeply on philosophy, literature, or politics; being polite and interested in others; having a sense of honor.

Make no mistake – so-called White Knighting is not merely a (flawed) strategy for obtaining sex ("You should like me because I'm such a great guy"): it is also a quixotic but in some senses admirable affirmation of how many men think things ought to be, if only the sexual marketplace were fair and reasonable: if only female psychology was more aligned with their own. I'm not saying that women don't value these traits, or that they don't end up with men who possess them. What I am saying is that they don't find them inherently attractive.

What Women Really Want

What women really want, as is well-documented, is the bad boy, the jock, the douchebag, the exciting alpha whose devil-may-care swag causes tornadic pupil-enlarging and tsunamic Victoria's Secret panty-wetting. For those readers unfamiliar with theories about women's dual sexual strategy I suggest you start by checking out Sperm Wars by Robin Baker, or Krauser on r/k selection.

For our purposes here it suffices to say that an idea gaining a lot of credence is that as women grow increasingly independent from men (with their own incomes, support from the state, alimony payments etc.) provider qualities that were once attractive – being a sensible beta male with a good steady job to support her – are now frequently thought inferior to sexy jerk qualities that don't suggest stability, but do suggest a damn good bang and superior, alpha genes.

I was once the guy discussing Sartre and existentialism with some philosophically-inclined girl at the bar for hours before getting a polite peck on the cheek at the end of the night and no sex. Meanwhile, some juiced dude in an Ed Hardy wifebeater and trucker cap would already be nuts deep in whatever co-ed he'd picked up. If I'm honest, I would probably have been a bit snobbish about such a man, whose technique was the polar opposite to my smoother, more cerebral and woefully ineffective approach. But it would have served me better to have observed his behavior and attitudes and incorporated some of them into my own.

Alpha Douchebag Club Game in Action

I recently spent a few days on the Spanish party island of Ibiza. For those who haven't been, you can read my write-up of it here, but suffice to say it is the Vegas of Europe – blazing sunshine for five months of the year, huge clubs and literally thousands of hot girls getting off planes from England, Russia, Italy, mainland Spain, and the US every day. Here, at my favorite party Circo Loco at DC10, I was privileged to observe some of the most exquisite alpha douchebag club game that I have seen for a long time.

Circo Loco is a techno party that used to attract a very underground crowd composed largely of Italian music lovers. It was defiantly unglamorous with the focus being firmly on the beats. Ten years later, as with everywhere on the island, it now attracts a much bigger, more mainstream crowd, including many, many cute 18-24 year old girls in cut-off denim shorts, and alpha jock types. Standing in the back room listening to DJ Mees Dierpdorf play, I saw a very cute young English brunette get picked up by a loud AMOG (alpha male of the group) type in a vest with YOLO written on it. Here's how it happened.

The AMOG was dancing with a group of three other guys in front of the DJ box. He was tall and muscular with a cheeky, good-looking face. He was whooping, throwing his arms in the air and moving around a lot, dominating the space about him. He was talking to everyone – guys, girls, young, old, cute or ugly. Just a friendly word or two here and there: "Alright mate," "Sweet," "Have a good night," etc. He had a huge grin on his face and looked as though he was having the time of his life (of course, it is more than possible that he had taken MDMA, although I have no way of knowing this). He was touching everyone – a handshake here, a pat on the head there. He appeared interested only in having fun, in enjoying the music and dancing.

The cute brunette whispered something to her friend, and then approached the AMOG. She was holding a Spanish flamenco fan. She stood right in front of him and wafted it up and down, cooling him off – after all, he was glowing with sweat from all that dancing. He laughed, pulled her towards him, rubbed the top of her head with his palm then kissed her on the cheek as though she were his little sister. He spoke briefly to her, looking down at her as though highly skeptical and puzzled by everything she said, sometimes pulling her in close to speak in her ear.

Shortly afterwards he carried on dancing as before. But now the brunette and her friend were part of the group. The AMOG didn't pay much attention to them; he just carried on partying, talking to other guys and girls, having a blast. From time to time one of his friends would whisper something to the brunette, probably in attempt to ingratiate himself, but with a light, playful touch.

After ten minutes or so the group disbanded a little, and now the two girls were on the periphery again. Seeing his opportunity, a Spanish guy not associated with the AMOG's group came up behind the brunette and began dancing close to her, holding her hips. The AMOG noticed. He came over immediately, put a huge arm around the girl and moved her to his right. Then he took her place in front of the unfortunate interlocutor, and began grinding his ass into her crotch, laughing all the while. Then he turned and playfully grabbed the guy's head, pulled it towards him and kissed him on the cheek, as though this was all just good fun rather than serious mate-guarding.

His physical dominance over the man, and the latter's humiliation, were plain for everyone to see. Then – and this was the AMOG's masterstroke – he grabbed the brunette and threw her back into the Spaniard's arms. Predictably, she shook her head, disgusted by the implication that she might actually want to be with this weaker, beta male. With huge, shining eyes she walked once more into the protective radius of the AMOG, who was now ignoring her and dancing wildly once more as though nothing had happened.

The unfortunate Spaniard walked away, his emasculation confirmed, his opportunity for sexual access to the brunette entirely and brutally eradicated. In contrast, the AMOG's supremacy was now assured. I am certain that after his seeing off the lesser man, the brunette would have had sex with him in the bathroom right then, had he chosen to lead her there.

If this sounds like something you might see on a wildlife documentary, believe me, it was. But there is no other environment I know of where female hypergamy is so visible as in the modern nightclub. Here, the combination of alcohol, drugs, and overtly sexual music, as well as the array of potential male suitors on hand, means that attractive young women have little need or inclination to hide their active seeking out of the highest value males they can get.

Does this mean that alpha douchebag game is the only way? No. My natural style is based more on conversation, coupled with increasing physicality throughout the interaction. It works well for me and for people I've taught. Could I have pulled the cute brunette? Quite possibly. She was certainly no more attractive than other girls I've slept with recently. But let's be honest, stealing her from the AMOG that night would have been a challenge. A well-built natural who exhibits physical dominance and emanates a fun, don't-give-a-shit attitude in a club is always going to be hard to beat, as this is an environment where women are bombarded with stimuli and are looking for the most exciting, shiny thing they can find.

How To Use Alpha Douchebag Game

If you are not like the AMOG in this anecdote then there a few things you can do. The first is to consider whether night game is for you at all. If you favor a softer, more conversationally-led approach, then you might be better off sticking to daygame. That's not to say that you're not also competing with AMOGs in the girl's circle during the day, but at least they won't be present, so you can take your shot in a more low-key, less pressured situation. If clubs are your thing, though, I would say there is a lot to be learned from AMOGs and it's worth watching them and copying some of their behaviors.

First, if you don't work out, then begin immediately. I go to the gym about five times a week. I'm not huge, but I have developed greater muscle mass over the years, which means that I feel significantly more confident around other men than when I was in my early twenties. Second, rather than doing hundreds of "gamey" cold approaches, you might experiment with simply going out with a group of high-value male friends, dominating the club environment, speaking to everyone, having a great time and attracting girls to you that way. In my anecdote – and this is the mark of the true alpha – the AMOG didn't have to bother approaching the cute brunette. She came to him. I'm not saying do nothing – obviously you still need to interact with girls, but given you will be talking to everyone anyway, and those close to you will likely be there because they are attracted to your energy, then the job of pulling them will be much easier.

You should look quizzically at girls when they talk to you, as if they are children who aren't quite making sense. Be physical with everyone – especially other men. High-fives, hugs, pats on the back, handshakes. If you can make it look as though you can dominate other guys then you are well on the way to creating pussy Niagara Falls in your vicinity. Don't try to be cool – smile, be happy and look like you're having an amazing time. Be friendly to people – the true alpha can afford to be magnanimous because he knows he can kick the ass of anyone who steps out of line.

While "dark triad" characteristics are undeniably attractive to women, the greatest currency in a nightclub is fun. You should not appear to attach too much importance to your target. And if another guy moves in on her then feel free to replicate the technique I've described here as it was, quite frankly, a stroke of genius (judge the situation carefully though – don't get yourself beaten up).

Another thing you should bear in mind is this. The cute brunette I describe looked like a typical good girl – the type who the average beta would assume would be swayed by intelligent conversation, flowers and dinner. Not a bit of it. It was a central tenet of Mystery's thinking that ultimate masculine energy attracts ultimate feminine energy. This is well worth remembering – especially in a highly competitive environment like a nightclub.

There will be those who read this and attribute the alpha's success entirely to his looks and build, but that would be to miss the point. While those things undeniably helped (and every man can work on his body and his appearance) it was his behavior, his display of masculine dominance that really made the difference. Not everyone has to use this type of physically dominant game – there are other strategies – but you should at least be aware of it, of how susceptible beautiful young women are to it, and how easy to imitate it is.

Even if you are not a six foot, granite-jawed champion lifter, aping a few of the behaviors I've outlined here while in the club will pay dividends and will certainly differentiate you from the scared-looking, James Bond-imitating, wall-hugging guys that you are competing with.

To find out more ways to get more sex with beautiful young women click here.

Read More: How To Get Laid In Ibiza

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

What Is Game? (ROK Mailbag)

October 8, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Some navel gazing

Dopeman writes:

> Could you please define a definition of Game? What is Game really? A system, a structure, strategy or maybe an ideology?

This is an interesting question. I believe the definition of game both varies from person to person and is particular to an individual. Since we all come from different backgrounds, starting points, and have different goals it is hard to define is as an absolute thing.

For me, game is initially a skill that you learn that eventually becomes second nature to you. It's also partly a realization that things are not what you thought they were, and that you must adjust yourself to the actual realities of the world.

It's knowing when to react, and when to be nonreactive. For example, if she starts accusing you of something you grab and kiss her to shut her up (reactive), and conversely if she mentions she had a threesome you casually ask her to pass the salt (nonreactive). it's also realizing that you can get away with a lot more than you think. You know when to touch, how to touch, where to touch. It's a tool that eviscerates the idea that "I'll never have sex again" because you can, and will, have sex rather often.

Think of it as learning to drive a manual transmission. At first, you can barely move the car. You are terrified. You keep stalling every few minutes. Slowly you learn how to drive straight lines, but struggle to fully grasp it as you have difficulty up hills and with parking and other tasks. Eventually you get better and can do a full drive without fucking up.

Then you actually become good at it – you downshift going into corners because you can. You start from a stop on 2nd gear as opposed to first, because you know the clutch so well you can time it just right as opposed to a beginner who could never do that. Once in a blue moon you will still stall out, but overall it has become second nature to you. That even when you get back into an automatic transmission, you still rest your hand on the gear knob because that's just what you are used to.

If you apply that analogy to game, at first you are terrible with interactions with females. You are terrified to approach. When you do, you stall out and the conversations go nowhere. Eventually you learn how to engage girls and get numbers, but can't fully close. Then you become good at it – get some bangs in. You start pushing yourself by doing things you wouldn't have done in the beginning. You get to a point where you are advanced, skipping steps. You still fuck up here and there (stall), but eventually when you meet a girl you just start gaming her without realizing it. It becomes a part of who you are, instead of an idea of concept you are trying to use.

– Law Dogger

Game is a set of social skills that permit you to become sexually intimate with women. But who gives a shit what the definition of game is? What is this, Aristotle's "Categories"? You already know what it is. As Theolonius Monk once said when asked to define jazz: If you got to ask what it is, you'll never get to know.

-Quintus Curtius

Pissed-in pool

Cody writes:

> "I'm back together with an estranged gf of 11 years…you think I should ride with her? I'm quite certain she rode the carosel in those years… I honestly don't give a fuck about her and her shit though, but sometimes I do feel like she's the one who got away…

First off, you state in the same sentence that you don't give a fuck about this girl yet she is the one that got away. So currently you yourself have no idea what you think of her. Second, without providing more detail there is no way for me to give a viable answer. What makes her "the one who got away?" More importantly, it is hard to believe nobody in 11 years has tickled your fancy in the same way. Read up on oneitis, sounds like what we have going on here.

– Law Dogger

Generally, these things do not work out well. If you broke up with her, there's usually a good reason why you did so in the first place. Hanging around with her will prevent you from finding better girls. Be honest. You're with her now because it's a sure thing and you want the sex. You're looking for a comfort blanket. That's not a good plan.

– Quintus Curtius

She’s just not that into you

James writes:

> Scenario: I am at a small piano bar in NYC on a Saturday night. I spot an attractive girl (mid 20s) sitting (alone, believe it or not) at the bar with a glass of wine. I take a seat next to her, open her. I quickly determine English is not her native language. I ask her where she’s from – she turns out to be Albanian. Moved to NYC a few months ago, staying with her cousin. She is a bit shy at first but warms up to me in time. Laughing, touching my arm, etc. Unsolicited, she ask if I have “a facebook.” She hands me her phone. I add her. I ask for her number but she says she doesn’t know it (wtf?) and asks me to put mine in her phone (of course this is a bad idea, always get the girl’s number, don’t give her yours). She orders another glass of wine, we continue chatting. Again, she is being quite warm and friendly throughout, touching, etc. 11:30 rolls around, she receives a phone call, goes outside to take it. Says it is her cousin and that she has to head home, has things to do in the morning tomorrow (doubtful). I invite her back to my place for wine, she declines politely. “Message me sometime, show me new place” she says. She hugs me and kisses my cheek.
>
> Messaged her 3 days later asking if she was free to meet up that evening. Read, no response. Has not unfriended me.
>
> Question: In most circumstances, I would just attribute this to the girl being polite/feeling something in the moment and then changing her mind later. I find it odd that she asked me to add her on Facebook though, before I even asked for her contact info, and continues to be my “friend” on there despite not responding to my message. Also, I would appreciate any info you have regarding Albanian girls in general. I do not recall you writing extensively about them, though you may some articles somewhere that I’m unaware of.
>
> Any insight would be appreciated.
>
> P.S. I do not have anything incriminating on my Facebook. Very sparse, about a dozen photos, a few funny/sarcastic status updates. Nothing that I would imagine would turn a girl off or on. Just basic stuff.

See the heading above. To quote Roosh from Brazil Compendium, “If a girl asks for your Facebook, the interaction will soon be over.” This isn’t just true in South America. She found you interesting enough to talk to and perhaps milk for a drink or two, but it is clear that even before your messaged her she had no interest in seeing you again. Congratulations, you just upped her friend (read: orbiter) count on social media.

Starting from the bottom

Bruce writes:

> While being an avid reader of ROK, I am still socially inept. Would a Dale > Carnegie course be a step in the right direction? Not sure about the science (genetics, introvert, shy) behind it, but I'm pretty sure it's a habit that can be broken. It's even more frustrating having the tools with no experience on how to use them. There are three types of men on ROK (plus outliers).

> 1) Established players/ man who gets play
> 2) Men who can socialize but still can't get laid.
> 3) Men who can't socialize..... . . . . .
> I know you just have to "do it", but that puts the GAME on hard mode for man #3. Where do I start?

Paying to take a course may help, but I honestly think it's a lousy first step. I used to have some serious problems with anxiety, so I would suggest you first read that article and perhaps apply a few of those strategies. Ineptness and shyness are two distinct problems, though both can be managed by getting reps in. In the Beige Phillip podcast, Dante Nero has a strategy he calls "laying the five bricks," which basically amounts to making a certain fixed number of mini-approaches during the day. In a case where you're simply trying to defeat shyness, these don't even have to be with good looking women.

So, you need to get off the internet and strike up a conversation with anyone about anything, and do that three times every day. Like a shirt a guy's wearing? Tell him it's sharp, and ask where he got it. Think the coffee girl made your drink extra tasty? Let her know and ask what she did differently. Talk to everyone, and ask lots of questions. See how people react to you—you'll notice that people are generally friendly and understanding when you're asking about their life. Also, keep a log of what you did and how people reacted. This will help you notice patterns in the interactions.

You'll probably feel like you bombed the first 100 interactions, but I guarantee that after a month of doing this you'll feel more comfortable about transitioning those interactions to women in a pickup setting. We all have different baseline appetites for social stimulation, but blaming your genetics is a cop-out. This is a solvable problem, but you are the only person who can change your fortunes. Do it or don't. And write back and let us know how it goes.

-Black Knight

That's it for this week. If you would like a question answered by the ROK staff, send it via email or the anonymous form.

Read More: Do You Love Game?

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

The Most Disgusting Thing A Slut Can Say

October 9, 2014 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

Women love winners, and women love losers—it's the guys in the middle they can't fucking stand. This is something I figured out back in high school. The popular guys never went without pussy, and the drug dealers never went without it either. High school doesn't last forever, but the fact remains that just being a normal dude doesn't get you very far with chicks.

I have no doubts that a frustrated 23-year-old virgin with a passion for working out, a serviceable degree, and a very bright future ahead of him is reading this article right now. At the same time, there's a jobless derelict out there somewhere that's deciding on which of the three attractive women he nails on a regular basis will be the one he visits tonight. It ain't right, but it is the way the world works.

I won't blow smoke up the asses of the ROK readership—I've never had hardships with getting women. There are no stories of overcoming adversity that I can share about my inability to land some pussy. Getting women has never been a problem for me and it has only gotten easier with time. The reason I've never gone without women is simple—I combine being a loser and being a winner into one package.

Being A Winner

In my professional life, I'm a winner. I have a strong passion for what I do and I'm good at it. I'm always expanding and brushing up on my knowledge. I take my responsibilities seriously. I show up for work looking professional because I am a professional. The shoes are shined, the coat is dry-cleaned, the slacks have perfect creases and the face is clean-shaven. I have the respect of my colleagues—I don't want anyone I fly with to ever get the impression that I don't know my shit or that I can't be relied on in a pinch. That would be unacceptable, and I will never allow it to happen. In the cockpit, I will never be a loser.

When it comes to my health, I'm a winner. I eat as clean as I possibly can, which is not easy for a guy who spends a lot of time away from home. Even though it is a challenge, I do the best I can. I also lift three times a week and run for cardio. My health is directly tied with my professional life due to an annual medical examination required for professional pilots. If I lose my health, I lose my ability to fly and make money. Only a loser doesn't care about their health and well-being.

With my immediate family and the very tiny group of people I care about, I'm a winner. If someone close to me needs anything at all—I'm there for them with no questions asked. If they're broken down on the side of the road at 2:00 AM, I'll be there with flashlights, a bag of tools, and a thermos full of hot coffee. If my parents get too old to take care of themselves, I will do it for them. I would wipe my dad's ass and feed him like a baby if it ever came down to it. And I would do it without complaining or feeling the slightest tinge of embarrassment. That's one of the luxuries of being a great and selfless father—the unwavering loyalty of his sons. He will never set foot in a nursing home so long as I outlive him. Same for my mother.

When dealing with people in general, I'm a winner. I'm never deliberately a dick to anyone that doesn't deserve it. I'm polite to waitstaff, retail workers, and anyone I come in contact with in public. I see no reason to ruin someone's day or be a power-tripping asshole to people for no reason. I tip well for good service, and give compliments to people that go above and beyond to please me. Only when necessary, will I become a ruthless cut-throat son of a bitch.

When it comes to making money and making sound financial decisions, I wasn't always a winner, but I can say with confidence that I am now. My savings is growing quite nicely every month, and I've cut off any impetuous and needless spending. Winners are able to retire and stop working at a decent age. I aim to be included in that group someday.

Being A Loser

On the other hand, with the women I date, I'm a complete fucking loser. I don't respect them. I don't care about their opinions, their hopes, or their dreams. I run my dating life in the same way I would run a business, and like any good business, I have a slogan: “When women have problems, I don’t have solutions.” Women nowadays don’t deserve a winner, therefore, they don’t get one. Even if they did get one, they wouldn’t appreciate it. Women are only entitled to the loser version of me. And you know what? They wouldn’t have it any other way.

Why am I such a loser to women? Well, there are two reasons. Number one: it’s easy and it works—being a winner is hard, being a loser isn’t. Number two consists of a comprehensive list of very rudimentary attributes a woman must possess in order to not be considered a loser herself.

If she’s slept more than three dudes by 25 years old—she’s a fucking loser. If she has a tattoo anywhere on her body or anything other than normal earrings—she’s a fucking loser. If she’s had a one night stand; fucking loser. If she’s a social media attention whore; insecure fucking loser. Women have made the decision that their utility will not extend beyond their vaginas. If that’s the way they want to run things, then by all means—go for it. I’m more than happy to play along and take my share—provided it comes at little hassle.

Those Disgusting Words

Now, you might get the impression that my lowly opinion of the modern woman would make them hate me. Obviously, some of these thoughts and opinions must be kept hidden away, but I’m pretty overt in my feelings towards women. It’s not displayed through contempt, but through apathy. There’s just not a whole lot of fuck giving going on over here. However, none of this has stopped a few of these women from saying the most foul, disgusting, vomit-inducing shit they could ever utter to a man…

“I love you.”

Hearing a slut say that she loves me will completely ruin my day. I would rather watch two gay snapping turtles slowly fuck in a puddle of diarrhea than have some slutty broad say that she loves me. Hearing that will make me feel like I messed up somewhere along the line, or did something wrong. I will say to myself, “Dammit, I knew I should’ve been nicer to this one.”

It really is mind-blowing. There are so many dudes out there who would dedicate their lives to making these women truly happy. Men that would move heaven and earth to have some slut fall in love with them. Men that would pull 80-hour workweeks to make money to buy these sluts whatever they want. Men that would forgive any of their prior transgressions and piss-poor decisions. These men would truly love these women with all of their little beta hearts.

Yet here these women are… in love with some dude that would seriously debate whether he would miss a day at work to go to their funerals if they died. And this seems to have no effect on them at all. They want exclusive relationships anyway. They start pursuing commitment like they’re fucking Oliver Twist asking for a second helping of porridge, “Please sir, I want some more.” Nope, sorry bitch—the kitchen’s closed.

Committing to these women is simply an impossibility, and it’s impossible because they command absolutely no respect. If you show me a truly respectable woman, I’ll show you a man that would go to bat for her in a heartbeat. Otherwise, assume the position: face down, ass up.

Here’s an example of what I’m talking about. I was seeing a woman earlier this year. At one point, I had her eating out of the palm of my hand and she used to come over to my place to do chores for me. One day she was doing my laundry and said, “Just so you know, I’ve never liked a guy enough to do his laundry for him,” I thought that was amusing and I completely believed her—she couldn’t fold a t-shirt to save her life, and her clothes were usually in a pile on the floor at her place, so I had proof. I’m sure some guys out there would love to hear those words come from a woman’s mouth. “Oh gee golly, she likes me and thinks I’m special and oh-so great,” he might say to himself. Faggot.

I wasn’t buying the shit she was selling, though. Why, you may ask? Because earlier in our relationship she had said to me, “I’ve never done anal before, all of my other boyfriends wanted to try it and I wouldn’t do it. But I’ll do it for you,” I didn’t believe her for a fucking second. This was a slut in the truest sense of the word—a standard issue college educated hoe that had smoked more sausages than all the barbecue joints in Memphis combined. Given the way she could suck and ride a dick, I knew she wasn't being honest.

Now, just think about that for a second. In 2014, the chances a woman was previously fucked in her asshole by an ex-boyfriend are greater than the chances that she washed and folded his jeans and t-shirts. That is some shameful shit right there. Oh American women, how far you have come.

In Closing

Being a loser is no way to approach life. In order to make life worth living a man must have goals, aspirations, and meaningful hobbies. Those goals, aspirations, and hobbies cannot revolve around relationships with women. Women are not to be taken seriously—they are a supplement to your otherwise fruitful existence.

Sure, there are a handful of them out there that are worth your time, but finding one is going to be one hell of a challenge. I haven't met a relationship-material woman in America in the past six years of trying, and trust me, I've tried. It used to be frustrating, but now it's just comical. I've resigned myself to the fact that this is just the way shit goes.

Gentlemen, once you legitimately stop giving a fuck about women, they will cling on to you like human barnacles. That's the honest truth. I was in love once, and I wasted five years of my life. Relationships have one of two outcomes: you're either together forever, or your not. There is no return on investment with broken relationships. The only thing you get are some hard lessons learned and a fresh start—that's it.

I went all in with my emotional chips on a woman that was the equivalent to a pair of Jacks—I lost my hand. I will never go all in again unless I'm holding a Royal Flush. If that happens? Great. If it doesn't? Also great. Life is good and there's a lot of fun and meaningful shit to get done before one dies—a steady relationship isn't a requirement for making any of that happen.

Just remember to use sluts for their designed purpose, while keeping your eyes peeled for one of the good ones. That’s the best advice I can offer. After a five-minute conversation with a modern woman, it should be crystal clear that you won’t be with her for the rest of your life. Act accordingly. Get yours and get out when you’re ready to move on. Other than her pussy, she’s irrelevant unless she proves otherwise. Never forget that.

Give a woman heaven, and she’ll complain about the view. Give a woman hell, and she’ll offer to pay the rent. – Yours Truly

Read More: 26 More Signs She’s A Slut

A.V. Yader
A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

The Value Of Being A Loner

October 9, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

"The vulgar, that is, indeed, all mankind, a few excepted."

–David Hume

"The crowd is untruth."

–Soren Keirkegaard

If you read the biographies of great philosophers from the days when Philosophy meant a way of life, rather than just a recondite branch in the academic "knowledge" industry, you will see that very few of those great men from the pre-Socratics up through Nietzsche were much for marriage and social life. Most were loners. Many were solitaries. Very few married. For, given the quality of their minds, and in some cases, the quality of their characters, they could not relate well to most people. So they went their own way, devoted to loftier pursuits than power and pleasure.

But you don't have to be an erudite genius to choose (wisely) to spend much or most of your time alone. One of the more difficult truths about the human condition is that people don't understand us in a deep sense any more than we do them. Our deepest thoughts, feelings and values are hard, and in many instances impossible, to share or communicate. The knowledge of this becomes plain as we get older, and it then becomes natural to spend more and more time alone.

Now time alone may be understood as a kind of measure of a person's value. Strong and well-cultivated men require and cherish it. With stupid and weak men—that is, the majority—the opposite is true. Their Facebook is like a woman's, with its 2,421 friends; and it's also obviously rare for any woman to be a loner, since in themselves most women are nothing but objects of desire and vehicles of external validation.

If you look closely at what most people call friendship, you will see that, in our time, there is often little to it besides the pursuit of base pleasures and the mutual reinforcement of the illusions and delusions that sustain people. In order to get through life, most people seem to insulate themselves in a weird bubble of rationalizations, lies, expectations, hopes, entitlements, and so on. They also get a powerful forward drive from indulging in a variety of pleasures, usually of a coarse and vulgar kind. Their friendships will consist of those who live in the same type of bubble and who enjoy the same kinds of pleasures. Yet quite often, there is no real deep sympathy or love involved here. We know this from the common complaint, made in times of tragedy and hardship, that when a person really needed someone, his friends and family were not there. Of course, they were there in the easier days, offering up all sorts of herd platitudes: "Everything happens for a reason," and so on.

Now let's suppose you are a man with an exceptional mind, and perhaps your character isn't altogether corrupt. For you, friendship may well be problematic, for the same reason that you have to be mindful of the PC police at work: most people do not, and indeed cannot, see the world as penetratingly as you do. So, the truths which you take for granted are likely to burst the dear bubbles without which the majority of humankind cannot go on.

The red pill is not for everyone. Most people live in ignorance and cling to comforting fantasy like the junkie does his last bag of dope. And where you see hard-won yet necessary knowledge, the majority see only the views of "bad guys," even if they are such great spirits as Socrates and Jesus.

The main driving force in human life, it's overwhelmingly clear, is self-interest, and people, on average, are so self-interested that unless they depend on you to meet their vital needs, you would do well to regard them with a certain amount of prudent distrust. Of course, human beings—and the Second Sex in particular—have a way of being all smiles and "nice to meet you." Many things in life are not what they seem, and the danger of having to do with other people is something we learn only once they have harmed us. We must then become more self-reliant, cultivating rich and satisfying interests that will keep us from wanting to be among the ignorant and depraved crowd.

In Gulliver's Travels, Jonathan Swift—a very edifying misanthrope—wrote:

> My Reconcilement to the Yahoo-kind in general might not be so difficult, if they would be content with those Vices and Follies only which Nature hath entitled them to. I am not in the least provoked at the Sight of a Lawyer, a Pick-pocket, a Colonel. . . . This is all according to the due Course of Things: But, when I behold a Lump of Deformity, and Diseases both in Body and Mind, smitten with Pride, it immediately breaks all the Measures of my Patience; neither shall I ever be able to comprehend how such an Animal and such a Vice could tally together.

In other words, it is not so much the defects of human nature, as the fact that these so often come with an intolerable self-regard, that makes so many human beings deserving of contempt, and the loner's life therefore necessary. Our time is full of men and women who are not only a blind mess on two legs, but who also expect you to kiss their stumbling, foolish feet. That person may be your boss. It may be your wife.

The age of text messages and social media, ironically, finds many people being loners in spite of themselves. Whether you are sending lots of texts, or constantly on Facebook and Twitter, you are engaging in mediums that are actually quite cold, sterile, and impersonal. You may have a lot of "friends," but in fact, few care much about you; and your interactions with other people are certainly very empty if they are nothing but words and images on a screen, whether it's your computer or your smartphone.

But many people today were not alive in the days before smartphones and social media. As such, they may not be able to understand what it would mean for human relations not to be so utterly deprived. Then too, when you are conditioned as the young are today—with so many interactions filtered through technology—is it not natural to conceive of other people as nothing more than a means to your own ends and expectations?

Again, today other people, more and more, are nothing but words and images on a screen. Here, what room is there for ethics, for keeping your word, for notions of duty and obligation? Nobody cares. No one else is there. It's ultimately just you and your impulses, and your computer and your smart phone.

I notice, also, that today most people who have a good professional job, or who are in college working toward having one, are simply too busy to have much in the way of a social life. They are lucky if they see their friends and romantic partners more than a few times a month. It would seem that meeting our basic animal needs should not take up most of our time. But it does, so for this reason, too, many of us are compelled to be loners—or at least lonely!

I look towards the future, with current cultural trends in mind, and predict that, for men, being a loner will become more common in the next ten to twenty years. Smartphones and social media have turned American women into entitled flake machines. At least eight out of ten of them are good for nothing but sex. In other words, their company cannot be deeply satisfying. They allow you to scratch an itch—that is, some respite from your burdensome need to get laid. Intellectually dull and morally repugnant, they are merely attractive bondage; they have no other value.

Meanwhile, for men like us—I mean who men read sites like this one, some of us familiar with wise classical conservatives like Edmund Burke and Samuel Johnson—male camaraderie is becoming increasingly rare. I myself have a handful of male friends who view the world as I do—undraped, that is to say. But most men I meet, and especially those under 30, seem to me quite deserving of taking orders from Americunts and the sniveling oligarchy of corporate beta males. They are spineless, and usually driven by a bland narcissism not so dissimilar from the twentysomething Americunts in my phone. In a time like this, which seems likely to get worse, being a loner who relies on his hobbies and interests for meaning and fulfillment is a rare type of good fortune, however difficult.

Conclusion

Being a loner, as I said before, is a prideful test of strength, both of your character and of your mind. If you feel you are surrounded by fools and charlatans—well then, welcome to the human experience: the world has always been like this, and you are among the rare few who sees things clearly. As such, your surest source of happiness lies in devoting yourself to a project or projects that will keep you productive and employ your creativity. In this way you will not depend on other people to pass your time, for that is always a dangerous endeavor, especially if they look good in a dress and heels.

Read More: Why Being A Loner Makes You A Great Leader

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

Reflections On Blue Mountain State

October 9, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

It's football season again, and for me, that means coming back to one golden tradition: watching Blue Mountain State. This was a show that used to air on Spike, and it's inadvertently very red pill. It follows a college football team, but the show is more about the team than about actual football. The college and lifestyle are very exaggerated and hedonistic, but there's a fundamental philosophy lying underneath. Despite its relative obscurity, it's become something of a cult classic. The first two or three episodes are a little rough, but after that the show settles into its identity.

Spoiler alert: spoilers below

Note: I only have seasons one and two on DVD, and it's been a while since I've seen season three on Netflix. So for this article, I will only be discussing the first two seasons (which were better anyway).

Character Traits

The main character is the second-string freshman quarterback Alex Moran. He comes to college with his best friend Sammy Cacciatore, who becomes the mascot. The other two most constant characters are team captain Thad Castle and coach Marty Daniels.

Thad is your stereotypical dumb jock. He's unstoppable on the field, he gets all the pussy and drugs he can find, and he's functionally illiterate. However, unlike most of our culture's depictions of jocks, he's has a strong sense of virtue ("virtue" is from the Latin for "man" and is related to our word "virility"). He's loyal to the team and is willing to sacrifice his personal safety either to build morale or to help a fellow teammate, even if he doesn't like that teammate. But neither is he completely selfless. Thad still wants what's best for him, but he realizes that often involves making others' bests happen. This is best shown in the episode "Ransom."

Patriarchy

The team is very hierarchical. Most of the players know their place in the team, and they are okay with that because they realize respect is given in measures as to how it's earned. Players who deviate from the hierarchy are ostracized, but most of them eventually learn to abide by the rules. Once they find their place in the pyramid, they realize it's anything but oppressive and so find comfort in it, or at least they understand the importance and rationale. If a player remains self-seeking, it causes harm to both him and the entire team. The patriarchy in the show is self-sustaining. Again, watch "Ransom" for the perfect example of patriarchy gone right.

Indeed, the nerds in the show are on the lowest ring of society, and although the team is generally nice to them, they are still considered not quite male. The nerds, for their part, are extremely submissive and egalitarian, just like women. Although I was more of the nerd and certainly not the jock in high school, I find it extremely refreshing to find someone in society finally shaming grown men who play dress-up and watch children's movies.

But one is not given a large amount of respect merely for being a man. Sammy is friends with the players and vaguely connected to the team through being the mascot, so they allow him to attend their parties. However, in no way is a male cheerleader given the same honor as the boys duking it out on the field of war. His lack of respect is usually manifested in everyone forgetting his name and just calling him "Mascot." In fact, Sammy is so low in society that he gets laid most when he's wearing the mascot costume (see episode "Piss Test"). But again, Sammy usually doesn't mind because he realizes that he is there as a guest. He finds his way to weasel around and get what he wants despite his low position, while still showing proper respect.

Love and War

The games really are seen as war. George Orwell said, "Serious sport has nothing to do with fair play. It is bound up with hatred, jealousy, boastfulness, disregard of all rules and sadistic pleasure in witnessing violence. In other words, it is war minus the shooting." This is definitely manifest in the show. Several episodes revolve around teams trying to sabotage or demoralize each other before the game even starts. This wouldn't make any sense by the adage, "It's just a game!", but in Blue Mountain State, sports are about pride and dominance. The players go to war for much the same reasons as people always have. And if they win the game, there is a bounty of women to be had.

The women in the show are shown in a variety of archetypes. Strong and independent women are always scheming and selfish. They rarely change their ways, and their actions cause massive destruction either to themselves or to those they care about. One episode, "LAX," has a woman teaching a group of aristocrats the red pill for women truth about how a man will be less accommodating once a woman gives him sex.

Previously the women would give sex to their lacrosse boyfriends to get what they wanted, but the players would cheat on them anyway. But as soon as they cut off the pussy faucet, the men imploded. Then the prisoner's dilemma is manifest when a single third-party woman decides to sleep with the whole lacrosse team, completely undercutting the women's strategy. You see them all giving the middle finger together.

One character, Craig Shilo, is an all-star freshman running back. He could easily get any girl he wants, but he's so blindly infatuated with his manipulative girlfriend that he's constantly worried and stressed. One time, after being assaulted by the lacrosse team, he tells her in front of the whole team, "I'm so glad I have you looking out for me." Immediately the team captain starts shaming him, as is proper. As you have already guessed, Craig later finds out that his virgin girlfriend has been having sex with several people in socially deviant ways.

What about love? Is it all a choice between cheap sex and ball-cutting girlfriends? No, there is a beautiful love story in season two. Sammy's younger sister Mary Jo comes to college to be a cheerleader. She's in love with Alex, and he in some part is in love with her, yet he's always been a coward. Not only does he choke on the field, but he can't even bring himself to admit he wants to be with her. Eventually he does admit this to himself, but even then he doesn't want to pursue her, making all sorts of weak excuses. Gradually he works up the nerve, and at the end of the season, he publicly rejects a threesome with the other cheerleaders to make love with his childhood friend.

Sundry Points

In the first episode, Coach Marty Daniels asks the team, "Where do we come from?" "From our father's balls!" He then explains that we didn't just dropped out of the womb like a jellyfish. I'm not sure if that's a red pill issue, but I found it anti-feminist and absolutely hilarious.

One character spends an episode screwing up on the field because he doesn't feel loved enough. The coach and his therapist finally call him a pussy, which gives him enough anger to overcome his psychosomatically-injured arm.

Only a virgin is able to end a war on campus because of her high sexual value. Slutty girls, on the other hand, are a dime a dozen. They are interchangeable and generally unintelligent. The term "attention whore" is quite literal in this show. A player makes a remark that most girls are like Yoko, but the truly dangerous girl is the rare Linda. She'll make you so happy that you'll lose all your edge and become weak.

Conclusion

As I alluded to above, some of the morals in this show are a bit suspect. However, that's part of the charm, and it's so exaggerated that I doubt the writers were endorsing all of them. Get a group of your red pill buddies together and give this show a chance. My favorite episodes are "LAX," "Debra," "There's Only One Second Best," and "Ransom," but it’s best to watch them in order.

Read More: How A Sitcom Shoved The Blue Pill Down Our Throat

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Are Modern Women Modern Thinkers?

October 10, 2014 | by Marcus Aurelius | Link | Original Link

If your mind ever boggled as to how the hell a woman could come to a particular conclusion, against all the seeming facts or data at hand, you actually have something to be thankful for. The idea that you draw a conclusion from the facts and data at hand actually hasn't been common sense for quite as long as you might realize.

Modernism was born the day Charles Darwin stepped off the HMS Beagle at Falmouth, Cornwall after completing his (almost) five-year mission to boldly tour certain idyllic islands in the Pacific. When he published On the Origin of Species in 1859 he dropped a rock into a pool, the ripples of which eventually spread to virtually every field of human thought. Darwin did not just change how we think about evolution, he changed how we think—because he was the first and most prominent scientist to successfully break scientific method away from religious orthodoxy.

Roosh, as some of you know, was a microbiologist before he took up game. He'll tell you (I'd hope) that the most fundamental principle of science is that you don't start with a theory and seek to prove it. Basic scientific procedure is: gather data, make a hypothesis given your data, test the hypothesis by experiment, and evaluate contradictory evidence. If contradictory evidence invalidates said hypothesis, return to step one. (Indeed Roosh's approach to Game seems to have been using this exact method: laboriously recording the results of approach after approach after approach and then seeing if any principles arose which explained his failures or successes.)

This is why every principle of scientific knowledge is known as a theory. Scientific theories explain sets of data. You cannot ever prove a theory—you can only disprove it. For example, the theory of gravity: we know it works—satellites depend utterly on the theory being correct. And it's been verified by hundreds and hundreds of experiments. But no matter how many experiments you conduct, it will forever be a theory. A working idea. If Stephen Hawking tomorrow finds a set of equations that more accurately explains objects dropping out of the sky as the sole work of the Everlasting Gobstopper, the theory of gravity will be thrown out or at least reconsidered.

In his book The Metaphysical Club, Louis Menand observes that this method utterly changed how we think in the West, not just in science, but in almost every human endeavor. We no longer attach legitimacy to a premise, but rather to a procedure. We no longer speak of justice as preexisting a case at hand; justice is whatever result just procedures lead to.

This philosophy underlies many legal principles, from the right to silence to jury unanimity. Universal suffrage is founded on it: a decision cannot be said to be democratic unless everyone is permitted to participate in the making of it. In science's case, unless you follow scientific modes of investigation, you are not engaged in science. This, in a nutshell, is modernism.

Contrast that with science before Darwin's voyage. While the concept of experimenting to establish a natural law was long-established, the focus was fundamentally different. Philosophically, science was concerned with confirming truths already revealed or already in place from a divine source. Material discovered by scientific investigation which contradicted a divinely-revealed truth, therefore, was automatically wrong, to be dispensed with, or an act of deception by an agent natural or supernatural.

To any rational male living today, this sort of thinking is lunacy. It is the sort of reasoning Christopher Columbus probably chuckled at when he fooled a group of Jamaican natives into thinking he, not the predictable orbits of planetary bodies, caused a lunar eclipse on cue. But for people like Galileo Galilei whose observations contradicted "established truth" propounded by religion, it was serious business—to the point of being deadly in the case of Galileo's contemporary Giordano Bruno and others.

This is how people who haven't accepted modernism think. They demand certainty. They demand a conclusion be revealed first—from any pseudo-logical source, it need not be religion—upon which to interpret the world. They cannot conceive of a universe where the underlying order of existence is unrevealed, can't ever be completely certain to us, and must be uncovered step by laborious step.

You can still see echoes of the pre-modernist mindset among Young Earth Creationists: it's not uncommon to hear accusations that dinosaur fossils were placed there by Satan. The same antiquated thinking is in force when a creationist shouts that "The theory of evolution is not proven!" It reveals a fundamental misunderstanding of how science works. Either way, there is a different form of reasoning going on: the predominant reasoning of science prior to 1859.

[image]

You see a similar mindset in women—especially out on the vast, shallow lagoon that passes for knowledge on the Internet. Part of it derives from the culture of narcissism currently prevalent in the West, and part of it derives from feminist browbeatings, but women as a group are simply less inclined to be modernist thinkers than men. Exhibit A is hat women are more likely than men to believe in God, haunted houses, astrology, and communicating with the dead. Oh, and witches.

Note the patronizing but revealing quote around this gender difference that follows the results:

> Kathleen, a New Jersey counselor who treats both men and women for a variety of issues, isn't surprised by the finding that women are, in some cases, bigger believers in the paranormal. She suspects it's a function of how men's and women's brains work. "Women are just more receptive, more intuitive, and more plugged in, whereas men tend to be logical and sequential," she says. "In my work, I find that women are much more inclined to speculate about hypothetical situations."
>
> Kerk-Tabor agrees that women are more likely than men to believe in the paranormal, but for a different reason. "Men tend to judge themselves competitively," she says. "They ask, 'Am I better than you?' whereas women encompass the whole and ask, 'Where do I fit in?' This inclusiveness may help women to be more receptive to the 'magical stuff' — things that exist in a different paradigm, in another realm."

Asking "where do I fit in?" presumes a revealed order. You can't ask where you fit in unless you already have a picture before you—and it does not matter whether the picture fits objective reality or not. Per this female counselor, women's brains are just not built to easily do otherwise.

Men are more inclined to modernist thought not because of innate competitiveness, but rather male objectivity. If you substitute the word "objectively" into the above quote for "competitively," the difference becomes quite apparent. Indeed, competitiveness requires objectivity.

And this objectivity requires an open mind. Even if a man doesn't personally like the conclusion that a set of data suggests—"Your energy in per week is greater than your energy out per week, therefore you have gained 10 pounds"—he'll at least entertain the thought because he accepts there is an objective world out there and he is at best a small part of it.

By contrast, confront a woman with a set of reliable statistics that impacts on their worldview—say, about how most single mothers suck as parents, going by decades of outcomes for children of single parents—and as often as not the immediate response will be one of:

> Well I'm not a bad single mother
>
> Well I was a child of a single mother and I did all right
>
> Well not all single mothers are like that
>
> Well the reason they suck is because of men

Or if you ask a woman why she is the size of a landwhale, the immediate response will be: "Because of stress/lack of time/hormones/because of my (undiagnosed) Crohn's Disease/gluten intolerance/I am not fat, I am a victim of patriarchal expectations of beauty/BMI don't real." In the field of gender if not generally, women cannot admit observed phenomena that do not square with their personal experiences or self-image.

Women crave that the world should make sense to them. They don't like to hear unpleasant truths unless said truths are solely in their favor. Per the above quote, they'll happily speculate about all manner of hypotheticals rather than deal with objective data. They are not the least bit primed or prepared to deal with uncertainty in their lives. And in all cases, their emotions trump reality. This should be borne in mind in all your dealings with them.

Read More: American Women Are Deep Thinkers

Marcus Aurelius

Marcus is a newly-awakened red pill hidden inside the Matrix, seeking to bring down the system from within. In the meantime he has books to read, writing to do, medieval swordsmanship to practice, and does not charge by the hour.

Neil deGrasse Tyson’s 20 Greatest Musings On Love

October 10, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Neil deGrasse Tyson, the astrophysicist host of Cosmos, whose musings on science have made him a celebrity, recently landed himself in a public scandal when he misquoted—or entirely fabricated—a quote by President Bush during a public speech. Sean Davis of The Federalist called Tyson out in an article that began:

> “I’m beginning to think this Neil deGrasse Tyson fellow is a serial fabricator of quotes.” — President Thomas Jefferson, “Stuff Jefferson Said: The Prequel,” Originally self-published at Amazon.com in 1573

After several other news sources were unable to verify the quote, Tyson replied with a non-apology on Facebook, stating essentially that the details of his speech don’t matter, because he was making a broader point. Although this might seem like an odd statement for a man of science, shortly after Tyson began appearing on social media with broader points on another controversial subject—the nature of love.

Perhaps surviving controversy has emboldened Tyson, and given him the freedom to speak honestly on the topic of intimate relationships. Whatever the reason, we thank him for sharing his wisdom. Here are Neil deGrasse Tyson’s twenty greatest musings on love:

1. Neil deGrasse Tyson on men and women:

2. Neil deGrasse Tyson on irrationality:

3. Neil deGrasse Tyson on confidence:

4. Neil deGrasse Tyson on how to love your woman:

5. Neil deGrasse Tyson on the nature of women:

6. Neil deGrasse Tyson on what women are attracted to:

7. Neil deGrasse Tyson on what women are not attracted to:

8. Neil deGrasse Tyson on the obesity epidemic:

9. Neil deGrasse Tyson on how picking up women is like space exploration:

10. Neil deGrasse Tyson on how science could save feminism:

11. Neil deGrasse Tyson on all-natural anti-aging remedies:

12. Neil deGrasse Tyson on how technology will change love:

13. Neil deGrasse Tyson on marriage:

14. Neil deGrasse Tyson on ethical non-monogamy:

15. Neil deGrasse Tyson on women's non-verbal cues:

16. Neil deGrasse Tyson on honesty in relationships:

17. Neil deGrasse Tyson on evolutionary psychology:

18. Neil deGrasse Tyson on self-respect:

19. Neil deGrasse Tyson on picking the right wife:

20. Neil deGrasse Tyson on breaking a dry spell:

If you find more Neil deGrasse Tyson quotes or memes on love, please share them in the comments of this article and on Twitter under the hashtag #TysonOnLove.

Legal Disclaimer: Neil deGrasse Tyson did not actually say these quotes. They are sourced from the manosphere.

Read More: Anatomy Of A Troll Job: The xoBang Gang And The Business Of Rage

Eric Crowley
Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

Is FEMEN Promoting Female Degeneracy Under The Guise Of Feminism?

October 11, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

(Warning: Most of the images and links in this article are NSFW, so exercise caution)

We've noticed, discussed, and known how feminism has slowly spread (or is spreading) throughout the world after its rise in the West five decades back. Men who've traveled abroad to find feminine women in traditional societies have also sometimes discovered the slow influx of feminism, and sometimes the appalling rise of feminist activism in those societies. One such example of feminist activism is that of FEMEN.

Background

FEMEN is a feminist protest group whose slogan is Sextremism. It was founded in Ukraine in 2008, and is now based in Paris. The organization became internationally known for organizing controversial topless protests (ranging from from public group urination to softcore street theatre) against "sex tourism," religious institutions, sexism, homophobia and other social, national, and international topics.

In October 2013 FEMEN had its largest membership in France, with international branches in Poland, Turkey, Israel, Brazil, Germany, the U.S., Canada, Switzerland, Italy, Bulgaria, and Tunisia. A Quebec-based FEMEN is also active, founded by Ukraine-born Xenia Chernyshova. In October 2012 the organization claimed it had about 40 activists in Ukraine, and another 100 who had joined their protests abroad, as well as twenty thousand supporters via the social network Vkontakte.

It's founder is supposedly Anna Hutsol, who was born in Russia but moved to Ukraine with her parents in 1991.

An economist and a former assistant to singer Tina Karol, she supposedly founded FEMEN in 2008 after she became attuned to the sad stories of Ukrainian women duped by false promises from abroad:

> I set up FEMEN because I realized that there was a lack of women activists in our society; Ukraine is male-oriented and women take a passive role. – Anna Hutsol

Other notable "front-women" include Alexandra Shevchenko, Irina Shevchenko, Oksana Shachko, and in recent times, Aliaa Magda Elmahdy.

The FEMEN office in their native Kiev was closed and the organization's leadership left Ukraine ("Fearing for their lives and freedom") in August 2013. FEMEN now focus their activities in other parts of the world, to become an "international movement."

Fiercely anti-religion, FEMEN describes itself as "radical feminism"and it claims to be "fighting patriarchy in its three manifestations – sexual exploitation of women, dictatorship, and religion." FEMEN has pledged to fight the sex industry and marriage agencies, the Church and its pro-life beliefs and patriarchal society, as well as those who oppose gay marriage.

On its official website FEMEN states: "FEMEN – is sextremism serving to protect women's rights, democracy watchdogs attacking patriarchy, in all its forms: the dictatorship, the church, the sex industry." Their protests often have a slutty feel to them, with activists engaging in provocative actions to garner attention. However, sometimes women too, including models, haven't taken their provocative demonstrations (disruptions) with amusement.

The hypocritical ironies of FEMENism

The hypocritical ironies in what FEMEN preaches, and what it actually does are so glaring. Look at the sample slogans which FEMEN preaches, as mentioned in an article which appears biased in FEMEN's favor (the nsfw version is here) and explored behind the scenes of a FEMEN sextremist training session:

> The following day, I was invited to one of Femen's weekly sextremist training sessions. As I walked in, the 11 gathered girls – most of them wearing jean shorts and Femen tank-tops – were standing in a circle furiously screaming their mottos: "Go rape yourself!", "Nudity is freedom!", "Fuck your church!", "Fuck your morals!", "Not a sex toy!", "In gay we trust!", "Homohobes dégage! [Homophobes get out of the way]" and "Where is Amina? Free Amina!" in support of their Tunisian sister.

And furthermore:

> A new recruit to the group was then asked to demonstrate what she had learned during her inaugural training session at the headquarters the previous week. In front of everyone present, she got into position and started screaming the > slogans at the top of her lungs. Inna told her she'd done well, but that her arms went a little slack as she was screaming, before going over the technical aspects of the Femen pose: legs in a wide stance and holding the sign high, arms straight and held a little behind the ears. "We're not promoting yoghurt or beer, we're reclaiming our bodies. This is aggressive nudity – we're ready to attack!" Inna told her.

Is aggressive nudity, femininity or feminism? Which is worse – whoredom or attention whoredom?

A propaganda of evil degeneracy under the name of feminism—that's the thought which comes to mind. These girls, as will be shown below, possibly suffer from the Stockholm Syndrome.

> The girls even practiced being walked on, as is often the outcome at their protests. Pauline, a full-time French Femen activist, told me that women's bodies are a lot more resistant to pain than you'd think. "We're taught early on that we are frail, but we're not! We're probably more pain resistant than men. I've been beaten up during my six months as a Femen and I'm amazed at how much violence I can be exposed to and still be able to get back up and continue the action.

These are "strong" words from FEMEN activists whom the "patriarch" of FEMEN calls as "weak girls" or even "bitches," which will be seen below.

The real face behind FEMEN

Last year, 28-year-old Australian filmmaker Kitty Green, had "outed" Victor Svyatski (a "consultant" to the movement) as the mastermind behind the group, in the documentary film "Ukraine is not a Brothel".

He was badly beaten up by the secret services in Ukraine last summer because of his activities on behalf of the group.

Green reveals that Svyatski is not simply a supporter of FEMEN but its founder and éminence grise.

> It's his movement and he hand-picked the girls. He hand-picked the prettiest girls because the prettiest girls sell more papers. The prettiest girls get on the front page… that became their image, that became the way they sold the brand – Kitty Green

The article also mentions:

> It was a big moral thing for me because I realised how this organisation was run. He (Svyatski) was quite horrible with the girls. He would scream at them and call them bitches. – Kitty Green

The patriarch—of a "sextremist anti-patriarchy feminist" organization of "weak girls" having a female figurehead as a founder—claims to be a positive influence on the group while calling them "bitches." Ironic, isn't it?

> When the Femen founder finally spoke to Ms Green, he sought to justify his role within the organisation and acknowledged the paradox of being a "patriarch" running a feminist protest group. "These girls are weak," he says in the film.
>
> They don't have the strength of character. They don't even have the desire to be strong. Instead, they show submissiveness, spinelessness, lack of punctuality, and many other factors which prevent them from becoming political activists. These are qualities which it was essential to teach them.

Riight. Weak girls exposing (or brainwashed to expose) titties in public, and acting like remote controlled zombies of degeneracy.

Does the poor girl at the back even know that she is holding the placard upside down?

Finally it appears, FEMEN is nothing but instead a feminist farce of actual exploitation of women, which they hypocritically claim to be fighting against.

> One of the Femen campaigners talks of the relationship between the women and the movement's founder as being akin to "Stockholm syndrome", in which hostages feel sympathy for their captors.
>
> "We are psychologically dependent on him and even if we know and understand that we could do this by ourselves without his help, its psychological dependence," she says.

One can't help but wonder whether the above point actually sheds the actual light on the reality of the strings behind FEMEN. Are these girls hostages to the ones who run FEMEN, with the apt reference to the Stockholm Syndrome—commonly found in women who are abused (e.g. prostitutes)?

Nevertheless, the fallout in the wake of the documentary's expose on Svyatski was full of comical hypocritical apologetic "rebuttals" by FEMEN and Svyatski. Svyatski says in this interview:

> The director Kitty Green came from Australia. Together we planned how we could make her film more interesting. Kitty suggested to me: 'Victor, in the film you are the tyrant, and the girls fear you.' At the end, the girls would then free themselves from me. That's how it was filmed in the end as well. But I am not as bad as in this plot.

Which is contradicted most evidently by the blatantly apologetic and comical-at-times response by Inna Shevchenko who said that "Femen let Victor Svyatski take over because we didn't know how to fight it". "Strong" women who partake in aggressive nudity don't know how to fight? Seems like men are needed after all even by feminists. Who is telling the truth – Shevchenko or Svyatski?

Shevchenko then calls Svyatski as "sexism, male domination, and oppression against women personified." LOL. Was she hibernating all along when he was in charge?

Furthermore:

> From that moment on, I realised that the patriarchy was not somewhere outside. It was right in front of us, in Femen's office. And our global fight with patriarchy started with the fight in our own private life. This is when I decided to leave Ukraine for France to build a new Femen.

Are these statements supposed to be even taken seriously? According to the translation of this Ukrainian news article, FEMEN activists actually fled Ukraine in 2013 after having been summoned for questioning. Is Shevchenko thus trying to apologetically disguise FEMEN fleeing from Ukraine, as instead being a quest to build a new FEMEN elsewhere in the name of a farcical disgust against Svyatski's "oppressive patriarchy"?

More questions: FEMEN by day, whore by night?

In 2012, french articles on Eloise Bouton (more NSFW articles in french here: 1, 2), a radical member of FEMEN France, began to surface on the web, which showed stark pictorial resemblances to an online independent French call girl called Alise Lizaziz. The similarities in the nsfw pictures raised questions about the background of the activists, and possibly the real nature of the movement.

Eloise Bouton supposedly went through the feminist movement Oser, formerly led by Caroline de Haas. She declared similarity of view with the NPNS French movement – "Ni putes ni soumises" (Neither Whores Nor Submissive).

The credentials of NPNS are well known: They supposedly oppose prostitution which they consider to be the "exploitation of women," the objectification of the female body for the sole benefit of "domineering and exploitative" men. So Eloise cannot be an escort—which would be incoherent to the ideologies of NPNS as well as FEMEN. But then who is Alise (or Lizaliz or Luka) – who bears striking similarities to Eloise, as seen in the pictures?

If you connect the dots from the above two stories, you actually begin to wonder whether is FEMEN is a hypocritical farcical organization promoting degeneracy, by actually trying to recruit young women in the name of feminism to make them into attention and possibly real whores. Or possibly provide a cover for real whores to attention whore in public. If Eloise is indeed Alise, then 800 € a night leads to 24K € per month. So, it pays to be a feminist (or possibly run an organization of such women clandestinely indulging in such activities).

What or who funds FEMEN? A FEMEN activist is supposedly paid $1000/month and gets to fly around Europe, a pretty decent gig for a poor girl from Ukraine, if she'd choose to be an aggressive exhibitionist in public (and possibly a whore at night). Are these girls being lured into prostitution under the lure of feminism? Or are these girls already whores, who're further being used to promote degeneracy to traditional women worldwide under the lure of feminism?

Conclusion

We're always been told that "Do not judge who is speaking, but rather judge what is being said." Sometimes, it's better to first note the histories of the people in view to understand their motives. The ambiguous background of these activists and the nature of feminist organizations like FEMEN does raise questions about their actual motives. Are they really in favor of women, or actually promoting degeneracy to women instead through the aggressive nudity of possibly delusional, misandrist, victimized or brainwashed women who could already have dubious backgrounds?

The standard slogan reply from them would instead be: "Fuck your morals!"

Seems to be that FEMENists have agreed that morals don't exist for them at all—as seen above.

It's often said: "Corrupt the women first – to weaken the men then – to decay the society". The more you see the real picture of feminist ideology, the more you realize is how feminists are actually the real enemies of women. In the end, the endgame of feminism is to absolve women from their decisions in life, no matter how wrong their choices might be.

The scourge of feminism which rose in the west five decades back now seeks to corrupt women in traditional societies to destroy femininity and pollute the few pools of relationship-worthy women left in today's world. Feminist misery loves company. Some women have however already taken steps to reject feminism in modern societies, thus feminism now has decided to look to infect women elsewhere in the world.

FEMEN has already failed in Ukraine, but is now seeking to infect women elsewhere with its poisonous feminist ideology of hypocritical godless immoral degenerate sextremism. Even if it means by promotion of exhibitionist attention whoring in public—under the name of protesting for equal rights, or promoting degeneracy to fellow women in the name of liberalism—to destroy the last bastions of traditionalism and femininity.

Read Next: The End Game Of Feminism

Oscar Zach

Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Never Break Bread With The Ungrateful

October 11, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

In the book The 48 Laws Of Power, Robert Greene highlights an illuminating story about a woman in Law #10 – Infection: Avoid The Unhappy And The Unlucky.

Lola Montez

In the 1840's a young Englishwoman by the name of Marie Gilbert moved to Paris to pursue a life as a dancer and entertainer. She changed her name to Lola Montez and claimed to be a flamenco dancer hailing from Spain. By the middle of the decade, her fortunes were turning for the worse, so she decided to seduce Alexandre Dujarier, who owned the most circulated newspaper in France and was also its drama critic.

She successfully wooed him and the two were happy for a time as he helped revive her dancing career. However, the relationship quickly turned into a negative for Dujarier, who saw influential associates and friends leave his side. One fateful night, after consuming alcohol to excess, Dujarier insulted an influential drama critic over said critic's commentary on Lola. This critic challenged him to a duel the next day and Dujarier was shot and killed.

Lola promptly fled Paris for Munich, where she sought to ply her feminine wiles on King Ludwig of Bavaria. She found a way to manipulate a close aide of his to set up a meeting the King. When she arrived in the anteroom of King Ludwig's manse on the prescribed day, she overheard that he was too busy to entertain the wants of a stranger, so she pushed her way into his chambers. In the process, her dress ripped, leaving her bare breasts exposed. She was acting in a play on a Munich stage within 3 days.

King Ludwig

King Ludwig was utterly mesmerized by the young Lola, completely captivated by her feminine displays and irrepressible charm. Just like with Dujarier, Lola created a mirage that everybody but Ludwig recognized. As Ludwig showered Lola with wealth, praise, and even poetry, Lola was quickly abusing her position of power. She became irritated at slights and began to assault citizens on occasion. This caused the content and peaceful citizenry of Bavaria to speak out against their Ludwig. Advisers who counseled King Ludwig on his association with this toxic woman were dismissed.

Eventually, King Ludwig was forced to tell Lola she had to leave the kingdom, much to his great sorrow. Even this did not satisfy the citizenry, as Ludwig was forced to abdicate the crown a month after he exiled Lola.

She moved back to England, where she curried the favor of an ambitious military officer, a man ten years her junior. Facts came forward that she had previously wed in England before she left for Paris, so she was summarily arrested on charges of bigamy. After posting bail, she and her star-crossed beau fled for Spain. The relationship was incredibly stormy, with her slashing at him with a knife at one point. The relationship collapsed and when the man returned to British soil, he found out he had lost his respected position in the military. Destitute, he moved to Portugal where he was killed in a boating accident some months later.

Her well-documented and torrid sexual tear through Europe did not go unnoticed. A man stepped forward to write her biography. He went bankrupt a few years after publication.

Lola—after her travails in England—moved to California where she entrapped a man named Pat Hull. After yet another incredibly rocky relationship, she left Hull for another man. Hull slipped into deep depression and turned to the bottle to remedy his ailing soul. He was dead within a decade.

For Lola herself—after her looks presumably faded in her early forties—she turned to Christianity and used her impressive powers of charisma to give sermons across America on redemption and salvation. Still desperate for the bright lights of the stage, she would dress up in all white with a halo over her head when she performed her religious lectures. She died a few years later in 1861.

People like Lola are often charismatic, tempestuous, and sultry. They draw you in with grand feats of dazzling allure, then feed on your emotions while dragging you down to the depths of despair.

While commentary on Lola could conceivably hinge on her peculiarities as a coquettish female, the most relevant angle is on relations with toxic individuals. Lola, despite her superficial charm, brought nothing but harm and death to the men in her life. She was a real-life siren who—by virtue of her personality—lured unwitting men to their demise. She had a black hole in her heart that could never, ever be filled by anything positive in the kingdom of man. No man could fill her bottomless pit of existential despair.

Extrapolating from Lola, this speaks to toxic people in general. All manner of brutish hater, unreconstructed bigot, and the garden-variety misanthrope fall under this umbrella of the toxic individual. While a few—like Lola—might have developed a level of mastery in the arts of personal charisma, most are obviously marked by their ignorance, anger and disaffection. While they might not leave a trail of broken men in their wake, they usually are marked by their negative commentary, their alienation of those around them and their lack of self-awareness.

As Robert Greene observes:

Those misforunates among us who have been brought down by circumstances beyond their control deserve all the help and sympathy we can give them. But there are others who are not born to misfortune or unhappiness, but who draw it upon themselves by their destructive actions and unsettling effects on others. It would be a great thing if we could raise them up, change their patterns, but more often than not is is their patterns that end up getting inside and changing us. The reason is simple—humans are extremely susceptible to the moods, emotions, and even the ways of thinking of those with whom they spend their time.

Going forward from this, a man has to be careful who he lets into his life. Whether a man wants to admit it or not—as we might not necessarily be products of those we associate with—but we can or become reflections of those with whom we choose to break bread with.

Bambina Delmont, the false rape accuser of Fatty Arbuckle

All too often, unassuming men will let toxic people into their lives. They either fall for the false bravado or charm of a toxic person or allow a supremely negative person into their social circle. These human cockroaches worm themselves into the souls of men and infect them their with their personal brand of hatred or discontent. They erode positive views on life, attack happiness and are opponents of contentedness, gratefulness and generosity.

A man should never associate with this class of people. They might be charming superficially, but they leach value and positivity long-term. Like Lola Montez, a woman like her is nothing but a one-night stand, a passing fancy. Her fatally toxic mindset means that there cannot be anything positive to be gained from associating with her in the long term.

The best way to identify these sorts of people is to solicit opinions on them from third parties, especially if they are disinterested third parties. If more than a few unconnected individuals are making the same general observations about a person, odds are they are correct in their personal assessments. With this information in mind, a man can decide whether to engage a toxic person.

As Greene observes, there is no rule reversal in this situation: associating with toxic people is always a net negative for a man. There is little to nothing to be gained from maintaining relations with the ungrateful around us. Their emotional states are not just contagious, but they also actively seek to infect those around them with their hateful bile. While it is true that misery loves company, only the foolish entertain the misery of the ungrateful.

Read More: Why The Past Is Best Left In The Past

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

Women Never Grow Up, They Just Grow Old

October 11, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Women's "instinct" is centered around mating and social dynamics. Men go after life like a hunter chasing down prey. When not hunting, men simply get some R&R to recharge for the next mission. Men are "on or off'." Women are a whole different ball game. In many ways, men think of women as a recreational activity, whereas women have a variety of "modes" that can make men's "black and white" thinking can come unstuck.

Little Girl

Small children put on an act to get their way. Men are forced to grow out of this phase, since a whining man is unacceptable—but women are reliant on those around them so they never fully grow up. Recognizing "little girl" is the best defense. DO NOT try to communicate on her terms. Most relationship rows operate on this level. You don't have an argument with a 5-year-old, you gently put it in it's place. If that means simply walking away, then walk. Shut down the emotional blackmail right away, or it will never stop.

Serious Child

As children grow up, they become more "serious" about life and start play acting. Women use childish attributes for social engineering, whereas men rely on real skills and experience. Cliques, gossip, negative peer pressure, being "in-charge" and having the latest toy all fall into this mode. Serious children are fond of running to authorities. What is a false rape accusation if not "telling on you" to the head mistress.

Much of what goes on in Universities and careers is women play acting serious, as they did from 6-12 years. Try to operate on their level and you'll find them far more adept than you, plus the outcome is often pointless and or negative. There is a big gap between clown alpha and a true red blooded man.

(You cannot compete with this new iPhone or toy pram

Virgin Teen

As a girl matures sexually, she rapidly feels unwanted men's attention. She has a variety of shields in this area, from gaggling together with BFFs, giggling, cutting comments, being confrontational, social shaming, emotional bullying, taunting, being flaky, getting embarrassed or shy, buttering up the superiors, gaining petty positions of authority, etc.

Women of any age will have teen attitude on hand and society tolerates it because she's a woman. Shit tests and feminism falls into this category. Step over her defensive virginal BS, otherwise she'll brush you off like dandruff or turn you into her drone.

Girlfriend

Women don't have the luxury of living 20+ years of adult life to mature. They have a shelf life. Thus they will fall back on the modes of behavior. The girlfriend is where we find a lot of feminine traits that we seek. She's committed, available, and so forth. She sees herself as "taken." She will also keep herself nice, and try to impress. She's very interested in presenting herself to the world as a woman.

She will mirror you a lot, which is why men think they've met their soul mate. A good girl meets an alpha and bangs on the first date—she's mirroring his confidence and sex drive. This is also how a shy, angry, or petty person is able to project their negativity—if you allow it.

NAWALT is full girlfriend mode—Sure she's not like any other mode. Good luck if you think that will last, but she will maintain it so long as it's in her best interests.

Bitch or Slut

Here the problems really start. It's just so easy for her to leverage sexuality for all manner of validation. Where men are shamed for using violence against women, women in the past were shamed for using sexuality for material or social gain. Today women are being actively encouraged to jump straight into this mode and avoid the "girlfriend mode" entirely. This mode is her way of expressing anger. She's muscling up with her vagina.

While she can switch this mode off and revert to any of the other modes, once she's learned it, it's like a genie in a bottle. Much of what manosphere discusses in terms of negative female behavior relates to this mode. Your cock and her orgasms are the best tools in stopping this.

Childish behavior aside, this mode is the only real adult strength women have, and in the past all it amounted to was a nasty whore or a frigid wife. She will turn sex off, just as fast as she turns it on. The hardened feminist cunt is the opposite end of the spectrum to the slutty teen that has 10 boyfriends on Tinder.

Fiancée

The next three categories are versions of each other while ramping up the 'serious'. If she feels she is getting into an LTR, (even if you think it's casual) she takes her lead not from her man, but other female influences. A girlfriend you've slept with just a few times can soon morph into a fiancée, even if all you are buying her is condoms.

This is the time when she's growing and discovering herself, within the confines of a relationship SHE can always opt out of. She's got you hooked and the mistake that men make is they assume that their girlfriend is WYSIWYG. Once you spot fiancee mode, if you are not interested in wifeing her up, then back right off or split. Being emotionally detached (very different to the emotional repression women think men have), is the adult male way.

Kanye West (god help him), is a classic case of financée mode. He's practically Kim's wife now. This serious mode is why players resort to mini relationships. Be warned that this is also where the "mistake" pregnancy comes into play.

A man decides to get hitched to his easy going girlfriend (Paul Janka beware) only to discover her planning an expensive and hectic wedding. It seems totally out of character, but this again is a misunderstanding of the man who has only 2 modes…. Work or relax…. The female has many modes. She's not that bothered about the wedding, it's about dragging you into her domain and making you perform on her terms. Where necessary she'll flatter your ego.

She'll hang domestic crap around your neck to establish power dynamics in her favor. If you'll bend to a pizza when you really wanted noodles, she knows she's already got you cornered when more important issues come up. Men have no idea how women use subtle dynamics like this, to build themselves an emotional fortress inside your heart. (I don't think women do either, it's just instinct). It doesn't have to be in a serious relationship or marriage, this mode can start day one.

Without your razor sharp leadership, she's starting to take control and ignore your authority. She'll giggle with her friends about that mole on your dick; nothing is private. It's not about the friends or the mole, it's about her building walls of confidence. You're becoming her bitch and she's got 20 fems backing her up and consulting to her on every move. Pillow talk, casual breakfast conversation, chit chat in the car late at night and so on – she's laying some serious foundations.

Wife

While the fiancée mode builds power by busying herself, employing an army of female friends and making herself important, (all while entangling herself in your life), wife mode ties you down and keeps you busy while she relaxes. It's all an act.

While most women will slowly slide from easy girlfriend to more serious fiancée, some jump straight here and none of this is black and white. A woman will implement whatever mode suits the moment.

The woman will identify and act the part. This is why it can be so irritating to work with women, because they put on this contrived showboat personality. Playing "The Wife" is a female specialty. She can copy her mother, your mother, her other married friends and so forth. Be wary if she has a BFF going through a divorce, because she might start copying her behaviors. These copied behaviors are why women's magazines are so popular. It's also why BFFs come and go like pairs of underwear. She 'mirrors' and 'showboats' to suit her purposes.

Wives can be great for their nesting skills until some home and garden item becomes a matter of life and death. The woman gets all domesticated, because bringing children into the world needs organization and stability. In doing so she'll ramp up 'the serious' to fever pitch. The wife mode is where you are going to find the concept of soul mates is complete bullshit. Even if she did love deep powder skiing as your girlfriend, it's way down her priority list now. She'd rather have you mowing the lawn while she browses at Ikea.

Men can easily get sucked into the novelty of having a wife for a while, until suddenly they miss their male activities. Too Late! What wife mode does is busy up your life with BS, so that you can't easily stray. "Honey can you take the trash out" is all about keeping you busy, of course the witch can lift a 5kg garbage bag.

Subconsciously she'd rather you go broke watching cable on the sofa all week than wriggle out of her grasp. At the same time she's pressuring you to be "successful," but only in the conservative boring sense. Don't underestimate this because many ambitious and intelligent men have been turned into middle class ghosts to keep her insecurities at bay. If you're too successful you might decide to upgrade the wife for a younger model.

When you read this interview with Adam Clayton of U2, it's incredible how little his wife has thought about his needs and existing lifestyle. She's nagging him to come home. He probably rarely sleeps in the same place for more than a week or two. Did she consider what being his wife was going to be like? Ah no, because it's all about her and the nesting instincts. The fun and inspiration gets sucked out of male pursuits with this wife chain around your neck.

Mother

Never under estimate the woman's ability to turn on the authoritarian mother figure. Think "mother superior" in the nun's school. For the first 10-12 years of your life, the female mother figure had full authority over you.

While the mother can be nurturing, she's also the primary authority figure. The henpecked husband (Everyone Loves Raymond), is something she grows into. Like a creeping vine that started as a tiny weed, it can smother an entire building over a few years. This is how lively men end up in man caves dreaming of being rockstars, while she puts the bass guitar on eBay.

This is the end destination after she's laid the groundwork of (self important) financée and (fake stressed) wife, using the other modes to get her way as she goes. What men don't understand is she sees you as her personal property to do with as she pleases. After lockdown comes "I need some space"—which translates to "I'm fucking someone else." If she's not a cheater god help you, because your life will start to look like something from a retirement village.

Men lead with the ultimate authority of physical power combined with demanding respect due to their skills and position, (and add in a healthy dose of fun and relaxation). Women tend to "assume" authority. Fun and Risk is now banned. Relaxation is for the "useless" male drones. Get ready to be nagged and boxed into a corner if you don't reign this in. 90% of LTRs end up here, so don't underestimate it with black and white thinking. She is not your best friend, she is your woman and she needs to perform as such.

Fear

All these traits, while useful social engineering mechanisms, are COMPLETELY beneath a red-blooded male. Let her use the social skills on others. The little girl will get you the free upgrade at the rental car office. The Serious Girl will get you a refund. Wife can fix you a sandwich, or a comfortable home. Financée can fuck off, go back to being a girlfriend, or wife up and bear your children. Mother is for the kids and can also make a great secretary.

The uses are obvious, but you want them on your side. Notice how corporations employ the “mother” authority to firewall themselves from antsy customers, while the board of directors play golf. All the modes are useful. Women can be great managers but remember you are the CEO. Much like owning a Rottweiler or pit bull, you are the boss. Give out too many treats and your animal will not heel.

ALWAYS REMEMBER: No matter how sweet the Rottweiler is when it’s letting you tickle it’s tummy, it has many animal instincts that will come out, sometimes at random. It cannot help it. If you leave it alone with children, or if you behave like a child yourself, it may bite. You cannot make any black and white assumptions— you can only look to mitigate the negative sides of her “modes” and use the positives to your advantage.

5 Reasons To Start Wearing A Pocket Square Today

October 12, 2014 | by KK. | Link | Original Link

If you think about it, the concept of pocket squares is kind of odd: a functionally useless piece of cloth in a functionally useless pocket. But of course, any self-respecting sharp dresser knows that clothes aren't just about being functional—what's life without a little style?

You might be surprised to learn, though, that while there have been stylish people around since clothes became a thing, pocket squares came onto the fashion stage relatively late. Handkerchiefs, pocket squares' rustic ancestor, have been used since ancient times. But surprisingly, in the Western world, carrying a single handkerchief for nose-related issues only became popular during the Renaissance (before that time, they were usually used for wiping sweat from your face, or covering your head).

Among fans of pocket square lore, English King Richard II is typically credited with starting the trend of carrying around a quality piece of fabric to clean your nose—or to block it from your neighbors' foul body odor.

Today, the legacy lives on, and not just because each one has had a particular pocket square fold named for him: As you likely know if you're reading this, pocket squares are back in fashion. Look at a contemporary awards show red carpet and you'll see sharply dressed celebrities like Jon Hamm (whose show "Mad Men" may be partially responsible for the pocket square renaissance), Justin Timberlake, Diddy, and Robert Downey Junior all wearing a 'square. Will you take your place among them? You should.

5 Reasons to wear a pocket square

Some of us are reckless fashion adventurers, and others are more cautious about our sartorial choices. If you're debating whether or not to sport a pocket square, here are five good reasons to start doing so immediately:

1. Join the ranks of some of recent history and fiction's most dapper men

What do Jay Gatsby, Clark Gable, Don Draper, and Daniel Craig (as well as James Bond) have in common? They're all sharp dressers – and all of them have worn pocket squares. Still dubious about the elegant touch of that square of folded handkerchief? Think about one of menswear's darkest incarnations: the leisure suit. It has pockets, but certainly no pocket square!

2. The flourish

In bygone days, remarkable men had head-turning accessories, be it the helmet of a Viking warrior, the feather in the romantic troubadour's cap, or the earring of a wealthy Renaissance-era noble. Unless you have a really unique job, it's likely you can't wear any of those things to spice up the daily grind. Luckily, the pocket square is a more subtle and modern way to add personality and elegance to what might otherwise be a suit like any other.

3. Escape the ordinary

In his famous short poem “In a Station of the Metro,” Ezra Pound observes, “The apparition of these faces in the crowd;/Petals on a wet, black bough.” If everyone were wearing pocket squares, the poem might just have a few more lines. Maybe imagery about flames or colorful birds would be involved. Pocket squares will get you noticed, either for their subtle elegance, or their flamboyant shades and folds. Turn the right head and your life might take a very different turn, as well.

4. Self-expression

We all have the clothes we “should” wear, and sometimes, no matter how unique we try to be, we still end up blending into the crowd. But why not make a bold statement that will set you apart? Of course, nothing that will get your boss to call security! A pocket square is an excellent way to be bold, while not rocking too many boats. Add a pocket square in any color or combination of colors you can imagine, to give your suit a dash of personality and uniqueness. Pocket squares may be fairly unusual today, but they’re backed with enough historical credentials to command both fascination, and respect.

5. Easy to procure, easy to get rid of.

Some great fashion statements are also great expenses. Not so with pocket squares. Those gentlemen blessed in the wallet department may choose to invest in designer handkerchiefs in fabrics like silk, but even a less well-off fellow can seek out interesting fabrics and patterns in affordable menswear stores. Economical and eminently portable, the pocket square lets you decide, from how to fold it, to whether or not you want to keep it on display, if there’s a moment you feel you’d like a little less attention. A pocket square does not have to be a lifelong commitment: give one a try today and see if it’s for you. We bet you’ll enjoy it—as will everyone who sets eyes on you.

We really want you to join the Revolution

For those of you who already know me, to put it short, I’m a hardcore freak when it comes to Pochettes. Last year, I started a small company, Glamorous Pochette, in Eastern Europe (where else? huh…) and today, is a big day.. it has been already one year and we are doing pretty good. So to celebrate this event, I would like to offer all you guys, dear ROK readers, a nice little gift—a 20% discount.

Our Pocket Squares are made in Italy, 100% pure silk/linen/cotton and, especially, they are hand rolled. So you are getting a top-class product, plus a gorgeous packaging—Your Pochette will come individually packaged in a custom white Glamorous Pochette Boxes. Keep it safe, so it can grace your suits for years to come.

- So head to our shop on Etsy.com/shop/Glamorous pochette.com
- Pick the Pocket Square you like,
- When checking out, use this coupon code: ROK14
- Boom! You get 20% off
- Job done. Happy days.

And I advice you to go for the Player Pocket Square. All the ladies will love it… and will try to steal it, I guarantee it. Every time I go out, there will a bitch in the club who will try to steal my Pocket Square. If you guys have any questions, I will be happy to help.

Glamorously yours,

Kamal.

Read Next: Here's What You Should (And Shouldn't) Do When Buying A New Suit

KK.

Kamal is a French Blogger, Stylist and Founder of Glamorous Pochette : Perfectly unique & exquisite pocket squares cut from superior Moroccan silk.

Adrift In The Arctic: The Incredible Story Of Bruce Gordon

October 13, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Some incredible stories of survival are well known, and other less so. Still others have been covered up entirely by the silt of time. I came across one such story in a long out-of-print volume of nautical lore, and was surprised that it had remained so obscure. The experience of Bruce Gordon, who spent years trapped on ice floes in the unremitting hostility of the far north, is an achievement of survival that perhaps exceeds that of his tropical counterpart, Alexander Selkirk. Selkirk, readers may recall, was the real-life inspiration behind Daniel Defoe's novel Robinson Crusoe.

Bruce Gordon has been forgotten. He deserves to be better known.

In 1757 a young Scotsman named Bruce Gordon signed aboard the whaler Anne Forbes for a cruise from Aberdeen, Scotland into the rich whaling grounds of the North Atlantic. The waters around Iceland and Greenland were at that time choked with ice floes descending from the polar seas; and experienced mariners knew that navigating these waters could be extremely dangerous. In the span of a few hours, a ship could find itself surrounded completely, and from there carried off with the drifting ice; or it might be crushed by shifting ice masses.

The captain, Emmet Hughes, was neither prudent nor sober, preferring the whiskey bottle to the sound advice of his first mate, who cautioned him repeatedly that sailing too far north was risking disaster. Early successes in capturing whales spurred Hughes on to greater and greater follies of navigation, and he plunged ahead, oblivious to the dangers around him.

What the mate feared eventually happened. The Ann Forbes was caught in a current and swept into a treacherous expanse of ice. A fog descended over them, and immense pieces of ice began to press against the ship's hull. The crew lost control of the ship, and it was smashed between two colliding icebergs. Gordon, who happened to be on lookout in one of the ship's masts, was thrown onto one of the huge sheets of ice surrounding the ship.

The ship vanished beneath the shifting ice floes, taking all hands with her. Gordon alone survived, but he had nothing with him except a pocket Bible. His only hope for survival would be to reach the ship and try to live off its provisions until he could be rescued.

He eventually found the ship, which had overturned; its undamaged keel was elevated from the surface of a large ice floe, frozen firmly in place. But how to get inside the hull, and to the provisions and shelter inside? He scavenged an old boat hook and harpoon from the debris around the wreck and bored his way into the ship. Making his way to the captain's cabin, he located salt biscuits and a cask of spirits; then, overcome with exhaustion and the desperation of his situation, he drank himself into a stupor. He awoke, bleary-eyed, to the sound of what he believed were human noises. But these were not the sounds of men.

Gordon peered out of the hole he had made in the ship's hull and was immediately seized with terror. The ship was surrounded by huge polar bears, apparently attracted by the scent of the whale blubber stored in the hull. They were also eating some of the corpses of his shipmates, and Gordon was even able to identify one or two by the clothing strewn about the ice. He tried to scare them off by making various noises, but this seemed only to attract them to him that much more. To secure himself, he lashed forks and knives to an iron grate, so that they were projecting outward, and sealed the hull entrance he had made.

He now began to assess the dimensions of his situation. He nearly gave himself over to despair. He was alone, with no one to assist him, and he had no idea how he would get himself out of his situation. Why could I not have died like the others, he asked himself. For several nights, he remained in an alcoholic fog, the casks of rum providing little relief.

Finally, he pulled himself together and formed a plan of action. If he could get into the ship's forecastle and hold, where there was coal and other provisions, he believed he could spend the winter on the ice. But where was he? While he was drifting constantly, he assumed himself to be somewhere between Greenland and the North Cape.

Many days of scavenging in the freezing cold yielded up clothing, an old musket, tools, coal, gunpowder, linens, large quantities of rum and brandy, and food. Gordon eventually learned how to make fire and carry the smoke out of the hull with a makeshift flue. One night, during a blizzard, a polar bear forced its way into the cabin; Gordon could hear it munching greedily on his biscuits. He flew at the animal with a torch and large carving knife; and the terrified brute lodged itself helplessly in the entrance from which it had entered. Gordon stabbed it repeatedly, and it fell down dead, its blood spilling all over the frozen cabin floor.

Gordon skinned the beast, sliced away its meat, and preserved its hide as a rug. It was a large female, and had recently been nursing. That night, another sound came at his door. It was a small, starving female polar bear cub, attracted by the scent of its mother; Gordon took pity on it and brought it into his cabin, where it immediately identified the hide of its mother.

He nursed the wretched animal back to life with bits of whale blubber, glad finally to have a living companion, however insensate and brutish. He named her Nancy. The animal soon took to following Gordon everywhere, imitating him and answering to her name, showing a degree of affection for him quite uncommon for her man-eating species.

As she grew larger, he taught Nancy to fish for him. She even protected him from roving bands of polar bears. On one occasion, she nearly died in combat with other bears while she and Gordon were hiking among the ice floes. Gordon knew that he was drifting aimlessly on the ice, and that at some point he would have to venture out into the sea to try to make for land. But without any training in navigation, he doubted his ability to accomplish this. On several occasions, Gordon and Nancy did encounter remote parties of native seal hunters, but Nancy's roars always made them believe Gordon to be just an apparition. No man could be "friends" with a polar bear, they were certain.

After various adventures, Gordon's ice floe drifted to the northern coast of Greenland, and he fell in with a small tribe of natives. Most of them were women. There were thirty-one women and only ten men; the rest had perished through the rigors of hunting and fishing. He and Nancy made a bizarre appearance, but Gordon was able to offer the natives something useful by sharing the spoils of the Anne Forbes wreck with them. One night, Nancy simply vanished; he never saw her again.

He knew he would never return to civilization unless he took the bold step of launching upon the open sea. His chance came unexpectedly one day. Spotting a large vessel on the horizon, he decided to risk the open water, setting off in a sealskin canoe and paddling furiously. He paddled until he nearly collapsed. He finally caught up with the ship—the Briel of Amsterdam—and was taken aboard.

The crew were shocked at the appearance of this sunburnt, bearded foreigner, dressed in sealskins and weeping with joy. From the ship's captain, he was horrified to find out that he had been away from Scotland for just over seven years. Gordon eventually made his way back home, and there found that his story was initially greeted with skepticism and hostility.

Like Marco Polo, who endured years of taunts from his fellow Italians with the epithet "Marco Millions," Gordon discovered that he was now a stranger in his own country. Eventually, as knowledge of the polar waters and its topography grew, the details of his account came to be confirmed. His resilience, honesty, and endurance eventually won over his countrymen, just as these same qualities had allowed him to triumph over the shifting snows and ice of the Arctic Circle. He eventually rose to high standing in his community, a figure respected by all. His crucible of suffering had been his redemption.

Read More: The Fears Of Being A World Traveler

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Nobel Peace Prize Recipiant Malala Yousafzai Is A Coward And A Hypocrite

October 14, 2014 | by Billy Chubbs | Link | Original Link

So the increasingly irrelevant Noble Peace Prize was recently given out, and it came as a surprise to no one that the 2014 peace prize was shared by a 17-year-old Pakistani-born girl named Malala Yousafzai. For those of you (fortunate few) who haven't heard of her, Malala is a supposed advocate for girls rights to education in any and all cultures and societies in the world.

She became internationally famous when, in 2012 at the age of 15, a member of the fanatical Muslim religious group, the Taliban, tried to shoot her in the head. Malala was wounded, but the shooter's aim was piss-poor and the bullet wound up grazing her, entering the skin of Malala's head and passing along it before it struck her in the shoulder. Malala was treated in Pakistan and eventually flown to England for further treatment once she was co-opted by globalists who wanted to make her a poster child.

The reason the Taliban shot Malala in the head was to send a message that they would attack girls who wanted to get a western-style education. So as soon as Malala had recovered, she immediately proved she was stronger than the Taliban by returning to her home in the Swat region of Pakistan. Except that last part didn't happen.

When she awoke Malala eagerly embraced her celebrity status, travelling around the safe western world and making flagellant liberals and globalists feel good about themselves while peddling feminist dogma and her book. Malala bragged that she had bested the Taliban, and that she was not afraid of them. The world cheered her on, thumbing their nose alongside her at the oppressive Taliban from the safety of western countries.

Malala did not go back to live in Pakistan. She resides in England and was attending an English school when they came in and told her she won the Nobel Peace Prize. Malala was lucky that she was co-opted for an agenda and was given a great place to live in the western world, because while she is touring the globe, advocating girls rights to education, those same girls are the ones forced to continue to live in places where they can be hurt and killed for trying to attend school.

While Malala was laughing, playing and enjoying the safety of receiving an education in a predominantly white country found upon Christian morals, school girls in Africa were being kidnapped. While Malala mugged for the camera, giving speeches to the choir about how extremists are fools to think bullets can silence women’s rights in the 3rd and 2nd world in buildings protected by men with guns, Yazidi girls are being turned into sex slaves by those same men, most of whom will not face any prosecution or justice for their actions.

Let me repeat: after the Taliban shot her in the head, Malala opted to live in England. She ran away. They shot her in the head and she ran away. I don't know in what crazy world people think that being chased out of your home counts is a victory but it certainly isn't the real one. They shot Malala, and that scared her away. That was a decisive victory for the Taliban and for anti-female extremists everywhere.

And every time Malala gives a speech or drops another nonsensical, feel good quote for useful idiots to lap up, those extremists laugh. They're laughing at Malala. And the girls Malala claims to represent, and whom she abandoned to their fate simply because she had the chance to, are the ones who are now suffering. Getting shot in the head is pretty extreme, and I could respect Malala if she took it and continued to live in Pakistan. But she ran. She gave up. The extremists won unequivocally, and no amount of desktop wall papers will change that irrefutable fact.

> They thought a bullet would silence us, but they failed. Nothing changed in my life except this: Weaknesses, fear and hopelessness died. Strength, power and courage was born.
>
> – Malala Yousafzai, speech to the United Nations.

Malala has done more harm than good to oppressed girls in crappy countries. She says books and education are what we need to change the world, then proved that completely untrue after she ran away when a man with a gun fired a bullet into her. Instead of reading text books and trying to fill her head with words, Malala would have been better served to take that textbook and hold it in front of her head to try and stop the bullet. Now Malala is a talking head, a mascot, someone do nothing people can point to and exclaim that they're changing the world.

It's fair to say that at this point the Nobel Peace Prize means nothing anymore. The science awards still have some merit, but the peace prize is a worthless political tool. It's a feel-good scam, designed to sell books and globalist talking points. Not only have they given it to a girl who abandoned the very women she claims to represent, but within recent memory (2009) the Nobel institution also gave the prize to a man whose governmental policies continue to result in the deaths of hundreds of civilians, and whose administration continues to destabilize nominally peaceful countries all over the globe with a Byzantine surveillance network which also spies domestically on their own war-weary citizens, and whose administration is continually manipulating the press in an attempt to drag the war-weary people into yet more conflicts.

The only rational explanation as to why they gave him the peace prize was simply because he was the first black-skinned president of the United States of America.

But that doesn't matter. Dignity and morals have no place in the modern world. At least it has no place in our so-called noble institutions, the places where we supposedly celebrate the best of humanity. No, we mustn't have standards. We need to keep making guilty privileged people feel good and like they're doing something by cheering on a 3rd world mascot. We need to keep stroking Malala's ego and filling up her pocket book. We need to keep showing the globalist elite that we're still so blind and stupid that we'll eagerly cheer on their token ethnic talking head while they keep waging wars and funding the very same groups who make girls lives a misery with cash and weapons.

So yes, never fear you ladies of the 2nd and 3rd world. You, too, can brave all those bad men and receive an education: so long as there are prosperous countries founded upon and still more or less exercising European Christian morals that still exist for you to run to (and which you can afford to run off to in the first place), and that you're willing to be a hollow mascot for the powers that be in those countries.

If you can't…whelp, better shut up, take your beatings and get into the kitchen because all your champions are too busy making cash and soaking in the congratulations about how brave they are after they've completely abandoned you.

Read More: The Frenchman Who Took A Stand Against Socialism

Billy Chubbs
Billy Chubbs is a early 20's Millennial with an impressive university degree in English and an equally impressive Electrician's certification. He recently joined the Canadian Military and is currently serving as an officer. You can tell him how much you hate him via Twitter or just send him some good old fashioned hate mail.

5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken

October 14, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

No girl has ever improved her looks with a gaudy mural injected under her skin or a piece of metal dangling from her nostrils. There's no man on Earth who has ever thought about his girlfriend or wife, "Man, you know what would make her even sexier? A butterfly emblazoned just over her ass." Yet despite this objective reality, thousands of girls continue to mutilate themselves at an astounding rate, to the point where more girls now have tattoos than men. Here are the reasons why you should shun these girls like they're lepers.

1. They’re sluts

What kind of girl would be comfortable lying down half-naked in public for two hours while some fat dude with a dirty beard jams a sharp needle into her skin? Answer: the kind of girl who takes sharp objects in her vagina as a hobby. Girls with tattoos and/or piercings (aside from earrings) are slags who fall in and out of guys’ beds at a moment’s notice. If you’re unfortunate enough to commit to a girl with ink on her body or metal in her face, she’ll cheat on you at the drop of a hat. Tattoos and piercings are the mark of the whore, which is why in more traditional countries like the Philippines, only whores have them.

One of the first girls I ever banged was a self-styled “piercing addict.” She had multiple ear piercings, a stud in her nose, a tongue piercing, and both nipples pierced. While we were dating, she was also bragging about how she was going to get her clit pierced (oh lucky me). In the time that I knew her, she went on to bang two of my friends, as well as at least four other guys I knew, within a span of two months. She would later get busted by campus police for turning tricks on the side.

2. They have no foresight

Even in our degenerate society, people with visible tattoos and piercings have difficulty getting jobs. Not even minimum wage employers will hire them, because no one wants their Big Mac or Double Crappuccino served by an Apocalypto extra. Girls who get inked or pierced are showing that they can't be trusted to plan for the future. They don't care that their stupid choices will consign them to living off their parents for the rest of their lives: all they care about is their individuality.

Not only that, but girls with tattoos specifically have no idea that their cool designs will be destroyed by aging. Gravity and Father Time work their magic on us all, and your taut flesh will eventually sag and wrinkle like a raisin in the sun. A chick who can't comprehend that the awesome Narnia scene tattooed on her back will look like Technicolor vomit when she's 40 is too dumb to be the mother of your children.

3. They're selfish

The reasons girls get tattoos and piercings—"I'm doing it for ME!"—are indicative of narcissism and mild psychopathy. Girls get tattoos for the same reasons they cut their hair short: a desperate attempt to assert how unique and special they are. A girl who willfully disfigures herself like this will never attempt to please you or do anything nice for you. She won't care for you when you're sick, will refuse to sleep with you for completely arbitrary reasons, and will generally be a moody, unlikable cunt.

4. They're boring

Girls' logic when it comes to tattoos is best described by paraphrasing Lena Dunham's character in Girls: "I have a tattoo, and that just makes me naturally interesting." Nothing could be further from the truth. My experience shows me that girls with ink and/or metal are the most boring, conformist chicks you'll ever come across. To be fair, most girls are dull as dirt, but tattooed and pierced girls are aggressively dull, assaulting you with the most hackneyed left-wing tripe you'll ever hear.

My "piercing addict" girlfriend, for example, identified as a Marxist (I shit you not) based on one class she took on Latin America and was constantly talking my ear off about some "injustice" or another. The joke was that before she took that class, she was so tuned out to current events that she wasn't even registered to vote. I derived incredible pleasure from shoving my cock in her mouth to shut her up.

5. They're mentally ill

This is the clincher. Any girl who thinks that a getting a ring in her nose or a Bible verse on her back is a good idea is going to be off her rocker. In my entire life, I have never met an inked or pierced girl who wasn't sick in the head, whether they had depression, "anxiety" or a full-blown personality disorder. While girls with facial piercings and tattoos on the arms or legs can at least feign normality, chicks with piercings or tattoos on or near their erogenous zones (breasts, labia, ass) are the kinds of broads who will cut you with a knife.

Going back to the "piercing addict," she was a complete masochist who would burst into tears every time after we had sex, crying about how I wasn't banging her hard enough. Another girlfriend of mine who had a tramp stamp was a full-on borderline, starting fights for no reason to try provoke me into hitting and slapping her. She also casually referred to black people with the n-word in mixed company despite being a racial minority herself. Both girls were absolute maniacs in the sack—we're talking nails-digging-into-my-back kind of sex—but outside of the bedroom, they were one bad day from a complete breakdown.

The only good thing about tattoos and piercings is that they signal which girls you can bang with minimal effort. If you’re looking to make a girl wince during anal on the first date, pick the one with a tramp stamp or a tongue piercing. But if you’re looking for a girl you can wife up, go for the ones who haven’t mangled their bodies beyond repair.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why You Should Never Date A Girl With Dyed Hair

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken

October 14, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

No girl has ever improved her looks with a gaudy mural injected under her skin or a piece of metal dangling from her nostrils. There's no man on Earth who has ever thought about his girlfriend or wife, "Man, you know what would make her even sexier? A butterfly emblazoned just over her ass." Yet despite this objective reality, thousands of girls continue to mutilate themselves at an astounding rate, to the point where more girls now have tattoos than men. Here are the reasons why you should shun these girls like they're lepers.

1. They’re sluts

What kind of girl would be comfortable lying down half-naked in public for two hours while some fat dude with a dirty beard jams a sharp needle into her skin? Answer: the kind of girl who takes sharp objects in her vagina as a hobby. Girls with tattoos and/or piercings (aside from earrings) are slags who fall in and out of guys’ beds at a moment’s notice. If you’re unfortunate enough to commit to a girl with ink on her body or metal in her face, she’ll cheat on you at the drop of a hat. Tattoos and piercings are the mark of the whore, which is why in more traditional countries like the Philippines, only whores have them.

One of the first girls I ever banged was a self-styled “piercing addict.” She had multiple ear piercings, a stud in her nose, a tongue piercing, and both nipples pierced. While we were dating, she was also bragging about how she was going to get her clit pierced (oh lucky me). In the time that I knew her, she went on to bang two of my friends, as well as at least four other guys I knew, within a span of two months. She would later get busted by campus police for turning tricks on the side.

2. They have no foresight

Even in our degenerate society, people with visible tattoos and piercings have difficulty getting jobs. Not even minimum wage employers will hire them, because no one wants their Big Mac or Double Crappuccino served by an Apocalypto extra. Girls who get inked or pierced are showing that they can't be trusted to plan for the future. They don't care that their stupid choices will consign them to living off their parents for the rest of their lives: all they care about is their individuality.

Not only that, but girls with tattoos specifically have no idea that their cool designs will be destroyed by aging. Gravity and Father Time work their magic on us all, and your taut flesh will eventually sag and wrinkle like a raisin in the sun. A chick who can't comprehend that the awesome Narnia scene tattooed on her back will look like Technicolor vomit when she's 40 is too dumb to be the mother of your children.

3. They're selfish

The reasons girls get tattoos and piercings—"I'm doing it for ME!"—are indicative of narcissism and mild psychopathy. Girls get tattoos for the same reasons they cut their hair short: a desperate attempt to assert how unique and special they are. A girl who willfully disfigures herself like this will never attempt to please you or do anything nice for you. She won't care for you when you're sick, will refuse to sleep with you for completely arbitrary reasons, and will generally be a moody, unlikable cunt.

4. They're boring

Girls' logic when it comes to tattoos is best described by paraphrasing Lena Dunham's character in Girls: "I have a tattoo, and that just makes me naturally interesting." Nothing could be further from the truth. My experience shows me that girls with ink and/or metal are the most boring, conformist chicks you'll ever come across. To be fair, most girls are dull as dirt, but tattooed and pierced girls are aggressively dull, assaulting you with the most hackneyed left-wing tripe you'll ever hear.

My "piercing addict" girlfriend, for example, identified as a Marxist (I shit you not) based on one class she took on Latin America and was constantly talking my ear off about some "injustice" or another. The joke was that before she took that class, she was so tuned out to current events that she wasn't even registered to vote. I derived incredible pleasure from shoving my cock in her mouth to shut her up.

5. They're mentally ill

This is the clincher. Any girl who thinks that a getting a ring in her nose or a Bible verse on her back is a good idea is going to be off her rocker. In my entire life, I have never met an inked or pierced girl who wasn't sick in the head, whether they had depression, "anxiety" or a full-blown personality disorder. While girls with facial piercings and tattoos on the arms or legs can at least feign normality, chicks with piercings or tattoos on or near their erogenous zones (breasts, labia, ass) are the kinds of broads who will cut you with a knife.

Going back to the "piercing addict," she was a complete masochist who would burst into tears every time after we had sex, crying about how I wasn't banging her hard enough. Another girlfriend of mine who had a tramp stamp was a full-on borderline, starting fights for no reason to try provoke me into hitting and slapping her. She also casually referred to black people with the n-word in mixed company despite being a racial minority herself. Both girls were absolute maniacs in the sack—we're talking nails-digging-into-my-back kind of sex—but outside of the bedroom, they were one bad day from a complete breakdown.

The only good thing about tattoos and piercings is that they signal which girls you can bang with minimal effort. If you're looking to make a girl wince during anal on the first date, pick the one with a tramp stamp or a tongue piercing. But if you're looking for a girl you can wife up, go for the ones who haven't mangled their bodies beyond repair.

Read More: 5 Reasons Why You Should Never Date A Girl With Dyed Hair

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

The Supreme Importance Of Having A Den

October 14, 2014 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

The time will come with age and wisdom that you will find yourself in a situation where your work or your trade will be the engine, the "Flux Capacitor" of your life. All financial resources will derive from your profession, all material assets will be begotten from that career, and your entire standard of living will depend on how well you do it.

Enter "The Den" aka "The Study."

The "Den" or the "Study" I viewed as a filmotography novelty. A hold back from 1950's television where the stalwart, WASPy pepper-haired white male would retreat to in order to avoid the mundaneness and theatrics of his familial life. Ward Cleaver would retreat there. The Father of the "Father Knows Best" would go there. And presumptively to just get some peace and quiet.

The truth is, however, that the Den is NOT a place of retreat, but rather a place of composition, ponderance, and innovation. For that is where a true man takes his otherwise uncommon life and turns it into something great. A stamp on society. A difference in the world. A revolutionary technology. An influential book. A true and genuine "difference" for the positive and general advancement of society.

The key, however, is to make men of today realize the importance and vitality of having his own den, and just what a contribution to society having such an asset is. Let's be clear what a den's true function is: It is to ELIMINATE all exterior sources of distraction so as to permit a man to dedicate and focus 100% of his efforts towards creation.

This is why back in the day a child, a woman or anybody else would NEVER enter the “den” or the “study” of the father who was currently occupying it. He was there doing SERIOUS FUCKING business. You didn’t have to understand it. You didn’t have to appreciate it. All you had to do was respect it. When your father was in the den, that meant you did NOT DARE to interrupt him or disrupt him. And now, as an older man, I understand why.

It was merely an issue of efficiency.

A man loves more than anything else his family and his freedom. It’s why he worked so hard. It’s why he went to college. It’s why he learned game. He wanted a family with a loving hottie spankable wife and children he could mold and pick on and the free time to do it. However, in the historical sense, a man had to provide for such a family. That meant dedication, service, servitude and loyalty to an employer.

However, some men of the entrepreneurial nature discovered the benefits of self-employment. And when upon realizing the freedom benefits this career path provided, he would dedicate himself to this pursuit. The irony, however, was that he was at home. And as loving children and wives are prone to be, they would want to interact with him, which (in an ironic sense) would threaten the engine that provided the freedom that man had with his family.

Naturally, the man being the conduit at which this paradox met, would be adamant that his family DARE NOT interrupt him or disturb him in his study. He WAS doing the utmost of important work, the sole purpose of which was to allow that man the maximum amount of time to spend with his family.

And thus the lesson for today.

Every man, especially of the ROK variety, needs his own den. It is the sole source of freedom from an otherwise abusive employer. This assumes an entrepreneurial spirit of most men, but when you do get to that stage you will realize that the den is the most efficient vehicle by which you can achieve your means. A den allows you to (uninterruptedly) achieve your masterpiece, establish your business, run your empire or free yourself from your employer. However, the key is to make sure it is yours and 100% yours alone.

No woman

No child

No family

No friends

are allowed into your holy and sacred den. That den is a place of purified work, dedication, and focus so that you may achieve your life’s work and (hopefully and consequentially) your riches, granting you the freedom to spend your finite resource of time with loved ones and family.

I know many men love their “man cave,” a place of video gaming and sports-watching joy. But most men should be more focused on their den, as that is the vehicle by which you will attain true happiness.

Read Next: On The Importance Of Family

Aaron Clarey
Captain Capitalism is the resident economist of the mano/androsphere. He is a misanthropic, hedonist, nihilistic, cynical type, but he keeps getting proved right every day. He is the author of "Enjoy the Decline," "Worthless," and "Bachelor Pad Economics". His newest book is "The Black Man's Guide Out Of Poverty". He also runs the advisory "Asshole Consulting." You can read his daily rantings at his blog Captain Capitalism.

Woody Allen's Red Pill Masterpiece "Crimes And Misdemeanors" Is 25 Years Old

October 15, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Woody Allen's Crimes and Misdemeanors was released twenty-five years ago this week. Not only is it arguably his most artistically accomplished work, but it also dramatizes a red pill view of life and male-female relationships.

The film was the twenty-third Allen had written after What's New Pussycat (1965), so he was some way into his career at its conception. By the early 2000's, before his habit of putting out a movie a year led to a string of less-than stellar productions like 2003's Anything Else or 2004's Miranda and Miranda, it was common to divide his output into "the early, funny ones" – Bananas, Everything You Always Wanted to Know about Sex (But Were Afraid to Ask) and Sleeper – and the "serious" ones like September and Another Woman.

But the truth is more complex. Allen has always been a serious dramatist stuck in a comedian's body, striving for the profundity of Ingmar Bergman but forever falling short, in his mind at least, despite the fantastic success of funny-serious pieces like Annie Hall and Manhattan. Interviewed in 2005, he stated that he would never make a film as good as Bergman's The Seventh Seal: "I feel that level of greatness is not in me. It may just not be in the genes, or I just don't have the depth of humanity to do that."

Spoiler alert: spoilers below

Bleak

Allen's worldview has always been bleak. Speaking to the press at the release of this year's Magic in the Moonlight he said:

> I firmly believe . . . that life is meaningless. I'm not alone in thinking this – there have been many great minds far, far superior to mine, that have come to that conclusion. And unless somebody can come up with some proof or some example where it's not, I think it is. I think it's just a lot of sound and fury, signifying nothing. I'm not saying that one should opt to kill oneself. But the truth of the matter is, when you think of it, every 100 years, there's a big flush, and everybody in the world is gone. And there's a new group of people. And this goes on interminably towards no particular end, no rhyme or reason. And the universe, as you know from the best of physicists, is coming apart, and eventually there will be nothing, absolutely nothing. All the great works of Shakespeare, and Beethoven, and Da Vinci, all that will be gone. Now, not for a long time, but shorter than you think because the sun is going to burn out much earlier than the universe vanishes . . . So all these plays and these symphonies, the height of human achievement, will be gone completely. There'll be no time, no space, nothing at all, just zero.

Crimes and Misdemeanors is his most successful wedding of this worldview with his comic impulse. It contains some very funny moments, but it is essentially a drama that rips away the "pretty lies" that society proliferates about relationships between the sexes, morality and religion.

The plot concerns two main characters: Judah Rosenthal, a successful ophthalmologist played by Martin Landau; and Clifford Stern, a failed film-maker played by Woody Allen. Their stories are told in counterpoint.

As the movie opens we see Judah being honored for his services at a New York society dinner. He is with his wife and family, the picture of respectability. But all is not well beneath the façade. Judah has been having an affair with a flight attendant called Dolores Paley for the past two years. Doleres, played brilliantly by Anjelica Housten, is an unstable woman prone to hysteria, unable and unwilling to accept her position as mistress and becoming demanding.

Coming home after the ceremony, Judah is lucky to intercept a letter from her to his wife, telling her of the affair and asking if they can meet. Judah, who has been married for twenty-five years, has no intention of breaking up his family, but in spite of his promises to find a way to make everyone happy, it is clear that Dolores is serious in her intention to reveal their secret. Worse, she threatens to lift the lid on his "embezzlement"—what he insists were essentially honest "financial irregularities" associated with his practice earlier in his career. Terrified that the comfortable life he has built for himself will be destroyed, Judah calls his brother Jack, a small-time crook, for help.

Meanwhile, Clifford, a failing filmmaker in a sexless marriage with a nagging wife, is offered the opportunity by his brother-in-law Lester (Alan Alda), a successful TV producer, to make a documentary about his life. From the outset, Alda portrays Lester as a classic alpha—he is powerful, men defer to him and he attracts sexy female groupies. He is also brash and spends all his time on vapid commercial projects.

Clifford, in contrast, is a serious documentary maker who wants to make a film about Professor Louis Levy, a philosopher. But he has no choice but to take on the Lester documentary for the money. During filming he meets and develops oneitis for Halley Reed (Mia Farrow), an executive for the TV company. In a subplot, Judah is treating Lester's brother Ben, a devout rabbi who is slowly going blind.

Underlining Allen's ambitions, the film was shot by Sven Nykvist, a cinematographer who had worked extensively with Bergman. On screen it looks very clean and straightforward, almost like a TV movie. But the plot systematically and ruthlessly undermines the audience's expectations. Jack tells Judah that the only way he can escape his situation is by having his mistress dispensed with.

At first Judah is shocked—in Allen's words "his first reaction is the stereotypical reaction dictated by his social milieu." But soon enough, after Dolores threatens to come over to his house, he decides to proceed with the plan.

Jack hires a hitman and Dolores is murdered. The scene where Judah, having been informed that the deed has been done, goes to her apartment and sees her corpse in a pool of blood to Schubert's String Quartet No. 15 is genuinely shocking: real, visceral violence has penetrated Judah's safe, middle-class existence. He is stricken with guilt and fear for months, and considers turning himself in. But a detective questions him and isn't suspicious. In the end the crime gets pinned on someone else. Judah, who had been drinking heavily, starts to relax.

Meanwhile, Clifford, in love with Halley, takes her to see movies and shares Chinese takeout with her. But Lester is interested too—in her first scene we see him ask her out confidently, only to be rebuffed. Soon, though, they are working late together at her apartment. In this strand, Allen gives us a masterly presentation of beta game and the friendzone. Clifford believes that because Halley is interested in his documentary about Levy, and because she too is artistically-inclined, she will be attracted to him.

Even though he doesn't believe for a moment that his special snowflake would succumb to the boorish, unsophisticated Lester, he is dimly aware that he is a threat, and so ridicules him with her. ("After all, he is an American Phenomenon.""Yeah, but so is acid rain."). In a wonderfully painful moment at his apartment we see him try to kiss her, only for her to turn her head and come out with the usual excuses—"I'm not ready," "It's me – I'm serious about my career at the moment," and so on.

Both narratives play with the audience by setting what "should" happen against what actually does happen. Brought up on Hollywood movies, viewers are conditioned to think that Judah should be punished for the terrible deed that he has committed and that Clifford, the hardworking artist with integrity should get the girl. But neither of these eventualities is to play out.

The movie's key themes are articulated in a masterly scene where Judah, cracking up, visits his old family home in Brooklyn. Here he recalls a Passover dinner from his childhood where his father and his aunt argue over the possibility of a godless universe. His father is adamant that guilt will win out, and that no crime goes unpunished. His aunt, though, has this to say:

> If he can do it (a crime) and get away with it, and he chooses not to be bothered by the ethics, then he's home free. Remember, history is run by the winners. And if the Nazis had won, future generations would come to understand the story of World War II quite differently.

The aunt's point is essentially atheist: there is no god and no moral structure to life at all.

Swallowing the Red Pill

The story culminates in a wonderful scene set at the wedding party for Ben's daughter. Judah is there with his wife and is happy again. Clifford is also present with his wife, although they are soon to be divorced. He hasn't seen Halley for months as she has been working in London. She arrives at the party with Lester unannounced: they are now a couple.

The close-up on Clifford's face as he sees them together is highly affecting, one of the finest shots in the film, expressing the surprise and pain of the disillusioned beta perfectly. In that moment, Clifford effectively swallows the red pill: his special snowflake was nothing of the kind, just as susceptible to the flashy but superficial bad boy charms of Lester as any of the cheap actresses he also seduced.

Worse, Clifford had accumulated no relational equity with her in all their shared moments, with all the movies he had watched with her, through their common aesthetic appreciation. In the end, she turns out to be just another woman attracted to success (and money?) and alpha dominance.

Clifford sits drinking alone at the bar. Judah joins him. It is the first and only time the two principle characters will meet. Judah says that he has “the perfect murder story – a great plot,” and—without suggesting that it is true or concerns him—describes Dolores’s murder and its aftermath:

> And after the awful deed is done, he finds that he’s plagued by deep-rooted guilt. Little sparks of his religious background which he’d rejected are suddenly stirred up. He hears his father’s voice. He imagines that God is watching his every move. Suddenly, it’s not an empty universe at all, but a just and moral one, and he’s violated it. Now, he’s panic-stricken. He’s on the verge of a mental collapse-an inch away from confessing the whole thing to the police. And then one morning, he awakens. The sun is shining, his family is around him and mysteriously, the crisis has lifted. He takes his family on a vacation to Europe and as the months pass, he finds he’s not punished. In fact, he prospers. The killing gets attributed to another person-a drifter who has a number of other murders to his credit, so I mean, what the hell? One more doesn’t even matter. Now he’s scott-free. His life is completely back to normal. Back to his protected world of wealth and privilege.

In this way his aunt’s point is illustrated and confirmed. There is no god; there is no moral order to the universe: just as the “nice” guy doesn’t get the girl, so bad people are not punished for their crimes.

In revealing pure, undistilled red pill truth, the movie’s climax feels bleak. The final shot is of Ben, the rabbi, dancing with his just-married daughter. In the background, we hear Professor Levy’s voice:

> We are all faced throughout our lives with agonizing decisions. Moral choices. Some are on a grand scale. Most of these choices are on lesser points. But! We define ourselves by the choices we have made. We are in fact the sum total of our choices. Events unfold so unpredictably, so unfairly, human happiness does not seem to have been included, in the design of creation. It is only we, with our capacity to love, that give meaning to the indifferent universe. And yet, most human beings seem to have the ability to keep trying, and even to find joy from simple things like their family, their work, and from the hope that future generations might understand more.

This voiceover (which reflects Freud’s assertion that “love and work are the cornerstones of our humanness,” and the basis for happiness) seems to strike a more optimistic note—until we remember that Professor Levy had committed suicide at the onset of the third act, both scuppering Clifford’s documentary plans and brutally undercutting the hopeful tone established here. In the end, even love and work may not be enough in the face on an indifferent cosmos.

Blindness

The theme of blindness is a central metaphor in the film. Judah is an eye doctor who cannot see his own moral reprehensibility clearly. Ben is a rabbi who believes in a just universe, but who is going blind—underlining the fact that he literally does not see life clearly. Clear sight of unvarnished reality is in short supply, as is happiness.

Perhaps surprisingly, for such an atheist story, the most contented character is Judah's father. When someone asks him at the flashback dinner party how he would feel if it turned out he was wrong about God, about pursuing his faith, he says "Then I'll still have a better life than those who doubt." Even though religious belief is self-inflicted blindness, those who have it are somewhat insulated from the harsh meaninglessness of the universe.

In its portrayal of female sexual agency and in its assertion that life has no moral framework, that each man is answerable only to his own personal code of morality, Crimes and Misdemeanors is defiantly red pill in nature, is Woody Allen's finest moment, and is highly recommended to anyone interested in a dramatic representation of existential themes.

Want to find out how to avoid oneitis and attract beautiful women? Then click here.

Read More: Why It's Important To Develop An Insane Degree Of Self-Love

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Meet Your New Youtube Censors

October 15, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Not long ago I mentioned how Youtuber Laci Green initiated a witch hunt against Sam Pepper to remove him off Youtube entirely. She was partly successful: Youtube canceled his partnership program which means he will no longer earn money from the site. While the social justice warriors do their victory lap, I wanted to introduce you to four Youtubers who played an active role in the witch hunt. By sharing their ideals, we can better understand what type of thought is allowable to them.

Unless you're gay, transsexual, feminist, or morbidly obese, your beliefs are unacceptable and are subject to future mob action. The standard operating procedure for these types of people is to aggressively censor and ruin those with a large voice who dare disagree with their lifestyle. I share their formula in the following article: What Is A Social Justice Warrior?

The sad part is that we're outnumbered and the masses seem to want these people to censor content for them. There's not much we can do except play defense and make sure we're not their next victims.

Don't Miss: Feminist Laci Green Is Trying To Censor Youtube Without Consent

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

ROK Columnist Matt Forney Receives Death Threats For Criticizing Tattooed Women

October 16, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

ROK writer Matt Forney has received hundreds of harassing and threatening tweets since we published his article "5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken." Several of those have included serious death threats, levied against him solely because he wrote a piece of commentary that criticized women who partake in harmful self-mutilation. For his own safety, Matt is currently in an undisclosed location outside of the United States. Only a few trusted individuals know where he is housed.

At precisely 4:10pm on October 14, we began receiving a massive flood of traffic. It appears that this traffic originated from a Facebook group called Inked Till Death. They shared the article with the following text: "Well this is stupid." At time of this writing, the posting has garnered nearly 7,000 shares, providing a large volume of visitors to our inadequate web server, which at one point served 3,805 simultaneous outraged people.

In addition to the thousands of angry comments on the Inked Till Death group, outrage spilled over onto Twitter, where tattooed females and their white knight protectors continue to spew invective at us:

Threats on Matt's life

More severely, Matt has received death threats. While death threats on the internet are usually nothing serious, they are always taken to be 100% credible when targeted towards a woman, especially one who has successfully weaseled her way into the video game industry. At ROK, we see no reason why equal treatment should not be applied to both sexes when it comes to violent threats that could result in death.

Laurel 9:49pm
Please just do the world a favor and stop writing

Matthew Forney 9:50pm
Do gentlemen prefer blondes? We're about to find out.

Laurel 9:51pm
I will find you and kill you

♛Queen Of The Heels♛
@ThatRoxxieGirl

Follow

returnofkings.com/45334/5-reason…

I need to shoot the cunt who wrote this with my boring slutty hand..
#Girls #Tattoos #Piercings #Article

Reply Retweeted Favorited More

RETWEETS 2
FAVORITE 1

5:01 PM - 14 Oct 2014

Alec Schroff <Schroffa@hawks.rockhurst.edu> to me

To:
Matt

Name:
Alec Schroff

Email:
Schroffa@hawks.rockhurst.edu

Subject:
Re: women with tattoos and piercings are broken

Message:
Please call me at (314)691-1557. I was very intrigued by this article and would like to know how someone could think like this. You are the biggest piece of shit alive and I hope someone gets the chance to slit your throat asap you worthless fuck.

Sent from (ip address): 107.170.230.237 (sfo02.spaccel.net)
Date/Time: October 15, 2014 1:33 am
Coming from (referer): http://mattforney.com/consultations/
Using (user agent): Mozilla/5.0 (iPhone; CPU iPhone OS 8_0_2 like Mac OS X) AppleWebKit/600.1.4 (KHTML, like Gecko) Version/8.0 Mobile/12A405 Safari/600.1.4

ROK Publisher Is Standing By

When Anita Sarkeesian was threatened this week (again), major media outlets like the New York Times, Washington Post, and Time immediately reported on it with sympathetic coverage. We expect the same in response to the threats Matt has received. As publisher of ROK, I'm prepared to field questions from ABC News, Huffington Post, and Jezebel, who I'm sure will all want to report on this crime against Matt. I can also act as an intermediary to put both journalists and the federal authorities in contact with Matt, who understandably does not wish to reveal his location.

Final Decision In Response To The Controversy

After ensuring Matt's safety, I carefully went through the emotional responses that his article received, and have failed to see one valid concern that these outraged individuals have provided. Their anger and criticisms are eerily void of logic, sense, or anything resembling a rational thought from a sane human entity. Therefore, Matt's article will remain and he will receive a bonus for sacrificing his safety to exercise his free speech. As any man will tell you, tattooed and pierced women tend to exhibit the negative traits that he so eloquently described, and so we will not voluntarily censor information that can help the lives of millions of men who come across it.

God bless freedom of speech, and God bless America.

Read Next: Did Anita Sarkeesian Fake Death Threats Against Herself?

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Never Envy A Woman For Her Privilege

October 16, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Reading the letter of Thomas Ball, written shortly before his public suicide, a man may be inclined to think it would be better to be a woman, even if just a little. Women get so much: special homeless shelters, an act against violence with a government office, greater funding in food stamps, near-unilateral protection by child services, the license to take a child of the opposite sex to go potty when working in childcare, social acceptance to spend their lives outside the workforce, a broader variety of fashion, media attention after false rape accusations, wider choice on whom they can have sex with, the ability to avoid a traffic ticket by crying, et cetera.

Such talk of female privilege is not merely limited to the internet. In the secret alcoves all over the nation, men whisper to each other about the oppression, afraid that they might be ostracized should anyone hear them. You know the old joke:

Q: "How does every sexist joke start?"

A: "By looking to see if there are any other people in the room."

The dogma of the day is in conflict with what the majority of what both men and women believe, yet still the masses are kept down by Big Radical Feminist. Whatever shall we men do? Powerless, shall we pine to be on the other side? Like Louis Armstrong singing about being "white on the inside," shall we wish we were women, or at the least envy them?

The Mystique Of The Feminine Mind

Abso-fucking-lutely not. Why would anyone envy women? Sure, I've always wanted to be a lesbian, if only for a few years, but that's comparatively insignificant. The drawbacks are far heavier the benefits. The most obvious drawback is the body. There's a reason that men don't squawk about how independent they are. Women are tiny. Almost any woman could be raped and killed by almost any man regardless of all the self-defense classes and jazzercise she does. Let's not kid ourselves. Women live in a constant state of fear, which is why they keep screaming about being strong and empowered. A truly strong and empowered person has no need to convince himself of it.

But the body is not the main reason I wouldn't want to be a woman. By far the most terrible thing about being a woman is having a woman's mind. Sure, they have better time-management skills, but that just means they're wired for service. Women suck complete shit at objective reasoning. Why did you hate high school English? Because a woman taught it, and she told you that a poem can mean whatever you want it to. They couldn't expect you to do something they could never figure out themselves.

I'm in law school right now. Unsurprisingly, I couldn't find any data for what fields of law women tend to study, but from what I've seen, they are almost always either "fun" fields like child advocacy, sports, or entertainment, or "clean" fields like tax law or prosecution. Women don't study divorce, custody, criminal defense, or anything that is morally vague or subject to interpretation. They make better grades, but that just means that they are wired for studying for tests. It is said that there are twice as many law jobs as there are new law graduates, but that's because people specialize in bullshit fields that are flooded by cowards. If you study law, you will either learn moral flexibility or die in poverty.

Also unsurprisingly, the kind of men and women who go to law school aren't the type of people who read Return of Kings. I realize that doesn't have anything to do with the female mind, but this seems as good as any place to make that observation. Law school attracts the absolute worst in humanity. Weak, cowardly men and cutthroat, entitled women.

Moving on. Have you been looking for that girlfriend who just gets you? The kind you can talk about anything to? You're on that first date, and as it both turns out, she loves Siouxsie and the Banshees, just like you! What luck! You excitedly being to talk about what their influences were, how they shaped their sound, what was the band's effect on later music, and what the critical points in the band's history were. At best she's unresponsive, and at worst she loses all interest in you.

Women are terrible at historical criticism, philosophy, or anything that involves value judgments, and they generally seem uninterested in it unless it directly affects them. This is because a woman will always argue the person, not the issue. There's a reason St Paul said that women should never teach or speak in church. Women just aren't equipped to perform with men when it comes to deep thinking, and that is why all the women's liberation in the world will never enable them to accomplish much worth remembering. For example, rock music has always been pretty liberal, and there have been exactly two well-known and talented instrumentalists in all of its history: Nancy Wilson of Heart and Kim Deal of The Pixies. Imagine all of the money record companies could have made had they been able to find a talented female rock band.

Being Fair In Our Judgments

At this point, many people will say I hate women or think they are evil, but that is…to use your word…ignorant. To tell a woman not to be manipulative, self-serving, or finicky is to tell a hawk not to devour a mouse. It is in a woman's nature to act like a woman, and so it is unjust for us men to judge them for being so. To hold women to the same standard as men is the greatest discrimination.

Does this mean that women are inferior? In most ways, yes. Fortunately, men are hard-wired for sex, so we have a reason to talk to them. Remember your childhood. Before you hit puberty, you absolutely discarded girls. To be a girl was the worst thing in your eyes, and to be friends with a girl was to be sick in the head. The only females you considered to have human value were the adults who provided for you. If a little boy is ever friends with a little girl, it's always because he has a crush on her (I'll never forget you, Jennifer Dolphin. Please get a Facebook.).

Some people will say that I'll never get laid with such a view of women, but most people who would accuse me of that either never get laid themselves or are women. It's been proven again and again that women love assholes. If they didn't, then men would never mistreat women. The reality is that women have no value to men beyond sex, children, and housework.

Feminists have been screeching for years about how men and women shouldn't need each other, but they've never given any reasons for why we should want each other. I have far more in common with my male friends than I have with any woman. If a woman isn't screwing me or somehow related to me familially, I have no reason to talk to her beyond, "Did you get those TPS reports?" Sex appeal is the greatest weapon women have in their arsenal, and they'd be wise to invest it for the long-term instead of the short-term while they are young.

Taming The Shrew

Women, of course, will never understand their inferiority any more than a child can understand his. You cannot argue with a child. Instead, you must discipline to build good behavior, and in time, that good behavior will turn into a worldview. The same is true with women. Women are inherently terrible people, and you can't correct their bad behavior with words alone. No, you must tame the shrew using positive and negative reinforcement.

Religion is best for the job, but in today's pluralistic marketplace, that's often not an option. Furthermore, society has decided it's best for women to continue acting like children, ever focused on their wants instead of their shoulds. But with a subtle reward and punishment system, you can turn the any promiscuous harpy into a submissive virgin bride. Perhaps I am a fool, but I like to believe the best in people.

You cannot tell the hawk not to devour the mouse any more than you can verbally teach a woman right from wrong. You can hate the effects of women, but you cannot call women evil. Every strong, empowered woman at heart is a scared little child lost in the woods. She'll never admit it to herself, but every woman has a Disney fantasy about some strong man taking her away and becoming her identity. Those movies made a fuckload of money for a reason. Be her identity.

The Glass Ceiling Within

So a man should never envy women. Women have advantages in society, but they are trapped with themselves. If a man wants to avoid his wife for a few hours, he can go to the golf course, but the wife will never be able to escape herself. There is no shelter from her own idiocy except in the guidance of a man, whether that man is her husband, her father, or her brother.

To have ignorance of your own insufficiency is the worst prison. A woman is like a drunk man who claims that he is merely buzzing. He thinks he is orderly, but all those around him laugh at his antics, and he grows angry. They take away his car keys and cell phone, and he thinks they are oppressing him. This is the natural state of the woman, and without the tempering force of patriarchy, there is nothing to prevent her from destroying her life and the lives of those around her. Why would you envy that?

Read More: All Women Are Sheep

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Science Confirms Tattooed Women Are Indeed Broken

October 17, 2014 | by Nomen Nescio | Link | Original Link

ROK writer Matt Forney recently outlined why women with piercings and tattoos are broken, and in doing so he bruised fragile egos, hurt a lot of feelings, and launched more than one rationalization hamster into orbit. Feminists, white knights, and other social justice warriors lashed out online, mostly in ad-hominem attacks, including death threats. Is this justified? Is Mr. Forney wrong in his assumptions? What does science have to say about links between body modifications such as tattoos and piercings, risk taking behavior and psychiatric disorders?

Dr. Caveman holds Forney's claims up to the cold white light of science to see what professional researchers have to say on the matter. For quality assurance, he only looked at peer-reviewed papers that have been published in scientific journals. There is no room for personal anecdotes and hurt feelings in scientific discourse. Facts are facts.

Claim 1: Tattoos indicate slutty behavior

Are women with tattoos or piercings sluttier?

Science says:

Being tattooed is associated with greater numbers of lifetime sexual partners (Heywood 2012), earlier sexual initiation, higher frequency of sexual intercourse and increased preference for oral sex (Nowosielski 2012). In adolescents, tattoos also correlate with the likelihood of having unprotected sex (Yen, 2012), but not in adults (Nowosielski 2012).

Verdict: TRUE

More sex with more partners = sluttiness

Claim 2: Tattoos indicate lack of foresight

Are women with tattoos less likely to oversee the consequences of their actions?

Science says:

Tattoos indicate impulsiveness (Kim, 1991). In students, tattooing is associated with risk-taking behaviors, including smoking and cannabis use (Heywood, 2012). Participants with tattoos or body piercings were more likely to have engaged in risk-taking behaviors and at greater degrees of involvement than those without either. These included gateway drug use, hard drug use, sexual activity, and suicide.

Gateway drug use was associated with younger age of both tattooing and body piercing. Hard drug use was associated with number of body piercings (Carroll 2002). In Croatian prisoners, tattoos correlated with lower IQs and those possessing them demonstrated significantly higher levels of impulsiveness than the non-tattooed group (Pozgain 2004). An overview of autopsy reports also revealed that persons with tattoos appear to die earlier than those without. A negative tattoo may suggest a predisposition to violent death, but is eclipsed by the presence of any tattoo (Carson 2014).

Verdict: TRUE

Impulsiveness, increased risk taking behavior, increased change of death = Lack of foresight

Claim 3: Body modifications indicate selfishness

Are women with tattoos or piercings more selfish?

Science says:

Those with tattoos are hostile and prone to delinquent behavior (Kim 1991). Psychiatric patients with tattoos are much more likely to suffer from Antisocial Personality Disorder and have an increased likelihood to have previously suffered from sexual abuse, abused substances, or to have attempted suicide. (Sciencedaily). Violence was associated with females having body piercings (Carroll 2002).

Verdict: TRUE

Antisocial behavior, increased willingness to use violence = selfishness

Claim 4: Girls with tattoos are boring

Do girls with piercings or tattoos have boring personalities?

Science says: Nothing. Correlations between being boring and being tattooed have not been studied. So, it depends how you define boring. Science supports the idea that women with tattoos lack foresight and are selfish and slutty. This does not sound boring to me. But science can tell us a bit about why women get themselves tattooed.

In Polish women, the main reasons for body ornamenting are the desire to enhance one's individuality and the need to increase sexual attractiveness (Antoszewski, 2010). Likewise, in Americans, three consistent self-identity outcomes for their body art were: it helped me (a) express myself, (b) feel unique, and (c) be myself (Owen, 2013). Together, these reasons suggest a compensation mechanism for low self-worth. However plausible, this theory has not yet been tested.

Verdict: NO DATA

Claim 5: girls with body modifications are mentally ill

Is there a correlation between tattoos, piercing and increased prevalence of psychiatric disorders?

Science says:

There are links between tattoos and psychiatric disorders such as depression (Heywood, 2012), eating disorders (Carroll, 2002), borderline personality disorder (Raspa, 1990), neuroticism (Pozgain, 2004) and increased risk of suicide (Carroll, 2002). Seven or more piercings, or intimate piercings, described higher risk behaviors and emotional distress (Owen 2013). In high school students, tattoos correlate with suicidal idealization, suicidal attempts, and depression (Yen 2012).

Verdict: TRUE

Depression, eating disorders, borderline personality disorders and suicidal tendencies are all mental illnesses

Final Results:

YEA sayers: 4/5 vs NAY sayers: 0/5

Science supports the idea that girls with tattoos are sluttier, have less foresight, are more selfish and crazier, but it is not just cold-blooded scientists and ROK readers who feel this way: a fairly recent study had male and female undergraduates from the UK rate female line drawings that varied in eight levels of tattooing. Results showed that tattooed women were rated as less physically attractive, more sexually promiscuous, and heavier drinkers than untattooed women, with more negative ratings with increasing number of tattoos. So, ROK stands not alone (Swami, 2007).

Read More: 5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken

Nomen Nescio
Nomen Nescio was born naked, screaming and covered in someone else's blood. Eventually he overcame those odds, left his cave and became a mercenary mad scientist, traveling the world and sampling its women. He writes on ROK sporadically. Follow him on Twitter: @The_Dr_Caveman

The Mask You Live In: Feminists Take On The Failure Of Masculinity

October 18, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

I found this video from the Manosphere commenter "Love, Ashley."

Ashley's insightful commentary:

I think men and women could potentially get along so much better if men knew how to communicate their feelings. If they did, I could have avoided so much stress and drama in the relationship and dating scenes. I am a firm believer in the idea of when there is a problem that comes up, communicate it with the person it concerns. Let it out, talk it out, get past it. But since men are taught to "be a man" and not show or express their emotions, there is so much they bottle up in fear of looking weak. When that happens, I sense it and it just pisses me off and makes me all kinds of uncomfortable. Now, there are men I have met who are more open and straightforward and have been able to express their emotions and me and those men get along so much better.

One of the commenters links to Jackson Katz, who claims to be an "anti-violence" expert, and his video called "Tough Guise."

Further, the first video draws heavily on a book called Guyland, in which Michael Kimmel singles out white, heterosexual men and their degenerate culture for holding men back from gender equality. The problem with these authors and approaches is it does not understand what exactly is going on in society nor does it proscribe any appropriate or justified remedies.

First, people who like and believe these videos can't conceptualize of people with healthy, solid personal identities. They are playing a frame control game that is aimed at eroding stronger—but still weak—personal identities of others. Kimmel and Katz don't believe in strength and personal calm. Since they start with themselves, they assume that everybody else must have the same personal deficiencies as them.

The videos observe the wasteland of the modern boy growing into a man. They note explosions of violence, unstable identities, and inability to connect with other men. That sounds like a serious personality disorder manifested at a social level, which is known as social narcissism.

Still, it sounds like these boys subject themselves to recurrent, unhealthy patterns of thoughts. That is the definition of personality disorders. For the boys presented, they never mention anything about personality disorders. Isn't it funny that people who bloviate so much about "harmful thought patterns" don't understand that that is the definition of personality disorders. Therefore, there is no racist personality disorder, misogynistic personality disorder, or homophobic personality disorder. Anti-social, passive-aggressive, histrionic are all personality disorders.

It is disgusting that the video talks so much about "hyper-masculinity." In the modern era with a clutch of boys who talk very nervously about their self-identity. What an example of hyper-masculinity!

 d

One problem presented here is that as a society devolves it needs enemies of the thinly-veiled decline. The Duck Dynasty star said something something bad about practicing homosexuals and was skewered immediately because he represented an incredibly easy and threatening target: a family man from tradition with a solid personal identity. All three of those concepts is incredibly threatening to mainstream identities, as independence, fleeing the past and weak personal identities based on social approval are in vogue today.

Note the implicit assumption of female superiority in emotional and relational realms presented. Women start from themselves and part of collective female identity is that they have superior relational skills with friends, family and romantic partners. Society knows this isn't true because the constellation of reality TV shows, etc. all know that women are worse at relationships than men.

Still, this stubbornly persistent belief bleeds over into discussions of masculinity. Women pretend that men don't communicate with one another or if they do, it isn't in an honest or effective way. We see the ridiculous multiplicity of crossed wires on the Left, as they dispute the fact that women speak more than men: it is either equal or men talk more. But, men don't talk about what they truly want to talk about, just engaging in conversation to prop up their identity or maintain appearances. See the projection here?

This is also a derivation of the concept that "all men are beasts." This concept exists in most cultures and—apparently—is a psychological construct that helps women explain male behavior they don't understand, especially violent or abusive behavior males engage in. It shows the biological roots of female rationalization, as women have a incredibly tough time dealing with female homicide, child abuse, or any other behavior that is seen as originating from men. To be fair, men have unfairly categorized women, as a class, as dumber than men. That isn't true from an IQ standpoint and much more reasonable observation is that women suffer, collectively, from a supreme drought of wisdom.

The other looming issue presented here is what happens when men express themselves. MRA's have long realized what happens when men talk candidly and frankly about what men are feeling. Take Michael Kimmel. In his book Guyland, he worked intimately with many men, only to treat them—at best—as lab rats of an inferior breed. At his worse, he shows off his true intentions—to paint white men as morally repugnant, psychologically ill, and potentially homicidal and rapey maniacs.

What these sorts of people don't realize is they are the reason men have so many issues. When feminists and women constantly label men as creepy, rapey, etc. all they do is place a damper on more honest exchanges between the sexes. Sure, the idea of a perfectly honest social dialogue between men and women is absurd on it's face, but we could be more honest. Feminism has been complicit in so many things, but one striking is sex and relationships with women—with men as the speakers. Men can't just say that men get fucked in divorce court, but Chris Rock can make jokes about women cleaning men's financial clock in divorce court.

Personally, I see feminists as latter-day torch bearers of old, puritanical ideas about sex and relationships. They really don't want sex to be talked about—but most especially by men. It isn't any surprise that early second-wave feminists thoroughly trashed gay men and treated them like dirt. Of course, they had to educate gay men about misogyny because women are men's moral superiors while they kick dirt in gay men's faces and call them worthless faggots. Seriously check out some of Gloria Steinem's early work in the seventies. That bitch hates gay men. But, now she hearts the gay marriage.

Back on point, these sorts of people who are apparently dying for a conversation about changing masculinity are part and parcel of the problem. First, they don't realize how much of American masculinity is based on female approval. Second, they don't understand that replacing the wider family unit with government bureaucrats and media is insanely damaging to the psyche of a child. Teachers, TV and social workers can't unconditionally love a child.

Further, by the time kids enter the school system, personality disorders are already in force. If we expand the system—like Sweden—and start the governmental intervention as early as we can after the one year of parental leave, those children all present similar problems later on in life: the inability to handle change, a strong need for public approval and a highly deficient emotional life.

I feel they think that if men will just open up and express themselves, that will solve so many problems. Trust me—from first hand experience—revealing what lies beneath is often an incredibly dumb and short-sighted idea. Personality disorders exist to allow a person to live in society as best they can.

Finally, it is a stereotypically naive left-wing idea that if we all embrace all the egalitarian diversity tolerance then all the plus-good stuff happens. It reeks of an extremely naive view of the world that if we are all the same and appreciate each other not for substance by for superficialities, then we can finally rid the world of the wants, needs and frictions that necessarily inhere as existing as a human.

It should not have to be said, but: masculinity has never been a problem, but a solution to the social ills that plague so many societies.

Read More: Men Need A Return Of The Male Only Gentleman's Club

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

6 Habits That Hold Men Back

October 19, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

A lot of talk surrounds habits that are “good”—activities that you should implement into your life. Meditation, weight lifting, reading, and drinking sufficient amounts of water are a few that immediately come to mind. And these are all things that every man should do.

However, it’s equally important to acknowledge the existence of any bad habits that you may have. And we all have bad habits. I am going to offer you a list of common bad habits shared by men everywhere in a moment, but first I want to define exactly what makes something “bad,” because honestly it can mean something completely different to all of us.

In my opinion a bad habit is something that “takes” more from your life than it “gives.” And this definition can apply more generally than to habits. For example, a bad friendship would be one that “takes” more than it “gives”—a friend whose bullshit causes you more anxiety and stress than spending time with him makes up for in advice and camaraderie. The same goes for a girlfriend, a family member, or even a job.

You should periodically analyze your life and closely examine anything that may be “taking” more than it “gives.” Everything from your diet to your job to your relationships are fair game. Anything that fits this criteria should be removed from your life ASAP.

And often the things that you’re afraid to examine are the ones that need to be looked at the most. Relationships will always be this way, for example. Whether it’s your best friend who’s trying to pull you down with him or your girlfriend who’s causing you endless anxiety, they’re never easy to cut off. Even if you logically know that it’s unhealthy for your growth and development, there are emotions involved and this can make ending it seem almost impossible.

With that being said, here are six basic habits that are easy to identify, almost always bad for your development, and somewhat easy to remedy. They're all positive habits, meaning I didn't include things like NOT lifting weights or NOT reading books. Those are things you should START doing, but this list focuses on things you should STOP doing.

1. Watching Porn

From erectile dysfunction to social anxiety and lowered sex drive, the reported costs of masturbating to internet porn are numerous. And what are the benefits? Instant sexual release and learning about sex are the only two I can think of. And you can achieve the first without having to watch porn. At the end of the day, this bad habit can only "take" more than it can "give," so stop making excuses and cut it off.

2. Eating Shitty Food

Shitty foods mean something different to each of us. I'm lactose intolerant so milk and cheese are shitty for me. Bread, pasta, and other gluten products are shitty for a Celiac. You need to determine what foods cause you bloating, constipation, diarrhea, or general lethargy and then stop eating them. It's like putting regular gas in a Ferrari—it might run but it's destroying the inside of the engine. Some foods that fuck everybody up equally include fried foods and foods high in artificial sugars.

3. Playing Video Games

Video games are addictive because they give you a false sense of growth. You start to identify leveling up your WoW character with actually growing and developing your self. Your neurotransmitters and dopamine levels become intrinsically tied to your progress in a virtual world instead of the real world. Sure, if you only play video games for a couple hours a week to blow off some steam, they might be "giving" more than they "take," but this is rare—most people get addicted to this shit.

4. Watching TV Shows

This is similar to video games. While you won't experience personal growth by watching 20 episodes straight of Lost or whatever the popular show today is, you will start to live in an alternate reality. And that's what it is, at the end of the day—an escape from reality. And again, this is good in small doses. I get lost in Game of Thrones once a year. But you don't want to be that guy who watches every show and talks about the characters like they're his real friends and coworkers. Live your life, my friend.

5. Browsing The Internet

I don't think I need to convince you of this. Endlessly browsing sites like Facebook, Instagram, and Reddit is basically crumpling your free time up and throwing it in the fucking garbage can.

6. Living With Your Parents

This isn't something that you do, like the other items on this list, but it undoubtedly "takes" more than it "gives." You'll never be fully independent until you're living in your own apartment or house, paying your own bills, and scheduling your own day. Yes, there's something to be said for helping your parents out, but you don't need to live with them to accomplish this. When living alone your mindset will be different, and it will manifest itself directly though how you think, act, and feel about yourself.

Building good habits is just as important as avoiding bad ones. Check out my new habit-building course "28 Days to Alpha" by clicking here.

Read More: How To Avoid The 3 Worst Qualities Of The Beta Male

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

How To Stand Up To Abusive U.S. Customs Officials And Win

October 20, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

It’s a familiar ordeal for any American who’s ever traveled abroad. Every U.S. citizen with the temerity to explore lands unknown is forced into a grueling, humiliating interrogation with Customs and Border Protection (CBP) officials when they return. CBP agents treat returning Americans like criminal defendants, grilling you on everything from what you did abroad to where you’re staying in the U.S. (despite the fact that since you’re a citizen, where you live is none of their business). Even Americans who cross into Canada by car are subjected to warrantless searches of their cars and computers when they come back.

The ostensible purpose of this police state thuggery—protecting Americans from terrorism and criminality—is a total joke. Consider that CBP was completely unable to stop a Liberian national with Ebola from entering the country and infecting everyone he came into contact with. The reality is that U.S. customs is staffed by incompetent goons who only care about lording their power over the little people. Rent-a-cops on the public payroll. The CBSA (Canadian Border Services Agency) is run by the same kinds of dweebs: CBSA personnel usually end up there because they failed to qualify for either the military or the RCMP.

But you don’t have to take their abuse. Here’s how to assert your rights as a U.S. citizen in the face of fascism.

You Have The Right To Remain Silent

CBP officials have far less power over U.S. citizens than you think. The only questions of theirs that you are required to answer are ones pertaining to establishing your citizenship. By showing them your passport, you are fulfilling this requirement. You're also required to hand in a written customs declaration indicating any items that you acquired while abroad. That's it. You do not have to cooperate with customs officials beyond this. You don't even have to answer the "Business or pleasure?" question, seeing as you're already required to do that on your declaration form.

Granted, like all petty dictators, CBP thugs will make your life hell if you dare to defy their "power." Therefore, when it comes to reminding a customs commissar of your rights, answer their questions with this:

> I decline to answer your questions.

This is how you draw a line in the sand. If the official presses you, inform them that you know your rights as a U.S. citizen and that you don't have to answer their questions.

Now, even if you refuse to be interrogated, you still need to comply with CBP's physical requests. For example, if an official tells you to go somewhere or do something, don't argue, just do it. What you are not obligated to do is answer their invasive and rude questions. While you may be held in "Secondary" for the "crime" of not submitting to authoritarian abuse, CBP will eventually have to release you, because federal and international law prohibits them from denying U.S. citizens re-entry.

Why Defy Customs Officials?

Because asking those questions is how CBP finds suckers to throw in prison. The average customs official is Dwight Schrute with a badge, completely incompetent at his job, as the Thomas Eric Duncan case shows. Because they have no clue how to catch real criminals, CBP officials seek to arrest law-abiding U.S. citizens to meet their monthly quotas.

By answering these seemingly innocuous questions, you are giving CBP the rope by which they will hang you. Customs officials are not your friends, they are police officers who are trained to identify criminals (even if they're terrible at it). Even if you are completely honest, an officer can trip you up with redundant questioning, you might forget certain details, or the officer might just outright make shit up. Even if you can beat the charges in court, the process is the punishment: merely having to defend yourself against a bogus charge will drain your time, energy and finances.

The only way to protect yourself from corrupt border commissars is to refuse to answer their questions. By reminding them of your right to remain silent, you deny them ammunition to use against you.

Furthermore, the principle of living in a free society is antithetical to the abusive, harsh treatment U.S. customs officials mete out to their own countrymen. The foundation of Anglo-American law is Blackstone's formulation, the idea that it is better to let the guilty go free than to punish even one innocent. Even if CBP's methods were effective in apprehending terrorists, drug smugglers, child molesters and other criminals, they would still be immoral and wrong.

And don't give me some argument about how the poor, suffering customs agents are "just doing their jobs." As much as I hate to Godwin this article, that excuse didn't fly at Nuremberg and it won't fly now. If you willingly participate in evil acts, you are morally culpable regardless of your motivations. If the "good" CBP officers don't want to be blamed for the excesses of their colleagues, they can either work to change the system from within or get another job.

Give Me Liberty, Unless It Inconveniences Me

Some people will no doubt protest this post by saying "It's just a couple of questions, I don't get why you're making a big deal about it!" or "What about all the people in the line behind you that you'll be holding up?"

Are you serious? Our Founding Fathers fought a revolution to be free of foreign tyranny and you're telling me you can't be bothered to expend the slightest bit of effort to maintain the rights they won for you? "Well, gosh darn it, I'd sure love to fight the police state, but not if I have to miss the new episode of Pawn Stars!"

Newsflash: if you're not willing to defend your rights, you don't deserve to have them. It's this kind of apathy that has aided the American police state. Back when the first TSA regulations were being implemented after 9/11, people justified them by saying that "It's just a little extra screening, it's no big deal!" and "If you're not a criminal, you have nothing to fear." More than a decade later and not only is the TSA still around, they now get to grope you, shoot X-rays into your body, and confiscate your contact lens solution for being too big.

If more Americans were willing to say no to government abuse, the police state would lose all of its power overnight. You can be a cowardly sheep if you want, but I'm not going to give up my freedom without a fight. Your willingness to get raped in the ass doesn't require me to drop trou and grease up along with you.

The Land Of The Cowardly And The Home Of The Slave

Some ~~government shills~~ commenters will no doubt claim that foreign immigration officers are far more abusive. Again, this is a lie.

I spent the past three months in the Philippines. When I landed in July, the immigration officer asked me a grand total of one question—"How long are you staying?"—before stamping my passport. I then collected my suitcase from baggage claim and handed in my customs declaration. The process took all of fifteen minutes.

Coming back to the U.S., my carry-on bag was flagged by both Philippine and Japanese airport security because of a metal microphone I was carrying. Not only were the officers courteous when they searched my bag, they actually helped me put it back together when they were done. In contrast, when I was departing from Chicago last week, the TSA official at O'Hare who searched my bag accused me of having a gun, refused to help me clean up the mess he'd made, and yelled at me for not being able to get my things off his table fast enough.

The reality is that only the U.S. and Canada—supposedly free, first-world countries—feel the need to treat travelers like international fugitives. For example, my friend told me about how when she and her husband took a trip to Niagara Falls recently, they made a wrong turn while driving and ended up on the border crossing to Ontario. Rather than let them turn around and go home (as was possible up until a couple of years ago), the customs agents forced them to get in line to seek entry. Because her husband forgot his passport (because they weren't planning on crossing the border), the Canadians arrested and interrogated them for hours before letting them leave.

The Fight For Liberty Begins With You

Freedom is not a privilege granted by the government, but the product of the actions and beliefs of a people. If you're not willing to fight for your rights, the forces of tyranny will strip them from you, one humiliating interrogation and patdown at a time. Want to prove you're serious about keeping America a free nation? Start by refusing to submit to the vagaries of the police state. Each little act of disobedience will make the world a better place.

Read More: The Frenchman Who Took A Stand Against Socialism

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Ezra Klein’s Anti-Male Hatred On Vox (UPDATE 2)

October 20, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In response to California’s “Yes Means Yes” rape bill, Ezra Klein has shared a chilling anti-male article where he stated his desire for men to live in fear, be robbed of their legal due process, and suffer punishments even if innocent of any wrongdoing. His opinion was published on Vox.com, a news site which he founded and currently serves as editor-in-chief. Vox receives 20 million unique visitors a month and is sponsored by the Mastercard corporation. It is part of the Vox Media network which also operates The Verge and Polygon.

Background on California’s “Yes Means Yes” law

On September 28, 2014, California passed bill SB-967, which applies to college students and re-defines consensual sex. Male students will now have to prove that women gave them “affirmative consent.” The bill contains the following:

> Lack of protest or resistance does not mean consent, nor does silence mean consent.

If a male student is unable to prove that affirmative consent was provided by a woman he had sexual intercourse with, a college tribunal may expel him without police or judicial involvement. This means that tribunals are now legally authorized to use a new definition of sex to expel and punish male students without involving the courts.

Affirmative consent is an entirely new concept that has not yet been tested in any international court system. Here is a licensed California lawyer’s interpretation of the bill:

> To convict a man of rape, the prosecution must show you overcame the girl’s consent. This standard was generally applied to college students accused of rape > as well. No longer.

> To kick a young man out of college, a kangaroo court only has to show she wasn't that into it.

Another possible scenario that could expel a male student is if the woman was sober and conscious but quiet during the sex act. She could later claim that she did not give affirmative consent and, based on that definition, have the male successfully kicked out of school, effectively ending his education and greatly hampering his future economic potential.

Ezra Klein's take on the Yes Means Yes law

On October 13, 2014, Klein published "Yes Means Yes" is a terrible law, and I completely support it" on Vox.com It contains several disturbing passages which reveal a vehemently anti-male viewpoint.

> The Yes Means Yes law is a necessarily extreme solution to an extreme problem. Its overreach is precisely its value.
>
> […]
>
> If the Yes Means Yes law is taken even remotely seriously it will settle like a cold winter on college campuses, throwing everyday sexual practice into doubt and creating a haze of fear and confusion over what counts as consent. This is the case against it, and also the case for it. Because for one in five women to report an attempted or completed sexual assault means that everyday sexual practices on college campuses need to be upended, and men need to feel a cold spike of fear when they begin a sexual encounter.
>
> […]
>
> Critics worry that colleges will fill with cases in which campus boards convict young men (and, occasionally, young women) of sexual assault for genuinely ambiguous situations. Sadly, that's necessary for the law's success. It's those cases — particularly the ones that feel genuinely unclear and maybe even unfair, the ones that become lore in frats and cautionary tales that fathers e-mail to their sons — that will convince men that they better Be Pretty Damn Sure [in gaining consent].

In unambiguous language, Klein states the following:

1. An unfair law is precisely what we need to fix a problem that is based on flawed rape studies. It is not true that "1 in 4" or "1 in 5" women will be raped ([1] [2] [3] [4]), and the Department of Justice's own figures show sexual assault is clearly on the steady decline.

2. Men should feel fear, confusion, and anxiety when entering any sexual relationship with a woman. This is an alarming viewpoint that is more commonly possessed by far-left extremists known as social justice warriors, whose totalitarian methods to date have been the marginalization of men through censorship and economic punishments. Klein is advocating for dystopian gender relations where men must be constantly worried about having their lives ruined before every act of sex, bringing new meaning to the term "sexual anxiety."

3. It is acceptable for innocent men to be punished by quasi-legal tribunals in order to stoke fear and apprehension in all men. Due process is a legal concept that has been used in Western societies since the Roman era, but Klein wants to remove this legal requirement for men. This would create an unfair and likely unconstitutional two-tiered legal system where both due process and the presumption of innocence is removed for men but still applicable for women.

Even among the most radical of feminists who claim that all heterosexual sex is rape, it is tough to find a more anti-male and misandrist viewpoint than what Klein has written, and even Klein's media peers have chimed in to show dismay in his position ([1], [2], [3], [4]). One journalist went as far as to describe him as going "off the rails."

I looked into Klein's background a bit further and what I found suggests that this opinion is not an isolated outlier but a consistent pattern that overlaps with far-left extremists known as social justice warriors.

Is Ezra Klein a social justice warrior (SJW)?

I've previously studied the SJW movement. Here is a brief encapsulation:

> Social justice warriors believe in an extreme left-wing ideology that combines feminism, progressivism, and political correctness into a totalitarian system that attempts to censor speech and promote fringe lifestyles while actively discriminating against men, particularly white men. They are the internet activist arm of Western progressivism that acts as a vigilante group to ensure compliance and homogeny of far left thought.
>
> […]
>
> SJW's utilize censorship, discriminate against white men, and disagree with basic human rights concerning due process that has existed in the Western legal canon for centuries. They are against free speech as granted by the US Constitution and don't believe that all men are created equal. They disregard science and wrongly apply labels, accusations, and criminal allegations to those who dare cross their path.

Based on this definition, Klein has left a trail that suggests he is such an extremist.

1. He used an SJW slur against the #GamerGate movement

Gamer Gate is a decentralized movement that aims to expose corruption and nepotism in gaming journalism at sites like Kotaku, Rock Paper Shotgun, and Polygon, which happens to also be owned by the Vox Media network. It began after the revelation that a female SJW developer had sex with influential members of the gaming journalist community in order to enrich herself while pushing an SJW agenda.

A common tactic of SJW's is to label an opinion or cause as "sexist," "misogynist," or "racist" to shut down all support for it, as Klein does above.

2. He started a secret email list called JournoList to push a leftist agenda

He began JournoList in order to better coordinate and manufacture a leftist narrative on major news sites. Not surprisingly, emails within the list display a conspiratorial tone. JournoList was so controversial when it was revealed that it cost the job of his co-worker and friend David Weigel at the Washington Post.

Klein's JournoList was apparently used a template for gaming journalists in their own secret list: GameJournoPros. Many members of the secret gaming list have been under the microscope by Gamer Gate for their corrupt practices and insistence on pushing an SJW agenda that is irrelevant to gaming. Just like JournoList, GameJournoPros was dismantled after being publicly revealed (by journalist Milo Yiannopoulos).

3. He liberally applied the "sexist" label to those critical of a woman

Klein used the "sexist" label to critics of Janet Yellen when she was nominated to lead the Federal Reserve.

Like previously mentioned, such ad-hominem labels are meant to shut down rational discourse and valid concerns instead of factually addressing the issue at hand.

4. He insinuates that racism could be eased if white people offer financial compensation

When working for the Washington Post, he stops one step short of taking on the position that whites living today must correct the wrongs of the past by compensating minorities and ushering in even more policies:

> The idea that racism is over — or even just that policy should be colorblind — has a clear winner: the group that benefited from the years of racism and that now doesn't have to pay any compensatory costs.

Klein is one of the more hardline social justice warriors in that he directly advocates for strong governmental intervention to improve societal problems that is perceived in his mind but not necessarily backed up by data.

5. He compares Islamic terrorists in America to Christians

He stated in an interview that radicalization of Muslims is not a problem before highlighting the violence of Christian adherents.

The most relevant portion is from 1:53 to 2:25

This interview aired two years before the Boston Bombings, where two radical Muslims from Chechnya killed four civilians and injured 280 others. A common SJW tactic is to embrace all religions but Catholicism to exhibit their disdain for Western values.

6. He insinuates that not discriminating against majority race job applicants is "really dangerous"

In an interview for NY Mag to promote the launch of Vox, Klein shares how he actively discriminates against certain applicants for the sole purpose in creating a diverse newsroom.

> We focused on [diversity] early on but didn't succeed in the way that we should have. We had some hires that we really hoped would work that fell through for totally normal reasons and then we didn't correct quickly enough. Look, you have to be committed to it. If you're not, you get into the problem we began to have: People feel that maybe it's not a culture that cares about [diversity]. And that's really dangerous.

SJW's view white people as having the most amount of privilege, meaning that they can be actively discriminated against to correct any imbalances that they feel or perceive. In SJW ideology, equality can never be achieved without open discrimination against majority groups.

The MasterCard corporation is currently sponsoring Klein's extreme anti-male views

MasterCard currently has a sponsorship agreement with Vox.com to display two advertising banners on every article, including Klein's opinion piece where he states that men should live in fear and not receive due process.

It is unfair to expect MasterCard to read every article on Vox.com, so I emailed their public relations team 24 hours ago as a representative of Return Of Kings to ask them if they were aware that their brand is splashed besides Klein's anti-male writing. (The email was sent to , , , , )

As of publication, they have not responded, forcing me to conclude that they are aware of Klein's position and wish to continue sponsoring it. If you have a MasterCard, you are free to ask them what agenda they are trying to push by supporting Klein's work.

Ezra Klein has the right to exercise his free speech to promote an SJW brand of anti-male hatred, and MasterCard is free to sponsor it, but I personally feel uncomfortable using the two MasterCards I'm in possession of. Every time I use one at the register, I'm essentially giving approval to Klein's view that that men should endure hardship and suffering without being guilty or even charged of any crime. As SJW ideology creeps into the mainstream, we have to start asking ourselves difficult questions about using consumer products that sponsor those who want to marginalize our role in society or outright ruin our lives.

UPDATE:

I can no longer find Mastercard's ads on Vox.com, even though they were present while writing this article over the weekend. They have not replied to the inquiry I sent on Sunday afternoon, so either they removed their ads quietly since then or it's a coincidence that their exclusive campaign run on Vox ended after I emailed them. The current sponsor is, ironically, a video game produced by Take-Two Interactive.

UPDATE 2:

A reader noted that Mastercard ads continue to run on the site.

Read Next: The Anti-Male Commercial

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

An Epic Poem Of Discovery And Adventure

October 20, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Towards the end of the sixteenth century, Portugal's mercantile empire began to cede its primacy in world affairs to the Spanish and Dutch; and like Spain after her, she was unable to convert the rapidity of her material gains to sustained economic influence. Lisbon was choked with corrupt officials, living off royal patronage, while avaricious merchants stacked their reis against a backdrop of inequality and exploitation. Yet Portugal shared with Spain a passion of blood and creed, and her empire still commanded respect for its cartographic extent and majesty of conception. It was an age of overseas conquest, lusty adventures, and lives of intense florescence but short duration.

It was against this tapestry that Portugal's greatest poet appeared. Luiz Vaz de Camões, much like Spain's Miguel de Cervantes, illustrates the truth of the maxim that one cannot write unless one has first lived. And live he did. He was born in 1524 at either Lisbon or Coimbra (we are not certain) from a father who derived an uncertain income from seafaring. He died in a shipwreck off Goa, in India, soon after his son Luiz was born, leaving his progeny with little more than hope and ambition.

We do not know the scope of his education, but it must have been one rich in religion and the classical authors, for his great poem, Os Lusiadas (The Lusiads), rings with both Catholic solemnity and Virgilian grandeur. As so often happened to young men of that era who were rich in eloquence but poor in family connections and influence, he offended some petty official and was sent into exile, first in Tagus and then in Ceuta.

He seems to have joined, or to have been made to join, the army at this point; at Ceuta he lost one of his eyes in either a military engagement or a duel. He then appears back in Lisbon, where he was jailed for eight months for his participation in a brawl while protecting some friends. Like Cervantes, he must have been relieved finally to take to the open ocean and find an outlet for his ambition; at age twenty-nine (1553) he shipped as a soldier aboard a vessel bound for India. Resentful of his sufferings in his native land, he is reported to have quoted Scipio Africanus as he departed by saying, "Ingrata patria, non possidebis ossa mea!" (Ungrateful country, you will not have my bones). It was on this six month voyage, in his free moments, that he began the composition of one of the world's greatest works of epic poetry.

Camões was a soldier was well as a poet; and in India, the East Indies, Macao, and off the African and South Arabian coasts, he took part in numerous pitched battles as a member of the flagship of Fernão Alvares Cabral. He was known by the sobriquet of "Trincafortes" (Swashbuckler), and one suspects that the epithet was well-deserved. Through all of the privation, adventure, combat, and suffering, he kept working steadily on his poem, a work that he hoped would "increase the glory of Portugal and make Smyrna envious despite her being the birthplace of Homer." One sonnet written in Africa boasted that he wielded a pen in one hand and a sword in the other ("One hand the pen, and the other the sword employed").

Many stories are told of his adventures in the eastern seas: one tradition has him swimming ashore after a shipwreck near Cambodia with his manuscript in his mouth, preferring to rescue it in preference to his Chinese mistress Dinamene. He was apparently imprisoned many times for debt and general misbehavior, freed every time by sympathetic friends or superiors; we even find him marooned in Mozambique for nearly two years, his pecuniary miseries forestalling any return to Europe.

His poem finally found print in 1572, and King Sebastian found fit to provide him a modest pension, probably more for his services in the Far East than for his literary efforts. He died in 1580 at the age of fifty six (some sources given conflicting dates), heartbroken at the 1578 defeat of the Portuguese in the Battle of Alcácer Quibir.

His poem shaped the language of his country as much as Dante did Italian or Shakespeare did English. Its general theme is the epic voyage of Vasco da Gama to India; but into this historical narrative, Camões grafts gods, auguries, portents, storms, and similar Homeric flourishes to produce something strangely original. Those of us familiar with the modern rhythms of Brazilian Portuguese will find the antiquated language nearly inaccessible without the help of a decent translation. But even through the medium of translation, the grandeur and passionate resonance is irrepressible. The opening of the first canto has echoes of Virgil:

> ARMS and the Heroes, who from Lisbon’s shore,
> Through seas where sail was never spread before,
> Beyond where Ceylon lifts her spicy breast,
> And waves her woods above the watery waste,
> With prowess more than human forced their way
> To the fair kingdoms of the rising day:
> What wars they waged, what seas, what dangers passed,
> What glorious empire crowned their toils at last,
> Ventrous I sing, on soaring pinions borne,

> And all my country's wars the song adorn;
> What kings, what heroes of my native land
> Thundered on Asia's and on Africa's strand:
> Illustrious shades, who levelled in the dust
> The idol-temples and the shrines of lust.[1]

The Lusiads, said Voltaire, has "a sort of epic poetry never heard before. No heroes are wounded in a thousand different ways, no woman enticed away, and the world overturned for her cause." It is a poem unabashedly singing the glories of travel and adventure, of lands, nymphs, and maidens conquered; its pages are not darkened by tiresome theologies or rhetorical rants, by geographical digressions or lists of names and families. Camões, like Joseph Conrad three hundred years later, had lived these oriental adventures, and when he sang of them, he sang of himself. It is the most triumphant poem ever written.

As we recite his lines to ourselves, we are conscious of a mystic connection, reaching through the ages, which all great travelers somehow share. In the halls of this pantheon we will find Columbus, Ibn Battuta, Hanno the Carthaginian, Magellan, Vasco da Gama, and a hundred others. Their deeds made them great, and their writings conferred on them immortality.

He was granted a modest pension in his final years, content to settle down, after having lived enough for ten lives. His fame grew steadily, a reward after a lifetime of struggle. One of his last letters contained this line: Em fim accaberey à vida, e verràm todos que fuy afeiçoada a minho patria. ("I am ending the course of my life, and the world will see how I loved my country"). Another reported statement by him, just before his death, struck a philosophic tone: "Who has seen on so small a theatre as my poor bed, such a representation of the disappointments of Fortune! And I, as if she could not herself subdue me, I have yielded and become of her party; for it were wild audacity to hope to surmount such accumulated evils.”

The end came quietly. To Camões, Fortune had both granted and taken away. But in the balance, he had managed to tip the scales in his favor. For as long as the Portuguese language is spoken, and as long as there is a Portugal, Camões and his poem will endure forever.

[1] William J. Mickle, The Lusiad, Or the Discovery of India, London: George Bell & Sons, 1877.

Read More: How To Build A Dynasty

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Has Game Made Me A Better Lawyer?

October 21, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

I'm currently in the middle of the most intense, tiring, yet intellectually stimulating stretch of my legal career. For anyone who is familiar with civil litigation, trial rarely—and I mean rarely—happens. Most cases settle before trial because there is just too much uncertainty, and the cost of going to trial is astronomical. This month I had not one, but three trials.

Modesty being my forte, I will unabashedly state that I am a pretty good lawyer. I've previously moved up the ranks of a law firm pretty quick and have had judges, clients, and co-workers compliment my abilities. But infrequently do you get to see all your skills come into play at the same time, which would be the aforementioned engagement of trial. As they happen so rarely (my last one was in 2009), I have a means to measure my growth subjectively.

We often talk about how game translates into other areas of your life. For example, a few months ago some light flirting (and I do mean light) got me a free upgrade to business class on a flight to Europe. My game journey began a few years ago and while it will never end, after a lot of effort I have grown considerably both as a man in general and specifically in my ability to interact with women. But aside from the general statement that fronts this paragraph, how does game specifically translate? Well, let's compare and find out.

Preparation and Chance

You leave nothing to chance when trying to bed a woman. Before a date, or a night out, I go through an entire routine and make sure everything is accounted for and I am well-prepared. I am groomed from head to toe, shirt ironed, bed made, condoms ready, dog walked, bathroom clean. I make sure I have enough cash on me so I don't have to use a credit card and await a tab if she is ready to go. I pay attention to logistics to make sure I am close to home base. Music, additional drinks of varied kinds are setup ahead of time. Essentially, when things start happening I try to leave as little to chance as possible and arm myself to be ready to handle anything.

In court, and especially at trial, you are at war. Every little detail matters, and the more prepared you are the better you will be. Have all your exhibits ready, numbered and organized. Know all your witnesses' previous testimonies and be ready to impeach them if they change their stories. Laptop powered fully, notepad with multiple color pens that correlate to multiple thought chains you will have. Realize how much time you have before the next break because the opposing attorney will coach his witness if you are doing a cross-examination (conversely, you may want to coach your own witness during a break). Just like in game, you need to be fully prepared at all times.

Being Calm

When I first started approaching random girls, I was a nervous as can be. Move onto dates and the same nervousness would seep out of my skin. Eventually after many many approaches and dates, I no longer was nervous. I would be calm in all aspects of dealing with girls.

I've noticed that now when I go to court, I am as calm as it gets. I'm almost happy to engage in argument, to publicly speak to the judge and whoever else may be sitting in the courtroom. As I look at other witnesses and the other attorneys at trial, I can see they are still nervous. Fidgety hands, inability to contain their emotions, and so on. This ability to remain cool is very powerful and makes you come across as confident and knowledgeable.

Handling Curveballs

With any girl you are trying to bed, whether following a date or within a night out, you will be thrown curveballs. She will tell you she doesn't drink when you go meet for drinks. You have invited her over for dinner and was planning on making chicken and she's a vegetarian. You find a random girl at the bar and her friend grabs her on your way to the taxi ride that was going to lead you to banging her silly. It happens a lot, and to all of us, and you have to be almost military-like in your counterattack to deal with such occurrences. The more I dealt with them, the better I got.

The same thing happens at trial. I'm about to use a piece of evidence and the opposing attorney tries to exclude it. The Judge starts asking questions of my own witness and ruins my flow and comfort. My staff mislabeled a key exhibit. The number of times I've had curveballs thrown my way with game has made me both sharper to react and figure out a solution, and also remain calm in the process. You would be amazed how many attorneys simply crack when one small thing does not pan out the way they expected it to.

Observing Others

On a date, I am observing all her actions. Does she flip her hair, does she retract upon my touch, what words does she use when speaking and how does she react to my words and stories? Taking of a sum of all these observances I gauge how interested she is in both me and sex.

The same applies to night game. I observe and see if a girl is standing in a closed manner, who she is there with, if she is drinking wine, beer, or tequila. Is she alone while her friend is talking to a guy? All these observations will help me assess where to focus my efforts.

Again, the translation to the legal world is substantial. This is especially so with respect to witnesses and other attorneys. I listen carefully to their words. I watch their eyes to see if they dart around when they speak, indicating truthfulness (or more commonly lack thereof). I watch the judge to see if I am losing him to boredom, or if he is giving me clues as to what he thinks is important by the intensity of his stare. Know your surroundings and you will be much better off than your competition.

Conclusion

To answer the question posed in the title, unequivocally yes. And this is not surprising. Many men can handle themselves in all aspects of life but freeze up when dealing with women. So if you start to master this one aspect of life, which some view as insanely difficult, everything else will seem easy. Couple this with the similarities explained above between practicing law and engaging in game, and I can in all honesty say it has made me a better lawyer.

Read Next: 5 Reasons Being A Lawyer Sucks

L.D. Hume
L.D. Hume, formerly known as Law Dogger, is an attorney and the litigation partner of his law firm. A traditionalist at heart, he travels often in an attempt to expose himself to as many cultures across the globe as possible. His column runs every so often and he can be found on Twitter as well.

5 Reasons To Have Wine On A Date

October 21, 2014 | by Mark Law | Link | Original Link

Whether you are sharing a beer with your mates or cocktails with the ladies, alcohol has truly become one of the defining features of the human experience. Today we are faced with a plethora of choice from craft beers to exotic spirits. With so much variety we should feel empowered, but more often than not we see it as an obstacle, ultimately choosing to fall back on our old favourites.

In the past decade another competitor has been thrown into the ring: Wine. With reds, whites, rosés, sparkling, dessert, and fortified styles on offer from all around the world, there is now even more diversity. By being aware of a few key points, you will find that wine actually offers a lot of value.

Before I begin, a few points to consider:

i) This article is written in the context of being on a second or third date. Wine is more conducive to creating a casual social experience and building rapport. Anyone who tells you to splash out $100+ on a California Cabernet to attract some girl's attention is trying to sell you something.

ii) This article is not arguing that wine is somehow better than spirits or beers. I'm partial to craft beers and the occasional Old-Fashioned myself. There's a time, place and occasion for everything.

With that taken care of, let's get into the 5 reasons why getting a bottle of wine is a good bet:

1. Wine Is Classier

Wine has benefited from a great marketing campaign for the past few decades, and there's no denying that its public image is tied to the finer things in life.

Imagine you are in a bar or lounge. You spot a man having drinks with a woman. If they're drinking beers, they're probably just friends hanging out. If they're drinking cocktails, the guy wants to get laid and the girl might just be fishing for drinks.

But if they're drinking wine? They're a couple of people having a good time, getting to know each other, and in a few hours the guy might tell his date "Hey, I've got this cool wine I brought back from Italy that you can't find anywhere else, let's bounce back to my place…"

Don't be a snob. Relax, be social and act with grace.

2. Wine Is Cheaper

If you're similar to me and like to have a good time, you're not just going to order one Old Fashioned and call it a night. You'll be ordering a Mojito next, followed by a Margarita, then a Daiquiri for dessert. Things add up if you feel the situation calls for buying drinks for your date as well.

After doing some research it seems the average cost of a cocktail is around $10. At more upscale places this could quickly rise to $15-$20. You're looking at spending $40-$80 at the least.

In contrast, most venues will have wines available for around $10-$15 by-the-glass. But the secret to getting value lies in buying full bottles. The full-bottle price of these offerings are usually three to four times the glass price, yet you can get up to five pours from one bottle. In effect, ordering a bottle is like taking advantage of a promotion—buy four glasses, get one free.

So if you're committed to spending $40-$80 anyway, a bottle of wine (or two) will take you a long way. Don't be sidetracked by the more expensive offerings on the list, as price is no guarantee of quality.

3. Fewer Interruptions

Imagine you're sitting on a lounge with your date. You're having a good time, talking about love and the secrets of the universe when she suddenly points out that both your cocktail glasses are empty. You take hers and say "I'll be right back."

The line to the bar is three people deep. You're there for what feels like an hour. By the time you've gotten your two Vodka Martinis you turn around and begin to walk back… only to see your date being chatted up by some 6'3" suited-up son-of-a-bitch. And from the way you see her giggling at his every word, she's enjoying it.

And what are you doing? Standing there holding onto two Vodka Martinis like a drunken chump, that's what. Sure, maybe you're Don Draper you can go up and tell the guy not-so-politely to leave, but the love bubble you had painstakingly built has popped, and the atmosphere has changed.

A bottle of wine solves this problem simply. Her glass is empty? Smoothly pick up the bottle and pour her another measure.

4. You Drink More

I've mentioned before that you can typically get up to five pours from one bottle. What if I told you that it could be stretched to 8-10 glasses?

All you have to do is pour less each time. I like to use two or three fingers to measure the height of the liquid in the glass. With practice, you don't even need the fingers to measure, free pouring perfectly each time.

If anyone (like your date) asks why you are drinking so slowly, tell them you just like to take your time to appreciate the wine. Less liquid in the glass means you can swirl more vigorously, releasing more aromas. And why is everyone in a rush to drink? Why not slow down and have a good time? Smile confidently as you say this.

Make a game out of it. Teach her how to engage the senses. What colours do you see? What do you smell? What do you taste? How does it feel in your mouth (heh)?

5. You Drink Less

Most wines hover around 10%-15% alcohol by volume. Compare this to most spirits which regularly go over the 40% mark.

If you're on a date, you don't want to impair your judgement just because you've had one drink too many. Just one badly calibrated move can result in you scaring the cat. After a few shots of tequila, your calibration might be off. Is now the right time to go for the kiss? Have you built up enough rapport? Was that her licking her lips or just a nervous tic?

With wine, you are free to moderate your intake by pouring less (Tip #4, above), basking in that comfortable zone between mundane sobriety and total inebriation. Have a conversation. Flirt a little. Sit back, relax, and smell the rosés. There's more to life and seduction than furiously banging out one-night stands in club bathrooms.

Conclusion

While this article is framed around the scenario of you being on a third date with an attractive young lady, you will find it just as applicable if you're having a business lunch with an important client or a good time with friends. Your only problem now is finding a wine that you will actually enjoy. No one wants to order the second-cheapest bottle on the list and end up being disappointed. For more information about what styles of wine are right for you, check out my Personal Wine Consultation service.

Read More: A Basic Guide To Selecting Wine For Women

Mark Law

Mark Law is a WSET-trained aficionado and wine consultant who respects wine and hates people who claim they “love” wine, because love has become so overused a word it has lost all meaning. He is the author of The 7 Key Wine Concepts, founder of Consult Wine and has his own wine blog, Rational Wine. He is also on Twitter and Facebook

ROK Is Looking To Hire A GamerGate Correspondent

October 21, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

GamerGate is an internet movement that is attempting to clean up corruption and favoritism in gaming journalism on sites like Kotaku, Polygon, Rock Paper Shotgun, Gamasutra, and numerous others that have been pushing an extremist SJW agenda instead of reviewing games fairly. These sites have elevated women like Zoe Quinn and Anita Sarkeesian to professional victims who tear down gamers and label everything as misogynist instead of fostering real game development. Since all of the mainstream media is against GamerGate, this leaves a reporting void that ROK would like to fill.

What does ROK have to do with games?

ROK is a site that focuses on masculinity, travel, sex, and traditional gender roles. Gaming is not within our sphere. Out of 1,700 articles published here since we launched in November 2012, we have only written six about video games. These four are neutral in tone:

- 3 Ways Women Have Ruined Video Games (a bit prophetic)
- 4 Underrated Classic Video Games
- 5 Things I Learned From Call Of Duty
- Why Do Women Suddenly Want To Become Video Gamers

While two were critical of video gaming:

- Video Games Are Limiting Men's Potential
- The Western World Has An Addiction Problem

Video games are not our strength or passion and never will be, but there is one important thing that ROK and GamerGate have in common: we have the same enemy.

SJW's have plagued our corner of the sphere (often called the manosphere) for many years. Here are some recent examples:

- Feminist Laci Green Is Trying To Censor Youtube Without Consent
- Did British Blogger Sara C Nelson Commit Libel?
- Canadian Feminist Kyla Garvey Gets Two Firemen Fired
- Are Nitasha Tiku & Anil Dash Racist Against White Men?
- How To Defeat New York City Media Liberals
- Why Is WordPress Employee Kevin Conboy Threatening To Delete Blogs He Disagrees With?
- Anonymous Goes After Writer On Behalf Of Tumblr Feminists

Two years ago the Southern Poverty Law Center put me on a "misogyny" list, which feminists loudly celebrated at the time in the hopes that I would become scared and quit blogging.

The same people who are involved against GamerGate are familiar faces to us, making me realize how deep SJW's have infected various internet communities.

The enemy of my enemy is my friend

I personally don't play video games or know much about the current industry. I'd estimate that most ROK readers also don't play video games, but as of right now, we are fighting in the same cultural war against the same enemy. I believe a temporary bond would be prudent to defeat the far-left extremists who have corrupted gaming journalism and have been continuously attempting to censor and attack ROK's promotion of free speech and male heterosexuality. Even before GamerGate, I possessed no ill will to video gamers. Their hobby does not interfere with my ideals like SJW's do, who have labeled both me and ROK with every slur under the sun.

I also want to make clear that GamerGate is not our movement, and I do not want to lead, direct, or organize any aspect of it. I simply want to provide ROK's bullhorn to disseminate pro-GamerGate news, because as of right now, it's extremely difficult to get summaries of what's going on without having to spend a lot of time staying on top of tweets and random image or video postings. I also don't have the will to wade through GamerGate videos that can run well over 20 minutes in length.

Since ROK is a popular destination (1 million unique and 4 million page views a month), I'd like to introduce GamerGate to those who are not even gamers. That said, gamers must know that we promote a traditional masculinity that women and homosexuals may find disagreeable or even offensive. We completely understand if pro-GamerGate followers choose not to get their updates from us.

We're looking for one GamerGate correspondent

I'd like to hire one writer who can publish at least one article a week in the 800-1500 word range summarizing GamerGate news by highlighting the most recent developments in an orderly summary that is easy for casual observers of GamerGate to follow. Everything must be sourced on facts and credible sources, and you will not be allowed to bully, dox, or harass those who are against GamerGate. You will also be free to use the ROK name to conduct interviews and other press inquiries.

ROK is a modest operation. We have no corporate office and our writers—most of whom are anonymous—live throughout the world. Our pay structure is $20 per article plus up to $40 in bonuses per week. For this position, we're looking for someone who is passionate about GamerGate, plays videos games, is familiar with all the key industry figures, and can write clearly in plain language without unnecessary flourish or sensationalism. If you are interested, email me directly at Attach any writing samples if you have them.

It's understandable if gamers don't want to associate with a "misogynist" site like ROK, but I want to stress again that we don't want to become part of the GamerGate story. We simply want to provide accurate reporting on it to support the movement, because I fully stand by GamerGate and am hoping that it achieves its goals. If GamerGate loses then I fear our own battle with SJW's will end in defeat as well.

Read Next: How Social Justice Warriors Miss The Mark

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Misconceptions About White Guys With Asian Girls

October 21, 2014 | by jim soler | Link | Original Link

It is no secret that there is a good amount of fornication between white guys and Asian women these days, and there are no signs of this trend slowing down. It's hard to go out in a large American city nowadays and not see a white guy holding hands with an Asian girl. It's even getting to the point where people aren't surprised anymore if you tell them your girl is Asian, as if it's almost slightly expected. But that doesn't stop them from taking a second to look at you as if you've been infected with an incurable disease, otherwise known as yellow fever.

I am one those white guys whose immune system has been overrun by yellow fever. Yes, it is somewhat incurable. I also like to observe, listen, and attempt to understand the thought process of the mainstream. One thing I've learned over the years is that there is a lot of misinformation and myths associated with the white guy Asian woman saga. Here are 5 common misconceptions

1. Asian girls only hook up with white guys

If you are a white western feminist threatened by all the Asian girls taking your men, then you can relax. Most Asian girls are not interested in western men, and the ones that are also like non-white western men as well. If you are an angry white guy that thinks Asian women will love you because you are white, sorry to burst your bubble. Maybe in Korea or Japan during the 1990's, but it's 2014 dude. Get over yourself.

Global society has changed drastically. Everyone has high-speed internet, YouTube, and Facebook, and the world has been exposed ten times over. The truth is, guys of every color love Asian women and Asian chicks who adore western men are open to all backgrounds. Asian women often like western men because of the equal lifestyle it affords. Sure, it used to be only white guys and Asian women back in the day, but that was because they had only been exposed to white guys.

2. Asian girls hook up with creepy old white guys

Are there old guys in Thailand who have young girlfriends or old dudes in America married to some young, mail-order bride? Sure, of course there are. I've also seen young western women shacking up with old guys. The creepy old white guy and young Asian bride image has to stop. The reality is that there are tons of American guys in their twenties and thirties hooked up with a Japanese, Korean, or Chinese girl. Just take a stroll on a university campus and you will see a fair number of young, hot Asian women walking with their western boyfriends. The creepy old guy image is a stereotype mostly propagated by feminists.

3. Western men think Asian women are submissive and weak

This is another absurd misconception campaigned for by young, western feminists who have become bitter from a lack of attention. Personally, I don't think most western men think Asian girls are weak. Western women, on the other hand, just assume that all Asian women are submissive and weak and that is the only logical explanation as to why they are sought after by western men.

Let's just set the record straight. Sure, there are some submissive Asian girls in Asia, but these aren't usually the ones that go with western men. The Asian women I've met and ones that go with western men are rather polite and less dramatic, though "submissive" is the wrong word to describe them. It is this drama-free demeanor that gets them pegged by their western counterparts as being "submissive."

4. Asian women are just after a green card and money

Are there Asian women living in America with the hopes of securing a green card or financial security? Absolutely. Are there white, Black and Latina women shacked up with a guy right now because he has money or can help her get a job? Of course there are. So what is the difference if an Asian woman does it? At the end of the day, we live in a capitalistic system and a woman is a woman. In reality, most Asian girls are not after an American guy's money or papers. Women from Korea, Japan, and China are some of the most sincere, selfless, non-materialistic and educated people on the planet.

5. Western men date Asian girls because they can't get a REAL WOMAN

This one always makes me laugh. If by a "real women," you mean having a girl put you down in front of your friends at the drop of a hat, then I don't need a "real woman." If you mean a chick that will stop caring about her body and looks after you settle down, then it’s not so appealing. If you mean a girl whose idea of cooking involves canned food, microwaves, and constant complaining, then I can live without a “real woman.”

Actually, western men for the most part love Asian women because they are actually women. Maybe western women should starting Asian men, since both groups love to be demanding, unappreciative, and expect too much.

Read More: 5 Tips For Getting A Quality Foreign Woman

---

jim soler
Jim is a traveler and freelance writer that has lived in many countries and currently is traveling the world. He enjoys interacting with different cultures and stirring up interesting conversations.

8 Tips For Getting Laid More By Developing Your Sexual Presence

October 22, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Learning game is rather like learning a musical instrument. Technique can be taught – body language, what to say, and how to lead. Core "talent" – which in this case translates as sexual presence – can't. But it is the key element to attracting girls that you have in your arsenal.

When I see guys chatting up girls, it is almost always sexual presence, or intent, that is missing. So many times I've seen a man interacting with a woman, maybe saying something funny and making her laugh, but with no suggestion that he intends on – or is even capable of – ripping her clothes off and having sex with her. And yet this is exactly what he must do to be successful. The girl must sense immediately and without any question that he is a dominant, sexual man.

In both night game and daygame, the optimum state you can achieve is a kind of sexual trance, where you prowl around like a tiger eying its prey, ready to pounce. If you can get there then you will find that the importance of your "outer game" will diminish as girls are drawn to you on a primal level. If you've ever had the experience of making out with a girl in a club without even having spoken to her, or having sex within a few minutes of meeting, then it will have been because the degree of sexual presence you showed was sufficient to arouse her without any "pick-up" window-dressing.

So how do you become a ball of pent-up sexual energy? As I've said, this is difficult to teach as it needs to come from within. Every pick-up interaction is to some degree an expression of your inner-state at the time: every successful pick-up occurs when your sexual energy is potent and you have signaled this sufficiently to the girl.

This is easier for some guys than others. If you had a particularly conservative upbringing, and you are not comfortable with being sexual, then the curve is going to be steeper than for a former high school jock accustomed to getting blowjobs from co-eds after class. There are a few things that you can do to help get into the right state, however.

1. Swagger

As with many things in life, if you adopt certain external behaviors, then your mind will quickly catch up. One of the most fundamental ways in which you can demonstrate that you are a sexual man is through your body and the way you move. The way you walk through a bar or nightclub is critical.

Ensure that your head is high and your shoulders back at all times. Relax your shoulders so that your arms are hanging down casually by your sides. Shake them so that they feel loose and free. Walk forward, rotating your torso from side-to-side from your lower back. Walk with your legs wide apart, and your crotch slightly angled forward, as though you are being led by your cock. Angle your head up so that you look down slightly on each girl you pass. Your aim is to take up as much room as you can with a cocky, cavalier attitude. Imagine you are John Wayne in a cowboy movie.

This may feel unnatural: you should exaggerate your movements at first, until they become second nature. A lot of game is akin to acting. Imagine that you are a cocky, alpha guy (if you're not already) and move how that guy would move. Soon, it will be easy.

Girls have often commented on the way that I walk around as if I own the place. When I show sexual intent, therefore, I am congruent. It's a simple trick and very easy to pull off.

2. Lift

You will rarely read a manosphere blog or men's self-improvement book without lifting weights being advocated somewhere. The reason I mention it here is because it will help you with your posture, but mainly because it will boost your testosterone, thus increasing your sexual potency.

There are other sources where you can find specific information about working out. In my experience, though, compound exercises or exercises that target bigger muscles like bench press, shoulder press, dead lifts and squats give me a kind of high, making me feel masculine and sexually powerful. This is exactly the mood you need to be in when you go out to meet women.

Try lifting weights right before you hit the club. I guarantee it will lift your mood, you will feel more on-point, and this will be apparent to the girls you target.

3. Approach loads and loads of women

Once you're out, approach as many women as you can. In fact, you should never stop approaching. Do daygame and night game. Sure, daygame may yield fewer solid leads, but the one thing it does do when practiced consistently is it ensures that you are on-point. Do you really think a guy who talks to one hundred women in the street in a month is going to have a problem approaching some stuck-up hottie in a bar?

More importantly, the more girls I hit on the more sexually potent I feel. Strangely, it doesn't matter whether I get rejected or not. Even after a knock-back, I find myself feeling more in-state and more predatory than before. This communicates itself to the next girl I talk to.

Always be approaching. Look girls straight in the eye and allow your gaze to communicate your masculine sexual power. Be ruthless and unemotional. Negative reactions don't matter. You're not doing this to please people or to make friends. You're doing it to get laid. If a girl is rude or bitchy or says "but it was nice to meet you," simply turn your back on her and go on to the next. Keep grinding out the approaches and you will find the girls that are interested in you.

4. Watch strippers and porn and listen to hip-hop

Refute the tainted lessons of feminism. To be sexual with women you need to objectify them. You need to be able to visualize the cute girl in the woolly hat coming out of Whole Foods having a crazy, sweaty threesome with you.

The best way to do this? Expose yourself to material that presents girls as sex objects. Go to strip clubs (don't buy dances though – hit on the girls instead). Watch porn – in moderation. I know I risk getting some heat for saying that from the no-fap brigade, so here's a thought: watch it, but don't jerk off while you're doing so. This will help you get into the right mindset and remind you that girls are sexual creatures, while storing up desire that will spur you on when you're out meeting real women.

Hip-hop music, with its unapologetically sexual lyrics, is also great for getting you in the mood.

You need to shift your perception of women so that you see them as 80% sexual and 20% wholesome, rather than the other way around. Do this, and you will find that your interactions with them are much more charged.

5. …but don't fap (too much)

Don't masturbate too much. If possible, try to keep it to a couple of times a week. You need to maintain the balance between being so horny that you come across as desperate and being sated, pale, and moon-eyed after a wanking marathon, too exhausted to approach anyone. This will vary from guy to guy: find a balance that is right for you.

6. Assume her sexual attraction to you

This is key. Go into every interaction with the assumption that she is into you. This will give you permission to be sexual from the outset.

7. Push it further than you think you can

A recent Heartiste post confirmed that in the land of cock and pussy, the currency of over-confidence is essential. Be sexual with her more quickly than you think you can get away with – that is, look at her commandingly, with deep eye contact; touch her, hold her hand and kiss her early on; and drop in suggestive comments.

Of course, it goes without saying that you should never do anything against a girl's will. If she seems pissed off or upset then pull back immediately. My point is that it is your job as a man to show sexual intent and to lead the interaction in the right direction to your timetable.

8. Learn to deal with feelings of incongruity

For many of us, showing sexual intent and presenting ourselves as sexual beings can feel uncomfortable, especially if we are not used to it. After all, the feminine-primary culture we were brought up in encourages men to suppress their true masculine natures. You need to rebel against this, and initiate proper man-to-woman interactions with those girls you want to sleep with. Ignore any feelings that this behavior is somehow incongruent with your true self – it isn't. It is merely incongruent with your conditioning. Men are sexual animals intended to behave sexually with women. Remember that, and act accordingly.

To find out more about how to develop a sexual presence and crush it with hot women click here

Read More: The Simplest Way To Approach Hot Girls For Newbies

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Few People Really Believe In Equality

October 22, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

Although most people claim to believe in equality, if we look closely we can see that they don't take this belief as seriously as they say. We can also see that, for the most part, few even believe it. Nor do most of us seem to notice this subtle truth which undermines the great sham of political liberalism.

People's pretensions to superiority are easily seen; just observe how seriously almost everyone takes rank and titles, how happy people are that others know they are doctor this or senior that. Of course, however, being wary of envy and of appearing arrogant, they will not always make a big show of their station. That task is frequently left for others, who in many cases stand to gain from it.

What matters most to many people, we can easily see, is their standing in the world, because this realizes self-interest and narcissism, the strongest forces in human affairs. Samuel Johnson observed that people are all for leveling (or making equal) when it is leveling others down to them–but it is otherwise when it comes to leveling upward!

For many of us worldly standing is the only notion of supreme value. To this the notion of equality is tacked on as a hollow but slyly useful abstraction; people adhere to it so as not to be imprudently out of step with PC convention. In this complex way the notion of equality both maintains social cohesion and mitigates envy, even though it is no more realistic or substantive than the sentimental endings of popular films.

We can also see, what complements the value of feeling superior, the value people get from feeling inferior (albeit often unconsciously); for although everyone claims to be the equal of the next person, if you examine the behavior of any number of people closely, we will notice that they actually consider themselves inferior to many. Go, for example, to any literary reading or art gallery—notice how readily people truckle to the artist, whether he has any talent or not, whether they understand the work or not, or even heard of it before that day. What a humorous spectacle!

The slavish psychology of most people—the result of severely unequal nature itself—is quite pleased by such happy herd sycophancy. I have met several people who not only kept up with US, People and the like inane magazines, but had actual tattoos of celebrities commonly found in them! In some cases, of their names; in others, of their faces.

The reason for such stupid phenomena is this, that human beings are powerfully attracted to anything that seems greater than themselves. There is in human psychology a deep animal instinct of veneration and idolatry; into this has gone all our history, all our terrible struggle to survive and endure. Thus many people take naturally to flattery and are not at all troubled by it, their pride being no hindrance to sucking up to others. And this instinct is universal among classes and peoples.

Even philosophers, though typically more temperate than most and not given to overpraise, are happy to romanticize and make a hero out of the eccentric genius Saul Kripke, to celebrate and stand in awe of his prodigious youthful achievements as if the man were God himself. In so doing philosophers are not so different from the manner in which the empty-headed masses regard Hollywood “stars.”

For, regardless of gender, education, ethnicity, or class, there is in many human beings an unconscious need to venerate someone or something. Different people realize it through different forms. For some, it’s a picture or an autograph. For others, it’s small talk with a prominent or famous person, to be related to others time and again. This need, to be sure, is something different from our reasonable regard for supreme merit, though the two are often connected.

So, for instance, often what begins as deserved appreciation ends in bizarre idolatry (certainly far more affective than intellectual); but because the latter is offensive to pride, most of us are far from willing to recognize the complete truth about this phenomenon. Here, the common pretense to equality is fascinating. People can slavishly venerate someone, and so render themselves inferior to him in respect to whatever makes him so significant, all while acting as if they are nevertheless equal to the person who moves them to such obsequiousness.

Much of the gossip people engage in reveals how unequal they believe they really are, though this seems to be an unconscious belief. People will go on and on about how wonderful a person is, and though they do not think so highly of themselves, they will still say everybody is equal. But even when people engage in malicious gossip, in many cases they betray their feelings of deep inferiority, motivated as they are by resentment.

For instance, wherever there is a person who excels at something, and who is therefore superior to many people in this respect, there will be a number of resentful people who tell you he is all hype, overrated, or owes his achievement to external advantages, and so on. Or again, in order to shirk their resentful inferiority, people will say he is arrogant, or that he is insecure and thus endeavoring to show them up. And yet by such anxious means people reveal that it is they themselves who are insecure, being indeed inferior, though their knowledge of this must remain unconscious, it being so difficult to accept.

"If mankind had wished for what is right," said William Hazlitt, "they might have had it long ago." So it is with equality. For though most of us have moments in which we want life to better for everyone—for no one to go hungry, to be homeless, to be without healthcare, and so on—it is also true that many of us get an immense psychological satisfaction from being more affluent than others, from the appearance of our social superiority to them. Hence the celebrity's $800 Versace sweatpants, so much more expensive than the $8 pair from Walmart.

Like belonging to a country club or having an Ivy League degree, the value consists of symbolic comparative superiority, which is impossible to measure, and hardly reducible to any $800 cost or name such as Harvard or Yale. For this is a matter of individual narcissism: delightful, boundless, irrational. Again, though we may find equality to be a good, we also like to feel superior to others. If we are particularly good at something, many of us don't end it there; we want to be better than others, or the best.

Here is another dark yet evident truth: equality is an ideal to which everyone pays lip service, but for which few are willing to sacrifice to achieve. The reason is that people are deeply self-interested. Indeed self-interest is so much a part of human nature and our entire point of view that we rarely see just how influential and extreme it is. What is more, when people talk about equality what they usually have in view is their own material well-being; it is rarely the case that anyone really wants everyone to be equal. Despite all the lofty sentiments concerning equality, fairness and the common good, people's main concern clearly is themselves. With respect to others they are usually indifferent hypocrites—except of course when it comes to those on whom they depend for their own well-being.

Meanwhile, after self-interest nothing is more reliable in human affairs than narcissism, the intoxicating delight people get from contemplating their own power or superiority, as it emerges from their awareness of how they believe others perceive them. It is easy to see that this narcissism is always at least a latent force in human affairs, ready to be called forth by the right pretext or occasion. Hence it frequently happens that when people rise in social status they immediately begin to carry themselves in a different manner, one meant to be suggestive of their newfound superiority. It can be seen here that human nature itself is strongly inclined to such self-delighting behavior, which needs only the right context for this very pleasurable feeling to come forth.

Conclusion

Our nature consists of contradictions. Now we value equality and altruism, now we prize superiority and our own well-being to the exclusion of everyone else. We need to learn to be at home with these incommensurable values. And here abstract thought is only so effective; it cannot make the incompatible not be precisely that. When faced with a problem of incompatible values—in this case, the natural human desires for equality, superiority and even inferiority—we must be like athletes or artists, letting the sharp instinct of the moment, which is the fruit of pondered experience, show us what to do according as fortune provides a challenge.

Read More: The Real Nature Of Politics

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at c.contrary

A Treatise On Respect

October 22, 2014 | by A "Nihilist" Frank | Link | Original Link

In my line of work I all-too-often encounter the type of people who are demanding of respect. These people are also the ones who are the most overly obsessed with the concept of “respect” and being “respected.” They are overly sensitive towards what they perceive as being “disrespected” or slighted. These people use the word “respect” like it were nothing more than a cheap slang buzzword, and they have no idea whatsoever about what true respect even is. Often they have their own twisted value system to define respect and what is considered worthy of it.

These are also the psychopathic kind of people who not only demand personal respect, but are also overly demanding that their rights and property be respected as well, while at the same time displaying little regard for the respect, rights, and property of others. In dealing with this type of person on a daily basis, it made me consider my own thoughts on the concept of respect.

It seems to me that those who are the most outwardly obsessed with the concept of respect are usually the ones who deserve it the least. I am a firm believer that true respect is earned and never demanded, but the way I see it, there are basically two kinds of respect: basic respect and true respect. Like most things in life, these categories fall along opposite ends of a spectrum. The center point of this spectrum is common courtesy, general politeness, and manners.

Basic respect is on the extreme negative end of the spectrum, and is the absolute lowest form of respect. It is treating someone with absolutely nothing more than basic human rights and dignity. This could include nothing more than providing food, water, a prison cell for shelter, a fair trial, and a humane execution. This is the absolute bare bones level of humane treatment, reserved for the absolute extreme worst examples of humanity.

The purveyors and orchestrators of genocide and mass slaughter, and the truly evil on a large scale, would fall on this end of the spectrum. They may be terrible evil people, unworthy of freedom, trust, respect, and friendship, but in theory a civilized society still extends them basic human rights and dignity, free from cruel and unusual punishment. Obviously most people, even the truly heinous, do not usually fall on the extreme end of the spectrum.

The center point of this spectrum is common courtesy and manners, and it reflects the general interactions with people that we come into contact with in our daily lives. It is treating those we meet in passing, or don't really know well, with common courtesy and politeness. It is the baseline for which most socially well-adjusted people treat each other. If someone is rude or wrongs you, or you learn something about them which you find offensive, then your perception of them will fall a degree on the spectrum, and it will govern the way further interactions with that person are conducted. By that same token, the more you get to know someone, develop a relationship and trust, or learn of attributes that they possess which you find admirable, then your respect for them may increase.

True respect, on the positive end of the spectrum, is genuine and based on character, accomplishment, trust, and honor. It is the respect which does not need to be demanded, because we automatically bestow it on those we deem worthy of it. True respect becomes more relative, subjective, and personal the further along you go, due to individual preferences and priorities about which attributes and accomplishments constitute and are worthy of it.

We all respect different people for different reasons. Although there can often be a large general consensus on certain people deemed worthy of respect by society as a whole, generally speaking, there is usually more of a consensus as a society about who is considered unworthy of respect as opposed to who is. However, as our society grows more fractured and marginalized and our culture and values decline, I think it will become much rarer for there to be a widespread consensus as to who we deem worthy of respect.

Respect is a dynamic concept, rising and perhaps falling over the course of a relationship. It is also important to note that a person may very well possess admirable and contemptible qualities or history at the same time, and therefore respect is a relative and individual judgment and balancing act. It requires critical thinking and one's own personal character, core values, principles, and judgment to assess the character of another.

In the end, we are all human, we have all made mistakes, and even heroes have their faults. Be careful about placing someone on a pedestal, and be careful about bestowing respect based solely upon superficial qualities. The important thing to remember is that no man, no matter how worthy of respect, should be praised and exalted above others to the point of demigod or superiority status. All men are equal in their humanity, but not all men are equal in their character.

Read More: Hiding Your Power Level

A "Nihilist" Frank
Frank is a nihilistic, misanthropic, politically-incorrect, cynical-asshole, intellectual, metal-head, weightlifter, conservative-Libertarian, Generation X'er. His observations and opinion of modern society and culture is far from flattering. His essays can be found at www.nihilisttemple.com

5 Gründe, Warum Frauen Mit Tattoos Und Piercings Einen Schaden Haben

October 22, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following is a German translation of Matt Forney's "5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken."

Keine Frau hat jemals ihr Aussehen mit einem auf ihrer Haut eingebrannten, bunten Gemälde, oder einem von ihrer Nase baumelnden Stück Metall verbessert. Es gibt keinen Mann auf der Welt, der jemals über seine Freundin oder Frau dachte: „Mann, weißt du, was sie noch sexier machen würde? Ein knapp über ihrem Arsch prangender Schmetterling." Doch trotz dieser objektiven Realität verstümmeln sich weiterhin Tausende von Frauen mit erstaunlicher Geschwindigkeit selbst, und das bis zu dem Punkt, wo mittlerweile mehr Frauen Tattoos haben als Männer. Hier sind die Gründe, warum Sie diese Frauen meiden sollten, als wären sie Leprakranke.

1. Sie sind Schlampen

Welche Art von Frau würde sich wohlfühlen, zwei Stunden lang halb nackt in der Öffentlichkeit zu liegen, während ein fetter Kerl mit dreckigem Bart eine spitze Nadel in ihre Haut bohrt? Die Antwort: die Art von Frau, die als Hobby scharfe Gegenstände in ihre Vagina einführt. Frauen mit Tattoos und/oder Piercings (abgesehen von Ohrringen) sind Schlampen, die sich durch die Betten unzähliger Männer schlafen. Wenn du dich an eine Frau bindest, die Tinte auf ihrem Körper oder Metall in ihrem Gesicht hat, dann wird sie dich in null Komma nichts betrügen. Tattoos und Piercings sind die Erkennungszeichen einer Hure, weswegen in traditionelleren Ländern, wie den Philippinen, nur die Huren damit herumlaufen.

Eine der ersten Frauen, die ich fickte, war eine selbst ernannte „Piercing-Süchtige.“ Sie hatte mehrere Ohrstecker, einen Nasenring, ein Zungenpiercing und selbst ihre beiden Brustwarzen waren gepierct. Während wir miteinander gingen, prahlte sich auch noch damit, sich die Klitoris piercen zu lassen (ich Glückspilz). In der Zeit, in der wir zusammen waren, schlief sie mit zwei meiner Freunde sowie mit mindestens vier weiteren Kerlen, die ich kannte, und das innerhalb von zwei Monaten. Später wurde sie dann von der Campus-Polizei erwischt, wie sie ihren Körper verkaufte.

2. Sie haben keinen Weitblick

Selbst in unserer sittlich heruntergekommenen Gesellschaft haben Menschen mit deutlich sichtbaren Tattoos und Piercings Schwierigkeiten, eine Arbeit zu finden. Nicht einmal Arbeitgeber, die einen Minijob zu besetzen haben, würden sie einstellen, denn niemand will seinen Big Mac oder doppelten Cappuccino von einem Statisten aus dem Film Apocalypto serviert bekommen. Frauen, die sich bepinseln oder durchbohren lassen, zeigen uns damit, dass man ihnen nicht vertrauen kann, für die Zukunft vorzusorgen. Es kümmert sie nicht, dass sie durch ihre dummen Entscheidungen für den Rest ihres Lebens ihren Eltern auf der Tasche liegen werden – alles, was sie interessiert, ist ihre Individualität.

Nicht nur das, aber Frauen mit Tätowierungen haben darüber hinaus keine Ahnung, dass ihre coolen Designs durch den Alterungsprozess zerstört werden. Die Schwerkraft und Gevatter Zeit wirken sich auf uns alle aus, und die einst so straffe Haut wird letztendlich schlaff herunterhängen und runzlig werden wie eine Rosine in der Sonne. Eine Tusse, die nicht nachvollziehen kann, dass die ach-so-geniale Narnia-Szene auf ihrem Rücken wie ein erbrochener Farbfilm aus den Anfängen der Filmgeschichte aussehen wird, wenn sie 40 ist, ist zu dumm, um die Mutter Ihrer Kinder zu werden.

3. Sie sind egoistisch

Die Gründe, warum Frauen sich tätowieren und piercen lassen (Zitat: „Ich tue es für mich!“), sind Anzeichen für Narzissmus und eine mittelmäßig ausgeprägte Psychopathie. Frauen lassen sich aus dem gleichen Grund tätowieren, aus dem sie sich ihr Haar kurz schneiden lassen: ein verzweifelter Versuch, um zu beweisen, wie einzigartig und besonders sie sind. Eine Frau, die sich absichtlich selbst entstellt, wird nie versuchen, Ihnen zu gefallen oder etwas Nettes für Sie tun. Sie wird sich nicht um Sie kümmern, wenn Sie krank sind, wird sich weigern, aus völlig willkürlichen Gründen mit Ihnen zu schlafen und wird in der Regel eine launische, unsympathische Fotze sein.

4. Sie sind langweilig

Die weibliche Logik bezüglich Tattoos kann am besten mit einem Zitat von Lena Dunhams Charakter aus der Fernsehserie Girls beschrieben werden: „Ich habe ein Tattoo, und das macht mich natürlich interessant.“ Doch nichts könnte weiter von der Wahrheit entfernt sein! Meine Erfahrung zeigt mir, dass Frauen mit Tinte und/oder Metall die langweiligsten, konformistischsten Tussen sind, die einem jemals begegnen werden. Um fair zu sein, die meisten Frauen sind langweilig wie ein Stück Knäckebrot, aber tätowierte und gepiercte Frauen sind mit ihren abgedroschenen, linksgerichteten Tiraden extrem öde.

Meine „Piercing-süchtige“ Freundin zum Beispiel ist überzeugte Marxistin, weil sie – und das ist kein Witz – ein Mal an einem Kurs über Lateinamerika teilnahm. Sie kaute mir ständig mit ihrem Gerede über irgendwelche „Ungerechtigkeiten“ ein Ohr ab. Der Witz an der Sache: Bevor sie diesen Kurs besuchte hatte, hatte sie sich nicht einmal für die Wahl registrieren lassen, weil sie sich für das aktuelle politische Geschehen nicht interessierte. Mir blieb nichts anderes übrig, als ihr meinen Schwanz in den Mund zu stopfen, um sie zum Schweigen zu bringen, was mir – zugegeben – sehr viel Freude bereitete.

5. Sie sind geisteskrank

Das ist der Clou. Jede Frau, die glaubt, dass ein Ring an ihrer Nase oder ein Bibelvers auf ihrem Rücken eine gute Idee ist, ist verrückt. Mein ganzes Leben lang habe ich nicht eine einzige tätowierte oder gepiercte Frau getroffen, die nicht krank im Kopf war, unabhängig davon, ob sie nun Depressionen, Angstzustände oder eine ausgewachsene Persönlichkeitsstörung hatte. Während Frauen mit Piercings im Gesicht und Tattoos auf den Armen oder Beinen zumindest Normalität heucheln können, so gehören jene mit Piercings oder Tattoos in der Nähe ihrer erogenen Zonen (Brüste, Schamlippen, Arsch) zu der Art von Weibern, die einem mit einem Messer abstechen würden, sollte sich die

Gelegenheit dazu bieten.

Kommen wir noch einmal kurz zurück zu der „Piercing-Süchtigen“: Sie war eine totale Masochisten, die jedes Mal in Tränen ausbrach, wenn ich sie beim Sex nicht hart genug fickte. Eine andere Freundin von mir, die ein Arschgeweih hatte, hatte eine stark ausgeprägte Persönlichkeitsstörung, die sich darin äußerte, dass sie immer ohne Grund anfing mit mir zu streiten und versuchte mich dazu zu bringen, sie zu schlagen. Wenn sie von schwarzen Menschen sprach, dann verwendete sie gelegentlich auch das N-Wort, obwohl sie selbst einer ethnischen Minderheit angehört. Im Bett waren beide Frauen absolut wahnsinnig – wir reden hier von der Fingernägel-in-den-Rücken-bohren Art von Sex –, aber außerhalb des Schlafzimmers bekamen beide immer einen Nervenzusammenbruch, wenn sie einen schlechten Tag hatten.

Die einzige gute Sache an Tattoos und Piercings ist, dass sie signalisieren, welche Frauen man mit minimalem Aufwand zum Ficken überreden kann. Wenn Sie es darauf abgesehen haben, eine Frau bereits am ersten Tag des Kennenlernens zum Analverkehr zu bewegen, dann wählen Sie eine mit einem Arschgeweih oder einem Zungenpiercing. Wenn Sie aber eine Frau suchen, die sie ehelichen können, entscheiden sie sich lieber für eine, die ihren Körper nicht bis aufs Unkenntliche verstümmelt hat.

Weiterlesen: 6 Arten von Tattoos, die sich dumme Frauen stechen lassen

The above was a German translation of “5 Reasons Why Girls With Tattoos And Piercings Are Broken,” originally written by Matt Forney.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Is Zoe Quinn Using The Massachusetts Courts To Censor The Legal Speech Of Her Ex-Boyfriend?

October 23, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Return Of Kings has obtained public court documents from California lawyer Mike Cernovich that contains the harassment complaint Zoe Quin (not her real name) filed against ex-boyfriend Eron Gjoni. Details within this complaint reveal serious inconsistencies that suggest she may be using the courts as a way to censor all criticism about her from Gjoni, whose public revelations about their relationship launched the Gamer Gate movement in August of 2014. Quinn is currently portrayed in the mainstream media and some in the gaming community as a brave woman who is fighting "misogyny" in gaming.

The birth of Gamergate

For non-gamers unfamiliar with GamerGate, the movement began with Gjoni's 9,500 word posting of his relationship with Quinn at The Zoe Post on August 16, 2014. It included stories and screenshots which detail how the relationship got its start and how it ended due to Quinn's multiple infidelities. The infidelity of any woman is not usually news, but Quinn is a gaming developer who slept with prominent members of the gaming journalist establishment, particularly Nathan Grayson of Gawker-owned Kotaku, which led to her receiving favorable coverage for work that she earned money from.

This corruption was further exposed by journalist Milo Yiannopoulos, who revealed a secret list called GameJournoPros that conspired to manufacture gaming news that matched their extremist agenda, inspired directly from Ezra Klein's defunct JournoList, which cost the job of a Washington Post reporter. Instead of reporting on the conflict of interest created with Quinn's personal relationships, they aggressively coordinated to squash GamerGate by broadly painting the ethically concerned gamers as rabid misogynists. Highlighting this collusion further on GameJournoPros was an email thread suggesting that gaming insiders buy Quinn a "feel better" gift along with publishing a letter of support instead of reporting on the major conflict of interest within their ranks.

To many gamers, this revealed the corruption, nepotism, and outright bias of gaming journalism, not to mention the many game reviews which were written by journalists who had relationships with the gaming publishers. Gamers demanded fair changes that were more in line with standard journalistic ethics. They were instead met with a coordinated attack by major sites that declared them "dead," with admonishments from their editors that nothing untoward was occurring. This launched an acrimonious fight that lasts to this day, with the SJW-dominated gaming media on one side (backed fully by the mainstream media) and gamers who believe that gaming journalism should be free of corruption and extremist infiltration. Advertisers such as Intel, Mercedes, BMW, Adobe, and Nissan have since distanced themselves from sites embroiled in GamerGate.

(A more detailed history of GamerGate's early beginnings can be found at History Of Gamergate.)

Zoe Quinn's Massachusetts complaint harassment complaint against Eron Gjoni

Once The Zoe Post went public, a video was made by MundaneMatt on Youtube that connected her personal relationships with men in the gaming industry. He included a 'fair use' excerpt of one of her games, but Quinn filed a DMCA request anyway to censor the entire video. Another Youtuber expanded on the story in a video that is now approaching one million views. Quinn then privately corresponded with the moderator of Reddit's /r/games, el_chupacupcake, to censor thousands of comments that discussed the revelations brought forth by The Zoe Post.

In the proceeding month, Gjoni gave further information of the relationship that aided the corruption investigation of the decentralized GamerGate movement, but on September 16, 2014, Quinn wanted this to stop. Here are portions of the scanned complaint she filed in Massachusetts on that date:

AFFIDAVIT

Quinn's handwritten complaint

THEREFORE, I ASK THE COURT:

- [x] 1. to order the Defendant to stop abusing me by harming, threatening or attempting to harm me physically, or placing me in fear of imminent serious physical harm, or by using force, threat or duress to make me engage in sexual relations.
- [x] 2. to order the Defendant not to contact me, unless authorized to do so by the Court.
- [x] 3a. to order the Defendant to leave and remain away from my residence: See Plaintiff Confidential Information Form. If this is an apartment building or other multiple family dwelling, check here ☐
- [x] 3b. to order the Defendant to leave and remain away from my workplace: See Plaintiff Confidential Information Form.
- [ ] 3c. to order the Defendant to leave and remain away from my school: See Plaintiff Confidential Information Form.
- [x] 4a. to order that my residential address not appear on the order.
- [x] 4b. to order that my workplace address not appear on the order.
- [ ] 4c. to order that my school address not appear on the order.
- [ ] 5. to order the Defendant to pay me $_____ in compensation for the following losses suffered as a direct result of the abuse:
- [ ] 6. to order the Defendant, who has a legal obligation to do so, to pay temporary support to me. (You may not obtain a temporary Order from a Boston Municipal, District or Superior Court if there is a prior or pending Order for support from the Probate and Family Court.)
- [ ] 7. to order the relief requested on Page 2 of this Complaint pertaining to my minor child or children.
- [x] 8. to order the following: Don't continue to distribute private info about me online and the people harassing me
- [ ] 9. to order the relief I have requested, except for temporary support for me and/or my child(ren) and for compensation for losses suffered, without advance notice to the Defendant because there is a substantial likelihood of immediate danger of abuse. I understand that if the Court issues such a temporary Order, the Court will schedule a hearing within 10 court business days to determine whether such a temporary Order should be continued, and I must appear in Court on that day if I wish the Order to be continued.

Quinn's request to prevent Gjoni from writing about her "online"

☐ 14. YOU ARE ALSO ORDERED NOT TO POST ANY PERSONAL INFORMATION ABOUT THE [illegible] HATE MOBS [illegible]

COURT COPY

The court order preventing Gjoni from distributing material to "hate mobs"

And here is a portion of the transcribed text (full transcript can be found on pastebin):

> On or about August 16, 2014, the Defendant wrote and published a long post about my sex life and private dealings to several websites that he knew had a history of harassing me. He was aware that harassment and stalking would > happen, and openly admits to doing so to damage my professional reputation as an independent artist. Since then I have received numerous death and rape threats from an anonymous mob that he had given details to. My personal info like my home address, phone number, emails, passwords, and those of my family have been widely distributed, alongside nude photos of me, and several of my professional accounts and those of my colleagues have been hacked.

>
> Eron has coached this mob multiple times, made multiple social media accounts to smear my name publicly, and has stoked the fire of this on many occasions and doesn't seem to be stopping. He has also called hotels that he suspected me of staying at, falsifying information to give more personal info to the mob. I am in fear of him as he is not repentant for the mob's harassment of me and keeps hinting at giving them more information, which he knows will continue inciting the threats and harassment.
>
> […]
>
> Therefore, I ask the court to order the following: "not continue to distribute private info about me online and to people harassing me or to contact my friends and colleagues"

Granting of order number eight legally bound Gjoni from talking about her publicly, effectively acting as a chilling effect in all further speech about his ex-girlfriend.

Quinn decided to use the legal system to prevent sharing her "personal info" when in the past she shared the personal information of the organizer of Fine Young Capitalists, a charity organization meant to promote women in gaming. It was claimed that she doxxed the organizer for the reason that they were transphobic, but it has been speculated that she was upset they didn't offer compensation in exchange for her participation. She helped blacklist coverage of them (aided by her relationships with many reporters in the industry), so that the charity was effectively ruined. It was brought back to life by 4chan donations after Quinn's actions were revealed.

Quinn also aided the doxxing of my colleague Mike Cernovich yesterday by gleefully retweeting a blog post that showed a photograph of where Cernovich lived, calling it the "best" journalism.

She has petitioned the Massachusetts police to prevent Gjoni from a behavior that she has committed herself less than 24 hours ago.

Did Gjoni "coach" a hate mob against Quinn?

I read the entirety of The Zoe Post along with Gjoni's public social networking feeds to find the source of his mob coaching, but I could not find an instance of it. Instead I found a man deeply conflicted about his involvement in GamerGate, and as a self-proclaimed social justice warrior, ambivalence in the movement he has unleashed. Nonetheless, he supports the most prominent opponent of GamerGate:

He has come out against bullying:

And he has come out against doxxing while Quinn continues to actively engage in it:

At the beginning of The Zoe Post, in bold and capitalized letters, he states the following:

> I DO NOT STAND BY THE CURRENT ABUSE AND HARASSMENT OF ZOE QUINN OR FRIENDS. STOP DOING THAT. IT IS NOT IN ANYONE'S BEST INTEREST.

His interpretations of her behavior and psychology could be very well wrong, but I could not find instances of genuine harassment or coaching, and he even has gone the extra step to censor names out of chat logs that he had with Quinn. Instead you're more likely to find an emotional if not sappy outpourings from a man who has been crushed by his relationship with Quinn:

> For the next four hours I lie awake next to the woman I love – or someone who I thought was the woman I loved, but who has yet to provide a reasonable explanation for what she's done to me. Who even after all of these revelations, I still can't help but trust.

As embarrassing as these details might be to Quinn, posting factually based details of past relationships and sharing them on social networking is not typically defined as mob "coaching," "harassment," or name "smearing." Otherwise, a company like Yahoo, which owns the most emotional platform on the internet, Tumblr, would face huge liabilities.

Gjoni's interview with Buzzfeed

On October 16, 2014, Gjoni did an interview with Joseph Bernstein. The interview contains a portion that seems to corroborate Quinn's assessment that Gjoni coached the mob:

> He admitted to regularly advising GamerGate leaders, and seems to take some pride in the power he claims to exert over the movement, as well as over the effect the movement has had on gaming journalism.

I investigated further by reading the entire interview transcript. I immediately noticed that Bernstein's "interview" was more like a hostile interrogation, whereby it was obvious to see the agenda Bernstein possessed. This isn't surprising considering that Buzzfeed had previously published an anti-gamer article along with one of its employees expressing hatred for the movement by calling it part of a "shitty" culture.

In connection to Gjoni's advisement of GamerGate "leaders," this is the relevant portion I found in the interview:

> [10/14/14 3:05:04 PM] Eron Gjoni: People in the movement listen to what I have to say, because I have information it wants. So, I have a responsibility to say things that help fix the situation.
> [10/14/14 3:05:28 PM] Eron Gjoni: I'm not afraid of it. It's not a scary movement.
> [10/14/14 3:05:34 PM] joseph_bernstein: What information do you still have that #GamerGate wants?
> [10/14/14 3:05:49 PM] Eron Gjoni: Don't trash talk or belittle it, and it won't trash talk or belittle you
> [10/14/14 3:06:13 PM] Eron Gjoni: just knowledge of the landscape.
> [10/14/14 3:06:21 PM] Eron Gjoni: my opinions are better informed
> [10/14/14 3:06:30 PM] joseph_bernstein: Okay.

Gjoni provided "knowledge of the landscape" and informed "opinions," which Buzzfeed transformed into Gjoni acting as a sort of mastermind of GamerGate. It almost seemed like Berstein was in possession of the harassment order and wanted to stretch Gjoni's words to better corroborate with it.

The interview did include an interesting quote from a woman in gaming who supports what Gjoni did, suggesting that claims of Gjoni's "harassment" are exaggerated:

> Rachel Martin, is a 25-year-old freelance designer who described herself as a radical feminist. Martin described Gjoni as "gentle and conscientious" and said that she condoned the publication of "thezoepost" because of her own past as a victim of emotional abuse, which she felt Quinn had committed against her friend.

If it can be proved that Gjoni did not coach the mob or "stoke the fire" as Quinn claims, she would be on the hook for filing a false police report, a misdemeanor or felony crime depending in the severity of infraction.

Harassment or threats has no place in any consumer revolt

It's hard to deny that Quinn has received harassment and threats since The Zoe Post went public, but the evidence does not clearly show it came from Gjoni, suggesting that her petition with Massachusetts was filed more to censor Gjoni from sharing details of their relationship that conflict with the public reputation Quinn wants to maintain as a game developer. Her petition does fit with her clumsy previous attempts at censorship on Youtube and Reddit, and her actions against the Fine Young Capitalists and Mike Cernovich show that she continues to actively use doxxing as a strategy against those whom she disagrees with.

> "Zoe is in fact a pretty solid narrative designer. And if there's any significant fault to find in her narrative design, it's that she never stops doing it." -Eron Gjoni

For a woman who is held up as an innocent victim by the media industry, GamerGate supporters should be concerned that they are up against an establishment that is supporting someone whose concept of free speech is far narrower than their own. This establishment will persist in painting GamerGate supporters as harassers and misogynists while their own "victimized" darlings continue to dox others. They say that enemy flak is most intense when you're flying right over the target, hinting that GamerGate may be close to further truths that corrupt insiders don't want revealed.

Read Next: Why Is The Zoe Quinn Scandal Blacked Out Across The Internet?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Don’t Ever Take Advice From A Dating Website

October 23, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Mmm…that woman in the picture above sure looks like a fun time. eHarmony has an article titled “15 Reasons to Date a Single Mom.” I think there’s something unique about it compared to most articles of its kind. This isn’t written from the dogs at Jezebel who likely believe in their ideology. No, this is by a company with a financial interest in people getting together. Should you take their advice and say “I do,” or at least get an apartment together, then they’ve won. And if such advice should cause you to get divorced again, then they’ve gained another client. And if you should spend a couple years paying for their website without finding anything, then even better. It is in a dating website’s financial best interest for the product to fail.

The interesting thing about this article is that every single point is 100% false. Not just sort-of-true-maybe-if-there’s-the-right-chemistry-and-time-of-life. No, their stereotype of unwed mothers is like saying that black people listen to country music or that men find comfort through watching Eat, Pray, Love. If you hate long articles, basically eHarmony says that unwed mothers are great because they’re willing to settle for a lazy man-child. They are really playing to their clientele.

The article begins with, “That cute single mom might be the future Mrs. You.” This isn’t even one of their points; it is just the introduction, and already they are lying to you. Obviously, unwed mothers tend to be older, and a woman’s beauty begins to degrade circa 25 years old. But even if she is an 18-year-old with a prom “accident,” pregnancy does things to a woman’s body. Her stomach of course is deformed, but more than that, the constant stress of unwed mothering takes a toll on her face.

Humans aren't designed to raise children alone, and doing the job of two people will wear you down. I remember seeing a teenage picture of my (now unwed) mother and thinking that she was my aunt because the woman in that picture was actually pretty. Furthermore, an unwed mother knows that her best bet at marrying a "good guy" is to find a reformed drug felon, meaning that the greatly limited dating market has further stressed her out. So maybe some unwed mothers are hot, but they certainly aren't cute, if that makes sense.

> 1. She's no wimp. Single moms are tough and independent.

The idea of an independent woman is a myth to begin with, and even if it's not, unwed mothers are not independent. If they were, they wouldn't be trying to find a man, and they wouldn't be on government assistance. Also, you only need one tough and independent person in the relationship. Imagine the hell of two people with strong personalities and different life-philosophies trying to live as one. Ladies, unless you want a weak and needy man, it is against your best interest to be tough and independent. Also, I find it telling that they describe unwed mothers in masculine terms.

> 2. She's already a great mom. (And weren't you looking for someone who would be a great mother? Look no further!)

Notice they put the word "great" in front of "mom," because they themselves know that those two words don't naturally imply each other. There are some unwed mothers who put their kids first in their life, but that only means the man will always be number two. This point is at best a tautology and at worst a misapplied false assumption. There are plenty of unwed mothers who make poor life choices, hence why they're unwed.

> 3. She's incredibly patient, but doesn't have a lot of tolerance for bad behavior. She'll be good for you.

So patient that she decided to wait until marriage before breeding? So patient that she stuck it out in a difficult marriage? So patient that she actually does "have a lot of tolerance for bad behavior"? Because I want to be a little bad, at least by a woman's standards. I like smoking, going to bars, and watching South Park. Why should I compromise my life for your kid?

> 4. She doesn't play games. She doesn't have time to just fool around. She takes her relationships seriously.

I could pretty much type verbatim what I wrote for point three.

> 5. She'll only keep you around if the relationship is a good thing for both her and her kids. You won't have to guess if she's into you.

I like the if-statement here. Glad to know she likes me for my natural charisma. And it's true for most girls that "you won't have to guess if she's into you." If a girl replies to all your texts immediately, does anything to accommodate you, and has been dating you for several months, then she's into you. Really, the best way to tell if a girl likes you, whether you're dating her or not, is to make a joke about the two of you getting engaged and see if she plays along.

> 6. Single moms are easy to pamper. (They don't get breaks very often. Hint, hint.)

Okay, I'm not quite sure what this one means. I think I've got a guess though. This means that she's easy to satisfy. Like, you don't have to put out a lot of effort? This one might actually be true, at least for some of them. If an unwed mother understands the huge disaster she's made of her life, she'll take what she can get. The operative words there are "if" and "understand," and since society wants unwed mothers to believe that they can do no wrong, she probably won't ever have this epiphany. So I still stand by my claim of the article's complete falsity.

> 7. She's loyal — and is fiercely protective of her little brood.

And will she be more loyal to me than to the little bastard? If she is so loyal, why is she unwed? Oh right, right, because all divorces happen because the husband beat his wife, got in his truck, and moved to Wyoming. My bad.

> 8. She can articulate what she wants and needs from a relationship.

I highly doubt she'll say, "What I really want is a man whom I don't completely hate and who has a high-enough-paying job to sustain a normal life. He should also be the same race as the father so that people don't think I'm a tart." Kids, despite what you've been told all your life, you need more than chemistry—whatever that means—to make a relationship work.

> 9. Single moms are both practical and fun. There's no room for diva behavior.

Aren't practical and fun mutually exclusive terms? Like, you can be both, but not at the same time. Fine dining is fun, but eating Swanson frozen dinners is practical Also, why are unwed moms by default fun? I get the practical part at least in theory, but why would a grass widow be fun? Oh, because she's easy. A woman's body is priceless in the sense that banging is free. Why do poor people breed so much? Because they can't afford cable. So never mind. This list is only 93% false.

> 10. She's no longer a party girl, but a fun night out is still very welcome.

I think an "lol" would be in order if I were that kind of man. eHarmony has admitted that unwed mothers used to be party girls (i.e. whores) and still miss that lifestyle. I know this is controversial here on ROK, but point ten is also false. My mother went to the wedding bed a virgin, and when my father left her, she decided to never date again. My mother is anything but a party girl, and she's certainly not fun in any sense of the word. Although this is a small minority case study, it still is the exception to eHarmony's assumption.

Point ten still stands (as being completely false).

> 11. She's selfless. Single moms put others' needs before their own.

Selfless people are rarely divorced. Also, completely selfless people don't exist. But even if they do, and even if someone who has consistently made bad life choices is one of them, which "others" is eHarmony speaking about? Will her bastard get more priority than her fancy new husband? The competition is supposed to end at the altar, hence the whole concept of life-commitment.

> 12. Moms make the best lasagna and give the best back rubs.

If by "make" you mean put Stouffer's in the oven. And no, Chianti's on 4th street makes the best lasagna, and Chardonnay at Dick's Leisure Club gives the best back rubs. As an aside point, isn't this rather anti-feminist? Is eHarmony telling me that real women are good in the kitchen? Of course eHarmony is. A dating website is trying to make money, and they'll push whatever ideology necessary. They're not idiots.

> 13. You'll get to take part in adventures to amusement parks, the zoo and the park. Bonus: You'll have an excuse to play with toys.

First off, amusement parks suck, but even if they didn't, plenty of adults go without children. Second, only retards like the zoo. And finally, going to the park is not an adventure or anything that could be confused as fun. As for playing with toys, I'll admit that this might be fun for some males, but I try to move forward with my life and engage in adult pursuits. I find it a little insulting that eHarmony thinks I'd like to play with a Barbie doll or watch Star Wars. Yes, I just said that.

> 14. She's adaptable. She knows that life doesn't always go as planned and has learned how to make the best of it.

To quote the great western philosopher Jagger, "Cash your dreams before they slip away." You've got to get the best you can, and that heroin-addict-turned-pastor is looking pretty hot right now. Maybe they can get matching neck tattoos. Damn it, that puts the list at only 86% false. Looking pretty credible.

> 15. Single moms can do it all, but are super-appreciative of a helping hand. Woo her with kindness and acts of service.

They can "do it all" except hold onto a man, apparently. And while a woman might appreciate favors from you, nothing makes her nether regions dry up like a habitually servile man.

These idiots who harp on men to marry unwed mothers never tell the one thing that would most convince us to buy their product: What does an unwed mother offer you that a childless woman (or perhaps a wed mother) can't? This is a basic principle of marketing. What benefit does your product have that none of the others do? Well, she's cheap, at least until you marry her. Maybe children are fun, but most co-eds can shit out a couple kids just as easily. Perhaps these websites should say, “Do you want kids but hate babies? Then marry an unwed mother!”

The eHarmony article ends with “Why else should one date a single mom?” Leftists accuse ROK of hating marginalized women, and so in the interest of human goodwill, I’d like to ask my readers the same question. Let’s help the ladies out. In addition to avoiding an infant screaming in the dead of night, why else should a man date an unwed mother? I want to be convinced.

Read More: Is Return Of Kings Really The Most Repugnant Website On The Internet?

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Why Her Past Is Better Left Alone

October 23, 2014 | by Netanderthal Man | Link | Original Link

It's a Pandora's box that should never be opened.

Do not inquire or think about her past. Never. Don't even think about thinking about it. It does not concern you and it will only gratuitously hinder your progress. The past cannot be changed, but finding out about it will ramp up your insecurities and ram your confidence harder than a tsunami washes cars off the Fukushima highway. Nothing good can come from nosing around a woman's past (at least when this nosing is obvious to her). You only shoot yourself in the foot, since inquiring about it screams insecurity.

Your girlfriend might (un)consciously throw you some beta chum by revealing bits of her past as a test of your confidence. Don't let it shake you, don't show it bothers you. Ignore it. If she throws something like being in a threesome with two other guys just smirk and tell her that you are fine with threesomes as long as there are two girls involved. Now you have some insight into the dark side of your precious snowflake—milk it into a threesome with that hot girl friend of hers, but never give her full validation and don't fully reject her when you're in said threesome. If you can't pull it off, then shrug it off, don't give in into her drama, no matter how tempting it is.

What you don't want to do is use her past to overtly gain the upper hand in your relationship. Using her past to get leverage will always work against you and she'll harbor a growing resentment towards you. It will make you come across as needy and she will lose interest quickly.

The more women you get to know, the easier it will be for you to spot red flags without asking her about her past. Maybe she'll blurt out of nowhere that she has slept with 10 other guys. Don't make a fuss, take a mental note of that and multiply the number by a factor of 5 to 10 to have a somewhat accurate representation of the number of men she's been with. You now know she's not girlfriend material.

If she sucks a mean cock you should be thankful to the meters of cock she sucked in order to achieve the royal quality of service you receive. Maybe she cheated on one of her ex-boyfriends, that's not necessarily alarming, most likely he was an insecure and whiny little chump who couldn't handle things properly. However, if she cheated on most of her boyfriends, you have a case of flighty vagina on your hands. She is to be pumped and dumped, perhaps kept in orbit if you see it fit, but only if she is fun and her girlfriends are hot and willing. If she cheats on you she's out. There are no exceptions to this rule.

Betas are always nosing into their girlfriends past like dogs smell turds because of their constant need for validation. Their egos are bloated, volatile, and fragile like the Hindenburg zeppelin. Confident men don't have ego issues, nor egos for that matter. They have control over their mind, emotions and body.

I'm not saying you should take my advice to the extreme and be blinded to the fact that she has cheated on 9 out of 10 of her exes, she's a single mom or a crazy stalker. If that's the case, you most certainly should run like hell in the opposite direction. But as I said before, you don't really have to ask about her past, just pay attention to the details and it'll all be revealed in time.

All that you read here or elsewhere is pretty much useless unless you expose yourself to life. Be willing to go out, be bold, be ludicrous and make a lot of mistakes. Your own mistakes are the best way to learn (and even unlearn) new things about the world around you. Most men make the same mistake over and over again because said mistake never registers with them as an actual mistake, and they end up blaming their failures on external factors.

By failing to identify the problem, such men fail to find a path to happiness. They lack the social calibration tools and the knowledge you have at your disposal here on ROK. Society fears and bashes free-thinkers, and it thrives by emasculating men, turning them into easy to control mindless drones.

Here’s the thing: her past is just that, past. It cannot directly have any consequences over you as long as you ignore it. So, just leave it where it belongs: behind you, in the past. Use it to make decisions going forward, but never preoccupy yourself with it.

Your own past, on the other hand, is a priceless repository of both your successes and failures. Use it to learn from it, use it to unlearn what needs to be unlearned, but never ever live in the past. Keep in mind this ancient nugget of wisdom and make it a part of who you are: only a fool trips on what is behind him.

Read More: Unconditional Love From A Woman Is Impossible

Netanderthal Man
Netanderthal Man saw the light of day somewhere in Eastern Europe. He enjoys life as creative director and owner of a design studio. He is a big fan of Occam’s razor, Pink Floyd, Roald Dahl and wet tight pussy, is politically incorrect and his favourite dish is roasted unicorn with rainbow gravy.

The Most Powerful Yoga Exercise

October 23, 2014 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

Yoga is an ancient philosophy that means literally “to unite with the Divine.” It was a way of life that helped one focus all of one’s actions on attaining this goal. Real men will tell you that to achieve anything in life you have to give 100 percent of your focus, a type of singular one-mindedness. Why should yoga be any different?

Yoga has gotten a bad rap in the west, and is considered something that women do. American women have taken such a great philosophy like yoga and they’ve turned it into a very shallow and superficial concept. What women call “yoga” nowadays is nothing but gymnastic bullshit. Real yoga requires a very high level of dedication. One has to be willing to change their entire lifestyle and outlook on life. Yoga is not just something you do for an hour a week, practicing pointless gymnastic exercises. But American women will corrupt whatever they can get their grubby little paws on.

Fat women doing yoga

To achieve anything requires very hard work and effort. The nature of women is that they want to be given everything for free and do not want to work for anything. However, for a man who is willing to put in the time, it can be highly rewarding. Yoga can offer men a much higher level of concentration, energy levels, and overall physical health, to name a few of the benefits.

This yogic breathing exercise is called Sodarshan Chakra Kriya. It is considered by many to be the most powerful yoga exercise ever. If you were to practice just one yoga exercise, this is the one.

Instructions for performing Sodarshan Chakra Kriya:

1. Sit up straight, preferably in the siddhasana posture (picture below). Try to keep your spine as straight as possible.
2. Rest your left hand on your left knee. Block your right nostril with your right thumb and have the remaining fingers pointing upwards.
3. Now breathe in deeply through the left nostril filling your lungs to capacity. Lower your right hand now and place it on your right knee.
4. With your breath held in begin to pump your stomach (pulling in the abdominal muscles) and mentally count with each pump, 1, 2, 3, and so on.
5. Once you have reached 48 stomach pumps with the breath held in, raise your right hand, close off the left nostril with your right pinkie and breathe out of your right nostril.

This completes 1 cycle – breathe in through left nostril, hold and pump, breathe out through right nostril. Continue to repeat this cycle for the duration of the practice. This can be practiced for up to 3 hours daily.

Siddhasana sitting posture

In the beginning, it will be very hard to hold in your breath long enough to do 48 pumps, so it is best to start small and work your way up.

Beginner's Level: 16 stomach pumps instead of 48
Intermediate Level: 32 stomach pumps instead of 48
Full level: 48 stomach pumps, as described above

A video demonstration of it:

The only modification I have made to it is that instead of mentally repeating that "wahay guru" mantra with each stomach pump, I mentally count 1, 2, 3, and so on, for each stomach pump. I don't know how I'd be able to keep track of the number of stomach pumps unless I mentally kept track of the number. This yogic breathing exercise is very simple to practice and you don't need to go to some feminized yoga class to learn it or listen to some mangina yoga teacher.

It is best to practice this on an empty stomach, before eating or 2 to 3 hours after the last time you ate. This yogic breathing exercise will also help purify your eating and drinking habits. It's very difficult to practice it if you eat a lot of processed food, because the processed food will slow down your digestion and clog up your stomach. This is especially true for products that are made with white flour. As for drinking, it's impossible to practice if you've been drinking hard liquor the night before because your stomach will feel like complete shit.

This yogic breathing exercise falls more into the category of pranayama or kundalini yoga rather than hatha yoga, which is the showboat gymnastics yoga that most women practice in the West. It will not only help improve your physical health but also your emotional and mental health as well.

Read More: Fat Woman Sucks At Yoga, Gets Rich Anyway

John Doe

John is the creator of the famous Boycott American Women blog. Check it out here: www.BoycottBitches.com

“Modern” Women And Beta Males Are Like Circus Animals

October 23, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

Take two lions. Lion number one lives in the wild. Lion number two is a trained circus animal working in the zoo. While number two can perform amazing tricks, number one must learn skills to hunt and savagely kill large animals such as Zebra. Number one lives and dies by his wits. Number two is fed “humanely” killed beef carcasses and lives a much more comfortable life, with access to free medical care and a retirement package.

This might seem like a good deal for number two, but he has lost skills as a hunter and survivor. Released into the wild, number two will have trouble. What’s more is that our circus lions rely implicitly on external business structures (over which they have absolutely no control) to support their lifestyles. The circus lions might have learned all kinds of tricks their wild cousins cannot imagine, but keepers must feed them, clean their enclosures and run a budget.

Beta males, along with feminists, single mothers, unruly females of all lineage, and all manner of alternative lifestyles, are all essentially circus animals that rely implicitly on their keepers to maintain the facilities and social mechanisms they need to survive. There is little alternative for them if the order that supports them collapses. They will simply die out, because they are an unnatural phenomenon.

Politically Correct Attitudes Are Prejudicial

The point is not to be prejudiced against anyone. People can choose to do whatever they want. The point is to be objective about paths that are being chosen. The pacifist monks can meditate all day, but they are going to be singing the praises of the local Special Forces killers when a neighboring country tries to invade. The special forces killers that so valiantly defend their country were in part trained by the pacifist monks and their mind control techniques. Everyone can benefit everyone. Lesbians can most certainly be highly beneficial, (especially after a couple of vodkas) and as any disco chic will tell you, gayboys make excellent BFFs and fashion designers.

The problem starts when sectors of society start putting their hand out for more than their fair share. This creates a distortion and an imbalance. We can cite examples of circuses that have gone bankrupt and animals that have experienced the most dreadful conditions that their wild cousins would never have to endure. Why is the superstar DJ more important than the civil engineer? Agriculture, Engineering, Technology, Military and Finance are vital and masculine roles that need to be preserved. Men should be encouraged and directed into these fields, not least because men find ways to team up and enjoy themselves, even in the most arduous and difficult tasks.

Mardi Gras, same sex marriage, gay discos, single mothers, equal opportunity work places, sprawling governments, expensive healthcare for all, liver replacements for alcoholics, etc. are optional extras that put a burden upon society to some degree. Much like the circus animal, it's all fine and good if the resources are there, but it can never become the priority. Imagine all the bright young men that have been kept out of universities and careers in favor of some mandated equal opportunity BS. Imagine if the costs of all the legal wrangling over same sex marriage had been put into developing a warp drive. Its inventor is probably smoking bongs and playing XBox right now, or worse, living under the freeway.

Cage Fever

We can cite examples of cage fever where animals pace back and forth manically even though they are well-fed. This condition is not that different from those who need antidepressants, antipsychotics and cite all manner of "issues" such as OCD, ADHD, anorexia, depression and so forth, as if those problems are incurable diseases caused by viruses.

Take people with these compulsions on a camping trip and their conditions disappear. Incredibly it seems that fresh air and exercise can kill these mysterious "diseases." This is not because they are a real infection, but simply the byproduct of people living like caged animals and being prevented from maturing into self-sufficient units that can think and fend for themselves. As Agent Smith so graphically explains, humans need to suffer and struggle:

> Did you know that the first Matrix was designed to be a perfect human world? Where none suffered, where everyone would be happy. It was a disaster. No one would accept the program. Entire crops were lost. Some believed we lacked the programming language to describe your perfect world. But I believe that, as a species, human beings define their reality through suffering and misery.

It is so simple to understand these mechanisms that I almost feel foolish for writing this article in the first place, but common sense ain't so common. Stating the obvious is very often what categorizes someone as either a pariah or a genius. What is truly childish is the modern attitude of the circus animal female and beta male—and we can say categorically that taking the red pill simply amounts to growing the fuck up.

The Emperor Has No Clothes

People who call for equal opportunity workplaces are about as intelligent as animal rights activists who start campaigning for dogs to have the same lifestyle as cats. Dogs have to be walked on leashes, they cannot go out hunting at night, and they don't have the chance to catch mice. In simple terms, they are fundamentally different. In the same vein, expecting the same number of women CEOs and executives is about as intelligent as expecting the same number of men occupying beds in maternity wards.

Those squawking about unfairness and prejudice are the same layabouts who rely on hardy oil workers, transcontinental container ship sailors, farmers out of bed at 4am on a rainy winter's morning, etc. They themselves roll out of bed at a leisurely 9am, peruse

HuffPost, Daily Mail or some other such drivel, cruise over to the mall in their Prius, picking up a chai latte that costs 100 times its true value. They grab a pint of milk for their breakfast cereal as if it's fruit on a tree, while looking down their nose at the world, complaining about how unfair it is. The captain of the ship that delivered products from China didn't have quite the same start to his day, neither did the shift worker on the Alaskan oil rig that fueled their car or the miner who dug out the iron ore to build it AND there are no females on earth clamoring for equal opportunities in those work places.

Men Rule For Good Reason

Back in the day, a man would ask the girl's father for her hand in marriage. Often times her father would dictate the man she would marry. A ceremony was held to mark the transfer of responsibility from her father to her husband. Brides' families paid dowries to the husband's family when they passed on responsibility for her.

Why was this? It seems barbaric but the hard reality of life actually demanded these social rules. A daughter who got pregnant and gave birth to a child, is still to this day very much reliant upon the social structure around her. Back then her father constituted a large part of this support system, and he was damned if he was going to use his resources on behalf of his daughter's absentee sperm donor.

It's very easy to understand, once you remove the veil of prejudice. A girl should be carefully advised before she gets pregnant, because the man does need to play a part in her and the children's support system. Preferably that advice should come from a mature male figure, because real men are more inclined to be judgmental and forthright in their observations, avoiding sentimentality and emotionally charged ideals.

The "modern" dynamic absolving child-bearing women of responsibility is precisely what our ancestors fought so hard to avoid. It has been foisted onto us by remote controlled welfare systems, as well as governments and divorce courts open to any women who "changes her mind." Let's ask females to do a three-year licensing exam before they are permitted to have kids, with any child born out of this regime deemed a second-class citizen, denied healthcare, welfare, education, and so forth. The DMV is no more demanding for something far less important (crash the car, no more license). Privileges and respect must be earned. Breed like an animal – be treated like one.

I am quite sure that there are a minority of straight-thinking, hard-headed women that can operate in the male sphere and we have examples from history. However, these women are the EXCEPTION not the rule. The stupid side of the male bell curve may well be more stupid than the female side (hey the world needs grunts), but males are genetically predispositioned to a more logistical and rational approach. Many times their lives depended on it.

Females will on average take at least a couple of years out of their lives to deal with motherhood, which at least for the first few years is a soft, nurturing, caring and purely feminine experience that no man can ever truly experience, nor would he want to. No woman should be encouraged to rush back to some mundane job, while she has a new life to care for. Females tend to herd together whilst also (and ironically) not getting along very well. They are not ideally suited to industrial endeavors, least of all vital ones that society depends upon.

Shut Down The Zoo

There are natural traits and natural gifts that both sexes have. They are not equal, they are complimentary. It's about time we stopped trying to be zoo animals. The men who engineered your sewage pipes and electricity are more important than the Kardashians; any woman who wants a hard engineering job is welcome to give it a shot. These men ought to be the millionaire superstars, not some attention slut, but in reality these kinds of men are too humble and too focused on their work to give a damn. When the day comes that they need to start whoring for fame, they can shut down entire cities at the flick of a switch.

Remember that the matrix, including the rebels and Zion, was created so humans had something to struggle against. It was all a con, INCLUDING Neo. Those that call themselves alpha are just rebels that the system has permitted to maintain its hoax. This is the final take home lesson from the matrix. The machines might have been harsh in punishing the humans, but they did it for good reason. The humans had grown too lazy to think for themselves. They had become zoo animals, so the machines put them in a zoo where they belonged.

We need to look for real, tangible goals and advancements in technology, otherwise we are simply fighting our own shadows. We need to look for real partnership between the sexes and cease this pathetic squabble about who gets to play captain. The world might seem like a game, but I can assure you when your life is on the line you will find it very serious indeed. If we don't learn to challenge ourselves better and push the envelope, I'm afraid we will just continue to create our own pointless misery.

Read Next: Are Modern Women Modern Thinkers?

Why Feminists Want To Destroy Gaming

October 24, 2014 | by Thomas Andersson | Link | Original Link

In recent decades, gaming has been one of the few areas of mass entertainment where creative freedom was not subject to the politically correct whims of the day. But in 2014, the cultural elite declared war on this idea of creative freedom and sought to make gaming as bland an experience as watching a CBS sitcom.

In every era, men have sought safe harbor from the drudgery of everyday life, a place to relax without the grasp of their bosses and womenfolk. In times past, this could have been the pool hall or the strip club, but for millennials this sanctuary has taken the form of gaming.

As the hydra of feminism, low social mobility, and economic stagnation has devoured the living standards of young men in the west, video games have provided a welcome and mostly healthy escape for them to blow off steam. But in recent times, this vent has been sealed shut by so-called “Social Justice Warriors“ in the name of an extreme socio-political agenda.

Video games have thrived in part thanks to offering a level of complexity, humor, and occasional lack of political correctness which would simply never fly in the mainstream media. Developers were able to get away with this subversiveness due to gaming being seen as a fringe pursuit.

Now that gaming is in the mainstream, it is subject to the same homogenizing demands as a TV show or Hollywood movie—with every controversial idea being sucked out in the name of not hurting a certain group’s feelings.

You want a game featuring a bold, alpha male hero? How sexist of you! Here’s one about a chubby girl’s bout with depression instead.

The question must be asked as to why this is happening, and I believe there are three main reasons for this establishment attack on gaming and the young men who form its audience:L

1. Male-dominated spaces contradict feminist ideology

All men need to enjoy a dame-free space on occasion. Whether it's schoolboys going to the treehouse or some executives hitting the golf club, it's a chance for the guys to relax, engage in some real talk and tell the filthiest jokes and stories they know.

As someone who spent most of 2001 getting repeatedly banned from a supposedly unmoderated, unofficial Halo LAN group, I know all too well of how fun it can be to talk smack with no recourse or real-world consequence, it's a release and any adolescent with an ounce of testosterone in them needs that occasionally.

Yet for some reason, feminists hate the idea of a private gathering of men. Centuries-old male golf clubs have been forced to accept women, and universities have banned "men's clubs" before they could even be launched. They believe that if the nanny state takes its eye off us for one second, we'll start collectively devising ways to increase the "pay gap" and discussing our shared appreciation of the finer points of "rape culture."

The reality is that despite the often vulgar language, most online gaming chats and forums are fairly innocuous, yet the solipsistic worldview of feminists somehow manages to construe that all of this behavior is somehow related to the oppression of women.

2. They see gaming as a way to shape the next generation of men

Just as any act of violence committed by a young man in the early 2000s was attributed to big, bad violent video games – any act of supposed sexism committed by a young man is now the fault of irresponsible game devs.

Social Justice Warriors subscribe to the view that everyone is equal and that all of a person's character is defined by the media they consumed while growing up. This is entirely true of course; video games are a massive influence on one's character. After all, I am sitting here writing this article with blue spikes atop my head, an affinity for collecting gold rings and I've developed a complex frenemy-style relationship with a rebellious echidna…

Given this belief, video games are seen as hot property for winning the minds of the next generation. If a generation of little boys grows up wanting to be like Princess Peach rather than be the plucky fellow who saves her from a fire-breathing turtle, the SJWs will have succeeded in their goal.

3. Gaming distracts male attention away from them

Ultimately, the main currency in which women deal is that of male attention. Even the most ardent, mohawked, proudly obese Tumblr feminist would cry herself to sleep on a day where no male had lavished her with some form of attention, whether positive or negative.

Video games offer men a chance to tune out from nagging girlfriends, angry feminists, and a judgmental media. Whereas once we had to leave our homes to seek solace, we can now in a matter of seconds load up Steam and be transported to a realm where the aforementioned have no influence.

Did you really think feminists were going to allow that? Absolutely not, that would be far too much freedom and you're a troll if you disagree.

All games must now offer a strong female perspective on events, and perhaps controllers could be modified to include a "trigger warning" button if things get too heavy for the gamer girls and their beta male accomplices.

The recent Zoe Quinn affair is merely one facet of a wider movement which seeks to co-opt gaming and turn it into yet another anodyne form of entertainment which offers no place for men.

GamerGate presents a larger question. If men are being demonized for the types of video games they wish to play and their opinions, and their hobby is to be co-opted by social justice warriors who regard gamers with utter contempt – where else can these young men blow off steam?

Faced with declining living standards and the atrocious state of western women, if gamers have their hobby stolen from them the SJWs may have awakened a generation of frustrated young men who will finally question the cultural forces which have actively sought to worsen their lives.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: ROK Is Looking To Hire A GamerGate Correspondent

Thomas Andersson

TA, a retired journalist once described as a 'Fat Shaming Innovator', spends most of his time between Scandinavia and central Europe in search of increasingly nubile 19 year olds.

5 Things I Learned From My Second Time In Jail

October 24, 2014 | by AO | Link | Original Link

First the basics. I was in jail. Not prison. Some people still get it mixed up.

The first time I went was in my hometown for a mix-up on an old traffic ticket. I was only there a few hours. The second time I was in a big city. Long story short, I refused to sign a ticket because the lady cop was an idiot and tried to make me agree to show up to court for something I wasn't guilty of. It was a license plate issue.

Then it turned into a scuffle with three of them etc., and…I got arrested. I don't regret it—dtand your ground and NEVER agree to anything you know isn't right. I don't give a fuck who it is.

So what did I learn while I was in the shit house for a couple days?

1. Correctional officers don't correct a damn thing

From the ones I know personally, this is not a jab at you guys. I'm simply speaking the truth. No one is being corrected. There's a reason people become repeat offenders. My cellmate was on his third stint. If he was "corrected" then he would have returned to society and become a lot more productive.

Didn't happen.

He was back in for "knocking out a cop." All correctional officers do is unlock doors, tell you when to eat, and direct you where to go. If you have TVs inside the main block, they change the channel. That's it. Oh and they also break up fights from time to time.

2. There need to be stricter standards for hiring police

I was chatting with one of the correctional officers during our free time. I told him about the lady cop and what she was trying to make me sign. He gave me the “I cant believe that bitch” look.

> Him: You shouldn’t even be in here, you already don’t have a criminal history so ain’t no money to be made off you. She didn’t know what the hell she was doing.
>
> Me: Mannn, I know. I’m not a lawyer but I know what a legal tag looks like.
>
> Him: Sometimes we get people that don’t know what the fuck they’re doin’. They get a badge and get stupid. Maybe she was new.

The standards need to be a lot more strict for entry into the police force. The whole ordeal was a complete waste of everyone’s time. And not profitable for the city.

3. It’s a money game

Talking to the correctional officer was a trip. He straight up told me it was a money game, which I was partially aware of already. My arrest happened at the very end of the month. So they tried to “get me” for anything they could. Serve and Protect takes a backseat to Probe and Collect when it comes time to meet those quotas.

Yes, he admitted that there is a quota they have to meet from time to time. As for the officers on the streets, this is not entirely their fault. They are being forced to meet these quotas. They have jobs they want to keep, and bills to pay. I get it. But dammit so does everyone else.

4. Homeless People Get arrested on purpose

The conditions in big city jails are a clusterfuck. One of the reasons they are overcrowded is because there are countless homeless people getting arrested on purpose.

They have no money, so obviously they can’t provide any profit to the city. But the officers HAVE to make the arrest for the simple misdemeanors homeless people commit.

They go in to get a place to sleep for a few days, and get a few free meals. Sad shit to witness, but eye-opening nonetheless.

5. The mentality of ghetto black youth is damaged

I saw a ton of younger guys in there. My cellmate was 23 but a lot of the other guys were 18 and 19. The reasons they got arrested were not what intrigued me—rather, their behavior inside the place was what caught my attention.

These young kids were comfortable. The way they carried themselves inside a jail almost looked "natural." They were at home in a sense.

This is scary. For someone to be that much at home, in a place like that, at such an early age shows a mentally damaged group of individuals. The only thing on my mind and a few others was getting the fuck outta there. But these kids were completely at ease and content.

And again, the majority were young black males. Whether it's socioeconomic or cultural, it's like someone went into the communities and dropped a "fuck it" bomb that completely erased the sense of discernment or awareness of consequences. Or maybe they are aware of the potential consequences, but just don't care.

I know raising children starts at home, but if you are a correctional officer, something should be corrected in these young adults so when they are released back into the community they are able to be productive instead of destructive.

But that wouldn't be profitable would it?

Most importantly (saved the best for last), if you do end up behind bars for a while, do not by ANY means drink the clear kool-aid they serve. It's addictive and delicious. But it has a secret ingredient that keeps your dick limp. I'm dead serious. I guess that's how they cut down on gay behavior. I was drinking it like beer when I was in there (for less than a week) and didn't notice anything. But when I got out a buddy of mine told me what it does, and I noticed that my dick wouldn't get up for a full week after I got out! And when it did rise up a little bit, it was only a semi. Scary shit.

Don't go to jail. If by some strange twist of fate you end up there…don't drink the kool-aid.

Get coffee or water. Cheers.

Read More: Getting Arrested On The First Date

AO
AO is a man with the gift of explaining stuff using metaphors and he is great at short bios. You can keep up with him at his new-ish blog ATOMORIAM and also Like the Facebook

Page HERE

How Your Education Failed You

October 24, 2014 | by swimmerboy1 | Link | Original Link

The educational system is one of the largest and most underestimated governmental regulation systems in the world.

Attending school in the United States is compulsory from the time we're about 6 until we turn 18, which is a lengthy amount of time to be a slave in a system in which you have no control. The vast majority of children are taught the same subjects, and with the same techniques. Everyone is funneled towards the same end goal.

You are conditioned for over a decade to have behaviors within a certain range, and you learn preselected information using ubiquitous techniques. This is all done to make you a productive wage slave in our capitalist economy. Unfortunately, if you do not deviate from this path and change your mindset at some point, then you will end up as a wage slave. And this is exactly what they want.

You were psychologically and physically conditioned with this system, but this conditioning can be overcome. View the system objectively for what it is.

A special kind of hell

Environment

As a result of second-wave feminism in the 1960’s as well as the onset of third-wave feminism in the late 1980’s-1990’s, the school systems we grew up in were solidified upon the grounds of a feminine-centric mindset.

It is universally understood that boys have an innate biological tendency to be physical and active. But this fact has been shamelessly ignored. The system tells you to sit down at a desk for hours at a time. There is no relief aside from small breaks during a recess or lunch. Females are fine with this, as young girls are physically tame and very respectful of authority.

But the boys are overlooked. They cannot control what their physiology is aching to do, especially at an age when their self-control is still developing. They are reprimanded and made to feel sorry about their nature, and it is deemed unacceptable if they cannot fit in with this single-minded system. They are often drugged with powerful psychoactive chemicals to force their conformity.

As a young student I felt trapped in this system. I was the boy who could never focus and always had too much energy. I was punished continuously for it, both indirectly and directly, and struggled in school as a result. It is easy to harbor negative emotions towards a system that makes you feel like an outcast. I hated the teachers and the school system for trying to make me into someone I was not.

Subconsciously I knew it was absurd that I was being punished for not fitting in with their agenda. But I did not know how to consciously recognize or express this at a young age, so I developed a sort of passive-aggressiveness towards it all. Combine being ostracized with the intense need of a maturing child to fit in and keep up with his peers, and you have a recipe for soaring student drop-out rates and complete system failure.

Our educational system truly is failing boys everywhere.

> Gurian's book presents statistics that boys get the majority of D's and F's in most schools, create 90 percent of the discipline problems, are four times more likely than girls to be diagnosed with ADHD and be medicated, account for three out of four children diagnosed learning disabilities, become 80 percent of the high school dropouts, and now make up less than 45 percent of the college population" (http://www.huffingtonpost.com/lori-day/why-boys-are-failing-in-a_b_884262.html)

This is a quote from a Huffington Post article in reference to Michael Gurian's book The Minds of Boys: Saving Our Sons from Falling Behind in School and in Life. He uses facts and statistics to support the idea that our school systems are completely failing to meet the needs of their male populations.

Gurian also made another observation that is particularly relevant:

> According to Gurian, boys learn by doing and by moving their bodies through space. The more emphasis is placed on the development of early reading skills, and the less emphasis is placed on a healthy amount of movement and experiential learning, the more disadvantageous our schools will be for males.

I can count on one hand the number of times my teachers used any type of “experiential learning” method. And yet we are punished and looked down upon if we don’t excel in a structure that is clearly disadvantageous to us.

He just realized that his grades don’t matter

Evaluation

These methodologies also overlap with the performance evaluations that are present in schools everywhere. Here is the method: you sit at a desk, the teacher talks, and you write. Or, you use a book and write whatever it tells you to. You are then tested on this information in one way: a written exam. If you do not do well, you receive a poor grade, a veritable punishment for your lacking performance.

What does this grade do for your future learning experience? Absolutely nothing. It does, however, make you feel inferior and unintelligent, regardless of how many times you tell yourself otherwise. You may continue to receive this same type of feedback throughout the years, all based on the same evaluation methods. The negativity can compound if you aren’t performing well enough or keeping up with what the system wants you to do.

Grades also make you care infinitely more about your future grades than any amount of “learning” you accomplish. School is supposed to be about learning, isn’t it? The school system that you’ve been raised in evaluates your intelligence with such a slim range of methods that it is disgraceful. Yet nobody questions it, and nobody re-evaluates what the grades mean with a proper perspective.

This man was the epitome of the school misfit

Gentlemen, you cannot let grades define your goals or self-perception. They are meaningless. It is a system of evaluation based on the short term. They never mattered and they never will.

This isn't to say that you should just flunk out of school, but understand the importance of the real elements in your life. I have received many poor grades in my schooling years, and it doesn't bother me anymore. I realize it has no bearing on my intelligence or future success. I refuse to let another person's evaluation stop me from achieving what I desire.

Understand that you were dealt an educationally adverse hand, and that there are multiple cultural and societal issues that need to be changed in order to better meet these needs on a system-wide basis.

> No matter what happened to you in your past, you are not your past, you are the resources and the capabilities you glean from it. And that is the basis for all change. – Jordan Belfort

If you do not enjoy school, struggle with the classroom setting, or just generally feel helpless, know that you are not alone, and have never been alone. I was there, and many others were too.

Don't let school stop you from going after your dreams. Don't let anything stop you.

Read More: 5 Signs The American Education System Is Doomed

swimmerboy1

William is a writer and aspiring entrepreneur. He is from LA and currently resides in the area.

The Revolutionary Implications Of GamerGate

October 25, 2014 | by Amasa M. Lyman | Link | Original Link

At first I was confused why GamerGate was such a big deal. So feminists reportedly screwed their way through the video game industry and pretended to be victims of male aggression. Aren't they always doing that? Aren't there thousands of Zoe Quinns out there?

But then the censorship started, pervasively on forums such as 4chan and reddit. Then came a massive assault by the news media and video game industry. If this issue isn't such a big deal, why do they so fiercely abuse their own consumers? Deep in my stomach I could tell something was very wrong.

The Internet Will Destroy The Press

Victor Hugo (1802-1885) once said, “The printing press will kill the church.” In medieval times, the universal church held on to power through the production of books. They ran the religion, government, commerce, every aspect of social life. People literally were executed for owning or copying important records such as the bible because it could threaten the church’s control.

But suddenly the printing press afforded the common man the opportunity to write his own books and spread his own message. After that, despite years of wars waged by authorities, the printing press prevailed.

The cathedral was overthrown and a new building rose in its place, one built by the common man:

> “The press, that giant machine, which incessantly pumps all the intellectual sap of society, belches forth without pause fresh materials for its work. The whole human race is on the scaffoldings. Each mind is a mason. The humblest fills his hole, or places his stone. Retif dè le Bretonne brings his hod of plaster. Every day a new course rises. Independently of the original and individual contribution of each writer, there are collective contingents. The eighteenth century gives the Encyclopedia, the revolution gives the Moniteur. Assuredly, it is a construction which increases and piles up in endless spirals; there also are confusion of tongues, incessant activity, indefatigable labor, eager competition of all humanity, refuge promised to intelligence, a new Flood against an overflow of barbarians. It is the second tower of Babel of the human race.” (Hunchback of Notre Dame, Victor Hugo, 1831)

The internet is the next great invention. Today, anyone can create a website and spread beliefs. Everyone is connected and everyone contributes to some degree. We don’t need

CNN to give us the headlines or to tell us what to think. But this freedom does not come without great conflict. Today, just as then, the authorities are not willing to give up their control.

Gaming: The Third Tower of Babel

Hugo called the printing press the “second Tower of Babel.” Without getting religious, let’s look at the reasons why the Tower of Babel fell. Civilization was going through a technological revolution at that time. The invention of baked bricks allowed the people to construct buildings like never before and to express their opinions and beliefs in architecture. It was a communication revolution. But then their language got confused. Their society fractured because nobody could understand anyone else. Each individual wanted things his way and that broke up society.

But “if thought corrupts language, language can also corrupt thought.” And this is where gaming comes into play. So-called social justice warriors still cling on to the structure of the old days because they are frightened of a future without it. Their great crusades of social justice are nothing more than preservation of an antiquated belief system.

And it is true, the new system leaves destruction in its wake. Just look at the state of the music industry. Popular music gets progressively worse, and do you think peer-to-peer technology has nothing to do with it? Look at Hollywood in the age of YouTube, tumbling to the ground in a disgusting heap. Remediasation has very real and huge implications: we in the West are losing our language.

Gaming is a large part of that revolution, an industry for which revenue will soon hit $100 billion. In the UK, gaming already accounts for 40% of the entertainment industry. This is because gamers more than sit on a couch and consume a story. You become part of the story and influence what is going on. You interact with other gamers and build communities. How much power will they hold onto if any man can build and distribute their own story in this kind of medium?

This is why SJWs are so eager to attack gamers. This is why big-shots like Joss Whedon are so eager to compare us to the KKK, and why SJWs cry foul like a losing soccer player. The gaming medium will fundamentally change how we live, and they want the same authorities to remain in control, because that is what they are comfortable with.

We are learning little by little that the people who control the media, the celebrities, the gaming industry CEOs, the journalists, are just the same as the Church inquisitors of the dark ages. This is starting to really sink in. They call themselves "liberals" but they are just the opposite.

Return Of Kings At The Lead

The old authorities can hold on to power if they edge out new developers and control the discussion. But alternative discussion platforms don't allow them to do that. All it takes is a few people to boldly say the old rules of political correctness are ridiculous. A backwards hierarchy where women dominate men and deviancy of all kind is rewarded will not stand. These ideas catch fire because they ring true.

The social justice warriors lust for control because they know there is no future for them. This revolution is what Roosh champions with Return of Kings. The individual is liberated and change an old-fashioned, perverse, unnatural social structure. We are less consumers and more independent creators.

Read More: ROK Is Looking To Hire A GamerGate Correspondent

Amasa M. Lyman

Amasa enjoys art, music, and traveling. Some day he hopes to make it to Romania and settle down.

Why Men Need To Save The Barbershop Culture

October 25, 2014 | by Al-Assaf | Link | Original Link

During the July War of 2006, my father insisted on taking me to his barber shop instead of the safety of our house where my mother's family came to take refuge. The shop stood a mere five minutes away from the concentration of raids and bombings.

I never questioned him. As man who had weathered a 35-year-long civil war, my faith in him was absolute. Later on in life, when I asked him for the reason of his decision to visit the barber shop every day during the summer war, he told me it was necessary for my growth as a man. War gives you character, as tragic as it may be, he would say. I didn't want your memories of war to be that of crying women, huddled together in prayer and fear.

And today I understand.

The men at the barber shop were hardened veterans; former militia commanders who returned to civilian life after the war ended, soldiers, key figures of the families that populated the area where my father grew up, the odd politician from time to time, and the barber and his assistants. As I sat there, at least three decades younger than the least senior of the men, I observed how they freely debated politics, military tactics, money, sports, fucking, and social issues. The news, accompanied by the classics of the older generation of singers and composers on the radio, would background games of backgammon, Turkish coffee, and hookah smoking.

Today, the purely male barber shop is almost extinct. Unisex salons, which naturally boast a predominantly female clientele, are almost all that is left. Of the few purely male barber shops that remain, most are trend oriented, with a negligible defining male character. If such extinction is ever to occur, men would have lost one of their greatest strongholds in the socio-geographic fabric.

Where once upon a time the barber shop was a cocktail of what young men need for their mental and cultural growth and evolution, the modern-day unisex salon is no more than an environment of malicious female gossip, generic radio crap, and trend-conforming hairstyles that in no way promote masculinity.

Helping perpetuate the existence and success of such decadent establishments not only serves to undermine a much-in-need-of-protection masculine legacy to the point of irrelevancy and extinction, but also destroys an element that might contribute to realizing a generation of manly youth. Making the conscious choice to go to a unisex salon to have your hair handled by naturally under-qualified women or effeminate male stylists is a blow to man and his role in society.

What must be done is simple. The barber shop must be reclaimed, protected, and promoted. Here are four ways this can be done:

1. Make the effort to become a regular client of a purely male barber shop

Despite the universal demonization of classic masculinity and its decline in the free market as an influencing factor, one can still, with effort and conviction, find its last remaining bastions with vigilance and observation. They’re out there, and a few minutes expended walking, in the car, or in public transport to patronize these places won’t hurt.

Pro tip: They’re usually in the older parts of the commercial centers (the lesser streets), and well-known neighborhood corners. Once upon a time a landmark of a neighborhood, they’d be highly recognizable and part of the local culture and memory. Ask around.

2. Try to frequent the shop also in a none-client capacity, merely as a visitor

Male ssocializing is blessedly easy, especially with the more classic male adult. There is no distrust or malicious jealousy that female ssocializing has enjoyed since the dawn of sentience. Men have a natural tendency to respect each other, even in the most heated of competitive situations. So as it is easy to establish social ties, it will become easier to frequent the shop as a man who simply wants to check on the lads, have a drink, see what’s up.

3. Introduce your own social circle to the shop

Not only will you make the shop more familiar to yourself, but by expanding its clientele, you are helping the business. Helping the business grow will ensure its survival, naturally. You are not promoting, you are contributing. Contributing will help maintain this manly legacy. Additionally, frequenting an environment of peers not only builds character by a desirable set of influences, but also aids in reinforcing the tenets of the said environment on whoever frequents it.

4. Advocacy

Even to the odd stranger, advocacy can have great effects and positive influences. One does not need the rhetoric of a veteran politician to compel others to think and act differently. Simple truths spoken with conviction are enough. Once men receive hearsay of an establishment that safeguards the stylistic dignity of man's coiffeur, one or two are inevitably bound to frequent the aforementioned establishment to have their hair tended to and be surrounded by masculine men.

The Barbershop Culture may seem at first as an innocuous thread in the fabric of the social tapestry. But properly examined and reviewed, such an environment can yield many necessary details that can aid in the formation of a strong, masculine identity. Like a layer of paint, glazed in obscurity to grant other colors strength and depth, the barbershop paints a man brighter and deeper.

Don't Miss: Pax Dickinson And The Culture Of Tolerance

Al-Assaf
Al-Assaf is a connoisseur of International Law, Ethics, and Classical music. A deeply spiritual man, his Promethean spirit has cost him greatly, but rewarded him incalculably. He forever remains a student of the Arabic school of poetry, and rhetoric.

5 Reasons Being Indecisive Will Ruin Your Life

October 26, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Will you take the job? Will you quit the job? Will you text her now or later? Will you break up with her? Will you move? Will you go out or stay in and work? Will you order sushi or thai?

Every single day we face a number of decisions. Each decision will affect you in some way. What you order for dinner will likely have only a small impact on your life. Maybe it will cause you an upset stomach, but that's about as extreme as it can get.

Other decisions will have greater consequences. Deciding to quit your job, for instance, is sure to have more obvious, long-term effects on your life. But even though this fact can be scary, you cannot let it slow down your decision making process. Sure, there's more information that must be gathered when it comes to changing careers versus ordering dinner, and the decision will likely take longer as a result. However, it's important to realize that the dangers of prolonging the decision making process almost always outweigh the benefits of gathering more information.

Here are five reasons you should be making quicker, more concrete decisions:

1. Most decisions are not important

The pareto principle states that roughly 20 percent of causes generally account for 80 percent of the results. This means that roughly 20 percent of the decisions you face will account for 80 percent of the impact on your life. However, aside from obvious long-term decisions like buying a house or getting married, you won't be able to accurately identify most of these choices. This means you shouldn't waste time or energy on most decisions, because it will likely cost you more than the outcome affects your life.

For example, I often stress myself out about stupid shit like when I should text a girl or what I should write in said text when I'm single. Even after countless repetitions, I can let a routine decision like this affect my tranquility. I have to remind myself that in all likelihood, it doesn't fucking matter.

2. A good decision today could be a bad decision tomorrow and vice-versa

This fact can be eye-opening. It's extremely common to make a decision that grants you an immediately beneficial result, yet you come to regret it in the long-term. The opposite is equally true: it's not rare to make a decision that seems like it was a terrible choice right after you make it, yet turns out to be a great choice a few weeks, months, or even years down the line.

A common example here is breaking up with a girl or quitting a job. It's a decision that often causes you tremendous pain and suffering in the weeks and months that follow the decision. However, you usually bounce back with a fierce determination across all areas of your life that propels so much growth that you look back and realize it was actually a good thing overall.

The point is, because external circumstances and prolonged time can change how you view a particular outcome, you shouldn't waste time worrying about making the "perfect" choice or regretting having made the "wrong" one. At the end of the day, there's no such thing.

3. Making concrete decisions frees your mind

When there's something on your mind, an issue or challenge you're facing, the only way to get it off your mind is to make a decision that addresses the issue at hand. In my case, it doesn't matter if it's what book I'm going to write next or what time I should schedule a particular appointment, I can't stop thinking about it until I've come to a firm decision.

The process I've recently adopted is keeping a notebook open on my desk. Whenever I catch myself repeatedly thinking about something to the point that it's distracting me from the task at hand, I make a decision about it and write it down in the notebook. The act of writing it down helps my mind put the issue to rest—it makes me feel like I've made a firm decision that I won't second guess.

4. People immediately identify and respect decision-makers

It doesn't matter if it's in a social setting, work environment, or with a girl you're dating. When you consistently offer a firm decision to any situation that requires one, people recognize it. They unconsciously start to identify you as a leader. You're aren't afraid to make decisions and shoulder the responsibility that comes along with it.

With your friends this could mean choosing the bar or restaurant you're going to check out on Friday night. At work it could mean advocating for a particular solution when everyone else in the room is sitting on the fence, fearful of committing one way or the other. With your girl this could mean always picking which activity you'll pursue when the question arises.

5. Indecision spreads like wildfire

Decision making is a habit like any other. If you're at dinner with someone who can't even choose what they'd like to drink off the menu, chances are they can't make any other decisions without their stress levels shooting through the roof either. What this means for you is if you don't start practicing making quick, firm decisions you'll be practicing not being able to make decisions by default. There's no middle ground. When you're at dinner, make a quick choice and forget about it. When you're with your boys, voice your opinion about what you think you should do. By constantly making small decisions quickly, you'll be able to face the tougher ones with a firm resolve as well.

If you liked this post, check out my book "Dominate" – it goes further into the topic of living life boldly and making confident decisions.

Read More: 3 Habits That Every Man Should Practice

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Be An Active Participant In The Mating Game

October 26, 2014 | by Jesus Baetana | Link | Original Link

You can't present yourself as a high-value male without truly living the role. Standing as a man, straight-backed and confident with a steeled look in your eye, any woman who may be making eye contact with you is likely to be intimated to some extent, or at the very least have expectations if anything is to progress. You're going to have to take control of the situation.

What does this mean? In the purest form, putting aside technology for now, just look at animals. During mating season, male pigeons are sticking out their chests, parading themselves amongst the others and aggressively pursuing the females. It's quite funny, because the female pigeons sometimes look like they wonder what the hell is happening, when normally all of them are just pecking away minding their own business. Although I have my doubts, I'm sure they're aware of what's going on, the conniving fuckers.

Be The Best

Even if you're walking around and have the belief you are the best you can be, a girl you see likely won't do anything to initiate an approach. She might invite an approach, by sitting nearby, repeating eye contact, or doubling around so she walks past you again. But know, this is where you are expected to do something. She's giving you the window of opportunity. Don't dwell on it or any imagined consequences.

We put ourselves through much worse on a daily basis, by sitting on cramped public transport, going to jobs we hate and smiling through our gritted teeth at people we couldn't really care less about. Initiating a conversation with a girl who is inviting you to do so is easier than any of these. In the age where the huge majority of men lean on technology or their work environment for 100% of their dating prospects, by approaching a girl directly you're going to look like the fucking man.

Do remember there will always be some women who are just looking for validation. You'll start the conversation and they'll then act like you're bothering them. Perhaps they'll go quiet when you stay showing enthusiasm (I've noticed Brazilian women especially are really prone to speaking shortly with you following your opening lines). Don't waste too much time with these types. Pull back and become a bit cold, show a casual attitude, like you are beginning to rapidly lose interest. If she doesn't perk up, just make your excuses and walk away with your dignity, proud you took the step to initiate.

Context Is Key

Another important factor is context. Club game and online game are very similar, because you're in a situation where women are constantly being validated, either by drunk dickheads or internet warriors. The best ways to counter this is to be a little more direct.

You should already know what your strong points are; employ them unreservedly. Escalate to a familiar enough level to get them to meet you in person if you are communicating online. Don't leave too much time when you arrange to meet them – the same day is rarely possible but the next day should be standard. Remember, every day you waste between them agreeing to meet you and you actually meeting them is another 100 internet warriors elevating her ego by promising her the world.

In the same way, when in a club you have to be direct. I'm of course not saying you should be grabbing every girl of interest near you, but if you're getting eye contact, you should be re-evaluating once or twice more at the most before going directly to the girl. Standing there like a mug staring at her is only going to transform you from "interesting guy" into "increasingly drunk weirdo." Also remember, you're in constant fierce competition when in a club. Even now, many guys only go to clubs to meet girls, because they know they're more likely to meet a girl who will put out.

I would agree with this, girls go to clubs for attention and depending on how much attention they're needing, this will determine how far they're likely to go. It's no secret when you meet a "party girl" who's been around a lot, they exude a false veneer of confidence. They may appear confident in certain situations, but sit one of these women down and scratch below the surface; you'll see there are massive insecurities. As such, they stand out in clubs, fucking guys when sometimes all the really want is the post-coitus hugs.

But that's the way the world is. You should have a constant goal of escalation, increasing comfort while maintaining intrigue mixed in with generous helpings of physical contact, preferably with increasing intimacy. Remember, you're not trying to grab her tits in the club – you're trying to ignite her emotionally so she's going to let you do whatever you want to them in the comfort of your own home.

Therein lies the key point; women are primarily emotionally driven. Your goal is to change her state to match whatever objective you have. This is for getting laid, for making a girl fall in love with you, for maintaining a relationship, everything involving women. Simply look at female-dominated work environments, which can be prone to being riddled with incompetence, yet sackings are rare because the “right type of person” and personal attachments are valued more than actual ability.

Disclaimer (sort of)

Despite what I’ve said here, there are a minority of good women out there—in my own experience of mainly western dating culture I would say about 5%. Don’t be so stupid to commit the typical male offense of thinking the girl you’re currently fucking is “different,” because she’s probably not. But if you are lucky enough to come across one of these quality minority, treat them as well (or just slightly less) as they are treating you. By employing these simple steps, you will ensure an active role in the topsy-turvy sexual marketplace of the west.

Read Next: The Difference Between A Woman’s Behavior And Her Intent

Jesus Baetana
Jesus Baetana is a man of Anglo-Italian descent, often found stood slack jawed in astonishment at the current state of gender politics today. He now resides in a small central European state, attempting to single-handedly wrest control of both it's wealth and women. Read more about his adventures at The Words Of A Man

Why Men Should Not Go To College

October 27, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

I've said it before, I'll say it again: going to college was one of the biggest mistakes I've ever made. I spent four years of my life in the ivory tower and got nothing out of it aside from a piece of paper, five figures worth of debt and some funny stories. What I do for a living now—writing—didn't require a degree and never has. If I could do things all over again, I'd have skipped college entirely, cashed out my bonds and gone carousing in Brazil or Thailand.

It's clear that I'm not the only one who thinks this way. For as long as I can remember, the percentage of men enrolled in colleges has dropped every year. Universities across America are becoming giant clam-fests, coffee klatches of sexually frustrated co-eds whining about the quality of men they're expected to hook up with. Barring some kind of housing crisis-esque meltdown in the student loan market, higher education is only going to get pinker as the years go on.

Good, I say. The day when the last young man decides that doing anything is better than pissing away four years of his life and $50,000 of his money on a sheepskin will be a glorious day indeed. Here is why most men should not go to college.

1. You will learn absolutely nothing

Outside of math and the hard sciences, most college curricula have zero factual basis. I don't mean necessarily that everything taught in them is a lie, but rather that there is no objective standard on which they are based. In math and hard sciences such as chemistry, for example, claims made by scholars and professors can be independently proven and verified. In the humanities and soft sciences, you can literally come up with any thesis you want and get away with it so long as you sound convincing.

For example, I once wrote a term paper for an English class contrasting Jimmy Stewart's character in Vertigo with Cary Grant's in North by Northwest, arguing that Stewart played an effete beta and Grant a dashing alpha male (I'm dead serious; this was shortly after I discovered Roissy, Roosh and other game blogs).

The problem with the humanities and other liberal arts degrees is that without an objective standard, learning is impossible. If the only metric by which students are judged is how accurately they follow the MLA citation guidelines, they will never learn anything. Not only that, it makes academic fraud ridiculously easy. For example, academic ghostwriting—writing other peoples' college papers for money—is now a huge industry in the U.S., with countless writers earning a living by helping students cheat. If someone who has never even cracked a book on literary criticism can write quality papers for an English class, it means English degrees are worth less than toilet paper.

2. You will put yourself in debt for years, if not decades

Unless your parents are rich or you've gotten some quality scholarships, you're going to have to finance your education by taking out student loans. Thanks to the collapsing economy and the usurious nature of student loans, you're going to be a debt slave for the better part of your adult life. Because student loans have ridiculous interest rates and cannot be discharged in bankruptcy, they will be an albatross around your neck, keeping you from marrying, having children, buying a house or doing anything worthwhile in life. Even if you luck out and end up with a decent job, your student loan payments will combine with your other expenses to keep you on the hamster wheel for years.

Aaron Clarey said it already in his brilliant book Worthless, but it bears repeating: it's absolutely insane that we allow 16 and 17-year-olds to make these kinds of decisions. We don't let them smoke, vote, or drink, yet we allow them to shackle themselves in the chains of debt slavery by letting them major in useless subjects. And when they end up slinging lattes at Starbucks, we scratch our heads and wonder "Hurr durr, how did THIS happen?"

3. You will be denigrated every day—and potentially arrested—for being a man

Imagine a black man who willingly puts himself in an environment where he's called the n-word every day and told he's an inferior, evil person because of the color of his skin. You'd think he was insane, right? Yet men are still choosing to attend universities where their Marxist, leftist, feminist professors preach hatred against men in general and straight white men in particular. To be a man in college is to be blamed for everything that's wrong with the world, from poverty to colonialism to environmental degradation. If I wanted to be picked on, I'd go see an insult comic.

You might think that being castigated for your Y chromosome is no big deal, but the rabid anti-male hatred on campuses is starting to have real-world effects. Consider that California's new "Yes Means Yes" sexual assault law effectively makes every sexually active man enrolled in the state's universities into a criminal. As attorney Mike Cernovich points out, the arbitrary and poorly-defined concept of "affirmative consent" means that any man can now potentially find himself behind bars for "rape." With New York Governor Andrew Cuomo recently forcing a version of "Yes Means Yes" on SUNY schools, maleness itself is rapidly becoming illegal on college campuses across the nation.

Not only that, but while your professors and administrators assert themselves as infallible moral authorities, they're engaging in degeneracy on a level that would make Caligula blush. Beyond professors tearing up political signs they disagree with and helping fabricate "hate crimes," both they and administrators are complicit in wide-scale academic fraud.

For example, most professors and administrators are well aware that many of their students are going to degree mills and passing in work that is not theirs. They do nothing because if they actually started expelling students for plagiarism (like the college syllabus says they're supposed to), that would mean fewer tuition dollars for the school and no money to pay their bloated salaries. If you're too much of a wuss for war, education is a pretty damn good racket.

The only reason to go to college if you have the talent and drive to major in a high-earning, math-centric degree such as computer engineering. Anything else is a waste of your time and money. But what do you do with your life if you aren't STEM-oriented? Here are some suggestions.

1. Learn a trade

Electricians, plumbers and other tradesmen are among the highest earners in the U.S., pulling down five- and six-figure salaries with only a few years' certification and experience. The cost of breaking into a trade is minimal as well, as you will typically be paid while you're apprenticed. Additionally, the trades are still a masculine field: you won't have to worry about politically correct HR commissars getting you fired for not toeing the leftist line. Finally, you will have job security, as no matter what happens to the economy, people will still need their electrical grids maintained and their water pipes working.

Despite this, men are reluctant to enter the trades because decades of liberal propaganda have made blue-collar jobs "uncool" and "low-class." My friend Dr. Illusion tells me that his company is absolutely screaming for new hires. The lack of new tradesmen has helped to push salaries up, meaning that if you're looking for a career in the trades, there's no better time than now.

2. Go to the Bakken oil fields

While the Bakken oil fields in North Dakota and Montana are no longer as active as they once were, enterprising men can still make bank there if they network well. No experience necessary. Halliburton, Select Energy and other oil companies are constantly looking for men to work on their hydrofracking rigs, with annual pay reaching into the six figures for some roughnecks. Even “menial” jobs in Williston, North Dakota and other oil towns pay well due to the region’s labor shortage. For example, when I lived in Williston two years ago, even Wal-Mart was paying $21 an hour.

3. Just do it

If you have lofty dreams of being an artist or businessman, you don't need a degree to achieve them. If you want to be a musician, forget about auditioning for Berklee and just take guitar lessons from the music shop in your town. If you want to be a writer, go score some mushrooms from the hippie down the street and take a trip (or do something else equally memorable). If you want to start a business, save up your pennies and just do it. Take advice from a guy like Robert Koch, who dropped out of college and began making money online, and is now living in Peru.

Avoiding college isn't merely a smart financial decision, it's one that may save your life. With hysteria about "date rape" reaching Red Scare-esque proportions, to be a man in an American university is to have a target on your head. Save your money and choose another path instead. While your "enlightened" feminist, you-go-grrl peers are stuck paying off their student loans on a minimum wage salary, you can be living the life of your dreams.

Read More: How To Get A Good Education Without Going To College

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Revolt: Genesis Of The Tunisian Revolution

October 27, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The individual man retains his position as an occasional formative force in history. He is the cause of countless effects, as well as the effect of sundry causes; he shapes his era, as much as it shapes him. There are great men all around us, with the potential to influence contemporary events in profound ways. Yet without the appropriate conditions precedent to act as the kindling, the fires of change would sputter and fizzle into smoky impotence.

Mohammad Bouazizi was born in the obscure Tunisian town of Sidi Bouzid in 1984, and was one of six children. Like many of his peers, he received a scant and middling education, and worked regularly since he was ten years old; since his late teens he labored to support an extended family consisting of a mother, uncle, and younger siblings. An estimated $140 per month in wages, earned by selling fruits and vegetables on the streets of Sidi Bouzid, was expected to be sufficient to keep both himself and these relatives clad and shod. Like the other governments in the region, Tunisia's was profoundly corrupt; important posts, jobs, and opportunities went to those who had connections. Those who did not—of which Bouazizi was one—had to fend for themselves.

The nation's president, Zine El Abedine Ben Ali, was only the latest of several contemptible mediocrities who had worn the presidential sash since the granting of the nation's independence. His vices, and those of his notorious spouse, were only circumscribed by their abilities to indulge them; as a consequence, an enfeebling stagnation descended on the population, which had learned to acquiesce fatalistically in the avarice of its leaders. Nepotism, venality, and a stifling bureaucracy was the rule of the day. A citizen unable or unwilling to navigate these turbid waters would quickly find himself destitute.

By all accounts, Bouazizi was an honest, upright man, seeking only the opportunity to provide a measure of support for himself and his kin. With no employment opportunities available to him, he worked as a street vendor of produce. On December 17, 2010, Bouazizi had purchased several hundred dollars' worth of produce to sell from his cart in the town center. He was then descended on by parasitic police officials claiming that he lacked the requisite "permit" to sell produce; but this, as any informed traveler to the region knows, is parlance in the Arab world for the payment of graft.

But Bouazizi did not have the money to bribe the police on this day. A female municipal official and her entourage confronted the miserable vendor and demanded payment; Bouazizi refused; and in the ensuing confrontation, either she or her entourage physically abused him. His produce scales and cart were confiscated. In any part of the world, a public slapping of a man by a woman would be a profound insult to masculine honor. It is even more so in the Arab world, which places a high value on the saving of masculine face.

His attempts to recover his wares came to nothing. An attempt to appeal to the local satrap was met with official silence. "How can I be expected to make a living?" he begged the governor in desperation. In front of the mayoral office later that morning, Bouazizi doused himself with gasoline and ignited it. Horrified onlookers, having been told that some sort of protest was underway, were unprepared for the ghastly spectacle of a man's suicide; and the passions of the crowd, aroused to fury at the sight of a death and its attendant injustice, gradually swelled into a seditious torrent that would carry all before it.

An opportunistic visit by Ben Ali aimed at a show of sympathy

Bouazizi remained in a coma and was transferred to several different hospitals. When public dismay at the story began to gather steam, President Ben Ali—ever the opportunist—decided that some public show of sympathy for the victim might be advisable. A photograph of the hospital visitation scene is grotesque. Bouazizi, wrapped in bandages, is surrounded by nervous, well-fed government officials and Ben Ali himself, all not knowing quite what to do. According to some sources, Ben Ali made promises to send Bouazizi abroad for advanced burn treatment; if so, these promises were not honored. Bouazizi died eighteen days after his act of self-immolation. But by then events had already begun to spiral out of control.

Protests and demonstrations began slowly, in scattered cities and towns around the country, but then began to gain momentum in a few days. Ben Ali, who had enjoyed unlimited power since 1989, hesitated at first, not knowing quite how to handle the situation. Long simmering resentment of Ben Ali and his wife, who was notorious for her own and her family's greed, exploded across Tunisia.

But because his government was supported by the United States and France, official reaction from abroad to the protests was non-existent. What became known as the "Sidi Bouzid Revolt" (in the Arabic press) or the "Jasmine Revolution" (in the West) surged from the countryside into the capital, Tunis. Trade union activists, lawyers, and public figures organized protests across the country to demand better job opportunities and less corruption. By early January of 2011, more than 95% of Tunisia's eight thousand lawyers were on strike; some rioters were killed by security forces. The demonstrations had now turned into a full-fledged revolt.

The Tunisian military, seeing the declining fortunes of their president, removed Ben Ali's personal security and made moves to take him into custody. By mid-January, apprehending his peril and not knowing how to restore the dignity of his office, he boarded a plan with his wife and a select group of cronies (and a considerable amount of money) and flew off into exile in Saudi Arabia.

The outcome might have ended differently had Ben Ali and his empress been made of sterner stuff. He lacked a Theodora to stiffen his backbone at the critical moment, as the Byzantine emperor Justinian had had during the Nika Revolt in Constantinople in 532 A.D. In that year, the seat of the Greek empire in the East was convulsed with demonstrations and disorder that had erupted from various factional provocations both real and imagined. Justinian's inclination was to abdicate, but at the critical moment, according to historian Edward Gibbon, his ruthless empress Theodora shamed his cowardice:

> "If flight," said the consort of Justinian, "were the only means of safety, yet I > should disdain to fly. Death is the condition of our birth; but they who have reigned should never survive the loss of dignity and dominion. I implore heaven that I may never be seen, not a day, without my diadem and purple; that I may no longer behold the light, when I cease to be saluted with the name of queen…For my own part, I adhere to the maxim of antiquity, that the throne is a glorious sepulchre."

Justinian then proceeded to crush the rebels with a brutal fist. He kept his throne, and went on to become the greatest of all Byzantine emperors. Alas, however, Ben Ali and his queen lacked the stomach for a fight, and preferred to flee with their treasures intact.

The aftershocks of the Tunisian Revolution were profound. Within a very short period of time, every other Arab country in North Africa (Morocco, Algeria, Libya, and Egypt) was engulfed in protests and demonstrations. In two of these nations—Libya and Egypt—the ruling clique was overthrown. The situation probably would have been the same in Algeria, were it not for the fact that the country's exhaustion from its civil war during the 1990s had left little enthusiasm for such ventures. Public protests even spread to Syria, which was soon plunged into its own bitter conflict (which was complicated by outside interference).

Although each nation's circumstances were different, the fact remains that, incredible as it may seem, the wave of revolt that pulsed through the Arab world after 2011 can be directly traced to the actions of one humble vegetable vendor. Not since the revolutions that swept through Europe in 1848, causing the crowned heads of several ancient monarchies to tremble in fear, had so much popular revolt happened in so little time. Anyone who would doubt the influence of personality on history has only to remember Mohammad Bouazizi.

Read More: Fact-Checking Emotional Propaganda

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Feminist Joan Jett's Music Demonstrates The Unfeminist Female Psyche

October 27, 2014 | by Charles Martel | Link | Original Link

Performing some mundane but necessary chores about the house the other day, I first put on some tunes. Standard practice with me and I am sure, many others.

Every now and then, a song that I have heard 557,000 times comes across in an entirely new way. So it was this day, when Joan Jett and the Blackheart's "I Hate Myself for Loving You" came on. A song that I have always liked, but until now, never fully understood. Joan Jett may very well be a feminist icon as her Wikipedia page states, but this song is some serious red pill truth. It is worth noting that the song was co-written by a man, one Desmond Child. Let's take a look at the lyrics…

> …Midnight, gettin' uptight, where are you?
> You said you'd meet me, now it's quarter to two
> I know I'm hangin' but I'm still wantin' you
> Hey Jack, it's a fact they're talkin' in town
> I turn my back and you're messin' around
> I'm not really jealous, don't like lookin' like a clown
> I think of you ev'ry night and day
> You took my heart then you took my pride away…

This guy is clearly an alpha of the first magnitude. He has stood her up, is blatantly messing around on her and she doesn't really care. She just wants him. She is more concerned with her reputation than his shagging of other girls. He has her firmly on the hook and has made it clear that she is a low priority.

> …I hate myself for loving you
> Can't break free from the things that you do
> I wanna walk but I run back to you
> That's why I hate myself for loving you > Ow! Uh…

Now we get to the famous refrain, "I Hate Myself for Loving You." More on that later…

> …Daylight, spent the night without you
> But I've been dreamin' 'bout the lovin' you do
> I'm over being angry 'bout the hell you put me through > Hey, man, bet you can treat me right
> You just don't know what you was missin' last night
> I wanna see you begging, say forget it just for spite
> I think of you ev'ry night and day
> You took my heart and you took my pride away…

Now we see the real yo-yo that is woman. The emotional back-and-forth of this short stanza is amazing and truly gets to the real crux of the matter. She got stood up and spent the night sexually frustrated, yet she is already forgiving him. At the same time, she had a fantasy in her head and imagined that it would've blown his mind, insinuating that he was the one who missed out on something special. Further, she says that she wants to see him begging, but we all know that is horseshit. That would kill it and she knows this also, that is why she has already forgiven him. She wants more of him, but this night he decided to service some other filly. He has options and is exercising them.

So, from the obverse we all get an idea of just what game is all about, but what more does this say about women and their psyche?*

The title really says it all- "I Hate Myself for Loving You." Other writers, more skilled than I, have extrapolated on the emotional roller coaster that women love more than anything. This is a woman (a feminist no less) confirming that. She is sure as hell not singing an ode to the beta male. This man plays her like the strumpet she is and she hates herself for it.

What one must understand, is this—women talk a lot about love, but what they really mean is "respect." Any women would rather have a man they respect than a man they "love." Love is merely a more socially acceptable word. If the way to a man's heart is through his stomach, the way to a woman's heart is through her respect. Get her to respect you and love will follow.

For a woman, what follows after love is self questioning—am I good enough? Pretty enough? Why can't I nail this guy down? Yet that is exactly the situation that women crave. Each woman pretends that her vagina is worth gold. In reality, they all know that it really isn't worth so much. Nevertheless, women indulge in the con game of vagimodity. The fact is that if you gain a woman's respect, she will hate herself for that, all the while loving you.

Read More: Women React To Not Being Your Priority

Charles Martel
Charles is a hack writer and all around shiftless individual. He has spent his time traveling and in a wide variety of occupations. If it can be said that he has any goals in life at all, it is to impart just a small bit of his hard earned wisdom. He can be followed on twitter here
Follow @CharlesMartel19

Book Reviews Of “Made To Stick” and “Tapped Out”

October 27, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following is a compilation of two brief book reviews.

Made To Stick

This book attempts to deconstruct why some ideas tend to stick (i.e. become viral) by giving you examples of sticky ideas and why they were effective. Tips include:

> Mysteries are powerful, Cialdini says, because they create a need for closure.
>
> […]
>
> Curiosity, he says, happens when we feel a gap in our knowledge. Loewenstein argues that gaps cause pain. When we want to know something but don’t, it’s like having an itch that we need to scratch. To take away the pain, we need to fill the knowledge gap. We sit patiently through bad movies, even though they may be painful to watch, because it’s too painful not to know how they end.
>
> […]

> Knowledge gaps create interest. But to prove that the knowledge gaps exist, it may be necessary to highlight some knowledge first. “Here’s what you know. Now here’s what you’re missing.”
>
> […]
>
> …try appealing to more profound types of self-interest.

Much of the book’s proclamations were hinged on dubious psychological “studies” that were mere surveys of college students in some contrived setting. The authors managed to find the most boring psychological anecdotes possible, which make you feel as if you’re reading a poor man’s Gladwell. It wasn’t until the epilogue did I feel a payoff when they presented a cheat sheet of sorts that gave an overview of their methods, with the most useful being “use analogies.” Attach a story to your idea that increases the chance it will be remembered. This entire book could be distilled into a blog post that may give you an idea or two, but nothing more.

The two men who wrote the book are brothers Chip and Dan Heath. Does their name ring a bell to you? Probably not, and there are no clients of theirs that you know. In other words, the authors are essentially keyboard jockeys who haven’t created anything viral themselves, but have done “research” into the matter in the form of low sample size studies. I think I’m as qualified to write this book as they are.

In the end this is a boring pop psychology book that has caused me to decide never again to read a pop psychology book.

Read More: “Made To Stick” on Amazon

Tapped Out

This is the story of an aging self-described beta male who decides to train and fight in an MMA match. The book chronicles his training, his trainers, and the arguments with his fiance, who doesn’t approve of his lifestyle. The book flies at a smooth pace and keeps you engaged, with many lol moments spread throughout.

> For the average person, the initial reaction to getting hit hard in the face is to turn away. For the average fighter, the initial reaction is to get angry and try to return the favor. Both are mistakes. The proper response is to act as if you were never hit. Show no reaction. If your opponent sees either pain or rage, he will know he hurt you, and no matter how tired he is, it will turbocharge his battery.
>
> […]

> “You see, you had to tap,” Magno said. “The fight is over and no one is hurt. Jiu-jitsu is the gentle art.”
>
> “I see,” I said, rubbing my elbow. “And what if I hadn’t tapped out?”
>
> “Then your elbow pop, pop, pops,” he said. “And you must visit doctor.”
>
> […]
>
> Sitting back on the benches of the gym with my leg up and the ice bag strapped to my leg, Ryan wandered past me, stopped, and asked, “You all right?” It was one of the things I liked most about MMA fighters. They didn’t mind putting a little hurt on a teammate, but they never wanted to cause an injury. They wanted to win, often desperately, but not at the expense of permanent damage. They were in the hurt game, not the injury game.

There was even some game advice from one of his trainers who re-packaged the classic venue change move as “the bounce,” which greatly impressed the author:

> “It’s called ‘The Bounce,’” Dennis started, slowly warming to his subject. “On a first date, most guys think up something elaborate, but at the end of the night it is still a first date and women have rules about first dates. Instead, I invite a girl out for coffee or something. Then I text some friends and arrange to go over to a bar and get some drinks. An hour later, I propose that she and I grab a bite to eat. Bounce, bounce, bounce. It’s not a first date; it’s three mini-dates. Women have different rules after a third date.”
>
> “You’re an evil genius,” I said with admiration.

I didn’t like how supplicant and fearful he was of his fiance (in one part he describes how to buy the perfect engagement ring). Here you have an American guy taking a big risk to fight MMA but still grovels before a woman as if she is the only one left on Earth who will have sex with him. My other complaint is that the book was too short. For two years of training, the story flies too fast, introducing a series of characters that you don’t really feel invested in. Nonetheless, the book was entertaining and funny. I recommend it if you have any interest in martial arts.

Read More: “Tapped Out” on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

People Oppose Anonymity Because They Can’t Think For Themselves

October 28, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Feminists and social justice warriors hate online anonymity. In the recent months, there has been a deluge of articles arguing that the internet is rife with harassment because people can hide behind online handles, and only total digital monitoring can make women feel safe online. Likewise, many in the manosphere have said the only way to root out fakes and posers positioning themselves as internet alphas is for men to write under their real names. Imagine that, men and social justice warriors in agreement. Too bad they’re both wrong.

In the early days of the internet, before AOL brought vast unwashed masses online, there was a utopic and perhaps naive vision, that anonymity would make the internet a place where ideas were evaluated based on their merit rather than who said them. Elite-approved experts were a constraint of old media. The internet was a meritocracy. It didn’t matter what the gatekeepers thought of you. If you had a voice and your content was good, you could have an audience.

It is ironic that social justice warriors would want to eliminate a system that removes race, gender, class, and age. You don’t know if the writer behind these words is an elderly Jewish woman, a grandfather of ten, or a very articulate thirteen-year-old. Sure, I write for Return of Kings and present myself as a young man, but how do you know?

I’m not saying that race or gender don’t matter. They obviously do, and if you’ve read my writing, you know I believe they do. What I’m saying is that who a writer is has no bearing on whether or not their ideas are true. By hiding his or her identity, a writer can keep the discussion focused on their ideas, rather then themselves.

Why People Oppose Anonymity

Anonymity forces you to evaluate a writer only on their work, which is precisely why so many oppose it. The people against online anonymity are intellectually lazy. They want to be able to tell what they think of an idea based on who is telling them to think that way. They want to nod when a minority, "alpha male," or person who looks like them tells them something. Knowing an author only by their words forces readers to think abstractly, to think for themselves, and they hate it.

Social justice warriors and feminists hate anonymity because they do not believe in objective truth. They believe it matters more who makes a certain statement than what is being said. The same words that are okay for a black lesbian to say, might be offensive if a white heterosexual male says them. This is precisely why social justice warriors hate Anne Gus and #notyoursheild.

Likewise, even criminal accusations of rape carry more weight if the person making them has a vagina. Without being able to see the race and gender of the person speaking, social justice warriors and feminists don't know what to think and have no idea what ad hominem to hurl.

Some in the manosophere hate anonymity because they are not actually interested in bettering themselves. They are looking for a strong father figure to tell them what to think and do. They want to see if the writer is alpha, so they feel comfortable blindly following him, rather than evaluating his ideas for themselves. If you're willing to do something just because a self-professed alpha male told you it was alpha, it doesn't make you alpha. It makes you a follower.

Something that works for one man may not work for you. The only way evaluate an idea is to actually try it out and think for yourself. There is no shortcut. No one else's commands can make you the master of yourself. If you're still worried about being "alpha" you will never become anything that remotely resembles the concept.

It’s Not About The Author – It’s About You

The funny thing about being anonymous is the assumptions people make about you. They’ll wildly speculate about your penis size based on an essay on gender theory. Or ascribe claims to you that you’ve never made. I’ve had people assume I must be a massive alpha male because I write for Return of Kings, despite me repeatedly telling them I’m not, and I don’t even like the term alpha male. These assumptions usually say more about the person making them then they do about the author.

The point of my writing isn’t me—it’s you. What did you get out of it? Have my ideas improved your life? If you come away from my writing thinking “This guy is the biggest alpha ever,” I’ve failed you as much as if you were to think “This guy is the biggest poser ever.” I want you to come away thinking “I can be the person I want to be. I can change my life in the way that I want to.”

Anonymity Could Change The News

Imagine if the focus was always on ideas, rather than gossip about the author. When Snowden leaked documents on the NSA, everyone wanted to know who he was. News companies ran stories on his girlfriend, his teenage modeling shots, his old gaming chatlogs—and ignored the largest domestic spying program in US history. Would the leaks have had a greater impact had the media been denied this juicy gossip?

One of the greatest digital revolutions of our time was released anonymously—itcoin. We still don’t know who created bitcoin. There’s been a lot of discussion about bitcoin, but all of it has been about the currency, not the creator (despite the medias best efforts to find him and harass a false target). What might have happened to the currency had there been a public figure behind it whose private life could be mined for controversy? Could the currency be put in jeopardy every time he opened his mouth and made a controversial statement?

The Push Against Anonymity Is About Power

This is just the benefit of anonymity to an author's ideas and writing. I haven't even talked about the more common reason for online anonymity—protecting authors from witch-hunts and the blowback of controversial ideas. The manosphere would not likely exist had its early writers been forced to blog under their real names. Anonymity allows writers to talk openly about their sexuality and personal experiences without fear of family or co-workers reading their blog. If all Return of Kings authors wrote under their real names, I am certain we would be harassed in our private lives, because we are already harassed even under pseudonyms.

The real reason many social justice warriors are against anonymity is because it prevents them from harassing writers and getting them fired from jobs. It prevents tech companies from collecting accurate data on public forums. Even in the manosphere, anonymity prevents internet marketers from slandering their competition by claiming they are "not a real alpha male" without photographic evidence. Like most things, the push against online anonymity comes back to money and power.

I am not saying all writers should be anonymous. However the benefits of anonymity are rarely discussed, and the push against it is motivated by anti-intellectualism, and a hatred of ideas. To me, the red pill has always been about truth, and the willingness to pursue and see truth no matter where it leads. The rest is distraction. Leave the gossip to women. Let's focus instead on truth and improving ourselves.

Read More: Who Killed Adulthood in American Culture?

Eric Crowley
Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

Society Is Oblivious To The Warnings Of Literature

October 28, 2014 | by A "Nihilist" Frank | Link | Original Link

History repeats itself, because no one was listening the first time. Yet it is not just history, and the non-fiction books which document it, that should serve as a warning to all of humanity about where we are headed. There is plenty to be learned from classic literature and fiction novels as well, about who we are and where we are headed. And although most fiction is meant to entertain us, there is plenty of literature out there that allegorically shames us for where we have been, or warns us about where we are headed.

My personal favorite example of this type of fiction is the “dystopian future” literature. Not the apocalyptic or zombie variety, but rather the “oppressive all-powerful authoritarian government” kind. Famous works of literature such as Zamyatin’s We, Huxley’s Brave New World, Orwell’s 1984, or Rand’s Anthem were written to serve as blatantly obvious warnings about a very real and possible not-so-distant future, where man is dominated by the state and individuality is destroyed, often in the name of creating a false utopia. The problem is that so many damn people miss this obvious point.

Many of these dystopian books are read and taught in school (or at least they were in my day, God only knows what kind of idiotic dumbed-down crap the modern public schools are “teaching” today). During my high school years I recall reading the books above, and just like millions of other students. They are not obscure. They are in fact well-known and highly regarded works, with a large segment of the population having read at least some of them. They should also be especially well-known and well-read books among the so-called educated, enlightened, and academic pseudo-intellectual progressive crowd.

Hell, even if we dumb it down a notch, we can still look at some of the wildly popular tween book franchises, such as The Hunger Games or Divergent, which share many similar themes with the classics, and also have a widespread young readership. So therefore it is not as if these themes are out in the public mind.

Let's dumb it down a notch further, to the absolute lowest common denominator, and infer that even if the illiterate dregs of society have not read any of these books at all, than they must have at least seen a movie version of one of these books. Even barring that, let's assume that they must have at least seen some movie with similar themes or plots during some point in their lives. These themes and warnings to humanity have been dispersed to a wide audience in one form of media or another. Again, the problem is that so many ignorant people out there are completely oblivious to this message, and miss the obvious point entirely.

I suppose that most people out there, assuming that they are even capable of comprehending the themes in these types of stories, see them as nothing more than fiction and entertainment value. They hold the naive assumption that it could never happen here or to them, and that our society could never actually end up that way, all the while mindlessly voting for the very people and policies that are contributing to the erosion of individual liberty and rights while strengthening the central authoritarian power of the state. And it is all in the name and the false promise of creating utopia. The sheer lack of a connection is mind-blowing, but it is not at all surprising.

The other category of people who are utterly oblivious, are so-called intelligent "useful idiots" who actually claim to understand the point of this literature. These so-called enlightened intellectuals will proudly brag about how well read and educated they are, and will proudly admit to reading many of these books, yet they still completely miss the point. Oh they will absolutely acknowledge with a straight face the dangerous themes and warnings within these books, yet they will always point the finger at the "other side." They will always attribute the road to oppression with the policies of the opposite side, never once looking in the mirror to see that they are cheering for their own demise.

The progressive left will blame those on the conservative right. They will blatantly call them fascists, nationalists, xenophobic racists, and Nazis, who are hell-bent on enacting some kind of corporatist authoritarian police state. They are completely oblivious, unconcerned, or complicit that their own progressive socialist, Marxist, statist, and social justice utopian policies will erode freedom, individualism, and individual rights just the same, all while granting limitless power to the state.

The establishment right will blame the left as well, calling them socialists, communists, and progressives, hell-bent on enacting an all-powerful centrally-planned economy and government. They too are oblivious, unconcerned, or complicit that their own neo-con, corporate welfare, and progressive right policies serve only to empower the state as well.

This is a complete and utter lack of understanding by many, that two roads can very well lead to the same place. There are many roads to hell, all of them paved with good intentions. It is a failure to think critically, and to delve deep into the dangers of one's own belief system. Just because someone happens to agree with the policies of their own side, doesn't make them any less potentially dangerous. Utopia means very different things to different people.

Those who fail to learn history are doomed to repeat it. Millions of people in this world have been killed in the name of creating utopia. Millions still live under the boot of oppression, whatever the name of that oppression may be. Whether history, non-fiction, or literature, the lessons are clear to those willing to see them.

Read More: The Frenchman Who Took A Stand Against Socialism

A "Nihilist" Frank
Frank is a nihilistic, misanthropic, politically-incorrect, cynical-asshole, intellectual, metal-head, weightlifter, conservative-Libertarian, Generation X'er. His observations and opinion of modern society and culture is far from flattering. His essays can be found at www.nihilisttemple.com

How Al Bundy’s Advice Changed My Life

October 28, 2014 | by Average Guy | Link | Original Link

> Kelly: Daddy, did you pick up the permission slip at school like I asked you?
>
> Al: Pumpkin, have I ever disappointed you before?
>
> Kelly: Yes Daddy. Lots of times.
>
> Al: Then what I have to tell you won’t come as a surprise.

When “Married With Children” first came on the air the buzz was about cheap, mindless bathroom humor. So I didn’t watch the first two seasons. Finally, I watched an episode and discovered it was hilarious…and hilarious because it was filled with truth and wisdom. It became a favorite show of mine. I watched it for years and in reruns.

In one episode a young, handsome salesman has begun working with Al at the shoe store. Al and the young man have bonded because they both played football at Polk High. One day the young man comes to work and asks Al for advice. He wants to ask his high school sweetheart to marry him. Al is horrified. Al was an all-state fullback who once scored 4 touchdowns in one game. Then he married Peggy, his high school sweetheart, and his life went downhill from there.

Desperate to save his young friend from making the same mistake he had made, Al takes the young man for a walk in the mall. They come to the intersection with a large circle of benches for weary shoppers to rest. The seating area is filled with men holding on to large shopping bags from department stores. They're obviously the "mules" for their wives…assigned to follow the women around and carry the bags. The men all sit expressionless. Like zombies bored out of their minds but resigned to their fate.

Al tells the young man that he is young and vibrant and full of life. He has endless possibilities. Then Al points to the men sitting with the bags and says, "They all used to be like you."

Fast forward 10 years. I'm following my wife in the mall carrying her shopping bags. "My God," I thought, "I'm Al Bundy."

A few days later I woke up and looked at my wife standing naked at the dresser. My wife was young and beautiful with a centerfold figure. We'd had great sex the night before as we had every night we'd been together. And every time we made love I asked myself if all that came with marriage to this woman made the sex worth it. I'd always answered that question "yes" but nevertheless, I was asking the question. This morning my answer would change.

I reviewed the trade-off. It was difficult for me to be a dog on a leash. The loss of freedom, dealing with her irrational moments, no longer having control over decisions for my time and money and energy, living in fear of displeasing her…I had willingly accepted all of it for the promise of love, devotion and companionship…and steady sex. But now I was rethinking that decision. I wanted to run and put it all behind me. I wanted my life back.

So, there I am laying in bed looking at her beautiful, naked ass and asking myself if that ass was worth the trade-off. What possessed me to think the following I'll never know. My thought was, "I can do better." That's a bold statement for a man to say about his young, beautiful wife. In that moment I was prepared to give up the love, devotion, and sex in order to get my freedom back.

I had no reason to think I could do better but for some reason I believed it and I wanted a life with possibilities. I'd never traveled outside the country. I wasn't thinking at that moment of moving to a foreign country. My life in America wasn't bad at all but, for some reason, I thought I could do better. More importantly, I had to have my life back. I was no longer willing to trade my freedom for a secure sex life.

And, as it would come to pass, I did do better. Better than I could ever have imagined. Girls more beautiful. Girls sexier. The bar has been raised and my ex-wife is a distant memory. But, the best part of the decision I made that morning is that now I'm in charge of my life. I have the power. I make my own decisions based on my own self-interests. In a sentence, I got my balls back.

I owe Al Bundy a debt of gratitude. I can't remember if the young man in that episode took Al's advice, but I sure did. And I'm better off for it.

Read More: 5 Pieces Of Advice For Men Who Are Tired Of Being Beta

Average Guy
AG is a recovering Beta chump who wishes he'd had red pill information in his young, formative years. A lover of women, sports, travel and freedom he now enjoys all of them as never before. You can email him at

Why GamerGate Could Be A Turning Point In The Culture War

October 29, 2014 | by Jef Costello | Link | Original Link

GamerGate has morphed from a seemingly-innocuous case of infidelity to perhaps the single dominant issue in the blogosphere in less than two months. As such, yet another piece on the subject might seem like overkill, but as of this writing I have yet to see a comprehensive analysis of the place GamerGate has in a larger, historical context. To date, the majority of the discussion has been about whether GamerGate is about ethics in gaming journalism, or whether it is merely the Trojan horse that carries a legion of misogynists to make the world of gaming a dangerous place for anyone who is not a white male.

While this question dominates the current discussion, it is merely a part of a larger battle in video games, which in turn is a part of a larger Culture War. The recent developments in the video game "theatre" of this war have the potential to be extremely damaging to one of the combatants, as it has exposed its true colors to a wide audience for quite possibly the first time. If the correct message is taken from the GamerGate saga, it may not spell the immediate end for the defeated camp, as its ideology currently dominates popular thought. As such, change will be a slow burn, but it will be achieved.

Why Games?

In a sentence, games became a space ripe for battle thanks to its evolution from a nerd culture staple to a pop culture staple. For much of its history, video games were the domain of the ultra-nerdy, pimply-faced computer geek. To be sure, a much wider demographic of people played games growing up, especially with the rise of the console. But for most people, games were just another tool, a means to an end. It was just one of the possible things you could do with friends or by yourself after school or over the weekend. Activities like watching TV, playing outdoors, or hanging out at the mall were all simple substitutes.

Being a hardcore gamer meant that the game was the end, almost to the point of obsession. There were no substitutes. Instead of spending Friday nights going to the school dances and seeing what sort of mischief you could get into at a friend's house afterwards, all-night LAN parties were the order of the day. The level of dedication and involvement most hardcore gamers showed, combined with the fact that this attention was focused on an inanimate portal into a virtual world, led to a stereotype with negative connotations. You were anti-social, didn't fit in, you were just weird.

Then Halo came along. The advancement of the first-person shooter, combined with the introduction of online console play, took gaming to another level. The further advancement of gameplay, graphics, and the ubiquity of high speed internet connections turned gaming into an experience that could be shared with people across the world. 15 years ago, the pinnacle of gaming for the average guy was having a few friends over and shooting at each other a bit in Goldeneye 64. Now, it is teaming up with those same friends and engaging in complex tactical battles against people from all over the planet, in extraordinarily vast, deep, rich virtual worlds that closely resemble reality.

This transformation of gaming was mostly a visual, graphical transformation, versus a change in the content and the basic style of games. The increased visual appeal in addition to the increased depth of the games introduced a more movie-like quality, with the added bonus that the user could be immersed in it. With that movie-like quality came movie-like attention, movie-like money, movie-like marketing campaigns and movie-like releases. Video game tournaments have the capability to draw crowds in excess of 100,000. At the very highest level, individual gamers can earn millions, and have millions of viewers watch their newest videos on YouTube. As it stands now, video games are a $100 billion industry, fully entrenched in popular culture.

Through it all, our LAN-partying "gamer" never really changed, he just got older. The games kept improving, so he kept playing, even as the industry crept into the purview of the general population. It is this intersection between gamer culture and popular culture which has caused fireworks of late, owing to the fact that the former is male-dominated while the latter, as has been discussed in the manosphere for quite some time, is female-dominated.

Most would take issue with the idea of the LAN-partying gamer image as masculine, but it is more to do with the games themselves, and the environment that surrounds gameplay. On a very base level, most games involve an unstable situation which the user must survive. This dynamic is true of the real world, and although females are also subjected to this reality, throughout history it has generally been males who have had to navigate through the uncertainties of the world in a more direct manner. Think male hunters as opposed to female gatherers. Video games force one to play the hunter with efficiency, or the consequence is death.

The negative stereotype surrounding gamers is ultimately borne from the fact that this sort of masculinity is engaged only virtually. Why spend so much time shooting zombies and imposing your will on level bosses, when you can break down barriers and impose your will on the real world? The perception is you can't, and thus the complete and total immersion into the virtual world marked the gamer as weak in the real one, rightly or wrongly.

Incidentally, that gaming has exploded to reach the masses as it has suggests this "weakness" has now spread to society as a whole (see here, and here). That is beyond the scope of this piece. What is relevant here is that video games, a predominantly male space, have now entered the mainstream. Thus any and all messages conveyed must be "appropriate." It was ok if only a few harmless geeks ingested some off-brand media, since they were losers nobody listened to or cared about. Send the same sort of messages to everyone, including the "cool kids," and there might be a problem, since they set the trends and have the influence.

Feminist Game Critics Want to Change Games – Not Add New "Representative" Niches

Enter the feminist video game critic.

The rise of video game culture into pop culture, and the money and power that came with it brought about a powerful medium with which political and cultural mores could be shaped. Such a large, fundamentally masculine entity such as video games suddenly garnering the attention of multinational corporations was never going to be tolerated long by feminists and their allies. The media has framed the response by gamers to the views brought forth by feminists in the following manner:

> GamerGate is ostensibly about ethics in gaming journalism, but in reality its misogynistic core is tainting whatever aims the actual movement is trying to achieve

This is a disingenuous supposition. Underlying the mainstream critiques of GamerGate is a theme of gamers having their clubhouse invaded and not liking it. Brianna Wu, a game developer, said as much in an article she penned for the Washington Post last week. This visual is actually a very good tool for explaining the faults of the argument the anti-GamerGate crowd is making, as there are only two reasons an outsider would want to enter a clubhouse he or she is not privy to.

The first is because he or she appreciates the environment in that clubhouse, wants to experience that environment, and is willing to be constructive in furthering and supporting that environment. The other reason is that he or she wants to destroy the clubhouse and its environment, for whatever reason.

The feminist video game critique is clearly driven by the second reason. Perhaps the most prominent critic is Anita Sarkeesian, who is the creator of a series of videos on YouTube which examine how women are portrayed in video games. According to her, the representation of women is generally demeaning or dis-empowering to the extent they are represented at all. She has every right to express these views without harassment, and my point here is not to address her specific concerns, but rather her general concern that female representation is a huge problem in gaming.

Sarkeesian has purportedly identified a problem with a product, which has not been addressed sufficiently. In most situations, this presents opportunity. The creation of a new product which fixes a problem is a source of value in the marketplace, which is rewarded handsomely. Rather than taking this line of action, Sarkeesian would rather complain really loudly about it. Interestingly enough, she did receive upwards of $150,000 in funding for her YouTube video project, which on one level may suggest that the rethinking of women in video games is a subject the market may be interested in.

Yet wouldn't a better use of that money have been to actually fund video game development in that image, bringing forth a tangible product that represents its ideals? If female under-representation in gaming is really such a scourge on the industry, real, tangible steps towards bringing a more "ideal" product to market would have been welcomed handsomely. Yet Sarkeesian and her allies choose to complain about the existing product. Having entered clubhouse, she is essentially screaming and banging pots and pans together to call attention to the fact that she does not like the furniture is arranged and that it must be changed.

This is at the crux of the vitriol Sarkeesian and others like her have received. The fact that they are women is not the source of the negative pushback they are getting – this would make it misogyny. It is the fact that their opinions are being couched as rock-solid fact and used to force feed sweeping changes into the industry, an industry these critics had no time for when there was no Call of Duty around, grossing $1 billion on the first day of sales.

To the credit of Brianna Wu, she has at least made tangible steps to address what she may consider a problem in the gaming industry. She is a game developer, and helped to start an independent game studio which seeks to produce games with female protagonists. As far as I'm aware, nobody tried to stop Wu in this endeavor. The video game industry has not colluded to prevent her work from seeing the light of day or being assessed fairly. Her product has been brought to market and assessed by the market, so it can only be surmised that the source of Wu's angst is her unhappiness with that assessment. Invading the clubhouse is seemingly not enough; the red carpet must accompany the invasion.

The bottom line is that if the repeated kidnapping of Princess Peach over the last 25 years of Super Mario games was really such a grave problem in the industry, it would have been addressed. People would have stopped playing video games which featured men blowing stuff up to save the girl, and sales would have dropped. If gamers had wanted to play games which featured tons of Strong, Independent, Empowered women (preferably overweight ones: characters like Lara Croft are no good because they become "objects"), there would have been a market for it.

The customers dictate the gaming content, and to date they haven't cared for feminist narratives polluting them. As discussed above, the meteoric rise of games came on the back of "gamer culture" as it was prior to its commercialization. Attempting to change the culture just because it has a wider audience now is ultimately changing a winning formula. That is the concern here, nothing more, nothing less. It certainly is not misogyny.

Operation Gawkerossa

Unfortunately, that hasn't stopped the media from screaming misogyny at every turn. One of the more egregious examples took place during this segment on MSNBC.

NBC reporter Irin Carmon had this to say about the relationship between games and larger culture:

> Misogyny is the air that we breathe…gaming is a piece of culture, a culture like anything else, and it absorbs the same kind of warped messages that we all do about gender and power and violence…
>
> Interviewer: At the same time, I know a lot of gamers would probably respond and say this is just gaming. We're just having fun, we're enjoying ourselves. Why do we have to be thinking about social justice issues, why do we have to be thinking about feminism? Why can't we just enjoy games?
>
> Carmon: I would say there is no world that is not imbued by politics. If you believe that you have no identity, no race, then you are probably a very privileged person. If you're a woman in this male dominated world, you are always marked by being a woman. There is no space that isn't inflicted by politics. I think they maybe want to slam their hands over their ears and say 'leave us alone we wanna do our thing,' but guess what? Your thing is politics too and it's just a matter of opening up and listening, you don't have to agree with all of the critiques. But people have a right to make their voice heard, and I really admire and respect the women who have continued speaking out despite the fact that they've been met with unconscionable attacks.

As mentioned before, there is nobody silencing feminist critiques. There has been a lot of "opening up and listening," it is just that the message conveyed has not been well-received. This rejection has been redefined by the mainstream as "misogynist hate speech," in attempt to garner sympathy and support on an emotional level. The stakes are very high, and losing the chance to fill a large cultural force such as games with feminist doctrine is a big risk. It means that the millions that play games will be absorbing "warped messages" about gender relations. So when the feminist message met that resistance, the next level of combat began.

In late August, a slew of posts on various blogs and online media outlets proclaimed the "gamer" as a thing of the past, a dying breed. The essence of these posts is encapsulated in the following quote from Dan Golding:

> Today, videogames are for everyone. I mean this in an almost destructive way.

> Videogames, to read the other side of the same statement, are not for you. You do not get to own videogames. No one gets to own videogames when they are for everyone. They add up to more than any one group.

This, along with Carmon's comments on MSNBC speaks to the crusade of the social justice warrior (SJW): the fight against privilege. Male privilege, white privilege, thin privilege, straight privilege, cis privilege, Christian privilege. Essentially any human trait that can be construed to having an advantage in any context is a threat, which must be acted against for the good of all.

With respect to games and gamers, the mostly white male demographic which comprises its most fervent acolytes is a threat to the social justice warrior because the ascendance of gaming into the mainstream theoretically means the furtherance of a mostly white male influence, which in the mind of the social justice warrior, undermines attempts to create an equalist utopia.

Thus "gamers," or at least that stereotype, had to be sacrificed. Recall that the part of the gamer stereotype is being an anti-social weakling who didn't get out much and was likely to be ridiculed. These shortcomings were tapped into by most of the anti GamerGate articles when painting a picture of the average GamerGate supporter, as if to say "these guys are losers, nobody should care what they think." A more explicit playing up of the loser frame was put forth by Sam Biddle, editor of Valleywag, an arm of Gawker. He recently tweeted the following:

This was followed up later by Max Read, editor in chief at Gawker, who after engaging with GamerGaters enraged with Biddle, posted the following:

Representatives of Gawker, one of the largest, if not the largest social justice warrior enclave on the internet, established themselves as the guy who stole the nerdy kid's glasses and laughed at him while he fumbled about trying to find them. In other words, they played the very role of the "privileged" individual they have constantly tried to denounce. All because of the gamers' refusal to comply with the SJW narrative.

This message from such a large media entity led to a backlash on Twitter and elsewhere, which culminated in sponsors such as Mercedes Benz, Adobe, Intel, and Nissan backing away from Gawker and similar sites which espoused the anti-GamerGate position, particularly the "nerd bullying" angle of Biddle and Read.

The response of the GamerGate crowd to the SJW attempt to bully and shame gamers into submission suggests that the SJWs have picked the wrong fight. Gamers have long been natural allies of SJW causes, owing to their position as outcasts for most of their existence. Even though they are mostly white males, they were mostly not the cool kids, meaning they qualified for SJW protective status as a group without privilege. That the rejection of feminist ideology was then followed up with full-scale SJW shaming tactics normally reserved for "racists," "bigots," "homophobes," and other culture war criminals (i.e. anyone who didn't unquestioningly accept their doctrine) alerted the gamers. They have begun to wake up and understand that their dissent is not to be tolerated.

On a simpler level, the SJWs picked an opponent which is as qualified, if not more qualified to wage a digitally-based war. It is one thing to use social media to eviscerate a prominent middle aged "bigot" for whom sending emails is an unnatural action. It is another to go after a group deeply entrenched in the ways of the internet. Indeed, the decisions of sponsors were spurred on by an uproar within online communities such as Reddit and 8chan, which worked together to voice their concerns in a large way. I suspect this has taken the SJWs aback. In many ways, gamers are perhaps first group that can effectively take on SJW tactics and use them against the SJWs. This has big implications for the Culture War generally, of which GamerGate is a part.

Is this the Reversal of the Ideological Trend?

The error of the SJWs in turning on gamers in the Culture War mirrors one of the largest errors in the history of actual wars. Over 70 years ago, a certain European power turned on another European power, with which it had a prior agreement. The perpetrators totally underestimated the nature of the operation, thinking that a certain large, frozen country could be easily vanquished within a few weeks. They were wrong, and were wholly unprepared for winter. The loss of men, time, and weaponry, in addition to starting a two-front war led to their ultimate demise, when prior to that they were in a position of strength.

Similarly, the SJWs have, like it or not, elevated themselves into a position of strength in the Culture War. The GamerGate saga underlines this, given the flood of support the anti-GamerGate side has received from heavyweights in mainstream media, both traditional and online forms. Yet, even with the advantage of currently dominating the cultural narrative, the anti-Gamergate SJW camp hit the self-destruct button.

The reality is that GamerGate would have blown over in a week if a few white knights had done the unthinkable and let a girl on the internet look bad for a few days. The zoepost, if left on its own, probably would have been forgotten as the ramblings of a butthurt guy, with a further manosphere diagnosis as another case of oneitis for the wrong girl. It was only when the SJW sympathetic parts of 4chan, Reddit, and prominent video game forums systematically shut down discussion of the issue that it started snowballing, as the conspiratorial elements of the zoepost began to look like legitimate concerns.

The discussion blew up, and the SJWs became more and more defensive, decrying any and all criticism of their position as misogynist hate speech. With their most recent move, an explicit attack on gamers and gamer culture, they risk starting a reversal of the multi decade encroachment of their ideology into all aspects of life. For those who are interested in normal human interaction, and not living in an Orwellian world, this is undoubtedly a good development. How far the reversal will go is yet to be seen.

All that can be said right now is that the cool winds of fall are warning of the freeze to come, and the SJWs are stuck without winter apparel.

Read More: ROK Is Looking To Hire A GamerGate Correspondent

Jef Costello
Jef enjoys bloviating about various subjects such as sport, politics, men's style, film and culture. Read more at thecerclerouge.com

Was Jian Ghomeshi Fired From CBC For Baseless Allegations?

October 29, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Jian Ghomeshi is a Canadian former talk show host, the man behind very popular radio show Q for eight years during a nearly 14-year career with the Canadian Broadcasting Company (CBC). Ghomeshi had built up significant amount of good will with left-leaning Canadians by espousing a platform of equalism and social justice, having just spoken out with an anti-GamerGate bent earlier this month. Most Canadians even assumed that he was a homosexual, a protected and elevated class in the word view to which his show pandered.

That all ended several days ago, when Ghomeshi was fired from CBC for claims of assault made against him by an ex-girlfriend, who alleged that their rough sexual escapades were non-consensual. When the scandal broke, he went to the CBC with confidential information, which the company then used to fire him. CBC had even told him they believed that the allegations were without merit.

Ghomeshi is suing the government-funded CBC for defamation, breach of confidence and punitive damages. The lawsuit is for $55 million. The suit claims that Ghomeshi was fired because CBC thought it would be bad publicity if the public learned about the host's BDSM practices. The Financial Post thinks that he will not win any money, but that viewpoint is potentially motivated by PR and pandering to the mob rather than any legal basis.

The timeline and recent similar events in entertainment

A former girlfriend of Ghomeshi set off the scandal by telling a reporter that she did not consent to the BDSM they practiced during their relationship, while Ghomeshi claims she is lying. Three other women came forward on Sunday with similar allegations of physical abuse during sex in a story published by Jesse Brown. Prior to the story breaking, there had been no formal complaints to HR filed, nor any police reports filed against Ghomeshi.

On Sunday afternoon, Ghomeshi posted on Facebook with the story of his termination. Unlike most celebrities, he did not force an apology and quietly leave. His post is long and bitter, but draws the reader to sympathy. This is an excerpt, but you should read it in its entirety:

> About two years ago I started seeing a woman in her late 20s. Our relationship was affectionate, casual and passionate. We saw each other on and off over the period of a year and began engaging in adventurous forms of sex that included role-play, dominance and submission. We discussed our interests at length before engaging in rough sex (forms of BDSM). We talked about using safe words and regularly checked in with each other about our comfort levels. She encouraged our role-play and often was the initiator. We joked about our relations being like a mild form of Fifty Shades of Grey or a story from Lynn Coady's Giller-Prize winning book last year. I don't wish to get into any more detail because it is truly not anyone's business what two consenting adults do. I have never discussed my private life before. Sexual preferences are a human right.
>
> Despite a strong connection between us it became clear to me that our on-and-off dating was unlikely to grow into a larger relationship and I ended things in the beginning of this year. She was upset by this and sent me messages indicating her disappointment that I would not commit to more, and her anger that I was seeing others.
>
> After this, in the early spring there began a campaign of harassment, vengeance and demonization against me that would lead to months of anxiety.

Which seems more likely—that an attention-seeking up and comer in the industry comes to resent a famous and powerful man's dalliances and refusal to commit, or said woman endures an abusive, non-consensual relationship and only confesses to her forced suffering after being dumped?

At the very least, Ghomeshi's account demands a more nuanced investigation of the situation, one that is unlikely to come from any mainstream media outlet. He is accused of an action against a woman, so he is automatically a misogynist, and now will be a pariah in the media.

Notice Ghomeshi's explanation of the accusations and contrast this with Jonah Hill's recent apology for using the word "faggot." Like many people, I personally find BDSM to be decadent but I have little problem with the word "faggot." Yet, I have some measure of sympathy and respect for Ghomeshi, whereas I feel distaste for Hill. The media will vilify Ghomeshi even further for this, but he stood up for himself and for his side of the story on the fishy accusations. Hill, on the other hand, is still vilified despite his groveling.

Gawker did not fail to offer their own commentary, calling Ghomeshi "creepy" and claiming that the women should not have to feel uncomfortable about going public:

> He gets to call these women liars and conspirators against him without their being able to respond in kind. The scales are weighted in his favor because he has the microphone and the power. It's pretty awful.

The writer for Gawker—who is from Canada—said it was "vaguely disturbing" how her friends and family members clicked "like" on Ghomeshi's Facebook post. She is quick to criticize those who immediately believe him, while offering no reason why she immediately disbelieves him. Keep in mind, there is no evidence for any of the allegations beyond hearsay.

The Huffington Post predictably ran an article praising the journalist, Jesse Brown, who gave the story from the three other women. Brown has done a lot of controversial journalism and has a popular podcast. Brown claims to want to say the things none of the other Canadian journalists are willing to, but based on the HuffPo article, it seems that Brown is simply interested in controversy for the sake of controversy.

Jump on the bandwagon

This seems to be a common pattern with celebrities in unconfirmed sex scandals. One woman claims something and then several other groupies hop on the media whore train. People claim Bill Cosby raped 13 women, but do they have any idea how hard it is to rape just one? Thirteen is a large rape notch count. Even if it was all consensual, how would Cosby hide that much adultery from his wife? He isn't a sex symbol like some politicians are.

This situation also raises a question concerning the interaction between internet life and work life, which we saw play out during the firing of Pax Dickinson. Should one be held accountable at work for what he does on the internet? For now, the reality is yes. Whether or not it should change in the future is a different question which manosphere readers are likely to be divided on, though we have seen public figure after public figure tarred and feathered by the social justice mob over the past few years.

As red pill men, how are we to feel for Ghomeshi? There is admittedly some poetic justice that the sword of social justice he helped to sharpen was responsible for cutting down his career. But on a more general level, we can only look on with grim acknowledgement that another man was ruined by dubious accusations in the court of public opinion without any verdict in a court of law. Perhaps it will require more of society's power elite to have their lives ruined for the burgeoning guilty-until-proven-innocent mob culture of the information age to be tamed.

Read Next: Canadian Feminist Kyla Garvey Gets Two Firemen Fired

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Portrait Of A Modern Career Woman

October 29, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Yesterday a colleague of mine, Ariana, left our company for a new job in Australia. Ariana is twenty-nine: this is not insignificant.

Ariana is attractive – or rather, she retains the last vestiges of her youthful beauty. OK, Ariana was never a stunner, never a first-rate head-turner. But with her slender body, her long, thick black hair and a mischievous face that suggested a profound appetite for naughtiness, she was sexy.

I use the past tense for a reason. In the two years we have worked together, I have observed a definite depreciation in her looks. In part, this is due to her love of binge drinking. Alcohol remains endemic in many industries in London, not least ours, where entertaining clients is a central part of the job. Ariana attacked that duty with gusto, and the empty calories she loaded into her system over many drunken nights meant that she ended up carrying considerably more weight than when she started. Not enough to make her obese, but enough to render her formerly shapely legs matronly, and to give her once-angular features a doughy appearance. These unfortunate adjustments amended my rating of her from “would definitely bang” to “would probably bang, provided it were easy and there were no other options available.”

But Ariana was much-loved at work for her madcap ways and the amusing stories that her frequent inebriation provided. For her last day in the office, another (female) colleague prepared a PowerPoint presentation displaying some of her “finest” moments. The slides were largely composed of photographs taken from Ariana’s Facebook page. Many of them featured close-ups of her increasingly bloated, drunken face as she careened from one crazy night out to the next. One slide was dedicated to her love of drinking whiskey. Another to her penchant for red wine. A third focused on the short skirts she liked to wear.

More slides revealed her “yolo” exploits in the various five-star hotels in New York and Berlin the company had put her up in for business events. Her talent for attracting beta orbiters was referenced; and the fact that she had been banged by a male colleague was revealed on a slide celebrating her “horndog” nature. My assembled colleagues hooted and guffawed at these images, while Ariana looked on, held in the embrace of another girl, close to tears at her impending departure.

Tellingly, not one of the slides referred to her professional capabilities. To be fair, her skills were complimented by two of her managers in their summing-up. Apparently, Ariana had proved herself to be a linchpin of her team, and she had been personally responsible for managing multi-million pound accounts. Personally, I am skeptical. I worked on projects with her a few times: she was rubbish.

Women’s Rights?

I love to party as much as the next person – when it’s appropriate. But it seems incredible that we have reached a state of affairs where a female executive in a responsible position in an internationally-known company with offices in major cities in the UK and the US can be celebrated for spending most of her time drunk and wearing revealing clothes.

Is this really what Emmeline Pankhurst and the early suffragettes had in mind when they fought for women’s rights? And other than looking good in a mini-skirt, what has Ariana really accomplished since completing her humanities degree? OK, apparently she enjoys running. But has she started a business or worked on some other personal project? No. Has she written a book? No. Has she read a book? I doubt it.

One of the problems with reading and writing for men’s websites is that time and again one observes real-life examples of what we caution against in this part of the internet. Ariana is currently perpetuating what Rollo of the Rational Male calls her “party years” and is about to enter the “epiphany and transitory phase.” Her story is fairly typical.

In a long-term relationship with a stable guy slightly older than her until a year or so ago, she dumped him because she was feeling “trapped” and wanted to “experience a little more of life” before “settling down.” “I still love him,” she confided to a colleague. “He is everything I want in a man. But we met at the wrong time. I wish we had met five years from now, when I’m ready to move onto the next stage in my life.”

Is there really any need for me to translate this? Having had few sexual partners prior to her boyfriend, as soon as they had broken up, Ariana slept with at least five new guys, one she met in a fast food joint after yet another drunken night out.

There is a lesson here for those who believe that “locking down” a (relatively) inexperienced girl in her early twenties is still a workable strategy. With Western culture encouraging all of us to put off until tomorrow what could be done today, and telling women to delay building stable relationships and families in favor of sexual pleasure and career success until they are at least in their thirties, then your chances of holding onto your special snowflake for life are slim.

So Ariana is having fun. But she is twenty-nine. I suspect that this underpinned her decision to emigrate. For many young Brits looking to travel and party while they work, Australia is a tempting destination. After all, there is sunshine there, beaches, a vibrant party scene, and a reputedly unquenchable thirst for heavy drinking. But Ariana is not young anymore, and she knows it. Thirty will come knocking soon, and there is a fast-growing crowd of cuter, younger party girls behind her. Reality is starting to bite, and like a dog, it bites hard.

My guess is that the thought of accepting her new relegated position as a has-been in London where many people know her is simply too frightening, too painful. Better to move to another country thousands of miles away, to make new friends, find new lovers. Anything to keep the party going for just a little longer, away from judgmental eyes that reflect back a cold truth – that Ariana is no longer the hot property she once was.

I believe that social mores are arrived at through a combination of diverse factors and that we shouldn't be too quick to ascribe them to just one. Nevertheless, it seems pretty clear that narratives like Ariana's are brought to us courtesy of a mixture of modern "feminism" (which isn't really feminism at all in the original sense of the word) and a general relaxing of moral standards in the new "yolo" culture.

How much better would it have been if Ariana had stuck it out with her boyfriend, who by all accounts was a decent, supportive man (translation: a "boring nice guy"). This, after all, is what our grandparents used to do. I'm not saying the old ways were always better – I'm sure that many women were forced to remain in unpleasant and abusive relationships that they would have been better off out of. But as there is now no societal requirement for people to remain in couplings for appearance's sake, it means that girls like Ariana are free and indeed encouraged to follow their hypergamous instincts by having sex with strangers and pursuing the backpacker dream while entering their thirties.

Biology

Let us not forget: women are at their most fertile between the ages of 19 and 26. Right now, Ariana's thwarted, trampled biology is screaming out to be heard. It is inevitable that at some point its voice will grow too loud. Then – I have no doubt – she will cash out with whatever guy she is seeing and have a baby. What then for her "beloved" career? After a long absence for maternity leave, she might return to work on a part-time basis – if at all.

As men we are lucky. Because our sexual market value is less based on our physical appearance, and more on other factors like status and dominance, and as we remain fertile for longer (for those men who want kids), we are able to pursue our own inclinations for longer, if not indefinitely. Unfortunately, it's simply not the same for women – they have a shelf life of between 19 to around 30 if they're lucky before they become less appealing to men and less able to conceive. This may not be fair, but it's true.

The tragedy for women like Ariana is that they've been lied to – both by a popular culture that tells them they can "have it all" for as long as they like, and by the modern world of work (the only structured organization with rules that Western girls recognize, what with the decline of religion and the discrediting of politicians). And judging by Ariana's farewell presentation, the feminized contemporary workplace seems only too happy to endorse their bad behavior.

To find out how to navigate the modern dating landscape and meet hot woman click here

Read More: The Difference Between a Woman's Behavior And Her Intent

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

The 7 Most Common Lies Women Tell In A Relationship

October 30, 2014 | by Nicholas Jack | Link | Original Link

Many of you might have heard about a book I wrote called The Key Logger. To write the book, I used a key logger to record all the things typed by girls on my computer while I was dating them. I have had a key logger on my computer for a very long time, and it allowed me to do something that most men couldn't: know when women lied to me.

These seven lies were the most common ones that women told me over the many years I have used a key logger. I will link to various articles and studies to help you understand why so many women will lie right to your face, and why it is so fucked up.

7. Age

Most of the girls I date are within the 18-22 year old group. However, I noticed something from the small number occupying the 24-and-up group: they frequently lied about their age. Maybe it was only a couple of years, but they would lie. Normally, I wouldn't include such a small sample size on this list, but because such a high percentage tried to shave off a few years, I had to add it.

Girls lie about age for the obvious reason: men are attracted to younger women. Check out this article about at what age men and women find each other most attractive.

Even with all the BS that the media is telling women ("40 is the new 30," etc.), women still instinctively know when men find them the most attractive and when they are above that age, they will sometimes try to hop in a time machine. Unfortunately, it doesn't work.

6. Being Single

Another thing many women will lie about is whether they are single. There is the obvious one where they will pretend they have a boyfriend when a guy they aren't attracted to asks them out, but we will focus on the opposite situation. When a girl really likes a guy she ends up meeting, many taken girls will lie about not having a boyfriend. At the very least they will never mention it, which is the same as lying about it.

There were quite a few girls that were in committed relationships before they met me. I don't usually ask a girl if she is single; I just assume she is from the fact that she lets me kiss her and touch her in a more than friendly way. These girls would never mention their boyfriends and I would never know about them until getting a strange phone call, message on Facebook, or key logging them and seeing that they were tying to juggle two (or more) guys.

Sometimes the girls would try to go on dating both myself and another guy. Other times they would dump the guy after it seemed like the two of us were developing a consistent pattern of seeing each other. Then, there were the girls that would cheat on their boyfriends of many years for the passion and excitement of being with another man.

You know what's scary about this? That man they cheat with could end up knocking them up. Take a look at this study about how honest they are with their boyfriends in situations like these.

50% of women ADMIT that they would lie to their boyfriend saying it's his kid, and 42% of women would lie about taking birth control so they could get pregnant. Talk about the ultimate "fuck you" to your boyfriend.

5. We are just friends, he's not interested

Another common lie women will tell you when they say they are committed to you is "We are just friends, he's not interested in me." I used to think that women actually believed this and were just too naive to notice. That was until I saw for myself the obvious way that these guys acted towards them: "I miss you," "You look so sexy in that picture," etc.

From these messages it was clear that no woman could honestly believe that these guys were interested in just being friends. Then, there were the girls that would say the same things back. Why do women do this? There is a few reasons. They sometimes do it to get validation. Maybe it's just boredom, or maybe she has other plans for him.

Women will have "backup plans" and "the ones that got away" that they will continue chatting and flirting with. They keep "backup plans" in case the relationship doesn't work out or they have somebody to run to when there is a big fight in the relationship. She will keep "the one's that got away" for the possibility that she can win him over. You may be getting dumped soon if she succeeds. Women will jump ship when they think they can land a guy of higher value.

This is scary because of how easily this can lead to her getting knocked up by another guy. Maybe “the one that got away” pumps and dumps her, or maybe a “backup plan” gets into her pants in the middle of one of your fights. Either way you could end up in the same situation as this guy.

This guy raised his kid, then found out that his wife had cheated on him with another man and that other man was the father of his little girl. After this, they ended up getting divorced. Go ahead, guess who had to keep paying child support. I’ll give you a hint, it’s not the real father. That’s right, it’s the guy that was duped into raising another man’s child.

To add insult to injury, his wife ended up getting back together with the biological father of the kid. So the guy ended up paying child support for a kid who lived with her biological father and mother. It’s very likely that this affair stemmed from the wife telling her husband “he’s just a friend.”

4. I don’t flirt with other guys

The next most common lie is one they may tell you a lot: “I don’t flirt with other guys.” This one is so common and so hard to catch her in, because of the loose definition of “flirting.”

Here’s my definition of flirting: talking to a normal guy in a way that could lead him to believe that you are sexually interested in him. Girls can read body language much better than men can, so they really do know when they are flirting and when a guy is only interested in something more. They do this for the same reasons as the lie above: backup, plans, boredom, etc.

3. I’ve never done this before

I think every experienced man out there has heard this countless times. After bringing a girl back to your place on a first date or after just meeting her in the club, she will say “I’ve never done this before.”

She’s saying that so you will believe that she is a good girl who would never go home with a guy she just met, but that you were just that one in a million who it ended up happening with. Of course, if she’s saying that, it’s not even close to the first time she has ever done something like that.

Girls will try to appear innocent so that they don’t lose the opportunity to have a relationship with you. Girls know that “You can’t turn a ho into a housewife” so they will try to create an illusion in the hopes that you will fall for it. Unfortunately, many men do fall for it, and things like the next study are what ends up happening.

> The more sex partners a respondent had had between age 18 and the time of first marriage or cohabitation, the more likely he or she was to be unfaithful (1.01) Source.

Yeah, you get married and surprise, surprise… she cheats.

2. Last time she had sex

This is one of my favorite things to ask. I started asking it a long time ago and it's still fun to ask because of the ridiculously high percentage of girls that lie about it. I don't know why, but most girls like to say the last time they had sex was 6 months ago. For some reason, in their heads, it just sounds right. Too bad that at least eight times out of 10, it's a straight-up lie.

As I have previously talked about, girls are very aware of the fact that men don't want to date a slutty girl, the same way that women don't want to date a guy with no job or who lives with his mom. They know this, so they pretend to be innocent and they use this innocence as a weapon:

This is an article I wrote a while back about a girl that ended up sleeping with all three past writers of Swooptheworld within a nine month period. It shows her hilarious responses when confronted with the fact that all three of us knew we had been with her. She still wanted to be seen as a good girl.

1. Number of Sexual Partners

The most common thing that a girl will lie to you about is her notch count. I would say more than 90% of girls lie to me about this. This was the first lie I noticed a pattern with so many years ago.

Girls want to be seen as innocent, but they want it to seem believable to you. Most of you have seen the movie "American Pie." In that movie there is a scene that mentions this:

> Jessica: If a guy tells you how many girls he's hooked up with, it's not even close to that. You take that number and divide it by three, then you get the real total. OK, so if Kevin is saying it's been three girls it's more like one or none.
> Vicky: None?
> Jessica: The rule of three. It's an exact science. Consistent as gravity.

The rule of three works in this situation as well, just backwards. When a girl tells you she has been with three guys, nine guys is probably more accurate. If she tells you six, probably around 18. However, I have found that a lot of times it's even more, maybe six or seven times the number she told you. Contrary to Jessica's thoughts on the rule of three, it's not an exact science, but using it is a good way to have an idea of how many guys she has been with.

It's so strange that nobody ever talks about this because it's an obvious lie, and one that could trick a guy into giving everything to a girl who has been riding the cock carousel all her life. Check out this study that shows how drastically the chances of getting a divorce goes up if after every new guy she sleeps with:

Source.

What these most common lies tell us

Yes, women have been lying to you all your life. There is one positive thing you can take from these lies: it means that she is interested in a relationship with you.

Unfortunately, that is the ONLY positive thing about all these lies. Just because they want something serious with us, it does not make it OK for them to con us into a relationship with them. They use the fact that we want an innocent girl, and have become masters at appearing more innocent than they really are. They want their prince without having to live like a princess… don't be duped.

Read Next: 4 Lies Men Are Being Told About Women

Nicholas Jack
AKA 20Nation. Join me on my adventures around the world as I bang my way through the local women by going to SwoopTheWorld.com. I've been doing this for the last half decade so there is tons of content. You can now get all my books for 60% off here.
Nicholas Jack the author.

The Nature Of Hypocrisy

October 30, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

Hypocrisy almost never should be surprising. The only surprising thing about it occurs when people realize they themselves are guilty of it (as opposed to others), something they rarely do. For it is of the nature of hypocrisy that it is bound up with ignorance, usually of a selfish kind. By definition, hypocrisy tends to go unperceived. No wonder that in the vast history of human thought, there has been relatively little written on this complex subject (not, anyway, as much as we might expect), which is still always prevalent, like some poison in the air most of us cannot smell, though we breathe it in nonetheless.

As for why we are so prone to hypocrisy, the reason is quite clear: because of our natural selfishness, we are vexed more by others' failings than our own, especially when we are the victim. Everybody is happy to condemn the politician for his latest blunder. That person is rare who is equally severe on himself. Where we condemn another, we easily give ourselves a pass, especially if it is only others, not ourselves, who suffer from our actions. Further, when others reproach us, matters may be interpreted in terms of our own interests; in other words, we may misinterpret, and so get off the hook.

This is also where the unthoughtful tend to excuse themselves via comforting platitudes, whose purpose is to get rid of responsibility altogether: "Well, I guess it just wasn't meant to be." Since both disinterestedness—crucially, an affair of the will and the intellect—and the analytical ability to make sense of the enormous complexity of things are uncommon, while bias and downright perversity are not at all, such trite unaccountability is easily reinforced by our friends and family, who, as such, will readily incline to our own distorted perception. For much of what is called love and friendship is really nothing more than the mutual support of sustaining illusions and delusions. And it is in the nature of things for human beings to huddle together in blankets of rationalizations.

Then there is the common tendency to consider ourselves victims when it is actually we who are guilty. How often does it happen that rather than recognizing his own culpability, a person believes the other has done him wrong. In fact, in countless romantic relationships this happens on both sides; each person has harmed the other in some way, but each sees only his own suffering, not his wrongdoing. The back-and-forth is incoherent, and therefore fruitless. Quite amusing! Yet also sad. For how much suffering results from our selfish blindness.

Many people say about dating and relationships that they are “tired of all the games.” Still, their deep selfishness and limited perceptions persist. So they will continue to play games, though again, it will usually be thought that the other is to blame. Nietzsche said that all life is a dispute about taste. It may be said similarly that all life is a dispute about interpretation.

It is our sensible wariness of hypocrisy that makes us so quick to say things like “don’t judge me” and “I’m not judging you.” And yet, to live a just life we require the criticisms—and hence the judgments—of others. This is especially true in secular societies like our own, where there is so much conduct which implies that virtually anything one does is all right or permissible so long as it doesn’t harm others. When it comes to the difficulty duty of making moral criticisms, the immense challenge is to be consistent. We must not give ourselves or others a free pass (forgiveness is something else, of course). In this sense, it may be said that the most moral people are the least hypocritical.

How should we deal with the knowledge of our own hypocrisy? What should be our response here? On this subject I agree with Spinoza, who says that guilt is a hindrance, a source of suffering without a rational solution. So he recommends that we take care not to subject ourselves to overmuch guilt, but simply learn from our mistakes then move on. This is wise. Once we understand that we are guilty of hypocrisy (or for that matter, any failing), we should resolve to be more careful in our conduct and honest with ourselves in the future.

Beyond this, it would seem pointless and unhealthy to wallow in guilt: doing so will not make us any better, and it is surely wasteful since, after all, it is only through rational judgment—the firm decision to do the right thing and not take refuge in self-delusion—that we can improve our character. “Listen to your heart” is a popular saying, but to do that is an uncertain and dangerous activity. Human beings, indeed, are less rational than they tend to believe. Still, without rational judgment we are terribly blind.

Read More: It’s In Our Nature To Judge Others

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

Why Muay Thai Is Perfect For Men

October 30, 2014 | by James Bee | Link | Original Link

Known as the art of eight limbs, Muay Thai is a martial art that incorporates punches, kicks, knees, and elbow strikes. Its ancient traditions dating from centuries ago still exist in the sport today. But if you think Muay Thai is only for Van Damme-wannabe thugs and Asian people, think again.

Muay Thai isn't just one of the more brutal and efficient martial arts; it's technically beautiful. Its sportsmanship is unparalleled among any mainstream combat sport. It's also the most relevant to real life situations, and because of its strong ethics and traditions, Muay Thai has amazing character-building qualities. For this reason, it can change you from a mouse to a lion. Here's my story.

When I was 17 years old I first walked into a Muay Thai gym. I had a strong interest in martial arts from when I was a kid already, but I wanted to learn Muay Thai because:

A) I was tired of being defenseless

B) I was tired of being weak and unfit

C) I was tired of my low self-esteem and lack of confidence

I had reached the point in my life where I was looking for a big change. So I made my move. The first day I just watched. I'll admit it was intimidating, but visually impressive. The power and athleticism immediately got my attention. There was a strong sense of a team spirit and brotherhood in the dojo. And unlike the gym, which is largely focused on aesthetics, Muay Thai was clearly about the journey of continuous self-improvement. The training incorporated courage, inner strength, respect, skill, technique and athleticism. It focused on the journey rather than the final outcome. And I really liked that.

No doubt, I was a total retard in the beginning. After years of not doing any real physical activity my coordination was terrible—my punching resembled something like my grandma swatting a fly. But I hung in there for a while and soon I actually started to get pretty damn good. I ended up having a few fights, traveling to Thailand to train, and eventually becoming a coach to fighters…but that's another story.

Anyways, because of my transformation and firsthand seeing tons of people over the years overcome low confidence, negative attitude, obesity, health issues, troubled lifestyle, and fear, I have naturally become an advocate for the sport. I truly believe it has the ability to change the lives of men. When I recommend Muay Thai to my fitness and weight loss clients, here are the top reasons I give them:

You'll get stronger

Within weeks of starting you'll achieving strength gains that will motivate you to keep going. The high amount of bodyweight exercises combined with explosive movements will develop fast-twitch muscle fibers and activate muscles you never knew you had. This will help you develop a strong, athletic body to be proud of. If you're already hitting the gym, adding a couple days of Muay Thai training will help with your range of movement and core strength, which can result in mobility and bigger lifts.

You'll increase confidence

Each training session you'll achieve mini goals. Through this you'll progressively overcome your fear of failure and you'll begin to take more risks. Your self-doubt will soon fade away and be replaced by self-belief. Your new awareness of yourself and your surroundings will create a whole new perspective for you. With that transition your attitude will become more positive and confidence will bloom. This will reflect in your life directly.

You'll lose weight

Over the years I have seen countless ordinary people lose extraordinary amounts of weight through Muay Thai training. You can expect to burn up to 800kcals in a two-hour training session. With Muay Thai you will start to see a change in body composition within weeks. The bodyweight, aerobic, interval-style training promotes a high metabolic rate which increases weight loss. Coupling your training with a good diet will speed up the process even more.

You'll gain respect

Gain respect for yourself, and for others. This might make me sound old, but dudes these days have a serious lack of respect. Respect for oneself and respect for others is becoming a rare combination in society, but in Muay Thai it is an integral part of the culture. It's another good life lesson that Muay Thai teaches people.

You’ll release stress and aggression

Muay Thai truly has the power to relieve stress. Rather than getting into road rage or bitching with loved ones, take frustration at your week’s worth of dickheads and nagging sluts out in training – which is totally permitted in Muay Thai. There is nothing like it in the world. For me, no matter what is happening in life, when I’m training Muay Thai all my worries fade away. You will become a calmer and more patient person.

Bottom line

Life is too short to be scared, weak, and have low self-esteem. I feel strongly about this subject because I know how much it did for my life and thousands of others. And I’m betting my left nut it will do the same for you. Join a Muay Thai gym today.

Read More: 5 Reasons To Try A New Hobby

James Bee
JB is a fitness and nutrition coach who specializes in weight cut management and performance optimization for professional Muay Thai fighters. For advice on getting leaner, stronger, increasing performance and avoiding common mistakes, visit his website JB Fitness Systemsor follow James on Facebook.

Margaret Thatcher Didn’t Need Feminism

October 30, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

While today’s women whine on about how unfair the world is, way back in the early 70s a female politician came to power and by 1979 occupied arguably the second most powerful position in the world. Furthermore, she held that post for over 10 years, taking the country to war when necessary.

While Margaret Thatcher was a polarizing figure, she was a champion of the free marketplace. She confronted the unions who had a stranglehold over British industry. The UK of the 60s and 70s was not far from being a communist state, with endless “jobs for the boys” in every field, eventually reaching the point where every job needed five employees. The bus driver couldn’t collect tickets—there had to be a ticket collector. He couldn’t clean the bus—there had to be a cleaner. All these superfluous jobs came with the “need another cup of tea” attitude pre-installed.

Any time a corporation tried to take on the might of the unions, massive walkouts ensued. Those of you with a more liberal bias might get up in arms about workers’ rights, but understand that during the 1970s, the UK had more power cuts than a third world country because the workers walked out on strike. As a child, we’d have candles and torches on during many evenings.

The prosperity we enjoyed during the 1990s and 2000s was largely created by one woman and her efforts to encourage the world to modernize. Without incentive, there is no investment. Without investment, there is no progress. Without incentive and a drive for progress, workers just do the bare minimum and complain like high school girls every time they actually need to do a decent day’s work.

That internet connection you are using to read this article is thanks in part to Maggie for denationalizing the telephone companies, after which other nations followed her lead. Government-run institutions have no incentive to seek progress, as the Soviets found out, and without deregulation of the telephone industry we’d have been lucky to have enough extra lines to run fax machines. Thanks to Thatcher, Canary Wharf is now a thriving financial district where once it was one of the most deprived areas in Europe.

USSR-style communism was defeated largely by Reagan and Thatcher’s free-minded economic reforms, and whilst some of you might be learning Russian to chase hotties, without the roaring economy they engineered, we might well have all been learning it to survive the labor camps.

If there is so much prejudice against women, how was a woman, so many decades ago, able to rise up and become an elected politician, the leader of her party and then win several national elections, whilst taking on massive controversial challenges against embedded socialism?

“Ah…That’s different

BULLSHIT. The simple matter of the fact is that she cut it alongside men. She had a sharp mind and wasn’t afraid to use it. I actually met her once and there was no doubt about her qualities, not only as a head of state but as a human being.

Thatcher most certainly puts any whining feminist to shame, along with the likes of Hillary, Christine Lagarde, Sheryl Sandberg, and any of the other entitled harpies that feminists are so found of championing. Better still, she was not some sniveling lawyer, but a trained chemist with a degree from Oxford University she obtained on scholarship in 1947. Now please try and tell me about the patriarchy and male prejudice. The only glass ceiling women have been banging their heads on is the one they can’t navigate around because they have the intelligence of a common house fly.

"There's no glass ceiling in this company. It's just as well with all these windows we've got to clean."

This article is not a debate about whether Thatcher made mistakes as Prime Minister—of course she did. It’s not about whether her style of governance was perfect—of course it wasn’t. She was a politician, and they are all fucked to come degree. One could argue that real statesmen have not been seen in several decades, since most today are limp-wristed lawyers intent on ruling by decree and punishing when their almighty laws are broken. It’s no surprise to find countries run by lawyers are all piling into debt, since a legal mind is only used to working away on it’s long winded theories, with someone else to pay the bill. It takes a business mind to maintain fiscal discipline, and Thatcher had that.

There were and still are precious few women that can truly operate on a high intellectual level. We are not talking about learning from books or passing exams. That is only one test of a person’s abilities. Fluid, dynamic, analytical quick thinking is not high on the list of feminine traits, just as breastfeeding is not among the skills of your average male. It’s just a fact. Few breeds of dogs can catch mice, but they will guard your house. Ducks are not able to walk well on land, but boy do they fly and swim well.

The exceptional females of the world have on occasion proved themselves just as able as men, but this does not mean that every woman is automatically entitled to a scholarship at Oxford or a position as Prime Minister. Frankly, my experience suggests that most are better off barefoot and pregnant at the kitchen sink, or later in life, taking care of grandchildren or their aging husbands.

When the IRA blew up the hotel Thatcher was staying in, she was unharmed in part because she was still awake at 3am working on her speech. A lot of women cannot work those kinds of hours. She gave an interview at 4am announcing the party conference would continue, while persuading the local department store to open early, so her party members could replace their lost clothing. No hysteria necessary—it was only a small bomb.

Until there is more evidence of females on a large scale being able to operate non-emotionally, rationally, logistically and without claims of prejudice and discrimination, we cannot take any feminist claims seriously. It's very interesting to see how women react when this topic comes up in conversation. From prominent female figures on television to girlfriends and their BFFs, all will parrot the same nonsense whilst becoming accusatory, refusing to engage in logical debate, while contradicting themselves. Beware of those who cry discrimination, most likely they are the prejudiced ones—we all know how bitchy and competitive woman can be.

The point of this article is to demonstrate the absurdity of the claim that Thatcher "was different." Why would women need feminism when a woman got a scholarship to Oxford in 1947, became leader of her party in 1975, and Prime Minister in 1979. It's already been done. Marie Curie discovered radioactivity and won a Nobel prize for physics in 1903. Yes I am sure that her parents, teachers, peers and so forth all had a go at her and it was tough for her to make progress in her chosen field. Poor little thing… But she did it.

Most men run into this kind of obstacle as a matter of course. Famous racing driver Nikki Lauder was cut off by his wealthy father because he wanted to race cars professionally—hardly a non-lucrative career. You could argue that lack of paternal support was an element in his crash, trying to prove himself, "like an idiot." This is one man out of millions who've had the same obstacles from fathers, brothers and other men in their lives. Men rise to adversarial attitudes, whereas most women need a more "supportive" atmosphere. Where it's not supportive they simply resort to emoting, bitching and "that's different."

It's exactly the adversarial climate that forges great men (and women, if they can handle it). It's a proving ground, a crucible. If anything, Thatcher, like many women, got an easier ride than a man would have done, not just because of novelty factor, but because men will help a broad along. Someone that is exceptional is exceptional. The only thing that is different is the skill set of the average woman, not the false “discrimination” she faces in the modern world.

Read More: More Women Are Rejecting Feminism

Are Anti-Depressant Drugs The Reason Why Many American Women Are So Fat?

October 31, 2014 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

25 percent of American women are taking psychiatric drugs, with the majority of those being anti-depressants. As anti-depressant drug use has increased 350 percent over the past 10 years, it raises the question: Is anti-depressant drug use causing the massive increase of fat women in America?

As a personal anecdote, every single American woman that I've known that has used anti-depressant drugs has been at least moderately obsese (10 pounds or more over the healthy body weight limit), and many of them have been outright chunky landwhales, the mere sight of which would make you want to vomit.

Why do so many American women feel the need to turn to drug use in order to cope with reality? Is life really that hard for women in America? In rural India, some women have to walk many kilometers each day carrying large pots of water on their heads. Or in Pakistan, car bombings and other acts of violence are an almost daily occurance. And yet women in India and Pakistan aren't guzzling down anti-depressant drugs in record numbers.

The fact is that American women are the most spoiled, pampered women on the planet and have an extremely easy life. Why then are they so unhappy? Any man that has travelled outside of America and met foreign women will tell you that women outside of America are much more mentally stable and much more likely to have a healthy body weight. Outside of America, the vast majority of women don't take anti-depressant drugs and aren't fat either. Coincidence?

Pakistani American

Give me a spicy Pakistani woman any day of the week over a fat chunky American landwhale

Do anti-depressant drugs cause weight gain?

According to Norman Sussman M.D., a psychiatrist and associate dean for postgraduate medical programs at the NYU School of Medicine, the side effects of weight gain appear with long term use of anti-depressants, generally appearing after 6 months of first starting the usage of the drugs, although some anti-depressant drugs can cause weight gain both in the short term and long term.

Antidepressants have been associated with weight gain since they were first used about 50 years ago, according to Psychology Today. One woman even reported that she went from petite to obese, gaining 100 pounds in weight after having started the usage of anti-depressant drugs.

About 70% of people in the United States are overweight and, in a cruel catch-22, many of the drugs used to treat obesity-linked conditions such as diabetes, high blood pressure, and depression can themselves cause weight gain, according to Health.com.

One woman who had been taking Zoloft for two years described her own situation on Reddit:

> [All of the SSRIs I've taken] have caused weight gain, and lately it feels totally unmanageable. I work out 5 days a week, cardio and lifting free weights, and still the pounds keep coming. I watch what I eat. I don't drink or do recreational drugs anymore, I even gave up smoking. I'm in therapy. Basically, I am doing all the shit necessarily for an emotionally healthy and stable life and it really frustrates me that I am still piling on the pounds. I was a fat kid and body issues are a big deal for me. Weight gain tends to spark feelings of panic and self-loathing and > hopelessness, all of which can help me slip right into depression again.

One study even discovered that mothers that took antidepressants during pregnancy were four times more likely to have a baby that developed an autistic spectrum disorder. American women are not only damaging their own bodies with anti-depressant drug use, but also the bodies of their unborn children. Congratulations, ladies.

There is also the troubling possibility that, in some cases, the causal arrow points in the opposite direction—obesity may exacerbate an existing tendency toward depression, creating a vicious cycle that is depriving the American man of dateable women. Americans eating a standard diet are constantly being force-fed poison that makes it much more difficult to maintain a slim physique, and research is finding that what goes on in the brain is inextricably linked to what we put into our stomachs.

In either case, a clear aspect of the problem is that American women have had such easy lives, never having experienced any real hardship or difficulty. As it stands right now, most American women are nothing but a bunch of spoiled little brat children who never grew up and learned how to function as adults, as women, instead of acting like an immature 12 year old girl. And most of them certainly never learned to cook nutritious meals for themselves, instead relying upon eating processed slop that may actually lead to mental illness.

But as more and more men reject feminism and boycott marriage, American women will have no choice but to adjust their behaviors, change their bad attitudes, and lose some weight. Otherwise they will end up growing old alone with their 10 cats.

Read More: American Women Simply Can't Compete

John Doe

John is the creator of the famous Boycott American Women blog. Check it out here: www.BoycottBitches.com

Why Are Some Countries Rich While Others Are Poor?

October 31, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In A Farewell To Alms, economist Gregory Clark attempts to present the reasons for the industrial revolution taking place and why all of the world's countries were not equally affected by it. Two hundred years after the industrial revolution, some countries see untold wealth while others are actually living worse off than before it took place. He looks into the economic answers to this problem.

The book starts off by examining how life was for the common man before the industrial revolution (the Malthusian era). During this time, any increase in population would mean a direct decrease in living standards. This check prevented runaway population growth.

> Any increase in birth rates in the Malthusian world drives down real incomes. Conversely anything which limits birth rates drives up real income . Since life expectancy at birth in the Malthusian era was just the inverse of the birth rate, as long as birth rates remained high, life expectancy had to be low. Preindustrial society could thus raise both material living standards and life expectancy by limiting births.

> […]
>
> This Malthusian world thus exhibits a counterintuitive logic. Anything that raised the death rate schedule— war, disorder, disease, poor sanitary practices, or abandoning breast feeding— increased material living standards. Anything that reduced the death rate schedule —advances in medical technology, better personal hygiene, improved public sanitation, public provision for harvest failures, peace and order— reduced material living standards.

Technological advancement during the Malthusian era would result in more people, but not necessarily higher income for those people.

> In the preindustrial world sporadic technological advance produced people, not wealth.
>
> […]
>
> Since preindustrial living standards were determined solely by fertility and mortality, the only way living standards could be higher in 1800 would be if either mortality rates were greater at a given real income or fertility was lower.

More people can live on lower incomes than in the past, especially thanks to medical advances, so population explosions can co-exist with abject poverty. The income needed to merely survive today is much lower than in the past, so there is no “punishment” for having a lot of children even if you can’t afford it (the likelihood is high that they will all survive). In the past, only the rich could have many children, but now we’re seeing an inverse situation where poor people pop them out while rich people delay birth.

> If the great majority of income was spent on food then there was also little surplus for producing “culture” in terms of buildings, clothing, objects, entertainments, and spectacles. As long as the Malthusian Trap dominated, the great priority of all societies was food production.
>
> […]
>
> …between 10,000 BC and AD 1800, real living conditions probably declined with the arrival of settled agriculture because of the longer work hours of these societies. The Neolithic Revolution did not bring more leisure, it brought more work for no greater material reward.

To keep birth rates low and living standards high, many cultures invented various social customs that limited births—a sort of societal birth control. Modern medicinal birth control simply duplicates what was already going on in the Malthusian era, so attributing low birth rates to birth control or feminism, for example, fails to look into the complete history. Birth rates already declined greatly before the pill was introduced. Modern life introduced by the industrial revolution is argued to be the biggest contributor to birth decline.

> Could the rich of the preindustrial world actually have wanted fewer children, but > been unable to achieve that desire because of a lack of effective contraception? No. Figure 14.6 shows that most of the decline toward levels of gross fertility characteristic of modern developed economies had been accomplished in England (and indeed elsewhere in Europe) by the 1920s, long before modern condoms, hormonal contraceptive pills, legalized abortion, or vasectomies.

>
> […]
>
> In these societies violence was a way of gaining more resources and hence more reproductive success. Thus Napoleon Chagnon, in a famous study of the warlike Yanomamo society, found that a major predictor of reproductive success was having killed someone. Male Yanomamo sired more children at a given age if they had murdered someone than if they had not.
>
> […]
>
> …in the preindustrial era cities such as London were deadly places in which the population could not reproduce itself and had to be constantly replenished by rural migrants. Nearly 60 percent of London testators left no son . Thus the craft, merchant, legal, and administrative classes of London were constantly restocked by socially mobile recruits from the countryside.
>
> […]
>
> The New World after the Neolithic Revolution offered economic success to a different kind of agent than had been typical in hunter -gatherer society: Those with patience, who could wait to enjoy greater consumption in the future. Those who liked to work long hours. And those who could perform formal calculations in a world of many types of inputs and outputs— of what crop to profitably produce, how many inputs to devote to it, what land to profitably invest in.

The industrial revolution completely changed how human societies live, with aftershocks that are still taking place today. The author tries to explain why this happened.

> Around 1800, in northwestern Europe and North America, man’s long sojourn in the Malthusian world ended. The iron link between population and living standards, through which any increase in population caused an immediate decline in wages, was decisively broken. Between 1770 and 1860, for example, English population tripled. Yet real incomes, instead of plummeting, rose . A new era dawned.
>
> […]
>
> The model reveals that there is one simple and decisive factor driving modern growth. Growth is generated overwhelmingly by investments in expanding the stock of production knowledge in societies.
>
> […]
>
> Thus, despite all the complexities of economies since the Industrial Revolution, the persistent growth we have witnessed since 1800 can be the result of only two > changes: more capital per worker and greater efficiency of the production process. At the proximate level all modern growth in income per person is that simple!

>
> […]
>
> Enhanced production of knowledge capital, seemingly starting around 1800, generated great external benefits throughout the economy. This increased the measured efficiency of the economy , and with it the stock of physical and human capital. Thus the path to explaining the vital event in the economic history of the world, the Industrial Revolution, is clear. All we need explain is why in the millennia before 1800 there was in all societies—warlike, peaceful, monotheist, polytheist— such limited investment in the expansion of useful knowledge, and why this circumstance changed for the first time in Britain some time around 1800. Then we will understand the history of mankind.

The British population tripled in 120 years but their farm output didn't increase since land was limited, so they had to import food. To import food you need a product to export. In this case it was manufactured goods. Britain quickly became the workshop of the world.

> The classic Industrial Revolution, with its reliance on coal and iron, was the first step toward an economy that relied less and less on current sustained production through plants and animals, and more on mining stores of energy and minerals.

In one word, the industrial revolution created massive wealth because of efficiency:

> In a world where capital flowed easily between economies, capital itself responded to differences in country efficiency levels. Inefficient countries ended up with small capital stocks and efficient ones large amounts of capital . And efficiency differences explain almost all variations between countries in income levels.
>
> Differences in efficiency could stem from discrepancies in access to the latest technologies, from economies of scale, or from failures to utilize imported technologies appropriately.
>
> […]
>
> Poor economies since the Industrial Revolution have been characterized mainly by inefficiency in production. Their problem, however, was typically not in gaining access to new technologies. The problem, it turns out, was in using these new technologies effectively.

The book finally arrives to the money shot in answering why some countries are poor and some are rich: the rich countries have the greatest efficiency in maximizing output per worker based on the same inputs.

> [Poor countries] were inefficient in the use of labor, not in the use of capital. Even though they were using the same machines as the high-wage economies, they > employed many more workers per machine, without obtaining any additional output from the machines . Thus in ring spinning one worker in the northern United States tended 900 spindles, while one worker in China tended only 170. On plain looms a worker in the northern United States managed eight looms at a time, in China only one or two.

>
> […]
>
> Poor countries used the same technology as rich ones. They achieved the same levels of output per unit of capital. But in doing so they employed so much more labor per machine that they lost most of the labor cost advantages with which they began.
>
> […]
>
> Thus the crucial variable in explaining the success or failure of economies in the years 1800– 2000 is the efficiency of the production process within the economy. Inefficiencies in poor countries took a very specific form: the employment of extra production workers per machine without any corresponding gain in output per unit of capital.

So now you're probably wondering why is the labor in Africa or Pakistan worse than the labor in Britain or America. In the past, "labor quality" was looked into as the reason, which to me seems like a politically correct euphemism for intelligence.

> Although the disparities in performance across countries remained unchanged, the "labor quality" explanation disappeared from the economics literature after World War II. Most economists now attribute the poor performance of industry in underdeveloped economies not to labor problems but to a generalized failure by management to productively employ all the inputs in production— capital and raw materials as well as labor.

The nineteenth-century view blamed these on the quality of workers, whereas the twentieth-century view tried to say the problem lay in managerial failings. But since many western managers were exported to work in foreign countries, there is little evidence that the management theory explains the wide disparity in efficiency levels. So we have this amusing let down:

> Regarding the underlying cause of the differences in labor quality, there is no satisfactory theory.

The difference in wealth between nations in due to efficiency, which the author gives compelling evidence for. The difference in efficiency can only be due to labor quality, but we have no academic answer as to why the labor is different.

Another interesting piece of knowledge you'll learn here is that technological and knowledge decline has happened many times in human history where a society has simply lost a capability that the previous generations had. Don't ever assume that progress happens on a straight upward line, and we can argue that today we're seeing a cultural decline where collective progressive beliefs become further estranged from scientific reality.

One major complaint I have is that this book is dry and academic, meant for college students. It's a good book to read before going to bed because it'll put you to sleep, but at the same time it gives great information in explaining how the wealth of societies came about. The end was unsatisfying, as it will leave you with unanswered questions, but thankfully it answers a few along the way. If you were victim to an American public school education, you probably think that the industrial revolution happened solely because of the steam engine. This book will rid you of such a primitive notion.

Read More: "A Farewell To Alms" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

5 Lessons From Church That Will Wreck Your Life

November 1, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Several commenters on the website and the forum have linked to an Independent Fundamentalist Baptist preacher named Steven Anderson. While that vein of Christianity is the most likely to turn you into a miserable human being, I have to admit that I admire their absolutism. True, every Christian sect is always in the process of secularizing, but in terms of Sunday morning preaching, the fundamentalists (and Eastern Orthodox) seem to be dragging their feet the hardest. 1890s pop-ideology is better than 2014 pop ideology in the same way that being decapitated is better than drowning.

But I'm not here to elaborate on the inherent failures of fundamentalism since that should be obvious. No, dear reader, it is the church down the street I'm here to talk about, even "the good church where the Spirit is moving." The Dalrock kind of church. Here are five terrible lessons you were taught that will wreck your life. Readers can debate in the comments whether or not these lessons are actually Christian, but most churches regularly teach at least some of them. When I finally left the great circle jerk that has become American Christianity, my friends said, "You've only been to a few churches. They aren't all like that!"

Churches are all the same because churches grow by migration instead of conversion, especially in the southern states. They do all this evangelism, and I swear it's just a pissing contest to see who is the bravest. Somehow they've replaced masculinity with shamelessness. Everybody and their kid brother has heard the basic Christian message in the South, but they'll stick a pamphlet in the Wal-Mart soap dispenser on the off chance you haven't.

Maybe evangelism would have more of an effect on people, but most Christians are so ignorant about their own beliefs and history, assuming that they the individual (or the Vatican, for you Catholics) is interpreting the Bible the right way for the first time in 2,000 years. None of us are independent thinkers.

One final introductory note. Last time I wrote an article about Christianity, I had readers email me trying to convince me to become Catholic or Mormon or whatever. Normally, I enjoy reading mail, but let me save you five minutes of your time.

- Jews, Judaism has always been more of a political ideology than a religion.
- Catholics, large tracts of your theology is based on the logical fallacy of equivocation (purgatory, annulments, apostolic succession, basically anything that has touched the Doctrine of Development).
- Protestants, read James 2:24 and 1 Timothy 3:15 and Google "Masoretic or Septuagint."
- Anglo-Catholics, well, at least you gave it your best shot, but you're doing just as much guesswork as the above groups.
- Orthodox Christians, Athos is a cult, and your bishops have always been secularists.
- Mormons, Joseph Smith had a criminal record before he founded a church.
- Jehovah's Witnesses, you take advantage of uneducated and impoverished minorities, hence why I've never met one of you who isn't black.
- Hindus and Buddhists, an impersonal god is a contradiction in terms, and karma is the very lowest level of morality.
- Muslims, Mohammed became a genocidal warlord to compensate for his beta male status.
- Atheists and agnostics, your beliefs give you the same bitterness, anxiety, and arrogance of the average Christian.
- Wiccans, your religion involves more speculation and blind faith than all of the above.

I think that covers all the major religions. All of the ones that matter anyway. Onto the doctrines:

1. "Time Doesn't Heal All Wounds. Only Jesus Heals, and Only Jesus Can Make You Happy."

Growing up, I had this idea that all non-Christians were miserable people consumed with bitterness, vengeance, and general misery. I listened to "Eleanor Rigby" and assumed the Beatles must have been singing about the emptiness in life that comes from not having Jesus fill you up every day. I never realized that most Christians I met were miserable, arrogant, and morally ambivalent. Then I got older and met non-Christians who seemed to be fairly satisfied with life, although I've met very few people of any religion who were genuinely happy.

Jesus may give your life purpose and direction, but he will not make you happy. What will make you happy is a) your approach to life, and b) the conditions of your life. So you can have a just-loving-each-moment attitude, but if you catch your wife in bed with the mailman, then suddenly you won't be happy anymore. And you can have a lot of close friends and financial stability, but if you are always worried about civil unrest on the other side of the globe, then you won't be happy.

Nor will Jesus magically wipe away your bitterness, as if you can choose whether or not you are angry. You can choose to dwell on your hurts and hence make them deeper, but generally bitterness is the kind of thing that has to burn itself out. And some wounds are so deep that they will never go away. Imagine a preacher's kid who was molested by his father. Could he ever truly get past that? Can he just pray to Jesus and make it like it never happened? Which leads to my next point…

2. "Jesus Wipes Away Your Sins Like They Never Happened"

Yes, from east to west, except that Jesus said we'll still have to answer for every idle word on judgment day, and you can trust the red letters. Jesus may forgive, but that doesn't mean He forgets.

The born again sinners think that just because they are forgiven by God that they can demand forgiveness from others. It's worth declaring yourself an atheist just so that your parents will quit saying you have to forgive them for neglecting you emotionally as a child. I also find it interesting that those who demand forgiveness the hardest are also the most unrepentant. Real repentance involves asking for forgivenss, not expecting it. My parents' God makes me want to go to Hell.

3. "A Single Mother is like a Widow, and St. James Says to Take Care of Widows"

And St. Paul says for young widows to remarry. In that same passage, he also says that the church and lay people shouldn't be burdened by their poverty. The Bible talks about married people and religious celibates, but it offers no instruction for unwed people beyond “Get married soon.” Few unwed mothers today are widows. Most of them made poor life choices and came back to Jesus to feel better about themselves. I’ve always wondered how many nuns had sex “just that one time.”

There is a difference in essence between the widow and the unwed mother. A widow is usually so through no fault of her own. As for divorces, usually each party could have done something to prevent it. If we are really going to be Biblical, then how about excommunicating all the divorced men and women for committing sacrilege? The Bible is very clear about divorce—you can only divorce if your spouse cheated on you, and even then it is to be avoided.

A Bible-believing Christian will not divorce even if there is spousal abuse, addiction, hatred, misery, annoyance, loss of respect, or anything people get divorced for other than “He (or she) keeps banging a co-worker.” Even then, should adultery really be a get-out-of-marriage-free card? Should you throw away your marriage merely because the other made a mistake in a weak moment? Divorce, whether ultimately good or bad, always causes major life damage to both spouses and all children. Show some temperance (a lost Christian virtue) and stick it out if at all possible.

This is, of course, assuming that no Christian unwed mother has a child out of wedlock. If you do meet such a unicorn, most of the commentary above will apply to her as well.

4. “God will Find You a Spouse”

My mother got divorced, became a fat workaholic with a hoarding complex, and said that she would only start dating if God brought someone along. Obviously God never did that, much to her delight. Every human relationship is innately transactional, and you have to bring more to the table than the stars aligning.

God helps those who help themselves. If you work hard at finding a marriageable person while working hard at being a marriageable person yourself, then you’ll find someone eventually. But no, you do not deserve “the right person” by virtue of wanting one, and God isn’t going to deliver you what you want if you merely “wait for His timing.” The careful reader will notice I am using sex-neutral language here, because both Christian men and women fail horribly at this.

5. “A Real Man is Always Selfless and Respects Everyone”

This perhaps is technically true but wildly misinterpreted. For one thing, it is literally impossible to be entirely selfless, and if you try, you will grow to hate yourself and all humanity. Being others-interested oddly involves being self-interested. Also, being selfless and respectful are contradictory traits, since complete selflessness involves a lack of self-respect. And to quote Jesus, “Love your neighbor as you love yourself.”

No one, whether man or woman, respects someone who unilaterally respects everyone else or never takes a stand for anything. People confuse “love” with “not offending.” “Don’t criticize single mothers, because that decision is in the past, and you’ll make them feel like they don't belong at church." When your unwed mothers show tears of repentance, then I'll have show some compassion. Most unwed mothers at church have a snarky attitude, as though they are entitled to Christ's generous gift of forgiveness.

It's like if little Timmy fails math class because he didn't do the homework and everyone says, "He must be a victim of the system!" I want to see an unwed mother realize just how grave a mistake she made and try to do anything possible to mollify it. I want to hear an unwed mother say, "I know I can't raise these children well at all by myself, and I need a man who can guide them and make sure they don't turn into serial killers."

Soon I will bring another installment, since I have another three lessons on my list. Email me if you think of another terrible lesson from church, but if you send me an apologetic for your religion I'm going to respond with, "See paragraph five. [Insert quote about specific religion]"

Read More: The Most Abominal Christian Wife On The Internet

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

“Womyn” Need A Lesson On The Evil Patriarchy’s Etymology

November 1, 2014 | by Tom | Link | Original Link

When looking for evidence of that elusive folk devil “the patriarchy,” social activists will often point to the gendered bias of the English language. Some feminists have sought to encourage the use of “womyn” rather than woman or women (no distinction for the plural) because the latter imply a woman is simply a man with a “wo” prepended.

This is a rather peculiar assertion given the etymological history of the words “man” and “woman.” There are even some who complain of the alleged patriocentricity of “human” and “mankind.” I’m no expert on gender studies, but from an etymological perspective, I believe these claims are unfounded.

In the Old English of Anglo-Saxon times, “mann” was always gender neutral just as it sometimes is today. The prefixes wīf or wer could be added to denote female or male gender respectively. While the prefix wīf was separated and became “wife,” wīfmann evolved over the centuries to become wīmmann then wumman, and finally, the modern spelling “woman.” The Old English “mann” is an autohyponym, meaning it can refer both to a category and one of its subcategories. “Fox” is another autohyponym; referring to the species as well as the male of that species while “vixen” refers exclusively to the female.

Anglo-Saxon womyns

Some have argued that the Anglo-Saxon use of “mann” as an autohyponym is evidence that less prejudiced notions of gender were prevalent among such peoples, but anyone familiar with the war-like and masculine history of the early Germanic tribes would scoff at this. Although “one” is now used more frequently as an indefinite pronoun, “man” is still commonly used this way in modern English and as an autohyponym. One need only remember the immortal words of Neil Armstrong as he set foot on the moon for evidence of this.

Then of course there’s the American slang usage of man as an interjection and the Welsh English, AAVE and Jamaican patois usage of “man” as a term of familiar address. These slang uses are now prevalent among English speaking youth of all cultures and are not necessarily gender specific. Bart Simpson’s impertinent catchphrase “Don’t have a cow, man!” has been directed at male and female alike, without amendment.

The consistently gender neutral “human” came into our vocabulary later on and wasn’t used as a noun until the 16th century. It’s a Middle English loanword the Normans took from Old French humain, ultimately from Latin hūmānus, the root of which, hum, originally meant “soil,” indicating that early Indo-Europeans believed that mankind sprung from the earth itself or was at least connected to it.

The second part of the word is not related to the English “man,” which, coming from Old English mann, derives from Proto-Germanic mannaz. So, etymologically speaking, one can’t seriously argue that “human” is patriocentric either.

“Mankind” on the other hand, does derive from “mann,” but does that really make it patriocentric? By 1300 A.D. we see “mankind” referring to the human race after it had replaced the Old English mancynnes, which meant the same thing. It can be found in one of the first examples of the English language; an Anglo-Saxon poem called “The Dream of the Rood.”

Geseah ic þa frean mancynnes efstan elne mycle

“I saw the Lord of mankind summon great strength”

Mancynnes was gender neutral and “mankind” remains absolutely gender neutral to this day, thus rendering “humankind,” “womankind,” or even “womynkind” rather redundant. Since Old English cynnes means “race,” there can be no mankind in the gendered sense, nor can there be a “womankind,” since women are a gender not a race. You can get a feel for how similar the language of the Anglo-Saxons was to our modern English by looking at these Useful Phrases in Old English.

The transition from “mann” to “humain” occurred as the result of an authoritative imposition of new linguistic conventions from above. Language does not always evolve “naturally,” but rather is very often altered in accordance with changing ideals and power structures. The fusion of Norman French and Anglo-Saxon resulted in an English language with a schizophrenic tendency, whereby numerous words describe the same thing but with different cultural connotations (e.g. “beef” and “cow”).

It is therefore unlikely we will ever do away with words such as “mankind” or “woman” even if they may be forced to coexist with politically correct alternatives such as “womyn” and “human-kind.” And, given the history of the terms, why should we?

Read More: The English Are Coming!

Tom

Tom is a professional writer and film maker from London, England. His latest film, From Runes to Ruins , is about Anglo-Saxon history.

4 Fitness Myths That Are Pure Bullshit

November 2, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

The fitness industry is full of bullshit. I don't think anyone will contend that point. There's so much money to be made that companies are incentivized to market their products on increasingly laughable claims. After all, humans have become a vain race, with egos that need constant validation, and there's no better place to get it than looking in the mirror at a ripped body.

And so while the source of many fitness myths is the supplement companies and fitness personalities who are trying to sell more product, there are also a lot of old school myths still being passed around that are equally inaccurate. Below I'll cover four common myths, the rationale behind them, and the science that disproves them.

1. Eating carbs late at night will make you fat

The idea behind this popular myth, like many others, is based on pure logic. Carbohydrates are our bodies primary source of short-term energy. At night we're resting, and thus we don't need this type of energy. Therefore eating carbs at night will result in fat gain, because our bodies won't have any use for the carbs so they'll be instantly turned into fat.

This reasoning is wrong on many levels, but I'll only point out its two main fallacies. The first one is that our bodies only convert the food we eat to fat when we're in a caloric surplus—that is, when we've consumed more energy than our bodies have expended. Yes, the macronutrient profile of what we've eaten can have slight effects on the net amount of calories ingested, but for the most part being in a caloric surplus causes weight gain (1). So if you're not in a caloric surplus, it doesn't matter what you eat or when you eat it—it will be burned as energy for your body NOT converted to fat.

The second fact is that our bodies don't simply turn off at night. Our brain and bodily functions require energy to continue functioning even while we sleep.

2. You can confuse your muscles to make them grow faster

This myth is a more recent one. The idea behind it is that after doing a particular exercise for a while, your body gets used to it, thus rendering it ineffective. By simply switching it out for a new exercise you can "confuse" your muscles and cause them to grow.

This is just silly. Our muscles don't have brains inside of them.

But when doing a new exercise, we do tend to grow stronger at it quite quickly at first. And this is the "evidence" that supports this theory. However the reason for this initial increase in strength is what's called neural adaptation: when we perform a new movement for the first few times, our nervous system quickly gets more efficient at performing it (2). So the reason we got stronger was that our brain got used to recruiting our muscles in this new pattern NOT because they were confused and got bigger.

3. There are certain foods that will cause you to gain fat

Whether it's carbs, fats, fried foods, or donuts—there are plenty of foods out there that people think are "evil" fat-causing agents. But there's no such thing.

Sure, our bodies may absorb a greater percentage of the calories in particular foods, but the fact is that you must take into account the rest of your diet in order to be able to accurately predict the outcome of eating something specific. For example, if you eat a donut for breakfast and eat a light diet throughout the rest of your day, you'll likely be nowhere near the caloric amount needed to gain weight. However, if a morbidly obese man consumes that same donut after eating 5000 calories, then it's probably going to end up as fat. Context, my friends, is everything.

4. Lifting more often will yield better gains

We all know that lifting weights leads to the body's anabolic response that results in hypertrophy (the synthesis of new muscle tissue). I'm not debating this point. But using backwards logic, people often use this as justification for lifting weights almost every single day.

More lifting = more muscle gains, right?

Wrong. The anabolic period takes place over roughly a 36 hour period after you lift (3). By slamming more and more lifting sessions into this window you aren't doing yourself any favors. The anabolic processes in our bodies require proper rest and nutrition to work at maximum capacity, not lifting more weights. The take home lesson here is: go hard in the gym, and then focus on resting and eating to recover and build muscle. This way you can go just as hard during your next session, if not even harder.

If you liked this post, check out my book Shredded Beast for a complete scientifically based training program and diet protocol.

References:

1. Feinman, Richard D., and Eugene J. Fine. “A calorie is a calorie” violates the second law of thermodynamics.” Nutr J 3.9 (2004).

2. Aagaard, Per, et al. “Neural adaptation to resistance training: changes in evoked V-wave and H-reflex responses.” Journal of Applied Physiology 92.6 (2002): 2309-2318.

3. MacDougall, J. Duncan, et al. “The time course for elevated muscle protein synthesis following heavy resistance exercise.” Canadian journal of applied physiology 20.4 (1995): 480-486.

Read More: 5 Bench Press Mistakes That Will Stall Your Progress

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

The Quality Of Modern Movies Signals Our Cultural Decline

November 2, 2014 | by Jon Bergeron | Link | Original Link

"When our food and clothing and housing all are born in the complication of mass production, mass method is bound to get into our thinking and to eliminate all other thinking." – John Steinbeck

The regurgitated garbage that passes for film these days (or even entertaining blockbusters) is appalling; Robocop remakes? Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles remakes? Saw XXI? Is anyone's intelligence insulted? The lack of original thought in our arts and culture would make anyone think the western world is truly in decline. The movie industry no longer invests in such frivolous things as plot, script, and original ideas.

Why is this? Because it's fucking hard to write a good movie! It is way too labor intensive and requires something called "talent," which is on par with "intelligence" and "skills"; which apparently everyone magically possesses now by simply trying in the world of equality (think Kurt Vonnegut's "Harrison Bergeron"). The creation of movies (along with literature, music, etc.) at one time was the pinnacle of a talented individual's thoughts and ideas. To slightly modify George Orwell's great quote:

> (Film) as we know it is an individual thing, demanding mental honesty and a minimum of censorship. Almost certainly we are moving into an age of totalitarian dictatorships- an age in which freedom of thought will be at first a deadly sin and later on a meaningless abstraction. The autonomous individual is going to be stamped out of existence. But this means that (film), in the form in which we know it, must suffer at least a temporary death.

The state of movies today

Today's major blockbuster films are definitely on their deathbed, if not already six feet under. Modern movies reek of cronyism, group thought, and investment in profitable ideas rather than original ones. The movies are created to garner the most income with the least amount of investment, targeting the unthinking masses to maximize profits. Popularity trumps quality.

In this dichotomy, political leanings often play a role. In Western Civilization, Harold Bloom's School of Resentment (written some 40 years ago) becomes more and more apparent among modern movies. Not stepping on toes, no offensive material, no hurting feelings, and political correctness has touched every aspect of mainstream films and, most obviously, all arts in general. It is water downed, weak garbage without a spark of individual thought.

Films are the largest and one of the most easily accessible of the arts. Why take the grueling time to write a story when you have another plot you can build on from 30+ years ago? With modern movies, all the "talent" goes into marketing; this is the new art form. The commercials, the target audience, the distribution are all far more the focus than the actual content of the film, all in the name of profit. Forget everything else; cut-paste plot, lower the bar of casting, use cheapened special effects, computer generated garbage, etc. BOOM! Shit-A-la-carte!

There was a time not only plot, script, etc. was an art, but other more subtle things like make-up, set design, movie poster painting (quite an admirable art form), casting, etc. were actual art forms as well that were not simply mass-produced. They were considered a craft perfected by a craftsman. Ask anyone over 30 and it's likely that their favorite films did not originate in the 21st century. What does this say about our cheapened modern culture? It truly has "gotten into our thinking," as Steinbeck observed so many years ago.

Another point to bring up is acting. Does anyone remember the amazing acting of Jack Nicholson in "One who Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest" or "Five Easy Pieces"? The whiny, emasculated, ironic, indifferent, flapping vaginas that pass as "actors" today are disheartening. Have you seen any modern movie that doesn't star an actor that could easily be an emotionless emaciated androgynous lesbian that has the acting skills of a retarded infant? Where is the goddamn passion?

All the focus is now on the cheap advertisements with an equally trite, cheap, weak, watered-down movie experience vacant of any artistic merit. Think of quality directors' names such Kubrick, Bergman, Welles, and Scorsese, to name a few. Can anyone even name the director of a movie churned out of Hollywood these days? Watching one of these modern flicks is like getting stabbed in the eyes while someone is poking you in the balls at the same time.

Hope for the future of film

I must say, though, there is a glowing beacon of light emanating from the small movie screens around the corner. Some of these small movie theaters are located sporadically around the country. And no, I am not speaking of Porn Theaters. They are commonly referred to as “independent theaters.” These venues are a sanctuary from the literal shitshow of the large mass-produced movies, and offer an intimate environment usually populated by only a few mature adults in the theater. I don’t have to stare at the mouth-breathers or the asshole who keeps farting while simultaneously stuffing popcorn in his face while his fatass girlfriend and kids are literally wedged in the seat next to me.

More than likely you can purchase booze on site, or you can easily sneak in a flask of booze. The indie and foreign films that play at these theaters can be a hit or miss, but the risk is worth it. The acting is usually done well by some up—and—coming actors who are looking to get established. This is in contrast with mediocre Hollywood actors of today who just sit back and collect the money.

Unlike the movies of the west with all their saturated stinky little orthodoxies out for your soul, many less-known films and foreign films don’t dabble in cultural Marxist propaganda as much. In fact, they focus more on the craft of film making rather than politics, and this is apparent within five minutes of watching one of these quality films. You will rarely see a remake.

The most important thing to me is, even if the indie movie is crappy, the ideas are almost always original in thought, which is all one can hope for in this clusterfuck of modern art. At these independent theaters, some days they will also play classics such as “A Fistful of Dollars” or other great films of the past. Other days they will feature a great TV series on the big screen. The variety is endless. In addition, it is a great place to bring a date. If you are feeling risqué, you can easily have theater sex if the movie is a total bomb and the theater is dead, ironically turning the theater into your very own “porn theater.”

Independent movies and theaters have shown me not all the world is a decadent mess of soulless mass-produced garbage regurgitated from the same mass-produced garbage from yesteryear. Only 90% of the world is (I am looking at you, ironic mustache urbanite with aviator sunglasses and shitty tattoos). As for the other 10%, you might be pleasantly surprised to find it at an independent movie theater.

Read More: You’ve Already Seen One Of The Greatest Red Pill Movies Ever Made

Jon Bergeron
Jon is a part time misanthrope, full time American. Jon loathes modern academia, art, culture, literature, politics, television, and everything on god's green earth that has been inundated with boring, predictable, impotent, vapid Cultural Marxist horseshit which, mind you, is totally void of a single individual thought. Jon just realized he is a full time misanthrope. Anyways, Jon prays for this to change one day and something new to come along. Until then, Jon remains pessimistic with a loaded .357 next to his bed. Jon can be reached at

Why American Men Should Refuse To Vote

November 3, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Tomorrow, the U.S. holds its midterm elections. While not quite the orgy of inanity that is a presidential election, there'll be plenty of idiocy pouring out of the chattering classes like diarrhea out of a sewer pipe for weeks to come:

> Well Jim, the Elephants look like they're going to win this one, but the Donkeys aren't going down without a fight.
>
> True, John, the Donkeys have many loyal supporters but the Elephants are fired up and angry and have the momentum…
>
> Hold on, McConnell has the ball and is dashing for the finish line! Can Alison Lundergan Grimes catch up with him! She's struggling… TOUCHDOWN! THE ELEPHANTS WIN! THHHEEE ELEPHANTS WIN!

Politics is football for the over-educated and under-read: they're both spectator sports that are slow, overly commercialized, boring, and meaningless. And while someone like myself born without the sports gene can at least have fun at a Super Bowl party, there's no mirth to be found in the cavalcade of stupidity that is the American body politic. Yet for some reason, I'm expected to participate in the charade of politics by casting a vote every year.

I refuse. I haven't voted in three years, I'm not voting this year, and I'm not voting ever again. Here is why all American men should follow my lead.

1. Your vote is meaningless

I mean this both literally and metaphorically. In a nation of 300 million imbeciles, your vote as a sane man is outweighed by the lazy and the crazy. The average American reads at a eighth-grade level, doesn't pay attention to the news and has an IQ in the 90s. Their votes count just as much as yours. If you live in a state where legislative districts are gerrymandered to favor one or both of the major parties (i.e. almost all of them), your ballot is worth even less. And God help you if you're a Republican in Cook County, Illinois or you live anywhere else where voting fraud is rampant.

Not only that, elected politicians comprise only one part of the government: the weakest part. As James Burnham predicted in his brilliant book The Managerial Revolution, power in the U.S. has gradually been shifting from public officials to unelected, unaccountable managers. Civil servants, the Federal Reserve, and alphabet agencies such as the FBI and NSA have far more power than Congress or even the president himself. Can your vote to determine who runs the NSA or the Fed? No, you can't.

2. Politicians on both the left and right hate you

There is not a single politician of importance in the U.S., liberal or conservative, who gives a damn about men's issues. The Democrats have abandoned all pretense of being a party for the common man and have made gimmedats for single mothers and feminist urban slut machines the centerpiece of their platform. NAFTA, the piece of legislation that has done the most damage to the middle class in the past twenty years, was passed by a Democratic Congress and signed into law by a Democratic president.

But anyone who thinks the Republicans are any better is smoking crack. While the GOP is not as overtly malicious as the Jackass Party, their leading figureheads are just as equally corrupt and beholden to corporate interests. There are no Republican politicians advocating for the abolition of alimony, family court reform or any issues that would improve the quality of life for men in America. Indeed, the Christian wing of the GOP has a disturbing tendency to white knight for women, as shown by such things as IMBRA (International Marriage Broker Regulation Act, an unconstitutional attempt to keep men from marrying foreign women) being co-sponsored by two conservative Republicans.

Furthermore, while Republicans are marginally less insane than Democrats when it comes to economics, they have a disturbing obsession with picking on the poor and downtrodden. For example, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, a folk hero among conservatives for his battles with the state's overpaid civil servants, supported a bill that would allow retailers like Wal-Mart to force their employees to work seven days a week. I'm not stupid enough to think a $15 minimum wage is a good idea, but neither is treating our poorest citizens like feudal serfs.

If you're a productive, industrious man, both Republicans and Democrats want to fuck you in the ass. The only difference is that the GOP will use Astroglide and cuddle with you afterwards. How about we choose not to have our sphincters split open?

3. Politics itself is a charade

I'm not a conspiracy theorist, but it's difficult to look at the pageantry of American politics and conclude that they aren't all in on the scam. Unless you're a low-information voter who only cares about government handouts and boutique issues like abortion and gay marriage, both the Jackass Party and the Dumbass Party are bound to disappoint you. Neither party has any interest in solving the issues it purports to care about, because keeping their supporters unsatisfied is the only way to motivate them to turn out at the polls.

For example, everyone made a huge deal about how House Republicans "shut down the government" (in quotes because the important agencies, like the NSA, mysteriously kept running despite the lack of funding) last year in order to stop Obamacare. I predicted that John Boehner and company would do an 11th hour about-face and cave to every single one of Obama's demands, then go back to their constituents sniffling "Welp, we tried, but we just couldn't stop Obamacare, sorry. But please pretty please vote for us next year!" And—SHOCK! HORROR! SURPRISE!—I was right.

The Democrats pull the same shell game with their constituents. Obama was swept into office on the promise that he would close Guantanamo Bay, repeal the PATRIOT Act and end the erosion of civil liberties that defined Bush's presidency. Six years later, Gitmo is still open, the NSA is spying on our every move and Obama has decided to one-up Bush by killing people without due process with drone strikes. Add in the bogus prosecutions of Republicans for "corruption" in the past year—and Obama's complete inaction in regards to Wall Street corruption—and a pretty ugly picture emerges.

There is only one way to fight the corruption of our political class: refuse to vote. Merely casting a ballot, regardless of who it is for, is an act of acquiescence to the system. I regard the United States as a degenerate failed state incapable of doing anything aside from oppressing its citizens. I may not be able to keep the IRS's fingers out of my wallet or NSA cronies from jerking off to my girlfriend's nude selfies, but I can refuse to give the entity that controls them my stamp of approval.

So tomorrow, stay home. Play video games. Make love to your girlfriend. Snort an eight-ball and watch reruns of Girls. But for the love of God, don't vote.

Read More: The Republican Party Needs To Go Away

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Cervantes And The Grandeur Of Spain

November 3, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Before the rise of England to the status of a world power in the seventeenth century, Spain's empire in the sixteenth century covered an immense portion of the globe. Yet the character of this nation, so unlike any other in Europe, confounds easy explanation. Inheriting the bloods and passions of its constituent peoples, it blended Arabic, Hebraic, native Iberian, and Latin stocks into a mixture of perfervid and turbulent vitality.

No other nation in Europe was as devoutly religious as Spain; and the preference of the people was for a creed rich in miracles and stern in conception. Even criminals carried religious paraphernalia and scapulars; in 1600 Spain contained some 9,000 monasteries and over 32,000 Dominican and Franciscan friars, nearly all of them imbued with a zeal that marked them off from their milder counterparts in Italy.

Agriculture and industry had suffered grievously from the expulsion of the Moriscos and Jews; and the peasantry, disdaining manual labor, settled into an enervating lassitude that found the guitar and songbook more congenial than the plow. The Inquisition—always more severe in Spain than in Italy—cast a pall over cultural life, retarding the growth of free inquiry and cutting the nation off from the stimulating strains of European thought that had galvanized Renaissance Italy and Reformation Germany. Spain chose to remain medieval. She stayed contentedly so.

The surfeit of gold from the New World, ironically, contributed to Spain's decline. As fast as the money was unloaded from the galleons, it was spent on wars and on the purchase of manufactured goods from England or Holland. Prices exploded as the law of inflation caught up with the influx of precious metals: in Andalusia, we are told, prices of good increased by 500% in the sixteenth century.

The money could not last forever. Galleon traffic from the Americas in 1700 was less than half what it had been a century earlier. The bullion had proven to be as addictive as it was fleeting. One is reminded of the similarly corrosive effects of petroleum wealth on some Middle Eastern nations.

As the money dried up and the military reversals mounted, Spain found herself saddled with a parasitic class of nobles, a dour clerical establishment, and an inadequate manufacturing base. These proved incapable of modernizing the country. Spain settled into a long period of political and military decline. And yet there was—and remains—an incomparable majesty and grandeur in Spain, even as her decline became a European tragedy. The conquest of an empire that spanned the globe, the seeding of the New World with a transformed Latin blood and culture, the fanatical propagation of the Roman creed into strange and savage lands: is this not one of history's great dramas?

It is against this backdrop of valor and decline that we must consider Spain's greatest novelist. Miguel de Cervantes was born at Alcalá on October 9, 1547. His father was an itinerant physician, scratching out an uncertain living from the generosity, and the ailments, of the peasants with whom he disdained to rub shoulders. At age 22 he had some of his poems published by a Madrid teacher, and in the same year was banished from Spain for ten years as punishment for dueling. In 1571 he signed as a seaman in the armada assembled by Don Juan of Austria (most likely to escape prison) and saw action against the Turks at Lepanto, enduring three wounds and the loss of use of his left hand.

In 1575 he and his brother Rodrigo, on their way back to Spain, were captured by Saracen pirates and (as was customary at the time) impressed into slavery in Algiers. For five years he was held in bondage. His sisters tapped into their marriage dowries, his mother tapped her friends and contacts, and together they raised the five hundred crowns needed to ransom him. From this experience he gained a wealth of stories, a knowledge of Arabic and of Islamic customs, and a genially philosophic view of life. But perhaps this was enough. He returned to Spain rich in nothing but experience.

Further military adventures brought him little except a healthy skepticism of swordplay and war. In 1584 he married a loyal and patient woman named Catalina, eighteen years younger than he, and oversaw the publication of a mediocre romance titled Galatea; further efforts as a playwright produced little in the way of lucre.

Appointed a tax collector at Grenada in 1594, he was eventually jailed for ninety days on suspicion of embezzlement; released, our hero was locked up again in Argamasilla. Like his Portuguese contemporary Camões and his English predecessor Thomas Malory, he found prison a wonderful concentrator of literary effort, and there completed the manuscript for what would eventually become one of the most cherished novels in world literature.

In 1605, his meandering manuscript finally saw print, and touched heaven. It was titled The Life and Adventures of the Renowned Don Quixote de la Mancha. It is a genial tale of a kindly lunatic, who time has passed by, wandering the Spanish countryside (although trying to follow Cervantes's geography is impossible) and upholding feudal values against brigands, miscreants, and windmills.

Here we find some of the most touching creations in Spanish literature: the loyal Sancho Panza and his donkey, the Lady Dulcinea, and the odd assortment of characters whom the Don encounters in his rambling quest. Don Quixote himself is animated by a desire to right injustices and to protect the weak; he longs to return to an imagined golden age of knights and heroes, and seeks to recreate this ethic in his tragi-comical dealings with the Spanish peasantry. Cervantes channeled a lifetime of suffering and failure into the most optimistic, kindly, and profound of all novels.

Cervantes even achieves something more, for he turns this strange figure into a philosopher, and has him and Sancho Panza amuse the reader with a flood of well-placed adages. Despite his master's shortcomings and befuddlement, Sancho loves him, serves him loyally, and provides the comic relief needed in a narrative of eight hundred pages. The book is a goldmine of proverbs, a fountain of wisdom, a vein of memorable episodes, and at times a tiresome bore; yet we are swept along by the bubbling stream of the narrative, the cheerful humor of the whole, and its ability to tap into the deepest recesses of our consciousness.

We love Don Quixote because we see ourselves in him. We identify with his hopeless quests, his need to dream great dreams, his veneration of a lost ideal, and his protective self-delusions in an unforgiving world. We share the hardships and humiliations of the "Knight of the Woeful Countenance" because we have lived them, and go on doing so.

Miguel de Cervantes: a life of adventure and difficulty

Don Quixote is one of the glories of the written word. It has seen more translations than any other book except the Bible; the Don and his loyal squire are drawn with such precision and sympathy that we feel offended when Cervantes humiliates his heroes. At the end of the tale, the old Don takes ill, and feels the approach of the Reaper. The final deathbed scene is one of the great passages of world literature. Who will object to our quoting it here at length?

> As all human things, especially the lives of men, are transitory, their very beginnings being but steps to their dissolution; so Don Quixote, who was no way exempted from the common fate, was snatched away by death when he least expected it…A physician was sent for, who, upon feeling his pulse, did not very well like it; and therefore desired him of all things to provide for his soul's health, for that of his body was in a dangerous condition. Don Quixote heard this with much more temper than those about him; for his niece, his housekeeper, and his squire, fell a weeping as bitterly as if he had been laid out already…
>
> At length he awaked, and, with a loud voice, "Praised be the Almighty," cried he, "for this great benefit he has vouchsafed to me!" The niece, hearkening very > attentively to these words of her uncle, and finding more sense in them than there was in his usual talk, at least since he had fallen ill; “What do you say, sir?” said she; “has any thing extraordinary happened? What mercies are these you mention?” “Mercies,” answered he, “that Heaven has this moment vouchsafed to show me, in spite of all my iniquities…”

>
> Don Quixote’s words put them all into such wonder, that they stood gazing upon one another; they thought they had reason to doubt of the return of his understanding, and yet they could not help believing him…The curate thereupon cleared the room of all the company but himself and Don Quixote, and then confessed him…These dismal tidings opened the sluices of the housekeeper’s, the niece’s, and the good squire’s swollen eyes, so that a whole inundation of tears burst out of those flood-gates, and a thousand sighs from their hearts…
>
> “Woe’s me, my dear master’s worship!” cried Sancho, all in tears, “do not die this time, but even take my counsel, and live on many years. For shame, sir, do not give way to sluggishness, but get out of your doleful dumps, and rise…” “Soft and fair gentlemen,” replied Don Quixote; “never look for birds of this year in the nests of the last: I was mad, but now I am in my right senses; I was once Don Quixote de la Mancha, but I am now (as I said before) the plain Alonzo Quixano; and I hope the sincerity of my words, and my repentance, may restore me to the same esteem you have had for me before…”
>
> Thus died that ingenious gentleman, Don Quixote de la Mancha…with design that all the towns and villages in La Mancha should contend for the honour of giving him birth, as the seven cities of Greece did for Homer…Several epitaphs were made for his tomb, and will only give you this, which the bachelor Carrasco caused to be put over it:
>
> The body of a knight lies here,
>
> So brave, that, to his latest breath,
>
> Immortal glory was his care,
>
> And made him triumph over death.
>
> Nor has his death the world deceived
>
> Less than his wondrous life surprised;
>
> For if he like a madman lived,
>
> At least he like a wise one died.

All of Spain wept with Sancho. No one who has dared to dream impossible dreams, who has been inspired by a just and noble cause, or who has sought to attain the unattainable, can fail to be moved the pathos and humanity of this story.

If anyone should doubt the enduring greatness of Spain, let him stand beneath the fantastic spires of the Sagrada Familia in Barcelona; let him touch the sublime arches of the Alhambra; and let him hear the rhythm and beauty of the Spanish language, spoken in all its forms across the globe, which cedes to no other tongue its primacy.

The venerable old Don, despite all his human flaws and follies, possessed a nobility of purpose that redeemed the limitations of his powers. Spain honored him, loved him, and forgave him.

Read More: An Epic Poem Of Discovery And Adventure

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Why You Should Live Life Like A Villain

November 3, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

The other night I was flipping channels and stumbled upon my favorite movie, Rocky IV. I tossed the remote aside and made myself comfortable to watch the flick I'd seen at least a hundred times. Right on cue my on-and-off FWB emerged from her kitchen bearing gifts of homemade empanadas and rice milk (love my Latinas). After she rolled her eyes at the television and handed me my plate she took to her usual task of playing with her more reliable FWB—her iPhone.

Shortly after Ivan Drago sent Apollo Creed six feet under with the left hook heard 'round the world my cheating chica managed to pull herself away from her phone long enough to ask me a question that really got me thinking: "Why do you always root for the bad guy?"

She was right. I love villains. All of them. From real life heels like Pablo Escobar and Floyd Mayweather Jr. to fictional outlaws like Scarface and Gordon Gekko, I have always had an affinity for men who proudly don the black hat since I was a wee lad. As a kid I recognized very quickly that the bad guys always had cooler cars, bigger guns, and hotter women. I saw that they carried themselves with a swagger and confidence the good guys didn't have nearly enough of. Once I saw the results of their ability to charm themselves into the good graces of both men and women, I was all in on malefactors, though I was much too young to wrap my head around why.

[image]

Being raised in a culture that all but castrates us from birth, men are led to believe that the hero always gets the girl and lives the good life because he is selfless and does the right thing (read: panders to women). The matriarchy finishes the job by telling us the bad guy gets nothing but contempt from said girl for his assholery or crimes and is destined to live out his days in misery and shame. Naturally we try to become heroes to save the damsels in distress and live out that dream.

Those of us who've unplugged from the matrix have come to accept that this isn't how it works. And while it's common knowledge in the 'sphere that being a hero is the quickest way to contract the disease known as parchus cockaramus (desert dick) it's not oft discussed that modeling your behaviors and habits according to what the opposite side of that spectrum dictates will quite literally transform you and your life right before your very eyes. So if you've truly digested the Red Pill, side effects and all, then you'll understand these three unmistakable real world truths about life in 2014:

1. Villains live more fulfilling lives than heroes.
2. Villains command much more respect than heroes.
3. The hero never gets the girl while the villain is always up to his eyebrows in pussy.

Now I know there could be a few men (and women) reading this right now thinking "You are soooo wrong! Heroes are amazing and attractive and women adore them!" Answer this question fellas: How's that hero thing workin' out for ya? Thought so. And ladies, when's the last time you blew a guy who tried to "save" you? I hear the crickets too.

I also know there are men reading this who are on the cusp of true alphadom. You're not quite there yet but you're getting close. You've gotten into shape, killed your approach anxiety, tightened up your thread game, and can leap over a shit test in a single bound.

But you're missing something. That edge. You're lacking that extra oomph that pushes a woman from a casual fuck buddy to devoted sex slave who doesn't give a shit who you're banging on the side so long as she's in your presence. You're missing that x-factor that commands the respect of everyone around you. This is where implementing villainous traits comes in.

Now before you furrow your brow and blurt out "what the fuck," just relax. Nobody's suggesting you go out and start committing crimes. However, taking on a few bad guy attributes will most assuredly kick your life into overdrive.

Never ever apologize

"If he dies, he dies…" As a 9-year-old those words sent chills up my spine (they still do). I had always been told to repent and make amends for sins I've committed. And who among us haven't been raised to apologize for the wrongs we've done? This was different. Drago killed someone, didn't give a shit, and let everyone know about it while draped in the Soviet flag in hostile territory at the height of the Cold War. He showed positively zero penitence about taking a man's life with his own hands. This was maximum fucking alpha.

[image]

Obviously you can't run out and commit murder then tell the cops "If he dies, he dies," and expect to get off scot-free. But absolute remorselessness is a staple in the psyche of a man who lives life on his own terms without feeling the need to utter the words "I'm sorry" to anyone for any reason.

If you forget to pick up your girl from work, don't apologize no matter how much she bitches at you. If you piss your buddy off when you tell him his new girlfriend is the town orifice, show no contrition. If your brother tells you you're an idiot for quitting your job to start a business, don't justify shit. Even if your girlfriend catches you with your dick in another chick, show absolutely no remorse. You do what you want, when you want, and how you want without explanation or justification.

Villains are unapologetic. They do what's necessary to dominate life and don't feel a tinge of guilt about it. Adopt this mentality and you will quickly gain the respect of your peers, your parents, your women, your siblings, and even your boss.

Take what you want, when you want it

Another classic trait that serves a Bad Guy well is his ability to go after what he wants with a fervor and precision unmatched by his less than ambitious counterparts. He pinpoints his target, creates a plan of action, executes it, and most importantly, sees it through to the end.

Tony Montana is a great example of a man who carried out his plan to get what he wanted to perfection. This guy was a refugee when he arrived stateside but he was blessed with razor-sharp instincts. Scarface used his gifts to quickly identify and exploit a weakness within the hierarchy of the Miami drug trade. Yes, there were some speed bumps along the way, but he adapted and stayed the course. Before long he was the king of South Beach with more money, women, and drugs than he knew what to do with.

[image]

As a man with outlaw tendencies you must never deprive yourself of the things you want. Don't dream about driving that badass car you saw on the lot, start saving your money now and go buy the damn thing when you have the cash. Don't just make small talk with the hot cashier you want to bang, spit game at her today and invite her to hang out later tonight. Identify what you want and take it.

Villains are acutely aware that striking while the iron is hot is paramount to their lifestyle and never hesitate to take action to get what they want. It is very important to understand that they don't just go all willy-nilly and start shooting up jewelry stores when they see diamonds sparkling in a display case. They carefully plan their heist and carry it out with meticulousness so as to increase their odds of success. You would do well to emulate this behavior.

Quit acting like your miserable friends who sit around playing video games wishing for shit and start taking control of your surroundings. Act as though the world is yours for the taking and take it. You'll shock yourself when you start accumulating the commodities you thought were out of reach.

Turn your residence into your lair

A few years back I bought a very small (1700 square foot) abandoned warehouse in an industrial district downtown with the intent of eventually living there. I had my work cut out for me, but I had a vision. It took almost two years to make it livable through various renovations, but believe me when I tell you it was worth it.

Among the amenities of my new dwelling is a weightlifting area, a multi-screen computer system that rivals the Bat Cave, and a proper gun safe for my firearms. My new pad also has a roll-up door on the back large enough for me to drive my Jeep through, so I'm able to park inside. This gives me complete isolation from the outside world. If not for the deed and lack of solar panels, this place would be completely off the grid (can't have it all). I've only lived here for a few days but I felt right at home my very first night. For this is a space I inhabit over which I have complete control and is a direct reflection of who and what I am. This is my lair.

The way most homes are set up these days is under the complete control of women. The kitchen has to look like it does in magazines and always costs a fortune, the living room is in some ridiculous feng shui set up, and the act of removing the 38 overpriced designer pillows off the bed before turning in for the night is enough of a workout to burn off the day's calories.

Men are so afraid of upsetting their ~~wildebeests~~ wives they rarely object to any of it. As a result they are prisoners in their own homes without any respite from the daily grind. Any sliver of space they can carve out and call their own is given the pathetic moniker "man cave." Worse yet, some dudes in LTRs allow their women to arrange their homes to her liking.

Fuck. That. Noise.

[image]

Go into villain mode and turn your place into your lair. If you don't live alone find a place you can turn into one. Rent a storage unit, buy or lease a warehouse, rent out the attic from the crazy old man who owns the butcher shop down the street. You're a man. Get creative. Do whatever you have to do to isolate yourself in an environment that gets your testosterone juices flowing.

Make your dwelling a technological wonder if you're into computers and technology. Deck your place out with a full-scale casino complete with blackjack and poker tables if you're into gambling. Turn your crib into a sports bar or pool hall. Whatever you're into, your domain needs to reflect it because this is where you will recharge your batteries, regain your focus, and lay out plans to kick life's ass.

This is one of the single most important things you can do for yourself as a man. I can personally attest to the benefits of building a lair for yourself. The few days I've been here have reinvigorated me. It won't be long after you make this change that you will notice you're more productive, more creative, and develop a much greater thirst for crushing life—just like the bad guys.

Putting these lifestyle changes into practice will noticeably improve your quality of life when implemented correctly, and consistently. While this is next-level game, red pill newcomers can also slowly work in these habits until they become second nature.

Part 2 will cover your priorities, mindset, and crew selection during your metamorphosis into a real life bad guy. Stay tuned.

Read Next: The Supreme Importance Of Having A Den

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

The Lena Dunham Sexual Abuse Scandal Showcases The Double Standard Of Feminism

November 4, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

"Evil gets the upper hand, and folly makes the most noise."

—Schopenhauer

Imagine if a male celebrity was to write the following about his younger sister:

One day, as I sat in our driveway in Long Island playing with blocks and buckets, my curiosity got the best of me. Grace was sitting up, babbling and smiling, and I leaned down between her legs and carefully spread open her vagina. She didn't resist and when I saw what was inside I shrieked.

My mother came running. "Mama, Mama! Grace has something in there!"

My mother didn't bother asking why I had opened Grace's vagina. This was within the spectrum of things I did. She just got on her knees and looked for herself. It quickly became apparent that Grace had stuffed six or seven pebbles in there. My mother removed them patiently while Grace cackled, thrilled that her prank had been a success.

…As she grew, I took to bribing her time and affection: one dollar in quarters if I could do her makeup like a "motorcycle chick." Three pieces of candy if I could kiss her on the lips for five seconds. Whatever she wanted to watch on TV if she would just "relax on me." Basically, anything a sexual predator might do to woo a small suburban girl, I was trying. Maybe, I thought, she would be more willing to accept kisses if I wore the face mask my grandmother had for when she did her dialysis. (The answer was no.) What I really wanted, beyond affection, was to feel that she needed me, that she was helpless without her big sister leading her through the world. I took a perverse pleasure in delivering bad news to her — the death of our grandfather, a fire across the street — hoping that her fear would drive her her into my arms, would make her trust me.

There is no doubt that these paragraphs, coming from a male celebrity, would be a national scandal. With the cheap moral smugness and facile self-righteousness that are as American as baseball and apple pie, the public would condemn the figure for molesting and trying to emotionally manipulate his poor younger sister.

It would be inquired whether such a horrible man is fit to do whatever he does for a living: "Should this monster be a role model for our children?" The answer would be no, but perhaps the tireless sage Dr. Phil could rectify his character as the public looks on, weighing in by Twitter while slurping Coke and munching Doritos. Without his fame and affluence, the man would soon fade into obscurity, perhaps only to be resurrected on some reality TV show or other idiotic entertainment that keeps us informed of what people like Vanilla Ice and Dennis Rodman are up to these days.

The paragraphs I have quoted are from Lena Dunham's book of essays, Not That Kind of Girl: A Young Woman Tells You What She's "Learned." Elsewhere in the book, Dunham discusses masturbating in bed next to her younger sister. Her frankness about her childhood sexuality has set the American public talking and blogging.

Of course, the American public, as well all know, likes to talk and blog. It does not, however, like to think, and hence it is that most of the "conversation" around Dunham has been predictably stupid. The Right has been particularly vexed by Dunham's candid revelations. The Feminist left, meanwhile, has been oddly ambivalent. Let those of us who care about the truth therefore have a close look at this issue.

What Lena Dunham Is Not

To begin with, Lena Dunham, though by her own account a "weird child," was and is not a monster. Her behavior toward her younger sister, however bizarre it may seem, actually is not at all uncommon and indeed quite normal. All over the world, little boys and girls immodestly and naively explore their burgeoning sexuality together. This includes touching in groups, sometimes among siblings.

Children's bodies, so novel, strange and surprising, are natural objects of curiosity and fascination. Nor is there any reason why this should not occur while siblings also play out their usual familial power struggles, in which emotional manipulation is often present. In other words, that Dunham coaxed her sister into giving her affection, while also playing familial politics with her, doesn't mean Dunham was sexually deviant, or a horrible person, or any such thing.

Now I know well that many (if not most) readers will react to the above paragraph with shock and disgust—the usual human response to highly discomfiting truths. Therefore, I would ask you to click on the following links and read the text therein—the first is from The National Child Traumatic Stress Network; the second, from The American Academy of Pediatrics. There is plenty more literature on early human sexuality, but here the main point—confirmed daily all over the world—is that behavior like Dunham's is not abnormal and nothing to be upset about it.

Dunham, it must be understood, was writing about her early childhood and early teenage years (she was seven, she says, in the passages quoted above). And a young girl is not a rational moral agent. She hardly knows what morality is, just as she hardly knows what sexuality is. A seven year old girl, like a seven year old boy, acts mostly on sheer impulse. So it would be inaccurate to describe Dunham as some kind of twisted woman who molested her younger sister then wrote about it shamelessly.

The Greater Significance Of The Issue

What, then, is really problematic here? To answer this question, we need to take a good look at the context in which this issue occurred. We need to understand what is going on with America's intergender relations. Here the thought experiment with which I began this essay is illustrative. It is impossible to imagine a male celebrity writing as Dunham has without being subject to a figurative public hanging. We also have not heard any feminist outcries concerning Dunham's failure to procure an affirmative "yes" from her younger sister.

This hypocrisy is disturbing because feminists and the media have become unsparing and unreasonable in the way they scrutinize every aspect of male sexuality. We have reached a state of things where a remark such as "hey cutie" is considered "harassment"—rather than what it actually is, an advance, or a compliment, or an advance by way of a compliment.

Then there is the inane "yes mean yes" policy. By this means a simplistic and coddling binary is set up, one that functions to maximize female power just insofar as it oppresses men: if a woman did not say "yes," then she really meant "no." So runs the logic, and so heterosexual intercourse is supposed to be some kind of perfectly tidy transaction. No one ever gets hurt, because getting hurt only happens thanks to the wrong kinds of "social constructions."

In reality—that little seen red-pill place—intergender relations are naturally and permanently difficult, messy and irrational; far beyond the purview of contracts and policies. It is part of the seducer's art to have a woman's pants off before "yes" or "no" ever occur to her. It is likewise part of his skill not to settle for "no," but to continue to seduce his lover until she yields—nor is this to advocate rape or any other behavior that doesn't respect a woman's wishes.

Endeavoring to secure an affirmative "yes" while in the throes of desire is quite contrary to the nature of heterosexual seduction. Driven by a pursuing man, it's usually a matter of urgent irrational passion; it is not some bloodless contract, or something reducible to logic or a simple binary. In many cases, a woman says "no" only at first, because she doesn't want to be thought of as a slut.

Besides, women are strongly aroused by men who simply go after things (read: confidence and dominance). Asking permission is a huge turn off; taking what you want, a huge turn on. Finally, from a logical point of view, lack of a yes is not the same thing as an (implicit) no: it's simply lack of a yes—full stop.

Feminism's Primary Agenda

Feminism's primary agenda is the same as the liberal one: it is to condemn reality itself while asserting its utopian dream of a world based on fairness, equality and the like delusions. Man as such—man as he really is—that thorny creature is not acceptable to liberals and feminists. He needs to be chopped down to size, made more passive, more tame, more agreeable, more "equal." When similarly "deviant" behavior is seen in women like Lena Dunham, however, most feminists are predictably silent.

And, interpreting expressed interest or a compliment from a man as harassment goes a long way, over time, toward building the fantasy of a world without awkward encounters. This is the same world, tellingly, where everyone is middle-class and no one has to scrub toilets for minimum wage. The Gulags of the last century may serve as a reminder as to what happens when humankind sets out to realize its utopian chimeras.

Feminism is like any other large human movement in that while it makes much of fairness and equality, its actual main effect is to try to maximize Power. In other words, it is essentially self-interested. For, take any movement, however noble and well-meant in the beginning: before long, the intellectual stupidity and moral baseness of the human majority will corrupt it, whether it's democracy, feminism, the manosphere, or whatever.

Feminism presents a very interesting and complex case. The unseemly truth, which virtually no one wants to recognize, is that conflict frequently is inevitable between the sexes. At best, we can complement each other. But even when that increasingly rare state has been reached, it doesn't follow that our respective agendas are not still averse to one another in certain respects.

More generally, it should be understood that human relations consist of people needing or wanting things from another, from fellow creatures who are laden with all sorts of anxieties and burdens, just like you and me. And since almost all of us are not only far from being saints, but rather perversely self-interested, it follows that not equality but competitive discord is our natural and indeed permanent condition.

To those who disagree, I say look closer at what is called equality. True equality, as lived out in actual life, would consist of literal sameness—an impossibility. Now, as for equality as a legal and political thing, here we invariably find that whatever is the cause, the main goal ends up being to maximize power, not to achieve any real equality.

Hence, then, the conflation of an advance or compliment with harassment. Hence the lunatic notion that de facto rape has occurred if a man didn't receive a "yes" from his lover. Hence the trite cant that the Sports Illustrated Swimsuit Edition is "patriarchal objectification that contributes to a rape culture." And hence the muted response to actions from a feminist icon that would inspire widespread outrage if the sexes were reversed.

To a student of human nature, all this is just how it should be. Like the characters in Moliere's great plays, the world is one vast ever-smiling fraud. With few exceptions, the poor man who castigates the greedy rich would, if only possible, be a heartless miser himself. So too with the typical feminist. She may go on and on about the "subjection of women," but as we have seen from many recent events, feminists, and women, will be happy to get in on the intoxicating fun of Power if only they can.

Read More: The Equality Movement Is Allowing Women To Tyrannize Men

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

#GamerGate Proves That No Hegemon Is Everlasting

November 4, 2014 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

It seemed a typical September day in 490 B.C. Summer was turning into autumn, but the change in the seasons was probably not very apparent. Warmth still filled the air. So did fear. In fact, fear was probably the most palpable thing in the air that day, because this was not a typical September day at all.

Fear must have swept through every Greek man as he watched what was arrayed before him. From his safety on the heights overlooking the beach of Marathon, the Greek soldier saw the enormous host of the Persian King Darius. In their presence was the expelled Athenian Tyrant, Hippias. The Persians were present for only one reason – to subjugate Athens and punish its people for daring to take part in the revolt of the Ionian Greeks against their rule some years earlier. For this transgression, the mighty Persian King sought to punish tiny Athens, keeping the Athenians first in his thoughts by supposedly demanding a servant to remind him to "remember the Athenians" every time he took a meal.

Tiny does indeed describe Athens well, especially when considering the magnitude of the opponent the Athenian soldier faced on that September day. The Persian Empire stretched from the Indus to the Danube and from the Caspian Sea to Egypt. The equivalent today might be the entire United States ganging up on New York City.

Some in the city were so afraid that they considered surrendering immediately. And indeed, it was known that a large faction, including the sympathizers of Hippias, wanted to open the gates. The Persians banked on this too, and began to withdraw from the beach, leaving only a covering force.

Not one to waste such a golden opportunity, the Greek general Miltiades implored the other generals to take action, but many still did not dare. The fear among the soldiers had not missed many of their generals, and five refused to vote to attack, not wanting to leave the safety of their shelter. Miltiades, no doubt frustrated, turned to the decisive vote in the senior general, Callimachus, who had still not spoken. This is supposed to have been his passionate argument, one which has chilling similarities with what we are faced with today:

> With you it now rests, Callimachus, either to bring Athens under slavery, or by making her free to leave behind you for all the time that men shall live a memorial such as not even Harmodios and Aristogeiton have left. For now the Athenians have come to a danger the greatest to which they have ever come since they were a people; and on the one hand, if they submit to the Medes, it is determined what they shall suffer, being delivered over to Hippias, while on the other hand, if this city shall gain the victory, it may become the first of the cities of Hellas. How this may happen and how it comes to thee of all men to have the decision of these matters, I am now about to tell.
>
> Of us the generals, who are ten in number, the opinions are divided, the one party urging that we fight a battle and the others that we do not fight. Now if we do not, I expect that some great spirit of discord will fall upon the minds of the Athenians and so shake them that they shall go over to the Medes; but if we fight a battle before any unsoundness appear in any part of the Athenian people, then we are able to gain the victory in the fight, if the gods grant equal conditions.
>
> These things then all belong to you and depend on you; for if you attach yourself to my opinions, you have both a fatherland which is free and a native city which shall be the first among the cities of Hellas; but if you choose the opinion of those who are earnest against fighting, you shall have the opposite of those good things of which I told you.

Callimachus assented. The Athenian hoplites, still no doubt feeling fear, turned it into aggression, charged forward, and, summoning powers they never knew they had, slaughtered the Persians. For this, Callimachus paid with his life, but it was a life not spent on frivolities, because with his vote, and the valor of the Greeks in the face of fear, the myth of Persian invincibility was shattered forever.

Persian interference in Greek affairs was cut short by only a decade, but the genie was out of the bottle. The progress of Persian arms could be blunted and repulsed.

Stories such as this span the ages. In 1809, Napoleon Bonaparte, Emperor of the French, was master of Europe. Almost the entire continent was either occupied by or forcibly allied to France. It is also very likely that Napoleon could have negotiated a favorable peace settlement with Britain had he agreed to some demands such as removing his Continental System. Napoleon, in his arrogance, not only did not remove the system, he attempted to replace the Spanish king with his own brother and, when Russia defected, gathered a massive army to invade it.

The result was a “Spanish ulcer” and a “Russian hemorrhage.” Seeing that Napoleon was now vulnerable, almost all of Europe, inspired by their hatred of the French Emperor, and no longer pacified by fear, smelled blood and rose in revolt against their master. The result was the shattering Battles of Vitoria and Leipzig, the invasion of France itself, and the banishment of this swaggering pest. Waterloo was but an afterthought, an inevitable final defeat resulting from the making of too many enemies.

It took a generation to defeat Napoleon. Men and women from many nations cooperated together as never before in the undertaking – the sailor in the Royal Navy, the Russian infantryman, the Spanish guerrilla. Though distant and different, they were all connected, fighting for a common cause.

It took over a century and a half of intermittent hostilities to come, but Greece eventually did topple Persia under its champion, Alexander the Great. Throughout the process, the disparate city-states united as a nation, ceasing their own incessant warring for a grand undertaking that could only be accomplished together.

In both cases, the hegemon became the hunted.

Are there similarities relevant to GamerGate? While it may seem odd to compare military campaigns to a consumer uprising, the root they all share is the one constant in life – power. In GamerGate, we see a hegemon intruding into new territory and attempting to take it over. The hegemon today is not composed of kings or emperors or their states, but the ideological zeitgeist of Cultural Marxism and its enforcing institutions, namely in the media.

Like Napoleon, it wants to turn the territory of gaming into another dependency, another satellite state to act as a booster and buffer for the power and safety of the conqueror. It is an intrusion that seeks to destroy a territory's way of life, like the Persians in Greece.

The casualties of Cultural Marxism and its bullhorns have been immense, the power it wields over society, unquestionable. Many have transgressed against its norms over the years, especially in recent ones as its vice has tightened. It has become harder not to run afoul of its inquisition. Its zealots are constantly watching.

They have gotten a talented programmer fired for a few tweets, a revolutionary software developer fired for a small donation he made six years ago, a group of firefighters fired for years-old tweets, and, in moves which question their supposed stance of championing women, they have harassed and attempted to ruin the livelihoods of two successful women—one for a joke about AIDS, and the other for a remark she made many years ago. These are only a few notable instances among an uncountable number.

Cultural Marxism's victories have been numerous and varied. With such a fearsome reputation and maximum forward momentum, its adherents might not have been totally wrong to assume that they would be able to dictate to the gaming world (one of the few remaining holdouts that it hasn't completely taken over) how it should operate.

But gamers, like the Greeks at Marathon, stood. They showed that they would not tolerate the corruption, the rampant proselytizing, the labeling, the attacks. They would not tolerate intolerant encroachments and appropriation of their community, their polis. Cultural Marxism doubled down, insulting them and inciting their ire even more. It might have been easy for gamers to be afraid, especially when mainstream news got involved, but they turned their fear to anger instead.

Like Napoleon's enemies, gamers learned Cultural Marxism's tactics and turned them on their creator. Many gamers in fact were probably sympathetic to Cultural Marxism, and have defected from their former allegiance, realizing its corruption and zealotry. They drew blood. Inspired by the gamers' example, other factions hostile to Cultural Marxism have begun to join in. They smelled blood. A coalition is forming.

Julius Caesar noted that "in war, important events often result from trivial causes." GamerGate proves the maxim true. If GamerGate teaches us one lesson, it is that hegemons, even when appearing invincible, always show cracks, and then fall. So it was with the Persian and French Empires, and we are seeing it unfolding before our eyes here. GamerGate will not destroy Cultural Marxism, but it has shown one thing – it is not invincible. Marathon has been repeated.

Hegemonies fall because power corrupts and corrodes itself through its own arrogance. It makes too many enemies, and at some point, those enemies are no longer pacified by fear. Once that element is removed, aggression is channeled by the hegemon's many enemies to oppose and ultimately topple the regime.

The Persians thought they could conquer tiny Athens. They were wrong. Napoleon thought he could continuously maintain control of Europe. He was wrong. Cultural Marxists thought they would be unchallenged in their corruption of video games. They were wrong. All three cases are a violation of the 47th of Robert Greene's 48 Laws of Power:

"Do not go past the mark you aimed for. In victory, know when to stop."

Hegemons have always violated this law, and it has cut them down at their knees, time and again.

Read More: The Long March Home

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

4 Supplement Scams You Should Avoid

November 4, 2014 | by Clark Kent | Link | Original Link

I've been consistently training with weights for about twenty-five years. I do not regret all the hours I have spent in the gym—it has resulted in a healthier, stronger version of me.

But if I had it all to do over I would have spent much, much less money on bodybuilding supplements. I was naïve about the industry and all the garbage that was being marketed to young men. I always encourage young trainees to be very skeptical about supplements.

I'd like to share four of the worst supplement scams in hopes that it will help you to wise up and not fall for the hype next time you check out a bodybuilding website or nutrition store.

1. The “Proprietary Blend”

You’ll frequently see this term on the label of bottles of bodybuilding supplements. Companies are allowed to list the ingredients in their products without telling you exactly how much of said ingredients are in their formula. They can do this legally under the pretense of guarding their patented formula.

Here’s the problem: you never really know exactly what you are buying. Many companies, in fact, will put tiny amounts of several compounds in their “proprietary blend” to make it look more impressive. Industry insiders call this practice “fairy dusting.” The long, impressive list of ingredients is called “label decoration” by the same insiders.

Your supplement may have a long list of ingredients without an effective dose of any of them. This even assumes that said ingredients do anything in the first place—which is a huge assumption. The “proprietary blend” loophole leads to paying for more filler and less of the substances that are (supposedly) helping you to achieve better gains.

2. The (Real) Active Ingredient

Even “effective” supplements can be deceptive because of one ingredient that actually works. Let’s take caffeine as an example. Multiple studies have proven caffeine’s efficacy for mobilizing fat, controlling appetite, delaying fatigue, and even reducing pain during exercise. Guess what the active ingredient in most “fat burners” and “pre workout” supplements is? You got it—caffeine. You’d probably do just as well to buy some generic caffeine tablets at a fraction of the price.

Creatine monohydrate is another example—multiple studies have been conducted (over 500), with most of them (over 70%) concluding that it works. Some supplement companies have taken advantage of this by mixing creatine with a several unnecessary and overpriced ingredients. The resulting formula is “clinically proven” to add size and strength, but the trainee would have saved a lot of money if he had just used regular creatine monohydrate instead of “super awesome mass pump anabolic secret formula.”

3. The Celebrity Endorsement

Dr. Oz was recently called out for endorsing green coffee bean extract based on shoddy research. This isn’t first questionable supplement he has endorsed. But supplement companies have been using this method to promote their products ever since I can remember. The endorsement may come from someone with academic or medical credentials, or from a high-profile fitness expert.

The bodybuilding industry’s version of this is to have a steroid-using bodybuilder promote their supplement, as if 20-inch arms are made possible by ingesting the right type of protein powder. Always follow the money if you want to know what motivates such claims.

4. Spiking

This may be the least common practice, but it is also the most dangerous. Some supplement manufacturers have resorted to putting banned or illegal substances in supplements in order to get quick results and build some “street credibility.” I’ve heard rumors of this quite some time, and I’ve seen quite a few recalls of supplements over the past few years for this reason. Some were even found to cause liver damage.

How do you avoid falling for scams like these? Here are a few easy steps:

1. Stick with a few basic supplements: a multivitamin, protein powder, fish oil, and creatine monohydrate are enough for most trainees.

2. Read labels carefully and know exactly what ingredients you are buying (and ingesting). I usually avoid proprietary formulas altogether.

3. Don’t jump on the bandwagon. A bunch of meatheads talking something up on a forum is no reason to start using the latest greatest “muscle builder.” Always wait a few years and see what the research says before trying a new supplement.

Read More: The Truth About Anabolic Steroids

Clark Kent
Gym rat, entrepreneur, former supplement addict, and practitioner of intermittent fasting. Visit his blog: Build Muscle. Lose Fat. You can also follow him on Facebook or Twitter.

The Incredible Story Of Mira Slovak, The Flying Czech

November 4, 2014 | by Average Guy | Link | Original Link

It was March 23, 1953. At 7:20 pm the plane lumbered down the runway and took off in the direction of Brno, 115 miles from Prague. Once in flight, the pilot turned the controls over to his Communist co-pilot and walked back among the passengers. Two of his co-conspirators then accompanied him up front on the pretext of seeing the pilots' compartment.

With weapons brought aboard, the escapees overpowered the other crew members and locked them in a baggage compartment. The pilot made his final radio contact over Benesov, then tipped the ship downward in a steep dive.

Leveling out well under 1,000 feet, the pilot banked the plane sharply toward the west and began the 45-minute hedge-hopping flight to freedom. At any moment they expected MIG fighters to pounce upon them. An attempt was made by Communist passengers to break down the door to the pilots' compartment. The pilot pulled back hard on the wheel and then shoved it forward quickly. The effect was like hitting a huge air pocket and the lurching plane discouraged further passenger action.

The pilot was Mira Slovak. The daring escape from communist-controlled Czechoslovakia would not be the end of his adventures. He would embrace freedom in America…and America would embrace this charismatic, young Czech.

In the air he was a crop-duster, a stunt pilot, Reno Air Race winner, Continental Airlines captain and Bill Boeing Jr.'s personal pilot. In 1968, Slovak piloted a tiny glider powered by a 36-horsepower Volkswagen engine from California to West Germany and back…simply for the adventure.

On the water, Mira Slovak was an Unlimited Hydroplane Hall of Fame driver and National Champion. He was also the most gracious and charismatic driver of his era. That along with his racing skills made him the most popular driver of his time. It was during this time in the 50s and 60s when Seattle became the home to most of the hydroplane racing teams. Before the Seahawks, Unlimited Hydroplane racing was a big part of Seattle's identity. The boats and their drivers were household names.

Growing Up In Czechoslovakia

Born in Czechoslovakia in 1929, Mira grew up with a fascination for aviation. He also grew up in interesting times. As a boy he watched war and occupation by Nazi Germany be replaced by communist take over. Nevertheless, at age 18 Mira found an opportunity to fly. In 1947 the newly established Republic of Czechoslovakia advertised for young men to fly for the country's air force. Of 3,000 applicants, Mira was one of 105 candidates accepted. Two years later Mira stood second in his class of 54 graduates.

In 1950 Lieutenant Slovak was selected to attend the military air transport school. Upon graduation he was assigned as a pilot with the government-controlled Czechoslovakian Airlines. Within three months he was captain and chief pilot of a plane. The stage was set for one of the most dramatic episodes of his life.

As an airlines pilot, Mira was extremely well-paid. This was primarily incentive pay to keep pilots loyal. But he felt a conflict that financial reward would not comfort. On flights to the Scandinavian countries he witnessed democratic living. He heard the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe. He remembered his life of freedom before the war. The conflict grew in his mind until at last he knew he had to try to escape communism.

The escape would be made on a scheduled flight from Prague to Brno. Mira would be the pilot of the C-47 Dakota. Among the 26 passengers were three friends involved in the conspiracy.

Now they were locked in the cockpit hedge-hopping towards West Germany expecting MIG fighters to intercept them at any moment. But, the fighters never came and now the lights of West Germany began to appear in the towns and cities below them.

Circling high above an American Air Force Base, Slovak contacted a passing jet and was led down. The escape came to a close when he and five of his passengers were granted political asylum. The next morning headlines throughout the Free World proclaimed the escape.

Coming To America

For over a year Mira worked closely with the U. S. Air Force, in Germany and in Washington, D. C. For his cooperation during those long months of interrogation, he won permanent residency in the United States.

Mira now set upon the task of getting a commercial pilot’s license, but he had no credentials. So Mira found his way to Yakima, Washington where he worked on his English and took a job with Central Aircraft flying crop-dusters.

Over in Seattle Boeing Aircraft soon learned of the skilled pilot who had fled Communism. Mira was brought to work for Boeing as a test pilot and as the personal pilot for Bill Boeing Jr.

In 1956 Boeing convinced Slovak to drive his new Miss Wahoo on the hydroplane racing circuit. Mira had never driven any boat…let alone one of the fastest in the world. But, by 1957 he had gained huge popularity in the sport and his story of escape from behind the Iron Curtain made him an American folk hero. President Eisenhower stepped in and signed an executive order to enable “The Flying Czech” to obtain a pilot’s license ahead of citizenship. In 1959 Mira won the President’s Cup Regatta on the Potomac River. President Eisenhower awarded the trophy and Slovak was able to thank him in person.

In 1960 my father stood on the shore of Lake Washington to watch the Seattle Seafair

Race. Miss Wahoo was the fastest qualifier and favored to win. From his vantage point near the north turn my father watched the six boats thundering towards the start line. But Slovak had mis-timed his start. He went past the start line reaching top speed, but trailing the entire field. The boats were now out of view as they raced to the south turn of the three-mile oval course. The crowd waited for the boats to reappear as they would race up the back stretch to the north turn.

They came into view…now five of them. Where was Miss Wahoo? My father looked from one boat to the next but couldn't find Slovak. Then someone shouted, "There's Wahoo. Behind the roostertails." The five boats were spread out along the back stretch. The crowd couldn't see Miss Wahoo but they could see her roostertail streaming higher than the boats in the foreground as Slovak raced up the outside line passing one boat after another. Now entering the North turn he was in second place and closing on the leader.

The cheering on the shore had grown to a roar. The crowd could still only see Miss Wahoo's roostertail streaming higher than the lead boat as they raced through the turn. Then Wahoo came into view as she thundered around the outside of the lead boat's tight line. There was an audible gasp by the crowd on the shore as no one had ever seen a boat corner at such a speed.

But the water in that corner wasn't smooth. The outside sponson of Miss Wahoo found a hole, the sponson dug in and Miss Wahoo flipped doing a barrel roll. There was a tremendous geyser of water. When it cleared there was the wreckage of Miss Wahoo and a Coast Guard rescue helicopter was plucking Slovak out of the water unconscious and drowning. He was taken to the hospital with broken ribs.

Slovak did not need to pass that boat in that corner. The heat was five laps. He could easily have caught the boat going down the front straightaway. But that was not how Mira Slovak drove. He always pushed to the edge. Slovak had three serious hydroplane accidents, the first in Seattle in 1960. In 1963 the Miss Exide exploded on Lake Cour d'Alene. In 1966, he tried to break the world speed record in the Tahoe Miss and the boat exploded at 195 mph. Mira bailed out breaking his back and dislocating his hip.

Mira Slovak retired from racing in 1967 and settled down. He piloted for Continental Airlines and occasionally performed in his stunt plane…flying into his 80s.

In recent years some of the vintage hydroplanes have been restored and they have exhibition races at the events throughout the Northwest. In 2009 Bill Boeing Jr. had an exact replica of Miss Wahoo built to participate in these exhibitions. At age 81, three years before his death, Mira took the wheel of Miss Wahoo once again and turned his last laps in a hydroplane.

He was told to stay below 90 mph. Mira opened it up to over 140 mph. The owners stood on the dock laughing at themselves for thinking Mira could ever hold back. His fans stood on the shore cheering their hero one last time. He had inspired them by living his life to the fullest and they loved him for it.

This article was edited from source material including:

The 1959 APBA Gold Cup Official Regatta Programme by Bob Karolevitz

Jon Osterberg's Blog Mira Slovak makes final flight home posted by Jon Osterberg June 19, 2014

Read More: In The Gunsight Of The KGB

Average Guy
AG is a recovering Beta chump who wishes he'd had red pill information in his young, formative years. A lover of women, sports, travel and freedom he now enjoys all of them as never before. You can email him at

Street Harassment Is A Myth Invented By Socially Retarded White Women

November 5, 2014 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Only to today's autistic American woman does simply being talked to amount to a crisis. Every man over a certain age can agree: girls nowadays are outright crippled by basic social interaction with people they don't already know. From being asked for directions, to simple elevator small-talk, today's 20-something woman is an agitated social retard who's scared of all men, and whose only eye contact is with her iPhone's "retina" display.

Things only get worse if the man who's talking to her should, god forbid, obviously try hitting on her—especially if he's a racial minority. That's an outright emergency, one that a growing chorus of misfits, weirdos, and social rejects are trying their hardest to brand as criminal. They call it "street harassment," and it's part of a cocktail of movements aimed at showing just how dangerous the first world is for the defenseless white girl.

Women Don’t Understand What It Takes to Meet Women

For millennia, men and women met in pretty much one of two ways: they were introduced to one another by someone they knew in common or—for the last several generations—the man had to muster the courage and skill to talk to her in public. An entire planet was populated by regular men seizing the fraction-of-a-second he has to get a woman’s attention, deploying his fine-tuned social skills to get her talking, and targeting his powers of persuasion to convincing her to show up again.

That process is harder than it looks. Have you ever had the joy of seeing a woman try to pick up a man cold with something besides her looks? If so, you already know that women have zero skill at creating anything but the most pedestrian of conversations, and even less at sustaining them long enough to get a viable number.

But, while men are across-the-board better at it than women, not all of us are created equal. Just like some women are fatter and uglier than others, some men are better than others at talking to women. For every smooth cat with a phone full of fresh numbers, there are two guys throwing out corny pick-up lines, lavishing sub-standard women with thirsty compliments, and undercutting themselves with self-deprecation in hopes of landing a crumb of traction. For better or worse, it seems the thirstiest and most desperate game comes from men from lower social classes and minority backgrounds.

Baiting Poor Men of Color on Video

Last week, a video showing precisely that emerged. Turns out some internet heroes with an agenda hired an "actress"—who's a 6.5, at best, on the 1-to-10 scale—to walk through some New York streets on camera for a supposed 10-hour stretch. Judging by the woman's physique, this had to have been done over the course of several sessions. The intention was to show just how much men would "bother" her during the course of that stroll.

What most people see is a resting-bitch-faced woman stomping her way down some urban streets. Several men try to talk to her in the carefully edited two-minute clip. The men toss a bunch of weak lines in her direction—a standard cocktail of lame compliments and self-deprecating attempts at humor—and move on when none of it hooks.

One or two guys trail her for a few steps to deliver their lines before also giving up. You're meant to see that being a woman in today's world is to be subjected to non-stop harassment at the hands of would-be rapists. You could indict the guys for having abysmal game—and maybe bad taste—but not much else.

Sheltered and Fragile Women Fear Normal Social Interaction

Just like being dumb in school has turned into a "disorder" in less than a generation, bad game has suddenly turned into a crime. The word "harassment" used to actually mean something, but today's American woman is so sheltered and fragile that having to deal with men being interested in her or giving her sloppy (and often undeserved) compliments—if they're not handsome enough—is a cause for panic.

In fact, it's even more than that. It's an outright crime that requires a national campaign to encourage women (and white knights) to report catcallers online.

But the move to re-brand lame pickup lines into harassment isn't just simple hysteria. I'm not first to point out that it's outright racism and classism. To parade a provocatively dressed woman through the toughest (and most ethnic) neighborhoods of New York—for hours upon hours—until something happens, is to bait lower- and working-class men into behaviors that are not uncommon, if not straight-up expected, in their environment.

In hardscrabble neighborhoods, only the boldest, loudest, and toughest members of crowd survive. From making friends to picking up girls to not being bullied, things are done differently in the ghetto. If you're a man walking through these same neighborhoods, you're just as likely to be "harassed" by guys asking you dumb questions meant to trip you up, talking trash to you, or flat-out threatening you. I've had all three happen to me many times.

Viral Street Harassment Video Is Just Another "Hood Prank"

This video—and the movement around it—is nothing more than thinly veiled ridicule of the less fortunate. Cloaked as concern, it's little more than alarmism manufactured by privileged white women who think the world revolves around their feelings and adheres to their same sterilized, protected, suburban worldview.

It's no different than the string of now-popular "hood prank videos," where upper-middle-class white "pranksters" go into black neighborhoods and provoke men of color by stepping on their shoes, stealing from them, or generally annoying them. When the black men react violently, everyone can have a laugh at the animal in the cage.

The only difference here is that white girls are the pranksters.

Men Have Always Met Women By Talking to Them

Many years ago, my father met my mother by “street harassing” her. He stopped her on the street with a silly remark and, as she reflexively tried to walk away from him, he followed next to her and kept talking. Two weeks later, they went on their first date. Eighteen months later, they were married. There are millions of stories like this, but soon this time-honored way of meeting a complete stranger—if the damaged women at Hollaback! and its ilk have their way—will be illegal. Why?

Because today’s socially awkward and terrified woman can’t countenance a social interaction that hasn’t somehow been funneled and vetted through the precious iPhone glued to her hand.

Read More: Rape Jokes About Men Are Okay

Tuthmosis Sonofra
Tuthmosis is a Columnist-at-Large at Return of Kings. His work has been covered by major media outlets such as The Huffington Post, Cosmopolitan, Vice Magazine, The Daily Mail, and Yahoo Shine. He's also been profiled by BuzzFeed and The New Statesman. You can follow him on Twitter.

Why Men Should Call Out Cockblocks More Often

November 5, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

I recently went to a nightclub where I spent much of the evening interacting with women, having fun and hoping to find a hook-up. Nothing particularly unusual there, you might say. After all, not only am I a game writer, but men hitting on women is hardly anything new.

Not, apparently, as far as the female friends of a couple of the girls I approached were concerned, though. On more than one occasion I experienced unpleasant and rude cockblocking from mother-hens. This led me to contemplate anew something that has been on my mind for a while – that cockblocking is on the rise in Western society. The practice is a direct attempt by the female imperative to limit and control men's agency and expression of their natural masculine desire through shaming. It is the duty of men to speak out against this. That night I confronted a cockblock. Here's what happened.

I was at a Halloween party at a club where – well, let's just say it's the kind of place where people dress up, become uninhibited through various means, and where security turns a blind eye to any naughtiness that ensues. It's well-known as a highly sexual place, so it shouldn't come as a surprise to anyone there that guys are going to approach girls.

I walked up to a slinky young cutie wearing black angel wings chatting with a group of friends. I said hi. She turned to me and smiled. I reached out and briefly touched her on the arm. I did this because one of the tenets of game that has worked consistently well for me over the years is to physically interact with girls as early as possible. But here's the thing – no pick-up technique works 100% of the time. You'll always get that one girl with whom your killer line falls flat, who doesn't get your sense of humour or your cool dress sense. In this case, the girl shook her head lightly and moved her arm away.

No big deal. Note that she didn't tell me to fuck off, or indicate that my presence was unwelcome. She simply made it clear that she wasn't comfortable with me getting physical with her – yet. That was her prerogative, and absolutely fine by me. I would never do anything against a girl's will, or advocate doing so, but being cheeky, assumptive and persistent is all part of the game.

Had I continued talking to her, then perhaps she would have become comfortable enough with me to allow things to escalate – this has certainly been my experience many times in the past. Or maybe not. In that case I would have said goodnight and walked off. Either way: no big deal.

It's called socializing.

Unfortunately, things weren't allowed to continue on their natural course. I heard someone calling me, and looked up to see one of the girl's friends superciliously waving me away.

'"What's her problem? Is she in a bad mood?" I asked Angel Wings, who smiled and shrugged.

Annoyed at what I regarded at an unnecessary intervention, I approached the cockblock.

"What's up?" I said, smiling.

"She told you to go away. Go."

"She didn't, actually. You should be more polite to people."

"So should you."

"This is a nightclub. People socialize here – it's normal. You need to think about how you speak to people you don't know."

The girl, a shorthaired mediocrity of boyish figure and awkward height, looked surprised but defiant. In her estimation, right was on her side. After all, she was defending a defenseless girl from an unknown male interlocutor. Is there a less assailable position to be in? The whole of western culture had her back.

"You need to think about how you treat girls," she said.

"I was talking to her. There's nothing wrong with that. You need to be less rude."

She laughed nervously.

"And you need to stop going around groping girls."

Now I know I had her. She knew it too. To "grope" is defined by my dictionary as "to fondle someone for sexual pleasure." "Fondle" is defined as "to stroke or caress lovingly or erotically." I had touched the girl fleetingly on the forearm. The gesture was not sexual, nor could it have been construed as such by any sane onlooker.

"I didn't grope her. You need to stop lying, think about how you speak to people in public and be less rude," I said. Then I walked away.

OK, I lost my chance with Angel Wings, and my retorts were hardly earth-shattering, but I couldn't help feeling a sense of satisfaction. If a girl is being seriously harassed by a man, then I have no problem with her friends stepping in to help. But I was sober, and talking to Angel Wings in a normal, fun way. The cockblock simply stepped in too quickly, and was rude and obnoxious. When I politely pointed out to her that she had overstepped the mark, she lied in order to strengthen her position.

Often, when considering male-female interactions, it is useful to imagine what would have happened had the man in question been a celebrity. Would Ryan Gosling get cockblocked in a club? Unlikely. The best way to deal with cockblocking is to prevent it happening in the first place. As a general rule, the more high value you appear on your approach, the less likely you are to face it.

The situation with Angel Wings happened early in the night while I was warming up — most likely I wasn't in top form yet. When I'm having a great night, I hardly ever get blocked. That said, rejection is part of the game. Most non-psychopathic men know and accept this. If anything, men are too timid when they approach women, too apologetic. Bitchy girls "protecting" their friends are surplus to requirements: in the vast majority of cases the man will run away despondently at the first sign of disinterest from his target.

Of course, it depends on what your objectives are, and the particulars of a given situation, but I would encourage you to speak up when you are treated rudely by women in public. To be clear, I'm not advocating butthurt ranting. Be polite, but firm, and explain why she is in the wrong. Shame her for her social impropriety – rudeness and obnoxiousness – rather than allowing her to shame you for what she (wrongly) perceives as yours.

With society backing them up, and little fear of reprisals, some girls think they can get away with absurd degrees of unpleasantness in public. If they are not called out on this then the problem will only get worse. A word of warning, though – as the incident described here shows, the woman you stand up to may not be above falsifying her version of events if you upset her. If she does so, then rest assured that there will be plenty of white knights around to help her out, and some of them may be wearing security badges.

To find out how to avoid cockblocks and attract beautiful women click here.

Read More: The Most Important Quality All Successful Players Have

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

How To Question A Woman’s Past

November 5, 2014 | by A.V. Yader | Link | Original Link

After a round of sex between a nonjudgmental man and his wonderful fiancé, a conversation ensues between the two as they lay in bed—cuddling in their post-coital bliss. Let’s observe their little chat…

> Man: Wow sweetie, you’re so amazing and wild! So look, we’ve been together for almost two years now and have lived together for six months. Tell me, what’s the craziest thing you’ve ever done in bed?
>
> Fiancé: Oh, I don’t know, I’m pretty shy about that stuff, I don’t want you to judge me either. Besides, nothing could ever compare to you big daddy, hehe…
>
> Man: Aww shucks, don’t be that way sweetheart. We’re best friends! You know that you can tell me absolutely anything without fear of being judged.
>
> Fiancé: Really baby? Are you sure?
>
> Man: Absolutely, cupcake.
>
> Fiancé: Okay! Hehehe [grabs iPhone from the nightstand]… Well, there was this one time where I let six guys take turns cumming inside my butthole and then drove to my ex-boyfriend’s place and sucked a booger out of his nose. Take a look, we’re still friends on Facebook—here’s his picture:

> …God, he’s still so fucking hot… By the way, can I borrow 30 bucks?
>
> Boyfriend: Wow… ummm… you know what, sweetheart? I love you and the past is the past, and yes—he seems like a great guy. You two should hang out again sometime and catch up. I’m sure the other six gentlemen that ejaculated into your rectum were quite charming as well. All that matters is that you’re with me now—that’s the only thing I care about. You’re my world. I’ll tell you what, here’s

> 50 dollars, keep the rest and buy yourself something extra. Don't worry about paying me back either.
>
> Fiance: Oh my God babe, you're the best! I can't wait to marry you!
>
> Man: I can't wait either, sweetheart, I'm so glad you're going to be mother of my children!

The man in the above story is such a great guy, isn't he? I, for one, completely agree with him 100 percent. It wouldn't bother me one bit to take sloppy seconds from the bastard in that picture. After all, the past is the past, and it takes a "real man" to overlook a woman's dubious history, right?

Let's cut the shit, right here and right now. There are only two types of people that subscribe to this whole "The past is the past" line of bullshit thinking: people with fucked-up pasts, and people that date people with fucked-up pasts.

Feminism has successfully brainwashed men into thinking that a woman's history is somehow completely irrelevant. If you were to meet an attractive 23-year-old woman right now, it would be your obligation to ignore the first 23 years of her life as if they never happened. You're supposed to pretend like she didn't exist until the moment you met her, or to assume that she was a darling little angel throughout all of those previous years—what a crock of shit.

I'm one judgmental son of a bitch and I make no apologies for it. It's incredibly important to me to know what kind of woman I'm dealing with, and I want to know as quickly as possible. There are basically three tiers of acceptability women can fall under as far as I'm concerned.

Tier One: Relationship

These types fall under my personal standards for a relationship-material woman. They have no tattoos, no slutting around in their past, and have pleasant and nurturing personalities. They will also answer any questions about their past without reticence. A good girl knows that she's a good girl, and will speak freely of her experiences or lack thereof. Relationship material women tend to be on the demure, quiet, and shy side as well. It's important to note that I'm basing my "good girl" experiences on foreign women here.

Tier Two: Fuck Buddy

These women are sluts, but they're sluts that are enjoyable to be around. They have somewhat pleasant personalities and listening to them talk doesn't make me fantasize about my own death. Their sexual prowess tends to be very good and they pull their own financial weight when we go out together as well.

I make decent coin and can easily afford all of our outings, but watching a woman pay for shit when she makes significantly less money than me makes me happier than a freshly-sucked dick. And while these women usually have tattoos, they can easily be covered up with normal clothing. This is important to me because I don't like to feel embarrassed when I'm out in public.

Tier Three: Nail ‘N Bail

These sluts have the types of personalities and mannerisms that would make a trip to the cancer ward at a children’s hospital a pleasant experience in comparison… but if they have big titties that I wouldn’t mind playing with, I might tolerate their shit just long enough to get them into bed. After I nail this type once or twice, I will quickly remove them from my life. However, in the past couple of years, I’ve developed a low tolerance for these broads and have pretty much stopped messing with them altogether.

Now, in order to appropriately categorize a woman, she must be interrogated. American women have hit rock bottom and started digging, so for the most part, I don't even have to ask anymore. Give me 10 minutes of uninterrupted conversation with the average woman and I'll know what I'm dealing with pretty quickly from her mannerisms and the way she talks.

With roughly 80 percent of them, I can figure them out quite easily this way. This is the demographic of women that I draw my fuck buddies from. I know what they are and what they're all about, and therefore I don't have to question them about their pasts—the relationships will never get serious to the point that I care enough to find out. The problem lies with the remaining 20 percent, it's these women that think they're clever and slick that find themselves under the microscope.

Women are pretty good liars, but they're not that good. They have the allure of their pussies and that's it. If you're a sucker for pussy, then you'll be a sucker for their lies too. If you can maintain a level head and look at things objectively, then you'll realize their attempts at subterfuge are amateur at best.

This is best handled by dating two women—or more, if you can handle it—at the same time. It would be easy to tell your current boss to go fuck himself on a Friday when you could have a new gig starting on the following Monday. It's the same way with women. This is important because of the power it gives you. It makes walking away from a woman very easy when you're not concerned about replacing her. With this in mind, let's look at the first technique.

Directly Asking

This is the route I take nowadays simply because I don't fucking care anymore. If a woman passes the initial screening process and presents herself as decent, then I'll just ask her whatever I want to know. It's my privilege to know who and what I'm dealing with. If I'm paying for dates or she's coming into my home—then I want full disclosure. That's the bottom line.

If you were engaged to a woman and asked for a prenuptial agreement, then "yes" would be the only answer you would find acceptable. It's the same way when directly interrogating women about their pasts. If there's any hesitation, or any dancing around the questions, then you have your answer.

If you're going to take the direct path, then you need to be prepared for some return fire. The woman in question might be offended by your audacity. This is where the shaming language and emasculation attempts may come into play. Here are some common slut responses and how you should properly view their reactions.

"You're so insecure!"

Yep, I'm so insecure that I will discard you like rotten fish guts and then swiftly replace your ass like a burnt out lightbulb if you think you're too good to answer my fucking questions. Let's get something straight here: there is nothing "insecure" about seeking answers to any questions you may have—absolutely nothing. Insecure would be sitting back and wondering what type of woman you're involved with, but not asking uncomfortable questions because you're a chicken shit that is afraid of what you might hear.

Repeat after me: "Looking out for my best interests does not make me insecure. Not settling for anything less than what I want does not make me insecure. Demanding to know the truth about someone I've been intimate with—or plan on being intimate with—does not make me insecure."

If a police detective was conducting an interrogation, and the suspect said, "Oh my God, detective, you're so insecure for asking me what I was doing at 3:00 AM last Thursday," the detective would be like, "Lady, you're a fucking idiot." He's just doing his job, and that's exactly what you're doing—your fucking job. The most important job you've ever had at that: the job of looking out for yourself first and foremost. Having the balls to ask tough questions and not being afraid of getting your hands dirty is the complete opposite of insecure.

"Why do you want to know? Don't you trust me?"

Fuck no I don't trust you. Why would I trust someone that's choosing to blow smoke up my ass instead of answering some straightforward questions? And I want to know because there's a certain caliber of woman that I'm looking for when it comes to a relationship. I get to choose the type of woman I spend my time with—that's my choice and my choice alone. And if a woman has a problem with that? Well, tough shit, sweetheart—should've laid off the dick sauce and made some better decisions.

"All of the guys I dated before didn't ask about my past!"

Well, all of the other guys you dated were either cowards, weirdos, or fucking idiots. Let's examine these three types of men in detail.

1. Idiots

There are way too many men out there operating under the strong misapprehension that they are special. Their arrogance is cute—it would even be somewhat admirable if it wasn't so misguided. They think all of the bad shit in life doesn't apply to them. They think that no one can fuck better than them, provide better than them, or understand women better than them. They're under the impression that divorce or being screwed over is something that happens to other guys, and not to such rock stars like themselves—they're fucking fools.

I fully accept the fact that I'm a pissing, shitting human being. That's all I am—I'm not special. Being cheated on, lied to, misled, and flaked on? Those things all have and still do apply to me. And being armed with this knowledge that I'm not exempt from all of the bullshit the world has to offer makes me a very discerning and calculating individual.

2. Cowards

These types of men are too afraid to ask hard questions because they only have a woman come along once every so often. Since they don't want to fuck up their biennial vagina encounter, they keep their mouths shut so they don't rock the boat and lose out on the trickle of tattered and torn pussy the that so seldom comes their way.

These are the guys that say, "I don't care about her past." Of course they don't care about her past—they can't fucking care. They don't have the options at their disposal to care. Their only choice is the slut that's sitting next to them—that's all they've got. These men are like buzzards—they guard their rotten stinky-ass carcass of a woman like she's a piece of prime rib. They have to do this because it's the only God damn meal they're going to get. These men are exactly like what they desire but can only sparsely obtain—pussies.

3. Weirdos

These are guys that actually like the idea of their women getting nailed by other men. Have you ever stumbled upon one of those amateur porn videos where some housewife is taking a jackhammer-style beast fucking by a group of men in a poorly lit living room? Oh, you have? Well, who do you think is holding the camera and directing that shit-show? The motherfucking weirdo husband—that's who.

I'm not going to pretend like I know or understand the psychology of these men, but suffice it to say—I'm not into that shit, personally. I think any man that gets turned on by the thought of his woman taking dick from anyone other than himself—either in the past or present—has seriously tripped a brain wire somewhere along the line.

Here's the bottom line—all of the "other guys" in a woman's past weren't me. As a result, I don't give a fuck about them or what they thought of her. I care about me, what I want, and what I think. Just because some other joke of a man is cool with a past filled with drunken cock consumption and drug abuse doesn't mean I have to be. I'm smarter than those other guys, and any man reading this right now—that doesn't have his head up his ass—is smarter than them too.

"Just give me a chance! Let me prove to you that I'm not like that anymore, I was a different person back then!"

This is one of my favorites. Just how long is this "chance" supposed to last? How long will it take for you to "prove" to me that you're "not like that" anymore? All the way up to the point where the novelty of our relationship wears off and you reveal exactly what I knew you were all along? I'm not thinking about six months down the road. I'm thinking six years down the road, or sixteen years down the road. You know, when you could take my kids, retirement, and other investments through a divorce, perhaps? Out of all the replies you'll be faced with, this one will be one of the most difficult for you to walk away from.

When a woman says she's "not like that anymore," there's a good chance that she's being sincere. That's why you might be tempted to give her a chance—she's actually being honest when she says it. At that particular moment in time, she actually believes in her own bullshit, and that's exactly why knowing her past is so important. All of the lip service about how she was "immature" or a "different person back then" is fucking nonsense. Her past is exactly who she is, and she can easily revert right back into being herself once her goals have been accomplished—at your expense, mind you.

Women never really change who they are, they just change what they do, and they only change what they do just long enough to get whatever they're after. The only way people really change is through deep introspection, self discovery, and a very strong desire to overhaul themselves for the better. Have you met any women that possess those three qualities? Yeah, me neither.

I could write a book on all of the different shit women will say in response to questions about their pasts, but this will have to do in the interests of saving space. Now, directly asking a woman about her past means exactly that—you just ask. Here are some examples of how to take this approach.

Primer Questions

In part two of this article, I will talk about the easier approaches: Appearing Non-Judgmental and Clandestine Measures. For guys that may find what follows a bit out of their comfort zones, those techniques will be much more suited for them. Now, I generally like to preface my interrogation with a feeler question(s). This is to test the waters and see how she reacts—think of it as laying a foundation.

It's very important to pay close attention to her responses here, and remember to trust your instincts. Remember, anything other than transparency and candid responses to your questions means she's hiding something. This includes saying things like, "I don't feel comfortable answering that," or "Do we have to talk about that now," and so on.

These lines are to be said "matter of factly" and with confidence. Don't be timid with this shit. Say it like you're telling a waiter what you're ordering for dinner. Have an attitude that says, “I know what I want—you can either give it to me or fuck off.” When asking a woman about her past, you need to prepared for the fact that it could be your last interaction with one another—either by your choosing or hers. With that said, here are some ideas for you to use. I think it’s important to note that I’ve said variations of these lines in my own interactions…

“We’ve gone out a few times and it’s been great getting to know you, but if this is going to go anywhere—I’ll to need to know some things about you.”

“If this little relationship of ours is ever going to progress beyond where it is right now, then I’m going to need to know more about who you are.”

“I value my time and only want to spend it with the absolute best people possible. So far things are going fine, but I still don’t know you well enough to tell whether or not you’re the best. I need you to help me make that clear.”

“So, this good girl act of yours, is it legit or are you trying to charm me?”

If she seems pliable and willing to answer, then ask anything you want to know. How you ask is at your discretion—just be sure to pay attention to eye contact and body language. Another suggestion is to do this when you’ve had a couple of drinks at a bar or other public venue. She will be much more reluctant to cause a scene or act like an idiot when there are people around. It also gives you the chance to get up and leave if you hear something that disgusts you. As always, I recommend sticking her with the entire drink bill if that happens.

In Closing

In the aviation business—pilots specifically—it’s simply not enough to be a good aviator. If pilots hope to be hired by major airlines, major cargo carriers, or land a good corporate gig—then they can’t be fuck-ups in their personal lives. Pilots have a reputation for being drinkers, and this is a reputation prospective employers are well aware of.

As a result, if a pilot has a DUI in the past 10 years, then he’s pretty much screwed unless his daddy is a company executive or the director of flight operations. He also can’t have too many busted checkrides on his PRIA record (especially at the part 121 airline level); even too many speeding tickets can be a deal breaker.

Why do you think airlines, fractional operators, and cargo outfits are so hard on pilots for DUI’s? Easy answer—because drunk pilots are bad for business. Employers know this and act accordingly with their hiring practices. I’m sure many readers have noticed that it always makes the news whenever a flight crew member shows up to work intoxicated. Needless to say, it’s bad for public relations when that happens; not to mention highly illegal and dangerous. A DUI gives employers the impression that these pilots not only put their own lives at risk, but also the lives of others.

Pilots are aware that DUI’s can greatly impact their careers in a very negative way, so what does it say about them if they make the decision to drink and drive? Perhaps it shows that they don’t take their careers seriously, that they’re impetuous and lack foresight, or that they just flat-out have a drinking problem—none of which are good traits for an airman. An employer will ask themselves, “What kind of risks would these guys take with passengers on board?”

I’ve known some great guys that were excellent pilots throughout the years, but they have a DUI on their records. These guys didn’t just make a mistake—they made a decision, and a bad one at that. Their career progression has stalled due to their poor judgment. It’s a competitive market for good jobs in the industry, and there are plenty of pilots that don’t have any blemishes on their records. The ones that haven’t fucked up are the ones that get the good jobs, period.

I’ve also known some great women throughout the years, but their records revealed that they were poor decision-makers or sluts. So guess what? They don’t get the job of being with me. I only hire sluts for temporary positions such as blowjobs or doggy style. The more permanent and rewarding position—that of my commitment—is only open to the absolute best, period.

Airlines won’t hire pilots with checkered pasts, banks won’t give loans to people that are unemployed or have shitty credit, and DMV’s won’t issue driver’s licenses to people with vehicular manslaughter charges on their records. If all of these entities exercise strong judgment in their practices, then why would it be any different for a man and the women he dates?

The answer is simple: there is no fucking difference, and don’t let anyone—especially a woman—ever try to convince you otherwise. Stay tuned.

Read More: What To Do When She Claims To Have Been Raped In The Past

A.V. Yader

A.V. Yader flies jets for cash, writes at Return Of Kings for pleasure, and dates American women for pain. He's a stone-cold realist, but one who manages to keep a smile on his face despite the insanity that surrounds him. He's well traveled and aspires to start a family and live a quiet life abroad someday.

Another Whiny Feminist Reveals The Hypocrisy Of Feminism And Social Justice Warriors

November 5, 2014 | by Jon Socrates | Link | Original Link

Amanda Hess is the author of a prodigious number of feminist rants. Highlights include chastising Stephen Colbert for hiring writers based on his assessment of their talent, rather than affirmative action, and defending a woman who knowingly and repeatedly put the care of her son in the hands of the mentally unstable, murderously violent boyfriend who eventually killed the boy.

In her recent Slate.com article "Male Allies Are Important, Except When They're the Worst," Hess criticizes the way male feminists have tried to help women. She draws heavily from a PhD dissertation by Kris Macomber, as well as a variety of other articles, to create a semi-coherent rant in which Macomber's views and Hess's own are indistinguishable. Not quite a presentation of Macomber's work, not quite an original work of social or cultural commentary, Hess's article does a spectacular job of illustrating the hypocritical attitudes of modern feminists.

The Attitudes of Feminists

Feminists Don't Want Real Opportunity

In the beginning of her article Hess mentions the Grace Hopper Celebration, a conference for women in computing. According to Hess:

> The Grace Hopper Celebration brought top executives from Facebook, Google, and Microsoft to the stage for the 'Male Allies Plenary Panel,' where they were to talk about how high-powered male allies can advocate for women in tech. Too bad the GHC male allies panel spent less time discussing how men can advocate for women than it did instructing women to advocate for themselves by 'speaking up.'

Advocacy for someone in the context of a high-talent, high-stakes field requires nothing more than being open-minded to the person proving their own worth. Feminists like Hess don't want real opportunity, the chance to learn the rules of an industry or profession and then to work hard to succeed. Instead, feminists believe that workplace environments need to change to accommodate them.

Another victim of patriarchy

Feminists Believe Male Strength Is Bad

Hess presents another critique of men working to help women when she writes:

> Macomber notes that when male allies work to 'redefine' masculinity—as in the long-running Men Can Stop Rape campaign 'My Strength Is Not for Hurting,' which foregrounded the idea that men are real strong—they signal an attempt to participate in feminism without actually shedding their male privilege.

Hess and Macomber illustrate two things here. Firstly, feminists believe that male strength is "male privilege" because feminists' view of empowerment is parasitic, wherein people leech off of society and the government. According to feminists, men are only strong if society awards them "privilege" for having dicks. The truth, however, is that men can cultivate strength of body, of mind, and of spirit only through personal effort.

Secondly, Hess and Macomber illustrate that feminism is only nominally about "empowering" women. In reality, feminism is primarily about eroding the strength of men. Accordingly, men could only ever fully participate in feminism (which supposedly is about gender equality) if and when they are weak.

Feminists Think All Men Are Guilty

Hess shares another gem from Macomber's dissertation, in which she writes:

> Male allies often position themselves in opposition to typically sexist dudes in order to find a community inside feminism, but identifying as one of the 'good guys' can feel like a denial of their own role in the problems.

This statement illustrates one of the most insidious elements of liberal and progressive thought—the notion of collective responsibility. Because of this, feminists view each man as "part of the problem" because of the advantages of a few, regardless of his own actions or character. Here's a joke: What does a feminist call a man who gets falsely accused of rape, another man who works 60 hours a week to support his family, and a third man who gets blown up in Iraq? Privileged!

Women Don't Know What They Want

If only men… uhhh… just started to… you know….

After criticizing the various ways in which men have tried to help feminists, Hess finally asks "So how is a man supposed to act?" For this she offers up Macomber's view that "the feminist approach to allies could benefit from more 'action-oriented language' and 'very explicit guidelines.'"

Of course, Hess never gives any examples of "action-oriented language" or "very explicit guidelines." The problem is that feminists (and other SJWs) tend to operate on their feelings. Hess cannot articulate what she wants male feminists to do, because she is not fundamentally concerned with what they do or accomplish. She is concerned with how they make her feel.

Feminism Is Not About Gender Equality

If feminism was really about gender equality, then the input of men would be valued, even if they approached the issue differently. Of course, the input of men is valued (marginally) only when they parrot the views of women in general women feminists. As Macomber points out, in feminism, "men are instructed to listen to women and follow their leadership."

Later, Hess asks some questions about the future of feminism and makes clear who she thinks should decide it. She writes:

> Is feminism most effective as a radical fringe movement or a broad coalition? Should it stay grass-roots or go corporate? Is 'feminist' a label that every person > defines for themselves, or does it reference specific political beliefs and commitments? Should feminism focus squarely on women, or on gender itself? If you're a man, don't answer those questions.

Lastly, if anyone doubts whether feminism is about gender equality, just re-read Hess's article and note how she refers to men trying to help women as "allies." For Hess and others like her, men cannot be real feminists because, at its core, modern feminism is not about equality, but about advancing the interests of women only.

Final Thoughts

The general hypocrisy of feminism is nothing new to the seasoned readers of ROK. However, it's important to emphasize that Hess and Macomber's attitudes are not just about men in general, but about the very men who are trying to help them.

These are the betas, the white knights, the blue-pill men. These are the guys who need to wake up and see how feminists are using them. Being "a feminist" won't earn them a woman's love or respect, because feminists don't care about them independently of their usefulness to the cause. Of course, feminists feel entitled to men's help, even though, as Hess shows, they will always consider men to be "part of the problem." This is because entitlement and ingratitude go hand-in-hand.

My advice to any blue-pill man, beta, or white knight is to do a little experiment to see how entitled to your help a feminist feels. This will give you some idea of how ungrateful that feminist would be if you actually did help. The next time a feminist asks you to help with something like promoting breast cancer awareness, just tell her that breast cancer is women's problem, and you're not going to help.

Indignant, she'll start shaming and will demand an explanation. Here's what you say:

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: 'Kirill Was Here' Exposes The Hypocrisy Of Feminism

Jon Socrates

Jon finds purpose in the cultivation of wisdom, strength, and manly virtue.

How Liberals Neglect Contexts When Crying "Discrimination"

November 6, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

"The sour faces of the multitude, like their sweet faces, have no deep cause, but are put on and off as the wind blows and a newspaper directs."

—Emerson

It seems that every few weeks or so I read an article in a liberal publication decrying police discrimination against African-Americans. Of course, it is well-known that they are stopped by the police and arrested far more than whites. And for many liberals, with their superficial point of view, this is obvious discrimination, cause for vociferous outrage and indignation.

But the actual context is not this stunningly simple—not that it should be difficult to understand. Simply put, African-Americans commit a disproportionate amount of crimes, and we must expect police stops and arrests to reflect this; the converse is what would really be puzzling.

Now it should go without saying that to point out this fact of African-American crime is not adverse to the reality that many of the crimes committed by African-Americans are linked to poverty. Nor is talk about the legacy of slavery necessary here. And there can be no doubt that there are instances in which police, like the criminal justice system, discriminate against African-Americans and other minorities. After all, if we look closely, we find that corruption is virtually everywhere in human affairs. But to say all this is not to negate the fact that crime remains just that—illegal—and that the police must enforce the law.

Yet the problem is that in contexts like this, many liberals decry difference per se as discriminatory. In other words, because more minorities than whites are pulled over, arrested, and so on, it must follow that here the general context is discriminatory (as opposed to particular instances)—but that is far from clear.

Similarly, many people look at the number of women and people of color in a particular field and think that if there aren't just as many women as men, and just as many minorities as whites, then there necessarily is discrimination. But again, the situation is not so simple. Since talent, ability, and achievement are not determined by race or gender, it is incorrect to assume that something is necessarily wrong if a subject or field—say, engineering or philosophy—is dominated by men, that such dominance in itself demonstrates discrimination.

The problem here—the source of the confusion—seems to be that since we are all supposed to be equal citizens in the legal sense, many people therefore think that a field is discriminatory if it doesn't have an equal number of men and women and whites and minorities. Yet this belief wrongly presupposes that talent, ability and achievement are determined by the "fair representation" of gender and race.

Such representation is really a value judgment after the fact. In other words, people look at the representation of women and minorities in a particular field, regardless of merit and how people got there, and then judge "discrimination" to be at work whenever—surprise, surprise—this or that field doesn't consist of an equal number of men and women or whites and minorities: an assumption which bizarrely implies that talent and competence are uniform across all people and both genders.

But just as not everyone is the same race or gender, so not everyone is equally talented and competent, and we can only expect differences of representation to reflect this natural difference of talent and competence. It is mistaken, then, to think that something is obviously wrong with the Harvard philosophy department, for example, just because it largely consists of white men. Nor do we find anybody complaining that Women's Studies lacks a fair number (whatever that is) of men, a complaint that would be like saying that the fact that most nurses are women, or construction workers men, is inherently sexist.

The Causes

"He smiles with condescension; he talks of benevolence and virtue, and those who act with benevolence and virtue they murder time on time."

—Blake

It is obvious that in matters of intellectual merit and of competence in general, race and gender are strictly irrelevant. If you can't do a theorem, argue a position, compose a sonnet, or diagnose a patient, then talk about your skin color or gender will not do. So why do we hear so much outrage concerning "equality" from liberals and social justice warriors?

There are several reasons. Perhaps the main one has already been described: people simplify the contexts of things, then project their political agenda. Certainly some of these efforts are well-meaning: people are passionate about their cause, and think they perceive social evils that need to be remedied.

Then there are the frauds. I went to graduate school in English, so I have experienced many of these people firsthand. These are the identity-politics-rabble who affect a stance of moral indignation, while in reality they don't give a damn about the lives of women and minorities. All show, these committed pretenders try to advance professionally by being on the side of the good guys. They also like to think of themselves as some sort of rebel, though of course also so very knowledgeable and informed, so very deep and weighty.

Finally, there are those who are driven by a most primordial motive. These are the ones who wax indignant about injustice, while their actual motive is to vent some utterly unrelated discontent; for life is hard, and it can be more bearable when a person has something to gripe about. The simplistic liberal or social justice warrior complains about discrimination where a different type of person might simply have a stiff drink. The primordial desire to vent one's stored up spleen, one's suppressed human venom—though generally unconscious, this is a powerful force, and history is rife with bloody testaments to it, though they have frequently been sacrificed in the name of "justice."

An Intellectual Obstacle

"The bulk of mankind is as equipped for flying as it is for thinking."

—Swift

The average IQ—a limited thing—is a huge problem in the sociopolitical domain. For even if there weren't so many zealous and essentially careerist pretenders—whether these are politicians, journalists, academics or whatever—it would remain true that most people are ill-equipped for making sense of the complex contexts of things. History is written in blood not just because human beings are brutally self-interested, but also because we are very poor at understanding one another, making conflict frequent and inevitable.

Here consider what is the ordinary person's procedure when it comes to getting at the truth about something. He is not like a philosopher, or a lawyer, or a scientist. He is not objective and analytical. Rather, he simply looks around for whatever may serve to justify the opinion he already had about something. In large societies like our own we this phenomenon en masse. Thus politics is essentially incoherent, though of course most people, with their usual ignorance, do not see this.

Again, the moral corruption of human nature—the cause of much bias, distortion, rationalization, and more—is not the only reason for the endless misinterpretations and distortions of contexts. The average IQ has very little aptitude for nuance and subtlety. It naturally takes a superficial view of things, and then a person's emotions—a powerful engine of self-interest—take over, driving him or her to "argue" about what is going on, what is wrong, what needs to change, etc.

And so it should not be surprising, for example, that if you say anything at all critical of women, of minorities, or whoever, many people will respond with the charge of "sexism," or of "racism," or whatever. For they cannot do otherwise. Few human beings have any serious interest in knowing the truth, and fewer still have the discernment and disinterestedness it takes to know it. The average IQ is little more than a vehicle for satisfying material needs, which are bound up with emotions.

That is why most lives are spent between work and pleasure, why the conversation and writing of most people is so far from articulate, and interests in things like art and science are forever minority affairs. It is also why arguing with the average person about how we should live is often nothing but a kind of emotionally-charged incoherence.

"The banality of evil" is Hannah Arendt's infamous (and widely misunderstood) description of what made the Holocaust possible. She meant the tendency of ordinary people to conform and take orders unthinkingly; to basically just go along with the historical tide. This is what most liberals and social justice warriors do, just like most people in general, and whether they are sincere and well-meaning or just deeply self-interested pretenders, we should not allow ourselves to be overly vexed by them: their ignorance is beyond our control.

Rather, have a laugh, remembering Plato's great line that the gods made man in order to laugh at him.

Read More: "Liberals" Are Not The Enemy

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

Xenophon’s “The Economist” Holds Valuable Lessons On A Woman’s Education

November 6, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

I’ve read an interesting section of The Economist (sometimes translated Economics or Oeconomicus), one of the more controversial classical books. Xenophon (d. 354 BC at Corinth) wrote this treatise concerning how to manage one’s estate. It is one of the more practical-minded ancient philosophy works. In the famous section, a man named Ischomacus gives instruction to his new teenage wife about what her role is. Today, there is either bad information on sex roles (most of society) or good guesses (the Manosphere).

Let’s see what the wisdom of the ancients have to tell us. Granted, being archaic does not necessarily yield truth, but it’s worth considering nonetheless. Another reason I chose this book is because it’s about a man teaching a woman how to be a woman. Society has the opposite dogma about a woman needing to tame a man. From a casual glance at people, I find Xenophon’s view much more plausible.

In some ways, I’m more woman than most women. Many girls brag about their lack of cooking skills, but I can actually make mashed potatoes and gravy from scratch. A girl will lean on a microwave like a cripple on a crutch, but I don’t even own one myself. A modern woman will flee from a sewing needle as a symbol of oppression, but I can actually make basic repairs in my clothing. Knowing basic home maintenance is a part of being an adult, especially if you’re single. Ideally I’d like to have a wife to do that for me someday.

Unsurprisingly, The Economist is not available in mass-market paperback, unlike more dubious ancient works like the Satyricon. You can download a pdf or an ebook for free on Kindle. It's also worth noting that in ancient literature, a chapter is called a book. This is because they were written on scrolls, and it's not until the late Roman Empire that the bound book appeared, called a codex.

At first I thought about reading the whole thing, but book one begins with Socrates dicking around with word games as usual. I figured that was just a Plato thing, but apparently the historical Socrates really was that much of an asshole. The famous part is books seven through ten, so I decided to skip ahead. If you're on Kindle, it's location 488, and if you're on that pdf, it's page 97. I wanted to write a single article on it, but there's too much in there to fit. So I'll outline book seven this week and finish with books eight through ten next week.

Taming the Unshrewd

Socrates tells a story about running into his friend Ischomachus. He asks Ischomachus why he is able to afford time to leisurely sit outside. Ischomachus proudly tells him that it's because of how productive his wife is. She's never named, so I'll call her Mildred. It's interesting because he uses the phrase "without my aid." Apparently there is some virtue to a woman's self-sufficiency (sic independence), at least within the context of the home. Then Ischomachus begins to tell the story of how he trained her.

Book seven recounts the first conversation Ischomachus can remember having with Mildred. She keeps badgering him about how useless she is. Frankly it's refreshing to encounter a woman who can admit her own ignorance. It's like she's committed to her husband or something. Mildred realizes that she has adult responsibilities beyond following her dreams even though she's only fourteen. Ischomachus tells her about their shared property and future children, as though they were united as one instead of two who co-habitate. He says,

> We need not stop to calculate in figures which of us contributed most, but rather let us lay to heart this fact that whichever of us proves the better partner, he or she at once contributes what is most worth having.

This seems counter to the feminist claim that women were merely viewed as cattle. In fairness, it's also in contrast to the aristocrats in Plato's Symposium. I suppose there's a different way you talk to your wife than to your drinking buddies.

Then Mildred says, "My business, my mother told me, was to be sober-minded!" This by far the greatest piece of wisdom I've ever heard given to a woman, and it was given by another woman too! A woman's business is to be sober-minded. I've just regained my faith in humanity. God hasn't abandoned us after all! Someone find me a wife like that.

The Purpose of Women

Then Ischomachus prattles on about the nature of sex roles and domesticity. He even uses the word "duties" while making a long speech that men and women are designed to fit together. Although he doesn't mention homoerotic relationships, it really flies in the face of the "find someone you love" ethic of today, which in itself is a product of the "be your own independent self" ethic that has spiked the divorce rate. It also enlightens on the "Men are keys and women are locks" analogy. But I digress.

> And for the very reason that their natures are not alike adapted to like ends, they stand in greater need of one another; and the married couple is made more useful to itself, the one fulfilling what the other lacks.

Many red pill men ask why a man would ever want to get married. Xenophon seems to have anticipated that argument. What good is a key without a lock? Yes, you can live a happy life without a woman, but there seems to be something missing. Manosphere writers talk about how today's career woman will become a lonely old spinster, but, and I know this is controversial, will today's Red Pill man become a lonely old bachelor who stares at the check-out girl in a grocery store?

But in fairness, I get the impression that many men on these sites secretly wish for a marriageable woman but just can't place that much faith in the modern woman. Perhaps the state of American women is so dismal that cheap hook-ups are the best a man can hope for. God help us all.

Feminine Virtue

The modern woman is anything but nurturing, and the red pill man tends to claim that this is by nature. But when Ischomachus tells Mildred that she will be caring for sick household members, he assumes that she will find this loathsome. Instead she says, "That will be my pleasantest of tasks, if careful nursing may touch the springs of gratitude and leave them friendlier than before." It's also worth noting that Ischomachus assumes that Mildred will enjoy the other tasks in the house. My guess is because it offers a measure of autonomy, responsibility, and hence self-esteem.

After hearing her eagerness to care for the sick, Ischomachus "was struck with admiration at her answer," which is Victorian English for "He got a raging boner at her exuding femininity." He goes on about how it will eventually be her job to teach other women domestic skills, which I guess is the ancient equivalent of finishing school. He says a woman who is "skillful, loyal, [and] serviceable" in "housekeeping or…service" is "worth her weight in gold."

I looked it up, and unfortunately the weight in gold part is not an ancient idiom, but the point stands that a woman is valuable who can teach other women how to be feminine. So basically almost all modern women are worthless. Don't you feel dirty just reading that? Odd how for a woman to pursue her dreams, a man has to give up his.

Ischomachus gives another interesting line, "But the greatest joy of all will be to prove yourself my better; to make me your faithful follower," of course in reference to household management. He continues to speak how such respect and glory will follow her into old age. There's something for you feminists who realize that there is some innate difference between men and women.

Do you want to make men look up to you as a great example of morality and prudence? Then be an awesome housewife. Nothing is more of a turnoff than a cut-throat business woman. They don't make wives anymore; instead, there are she-dudes who co-habitate with males whom they may or may not breed with. Send me an email if you can get a hold of cyanide.

That's the basic outline of book seven. Join me next Thursday for books eight through ten.

Source: The Economist by Xenophon. Translated by H. G. Dakyns. Published by Amazon Kindle.

Update: Part Two is now available.

Read More: The 20 Articles Of Traditional Sex Roles Week

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Anti-#GamerGate SJWs Claim Victimhood While Doxxing Their Enemies

November 6, 2014 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

Mike Cernovich is one of the latest victims in the full-blown war on gaming, male spaces, and masculinity known as GamerGate. You've may have heard of him through Danger & Play, but everything you have to know about Mike is that he is a successful lawyer, white, and hetero. As such, he epitomizes the dreaded boogeyman of modern SJW's around the world: patriarchy.

The History of Oppression

Before we get into what Mike said that riled up SJW's so badly, let's talk about patriarchy and why it's such a seemingly big threat to SJW's. Patriarchy literally means "the rule of fathers." What's wrong with being ruled by a "father"? Well, there is nothing inherently wrong with it. In fact, someone has to rule, so it made sense that those would be the most powerful and capable persons, usually men. Under the patriarchy almost all men in the society also had no power whatsoever and were likewise obeying the father figure, just like women.

However, SJW theory disregards all of that and claims all men rule all women, regardless of any other factor. In short, patriarchy makes women feel oppressed. This is an important point and the crux of feminism, because it shows how with radical feminists, everything is based on feelings, which cannot be measured or sometimes even correctly identified. Thus, feelings trump reality. Anyone who tries to bring facts, logic or any emotion that differs from the current mindset is threatening the narrative and has to be silenced.

“Repent, Oppressor!” Said the Rad-Fem Woman

The sole weapon of social justice warriors is to shame-and-blame anyone who dares to speak up. The reason they are doing it so fervently is that people who speak up create a dangerous example for others to follow. If left unsilenced, one voice can quickly turn into a massive protest. If shame-and-blame doesn’t work, it’s time for some doxxing (the practice of releasing an enemy’s personal information on the internet).

That’s not surprising, since SJWs fear direct confrontation with reality the most and would rather file false police reports and tarnish someone’s reputation instead of coming up with logical rebuttal and sound arguments. If you cross the line and criticize their ethos publicly, don’t expect any mercy, for yourself or for your loved ones.

All of this started when Mike challenged Sam Biddle, a Gawker writer who famously proclaimed that we should create a “national SMASH A NERD day,” to a boxing match. Ironically, Sam Biddle fits the definition of a nerd quite handily, which probably reveals his masochistic tendencies.

After that, Mike Cernovich went to Youtube and recreated the same challenge, this time in video form. In short, Cernovich challenged Biddle to 3 rounds of boxing with the full set of protective gear: mouthpiece, headgear, and 16-ounce gloves. Each round would last 3 minutes, with $10,000 being donated to anti-bully charity if Biddle accepts. The event would be streamed live and all proceeds from viewers would also go to charity.

The above boxing challenge video gathered around 100,000 views on Youtube, which is around 30 times more than any other video on his channel.

Mike definitely got more attention than he expected, but therein lies a very important lesson. Namely, each and every one of us has a powerful voice and we can all use it to become warriors against feminism and social justice warriors. We can question the official narrative and hopefully remedy the toxic situation in our society, without exposing ourselves to harm that comes with the default label of “misogynist.”

Whack-A-Critic

Feminists and social justice warriors avoid criticism because their world view isn’t based on any facts—it is instead based on emotions and the subjective feeling of being “oppressed.” There will be no citation for this claim, however, you can check it very easily if you find a SJW and ask: “Who is more oppressed – a black woman or a white woman?” After that, simply sit back and enjoy watching the wheels spin. As an added bonus, try to count inconsistencies and logical fallacies in the response.

Shame-and-blame only works if those who speak up are foolish enough to believe their differing opinion will be tolerated by the SJW collective. Though they are full of proclaimed “equality and social justice,” this is never going to happen, especially if you’re a white straight man. If you’re out there and think you can go public on Twitter or any other social network and criticize women at all, be warned. Even if your criticism is well-grounded, whatever you say will likely be labeled as “misogyny.” You are expected to shut up, man up, and check your privilege.

Note how the feminists and social justice warriors have no way to silence anonymous people other than to say “check your privilege,” which is a fancy way of saying “shut up.” However, the shame-and-blame tactic will not work against the passionate GamerGaters, because they are willing to hide their tracks and use the full extent of anonymity provided to them by the almighty Internet. That does award them the label of being “trolls,” but trolling is still considered largely childish and harmless and there is no legislation against it, unless you’re in the UK.

The censorship of GamerGate extends to popular platforms as well. The discussion of a Zoe Quinn related thread on Reddit’s r/gaming was subjected to absurd amounts of moderation, which resulted in some 27,000 deleted comments. TotalBiscuit, whose essay the thread linked to, proclaimed it “the biggest comment graveyard I’ve seen in my life”. 4chan moderators also began censoring and introducing political correctness in GamerGate topics.

In both cases, the cause were connections between social justice warriors and moderators on 4chan and Reddit. Therefore, don’t expect to find an outlet on a popular platform, since they all conform to the SJW narrative. Instead, use guerrilla tactics, and arm yourself with facts and logic.

Read More: Is The Feminist Movement Experiencing A Meltdown?

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

The Benefits Of Machine Gun Versus Sniper Rifle Game

November 6, 2014 | by Jesus Baetana | Link | Original Link

Today we discuss the advantages and disadvantages of what you may have seen referred to as the “machine gun” approach; aiming at multiple female targets with indiscretion and scoring with whatever you hit. This is opposed to the more concentrated “sniper rifle” approach, where you concentrate your efforts on a few select targets.

Now, perhaps a first reaction would be to look at the above and immediately think “I want as much pussy as possible, so I will adopt the machine gun approach.” I can understand this—if you’re reading this and other manosphere sites, one of your primary motivators is likely wanting to sample as much as you can.

Machine Gunning

Firstly, remember the machine gun approach should not be confused with the abundance mentality. As an overarching principle, you should be intolerant of time wasters; there's simply too many women out there. Initially, you should be breaking ice with everyone you have interest in. The advantages of the machine gun principle is you are diversifying your risk of failure, and so increasing your chances of conversion, through numbers alone. If this works while you're on-form, you're potentially going to experience jackpot weeks, such as when I slept with seven different women in six days.

Now, downsides. Irrespective of what others may say, you're going to have to put time into this approach. Unless you're a hypnotist, the truth is getting a woman to sleep with you who you also want to sleep with is going to require some time investment. You're going to have to organize yourself and have good consistent excuses when they start bleating on about wanting to spend more time with you.

The stronger the competition in your chosen arena (online or not, demographic of region of operation and so on), the tighter your game is going to have to be. In reality, this means organization of time, understanding of progress with each woman and not becoming blasé about it, regardless of levels of success. It is a time and effort-intensive approach. If you're trying to do more with your life aside from the minimum needed to sustain your existence (go to work and little more), the opportunity cost will be substantial.

Putting In The Hours

I mentioned becoming blasé. A level of success with this approach can affect your enthusiasm for sex. "Yeah whatever," I hear you say. Trust me; I have testosterone and health levels significantly in excess of the average thirty-four year old and still, this shit can get old quick. Sustainability to keep onboard quality women is of note; regardless of what others in the manosphere might say you can't simply ignore women who message you.

Maintaining a quality harem of hot women who know how to fuck, alongside the machine gun approach, is fucking hard work even for a man in his prime, particularly when other shit is starting to go down. You're inevitably going to have to make cuts at some point or another, as days come by where you think "fuck this." Even if you don't get to this point, your game can become diluted; where you're expending so much energy among many, the end results may not be good. We only have limited personal resources.

Anyone who reads my blog will know I'm not entirely honest with women; I treat people how they treat me and women utilize omission of information more than anything else. Hence, I do exactly the same and that's how I get the women I want; because the majority of quality women need at least a hope, the possibility of a fairy tale ending might be there in order for them to go further and stick around if you want some regular action.

Sniper Game

The sniper game also has it's advantages and disadvantages. On one hand, you can again begin with some scattergun ice breaking; taking aim at anyone who takes your fancy. But the difference here is, you isolate quickly the ones you believe are going to yield results, discard the time wasters, and concentrate on building a high-quality harem of two to three women, which will be easier to maintain over an approximate three to nine month period (as desired of course). This way, you'll have more understanding on their part, more flexibility and less demands on their part. Frankly, this approach is going to yield you better quality and more regular sex, as the women are likely to engage emotionally with you, and so yield to your desires.

The most prominent downside to this approach is the misfire. Even the most experienced of us have been drawn into a girl and started going through the sequence, only to get blown out at some point. I've done it. Lots of the biggest self-deemed "players" do, you just don't hear much about it. The only thing you can do is learn from it and refine your approach in the future.

Other disadvantages come mainly from when the harem is established. While you'll likely change the composition of it in the time frame above, someone along the line is going to get inside your head at some point or another, and you may feel some attachment growing. That's when you're going to have to take control again, of yourself and the situation. Even the most hardened male is going to experience that sooner or later, and frankly if it escalates the best thing is to make a quick kill and deal with the situation immediately. It's either that or you're going to end up in a de-facto relationship.

More likely, she'll get emotionally involved with you. While there is a need to maintain an ember of hope for a woman there could be something more (particularly with women over thirty), overall this needs to be tightly controlled. The best way I've found to deal with this personally is regardless of what you want, to set out strong boundaries and expectations as a man in the early stages. However even with this, in my experience this is basically inevitable. The vast majority of women are going to want to feel things are "progressing" in their minds, as the biological clock begins to tick down.

The ages between thirty and forty are going to determine the average amount of time before these demands become apparent, as they approach the point of barren spinsterhood. You may have experienced this yourself with women practically demanding a relationship on the first or second meeting. Don't even waste your time with these dickheads – anyone with an ounce of sense would understand relationships develop naturally when they are of beneficial worth to both parties.

Conclusion

Personally, I've recently noted spreading myself too thinly and expecting too quick results (from having a string of previous successes with the same approach) has resulted in a much lower conversion rate than I'm happy with. The net result of all the above is a lower tolerance for time wasters and so more deletion, as well as a desire to spend time on higher quality women. These women certainly require more investment.

As for yourself, I would suggest you evaluate what you really want to achieve in life. While a lot of people do certain things which seem to be driven by the desire for pussy, you should really concentrate on what you feel you need. While we always hear a load of information about building a career, family, and so on, this is essentially control propaganda. However, there is some truth in that you do need a good form of income to do things you find satisfying, to do things that will improve your life and also to experience the relations you need at this point of your life.

Much in the same way I've never owned a car and only rented, fucking a whole bunch of different women opened my eyes and aided my transition from Jaded to Unjaded, as I realized how many different types of personalities, bodies, and experiences there were out there to be had. With that knowledge, should I ever decide to choose one for the long term, I will have an exact idea about what I want. Life is there to be experienced. If you're not sure what you want, I would generally advise you to have a little taste of everything until you do.

Read Next: Don’t Ever Take Advice From A Dating Website

Jesus Baetana
Jesus Baetana is a man of Anglo-Italian descent, often found stood slack jawed in astonishment at the current state of gender politics today. He now resides in a small central European state, attempting to single-handedly wrest control of both it's wealth and women. Read more about his adventures at The Words Of A Man

#TakeDownJulienBlanc Shows Feminists Need The Patriarchy To Protect Them (Update)

November 7, 2014 | by Eric Crowley | Link | Original Link

Feminists are trying to take down Real Social Dynamics pick-up coach Julian Blanc for a video he posted, in which Julien pulls Asian women toward his crotch while repeatedly shouting "pickachu." They've already gotten RSD banned from several major hotels, and shut down an RSD event, attacking and hitting RSD instructor Max. Those behind #TakeDownJulienBlanc say that what Julien does in the video is sexual harassment, and ask why other men don't police men like Julien Blanc?

Well feminists, I've been waiting for this a long time, and it's finally come. I've been waiting for the day you'd ask us to bring back patriarchy.

Now, I know some of you will hate me for suggesting that wanting men to create standards of conduct for other men is patriarchy, but if you pay attention, I'll give you everything you need to actually #TakeDownJulienBlanc, straight from an insider in one of the most anti-feminist, pro-game websites on the internet.

The Controversy Behind #TakeDownJulienBlanc

The controversy behind #TakeDownJulienBlanc was started when Julien posted a free tour video of a public speaking event he did in Japan, in which Julien said:

> When you go to Tokyo…if you're a white male, you can do what you want. Just grab her, pull her in. She'll giggle. Just say PIKACHU or POKEMON or something to take the pressure off. I'm romping through the streets (of Tokyo) just grabbing girls and it's like (motions) head on dick (pfft) head on dick, yelling 'PIKACHU' with a Pikachu shirt on…Every foreigner who is white does this. When you see > that one foreigner in the crowd in Tokyo and your eyes will lock and you know that he knows and he knows that and it's this guilty look like you both fucked a hooker or something.

The video was seen on Tumblr by Washington D.C.-based Chinese feminist Jennifer Li, who started the hashtag #TakeDownJulienBlanc in response to what she heard. In this video, she explains her reasons for starting the hashtag:

Jennifer embodies many feminist stereotypes. She was on tumblr at 2am on a Saturday night instead of having a social life. Her cat wanders into the frame two minutes into the video. She is slightly overweight, and lives in Washington D.C. But one comment she makes stands out:

> The responsibility shouldn't be on the women. it should be on these nasty ass men.

Jennifer doesn't want to fight her her own battles. She wants a men to protect her. And she isn't alone. Many of the #TakeDownJulienBlanc tweets echo the same sentiment. Why aren't men stopping men like this?

Feminists Need Patriarchy To Save Them From Julien Blanc

It used to be if a man was abusing or harassing women, the older men of that community would get together and teach the young man a lesson. Fathers in particular would teach their sons to be respectful of women. This system of men maintaining order was known as patriarchy. The word patriarch literally means rule by fathers.

Now, in the absence of patriarchy and male organizations, women only have ineffective government organizations, Twitter, and change.org petitions to turn to. What little success the feminists behind #TakeDownJulienBlanc have had is in turning to men—working class men like hotel managers, event organizers, and government officials—to help them shut down events.

In her video, Jennifer says "if he [Julien] were to yell Pikachu at me, I would fucking whip out a taser and go Pikachu on his motherfucking dick." Would you really, Jennifer? Do you carry a taser? Are you so frightened of men that you carry a weapon at all times? Or is this just a violent power fantasy you indulge in, in the absence of any real power? You live in Washington D.C. If you don't feel safe walking the streets in the city with the most government of any place in the world, who can you turn to for protection?

The hashtag #TakeDownJulienBlanc is a cry for help, a damsel in distress trope. I say this not to be mean, because I truly want each and every woman tweeting that to feel safe and secure, but because I believe what will make those women most secure is being surrounded by strong men, who've been raised by their fathers to behave honorably and justly. Patriarchy is what make women feel safe, which is why survey after survey says that conservative married women are the most happy and sexually satisfied demographic in America.

But don't think I'm letting Julien off the hook. We'll get to his behavior next.

How did Julien Blanc become Julien Blanc?

Julien's behavior didn't evolve in a vacuum. It was rewarded over years of practice and experimentation. In one video, Julien says that as a young man he couldn't even start a conversation with girls. During his first approach, he ran away after a few seconds of conversation. He was not born as the man feminists are protesting today.

Much of Julien's mindset can be attributed to being raised without a patriarch. In her video, #TakeDownJulienBlanc creator Jennifer Li says:

> What is messed up about this guys behavior is that one – he knows that what he is doing is wrong because he says in his video, "I didn't know how much I could get away with," and you don't say I'm going to get away with something , if you don't think that what you're doing is wrong.

"I didn't know how much I could get away with," is the voice of a child who was never taught boundaries. It is the voice of a child who never had a father to teach him right from wrong, or to give him meaningful challenges by which to discover the limits and abilities of his own powers.

Other RSD coaches have said that for Julien, the drama is the sex. Julien will actually continue to fuck with a girl he knows will go home with him because he enjoys creating an emotional roller coaster that more than getting laid. If that doesn't sound like behavior learned from women, I don't know what is.

Years before #TakeDownJulienBlanc, Julien made videos where he said his favorite way to open girls was to point and call them a dog. While this opener would offend women, it got their attention. Julien's game is to troll women and then win them over by reframing his actions. If you're offended by what he does, congrats, his game worked.

When Jezebel did a hit piece fellow RSD coach Jeffy Allen, Julien was jealous because he wanted to be the subject of that much drama. He emailed offensive messages to Jezebel editors hoping they'd cover him. I have no doubt that Julien is relishing much of the controversy that surrounds him now. No one would give him attention when he was a fatherless young man who wanted girls to talk to him, and now he's got his own hashtag.

Feminists Responses Show They Don’t Understand The Problem

Real Social Dynamics is the largest pickup company is the world. They are a million-dollar business. They have a bootcamp model, meaning that men pay them directly for in-field coaching. They don’t have advertisers or corporate sponsors who can pull support. If you wanted to stop them, you’d have to reach their customers. You have to convince men that you have something better to offer.

What are women doing instead? Making violent death threats against Julien:

One protestor even physically assaulted RSD coach Max on camera at an event in Melbourne, Australia:

The RSD students were forced to leave the Melbourne event after feminist protestors surrounded the boat they were meeting in. Max later told news, "we were actually fearing our safety and that's really not cool." #TakeDownJulienBlanc have said they plan to stage similar protests at future RSD events.

Isn't it ironic that in their efforts to stop men from harassing them, women have made death threats and committed assault?

"Well he deserves it!" cry feminist protestors in their tweets. If these were men tweeting similar statements to a female speaker she would receive massive sympathetic mainstream coverage. However, because the protestors and media seem find Julien's videos so reprehensible, they believe he deserves to have his life threatened, and his friends assaulted. When I see Julien, I don't see a monster. Julien is what men become when they are raised by only women, and told women's attention is what defines their worth.

If feminists truly wanted to #TakeDownJulienBlanc and keep men like him from ever becoming a problem again, they would make sure their sons grew up with fathers who were present active parts of their life. They would give attention to men they respect, rather than only engaging men who choke them and call them "dog." And they would encourage the men in their lives to band together and lead their communities. If you want to #TakeDownJulienBlanc then you need to #BringBackPatriarchy.

Update: Since publishing this article, Julien Blanc's Australian visa has been revoked by immigration minister Scott Morrison. This is the old ruling white man feminists are cheering on as their savior:

Victorian police commissioner Ken Lay also made a statement condemning Julien's work, labeling it "deeply disturbing and offensive." Here is the old white police man gun owner feminists asked to solve their problems for them:

I couldn't have picked two better images of Patriarchy myself.

Read More: This Accidental Experiment Shows The Superiority Of Patriarchy

Eric Crowley

Eric is a self-employed artist who writes about modern culture. You can follow him on twitter.

4 Takeaways From The American Midterm Elections In 2014

November 7, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

On November 4th, Americans trudged off to the ballot box to cast their votes in the midterm election. The Republican Party won decisively, taking the Senate, while increasing their numbers in the House. This means that for Obama's last two years, he will face a hostile Congress that will not be receptive to working with him.

Generally speaking, midterm elections—typically—have significantly lower turnouts than years with presidential elections, so it is a bit tougher to draw lessons about the electorate and the future of American politics. However, there are some lessons to be drawn from the outcome on Tuesday night.

1. The Obama Era Is Over

It has been a tumultuous six years, but the Obama era is over. Obama has two years left as President, but he is the lamest of lame duck Presidents. Congress is firmly controlled by the Republicans and Obama's supporters are as dispirited and demoralized as they have ever been. Outside of national crises, foreign policy, and Supreme Court nominees, his tenure as President will end with a historical whimper.

It has been an amazing run for Obama. From his historic election in 2008, the "shellacking" his party took in the 2010 midterms, followed by his fairly convincing reelection in 2012, it certainly has been a curious run for the man. He has gone from the golden boy of the West to a president who will end his tenure with the opposing party in control of Washington.

His crowning legislative achievement—Obamacare—is highly controversial. Unlike other important legislative acts—such as the American's With Disabilities Act—it was a decidedly partisan bill that is still vehemently opposed by Republicans. It's roll-out was a disaster and is little more than a doubling down on the dubious concept of employer-sponsored healthcare.

His presidency, much like his predecessor George W. Bush, will not be judged kindly. Much like Bush, he will spend his last years with the opposing party controlling Congress with a firm grasp, while he is left to ponder his legacy for America.

2. Republicans Have A Great Chance To Lay The Groundwork For 2016

The Republicans have not been handed a mandate by the people. Simply put, the Republicans have been handed an opportunity to make the case to America that they are committed to enacting policies to improve the economy, address social malaise, and correct the excesses of the Obama administration.

Without Obama on the top of the ticket, the Democrats got buried. A sluggish economy coupled with Democratic misdiagnosis of the issues at hand gave the election to the Republicans. Without Obama's star power to lift mediocre Democratic candidates, they collapsed at the hands of highly organized Republicans who kept hammering Democrats about the economy.

In order to most effectively deal with the possibility of Hillary getting the nomination in 2016, Republicans needs to take advantage of this situation fully. They need to emulate what Democrats did after seizing control of Congress in 2006: Pass simple legislation that reflects the core ideological values of the party. Republicans need to prove that they can get things done.

They should start by directly addressing the voiced concerns of the average American. They need to avoid partisan recrimination—the sort of recrimination that hurt Republicans in Clinton's final term—and prove they are first and foremost interested in advancing America's progress.

3. The "War On Women" Talking Point Was Not Successful

In their inability to divine what exactly is bothering America, Democrats doubled down on the "War On Women" talking point. Access to abortion and governmental subsidization of birth control did little to sway voters—especially female voters.

With the economy in the tank, coupled with stagnant wages and a deteriorating social fabric, Democrats failed to prove to they are "the change we can believe in." Their fall-back to naked appeals to women smacked them right in their face. Women need jobs and are worried about their social climate, not just their ability to balance a working life with their sex life.

Greg Abbott roundly stomped Wendy Davis in Texas for the governorship, all the while beating her by nine points with female voters. Even female voters got tired of the heedless and inflammatory rhetoric around the "War On Women." Women voters are much more than their uteruses, and Democrats should have found that out in this election cycle.

4. The Republican Party Is Not Dead

As is to be expected with political hubris, Democrats have been calling the Republican Party dead the past couple years, as a doctor might prematurely pronounce a patient rushed into the ER. Examples are here, here and here.

Democrats—much like their Republican counterparts in the wake of George W. Bush's reelection in 2004—vastly overplayed their political hand and assumed their political dominance wasn't temporary, but rather spoke to eternity.

There is no such thing as a permanent, ideological majority.

While Republicans certainly didn't win this election outright, Republicans reminded the nation why they are relevant and the growing party going forward. Democrats combined an out-of-touch campaign strategy with a level of lethargy and got smacked in the mouth, rightfully.

Republicans have a chance to change America for the the better. Whether they will, only time will tell. I'm not holding my breath.

Read More: The Seven Ugliest Women In The Democratic Party

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

Even SJWs Can’t Deny That Personal Responsibility Trumps Privilege

November 7, 2014 | by Erik Fomorian | Link | Original Link

A common debate “tactic” among all SJWs, from the most fanatic to the mildly adherent, is “check your privilege!” You usually hear this phrase when a middle class white male (the most evil creature of the human race) makes a relatively unpopular social observation. The phrase used to imply that his statement is skewed, and therefore incorrect, because of his social status. Types of “privilege” include white privilege, male privilege, even cisgender privilege.

These ideas could certainly provide some stimulating intellectual conversation in the abstract, but the main application of these concepts today are to either instill a sense of guilt in the majority, or to excuse the poor choices made by people belonging to minority groups. The latter is indicative of an even broader and more detrimental social problem in western culture: a lack of personal accountability.

Check your privilege BINGO!

Native English Speaker	Cis	Thin	No speech impediment	Christian
Male	White	Attractive	Heterosexual	Able-bodied
Standard accent	No criminal record	Human (FREE SPACE)	Tall	Mentally Healthy
Support mainstream political party	Adult	Born in country of residence	Wealthy	Intelligent
Employed	First-world	Well-connected family	Not a red-head	Educated

White Male Privilege

I was first acquainted with this concept when my hippie ex-girlfriend started lecturing me on my cultural insensitivity when I may or may not have uttered something culturally insensitive. After researching the phrase, I found out that living in a nation founded by men of my skin color and built upon the sufferings of a different colored people has supplied me with some unique cultural benefits not shared by women or other races.

Furthermore, lacking these benefits has socially conditioned women and non-whites to strive for less and thus achieve less. The first concept I can understand, the second I cannot. The minute people start blaming their situations on “social conditioning” is the minute I tune out and classify them as degenerates. Regardless of the society you live in, you are one hundred percent responsible for your actions.

Aside from attempting to make white men feel guilty for the transgressions of their ancestors, the concept of white male privilege is used as a scapegoat for non-white males to excuse their life decisions. Being born with fewer resources than some of your counterparts does not excuse poor decisions, nor does it change the fact that improving your life requires a lot of time, dedication, and hard work.

Social conditioning does not force you to commit crimes, nor does it prevent you from working hard to change your circumstances. Maybe you start off lower than most, maybe you have to fight just to avoid poverty, and maybe you have more to prove and more to overcome. Yeah, it sucks, and I’m sorry some of you were born into shit. But whether you wallow in that shit or claw your way out of it is completely up to you.

Other Scapegoats

Race and gender aside, a lack of personal accountability manifests itself in many other ways among all demographics. “I didn’t pass the class because the teacher hates me,” “I didn't get the promotion because I don't kiss ass," or my personal favorite, "I didn't make the basketball team because I'm not black." People are quick to blame their shortcomings on factors outside of their control, neglecting that achieving something you want usually requires personal sacrifice.

Take for instance the basketball team example. The last time I heard this excuse was when my unit was putting together a team for the base basketball league. I asked one of my troops how the tryouts went, and he fed me this excuse. After asking a few other people, I heard the same thing several more times, so I assumed that my unit's team would lack white guys.

This wasn't the case, however. After watching one of the games, I came to the conclusion that my troop was not cut because he was white, but because he wasn't nearly as good as the guys who did make the team. My troop was a shorter guy on the pudgy side and although he did have some competence on the court, he was nowhere near the level of the guys who did make the team. But this is because I saw these guys playing all the time. Most of the time I went to the gym, these guys were either on the court or in the weight room.

Also, I never once saw my troop in either unless I had forced him to work out with me. If being on the unit's basketball team was something he truly wanted, he would've had to bust his ass in the gym and play his heart out in pick-up games in order to reach a competitive level of skill. But because he was lazy and unmotivated (partly my fault too I guess), he spent most of his off time sitting at home drinking sodas and eating pizza. When he was told he wasn't good enough for the team, he chose to blame racial discrimination instead of his own decisions.

Conclusion

I am not trying to tell you racial discrimination doesn't exist. I am also not so delusional that I believe everyone has equal opportunity. No matter what you want in life and no matter what circumstances you were born into, obstacles will exist and sometimes they will be beyond your control. Sometimes you have to work harder than others, sometimes there's more holding you back, and yes, it is completely unfair.

But you should've been told life isn't fair since you were five years old. Bitching about your circumstances is far less effective than working to change them. Take some personal accountability for yourself and your actions, and watch your life improve immediately.

Read More: Thin Privilege Doesn't Exist

Erik Fomorian
Erik is a disillusioned American veteran. Follow him on Twitter @eeDubbs.

“Down And Out In Paris And London” Is George Orwell’s Disappointing Exception

November 7, 2014 | by Jon Bergeron | Link | Original Link

George Orwell is one of the greatest writers of the 20th century. He was a soothsayer and a genius. Read Inside the Whale (a must read for all Orwell fans), Animal Farm, and 1984, and you will understand why the man has a reputation. However, Down and Out in Paris And London is not one of his better works. The book is decent at best (I give it three stars), and if the book was written by some random schmuck, my rating would be much more brutal.

Orwell has consistently proven his worth as a great writer, something rare even amongst the great writers who can only produce one masterpiece after a lifetime of striving to create a memorable piece of literature (e.g. John Kennedy O’Toole’s Confederacy of Dunces and Louis Ferdinand Celine’s Journey to the End of the Night). Unfortunately, Down and Out in Paris And London is not a masterpiece. It is the one disappointing exception to an otherwise undisputed collection of great novels that champion the individual.

This book is an autobiography about his life “in the slums” and is Orwell’s earlier work when he was trying to make a name for himself as a writer (another reason I was light on the rating). Though I believe he chose this life, instead of actually being “down and out,” Orwell glamorizes poverty and the “interesting” bums he meets. Take for example the interesting and super intellectual bum named “Bozo.” That is his real name…Bozo. I guess this Bozo character is extremely “authentic” and is idolized by Orwell, who won’t shut up about him.

Jean Paul Sartre (great writer in his own right, but a nut in his politics) is popular for glamorizing this idea of the “authentic” which consisted of being a drunk, poor asshole that was unemployed and was supposedly “sticking it to the man” by resorting to petty crime. We know now this is just celebrated perpetual adolescent behavior the hippies later would adopt and never seem to grow out of, even today. Grow up and start acting like an adult male. Luckily Orwell did later on.

Mr. Orwell could have left this “life of poverty” at any time, but rather enjoyed pretentiously pretending to be downtrodden, as if being poor was something to hold in high regard and something to strive for. As if rising out of poverty was not the goal of the poor, but smugly accepting your life was. In this book, Orwell wanted to be victimized to get a sensationalize story and exploiting his so-called poverty (just like that prick Jack Kerouac; pseudo-poverty is as transparent as a half-eaten greasy bag of fries found in a dumpster).

Orwell wanted a romanticized story and wanted to experience something “real” and “authentic.” This “authentic life” consisted of being smelly and having lice while homeless homosexual men tried to penetrate his butt in his sleep on the floor of the disease infested Salvation Army (this is actually in the book). What a fun time and quite the amazing experience!

Down and Out in Paris And London is a testament of a masochist. This is common among some of Orwell’s other pieces. Another piece where he so cleverly attempts this glamorization is the short story “Down the Mine” from Inside the Whale. It is another oversaturated sentimental propaganda piece to show empathy with the working class coal miners of the day. It is so overtly propaganda-like, one would question if it was done intentionally. There is no doubt the working class is an honorable class, but the way he writes about it borders on sappy romanticism. Orwell thinks he is almost suffering with them. I am surprised a miner didn’t call him a whiny pussy and kicked him out of the mine for getting in his way.

The book does contain some interesting points, such as Orwell’s commentary on the food industry. He talks about how sweat gets in the food from the cooks and other rather frivolous, but thought provoking ideas. Besides this, the book left me wishing it was packed with more interesting terms and phrases that we have all come to love (four legs good, two bad; Thought Police, Big Brother, etc). You won’t find any great terms or memorable phrases in Down and Out in Paris And London. The story is very redundant and the book could have ended a lot sooner, though this was one of the closest things to gems in the book:

> Poverty frees them from ordinary standards of behaviour, just as money frees people from work.

Below are some vague and sporadic interesting quotes:

> Without another word I pulled her off the bed and threw her on to the floor. And > then I fell upon her like a tiger! Ah, the joy, the incomparable rapture of that time! There, Messieurs et dames, is what I would expound to you; voila l'amour! There is the true love, there is the only thing in the world worth striving for; there is the thing beside which all your arts and ideals, all your philosophies and creeds, all your fine words and high attitudes, are as pale and profitless as ashes. When one has experienced love- the true love- what is there in the world that seems more than a mere ghost of joy?

>
> You are strong, eh?' he said.
> 'Very strong,' I said untruly.

Down and Out in Paris And London is simple, well-written, and was a quick easy read. The content just didn't grab me nearly as much as his later works. In the end, the only thing I really appreciated about the book was not working 14-hour days, 6 days a week, only to crawl into a bed of bugs while eating watery bread for every meal.

If you thought you invented "Bolsheviks" instead of saying "Bullshit," you did not, because George Orwell did in this book. With this said, I would say this book is mostly "Bolsheviks," so if you're only a casual Orwell fan stick to his later works when he was seasoned with life experience and possessed a less idealistic view of the world. It was this very view that allowed him to see the Thought Police just over the horizon.

Read More: Down And Out In Paris And London

Jon Bergeron
Jon is a part time misanthrope, full time American. Jon loathes modern academia, art, culture, literature, politics, television, and everything on god's green earth that has been inundated with boring, predictable, impotent, vapid Cultural Marxist horseshit which, mind you, is totally void of a single individual thought. Jon just realized he is a full time misanthrope. Anyways, Jon prays for this to change one day and something new to come along. Until then, Jon remains pessimistic with a loaded .357 next to his bed. Jon can be reached at

Career Women Are Pretending To Be Men

November 7, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

The masculine world can look very exciting on its face; difficult qualifications, demanding careers, product launches, engineering projects, huge sums of money flying around and so forth. A man at the pinnacle of his career doesn't have a minute to waste. He needs the best of everything and a team of people working for him.

It's very easy for a young woman to look at this world and feel that she wants her shot at the big time, her piece of the pie, but in fact a clever woman can achieve that much more easily by attaching herself to a high-flying man, being a super wife, and bearing his children. Far from being a cop-out, this is the ultimate female role. Thanks to Lauren Powell, Steve Jobs got some medical treatment and stayed alive an extra decade. Few people know the role she played in Apple's success, but she does.

As Marilyn Monroe said, "A woman that wants to compete with a man has very little ambition."

It's a well-accepted red pill fact that a woman's peak sexual value is around 23, so talking a woman into some high-flying career is tantamount to wasting the best years of her life. Now I am not saying that a woman isn't perfectly capable, because there are certainly some successful career women. Others, like the CEOs of IBM, Xerox, and HP, have pissed massive corporations down the drain with unimaginative leadership. What I am saying is that men and women need to make more informed choices when they are young—the very period during which feminism pulls the wool over women's eyes.

Four distinct paths for career women

Cramming women into the masculine energy of the corporate environment is frankly irresponsible, unsuitable for many women, and in most cases is nothing but the product of pure penis-envy from ugly feminists. A woman in her mid 20s is far more able to land a wealthy and supportive husband that can be with her through her most fertile childbearing years. What's more is that the "excitement" of the corporate world leads women down one of several wrong paths:

1. They "retire" to have children in their early 30s and become full-time housewives. This wastes more than a decade of high-level training and skills that could have gone to someone who might have put those resources to better use over a longer term.

2. They find that eventually being a homemaker after their prime age is too tedious and mundane after all the excitement in the male world. They are essentially taking on a role that they have no experience or training for.

3. They are torn between family and career responsibilities, carrying out neither to their full potential.

4. They find that they cannot cut it in the corporate environment, that their chosen field was too demanding, or rather more dull than they had anticipated.

We already know that women are rarely happy—giving them two paths to choose from and then telling them they can have their cake and eat it too, is like turbocharging a pre-existing condition. Regardless of whether they failed or succeeded in the corporate world, childcare is a completely different type of mindset. There isn't really a higher education suited to this field, in large part because higher education has always focused on endeavors centered around masculine-type energies.

Childcare and homemaking is an endless daily cycle of routine and minor tasks. There is a massive satisfaction to be had in raising kids (it is after all the most important role of all), but not if you are looking for more short term gratification, creative accomplishment, social validation and so forth; accolades that men (and women) find in careers. Having children is very hard work and needs some real preparation. Anyone thinking they can have kids and carry on as if nothing has happened, is more irresponsible than a drunk driver.

What drives families is a very real "love" or caring emotional kinship that is largely devoid from the masculine world of commerce and finance. A family cannot be driven purely by performance. It's the female nurturing energy that supports the family unit. Once a woman enters higher education and the work place, she loses that quality to some degree, just as a slut loses her ability to bond and connect through sex.

Even worse is a woman with a graduate degree that actually enjoyed her career and left to have children. She is going to be more miserable than ever and perpetually bound between the challenges of wanting to go back to work and wanting to spend time with the family. Aggressive career men often cite "more time with the family" as a good reason to step down. Sometimes this is political smokescreen, but I am quite certain many men have felt frustrated at the demands their careers placed on them and the family time they missed.

The path to dissatisfaction

Putting a woman through higher education and a 10+ year corporate career is loading her life up for complete dissatisfaction in all areas. Neither can she be completely settled as a mother and wife, nor can she fully commit to her career with children in tow. If feminism has done anything, it has fed everyone the most brutally disappointing lie.

Rather than validate women as mothers, home makers, and wives, and establish some fair and reasonable compensation and rights in that department, while seeking to bolster women with better skills and training in those fields, feminism has instead told women to abandon those roles completely in favor of not only competing with men, but expecting them to take on childcare and housework duties. This leaves many men demotivated and depressed, unable to fill their biological role. You can NOT have it all. The lucky men abandon family ideals and play the field, but deep down they too know something is broken.

How to reverse the trend

Men who want to settle down and have children and a stable home life are wise to pick a young woman. A girl who gets married to an older man while she is in her early 20s, can already have a couple of children 10+ years old by the time she hits her mid-30s. She can do it without financial or career burdens (that's the man's role) and she can have a relevant and current education as the children grow up. Then, she can start hitting the corporate environment as a real adult with real skills in her late 30s. By the time she is in her late 30s, her children will be grown up, her husband will be mellowing, and she will be far better placed than the career hag that's caught trying to have her cake and eat it and then wonders "where have all the good men gone?"

Men do not want to marry some tired-out late 30s bossy middle management troll, who's only a few years shy of menopause and needs $50,000 of IVF treatments just to have a 3-month premature spawn. This is an abuse of technology that should be outlawed. The world is awash with starving children—how can any sane person force their body to have children under the current global circumstances, when they made a life choice to sacrifice their fertile years for a career?

If feminism wanted to do something positive for the world, it would have backed women to have real training from 16-20 in areas of childcare, homemaking and so forth, while encouraging men to knock up young hot wives and build families and communities. A couple of my female friends have diplomas in catering and hospitality and they do a damn fine job as homemakers.

As the man ages he's less likely to stray, still having a young pretty wife and feeling comfortable in a solid family base, in which both partners are happy and the woman has plenty of time in her later years to find herself a suitable career and avoid the empty nest syndrome or empty call of cougardom. What's more, her income would give the man the chance to spend more time at home when the kids are older, less childish, and more in need of male authority, as opposed to feminine supervision.

Feminism's role in the decline

Feminism encourages women to throw away their best years slutting it up in university and some dead-end career she either fails at or winds up compromised in because of children. It demotivates men by watering down the workplace and universities, while giving them little incentive to be successful and build a family and community. There are natural laws that cannot be changed. Instead of trying to compete with men, feminism could have looked for solutions in which all parties win.

The only parties that feminism benefits are the sprawling nanny state, along with the universities and corporations who are only too happy to have the pool of potential candidates watered down as much as possible. Imagine all the billions spent on pointless divorces, with the legions of men (and women) ruined in bitter separations, not to mention the children who'd love to have a stable upbringing. The only ones getting rich are the lawyers and corporate shareholders, while government can more easily afford it's 20th century bureaucratic nightmare because the labor pool is watered down with women of childbearing years. Equality has no benefit to the individual, either male or female, and if women would start putting their hands up, we could change the social dynamics for the better.

We are not bacteria that can just multiply at will. Children are a 10+ year commitment of mothering-type energy and another 10-year commitment of formative and fatherly energy. Only a father has the authority to guide his children through their teenage years. If we look in nature we find that the more advanced an organism is, the greater differences there are between the male and female. A male shrimp is not that different from a female, whilst a male lion serves entirely different roles than the female lion. Humans have been successful in large part due to this SEXUAL division of duties, skills, and labor. I'm sorry, but a huge part of that is genetically built in.

Men are better designed both physically and mentally to fill more masculine roles, as females are to fill feminine roles. What's more is that you cannot underestimate nature's instincts. Even a lion cub that grew up in a zoo with no parents knows how to stalk and hunt prey – how is that? Female children are immediately drawn to dolls and prams, while male children seek guns and building sets. No one tells them these things, it is pure instinct.

Feminism is beyond insane if it thinks it can, within a couple of generations, rewire hundreds of thousands of years of evolution. Frankly it's nothing more than a smokescreen for communism, a seemingly strange but increasingly relevant bedfellow. Break the family unit and the state can be father to everyone just like Mao, Stalin or Hitler was.

Read More: Why Men Need Dumber Women

3 Steps To Prevent The Ignorant Masses From Voting

November 8, 2014 | by Adem Çingene | Link | Original Link

In a recent opinion U.S. District Judge Nelva Gonzales Ramos called the Texas Voter ID law "[an] unconstitutional burden on the right to vote." The statement echoes progressives' attempts compare voter ID laws to poll taxes meant to disenfranchise minorities and the poor. The law in Texas was later upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court.

The history of voting rights in the U.S. is contentious. Constitutional amendments clearly define that a person cannot be denied the vote based on certain criteria, but is there a right to vote? The answer appears to be "no," since many states prohibit felons from voting, and certainly the court's ruling in Texas confirms that voting is a privilege.

Winston Churchill once quipped, "The best argument against democracy is a five minute conversation with the average voter." It's clear that progressives and activist judges are aggressively pushing for a purely democratic electoral process that allows anyone and everyone to cast a ballot. Progressivism is inevitable, so to remedy the situation the answer is not to enact laws to prohibit voting but rather to make voting simply too difficult for the uninformed.

Step #1 Eliminate Political Parties

I was once of the mind that we should have many political parties. There's always been a lot of talk about the problems created by the two-party stranglehold in the U.S. It's easy to see how some might think that getting more parties involved is a solution. By giving more parties a voice we increase the market of ideas; more choices means more discussion. The argument for more parties fails to address a major problem of human nature, though—reliance on labels.

Browse any political forum, any comments section, and you'll undoubtedly find someone complaining about the "Repulicons" or the "Democraps." The conversation shifts from any substantive discussion and becomes a childish exchange of tired portmanteaus. The recent pop in membership of the Libertarian party quickly earned them the moniker "Libertards." This is childish.

The ignorant and uninformed don't have time to learn about a candidate's stance on issues or whether or not they even agree with the candidate. What they need are labels that can quickly and easily tell them which box to tick in the voting booth. By eliminating parties, you remove the party affiliate letter next to each candidate's name on the ballot. You eliminate associative labeling. If there were no political parties voters would be forced to educate themselves about candidates or risk being completely confused at the polls.

The initial downside is that many politicians have already built a brand and the voting public might remember that a candidate was a "Republicon." In the long run, though, as career politicians pass on, candidates would have to stand purely on their platform and not on the association of their political party. The voter would have to educate himself about where a candidate stands on the issues. This situation benefits all. It encourages greater transparency from the candidate, and it requires that the voter be informed.

Step #2 Enforce Strict Rules for Campaign Advertising

You've no doubt heard a lot of fuss about campaign contributions. There's been genuine concern from all sides of the political spectrum about wealthy donors and lobbyists influencing elections with large infusions of cash. In April of 2014 the U.S. Supreme Court struck down long standing campaign donation limits. Justice John Roberts wrote of the decision:

> There is no right more basic in our democracy than the right to participate in electing our political leaders. We have made clear that Congress may not regulate contributions simply to reduce the amount of money in politics, or to restrict the political participation of some in order to enhance the relative influence of others.

With all the bickering over campaign funding, sleazy ads, and misinformation, I think it's important to raise the question of whether money is the problem.

First let's determine where all those campaign donations are going. The Washington Post reported that in the 2012 election Mitt Romney spent 492 million dollars on television advertising with 91 percent of those ads being negative. Barack Obama spent 404 million dollars on television advertising with 85 percent of those ads being negative. That's roughly 791 million dollars being spent towards caustic advertising on the idiot box. These aren't ads explaining a candidate's platform but rather vindictively attacking the opponent. These ads are addressing the lowest common denominator.

Political advertising should be limited to print. If you aren't ready to read about the issues, you aren't ready to vote. If advertising were limited to print much less money would need to be raised, thus we avoid the concerns raised by lavish campaign donations.

Limiting advertising to print helps keep advertising clean since you're eliminating the ability to make your opponent look like shit with slick editing. Deliberately misquoting an opponent comes with serious legal penalties under libel statutes. Best of all you're reaching out to those invested enough in the electoral process to actually take the time to read.

Of course none of this keeps activists and evangelists from advising their followers on voting, but it does limit the audience. Limiting ads to print requires more effort to reach a conclusion, it does a good job of eliminating appeals to emotion.

Step #3 Make it Easier for People to Vote

At first blush this may sound counter intuitive, but consider that voting has become a "game day" event. There's a mystique to voting. Activists groups, churches and social clubs have made it a priority to get as many people as they can to the polls. Many of these people would have no interest in voting otherwise. I don't have to tell you that these groups are influencing voting decisions. If we take the burden out of casting the actual vote we eliminate the need for these advocacy groups and we lessen their influence on election results.

Making it easier to vote by using online or telephone balloting might also address a lot of the concerns with voter ID fraud. Every registered voter is issued a voter ID card every year. That card might have unique pin assigned to the voter that they must use when submitting their ballot through the system. Once a ballot is cast using the pin, the pin can't be reused. You would be issued a new pin every year. That should make both sides of the voter id argument happy, it's easier to vote and you're effectively being identified by the pin.

Conclusion

The idea is not to silence voters, but rather to have the most informed and invested individuals voting. We value quality over quantity. Political campaigns and voting have been reduced to emotional pandering and patronizing of the least informed. While none of the ideas mentioned above will correct the course, they can help slow the descent.

We have to resist mob rule, and the major parties have made it clear that their interests lie solely in reelection and not the good of the nation. The best we can do is ensure that the most thoughtful also have the loudest voice.

Read More: The Republican Party Needs To Go Away

Adem Çingene
Adem Çingene is a Balkanophile, biker, professional couch surfer, dirtbag climber and all around wanderer. Follow @NomadAdem

3 Easy Hacks To Develop A Dominant Presence

November 9, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Far too many men hold themselves like 13-year-old girls who are too shy to wave down the waitress and ask for a glass of water.

Whether I'm walking down the street passing a man who nervously looks down at his feet as we cross paths, or just meeting someone for the first time who rambles anxiously about god-knows-what as soon as we're introduced, it's clear that a large percentage of men shit their pants at least five times a day.

And it's obvious. Whether you realize it or not, you size someone up within an instant of seeing them. A 2006 study at Princeton University found that people's inferences about someone's attractiveness, likability, trustworthiness, competence, and aggressiveness are made up after a mere 100 milliseconds of viewing their face. Allowing the participants to view the faces without a time constraint rarely changed their judgments.

This means that you should do what you can to portray what you want to. How you carry yourself, dress yourself, and build yourself physically will dictate EXACTLY how other people perceive you, and therefore treat you and relate to you. NOT taking the time to consciously analyze and plan these things is silly. How people view us and treat us will either propel us towards success or condemn us to failure. It will either fill women's pants with moist liquids and men's hearts with respect, or dry up that vagina like the fucking Sahara and kill your chances of ever impressing anyone in a job interview.

Obviously doing things like lifting weights to build a bigger chest and back and practicing martial arts to ingrain a sense of fearlessness in your character are worthwhile pursuits that will shape your presence over time, but in this article I'll aim to offer you three "quick fixes" that can make a nearly instant impact on your presence if used correctly.

1. A simple stretch to help you stand up straight

One of the first things, if not the first, that people notice about you is your posture. Good posture is expansive, takes up space, and embodies strength. Poor posture shrinks and portrays weakness. And, while a lot of factors go into solid posture, the most important is undoubtedly bringing your shoulders back to expand your chest cavity and holding your head high.

The problem is that today we constantly bring our arms forward to type on computers, drive cars, or play video games. And this shortens the muscles on the front of our body, resulting in weak posture where the shoulders roll forward. To combat this you should stretch your chest. The simplest way to do this is standing inside of a doorframe with your palms holding the sides of the frame, and then leaning forward and holding that position for at least 30 seconds.

If you do this a couple times per day, you will lengthen these muscles and hold your shoulders back by default. This makes your chest look bigger, your shoulders look wider, and your presence more dominant.

2. How to hold eye contact

Earlier this year I wrote an entire article on this, but I'll distill the key points here. Strong eye contact is associated with confidence and authority. By holding eye contact you can effortlessly convey these things without saying a word. The trick is to hold eye contact for just a bit longer than whoever you're talking to. If you overdo it, it will come off as creepy or like you're trying to intimidate them. If, on the other hand, you struggle to hold it, it will convey fear or nervousness.

Practice your eye contact in every interaction. I promise it's worth it. I can't even count the number of times girls have blushed, looked down, and complimented me on my eye contact. And I can tell you that it's definitely built a strong attraction inside of them.

3. An appropriate speed to speak at

This conversation variable is similar to eye contact, although not quite as important. Eye contact is recognized before you even open your mouth, just like posture, and so those make for a stronger first impression. But the speed at which you speak is also quite important when it comes to creating a powerful presence. And it’s easy to tweak.

You want to speak slowly. As in while you’re speaking, the rate at which words are exiting your mouth is calm and controlled. But also as in allowing people to finish talking and pause for a moment before responding. This shows you’re completely comfortable in the conversation. It also creates an interview-type dynamic where you’re the interviewer and the other person is qualifying themselves to you.

Want to radically improve your confidence in less than a month? Check out my online course 28 Days to Alpha.

Read More: 8 Tips For Getting Laid More By Developing Your Sexual Presence

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Is Nostalgic Patriotism The Problem With Conservative America?

November 9, 2014 | by Henry Calgues | Link | Original Link

Patriotic, conservative Americans have had a rough few years. There is no question that progressivism has marched over traditional conservatism and caused so many to ask, "What happened to America?" It's a crucial question that has been reduced to an exasperation and is often followed by a roll of the eyes or a shrug. Often, it concludes another discussion had by conservatives, scratching their heads at their dispossession and sighing at the futility to fight it.

So what did happen? In my opinion, the prosperity experienced after World War II provided a warm and cozy environment for progressive bacteria to grow and their ideas to spread, as the "greatest generation" eventually allowed their own children to undermine all that they had bled and died for. The shimmer of America's golden age was too bright for many baby boomers who made concentrated efforts to dim it—and succeeded.

The revolutionaries of the sixties never officially revolted. They never took up arms and invaded the courthouses across America. They never rose up the workers to overtake the White House. They never got to plant their new flag on the Capitol building. They didn't have to—they just took possession of our flag.

After decades of taking control of institutions within the media, universities, and government, leftists simply took our flag. It's quite remarkable when you think about it: an entire nation's way of life had the rug pulled out from under it. Some claim a globalist conspiracy was responsible and it may be true, but the failure of the American spirit, which had the opportunity to resist it, was as organic as rain.

The takeover was slow and drawn out because vast changes were simply a series of small nudges over time. Their progression was noted and scoffed at, but never resisted. Revolution was disguised as change and progression, and so here we are today—an enemy now waves our flag. Some claim that the enemy disrespects the flag and even spits on it with their policies, but I disagree. They handle the flag with greater care than most patriots, and why wouldn't they? It's their greatest weapon against you.

Does the patriot wave the flag or does the flag wave the patriot?

It's worth questioning as the power structure shrouds themselves in the flag while they tax you, send you to war, legislate against you, violate your privacy, dumb down your children, empower special interest groups against you, etc. They then use guilt and apology to tranquillize you. And it works.

Like a parasite that uses the system of its host to thrive, the progressive uses the engine of America to "progress." Other than radicalized union laborers, conservatives are generally the engine of America. Leftists are not conquerors—they can't be. They are only direction-changers. Their "progress" is not action, it is emotion. The left is not the heart of a body that engines the limbs into action. The left is an emotion somewhere in the brain that causes hesitation, fear, and anger. It affects the body like a neurosis does, which is why it must wave the flag of the heart.

But just because an enemy waves the flag, it doesn't mean that you need to march behind him. Leaders that have waved our flag over the last few decades have done so against our best interest, as any success was self-made, and often with resistance from the flag.

How to take back the right ideals

So why the continued allegiance? Do you want restoration or do you want warm and cozy feeling of days passed? Ideals have inspired little action. When we pledge such allegiance, we conscript ourselves to the engine of the machine identified by that flag. You are manning a crank to keep the engine running just because of the flag that is branding it. You disagree with where the machine is going and how expensive and deadly it is, yet you crank away because you read about a time when that flag was in better hands.

I understand that you hope that flag changes hands again; back into the hands of the people, but that machine isn't going to just hand that flag over—not while you are working sixty hours per week for it, giving it thousands of dollars every year in taxes, or sacrificing your son or brother for it in some faraway desert. You've made it too strong.

An enemy has your flag. They stole it from you. They wave it inspiring, demanding your hard work, and sacrifices your lives on their battlefields. They brand their tanks with it and drape it over the caskets of your children, blinding you with pageantry—to keep you working, sacrificing yourselves for an ideal that they despise; an ideal that they are destroying with the very machine you fuel.

Their madness inspires suicide, but you keep grinding. You keep killing yourself to patronize an ideal that they have hijacked. You are the proud and willing flow of gasoline in their chainsaw that burns to cut down the tree of liberty that your grandchildren will never see. You pull their chariot and merely hope that somebody else takes the reins someday. You rely on another vote to appoint a new hijacker.

> Even voting for the right is doing nothing for it. It is only expressing to men feebly your desire that it should prevail. A wise man will not leave the right to the mercy of chance, nor wish it to prevail through the power of the majority. There is but little virtue in the action of masses of men. – Henry David Thoreau in Civil Disobedience

The fuel to fight back is in the heart of every conservative patriot—it only needs to be ignited. Consider this: What if a movement emerged across America of conservative patriots burning the flag in protest of their dispossession? Imagine the fear that would consume progressives when patriots finally proclaim an admission that the flag no longer waves for them, that the flag will no longer inspire their own suicide, that reason has prevailed over symbolism and that self-sacrifice will no longer be idealized.

Imagine workers, policemen, soldiers, teachers, and entrepreneurs suddenly taking such passionate action simultaneously, nonviolently and safe from condemnation. Have you ever seen a progressive on the defensive before? No, because we never take an offensive. We have permitted them to maintain a constant offensive by condemning ourselves to a never-ending defense of our own values, clinging to symbol that they attack and injure, but only to the brink of death as torture.

They use the flag to mock us by banning it or censoring it because we let them attach our virtues to it. They ban the flag which bans our virtues. They use the flag to instill guilt in us by attaching past transgressions to it, so that even our virtues inspire guilt. They use our own virtue as a weapon against us. Conservatives are largely moral people who have had their own compassion and mercy used against them. In Atlas Shrugged by Ayn Rand, one of the novel's heroes, Henry Rearden, considers how his own virtue and guilt is used against him by his enemies:

> What sort of code permitted the concept of a punishment that required the > victim's own virtue as fuel to make it work? A code – he thought – which would destroy only those who tried to observe it; a punishment, from which only the honest would suffer, while the dishonest would escape unhurt. Could one conceive of an infamy lower than to equate virtue with pain, to make virtue, not vice, the source of motive power of suffering?…To count upon his virtue and use it as an instrument of torture, to practice blackmail with the victim's generosity as sole means of extortion to accept the gift of a man's good will and turn it into a tool for the giver's destruction.

A tyrant will point his gun at you to get your cooperation out of fear, and a progressive will point his finger at you to get your cooperation out of guilt. I contend that in America today, the finger of a leftist is far more dangerous and powerful than the gun of any soldier we have ever seen. Conservatives should no longer permit progressives to instill guilt in them.

What if conservatives did begin to burn the flag? For every star on the flag that goes up in smoke, so would our guilt and participation toward our dispossession. For every stripe that burns, so would our ideals of self-sacrifice for a symbol that is wrapped around the guilt that is used against us.

Could the flame from a burning flag that was stolen from us ignite the fuel within the patriot that has been lured into a position of endless defense? Think of the chilling message it would send to the domestic enemies of America that have hijacked our nation. They will have to defend the flag. Consider how the useful idiots and other weapons of the left will respond as they will be the one's fearing revolution. Imagine the terror in the eyes of the looters of the left when the engine of the machine that carries them begins to break down, and they see that the flickering light of a burning flag, when ignited by a patriot, illuminates the face of a rebel.

Read More: Liberals Are Not The Enemy… But Liberalism Is

Henry Calgues
AC is a cop on the brink of resignation. To find out why, check out his new blog at anonymouscop.com or like Anonymous Cop on Facebook Click here to view my Facebook page

Lena Dunham And The Hollowness Of Millennial Girls

November 10, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Last week saw one of the most embarrassing temper tantrums ever thrown in public, when Girls creator and feminist activist Lena Dunham went into a "rage spiral" at people calling her a child molester based on quotes from her own memoir. In Not That Kind of Girl, Lena Dunham's 300-page paean to the awesomeness of Lena Dunham, our plucky rich girl heroine describes sexually abusing her younger sister in ways that would land someone with less money—and more conservative views—in prison:

> One day, as I sat in our driveway in Long Island playing with blocks and buckets, my curiosity got the best of me. Grace was sitting up, babbling and smiling, and I leaned down between her legs and carefully spread open her vagina. She didn't resist and when I saw what was inside I shrieked.
>
> My mother came running. "Mama, Mama! Grace has something in there!"
>
> My mother didn't bother asking why I had opened Grace's vagina. This was within the spectrum of things I did. She just got on her knees and looked for herself. It quickly became apparent that Grace had stuffed six or seven pebbles in there. My mother removed them patiently while Grace cackled, thrilled that her prank had been a success.

After the red mist cleared, Dunham threatened to sue Truth Revolt for calling her what she called herself—a sexual predator—and tried to defend herself by claiming that "other people did weird stuff when they were kids too!" Uh Lena, no, we haven't. "Weird" is sticking a fork in an electrical socket. Giving your toddler sister a gynecological exam then bragging about it in a book is sick.

The most remarkable thing about Dunham's tales of incestuous molestation is that it took this long for them to become public. Not That Kind of Girl was released in September, yet the only reviewer to even mention these segments was Jezebel's Jia Tolentino, who described Dunham's vaginal spreading as "welcome," "old-fashioned" and "childish." Then again, seeing as Dunham had to resort to having her father Carroll blurb the book, maybe the lit-press was just playing a game of Let's Not and Say We Did.

The Girls Are Not Alright

My primary experience with Lena Dunham was watching the first season of Girls, in one of my bizarre episodes where I try to understand how "ordinary fuckin' people" think. It's one of the most spectacularly lazy TV shows I've ever seen, a poorly-written mess that queefs pure concentrated smug in your face. Girls is basically the daughters of the elite (all of the show's main stars have rich and famous daddies) playing dress-up with HBO's money.

At the time I watched the first season, folks in the manosphere were claiming that Girls was somehow "red pill," oblivious to how the show took basic truths and spun them to justify female piggishness and vanity. The show is clearly written to frame Hannah (Dunham's character) as sympathetic, whether she's stealing tips from underpaid Mexican maids or breaking her beau Adam's heart because… well, she doesn't have a reason. The second season took this wish fulfillment to even more ridiculous levels, featuring an episode where the dumpy, titless Hannah somehow rejects a man who's far more attractive than him after leading him on for days.

Assuming there's any point to Girls beyond rich girl vanity, it's cultural inoculation: taking the truly dangerous ideas of the manosphere and killing them in a lab to vaccinate the female population. Girls is about telling the most narcissistic, damaged generation of women in American history that their bad choices are not their fault, they're special just the way they are, and anyone who protests this is just a sexist meanie who wants to put them down. That's about as "red pill" as the SPLC Intelligence Report.

They Are The Stuffed Women, Leaning Together, Headpiece Filled With Straw

Because of her work on Girls, Lena Dunham has been lauded as the "voice" of the Millennial generation, which is enough to make me wish the GenXers would adopt me. Most sensible people would scoff at the idea of a trust-fund nihilist from Brooklyn being the voice of anyone, but I'm not so sure anymore.

Lena Dunham is the embodiment of the Millennial woman. Raised by permissive parents, her head filled with affirmations of her own wonderfulness, shielded from the negative consequences of her actions, she is a monster. Having never known pain, she has no empathy and cannot acknowledge the humanity of those around her. Her friends, lovers, family members are mere tools in her quest for narcissistic supply. She has no soul, only a black hole that sucks in everything and crushes it.

And before the usual suspects come in, yes, many of these criticisms also apply to Millennial men. But Millennial women wield far more power than men in mainstream culture. The majority of TV watchers and moviegoers are women; virtually all consumer spending is controlled by women; politicians jockey for the female vote by conjuring up mythical "wars" on women and creating fake "Women's Equality Parties" to win extra votes. Outside of video games, nobody gives a crap what the Millennial male thinks, so he's left to masturbate in the corner alone.

The Millennial woman is an intellectual vacuum. She cannot form true relationships, so she compensates with social media, the crack pipe of Twitter and Facebook giving validation to her existence. She pops Prozac like candy to quell her feelings of suicidal ideation. She covers herself in tattoos and piercings as a narcissistic defense mechanism: aware of her own vapidity, she clothes herself in markings to keep people from seeing the truth. She inflates the molehills of her life—"street harassment," "date rape," having to pay for her own birth control—into mountains because she has no real problems.

Sex is where the Millennial woman displays the true extent of her dysfunction. Too autistic to handle a real-life conversation, she retreats to the safety of Tinder, where she can filter out all men who don't perfectly match her narcissistic fantasy. Her feminine instincts dulled by mass media, she resorts to imitating the phony moans of porn stars, her every motion as mechanistic as a sexbot. Incapable of true emotional intimacy, she substitutes it with the spiritual junk food that is meaningless hookups.

So long as the Instagram likes and Tinder matches keep piling up, she'll never have to confront her inner emptiness.

Lena Dunham is their spokesgirl, a woman so clueless that she thinks that she can write about prying her sister's vagina open and think people won't find it disgusting. Note that her parents didn't bother telling her that she shouldn't be playing with her sister's loins. After all, telling young Lena that something was bad might have made her sad, and we can't very well have that, now can we? Dunham has even confirmed her narcissism by claiming she views her sister as an "extension" of herself, as opposed to an autonomous person with her own consciousness, wants and needs.

This is why the white girl "intelligentsia," from Jia Tolentino to Salon's Emily Gould, are closing ranks to defend Dunham. According to their own ideology, they are helping to perpetuate rape culture by making excuses for Dunham's kiddie-diddling. They don't care because deep down, they know that Dunham is just a more extreme version of themselves. They cannot condemn her without negating their own existences.

This Is The Way The World Ends

Whenever a man criticizes the way women behave, the default reaction is that it's always his fault somehow. “You’re just choosing the wrong girls.” “Like attracts like.” “Not all women are like that!” When I was young, dumb, and full of cum, I actually believed it. But you can only thrust your hand into an open flame for so long before your flesh catches fire.

With just one exception, the most fulfilling relationships I’ve had were with girls who were either non-American, significantly older (mid-thirties and up) or younger than me (young like 18-19 young, you perverts). Why? They treated me like a human being and not a supporting actor in the stage play of their lives. The social retardation and narcissism endemic to Millennials is a curse all their own. No, not every Millennial woman is a vapid narcissist, but not every apple in a basket has to have a worm in it to convince people to toss the whole thing aside.

And remember: these girls are next in line to run the country. The girls who think being a portly, rich, child-touching narcissist is something to aspire to.

God help us all.

Read More: The Lena Dunham Sexual Abuse Scandal Showcases The Double Standard Of Feminism

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

A Dialogue With A Pious Monk

November 10, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

One of Return of Kings's strengths is its ability to attract and hold the attention of men from startlingly diverse backgrounds. Just how diverse, readers will this week discover. Regular readers may recognize the name Cui Pertinebit. He has added his lengthy and informed opinions in the comments sections of many of my recent articles. I was surprised to discover several months ago that he was a tonsured monk of the Catholic faith as well as scholar proficient in both Latin and Greek, a man who lived a regimented lifestyle in pursuit of a higher purpose.

It is not a background that is familiar to most of us, certainly not to myself. Having been won over by his sincerity and good humor, I thought we would benefit from hearing him discourse at length on topics of concern for all of us. Hence this interview. Cui's thoughts are acute, unique in perspective, and unrelentingly positive. In all of my dialogue with him, there was not one word of bile or calumny; on the contrary, I found him to be genuinely modest and self-effacing.

Even if we disagree with his opinions—and some no doubt will–we are all elevated by his example, and his patient devotion to a cause. Although he would gently admonish me for my praise of him, I will yet say it here: the man of virtue emits his own radiance.

Quintus. Thank you, Cui, for speaking with me today. I am glad you could find the time to do this interview.

C.P. No, it is my pleasure, Quintus.

Quintus. I'll start off with a question that many of our readers may have thought about. Do you believe men are facing a spiritual crisis today? If so, why?

C.P. Yes. Crisis is a Greek word, meaning "judgment." It is the nature of Truth, that to come in contact with it is to face judgment; it is therefore no surprise to me, that our judgment rises to the level of a crisis, precisely when "non-judgmentalism" has become our only "truth." The underlying sickness, is the heresy of "modernism," (sometimes called "liberalism"), which, boiled down to its very nub, is the irrational assertion of autonomy via absolute, abstract "rights," while one denies, doubts or despairs of knowing the necessary causes of rights' existence.

The modernist cares not whether something is Right and True; one only needs the "right" to do something without regard to what is Right and True. The core irrationality is to deny the Right in the name of "rights," and even to believe that "rights" exist, if there is nothing Right. The modernist society inevitably develops irrationally, in accord with its premises.

Quintus. This is a good point.

C.P. But should we therefore deny human rights and impose the pure Right? Pope Pius XII spoke of the balance between stricture and leniency in society. "First: that which does not correspond to truth or to the norm of morality objectively has no right to exist, to be spread or to enjoy free action. Secondly: failure to impede this with civil laws and coercive measures can nevertheless be justified in the interests of a higher and more general good." The distinction, philosophically crucial, is that it is often right to tolerate something objectively wrong; but it does not therefore follow that there is a right to do something objectively wrong. To establish the latter idea as a principle, is to plunge society into irrecoverable irrationality and injustice.

Quintus. But how did things get to the point we are now in society? Who do you think is responsible?

C.P. Every man is responsible for himself. Assigning responsibility before taking whatever responsibility is due, is shameful in itself. So, that is first. To the extent that we permit, participate in or fail to repent of the crisis, we are partly responsible.

I don't go in for conspiracy theories as to who the precise instigators of the current events may be, but this is not because I find it unlikely that there are conspiracies and cabals fomenting the destruction of our civilization – I emphatically do. But there is an obvious dearth of information on conspiratorial activity, and many "useful idiots" implement the agenda unwittingly, so expository theories tend to disappoint.

I regard the first Protestants, the Freemasons, Jacobins, all those who advocate for redistribution of economic or social capital (especially socialists and Zionists), and all who defy the principle of "subsidiarity," to be specially responsible. Those who will drink most deeply from the chalice of God's wrath, in my personal opinion, are the clergy and religious of the Catholic Church, many of whom, even popes, seem to have completely derelicted their duties.

Quintus. Yes. There is no doubt that many of our institutions have let us down. Perhaps if these authority figures had been as concerned with the responsibilities of their offices, as they have been with their privileges, then we would not be in this situation. But what things should men be doing now to develop their spiritual sides?

C.P. First, they should cultivate a love of beauty and excellence. We are immune to heavenly beauties if we cannot even appreciate those of this world. Next, men should learn about the function of the soul in its three aspects, and the relationship of the virtues, especially those called Cardinal Virtues, to them. Finally, men should realize that the spiritual life, properly-so-called, consists of the three Theological Virtues: Faith, Hope and Charity. These are beyond human nature, and so man must ask them from God.

God may test your sincerity and expect you to do some work. Ultimately this will involve spiritual regeneration and a restoration of justice through repentance and union with Christ. If men ask God sincerely, and especially if they commend themselves to Him through the Blessed Virgin, by whom He commended Himself to us, I am sure the spiritual life will open up to them.

Quintus. What is your background, and what do you do now?

C.P. Well, I was a professional cellist, and studied music theory and composition. I converted from atheism to Christianity shortly before entering college, and left college in my second year to join an Orthodox monastery, after some reading in history convinced me that the first Christians were not Evangelical Protestants. The monastery felt I had a priestly vocation and sent me back to college. I got two Bachelor's Degrees, one in Classical Greek and Latin, and another in Medieval and Renaissance Studies.

Learning more about history, and acquiring the ability to read more primary texts in Greek and Latin directly, convicted me of the truth of the Catholic Faith. I'm being received into the Catholic Church now, though I would caution modern men that much of what passes for Catholicism, even in "conservative" circles, is certainly not Catholic. I heartily recommend the SSPX for the Latin Rite; the Eastern Rite is not so damaged at present. I will be withdrawing from my doctoral studies to teach Latin at the seminary, where I will also be trained for the priesthood.

Quintus. I am glad to know that there are still such men as you, quietly influencing lives. How did you come to make this decision on the direction of your life?

C.P. I was drawn to the monastic or priestly ideal all my life. But I was an atheist, and then a Protestant! As I considered converting to the Orthodox Church, where monastic life was a possibility, I was in love with a girl. She was the only girl I had ever seriously dated (damaged women are unattractive to me, and modern women are a damaged bunch). Though this girl was not damaged, she still wrote me a powerful prescription for the "red pill."

This caused me to reflect on the behaviour of women more generally; even the good ones were still beset by that inevitable weakness of their sex. Society once had conventions, which made life with women possible; but since modern society removed these conventions, I saw no need to waste my time. I've never regretted this decision.

Quintus. Yes.

C.P. For a positive motive, the celibate life has been recommended from the New Testament onwards, as the best form of life. "In the Kingdom of God they are neither married nor given in marriage;" through baptism, "lo, the Kingdom of God is within you." Thus, to live this life here and now is already eminently suitable for a Christian man.

But what touched me the most, was St. Dorotheos of Gaza's explanation: when we give God a return on His grace through faith and observance of the commandments, we merely give God His due. If we want to show our gratitude and give something extra, we can voluntarily sacrifice even good things for love of God. To make one's whole life a sacrifice, is the best possible thing. Quid retribuam Domino, pro omnibus quae retribuit mihi?

Quintus. Are there any specific spiritual exercises or books that you might recommend?

C.P. Personalities are too different, the tradition is too rich, and the valid options are too many, to give much in the way of specific recommendations to a large group. I will say what I can, though. First, to heed the Virgin's instructions at Fatima on the Rosary and other devotions, is the most important spiritual regimen of our age. I recommend meditation as described in The Cloud of Knowing, but mind that book's warnings.

Observe the full rigour of the medieval fasting rules with the liturgical calendar, to find yourself aligned with a great mystery. Finally, rote prayers are good, since they impart the Church's piety, but we must also pray freely if we hope to know God and be saved. I will give the advice that consistency in a bit of prayer, is better than failing to regularly pray more (shoot for a daily minimum of 15 minutes, though). Find a time, space and manner of prayer that separates the sacred from the profane…

As to books: the Scriptures go without saying, but read them as the Church reads them. Who cares what you think the Bible means? When Christ said the Holy Spirit "shall lead you into all truth," it is the plural "you" in the Greek, and He was speaking to the Apostles.

For a crash-course in Christian spirituality, I recommend The Life in Christ by Blessed Columba Marmion, The Spiritual Combat by Lorenzo Scupoli, Christian Mortification by Cardinal Desideratus (Désiré) Mercier, and the regular reading of hagiography, since nothing distills the ethos of Christian spirituality so well as this.

In this latter genre, various works appeal to different backgrounds: my favourite is The Ecclesiastical History of the English People by the Venerable Bede (you may want to skip the first chapters), but there are many other choices. The Exact Exposition of the Orthodox Faith distills the patristic mind; The Catechism of the Council of Trent does, too, as refined and enriched by Thomism. The Conferences and Institutes of St. John Cassian give advanced spiritual instruction. But I could spend an afternoon recommending various books for various needs, so let's leave it at that.

Quintus. I have to ask this. What is your daily regimen like?

C.P. When everything goes well, it is like this:

6:00 – Rise, morning prayers, Prime, Terce. 7:00 – Exercise, shower; 8:00 Tea/Coffee, Study and Intellectual Work; 10:00 – Light breakfast, free time to read news, blogs; 11:30 – Sext, None, Manual Labor; 1:30 – Freshen up, mental prayer, spiritual reading; 2:00 – Lunch, Productive Time ad libitum; 5:00 – Clean and straighten up room or work areas if needed; Walk with Rosary, Vespers; 6:00 – Cook Dinner, Eat, Clean; 8:00 – Compline, Matins, Prayer ad libitum; when Matins is done, if so desired, tipple some vespertinal spirits, listen to music, read for pleasure, wind down for sleep by 10:00-ish Quintus. What are the big mistakes that you see young men making today? How can they correct these things?

C.P. The main ones are those outlined above, of modernism and liberalism – that sense of entitlement to pursue life on one's own terms, rather than realizing that nature and reason have dictated their own terms to us, and wisdom lies not in resisting reality, but in harmonizing with it.

Past this, I would say that cynicism is a problem, especially when joined to hedonism. Man was created to have pleasure in serving the Good faithfully. To cynically serve nihilism, especially in hedonism, is the exact opposite of our natural state and purpose. It is no coincidence that this state is the natural consequence of Modernism and Liberalism.

I know that our times are bleak, and that dysfunction and societal breakdown are everywhere accelerating. I know that our fathers, physical and spiritual, have left us rootless as never before. I know that there is no longer any beauty, comfort or fidelity in our women, and that the simple pleasures of starting a family are overshadowed by perpetual wage slavery and divorce slavery. I know it often seems that there is nothing of enduring value to be acquired and preserved, and that the pleasure of the moment seems like the best we will get. This is all an illusion. Clean the garbage from your mind and reject the slow-acting poison that has been poured into your veins by every apparatus of the Modernist culture.

While it is true that present circumstances may limit our options, we see that every treasure of moral and spiritual excellence is yours to enjoy, and no power outside yourself can alienate it from you without your consent. So that is my advice to men on how to correct it. Refuse it your consent. Repent of the bad, adhere to the Good as to your very life. In a world without honor or integrity, consider your own honor and integrity all the more priceless. Struggle not to be corrupted. Those in this age who do so, I am sure, will receive from God a recompense proportionate to their struggle. The afterlife aside, a virtuous man lives the better life even here and now.

Quintus. These are noble words. It feeds my vexation not to be able to enjoy the benefits of your counsel, and I hope you will return to us again soon. I will say no more, except that few take more pleasure in your words than I. Thank you most sincerely.

C.P. No, such words are not necessary, Quintus.

Read More: The Life Of A Location Independent Traveler

Quintus Curtius

Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Is Modern Thai Dating Finally A Mainstream Option?

November 10, 2014 | by Steve Bain | Link | Original Link

The Thai dating scene has received a great deal of bad-press in recent years and it always saddens me when I read or hear about a failed relationship between a westerner and a Thai. I have to say that such failures, traditionally at least, have not been an uncommon thing. But the times are changing fast. If you are getting back into the dating game, then there are some convincing reasons to give this tropical option a serious look. Before looking into those reasons it might be best if we have a quick look at why it is that Thai girls have got something of a bad rap.

Thai Dating in the Past

The majority of the romantic relationships that have blossomed in previous years have come about via the tourism industry, i.e. from middle-aged western men visiting places such as Pattaya, places that are home to thousands of red-light workers. They arrive intending to have some no-strings-attached fun for a couple of weeks, but then they end up finding themselves emotionally attached to the ladies that they meet there.

I don't want to spend too much time talking about the insanity of getting romantically involved with these ladies, as it isn't the point of my article, but I should offer an olive branch to those men that have made this mistake. These girls aren't the hardened professionals that you might think they are; they are often working as they do because it is the only way to make enough money to provide for elderly parents, infants, and so on. The compassion that these ladies can stir in the unsuspecting tourist is often enough to turn an otherwise sensible person into a man determined to "save" his poor sweetheart. Sadly for him, it is almost always a scam and the relationship almost always ends in tears – and serious financial loss.

If the majority of Thai girls that have been available to western men have been unrepresentative of the larger body of regular Thai girls, it is probably just as true that the western men that have entered into romantic relationships with them have been equally unrepresentative. Many of them belong more to the hard-drinking, recently divorced, or socially awkward genre that have sometimes struggled to maintain lasting relationships with the ladies back home. There are others of course, there are lots of genuinely decent men that just got taken for a ride, but the body of Westerners as a whole has been a bit below average in terms of quality husband material.

The upshot of all this is just as you would expect, lots of failed relationships, and it has done nothing to help create a positive perception of Thai women in the mind of your typical Westerner.

Thai Dating in the Present and Future

Mainstream Thai attitudes towards westerners have improved a great deal with recent economic development in the country. The last three decades have brought massive inflows of western investment into Thailand and, alongside it, many professional or business expats from the West – and it’s a trend that is set to continue.

At one time a regular Thai lady would have been reluctant to get involved with a foreign man due to the stigma that it brought with it (i.e. the assumption that she must be a working-girl involved with a sex-tourist). These days that stigma is much diminished due to the inflow of more respectable western business visitors, and Thai ladies are increasingly interested in meeting those visitors.

The rapid growth of Thai dating sites that cater primarily for local women who are interested in meeting western men has played a big role in providing an opportunity to meet these men, but the success of these sites is also a testimony to the increased interest from regular Thai ladies – typically there are over five female registered profiles for every western male profile on these sites.

What most westerners don't realize about Thai girls is that, outside of the tourist areas, they are a very conservative bunch with very traditional values. You read that right, I'm talking seriously traditional family values, the sort of thing you think of when you imagine the world that your grandparents grew up in. I won't go into a discussion of female emancipation and economic independence in western society, or the confusion that it has led to between the modern roles of the two genders, I simply point out that in Thailand the traditional model of femininity remains very much the mainstream paradigm.

The good news is that this makes modern Thai dating a very good option if you are looking for a lasting relationship. If you are finding yourself increasingly frustrated by the demands of romantic relationships back home, as I think a sizable number of us ROK readers are, then it might be time to consider Thai dating as an option to be explored. Don't be deterred by the horror stories from the past that you may have heard, just take your time and don't get involved with a girl who works at a bar in Pattaya.

Cultural Differences; the biggest hurdle

Now for the downside; if you were to get involved with a Thai lady you will find that the cultural differences that you will need to get a handle on are not insignificant – they are huge! For many people these differences are not just huge, but they are often insurmountable. If you are tempted by the prospect of Thai dating then I can't urge you strongly enough to do all that you can to learn about the differences in dating culture, my website will help with this. You might have thought that the language barrier is the biggest obstacle to success, but I'd say that it is even more important to understand the cultural differences.

You do need to be able to communicate effectively, but a common mistake us westerners make is to think that communication is just about language, it's not. If you want to communicate well with a Thai lady then you're going to need to understand her emotions and her feelings; you need to be able to understand the things that aren't spoken. You may think that members of the opposite sex are difficult to understand in the west when it comes to dating, but compared to Thai dating I think that the famous Churchill quote applies very well: "it's a riddle, wrapped in a mystery, inside a puzzle…"

It isn't particularly difficult to grasp what the cultural differences are, but it can be very difficult to really embrace them and accept them as though they are your own. It's natural, once you are dating a Thai girl, to think that once you have grown close to each other you can just revert to your own cultural instincts and that all will be fine. It isn't going to work that way; even if you could "westernize" your new girlfriend, you certainly won't westernize her family, and her family will always be an enormous influence on your relationship. In any case, if you want western culture then it's probably best to date a western lady. If, on the other hand, you are ready for a very different way of life, Thai dating has much to offer.

I quite enjoy answering questions on this topic; so please do ask away in the comments below if there is anything you are unsure of.

Read More: Why Modern Dating Is Like Illegal Alaskan Halibut Fishing

Steve Bain
Steve Bain is an Englishman who has traveled to Thailand many times and has lived there, on and off, since 2010. He is a graduate in Economics and is fascinated by the developing economies and cultures of South East Asia. His websites AsiaLibertine.com and Pattaya-Adventures.com are devoted to providing the very best advice for western men.

5 Lines That Potential Wives Cannot Cross

November 11, 2014 | by Hesse Kassel | Link | Original Link

In the modern west the proportion of marriages that end in divorce is very high, up to 50%. The good news is that it does not follow from this that YOU have a 1 in 2 chance of divorce, no sir. Your chance will at least be reduced, because you are smart and will make the decisions that mitigate some of the risk.

So, you meet a girl who might actually fit the bill. If you're looking to increase your chances at maintaining a stable family unit, here are five red lines to establish from the moment the relationship starts.

1. You don't reject me, ever

This first one speaks for itself. Under no circumstance can you accept the idea that she gets to choose if or when to satisfy you or choose to sabotage your joint fertility. Like the other red lines, you need to establish this one well before you sign on the dotted line. Practice this from day one and make it clear before you actually marry and the chance it will be accepted long-term is very high.

If you meet resistance on this matter other than for a very good reason, just quote the line to her. If she continues to protest, then simply next her. Only give sex when it suits you. Making her miss out just a little will only make her keener, so don't sweat, it establishes the basic theme. You control the time and frequency of sex, not her.

This rule is not just important to the fulfillment of your biological needs. More importantly, a woman who will deny you sex early on will only use it to gain greater power over you in the long run. Simply realize this is not a woman you want tethered to your life, and move on.

The obvious exception to this is the first time you have sex. Typically she will control the timing of that for obvious reasons. From the second time onward, any poorly-reasoned denial is a red flag.

2. I make the decisions, not you

You can't operate as an effective unit unless there is a clear decision maker. You are that decision maker. As a rule of thumb that means that all decisions about things outside the house are in your sphere. If she wants some responsibility, it's ok if she chooses how to cook the eggs.

You shall manage money competently and save to create future wealth. After demonstrating that you are a safe pair of hands it will be a lot easier to maintain discipline in this area. If you leave her with power over spending decisions she will squander the lot, so don't give her the option.

I feel bound to point this out, but it should go without saying. You are not going to make this one stick unless you make decisions which are genuinely aimed at mutual benefit. Once you establish a trust that you will make responsible decisions, most girls will happily follow your leadership. Any girl who doesn't is just asking for the door. As a gentleman you are ever-ready to open it for her.

3. Contraceptives and abortion are murder

Yes, that's right. When you are selecting a wife or are married you don't accept such practices. Why? Immediate children, more children, short gaps between children. These all increase her dependence on you and the loyalty that comes with it.

Sluts and pleasure-seeking women will next you right away if you insist on applying this rule. We are looking for a wife, right? So that's a good thing. This rule may require some short delay before having sex. That's fine, we are chasing a good partner for the next 50 years.

If she is marriageable don't be afraid to make her pregnant before marriage. There is nothing like a baby on the way to increase your bargaining power. Since you are sincere in your search you are not harming her. You are helping her by overcoming her female propensity to waste her fertile years on a career, bad boys, and antidepressants.

4. I don't touch children till they can walk

Yes, that's right. Mothering is for mothers. If she tries to insist, just feign incompetence. It's not hard and no girl can resist taking over.

If she claims she has other responsibilities that just means she doesn't have enough time for those other responsibilities. Being a mother is a full-time job and her first priority. Any work, sport, church, or whatever that she can't handle just has to go. Yes, that means everything up until the youngest child enters school.

It's important for your children that they have her full attention. There is no one on Earth who will do as good a job. Child care services are not acceptable substitutes for a mother's time, so don't let her use them. If you are worried about your family living on a single income then either don't get married, knuckle down, or harden up.

Breast feeding is good for children and increases her bond with your children, so make her do it for one year. Then make her stop. Otherwise it might delay the next child and make her search for alternatives to being a wife and mother.

5. You have left your old family and joined mine

Don't actually say this one. Just make it clear that her family and friends from before are not important to you. Their opinions do not matter. Don't spend a lot of time with them. Show them exemplary politeness, but only the required respect and minimum interest.

If she is worth having as a wife then she will get the message and simply attach herself to your family. Under no circumstance should you think that you can establish relations on a win-win basis with such people. They will turn on you the moment there are problems between you and your wife. When that happens, the less influence they have the better.

Now ask yourself how she will find the chance to stray?

Just imagine the situation. Wedding. Pregnant. Child born. Full time mother. No career. Breast feeding. Stop breast-feeding. Constant sex. Pregnant again. Repeat. There is little opportunity for her to get away from the children and her commitment to you, let alone consider alternatives to marriage. By the time the youngest child is in school her SMV relative to yours will have dropped, and you are safer. There are no guarantees in life but this is about as close as it comes to a solid gold one. So, follow these rules and enjoy your traditional marriage.

Read More: The Rising Epidemic Of Cheating Wives Who Want "Freedom"

Hesse Kassel
Hesse Kassel is an Australian economist. He stopped chasing money and chased women and made children instead. He blogs right here

XXX

November 11, 2014 | by XxX | Link | Original Link

IT'S ALL ABOUT

ME

XxX

A Guide To Wedding Game (ROK Mailbag)

November 11, 2014 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Keep your enemies…closer?

Corey writes:

> Does having female friends help or hinder your game?

Having female friends has never helped my game one iota – in fact, on balance I would counsel against it.

For a start, it is well-known that women give out hopeless dating advice of the "just be yourself and she'll fall in love with you" variety. This isn't because they're actively seeking to mislead—it's simply because they don't really know what turns them on themselves. If ever a woman offers to give me dating tips these days I'll tell her no, simply because I will certainly have slept with many more girls than she has (unless she's a lesbian – and even then it's likely I'll have a higher notch-count).

Of course, being friendzoned and having a genuine female friend are two very different things. It goes without saying that you should avoid the former at all costs. As for the latter: I have many female acquaintances, colleagues and girls I get on well with in my social circle who I am not attracted to. But these are women I know circumstantially. At this point my close friends are exclusively male, and I think this is correct and healthy for a heterosexual man. I wouldn't, for example, choose to spend an evening alone with a woman who I was not fucking or seeking to fuck. This is largely because I get more value from interacting with other men who challenge and inspire me; my time is simply better used with them. When the possibility of sex is removed then women—for the most part—offer me remarkably little.

As for the social proof argument—I've heard this bandied about a lot, but I don't know of any successful player who consistently games with a women in tow, unless it's his girlfriend and he is angling for threesomes. I have been to clubs with hot girls on many occasions and it hasn't noticeably improved my results. Nor has being introduced to their friends, which can sometimes feel contrived and awkward. My best wingmen have always been male, and I have probably had the most success while gaming solo (even if my wing was simply elsewhere in the venue at the time).

– Troy Francis

Helpful advice

N/A writes:

> You are all fucking idiots and assholes. You must hang yourselves, for the benefit of the entire world.

No.

-Matt Forney

Mom! The Meat Loaf! Fuck!

Joe writes:

> I'm going to my first wedding. It would be helpful to hear any advice on game in that environment, for bridesmaids/young women.

I've had some good success at weddings. Here is what I would suggest. First, if you are close to the bride or the groom, try to get some intel on which girls are single and if possible, slutty. That will narrow your targets and if you are really close to them, they will put in a good word for you. Also try to get seated at a table with single girls.

Come dressed to the nines. This means fitted suit, tie and pocket square. People get hammered at weddings, so be prepared to drink up and have cigarettes on you in case girls go out for a smoke break. it is highly suggested to be staying at the hotel where most the guests are staying so you can end the night at the same place as the available girl.

Other than that, just have fun and be the life of the party. This does not mean you have to necessarily be a clown, but get people to drink, suggest people go dance and so on. The girls are all horny and sad at weddings anyway, so you are working with a good handicap from the beginning.

– Law Dogger

I know where it is! Poosy paradise—the most guarded secret we have.

TeutonicLore writes:

> My question relates to how you see the current Alpha havens in 10-15 years time.
>
> It would appear that Feminism is having a ripple effect looking at the articles about Ukraine and Brazil in particular where technology coupled with feminism seems to have had an effect (and not in a good way) on the women there, since I > haven't been for a few years (EE in particular) I cant say just HOW bad it is.

>
> So my question is; Do you see places like EE and South America following the same script as America, UK and Australia with aforementioned Anglo nations reverting back to a post-feminist times (ripple effect) or do you see places like Eastern Europe, Asia and South America becoming on the list of places NOT to go and we have to find new places to get away from the feminist influence??

I can't speak to Asia, and I have not spent enough time in South America. However as to EE while I can give my opinion (and I will), it is of course pure speculation.

I don't think EE has hit that point yet. It is much more resistant than the West, and the girls are still one generation removed from being entirely Westernized. For example while the Russian or Ukrainian girls would have iPhones and be Instagram whores, they would still cook and clean like champions and know how to please a man. I think the wall coming down in the East is a bit more resistant and will be for a longer time too.

Eventually and sadly however, I think it will fall.

– Law Dogger

…but at least he won the spelling bee

Young Homeschooler writes:

> I'll cut to the chase immediately. I'm in my senior year of homeschool/online school in a Christian environment. I have little to no social interaction, and almost all of my life is taken up with ridiculously hard courses that my mom thinks I need in order to go to college. My parents refuse to let me get my drivers license, so I can't go anywhere. My school is too hectic for me to get a job. Thanks to my isolated life, I have no friends I could stay with. To add to my problems, I'm still 17 and therefore a minor.

What would an alpha male do in this situation? How do I deal with it? Just curl up and live in misery until I go to college?

What you're going through is incredibly tough, but the fact you're already seeking out other points of view and asking for help shows you're on the right track.

The thing you have to realize is that the only power your parents have is that they control the money in your life. If you can find alternative sources of income or simply go without what they offer, you don't have to obey their commands. Decide what their support is worth, and if they demand more than you're willing to give, stand your ground and maintain your point of view. In my case, I had to be willing to look my parents in the eye and say I was willing to starve or be homeless, rather than live under their rules. It might sound dramatic, but you will respect yourself so much more if you're that uncompromising – that alpha – with your boundaries.

Seek out real world support. A few friends go a long way. Lie a little if you have to. Tell your parents the skills you're interested in learning will look good on your college application, or that you need a drivers license to go to go to extracurricular activities. Based on your question, it sounds like your parents value college and religion, and you might be able to leverage those two values to get what you want. Once you're got a little support, it will be easier to get even more.

Remember that your situation will change. If you go to college, they will have less power over you. Be ready to work hard when you get out of this situation. There will be a lot of basic stuff everyone else knows that you'll have to learn. Normal socializing may feel like a foreign language. You may even want to seek out counseling, therapy, or mentors to untangle the negative thinking your family has given you. Just be patient with yourself, enjoy the process, and know that you're capable of pulling yourself out of this situation.

– Runsonmagic

That's all for this installment. If you would like a question answered by the ROK staff, send it via email or the anonymous form.

Read More: Do You Love Game?

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

A Man’s Guide To Women Based Purely On Looks

November 12, 2014 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

There has been something that has been bothering me lately. Bothering me so much so I feel compelled to write about it in the silly hope it will reach at least one male who has voluntarily cloaked his eyes of this necessary truth. And I see it everywhere, in America at least. Unfortunately it is nothing new at all, and something we have all commonly designated as one of the main contributors to the female attitude encompassed in western society these days.

This is the valuation of women higher than their actual worth by men. I know you have seen it too. The well-dressed, moderately in-shape man walking down the street holding a chubster’s hand. The decent looking guy with money having a Friday night dinner with a girl who could be a face double for Sarah Jessica Parker. Even the average guy who is being yelled at by an obese American girl who wears yoga pants, despite it causing ocular pain to those in her immediate orbit. Please guys, stop it. I’m not even asking you to stop it for the greater good of our society (which is important), but for yourselves.

Let me put it bluntly: a woman’s looks heavily dictate the role she plays in a man’s life. Yet this is rarely the case in America and increasingly abroad. Instead I see what I described above, and just want to grab the offending male and shake him. Shake him hard. Tell him “it doesn’t have to be this way, it really doesn’t.” I’ve actually done that before with friends and the response I received was along the lines of “you don’t understand love like I do.” So let me try and break it down this way instead, with a very rudimentary and non-exhaustive categorization of how men should treat women of various levels of attractiveness. Each category range will follow with a short cheat sheet.

As always, a few disclaimers. First, I fully understand looks are not everything. The ability of a girl to pull a Gandalf and magically make her teeth disappear during a blowjob counts for something. Knowing her way around a kitchen and having the desire to be there is not to be overlooked. Having slept with 3 guys in her life versus 30 this year puts her in a different category all together (see this recent article on how to categorize based on this factor).

If she's bisexual, by all means engage in a short term relationship even if she is a peg below the standard. And that is why my bolded statement above says heavily, as opposed to exclusively. Nonetheless for purposes of this article, we are focusing purely on looks. Put aside the bisexual blowjob Italian cook for the time being.

Second, I will not hold myself out as holier than thou. I've deviated from this framework in the past and may do so again in the future. Everyone is human. But as long as you are progressing towards this structure, as I have found myself to do so the older and more discriminating I get, the better man you will become.

The 1-10 Scale

[image]

In what will be the topic of one of my future articles, realize that people's scales are all over the place and should be taken with a grain of salt. There is huge amount of subjectivity (blondes vs. brunettes; tits vs. ass; slavic vs. latin flavor; etc.). Additionally, experience plays a role. The guy who's never had sex will rate a five closer to an eight than the casting agent for a model photoshoot who sees quality day in and day out.

That said, I have yet to find a more accurate scale—and one I use myself—than our fellow writer Tuthmosis's 1-10 scale. You can read the quick article for a full analysis of the scale. To simplify matters for purposes of this article, I will copy Tuth's scale below for reference:

> 0: No Such Thing. Has a dick.
>
> 1: Hideously Unattractive. A monster. Disfigured or irretrievably mutilated. Has two heads, is missing an eye, etc.
>
> 2: Very Unattractive. Disproportionate, morbidly obese.
>
> 3: Unattractive. Ugly, fat, and/or old.
>
> 4: Almost Bangable. But definitely doesn't pass the boner test. Still not good-looking.
>
> 5: Merely Bangable. Barely passes the boner test. You'd be pretty embarrassed to be seen with her.
>
> 6: Almost Cute. She might be cute if one or two things were different, but they're not. You may not be super-embarrassed to be seen with her, but you certainly wouldn't be proud, and you definitely wouldn't willingly bring her around to anything.

> 7: Solidly Cute. Zero embarrassment, even some nascent pride in being seen with her. You could bring her to things without looking bad, or losing any of the luster on your game.
>
> 8: Hot-Cute. Would be straight-up proud to be seen with her or bring her to things. This is often the sweet spot for long-term relationship material.
>
> 9: Smoking Hot. This is a girl who can easily monetize her beauty. You're going out of your way to be seen with her.
>
> 10: Perfection. A theoretical abstraction that only exists in the laboratory.

Cheat Sheet Definitions:

At the end of each category I will list a quick cheat sheet. Just so we are all on the same page, here is my definition of each classification.

Cheat Sheet:

- Long Term Relationship ("LTR"): Over three months of actual dating. To her and the world objectively, you are exclusive. (I will withhold my thoughts on male monogamy for now.)
- Short Term Relationship ("STR"): Up to three months of actual dating. To the extent she is seeing other men, you are her number one.
- Fuck Buddy: You see each other for sex, but occasionally grab a drink or a sandwich. You may watch a movie together. She may join you out at a bar with your friends here and there.
- Booty Call: The only times you see each other are strictly for sex, and never outside each other's residences.
- One Night Stand: Self-explanatory.

Of course when you get to fuck buddy and higher categories, personality does matter. After all even in the fuck buddy category you will be spending some non-coital time with this person. However I want to stress again that for this article, it's just an aesthetic analysis; personality and other factors is a discussion meant for another time.

The 1 – 4 Group:

If a girl is in the 1-4 group (I am not even going to discuss the 0 category), then she only can be mentioned in two scenarios. First, if you have had sex with only 1-4 girls in your life, I won't judge you if you go dumpster diving to get some experience. Most careers start with demeaning, shitty work before you get to the point of where you want to be. Once you've had sex with 5 girls, there's no reason to go below a 5 on the scale. Except…

If you are blackout drunk. And I mean to the point of zero recollection, not the typical overindulgence in alcohol that most people engage in on weekends. I'll even demonstrate with a personal example. One night in Vegas, I suited up and went out to a club. The first girl I hit on took to me, and she was gorgeous. We danced, made out and were ready to enjoy each other's company for the night before the mother hen of the group showed up and whisked her away.

Distraught, and as a younger lad, I turned to more drinks to quell my disappointment. Heavily inebriated now, I found a new girl with a great body but housing a face mimicking that of Abe Vigoda. Made out with her, and then lost her. However, my downward progression of that night did not end there.

More alcohol, and I go dark. Wake up in the morning on my bed, naked, condom wrapper on the floor. I only have flashes of the night after the Abe Vigoda girl, akin to those an alien abductee would have following some experimentation as portrayed in a sci-fi novel. My friends tell me I left with a beast, a 3 at most. I have no recollection other than a flash of blonde hair, and a millisecond of fornicative memory.

Three hours later at lunch, my boxers fall out of my pants as I'm sitting hungover as all hell eating a burger. That's how messed up I was that even the morning after not only did I not realize I had no underwear on, but didn't notice it was dangling loose in my pants. If you truly have no conception of consciousness, you get a pass. But don't make it a habit.

As a man who respects himself you should not be engaging these girls in any way other than the rare cases identified above. Society and I beg of you.

Cheat Sheet:

- Long Term Relationship: No
- Short Term Relationship: No
- Fuck Buddy: No
- Booty Call: No
- One Night Stand: Rarely

The 5:

The all-common 5. We seem them everywhere. On the streets, at the bars, in Whole Foods buying sugar-free muffins. Similar to the 1-4 range, their engagement should be in only certain scenarios. Almost always a result of excessive, yet not blackout amounts of alcohol. The “last call at the club” slut coupled with a dry streak. While not set aside to only rare occasions as allowed by its predecessor category, it should not be made a habit.

Your friends will poke fun at you, but will forgive you. Everyone has fallen off the path once or twice. But always remember that you can, and will, do better than her. She is just a five, and as Tuthmosis accurately describes, “merely bangable.” Is that what you want, a girl that just “merely” reaches the level of something so pursued after by the male sex ? Exactly.

Sometimes you have been driving down a highway for a very long time and need to urinate badly. Of course we would like to pull over at the Ritz Carlton and enter a golden-tiled bathroom with scents of lavender and Egyptian cloth hand towels, but that is not always an option. Sometimes the dinky gas station conveniently located just off the exit will have to do.

Cheat Sheet:

- Long Term Relationship: No
- Short Term Relationship: No
- Fuck Buddy: No
- Booty Call: No

- One Night Stand: Sometimes

The 6:

[image]

Most girls you meet will fall into either this category or the next one (the 7). As long as it is not the only type of girl you engage, nobody will give you shit for hitting on or even banging a 6. When your buddy asks you what happened when you left with the 6 you just met at the bar, you will answer that you banged her. In essence, there is no shame in the 6 under certain scenarios.

Most would agree they are bangable, but not to the point of taking them out for dinners or bringing them around your friends consistently. If you are bored on a Wednesday night text her to come over. If you are out with your buddies at a bar and she wants to meet you there first instead of directly to your apartment, worse things can happen than you conceding on a one-time basis.

But note, this is actually the most dangerous category. The 6s are the most likely to finagle you into a relationship. The sheer number of 6s means you are bound to run into some that have a decent personality, or amazing blowjob skills. Your male hamster will start spinning, thinking about how her tight body overlooks the weird haircut and acne she has. Or how her cute face overrides her baby fat.

She satisfies you during booty calls to the point where you think, hey why not let me go grab a sandwich with her. It starts as one or two times which is arguably acceptable, but can quickly lead to increased rendezvous that should not be undertaken. There is no wrong or right answer to having a 6 as a fuck buddy. Just tread carefully my friends…

Cheat Sheet:

- Long Term Relationship: No
- Short Term Relationship: No
- Fuck Buddy: Sure I guess
- Booty Call: Yes
- One Night Stand: Yes

The 7:

Seven's are the sweet spot, and the type of girls you take pleasure in meeting. They are cute girls. You enjoy looking at them, you don't mind introducing them to your friends, and don't mind being seen out with them. If you take them home the same night, while you don't go around bragging about it you also don't mind giving yourself a virtual pat on the back and slight smirk the next morning. With the ever-increasing number of 6s and below in today's world, the 7s and higher become more of a commodity.

And because they are cute, they qualify to be placed in all but the long term relationship category. Short term relationships are great with a 7. Find one that you like, and because she is a 7 she can keep your brain aroused enough for a few months to let you take a break from the efforts required for actively gaming girls. The 7 is cute enough that you don't feel like you are missing out by taking a month or two off from the chase.

As to why they are not suited for a long term relationship, the reason is simple—there is just better out there in the world. There are 8s and above. So why, even though she is a cute girl and may have the personality traits to go along with it, settle for a 7? It's a very very tough thing to advise against and even harder to put in practice. I've fallen into the trap myself several times.

The answer of course lies in something that most men have yet to experience. The feeling of dating an 8, which is exponentially better (though admittedly harder to pull off) than a 7. I've dabbled in this before and it does make a difference. Try to keep the 7s at bay for the short term relationships and everything below. Instead, use the time you would put LTR'ing a 7 into bettering yourself for the 8.

Cheat Sheet:

- Long Term Relationship: No

- Short Term Relationship: Yes
- Fuck Buddy: Yes
- Booty Call: Yes
- One Night Stand: Yes

The 8, 9 and 10:

[image]

When I talk about this last category, I'm talking about a true 8 or higher. Not some internet jockey's description of the "HB8" he took home from the club after displaying alpha game and throwing out six negs and push-pull tactics. People have a tendency to overinflate the rankings. A piece of advice—don't trust anyone's rankings until you see it for yourself in person.

Alright, enough of my rant. The last set can be grouped together because these girls are not only a pleasure to the eyes, but check off the "YES" mark on all the categories on the cheat sheet. Nobody says no to having a one night stand, booty call, or fuck buddy that is an 8 or higher. And in fact, this may be easier to achieve than getting an 8 into a relationship. Party girls and college girls for example are more likely to fall into the 8 category based solely on looks, yet they are more likely to engage in these casual arrangements based purely on sex.

As for the relationships, assuming the 8+ has the personality traits to go with it—and I realize that is a big assumption—you are not doing yourself a disservice of even a long-term relationship if that is in fact something you actually want and desire. Most men even in the manosphere, despite not wanting to admit it, still hold out the desire for that unicorn—the 8 or a 9 who is not only that in looks but personality too. So should you find it, kudos to you and I certainly won't fault you. (As to whether such unicorns exist, that's for another time…)

Cheat Sheet:

- Long Term Relationship: Yes
- Short Term Relationship: Yes
- Fuck Buddy: Yes
- Booty Call: Yes
- One Night Stand: Yes

Why Should I Care?

A valid question always arises in this discussion. Who cares if I take a 6 out for drinks or dinner? What if I want to? Sure, go ahead. But from my own growth as a man, especially in this past year, I realized how much more valuable time is than a fresh notch. Are you going to date the 6 long term? If so, then I don't know what to tell you. If not, which is the appropriate response, then what do you value more: a new notch or more time to yourself? If she wants to come over and fuck, great tell her to come right over. But don't waste your time on something that is below average.

A lot of this stems from what I consider one of the biggest realizations a man can make with respect to game and women—and that is the abundance mentality. Once you realize there is not only a sea of women out there, but a fucking massive ocean's worth you will understand that if this 6 doesn't want to come right over and fuck, another one will. Save your time and efforts of dating for a girl that brings you the visual pleasure you require, meeting the minimum aesthetics necessary for a relationship. At that point you can then determine if she has the other qualities sufficient to engage in such a relationship.

A Message To The Ladies:

If I offended you, I really don't care. The fact of the matter is the old adage "it's what's inside that counts" only comes into play once your outside meets a necessary minimum standard.

Aside from some sort of facial deformity, in almost all cases it is easy to elevate yourself to at least a 7 on the scale if not objectively, then at least for a group of men subjectively. And once at a 7 you can work on your domestic, feminine, sexual and personality skills to qualify for a being a higher catch. Anyway, here's a quick and dirty for the ladies on elevating to a 7:

- Step One: Don't be fat;
- Step Two: Don't cut your hair short;
- Step Three: Put on heels and a dress;
- Step Four: Use makeup (as necessary) and adhere to hygiene.

It really can be that simple. As a Ukrainian girl once told me, "There is no such thing as an ugly girl, just a lazy one."

Read Next: Why So Ugly?

L.D. Hume
L.D. Hume, formerly known as Law Dogger, is an attorney and the litigation partner of his law firm. A traditionalist at heart, he travels often in an attempt to expose himself to as many cultures across the globe as possible. His column runs every so often and he can be found on Twitter as well.

Twitter Is Partnering With SJWs To Prevent Women From Facing Consequences

November 12, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

As of Thursday, Twitter has begun partnering with a nonprofit organization known as Women, Action, and the Media (WAM) to handle online sexual harassment. [Author smirks at his own Twitter trolling.] Investor place wrote:

> The WAM website now has a comprehensive form where you report 'gendered harassment.' The organization will then 'escalate' relevant reports to Twitter within 24 hours.
>
> One-time offenders may not be subject to any action from WAM because one tweet may not be considered as harassment.

The Atlantic does not believe this measure is extreme enough. The two employees of WAM can only flag abuse reports for Twitter to view more quickly, but they cannot actually moderate comments or users. It is planned to only be a temporary partnership. The Atlantic claims that delegating this large task to two nonprofit workers is a negligence and that more attention should be given.

Dodgy Claims

The Atlantic claims that the internet is not "a safe space for women," considering the force of "threats" from Gamergate and Pew's finding that 25% of women have been sexually harassed online and 26% have been stalked.

I can understand that threats of plausible and specific violence against known feminists should be considered unsafe and should not be tolerated, but the implications of the statistics are laughable. “Sexual Harassment” and “Stalking” have become such vague terms, and if it is only done on the internet, how does that make it unsafe? If I look up a girl’s Facebook page, in what way is she in danger? If I post a picture of a hater with a “Would you bang?” caption, does she need to flee her home for fear of rapists?

Another issue is that the Atlantic only wants to protect women from sexual harassment. But how many men on this site and others have been accused of having a small penis? To give the female equivalent, I’ve never seen a man on the internet tell a woman she has a loose vagina. Sure, a man may call a woman ugly, but that is just from what he can visibly see, not conjectures about her genitalia, hence the term “private parts.” It seems that the people who most cry for love and acceptance are always the most hateful. Men slut-shame, and women small penis-shame, and there will always be a double standard.

The Atlantic states that Twitter is an extremely open forum. Anyone can send a message to anyone. That’s the beauty of Twitter, though. It puts everyone amongst each other. Sure, women will be made uncomfortable, but one will notice that it is almost always only if the women provoke the men to insult them. I doubt a single reader of ROK searches for completely random girls on Twitter for the sole purpose of ruining their day, because most human beings just are not that sociopathic and sadistic. What the leftists refuse to admit is that we hate on them because they first hated on us. I believe that’s in the Bible somewhere.

Internet hatred cuts both ways. Why one ideology gets a pass and another does not is beyond me, because an open discussion is necessary for any kind of societal progress. If our ideas were truly stupid and irrelevant, feminists could leave them alone, knowing we would die without ever breeding. But not only will they not leave us alone, they rarely confront us on our own talking points. They dance around the issues and mock us like they schoolyard bullies they are, because power for them ultimately about control and not about betterment.

This comic from Friedman herself is telling concerning her motives and specific aims. We see a woman drunk on what modicum of power she has, perfectly exhibiting the modern woman. You could put her in a glass case in the American Museum of Natural History.

Leftists never attempt to counter our claims about journalism or sexual ethics, because at heart they cannot think of a solid reasoning. For example, if you were to tell me that it is in the best interest of mankind to gather up some specific subculture on the internet send them to the sun, I could easily counter your argument with some kind of soft Kantian ethic or history lesson. Perhaps you would still disagree with me, but at least I confronted you head-on and had a conversation. However, the leftists will not confront us on our beliefs, because they cannot think of any halfway-decent counter based on logical reasoning alone. Tell me my fallacies, give me a syllogism, but do anything except throw an ad hominem, a tu quoque, or a strawman.

I especially like this comic in how they admit that our ideology is extremely contagious. I wonder whether or not they did that consciously. You can feel the panic and impending doom, as though we actually are something dangerous and powerful. I have always said that you can tell the most about a society by its literature and art.

Nothing New Here

Twitter is enabling WAM to attempt the ultimate feminist goal from time immemorial: a world without consequences to women. This is not so different from the “Find someone who loves you for you and won’t try to change you” ethic they tell girls, even though I have never met a man who tried to change a woman beyond her moral flaws.

Executive director of WAM Jaclyn Friedman would seem to disagree about women opening themselves up to verbal assault on Twitter. “I see this as a free speech issue,” she claimed, believing that without such measures, women and other types of minorities will feel uncomfortable speaking their opinion.

Perhaps there is some merit to this argument, considering that women who write provocative feminist rhetoric on the internet are often verbally assaulted. However, that does not compare at all to how often and (generally speaking) how rudely anti-feminists are assaulted. The sole differences lie in ideology and sex organs (unless one had them removed, in which case it would get a free pass). It appears as though WAM is using sex-neutral language to describe their Twitter policies, but realistically, you can bet money that they will report almost entirely against men.

The cold reality of the world is that life really is that difficult. People really are that brutal, especially in a place without consequences like on the internet. Being gay, colored, or female is only maybe 5% of the reason why life is that hard. It would be wise to learn to game the system instead of kick against it.

Future Consequences

The great question is, "Will this make Twitter unsafe for men"? In the short term, I do not believe so. Two female employees of a non-profit cannot police the whole world. They can jump at the big scandals, but many of the other isolated incidents will be unnoticed. One wonders whether they will have enough hours in the day to even report all the big scandals. Another issue is that it may cause Twitter to neglect reports not given by WAM.

However, this outcome still represents bad tidings. With every civil rights decision of the last 100 years, at first there was a great controversy and laxity, but as time went on, people demanded even more rigor. Eventually, other major websites will be pressured into working with these kinds of activists, and then they will be pressured into have a large and permanent in-house staff to guard against "gendered harassment."

Then you will find that it will be unacceptable for the small internet companies to go without such a staff, and women will refuse to be on any social website without a man behind a computer in an office to protect her from other men. They cycle of patriarchy continues.

Twitter's decision is not innovative. Reddit and 4chan have blocked comments about Gamergate, and Youtube cancelled Sam Pepper's partnership because of his sexist videos. Twitter themselves have previously white knighted against Red Pill men. However, with this new partnership, Twitter is the first large company to enact this much of a unilateral and broad-sweeping measure.

The SJWs, a small minority, are making their screeching voices heard, but how long will the masses put up with it? Perhaps the masses will eventually come to accept this new way of life, or perhaps the SJWs will eventually fly too close to the sun and fall into the sea with melted wings—as when they pushed gamers too far in Gamergate.

Read More: Anti-#GamerGate SJWs Claim Victimhood While Doxxing Their Enemies

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Has Russell Brand Lost The Message?

November 12, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Russell Brand is currently on the receiving end of a lot of flak in the UK media. This is more-or-less unprecedented. A few haters aside, Brand has been largely untouchable as a comedian, actor and, latterly political commentator since first appearing as a presenter on MTV in 2000. OK, his films, including Forgetting Sarah Marshall (2008) and a remake of Arthur (2011) have hardly set him up as the new De Niro, but his undeniable charisma meant that for the most part his popularity rode consistently high among mainstream audiences.

He has also been much-feted in the manosphere (including here) for his social savvy, and attendant ability with the ladies, which culminated in his brief marriage to pop star Katy Perry in 2010. Whatever your personal opinion on Brand's flamboyant appearance – a mash up of Captain Sparrow, Keith Richards and a Victorian chimney-sweep – he certainly challenges the one-dimensional belief that alpha is the sole domain of roid-headed bulk-beasts in muscle t-shirts.

Things started to go wrong when Brand began commenting publicly on political and social inequalities as he saw them, joining demonstrations by activist groups including Occupy Wall Street, and the protestors at the G-20 London summer summit in 2009. He also wrote to The Independent newspaper to condemn Israeli assaults on Gaza in the same year. This led to a number of admittedly very well-written articles for The Guardian (the UK's leading liberal newspaper, which has a global voice due to its highly-influential website).

In 2013, Brand was invited to edit an issue of left-leaning political magazine The New Statesman, a decision which led to this combative interview on Newsnight with heavyweight pundit Jeremy Paxman. Paxman takes umbrage at Brand's famous refusal to vote and therefore participate in what he views as a broken system:

Here, Brand outlines the problems that he perceives in society: the planet being destroyed, the creation of a global underclass, and the exploitation of the poor by governments who care only for the interests of big business. His diagnosis, while unoriginal, is not unsound. Many ROK readers who take more of an Ayn Rand tack would still recognize his portrait of a mainstream "system" created by complicity between governments, commerce, and global banking that is antithetical to the interests of many groups and individuals.

A year later and Brand appears to have become a full-time activist with a YouTube show called The Trews ("True News with Russell Brand"), and a new book fleshing out the ideas he discussed with Paxman, Revolution. The reviews have been patchy at best, and frequently downright scathing. The problem is that while Brand articulates his bugbears well enough, he seems unable to provide a rigorous alternative.

The Atlantic says that the book is "ostensibly a manifesto for the peaceful dismantling of capitalism and the establishment of small anarco-egalitarian communities without centralized power structures." Big business is a target, of course. How to handle the motor trade? Stop exporting cars as "other countries have their own fucking cars." Personal debt? Simply cancel it. Corporations not paying tax? "If they don't pay tax, we'll reclaim their assets and give them to the people who work there to run." While well-intentioned, Brand's ideas are infused with a kind of hippy-dippy peace-and-love idealism, but with little sense of how they might play out in the real world.

A second Newsnight interview, this time with new incumbent Evan Davis, featured an overbearing Brand who apparently favored shouting down his opponent rather than engaging in a more considered debate.

Parklife

Brand's evangelism has caused such amusement on social media that a rash of Tweeters recently began appending the word "PARKLIFE" to the end of some of his more flamboyant utterances, thus likening them to the convoluted monologue by actor Phil Daniels on Blur's 1994 single of the same name. To his credit, he has taken the joke in good spirits and this week put out a parody of the track which further promotes his message:

Regrettably though, Brand is now seen by many as a figure of fun rather than the serious political figurehead he would no doubt like to become, not least because a millionaire film star railing against the evils of personal wealth is always going to have a hard time being taken seriously.

Brand and Spirituality

Brand's forays into spirituality in the last decade can be found at the root of his transformation from comic into would-be revolutionary. He writes that "the spiritual Revolution, the Revolution we are about to realize, will be fast because the organisms are in place." Brand, as is well-documented—not least by him—is a former drug addict who now adheres to a strict program of abstinence from all mind-altering substances to stay sober.

For those who are unaware, twelve step programs such as AA (and NA, essentially an off-shoot for problematic drug users), which are frequently the recourse for addicts who have been through rehabilitation treatment, are run along spiritual lines. The second step (after the addict has admitted powerlessness over the substance or behavior that troubles them) states that former members "came to believe that a Power greater than [themselves] could restore [them] to sanity."

The third step says that they "made a decision to turn [their] will and [their] lives over to the care of God as [they] understood him." The recovering addict will then "clean house" by making a list of people they have harmed and making amends to them, before continuing to pray and mediate and generally live a spiritual life in the future.

The eleventh step is key: "[We] sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood him." For Carl Jung, alcoholism and addiction are "the spiritual thirst of our being for wholeness, expressed in medieval language: the union with God." For Jung, a "spiritual or religious experience" is required to escape their tyranny.

Recovering addicts will frequently find themselves attracted to a variety of different religions or spiritual disciplines as they search for this closer contact with a higher power.

While I have no idea whether Brand is an AA member or not, this would certainly explain his interest in Buddhism and Hare Krishna, and his increasing tendency toward "everything is everything, dude"-style pontification.

To be clear: AA, which will be eighty years old next year, is without doubt a phenomenal organization that has helped millions of people to stop drinking and to stay stopped. In spite of its liberal use of thew word "God," the program is spiritual rather than religious, meaning that it is open to those of all faiths and denominations, as well as to atheists. Members are simply encouraged to seek out a higher power of their own understanding, which doesn't have to be a god from one of the monotheistic religions.

For real alcoholics and addicts (those for whom the idea of will power is a laughable irrelevance) who want to quit using and go on to live a productive life, it is almost certainly the best available form of treatment. I have personally known many people whose lives have been transformed utterly by attending meetings, getting a good sponsor and working through the twelve steps.

The problem is that Brand uses the steps as the basis for Revolution, as though the components of his own personal recovery are fit for purpose for rebuilding global society from the bottom up. Profound personal change brought about by any means can often feel so powerful that the individual it affects imagines that others will be touched similarly. But to moot individual spiritual enlightenment as a means to enabling widespread structural change in world politics and finance simply sounds naïve.

Russell Brand's intentions appear good, but his Revolution has started a conversation he seems ill-equipped to finish.

To revolutionize your love life by meeting and attracting beautiful women, click here.

Read More: Portrait of a Modern Career Woman

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Preventing Hangovers With A Pre-Drinking Drink

November 12, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

ROK's November sponsor is Prevail, which sells a hangover prevention drink that you consume before heavy drinking. Here's a message from the owner:

> PREVAIL
> HANGOVER PREVENTION FOOD SUPPLEMENT
> PREVAIL
>
> Would you like to enjoy a night out with your friends without worrying about waking up hungover the morning after?
>
> We are pleased to introduce 'Prevail' the healthy new hangover prevention drink. Made from 100% natural ingredients Prevail is easy to use and proven to prevent hangovers. Simply empty your sachet of Prevail into a drink of water and consume before drinking alcohol.
>
> If you suffer from particularly bad hangovers our studies have shown that consuming a second Prevail drink before bed delivers the best results.
>
> Order a sachet of Prevail before the end of the month, and we'll give you a second one completely free.
>
> If you're not 100% happy with the results of Prevail, we promise to refund your money with our money back guarantee.

I have slowed down drinking as my age advances, but this sounds useful for a weekend binge fest. Check out Prevail to learn more.

If you are interested in becoming an ROK sponsor, visit our sponsorship page. You can also drop a couple bucks in our tip jar.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Tune In Tomorrow Night For Culture War Live Chat With Me And Quintus Curtius

November 12, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Two weeks ago, Quintus Curtius and I did a spontaneous live Youtube show where we talked about the ongoing culture war. It inadvertantly served as an overview to red pill thinking. If you missed it, you can listen to the recording below (start at 26:55 to skip the technical difficulties):

We're doing another show tomorrow at 7pm EST. You can tune in at this Youtube address or click play below:

Do you have questions you want us to answer or topics you want discussed? Leave them below in the comments.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

This Arthur Chu Interview Shows How SJWs Play Professional Victims

November 13, 2014 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

GamerGate has been going on for more than two months now and shows no signs of running out of steam. That's because GamerGate is a genuine grassroots consumer movement, without a leader who can be shamed (unless you count Tyrone) or a political agenda that can be subverted. Also, it's partly because SJWs play the victim card to the most absurd extremes imaginable, exposing their views to the public.

The most recent example is the interview of Arthur Chu, a self-proclaimed nerd blogger, on the David Pakman show. Before we get into the cringefest that is the interview itself, let's step back and examine why victimhood works for SJWs, how they use it and why neither Arthur Chu nor any other man will ever be able to gain that coveted victim status, no matter how fanatically they push the agenda.

"Stop rescuing me, oppressor!"

Men have a natural protector instinct towards women. They are to be sheltered, provided for and taken care of by any means necessary. This is a normal urge that helped the human race survive times of great turmoil. It is nothing to be ashamed of. However, according to the SJW philosophy, this urge is merely a way patriarchy controls, oppresses, and demeans women, by turning them into inanimate objects that have no agency and have to be fetched by the hero. This isn't my definition, this is how Anita Sarkeesian actually worded it in her "Damsel in distress trope" video.

Naturally, she is completely wrong, since the purpose of that trope is simply to provide an additional motive for players to play and finish the game, not to brainwash the player. Note the word "damsel." It's there for a reason and implies a woman of higher status, someone who carries herself with grace, dignity, and elegance. There is a reason Super Mario rescues Princess Peach and Link is helping Princess Zelda and not just any two random peasant girls.

Rescuing a princess, even if it's just make-believe, makes the men who perform the rescue feel noble and righteous. Playing a game that makes you feel good means you will have fond memories of it and probably buy the sequel when it comes out. Again, there is a good reason why Super Mario and Legend of Zelda are arguably the two most enduring franchises in the gaming history.

However, that same protector instinct isn't needed in the modern society because there aren't that many dangers around. SJWs have also pushed for and basically criminalized or shamed into oblivion all the basic courtesies that a man used to extend to a woman. This created an atmosphere where women no longer feel the need to be damsels, while men lost a great source of motivation to become better and conquer the outside world, withdrawing instead into virtual worlds where they can do whatever they want. And who can blame them for acting that way? Would you come to this woman's aid if she was in danger?

If you feel masochistic and want to hear this banshee's wails, knock yourself out.

"…except when I want to be rescued!"

However, SJWs realized the protector instinct is so powerful that men will do anything to help a woman in danger, if the danger is big enough. But, there are no bears or crocodiles around, so what could that danger be? In the end, SJWs chose rape instead of murder or maiming, because rape implies that the woman is chaste and pure, again playing into the "save the princess" trope.

"I was raped!" thus becomes the equivalent of "I am a princess, save me!" This is why for SJWs everything is rape. It simply has to be, or they lose their coveted victim status.

Ironically, this also means SJWs turned victimhood into a position of privilege.

With all the above in mind, let's finally take a look at the Arthur Chu's interview:

In this video we can see the lame depths to which Arthur Chu sinks in an attempt to play the outdated role of a noble protector, including "drawing away heat" from SJW fair maidens he considers his friends. I wonder what they would say if they knew Arthur was putting them in the patriarchal role of a helpless woman who can't act or speak on her own behalf. What Arthur doesn't understand is that being a hardcore SJW ally does not grant him any kind of lasting respect or authority in the inner circle. Even though he was one of the authors penning one of the original "gamers are dead" articles that started the whole GamerGate movement, as soon as he becomes a burden, SJWs will ditch him without regret.

"And don't expect anything in return!"

Arthur also pulls the victim card and tries to say he was raped or something along those lines. It's not clear what actually happened to him because the host of the show cleverly avoided asking the question, though Arthur prompted him to do it, probably so he can claim he was verbally abused or ambushed. Interestingly enough, SJWs consider that being raped and being a victim do not apply to men at all, which again shows how little Arthur Chu understands the inner teachings of SJWs philosophy. He is privy only to the outside circle of information, in which propaganda has the stated goal of "gender equality."

SJWs undoing will be when they start overplaying the victim card, which is already happening. Anita Sarkeesian has recently held a presentation where she called for mass censoring and blocking of all "unwanted content" from social networks, including changes to legislation that basically allow for anonymous civil lawsuits.

When the feels brigade starts threatening the very essence of the Internet, a massive backlash will form from people who previously had no interest in joining the fight and we might see cracks in the SJW structure. We waited for heroes, but who would have thought it would be gamers?

Read More: Anti-#GamerGate SJWs Claim Victimhood While Doxxing Their Enemies

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

34 Aphorisms For A Civilization In Decline

November 13, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

1. In our time, a great man is like God: probably he doesn't exist, and if he does, no one can see him.

2. We all prostitute ourselves in the marketplace, and so we all must use protection: not tell the truth, unless it's what people want to hear, which, like a fair marketplace, we don't really want.

3. The only way to have a holiday in our time is not to indulge the pleasure principle: to take a day off from the incessant work of pleasure.

4. Democracy was the worst thing that ever happened to great men. Still, democracy would never have been if there had been more great men and the great men had been greater.

5. Those smiling snivelers at the bank, the supermarket, the restaurant—really, everywhere—may be helpful, but they are also odiously insincere, and their behavior is a distinctly American vulgarity, like the common lack of disdain for it.

6. If only I were better at multitasking, but alas, most tasks are worth so little.

7. You would think that as a society becomes more prosperous, manners and the sense of courtesy would improve. Actually, the opposite is true, and this is yet another example of the truth that without an elite minority to lead and rule, the majority will mar virtually everything with which it comes into contact.

8. To the naive young, America is a vast carnival. To the cynical old, a horrific satire.

9. Today most of us have neither community nor solitude.

10. Those who once feared God now fear the other person's knowledge of their deep insincerity.

11. The virtues we lack most today are sincerity and courage.

12. By American dream the majority understand mere pleasure and comfort, not equality and liberty. The latter is too great a burden, and the former mostly a means to pleasure and comfort.

13. After unthinking adherence to custom, the driving force of the majority is unthinking adherence to authority; and their general response to anti-authoritarians is one of bafflement, contempt, or a combination of both. Thus, the natural brutality, smugness, and obstinacy of authority is both exacerbated and reinforced.

14. It took centuries for democracy to emerge from brutal aristocracy, but it may not take long for the tyranny of the stupid many to give way to the tyranny of the stupid few—which does, after all, seem to be the natural and proper order of things.

15. Civilization is the knowledge of a collective illness in which the doctors themselves are sick, though it's because they offer a cure that they are the most hated.

16. Institutions—though made up of dwarfs—are able to crush giants, unique and superior individuals.

17. In our fundamentally perverse time, there is more loyalty and dignity in adherence to the terrible phrase "stop snitchin" than in being a "good team member," in which there is a degradation that would be plain if not for the incorrigibly stupid mass that cannot even recognize their own wretchedness.

18. While vanity is a great and well-known evil, not being honest with ourselves about our virtues, merits, talents, and abilities is also to be guarded against: otherwise our self-estimation may suffer—especially in our leveling era which is so resentful of merit—and those who benefit from what we have to offer may not give us sufficient compensation. We must know what we are worth in order to judge whether we are getting our due.

19. Once I have put on the necessary gas mask, ear plugs and goggles, there seems to be nothing left to most people around me.

20. Narcissism always awaits an outlet. Is it social media? Your new job? What a woman last weekend said to you?

21. For the most part it is the adults and the doctors who are sick, not the children. Still, the child who is given Ritalin after naturally resisting an "educational curriculum" which doesn't engage his mind to think independently, and which therefore doesn't stir his vitality and creative powers, will as an adult transition as a matter of course to Prozac, that yuppie dope. But certainly the spiritual hell of American capitalism requires some anesthetic.

22. In America almost nothing is as reliable as the most predictable stereotypes.

23. Where there are many, there shall be much deceit, albeit under the veil of virtue.

24. Get your children an edition of the Harvard Classics or some other great books curriculum. Read these together, and what is much more, brood on experience, on your sense of human motivation and the meaning of things. Such an education will take you much farther than any institution.

25. Fully to profess entails making enemies; a man of knowledge and conviction could not be more unwelcome in our spineless era.

26. Liberalism arose as a response to the oppression which resulted from the pursuit of desire. Yet once the individual is free, his chaotic pursuit of desire must eventually lead to another tyranny. And the current chaos of liberal democracy is no more stable or permanent than any other system.

27. The recognition that not just by ignorance but by conscious choice we made life unnecessarily hard on ourselves: this is one of the hard-won virtues of experience. Nor does it entail that we won't continue to err in the same fashion. Thus, we must be ever mindful.

28. The loss of tradition means the loss of honor: hence why so few of us today can be bothered to keep our word.

29. The more our culture emphasizes equality, the more we can observe deceit.

30. The hours and days when no one calls, texts or emails are more representative of the truth of our condition than those times when we are flooded by contact.

31. The harried poor long for free time; the idle rich struggle to use it.

32. Very few of those who exercise power are worthy of respect in any deep sense. But then, who is? And humankind requires hierarchy all the same.

33. Never before have people made so much of equality; never before have people been so uncompromisingly self-interested.

34. Our ignorance of one another, and our ignorance of ourselves: this is the deep tragedy, the source of our greatest problems.

Read More: American Cultural Trends And The Future

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

More Insights About A Woman's Education From Xenophon

November 13, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Last week, I outlined book (i.e., chapter) seven of Xenophon's The Economist. This week we'll look at books eight through ten. These four chapters are the (in)famous part of the work in which a man describes how he trained his young wife to be a real woman. I would recommend reading last week's article first.

Know Thyself

Book eight begins with Ischomachus recounting a time when his wife was embarrassed that she was unable to do bring him the food item he asked for even though they didn't have it anyway. Most women today would make an excuse for lack of servility like "I'm too tired from folding laundry all day. Can you make your own sandwich?" Mildred actually has a real excuse, and she chooses to keep quiet out of feminine pride. I can only imagine what their sex life is like, this 14-year-old virgin getting pounded in a way that only an Athenian man could deliver. I bet she gave him anal like all the time.

Ischomachus says, "There is nothing in human life so serviceable, nought so beautiful as order," in reference to managing a house. He continues on about the orderliness of armies, saying that an army is not intimidating merely because of its size but also because of its organization. I quite like this. What good is chaos? Humans are creatures of habit and tradition, and when we try to break free of tradition to "be our own person," we soon create new ones whether we realize it or not.

(House)Law and Order

He then spends the rest of the book explaining why it's so important to have a kitchen cellar so well-organized. It's good advice but fairly boring, and there's not a lot for me to comment on. Ischomachus babbles like a woman.

> Though it well may raise a smile of ridicule (not on the lips of a grave man perhaps, but of some facetious witling) to hear me say it, a beauty like the cadence of sweet music dwells even in pots and pans set out in neat array.

I concur. I've always said that I would pay to sell appliances.

The most disappointing thing about book eight is that Mildred hardly speaks at all. Her character shines a light on everything wrong with the modern woman. But I've got to give props to Ischomachus for not being a slob. Ischomachus really undercuts the feminist claim that men the world would be disorderly and ugly without women to keep things straight.

Book nine begins right where book eight left off. Ischomachus prattles on about keeping an organized house, which I guess is his wife's main job anyway.

You Find Yourself by Looking Where You Left It

"Her delight was evident, like some one's who at length has found a pathway out of difficulties." This reminds me of the modern ethic of "finding yourself," whatever the hell that means. Do you want to find your path in life, to find what you're supposed to do? Hold a job, maintain a house, and try to live a functional life. Divorcing your husband so you can freedom-bang exotic men is anything but having a functional life.

One issue with "finding yourself" is that it used to not be possible. In the old days, you couldn't just leave the village to go live with nature or explore new spiritualities. The modernist will argue that that's because society used to be oppressive and so everyone was miserable, but is today's society truly happy? Worse case scenario, the feudal man hated his life as much as American Joe, but I'm not sure it's possible to have a more depressed society than modern America. A simpler time, a sweeter place.

A Lamb amongst Wolves

Ischomachus says that Mildred must be able to serve his friends at parties, and through that she will both "win" their respect and be able to "share [their] joys." The opinion of a man's friends concerning his wife are as important as that of a woman's friends concerning her husband. We are creatures of community, not insular agents. Men like pleasant and comparatively quiet women, and nothing will kill a man night like a woman saying, "Why do you boys get so riled up? It's just a game!" Worse though is a woman who screeches at the tv when the ref makes a bad call. Either get back in the kitchen and make some pizza rolls, or go knitting with your friends.

Motherly Instinct

> But to be obliged to fulfill the duty of attending to her own domestic happiness, that was easy. After all it would seem to be but natural (added he); just as any honest woman finds it easier to care for her own offspring than to neglect them, so, too, he could well believe, an honest woman might find it pleasanter to care for than to neglect possessions, the very charm of which is that they are one's very own.

Here they discuss that women should be happy to care for their property, and they make an off-hand assumption that "any honest woman finds it easier to care for her own offspring than to neglect them." Oh, Xenophon, you would weep if you saw our daycare culture today. Today's empowered woman doesn't let something like offspring get in the way of her career dreams. A childcare service at best will have children mostly coloring and watching tv. Some influential people even claim that all children should go to preschool.

You know, you read red pill websites, and you think, "No, society can't be that bad," and then one Google search destroys your entire faith in America. And notice how none of those links give any statistics about whether the children later do better in real school. I'll be breaking out the cheap gin tonight.

Skin-deep Beauty

Book ten concerns the virtues of Mildred herself. She was very attentive to cosmetics and physical appearance and even wore high-heeled shoes, proof that modern beauty standards aren't modern. Ischomachus falls into the trap I myself often do, claiming to prefer natural beauty because of its truth. I suppose this has some merit since girls today will put on far too much make-up, especially when they are in high school.

Ladies, make-up should compliment the face, not define it, and should a man pay attention to your make-up because of the excess, then you have only made yourself look unnatural and less attractive. Aberrant eye-shadow reveals an ungentle soul. It's like the modern woman is trying to be ugly.

I wish I could say that Athens's favorite empowered woman won't hear it and gives him a strong dose of the red pill, but she caves and asks how she may look beautiful to him. Many men don't know what they really want, and Athens was no stranger to pop-ideology fads. But to her credit, Mildred's aim in her cosmetics was to please him instead of herself, and when she perceived that to fail, she asked him what would work. Mildred knows a woman should submit to her husband's beauty standards, at least within reason.

How to Gain a Man's Love

I'll give Ischomachus half a point in this scene because he says that what really turns him on is a woman who excels in weaving and baking bread. True, this rings of the "I want a career woman" mentality, but at least he's not saying "I want a career woman because she will be able to relate to me," as if men and women can relate to each other anyway. Seriously, ask a woman sometime if she likes CCR and see how similar she is.

In looking for good links for that last paragraph, I was pleased to find absolutely nothing useful written by a man when Google searching for "I want a strong woman" and "I want a career woman," which is surprising since my former law school peers all make that claim. Every result either was someone explaining why men do not desire a strong career woman or was a woman trying to convince men to want a strong career woman. Perhaps mankind is not lost after all.

Anyway, for all this "I like accomplished women" ethic of Ischomachus, at least the accomplishments he likes are feminine ones, and he continues that it is acts of grace and not mere obligation that turn him on. The saying is true, "The way to a man's heart is through his stomach." My college girlfriend one time hid a piece of pie from her parents to give to me, and I don't think I was ever so impressed with her as then.

I'll also have to agree that just because a woman looks pretty doesn't mean she's the kind of woman you want to spend your life with. You lust after a girl with a dolled-up face, but you fall in love with a wife who makes your daily life pleasant.

And so ends the section of The Economist concerning the training of a wife. It both brings hope that women are not naturally depraved and self-centered and also shows just how warped the modern woman is. Mildred wisely understands her own insufficiencies, and she both gladly accepts advice and seeks to master such deficiencies. I never thought I'd find myself envying Amish society.

Source: The Economist by Xenophon. Translated by H. G. Dakyns. Published by Amazon Kindle.

Read More: The Education Of Alciabides By Socrates

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Haiti Shows How A State's Unstable Foundation Can Undermine A Willing People

November 13, 2014 | by Average Guy | Link | Original Link

This year I visited Cap-Haitien, which is on the North coast of Haiti and about the 10th largest city in the country. Here are my observations and thoughts on what I saw during the 4-day trip.

Disrepair

My impression of Haiti is a country in complete disrepair…buildings, utilities, water, electricity, police, government fiscal management…nothing works in Haiti. I did see one exception. Everyday a garbage truck came by and collected garbage. I found this interesting that somehow the government was able to get that done when they are so ineffective at most everything else. My only conclusion was that garbage piling up makes such a visual statement about government failure that there is a motivation to at least get that taken care of.

So how is it that things don't get built in Haiti? Haitian men have excellent construction skills. I've watched them work. Block, cement, stucco, tile. Quality skills that US contractors pay top dollar for. Is it lack of money in Haiti? Well, yes and no. There is money. It's just not being allocated to creating anything. To learn why you have to understand the roots of Haitian politics.

Haiti's history is one long cluster-fuck of thugs, bullies, coups d'etat, takeovers, corruption, and theft. In its history, the people who came to Haiti were mainly soldiers and pirates. They didn't come to build anything. They came to conquer and take. The typical cycle was some strongman conquered and took over. He confiscated and stole from any producers. He exploited resources. He enriched himself and bankrupted the country until his time came to an end under the weight of his ineptitude and corruption.

Another thug conquered his way to power and the cycle repeats. Basically the history is hundreds of years of piracy. In other words, the one with the biggest gun takes ownership, a culture of piracy that remains today. This threat of confiscation or "nationalization" has to be a big factor when multi-national companies decide against locating a plant in Haiti.

To further understand Haiti's history, compare it to how America was settled. American settlers were not soldiers or pirates. They were tradespeople who came to America to build things. They were farmers and carpenters and stone masons. They came to America with their skills and they brought with them the English rule of law which would protect their private property. They built homes and farms and businesses, and built a legal system so that what they built could not be confiscated by would-be pirates.

But, in Haiti the law of the jungle prevails. The people in charge use their power to enrich themselves. The resources are squandered. The well-meaning foreign aid is stolen or mis-allocated. The UN has a large presence in Haiti, but an effective and honest local police force is desperately needed. It's one of the many things the Haitian government is incapable or unwilling to provide. All of the Haitians I spoke to told me the UN presence has made a big difference controlling street crime. At least now Haitians are secure to go about their daily lives.

Education

Everyday at 8am, noon and 5pm the sidewalks of Cap-Haitien overflow with students coming and going to school in their uniforms. There’s a strong respect for education in Haiti among the parents and the kids. I saw all the kids doing homework. While out walking in the evening I saw groups of kids sitting under street lamps reading their schoolbooks when the electricity was out at their homes.

I saw the enthusiasm among the students and I heard the commitment in the words of the parents. Every parent was proud to make the financial sacrifice to send their kids to school but then they would ask, “Why do we do this? There are no jobs for my kids when they graduate.” There is this recurring theme in almost every aspect of Haitian life—the frustration with a dysfunctional government and economy.

Listening to these parents got me thinking. In America the politicians all tell us the answer to unemployment is education. If we “invest” in education the economy will strengthen and jobs will miraculously appear. But what I saw in Haiti tells me this is not necessarily so. Haitians are going to school and studying hard, yet that changes nothing.

Of course, American politicians are talking their own book. They want the electorate to accept the importance of unbridled spending on education. So when unemployment rears its ugly head what are politicians going to do? Lower taxes to stimulate the private sector so businesses start hiring? No. They will choose to raise taxes to “invest” in education. The fact the school system is progressively less effective at preparing a kid for constructive employment is never discussed.

But, back to Haiti. Am I knocking education or suggesting those parents are fools for sending their kids to school? No, not at all. Those parents have no choice but to send their kids to school. It keeps them off the street and gives them a valuable gift of education. And what becomes of all those Haitian kids embracing a good education? The lucky ones will someday make their way to another country where they can use it.

Free-market capitalism

Haiti is an interesting study in free-market capitalism at its basic level. In America we walk into a grocery store and find packaged food on the shelf. All of this is created by large corporations which we are told are evil. We don’t see the farms. We don’t know what’s in those semi-trucks on the freeway. We don’t see the process. Is it any wonder Americans don’t understand how capitalism works?

When I arrived in Cap-Haitien I walked around the center of the city and couldn't find any stores. I told my Haitian friends I wanted to go to a store. I thought I could learn more about Haiti by seeing the products on the shelf. My friends took me to a huge street market. I walked through it in wonderment.

On the periphery I saw pickup trucks filled with produce. Inside the market men carried goods with wheelbarrows. I was especially taken with the pride each vendor took in displaying their goods encouraging me to buy their tomatoes, garlic, onions or peppers. I want to be there when some politician tells them, "You didn't build that."

As I walked through the crowd I had a clear vision of something my favorite economist, Thomas Sowell, talks about: “the invisible hand” of capitalism. And here it was. Some farmer outside the city has produce. Some guy has a pickup truck and brings it to the market. Vendors display the produce and the consumer comes to buy what he needs.

At each step along the way a person’s role creates profit and wages. If the farmer produces more, his reward is greater profits. If the farmer produces too much then he adjusts his output. If the truck owner is unreliable then another truck owner steps in to fill the need. So much gets done and all simply by individuals pursuing their self-interests.

When one considers the myriad of details which go into a complex economy, it really is astonishing to watch free market capitalism work so flawlessly in a country like Haiti where virtually nothing else is working. It’s a tribute to the power unleashed by individuals free to pursue their self-interests. Imagine if these ambitious, resourceful people had a legal system which protected them.

A crisp 100 Gourde note – about $2.14

Why is most of the commerce done in the street by small vendors? There are no jobs in Haiti so the people create their own by becoming these small vendors. In this dysfunctional country, free market capitalism is the hero. It's what keeps the people clothed and fed and employed. Where the Haitian government has failed to provide what is necessary to support a growing economy, the entrepreneurs are the only thing keeping the country going.

Haitians know where the problem lies

In all the conversations I had with Haitians I found a recurring theme. Haitians see government and politicians for what they are. Haiti has a culture of mismanagement which goes back to Columbus's arrival on the island. The Haitian people have suffered corruption, theft, shakedowns and abuse for over 500 years. So Haitians are not under the delusion government is going to come along and fix things. They know government is the problem and not the solution. I found that refreshing and healthy. Haitians know about self-reliance.

So what holds the country together? The answer is found in the Haitian people. Their resourcefulness, their ambition, their talents, their love for education, and their devotion to family all play a role. They face the daily struggles with such grace. It’s humbling to watch them, especially when so many in the world show little appreciation when an easy life is handed to them.

All photos taken by the author

Read More: 14 Things I Learned From The Wealth Of Nations

Average Guy
AG is a recovering Beta chump who wishes he'd had red pill information in his young, formative years. A lover of women, sports, travel and freedom he now enjoys all of them as never before. You can email him at

Finland’s Welfare State Model Holds The Interests Of Terrorists Above Its Own People

November 14, 2014 | by Johannes Joukahainen | Link | Original Link

For a country that has existed less than one hundred years, Finland has had a violent history. The White Guard defeated the (communist) Red Guard in a bloody civil war, which ended in brutal executions of the defeated Reds. Twenty years later, the Soviet Union attempted to invade Finland in the Winter War. Not long after, the Continuation War broke out only to be followed by the Lapland War against the Germans. Through feats of heroic fighting and sacrifice, Finland managed stay independent amidst the fires of the Second World War.

Both my grandfathers (and their fathers) fought in the Second World War for the independence and sovereignty of Finland. Despite the hardships they faced during the war, regardless of the wounds they sustained in combat and the fact that their farms were lost to the enemy, they managed to start a family and live a relatively normal life.

Heroes of the Battle of Tali-Ihantala in the Continuation War

Therefore, Finland and her people are no strangers to war. However, all these events predate the so-called “welfare state” that later emerged. This change turned a once strong and proud nation to a shadow of its former self. The general lack of integrity resulting from the abandonment of the masculine virtues that allowed this small nation’s population to cope with crises of insane proportion, has until now been hard to describe to a foreigner not familiar with the intricacies of modern Finnish society.

While gathering sources for this article, I personally found that inconvenient statistics that had previously been provided by the national statistics institution, “Statistics Finland” (Tilastokeskus) have been deleted. Notably, a study showing the employment percentage of immigrants by ethnicity, which uncovered a shocking truth, that fewer than 20% of Afghani or Somali immigrants were employed. The study also showed the discrepancy these groups had with other immigrant groups such as the Kenyans of whom 83 % had found employed within Finland.

This and other similar studies, which have since been deleted, highlight the problem of too-lavish benefits. As expenses such as accommodation, food, and even hobbies are paid for by the welfare state, why would an individual get a job anyway? Unfortunately, such is the reality of the modern Nordic welfare state; foreign nationals are valued higher than the native population whose labor pays for the lifestyle of these higher value individuals. Any discussion of these policies, however, has been hampered by the standard techniques familiar to any man arguing feminists. Anyone criticizing either immigration or the benefits they receive is immediately called out as a racist, fascist or white trash.

The collapse of our masculine virtues and their replacement by feminine welfare values is nowhere more obvious than in the Parliament’s October 2013 decision not to revoke the social security benefits of individuals who went to fight in the Syrian civil war. The Minister of Social and Health Affairs submitted a written answer that maintained that social security eligibility is based on residence, and therefore the fact that they fight overseas does not warrant further action.

As a direct result, our state is supporting terrorism. The discussion regarding the immense social security benefits which immigrants (hailing from third-world countries such as Somalia) currently enjoy in Finland has been going on for a long time before this decision.

If a “brave” terrorist fighter is injured in the conflict, they will be treated free of charge in our Nordic all-expenses paid nanny state. It is not a secret that Finland has one of the highest tax rates in the world, and due to this, the Finnish taxpayer should have a right to ensure that their funds are used responsibly. Call me crazy, but I do not personally believe treating members of terrorist organizations is a responsible or even sensible use of Finnish resources.

One could almost question why we let them continue residing in Finland in the first place.

The silence regarding this decision has been deafening. It took over a year for the media to barely cover the topic. The resulting outrage regarding the issue of taxpayer money being used on Jihadists has been rather docile. Similarly to the aforementioned immigrants’ benefit discussion, it is being pushed aside. There can be no questioning of the multiculturalism or xenocentrism our state sponsors. No one shall question the use of his or her taxed income.

The level of insanity inside a welfare state can be conveyed very poorly through a modicum of words. The prevalent attitudes of some of the people and the insidious propaganda that the people are exposed to daily I cannot bring to you via the sources I have available. However, my objective here has been to give a glimpse of the stupidity of the decision-making in our country and the resulting policies for the whole world to see.

These policies in place today are the result of the silencing dissenting opinions, limiting freedom of speech, and the brainwashing our people have been exposed to since kindergarten. It is an open secret that the education system promotes the leftist agenda on vulnerable and impressionable children. Furthermore, media focus is given to matters of no importance to shift attention from the more serious issues at hand.

Examples of shifting focus to non-issues are endless. For example, recently a member of the Finnish Parliament expressed her concern over SpongeBob Squarepants' detrimental effects on children. Naturally, the story attracted a sizeable proportion of the public's attention. Never mind the fact we are effectively supporting terrorism through our policies, SpongeBob is much too violent.

Our nation that once fought so fiercely against its enemies is now caring for them. We have betrayed ourselves.

Read More: You're A Monster If Don't Support The Welfare State

Johannes Joukahainen
A rather anonymous Finn proud of his roots and ashamed of the current state of his Fatherland.

Understanding The Difference Between Guilt And Shame

November 14, 2014 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The Office is a wildly popular American TV show that was originally created in Britain. The American version differs from the original—but I have only seen a handful of the British episodes—so I will not comment on that and that is also beyond the scope of this writeup.

For itself, the show opens itself up to much interpretation. The Ribbon Farm has an absolute must-read series of posts analyzing power relations in the modern workplace through the lens of the The Office. However, for my purposes here, I wish to talk about Michael Scott, as he is a perfect example of a narcissist—a person who feels no guilt, only shame.

Michael Scott, for the first eight seasons, is the regional manager of a mid-size paper distributing company. He clearly had a traumatic childhood. While such narcissism is always born out of a childhood not lived, consider a few points that reinforce my perception. First, is his appearance on a TV show for kids. His younger self said his dream was to have 100 kids so nobody can say no to being his friend.

He seems to think that childhood is necessarily limited by the parent's wishes, which is not healthy. Further, he is admitting he isn't not getting the positive emotional support at home. Second, consider the taped footage of his mother's marriage to Jeff. In the clip, when bringing something down the aisle, he screams, "I HATE YOU" and storms off. He is wetting his pants the entire time. Clearly, this situation reminded him of a very traumatic experience that can only be speculated on.

Back on point, Michael Scott displays a great level of delusion about who he is and appropriate behaviors to display in society. He never displays genuine sympathy or empathy, as it is always tied to advancing his personal delusions or to show off to others. He has no self-esteem and has his delusions punctured very easily and slips in narcissistic depression with frightening regularity. He also possesses the ability to turn women into compensatory narcissists and transform himself in a pseudo-codependent. The fact the whole show is supposedly a documentary reinforces the narcissism of the workplace and Michael Scott.

As far as Michael Scott is concerned, he only experiences shame and never guilt. Guilt, properly felt, is a feeling about things you have actually done (to others). Shame, however, is a feeling about who you are, your identity.

For example, let's say a man forgets to pick a friend up from work and it forces them to miss a date with an attractive woman. The guilt-based person would apologize to the person and feel bad because he hurt a friend. A shame-based person would think "I am such a bad person!" and need public reassurance they aren't a bad person from the person they harmed.

The guilt-based person would try to own up to their misdeeds and try to rectify the situation with good acts—i.e. buy his friend a case of beer he likes or personally call the woman and convince her that is was his fault—not his friend's—that she was stood up. The shame-based person will seek avenues to avoid personal culpability, such as downplaying the bad act (she was probably a bitch), blaming them (you know how unreliable I am!) or ignoring the situation (dodging his calls or texts).

Guilt-based people are healthy. People should want to atone for their bad acts with commensurate good acts. Shame-based people are immature psychologically. While every personality disorder has shame-based impulses, narcissism is the one that expressly discloses any ability to feel guilt, only shame.

Shame-based approaches are born out of child-like approaches to criticism or lack of boundaries. Kids subject to intense, withering criticism as a child develop a complex that they are either 100% good or 100% bad. Recall that every child is a born a narcissist, which is why we tend to put the gloves when critiquing a child because we implicitly recognize they take criticism 100% personally as an attack on their identity as a whole.

Further, kids who are never disciplined develop the same complexes. Kids who are unschooled, receive "participation ribbons" or who are born to parents who let them do whatever they want never mature beyond the emotional level of a child. Children need boundaries set by those who love them unconditionally and are intimately based out of that child's best interest and personality.

Reconsidering Michael Scott, he displays shame-based approaches to life. Recall the season 3 episode in which Michael and Dwight travel to the paper convention with Jim and his new boss. At the end, when Michael's party fails and he broods in a narcissist depression, Jim visits and calms him down. Michael was jealous of Jim's rapport with his new boss. Notice at the end when he calms down, he refers to Jim as "Best Friends Forever." See the black and white approaches to relationships? Jim realizes he is dealing with an emotional child, so he treats him as such.

In fact, the rest of the office—outside Dwight—recognizes this. While his antics are outrageous and often offensive, you can't really treat him badly because you realize he is—in this heart—an emotional child. When Michael hosts the Dundies in season 2, he is heckled by a group of people. He feels a great amount of shame as they puncture his personal concept of being a comedic genius. He doesn't really need anybody to validate that, as long as he can perform, he will invent approval in his head.

Let's consider a few more scenes that flesh out the contours of shame-based behavior. Michael once makes an incredibly dismissive and flippant remark about Dwight crying on New Year's Eve when it started to snow at midnight while watching one of Dwight's favorite shows. In private, Michael exhibits a complete lack of feelings about somebody.

I can't recall the exact scene, but I believe Jim says that is pretty insensitive to mock Dwight for that. Michael backtracks and calls Dwight's movie "stupid." See the shame-based approach here? Michael—with no audience—flippantly dismisses a friend's emotions and when confronted publically about it, he downplays his rejection of Dwight.

Now, making fun of Dwight is one thing, but a guilt-based person would feel a bit bad that a friend had such a emotional reaction to something. Sure, if Dwight was my friend I would razz him about it, but if he's your friend you care about his emotional state. Rudely ignoring him is not what a good person does.

Quite possibly the best episode to talk about is season 3's opener, Gay Witch Hunt. In this episode, Michael jokingly refers to Oscar as "faggy." Toby confronts Michael and tells him Oscar was offended because he is gay. Michael is asked to keep this a secret as Oscar does not want his coworkers to know. A guilt-based person knows that they would feel bad if they disrespected Oscar's wishes, would apologize to them in private and move on. If Michael had done that, Oscar would have respected Michael. That is not what happens.

Michael does apologize to Oscar, but does it in a self-aggrandizing way and only in semi-private. Oscar accepts Michael's insincere apology only because he is worried about being outed. Michael doesn't stop because he knows homosexuality can bring attention into somebody's life. He has Dwight research gay porn on his computer and it results in a very psychologically unhealthy and embarrassing—for Oscar—office meeting.

As is seen, most people don't care about allegations of homosexuality. I wouldn't be surprised if some real-life homosexuals were upset at this (if they notice) because it means most people— today—just don't care who you have sex with. Pam is interested in hearing about Oscar's sexuality, but at the moment his biggest issue is Michael. Michael formally outs Oscar, narcissistically thinking Oscar will love the attention, whether positive or negative. See the self-absorption here? If Michael was gay, he would prefer worship for being gay, but would accept hatred if it means avoiding indifference.

Oscar comes out and in the intervening events, shuts Michael down badly, calling him "ignorant, offensive and small." Michael immediately engages in the shame-based defense mechanism of narcissistic depression. Oscar realizes that Michael had no malicious intentions, just self-absorbed ones. He engages in guilt-based acts right afterward. Oscar softens his tone, proffers a genuine apology and offers Michael a hug. Michael then tries to self-aggrandize with kissing Oscar but he realizes that doesn't work for him, for obvious reasons.

The takeaway lesson is about the differences between guilt and shame based individuals. Guilt-based people don't consider failures to speak to their entire identity, while shame-based people do. Shame-based people are emotionally immature and that results from poor parenting of many stripes. Guilt-based people are worried about the effect of their actions on others, shame-based people are worried about their identity, especially as seen by others.

Read More: The Power Of Shame

Charles Wickelus
is the writer formerly known as 2Wycked. Follow him on Twitter

A Brief Lesson In Game From Charlie Sheen

November 14, 2014 | by Alexander | Link | Original Link

The other day I happened to catch Ferris Bueller's Day Off on cable. As far as coming-of-age movies go, while it may not be on the level of Stand By Me, it's still a very funny movie with a healthy, masculine sense of life. There is definitely a red pill sensibility in several parts. Ferris has his girl, but she's along for the ride—not the center of his universe. He basically does whatever he wants, stumbling occasionally along the way, but also finding time to drop some pearls of wisdom, like this quote about his friend Cameron:

> Cameron has never been in love – at least, nobody's ever been in love with him. If things don't change for him, he's gonna marry the first girl he lays, and she's gonna treat him like shit, because she will have given him what he has built up in his mind as the end-all, be-all of human existence. She won't respect him, 'cause you can't respect somebody who kisses your ass. It just doesn't work.

Young men aren't getting that kind of candor about the dangers of oneitis from Don Jon, Superbad, or Scott Pilgrim.

The purpose of this article however, is to break down a specific scene that happens to be a very solid, simple example of game. Charlie Sheen plays a druggie in a police station. He sits next to Ferris's sister Jean, who has been hauled in for her "fake" 911 call (this was after she caught her principal in her house and kicked him in the face). Go on Youtube. Watch the scene. Identify the principles involved.

Playing the Bad Boy

Superficially he seems to be playing a kind of “asshole” game. He stares at her, cracks his knuckles, and says unflattering things to her. However if you watch the scene carefully, you will realize that everything Sheen’s character says and does is measured and purposeful. He isn’t “playing” an asshole; he sees a pretty girl, has something he wants to say, asks specific questions, and then gives honest answers, maintaining strong eye contact throughout.

He starts by asking her if she was arrested for drugs. Jean’s body language is pretty cold and closed up at this point. With an unconcealed pride she declares, “Thank you, no, I’m straight.” She then asks why Sheen is there.

“Drugs.”

He’s not impressed. He doesn’t make excuses for himself. The matter-of-fact way he states it conveys this message to Jean: “If the fact that I use drugs is a deal-breaker for you, tough.” Jean however still isn’t buying, so she bristles and tells him put his thumb up his butt (probably sounded tougher in her head). Sheen sizes her up, then decides to demonstrate how to properly insult someone.

“You wear too much eye makeup. My sister wears too much. People think she’s a whore.”

The delivery here is excellent, especially the pauses between each sentence. It is a solid neg. It’s not too light and not too mean. It shows that he has no interest in buttering Jean up and that he isn’t afraid to offend her. To Jean’s credit, she isn’t baited—she gives him a look and says nothing. Charlie persists.

“You don’t want to talk about your problem?”

“With you? Are you serious?”

“I’m serious.”

“Blow yourself.”

Again, no sense of offense or emotion in response to Jean’s insult. He simply looks down at his crotch, then gives Jean a look like “Really?” Likely he had something else prepared to say, but by this point he had worn down Jean enough to get her to bite. She opens up a bit (note the body language).

“Alright. You wanna know what’s wrong?”

“Oh I know what’s wrong. Just wanna hear you say it.”

Sheen’s line here is a bit cryptic but we can infer that he has well sized her up by this point. What I think he means is something to the effect “You are an attractive upper class white girl giving attitude to a stranger in a police station. You know that your asinine suburban girl problems are bullshit and it makes you high-strung, so I’ll humor you for a bit.” Charlie proceeds to listen to Jean complain about her brother Ferris skipping school:

“Why should he get to ditch when everyone else has to go?”

“You could ditch.”

“Yeah, I’d get caught.”

“I see. So you’re pissed off because he ditches and doesn’t get caught. Is that it?”

“Basically.”

“Basically…Then your problem is you.”

“Excuse me?”

“Excuse you. You oughta spend a little more time dealing with yourself, a little less time worrying about what your brother does.”

What he says here is 100% true. It is the sort of clear honest advice you should want from your friends. A man ought to judge the quality of his friends by their willingness to speak straight, unflattering truths to them. Unfortunately for women, most of the female friends and white knights they surround themselves with would never dare to say something like this.

What Charlie says here is not mean. It isn’t a neg, yet it has that effect. That’s the beauty of it. Jean gets mad (“Why don’t you keep your opinions to yourself!”) but deep down, she appreciates it. Decent women all crave a man who will not buy their bullshit or coddle them because it is a sign of leadership.

Masculine Leadership vs. Supplication

Imagine what a typical white knight would say in this situation. Upon hearing that the biggest problem in this privileged girl’s life is that her brother occasionally ditches school without getting caught, how would they respond?

“Man, your brother sounds like an asshole!”

“What a jerk! Sorry you have to put up with him”

“Fucking loser. He won’t amount to anything.”

“Real men don’t skip out on their responsibilities.”

“That sucks, but don’t sweat it. You’re too smart to let a shithead like that get to you.”

Betas rarely miss a chance to cut down other men in front of women, especially if those other men are not present. They also rarely miss a chance to flatter women and feign sympathy. Yet do you imagine that any of the above responses would have garnered Jean's interest? Or any woman's? These are trite, kiss-ass replies any man could give to any situation where a woman is complaining.

Charlie by contrast actually listens to her problem, repeats it to her for sake of clarity, then responds with actual good advice. The willingness to tell people what they need to hear instead of what they want to hear is a sure sign of masculine leadership, and neither Jean nor any normal girl will miss it.

The scene eventually transitions to Jean and Charlie making out as Jean's mother comes to take her daughter home. Note how Jean tries to play it cool here—tries to retake control by acting like the fact that the two of them will likely not see each other again is no big deal.

"Lets not ruin this with a lot of talk," she says, smiling sheepishly.

Charlie surprises her again. Instead of being the cool guy and saying "Sweeeet, later babe," he softens his expression (still looking right into her eyes and maintaining a relaxed posture) and says "You didn't tell me your name." It's not even a question, just a simple statement that offers a bit of vulnerability (she can refuse to tell him) and sincerity to an otherwise casual encounter.

"Oh, well it's…it's Jean but uh…a lot of…a lot of guys call me 'Shawna'"

"Ok Jean."

Calling her Jean after she explains that other guys call her Shawna is also deliberate. It is another touch of sincerity—the slight formality of refusing an offered nickname. More importantly it has the effect of separating Charlie from the herd. In effect it says, "I'm not one of the 'other' guys, I'm not one of your beta orbiters, I'm Charlie fucking Sheen, and you're going to remember me. After another decade or two of riding the carousel and then settling down with some boring loser who never fails to call you 'Shawna' and sympathize with your first world problems, when you lie awake at night after turning down his feeble attempt to get sex – it is me you are going to sigh and think about."

The response is immediate—Jean walking away in a fit of giggles. Sheen doesn't look away until she is gone.

Concluding Thoughts

What is the takeaway here? Should you copy Sheen's technique? Generalize the principles. The specific phrases and actions Sheen takes here will not work on every girl. Note my usage of qualifiers like "decent" and "normal" to describe the sort of women for which this approach can work.

The key thing to remember is that Sheen's dominance in the encounter comes from the fact that everything he does and says makes obvious to Jean that he does not give a fuck whether or not she likes him. He doesn't compliment or flatter. He doesn't sympathize. He straight up insults her but ultimately tells her what she needs to hear, which shows genuine concern for her. Honesty and fearlessness can be powerful aphrodisiacs. Given Jean's bitchy temperament, Sheen would have gotten nowhere with her had he shown even a little bit of need for her approval. Instead he gets her to seek his approval. This is the essence of game.

Superficially it seems like a "cool" guy being a "jerk" and winning the girl by being a "bad boy." Look closer and there is a basic principle one can derive about manhood and female selection. Study. Learn. Apply.

Read More: Game Trumps Everything

Alexander
Alexander is a programmer from New York City.

In The End, Positivity Is The Only Way To Win

November 14, 2014 | by swimmerboy1 | Link | Original Link

"Make the most of yourself… for that is all there is of you." -Ralph Waldo Emerson

At Return of Kings we tend to focus on the dysfunctional aspects of society. By focusing on these issues we acclimate ourselves to the decline of a once traditional and functional time.

It is clear many of these topics are based upon negativity, because our society is currently headed there. And, interestingly, negativity can be a powerful force that enlightens, educates and even motivates. But too much of it can cause destruction.

Human beings are dynamic and powerful creatures. Countless historic examples illustrate this power of human will. This is how our society was built; by people with visions of greatness, and of realities that were not yet theirs. Draw inspiration from this and refuse to let negativity affect you. The human mind is powerful enough to adapt to any situation it is presented. We can and should remain positively focused.

It may sound cliché, but there is power and potential within all of us. We can focus on this and revive the greatness of our forefathers, who built this society from the ground up.

The key to doing this lies in the power of The Grind.

The Grind

"When you're not pursuing your goal, you are literally committing spiritual suicide." -Les Brown

Solace is found in the redemptive powers of hard work and triumph. The motivation to achieve comes from a place of dissatisfaction, a desire to change the reality you are currently experiencing. That's how everything in our current life came to fruition. It all started with varying degrees of dissatisfaction.

The process of changing your reality starts with one step. The full change occurs over many small steps, lasting an extended period of time until the goal is achieved. This is The Grind. There is nothing I enjoy more than grunting out that last rep in the gym or finishing the last part of a writing piece. The feeling of overcoming something on a daily basis is unmatched. You feel cleansed, as if nothing else matters.

When you are on a mission, when you are striving to reach your goals and dreams, all emotional and spiritual matters fall into place. The power of The Grind should not wasted.

Time

"Time is what we want most, but what we use worst" -William Penn

Time is the most precious commodity. No amount of money, power, or influence will get it back. You have a predetermined amount and that is it.

Despite this fact, I would say that most people don't value their time. They spend their days watching television, movies, or Netflix while browsing social media. They walk places as if they have nowhere to go. They live as if they will never die.

Do not be one of these people. Your time is your most precious asset, and you should treat it as such.

Tunnel Vision

In these turbulent times what can you do? How do you stay on your path when it seems the world is in turmoil?

You must become the center of the storm. Your job, your school, your girlfriend, and your friends are all supplementary. Do not watch the news. Do not watch television or movies. They're all a distraction. If it takes away from your goals or does damage to your life, it should be cut out.

What we allow to enter our minds helps create our current reality. And our current reality will create our desired reality. So it follows that what you think will determine your future. The mind is a powerful thing, and so you must mold it to your benefit.

And this is a lot easier than you think. When you dedicate yourself to something, truly pouring your whole being into it, all else falls away. The Grind is powerful because you are living honestly. You are only doing what is most important to you. You see only your purpose, and your mind and body adjust accordingly. You feel complete as you empty all energy onto the battlefield. You know there is nothing more you can do at the moment to get closer to your dreams.

The purpose of this article is not solely to motivate. It is to reiterate the capabilities of not only you, but Return of Kings as a whole. There are plentiful amounts of intelligence and potential in the articles and comments I read here. If we all go after our goals with the vigor that I know we are capable of, we will thrive in these times.

I am not ready to succumb to cynicism just yet, and you shouldn't be either. The path to achieving your goals is not an easy one, but it is worth it. You must be willing to see the positive, value your time, and shut out the noise.

And ultimately, you must embrace The Grind.

Read More: 3 Ways To Make Better New Year's Resolutions

---

swimmerboy1
William is a writer and aspiring entrepreneur. He is from LA and currently resides in the area.

The Enduring Similarities Between Sales And Seduction

November 15, 2014 | by Oscar Zach | Link | Original Link

The concept of seduction can be explained with different analogies in real life, by each person. One common analogy is that of sales, and a lot of has been already said on how sales is very much like game (or seduction): in sales, you pitch your product; and in seduction, you "pitch" yourself – where you are the "high value product" which brings quality and value to her life.

> Maxim #1a: Women desire men of better quality than themselves.

Since the science of selling is deep and vast, so are its lengthy analogies to game – with some slight differences. And dating essentially being also an amoral power game, so references from Robert Greene's "The 48 Laws of Power" have been used here to further highlight their use and significance in the analogies between both sales and game techniques.

Some commonalities which immediately come to mind:

1. Buyers are the gatekeepers of the sale, while women are the gatekeepers of sex.

2. Emotional rapport often trumps logical rapport in both game and sales.

3. Game and sales both involve dealing with shit tests and flaking from women and buyers. The correct rebuttals are the tools to help you stand your ground.

4. Both sales and game are dynamic and constantly evolving. The basic nuts and bolts of both game and sales may remain the same, but there is no single style of selling (seduction) which works with every buyer (woman).

5. Since game and selling would never stop, learning never stops in both.

There are however certain differences when it comes to sales and seduction, but the one which comes first to mind is that in real life, you don't have to "pitch" yourself as a product to women all the time.

Sometimes, women pitch themselves as a worthy buyer or are gaming you instead; this happens when there are more buyers (women) and there are fewer sellers (men), or when you are the higher value product with more options (buyers) as compared to others—which automatically gets bought because of your higher value to women, with minimal effort.

Always remember the call flow

One simple example is that of cold call selling, which is quite similar to cold approaching. The styles of cold selling and gaming in cold approaches can be improvised or innovated by each person, but most of them usually follow a sequence of parameters what in telemarketing terms can be called as the call flow model.

Most call flow models focus on five main parameters (whose sequence can be improvised depending on the type of buyer), as seen in a sample generalized call flow chart below.

Here the "product" is usually introduced subtly after an covert opener, followed by enough rapport building and a sufficient "need (and value) creation" for the product. Quite similar to the technique used in cold approaches, the call flow model first focuses on harmless insinuation into an unsuspecting buyer's space (mind) and then the eventual seduction.

Each of these five main parameters could be interpreted in a game analogy, below as:

1. The Opener:

The opener is often an important parameter of the sales process which effectively contributes in initiating a covert yet strong initial insinuation into the buyer's space (mind). And in game, a good opener is what effectively insinuates your "harmless" entry initially into the woman's space.

"Conceal your intentions" (Law No.3) and "Enter action with boldness" (Law No. 28) explain important basic ideas about how an opener could be formulated. Usually a good cold seller (player) doesn't want his buyer (woman) he seeks to seduce to immediately pull up a bitch shield and hang up, by using an opener which reveals his intentions abruptly. And a bad or half-assed opener is what will require additional effort to compensate for its weak impression, unless if the customer (or woman) is already into you to begin with.

2. Rapport Building:

In sales, "rapport building" is where salespersons determine (judge) their prospective customers personalities and desires often through probing, cold reading and mirroring to build the appropriate rapport that helps in securing faster and easier sales.

This parameter focuses on ideally building emotional and (or) intellectual rapport with buyers—but if both are not possible, then the focus should primarily be on emotional rapport (more so in game, since women being primarily emotional creatures, how you tweak their emotions and minds is what helps in "need creation"—the need to have sex with you). Thus, an emotional rapport has more chances of success than an intellectual rapport, unless your customer is an overly intellectual type to begin with. This is where "rapport building" comes into the picture—to bait the cat into the bag.

In the game analogy, this parameter is where you can introduce the different types of game: asshole game, confident beta game, provider game or so on – depending on the type of woman you're dealing with, after probing enough so as to build the right rapport with her. Every customer is different; so are the different tastes of women that you might be dealing it. The important points in rapport building are efficient probing and cold reading—to judge your buyer's nature effectively so as to build the required appropriate rapport.

Certain laws which could be further implemented during the rapport building process are:

- Law No.4: "Always say less than necessary" – probe more, reveal less
- Law No.8: "Make other people come to you: use bait if necessary"
- Law No.9: "Win through your actions, never through argument"
- Law No.12 : "Use selective generosity and honesty to disarm your victim"
- Law No.14: "Pose as a friend, work as a spy"– use rapport building to probe
- Law No.32: "Play to people's fantasies" – in game terms, that is to her 'fantasy'
- Law no.33: "Discover every man's thumbscrew" – find your buyer's (her) thumbscrews
- Law No.38: "Think as you like, but behave like others"
- Law No. 43: "Work on the hearts and minds of others"– to heighten buyer interest
- Law No.44: "Disarm and infuriate with the mirror effect"– to innocuously disarm your buyer

It is important to note that the correct rapport built usually then effortlessly generates "need creation" – where the need for the "product" (i.e. sex with you) is planted effortlessly in the customer's mind by the seller. On the other hand, the wrong choice of or inadequate rapport built is what leads to delayed sales (sex), or worse: getting sidetracked (friend zoned) by buyers (women) to get no success at all.

3. “Need Creation”

This could possibly be called the single most important parameter of the call flow model, or seduction. Without a need, there would be no sale. As long is one exists, a sale is possible.

“Need creation” essentially means: the customer experiences the “need” to buy your product, or in game analogy that the woman experiences the desire for sex with you. You must then create this need, which is essentially the “make or break” part of the sales pitch or seduction – especially when the customer doesn’t already have the need to buy your product, or the woman in question doesn’t already have the need to sleep with you .This parameter is also – where and how you ” create value ” for your “product” (i.e. you, in seduction terms).

This is where experienced players employ boyfriend destroyer tactics (to destroy the buyer’s other options), or use communication (both verbal and non-verbal) which gets women thinking about sex with them, and transforming that thought into a desire. This eliminates your buyer’s options, and keeps them dependent on you – as Law 11: “Learn to keep people dependent on you”.

Furthermore, in sales terminology, it is called “need creation”– as a need is often more difficult to resist than a “want” in a world of illimitable available options. However in game, you just have to focus on making her wanting to fuck (you) – instead of needing to fuck (you); by verbal or non-verbal suggestion. No matter how good your product might be, or how good your eventual product pitch might be, an insufficiently strong need usually generates the most roadblocks to a sale (and sex).

This aspect of the seduction process is where the most desirable men fail in getting the pussy they want even after a strong opening and a supposedly correct rapport built previously – because they fail in creating the adequate value about themselves and need for sex with them in women's minds. Conversely, if the woman already has the need for you, no matter how bad your prior game with her might've been, she'd still want to fuck you. The efficacy of all other parameters thus depend on how strongly need creation is generated.

True, some sellers sometimes successfully "supplicate" to buyers into buying from them even if there is no need for the product, but again in those scenarios there is still a need created in the mind of the buyer—the need to get rid of the seller by buying his product. Those supplicated "sales" could be described as "mercy or pity fucks."

Law No.13 : "When asking for help, appeal to people's self-interest; never to their mercy or gratitude"—this should be kept in mind during the entire seduction process—and more so during this parameter, as supplicating is detrimental to both need and value creation.

4. Product pitch

The next parameter of the call flow model is introducing and pitching the product effectively. In game analogy, this product is YOU (or sex with you).

In sales, how valuable your product is what effortlessly helps in closing the sale after proper need creation. If your product is good enough, sometimes it could guarantee its sale by the virtue of its value itself that generates the need.

In real life, this parameter of the call flow model often comes first (sometimes before the opener), because the buyer (woman) sees you as the product first. The most important person in your life is YOU, so you must take care of yourself (and your life) very well, and focus on self improvement all the time. As a bonus, this serves to make a lasting impression on women. Women are hypergamous by nature, so project yourself as a unique high value product—which they'd instinctively gravitate to.

5. Closing

The final parameter of the call flow model is escalation and closing the sale (in game terms, escalation to sex).

How do sellers know if the need created is adequate enough? Through “trial closes”—when sellers test the strength of the created need—by escalation. The same analogy applies in game: in order to know whether the need for sex is adequately generated or planted in the woman, escalation is necessary. Persistence and boldness (not supplication) become even more necessary during the closing part of the sale and seduction.

Post sale (post-sex), retention is the aspect of sales where the focus is on customer relationships. In game, the analogy could be relationship game.

One thing to remember at all times during the entire call flow (or seduction) process is Law No. 31: “Control the options – get others to play with the cards that you deal.” Your buyers should feel they are in control, but are actually your puppets. In short, you must be in control during the entire interaction, by giving buyers (women) options that come out in your favor whichever one they choose, and also creating value for yourself to ensure your control.

Other similarities

Important and effective mindset traits to acquire for both game and sales are :

1. The Dark Triad Mindset

The often irresistible appeal of The Dark Triad personality again. Just as women are attracted to them, so are buyers in the commercial world. As seen in other careers as well, sales persons who embody Dark Triad traits are found to be more successful than their competitors.

2. Analysis, self-motivation and harnessing fear to your advantage

A good salesperson is not fearful of rejections or losing the sale, but rather he would be fearful of failing to rise from his failures and mediocrity – so he harnesses the fear of mediocrity to propel and self motivate himself towards success and achievement.

He understands that failure is the stepping stone to success – when failure is used to ascertain where his pitch went wrong. In telemarketing, most sellers record their calls and listen to determine as to which their failed pitches stumbled. The same approach applies in game.

3. Sales Hunger and the Killer Instinct

In life, there are often only two ways to resolve a problem: to either resolve it or dissolve it. Once you've got the cat eating out of your hand, don't delay in belling it.

In sales, no matter how emotional the rapport with the customer might be, a good seller would never hesitate to go in cold-bloodily for the kill—to secure the sale—as the end justifies the means. He understands that his happiness manifests itself through getting regular sales, and not through stagnant buyers. The same thing goes for seduction. Hesitancy, procrastination, or failure to escalate after adequate "need creation" only results in analysis-paralysis which allows the customer (or woman) to lose interest and get out of your grasp.

4. Constant approaching and the Abundance Mentality

The abundance mentality is extremely important in both sales and game (where comparatively you can pitch yourself to as many women as possible, and have more chances for sex).

A good sales person understands the importance of approaching boldly very well, and understands that it is a numbers game when it comes to success. He thrives when he has a large pool of customers to target on, than a limited number of options which limits his options, his game, as well as the chances of his success.

Adopting the cold blooded and calculated approach which rebounds effortlessly from brutal or harsh rejection and flaking is what separates the experienced from the rookies. Leaving the ego out of the picture is extremely important, or better still, hardening oneself from rejections is what makes men into seasoned players.

5. Improvisation and spontaneity

Whether it is witty stories and one-liners during rapport building, powerful rebuttals to stand your ground in face of roadblocks of flaking and worse behavior, or innovative ways of need creation, improvisation and spontaneity are some things which should never be left out in both sales and seduction. Law no.35: "Master the art of timing" and Law No.48: "Assume Formlessness" explain that very well. Rigidity in technique is the death to successful results in both game and sales.

A good telemarketeer has the ability to size up his customer effectively and quickly in order to alter the sales pitch call flow steps sometimes to get the deal as fast as possible.The same thing applies in game. The experienced player who has the ability to correctly judge that the woman he's targeting already needs sex with him, doesn't waste his time on a lengthy intro or rapport building. He directly escalates for sex – because he knows that the need for sex and his high value is already present (created) in her mind.

Conclusion

The more you practice game, the more you will realize that the dynamics of seduction are more or less similar to sales, with slight differences. Game simply offers more possibilities and has fewer constraints than sales, especially when it comes to options in a world of approximately 3.5 billion women. Like a skilled hustler, always remember that when it comes to a world of billions of buyers (women), the world is your limitless oyster.

Read Next: Go for No

Oscar Zach
Oscar Zach is a red piller who detests white knights/manginas, whom he believes to be the actual source from where feminism draws its power to subvert men in modern society. He enjoys philosophy, archery, target shooting, learning new languages, globe-trotting and the company of non-hypocritical, feminine women.

Time Is A Non-Renewable Resource

November 15, 2014 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

As I rummaged through the desk abandoned by its owner, I that concluded that whoever occupied this “embassy” had left in a hurry. I found a Red Bull in the receptionist’s desk in the antechamber before the main office on the fifth floor. My colleagues found a variety of goodies, such as candy and magazines strewn about.

Whoever left didn’t seem to care about leaving behind such treats, as they were highly valued in that locale. As I finished up with the bottom drawer, I came across a sheaf of papers. Scanning to them quickly to see if I could find a perspective on my own operations from a higher level, I came across something mundane yet quite interesting to me at the time.

It was an itinerary. Not just a simple itinerary, but one where everything was scheduled down to the minute for a four-star general’s visit. While the timing was tight, there were alternate plans put into it to make up for any deviations. What struck me the most was that all the things this general accomplished in 24 hours. This made me think about how I utilize my own time and how I can improve the use of this irrecoverable asset.

This “embassy” I speak of is not for a country that you find on the map. This is a mysterious country called Atropia. It is part of a United States Army exercise. Surprisingly, my superiors thought it would be a better idea to stay out on the training site and live in the concrete, steel, and plywood buildings before redeploying back to home base.

This efficient decision prevented the unit from getting bogged down in garrison games and cleaning. This also gave us free time to venture into the various buildings that we as soldiers were not allowed to go into during the exercise. A lot of things of this “embassy” surprised me. First off they had internet and an environmental control unit, so the office-types lived in comfort and had Facebook.

During this unexpected amount of free time, I had a lot of time to think. I realized that I could also accomplish more in a day if I planned it out properly. The first step I came up with is identifying the things one cannot skip. These include eating, sleeping, and working out. Depending on your life, it can also include grooming, fornicating, and education. Depending on who you are and what you like to accomplish, identifying the non-negotiable for your schedule is key because everything is a trade-off.

While I was considering what always has to occur in a day, I contemplated what happens over the course of a day that wastes time. A big time sink is watching TV. For example, watching an hour of news is pretty much the equivalent of a 5-minute look over of any news aggregating site. Another huge time sink that can be considered controversial, especially here on Return of Kings, is woman. Think about how much time we spend talking, schmoozing, and gaming woman. A cost-benefit analysis for the time should be undertaken. Getting personal things done on the clock at at work job is a good start. Staying up late on a Thursday night finishing a Return of Kings article is a problem.

The General’s Schedule

Why did I find this itinerary so interesting? Not only did it show how much the general accomplished in the day, but it also gave a new perspective on how to allocate time. If you create a timeline for a week, you will be surprised how many tasks you can fit in to a 24-hour day. Reviewing this timeline can see how much time things really take to do and there may be a whole lot more time than what you originally estimated. Also, by putting it on paper you are mission-oriented where before you would be wasting time contemplating your next move.

Here is an example:

0700 wake up

0710 shower and dress

0730 go to work

1100 eat lunch

1120 work out at the gym

1200 go back to work

1630 go shopping for any items you might need on your way home from work

1700 free time starts

2200 go to sleep

This is a very basic itinerary where you have a five-hour block to fill in with anything left over. This can include game, education, or leisure time. How complicated your daily schedule gets is up to you.

Time conflicts require decision. I not going to tell you how to think, but I will say how I think. I put going to the gym over shopping for food or women if I had to make a choice. I would skip lunch long before I gave up sleep time or gym time. I invite you to write down what you do during the day while it happens and then compared to a schedule you draw up later. It might be quite surprising for you to see how much time was overlooked.

Read More: A Resource For Positive Male Self-Improvement

Douglas Heppner
Douglas is Returnofkings.com's Chief Investigative Journalist, booze expert and part time soldier. Send tips or hate to or if you are on twitter @douglasfromrok

A Manifesto On Masculine Happiness

November 16, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Everyone enjoys feeling happy, that much is obvious

We know this because feeling happy is inherently “good”— people generally prefer the feelings, emotions, and whatever other chemical reactions go on inside your brain when you can describe your current state as “happy.” Also, it’s what society has told us is best ever since we were born.

Drugs can induce happiness. Exercise can induce happiness. For some people, buying things can induce happiness.

Being happy is arguably the most common goal shared by humans. At least, that’s what most of us would tell you. What you observe the average person do on a typical day would likely immediately call this goal into question. But I digress…

So, exploring this common aspiration one step further, is what makes a man happy fundamentally different from what makes a woman happy? Strictly biologically speaking, perhaps not. But I’d argue that given all of the social conditioning that we experience from the moment we’re born and the history and evolution of our race, that yes, it is quite different.

Males have unquestionably taken on the dominant role

From the very act of sex, where a man must literally penetrate a woman to procreate, it’s clear that the initiative must be taken by the man. And so to go back on my previous point, perhaps the very essence of what makes men happy is indeed biologically distinct.

And this biological difference is only the root. As history shows us, men have led the charge forward since forever. There are exceptions to every rule, but the vast majority of great leaders have been men. From fearless kings like Alexander the Great, who expanded and conquered, to genius scientists like Isaac Newton, who invented and discovered, men have consistently been the ones to push society forwards.

And most men who are considered great, like the two I mentioned above, are characterized by strength, perseverance, leadership, courage, and of course, literal accomplishments.

I'd like to take a second to note that none of this is to put down women. Men wouldn't even exist if it weren't for women. And women play a critical role in the life of every great man. Furthermore, as society continues to evolve, women are making strides towards being leaders. However, I'm writing this to speak to men. More specifically, I'm writing this to speak to men's primal instincts and desires — and these are all inevitably linked to the ideals of strength, growth, leadership, and domination – the characteristics of the "alpha male."

What fundamentally makes us happy as men?

I'm not talking about a short-term happiness induced by drugs, sex, or video games. I'm talking about what fills a man's cup to the brim with a striking confidence that perpetuates a solid state of happiness that persists in the long term.

What truly makes a man happy and fulfilled is undoubtedly the act of progressing towards becoming someone who possesses the aforementioned qualities of the "alpha male": strength, decisiveness, leadership, confidence, charisma… all around domination. You'll notice I included the word "progressing" in the previous sentence. That's because it's the process of growing that induces happiness. It is the process of surpassing your previous self that is so fulfilling. Not the end state of being a badass motherfucker – that's just the icing on the cake.

Think about any great accomplishment you've made: a job you fought for, a girl you seduced, a weight loss goal you reached, a product or project you completed, or anything else for that matter. What do you have fonder memories of: the process and hard work that went into achieving the goal or the aftermath of success?

It's almost always the former. The experience you gain, the lessons you learn, and the character traits you develop through the process of persisting until you completed a particular goal are usually the hidden prizes. You carry these things with you for the rest of your life. They change who you are. The job, the girl, or the money you received from your product is awesome, yes, but it's only temporary. It's just the icing on the cake – you've now know how to get this "prize" again and again.

So how can we apply this principle more generally to my life, your life, or the life of any man? I believe the answer is that we must continually strive to be more "alpha" – we must continually strive, through various goals and processes, to become stronger, more courageous, more confident, more resilient, more charismatic, and overall more masculine men. This is what will bring us true happiness and fulfillment. And, perhaps more importantly, this is what will allow us to affect and add value to the world and the lives of all those who surround us.

Want to radically improve your confidence and sense of masculine purpose in less than a month? Check out my online course 28 Days to Alpha.

Read More: 3 Easy Hacks To Develop A Dominant Presence

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Feminists Attack Lincoln University President For Saying Women Should Be Responsible For Their Actions

November 16, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

It's hard being a feminist. Every time you settle down for some good green tea and Ani Difranco, another wicked patriarch comes along and harms another poor innocent piece of masculine objectification. Summoned by the spirit of ~~envy and resentment~~ fairness and equality, you take up your formidable guns: cliché-heavy rants on Twitter, Facebook, and Jezebel, impassioned letters to persons of authority (mostly greedy white men), and, when spaces fairly accommodating of obesity are available, hearty marches—hearty because they engender such an appetite, and even occasional squabbles over Wheat Thins.

Still, the feminist cause is not without certain deep satisfactions. On especially productive days, for example, all the writing, blogging, and tweeting, all the whining, neighing, and squawking, is crowned by Instagram shots of delighted duck faces, the natural product of seeing so many "likes" obtained by your heroic efforts to speak truth to power.

Yet all the Rocky Road in the world cannot compensate for the latest injustice, the following evil words by that old patriarch Robert R. Jennings, President of Lincoln University:

> We have, we had, on this campus last semester three cases of young women who after having done whatever they did with young men and then it didn't turn out the way they wanted it to turn out, guess what they did? They went to Public > Safety and said ‘He raped me.’

By way of clarification, Jennings said later that “my message was intended to emphasize personal responsibility and mutual respect.” In other words, ladies, have the “personal responsibility” and “mutual respect”—you who are so ardent about receiving it yourself—for men not to cry rape just because you got pumped and dumped, or because the guy turned out to be a jerk, or whatever.

Of course, feminist watchdogs are far too enlightened and diligent to let a man get away with emphasizing personal responsibility and mutual respect. Thus, Robert Langley—chemistry professor, president of the faculty union, and, above all, Mangina—opined: “Women are not partly responsible for rape,” and in case you are obtuse, he repeated (perhaps with a child-like pout): “They’re not.”

Now, if you are one of those rare people today who is afflicted with a logical mind, you may wonder how it is that condemning false rape accusations can lead anyone to indignantly respond that women are not responsible (whether wholly or partly) for rape. For clearly, to say that women should not falsely accuse men of rape—as in the Duke Lacrosse scandal, for instance—in no way implies that, with respect to rape in general, women are to blame.

But feminism, today, is not a matter of logic. It is a matter of power at any cost, and driven by resentment. Here Robert R. Jennings is a rather pesky figure, having stood up for men. Consider his Good Sense: “Men treat you, treat women, the way women allow us to treat them…We will use you up if you allow us to use you up.” His cruelty reached its summit when he remarked that men “marry the girl with the long dress on.”

It is easy to see the red pill background behind Jennings’s words. Here is a man of Good Sense, speaking frankly and offering wisdom—that dreaded thing—about how the world really is. Women who give it up right away, Jennings knows, will be pumped and dumped and passed around. (Feminists call this “sexual empowerment.”) Virtuous women—those who don’t subscribe to the narcissistic maxim “if you’ve got it, flaunt it”—get men’s respect. These are also the women we want to marry.

With the hindsight of age, Jennings doubtless knows well that young men in particular are hornballs who want nothing so much as easy sex with a variety of attractive women. Certainly he also knows that most women do not want to be pumped and dumped; that they want a more significant connection.

What about the feminist notion of the “double standard? It misses the point, because notwithstanding what feminists say about “sexual empowerment,” the reality is that men do not respect and are not attracted to women whose sexuality is as given to variety as our own. The reason, as many feminists have rightly pointed out, is that male heterosexuality has a possessive element: we want women for ourselves; we don’t want to share them with other men, who are our natural competitors for women. And it is precisely in this way, precisely by having a sexuality that is not subject to a double standard, but rather simply different, that women—who, as the source of life itself, are fundamentally objects of desire—can complement men and vice versa.

The double standard claim depends on the assumption that men and women are the same, so that it's hypocrisy for us not to want women to sleep around. But just as we don't want our girlfriends and wives attention-whoring in person or on social media for other men, so we men don't want to be partners in a lady player's rotation. And the double standard dissolves once we realize that, because they really are different, men and women have different functions in the sexual sphere.

In that sphere attractive women possess a great deal of power, which corresponds to and is one with that sexual objectification against which feminists revolt. It's often noticed that feminists are not attractive. No wonder. If they were, they'd be too busy getting attention (and material benefits) from men to complain about catcalls and microagressions.

One never meets a sexy young feminist. The reason is that, as life goes for human beings, no one has it so good as a sexy young woman, with her army of obliging orbiters. With respect to power, the middle-aged professor of women's studies lives in a very different world from the young stunners in her classroom. She actually has far less power than her attractive students, and her feminist "revolt" would have no reason to be if she were a star in the sexual marketplace. Miranda Kerr is a far more powerful and doubtless happier woman than the feminist professor whose life is an eccentric obsession with "patriarchal gender norms."

Anyway, like the faculty of Lincoln University, parents of students were vexed at the president. They too thought he was blaming women for sexual assault. Under much pressure, Jennings issued an apology: "I apologize for my choice of words. I certainly did not intend to hurt or offend anyone. I will choose my words more carefully in the future."

Sharon Roseboro, whose daughter is a student at Lincoln, didn't buy it: "I think it was the political thing to do," she said. "If it didn't run in The Philadelphia Inquirer, I'm not sure that apology would have been written." With further sagacity, she added that Jennings—mind you, a university p*resident*—should not have addressed students on the subject of personal responsibility in sexual matters. That is the job of a "counselor."

Final Analysis

In a more reasonable society, a university president would be respected and appreciated for trying to guide young women to be personally responsible when it comes to sex. Referencing specific instances in which women falsely accused men of rape, would by no means seem to imply that women are to blame with respect to rape per se. Such a clear logical fallacy is not possible if one relies on disinterested reason, rather than on a resentment-driven ideology whose chief goal is power at any cost.

It is a sign of the times that Robert R. Jennings has been widely condemned for doing what a man in a position of authority should do above all: trying to lead the young to make wise decisions. Instead of being thankful, parents and students, feminists and manginas grossly misunderstood Jennings, then pressured him to "apologize" for his Good Sense, which they were too dim-witted and touchy to understand.

So here is where we are in America in 2014. People want nothing to do with wisdom and authority. Where wisdom and authority could be perceived, people are fiercely blind and “think” with only their emotions. Now in the case of women, this is quite ironic. Far from contradicting the stereotype that men are more logical while women are more emotional, the response to Jennings only serves to reinforce it.

Faced with certain discomfiting realities of intergender relations, with the sort of hard truths from which it is necessary (though not easy) to learn, the people cry foul, then ask to be coddled: “I certainly did not intend to hurt or offend anyone. I will choose my words more carefully in the future.”

And so America’s proudly deluded decline continues.

Read More: How Liberals Neglect Contexts When Crying Discrimination

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

9 Signs She's A Cheater

November 17, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

In the past year, I've had no less than five different girls cheat on their boyfriends or husbands—or attempt to cheat—with me. I'm not talking about seedy hookups on Tinder where I found out the girl was attached after I banged her, but normal girls I knew socially who decided I was the man they wanted to have an affair with. Some examples of the girls I've encountered:

- An Ivy League-educated housewife in her early twenties who tried to make a move on me when I visited her and her husband some time ago. She later divorced her husband so she could shack up with a friend of mine (and fellow manosphere blogger), then dumped him to get gangbanged by a bunch of survivalists in Wyoming. You can read the full story here.
- A young groupie of mine who flew out to hang out with me in upstate New York without disclosing the fact that she had a boyfriend back home. You can read more about what happened here.
- A girl who sent me unsolicited nudes despite having a boyfriend.

I'm not going to argue the morality of banging other mens' wives. While I don't take the view that I'm a moral innocent in these affairs, I'm also not going around looking for these girls; it was they who went after me. I don't know exactly when my life turned into a Charles Bukowski novel, but I figure I should at least teach other guys what I've learned so they don't end up with a jilted boyfriend's baseball bat to the face.

Here's how to tell when a girl you know socially is angling to suck your dick.

1. She drinks

People hate it when I (or others) point this out, but it's the truth. If a girl drinks anything other than wine, Twisted Teas, or girly cocktails like daiquiris, she will cheat. It's physics. It's inevitable.

Alcohol is the lubricant that greases the cogs of male-female relations. It's no coincidence that cultures and religions where drinking is verboten (e.g. Islam, Mormonism) are seriously screwed up. But when a girl drinks, her id is unchained and her superego is banished to the darkest corners of Hell. Her long-suppressed fantasies and desires come bubbling to the surface, and if you're part of those fantasies, you better watch out.

2. She hates other girls

Girls who talk about how they “hate” other women or prefer hanging out with men (for example, one of the girls who cheated with me told me that she’s “afraid” of other women) are prime candidates for infidelity. These girls have more masculine personalities (even if they work harder at appearing feminine), and the greater ease they have in being social with men makes it more likely they’ll end up in bed with one of them. Essentially, these girls have a best-of-all-worlds special: the thinking style of a man and the rationalization hamster of a woman.

3. She seeks you out to be your friend

The reason I’m being specific is because if it’s the other way around, she’ll never sleep with you. Girls who seek men out for platonic friendships always have an ulterior sexual motive, even if they don’t consciously recognize or act on it right away. A friend of mine put it best (paraphrasing): it’s impossible to have a long-term female friend, because if you’re really such good friends, you’re going to end up fucking sooner or later… which isn’t what friends do.

I’m coming around to the idea that it’s almost impossible for men and women to be “just friends,” because most non-familial male-female relationships have a sexual undercurrent that eventually explodes. Whether it’s a dorky dude getting friendzoned or a desperate housewife in dire need of a good deep dicking, men and women can’t keep their minds off their genitals. If a platonic friendship lasts, it’s only because one or both friends are afraid of the consequences of sleeping around.

4. She tells you, “I’m not going to sleep with you”

This goes for any girl, but doubly in the case of taken women. If a girl says that she’s not going to sleep with you, it means she’s thinking about sleeping with you: she blurts the line out as a last ditch attempt to stop herself. Variants on this line I’ve heard from girls include “My husband trusts me to drive you around alone, he knows we’re not going to sleep together” and “You like [HUSBAND’S NAME], he likes you… nothing’s going to happen between us.”

5. She was sexually abused as a child

Girls who were molested as children—particularly by a family member—are fundamentally disconnected with their sexuality, which makes them more apt to sleep around. For example, a great many porn stars, strippers, prostitutes and other “sex workers” were sexually abused as children, and this sexual disconnect enables them to do their jobs.

6. She has tattoos or piercings

Do I really need to elaborate on this one?

7. You’re more of a man than her significant other

As much as I hate manosphere sperg talk like “sexual market value,” it’s perfectly appropriate here. If you’re a better prospect than her boyfriend or husband (e.g. because he’s an unkempt slob, lazy, has no ambition, or is a spineless pussy), expect her thoughts to wander towards straying.

8. She’s a writer or artistically inclined

I’ll let one of the girls I’ve slept with explain this one: “Writers are shitty people, because we’re experts at rationalizing the shitty things we do to others.” Girls who are involved in other artistic endeavors (e.g. art, music) are also suspect, but writers are by far the worst when it comes to infidelity.

9. She has a personality disorder or a history of mental illness

Pretty much all the girlfriends or wives who've slept with me weren't playing with a full deck. Whether they were narcissists, codependents ("inverted narcissists"), or full-blown borderlines, every unfaithful woman I've known is whacked in the head. Any girl on antidepressants or antipsychotics is one bad day from jumping on another man's cock.

Again, I'm not arguing for or against screwing taken women. Moral dilemmas are easy to think about in the abstract; when you're actually thrust into the middle of one, things tend to get messy. But if you pay attention to how women around you act, you won't be taken by surprise when one of them plants a kiss on your lips.

Read More: 5 Signs You're Not The Only One She's Sleeping With

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

SJWs Shame One Of The World’s Smartest Men For Wearing His Lucky Bowling Shirt

November 17, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Scientists are not famous for their social tact. Granted, I do not know how often the “nerd who is a genius but can’t figure out people” stereotype is true, but I imagine it applies to several people in the field. These people are more concerned with knowledge and discovery than they are with hitting the club, and I commend them for that. Whether looking for a cheap hook-up or serious wife material, getting laid involves a lot of time and effort, and this minority chooses to prioritize other things, even if they do get around with the chicas when they get the chance.

Humanity has recently landed a rocket on a comet 300 million miles away. Considering that we’ve done precious little space exploration since the Cold War, this is exciting. Comets obviously move very fast, and this must have been very difficult to pull off. A driving force of this feat known as the Rosetta Mission is an English scientist named Matt Taylor. On Thursday, his day of triumph, perhaps the greatest day of his life, he wore a goofy shirt that a female friend had made for him. It had women in very sexual clothing and poses, including bondage.

Social justice warrior-ing women let all hell loose. This man with his y chromosomes and male anatomy performed a miracle of human ingenuity, and women complained. Yes, I'll agree that his shirt was in poor taste. Taylor should not have worn it on a public interview. But women, consistently being outdone in the STEM fields, chose to focus on the incidental.

Like the attention whores that are modern women, they immediately rushed to Twitter with a #ShirtStorm and #ShirtGate. They compared wearing a tasteless shirt to Richard Nixon committing a felony. They even made Taylor cry when he apologized the next day. Have they no compassion or mercy for such a deserving man?

Nick Denton once said that "Hypocrisy is the only modern sin," but I would argue that being seemingly prejudiced is more accurate. These people preach the importance of a woman's self-esteem, but they have no concern for a man's.

And what did the women complain about? "This discourages women from entering science fields!" It appears that equality and comfort is more important than achievement and innovation. One of the world's smartest men is made to feel stupid and evil for an oversight.

This man is not your ROK breed of male. He seems like the type who is genuinely concerned about fairness and cordiality. Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society Nick Howes said, "Matt is a decent guy, and from time spent with him, no misogynist." I kind of admire Dr. Taylor, considering my friends' constant complaints that I'm intolerant and elitist are answered with a resounding "meh."

Taylor has no reason to apologize with the sorrow he had, weeping and calling it a "big mistake." Myself, I would be flipping the world a bird and daring them to put a rocket on a comet, but there's a reason they don't allow me on tv. I cannot fathom why he would feel such shame at the instigation of others. He has accomplished greater things than most people ever will.

Also of note is that women often claim that they should be able to wear whatever they want wherever they want. Woman wearing a low cut top and booty shorts in a dark alley in the Bronx? No problem. Feminist with a shirt denigrating men? Fine. Man with a t-shirt depicting sexual fantasies women indulge in? Hang him!

Dr Matt Taylor
British Rosetta Project Scientist

Jessica Valenti
Columnist for the GuardianUS
Feminist writer &
founder of feministing.com

ONLY ONE OF THESE SHIRTS CAUSED AN UPROAR

50 Shades of Grey is a #1 New York Times bestseller, much to the accolades of women everywhere, but as soon as they see it in real life on a shirt, suddenly they are all chaste and pure. Far more people read 50 Shades of Grey or whatever feces is on the magazine stands than follow groundbreaking scientists. Ironically, the world would have largely ignored Taylor's achievement had he not worn the shirt.

One woman actually said that she did not think Taylor was a misogynist.

> This is why feminism is important…I'd like to think that if Taylor were a bit more knowledgeable he would have known the demoralizing message he was sending to young female scientists with that shirt.

Are young women really that sensitive? The other day, a young girl bragged to me that women were smarter because they have more college degrees. I could have felt demoralized and went home, deciding to give up on career success due to the hostile nature of the world. Instead I laughed her down and tried to explain to her why she is wrong before she turned away to start a conversation with someone else.

You see, if young female scientists had any real drive and ambition, they would not let a shirt hold them back. Even if the science community was as hostile towards ambitious women as they claim, they would still fight and claw their way up, because that is where their dreams are. If you really want something, you do everything in your power to achieve it and then prove your value by being awesome.

If women want respect in the science community, accomplishing amazing feats of human ingenuity would be more effective than trying to ban shirts and make men cry. Marie Curie did not have a large lab in a university. She was working in a tiny shed with a leaky roof because science was her passion, and she would not allow any glass ceiling to keep her back.

But there is a good sign in all this. In addition to the numerous retweets of Taylor's friend who made the shirt, there are many writers on the internet drawing attention to this misfocus of women. Props to USA Today.

> It seems to me that if you care about women in STEM, maybe you shouldn't want to communicate the notion that they're so delicate that they can't handle pictures of comic-book women…Thus, what should have been the greatest day in a man's life — accomplishing something never before done in the history of humanity — was instead derailed by people with their own axes to grind.

USA Today also wrote that this is why fewer and fewer Americans are claiming to be feminists.

> When you act like what pioneer feminist Betty Friedan once called 'female chauvinist boors,' you shouldn't be surprised to lose popularity.

Feminists and other social justice warriors, drunk on hubris, continue to fly towards the sun. But as we are seeing with GamerGate, the closer they get, the faster their wings melt. In due time, their ideology will sink into the sea.

Read More: Men Fought The Nazis, Women Slept With Them

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

The Virtue Of A Full Amphora

November 17, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The humanist Bartolomeo Scala wrote a consolatory essay to Cosimo de Medici upon the death of Cosimo's son Giovanni in 1463. The essay (Dialogus de consolatione) is presented in the form of a dialogue between Cosimo and the author. As the conversation progresses, Scala separates the "goods" (i.e., the good things which make life happy) of this world into three classes: goods of the body, goods of the soul, and a third category of what he calls "external goods." External goods are such tangibles as wealth, riches, or glory. We can list our "goods" as follows:

1. Goods of the body: Health, strength, beauty, and associated positive physical traits
2. Goods of the soul: The transcendent love of the Divine Principle, the love of wisdom and virtue, and the pursuit of the philosophic life
3. External goods: Wealth (riches), glory (honor)

Of the goods of the body, much has been said by different writers on this subject. Perhaps no blessing is as important as a sound body and regular health; before one can philosophize, one must be blessed with corporeal salubrity. And yet it is strange how some of the best philosophers have been distinctly unsound of body.

Blaise Pascal's autopsy showed a body wracked by the most terrible ailments and an abnormal cerebral cortex: his internal organs were found to be diseased, and the surface of his brain contained two depressions in it, each the size of a finger. Perhaps this was the origin of the headaches that tormented him for most of his adult life.

Descartes battled sickness from childhood. Nietzsche knew few days of health before being overtaken by insanity. We can speculate that an excess of health likely discourages the pursuit of strenuous mental effort. Plato himself seemed to think so, since (we are told) he supposedly established his Academy in a place uncongenial to physical vitality, so that his pupils would not be distracted by sensual pleasures. They might thereby, he believed, feel more incentive to sharpen their mental acuities.

As any follower of the popular celebrity culture knows, beauty has had a middling record of "goodness." It has harmed as much as it has helped. It confers great social benefits on its holders, while cursing them with vanity and neurotic disorders. Physical gifts are a blessing, but ultimately they cannot be relied upon, for Fortune can revoke them just as readily as they have been granted.

And since the gifts of beauty or health have not been earned, but rather conferred by divine decree, their holders will not readily appreciate them. They thus can often prove to be an impediment to higher achievement. Because beautiful people are treated with such automatic deference by others, they lose the incentive to cultivate their own personal virtues. Reliance on inborn traits stunts the growth and enfeebles the will, leaving them ill-equipped to withstand the inevitable shocks of life.

But what of the external goods, riches and glory? Wealth is something we all wish for, as it enables us to indulge our ambitions, insulates us (we hope) from calamity, and soothes our avarice. It is neutral, in the sense that wealth in itself will neither corrupt nor ennoble us. It only magnifies the pre-existing traits of its holders. The flawed man will become worse with wealth, and the man of good virtue will become better with it.

Wealth can thus be seen as a fertilizer for the plant that already has germinated. Where wealth does its greatest damage is when it falls into the hands of those who are not equipped to deal with it. The young, the immature, the addictive personality, the defective personality: in these hands, wealth can corrupt and destroy with startling speed. Just as one would not hand the keys to a racecar to a youth of fifteen, it would be equally hazardous to grant vast riches to one who is ill-equipped to handle it.

The excessive pursuit of wealth promotes effeminacy in men. Monetary pursuits are mostly sedentary and indoor, and an obsession with these types of activities causes the body to deteriorate, and the soul to atrophy. Wealth whets the appetite for delicacies, whether it be rich foods or sumptuous clothing. Sallust says the following about avarice:

> Avarice means the studied pursuit of money, and this no wise man obsesses over. Greed, as if imbued with a fatal poison, feminizes mind and body. It is infinite and insatiable. Neither abundance nor lack thereof can diminish it.[1]

Wealth also promotes vanity and voluptuousness, as Aulus Gellius (Attic Nights III.5) noted in a story about the philosopher Arcesilaus, who taunted a rich man for his vanity. Archesilaus disdainfully observed the dandyish qualities of his target (his speech, affected mannerisms, dress, and hair), and said to him (with a pointed sexual double entendre), “It makes no difference with what parts of your body you debauch yourself, your front or your rear.”

And what of glory? The desire for glory also seems to be ingrained in the human psyche. Perhaps it is the desire for social approval taken to the extreme. How often in history has ambition proved to be the undoing of a great leader? How often has a man of otherwise prudent judgment been led to ruin by an unnecessary indulgence in glory’s vain temptations? There are examples here beyond number.

Of all the goods discussed here, I am inclined to believe that glory is the most useless, and indeed the most harmful. Like a summer shower, it falls suddenly, and evaporates quickly in the suns of circumstance, leaving us with a damp and hollow feeling. And this is why Roman generals in the republican period, when granted a triumph after a foreign campaign, were careful to have their slaves remind them that all glory was fleeting. But enough of these matters.

We have discussed the nature and qualities of external goods. A question which hovers on the margins here is whether virtue alone is sufficient to impart a happy life. The Stoics placed so much emphasis on virtue that they seem to have lost sight of the fact that a life devoted solely to its pursuit is an arid, unfulfilling one. The body has its own needs, which it alone knows. The mind may master the body, but the body remains the instrument for our exertion of control over our physical environment.

Endurance of pain is all well and good, but just as much evil arises from the suppression of pain as from its outward expression. To claim a proud indifference to pain, or to emotion, is to numb our sensitivity to the joys of life. It is a futile attempt to deny Nature’s power over our physical form, and this can only viewed as vanity on our part.

There is an amusing anecdote which illustrates the inadequacy of virtue alone for a fulfilling life. Aulus Gellius describes a scene (Attic Nights XVIII.1) where he was walking with a group of friends along the shoreline at Ostia on a spring evening. One of the group was his close friend Favorinus, another a follower of the Stoic school, and a third friend was a Peripatetic (a follower of the Aristotelian school).

The Stoic happened to state that virtue alone was sufficient to enjoy a happy life. The Peripatetic disagreed, responding that the use and enjoyment of one's limbs, health, and similar accompaniments of good fortune were also necessary.

The Peripatetic posed this question to the Stoic. "Do you believe that an amphora of wine from which a congius has been taken, is still an amphora?"[2]

"No," said the Stoic. "You certainly could not call that an amphora."

"Then you must admit that one congius makes an amphora," replied the Peripatetic. "For if its presence makes an amphora, but its absence disqualifies it from being an amphora, then it is the deciding factor. But if it is absurd to say that one congius makes an amphora, then it is equally absurd to say that life can be made happy by virtue alone, or that removing virtue automatically prevents life from being happy."

Here Favorinus interjected. To the Peripatetic he said, "You are using a clever trick here. When an amphora lacks a congius, this makes the amphora not full. When we add a congius, it completes, rather than makes, the amphora. You should understand the key difference here. The Stoics believe that virtue is not some supplement or ingredient to be added. They believe that virtue, by itself, is what makes a happy life. It alone is the deciding factor, when it is present or absent."

Gellius does not tell us who won this argument. Perhaps both philosophers were missing the point. As for myself, I would prefer to have my amphora as full of wine as possible.

Confronting the world with a full jar of wine gladdens my heart far more readily than having a jar from which someone has lifted a drink or two. A full amphora fortifies the spirit, and perhaps this feeling of confidence is virtue's handmaiden.

More wisdom is to be found in multiple glasses of wine than in many books of the philosophers.

Read More: The Fears Of Being A World Traveler

---

[1] Bellum Catilinae XI.3.

[2] An amphora was an storage vessel used for wine, olive oil, and other liquids. A congius was a unit of measure amounting to about six pints.

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

A Story About Why You Should Never Lose Your Frame

November 17, 2014 | by Georges Rigondeaux | Link | Original Link

In all of your interactions with the female variety of homo sapiens, one thing you must always keep in mind is maintaining your frame. It cannot be jostled, impinged, detracted from, or otherwise monkeyed with if you expect success in your life. The following is an example of how seemingly innocuous circumstances can lead to losing one's frame, and the undesirable results that you can expect to follow.

Cracks in the facade

Earlier this year, I found myself in a unique position in my adult life; I was helping a girl. Not in the way you help a girl move some large items because you possess a truck and a penis, and a six pack or access to her vagina was implicit in the arrangement. No, I was unwittingly taken in, a moment of lost frame spiraling down into a bitter lesson re-learned.

In my line of work, one is frequently called upon to help certain people. In this case, a girl from a competing business had jumped ship and came to ours in search of career advancement. This was not wholly unexpected, since not only had the aforementioned business lost several people to us, but also because my coworkers and I (almost exclusively male) had fostered an environment of teamwork, camaraderie, quality, and respect that was resulting in prominent, easily identifiable success.

In short, we were winning and she wanted to be on the winning team. I was asked to help her along when she first showed up, which I was happy to do because 1) I enjoy that aspect of my job, and 2) she seemed genuinely grateful for the quality instruction I provided and how much better it was than what she had experienced before. The fact that she was a girl was, at first, a non-issue. This was the first of my mistakes.

About two weeks progressed like this and we were becoming, if not friends, at least teammates in a coach-mentor relationship. One Wednesday afternoon while I was enjoying my mid-day break, she called. At first, all I could understand were sobs. It wouldn't be a far stretch to say she was hysterical, so immediately I went into protective older brother mode. Mistake #2.

After I calmed her down, she explained that she'd been kicked out of the house she'd be living in. That situation could totally warrant someone being distraught, but given that a lot of her personal property was still in the house she'd been evicted from and she wasn't the best at problem solving, she was in total freak-out mode. I welcomed her into my home so she could get cleaned up and we then went back to pick up the rest of her belongings, which then went into my storage (once again, having a truck and a penis comes back to haunt me).

I offered several solutions for her living arrangements, and she settled on couch surfing with friends until she was back on her feet…but then she also ended up crashing on my couch. Mistake #3.

Cognitive Dissonance

One might ask how I could let this happen. A reasonable question, since I definitely knew better. But in my defense, I let my considerate nature and sense of duty to others get the better of me. Strangely, this might be the result of my military training.

Before I turned to my current profession, I had spent my entire adult life in uniform. Being a naval officer has been a big part of my identity since just after my 18th birthday. I did 5 deployments in 6 1/2 years, put off grad school, my family, marriage, and children because I believed focusing on my personal development as a leader was more important. I have noticed one commonality between myself and my peers is that when we see a wrong, we want to right it. If we cannot, we do the best we can for those in the circumstance. When we see someone who needs help, especially someone we are responsible for, we want to help them and will go to great lengths to do so.

Chip Somodevilla, Getty Images

This old instinct is what led me to lose my frame when dealing with this particular girl. I knew better than to do anything white knight-ish, but I saw a damsel in distress and my inculcation as a military leader kicked in, and there I was with my Captain Save-a-Ho cape flapping in the breeze. It's pretty elementary what happens from there: Expending time and effort to help someone who should be a fucking grown-up, punctuated by enthusiastic sex. Mistake #4. I played it straight, cleaned out most of my harem, was not dishonest with her, provided shelter, food, and companionship. And then got friendzoned.

I honestly could not remember the last time this had happened to me as an adult. I was beside myself, incredulous. I thoroughly examined the circumstances and realized that I'd fucked up, fair and square. Instead of maintaining my frame as an alpha, I took on the role of orgasm-giver AND beta provider. I couldn't even be mad at her, since I've known the fickle nature of women for so long, yet still let myself fall into this trap. Needless to say, after I shook off the few weeks I'd wasted I saw the extent to which a seemingly capable, worthwhile human being could let their hamster run wild.

Aftermath

Once it became abundantly clear that AWALT, including in this case, I stopped talking to her. We were still in the same space on an almost daily basis and in the same social circle, but I did not communicate with her in any way and barely acknowledged her presence. But I could still observe her, and all the old truths were there.

Do not listen to what a woman says, watch what she does. She'd said she didn't want to fuck me anymore because she didn't want to be intimate with someone she worked with who was a coach-type figure. A few months later, I saw her making out with one of my coworkers off the side of the parking lot. I think she may be crashing at his place now. This caused no butthurt with me, since I'm pretty sure he and I were already Eskimo Brothers, but the embarrassment she exuded after that was priceless.

She had also mentioned somewhere along the way that she'd been molested as a child by a family member. This was another red flag I chose to ignore, and she's since displayed the classic signs of attention-whoring, it leads me to believe that she was full of shit. Without listing all of the red pill truths that were on prominent display after that, I will say that herc oup-de-grace was ruining one of the most feminine qualities she had by shaving the side of her head.

It was like observing a hypothetical situation someone would pose to a fledgling red-piller about how bat shit insane even the most normal-seeming girls can end up being.

<

Frame = Success

I provide the above anecdote not in vain self-flagellation, but as a cautionary tale to players old and new. I let circumstances rattle my frame for just a moment, and paid the expected price. Luckily I'm a man: I've since replaced my harem with a whole new stable of fillies, and I'm content in my knowledge that this is one lesson I won't have to re-learn. If there's one truth that a man can't forget, it's to ALWAYS maintain your frame. If you do, you can expect success with women, and in life.

Read More: The Battle To Maintain Frame Control

Georges Rigondeaux
Georges is a former naval officer, CrossFit coach, and professional fighter. He now spends his days in the study of irregular warfare, counterinsurgency, and the high price of when diplomacy fails.

How To Make Money Trading Cryptocurrency

November 18, 2014 | by Altcoinplayer | Link | Original Link

If you have extra money lying around, you'd be surprised what you can do with it.

With just a few dollars worth of Bitcoin you can start trading cryptocurrencies right now. There are no broker fees, there are no middlemen to deal with, nor really any barriers to entry or red tape. All you need is some percentage of a single Bitcoin. There is no reason not to try it out. If you can accept risking a few dollars, it's a great way to get into cryptocurrency.

I started trading with less than $40 worth of Bitcoin.

I gradually traded my way up to 5.5 Bitcoin (worth over $5000 at the time) in less than a month or two. This isn't to suggest that trading is something that's easy or effortless. Losing money is an inevitable part of trading and investing, but you can certainly minimize risk and loses with the right strategies. The reality is that if trading were an easy, risk free way to make money, everyone would be a trader. However, if you're a strategically minded person, patient, and able to research and analyze market trends, you'll enjoy trading cryptocurrency.

But what is cryptocurrency?

Cryptocurrency is more than just a bunch of digital numbers that people have decided to use as money. The technology that was brought forth by Bitcoin is essentially a decentralized public ledger system, known as the Blockchain. This cryptographic Blockchain technology is what makes Bitcoin, Litecoin, Darkcoin, and other Bitcoin-alternatives a “cryptocurrency.”

Cryptocurrency is the real Occupy Wall Street

Being a decentralized ledger, the Blockchain can never be controlled or manipulated by a single institution. Its design makes transactions virtually error proof, and it can also do much more than just transfer the ownership of digital currency; it can be used for transferring assets and shares of companies, smart contracts, commodities, and escrow services. This technology will likely change the future of finance as we know it, democratizing financial markets while simultaneously eliminating “banksters.”

If you’re just getting your feet wet with cryptocurrency, all the technical jargon can seem overwhelming.

It’s important to learn, but for now, If you’re just interested in trading and investing, having a basic common-sense understanding of business, consumer demand, and economics is enough to give you an edge over other traders (at the moment). Most of the current batch of traders are early cryptocurrency adopters, cryptocurrency “miners,” programmers, and basically people that are more tech savvy than business/market savvy.

They’re focused on small technological innovations that help build hype for a coin in the short term, without giving much thought about how the coin will exist outside of the exchanges and crypto community. This gives you a huge advantage.

So let’s get started. First buy some Bitcoin.

There are some exchanges that will let you purchase specific cryptocurrencies for USD, but it's a better idea to buy Bitcoin first. With some Bitcoin, you can trade into and out of every other cryptocurrency on the market, on every crypto exchange. Remember: you don't have to buy a whole Bitcoin ($390 as of writing this); you can purchase Bitcoin in fractions known as Satoshis; for example, 500k Satoshis equals 0.005 Bitcoin. The safest, most popular place to purchase Bitcoin is coinbase.com, however you can also go to an exchange that has a USD-BTC pairing to try to trade USD for Bitcoin at a cheaper rate.

Now that you have some Bitcoin, it's time to find an exchange.

The most reliable exchange I've found is Bittrex.com. There are other exchanges: some are good, some are bad, some have been shut down already — the Mt. Gox scandal might ring a bell. Some people are discouraged from cryptocurrency altogether when there's news of an exchange getting shut down or coins being stolen, but I see all of this as a right of passage for any new market that is still in its infancy. I find it very encouraging that most of these shady exchanges have been terminated and their CEOs have been doxxed and sued to hell.

News spreads very quickly in the crypto world, so check news feeds daily.

You will usually see smoke before there's a fire, as long as you pay attention to the news on twitter. Crypto exchanges and businesses are being talked about on twitter. Check in on twitter and crypto forums daily, follow hash tags, see what people are talking about. Information is power, news is power, and rumors are opportunities!

Once you have Bitcoin in your exchange account, you can start trading.

However, before you just randomly pick some cryptocurrencies and watch their charts, I recommend you do some research first; otherwise you're trading blindly. The best way to learn about each coin is to search it, like "Cannabiscoin ann" – "ann" as in announcement. This search phrase will lead you to the bitcointalk.org forums, to the official announcement thread of Cannabiscoin.

An official announcement thread of a coin will show you important information: Total coin supply, technical details, development plans, mission statement, community speculation, and a lot more. Additionally, Twitter is a great resource not just for news, but tracking down web pages and other forums related to a cryptocoin.

Trading basics.

Researching the market is referred to as "fundamental analysis." By gaining the right information at the right time and understanding how it will interact with the market, it becomes easier to stay predict trends — essentially whether or not a cryptocoin will rise or fall. In addition to fundamental analysis, you also have "technical analysis." Technical analysis is equally important, but it refers specially to studying charts and finding patters—for example, at a certain price, a coin will fall repeatedly.

The most basic but important thing to remember: Buy low, Sell high.

The best time to buy a coin is after it has been dumped.

Why? Because the people that didn't cash out during the pump (called "bag holders") don't want to sell their coin at the bottom, at a much lower price. It goes without saying that if the price of a coin you've bought moves upward quickly, it's best to cash out, back into Bitcoin. And If it's a good coin that you want to invest in for the long term, make sure you buy back in after a dump. Sometimes it is better to focus on accumulating good coins rather than making more Bitcoin, because a good coin will always rise again.

That's how trading is done.

Read More: Bitcoin Is Creating A New Class Of Millionaires

Altcoinplayer

ROK Now Has A Little Brother: Reaxxion.com

November 18, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

As I wrote on my blog yesterday, I'm proud to announce the official launch of a new video game site called Reaxxion. It is based on the ROK model where articles are submitted by weekly columnists and guest posters.

To understand why I opened this site, take a look at Welcome To Reaxxion. Here's an excerpt:

> I'm starting a video game site even though I haven't played video games seriously since the year 2000 (Starcraft was my jam). I don't even play mobile games. I won't blow smoke up your ass by pretending I'm a gamer or have a deep commitment in furthering game technology. My only commitment is with helping men.
>
> I aim to protect the interests of heterosexual Western males, a category I'm in. The far-left is trying to censor and criminalize masculine behaviors that are normal. They want to relabel consensual sex as "rape" and relabel innocent flirting as "harassment," and as I learned with #gamergate, they've successfully infected the gaming industry and gaming journalist sites by damaging the very nature of gaming development to fit their extreme political agenda. So while I > don’t play video games, the idea of starting a pro-#gamergate site is compatible with my overall mission.

You can see from the the 480 comments on that post that the site was already attacked by feminists and SJW’s. Here’s a video I did which includes examples of their hysterical response:

My plan is to get the site on firm footing for the first three months and then pass editor duties to an experienced gamer who knows much more about the industry than I do. In the meantime, here is a small sampling of articles we published so far:

- Why Men Will Always Need Games
- 5 Reasons Why Working In The MMO Industry Sucks
- Civilization: Beyond Earth Shows Firaxis Has Lost Touch
- The Great Star Citizen Swindle And The Failure Of Crowdfunding
- 5 Reasons Why I’m A Retro Gamer

If you have a friend who plays video games, please spread the word. I hope that Reaxxion will serve the needs of men who enjoy video games but don’t want to be manipulated by the far left, and if they are ever ready to dive into the red pill, we will happily welcome them.

Follow Reaxxion On Twitter Or On Facebook

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Welcome To The Part Time Economy

November 18, 2014 | by jim soler | Link | Original Link

Do you find it difficult to land a full-time job these days? Does it seem like for every full-time position you apply to you are competing against hundreds of other résumés? You might have a full-time job that you absolutely hate, but are frightened to quit because you realize there isn't much full-time work out there.

If you are like many Americans these days, there's a decent chance you have two or three part-time jobs. One of those jobs might feel like full-time work, but without benefits, such as paid vacation time and so forth.

Sure, working multiple part-time jobs or having alternative sources of income may allow more flexibility in terms of travel and lifestyle, but at the end of the day, it becomes exhausting. You might be paying the bills and driving a late-model car, but that irregular work schedule is also digging into the aging process. That is no fun, nor a way to live. What's more is that while full-time employees are building 401Ks and pensions, your hard work often goes unrewarded. Flexibility is great, but a little security within a civilized and developed society is also a necessity.

At the moment, you might be in your 20s or 30s and wondering what the hell is going on with the economy? What happened to this country which you were told repeatadly was the strongest ever known to man. It definitely isn't what you envisioned back in high school or during your time in university.

If you glance at the news or even skim through a paper for a few minutes, there always seems to be a mentioning of job creation, with stats implying that thousands of jobs are being created each month. This is true. Unfortunately, a great number of these positions are part time. As of June, only 47.5% of eligible American adults were working full-time and that number is expected to drop.

It's not just cashier position at Walgreens—traditionally good jobs in fields such as nursing and education are now often being reassigned as part time. While full-time positions offering benefits, healthcare, and paid vacation still exist, they are a trait of the old economy. Unfortunately, all indicators suggest that we are on track to descend further down this myopic path of part-time unsustainability.

Why is this happening?

Well, it's not really rocket science. Capitalism may be the best form of an economic system that we have, but unfettered free-market capitalism invokes excessive greed and a lack of responsbility for the well-being of society. It is merely in the interest of big business and the upper class to gradually institutionalize a part-time economy.

We can point to a myriad of factors, such as outsourcing, global competitiveness, and a growing global middle class that has caught up to the American middle class. However, the reality is that too many American business owners, decision makers, and those part of the upper class are simply becoming increasingly greedy. Put the politics aside, as this isn't some leftist rant. The reality is that we are in the midst of class warfare, and we are getting our asses handed to us. We are losing on all fronts: psychologically, ideologically and intellectually.

Who is to blame?

At a time like this, it's only natural to point the finger at the political left or right. Traditionally, the left and the Democrats have always been known as the political order fighting for working Americans and the well-being of society. However, the Left as it exist today is as much pathetic as it is useless. The great irony is that the American Left no longer fights for middle and lower classes. The Left has been overtaken by pretentious progressives and hipsters who are more concerned with protecting the rights of transexuals, saving kittens, or making sure their $5 cup of coffee is 100% organic.

Don't get me wrong, I am all for clean and chemical-free food, protecting the rights of people, and preventing animal cruelty, but what about the fact that millions of Americans are without job security, benefits, or any hope in the workplace? The reality is that the American Left is run by a bunch of oversensetive, annoying, and spoiled pussies. They are mostly white kids who grew up in the suburbs, but migrated to the large cities after university and are suddenly here to save the world.

If you are reading this and you are a conservative, then you can go fuck yourself as well because I am definitely not on your side. That's right. You are just as big as a cocksucker as your whiny hipster counterparts. The politics of Bill Clinton, Barack Obama, and Jimmy Carter are nowhere near what you espouse to be socialism. Have you ever actually read a book on Marxism? Better yet, have you ever read a book in your life?

Anyone with a half a brain can realize that a healthcare system is practical and better for the long-term economy. The free market can do wonderful things and it has given us so many great products, inventions, and ideas. However, don't put it on a pedestal. The market is great, but it has flaws. Thus, it has to be tweaked, manipulated, and in some cases regulated for the betterment of society.

Ultimately, we have to blame ourselves for being duped by the "politricks" of the Left and Right. The business class wants us to take sides. They want us to fall into an ugly abyss of patriotism, single-issue campaigns and ignorance, while ignoring the real underlying economic dysfunctions that have a greater overall impact on our daily lives.

What can we do about it?

First, we have to face reality. The part-time economy is here to stay. It has been institutionalized within a new form of economic governeance. If you have a full-time job at the moment, accept the fact that you may be working two part-time positions in the future. If you are stuggling to get by on your sole part-time gig, then you need to reinvent yourself.

In this economy, we need to be constantly redefining and improving our resumes. We must not only focus on one skill, but a variety of them. Learn HTML, SEO, web design, WordPress, or even get a TEFL or TESOL certificate to teach English abroad. If you are not good with computers or business, then learn to be. Going back to get another master's degree or PhD probably won't do much at this point, but picking up a couple of certificates and adding new skills to your arsenal will.

The world is not what we thought it would be 20 years ago, and now is the time to adjust. Start a business, service and supplement your income online, but don't forgot to encourage and offer advice to others struggling in the new part-time economy.

Read More: Your Parents Were Middle Class Because Of The Soviet Union

---

jim soler
Jim is a traveler and freelance writer that has lived in many countries and currently is traveling the world. He enjoys interacting with different cultures and stirring up interesting conversations.

The Roots Of Masculinity In Ancient Rome

November 18, 2014 | by Atlas | Link | Original Link

Few civilizations have been granted the honor, by Providence, to stand as equal to the best. The Ancient Roman Empire, however, is one such civilization. Sitting at the table among the titans of history, Ancient Rome is regarded as one of the largest and most influential empires the world has ever known. Certainly up until that point, only the Macedonian and Achaemenid empire had controlled large swaths of land, but both quickly sunk into the annals of history.

Stretching from Hadrian's wall in Britannia (modern day England) to the banks of the Euphrates river, the Romans affectionately described their legacy as imperium sine fine, or "empire without end." With roughly forty-seven modern day countries within its grasp, almost no civilization during her millennia-long existence went untouched by the tentacles of commerce or by Rome's colossal war machine. What started out as a monarchy evolved into a republic, and because of military expansion and thus need for centralized power, ushered in imperial Rome. During this imperial period, Rome acquired the majority of what history would remember as the Roman Empire.

While Rome is most often remembered for the debauchery associated with certain emperors and its many technical advancements, what was truly remarkable about Rome was the way Romans were expected to steadfastly attend to virtue. The culture was permeated with the idea that one would achieve excellence and renown amongst fellow citizens through pursuit of certain virtues. These virtues were either were specific to their station in life or were general overarching ideas for a civil society. Nonetheless, most Romans, including women, were judged on their ability to effectively and competently fulfill their role in the Republic.

Roman society, especially Roman public service and military life, was notoriously meritorious. There was no coddling, and certainly no handouts; both of which are prevalent throughout the west today. Any public appointment or respect in the community was earned through attendance to virtue and tangible deed that reflected ones commitment to excellence.

To be respected in ancient Rome, and especially to be considered for membership in the senate or military elite, one was in constant pursuit of attaining excellence. While the Romans had many virtues they aspired to, Virtus, or “manly character” was the most important for those who served in the public sphere. From the freshest legionnaire, to the emperor himself, Virtus was the most highly prized trait a man could have. If a man was able to have Virtus associated with his name, it was likely that he would one day hold high public office.

While the exact definition of Virtus varies among philosophers, and evolves throughout the history of the Roman Empire, Virtus was introduced by Plato and refined by Cicero into four specific virtues. These virtues are as follows: prudence, bravery, justice, and self-restraint. (Note: The reader might recognize these as the “four cardinal virtues” found in theology—this is because they were co-opted by Thomas Aquinas during the 13th century A.D.)

It was apparent to the men of Rome, but especially to men of power, that it was manly virtue that distinguished them from those whom they considered barbarians. It was their Virtus that made them great. There was no doubt; the Romans believed they were victorious because they were better men than their adversaries. They were certain that it was Virtus which would make or break them as men, as would it determine the success of their civilization. The Romans were correct, it seems, considering large scale moral decadence seemed perfectly to correspond with the downfall.

> Virtus is the badge of the Roman race and breed. All else is false and doubtful, ephemeral and changeful: only virtus stands firmly fixed, its roots run deep, it can never be shaken by any violence, never moved from its place. With this virtus your ancestors conquered all Italy first, then razed Carthage, overthrew Numantia, brought the most powerful kings and the most warlike peoples under the sway of this empire. -Cicero

Modern Society

One would think with a clear message like this from history, Western Civilization would be able to go forth and achieve even more, for an even longer period than our Mediterranean forefathers. In any reasonable society, the life and times of great virtuous men would be blasted throughout the culture. We don't belong to a reasonable society, though, in fact one that is sick by most measures.

We seem to not only have what is important completely reversed, but we even venture to find the degradation of values as cause for celebration. We forsake truth for the sake of political correctness, and shun the successful ideas of great men in favor of the ruthless doctrine of a failed false utopia. Telling enough, when I recall my Advanced Placement literature class in high school, I remember being offered a choice between "Black Feminist Theory" or just "Feminist Theory" as potential topics for my essay.

A critical aspect of civilization that has been almost completely washed out of modern society is the aspiration toward a good character. There are very few institutions left that teach the traditional manly character that built all of Western Civilization. It has always been an insane idea that these empty and ambiguous catchphrases like "social justice" and "kindness" that are oft quoted by leftists are expected to cure the ills of society.

The idea of what it means to be good has gone from prudence to running around naked at the gay pride parade, from restraint to indulging in whatever emotion feels right, from bravery to demonizing people who have a different opinion than you, and from justice to engaging in anything to further the SJW cause even if it means ignoring the truth.

A Return of Kings

If we men want to renew our civilization, void of illogical dogma and abject ignorance, why not begin by adopting the very way of life that ushered our civilization into the once-great civilization it has been in the past? The doctrine of emotion that the mainstream Cultural Marxist society perpetuates today is also the doctrine of weakness.

It is rooted in myopic thought and a lack of depth of understanding. Perhaps if men can once again find Virtus, we can find the manly character to be bold in the face of mainstream criticism. In due time, real men will show themselves and act as an antidote to the venom coursing through the veins of western civilization.

Read More: Is Feminism Really Killing Masculinity?

Atlas
Atlas is a longtime veteran of the culture war. He's trying to learn and do as much as he can before he becomes ashes and dust.

3 Things I Learned At Improv Class

November 19, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

Here at ROK we frequently say that you should constantly be working on ways to improve yourself. To that end, I recently enrolled in a beginners improv course to see what effect, if any, it would have on my conversational and social skills, as well as on my confidence. While the class definitely paid dividends in each of these areas, it also turned out to be a lot of fun—so much so that I'm planning on taking another early next year. Below I outline what an improv class is like, and share the top three things I learned.

Improv—short for improvisation—is the art of producing spontaneous, acted scenes, usually between small groups of people. They can be comic, serious, or something in between.

Who Goes to a Beginners Improv Class?

You will likely find a fairly motley collection of people at your local improv class. Some will be aspiring actors, perhaps with prior training. Others will be stiff, slightly desperate office drones, in search of a creative outlet. Others still will be directionless millennials, just coming to understand—dimly—that their post-humanities degree cubicle job is entirely with out value or dignity, and that this is their lot until they die, and that it is therefore pleasurable to forget by hollering and whooping for a few hours, indulging in adult "play." Most will be friendly, though, offering you the chance to widen your social circle if you so wish.

Put aside your reservations about the irredeemably chodey reputation that improv has in some quarters. This is largely unjustified, and anyway, there is a lot to be learned from it.

What Happens At Class?

An improv class usually caters for between ten and fifteen students and is run by a tutor.

The tutor may or may not be a failed actor who is compelled to make a living this way. Or they may be a bright-eyed, hippyish former drama student who is really into connecting with her inner child and one day hopes to be in a Gap advert. It depends.

The tutor will lead the class through a series of warm-up games and exercises, before gradually getting small groups of people to enact scenes in front of the rest of the class. They will give instructions along the lines of "imagine you're all on a plane and . . . the plane is made of jelly!'"

These scenarios may be devised by the tutor or the by the rest of the group. To imagine what this is like, think back to drama class at school. Yes, I'm, afraid all of that "be a tree" stuff is out there waiting for you. This time, though, it will be with a bunch of adults in some shabby disused rehearsal space in the arty, rent-controlled side of town.

To get the most out of improv you should put your cynicism aside. In real life I am by nature someone who is more comfortable with serious conversations, and who can find "organized fun" a little embarrassing. But the purpose of taking an improv class is to expand the limits of your character, so you should go in prepared to shed your inhibitions.

I made a pact with myself to forget about my normal limitations for the two hours I was there and just open myself up to a new experience. If you do the same, then improv will definitely pay dividends, improving your confidence and social skills. Here are three specific things I learned, and how they can be applied in everyday life.

1. Say Yes to Everything

One of the fundamentals of improv is saying yes—that is, not blocking the flow of a scene by dumping on someone else's idea. So, if someone says "we're on a spaceship made of cheese," then rather than telling them it's a crap idea, you should say "yes" by eagerly taking the bait and running with it, building on and extending what has been proposed.

This can work very well in normal conversation. Say you are talking to a girl in a nightclub, and she starts talking about something that bores you, like her holiday in Florida. Rather than shutting her down and trying to change topics, try latching onto what she has said and mining it for humorous possibilities or extending it to the point of absurdity. In the case of the Florida comment, you could talk about the two of you overthrowing Mickey and Minnie Mouse as the king and queen of Disneyland. Anything stupid and fun to create vibe and keep the conversation going.

If you've done some improv training you'll find you will quickly become more adept at this as your brain starts to find quirky little connections faster.

2. You Don't Have to Worry About Being Funny or Clever

In improv, you are taught not to sweat being the next Steve Martin or Nietzsche. Not everything that comes out of your mouth is going to be a perfectly-formed Wildean bon-mot, or earth-shatteringly intelligent. The good news is, this is the same for everyone, so don't worry about it. When you take the pressure off yourself to be impressive, you will find that your mind works more efficiently and that strangely you are more able to come up with those conversational gems than when you are trying too hard.

Again, this works really well when you are in a social setting such as a club or bar. Give yourself permission to say stupid and even boring things sometimes. It really doesn't matter—your main aim should simply be to keep the conversation going. When you practice this a few times you'll be pleasantly surprised about how entertaining you can be when you're relaxed.

3. The Awesome Power of Sustained Eye Contact

Having to act in scenes with people in character for sometimes up to ten minutes at a time, in particular with people who had had acting training, really honed my ability to hold eye contact without embarrassment for long periods of time. In any kind of acting, the ability to be still and self-contained is crucial. The class really helped me with this. Even after a few short weeks, I now find that I am able to look at people more steadily and unwaveringly then before. This really helps in all types of interactions, from meeting girls to holding successful business meetings.

I can't recommend improv enough for instilling and honing these basic social skills. I am certainly glad I took the class and I look forward to beginning again in the new year.

For more on using simple social skills to meet beautiful women, click here.

Read More: The Most Important Trait that Leads to Male Success

Troy Francis
Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Sharpen Your Tribal Instincts To Lead In Modern Society

November 19, 2014 | by Andrian Red | Link | Original Link

In the olden days, when civilization was strictly hierarchical, a man's value and status was determined by his lineage or how he could ascend to the top. There were many problems with this, namely bloodshed, foul play, manipulation, and nepotism. However, the hierarchy did serve a purpose: to bring order and structure to tribes. Those leaders who seemed to be just and competent were able to expand their civilizations and gather many resources (and vaginas).

However, these days, such outright thirst for power and resources only signals neediness and weakness. What happened? What changed? More importantly, what must the modern man become to lead his modern tribe to the promise land?

In essential, my argument is that the evolution of a freer society will necessitate a man to use age-old intuitions to shape the new world according to his standards and values. He does so by defining what his modern tribe means to him, and to sharpen and channel his aggression to protect and further its influence.

What is the modern tribe?

We are ancient beings living in a technological world. Although we surround ourselves with technology and would like to believe that our days walking the plains of Africa are far behind us, the truth is that our brains still contain the beliefs and impulses of those days. The more we try to repress this, the more troubling they become to us. The more we distract ourselves with frivolous activities, the more depressed we become.

The answer is not to abandon technology altogether (though some have taken this extreme route). The answer is to realize that technology is a tool used for us to express our purpose. So then this expression of purpose becomes the core of what I define as the modern tribe. This tribe is not defined by a set of particular physical traits, or physical boundaries, or by our chosen names.

> This tribe is defined by our ideas and how we carry them from inception to fruition.

Who belongs to your tribe?

Through this purpose, and all the trials and tribulations that it, and you, will go through, that your intuitions as a modern leader will sharpen and harden into true personal power that you can use to influence others. Who are the others? They are those who hold and cherish the same values and ideals as you do. They deserve to be protected and taken care of by you. They serve your purpose just as you serve their well-being. They give you something to live for, and if necessary, to die for.

Understand that the modern tribe is constantly in flux according to new information and ideals. However, your core set of values will remain constant and hardened. At the outer edges of this tribe, there are the people who share hobbies and interests with you. They interact with you in a fairly regular basis, but at a low amount of engagement. At the middle layer of your tribe, those who labor alongside you, but don't necessary share all of your visions and objectives. They are here because your interests overlap with them for the time being. Once that change, they will no longer be there.

At the core is where those who believe in you and your beliefs sit. These people are often not who you grew up with or share demographics with at all. They may come from an entirely different set of circumstances. However, they share a common set of values and beliefs with you. Robert Greene remarked in his book the 50th Law that he and 50 Cent share more ideals and visions than anyone of his other close associates ever will. Your job in life is to seek out these people and work tireless with them.

What does it mean to be a leader?

Through my years of schooling, university, and even a job at a top consulting firm, no one has been able to concretely describe to me what a leader truly is. It was not until I got into game that it became overly clear to me than a leader is someone who seeks moments of danger and overcomes his fears through them. There are other traits, such as confidence, charisma, vision, etc., but I can always argue that these qualities are developed through the constant facing of one's own vulnerabilities. The thrill of overcoming one's own fear is so exhilarating that it injects pure adrenaline and endorphin to the brain, creating feelings of fearlessness and untold personal powers.

The leader of the modern tribe needs to have the initiative and authority, which comes from the Latin word author, which means to create ideas, to seek out challenges and overcome them. Without it, he is simply an empty throne. This is true today as it was hundreds of years ago. To breathe meaning and life into your purpose, you must embody it every day and every moment. Any lapse in consciousness and others will find a way to attack it. Or worse, your own mind will find a way to subvert through a myriad of distractions and procrastinations.

What do we worship?

Whether or not you subscribe to a religious belief, your brain is wired to find something to worship. Even when religious icons and dogmas fade, new brand symbols and mottos will drive you to value them even more than life itself. Instead of resisting this desire, which becomes a form of worship itself (think of the anarchy symbol), you can create and channel this desire into a positive and self-fulfilling one.

Think of the goddess Athena. She embodies wisdom and stoicism in how we face our challenges and enemies. She is a worthwhile ideal to worship if your values align with hers. The matter of fact is that every tribe will need some sort of symbol or ideal to worship. And as the de facto priest, you will need to be careful with how you craft this form of worship. People (including yourself) always need something to believe in, something to fight and sacrifice for, so why not make this symbol a positive and truly transcendent one?

What is your brand and icon?

In this modern tribe, where every aspect seems chaotic and changing, you need to have a brand and symbol to strive for. To expand your sphere of influence, you will need to be an entrepreneur without the bloodshed or greed. You will need to lobby and hustle. You will need to defend and challenge. You will need to grow and suffer a little bit because of it. Actually, make that a lot of suffering. They don't call it a passion for no reason.

In the true entrepreneurial spirit, you will seek out new ideas and people to invest in. Seek out those who share the same values and styles as you. This is the hardest but the most rewarding aspect of being an entrepreneur in the new world.

What about the feminine?

As you channel all the forces of conscious to create and define your modern tribe, which can be liken to a masculine force (defined by logic and consciousness), there will be positive and negative feminine forces which encourage but also damage your ship. Feminine forces are free-flowing without rhyme and reason. These forces are very attractive for truly masculine forces. However, without proper management, these forces can also be damaging. Just as the wind can propel a sailboat, it can also create a storm to knock it down.

The best approach to this force is to establish clear values and boundaries for them to flow into and around. The positive forces will propel and inspire you, while the negative forces will simply flow around and away from you.

I speak of the feminine force in general (instead of women) because these forces can also come in the form of other irate and irrational men. They exhibit lack of consciousness and self-control, and their needs will pull you along and destroy your ideals if you are not careful.

Why should you establish your modern tribe?

As Dr. Nathaniel Branden stated in his book, The Six Pillars of Self-Esteem,

> A life without purpose is hardly one worth living

As you work to find a sense of purpose and meaning to your days, you will find that you need help from others as well as well to lead others to do the same. These desires are not by chance. This is how men have learned to lead and cooperate with others through centuries of evolution. Naturally, this mind meld creates a sort of tribe (or cult, in some extreme religious ideals). These tribes were divided between geography, and consequently, similar physical features.

However, to overcome modern challenges and establish a sense of purpose that we all need to live fulfilling lives, we will form virtual tribes and niches. Ultimately, however, every man will be his own tribe, his own brand, and his own set of values. Though he may share it with others and encourage them to do the same, he alone must face his demons and depend on no one else to do it for him.

That is what it means to live in a modern tribe, and become a modern man.

Read More: The 10 Most Important Principles of Leadership

Andrian Red
Andrian is a lifelong learner, devoted skeptic and ethical hedonist. He is the founder of www.thequintessentialman.com, the only online community that offers a holistic approach to masculine self-growth. He is also the creator of "30 Challenges-30 Days-Zero Excuses", a challenging project aimed to help men take back control of their life.

The Quest For Financial Independence In A Welfare State

November 19, 2014 | by Carnival Of Gangs | Link | Original Link

I live in Finland, the country in the north that is known for Santa Claus, Nokia, and sauna. To be fair, I don't really know how people from other countries perceive Finnish culture or economy. Finland is typically known for its relatively high education and functional welfare system that was quickly built after World War 2. Because of these benefits, it is a common saying here that being born in Finland "is like winning the lottery."

Except it isn't. The public sector in Finland has grown tremendously throughout the last decades, and governmental debt is also through the roof, leading to an unsustainable situation. The private sector can't fund the bloated public sector, whose wages are actually higher on average, for much longer. Ridiculously high taxes come with the deal, as well as progressive payroll taxes that discourage high earnings. Really puts you in the mood to become an entrepreneur, doesn't it?

As another author noted previously, the ideology driving the whole country is plain socialism under the disguise of "social democracy." This includes the scourges of cultural marxism, feminism, equalism, mindless immigration from Islamic countries, and all the fun stuff that runs civilizations to the ruins. I'm sure active ROK readers are familiar with these.

Digging for a solution

It becomes clearer by the day that it will be difficult to count on the government to continue handing out benefits. So what's the best way to deal with this? I decided to make the best of it and invest my way off this shit. To accomplish this, what investing strategy should you choose, and do you have to be Warren Buffet-like mastermind to become financially independent? The answer is no, and I'm going to tell you why.

Investing is a topic far too large to cover in one little article. So I highly recommend that you get into the basics by reading books, and of course the internet is full of useful material. So I will only tell you about my strategy, why I chose it, and why I think it's going to work in the long run.

At first I studied about investing as much as I could, and acquired vast amounts of knowledge about the topic. Basically, there are many possibilities to choose from if one wants to start investing. Stocks, bonds, real estate, and different kind of funds etc. You can choose just one of them or combine different instruments to your portfolio. Hell, you can even lend money to your friends with an interest rate. You should definitely look into different allocations because allocation itself is the one main reason that explains over 90% of the expected returns.

Enter index funds

After my studies I chose to invest in stocks via passive index funds. Index funds are basically just funds that attempt to emulate the overall performance of a certain segment of a market. ETF's (exchange traded funds) are certain kinds of index funds, but their fund units are traded on the stock market like any other stock.

There are a lot of indexes that measure the change in different markets, so there are many possibilities to form an index fund. Basically what you're doing is buying many different stocks at once. By buying several different index funds, you can adjust your strategy to the direction you want. That way your portfolio becomes diversified on its own. Even by buying just one index fund, your portfolio can gain most of the benefits related to diversification. I recommend that you visit http://www.ifa.com/ for further exploration.

I mentioned earlier that the instrument of my strategy is a passive index fund. The key here is "passive." Active funds and active stock trading mean that the trader, broker, or in the case of funds a portfolio manager takes a certain view of the market which is supposed to beat the market in returns. The problem with active trading is that even the so-called professionals rarely know what they are doing, and timing the market—trying to pick the right time to buy or sell—is actually impossible. Those points have been shown in studies over and over again.

Of course there are exceptions and people who have continuously beat the market returns, but how can you know that your portfolio manager is one of those? With active investing also come the costs of activity, including trading costs, taxes, and the different fees for managing the portfolio. Passive investing lets you mostly avoid those because the fees of the portfolio manager are significantly lower, hence the bigger returns in the long term. You of course have to pay taxes after realization of the investment, but with funds one can avoid it as long as possible.

Passive index funds actually don't even have portfolio managers per se. They just have people to take care that the fund is balanced and thus represents the index it is emulating. What most people don't realize is that the whole financing industry and the products it offers to common people are mostly bullshit. Most investing products and active funds are just there to make money for the companies offering them via managing fees. Don't believe that they care about how your particular investments are doing.

In fact, many funds are actually so called "hidden indexes," where the portfolio manager is too afraid to take a real view on the market to make extra returns. So, he just makes it an index fund and still collects the higher fees related to active funds. And why would he take a real view and risk it, because if he takes a wrong view it would cost him his job. It's better for him to go and "be wrong" along with the market indexes against which the performance of the portfolio manager's fund is measured.

The time-saving advantage

Considering the fact that most people have day jobs, hobbies, and some hustling to do on the side there's not too much time left to monitor the stock market, which is quite pointless anyway in the aggregate. Trying to foresee the future of the stock market even based on past returns is nearly impossible, especially without complex algorithms.

The average market return rate is considered to be from 8% to 9% per year. So from that you have to extract the fund managing fees etc., which in my case are 0.5% on average, significantly lower than in active funds. Inflation and other things should also be taken to account, but the real path to financial independence is dependent on your lifestyle choices. I have a good view of the amount of money that I need to "retire" and I try to invest as much as I can on a monthly basis. That gives a nice time-based diversification also—look up "dollar cost averaging."

My goal is not to retire in a sense that common people perceive it, but rather to become financially independent so that I can give all my time to my real passions like music and weight lifting. The key is not to make hasty decisions based on market positions. The market goes up and down, and the basic psychology behind the behavior of most investors usually forces them to sell at the wrong time. With passive investing you ride out a depression, all the while buying cheap stocks and waiting for the market to go up again.

The key is to find your strategy and stick to it. This simple idea works because so many people really can't commit to it—in Finland, in the U.S., or anywhere else. Determine an allocation and instruments and start investing constantly. Other sites give a decent introduction to safe withdrawal rates, the amount of money to save for retirement, and the concepts behind it. Start now, and build for your future.

Read More: I Will Teach You To Be Rich

Carnival Of Gangs

Lauri from Carnival Of Gangs is an engineer and a musician who is trying to find some truth in the world. Check out the multimedia series here: Carnival Of Gangs

How To Spark Sexual Attraction By Showing Your Desire

November 19, 2014 | by Maxim Adam | Link | Original Link

According to Mark Manson in his well-known book, Models: Attract Women through Honesty: "

> Women are turned on by being wanted, by being desired. Suddenly, seemingly disconnected events that arouse women—a romantic marriage proposal in one instance, and a rape fantasy in another—make sense. Both indicate an extreme display of desire in her by a man."

Women desire to be desired. Many healthy women have rape fantasies not because they literally want to be raped, but because those fantasies makes them feel as if they are submitting to a man's powerful desire for her. This desire to be desirable is a little narcissistic, as it implies that since a man desires her, she must be attractive. This often fuels women's egos to believe they are more attractive than they actually are.

Once in a night club in Taiwan I stood on the edge of the dance floor contemplating whether or not I should go home, because I had already had a fun night. I noticed a girl dancing not far from me. A French guy started dancing behind her, trying to get her attention. When he did this her movements became even more exaggerated. I could actually see her ego swelling. I laughed to myself at this scene and then looked away from her.

Almost instantly she was dancing right next to me, pressing her body up against me as her ego begged for my attention. The more I ignored her the more she struggled to pull my attention to her. Finally she couldn't take it anymore and tried to kiss me.

She wasn't ugly on the outside, but her neediness turned me off. By basing her self-worth on male attention and her ego's need for validation I just didn't feel interested in her. Although I hesitated when I realized this, I let her kiss me for an instant before pushing her away. She immediately ran away with her prize. A tiny piece of male attention made her feel like an attractive, desirable woman.

Women get accustomed to free attention and easily become frustrated when they don't get it.

Women of every level of attractiveness get thousands of messages on Facebook and other social media from men giving away free attention. They comment on her photos and beg for her approval by complimenting how "hot," "beautiful" or "sexy" she is. These messages fuel her ego and make her feel desired before she has even earned this male attention. She then develops an entitled attitude, in which she expects men should desire her and give her attention, but she feels absolutely no obligation to give any value in return.

Your attention is the most valuable commodity you can provide a woman. When you give it freely you are implying your attention is very cheap. Attention should be earned. This applies to all forms of attention you could give a girl. Even if you argue with a woman it implies that on some level you care about her opinion.

When should you express your desire?

Would you ever walk up to a random girl on the street and start the conversation with, "Hey, I just had to tell you, you are the sexiest girl I've seen today!" or even something a little crazier, "hey you are sexy, will you come home with me?"?

I'm sure some of you would. I've started conversations a few times by pointing out I find a girl sexy with mixed results. Many girls just walked away, and a few were pleasantly flattered by the forward compliment.

Of course, the exact words you say are not as important as the vibe you give off when you are interacting with people, but the point here is that stating to a woman you find her sexy or desirable before she has earned your attention devalues what you have to offer.

Letting a woman know you find her desirable is best after she has earned your attention. She may not consciously realize exactly what is going on, but it will feel much more exciting to her to be desired by a man whose attention she has earned than to feel desired by random beta guys who throw away their attention without her first working for it.

How do you let her know you want her?

I was once on a first date with a girl and after a couple hours of getting to know each other, I stood in front of her, looked into her eyes, a sly smile on my face, and I stepped even closer, inches from her lips. Invading her private space, I asked a simple question,

“So what do you want to eat?” And I was just hungry and wondering what we should have for dinner.

But later, after I took her home for the first time, I asked her, “so when did you first think about kissing me?”

You can probably guess she said it was when I was giving her that intimidating look and asking what was for dinner. Even though we had only been hanging out about an hour at that time I made her feel like I wanted to eat her for dinner. And she loved it. Even subtly implying my desire for her was enough to trigger arousal.

One time I had just met a girl at a small party and after convincing her to sit next to me and give me a massage, I leaned in, pushed her hair aside, and smelled her neck. After I took her home that night, she later told me that it was when I smelled her neck and complimented her scent that I first sexually aroused her.

You can be as subtle as you want. After she has earned your attention you can also directly state exactly what it is you find sexy about her. For example, say you have been on a date for three hours, you’ve had a few drinks and took a walk in a cozy park. She is sitting next to you and you tell her, “I just noticed your long legs are really sexy.”

Your entire vibe should imply that this is a man-to-woman interaction. You can both verbally and nonverbally imply you want her sexually. But ultimately if you want to become intimate with a women you need to be able to express your desire for her.

Read More: Effortless Attraction

Maxim Adam
Maxim currently lives in Asia where he teaches men the power in authenticity and confidence as an alternative to traditional provider game. Visit his website at Daygame Review

Geordie Tait's Epic Meltdown Shows Who #GamerGate Is Up Against

November 20, 2014 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

We all have an emotional crisis from time to time. It's understandable, because we're human after all and having uncontrollable emotions is just a part of the package. On some days, things aren't going as intended—the coffee cup spills all over your shirt or you get stuck in traffic for hours on end. Maybe if your job is particularly stressful, you can be forgiven for needing to vent once in a while. Especially artists are prone to being emotionally unstable because their delicate sensibilities can't withstand the onslaught of the cold, harsh reality.

Copypasta in the making

But a certain Geordie Tait completely lost his shit and experienced what could only be described as a nuclear meltdown of epic proportions. If Chernobyl could be put into words, this would be it. Forget about the Navy Seal Copypasta, this is the real deal. You might be tempted to go and check out Geordie's rant out of morbid curiosity. Please don't, as setting your gaze upon this rambling diatribe in its entirety will probably cause you to develop multiple brain tumors. Instead, keep reading and I will dissect the writings of this raving lunatic and show you the most hilarious parts.

What prompted Geordie to go on a rant in the first place was that a certain website, StarCityGames.com, apparently stopped hosting his articles. In reality, they merely reorganized the layout and made articles searchable by tags instead of author names. Like a true SJW, Geordie didn't want to investigate or have a moderate response, but instead vomited a massive 2000+ word rant about how GamerGate supporters should literally be murdered like Jews in the Holocaust.

> I hope everyone posting in #GamerGate gets gassed, incinerated, and their tooth fillings melted into a silver/gold WiiMotes for Kim Jong-un and his extended family. I just feel you all should make the same contribution to the furtherance of tyranny and inequality in death that you did in life.
>
> Anyway, if you don't get it by now then nothing I can say is going to convince you. I have to accept that. Some people are too dumb or too stubborn or too misprioritized to get it. But.
>
> DON'T give me any shit about how Holocaust jokes at your expense are inappropriate when EACH AND EVERY ONE OF YOU is in the midst of an act of anti-woman social sabotage so foul it makes Stuxnet look like a game of Centipede.

Centipedes are not worms

Throw it at your wall

The entire thing just keeps going and going, it's like a car pileup that happens right in front of your eyes, you want to look away or do something, but you can't. It's gruesome yet mesmerizing. Geordie musters all his artistic imagination to link GamerGate to women's right to abortion, women running the Boston Marathon, getting credit and so on. You think I am joking?

> Guess, since the dawn of (LOL) *man*kind, how many women were born, lived, and died during a time when they could:
>
> - be fired for being pregnant
> - NOT report workplace sexual harassment
> - NOT run in the Boston Marathon
> - NOT apply for credit
> - NOT refuse to have sex with her husband
> - NOT obtain a No Fault Divorce
> - NOT have a legal abortion
> - in some countries, NOT leave their own homes without being stoned to death
> - NOT drive a car or leave home without a man's permission if dwelling somewhere with strict Islamic Law (but they can OWN a car! Gee, thanks!)
> - be raped as part of a strategy of war, to reduce morale of their side
> - suffer marital rape or physical abuse
> - be blamed for it

Now that's how you weaponize stupidity

It's one twisted analogy after another. But why would Geordie even consider GamerGate as the cause? In September, GamerGate supporters have quietly started several e-mail campaigns to advertisers to remove their ads from the SJW network of faux-gaming websites that inject their ideology into the gamers' consciousness. These campaigns were successful to a degree and resulted in mass panic and butthurt amongst the SJWs and their allies, prompting Gawker's Max Read to tweet:

And see if it sticks

It's simply a war of attrition and every single cut counts in finally bleeding the SJW press dry. The idea is to starve the mainstream dens of SJWs of oxygen and show to everyone what happens when you proclaim that "gamers are dead." Finally, Geordie ends his rant on a positive note, by offering an olive branch and an absolution from the sin of critical thinking.

> Come over to the right side and you'll instantly be forgiven and welcomed into the fold. It's not like I don't understand why you're so wrongheaded, right? Just read up. But ignore me instead? I'll not stop ripping you until one of us can no longer lift a finger at the keyboard.

Please provide us with more entertainment

Even when he realized GamerGate had nothing to do with the apparent removal of his articles, Geordie continued insisting that the privilege is real and we must all join forces and allow women to live their lives to the fullest and without the oppression patriarchy subjects them to:

> Only #GamerGate, that bastion of PUAs, trolls, and assholes, would deny the sad truth that women have literally never been afforded the same luxuries and privileges as men at any point since the Earth was formed, since it was just a boiling sphere hanging in a firmament of gas and the male microbes were raping, verbally abusing, and denying microbial jobs to the female microbes.
>
> We have to stop fucking talking about irrelevant shit and DO SOMETHING to help these women. And I am going to do that. I will not stop. I now see the attitude of the average man as the insidious evil that it is.

He went full retard with the microbial jobs part

This deranged behavior extended beyond Facebook and Geordie continued to have mental lapses on Twitter as well:

Note the passive-aggressive wording

Funny as it is, Geordie's rant shows several interesting things. SJWs are full of hate towards what they perceive as a "white cis hetero" movement and are just waiting for the right opportunity to spread their venom, using their allies in powerful places who will give them coverage and favorable exposure in the media. The cause doesn't have to be even remotely related to GamerGate, as shown in this example, it simply has to give plausible cause to the SJWs.

Battle of the giants

As GamerGate continues, some sensible gaming websites have started to reform and reject game review embargoes or issue official policies on who can report on who. While this is a welcome change, it feels like too little too late. Other media outlets just want GamerGate to end immediately, by using any means necessary.

But, how do you silence 10,000 GamerGate supporters who are present at every turn, criticizing, asking questions, inviting to debate, screenshotting everything you ever said? As SJWs quickly found out, it's impossible to defend against massive criticism, which is why it's their favorite tactic.

Instead, SJWs turn to silencing, shouts to check your privilege, and outright censorship. If one of their own SJWs criticizes them, well, they aren't true believers, are they? They must be cut out of the fold and only the most hardcore zealots will remain in the inner circle.

If all else fails, SJWs will turn the victimhood dial up to eleven and demand strict controls on who can say what online, simply to maintain the crucial part of their ideology—echo chambers. Since we've already seen Anita Sarkeesian play the victim card to perfection, we can expect a similar attempt in the future to associate GamerGate with physical violence against women.

2 + 2 = RAPE

In fact, in the absence of such an event that would mobilize SJWs worldwide, I predict one will be created. Whether it involves Anita Sarkeesian or Zoe Quinn, the target will definitely be a woman to incite maximum outrage and finally bring us closer to the totalitarian state that's been long in the making. The purging will happen, but it will probably be virtual, rather than physical, with massive ban campaigns and radical censorship methods implemented on all social networks. We've already seen this happen on Reddit, but it is happening on a daily basis, silently and behind the scenes on Facebook and Twitter as well.

GamerGate has become the de facto patriarchy and how it started or what it actually represents doesn't matter to the SJWs. They are intent on infiltrating everything and poisoning it with their agenda. If they can't, then it's time for some equality.

Read More: This Arthur Chu Interview Shows How SJWs Play Professional Victims

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

4 Ways Beginners Can Choose Better Girls To Approach

November 20, 2014 | by Louis Stuart | Link | Original Link

You’re outside, feeling good about yourself. You’ve finally gotten your approach anxiety under control with your first few experiences and now you’re looking at a very different world. What a glorious world it is! A whole universe of women you’d never be able to meet before is now suddenly open to you. While you may be tempted to approach nearly every attractive woman you see, I have one piece of advice: hold your horses!

Debates have long been held in the community between mass approaching versus selective approaching, the so-called “shotgun versus sniper” theories. I personally tend to take an in-between route, an “assault rifle” route, if we continue those analogies. Waiting for everything to be aligned, such as you receiving an approach invitation or for conditions to be “perfect” is a way to severely limit your opportunities. On the other hand, mass spam RSD-style approaching is a good way to waste your time and get you blown out en masse, which will immunize you from any pain of rejection, but is good for little else.

So, what is my third way then? In short, I approach a lot of women, but I focus my approaches on women that I think are likely to be more interested in me from the start. It means I will do less work and receive more benefits. I run a mental checklist in my head before I approach, and if all systems are go, I do so.

Before I go into the rundown of what that checklist is, I want to say one thing: look good. Looking good and dressing well will simply mean that more and higher quality girls will be more interested in you from the beginning. You don’t need to be a male model, but you should at least be above average. I don't think this is entirely necessary to use this approach system but it will get you the most out of it.

Now let's go over the signs I look for before I approach:

1. Is she attractive enough?

This may seem somewhat counterintuitive since you shouldn't be approaching unattractive women in the first place, but I always ask myself if I'm sufficiently and genuinely attracted to a girl before I do anything else. I don't waste my time approaching "so-so" girls whom, while I would bang, I don't want to put much effort into.

I only approach girls I have a very real and raw sexual attraction to and desire for. This helps to keep me mentally grounded and adds to the authenticity of my approaches. I have always been a direct action kind of a guy and the way in which I approach women is no different. It may not be for everyone, which is fine; this is simply how I do things.

2. What is her age in relation to your own?

It's well-known that women tend to have a preference for older men – not much older of course but just…older. I can confirm this from my own data in my approaches. As girls get closer to my own age or older, the difficulty is raised slightly, while girls several years younger than me are usually quite receptive and I walk away with at least their phone numbers more often than not. For this reason I think that your efforts would best be spent on girls that are two to eight years younger than you are.

With a little bit of experience you can generally tell how old a girl is (usually within a few years) not just by their overall appearance, but their choices in fashion and the like. This instinct won't always be accurate, but it often will be. Do this and you will likely be surprised at how well you can do. I am not saying to limit yourself to this group of course; I'm just saying that you will likely find the most success with them.

3. Does she look open to being approached?

This is a bit more subtle, but you should be able to hone your instincts with only a small bit of experience. And yes, I do say instincts because knowing what girls to approach is in some ways instinctual. You will have an inner voice in your head encouraging or discouraging you, one that has been honed over billions of years of evolution and designed to find a mate. This voice is rarely wrong, so listen to it!

Before I go into further detail, I want to say that, much like above, you don't need to limit yourself to girls that fall under this category, as I have approached women that did not look like they wanted to talk without many problems. All I'm saying is that you will likely find more success with girls that display some of these signs.

Signs your girl is likely open to a chat:

– She is walking slowly.

– She is looking around at different sights as she is walking, often somewhat wistfully.

– If seated, she is looking around, again often somewhat wistfully. If she is reading or on her phone and often interrupts herself to look around, she is likely just trying to pass some time and is still open to a chat.

– She stops to look at something for a while (I like to open girls that do this just after they begin to move again).

– Her body language is open and she makes slow movements (aside from just walking).

– She is taking a lot of pictures of the scenery (might seem counterintuitive if you haven't done it before, but I've had a lot of successful approaches with girls like this).

– She looks happy.

These are just a few that I commonly notice. Some of you out there might notice some other recurring signs. If so, please post your experiences in the comments. I'm all for any suggestions to improve my own game.

4. Does she give you an approach invitation?

You should know what these are by now. Even just the slightest hints of a smile or even repeated eye contact without expression are approach invitations. If you receive one, approach immediately, and approach direct. Reward her for treating you well.

By going through this checklist and being just a bit smarter in your approaches than the typical guy out there, I am confident that you will be able to increase your success rate by a dramatic amount. It's rare the man that actually approaches women without a pretext. Rarer still is the man that approaches the right woman in the right way. Smart target selection, I believe, will help you see more success and boost yourself to that rarified status of the self-actualized man with total confidence.

Read More: Gaming In School Is Not Enough

Louis Stuart
Libertas is a young bard traveling along the endless road to self-improvement and recounting his adventures. You can follow him on Twitter.

How To Use Rhetoric To Sexually Objectify Women

November 20, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

In my post about being judged by appearances, I said, "Women complain about how they'll never be supermodel-skinny, but most men want to marry a woman whose ribcage they can see." Some commenters were upset at this, but this, interestingly, was a typo. I meant to say that most men don't want to marry a woman with a visible ribcage. I caught this before it was published but ultimately decided to keep it because it presented a different aspect of the same truth. Both statements are true because both statements sexually objectify women and shame the gluttonous.

Shaming Into Health

As for how I meant to word it, I think the notion of health is important. Personally I want a woman just a little on the plump side. Not overweight, but a little poofy. Again, we are instinctually attracted to healthy people of the opposite sex. So the commenters were right that you want a certain hip-to-waist ratio as opposed to mere thinness.

However, I decided to leave it because I think it is a stronger statement to say that men want a ribcage girl. The polar statement has a greater effect, at least in the present case. Obviously, the statement was a bit tongue-in-cheek, since it was preceded by, "The thing about weight is that it's a sign of health." Looking underfed is not a sign of health, but having a visible ribcage doesn't always mean looking like an African orphan. I've had a visible ribcage my whole life, even though I grew up middle class and had to eat my vegetables. I've been blessed with a very high metabolism.

Saying that men want a ribcage girl is an exaggeration with a purpose, even though the article itself was not satirical. I was not trying to communicate that women should look unrealistic but rather that they should not be fat. The word "curvy" is fairly vague after all. The same is true with my article about envying women. I made the claim that a man will only talk to a woman if he's interested in banging her, but in real life I've had close female friends whom I had no interest in being physical with.

The point of my claim wasn't to make a clear-cut axiom as though it were a statutory law; the point was that being a woman ontologically entails being a sexual object.

Women Are Designed To Be Sexual Objects (And Maybe Something More)

In real life, I think a woman should be more than a mere sexual object, but she will always be a sexual object. We use this phrase "more than a sexual object," but it seems to mean "a sexual object plus something else." A woman by nature is always a play-toy for a man, and she is only valued as an individual should she choose to cultivate that individuality in a way that is valued by others. By that I mean, if a woman has nothing appealing about her beyond her body, then she is merely a sexual object. If she has a rockin' body and can make a pie from scratch, then she is more than a sexual object.

Granted, women lust after men too, but it's different. By "object" I mean something which is acted upon. To make a grammar analogy, men are the nominatives and women are the objects, whether in sex, work, society, entertainment, domesticity, or anything else. Even if a woman should pursue a man, she is still wanting to be taken herself, hence the ridiculousness of the "Yes Means Yes" law. Patriarchy is a natural law, not a philosophy, and to topple it would be like defying gravity.

Remember that a man is a key and a woman is a lock. A master key can open many locks, but a lock that can be opened by many keys is worthless. This is the way we are wired as human beings, and no amount of legislation or marching in the streets will change biology. And this is why the most hurtful insult you can tell a woman, even as a joke, is that she is ugly. She can accept being called a bitch, a whore, or an idiot, but a woman cannot tolerate being considered ugly no matter how light-hearted the jest or how close of friends you are.

Misreadings In Modern Criticism

People today easily misunderstand when something is a joke instead of actual advice, as we saw with ROK's posts both about why you should date a girl with an eating disorder and why you shouldn't. The comments section on the second article was quite enjoyable. Suddenly all the offended people were claiming that to date an anorexic girl was a wonderful privilege that most men don't deserve.

This leaves the question, is it appropriate in society to date an anorexic girl or not? It must be one or the other, because an eating disorder consumes one's life so much that it can't be ignored by your significant other. Damned if you do, damned if you don't.

The eating disorder articles weren't actual dating advice. They weren't even merely meant to troll people. Like nearly everything on ROK, they were trying to reorient social order. Notice the nine points between the two of them each criticize a bad character trait that's become considered benign for women. Inattention to physical appearance, heavy spending, conceit, poverty, and sexual negligence for the “should” article. Overweight, bad breath, avoidable instability, and mental illness for the “shouldn’t” article.

We see the same gut reaction with my two articles above. I’m inclined to not blame those individuals but the society that has given us this draconian literalism. If a person makes a joke on Facebook about killing the president, then it’s treated like a viable plan. As a society, we are trained to take things at face value and assume the worst. So I don’t blame the individuals for misunderstanding my tongue-in-cheekness, and in fairness, the exaggeration in my article about appearances was subtle.

Red Pill Wisdom For Women

What should have been the takeaway, more than body weight, is sexual objectivity. A woman by definition is meant to be viewed sexually. Notice how women past 40 have the worst hairstyles. It’s like they are trying to hold onto some relic of their prior glory. Even my spinster mother regularly gets a perm and won’t go to the bank without her makeup.

But then they turn into true elderly women. Gray-haired women almost never have long hair and look strange when they do. An old woman tries to look good and presentable, not hot or cute, because they know their time of sexual desirability is long past.

If a woman is wise, she will use her sexuality for a long-term investment instead of a short-term one-night stand. She will retain her virginity and marry young to a man who can both provide for her and be someone she respects. Interestingly, this is the origin of expensive engagement rings, which disproves the Christian myth that few people fornicated before the 1960s.

If a young woman has a financially stable husband, then she has no need to go to college or pursue a career. Leftists will scream that women should be able to pursue a career if she wants, but people who make that argument miss the point entirely. For one thing, being a responsible adult is more about doing what you should instead of what you want. A woman has a stronger innate connection to her family and therefore should spend her life investing in them.

Why wouldn’t a woman want to make her husband’s life easier by preparing him dinner? Why wouldn’t a woman want to stay home with her children instead of incarcerating them in daycare? The joke about a woman refusing to make a sandwich is horrifying to me because of what it says about the joke-teller. Let’s not be selfish, ladies.

Second, the workforce is a bitch. People only desire the stress of a soul-crushing career if they had no other method of self-validation. Even if you achieve your dream job, you don’t really know what it’s like until you get there. And even if you love your job, there will always be difficult people you have to appease and obnoxious procedures you have to follow. I don’t believe for a minute that any woman truly wants to work for the raw joy of it because I have never met a man who loves work for the sake of work even if he settles into a career he loves. If working was so joyous and fulfilling, there would be no concept of retirement and no social security crisis.

Nature Will Always Trump Nurture

I wrote that a man shouldn't envy a woman because of her privilege, but in real life, I would love to be a stay-at-home dad. However, I recognize that isn't my role, and I understand that even the most virile wench looks down on a servile man. Men are wired to provide and women are wired to nest. All of human history attests to this, and fifty years of burning bras isn't going to change mammalian biology. A wise woman will use this biology to her advantage instead of trying to subvert nature out of unconstrained conceit. Ruining your life is not empowering.

A friend once told me , "I can't go anywhere without men staring at my chest." I responded, "I can't go anywhere without women staring at my wallet," but what I should have said was, "That's just the way Jesus made you."

Read More: The Growing Epidemic Of Sexual Dysfunction Among Women

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

The Most Efficient Rep Range To Build Muscle

November 20, 2014 | by Scott James | Link | Original Link

I don't follow the herd… when I'm performing a certain exercise or style of workout I ask myself "Why am I doing this? Does this actually work?"

Unfortunately instead of seeking out the most efficient, Spartan method to build muscle naturally most men simply do as they're told – performing 10 – 12 reps of each and every exercise in their workout regime. After reading and being brainwashed by men's health and fitness magazines I too fell victim to this misconception, I ended up hitting a plateau on my strength shortly thereafter.

There is a far more efficient way to build both muscle size and strength.

I'm not here to sell you the "one weird tip to gain muscle mass fast."This is no secret, men knew about this training technique centuries ago…

> If you must use dumbbells for daily training, use heavy ones with fewer repetitions rather than light bells with numerous repetitions – Arthur Saxon, 1906

I'm sure you've heard it before—compound exercises such as the squat, bench press, deadlift, and overhead press build the foundation of any notable physique. Yet many individuals still waste their time performing 20 – 30 reps per set on bicep curls.

Imagine for a moment that your body is a building. In order for your mighty fortress to withstand the test of time you've got to build the foundation right, otherwise in time it will crumble.

Hit the heavy weights now, focus can be placed on isolation once you've built up that foundation.

A study published by Ohio University had 32 men split into three different groups, where each group was to utilize a different repetition range in their training for a period of 8 weeks.

Group 1: 3 – 5 reps

Group 2: 9 – 11 reps

Group 3: 20 – 28 reps

With no surprise group one (3-5 reps) gained substantially more size and strength than the conventional 9-11 rep group and the higher 20-28 rep group. Studies suggest that focusing on heavy compound exercises in the low repetition range have also been proven to raise your testosterone levels.

If you're like me, a normal guy with average genetics, looking to build both size and strength naturally you cannot go past the 4-7 rep range for your major compound lifts. Your muscles don't grow by pushing out countless reps until you feel a pump, muscle growth is a direct reaction to the large amount of tension being placed on the muscle. The best way to provide your muscles with the tension they require is to progressively increase the weight you're lifting (aka. Lift heavy!)

> Movements or exercises that do not give the muscle the required resistance, but are the kind that involve a great number of repetitions, never break down any tissue, to speak of. These movements involve a forcing process that cause the blood to swell up the muscle, and simply pump them up– George F. Jowett, 1926

I personally have always had strong shoulders and triceps, however getting my chest to grow in proportion proved to be a bit of an issue until I started experimenting with low rep training.

Here's a sample of my current chest workout that has assisted me to overcome this plateau:

Incline Barbell Press – 4x 4-6 reps

Flat Dumbbell Press – 4x 4-6 reps

Weighted Chest Dips – 3x 8 reps

One of the biggest mistakes most gym-goers make in regards to rep ranges is lifting heavy weight for few reps when they're in a "bulking" phase (gaining size) and lifting lighter weight for a higher number of reps when they're in a cutting phase (burning fat, maintaining muscle).

Building muscle and shredding fat comes down to caloric manipulation. Lifting light weight for high reps is a sure-fire way to lose muscle while cutting, if you want to get the best bang for buck out of your workouts I cannot stress the importance of heavy compound lifts.

Read More: All Girls Like Muscular Guys

Scott James

Scott is a fitness enthusiast, entrepreneur, author & proprietor of IgnoreLimits.coma blog created to share how he transformed his physique, finances & habits. RoK readers can download his free bodyweight training eBook on his website.

The “Drunk Girl In Public” Scandal Makes Both Feminists And The Mainstream Media Look Foolish

November 21, 2014 | by Dikwan Ray | Link | Original Link

Update: The video has been set to “private”. Here’s a commentary of the video that shows highlights:

Within the past week, the feminist movement and its many outlets that claim to be “news” attempted to make another viral propaganda push with “Drunk Girl In Public (Social Experiment).” The video’s objective was to show men as prowling jackals yet again, with the parameters of the self-proclaimed experiments being fairly unrealistic.

Recently, however, it has been revealed that it all was apparently a hoax. The guys in the video saw it themselves later and were understandably pissed about being asked to do something under a false premise, and more importantly, portrayed as potential rapists by feminists all across the internet for their compliance.

As hilarious and satisfying as it is to see the feminist movement blow their load, unashamedly backpedal in their argument, and create even more elaborate routines of mental gymnastics, the whole thing seems off and has brought a number of questions. The questions are in no way to make any claims or insinuations, and are purely from personal speculation that are felt needed to be shared as food for thought:

1. What are many of the outlets that claim to be news to do now? Will they at issue an apology at least to their followers, for the failure to check their sources as they claim to be a source of news for them?

2. If this is the matter of them failing to check their sources before perpetuating the articles, what does this scandal say about the legitimacy of the claims made against them in regards to the ethics and practices exposed by Gamer Gate?

3. More importantly, what exactly is the role and the motivations of the creator of the video, Stephen Zhang, since he is the one who produced and originally released the video?

And that is where most of the interest lies. Stephen Zhang, the owner of HYGO, Inc., seems to be the linchpin in these events, and he is refusing to comment even though hoax claims and slandering the men in the video paint him as a dishonest asshole to everybody. From what is gathered, Stephen seems to be running a pretty successful company and has been in the marketing industry for five years. Impressive, considering he's only 20.

HYGO, being his current venture, is primarily focused on social media optimization and it has a few portfolio examples to show the success of his company's effectiveness for maximizing social media traffic and using it to yield a profit. However, he states that due to the elite status of his company, only 6, 7, and 8 figure contracts are the only things they work with.

This brings about other questions. Why did Stephen create the Youtube account that the video was originally posted, only recently, on 11/3/2014? And why did he add 3 other random videos a day beforehand, label them as pranks, then just a day after upload drunk girl and label it as "social experiment" instead, then cease all activity?

Since no statement has been made, what could the motivation be to fund, produce and promote this video? Anybody with a hair of business understanding would deduce that it's unlikely to be just for shits and giggles. Going off that assumption, there are only two logical possibilities: 1) This was a part of some strategy within HYGO to increase their reach and revenue 2) HYGO or Stephen was commissioned to produce and distribute it, possibly with a non-disclosure agreement.

If this video was, indeed, commissioned, who then could possibly be the client? Who could possibly want to contract a business that specializes in the return of investment on social media, to create a video that depicts only men trying to take advantage of a drunk girl? Why would this video come out so quickly after the Catcall video, with the same framework of trying to demonstrate that men are degenerates?

Was it supposed to be that in this video, the appearance of the men's race and socioeconomic status just happens to conveniently show a more diverse and varying demographic, one of the major argument against the Catcall videos? What does it mean in one of the messages they sent out among the men in the video after they began protesting, when they're talking about the future success that this video is going to bring about?

Now, there are a lot of ifs and hypothetical scenarios that these questions are asking, and no one else has presented a similar opinion yet that I have seen. But given the course of events this year, I feel that this is not completely implausible. This video and its revelation that it was a hoax seem to allude to the possibility of being a part of a larger picture, one that they are more than likely going to try sweep under the rug.

Or maybe the questions have no grounds, imply a crackpot conspiracy theory, and I'm full of shit. Because there's no way that various journalists, writers, content creators, social justice advocates, advertisers, and whoever else could be collaborating with each other behind the scenes to make some tangible gain off the target audiences of various industries under the guise of social justice and feminism. That's just misogyny.

Read More: Is Zoe Quinn Using The Massachusetts Courts To Censor The Legal Speech Of Her Ex-Boyfriend?

Dikwan Ray
DR is simple man with simple pleasures, mostly to be his own master and to remember where he set his tools down on project sites.

The 3 I’s Of Getting Laid

November 21, 2014 | by John Hopson | Link | Original Link

Often when reading articles and comments in the manosphere, one can get the impression that it takes a master’s degree in evolutionary psychology to get laid; this simply isn’t true. Rather than focus on every little nuance of female psychology, it often serves a man better to have a strong understanding of the basics and then take that knowledge out into the field.

For the purposes of this article I’m writing from the perspective of the man whose goal is to obtain physical intimacy with a woman (anything from a first kiss to sex—I know there are men of all experience levels reading this). The 3 I’s Of Getting Laid is the basic formula for creating an atmosphere in which women are comfortable becoming intimate with you. These 3 I’s are: Isolate, Intoxicate, Initiate. Learn this simple formula and always keep it in the back of your mind.

1. Isolate

The first I, Isolate, should be pretty self explanatory. Take the object of your desire somewhere private; she probably doesn’t want to have sex with you (or even just kiss you) for the first time in front of a crowd. This sounds easy but so many men simply don’t plan for this step. Many men ask women on traditional dates such as meeting for coffee or a dinner date. Once on this date it really doesn’t matter how well the conversation goes or anything like that if you don’t have a plan to obtain some privacy.

One way to solve this problem is to go to locations near where you live, ideally within walking distance or less than a 5-10 minute drive. If you don’t live near the location of your date then you should have a plan to get out of public, one of the simplest ways to do this is to suggest going on a walk. Going on a walk is a good move because you should be able to hold her hand and create more intimacy between the two of you right away. Of course the easiest way to Isolate is to just ask her to go home with you; if that is your read then go for it. The #1 lesson that goes with Isolate is to plan ahead.

2. Intoxicate *

The next I, Intoxicate, will no doubt raise some controversy. I'm sure many misguided leftists would assume I am writing a guide on date rape; this is not what I am suggesting. Before I go any further I will warn every man reading this never to have sex with a woman who is drunk—you can be charged with rape even if it was just consensual sex between two drunk individuals. Always remember women are treated by society as children with no personal responsibility for their actions.

So you want to Intoxicate the woman but not get her drunk? Bingo. There is a sweet spot with women when it comes to alcohol, usually just a drink or two at most. The impact of this is less about the physical effect of the alcohol and more about the psychological effect. When a woman has had time to be around you and have a drink, her anxiety will lessen and she will not have such a whirlwind of thoughts twisting around in her head once you actually start to be intimate.

Even more importantly, it is a compliance test—if a girl will not at least have a drink around you, in most situations you can assume that she is not interested in getting intimate on the time scale you desire. In all honesty, Intoxicate is the least important of the 3 I's, but it does give you a good indicator of her willingness to move forward.

*I personally won't engage with a drunk female but MANY women (especially young women) prefer to only have sex under the influence of alcohol or drugs. These are psychologically unhealthy people and it is not wise to put your life in their hands.

3. Initiate

Lastly we have the most important I, Initiate. How many guys do you know who agonize over whether a certain girl likes them or not? How many select a girl and basically stalk her for weeks before making any contact? How many "fall in love" with some fantasy girl they really don't even know? Too many.

Initiate is simple but quite frankly a lot of men either don't have the balls to do it, or they have been programmed to be "gentlemen" and they miss out. You must always be physically escalating; a first date should always start with a hug—if the woman doesn't react well to that or tries to shake your hand, you are probably fucked, so move on.

Any man with experience will tell you that some women like you and some just don't—somewhere out there is a model-quality girl who would fall in love with you, and somewhere else there is an obese pig who would think you don't meet her standards. The only way to know if a woman will have sex with you is to Initiate.

Conclusion

This all sounds so simple that there is no need to write about it, right? Wrong. Go out into the world and observe “alpha” behavior; now put what they are doing into the context of this article. Think back to your high school days and remember how all those “naturals” got laid. I guarantee it followed this format.

There is so much focus on how to become more “alpha” that we lose sight of what constitutes 90% of the “alpha” male’s success. Frat guys get laid like crazy (and often get into serious trouble) because they are in an environment full of intoxicated women—all they have to do is Isolate and Initiate. There are a lot of attractive women out there who will have sex with you, if you’ll only give them the chance to let it “just kind of happen.”

Remember, it is up to you to create the kind of atmosphere that allows a woman to get intimate with you—don’t leave it up to fate.

Read More: If You Can’t Get Laid In The West, You Won’t Get Laid Abroad

John Hopson
John is a ruggedly handsome introvert with a heart of gold. He was born the bastard child of a prostitute who abandoned him at age 3 to pursue an acting career in the big city. The acting career never really took off. He enjoys music, drugs, alcohol, sex, and solitude.

Western Feminists Continue To Exploit Women In Developing Countries For Their Own Gain

November 21, 2014 | by Michael Mobius | Link | Original Link

Britain's Daily Mail recently reported that T-shirts for the "this is what a feminist looks like" campaign costing £45 ($71) were being made by women in Mauritius working in sweatshop-like conditions. One veteran feminist rounded on her fellow ideologues:

> 'While London fashionistas and point-scoring politicians brag about their right-on credentials by wearing the £45 shirt, the predominantly female migrant workers who actually make them have to work a grueling 45-hour basic week, live in barrack-style dormitories, 16 to a room, and are paid a derisory 62p an hour to make ends meet,' adding, 'there's nothing remotely feminist about having T-shirts made by poorly paid migrant workers in the Third World.'

I beg to differ. I think exploiting Third World women is something western feminism does all the time. It would seem beyond dispute that women in the west live more privileged lives than those in "poor" countries. After all, what western woman has ever lived 16 to a room? Arguably women in the west live more privileged lives than everyone on Earth, with the exception of that small group of elite men they are so clearly fixated upon both sexually and, as feminists, politically.

But that doesn't stop feminists gleefully reporting that life is getting tougher for western women: apparently the UK came in at only no. 26 in the global gender gap rankings (the US was 20th). That's better than Mauritius at 62, but far behind Rwanda at no. 6. As one commenter put it though maybe Rwanda closing the gender gap just means that life over there is is equally crap for everyone.

But when not competing with their “third world” rivals for top victim status, western feminists tend to argue for international solidarity, which translated means that western feminism should be a model for the rest of the world. Like liberal modernisation theory, feminism assumes that less developed countries (LDCs) should develop into more developed (i.e. progressive) countries.

Such a linear model of development has been challenged for being western, imperialist, and just plain wrong, but as an internationalist movement—the idea that women everywhere are in fact an “oppressed class”—it has revolutionary overtones as well. The internationalism of the women’s movement conveys the sense that the women of the world are a gender proletariat, and politically conscious western feminists the revolutionary vanguard.

Celebrity Revolutionary

Recently celebrities like Emma Watson and Beyoncé have joined the cause. Emma, as the vanguard intellectual responsible for the HeforShe initiative, appealed for the world's men to fight with her against counter-revolutionary forces. There is an obvious irony to elite women celebrities like Ms. Watson fighting for feminism, including for themselves. But at least Watson attempts a sincere effort at being a "role model," even if her ideology is poisonous.

But what sort of role model does "feminist" Beyoncé provide for women in traditional societies when she grinds and gyrates on stage? Or for that matter feminist shock artists like Femen or Pussy Riot? Do girls in Afghanistan have a better or worse chance of being educated and respected on account of a feminism that seems to offer help and assistance while seeking to stir the hornet's nest on the other?

I don't doubt that idealistic young women naively expect feminism to help disadvantaged women abroad. But having a kind heart doesn't mean much if the effect is to make things worse. Indeed one of the main effects of global progressivism seems to be that it inflames more traditional societies, making them more resistant to the kind of small improvements that might actually make a difference. When "progress," "humans rights," and "spreading democracy" sound like bywords for imperialism to the people they're supposed to help, then maybe it's time activists pushing the agenda asked themselves if they are partially to blame for the world burning.

Ethical Capital

So far, the above could be (implausibly) explained as "great powers" pushing a cause that coincidentally has both good and bad effects for the intended beneficiaries. But I would like to suggest that western feminism has a selfish interest in perpetuating the misfortune of women in the third world.

As the world becomes more formally democratic and consensual, those who wish to act in the world must demonstrate they have justice on their side; not the justice of might is right, but the justice of fighting against injustice. In the case of Afghanistan, the War on Terror needed feminism as an easily marketable social justice cause. To put this another way, being able to claim you are fighting against "injustice" has now become an important political resource in its own right.

This ability to invoke an ethical crusade is a resource like any other, like oil, gas, or water. It establishes not only the grounds for action, but also the redistributive action. It is a form of social capital, or what has been called ethical capital. Moreover, injustice, by virtue of the redistributive claims that can be made on its account, has material benefits for those who can command it for their own purpose.

Thus, western feminism desperately needs the international feminist cause to be its own struggle. Increasingly insecure about the weight of its own cause, with its manufactured outrage and paranoid claims of misogyny sometimes amounting to no more than complaints about hurtful words, western feminists have an ever increasing need to “import” injustice from abroad. That way, as long as women in other countries remain genuinely oppressed it doesn’t matter how privileged western women themselves become. Global feminism’s balance sheet will always show them in credit.

Fashion Victims

Some marxists have argued that the reason “modernization” doesn’t work is that it isn’t supposed to. Gunther Frank for instance argued that developed countries benefited by “under-developing” less fortunate ones. According to him, the wealth of the less developed periphery was repatriated to the metropolis—be it New York, London or Amsterdam—in an unequal exchange, for example a transfer of technology for natural resources.

Something similar is going on with the “technology transfer” of western progress for the resources of (negative) ethical capital that oppressed women in LDCs possess in such abundance. Ethical commodities are exchanged for the ethical capital of “injustice” so that rich white women in the west get to look beautiful “wearing” real pain and injustice, as though it were a fur coat. But there’s blood dripping from those furs, and its time they admitted it wasn’t theirs.

The problem is feminism needs third world injustice because in every meaningful sense it has exhausted its own supplies. Hurt feelings, unkind words, and making a few pennies less because your career stalled when you chose to have a baby isn’t the same as being shot in the head for wanting to go to school. Unfortunately messages like that don’t sell t-shirts.

Read More: The Equality Movement Is Allowing Women To Tyrannize Men

Michael Mobius
hails from England, but currently lives in Central Europe. He plays the piano and enjoys travelling.

Herbert Marcuse's "Eros And Civilization" Helped Jumpstart The Blue Pill In America

November 21, 2014 | by Vincent Law | Link | Original Link

If ever there was a writer that took up the cause of cultural Marxism and brought it to the forefront of popular culture it was Herbert Marcuse and his groundbreaking book, Eros and Civilization. Having just read and written a midterm paper on it myself, I can tell you with all honesty that it is one of the most intentionally confusing, obscure, and meandering books that I have ever come across.

Though the book is dense, its Marxist undertones are readily apparent even to the disinterested reader. Having read the book, I would venture to call the author, Marcuse, the father of the blue pill. While rambling on about Freudian pseudo-analysis of man's true sexual nature, Marcuse advocates the overthrowing of 50's era western society along psycho-analytic grounds.

Marcuse's central idea

The fundamental point that Marcuse raises is the idea of surplus repression. The fundamental premise is that civilization with its traditions and its competition based performance principle repress man and require more and more work from him despite the fact that we could all readily live lives of far greater leisure. Furthermore, man is now alienated from the product of his labor and does not take joy in the production of, say, 1000 iPods as much as he would the production of one spear with which he could hunt for food.

According to Marcuse, civilization acts as a source of surplus repression that denies man the expression of one of his most basic drives, the Eros or love drive. According to this theory, man tries to reach out and connect to the entire world by engage in erotic love, or love of a non-sexual nature. Making friends and building communities, when not motivated by the performance principle, are all examples of Eros or non-genital love. The kind of work that society makes us engage in however, is non-erotically charged, repressive, and makes us all deeply unhappy.

Ok, pretty basic Freud stuff so far, whats next?

Marcuse makes the claim that genital intimacy has been elevated above all other forms of sexual intimacy; apparently we used to possess as children what Marcuse calls pre-genital polymorphous perversity in which we love without focusing on genital heterosexual release as a primary goal.

Marcuse's vision:

> No longer used as a full-time instrument of labour, the body would be re-sexualised… (which) would first manifest itself in a reactivation of all erotogenic zones and, consequently, in a resurgence of pre-genital polymorphous sexuality and in a decline of genital supremacy. The body in its entirety would become an object of cathexis, a thing to be enjoyed – an instrument of pleasure. This change in the value and scope of libidinal relations would lead to a disintegration of the institutions in which the private interpersonal relations have been organised, particularly the monogamic and patriarchal family.

Did you catch the last bit? The executive summary:

> Intentionally grandiose language and theorizing to drive home the final point about how the monogamic and patriarchal family is repressive. Didn't quite follow the logic? Don't worry, that's the point, but at least you're convinced that some sophisticated thought processes went on to arrive at the final point that the nuclear family unit is bad.

Would you be surprised to learn that this is the guy that coined the phrase, "sex, drugs, and rock and roll?" Keep in mind that the work of men like Marcuse, Frankfurt school acolytes in general, formed the intellectual groundwork of the entire 60's counter-culture movement. His platform promised a utopia of sex on demand with every single perversity of every single individual fulfilled because it was grounded in their childlike innocence.

True red-pillers know that all the betas marching around in berets were the first to lose out on the sexual bonanza promised by the "sexual revolution" as they found out that, much to their horror, women's unrestrained sexual nature is hypergamous, and beta boy waving the hammer and sickle was the first victim of the laissez-faire sexual marketplace. God has a sense of humor, I suppose.

The repudiation of tradition

With Marcuse, tradition, with its guiding structures and underlying understanding of objective truth, is seen as something repressive and worth overthrowing. But the exploration of our animal curiosities is the key to our happiness as individuals and as a society. Somehow this repudiation of society built on humanity's development of a super-ego, through a Great Refusal, as Marcuse puts it, will suddenly return us to children romping around free to engage in polymorphous perversity whenever we please. Oh yeah, and we'll get to keep all the benefits of industrial civilization as well!

Truth, however incomprehensible it may be to us, should be the true motivator of society. Even if it isn't, it will always rear its ugly head and remind us that social projects are by their very nature attempts to defy human nature. I hesitate to say more about Marcuse, except to mention that this was the popular voice of the 60s calling for overthrow of patriarchy, black revolt, and discarding of traditional values, all in the favor of something called the pleasure principle—the idea that humans live to experience erotic pleasure and that any digression from this pursuit is damaging and to be avoided at all costs.

Take that as you will. Personally the conflation of these disparate ideas seem to be a logical leap at best, but keep in mind that logical, systematized theory was never the modus operandi of Marcuse's work. His was an emotional appeal, riding the populist indignation of worker exploitation to market completely disparate, unrelated and toxic ideals to upper-middle class white folks living in a baby boomer utopia and fundamentally divorced from reality.

The appeal to the counter-culture youth worked, and now we wonder why university students are the chubby-cheeked herbivores who march around in Guy Fawkes masks shrilly chanting "we r legiun, end raep cultur NAW!!!" If you ask me, guys like Marcuse had a lot to do with it. But I believe we may be nearing a tipping point—enough of us are waking up, and maybe it is high time for a counter-culture movement of our own.

Read More: Why The Ukraine Crisis Is A Red Pill Vs Blue Pill Superpower Clash

Vincent Law
Vincent is just another immigrant from Mosk who has been trying all his life to become a fellow citizen. Check out his blog at atavisticintelligentsia.us

Feed A Western Woman The Red Pill

November 22, 2014 | by Jack Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Common advice to aspiring kings on this site and many others is to find a woman from a foreign, traditional background. But what happens if you, like me, are all "set" career-wise, network-wise, friend-wise? Frankly, spending a lot of time in a different country just may be off the table for you, and I would personally never buy a bride off the Internet. Giving up on women is not an option; it's a loser's way out. You have another option: Feed a western woman the red pill.

Suitability of the Target

The single most important step is identifying a proper target. Once that is done, all else should flow naturally, provided you show the qualities of a leader.

About 95% of Western women are immune to the red pill. Their views, rationalizations, and identity constructs are too entrenched for any wisdom to seep in. They're still busy making credit card payments on the expensive fantasy they've purchased: The bedazzling career woman supermom that takes on all gender roles simultaneously, who can have her appletini and drink it too. So you're going to have to be a discriminating judge of talent to isolate the 5% who aren't.

Find a girl who has struggled a bit in life and has a degree of self-awareness, because oblivious silver platter chicks know no humility. You need to look for the same attributes you'd look for in any Queen. The main difference is, western culture in general is atrocious at developing these aptitudes in women. You're looking for raw traits, and you understand that they will take development. Think of yourself as a scout for your own sports team, scouting semi-pro leagues for the diamond in the rough.

Some good ways to probe are to discuss subjects like her own mistakes, existentialism, and gender-roles. Here are some examples of real conversations I had, and how I sorted them into “No” or “Maybe” based on their answers.

> Man: Do you believe in soul mates
> Woman: Yes I do.
> Man: Why?
> Woman: I like to believe there’s someone out there for you.
> Man: What if I told you your beliefs had no bearing on reality? As in, I could say ‘I want to believe unicorns exist’, but my want doesn’t make their existence any more, or less, likely.
> Woman: That’s stupid, I know there’s someone out there for me.
>
> Result: Inability to think logically and divorce oneself from emotional stake. Gone, baby gone.
>
> Woman: All the guys I date end up being assholes.
> Man: What else do all those guys have in common?
> Woman: I don’t know, what?
> Man: You picked them all. So it’s essentially your own fault after the first one.
> Woman: No, men are good at lying.
>
> Result: Next. Inability to see one’s own faults.
>
> Man: Do you regret that tattoo?
> Woman: Yes.
>
> Result: Shows frankness, humility and ability to evolve. Maybe.

You may notice there is no “YES.” That’s because a “YES” is the result of a collection of maybes. No particular maybe is enough to qualify a girl, but almost any single red flag is enough to disqualify her. Keep this fact in mind at all times.

Scouting takes practice, and you may miss. So do many sports general managers, and they’re still paid millions. Risk is unavoidable. Your only choice is how you mitigate it. You may have to go through 20 targets before you stick to one. That’s the deal.

Taming of the Shrew

Once you’ve identified a target, you need to separate her from the silly notions in her head. In Shakespeare’s The Taming of the Shrew, Petruchio the suitor tames the ill-tempered Catarina by responding to all of her insults with kindness. In “gamespeak,” she relentlessly shit-tested him and he didn’t flinch. Paradoxically—but not really to anyone who understands women—she begins to respect his ability to stay calm in the flurry of her insults, and is eventually won over.

You will have to do the same. Shit-tests will be numerous and will be both advertent and inadvertent. See each one as a growth opportunity, not an irritation. Let her call herself a feminist, but present her with logic to combat her views whenever the opportunity arises, which in the case of feminism is quite often. If you’ve selected well, each time one of her pet ideologies or social constructs implodes, you can chip away at it with logic.

Recently, mine posted the Emma Watson UN speech on her Facebook profile. She asked me what I thought of it. Inadvertent shit-test.

> It's the stupidest thing I have ever heard (She was aghast)
> Why?
> Because it's sexist.
> No, she's saying men also have their challenges and we all need to work together. That's what HeForShe is all about.n(Here she is trying to get my approval by eschewing one of my own values – that of proper inter-gender cooperation. Another good sign.)
> The very name of it reeks of men being subjugated and inferior. He for She.
> Look past the name.
> I can't. What if told you I was starting an organization to save battered women and I called it Women are Weak And Need Men's Help, would you want to work for its cause?
> So what would you call it?
> He AND She.
>
> Light bulb.

The key aspect of the taming is timing. You are injecting wisdom into her head, such that her actual qualities can shine. Each girl is different; I've found with mine the best thing to do is let her make her mistakes; when she does, I have a brief instant where her westernized mind has no answer but I do. Your future queen may be different.

Patience and Reaping Rewards

Digestion of the red pill isn't usually a "eureka" moment for anyone, male or female. It often comes about as the result of successive failure and gradual accumulation of maturity, along with the humility to accept that whatever we may think or want to think, the natural order of things just doesn't give a fuck about our self-constructed identities.

The process is doubly slow for women because of western conditioning. Therefore, you must be ready to give it time. If you have picked well, you will enjoy the process and it will be immensely rewarding.

Once she is past a tipping point and the dynamic of leader-follower is established, your girl should be extremely grateful to you for taking the time to help her be the best version of herself she can be – something no Emma Watson or tumblrina can do for her. You'll be the only man she'll have ever met who is capable of "handling" her. She will give you something that most men cherish more than love: Respect.

Critiques and Caveats

Despite what it is often written of women, there are good ones and it behooves a man to find one. My way is just one among many and if the foreign girl or mail order girl route suits you, go ahead and follow it. Let's be clear about one thing though: Do not turn into Captain Save-A-Ho. You are performing the selection based on your judgment of a woman's character. You are not waiting for a damsel in distress. You're being proactive, not reactive. It's a nuance I can't stress enough.

This approach is not for everyone. I'm a contrarian in a lot of things I do, so red-pilling women came quickly to me. It takes quick wits, a spine, near unflappable calm, blunt sincerity, compassion and empathy. You must be sensitive enough to see when she is receptive to wisdom and stern enough to set boundaries. These traits usually come after about a decade of experience with women and their shit-tests.

I would hate for you to miss out on a great prospect only because she has a few silly notions in her head, and felt I could share my experiences. My path led me to a Western girl who now:

- No longer wears dresses that go above the knee in public
- Asks if I like any article of clothing before she buys it
- Will bring me a diet coke or a beer every single time I ask
- Will give me hand jobs while I watch porn
- Has not refused sex or sexual favors in 5 years
- Has offered me strippers for my birthday
- Understands she'd rather be an alpha's #1 girl than a beta's only girl
- Lives with me, pays me rent, and cleans my apartment. She gets that it's a privilege to live in my castle no matter how small
- Babysits my much younger siblings when my mother asks her to
- Makes my coffee every morning before I wake up.

Obviously, I'm still working at it. I'm also still working on many of the traits of a leader, particularly remaining unflappable. My girlfriend isn't unique by any means—red pill women are out there. That Emma Watson thing was a small setback. I'm exacting of her, as I am of myself, but we're off to a good start.

Read More: Why Western Men Prefer Foreign Women Over Their Own

Jack Goldstein
Jack is well-traveled, well-educated, well-read, well-to-do, well-sexed and has squatted 4 plates (below parallel). These days, his interests are reflection, enlightenment, fitness, making money, data visualization and coaching others.

SJWs Force British Comedian “Dapper Laughs” Off The Air

November 22, 2014 | by Michael Howell | Link | Original Link

If you’re from outside the UK you may not have heard of the comedian Dapper Laughs, real name Daniel O’Reilly, but he is well-known throughout Britain for his hilarious Vine videos, stand-up tour, and recent TV show.

Having been a fan of his since he first entered the comedy scene I, like many others, have always viewed him as a likable character with humour that is both light-hearted and amusing. These features of his persona were reflected by his rapid rise in popularity, adoration by various members of the British public, and his remarkable climb from making short videos on Vine to hosting sell-out comedy shows and his own TV series, all within the space of a year.

During this time he has also offered genuine dating advice for men which, perhaps surprisingly, incorporated red pill philosophies and known game techniques. His Facebook page attracted almost 2 million “likes” and, up until now, the majority of responses to his comedy have been overwhelmingly positive.

So what went wrong?

In the past couple of weeks, despite the range of far more important issues going on in the world, feminists and SJWs decided that Daniel should be the focus of their negative energy. Through the use of petitions and Twitter attacks (as always), he was first forced to cancel his stand-up tour after the student union at Cardiff University stated that his comedy “trivialized rape, unprotected sex, and dehumanizing of women.”

The British channel ITV then decided to axe his TV series and remove all trace of them from their catch-up service. This was then followed by a media storm that grossly exaggerated his comedy, calling it “sexual harassment” and him “misogynistic.” It is shocking how a person can be so meticulously harassed and hounded that, in the space of almost a week, their livelihood is all but destroyed.

The effect this witch-hunt has had on O’Reilly was particularly noticeable when he appeared on the BBC’s Newsnight program in an attempt to calm his critics and detach himself from the “character” of Dapper Laughs. His solemn appearance and demeanour on the show was a far cry from the flamboyant, joyful character seen before.

In many ways it was extremely sad to see how his personality and character had been stripped bare – a visual representation, perhaps, of the suppressive censorship of his disapprovers. At the end of the show he stated that that the controversy had “wrecked” his life and that “Dapper Laughs is gone.” With that, his career, character, and fan base that he had spent countless hours developing were also destroyed.

If you spent a mere five minutes looking at O'Reilly's Vine page you would instantly see that his humor is undoubtedly light-hearted. One would have to be extremely simple-minded, or even deluded, to look at his comedy and think that it really advocates rape or sexual harassment.

The world of comedy is littered with racial slurs, inappropriate jokes, and demeaning references to the disabled. Fellow British comedian Frankie Boyle previously named and made jokes about a 10-year-old autistic child and then said that society has a problem if we're not allowed to "laugh with the disabled." Yet are comedians like Boyle attacked like Dapper Laughs was? No. Are there shows cancelled and their livelihoods destroyed? No.

Is this the start of comedy censorship? Who's next? Who will risk having their livelihoods destroyed by saying anything that could be deemed offensive by a minority? Despite the hundreds of thousands of people that O'Reilly made laugh, there was a much smaller group that didn't find it funny and eventually ruined his life. They have successfully removed Dapper Laughs from the public sphere. And for what gain?

Read More: Did British Blogger Sara C Nelson Commit Libel?

Michael Howell
Michael is a student from England, beer guru and aspiring writer.

5 Pre-Workout Tips For Consistently Better Workouts

November 23, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

Your workout should be a sacred part of your day.

Any stress or problems eating away at you should be left at the door. The fight with your girlfriend or the upcoming deadline at the office will cripple your workout if they're allowed to enter the gym.

Focus and energy are the only two things that must be present. You must have a clear mind so that you can focus on your body and how it feels as you execute your training regimen. And you must have physical energy so that you can perform and push yourself past your previous best.

Improvement is the name of the game. Whether it's loading ten more pounds onto the bar, performing one more repetition, or perfecting that new exercise that your body just can't seem to get down – you must be fully present in order to improve. Below I want to offer you five tips that allow me to bring energy and focus to each and every workout.

1. Review your purpose

Whether today you're pushing for a new five rep max on your squat or just trying to nail down proper squat depth, you must review what your purpose is before you get there. There's nothing worse than arriving to the gym, getting changed, and walking out onto the gym floor only to stop and scratch your head thinking about where you should begin. Having a defined purpose will boost your focus by definition, and allow you to perform that much better as a result.

2. Select appropriate music

When you work out, you want to create the perfect environment for growth and improvement. And your music, or lack thereof, will directly contribute to this. You want music that will energize you and contribute to your focus, not music you want to sing along to or drive your car to. For me this is fast paced rap music. For some people this is heavy metal. And for others, this is no music at all, as it tends to distract them. I suggest trying out a few different genres, not just your favorite, and then picking your poison.

3. Ingest caffeine if necessary

Caffeine is a stimulant that's been proven to delay fatigue in high intensity training (1). If you're feeling lethargic or a general lack of energy, I suggest ingesting an appropriate amount of caffeine before you work out. For me, this is a homemade pre-workout mixture. For others, this might be a large coffee. The one time to avoid caffeine is in the afternoon or evening, if you know that it will prevent you from sleeping.

4. Take a cold shower

Taking a shower before your workout goes against conventional wisdom. I'm well aware of this. But you can't argue how good and energized you feel after showering. And cold showers do the job even better. They've been proven to increase the blood flow in your body (2). If caffeine isn't an option, this is a solid method to boost your energy and wake you up before a workout. And if you can't tolerate a full on cold shower, alternating between hot and cold is less painful but yields roughly the same benefits.

5. Perform a specific, dynamic warmup

Don't stretch or do cardio. Cardio will tire you out and should be performed after the main workout, if at all – unless of course that is the workout for the day. Traditional stretching, on the other hand, has been shown to weaken your muscles, and therefore should be performed at the end of the workout (3). What should be done is a specific warm-up that takes your body through the full ranges of motion that will be used during your workout. For example, doing deep bodyweight squats before perform a barbell back squat is advisable. A great full body dynamic warmup is Joe Defranco's Agile Eight.

If you liked this article, check out my book Shredded Beast for a complete scientifically backed workout routine and nutrition system.

Read More: 5 Bench Press Mistakes That Will Stall Your Progress

References

1. Green, J. Matt, et al. "Effects of caffeine on repetitions to failure and ratings of perceived exertion during resistance training." International journal of sports physiology and performance 2.3 (2007): 250.
2. Keatinge, William R., Malcolm B. McIlroy, and Alan Goldfien. "Cardiovascular responses to ice-cold showers." Journal of applied physiology 19.6 (1964): 1145-1150.
3. Nelson, Arnold G., Joke Kokkonen, and DAVID A. ARNALL. "Acute muscle stretching inhibits muscle strength endurance performance." The Journal of Strength & Conditioning Research 19.2 (2005): 338-343.

David

David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Outrage At Halloween Costumes Shows Feminism's War Against Femininity

November 23, 2014 | by Jonathan David Farley | Link | Original Link

On All Hallows' Eve 2014, the hit television series, The Big Bang Theory, aired an episode in which two characters debated about sex and science. A magazine wanted to include Bernadette, a microbiologist, in a profile of "the fifty sexiest female scientists in California." Amy, a neuroscientist, said, "I think it's awful," adding, "Bernadette…should be celebrated for her achievements, not her looks."

Bernadette countered, "Why can't someone be thought of as both smart and pretty?", echoing the words of real-life science communicator Cara Santa Maria, who wished that one day girls could avoid "Sophia's" choice and be able to say, "I'm pretty, and I rule at math." Amy contacted the magazine and got them to scuttle the article.

The day after Halloween, life imitated art. An article entitled “The Reviews Are In For ‘Delicious Women’s PhD Darling Sexy Costume’” skewered a company’s “doctoral candidate” Halloween outfit. An assistant editor at Salon also entered the fray, along with Huffington Post, Inside Higher Ed, The Today Show, and the Boston Globe.

The Daily Kos listed it as part of the “war on women.”

Trigger warning: unrealistic depiction of a female soldier

The Guardian newspaper made a similar critique in October 2014, when it lambasted a video "encouraging girls to go into science" because that video "featured sexist cliches including high heels and lipsticks."

Sexist cliché? Women don't wear high heels and lipstick? Feminists seem to think women's sexuality stops at the laboratory door, that women's brains are disconnected from their bodies. Let's go through five problems with the feminist critique.

First, the over-reaction to the costume is bizarre, since the company makes police costumes, circus ringleader costumes, even clownfish (think Finding Nemo) costumes. Why is a doctoral candidate off-limits?

Second, while the criticism lambasted "male tenured faculty," "the patriarchy" (of course), "the male gaze," "Harry Potter's child bride" (I'm as confused as you are), and "rape culture" (Bingo!), the company's media contact in 2011 was a woman and the national sales director is a woman. I thought ignoring women who were in charge was an example of misogyny.

Third, men presumably aren't buying these costumes; women are, and women have agency. Or, as one feminist put it: "[W]hen we were teenagers and twentysomethings, we pretty all [sic] WANTED to dress sexy…. [W]hat drives it? If it's companies pushing it on us that's wrong…. If it's driven by demand… then it's less clear if or where the issue is," she concludes (unable, naturally, to suggest that women take responsibility for anything).

Fourth, at Oxford University, students often have to wear gowns. Most of the time, I noticed that women would wear tights with their gowns, which, for undergraduates, did not go down that far. They thus resembled the model in the Halloween costume.

Fifth, and most importantly, the feminist objections hinge on the assumption that female intellectuals aren't interested in displaying their femininity. Here are two female mathematical biologists, professors—not just doctoral candidates—at two of the world's greatest universities, Princeton and Harvard.

Corina Tarnita, Assistant Professor of Ecology and Evolutionary Biology at Princeton University, and Franziska Michor, Associate Professor of Biostatistics and Computational Biology at Harvard University. (They are from Central/Eastern Europe. Coincidence?)

And here is Big Bang Theory guest star Danica McKellar, who graduated summa cum laude with a degree in mathematics from the University of California at Los Angeles. One of her research papers is entitled, "Percolation and Gibbs states multiplicity for ferromagnetic Ashkin–Teller models on $\mathbf{Z}^2$." (Conflict-of-interest disclosure: Danica described me as "the incomparable, brilliant Jonathan Farley" in her New York Times best seller, Hot X.)

Why is feminism seeking to decapitate women? Bernadette tells Amy her thoughts:

"[Y]ou got jealous…you don't like people expressing their sexuality because no one wants you to express yours."

Feminist Andrea Dworkin

Of course, Bernadette is slightly wrong: feminists usually celebrate the smashing of barriers to the expression of female sexuality. If a woman walks around New York City in tight clothing and men notice, shame on those men, because women do not wear micro-minis and stiletto heels to make themselves appealing to men.

Feminists' reaction to the Halloween costume is scientific evidence that even they don't believe this claptrap: Though they prioritize career over family (i.e., appealing to a mere man) and insist that a 35-year-old woman finishing her second post-doctoral fellowship is just as able to attract a high-quality mate and have children as a 20-year-old Princeton co-ed, they know the truth.

They see the wrinkles in their faces and it is like staring into a chasm—these strong, independent women must run to Jezebel.com for reassurance and a group hug—for, as the Boston Globe puts it, “Halloween Is a Cruel Reminder That Women Must Strive to Be Sexy.”

They don’t have to, but if they are as smart as their advanced degrees suggest they are, they won’t mock the one sexual preference modern feminism considers fair game.

In conclusion, men like attractive women. Judging from the plethora of “sexy fill-in-the-blank” Halloween costumes, women like to be attractive. This is what causes the species to continue. It’s not rocket science.

And you don’t need a Ph.D. to figure it out.

Read More: “Gravity” Perfectly Depicts Women In Science

Jonathan David Farley
JDF has written for "The New York Times," "Time" Magazine, and "The Guardian" newspaper in Great Britain and is co-founder of Peren Linn Fashion, a company that makes math-themed clothing for women and girls. He obtained his doctorate from the University of Oxford.

Why Is Pando's Sarah Lacy Leading An Anti-Male Smear Campaign Against Uber?

November 24, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Sarah Lacy is the owner of Pando, a tech news site that bills itself as "the site of record for Silicon Valley." For the past couple of years, Lacy and her colleagues have been waging a war against the ridesharing company Uber based primarily on the supposed "misogyny" of its CEO, Travis Kalanick. Pando's campaign came to a head recently after Uber's Emil Michael revealed that the company was planning to fund investigations into Lacy and other SJW journalists known for leading harassment campaigns:

> According to BuzzFeed News, Uber's Emil Michael was at a dinner in New York on Nov. 14 where he detailed a plan to spend "a million dollars" to hire a team that would help it fight bad press. Michael reportedly said Uber would be justified in looking into the personal lives and families of journalists in order to strike back. The executive apparently believed the dinner was an off-the-record event, though BuzzFeed said it was never told not to report on the dinner.

In the typical fashion of SJWs, Lacy panicked, claiming that Uber was targeting her children, and even went so far as to hire a bodyguard. The story has become so big that Senator Al Franken (D-MN) sent a letter to Kalanick demanding to know more about Uber's "smear campaign" against Pando. The SJW tech media has closed ranks around Lacy; even Valleywag, whose scrapes with Pando are well known, came out against Uber.

Lacy's histrionics are yet another example of the hypocrisy of SJW journalists. It's perfectly acceptable for writers like Lacy, The Washington Post's Caitlin Dewey, Jezebel's Jia Tolentino, or Gawker's Dayna Evans to ruin peoples' lives with politically correct lynch mobs, but when their own tactics are turned against them, these fearless reporters suddenly cry foul. While there are fair criticisms to be made of the way Uber and other Silicon Valley start-ups do business, Lacy's conduct suggests she and Pando are leading this witch-hunt for more sinister reasons.

Sarah Lacy's History Of Anti-Male Bigotry

Sarah Lacy has a long record of making bigoted comments against men, white men in particular. A month ago, she published an article decrying Uber's "asshole culture," prompted by a French advertising campaign in which Uber used attractive, scantily-clad women to push their service:

> We shared this in our News Ticker already, but I still can't believe that an office of Uber — a company valued at $18 billion and held up as a bastion of modern entrepreneurship — posted an ad that encouraged, played on, and celebrated treating women who may choose to drive cars to make extra money like hookers.

Lacy hysterically claimed that the campaign was evidence that Uber didn't take the safety of its female drivers and passengers seriously—because men who enjoy attractive women are apparently a threat—and huffily declared that she was deleting the Uber app from her phone because of it:

> So, I'm turning that advice on myself: I've finally deleted Uber from my phone. For one thing, I increasingly don't feel safe as a woman taking it, frequently late at night and alone. I've got a good solid alternative in Lyft, and life is too precious for me to put mine at risk.
>
> And at some point, an asshole culture just goes too far.

Indeed, Lacy has a well-documented hatred and fear of normal male sexuality. She and other Pando writers have frequently whined about Travis Kalanick's comments on how Uber has helped him get laid with numerous girls:

> …Or maybe people talk about Uber in a douchey way because, when talking to journalists, the CEO of Uber says things that make him sound like a tremendous, unapologetic douche.

Lacy is yet another in the long line of female reporters who complain about the "sexist" or "bro" culture of Silicon Valley startups. In a PandoQuarterly article on "the great big Silicon Valley asshole game," she attempted to shame Snapchat founder Evan Spiegel for "sexist" comments he made in private emails to his friends. She also harped on the claims of sexual harassment against Tinder CMO Justin Mateen, among other things. In another article, Lacy also praised notorious man-hater Sinead O'Connor's comments on the so-called "woman problem" in tech.

Paul Carr, Pando's editorial director and a close friend of Lacy's, also appears to be motivated by SJW ideology. For example, in an article last month, Carr referred to the owners of Mack Tactics, a Mystery Method ripoff PUA firm, as "gross" (a term used by SJWs for anything that upsets their delicate feelings), and also took umbrage at the firm's advice that "every encounter with a woman is an opportunity." Indeed, Carr spent more time attacking Mack Tactics and PUAs then discussing co-founder Ronen Olshansky's legitimately objectionable public behavior:

> Today, Macktactics.com points to a gross-but-unremarkable "dating tips" website but, when Olshansky went in to business with the site's authors, it had one purpose: to teach men how to use the methods of police hostage negotiation to pick up women. (If you have a strong stomach, you can find most of the previous versions of the site on Archive.org)

It's clear that both Lacy and Carr's primary motivation in attacking Uber is not the company's questionable business practices, but their own hatred and discomfort with healthy male sexuality. Additionally, they also seem to be motivated by envy that they themselves can't achieve the level of success that Kalanick has. This must be especially bruising to Carr, whose most recent start-up, the subscription magazine NSFWCORP, had to be bought out by Pando after failing to turn a profit in two years of operation.

Sarah Lacy Employs Mark Ames Who Admitted Sex With A 15-Year-Old

One of Pando's most notable contributors is Mark Ames, best known for co-founding the satirical Moscow biweekly The Exile. In his 2000 memoir The Exile: Sex, Drugs, and Libel in the New Russia, co-authored with Matt Taibbi, Ames bragged about having sex with a 15-year old girl:

> When I went back into the TV room, Andy pulled me aside with a worried grin on his face.
>
> "Dude, do you realize.... do you know how old that Natasha is?" he said.
>
> "Sixteen?"
>
> "No! No, she's fif-teen! Fif-teen!" Right then, my pervometer needle hit the red. I had to have her, even if she was homely. I sat down next to her on the couch and fed her another double martini with pineapple juice, and asked her to take off her clothes now, to prepare for the Jacuzzi.

Several paragraphs later, Ames also bragged about how he bullied one of his girlfriends into an abortion by threatening to murder her:

> Right then, I stared at Katya with a look—I'm not sure how it appeared to her, but in my mind, I was starting to contemplate two courses of action: murder, or AWOL.
>
> "What will you do, kill me?" she said, laughing nervously.
>
> "Maybe, yeah," I replied. "I'll throw you off my balcony. I'll make it look like an > accident."

>
> She started to cry, but I was relentless. I told her that if she had the child, she would be killing me, so it was an act of self-defense. And if I didn't kill her, then I would flee Moscow and she'd never find me… I was relentless. I attacked her the Russian way: I wore her down for hours during the night, KGB interrogation-style.
>
> […]
>
> At 5:30 the next morning, Katya, acting the martyr, quietly slipped out of my apartment, made a beeline to the abortion clinic, and sucked the little fucker out.

Whenever Ames is confronted about these excerpts, he claims that the book was "satire" and that none of the stories in it actually happened. Both Paul Carr and fellow Pando contributor and ex-Exile editor Yasha Levine have repeated this claim:

Ames's claims that his Exile writings were all fiction—or that he always billed them as fiction—is a lie. Not only does The Exile's copyright page contain a notice that the book is "nonfiction," the back cover proudly describes it as "the inside story of how the tabloid came to be." I scanned these images from my copy of the book:

Copyright © 2000 by Mark Ames and Yves Tellki

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form or by any electronic or mechanical means, or the portions thereof, including information storage and retrieval systems, without permission in writing from the publisher, except by a reviewer, who may quote brief passages in a review. Any members of educational institutions wishing to photocopy parts or all of the work for classroom use, or publishers who want to photocopy parts or all of the work for inclusion in an anthology, should send their inquiries to Grove/Atlantic, Inc., 841 Broadway, New York, NY 10003.

This is a work of fiction. While all of the characters and events described in this book are real, certain names and identifying details have been changed.

Published simultaneously in Canada
Printed in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Ames, Mark 1965-
The Exile sex tapes : lost in the new Russia / by Mark Ames and Yves Tellki.
p. cm.

ISBN-10: 0-8021-4352-4
ISBN-13: 978-0-8021-4352-7
1. Ames, Mark 1965- 2. Exile (Moscow, Russia) 3. Tabloid newspapers—Russia (Federation)—Moscow. 4. Newspaper publishing—Russia (Federation)—Moscow. 5. Journalists—Russia (Federation)—Moscow—Biography. 6. Americans—Russia (Federation)—Moscow—Biography. I. Tellki, Yves. II. Title
PN5276.A52 2009
070.1'31—dc21 2009 SP-25071
CIP

Additionally, in a 2010 Vanity Fair profile of The Exile, The Wall Street Journal's Alan Cullison was quoted saying that Ames is "absolutely truthful, even about the most shameful things in his life." Vanity Fair also quoted Newsweek's Owen Matthews as saying that Ames "has that quality of brutal honesty." The profile, frequently touted by Ames and Levine as a good introduction to what The Exile was about, makes no mention of The Exile book's content being fake.

There are two possible explanations here. One is that The Exile is a true story and Sarah Lacy is employing an admitted statutory rapist who threatens to murder his pregnant girlfriends, which makes her accusations of "misogyny" against Kalanick and Uber absolutely hollow. The other is that the book is made up and Lacy is employing a liar and serial fabricator who has no business writing for any news organization. If the latter, Carr and Levine are also complicit in Ames's fraud.

Follow The Money

SJW smear campaigns are almost always motivated by money, whether it's Gawker Media targeting the CTO of their competitor Business Insider for his "offensive" Tweets, to anti-white race hustler Suey Park promoting herself through bogus campaigns like #CancelColbert. In this case, Pando's investors include Marc Andreessen, who is also a major investor in Uber's chief competitor, Lyft.

While both Sarah Lacy and Paul Carr have tried to deny the Lyft connection, claiming that Pando shares more investors with Uber, a cursory glance shows that Pando's coverage of Lyft has been considerably more positive than their Uber coverage. For example, in her article on Uber's "asshole culture," Lacy announced that she would be using Lyft instead, and she also wrote a hagiographic piece on Lyft's business model six months ago. Carr has also written his fair share of articles sucking up to Lyft.

Assuming that Lacy and Carr are telling the truth about money not playing a role in their Uber coverage, it's clear that they are attempting to play favorites and promote Lyft over Uber because of their SJW beliefs. This is the exact opposite of what journalists are supposed to do.

Turnabout Is Fair Play

Journalism in the social media age is defined by angry witch-hunts lead by aggrieved individuals. As Ryan Holiday wrote in Trust Me, I'm Lying, the Internet-driven rapid-fire news cycle means that publications benefit from making their articles as inflammatory as possible, damn the actual facts. From Pando to Gawker to The Washington Post, most reporting is propaganda in disguise, advanced by damaged writers with axes to grind.

SJW journalists like Sarah Lacy and her hatchet boy Paul Carr view themselves as crusading warriors for truth, when in reality they are just as corrupt—if not more so—than the "dudebros" they lambaste. They position themselves as our moral superiors, arrogantly lecturing us about "sexism" and rooting through the private lives of their enemies, all the while zealously keeping anyone from finding the skeletons in their closets. And as Franken's intervention shows, there are many in the government who will eagerly help them in their harassment campaigns. Quis custodiet ipsos custodes? If Lacy and Carr get their way, no one.

If Lacy and her ilk want to engage in hysteria-driven smear campaigns against “racists” and “misogynists,” they should get used to their victims doing the same to them. As it stands, there’s enough evidence to condemn Lacy and Pando without any serious digging. Her own words—and the actions of her employees—show her to be a misandrist bigot and monstrous hypocrite who can dish it out but can’t take it.

Read More: Ezra Klein’s Anti-Male Hatred On Vox

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Churchill Makes The Call: An Agonizing Command Decision

November 24, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

In 1940, the Germans burst into France, overwhelming the defenses of that proud but demoralized nation in a scant six weeks. To those on the Allied side old enough to have lived through the First World War, it was a shocking spectacle. To see the roads of the Low Countries and northern France choked with the detritus and charred wreckage of war; to witness the pathetic columns of refugees fleeing the fury of the battle zones; to view the beaten residuum of Allied arms evacuate in disgrace and defeat from the continent at Dunkirk; to see the Wehrmacht's battle standards hoisted on France's national monuments: these were the dismaying scenes that no observer could have contemplated in 1939.

The Soviet Union in 1940 was still engaged in the cynical collusion with Germany in the rape of Europe. Even Franklin Roosevelt, though disposed to favor the justice of the Allied cause, believed it was only a matter of time before England was finished. No amount of Churchillian oratory could disguise the fact that England was prostrate, undefended, and alone.

England's wartime agreement with France imposed the reciprocal obligation on both nations not to seek an armistice with Germany without the consent of the other. But these assurances now counted for very little. The roots of French malaise went deep, stretching back to the 1920s and 1930s; it some ways the nation (like England) had never fully recovered from the First World War. Its excessive loss of blood and treasure in the Great War had left it anemic and pale, a shadow of its former self, and a ready victim of more predatory or vengeful powers.

Its leadership was riven with faction and ideological bickering, and its people had little stomach for a fight that appeared to offer a replay of the bloodletting that had ruined Europe a generation earlier. From Paris's perspective, a separate peace seemed the only way to preserve the integrity of the nation.

Winston Churchill, England's new prime minister, did not see it this way. He knew that a Franco-German armistice would be a stepping-stone for an eventual invasion of his country, and placed no faith in the guarantees of the Vichy government, which he considered to be little more than a German quisling. Of primary concern for Churchill was the disposition of the French fleet. France possessed a mighty collection of battleships, cruisers, and destroyers, second in power only to the Royal Navy; these ships, should they fall into the hands of German belligerence, might prove to be a deciding factor in the coming battle for Britain. The French fleet was dispersed throughout the Mediterranean, but its bulk was concentrated at the port of Mers-al-Kébir in Algeria.

The prime minister left no doubt that he would act with resolution and speed in the protection of his nation's interests. On July 3, 1940, as part of what was called Operation Catapult, British forces seized, after some resistance, several French vessels (including some submarines) moored at Plymouth and Portsmouth. This operation earned England the enmity of many Frenchmen, including Charles de Gaulle, who saw it as unnecessary and deeply insulting. Yet truth and reason rarely find a favorable reception in those burdened by defeat. Wisdom may often condescend to stir the passions of the human heart, but misplaced pride blocks our appreciation of what is wise.

But what to do about the formidable array of French naval power at Mers-el-Kébir? There were located four battleships, a seaplane tender, and six destroyers. Their disposition was uncertain; Churchill was receiving contradictory messages from Paris, perhaps reflecting the paralysis that had overcome the nation in the wake of its collapse.

For Churchill personally it was an agonizing dilemma. Pro-French to the marrow of his bones, he was as shocked as anyone by the swiftness of France's collapse and the abjectness of her condition; the thought of having to take up arms against his ally was abhorrent to him. Yet he knew the fight must continue, and that he must not be swayed by emotion or sentiment in Britain's lonely hour of peril. Roosevelt had essentially written England off, Stalin was smug in his own imagined rapprochement with Berlin, and the remaining small nations not controlled by Germany were too cowed to offer anything more than moral support.

Churchill, wanting to give the French an opportunity to avoid a confrontation, ordered an ultimatum to be delivered by a Gibraltar-based naval officer, Admiral James Somerville, to his French counterpart at Mers-el-Kébir. It offered the French three choices: sail the fleet to England and turn over the ships to British control, sail the fleet to a French colonial port away from Europe, or scuttle the fleet to prevent its seizure by the enemy. Should the French commander refuse these "fair offers"—the ultimatum continued—the British would "use whatever force may be necessary" to neutralize the French naval vessels.

And here is where the obscuring smoke of conflict, the vanities of human interaction, and the pathos of war combined to create a tragedy. The British ultimatum was presented by a French-speaking naval officer named Cedric Holland. The French admiral receiving the message, Admiral Marcel-Bruno Gensoul, was piqued that the British had sent him an officer of comparatively low rank, and responded by erecting bureaucratic obstacles to candid discussion.

Gensoul was one of those wooden-headed military types who appear with depressing frequency in the history of armed conflict. His superior, Admiral Francois Darlan, had previously assured Churchill that the French fleet would never be permitted to fall into German hands. Churchill, however, was unwilling to put his faith in such promises.

Darlan was apparently never informed by Gensoul of the full text of the British ultimatum, nor of the fact that one of the ultimatum's options (sailing the fleet to Martinique) was an option Darlan himself had authorized Gensoul to pursue. For the carnage that was to follow, Gensoul's obduracy and churlishness shoulder much reproof. And this is the tragedy of war.

In war, much that seems clear or certain in hindsight is not so at the time. Decisions are made, and fates are sealed, with the information that is available to the protagonists in the arena at the time. When to this uncertainty is added the passions and errors of men under duress, one begins to see how tragedy emerges from situations that may seem easily negotiable from the comfortable perspective of one's living room sofa. So it was at Mers-el-Kébir.

When it became clear that negotiations were going nowhere, the British mined the harbor to prevent the ships' escape in the event of fighting. Churchill then gave the command to commence action. The British destroyers opened fire in late afternoon on July 3, 1940, against an array of French ships that was largely unprepared. One ship, the Bretagne, exploded after a direct hit on her magazine, sinking with great loss of life. Several ships sought to escape the inferno at port and made out to sea, but these too were pursued. The French made some ineffective counterattacks on the British base at Gibraltar in July and September, but these appear to have been conducted more as a face-saving exercise than anything else.

The results of Operation Catapult were grim. The French lost 1297 men, with about 350 wounded; the British lost two airmen who were killed in the mining of the harbor. The greatest damage done was that to Franco-British relations; a lasting enmity was sown into the hearts of patriotic Frenchmen, which the passage of time did little to diminish. Understandably, the French were extremely bitter at the British attack, believing it to have been unnecessary and unjustified.

This view is not entirely without merit. French ships in Alexandria, Egypt, for example, were simply blockaded on July 3 and then turned over to the British on July 7 without violent incident, under similar conditions to those existing at Mers-el-Kébir. When the Germans attempted to capture the French fleet at Toulon in November 1942, the French did in fact scuttle their ships before the arrival of the Wehrmacht. Admiral Darlan then sent Churchill an aggrieved letter stating that his action in scuttling the fleet in Toulon finally proved that he, Darlan, would have honored his promises made two years earlier about the fleet at Mers-el-Kébir. The British attack, he believed, had been entirely unjustified.

Churchill himself was profoundly distressed by the action he had been forced to undertake against the French fleet. But in cool-headed retrospect, it is clear that the Prime Minister's decision was the correct one. Assurances made by Darlan to Churchill were dubious at best; Darlan later proved himself to be an opportunistic fixture in the Vichy government. He died by the hand of a French assassin late in the war. And perhaps the surrender of the French fleet at Alexandria had only been made possible by the British military action at Mers-el-Kébir.

The necessity of keeping the French fleet out of German hands was so dire that extreme action was justified in pursuit of this goal. Churchill could not afford to take a wait-and-see approach to developments; the hour of crisis called for speed and resolution in the determination of outcomes. His actions sent a clear message to the rest of the world: England was down, but not out; England would still be in the game, and would fight, if necessary, to the bitter end. Churchill's ruthlessness signaled to the world that the war would continue, and that there would be no surrender.

In 1940, when France lay in ruins and the tyrant in Berlin bestrode the continent, Churchill found himself chided by weaker spirits than his own, men who believed

England’s future lay in some sort of detente with the German tyranny which had engulfed Europe. Lord Halifax attempted to usurp control of Churchill’s cabinet and convince them to make peace with Germany. Brushing him aside, Churchill delivered a passionate speech to his 25-member cabinet, urging them to fight on no matter the cost. In these words he expressed the soul of a fighter, and a spirit that would not be cowed into subservience:

> Nations which went down fighting rose again, but those which surrendered tamely were finished…If this long island story of ours is to end at last, let it end only when each of us lies choking in his own blood upon the ground.

Even after all these years, these words still command a stillness in the soul, an awe that induces a becoming submission, and removes all prevarication from the heart.

Read More: The Lives Of Great Men As Moral Instruction

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

7 Things I Learned About Game In My 40s

November 24, 2014 | by Jean Lamour | Link | Original Link

I am now in my mid 40s and life is increasingly better due to the fact that I am self-employed, single, and free to practice the "game" of pick-up and the art of seducing women. I disengaged from corporate mass-media a couple of years ago due to the onslaught of attacks received by commentators when I posted comments on the Huffington Post.

There, I wrote my opinions under the pen name: "whitemale08″ and rhetorically defeated every argument against me by the ultra-extreme left. I soon realized that I was entering what I thought was a mid-life crisis by constantly engaging "popular opinion." Unthinkable ideas and concepts, that should have never been up for debate, were depressing to me. Through this change in perspective, I discovered seven key truths that led to a renewed commitment to game.

1. The need to immerse oneself in game and in business

A couple of years ago, I immersed myself fully into business and consumed only what was related to game. Because of this commitment, life is richer and happier. When I go out and practice game, I enjoy it a lot more than when I was younger. Experience has taught me that a lot of younger girls between ages of 18 and 24 are attracted to older guys for their maturity. Age seems to not be a factor as long as an older man is able to care for himself and his finances to the best of his ability. This type of strength can uniquely be found in a mature older man and can be very attractive and even intimidating to younger women.

2. Mature men can game both day and night

When I practice day game or night game, I rely on being centered and kind as a person. At the same time, I look for an opportunity to be direct and dominant when escalating the interaction. Because of a woman's feminine nature, she submits herself easily to a man's dominant frame and will feel less attractive if masculine dominant energy is not directed towards her. Men only appreciate this fact when they get older. As long as you feel comfortable seducing a younger woman, she will be OK with you moving the interaction forward. Be aware, though, that she may be ridiculed and mocked by her peers and friends in public.

I cannot overemphasize the importance of being grounded as a mature man. Younger guys may try to push you around in a nightclub, but being calm and indifferent can go a long way. Be comfortable with people calling you "sir" at the supermarket or by a bartender at a nightclub. Initially it may make a girl feel awkward that she's attracted to an older gentleman, but that can quickly turn into you being viewed as the "prize."

3. The Myth of the Mid-Life Crisis

Embrace the fact that you are getting older and don't try to hide it with buying a sports car or dressing in attire more suited for young males. Don't think you have to put on a fluorescent colored top with crazy graffiti written all over it to impress some 21-year-old. "Peacocking" in a nightclub will telegraph to a girl that you are immature, and she will quickly label you as suffering from a "mid-life crisis," even though this phenomenon was made up by middle-aged women to rob mature men of their power in the sexual marketplace.

4. The importance of analyzing your interactions

When dissecting interactions and blowouts, you can easily pinpoint the subtle giveaways that qualify or question masculine presence. Women feel awkwardness the moment your presence becomes androgynous. Unfortunately, today's social conditioning has confused us as to what is appropriate masculine behavior.

An older man is more bold and assured of himself, and this is what is so attractive to hot young girls. They don't apologize for being masculine or older—rather, a man shows off his dominant "macho" behavior to a girl by projecting a deep voice and unflinching eye contact. The smirk on his face allows the woman to become acutely aware of just how naughty she is when flirting, and this is a big turn-on for both you and her.

5. Take advantage of your age

Men in their mid-40s should take advantage of the fact that they went through puberty during the 80s, where the remnants of masculinity were still visible. Later in the decade, female celebrities like Janet Jackson began to dress in a more masculine fashion. Groups like Wham and Culture Club promoted an "alternative lifestyle" and created a slippery slope where masculinity slid into decline. Sitcoms in the 90s, like Friends, perpetrated unspeakable damage to the male image and father figures were dumbed down and portrayed as weak and incompetent.

Now, the hint of being "macho" or even masculine is somehow considered evil according to corporate mass-media, and that could be an obstacle in your game and when learning the art of seduction. Your age is your advantage in this area, where it provides a good excuse for you to be more classically masculine.

6. Game and travel go hand in hand

If you travel to certain countries, like in Latin America, you will see more traditional masculine behavior and women more comfortable in their natural feminine roles. This affords plenty of opportunities for men in their mid-life to explore possibilities with younger, hotter, more fertile women without much retaliation and debate.

Most men in their later years have the means to travel and meet beautiful women from different parts of the world. Instead of taking that same boring vacation people do every year, why not research places that have the most attractive girls on the planet and plan a trip to go there and practice your game?

7. Game for life

Game will keep a man focused on his masculinity throughout his later years and away from the time-wasted philosophical debates in a mass-marketed culture that is now beyond recoverable.

If you are a middle-aged man who finds himself single or divorced and has no obligations to anyone but himself, then by all means get back in the game. Remember, every year around the world, another million plus hot young girls turn 21 and are waiting to meet mature middle-aged men with enough sophistication to seduce them and show them the romance of a lifetime.

Read More: 5 Lessons From One Year Of Game

Jean Lamour

Jean is a business owner in the transportation industry and a lover of women, with over a 20 year long journey in Game and the Art of Seduction. You can find out more about him and his journey action-takers.com or see his Youtube channels at and at Jean Lamour

Beowulf Is A Mystical Red Pill Bible

November 24, 2014 | by Tom Barry | Link | Original Link

Someone mentioned Beowulf the other day. Like many contemporary windbags I felt I had the authority to comment on it, but I quickly realized I could not recall a single element of the story. I "read" Seamus Heaney's translation of Beowulf in university, and my Irish dad had always proudly raved that it took an Irishman to translate the most important piece of Old English literature in history, but I was ashamed to admit I couldn't remember a thing about it.

However, for some reason I knew the ins and outs of how extraordinarily sexist it was, thanks to my feminist university indoctrination. Grendel's mother was a woman, women are in the background of the narrative, blah blah, patriarchy. It is only years later, after taking the red pill, that I am waking up to the fact that this book was treated with outright disdain by the cultural Marxists running the show in academia. I resolved to take a step towards undoing this social programming and revisit it. I was not disappointed.

Cultural Marxists have declared war on literature and tradition

I was assigned the task of reading Beowulf for an English elective I took in third year at a Canadian university. It was, unsurprisingly, taught by an elderly feminist who openly hated it. She was hell-bent on using Beowulf to prove its author and all white males are evil and biased. This class was basically a crude open-air dissection of great works of English literature. Want to know how it ends? You find out men are bad.

No matter how hard I tried I could not find this discussion engaging, so I tuned out. I blamed myself for being a lazy unmotivated idiot (unlike all the women in the class, who seemed to be doing so well) but now I'm not so sure. After taking the red pill, I am waking up to the fact that I was only allowed to be walked through these great works of literature with feminist intermediaries holding my hand, shielding me from the contagious bigotry.

We weren't even really encouraged or required to read the original literature for the class. The actual works themselves were much less important than the mandatory articles about the male gaze and castration theory. Come essay time, as long as we could mine a random quote and inject it into a new draft of the same basic essay we all wrote over and over for every course we took, with the thesis that had the words "white", "male", and "hegemony" in it, we were guaranteed a decent mark.

In short, the many criticisms of Beowulf amount to the incredibly evil and biased fact that that the hero is a white jarl (the Norse high caste) and therefore extremely biased and not to be taken seriously. Because of this, rather than analyze the work in its own right as a rare and valuable glimpse into an otherwise dark and cloudy past, we were encouraged to deconstruct it, asking "but what does this say about women?" at every opportunity. When it came time to write the final exam can you guess what all the questions were about? Gendered analysis of Beowulf. Any other analysis was not an option.

Beowulf is a classic for a reason

Recently, I did in fact read Beowulf, and I am happy to report it is nothing short of transformative. Read a little bit every night before bed and it will transform your consciousness. It is not the self-congratulatory drivel they made it out to be in feminist academic hugboxes. It is an ode to the very notion of manhood, honour, legacy, heroism, and the tragedy of male disposability.

To the SJWs who say that Beowulf is literary masturbation of upper class males I say this: Beowulf's high status is directly related to his willingness to sacrifice himself for the good of his society. His sacrifice is the only thing standing between existence and complete obliteration for his kinfolk.

Beowulf has real social value. In a world that is plagued by dragons and marauding beasts, anyone willing to face them who is not you is your new best friend. The dragon or the serpent is not a fantasy—it is an apt metaphor for the real, deadly challenges that faced old Norse society. And the skald (bard) makes it clear Beowulf was seen by his kin as nothing short of a divine gift from God for his feats. So-called "Big Men" like him had real value, not imagined value. This is not some invention of the male ego. The warrior archetype is real and in demand, even today, and it is this fact that is so empowering to contemporary men, and the one that feminists can not stand to acknowledge.

In short, Beowulf deserved his high station. He was not some sociopath who relished pointless killing, but rather appeared to be a very thoughtful and even humble character who took the notion of honour insanely seriously, and was willing to lay down his life without hesitation for his kin. The truth is we all owe our existence to men like him, and a functional society recognizes this fact. That is why these men get sagas written about them, while the names of the men women who waited out the conflicts in palisaded hillforts, minding the children, are lost to history. It's a tradeoff that needs to exist, or there is no incentive for men to step up and put it all on the line.

The debt of gratitude to the dragon slayer

There is a reason the male warrior is such a compelling archetype. We will always find him engaging, no matter how much SJWs try to destroy and mock him in today's lecture halls and tumblr pages. Human beings love male machismo and bravado. No matter what we may claim to believe, when we see that video of that Kurdish boxer beating up five punks in a streetfight, we are filled with primal satisfaction. We are wired this way, and for good reason: it saved our lives. You can declare war on patriarchy, warrior ethos, even the notion of maleness itself, but the sacrifices and legacy of the past will always be a part of you.

If you are a man, especially but not exclusively one with Northern European heritage, you need to check out this piece of literature. Read it slowly. This tale of the Anglo Saxon skalds is an echo of red pill truth from an ancient time, a timeless testament to the debt of gratitude we all owe to the dragon slayers. The language is rich and beautiful, and there is something almost mystical about the interwoven motifs of fire, serpents, metal, blood, and honour.

I will leave you with Seamus Heaney's reading of his own translation and a little bit of verse. Enjoy—and tonight, I hope you'll all join me in raising a horn of mead to the Beowulfs.

> Then he addressed each dear companion > one final time, those fighters in their helmets, > resolute and high-born: "I would rather not > use a weapon if I knew another way > to grapple with the dragon and make good my boast > as I did against Grendel in days gone by.
> But I shall be meeting molten venom > in the fire he breathes, so I go forth > in mail-shirt and shield. I won't shift a foot > when I meet the cave-guard: what occurs on the wall > between the two of us will turn out as fate, > overseer of men, decides. I am resolved.
> I scorn further words against this sky-borne foe.
> "Men at arms, remain here on the barrow, > safe in your armour, to see which one of us > is better in the end at bearing wounds > in a deadly fray. This fight is not yours, > nor is it up to any man except me > to measure his strength against the monster > or to prove his worth. I shall win the gold > by my courage, or else mortal combat, > doom of battle, will bear your lord away."

> Then he drew himself up beside his shield.
> The fabled warrior in his warshirt and helmet > trusted in his own strength entirely > and went under the crag. No coward path.

Read More: Violence Is A Means To An End, Not A Coming Of Age Ritual

Tom Barry
Tom is a traditionally-minded red pill survivor of the cultural Marxist wasteland that is the humanities and arts streams of academia. He is a folk musician, history-buff, and level II nymphomancer.

The Pros And Cons Of Game For Black Men In The West

November 25, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

As an African American male it took me a good long while to come to grips with the fact that my skin tone changes a lot of things when gaming western females. There's nothing special or unique about me, but it would be silly not to acknowledge that my race does have certain advantages and disadvantages with regards to bedding women.

Being raised in a military family, race didn't seem to play a role in much of anything on base. People were judged strictly on rank and credentials which were posted next to doors of family living quarters beneath the family name. Because of this I was almost completely oblivious to the racial issues of the outside world until I became a civilian in my teens.

When I started out in game I had that same adolescent mentality. Never once did I ask myself "How does being black factor into my success with girls?" I knew there were some differences, but not enough to make me think I had to make any major adjustments, so I just dove in headfirst (which was the right way to do it). But as soon as I became cognizant of the racial components of game and tweaked my approach accordingly, my conquests with the second sex improved considerably.

[image]

Over the years I noticed a few differences in the way women react when approached by black men as opposed to other races. There are all sorts of studies, surveys, and research out there to back up my observations (Google them) but this article is based on personal experiences, stories from lifelong friends, and things I've seen throughout life post-red pill awakening.

Qualifier: This article pertains to gaming non-ghetto, westernized women of all races as a black man with game. Now that that's out of the way, here are the advantages and disadvantages of practicing the Venusian arts from a black man's point of view.

Women Often Assume Black Men Are Natural Alphas

While most white men in the Anglo world have to prove their sexual fitness to women (on the "alpha fucks" side of hypergamy) there's an unspoken sentiment that black men who are at or near the extreme poles of the financial hierarchy (wealthy and poor) are natural alphas. The hip hop culture, ghettos, and black professional athletes make compelling arguments for that assumption but the truth is no one really knows for sure.

Advantage: This assumption will push women to shit test as a function of confirmation as opposed to discovery or qualification. They will poke and prod a little to make sure you live up to the perceived reputation (to what degree depends largely on frame), but women tend to give black men the benefit of the doubt as far as congruency goes. Their shit tests are more benign, at least from the onset of courtship.

Disadvantage: If you do fail a shit test, you're beyond finished. When everything around a woman tells her a certain type of male has natural alpha tendencies her southern regions will dry up faster than a salt-covered slug if she uncovers any remnants of beta penchants. Nothing is more unattractive than a black beta male. Most times when I've failed a single shit test I have rarely been given a chance to redeem myself, if at all. Even when my game was air-tight to that point, if I took the smallest bite of that beta chum I could almost see the attraction drain out of her body.

Even though black men seemingly have the "assumed alpha" advantage when approaching, the margin for error is razor-thin. Speaking from personal experience, getting blown out for the slightest missteps motivated me to tighten up my game rather quickly and effectively, but only because I was highly motivated to be successful with girls. Thinner-skinned men often drop out at this stage because of the sheer volume of rejection early on in their womanizing development.

Girls Expect Black Men To Push For Sex

The "natural alpha myth" impressed upon Anglo women about black men sets a lot of expectations in terms of what to expect upon being approached by us. They assume we'll be forthright, bold, and fearless. They also expect black men to escalate the interaction toward sex more quickly.

Advantage: It takes a tremendous amount of pressure off. Knowing that women expect this means that if they're receptive to game, give up the digits, and don't flake out on the ensuing arranged meet-up, they are straight up DTF.

Disadvantage: Day game is very difficult. It's not easy to work past the slut shields with women who hold this assumption. Don't get me wrong, it's not impossible. But ultra-smooth game is absolutely necessary when attempting to strike up a seemingly innocuous conversation with a high sexual market value woman in order to gain trust and build attraction. Granted, most men (regardless of race) have to do this anyway, as good looking girls usually assume the reason most men talk to them is to get into their panties. But they're damn near 100% certain of the intent when being chatted up by a brother, so they fortify their defenses accordingly.

This presumption puts all our cards are out on the table. Women can either fold or double down right then and there, because in their minds sex is inevitable when they meet up with a black man. But like I said before, it's a major plus on the "alpha fucks" side, which leads me to my next observation which is that…

Black Men Are Rarely Thought Of As LTR Material

Today's American female is encouraged to ride the cock carousel until she's well into her 30s and then settle down with a beta schlub to fulfill the other side of her dualistic sexual imperative. Most of the time that unlucky sap is a white male—especially if the carousel passenger is a high-value female.

The U.S. has come a long way as far as the overall acceptance of interracial dating is concerned (specifically between black men and white women), but it still carries a measure of taboo however underground it may be. For that reason black men are mainly viewed as a "phase" when seen with a younger woman who isn't black or a "How Stella Got Her Groove Back" type of fling when seen with an older woman of a different race.

[image]

Outside of the wealthy, it is highly uncommon for women to think of black men as a long-term partners. The perceived lack of future provisioning potential and social stigma are major deterrents to women with options as far as marriage or settling down is concerned (the obvious exception being black women, who chase black men like fat kids chase ice cream trucks). However, non-black women in this country are mystified by the lore of the sexual prowess of the black male. They'd by lying if they didn't admit they weren't a little curious about the "once you go black you don't go back" adage.

Advantage: It leads to a lot of easy notches for black men—especially with today's pro-carousel woman. Obviously not all black men are porn stars between the sheets and equipped with 19″ cocks that make women squirt like faucets. Women who have experience with more than one know this. But the hamsters of those who have never crossed over just can't help themselves. They have to know. So as soon as the opportunity presents itself to a woman who is even a little curious they make themselves readily available for the taking.

Disadvantage: Unless you believe in ridiculous notions like unicorns, "The American Dream," and NAWALT, none.

Though Western women seldom fantasize about the suburban white picket fence life with black men, a good number of them do fantasize about short-term trysts. That makes some of them just about as easy to game as single mothers. Especially if they indicate they're looking to "broaden their horizons."

Another advantage to not being considered for long term partnership means…

Very Little Wasted Time

Because I know I'm not often thought of as LTR material I've resigned myself to the fact my race makes me little more than a mere novelty. My sexual market value is of the "exotic" variety more often than not. This means that some women definitely want to give men like me a try (at least once), some do not, and some are curious as is the case with all novelties.

Advantage: Very little wasted time. When I approach girls, day or night, they usually make it clear very quickly whether or not they're interested. If they are, they start shooting off rapid fire IOIs and shamelessly flirt away. If they're not they don't much waste much time leading me on. They shut me down on the spot. I've consistently witnessed this firsthand with my buddies (we always have a good laugh with each other if one of us gets blown out in front of the crew) and throughout my daily life.

Disadvantage: A lot of rejection. Most (I'd put the number at two out of three) high-SMV chicks just aren't into black guys. That's just how it is. So having a taste for high-quality girls can cause a temporary slip in standards when going through a dry streak. I'm as guilty as anyone out there for occasionally bottom-feeding during a slump.

The silver lining to this disadvantage is that it destroys approach anxiety pretty damn quick. Less wasted time means more approaches over the course of any given day, but that also means more swings and misses. I've been turned down by a shitload of women over the years, especially in the fledgling stages of learning game. But getting rejected by a high number of women early in my development decreased my learning curve which eliminated my ego and made me completely fearless.

Takeaway

One of my best friends is a white guy I've known for nearly 20 years. He's a tall, great looking guy with a great job. Every Anglo-slut's dream. When we go out for a night on the town he consistently pulls quality chicks much easier than I do, even though my game level is much higher than his. He's got a little game, but he naturally attracts women to him so he hasn't really had to hone his skills in the art of seduction. I always have to work a little bit harder to pull than he does, which is perfectly okay because I now have a deeper understanding of how the game works.

Acknowledgement and acceptance of your abilities and limitations are paramount for survival in every aspect of life, regardless of your race. Men of all races in the west have a unique set of strengths and weaknesses that apply to game. Understanding them will help a man come to terms with a lot of lingering questions about why things happen the way they do, good or bad, when dealing with women.

This article is a telling look on how Asian men are perceived in the west. I'd be very interested to see an article like this one from our Latino, Indian, Pacific Islander, and foreign-born brothers.

Read Next: How To Approach Black Women As A White Male

Donovan Sharpe

Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Feminists Campaign To Remove The “Man” From Our Language

November 25, 2014 | by Rollo Tomassi | Link | Original Link

Last week Elon University banned the use of the word “Freshmen” from its website and student orientation citing that the word was “sexist” and suggests that the young women might make good rape victims.

> The term has often been felt to refer to the vulnerableness of young women in college for the first time. 'Given the rates of sexual violence perpetrated against women on college campuses, it is useful to examine any use of a term that suggests that a group of people just entering college might be targets for such violence in any way'

Roosh had a passing tweet of this development and it reminded me of another "gender neutral" language purge from last year. In August of 2013 Washington state Governor Jay Inslee signed off on the final installment of a six-year effort to make language in the state's copious laws gender-neutral. The sponsor of the bill, Senator Jeannie Kohl-Welles's (hyphenated surname noted) reasoning for initiating the six-year endeavor was,

> It brings us to modern times, to contemporary times, why should we have in statute anything that could be viewed as biased or stereotypical or reflecting any discrimination?

Thus, words such as freshmen, fireman, fisherman and even penmanship are neutralized to "first year student," "fireperson," "fisher" and "writing skill." Perhaps the easiest way to grasp the process the committee used in their six-year effort is to presume that any noun or verb with the successive letters of "m-a-n" in its syntax was replaced with "person" or a substitution for a term that excluded the offending "m-a-n" letters.

This hasn't been the only effort to geld the English language under the guise of a want for avoiding legal repercussions. The University of North Carolina has initiated a similar effort in their school's by-laws. Kent Law, Marquette, and virtually every state college in the union, while not mandating the "manless" language, has made efforts to encourage linguistic androgyny.

The Washington state initiative is really just the next predictable progression in this gelding, but it clearly shows that the Feminine Imperative, in its unconsolable insecurity, would re-engineer the very language society uses in order to feel more secure. In order to fully appreciate the scope of the Feminine Imperative and the lengths to which it will go to assuage the need for feminine-security, a red pill man has to recognize the importance language represents to the human race as well as the removal of male, not masculine, influence from that language.

In all Latin-based languages there are gender associations with definitive articles. Nouns (and many adjectives) are specifically feminine or masculine as part of their intrinsic qualities. In Spanish "La Casa," the home, is a feminine association. "El Toro," the bull, is a masculine association. Anyone with even a rudimentary grasp of a Latin-based language understands that millennia ago the Latin culture found gender differentiation so important that it attached gender associations to the words, written and spoken, that represented the ideas and articles each word meant.

This might seem like a remedial review of language and society, but it's important to understand what it is the Feminine Imperative hopes to undo, and the magnitude of its insecurities. They wish to alter the very foundations of human communication, language, by eliminating masculine associations with any article or quality. The Feminine Imperative, that is dependent upon men being Men when convenient, simultaneously makes herculean efforts to remove men from its idealized environment and society.

Be a Man

There used to be a time when some cultures had a rite of passage into manhood or a passing into adult responsibility and masculine respect. In Latin cultures a young woman becomes a woman on here quinceñera – her fifteenth birthday. Jewish boys have a Bar Mitzvah, certain Native American tribes had similar traditions, etc. I think that if there's a modern social complaint about men remaining perpetually juvenile this is the root of it – we don't respect Manhood enough to define what's expected and when that adult, masculine respect is due.

A lot has been written on this blog and many others about the ceaseless efforts of feminists and SJWs to marginalize and ridicule anything masculine. It's easy to find consistent examples of this in the past 50 years of popular media, movies, TV sitcoms, music, etc. While masculinity is ridiculed, there's more to it than this—the same masculine attributes and qualities that make women "strong" are those make men strong. The difference is in the application – it wasn't enough to implant the seeds of masculine self-doubt into men, the Feminine Imperative had to make men, not necessarily masculinity, the problem to be solved.

In all of the examples of masculine gender reversal in popular culture, men are the unique problem, to which only women have the resources, wisdom and intuition to correct. The men of today are characterized as the Lucy Ricardos of the 50's, requiring women's guidance to avoid, often mutually destructive, disasters. However, the key to solving those problems, characterized as uniquely male, still require masculine-associated, mindsets, skills and applications.

Guys vs. Men

I was participating in a conversation just recently with a young woman of 26 and a young man of 18. The conversation itself wasn't important, but at one point the young man referred to himself as a "Man." He said something to the effect of, "Well I'm a man, and men do…" At the word "man," she cut him off with the unconscious snigger that's resulted from years of feminist ridicule conditioning. Just the mention of a man self-referencing as a "man" is enough to inspire feminine ridicule. It's laughable for a man to consider himself a man.

In the face of a constant conditioned ridicule, it's almost an uncomfortable recognition to distinguish yourself as a Man. It's too easy to just think of yourself as a "guy" and never be so presumptuous as to insist upon your manhood. In girl-world, to claim to be a Man is to admit to arrogance – it's to embrace a flawed nature. It's important to note here that in embracing your status as a Man, instead of "just a guy," you are passing a meta-shit test. By embracing self-referenced manhood, you are rejecting what a world aligned against you would like you to believe about yourself.

Remove the Man

As I addressed earlier, the Feminine Imperative perceives your Manhood as a threat. By endorsing yourself as a Man, on some level, whether you're cognizant of it or not, you're indicating that you have an inkling of your own personal value. You're expressing a self-awareness that is both attractive and terrorizing for women, but due to the constant influence of feminine primacy you're perceived as arrogant, self-serving, and prideful. Even in the most innocuous context, insisting upon your status as a Man is inherently sexist to a world defined by the Feminine Imperative.

But the imperative needs masculinity. To insure its (temporary) satisfaction of security a masculine element is required. Strength, confidence, determination, a capacity for risk taking, dominance and the comfort that women naturally derive from those masculine attributes are necessities of a healthy, secure, existence for women and the feminine.

However, brutish, ridiculous, and stupid men can't be trusted to universally provide this masculine security that every woman deserves irrespective of attractiveness or merit according to the Feminine Imperative. So Men must be removed from masculinity. Domineering women, as a default status in heterosexual relationships, pushes masculinity into her domain. Dominant masculine partners in sexually fluid relationships are similarly, unironically, re-characterized.

These are the easy examples. Volumes have been written in the manopshere about how feminine-primary government assumes the masculine providership role in modern relationships, thus freeing an already unhindered hypergamy even more so, but the effort to remove the Man goes far beyond this obvious institution. The fundamental restructuring of gender reference in our very language – as illustrated by the Washington state legislature – attempts to, literally, remove the Man from the equation.

Masculine Security

I can remember an instance at a former workplace where some coworkers were organizing a team to run in a Breast Cancer awareness walk. At one point a particularly mangina coworker suggested we all wear the prerequisite pink color at the event. Needless to say I arrived in a black t-shirt amongst a sea of pink. The predictable accusation of my sexual security came up: "What, aren't you secure enough in your manhood to wear pink?…herp..derp!" to which I answered "I'm secure enough in my Manhood not to wear pink."

What the mangina was obliviously parroting back is the same social tool that's been used by the Feminine Imperative for the past 60 years; inspire self-doubt in male-specific masculinity. By making compliance with the Feminine Imperative a qualification of masculinity, men assign the power to define masculinity to the very movement that seeks to destroy it.

This power of defining the masculine isn't limited just to snarky, subconscious referencing; it's simply one aspect of a greater effort to remove men from masculinity. While the efforts of certain women bloggers and psychologists (both within and out of the manosphere) to build better betas seems ennobling to white knights, the unifying purpose behind their efforts is really one of portioning or rationing masculine authority to men to satisfy only their immediate needs for those masculine aspects. Be alpha as needed, but more often be beta to allow for fem-masculine dominance and primacy.

I've explained this previously as the Male Catch 22, but it's important to understand that this catch isn't some unfortunate byproduct of male inheritance; it's a careful, calculated feminine social dynamic with the latent purpose of making men accountable for masculine responsibilities while simultaneously making them shamed and guilty of "male privilege" when that masculinity conflicts with the dictates of the Feminine Imperative. That's the crux of the dynamic, but the mechanics of it are still rooted in specifically male masculine self-doubt.

For the Feminine Imperative to sustain itself men can never be trusted with masculinity. Here's the solution: remove men from being the definers of masculinity and apportion them faux authority only when it would benefit the Feminine Imperative.

Read More: The Limits Of American Feminism

Rollo Tomassi
Rollo has spent the past 12 years as a contributor and moderator at SoSuave.net, is the author of 'The Rational Male' and the proprietor of The Rational Male blog.

Take Back The Sidewalk And Stop Street Harassment With These Simple Dos And Don’ts

November 25, 2014 | by Alphonse Hay | Link | Original Link

Though the Islamic State is waging war in the Middle East and the Ebola crisis is raging in West Africa, it’s clear that the biggest threat to affluent white women in America is Street Harassment™. White women with money and good jobs have been subjected to countless low-status men saying things like “hi” or “have a nice day.”

Street Harassment™ is the most important issue of our time because anything that affects middle and upper class white women is a national concern. We at ROK want to put a stop this rampant violation of women’s rights. I’ve outlined a few simple DOs and DON’Ts (for both men and women) that will help to keep our streets safe for everyone.

DON’T be poor

Men, if you are going to speak to a white woman of means, it is critical that you not be poor or a minority. There is nothing that makes a white woman’s skin crawl more than being talked at by a man she feels is beneath her station. This is for several reasons: first – you are wasting her time (remember, you don’t have a chance with her, so you’re just an annoying distraction from her smartphone.) Second – being hollered at by low status men is an acute reminder of all of the HIGH STATUS men who ignore her.

What you see as a compliment is actually a painful reminder that she only gets attention from “losers.” This will stir a range of emotions in her: she begins to pulsate with bitterness and envy towards women who attract powerful men. She will hate you for bringing out this superficial side of her, because deep down she fancies herself the supreme arbiter of tolerance and social justice. Even though she make s 2 or 3 times your salary and enjoys a higher standard of living than you do, you are an oppressor because making a white woman feel even slight discomfort is unacceptable.

DO be rich

Men, if you would like to talk to white women on the street, simply be rich (and preferably white). If you are a construction worker, consider instead a career in finance. If you are currently unemployed, consider inheriting lots of money and investing in real estate. If actually becoming rich is too much effort, you can do things to project higher status like wearing a suit and an expensive watch. Or driving a sports car. Get creative: if you are a poor Hispanic restaurant worker, practice your Italian accent and pretend to be a famous Italian chef who’s in New York to open a new vegan cronut shop.

DON’T have a phat ass

Ladies, we all know that nothing grabs the attention of minority men (especially black men) as the sight of a well-apportioned, juicy booty. If you want to avoid stares or comments from these men, consider trying ways to flatten your posterior, or at least wear clothing that makes your butt look smaller.

DO stay in lower Manhattan

Ladies, if you would like to avoid being talked at by pesky minorities, we recommend that you not walk on streets outside of lower Manhattan (and perhaps the upper west side in a pinch). This may seem restricting, but when you think about it, lower Manhattan has everything you could possibly need: lattes, Apple stores, and bottomless brunch spots. By staying in lower Manhattan, you are also more likely to run into that investment banker you've been dreaming of.

DO be more attractive

Ladies, this may seem counter-intuitive at first (how would becoming more attractive prevent cat-calls?) Allow me to explain. We can all agree that the woman in "Hollaback" viral video is truly nothing to write home about in terms of her looks. Would she be catcalled in a city like Moscow that's teeming with super-model quality women? Doubtful. She'd barely get a second glance.

So it stands to reason that if all American women collectively raise their level of attractiveness, fewer women will stand out and men will be able to take more of a relaxed attitude toward female beauty. When you have a sea of unattractive, unfeminine, undesirable women this creates extreme thirst in men and even a slightly-above-average girl is bound to get inordinate attention.

If all women suddenly made themselves more attractive by doing things like losing weight, avoiding trashy tattoos, being more feminine, and putting a little effort into their appearance, male thirst would go down. So ladies, do your part. Remember: we are all in this together.

Read More: Street Harassment Is A Myth Invented By Socially Retarded White Women

Alphonse Hay
Alphonse is a man of letters who has traveled the world. He has enjoyed many fine whiskies in the company of many fine women.

Why You Must Always Ask “What’s In It For Me?”

November 25, 2014 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

The manosphere is loaded with abbreviations that fly over the heads of common folk. “NAWALT” (Not All Women Are Like That), “MGTOW” (Men Going Their Own Way), “AFC” (Average Frustrated Chump), and “SMV” (Sexual Market Value) are some of the most common examples.

However, few are familiar with “WIIFM” or “What’s In It For Me?” In the form of a rhetorical question, it’s the concept of taking charge of your desires and goals by aggressively following the best incentives to achieve those goals. You must do this while not being taken advantage of or pushed around by a third party.

Understanding Incentives

The key word to understanding WIIFM is incentives, which are simply the things that motivate or encourage someone to do something.

For a visual explanation, here is an example from the film adaptation of Freakonomics. In the opening segment, the authors Steven Levitt and Stephen Dubner discuss how incentives influence human behavior by asking the question: Does your real estate agent really have your best interest in mind?

In other words, it can also be interpreted as a “What’s In It For Me?” kind of scenario. Both parties are trying their hardest to look after their own best interests, without getting shafted for a perceived loss of time, money, or both.

Making Incentives Gender Specific

What is your incentive to communicate with many of the other men you encounter every day? There could be plenty of things. Good companionship, common interests, just a friend you haven’t met yet, or for business contacts or other financial association.

But what about women? You should especially treat every interaction with women as if you have a good incentive to do so. And since the sex drive, or sexual instinct, is one of the most common and powerful incentives that men possess, we will build almost exclusively upon this when interacting with the opposite sex.

Why? Because the formula is pretty straightforward, my friends. Outside of the realms of work and family, most women simply don't have much to offer men other than sexual satisfaction. For instance, if you are ever presented the opportunity to exchange Facebook contacts with an attractive woman, do the "What's in it for me?" shtick and ask your self the following hypothetical questions (Just an example).

- Am I fucking this woman?
- HAVE I fucked this woman?
- Is there genuine potential to fuck this woman in the near future?
- Will this woman at least introduce me to a social circle in the near future with women I can potentially fuck?
- Will this women lead to a job opportunity or good professional references? (highly unlikely)
- Is this woman just a genuinely cool chick who isn't a smartphone zombie, and is somebody I can have an enjoyable and intellectual conversation with? (more common in the past, but now an endangered species)

At least one match from any of those bullet points will be a good incentive to click "yes." If the woman you have interacted with does not display ANY of those features, then there is frankly little incentive for you, as a male, to add her as a digital "friend."

Rationally Explain Your Lack Of Incentive

You personally have nothing to gain out of having your newsfeed bombarded with photos of her cats, what she's having for dinner, whatever pathetic mood swings she's going through, and then of course the inevitable photos of her with some other guy who she's now obviously shagging.

After all, you wanted to be that guy, but you were friend-zoned. She didn't have a receptive social circle, where there might have been some girls who actually were DTF. She didn't use her own powers of persuasion or business contacts to get you out of your dead-end Starbucks coffee job. She couldn't go three minutes without switching all attention from you to her smartphone.

Was that the kind of long-term contact you wanted? What is she going to add to your life? What is she going to continue to take from yours? What's In It For You?

You Are The Alpha – Take Control

In closing, make a good personal incentive out of all your future interactions and communications with women. Don't be motivated to partake in beta behavior like being her shoulder-to-cry-on-guy, or the "nice guy" who will routinely go out of the way to cater for her every whim, all while getting no rewards in return. Don't be a pushover like Milhouse, who will come up with a pathetic excuse to do anything that little feminazi Lisa Simpson asks him to do.

Poor Milhouse. The pill he swallows is as blue as his hair…

Final Statements

Never do favors for women without reciprocation period. After all, like one of the core philosophies of ROK, we know what women ultimately want from us. Our resources. That is absolutely fine and we just accept that as part of female nature (though we still reserve the right to decry it). However, you should always look after your core masculine nature, and follow the incentives which aim to gratify that nature.

Part of your core nature as a masculine man is to desire at least some element of money, power, and respect. The women will inevitably follow when you have a suitable amount of all three, which only come after aligning your behavior with your incentives.

Read Next: Women Don't Owe You Anything

John Carver

John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

Why The Media Uses The Death Of Michael Brown To Promote Racial Division

November 26, 2014 | by The Archangel Michael | Link | Original Link

According to the FBI, in 2010 a total of 6470 black Americans were murdered. In 2011, the number was 6329. In 2012, it was 6454. A total of 19,253 black Americans were murdered over this three year time span; a truly horrific number.

There is no reason to think that the annual butcher's tally for black Americans in 2013 or 2014 will be materially less; it may be higher.

The FBI keeps track not only of those who are killed, but also who the killers are. Of course, not all crimes are solved, so the race of the killer is not always known. However, from 2010 through 2012, in cases where the race is known, 90.76% of the killers of black Americans were black.

Less than 10% of the killers were of a different race.

Logically, if it was the desire of the editors and producers determining which stories are covered in the American media to shine the light of truth on the neverending carnage in the black community, then nine out of ten stories would focus on the perpetrators of that carnage. Makes sense, right?

Well, not if you are one of our cultural Marxist media overlords. According to these self-proclaimed paragons of truth and justice, the most important issue facing the black community in 2014 is the shooting death of one strong-armed robber, Michael Brown of Ferguson, Missouri.

The Three Whoppers

The falsehoods spewed about the Brown case by the cultural Marxists in the media and their political fellow travelers are too numerous to list in full. However, it is important to mention three of the biggest whoppers to get a taste of the lie fest that Americans have been subjected to:

Lie #1: Michael Brown was shot by the police for walking down the street and is therefore completely blameless in the events leading to his death.

This is a nice fairy tale. Unfortunately, for those who have been telling it, it has little basis in reality. The facts show that less than fifteen minutes before his death Brown committed a robbery of a local store just blocks away from where he was shot. His robbery is on video and therefore cannot be disputed. The policeman was aware of the robbery and suspected Brown's involvement before he attempted to exit his clearly marked police vehicle.

More importantly, Michael Brown knew he had just robbed a store. Given that fact, he had two options. Cooperate with the policeman and go to jail; or violently resist arrest. It is pretty obvious which choice he made.

Lie #2: Michael Brown was shot in the back.

For weeks the media coverage repeatedly stated that Brown was shot in the back. This was reported so often as a "fact" in the televised news coverage that one has to wonder whether the producers were willfully resurrecting the old American western film trope where the innocent man (played improbably by Brown) is gunned down in the back by the nefarious villain (played by the cop).

Of course, all good westerns and media fabrications must eventually come to an end. When the autopsy report was released it was learned that none of Brown's wounds were in the back; not one. All the media reports and commentary to the contrary had no basis in fact. Predictably, the media's enthusiasm for reporting the autopsy results was a fraction of their prior false repetitious claims that Brown was shot in the back.

Lie #3: Michael Brown's character was "assassinated " when the police released a video showing him committing a strong-arm robbery.

Videos are objective pieces of evidence. They show what they show. No more, and no less. This particular video shows that less than fifteen minutes before he was killed, Brown robbed a store and assaulted a store clerk.

All this occurred at a neighborhood store where Brown likely had been dozens of times in the past and where the security cameras were in plain view. His actions at the store are an indication of Brown's rationality and judgment on that day; or lack thereof. The store clerk called the police after Brown and his accomplice fled on foot.

At the same time that Michael Brown was pulling off his last heist, the policeman was on a neighborhood call with EMS personnel to help a baby that was having trouble breathing. If Brown had been helping a baby gasping for air fifteen minutes prior to being shot do you think that there would have been whining in the media that a great injustice had been committed by the distribution of such a video?

The question answers itself. Instead, the media would have used such a video to demonstrate to the world what a great humanitarian Brown was. No doubt there would be insistent demands from CNN that the Pope start the beatification process for Brown immediately.

The chorus of objections in the media outlets to the release of the robbery video was solely because it shows that less than fifteen minutes before Brown was shot he was stealing, and when caught, assaulted the clerk. This completely undercut the false media narrative the Brown was a "good boy" who played no role in his own demise other than that of passive victim. Instead of a model citizen, he was shown to be a thug and a thief.

As a famous preacher would have said, Michael Brown was demonstrating the "content of his character."

Why They Lie

To understand most of the media coverage of Michael Brown's death, one must revisit an old word that has fallen out of common usage. That word is "agitprop." According to the editors of The Encyclopedia Britannica, agitprop (agitation propaganda) is a:

> ...political strategy in which the techniques of agitation and propaganda are used to influence and mobilize public opinion. Although the strategy is common, both the label and obsession with it were specific to Marxism practiced by communists in the Soviet Union.

The word agitprop explains the veracity free basis of most of the media coverage Americans have endured of this event. The underlying purpose of the media's coverage in Michael Brown's case is to foster a climate of racial division and hate so that the need for political "change" can be sold to the American public. This is the the cultural Marxist media's raison d'être; their "purpose for being."

Despite what you may have been told in Journalism 101, the truth is wholly beside the point from most of the media's perspective. Their sole concern is to push forward a version of events that serves their "social justice" agenda while making money. Not uncommonly, this version and reality are polar opposites.

The actual truth of why Michael Brown was shot and whether the policeman has any culpability in the matter is completely meaningless to them. The entire story for them is merely a means to advance their agenda of "change," which is the most profitable stance possible.

The Federal Cavalry Arrives

The controlling political class is marching in lock step with the media in using this event to foster racial animus to drive social change. This is why it was no great surprise that when Attorney General Eric Holder arrived in Missouri one of the first things he was quoted as saying was “change is coming.”

Consider what an odd comment that is for the chief law enforcement officer of the nation to make about an investigation that had barely begun, much less been completed. It almost seems like the fix is in, doesn’t it?

Will The Media Improve?

Given the false nature of most of their early reporting of the events of Brown’s death, can we at least expect the “social justice” media to trim their sails on the Brown story going forward and reset a course for the lighthouse of truth? If only to preserve for a little bit longer the few remaining tatters of credibility their journalistic sails have left with thinking Americans?

Not likely.

There is no doubt they will double down on their agitprop lies because that is what they do. After all, we have the George Zimmerman fiasco as a sonar gauge for the depths these folks will sink to when peddling racial division. By telling the nation repeatedly that Zimmerman was a “white man” after his photograph had been broadcast nationwide, they demonstrated that they are capable of saying anything to promote their cultural Marxist agenda. Truth just simply does not matter with them.

The Red Pill Response: A New Approach

So what approach should red pill men adopt going forward?

Over multiple decades, American men have made a grave error which has endangered the civilization and republic built up by the arduous toil, sacrifice, and struggle of our people since Plymouth Rock.

That error was the belief that compromising with the unreasonable would promote reason; that compromising with the loud would promote peace; that compromising with the angry would promote calm; that compromising with the stupid would promote intelligence; that compromising with the malevolent would promote virtue; that compromising with the innately dishonest would promote candor; and that compromising with evil would promote the common good.

And where has this emasculating policy of unending compromise led us? It has led us exactly where those who promoted it always intended, at the edge of a societal abyss with their hands, as well as those of their useful idiots, reaching for our back.

Shall we continue down this destructive road of ceaseless compromise with those who are insidiously and relentlessly destroying our civilization? Or shall we end this dark destructive era of false compromise by defiantly turning and facing the rabble behind us and saying, “No more.”

The choice is yours. But remember, whether you turn or not, the abyss remains, as does the rabble behind you.

Don’t Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter (And Facebook)

The Archangel Michael

The Archangel Michael is a Warrior Prince. His mission is to defend the righteous keepers of the flame of Western Civilization and to defeat the evil forces who seek to subvert and destroy it. In a world cast down into darkness and despair, he will shine the light of truth and show the way to victory. Before him, the forces of darkness gave no quarter. After him, they will receive none.

Why Completion Is Better Than Sex

November 26, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

There is nothing greater than the feeling of completion – of having worked on a demanding project that is important to you for a long period, and then bringing it to a successful conclusion.

David Deida, in classic book The Way of the Superior Man, writes famously that for a man to be whole he should have a mission other than women – something he is passionate about from the core of his soul to dedicate his life to.

In my experience this is true. For me, the passion happens to be writing. For another man it might be sports, or art or carpentry – anything, so long as it requires focus and exertion. Ideally, whatever you choose should be something that you are inextricably drawn to, and it should involve you making something to put out into the world – whether that be a book, a video or a great golf swing.

Too many people are passive consumers, and no wonder: there's a whole world of content out there to be read, watched, listened to, downloaded. There is too much information and it turns us into mindless consumers. A real man is a man who produces something, who gives to the world rather than merely receives. And the great thing is, it is through this act of giving that we are happiest.

But one difficulty is that, having taken on your project, you may find yourself floundering halfway through, intimidated by the enormity of it and unable to carry on. How much easier it would be simply to give up. To go back to playing Call of Duty or watching football instead.

Here's a tip – don't. Just don't. The secret to completion is consistency of effort. The secret to consistency of effort is breaking every task down to its minimum components, and executing these on a daily basis.

Don't think about the end goal – just think about what you need to do today, and do it to the best of your ability. If you're tired and you can only manage half an hour's writing then just do half an hour – it's better than nothing, and it means you're exercising the muscles necessary to get to the end of the task. Days add up to months, months add up to years, and before you know it your project is done, and you will feel a sense of satisfaction deeper than from anything else.

Seek progress, not perfection, every day. Break everything down into manageable chunks, do whatever you can in the given time you have and don't be hard on yourself – you can always polish later. In time, you will have successfully completed your project: and when that happens you'll realize that completion really is better than sex.

Want to learn more about how to apply these principles in your love life? Then click here

Read More: You Will Always Face Criticism

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

College Showed Me The Cultish Nature Of Feminized Christianity

November 26, 2014 | by Vincent Law | Link | Original Link

Coming to college, upon the recommendation of a blue-pilled beta friend, I joined an organization called Chi Alpha. They were the real deal: crying and shaking, guitar-strumming, tambourine-banging, born again evangelists. But being an immigrant, and clueless to boot, I had no idea what kind of craziness to expect. Full disclosure, in my beta boy angst, I was easily seduced by the easy smiles and talk of community, acceptance, and Christian life. I even went on a retreat with the group where I saw feminized Christianity at its best. Luckily I made it out unscathed, with a tale or two for you, dear readers.

I'll never forget the time that a middle-aged (read: post-wall) speaker came to talk to us on special invitation. She lamented how God had not yet sent her a man and described how hard she had worked at her career and how she had a few men that walked out on her earlier in her life, leading her to take a break from dating. She claimed that she found God at this time, leading her to only pursue men in a Christian manner, which I assume meant not frequenting the same dive bars.

Either way, this new "Christian approach" to dating didn't seem to pan out, because the subject of her talk was all about God not giving her a man and how it must just not be her time. The trials that this poor spinster faced elicited comparisons with Job and Rachel from the Old Testament. I remember how her voice trembled, and I couldn't help feeling how awful those men were for dumping her while she was trying to pursue a Christian lifestyle.

She even talked about the debt that she had accumulated from going to graduate school in her early 30s, and how she hoped that God would help her find a way to pay off her debt. I wonder how much the first goal and the second goal were related in her mind. As always, the “hook up culture” was decried and the disrespect for women by males at the university was constantly a subject of pontification. Naturally, the true causes of the hook-up culture were never addressed, the broken nature of the old dating model never mentioned, and slutty behavior by women never called to account. But hey, what do you expect from gynocentric feminized Christianity?

The girls all shed thick, heavy tears and nodded emphatically about how hard it was to find a good Christian boy to fall in love with. Needless to say, there were Christian boys all around them, only none of them seemed capable of igniting a fire in their loins. I wonder why. I’ll venture to say selection bias had something to do with it.

Whiny femme-boys with no applied charisma skill (game) trying to justify their involuntary celibacy as part of a wholesome Christian lifestyle don’t make college girls swoon. But rather than confronting their sexual marketplace value and working to improve their game, their character, and hell, maybe even working out a bit, they instead found religion as a balm for their broken hearts. Here’s the pitch:

> Pastor: Do you feel out of place and rejected by girls?
>
> College boy: Boy, do I!
>
> Pastor: Never get invited to parties?
>
> College boy: Not really…
>
> Pastor: Come join our ~~cult~~ club and Jesus will take all the pain away.
>
> College boy: Maybe I’ll get a cute Christian girlfriend if I’m good and God rewards me!

I only saw one match-up occur between two Chi Alpha members: a reformed slut and a football player. Full disclaimer, the girl was a 3 or a 4 on a good day, and on the big retreat to Virginia beach, broke down during discussion time and sobbed out a story about how she had lots of pre-marital sex with her boyfriend and felt abused because of it.

Now a black football player, at any university, is a prime catch for any girl, and this guy wasn’t bad looking at all. His big problem though: he was too nice and had no game. Naturally he tried with several girls when he came to college, and flamed out spectacularly several times, leading him to join Chi Alpha as the savior intended. After being “set up” with this damaged goods “Christian,” the football player became the toast of the club, a shining example of what every good Christian ought to do. The fact that this 3/10 had had more sex with more partners in her short 19 years of life than he ever would probably in his entire life never seemed to bother him.

How noble of all of these angsty betas to renounce their involuntary celibacy for a voluntary one—the sacrifice must have been immense. Here is my main point about these religious groups: they are INCREDIBLY damaging to young men because, like youth groups of the past, it puts a skewed moral burden on many young men and actively prevents them from developing their skills with women.

The sexual marketplace has changed, and all those beta traits that church groups used to foster in their young men are totally useless. You know that hottie sitting next to you in the pew? Chances are she's banging some random dude she met at the university pub on Saturday and sitting there talking to you about "Christian values" on Sunday (true story). Why? Because its alpha or die, dear readers.

And as long as she continues mouthing platitudes and shedding tears during the group sing along, no one will know. Even if she should choose to confess her sins or something, I guarantee you that she would be forgiven. Evangelicals are predominantly female. Evangelicals love reformed sluts. Jesus has been re-branded as the perfect white knight poster boy for the feminized Christianity cult that I see in America. Try pulling that shit as a guy who got drunk and had a one night stand, you'd be standing before an honor council by the end of the day.

According to Chi Alpha and evangelical groups like it aimed almost exclusively at youth, one would think that Christ came down from heaven for one reason and one reason only: to prevent underage drinking and pre-marital sex. In a nutshell, this was the point of the group. Any group that takes awkward betas and reinforces their tendencies to the point of associating religious holiness with social awkwardness deserves to be purged. There are enough conflicting messages from Hollywood, clueless parents, left-wing school administrators without so called religious "conservatives" jumping on the bandwagon and skewering men as well.

Where was the tradition? The whole, "women be loyal and submissive to your husbands," "don't whore around in your 20s and expect a husband when you're overweight, pushing 40 and drowning in student debt" stuff? It wasn't progressive enough I guess. Our university's brand of evangelicalism even avoided condemning gays the same way their southern brethren would. I asked several times about the church's position on the homosexual lifestyle, and got no replies, probably because we had many homosexuals in the congregation. Pretty conservative, amirite?

There was nothing truly Christian about the experience. The movement felt like it had been spawned in the early 90s and that Jesus had died as early as the 9/11 attacks with only a tenuous connection at best to the actual crucifixion and the story of the early church. Long story short, it wasn't for me, and I decided I needed a church based in tradition and not drowning in progressive platitudes, and based on the "make it up as you go along" attitude of the Protestant tradition.

A short epilogue:

After I overcame my weird, guilty, religious phase, stopped showing up (I only went for about 3 months), and read up on some game material, I turned right around and banged a couple of those religious girls. Praise be to God.

Read More: Letter To My College Freshman Self

Vincent Law
Vincent is just another immigrant from Mosk who has been trying all his life to become a fellow citizen. Check out his blog at atavisticintelligentsia.us

Don’t Brush Off Your Failures

November 26, 2014 | by Netanderthal Man | Link | Original Link

One of the following has almost certainly happened to you at some point: you got rejected by a girl when things seemed to go well. Or a girl flaked on you. Or she blows you off, cheats on you, lies, or flirts with some other dude. You may have been quick to brush her actions under the rug, rationalizing that she’s a bitch, but are you willing to ask yourself if perhaps you might be doing something wrong too?

Many women will cheat on you if given the right circumstances, but it doesn’t exonerate you from your responsibility. She might do any of the above for an obvious reason: the presence of a guy who turns her on more than you. It means you’re losing demeanor and dominance over your domain. Unless she’s a psycho or the town’s designated orifice, when a woman’s attraction takes a nosedive it is, more often than not, your failure.

Don’t brush it off, don’t rationalize it by saying it’s not your fault. 9 out of 10 times when a woman is losing attraction for you it’s because you are not the dominant figure you used to be. So, you have to up your game. Keep your outcome-dependency under control, flush out your bad body language, and suppress negative thinking.

Also, don’t underestimate competition and don’t overestimate your game unless your confidence is built on a solid foundation. If you think you’re ultra confident but you’re not getting any tail, you’re doing it wrong. The only accurate unit of measurement for success with women is penis in vagina. Anything else is feather stroking your pasty ego.

You can never stop playing the game if you want to be a part of it. With emphasis on playing. Don’t take yourself too seriously, unless you’re warranted to do so. When she breaches your trust or crosses a line, it’s your duty to nuke the hell out of the woman or dump her if it’s called for. Respect is non-negotiable. If you don’t respect yourself, no one else will.

You are the mixed result of your experiences. Not the sum, at least not until you understand those experiences. And then your journey has just begun. You'll have to refine that gem and start polishing every facet of you. This will take a long time, the rest of your life to be exact.

Take a mental note on every slip-up, be honest with yourself about it and correct it. At the end of the day, you should better yourself for no one else but you. Most often than not, the main reason someone fails is because he's not trying hard enough. Betas are quick to blame others or external factors for their failures. Alphas see an opportunity to learn from failures. Here are a few things you may internalize if you see fit:

1. Don't take yourself too seriously.

2. Failure is an effective learning tool. If you can learn from other's mistakes, that's even better.

3. Follow your own set of rules, don't bend them for others.

4. Don't rationalize your mistakes to save your ego. Aim to become as ego-less as possible. A big ego is a sign of insecurity and vulnerability.

5. Educate yourself to keep emotional thinking to a minimum and become as outcome-independent as possible.

6. Assume responsibility for your actions.

You can be your own worst enemy or your own best friend. The choice is yours.

Read More: The Biggest Hindrance To Success With Women Is Ego

Netanderthal Man

Netanderthal Man saw the light of day somewhere in Eastern Europe. He enjoys life as creative director and owner of a design studio. He is a big fan of Occam's razor, Pink Floyd, Roald Dahl and wet tight pussy, is politically incorrect and his favourite dish is roasted unicorn with rainbow gravy.

SJWs' Latest Attempt To Silence Critics Backfires Gloriously

November 27, 2014 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

As we've seen countless times before, SJWs absolutely loathe criticism. They will go to any lengths to stifle criticism and silence not just who they perceive as the opposition, but also everyone who is neutral and simply asks questions and wants to find the facts. As David Pakman found out, there are no innocent bystanders.

The latest attempt to silence critics comes in the form of a Twitter blocklist. Because, if you can't deal with questions, you might as well just block everyone asking them. But, as SJWs are wont to do, the blocklist failed spectacularly, tagging one of their own in the process.

The developer of the blocklist is a certain Randi Harper, aka FreeBSDGirl:

That hair color gives me confidence in her coding skills

How the blocklist works

The blocklist was created using the Twitter API and the organization which promoted it was IGDA (International Game Developer's Association), a non-profit organization which is supposed to help obscure game developers get their fair chance and exposure, not get screwed by the big players, and so on. In essence, it is a union for game developers. IGDA hosted the blocklist on their “harassment resources” page.

The way the blocklist works is fairly simple—it marks certain people as shitlords and compiled a list of everyone who was following them as “harassers.” As you might imagine, the problem with this approach is that people whimsically follow each other on Twitter, most of the time without having a clue who the person is. There is nothing wrong with this, since arguably the entire purpose of Twitter is to get as many followers as humanly possible. Even big businesses tend to follow back everyone who followed them, because it costs nothing, yet increases their social influence.

The real victims

This instant connectivity makes Twitter great for small businesses and freelancers, who often have no resources to market themselves in the presence of established competitors. Those are also the real collateral victims of this incident. People who struggle to make a living could have their reputation destroyed since they were marked as “harassers” by a blocklist.

In other words, the blocklist caught some innocent bystanders. Actually, a lot of them. A portion of these blocked accounts have one or zero tweets and few or no followers at all. Most of them probably have no idea what GamerGate is or who Randi Harper is. Now for the fun part. Even the Puerto Rico director of the IGDA was found on the list:

SJWs can’t even do censorship right

So, do you think this will make SJWs re-examine their list and the way it was compiled? Of course not!

GOTO FAIL

After that, Roberto Rosario threatened resignation but he probably doesn't need employment at all. He is white and male, so the patriarchy will probably give him all the support he needs. IGDA removed the blocklist from its page—for now.

There is an appeals process for removal from the blocklist but, as is par for the course with SJWs, it simply means giving them more power. People who applied to be removed from the blocklist risk exposing their real name and email to the SJWs. This means a real danger of being tagged as a harasser or rapist in front of the employer, having a false police report filed, and so on.

Join the war

We are in the middle of a raging culture war. SJWs are intent on stamping out the fun from everything in their vicinity and replacing it with gender debate. You will either choose a side yourself or you will be forced into choosing one. It is us vs. them, in the truest sense of the expression.

Also, the blocklist itself is probably illegal and definitely violates the Twitter Terms of Service:

That section states that you won't use Twitter for research aimed at discriminating or isolating any individual or a group of people.

Like a phoenix

In a sense, SJWs were right. Gamers are dead, by which they meant the old stereotype of “basement dweller virgin neckbeard” is no longer there. Gaming has become a big industry and it is no longer shameful to admit you’re a gamer. It is actually a badge of honor. Now you can be proud to play games and actually be a part of a thriving games culture. Also, it’s possible to make a nice income from being a professional gamer.

While the gaming has gone mainstream and gained massive popularity with E-Sports, it has also picked up enemies who want to hijack it for their own purposes and control the narrative. This is exactly why GamerGate started. But, there is no need for fear, as the internet has removed the need for gaming press. In fact, the entire gaming industry will soon have to reorganize itself or become obsolete due to indie developers being able to bypass the traditional distribution channels.

Forged in the fire

It is my personal belief that, after GamerGate, video games will evolve to become a tool for raising a new generation of men. Our current education system fails horribly at providing real information on how the world works, what motivates people, and how to get laid. More importantly, it pussifies men and turns them into starry-eyed believers in the Disney variety of life and love. The entire concept of sitting quietly and reading is meant for girls. Boys need the fight, the challenge, competition, and a test of their strength.

Games were always learning tools. Now they can become a tool for learning greater masculinity. To become real men, boys must overcome challenges and find the true strength in themselves. Whether this is done in a virtual or real arena is irrelevant. By creating games that are consciously aimed at presenting a proper challenge, we can collectively make the world a better place for the next generation of men. And possibly help them get laid more.

Read More: This Arthur Chu Interview Shows How SJWs Play Professional Victims

Derek Baroni
Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

The Two Ways Girls Can Get Noticed On Online Dating

November 27, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Here at Return of Kings we realize that we have a lot of female readers. On rare occasions, we offer them our world-class advice, considering that the masculine and the feminine are innately linked together. You cannot raise or lower one without doing the same to the other. Therefore, it is in our best interest for you ladies to be the best you that you can be.

Many women complain about how hard it is to get men to notice them in online dating. Having been on these sites myself, I find that women usually vomit their thoughts onto paper and hope a guy "just loves me for who I am," as though the stars will bring them one by virtue of wanting one. But in the grown-up world, no one cares about you as an individual. All relationships are innately transactional, and you've got to bring something to the table beyond your charming personality (or lack thereof).

I've found that internet dating is like a thrift store: lots of junk that needs to be discarded, but once in a while you'll find something you love. Ladies, you do not get to decide what men find attractive in women any more than men get to decide what women find attractive in them. Men like two things in women: 1) pretty girls 2) who are pleasant to be around. You will need to present yourself as both.

Pretty Girls

All the make-up and hair-styling will not do you any good if you are overweight. Men are not interested in “big beautiful women” who are “curvy,” even if they only have “a few extra pounds.” If you only post a headshot, we can still tell. Don’t insult us.

If this describes you, make sure you write that you exercise five times a week. Lie if you need to, because at least then you won’t look lazy and gluttonous. But really, you can find thirty minutes a day in your lonely single life to hit the treadmill. If you are not overweight, write about exercising anyway and post a full body picture. Your full body picture should vary based on what you desire: if you want a cheap hook-up, then wear a bikini or the shortest shorts money can buy from Wal-Mart.

If you want a long term relationship, however, then wear a dress. It should be something conservative and slightly formal (i.e. don’t dress like a hippie). However, one mistake I often find with these girls is that they often don’t post a clear picture of their face. I can still tell they are probably attractive, but their inattention to detail has not been lost on me, and I make a mental note to condition it out later.

Grow your hair long, and don’t wear sweatpants in any of your photos. Use makeup, but don’t use so much that it is the only thing he will notice. The way you present yourself to the world says a lot about you as a person.

Who Are Pleasant To Be Around

I realize you were told to be what you want in someone else, but they were referring to virtues like honesty and selflessness, not personality traits. “im funny sarcastic and always have a great wit” is code for “obnoxious.” Very few women are actually funny, and men don’t expect that from them anyway. This is a classic example of women thinking men want what they themselves want. Even if a woman really can make a man laugh, it doesn’t help her much. Ladies, cut learning this trait out of your life, and certainly don’t fake it. On the off chance that you naturally have it, use it sparingly. No man wants to bang the class clown.

Mention that you like cooking. Again, feel free to lie. Take a night in your lonely single life and learn to make one dish really well. After two or three times, take a picture of yourself with it. Post it on your profile but not as your main picture, since the extra pictures are supposed to be the day-to-day real you. Now not only do you have something to contribute to parties and family reunions, but you have something to impress him with on the second date. Yes, it’s sexist and patriarchal, but you have a choice: You can either be an independent, liberated woman and queen of the cats, or you can attract men on internet dating.

Above all, do not be weird. When OKCupid says “6 Things I Could Never Live Without,” do not take that literally. You would be amazed at all the girls who write “chapstick.” This absolutely baffles me. Does chapstick have some special use off the label? Does it cure the common cold? Why are your lips constantly chapped? Are you just that neurotic and obsessive compulsive? It’s like all the women in the country got together in the bathroom and decided to pull a prank on the men.

Do not mention animals in your profile. There are a variety of theories for why this is, but it is a red flag to men when a woman loves animals. If you have four diabetic cats all named after the Beatles, save that for after you've been on a few dates. Even if your dog is the most important thing in your life, he won't be offended if you betray him by pretending he doesn't exist for a few weeks.

If you are a feminist, into women's lib, or a women's studies major, do not mention that until the fifth date after you've already cooked for him and generally shown you are not crazy. There's a strong stigma attached with those labels, and claiming them will make a man go running for more patriarchal girls. Even saying "I believe in equality for both sexes" usually translates into "men are pigs." Unfair maybe, but such is the world of marketing.

As a final note about writing your profile, people will judge you by your grammar. You will look stupid and lazy if you don't even capitalize the first word of a sentence. People will overlook not using "whom," but you cannot claim that you should be valued for your personality when you're not smarter than a fifth grader. Also, put a lot of detail in your profile. Don't write a dissertation, but don't merely write "if u want to know anything just ask :)."

Interacting

So you've placed your strategic advertisement and cast out lines. Now what? The woman in that article only picked ten men at a time. How entitled! You are on internet dating because you have failed in real life. You do not get to be picky. Cast out a line to every guy who might conceivably be what you are looking for. It does not hurt you to message back and forth with someone. For all you know, he might be as bad at crafting a profile as you were. And if you are divorced, an unwed mother, or past your 20s, then you need to greatly expand your upper age limit.

The days of courting are over. A guy will not spend a lot of money on the first date because he doesn't know if the investment will pay off. When he takes you out to Captain D's, dress nice anyway. Not prom nice or even church nice, but certainly better than you dress for school. Let your hair hang down and consider a dress. Basically, look like something he'd want to make love to, whether in the near future or not until after the wedding. It's concerning how women dress like men and then complain when men aren't attracted to them. Feminine females get masculine men.

Don't brag about your education or work accomplishments, because we aren't turned on by them. Seriously, we aren't, even if we ask you about them. Your leadership skills are irrelevant unless they involve small children. Even if a man says, "I want a confident career woman," he's only parroting that because he was told to. Remember, you do not get to choose what men find attractive in women. There's a golden moderation between being strong and being clingy, and it's skewed a bit closer to the clingy side.

Finally, do not play hard to get. Again, this is women thinking men like what women like. If you like a guy, be very easy to get. This does not mean be easy to bang but just to non-verbally communicate you want to be with him. If a guy thinks you are not interested, he will likely move on to the next girl. The world is full of pretty young girls, and he will take the path of least resistance.

Conclusion

Follow this advice, and you'll have actual success on internet dating. My goal in this article is not to convince you to give up your soft-feminist values but merely to consider how you market yourself. Presentation is key in any advertising, and the sexual economy works much the same as the financial economy. If you put effort into your physical appearance and try to have the persona a man would want to be around, then men will notice your femininity, even if unconsciously. A man does not go onto those sites to look for a dude to hang with. You will never be his bro. Be what men want, and you will finally feel wanted.

Read More: American Girls Have No Game

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Is Rolling Stone Sensationalizing The UVA Rape Story For Profit?

November 27, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

A journalist for Rolling Stone, Sabrina Erdley, recently wrote an article "Rape On Campus" that has spread yet another feminist outrage across the internet and has UVA and the Greek fraternities on the back foot.

Now I am not trying to argue that criminal acts and bad behavior do not take place in universities. In any institution, of course there can always be incidents and of course there might be better ways for institutions to deal with these cases. Naturally, the victim has rights and there should be systems in place to insure justice is served—fair enough.

The problem here is not about the case itself, but rather the way a publication and a journalist has gone on a social crusade:

1. A monstrosity of an article, some 9000 words long, with fair portions of it written in a glamorous and perverse style more suited to an erotic novel, than a factual account of a crime on a university campus.

2. The article could most certainly enable fellow students to identify not only the victim but the alleged perpetrators. This is perverting the course of justice and enabling all manner of repercussions against those involved without allowing a full investigation and legal guilt to be proved.

3. The article assumes that everything the victim says was fact, allows the writer to take enormous and unwarranted liberties in presenting a story in a style close to a Hollywood movie "based on fact," whilst acting as judge, jury and executioner.

> There was a heavy person on top of her, spreading open her thighs, and another person kneeling on her hair, hands pinning down her arms…
>
> Most of all, Jackie remembers the pain and the pounding that went on and on.
>
> As the last man sank onto her, Jackie was startled to recognize him: He attended her tiny anthropology discussion group. He looked like he was going to cry or puke as he told the crowd he couldn't get it up. "Pussy!" the other men jeered. "What, she's not hot enough for you?" Then they egged him on: "Don't you want to be a brother?" "We all had to do it, so you do, too." Someone handed her classmate a beer bottle. Jackie stared at the young man, silently begging him not to go through with it. And as he shoved the bottle into her, Jackie fell into a stupor, mentally untethering from the brutal tableau, her mind leaving behind the bleeding body under assault on the floor.

How could Jackie have known it was the last man? The journalist tries to create sensation, and speak as though she was an eye witness, or recounting a video feed of the incident. This is disgusting journalism.

4. Is an article of this nature really best suited to Rolling Stone, which was primarily a counter culture magazine that focused on music and social movements? Wikipedia states:

> Rolling Stone is a biweekly magazine that focuses on popular culture. It was founded in San Francisco in 1967 by Jann Wenner, who is still the magazine's editor-in-chief, and music critic Ralph J. Gleason. The magazine was known for its musical coverage and for political reporting by Hunter S. Thompson.

It's a shame to see another institution go down in a ball of flames as a bunch of feminist trolls move in and take control. Hunter S. Thompson, Sabrina Erdley most certainly is not!

5. Unless we make some noise and start firing back, it's likely we will not have a voice. Frankly, I couldn't care less about universities or what goes on there. I have no interest in attending one in any shape or form, other than perhaps looking purely for pussy… OMG, scratch that politically incorrect faux pas. This is how it goes down:

> First they came for the Socialists, and I did not speak out—
> Because I was not a Socialist.
>
> Then they came for the Trade Unionists, and I did not speak out—
> Because I was not a Trade Unionist.
>
> Then they came for the Jews, and I did not speak out—
> Because I was not a Jew.
>
> Then they came for me—and there was no one left to speak for me.
>
> - Martin Niemöller

6. I still remember the 70s and 80s, and to me it's shocking how far the world has fallen. The media is swarming with pathetic trolls, complaining about everything they can think of. Katy Perry, for example, net worth $130M, has no right to complain about paparazzi when she's made her living almost entirely from her tits and ass and happily flaunts them whenever necessary. This shot was taken the very next day—she can hire a $20,000-a-day yacht for privacy and can't resist showing off, but expects to go for a walk on a public beach in privacy. Go figure.

[image]

I don't have a personal stake in this issue, but I came across it on Google and was shocked by the state of people's minds. It's a fucking nursery school out there. Lord of the Flies is a heartbeat away from enveloping the entire western hemisphere. People are becoming more bigoted, entitled, and pathetic by the day.

So take two minutes of your time to browse the offending article and email Rolling Stone a complaint. The editor will take note. At least it's doing something instead of just hoping for the best. Let's be Rolling Stones—to hell with Rolling Stone.

Don't Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

What To Do When Your Friend Turns A Ho Into A Housewife

November 28, 2014 | by Panchito Cordero | Link | Original Link

Foreword

I am one of the many youngsters fortunate enough to stumble upon a website like ROK during a very formative time of my life. At twenty-four years of age, I would like to think that a few integral life experiences have helped me to swallow the red pill very early on in life. I have been on my path ever since, which consists of perfecting my craft as drummer, playing music, writing, focusing on my health, and ingesting as much knowledge as possible.

However it was not through my two tumultuous LTRs that the red pill theory was presented to me, but moreso from what I witnessed around me. Once puberty hit, my uncle passed onto me probably the best piece of residual knowledge a man could ever give. “A wise man learns from his mistakes, however a wiser man learns from another’s.” With that said, let us begin.

Once Upon A Time

College has never done much for me other than cater to my inherent disdain for the human condition. From watching the desperate attempts of effete beta men trying to garner attention from the opposite sex, to witnessing an environment liberal enough for women to seek comfort for the situations they willingly placed themselves into (obesity, toxic relationships, early parenthood), the entire institution never did much for me. Yet there are those few instances when you come across pretty knowledgeable folk and actually learn something.

In my case this came in the form of a summer psych class. Granted, I cannot remember the professor's name, but what made his approach to psychology interesting was integrating what he learned on the field as a marriage counselor into his lessons. One day while conducting a lesson it seemed as though he was gathering information for a study by asking a multitude of questions about my classmates' relationships.

After enough information was gathered he stated the following:

> Ladies and gentlemen, I think it is a beautiful thing that many of you have found love at such an early age. In fact love in itself is a very beautiful thing, but it is also important to take this into account. The minute you notice a change in your partner's behavior, such as longer nights out, delays in responses, followed by misplaced anger…save yourself the trouble and just ask 'who is it?' If they cannot comply, then fuck it and cut your losses.

Now as you can imagine, all of the once-vibrant ninnies gloating about their relationships were now sporting the same blank expression Bambi did when his mom was offed. Class was dismissed, but even if no one else got the message, I sure as hell did.

The present

I was nineteen when that summer class took place. I am twenty four now. The advice that professor gave me has served as the basic guideline for red flags in my dealings with women, along with the colorful cast of characters that I consider to be my acquaintances. Now keep in mind the quotation that I concluded my foreword with, let me introduce another one by the great Henry Rollins: "Knowledge without mileage equals bullshit."

Despite the naivety that may be associated with my age I have surely had my fair share of women. Furthermore, that professor's advice was essentially the grounds upon which I chose to end my final LTR. Given my commitment to bachelorhood, it is obvious not many males share the same vision as me. These plugged-in men are what my ex-detective for a father deems the "believers"—men who are unable to accept the blatant truths that are set before them. Now I am sure you have come across a few "believers" yourself.

How it Happens:

1. Friend meets romantic prospect.

2. Friend falls for said prospect.

3. You come across information that said prospect is a deviant whore (or you were smart enough to pick up on that all on your own).

So what do you do?

4. DO NOT GET INVOLVED!

Save your energy for focusing on your own path and endeavors. No matter how much of a hard pill this must be to swallow, you will be doing yourself the biggest favor in the long run. Chances are if your friend is that much of an idiot to invest so much time into a cum dumpster, he will not be willing to see the obvious truth beset in front of him.

Moreover, if the succubus has manipulated him this far into the game, she might use this opportunity to turn him against a lifeline like you. Perhaps he is so weak that he will take your attempt at showing him the light as a sign that you are trying to break them up. I have heard this scenario happen one too many times.

If YOU Are the Friend in the Situation

It is important to understand the difference between love and infatuation. Love is an ambiguous concept to me. Surely I have felt “connections” with women in the past, but these experiences can be correlated to proverbial callouses on my hand. My mother hit me with some notable red pill knowledge by once stating “If you find yourself making excuses for your partners’ actions, you need to take a step back and ask if this scenario is really working for you.” She also went on to say “Before you learn to live, love, and be with anybody; you need to learn how to live, love, and be with yourself.” Mother knows best, right?

Don’t let prior moments of happiness cloud your vision of what is currently happening before you. Never allow yourself to become one of those men who are complacent with toxic bullshit that can easily be avoided. Society has programmed the masses to think that if a woman cheats, she was neglected, she needed space, etc. It is up to YOU to decide whether or not sacrificing your well-being is worth the occasional fix of Y-chromosomes.

With That Said

Despite the advice exhibited in this article, there have been instances where some actually take what their friends say into consideration. A dear friend of mine hit me with a friendly reminder after both of us found ourselves out of our LTRs and enjoying a few brews. “We just need to accept the fact that the women we once loved are sucking other dudes’ dicks.” No bullshit, and straight-to-the-point advice that I will forever be grateful for. If you believe your friend is receptive to the truth, then go for it. But if he has gone past the point of no return, it is best to simply value your time together when it is available and keep it moving.

Read More: You Cannot Turn A Whore Into A Housewife

Panchito Cordero

Sleez3vil is a man with no shortage of words. After an early introduction to the red pill he has been on his path ever since.

Julian’s Empty Temples Mirror The State Of Modern Conservatism

November 28, 2014 | by Vincent Law | Link | Original Link

From 361 to 363 AD, Rome was ruled by emperor Julian. If you know your Roman history, at the time, Rome had already converted to Christianity with the previous emperor Constantine, who had accepted Christianity on his deathbed. When Julian came to power, he brought with him an agenda of reforms that would restore the greatness of the Roman empire. In his mind, it only made sense to start with political and religious reforms. He blamed Christianity for the state of the Roman empire and he also blamed Constantine for the state of the administration and for having abandoned the traditions of the past.

Wikipedia summarizes this as:

> He restored pagan temples which had been confiscated since Constantine’s time, or simply appropriated by wealthy citizens; he repealed the stipends that Constantine had awarded to Christian bishops, and removed their other privileges, including a right to be consulted on appointments and to act as private courts…
>
> On 4 February 362, Julian promulgated an edict to guarantee freedom of religion. This edict proclaimed that all the religions were equal before the law, and that the Roman Empire had to return to its original religious eclecticism, according to which the Roman state did not impose any religion on its provinces. Practically however, it had as its purpose the restoration of paganism at the expense of Christianity.

To his surprise, however, he failed spectacularly in his efforts. This is all the more surprising considering that Christianity was not yet the predominant religion of the empire, but rather still another sect among many. The pagan temples were already empty, abandoned, or under new ownership by Christians who had simply moved in.

This is a startling story because it raises many parallels with the situation that we find in America. The old religion is dying; the idea of a liberal, democratic and prosperous society built upon the premise of the American Dream has disappeared. Americans more and more wistfully look at the past with its assurances of a stable job with benefits, a loyal and feminine wife, and an assurance that future generations will have it better than you.

Unfortunately, things are deteriorating, and have been for a while. Occasionally we get a pep talk from the emperor-in-chief about how we will revive the middle-class and restore American values back to their proper place on the bow of the HMS Progress. Jobs will come back and, with them, the white picket fences will pop back up. Illegal immigration will be resolved, Ebola contained, race issues in America cordially concluded once and for all. We may as well be promised that women will no longer be taught to be empowered sluts, and frustrated beta males will be able to find wives again.

The truth of the matter, however, is that Pandora's box has opened and the toxic sludge of equalism with all its attendant derivatives (feminism, historical revisionism, racial self-abasement) continues to ooze out. It wont stop, and the old traditions won't come back, even if a sympathetic emperor were to try and stem the tide. The nostalgia is not strong enough, the churches are empty, and the new visionaries continue to chant "progress" over a cacophony of equalist pablum that drowns out the old truisms and traditions and labels them heretical.

Feebly clinging to the moderate ideologies of the last several decades is a sure way of ending up like Julian's pagans. Turning the clock back 10, 20, maybe 50 years is a sure-fire path to failure, as Julian found out. Reaction is not about trying to stave off "progress," consigning oneself to fighting a rear-guard action against the forces of "reform" as they nip at the heels of a disorderly and retreating army.

Most American conservatism in this sense is just a reaction to whatever current trend of progressivism happens to be most prevalent. What good is it then to constantly dig one's heels in, knowing that eventually and assuredly, the enemy will continue to press the advance and retreat will be inevitable? What passes for modern conservatism in America is little more than a knee-jerk reaction that continues to have a clear trajectory leftward and downward.

Read More: The Roots Of Masculinity In Ancient Rome

Vincent Law
Vincent is just another immigrant from Mosk who has been trying all his life to become a fellow citizen. Check out his blog at atavisticintelligentsia.us

Are You Strong Enough To Fight A Tiger?

November 28, 2014 | by John Doe | Link | Original Link

Many of you may have heard of the book called Autobiography of a Yogi. It is literally an autobiography of an Indian man who went to the Himalayas and attained enlightenment in the first part of the 20th century. He talks about his travels throughout India and how he met many extraordinary people. One of the stories he tells is about someone he called the Tiger Guru.

Yogananda Paramahamsa, the author and lead character of the book, was travelling in Kalighat, a neighborhood in Kolkata, West Bengal, visiting one of his friends whom suggested that he meet a guru who used to fight and tame wild tigers in his youthful days before he became a monk. Yogananda could not help but feel a boyish enthusiasm to meet such a person. The next day, he and his friend went to meet the saint at his house. After waiting for a while they were ushered in to his room, and they fell dumbstruck at the size of the Tiger Guru's body, with a massive chest and huge biceps. He was sitting there in meditation and he welcomed his guests.

They immediately asked the Tiger Guru, "How is it possible to become so strong that you can fight wild tigers, which are the strongest of all animals?" He replied "You look upon tigers as wild beasts and yet I see them simply as pussycats." To prove his strength he punched a solid wall and a brick fell right out of it. The Tiger Guru then explained to them that his real source of power was his mind and its powerful determination, and that he could terrorize even wild tigers into submission using such power of will.

He explained how the body and mind are intimately connected, and that if you have a weak mind you will have a weak body as well. The Tiger Guru admitted that he used to have a very weak body, but through relentless effort and a regime of exercise and meditation he developed into the superhuman Goliath that he was today.

The Tiger Guru then told Yogananda and his friend the story of his greatest victory. The Tiger Guru's fame had spread so widely that the king of the local area had requested his audience. The king sent a royal assembly to accompany him to his palace so that he could meet him. The king himself met him at the palace entrance and he sat the Tiger Guru on his royal throne as a gesture of honor and respect.

The king asked him "I have heard that you can fight and defeat wild tigers with your bare hands. Is this true?" "Yes," the Tiger Guru replied. The king then negged him by saying "How is it possible that a weak Indian could have ever gained such strength? Are you actually fighting wild tigers or is this one massive hoax? Do you give opium to the tiger beforehand?"

The Tiger Guru was insulted by such a question and his pride grew. The king then challenged him to fight his newly-caught wild tiger and said that if he was able to defeat the tiger he would be rewarded with the equivalent of millions of dollars (the value of the Indian rupee has fallen many-fold in the past 100 years), but that if he refused to fight the tiger that the king would expose him as a fraud. The Tiger Guru agreed and the match was set for one week later.

During the days leading up to the match the king built an enormous arena that was capable of seating thousands of people. The tiger match would be fought inside a massive iron cage in the middle of the arena. On the day of the match so many thousands of people showed up to watch that many of them had to be turned away, but in their enthusiasm they broke through the tent walls so that they could watch from outside the arena. The Tiger Guru strolled into the arena with massive swagger and walked right into the safety cage that was surrounding the iron cage where the tiger was waiting for him.

As soon as he walked into the iron cage the tiger pounced on him and injured his right hand. Not letting that faze him, he threw a punch with his left hand and landed it squarely on the tiger's head. The tiger fell back momentarily stunned, but then increased the fury of its attacks against the Tiger Guru. The cage eventually became covered in the blood of both the human and the tiger.

The crowd was screaming in astonishment and the guards even tried shooting the tiger because they were afraid the tiger would kill him, but their bullets missed due to how fast the tiger was moving. The Tiger Guru then mustered all of his will power, roared at the tiger, and punched the tiger so hard on the skull that the tiger fell unconscious to the ground.

The audience erupted with tremendous enthusiasm as the Tiger Guru opened the tiger's mouth wide and put his head in between the tiger's jaws in order to show that he had defeated the tiger. He then walked towards the exit of the iron cage, but the tiger came back to consciousness and leaped on him, once again pinning him to the ground.

The Tiger Guru flipped the tiger over so that the Tiger Guru was on top and with his Herculean blows he beat the tiger into unconsciousness once again. Victorious, the Tiger Guru got up and left the cage. After his wounds were treated by a doctor he began walking out of the arena, people rushed up to him and placed flower garlands around his neck and showered gold coins at his feet. The king himself congratulated him, gave him the promised rewards, and declared a festival celebrating the Tiger Guru's victory over the tiger.

Though the story itself may be apocryphal, its message is not: man is often capable of the unbelievable when he is completely devoted to his singular purpose.

Read More: The Worst Advice Ever For Strong Men

John Doe
John is the creator of the famous Boycott American Women blog. Check it out here: www.BoycottBitches.com

The Deregulation Of The Sexual Marketplace

November 29, 2014 | by Thomas Hobbes | Link | Original Link

Even to the casual observer, the realities of western dating today can seem bizarre. Contradictions are everywhere. How are there so many promiscuous, “slutty” women around, and yet so many desperate twentysomething virgin males? How are there so many “alpha” males with extensive dating histories, and yet many attractive women lamenting the lack of “decent” men anywhere?

But there is an answer, one the manosphere has been aware of for some time, but often has trouble articulating. Here then, I shall attempt to explain it in useful chart form.

The reality of the past fifty years, of the rise of second and third wave feminism, of the culture wars and the collapse of the family unit, could be summed up in one word—deregulation. In short, people are no longer beholden to a great deal of legal and social restrictions on their behavior, particularly when it comes to their sexuality. A whole host of sexual behaviors, once rare (or at least taboo) are now increasingly common—sex before marriage, “open” relationships, one-night stands, masturbation, childbirth outside of wedlock, single parenthood…the list goes on. In most western countries, divorce rates are now pushing 50%.

Now in our modern, globalized world, the idea of “deregulation” may sound appealing. What need was there, many wonder, for such restrictions in the first place?

A reality of human behavior, one which today’s feminists resolutely ignore, is the obvious fact that men generally desire sex a great deal more than women. Surveys across the board indicate that men masturbate, or else desire sex, about three times as often. By rejecting this, feminists decide to ignore all of the implications it has in our society.

We could depict this difference in libido between the sexes like so:

Clearly, when it comes to sex, women are in far greater demand. In our politically correct society this reality is often denied, but let’s face facts.

The question of how to divide up this relatively limited amount of desire among women is one every human society has struggled with. Basically, if you fail to regulate the market, the logical result is a small minority of men garnering the attention of the vast majority of all women. Not totally dissimilar to a lion pride, a handful of males can service a much larger number of females.

To prevent this, societies have almost always regulated women’s sexuality to some degree. Certainly some individuals (generally the nobility and others with a great deal of wealth and power) got more than their fair share of attention, but by and large most men were guaranteed a wife. This was necessary in order to maintain social stability.

The pre-1960s dating market thus looked something like this:

Over the last fifty years however, these ancient rules have been discarded, leading to exactly the situation described above. Rather than a roughly equal distribution of partners, a small minority of men have come to command most of the attention of the fairer sex, while the rest are left out in the cold:

Annotated further, we get this reality:

Looking at this overview, a great deal of mystery about the modern day sexual marketplace evaporates. Studies consistently show that, when it comes to number of sexual partners, men come first in both the lowest (i.e. zero partners) and highest (say, ten or more) categories.

The rich, the famous, and the physically most attractive are in the latter group. This then leaves a huge portion of the male population who are forced into what has lately been called “involuntary celibacy” (or incel for short).

Of course, there is still some natural variation in the quality of partners. The least attractive women are still unlikely to score the most attractive men, but they are consistently able to punch above their weight. You can find countless news articles about women in their 40s and 50s foraying into online dating and successfully bedding desperate guys half their age. Such articles are typically clueless on the actual causes of this phenomenon. “Young men now actively seeking older women!” the headlines proclaim—not realizing that only a lack of suitable partners their own age has driven them to this.

Aside from the media headlines, most people can probably relay a number of anecdotes that reflect this new reality. Personally I know of a number of men (generally older, wealthier ones, men who travel to Thailand a lot, younger buff guys, and guys in bands) who have slept with likely dozens of women. At the other end of the spectrum I still know of a great number of virgins, even though most of my friends (and former classmates who I keep in touch with) are now in their early 20s.

It’s worth mentioning at this point, that even the “winners” of this new reality may not necessarily be better off. For the vast majority of men, this new order could rightly be described as soul-crushing of course, but for the top-quota men and women who have seen the quality of their sex lives go up, most of what they’ve got is just that—sex.

There’s no denying that long term relationships are on the decline. Social conservatives are often described as hateful and misogynist for railing against promiscuity, but the statistics don't lie. Marriages in which the wife was a virgin have an 80% chance of succeeding, while the figure for brides who have had 15 or more premarital partners is just 20%.

Basically, there's an ever-increasing number of washed-up old hags out there who are coming to regret their earlier promiscuity, and are now facing the realization that they will probably die alone and childless. Whatever "decent" men there might be out there are typically dating women half their age, while older women quietly seethe at a younger generation doing exactly what they did when they were that young.

This has economic effects as well. The elderly used to be looked after by their partners or their children once they got too old, but an increasing number are now destined for retirement homes—ones for which the taxpayer will no doubt have to fork over the cost. Here in Australia, the decline in average household size (from 3.1 in 1976 to 2.6 today) means there are just over one million extra houses today than there otherwise would be.

That's a million extra fridges running 24/7, and hundreds of thousands of extra dishwashers, microwaves, washing machines, cars and other devices. No wonder the cost of living is continuing to skyrocket.

As for the younger generation, the blurred line between alphas and betas, where marriageable men may still be found, seems to be shrinking every year. ROK author Tuthmosis covered this brilliantly in a post last year.

The real problem with this new reality however, is found in the hordes of thirsty young men who fall outside the fortunate group at the top. The reality can no longer be ignored that the deregulation of the sexual marketplace has disenfranchised millions of young men across the western world. Elliot Rodgers is merely among the most extreme examples. Others have written detailed articles on his story.

Aside from mass-shooters, there is also the reality that young men commit suicide at around four times the rate women do. Furthermore, the number one cause cited for such deaths is actually breakups—a factor in a whopping 75% of cases.

One can also see how this crisis of intimacy has divided the male community. We can outline three groups—the manosphere, PUA-hate and white knights.

The first group basically accepts the new reality, and generally consists of men who are (or think they have a decent shot of becoming) in the top portion of men who have much to gain on the sexual market. "PUA-hate" refers to those who are rallying against the new reality, and we can include Elliot Rodgers among them. The last group basically rejects the whole thing, and thinks that either stable marriages can still exist in our society regardless, or that it doesn't matter much anyway.

I would hope to count myself among the first group, but that isn't to say the other two are completely inferior. If only a minority of men stand to gain from this new order, then the betas of PUA-hate will always outnumber the alphas of the manosphere, and if a revolution ever comes, like the Proles in 1984—it will come from them.

The new reality

If there’s one thing socialists have always understood, it is that you can only deregulate a market so far before the losers, justly or not, begin to respond violently. This is because violence, more than any other currency, is not a distortion of the free market; it is the ultimate free market.

The collapse of the family unit could be compared to Russia after the fall of Communism—society may have become “freer,” but it also became more unequal and actually poorer. Unemployment and poverty, previously almost unknown, became commonplace. Similar trends are now seen in western countries regarding sexuality. Involuntary celibacy, the social equivalent of unemployment, is increasingly common, and the latest surveys show that people are actually having LESS sex today than they used to.

No resolution to these problems seems to be in sight. Even trying to admit their existence will bring social justice warriors crashing down on you, hurling the tired old labels of “sexist” and “misogynist.” It is a crying shame that, while the left typically comes out against excessive inequality, since we’re discussing women’s issues this is trumped by feminist dogma.

Just as wealth inequality will surely drive up crime rates and destabilize a society, it is not hard to see that this newfound crisis of inequality of intimacy is causing much the same thing. Our society is largely blind to this reality, but chances are we won’t be able to ignore it forever.

Read More: The Father Of The Term “Sexual Marketplace”

Thomas Hobbes
Thomas Hobbes is an Australian uni student hiding out in his mother's basement waiting for the singularity to arrive. As a backup plan he is secretly hoping to avoid the perils of an actual career by becoming a writer and travelling the world.

The #1 Reason You're Struggling To Gain Muscle

November 29, 2014 | by Scott James | Link | Original Link

If you're reading this post, chances are you'll fit into one of the following categories in regards to your training.

• You're looking to build muscle to attract girls

• To excel in your chosen sport and get an edge over the competition you need to improve your physique

• You're overweight and unhappy and have decided it's time for change

• You've been lifting for a while now and have seen some steady progress, yet the rate at which you're progressing has begun to rapidly decrease

When these situations arise, consulting Google is generally the first course of action. I know it used to be for me when I found myself hitting a plateau or getting into a training rut. Upon searching "how to build muscle mass," "advanced techniques to build muscle," or "best diet to get shredded" millions upon millions of search results are instantly displayed.

"Fantastic, all the information I need is right here at my fingertips!" you think to yourself.

With so many different results come so many different recommendations, techniques, conflicting points of view, and the peddling of many supplements which promise to help you acquire that body you've been working tirelessly to achieve.

Your mind becomes overloaded with a ton of conflicting information, you get frustrated and don't end up implementing a diet or workout regimen because you're left with more unanswered questions than before.

This is undoubtedly the #1 reason why most men are struggling to build lean muscle mass.

It's analysis paralysis: "over-analyzing (or over-thinking) a situation so that a decision or action is never taken."

Funnily enough, from my experience I can see that this is also the reason why most online businesses and passive income streams fail—an overload of information leads to absolutely no action. Do I need to buy whey protein concentrate or whey protein isolate? What if my testosterone level is only 400ng/dl?Am I at risk of going catabolic if I don't get a meal in within 20 minutes of finishing my workout? Does my chicken breast have to be boiled or grilled to absorb the nutrients best?

Too much thinking and not enough doing

The internet is our greatest tool. Researching literally any topic and gaining new knowledge within seconds is a blessing, yet at the same time the internet is a weapon—the amount of false information, broscience, marketing of pseudoscience supplements, and different gym-goers' conflicting opinions is mind boggling.

Stop over reaching and stressing.

Construct your own plan.

Realize that the perfect diet, the perfect workout regimen, and the perfect supplement do not exist. Stop looking for the quick fix.

Like any other worthwhile endeavor in life, building a noteworthy physique is a marathon, not a sprint. it's a journey on which you take action for a pre-determined period of time before measuring your progress to assess what is and what isn't working and then pivot the necessary portions of your workout regimen, diet, or supplementation.

Instead of reading 100 articles on Bodybuilding.com and listening to every broscience post submitted by your favorite Instagram athlete, read what YOUR BODY is telling you after you have applied a workout, diet, or exercise for a reasonable period of time. You will learn far more from it than from any article like "How to Build A Badass Chest Today – the 3 must do exercises."

Here's what I'd like you to take away from this post:

– Stop looking for the perfect workout regimen, diet, or supplement – Understand that building a noteworthy physique takes time, regardless of what training ideology you adopt

– Pick a routine and diet and follow them consistently for 4 – 6 months

– Track your lifts, weight, body fat and body measurements

– Assess your progress and results and make necessary pivots based on this information

– Rinse and repeat

Don't Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

Scott James

Scott is a fitness enthusiast, entrepreneur, author & proprietor of IgnoreLimits.coma blog created to share how he transformed his physique, finances & habits. RoK readers can download his free bodyweight training eBook on his website.

3 Dangers Of Setting Goals

November 30, 2014 | by David | Link | Original Link

What's your dream car? Where's your dream vacation destination? What's your dream girl? What's your dream job?

Do you have answers for any of these questions? Or for all of them? Is that a good thing?

Ok, I'll stop asking questions now. Clearly setting goals is beneficial for making progress in your life. But in this article I'll argue against this self-improvement staple. Let me make one thing clear: you should set goals for various areas of your life. I only want to point out the dangers of becoming obsessed and attached to these goals.

Note: This article doesn't apply to the lazy sloths who haven't set a single goal for themselves. In their case, setting any goal can only be a good thing.

1. You get attached to the outcome

The purpose of setting goals is to give yourself a direction to work towards. You set a goal when there's a need for a purpose in a certain area of your life. The act of setting the goal formalizes your intention and seemingly increases the chance of success.

But it can have one terrible side effect: you get attached. And when you get attached, you start to put the goal on a pedestal. Yes, you're still likely to achieve it, but oftentimes the costs outweigh the benefits. You start to sacrifice your health, relationships, and leisure time to get what you want. And if you don't get it you can lose all of your sense of self-worth.

The solution to this is to set goals in opposing areas of your life. Say you set a goal that relates to your career—to get a certain promotion, for example. You should balance this by also setting a goal for something in your personal life—dating a new girl or learning a new martial art, for example.

2. You become addicted to setting goals

While setting measured and calculated goals is a good way to grow and learn, there is a danger of becoming obsessed. It's happened to me, and I've seen it happen to other men as well. You achieve one thing, and before you even pat yourself on the back you've replaced it with something else.

Always having an aim in life is important because it fills you with a sense of purpose. But you must be careful not to turn goal setting and achieving into the only thing in your existence. Spending time with friends, watching a good movie, and eating a savory meal are all things that should be enjoyed and looked forward to.

The solution to avoiding this trap is to remind yourself that a lifestyle without enjoying things is unsustainable. You're missing out on essential parts of living. Your goals are important, yes, but they're not everything.

3. You set the wrong goals

Yes, I'm judging your goals. Some goals suck. Simple as that. They are dead ends that will only lead to suffering and anxiety. Others are good. They will lead to growth and happiness.

What's the difference? Bad goals focus entirely on the outcome. Owning a Ferarri or sleeping with 100 women are examples of bad goals. Saving some money every month and having the confidence to approach any woman in any circumstance are far better alternatives.

Sure, the image of a Ferarri or of a bunch of hunnies in your bed is vivid and attractive, but it focuses your attention on all the wrong things. How can you buy a Ferrari if you can't save $1000 per month? How can you sleep with 100 girls if you don't even have the balls to approach one?

The solution is to set goals that meet the following parameters: you have a large degree of control over them (ie. success is likely if you put in the time and effort), they focus on the process, and you can describe why you want to achieve it (ie. your motivation).

For a roadmap to setting better goals and conquering your fears check out my book Dominate.

Don't Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

David
David is a strength coach and bestselling Men's Health author. You can follow him at HowToBeast.com.

Are Our Fears About Anonymous Rape Accusations Coming True?

November 30, 2014 | by JJJ Van Erp | Link | Original Link

Hysterical trends within the feminist movement are not new to us. But once in a while, one of these trends stands out and can be interpreted as a sign that we have reached a new step towards the dystopia the cultural Marxists are bringing us to.

Presently, in the part of Canada where I reside, there reigns a surreal atmosphere brought on by the French version of the #beenrapedneverreported frenzy and it is all the newspapers have been talking about, with a number of public personalities coming out as victims. What follows makes me wish I could go back to the good old fashioned normal rape hysteria we used to have.

Among this turmoil, a Facebook page called Alerta Feminista sprung up, where women can anonymously accuse their rapists. If you have been reading ROK for a while, you know where this is going. Under the cover of anonymity, women write long sob stories in which they publicly accuse a man. The fact that they post the personal information of their purported rapist removes all pretense of a therapeutic confession and shows it for what it is—a witch hunt. Another interesting thing is that many of the accused are part of extreme-left organizations, which does not have an ounce of credibility and instead gives us insight into typical female power struggle tactics.

I often joke with my brother about the 1-in-5 statistic, and how as people become used to it, feminists will need to come up with an even more shocking number to remain relevant. Well, this moment has arrived! The figure of 1-in-3 has recently become the norm here, originating from official government statistics about sex related crimes.

Of course when you read women's posts it is always interpreted to be rape, and anyone that tries to explain that a slap on the butt cannot be put in the same category as penetrative rape is accused of taking the side of patriarchy. The logic, according to what I read, is that the gravity of the event is in the mind of the victim, and that deciding the degree of traumatism for a victim is patronizing and perpetuating rape culture.

Here is what I gathered about the kind of stories posted on Alerta Feminista. The most recent poster starts her story with this gold: "Like the majority of women, I have been raped." No mention is made anywhere of forcible rape, but she then proceeds to describe how she basically dated a "control freak" who made false promises, and she finishes by saying equality was just the beginning, and that stopping at equality is an insult to all our mothers and grandmothers who suffered under the patriarchy.

Another invites men to offer reparations to their "victims" if they ever pressured or insisted for sex, or omitted to verify that consent was still valid in the middle of the act. It also took her 15 years to "realize" that what her lesbian partner did to her was rape. Although I'm inclined to believe that one, since lesbian couples are much more likely to be abusive than other couple configurations.

And yes, she does blame the patriarchy for her rape by a lesbian woman.

No matter what nonsense women throw at us, it does not have to impact our lives. It has not for most of history after all. But things start getting ugly when people start giving it importance.

Enter the leftist politician.

Two House of Commons representatives belonging to the Liberal Party of Canada have been anonymously accused of harassment. Justin Trudeau, pretty boy, son of ex-Prime Minister superstar Pierre Trudeau, and lastly, leader of the Liberal Party, chose to immediately suspend them for the duration of the investigation.

To make this clear, those two men were suspended and their names appeared in newspapers across the country, while the identity of the accusers remains unknown, although they are said to be members of parliament. No report has been made to the police. We know from the example of countless male teachers cleared of any wrongdoing after a child got an overactive imagination that reputations never recover from these events. Justin Trudeau has justified his decision by saying:

> I am aware of how difficult it is for people to come forward. I believe strongly that those of us in positions of authority have a duty to act upon allegations of this nature. It's 2014—we have a duty to protect and encourage individuals in these situations to come forward. The action must be fair but decisive. It must be sensitive to all affected parties but, recognizing how difficult it is to do so, it must give the benefit of the doubt to those who come forward.

You see that this justification fits right in with the zeitgeist. He mentions giving the benefit of the doubt to the victim, while giving none to the accused. In total disregard of the presumption of innocence. According to a cop I talked to who works in criminal intelligence (and various studies), roughly half the rape reports are fake.

So how is the difficulty in coming forward any indication of truthfulness? But hey, as he said, it's 2014, being progressive is good, no matter what direction you take. How long do we have until a woman's word is all it takes to put a man behind bars without due process, spectral evidence-style? Considering these women did not even need to name themselves, this case shows that we are already well on our way there.

Read More: The Truth About False Rape Accusations That All Men Should Know

JJJ Van Erp
JJJ Van Erp is a thinker, traditionalist and outdoorsman. He works part time infantry and farming and can otherwise be found hunting or fishing.

Masculinity, Misanthropy And Mirth: Inside The World Of Ann Sterzinger

December 1, 2014 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

NOTE: Ann Sterzinger is a personal friend of mine, and this article represents my personal opinions on the merit of her work.

Self-publishing has been one of the greatest innovations of the last decade and one of its greatest curses. Sure, the freedom to release your life's work without having to grovel to some executive with his head shoved up his rectum is great. So is the ability to actually keep the majority of your book's earnings (most mainstream authors earn at most ten percent royalties, which they usually have to split with their agent).

Unfortunately, self-publishing also means self-promotion: without the resources of a major publishing house behind you, you're left to hock your own wares. This advantages self-help writers—most of whom already have marketing techniques down pat—at the expense of everyone else. The reading public also gravitates towards self-help books, with fiction and memoirs being a far harder sell. The end result is that while today's novelists may have the freedom to publish whatever they want, the hurdle of self-promotion means that most of them will languish in obscurity.

Take my friend and Taki's Magazine colleague Ann Sterzinger. When I asked her how many books she and her confederate Andy Nowicki were selling via her Hopeless Books label, she chuckled and said, "Um… I think I owe Andy enough to buy a hamburger?"

It's a shame, seeing as Sterzinger and Nowicki are by far the best young fiction writers out there today (yes, being middle-aged counts as "young" in the world of literature).

Some may say that using my ROK bully pulpit to promote a personal friend is borderline unethical, but had I never bought and reviewed Sterzinger's novel NVSQVAM (Nowhere), we'd have never become friends to begin with. I also know I'm going to catch flak from the permavirgin crowd for praising a woman writer, but I doubt they read books anyway.

Indeed, if you scrubbed her name off NVSQVAM and The Talkative Corpse (we'll ignore her freshman novel, the entertaining misfire Girl Detectives), you'd have a hard time even telling Sterzinger is a woman. Not only is her prose crisp and funny, her subject material is a complete 180 from the whiny navel-gazing that most female writers puke out.

Sterzinger's oeuvre sits at the crossroads of generational angst and male alienation, tales of losers struggling against a world that holds them in contempt. She arguably captures the experience of being a man better than many male writers do. With her recent hiring as Takimag's editor, replacing the departing Jim Goad, hopefully Sterzinger will start getting some of the attention she deserves.

A Brief History Of Beautiful Losers

Ann Sterzinger and Andy Nowicki's brand of "loser-lit" has a pedigree going back nearly a hundred years. All roads converge with Louis-Ferdinand Céline, the original self-made pariah of Western fiction. His 1931 novel Journey to the End of the Night (Voyage au bout de la nuit in the original French) introduced the world to Ferdinand Bardamu, Céline's misfit alter ego, bringing with it a new prose style that mimicked the nature of human memory itself.

Journey and its successor novels succeeded because they blended misanthropy, humor, and above all, self-awareness. Any teenage emo idiot can talk about how everyone else is a piece of shit: it takes courage to mock yourself. Céline's sophomore effort Mort à crédit (translated as Death on the Installment Plan) was a glorious monument to self-abasement, in which he depicts his literary surrogate as a fap-addicted oddball with an aversion to wiping his ass.

Despite attempts by politically correct leftists to erase Céline from history (he was a fascist who authored anti-Semitic pamphlets and supported the Vichy regime during World War II), he's remained one of the most influential writers of the 20th century. Virtually every great writer who came after Céline, from mid-century novelists like Charles Bukowski and William Burroughs to modern ones like Michel Houellebecq and John Dolan, owes him a considerable debt. A few hacks have also ripped Céline off: for example, Joseph Heller's Catch-22 is an artless imitation of Journey to the End of the Night, lacking that novel's rhythm or frankness.

Sterzinger also lays claim to the legacy of another group of 20th century literary misfits: the Angry Young Men. Rising to prominence in the 1950's, the Angry Young Men were a reaction to the suffocating Beigeism of post-war Britain, a society that praised mediocrity and elevated fools like James Joyce to prominence in the arts. Writers such as Kingsley Amis and John Osbourne lambasted the British establishment with novels such as Lucky Jim that defied the literary conventions of the era. Sterzinger has named Amis as one of her influences, even telling me in an interview that NVSQVAM (Nowhere)'s protagonist Lester Reichartsen is partially based on him.

The Marginal Men

Both NVSQVAM (Nowhere) and The Talkative Corpse feature male marginalization as their subject matter, notable not just because it's an underserved market in modern literature, but because of who wrote them. Sterzinger deliberately bucks the trend of novelists who can only write about their own milquetoast lives; she told me in the aforementioned interview that autobiographical fiction "bores the shit" out of her. She also bucks the trend of onanistic writers who can't imagine what life is like outside their Manhattan cocoons, as her male protagonists are just as believably loserish as anything Amis or Céline put out.

In particular, NVSQVAM probes both modern male alienation and the existential nausea of Generation X. The novel's protagonist Lester is a punk rock washout brought low by bad luck and his own foolishness. Relegated to grad school after an accidental pregnancy and shotgun marriage, Lester spends the bulk of the novel at the whim of everyone around him, from his ball-busting wife, his bratty Oskar Schell-esque son Martin (whose name is an allusion to Kingsley Amis' own no-talent progeny), to a brainless co-ed who seduces him:

> He looked up at Jenneth, who was waiting like a puppy for him to say something devastatingly witty yet easy to understand about the Incas. She wants her drink to shoot out her nose. Not much else to strive for, has she? Noblesse oblige was dead, and self-fulfillment was middle-class. The only decent things to want were good drugs and long mornings and weird Incan professors staring into your cleavage while you wandered around in your underwear in December in Minnesota during an oil shortage which would never affect you. To expect anyone to use leisure productively, in short, was pathetic. "You and your German work ethic, old boob," he muttered.

Lester's life and ambitions are crushed not only between the twin poles of family life and post-sixties hedonism, but between the machinations of the generations that surround him. Generation X exists between two groups of malignant narcissists: the Baby Boomers, with their vanity and willful destruction of societal norms, and the Millennials, who pursue mechanistic self-gratification to compensate for their inability to form normal relationships. Raised during the dismantling of the old America, GenX was never able to adapt to the world around them, an alienation that can be found in every bit of art they created, from Less Than Zero to In Utero.

The Talkative Corpse probes the same themes with an extra dash of ebullient rage. The book is presented as the diary of John Jaggo, a marginally employed 40-year-old dweeb, as interpreted eons in the future (the novel is set in early 2010's Chicago). Aside from an amusing commentary on how society bases its impressions of long-extinct civilizations on the few texts that survive the centuries, The Talkative Corpse is a bleak portrait of life at the bottom of American society:

> Her name was Kat. I want to stomp on little Kat's hauntingly beautiful face. I want to smash her fucking skull in to end all the dismissive thoughts she now has about me that make a mockery of the spontaneous poetry that used to come out of her mouth. I won't tell you what she said, because I was a shameful fool for > believing such rot. Such lying scum rot. I want to shove her pretty nose back into her brain and crush her arm bones slowly and tie her to the railroad tracks, to throw her in the river and heave her in a quarry and strap her to a bomb and fill her drink with cyanide and giggle as the maggots crawl from the exploded dead bags of what once were her creamy perfect breasts.

Tying together the dejected men of NVSQVAM and Corpse is the mirthful misanthropy at the heart of Sterzinger's work. She formally subscribes to the philosophy of antinatalism, the idea that human beings should blot themselves out of existence as a moral imperative, but she doesn't hammer you over the head with it like most modern writers. Instead, she paints the world as it is for the average man: loveless and emasculated, discarded by a broken economy, life is nothing but a train of comic miseries.

The operative word in that last sentence is "comic." Sterzinger leavens her characters' pratfalls with a healthy dose of empathy, the secret ingredient in the Célinean stew. Whining about how man is a piece of work is fine when you're sixteen, but even the most serious goth eventually dumps the Black No. 1 and grows up. Even in the darkest corners of NVSQVAM (Nowhere) and The Talkative Corpse, there remains a lone ray of hope that hey, we can still make this thing work. As John Jaggo puts it:

> Love may be bullshit. But without love, it's all bullshit.

It's ultimately this blend of empathy, comedy and honesty that makes for great writing. The world may suck, humans may be glorified shaved apes, and there's probably no point to existence, but you persevere anyway because you have to. Because you can't simply lay down and die. Because you'd rather struggle to make something of yourself—no matter how futile that struggle—then give up. Or as George Grant said: "When a man truly despairs, he does not write; he commits suicide."

Indeed, the mostly-hopeless questing ethos of Ann Sterzinger's characters mirrors her own struggle—as well as that of other modern writers—to get noticed. With the collapse of traditional publishing and the ongoing revolt against social justice warrior inanity, here's hoping she, Nowicki, and their contemporaries get the recognition they've earned.

Read More: Inside The Mind Of The Social Justice Wanker

Matt Forney
Matt Forney is an American author, journalist and radio host based in Europe. He blogs at MattForney.com and is also on Gab, Instagram, SoundCloud, and YouTube. He is the author of Do the Philippines and many other books, available here. Matt's work has also been featured at Reaxxion, Taki's Magazine, Right On, Red Ice and other sites.

Leadership Lessons From The Film “Das Boot”

December 1, 2014 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

A few days ago I saw the director’s cut version of the 1981 German film Das Boot. Of course I had seen it before, but it had been at least a decade, and it had been the theatrical version, not the director’s cut. The film was every bit as harrowing, realistic, and tragic as I had originally remembered it; perhaps more, now that the passage of time and (hopefully) greater maturity had enhanced my sensitivity to suffering and loss.

It is without doubt the greatest film of naval combat ever made, and belongs on that very short list of the greatest war films ever made. The heroism and fortitude displayed made me ponder what I had seen for days afterwards, as I am wont to do after any emotionally engaging experience.

The greatest of all naval war films

What greater eulogy could be made to those brave men of the German U-boat service, which witnessed shockingly high casualty rates? Consider this: of the 1155 submarines that Germany sent into battle, we are told, 725 never returned. The death rate of German seamen, incredibly, exceeded 60 percent, a figure equaled by no other service of any other nation.

And yet the Kriegsmarine never suffered from a want of volunteers; its morale, against all expectations, remained high even at the conclusion of the war. Most U-boat commanders never even surrendered their vessels, preferring either to scuttle their crafts or sail them to neutral ports.

In the belly of the beast: the engine room

Das Boot was intended to be the film rendition of Lothar-Günther Bluchheim's 1973 novel of the same name. Bluchheim's novel related the adventures of U-96 during the Battle of the Atlantic in 1941. From the outset, director Wofgang Petersen wanted the action, scenes, and sets to be as faithful as possible to actual wartime conditions.

The film was the most expensive in German film history. No effort was spared in meticulous attention to detail: several submarine mock-ups were constructed, actors were required to follow a strict regimen to enable them to acquire that pallid, sickly complexion that a real sailor might acquire from prolonged denial of sunlight, and the crew was put through an arduous training schedule.

The film took two full years of production and was released in 1981. The final result is nothing less than spectacular. We feel the exhilaration of salt spray on our faces while standing in the conning tower, plunging through the cold, white-peaked waves; we grit our teeth in irritation at the ceaseless pulse of the rackety diesel engine; we surge with joy at the sounds of enemy bulkheads cracking from direct torpedo strikes; and we soak in the horror and claustrophobia of being subject to depth-charge attack from an unseen enemy.

This is the grim face of combat, of battle leadership, raw and undiluted. Yet beyond the film's merits as an artistic achievement, there are timeless lessons here, which will be familiar to those who have had military leadership experience in conditions of extreme duress.

Be technically and tactically proficient. No leader can be effective unless he knows his business completely. The U-boat commander emerges to me as the major figure of the film. Actor Jürgen Prochnow plays the intense, reserved "Kapitänleutnant" (also called "Der Alter", or "old man" by his crew) who always seems to project a command presence under even the worst conditions. He knows every inch of his ship, and is obviously a veteran of multiple combat patrols.

His chief engineer (played marvelously by Klaus Wennemann) is the perfect complement to his captain's simmering intensity. His technical brilliance is what enables the sub to rise from the seafloor at Gibraltar. Technical and tactical ability cannot be faked. All of the captain's big decisions are made in the full view of the other crewmembers, under the direst of circumstances. There is no running and hiding, no dodging, and no opportunity to shift the blame. There is no room for posturing or theatrics: either the leader knows his business, or he does not.

Train your men as a team and cultivate cohesiveness. It is difficult to imagine circumstances that would promote as much cohesion and unity than service aboard a U-boat. The men “hot-rack” (alternate bunks between men); have one toilet for fifty crewmen; and are crammed together like sardines. The actors had to go through an arduous training schedule that would enable them to move about the submarine with ease, and this was before filming even began. The conditions of hardship and unrelenting adversity cement the bonds of duty between the crewmembers like no other environment could hope to achieve.

While passing through the Straits of Gibraltar, the ship is attacked and plunges directionless to the seafloor. Without this level of unit cohesion, there is no way the crew could have gotten the boat repaired and raised from the deep.

Dive! Dive! Dive!

Know your men. The captain was always aware of his men’s capabilities and limitations, and was not afraid to push the boundaries of both. He never coddles his men, but never is curt or disrespectful with them, either. There were times when he deliberately withheld information from them that they did not need to know. He tried, for example, to get the chief engineer and another crewmember off the boat before they passed through the Straits of Gibraltar. The unstated reason, they later found out, was that the captain did not expect to survive the crossing of the Straits.

Set an example. The example of the officers is consistently the same: professionalism, tactical knowledge, and bearing. Despite the worst possible conditions, and under the most adverse of combat circumstances, the captain and chief engineer never outwardly show signs of fatigue or hesitation. When you are in a leadership situation, your people are going to be watching your every move: every inflection of the voice, every raised eyebrow, every bodily gesture. Command presence matters: how you look, how you present yourself, and how you conduct yourself will be assiduously studied.

My captain, my captain: the anguished conclusion

Enforce discipline tempered by fairness and justice. There is a moving scene in the film where one of the engine-room technicians (named Johann) temporarily cracks under the strain of combat and ignores the captain's order to return to his battle-station. The captain retrieves his pistol and seems prepared to shoot Johann; discipline and orders in the German military were not a punch-line in those days.

Later, when the danger had passed, Johann apologizes to the captain, who forgives him and sends him on his way. This action showed a generosity of spirit and awareness of human nature that a lesser leader might have been incapable of appreciating. Sometimes it is better to let things go, especially if the offending person has a solid track record of performance.

Be aggressive and take the fight to the enemy. The mission always comes first, and there is no way to obscure this fact. The purpose of the U-boat is to sink enemy vessels, and this is something the captain knows. He is a wolf, a predator. He does not hesitate to attack convoys that a less aggressive commander might have gone out of his way to avoid. A leader must take the initiative and not shrink away from situations that cause him and his men discomfort.

All in all, we must rank the leadership lessons of Das Boot the most powerfully delivered messages of the film, clearly overshadowing the antiwar intentions of the director. While the film can be seen as an adventure story, an antiwar parable, or as an operatic tragedy, it also serves to showcase the leadership traits and principles that we as leaders should aspire to. Das Boot joins Adolf Von Schell's classic manual on small-unit combat leadership Battle Leadership as one of the very few epitomes that have the ring of brutal, hard truth, forged and tested under fire.

Read More: Leadership Training For Men

Quintus Curtius
Quintus can be found at qcurtius.com. He is the author of the books On Duties, Thirty Seven, Sallust: The Conspiracy Of Catiline And The War Of Jugurtha, and other books. His work has been reviewed at Taki's Magazine. He can be followed on Twitter

Davis Aurini On Integrity, Moral Responsibility, And The Sarkeesian Effect

December 1, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This interview was originally published on Reaxxion by Dallas Fitzgerald.

I recently had the pleasure of speaking with Davis Aurini, co-creator of The Sarkeesian Effect. The project has been met with some skepticism by the GamerGate community and I'd be lying if I said I wasn't one of those skeptics. However, the opportunity to speak with Davis had a large impact on how I see him as a person—and more importantly, the director of this project. Without further ado, the unaltered, unedited text of our interview in it's entirety.

—

DF: Hi, Davis. Glad to have the opportunity to chat with you. First things first, please introduce yourself and your project to our readers who may not be familiar with The Sarkeesian Effect.

DA: The feeling's mutual, Dallas, I'm pleased to be here on Reaxxion! As for myself; I'm a blogger, film-maker, and novelist who's active in the Alternative Right; my partner in this, Jordan Owen, is also a novelist, as well as a musician, and a YouTube personality; you'd best describe his politics as 'left-libertarian'.

The project we're currently working on is titled The Sarkeesian Effect: Inside the World of Social Justice Warriors. It's a feature-length documentary on the methodology of Social Justice, using the eponymous Sarkeesian as a lens through which we can look behind the scenes to see what's really going on with these people.

Jordan approached me with the idea for this film last summer, after composing the score for my short-film Lust in the Time of Heartache; I immediately knew that it was the right idea, at the right time, and that he and I were the right people to do it: we'd both taken so much flak from the radical left that a little bit more wasn't going to stop us. Fortuitously, right as we were preparing to launch our Patreon, #GamerGate erupted onto the scene; while our goals aren't identical, we're definitely in alignment. Where #GamerGate wants to expose the fraud of particular individuals, and demand accountability out of particular websites, we want to expose the general methodology which these individuals employ. Time and time again we've seen 'Social Justice' (working under various labels) infiltrate, subvert, and ultimately destroy any industry or movement which has come to their attention.

Our hope is that by putting it into an engaging, easy-to-understand documentary – by shining a bright light on the naked Emperor – we will prevent, not just the infiltration of gaming, but the ability of these Gramsci-fed Marxists to infiltrate social institutions in general.

DF: I know that you're no stranger to catching flak from the 'Social Justice' community, a quick Google search of your name can attest to that. That said, were you surprised at some of the negative criticism coming from within the #GamerGate community itself? At the time of this writing, your Patreon has 407 backers and is lagging about $5,000 behind your initial production goal. Did you expect more support than you've received thus far?

DA: It's been an uphill battle, and I'll admit it's been frustrating at times – almost makes me with I had Sarkeesian's training in manipulating crowds – almost. In my mind, Rhetoric is one thing (I'm with Aristotle on that), but sleazy NLP-based marketing techniques are beyond the pale; heck, they're one of the things we're going to expose!

In retrospect, the challenges have been two-fold: the first is due to the nature of the battlefield, and the second is the nature of the enemy.

First, the Battlefield: the Social Justice movement is well-entrenched. They aren't a conspiracy per se, but their fellow travellers exist throughout all of the cultural broadcast centres of our civilization – all of them save gaming, that is (not yet, anyway). Using these positions of power, they've constructed a narrative of villainy to serve their ends; their villains are largely fictitious, but that's not the point; the villains exist merely as tools used silence the opposition. I'm speaking, of course, of all those racist, sexist, homophobic, right-wing, HateSpeeches! who never seem to materialize in substantive numbers.

Unfortunately, they've been very effective, and at the start of all of this I came down with a bad case of the Racist!'s – all because I had the temerity to post a video arguing that racial hatred was a personality problem! I'd say this was ironic, but it wasn't; as more and more people are starting to realize, Gramsci-ideologues have no interest in combating actual cases of racism, sexism, or whatever – they're only interested in silencing their opposition.

This did prove to be an initial stumbling block, but God bless 'em – most of the folks of #GamerGate saw through it pretty quickly, and while some of them might still be wary of the Evil Canadian Monarchist, they've realized that I don't actually suck the marrow out of childrens' bones – not without their parents' permission, at least.

The other challenge has been our Opposition – not what they're doing, but who they are. As I said, they're a bunch of Internet-based NLP employing scam artists – and here come Jordan and Davis, asking for money on the Internet!

Now this is the part where I need to take some responsibility: Jordan and I have been so busy filming that we've been doing a terrible job 'marketing' the project (and I mean good, honest, Nuka-Cola marketing – not the Multi-Level, Internet Billionaire, NLP nonsense). That's something I'm working on correcting right now; the latest Teaser Video with Jack Thompson was a big hit, and I'm planning a number of other teasers that I expect to be equally well-received.

Ultimately, it's up to us to earn people's trust, and making excuses won't do that. Thankfully, both Jordan and I know how to deal with adversity, and despite being under-budget we've been getting some great work done – more of which we'll be releasing as time goes on.

DF: Of course, character assassination is one of the best weapons in any SJW's arsenal. In my personal inquiries with friends and associates regarding The Sarkeesian Effect, the overall tone seems to be that of cautious optimism. I'd say you would be hard-pressed to find someone outside of the Social Justice crowd that would argue your direction with the documentary to be unjust.

That said, I've heard a lot of rumblings regarding the exact amount you are trying to fund. 5 months at $15,000 is certainly a lot of capital and many claim that what you've released thus far doesn't reflect the budget in terms of production value. On the other hand, there are a lot of people claiming they could "do it better" on a smaller budget, though I'm personally not aware of any other active projects aiming to do so. What are your thoughts on this?

DA: While it's hard to say for certain, I strongly suspect that many of these frugal filmmakers are SJW sockpuppets; I've had a number of them claim to have made better films than LITTOH on smaller budgets, but I've yet to see any evidence that these films actually exist. The simple fact of the matter is that film making is expensive – just look to your average film's budget, even after you account for actor salaries – but that's not much of an answer for those who are legitimately curious. I think the best response I can give you is to describe my philosophy of film making.

With any movie, it all comes down to compromise – "Art Through Adversity", as Red Letter Media would say. Not just compromise between all the creative energies involved in making it, but compromise forced on you through actor availability, set availability, weather, and – yes – budget. It's a series of endless problems and frustrations, but it's in overcoming these problems that you wind up with something great (as far as I know, only one movie was ever made 'perfectly', and that was The Phantom Menace: 'nuf said). Ideally, the audience won't even notice all the corners you had to cut – a true maestro makes all of his fudges look like intentional choices.

But that doesn't mean you don't prepare for the problems: at the start of any production, you need to ask yourself: Which parts of my vision can be sacrificed?

There was a movie a while back called Primer which was notable – not just for being a great time travel story – but for it's ridiculously small budget of $7000. When I watch something like that it gets me thinking about the artist's original vision, what they considered crucial, and what they decided to cut.

In Primer the cuts are obvious, if you'll forgive me for dissecting it. The bulk of the movie has only two people in it, it's filmed on out-of-date cameras, the sets were either empty fields, their own homes, or storage lockers, and they didn't have a talented writer to punch-up the script. What the movie did have was a author who'd thought long and hard about time travel, and actually managed to write a coherent time-travel plot (probably the first ever).

Contrast to LITTOH, which was much shorter, and more expensive: we had a large number of actors, professional stunt-men and martial-artists, one in-door location, and modern equipment (part of the goal was to 'show off' what we could do with the $10,000 grant) – but at the same time we couldn't do multiple takes, nor could we film it at night, as we'd originally hoped; we went 'wide' with our money, while Primer went 'tall'.

So to bring this around to The Sarkeesian Effect, what can we not afford to sacrifice?

1. Time: this movie is topical, we need to get it out ASAP – we can't take a two-month break during filming to gather funds, and we can't work part-time and film it on weekends.

2. Mobility: the interviewing is tightly scheduled – partly because these people we're speaking with are busy, partly because they live in expensive cities – when our feet hit the ground, we need to move, and the sort of problems that get in our way often need to have money thrown at them.

3. Art: I love the documentary Fat Head, but let's be frank: the animations in it suck. We need to make this movie look good because it's rhetorical, not informative in nature (IE you don't use science to prove that the Emperor's naked – you use common sense).

What have we sacrificed?

1. Technical quality: note that I do not mean "It's okay if it sounds terrible" (speaking of which, I'll be re-releasing the first teaser with the good audio soon – that was laziness on my part as editor, not shortcomings of the raw footage), what I mean is that most people won't notice minutiae, so long as the movie's slick. Our Jack Thompson teaser was released under major technical limitations, and not even the SJW's have noticed them yet (partly because I'm damned good at what I do).

2. Artistic design: we had some initial thoughts for an artistic take on the whole thing which had to be shelved; we barely had the budget to film as it was, let alone including the sort of stuff which would have mandated a crew.

I hope that addresses some of the concerns. Elsewhere, I've broken down where the money has gone thus far, but what it really boils down to is that money solves problems, and our primary focus right now is making a bloody good movie. Outside of that, our only goal is to survive the process; any profit we see will be on the back end once it's released. Don't get me wrong, it's been an absolute a blast seeing places like New York and Miami, but our Patreon funding is not an honour I shoulder lightly; it's also a heavy moral burden. I absolutely must pay back the trust placed in me by creating the best documentary I possibly can.

DF: That was a very thorough answer. You mentioned crowdsourced funding as a "heavy moral burden". That choice of words intrigues me. It seems like the crowdsourcing boom is starting to die down, with a lot of the initial hopefulness from eager consumers involved with the platform being in vain time and time again. I can think of several projects I've personally funded that ended up ultimately being a disappointment and it's refreshing to hear someone openly express understanding of the gravity behind having so many hopeful supporter's cash in their wallet.

Could you touch briefly on this moral burden, what it means to you, and what that means in relation to those who decide to fund your current project?

DA: I've had a lot of people in my life tell me that I take things too seriously, when in my opinion they're being far too flippant about things that matter. At the same time, I find that most people will panic and resort to recriminations whenever something goes wrong in their life (say, a vehicle breaking down in the middle of nowhere); when that sort of thing happens to me I do the opposite, I try and laugh it off and find a solution.

I guess what I'm saying is that we have a lot of low-quality people nowadays. I think there are two reasons for this.

First, we're so wealthy that nothing matters anymore. Break a promise to somebody? Whatev's. Nobody's going to starve, or freeze, or wind up on the gallows over our petty betrayals. Second of all, we're wealthy, but we don't own anything – we rent and lease – and the fruit of our labour is theoretical. We fill out TPS reports about the monthly sales figures, and a paycheque gets deposited into our bank accounts; what did we actually do? What did we actually accomplish? How did we earn our money, and what to we have to show for our lives? Nothing but an apartment full of Ikea furniture, a leased sports car, a wardrobe made up of synthetic fibres, and blue-blocker sunglasses that we wear at night whenever we dress up as Mr Cool.

Everybody is a scam artist nowadays; our personalities are scams, our work is a scam, our accomplishments are scams, and deep down we all suspect it, which is why we work so hard to convince ourselves that we aren't scam artists.

Is it any surprise that in a world like ours, that your average person who receives crowd-funding feels like they earned it? Like they were owed it?

Crowd funding isn't pay that you received in exchange for a product; it's a loan that you've been entrusted with, because your supporters believe you'll pay them back with an awesome product.

In a certain sense this cuts to the core of #GamerGate: when people read my stuff, or watch my YouTube videos, I'm grateful – I'm not owed an audience, it's the exact opposite, I owe my audience good content since they were kind enough to watch or read it. The mainstream gaming press feels entitled to their audience, even going so far as to bash them.

I think a lot of people need to get over themselves.

DF: I'm glad that you mentioned the Jack Thompson interview again, that's something that I was hoping to touch on next. What was the thought process behind getting an interview with him? I've seen a lot of comparison between him and modern SJW figureheads like Sarkeesian, with some even referring to her as "the new Jack Thompson".

I'll admit, even I was surprised to see it. Do you have any response to some of the criticism being lobbed at the move such as the claim that your team is resurrecting the corpse of an already defeated "gamer enemy" to gain publicity?

DA: Upon releasing the video, Jordan and I were laughing, trying to figure out what angle the SJWs would take to undermine this one – especially given that Sarkeesian has played right into our hands over the past couple of weeks, getting her army of White Knights (I'm looking at you, Bob Chipman!) to argue that "at least she isn't Jack Thompson!"

Y'know, when I put it that way it sets your question in a different light – they were the ones resurrecting him! The way we put together the second teaser was a tactical response to a flank they'd just opened up. "At least we're not Jack Thompson"? No, you're far, far worse than Jack Thompson – say what you will about him, he's transparent about his beliefs, and his actions are direct.

We interviewed him before any of this occurred, however; so asking "Why did Davis and Jordan [Timestamp October 15th, 2014] want to interview Jack Thompson?" is a legitimate question.

The main thing we wanted to speak to Jack Thompson about was his own handling of the nasty emails he received; the parallel between him and Sarkeesian being self-evident. In his case, he was more than willing to publish the emails and say "Look at what assholes these guys are!", but harassment was just a side-effect of what he was doing; at one point in our interview, he said "You don't get into this to be popular." I'm sure you can find a quote somewhere where he alludes to violent video games creating such an uncivil attitude, but that was never a foundational plank of his belief that games cause violence amongst children.

With Sarkeesian, the harassment is her argument. It's part of her methodology. Before she can be a Damsel in Distress, she needs a Big Bad Wolf to attack her – so she provokes gamers, one or two idiots leave angry comments, and this 'proves' her argument.

If nobody had ever harassed Sarkeesian, she would have no argument, she'd be a nobody; harassment was a critical plank of her methodology. With Jack Thompson, the harassment he received was an annoyance.

DF: I'd like to touch on one more controversial subject before we wrap things up. There has been a lot of buzz in the GamerGate community about feeling "used" by people as a way to gain momentum for outside projects. Aside from your own project, the first one that comes to mind is Jennie Bharaj's BasedGamer.

I must admit that I have a certain amount of skepticism regarding her motives behind the website. As someone who has received similar criticism, do you have an opinion on the site, her asking price of $50,000 dollars, and the public opinion that she's asking too much, showing too little, and taking advantage of the current cultural climate in gaming?

DA: BasedGamer is something I've addressed publicly (albeit on Twitter), since the perceptual similarities between both our projects is obvious.

My stance is simply this: I neither endorse, nor denounce, BasedGamer. I don't yet have enough information to offer an opinion either way.

On the one hand, $50k sounds like a lot of money, but I don't know what she's planning to do with it. It's a field I'm ignorant of. $15k for The Sarkeesian Effect likewise seems like a lot of money, but as I stated above, film making is expensive; if all we were doing was releasing a bunch of YouTube shorts that price tag would be ridiculous – but for a feature film, it's reasonable (it's actually insanely cheap).

Similarly, Bharaj is going to have to justify the pricetag of BasedGamer. As both Return of Kings and Reaxxion demonstrate, it's possible to create a top-notch web-zine through elbow grease and a small amount of up-front capital (I would guess that Roosh put in about $2,000 of his own money into both projects). What is she doing that's different?

Skepticism is just due diligence in my eyes, but we cannot let it turn into motivated skepticism. If you've ever tried to convince a Social Justice Warrior of the (obvious and self-evident) fact that men and women are different, and just happen to prefer different types of games, you'll know what I mean by 'motivated skepticism'; no proof in the world is ever sufficient for these skeptics.

One of the oddities of our current social order is that we don't mind it when people make six figures for shuffling paper all day (Mrs Obama making $300k as a "Diversity Coordinator", for instance), but as soon as somebody makes money off of the Internet, people want to howl about it. I have no issue with Bharaj earning a living doing something positive; I hope she has a plan that justifies a price of $50k, and I'm open-minded to the possibility that she does.

DF: Davis, I'd like to thank you for your time and input. I'm sure you won't be swaying SJW opinions, but hopefully those on the fence have a clearer picture of the project and the workings behind it. I'll give you the floor for a final statement to our readers if you have any lingering thoughts you would like to share. It's been a pleasure interviewing you.

DA: I'd like to leave off with a question: how do we stop this from happening next time?

The crisis of #GamerGate is essentially this: a bunch of decent people have been minding their own business, dealing straight and fairly with one another as best they can, while in their midst are a bunch of adders; people who share cruel gossip, people who ask disingenuous questions, people who seek out power but shirk the responsibility.

I am so bloody proud of everybody in #GamerGate who's figuring this out: six months ago I would have felt like a conspiracy nut talking about these people, and their manipulative argument tactics. For most decent people, it's hard to believe that anybody would enter an argument with such subversive and destructive motives. Iconoclasts throughout history have run into this problem – people witnessing the argument assumes that it's being waged fairly on both sides. As more and more people engage with these SJWs over #GamerGate, however, they're quickly realizing what sort of belly-crawling vermin we're dealing with.

So my question is this: once we win this battle (and we will win), how do we stop this from happening again? What sort of social standards do we set up to ensure that the manipulators are kept in their rat holes, upbraided and shamed any time hey try and start one of their witch hunts? These people have existed throughout all of history – it's not a problem that's ever going away – but what can we do to make it that much harder for them?

This is the age old question of ethics, law, and civility of course – but it's one worth reflecting on.

If you'd like to see more of what Davis Aurini has to say, please do check out his blog and/or Youtube Channel.

Are you someone of note in the gaming industry? Developing a game you think would interest our readers? Have a personal experience related to GamerGate you'd like to express to a like-minded community? Want to tell me to check my privilege? For all of the above (and other inquiries) feel free to drop me a message via email at .

For more articles like this, visit Reaxxion.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

4 Reasons Why Aragorn Is A Great Man

December 1, 2014 | by John Smith | Link | Original Link

The realm of novels, trilogies, and fandoms is something that is often considered strictly for geeks and nerds. While a lot of fantasy series have nothing much noteworthy of emulation, J.R.R. Tolkien's literary masterpiece, The Lord of the Rings, is quite pragmatic and inspiring. Aragorn, the protagonist of the movie, is a great man in all senses of the word. Here is why:

1. The nature of his rise to power

Some are born great, some acquire greatness, and greatness is thrust upon some. The Bard may have been apt in saying so, for Aragorn shows all the three characteristics. By virtue of his bloodline, he had the traits of the great Kings of Men that came before him. Throughout the books, as well as in the movies, he is reluctant to step up and claim the throne of Gondor, that by virtue of ancestry was rightfully his.

However, these things did not come easy. He was certainly skilled as one of the best fighters, and perhaps the best swordsman in Middle Earth, but he had to acquire his mastery through years of toil and patience in the forests. He spent much of his life fighting as a nameless soldier in battles and learning in the school of life.

2. The work behind his abilities

As has been written about on ROK several times, every great man had to go through a long phase of learning, toil, and grind. There was a time when Albert Einstein failed in school, and there was a time when Newton was temporarily driven insane by his work. No men are exempt.

Aragorn is no born superman, and had to undergo eight decades of training in combat and lore. Before he basked in the glory and comforts of the Halls of Kings, he spent years wandering in the wild as a ranger. Before he stood in majesty above all of Middle Earth, he was looked down upon with scorn by travelers and non-wanderers alike. Ultimately, it is the toil, the grind, and the years of experience that served his purpose during the war of the ring.

3. His use of mentors to learn about the world

The thought of striking gold on your own is alluring, but most men need a true expert mentor to guide them to the pinnacles of power. Aragorn grew up in Rivendell, with the wise Elf Lord Elrond. Thus from a very early age, he had a guide figure who counseled him, trained him, and kept him in line.

A few years after Aragorn came of age he found Gandalf, and they become close friends. Gandalf, who was one of the most powerful beings in Middle Earth, helped and guided Aragorn. It was Gandalf who devised the entire scheme of affairs to bring Aragorn back to the throne. A trustworthy, wise, and helpful mentor is something that many men lack in their quest for greatness.

4. His relationships with women

It is noted that women seldom occupy a big role in great men's lives. But in Aragorn's case, it is the opposite. His great virtue and his lineage drew to him Arwen Evenstar, one of the most beautiful and worthy women on Middle Earth. He understands that as a man of worth and lineage, he deserves even immortal maidens.

This belief in oneself is something characteristic of all great men. When he is faced with the dilemma to ride into the battlefield or stay behind with his love, he chooses the former. He places his goals before any woman's love. This spirit ultimately wins him the hand of the best woman in Middle Earth.

While great men are usually found in biographies and historical books, it is important to note that certain fictional characters exhibit great virtue as well. If we look hard enough for inspiration, we can often find men of spirit in all spheres of human knowledge.

Don't Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

John Smith
John is a young man, who is trying to find and live his core values in a chaotic world.

Cultural Collapse Theory: The 7 Steps That Lead To A Complete Culture Decline

December 2, 2014 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

(To download the PDF edition of this article, click here. It was originally published on Roosh V.)

It was Joe's first date with Mary. He asked her what she wanted in life and she replied, "I want to establish my career. That's the most important thing to me right now." Undeterred that she had no need for a man in her life, Joe entertained her with enough funny stories and cocky statements that she soon allowed him to lightly pet her forearm.

At the end of the date, he locked arms with her on the walk to the subway station, when two Middle Eastern men on scooter patrol accosted them and said they were forbidden to touch. "This is Sharia zone," they said in heavily accented English, in front of a Halal butcher shop. Joe and Mary felt bad that they offended the two men, because they were trained in school to respect all religions but that of their ancestors. One of the first things they learned was that their white skin gave them extra privilege in life which must be consciously restrained at all times. Even if they happened to disagree with the two men, they could not verbally object because of anti-hate laws that would put them in jail for religious discrimination. They unlocked arms and maintained a distance of three feet from each other.

Unfortunately for Joe, Mary did not want to go out with him again, but seven years later he did receive a message from her on Facebook saying hello. She became vice president of a company, but could not find a man equal to her station since women now made 25% more than men on average. Joe had long left the country and moved to Thailand, where he married a young Thai girl and had three children. He had no plans on returning to his country, America.

If cultural collapse occurs in the way I will now describe, the above scenario will be the rule within a few decades. The Western world is being colonized in reverse, not by weapons or hard power, but through a combination of progressivism and low reproductive rates. These two factors will lead to a complete cultural collapse of many Western nations within the next 200 years. This theory will show the most likely mechanism that it will proceed in America, Canada, UK, Scandinavia, and Western Europe.

What Is A Cultural Collapse?

Cultural collapse is the decline, decay, or disappearance of a native population's rituals, habits, interpersonal communication, relationships, art, and language. It coincides with a relative decline of population compared to outside groups. National identity and group identification will be lost while revisionist history will be applied to demonize or find fault with the native population. Cultural collapse is not to be confused with economic or state collapse. A nation that suffers from a cultural collapse can still be economically productive and have a working government.

First I will share a brief summary of the cultural collapse progression before explaining them in more detail. Then I will discuss where I see many countries along its path.

The Cultural Collapse Progression

1. Removal of religious narrative from people's lives, replaced by a treadmill of scientific and technological "progress."

2. Elimination of traditional sex roles through feminism, gender equality, political correctness, cultural Marxism, and socialism.

3. Delay or abstainment of family formation by women to pursue careerist lifestyles while men wait in confused limbo.

4. Decreasing birth rate among native population.

5. Government enactment of open immigration policies to prevent economic collapse.

6. Immigrant refusal to fully acclimate, forcing host culture to adopt external rituals and beliefs while being out-reproduced.

7. Natives becoming marginalized in their own country.

1. Removal of religious narrative

Religion has been a powerful restraint for millennia in preventing humans from pursuing their base desires and narcissistic tendencies so that they satisfy a god. Family formation is the central unit of most religions, possibly because children increase membership at zero marginal cost to the church (i.e. they don't need to be recruited).

Religion may promote scientific ignorance, but it facilitates reproduction by giving people a narrative that places family near the center of their existence.[1] [2] [3] After the Enlightenment, the rapid advance of science and its logical but nihilistic explanations into the universe have removed the religious narrative and replaced it with an empty narrative of scientific progress, knowledge, and technology, which act as a restraint and hindrance to family formation, allowing people to pursue individual goals of wealth accumulation or hedonistic pleasure seeking.[4] As of now, there has not been a single non-religious population that has been able to reproduce above the death rate.[5]

Even though many people today claim to believe in god, they may not step inside a church but once or twice a year for special holidays. Religion went from being a lifestyle, a manual for living, to something that is thought about in passing.

2. Elimination of traditional sex roles

Once religion no longer plays a role in people's lives, the stage is set to fracture male-female bonding. It is collectively attacked by several ideologies stemming from the beliefs of Cultural Marxist theory, which serve to accomplish one common end: destruction of the family unit so that citizens are dependent on the state. They achieve this goal through the marginalization of men and their role in society under the banner of "equality."[6] With feminism pushed to the forefront of this umbrella movement, the drive for equality ends up being a power grab by women.[7] This attack is performed on a range of fronts:

- medicating boys from a young age with ADHD drugs to eradicate displays of masculinity[8]
- shaming of men for having direct sexual interest in attractive and fertile women
- criminalization of normal male behavior by redefining some instances of consensual sex as rape[9]
- imprisonment of unemployed fathers for non-payment of child support, rendering them destitute and unable to be a part of their children's lives[10]
- taxation of men at higher rates for redistribution to women[11] [12]
- promotion of single mother and homosexual lifestyles over that of the nuclear family[13] [14]

The end result is that men, confused about their identify and averse to state punishment from sexual harassment, "date rape," and divorce proceedings, make a rational decision to wait on the sidelines.[15] Women, still not happy with the increased power given to them, continue their assault on men by instructing them to "man up" into what has become an unfair deal—marriage. The elevation of women above men is allowed by corporations, which adopt "girl power" marketing to expand their consumer base and increase profits.[16] [17] Governments also allow it because it increases their tax revenue. Because there is money to be made with women working and becoming consumers, there is no effort by the elite to halt this development.

3. Women begin to place career above family

At the same time men are emasculated as mere “sperm donors,” women are encouraged to adopt the career goals, mannerisms, and competitive lifestyles of men, inevitably causing them to delay marriage, often into an age where they can no longer find suitable husbands who have more resources than themselves. [18] [19] [20] [21] The average woman will find it exceedingly difficult to balance career and family, and since she has no concern of getting “fired” from her family, who she may see as a hindrance to her career goals, she will devote an increasing proportion of time into her job.

Female income, in aggregate, will soon match or exceed that of men.[22] [23] [24] A key reason that women historically got married was to be economically provided for, but this reason will no longer persist and women will feel less pressure or motivation to marry. The burgeoning spinster population will simply be a money-making opportunity for corporations to market to an increasing population of lonely women. Cat and small dog sales will rise.

Women succumb to their primal sexual and materialistic urges to live the “Sex and the City” lifestyle full of fine dining, casual sex, technological bliss, and general gluttony without learning traditional household skills or feminine qualities that would make them attractive wives.[25] [26] Men adapt to careerist women in a rational way by doing the following:

- to sate their natural sexual desires, men allow their income to lower since economic stability no longer provides a draw to women in their prime[27]
- they mimic “alpha male” social behavior to get laid with women who, without having an urgent need for a man’s monetary resources to survive, can choose men based on confidence, aesthetics, and general entertainment value[28]
- they withdraw into a world of video games and the internet, satisfying their own base desires for play and simulated hunting[29] [30]

Careerist women who decide to marry will do so in a hurried rush around 30 because they fear growing old alone, but since they are well past their fertility peak[31], they may find it difficult to reproduce. In the event of successful reproduction at such a later age, fewer children can be born before biological infertility, limiting family size compared to the historical past.

4. Birth rates decrease among native population

The stage is now set for the death rate to outstrip the birth rate. This creates a demographic cliff where there is a growing population of non-working elderly relative to able-bodied younger workers. Two problems result:

- Not enough tax revenue is supplied by the working population in order to provide for the elderly’s medical and social retirement needs.[32] Borrowing can only temporarily maintain these entitlements.

- Decrease of economic activity since more people are dying than buying.[33]

No modern nation has figured out how to substantially raise birth rates among native populations. The most successful effort has been done in France, but that has still kept the birth rate among French-born women just under the replacement rate (2.08 vs 2.1).[34] The easiest and fastest way to solve this double-edged problem is to promote mass immigration of non-elderly individuals who will work, spend, and procreate at rates greater than natives.[35]

A replenishing supply of births are necessary to create taxpayers, workers, entrepreneurs, and consumers in order to maintain the nation's economic development.[36] While many claim that the planet is suffering from "overpopulation," an economic collapse is inevitable for those countries who do not increase their population at steady rates.

5. Large influx of immigration

An aging population without youthful refilling will cause a scarcity of labor, increasing that labor's price. Corporate elites will now lobby governments for immigration reform to relieve this upward pressure on wages.[37] [38] At the same time, the modern mantra of sustained GDP growth puts pressure on politicians for dissemination of favorable economic growth data to aid in their re-elections. The simplest way to increase GDP without innovation or development of industry is to expand the population. Both corporate and political elites now have their goals in alignment where the easiest solution becomes immigration.[39] [40]

While politicians hem and haw about designing permanent immigration policies, immigrants continue to settle within the nation.[41] The national birth rate problem is essentially solved overnight, as it's much easier to drain third-world nations of its starry-eyed population with enticements of living in the first-world than it is to encourage the native women to reproduce. (Lateral immigration from one first-world nation to another is so relatively insignificant that the niche term 'expatriation' has been developed to describe it). Native women will show a stubborn resistance at any suggestion they should create families, much preferring a relatively responsibility-free lifestyle of sexual variety, casual internet dating via mobile apps, consumer excess, and comfortable high-paying jobs in air conditioned offices.[42] [43]

Immigrants will almost always come from societies that are more religious and, in the case of Islam with regard to European immigration, far more scientifically primitive and rigid in its customs.[44]

6. Sanitization of host culture coincides with increase in immigrant power

While many adult immigrants will feel gracious at the opportunity to live in a more prosperous nation, others will soon feel resentment that they are forced to work menial jobs in a country that is far more expensive than their own.[45] [46] [47] [48] [49] The majority of them remain in lower economic classes, living in poor “immigrant communities” where they can speak their own language, find their own homeland foods, and follow their own customs or religion.

Instead of breaking out of their foreigner communities, immigrants seek to expand it by organizing. They form local groups and civic organizations to teach natives better ways to understand and serve immigrant populations. They will be eager to publicize cases where immigrants have been insulted by insensitive natives or treated unfairly by police authorities in the case of petty crime.[50] [51] [52] [53] [54] [55] School curriculums may be changed to promote diversity or multiculturalism, at great expense to the native culture.[56] Concessions will be made not to offend immigrants.[57] A continual stream of outrages will be found and this will feed the power of the organizations and create a state within a state where native elites become fearful of applying laws to immigrants.[58]

7. Destruction of native culture

This step has not yet happened in any first-world nation, so I will predict it based on logically extending known events I have already described.

Local elites will give lip service to immigrant groups for votes but will be slow to give them real state or economic power. Citizenship rules may even be tightened to prevent immigrants from being elected. The elites will be mostly insulated from the cultural crises in their isolated communities, private schools, and social clubs, where they can continue to incubate their own sub-culture without outside influence. At the same time, they will make speeches and enact polices to force native citizens to accept multiculturalism and blind immigration. Anti-hate and anti-discrimination laws will be more vigorously enforced than other more serious crimes. Police will monitor social networking to identify those who make statements against protected classes.

Cultural decline begins in earnest when the natives feel shame or guilt for who they are, their history, their way of life, and where their ancestors came from. They will let immigrant groups criticize their customs without protest, or they simply embrace immigrant customs instead with religious conversion and interethnic marriages. Nationalistic pride will be condemned as a “far-right” phenomenon and popular nationalistic politicians will be compared to Hitler. Natives learn the art of self-censorship, limiting the range of their speech and expressions, and soon only the elderly can speak the truths of the cultural decline while a younger multiculturalist within earshot attributes such frankness to senility or racist nostalgia.

With the already entrenched environment of political correctness (see stage 2), the local culture becomes a sort of “world” culture that can be declared tolerant and progressive as long as there is a lack of criticism against immigrants, multiculturalism, and their combined influence. All cultural identity will eventually be lost, and to be “American” or “British,” for example, will no longer have modern meaning from a sociological perspective. Native traditions will be eradicated and a cultural mixing will take place where citizens from one world nation will be nearly identical in behavior, thought, and consumer tastes to citizens of another. Once a collapse occurs, it cannot be reversed. The nation's cultural heritage will be forever lost.

I want to now take a brief look at six different countries and see where they are along the cultural collapse progression…

Russia

This is an interesting case because, up to recently, we saw very low birth rates not due to progressive ideals but from a rough transition to capitalism in the 1990's and a high male mortality from alcoholism.[59] [60] To help sustain its population, Russia is readily accepting immigrants from Central Asian regions, treating them like second-class citizens and refusing to make any accommodations away from the ethnic Russian way of life. Even police authorities turn a blind eye when local skinhead groups attack immigrants.[61] In addition, Russia has also shown no tolerance to homosexual or progressive groups,[62] stunting their negative effects upon the culture. The birth rate has risen in recent years to levels seen in Western Europe but it's still not above the death rate. Russia will see a population collapse before a cultural one.

Likelihood of 50-year cultural collapse: Very low

Brazil

We're seeing rapid movement through stages 2 and 3, where progressive ideology based on the American model is becoming adopted and a large poor population ensure progressive politicians will continue to remain in power with promises of economic redistribution.[63] [64] [65] Within 15 years we should see a sharp drop in birth rates and a relaxation of immigration laws.

Likelihood of 50-year cultural collapse: Moderate

America

Some could argue that America is currently experiencing a cultural collapse. It always had a fragile culture because of its immigrant foundings, but immigrants of the past (including my own parents) rapidly acclimated into the host culture to create a sense of national pride around an ethic of hard work and shared democratic values. This is being eroded as a fem-centric culture rises in its place, with its focus on trends, celebrities, homosexuality, multiculturalism, and male-bashing. Natives have become pleasure seekers with little inclination to reproduction during their years of peak fertility.[66]

Likelihood of 50-year cultural collapse: Very high

England

While America always had high amounts of immigration, and therefore a system of integration, England is newer to the game. In the past 20 years, they have massively ramped up their immigration efforts.[67] A visit to London will confirm that the native British are slowly becoming minorities, with their iconic red telephone booths left undisturbed purely for tourist photo opportunities. Approximately 5% of the English population is now Muslim.[68] Instead of acclimatizing, they are achieving early success in creating zones with Sharia law.[69] The English elite, in response, is jailing natives under stringent anti-race laws.[70] England had a highly successful immigration story with Polish immigrants who eagerly acclimated to English culture, but have opened the doors to other peoples who don't want to integrate.[71]

Likelihood of 50-year cultural collapse: Very high

Sweden

Sweden is experiencing a similar immigration situation to England, but they possess a higher amount of self-shame and white guilt. Instead of allowing immigrants who could work in the Swedish economy, they are encouraging migration of asylum seekers who have been made destitute by war. These immigrants enter Sweden and immediately receive social benefits. In effect, Sweden is welcoming the least economically productive people in the world.[72] The immigrants will produce little or no economic benefit, and may even worsen Sweden's economy. Immigrants are turning some parts of Sweden, such as the Rosengard area of Malmo, into a ghetto.[73]

Likelihood of 50-year cultural collapse: Very high

Poland

From my one and half years of living in Poland, I have seen a moderate level of progressive ideological creep, careerism among women, hedonism, and idolation of Western values, particularly out of England, where a large percentage of the Polish population have emigrated for work. Younger Poles may not act much different from their Western counterparts in their party lifestyle behavior, but there nonetheless remains a tenuous maintenance of traditional sex roles. Women of fertile age are pursuing relationships over one-night stands, but careerism is causing them to stall family formation. This puts a downward pressure on birth rates, which stems from significant numbers of fertile young women emigrating to countries like the UK and USA, along with continued economic uncertainties faced from transitioning to capitalism[74]. As Europe's "least multicultural" nation, Poland has long been hesitant to accept immigrants, but this has recently changed and they are encouraging migrants.[75] To its credit, it is seeking first-world entrepreneurs instead of low skilled laborers or asylum seekers. Its cultural fate will be an interesting development in the years to come, but the prognosis will be more negative as long as its young people are eager to leave the homeland.

Likelihood of 50-year cultural collapse: Possible

Poland and Russia show the limitations of Cultural Collapse Theory in that it best applies to first-world nations with highly developed economies. They have low birth rates but not through the mechanism I described, though if they adopt a more Western ideological track like Brazil, I expect to see the same outcome that is befalling England or Sweden.

There can be many paths to cultural destruction, and those nations with the most similarities will gravitate towards the same path, just like how Eastern European nations are suffering low birth rates because of mass emigration due to being introduced into the European Union.

How To Stop Cultural Collapse

Maintaining native birth rates while preventing the elite from allowing immigrant labor is the most effective means at preventing cultural collapse. Since multiculturalism is an experiment with no proven efficacy, a culture can only be maintained by a relatively homogenous group who identify with each other. When that homogeneity breaks down and one citizen looks to the next and does not see a person with the same values as himself, the culture falls in dis-repair as native citizens begin to lose a shared means of communication and identity. Once the percentage of the immigrant population crosses a certain threshold (perhaps 15%), the decline will pick up in pace and cultural breakdown will be readily apparent to all observers.

Current policies to solve low birth rates through immigration is a short-term fix with dire long-term consequences. In effect, it's a Trojan-horse prescription of irreversible cultural destruction. A state must prevent itself from entering the position where mass immigration is considered a solution by blocking progressive ideologies from taking hold. One way this can be done is through the promotion of a state-sponsored religion which encourages the nuclear family instead of single motherhood and homosexuality. However, introducing religion as a mainstay of citizen life in the post-enlightenment era may be impossible.

We must consider that the scientific era is an evolutionary maladaptive feature of humanity that natural selection will accordingly punish (i.e. those who are anti-religious and pro-science will simply breed less). It must also be considered that with religion in permanent decline, cultural collapse may be a certainty that eventually occurs in all developed nations. Religion, it may turn out, was evolutionary beneficial to the human race.

Another possible solution is to foster a patriarchal society where men serve as strong providers. If you encourage the development of successful men who possess indispensable skills and therefore resources that are lacked by females, there will be women below their station who want to marry and procreate with them, but if strong women are produced instead, marriage and procreation is unlikely to take place at levels above the death rate.

A gap between the sexes should always exist in the favor of men if procreation is to occur at high rates, or else you'll have something similar to the situation in America where urban professional women cannot find "good men" to begin a family with (i.e., men who are significantly more financially successful than them). They instead remain single and barren, only used occasionally by cads for exciting casual sex.

One issue that I purposefully ignored is the effect of technology and consumerism on lowering birth rates. How much influence does video games, internet, and smartphones contribute to a birth decline? How much of an effect does Western-style consumerism have in delaying marriage? I suspect they have more of an amplification effect than being an outright cause. If a country is proceeding through the cultural collapse model, technology will simply hurry the collapse, but giving internet access to a traditionally religious group of people may not cause them to flip overnight. Research will have to be done in these areas to say for sure.

Conclusion

The first iteration of any theory is sure to create as many questions as answers, but I hope that by proposing this model, it becomes more clear why some cultures seem so quick to degrade while others display a sort of immunity. Some countries may be too far down the wrong path to be saved, but I hope the information presented gives concerned readers ideas on protecting their own culture by allowing them to connect how progressive ideologies that may seem innocent or benign on the surface can eventually lead to an outright collapse of their nation's culture.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

---

[1] Religion linked to stronger family relationships, new research shows

[2] Religion and family formation

[3] Teen birth rates higher in highly religious states

[4] "Building A Bridge To The 18th Century" by Neil Postman

[5] Religion and fertility in the USA

[6] Cultural Marxism: The corruption of America

[7] The end game of feminism

[8] Over 20% of young boys labeled with ADHD

[9] Say hello to the new definition of rape

[10] Jailing dads who can’t pay

[11] Obamacare is a bachelor tax that will fail

[12] When Obamacare takes effect, young healthy men will be hurt

[13] In defense of single motherhood

[14] Huffington Post on Single Mothers

[15] Why does America have so many Peter Pan men?

[16] Special K: Fight fat talk

[17] The Dove Campaign for real beauty

[18] Nice Girls Don’t Get the Corner Office: 101 Unconscious Mistakes Women Make That Sabotage Their Careers

[19] Play Like a Man, Win Like a Woman: What Men Know About Success that Women Need to Learn

[20] Many more women delay childbirth into 40s due to career restraints

[21] UK women having babies later than ever before

[22] U.S. women on the rise as family breadwinner

[23] Young women’s pay exceeds male peers’

[24] Income gap closing: women on pace to outearn men

[25] Sex and the City drinking culture blamed for marriage breakdowns

[26] The lonely legacy of my Sex and the City lifestyle

[27] The great jobs mystery: why are so many men dropping out of the workforce?

[28] America’s sexual hierarchy favors alpha males more than ever

[29] Video game addiction and other Internet compulsive disorders mask depression, anxiety, learning disabilities

[30] Addiction? Video games crowded out man’s life

[31] Age and female fertility

[32] Falling fertility rates pose threats to government revenues

[33] The worldwide demographic cliff

[34] The demographic cliff

[35] Solving America’s demographic problem is only hard if you rule out immigration

[36] More babies, please

[37] Fwd.us – Facebook founder Mark Zuckerburg’s immigrant reform group

[38] Soros & fellow billionaires for open borders lobby GOP on amnesty

[39] Obama administration to stop deporting some young illegal immigrants

[40] White House immigration plan offers path to residency

[41] Numbers of illegal immigrants may be on the rise again, estimates say

[42] Women who choose to remain childless have lots of money, hardly a care in the world

[43] Lean In: Women, Work, and the Will to Lead

[44] Europe's shifting immigration dynamic

[45] Generations of exclusion: Mexican Americans, assimilation, and race

[46] Ghettos shackle French Muslims

[47] Europe's angry Muslims

[48] Falling behind or moving up? The intergeneration progress of Mexican Americans

[49] Sweden shaken as riots continue in immigrant suburbs

[50] Thousands join pro-Islam protest

[51] Islamic organizations based in the United Kingdom

[52] British Islamists: Islam will dominate France

[53] The Muslim Brotherhood's conquest of Europe

[54] Arizona immigration protesters block court proceedings

[55] National Council of La Raza

[56] Common Core standards 'educate' 4th-graders about 'white privilege'

[57] Hamburg, Germany makes major concessions with its Muslim community

[58] Another no-go area in Londonistan

[59] Averting a demographic nightmare in Russia and Eastern Europe

[60] Putin vows to halt Russia's immigration plunge

[61] Neo-nationalist violence targets Central Asians in Russia

[62] Russian anti-gay bill passes

[63] Brazilian feminists to dress like lewd nuns to protest pope visit

[64] Rio holds 'biggest ever' collective gay marriage ceremony

[65] Brazil judicial decision paves way for gay marriage

[66] U.S. birthrate falls to lowest on record

[67] Immigration to the UK

[68] Will Britain have a Muslim majority by 2050?

[69] Britain's first Sharia Law zone

[70] Nearly 70,000 Britons convicted of hate crimes over six-year period

[71] Why Poles love coming to Britain

[72] Swedish multiculturalism goes awry

[73] Muslim refugees and the cost of Sweden's kindness

[74] Concern over Poland's low fertility rate

[75] Economic success makes Poland destination for immigrants

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

More Ways You Can Live Life Like A Villain

December 2, 2014 | by Donovan Sharpe | Link | Original Link

Heroes and villains. This age-old conflict goes back as far as human history has been recorded. As far as most of us know, the good guys came out on top most of the time. But the older we get, the more we question what we believed to be the pillars of truth that have been engrained in us since our youth. One of those pillars is that heroes are worshiped and revered as the true alphas of society.

Red pillers are now well aware that acting like a hero or trying to be the good guy leads to failure in most every aspect of life. Work, women, social situations, and everything in between will ultimately kick you square in the balls if you sacrifice your mental, physical, and financial well being for the "greater good" (read: feminine imperative).

But how do we break the mold and conquer life when the world showers men with false promises of female love and loyalty for their heroism? Who do we take cues from now that we know that most of our fathers, mentors, and role models have led us astray?

Villains, that's who. These guys live much better lives than their suburban beta counterparts with their four-figure mortgages and two car payments. Women outwardly want them. Men secretly want to be them. Bad guys have it figured out, and we would all do well to heed their actions and apply them in our lives accordingly.

Part one detailed the beginning stages of your outlaw transformation. At this point in your development you're working on being completely unapologetic, increasing your chattel, and turning your dwelling into an environment that suits you and you alone. Let's continue the incubation process.

Make Women Your BOTTOM Priority

One of life's greatest fallacies is the idea that a man needs a woman in his life to be truly happy. Make women your priority and you'll win their undying devotion and respect, they say. Lies. Men don't need anything but our own bodies and minds. With a solid foundation with these two tools at its core, a man can achieve a level of satisfaction that goes far beyond committing to a female who has little to no agency and brings no value to his life.

With our bodies and minds we can accumulate other valuable commodities like money, respect, and solitude. Outlaws understand that these are some of the most important assets they can acquire because it allows them to amass other resources to enhance their lives. Among the items on their list of priorities, women are at the very bottom and for good reason.

First, women are experts at draining your monetary means. They are expensive on many levels within the context of a committed relationship, which can deplete your financial stores if you allow things to get out of hand. As far as respect goes, if your frame isn't air-tight then today's women won't hesitate to disrespect you in public or in front of your friends and loved ones. Allowing this to go unchecked will extinguish that currency very quickly. Finally, their propensity to smother you in an attempt to control your life means time to yourself to think, reflect, and plan walks right out the door along with your money and respect.

Bad guys know the havoc that devoting themselves to a woman can wreak on their lives, so they wisely put them at the bottom of their respective totem poles. Incidentally enough, this is exactly what keeps the pussy flowing like the Nile River. This is something they've known for a while.

Making your mission your priority will improve your life to the point where you won't have to commit to a woman. The reason for this is that they will make themselves available to you with every chance they get simply because of the scarcity of your availability and emotional contribution. The emotions of a woman are no match for a man who has other things going on in his life. Plus, all the pussy he's getting on the side as a result of having his priorities straight causes him to subconsciously adopt an abundance mentality, making him all the more irresistible to her.

Like most things in life, the more something is available to you the fewer fucks you give about it—especially poonani. The supply of women is plentiful and the inventory is growing by the second. Girls aren't going anywhere, so there's no reason to focus an exorbitant amount of effort obtaining something you can get with minimal investment.

This isn't to say you need to stop approaching. But spending a disproportionate amount of your time chasing tail is a waste of time and resources. Villains don't do this and neither should you. Let the manginas give them constant validation. You've got better shit to do.

Think like a bandit and put the pussy in your basement. You'll quickly find yourself in their penthouses much more often than not.

Assemble A Solid Crew

I've been arrested a few times and have spent a total of about 2 weeks in jail. It's not something I'm proud of, but I'm not ashamed of it either. I fucked up, got caught, and paid for it. That's life. I've also been in my share of fights. I've kicked a few asses but I've also gotten the crap beat out of me on more than one occasion. Can't win 'em all.

But as bad as being on the short end of these experiences was, it taught me a very important lesson: having one or two compadres you can count on substantially reduces the collateral damage. It's common knowledge that there's no honor among thieves, but outlaws always have one or two go-to guys they trust implicitly in case things go sideways. While they're confident they can handle just about anything that comes their way, they don't let their egos get in the way of survival and are never too proud to call in a favor from a trusted comrade.

As a man you must be self-sufficient in every sense of the word. But there will come a time when you encounter a situation that's outside of your control and you will need assistance. Count on it. Getting pulled over by a hot-headed cop who's five arrests short of his quota or being accosted by a pissed off beta who's recruited a couple of his buddies looking to defend the "honor" of the girl you approached are good examples where a helping hand(s) would be quite useful.

Having a crew you can call on to help mitigate the damage is invaluable. I consider myself very fortunate to have a couple of close friends who have helped me out of some pretty sticky situations over the years, and for whom I've returned the favors faithfully. We've bailed each other out of jail, jumped into fights for one another, and called each other at all hours of the night to get out of some predicament or another. Through all the bloody noses and loss of precious sleep we always have each other's backs and have plenty of great stories to tell.

Understand that this will not be easy. Finding like-minded men you can trust is becoming increasingly difficult, as 95% of men in this country are certified beta boys who will do nothing but decrease your value and will sometimes intentionally drag you down with them when they see you've got life by the balls. Unfortunately these guys can sometimes be your own friends.

Bad guys have a knack for piecing together high-quality inner circles. If you manage to gather a team of self sufficient, goal-oriented red pill men who think and act on your level, the dividends are priceless.

Become A Civilized Barbarian

One of the most underrated traits villains possess is their ability to thrive in domestic situations and hostile environments equally well. The first half of this dual-purpose attribute is learning to cook, and cook well. There's no need to become a Michelin Star-level chef (though it does have its advantages) but possessing above average culinary faculty shows a class and sophistication villains are well known for. Cultivating this skill will also keep your mind engaged and will churn your creative juices which ultimately affects every part of your life.

The second half of this agency is the ability to survive in outdoor or hostile situations. The ability to defend yourself effectively gives you supreme confidence in potentially volatile situations and preserves your continuity as a man. Mastery of outdoor skills such as camping, using firearms, hiking long distances, or anything that pertains to outdoor survival over an extended period of time are all examples of things the bad guys must have down pat as a matter of necessity.

I'm no MMA fighter, but if push comes to shove I can hold my own. I also take tremendous pride in the fact that I can prepare a perfectly seasoned salmon with a side of parmesan crusted asparagus (goes great with red wine), walk outside and hit a target 100 yards away with my Winchester, then pitch a tent and set up a base camp faster than most.

These things, like assembling my crew, were far from easy and took years to accomplish. I've shelled out a ton of cash for cooking classes, countless target shooting courses, and dozens of camping trips in order to achieve the multidimensional agency I wanted. I am a self made man—a common trait among villains.

Learning and honing these dichotomous skill sets drastically increase your value as a man. However, a welcome side effect is that females get dripping wet over a man who displays high aptitude in these areas because they demonstrate high value. DHV is effortless to outlaws because they genuinely possess these skills and are required to use them quite frequently. Developing your domestic and outdoor survival skills will not only serve you well on a daily basis, but it will also separate you from 99% of men out there who are one-dimensional.

Supplemental Habits

Let's discuss a few minor habits that will help push your outlaw game to the next level.

Spend More Time Alone

Making an effort to consistently isolate yourself from the outside world has innumerable benefits. It allows you to decompress, which is paramount to keeping your mind and body razor sharp and operating at peak efficiency. Isolation can last from just a few hours to a few days or longer depending on your personality and time. Turn off your phone, ditch your laptop, and get off the grid for a while. Meditate, lift weights, or go on a weekend hiking trip alone. Do whatever it takes for as long as it takes to recharge your batteries.

Read Up On Dark Triad Traits

There are a plethora of studies out there that unequivocally prove that men who genuinely possess one or more of the "dark triad" traits have little problem attracting the company of women. Without getting into the nuts and bolts, dark triad men simply don't give a fuck about anyone but themselves. Here is a great place to start if you need a basic overview of what they are.

Many men already have one or more of these characteristics and sometimes it takes a little research to bring them to the surface. Not everyone has them, but reading up on them might help you realize why you act and think in ways that most men don't.

Always Have A Backup Plan

The best bad guys rarely get caught off guard. This is because they always have a plan B up their sleeves on the off chance things don't go according to plan. Having a solid backup plan manifests itself in confidence and boldness. Walking into any situation knowing you have one or more ways carry to out your plan helps you maintain frame in any environment.

We've all heard stories about the guy who always seems to have the presence of mind to make the right decisions in chaotic situations. This guy likely had a failsafe or two ready to deploy at a moment's notice. This is why a man with a plan and a backup plan are unfazed by unrest.

Part 2 Takeaway

We all know that Drago lost to Rocky in disgrace and that Scarface and his "lil' friend" were blown away in a cocaine-fueled rage. Those who are familiar with the story of Frank Lucas also know that his undoing was largely due to his inner circle dropping the ball, which led to the unfortunate decision he made to turn on them to save his own skin.

But where being a man is the most auspicious is the ability to separate the advantages of being a bad guy from the disadvantages. Leave the lemming approach to life to western females who blindly follow and mimic the exploits of celebri-sluts like the Kardashians, Jennifer Lawrence, and Taylor Swift thinking they'll live the good life, only to realize much too late that following that lifestyle is the quickest way to shorten their shelf lives.

[image]

This approach to life is not for everybody. A good number of men who wish to implement these traits will be short of time and resources. Another portion of men will want to jump on their moral high horses and denounce this lifestyle, failing to understand that I'm not advising men to copy criminals to the letter and risk their freedom in the name of "alphadom."

That's perfectly fine with me, but I would strongly advise these men to check their fear at the door. Use the discernment and logic your creator blessed you with in the form of a y chromosome and grab life by the balls in ways most men can't or won't.

By the same token, I'm fairly certain that ROK has readers who have been in or have proclivities that put themselves in situations that are potentially dangerous or have serious legal ramifications. As stated above I've had my share of brushes with the law. Though I've had a few close calls I've managed to come out the other side with minimal physical, mental, and monetary damage because I figured out how to weave my way through these treacherous waters. Did good fortune have a small part in a few of my favorable resolutions? Sure, but don't kid yourselves—preparation and experience makes a huge impact.

On that note, my final third and final installment will not be for the faint of heart. It will detail the ugly but necessary side of the outlaw lifestyle. Avoiding, safeguarding, and preparing yourself for situations that could potentially rob you of your time, money, faculties, freedom, or even your life will all be covered. Bad guys protect these commodities much more fiercely than depreciating assets (e.g. women and expensive toys) and so should you.

Read Next: Why You Should Live Life Like A Villain

Donovan Sharpe
Donovan is a sexist son of a bitch who objectifies women by keeping them on their toes, their backs, and their knees where they belong. Tune in weekday afternoons at 5EST/2PST for TSR: Live with Donovan Sharpe. You can follow him on Twitter , Facebook , and Instagram.

Permanent Unemployment Is America's Permanent Future

December 2, 2014 | by John Carver | Link | Original Link

I'm feeling very fortunate to have formal employment which covers my necessary expenses, with some leftover money to spare for rainy days or the odd spot of overseas travel. Being a small-time online entrepreneur helps too, and it can (hopefully) allow me to live someplace warm and modestly priced in Latin America someday.

But what about the tens of millions of Americans who are not anywhere close to having my comparatively fortunate circumstances? Long-term unemployment (or underemployment) is a major issue for those who are stuck in the American vortex, with seemingly no options to escape. Unfortunately, I have some bad news for many of these people, and of course the regular readers of RoK.

Are you ready to swallow the red pill? Of course you are, that's why you're here…

You Are Becoming Irrelevant

To grumpy taxpayers, the mainstream media, and political and business elites, you are a pest. They see you as a hopeless smartphone and pornography-addicted zombie who lives in "your mother's basement." They see you only as a taker, a moocher, and a "gibs me dat" type of person. A person who just does not want to work or contribute to society.

However, the "get a job" naysayers simply cannot comprehend the truth about the rapid changes in our civilization. There are currently more people alive today than at any point in human history (roughly 7.2 billion as of 2014) and yet the need for financially compensated human labor is dropping at an unprecedented rate.

Outsourcing, automation, robotics, drone deliveries, smartphone apps, and self-service checkouts are all contributing to less need for paid labor. But if technology is supposed to make our lives better and we live in a for-profit capitalist economic system, where is the wealth generation (for the masses) supposed to come from?

There Is No More Entry-Level Work

Many individuals have never been affected by long-term unemployment. Good for them. But they are clueless to one very defining aspect of the modern employment landscape: how can the unemployed, or new to the workforce, get work when they are not even given the chance?

You can drop your standards to rock bottom, minimum wage and part time hours, right away – and what will you get from the 24-year-old HR girl who holds your entire financial future, and by proxy your future sex life, all in her hands? "Aren't you overqualified for this? Won't you just leave the minute a better job comes around?"

Or here's another one. You can drop your standards to rock bottom, minimum wage and part time hours, and you will find is that even for the most simplistic jobs, employers want a ridiculous amount of previous experience.

Retail? You need 3 years of recent experience to restock shelves, scan price tags, hand over some change, give an insincere "have a nice day," and just generally hold the fort.

Picking orders in a warehouse? Six months of recent experience. That is, six months of recent experience which a healthy and active young adult will obviously never get.

Seating diners in a run-of-the-mill restaurant chain? Three years of similar experience.

This is exactly why many teenagers and 20-somethings cannot find work: the job market has simply eliminated the concept of an entry level job.

It seems like there is almost zero tolerance in allowing a job seeker just a few shifts of OJT (on the job training) in order to acclimatize to a new line of work. All an advertiser has to do is require one year of experience as a dishwasher, and anyone outside of those currently working as dishwashers are out of the selection pool.

Oh, and they always want somebody who will "hit the ground running," which is another cute buzz phrase which routinely makes it to print.

In today's job market, employers can set these ludicrously high standards precisely because there is such an overabundance of available labor. Adults with families to feed are working these jobs which were once almost the exclusive property of teenagers, college students, or just the outright unambitious.

The underemployed or unemployed man cannot get a better paying or "living wage" job without entry-level experience, so that means he will likely remain in his "mother's basement" or on welfare. But here is where things get strange—sometimes it's better to not even be working at all than get dead-end entry-level jobs:

But It's Not Your Fault

People who have either been employed their whole lives, settled into a career in more prosperous times, or have the political and business connections to easily procure jobs, do not identify with your plight. They will tell you to go “pavement pounding” like they did back in the good ol’ days, and that you need to “pull yourself up by your bootstraps” or something cute like that.

They are truly out of whack with how serious the unemployment situation is across the country. That would be an awful lot of “bootstraps” that need to be pulled up in order to give 90 million+ working age Americans a job.

The fact is no matter how skilled someone is or how good his résumé reads, there will be untold millions of people who will never get a job in their profession. This will be due to an oversupply of labor, outsourcing, and the takeover of robotics which is vastly decreasing the need for labor which carries a pulse.

Eventually there will be a large and permanent underclass of good-natured, un-tattooed (oh my God, brace yourself for the SJW’s!), un-pierced, well-spoken, and well-educated people who will be unable to procure work. Even though they did exactly what they were told to do by their teachers, parents, political leaders, and society in general.

The psychological (and of course the financial) effects of long-term unemployment can be devastating. Regardless of these highly unfortunate circumstances, though, keep plugging along and gradually work towards improving your future prospects. And to all the naysayers who say things like “it’s because your not trying hard enough,” tell them to take these “bootstraps” and shove it.

Thoughts & Suggestions

It’s just stupefying how utterly out of touch our politicians and media have become about the long-term unemployment problem. Rapidly growing percentages of Americans are suffering in a state of severe, abject poverty. The middle class is disappearing, wages are plummeting, jobs are vanishing, people are hanging on for bare survival in a manner even worse than what could be fathomed in Dickensian London. There is real and hard-core desperation and fear around us. Cities trying to keep up appearances are even banning and arresting people for feeding the homeless now.

So what can you do?

If you are college educated, single, and don’t have any children, I would highly consider looking into teaching English in South Korea for awhile. These positions are still in high demand, pay adequately, and you are often provided with your own apartment for free as part of a deal sweetener. The internet speeds and pervasiveness of WiFi in South Korea are also kick-ass, and it's not a bad place to be a budding online entrepreneur as a side business.

If that's not an option, look into online entrepreneurship in general. If you can manage to earn (somehow, someway) $10,000 per year online, you can live and have the same quality of life in numerous other countries as you would in the United States earning $40,000 per year. Don't believe me? Look into places like Cochabamba, Bolivia where a decent apartment in a nice neighborhood can be yours for $250 per month!

If you have a trade, look and see if your skills are required in Australia, Germany, or Scandinavia someplace. It may surprise you as an American that a lot of these countries actually have higher wages, and a higher quality of life than the United States in general.

However, the saddest part is that we really shouldn't have to leave the United States. Weren't we all promised in our "everybody gets a trophy" little league sports huddle-ups that we could all be rockstars and multi-millionaires someday? You know, you can achieve anything if you just "put your mind to it" or some feel-good shit like that?

Then I was offered the red pill, and I came to the realization that we have been emotionally and spiritually hijacked all throughout our Cultural Marxist spoon-fed youths. That makes me very angry, and it should make you angry too. You can either watch it affect your life, or choose to do something about it.

Don't Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

John Carver
John Carver is a deplorable wandering Bard who likes to spread "fake news" (red pill truth) across cyberspace.

Why You Should See Every Day As Christmas

December 2, 2014 | by Denzel Bryant | Link | Original Link

When I was but a wee lad, my father would often say that “every day is Christmas” when the holiday season rolled around. In my youth, I did not understand what he meant. There were no daily presents, no Christmas specials being aired year-round, no tree that stayed up beyond New Year’s, and it was back to school once the two weeks of winter break were over. It was not until recently that I truly realized what my father meant, and how this principle applies to life.

Every Day is Special, and No Day is Special

Some people tell us to live each day as if it were our last. This conflicts with the sensible approach of planning for the future, but they do have a point. We never know when our time will come to leave this plane of existence, so while we are here, we should make the most of the time that we do have. Do not wait until the holidays or special days to show appreciation for your loved ones, but instead show appreciation through your daily actions.

This also applies to actions that we would take to show appreciation to ourselves. No, I am not saying to treat yourself to a decadent triple latte like some Sex and the City character or overweight feminist blogger, but I am encouraging you to build yourself daily. Why wait until New Year’s Day to make your resolutions when you know that you need to change your habits immediately?

Do not hesitate when it comes to taking actions that will improve your lot in life. Even if you do not perish, opportunities are not guaranteed to always be available, so they should be pounced upon whenever possible. Do not wait until a holiday to talk to that cute girl; talk to her now if you get the chance to. Do not get caught up in holiday sales that generally aren't good deals and waste your time in line; get what you need when you need it and can afford it.

Utilize Each Day to the Fullest

Yes, Christmas and other holidays are days off from work, but the work that you must do towards your own personal development does not stop when you clock out. Too many of us use these days to be slothful or engage only in leisure activities. Of course, it is great to enjoy yourself and to enjoy your time off, but the world will keep moving on, leaving you behind.

We should do something to improve ourselves each and every day that we are allotted. Holidays are some of the better days to develop ourselves, actually, since we do not have to worry about clocking in for our bosses. Instead, we can spend that extra hour at the gym (if it's closed, we can go for a run or do calisthenics), read a few chapters in a book, catch up on articles on various websites, and so on.

This is something that the advertisers and retailers know. Advertisements do not stop for the holidays; in fact, they ramp up. If businesses can do it, then why can't we? The grind never stops. Even when you are sleeping, your body is recuperating and repairing so that it can take on the next day. Just because it is Christmas, Kwanzaa, Golden Week, the Dragon Boat Festival, Fat Shaming Week, or even Christian Love Day doesn't mean that the world comes to a standstill, so we shouldn't either.

Holidays are Losing Their Luster

Okay, this probably isn't what my father meant, but it is something that I have been noticing. Maybe I have just become a humbug after becoming an adult, maybe it is a shift in cultural trends, or maybe it is a combination of these factors. But based on what I have been seeing, western holidays seem to have lost their meaning.

For most people that I know, holidays are just days where they don't have to go to work, or have to run around from store to store spending hours of their time and dipping into their savings to purchase decorations and gifts. This really hit home when I spent Christmas in Japan a few years back and noticed all of the Christmas decorations in a country where less than one percent of the population claims to adhere to the religion of Christianity.

Christmas these days is just another aspect of western culture that the Japanese people find "cool" to follow, I suppose, and another way for international companies to make more money. As a side note, it is also a great day to pick up in Japan.

No matter where we are or what set of holidays are celebrated in our countries, we should seek to develop ourselves constantly, show appreciation to the people in our lives that deserve it every day, not overindulge in consumerism or sloth, and not wait until designated special days to make necessary changes in our lives. Happy holidays to you and yours, and remember to stay on the grind.

Read More: The Holidays: Amateur Nights on Steroids

Denzel Bryant
Denzel is a semi-entrepreneur, semi-educator, and full-on Black Man with Yellow Fever. You can follow his poorly written musings at General Quarters

I Was Mugged And My White Privilege Was to Blame

December 3, 2014 | by Vincent Law | Link | Original Link

If you haven't heard of this story, I present it to you with little fanfare. I highly recommend reading the original article, and even subscribing to the Hoya if you want a daily does of rage.

This article has everything stereotypically associated with the liberal intelligentsia of the west in it. And it should make everyone reading this stop and shudder because these indoctrinated leftist clowns are graduating from school and coming soon to a workplace near you. Here's some juicy excerpts written by the kid who got mugged:

Example 1: White Guilt

> The millennial generation is taking over the reins of the world, and thus we are presented with a wonderful opportunity to right some of the wrongs of the past. As young people, we need to devote real energy to solving what are collective challenges. Until we do so, we should get comfortable with sporadic muggings and break-ins. I can hardly blame them. The cards are all in our hands, and we're not playing them.

Funny enough, he seems to make a case for "the white man's burden" in 21st century neo-liberal terms. Basically, "black people need our help because whites hold all the power, and until whites do something to help blacks, nothing will change." Of course, formally, SJWs would shudder at the thought of this neo-colonial mindset, and yet here it is, spelled out in black and white..

Example 2: Refusing to Account for Personal Responsibility

> Young people who willingly or unwillingly go down this road have been dealt a > bad hand. While speaking with a D.C. police officer after the incident, he explained that he too had come from difficult circumstances, and yet had made the decision not to get involved in crime. This is a very fair point — we all make decisions. Yet I've never had to decide whether or not to steal from people. We're all capable of good and bad, but it's a whole lot easier for me to choose good than it may be for them to.

What makes this funnier, is that talking with the DC police officer (I'm going to roll the dice and guess that he's black), he gets told that socio-economic factors are not enough to remove the agency of choice or willingness to commit violent crime. But of course, the young SJW just brushes it off and blames it on "the system." Which brings us to example 3:

Example 3: "Its the system, maaaan"

> When we play along with a system that fuels this kind of desperation, we can't be surprised when we're touched by it. Maybe these two kids are caught, and this recent crime wave dies down, but it will return because the demand is still there, and the supply is still here. We have a lot, and plenty of opportunities to make even more. They have very little, and few opportunities to make ends meet.

A lot of Ivy League and top-tier university kids DO get a leg-up in life. And when they graduate, they will belong to the ruling class of this country. They will assume the position of left-leaning intellectuals that are increasingly becoming a "liberal politburo" in front of which we have to clap harder and harder to not be labeled homophobes, racists, and sexists. Even if the parents of these kids are rich conservatives, college will make sure that their children will end up like the mugged student: shrieking termagants begging for annihilation from the Uruk-hai.

Rush Limbaugh chimes in:

(Disclaimer: I'm actually not a big fan of Rush, but he's spot on here)

> Is this not pathetic? This is little glimpse here into the minds of our indoctrinated youth. You know, it used to be said that a conservative is a liberal who's been mugged. Now, if you want to mug a liberal, you go right ahead because the correct reaction is love for the mugger, understanding of the economic plight of the mugger.

One has to wonder if the Christian ideals of turning the other cheek have not finally reached saturation point, and now permeate the consciousness of the millennial generation. If this is true, the irony is that most millennials reject Christianity for being too barbaric and backward, without realizing that as a generation they represent the culmination of thousands of years of Christian teaching in the west.

Whatever is going on, it is incredible. It seems that even an encounter with near death is not enough to change the belief of this SJW. Such fanaticism is usually reserved only for the extremist sects of most religions, and yet here we find it as well, only in its secular form. This leads us to conclude that progressivism is itself a cult, dedicated to its own message, divorced from reality and dependent on faith alone, with its own strange rituals and initiations that one must go through to join the church.

There is a ray of light in all of this I suppose. The feminists on campus decried the article on the grounds that it was “victim blaming” (Unfortunately many comments were removed, but not before your humble narrator picked out the juiciest ones). Deconstructing their logic is a difficult task to be sure, but I surmise that they realized the following: a woman placed in that situation should not be blamed, so I guess we can’t blame this male who got mugged either.

However, they then continued to agree that the fact that we are all white and privileged is a problem, and that systematized racism was the culprit behind the mugging. I guess both parties, the mugger and the muggee, were the victims. Well there you go, liberal double-think at its finest. And they said 1984 was a work of fiction.

Read More: 5 Signs The American Education System Is Doomed

Vincent Law
Vincent is just another immigrant from Mosk who has been trying all his life to become a fellow citizen. Check out his blog at atavisticintelligentsia.us

Freedom Of Speech Is Dying In Sweden

December 3, 2014 | by Johannes Joukahainen | Link | Original Link

Imagine driving one day in your beloved car and suddenly hitting a massive pothole. Distraught over the damage done to your car, you decide to complain to the local government about the condition of the road. Instead of acknowledging the complaint, cars with sirens on top arrive to take you away. You find yourself in a court that quickly sentences you to prison. This is a Kafkaesque nightmare far removed from reality, right?

Wrong. Just as George Orwell wrote that some animals are more equal than others, some groups are now more protected than others under new legislation that limits the freedom of speech in Sweden, which may prove to have a more Draconian effect on the already tightly controlled Swedish society.

The key difference in the freedom of speech or expression between the United States and Sweden (as well as many other European countries) is that in the US, regulation of the freedom of speech is very lax when compared to continental European legal systems. While the freedom of speech is not absolute in the United States' legal system, it is much closer to being almost completely unrestricted than in Europe. European legal systems generally have much tighter laws regarding "incitement to hatred" and "hate speech," to the extent that in recent years they have been used to silence dissenting opinions all across Europe.

The silencing of opposing views via legal norms is nowhere more obvious than in Sweden, where several laws have been passed to make it incredibly difficult, if not impossible, to legally argue against "special groups" within the society. A law passed in 2002 (2002:800) notably mentions that "expressing disrespect against groups of people with reference to race, color, national origin, ethnicity, confession of faith or sexual origin" can be sentenced to prison for a time of up to four years for inciting hatred.

The word "disrespect"("missaktning") is especially problematic, as the term fairly ambiguous. The law was most notably used to sentence a pastor (Åke Green) for comments against homosexuality during a sermon. The Supreme Court later overturned the conviction, as it did not comply with the European Convention of Human Rights, and hence the conviction would have most likely not have been upheld in the European Court.

But who will protect the Swedes from the special groups?

However, the conviction by the Swedish legal system shows a troubling trend. Swedish laws restricting the freedom of speech have become increasingly severe, to the extent that they deviate from the European Convention of Human Rights. Furthermore, a new addition has recently been drafted to make prosecution for the crime of "insult" easier when LGBT, government officials, and immigrant groups are in question. One of the critical changes is that no longer will "exceptional circumstances" be required for public prosecution if the aforementioned groups are in question.

The new law, which will take effect from the 1st of January 2015, is designed to target hatred on the Internet ("näthatare") especially. One of the key figures behind the law, Andreas Norlén described it as the sheriff returning to a previously lawless country.

It is still too early to see how the law will affect discussions on the Internet in Sweden; however, one could imagine it will make criticizing the protected groups very difficult, as the plaintiff has nothing to lose by hurling accusations, as the case will fall under public prosecution. Previously, if special circumstances were not present, public prosecution would not be available for the plaintiff. Furthermore, the plaintiff may have been ordered to pay the legal expenses of the defendant as well. By removing the threat of having to pay for baseless accusations, the new legislation is opening the door for a Draconian new standard of discussion on the Internet.

The tolerance of the Swedish society has become increasingly tested during recent years. For example, the chairman of the Swedish Democrats (SD) Jonas Andersson was assaulted due to his political affiliations with the anti-immigration party. Moreover, as 13% of Swedes voted for the SD in the last parliamentary election, it would appear that there is an increase in the desire for change within the Swedish society that is dividing the nation.

The reasons for the surge in demand for a change in immigration policy are easily traced to the growing problems of immigrants not integrating to Swedish society. The riots in Stockholm in 2013 by groups of mostly young immigrants are one example of the many issues immigration has brought to Sweden. The problems with immigrant-rich areas have become so widespread that the worldwide logistics company DB Schenker has stopped operating in Rinkeby, which is an area of Stockholm that is populated almost exclusively by immigrants.

Stockholm burning in 2013

In 2012 Sweden received over 100,000 new immigrants, and as more and more immigrants continue to flood into Sweden the existing problems will no doubt become increasingly visible. Therefore, it is only a matter of time until no amount of new laws will deter Swedes from finally facing up to the fact that their society is in grave peril.

As Swedish cities burn, it is only a matter time until the flame ignites the hearts of the Swedish people. After that point, no amount of legislation will put out the fire.

Read More: The Curious Case Of The Feminist Party In Sweden

Johannes Joukahainen
A rather anonymous Finn proud of his roots and ashamed of the current state of his Fatherland.

Was America Better Off Before Smart Phones, Text Messaging, And Social Media?

December 3, 2014 | by Edward Adams | Link | Original Link

"Things are in the saddle and ride mankind."

—Emerson

Smartphones, text messaging, and social media seem to consume more of our time each year, and are so much a part of everyday life that it is difficult to imagine living without them. They are so inescapable and ubiquitous that one might think that they are somehow necessary, and some very young people may even believe that, for all other people as for them, these things were always there, always a part of life, allowing a person to touch base, to keep up, and of course, to "like."

And yet they remain relatively recent cultural phenomena. I look back no farther than about ten years ago, when I was in my mid-twenties, and recall a very different world, and a very different social scene. Back in 2004 it was much more common for me to meet new people simply by talking with a stranger, at a bar, a cafe, or wherever. In 2014, this is much less common.

Social interaction is now frequently buffered by a machine. As a result, people become less interested in striking up random conversations, and more and more, they don't know how to. And so it happens that trying to share meaningful words with a human being I do not know is often a dull and flat experience. The interlocutor is inadequate. One comes away feeling stale, and even more bored and lonely, though deep down it's boredom and loneliness that drive people together after all.

There can be no doubt, to anyone of a certain age, that the art of carrying on a polite and intelligent adult conversation is regressing in America. This, of course, is part of our more general cultural breakdown. Just as people no longer know how to date, and just as honor and the belief that you should keep your word are antiquated things, so one of the most basic social skills—the ability to engage other people in a friendly, substantive way—is becoming outdated like VHS and Nintendo.

Technology reduces engagement with others

Why, then, are so many Americans—and millennials in particular—lacking in conversational skills? What is the problem when it comes to articulating what we think and feel? Perhaps it is that, in situations where previous generations interacted in person with fellow human beings, today people simply press buttons on a screen. This is cold, impersonal and isolating. Instead of nurturing development, it stunts development.

A machine places other people at least one level of removal away from us. The depth of our engagement will be limited by the nature of the medium. Now there's no tone or body language in a text message or an email. And the representations we get on social media are nowhere near as rich and revealing as those in real life, where nuanced perception enables us to see what people endeavor to conceal, and what, in some instances, they themselves are not even aware of.

Words and images, in any medium, are no substitute for people themselves; if most of your interactions with other people are in the form of text messages, as opposed to the natural context in which you see other people and hear their tone, then your conversational skills—and social skills generally—are bound to be inept.

The sense of what makes a life significant—what gives it meaning and a sense of forward drive—is marked by complex relationships. Navigating any one of those relationships—whether it's between two best friends, a parent and a child, longtime lovers, or whatever—requires the ability to empathize with others, to interpret not just their language, but also their tone, eye contact and gestures.

Of course, all this can only happen in the flesh, face to face. So, if you place a machine between people, a remove that deprives human interaction of its extraordinary richness and depth, then social retardation must be the inevitable result. This retardation may be a new phenomenon, but it has already had widespread pernicious effects. We have little idea of just how far recent technology will go in shaping human nature for the worst, but there is no doubt that it is doing so, nor is there any reason to think this trend will not go on apace.

A troubling increase in the transactionality of human interaction

Immanuel Kant taught that we should never value other people for merely utilitarian reasons; we must recognize their inherent dignity. Yet the truth is that human beings are naturally so self-interested that treating others as a means to our own ends appears to be our natural inclination. The hard conditioning of morality, occurring first in the family (always a complicated and, in some respects, fraught moral place), is needed for us to learn not to treat people like this.

But smart phones, texting and social media create huge obstacles for moral growth, in other words, to becoming a moral human being. For they allow us to deal with others only when its convenient. In fact, by their very nature, they seem to promote this. And more and more, there is effectively no difference between a person and the image of that person, or between a person and the sense of him one gets via text or email, both quite limited forms of language which lend themselves readily to misunderstanding.

We cannot overestimate the significance of this fact: that today, more and more, people are perceived and their value is determined in mediums in which they are not physically there. Hence our perception of and regard for them is bound to be quite limited. Who cares about other people's feelings when, for the most part, other people amount to nothing but texts, profiles and images? Hence today people flake, where in the past a person kept his word or promise simply because you're supposed to. The notion of being supposed to do something certainly was much more meaningful in only the recent past, when people as such were not filtered through technology.

If you are a keen student of human nature, then you are necessarily aware of how poor people are at understanding one another, so that a certain amount of solipsism is inevitable in every life. For all sorts of reasons, from differences of personal experience to differences of age, gender, and culture, we frequently misunderstand other people. We misperceive their intention, or attribute a false one to them, though of course we don't know that we do. That last clause is the most important one. For it isn't just that we are ignorant of others—of their intentions, motives, values, beliefs, fears, insecurities, and so much more—we are ignorant of our ignorance. We are unaware that we often don't get people right, and *vice vers*a.

Why we can no longer understand our fellow man

Meanwhile, smart phones, texting, and social media condemn us to lives of even more impenetrable solipsism. Human beings are remarkably complex creatures. We are set in motion by forces beyond our control, we are governed by forces over which we can have only limited control, and we consist of contradictions. Knowing what another human being is, how he came to be that way, what he wants or expects from you: essential knowledge such as this requires tremendous nuance, and it's only through interacting with others in person over and over again that we can transition from having the rudimentary social skills of childhood to those of a fully formed adult. Nor can this happen if friendship means social media profiles and our primary mode of communication is a medium which reduces language to its most impersonal form.

A young person sets out in life overflowing with phantasmal hopes and expectations. Time thwarts many of these, with the result that a mature adult is marked by at least some hard-won wisdom. But here too recent technology serves as an impediment. Smart phones and social media, it is true, give us access to countless people whom we would not engage otherwise. And that seems to be a good thing, on the face of it. But then we find that dating, for example, becomes a kind of buffet in which the goal is not to nurture oneself through a healthy and happy relationship, but to entertain the overwhelming abundance of options. Which great catch, out of your 500+ Tinder matches, shall realize your pursuit of happiness?

Alas, good team members, meaningful relationships are not so easy or superficial. If a person matters to us, then we are willing to compromise for them. We are willing to put up with them, to suffer with them. We do not act as if they no longer exist once an awkward moment arises. But this recent technology, because of how it affects human nature, lends itself wonderfully to that fantasy world—that utterly selfish and immoral one—where there are no awkward moments: in the face of them, you can simply go silent (flake), hit “unfriend,” or declare that you “aren’t going to settle” where a person of a previous generation would have been accountable for his behavior.

The price we pay here is immense. A culture where people are conditioned to avoid awkward encounters is also one where people no longer know how to develop satisfying relationships, where the hard work of being a good friend or husband, or a loyal employee or boss, is conveniently avoided. It is just then that all sorts of private addictions, obsessions, neurosis and other disorders of mind and body spring up, problems that were less common in the days when people actually knew how to develop meaningful relationships. Indeed, people are unhappy today because they don’t know how to live.

Finally, a culture where people are conditioned to avoid awkward encounters is also one where such encounters may seem “wrong,” or even “criminal.” Faced with a compliment from a man in whom she is not interested, a millennial woman may see herself as a “victim of harassment.” A generation before she might have said “thanks, but I’m not interested” and kept walking.

Of course, smart phones, social media and texting have their practical uses, and I have no interest in suggesting otherwise. It’s very convenient to be able to look up something on the web wherever I happen to be. Facebook allows me to keep in touch or reconnect with people in ways that a phone does not. If I am on the train and running late for a meeting, I can send someone a brief text, without having to disturb my fellow passengers. And so on.

Still, this recent technology also has many (and perhaps mostly unseen) bad effects. They reinforce, as we have seen, some of the worst aspects of human nature. And they cheapen the quality of human relationships, even as they provide us with a huge variety of people and interactions.

The poet Rainer Maria Rilke wrote that “The Machine endangers all we have made./ We allow it to rule instead of obey.” The poet’s insight seems even more apt now than when the lines were written. Technology should serve and enrich human life. Mere gadgets, however useful and convenient, should not blind us to the wonder of being alive. Nor should they keep us from trying to know and understand other people in non-superficial ways.

So spend less time with our time’s machines. Turn off your phone and log out of Facebook for a while. Do not let technology rule—make it obey. Let your friends be able to hear your voice and to see your eyes. Look around you. The world is uncanny, a strange mystery to face.

Read More: American Cultural Trends And The Future

Edward Adams
C.Contrary is a writer and scholar. His column runs on Wednesday and he can be reached at

Why Karate Is The Most Beta Martial Art

December 3, 2014 | by Gustav | Link | Original Link

When I was at school, Karate was by far the nerdiest “sport,” though even at the time I could understand its appeal to the pimply-faced, skinny-fat loser. It “teaches you to fight,” something every nerd is told to learn for their own safety. It is not a team sport, meaning there is not the competitive grading, team to beat every week, or physical requirements to perform a specific role. It is a parallel outlet, an anti-sport that ticks the co-curricular box but cultivates few, if any, of the virtues of other sports.

Replete with its own history, traditions and philosophy, eastern martial arts as practiced in the west is a scam. What with their air-punching pirouettes, bowing and scraping servile Orientalism, these “art-forms” bear little resemblance to any real physical combat. For westerners consumed by modernism, tapping in to a foreign tradition inevitably appeals to the outcasts, who don’t feel powerful or connected to their own history and martial culture.

I’ve always found something odd about white men who became eastern martial arts enthusiasts. It seemed they were play acting, that they were little boys that were allowed to put on a costume and learn their philosophy.

I understood wanting to learn how to fight, but the eastern religious message of emptiness, Tao, and relinquishing the “self” seemed so at-odds with the passionate, aggressive Teutonic Christianity that characterized my vision of the valiant knight, Roman legionnaire or champion. The servile, self-effacing submission seemed as foreign to my sense of strength, courage and manliness.

After much reflection on this, I have come to conclude that karate and similar eastern martial arts as practiced in the west have become exhibitionist LARPing for hand-flapping retards whose technique and methods are of little use in a real fight.

How could this be tested? Find examples of fighting without all the rules: MMA. Pure karate (or any narrow other code) is hopeless in these scenarios. Over the last few decades, codifying rules, points systems, and insurance regulation has repurposed these styles from skills used in actual hand-to-hand military combat to Chinese fighting-yoga. Here’s what a pure karate bout looks like:

While some of these girls exhibit some impressive flexibility and vocal range, what is inspired in me wouldn’t accurately be described as fear. Perfectly choreographed, pure Karate is to fighting what WWF is to wrestling, minus the fold-up chairs, big-titted blondes, and multi-color spandex outfits.

Any time I have spoken to someone who teaches or practices Karate, they give the same excuses as to why their students don’t engage in contact or win MMA competitions. As a defense, they claim that their “punches could kill” so they don’t do them because its unethical. Could their kiddy punches “kill” Wladimir Klitschko? What a joke.

When asked why don’t they clean up in mixed styles with multimillion dollar prizes and contracts, they use the safe defense of “this is an art,” or “it’s not for money or fame or glory,” despite the inordinate amount of purist snobbery and rivalry within and between codes and styles. McDojos abound, yet they hide from any objective standard of combat effectiveness by the false moral high ground of their token eastern “philosophy.”

“Someone with only a year of training in boxing and wrestling could easily defeat a martial artist of twenty years experience.”
–Bruce Lee

The truth is that boxing and wrestling are the two most useful skills to learn in a real life situation. What makes mixed styles realistic is that when a fight goes to the ground, if you are weak and don’t know how to grapple, it’s game over. As soon as an Asian martial artist gets too close or too far, they have no more skills in their set and skull crushing ensues.

If you want to practice discipline, co-ordination, and stretching exercises, then Karate may be for you. I’ve heard of great health benefits from Tai Chi, a slowed-down version of Karate which is a series of stretching and balance exercises for the elderly. Just don’t think that you are learning to fight or be a warrior. It could be very dangerous for you to assume your techniques can protect you from a brawling thug. For everyone else who wants to learn to fight, stay away from the dojo. Learn boxing, wrestling, or a mixed style like Krav-Maga.

Read More: Where Beta Males Are Polished To Perfection

Gustav

Not Even The Supreme Court Can Stop #GamerGate Now

December 4, 2014 | by Derek Baroni | Link | Original Link

While so far GamerGate hasn't achieved any dramatic victories, it certainly did manage to thoroughly dismantle the mainstream narrative and perception of gamers as "misogynist, neckbeard basement dwellers." This happened through a series of small battles, fought via Twitter and other social networks on a daily basis. Every time there was an attack on GamerGate, either with feeble hashtags or pathetic parodies, GamerGate supporters responded promptly and curbstomped the SJWs.

"Don't sealion me, bro"

There have been numerous attempts to label GamerGate supporters as online terrorists who harass and verbally abuse poor SJWs that dare to criticize their culture. The case is actually quite the opposite. GamerGaters have been nothing but patient, calm, and collected when dealing with such hysteric harpies as Leigh Alexander. Of course, these virtues are flaws in the eyes of SJWs, as you are about to see.

One example of a failed SJW reaction was when a certain David Malki drew a comic which brought us the wonderful term "sealioning."

Note the text spoken by the sea lion. This is the type of behavior that SJWs see as an insult in itself. But what do sea lions have to do with GamerGate, SJWs, video games or anything at all? Why sea lions? Nobody knows and trying to delve into the mind of a SJW is a dangerous journey. Sealioning apparently means being immovably polite and respectful in dealing with SJWs to the point that they cannot muster the strength to play the victim card at all.

In any case, the retaliation to that comic by GamerGaters was swift and brutal. It consisted of funding an actual WWF sea lion (christened “Ethics”) and its habitat (christened “Games Journalism”) with $5,000. In the end, every GamerGater can claim it is about “ethics in games journalism.”

Stop weaponizing charity, GamerGate!

Beastiality fantasies

Combine “sealioning” with “dogpiling” and you can get potentially the most retarded sentences in the history of English language. For SJWs, however, those two words represent very real and frightening possibilities and they utter them with complete seriousness. When one of their ilk posts a hateful, slandering article on GamerGate, they risk being challenged, asked for sources or to clarify their position (sealioning) en masse (dogpiling). Because these challengers can be minorities, transsexual, gay or handicapped, SJWs can no longer resort to cries of “patriarchy!” to dismiss them summarily.

The above comic also shows succinctly how SJWs think and operate. SJWs will publicly criticize, demean, shame and blame anyone and anything but nobody can dare criticize them, no matter how politely. Responding in kind to SJWs’ hate speeches can and probably will end up with critic being the one called a harasser or a stalker. These labels would mean nothing if it weren’t for their massive network of allies on blogs and in mainstream press, ready to smear people’s names and ruin their careers. There is also the latest push to criminalize “hate speech” over the internet, coming from none other than the Supreme Court of the United States.

Skeletons in my newsfeed

In 2010, a certain Anthony Douglas Elonis was sentenced to 44 months in jail for making threats to his wife over Facebook. Of course, nobody considered that the cause of these threats might have something to do with her running away with their two children prior to that. And, as we all know, there is no reason to hit a woman. Anthony ended up serving three years for his Facebook posts, but the interesting part is that the Supreme Court ended up discussing when an online threat is credible.

In short, a credible threat involves "a reasonable person thinking that the threat is real." But how do you apply this same standard to the Internet? Reasonable person? Thinking? Online? Also, while making threats in real life means risking a punch to the face, when online everyone gets the aptly named "digital courage." Everyone is a keyboard Rambo and social networks are specifically designed to make creating and sharing content as easy as possible. It was also noted by the judges that the same "threat is real" standard that was applied in Anthony's case could be applied to any of Eminem's lyrics, meaning that any teenager quoting Eminem on Facebook could end up in trouble.

The problem is that nobody discussed the line after which online threats become criminal. Should there be such a line? Aren't we supposed to be judged by our actions and not our words? Supreme Court judges are also hilariously out of touch with online culture of smack talking, which is especially vibrant in video games. Are they even capable of making such a ruling?

The US government is pushing for the standard for an online threat to be changed to "someone to be reasonably put into fear," meaning that causing bad feelings and angst could actually become illegal. If that does become a federal law, trolls will have a field day and go an extra mile just to cause epic butthurt.

You can thank gamers

Finally, we come back to GamerGate. While there have been certain homebrew efforts to block GamerGate supporters, they all failed spectacularly. But what happens if causing fear online does become a criminal activity? What if Twitter or Facebook decide to help the government and preemptively ban "hateful speech," including any mention of GamerGate? The most likely outcome is that the Supreme Court makes a small concession to the SJWs and thus continues the slow decline of the freedom of speech in the US.

GamerGate has been called dead hundreds of times over the last three months, but it simply refuses to die. It's as if GamerGate supporters are actual, passionate people who want higher standards in journalism. Over time, GamerGate supporters uncovered massive corruption in the gaming press, uprooting SJW tentacles buried deep in our society. More fun revelations are sure to come. Stay tuned.

Read More: Geordie Tait's Epic Meltdown Shows Who #GamerGate Is Up Against

Derek Baroni

Derek Baroni is the world's leading expert in creating pretentious profile summaries

Happy Birthday Jay Z, Red Pill Rapper

December 4, 2014 | by Troy Francis | Link | Original Link

It is a familiar trope in the manosphere that rappers are “red pill,” but this is rarely explored in any detail. Today, December 4th 2014, is Jay Z’s forty-fifth birthday, so by way of tribute I will examine the lyrics to several of his songs most pertinent to our concerns here at ROK – those concerning relations between the genders that often hit on truths rarely explored in mainstream music.

I know from having posted tracks here before that opinion is divided on rap music. I myself come at it as an outsider to the genre, as someone who is primarily a fan of alternative rock or electronica, with a particular leaning towards great lyricists who tell a story in their songs – everyone from Nick Cave to Jacques Brel to Morrissey to Depeche Mode to Sinatra.

But of course, rap music is by its very nature intimately concerned with lyrics, given that the artist’s verbal facility is front and centre of any recording. This has led to a number of great storytelling MCs, foremost of whom, in my estimation, are Eminem, Tupac, Nas, Ghostface Killah, Talib Kweli and Pusha T. But none of these are able to communicate the whole span of human experience as effectively as Jay Z, whose songs are by turn comic, violent, sexy, sad and tragic.

Whether Jay Z is actually – as he has claimed many times – the “best rapper alive,” and whether he is the most “red pill” is of course open to debate. But I believe there is a good case to be made on both counts, and indeed, one quality feeds into the other – because Jay Z is one of the most skilled MCs ever to have picked up a mike, he is better equipped than most to articulate the intricacies of human relations. Those who doubt his ability, perhaps just having heard the singles or his guest spots on other artist’s songs, like Beyonce’s “Crazy in Love,” should seek out album tracks like “Where I’m From” from the 1997 album In My Lifetime, Vol. 1:

> I'm from the place where the church is the flakiest,
> And n*ggas is praying to God so long that they atheist,
> Where you can't put your vest away and say you'll wear it tomorrow
> Cause the day after we'll be saying,
> "Damn, I was just with him yesterday."

Note the dexterity with which the lyric reveals the murderous reality of life on the streets around the Marcy housing project in Brooklyn. There are those (including Nas, on the diss-track "Ether") who claim that Jay was bested by Eminem when they duetted on "Renegade" for the former's Blueprint album. While Em's verses are undeniably shiny and slippery as mercury, Jay reaches an emotional pitch inaccessible to Em in lines like this:

> Do not step to me, I'm awkward, I box lefty
> An orphan, my pops left me, and often my momma wasn't home
> Could not stress to me I wasn't grown, especially on nights
> I brought something home to quiet the stomach rumbling
> My demeanor, thirty years my senior
> My childhood didn't mean much, only raising green up
> Raising my fingers to critics
> Raising my head to the sky –
> "B.I.G. I did it, multi before I die!"

Stick 2 The Script

The central narrative to Jay Z's work is the struggle – the tornado of energy and determination which took him from poverty on the streets of Brooklyn to becoming a music mogul worth over $500M. As you might expect, a man who has successfully accomplished such a monumental life change has nothing if not a piercing acumen for decoding intimate and social relations, as well as an iron will in avoiding falling into the traps that derail lesser (beta) men. In the hook of “Stick 2 The Script” from 2000’s The Dynasty: Roc La Familia album, Jay counsels:

> Money over bitches n*gga, stick to the script
> We cop, we flip, we re-up; get back on our shift.

In other words, a man should not allow a woman to distract him from his primary purpose of attending to his business (in this case drug dealing) and making money. Jay elaborates further in the verse:

> When I’m skating through the city and I stop and kick it
> Be the most asked question – how I got them digits?
> I say I stay on my grind, never stop for bitches

This, even though he has “fuck[ed] the most hoes out of New York State.” The message is clear – the successful man is free to enjoy the company of women, but at no point should he allow them to take over his life to the detriment of his ambition. Love them and leave them, in other words – or “pump and dump” in manosphere-speak.

Big Pimpin’

This theme is expanded on in Jay’s 2001 hit “Big Pimpin” (a song he later disowned for its misogyny, perhaps because of his impending marriage to Beyonce, although he continues to play it in live concerts). The first few lines straightforwardly present the alpha mindset of the industrially-successful player:

> You know I, thug em, fuck em, love em, leave em
> Cause I don’t fucking need em,
> Take em out the hood, keep em looking good
> But I don’t fucking feed em
> First time they fuss I’m breezing
> I’m a pimp in every sense of the word, bitch
> Better trust and believe it
> In the cut where I keep em
> Till I need a nut, til I need to beat the guts
> Then it’s “beep beep” and I’m picking them up
> Let em play with the dick in the truck
> Many chicks wanna put Jigga’s fists in cuffs
> Divorce him and split his bucks
> Just because you got good head, I’mma break bread
> So you can be living it up?!

> Shit, I part with nothing, ya'll be fronting
> Me give my heart to a woman?
> Not for nothing, never happen
> I'll be forever macking
> Heart cold as assasin's, I got no passion, I got no patience
> And I hate waiting, ho get your ass in and let's ride.

I quote at length because this passage mirrors many of the preoccupations of the manosphere. Jay the successful "pimp" or player maintains zero emotional investment in the women he meets, using them only for sex. He will tolerate no nonsense, dumping them unceremoniously at the first sign of "fuss." He maintains fuck-buddy relations with them, calling them only when he needs "a nut."

While, as a rich man, he doesn't mind spending a little money to "keep them looking good," he resists the "many chicks" who want to "put [his] fists in cuffs" – that is, marry him – then divorce him, taking half his cash. Why, he argues, should he part with the fortune he has built up just because a woman happens to be skilled at fellatio? Why indeed. Jay will not fall into the provider role.

By the way, that Jay Z ended up marrying Beyonce in real life is the subject for another article – and given the persistent rumors of infidelity, who really knows the truth about that relationship? Here I'm more concerned with the fictional persona that Jay presents in his lyrics. It is the downfall of many men that they end up buying the cow because they enjoy the milk, or supporting women financially simply because they were initially sexually attracted to them.

The suspicion that woman are frequently financially-motivated in a persistent theme in Jigga's work, and must, we assume, be borne out in the real-life experience of a young man who achieved great fame and riches quickly. In 1998's "Can I Get A…" he writes:

> Can I hit it in the mornin' without giving you half of my dough
> And even worse if I was broke would you want me?
> If I couldn't get you finer things like all of them diamond rings
> Bitches kill for – would you still roll?

The pecuniary motivation the young Jay identifies in the women who surround him pushes him further into his cold, self-created alpha role as one who acts solely for himself, lacking all "passion" and "patience."

Is That Yo Bitch?

But his concerns extend beyond mere materialism, and into female hypergamy. Take "Is That Yo Bitch," recorded with Missy Elliot, from his 1999 album Vol. 3… Life and Times of S. Carter. To a dark backing track, Jay casts himself as a protagonist having an affair with another man's wife, in what must be one of his most thrilling recorded displays of verbal virtuosity. In essence, the song is a direct refutation of the blue pill constructs of monogamy and “provider game.”

> Don’t get mad at me
> I don’t love ’em I fuck ’em
> I don’t chase ’em I duck ’em
> I replace ’em with another one

Addressing the woman’s [beta] husband, the lyrics assert that, even though they may be married, his wife is not “his bitch” – that is, she is not allied to him in any meaningful sense beyond the merely legal, given that Jay is fucking her – the lyric “wedding bells won’t make it rosy, man” recalling Rollo’s observation that marriage does not exempt a man from the sexual marketplace.

Jay describes how he treats the woman coldly: “I never kiss her, I never hold her hand / I diss her, I’m a bolder man,” without any of the affection and financial support presumably forthcoming from the husband, and yet, turned on by his alpha, “pimp” demeanour, she rewards him sexually –

> Why you home alone, why she out with me?
> Room 112, hotel balcony
> How she say “Jay you can call the house for me?”
> There’s no respect at all
> You betta check her dawg
> She keep beggin’ me to hit it raw
> So she can have my kids and say it was yours
> How foul is she? And you wifed her
> Shit, I put the rubber on tighter
> Sent her home, when she entered home
> You hugged her up
> What the fuck is up?
> She got you whipped, got your kids
> Got your home, but that’s not your bitch
> You share that girl, don’t let ‘em hear that, he’ll hurl
> It’ll make ‘em sick that his favorite chick
> Ain’t saving it, unfaithful bitch

This passage articulates the worst fear of men everywhere – that the woman they love will be impregnated by another guy and they will be forced to support the child. Worse still, in this instance the offense is deliberate, with the errant wife “beggin’ Jay to ‘hit it raw.'” To his dubious credit, Jay (or rather the narrator) puts “the rubber on tighter” before sending her home, where her husband greets her affectionately ("you hugged her up").

Rightly, Jay sounds incredulous ("What the fuck is up?") – both that the husband is unaware what is going on, and that the wife "ain't saving it" – although like all alpha predators, this doesn't stop him from taking advantage of the situation. And as he suggests, if the tables were turned, it's likely the husband would do the same to him ("You would fuck mine").

"Is That Yo Bitch" is typical of the "misogyny" identified in the rap genre by many feminist commentators. But is the scenario the song describes atypical? Sperm Wars, Robin Baker's 1996 study in evolutionary biology, famously posited that 10% of children have a biological father who is other than the man married to their mother: that is, that woman, programmed to seek the sperm of the highest status males possible to ensure good genes for their offspring, are often not above cheating on their (beta) husbands and then lying about it. So "She keep beggin' me to hit it raw / So she can have my kids and say it was yours" rings with a truth that many men – and women – would rather not hear.

One might argue that it is the narrator's behavior that is reprehensible, but here blame is apportioned to the wife – after all, it was she that was breaking her commitment to her partner. As Jay says, "How the hell can you knock that? / I'm just playing the cards chosen." As a man, Jay is merely following his biological programming in sleeping with a willing young woman with whom he could in theory procreate, while the woman is exercising her hypergamy in seeking out his alpha seed.

Meet The Parents

A further examination of hypergamy and its consequences in the impoverished African-American community in Brooklyn is undertaken in Meet the Parents from 2002's Blueprint 2: The Gift & The Curse album. Arguably Jay Z's greatest song, it showcases his masterful storytelling technique to the fullest, opening with lines that are particularly poignant given recent events in Ferguson and NYC:

> At the end of every young black life is this line
>
> "Damn, him already?"

The song starts with the funeral of a young man, son of Isis, who was raised by his mother after his father ran out on them:

> Mama ain't strong enough to raise no boy
>
> What's his father's name?
>
> Shorty never knew him, though he had his blood in him.
>
> Hot temper, mama said she act just like her husband
>
> Daddy never f*cked with him, so the streets raised him
>
> Isis blaming herself, she wish she could have saved him

> Damn near impossible, only men can raise men.

How did Isis come to be raising her son on her own? Because she chose an unsuitable, bad boy partner who got her pregnant with no intention of hanging around to pick up the bill afterwards. Jay describes her visceral attraction to this alpha here:

> He wasn't really her husband, though he called her wife
> It was just this night when the moon was full
> And the stars were just right, and her dress was real tight
> And it sounded like "Lisa Lisa, I wonder if I'll take you home?"
> "Will you still love me after this night?"
> Mike was the hardhead from around the way
> That she wanted all her life, shit, she wanted all the hype
> Used to hold on tight when he wheelied on the bike
> He was a willie all her life, he wasn't really the one to like
> It was a dude named Sha who would really treat her right
> He wanted to run to the country to escape the city life
> But Isis liked this Broadway life
> But she loved the Gucci sneakers, the red green and white
> Hangin' out the window when she first seen him fight
> She was so turned on that she had to shower twice.

The one to "really like" was Sha, a nice guy who wanted to take Isis out of the ghetto for a good life in the country. But Isis loves not only the bling that Mike and the big city represents – the Gucci sneakers and Broadway – but also his tough-guy machismo. Is there a greater encapsulation of the power of alpha over women than Jay's extraordinary poetic image of Isis having to "shower twice," so sexually aroused is she watching Mike fight? In these few lines Jay artfully contrasts provider game with masculine bad boy don't-give-a-shit energy and finds the former sadly lacking.

Of course, Mike runs out on Isis after the baby is born – as a streetwise tough he is well aware of the nature of women and is naturally uncertain that he is the child's true father:

> If that was my son he would look much different
> See I'm light-skinned and that baby there's dark
> So it's mama's baby – papa's *maybe

Estranged for fourteen years, the song reaches its Shakespearean conclusion when the son – now a hoodlum himself, having lacked a strong father figure – runs into Mike on the street and an altercation ensues. They both pull their guns but the son pauses, recognizing something in the older man's face:

> He clearly had the drop but the boy just paused (hold up)

> There was something in this man's face he knew he'd seen before
> It's like looking in the mirror, seein' himself more mature

Then, tragically, the Mike fires:

> Six shots into his kin, out of the gun
> N*gga be a father, you're killing your son
> Six shots into his kin out of the gun
> N*ggas be a father, you're killing your sons
> Meet the parents

In making "sons" plural in the penultimate line, Jay pulls back from the narrative to address absconding fathers generally. But women are indicted equally – had Isis chosen the more suitable Sha as a partner, rather than following her instinctual animal attraction for Mike, then perhaps her son would have been raised properly and would still be alive. And it is precisely his awareness of the realities of female hypergamy that prompted Mike to walk out on his son in the first place.

SJWs

I think we can safely assume that Jay Z does not spend his days scrolling through manosphere blogs—and of course, most of the tracks referenced here pre-date it—but this makes his work all the more compelling, in that his deep understanding of female behavior and its consequences is authentic and was hard-won on his journey from the streets to the ROK boardroom. His work proffers a tough, cynical, and unvarnished understanding of relationships between men and women to a huge audience – the type of insight that is sorely lacking in most mainstream culture outside of rap music.

Were Jay Z to be starting out today, in the current cultural climate with its SJWs and Twitter witchhunts, I wonder whether he would be allowed a voice at all? Could a song like "Big Pimpin" be a hit single in 2014? I doubt it. As we know, the push now is to eradicate anything that doesn't cohere with the solipsistic views of the social media masses, talentless but angry, and hungry to suffocate anything that offends even slightly.

But to have denied Jay Z a career would have been to have silenced one of the most talented artists of our age, the creator of iconic tracks such as "Empire State of Mind," "Hard Knock Life" and "99 Problems." Thankfully though, Hova came up in a more tolerant, less censorious age, where a plurality of opinions and their expression was still tolerated. In a world where bland rap stars like Drake now rule the roost, Jay has retained his edge, with powerful tracks on 2013's Magna Carter, Holy Grail. Happy Birthday, Jay – can't wait for the next album.

To find out how to attract beautiful women like a rap star, click here

Read More: Has Russell Brand Lost The Message?

Troy Francis

Troy is a game veteran of a decade's standing, and a lover of women, literature, travel and freedom. He is also the author of The Seven Laws of Seduction. Visit his website at Troy Francis.

Unwed Mothers Should Give Their Children Up For Adoption

December 4, 2014 | by Blair Naso | Link | Original Link

Sometimes at ROK, we publish satirical pieces designed to direct attention to deeper issues. Leftists refer to them as troll pieces, but I think that just shows their own willful ignorance. We are not merely trying to gain attention to cure ourselves of boredom; we are trying to change the world. Many articles are tongue-in-cheek, and in fairness, sometimes that can be difficult for the reader to discern. Therefore, in the interest of clear communication, allow me to state that this article is not satirical, trolling, or a joke.

A woman who gives birth without a husband or live-in partner and chooses to raise the child is only acting in her own best interest. It is one thing if she gets divorced when her kids are a few years old. Since they've already begun to develop, one could argue that it's best not to separate the child from the parent. But when your child is born, if you are an unwed mother, then the only morally defensible thing to do is to give the child up for adoption.

Dickensian orphanages no longer exist in America. The Catholic nun is a Hollywood myth from a former time. There is a huge surplus of financially stable but infertile couples who wait years to adopt a single child, and many of them are never able to. Mr. and Mrs. Smith can do a far better job raising your offspring that a daycare can. It's an open secret how poorly-developed the American childcare industry is. If you want any hard evidence that women should seek to be housewives, read that article in the last sentence.

Unwed Mothers Are Unable To Mother

But what if the mother is financially well-off and can afford good childcare? After all, that article argues for higher quality daycare instead of gross reduction. Or what if she has a strong support system with her parents? Doesn't matter. Maybe a boy or girl can develop well without a mother, but he or she will be damaged for life without a father constantly around. There are people who were raised without a father who did well for themselves, but this is in spite of their unnatural family structure and not because of it.

A boy needs a father to teach him to be a man, and a girl needs a father to make her feel protected. Everyone in society has a different definition of "a real man," but notice how everyone still has a concept of it. You rarely hear people use the term "a real woman." So does a girl need a mother to teach her to be a real woman if we have no concept of real womanhood? What does a mother offer to a girl that can't be given by a man? The leftist reader is drawing a blank, because as soon as he answers that question, he will admit that there is an innate and hence obligatory gender role for women. How much more worthless is an unwed mother to a boy!

One could claim that a mother can provide a sense of protection and provision for both boys and girls, but again, that can much more naturally be provided by a father by virtue of his outer physiology. Small kids aren't intelligent, and your high-paying job or MBA won't impress them when the monsters under the bed try to attack them, to use a kindhearted example. They haven't been socialized yet, and so they still have the animal mindset that might is right. So no, children cannot be properly mothered without the context of being fathered.

What about grandpa? Doesn't he provide a father figure if the mother lives with her parents? It is still not the same, because he will be subject to the mother in every circumstance involving the child. Grandpa is ultimately employed as mommy's nanny. The child still does not have a true father figure. If the mother wants to give up the child to be adopted by the grandparents, then wonderful. But under no circumstances in modern America should an unwed mother keep custody of her infant.

Be A Hero

Why then would an unwed mother keep custody of a newborn infant? Because she can't imagine herself living without the child. My father made the same argument when he knocked up his mistress in an extramarital affair and decided to break up my family to marry her. The reader may scream that a parent is entitled to his child, but that only confirms the self-centeredness element. Who else is benefitted beside yourself? If you know that your infant will be far better off with another couple (especially if you are already in poverty), then why will you not do what is in the best interest of your child?

Furthermore, couples seeking to adopt are so desperate that they are often willing to negotiate an open adoption, meaning that you the biological parent can still interact with your child! You do not have to be completely out of the picture. Instead, you are making an adult decision about your incapacities. This way you can both be involved with your offspring and have the child develop into a functional human being. Everybody wins in an open adoption.

"But it's still so difficult for a woman to give up custody!" screams the reader. Then be heroic. You want to be “an American hero”? You want to do something selfless and earn your good person membership card? Do what’s in the best interest of your child and send him or her to be with someone else. But do not use your infant as a security blanket. The love of such a woman is a selfish and cheap love. It is not love but at best mere deep affection.

“Women should be able to do what they want!” is the next argument. That just shows what an objectively terrible person you are. The difference between being a child and being an adult is the difference between choosing your wants and choosing your shoulds. And just so the on-the-fence reader doesn’t accuse me of misogyny, I’ll say that is true for both sexes.

People shame the modern man-child Peter Pan for good reason, but they never consider that what drives a 28-year-old man to live in his parents’ basement instead of enrolling in vocational school is the same thing that drives a career woman to pursue her dreams of cubicle serfdom and martini brunches. Both involve doing what they want, and the difference between those wants is only incidental.

Damaged Goods

One could argue that the child will naturally be better off with his biological parents than with adopted parents. Perhaps that is normally true, but the detriment caused to the child will be far worse with Jane Slut than with Mr. and Mrs. Smith. Actually, I’m willing to be fair and say that not all unwed pregnant women are sluts. Maybe your husband died in a car accident when you were eight-months pregnant. Still it doesn’t matter.

A generation ago, Chuck Palahniuk wrote in Fight Club, “We are a generation of men raised by women.” This feeling of loss causes the men in the book to drop out of society and pursue anarchy and nihilism. Although the actions are somewhat of an exaggeration, the sentiment of loss is much the ubiquitous state of the modern male, and this quote is as easily applicable a generation later. It’s ironic that early feminism fought for prohibition, since today it causes liquor sales to soar.

If my parents had not divorced, I never would have developed the emotional baggage that drives me to write, especially for a site like this. Read my work and try imagining it written by a happy, stable model citizen. This article is a product of a career mother and an androgynous father. They separated when I was six, and I can’t fathom how much more antisocial I would have become had they divorced during those crucially developmental first five years. So, feminists, if you don’t want your children to grow up to write for Return of Kings, then either stand by your man or release your infant to more qualified candidates.

Read More: American Children Are The Prisoners Of Women

Blair Naso
was destined to be a god of the Manosphere, but instead he gave up his swan song and died. However, you can still read his blog's archives and buy his poetry books.

Why We Must Fight, Shame, and Boycott Cowardly Men

December 4, 2014 | by Bruce Tanner | Link | Original Link

"In the Soviet army it takes more courage to retreat than advance." – Joseph Stalin

I thought about these words as I watched Daniel O'Reilly, whose comedy stage name is Dapper Laughs, solemnly apologize before a browbeating Emily Maitlis on Newsnight after his show had been cancelled by ITV due to feminist pressure.

I also thought back to the events in recent weeks, including:

1. Julien Blanc's Australian visa being revoked, his visa for the U.K. being denied, his apology on CNN, and RSD's all-around pathetic PR response to the situation.

2. Matt Taylor breaking down and apologising for a shirt he wore while doing media for the Rosetta comet landing

Joseph Stalin's earlier words were in reference to Order 227, a brutal but necessary order that contained the line, "Not One Step Back!" which became a slogan of Soviet resistance during the fight against Germany in WWII. The order was made because ill-disciplined Soviet troops kept retreating and deserting without putting up a fight.

Order 227 dictated that no commander had the right to retreat without an order. It called for the creation of penal battalions where poorly disciplined men were sent. These penal battallions were put at the front lines and often ordered to clear minefields by running through them on foot. The order also called for blocking units, whose job it was to shoot any soldiers attempting to retreat without an order to do so.

So what does a brutal measure like Order 227 have to do with these recent events?

Simple. Every time a man gets on TV and apologises for that which owes no apology, he emboldens and encourages Social Justice Warriors (SJWs) to attack more men. If these injustices are ever going to stop, men pressured to apologize by feminist SJWs must fear the backlash from red pill men more than the media frenzy from SJWs. In some instances this may result in a few men becoming double victims. This is regrettable but necessary.

Here's why…

Because, the real enemy of men today isn't a feminist woman. It's the cowardly male that sells us out

It's the politician who signs in a law like "Yes Means Yes," which turns every Californian male into a potential criminal at the whim of a woman.

It's the comedian who apologises for a rape joke said in jest on stage.

It's the corporate suit who kneels to feminist hysteria and propaganda by pulling advertising dollars, censoring speech through the closure of accounts, and firing male employees and thereby endangering their future for such heinous crimes as telling a joke or having an opinion.

Men's basic legal and working rights are suffering death by a thousand cuts on what is now a daily basis.

For that reason, we can no longer excuse men who apologise to the feminist mob in an attempt to save themselves, while repeatedly dooming their fellow man

In addition, there is no longer any reason for a man to act ignorant of the threats posed by feminism and SJWs just so he can excuse his inaction and cowardice. The issues are now staring him in the face every time he turns on the TV, checks the news, or browses through his social media feeds.

We can no longer sit back, feign disgust and shrug our shoulders at “those crazy feminists,” then pretend like there’s nothing we can do, and head off to work for the day. If we’re going to stop the rot, we have to be ruthless with the four sources of power that enable SJWs to hurt us most. This means publicly outing, shaming, and besmirching the reputation of the following types of men:

• Corporate executives that bow to feminist pressure

• Politicians and public officials that placate feminists at the expense of men’s rights

• Entertainers that apologize for doing their jobs, thereby encouraging further censorship

• Journalists who lie, distort, and destroy the reputation of men so they can garner more money and fame by appealing to the feminazi mob that will inflate their page views and shares

The inverse of this should also be paid attention to. That means supporting in any way possible the corporate executives, politicians, entertainers, and journalists that don’t bow to feminazi pressure. So how can you best be of service? Here are five ways:

1. Inform

If you have any honest and concrete information that would be useful in discrediting one of those four sources of feminazi power, disseminate it through an email to a writer, write about it yourself, or post it to a forum where other members can assist you in getting the word out. Don’t sit on it.

Every time the feminazi mob gets up in arms about an issue, which is almost every week, they are ruthless about encouraging informants to come forward and even offering financial incentives to do so. Don’t expect that from our side. Inform from a pure heart and a desire to maintain your freedom and the freedom of others.

2. Participate in boycotts and be vocal

Any time one of those four sources of power kowtows to the SJW mob, we need to be heard just as loudly, both with voices and money.

3. Single out and shame away

Shaming a faceless corporation or group has no power. Single out the men responsible for bowing to a feminazi mob, and let them know their actions toward their fellow man has negative social consequences.

Tech entrepreneur Jason Calacanis perfectly demonstrating the techniques of soliciting for informants, and singling out and shaming in the SJW's war against Gurbaksh Chahal and RadiumOne

4. Write

The more people that write about these issues, the more men will not only learn about them, but also realize that they are not in a powerless minority, but rather a powerful majority. Do not worry about competition or divvying up a small pie. Focus on growing the pie. The SJW mob has thousands upon thousands of tumblrs, Blogger blogs, Facebook groups, and media outlets that all work together. We can do the same.

5. Comment, link, and share wherever you feel compelled to do so

Every time you hold back from posting a link, sharing an article, or posting a comment about a men's issue you care about, you are robbing yourself of your voice as well as the voice of other men.

By doing these 5 things you give men with power more than one choice

When men face a SJW mob and the media frenzy that surrounds it, they should be faced with two choices instead of just one. They can stand and fight with us. Or, they can bow to the enemy and feel our wrath. It's about time that the men standing in the middle of these two choices heard the phrase…

"Don't fear the enemy. Fear your own."

Don't Miss Future Articles Like This: Follow Us On Twitter

Bruce Tanner

Bruce is a former welfare recipient, 3-time college dropout, and deadbeat insurance worker now turned writer and entrepreneur. When not earnestly staring at spreadsheets, or ripping his hair out over a first draft, he spends his time weightlifting, studying philosophy, and traveling.

How Wolves And Foxes Showed The Soviets The Necessity Of Masculinity

December 4, 2014 | by raywolf | Link | Original Link

There weren't many positive attributes of the Soviet Union—in fact, just about the only one was their science program. Although most of it was inspired by military needs, there were quite a bit of spillover discoveries. The sprawling state machinery, although inefficient to run a nation, was able to allocate stupid amounts of time, money, and resources to backwater projects that would never get a green light in the west.

Back in the 50s the Soviets tried to tame and develop wolves into domestic animals they could use in the military. The wolf has a bite far stronger than any domestic dog,and also has far more accurate hearing and smell—perfect for tracking. They are also extremely aggressive and hardy animals, able to go for days without food or sleep. They would, in theory, make great guard dogs.

Best of luck with that one, comrade. It proved impossible to domesticate the wolf. Although puppies were removed from their mothers and hand-reared in comfortable homes with plenty of human attention, upon reaching adolescence the wolves simply refused to obey orders or adhere to any structure. They were also prone to become aggressive, snatching food wherever they could and attacking owners that tried to put them in line. A wild animal is always a wild animal. The domestic dog is an ancestor of the wolf, but clearly even the most aggressive breeds like pit bulls and Rottweilers have different genetic traits.

The aftermath of the experiment

The project was a total failure but spawned another venture that attempted to breed foxes to become more domesticated. Foxes were taken from the wild and from farms where they were reared for their fur. The tamer, more placid animals were bred with each other, and as a control the more aggressive foxes were only allowed to breed with each other.

Within a few generations the tame foxes were becoming tamer and tamer, welcoming human interaction and behaving more and more like pets, while the aggressive animals would take your finger off, just for touching their cage.

It seemed that the aggressive tendencies of the foxes were a function of their genetics. In order to test this, puppies of aggressive couplings were given to the more gentle fox mothers to rear, while gentle fox puppies were given to the aggressive mothers—it made no difference. Even inplanting embryos from aggressive foxes into more domesticated mothers did not produce marked results. An aggressive animal was an aggressive animal according to its lineage.

This is where it gets really interesting

As the generations of interbreeding only the tamer and more domesticated foxes continued, the tame animals began to show changes to their morphology. Sloppy ears, curly tails, white fur around their faces, and so forth. Not only did they behave more like domestic dogs, but they began to look like them as well. BY 20-30 generations of breeding, which only the Soviets could pull off with their massive government machinery, the foxes were practically household pets and looked less like foxes and more like common breeds. They also had the temperament to match.

It's not hard to understand that continuing to breed and select the tame foxes and specifically choosing traits would soon land you with anything from a sheep dog to a shih tzu. More interesting, though, is the way that their appearance was absolutely linked to their genetic trait of being more placid and more easily tamed. It wasn't necessary to look for changes in morphology to identify behavior characteristics, only to select breeding pairs according to how tame and well behaved they were—the rest would follow.

No one has applied these kinds of breeding regimens to the human race, but it would be logical to assume that similar rules apply. Humans are more complex, but to some extent, the more appealing and attractive a person is, the more well-balanced and social they are. It's not just appearance but a genetic characteristic that defines behavior. There is a reason why gangsters often look so mean and nasty; it's not just a put-up job. In the same way then, the females of the race are not only more physically appealing with softer skin and rounder faces, but they are also more amenable when it comes to social situations. Hence, the age-old BFF relationships that form overnight.

This has been deliberately bred into women, by the men that mated with them, over hundreds and thousands of years. Picking a female to mate with, a man would most likely pick an attractive one, because that also meant she was better behaved. On the flip side, a woman that was better behaved would be more likely to mate and thus pass on her more attractive characteristics to her offspring. Perhaps there is some truth to the concept of royal lineage after all.

The human application

What this means for men and women is that men's more aggressive, dry, and logistical nature is not something they can change. Men do not need to get in touch with their emotions or seek out their feminine side—if anything that is a completely unnatural request. Furthermore, it's just as unreasonable to expect a man to "behave" according to female standards as it would be to ask a woman to piss standing up.

That's not to say that gentle characteristics cannot be displayed by men—of course they are capable of feelings and kind actions, etc. The point is that they have a genetic programming and a need for more assertive or even aggressive behavior. It's simply a matter of finding an outlet for that, because that very male trait is most important to the survival of the human race.

It doesn’t take four decades of Soviet experimentation to tell you that the drawback of breeding the foxes into domestic animals is that they cannot survive well in the wild. Any dog that goes feral has a tough time, because they cannot easily hunt, they lack an aggressive “animal” drive and want to cuddle up to some higher power than themselves. They are inherently beta. The same goes for females and “pretty boys.” As lovely as they all are, they are not as capable of taking risks, meeting confrontation, taking leadership positions, arranging logistics, or meeting schedules. This is because their very nature makes them more placid and nurturing.

Of course the counter to that is more developed social skills that can get them what they need to survive by using others rather than fending for themselves. A wolf is more likely to bite your hand off, whereas a domestic dog will beg for food, make funny noises, play cold or injured, or hold one paw out. They have way more advanced non0-threatening social skills (as do women) and they also offer companionship, guard dog duties, tracking, and hunting, which are their latent skills from being wild animals. The same thing applies to women who offer social skills, home making skills, and parenting abilities to comfort their man who doesn’t have the same priorities.

